Calling the exposure of the hidden effort to reclassify records a "turning-point moment," Allen Weinstein, the head of the National Archives, announced a new effort to set consistent standards for deciding what records should be protected.

The pilot National Declassification Initiative, overseen by the archives, will seek to reduce what Mr. Weinstein called an "unconscionable backlog" of historical records not yet released and to avoid unnecessary classification in the future.

"We're in the access business, not the classification business," Mr. Weinstein said. He said all the agencies that had withdrawn records, including the Air Force and the Central Intelligence Agency, had agreed to drop the practice of secretly reclassifying documents and to operate under new standards of transparency.

Paul Gimigliano, a C.I.A. spokesman, said the reclassification of documents had been necessary because other agencies had released C.I.A. intelligence without allowing the spy agency to review it.

"Once classified material is made accessible to the public, there are few good options to protect that information," Mr. Gimigliano said Wednesday. "That said, the C.I.A. has worked very closely with the archives to improve the process and ensure that the public has maximum access to properly declassified records."

In announcing the results of the audit, both Mr. Weinstein and Mr. Leonard said it raised unsettling questions about the overall quality of decisions by the three million Americans who hold security clearances about what should be secret. "To be effective, the classification process is a tool that must be wielded with precision," Mr. Leonard said.

The audit found that 25,315 documents were withdrawn from public access, far more than the 9,000 they estimated in February, and that 64 percent met the minimal criteria for classification. The Air Force was responsible for the largest share — 17,702 — followed by the C.I.A., the Department of Energy, the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the presidential libraries, which are part of the National Archives system.

The auditors discovered that C.I.A. reviewers deliberately classified some "purely unclassified" documents simply to obscure the removal of other documents they judged to be genuinely sensitive. In addition, the audit showed, some records that had always been unclassified were classified by C.I.A. reviewers — "often 50 years later" — because they contained a name of a C.I.A. official who had received a copy.

At the same time, the audit noted that more than one billion pages of previously secret government documents have been declassified since 1995, four times more than in the 15 years before that. It praised the C.I.A. for placing millions of pages of documents into a searchable computer system that is accessible to researchers at the archives.

The reclassification of documents began after some agencies found that their records had been improperly declassified in the mid-1990's in a process the audit admitted was "replete with errors." The review took place largely hidden from public view, and researchers found entire boxes of records missing from the shelves with only vague notations about "restricted status" as an explanation.

A few months ago, a number of historians led by Matthew M. Aid, a Washington writer on intelligence, discovered that documents they had copied at the archives long ago had been removed. In February, they confronted archives officials, who suspended all reclassifications and ordered the audit.

The withdrawal of documents was governed in part by secret agreements the National Archives signed with the C.I.A., in 2001, and the Air Force, in 2002, before Mr. Weinstein's tenure. Mr. Weinstein said Wednesday that such agreements were improper and should never have been signed.

Reaction to the audit and the planned overhaul of declassification from the affected government agencies, as well as from historians who had complained about the reclassification, was generally positive.

Mr. Aid, the historian who first uncovered the reclassifications, said he found the audit professional and its results "shocking."

"The various reclassification programs were, in my opinion, a massive waste of time and the taxpayers' money in a time of war, and did not enhance or improve U.S. national security at all," Mr. Aid said.

An Air Force spokeswoman, First Lt. Christy A. Stravolo, said: "This audit was a good thing. In the long run, it will improve the consistency of declassification processes across the board."

Archives: 1 In 3 Records Wrongly Resealed (AP-Y2)

By Hope Yen

AP2, April 26, 2006

The government improperly sealed hundreds of previously public CIA, Pentagon and other records by reclassifying them as secret on questionable grounds, an internal review said Wednesday.

The National Archives' audit of thousands of records withdrawn from public view since 1995 contends that one of every three was resealed without justification.

The investigation covered historical records held by the National Archives. But it comes amid broader debate on classifying records on national security grounds, which critics say is often done based on political expediency.

The Associated Press reported earlier this month that the National Archives agreed to seal previously public records — many of them more than 50 years old — despite concerns about whether it was justified.

On the other hand, Democrats have decried the timing of President Bush's 2003 decision to declassify sensitive intelligence and authorize its disclosure to rebut Iraq war critics. In recent weeks, the CIA has fired an employee accused of sharing classified information with news media.

"The ability and authority to classify national security information is a critical tool at the disposal of the government and its leaders," said William Leonard, head of the Archives' information security oversight office, in a briefing with reporters.

Such a system, Leonard said, is only effective if the 3 million federal workers who decide whether to seal records on national security grounds each day follow clear standards and are kept honest.

While the audit found numerous instances of improper reclassification, the National Archives declined to release details of what those documents contained, saying it was still working with the agencies to make them public again.

According to the audit:

_At least 32,315 publicly available records were reclassified since 1995, primarily by the U.S. Air Force (17,702), CIA (3,147) and Energy Department (2,164). Based on a sampling of 1,353 of those documents, 24 percent were resealed on clearly inappropriate grounds, while another 12 percent were questionable.

_Poor oversight by the agencies and the National Archives was to blame, primarily due to a lack of clear standards and protocol for reclassification.

_In many cases where a previously public document was resealed on national security grounds, the decision didn't make sense because the material had been published elsewhere.

National Archivist Allen Weinstein said at the news briefing that he was implementing new procedures to curtail abuses and ensure that resealing of documents is rare. The procedures require that the public be informed on a regular basis when records are withdrawn from public access.

The archives also will boost training, seek more federal funding to speed declassification and launch a longer-term study of how it handles materials that are deemed classified.

The archives' secret agreements with government agencies were made public earlier this month in response to a 3-year-old Freedom of Information Act request by The Associated Press. They provided new details on the efforts of the nation's chief historical repository to hide the fact that U.S. intelligence was secretly trying to reclassify approximately 55,500 pages of previously public documents.

The revelation drew widespread anger on Capitol Hill, and the agreement was even disowned by a former head of the archives. John Carlin, a former Kansas governor who served as chief archivist from 1995 to 2004, said the agreement was kept secret even from him.

"I was shocked by the content, particularly the language that it was in the best interest of the National Archives to keep the public in the dark," he said in a statement last week. "I spent most of my tenure stating that NARA is a public trust — this (agreement) undermines that trust."

Archives officials have been criticized for keeping the agreements secret. But internal NARA reports obtained by the AP under the Freedom of Information Act show archivists were concerned about the reclassification scheme as early as January 2003. As boxes of documents were pulled from shelves, historians and other researchers who regularly use archival materials were beginning to notice their absence.

"Researchers continue to question why records, some of which have been open for years, are not readily available for research in 2003," archivists said in a January 2003 report. "The exceptional efforts of the (staff) ... have worked to placate most of the impacted researchers, and complaints are amazingly few in number."

Two years later, NARA officials appeared frustrated by the reclassification effort.

"The amount of disruption to timely reference service wreaked by ... declassification (sic!) teams is growing," a NARA official said in an April 2005 report. "The Air Force team seems particularly bent on expanding their mandate to series of records well beyond recognized rationality considering the sort of information they are allegedly seeking to identify."

Lorillard Seeks To Reverse Anti-Smoking Ads Decision (DOW)

Dow Jones, April 27, 2006

WILMINGTON, Del. -(Dow Jones)- Lorillard Tobacco Co. Wednesday asked the Delaware Supreme Court to overturn a ruling that the "truth" series of anti- smoking ads does not "vilify" the tobacco industry.

The maker of Newport, Kent, True and Old Gold cigarette brands says the ad campaign, which is targeted at children and teenagers, violates the bargain tobacco companies made in 1998 to settle lawsuits from 46 state attorneys general, an agreement that called for the industry to pay for anti-smoking ads.

Lorillard wants to strip funding from American Legacy Foundation, the non- profit organization behind the "truth" ads and the recipient of $1.5 billion in funds under the settlement. According to the company, the ads breach restrictions against vilification and personal attacks contained in the settlement.

"We are pursuing this lawsuit because we want to get what we bargained for," Ronald Milstein, general counsel for Lorillard, a unit of the Loews Corp. (LTR) (LTR), told Dow Jones Newswires in an interview after the hearing.

American Legacy says that the ads have to be edgy to reach the defiant youngsters most at risk of smoking but that the campaign is tailored to avoid personal attacks and vilification, which it defines as abusive and unfair portrayals of tobacco companies.

Last year, a Delaware judge sided with American Legacy and against Lorillard in a legal battle over the "truth" ads.

Lorillard appealed the decision, and the Delaware Supreme Court is expected to rule later this year on whether American Legacy's "truth" ad campaign crossed the line by tackling evils in tobacco industry profiteering along with the evils of smoking.

Wednesday, a five-judge panel in Delaware viewed some "truth" ads, including a commercial showing young people piling body bags outside the headquarters of an unidentified tobacco company to illustrate the daily death toll from smoking.

That ad breached the deal, said John Parkins, attorney for Lorillard.

Another ad, which showed passers-by reacting to what seemed to be an abandoned, crying infant in a baby carriage, did not transgress, he said.

"They can run an effective, hard-hitting campaign without vilifying or personally attacking tobacco companies," Parkins said.

The dispute in Delaware is focused on the meaning of a very few words in the settlement in which tobacco companies agreed to fund anti-smoking ads, a settlement that created American Legacy.

But it's a fight that the foundation says could mean an end to the only anti- smoking ad campaign not controlled by cigarette makers.

"If they (Lorillard) were to have an all-out win in this court, that would basically shut us down," American Legacy Chief Executive Cheryl Healton told Dow Jones Newswires in an interview before Wednesday's debate before the Delaware Supreme Court.

The foundation points to academic studies that show the "truth" campaigns accomplish their goal of preventing youth smoking. Industry-funded ads are tailored to portray smoking as an adults-only activity and are thus more likely to make cigarettes attractive to rebellious teens, American Legacy's CEO said.

Healton said tobacco companies know the "truth" ads are costing them customers. Instead of dealing with American Legacy, she said, Lorillard is asking the Delaware court for a ruling that will let cigarette makers "start over with some well-behaved entity that won't cut their market share."

Lorillard's top lawyer says tobacco companies are not out to kill anti-smoking ad campaigns but they do not want to pay for ads that show them as profiteers at the expense of public health.

"Ads do not cause people to want to smoke," Milstein said.

Wednesday's arguments came just days after Delaware and a number of other states sued Lorillard and R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. for allegedly shortchanging them in this year's settlement payments.

Lorillard and R.J. Reynolds say they have placed more than $750 million in escrow pending a resolution of how much they owe in 2006 on the settlement.

Vermont Attorney General William H. Sorrell, who also filed a suit over the 2006 shortfall, was in the Dover, Del., courtroom Wednesday as a member of American Legacy's board.

"We need to be able to continue an ad campaign that speaks to kids," Sorrell said in an interview. However, he said, American Legacy screens ads carefully to make sure they don't violate the covenant against personal attacks or abusive characterization.

"We've taken it very, very seriously that we can't throw just anything out there," Sorrell said. "That word vilification is there for a reason."

The Delaware Supreme Court arguments also come as American Legacy awaits a ruling from a federal judge in Washington, D.C., in the U.S. Department of Justice's case against tobacco companies. The Justice Department has recommended that $4 billion of any settlement in the case be earmarked for American Legacy, to expand its award-winning advertising effort.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Supreme Court To Decide Whether It's OK To Require ID To Vote (AP)

By DAVID EGGERT, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, April 27, 2006

LANSING, Mich. (AP) -- The state Supreme Court agreed Wednesday to decide whether Michigan can require voters to show photo ID, entering a decade-long political fray over issues such as election fraud and voter intimidation.

The court voted 5-2 to issue an advisory opinion on the constitutionality of a 1997 state law requiring voters to show photo identification to get a ballot. A court spokeswoman said the ruling will be binding, though it could be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Former Attorney General Frank Kelley, a Democrat, ruled nine years ago that the law violated the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, which guarantees U.S. citizens the right to vote.

Opponents of the law say the requirement would keep poor people, non-drivers and others away from the polls. But supporters say it's needed to prevent election fraud.

The U.S. Justice Department, for example, has been investigating allegations that Detroit votes were cast last year in the names of dead people.

In February, the Republican-controlled state House passed a resolution asking the Supreme Court for an opinion after the 1997 law was amended to make an array of election-related changes. Five Republican nominees on the court agreed with the request, while two Democratic nominees opposed it.

"We can ensure the sanctity of the voting process," House Speaker Craig DeRoche, R-Novi, said of requiring ID to vote.

The high court asked Republican Attorney General Mike Cox to submit separate briefs within 84 days -- one arguing that the law is constitutional and the other arguing it is unconstitutional. The court also invited the state Bureau of Elections, Michigan Democratic Party and Michigan Republican Party to file arguments. It will hear oral arguments later.

Kelley appeared before the Attorney General Opinion Review Board last November to argue that his opinion should be left standing.

The board was considering a July request from state Rep. Chris Ward, R-Brighton, that Cox issue a new opinion on the law. A Cox spokesman said Wednesday that Cox will not issue a legal ruling because the matter is now pending before the Supreme Court.

Jason Moon, spokesman for the state Democratic Party, said requiring a photo ID is an illegal poll tax. But Ward has said would-be voters who don't have an ID could get a state-issued card free of charge.

Marcia McBrien, spokeswoman for the Michigan Supreme Court, said the court will decide whether the state law is constitutional on its face. She added that parties could challenge the state law in federal court.

Court rulings have been mixed regarding voter ID requirements.

Earlier this month, a federal judge upheld an Indiana law requiring voters to present photo identification, saying it places reasonable restrictions on casting a ballot.

But last year, a federal judge held that a Georgia law amounted to an unconstitutional poll tax and issued a temporary injunction blocking enforcement while the government appealed.

In January, the Republican-led Legislature amended the law to provide free photo IDs to any Georgian who needed one, and the U.S. Department of Justice signed off on the law last week.

Marriage Battle Gears Up For Fall (WP)

By Chris L. Jenkins

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

RICHMOND -- At the Shad Planking in Wakefield, the traditional kickoff to Virginia's political campaign season, activists passed around chunks of pearl-white wedding cake and handed out yellow and black stickers that read, "Vote Yes 4 Marriage."

Days earlier, outside a post office in Fredericksburg, another group stood with clipboards and fliers and held up pumpkin-orange signs written in block letters to promote their cause. It was tax day, and one man held a sign that said, "No Taxation With Discrimination."

These are the beginnings of a statewide political campaign not for an individual candidate but for an idea. The groups represent the two sides of the debate over the proposed amendment to the Virginia Bill of Rights that would ban same-sex marriages and civil unions and will be on the ballot statewide Nov. 7.

"The campaign is in its infancy . . . we're finding that a lot of people don't even know about the constitutional amendment," said Doug Pfaff, a landscape designer from Fredericksburg who was among about 20 people opposed to the amendment who rallied last week along Princess Anne Street downtown. "Our job between now and November is trying to not only get people educated, but get them mobilized."

More than six months before Election Day, supporters and opponents have formed coalitions they hope will raise hundreds of thousands of dollars and lure scores of volunteers to their voter outreach efforts.

"This is a campaign that has similar attributes to a campaign as if we were electing a candidate," Chris Freund, director of communications for the Family Foundation, told a group of black ministers last week. The foundation is helping to lead the effort to pass the amendment. "Except here, we're electing marriage. We're voting on marriage."

Organizers on both sides said they hope to raise enough money to fill the airwaves with radio and television ads. And they vowed to send volunteers to as many county fairs, clambakes and cookouts as needed to get the vote out.

Since the adoption of the modern constitution of Virginia in 1971, the document has been altered more than 40 times, but proposed amendments have rarely engendered passionate campaigns. The last time the state's 230-year-old Bill of Rights was amended was 1996, with a new section that addressed the rights of crime victims.

"This will certainly be unique," said A.E. Dick Howard, a University of Virginia law professor who helped draft the state's modern constitution. "In most cases the amendments are so . . . technical that the first time people have heard of them is at the voting booth."

Nineteen states have passed constitutional amendments barring same-sex marriage, and six others will place the issue before voters this year. No such amendment put to voters has been defeated, but the issue continues to roil statehouses across the country. In Maryland, lawmakers debated the topic this year after a circuit court judge found the state's 33-year-old ban on same-sex marriages to be unconstitutional.

Opponents of the marriage amendment will try to convince voters that the measure is about more than "electing marriage" and might also affect unwed heterosexual couples because it says the state should not recognize "a legal status for relationships of unmarried individuals." Organizers said that although they will tell voters that they should not "write discrimination" into the state constitution and that gay couples deserve civil benefits, they will largely seek to raise the specter that the amendment could harm some heterosexual couples.

"Once people understand that this is about more than just marriage, their support for it plummets," said Claire Guthrie Gastanaga, campaign director for the Commonwealth Coalition, which is fighting the ballot question.

Proponents say the amendment will protect Virginia from judges who might interpret the constitution to allow such unions. And they say there is no evidence that the amendment will void contracts between unwed heterosexual couples, as opponents have warned it will.

"Our job is to make sure that the misinformation doesn't stick," said Del. Robert G. Marshall (R-Prince William), chief sponsor of the constitutional amendment. He predicted that opponents will have a difficult time grabbing voters' attention with what he termed a complicated legal argument.

Meanwhile, proponents have aimed their message at church pastors across the state. At Saturday's meeting with the black ministers, Freund handed out DVDs titled "Why not Gay Marriage?" He also announced a "Marriage Protection Sunday" on Nov. 5, when proponents will urge pastors across the state to get their flocks to vote yes on the amendment.

The marriage amendment will be on the ballot the same day U.S. Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) hopes to win reelection. In 2004, when 11 states passed similar measures, political observers said the amendments helped drive conservative Republicans to the polls and to President Bush, particularly in swing states such as Ohio. Allen includes support for the amendment in his stump speeches, and a spokesman predicted that the senator's position will help him on Election Day.

"We think Senator Allen is on the same side as the majority of Virginians," said campaign consultant Dick Wadhams.

Aides for the two Democrats vying to defeat Allen, former high-tech lobbyist Harris Miller and former Navy secretary James Webb, said their candidates oppose the amendment. Taylor West, press secretary for Miller, called the ballot question a "cynical attempt to divide Virginians" and said her candidate will focus on "the real issues" that affect voters, such as health care and jobs.

Study Assesses How Many Gays Marry If Legal (AP)

By David Crary, Ap National Writer

AP, April 27, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-A new study attempts to gauge the percentage of gays and lesbians who have chosen to marry in places where that option is legal, with estimates ranging from as little as 2 percent to more than 16 percent, depending on the location.

A co-author of the report, released Wednesday, said both sides in the gay marriage debate may take heart from the findings.

The Institute for Marriage and Public Policy, which opposes gay marriage, reviewed data from the Netherlands, Belgium, Canada and Massachusetts, all of which allow same-sex partners to wed.

In each case, the study offered a range of estimates of the percentage of gays who had married, based on varying approximations - from 1 percent to 5 percent - of how many gays were in the general population.

In the Netherlands, where 8,127 same-sex couples married from April 1, 2001, through last December, the study said this represented between 2.6 percent and 6.3 percent of the country's gays and lesbians.

The study estimated that between 2 percent and 5 percent of Belgium's gays and lesbians, and 5.9 percent to 16.7 percent of those in Massachusetts had married. Same-sex marriage became legal in Massachusetts in May 2004, and 7,341 gay and lesbians couples had wed there through last December.

The institute study said calculations for Canada were difficult because the country allowed nonresidents to marry, but it estimated that as many as 14.3 percent of the gays and lesbians in the western province of British Columbia had married.

The report does not draw any major conclusions, saying it is too early to assess long-term trends.

"Whether same-sex marriage will emerge as commonplace or normative among gays and lesbians, or fade as time and novelty passes, cannot yet be determined," it said.

However, Maggie Gallagher, president of the Institute for Marriage and co-author of the study, said interpretations of the findings might vary according to one's views on gay marriage.

One faction, she said, might conclude that opposition to gay marriage was an overreaction given that seemingly modest numbers of people were choosing it. Another faction, she said, might look at the same numbers and contend that they did not justify overturning the long-standing concept of marriage as exclusively heterosexual.

"That's why the debate is so contentious," Gallagher said. "In one view, if you treat gay couples any differently, that's akin to racism. There's another view that there's something special about the unions of husbands and wives."

Gary Gates, a specialist in gay demography at the UCLA School of Law's Williams Institute, was given an advance look at the study. He disagreed with Gallagher's suggestion that relatively few gays and lesbians were opting for marriage.

Looking specifically at the Massachusetts data, and noting the limited time period of 20 months, he contended that a sharply higher percentage of gays and lesbians were deciding marry than heterosexuals of marrying age.

"Numerically, same-sex couples will never comprise a major portion of the married population," Gates said in a telephone interview. "But gay people do seem to be really interested in getting married - it's kind of a compliment to the institution of marriage."

Activists Visit West Point On Gay Policy (AP-Y2)

By Michael Virtanen

AP2, April 26, 2006

Twenty-one gay rights activists were detained at the U.S. Military Academy and issued federal citations Wednesday while protesting the Pentagon's "don't ask, don't tell" policy.

The academy was their last stop on a 20-stop, cross-country tour of conservative Christian and military colleges that protest organizers say discriminate against gay, bisexual and transgendered people.

Members of the protest group Soulforce Equality Riders have faced charges for protests at five of the campuses. Ten were handcuffed and charged with disorderly conduct after demonstrating April 14 at the U.S. Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs, Colo.

On Wednesday, about 50 protesters arrived on buses at the gate that separates the storied U.S. Military Academy from the village of Highland Falls. The 21 detained had entered campus grounds and were warned they risked federal charges if they continued to try to protest inside the post.

After several trips through the gate, they were cited by military police for entry to military property for unlawful purposes, a misdemeanor. Federal law prohibits protests on military installations.

"I felt it was definitely something I should be doing," said protester Chad Grandy, 20, of Mount Pleasant, Mich., who was among those ticketed. "To see government-sanctioned discrimination, it really bothers me."

The "don't ask, don't tell" policy for the U.S. military and its service academies, set by Congress and signed by President Clinton, allows gays to serve in the armed forces if they abstain from homosexual activity and do not disclose their sexual orientation.

The Death Of Multiculturalism (NYT)

By David Brooks
The New York Times, April 27, 2006

In 1994 multiculturalism was at its high-water mark, and Richard Bernstein wrote "Dictatorship of Virtue," describing its excesses: the campus speech codes, the forced sensitivity training, the purging of dead white males from curriculums, the people who had their careers ruined by dubious charges of racism, sexism and ethnocentrism.

Then two years later, the liberal writer Michael Tomasky published "Left for Dead," which argued that the progressive movement was being ruined by multicultural identity politics. Democrats have lost the ability to talk to Americans collectively, Tomasky wrote, and seem to be a collection of aggrieved out-groups: feminists, blacks, gays and so on.

At the time, Bernstein and Tomasky were lonely voices on the left, and the multiculturalists struck back. For example, Martin Duberman slammed Tomasky's book in The Nation, and defended multiculturalism:

"The radical redefinitions of gender and sexuality that are under discussion in feminist and queer circles contain a potentially transformative challenge to all 'regimes of the normal.' The work of theorists like Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick, Jeffrey Weeks, Marjorie Garber and Judith Butler represents a deliberate systemic affront to fixed modes of being and patterns of power. They offer brilliant (if not incontrovertible) postulates about such universal matters as the historicity and fluidity of sexual desire, the performative nature of gender, and the multiplicity of impulses, narratives and loyalties that lie within us all."

Duberman insisted that postmodern multicultural theorizing would transform politics, but today his gaseous review reads as if it came from a different era, like an embarrassing glimpse of leisure suits in an old home movie.

That's because over the past few years, multiculturalism has faded away. A different sort of liberalism is taking over the Democratic Party.

Multiculturalism is in decline for a number of reasons. First, the identity groups have ossified. The feminist organizations were hypocritical during the Clinton impeachment scandal, and both fevered and weak during the Roberts and Alito hearings. Meanwhile, the civil rights groups have become stale and uninteresting.

Second, the Democrats have come to understand that they need to pay less attention to minorities and more to the white working class if they ever want to become the majority party again. Third, the intellectual energy on the left is now with the economists. People who write about inequality are more vibrant than people who write about discrimination.

Fourth and most important, 9/11 happened. The attacks aroused feelings of national solidarity, or a longing for national solidarity, that discredited the multiculturalists' tribalism.

Tomasky is now back with an essay in The American Prospect in which he argues that it is time Democrats cohered around a big idea — not diversity, and not individual rights, but the idea of the common good. The Democrats' central themes, Tomasky advises, should be that we're all in this together; we are all part of a larger national project; we all need to make some shared sacrifices and look beyond our narrow self-interest. Tomasky is hoping for a candidate who will ignore the demands of the single-issue groups and argue that all Americans have a stake in reducing economic fragmentation and social division.

Coincidentally, two other liberal writers, John Halpin and Ruy Teixeira, have just finished a long study that comes out in exactly the same place. Surveying mountains of polling data, they conclude that the Democrats' chief problem is that people don't think they stand for anything. Halpin and Teixeira argue that the message voters respond to best is the notion of shared sacrifice for the common good. After years of individualism from right and left, they observe, people are ready for an appeal to citizenship.

Naturally, this approach has weaknesses. Unlike in 1964, most Americans no longer trust government to be the altruistic champion of the common good, even if they wish it could. And while writers and voters talk about the common good, politicians are wired to think about their team. Harry Reid and Chuck Schumer will never ask their people to make sacrifices, but until they do, the higher talk of common good will sound like bilge.

Nonetheless, the decline of multiculturalism and the rebirth of liberal American nationalism is a significant event. Democrats are purging the last vestiges of the New Left and returning to the older civic liberalism of the 1950's and early 1960's.

Goodbye, Jesse Jackson. Goodbye, Gloria Steinem. Hello, Harry Truman.

Committee Will Probe Oil Industry Tax Records (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

A Senate committee yesterday announced an investigation into taxes paid by major oil companies and asked the Internal Revenue Service for the companies' tax returns.

The Senate Finance Committee promised "a comprehensive review of the federal taxes paid" by the 15 largest oil and gas companies. The panel said it wants to inspect their tax returns for the past five years.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), the committee's chairman, said the panel is concerned about high profits and executive compensation at oil companies.

With gasoline prices soaring and oil companies announcing record profits, "it's relevant to know what the real financial picture is for this industry," said Sen. Max Baucus (Mont.), the ranking Democrat on the committee.

It is highly unusual for the Senate committee to seek corporate tax records. The last time it was done was when the panel asked the IRS for the tax records of Enron Corp.

The committee announcement came as Congress showed increasing concern amid political fallout over high gasoline prices and oil industry profits. Lawmakers began moving on various fronts to eliminate loopholes and some tax provisions that save oil companies billions of dollars.

In their request, the senators noted not only the industry profits but also "an extremely lucrative retirement plan by one oil and gas industry executive." The compensation package given by Exxon Mobil Corp. to outgoing Chairman Lee Raymond is said to total $400 million when all pension payoffs and stock options are included.

Senate Panel Demands Oil Co. Tax Records (AP-Y2)

By H. Josef Hebert

AP2, April 26, 2006

A Senate committee Wednesday announced an investigation into taxes paid by major oil companies and asked the Internal Revenue Service for the companies' tax returns.

The Senate Finance Committee promised "a comprehensive review of the federal taxes paid" by the 15 largest oil and gas companies. The committee said it wanted to inspect their tax returns for the last five years.

Sen. Charles Grassley (news, bio, voting record), R-Iowa, the committee's chairman, said the panel was concerned about high profits and executive compensation at oil companies.

"I want to make sure the oil companies aren't taking a speed pass by the tax man," said Grassley in a statement.

With gasoline prices soaring and oil companies announcing record profits, "it's relevant to know what the real financial picture is for this industry," Montana Sen. Max Baucus (news, bio, voting record), the ranking Democrat on the committee, said.

It's highly unusual for the Senate committee to seek corporate tax records. The last time it was done was when the panel asked the IRS for the tax records of Enron Corp.

The committee announcement came as Congress showed increasing concern amid political fallout over high gasoline prices and oil industry profits. Lawmakers began moving on various fronts to eliminate loopholes and some tax provisions that save oil companies billions of dollars.

In a letter to the IRS, Grassley and Baucus said the tax records of the major oil companies are needed to conduct "a comprehensive review" of the companies' compliance with tax laws.

"As pressure mounts to address extraordinarily high gas prices that consumers are facing at the pump, we feel we should better understand the federal tax posture of the industry," the two senators wrote IRS Commissioner Mark Everson.

In their request, the senators noted not only the industry profits, but "an extremely lucrative retirement plan by one oil and gas industry executive, benefits which may have been subsidized in part by the taxpayers."

The retirement compensation package given by Exxon Mobil Corp. to outgoing Chairman Lee Raymond is said to total $400 million when all pension payoffs and stock options are included.

Anger over soaring gasoline prices and record oil profits is putting pressure on Congress to eliminate loopholes and some tax provisions that save oil companies billions of dollars.

A House-Senate conference, negotiating a large tax bill, is considering a provision that would change accounting rules for oil inventories and require the five biggest oil companies to pay $4.3 billion more in taxes.

The measure passed the Senate but was viewed as essentially dead this week because of opposition from House GOP lawmakers. The White House opposed the idea, too, when it surfaced in November and threatened to veto the entire bill because of it.

Grassley said Wednesday that high fuel prices revived the inventory tax plan and it "is still being negotiated."

His House counterpart in the negotiations, Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, R-Calif., said the issue has not been decided. He denied he had rejected it.

Additionally, there is broad bipartisan support for scuttling other breaks given to oil companies only eight months ago when President Bush signed an energy bill.

Bush on Wednesday urged Congress to remove those tax provisions, worth $2 billion over 10 years. He said people should not pay for such subsidies when the industry is wallowing in cash.

Sen. Pete Domenici (news, bio, voting record), chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, promised to press hard to repeal the subsidies. Domenici, R-N.M., said he cannot support tax breaks for oil companies "while some American families are searching their budgets for the extra cash they need to fill their gas tanks."

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said he intended to offer legislation repealing the tax breaks. They included subsidies for exploration in deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico and in geologically or politically difficult regions of the world, as well as royalty relief for certain oil and gas exploration.

Executives of the major oil companies said at a recent hearing they do not need those tax breaks.

"They feel they are not necessary. We are not involved in trying to hold them in place," Red Cavaney, president of the American Petroleum Institute, said Wednesday at a news conference.

Cavaney criticized the proposed changes on oil inventory accounting, calling them "equivalent to a windfall profits tax" for the five largest U.S. oil companies.

The Senate-passed plan would change accounting rules for oil kept in inventory. The changes would raise $4.3 billion in additional taxes from the companies over five years, according to a congressional analysis.

Cavaney said it was unfair to single out the five companies — Exxon Mobil Corp., Chevron, BP, Shell and ConocoPhillips — for an accounting practice widely used both in and outside the oil industry.

Congressional Democrats see the uproar over the surge in gasoline costs as a chance to renew their push for a windfall profits tax.

"When Exxon Mobil can realize billions of dollars of profits at the expense of millions of American families, it's time to step up" and tax more of those earnings, said Sen. Richard Durbin (news, bio, voting record), D-Ill.

A few Republicans, including Sen. Arlen Specter (news, bio, voting record) of Pennsylvania, have said a windfall profits tax ought to be examined, but most GOP lawmakers — and Bush — strongly oppose it.

It "failed miserably" when it was tried in the early 1980s and there is no reason to try it again, House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, told reporters.

US Senate Seeks Oil Co. Tax Returns As Gasoline Rises (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Jim Efstathiou Jr.

Bloomberg, April 27, 2006

April 26 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Senate is seeking tax returns from Exxon Mobil Corp., Chevron Corp. and others among the 15 largest oil and gas companies in the U.S. to ensure they are paying the full amount due on record profits.

In a letter today to Internal Revenue Service Commissioner Mark Everson, Senator Charles Grassley, the Republican chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and Senator Max Baucus, the committee's ranking Democrat, said they need the information to ``better understand the federal tax posture of the industry."

The request is for federal corporate tax returns for the last five years of the 15 largest companies based on sales. President George W. Bush and Republicans in Congress face growing pressure from voters with crude oil and gasoline near all-time highs. A CNN poll released this week found 69 percent of U.S. adults say higher fuel costs are causing financial hardship.

``The whole country is trying to figure out what should be done about record high gasoline prices at a time of record oil company profits," Baucus said in a statement. Congress needs to know ``what the real financial picture is for this industry, because the financial picture for American consumers is pretty bleak."

Profit for Irving, Texas-based Exxon Mobil Corp., the world's biggest oil company, climbed last year to $36.1 billion, a record for any U.S. company. The combined 2005 earnings of Exxon Mobil, BP Plc, Royal Dutch Shell Plc, Chevron and ConocoPhillips, topped $111 billion.

Reducing Incentives?

Bush, in a speech on energy issues yesterday in Washington, said the American people expect oil companies to plough more of their profits into investments in refineries and production projects that might eventually ease prices. He also said Congress should roll back incentives to the oil industry that will cost the U.S. about $2 billion over 10 years.

While Grassley's committee has scrapped a proposal to boost oil company taxes by $5 billion through an accounting rule change, Democratic Senator Byron Dorgan of North Dakota is proposing a 50 percent excise tax on profits from oil sold at more than $40 a barrel.

Republican Senator Arlen Specter said Congress should consider taxing the ``windfall profits" reaped by oil companies as a result of surging crude oil prices. Specter, of Pennsylvania, earlier this month introduced legislation to strengthen antitrust enforcement of the oil and natural gas industry to counter the consolidation of production and refining operations.

Soaring Prices

The average U.S. pump price for regular gasoline rose to its highest since Oct. 3, climbing 13.1 cents to $2.914 a gallon in the week ended April 24, the U.S. Energy Department said. Crude oil, which accounts for about 60 percent of the price of gasoline, fell 95 cents, or 1.3 percent, to close at $71.90 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Prices are 33 percent higher than a year ago.

The request for information refers to record industry profits and recent press reports of ``an extremely lucrative retirement plan by one oil and gas industry executive." Lee Raymond, who retired at the end of last year as chairman of Exxon Mobil, will receive stock and benefits worth $357 million.

The package, which Raymond said was justified by his performance, includes a $98.4 million lump-sum payment of pension benefits and the year-end valuation of the stock and stock options accumulated in more than 40 years with the company.

``We're seeing record profits and significant executive compensation in the oil and gas industry," Grassley said in a statement. ``We all know there can be a slip between cup and lip on corporate profits made and taxes paid. I want to make sure the oil companies aren't taking a speed pass by the tax man."

The 15 largest oil companies aren't identified in the request.

US Senate Seeks Tax Records Of Oil Companies (FT)

By Holly Yeager

Financial Times, April 27, 2006

The leaders of a Senate committee demanded the tax records of the 15 largest US oil and gas companies on Wednesday, opening a new front in the politically charged battle over high petrol prices.

The unusual demand for sensitive financial information underscores the pressure among politicians to show they are responding to record fuel prices. A CNN poll this week found that 69 per cent of adults said high fuel prices had caused financial hardship.

Chuck Grassley, Republican chairman of the finance committee, and Max Baucus, his Democratic counterpart, asked the Internal Revenue Service to provide the tax records of the oil and gas giants for the last five years, so they could “better understand the federal tax posture of the industry”. A committee aide said the committee rarely makes such requests, but had done so occasionally, including in the case of Enron, the bankrupt energy trader.

A spokesman for the American Petroleum Institute, which represents the US industry, said the review of documents was within the committee’s power, but added, “I don’t think there is anything in there that would have any bearing on gas prices. Gas prices are set by the law of supply and demand.”

The oil industry has been on the defensive in recent days. President George W. Bush has ordered the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department to investigate whether oil companies have been overcharging consumers and Republican leaders of Congress have pledged close scrutiny of the industry and its profits.

But Red Caverney, API president, said 30 previous investigations over the past 20 years had cleared the industry of any wrongdoing. Despite a jump in companies’ profits, The API said that as a percentage of sales the industry’s profits were in line with those of other sectors. At 5.9 cents in the dollar, the figure for profits compared with sales for the oil companies is only slightly higher than the average of 5.6 cents for US industry as a whole.

But in their letter, the senators said the were concerned that the record profits -- and a highly publicized $400m retirement package for Lee Raymond, former Exxon Mobil chief executive -- “may have been subsidised in part by the taxpayers”.

Gonzales: Belt-tightening Must Accompany Gas Price Probe (AP)

By PHIL DAVIS, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0026946

TAMPA, Fla. - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said federal and state investigations aren't a substitute for consumer belt-tightening to combat soaring gas prices across the nation.

"If the gas companies are colluding together or committing fraud, we have an obligation to investigate that," Gonzales said Wednesday during a visit to Florida to kickoff an anti-gang program. "Obviously, this is not something that can be solved solely by law enforcement efforts. It requires, perhaps, a change in behavior by consumers. There are things we can do at a federal level, but also it's going to require a collective effort."

Gonzales declined to comment on what evidence, if any, his agency has of price fixing in the gasoline market.

President Bush is trying to calm Americans' outrage over soaring gas prices by ordering the Department of Justice to investigate whether the price of gasoline is being illegally manipulated. Gas prices are hovering near $3 a gallon and polls give Bush low marks in handling the crisis.

On Monday, Gonzales shifted some of the focus to local authorities with a letter asking all 50 state attorneys general to be vigilant for price gouging. State authorities have primary authority in policing gouging.

"We're all working together looking into this," Gonzales said.

The attorney general came to Tampa to announce a $2.5 million anti-gang grant for local law enforcement and education efforts.

Tampa is one of six areas selected in the $15 million national gang initiative. The other areas, each getting $2.5 million, are Los Angeles, Cleveland, Dallas-Fort Worth, Milwaukee and the "222 corridor" near Philadelphia.

Gonzales and his entourage visited the scene of a recent double homicide, a high school and a neighborhood community center in a daylong tour of Tampa. He said the grant money will be split between education, law enforcement and rehabilitation efforts.

"We're not a gang city like south Los Angeles, but gangs are starting to get a foothold here," Hillsborough County Sheriff David Gee said. "If we don't get out in front of it, we will have a problem."

ConocoPhillips Posts 13% Profit Increase (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

ConocoPhillips said yesterday that its first-quarter profit rose 13 percent on stronger results from exploration and production of oil and gas.

Net income increased to $3.29 billion, or $2.34 a share, from $2.91 billion, or $2.05 a share, in the year-earlier period. Those results were in line with analysts' expectations, according to Thomson Financial.

Revenue at ConocoPhillips grew to $47.9 billion in the first quarter from $38.9 billion last year. The company said higher oil prices were partly tempered by lower natural gas prices compared with the fourth quarter.

The company's shares fell $1.10, or 1.6 percent, to close at $67.15.

ConocoPhillips, which is based in Houston, is the first of the three largest United States oil companies to report results this week. Exxon Mobil will report today and Chevron tomorrow. The three are expected to report a total of more than $16 billion in first-quarter profit. James J. Mulva, chief executive at ConocoPhillips, said in a conference call with analysts and investors that the company would spend about $18 billion this year in capital investments, up from the $10 billion announced in December.

A detailed breakout of the spending was not disclosed. But the increase, the company said, comes in part from the recent acquisitions of the natural gas producer Burlington Resources and a German refinery. Additionally, the company will earmark $1 billion for loans to affiliates, and complete its planned 20 percent purchase of Lukoil of Russia.

"This company has more investment opportunity on its plate than resources to fund them," said Fadel Gheit, an analyst for Oppenheimer & Company. "Everybody else has the problem of too much cash."

Analysts asked during the call how ConocoPhillips would handle the Venezuelan government's plans to increase government control of some of that nation's most lucrative oil projects.

Mr. Mulva said he planned to meet with Venezuela's oil minister, Rafael RamírezÖ, within in a few weeks. "That's a big concern because they do have a lot investment opportunities there," said Gene Gillespie, analyst with Howard Weil Inc., in an interview. "Unfortunately, they could be unfulfilled."

Critics Of Oil Profits Rebutted (FT)

By Christopher Swann

Financial Times, April 27, 2006

The US oil industry struck back on Wednesday at criticisms over rising profits and soaring fuel costs, warning that a windfall tax on profits would lead to lower domestic production and higher imports.

With the political temperature rising over higher fuel costs, President George W. Bush has ordered a Federal Trade Commission and Justice Department inquiry into whether oil companies have been overcharging consumers.

Red Caverney, the president of the American Petroleum Institute, which represents the US industry, said that 30 previous investigations over the past 20 years had cleared the industry of any wrongdoing. Despite the jump in companies' profits, the API said that as a percentage of sales the industry's profits were in line with other sectors. At 5.9 cents in the dollar, the figure for profits compared to sales for the oil companies is only slightly higher than the average of 5.6 cents for US industry as a whole.

In addition, while the price of refined petroleum products have risen by 70 per cent since 1982, the price of pharmaceuticals has climbed by 209 per cent and the price of concrete by 100 per cent.

In January Exxon Mobil Corp reported profits of $36.13bn - the highest corporate profits in US history. The Democrats in Congress have called for the closing of tax breaks for the industry that would raise around $5bn over five years.

"Windfall taxes were tried between 1980 and 1986 and it increased out dependence on foreign oil and reduced domestic production, " Mr Caverney said. "There is nothing good that comes of it."

Oil Firms Cast As Villains (LAT)

By Elizabeth Douglass

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

Oil company earnings have never been sweeter. Stock prices are up. Shareholders are pocketing ever-bigger dividends. By nearly every measure, the petroleum industry is in its heyday.

But in the realm of public opinion, things could hardly be worse.

Motorists paying up to $3.50 a gallon for gasoline castigate oil companies and their executives with a growing list of high-octane epithets: Greedy. Un-American. The new robber barons.

On Wednesday, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) invoked the harshest image yet. "I think they have the least PR sensitivity of any group outside of satanic cults," he said.

Responding to public outrage, the Senate Finance Committee on Wednesday asked the Internal Revenue Service to hand over the tax returns of the 15 largest oil and gas companies, saying they were concerned about excessive profit and outsize executive pay.

The news got even better — or worse — for the industry Wednesday with the news that Wall Street analysts expect the three largest oil and gas companies to report combined quarterly earnings of more than $16 billion, a 24% increase from last year.

Instead of celebrating their windfall, oil companies are battling demands for a tax on "windfall" profits, President Bush's call for an investigation into allegations of price gouging and mounting consumer resentment.

Oil executives have launched their own offensive to win American hearts and minds. In full-page advertisements and media interviews, they argue that the millions of Americans who own shares in oil concerns are winners too. Exxon Mobil, the world's biggest company with $1 billion a day in sales, insisted Wednesday that it was too small to influence the global oil market.

"As big as we are, we are only 3% of the crude oil production in the world," said spokesman Mark Boudreaux.

Any public relations blitzkrieg may fail to appease angry motorists who continue to feel pain at the pump.

Ron Perkins, a Blythe, Calif., resident who drives more than 23 miles to his prison guard job, said he saw a station's price jump 10 cents to $3.49 a gallon Wednesday. "It stinks … and their profit margin is outlandish," he said. "They're kicking consumers when we're down."

Oil companies are flush because the price they get for each barrel of crude is rising much faster than the cost to extract it. In refining, profit margins are rising because the wholesale and retail prices for gasoline and diesel are far outpacing the additional costs of the resource they process.

In the end, the major oil companies can take solace in the fact that dozens of price-fixing investigations into the industry have come to naught and that public hatred does not amount to a criminal conviction.

Big Oil's top executives have appeared before congressional committees twice since the summer — once to explain the high prices that followed Hurricane Katrina and again in March to explain their record-setting 2005 earnings. Those included Exxon Mobil's $36.1-billion profit, the biggest ever at a U.S. company.

Exxon Mobil further inflamed the furor by awarding longtime Chairman and Chief Executive Lee Raymond, who retired at the end of last year, a 2005 pay package worth more than $400 million.

Today, oil futures are hovering above $72 a barrel, and retail gasoline nationwide is approaching last year's post-hurricane peak of more than $3 a gallon. On Wednesday, the average cost of self-serve regular in California set another record high of $3.15 a gallon, according to AAA.

Exxon Mobil, based in Irving, Texas, is expected to post first-quarter earnings topping $9 billion. Industry analysts expect the company's full-year income to surpass the record set in 2005.

Analysts expect San Ramon, Calif.-based Chevron Corp., the nation's second-largest oil company, to report first-quarter net income of $4.1 billion on Friday. No. 3 ConocoPhillips of Houston on Wednesday reported profit of $3.3 billion.

Michael Smith, a communications professor at La Salle University in Philadelphia, said the earnings could have "investors doing cartwheels…. For them, this is really good news," he said. "For everybody else, and for consumers especially, it's going to be another sign of greedy oil companies taking advantage of the little guys."

Boudreaux, the Exxon Mobil spokesman, acknowledged that "there are a lot of questions out there about what we do with our earnings and how we invest them."

He said the company hopes its current advertising and public relations efforts will help quell the outrage and "do a better job of helping people understand what goes behind providing the energy that they use…. This is a commodity business. It's cyclical, and there are ups and there will be downs in the cycle. We have to look through the highs and lows.

"Obviously, some consumers are upset with energy companies … because gasoline prices are high. We understand that," he said. "We have a strong image with those people who understand our business and with investors."

Exxon Mobil and its peers are banding together to defend their riches.

After last year's hurricanes, the American Petroleum Institute, the primary public voice for oil companies, launched a campaign to improve the industry's image.

Red Cavaney, the group's president, said the Institute was spending millions of dollars — he wouldn't specify — on advertising and to target opinion makers and state and federal officials to dissuade them from enacting legislation harmful to oil companies.

"We'd obviously like people to like us," Cavaney said. "But it's a matter of priority…. It doesn't help to have a good image if you can't get it done sufficiently to get enough votes to swing the policy."

Tom Brown, senior consultant with Power Decisions Group Inc. of San Francisco, which helps companies polish their brands and images, said the oil majors could be fighting a losing battle.

Their message is a "stockholder message: 'Hey, we're good guys, and all this is good for you.' "

But that, he said, is evading the issue. Nothing the industry says can erase what people see at the pump: more than $3 a gallon and climbing.

Second Thoughts In Congress On Oil Tax Breaks (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews And Michael Janofsky

WASHINGTON, April 26 — As anxiety spread in Congress on Wednesday over soaring oil prices, lawmakers in both parties said they were ready to take a tough look at oil and gas incentives they passed as recently as eight months ago.

Citing record industry profits and huge executive pay packages, the top Republican and top Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee asked the Internal Revenue Service to turn over tax returns for the nation's 15 biggest oil and gas companies.

Leading Republicans echoed President Bush's call Tuesday to trim about $2 billion in tax breaks Congress passed as part of the energy bill last August. Several prominent Democrats, not to be outdone, pushed for repealing oil and gas tax breaks worth more than $10 billion over the next five years.

"Nobody has any sympathy for oil companies on Capitol Hill right now," said Representative Jack Kingston, Republican of Georgia and vice chairman of the House Republican Conference. "You talk to someone driving to work in an F-150 pickup and paying $75 to fill up his tank, and everybody's on his side."

Both parties jockeyed for political advantage even as they were grasping for ideas. Most experts contend that the government has few options that would quickly reduce gasoline prices, and competing party agendas could block Congressional agreement on any meaningful legislation.

Lawmakers have introduced more than 30 energy bills in the last several months. But they reflect often -conflicting goals of reducing prices, increasing production and soothing consumer anger about oil industry profits.

Democrats called for a 60-day halt on collecting federal gasoline taxes, which are 18.4 cents a gallon, but they were openly split about the more radical step of imposing a windfall profits tax on major oil companies. For their part, many Republicans are torn between wanting to show their sympathy for consumers and maintaining their longstanding support for the oil industry.

"Nobody's happy with gasoline prices being where they are," said Representative Joe L. Barton, Republican of Texas and chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, who last year championed scores of new tax breaks for the industry.

Congressional Republican leaders are negotiating with White House officials over a bill to expand on Mr. Bush's proposals for alternative fuels and conservation, but disarray among lawmakers was evident across Capitol Hill.

The energy industry is also politically divided. Most big integrated oil companies, like Exxon Mobil and Chevron, have shown no interest in defending the $2.7 billion in tax breaks in last year's energy bill.

But the hundreds of smaller independent producers want to preserve as many incentives as possible. In singling out tax and spending incentives to be eliminated, Mr. Bush did not criticize a new expansion of tax write-offs for smaller oil refineries.

"The big companies don't want them, don't need them and are not asking for them," said J. Robinson West, chairman of PFC Energy, an oil industry consulting firm. But the smaller independents, he said, "are not going to give up easily."

The Congressional Joint Committee on Taxation estimated Tuesday that oil and gas companies would receive about $10 billion in tax breaks over the next five years that are specifically aimed at their industry.

Most of those tax breaks have been around for many years. They allow energy companies to take substantial write-offs on their investments in new equipment and hefty "depletion allowances" as companies use up the oil and gas in a particular field.

Neither Mr. Bush nor Republican leaders in Congress have suggested an attack on the industry's main tax breaks. Nor are they proposing to trim back tax incentives written primarily for industry in general that also benefit major oil companies.

One obscure tax cut, for example, included in a 2004 law to promote domestic manufacturing, is expected to save energy companies at least $3.6 billion over the next decade. ConocoPhillips, which earned $13.5 billion in 2005, saved $106 million last year on that provision, which reduces the corporate tax rate on profits on goods produced in the United States.

President Bush and Congressional leaders are focusing on about $2 billion in tax breaks in last year's energy bill. Among other things, those tax breaks let companies write off in just two years the geology studies associated with exploration. For decades, the courts and the I.R.S. have said that these are capital investments that can be written off only slowly, as oil is produced from the fields.

Mr. Bush also called for repealing several hundred million dollars in subsidies, also in the energy bill, for an industry-run deepwater drilling research center in Sugar Land, Tex. That project's biggest champion was Representative Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader whose district includes Sugar Land.

Many Democrats had opposed the new tax breaks all along, and Senate Democrats pushed for a provision that would trim them in a broader tax bill that the Senate passed last fall. But that provision was not approved by the House.

On Wednesday, leading Republicans made it clear they were now willing and even eager to eliminate some of those tax breaks.

"I am happy to repeal tax breaks for the development of oil in foreign countries," said Senator Pete V. Domenici, Republican of New Mexico and chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee. "I cannot support the concept of tax breaks for oil companies while some American families are searching their budgets for the extra cash they need to fill their gas tanks."

But Republican lawmakers want to combine their seemingly tough new stance with measures to increase production. High on the list is a new attempt to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to exploration.

Democrats are focusing more on taking things away from the industry. Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts proposed legislation this week to repeal all tax breaks for oil drilling and production — about $10 billion over the next five years.

Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon, proposed a measure to force energy companies to pay royalties to the government on all oil and gas they produce on federal leases in the Gulf of Mexico, if the price of crude oil is above $55 a barrel. Some energy companies are now allowed "royalty relief" expected to total about $7 billion over the next five years.

The mounting suspicion of oil companies was apparent in a letter to the I.R.S. from Senator Charles E. Grassley, the Iowa Republican who is chairman of the Finance Committee, and Senator Max Baucus of Montana, the committee's senior Democrat. They demanded that the I.R.S. let them review the past five years of tax returns filed by the nation's 15 biggest oil companies.

The senators pointedly noted an "extremely lucrative retirement plan by one oil and gas industry executive" — an allusion to Lee R. Raymond, former chairman of Exxon Mobil, who received $398 million in compensation on retiring last year.

"We're seeing record profits and significant executive compensation in the oil and gas industry," Mr. Grassley said. "I want to make sure the oil companies aren't taking a speed pass by the tax man."

Red Caveney, president of the American Petroleum Institute, which represents the large oil companies, said his group would not fight to retain the newest tax breaks.

"We understand the frustration that consumers have expressed about energy prices," Mr. Caveney told reporters on Wednesday.

Senate Committee Looks At Increasing Renewable Fuels (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

DOJ_NMG_0026950

AP, April 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - A day after President Bush touted the increased use of renewable fuels to help offset rising gas prices, a Senate committee looked at ways to promote the use of such fuels.

"I am pleased the alarm bell has gone off and the American people are taking a hard look at the way we consume fuel in this country and around the world," said Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., at a Senate Agriculture Committee hearing Wednesday.

The committee chairman, Georgia Republican Saxby Chambliss, said that the energy bill passed by Congress last year has helped spur the renewable fuels industry by creating a national renewable fuel standard, and by extending the biodiesel tax credit.

Jay Debertin, executive vice president of CHS Inc., an Inver Grove Heights, Minn., farmers cooperative, said Congress can help continue the growth by providing tax incentives and improving infrastructure to ship the fuel, among other things.

"The renewable fuels industry is still a very young and growing industry," he said.

Bob Dinneen, president of the Renewable Fuels Association, the group Bush addressed on Tuesday, noted that demand for corn-based ethanol is on the rise. He said he was confident that the industry will be able to meet demand.

Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., touted the benefits of E85 fuel, which blends 15 percent gasoline with 85 percent ethanol. At some stations in Missouri, he said., E85 is selling for 50 cents less than regular unleaded gas.

"Renewable fuels are already moderating the price of gasoline as more ethanol and biodiesel plants come online," Talent said.

But Sen. Mark Dayton, a Minnesota Democrat and longtime backer of E85, said he was troubled that recent prices of E85 are not even lower. Dayton, who drives a vehicle with an E85 "flex fuel" engine, said he saw E85 selling for 40 cents cheaper than unleaded gasoline during a trip to Minnesota.

Dayton said that E85 needs to be priced more competitively because a car can't go as far on a gallon of E85 as it can on gasoline.

"It's not based on the cost; frankly, it's as much profiteering, somewhere along the line, as I fear is happening with gasoline," Dayton said. "And I think it's going to be the destruction of the industry."

On Tuesday, Chrysler's chief executive announced that by 2008, the company would offer 500,000 alternative-fuel vehicles that run on E85 and clean diesel - representing one quarter of its production.

Only about 685 fueling stations across the country offer ethanol blends out of 165,000 stations nationally - less than 1 percent of stations, according to the National Ethanol Vehicle Coalition. Most pumps are concentrated in Iowa, Illinois and Minnesota.

"We have a real chicken-and-egg problem," Roberts said, arguing that people are reluctant to buy flex fuel cars if stations don't sell it, and stations won't want to offer it without enough cars that use it.

With Oil At $70 A Barrel, Firms Try Coal, Shale, Even Turkeys (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK - At more than $70 a barrel, the price of oil is causing angst for millions of Americans. But for some others it's an opportunity to move the United States beyond conventional oil:

· In Carthage, Mo., a company is turning the inedible parts of Butterball turkeys into up to 350 barrels of biodiesel per day.

· In Gilberton, Pa., businessman John Rich is planning to convert huge piles of low-quality coal into diesel. The state has promised to buy the production of 5,000 barrels per day, once it starts.

· In Utah and Colorado, four companies are preparing environmental assessments to show the feasibility of producing oil from shale.

With gas now becoming as pricey as a gallon of milk in some places, the economics of energy production is changing. Processes that didn't make any sense in the good old days of $30-a-0barrel oil are now being pulled out of filing cabinets. From the tundra of Alaska to the depths of the Gulf of Mexico, energy dreamers are trying to tap into new frontiers.

Prospects for alternative energy got a boost this week when President Bush spoke to the Renewable Energy Association. "What we are seeing is more creativity," says John McLennan, a director of technical services at ASRC Energy Services E&T, Inc. in Salt Lake City.

The potential reserves in some cases are gigantic. The Bureau of Land Management has estimated the potential US recoverable oil shale reserves at 800 billion barrels of oil, three times the proven oil reserves of Saudi Arabia. In some cases, there is already a significant production: tar sands in Canada are currently producing about 1 million barrels of oil per day and expanding rapidly.

However, don't expect to see changes overnight. "As the oil price rises, it doesn't mean that we're all going to turn a switch on and be awash in alternative fuels," says Aaron Brady, an energy analyst at Cambridge Energy Research Associates. "There is no one technology that is the silver bullet that will overturn the dominance of petroleum, but a lot of efforts will become part of the mix that increases the supply of liquid fuels for the world."

Some of the most promising large-scale efforts are the tar sands of Canada. Mr. Brady says they are in the process of "ramping up quite rapidly" and could increase their output to several million barrels of oil per day. But he also points out that there are limits to their development. "There are shortages of natural gas [needed to heat the bitumen] and it's pretty low-quality oil, so you need refineries that can chew up this stuff."

Some of the attempts to produce new liquid fuels resemble those of the 1970s and '80s. That's the case with oil shale, rock that is infused with kerogen, a bituminous material that, when heated, may produce oil.

But, unlike the earlier era, there are now more water, air, and waste restrictions. In fact, a significant amount of the shale is in highly sensitive park lands. "There are too many eco groups ready to mobilize and the deposits are in very beautiful places," says Steven Schamel, a principal at GeoX Consulting and formerly a professor of chemical engineering at the University of Utah in Salt Lake City. "And, much of it is on arid lands, which are very tough to reclaim."

Despite the potential problems, the state of Utah says it would like to press ahead. "Our governor's position is strongly supportive of economic development," says John Baza of the Utah Department of Oil, Gas and Mining. "Something must break loose or oil prices won't ease much."

Currently, much of the work being done in the oil shale is on relatively small parcels of land. Shell Oil is reportedly working on a process that heats the shale to 700 degrees F for two to three years while it's in the ground. But, like much of the shale work, it's secret. "Shell claims to be producing oil, but I don't know anyone who knows for sure," says Mr. Schamel. Shell itself says it is in a "quiet" period prior to the sale of securities and cannot comment.

Many of the efforts maintain they can now produce fuel at a cost well under the current market price. That's the case in Gilberton, Pa. where Waste Management and Processors Inc. (WMPI) says it can make diesel fuel out of waste coal for $1 a gallon less than the current price. The WMPI effort utilizes technology developed in South Africa to produce fuel during the apartheid boycott. "As we scale up, we can drive down the cost even more," says Mr. Rich, the president of the company, which received a $100 million federal grant in 2003.

Yet scores of other efforts are finding ways to convert biomass to diesel. In Carthage, Mo., Changing World Technologies, Inc. has set up a plant adjacent to a Butterball turkey processing facility. Using heat, the company breaks the organic products down similar to how the earth produces oil, but in in two hours, not hundreds of thousands of years, says Julie Gross Gelfand, a company spokesman. "The beauty is that this can be expanded to any carbon-based material so stuff that used to go a landfill can be made into oil."

Industry's Cup Runneth Over (WT/AP)

By John Seewer, Associated Press

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

TOLEDO, Ohio

few months ago, only a few investors knew about Andersons Inc. and its grain-storage and rail-car businesses. Even in its hometown of Maumee, Ohio, the company is better known for stores that feature microbrews, fresh breads and garden supplies.

But the company's recent entry into the burgeoning ethanol industry has sent its stock soaring. Investors are betting that new energy regulations and high gas prices could lead to an earnings bonanza for companies such as Andersons, ADM and Pacific Ethanol that produce the fuel additive made from fermented corn that allows cars to run more cleanly.

"Right now, making ethanol is almost like having a money machine," said Spencer Kelly, an ethanol analyst for the Oil Price Information Service in Rockville, Md. "Ethanol looks strong as long as gasoline prices stay strong and corn prices are low."

Andersons, founded by Harold Anderson in 1947, turned a grain mill into an agribusiness that had $1 billion in sales by 1995 and went public a year later. The company's move into ethanol production is a natural step given its network of grain elevators and its large rail fleet, which account for most of its profits.

Chairman Richard Anderson and former Chairman Thomas Anderson, two of the founder's sons, remain among the company's biggest shareholders. Richard Anderson's shares were worth $6.5 million two years ago and now are worth $28.5 million.

The surge of interest in ethanol was fueled in July when Congress passed an energy bill requiring the United States to use 7.5 billion gallons of renewable fuels by 2012. Ethanol producers now have the capacity to generate about 4.3 billion gallons.

U.S. refiners are clamoring for more ethanol also because of the phaseout of a natural-gas derivative called methyl tertiary-butyl ether, or MTBE, that allows gasoline to burn more cleanly but also has some health risks. Refiners are stopping use of MTBE because Congress refused to grant them protection from lawsuits.

Private investments in ethanol plants also have soared in the past year. Farmer-owned co-ops built most of the plants during the 1990s, but now only six of the 42 new or expanded ethanol plants under construction nationwide are farmer-owned, the Renewable Fuels Association trade group reports.

Those new plants will be able to produce 2 billion gallons each year.

Individual investors, though, can put money into only a few public companies making ethanol.

Shares of Decatur, Ill.-based Archer Daniels Midland Co., the nation's biggest ethanol maker, have been trading at 52-week highs in recent weeks. They gained another 26 cents yesterday to close at $36.93 on the New York Stock Exchange. Shares of Pacific Ethanol, which plans to open its first plants this year, nearly doubled in January, the same month that President Bush touted ethanol in his State of the Union speech. Its shares fell 30 cents yesterday to close at $33.00 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Pacific Ethanol, based in Fresno, Calif., should be making a profit by next year, said Paul Resnik, an analyst with Dutton Associates, an equity research firm based in El Dorado Hills, Calif.

"Their first plant is still in the future, but the long-term strategy is sound," he said.

Andersons stock has been rising since 2001, when it traded below $8 a share. But the stock really took off in November, when it was trading at about $40 a share, after posting strong earnings from its rail-car operations and announcing plans for a second ethanol plant. Its shares gained an additional $7.33 yesterday to close at $115.03 on the Nasdaq.

Mr. Resnik also warned that alternative-energy company stocks are likely to be volatile.

"These stocks have moved a long way in a short time," he said.

The cost of ethanol's main ingredient, corn, can move up and down based on the weather's effect on the crop. A sharp increase in corn prices would translate to higher production costs for ethanol makers.

Analysts say a drop in oil prices also could cut into the profits of ethanol makers because ethanol's cost is tied directly to gas prices at the pump. A rush in demand for fuel-efficient cars or a decision to drop government incentives for ethanol also could spell trouble.

"There's too many factors out of their control," said Mark Hughes, an analyst with Lafayette Investments in Ashton, Md.

His firm sold its stake in Andersons at the end last month when shares jumped to $78. He noted that the company has yet to give any profit projections on its two ethanol plants under construction.

"I would take a pause and see how it goes," Mr. Hughes said. "I think the big move has been made already."

Andersons is investing about $250 million in two ethanol plants in Michigan and Indiana, which will be supplied with corn it already gets from farmers. The plant in Michigan should open in August.

Andersons said April 6 it planned to build a third ethanol plant next to one of its grain elevators in Dunkirk, Ind.

Heather Jones, an analyst with BB&T Capital Markets, predicted that Andersons will maintain "very nice margins for a sustained period." She lists it as a "buy" with a $96 price target.

"It looks like they will be profitable into the next year or year and a half," she said. "The economics of ethanol are incredibly compelling at this time."

Going A Short Way To Make A Point (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Ladies and gentlemen, start your engines.

Gas prices have gone above $3 a gallon again, and that means it's time for another round of congressional finger-pointing.

"Since George Bush and Dick Cheney took over as president and vice president, gas prices have doubled!" charged Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), standing at an Exxon station on Capitol Hill where regular unleaded hit $3.10. "They are too cozy with the oil industry."

She then hopped in a waiting Chrysler LHS (18 mpg) -- even though her Senate office was only a block away.

Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.) used a Hyundai Elantra to take the one-block journey to and from the gas-station news conference. He posed in front of the fuel prices and gave them a thumbs-down. "Get tough on big oil!" he demanded of the Bush administration.

By comparison, Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) was a model of conservation. She told a staffer idling in a Jetta to leave without her, then ducked into a sushi restaurant for lunch before making the journey back to work.

At about the same time, House Republicans were meeting in the Capitol for their weekly caucus (Topic A: gas). The House driveway was jammed with cars, many idling, including eight Chevrolet Suburbans (14 mpg).

America may be addicted to oil, as President Bush puts it. But America is in the denial phase of this addiction -- as evidenced by the behavior of its lawmakers. They have proposed all kinds of solutions to high gas prices: taxes on oil companies, domestic oil drilling and releasing petroleum reserves. But they ignore the obvious: that Americans drive too much in too-big cars.

Senators were debating a war spending bill yesterday, but the subject invariably turned to gas prices. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) engaged his deputy, Dick Durbin (Ill.), in a riveting colloquy. "Is the senator aware that the L.A. Times headline reads today, 'Bush's Proposals Viewed as a Drop in the Bucket'?"

"I'm aware of that," Durbin replied.

Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) responded with an economics lesson. "Oil is worth what people pay for it," he argued.

Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) sounded the alarms. "We are one accident or one terrorist attack away from oil at $100 a barrel!"

Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) made a plea for conservation. "We have to move quickly to increase our fuel efficiency," she urged.

But not too quickly. After lunchtime votes, senators emerged from the Capitol for the drive across the street to their offices.

Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) hopped in a GMC Yukon (14 mpg). Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) climbed aboard a Nissan Pathfinder (15). Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) stepped into an eight-cylinder Ford Explorer (14). Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) disappeared into a Lincoln Town Car (17). Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) met up with an idling Chrysler minivan (18).

Next came Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.), greeted by a Ford Explorer XLT. On the Senate floor Tuesday, Menendez had complained that Bush "remains opposed to higher fuel-efficiency standards."

Also waiting: three Suburbans, a Nissan Armada V8, two Cadillacs and a Lexus. The greenest senator was Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), who was picked up by his hybrid Toyota Prius (60 mpg), at quadruple the fuel efficiency of his Indiana counterpart Evan Bayh (D), who was met by a Dodge Durango V8 (14).

As a political matter, Democrats clearly sense that they have the advantage on the high gas prices, judging from the number of speeches and news conferences. "The cost of Republican corruption when it comes to energy is hitting home very clearly for America's middle class," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) exulted yesterday morning.

Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.) introduced an amendment to repeal oil-company tax breaks and distribute $500 tax rebates to consumers. It was quickly ruled out of order.

But Republicans were clearly feeling defensive. "We passed an energy bill last year, last July," House Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.) pleaded at a morning news conference. "It changes CAFE [corporate average fuel economy] standards. It changes some of the things that we can do -- I'm sorry, changes not the CAFE standards, but changes some of the supply issues, boutique fuels, all these things."

Only Sen. Mark Dayton (D-Minn.), who can speak freely because he is retiring, was willing to note the disconnect between rhetoric and action. "People say, understandably, 'Solve our energy problems right now, but don't make us do anything differently,' " he said on the Senate floor.

If the politics of gasoline favor Democrats at the moment, the insincerity is universal. A surreptitious look at the cars in the senators-only spots inside and outside the Senate office buildings found an Escort and a Sentra (super-rich Wisconsin Democrat Herb Kohl's spot had a Chevy Lumina), but far more Jaguars, Cadillacs and Lexuses and a fleet of SUVs made by Ford, Honda, BMW and Lexus.

A sampling of senators' and staff cars parked along Delaware Avenue NE found that those displaying Democratic campaign bumper stickers had a somewhat higher average fuel economy (23 mpg) than those displaying GOP stickers (18 mpg). A fuel-efficiency rating could not be found for the 1970s-era Volkswagen "Thing" owned by Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.).

Maybe, lawmakers are starting to learn. When GOP senators had a lunch Tuesday a couple of blocks from the Capitol, many took cars. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) emerged from the lunch looking for his ride when he spied The Washington Post's Shailagh Murray. Reconsidering, he set out on foot. "I need the exercise," he reasoned.

How Much Oil Is Really Down There? (WSJ)

By Daniel Yergin

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

The disclosure of "proved reserves" has been one of the great rituals of the reporting season for oil and gas companies, and one carefully monitored by investors. It's recently taken on even more significance with high and jittery prices, concerns about energy security and plain fear of running out. In a world of uncertainty, these disclosures seem to provide direct, quantitative information on the future oil "inventory" -- at least for companies reporting to the SEC -- and a basis on which investors can evaluate companies.

The reality is different. The current system mandated by the SEC for reporting "proved reserves" has become antique, and the information it provides to investors increasingly diverges from the actual resource position of many companies. Nor does it serve the original intent of disclosure -- energy security. The issue should not be confused with recent cases and settlements involving the practices of certain companies. The significant problem is generic and it is with the rules themselves, which need to be modernized if they are to regain their relevance. The current system is roughly analogous to a doctor restricted to making a diagnosis only on the basis of invasive surgery rather than with a CAT scan. * * *

Surprising as it might be, the current rules for reporting reserves -- what might be called the "1978 System" -- essentially insist on 1970s technology and methodologies. Back then there was no digital revolution, and the frontier for offshore development was 600 feet of water; today it is 12,000 feet. The rules do not recognize the vast technical progress over the last 30 years, and as a result, standard techniques used today by companies to set multibillion investment programs are not approved, or only partly approved, for use in describing proved reserves for disclosure purposes to investors.

In addition, the rules simply have not kept up with the globalization of the industry. They were devised for onshore operations in "Texlahoma," the "oil patch" of Texas, Louisiana and Oklahoma that was the center of industry activity in the '50s and '60s. Today more than 80% of the total of companies' proved reserves are outside the U.S.; and differences among the fiscal regimes in several countries make it harder, not easier, to compare domestic and international reserves. As perverse as it may sound, under the "production sharing agreements" that are common in many oil-producing countries, when the price goes up, proved reserves go down.

Major projects today dwarf those in the past, both in size and complexity. "Non-traditional projects" are drawing an increasing share of capital, but they are not adequately accommodated under the "1978 System." This includes a significant part of Canadian oil sands, gas-to-liquids and projects in what's called the "ultra-deep water." And yet these "non-traditional liquids" will account for as much as 45% of oil production capacity in North America by 2010. Nor does the current system fully account for the larger, commodity-driven liquefied natural gas business that will be critical to future U.S. natural gas supplies.

The current rules were laid out in response to the 1973 oil embargo that shook not only world politics and global economy, but also American confidence. How much oil was left in the U.S.? This was an urgent matter of energy security, and Congress told the SEC to implement a system for reporting on the resource base. The SEC in turn viewed its mandate through the lens of investor protection.

Though the word "audit" is customarily used for these evaluations, oil and gas reserves cannot be "audited" in the conventional sense of a warehouse inventory or a company's cash balances. Rather, "proved reserves" are an approximation about formations thousands and even tens of thousands of feet below ground. Their size, shape, content and production potential are estimated in a complex combination of direct evidence and expert interpretation from a variety of scientific disciplines and methodologies. Added to the science is economics; if it costs more to produce oil from a reservoir than one can sell it for profitably, then one cannot "book it" as a reserve. Reserves are "proved" if there is a 90% chance that ultimate recovery will exceed that level.

In the face of such complexity, the SEC adopted technical definitions developed by an independent group, the Society of Petroleum Engineers (SPE), the key technical and professional group whose members are experts from both the academy and industry. Specifically, in setting its own standards, the SEC relied on SPE definitions promulgated in 1965 and consultations in the 1970s. This became the basis of the "1978 System." And that is the system still in place today, despite the fact that the SPE has revised the definitions three times since in response to major advances in measuring reservoirs, and is in the process of doing so once again. For the most part, however, the SEC continues to rely on the technology and "best practices" of the '60s and '70s.

The rules describe proved reserves in terms of "reasonable certainty" -- but ties this to direct physical measurement for estimating the volume of oil or gas in a specific reservoir. That works for onshore or shallow-water wells, but is not effective for large offshore projects, where the reservoirs may lie below 7,000 feet of water and another 20,000 feet beneath the seabed, and where gathering the SEC-mandated direct physical data is immensely expensive, and also poses physical risks. Yet in the meantime, the industry has expanded the standard for "reasonable certainty" to include noninvasive means of measure and estimation. Think CAT scan. And very large amounts of money are invested on the basis of these methods.

The result is a disconnect between the mandated reserves disclosure and the reality of companies' plans, strategies and activities -- and how they are spending many billions of dollars. Owing to the current rules, much of what they are working on, though particularly relevant to their futures, cannot be counted. That divergence hardly helps investors understand the position of a company and its future prospects.

An example: One company judged that it had 658 million barrels of oil classified as proved, or reportable, under current SPE guidelines using a widely accepted technique called the "pressure gradient" method. Under SEC guidelines, based on the older technological approach, it could only disclose 261 million barrels of proved reserve. At $50 a barrel, this represents a $20 billion difference in future reserves. On the pure science, it is generally agreed that over the 20- or 30-year life of the field, it will bring to market a volume much closer to 650 million barrels.

The current system also insists on using year-end prices to calculate whether oil and gas reserves count as "economic" and thus as proved, rather than some kind of average. But this is no sure guide either to what happened during the year, or what will happen in the coming year -- or even what happened on that particular day. The price for Canadian heavy oil dipped at the very end of 2004, owing to particular short-term pricing conditions, and so a substantial amount of heavy Canadian oils lost their standing as proved because they were temporarily no longer profitable and thus two billion barrels had to be "debooked." Yet the price quickly bounced back, and those reserves once again counted as "proved."

Current estimates are that the oil and gas industry will spend some $6 trillion over the next 25 years to meet the future demand for oil and gas. The accuracy and reliability of reserves data are at the heart of the industry's capabilities and its funding of these projects. The real beneficiaries from reforming the system for disclosing proved reserves will be investors, of course -- and the consumers who are counting on the availability of future supplies. And as recent events remind us, it will also be important for energy security.

Mr. Yergin, chairman of Cambridge Energy Research Associates, is co-author of the new CERA study, "Modernizing Oil and Gas Reserves Disclosure."

MediaNews Buys 4 McClatchy Papers (AP)

AP, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- MediaNews Group Inc., publisher of the Denver Post and other newspapers, is buying four newspapers from McClatchy Co. for $1 billion in cash with backing from Hearst Corp.

The four papers -- the San Jose Mercury News, the Contra Costa (Calif.) Times, the Monterey (Calif.) County Herald and the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press -- currently are owned by Knight Ridder Inc., which McClatchy is buying.

The deal announced late yesterday would strengthen MediaNews's presence in Northern California, where it already owns several papers in the San Francisco Bay area.

The four papers are among the 12 Knight Ridder properties that McClatchy has said it intends to sell since they do not meet McClatchy's acquisition criteria, which include being located in rapidly growing markets.

MediaNews' interest in the newspapers had been widely known. The three Northern California papers would complement the company's existing holdings, which include the Oakland Tribune and the Marin Independent Journal. MediaNews owns a number of newspapers in geographic clusters, which helps reduce production and other costs and allows for group advertising sales.

"These were the newspapers that excited us the most about Knight Ridder," MediaNews Chief Executive Officer William Dean Singleton said, calling the deal "a wonderful opportunity at a fair price."

McClatchy would have faced antitrust difficulties owning the St. Paul, Minn., paper since it already owns the Star Tribune in neighboring Minneapolis.

McClatchy said yesterday that the Justice Department told the company that it would seek additional information regarding the Minneapolis-St. Paul area, indicating that regulators did not see other antitrust concerns with the Knight Ridder takeover.

The agreement calls for MediaNews to acquire the San Jose Mercury News and the Contra Costa Times, which then would be folded into the California Newspaper Partnership, an entity in which it has a 54 percent stake.

The other two stakeholders in the partnership, industry leader Gannett Co. and the privately held Stephens Media Group, have agreed to contribute their share of paying for the two papers, according to a joint statement from McClatchy and MediaNews.

Separately, Hearst, publisher of the San Francisco Chronicle, will buy the Monterey County Herald in California and the St. Paul Pioneer Press and then transfer them to MediaNews in exchange for a stake in all newspapers that MediaNews owns outside the Bay Area.

Once the deal closes, MediaNews would become the fourth-largest newspaper company in the country in terms of circulation, with about 2.7 million daily circulation and 53 daily newspapers.

Justice Asks McClatchy About Twin Cities (STREET)

By Sandy Brown, TheStreet.com Staff Reporter

TheStreet, April 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0026956

McClatchy got a Justice Department request for additional information on its planned acquisition of Knight-Ridder (KRI:NYSE - commentary - research - Cramer's Take).

The Sacramento-based newspaper company says the government wants information about papers in Minnesota.

McClatchy is owner of the Star Tribune in Minneapolis, and with the Knight-Ridder deal it gains control of the Pioneer Press in nearby St. Paul.

"The scope of the DOJ's request is limited to information concerning the Minneapolis -- St. Paul, Minnesota area. McClatchy has previously announced its intention to divest the St. Paul Pioneer Press newspaper, currently owned by Knight-Ridder Inc., to a third party," a company statement read.

It added that a second request extends the waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Act.

Knight-Ridder, the publisher of the Philadelphia Inquirerand Miami Herald, agreed to sell itself to smaller rival McClatchy for $4.5 billion in cash and stock last month. McClatchy said it would try to sell 12 of the 32 papers involved in the deal.

"This represents a step forward in our effort to close our deal with Knight Ridder in a timely manner," said McClatchy lawyer Karole Morgan-Prager. "We are delighted that the Department of Justice review confirms our belief that there would be no antitrust concerns other than in the twin cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul, where we intend to sell the Pioneer Press to remove any concern."

McClatchy shares traded down 7 cents to $44.71 on Wednesday.

MediaNews Acquiring Pioneer Press, Three Other Newspapers (STPPP)

By John Welbes

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, April 27, 2006

MediaNews Group Inc. is buying the St. Paul Pioneer Press in a complex transaction that involves the Hearst Corp., three other papers and a $1 billion price tag.

The proposed deal, announced Wednesday by MediaNews and the McClatchy Co., the owner of the Minneapolis-based Star Tribune, would end more than five months of speculation about who eventually would own the Pioneer Press.

"I think this is a good outcome to a lousy situation," Par Ridder, the publisher of the Pioneer Press, told more than 150 employees who gathered for a late-afternoon meeting Wednesday.

The four newspapers, which also include the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times and Monterey County Herald, are owned by Knight Ridder. They are among the 12 "orphaned" Knight Ridder papers that McClatchy will resell after it closes its $6.5 billion deal for the Pioneer Press' parent company, likely by midsummer.

Regulators are taking a close look at how the shuffling of ownership will affect competition in the Twin Cities and in the California markets where MediaNews will gain considerable strength.

Employees, meanwhile, say they'd like more answers about their future.

William Dean Singleton, the CEO of MediaNews Group, said in an interview Wednesday that he plans to compete vigorously with the Star Tribune and will not seek any type of cooperative agreements with the Minneapolis paper. (MediaNews owns papers in Detroit and Denver that are part of joint operating agreements with rivals.)

He also said he plans to retain Ridder as publisher.

Singleton added that he likes the east metro market that the Pioneer Press serves and its long-term prospects.

The structure of the transaction doesn't require Singleton to honor existing labor contracts. Almost 90 percent of the newspaper's 960 workers are union members, and they received no answers at Wednesday's hastily called meeting.

"The part that makes me nervous is that nobody came right out and said that local contracts would be honored," said Bill Weyandt, who works in information technology at the newspaper.

Asked about the contracts, Singleton said "we will sit down with the local management team and let local management determine what their labor strategy should be," referring to Ridder's management team. "All of our labor strategies are done at the local level."

Ridder said he hasn't discussed labor strategy with Singleton and declined to comment.

Singleton said the Pioneer Press' "cost structure is high for a newspaper its size, but we knew that when we made the acquisitions."

As he looks at the newspaper's operations, he said, "there will be areas that need more investment, and we'll move resources around or add resources. I've read all these stories about the (Pioneer Press') profit margins being lower than everybody else's, but we knew that when we made the decision to buy."

Singleton also said he expects to continue the four newspapers' relationship with CareerBuilder, a national, online job search service.

Singleton will be in St. Paul today and plans to meet with the newspaper's employees.

Thom Fladung, editor of the Pioneer Press, said he wants to know more about Singleton's plan for the paper.

"I hope it will be what we're doing now," which is aggressive, local news coverage, Fladung said. "Because I think it works."

He said the paper needs to fill six to eight jobs in the newsroom, which would get the newsroom close to a total of 220 workers, a level he believes allows the paper to do its job.

Antitrust concerns remain with the Pioneer Press sale, as the McClatchy Co. is essentially picking who will run the rival for its largest paper, the Star Tribune.

On Wednesday, McClatchy said the U.S. Justice Department, which reviews sales with potential antitrust issues, requested information about the Twin Cities newspaper market. The request gives the Justice Department more time to review the proposed transaction, though the deal could still close by midsummer.

A task force set up by the St. Paul Area Chamber of Commerce to monitor the Pioneer Press' sale has been contacted by Justice Department officials, said Larry Dowell, president of the chamber. Advertisers in the area also have been contacted as part of the inquiry.

A California private equity group, the Yucaipa Cos., had bid for all 12 of the Knight Ridder papers up for resale. In addition, a group of local business people had hoped to make a bid for the Pioneer Press.

The announcement Wednesday "just smacks so much of cartel-like behavior," said Linda Foley, president the Newspaper Guild-Communications Workers of America, which was partnering with Yucaipa in its "worker-friendly" bid for the 12 newspapers.

"It's pretty clear that this was something that was done in a back room somewhere, that it wasn't an open process," she said. "This goes contrary to what (McClatchy CEO) Gary Pruitt was saying a month ago," when he said it would be in his company's best interest to consider all bids for the 12 papers.

John Wodele, the spokesman for the local group that was never able to submit a bid for the Pioneer Press, said he hopes the new owner will respect the paper's long tradition in the community after the deal is done.

"I don't know if they'll get rich doing it," Wodele said, "but if they get rich doing it, I hope they'll have a product we can all be proud of."

In a release Wednesday, Pruitt said the "transaction highlights our ability to deliver quickly on our divestiture plan, and we are delighted with the sales price."

The sale of the Pioneer Press is also getting attention from Minnesota Attorney General Mike Hatch, who said he plans to ask McClatchy for more information about its terms for the deal with MediaNews.

"The concern is whether these are real agreements or just a lot of paper being exchanged to put a paper out of business," Hatch said.

The future of the Pioneer Press has drawn the attention of local leaders, who urged McClatchy to seek a buyer who would continue to offer a strong competitor in a two-newspaper market.

"My concern is that St. Paul continue to have a newspaper, and a strong one that's dedicated to real journalism," St. Paul Mayor Chris Coleman said. "The history there (at MediaNews) is a mixed bag, but I think it's possible, and I'm hopeful."

The four papers are being sold for 11.5 times 2005 earnings before other expenses, a multiple that's in the range of other big newspaper deals of recent years, though higher than what some analysts had anticipated.

McClatchy is paying 10.2 times earnings for the entire Knight Ridder chain.

The price that MediaNews is paying for the Pioneer Press and the California papers "does say that he believes, and I believe, that St. Paul and the Bay Area papers have a bright future," Ridder said.

John Morton, head of Morton Research, a media consultancy in Silver Springs, Md., said he was "a little bit" surprised that the Pioneer Press was included in the four-paper package.

"You can't really see the strategy there except that he has shown, in the past, a weakness, you might say, for owning big-city newspapers," Morton said. "I suspect he thinks it's a feather in his cap to have St. Paul. The strategy there is not so clear-cut."

The deal is structured so that Hearst will acquire the Pioneer Press and the Monterey paper, and then "contribute" the papers back to MediaNews as part of an equity investment in other MediaNews papers outside the San Francisco area.

Hearst, which owns the San Francisco Chronicle, is acting as a source of equity for the purchase of the four newspapers, Singleton said. MediaNews, which is privately held, will issue private stock to Hearst as part of the deal. The Pioneer Press' pass through Hearst in the sale process will have no significance for the paper, he said.

Singleton, whose holdings include the Detroit News and Denver Post, has a mixed record with the newspapers he has acquired. In years past, he has shut down newspapers in Texas, including the Houston Post, and taken the Long Beach (Calif.) Press-Telegram through deep cost cutting after acquiring that paper in the late 1990s. In his more recent big-city acquisitions in Denver and Detroit, he has honored union contracts and kept the operations largely intact.

After hearing word of Wednesday's deal, Martin Demgen, acting executive officer for the Minnesota Newspaper Guild, which represents some 470 Pioneer Press workers, said the union is concerned.

"We can't be sure what it means because the sale isn't final," he said.

Staff reporters Jennifer Bjorhus and Sheryl Jean contributed to this story. John Welbes can be reached at 651-228-2175 or jwelbes@pioneerpress.com.

Complex Deal Ends Uncertainty (MINNST)

By David Phelps and Terry Fiedler, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, April 27, 2006

The $1 billion acquisition of the Pioneer Press also includes three California newspapers and puts the St. Paul paper under control of MediaNews. It's set to close this summer.

The complex $1 billion transaction that will put the St. Paul Pioneer Press in the hands of Denver-based MediaNews Group Inc. includes three California newspapers and turns prospective MediaNews rival Hearst into a partner in the deal.

The three-way transaction is expected to close this summer after the McClatchy Co., parent of the Star Tribune, completes its acquisition of the Pioneer Press' current owner, Knight Ridder Inc., for about $6.5 billion.

McClatchy said net proceeds of about $700 million from the MediaNews transaction will be used to help pay down its debt from the Knight Ridder acquisition.

As part of Wednesday's deal, Hearst Corp. agreed to temporarily purchase the Pioneer Press as well as the Monterey County (Calif.) Herald and then contribute both papers to MediaNews in return for an equity investment in MediaNews' non-San Francisco Bay-area assets.

MediaNews also agreed to buy two California newspapers, the San Jose Mercury News and the Contra Costa Times, from McClatchy in the deal.

The announcement capped a whirlwind spring for the St. Paul newspaper, the state's oldest.

It was put on the market along with 11 other Knight Ridder papers right after McClatchy bought the chain last month. Helping drive the sale of the Pioneer Press were antitrust concerns that regulators wouldn't be comfortable with two major papers under the ownership of one company in the Twin Cities market.

Employee rallies and a failed effort by the Newspaper Guild to broker a bid by California buyout firm Yucaipa Companies underscored the anxiety of workers about who their next owner would be. But in recent days, it appeared that MediaNews was the leading candidate to buy the paper.

MediaNews Chief Executive Dean Singleton said the acquisition "will expand our reach in California as well as enter a new and growing market in St. Paul."

MediaNews has 40 newspapers in nine states, radio stations in Texas and a TV station in Alaska. After the transaction closes, it will be the nation's fourth-largest newspaper company in daily circulation, at about 2.7 million.

McClatchy Chief Executive Gary Pruitt said that his Sacramento-based company was "delighted" with the purchase price and that the $1 billion sticker "demonstrates that these are strong newspapers with great value to companies whose strategies fit them."

Reaction in Minnesota

A St. Paul-based investor group, which also wanted to take a run at owning the Pioneer Press, expressed hope that MediaNews would be committed to quality journalism and not just the bottom line.

"Our hope was to make a little money at it, but our hope was also to do good journalism," said John Wodele, a member of the group, whose 10 investors were never publicly identified. "We hope the new owners understand the tradition of the Pioneer Press in Minnesota, the Twin Cities and western Wisconsin, and build on a long time of sometimes extraordinary journalism."

Minnesota Attorney General Mike Hatch said his office will be requesting details of the transaction from McClatchy, Hearst and MediaNews so that his staff can scrutinize the deal to make sure "it results in a viable competitor." He said: "My concern is this: I want to make sure in the end that whoever acquires the Pioneer Press is a true competitor that's viable and not acquiring it solely for the purpose of stripping it down."

Hearst role a surprise

The structure of the transaction, with the involvement of Hearst, was a surprise to most who had followed the deal's developments.

Hearst basically provides MediaNews with cash in exchange for equity by buying the Pioneer Press and the Monterey paper, and then turning the keys over to MediaNews. "Hearst is acting as a guarantor for MediaNews," Hearst spokesman Paul Luthringer said.

In the event that the Hearst equity transaction is not completed, MediaNews has agreed to buy the Pioneer Press and Monterey paper from Hearst.

David Cole, publisher of the industry newsletter News Inc., said the structure of the deal ensures MediaNews that Hearst will not raise objections on antitrust grounds because of MediaNews' concentration of properties in Northern California.

"As I've always said, Dean doesn't have competitors, just partners he hasn't done business with," Cole said.

MediaNews intends to contribute the San Jose Mercury News and the Contra Costa Times to the California Newspapers Partnership, owned 54.23 percent by MediaNews. Gannett Co. and Stephens Media, the remaining partners, have committed to contribute their share of the purchase price.

The purchase price represents a multiple of approximately 11.5 times 2005 earnings before interest, taxes and other charges, McClatchy reported.

Pruitt said the transaction "highlights our ability to deliver quickly on our divestiture plan, and we are delighted with the sales price." He said the 11.5 multiple is two "full turns" higher than the 9.5 multiple paid for all of Knight Ridder.

But Wall Street has been a little wary of the Knight Ridder deal, based on the size of debt that McClatchy will incur. Shares of McClatchy closed Wednesday at $44.71, two days after hitting a six-month low of $44.11. News of the MediaNews deal came after the markets closed.

McClatchy agreed in March to acquire Knight Ridder, which has 32 daily papers. McClatchy said it would keep the 20 Knight Ridder dailies in the fastest-growing markets and sell the other 12. The Pioneer Press sale also is taking place to address antitrust issues.

The California papers fit with MediaNews' strategy of clustering newspapers and sharing advertising and production resources. MediaNews already owns nine papers in the Bay Area.

The company's interest in the Pioneer Press doesn't fit that profile -- MediaNews owns no papers in the Upper Midwest. But the Pioneer Press is profitable: Analysts estimate that it had a 10 percent operating profit margin last year, or about $12 million profit on revenue of about $120 million. By comparison, the Star Tribune had operating earnings of about $90 million.

McClatchy hopes to raise more than $2.15 billion through the sale of the Knight Ridder papers that it will divest. McClatchy agreed to assume $2 billion in debt and pay about $4.5 billion in stock and cash for Knight Ridder.

McClatchy expects to close the Knight Ridder deal in July.

Times Sold To MediaNews (CCT)

By George Avalos And James Temple

The Contra Costa Times, April 27, 2006

The McClatchy Co. announced an agreement to sell the Times and three other newspapers for $1 billion to two parties.

Denver-based MediaNews, publisher of the Oakland Tribune and other East Bay papers, will purchase the Times and San Jose Mercury News.

In a visit to the Times newsroom in Walnut Creek, MediaNews CEO William Dean Singleton said that both of the papers will continue to operate independently. He did not anticipate layoffs as a result of the deal.

Singleton, a media mogul who has earned a reputation for slashing costs and jobs at some newspapers he acquires and increasing salaries and staffing at others, said the deal will provide MediaNews with a big piece of Bay Area market. Indeed, the combined circulation of the company's regional papers will exceed 700,000, compared to the San Francisco Chronicle's 419,000.

"We still have a competitor across the Bay that is very fierce in the Chronicle," Singleton said. "They're the big bad metro and we're the little guys chipping at their heels. I just hope we can chip a little harder now."

New York City-based Hearst Corp., owner of the San Francisco Chronicle, will buy the Monterey Herald and St. Paul Pioneer Press in St. Paul, Minn, as part of the transaction.

Hearst has agreed to "contribute" the St. Paul Pioneer Press and Monterey Herald to MediaNews in return for an equity investment in MediaNews assets outside of the Bay Area. If the transacton isn't completed, for regulatory issues or otherwise, MediaNews has agreed to acquire the two newspapers from Hearst.

In either case, Singleton said MediaNews will continue to compete vigorously with the San Francisco Chronicle locally: "In the Bay Area, they are the enemy."

The four newspapers are owned by Knight-Ridder Inc., which McClatchy agreed to acquire in March. The parties expect to close the transaction soon after the close of McClatchy's purchase, which is expected this summer.

The sale of the Times became increasingly certain starting last October when several big shareholders rebelled at the lackluster stock performance of its parent, San Jose-based Knight Ridder, and eventually forced Knight Ridder to put itself on the block.

Sacramento-based McClatchy announced it had won the sparsely contested auction on March 12, in a stock and cash deal then worth $4.5 billion. The news was greeted with optimism by Times reporters and employees, given McClatchy's reputation for quality journalism and financial stability.

But the following day, the company announced plans to discard a dozen papers, including the Times and Mercury News, that did not fit McClatchy's strategy. McClatchy has been seeking buyers for the papers since the first deal was announced.

With the deal, which would include the Contra Costa Times, Valley Times, San Ramon Valley Times, East County Times, West County Times, and other East Bay publications, Denver-based MediaNews would be able to encircle the San Francisco Chronicle.

MediaNews would have more than 700,000 paid subscribers to about 419,000 for the Chronicle, enabling MediaNews to assault the Chronicle with an array of editorial, advertising, circulation and marketing resources.

Separately on Wednesday, McClatchy Corp. said that the U.S. Department of Justice is seeking additional information regarding its pending purchase of Knight-Ridder.The DOJ's request is limited to the St. Paul Pioneer-Press, but McClatchy said it extends the waiting period under antitrust law, giving the government additional time to review the transaction -- and potentially holding up any deal.

The DOJ inquiry follows an announcement last week by California Attorney General Bill Lockyer that his office is launching an antitrust review of the Knight Ridder sale to McClatchy Co.

McClatchy said it intends to respond promptly to the DOJ request.

"This represents a step forward in our effort to close our deal with Knight Ridder in a timely manner," said Karole Morgan-Prager, vice president and general counsel of McClatchy, in a prepared statement. "We are delighted that the Department of Justice review confirms our belief that there would be no antitrust concerns other than in the twin cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul, where we intend to sell the Pioneer Press to remove any concern."

Soon after the divestiture was announced, Knight Ridder Chairman and CEO Tony Ridder expressed shock that McClatchy planned to jettison the papers. Gary Pruitt, the chairman and chief executive of the McClatchy Co., defended the decision, saying the papers did not fit into the company's strategy to focus on high-growth communities.

Reports quickly pegged MediaNews as a serious contender for the California publications, given its existing Bay Area presence and known strategy of clustering in geographic regions.

Other interested parties included Los Angeles-based investment firm Yucaipa Cos., which made a bid for all 12 papers in partnership with the Newspaper Guild-Communications Workers of America. Knight Ridder Chairman and Chief Executive Tony Ridder also reportedly began raising funds to buy the California papers, but dropped the effort at the urging of his lawyers and bankers.

Wall Street hasn't reacted kindly to McClatchy's deal. Late last month, Moody's Investors Service lowered McClatchy's credit rating the lowest investment-grade rating and threatened to drop it into junk-bond status. Since the deal was announced, McClatchy's stock has fallen 18.5 percent, which has sliced several hundred million off the value of the deal.

MediaNews had also expressed interest in the initial Knight-Ridder deal. It teamed up with several private equity firms and Singleton himself toured several papers including the Times. Several private equity bidders also failed to follow through on offers.

The only other actual bid came from a private equity group comprised of Texas Pacific Group, Thomas H. Lee Partners, Hellman & Friedman, though its offer was reportedly lower.

Newspaper Guild Petitions To Revoke JOA In York, Pa. (E&P)

Editor & Publisher, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK The Newspaper Guild-Communications Workers of America filed a petition with the U.S. Attorney General's office claiming that MediaNews Group violated the Newspaper Preservation Act with two York, Pa., daily papers.

The Guild, along with York/Adams County Central Labor Council and City Council President Cameron Texter, charge that MediaNews Group has "hidden the fact that it now is sole owner and publisher of both papers."

In 1989 the Justice Department approved a JOA between MediaNews, publisher of the York Dispatch, and Buckner News Alliance, publisher of the York Daily Record.

The union groups and city council president claim that "the two publishers engaged in deception in 2004 by reporting that they had swapped ownership of the two papers" when in fact MediaNews bought the Daily Record from Buckner while retaining the Dispatch.

The parties charge that MediaNews "failed to file an application for approval of material changes to the agreement or provide public notice."

Linda Foley, Newspaper Guild president, said in a statement: "The whole intent of joint operating agreements is to preserve vigorous news reporting and diversity of editorial opinions through maintaining newspaper competition -- not to provide a loophole for monopoly publishing."

Microsoft, EU Debate Access For Rivals (AP)

Microsoft Complains That European Commission Forced It to Hand Over Trade Secrets to Rivals

LUXEMBOURG (AP) -- Microsoft Corp. complained Wednesday that the European Commission forced it to hand over trade secrets to rivals, effectively giving them a "free ride" on the work the software maker did to acquire new customers and develop new technologies.

But Anthony Whelan, the Commission's lawyer, said that the "super-dominant" software maker had managed to strangle its rivals' innovation and was unlikely to face "an attack of the clones" if it gave companies the information they needed to make their programs work more smoothly with the Windows operating system.

"Microsoft's alarmist claims about duplication have been made for your consideration only," he told the panel of 13 judges who are considering the company's challenge to the Commission's 2004 antitrust order and record 497 million euro ($613 million) fine.

The weeklong hearing was in its third day Wednesday, and the focus shifted from media player software to the EU regulators' order that Microsoft give interoperability information to makers of rival server operating systems.

Whelan said Novell Inc. and Sun Microsystems Inc. were reduced to catering to network servers with "last century's technology" -- Windows NT -- because Microsoft withheld the code needed to allow them to work smoothly with PCs running the world's most-used desktop software.

"In network computing, the client is king and the client speaks Windows," he said.

Microsoft's refusal to supply server protocols from 1998 onward meant most servers had to use more time-consuming and costly techniques to supply software people wanted, keeping them a generation behind Microsoft's software, he said.

The company broke with standard practice in the technology industry by refusing to supply interoperability information, he said.

Microsoft insisted that the survival of its rivals and the emergence of new companies proved the competition was strong. The Commission argued the degree of interoperability Microsoft allowed was simply not viable for most customers and "effective competition" no longer existed.

Microsoft lawyer Ian Forrester said the Commission's order has been an attempt "to handicap the (market) leader in perpetuity" by forcing it to hand over trade secrets.

He said Microsoft's server software was compatible with products made by other companies, such as those from Novell and Sun and using Linux and UNIX-based servers.

"Microsoft spends an enormous amount of effort attempting to achieve interoperability," said Microsoft executive John Shewchuk.

Thomas Vinje, a lawyer for an industry group supporting the Commission -- the European Committee for Interoperable Systems -- said Microsoft was trying to blow its patent rights out of proportion and skirt the key issue of the company's monopoly power.

"This is a case about abuse of a dominant position, about refusing to provide information to vendors," he said.

Microsoft broke an informal agreement with EU advocates when it dragged up the recent dispute over the company's compliance with the order -- earning them a stern reprimand from Judge Bo Vesterdorf, who told Forrester to stick to the issue at stake.

Forrester claimed that Microsoft was being threatened with 2 million euro ($2.4 million) daily fines, backdated to Dec. 15, for not creating "a new copyright work" derived from Windows secret source code.

EU regulators asked Microsoft to supply a "complete and accurate" support manual for developers to help them make compatible software.

Last December, they charged Microsoft with not obeying the order after an independent monitor branded Microsoft's 12,650-page technical manual as "unfit at this stage for its intended purpose."

The world's largest software maker says it has the right to guard its valuable intellectual property, and maintains that it has worked strenuously to comply with the 2004 EU ruling.

It was handed down after a five-year investigation concluded that Microsoft had taken advantage of its position as the leading supplier of operating systems to damage rivals who offered server software and media player programs.

While a ruling on the challenge is not due for months, a decision backing the Commission could force Microsoft to change the way it does business in the future and endorse the EU's ability to hold back aggressive corporate behavior.

An appeal of any decision, however, is not certain since Microsoft would need strong legal arguments to protest the ruling to the EU's highest court, the European Court of Justice.

Microsoft Says EU Undermines Its Property (DOW)

Dow Jones, April 27, 2006

LUXEMBOURG -(Dow Jones)- Microsoft Corp. (MSFT) (MSFT) Wednesday attacked a European regulators' orders to help rivals write software that works smoothly with its Windows operating system, saying that they violate its intellectual property.

On the third day of a week-long court hearing, the software giant claimed the European Commission is giving rivals license to clone its products. The software industry and the future of technological innovation are at stake, the company's lawyers contended.

Microsoft (MSFT) is appealing a landmark antitrust punishment before a European court in Luxembourg. In 2004, the Commission found the company cripples rival software makers by withholding key "interoperability" information. The regulator also said Microsoft (MSFT) illegally bundles its Media Player program with Windows. On these two counts, the Commission fined the company a record EUR497 million and ordered it to change its some of its business practices.

During the first two days of hearings, Microsoft (MSFT) defended its bundled Media Player software, claiming the Commission made "serious errors" in its decision. Wednesday and Thursday, Microsoft (MSFT) is arguing that Windows isn't designed to hamper rivals' products.

The Commission's decision "is an attempt to alter how the marketplace works," said Microsoft (MSFT) lawyer Ian Forrester Wednesday. This is "an immense encroachment on Microsoft's (MSFT) interests."

Forrester said Microsoft's (MSFT) software is "widely known, widely used, and not at all secret." He added that the company still faces strong competition.

Microsoft (MSFT) engineer John Shewchuk gave a presentation designed to show that servers all over the globe work well with Windows. "Microsoft (MSFT) spends an enormous amount of effort achieving interoperability and providing interoperability" with systems all over the world.

Microsoft (MSFT) supporters backed up his testimony. Tom Kemp, CEO of Centrify Corporation, said his company made software that allowed different operating systems to communicate. "Seamless interoperability between disparate, heterogeneous systems and applications is possible and easy using Centrify's technology," Kemp said. In the afternoon session, rivals defended the Commission's 2004 decision. printed on paper, it would take up 12,650 pages. Thomas Vinje, a lawyer for the European Committee for Interoperable Systems, which includes Sun Microsystems Inc. (SUNW) (SUNW), International Business Machines Corp. (IBM) (IBM (IBM)), and Oracle Corp. (ORCL) (ORCL). said Microsoft (MSFT) was blowing its patent rights out of proportion.

"This morning's Microsoft (MSFT) presentation confirms the March 2004 conclusions of the Commission," Vinje said. "Microsoft (MSFT) determines if and how computer server systems will interoperate with Microsoft's (MSFT) desktop monopoly. So long as it is in Microsoft's (MSFT) business interest, it will provide necessary interoperability information."

In his presentation Commission lawyer Anthony Whelan attempted to demonstrate why Microsoft's (MSFT) technical information made it difficult or to expensive to achieve interoperability. He denied Microsoft's (MSFT) assertion that competitors wanted to copy or steal its intellectual property.

"There is no evidence Microsoft's (MSFT) competitors want to clone its product," Whelan said. He added they only wanted to make sure their products communicate with Windows.

Microsoft's (MSFT) direct rivals are keeping a low profile during the hearing to avoid a public confrontation with the company, lawyers familiar with the case say. IBM (IBM) and Oracle won't present information directly to the court, preferring to let Vinje speak for them.

Sun Microsystems (SUNW) propelled Microsoft's (MSFT) European antitrust case with a 1998 complaint about ill-defined instructions for making software work with Windows. Based on later complaints from RealNetworks Inc. (RNWK) (RNWK), the Commission expanded its case to include the Media Player charges. Sun Microsystems (SUNW) and RealNetworks (RNWK)aren't present at the Luxembourg hearing, however, since both companies settled their disputes with Microsoft (MSFT). Microsoft (MSFT) paid Sun Microsystems (SUNW) $1.95 billion in 2004 and RealNetworks (RNWK) received a $761 million payout last year.

With Microsoft's (MSFT) appeal pending, the Luxembourg court in December 2004 ordered Microsoft (MSFT) to comply immediately with the regulator's decision. Since then, the Commission has battled Microsoft (MSFT) over compliance issues.

Last summer, Microsoft (MSFT) released a version of Windows without Media Player, a product known as Windows N. Earlier this week Microsoft (MSFT) said limited demand for the product - it has sold only 1,787 copies - proves consumers want built-in music and video capabilities. The company's rivals claim limited demand for Windows N confirms Microsoft (MSFT) has created an invincible monopoly.

Over the past few months, the regulator has pressed Microsoft (MSFT) to comply with its interoperability orders. Microsoft (MSFT) has provided a set of protocols, also known as a road map, for rivals to use. But an independent software expert overseeing the company's compliance, U.K. computer scientist Neil Barrett, last year told the Commission that these protocols were "totally unusable."

The regulator is threatening to fine the company up to EUR2 million a day for not complying with its orders.

ENVIRONMENT:

More Than A Letter Needed To Take House, Court Says (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 26 — "An elementary and fundamental requirement of due process," the Supreme Court ruled many years ago, is that the government must provide "notice" and an opportunity to be heard before it seizes property.

On Wednesday, the court added teeth to that requirement, ruling that Arkansas violated a homeowner's right to due process when it sold his house for nonpayment of taxes after sending him two certified letters that came back "unclaimed."

Writing for a 5-to-3 majority, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said that "it is not too much to insist that the state do a bit more" before using its "extraordinary power" to take and sell a person's house.

The Constitution does not require "actual notice" like personally handing the letter to the homeowner, the chief justice observed. But he said that once the state became aware, as in this case, that an effort at notice had failed, it must take "additional reasonable steps to attempt to provide notice to the property owner before selling his property, if it is practicable to do so."

Justices Clarence Thomas, Antonin Scalia and Anthony M. Kennedy dissented, the latter two signing a dissenting opinion by Justice Thomas. The state did all that was constitutionally required, Justice Thomas said, adding that it was the homeowner's responsibility to make sure that the authorities knew how to contact him. The court was imposing a "burdensome" and "impractical" requirement on the government, he said.

After a separation from his wife, the homeowner, Gary K. Jones, had moved out, continuing to pay the mortgage while his wife remained in the house. The mortgage company paid the property taxes. But once Mr. Jones paid off the mortgage, the taxes went unpaid.

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. did not vote in the case, which was argued shortly before he joined the court in January. The decision, Jones v. Flowers, No. 04-1477, overturned a ruling by the Supreme Court of Arkansas.

For anyone watching the emergence of the Roberts court, the case provided intriguing tea leaves. It was the chief justice's fourth majority opinion, and the first to provoke any dissenting votes. That the dissenters included the court's two best-known conservatives was interesting, of course.

Equally intriguing was the choice by Justice Kennedy, seen by many as the justice most likely to assume the central position on the court previously held by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, to join Justices Thomas and Scalia in an almost paradigmatic case pitting an individual against the state.

While this was hardly the most high-profile case on the court's docket, no case that requires the justices to express their views on the meaning of constitutional due process is insignificant.

Further, the federal government raised the stakes by entering the case to argue that the notice Arkansas provided to Mr. Jones was adequate. Given that many federal agencies have authority to seize property, "the United States has a substantial interest in the question presented," the solicitor general's office told the court in a 29-page brief.

The most recent Supreme Court case to touch on a related issue was in 2002, when the court ruled, 5 to 4, that the Federal Bureau of Investigation had satisfied due process by mailing a notice to a prisoner that his property was about to be forfeited. The bureau was unaware at the time that the prisoner had not received its letter.

William H. Rehnquist, then the chief justice, wrote the majority opinion in that case, Dusenbery v. United States, joined by Justices Thomas, Scalia, Kennedy and O'Connor. The dissenters then, all of whom joined Chief Justice Roberts in the new case, were Justices John Paul Stevens, David H. Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer.

In his majority opinion, Chief Justice Roberts acknowledged the Dusenbery case but said the "new wrinkle" was that in the new case the government was aware by the time it seized the property that it had failed to notify the owner.

Offering an analogy, the chief justice said that if the Arkansas tax commissioner had "prepared a stack of letters to mail to delinquent taxpayers, handed them to a postman and then watched as the departing postman accidentally dropped the letters down a storm drain, one would certainly expect the commission's office to prepare a new stack of letters and send them again" rather than "simply shrug his shoulders as the letters disappeared and say 'I tried.' "

Among the additional "reasonable steps" the chief justice said the state might have taken was to send the notice by regular mail, so that a signature was not required, or to post a notice on the front door.

In a second decision on Wednesday, the court set a new rule for people seeking to bring a lawsuit that accuses government officials of fomenting a criminal prosecution as retaliation for criticizing a government agency.

By a vote of 5 to 2, the court held that such a "retaliatory prosecution" suit could proceed only if the plaintiff could demonstrate an absence of probable cause for the prosecution.

The decision overturned a ruling by the federal appeals court here, which had not imposed that requirement in permitting a lawsuit against five postal inspectors to proceed.

The plaintiff, William G. Moore Jr., had been engaged in a business dispute with the Postal Service. He contended in his suit that the postal inspectors had persuaded a federal prosecutor to bring criminal charges against him, charges that were dismissed after a federal district judge found a "complete lack of evidence."

Under the court's precedents, prosecutors themselves have absolute immunity for a decision to prosecute, meaning that such suits must be brought against the officials who influenced the prosecutor to bring the case.

In his majority opinion on Wednesday in Hartman v. Moore, No. 04-1495, Justice Souter said that showing an absence of probable cause was the most reliable way to make the necessary link "between the retaliatory animus of one person and the action of another."

Justices Ginsburg and Breyer dissented. Chief Justice Roberts, who was on the appeals court when the case was decided there, and Justice Alito, who was not on the Supreme Court when it was argued in January, did not vote.

America's Parks Feel Strain Of A Budget Crunch (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, April 27, 2006

ASHLAND, ORE. - In the eyes of Americans, nothing tops national parks as a popular government program. Not defense or education. Not Social Security or fighting crime, public opinion polls say. That's one reason President Bush declared this week to be "National Park Week."

But as the wear and tear of all that love takes its toll on nearly 400 park units around the country, and as Uncle Sam's expenses for war in Iraq, hurricane cleanup, and other activities continue to push the federal deficit ever higher, parks around the country are facing a budget crunch.

From Joshua Tree in the southern California desert to Acadia on the coast of Maine, national parks are tightening their budget belts - shortening some facility hours, increasing fees for camping and other activities, recruiting retirees and other unpaid volunteers to conduct education and interpretation programs, sharing archaeologists and other specialists, and seeking financial support from corporations.

"These are challenging times," says Elaine Sevy, deputy chief of communications for the National Park Service. "I'm not going to deny that."

Will this affect the park experience for vacationers this summer? Parks advocates and former park service employees say so, predicting reduced visitor services and increased fees.

"It very definitely is belt- tightening or more," says Bill Wade, chairman of the executive council of the Coalition of National Park Service Retirees and former superintendent of Shenandoah National Park in Virginia. "We are in the process right now of surveying some parks to find out how the quality of park experiences and protection of resources are likely to be impacted, this summer and beyond."

The Government Accountability Office (the investigative arm of Congress) recently visited 12 park units. Managers there told GAO officials that they do not have the financial resources to keep up with increasing costs, including congressionally authorized salary and benefits for employees, rising utility costs, maintenance needs, and required law enforcement levels, including back-country patrols.

"In response to daily operations allocation trends, increased costs, and new policy requirements, parks reported that they either eliminated or reduced some services," the GAO recently reported. "They also relied on other authorized funding sources and volunteers to pay for activities that have historically been paid for from the allocations for daily operations."

This worries park advocates.

"The GAO report confirms that America's national parks are losing ground, and straining to survive shrinking budgets," says Tom Kiernan, president of the National Parks Conservation Association (NPCA), an advocacy group in Washington.

A year ago, the Congressional Research Service estimated that the Park Service backlog in maintenance and resource protection totals from $4.5 billion to $9.7 billion - upkeep for some 8,000 miles of roads, 1,500 bridges, 400 dams, and 30,000 structures at 388 national park sites (parks, monuments, battlefields, historic sites, lakeshores, recreation areas, scenic rivers and trails, and the White House).

Then there's the cost of paying park rangers, keeping the lights on, running thousands of vehicles and hundreds of visitor centers, and the other necessities required to handle nearly 300 million visitors a year. As the NPCA sees it, there's a "chronic annual operating shortfall," exceeding $600 million a year.

Aside from the politics of who's responsible for such growing needs, the Park Service has to make do with the budget put forth by the president and approved by Congress.

What that means, says Ms. Sevy, is having each park superintendent work to keep operating costs at about 80 percent of his or her annual budget, leaving the rest for special projects like natural resource studies or restoration of trails.

"It's not a cut," says Sevy. "It's just to get them to manage their budgets more efficiently."

To advocacy groups, that sounds a lot like a budget cut - $100 million less in the fiscal year 2007 overall parks budget now being reviewed by Congress, as the NPCA sees it. In any case, Sevy acknowledges, "there's no way around" the need for some parks to reduce some services and hours of operation.

In Congress, 70 representatives and senators are sponsoring the bipartisan National Park Centennial Act. Using federal treasury money plus a voluntary check-off on income tax returns, the bill would increase funding for maintenance as well as natural and cultural preservation projects through 2016 - the 100th anniversary of the National Park Service.

The debate over national parks funding goes back several years to when US Park Police Chief Teresa Chambers was fired for talking with a reporter about staff reductions. Ms. Chambers' legal dispute with the federal government over her termination continues. But since then, the park service has directed its employees to be more open with the public over budget challenges.

More Lawlessness At EPA (WP)

BARELY A MONTH ago, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit issued a stinging rebuke to the Environmental Protection Agency's efforts to rewrite federal clean air law to weaken rules concerning power companies upgrading old coal-fired equipment. This week, a cross-ideological panel of the court unanimously accused the agency, once again, of defying federal environmental law -- this time concerning efforts to clean up the Anacostia River. The panel's strong, derisive language should send a message to the agency to take congressional enactments seriously, as written, not as the agency wishes Congress had written them.

Decades after the passage of the Clean Water Act, the Anacostia remains one of the dirtiest rivers in the country. To redress such problems, the law requires the EPA to identify pollutants and set what the law calls "total maximum daily loads" -- the daily dumping the river can take for each of these pollutants, measured at a level adequate to "implement the applicable water quality standards." The trouble for the Anacostia, and for a lot of dirty rivers, is that measuring the maximum load by the day requires expensive changes. Heavy rains can cause sewage to overflow into the river day, killing fish and blotting out sunlight necessary for plant life. Instead of forcing the D.C. government and the D.C. Water and Sewer Authority to create systems to prevent this, the EPA read the word "daily" to mean -- as it put it in one brief -- "non-daily" and measured the total maximum load for different pollutants on a seasonal and annual basis. This effectively allows big dumps now and then, as long as the total over time stays within specific limits.

This move was not, as was the power-plant rule, a crude effort by the Bush administration to rewrite the law to favor polluters. For one thing, the EPA seems to have adopted this reading of the statute long before the current administration; what's more, one federal court of appeals actually adopted it. That said, it is plainly erroneous, as was argued by the D.C. Circuit panel, which included controversial Bush-appointed Judges Janice Rogers Brown and Thomas B. Griffith. Wrote Judge David S. Tatel for the panel, " 'Daily' connotes 'every day.' Doctors making daily rounds would be of little use to their patients if they appeared seasonally or annually. And no one thinks of '[g]ive us this day our daily bread' as a prayer for sustenance on a seasonal or annual basis." Federal regulators shouldn't need such judicial reminders that the law means what it says.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Oakland Pot Growing Conviction Overturned But Ruling Means New Trial For Marijuana Advocate (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, April 27, 2006

(04-26) 13:48 PDT SAN FRANCISCO -- The federal marijuana cultivation convictions of noted pot advocate Ed Rosenthal were overturned by a federal appeals court today because of a juror's phone call to an attorney friend, who told her to follow the judge's instructions or she could get in trouble.

The juror's unauthorized contact on the eve of the verdict in January 2003 was an "improper influence" that denied Rosenthal a trial before an impartial jury, the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said in a 3-0 ruling granting him a new trial.

"Jurors cannot fairly determine the outcome of a case if they believe they will face 'trouble' for a conclusion they reach as jurors," said the opinion by Judge Betty Fletcher. "The threat of punishment works a coercive influence on the jury's independence."

Rosenthal, a magazine columnist and author of books on marijuana-growing who is known as the "Guru of Ganja," was convicted of three felony charges in connection with plants he was growing in 2002 for patients served by the Harm Reduction Center, a San Francisco dispensary.

He faced a sentence of at least five years in prison under federal law, but U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer gave him only a day in jail, finding unusual circumstances. Breyer said Rosenthal had believed, mistakenly but reasonably, that he was not violating federal law because Oakland had named him an official agent in its drug program.

Rosenthal, who had already served his one-day sentence after his arrest, appealed his convictions. The Justice Department, which had sought a 6 1/2-year prison term, appealed the sentence. Because the convictions were overturned, the court did not rule on the government's appeal, but Fletcher said the panel was not inclined to change Rosenthal's sentence.

During the trial, Breyer refused to allow evidence about the intended medical use of the marijuana or about its possible legality under California's Proposition 215, a 1996 initiative that allowed patients to use the drug with their doctor's approval. Seven of the 12 jurors disavowed their guilty verdicts after the trial when they learned about the evidence that had been excluded -- that Rosenthal was growing marijuana for medical patients, and that he had been designated as an agent by the city of Oakland in its medical marijuana program.

Similar qualms about the jury's inability to consider the drug's medical use led to the pre-verdict phone call that was the basis of today's ruling.

In a sworn declaration, the juror said she had been troubled by the absence of evidence about medical marijuana and by the judge's instructions that jurors must consider only federal law. She said she telephoned a lawyer she knew and asked if she had to follow the instructions or if she had any leeway for independent thought.

She said the lawyer replied that she had to follow the instructions or she could "get into trouble." The juror said she shared the advice with another juror who shared her confusion.

9th Circuit Overturns Marijuana Cultivation Conviction Of 'Guru Of Ganja' (AP)

By David Kravets, The Associated Press

AP, April 27, 2006

A federal appeals court Wednesday overturned the pot-growing conviction of the self-proclaimed "Guru of Ganja," a marijuana advocate who has written books on how to grow pot and avoid getting caught.

The court cited jury misconduct in overturning Ed Rosenthal's conviction, but it otherwise upheld federal powers to charge marijuana growers.

Rosenthal was convicted in 2003 for cultivating hundreds of marijuana plants for a city of Oakland medical marijuana program. U.S. District Judge Charles Breyer sentenced him to one day in prison, saying Rosenthal reasonably believed he was immune from prosecution because he was acting on behalf of city officials.

The government sought a two-year prison term and appealed. Rosenthal cross-appealed.

The case drew national attention, in part, because of Rosenthal's status as a leading author and proponent of marijuana. It also underscored the federal government's position that medical marijuana is illegal, it has no medical value and the will of California voters has no effect on nationwide drug laws.

A three-judge panel of the San Francisco-based appeals court, in overturning the verdict, said a juror had had inappropriate communication with an attorney.

"Juror A" had asked a friend who is an attorney whether she had to follow the law or could vote her conscience because she suspected Rosenthal was growing marijuana for medicinal uses. The attorney told her she must follow the judge's instructions to follow federal law or she would get in "trouble."

"We hold that here the communication was an improper influence upon Juror A's decision to acquit or convict," the appeals court wrote.

The court rejected Rosenthal's argument that he should have been allowed to tell jurors he was growing marijuana for the city for medicinal uses.

While the case was on appeal, and despite Rosenthal's claims, the Supreme Court ruled again that the federal government can prosecute medical marijuana growers and users despite California's medical marijuana law.

Rosenthal once wrote the "Ask Ed" column for High Times magazine and has written books with titles including "The Big Book of Buds" and "Ask Ed: Marijuana Law. Don't Get Busted."

Reached by phone Wednesday, he declined immediate comment on the ruling, saying he had not yet read the decision.

U.S. Attorney's spokesman Luke Macaulay said the office was considering whether to appeal or go ahead with a new trial.

BankAtlantic To Forfeit $10M To U.S. (AP)

BankAtlantic Agrees to Forfeit $10 Million to U.S. to Avoid Money-Laundering Charge

MIAMI (AP) -- BankAtlantic agreed Wednesday to forfeit $10 million to the U.S. government to avoid criminal charges that it permitted millions of dollars in suspected drug money to be laundered through its accounts over a nearly seven-year period.

Under an agreement with the U.S. Justice Department filed in federal court, prosecution against the Fort Lauderdale-based bank will be deferred for at least 12 months in return for the payment. The charges will be dismissed altogether if BankAtlantic continues taking action to remedy the situation.

The investigation, led by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and federal bank regulators, identified more than $50 million in suspicious transactions between July 1997 and April 2004, according to court documents.

BankAtlantic operates 79 branch offices in Florida. It is a subsidiary of BankAtlantic Bancorp Inc., a financial services holding company whose stock fell 2 cents Wednesday to close at $15.32 a share.

Alan B. Levan, BankAtlantic's chairman and CEO, said that since problems were found in 2004 "we have worked tirelessly" to improve compliance with anti-money laundering laws and regulations.

"We are happy to put these issues behind us," Levan said.

DEA agents working undercover as operatives for supposed Colombian drug lords found that drug money was being wire transferred to a handful of BankAtlantic accounts overseen by a specific branch manager. That led to the discovery of other BankAtlantic accounts being used to launder illicit drug proceeds.

"While a weak link at BankAtlantic let this money in, DEA is committed to following it where we often see it lead: right to the pockets of drug kingpins," said DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy.

BankAtlantic admitted in the agreement that it did not identify and report the suspicious transactions as required by the Bank Secrecy Act. Court papers say there were numerous "red flags" about the transactions, such as a high volume of both incoming and outgoing wire transfers to unrelated people and corporations.

Although the unidentified branch manager was to blame for many of the problems, the investigation also revealed "serious and systemic" failures by BankAtlantic to comply with anti-money laundering laws over several years.

But the court agreement gives BankAtlantic credit for cooperating with the investigation, firing employees responsible for the problems and closing down accounts used for the suspicious transactions. The bank also created a new anti-money laundering and Bank Secrecy Act department to beef up compliance and improved audits, training and software used to detect such transactions.

US Drug Money Sting Leads To $10 Million Fine For BankAtlantic (DOW)

Dow Jones, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- An undercover money-laundering sting has netted an unusual catch - a medium-size bank - and Wednesday BankAtlantic Bancorp Inc. (BBX) agreed to pay federal officials a $10 million fine.

DOJ_NMG_0026968

In its agreement with the U.S. Justice Department and bank regulators, BankAtlantic, based in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., agreed to ramp up its anti-money- laundering controls. If major changes are made in the next 12 months, law enforcement officials have agreed to drop the charges, but not the fine.

This arrangement is called a deferred prosecution agreement.

The $6 billion Fort Lauderdale-based thrift "accepted and acknowledged responsibility for its behavior," the Justice Department said in a press release. A BankAtlantic spokeswoman didn't return a call for comment.

In the agreement, the Justice Department and Drug Enforcement Agency alleged that BankAtlantic allowed millions of dollars to illegally flow through its accounts from 1997 through April 2004. This included "the deposit and transfer of more than $10 million in suspected drug proceeds originating from U.S. undercover law enforcement operations."

Court records show that undercover drug enforcement officials made deals with suspected drug traffickers to help deposit drug proceeds into U.S. banks. On multiple occasions, money couriers handed undercover agents bags or briefcases with between $150,000 and $500,000 in cash. The agents then deposited the money into a secret government account and were asked by the suspected drug traffickers to wire the money to accounts at BankAtlantic.

The Office of Thrift Supervision, which regulates BankAtlantic, issued a cease and desist order against the thrift Wednesday, requiring it to improve its anti- money- laundering protections.

This isn't the first time the Justice Department has sanctioned a bank for weak money-laundering controls.

In the last several years, the Justice Department has fined Riggs National Corp. $16 million and AmSouth Bancorp (ASO). (ASO) $40 million.

SAN FRANCISCO - A man suspected of storing methamphetamine for the ringleaders of an alleged Hells Angels drug ring was found shot to death at Ocean Beach, police said.

Michael Demetrescu Sr., 46, was wanted on federal drug trafficking charges after agents raided 19 Hells Angels locations last week and found a pound of methamphetamine in the garage of Demetrescu's home in San Francisco, said police Inspector Joe Toomey.

Demetrescu told his girlfriend a day before his death that he planned to turn himself in, police said. His death is being treated as a suicide.

Investigators believe Demetrescu was storing drugs for his neighbor, Jason Peterson, 32, a top Hells Angels official who was arrested in the raids Thursday along with the San Francisco chapter president, 35-year-old Joseph Wilson.

A total of 12 people were arrested on suspicion of methamphetamine trafficking and other charges. All have denied the allegations.

Authorities said they found more than 100 pounds of cocaine, eight pounds of methamphetamine and numerous weapons including a grenade in the raids and earlier seizures.

SAN FRANCISCO Hells Angel Possible Suicide At Beach Fugitive In Drug Raids Had Bullet In Head, Gun At Side (SFC)

By Jaxon Van Derbeken, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, April 26, 2006

A man sought after last week's federal raids targeting the Hells Angels motorcycle club in San Francisco was found shot to death Tuesday at Ocean Beach, a day after telling his girlfriend he was going to turn himself in, authorities said.

Authorities say Michael Demetrescu Sr., 46, was found about 8:15 a.m. in the sand dunes on Ocean Beach near the Great Highway and Kirkham and Lawton streets, a handgun by his side. He had been shot in the head.

Police say they suspect Demetrescu committed suicide but are awaiting the outcome of tests and a review of other evidence before making any conclusions.

Demetrescu had faced 40 years to life in prison if convicted of federal methamphetamine trafficking charges that had been lodged against him after the raids Thursday. The agents who conducted the raids said they had found a pound of methamphetamine in the garage of his home in the Dogpatch neighborhood.

Inspector Joe Toomey of the homicide detail said Demetrescu was last seen Monday night leaving the Hells Angels' clubhouse on Tennessee Street. After his body was found, his live-in girlfriend, Nancy Deemer, told police that Demetrescu had said he was going to turn himself in Tuesday, Toomey said.

"She didn't know where he was going to turn himself in or to whom," Toomey said. "She said he was a little depressed."

Demetrescu lived at 1199 Tennessee St. in a home that abuts the Hells Angels Frisco chapter clubhouse. Authorities who raided his residence allegedly found marijuana in addition to the methamphetamine.

Federal agents suspected that Demetrescu stored drugs for Jason Peterson, 32, who lived in a unit that shares a wall with the Tennessee Street clubhouse.

Peterson, the sergeant at arms for the group, is in federal custody, as is the chapter's president, Joseph "Joey" Wilson, 35, of Visitacion Valley.

Demetrescu was not originally indicted, but was named as a defendant after agents allegedly found the methamphetamine.

Federal authorities used an undercover agent and eight months of wiretaps to build a case against the Hells Angels. They documented several drug deals -- including one for 100 pounds of cocaine -- allegedly orchestrated by Wilson and Peterson, according to a search warrant affidavit.

The two men and 10 associates were arraigned Friday before U.S. Magistrate James Larson. All denied the allegations. They are set to appear for hearings this week.

The defendants were involved in a well-organized, multimillion-dollar criminal enterprise involving methamphetamine, cocaine and marijuana, federal authorities said.

In the raids Thursday and in earlier seizures, agents found more than 100 pounds of cocaine, eight pounds of methamphetamine, $145,000 in cash and numerous weapons, including a grenade, authorities said.

FBI agents and local law enforcement raided 19 locations Thursday, knocking down doors in some cases to gain entry.

SAN FRANCISCO 15 Suspected Crack Dealers Arrested In Western Addition Roundup Will Cut Violent Crime There, Police Say (SFC)

By Jaxon Van Derbeken, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, April 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0026970

San Francisco police trying to gain control over crime in the Western Addition have secured warrants for at least two dozen suspected crack cocaine dealers and have arrested 15 of them, authorities said Tuesday.

Although none of those named in the warrants is wanted on murder charges, police said they were optimistic that taking crack dealers off the streets would reduce violent crime in the Western Addition.

At least 20 people have been slain in the neighborhood since the beginning of last year, and investigators suspect many of the killings were connected to the drug trade.

"We know of the nexus between drugs and homicides," said Deputy Chief Morris Tabak, who oversees police investigations and the narcotics detail.

The alleged crack dealers were identified during a two-month undercover investigation, Tabak said. Officers posing as customers made one to three purchases of crack in videotaped transactions from each of the alleged street dealers, investigators said.

All the suspects are accused of felony drug crimes, mainly crack cocaine dealing. Police were still seeking some suspects as of late Tuesday, but refused to say exactly how many.

Investigators said many of those arrested Tuesday were repeat offenders who were either out on bail or on probation. Their past convictions include gang violence and weapons possession charges, said Capt. Tim Hettrich of the narcotics unit.

"These people have committed robberies, they have shot people, they are terrorizing the neighborhood," Hettrich said.

Hettrich said most of the 15 suspects arrested Tuesday had been found on the street in the Western Addition. The arrest warrants carry bail amounts of $35,000 to $125,000, he said.

The sweep was conducted by the narcotics detail, with assistance from the gang task force, officers from Northern Station, and agents with the federal Drug Enforcement Administration.

"We target the areas where we have the violence," Hettrich said.

District Attorney Kamala Harris said her office had filed the drug charges against roughly two dozen suspects -- including the 15 under arrest -- as part of an overall crackdown on drug dealing and violent felons.

"It was a collaborative law enforcement effort," she said. "That's 15 bodies off the street who were dealing drugs and posing a threat to the neighborhood."

"Good job -- we need more of it," said Supervisor Ross Mirkarimi, who represents the Western Addition. He has called loudly for police to do something about homicides there.

"There is a very plausible link between the drug dealing and the spikes of homicides and violence," Mirkarimi said. "The homicides where I have been to the scene have often been the results of drug deals gone bad or turf wars over those who are selling drugs."

Mirkarimi noted that the homicide rate has dropped recently. Two killings have happened in the neighborhood since Jan. 1, compared with six by this time last year.

"We've had a bit of a respite in the homicides, thank heavens to all the good work everybody is doing," Mirkarimi said. But given the trend of gang and drug activity, he said, "it's just a matter of time" before the rate rises again, unless more is done.

Powerhouse Gym Owner Pleads Guilty To Drug Charge (BHE)

By SERGIO CHAPA

Brownsville (TX) Herald, April 27, 2006

The owner of a Brownsville gym pleaded guilty to a federal drug trafficking charge Wednesday morning.

Powerhouse Gym owner Jose Alfredo DeLeon had maintained his innocence on the conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute more than 5 kilograms of cocaine charge until the Wednesday morning hearing where he told U.S. District Judge Andrew S. Hanen that he had a “cocaine habit.”

The 39-year-old man, who was arrested by Drug Enforcement Administration agents in January, told Hanen that he last used cocaine three days before his arrest and requested to be placed in a drug treatment program.

The gym owner faces 10 years to life in prison after pleading guilty to selling bulk amounts of the dietary supplement inositol to cocaine traffickers and then instructing them how to use it to “cut” their shipments.

Prosecutor Terra Bay said in open court that federal agents found a hand-written ledger of inositol sales, a cocaine pharmacology book, scales, 25 pounds of marijuana and a small amount of cocaine inside DeLeon’s North Brownsville home.

Court records show that DeLeon is the next-to-the-last defendant to be arrested in a five-count, 16-person indictment that included convicted drug trafficker Juan Carlos Sanchez-Vasquez in January 2005.

Bay said in open court that DeLeon sold the dietary supplement to Sanchez-Vasquez as well as convicted drug traffickers Andres Garza and Rolando Curiel.

DOJ_NMG_0026971

Federal court records show that Sanchez-Vasquez, Garza and Curiel each bribed former Sheriff Conrado Cantu to protect their drug trafficking organizations.

DeLeon is expected to be sentenced July 31.

New Rochelle Drug Trafficker Sentenced To 38 Months In Prison (JNE)

By TIMOTHY O'CONNOR

Journal News, April 26, 2006

A New Rochelle man was sentenced yesterday to more than three years in prison for cocaine trafficking.

Victor M. Frias-Valencia, 27, of 40 Park Place pleaded guilty in November in U.S. District Court in Bridgeport to possessing and intending to distribute a kilogram of cocaine.

Agents with the Drug Enforcement Administration arrested Frias-Valencia in Greenwich on Sept. 29, 2004, after he struck a deal with a DEA informant to sell the cocaine, roughly 2.2 pounds, according to court documents and Frias-Valencia's plea.

Frias-Valencia showed the informant the cocaine that he had stashed in a cooler outside a Greenwich apartment building. The informant went back to his car to get money and signaled the DEA agents that the deal was happening.

DEA agents approached Frias-Valencia, who fled up the stairs and into an apartment. DEA agents entered the apartment after him and found the cooler in the bathroom, the cocaine on a roof outside the bathroom window. Frias-Valencia admitted to DEA agents the cocaine was his and he intended to sell it, according to court documents.

At the time of his arrest, Frias-Valencia was in the United States illegally. He was sentenced yesterday to 38 months in a federal prison. He will be deported to Mexico upon completion of his prison sentence, U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor said.

As part of the plea agreement he signed Nov. 3 with federal prosecutors, Frias-Valencia agreed to forfeit the Lexus IS 300 he was in possession of at the time of his arrest. Frias-Valencia's lawyer did not return calls seeking comment.

Man Guilty Of Conspiracy In Cocaine Trafficking Case (AP/WPRI)

WPRI/AP, April 27, 2006

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) -- A jury finds a Massachusetts man guilty of conspiring to deal cocaine.

Domingo Gonzales was arrested last year after agents from the federal Drug Enforcement Administration raided a Providence house and interrupted a cocaine deal. Investigators say they found a handgun and 97 grams of cocaine in the car Gonzales arrived in.

He was arrested after DEA agents found him hiding under a pile of rubbish in the basement. Gonzales lives in Lawrence, Massachusetts. He was convicted of conspiring to distribute cocaine and possessing more than 500 grams of the drug.

He was acquitted of a gun charge. According to the U.S. Attorney's office, five other defendants in the case have already pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges.

City Man Gets 5 Years For Role In Opiates Ring (SNE)

By Douglas A. Moser

Salem News, April 27, 2006

BOSTON — A Peabody man will spend more than five years behind bars for his part in a ring that peddled highly addictive painkillers on Cape Ann.

Jose Melo of 20 Tracey St., Peabody, was sentenced to more than five years (63 months) for distribution yesterday. During an undercover drug raid in 2004, Melo was arrested along with a dozen others, most from Gloucester. He pleaded guilty last month to the charges in U.S. District Court. He was sentenced yesterday at the John Joseph Moakley Courthouse in South Boston.

Judge Rya Zobel ordered Melo to serve 63 months in prison and three years' supervision after release. After his sentence, she ordered Melo, who is not an American citizen, to leave the country. His defense attorney, Stephen Neyman, did not say what country Melo is from, saying only that Melo would return to the Azores islands, off the coast of Portugal.

Thirteen men — most of whom were from Gloucester — were arrested June 29, 2004, and the next day after an eight-month undercover operation from a Riverdale Park apartment involving Gloucester police, the Cape Ann Drug Task Force, Essex County sheriff's deputies and the federal Drug Enforcement Agency.

Deputies and the DEA said they purchased 1,096 80 milligram pills between October 2003 and June 2004. Two of the men sold the drugs from a Gloucester apartment, as well as at the Bugaboo Creek Steak House in Peabody and in the Northshore Mall.

All 13 were indicted by a grand jury in September 2004 for distribution and conspiracy to distribute oxycodone.

Student, Teen Charged In Gun Case, Threat At Melvindale Charter School (DEN)

Detroit News, April 27, 2006

MELVINDALE -- A 16-year-old student at the Academy of Business and Technology and a 15-year old who formerly attended the school were charged Wednesday with carrying a concealed weapon and with making a terrorist threat in separate incidents at the school.

Melvindale police were at the school Tuesday investigating an e-mail in which someone threatened to shoot up the school when a student approached the officers and told them they saw a student with a gun, said Chief Rick Cadez.

When officers located the 16-year-old, a Detroit resident, he was carrying an unloaded .25-caliber hand gun, the chief said. Police were not able to learn where he got the gun, as his parents refused to allow police to interview him.

The gun was given to the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms (ATF) which will trace its ownership. The youth was turned over to Wayne County juvenile authorities. Wayne County Prosecutor Kym L. Worthy issued a warrant charging him with carrying a concealed weapon.

The threatening e-mail was traced to a 15-year-old from Taylor. He was charged with making a threat of terrorism, a felony that carries a 20-year maximum prison sentence. He is also being held by juvenile authorities.

Cadez said the incidents should not be seen as a reflection on the school.

"These were just a couple of dumb kids acting stupid," he said. Cadez said "I am going to notify our schools about what happened here so they can let kids know what the consequences can be for acting stupid."

Man Gets Probation For Having Bombs (GTT)

By Scott Harper

Georgetown (SC) Times, April 27, 2006

An Andrews man arrested last year for possessing homemade bombs will not go to jail after it was determined he had no criminal intentions.

Norman Weaver, 30, pled guilty to multiple counts of possession of a destructive device and was sentenced to 18 months probation Tuesday.

He was arrested in October after Georgetown County deputies went to his Big Dam Swamp home to investigate another matter.

Deputy Solicitor Matthew Modica told Judge Edward Cottingham while the officers were at the home they found eight bombs made of PCP pipe that were packed with black powder.

He said South Carolina Law Enforcement Division and federal ATF agents were called in to assist with the investigation. He said after the inquest, it was decided the matter did not warrant federal prosecution.Modica said Weaver's name did not appear on any intelligence watch lists and the ATF agents "did not believe he posed a threat."

However, Modica noted, "it is against the law in South Carolina to possess" such devices.

He also pointed out that the bombs could not have been exploded as they were at the time they were discovered. He said more work, including the adding of wicks, would have had to occur on the bombs before they could be detonated.

Weaver's attorney, Stephen Schmitz, said his client, who now lives in Beaufort, had a good, non-violent reason for having the bombs. He said Weaver travels the country as a Civil War reenactor and he made the devices five years ago to possibly use in one of the performances.

Schmitz said Weaver planned to blow up the bombs in the Edisto River but had not done it before they were found.

That story is different from the one Weaver reportedly told investigators when he was arrested. According to the Sheriff's Office, during Weaver's initial interview he said he bought a box of ammunition at a gun show and had no idea the bombs were in the box until he got home. He said he had planned to cut each of the pipes open with a saw to dispose of the powder.

The bombs were not the only things authorities confiscated. They also removed bullets and guns as well as two books — "The Complete Book of Witchcraft" and "The Magus: The Complete System of Occult Philosophy."

Although Modica said he now believes Weaver meant no harm, Cottingham said the Sheriff's Office did the right thing by pressing charges. He said after the Sept. 11 attacks on America no one can be too careful.

"I congratulate the Sheriff's Department for bringing this out," Cottingham said. He then sentenced Weaver to five years on each count but suspended the sentence to probation.

Search By ATF Called Politics (SANEWS)

By DEAN BOHN, THE SAGINAW NEWS

The Saginaw News, April 27, 2006

Time will tell if federal agents will return with arrest warrants after carting away numerous firearms from the home of an embattled Brady Township official whose husband is a convicted felon.

Federal law says felons cannot own firearms.

While Clerk Melissa Alcorn is at odds with the township supervisor, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives on Tuesday morning focused on her husband, Douglas A. Alcorn, 41, who served a month in jail and four years of probation, the first two on electronic tether.

He pleaded no contest in 1993 to a charge of second-degree child abuse. In return, prosecutors dismissed a count of first-degree child abuse, court records show.

Court documents show his first wife filed the charges two months into their marriage.

The Alcorns refused comment. William A. Temple, special agent in charge of the ATF's Detroit office who supervised the raid at Alcorn's home, also would not comment.

Arnold D. Dunchock of Corunna, an attorney for the Alcorns, said the firearms were in a gun safe in the home and Douglas Alcorn "did not have access to them."

"They were not arrested," Dunchock said. "If this is so terrible, why were they not taken away?"

However, Dunchock acknowledged, "this doesn't mean they might not be (arrested) in the future."

Dunchock said the family is incensed that agents "apprehended" Melissa Alcorn while she was driving home after dropping one of her four children off to school and conducted the search of their home in front of their other three children.

She has bickered for months with Brady Township Supervisor John Schoch, who faces a recall election Tuesday.

While Schoch blames Alcorn for orchestrating the recall, the timing of the raid prompted the Alcorns' attorney to complain about political motivations.

"This happened one week before the recall election," Dunchock said. "It's not like these were weapons of mass destruction. This (situation) was stable for years. Why now?

"It's obviously politically motivated. The family is being victimized, especially with the recall election on Tuesday."

Dunchock suggested that Schoch prompted the ATF search on the couple in retaliation for the recall effort, but Schoch said he knew nothing about the raid until it happened.

"They're slinging mud," Schoch said. "He's a felon, he's got guns in the house, and somehow they want to say all this is my fault."

The recall election follows months of arguing between Alcorn and Schoch. A Saginaw County Sheriff's Department report shows the Alcorns accused Police Chief Larry Briggs and Schoch of separately swiping their mail, including money from children's birthday cards and a government check.

Schoch and Briggs deny the claim, and no evidence of such offenses exists beyond the Alcorns' allegations, deputies concluded. Briggs was not present at the ATF raid.

Behind his home he has a shooting range accentuated with a large pavilion. v

Attorney For Former Nazi Guard Seeks Review Of Ruling (AP)

By MIKE WILSON, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 27, 2006

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) A lawyer for a former Nazi concentration camp guard has asked a federal appeals court to review its ruling to revoke the man's U.S. citizenship.

Lisa Mattson, a lawyer for John Hansl, filed documents with the U.S. 8th Circuit Court of Appeals last week, seeking a review by the entire court.

A three-judge panel of the St. Louis-based court ruled March 7 that a U.S. District Court judge was correct in revoking the citizenship of Hansl, 81, who lives in Des Moines.

The U.S. Department of Justice filed a complaint against Hansl in July 2003, claiming he hid his service with the Waffen SS when he applied for a visa to come the United States in 1955. He was granted a visa and became a U.S. citizen in 1960.

The case revolved around a 1953 law designed to control the flow of immigrants to the U.S. after World War II.

Mattson claimed the law required a person to have ``personally assisted'' in the persecution of others before they could be denied a visa.

U.S. District Court Judge Robert Pratt revoked Hansl's citizenship in April 2005, ruling that Hansl's conduct as a Nazi concentration camp guard left ``no room for factual dispute whether he personally advocated or assisted in persecution.''

In documents filed with the federal appeals court last week, Mattson argued that the decision by the appeals court panel did not take into account evidence by the government that would have shown Hansl was eligible for a visa.

The documents include justice department records on other post World War II visa applicants, and were turned over previously in a ``highly redacted form as to be meaningless,'' Mattson said.

By doing so, ``the government violated the defendant's due process right to a fundamentally fair hearing,'' she said.

She said the documents would show that it was national immigration policy to issue visas to former concentration camp guards unless they were directly involved in committing atrocities.

Mattson said Hansl does not deny that he was a guard at the Sachsenhausen and Natzweiler concentration camps but does not believe he personally assisted in the persecution of others.

Mattson said submitting the redacted evidence ``unfairly shaded and misdirected the court's focus.''

The government later came forward with five documents in their unredacted form, Mattson said in court records.

``Had the evidence been produced in its unadulterated form, and allowed to be presented to the court ... it should have made a difference in the outcome of this case,'' Mattson said.

High Court Avoids Immigration, Focuses On RICO's Application To Business Relationships (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, April 27, 2006

The Supreme Court appeared sympathetic to pleas by business advocates not to "RICO-ize" all types of business relationships, as Justice Stephen Breyer put it, during oral arguments Wednesday.

The Court heard debate in Mohawk Industries v. Williams, a class action brought against Georgia carpet manufacturer Mohawk Industries under the civil portion of RICO, the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. Current and former employees of Mohawk claimed that its hiring of illegal aliens -- in concert with outside recruiting and temp agencies -- depressed wages and amounted to racketeering as defined under RICO. If the suit fits under RICO and the plaintiffs prevail, Mohawk would be exposed to treble damages and could be forced to pay plaintiffs' attorney fees.

"These are enormous penalties that are imposed," Mohawk's lawyer, Carter Phillips, told the justices. Congress passed RICO to target organized crime, he asserted, not ordinary dealings between businesses and their agents and contractors. "It is not free for the government or anyone else" to broaden the law unilaterally, said Phillips, a partner in the D.C. office of Sidley Austin.

In advance billing it appeared that the Mohawk case would draw the high court into some of the immigration issues causing controversy across the nation, including the contention that the corporate hiring of illegal aliens has had the indirect effect of keeping wages low for American citizens.

Instead immigration was barely mentioned, as oral arguments devolved quickly into a dense debate over the ambiguous wording of the RICO statute and whether a corporation like Mohawk can be part of a separate "enterprise" covered by the law.

The tedium left at least two justices, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Clarence Thomas, struggling to stay awake, with mixed success. That is not unusual for Thomas, but it is not as common for Ginsburg, 73, though in recent months she has often appeared fatigued on the bench.

Responding to a Legal Times inquiry about the episode late Wednesday, Ginsburg said, through Court spokeswoman Kathy Arberg, that she "experienced an eye irritation during oral argument that was probably exacerbated by allergies."

Wednesday was the final day for regularly scheduled oral arguments this term.

Though originally aimed at organized crime, the RICO law was amended by Congress in 1996 to include the hiring of illegal aliens among the "predicate acts" that can trigger a RICO claim. So the employees asserted that Mohawk, by associating with outside recruiters to hire the illegal aliens, fit the requirements to make out a civil RICO claim. The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals held that the employees had stated a valid RICO claim. The Bush administration has also sided with the plaintiffs in favor of a broad view of RICO's scope.

Phillips, in a brief for Mohawk, said the circuit's definition of a RICO enterprise "would allow virtually every alleged corporate conspiracy, including most fraud claims and other business torts, to be pled as civil RICO claims."

Breyer appeared to agree, expressing concern that "vast amounts of ordinary activity" by companies would come under the law, even though the companies have nothing to do with organized crime.

Howard Foster of Johnson & Bell in Chicago, representing the plaintiffs, told the Court that Mohawk committed hundreds if not thousands of immigration-related felonies "in very close cooperation" with outside recruiters, all of which are well within the scope of RICO.

Foster also told the justices that all circuit courts that have ruled on the issue have adopted the broader scope of RICO that would include corporations like Mohawk. "There is no dispute in the lower courts that a corporation can be part of an enterprise," said Foster.

Business lawyers warn that if the Court rules against Mohawk, RICO will become another tool for attacking employers. "Employers located in areas with a large immigrant-worker population may be potential targets for civil RICO class actions," says Steptoe & Johnson partner Lynda Zengerle, who recommends that employers use hiring methods that clearly document efforts by companies and their recruiters to abide by immigration laws.

But some business advocates have sounded a broader alarm about the case. "If the Supreme Court sides with the plaintiffs in this case, there is no doubt that we will see many more civil RICO cases filed on a broad range of subject matters, not just immigration," says Karen Hirschman, a partner at Vinson & Elkins.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Republicans Sag In New Poll (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

Rising gas prices have intensified discontent with Washington and handed Congress a frightening midterm election backdrop: a deeply pessimistic electorate, despite a robust economy.

A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll underscores a striking gap between Americans' mood and the nation's economic performance. Fully 77% call themselves uneasy about the state of the economy rather than confident, even as data showed new-home sales and factory orders remain strong. Economists expect a similar message tomorrow when the government reports on first-quarter growth.

Public unease partly reflects fallout from the prolonged and unpopular Iraq war. But it also shows the impact of pump prices topping $3 a gallon in many places, passing Iraq to become the nation's highest-priority issue. The upshot: Two-thirds of Americans say the nation is "off on the wrong track," President Bush's approval rating has fallen to 36% and Congress fares even worse at 22% approval.

"There's almost nothing that the public is satisfied with," says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who conducts the Journal/NBC poll with Republican counterpart Bill McInturff. "What they're telling you is, they want change on every front."

That is a worrisome sign for Republicans, who are seeking to defend their House and Senate majorities with little more than six months remaining before Election Day. Continuing a trend that has persisted for a year, Democrats lead -- beyond the poll's 3.1 percentage point margin of error -- in public preference for which party should control Congress. The survey of 1,005 adults was conducted April 21-24.

And in the run-up to November, Democrats also enjoy an edge in intensity; by 11 percentage points, their partisans are more likely to express high interest in the midterm campaigns. The biggest bright spot for Republicans is that Democrats have made no progress improving their national image, an indication that they aren't yet positioned to take advantage of their opportunity for far-reaching November gains.

Public unhappiness with government is strongly at odds with bullishness on Wall Street, as new data underscored the economy's current strength. The Commerce Department yesterday reported sales of new single-family homes rose 13.8% in March, the largest increase in 13 years.

Orders for big-ticket manufactured goods rose 6.1% in March, the largest increase in nearly a year. Indeed, that data fueled bond-market worries the economy is so strong that the Fed will be reluctant to stop lifting short-term interest rates after May, when the central bank is expected to bump rates up a notch.

Public unhappiness also represents a powerful source of frustration for Republicans, who want Mr. Bush and Congress to get more credit for the economy. Doing just that is a top priority of new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten and congressional Republican leaders, who are aiming to take a first step by accelerating House-Senate negotiations on tax-cut legislation that would extend the current 15% rates on capital gains and dividends.

Yet worries about gasoline prices, offshoring of jobs, rising health-care costs and precarious private pension plans are creating anxiety even among workers who do have jobs. Moreover, the fruits of the economy's recent strength aren't evenly shared: Workers at the bottom and the middle are benefiting less than those at the top.

Richard Curtin, who oversees the University of Michigan's consumer-confidence surveys, says the gap between views of the economy among those who make more than $50,000 and those who make less is wider than it has ever been in the university's polling. Especially for those with moderate incomes, says Mr. Hart, the Journal/NBC pollster, gas prices "are the real numbers that people are living with."

That helps explain why just 19% of Americans say the strong employment picture, rising stock prices and low inflation rate leave them feeling confident about the nation's economic health. Four times that many respondents said that gas prices, rising interest rates and the federal budget deficit have them feeling uneasy.

The poll also explains why oil companies suddenly find themselves in the cross hairs of political debates over potential price-gouging and even windfall-profits taxes. In the wake of record oil-industry profits, some 60% of Americans find oil companies responsible for rising gas prices -- far outpacing the proportion who blame oil-producing nations, President Bush or Congress.

Yet the toll on Mr. Bush is reflected in his 36% approval rating, the lowest he has ever received in the Journal/NBC survey, and the 35% positive mark on handling the economy. Amid continued violence in Iraq and a looming confrontation with Iran over its nuclear ambitions, Americans disapprove of Mr. Bush's handling of foreign policy by roughly 2 to 1.

Approval of the job Congress is doing has plummeted to 22%, from 33% just last month. That's worse than the marks a Democratic-controlled Congress received at a similar point in 1994, the year Newt Gingrich led Republicans back to power on Capitol Hill.

In particular, Americans who don't approve of Congress blame their sour mood on partisan contention and gridlock in Washington. Some 44% call themselves "tired of Republicans and Democrats fighting each other"; 36% say "nothing seems to get done" on important issues. A further 34% cite corruption among lawmakers. Among all Americans, a 39% plurality say the single most important thing for Congress to accomplish this year is curtailing budgetary "earmarks" benefiting only certain constituents.

Ranking just behind ending "earmarks" is congressional action on immigration overhaul, the top priority of 32%. By 61%-35%, Americans say illegal immigrants within the U.S. should be allowed to stay rather than be deported so long as they pay taxes and pass security checks. By 68%-28%, they express support for a potential Senate compromise that would allow for different treatment of those who have been in the U.S. at least five years, those here for two to five years, and those in the U.S. for less than two years.

Americans take dim views of both parties, giving Democrats a positive rating of just 33% and Republicans 35%. But they have different expectations for the minority and for the party that controls Congress and the White House. If no progress is made on key issues, the Journal/NBC poll shows, 51% would blame either Mr. Bush or congressional Republicans, compared with 16% who would blame congressional Democrats. One in four voters would blame all parties.

Pain At Pumps May Be Felt At Polls (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla., April 26 -- One of the soaring bridges to the beach here is named for longtime Republican congressman E. Clay Shaw Jr., and at its foot is a gas station where drivers on Wednesday were filling up, wincing at the tally and wondering whom to blame.

Gasoline prices have reached $3 a gallon in the area, and for Shaw, a former mayor and a political institution here, the rising bipartisan disgruntlement at the pumps is a troubling sign. Here and in other swing districts across the country, the Democratic challenger is attacking the Republican incumbent for inaction -- or worse -- on gas prices and other energy woes.

"This is ridiculous," said Jackie Tarone, a retired homemaker and Bush voter who was filling up a Mercedes SL500. "The oil companies keep giving money to the politicians to keep them in there -- that's the way the system works. It's a shame."

Although she has voted for Shaw in the past, she said, she isn't sure about next time.

"I don't know which is the lesser of two evils anymore," she said.

Anger over gas prices is gaining traction in many midterm races around the nation as Democrats attack Republicans for being too close to oil companies. With many in the GOP growing uneasy, President Bush this week called for price-fixing investigations. Political analysts say the rising prices could dovetail with growing public concern over the war in Iraq to give Democrats an opening in several key races.

In Virginia, one of two candidates in the Democratic primary for Senate, Harris Miller, accused Sen. George Allen (R) of siding with oil companies instead of backing legislation to protect consumers. "Looking to George Allen and George Bush to solve the gas crisis is like asking Bonnie and Clyde to solve the crime problem," Miller said.

Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams said in response that Democrats in the Senate had obstructed the passage of an energy bill in Congress for more than five years. He said Allen fought successfully for the bill's passage in 2005. "Had Harris Miller's friends not obstructed that bill for years, we would be a lot closer to energy independence and developing renewable sources of fuel," Wadhams said.

In the Maryland governor's race, incumbent Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) took fire from his Democratic challengers, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley and Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan. They accused him of failing consumers by not putting his clout behind anti-gouging legislation that died during the recently concluded legislative session.

Ehrlich dismissed the attacks as "whining" and told reporters he is realistic about his limited ability to exert pressure on gas prices. He did say he is seeking permission to temporarily halt the use of cleaner-burning gas additives in the Washington suburbs and Baltimore area.

In Minnesota, Democratic Senate candidate Amy Klobuchar has stopped at stations to hear from consumers. In Pennsylvania's 6th District, where Democrat Lois Murphy is trying to unseat Rep. Jim Gerlach, Murphy has been swinging through the state all week for rallies at gas stations. In Arizona, Democratic Senate candidate Jim Pederson proposed a tax rebate to families funded by eliminating oil companies' tax breaks.

George Gonzalez, an assistant professor of political science at the University of Miami, said the issue gives the Democrats leverage against Republican incumbents. "It certainly creates a bias against the Republicans," he said.

At the pumps, it was clear that incumbents had something to worry about.

Thomas Fortino said of Shaw: "I voted for him before, but now I want change -- but not just because of gas prices." The retired picture-framing-store owner was filling up in Fort Lauderdale.

Florida's 22nd District stretches across coastal communities from Fort Lauderdale through Boca Raton and Palm Beach. Shaw is being challenged by state Sen. Ron Klein, who is well financed and also focused now on energy issues.

This week, Klein proposed suspending Florida's sales tax on gasoline during August, noting that "there is a lot of frustration out there -- Congress has done nothing."

In criticizing Shaw for "generally voting with the Republican leadership to prop up the oil companies," he echoed other Democratic candidates whose national leaders have advised them to depict the problem, at least partly, as a product of Republican coziness with the oil industry. At least among motorists filling up here, suspicion regarding the oil companies was rife, with several citing the record profits recorded by Exxon Mobil Corp.

"I'm boycotting Exxon Mobil right now," said Deborah Shuart, a 53-year-old Republican who was putting $41.70 worth of gas into her car. The entrepreneur said her family of five is considering carpooling for the first time. "It's been tough."

Shaw said he anticipates being the target of some of the anger.

In a letter to constituents who ask about the issue, Shaw reminds them that he voted in favor of a measure to increase fuel-efficiency standards, which failed. In August, he sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, calling for scrutiny of potential profiteering and price gouging.

Noting that any "challenger will blame the incumbent" for the economic situation, he said he expects that gas prices, if they continue to rise, "will have some effect" on the election.

At the pumps here, the oil companies may have been the most commonly cited target of consumer ire, but not the only one.

Many said they blamed the government and car manufacturers for failing to develop alternative sources of energy -- particularly after the oil crisis in the 1970s.

"The government is definitely to blame for making oil our number one energy source," said Inna Shapovalov, 35, an immigration lawyer who was putting $35 into her Hyundai Santa Fe. "I wish we could all drive electric cars."

In a district that contains some of the most affluent portions of the state and large numbers of gas-guzzling luxury vehicles, none blamed motorists themselves for buying cars that use so much gas. National figures show that though the average vehicle mileage improved dramatically through much of the '80s, it has since dipped or held constant.

John Holzberg, 64, a Republican banker from Boca Raton, put gas into a Cadillac and cursed when the total of $43 came into view.

"I can't seem to figure out who's responsible," said Holzberg, who "doesn't like George Bush anymore." But he was sure it was making the electorate grumpy. "The economy is humming along, but nobody cares because everyone is focused -- like I am -- on Iraq and oil prices."

Bush To Meet Big 3 For Talks On Fuel Issues And Pensions (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard

DEARBORN, Mich., April 26 — President Bush, who touched a nerve this year when he told Detroit carmakers to build "relevant" vehicles, will meet with the companies' leaders next month, William Clay Ford Jr., the chief executive of Ford Motor, said Wednesday.

People involved in planning the meeting, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the high level of the talks, said it would focus on three areas: energy and the environment; costs like pensions and health care premiums that add hundreds of dollars to the price of a Detroit car; and how currency issues affect the Japanese automakers.

The meeting is expected to take place on May 18 at the White House. It would be the first time during his presidency that Mr. Bush has met collectively with Mr. Ford, Rick Wagoner of General Motors and Thomas W. LaSorda of Chrysler.

A White House spokeswoman, Dana Perino, said she could not confirm or deny that the meeting would take place, adding that Mr. Bush's schedule was generally not final that far in advance. Officials at G.M. and Chrysler, a unit of DaimlerChrysler, declined comment.

Toyota Motor, which ranks fourth in American sales behind Chrysler, and which is considering sites for its eighth North American assembly plant, said it was not invited.

Mr. Ford, who is known for his interest in the environment, said in an interview that he wanted to use the meeting to lobby the government to finance a national delivery system for ethanol, the grain alcohol fuel made from corn.

Together, the three companies have sold millions of flexible-fuel vehicles, which can run on either gasoline or a gasoline-ethanol mixture.

G.M. has introduced a campaign to promote the use of E85, a mixture of 85 percent ethanol and 15 percent gasoline, blanketing billboards and the sides of buses with the slogan, "Live green, go yellow."

But Mr. Ford said many of the 1.5 million buyers who own Ford's flexible-fuel vehicles either do not know they are able to run on both fuels, or are unable to find ethanol-based fuel that could help lessen the country's dependence on oil.

"If the goal is to drive ethanol, you have to have it priced attractively," Mr. Ford said. That is a problem because the United States has only 600 stations that dispense ethanol-based fuel, versus about 176,000 gasoline stations. Still, the number of ethanol stations doubled last year and should grow further because of tax credits passed by Congress last year that are meant to promote the installation of E85 pumps.

The discussion over ethanol comes amid rising gasoline prices, which threaten to hurt recovery efforts at Ford and G.M. Each lost market share and billions of dollars in North America last year, while Chrysler gained market share and made money.

Together, G.M. and Ford have announced plans to cut 60,000 jobs and close more than two dozen plants through 2012.

After Ford announced its cutbacks in January, Mr. Bush said the solution to reversing the automakers' problems lay in developing "a product that's relevant." Rather than having the government bail them out, as Congress did in 1979 to save Chrysler from bankruptcy, "I think it's very important that the market should function," Mr. Bush added.

Robert A. Lutz, the vice chairman of G.M., who is known for his candor, criticized Mr. Bush's comments this month. Speaking in New York, Mr. Lutz said: "I'm a lifelong Republican, by the way, but next time around, Hillary, here I come. I'm a protest vote."

Mr. Ford said the discussion of a bailout would not be on the agenda for the meeting with Mr. Bush, whose former chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., served as G.M.'s lobbyist before joining the White House.

Although this would be their first collective session with Mr. Bush, the three Detroit chief executives held two high-profile meetings with President Clinton. The first, in early 1993, took place in Little Rock, Ark., shortly before Mr. Clinton was inaugurated, in what was seen as an unusual show of support for an industry.

The second, in May of that year, provided an opportunity for the companies to show off their cars. They lined up 120 automobiles in an event called "Drive American Quality." Mr. Clinton, a car buff, strolled among the gleaming vehicles, stroking the side panels of some and gazing avidly at others. There are no plans for any kind of auto show this time, officials at the companies said.

Warming Up To Nuclear Power (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Twenty years ago yesterday, at 5 in the morning in Moscow, Mikhail Gorbachev got a phone call telling him that there had been an accident followed by a fire in the fourth block of the Chernobyl nuclear power plant. "I was astounded: How was such a thing possible?" Gorbachev said in an interview published earlier this year. "Nuclear scientists had always assured the country's leadership that our nuclear reactors were completely safe."

For years the nuclear industry has lived in the shadow of Chernobyl, which discouraged many nations from pushing ahead with nuclear power plants. A referendum in Italy banned plants shortly after the accident. Sweden, which first reported that something had happened in the former Soviet Union after sensors at its own nuclear plants detected elevated radiation levels, said it would close down the ones it had. In the United States, the Soviet reactor accident compounded questions over safety issues. Since the incident at the Three Mile Island plant in Pennsylvania in 1979, there has not been a single new order for the construction of a U.S. nuclear plant.

But now the Bush administration is pushing for a revival of nuclear power both abroad and in the United States, saying it wants to promote a domestic unlimited energy source. The Bush-backed Energy Policy Act of 2005 included a bevy of incentives for domestic nuclear power, and the administration has laid aside nuclear-proliferation issues to urge India to build nuclear power plants.

"What I view myself as is the chief salesman for nuclear energy," said Dennis Spurgeon, the new assistant secretary for nuclear energy at the Energy Department and the first person to hold that job in a decade. Spurgeon, who most recently was the chief operating officer of Bethesda-based USEC Inc., an international supplier of enriched uranium for nuclear plants, said, "There's a great story to tell."

Spurgeon said getting a new U.S. nuclear plant built is his "number one priority." But at an initial cost of $1.5 billion to $2 billion for a 1,000-megawatt plant, and with uncertainty about costs linked to nuclear waste that lasts for centuries, most companies remain cautious. Critics of nuclear power say that plants would cost even more without government subsidies and that, in an age of terrorism, they carry grave security risks.

Nuclear power fans have gotten unexpected support from a handful of prominent environmentalists who are more worried about global warming than nuclear accidents or waste disposal. While Greenpeace says that "safe nuclear power is a myth," the organization's founder, Patrick Moore, riled the environmental community by declaring, "Nuclear energy is the only large-scale, cost-effective energy source that can reduce these emissions while continuing to satisfy a growing demand for power. And these days it can do so safely."

Many environmentalists still disagree. "Nuclear power would be a great solution to greenhouse gases but for the four problems that have been mentioned: It's uneconomical, it has a safety problem, it has a horrendous proliferation problem on the global level, and it has a long-term waste problem that hasn't been solved," Thomas Cochran, a nuclear policy expert at the Natural Resources Defense Council, said at a meeting last fall.

But electric power companies aren't going to make big nuclear investments out of concern for the environment. Companies have been encouraged recently by the high price of natural gas and the rising cost of coal, nuclear power's biggest (and cheaper) competitor in the electricity business. If a new system of penalties and credits tied to carbon emissions takes hold, that could further raise the cost of using coal. There are 10 U.S. nuclear projects under consideration, but no company has applied yet for construction or operating licenses or decided to move ahead.

To nudge them along, the Energy Policy Act provides $1.6 billion of spending on research and infrastructure, tax credits of 1.8 cents per kilowatt-hour for eight years, protection against the risks of regulatory delay for six new plants, and $1.25 billion to fund a prototype for a new generation of nuclear plants. It also plans a pilot project to use nuclear power to produce hydrogen for cars that can burn it.

Realizing that waste disposal is a key financial issue, the Energy Department is also looking for ways to cut those costs. The administration continues to push the idea of a giant disposal site at Yucca Mountain in Nevada, and some preparations have been made there. But a coalition of environmentalists, Nevada residents, agencies and nuclear waste experts are still challenging the project. Nuclear power supporters say that new reprocessing technologies could reduce the size of the waste problem by reusing some parts of the spent fuel.

Another lure for companies looking at nuclear power: Companies that gambled on nuclear plants that no one wanted just five to seven years ago are making good profit on those plants now.

Take Constellation Energy Group, the parent of Baltimore Gas and Electric. Constellation took control of the Calvert Cliffs, Md., nuclear plant from BGE at a time when the value of the plant was thought to be a fraction of its book market value. That assessment was an important part of rate negotiations in 1999, and state officials and consumer groups balked at the chance to have a new assessment done in 2001, for fear that the nuclear plant would fail to get relicensed, be worth even less or require unforeseen repairs.

Today, power generation at Calvert Cliffs looks relatively cheap. After investing substantially in the plant, Constellation is running it much more efficiently than BGE did. With deregulation of prices, Constellation should earn more. The company's acquisition of two other nuclear plants also looks smart today.

Nationwide the story is similar. The 103 U.S. nuclear plants run at around 90.5 percent of capacity, up from 56.3 percent in 1979, according to the Nuclear Energy Institute. They account for 20 percent of the nation's electricity. (Their output has kept pace with growing U.S. demand. So has coal-fired electricity, while hydropower hasn't kept pace and oil is rarely used.)

But taking over an existing plant is better business than building one from scratch, many say.

That has been less of a problem in other countries. There are more than 30 nuclear plants under construction around the world. China, which has nine plants, might build as many as 30 more over the next 15 years.

Countries with existing nuclear plants have done little to pare them back. France gets three-quarters of its electricity from its 56 nuclear plants and emits much lower quantities of greenhouse gases than the United States. Even Sweden, which planned to shut down all of its reactors after Chernobyl, has shut down only one. Russia hasn't needed any new plants; its economy contracted after the Soviet Union collapsed and it has plentiful coal, oil and natural gas reserves.

The biggest costs of Chernobyl came in Ukraine, where the reactor was, and neighboring Belarus. Both have borne costs for treating illnesses, decontaminating the plant and surrounding towns and resettling people, in addition to losing industrial output. The International Atomic Energy Agency says that Belarus alone spent $13 billion dealing with the aftermath of Chernobyl from 1991 to 2003. The toll in lives, while hard to measure, has been big, too. The IAEA estimates the accident will have caused 4,000 deaths from radiation and radiation-induced cancers when all is said and done. Greenpeace puts the number closer to 200,000, and there are others in between.

Many nuclear defenders say that such a disaster couldn't happen again, blaming the Soviet reactor model and pointing to more recent improvements in reactor designs.

"People say reactors can't blow up, but Chernobyl blew up," said Victor Gilinsky, a consultant who served on the Nuclear Regulatory Commission from 1975 to 1984. "It was a real explosion." He said people were "too quick" to blame Soviet design and procedures. "There's a tremendous worldwide PR campaign" for new nuclear power plants, he said, "but I guess the acid test will be whether electric companies buy them or not. We can only wait and see."

Phony War On Gas (WP)

NO DOUBT IT makes everyone feel better when the president states his concern for Americans, who are now paying more than $3 a gallon for gasoline. Unfortunately, the measures President Bush chose to announce this week to combat high prices are either meaningless or possibly dangerous in the long run, even if they do offer a bit of temporary relief. For example, just talking publicly about "price gouging" can spook gasoline providers into slightly lowering prices. And maybe it's useful to inspire state officials to start looking harder for crooks, given that price gouging is defined at the state level, not by the federal government. But in the long term, such talk encourages the public to believe that evil price gougers are responsible for higher pump prices, when the real culprits are global economic growth, increased demand and Americans' own large cars.

The president's other tactics seem no less dubious. Stopping the filling of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve won't increase supply by much, and it sets a bad precedent: The reserve, after all, is meant for national emergencies, which this is not. Temporarily waiving fuel blend or environmental requirements could help with spot shortages in a few places but won't have much effect on the long-term price. Calling for the construction of more refineries is unnecessary. Although the president is right to state that "there hasn't been a new refinery built in 30 years," it is also true that the oil companies have expanded refineries every year since 1996 and are expected to continue doing so through 2025, according to Energy Department statistics.

The president has, of course, had plenty of opportunities over the past five years to shape a more rational energy policy, one that would have provided incentives to move away from oil and toward other energy sources. He could have lobbied harder to remove the oil industry tax benefits from the energy bill he signed. He could have insisted that Congress add more tax breaks for hybrid cars, as he now says he wishes it had done. He could lift the tariffs on Brazilian ethanol, which would help address some of the ethanol shortages across the country. He could have endorsed a tax on oil and coal, which of course would not lower the price of gasoline but would, again, begin to reduce demand while encouraging investment in new technologies.

And he could have used his statutory authority to raise automobile fuel economy standards or persuaded Congress to find other ways to improve mileage per gallon of U.S. vehicles. Again, if he were completely honest, the president would tell Americans that the main reason fuel prices are higher in this country is because demand is growing -- and one reason for growing demand is that people drive inefficient cars. They drive inefficient cars because public policy, long shaped by the president and by Congress, has made it advantageous to do so. Until that changes, little else will.

Just how big a deal is $3 gasoline? For those with six-figure household incomes it's an annoyance, but little more. Evian spring water goes about $6.80 a gallon when purchased in one-liter bottles.

For those in the tap-water brackets, the situation is a bit different. For many of the 39 million households making less than $30,000 a year, the difference between $2 gas and $3 gas is the difference between spending 10% of income on gas and 15%. In a word: Ouch!

It's hardly surprising, then, that politicians from President Bush on down to local legislators are popping up with quick-fix proposals. Bush's plan to suspend deposits into the National Petroleum Reserve and to push for more lenient pollution standards would have little impact. Just as useless are calls for a tax on oil company profits and the partisanfinger-pointing of many in Congress.

It's easy to chalk this up as the inevitable political posturing that follows economic stress. But it is also perhaps the most visible measure of the inability of the nation's leaders to speak the truth about long-term problems — Social Security, health care and runaway spending to name three others. Today's high oil prices are the result of a quarter-century of low prices coupled with robust worldwide growth and instability in the world's oil-producing regions. Any meaningful energy polices will take years to unfold.

If all the posturing seems inevitable, it is because the truth — that everyone will need to adjust to a new reality — is politically unpalatable. But people will learn that truth anyway, and perhaps what follows can give rise to leaders with a longer vision. Or, in a darker view, to a more ominous national division.

In a society with acute differences of wealth, it's not hard to see other economic developments becoming political flashpoints. The surging cost of health care — and its unavailability to many — could easily trigger a hostile class fight. In many areas, housing costs are creating a wealth divide between those who own and those who can no longer afford to buy in. And, in the long run, the unsustainable amounts of money the government spends on retirees could trigger more generational resentment than sound policy discussion could.

Demagogic politics go hand-in-hand with class division. And those divisions are bad and getting worse. According to a Federal Reserve study last month, the 56 million households that make up the bottom half of the economic ladder owns just 2.6% of the nation's wealth. That's down from 3.6% a decade ago. The top 10%, meanwhile, accounts for almost 70% of the wealth.

That will likely fuel contentious debates for many years to come. You can hear the shouts beginning when people pay $3 a gallon at the pump.

Snow Seen As Key To Improved Press Ties (WT)

By Joseph Curl And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

President Bush yesterday named Fox News host Tony Snow as his new White House press secretary, a move geared toward shoring up relations with the Washington press corps and breathing new life into a sixth-year administration that is dropping in the polls.

Mr. Snow, 50, a journalist, writer and political pundit who was the editorial page editor of The Washington Times during the administration of the president's father, took the job after insisting that he be not just a spokesman, but a participant in administration policy debates.

Yet Mr. Bush, in introducing Mr. Snow to reporters gathered in the White House briefing room yesterday, made clear the chain of command.

"My job is to make decisions, and his job is to help explain those decisions to the press corps and the American people," the president said, with a smiling Mr. Snow next to him.

Mr. Snow displayed his knack for ad-libbing -- a trait not often exhibited by his predecessor, Scott McClellan -- by speaking after the president without a prepared speech or notes.

"One of the things I want to do is just make it clear that ... one of the reasons I took the job is not only because I believe in the president, [but] because, believe it or not, I want to work with you," he said to mild laughter from the reporters who will badger him daily for information.

"These are times that are going to be very challenging. We've got a lot of big issues ahead, and we've got a lot of important things that all of us are going to be covering together. ... I want to thank you, Mr. President, for the honor, and thank all you guys for your forbearance."

Although Mr. Snow was widely speculated to be the choice for more than a week -- he is a longtime friend of new Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten -- his decision to take the post was delayed briefly by health concerns. He had his colon removed last year and underwent six months of chemotherapy. But he had a CT scan last week and has a clean bill of health.

Mr. Snow is well-regarded among reporters in Washington, having worked in newspapers, television and radio. He has criticized the Bush administration as a political commentator and nationally syndicated columnist, which prompted the president to offer a humorous read.

"For those of you who have read his columns and listened to his radio show, he sometimes has disagreed with me," Mr. Bush said. "I asked him about those comments, and he said, 'You should have heard what I said about the other guy.' "

In a jab at reporters, Mr. Bush joked, "Tony already knows most of you, and he's agreed to take the job anyway."

Democrats immediately deluged White House reporters with e-mails cataloging some of what Mr. Snow has said about the Bush administration. In one, Democrats cited a Nov. 11 column after Democratic electoral gains in which he wrote that "George Bush has become something of an embarrassment."

In a piece from September, Mr. Snow said, "No president has looked this impotent this long when it comes to defending presidential powers."

Other e-mails fired out to reporters by Democrats cited columns in which the new spokesman said "racism isn't that big a deal anymore" and called the theory of evolution "pure hypothesis."

Although the newly named spokesman did not explain his earlier criticisms yesterday, one former administration official said he expects Mr. Snow to lay down a marker the first day he takes the podium.

"I expect he will say that he will not talk about his opinion -- or prior opinion -- because he is now the president's spokesman. If he sticks to that, the issue will disappear fairly quickly," the former aide said.

Mr. Snow will start May 8, but said yesterday that he won't conduct his first briefing until later that week to give him time to learn the job.

"You know how to talk, but you don't know how to brief. You've got to learn this stuff," he told reporters yesterday morning as he walked through the briefing room to introduce himself. He apologized to several reporters whose phone calls and e-mails he had not returned as he pondered whether to take the job. Mr. Snow demurred when asked how he will be different from Mr. McClellan.

"Just watch and see. I hate to be coy about it, but I'm going to be coy," he said.

"You're not coming here to drink the Kool-Aid; you're coming here to serve the president," he said.

White House Hopes Snow Will Aid Media Ties (AP-Y2)

By Jennifer Loven

AP2, April 26, 2006

President Bush gave his presidency a facelift Wednesday, tapping a smooth-talking, telegenic conservative commentator as the new White House press secretary.

The appointment of Fox News pundit Tony Snow as Bush's third chief spokesman was intended in part to help improve the White House's frayed relationship with the press corps. Bush paired the announcement of his choice with some friendly jabs at reporters, and a serving of respect for their craft.

"Tony already knows most of you, and he's agreed to take the job anyway," the president said, Snow laughing at his side in the briefing room where he will start holding court in about two weeks. "He understands like I understand that the press is vital to our democracy."

Snow, a 50-year-old Ohio native, plans to take over from current press secretary Scott McClellan the week of May 8. He will hold off conducting the daily press briefings for several days while the two overlap.

The choice of Snow was also part of a White House effort — under the leadership of new chief of staff Joshua Bolten and with Bush at his lowest-ever approval ratings — to reach out to conservatives who made up the base of support for Bush's two presidential victories but have been disaffected by government spending and other issues.

Democrats, though, seized on remarks and writings Snow has produced in nearly 25 years in the media that have been critical of Bush, and often provocative. Snow held several print journalism positions, mostly working for newspaper opinion pages, and lately has been the host of the "Tony Snow Show" on Fox News Radio and "Weekend Live with Tony Snow" on the Fox News Channel.

Though usually aggressively supportive of the president as a GOP pundit, Snow has also shown a confrontational side. In a syndicated column, for instance, Snow has called the president "something of an embarrassment," a leader who has "lost control of the federal budget," the architect of a "listless domestic policy" and a man who has "a habit of singing from the political correctness hymnal."

The Democratic National Committee said Snow's appointment shows "truth still snowed in" in the Bush administration.

The White House — led by Bush — said Snow's candor and colorful talk will be an asset, not a liability.

"I asked him about those comments, and he said, `You should have heard what I said about the other guy,'" the president said. "I like his perspective, I like the perspective he brings to this job, and I think you're going to like it, too."

Snow, who took a hiatus from the media in the late 1990s to work in the White House under Bush's father as a speechwriting director and spokesman for regional issues, spoke only briefly. Neither he nor Bush took questions, though he later told The Associated Press he hasn't yet determined what changes would make the White House press operation work better. "I'm still trying to figure it out," he said.

Snow had been openly interested in acquiring a role in developing White House policy — not just talking about it. But Wednesday, he told Fox News Channel, his soon-to-be ex-employer, that "I'm just going to have to wait and see" whether that will come to pass.

Earlier, to reporters in the briefing room, Snow said: "Believe it or not, I want to work with you. ... We've got a lot of big issues ahead and we've got a lot of important things that all of us are going to be covering together."

Snow had delayed a decision about taking the job to consult with his family — he and his wife have three young children — and his doctors — he had his colon removed last year and underwent six months of chemotherapy after being diagnosed with cancer. But his detailed on-air deliberations over recent days raised eyebrows among White House staff who are normally tightlipped and loath to run afoul of Bush's dislike for any public airing of internal thinking.

Bush seemed unaffected. He concluded his introduction of Snow by calling him "buddy."

Bush Selects Outspoken Outsider To Serve As New Spokesman (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

Knight Ridder, April 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush reached outside his inner circle Wednesday for the first time in his staff shakeup, naming a new White House spokesman who recently called the president "something of an embarrassment."

The selection of Tony Snow, a conservative Fox News commentator, broke Bush's pattern of filling top jobs with trusted loyalists. As the public face of the administration, Snow will take a leading role in White House efforts to reverse Bush's slide in the polls.

The job will give Snow a chance to put into practice his advice that Bush should be much more aggressive in confronting his critics. His appointment pleased Republicans who share that view, but skeptics questioned Snow's ability to influence an organization known for buttoned-down discipline and devotion to the president.

Bush said he was well aware of Snow's past criticism and welcomed his willingness to speak out.

"He's not afraid to express his own opinions," he said in introducing Snow to reporters at the White House. "He sometimes has disagreed with me. I asked him about those comments, and he said, `You should have heard what I said about the other guy.'"

Snow, 50, acknowledged that he'd have to show more deference to the president in his new job, but he said he would continue to make his views known in internal policy debates.

"They want people to express their opinions. You're not coming here to drink the Kool-Aid. You're coming here to serve the president," he said.

Snow's genial personality masks a fighter's instinct. He's repeatedly chided Bush for straying from conservative orthodoxy. His criticism of Bush, delivered in the tone of a friend, is mild compared with his disdain for Democrats.

"A party that projects confidence and good cheer will thrash a Chicken Little party any day," he wrote in a column last November that urged Bush to "stop cowering under the bed." Snow said Bush had become an embarrassment by losing his "swagger factor."

Snow will take on one of the toughest jobs in Washington when Bush's popularity is at the lowest point of his presidency. Paul Levinson, chairman of the department of communication and media studies at Fordham University in New York, said Snow's ability to influence public opinion is limited by the facts he has to deal with.

"You can only spin so much. In the end, people see the reality behind the presentation," Levinson said. "It doesn't matter what a press secretary says if you're paying $3.50 at the (gasoline) pump."

Snow, who won't take over from current White House spokesman Scott McClellan until early next month, survived a cancer scare last year that resulted in the removal of his colon. His doctors have declared him cancer free.

He comes to the White House with extensive journalistic experience as a conservative editorialist for newspapers and Fox News, which sets him apart from other recent presidential press secretaries. Having earned a national reputation on his own may free him to speak up in ways beyond that of McClellan, who owed his career to Bush.

Snow is the first working journalist to take the job since Ron Nessen left NBC to work for President Gerald Ford in 1974. Nessen replaced another journalist, Jerald terHorst, who resigned after a month to protest Ford's decision to pardon former President Richard Nixon.

A colorful personality, Snow is also an avid musician. He plays the flute, saxophone and guitar for Beats Workin', a rock band that specializes in songs from the `60s, `70s and `80s.

Some of Snow's associates at Fox wondered whether he'd be able to maintain his independent streak in his new job.

"You can go in there with the idea that you're going to be an aggressive and effective advocate of the policies of the president of the United States, or you can go in there with the attitude that you want to be the honest broker between the news media and the White House," Fox colleague Brit Hume said. "It's a good question as to whether this will work."

Bush Hires A Loyal Critic As Spokesman (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

WASHINGTON, April 26 — In formally naming the Fox News commentator Tony Snow to be his press secretary on Wednesday, President Bush completed a decade-long transformation of the role of the presidential spokesman from behind-the-scenes functionary to daily on-camera personality.

Mr. Snow is something the White House briefing room has not yet had at the lectern: a star of the opinionated cable news era. But he is also something Mr. Bush has never had: a free-wheeling outsider in a very public position, and one with a history of sharing critical opinions of the president.

While making the much anticipated announcement that Mr. Snow would be his spokesman, Mr. Bush acknowledged that "he sometimes has disagreed with me," a reference to recent columns Mr. Snow has written calling Mr. Bush's domestic policy "lackluster" and the president "something of an embarrassment" to his conservative backers.

"I asked him about those comments," Mr. Bush said in the White House briefing room, "and he said, 'You should have heard what I said about the other guy.' "

Even as Democratic groups sent out e-mail messages highlighting some of Mr. Snow's harsher analyses of the president, they said it should not mask his loyalty to his party and his new boss.

The groups were also quick to note Mr. Snow's connection to the Fox News Channel, which is where administration officials tend to show up for interviews in times of trouble, as Vice President Dick Cheney did after he accidentally shot a hunting partner last winter.

Mr. Snow's career change also might not be what Fox News executives want in terms of their public relations defense against criticism that their network is philosophically sympathetic to Mr. Bush. As Karen Finney, the Democratic National Committee spokeswoman, put it Wednesday, "To our mind he is just moving from one part of the conservative infrastructure to another."

Fox executives have dismissed such statements as partisan sniping at the network's conservative opinion makers — Mr. Snow among them — who operate separately from its news division.

But allies of the president said Mr. Snow's criticism and his Fox News commentator stripes provided Mr. Bush with the total package he needed as the administration's public face. Mr. Bush's new chief of staff, Joshua B. Bolten, hired Mr. Snow as part of the White House shake-up.

"Yeah, he's a conservative commentator journalist; that makes sense if he's reflecting a conservative president," said Mark McKinnon, the president's campaign media consultant.

But, citing Mr. Snow's critical columns, Mr. McKinnon said: "Tony has huge street cred. It gives him credibility, and that's the most important thing for a press secretary."

Mr. Snow's appointment has been described by Democrats and Republicans as an acknowledgment by the White House that it needs, among other things, a whole new approach to dealing with the national press corps after years of trying to keep it at a distance.

As White House press secretary, Scott McClellan, Mr. Snow's predecessor, stuck to a careful script, a style that the White House initially wanted and that seemed to serve its ends through much of a war and a winning re-election campaign.

The president and Mr. Snow seemed to acknowledge Wednesday that with the president's opinion ratings at all-time lows, and with Democrats daily questioning his credibility, the White House could use, if not a new message, at least a new messenger with a bolder, flashier style.

White House officials also said Mr. Snow had been given leeway to be looser and to make more of a show of the daily news briefings, while trying to make nice to a press corps that has grown increasingly assertive as Mr. Bush's political strength has ebbed.

"He understands like I understand that the press is vital to our democracy," said Mr. Bush, who did not, however, take questions. "He's going to work hard to provide you with timely information about my philosophy, my priorities, and the actions we're taking to implement our agenda."

Mr. Snow toured the White House briefing room after the announcement, and told reporters that he looked forward to sitting down with them "to figure out what you think we can do better."

"One of the reasons I took the job," he told them, "is not only because I believe in the president, but because, believe it or not, I want to work with you."

If anything, Mr. Snow embraced his recent criticism of the White House, which has boiled down to the idea that Mr. Bush is a great leader who is not living up to his potential, as a net positive.

"You're not coming in here to drink the Kool-Aid; you're coming here to serve the president," Mr. Snow said. "At this particular juncture, I think what you want is as much honest counsel as you can get."

Kenneth M. Duberstein, who served as chief of staff in the Reagan White House, said he believed that Mr. Snow would keep an outsider perspective that the president could use these days.

"He may bring a new sense of how things stand on the ground outside the grounds at the White House," Mr. Duberstein said, "And that's an important addition."

But Democrats and Republicans agreed that far more important than how the White House communicated was what it said as the president tried to salvage his second term agenda.

Snow Pick May Signal Less Insular White House (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

President Bush's decision to hire conservative commentator Tony Snow as his chief spokesman reflects a consensus among the president and his top advisers that his White House operation has been too insular and needs to be more aggressive in engaging with the news media and other Washington constituencies, according to Bush aides and outside advisers.

Snow, who in his roles as a pundit on Fox News and elsewhere has rapped Bush on several occasions, joined the White House only after extracting a promise that he would become an adviser to the president on day-to-day strategy. If Bush and his team follow through on that commitment, the former columnist will be the first outsider to become part of Bush's revamped inner circle.

"We want fresh thinking, to charge the batteries, and passionate participation," said Dan Bartlett, a top Bush adviser. "There is a lot of value added in Tony coming on board and helping us internally with his own views and ideas. It fits into the mold."

Bush aides said at least one more well-known Republican will join the White House as early as next week as part of a shake-up also aimed at improving the president's lower-than-ever approval ratings and limiting GOP losses in congressional elections this fall.

The emerging team -- which includes Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten, budget chief Rob Portman and now Snow -- has the task of salvaging Bush's floundering second-term agenda and repairing relations with Congress, the media and an increasingly skeptical public. But it is unclear whether Bush, who has resisted change and outside advice in the past, will adjust his style and policies enough to satisfy Republicans on Capitol Hill who have said his White House operation needs a major overhaul.

White House aides are hoping Bush will get what they call the "Bolten bounce" in light of recent political progress in Iraq, his new plan to hold down gasoline prices and progress on an overhaul of immigration laws. Even the Snow news, however, served as a metaphor for the long roster of Bush's troubles: A few hours after the president hoped to make a splash by announcing the new hire, sources close to Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove leaked word that Rove would testify again in the CIA leak case.

White House aides said there is now broad agreement that the first-term strategy of largely ignoring the mainstream Washington media was a mistake. At the beginning, the Bush White House pioneered a strategy of circumventing Washington and communicating directly with what it considered more friendly regional and local media outlets and niche publications that served as a pipeline to supporters. The strategy worked well for a long while, but aides said it eventually undercut their credibility with reporters and impeded the administration's ability to receive fair treatment from the media when Bush's popularity began to fade.

Mark McKinnon, a Bush political adviser, predicted that Snow's long experience in Washington would give him more credibility with the White House press corps.

A variety of Bush advisers suggested that the president is not interested in altering his major decisions or philosophy, but that he recognizes he needs to do a better job communicating in Washington and beyond.

"The president's message and vision are firmly in place and are not going to change," McKinnon said. "But it still helps to have a new messenger. It helps to wipe the slate clean."

Snow, 50, worked most recently as a commentator for Fox News and as host of his own radio talk show. He was a director of speechwriting for President George H.W. Bush and has worked as a USA Today columnist, editorial page editor of the Washington Times, deputy editorial page editor of the Detroit News and frequent substitute for radio host Rush Limbaugh.

Snow is an outspoken Republican, but he has not hesitated to pound Bush in writing and on air for his handling of the budget, as well as immigration and other domestic policies. He even poked fun at Bush's speaking style, saying in 2000 that he sometimes sounds like "a soul tortured with Tourette's."

Bush said Snow's selection is proof that he is open to dissenting opinions. "For those of you who have read his columns and listened to his radio show, he sometimes has disagreed with me," Bush said. "I asked him about those comments, and he said, 'You should have heard what I said about the other guy.' " Snow's first assignment will be to improve relations with the media, which have deteriorated over the past five years during disputes over access to Bush and senior officials and the accuracy of information released from the White House. Many reporters viewed outgoing White House press secretary Scott McClellan as out of the loop on many of the big policy and political debates.

"I know there is a perception that we disdain the media as a whole," Bartlett said. "I do not believe that. There have been some issues that strained the relationship, particularly when it comes at a time of war." He said the Snow pick was part of an effort to "improve our relationship with the press."

Snow will begin working at the White House on Monday and will hold his first on-air news conference by the end of next week or the following Monday. Bush hopes Snow can do for media relations what he anticipates Portman will do for congressional relations. Portman, a former GOP House leader who has close ties to many senior members, will be responsible for not only overseeing the budget but also providing insight into winning over lawmakers and better navigating Congress.

"Tony Snow should provide a smooth presence at the podium," said Martha Joynt Kumar, a Towson University professor who studies presidential communication. "But the problems that presidents have are political problems and policy problems, not press problems. But it is often the press problems that get addressed."

Analysis: Bush's New Effort, Old Problems (AP)

By Ron Fournier

The Associated Press, April 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - A new press secretary for the White House. A new leader for Iraq. A new ray of hope for immigration overhaul. New promises to curb gasoline prices.

Same old problems for President Bush.

He's getting credit for trying to save his ailing presidency. But is it beyond the point of political recovery?

"It takes a lot more than one day of good news or two days of good news to turn polls around," says Charles Franklin, political science professor at the University of Wisconsin-Madison. "It doesn't take much bad news to keep the polls down. You keeping getting hit."

And that is the rub for Bush. For every good piece of news that comes his way or is generated by his actions, there is a fresh reminder of how tough it will be to rehabilitate his presidency.

Naming conservative commentator Tony Snow as White House press secretary puts a fresh face on the administration and may help mend relations with the Washington press corps. But the move underscores how far Bush has fallen in the eyes of his allies - conservative leaders and voters who helped elect him in 2000 and re-elect him in 2004.

As a GOP pundit, Snow called the president "something of an embarrassment," a leader who has "lost control of the federal budget," the architect of a "listless domestic policy."

With friends like that, Bush hardly needs the Democrats to carp about him.

On Iraq, his signature issue, Bush had reason to crow when the nation's parliament elected a top national leadership, ending months of political deadlock. It was a step, if a small one, toward Bush's goal of easing U.S. troops out of Iraq as the nation matures politically.

But the killing continues in Iraq, and al-Qaida's Abu Musab al-Zarqawi released a video Tuesday that dismissed the new Iraqi government as an American "stooge" and a "poisoned dagger" in the heart of the Muslim world.

He warned of more attacks to come.

Polls suggest the war in Iraq is the biggest drag on Bush's approval ratings, undermining voters' views of his credibility, competence and leadership skills - all traits that were key to his 2004 re-election campaign against Democrat John Kerry.

Republican strategist Rich Galen said he thinks Bush may be turning his presidency around by working harder to connect with voters and lawmakers.

"They got into a mind-set that they were so right on Iraq - and I agree with them on Iraq, by the way - that they didn't have to explain themselves," Galen said.

Soaring gasoline prices have emerged as another political problem for Bush and his party. He moved to show voters he understood their plight, announcing several initiatives Tuesday aimed at curbing the high price of filling up.

But energy is another issue that is substantially out of the president's control. Bush conceded his plan would do little to curb costs this summer.

He seemed to make headway Tuesday on another tough issue by convening a bipartisan meeting on immigration. After the president urged senators to approve stalled legislation giving illegal immigrants a path toward citizenship, Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy compared Bush's role to President Lyndon Johnson stepping into the 1964 stalemate over civil rights legislation.

But immigration legislation is fraught with political problems, and an endorsement from Kennedy is the last thing Bush needs to keep hard-line conservatives in line. Many conservatives already oppose what they say is a promise of amnesty in the Senate bill backed by Bush and Kennedy.

Bush cannot rebound politically without regaining the faith of conservative voters whose support has waned in recent months.

If conservatives are too frustrated to vote on Election Day, Republicans could lose control of Congress, and the final two years of Bush's presidency could be filled with Democratic-led investigations.

Bush and his chief strategist, Karl Rove, believe the key to reviving the conservative voting bloc is to pass a budget with serious spending restraints, give voice to cultural issues such as abortion and stem cell research and push to make his tax cuts permanent. That is their midterm playbook.

Bush promised this week to veto a Senate spending bill unless the price tag was cut. That should be welcome news to conservative voters who bristle at runaway government spending in GOP-controlled Washington.

Still, so much is out of Bush's control - Iraq, gas prices and even Rove.

Just as Snow put a new face on the presidency, word came that Bush's adviser would testify for a fifth time before a grand jury investigating the leak of a CIA officer's identity.

Nobody - not even Bush - knows how much more political damage this case could produce.

"I've been hoping for a year that he had hit bottom and was moving up," Galen said. "But the bottom kept moving."

Bush's Fortune May Rest With GOP Congress (AP-Y2)

By Tom Raum

AP2, April 26, 2006

President Bush is not on the ballot in November, but he might as well be. Republican losses could make an already difficult situation in Congress almost untenable for him.

If his party loses control of one, or both chambers of Congress, the next two years could be a political nightmare for Bush and his GOP allies on Capitol Hill.

With poll numbers at the lowest of his presidency, Bush has had trouble enough winning support for his priorities in his second term even with a Republican-led Congress. That helped lead to a recent reshuffling of the White House staff.

A Democratic House or Senate and presidential stubbornness could spell legislative gridlock.

Democratic control of either chamber could rearrange priorities. Bush's programs and spending requests would come under increased scrutiny. Congress could even take tentative steps toward bringing troops home from Iraq or reducing funds.

Democratic control of committees in either chamber could lead to investigative hearings on Iraq, awarding of government contracts, the role of lobbyists, fraud and abuse, Pentagon divisions, any number of activities.

"You name the issue. There would be a lot of oversight hearings," said James Thurber, director of the American University Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies. "He will be a true lame duck."

History suggests the party holding the White House will loose congressional seats this year, even without Bush's basement poll ratings. Strategists in both parties are keenly aware of this trend.

The recent surge in gasoline prices just adds to the GOP's midterm woes.

Thus Democrats are portraying the November elections as a referendum on Bush, while Republicans are insisting it's a series of state and local races, each with different issues.

In a recent poll by the Pew Research Center, some 56 percent of voters said the issue of party control would be a factor in their vote in the midterm congressional elections. "More independents, in particular, say partisan control will be a factor," said Carroll Doherty, Pew's associate director.

Two recent two-term presidents — Reagan and Clinton — lost party control of one or both chambers.

Under Reagan, the Republican Senate went Democratic in 1986. Soon his presidency became engulfed in the Iran-Contra arms and money affair.

After two years of Democratic control, Clinton saw both chambers go Republican in 1994 and remain there for the remaining six years of his term.

Energized by their 1994 victories, Republican congressional leaders blocked an array of presidential spending proposals, leading to impasse and the actual shutdown of many government services.

Both Reagan and Clinton found ways to cope. Reagan shook up his staff, reached out to Congress and left office with his legacy mostly repaired.

Clinton successfully managed to blame the government shutdown on Republicans, survived impeachment by the House in a Senate trial, co-opted once-GOP issues like welfare overhaul and saw his approval ratings surge.

Bush starts further back in terms of popularity. And the Iraq war has become a drag on all Republican candidates. Bush seems less able to correct his listing presidency or rebound from a loss of the House or Senate as either Reagan or Clinton, analysts in both parties suggest.

Republicans hold 231 of the 435 House seats. Democrats have 201. There is one independent and two vacancies. In the Senate, Republicans have 55 seats to 44 for Democrats. There is one independent.

Ed Rogers, a GOP consultant, recognizes a GOP vulnerability this year. But he said Democrats "would have to draw an inside straight" to win back the Senate "when you look at it race by race." House races, meanwhile, are usually settled on local issues, although sometimes a national economic downturn can have an impact, Rogers said.

"The national election could become so corrosive that it suppresses turnout. But usually what suppresses turnout is a bad economy," Rogers said. "And the economy is the Republican safety net here."

Still, with gasoline prices recently rising to over $3 a gallon in some areas, it may be only a matter of time before soaring energy costs drag down other well-performing parts of the economy. And the summer driving season has yet to begin.

Democrats have seized on this to mount a new attack on Republican rule.

"It's very clear that it's America's number one issue today," said Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada.

Departing White House spokesman Scott McClellan countered Wednesday that, "there's a lot of good economic news out there. But high energy prices and rising health care costs do put a strain on family budgets." McClellan noted there remained some 1,000 days in the Bush presidency and "we are getting things done."

Bush on Tuesday tackled rising gasoline prices himself, suspending environmental rules for gas additives, ordering an investigation into whether price gouging is taking place and temporarily stopping government purchases of crude for the nation's emergency reserve.

His political reserve, meanwhile, is almost empty, even for many Republicans unhappy about his strained dealings with Congress, suggested Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University.

Baker said that, while a divided Congress may not be good for Bush, "there is some research that indicates that a divided government works. And oddly enough, sometimes it can work even better than a unified government."

Just don't expect Bush or his GOP allies to agree.

New Bush Spokesman Not Blind To Boss' Flaws (AP-Y2)

Tony Snow hasn't even started his new job as White House press secretary and already he is learning a lot — about himself. He says he's been called "a BushBot, a puppet, a force of evil in the modern world, a White House mouthpiece-toady-stenographer." And more.

But the good-natured columnist and Fox News commentator — named Wednesday as Bush's new spokesman — can give as good as he gets. Although a strong supporter of President Bush, Snow has used his column to label the president "something of an embarrassment," cast his domestic policy as "listless" and compare him to "the boy who can't say no" when it comes to federal spending.

The 50-year-old conservative commentator has done an even tougher Snow job on Democrats.

He's dismissed them as "reduced to a state of unshakable hysteria" and faulted their "righteous ignorance." He's labeled Democratic leaders like Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid "wheezy prophets of the Defeatocrat Party."

He also has been a strong defender of Bush on many an occasion, applauding his "brilliant" foreign policy, his stick-to-his-guns persistence in Iraq, his "delicious disdain for the Beltway culture," his "visionary" Social Security plan.

"On the seminal issues of national security and global destiny, he positively dwarfs the political opposition," he has written of Bush.

To put it mildly, Snow does not come from the cautious culture of some press secretaries of the past — the ones who make an art form of saying as little as possible.

All of that gives Republicans hope that Snow's fresh voice — and star quality as a polished media figure — will help reinvigorate the beleaguered White House and jolt it out of a defensive crouch.

"Tony's sympathetic to the president, obviously, in terms of policy and philosophy, but he's not a Bush insider and I think that could be healthy," said William Kristol, who worked with Snow in the first Bush administration and was a regular panelist on Snow's TV show on Fox News. He describes Snow as "a happy-go-lucky guy" with a relaxed attitude that could do the tightly wound Bush team good.

Snow wrote in a February column that over time, even the best presidential aides burn out "or worse, lose their capacity to tell the boss, 'Sir, that idea stinks.'"

In an Associated Press interview Wednesday, he rejected the notion that his past criticism of the president could be an impediment as he becomes the public face of the Bush administration. He said it would be a mistake for people to "waste their time on old columns," diverting attention from the real issues.

Former White House press secretary Marlin Fitzwater, who worked with Snow in the first Bush administration, said the commentator "has a good personality for bringing together contentious people and contentious issues," and the independent stature to help him prod the White House staff toward better press relations.

Snow, who served the first President Bush as a speechwriting director and in media affairs, also has shown a healthy perspective on White House service. In a 2001 column, he offered some advice to members of the new administration, including a reminder to keep their humility in check because "you are just a visitor to the history factory" that is the White House.

"People will kiss up to you in ways you cannot imagine," he wrote. "In 1991, while I was a minor grandee in that same White House, I received more than 400 Christmas and holiday cards at the office. The following year, following Mr. Bush's defeat, I received 25."

Snow's biography reflects both his standing as a longtime Washington insider and more eclectic elements of his background. He hosted "Fox News Sunday" from 1996 to 2003 and held a string of print journalism positions earlier in his career.

He also has served as an advocate for the mentally ill, taught school in Kenya and Cincinnati and is an avid musician, playing guitars, saxophone and flute. He plays in what he calls "an old-farts rock 'n' roll band" called Beats Workin', attended a rock band "fantasy camp" in New York three years ago, and admits he's a SportsCenter junkie.

Fitzwater said Snow's main concerns about the job focused on health and family,

Snow, who had his colon removed last year after being diagnosed with cancer, delayed a decision on taking the job while he consulted with his doctors and had a CAT scan. Snow and his wife, Jill have three children, 9, 10 and 13.

He said Wednesday he hopes to operate as efficiently as possible and "get as much time off as I can," working from home on the weekends.

Why give up a comfortable job with a much bigger salary for such a pressure-cooker job?

Said Fitzwater: "I always tell people you may lose your health, your wealth and your family but it'll still be the greatest job you'll ever have in your life."

Guffaws About A Fox Guarding The White House (LAT)

By Matea Gold

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0026990

NEW YORK — The selection of Fox News host Tony Snow on Wednesday as the next White House press secretary reignited a debate about the network's political leanings.

The liberal blogosphere chortled about the choice. "Snow, like everybody else on the payroll at Fox, is already a White House spokesman," the blog Reclusive Leftist read, one of many liberal sites that mocked the move. "Is there really a need to give him an office in the West Wing and pay him a government salary?"

The Democratic National Committee took a swipe at the cable network as well, with spokeswoman Karen Finney calling Snow's hiring "an interdepartmental move from one part of the conservative infrastructure to another."

Fox News anchors responded to the chatter about the White House tapping one of the network's own.

"The joke has been all along, we've been hearing it all day on the radio and stuff, 'Tony's not really changing jobs; he's just changing buildings,' " Shepard Smith said on-air Wednesday afternoon. "The conspiracy theories abound. They're baseless, of course. I promise."

In the decade since Fox News Channel launched and then overtook CNN as the top-rated rated cable news network, it has contended with criticism that it leans to the right, despite its "fair and balanced" slogan.

Fox News vigorously rejects that notion, saying that its format mirrors that of many newspapers, which provide news stories as well as editorials. Though many of its best-known personalities such as Sean Hannity and Brit Hume — to whom Snow gave his only television interview Wednesday — offer outspoken conservative views, straight news programming dominates much of the network's daytime schedule.

Fox has taken pains to shield its news coverage from charges of bias. In 2000, network officials reprimanded Snow, then a political analyst and host of "Fox News Sunday," for speaking to a GOP youth group during the Republican National Convention in Philadelphia.

But Snow's White House appointment reinforces for some the perception that Fox News is the go-to network for the administration, media observers said.

"Much of the public will say, 'Suspicions confirmed,' " said Robert Zelnick, chairman of Boston University's journalism department, adding that such sentiments understandably ruffle the network. "The essence of journalism is independence and not hewing to any particular line."

Fox News said in a statement, "We're proud of the work Tony did for Fox as a commentator, and we wish him all the best in his second stint at the White House." Snow previously was a speechwriter to President George H.W. Bush.

Network officials declined to comment further.

Snow's hiring comes as the cable channel, whose ratings overwhelmingly beat CNN and MSNBC, has sought to burnish its news credentials. For example, Smith recently spent two days in Jerusalem covering the Israeli elections, and anchor Bill Hemmer reported from Iraq for a week in March.

But it hasn't helped matters that Vice President Dick Cheney — who in February gave Hume an exclusive interview about his accidental shooting of a hunting companion — has indicated that Fox News is his favorite news outlet, a fact that he joked about at a recent Radio and Television Correspondents Assn. dinner.

Snow's selection to replace Scott McClellan only gives critics more fodder.

Weekly Standard editor and network analyst Bill Kristol acknowledged as much, joking to Smith that "Fox News will just take over the Bush White House now," and quipping that "On the Record's" Greta Van Susteren could be named White House counsel.

"This is what the world is going be saying, though," Smith replied. "You know, we're in bed with the White House, whatever."

Kristol said: "That will end quickly enough — the moment we all criticize the White House and Tony's there defending it."

New Bush Hire Has An Outspoken Past (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten And Joel Havemann, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

Some say Tony Snow's bluntness in matters such as race may be a risk as press secretary.

WASHINGTON — Three months ago, when Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) told a mostly black audience that Republicans were running the U.S. House like a "plantation," conservatives accused her of racial divisiveness. But no one put it quite like Tony Snow, the man President Bush has chosen to be his new press secretary. "Had she proceeded to distribute fried chicken and watermelon," Snow wrote, "she would have achieved perfect condescension."

It was vintage Snow: turning a routine shot at a liberal politician into a dance on thin ice. Linking fried chicken and watermelon to African Americans is something few public figures would dare to do no matter what point they were making.

His voice is quiet and authoritative. Even critics concede he has a talent for articulating policy issues and political philosophy. What has set Snow apart, however, is his penchant for making his points by walking close to the line in areas where others play it safe, including race.

In 1991, Snow, then a speechwriter for President George H.W. Bush, defended some ideas of Louisiana gubernatorial candidate David Duke at a time when Republicans were trying to distance themselves from the former Ku Klux Klan leader. Snow suggested that Duke was espousing some good conservative ideals, including family values and opposition to welfare dependency.

In 2001, Snow wrote a column defending another former klansman, Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.), for his use of a racial epithet.

As a conservative commentator, Snow's job was to be provocative and fire up the faithful. Sometimes that led him to level blunt criticism of Bush, whose policy agenda he recently derided as "listless." Snow also said his future boss appeared "impotent" in defending his presidential powers.

But how will Snow adapt those sharp-tongued skills to his new role at the White House, where his predecessor, Scott McClellan, seemed to make it his goal to appear as sedate and non-provocative as possible? Bush and his aides on Wednesday tried to put a positive spin on Snow's bluntness, offering his past words as evidence that the White House was not as averse to dissent, as critics had alleged.

"For those of you who have read his columns and listened to his radio show, he sometimes has disagreed with me," Bush said as he introduced Snow to a packed West Wing press room. "I asked him about those comments, and he said, 'You should have heard what I said about the other guy.' "

Asked if the White House had reviewed Snow's record of commentary as part of the vetting process, McClellan said: "He has strong views. That's a good thing."

For his part, Snow said he intended to continue expressing strong views.

"Look, they want people to express their opinions," he said. "You're not coming here to drink the Kool Aid, you're coming here to serve the president. And at this particular juncture, I think what you want is as much honest counsel as you can get. So when I agree, I agree, and when I disagree, I disagree. But on any opinion his vote's the tie-breaker."

Snow deflected a question about his potential differences with Bush on Iraq and other issues. "The president's the guy who runs the place," he said. "So I'll speak for him and at some other point I'll speak for myself."

As early as Tuesday night, when rumors began circulating about Snow's appointment, Democrats began circulating e-mails detailing his history of controversial statements.

David Brock, head of the watchdog group Media Matters, said that Snow's record underscored a risk for the White House in picking a celebrity for a post that had traditionally been filled by a loyal foot soldier.

"It's all fair game because it's all on the record," Brock said. "But it makes him something of a target…. And it's counterproductive in terms of what the administration is trying to do here."

Snow's record of provocative treatment of racial subjects could become especially sensitive for GOP political strategists. They have worked to build alliances among African American voters and to offset the political damage from the government's faltering response to Hurricane Katrina, which affected blacks disproportionately.

Snow has a paper trail on that topic too. And his words do not exactly mesh with the past rhetoric of the president. Bush has spoken of the need to rebuild a "great American city." Snow, chastising Mayor C. Ray Nagin for his pledge to keep New Orleans a "chocolate" city, wrote this year that Nagin was "more an entertainment figure than a statesman, just as New Orleans now is more a theme park with a port than a city of consequence — although both aspire to greater things in years to come."

One of the most frequently cited quotes in Democratic e-mails Wednesday was a 1991 comment by Snow, quoted by syndicated columnist Clarence Page, explaining why many conservatives might support Duke.

"You can't write off Duke's voters as racists," Snow was quoted as saying. "Duke is talking about things people really care about: high taxes, crummy schools, crime-ridden streets, welfare dependency, equal opportunity. A lot of politicians aren't talking about these things."

Ten years after that, he wrote that Byrd had appeared on Fox News to apologize for using a term which Byrd said he had learned not as a racial epithet but as a reference to white racists.

"This is not an unusual term for people of his generation or region," Snow wrote. "Some of my relatives used it from time to time when I was a child, usually as an epithet to describe what we might now call 'racist white trash.' "

Snow contended at the time that Byrd's critics were ignoring a central tenet of the senator's argument: that racism was becoming a figment of the past.

Snow echoed that sentiment in a 2003 commentary on Fox News Sunday. "Racism isn't that big a deal anymore," he said. "No sensible person supports it. Nobody of importance preaches it. It's rapidly and thankfully becoming an ugly memory."

White House aides seemed unconcerned on Wednesday that race might become an issue for Snow. "An overall look at Tony's record on race shows someone who has a long record of reconciliation and acceptance," spokeswoman Erin Healy said in an e-mail.

And one of the Democrats' most prominent African American strategists, former Al Gore campaign manager Donna Brazile, defended Snow against suggestions that he had been insensitive on racial matters.

"The vast majority of Americans don't know how to talk about race without stepping on somebody's toes," she said. "But Tony's somebody who has been at my house, he's been part of the larger political family. He has strong ties to people of color."

Times staff writer Nick Timiraos and researcher Robin Cochran contributed to this report.

Bush Touts Spokesman's Media Savvy (USAT)

By David Jackson And Richard Benedetto

USA Today, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — In naming Tony Snow as his new press secretary Wednesday, President Bush lauded the radio talk show host for his experience in the media and government.

Media experience, however, means little if Snow doesn't get consistent access to Bush and other high-level administration officials, said Ron Nessen, the last presidential spokesman to jump into the job from the media.

“The key to being a good press secretary is getting the information firsthand and not having someone inside the White House have to tell it to you,” said Nessen, who went from NBC to the Ford administration in 1974.

Snow, 50, a Fox News Talk host, joins Bush as the president struggles to improve the lowest poll ratings of his tenure. Snow replaces Scott McClellan, who resigned as part of an administration shake-up that started last month when Joshua Bolten replaced Andy Card as White House chief of staff.

Nessen said there was an increasingly “hostile” relationship between the White House press corps and McClellan. They engaged in heated exchanges over such issues as Iraq and an investigation into the leak of the name of an undercover CIA officer.

Snow said that he has been promised sufficient access to Bush and that he'll express his views privately to the president. However, he said, Bush always has final say: “The president is the guy who runs the place.”

The chief speechwriter for the first President Bush, Snow is also a former newspaper editorial writer and has written for The Forum in USA TODAY. He hosted Fox News Sunday on TV from 1996 to 2003 before moving to his radio show.

Snow recently survived a bout with colon cancer and received a medical clearance to take on the time-consuming job of press secretary.

Snow's background gives him “good insight into what it is reporters need,” Nessen said.

DOJ_NMG_0026993

Bush said his “job is to make decisions” and Snow's “is to help explain those decisions to the press corps and the American people.”

Snow said he took the job because he believes in Bush, and “we've got a lot of big issues ahead.”

Taking a spin around the press room, Snow said he knows how “to talk” but needs to learn how “to brief.” He won't start doing White House briefings until next month.

Stephen Hess, author of Organizing the Presidency, said, “We've never had a journalist of opinion” as press secretary.

Some of Snow's published opinions have been critical of Bush, including a column after this year's State of the Union address in which Snow called Bush's domestic policy “listless.” In that same column, however, Snow also called Bush's foreign policy “brilliant.”

In November, Snow wrote that “the newly passive George Bush has become something of an embarrassment.”

Bush said Wednesday that he had asked Snow about some of his criticisms, “and he said, ‘You should have heard what I said about the other guy.' ”

Frank Donatelli, political director for President Reagan, said Snow's conservative credentials could help Bush with a wavering constituency. “The challenge for the administration is to soften the criticism from his Republican and conservative base,” Donatelli said.

He and other analysts said Snow's ideology is less important than his access to the president and ability to disseminate his message fully.

W. Dale Nelson, author of Who Speaks for the President?: The White House Press Secretary from Cleveland to Clinton, said Snow must be careful not to sound like a commentator when he conducts White House briefings.

“By picking Snow, even though he has criticized him, Bush knows that Snow was just doing his job,” Nelson said. “Now that's all different. … He's the president's man.”

Fox Commentator Named Bush's Press Secretary (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush appointed Fox News commentator Tony Snow as his press secretary Wednesday, signaling that in its final 1,000 days, his White House plans significant changes in the way it reaches the American people.

Before taking the job, Snow — who was a speechwriter in the George H.W. Bush administration — sought and was given "walk-in" privileges in the Oval Office and the chief of staff's office, according to a veteran Republican advisor who asked not to be named because his conversation with Snow was confidential. That would make Snow one of the few officials with unscheduled access to the president and Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten.

The arrangement could be helpful as Snow, 50, attempts to build trust with a White House press corps that had an adversarial relationship with his predecessor and as he tries to help Bush recover from low public approval ratings.

Bush presented Snow on Wednesday morning as his choice to replace Scott McClellan.

"My job is to make decisions," Bush said, "and his job is to help explain those decisions to the press corps and the American people…. He's going to work hard to provide you with timely information about my philosophy, my priorities and the actions we're taking to implement our agenda."

Snow's appointment was unusual for a White House that has prized loyalty and long-standing relationships with Bush. He has worked for Fox for the last decade, and has criticized Bush — calling him "impotent" and "something of an embarrassment" in recent commentary.

He also is the first outsider given a top position during the White House shake-up engineered by Bolten, who has been chief of staff for less than two weeks. But Snow's selection fits a historical pattern.

At low moments in their terms, other presidents have sought to bolster their credibility by hiring press secretaries seen less as administration loyalists than as independent operators with their own authority and stature.

Suggesting that Snow would present himself as the latter, Tom Rosenstiel — director of the Project for Excellence in Journalism, a nonprofit group that studies the media — said: "One thing we know is that Tony Snow has to eat lunch in this town again. He is going to serve the president, but not sacrifice his reputation while he's doing it."

Moments after Bush introduced him, Snow walked through the White House press briefing room, pledging to work with reporters — "to figure out what you think we can do better."

"It's clear they are bringing in someone to do better marketing," said David Gergen, a former White House communications aide for both Republican and Democratic presidents who now is a professor of public service at Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government. "Whether they are bringing in someone to bring more complete information to the public is very much an open question."

Snow, who is expected to take over in the next two or three weeks, will be Bush's third press secretary. McClellan succeeded Ari Fleischer in July 2003.

The new spokesman brings a "fresh perspective" because he did not serve during the administration's first five years, said Kenneth M. Duberstein, who took a senior position in the White House at a similarly challenging moment — as President Reagan sought to emerge from the Iran-Contra scandal in 1987.

But, Duberstein said, the question remains whether Snow can overcome the Bush administration's aversion to outsiders and get information from the White House that he will need to be an effective spokesman.

Most fundamentally, the appointment of a prominent media figure may indicate that the White House is focused on shaping the way Bush is portrayed in the mainstream media.

Many analysts agree that this White House has appeared less concerned than previous administrations about influencing newspapers and network television — placing greater emphasis on reaching its core conservative supporters through such outlets as talk radio and cable TV.

They said that the appointment of an accomplished TV personality reflected a White House conclusion that — with fewer than 40% of the voters approving of Bush's performance — it needs to win over a broader segment of the population through the traditional national news media.

"What they've done before is use their back-channel media to get their message out to their base supporters …. And when times were good and bills were passing and things were going well, there was less of a concern of dealing with the mainstream media overall," said a senior Republican congressional aide who was not authorized to speak publicly on the subject and requested anonymity. "Now it becomes critical that they apply a different strategy … on a daily basis, and they have chosen a guy who can do that."

Republicans inside and outside the administration said they believed Snow would approach the job with a more proactive agenda than did his predecessors, who often seemed to view the daily press briefings more as an exercise in damage control than as an opportunity to drive a strong political message. A senior White House official acknowledged that the administration was looking to rethink the way it communicated with the public.

"I think it's fair to say that there is no panic in the White House, but there is concern about the numbers and a real attempt to make these changes an opportunity to relaunch our public message," said the official, who was not authorized to speak on the record.

But others said Snow's selection could indicate more continuity than change in Bush's approach to the media.

Gergen, for instance, praised Snow as a "person of integrity," but noted that he came to the job as a conservative advocate. "Coming from Fox, it will send a good message to their base," Gergen said. "They are not going out and getting an Associated Press reporter. This is a commentator with a conservative point of view."

Indeed, several Republicans said the White House may hope one benefit of Snow's appointment will be to signal that Bush hears the complaints of conservatives who believe he has not done enough to restrain federal spending — a charge Snow often leveled against the administration.

It has been more than 30 years since a journalist served as the White House press secretary. Ron Nessen, who had worked for NBC News, was President Ford's spokesman.

Snow has largely made his living in the news business, but his experience has been as a commentator and editorial writer, not as a news reporter.

He launched the public affairs talk show "Fox News Sunday." For several years, he has hosted the news program "Weekend Live," along with "The Tony Snow Show," a daily talk show on Fox News Radio.

He grew up in Cincinnati, wrote editorials for the Greensboro (N.C.) Record and the Norfolk Virginian-Pilot, and for four years was editorial page editor of the Washington Times.

He has also, Bush said, taught in Kenya. His biography on the Fox News website said he taught physics and geography. He plays flute, saxophone and guitar, and is in a rock band called Beats Workin'.

"The only thing more embarrassing than my old columns is my old music recordings," Snow said during his walk through the briefing room.

Snow recently underwent surgery for colon cancer. He and his wife live in Virginia with their three children.

Times staff writers Matea Gold in New York and Peter Wallsten and Tom Hamburger in Washington contributed to this report.

Into The Lion's Den (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe And Holly Bailey

Newsweek, April 26, 2006

It was all smiles in the White House briefing room Wednesday as George Bush introduced his new press secretary, Fox News commentator Tony Snow, to an excitable press corps. But Snow knows this isn't a happy situation he's walking into, even though his predecessor Scott McClellan was beaming at the cameras as the president walked in. After all, Snow knows just what it's like to be in McClellan's position.

In 1991, Snow gave up his job as editor of The Washington Times editorial page to head up the first President Bush's troubled speechwriting operation. A year later, during Bush's re-election campaign, Snow was forced out. Looking back on the experience, three years later, Snow sounded rueful. When President Clinton hired former U.S. News editor Don Baer in a similar shake-up, Snow offered some insight into his own experience as a journalist turned White House staffer. "I've been in this movie," Snow told National Journal. "He's stepping out of a nice secure journalism job to run an embattled speechwriting shop at the White House." Snow offered some blunt advice to Baer. "Make sure you have plenty of high-ranking defenders," he told the magazine. "When things go bad at the White House, the first person they come looking for is the speechwriter. The policy is never bad."

While Snow isn't being hired as a speechwriter, he's walking back into the lion's den. The White House press operation has been under fire for months, particularly from congressional Republicans who say administration officials haven't been effective in talking about the war, the economy and other policy issues. As a key public face of the White House, McClellan felt the brunt of much of that criticism, as some GOP officials complained that the White House's strained relationship with reporters wasn't helpful in helping Bush regain much-needed momentum this second term. Others called for a complete shake-up of the entire press operation and communications staff.

On Wednesday, Snow's appointment, which had been rumored for days, got positive reviews by Republicans on the Hill, including from one senior GOP leadership aide who told NEWSWEEK it was "great news." "He'll give some good outside-the-box thinking for the White House," said the Republican aide, who declined to be quoted by name so as not to upset other administration officials. "He also may be a bull in a china shop. It will be fun to watch him at the podium."

In some respects, Snow's pick was a no-brainer for an administration. The Fox News pundit has already been a go-to guy for administration officials to get their message out. Vice President Dick Cheney has been a frequent guest on Snow's radio show, most recently in March when he phoned in a defense of the administration's handling of national-security issues and the war. When congressional Republicans were in open revolt over the Dubai Ports World deal, Karl Rove called into Snow's program to dial back Bush's threat to veto legislation that would block the deal.

Yet Democrats offered a curious reaction to Snow's appointment. On one hand, some Democrats billed the Fox News analyst as someone who had already been an unofficial messenger of White House talking points. "Truth Still Snowed in at the White House," declared a Wednesday-morning press release from the Democratic National Committee. At the same time, Democrats also flooded reporters with e-mails citing Snow's public criticism of Bush and the White House--including excerpts from a recent syndicated column in which Snow described the president's domestic policy as "listless" and that Bush's "wavering conservatism" and his decision not to fight back against Democrats was "something of an embarrassment."

In announcing his pick of Snow, Bush acknowledged he was aware of his new press secretary's public gripes, telling reporters, "I asked him about those comments, and he said, 'You should have heard what I said about the other guy'." By embracing someone outside his Texas inner circle, Bush suggested that he is also hearing complaints that he needs fresh advice. Indeed, Snow made it publicly clear that if he took the job he would do so only if he could take a seat within Bush's inner circle and have the ability to shape policy. "The upside is that for someone like me who's been a pundit for many years, you sit around and you think about the way the world should be," Snow said in an interview with Fox's Bill O'Reilly last Thursday. "You become part of something that's very rare, which is an inner White House circle where you've got to make decisions." Citing the difficulties of being the president's spokesman, Snow said, "That has [a] sort of perverse attraction, which is it's a meaty substantive job with real responsibilities."

One GOP official privy to the negotiations told NEWSWEEK that Snow had pressed administration officials for a job that extended beyond simply being Bush's guy behind the podium and had successfully argued for increased access to the president. Additionally, Snow also argued for and won the ability to make staffing decisions within the press office, including the ability to hire or fire staffers. "He won't be a lightweight," said the Republican official, who declined to be named.

The Oily Slope

George W. Bush has traveled many long roads since he entered the Oval Office in January 2001. But few are quite so long as his personal journey on the energy issue--arguably the single subject he and his veep know more about than anyone else in their administration.

In 2000 Bush campaigned against Al Gore's green-tinged policies by lampooning them, suggesting that hybrid vehicles were some kind of alien life form. Now the president tours hybrid-vehicle facilities like they are a second home, laying out his vision for a nation of electric- and hydrogen-powered cars. This isn't, as some critics have suggested, a superficial move: Bush is sold on the new technologies of the auto industry.

But that's not Bush's only reversal on energy. This week's four-point plan on gas prices marked the end of another of the president's signature positions. In 2000, he campaigned as a Reagan-style free-marketer who opposed what he saw as the regulatory excesses of the Clinton years. Reagan wanted to get government off the back of business. This week Bush urged his own Justice Department to get on the back of the oil industry, launching an investigation into possible market collusion or price-fixing of gasoline.

Such investigations are notoriously difficult, and the bar is high when it comes to litigation. In the early 1980s, the Justice Department sued American Airlines' Robert Crandall for his attempt to raise prices together with his counterpart at Braniff Airlines. Crandall was secretly tape-recorded as he phoned Braniff, saying that if the company raised its prices by 20 per cent, "I'll raise mine in the morning." It would be hard to come up with a clearer attempt to manipulate prices, but the lawsuit ended with a slap on the wrist: Crandall merely agreed to stop having such conversations about fares.

In the case of the oil industry, there's no suggestion of behavior like that. When asked if there were any suspicions of market manipulation, the outgoing White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan came up with nothing. "It's important to make sure that there's not any price gouging," he simply stated.

In fact, President Bush has repeatedly explained why gas prices are high for a host of reasons other than price gouging. "We live in a global marketplace, and when the demand for crude oil goes up in China or India, fast-growing economies, if the corresponding supply doesn't meet that demand, the price of gasoline is going to go up here in America," he told an audience in West Sacramento, Calif., on Earth Day last weekend. "The American people have got to understand what happens elsewhere in the world affects the price of gasoline you pay here."

President Bush is of course feeling the intense political pressure of high gas prices, which his aides have blamed for a steady decline in his approval numbers for the last 15 months. That pressure led to another energy reversal this week, as Bush fiddled with the Strategic Petroleum Reserve. Bush dismissed as a political stunt Bill Clinton's release of oil from the reserve in 2000, and he repeated the same charge against John Kerry in 2004. This week, he followed Clinton and Kerry with an even less significant move--suspending shipments to the reserve.

What does Tony Snow think of the price-gouging story? Not much. Speaking to Bill O'Reilly last week, Snow rejected his fellow pundit's protests about price gouging and about excessive pay for oil executives. Snow said gas prices were high because of "jitters about the stability of the Middle East." As for the role of oil executives in setting gas prices, Snow insisted it was irrelevant. "The fact is, it doesn't matter who's running these companies," he told O'Reilly. "As long as you've got $70 a barrel oil, you're going to be paying that price."

Bush Picks Fox News's Snow As White House Spokesman (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Brendan Murray Catherine Dodge

Bloomberg, April 27, 2006

April 26 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush picked Tony Snow, a Fox News radio host and former presidential speechwriter, as the White House press secretary, replacing Scott McClellan.

``He's not afraid to express his own opinions,'' Bush said, appearing with Snow and McClellan in the White House briefing room. ``I like the perspective he brings to this job, and I think you're going to like it, too.''

Snow's hiring -- Bush's third spokesman in six years -- is part of an effort by Bush's new Chief of Staff Joshua Bolten to reorganize the White House team amid job approval ratings for the president that are at or near record lows. McClellan, who held the job for almost three years, announced his resignation last week and today told reporters that Snow would likely start at the White House the week of May 8.

Snow, 50, prefaced his remarks by saying that one reason he's taking the job is that ``I believe in the president."

``These are going to be times that are very challenging," he said. ``We've got a lot of big issues ahead and we've got a lot of important things that all of us are going to be covering together."

Snow didn't take any questions after the announcement.

Snow has been the host of Fox News Channel's ``Weekend Live With Tony Snow" on Saturday and a daily radio show for Fox News Radio. Before joining Fox in 1996, Snow worked as a syndicated columnist for the Detroit News and a columnist for USA Today.

Former Speechwriter

He served as a speechwriter and deputy assistant for media affairs for President George H.W. Bush from 1991 to 1993 after a career in newspapers, according to his biography on the Fox News Web site.

Snow would bring credibility to the White House post and is comfortable in front of the cameras, Joe Lockhart, who served as press secretary to President Bill Clinton, said yesterday, before the announcement was made.

``Tony is very bright, personable and has a good sense of humor, and that's a lot of what you need to be successful in the job," Lockhart said. ``The real issue for him is will the president and the White House let him do his job? There needs to be a fundamental shift in thinking in the White House on the role of the press, not just another new face."

Opinions

On his radio show, Snow has voiced strong opinions on a range of topics in a tone that contrasts with the measured approach traditionally taken by White House press secretaries. He also has occasionally criticized Bush.

The Web site for his show provides recordings of his broadcasts, including one in which he summarizes Bush's January State of the Union address as marked by ``brilliant foreign policy and listless domestic policy."

He described Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as ``Iran's Nutjob-in-chief" and Pennsylvania Democratic Representative John Murtha, who has advocated pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq, as a leader of ``the cut-and-run crowd."

His show has also featured U.S. military leaders critical of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's job performance.

Bush noted Snow's past criticisms. ``For those of you who have read his columns and listened to his radio show, he sometimes has disagreed with me," Bush said. ``I asked him about those comments, and he said, `You should have heard what I said about the other guy.'"

Lockhart said he expected the news media would highlight the more controversial comments Snow has made on the air at Fox. That may actually work to the administration's benefit if Republican voters conclude ``liberal reporters are attacking the press secretary," he said.

Snow's appointment is likely to be popular with the core of the president's supporters and may ``charge them up" for the November congressional elections, Lockhart said.

In his spare time, Snow plays guitar, saxophone and the flute in an amateur rock-n-roll band called ``Beats Workin'," a group that bills itself on a Web site as a combination of ``four lawyers, a realtor, a business executive, and a radio and TV political commentator."

Showtime At The White House (WP)

By Ari Fleischer

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

The Washington press corps -- working in an industry that's been transformed by talk radio, 24-hour cable news and the Internet -- still views the White House briefing room as it was back in the 1950s -- or the '60s, '70s, '80s or even early '90s. Despite dramatic changes forged by live coverage and instant analysis, the press fondly adheres to the notion that the briefing can be conducted the way it used to be.

But as Tony Snow, the new White House press secretary, will soon discover, the briefing is no longer a briefing, it's a TV show.

Gone are the days when this daily session was a serious affair, with mostly serious questions asked and mostly serious answers given. Instead, the public is now treated to a spectacle in which the media do their best to pressure the White House, regardless of which party is in power, into admitting that much of what the president is doing is wrong, and the White House pushes back. The two sides talk past each other, and the viewing public gets to watch a good fight.

Before 24-hour cable news and the Internet, reporters at the briefings asked tough questions and generally received straight answers. Because the quantity of coverage was limited and the quality was driven by the next day's newspapers and the 6:30 evening news, with major figures such as Walter Cronkite delivering it, press secretaries didn't have to worry that their every word or thought would instantly be reported live on the North Lawn of the White House.

There was only one news cycle, and it lasted about 24 hours. Today there's no telling when a news cycle begins and ends. It's 24 hours a day, and reporters are under constant pressure from editors to update their stories a dozen times a day. Reporters are in endless pursuit of "the latest development" or "this just in," even if there are no developments of late or even if what's "just in" is barely news at all.

Press secretaries realize that their audience isn't only the couple of dozen reporters in the room. It's also the hundreds of thousands of people who tune in to watch, giving the press secretary a forum to "get out the message."

Not so long ago, when Marlin Fitzwater was press secretary to the first President Bush, TV cameras weren't permitted to cover the briefing live. One of President Bill Clinton's press secretaries, Mike McCurry, in an effort to accommodate the new 24-hour-a-day cable news programs, allowed his briefings to be open to TV coverage. Poor Mike. The first briefing the press covered live was on the day the Monica Lewinsky story broke. Since then the briefing room has never been the same.

In addition to the televised session, I used to brief the press every morning in something called "the gaggle." It was on the record, but no TV cameras were allowed. The gaggle was more informative and serious than the briefing. Reporters didn't posture as much for their colleagues and editors, since their reporting wasn't on the air. If I ducked a question at the gaggle -- such as the ones I was asked immediately after Sept. 11, 2001, about whether a military strike was "coming within hours, days, weeks or months" (I was asked that actual question) -- the reporters didn't attempt to ask me the same thing 17 different ways, as they did at the televised briefing. They got the point: The White House wasn't answering.

Of course, the reporters aren't the only ones who behave differently before the cameras. I acted differently, too. At the televised briefing I would sometimes lean into the podium, raise my hand and do my best to deliver a sound bite for the evening news. I liked mixing it up with reporters. I enjoyed a good intellectual televised argument. But the briefing always had an air of theater to it -- on both sides of the podium. It was easier to give thoughtful explanations of controversial issues at the gaggle or during the numerous times a day reporters strolled into my office to talk with me.

It may not be the briefing it once was, but it is still an important show.

The writer was President Bush's press secretary from January 2001 to July 2003.

Senate OKs $2 Billion To Stop Illegals (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Senate yesterday approved immediately spending nearly $2 billion to stop illegal immigration, the largest such infusion of emergency cash for the effort in recent years.

Nearly every member of the Senate voted in favor of the new spending, but Democrats and Republicans split over whether to find cuts elsewhere in the massive spending bill to offset the border security expenditures. Republicans ultimately prevailed and roughly 3 percent will be cut from defense spending contained in the same bill.

"Porous borders are a threat to our national security, and the Senate has acted today to provide vital funding that will increase our border defenses," Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, said after the vote.

Republicans turned back an effort by Minority Leader Harry Reid to grant the same expenditures for border security but without making cuts elsewhere in the emergency spending bill, which has ballooned to a $106.5 billion proposal. The Nevada Democrat, whose amendment failed on a mostly party-line 54-44 vote, said the Republican amendment would hurt the military.

"Democrats offered a way to secure our borders and support our troops," he said. "Instead, Senate Republicans chose to slash $2 billion desperately needed by our troops in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere in order to offset the costs of additional border security."

Yesterday's action -- if approved by the House -- would make a comprehensive immigration bill like President Bush wants more difficult to pass through Congress. Border security unites virtually all lawmakers, while the guest-worker program is disliked by liberals who say it creates unfair competition for American workers, and a path to citizenship is disliked by conservatives who view it as amnesty.

The 59-39 vote came one day after Mr. Bush appeared to endorse a Senate proposal that would give many illegal aliens already in the country a path to citizenship.

After meeting at the White House with more than a dozen senators Tuesday, Mr. Bush told reporters that there was a broad and bipartisan consensus for immigration reform legislation that "recognizes we must have a temporary worker program, a bill that does not grant automatic amnesty to people, but a bill that says somebody who is working here on a legal basis has the right to get in line to become a citizen."

By yesterday, however, there was some dispute about whether Mr. Bush had actually endorsed the Senate proposal hatched early this month by Republican Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Mel Martinez of Florida.

Under that plan, illegal aliens who have been in the U.S. five years or more could apply for citizenship without leaving the country while those who have been here between two and five years would have to apply at a point of entry. Those here less than two years would have to return to their home country to apply for citizenship.

"I'm extremely confident that there was no endorsement," said Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican, who didn't attend the White House meeting because he thinks the Hagel-Martinez proposal amounts to amnesty. "Matter of fact, I'm extremely confident that they were told, 'I'm not endorsing the bill.' "

Mr. Cornyn, one of Mr. Bush's most ardent supporters in Congress, said his information was from a "highly placed source in the White House" but he declined to elaborate.

"That's not true at all," said Mr. Martinez, who attended the meeting. "That was clearly discussed yesterday and clarified in about three different ways with clear questions and answers and he said as long as there's not automatic citizenship, as long as there's not amnesty."

Asked if he had any doubts that Mr. Bush supported the Hagel-Martinez proposal, Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, replied, "Not really. But he has not committed to what 'automatic' means."

In any case, Mr. Bush was cautious.

Mr. Graham said he asked Mr. Bush if he defined "amnesty" as any program that doesn't force illegals to leave the country altogether before applying for citizenship -- a question that gets to the very heart of the debate.

"You don't want me to answer that question," Mr. Bush replied, according to Mr. Graham.

Other Republicans on Capitol Hill said Mr. Bush is either misinformed or just flat wrong if he supports Hagel-Martinez.

"I know he wants to move something forward," Sen. Jeff Sessions, Alabama Republican, said. "I think they need to study the language carefully because I do not believe that language in the bill comes close to meeting his standards that he's set forth."

Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican, denounced the proposal.

"I feel very strongly that we should not reward illegal behavior with amnesty," he said. "I think this convoluted three-tiered approach rewards illegal behavior and I don't think that's the right policy for this country, notwithstanding what the president had to say."

Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican and longtime advocate for immigration reform, said he was glad to see the new spending for border security, but he still has a big question.

"Will the president actually enforce the law?" wondered the Republican. "I know he says he will, but he has demonstrated over and over again that he will not."

Projected Iraq War Costs Soar (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

The cost of the war in Iraq will reach $320 billion after the expected passage next month of an emergency spending bill currently before the Senate, and that total is likely to more than double before the war ends, the Congressional Research Service estimated this week.

The analysis, distributed to some members of Congress on Tuesday night, provides the most official cost estimate yet of a war whose price tag will rise by nearly 17 percent this year. Just last week, independent defense analysts looking only at Defense Department costs put the total at least $7 billion below the CRS figure.

Once the war spending bill is passed, military and diplomatic costs will have reached $101.8 billion this fiscal year, up from $87.3 billion in 2005, $77.3 billion in 2004 and $51 billion in 2003, the year of the invasion, congressional analysts said. Even if a gradual troop withdrawal begins this year, war costs in Iraq and Afghanistan are likely to rise by an additional $371 billion during the phaseout, the report said, citing a Congressional Budget Office study. When factoring in costs of the war in Afghanistan, the $811 billion total for both wars would have far exceeded the inflation-adjusted $549 billion cost of the Vietnam War.

"The costs are exceeding even the worst-case scenarios," said Rep. John M. Spratt Jr. (S.C.), the ranking Democrat on the House Budget Committee.

Such cost estimates may be producing sticker shock on Capitol Hill. This year, the wars will consume nearly as much money as the departments of Education, Justice and Homeland Security combined, a total that is more than a quarter of this year's projected budget deficit. Yesterday, as the Senate debated a $106.5 billion bill to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and ongoing hurricane relief, 59 senators voted to divert $1.9 billion from President Bush's war-funding request to pay for new border patrol agents, aircraft and some fencing at border crossings widely used by illegal immigrants.

When some Democrats said the move would take money from needed combat funds, Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), the bill's sponsor, called the criticism "pure poppycock."

In another challenge to Bush, the Senate moved, in a veto-proof 72 to 26 vote, to shelve an amendment that would have struck spending on all items -- from farm drought assistance to a $700 million measure to move a Mississippi railroad away from the Gulf Coast -- not requested by the administration. The White House has threatened to veto the bill if it much exceeds the $92.2 billion Bush requested in February.

Because of the controversy surrounding the railroad funding, the Senate held a separate vote, 49 to 48, to retain the funding, which critics have singled out as a non-emergency. But advocates of the project, including Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran and Sen. Trent Lott, both Mississippi Republicans, defended it as part of a vital economic development effort along the Gulf Coast.

"It's built on marshes and on sand," Lott said of the railroad, displaying on the Senate floor enlarged photos of the tracks, which run along the coastline. "It will not stand."

But for a bill devoted largely to funding the war, the cost of the Iraq conflict so far has played little part in a political debate focused mainly on energy prices, immigration and pork-barrel spending.

Defense specialist Amy Belasco, the CRS study's author, stressed that the price tag is only an estimate because the Defense Department has declined to break out the cost of Iraqi operations from the larger $435 billion cost of what the administration has labeled the global war on terrorism. That larger cost applies to military, diplomatic and foreign aid operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, enhanced security efforts begun after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and related medical costs of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

"Although DOD has a financial system that tracks funds for each operation once they are obligated -- as pay or contractual costs -- DOD has not sent Congress the semiannual reports with cumulative and current obligations for [Iraq] and [Afghanistan], or estimates for the next year, or for the next five years that are required by statute," the CRS noted.

The report goes on to outline a series of "key war cost questions" for Congress to pursue and "major unknowns" that CRS has not been able to answer: How much has Congress appropriated for each theater of war? How much has the Pentagon obligated for each mission per month? What will future costs be? How much will it cost to repair and replace equipment? And how can Congress receive accurate information on past and future troop levels?

Such questions are highly unusual for a congressional research agency report, congressional budget aides said yesterday, and they point to growing frustration in Congress with a Pentagon that has held war-cost information close to the vest.

Lt. Col. Brian Maka, a spokesman for the Defense Department's comptroller, said the Pentagon will study the report before commenting on it.

The report details how operations, maintenance and procurement costs have surged from $50 billion in 2004 to $88 billion this year, citing rising expenditures for body armor, oil and gasoline; equipment maintenance; and training and equipping Afghan and Iraqi security forces.

"These factors, however, are not enough to explain a 50-percent increase of over $20 billion in operating costs," the report states.

War-related investment costs have more than tripled since 2003, from $7 billion to $24 billion, as money has been spent on armored vehicles, radios, sensors and night-vision goggles, as well as on equipment for reorganized Army and Marine Corps units.

"These reasons are not sufficient, however, to explain the level of increases," the report states again.

Other analysts are also scratching their heads. Michael E. O'Hanlon, a defense budget expert at the Brookings Institution, suggested that the military may be slightly padding its request for fear that Congress will be less giving on future emergency spending bills.

"I don't think these guys would make things up, but there is an assumption in the military that these supplementals might dry up, and if there are things that might be considered even Iraq-related, they should get them funded right now," he said.

Of the total war spending, the CRS analysis found $4 billion that could not be tracked. It did identify $2.5 billion diverted from other spending authorizations in 2001 and 2002 to prepare for the invasion.

That discovery helped push the CRS cost estimate higher than estimates from independent budget analysts. The CRS total also includes expenditures on foreign aid and diplomacy not counted in the military cost tallies by groups such as the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments.

Senate Cuts War Funding To Tighten Border Control (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

The Associated Press, April 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027001

WASHINGTON -- The Senate voted today to divert some of the money President Bush requested for the war in Iraq to instead increase patrols against illegal immigrants on the nation's borders and provide the Coast Guard with new boats and helicopters.

An amendment was adopted, 59-39, to cut Bush's Iraq request by $1.9 billion to pay for new aircraft, patrol boats and other vehicles, as well as border checkpoints and a fence along the Mexico border crossing near San Diego.

Later, the Senate voted by a veto-proof 72-26 margin to kill an attempt by conservatives to cut the overall bill back to Bush's request -- just a day after the White House issued a toughly worded promise to veto the $106.5 billion bill unless it is cut back to below $95 billion.

Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran, R-Ill. -- the key architect of the bill -- is unhappy with the veto threat and easily beat back a move by Craig Thomas, R-Wyo., to kill $12 billion in add-ons such as $4 billion in farm aid, $1.1 billion for Gulf Coast fisheries and money for a much-criticized $700 million relocation of a Mississippi freight rail line.

While the border security funds had broad support, Democrats and Republicans argued over whether the cuts to Pentagon war spending would harm troops in Iraq. The cuts, offered by Judd Gregg, R-N.H., would trim Bush's request for the war by almost 3 percent but don't specify how.

Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., said Gregg's cuts would "take money from troop pay, body armor and even the joint improvised explosive device defeat fund. Now that is a false choice and it is a wrong choice."

Gregg responded heatedly, arguing that the cuts eventually would come from other parts of the massive Pentagon budget rather than U.S. forces in Iraq.

"To come down here and allege that these funds are going to come out of the needs of the people on the front lines in Iraq or Afghanistan is pure poppycock," he said.

An amendment by Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada to add the border security funds but not tap the Pentagon for them failed by a 54-44 vote.

In its veto statement, the White House said the bill contains too many items that are "unrelated to the war or emergency hurricane relief needs." It said a final House-Senate compromise "must remain focused on addressing urgent national priorities while maintaining fiscal discipline."

The bill is sure to be carved back in House-Senate negotiations next month, and Bush may very well not have to follow through on his veto promise.

To accommodate the White House's objections would require the Senate to shed numerous projects. That would represent a departure from the way a disaster aid bill was handled in December, when Congress added $12 billion in new spending not requested by Bush.

Even as the White House raised the potential of a first-ever Bush veto, the administration on Tuesday asked the Senate for $2.2 billion more to repair and strengthen levees in and around New Orleans. The request wouldn't add to the overall cost of the bill since it was accompanied by a decrease in Federal Emergency Management Agency disaster funds.

The White House acknowledges that FEMA coffers would have to be replenished again in the fall instead of next year under the proposal.

Bush insists that total spending in the bill be capped at his $92.2 billion request for Iraq and hurricane relief, though he is willing to accept $2.3 billion in the bill to prevent an outbreak of avian flu. His February budget anticipated the funding, but the White House has been slow to follow up with a detailed request.

Gregg chairs the Appropriations Homeland Security Subcommittee. His border security plan focuses used on the capital needs of the Border Patrol and the Coast Guard, including new planes, helicopters, ships, communications equipment and a project to build a fence along the Mexico border near San Diego.

Gregg said his plan would "give the people who are defending us on our borders, the border security agents, the Custom agents, the Coast Guard, the tools they need to do their job right -- the unmanned vehicles, the cars, the helicopters which are a critical part of our fight in the war on terrorism. It has to be done now."

The underlying bill contains $67.6 billion for Pentagon war operations and $27.1 billion for hurricane relief, including grants to states to build and repair housing and $2.1 billion for levees and flood control projects. The funding for hurricane relief exceeds Bush's request by $7.4 billion.

To date, Congress has provided about $315 billion for the war in Iraq and anti-terror spending since September 2001.

Tax Reduction, Border Security Proceed In Senate (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Republicans neared agreement on a $70 billion tax-reduction bill even as the Senate Finance Committee told the Internal Revenue Service that it wants to inspect five years of returns from the top 15 oil and gas companies.

"The goal is we need some information," said Finance Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa). At this stage no clear legislative agenda is attached to the request, which also was signed by the panel's ranking Democrat, Sen. Max Baucus of Montana.

But in writing the tax bill now being negotiated, Senate tax writers were more aggressive than the House in looking for revenue offsets from the oil industry. And amid the outcry over record profits and high gas prices, the level of detail in the request makes it one of the broadest of the IRS in recent memory.

"We understand the frustration of members of the committee, and that they have a role to perform. But gas prices are set by market forces, not any manipulation by producers or refiners," said John Bisney, a spokesman for the American Petroleum Institute. "Some of these documents go back five years, and in that period we haven't heard a peep out of them [the IRS]."

Relatively small oil industry-related provisions were still in play last night as negotiators tried to pin down an estimated $4 billion in final offsets for the tax package. Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) and House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R., Cal.) were hopeful that an agreement in principle could be announced today.

The core elements will include a one-year patch to protect middle-income taxpayers threatened by the alternative minimum tax and a two-year extension of the favorable 15% rate for capital gains and dividends, due to expire at the end of 2008.

As part of the package, the financial-services industry appears certain of getting an extension of the "active financing exemption," important to multinationals. The exemption, which dates back to 1997 and is due to expire this year, says that U.S.-based firms shouldn't be taxed on the active business income earned abroad by their foreign subsidiaries until the income is returned to the American parent.

But major provisions, approved by the House or Senate, will be left out in anticipation of a second tax bill. Mr. Grassley said he didn't think the second package, which would include the research and development tax credit and more AMT relief for 2007, needed to be announced today, but "we have to have some consensus."

The progress on the tax front came as the Senate Republicans won approval of $1.9 billion in emergency spending for border security designed, in part, to ease conservatives' concerns and lay the groundwork for a second try at passing immigration legislation next month.

Most of the funds would go to buying patrol boats, aircraft and other equipment for Coast Guard and Customs and Border Protection operations. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) hopes to burnish the Republican image on border issues before again tackling immigration.

The action follows a White House meeting Tuesday at which President Bush urged senators in both parties to try again to complete a proposal that stalled before the spring recess. Republicans say he is clearly sympathetic to provisions that authorize expanded guest-worker programs and a path toward legalizing millions of undocumented workers in the U.S.

"I think he is really going to lean into this one," said Sen. Sam Brownback (R., Kan.), who said Mr. Bush had read -- and urged him to get -- the book "Judgment Days" by Nick Kotz, which details the relationship between another Texan, Lyndon Johnson, and Martin Luther King Jr. running up to the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Mr. Brownback said that just as President Johnson went against Southern forces in the Democratic Party, Mr. Bush appeared prepared to tackle conservatives in his own. "I think Bush sees [immigration] somewhat in that category," Mr. Brownback said. "I think the president really wants to get something. He thinks this is the issue of this year's legislature ... I think this is Bush's time as far as affecting millions of people."

The $1.9 billion for border security would be wrapped into a $106.5 billion appropriations bill to continue paying for the war in Iraq and hurricane recovery efforts along the Gulf Coast. Emergency defense funds would be reduced so the net cost of the package wouldn't increase. But the underlying bill remains $14.3 billion above the administration's request and is already the target of White House veto threats.

Mr. Frist said that he has 35 votes to sustain any future veto, but when put to the test yesterday, his party was more likely to support Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran (R., Miss.) who argues more money is needed for the Gulf Coast.

On a 72-26 roll call, with a majority of Republicans on his side, Mr. Cochran easily tabled a first conservative effort to roll back the cost of the bill to the president's request of $92.2 billion. And with the help of Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour, a former Republican national chairman, Mr. Cochran won a 49-48 vote blocking efforts to strip out $700 million to help relocate a CSX Corp. rail line in the state.

US Senate Frees Up Two Billion Dollars For Border Security (AFP-Y2)

AFP, April 26, 2006

The US Senate voted to set aside nearly two billion dollars for improving border security, in a move hailed as an important first step toward immigration reform.

By a vote of 59 to 39, the Senate approved an amendment by Republican Senator Judd Gregg that would free up 1.9 billion dollars in credits for surveillance planes and building a fence near San Diego, California, along the border with Mexico.

"Securing our border is the first step for any action that we need to take in terms of more comprehensive reform in immigration, ... an issue that we will come back to," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

Immigration has risen to the top of the national political agenda ahead of November's mid-term legislative elections.

The issue has divided the Republican Party, with some members of Congress pushing for strict penalties against illegal immigrants and those who employ or assist them.

For the past two years, President George W. Bush has been asking for a sweeping reform of border security procedures and a "guest worker" program.

The debate has spurred hundreds of thousands of immigrants and rights advocates to protest in Los Angeles, New York, Houston, Washington and dozens of other US cities, with a massive nationwide protest and boycott planned for May 1.

Senate Adds $1.9 Bln In Spending On Border Security (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Brian Faler

Bloomberg, April 27, 2006

April 26 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Senate voted to cut $1.9 billion from Defense Department programs so it can spend the money on aircraft, patrol boats and other equipment to boost border security.

The Senate approved the border-security changes in a 59 to 39 vote on an amendment to a $106 billion emergency spending measure for military operations and hurricane recovery.

Under the amendment, $1.9 billion will be used to replace surveillance aircraft, patrol boats, ``outdated'' vehicles, communications equipment and other improvements that lawmakers said were urgently needed to secure the nation's borders.

``The purpose of this amendment is to basically give the people who are defending us on our borders -- the border security agents, the Customs agents, the Coast Guard -- the tools they need to their job right,'' said Senator Judd Gregg, a New Hampshire Republican. ``We can bring the border under control and we're on a path to do that.''

Democrats denounced the border-security plan, saying it forced lawmakers to choose between supporting American troops and protecting the country's Southwestern border.

`Urgent Need'

``Border security is an urgent need and it should and must be addressed by this Congress,'' said Senator Hillary Clinton, a Democrat from New York. ``But our security and our values are not served by choosing between protecting our troops and protecting our homeland.''

A Democratic alternative proposal, which would have made paid for the border security equipment without cutting defense programs, was rejected on a 54-44 vote.

Republicans said their plan would cut non-emergency defense programs, not funds for troops, and was more fiscally responsible because it wouldn't increase the overall size of the spending measure.

The legislation includes money to replace the U.S. border protection agency's only unmanned surveillance aircraft, which crashed yesterday in Arizona.

The chamber also rejected, by 72 to 26, a proposal to cut the $106 billion spending bill by more than $10 billion as the Bush administration has demanded. The White House Office of Management and Budget yesterday said President George W. Bush would veto any legislation spending more than $94.5 billion.

Senator Craig Thomas, a Wyoming Republican who sponsored the proposal, said it would have cut billions in unnecessary spending. After the vote Thomas said he was confident the Senate would reduce the total cost of the measure.

`Reduced'

``I think when it's all over you'll see a lot more people being opposed to it unless it's reduced quite a bit,'' he said.

The House has approved legislation that closely tracks the president's request, capping the spending at about $92 billion.

Differences between the House and Senate measures will have to be resolved by a conference committee.

The border security spending is part of an effort by Majority Leader Bill Frist to gain support for pending legislation, now stalled in the Senate, to overhaul the nation's immigration laws.

The immigration measure would beef-up border security, create a temporary worker program and allow millions of illegal immigrants to gain legal status has stalled in the Senate over disagreements on a number of proposed amendments to the plan. The House has approved legislation that would crack down on the hiring of undocumented workers while calling for the construction of a 700-mile fence along the border. The Bush administration has called for overhauling U.S. immigration laws, including the creation of a guest-worker program.

Gregg, Clinton Face Off (NHUL)

By From Staff And Wire Reports

New Hampshire Union Leader, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON – A war of words broke out yesterday between Sens. Judd Gregg and Hillary Clinton after the Senate approved Gregg's proposal to divert some of the money President Bush requested for the war in Iraq to instead bolster U.S. border security.

Sen. Clinton, D-N.Y., said Gregg's cuts would "take money from troop pay, body armor and even joint improvised explosive device defeat fund. Now that is a false choice, and it is a wrong choice."

Gregg responded heatedly, arguing that the cuts eventually would come from other parts of the massive Pentagon budget rather than U.S. forces in Iraq.

"To come down here and allege that these funds are going to come out of the needs of the people on the front lines in Iraq or Afghanistan is pure poppycock," he said.

The Senate passed Gregg's amendment yesterday by a vote of 59-39. The amendment cuts President Bush's Iraq request by $1.9 billion to pay for new Border Patrol agents, aircraft and some fencing at border crossings widely used by illegal immigrants.

"Yes, fighting the war in Iraq is critical to this war on terrorism," Gregg said on the Senate floor Tuesday. "Fighting the war in Afghanistan is critical to this war on terrorism. But I have to think equally important is making sure that our borders are secure."

While the border security funds had sweeping support, Democrats and Republicans argued over whether the cuts to Pentagon war funds would harm troops on the ground in Iraq.

Gregg's proposed cuts trim Bush's request for the war by almost 3 percent but don't specify how. Yesterday, his press secretary said the money could be drawn from portions of the President's request that would not affect current U.S. troops in Iraq.

In his floor statement, Gregg said the majority of dollars in the amendment — more than $700 million — would go to improving the air fleet used to patrol U.S. borders. Some of the planes are 40 years past their useful life, he said.

Gregg said the United States has had just one unmanned aerial vehicle conducting surveillance along the border. On Tuesday, he said, it crashed.

Other portions of Gregg's amendment would go to new cars and helicopters. Gregg said he also hoped to buy new boats for the Coast Guard.

Gregg chairs the Appropriations Homeland Security Subcommittee. His plan, he said, would "give the people who are defending us on our borders, the border security agents, the Custom agents, the Coast Guard, the tools they need to do their job right — the unmanned vehicles, the cars, the helicopters, which are a critical part of our fight in the war on terrorism. It has to be done now."

Yesterday's vote came in the wake of a toughly worded promise by the White House to veto the $106.5 billion measure unless it is cut back to below $95 billion.

In its veto statement, the White House said the bill contains too many items that are "unrelated to the war or emergency hurricane relief needs." It said a final House-Senate compromise on it "must remain focused on addressing urgent national priorities while maintaining fiscal discipline."

The move is likely to force senators to drop most of their $14 billion in add-ons for farm aid, highway repairs, aid to the Gulf Coast fishing industry and other projects. The additional money had won the ire of the White House and GOP congressional leaders and scorn from conservative allies whose support is crucial on Election Day.

The bill is sure to be carved back in House-Senate negotiations next month, and Bush may very well not have to follow through on his veto promise.

The White House statement said farm aid in the bill is unnecessary after a booming 2005 crop year and that a controversial $700 million relocation of a Mississippi freight rail line would unfairly put taxpayers on the hook for privately owned infrastructure.

To accommodate the White House's objections would require the Senate to shed numerous projects. That would represent a departure from how a disaster aid bill was handled in December, when Congress added $12 billion in new spending not requested by Bush.

Even as the White House raised the potential of a first-ever Bush veto, the administration on Tuesday asked the Senate for $2.2 billion more to repair and strengthen levees in and around New Orleans. The request wouldn't add to the overall cost of the bill since it was accompanied by a decrease in Federal Emergency Management Agency disaster funds.

The White House acknowledges that FEMA coffers would have to be replenished again in the fall instead of next year under the proposal.

Bush insists that total spending in the bill be capped at his $92.2 billion request for Iraq and hurricane relief, though he is willing to accept $2.3 billion in the bill to prevent an outbreak of avian flu. His February budget anticipated the funding, but the White House has been slow to follow up with a detailed request.

To date, Congress has provided about $315 billion for the war in Iraq and anti-terror spending since September 2001.

Minutemen Gaining In Immigration Debate (AP-Y2)

By Gillian Flaccus

AP2, April 26, 2006

Laurie Lisonbee worried about illegal immigration but figured it was somebody else's issue — until she saw hundreds of thousands of immigrants and their supporters marching across her TV screen.

Soon, Lisonbee had recruited several friends to attend a demonstration by the Minuteman Project, a volunteer group that patrols the border to keep out illegal immigrants. Now, the 51-year-old art professor checks the group's Web site daily and plans a summer trip to the Mexican border to help build a fence.

Minuteman organizers say this spring's marches have proved to be an unexpected recruitment tool for Americans who feel uneasy about the burgeoning immigration movement but may have considered the organization a pack of gun-toting vigilantes.

"We're not trying to be more mainstream — mainstream has found us," said Stephen Eichler, the group's executive director. "They're saying, 'These guys actually have teeth, they don't all chew tobacco, they don't all have a gun rack in the back of their truck.' They're saying, `They believe what I believe,' and they're joining us."

Lisonbee, a registered Republican, said only one issue matters to her now.

"My vote will go to the candidate who's the toughest on immigration, whether they're Democrat or Republican," she said from her home in Orem, Utah. "Before, we were pretty much the types of people who would call our congressmen and not take to the streets. But that's all changed now."

The Minuteman Project first gained attention last year when Orange County resident and former tax accountant Jim Gilchrist helped lead its first 30-day patrol of the border in Arizona. The group has added mainstream political tools, including a network of local chapters and e-mail lobbying campaigns.

In December, Gilchrist, a former Republican, ran as a third-party candidate in a special House election in Orange County, Calif., finished a respectable third with 25 percent of the vote.

Since this spring's huge pro-immigrant rallies, 300 people nationwide have applied to start local chapters, according to Eichler. The group's goal is 500 chapters by December and a membership of 1 million within 1 1/2 years, Eichler said.

Eichler claimed the organization's membership has climbed to more than 200,000.

But Heidi Beirich, deputy director of the Southern Poverty Law Center's Intelligence Project, which monitors the Minuteman Project for racist rhetoric, said that estimate appears to be ridiculously high. She offered no estimate of her own.

"At the border during this last outing, they had maybe 50 people. If they have 200,000 people, it doesn't seem right," she said.

Beirich also questioned the premise that pro-immigrant rallies will help the Minuteman Project. She said many recruits may attend one or two rallies, but leave after they discover what she called the group's extremist attitudes.

"They get in there and they're like, `My God, I didn't sign on for this,'" she said.

In the coming weeks, the Minuteman Project plans to set out in a caravan from Los Angeles to Washington, with stops in 13 cities, including President Bush's vacation haven of Crawford, Texas. It is also raising money to build a private fence along parts of the California-Mexico border.

Increased security along the border is a popular idea on Capitol Hill, where the immigration debate will soon resume. How to treat the approximately 11 million illegal immigrants now here is where Congress splits — a House bill would criminalize the immigrants, a Senate bill would offer guest worker status and a potential path to citizenship.

David S. Meyer, a professor of sociology and political science at the University of California, Irvine, said the growing Minuteman movement has "stiffened the spine" of conservative politicians who might otherwise be wary of publicly identifying with the organization's views.

He said the recent workplace crackdown at a pallet manufacturer that resulted in 1,100 arrests at 40 U.S. sites was part of an attempt by the Bush administration to appease the Minuteman Project and its congressional supporters. Bush supports a guest worker program.

"The debate has kind of come to them, and they're clever enough politically to realize that," Meyer said. "People in mainstream politics who are not associated with the Minuteman Project are essentially voicing their position, which is a victory itself."

Immigrants Divided On Boycott (WP)

By Karin Brulliard And Krissah Williams

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Disagreement over whether immigrants should walk off the job and boycott businesses Monday appeared to deepen yesterday as one immigrant group mustered support for the protest while another group cautioned immigrants that it might put their jobs at risk.

The controversy over what has been called "a day without immigrants" has exposed a rift in the immigration reform movement over the best course of action after successful demonstrations April 10 in cities across the nation.

Although groups in Dallas and Los Angeles say momentum is building for a major May 1 boycott, the coalition that organized the recent rally on the Mall has discouraged participation for fear it could lead to firings and create a negative climate as Congress debates immigration legislation.

"We don't want to be the ones telling people to risk your job, risk your well-being," said Maryland Del. Ana Sol Gutierrez (D-Wheaton), who was joined yesterday by other Latino officials at a news conference.

Rather than protest, the officials said, workers who are excused from their jobs Monday should engage in such civic activities as cleaning parks and supporting voter registration efforts.

An opposing vision for the day was presented at a second news conference called by a group that was part of the April 10 effort -- Mexicans Without Borders -- and several smaller immigrant groups. They said a walkout and business boycott would up the ante in response to a congressional deadlock on immigration reform and multi-state raids in which 1,000 illegal immigrants were arrested last week.

"We want to show that our absence will leave an emptiness that cannot be filled," said Ricardo Juarez, coordinator of Mexicans Without Borders.

Speakers at both events emphasized that although they disagree over the boycott, they remain unified in their quest for legal status for immigrants who entered the country illegally.

"Not even in the civil rights movement did you have just one strategy," said Mario Cristaldo, the general coordinator for Voting Rights for DC Coalition, one of the groups that advocated a boycott yesterday. "This is a democratic system, and people agree and disagree."

That thought was echoed by Gutierrez, who was joined by Arlington County Board member Walter Tejada (D), Prince George's County Council member William A. Campos (D-Hyattsville), Montgomery County Council member Tom Perez (D-Silver Spring) and officials from two Prince George's municipalities.

"I don't know why there is the expectation that all of the Hispanic community would be on the same page or act monolithically," Gutierrez said. "We are not as organized as groups on the West Coast. There is not going to be a single leader or a single organization telling people what to do. This is coming from the bottom up."

The six groups backing the boycott -- including the National Association of Indigenous Salvadorans and the Latino Media Collective -- said they think the immigrant community supports the idea. Juarez said a recent survey by his group of more than 2,000 immigrants in the Washington region found that 97 percent said they would participate in the boycott even if it meant losing their jobs.

"For us, this poll was the voice of the people," Juarez said. "We are with the people and the voice of the people."

But most unions, chambers of commerce, churches and immigrant groups in the Washington area have been lukewarm to the idea of a boycott. The National Capital Immigration Coalition, the April 10 umbrella group, is planning Monday gatherings in the District, Baltimore and Prince George's County in the late afternoon and evening so people can attend after work or school. In Virginia, activists will stand on the corners of major intersections in Herndon, Alexandria and Baileys Crossroads, waving large banners advocating immigration reform.

"We have been trying to come out to educate the American community that we are immigrants who come just to work. . . . That has been very successful for us so far," said Juan Carlos Ruiz, a coordinator with the coalition. "We believe that if there is a need for a strike, we should use it, but we don't think it should be done right now."

Jorge Ribas, president of the Western Maryland Hispanic Chamber of Commerce, said that his group has taken no official position on the issue but that he does not believe many Hispanic business owners will participate.

"Hispanics are too pragmatic. They are not going to shut down just for that," he said. "Most are start-up businesses, and the owner is the sole employee."

The AFL-CIO, the Service Employees International Union and other unions that supported the April marches for immigrant rights do not support the boycott. Unions said authorizing what amounts to a strike for a day could be considered a breach of their contract agreements.

The support of mainstream business groups for immigration reform also influences those who oppose the boycott.

"Business is on our side. I'm thinking, why hurt business?" said Manuel Hidalgo, executive director of the Latino Economic Development Corp. in Washington and a member of the immigration coalition.

Some observers said immigrants seem unsure what to do about the boycott. Giovanna Tassi, manager of Radio Latina (950 AM), said that May 1 is a constant topic of discussion on the station's morning talk shows and that many callers express enthusiasm for the idea -- until, she said, she explains that most local immigrant advocates are not behind it.

The Rev. Jose E. Hoyos, director of the Arlington Catholic Diocese's Spanish Apostolate, said he has been bombarded with calls from immigrants asking questions and seeking advice. He has told them to continue with business as usual and attend community events in the evening, he said.

"That's like we are against the system," Hoyos said of a work stoppage. "We want to be part of the system."

D.C.-area Hispanics Oppose Boycott (WT)

By Keyonna Summers

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

Local Hispanic elected officials yesterday discouraged participation in Monday's nationwide immigrant boycott of work and school and instead urged immigrants to show solidarity with American citizens.

"We encourage all residents of the Washington metro region to participate in activities on May 1 ... that are peaceful, educational and raise awareness of the contributions immigrants make to our nation," said Arlington County Board member J. Walter Tejada, a leading immigrant advocate.

Prince George's County Council member Will Campos issued a plea to all immigrants: "Please do not boycott anything on May 1."

"We are trying to establish relationships with our federal leaders for comprehensive immigration reform and a boycott, especially of this magnitude, could damage that relationship," said Mr. Campos, Hyattsville Democrat.

The Hispanic leaders were responding to calls for a nationwide immigrant boycott organized by the California-based Latino Movement USA and Act Now to Stop War & End Racism (ANSWER) coalition.

Called "a day without an immigrant," the proposed boycott aims to highlight immigrants' place in the economy by having them close their businesses, skip school and work and avoid spending money.

Last week, local leaders of pro-immigration rallies held April 10 withdrew their support of Monday's boycott.

Officials from Arlington, Montgomery and Prince George's counties yesterday said they fear that holding a boycott so soon after the rallies, which drew hundreds of thousands of immigrants and demonstrators across the country, might generate a backlash against immigration and result in lost jobs.

Instead, they encouraged immigrants to register to vote and begin petition drives Monday -- activities that Maryland state Delegate Ana Sol Gutierrez said are as "American as apple pie."

"We want to form alliances with our American friends," the Montgomery County Democrat said.

Meanwhile, the U.S. Senate this week returned to work on an immigration reform bill -- the focus of this month's rallies.

The United States is home to an estimated 12 million illegal aliens, about two-thirds of whom arrived in the past 10 years, according to the Pew Hispanic Center, a nonprofit research group.

Illegal aliens cost the country and localities millions of dollars each year in unpaid income and Social Security taxes and in education and health care benefits, several state and federal leaders have said.

"We believe that all these [immigration] issues that we confront at our local government can be resolved by the federal government taking a comprehensive approach to our immigration crisis today," said Mr. Tejada, former chairman of the Virginia Latino Advisory Commission, which compiled a report on a state law denying illegal aliens' access to public benefits.

Advocacy groups on the West Coast, particularly in the border state of California, said immigrants and illegal aliens plan to participate en masse in the boycott. But other groups have expressed reservations about the effort.

Juan Jose Gutierrez, director of Latino Movement USA, said he will be satisfied with any kind of participation Monday.

"The fact that most of the people are in fact doing different activities on May 1 [is] in itself is a major step forward in the struggle for comprehensive immigration reform," Mr. Gutierrez said in a telephone interview from California. "Without the boycott, they probably wouldn't be doing anything at all."

However, the Virginia-based group Mexicans Without Borders said it has withdrawn its support of the boycott, after having endorsed the event last week, said Manuel Hidalgo, executive director of the Latino Economic Development Corp.

Some small-business owners plan to close their doors early to attend evening events but cannot afford to shut down completely, said Mr. Hidalgo, whose group trains Hispanic workers and provides loans to Hispanic businesses.

U.S. Lobbyists Lash Out At Mexican Boycott (AP)

By Alan Clendenning

AP, April 26, 2006

U.S. lobbyists lashed out Wednesday at the Mexican "Nothing Gringo" campaign timed for May 1 to coincide with the "Day Without Immigrants" boycott in the United States.

The American Chamber of Commerce in Mexico said organizers are risking a backlash and foolishly targeting some of their best allies, since U.S. corporations have actively lobbied the U.S. Congress for immigration reform including legalization for many of the estimated 11 million undocumented migrants.

Mexicans' refusal to "buy American" on May 1 could further polarize the debate and make reform supporters seem anti-American at the very moment that lobbyists are trying to persuade lawmakers in Washington to pass a bill that would benefit migrants, worries Larry Rubin, the chamber's president.

"This is like shooting oneself in the foot," Rubin said. "U.S. companies have been the first to lobby, launching a huge lobbying effort for immigration reform. ... Why hurt something that is helping you?"

Migrants and their supporters in the United States are being encouraged to skip work and school and not spend money for one day to demonstrate the migrants' importance to the U.S. economy.

South of the border, Mexicans are targeting American stores and chain restaurants — "That means no Dunkin' Donuts, no McDonald's, Burger King, Starbucks, Sears, Krispy Kreme or Wal-Mart," reads one e-mail making the rounds.

But even activists are confused about which companies are U.S.-owned. Sears is cited by boycott organizers, despite the fact that Sears' Mexico stores were bought by Mexican billionaire Carlos Slim in 1997. And few organizers mention Vips — the chain of ubiquitous Mexican diners — even though they are owned by Wal-Mart Stores Inc.

A quarter of Mexico's formal private-sector jobs with regular pay are provided by U.S. firms, according to the chamber, including Walmex, the Mexican Wal-Mart subsidiary that is the nation's biggest private employer with 140,000 workers. Delphi Corp., the U.S. auto parts maker, is second with 70,000 workers.

"Certainly, companies could be hurt," Rubin said at a news conference Wednesday.

The chamber represents more than 2,000 American and other foreign companies doing business in Mexico, and says its members are responsible for $100 billion of investment in the country.

The companies say they're helping Mexico by providing jobs, but activists counter they pay so little that Mexicans have little choice but to head north.

Backers of the Mexican boycott insisted Wednesday that the protest could send a message that American companies should offer better pay and benefits to their Mexican workers.

"They continue to exploit Mexicans with badly paid jobs and no labor rights," said Roberto Vigil, who works in the Mexico City office of the California-based immigrants rights group Hermandad Mexicana. "They're kind of two-faced: they support, but they exploit."

Unskilled workers at U.S. companies usually start with Mexico's minimum wage of $4.35 a day. While many earn more, such as seamstresses making an average of $5.89 a day — even these wages pale in comparison to paychecks offered by the same companies north of the border, conceded the chamber's Humberto Banuelos.

A cashier at Subway (or "sandwich artist," as the company refers to them) earns about $189 a month in Mexico City. In Colorado, Subway cashiers make four times that — $824.

Companies also often hire workers for three-month periods to avoid paying health insurance or other benefits, activists say.

"Yes, we are aware that they are the largest employers in the Mexican republic, but they are paying crumbs," said Martha Suarez Cantu, coordinator of Alianza Braceroproa, a Mexican labor-rights group helping organize the boycott.

The only way to stem immigration is to narrow the income gap between the two countries, said Robert Pastor, director of the Center for North American Studies at American University in Washington. He pointed to the European Union, where migration slowed after heavy investment reduced the income gap in its poorer countries.

Washington does not invest directly in job creation in Mexico. The U.S. Agency for International Development gave Mexico $31 million last year, but it went toward scholarships, tuberculosis, AIDS prevention and advice to lending institutions.

But raising wages would cause Mexico to lose ground to countries with cheaper labor, such as China and India. Felix Boni, director of equity research at Scotiabank's Mexican brokerage firm, suggested boosting Mexico's productivity and job growth.

"U.S. aid is not going to do it," Boni said. "It doesn't make sense to pour money into something that's broken. Mexico needs to make structural changes."

Migrants' Boycott Plan Is Crossing The Border (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar And Cecilia Sánchez, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

MEXICO CITY — It began as a series of e-mails bouncing around Mexico and Central America, the kind of chain letter a lot of people think of as a nuisance.

"Send this message to as many people as possible!" read one sent by a video-rental shop owner in San Salvador to more than 200 clients. "Don't buy anything North American … No Dunkin' Donuts, McDonald's, Burguer [sic] King, Starbucks, Sears, Crispy Cream [sic], Wal-Mart…. "

Spreading now by word of mouth as well as through cyberspace, the campaign calls for a 24-hour boycott Monday of American businesses in Mexico and other Latin American countries. The idea is to show solidarity with immigrant rights protests scheduled in several U.S. cities that day.

This week, a growing number of business groups, trade unions and political leaders in Mexico said they planned to join the boycott, which will be on the traditional May Day holiday here.

Even though Internet access is still a luxury in Mexico (only 9% of households have it), word of the boycott is quickly spreading.

Teresa Garcia Hernandez, a 44-year-old nurse in Mexico City who doesn't surf the Internet, heard about the boycott from her teenage children.

"They're really excited about it and they're telling all their friends, cousins and uncles," she said. "They told me, 'Mama, since your friends don't have this thing called the Internet, you tell them in person not to buy anything gringo that day.' "

Many Mexicans are closely following the immigration debate in the United States. There is a growing sense among Mexicans that proposals being debated by the U.S. Congress could hurt millions of compatriots who crossed over illegally.

In Ciudad Juarez, across the border from El Paso, the Chamber of Commerce announced that its 5,000 members would neither buy nor sell U.S. products that day. And leaders of a Chihuahua state peasant group said they planned to block the bridges that link Ciudad Juarez and El Paso.

"For those of us who live on the border, it's to our advantage to shop in El Paso, but one day isn't going to hurt us," Ciudad Juarez resident Adriana Olague told the newspaper El Universal. "And this way we help the paisanos [countrymen] over there who are looking to get better treatment."

For some Mexicans, however, the talk of a boycott is worrisome.

In the Mexico City neighborhood of Anzures, Carlos Torres pointed out that his McDonald's franchise was the joint investment of "many families that are completely Mexican."

"With this boycott we could have serious losses," Torres said. "Just because it's an American brand doesn't mean the owners are gringos. This is our source of employment. The workers here are all Mexicans."

The growing clamor to buy "nothing gringo" on Monday has also caused concern among members of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in Mexico.

Larry Rubin, president of the group, noted that 40% of the Mexican workforce is employed by U.S. companies. The chamber has lobbied for changes in U.S. immigration laws that would allow millions of Mexicans in the United States to gain legal status.

"Our members have been very vocal in support of a positive immigration reform in the U.S.," Rubin said. Boycotting American products "is not a good way for Mexicans to pay back this support," he said. "It's like shooting oneself in the foot."

Immigration groups in the U.S. conceived of their protest as "A Day Without Latinos," a name derived from a 2004 mockumentary in which California descends into chaos when it is mysteriously emptied of its Mexican population. Latin American activists quickly picked up on the slogan. One of the e-mails circulating through the region gleefully tells its recipients: "We can make the movie 'A Day Without a Mexican' into reality!"

Elmer Escobar, the owner of four Evolution Video stores in El Salvador's capital, San Salvador, got the "Day Without a Mexican" e-mail from a friend and promptly sent it to the 288 clients in his database.

In a country where nearly every family has a relative who has migrated to the U.S., joining the boycott feels a bit like an obligation, Escobar said.

"I have family in Los Angeles and San Francisco, relatives who came up from the bottom like I did," Escobar said. "We've all suffered to improve our lives. And the others who've migrated from Mexico, Guatemala and Honduras, they've come up from the bottom too. That's why we have to stick together."

A professor at the National University in San Salvador printed out the e-mail and posted it across the campus.

In Guatemala, activists who work with Maya Indians are planning to use community radio stations to spread word of the boycott to rural areas.

"We want to send the message to the towns and settlements, asking people to tell their relatives in the U.S. not to send remittances [to Guatemala] on that day," said Ignacio Ochoa, director of the Nahual Foundation. "We believe that just boycotting American products won't have as big an impact."

Members of the Chamber of Commerce in the central Mexican state of Guanajuato have said they plan to join the boycott too, as have officials in the border states of Tamaulipas, Chihuahua and Coahuila. Sonora state, which borders Arizona, is not supporting the boycott.

But Mexican diplomats and President Vicente Fox are said to be afraid that the boycott could backfire.

"The Mexican government will not join boycotts of this nature," Foreign Minister Luis Ernesto Derbez said last week. All Mexican embassies and consulates in the U.S. will remain open.

On Tuesday, supporters of leftist presidential candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador passed out fliers in support of the boycott at a campaign rally in Mexico City. But center-right candidate Felipe Calderon said he opposed the action.

"I've felt the temptation to show solidarity with the movement," Calderon said in an interview. But "it's important to understand that the immigration problem can't and shouldn't become a conflict between countries."

Calderon said he worried that the boycott would lead to an even greater "anti-Mexican" sentiment in the U.S.

Ernesto Zamora, a 65-year-old Mexico City retiree, said his family would honor the boycott even though it didn't buy many American-made products. His son, who left for Los Angeles to work in construction some years back, called to tell his father about the boycott.

"We can show the support of Mexico for the Mexicans who are over there," Zamora said of the boycott. "They're good workers and it's not right that they want to send them back."

Voters May Target Illegal Status (LAT)

By Ashley Powers

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

As Congress debates the polarizing issue of immigration, the founder of an anti-illegal immigrant group is pushing for San Bernardino to outlaw day labor sites and bar the undocumented from renting property.

Joseph Turner, executive director of the group Save Our State, submitted voter petition signatures this week that would force a City Council vote or a citywide election on the measure, which would also deny city permits, contracts and grants to businesses that employ illegal immigrants, and require that city business be done in English.

The proposal comes as Congress tries to hash out its plan for immigration reform — a debate that has sparked rallies large and small around the country and rekindled the dispute over how best to deal with the nation's estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants.

The federal fight has trickled down to cities, including Maywood in Los Angeles County and Coachella in Riverside County, where officials have declared their towns sanctuaries for illegal immigrants. Costa Mesa was recently thrust into the national spotlight when it decided to allow police to check the immigration status of suspected felons.

The reaction to the proposal in San Bernardino has already ignited a fiery local debate.

"This is bigoted and I don't think Latinos will be the only ones who suffer. They're going to pick certain parts of the population to run out of town," said Marianna Gonzales of the National Alliance for Human Rights, a Riverside-based immigrant advocacy group.

City Councilman Chas A. Kelley praised the ordinance as creative lawmaking needed to cope with the city's undocumented residents.

"Most people obey the law and the law says you come to this country legally. Period," he said. "It's not cruel. It's not about being racist. It's obeying the law."

The Pew Hispanic Center estimates that Riverside and San Bernardino counties have about 215,000 illegal immigrants.

Latinos account for nearly half of the city of San Bernardino's 200,000 people, and city voters elected Judith Valles, the country's first Latina mayor of a city with a population over 100,000, to two terms in office. Josie Gonzales, the sole Latina on the county Board of Supervisors, represents a district dominated by San Bernardino.

The Southern California town that most recently waded into the immigration debate is Costa Mesa, a city of 110,000 whose council endorsed using its police officers to check the immigration status of suspected felons. The decision divided the city, triggered protests and may have played a role in the police chief's recent resignation.

"Local [immigration] legislation can often polarize a city, and you see that now in Costa Mesa," said UC Irvine professor Louis DeSipio, who specializes in ethnic politics.

"My suspicion is that it may create a long-term distrust between the immigrant community and native citizens."

DeSipio called city attempts at immigration law largely symbolic, since enforcement tends to be spotty. "It's a reaction to the perception that the feds are failing," the professor said.

Indeed, the San Bernardino proposal stemmed from Turner's view that larger government bodies were doing little to combat illegal immigration. Local leaders, in turn, were "aiding and abetting illegal aliens to get jobs and reside in our city," he said.

Turner also acted to prevent creation of a city-run day labor center, which San Bernardino leaders had discussed but never approved.

Under a rarely used provision of the city charter, Turner needs only 2,216 approved signatures for the proposal to be sent to the seven-member City Council, which would have to vote on the plan but could not alter it. If the council rejects the ordinance, a special citywide election must be held in 90 to 135 days.

Turner this week submitted about 3,100 signatures, which the county registrar of voters has to certify by May 4, three days after a planned national boycott of schools, workplaces and stores to protest congressional proposals against illegal immigrants.

"Is it divisive? Yeah. Is democracy divisive? Yeah," said City Councilman Neil Derry, who said he agreed with some of the proposal's tenets but questioned how they would be implemented.

The far-reaching ordinance would ban illegal immigrants from renting or leasing property, allow police to seize vehicles used to pick them up and punish businesses that employ them.

It would also preclude the city from funding or building day labor centers and force privately run centers to verify the immigration status of anyone using their sites, according to an analysis by the city attorney, who added that the law would be vulnerable to a court challenge.

"It's going to be a laughingstock," said Jesse Diaz, an organizer for the March 25 Coalition, which headed a rally for immigrant rights in downtown Los Angeles that drew an estimated 500,000 people.

"Something like that is not going to pass in a city that once elected a Latina mayor," he said.

Outside a San Bernardino Home Depot, day laborer Jose Enriquez, 29, said he relied on construction jobs to support his 10-year-old son in El Salvador. Any such crackdown would make it far harder for him to earn money, he said.

"I'm not looking to bother people or anyone," said Enriquez. "Police should go after drug dealers or people with guns, not people who are just looking for work."

Court To Decide Whether To Let Illegals Suit Proceed (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

Lawyers for employees of a Georgia-based manufacturer yesterday urged the Supreme Court to allow a lawsuit that accuses the flooring company of suppressing workers' wages by recruiting illegal aliens.

Even though the case involves the politically explosive matter of illegal labor, it arrived before the justices because of a dispute over the lawsuit's use of the Racketeering Influenced Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) -- a law traditionally used to prosecute organized crime.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. asked the lawyer representing the employees, who are backed by the Bush administration, why their accusations against Mohawk Industries, which appear to fit under general criminal conspiracy law, had been brought under RICO.

"I'm trying to give you an opportunity to tell why this case constitutes RICO, and you're telling me 'interstate commerce' and that it happened with more than one person," the chief justice said. "Those are things that can be handled by criminal conspiracy law."

Justice Stephen G. Breyer said allowing the case to go forward could effectively "RICO-ize vast amounts of commercial activities" that have "nothing to do with organized crime."

Winning parties in RICO cases can be awarded triple damages -- notably higher awards than winners in non-racketeering criminal cases. Congress expanded RICO in 1996 to include violations of immigration law.

The group of current and former Mohawk employees say the company violated RICO by systematically contracting outside recruiting firms to hire illegals. The lawsuit says Mohawk provided identification cards to illegal aliens, which helped them avoid detection by immigration authorities.

The case stalled after Mohawk filed a preliminary motion to have it dismissed, arguing that it was improperly filed under RICO on grounds the company's activities did not constitute a racketeering "enterprise" as described by the language of the law.

Carter G. Phillips, the lawyer who represented the company yesterday, told the justices that providing ID cards to workers was part of the company's regular personnel practices, not a racketeering enterprise.

Mohawk denies knowing that it had illegal aliens on its payroll.

The high court agreed to weigh in after two lower federal courts denied Mohawk's motion.

Court observers noted the greater immigration underpinnings of the case likely will not come to the forefront until the justices decide whether to allow the case to go forward under RICO or order it to be refiled under another criminal law.

Yesterday's debate "was only to discuss the motion to dismiss," said Lynda S. Zengerle, a prominent immigration lawyer in the District, who predicted the case would not be dismissed.

"It was basically like Clinton's 'what is the definition of is,' " she said, referring to the former president's grand jury testimony.

Justice David H. Souter was critical of Mohawk's effort to dismiss the case yesterday, saying the deeper issue at hand centered on whether the company was "providing cover for the illegal status of the aliens" it hired.

Justices Debate Illegal Hiring Case (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a case that could provide a new way to crack down on firms that hire undocumented immigrants, the Supreme Court on Wednesday considered whether companies could be charged with racketeering if they used contractors to hire undocumented employees.

The case was brought by employees of Mohawk Industries Inc., a Georgia carpet maker, who say the company depressed their wages by hiring undocumented immigrants.

The justices focused on narrow questions: Whether a firm and an outside contractor fit the definition of an "enterprise" under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations statute, or RICO, and whether corporations could be sued at all under a law originally meant to chase down the mob.

But with a handful of similar cases already in the courts, a decision for the Mohawk employees could generate numerous civil suits against businesses reliant on immigrants. The decision could also affect the use of RICO in criminal cases. The Justice Department, which had a lawyer in court to support the employees' argument, uses the law to send corrupt union leaders to prison and win financial damages from pension funds.

Some business groups say they are worried by the prospect of new RICO cases. "We don't think it's a proper use of the RICO statutes, frankly," said Laura Foote Reiff of the Essential Worker Immigration Coalition, a business alliance.

"Unless we get an immigration reform bill, we're going to see more and more RICO cases, and that's a huge problem for business and a misuse of the RICO statutes," Reiff said.

Congress is considering an overhaul of immigration laws that could include measures to allow more foreign workers to take jobs legally in the U.S.

Michael Hethmon, an attorney with the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which favors restrictions on all forms of immigration, said the case showed the federal government was unable to enforce immigration law.

"What we're seeing is a devolution of enforcement onto state and local officials and the citizens themselves through private actions," said Hethmon, who favors the use of the RICO law in immigration cases. "Congress intended this [RICO statute] to be a powerful tool. The needs for these kinds of tools are critical and the problems that are triggering this will only get worse."

The RICO statute was written in 1970 to prosecute the Mafia. In 1996, Congress expanded it to include immigration law violations and specifically included the hiring of undocumented workers. As a legal tool, it has the attraction of allowing plaintiffs to claim triple damages.

RICO laws can only be applied if an enterprise separate from the defendant exists. Currently, these enterprises are described mostly as groupings of individuals. On Wednesday, the justices considered whether a corporation and an outside contractor recruiting illegal immigrants qualified as an enterprise under the law.

A few of the justices indicated an unwillingness to interpret the RICO statutes in ways that could expand their use.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer asked if Congress meant for the 1996 expansion to "RICO-ize with criminal penalties … vast amounts of ordinary commercial activity." Justice Antonin Scalia said he did not want a decision that would let lower courts probe the way corporations conduct their daily business.

But Justice David H. Souter questioned Mohawk's lawyer about whether "a scheme to provide phony IDs" for workers brought by a contractor fit the RICO definition of an enterprise.

The defense counsel, Carter G. Phillips, argued that an alleged practice of issuing false IDs was "simply Mohawk conducting its own affairs." He argued that it could not be guilty of a RICO violation because it was conducting its regular business.

Justice Department attorney Malcolm L. Stewart countered that businesses being used as a front for drug dealing could argue that they should not be sued under RICO, as they too were simply conducting their normal business. Stewart also told the justices that appeals courts had ruled unanimously in favor of a plaintiff's use of RICO in immigration-related cases.

The Mohawk case is currently on hold while the company appeals a trial court judge's refusal to dismiss the case.

Other RICO cases in the works include a lawsuit against Tyson Foods Inc., brought by the same Chicago-based lawyer, Howard Foster, representing the Mohawk employees. That case will be heard in 2007.

Foster also represents Canyon County, Idaho, in a RICO suit against local employers that is now under appeal.

The case before the Supreme Court is Mohawk Industries Inc. vs. Shirley Williams, et al. A decision is expected by the end of June.

Gingrich Slams Immigration Plans (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich yesterday said the government's failure to enforce immigration laws resembles its handling of Hurricane Katrina, and described current reform proposals in Congress as a "con."

Mr. Gingrich said he sympathizes with illegal aliens participating in protests and placed blame for the illegal immigration problem on businesses and the federal government.

"I do not blame someone who leaves poverty to seek prosperity," Mr. Gingrich said during a speech at the American Enterprise Institute. "They showed up here to work under a social contract and then [the government] tried to change the terms.

"We need to quit lying about who is hiring illegals -- it's Americans," said the Georgia Republican who is considered a potential presidential candidate in 2008.

Mr. Gingrich's own immigration reform plan, "Ending the Dishonesty: The Way Forward on Border Control and Patriotic Immigration," calls first for gaining control of America's borders, followed by a worker-visa program.

Mr. Gingrich said private companies such as American Express should run the worker-visa program. Worker cards would include a biometric identification system and require immigrant workers to pay taxes.

"There's zero reason to believe the federal government can run this program," Mr. Gingrich said.

In addition, Mr. Gingrich said a worker-visa program would allow prospective citizens currently obeying immigration laws to come to America immediately.

Mr. Gingrich said he favors the deployment of security fences at points of high traffic flow along the U.S.-Mexico border supplemented by electronic security and surveillance at areas of lower traffic flow.

In the past two weeks, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat and potential presidential candidate in 2008, and Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean have called for increased border security.

Mr. Gingrich conceded he previously fell prey to amnesty compromises during his time in Congress. "I voted for the '86 bill," Mr. Gingrich said. "It sounded fantastic."

The House last year passed an immigration enforcement bill that calls for nearly 700 miles of new fences on the U.S.-Mexico border and requires employers to check Social Security numbers to ensure employees are legal workers.

DOJ_NMG_0027014

The Senate is heading in a different direction, with leaders saying they have a general agreement on a broader bill that would create a program for future foreign workers and would legalize many current illegal aliens, offering them a path to citizenship.

Majority Says Nationality Shouldn't Be A Factor In Immigration Policy (WSJ)

By The Wall Street Journal Online

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

With immigration reform a hot-button issue in Washington, a strong majority of Americans say nationality shouldn't be a factor in U.S. immigration policy, according to a new Harris Interactive poll.

Many Americans support favorable treatment of immigrants under certain conditions. For example, nearly three-quarters of those polled said children of U.S. citizens should receive favorable treatment in order to immigrate into the U.S. and 67% said spouses should receive favorable treatment.

Likewise, half of the 2,377 U.S. adults surveyed said they support favorable treatment of immigrants who "might be punished, imprisoned or tortured if they are sent home."

But about two-thirds of those polled said U.S. immigration policy shouldn't give preference to people from some countries over people from other countries, compared with 21% who said the U.S. policy should give preference.

Among the factors to be considered when admitting immigrants to the U.S., 56% said fluency in English should be considered, and 51% said job skills should be taken into account. About a third of those polled said level of education and country of origin should be factors, and only 6% said religion should be considered.

However, respondents were divided when asked if they think immigrants from some countries make "a bigger contribution" than others. A third of those polled said some make a bigger contribution, 34% said they "all equally contribute" and 33% said "not sure."

Harris Interactive conducted this online survey in the U.S., April 11-17, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 2,377 adults. Figures for age, gender, race/ethnicity, education, income and region were weighted where necessary to align with population proportions. Propensity score weighting was also used to adjust for respondents' propensity to be online. In theory, with probability samples of this size, one can say with 95% certainty that the overall results have a sampling error of +/- 3 percentage points of what they would be if the entire U.S. adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. This online sample is not a probability sample.

35 Senators Vow To Back Spending Veto (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

Thirty-five Senate Republicans signed a letter yesterday assuring President Bush they will back his veto of the emergency-spending bill for war efforts and hurricane relief if the final version exceeds his requested budget level.

"The Senate's willingness to support a veto reflects that we're not kidding about fiscal restraint and responsibility," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican.

The signatures indicate there are more than enough votes to prevent the Senate from securing the two-thirds vote needed to override a veto.

Mr. Bush threatened this week to veto the emergency-spending bill if it goes beyond his requested level of $92.2 billion, plus an extra $2.3 billion the Senate added for pandemic flu preparation. Many conservatives had privately urged Mr. Bush to step up and make the threat, since the Senate version currently stands at $106.5 billion and contains many extra, unrelated spending items they want out.

But the first few tests of senators' willingness to cut the bill didn't go well. Senators voted 49-48 to kill a proposal that would have stripped a highly contentious $700 million plan to reroute a railroad in Mississippi -- dubbed by critics as "the railroad to nowhere."

And 72 senators voted to kill an amendment that would have immediately stripped the Senate bill down to Mr. Bush's level. Sen. Craig Thomas, Wyoming Republican, offered this proposal, which 26 Republicans supported.

When asked about the seeming inconsistency between the Republicans' letter and the refusal by some to cut the bill, a Senate Republican aide noted that the letter refers to the final House-Senate version of the bill.

Mr. Thomas said most members "want to reduce the total" cost, but are still discussing what to cut, so he wasn't surprised his proposal failed.

Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, offered the railroad-stripping proposal as one of 19 separate proposals to cut items from the bill.

"Mississippi will win if this happens, but the future of our country loses," he said of the railroad plan. "It's not an emergency."

Mississippi's two Republican senators vigorously defended the plan and lobbied fellow members to keep it in the bill. They argued the rail must be moved north, out of the path of future hurricanes. Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, was the deciding vote that allowed the measure to remain.

Mr. Coburn's time-consuming crusade didn't sit well with everyone. Sen. Christopher S. Bond, Missouri Republican, was overheard sarcastically complaining to an aide "That's just what I want to do -- vote on his 19 amendments."

As Republicans struggled over what and whether to cut, Democrats accused Mr. Bush of hypocrisy yesterday for his veto threat, saying he and Republicans have plunged the nation into debt over the past five years.

"We had a surplus five years ago," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York said yesterday, referring to the end of her husband's tenure. "But the combination of this White House and this Republican majority has blown all of that to smithereens. This president has never vetoed anything, and now we finally get a veto threat on an emergency supplemental."

Mrs. Clinton, widely seen as a 2008 presidential hopeful, compared Republicans' call for spending restraint to a boy killing his parents and then asking the judge for leniency because he's an orphan.

But Republicans dismissed the hypocrisy charge as politics. Sen. Johnny Isakson, Georgia Republican, said Democrats "proposed a whole lot more spending than we did" over the past few years.

GOP Senators Spurn Bush's Order To Cut Bill (LAT)

By Richard Simon And Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Defying a White House veto threat, the Republican-controlled Senate on Wednesday refused to pare back an emergency spending bill sought by President Bush that lawmakers had expanded to include their own pet projects, which included items as diverse as aid for farmers and money to reroute a Mississippi railroad.

The vote was a direct rebuff of Bush by a number of GOP senators and underscored a growing party rift at a time when the president's popularity has sunk to new lows in public opinion polls.

"I might be intimidated by my constituents, but not the president," Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said in an interview.

The Senate vote against cutting the $106.5-billion bill was a lopsided 72-26, more than enough to override a veto.

About half of the chamber's Republicans joined most of its Democrats to reject the reduction proposal.

The bulk of the measure's money would pay for the ongoing expenses for the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan and for Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts.

But earlier this week, Bush said he would veto the bill if its bottom line was not trimmed.

Last month, the House passed a $91.9-billion spending bill, which closely tracked with Bush's initial request.

Despite the Senate vote, several GOP lawmakers pledged to continue to try to cut the bill's cost.

They included Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), who had encouraged Bush to issue his veto threat — an unusual step, given that the bill was crafted by other Republicans.

Bush has yet to veto a bill during his presidency.

Ultimately, Congress may send him a measure stripped of much of the funding he opposes.

"The bill we are debating is supposed to be about emergency spending — it's not an invitation to go on a shopping spree," Sen. Craig Thomas (R-Wyo.) said, pressing the case for cuts.

Still, the willingness of so many other Republicans to stand by the added spending requests starkly reflected the new political reality on Capitol Hill.

Until recently, Republicans almost always marched behind Bush's priorities — especially on issues involving the war on terrorism.

But Wednesday's vote illustrated his diminished clout, as well as lawmakers' differing political pressures.

Although Bush is not on the ballot this year, many GOP incumbents are. And they want to show constituents they are tending to their needs, even if that means running afoul of the White House.

The Mississippi railroad project has emerged as the most controversial addition to the spending bill.

Lott and the state's other senator, Republican Thad Cochran, said the railroad needed to be relocated for safety reasons. The tracks run along the Gulf Coast and could be easily damaged in another hurricane, they said.

The White House budget office has objected to using taxpayer funds to relocate a privately owned rail line. Officials have noted that the railroad owner, CSX Corp., has been using its own money to repair damage to the tracks caused by Hurricane Katrina.

But Lott, who served in the House for 16 years before winning his Senate seat in 1988, made clear he would not be swayed by such arguments.

"The very idea that presidents, Republican or Democrat, have the only say over what is in a budget is outrageous," Lott told reporters. "I got elected. I was here when Bush got here, and I'll probably be here when he's gone."

Lott dismissed Bush's veto threat as "totally irrelevant at this point," given that any bill the Senate passed would have to be reconciled with the version that the House approved.

"I guess he's under pressure to veto something," Lott said. He added, "Thank you for your input, Mr. President."

The emergency spending measure also became the latest battleground in Congress' debate on overhauling the nation's immigration system when the Senate approved, 59-39, a provision that would allocate $1.9 billion to tighten border security.

The new money aimed at stemming the flow of illegal immigration into the U.S. would not increase the bill's cost because it would be offset by cuts to defense-related spending in other parts of the measure.

Some Republicans said the provision could improve the prospects for passing separate legislation to toughen border enforcement while creating a guest-worker program and a potential path to citizenship for many of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants now in the country.

The immigration bill has stalled in part because Republicans disagree about whether it should focus solely on border security.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said the spending approved Wednesday could help build support for the broader approach to immigration, "because then we can convince our constituents that our first and most important priority is border security."

Democrats were skeptical that the spending provision for border security would affect the immigration stalemate.

"We hope it works, but it's too soon to tell," said a senior Democratic leadership aide who requested anonymity when discussing the legislative jockeying.

A number of Democrats opposed the border provision, saying that paying for it could harm U.S. troops by reducing defense-related funding. The foes included Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.).

But Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) broke with party colleagues to support the $1.9-billion proposal. "This is what people are calling my office and saying — that we need to secure the border."

Army Chief Laments Defense Budget Fights (AP-Y2)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP2, April 26, 2006

Americans spent as much on "plastic Santa Clauses," tinsel and other holiday purchases last year as they will for defense in the coming year, the Army's top general said Wednesday, lamenting complaints about the military's budget requests.

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, told reporters: "I just don't understand. ... What's the problem?"

Schoomaker said the defense budget the Bush administration requested for the fiscal year starting in October — nearly $440 billion — plus the costs of war in Iraq and Afghanistan, is 3.9 percent of the nation's nearly $13 trillion overall economy.

During World War II, military expenditures accounted for more than one-third of the economy, he said, calling today's piece of the pie the "lowest percent ... that we've ever spent in wartime."

"Here's what is amazing to me. ... What do you think we spent on plastic Santa Clauses and tinsel and all this stuff for Christmas last year ... the holidays?" Schoomaker asked during a meeting with reporters. "The answer is $438.5 billion, roughly equivalent to the defense budget."

The general said he got the figure on Christmas spending from a newspaper clipping quoting the National Retail Association.

The actual number from the National Retail Federation was a few billion less — $435.3 billion — and it was a projection for "winter holidays," meaning it included Thanksgiving turkeys and other seasonal spending, said federation spokeswoman Kathy Grannis.

Even so, the general's point was clear: America is a rich country, and he thinks it needs to spend more on defense.

Schoomaker was discussing his concern that it might take a fight to get enough money from Congress to rebuild the Army's equipment and supplies worn down in Iraq and Afghanistan. Officials have said the military would continue to submit requests for such money for at least two years after the last troops come home — which President Bush has said will probably be years from now.

"I've told Congress this," he said to a defense writers group. "I've told everybody this: What's the problem?"

"I mean I don't get it," Schoomaker said. "We've got a lot to be thankful for in this country, and we've got a lot to lose. And one of the first responsibilities of government is to defend the country. The Constitution says that."

Asked about Schoomaker's remarks, the No. 2 House Democratic leader, Rep. Steny Hoyer (news, bio, voting record) of Maryland, said he believed the general was frustrated over the budget pressures his agency is facing.

"My gut is, his real problem is he knows we're spending a very large amount on Iraq and Afghanistan and, at the same time, spending is squeezed very tightly in other areas" like training and equipment, Hoyer said.

The Bush administration recently requested an additional $68 billion for those wars for 2006. That would bring the total proposed for approval for this year for the wars to $118 billion.

Congress Democrats Eye Iraq Spending Talks (AP-Y2)

By Barry Schweid

Accusing the Bush administration of a failed policy in Iraq, all 23 Democrats on the House International Relations Committee on Wednesday demanded congressional hearings on what they said was waste and fraud in reconstruction efforts.

"No one has been held accountable," said Rep. Adam Schiff (news, bio, voting record), D-Calif. "More than $9 billion transferred to the CPA is missing," said Rep. William Delahunt (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., referring to the interim U.S. occupation institution, the Coalition Provisional Authority.

"We know nothing," said Diane Watson, D-Calif., at a hearing that several Democrats said was the first the committee held on Iraq this year. "We as decision-makers get nothing."

But panel Chairman Henry Hyde, R-Ill., said he had held nine hearings on Iraq, and Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (news, bio, voting record), R-Calif., said "many committees including ours" had reviewed the Iraq situation.

Tempers flared as Democrats accused President Bush of failure and the GOP-controlled committee of shirking its responsibilities. Only a few Republicans attended the session.

"It's a quagmire, it's a mess," said Rep. Betty McCollum (news, bio, voting record), D-Minn. "We should take our responsibilities seriously and hold Bush accountable."

There was no immediate decision on the Democrats' request, which was coupled with charges of "waste, fraud and abuse" in a letter to Hyde circulated by Rep. Tom Lantos (news, bio, voting record) of California, the committee's senior Democrat.

Mississippi Burning Tax Dollars (WSJ)

Just when you thought Republicans had sworn off pork spending, along comes an emergency appropriations bill that has Capitol Hill engulfed in the unmistakable aroma of bacon. President Bush has requested $92.2 billion for Iraq and hurricane relief, to which GOP Senators have added $14 billion or more in earmarks to benefit casino operators, condo developers, the shrimp and oyster industry, defense contractors, cotton and corn farmers and other urgent priorities. Mr. Bush threatens his first-ever veto unless the spending bill is cut back to below $95 billion.

Running to the taxpayers' rescue is Senate pork-buster Tom Coburn, last seen battling Alaska's infamous $233 million Bridge to Nowhere. As early as today the Oklahoma Republican will force an up-or-down vote on whether to strip the bill of $700 million for the proposed "Railroad to Nowhere." This pet project of Mississippi Republicans Trent Lott and Thad Cochran would reroute railroad tracks that CSX spent $250 million to repair after Hurricane Katrina. The Senators wish to make room for a new road that would just happen to service the gambling and beachfront condominium district of Biloxi.

Is this a good use of tax dollars? Mississippians don't think so. Last year Governor Haley Barbour's commission on recovery from Hurricane Katrina rejected the project as "no longer seen as practical" because of the steep price tag. If Mississippians don't want to foot the bill, why should federal taxpayers?

Fiscal-Conservatives-Come-Lately (NYT)

President Bush is threatening to veto this year's emergency budget supplement for the Iraq war and hurricane recovery efforts — he's suddenly shocked, shocked that his own Republican-led Senate has steadily inflated it with $14 billion in unrelated goodies. As if this sort of fiscal mayhem is not the now-familiar fallout from the administration's own signature fecklessness in adding to the record debt and deficit for future generations to handle.

This year's $92 billion "must pass" measure, while supposedly restricted to the pressing costs of the war and the post-Katrina Gulf Coast repairs, has been turned into a fiscal Christmas tree. Billions have been added for extra farm subsidies, highway repairs, higher education, veterans' health care and forest maintenance, and even a $15 million bauble for something that's called a "seafood promotion strategy."

Taxpayers interested in fiscal sanity should first wonder why, three years into the war, its costs are still being rushed through Congress by administration planners who are obviously wary of detailed accountability. No less irresponsible is the growing penchant of members of Congress to bypass the harsher tests of the regular budget process in favor of giving their pet projects a ride aboard the White House's annual "emergency" express. The $4 billion the Senate ponied up for extra farm subsidies certainly deserves a more serious look, considering that farm incomes have been booming, in part because of a record $23 billion in crop subsidies.

What's at the heart of the veto threat is an intramural Republican war over a feared mutiny by voters this November. House Republicans running as fiscal "hawks" (after years of cheerleading for the costly Bush tax cuts for the affluent) back the president's budget request; the Senate Republicans who are more concerned about popular spending programs opt for the add-ons. No one mentions the responsibility to find revenues to someday pay for all this, plus debt costs.

With his eye on a run for the White House, the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, one of the enablers of the administration's ongoing budget mess, scolded his colleagues to take care "not to blow the bank on the back of war." But the bank's already been blown.

Tony Snow, the new White House press secretary, made that point last month in his previous role as a conservative polemicist: "A Republican president and a Republican Congress have lost control of the federal budget."

Medicare Rule Guarantees Continuity Of Drugs (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 26 — The Bush administration issued a new policy on Wednesday that protects Medicare beneficiaries against the sudden loss of coverage for drugs they are taking under the prescription drug program.

Under the policy, insurers can still change their lists of covered drugs, known as formularies. But if they drop any drugs or impose new restrictions, they must exempt beneficiaries who are now taking those drugs.

Dr. Mark B. McClellan, administrator of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, summarized the policy this way: "In general, a plan cannot change your coverage for the drugs you are using during the year. The stability of drug formularies is extremely important for many of our beneficiaries."

The policy addresses one of the chief criticisms of the Medicare drug benefit. Democrats and a few Republicans in Congress had said it was unfair that drug plans could change their formularies at will while most beneficiaries were locked into a drug plan for the full year. This disparity was a major concern for many consumer advocates and for some beneficiaries.

The new policy says, "No beneficiaries will be subject to a discontinuation or reduction in coverage of the drugs they are currently using," with some limited exceptions.

An insurer could, for example, remove a drug from its formulary if new research showed that the drug was unsafe for some patients, or if a new low-cost generic version of a brand-name product became available.

The Bush administration issued the policy with less than three weeks remaining before the May 15 deadline for people to sign up for Medicare drug coverage. People who miss the deadline will generally not have another opportunity until November and will then face higher premiums as a penalty for late enrollment. People can switch plans at the end of each year without penalty.

Karen M. Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans, an industry trade group, said her organization supported the new federal requirement even though "it does not reflect common practice in the private sector," where employers provide drug coverage to millions of workers and retirees.

Ms. Ignagni said the federal policy "will have a financial impact," increasing costs for insurers under Medicare. But, she said, "you need to balance that with the goal of providing continuity of drug coverage and peace of mind to beneficiaries."

In most states, 40 or more drug plans are available. They differ in premiums, co-payments, deductibles and other details. Some plans cover fewer than 800 drugs. Some cover more than 1,800.

Insurers have many tools to manage use of prescription drugs. They can, for example, require doctors to get prior approval for prescriptions and can limit the number of pills given to a patient each month.

The policy says that an insurer can remove a drug from its formulary, increase co-payments or impose new restrictions "only if enrollees currently taking the affected drug are exempt from the formulary change for the remainder of the plan year."

Dr. McClellan, the Medicare administrator, said his agency had received 4,600 requests from drug plans that wanted to change their formularies. About 3,100, he said, involve the addition of drugs or relatively minor changes. About 1,500 requests involve more significant changes that will be covered by the new requirement, he said.

In a memorandum being sent to insurers, the Bush administration says the policy is needed to protect beneficiaries against "bait and switch" tactics in the drug benefit program, known as Part D of Medicare.

"Medicare beneficiaries select Part D plans, in part, based on the formulary that is marketed during annual open enrollment and therefore have a legitimate expectation that they will have continuing access to coverage of the Part D drugs they are using throughout the plan year," the memorandum says.

Nothing in the new policy fills the gap in coverage found in most plans. After incurring $2,250 in drug costs, beneficiaries typically must pay all of the next $2,850, until catastrophic coverage kicks in.

The policy was issued just as Senator Max Baucus of Montana and other Democrats were putting the final touches on a bill to increase protections for Medicare beneficiaries.

Dr. McClellan said insurers had legitimate reasons for changing formularies because "drug therapies are constantly evolving as new drugs are developed and new medical knowledge becomes available."

Tough Choices Can Be Side Effects Of Medicare Plan (USAT)

By Richard Wolf And Julie Appleby

USA Today, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — They are poor or near-poor, old, disabled or both. Some have cancer or AIDS, schizophrenia or bipolar disorder, spinal cord injuries or multiple sclerosis. Others have lists of medications as long as the alphabet.

They're paying more for their drugs, perhaps as little as $1 per prescription, but often thousands of dollars a year. Some buy on credit without knowing how they'll pay it off. Others scrimp on food and utilities or rely on the charity of family and friends.

When things get really bad, they space out their pills or injections, risking medical setbacks. They lose weight or swell up or get nauseated. Some wind up in emergency rooms.

They are the people that Medicare's new prescription-drug program has hurt, rather than helped. Most of the program's beneficiaries have saved money since it began Jan. 1. But for others, perhaps about 20%, the much-heralded program has meant higher costs, and in some cases greater pain and more worry.

“The people who need this the most can fight the least,” says Victoria D'Angelo of Denver, a former legal secretary now living on Social Security disability payments while battling bipolar disorder, asthma, high blood pressure and other ailments. “We don't have the strength. We don't have the mental ability.”

Before Medicare, 6.4 million of them had drug coverage through Medicaid. Others had state help or free drugs from drug companies. “They had good coverage before this program began,” says Ron Pollack of Families USA, a liberal health care advocacy group. Now, “there's a sizeable group that is actually worse off.”

On Wednesday, two advocacy groups and three patients sued the federal government in an effort to improve the plight of the 6.4 million people transferred from Medicaid to the Medicare plan.

“Our clients are poor, frail and disabled. They cannot afford to pay for their medicines or to go without them,” said Vicki Gottlich of the Center for Medicare Advocacy, which joined the National Senior Citizens Law Center in filing the lawsuit.

Since the Medicare program went into effect, many states have dropped their drug-assistance programs. Many drug companies have stopped accepting Medicare enrollees into programs that last year donated 35 million prescriptions to low-income people, according to the industry's trade group.

Among the manufacturers cutting back are Eli Lilly, AstraZeneca, Bristol-Myers Squibb and Wyeth. Ed Sagebiel, spokesman for Eli Lilly, says the program was “a bridge” to Medicare's drug benefit.

Companies such as Schering-Plough, Merck and Novartis have continued to provide free drugs to Medicare beneficiaries, due in part to an advisory opinion from the Department of Health and Human Services.

Medicare Administrator Mark McClellan has urged others to join them, “so beneficiaries can have the Medicare program and the assistance programs.”

Across the country, many low-income people face rising costs and dwindling health:

·In Denver, D'Angelo, 56, saw her drug costs under Medicare rise to more than $500 a month. Now they're even higher, because she has reached the “doughnut hole,” a period during which Medicare beneficiaries with high drug costs must pay for 100% of their prescriptions. Although she has cut back on her 22 medications, she recently put $2,679.19 on her credit card for a three-month supply. “I have no idea how I'm going to pay for it,” she says.

·In Jacksonville, mentally ill residents of Doug Atkins' assisted-living facility are refusing to spend part of their $54 monthly personal allowance on $1 and $3 drug co-payments. “They're saying they'll just go to the emergency room,” Atkins says.

·In Lafayette, La., Dorothy Broussard, 58, went a week in February without her arthritis and multiple sclerosis drugs because she was in the “doughnut hole.” Her prescriptions came to about $1,400 per month. “I almost passed out in the pharmacy.”

Class-Action Suit Targets Medicare (LAT)

By Rong-gong Lin Ii

The Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027021

A class-action lawsuit filed in federal court Wednesday alleges that Medicare has failed to properly enroll millions of low-income seniors and disabled beneficiaries into its new prescription drug plan.

The suit, filed in Oakland on behalf of three women and two senior-advocacy groups, also alleges that some low-income beneficiaries eligible for a subsidy were not properly notified about it or not receiving it. As a result of the problems, many seniors and others who qualify for the program are going without critical medication, said lead attorney Jeanne Finberg of the National Senior Citizens Law Center.

"The system simply isn't working," Finberg said. "Clients are falling through the cracks."

More than 6 million low-income senior and disabled beneficiaries, who had received drug coverage under Medicaid, the government health program for the poor, were required to be automatically enrolled into Medicare Part D plans Jan. 1. But that transfer was plagued by errors because databases to verify eligibility weren't ready or contained conflicting information.

Though he declined to comment directly on the suit, Medicare spokesman Peter Ashkenaz said the agency has resolved the enrollment problems it faced at the beginning of the year.

The lawsuit seeks a federal judge to issue a permanent injunction forcing Medicare to resolve the enrollment problems, inform drug plans that low-income beneficiaries are eligible for subsidies, and "take any and all other steps to ensure that plaintiffs and class members receive the full benefits of the Part D program."

1 In 5 Pay More In Medicare Rx Plan (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Medicare's new prescription-drug program has increased out-of-pocket costs for about one in five participants, causing some to risk their health by reducing or eliminating medications.

Though most of the more than 30 million beneficiaries enrolled in the program are saving money, two recent surveys suggest a substantial minority of seniors and people with disabilities are not:

·A Kaiser Family Foundation poll taken April 6-11 found 55% of 154 seniors who had enrolled said the plan would save them money, 19% said it would cost more, and another 19% said they would break even.

·A KRC Research poll taken March 15-20 for the Medicare Rx Education Network, a consortium of groups working to implement the law, found 59% of 201 enrolled seniors saved money, but 23% did not.

Both polls rely on small samples of beneficiaries and have large margins of error: +/-8 percentage points for the Kaiser poll, for example. But they confirm what had been predicted about the program since it went into effect Jan. 1: There are millions for whom the plan is increasing drug costs.

Among them: most of the 6.4 million low-income people transferred from state Medicaid drug programs. Most had no co-payments for drugs under Medicaid but now pay $1 to $5 per drug.

Others include those who used to get drugs for free from drug companies or at reduced cost in state programs; those who had less expensive employer retiree coverage; and those with little or no current drug expenses who signed up for a Medicare plan as a hedge against future costs. That last group is paying premiums but getting little or no benefit. Premiums will rise after the May 15 sign-up deadline for those not yet enrolled.

Medicare officials acknowledge that many low-income seniors and disabled Americans are paying more. They are urging drug companies and states to continue assistance to the poor who rely on expensive medications. “Any extra help they need can and should be provided by those other sources,” says Kathleen Harrington, director of external affairs at the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

In one case, a 59-year-old Newburgh, N.Y., man died in March after he stopped taking medications he could no longer afford, according to his pharmacist and his cousin. Eddie Rosa, whose death was first reported by the Middletown, N.Y., Times Herald-Record, lived alone and suffered from heart disease, diabetes, seizures and other mental and physical conditions.

Despite those illnesses, his pharmacist, Marty Irons, says, “I really think he'd be alive today if he had all his medicines.” Adds his cousin, Dolores Reano, “When Medicare came in, it just blew him away.”

When the Medicare drug program went into effect, Steve Worrell, 53, of Black Hawk, Colo., lost the free medications he had been getting from a drug company for his disabling arthritis. Faced with a $5,400 annual bill under Medicare, he spaced out his injections. His condition worsened. “You start swelling up, and you start twisting more,” he says.

Maria Oranje of Oakley, Calif., who turned 100 on Wednesday, is luckier. She takes 26 medications, but since she was switched from Medicaid to the Medicare program in January, her co-payments have been picked up by her daughter, Greta Heartfill, 62.

“If it wasn't for her living with me (and me) taking care of all this stuff,” Heartfill says of her mother, “she would not have been able to make it.”

Congress Is Studying Title-Insurer Practices (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal Staff Reporter

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In the wake of recent state and federal investigations into title insurance, lawmakers here are turning critical toward the industry.

A subcommittee of the House Financial Services Committee met yesterday, with an eye toward pushing for more consumer friendly competition in the title business.

Millions of Americans need title insurance in order to obtain a mortgage, because lenders want to be sure the properties that back their loans are free of outstanding claims or liens. Title insurers work to uncover such encumbrances, and issue policies that can protect the buyer or lender if any do turn up later.

Home buyers, however, are often unfamiliar with title insurance. A preliminary report by the Government Accountability Office notes consumers often rely on real-estate lenders and agents to find their title insurers. As a result, title agents normally market to those professionals, "creating a form of competition from which the benefit to consumers is not always clear."

Officials in Colorado, California and Washington, D.C., have investigated the industry in recent years, in some cases alleging that title companies paid what amounted to kickbacks to get business. Industry representatives contend there is competition, and prices properly reflect the cost of doing title searches.

Michael Oxley, chairman of the Financial Services Committee, indicated that Congress can do more to foment competition and said the investigations showed an "endemic problem."

"Consumers are paying home-purchase costs that are artificially high because of the lack of competition in real-estate services," he said. Erin Toll, the deputy insurance commissioner in Colorado, who has investigated the industry, told the panel, "The playing field is not level."

No Quid Pro Quo In Land Deal, Says W.Va. Democrat (WP)

By The Washington Post

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.) said this week that his purchase of farm property with a corporate chief executive has no relationship to his support for legislation providing a $2.1 million defense contract to the CEO's company.

Responding to a Wall Street Journal report published Tuesday, Mollohan said he and Dale R. McBride, head of FMW Composite Systems Inc. of Bridgeport, W.Va., have been close friends for 50 years.

Mollohan, who recently resigned from his position as the ranking Democrat on the House ethics committee because of a controversy over other investments, said he and McBride plan to use the 300-acre property for personal recreation, not for development.

Mollohan contended that he and McBride are equally at risk and equally responsible for paying off the eight-year, $900,000 mortgage they obtained from the previous owner, a widow.

"This has everything to do with friendship," he said, referring to the land acquisition. "This is totally 50-50," he added, saying that he received no special treatment from McBride.

Mollohan said he supported the $2.1 million contract for FMW after asking the same questions he applies to all decisions concerning money going to his home state: "Is it a good project, and does it mean jobs and economic development for West Virginia?"

The conservative National Legal and Policy Center filed a 500-page complaint against Mollohan with a U.S. attorney in February, challenging the accuracy of Mollohan's financial disclosure forms and detailing the run-up in Mollohan's wealth in recent years.

From 2000 to 2004, the congressman's holdings in real estate and other assets shot up in value from $562,000 to at least $6.3 million. Mollohan has argued that there is nothing untoward in the growth of his net worth, and that he has benefited from the surge in real estate values across the country.

In addition to winning approval of the contract for McBride's company, Mollohan used his position on the House Appropriations Committee to secure more than $150 million in appropriations for five nonprofit groups in his congressional district, including one run by a former congressional aide who, along with her husband, bought $2 million worth of property with Mollohan and his wife, according to an April 8 report in the Journal.

No Outcry About Lobby Scandal, Lawmakers Say (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum And Thomas B. Edsall

The scandal surrounding disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff has been a Washington obsession for months, but Republican lawmakers who returned from a two-week recess this week said they felt free to pass a relatively tepid ethics bill because their constituents rarely mention the issue.

The House is scheduled to vote today on ethics legislation to increase lobbyists' disclosures and require lawmakers to own up to the earmarks, or narrow projects, that they insert into appropriations bills. But the measure would not restrict the gifts or meals provided by lobbyists as House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) had proposed in January, nor would it expand the number of enforcers of lobbying rules and laws.

Lawmakers acknowledge that the bill is more limited in its scope and impact than the provisions promised by congressional leaders immediately after Abramoff's guilty plea to federal charges of bribery, conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud nearly four months ago. But they say they do not feel compelled to push more stringent measures partly because voters do not appear to be demanding them. "We're all being rushed into a bill," said Rep. David L. Hobson (R-Ohio). "We panicked, and we let the media get us panicked."

Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (R-Conn.), a former ethics committee chairwoman, said passage of the bill will have no political consequences because "people are quite convinced that the rhetoric of reform is just political."

Some Republican leaders assert that lawmakers are hearing little from constituents about the congressional corruption scandal, even though it has received considerable media attention. Jo Maney, spokeswoman for Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), a chief architect of the House ethics bill, said: "Many members have told him [Dreier] that they are not hearing about corruption and lobbying reform at home. They hear more about immigration, gas prices." Still, Dreier and Hastert "feel strongly" that the ethics bill "is the right thing to do" and that it will "improve the public's perception of the integrity of the House of Representatives," Maney added.

A Washington Post-ABC News poll this month showed that 63 percent of Americans called "corruption in Washington" important to their vote. Democrats are eager to use the lobbying controversy as part of their campaign to win back control of Congress this year, and they contend that the corruption issue can be a powerful Election Day weapon.

A poll this month by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press showed the public giving Democrats an edge on the ethics issue. Twenty-eight percent of Americans said they think the Republican Party governs in an honest and ethical way, compared with 36 percent who said the Democrats are more ethical, according to the survey. By a ratio of 45 percent to 28 percent, respondents said that Republicans are influenced more by lobbyists and special interests than are Democrats.

Democratic strategists say that the ethics issue does not carry a lot of weight by itself. They say that, to win over voters, they must link Republicans' alleged coziness with lobbyists to failures in Washington to address specific public needs, such as health-care coverage and economic security. "It is up to us to show the public what this means to them," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). For example, she said: "If [we] want to reduce our dependence on foreign oil, and therefore improve our national security situation, you can't do it if you are a Republican because you are too wedded to the oil companies."

Republicans won back control of the House and the Senate in 1994 after making Democratic political corruption part of the larger issue of arrogance of power and poor performance in government, according to Michael J. Malbin, executive director of the nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute. The Democrats' burden now, he said, is to make that larger connection to voters.

Republicans counter that Democrats have ethical problems of their own that blunt their effort to portray the GOP as the party of corruption. Two Democratic congressmen are facing separate, official inquiries about their connections to private pleaders: Reps. Alan B. Mollohan (W.Va.) and William J. Jefferson (La.). Both say they have done nothing wrong.

"The Democrat party runs a real risk here of being the pot that calls the kettle black," said Tracey Schmitt, press secretary of the Republican National Committee.

Some lawmakers and political analysts believe that voters could punish incumbents during the November elections if Congress passes a minimalist ethics bill. The chances of such a backlash could rise, these critics say, if there are more indictments or guilty pleas later this year. Abramoff and two former aides to Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) are cooperating with federal authorities in a wide-ranging investigation of political favors done in return for gifts, trips, payments and campaign contributions. DeLay, a once-powerful House majority leader, is fighting a criminal indictment in Texas on charges of political money laundering.

Some congressional historians assert that GOP leaders would be taking a risk in assuming that the lobbying bill is of such low voter priority that they could push through a modest plan without paying a political cost. "When you combine [the ethics issue] with the general dissatisfaction with the way in which we are governed," said L. Sandy Maisel, a professor of government at Colby College, "I think the breaking point might be near."

Today, the House plans to vote on a bill that would require lobbyists to file quarterly instead of semiannual disclosures and to include in those reports the donations they give to federal candidates and political action committees. Lobbyists would also have to make public the amount of any gift that they give to lawmakers or congressional aides. In addition, appropriations bills would have to list any earmarks that they contain, as well as the sponsors of those projects. Ethics training would become mandatory in the House under the legislation.

Government watchdog groups have complained that the legislation would not change much about how lawmakers and lobbyists interact. "It's a reform bill in name only, and they're hoping no one will notice," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington.

Tom Fitton, president of Judicial Watch, a conservative public interest organization, said one reason for the bill's weakness is that the public is not riled up about lobbying abuses. "The American people take the view that both parties are involved and there's not much surprising about it," he said.

Lawmakers Backtrack On Spending, Ethics Reforms (BSH/KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn, Knight Ridder

Biloxi Sun Herald, April 26, 2006

WASHINGTON - Just weeks after declaring themselves fiscal and ethical reformers, lawmakers are adding billions of dollars in special projects to a spending bill for the Iraq war while retreating from some of the lobbying restrictions they'd once touted as the antidote to a spate of scandals.

The House of Representatives is scheduled to vote Thursday on a package of ethics rules and measures designed to cut back on "earmarks," the special pork-barrel spending projects that routinely festoon congressional appropriations.

Government watchdog groups dismiss the House ethics proposals as cosmetic changes, but because some senior Republicans oppose even those as too binding, the outcome of the vote remained in doubt Wednesday.

In the Senate, lawmakers are working their way through a $106.5 billion bill that would pay for the war in Iraq and for hurricane-related costs. But the Senate version is $14.5 billion more than President Bush requested and could grow even bigger, larded with money for lawmakers' pet causes.

The White House this week threatened to veto the bill if it exceeded Bush's request. It made a special point of objecting to a $700 million railroad relocation in Mississippi added by the state's two Republican senators, Trent Lott and Thad Cochran. On Wednesday, 35 Senate Republicans sent a letter to Bush pledging to vote to sustain his veto if he casts it, enough to ensure that it would stick.

Yet Congress' continued appetite for unchecked spending and backpedaling on ethics illustrates how hard it is to change behavior that's ingrained in Washington's political culture. Many lawmakers believe that changing ethics rules would criminalize innocent conduct. Many lawmakers also believe that they - not government bureaucrats - know best how to spend federal money back home.

"My leadership doesn't think we have an ethics problem and doesn't believe in reform," said Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., one of the leading Republican advocates for tighter ethics rules. The pending legislation, Shays said, "has no redeeming feature."

Recent guilty pleas by lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., have spotlighted the crossroads of ethics and special-interest spending.

"Earmarks are the currency of corruption," said Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz.

The House bill would give lawmakers new powers to challenge legislation that contains earmarks, but advocates of more sweeping changes wanted to block members altogether from being able to add such individual spending items to bills. The proposed restrictions would apply only to appropriations bills, not tax or policy legislation, which also often contains special-interest favors.

The Republican chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Jerry Lewis of California, objects to restrictions on earmarks that affect only appropriations bills. Appropriators point out that another infamous spending proposal - the so-called $230 million "bridge to nowhere" in Alaska - was inserted into a massive transportation policy bill. It was eliminated only after a deluge of national publicity led the Senate to strike it.

Critics of the House bill say it also falls short on restricting lawmakers' access to privately paid travel and to corporate jets. The House legislation temporarily bans privately funded travel through the November election, but provides no permanent remedy.

Lawmakers currently reimburse corporations for use of their aircraft at a rate equal to that of a first-class ticket. But the cost of a corporate jet is significantly higher, amounting to a contribution to members of Congress. The legislation simply prohibits a company lobbyist from accompanying a lawmaker on such a flight.

Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif., the chairman of the House Rules Committee and lead author of the House bill, defended it as a "bold package of reform." He noted that former members of Congress who are lobbyists would no longer be allowed in the House gym or on the House floor and that lobbyists would have to disclose their clients and issues of interest with more frequency.

In the Senate, the spending bill for the Iraq war and the hurricane aftermath is considered "must pass" emergency legislation. That means it can't be blocked easily through parliamentary maneuvers. As a result, the bill has become a popular bipartisan vehicle for additional spending.

One of the biggest extra provisions was inserted by Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., whose ties to Abramoff have made his race for re-election difficult. Burns inserted $3.9 billion to help farmers hurt by any natural disaster, not just last year's hurricanes. The money includes aid to offset the high costs of oil, making agriculture one of the few industries to get energy-related assistance.

"No other industry in this country buys retail, sells wholesale and pays freight both ways," Burns said.

The Senate did manage to show a bit of restraint Wednesday. It tacked on to the bill $1.9 billion for border security while reducing military spending by a similar amount, but that was an exception.

Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour was in the Capitol on Wednesday lobbying for the $700 million to relocate a railroad line inland from the coast and build a highway to correct coastal bottlenecks. Critics have come to call the project "the railroad to nowhere."

"A lot of people get focused on the railroad who don't understand the purpose of moving the railroad is so we can replace it with a highway," Barbour said.

Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., a staunch critic of earmarks, offered an amendment Wednesday to eliminate 19 earmarks from the bill.

"This is a good plan in Mississippi," he said. "It's just not a plan that the people of the rest of the country ... ought to be asked to do."

But the Senate voted 49-48 early Wednesday evening to kill Coburn's bid to knock out the $700 million for Mississippi's project. And among those voting against Coburn were several of the 35 senators who had pledged earlier in the day to back Bush's veto if he cast it.

GOP Split Over Earmarks In Ethics Bill (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams

AP2, April 26, 2006

House approval of legislation to tighten lobbying and ethics rules was complicated Wednesday by a Republican split over how to deal with the issue of earmarks, those narrow and often wasteful pet projects that make their way into bigger bills.

With a vote on the lobbying package scheduled for Thursday, the GOP leadership was trying to resolve concerns, coming mainly from Republicans on the House Appropriations Committee.

The lobbying bill, which requires lobbyists to report more frequently on their work to influence lawmakers and temporarily bans privately sponsored travel by House members, allows lawmakers to raise points of order against appropriations, or spending bills, that do not properly identify earmarks.

But Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., said it was unfair that the crackdown on earmarks was limited to spending bills, and did not apply to tax and authorization, or policy, bills.

A reform bill that "does not touch on the 'Bridge to Nowhere' is not really reform," Lewis said Wednesday. Two proposed bridge projects with a cost of some $450 million, in sparsely populated areas of Alaska, were highlighted as among the more egregious of thousands of earmarks that made their way into a major highway bill the Congress passed last year.

Appropriations Committee spokesman John Scofield said appropriators were not out to defeat the lobbying bill, only to improve it.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said they would continue working on the differences over earmarks. "Going after those earmarks, bringing more transparency and more accountability to that process, will in fact lead to less numbers of earmarks," he said.

"We're trying to open the process," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill. "And anytime you do that, people have their own views. It's hard to change things around here, but that's what we're committed to do."

The Senate overwhelmingly passed its version of lobbying reform last month, but the House measure has hit much more resistance, with Democrats and good government groups arguing that the bill is too weak to have any real effect on lobbying practices that led to the scandal of disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the bribery conviction of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif.

The Senate bill bans all gifts and meals from lobbyists and doubles to two years the waiting period before a retiring lawmaker can take a job lobbying Congress. It also requires lobbyists to disclose their participation in grassroots lobbying campaigns, where the general public is encouraged to contact lawmakers through phone calls and ads.

The House leadership has also decided to attach to the lobbying bill a measure passed by the House earlier this month that limits donations to nonprofit political groups known as 527s. Such groups tended to back Democrats in the 2004 presidential election, and Senate Democrats have said they will oppose any lobbying bill that includes the campaign finance measure.

Stabenow Campaign Corrects Finance Records (AP)

By Ken Thomas

The Associated Press, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Debbie Stabenow's campaign has corrected her campaign finance reports to show that some donations from 2002 and 2003 came from an Indian tribe then represented by now-disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, not an individual as she reported at the time.

Stabenow's campaign originally reported that $4,000 in donations came from Christopher Petras, who was the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe's legislative director at the time. The donations came during a period in which Stabenow and other Michigan lawmakers sought funding for the tribe and wrote letters to federal regulators on the tribe's behalf.

The campaign wrote the Federal Election Commission on April 14 to correct the report to show the donations came from the tribe. Records originally listed Petras as giving Stabenow's campaign $2,000 on March 6, 2002, and an equal amount on June 30, 2003. Copies of the checks showed the first was dated Feb. 20, 2002, and the second June 2, 2003.

Stabenow campaign manager Tom Russell said Wednesday the tribe made the contributions and the error was "a glitch in filing the report which was corrected" as soon as it learned of the problem. He said the computer system attached Petras' name to the donations because he was listed as a contact for the tribe.

The wealthy Mount Pleasant, Mich., tribe, which operates a casino, contributed $308,980 during the 2002 campaign cycle and $564,480 during the 2004 campaign, according to campaign finance watchdog group PoliticalMoneyLine.com.

The tribe received $3 million in funding approved in November 2003 to build a school on the reservation. Earlier this month, tribal leaders asked that the funding be redirected to other federal programs.

Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in January to federal charges of conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud, turned to Republicans, including Sen. Conrad Burns of Montana, to overcome the Bush administration's objection to providing the school funding for the tribe.

Stabenow, Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., and Rep. Dave Camp, R-Mich., wrote the Interior Department on Jan. 23, 2003, and again on July 14, 2003, regarding the funding. The tribe made campaign donations to the three lawmakers, but they have said there was no connection between the letters and the donations.

Burns has said he acted at the Michigan lawmakers' request and wasn't influenced by Abramoff. His campaign has returned or donated to charity about $150,000 linked to the lobbyist.

Brian Nick, a National Republican Senatorial Committee spokesman, said it appeared that "Stabenow received thousands of dollars just before taking actions on behalf of a close associate of convicted felon Jack Abramoff, and now years later has gone back and doctored her campaign report in an attempt to avoid scrutiny."

Democrats Urge Hearings Into VA Contract (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche

Los Angeles Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats on the House Veterans Affairs Committee called for hearings Wednesday into a multimillion-dollar contract awarded to a firm now headed by former Veterans Affairs Secretary Anthony J. Principi.

Principi is chairman of the board of QTC Management Inc., a Diamond Bar company that administers medical exams under contract for the VA. In a two-page letter to Rep. Stephen E. Buyer (R-Ind.), chairman of the House panel that oversees the VA, seven Democrats asked for investigations into exam costs by the company and into possible conflicts of interest in awarding the contract.

"Our committee should review the facts and circumstances involving Mr. Principi and the QTC contracts to determine if there was any wrongdoing," the letter said. It sought a hearing date no later than Oct. 6.

Buyer could not be reached for a response Wednesday.

Principi previously told The Times that he fully complied with federal ethics laws, and that as VA secretary for four years he played no role whatsoever in the awarding or administration of the contracts. Under the contracts, QTC conducts exams on veterans applying for disability benefits.

Principi, who was the president of QTC when he was nominated for the top VA job in late 2000, said he divested himself of all interests in the firm before being sworn in as secretary. He also said he had never heard of QTC until mid-1999, when he was recruited for the top job at the company by a headhunting firm. Principi had served as a top VA official under former President George H.W. Bush.

Officials of the American Federation of Government Employees issued a statement criticizing the contract.

"This is a conflict of interest in the most extreme form," said union President John Gage, adding that the exams could be performed by VA staffers at a far lower cost.

Gage called award of a contract to a firm connected to a political appointee "flat wrong," and said the case "should definitely raise red flags with members of Congress."

The Times reported Sunday that data compiled by a consulting firm in 1999 estimated that the cost of the QTC exams was as much as 400% higher than in-house exams. The consultants recommended that the VA do a follow-up study to get more precise cost data on the in-house costs. It was never conducted.

In their letter to Buyer, the seven House Democrats, including ranking member Lane Evans (D-Ill.), said the full committee "should address if the leader of an organization who has essentially divested himself from a prior business interest can, even unintentionally, influence the award of a business contract or provide an advantage to his former firm."

As Principi has pointed out, he was not at the VA or QTC when the firm first won a contract from the VA in 1998. The firm won a second contract in 2003, while Principi was running the VA. It has been revised by amendments and remains in effect today.

Congressional Budget Office projections show the firm's VA contract could be worth as much as $1.2 billion in fees if fully funded by Congress through 2008.

VA officials said the agency complied with bidding requirements by publicly advertising for bids 30 days before an October 2002 deadline. QTC was the only firm to submit a proposal. Officials of other firms said they were not aware the contract was up for bid, though they had previously expressed interest to the VA.

Stuck With Bush (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

If George W. Bush could have been removed from office for being a bad president, he would have been sent back to his ranch a long time ago.

If incompetence were a criminal offense, he'd be behind bars.

But that's just daydreaming. The reality is that there are more than two and a half years left in the long dark night of the Bush presidency — nearly as long as the entire time John Kennedy was in office.

The nation seems, very belatedly, to be catching on to the tragic failures and monumental ineptitude of its president. Mr. Bush's poll numbers are abysmal. Republicans up for re-election are running from him as if he were the bogyman.

Callers to conservative talk radio programs who were once ecstatic about the president and his policies are now deeply disillusioned.

The libertarian Cato Institute is about to release a study titled "Power Surge: The Constitutional Record of George W. Bush." It says, "Unfortunately, far from defending the Constitution, President Bush has repeatedly sought to strip out the limits the document places on federal power." While I disagree with parts of the study, I certainly agree with that particular comment.

In the current issue of Rolling Stone, Sean Wilentz, a distinguished historian and the director of the American Studies program at Princeton University, takes a serious look at the possibility that Mr. Bush may be the worst president in the nation's history.

What in the world took so long? Some of us have known since the moment he hopped behind the wheel that this reckless president was driving the nation headlong toward a cliff.

The worst thing he did, of course, was to employ a massive campaign of deceit to lead the nation into a catastrophic war in Iraq — a war with no end in sight that has already claimed tens of thousands of lives and inflicted scores of thousands of crippling injuries.

When he was a young man, Mr. Bush used the Air National Guard to hide out from the draft in a time of war. Then, as president, he's suddenly G. I. George, strutting around in a flight suit, threatening to wage war on all and sundry, and taunting the insurgents in Iraq with a cry of "bring them on."

When the nation needed leadership on the critical problem of global warming, Mr. Bush took his cues from the honchos in the oil and gasoline industry, the very people who were setting the planet on fire. Now he talks about overcoming the nation's addiction to oil! This is amazing. Here's the president of the United States scaling the very heights of chutzpah. The Bush people and the oil people are indistinguishable. Condoleezza Rice, a former Chevron director, even had an oil tanker named after her.

Among the complaints in the Cato study is that the Bush administration has taken the position that despite validly enacted laws to the contrary, the president cannot be restrained "from pursuing any tactic he believes to be effective in the war on terror."

This view has led to activities that I believe have brought great shame to the nation: the warrantless spying on Americans, the abuses at Abu Ghraib, the creation of the C.I.A.'s network of secret prisons, extraordinary rendition and the barbaric encampment at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, in which detainees are held, without regard to guilt or innocence, in a nightmarish no man's land beyond the reach of any reasonable judicial process.

The sins of the Bush administration are so extensive and so egregious, they could never be adequately addressed in a newspaper column. History will be the final judge. But I've no doubt about the ultimate verdict.

Remember the Clinton budget surplus?

It was the largest in American history. President Bush and his cronies went after it like vultures feasting in a field of carcasses. They didn't invest the surplus. They devoured it.

Remember how most of the world responded with an extraordinary outpouring of sympathy and support for America in the immediate aftermath of Sept. 11?

Mr. Bush had no idea how to seize that golden opportunity to build new alliances and strengthen existing ones. Much of that solidarity with America has morphed into outright hostility.

Remember Katrina?

The major task of Congress and the voters for the remainder of the Bush presidency is to curtail the destructive impulses of this administration, and to learn the lessons that will prevent similar horrors from ever happening again.

Freddie's Friends On The Hill (WSJ)

It's well-known that Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac have good friends on Capitol Hill. But last week the Federal Election Commission shed some light on how Freddie Mac rewarded its friends. In a settlement with the FEC, Freddie admitted to illegally raising $1.7 million for candidates from both parties between 2000 and 2003. In 2001 alone, Freddie Mac's Senior Vice President for Government Affairs boasted of holding 40 fund-raisers for House Financial Services Committee Chairman Michael Oxley.

Unfortunately for Freddie, it is explicitly barred by law from political fund-raising. In the settlement, Freddie agreed to fork over $3.8 million in fines. Yet Freddie probably figures it also got its money's worth. Genuine reform of the two giant "government-sponsored enterprises" is now stalled on Capitol Hill, thanks in large part to Mr. Oxley's dutiful service.

Which means it's time for reformers to turn to Plan B. The Bush Administration could itself take the opportunity to rein in Freddie and Fannie. An overlooked provision of the laws that founded the two companies already gives the Treasury Secretary the power to restrict the duo's mortgage portfolios that now threaten the U.S. financial system.

First, some background. Fan and Fred have lower costs of capital than their competitors because of the market perception that the government stands behind their debt. This, in turn, is indispensable to their business model. Fannie and Freddie between them hold more than $1 trillion worth of mortgage-backed securities that they've bought with this cheaper credit.

To make it all work, Fannie and Freddie must carefully balance the risks that arise from interest-rate movements, mortgage prepayments and the different maturities of their debts and assets. The monumental accounting troubles that both companies have had in recent years centered around how they account for those risks and the hedges they use to mitigate them. The danger that those portfolios could melt down has led critics such as Alan Greenspan and his successor at the Federal Reserve, Ben Bernanke, to warn that Fan and Fred pose a "systemic risk" to the financial system if the size of their portfolios is not reduced.

It took Congress just weeks to pass Sarbanes-Oxley in 2002. But -- perhaps because Mr. Oxley has been spending so much time at Freddie's fund-raisers -- it can't seem to deal with the far larger financial problems at Fan and Fred. A watered-down reform bill has passed the House, but a stronger bill in the Senate shows no sign of being brought up for a vote anytime soon. Securities analysts have been telling investors they believe the drive to rein in the duo is losing momentum. Freddie Mac's president and COO recently concurred in public. He added that strict limits on retained portfolios would not be in the "best interest of the housing finance industry." By which he meant the best interest of Fannie and Freddie.

Portfolio limits are, however, in the interest of American taxpayers and the integrity of the financial system. The law requires that the bonds that Fannie and Freddie issue explicitly deny that they are backed by the federal government, but plainly no one believes that. Otherwise, who in their right mind would purchase the debt of Fannie Mae, a company with no financial statements and $11 billion in overstated profit?

This type of situation was foreseen when Fan and Fred were chartered. Which is why the same sections of the U.S. Code that require Fannie and Freddie to disavow any government backing of their debts also require the companies to get the approval of the Treasury Secretary before issuing any debt.

Specifically, the law pertaining to Fannie reads: "[T]he corporation is authorized to issue, upon the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and have outstanding at any one time obligations having such maturities and bearing such rate or rates of interest as may be determined by the corporation with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury . . ." (our emphases). The section of the law dealing with Freddie Mac has similar language.

As we read that, Treasury already has the power to limit Fannie's and Freddie's borrowing. What's more, that authority appears to have been granted specifically out of concern that the debts of the pair might someday be laid at Treasury's doorstep. But without massive borrowing, neither Fannie nor Freddie could afford to hold the hundreds of billions of securities that they currently do. So limiting their borrowing would require them to decrease the size of their portfolios -- and hence the risk to the economy of a blow-up. Meanwhile, their regular business of securitizing mortgages and selling them would be unaffected. It is their repurchase of those mortgages with subsidized credit that needs to be limited.

The Bush Administration has been forceful in calling for Congress to reform how Fannie and Freddie are regulated and run. But if it wants its effort to succeed, it is going to have to show Fan and Fred and their friends on the Hill that Treasury will act if Congress doesn't.

Sales Of New Homes, Factory Orders Surge (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

A jump in demand for commercial aircraft pushed orders for big-ticket manufactured goods higher last month while sales of new homes shot up at the fastest pace in 13 years, reflecting a rebound from bad weather in February.

Both reports depicted an economy continuing to expand at a healthy pace, a view supported by a survey of business conditions across the country released yesterday by the Federal Reserve.

The Fed's 12 regional banks used words such as "solid" and "steady" to describe the economy's performance last month and early this month. The Fed did note that "higher energy prices were at the forefront of most districts' mention of cost pressures," and that was before crude oil soared to a record $75.17 per barrel Friday.

Some analysts said the strong growth plus rising inflation pressures will mean the central bank's rate-setting Federal Open Market Committee (FOMC) will raise rates for a 16th time at its next meeting in May and will keep going after that.

"The U.S. economy is firing on all cylinders right now, and there is little to no slack left," said Sherry Cooper, chief economist at Harris Bank. "This makes it increasingly unlikely that the Fed will pause after the May 10 FOMC meeting."

The Commerce Department reported that sales of new single-family homes rose 13.8 percent last month to a seasonally adjusted annual sales rate of 1.213 million units. The increase represented a recovery from a 10.9 percent February sales plunge.

But the median price of homes sold last month dropped to $224,200, down 2.2 percent from the market prices of March 2005. It marked the first time home prices dropped over a 12-month period since December 2003.

Home prices last year were soaring as eager buyers bid more to get into a sizzling home market. However, analysts think sales, which set records for five straight years, will decline this year by about 10 percent under the impact of rising mortgage rates.

"With interest rates continuing to rise, all signs point to a further weakening in sales just down the road," said Patrick Newport, an economist at forecasting firm Global Insight.

Rates on 30-year mortgages rose last week to 6.53 percent, the highest level in nearly four years, with economists forecasting that they could be about 7 percent by the end of this year.

Home sales were up in all areas of the country last month, led by a 35.7 percent surge in the West and followed by gains of 10.9 percent in the Midwest, 6.9 percent in the South and 4.7 percent in the Northeast.

The government also reported that orders to U.S. factories for big-ticket manufactured goods soared by 6.1 percent last month, the biggest gain in 10 months. Two-thirds of the increase reflected a 71.1 percent jump in demand for commercial aircraft.

The overall increase, which followed a 3.4 percent February advance, was more than three times the advance Wall Street had been expecting. Manufacturing is expected to remain strong in coming months as businesses restock lean inventories and boost spending to expand and modernize.

"Businesses remain confident in the economic outlook and are committing to significant capital investments," said David Huether, the National Association of Manufacturers' chief economist.

In contrast to the big surge in new home sales last month, sales of previously owned homes edged up a much smaller 0.3 percent, the National Association of Realtors reported Tuesday.

Both reports, however, showed that the number of unsold homes on the market at the end of the month rose to record levels, a development that was expected to depress price gains in coming months.

The number of new homes remaining on the market last month rose to a record 555,000, up 2.8 percent from February.

More on the Fed's thinking may be known after Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke testifies on the economic outlook today before Congress' Joint Economic Committee.

U.S. Economy: Durable Goods Orders, Home Sales Surge (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Carlos Torres

Bloomberg, April 27, 2006

April 26 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. economy powered ahead in March as manufacturing orders surged and new home sales rose by the most in more than a decade.

Orders for durable goods rose 6.1 percent, the Commerce Department said in Washington today, more than three times the median forecast of economists surveyed by Bloomberg News. Home sales increased 13.8 percent, the most since April 1993, to an annual rate of 1.213 million.

The reports sent yields on 10-year Treasury notes to the highest since 2002 and traders increased bets the Federal Reserve will lift interest rates twice more before the end of June. Improving business demand and little slowdown in housing run counter to the Fed's forecast that growth will moderate after the first quarter.

``The numbers we're getting all indicate that the economy has maintained a large amount of momentum and that's obviously a concern to the Fed and will likely force their hand," said Joel Naroff, president of Naroff Economic Advisors in Holland, Pennsylvania.

Labor markets are ``tightening" and companies are struggling with higher energy prices because they're finding it difficult to pass those costs on to their customers, the central bank said today in its regional survey of the economy. Three of the 12 regional Fed banks described the economic expansion as ``solid," while others said the rate of growth was ``modest, moderate or steady."

First Quarter

The durable goods report, which measures bookings for items made to last at least several years, is one of the final pieces of information feeding into economists' forecasts for economic growth in the first quarter, which will be reported on April 28. Excluding transportation equipment, orders rose 2.8 percent.

The world's biggest economy probably expanded at a 4.9 percent pace in the first quarter, the fastest since the third quarter of 2003, according to economists surveyed by Bloomberg.

Today's figures come on the heels of data yesterday that showed consumer confidence at a four-year high and an unexpected increase in sales of previously owned dwellings.

``If one were looking for additional weakness in the economy, it's not going to come from housing," said Gerald Zukowski, deputy chief economist at Nomura Securities International Inc. in New York. ``We are seeing the economy generate a fair amount of momentum."

Shares of U.S. homebuilders advanced. The Standard and Poor's index of 16 homebuilding companies rose 1.5 percent, compared with rise in the S&P 500 of 0.3 percent.

New Home Sales

New home sales, recorded when a contract is signed, are considered by economists a leading indicator of the housing market. Economists expected new home sales to rise to a 1.11 million rate from February's originally reported 1.08 million, according to the median of forecasts in a Bloomberg News survey.

At the same time, the median price of new homes sold dropped 2.2 percent to $224,200 from the same month last year, marking the first such year-on-year drop since December 2003.

American companies are using growing profits to replace outmoded equipment and add factory space. They are also likely to increase production and orders to replenish stockpiles that have dwindled to near-record lows, helping sustain economic growth as consumer spending moderates, economists said.

``It looks like second-quarter business spending will be gang-busters," said Chris Rupkey, senior financial economist at Bank of Tokyo-Mitsubishi UFJ Ltd. in New York.

Aircraft

Boeing Co., the world's second-biggest maker of commercial aircraft, received orders for 112 planes in March, up from 25 the previous month. Boeing today said first-quarter earnings rose 29 percent, helped by the biggest jump in airliner deliveries in five years.

Caterpillar Inc., the world's largest maker of earthmoving equipment, reported yesterday that profit jumped 45 percent in the first quarter compared with the same time last year as sales rose 17 percent in North America. The company has raised prices as much as 13 percent in the past two years as their plants ran at full capacity to keep up with orders.

Economists expected orders to rise 1.8 percent in March, based on the median of 68 forecasts. Estimates ranged from no change to a 4.8 percent rise. The increase in durable goods orders for February was revised to 3.4 percent from 2.7 percent.

Treasury notes fell, pushing the yield on the 10-year note up 3 basis points to 5.10 percent, as investors speculated the Fed will raise its benchmark rate to 5.25 percent by the end of June. Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke testifies to Congress on the economic outlook tomorrow.

Forecasts

Business spending probably rose at an annual rate of 13 percent in the first three months of the year, helping the economy expand 5 percent, according to a forecast by economists at JPMorgan Chase Bank in New York. The increase in investment would be the biggest since the second quarter of 2004.

Inventories of durable goods increased 0.7 percent after a 0.4 percent drop in February. Unfilled orders, a gauge of future production, jumped 2.8 percent, the biggest increase since last November.

``We are seeing substantial orders," Robert Akins, chief executive officer of Cymer Inc., a maker of lasers used in producing semiconductors, said in an interview last week.

Chipmakers ``have finally reached the maximum capacity of their factories and they are ordering new equipment to equip the old factories as well as the new ones," he said.

Cymer said on April 18 that its first-quarter profit jumped almost fourfold. The following day, its biggest customer, Veldhoven, Netherlands-based ASML Holding NV, forecast increased shipments of chip-making machines this quarter on rising demand for processors used in cell phones and music players.

Durable Goods Orders In US Beat Forecasts (FT)

By Christopher Swann

Financial Times, April 27, 2006

US durable goods orders surged by 6.1 per cent in March, more than three times faster than analysts had been expecting.

The figures suggest that US industry remains in extremely strong shape and increase the chances that the Federal Reserve may need to continue raising interest rates beyond 5 per cent.

The Federal Reserve's Beige Book, a summary of reports on economic activity by regional agents, said that orders or revenues in the manufacturing sector continued to come in ahead of levels seen a year ago. In addition: "A majority of districts note that labour markets, at least for skilled workers, are tight or tightening."

The Fed said retail sales – excluding the vehicle sector – also appeared firmer. Activity in the service sector had also been expanding, the Fed added.

But it continued to say that higher energy costs were not feeding through into broader inflation. "Businesses continue to have limited ability to raise their selling prices," the Fed said.

The bulk of the rise in durable goods orders was due to a 14 per cent increase in transport orders, with civil aircraft sales climbing 71 per cent. Boeing reported bookings for 112 aircraft in March, up from 25 in February.

Excluding the volatile transport sector, orders rose by 2.8 per cent. Economists had expected a rise of just 1 per cent.

"Overall this is nothing but good news," said Paul Ashworth, an analyst at Capital Economics.

Economy's Surge Stirs Questions About When Slowdown May Come (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey And Greg Ip

DOJ_NMG_0027032

The latest readings suggest the nation's economy is carrying significant momentum into the second quarter, raising new questions about when a slowdown might come after a torrid start to the year.

By most accounts, the economy surged in the first quarter after a brief lull late last year. When the government releases its first estimate tomorrow, economists expect it to say the economy grew at a roughly 5% annual rate in the quarter.

But over the rest of the year, Federal Reserve officials expect growth to moderate to a long-term rate of 3% to 3.5%, slow enough to keep inflation at bay but fast enough to keep unemployment from rising. That would permit the Fed to stop the campaign of interest-rate increases it began in June 2004.

This week, however, the economy has been sending signals that it might not be ready to settle down. The housing market, though softer, is holding up better than many skeptics predicted and consumer confidence remains surprisingly strong, despite soaring gasoline prices, and concerns about President Bush's handling of the economy. Meanwhile, solid job creation and wage gains are providing a cushion for consumer spending, and orders for capital equipment are picking up.

Yesterday, the Commerce Department said new-home sales jumped 13.8% in March from a month earlier, erasing much of the 15.8% decline seen over the two previous months. It also reported that orders for durable goods -- items such as tractors and washing machines that are meant to last three years or more -- rose 6.1% last month on the back of strong aircraft orders at Boeing Co. More important, orders for capital goods, excluding aircraft and defense, usually a good indicator of future business spending, broke out of a recent slump last month to post a 3% gain.

"What we're seeing now is telling us about the momentum going into the second quarter," said Julia Coronado, senior economist at Barclays Capital. "It seems to be pretty strong."

The flow of indicators these days is particularly important because the Fed has said that prospects for further increases in short-term interest rates -- beyond an expected quarter-point increase next month to 5% from 4.75% -- will depend on what new economic data show. At their last meeting in March, Fed officials appeared to think they could pause after rates reached 5%.

But the spate of strong data has prompted futures markets to raise the probability of further increases to more than 50%, and the inflation-wary bond market has sold off recently. Yesterday, bond prices fell again, and the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose to 5.107%.

The Fed's latest roundup of business conditions, also released yesterday, suggested no slowdown is yet under way. "Economic activity continued to expand in March and the first half of April," the Fed said in its "beige book" report. Only one of the 12 Fed districts -- New York -- said growth slowed. Even so, evidence of broader inflationary pressure remained scant. The Cleveland district said many raw-material prices had risen, but "retail prices remained relatively flat."

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke testifies on the economy to the Joint Economic Committee of Congress today, but he isn't expected to give clear signals about what the Fed's next interest-rate move is likely to be.

To be sure, despite the recent robust data, economists say a strong finish to the first quarter is more likely to be a prelude to slower growth in the second. Oil prices and interest rates are rising, and the extent of the housing market's correction is still uncertain. As a result, few analysts are willing to raise their growth forecasts.

Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at New York consulting firm MFR Inc., said he still expects growth to slow to a 3% annual rate in the current quarter. "Could the second quarter be a little stronger than that? Yes, but not way higher," he said.

Businesses are helping to spur the economy. On their way to record corporate profits last year, businesses increased their investment at a 16% annual pace in the fourth quarter, the fastest clip since mid-2004. Ms. Coronado of Barclays expects that spending on equipment and software, a closely watched measure of investment, rose at an 11% annual rate in the first quarter and will grow at a 9% rate in the current quarter.

Google Inc. recently said that its capital spending, which was $838 million in 2005, will grow even faster than its revenue this year. Manufacturing bellwether Caterpillar Inc. recently raised its profit forecast for 2006 to between $4.85 and $5.20 a share, up from $4.04 a share in 2005. Announcing the sunnier outlook, Caterpillar Chief Executive James Owens said "strong underlying fundamentals are in place, and we believe this is a business cycle that has staying power."

In yesterday's Fed report, business investment appeared to be strong. "Production capacity for mining equipment in the Chicago district is reportedly booked through 2007," the report said.

With prospects on the business side looking solid, one of the major assumptions built into forecasts for slower growth has been that consumers will cut back on spending. Peter Hooper, chief U.S. economist at Deutsche Bank, said, "We really do need to see some slowing in consumer-spending growth in the second quarter to give the Fed room to pause" its rate raising at 5%. He predicted that would happen thanks to the combined impact of higher gasoline prices and slowing home-price appreciation, "although the risks have risen" that the Fed will raise rates beyond 5%.

The housing market has yet to show signs of a prolonged slump, but even with March's upturn a slowdown is still apparent. New-home sales in March, while up from February, were 11.5% below their peak last July. Sales of existing homes, which make up 80% of the housing market, are only 4.8% lower than when they topped out last June.

However, inventories of new homes on the market rose to 555,000 in March, up 24% from a year ago, and the unadjusted median sales price for a new home actually fell 2% from a year earlier, suggesting builders have used discounts to get homes sold. Existing-home prices have declined slightly so far this year, giving consumers less home equity to finance other purchases.

In another sign of weakness in the housing market, Dallas-based home builder Centex Corp. yesterday said orders fell 11% in the fiscal quarter ended March 31. CEO Timothy Eller said cancellations were up, too. The company slashed its earnings outlook for fiscal 2007 to a range of $8.50 to $10 a share, down from an earlier estimate of $10.75 to $11.25.

Still, the strong labor market, which has lowered the unemployment rate to 4.7% and shows few signs of reversing course, is likely to reassure consumers. Yesterday's Fed report found that job markets were still tightening, and wage pressures were rising. The Dallas district cited "reports of difficultly finding workers who meet basic qualifications of employment, such as background checks and drug tests."

One New York-district employment agency said "salaries are up at least 15% from a year ago for experienced office workers," and a Boston district firm said there was a "war for talent."

Growth Accelerated In March, But A Slowdown Is Expected (NYT)

The economy ended the first quarter on a high note, according to two Commerce Department reports released yesterday, but economists cautioned that higher energy costs and interest rates might sap some of that vitality.

Two measures of housing and manufacturing activity rose sharply in March, the Commerce Department said, indicating that the economy picked up steam. The Federal Reserve's beige book report presented a similar upbeat view but noted that higher energy prices were hurting businesses and that home sales were cooling in much of the country.

Analysts said the reports suggested that the economy grew at about a 5 percent annual rate in the first quarter, after a 1.7 percent increase in the fourth quarter. The Commerce Department will release its estimate of gross domestic product for the first quarter tomorrow.

"Neither the economy, nor the housing market has gone flat," said Stuart G. Hoffman, chief economist for the PNC Financial Services Group. "But it will continue to deflate a little bit."

New-home sales rose to an annual pace of 1.21 million in March, up from 1.07 million the month before and 1.2 million in January. Sales increased in all four regions of the country.

But the market was weaker when compared with a year ago. The selling rate in March was down from a pace of 1.31 million in March 2005, while the median price — meaning half the homes sold for more and half for less — slipped 2.2 percent from a year ago, to $224,200.

And the number of unsold homes on the market has grown, rising by 24.4 percent over the last 12 months, to 555,000. At the current sales pace it would take five and a half months to sell those properties, up from 4.2 months a year ago.

The jump in inventories was the biggest in 33 years, and the drop in prices the steepest since January 2003, said Ian C. Shepherdson, chief United States economist at High Frequency Economics.

Sales "are going to drop in the next couple of months," he said, noting that mortgage applications, an early indicator for the housing market, have fallen 22 percent in 12 months.

Orders for durable goods, big-ticket products that are meant to last for more than three years, increased by 6.1 percent, to $230.6 billion, after a rise of 3.4 percent in February and a decline of 8.9 percent in January.

A 71.1 percent increase in orders for civilian airplanes and related parts accounted for a big part of the gain, but the increase in orders was a robust 2.8 percent excluding the transportation sector, which is heavily influenced by the month in which customers place orders for planes with Boeing. Other sectors that showed increases were capital goods, machinery and communications equipment.

If businesses continue to show such strength they could offset some slowdown that analysts expect in housing and consumer spending, but not all of it, economists said.

They note that oil prices have risen 18 percent since the start of the year, to $71.93 a barrel, and that the national average price for a gallon of unleaded gasoline has increased sharply, to $2.92, from $2.50 a month ago, according to the American Automobile Association. The average interest rate on a 30-year fixed mortgage topped 6.5 percent last week, up from 6.21 percent at the start of the year, according to Freddie Mac.

"The economy has shown tremendous resilience in the face of energy prices so far," said David Greenlaw, an economist at Morgan Stanley. "But this latest spike will have a noticeable effect in the next couple of months."

An economic slowdown could force the Federal Reserve to end its nearly two-year campaign to raise short-term interest rates, now at 4.75 percent, after just one increase to 5 percent at its meeting on May 10.

Bond investors believe a second increase, in June, is likely. The yield on the 10-year United States Treasury note rose to 5.10 percent yesterday, from 5.07 percent on Tuesday.

Strong Data Good For Stocks (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

Wall Street can't seem to make up its mind about interest rates.

New signs that the economy is on solid footing have caused investors to rethink expectations about the future course of interest rates in recent days -- and what higher rates mean for stocks.

Last week, the Dow Jones Industrial Average surged to a six-year high amid hopes the Federal Reserve would stop raising its target rate after one more quarter-point increase to 5% at their May meeting. Now, after several reports indicating the economy is stronger than previously thought, more investors think the Fed is likely to increase rates to 5.25% or more.

Fed-funds futures contracts show a 64% chance policy makers will boost rates to 5.25%, up from 40% on Monday.

Wall Street's response to the new landscape this week has been erratic. Stocks tumbled Tuesday as investors worried that higher rates could slow the economy too much and hurt corporate profits. Wednesday, investors seemed more receptive to the notion that the economy is strong enough to withstand more than one rate increase.

The Dow industrials gained 71.24 points to 11354.49, a fresh six-year high, buoyed by an 8% pop in General Motors after Merrill Lynch, upbeat about the auto maker's turnaround plan, upgraded the stock to "neutral" from "sell." The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 3.67 to 1305.41, and the Nasdaq Composite Index added 3.33 to 2333.63.

Investors clung to the idea that the economy will stay resilient despite the prospects for more rate increases than previously thought. "People have been getting prematurely bearish because of rising rates," said James Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management. "They've been looking at how much rates have come up instead of how low they still are."

The Fed has increased rates 15 times in the past two years, and the yield on the 10-year Treasury bond has moved to its highest level in nearly four years. But rates on the 10-year note, at 5.1%, are still below their historical average of about 5.5% to 6%, said Mr. Paulsen, and aren't high enough to tamp down growth spurred by years of cheap money.

Some analysts aren't as sanguine about higher rates, though, largely due to two weak spots in the economy: housing and the consumer. Despite a report Wednesday that new-home sales surged in March, "the primary weakness right now is the housing market, and that is going to have an impact on consumers and the rate at which they plan to spend," said Stuart Freeman, chief equity strategist at A.G. Edwards & Sons, since consumers tend to feel wealthier when the value of their homes is on the rise.

Higher mortgage rates later in the year will cause the housing market to cool even more, putting more pressure on a consumer struggling with high levels of debt and gasoline prices hovering near $3 a gallon.

A Commerce Department report Wednesday showing that new-home sales in March surged 13.8%7 to an annualized rate of 1.213 million units, the biggest increase in 13 years, raised questions about whether the housing market was cooling.

But a look inside the report showed new-home sales, which slid 10.9% in February, weren't as hot as the headline number indicated. Sales were down 7.2% from a year ago. And a factor driving the jump was a dip in prices. The median home price slid to $224,200 in March from $239,900 the previous month and down from $229,300 a year ago.

In another report, the Commerce Department said orders for new durable goods8 jumped 6.1% in March, far exceeding the 1.6% gain expected by economists. Excluding the 14% rise in volatile transportation goods, new orders rose 2.8% in March, the biggest since August.

Treasury bonds slumped on the reports, sending yields to their highest level since June 2002. The 10-year Treasury bond slid 6/32 point, or $1.88 per $1,000 invested, to yield 5.107%. Crude-oil futures slid 95 cents to $71.93 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange after a report by the Energy Information Administration showed petroleum inventories fell less than expected last week.

Investors also weighed the Fed's latest "beige book" report, which said the economy's growth is "solid" and "moderate" and that the labor market is "tight or tightening." The report also found that the housing market is cooling off in most of the central bank's 12 regions.

In major market action:

Stocks rose9. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 1.8 billion shares traded, 1,832 stocks rose and 1,471 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.2 billion shares traded, 1,523 rose and 1,540 declined.

Bonds slipped10. The benchmark 10-year Treasury fell 6/32 point, or $1.88 per $1,000 invested, to yield 5.107%. The 30-year bond lost 5/32 to yield 5.178%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar fell.11 It traded at 114.73 yen, down from 114.82 yen late Tuesday, and the euro fell to $1.2454 from $1.2432.

U.S. Stocks Rise On Earnings; Dow Average Reaches 6-Year High (BLOOM)

By Dune Lawrence

Bloomberg, April 27, 2006

April 26 (Bloomberg) -- The Dow Jones Industrial Average climbed to a six-year high, leading gains in U.S. stocks, as earnings at Anheuser-Busch Cos. and Colgate-Palmolive Co. beat analysts' forecasts and sales of new homes surged.

Hovnanian Enterprises Inc. and Pulte Homes Inc. set the pace as homebuilders rallied on a government report showing the biggest monthly jump in sales since 1993.

``Earnings have been quite positive, and I think that's the number one reason to buy stocks and the number one reason why this market has held together," said Alfred Goldman, chief market strategist at A.G. Edwards in St. Louis.

Energy stocks declined as oil prices fell for a third day. Rising interest rates also hampered the advance, as the housing data and a jump in durable-goods orders sent the yield on 10- year Treasury notes to its highest since June 2002.

The Dow average rose 71.24, or 0.6 percent, to 11,354.49, its highest since Jan. 19, 2000. The Dow, which first reached a six-year high last week, got an added lift from General Motors Corp. after Merrill Lynch & Co. said the carmaker has enough cash to pay workers who accept buyout offers.

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index added 3.67, or 0.3 percent, to 1305.41, while the Nasdaq Composite Index gained 3.33, or 0.1 percent, to 2333.63. It was the first time all three indexes rose this week.

The market's advance on higher earnings had stalled as increases in consumer confidence and sales of previously owned homes reignited concern that the Federal Reserve would keep lifting interest rates.

Earnings Scorecard

About 72 percent of S&P 500 companies that have reported first-quarter profit have beaten analyst estimates, more than the 57 percent average since 1992, data from Thomson Financial show. More companies will release earnings this week than any other week during the so-called reporting season.

Anheuser-Busch climbed $2.27 to $44.90. The world's largest brewer reported better-than-expected first-quarter profit on the biggest sales gain in more than a year. Net income was 64 cents a share. JPMorgan analyst John Faucher, who is top-ranked by StarMine, estimated 54 cents a share, including a 2-cent cost for stock-option expenses.

Colgate-Palmolive, the world's largest toothpaste maker, rallied $1.60 to $58.95. The company said first-quarter profit, excluding some items, increased to 70 cents a share as new brands lifted sales in Latin America. The average estimate of analysts surveyed by Thomson was 66 cents.

Sales of new homes in the U.S. jumped the most since April 1993, up 13.8 percent to an annual rate of 1.213 million, the Commerce Department said. Economists expected sales at a 1.11 million rate, according to a Bloomberg News survey.

Builders Soar

The Bloomberg U.S. Homebuilders Index rose 1.6 percent. Pulte, the country's second-largest builder, gained $1.14 to $39.04. Hovnanian, New Jersey's largest homebuilder, added 92 cents to $40.63. D.R. Horton Inc., No. 1 U.S. homebuilder, added 51 cents to $31.33.

The durable goods report showed orders jumped 6.1 percent last month as businesses invested in new equipment to meet demand. The increase in bookings for expensive items made to last at least several years was the most since May 2005 and up from a gain of 3.4 percent in February, the Commerce Department said. Excluding transportation equipment, orders rose 2.8 percent. Economists expected gains of 1.8 percent and 1 percent, respectively in a Bloomberg survey.

Beige Book

A regional survey of the economy by the Fed added to concern over accelerating inflation. Labor markets across the U.S. are ``tightening" as most of the country expands, said the Fed's dozen regional banks in the so-called beige book report.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note climbed 3 basis points, or 0.03 percentage point, to 5.10 percent in New York, according to bond broker Cantor Fitzgerald LP. Higher yields may make fixed-income investments a more attractive alternative to equities and raise borrowing costs for companies.

``Solid earnings reports are helping to put in a bit of a floor in the market," said Jeff Kleintop, who helps manage $50 billion as chief investment strategist at PNC Advisors in Philadelphia. ``But the sensitivity here to the economic data given the question about the outlook for Fed tightening, that seems to be the overriding influence."

GM, Oil Stocks

GM, the world's largest automaker, advanced $1.74, or 8.1 percent, to $23.15 for the top gain in the Dow average and highest price since Feb. 6. Merrill raised its rating to ``neutral" from ``sell,' saying GM has enough money in its pension and retiree health-care funds to pay workers who accept its buyout offers. GM may get 50 percent of 63,000 union workers eligible for full or early retirement to leave, analyst John Murphy wrote in a report.

About four stocks rose for every three that fell on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 1.77 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, 8.4 percent more than the three-month average.

Oil for June delivery slid 1.3 percent to $71.90 a barrel in New York, bringing the loss this week to 4.3 percent. The Energy Department said U.S. refineries increased output of gasoline and other fuels.

Energy shares weighed on the market for a third day after reversing earlier gains. An S&P 500 measure slid 1.4 percent. Valero Energy Corp., the No. 1 U.S. refiner, slumped $3.20 to $63.10. Exxon Mobil Corp., the world's largest publicly traded oil company, lost 85 cents to $63.10.

Baker Hughes Inc. was the exception among energy stocks. The No. 3 oilfield-services provider said first-quarter profit soared 89 percent to $339.2 million as customers spent more searching for oil and gas. The company also raised its 2006 profit and sales growth forecast. Baker Hughes advanced $3.07 to $79.

PepsiCo, AT&T Earnings

PepsiCo Inc., the world's No. 2 soft-drink maker, added 36 cents to $57.86. The company said first-quarter profit rose 12 percent to $1.02 billion, or 60 cents a share, on demand for Frito-Lay snacks and Gatorade sports drinks. UBS Securities LLC analyst Caroline Levy, who is top-ranked by StarMine Corp., estimated earnings of 59 cents a share.

AT&T Inc., the largest U.S. telephone company, rose for a second day after reporting profit that exceeded analysts' estimates. The stock gained 56 cents to $26.16 today.

Sprint Nextel Corp., the third-largest U.S. wireless services company, dropped 68 cents to $24.35. Sprint said first- quarter profit, excluding some costs, was 35 cents a share, missing the 37 cents expected by analysts in a Thomson survey. The company added fewer customers than analysts estimated.

Bank of America Corp., the second-biggest U.S. bank, rose 62 cents to $47.71. The company said it will repurchase up to $12 billion of its shares within the next 18 months to help boost a stock price that has lagged peers.

Buffett's Day

The earnings news was mixed for Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway Inc., which was the biggest shareholder in both Moody's Corp. and Anheuser-Busch as of December.

Moody's slid $7.65 to $62.78. The company, whose founder created credit ratings, said first-quarter revenue rose 13 percent to $407.9 million, the slowest pace since December 2004.

Berkshire Hathaway shares still jumped the most in seven months, adding $1750, or 2 percent, to $88,700.

Wall Street Gains After Positive Earnings Reports (FT)

By John O'Doherty

Financial Times, April 27, 2006

US stocks enjoyed a strong day, after positive earnings reports offset fears of higher interest rates following strong economic data.

At the close, the S&P 500 was up 3.67 points, or 0.3 per cent, at 1,305.41. The Nasdaq barely moved, gaining 3.3 points, or 0.1 per cent, at 2,333.63, while the Dow Jones Industrial Average finished the day 71.24 points, or 0.6 per cent higher at 11,354.49.

"We're in a reverse-psychology market," said Alfred Goldman, chief market strategist at AG Edwards, who commented that prices were declining on strong economic data and rising on weaker news.

"The question investors will ask is whether this 43 month old bull-market is running out of energy," he said. "I'm still optimistic, but I'm starting to lose sleep at night."

General Motors clawed back its losses of earlier in the week after Merrill Lynch upgraded the company's stock to 'neutral' from 'sell.' It gave a sanguine assessment of GM's ability to complete a restructuring plan. GM jumped 8.1 per cent to $23.15.

Anheuser-Busch was also a strong gainer. The brewer reported quarterly earnings per share of 64 cents, beating analysts' forecasts of 56 cents. The news pushed its shares up 5.3 per cent to $44.90 Berkshire Hathaway, the largest shareholder in Anheuser-Busch, rose 2 per cent to $88,700.

Office Depot soared to an all-time high following the company's announcement that sales for the first quarter grew 3 per cent. This raised earnings per share to 48 cents, above analysts' forecast of 44 cents per share. The stock jumped 8.7 per cent to $41.52 on the news

Despite an increase in first quarter profit of 23 per cent, Moody's suffered losses on Wednesday. The company that operates the credit-rating service of the same name dipped 12 per cent to $62 as expenses rose and revenue growth slowed below analyst expectations.

Sprint-Nextel was one of the most heavily traded stocks after the telecommunications company announced a fall in first-quarter net income from $472bn to $419bn after merger-related costs and higher marketing expenses.

The shares fell 2.7 per cent to $24.35, bucking the trend in an otherwise buoyant communications sector.

One company leading the positive trend in the sector was American Tower which gained 4.4 per cent to $34.65 after it announced that quarterly losses had been reduced.

The company, which leases space on its communications towers to the likes of Cingular, said that sales gained 74 per cent in the first quarter compared with the same period last year.

Monster Worldwide, the owner of online jobs recruitment website Monster.com, rose on quarterly results that were significantly stronger than expected, up to $42.3m from $20.6m in the same period last year. Monster shot up 6.9 per cent to $55.86.

Bernanke Won't Hint At Ending Rise In Rates (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke is going to disappoint a lot of listeners when he addresses Congress today and provides no guidance on when the central bank will stop raising interest rates to keep inflation under control.

Financial market analysts and investors have longed for such a signal and thought they saw it last week when a summary of Fed officials' last policymaking meeting in March suggested they might be done after lifting their benchmark short-term rate once more in May.

But that expectation has wilted as several new government reports have shown the economy is growing briskly and inflation may be moving higher. Fed policymakers almost certainly will raise their benchmark rate again at their May 10 meeting but will be unable to indicate then whether they are done or see more increases in store.

"Anyone looking for clues about when the Fed will stop tightening is bound to be disappointed" by Bernanke's testimony today, said Ed McKelvey of Goldman Sachs U.S. Economics Research. "He simply does not know."

Rather, Fed officials will need to see how the economy and inflationary pressures behave after the May meeting before they decide whether to raise interest rates in June. Bernanke, testifying before Congress's Joint Economic Committee for the first time as Fed chairman, is likely to lay out the economic and inflationary risks he sees while keeping his interest rate options open, several analysts predicted yesterday.

Just yesterday, the Commerce Department reported that new orders for big-ticket durable goods -- items such as computers, cars and appliances -- rose 6.1 percent in March.

And sales of new homes surged 13.8 percent in March, after slumping in February, the National Association of Realtors said yesterday.

"The strong momentum undermines the notion that the Fed might be able to halt its rate hikes after just one more move," said Nigel Gault, an economist at Global Insight Inc.

The figures released yesterday prompted several analysts to estimate that the economy grew at faster than a 5 percent annual rate in the first three months of the year, a robust rebound from its weak finish at the end of last year.

"The economy is pumping on all cylinders," Richard W. Fisher, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas said in an interview yesterday. But, he added, economic growth in "the second half [of the year] probably will be a little slower."

Fed officials are raising interest rates to make sure strong economic growth doesn't cause inflation to take off. Higher rates make it harder for consumers and businesses to borrow, which restrains their spending, slowing growth and making it harder for businesses to raise prices.

The Fed has raised its benchmark federal funds rate -- the interest rate charged on overnight loans between banks -- 15 times since June 2004, to 4.75 percent last month. The rate has caused other short-term rates, such as those on home-equity loans, adjustable mortgages and credit cards, to rise as well.

But long-term interest rates, such as mortgages, are determined by global financial markets. Mortgage rates have risen in recent weeks but remain low by historical standards.

The housing market has already started to cool a bit, with price appreciation slowing, inventories of unsold homes growing and mortgage applications dropping, which implies that sales will droop as well. Many Fed officials expect this will help slow overall economic growth in coming months to an annual rate below 3.5 percent, which should keep the lid on inflation. But some policymakers don't see much of a slowdown yet, with consumer spending, business investment and exports all rising.

Housing is sending "mixed signals," Fisher said. But, "the rest of the economy is doing so well, it's mitigating the fall-off in one sector."

Meanwhile, inflation flared higher in March, in part because of higher energy prices. But other prices rose as well, for housing, clothing, medical care, recreation, air travel and education.

Fed officials cannot use interest rates to keep oil and gasoline prices from rising, since they are largely determined in global markets according to supply and demand pressures. But Fed policy can make it harder for businesses to pass their energy costs to consumers through higher prices.

Looking for signs of such pass-through inflation, economists look at core inflation measures, which exclude prices for energy and food. The Labor Department's core consumer price index rose 0.3 percent in March, the largest increase in a year.

"The March CPI was a mite disturbing . . . as pressures in the core index were not easily isolated to one or two troublesome items and were therefore consistent with the possibility of a pickup in this [energy price] pass through," McKelvey said.

"However, one month does not make a trend," he added, implying that core inflation could recede in following months. But several analysts say that is unlikely because of trends in rental housing prices, which are rising.

Rents fell dramatically while the Fed was cutting interest rates during and after the 2001 recession. Lower rates induced more renters to become homeowners, which fueled the housing boom and lowered demand for rentals. Now, with mortgages rising, rents are climbing, as well.

Much of the increase in the March core CPI reflected rising shelter costs for renters and homeowners, a senior Labor Department economist said. The "shelter" category, which also includes rising hotel rates, accounts for 42 percent of the core CPI.

Because of rising rents, "we suspect the markets could be negatively surprised as core CPI hangs higher longer than current expectations," wrote David Shulman, in a recent forecast published by the Anderson School of Management at the University of California at Los Angeles. And, he said, the higher-than-expected core CPI "will likely put upward pressure on U.S. interest rates."

Why War Is Hell On President's Party (USAT)

By Ross K. Baker

USA Today, April 27, 2006

Though the midterm congressional elections are seven months away, speculation has already reached a fever pitch about how the public, half a year from now, will evaluate the record of the Bush administration and the GOP on everything from the Iraq war to changes in Medicare.

Congressional experts point to the relatively small number of seats in the House of Representatives — less than 10% of them by some reckoning — likely to be in play because of a combination of partisan gerrymandering and the formidable advantages enjoyed by incumbents. Larry Sabato, a respected election analyst, concluded recently that in their quest to take control of Congress, “Democrats are facing an uphill struggle.” Coupled with these tactical advantages enjoyed by the GOP, critics also downplay Democratic chances because of that party's lack of clear alternatives to the president's policies.

If there were not battles raging in Afghanistan and Iraq in which Americans were dying and being wounded, perhaps the experts' predictions of token GOP losses would be on solid footing. But this midterm must be judged not by peacetime elections, but by those that have taken place with armed conflict as a backdrop. In those elections, the party of the president has suffered major losses. It will again in November if no clear end to our Iraq engagement is on the horizon. Even if success is within our grasp this fall, war fatigue alone might unhorse the Republicans.

The party of Franklin Roosevelt, the architect of the nation's recovery from the Depression and the author of victory in World War II, suffered such a humiliating defeat in the elections of 1942, the first midterm after Pearl Harbor. To add to the humiliation, just before elections FDR had made a cross-country trip to boost morale and gave one of his “fireside chats” brimming with optimism, in much the same fashion as President Bush's recent forays to shore up support for the war.

The reason for the Democrats' loss was straightforward: The war was not going well. The battle for the contested island of Guadalcanal in the Pacific was still in doubt. The Japanese were still entrenched on the Aleutians, in Alaska, and were battling for control of Southeast Asia's island of New Guinea. Like the current situation in Iraq, there was some encouraging news as well, such as the raid by U.S. bombers on Tokyo in April 1942 and the Battle of Midway in June. But our allies were struggling. The Russians were still on the defensive around Stalingrad, and the British were reeling from a failed large-scale raid on German-occupied France.

Unlike today's White House officials, some people high up in Roosevelt's administration were openly pessimistic. FDR's assistant secretary of the Navy warned, “We could lose the war;” his director of military manpower lamented, “The tide is running against us.” FDR lashed out at the press whose reports on the war, he said, “had done the country a great deal of harm.”

The conventional wisdom then held that the Republicans would make modest gains. Pollster George Gallup predicted that the Democrats would probably not lose more than a single House seat. But when the votes were counted, the Republicans had won 44 House seats and nine in the Senate. The Democrats retained control but suffered a severe setback. The Democratic defeat put Time magazine in mind of the previous wartime midterm, in 1918, when, on the very threshold of armistice, Woodrow Wilson's Democrats lost 19 House seats and six in the Senate.

A pattern emerges from all elections of the past century conducted in wartime: The contest turns into an expression of discontent with war.

Harry Truman's Democrats suffered a loss of 29 House seats and six Senate seats in 1950, the first midterm after U.S. involvement in Korea; Lyndon Johnson's Democrats lost heavily in 1966, the first U.S. midterm elections during the Vietnam War; and Richard Nixon's midterm in 1970, while the Vietnam War still raged, saw losses for his Republicans in Congress.

Each war is different, and the political circumstances around each election are distinctive. Dissatisfaction in 1942 did not carry with it the threat of a pullout from Europe or the Pacific. We had been attacked by the Japanese and had war declared on us by the Germans. In 1918, the Democrats lost their majority in Congress with victory in sight, according to John Dos Passos in his history of the Wilson years — because of the president's appeal to the voters to show their support of his war policies by electing a Democratic Congress. Here again, the experts, notably The New York Times, were wrong in their prediction of a victory for the president's party.

For Americans, war weariness sets in early. Lightning campaigns such as the ejection of Iraq from Kuwait or the invasions of Grenada and Panama do not test the patience of the public. But even those wars that are ultimately successful but protracted impose a dreadful political cost on the incumbent.

Today, the very many safe congressional seats do provide a buffer for Republicans that might stand up under Democratic attacks on corruption, immigration, health care, or a bungled response to a hurricane that struck a year before the elections.

But a war of uncertain duration, even one in which the trend lines are promising, might be too great a surge for members of the president's party to withstand. Combat fatigue is not a condition found only on the battlefield; it is also an affliction that has often been diagnosed in the voting booth.

Clinton Is Democrats' Favourite For White House But .... (AFP)

AFP, April 26, 2006

Senator Hillary Clinton is the favourite among Democratic voters to be the party's candidate in the 2008 presidential election, according to a poll.

But only 12 percent of Democrat electors believe the wife of ex-president Bill Clinton can overcome the hostility of US Republicans to take the White House, according to the Financial Dynamics poll for The Hotline political newsletter.

The New York senator had support from 38 percent of Democrats, a 24 percentage point lead over nearest rival, Senator John Kerry, the losing Democratic candidate in the 2004 election.

"The depth and breadth of Hillary Clinton's support among Democrats is daunting for other potential Democratic candidates in 2008, especially coupled with her enormous fundraising edge," said The Hotline editor Chuck Todd.

But Clinton is divisive figure. Many conservatives dislike her because of her attempts to influence policy while her husband was president.

The poll said that Senator John McCain was the leading Republican candidate among Democrats.

Fifty-five percent of the 603 people questioned had a favourable view of the Vietnam War veteran who fought George W. Bush for the Republican candidacy in 2000, a higher rating than many Democratic party chiefs received.

The poll, carried out April 19-23, had a margin of error of four percentage points.

Percentage Of Uninsured Americans Rising (AP-Y2)

By Theresa Agovino

AP2, April 26, 2006

The percentage of working-age Americans with moderate to middle incomes who lacked health insurance for at least part of the year rose to 41 percent in 2005, a dramatic increase from the 28 percent in 2001 without coverage, a study released on Wednesday found.

Moreover, more than half of the uninsured adults said they were having problems paying their medical bills or had incurred debt to cover their expenses, according to a report by the Commonwealth Fund, a New York-based private, health care policy foundation. The study of 4,350 adults also found that people without insurance were more likely to forgo recommended health screenings such as mammograms than those with coverage, and were less likely to have a regular doctor than their insured counterparts.

The report paints a bleak health care picture for the uninsured. "It represents an explosion of the insurance crisis into those with moderate incomes," said Sara Collins, a senior program officer at the Commonwealth Fund.

Collins said the study also illustrates how more employers are dropping coverage or are offering plans that are just too expensive for many people.

About 45.8 million Americans did not have health insurance in 2004, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

The percentage of individuals earning less than $20,000 a year without insurance rose to 53 percent, up from 49 percent in 2001. Overall, the percentage of people without insurance rose to 28 percent in 2005 from 24 percent in 2001.

The study also found that 59 percent of uninsured with chronic conditions such as asthma or diabetes either skipped a dose of their medicine or went without it because it was too expensive. One-third of them

One-third of those in that group visited an emergency room or stayed in a hospital overnight or did both, compared to 15 percent of their insured counterparts.

Collins said those statistics are significant because giving up medicines typically leads to more expensive health problems later. Treating people in expensive settings such emergency rooms places a financial burden on the health care system, she added.

"People not being able to take care of themselves should send out a big red flag," said Collins.

HCA Inc. hoisted a red flag on Tuesday, when the the nation's largest for-profit hospital operator said its earnings fell 8.5 percent in the first quarter after an increase in the uninsured admissions cut into revenue gains. Uninsured admissions rose 13 percent during the quarter, and the company said its provision for "doubtful accounts" rose to $852 million from $683 million a year earlier.

The Commonwealth Fund's study was bolstered by analysis of government data funded and released by the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, a private organization that provides health care grants.

That study found that cost prevented 41.1 percent of uninsured adults from seeing a doctor, compared to 9.2 percent of individuals with coverage.

Meanwhile, 51 percent of women without health insurance haven't had a mammogram in two years, compared to 22.8 percent of women with insurance.

And 76.3 percent of uninsured men between the ages of 40 to 64 haven't had the PSA test, which detects prostate cancer, in two years. That compares to 52.2 percent of their insured counterparts.

Researchers at the University of Minnesota School of Public Health used data from the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention to reach the study's conclusion.

Iranian Leader Warns U.S. Of Reprisal (WP)

By Molly Moore And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

PARIS, April 26 -- Escalating the threats between Washington and Tehran, Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, warned Wednesday that his country would strike U.S. targets around the world in the event it is attacked over its refusals to curb its nuclear program.

"If the U.S. ventured into any aggression on Iran, Iran will retaliate by damaging U.S. interests worldwide twice as much as the U.S. may inflict on Iran," Khamenei said in a speech to a workers' assembly, according to the official news agency IRNA.

His statement adds to a campaign of defiance by senior Iranian officials in advance of a report expected Friday by the U.N. atomic watchdog agency, which analysts predict will cite Iran for defying U.N. Security Council demands to halt its uranium enrichment program.

The heightened tensions between the United States and Iran have helped drive oil prices to record highs and have set in motion intense diplomatic meetings aimed at heading off greater destabilization in the Middle East.

In a spate of statements this week, Iranian officials have also threatened to cut oil production, export nuclear technology, bar international nuclear monitors, make their nuclear program entirely secret and withdraw from the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

While Bush administration officials have said they have no plans to attack Iran, they have repeatedly said they have not ruled out that step.

U.S. military experts are confident that U.S. forces could carry out extensive airstrikes against Iranian targets, but there is disagreement about how much of a setback such raids could impose on the Iranian nuclear program, much of which is housed underground.

Two main options are under consideration, say people familiar with Air Force thinking. The first would be a quick series of strikes against several dozen nuclear-related facilities, lasting only a few days and followed by a U.S. statement that the bombing would resume if Iran retaliated.

The second option envisions a lengthier, more ambitious campaign of waves of strikes by bombers and cruise missiles aimed at hundreds of targets, hitting not just nuclear-related facilities but also the headquarters of intelligence agencies, the Revolutionary Guard and other key government offices.

Many experts worry that Iran, dominated by Shiite Muslims, would retaliate against U.S. and British forces in neighboring Iraq by mobilizing Iraqi Shiites. It might also attack U.S. and British installations in Saudi Arabia and Bahrain through the help of Shiites in those countries. In other scenarios, Iranian agents would stage terrorist strikes against civilians in the United States, Europe and elsewhere.

The recent statements are "a war of words," said Gary G. Sick, a professor of Middle East policy at Columbia University and longtime monitor of Iranian politics. "Neither side has anything to gain by an attack on the other, but there is a chance of an accident triggering something and that's what makes the situation so dangerous."

The Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency's report due Friday to the U.N. Security Council on the status of Iran's uranium enrichment program will shape debate in the council that could begin as early as next week. At issue would be possible international responses to Tehran. An IAEA official declined to comment on the contents of the pending report.

Iran dispatched an envoy to Vienna on Wednesday to meet with representatives of the IAEA, but neither side expressed optimism about a last-minute breakthrough. Iranian leaders have said they will not stop their uranium enrichment efforts, but rather plan to expand them.

"I think it's pretty clear what that report is going to say," White House spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters Wednesday, "which is that this is a regime that is in noncompliance with its obligations; this is a regime that is not abiding by the agreement it made with the Europeans to suspend all its enrichment and enrichment-related activities."

Under an agreement reached with Britain, France and Germany, Iran had suspended enrichment work while negotiations continued toward an agreement under which Iran would receive economic and political incentives in exchange for a permanent shutdown of controversial aspects of its nuclear program. It recently restarted enrichment.

Iran says its nuclear program is exclusively directed toward generating electricity. But U.S. officials accuse it of using the program as a cover to develop nuclear weapons. The Security Council has instructed Iran to stop its uranium enrichment program out of concern that it puts the country a step closer in the years-long process of building a nuclear bomb.

Iranian authorities, playing to a domestic political audience, have cast the U.N. demands as an effort by the West to trample on its sovereign right to develop a civilian nuclear program. "The Iranian nation and its officials are peace-seekers and the Islamic republic would not invade anybody," Khamenei said Wednesday.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has also created concern abroad by repeatedly calling for the end of the Jewish state. On Monday, Ahmadinejad said the "fake" state "cannot survive" and urged Israeli immigrants to return to their home countries. He has often called the Holocaust a myth.

"Of all the threats we face, Iran is the biggest," Israeli Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz said Tuesday as Israel observed Holocaust Remembrance Day. "The world must not wait. It must do everything necessary on a diplomatic level in order to stop its nuclear activity."

He added, "Since Hitler we have not faced such a threat."

Iran Leader Warns U.S. Against Attacking (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, April 26, 2006

Iran's supreme leader warned the United States on Wednesday that his nation would hit back twice as hard if America attacked its nuclear sites.

Even as it threatened to ravage U.S. global interests, Iran sent its top nuclear official to Vienna, Austria, for talks with the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog agency ahead of a Friday Security Council deadline for Tehran to halt its uranium enrichment activities.

"The Americans should know that if they invade Iran, their interests around the world would be harmed," supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei told workers gathered ahead of May Day, the international workers' holiday, state television reported.

"Iran will respond twofold to any attack," Khamenei said.

The United States repeatedly has said it has no plans to attack Iran but all options remain on the table as it pursues a diplomatic solution to Iran's insistence on enriching uranium — a process that can produce fuel for generators or fissile material for nuclear bombs.

DOJ_NMG_0027042

Britain on Wednesday ruled out military force against Iran. "This is not Iraq. Nobody is talking about military action," Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said in a speech in London.

But Straw said how the world deals with the standoff over Tehran's nuclear program will be a test for the relevance of international diplomacy.

The Security Council has given Iran until Friday to suspend enrichment. If it does not, the council is likely to consider punitive measures against the Islamic republic.

Iran has rejected the ultimatum, but senior negotiator Gholamreza Aghazadeh was discussing the issue in talks Wednesday with the International Atomic Energy Agency, which is preparing a report on Iran's compliance with the Security Council demand.

In Vienna, diplomats were skeptical of any proposals that Aghazadeh was carrying, saying they were unlikely to alter the negative tone of the IAEA report to the Security Council. Still, one of the diplomats — who demanded anonymity because he was not supposed to be discussing the confidential talks — said the two sides agreed to a second round of talks in the evening after an afternoon meeting attended by IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei.

The chief U.S. delegate to the IAEA, Gregory L. Schulte, has said he expects a negative report from ElBaradei.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad shrugged off the possibility of the council's penalizing Iran.

"The enemies could not impose their wrong decision against us under cover of the Security Council and the IAEA," Ahmadinejad said, according to state television.

Ahmadinejad said Iran remained committed to negotiations.

"We are ready to discuss (the nuclear program) to show that it has not been diverted" to military purposes, the president said.

The United States has asked for the Security Council to meet May 3 to discuss how to respond to the report.

While the IAEA has found no "smoking gun" proving Iran wants nuclear arms, a series of IAEA reports have revealed worrying clandestine activities such as plutonium processing and documents including drawings of how to mold weapons-grade uranium metal into the shape of a warhead.

Iran deepened international concerns by announcing April 11 that it had enriched uranium with 164 centrifuges. It has informed the IAEA that it plans to install 3,000 centrifuges in the last quarter of 2006 and later 54,000 centrifuges for large-scale enrichment of uranium.

While tens of thousands of centrifuges need to be running in "cascades" for a full-fledged enrichment programs, experts estimate that Iran could produce enough nuclear material for one bomb if it had at least 1,000 centrifuges working for over a year.

On Tuesday, Iran issued its toughest warning on the issue. Nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani said that if the Security Council imposes sanctions, Iran would stop cooperating with the IAEA and conceal its nuclear activities.

"If you take harsh measures, we will hide this program. If you use the language of force, you should not expect us to act transparently," Larijani said.

Iran appears to be drawing strength for its defiance from the evident reluctance of Russia and China to endorse sanctions. The two powers hold vetoes on the Security Council.

"We see no alternative to the negotiations process," Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov said Tuesday. China has repeatedly urged all parties to show flexibility and pursue a peaceful settlement.

A Defiant Iran Banks On A Split At UN (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - With neither side blinking, Iran and the international community are preparing to take the next step in their showdown over Tehran's nuclear ambitions.

The confrontation returns Friday to the United Nations Security Council, where the Iranian regime is hoping a divide-and-conquer strategy will prevent the UN body from taking any coercive action to limit its nuclear program. It may be a bold gambit: Just a month ago, the Council acted - unanimously - to give Iran 30 days to show it had ceased uranium enrichment.

But the Security Council, in fact, is split over the need for action against a defiant Tehran - increasing the likelihood that steps such as economic sanctions will be taken not by the UN, but by a "coalition of the willing" of the US and equally adamant allies.

"Of course we have a strong preference for action by the Security Council, for legal reasons ... and [because] it sends a clear message to the Iranian people that action is against the regime and not them," says a French diplomat who requested anonymity because of the delicate nature of the negotiations. "But at the same time, we can't remain forever doing nothing in the case Iran goes forward with its process."

The United States as well has been emphasizing its preference for united Security Council action against Iran. But it is also floating with allies the possibility of steps outside the UN if the Security Council proves unable to bridge its differences - essentially with the US, Britain, and France on one side, and Russia and China on the other.

Beginning Thursday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is to attend a two-day meeting of NATO foreign ministers in Sofia, Bulgaria, where the issue of Iran and its relevance to the Atlantic alliance is expected to be raised, according to NATO officials.

The 30-day pause in deliberations on Iran was designed to give the Iranian government an opportunity to cease uranium enrichment, reassure the world that it is not proceeding along a path to nuclear armament, and stave off further international action.

But if anything, Iran has used the days preceding a return to the Security Council to rattle the international community: not only to boast of a perfected enrichment process, but to do it with veiled references to secret enrichment sites and to accelerated nuclear development.

The Iranian game plan appears to be to set up a confrontation with the West that not only divides the international community but shatters any consensus against its nuclear program, analysts say.

"They seem to be trying to replay the good-cop-bad-cop strategy the US and EU [European Union] used against them, but in their own way where they play both the good cop and the bad cop," says Ray Takeyh, an Iran expert with the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington.

He points to Iran's diplomatic forays to Russia and Persian Gulf states, as well as toward Sudan, even as Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad taunts the West. And he says Iran is trying to look reasonable and cooperative to friends (like Russia) and Muslim countries, while also appearing to stand up to Western powers.

The Iranian strategy may be working, both at home and when it comes to the UN. Domestically, the outspoken Mr. Ahmadinejad is winning points with his anti-Western stance, even as he fails to deliver on the bread-and-butter issues that brought him to power.

"This could be part of his domestic political calculations," says Joseph Cirincione, director for nonproliferation at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington. "The more he postures as standing up to a US positioning itself for war, the more he consolidates his power."

Then there's the UN: A month after the Security Council approved a watered-down statement on Iran, world powers seem no closer to consensus on diplomatic action, such as "smart" sanctions aimed at Iranian officials.

Initially, the US, Britain, and France are set on seeking something more from the Council than the simple "presidential statement" that was approved a month ago. This time they want a so-called "Chapter 7 resolution," which would designate Iran a threat to international security - a step that would open the door to sanctions and eventually even military action.

In the days leading up to Council deliberations, the US is reiterating that it is not seeking sanctions at this time. "The resolution we are contemplating ... would not be a sanctions resolution," the US ambassador to the UN, John Bolton, said Tuesday. "So from our perspective, we are going to take it one step at a time."

But for China and Russia, a Chapter 7 resolution puts the Council on a course of action, including sanctions, even if the text does not specifically call for it. And it also starts looking increasingly like the diplomatic road the US took before going to war with Iraq, some experts say.

That helps explain why neither veto-wielding nation is likely to go along with a tough new resolution. "I think the Chapter 7 route is dead on arrival," says Mr. Cirincione. "The US can keep talking about it, but our own policies have doomed it."

Specifically, he says the US appears to be "following the playbook on Iraq," by insisting it wants a diplomatic solution even as it continues to hold out the possibility of military action. "That may not be what's happening," he says, "but to a number of countries out there, it looks that way."

US officials appear to be aware of this perception. Secretary Rice this week said the US is "aware Iran is not Iraq." But at the same time, she warned that the Security Council's relevance to international security is on the line in the Iranian issue.

"We're starting to hear the US use the Iraq language - that if the Security Council doesn't act, it becomes an irrelevant organization," says Mr. Takeyh of the Council on Foreign Relations. "The strategy may be to put together a coalition of the willing to apply sanctions, but you can't go that route without denigrating the Security Council first."

House OKs Tighter Sanctions Against Iran's Nuclear Aims (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

DOJ_NMG_0027044

The House yesterday overwhelmingly passed a bipartisan bill that toughens sanctions against Iran until the country dismantles its nuclear programs, with supporters saying the move is a "key component of our war on terror."

Lawmakers voted 397-21 for the Iran Freedom Support Act, created "to hold the current regime in Iran accountable for its threatening behavior and to support a transition to democracy in Iran."

The bill sends the message "the United States expects Iran to be a responsible member of the international community," said House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican.

But opponents from both parties argued the bill undermines diplomacy and is a first step to war with Iran.

Rep. Ron Paul, Texas Republican, said the measure reminds him of a 1998 congressional resolution that called for regime change in Iraq, which he thinks was the first step to the "very unpopular, expensive" Iraq war.

Rep. Earl Blumenauer, Oregon Democrat, noted all lawmakers "hate this regime," but he favors "strong, smart, constructive, diplomatic efforts" -- characteristics that he says are not present in the bill.

"I am very worried about where this all ends," he said.

Supporters repeatedly said the bill "does not authorize the use of force."

"If the U.S. fails to act with clarity ... the potential consequences of inaction could be catastrophic," said Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican. "This is real."

Several supporters mentioned Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's recent statement that Israel "must be wiped off the map."

Rep. Eric Cantor, who is Jewish, said Congress must take such threats seriously. "This bill should be the first step and not the last," the Virginia Republican said.

That's what opponents fear.

"It is bad for Iran to have a nuclear weapon, but there are things that are worse," such as giving the country a reason to use one, said Rep. Jim Leach, Iowa Republican.

Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich said the Bush administration has "made a mess of international relations," with the war in Iraq.

"Don't we have enough problems in Iraq to clean up before setting the stage for another conflict with Iran?" the Ohio Democrat asked.

Under the bill, the mandatory sanctions must remain in place until Iran dismantles its weapons programs and presents no threat to the national security of this country or its allies.

It also calls for sanctions against countries that supply Iran with materials for weapons of mass destruction and denies U.S. assistance to countries invested in Iran's energy sector.

Bush administration officials previously said the sanctions bill could harm its own negotiations with Iran.

Mr. Pence said the president is not opposed to the resolution, sponsored by Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Florida Republican.

A Senate version is pending in the Foreign Relations Committee.

House Backs Tighter Iran Sanctions (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams

AP2, April 26, 2006

The House on Wednesday approved legislation to tighten sanctions against Iran, rejecting administration arguments that tougher sanctions could be an obstacle to international efforts to prevent the Tehran government from developing nuclear weapons.

The bill, said House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, sends "a strong message that the United States expects Iran to be a responsible member of the international community."

The vote was overwhelming, 397-21 in favor, but there was also a vocal minority in opposition who drew comparisons to a 1998 congressional resolution calling for regime change in Iraq.

Many voted in good faith for that resolution, said Rep. Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio, "not knowing that later on it would be invoked as a cause for the prosecution of war against Iraq."

Supporters emphasized that the legislation does not authorize the use of force in Iran and was a proper response to the Tehran government's nuclear ambitions. A nuclear Iran, said Rep. Christopher Smith (news, bio, voting record), R-N.J. "will be a devastating blow to peace and security, not only in the Middle East, but in the entire world."

The legislation, sponsored by Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (news, bio, voting record), R-Fla., in effect alters the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act of 10 years ago by strengthening sanctions against Iran while taking away restrictions on Libya, which is now cooperating with the West in eliminating weapons of mass destruction.

It states that weapons of mass destruction-related sanctions against Iran remain in effect until Iran has verified that it is dismantling its WMD programs. It requires that sanctions be imposed on any person who exports or supplies to Iran goods or technology that help Iran obtain WMDs.

The measure also states that the names of individuals, governments and companies that have invested at least $20 million in Iran's energy sector be published in the Federal Register. It denies U.S. aid to countries that are invested in Iran's energy sector, but gives the president the authority to waive such a ban on national security grounds.

It also authorizes the president to provide assistance to peaceful pro-democracy and human rights groups in Iran.

The administration, in a letter to House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry Hyde, R-Ill., last month, said the bill could limit the flexibility needed to reach a diplomatic solution to the deadlock over Iran's nuclear program.

The State Department's legislative affairs chief, Jeffrey Bergner, wrote that it could inhibit the administration's ability "to build and maintain an international consensus to confront Iran's violations collectively."

"By sanctioning foreign countries and companies that have economic relations with Iran, this bill sanctions the very countries we need for a strong diplomatic effort," said Rep. Earl Blumenauer (news, bio, voting record), D-Ore.

Rep. Mike Pence (news, bio, voting record), R-Ind., a supporter of the legislation, said the bill had since been changed to give the administration more of the flexibility it sought.

The bill must still be taken up in the Senate, where prospects are unclear.

Hu Refuses To Back Iran Sanctions (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

President Bush directly appealed to Chinese President Hu Jintao last week to support economic sanctions on Iran for not abiding by international controls on its nuclear program, but Mr. Hu refused to do so now, Bush administration officials said.

"They left open the possibility that they could support sanctions in the future," said one official familiar with the summit discussions between the two leaders at the White House last Thursday.

Some administration officials were encouraged by Mr. Hu's response. Others said it was typical of Beijing's lack of support for the United States on the issue.

On Capitol Hill yesterday, the House voted to tighten sanctions against Iran until it complies international nuclear controls. The bill urges holding Iran "accountable for its threatening behavior and to support a transition to democracy in Iran."

The bill received overwhelming support, with a vote of 397-21, despite opposition from the White House, which thinks unilateral action could inhibit the administration's ability to build an international coalition.

The high-level request of Mr. Hu was part of the administration's push within the United Nations and the international community to gather support for sanctions against Iran. U.S. officials say Iran has violated agreements by enriching uranium, although it is short of the level needed to create nuclear weapons.

A report to the U.N. Security Council from Mohamed ElBaradei, director of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), will be sent to council members as early as today.

Officials said the report is expected to repeat earlier appeals for Iran to come into compliance with IAEA controls. The report also will not provide any language that could be used by Tehran to claim that its uranium enrichment outside of those controls has been permitted.

Submission of the IAEA report then is expected to set off a U.S.-led effort within the Security Council for a Chapter 7 resolution that could be passed within the next three months. The resolution would set the stage for economic sanctions or possibly even the use of force in the future to force Iran's compliance with international controls.

Officials said Russia is leading international opposition to sanctions and that China continues to support Moscow's position. The Russian government does not want to impose sanctions because of its sales of technology and military goods to Iran.

Moscow agreed earlier this month to send Tor-M1 anti-aircraft missiles to Iran that U.S. officials say could be used against U.S. or allied aircraft, if force is used to knock out Iran's nuclear facilities.

Moscow also has signed an agreement with Iran to upgrade Iran's Kilo-class submarines with the addition of SSN-27 anti-ship cruise missiles, weapons that could be used against U.S. Navy ships in the Persian Gulf, or that could also be used by Iran to disrupt oil shipments through the Hormuz Strait.

The administration hopes to persuade China to support the Chapter 7 resolution or at least to abstain from voting against it, the officials said.

However, Iran is using its oil sales to China to influence Beijing's political posture on the Iranian nuclear program, the officials said. China is buying regular shipments of Iranian oil that are needed to keep China's modernization effort going.

The governments of Britain, France and Germany, along with some other European states, appear ready to support sanctions, as a result of the failure of the talks with the Iranian government to resolve the standoff diplomatically, the officials said.

The House legislation, sponsored by Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, Florida Republican, in effect alters the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act of 10 years ago by strengthening sanctions against Iran while taking away restrictions on Libya, which is now cooperating with the West in eliminating weapons of mass destruction.

It states that weapons of mass destruction-related sanctions against Iran remain in effect until Iran has verified that it is dismantling its programs. It requires that sanctions be imposed on any person who exports or supplies to Iran goods or technology that help Iran obtain weapons of mass destruction.

Azerbaijan Leader Staying Out Of Iran Fray (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, April 27, 2006

President Ilham Aliev of Azerbaijan opened a three-day visit to the United States on Wednesday by saying he would not allow his country to be used by the U.S. for any operations against neighboring Iran.

Aliev, scheduled to meet with President Bush on Friday, cited a "very clear" agreement with Iran that the two countries would not permit their territory to be used for operations against the other.

His visit comes at a time of rising U.S. tensions with Iran over its nuclear program, and Aliev said he would remain at arms' length from that conflict.

"Azerbaijan will not be engaged in any kind of potential operation against Iran," he said in remarks at the private Council on Foreign Relations.

The Caspian nation, which shares a border with Iran and Russia, is strategically important to the U.S. because of its location and its role in supplying the West with oil.

Azerbaijan wants to remain an "island of stability" in the region, Aliev said. At the same time, he said Azerbaijan had sent troops to Iraq, Afghanistan and Kosovo, and would "do its best to stand shoulder-to-shoulder" with the United States on security.

The president, who took office in October 2003, has the potential to be an intermediary between the Bush administration and Iran. Iranian Defense Minister Mustafa Mohammad Najjar, on a visit to Baku last week, said Aliev could use his talks in Washington to "explain" Iran's views to the United States.

Aliev said he did not think Iran would be a "major aspect" of his talks in Washington, which are due to include a meeting with Vice President Dick Cheney. But he said "if the question of regional security arises we will discuss it."

Azerbaijan is committed to peace in the region, he said. "We need to try to provide peace and stability."

"At this time," he said, "it is best to concentrate on a peaceful resolution" of the dispute over Iran's nuclear programs, which the United States and European allies say seek development of a nuclear bomb.

On another issue, Aliev conceded there was need for political reform in his country, a former Soviet republic that became independent 16 years ago. Referring to Azerbaijan's energy boom, Aliev said "economic reform without political reform will lead to severe problems." He said his country was moving forward on both fronts.

Human rights groups have criticized the nation for restricting political and human rights and questioned whether U.S. criticism would be muted due to Azerbaijan's role in supplying the West with oil.

Freedom House on Tuesday said Azerbaijan restricts political and human rights and is among the lowest-ranked countries in the private rights group's annual surveys.

"President Bush has made democracy promotion a priority of his presidency," Freedom House executive director Jennifer Windsor said in a statement. "His upcoming meeting with President Aliev presents an important opportunity for him to discuss Azerbaijan's democracy deficit."

Aliev, in response to questions Wednesday, rejected the description of his government as a "regime" and said, "We have all the major freedoms."

In his remarks, Aliev spoke most about a dispute with Armenia over the Nagorno-Karabakh enclave of Azerbaijian. Ethnic Armenian forces occupy the region, in what Aliev called an occupation. He said Azerbaijan's recovery of the territory was not subject to negotiations.

Rice Confirmed To Attend Southeast Asia Security Meet (AFP)

AFP, April 27, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has confirmed she will attend Southeast Asia's annual security meeting here in July, Malaysian Foreign Minister Syed Hamid Albar said.

Syed Hamid said that Bangladesh would also make its first appearance as an observer at the regional meeting, where discussions will focus on issues including global terrorism and energy prices.

"I spoke to Condoleezza twice. She confirmed that she will be coming and is looking forward to attending the meeting. There will be full attendance by all the participants," the minister told reporters.

"There will also be a new member attending the ARF, that is Bangladesh," he said of the ASEAN Regional Forum which brings together the Association of Southeast Asian Nations and its key partners including China, Russia and Japan.

Rice shunned the ARF meeting in Laos last year, instead sending her deputy in what was seen as an attempt to pressure ASEAN into pushing its recalcitrant member Myanmar to introduce democratic reforms.

Under pressure from the international community, ASEAN at its annual summit last December signalled its impatience with Myanmar and sent Syed Hamid on an inspection visit there as its envoy.

Syed Hamid said this year's meeting will look at security and economic issues, as well as efforts to create a sense of regional unity among nations with different cultural, linguistic and religious backgrounds.

"Especially the question of energy will be discussed at great length because of the soaring prices of fuel, how it impacts the economies of ASEAN as well as our dialogue partners," he said.

"There is a desire on the part of ASEAN to be seen as cohesive and united. Of course the problem of Myanmar is there but I think this should not in any way impair ASEAN progress."

U.S. Trade Deals Embitter Latin Americans (AP)

By Joshua Goodman

AP, April 26, 2006

With the rise of China and stiff competition from Europe, the United States has been flexing its economic muscle in its own backyard.

Since 2003, when attempts to secure a hemispheric-wide free trade zone broke down, U.S. negotiators have signed bilateral, free trade agreements with nine Latin American nations. Two more, with Ecuador and Panama, are in the pipeline.

Despite skepticism among U.S. labor groups and Congress, those agreements have been an unqualified success for American exporters. For example, U.S. exports to Chile have almost doubled, to $5.2 billion last year, in the two years since the two countries signed a deal, the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative said.

But among Latin Americans, the dollar diplomacy has left a bitter taste.

"Nobody who sat across the negotiating table from the United States came out of the talks feeling they got a fair deal," said Peter Hakim, president of the nonpartisan Inter-American Dialogue think tank in Washington. "And many feel they've been outright cheated."

Part of the failure to impress is attributable to a surge of leftist leaders in Latin America, who've deftly capitalized on the region's traditional protectionism and mistrust of Washington.

But even economists concede that free trade has barely helped the region reduce widespread poverty, which has remained stagnant for decades.

Moreover, the pacts may end up hurting farmers and rural peasants who make up almost half of Latin America's 500 million people. By permanently locking in trade preferences, countries entering trade deals are effectively turning a blind eye to the $17 billion that U.S. farmers receive annually in government subsidies, making it extremely tough to compete.

Not surprisingly, support for U.S. free trade deals in Latin America may be turning.

In Ecuador, Indian protesters last month paralyzed much of the country for nearly two weeks demanding that President Alfredo Palacio suspend trade talks with the United States that have been ongoing for years.

And even the signing of a deal is no guarantee of its implementation. Legislatures in Costa Rica and Peru have stubbornly refused to rubber stamp recent deals even as calls by opposition politicians for national referendums have grown louder.

Still, despite the push by Argentina and Brazil to create a South American trade zone, for much of the region the price of saying no to Uncle Sam remains too high. Even if that means betraying popular goals of regional solidarity.

The experience of the Andean Community trade bloc — comprised of Bolivia, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru and Venezuela — is a case in point.

The recent trade deals by Colombia and Peru with the United States sounded the death knell for the 39-year-old trade bloc, at least in spirit. For example, in providing a quota for American soy products, Colombia effectively shut out Bolivia from what has been until now its top soy market, worth $170 million a year.

Citing Peru and Colombia's defections, President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela, a staunch opponent of U.S. free-trade deals, announced last week that he was pulling out of the trade bloc.

It remains to be seen how strongly the Venezuelan pullout could affect the $8 billion in annual trade among bloc members, and Venezuela's commerce minister said over the weekend that the withdrawal would be gradual, over five years.

The Andean Community says that trade among member countries has risen on average by 13.5 percent a year since 1990, when it began gradually lifting tariffs and liberalizing trade.

U.S. Probe Targets U.N. Department (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK -- The United Nations confirmed yesterday the U.S. Attorney's Office is investigating suspected wrongdoing in the office that handles procurement for U.N. peacekeeping operations.

In a further blow to the troubled peacekeeping department, a report by the Government Accountability Office (GAO) to be delivered to Congress today describes the procurement office as understaffed, poorly trained and badly lacking the oversight that would uncover corruption, fraud and waste.

Eight senior staff members were suspended with pay earlier this year, after an inquiry by the U.N. inspector general's office uncovered lax management and possible corruption.

Each will be reinstated or disciplined after a U.N. task force investigates nearly 500 procurement-related tips.

"The United Nations currently has an aggressive internal investigation into all aspects of the U.N. global procurement operations," said Undersecretary General for Management Christopher B. Burnham.

"There is also an ongoing investigation by the [U.S. Attorney for the] Southern District [of New York] into the procurement office, and the United Nations is cooperating fully."

The officials involved likely have diplomatic immunity, but Mr. Burnham said U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan would lift that protection if authorities request it.

Reports by the GAO will be presented today to the House International Relations Committee, where the United Nations is likely to draw sharp criticism from lawmakers who are exasperated by the Iraq oil-for-food scandal and frustrated by the slow pace of management reforms.

The United States last year contributed about $8 billion to the U.N. regular and peacekeeping budgets, and the Bush administration and lawmakers are intent on improving the international organization's accountability.

"Brazen corruption in procurement shocks the conscience of everyone paying attention," said Rep. Henry J. Hyde, Illinois Republican and chairman of the House International Relations Committee. "The January release of a [U.N. Office of Internal Oversight] peacekeeping procurement report illustrates that corruption has risen to crisis levels."

The 56-page review by the GAO finds deep flaws in the management, coordination, and oversight in the procurement office that spent about $1.6 billion last year on everything from trash disposal in the Balkans to fresh food rations in Sudan to helicopters and cargo planes in the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

The research was conducted over a 10-month period with U.N. assistance.

The GAO audit found key procurement departments understaffed. Although eight missions have been added in seven years and the peacekeeping budget has tripled, the procurement staff and related oversight bodies remained stable.

"U.N. resources are unnecessarily vulnerable to mismanagement, waste, fraud and abuse," the GAO report says, "because the procurement process is improperly managed; has not committed to maintaining a professional, trained work force; and has failed to adopt a full range of ethical guidelines."

An audit by Deloitte Consulting late last year also revealed shortcomings in peacekeeping procurement. Some of the deficiencies were identified as far back as 1992, when Mr. Annan ran the peacekeeping department.

The Bush administration lately has been pressing for reforms in the procurement and management divisions, but according to the GAO report, its efforts are long-delayed.

The U.S. Mission to the United Nations was without an ambassador-level officer for administration and management for 13 months, until Mark Wallace arrived in March.

The GAO auditors said that left meetings unstaffed, or attended by diplomats of a lower rank who lack "impact and influence."

"This key vacancy represents a missed opportunity for the United States in the formation of the U.N. management reform agenda agreed upon at the World Summit in 2005," the GAO report says.

The report recommends several reforms, including stronger oversight of the field, a database with contractors' performance histories and better mechanisms for vendors to report the irregularities that might indicate patterns of bid-rigging or influence.

There are 270 U.N. procurement officers spread over 19 far-flung peacekeeping missions, many of those in conflict areas with limited local resources.

Peacekeepers Targets Of New Sinai Attacks (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

EL ARISH, Egypt, April 26 — Two suicide bombers attacked members of a multinational peacekeeping force in the northern Egyptian Sinai on Wednesday, two days after a triple bomb attack killed nearly two dozen in a resort south of here.

The suicide blasts were small, officials said, killing only the attackers while damaging two security vehicles. But their timing — so soon after Monday's attacks — and the location in one of the Egypt's highest security zones raised concerns that the country might again be faced with the kind of sustained terrorist threat it struggled to suppress a decade ago.

The bombings on Wednesday — against members of a multinational peacekeeping force established in 1982 after a peace treaty between Egypt and Israel — came as investigators rounded up suspects and sorted through evidence in the triple bomb attack on the southern Sinai resort town of Dahab.

The latest attacks added to a general sense of anxiety, both inside and outside the government, over challenges facing the Arab world's most populated country. The government has been buffeted on multiple fronts, from sectarian strife in Alexandria, where a Muslim resident recently attacked three Coptic Christian churches, sparking days of riots, to a protest by thousands of judges demanding independence from the executive branch, to the emergence of the fundamentalist Muslim Brotherhood as the only organized political opposition.

The string of bombings in the Sinai — at a time when the government has increasingly moved to stifle political opposition — has also prompted many people to charge that the authorities are so focused on political control they have undermined their ability to fight terrorism.

"The problem is you cannot separate what's happening now from the general atmosphere in Egypt," said Dr. Emad Gad, an analyst at the government-financed Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo. "There is a state of apprehension. Part of the problem rests in the fact that the Egyptian security agencies are concerned about confronting civil society interactions."

While the government insists it has made every effort to combat domestic terrorism, it has appeared stumped over to how to safeguard its tourist industry in the Sinai, one of the pillars of the nation's economy.

Magdy Rady, the chief government spokesman, said Wednesday night that the government recognized that it needed to address security in the Sinai in a comprehensive way — from improving roads to building schools — and said the government had developed a master plan to address the many concerns of the region. But he disputed the notion that the spate of attacks suggested a government failure, saying they occurred as tourism and the economy had begun to improve.

"The prime minister said something very true, that it seems like there are some people who do not like for Egypt to wake up," Mr. Rady said. "We were approaching a record in tourism. We are heading to a 6 or 7 percent growth rate, part of it because of investment, part because of tourism, and all this terrorism will affect this."

The aftermath of the Dahab attack demonstrated the nearly impossible task the government faced in trying to deter terrorism. While security at hotels has been tightened around the country, those responsible for Dahab went after the softest of targets — the middle of a crowded pedestrian walkway. Men, women and children were killed and maimed.

There have been multiple bombings in the Sinai in the last two years, and investigators say that what is worrisome is that they all appear connected — including Dahab and the suicide blasts.

Investigators said the attacks seemed to be the work of locals, mostly people from the Northern Sinai region who know the area and can avoid the intense security and checkpoints that are routine here, and have decided that they are willing to kill to undermine the government. An Interior Ministry statement said it had information that the attackers in Dahab and Northern Sinai were Sinai Bedouins.

"It is obvious that there is a link, especially since there are still suspects at large from the first attacks," said a top security official who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

The first attack on Wednesday occurred about 11 a.m. when a suicide bomber exploded a device near a van carrying two Egyptian officials and two peacekeepers with the multinational force, not far from their base in Al Gorah, about 15 miles west of the Gaza Strip.

The second bomb blew up five minutes later beside an Egyptian police vehicle responding to the first attack, officials with the multinational force said, adding that the bombers were the only ones injured in either attack.

But the bombings, while far less bloody than those in Dahab, sent a chill through Cairo.

For the first time since Hosni Mubarak became president, Egyptians are pressing his government in ways they have never dared to before, and the protests continue despite beatings and arrests by the security forces. As the suicide bombers were attacking the peacekeeping forces, for example, some of Egypt's most prominent judges were in the eighth day of a Cairo sit-in to demand independence from the executive branch.

"There are cracks everywhere, and what we have seen in the recent weeks are symptoms of deeper cracks in the regime," said Saad Eddin Ibrahim, who was once jailed for his own democracy work.

"The people are no longer as afraid of the regime as they used to be," he said. "Part of it is because of their ineptitude of handling big problems in the country whether social, political, or economic."

Mr. Rady, the government spokesman disagrees, saying that it is because of Egypt's successes that it has been the target of attacks.

"Even though there are some trespasses, we are heading the right way in many things, and every time we are about to accomplish something, there is a hit that brings us back a bit," he said. "We are adamant to head for our target despite all these problems. But there is someone trying to pull us back."

Two Bombers Target Forces In Egypt (WP)

By Daniel Williams

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

CAIRO, April 26 -- Bombers targeting Egyptian police and a U.S.-led multinational peacekeeping force killed only themselves in a pair of attacks Wednesday in northern Sinai, two days after blasts at a resort in the southern part of the peninsula left at least 18 civilians dead.

The attacks displayed the Egyptian government's continuing difficulty in pacifying the rugged Sinai region, which has become a stronghold for violent groups, government officials said.

In the first attack Wednesday, a man approached a vehicle operated by the Multinational Force and Observers or MFO, which has monitored the Sinai as an element of the 1979 Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty. The bomber blew himself up, perhaps as he tossed an explosive at the vehicle, according to Mahmoud Fishawy, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry.

The blast broke a window of the vehicle, which was carrying two police agents and soldiers from the Norwegian and New Zealand contingents. Neither the Egyptian police officers nor the peacekeepers were injured, Fishawy said.

A second bomber was riding a bicycle and tried to block a police car carrying two Egyptian police officers on their way to investigate the first explosion. The bomber also blew himself up, said Fishawy, labeling it a suicide attack. Neither of the police officers was hurt.

The peacekeeping force has operated largely in safety. Last August, however, a roadside bomb detonated near an MFO vehicle and slightly wounded two Canadian peacekeepers.

The Wednesday attacks followed the deployment of extra police officers and soldiers and additional checkpoints in the Sinai after Monday's explosions in the town of Dahab, where three bombs exploded on a seaside promenade.

The Egyptian interior minister, Habib al-Adli, said the bombings this week were linked to an attack last July in Sharm el-Sheikh, which killed 64 people, and to one in 2004 in Taba and another nearby resort close to the Israeli border, which killed 34 people.

Egyptian officials have blamed the bombings on Islamic extremists who have their roots in a disaffected Bedouin population that has complained of government repression and neglect. Massive police roundups of suspects that followed the Taba and Sharm el-Sheikh bombings also stirred discontent, officials said. In an announcement about Wednesday's bombings, the Interior Ministry specified that the second attacker was Bedouin.

"Sinai is a place where the government has not been present," a senior government official acknowledged. "Bedouins know the area better than any security official."

President Hosni Mubarak, a longtime U.S. ally, recently hinted he would extend emergency laws that have been in force since 1981, on the grounds that easing them would pose "a serious danger." The laws, originally justified as a means to fight terrorism, permit authorities to detain Egyptians indefinitely without charges, try civilians in military courts and restrict public gatherings, speech and political activity. Opposition groups and pro-democracy forces say the laws are used to buttress Mubarak's 25-year reign and stifle reform in advance of a move to transfer power to his son, Gamal.

In addition to the Sinai attacks, Egypt has recently experienced a spike in violence between Muslims and Coptic Christians, a minority in Egypt. Two weekends ago, the fatal stabbing of an elderly Coptic man by a Muslim assailant ignited three days of sectarian street battles in the Mediterranean port city of Alexandria.

Moreover, police killed at least 10 Egyptians during parliamentary elections last year when security agents blocked access to several polling stations, and on Dec. 30 last year, 23 Sudanese migrants were killed when police cleared an encampment in Cairo set up to protest refugee repatriations.

The bombings Wednesday took place near the peacekeeping force's base near the town of Rafah, on Egypt's border with the Gaza Strip.

A statement from the force's headquarters in Rome said the first assault took place at 11 a.m., as a peacekeeping vehicle left the el-Gorah base. The Egyptian police had visited the base to handle travel paperwork for the peacekeepers, the Interior Ministry said. The second bombing attempt took place 35 minutes later on a road between Rafah and el-Gorah.

The multinational force includes 1,800 troops from 10 countries: the United States, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Italy, France, Colombia, Hungary, Uruguay and Fiji. Although not technically a member, Norway provides the force with three officers.

Putin Talks Of Sending Oil To Asia, Not Europe (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

MOSCOW, April 26 — President Vladimir V. Putin said Wednesday that Russia should direct future oil and natural gas exports to Asia because "unprincipled competition" had blocked its energy companies from expanding elsewhere.

With the bold warning that Russia has other export options, Mr. Putin waded into a debate in Europe over the plans of Gazprom, the natural gas monopoly, which is trying to enter the retail gas market.

Mr. Putin couched his words in a discussion of a new Siberian pipeline to ship oil to China, Japan and other Pacific Rim markets. He spoke before a meeting on energy issues with Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany in the Siberian city of Tomsk.

This week, the Russian oil pipeline operator Transneft said that it would break ground on Friday on a 1,400-mile pipeline from eastern Siberia to the Pacific Ocean. The pipeline, which will be able to carry 1.5 million barrels a day, could divert exports to Asia that now go to Europe.

The swagger in Mr. Putin's remark suggests his government believes it now has a strong negotiating hand with Europe on energy issues.

After Gazprom briefly cut natural gas exports to Ukraine in January, European leaders questioned Russia's reliability as a supplier.

It is certainly a large one. At the end of trading on Wednesday, the stock market value of Gazprom was $267 billion, more than BP, Europe's largest energy company. The value put Gazprom in second place after Exxon Mobil of the United States. Gazprom is now the fourth-largest company in the world after Exxon, General Electric and Microsoft.

"We often encounter unfair competition on international markets," Mr. Putin told a business forum held before the summit with Ms. Merkel.

"Despite the great demand for energy resources, attempts are made, under all sorts of pretexts, to restrict us," he said. "Remember that the nations of the Asia-Pacific region are developing at an enormous rate, and they need our cooperation."

Ms. Merkel, who was brought up in East Germany, has taken a firmer line with Mr. Putin than her predecessor, Gerhard Shröder. Still, the German companies E.On and BASF were expected to sign a big natural gas deal with Gazprom at Tomsk.

Outside of Germany, Gazprom's business is not progressing smoothly. British news media reported this month that regulators had held eight meetings on how to block a possible bid by Gazprom to buy Centrica, Britain's largest gas distributor.

Thus, Mr. Putin's comments about "unprincipled competition" seemed to reflect, in part, unhappiness at Gazprom, though Prime Minister Tony Blair's office said Wednesday saying that it would not interfere in a Gazprom bid for Centrica.

Gazprom's deputy director, Aleksandr I. Medvedev, said Tuesday on the BBC "Hardball" program that Gazprom was considering buying Centrica but was not in talks with it.

Because of Gazprom's wealth from high energy prices, "it is very difficult to find a company which is not on our watch list," Mr. Medvedev said. Gazprom says there are many companies in Europe it would like to acquire: "Let me calculate," said Mr. Medvedev. "It will not be enough to have all the fingers on my hand."

Across Europe, Gazprom has found its association with the Russian government a liability in making acquisitions, analysts say.

As the Centrica plans soured, Gazprom's chief executive, Aleksei B. Miller, warned European ambassadors that Gazprom would turn to Asia if it felt unwelcome in Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0027052

Still, energy analysts say it is unlikely that Russia could intentionally curtail exports to Europe because of the high cost of unused export capacity. Instead, Europe's supply after the Siberian pipeline opens will hinge on whether Russia pumps enough oil to satisfy both markets.

Putin Uses Asia In Power Play On EU (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, April 27, 2006

MOSCOW -- President Vladimir Putin warned that Moscow would shift its energy focus to Asia if Europe resisted its expansion plans, ratcheting up the tension in an escalating row over Russia's international energy ambitions.

His comments come amid growing concerns in European countries about becoming overly dependent on Russian energy, as natural-gas giant OAO Gazprom looks to acquire distribution and marketing assets across Europe. Last week, Gazprom officials told European Union ambassadors that it would redirect exports to other markets if its European ambitions were thwarted.

"People are using various pretexts to limit us to the north, the south and the west," Mr. Putin told a meeting of regional governors in Tomsk, Siberia. "Unfortunately, we are very often coming across methods of unfair competition in world markets." The countries of the Asia-Pacific region "need cooperation with us," he added.

Russia has long said it wants to diversify its energy exports. Last month Gazprom announced plans to build two pipelines that could eventually supply China with 60 billion to 80 billion cubic meters of gas a year, with first deliveries in about five years.

But many analysts say that for the time being, Gazprom's threat to sell its gas elsewhere is empty rhetoric. Most of its pipelines flow westward; indeed, it recently started building one under the Baltic Sea to Germany, in partnership with BASF AG and E.On AG. A Gazprom official said this week that the company's share of the European market was set to grow to 33% by 2010 from 26% now.

"If you take into consideration where world gas reserves are, Europe will remain Russia's core gas market for the foreseeable future," said Kakha Kiknavelidze, an analyst at Brunswick UBS bank in Moscow.

The president's comments came hours before a summit in Tomsk with German Chancellor Angela Merkel, who represents Russia's biggest natural-gas customer. Ms. Merkel is expected to press Mr. Putin on the security of Russian energy supplies, an issue that has become contentious since Russia briefly shut off natural-gas supplies to Ukraine in January over a pricing dispute.

Gazprom's warning to the EU last week followed reports in British media that the United Kingdom government had considered changing merger rules to stop Gazprom from taking over Centrica PLC, Britain's biggest natural-gas supplier, a move Gazprom said it might consider. U.K. officials later said authorities wouldn't try to block such a bid.

The storm over Centrica prompted accusations by Gazprom that Europe was trying to politicize the energy issue. Gazprom made a similar charge over the International Energy Charter, which the EU wants Russia to ratify. That would break Gazprom's monopoly by requiring it to allow third-party access to its export pipeline network. So far, Gazprom remains opposed.

Putin Reroutes Oil Line To Avoid Landmark Lake (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

MOSCOW, April 26 — President Vladimir V. Putin ordered Wednesday that an oil pipeline being built across Siberia be rerouted away from the northern shore of Lake Baikal, one of the world's natural landmarks.

Mr. Putin's edict reversed a controversial government decision last month to allow Russia's pipeline monopoly, Transneft, to build the line within a half mile of Lake Baikal, the world's most voluminous body of fresh water.

The pipeline, a $11.5 billion, 2,500-mile project, will pump Russian oil to markets in Asia.

Rare public protests followed the approval in March of the initial route, with rallies from Moscow to Irkutsk, the Siberian region bordering the lake.

"It was not a huge wave," Aleksandr Shuvalov, deputy executive director of Greenpeace Russia, said of the protests, "but it was a wave."

The pipeline's route, so close to Lake Baikal, had raised concerns that any accident in a remote, seismically active region could send oil spilling into a lake holding more than 20 percent of the world's fresh water and an abundance of unique wildlife species. Not only environmental groups, but also Russian scientists opposed Transneft's planned route.

A commission of specialists from the Russian Academy of Sciences initially opposed the route on environmental grounds. Its recommendation was rejected and a new review ordered with new specialists.

Mr. Putin's decision on Wednesday was an unexpected reversal and appeared choreographed for state television networks. Meeting with federal and regional officials in Tomsk, a Siberian city, he publicly chided Transneft's director, Semyon M. Vainshtok, after asking if there was an alternative to the contested route.

"Since you hesitate, it means that there is such a possibility," Mr. Putin told a visibly uncomfortable Mr. Vainshtok. "If there had not been such a possibility, you would have said 'no' without any doubt."

Mr. Putin then ordered that the route hew more closely to one previously recommended by the Academy of Sciences but rejected by a regulatory agency. He said a new route should be charted at least 40 kilometers, or nearly 25 miles, from Lake Baikal. That would put it outside of Baikal's watershed, environmental groups said.

Mr. Shuvalov called it "a victory of common sense."

The reversal underscored Mr. Putin's highly centralized power and his penchant for dramatic gestures. Wielding a pen in front of an oversize map of the Baikal region, he swept aside decisions by several government agencies, as well as those by Transneft, which had warned that finding another route would be prohibitively expensive.

Mr. Vainshtok and other officials from Transneft could not be reached for comment. They had said that the planned route would be safe and that moving it could add nearly $1 billion to the cost of the pipeline. When Mr. Vainshtok, in the televised exchange, suggested that the pipeline would have to move "much farther north," Mr. Putin responded curtly.

"If there is at least a tiny chance of polluting Baikal," he said, "we, thinking of future generations, must do everything not only to minimize this threat, but to exclude it."

Natalya Podkovyrzina, a leader of Baikal Wave, an environmental group in Irkutsk, said it was not yet clear if the pipeline could easily be built where Mr. Putin said. "Forty kilometers to the north is a mountainous area, highlands and impassable taiga," she said. Mr. Putin decided to move the pipeline as Russia, with Ukraine and Belarus, commemorated the 20th anniversary of the nuclear accident at Chernobyl. The authorities broke up a protest against nuclear energy in Moscow, briefly detaining a dozen Greenpeace protesters who had chained themselves to a fence at St. Basil's Cathedral, in Red Square.

Sudan's Bashir Rebuffs U.N. On Peacekeepers (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, April 26 -- Sudan's president has rejected a U.N. appeal to allow its peacekeepers into the Darfur region to help stem a tide of violence that has left more than 100,000 dead and more than 2 million displaced over the past three years, a senior U.N. official told the Security Council on Wednesday.

The remarks represented a setback for a U.S.-backed proposal to send more than 15,000 U.N. and NATO peacekeepers to Darfur to replace an underequipped African Union force of more than 6,000 troops. The Bush administration has accused Sudan and a government-backed militia of committing genocide in Darfur.

Hedi Annabi, the United Nations' second-ranking peacekeeping official, told the 15-nation council in a closed session that Khartoum formally rejected a request to send an assessment mission there. "Such an assessment remains an indispensable step in the planning process," said Annabi, who briefed the council on a recent meeting with Sudan's president, Lt. Gen. Omar Hassan Bashir, in Khartoum.

Annabi warned that Sudan's opposition could doom U.N. peacekeeping plans. He suggested the council look outside the United Nations for troops if it decides to intervene in Darfur without an invitation from the government.

"The government of Sudan remains opposed to a transition to a United Nations operation in Darfur and has so far been unwilling to cooperate with our planning efforts," Annabi told the council.

The Bush administration accused Khartoum of stalling. "This is just delaying and delaying and delaying, and it's consistent with the pattern that the Sudanese government has followed for years in this," said John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

Annabi said the Sudanese leader left open the possibility of some U.N. role in assisting peace efforts if Khartoum makes peace with two Darfurian rebel groups. Peace talks underway in Abuja, Nigeria, are to conclude Sunday.

If those talks fail, and the Security Council were to decide to intervene without Khartoum's approval, Annabi said that "such a mission is better undertaken by means other than a U.N. operation." The Bush administration has secured NATO approval for a plan to send several hundred NATO advisers to bolster the African Union peacekeeping mission, as a first step in the transition to a U.N. mission, officials said. The Bush administration also sponsored a resolution Tuesday imposing a travel ban and freezing the assets of a senior Sudanese air force officer and three other Sudanese nationals for committing war crimes or impeding the peace process in Darfur.

Darfur's two main rebel groups, the Sudan Liberation Army and the Justice and Equality Movement, launched an insurgency in early 2003, alleging Khartoum was discriminating against the region's black African tribes. In an effort to quell the uprising, Sudan recruited, trained and supported local Arab militia, known as the Janjaweed, who have murdered, raped and terrorized hundreds of thousands of civilians suspected of backing the rebels.

While the death toll is unknown, U.N. officials and outside analysts estimate that 100,000 to 400,000 may have died from violence, disease and hunger.

Senior U.N. officials say that violence in Darfur has escalated in recent months, forcing more than 200,000 civilians from their homes since December. New York-based Human Rights Watch reported last week that the Sudanese government has launched a new military offensive in South Darfur, targeting villages in rebel controlled territory. On Monday, Sudanese Antonov aircraft and helicopter gunships fired indiscriminately at civilians during a raid in South Darfur, according to the rights group.

"Khartoum's new attacks on civilians show the Security Council needs to move quickly on a U.N. protection force for Darfur," said Peter Takirambudde, Africa director for Human Rights Watch. "They also show that the sanctions, while welcome, may not hit hard enough -- or high enough -- and civilians will continue to pay the price."

U.S. Options On Darfur Are Running Out (NYT)

By Joel Brinkley

The New York Times, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 26 — As the violence in the Darfur region of Sudan grows ever more deadly, Bush administration officials now acknowledge that they have few if any promising policy options for containing the carnage.

If there is no agreement by Sunday on a way to resolve the crisis, the long-running peace talks are to be disbanded. But hopes for an agreement are low.

One proposal, to send 20,000 United Nations peacekeepers to Sudan, has been stymied by Khartoum's adamant opposition. Without the government's agreement, the Bush administration acknowledges, dispatching troops to Darfur would rightly be viewed as an invasion.

"Sudan policy has run off the road into a ditch," said John Prendergast, a former senior Africa specialist for the government.

This comes as public outrage, sporadic before, is growing over the continuing bloodshed in Darfur, which the United States characterizes as genocide. States, including Maine, New Jersey and Illinois, and cities and private groups across the United States are cutting financial ties to companies that do business with Sudan.

A coalition of advocacy groups called SaveDarfur.org has organized a large rally in Washington for this weekend featuring speakers from Congress, the administration, Hollywood and religious organizations.

An estimated 200,000 people have died in Darfur since the violence began three years ago, and more than two million others have been driven from their homes. For the administration, the greatest hope centers on the peace talks in Abuja, Nigeria, which have limped along for almost two years.

The United Nations and the African Union, sponsor of the talks, have given the government of Sudan and the Darfur rebels until Sunday to reach agreement on a draft treaty that the mediators wrote and handed to both parties on Tuesday.

Both sides agreed to look at it but were otherwise noncommittal. While the two sides have agreed on some issues during previous sessions, the remaining disagreements are thick with complexity and emotion.

"We will respect the deadline, and if there are no indications that a deal is possible, we will wind up" the talks, said Sam Ibok, leader of the African Union mediating team.

Robert B. Zoellick, the deputy secretary of state, said in an interview on Wednesday, "There's a fighting chance" to reach agreement by Sunday. Jan Pronk, the chief United Nations envoy in Sudan, said the mediators might be willing to extend the talks a few days if significant progress was being made, but probably not much more than that. "It's now or never," he said.

Mr. Zoellick added, "If there is no peace accord, then it becomes a different mission."

The plan to send up to 20,000 United Nations peacekeepers to Darfur, to replace the 7,000 African Union soldiers stationed there now, presents formidable obstacles.

The United States and Europe have largely financed the African Union mission, but both have concluded that it is inadequate for the job. In February, the Security Council agreed to begin planning to send United Nations troops. The Bush administration said at the time that it would support the idea of having NATO take the lead in overseeing an interim African Union force until the arrival of United Nations troops.

But Sudan has remained opposed, and Khartoum has lobbied other African states, with some success, to view the idea as an affront to Sudanese sovereignty. Some of those other states would have to take part in any United Nations mission.

Now the Sudanese government is refusing even to grant visas to the United Nations team that wants to visit Darfur to assess the possible mission. But Sudan said it might change its mind if a Darfur peace agreement was reached.

Mr. Zoellick, in a speech this month to the Brookings Institution, said, "Either you get approval of the government," or "you invade, and that's a very big, serious challenge."

DOJ_NMG_0027055

In an interview on Wednesday, Mr. Pronk said Sudan was even more opposed to President Bush's NATO proposal.

"Wise diplomacy," Mr. Pronk said, means "you don't talk about NATO. It is viewed here as intervention, new colonialism."

What is more, few countries have expressed any willingness to send forces or equipment as part of the United Nations mission — and then only if Khartoum agrees. The State Department says Morocco, Pakistan, Ukraine, Russia and others have made tentative commitments.

"The United Nations has been flummoxed at every juncture," said Mr. Prendergast, who was director for African affairs in the National Security Council during the Clinton administration. Now he is a senior adviser for the International Crisis Group, a nonprofit organization.

The conflict in Darfur began in February 2003, when rebel groups attacked government positions, accusing the leaders in Khartoum of ignoring their region. The government struck back with a fury, enlisting local militias to massacre civilians and destroy entire villages. The world was slow to acknowledge the problem, but in September 2004, the Bush administration stated that the carnage constituted genocide.

African Union troops began arriving in Darfur last year, and for a while the violence diminished. But in recent months it has picked up with new ferocity and has spread to Chad, where Sudanese militias are raiding Chadian villages along the border. Sudan, a senior administration official said, had also supplied weapons to rebels that attacked Ndjamena, the capital of Chad, earlier this month.

As he gave the warring groups a copy of the draft Darfur agreement on Tuesday evening, Salim Ahmed Salim, the chief mediator, said: "This is decision time. No more procrastination, no more antics, no more delaying tactics. The eyes of the world are on you."

But a senior United Nations official noted another serious problem, even if the parties agreed: the proposed agreement calls for an immediate cease-fire, but the African Union troops in Darfur have already shown they are incapable of enforcing a cease-fire.

"If there are violations on the ground," the official said, "the whole thing could fall apart."

Maoists Declare Three-month Truce In Nepal (FT)

By Binod Bhattarai In Kathmandu

Financial Times, April 27, 2006

Maoist rebels in Nepal declared a unilateral three-month truce on Thursday ahead of the country's first parliamentary meeting since King Gyanendra handed over power to a seven-party alliance on Monday.

The Maoist party chairman Prachanda said the ceasefire was an attempt to "encourage" the seven parties to declare an "unconditional" constituent assembly election to re-write the constitution for a "democratic republic".

"The people's liberation army will not engage in offensive actions during the ceasefire and will remain in defensive positions," the Maoist chief said in an emailed statement.

On Wednesday, the Maoists lifted their blockades on highways following assurances by the leaders of the seven parties that they would hold a constituent assembly election.

The parties are organising a formal "victory rally" in the centre of Kathmandu later on Thursday when top leaders are expected to publicly articulate their commitment to such a move when parliament convenes on Friday.

Crumbling under three weeks of relentless anti-monarchy protests, the king ended 14 months of direct rule on Monday and agreed to let the seven parties implement their road map for peace in Nepal.

This road map is a result of the November 2005 "understanding" between the seven parties – that collectively control 90 per cent seats in parliament – and the Maoists. It is an agreement to end "absolute monarchy" and hold a constituent assembly election for writing a new constitution.

On Wednesday, the Maoists warned that they would re-impose the blockades if the parties do not declare a constituent assembly election on Friday when the parliament meets after a four-year "recess".

The Maoists had returned to war in January after the royal government did not reciprocate a unilateral ceasefire they declared in September 2005. Over 13,200 people have been killed after the Maoists began their bloody campaign to topple the monarchy in February 1996.

Nepal's parliament was dissolved in May 2002 and the king sacked the elected prime minister. Since February 2005, the country had been under the king's direct rule after he sacked the third prime minister he hand-picked, citing the government's failure to control the Maoist rebellion.

Nepal's Rebels Now Face Difficult Choices (WP)

By John Lancaster

DOJ_NMG_0027056

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

KATHMANDU, Nepal, April 26 -- From the grounds of Nakhu prison here, Matrika Yadav watched with a sense of elation, he said, as protesters streamed down a nearby road, chanting slogans against King Gyanendra. The Maoist ideologue was convinced that the end of the country's monarchy, nearly 2 1/2 centuries old, was near.

Now, he said, he's not so sure.

Earlier this week, Gyanendra capitulated to the protesters, agreeing to reinstate parliament in a decision that turned the streets of the capital into a huge victory party on Tuesday. His retreat opened the door for the writing of a new constitution that could eliminate the monarchy.

That is the goal of Maoist rebels whose 10-year insurgency has claimed at least 12,000 lives. But for Yadav and other leaders of the rebellion, Gyanendra's eleventh-hour concession to an alliance of mainstream parties, which had orchestrated weeks of protests in loose cooperation with the rebels, was cause for suspicion, not celebration.

"The parties were caught in his trap, against the will of the people," said Yadav, 48, the highest-ranking Maoist in government custody in Nepal. "If they would have waited for a few more days, the downfall of the monarchy was inevitable."

The writers of the new constitution could agree to retain the monarchy in some form.

Yadav's conflicted reaction to the massive display of people power, which brought the Himalayan kingdom to the brink of anarchy, illustrates the dilemma of a rebel movement that wants to retain a voice in above-ground politics but not at the price of abandoning its weapons or dreams of communist utopia.

Some analysts here say they believe that the tumult of recent weeks could open the way for an end to the insurgency, by creating a new political framework in which the Maoists can work peacefully. On Wednesday, the rebels declared a three-month unilateral cease-fire, to start Thursday, saying they wanted to facilitate a constituent assembly that will draft the constitution.

In a 90-minute interview at the prison Wednesday afternoon, Yadav, a slight, boyish-looking man in rimless eyeglasses and blue windbreaker, denounced the mainstream parties as "status quo-ist and feudal" and said some Nepalis could be forced to undergo "reculturization" in labor camps following the inevitable triumph of the revolution.

At the same time, he insisted that the Maoists were still willing to work with the mainstream parties -- "synergy is a must" -- and would cooperate, up to a point, in holding elections for a constituent assembly.

"We strongly honor the opinion of the people, and what we are saying is the opinion of the people," he said.

The Maoist party's struggle to reconcile its hard-line ideology with popular will was evident in its muddled response to Gyanendra's announcement late Monday that he would meet the seven-party alliance's demand to reinstate parliament, dissolved nearly four years ago.

On Tuesday, the Maoists' leader, who goes by the name Prachanda, denounced the king's proclamation as "a sham and a conspiracy against the Nepali people" and called for the protest movement to continue. By Wednesday, the rebel leader had softened his stance and agreed to suspend a blockade against the capital, at least until the parliament holds its first meeting on Friday.

In a statement, Prachanda said the decision came in response to an appeal from the incoming prime minister, G.P. Koirala, who earlier Wednesday promised that the new parliament was committed to holding elections for the constituent assembly. In writing a new constitution, the assembly could decide, among other issues, the future of the monarchy.

Although Maoist leaders have at times professed respect for democratic principles, their actions and ideology have not been consistent with that path. After Nepal became a constitutional monarchy in 1990, the Maoist party took part in mainstream politics until 1996, when its leadership proclaimed the experiment with democracy a failure and took the movement underground.

Maoist leaders now espouse "the Prachanda path," which blends the teachings of Chinese revolutionary leader Mao Zedong with homegrown remedies tailored to the specific social conditions of Nepal, such as caste discrimination.

The party's armed wing, equipped with homemade bombs and rifles looted from police, is thought to consist of about 7,000 full-time fighters, with as many as 25,000 militia supporters. They have the run of Nepal's mountainous countryside and at times have staged mass attacks on army outposts and other government installations.

At the same time, Maoist ideologues have retained their links to mainstream parties. At a meeting in New Delhi last November, the rebels and the parties formed a loose alliance aimed at rolling back Gyanendra's "royal coup" of Feb. 1, 2005, when the monarch assumed dictatorial powers that he said were needed to defeat the rebels.

About 70 Maoists are behind bars at Nakhu prison, a dingy single-story building surrounded by razor wire and sandbagged sentry posts on the capital's hilly outskirts. The most prominent inmate is Yadav, a grain trader's son with an eighth-grade education who joined the Maoist party at 19 and eventually rose to membership in its 27-member politburo.

During a cease-fire in 2003, he was part of a five-man team that tried unsuccessfully to negotiate a peace settlement with the government. He was arrested the following year in India and turned over to Nepali authorities.

On Wednesday afternoon, Yadav sat behind a wire-mesh screen in the visitors area of the prison, good-naturedly fielding questions from two American journalists as a fellow inmate translated his words into English.

While acknowledging the success of the mainstream parties' efforts to generate turnout for the protests, he said the Maoists deserve most of the credit for the king's capitulation because it was only under threat of rebel violence that Gyanendra agreed to go as far as he did. "To say this is the outcome of peaceful demonstrations, peaceful movement, is nothing but an illusion," he said.

Yadav described prison life as cramped but bearable, with frequent games of chess and table tennis interspersed with classes on communist ideology. The prisoners are permitted televisions and radios.

Yadav's time behind bars has apparently done nothing to cool his revolutionary ardor. "Marxism has failed nowhere," he said. "It has only been defeated for some time."

Headaches Piling Up For Britain's Blair (AP)

By Beth Gardiner

AP, April 26, 2006

In a single disastrous day, one of Prime Minister Tony Blair's closest allies came under fire over a prisoner release scandal, his deputy admitted an extramarital fling, and his health secretary endured jeers from nurses.

The headaches are piling up for Blair and his Labour Party ahead of local elections that could reduce the British leader's chances of hanging on to power if they go badly.

"There's an accumulation, a silting up of problems," said Patrick Dunleavy, a political scientist at the London School of Economics. "It's a very bad dynamic for Labour."

Conservative Party leader David Cameron pounced on Blair after the nation's top law enforcement official admitted officials released more than 1,000 foreign convicts from prison without considering whether they should be deported.

Calling for Home Secretary Charles Clarke's resignation, Cameron said Wednesday: "He has presided over systemic failure, he's failed to deal with it and he ... misled people about the scale of the problem."

"I don't agree with that," Blair responded, although he failed to offer a staunch defense of Clarke and hustled out of the room as the home secretary rose to speak.

Clarke disclosed Tuesday that 1,023 foreigners who should have been considered for deportation had instead completed prison sentences and gone free between February 1999 and March 2006, without officials considering whether they should have been ejected from Britain. He said 288 were freed even after top officials were alerted to the problem last summer.

Blair said the system for reviewing foreign prisoners' cases "has been seriously and fundamentally at fault" but is now functioning properly.

Crime and immigration are key political issues, so the disclosures have the potential to do real damage to Blair. Clarke is a crucial ally in Blair's power struggle with Treasury chief Gordon Brown, who is eager for the prime minister to step aside so he can take over.

The government has been badly damaged by Labour's admission last month that it secretly received nearly $25 million in undisclosed loans from wealthy backers. Blair denies he nominated some supporters to the House of Lords in exchange for financial support of the party.

Support for Labour hit 32 percent, its lowest point in 19 years, in a poll published Tuesday.

Deputy Prime Minister John Prescott's acknowledgment of an extramarital affair with a secretary 25 years his junior was another blow, adding a sordid element to the government's problems.

Prescott's office confirmed the Daily Mirror newspaper had accurately reported his admission that "I did have a relationship with her which I regret."

The newspaper printed photos showing Prescott, 67, with his arm around Tracey Temple, 43, and Temple unbuttoning his shirt at an office Christmas party.

Things failed to improve as Wednesday wore on. Health Secretary Patricia Hewitt faced loud jeers of "Shame!" and "Resign!" as she spoke at a convention of nurses furious about changes the government is pushing through the National Health Service.

Health workers blame Blair's introduction of private contractors and financing deals into the public service for its big budget gaps and layoffs. The prime minister has said he will not back down.

Dunleavy said he believed Clarke would ultimately be forced to resign over the foreign prisoner releases.

Combined with a poor Labour showing in the vote next week for local council members, a Clarke resignation could increase pressure on Blair to step down this summer, Dunleavy said. However, he said he thought the prime minister was unlikely to do so unless his problems get a lot worse.

Clarke said he offered to quit last year over the releases of the foreign prisoners. The prime minister's office said Clarke repeated the offer this week, but Blair felt he should stay on.

Conservative lawmakers booed and jeered as Clarke stood in the House of Commons to make a statement Wednesday.

"I do apologize, I have apologized, I continue to do so," he said.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Juror In Lodi Terror Trial Claims She Was Coerced To Make Conviction. The San Francisco Chronicle (4/28, Bulwa, Writer) reports, "One of 12 jurors who convicted a 23-year-old Lodi man Tuesday on charges that he trained for holy war disavowed the verdict late Thursday, alleging that she was bullied into a guilty finding amid a pattern of misconduct by fellow panelists." In an affidavit juror Arcelia Lopez said, "I never once throughout the deliberation process and the reading of the verdict believed Hamid Hayat to be guilty." She "said the jury's foreman, near the start of the two-month trial, 'gestured as if he was tying a rope around his neck' and said, 'Hang him.' Lopez said the gesture was repeated throughout the trial and that she believed it was a reference to Hayat." However one juror "called the accusations 'a complete outrage' borne of 'juror regret.' The juror said Lopez changed her vote to guilty Monday, which at first made the juror uncomfortable."

The Stockton (CA) Record (4/28, Hood) adds, "Hamid Hayat's conviction on terrorism charges was delayed by a lone juror who refused to believe the Lodi man was guilty, according to a jury note unsealed Wednesday, one day after the verdict." And "U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott said Wednesday that last-minute changes of heart are a part of the jury process and to suggest anything else is speculation." Scott said, "It's the back and forth of jury deliberations, and it's the way it works, so there's nothing really out of the ordinary about it." The Record adds, "Meanwhile, FBI agents resumed their surveillance of Muslims named by Umer Hayat as having received paramilitary training in Pakistan. Federal law enforcement authorities said Tuesday they are continuing their investigations into possible ties between local Muslims and terrorist groups."

Moussaoui Trial Deliberations Delayed By Juror Illness. The Washington Post (4/28, Markon, Dwyer, 744K) reports, "The death penalty case of Sept. 11, 2001, conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, which has stretched over more than four years amid numerous delays and complications, was delayed once again yesterday. A juror called in sick." The jury will continue deliberations Friday. The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Serrano, 958K) quotes U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema saying, "This is the most sensitive time in the case. … I don't want any juror in this serious of a case working if he or she is not feeling 100%."

Jury Finds Man Guilty In Plot To Bomb Milwaukee Federal Building. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/28) reports, "A man who authorities say idolized Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh was found guilty Thursday of threatening to blow up a federal building in downtown Milwaukee." Steven Parr "had studied bomb-making books and previously built small explosive devices, prosecutors said." He "was days away from being released from state prison in September 2004 after serving time on drug charges when he told a cellmate about his plan to use a truck bomb to blow up the 14-story building." But his cellmate "said in letters to the FBI that Parr had extensive knowledge in bomb-making and considered Ted Kaczynski, the Unabomber, another of his heroes."

FBI Arrests Five Linked To Terror Suspect On Bank Fraud Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/28, Foy) reports, "Five relatives of a U.S. citizen suspected of being a senior al-Qaida operative were arrested in California and Utah on charges of defrauding banks of hundreds of thousands of dollars." The Buerau "said it was investigating whether any of the money was used to finance Middle East terrorism." The AP notes, "Nothing in the indictments ties any of the relatives to a terror network, and federal prosecutors officially referred to the case as a criminal enterprise. But agents are working to determine where all the money went, said Greg Bretzing, a supervisor in the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force in Salt Lake City." Bretzing said, "This is an ongoing investigation. This is nowhere close to being over." Omar's relatives are suspected of taking "$327,000 from fraudulent bank loans and bad mortgages in Utah, and Bretzing said some of the money wound up in Jordan with Omar's relatives."

The Salt Lake Tribune (4/28, LaPlante) adds, "Counterterrorist agents pounced on five men, one in Utah and four in California, on Wednesday as part of an investigation into the U.S. connections of a suspected senior al-Qaida operative imprisoned in Iraq." Although they have not been charged with terrorism, "FBI agents say that some of the money alleged to have been stolen in various schemes wound up in Jordan. And now they want to know whether that cash has ended up in the hands of terrorists." Shawqi Omar was arrested in Iraq and "could be the first American citizen to be tried in the Iraqi court system, if military officials prevail in an ongoing legal battle. It is a prospect his family in the United States is fighting to prevent. A document filed by Omar's lawyers this week, in which they have again requested access to their client, alleged that U.S. troops beat Omar and tortured him with electric shocks."

KTVX-TV in Salt Lake, UT (4/28) reports, "What makes the FBI wonder if the money is being used for terror activities is Omar's relation to a terror suspect being held in Iraq. Shawqi Omar is Sharif's brother and is suspected of planning terror attacks with Al Qaeda boss Abu Musab al-Zarqawi." KTVX adds, "Shawqi Omar lived in Utah in the 80's and worked as a refrigerator repairman before moving his family to Jordan. Shawqi Omar was later arrested in Iraq in 2004 after his alleged help in a plan to kidnap an American working in the country."

Detainee Declares Intention To Admit To Conspiracy Charges. Ghassan Abdullah Al Sharbi, who was arrested was arrested in an Al Qaeda safe house in Faisalabad, Pakistan on March 28, 2002, made his first appearance before a US war crimes tribunal Thursday. The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Williams, 958K) reports, "The only indicted detainee mentioned in the Sept. 11 commission report made a defiant first appearance before the war crimes tribunal Thursday, vowing, 'I'm going to make this easy.' He said he had taken up arms against the United States and would proudly serve any sentence." He "denounced the tribunal and his detention as illegitimate and rejected the Navy lawyer assigned to represent him." Al Sharbi "declared himself ready to concede to – 'I don't like the word confession,' he said -- all the accusations of conspiracy to commit terrorism that have been brought against him."

Study Examines Al Qaeda Use Of Media As Terror Weapon. An Arizona State University study examined how terrorists use the media as part of their terrorist operations. The Washington Times (4/28, Harper, 90K) reports ASU Consortium for Strategic Communication director Steven Corman's study "found that jihadist operations use consistent patterns of outreach that establish them socially and religiously, generate public sympathy and intimidate opponents. Threats, in fact, are part of terrorist 'talking points.'" It "offered six measures to counter al Qaeda's media savvy." Corman "recommended that the United States try to improve its credibility with Muslim audiences, 'degrade' the jihadis' outreach efforts, draw attention to terrorist messages that contradict Islam, deconstruct idealized historical concepts, systematically disrupt Internet operations and seek assistance from sympathetic American Muslims."

PATRIOT ACT:

US Attorney Disputes WSJournal Characterization Of Patriot Act Prosecution. In a Wall Street Journal (4/28, 2.11M) letter to the editor, Arizona District US Attorney Paul K. Charlton writes, "Your page-one article 'Volatile Formula: How Patriot Act Helped Convict Man in Baby-Food Ring' (April 4) unfairly characterized the prosecution of Samih Jammal and the application of evidence lawfully gathered under the Patriot Act. … Criticize the use of the Patriot Act if you so desire, but if you intend to use Mr. Jammal's case to do it, please bear these facts in mind: A federal judge and jury found Mr. Jammal guilty of 20 felony counts of theft-related charges," and "the court found that Mr. Jammal's criminal enterprise led to retail losses estimated at $10 million and sentenced Mr.

Jammal to 10 years in prison. You also seem to suggest that Mr. Jammal should never have been the subject of an intelligence wiretap," but a FISA judge "found probable cause that Mr. Jammal was acting as an agent of a foreign power or an agent of a foreign terrorist organization," and the trial judge "reviewed the FISA court judge's decision, and affirmed the finding of probable cause. Perhaps the biggest distortion was your failure to give a complete characterization of Hani Hanjour, a 9/11 hijacker whom Mr. Jammal admitted associating with as a matter of public record. You described Hani Hanjour as 'one of the 9/11 hijackers' and as 'a Saudi Arabian who was aboard the American Airlines jet that crashed into the Pentagon.' … Hani Hanjour was one of the five terrorists who took over the cockpit and the only one who piloted the plane into the Pentagon."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI National Security Branch Chief To Retire. Executive Assistant Director Gary Bald announced his retirement after serving less than a year as the chief of the FBI's new National Security Branch. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/28) reports FBI Director Robert Mueller "gave no reason for Bald's decision, but praised his leadership. Bald said the time was right to retire, 'weighing our progress on implementation of the NSB as well as family considerations.'" The post was recommended by the 9/11 Commission, but the AP notes Sen. Charles Grassley opposed Bald's appointment "because Bald testified in a civil lawsuit that he had no counterterrorism experience when he moved to headquarters to oversee anti-terrorism strategy in 2003."

United Press International (4/28) reports, "Since August last year, Bald has headed up the National Security Branch of the FBI, which brings together its spy-catchers, counter-terror specialists and intelligence analysts." In a statement Mueller said "Throughout his career, Gary has shown tremendous leadership, vision, and grace under pressure. … He has helped to shape the Bureau in important ways. … I am pleased with the progress we have made under his leadership." He "said the bureau would 'move quickly to fill the important position' Bald was leaving."

"Frustrated" Specter Threatens To Block NSA Surveillance Program Funding. The Washington Post (4/27, 9:56 PM, Kellman, 744K) reports , "Noting that Congress holds the power of the purse, a frustrated Senate chairman threatened to try to block money for President Bush's domestic wiretapping program." Sen. Arlen Specter "said Thursday he delivered a message to Bush that cut to the heart of the debate over executive power. 'I made the point that the president doesn't have a blank check,' Specter said about their meeting Wednesday. 'He didn't choose to engage me on that point.' Without a pledge from Bush to provide more information on the surveillance program, Specter filed an amendment to a spending bill Thursday" which "would enact a 'prohibition on use of funds for domestic electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence purposes unless Congress is kept fully and currently informed.'" The Post notes, "The move got the White House's attention, but not its immediate cooperation. Bush has insisted that the program falls within his authority and has refused to allow Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other officials to answer many of Specter's questions. … For now, Specter said he will not bother having Gonzales return to the committee 'because he won't tell us anything.'"

CNN's The Situation Room (4/27, Blitzer) reported Specter "complained he's not getting satisfactory answers from the White House about the wiretaps, and he's frustrated." Specter "says he's warned President Bush about a possible bill to cut off funding for the NSA wiretaps, and he says he already has several potential co-sponsors for the measure." The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Miller, 958K) notes, "A draft of a proposal circulated by Specter's office would prohibit the use of funds for domestic electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence purposes 'unless Congress is kept fully and currently informed.' In particular, the proposed bill would require the administration to brief all members of the House and Senate Intelligence and Judiciary committees." Specter's move "underscores the tension between key Republicans in Congress and the Bush administration over the limits of presidential power in the war on terrorism."

The Washington Post (4/28, Pincus, Babington, 744K) adds that Specter is trying to generate "greater debate on the warrantless surveillance" and his "concerns about the NSA program were also reflected in much of the House debate on the intelligence bill."

Hatch Supports Bill To Require FISA Approval For NSA Surveillance. CQ (4/28, Perine) reports, "Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, one of President Bush's staunchest Senate allies, declared his support Thursday for legislation that would require the administration to seek approval from a secret federal court for a National Security Agency warrantless surveillance program." His "move is likely to aid" Sen. Specter's efforts to attract more debate about terrorist monitoring. The Administration and Senate Intelligence Chairman Pat Roberts want "a modified version of" Sen. Mike DeWine's bill which would give the administration the option of seeking approval from the FISA court "to serve as the Senate vehicle, but a defection by Hatch could make that more difficult."

TSA To Award Bonuses In Bid To Slow Worker Turnover. USA Today (4/28, Frank, 2.31M) reports, "The Transportation Security Administration will pay airport screeners up to a $1,000 bonus to entice them to stay at the turnover-plagued agency as it prepares for a summer of record air travel. Roughly one in four screeners left last year, a rate nearly twice the rest of the federal workforce," and a GAO reports found that "the number of screeners at some checkpoints is 'not sufficient for peak periods.'" The TSA "will spend $20 million to give most of the nation's 43,000 screeners $500 extra," with "a second $500 bonus if they work at 'hard-to-hire' airports that have trouble filling vacancies."

For-Profit Part Of Trade Group May Get No Bid TSA Contract. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Meckler, 2.11M) reports, "If a provision in a Congressional spending bill stands, a transportation-worker identification program will be awarded without competitive bidding to the American Association of Airport Executives, which may assign it to its newly "created…for-profit company that may do much of the work on its behalf." AAAE officials "said the AAAE didn't guarantee that work from these programs would be funneled to the new company," an "official from the rival firm said his company was explicitly told that the new venture would do the work of" AAAE's Transportation Security Clearinghouse.

The New York Times (4/28, Lipton, 1.19M) notes that AAAE has a partnership agreement with Daon, a biometrics company in Dublin, Ireland, that former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge is a board member of. "Critics of the provision…have questioned how the association, with little experience in high-technology secure identifications and biometrics, could handle such a task."

Internet Helps Spread Conspiracy Theories About 9/11 Attacks. The movie "Loose Change," which offers revisionist theories about the 9/11 attacks, is becoming popular among young people on the Internet. USA Today (4/28, Welch, 2.31M) reports Loose Change "is being downloaded from the Internet and shown in small screenings here and overseas." It "appears especially popular among young people immersed in a Web culture brimming with sites that question the credibility of government. They see 9/11 as the defining moment of their lives." Experts "say the Internet is making it far easier to spread such theories because the traditional media are losing their hold on the news. The immense coverage of controversies and accusations surrounding the war on terror has created fertile ground for people who assign their own interpretations to photos, footage, eyewitnesses, investigations and newspaper accounts of what happened, they say."

Questions Raised About "United 93" Film Accuracy. The Washington Post (4/28, A1, Farhi, 744K) in a front page story reports that while the film "United 93" generally follows the key events of the 9/11 attacks, it "is a dramatic re-creation that includes scenes and images that go far beyond what is known about the attacks." The Post continues, "Those scenes raise questions: How far can a dramatic movie go in imposing its own reality before it distorts the public's understanding of the event? And with memories of 9/11 still vivid and raw, is it too soon for such films to be made?"

Work Begins On Freedom Tower At Ground Zero. The CBS Evening News (4/27, story 9, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Nearly five years after terrorists took down the Twin Towers and after months of political wrangling, work has finally begun on the centerpiece of the new World Trade Center complex, the Freedom Tower. It will be taller than the Twin Towers, rising a symbolic 1,776 feet, which will make it the tallest building in the world."

WPost Says Law To Keep Terrorists From US Is Over-Inclusive. The Washington Post (4/28, A18, 744K) says in an editorial that Congress "tightened a law last year on refugee admissions in order (it thought) to keep terrorists and their supporters out of the country. The effect has been to bar friends and allies. One example: Many Vietnamese Montagnards fought alongside U.S. forces during the Vietnam War and were then murderously oppressed by the Vietnamese government. During the war, the United States helped arm a Montagnard group called the United Front for the Liberation of Oppressed Races, which continued to struggle for autonomy after the war ended. This group ceased to exist in 1992, when a band of nearly 400 fighters disarmed and were resettled in North Carolina. Under Congress's irrational new rules, however, the group has become, legally speaking, a terrorist organization, and 11 Montagnards still stuck in Cambodia would be denied refugee status because in the past they had offered the group 'material support.'"

WAR NEWS:

Probe Of Iraq Spending Expands To Training Of Security Forces. The Washington Times (4/28, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "The Bush administration's special investigator for Iraq reconstruction has expanded inquiries into how the US military is training and equipping the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF), according to an internal Pentagon memo." Special Inspector General Stuart W. Bowen Jr. "asked the Pentagon for reams of documents on the billions of dollars spent to create an Iraqi army, police, border patrol, navy and air force, the memo shows." The Times adds, "Some Pentagon officials say privately that the inspector is overstepping his mandate by probing U.S. military operations in addition to reconstruction dollars. But the chief spokesman for Mr. Bowen said security and reconstruction are intertwined."

"Grand Mafiosi" Seen As Stealing Billions From Iraq's Oil Industry. The Washington Times (4/28, Muir, 90K) reports, "A new class of 'grand mafiosi' is sucking billions of dollars out of Iraq's vital oil sector and crippling efforts to rebuild the nation, according to an official report published in Baghdad." The findings of the Oil Ministry's inspector-general "paint a sordid picture of corruption pervading every corner of the industry, from the oil wells to the gasoline pump." The report "says that since Saddam Hussein's overthrow in 2003, the spread of smuggling had turned Iraq from a major exporter of petroleum products into an importer."

Top Iraqi Official Says US Troop Drawdown Imminent. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, A7, Dreazen, 2.11M) details an interview with National Security Advisor Mowaffak Rubaie in which he "said there would be a substantial withdrawal of U.S. troops this year, with the rest leaving within the next two years," and that his government "was working to formalize a 'conditions-based transition agreement' with the U.S. that would govern the pace and scope of a U.S. military withdrawal from the country. Such an agreement would detail a timeline for turning U.S. military facilities over to the Iraqis and leaving Iraqi forces with primary security responsibility for growing portions of the country." The Journal continues, "Mr. Rubaie's comments are consistent with statements he has made since the beginning of the year, but both Iraqis and Americans agreed that big troop reductions wouldn't be possible until a new government was installed."

Sistani Implores Maliki To Rein In Militias. The Washington Post (4/28, Finer, Sarhan, 744K) reports Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, "Iraq's most revered Shiite Muslim cleric, urged Prime Minister-designate Nouri al-Maliki in a meeting Thursday to deal quickly with sectarian militias blamed for widespread killings, and to ensure that Iraqi police and soldiers remain loyal to the country and not to political factions." The Post notes that Shiite militias "dominate many Iraqi police and army units and have been accused by Sunni Arab leaders and U.S. officials of operating death squads." Maliki met separately with Moqtada Al-Sadr yesterday, after which Sadr "gave a noncommittal answer when asked at a news conference afterward about plans to disband militias."

The New York Times (4/28, Oppel, 1.19M) reports Maliki "traveled to the Shiite holy city of Najaf to meet with two of the powers he must now contend with, the Shiite leaders Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and Moktada al-Sadr." Maliki "was careful not to offend Mr. Sadr, perhaps the most influential single force in the Shiite coalition, suggesting that militias deserve to remain an influence, even if only from within the military." The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Wallace, Fakhrildeen, 958K) reports "the unusually direct political intervention from Sistani" rang "loudest" In Iraq, as he is "regarded as the voice of Shiite moderation." USA Today/AP (4/28) runs a similar report.

Iraqi Vice President's Sister Killed In Drive-By Shooting. ABC World News Tonight (4/27, story 5, :30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Iraq's new Sunni Vice President denounced the terror leader, Abu Musab al Zarqawi, and called for the insurgency to be crushed. Today, the Vice President's sister was killed in a drive-by shooting. His brother had been killed two weeks ago. The Vice President says he remains committed to serving the Iraqi people." The Washington Post (4/28, A12, Hernandez, 744K) and Washington Times/AP (4/28, Wagner), among other sources, also report on the attack.

Violence Said To Continue Unchecked. In a decidedly pessimistic piece, the AP (4/27, Wagner) reported, "One year ago Friday, when Iraq formed its first freely elected government, Americans and Iraqis hoped it would lead to a drop in violence. But Iraqis have continued to die in the thousands, and this year the trend is up. … The numbers offer a counterpoint of caution for Washington's hopes that Iraq's second freely elected government, being formed now, will help curb violence." The New York Times (4/28, Oppel, 1.19M) says Sistani's statement "was a firm message of support for Mr. Maliki," but added that "making a dent in the militias' influence will be difficult to accomplish, as some elements of the Iraqi Army and security forces are already dominated by members loyal to one militia or another. Indeed, in a demonstration of the balancing act Mr. Maliki must perform both as prime minister and as leader of a fractious Shiite coalition, he met next with Mr. Sadr" and "was careful not to offend Mr. Sadr, perhaps the most influential single force in the Shiite coalition, suggesting that militias deserve to remain an influence, even if only from within the military."

Baghdad Visit Said To Showcase Differing Styles Of Rice, Rumsfeld. In a detailed profile of the Secretaries' Rumsfeld and Rice's visit to Iraq this week, the Washington Post (4/28, A16, Kessler, 744K) reports, "For the second time in a month, Rice traveled to Baghdad to jawbone Iraqi leaders with a high-powered male counterpart. Last time, her partner was British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw. The pairing with him was convivial, so filled with easygoing banter that it was quickly dubbed the 'Condi and Jack Show.' This time around, Rice and Rumsfeld often seemed in separate orbits, and the visit had little of the warmth of the earlier one." While the trip was designed to demonstrate internal USG coordination of stabilization policy, "the contrast in the two secretaries' styles was sometimes jarring." While Rice "appeared energized," Rumsfeld "seemed disengaged and bored;" when fielding questions, "his answers were terse; hers were expansive." The Post concludes, "Before the two Cabinet members left Baghdad on Thursday, Rice dismissed any suggestions of tension. 'Secretary Rumsfeld and I have an excellent relationship,' she told Fox News. 'We're working very hard together. We're actually having a great time here in Iraq.'"

GOP Critics Of Rumsfeld "Grin And Bear It." An AP story (4/28, Sidoti) titled "Rumsfeld Critics Must Grin And Bear It" reports, "Senate Republican critics of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld are deferring to President Bush's support for the Pentagon chief, mindful that his fate is out of their hands." But "in the aftermath of calls by several retired generals for Rumsfeld's ouster, those GOP lawmakers remain uncomfortable with him. Given the chance, they offer no words of support." The AP quotes Sen. John McCain saying, "He still is in the confidence of the president. The president reiterated that the other day, so I'll continue to try to work with him."

Sessions Organizes Event For GOP Senators To Show Support For Rumsfeld. The Washington Times (4/28, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column that Sen. Jeff Sessions "organized a pep rally/war briefing where Republicans could express support for [Defense Secretary Donald] Rumsfeld, who seven retired generals have said must go. The setting was breakfast in the Russell Senate Office Building. Mr. Sessions invited 'defense-minded' Republican senators, and 17 showed up to talk with the defense secretary." Sessions spokesman Mike Brumas said the Senator "organized the get-together because 'we're in a time of war. Senator Sessions admires Secretary Rumsfeld and invited a group of defense-minded senators to talk with the secretary about a number of topics.'"

Corruption, Narco-Warlords Among Factors Dragging Down Afghan Security. The Christian Science Monitor (4/28, Montero, 61K) reports, "Nearly five years after the fall of the Taliban, Afghanistan's security situation continues to be dragged down by endemic corruption, roving militias, and a growing nexus between narco-warlords and remnants of the Taliban, officials and analysts say." The Monitor adds, "In the past, violence rarely spilled beyond the south, where NATO troops are slowly replacing US forces. But recent attacks have cropped up in the north and west. … Many governors and chiefs of police, rather than confronting the Taliban and neutralizing drug lords, are increasingly intertwined with them, either for political or monetary gain, some analysts say. Amid the lawlessness, military intelligence has become a political game, a tool for blackmail or settling old scores, analysts allege."

Taliban, Allies Executing Suspected US Informants In Pakistan. The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Watson, Ali, 958K) reports, "Taliban militants and their allies are waging a dirty war in Pakistan's unruly tribal areas, kidnapping and executing people suspected of spying for U.S. forces across the border in Afghanistan." Militants have "killed at least 53 accused spies and pro-government elders in Pakistan over the last two years, according to the independent Human Rights Commission of Pakistan. Many of their bodies were found with notes that claimed the victims had visited U.S. military bases in Afghanistan." Local residents "put the death toll from such executions at about 150." It was "not known whether any of the victims were working as informants or spies for U.S. forces. But secret documents on a memory drive stolen from the American air base at Bagram, north of Kabul, and sold at a bazaar outside its gates, show that U.S. Special Forces apparently used informants in Pakistan as well as Afghanistan."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Hueston Focuses On Lay Stock Sales In Second Day Of Cross-Examination. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Emshwiller, Mcwilliams, 2.11M) reports, "Federal prosecutors hammered at former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay's credibility by showing he made a series of inaccurate stockholding reports that failed to disclose large sales of his Enron shares in the months before the company's December 2001 bankruptcy filing." Lay "appeared taken aback by the assault during his first full day of cross-examination in court here, which followed two hours of tense exchanges with prosecutor John Hueston on Wednesday afternoon. … At times yesterday, he stuttered in response to accusations. Other times, he accused Mr. Hueston of twisting his words or harping on irrelevant points. Mr. Lay said repeatedly that he relied on advice from company attorneys who told him he wasn't required to disclose the disputed stock sales except once a year, since they involved turning the shares back to the company in return for cash rather than sales on the open market. He said that his Securities and Exchange Commission filings complied with the law even though they inflated the picture of his Enron holdings." The Journal notes, "By showing that Mr. Lay wasn't fully forthcoming about his stock sales, the government clearly hoped to buttress its contention that the former top executive was illegally hiding from the public a range of bad news about the company's finances and business operations."

The Washington Post (4/28, D1, Johnson, 744K) reports Lay "maintained his composure after furiously responding to questions and stabbing his finger at…Hueston a day earlier. Hueston attempted to rattle Lay Thursday by throwing back at him Lay's arguments that Enron was the victim of skeptical press reports, disclosures of wrongdoing by former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow, and short-sellers, who Lay said plotted Enron's demise in Florida in early 2001." The Post adds, "Lay answered questions in a firm voice, sometimes talking over Hueston and suggesting that the prosecutor didn't understand business issues. During a discussion of an arcane accounting issue, Lay retorted, 'I think the investors would totally understand it, Mr. Hueston. Maybe in fact, you don't.' Later, Lay told the prosecutor that an exchange about another accounting charge was 'a real waste of the jury's time.'"

USA Today (4/28, Farrell, 2.31M) reports Lay "told jurors…that he didn't think stock sales 'forced' upon him by banks making margin calls were the same as 'discretionary' sales. As a result, he didn't feel the need to disclose the sale of more than 1.7 million shares of Enron stock during 2001, when he encouraged Enron employees to buy the stock and told them he was buying shares, too. … Despite the fact that he sold more than 500,000 shares of Enron stock from late July through August of that year, Lay touted the company as an 'incredible bargain' to his employees in September 2001. He reiterated that belief in court Thursday."

The Houston Chronicle (2/28, Flood, 581K) notes Hueston "went back to Lay's allegations that colluding short sellers…contributed to Enron's downfall. Lay attorney Mike Ramsey previously called short sellers 'vultures.' Hueston showed Lay that his son Mark Lay was short selling Enron stock in March 2001 and made more than $166,000 betting Enron stock would fall. 'I didn't know that,' Lay said. 'He wasn't a vulture was he?' Hueston asked Lay of his son. 'I don't think he's a vulture,' Lay responded. 'He wasn't trying to kill Enron in 2001, was he?' Hueston asked. 'I would think not,' Lay said."

Lay's Contentiousness Clashes With Pre-Trial Image. The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Mulligan, 958K) reports, "Who would have guessed that Kenny Boy could be a tougher sell to a jury than Capt. Queeg?" Ken Lay "is renowned for his courtliness, his philanthropy, his rise from a dirt-poor boyhood in the Missouri Ozarks to a nine-digit fortune." Codefendant Jeff Skilling "shares some of the obsessiveness of Queeg, the Navy skipper of 'The Caine Mutiny.' But unlike Queeg, Skilling didn't unravel on the stand. Where mastery of Enron's finances was at issue, he overpowered co-lead prosecutor Sean M. Berkowitz. ... For Lay, however, it's been a rockier ride. …. His worst moment came Wednesday, when prosecutor John C. Hueston jolted Lay with questions about his attempts to reach actual or potential witnesses in the case — efforts that persisted even after Lay's lawyers told him to stop."

US Attorneys Appoint Stamboulidis Bank Of New York Examiner. The Forbes (4/28, Moyer) reports, "The United States Attorneys in New York named former federal prosecutor George Stamboulidis of Baker & Hostetler and FTI Consulting, a forensic accounting firm, to be the examiners in charge of making sure Bank of New York is in compliance with suspicious activities reporting and monitoring rules." Forbes notes that the appointment "comes after Bank of New York…agreed to pay $38 million in penalties and compensation over charges it failed to comply with mandatory reporting guidelines under the Bank Secrecy Act. That settlement was the culmination of a six-year investigation into a Russian money laundering ring that prosecutors say flushed $7 billion through the U.S. banking system."

Lawmakers Looking At Ways To Change Sarbanes-Oxley. The Financial Times (4/28, Grant) reports, "Signs of a growing desire among some US legislators to re-examine key elements of Sarbanes-Oxley legislation emerged on Thursday as a Republican congressman, Tom Feeney, said he would next week introduce a bill designed to make it 'more acceptable to business.'" Feeney's bill "is the third piece of legislation aimed at changing Sarbanes-Oxley since its passage in 2002 after the Enron and WorldCom accounting scandals. While such efforts are seen as having limited effect until senators Sarbanes and Oxley retire late this year, the bill reflects concern that changes are needed."

Shareholders Activists Target Executive Pay. The Washington Post (4/28, D1, Masters, 744K) reports, "After years of complaining about sky-high executive pay packages, this year shareholder activists are finally getting some traction in their efforts to do something about the issue." The issue "will come up today at the annual meeting of Merrill Lynch & Co., where chief executive E. Stanley O'Neal took home $37.5 million last year, including $2 million in long-term incentive pay." The American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees "is sponsoring a resolution calling for an annual up-or-down vote on the company's pay plan for top executives. Though the vote would be nonbinding, it would give shareholders a way to make their views clear, advocates argue."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Fitzgerald To Decide On Rove Charges In Two To Three Weeks. Special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald is weighing whether to charge Deputy White House Chief of Staff Karl Rove with perjury in the CIA leak investigation and will make a decision soon, according to a New York Times (4/28, Bumiller, Johnston, 1.19M) report. The Times says Fitzgerald is "expected to decide in the next two to three weeks," and following Rove's "fifth appearance before the grand jury on Wednesday, Mr. Fitzgerald is now believed to have assembled all of the facts necessary to determine whether to seek an indictment of Mr. Rove or drop the case." Lawyers "in the case said Mr. Fitzgerald would spend the coming days reviewing the transcript of Mr. Rove's three hours of testimony on Wednesday and weigh it against his previous statements to the grand jury as well as the testimony of others, including a sworn statement that Mr. Rove's lawyer gave to the prosecutor earlier this year." One lawyer "said that Mr. Rove had known for more than a month that he was likely to make another appearance before the grand jury, and that he had known since last fall that he would be subject to further questions from Mr. Fitzgerald before the prosecutor completed his inquiry." The Times also reports that "lawyers in the case" say Fitzgerald has "long been skeptical of Mr. Rove's account of his forgetfulness."

Judge Refuses To Dismiss Charges Against Libby. USA Today (4/28, 2.31M) reports Federal Judge Reggie Walton yesterday "refused…to dismiss charges against I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, the former White House aide who was indicted on perjury and obstruction charges last year in the CIA leak scandal." Libby's attorneys had "challenged the authority of special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald to handle the case. Libby's lawyers had argued that Fitzgerald was given too much power and that the appointment should have been made by the president. However, Walton said there is no question the attorney general can delegate any of his functions."

The AP (4/28, Locy) reports Walton "said there must be a way to appoint special prosecutors to ensure that 'the perception of fairness withstands the scrutiny of the American public' when high-level government officials are investigated for alleged wrongdoing." Libby "is charged with perjury and obstruction of justice, accused of lying to the FBI and a federal grand jury about how he learned about Plame and what he subsequently told reporters about her."

CNN's The Situation Room (4/27, King) reported, "As any defendant would do, Scooter Libby's defense team is trying to challenge the indictment just about any way it can. And one of its arguments was that special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald was improperly appointed; therefore he does not have the authority to investigate this case or bring indictments." The ruling was "not a surprise, but it does show you how aggressive the Libby defense team is being. They are challenging the indictment, they are demanding access to the most sensitive intelligence documents in the United States government, issuing subpoenas to news organizations, hauling in reporters, they threatened to do for testimony."

Federal Laws Barring Disclosure Of Classified Information Difficult To Enforce. The Washington Post (4/28, A7, Eggen, 744K) reports the firing of a veteran CIA officer Mary McCarthy "for unauthorized contacts with the press has focused attention on the patchwork of federal laws that govern disclosures of classified information, which are written broadly but are difficult to enforce and have historically been used sparingly in cases involving journalists." Numerous experts "on national security law said" McCarthy, "whom the CIA fired 10 days before her retirement for allegedly having undisclosed contacts with reporters, could conceivably be prosecuted under a number of statutes, including those governing espionage, disclosures of classified information and even theft of government property." Yet those experts "warned that any such prosecution is fraught with obstacles, including the difficulty in showing that disclosures were made with knowledge that they would harm national security or were intended to benefit a foreign power." The case "comes amid renewed debate in Congress over whether to increase penalties for leaking or to consider rewriting espionage and classified information laws."

USA Today Supports Leakers. USA Today (4/28, 2.31M) in an editorial examines the latest events surrounding the Plame leak case and the firing of a CIA official accused of leaking information and asks, "Harmful to U.S. interests? Definitely. Essential to protect U.S. values? No doubt. The same dichotomy applies in the secret-prison and wiretapping stories." Yet "as the leak probes continue, it's important to maintain a distinction between those who leak to help themselves and those who leak, at personal risk, to let the public know its leaders are flouting law or abusing power."

FBI To Seek Information On Mollohan From Three Nonprofits. The New York Times (4/28, Rudoren, 1.19M) reports, "The F.B.I. has notified three nonprofit organizations created by Representative Alan B. Mollohan and financed primarily through special federal appropriations he steered their way that they should expect subpoenas soon for financial and other records." The three "nonprofits at issue are the Vandalia Heritage Foundation, the Institute for Scientific Research and the Canaan Valley Institute. The F.B.I.'s notification to them has occurred over the last two days and signals that the bureau is looking deeper into the 500-page complaint, which among other things suggests ties between the special appropriations, or earmarks, and Mr. Mollohan's personal real estate investments."

Abramoff Vacations At Posh Florida Resort. The New York Times (4/28, Shenon, 1.19M) reports former Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff "may be facing financial ruin and a long prison sentence, but he still knows how to vacation. Guests at the oceanfront Turnberry Isle Resort and Country Club in Aventura, Fla., say they were surprised to see Mr. Abramoff, his wife and their five children at the 300-acre golf and tennis resort for more than a week this month for the Passover holiday." The Abramoffs "arranged the trip through a travel agency based in Brooklyn that, according to its Web site, charged a minimum of $3,600 per adult for a nine-night Passover package. A lawyer for Mr. Abramoff, Abbe D. Lowell, said the trip was paid for by Mr. Abramoff's 'extended family,' although Mr. Lowell would not say which family member or members." Lowell said "it was a 'cheap shot to suggest that Mr. Abramoff was living high off the hog' and that the trip, which allowed Mr. Abramoff to meet with his lawyers in Miami on a related criminal case, was intended to benefit his family in a difficult time."

Baltimore Said To Lead Country In Witness Intimidation In Murder Cases. The CBS Evening News (4/27, story 7, 3:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Criminals are literally getting away with murder more and more because witnesses are afraid to testify." CBS (Keteyian) added, "A CBS news investigation reveals that witness intimidation affects or derails up to 30% of all cases involving shootings in major US cities. In homicide cases, that number jumps to 90%, with Baltimore topping the list." Patricia Jessamy, Baltimore City State's Attorney: "We call it the conspiracy of silence. Its alive and well and I consider Baltimore probably to be the epicenter of witness intimidation in the country, but it's not just Baltimore, it's all across the country." Keteyian: "In Baltimore, it has come to this, a special police unit whose only job is to hunt down potential witnesses, some 1400 to date, armed with a prosecutor's promise of protection."

MS-13 Leader Sentenced To 30 Years In Prison. The Washington Post (4/28, Cauvin, 744K) reports DC-area MS-13 leader Juan Carlos Rivas-Moreiera was sentenced yesterday to 30 years in prison "for a near-fatal attack on a rival gang member. … And far from being the worst of his alleged acts, the May 2001 attack in Northwest Washington was only one crime in a life rife with it, the prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Gilberto Guerrero Jr., said." Rivas-Moreiera "is among the reputed members of MS-13…who were charged in Maryland last year in a federal racketeering indictment that details murders, kidnapping, robbery and other crimes." The Post notes, "The indictment was a significant regional strike against local Latino gangs, which have lured isolated and disaffected adolescents into dangerous lifestyles and sown fear in neighborhoods that are heavily populated by immigrants."

Jury Selection Begins Monday For Maryland Trial Of Convicted Sniper. The Washington Times/AP (4/28, Manning) reports, "Many witnesses who testified against convicted sniper John Allen Muhammad in his trial in Virginia are ready to tell their stories again, including some who bear scars from the Bushmaster's bullets. And Muhammad has returned to Montgomery County, where the October 2002 D.C.-area sniper spree began, to face another jury. Jury selection is set to begin Monday in his second trial, a case that likely will echo the 2003 Virginia case that ended in a death sentence for one of the 10 killings. Yet while much of the evidence and testimony during the expected five-week trial will be similar, the new trial could take some unexpected turns." Muhammad "plans to be his own lawyer despite evidence he may be mentally ill. He wants Lee Boyd Malvo…to testify. And jurors will hear evidence about two Maryland killings that weren't part of the first trial."

Virginia Inmate Executed After Kaine Denies Clemency. The Washington Times (4/28, McLaughlin, 90K) reports, "Death row inmate Dexter Lee Vinson was executed last night, hours after Gov. Timothy M. Kaine denied his petition for clemency. Vinson received a lethal injection at the Greensville Correctional Center in Jarratt and was pronounced dead at 9:15 p.m. Vinson, 43, was convicted of the 1997 murder of his ex-girlfriend, Angela Felton, of Portsmouth." Kaine "denied clemency last night, after the U.S. Supreme Court refused to stop the execution. 'Having carefully reviewed the Petition for Clemency and judicial opinions regarding this case, I find no compelling reasons to doubt Mr. Vinson's guilt or to invalidate the sentence recommended by the jury and imposed, and affirmed, by the courts,' Mr. Kaine said in a statement. 'Accordingly, I decline to intervene.'"

The Washington Post (4/28, B4, Rondeaux, Shear, 744K) adds that "Kaine made good on a promise he spoke directly and repeatedly to Virginians last year at campaign rallies and in television ads: that his personal and long-standing opposition to the death penalty, based on his Catholic faith, would not prevent him from allowing the ultimate punishment to be carried out. Kaine's Republican opponent in the governor's race, former attorney general Jerry W. Kilgore, had repeatedly slammed Kaine for his stance on the death penalty, and ran ads featuring the victims of heinous crimes. In one, the father of a crime victim said

Kaine would not have executed Adolph Hitler. But Kaine responded with ads of his own, in which he vowed to enforce Virginia's capital punishment laws. 'My faith teaches life is sacred,' he said to the camera. 'But I take my oath of office seriously, and I'll enforce the death penalty.'"

Annual NYPD Report Provides Details Of Murders. The New York Times (4/28, Mcginty, 1.19M) reports, "At the end of each year, the New York Police Department reports the number of killings — there were 540 in 2005. Typically, much is made of how the number has fallen in recent years — to totals not seen since the early 1960's. But beyond summarizing the overarching trends, the police spend little time compiling the individual details. The New York Times obtained the basic records for every murder in the city over the last three years, and while the events make for disturbing reading, the numbers can hint at trends, occasionally solve a mystery and in at least some straightforward way answer for the city the questions of who kills and who is killed in the five boroughs." The Times adds, "Of the rest, men and boys were responsible for 93 percent of the murders; they killed with guns about two-thirds of the time; their victims tended to be other men and boys; and in more than half the cases, the killer and the victim knew each other. … The offender and victim were of the same race in more than three-quarters of the killings," and "more than 90 percent of the killers had criminal records; and of those who wound up killed, more than half had them."

Woman Alleging Duke LAX Rape Made Similar Charge 10 Years Ago. The New York Times (4/28, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "The woman who has accused three Duke University lacrosse players of raping her last month claimed a decade ago that she had been sexually assaulted by three men, the authorities said. The woman's mother said her daughter did not file charges. 'She didn't want to bring charges up against them because they said they were going to kill her if she said anything,' said the mother," but Creedmoor, N.C., Police Chief Ted Pollard "said the woman filed the report when she was 18, in August 1996, but said the assault had happened in June 1993, when she was 14. Chief Pollard said the initial report did not explain why there had been a delay of more than three years between the alleged assault and when she reported it. He said Thursday that his office had only paper records from that time period and had not yet determined whether there had been a follow-up investigation."

Connecticut Trash Hauler Pleads Guilty To Racketeering Charges. The Waste News (4/28) reports, "A Danbury, Conn., trash hauler pleaded guilty to a federal racketeering charge, admitting to taking part in system to divvy up territory, the U.S. Department of Justice said. Joseph R. LoStocco, 47, who owns and operates JR LoStocco Carting in Danbury, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiring to violate the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act." US Attorney Kevin O'Connor noted, "The investigation is very active, and we have no further comment at this time."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

US Charges Tennessee Landlord With Housing Discrimination. The Chattanoogan (4/28) reports, "The Justice Department announced Thursday that it has filed a lawsuit against the owner and resident manager of the Fountainbleau Apartments in East Ridge, alleging housing discrimination against individuals on account of their having children. 'No one should be denied an opportunity to live where they choose because they have children,' said Wan J. Kim, Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division. 'The Justice Department is committed to vigorous prosecution of illegal housing discrimination.' The complaint…alleges that the defendants refused to rent apartments to persons with children and steered them to another apartment complex." The Chattanoogan adds, "Fighting illegal housing discrimination is a top priority of the Justice Department, officials said. In February, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales announced Operation Home Sweet Home, a concentrated initiative 'to expose and eliminate housing discrimination in America.'"

New York State Elections Board Adopts Voting Machine Guidelines. The AP (4/28) reports, "After months of haggling, the state Board of Elections has adopted guidelines for new voting machines that can be used in New York. The board also ordered machine makers to disclose information about their political contributions and any lawsuits against them. A statement released by the board says the new standards go beyond Help America Vote Act…requirements and contain a number of features that make them model regulations for the nation. The standards require a voter verifiable paper trail." The AP notes, "New York has been sued by the U-S Justice Department for failing to comply with HAVA provisions requiring states to have new machines in place for the 2006 elections."

New Hampshire Political Parties Sparring Over Phone Jamming Case. The Knight Ridder (4/28, Douglas) reports, "Is it a third-rate political dirty trick by Republicans or a cheap attempt by Democrats to drag the GOP through the mud before November's elections?" New Hampshire Democrats and Republicans "are locked in a legal battle over GOP operatives who tried to suppress voter turnout in a key 2002 U.S. Senate race by jamming Democratic get-out-the-vote phone banks on Election Day. … Democrats describe the phone-jamming case in Nixonian terms, using Watergate-era phrases such as 'follow the money' and 'what did they know and when did they know it?'" KRT adds, "Republican officials are on the defensive. They call the vote-suppression scheme an unfortunate incident that was the work of rogue operatives who did it without party leaders' knowledge. They say the civil suit is a baseless attempt by Democrats to score points and ruin the New Hampshire Republican Party financially.

CAIR Calls For Civil Rights Probe Of Atlanta Vandalism. The AP (4/28) reports the Council On American-Islamic Relations "is asking the FBI to investigate vandalism at a Muslim home in suburban Atlanta as a hate crime. The Douglas County family's van was burned and the words 'Killers go home' spray-painted on the side of their house on April 8." CAIR "said local authorities had been slow to investigate the crime" yet "Douglas County Chief Deputy Stan Copeland said evidence from the scene has been submitted to the state crime lab and that police patrols in the neighborhood have been stepped up as investigators seek new leads." FBI spokesman Stephen Emmett "said late Wednesday that the bureau's civil rights squad here was not familiar with CAIR's request for an investigation. Copeland said Thursday that a local FBI office has been notified about the incident."

Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Act Reintroduced In Congress. The AP (4/28, Haines) reports, "A 1946 lynching in northeast Georgia could be among the civil-rights era murders investigated under" the Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Act, reintroduced yesterday in the House and Senate. "Roger and Dorothy Malcom and George and Mae Murray Dorsey were killed on the banks of the Apalachee River at the Moore's Ford Bridge, about 40 miles east of Atlanta. The four sharecroppers were dragged from a car, beaten and shot dozens of times as a mob of 200 looked on. No one was ever charged in their deaths, even though the FBI's report named 55 suspects." The AP notes, "The bill would create an unsolved crimes section within the civil rights division of the Department of Justice and an unsolved civil rights crime investigative office within the FBI. The sponsors say it would cost $10 million to establish both offices and foster relations between federal and local authorities."

The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (4/28, Mitchell) reports Sen. Jim Talent "reintroduced the bill that passed the Senate last year before dying in a conference committee." Reps. John Lewis and Kenny Hulshof "are sponsoring the legislation in the House. The measure is called the 'Till Bill' after Emmett Till," and Talent said at a press conference yesterday, "The blatant failure for decades to bring Emmett Till 's murderers to justice was and is a national disgrace." The Clarion Ledger notes, "U.S Attorney General Albert Gonzales is supporting the legislation, and FBI offices around the nation are now collecting information about unpunished killings from their area."

National Park Service Issues Permit For Klan Rally At Antietam. USA Today (4/28, Moore, 2.31M) reports, "A Ku Klux Klan group will rally on the Civil War battlefield where a Northern victory led President Abraham Lincoln to issue the Emancipation Proclamation. The National Park Service has issued a permit for a Klan demonstration June 10 on a farmstead at Antietam National Battlefield in western Maryland. … Antietam Battlefield superintendent John Howard says the right to free speech meant he was obligated to issue the permit. … Howard said he has received more than 30 e-mails objecting to the demonstration." USA notes, "Gordon Young, the leader of the local Klan group who applied for the demonstration permit, said Antietam was chosen for convenience but the site is appropriate. 'Our forefathers are flipping in their graves, and we need to do something to stand up and fight back. Immigration, homosexuals — they didn't fight and die for that.'"

ANTITRUST:

US Charges Five Alleged Warez Group Members With Piracy. The IDG News Service (4/27, Gross) reports, "Five U.S. residents face criminal copyright charges for their alleged participation in the online 'warez' file-trading community, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) announced Thursday. The charges come out of an ongoing DOJ crackdown against international online piracy groups that distribute copyrighted movies, software, games and music on the Internet. The five defendants are alleged to be leading members of the 'warez scene,' groups of Internet users who illegally distribute copyrighted materials online." IDG notes, "The charges are part of Operations FastLink and Site Down, the two largest international law enforcement efforts targeted at online distribution of copyrighted material, the DOJ said. The operations have resulted in more than 200 search warrants executed in 16 countries, hundreds of computers being confiscated and more than US$100 million worth of copyrighted software, games, movies and music removed from download sites."

The LinuxElectrons (4/27) reports Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said when announcing the charges, "Large-scale operations like FastLink and SiteDown strike at the core of online piracy. Losses to industry and individuals from online piracy are enormous, and law enforcement will continue to do everything it can to protect valuable copyrighted products and shut down these illegal distribution networks." U.S. Attorney Gretchen C. F. Shappert added, "Intellectual property theft is a growing crime with serious economic consequences. Operations FastLink and SiteDown combine the resources of the Justice Department, 42 separate U.S. Attorney Offices, and FBI agents from 30 separate field offices, in a concerted effort to attack organizations dedicated to the piracy of intellectual property." And Charlotte FBI Special Agent-in-Charge Kevin B. Kendrick noted, "Theft of intellectual property strikes at the very heart of this country's economic vitality. Crimes of this type are a priority within our Cyber Crimes Program and the public can be rest assured that we will continue to aggressively investigate those individuals and organizations involved in activity such as this in an effort to bring them to justice."

UPI (4/28) reports, "The following individuals were charged with criminal copyright infringement in Charlotte, N.C., the Department of Justice said: Kevin Fuchs, 25, of West Amherst, N.Y.; and Cuong Quoc Trang, 35, of Parker, Colo., were charged by indictment with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement, violating the Digital Millennium Copyright Act, and copyright infringement. Authorities charged Matthew Alderman, 24, of Ashland, Ore., with criminal copyright infringement, and David Morvant, 35, of Thibodaux, La., and Michael Hays, 51, of Delafield, Wis., with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement." UPI also notes Fisher said, "Large-scale operations like FastLink and SiteDown strike at the core of online piracy. Losses to industry and individuals from online piracy are enormous, and law enforcement will continue to do everything it can to protect valuable copyrighted products and shut down these illegal distribution networks."

Newspaper Workers Union Opposes McClatchy Purchase Of KRT Papers. The Sacramento Business Journal (4/28) reports, "The Newspaper Guild-Communications Workers of America Thursday called on state and federal regulators to scrutinize the $1 billion sale of the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times, Monterey Herald and St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press" to McClatchy Co. "The union has been working with The Yucaipa Cos. of Los Angeles to try to buy the 12 papers that McClatchy said it intends to sell when it completes its purchase of…Knight Ridder Inc. 'We believe that a common interest exists among McClatchy shareholders, employees and the communities served by the 12 Knight Ridder newspapers being sold by McClatchy Co.,' union president Linda Foley said in a statement. 'TNG-CWA continues to believe that the bid by The Yucaipa Cos. for all 12 newspapers is likely to deliver the best value and we call on McClatchy Co. to provide evidence that shareholder, employee and community interests are being best served by yesterday's announcement,' Foley said."

MediaNews CEO Assures Pioneer Press Will See Few Changes. Knight Ridder (4/28, Welbes) reports, "The fate of the St. Paul Pioneer Press became a little clearer Thursday as William Dean Singleton said that the paper won't see major changes after his company becomes its owner sometime this summer. 'You're joining us because we want you,' Singleton, the CEO of MediaNews Group Inc., told employees packed into a stifling conference room. 'We think there's a lot of opportunity here and if we didn't want it, we wouldn't have bought it.' … The deal, expected to close this summer, won't cause the loss of jobs, wages or benefits at the Pioneer Press, Singleton said. He added that the status of the newspaper's labor contracts, which cover about 90 percent of its 960 workers, will be up to local management. Publisher Par Ridder will remain with the newspaper." KRT also notes the union's announcement yesterday and adds, "The U.S. Department of Justice recently told McClatchy that it's seeking additional information about the Twin Cities newspaper market."

Judge Rules Seattle Papers Antitrust Case Can Proceed. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (4/28, Richman) reports, "The judge in the 3-year-old contract dispute between Seattle's two daily newspapers refused today to halt all court proceedings in that case, ruling that antitrust and breach of contract claims by a self-styled citizens group can proceed against the owner of the Seattle P-I and The Seattle Times Co. The ruling, from King County Superior Court Judge Greg Canova, also raises the possibility that The Times Co. may withdraw from a binding arbitration agreement -- an event that would start two 18-month clocks ticking toward the automatic end of the Joint Operating Agreement that has bound the two newspapers since 1983."

Microsoft Assails European Commission Antitrust Ruling. The Financial Times (4/28, Buck) reports, "Microsoft yesterday accused the European Commission of 'the biggest encroachment on intellectual property in European competition law history', and likened the regulator's antitrust ruling to 'opening the vaults of a bank' and handing out money to passers-by. The software group's withering attack formed part of a legal challenge in the European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg to the Commission's March 2004 decision that found Microsoft guilty of abusing its dominant position and imposed a record €497m ($616m) fine. … But the Commission's legal team disputed Microsoft's arguments vehemently, saying the group had 'rigged the rules' of the market to ensure its rivals were unable to compete. The regulator dismissed, in particular, Microsoft's claim that the ruling infringed its intellectual property, saying the group had only been able to cite four European patents in its defence."

The AP (4/28, White) reports, "Judge John D. Cooke, in a terse exchange with Commission lawyer Anthony Whelan, asked whether Microsoft's proprietary information should be given away to its rivals, including patent information. 'The information which forms interoperability is hugely valuable commercial information. In the commercial sense this is highly valuable information, that's why it's difficult to understand the attitude of the Commission that these are mere trade secrets,' the judge said -- a reflection of Microsoft's assertion that to give over the code would be forfeiting the hundreds of years in manpower that went into devising it. Cooke, who will write the draft ruling, wanted to know if 'competition rules require that be taken away from Microsoft, conveying a huge commercial advantage.' Whelan said the value Microsoft placed on the code was merely a reflection of the amount of time and effort it had put into creating it, nothing more." The New York Times (4/28, Meller, 1.19M) notes, "During cross-examination…the sharpest questions were reserved for the commission." Cooke "appeared to chastise commission lawyers for not taking the company's concerns about protecting its intellectual property seriously."

Fifth Indianapolis Firm Pleads Guilty To Concrete Price-Fixing. The Indianapolis Star (4/28, Wall, 267K) reports, "Carmel Concrete Products and its president, Scott D. Hughey, have agreed to plead guilty and pay criminal fines for fixing the price of ready-mixed concrete in the Indianapolis area, the Department of Justice announced" yesterday. "Carmel Concrete is the fifth Indianapolis-area concrete firm to either admit guilt or be charged in the ongoing federal probe." The Star notes, "In all, those firms have agreed to pay more than $30 million in fines. Nine concrete executives have agreed to fines or jail time. U.S. District Court Judge Larry J. McKinney will determine the size of a fine for Carmel Concrete…and the length of any jail term for Scott Hughey. … 'Price-fixing conspiracies, such as the one that dominated the Indianapolis ready mixed concrete market for nearly four years, harm our free market system,' said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Department's Antitrust Division. 'This type of conduct deprives consumers of their right to competitive pricing.'"

Small Supplier Sues Chanel For Allegedly Counterfeiting Design. In a front-page story, The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Passariello, 2.11M) reports, "Carmen Colle has crocheted bustiers for Chanel and spun sweaters for Yves Saint Laurent. … But now Ms. Colle," a small supplier to fashion houses called a "petit main," has filed "a €5.3 million ($6.6 million) lawsuit that may unravel her business." Colle "claims Chanel, which she has supplied for years, copied one of her designs -- a crocheted floral pattern -- on a line of $1,800 to $3,000 cardigans, skirts and dresses. The iconic French fashion house says the allegations are unfounded. But a judge in a Paris commercial court has allowed Ms. Colle to pursue her case, which deals with a recurring issue for fashion firms today: counterfeiting." The Journal adds that at a "January hearing, the judge asked Chanel and Ms. Colle to enter into mediation. The two sides didn't come to an agreement, however, so the case went back to court last month. The judge is expected to issue a verdict on May 12."

Ten States Sue EPA Over Power Plant Pollution. The AP (4/28, Barrett) reports, "Ten states fired a new legal salvo at the federal government Thursday in a long-running court battle over global warming and pollution from power plants. The states, joined by environmental groups, sued the Environmental Protection Agency over its decision not to regulate carbon dioxide pollution as a contributor to global warming." New York, California, Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Mexico, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Wisconsin "filed the lawsuit in the US Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit." The states, led by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, "want the government to require tighter pollution controls on the newest generation of power plants."

The New York Times (4/28, Hakim, 1.19M) says "a similar suit involving many of the same states and led by Massachusetts was dismissed last year by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, where the new lawsuit was filed. Another suit by several of the same states sought to compel power producers to reduce emissions and was dismissed last year in Federal District Court in Manhattan. Both cases are being appealed."

Maryland Sues ExxonMobile Over Gasoline Leak. The Baltimore Sun (4/28, Wheeler, 296K) reports, "In the biggest environmental enforcement action in recent years in Maryland, the state filed suit Thursday seeking nearly $12 million in penalties from Exxon Mobil Corp. and a local service station operator for a massive gasoline leak that officials say has fouled well water in the Jacksonville area of Baltimore County." State Environment Department Sec. Kendl P. Philbrick "called the leak, one of the largest ever in the state, 'catastrophic,' and said an investigation continues into whether criminal charges might be filed as well." The Sun notes, "The suit charges that more than 25,000 gallons of unleaded regular gas dribbled from a small hole accidentally drilled in a buried fuel line by a contractor performing maintenance at the station in mid-January. The leak was not reported to state environmental officials until Feb. 17, more than a month later, although, the lawsuit says, the station's operator noted losses of almost 700 gallons of gasoline daily during that time."

NOAA Finds Navy Sonar Most Likely Caused Hawaii Whale Stranding. The Washington Post (4/28, A8, Kaufman, 744K) reports, "Federal marine specialists have concluded that Navy sonar was the most likely cause of the unusual stranding of melon-headed whales in a Hawaiian bay in 2004. The appearance of as many as 200 of the normally deep-diving whales in Hanalei Bay in Kauai occurred while a major American-Japanese sonar training exercise was taking place at the nearby Pacific Missile Range Facility." The Post adds, "While the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration scientists said they could not definitely state that sonar caused the strandings, they said extensive study led them to the conclusion that there was no other likely cause. … The Navy has said it was virtually impossible for its sonar to have led to the Hanalei Bay stranding, and officials maintained that position yesterday."

DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Announces 9,000 Fugitives Arrested Nationwide In Operation Falcon II. The CBS Evening News (4/27, story 6, 1:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Federal and local police working together have just completed a 27-state roundup of fugitives that they call the worst of the worst. Many are violent sexual offenders." CBS (Bowers) added authorities made "more than 9,000 arrests made in the last few days in 27 states, more than 1100 of them accused sexual predators." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales: "The very first arrests made under Falcon II for failure to register as a sex offender, put away Reginald Dozier, who had raped a child." Bowers: "Dozier was the first of what authorities are calling the Falcon 15, the most wanted sex offenders arrested in the sweep, men wanted for everything from child rape to failure to register with authorities." Falcon II "cost close to a half million dollars, money appropriated from Congress specifically for this operation, so when the week is gone, so is the money. Though what isn't gone is the work; despite all the Falcon 2 arrests, there could be as many as 500,000 wanted sex offenders still out there." NBC Nightly News (4/27, story 8, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) also briefly reported on the arrests, and CNN's Live From (4/27) and Fox News' DaySide With Linda Vester (4/27) carried the remarks by Gonzales and USMS Director John Clark live. MSNBC's Abrams Report (4/27) interviewed US Marshals Service Chief Inspector Billy Sorukas about the arrests. Additionally, CNN, MSNBC and Fox News briefly reported the story during periodic news updates throughout their evening programming.

The AP (4/28, Sherman) reports, "Ten years to the day after allegedly raping a 14-year-old girl, a California man was arrested in a roundup of fugitives that law enforcement officials say snared more than 1,100 sex offenders. The concentrated search for people wanted for federal, state and local crimes 'targeted the worst of the worst,'" Gonzales said. "Authorities arrested 9,037 people April 17 to last Sunday in a 27-state dragnet led by the U.S. Marshals Service and timed to coincide with National Victims Rights Week. … No other single law enforcement operation had resulted in the capture of as many suspected sex offenders, the Justice Department said." The AP notes, "Nearly 80,000 fugitives were arrested last year, just under half by the Marshals Service and the rest by state and local police working with federal authorities. … The operations in the past two years produced roughly 10 times the average number of weekly arrests, but even that barely dents the fugitive caseload. The FBI database contains names of a million fugitives. The director of the Marshals Service, John Clark, said Thursday there are a 'few million fugitives' in the United States, most of them wanted on state and local charges."

Bloomberg (4/28, Schmidt) also reports Gonzales said that "the operation 'targeted the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country.'" Bloomberg notes, "Authorities also seized 111 guns, more than 91 kilograms of narcotics, $120,265 in cash and 14 cars. Last year, more than 79,000 fugitives were arrested and there are 'a few million' still at large, mostly on state and local warrants…Clark said. FALCON stands for Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally. The government conducted a similar operation last year."

Gonzales' announcement was covered extensively by local newspapers and on local TV news across the country, with the stories emphasizing the arrests in those communities. Some examples: The Arizona Daily Star (4/28) reports, "Forty-six people wanted for immigration offenses, including people smuggling, were among the 117 fugitives rounded up in Tucson and Southern Arizona during a weeklong law enforcement operation, officials said. … Operation Falcon targeted those 'who had for too long escaped the grip of justice,' said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in a press statement Thursday. 'With these criminals off the streets, fewer Americans will live with the threat of violent crime in their communities,' he said."

The Chicago Sun-Times (4/28) reports, "In Chicago, 403 fugitives -- twice as many as the last time investigators did this -- were arrested during the sweep, which began April 17, said Geoffrey Shank, commander of the U.S. Marshals Service Great Lakes Regional Fugitive Task Force. In the Great Lakes Region, 1,225 fugitives were arrested. Chicago also netted more gang members than any other city and pulled two of the 15 most wanted off the streets, authorities said."

The Baton Rouge Advocate (4/28, Troxler) reports, "A nationwide crackdown on wanted suspects running from the law has found its way to Louisiana. As part of Operation Falcon, which has a primary focus of tracking down those suspected of sex crimes and violent crimes against women, 68 people were arrested in the middle part of the state. … U.S. Attorney David Dugas said the well-coordinated effort will continue throughout the year, but it gets extra emphasis this week. 'It's dangerous work,' he said. 'These are fugitives who are trying to escape the law. They know law enforcement is looking at them. It takes skill, it takes planning, it takes dedication by the agents -- and that's what we saw this week.'"

Under the headline "Sweep Nabs 'Worst Of The Worst'," The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (4/28, 200K) reports, "The long arm of the law rounded up 110 Minnesota fugitives — several wanted for violent sex crimes — over the past week," in "a 27-state effort by the U.S. Marshals Service to capture fugitives. … Al Garber, U.S. Marshal for the District of Minnesota coordinated the Minnesota apprehensions. In all, officers from 18 law enforcement agencies searched for fugitives in the Twin Cities, Duluth and Rochester from April 17 through Sunday." The Minneapolis Star Tribune (4/28, Aamot, 424K) adds, "In Minnesota, all but about 20 of the fugitives were captured in the Twin Cities area, officials said. … At a news conference at the federal courthouse, officials displayed several weapons confiscated in the sweep, including a gun and a device U.S. Marshal Al Garber called a 'knuckle-knife.' The fugitives caught in Minnesota included a man who had raped an 8-year-old boy, a gang member dragged from a crawl space and a career criminal with a record dating to 1967, Garber said. 'The goal was to make our neighborhoods safer, and by taking 110 people off the street, we did that' to a large measure, he said."

The AP (4/28, Sherman) reports, "Hundreds of California residents are among 9,037 fugitives arrested nationally in a weeklong roundup that focused on sex offenders, top law enforcement officials said Thursday. … Among the 256 apprehended in the inland region that stretches from Bakersfield to the Oregon border was a murder suspect from Mexico living in Modesto who will be deported, said Antonio Amador, marshal for that district. … 'As law enforcement knows, fugitives generally have criminal records and continue to commit crimes,' Amador said at a Sacramento news conference. 'In fact, 95 percent of those arrested had (previous) criminal records.'" The AP notes, "The Marshals Service spent $531,000 on the weeklong exercise, most of it to pay overtime to local and state police, said David Dimmitt, chief deputy U.S. Marshal."

The WHOI-TV Creve Coeur, IL (4/27, Spencer) reports, "Peoria County Sheriff Mike McCoy said before this program, it would have been impossible to track down many of these offenders. 'When you have someone like the Marshall's Office and this task force that has jurisdiction to go anywhere, to investigate anywhere, has the ability to call an office up throughout the country, through the world and say hey look we are looking for this guy, we got a report he is in your area. Will you go check it out?' McCoy said."

The KTEN-TV Ada, OK (4/27) reports, "A historic day for law enforcement nationwide, had a significant impact in Southeastern Oklahoma. … Today, U.S. Marshals visited Durant, commending Bryan County officials on their contributions." KTEN adds, "Twenty-five different departments in Eastern, Oklahoma captured over 500 fugitives. Local task forces working with the marshals talked about the operation. … 'Most of them will tell you that they're just doing their jobs, but just doing their jobs most likely saved or impacted many lives in a positive way that can't be calculated,' John Loyd, U.S. Marshals said. Loyd also said the raids yielded over a hundred guns, thousands in cash and opened doors to even more illegal activity in the area." The Muskogee (OK) Phoenix (4/28, McMahan) adds, "The number of arrests in the Eastern District was the third highest of any area in the United States where the operation was carried out, said U.S. Marshal John Loyd. Only the Houston and San Antonio areas had a higher number of arrests. … Of the 506 fugitives arrested in eastern Oklahoma, 35 were wanted for violent sexual offenses, including rape, forcible sodomy and sexual assault, Loyd said."

The Houston Chronicle (4/28, Lezon, 581K) reports, "In Houston, 328 fugitives were arrested, more than 40 of them wanted for sexual-related offenses, officials said. 'Pretty significant numbers, I think,' said Deputy U.S. Marshal Marianne Matus, from her Houston office. Carlos Bermudez, 30, offered no resistance when he was arrested at his golf-course maintenance job in The Woodlands last Friday, Matus said. … Federal authorities said he was among 15 of the 'worst of the worst' fugitives targeted in the crackdown, according to a news release from the U.S. Marshals Service." The KGBT-TV Harlingen, TX (4/27, Pedraza) reports, "An undercover agent says they were pleased with the number of arrests. … 'Valleywide there were 148 fugitives arrested and 213 warrants were cleared.'" KGBT notes that "Gonzales says Falcon III is coming in the next few months. He says it will target violent criminals on the east coast. The U.S. Marshall's Service in McAllen is already looking forward to another big round up. … 'We're going to continue searching for these individuals,' said the agent about the accused criminals still at large. 'We're not going to stop... we're going to be diligent in our efforts to bring them to justice.'"

The KITV-TV Honolulu (4/27) reports that "one of the nation's Top 15 most wanted was found on Oahu. From Waikiki to Maui, law enforcement involved in Operation Falcon II combed the islands for a week picking up wanted fugitives," arresting 249. The WANE-TV Fort Wayne (4/27) reports, "Altogether in northern Indiana, officers rounded up more than 46 fugitives on narcotics violations, seven on weapons-related offenses and several others for failing to registered as sex offenders. … John Clark, the director of the U.S. Marshalls Service says, 'There is an old phrase, "you can run but you can't hide" and for many fugitives out there, they think they can hide and they may, but not for long.' … Dave Murtaugh, the head of the U.S. Marshalls Service Northern Indiana District says, 'We're not going to let them rest.'"

The KCNC-TV Denver (4/28, Gionet) reports that "the U.S. Marshals Service rounded up 140 fugitives in Colorado as a part of Operation Falcon II…U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez announced Thursday. … One violent fugitive from Colorado was caught in Baltimore. The U.S. Marshals worked in conjunction with the Yakima Police Department, Yakima Tribal Police and the Sheriff's Department."

The KTVA-TV Anchorage (4/27) reports, "It is being called the largest sex offender bust in the nation's history and it's Alaska's biggest multi-agency bust ever. … We had 14 arrests in Fairbanks, 16 arrests on the Kenai Peninsula, 20 arrests in the Mat-Su Valley and 32 arrests in Anchorage," said Randy Johnson, U.S. Marshal, Alaska. 84 fugitives in all, the largest coordinated bust in Alaska in history with crimes ranging from drugs, and probation violations, to more dangerous offenses." KTVA notes that "the Last Frontier is often the last resort for the nation's criminals who think they can come and disappear into the Bush but Alaskan authorities say they will be caught. 'We want people to know this is not a place that they can come and hide. We will come and find them. We have a lot of investigative tools at our beck and call and we will come and find them anywhere they are, anywhere in the state,' said Marc Otte, Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal, Alaska."

The KGO-TV San Francisco (4/27, Ishimaru) reports, "U.S. marshals invited ABC7 on an exclusive ride-along for some of the Bay Area sweeps targeting sex offenders. … Chief Dep. Thomas Figmik, U.S. Marshals Service: 'Operation Falcon targeted offenders wanted for the worst crimes, such as murder, kidnap, arson, assault, robbery, narcotics and rape. The operation was inspired by the Department of Justice's National Victims Crimes Week, the theme of which was justice isn't served until crime victims are.'

The Grand Forks Herald (4/28, 32K) reports, "Fifty-four people are in custody in North Dakota as part of a nationwide roundup of fugitives, U.S. Attorney Drew Wrigley said Thursday. … U.S. Marshal Dave Carpenter said seven of the arrests in North Dakota were people wanted for sex crimes." The Herald notes, "North Dakota got about $8,000 for the roundup, up from about $5,000 last year, Carpenter said. The state's courts and jails will be busy in coming weeks, Carpenter said."

The KTRV-TV Boise (4/27, Patterson) reports, "In Idaho alone, 74 violent offenders are now in jail. … 'A sex offender is a very special kind' of criminal,' said U.S. Marshal Pat McDonald on Thursday. 'They stay below the radar. They move around a lot.' Of the 74 people arrested last week in Idaho during Operation Falcon, seven were wanted for violent sexual offenses, five for failing to register as a sex offender. … 'We got 14 different sex offenders, re-offenders, we got five unregistered sex offenders. One 2 miles from my house,' said Deputy Kevin Platts of the U.S. Marshals Service."

The Fort Wayne News-Sentinel (4/28) reports, "A nationwide roundup this month has put 210 central Indiana fugitives in custody," and "the dragnet captured at least 11 people who were wanted for violent sexual offenses such as rape, forcible sodomy and sexual assault, according to federal prosecutors. … '(This) serves as an excellent example of local, state, and federal law enforcement agencies working together in a united effort to bring fugitives to justice,' U.S. Attorney Susan Brooks said." The WISH-TV Indianapolis (4/27) reports former Hamilton County youth pastor Joshua Kramp "has been arrested, charged with sexual misconduct with a minor." He "was arrested on a golf course following a nationwide sweep of fugitives by the U.S. Marshals. … 'The arrest of Josh Kramp is a great example of why Operation Falcon works,' says Captain Kevin Jowett of the Hamilton County Sheriff's Department.

The Billings (MT) Gazette (4/28, Neary) reports, "Local police teamed up with the U.S. Marshals Service to arrest 21 fugitives in Wyoming," and "Timothy Moseley, chief deputy United States Marshal in Cheyenne, said Thursday his agency worked with 17 law enforcement officers from various agencies in Laramie, Natrona and Teton counties on the arrests. … 'The complete success of this operation lies solely at the feet of the state and local agencies that participated. Without their help and their manpower, we would not have been nearly as successful as we were,' Moseley said. 'We targeted sexual predators, and we managed to arrest two pretty heinous characters,' Moseley said."

The Bay News 9 Tampa (4/27) reports, "As part of Operation Falcon II, task force officers with the U.S. Marshal's Office arrested a suspect in a local rape. Darryl William Floyd, 37, is accused of sexually assaulting his then stepdaughter in April 2004. A doctor determined the then 13-year-old victim had been molested on two different occasions."

The nomination by President Bush must be confirmed by the full Senate. Senator Charles Grassley says it was approved unanimously by the Senate Judiciary Committee" yesterday.

Judge Rules NYC May Access ATF Information On Gun Makers. The AP (4/27, Caruso) reports, "For the fourth time, New York City's lawsuit against several gun manufacturers has survived an attempt by Congress to kill it off. A federal judge in Brooklyn ruled Thursday that the city may have access to gun tracing information gathered by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, even though a recently passed measure expressly forbids such data from being used in civil suits. … The decision is a victory for the city, which intends to rely heavily on weapons tracing information to prove its claim that gun manufacturers create a public nuisance by recklessly distributing firearms." The AP notes, "Lawrence Greenwald, an attorney for Beretta U.S.A., said the gun companies were likely to appeal."

The New York Times (4/28, Cardwell, 1.19M) reports in "Metro Briefing" that "in his decision, Judge Jack B. Weinstein…wrote that 'the proverbial cat is already out of A.T.F.'s bag' and that it made no sense 'to distort the terms of a federal budgetary measure in order to wrestle the cat back in.'"

Bloomberg's Handling Of Gun Violence Issue Noted. In his Washington Post column (4/28, A19), E.J. Dionne says, "Have you noticed that Washington politicians have given up on thinking about new solutions to gun violence? New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg has noticed, and he's angry. Good for him." Bloomberg is "a Republican, if hardly a partisan sort, and it may take a Republican to restart a debate that many Democrats have fled after a careful examination of the electoral map -- and years of exhaustion from demagoguery on the issue." With Boston's Democratic mayor, Thomas Menino, Bloomberg "brought 13 other big-city mayors together here on Tuesday to call for 'national leadership in the war on gun violence.'"

Federal Investigators Arrest Major Connecticut Gun Dealer. The AP (4/28) reports on of Connecticut's "largest gun dealers has been arrested on numerous federal firearms charges in a case that authorities say shows how guns wind up in the hands of criminals." Frank D'Andrea, "who ran the Gun Case in Shelton, was arrested last week and released after posting a $200,000 bond, authorities announced Thursday. … Federal investigators said that over a two-year period 100 guns seized at crime scenes had passed through D'Andrea's store. 'This investigation has revealed a disturbing lack of control and mismanagement by one of Connecticut's largest gun dealers, and blatant disregard for federal firearms possession and reporting laws,' said U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor. 'This case goes to the heart of how legal guns become illegal guns on the street. Gun store operators are the first line of defense for stopping gun crimes on our streets, and this case will be prosecuted to the fullest extent.'" The AP notes, "A routine inspection by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco Firearms and Explosives last year began to uncover the violations, authorities said. 'Stopping the illegal flow of firearms continues to be one of our top priorities and today is just another example of how we do that,' said ATF Special Agent in Charge Glenn N. Anderson."

The Connecticut Post (4/278, Mayko) reported, "The move came just months after U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor rented a billboard across the street from D'Andrea's former store in Stratford. The poster read 'Buy a gun for a criminal, go to federal prison.' … O'Connor said Wednesday that ATF investigators determined that, over a two-year period, 100 guns seized at crime scenes had passed through D'Andrea's store. 'Federally licensed gun dealers have a tremendous responsibility to sell weapons appropriately,' O'Connor said."

Police responded at approximately 1:15 a.m. No one was injured in the fire and the property damage is estimated at $1.5 million.

'We take this incident seriously and are committed to pursuing every investigative lead,' said ATF Special Agent in Charge Kelvin N. Crenshaw."

FDA Statement On Marijuana Continues To Be Scrutinized. In the New York Times (4/28, 1.19M), op-ed contributor Henry Miller writes that the FDA "staked out its position on the long-standing controversy over the medical use of marijuana — and made a lot of people smoking mad. … The regulators were denounced as elevating politics over science. But the F.D.A. did no such thing. To be sure, its one-page statement was far shorter and less detailed than the institute's book-length report, but its conclusions were essentially the same. The F.D.A. also recently gave the go-ahead for clinical trials of a new drug derived from marijuana — further demonstrating that its position is both sensible and proper."

The Jacksonville (NC) Daily News (4/28) writes, "Last week, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, for reasons that are far from clear, chose to enter the debate over medical marijuana with a thoroughly unscientific — one might even say anti-scientific — blanket denial that marijuana has any medical value at all. … Scientific American magazine noted on its Web site the next day, the statement simply ignores 'the existence of a 1999 report by the Institute of Medicine of the National Academy of Sciences, which concluded that marijuana was moderately well-suited for particular conditions.'"

US Anti-Drug Policy Seen As Empowering Organized-Crime Rings. In the Wall Street Journal (4/28, 2.11M), columnist Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes, "A serious discussion about U.S. security interests has to begin by acknowledging the great cost of prohibition and the war on drugs to U.S. foreign policy objectives. A U.S. policy that unintentionally empowers brutal organized-crime rings is counterproductive to U.S. hopes for a stable and prosperous Latin America. The problem is particularly acute for America's southern neighbor. Drug violence is spiraling throughout Mexico and innocents are paying the ultimate price."

IMMIGRATION:

May Day Boycott Plans Divide Pro-Immigration Activists. USA Today (4/28, Kasindorf, Keen, 2.31M) reports, "Masses of illegal immigrants and their supporters around the USA plan to boycott workplaces, stores and schools on Monday, but the move is dividing some pro-immigration activists and business owners." Organizers "of the May Day walkout call it el gran paro — 'the big stop' — and 'a day without immigrants.'"

The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Becerra, Blankstein, 958K) reports, "Two immigrant rights demonstrations Monday in Los Angeles could each draw a half-million marchers or more, police said Thursday, as officials expressed concern about a major disruption of traffic, commerce and school." Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, Cardinal Roger Mahony and "others have encouraged protesters to attend the late-afternoon march from MacArthur Park down Wilshire Boulevard to La Brea Avenue, prompting authorities to say that crowd might be the larger of the two." Officials "in Santa Ana, Huntington Park, Oxnard, Riverside, Pomona and San Diego said they expect smaller but boisterous protests." Police in Chicago, "meanwhile, estimated that as many as 500,000 could take to the streets in that city, while Seattle officials and protest organizers said they expect anywhere from 10,000 to 50,000 marchers."

Rumors Of ICE Raids Generate Fear Among Illegal Immigrants. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Jordan, Trevisani, 2.11M) reports, "Thousands of illegal immigrants across the U.S. stayed away from work and school, skipped medical appointments and scrapped purchases this week as rumors spread that authorities are rounding up undocumented residents." The "rising panic is fallout from last week's move by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to crack down on employers who purposely hire undocumented immigrants. Immigration and Customs Enforcement investigations over the past year resulted in the arrest on April 19 of 1,187 employees and seven current and former managers of IFCO Systems North America." The "origin of the rumors is unclear." The situation "could hamper Monday's planned 'National Day of Action,' another round of immigration rallies that has been expected to draw millions to the streets of major U.S. cities."

Two-Thirds Of Hispanics Blame Bush Or GOP For Inaction On Immigration Reform. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll "shows a 46% plurality of Hispanics place immigration atop 'must do' list. The poll, conducted in English, included an expanded sample of Hispanic respondents. Eight in 10 embrace Senate guest-worker compromise differentiating among illegal immigrants based on residence. Though Republicans blame Democrats for earlier collapse of that deal, two-thirds of Hispanics would hold Bush or his party responsible for inaction. The poll's margin of error is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points." The Journal adds, "White voters favor Republican control of Congress by 45%-39%; Hispanics prefer Democrats, 55%-22%."

(4/28, Kronholz, Lyons, Mexico, 2.11M) reports that "thanks to a decades-long family-planning campaign, most Mexicans are having far fewer children than was typical a generation ago." In 1968, "the average Mexican woman had nearly seven children. Today, the figure is just above two, comparable to the U.S." This "sweeping demographic shift has fostered hope that someday Mexico will produce a healthy middle class." The "new, smaller Mexican family may help change that by allowing parents to invest more in their children's education, finally producing the generation that lifts Mexico into the developed world." A slowdown of immigrants seeking work in the north "would be especially likely if a growing middle class makes more Mexicans comfortable at home and averse to risking a dash across the border."

Spanish-Language Version Of Star-Spangled Banner Generates Outrage. ABC World News Tonight (4/27, story 7, 3:30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "With Congress debating a crackdown on undocumented immigrants, Latino singers decided to record a Spanish-language version of the national anthem. They wanted to make a point about America being an inclusive nation that many immigrants and cultures are absorbed in. But there are those who say sing it in English or don't sing it at all." ABC (Avila) added, "The idea came from music executive Adam Kidron, who sympathized with immigrant demonstrations, but was bothered by the number of Mexican flags in the crowd. He hopes the new Spanish language national anthem will demonstrate Latino patriotism and encourage more American flags." But this "Spanish language rendition has sparked incredible outrage."

The Washington Post (4/28, A1, Montgomery, 744K) reports in a front page story that "outrage over what's being called 'The Illegal Alien Anthem' is already building in the blogosphere and among conservative commentators. Timed to debut the week Congress returned to debate immigration reform, with the country riven by the issue, 'Nuestro Himno' is intended to be an anthem of solidarity for the movement that has drawn hundreds of thousands of people to march peacefully for immigrant rights in Washington and cities across the country, says Adam Kidron, president of Urban Box Office, the New York-based entertainment company that launched the project."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Homeland Security Panel Calls For Abolition Of FEMA. The Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee issued a report Thursday that, among other things, called for the abolition of the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the creation of a successor agency to be called the National Preparedness and Response Authority. The White House "flatly rejected any proposal to abolish FEMA," NBC reported in its lead story, and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff also rebuffed the idea. ABC and CBS also gave prominent coverage to the report's release. ABC World News Tonight (4/27, story 4, 2:20, Kerley, 8.78M) said the report said the "massive FEMA failures, the bungling bureaucracy during Hurricane Katrina, can't be fixed," so FEMA "should be dismantled." But critics say their plan "only amounts to reshuffling and renaming the agency." In New Orleans, the President "said the country is already better prepared," and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff was "blunt." Chertoff: "I don't have a lot time to fuss about the naming issue." NBC Nightly News (4/27, lead story, 3:25, Reid, 9.87M) said that "in 86 recommendations, the report describes the proposed agency as far more powerful than FEMA, with a much larger budget, a director who would report directly to the President during a crisis, so powerful the report compares the position to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs." But White House Homeland Security Advisor Frances Townsend "flatly rejected any proposal to abolish FEMA."

CNN's The Situation Room (4/27, Blitzer) reported that the proposed National Preparedness and Response Authority "would still be part of the Department of Homeland Security, but a distinct agency like the Coast Guard or the Secret Service. Senators say the director of the new agency should have a direct line of communication with the president, and have significant experience in crisis management unlike the former FEMA chief, Michael Brown."

The AP (4/27, Jordan) writes that the report "ripped the Bush administration anew," but "with a new hurricane season just weeks away, senators conceded that few if any of their proposals could become reality in time. The bipartisan investigation into one of the worst natural disasters in the nation's history singled out President Bush and the White House as appearing indifferent to the devastation until two days after the storm hit." The Senate report "is the third major federal report on the government failures exposed by the Aug. 29 storm."

Knight Ridder (4/28, Hutcheson) calls the report "a scorching account of government failure." In addition to Bush, the Senate document singles out Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, "and a host of other officials for failing to anticipate the devastation or provide adequate help to victims." Knight Ridder points out that Lieberman, "a centrist whose bid for re-election next fall is being challenged by a liberal rival in the Democratic primary," was especially critical of Bush "in a solo chapter at the end of the full report." Lieberman "also accused the Bush administration of stonewalling the panel's investigation."

The Washington Times (4/28, Curl, 90K) reports Democrats "seized on the Senate panel's report, hoping to position themselves in the November congressional elections." Louisiana Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu said, "The handling of Hurricane Katrina by the Department of Homeland Security and FEMA was an organizational nightmare of immense proportions and that tragic administrative bumbling caused untold hardship for the people of Louisiana."

The Washington Post (4/28, A6, Hsu, 744K) says the report "sparked a sharp congressional debate over whether to abolish and rebuild FEMA." Collins said FEMA "'has become a symbol of a bumbling bureaucracy' that must be dismantled, and merely 'tweaking the organizational chart' will not solve failures exposed by the hurricane." But Townsend said, "As we're headed into this hurricane season, now is not the time to really look at moving organizational boxes." And Chertoff, "speaking at George Mason University, endorsed several Senate findings, but opposed making FEMA an independent agency and said renaming it would be like 'slapping a fresh coat of paint on.'" Chertoff said, "I'm held accountable. I want to make sure as a consequence that I have full command and control over my department."

CQ Today (4/27, Starks) also writes that while the panelists' view that FEMA "performed miserably during Hurricane Katrina is widely shared in Congress," lawmakers in both parties "are sharply divided on whether FEMA or any successor agency should be independent or part of the Department of Homeland Security."

Under the headline "Divisions Arise On Whether FEMA Requires A Tear-Down," the Los Angeles Times (4/28, Neuman, 958K) reports, "Congress and the White House are headed toward a collision over one of the big questions left unresolved" following Katrina: whether to "beef up" FEMA within DHS, "or to create a politically independent agency to handle national emergencies. … And as President Bush made his 11th visit to the Gulf Coast since the storm hit Aug. 29, the White House urged a strengthening -- but no reshuffling -- of current operations."

The Financial Times (4/28, Alden) quotes Collins saying, "FEMA is discredited, demoralised and dysfunctional. It is beyond repair." And while the report was generous in its distribution of blame, "the committee laid particular blame on Michael Brown." Collins "accused Mr Brown of 'blatant insubordination' during the crisis, and the committee's report said he was 'unqualified and counterproductive.'"

Army Corps Of Engineers Racing To Rebuild New Orleans Levee System. NBC Nightly News (4/27, story 7, 4:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "All eyes are on the levee system as they rebuild, and the Army Corps of Engineers tries to rebuild faith in the levees as well." NBC (Savidge) added, "It's a race New Orleans can't afford to lose: Repair its hurricane protection system before the next hurricane season starts. The job, 73% finished, 36 days to go, and the man in charge says it'll be done June 1." Brigadier General Robert Crear, US Army Corps of Engineers: "Some people would consider that almost impossible, but we've been working 24-hour shifts, seven days a week for the last eight months."

Ex-FEMA Chief Witt Calls For Independent FEMA. In a letter to the editor of USA Today (4/28, 2.31M), Clinton Administration FEMA Director James Lee Witt writes, "Even with the release of the Senate's report on Hurricane Katrina, the American public is not being well served by its government with the recommendations. It is time for Congress and the administration to do what is right and pull FEMA out of the Department of Homeland Security -- as Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., and other lawmakers suggest. FEMA and DHS should each stand alone. One agency can't effectively serve two disparate functions. … Let's give FEMA Director David Paulison an independent agency, a system and the support he needs to be a success. And let's give our citizens the confidence that they're being well served."

Krugman Says New Agency Would Not End Cronyism. In his New York Times (4/28, 1.19M) column, Paul Krugman writes, "The U.S. government is being stalked by an invisible bandit, the Crony Fairy, who visits key agencies by dead of night, snatches away qualified people and replaces them with unqualified political appointees. There's no way to catch or stop the Crony Fairy, so our only hope is to change the agencies' names. That way she might get confused, and leave our government able to function. … I guess it's impossible to select qualified people to run FEMA; if you try, the Crony Fairy will spirit them away and replace them with Michael Brown. But she might not know her way to" the National Preparedness and Response Agency.

Bush To Approve Dubai-Owned Firm's Takeover Of US Military Manufacturing Plants. The New York Times (4/28, Rutenberg, Sanger, 1.19M) reports, "President Bush is expected on Friday to announce his approval of a deal under which a Dubai-owned company would take control of nine plants in the United States that manufacture parts for American military vehicles and aircraft, say two administration officials familiar with the terms of the deal." The officials, "who were granted anonymity so they could speak freely about something the president had not yet announced," said that "the final details had not yet been set and that Mr. Bush might put conditions on the transaction to keep military technology in the United States." But "his action is almost certain to attract scrutiny in Congress."

Bush Asks Congress For Authority To Raise CAFE Standards. The CBS Evening News (4/27, story 3, 0:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported the President yesterday asked Congress "to give him the authority to raise fuel economy standards on all cars. He made the announcement while visiting a Mississippi gas station." While Bush's proposal was noted by all three networks and receives mentions in most print stories on the gas price issue, it was largely overshadowed by a Senate GOP announcement of steps to help Americans deal with the rising fuel costs.

ABC World News Tonight (4/27, story 2, 1:25, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported, "This is a pretty significant shift by the President. The Administration opposed this kind of move as recently as when the energy bill was passed last August. It's something that Democrats and some moderate Republicans have been calling for a long time. They want to raise the current standard, from the current 27.5 miles per gallon up to about 36 or 40 miles per gallon. The President is now saying he wants the authority to do this on his own. The question would be, how high does he want to raise them? Will he go up to 36 or 40? Or will he do something less? But this is a significant shift." NBC Nightly News (4/27, story 3, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) noted Bush made his remarks during "an unscheduled stop at a gas station in Biloxi," MS. Bush "pointed out that high gas prices are the equivalent of a tax increase on working people in this country."

Meanwhile, says the Washington Times (4/28, Bellantoni, 90K), in a letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta "formally asked for legislation that would allow the Corporate Average Fuel Economy standard for cars, now set at 27.5 miles per gallon for each manufacturer, to be raised through an administrative process."

Senate Republicans Offer Plan To Ease Fuel Prices, Including $100 Gasoline Tax Rebate. The AP (4/28, Hebert) reports Senate Republicans yesterday "proposed a $100 rebate check for millions of taxpayers Thursday to counter high gasoline costs, but linked the assistance to drilling in an Alaska wildlife refuge, assuring the measure would face stiff opposition from most Democrats." Fox News' Special Report (4/27, Baier) reported on the proposed rebate, and says that "where the money would come from is a bit unclear at the moment. It's part of a 10 point plan being proposed by senate republicans. Also include tax breaks for those purchasing hybrid cars." CNN's The Situation Room (4/27, Bash) said that "it is probably unlikely -- given the partisanship -- that they will actually pass any of these proposals this election year. It's very unlikely, most people say."

The issue of gas prices continued to receive widespread media attention last night and this morning. Last night it led two out of three network newscasts. ABC World News Tonight (4/27, lead story, 2:55, B. Stark, 8.78M) added, "In Washington today, it was hard to find a politician who wasn't talking about gas prices." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist: "Our plan would give taxpayers a $100 gas tax holiday rebate check." The proposals "ranged from a gas-tax-holiday and hundred-dollar rebate checks for drivers to a bill that would reward commuters who switch to bikes." NBC Nightly News (4/27, story 4, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) also outlined the GOP plan, "Among the proposals they have outlined, a $100 per taxpayer rebate linked to opening Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge for drilling, looser permitting rules for new refineries, and a rollback of recent tax breaks for the oil industry."

Meanwhile, the CBS Evening News (4/27, lead story, 2:30, Pitts, 7.66M) reported, "Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke came to Congress today with the same concerns as most Americans -- gas prices." Bernanke: "…rising energy prices pose a risk to both economic activity and inflation." Pitts: "The big three automakers are feeling the pain too. They're set to meet with President Bush for the first time sometime in May to discuss their woes. Gas prices help put the brakes on SUV sales." Bernanke "also made clear today the US economy is doing just fine at the moment, but we're just beginning to feel the effects of these rising oil prices. And, for that, there is no quick fix."

Appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (4/27), Frist said of rising gas prices, "As most people understand, there is no silver bullet, but it is a matter of supply and demand and we're 60 percent dependent on foreign oil. … What we need to do is focus on supply and demand issues. On the supply side, we can slow down filling or pause the filling of the strategic petroleum reserve. We have to go back and address our refinery capacity. Right now, our refineries are down below Katrina level. On the demand side, we need to give the authority to the administration to be able to control and to regulate those fuel economy standards, and we need in the midterm to long-term focus on ethanol production, production from soy, biomass, alternative fuels, wind, solar. A lot we can do, and that's why the Republicans today put out an eight point plan to look at supply, demand, make sure there's no price gouging as well."

The Financial Times (4/28, Yeager, Alden) reports Frist "acknowledged that the measures would have a limited impact," but "with the Republicans trailing badly in the polls, Congress and the White House are under pressure to respond." The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Fialka, Gold, Meckler, 2.11M) says "the industry-bashing in recent days from normally pro-business, antiregulation Republicans in response to surging pump prices has been striking." But "the Senate bill also includes some carrots for energy producers, including new tax incentives for increasing oil-refining capacity. And the plan would open up a supposedly oil-rich area along the coast of Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge for oil exploration."

The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Reynolds, 958K) says Democrats "derided the GOP plan, and its political chances appeared weak." The Democrats "noted that although the package incorporated some ideas they already had introduced, it contained a provision that almost assuredly would torpedo its passage: opening the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas drilling." The New York Times (4/28, Hulse, 1.19M) says Democrats "pressed their own ideas, including a proposal by Senator Robert Menendez, Democrat of New Jersey, for a 60-day suspension on the 18.4-cent-per-gallon federal tax on gasoline and 24-cent diesel tax. 'It is direct relief at the pump,' Mr. Menendez said." Meanwhile Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon, "tied up the Senate for almost five hours on Thursday in an effort to force a vote on his proposal to prohibit oil companies from escaping federal royalties for drilling on public lands when oil prices exceeded $55 per barrel."

As Senate Republicans Thursday revealed plans aimed at helping Americans deal with rising gas prices, Fox News' Big Story with John Gibson (4/27) questioned whether Americans are "willing enough to look at other alternative sources" like ethanol. Minnesota Governor Tim Pawlenty told Fox News that President Bush's request for the EPA to drop gas requirements will "hurt Minnesota and hurt the energy policy in the United States." Our country, he said, "has been asleep at the switch on energy policy since Jimmy Carter…30 years ago." Instead, the governor said "states have been leading the way with innovation and taking risks." And with today's "skyrocketing world demand" for oil, Gov. Pawlenty said the US has "to find more supply in other ways, things like renewable fuels from ethanol, so we can get more supply to accommodate demand to take off price pressures."

Gasoline Prices Seen As Further Depressing GOP Support In WSJournal Poll. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Harwood, 2.11M) reports, "Rising gas prices have intensified discontent with Washington and handed Congress a frightening midterm election backdrop: a deeply pessimistic electorate, despite a robust economy." A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll "underscores a striking gap between Americans' mood and the nation's economic performance. … The upshot: Two-thirds of Americans say the nation is 'off on the wrong track,' President Bush's approval rating has fallen to 36% and Congress fares even worse at 22% approval." That" is a worrisome sign for Republicans, who are seeking to defend their House and Senate majorities with little more than six months remaining before Election Day. Continuing a trend that has persisted for a year, Democrats lead -- beyond the poll's 3.1 percentage point margin of error -- in public preference for which party should control Congress. The survey of 1,005 adults was conducted April 21-24." Democrats also "enjoy an edge in intensity; by 11 percentage points." Approval of the job Congress is doing "has plummeted to 22%, from 33% just last month. That's worse than the marks a Democratic-controlled Congress received at a similar point in 1994, the year Newt Gingrich led Republicans back to power on Capitol Hill."

ExxonMobil Reports $8.4 Billion Profit. NBC Nightly News (4/27, story 5, 1:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "ExxonMobil just today reported $8.4 billion for the first quarter, the fifth-highest quarterly earnings number on record. Those numbers are infuriating a lot of Americans." NBC (Myers) added, "For outraged consumers, the staggering profit numbers boil down to this -- Exxon earned 9.5 cents on every dollar of gasoline and oil sold, cashing in at every stage of the process." The Washington Post (4/28, A1, Mufson, Murray, 744K) and USA Today (4/28, Healey, Krantz, 2.31M) run similar reports.

Prices Of Oil, Gasoline Down In New York Trading. The Washington Times (4/28, Hill, 90K) reports, "Oil and gasoline prices took another tumble in New York trading yesterday on signs of increasing supplies and slackening demand in the United States and China, adding to an 18-cent drop in wholesale gas prices that likely will produce relief at the pump in the days ahead." Since peaking above $75 last week, "the price of premium crude oil has fallen to just under $71 yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange, while gas for delivery in May has plummeted to $2.07 a gallon after touching a high of $2.25." the Times adds, "Pump prices have flattened out at $2.92 nationwide for regular unleaded, 50 percent higher than they were in February but not yet reflecting the declines in the futures and wholesale markets."

High Oil Prices Affecting Airport Costs. The CBS Evening News (4/27, story 2, 2:05, Orr, 7.66M) reported, "If you fly, you're also paying more due to record oil prices. And ticket prices are being jacked up more often then you realize." Darryl Jenkins, "who tracks the airline industry, say flyers have been hit with 22 separate price hikes in just over a year, raising fares on average by at least 10% and much more on some routes. For example, a flight from Chicago to LA, which cost about $200 last July, now costs $260." Jenkins: "Jet fuel and its impact on the airline business is now greater than the impact that 9/11 had on the airline business."

Religious Leaders Call For Prayer To Lower Gasoline Prices. ABC World News Tonight (4/27, story 3, :15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Not far from Capitol Hill today, a group of religious leaders felt the best way to lower gas prices was to pray. They held a vigil outside a gas station and urged all Americans to ask God to help lawmakers set good energy policy and to ensure honesty among oil companies."

House GOP Uses Hydrogen-Powered Car In Event To Highlight Gasoline Prices. The Washington Post (4/29, A17, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "The Republican House leadership, hopping aboard the new anti-oil-addiction campaign, staged a fine media event yesterday at a BP gas station at Ninth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue

SE that featured a hydrogen-powered car. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.), along with other top House Republicans, was photographed in and around the snappy blue General Motors HydroGen 3 van. The event followed one by Senate Democrats on Wednesday, who rode in their gas guzzlers to an Exxon station a block from their offices to blame Republicans for high fuel prices."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (4/28, 958K) says in his speech on Tuesday to the Renewable Fuels Association, President Bush proposed "dubious policies that…might save a few cents per gallon in the short term, while doing little to address the underlying problem of U.S. oil dependence," thereby ushering "in a silly season for wrongheaded, economically ignorant proposals by headline-chasing politicians." In fact, the "prospects for successful detox [now] seem all the more distant as public officials scramble to follow the president's lead in dreaming up their own 'solutions' to the oil market," but all these "gas-price proposals should be ignored and scorned." Instead, sensible policy "would focus on curbing consumption."

The Wall Street Journal (4/28, 2.11M) editorializes, "Let's hope the folks who make those cable-TV videos of loopy college kids vamping on spring break are headed for Capitol Hill. The Members aren't yet taking their shirts off in response to higher gasoline taxes, but give them time. They're certainly pulling enough other stunts to laugh at." The "Senate Republican proposal for a $100 rebate, unveiled yesterday," is "destined for the pandering hall of fame."

Under the headline "Pander At The Pump," the New York Times (4/28, 1.19M) editorializes, "The battle to see which political party can out-pander the other on the subject of gasoline prices is embarrassing. If American consumers are having sticker shock at the pumps, it's because of a series of policy failures that stretch back decades. The last thing the country needs now is another irresponsible quick fix." Congress's "frantic gestures this week are, at bottom, an attempt to divert attention from its past failures to act, and its resulting inability to shield Americans from the burden of high prices at the pump." But "the pain of high gas prices will only get worse unless Congress changes its priorities, now."

Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (4/28, 1.19M), "The beginning of leadership for the president is to tell the American people the truth: This is not your parents' energy crisis. The price of oil is not soaring just because of greedy oil companies. It is soaring because of structural changes in the global energy market that could have vast consequences for America and the world if we do not respond in a comprehensive manner. Toward that end, we need a tax on gasoline at the pump that will keep prices around $4 a gallon."

Charles Krauthammer writes in the Washington Post (4/28, A19, 744K), "If you thought the Dubai port deal marked a record high in Washington cynicism, think again. Nothing can match the spectacle of politicians scrambling for cover during a spike in gasoline prices." And "this time the panderfest has gone all the way to the Oval Office."

Michael Kinsley, in a column titled "Tax The Windfall," writes in the Washington Post (4/28, A19, 744K), "Because of the war, the government is adding hundreds of billions to the burden of debt that all taxpayers, including other businesses, will have to pay off. Because of the war, American soldiers by the hundreds, and Iraqis by the thousands, are paying the ultimate tax of death by government policy. And because of the war, American oil companies are raking in extra billions in profits."

Eugene Robinson writes in the Washington Post (4/28, A19, 744K), "That was no impostor, that was the actual George W. Bush the other day, wagging his finger at the good people who run the oil bidness and pledging to hold them accountable, or at least pretend to. Pushing alternative fuels? Investigating windfall profits? Is the president unwell? No, he's fine. H is fixes for high gasoline prices also include loosening some of those bothersome clean air regulations and, as usual, a call for drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. He's just scared, and I don't blame him. With gas prices soaring over $3 a gallon, it's time for some serious panic."

Bush Visits Gulf Coast For 11th Time Since Katrina. NBC Nightly News (4/27, lead story, 3:25, Williams, 9.87M), on location in New Orleans, reported, "President Bush visited this city today and made a second stop next door in Biloxi, Mississippi, thanking volunteers at each location. But again today, another story came along and collided with the planned choreography of the day." NBC (Reid) added Chairman Susan Collins and ranking Democrat Joseph Lieberman "concluded that, eight months later, FEMA is still not ready for a hurricane the size of Katrina. The report says it took Hurricane Katrina to reveal that FEMA is so dysfunctional, it should be scrapped."

The CBS Evening News (4/27, story 4, 2:25, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "While the President slipped into a carpenter's apron in Louisiana today to pitch in with rebuilding the Gulf Coast, back in Washington an entirely different sort of post-Katrina hammering was underway, with senators calling for FEMA to be abolished." But "34 days from hurricane season, the President promised an efficient response should disaster strike again." Bush: "One of the things that we're working on is to make sure that we've learned the lessons from Katrina."

The New York Times (4/28, Rutenberg, 1.19M) emphasizes the presidential visit to ailing New Orleans in its coverage, writing that Bush promised "to make federal rebuilding efforts 'as efficient as possible' while signaling that his administration was listening to its critics." The trip "was planned to highlight the progress of rebuilding efforts on the Gulf Coast and, this being National Volunteer Week, the role volunteers have played in them." Bush visited the home of Ethel Williams, which is being repaired through charitable efforts, and "the White House seemed to get the sort of image it was seeking, that of the president with his arm around Ms. Williams." With Blanco and Nagin, "both Democrats, standing nearby, she told him, 'I'm proud that you're here, Mr. President, and I won't ever forget you.'"

Under the headline "In New Orleans, Bush Urges Volunteerism," the Washington Post (4/28, A6, VandeHei, 744K) reports Bush "wrapped his arm around a symbol of the devastation and hope of this ravaged city: Ethel Williams, one of the thousands of people who lost almost everything to Hurricane Katrina." At her house, Bush said, "If you are interested in helping the victims of Katrina, interested in helping them get back on their feet, come on down here." The New Orleans Times-Picayune (4/28, Varney, 257K) reports on Bush "talking with residents, pounding nails at a reconstruction site in the 9th Ward, and once again calling on Congress to approve his request of additional money for housing and levee reconstruction in the state." Bush "noted there was no shortage of work to be done, and, with Catholic Charities banners undulating on Williams' porch, he pointed to the work done in the 9th Ward by volunteers from all over the United States."

CNN's The Situation Room (4/27, Henry) reported Bush made his "11th trip to the Gulf region since Hurricane Katrina, and he really found the Ninth Ward in New Orleans to be pretty much devastated, homes still demolished, trash piled high, streets still pretty lifeless. And the President put on a carpenter's apron at one point to try to help some volunteers rebuild a home." The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Cooper, 2.11M) also notes that it was Bush's "11th trip to the area." The President "found that after a start that by nearly every measure was scattershot and halting, federal and state efforts, fortified by some $85 billion from Congress, are beginning to show progress. Cleanup and reconstruction in the region are moving ahead, especially with the basics: removing debris, providing temporary housing and rebuilding the area's demolished infrastructure." The AP (4/28, Loven) also covers the Bush visit.

Lobbying Reform Bill Survives House Vote By 216-207 Margin. The AP (4/28, Abrams) reports, "A Republican-backed lobbying overhaul bill narrowly survived Thursday, averting what would have been a stunning blow to the party's drive to repair the scandal-tarnished reputation of Congress before the fall elections." The 216-207 House vote "to advance debate on the bill came after GOP leaders spent hours urging their own members not to abandon them on the legislation. The turning point came when they persuaded Republican members of the Appropriations Committee to go along with measures in the bill to limit earmarks, or special interest projects." The AP adds, "In the end 12 Republicans, mostly lawmakers who thought the bill was too weak, voted against it. Democrats were unanimous in opposition."

The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Rogers, 2.11M) reports "dozens more" Republicans "had threatened to jump ship until Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) interceded to quell a rebellion by members of the House Appropriations Committee. … By holding the party together, Mr. Hastert avoided what would have been a huge defeat, killing both lobbying overhaul and any chance of a budget resolution this spring." But "when debate resumes next week, critics say the shortcomings of the Republican package will also become more apparent -- as well as the restrictive terms of debate."

The Washington Post (4/28, A4, Weisman, Birnbaum, 744K) reports Hastert "promised appropriators that they would not alone be targeted by a provision that requires narrowly tailored 'earmarks' be identified by the names of their sponsors and be subject to a special type of vote that could remove them." The leadership also "pledged to broaden the earmark provision in later negotiations with the Senate so that it will apply to all sorts of legislation, from transportation to taxation." The Post adds, "Appropriators were incensed that the pending ethics bill would apply the strict new rules only to their 11 annual spending bills, which fund the federal government. Had the provision been in place last year, they complained, it would not have blocked the so-called Bridge to Nowhere in Alaska, which helped spawn Congress's anti-earmarks drive in the first place." The Washington Times (4/28, Hurt, Bellantoni, 90K) also says that "for much of yesterday…the legislation appeared to be doomed. Shortly after the vote, one Democrat hurriedly issued a press release with a subject line: 'GOP Lobby Bill Dies in the US House.'"

Knight Ridder (4/28, Kuhnhenn) says Republicans "narrowly defused a revolt within their ranks that would have killed lobby and ethics legislation, but then delayed a final vote on the package until next week." The legislation "still faces broad, if not unanimous, opposition from Democrats and a handful of Republican moderates."

USA Today (4/28, Drinkard, 2.31M) headline its report "Lobbying Bill Quite Different From 1st Draft," and says that under the House bill, "lobbyists would still be able to buy gifts for lawmakers, as long as they are worth $50 or less. Instead of banning privately financed trips, they would be suspended until the ethics committee could come up with new rules to govern them." House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., called the measure "a ruse." She added, "It is an embarrassingly trivial response to the culture of corruption that has thrived under the Republican Congress." The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Simon, 958K) runs a similar report.

Henninger Says Supreme Court Would Be Diminished By Televising Oral Arguments. In his Wall Street Journal column (4/28), Daniel Henninger says that after attending oral arguments for two cases at the Supreme Court, the "issues that rage around the Court over constitutional interpretation are worth fighting over. But in an op-ed piece this week, Judiciary Chairman Specter raged that the public deserved to have the Court's 'power' televised. He is wrong. TV of its nature would surely diminish the Court. Anyone who wishes may listen to past oral arguments at www.oyez.org/oyez/frontpage1. That includes, quite eerie to hear, Roe v. Wade."

NYTimes Columnist Says Scalia Needs To Be "Reined In." In a New York Times column (4/26), Adam Cohen says Justice Antonin Scalia "has gone too far — and he keeps on doing it. He made national headlines recently for making a gesture that may or may not be obscene. If it wasn't obscene, it was certainly coarse and undignified." Scalia's "public statements often make him sound more like a political partisan than a judge," and "worst of all, Justice Scalia refuses to abide by the basic principles of recusal." Scalia is "certainly hurting his own reputation," but his "actions are damaging the reputation and moral authority of the Supreme Court." Whatever "the reason, Justice Scalia needs to be reined in. If he will not police himself, his colleagues and Congress should do it, to protect the dignity of the court, and to ensure that the parties before him get a fair hearing."

Personnel News. CQ (4/27, Blinkhorn) reports, "Stacey Leavandosky has joined the office of Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., as chief of staff." Leavandosky "replaces David Thomas, now a principal at Mehlman Vogel Castagnetti." Joseph H. Lanier "has joined Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman as senior counsel. Lanier was legal counsel to Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky." Bill Holbrook "has joined the Electric Power Supply Association as vice president of public affairs. Holbrook was communications director at the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee. Matt Dempsey has been promoted to press secretary from deputy press secretary at the committee."

Judge Dismisses Most Of Red Cross Whistleblower Lawsuit. The AP (4/28, de la Cruz) reports, "A whistleblower who claims the American Red Cross failed to immediately alert regulators when more than 600 pints of contaminated blood were released in New Jersey saw the bulk of her lawsuit dismissed Thursday in federal court. Michelle Hoyte also claims the agency fired her for complaining to her managers about the tainted blood. That part of her lawsuit is still intact, but the Red Cross has filed a motion to have that final portion dismissed as well. After the brief hearing, in which a judge dismissed the False Claims Act portion of her lawsuit, Hoyte said she remained worried that the Justice Department and the Food and Drug Administration are not doing enough to make sure the Red Cross's blood supply is carefully monitored.

Sago Mine Survivor Details Efforts To Survive After Explosion. The networks last night all reported on the letter written by Randal McCloy in which the Sago Mine disaster survivor discusses the efforts that he and his fellow miners made to escape after the explosion that trapped them. ABC World News Tonight (4/27, story 8, 2:25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported McCloy "sent letters to the families of each other the victims, describing how their loved ones helped each other, and fought to live." ABC (Wiener) added, "Since he came home from the hospital, Randal McCloy has been hailed as a hero by his West Virginia neighbors. His new 2-page letter seeks to portray his 12 fallen colleagues as heroes, too." The CBS Evening News (4/27, story 5, 2:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The disaster's sole survivor wrote to families of the dead men and revealed that at least four of the emergency oxygen packs they carried did not work." NBC Nightly News (4/27, story 9, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "McCloy's letter is filled with details about the desperate struggle of the 13 miners to survive."

Iran Says It Will Defy Any UN Resolution On Its Nuclear Program. The New York Times (4/28, Broad, Sciolino, 1.19M) reports, "Iran vowed yesterday to defy any United Nations Security Council resolution on its nuclear activities on the eve of a major report by atomic inspectors on the status of its nuclear program." Javad Zarif, the Iranian ambassador to the United Nations, told reporters in New York that "Iran would consider illegitimate any Council resolution calling on Iran to stop uranium enrichment that invoked the so-called Chapter 7 clause, which could open the door to penalties and possibly to military action." Meanwhile, the Washington Times (4/28, Pisik, 90K) quotes Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad telling a crown in Iraq, "We want nuclear technology for peace and progress of nations, and if some believe that they can prevent us with psychological warfare and resolutions, they are mistaken. … We have obtained the technology for producing nuclear fuel. ... No one can take it away from our nation."

CNN's The Situation Room (4/27, Verjee) reported, "In Bulgaria today, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the world cannot sit by if Iran thumbs its nose at the international community. Rice says Iran is highly unlikely to give in to international pressure to suspend its nuclear program." The New York Times (4/28, Weisman, 1.19M) reports Rice stressed at the NATO Ministerial "that the latest talks between United Nations monitors and Iranian envoys had apparently failed to break the impasse over Iran's nuclear activities and that the United Nations Security Council had no choice but to rebuke Iran. 'What is clear is that it is highly unlikely that Iran is going to accede to the demands of the international community… In order to be credible the Security Council of course has to act.' The United Nations' credibility is at stake, Ms. Rice said, and 'it cannot have its word and its will completely ignored by a member state.'" The Times cautions that, "despite her tough words, it was far from clear whether Russia would drop its opposition to a resolution at the Security Council that would implicitly threaten sanctions. … Past opposition by Russia, China and others has forced the United States to back down from its demand…, but now American and European diplomats hope that a new critical finding by the International Atomic Energy Agency will bolster support for the action it wants."

The Financial Times (4/28, Dombey) keys on the continuing obstacles to American success, saying Beijing and Moscow again "warned against escalating the dispute over Iran's nuclear programme." Russian President Vladimir Putin "warned against too great an intervention by the Security Council – a path Moscow feels could lead to confrontation. … The Chinese government also called for restraint. Moscow and Beijing, which have growing energy and economic links with Iran, fear that a UN resolution might be used to justify military action at a later stage." The Times says Washington "has stepped up efforts to assuage" fears, and quotes Counselor Zelikow saying, "Forcible change of the Iranian regime is not the objective of American policy."

USA Today (4/28, Slavin, 2.31M) reports the US "diplomatic offensive could lead to limited sanctions, but there is little international consensus now for stronger measures." The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Richter, 958K) runs a similar story.

Wire services continued to cover the controversy broadly. An AP (4/27, Ames) story noted German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier "suggested Thursday that the United States and Iran could hold direct discussions on the Islamic republic's nuclear standoff with the West if Tehran agrees to talk to Washington about the chaos in Iraq." Steinmeier "said he still hoped for a negotiated solution, but insisted Iran 'must dissolve the suspicion that it uses its civil nuclear program for the development of weapons.'" A separate AP (4/27, Gearan) piece reported Rice said that "Iran seems determined to defy international demands to control its disputed nuclear program, so it is time for the U.N. Security Council to act." The AP also said "quick action" by the UNSC "seems remote because of splits among its members. The United States is pressing for a strong response and Rice wants such steps to remain an option."

Israel Says Iran Has North Korean Missiles. The AP (4/27, Heller) reported, "Iran has received its first batch of North Korean-made surface-to-surface missiles that put European countries within firing range, Israel's military intelligence chief said in an interview published Thursday. … Military intelligence chief Maj. Gen. Amos Yadlin, who spoke to Haaretz, has warned of the new Iranian missiles in several recent interviews to the media. Iran already has missiles capable of reaching Israel, but the BM-25s are a significant upgrade over its existing top-of-the-line missiles -- the Shihab-4 and Shihab-3." In a story this morning, the Christian Science Monitor (4/28, Prusher, 61K) says Israel "has been moving into a more proactive position in the campaign to contain Tehran."

Pakistan Tells US It Would Not Back Use Of Force Against Iran. The AP (4/28, Schweid) reports, "Pakistan notified the Bush administration on Thursday it would not support the use of force to halt Iran's nuclear programs. 'We are against any resort to force,' Foreign Secretary Riaz Khan said after a meeting with Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns."

Poll Finds Americans Support Strikes Against Iran By 48%-42% Margin. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows that "despite Iraq, Americans don't reject strikes against a nuclear Iran. By 48%-42%, public says U.S. should join coalition to attack Iran's nuclear capability if Tehran approaches development of a weapon."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, 2.11M) editorializes, "A funny thing happened on the way to the Iranian bomb: The more alarming the mullahs' behavior, the more nonchalant the rest of the world seems to be about it." The Journal adds, "How so many apparently thoughtful people can face the idea of an Iranian bomb with relative equanimity remains a mystery to us. Whether they are as "cool" with the idea of fissile material in Mr. Bashir's hands is another matter. Whatever the case, they should consider that acquiescing to a bomb for Iran may also mean agreeing to one for many more of the world's worst actors."

Bush Imposes Sanctions On Four Accused Of Darfur War Crimes. ABC World News Tonight (4/27, story 6, 2:35, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush imposed sanctions against four men suspected of war crimes in the Darfur region of Sudan. The government is accused of helping Arab militias kill nearly 200,000 people in Darfur and driving 2 million people from their homes." ABC (Karl) added, "The UN today warned the situation in Darfur has taken a dramatic turn for the worse, with violence forcing 200,000 people from homes in the last two months alone. An attack just this week by the Sudanese air force sent 20,000 people fleeing to refugee camps." Jan Egeland, UN Emergency Relief Coordinator: "It is the worst crisis in the world at the moment, because it's totally out of control." Karl: "There are 7,000 African peacekeepers in Darfur. They've been unable to stop the violence. Calls for greater action are now coming from US lawmakers, American religious groups and even celebrities. The actor, George Clooney, just returned from the region."

Rice Says NATO To Take On More "Robust" Role In Darfur Region. The Washington Times (4/28, Kralev, 90K) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "said yesterday that NATO leaders have agreed to take on a more 'robust' role in Sudan's Darfur region and urged other international bodies to prepare the way. NATO diplomats said that earlier disagreements among the allies over involvement in Darfur had been resolved, but impediments remained, such as the Sudanese government's objection to a U.N. peacekeeping mission. 'Everybody recognizes that the [African Union] mission, while it has been successful thus far, is not robust enough to deal with the continued violence in Darfur and, particularly, problems that are emerging in western Darfur given the situation and problems on the border with Chad,' Miss Rice said." Meanwhile, White House spokesman Scott McClellan "said, 'An unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security and foreign policy of the United States is posed by the persistence of violence in Sudan's Darfur region, particularly against civilians.'" Rice, following "a meeting of the 26 NATO foreign ministers in Sofia, the Bulgarian capital, said that 'NATO is ready to work' with the United Nations and the African Union [AU] 'to try to bring about that more robust mission.'"

Chadian Rebels Said To Be Using Weapons Obtained From China. The Washington Times (4/28, Pepper, 90K) reports, "Many of the weapons used by Chadian rebels who nearly overthrew the government this month -- from the ubiquitous Kalashnikov rifles and rocket-propelled grenades to more advanced artillery pieces mounted on Toyota Land Cruisers -- come from China, probably indirectly through Sudan." While Chadian President Idriss Deby "and international relief groups were quick to accuse Sudan of promoting the attack two weeks ago on the capital, N'Djamena, by about 350 rebels," China's "insatiable appetite for oil to feed its economic growth gave Beijing an interest in the outcome as well. … 'Chinese firms from the People's Republic [of China] have been providing a range of large and small arms to African armed forces regardless of their persistent grave human rights violations, especially to countries with oil deposits, such as Sudan, or valuable natural resources, such as Liberia,' said Brian Wood, the head of arms research at Amnesty International." China "is one of the largest suppliers of arms to Sudan, Africa's largest country, which has tense relations with Chad. And China is heavily invested in Sudan's oil sector, with more than 10,000 workers and $3 billion spent on its oil sector since 1999."

Civilians Caught Up In Conflict Along Chad, Sudan Border. A front page article in the Washington Post (4/28, A1, Wax, 744K) reports that in the "desert region of Chad near the Sudanese border, civilians are caught in a conflict so confusing that they -- and even the combatants -- have trouble telling who is fighting whom. … Chadian government troops are posted at key points along the border to halt what they say is a revolt by rebels based in Sudan. The soldiers wear red armbands to set them apart from the rebels, who wear similar uniforms." The rebels, "who are fighting to topple Chadian President Idriss Deby, represent at least 12 groups united under several coalitions." Chad "blames the Sudanese, saying they back the insurrection, an allegation that Sudan denies." Sudan "blames the Chadians, saying they support a different group of rebels in the Darfur region of western Sudan." Chadians, meanwhile, "tend to blame France, Chad's former colonial power, which they accuse of being involved in the violence by backing the president." The Post adds that "two things are certain: The chaos in Darfur has extended deep into Chad, and a rapidly increasing number of civilians continue to suffer in one of Africa's most complex crises."

US Strategy To Train, Fund Chad Military Said To Run Risk Of Backfiring. In a piece in the New York Times (4/28, 1.19M), Raffi Khatchadourian, who traveled to Chad in 2005 for the International Reporting Project at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies, relates that the U.S. military, since '03, "has been training and equipping" Chad President Idriss Déby's army. This summer, U.S. forces "will continue to advise Chadian soldiers, and Congress is expected to allocate $500 million for a five-year program to train and equip several Saharan armies," hoping "these initiatives will help contain the threat of terrorism by bringing order to the Great Desert and its borderlands." But "dispensing military aid to Chad now -- with Mr. Déby fighting hundreds of rebels backed by Sudan -- seems reckless. It puts American military equipment and expertise in the hands of a desperate dictator. Worse still, it risks pouring additional fuel into the human furnace of Darfur, and it may well come to impede the careful diplomatic work required to solve that crisis."

leader, Aleksandr Milinkevich, and "swiftly sentenced him to 15 days behind bars, accusing him of participating in an unauthorized rally the day before against President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko." The arrest of the former presidential candidate "intensified a crackdown on political opponents in the wake of unusually strong public protests against a vote denounced as a fraud." Leaders of three other political movements were also arrested Thursday. During a visit to nearby Bulgaria, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "assailed the arrest of Mr. Milinkevich as 'reprehensible,' saying that 'the United States roundly condemns this act and sincerely hopes that the Belarus government accepts the will of the international community that it act in accordance with accepted international principles in the treatment of political opposition.'"

Cairo Protest Over Judiciary Turns Violent As Police Intervene. The New York Times (4/28, Slackman, 1.19M) reports "thousands of riot police officers sealed off access" to the High Court in Cairo, "beating and arresting protesters who had turned out to support two judges facing a disciplinary panel because they had accused the government of election fraud." The "huge show of force, appearing larger even than what was deployed in the Sinai after four bombings there this week, seemed to signal that President Hosni Mubarak's government had reached a breaking point over shows of dissent." The Washington Post (4/28, A12, Williams, 744K) reports the two judges "are being prosecuted for denouncing fraud in a series of elections last year. The show of force was impressive: The number of black-clad, helmeted officers on the street was far larger than during a series of small anti-Mubarak demonstrations last year."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Juror In Lodi Terror Trial Claims She Was Coerced To Make Conviction. The San Francisco Chronicle (4/28, Bulwa, Writer) reports, "One of 12 jurors who convicted a 23-year-old Lodi man Tuesday on charges that he trained for holy war disavowed the verdict late Thursday, alleging that she was bullied into a guilty finding amid a pattern of misconduct by fellow panelists." In an affidavit juror Arcelia Lopez said, "I never once throughout the deliberation process and the reading of the verdict believed Hamid Hayat to be guilty." She "said the jury's foreman, near the start of the two-month trial, 'gestured as if he was tying a rope around his neck' and said, 'Hang him.' Lopez said the gesture was repeated throughout the trial and that she believed it was a reference to Hayat." However one juror "called the accusations 'a complete outrage' borne of 'juror regret.' The juror said Lopez changed her vote to guilty Monday, which at first made the juror uncomfortable."

The Stockton (CA) Record (4/28, Hood) adds, "Hamid Hayat's conviction on terrorism charges was delayed by a lone juror who refused to believe the Lodi man was guilty, according to a jury note unsealed Wednesday, one day after the verdict." And "U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott said Wednesday that last-minute changes of heart are a part of the jury process and to suggest anything else is speculation." Scott said, "It's the back and forth of jury deliberations, and it's the way it works, so there's nothing really out of the ordinary about it." The Record adds, "Meanwhile, FBI agents resumed their surveillance of Muslims named by Umer Hayat as having received paramilitary training in Pakistan. Federal law enforcement authorities said Tuesday they are continuing their investigations into possible ties between local Muslims and terrorist groups."

Moussaoui Trial Deliberations Delayed By Juror Illness. The Washington Post (4/28, Markon, Dwyer, 744K) reports, "The death penalty case of Sept. 11, 2001, conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, which has stretched over more than four years amid numerous delays and complications, was delayed once again yesterday. A juror called in sick." The jury will continue deliberations Friday. The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Serrano, 958K) quotes U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema saying, "This is the most sensitive time in the case. … I don't want any juror in this serious of a case working if he or she is not feeling 100%."

Jury Finds Man Guilty In Plot To Bomb Milwaukee Federal Building. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/28) reports, "A man who authorities say idolized Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh was found guilty Thursday of threatening to blow up a federal building in downtown Milwaukee." Steven Parr "had studied bomb-making books and previously built small explosive devices, prosecutors said." He "was days away from being released from state prison in September 2004 after serving time on drug charges when he told a cellmate about his plan to use a truck bomb to blow up the 14-story building." But his cellmate "said in letters to the FBI that Parr had extensive knowledge in bomb-making and considered Ted Kaczynski, the Unabomber, another of his heroes."

FBI Arrests Five Linked To Terror Suspect On Bank Fraud Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/28, Foy) reports, "Five relatives of a U.S. citizen suspected of being a senior al-Qaida operative were arrested in California and Utah on charges of defrauding banks of hundreds of thousands of dollars." The Buerau "said it was investigating whether any of the money was used to finance Middle East terrorism." The AP notes, "Nothing in the indictments ties any of the relatives to a terror network, and federal prosecutors officially referred to the case as a criminal enterprise. But agents are working to determine where all the money went, said Greg Bretzing, a supervisor in the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force in Salt Lake City." Bretzing said, "This is an ongoing investigation. This is nowhere close to being over." Omar's relatives are suspected of taking "$327,000 from fraudulent bank loans and bad mortgages in Utah, and Bretzing said some of the money wound up in Jordan with Omar's relatives."

The Salt Lake Tribune (4/28, LaPlante) adds, "Counterterrorist agents pounced on five men, one in Utah and four in California, on Wednesday as part of an investigation into the U.S. connections of a suspected senior al-Qaida operative imprisoned in Iraq." Although they have not been charged with terrorism, "FBI agents say that some of the money alleged to have been stolen in various schemes wound up in Jordan. And now they want to know whether that cash has ended up in the hands of terrorists." Shawqi Omar was arrested in Iraq and "could be the first American citizen to be tried in the Iraqi court system, if military officials prevail in an ongoing legal battle. It is a prospect his family in the United States is fighting to prevent. A document filed by Omar's lawyers this week, in which they have again requested access to their client, alleged that U.S. troops beat Omar and tortured him with electric shocks."

KTVX-TV in Salt Lake, UT (4/28) reports, "What makes the FBI wonder if the money is being used for terror activities is Omar's relation to a terror suspect being held in Iraq. Shawqi Omar is Sharif's brother and is suspected of planning terror attacks with Al Qaeda boss Abu Musab al-Zarqawi." KTVX adds, "Shawqi Omar lived in Utah in the 80's and worked as a refrigerator repairman before moving his family to Jordan. Shawqi Omar was later arrested in Iraq in 2004 after his alleged help in a plan to kidnap an American working in the country."

Detainee Declares Intention To Admit To Conspiracy Charges. Ghassan Abdullah Al Sharbi, who was arrested was arrested in an Al Qaeda safe house in Faisalabad, Pakistan on March 28, 2002, made his first appearance before a US war crimes tribunal Thursday. The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Williams, 958K) reports, "The only indicted detainee mentioned in the Sept. 11 commission report made a defiant first appearance before the war crimes tribunal Thursday, vowing, 'I'm going to make this easy.' He said he had taken up arms against the United States and would proudly serve any sentence." He "denounced the tribunal and his detention as illegitimate and rejected the Navy lawyer assigned to represent him." Al Sharbi "declared himself ready to concede to – 'I don't like the word confession,' he said -- all the accusations of conspiracy to commit terrorism that have been brought against him."

Study Examines Al Qaeda Use Of Media As Terror Weapon. An Arizona State University study examined how terrorists use the media as part of their terrorist operations. The Washington Times (4/28, Harper, 90K) reports ASU Consortium for Strategic Communication director Steven Corman's study "found that jihadist operations use consistent patterns of outreach that establish them socially and religiously, generate public sympathy and intimidate opponents. Threats, in fact, are part of terrorist 'talking points.'" It "offered six measures to counter al Qaeda's media savvy." Corman "recommended that the United States try to improve its credibility with Muslim audiences, 'degrade' the jihadis' outreach efforts, draw attention to terrorist messages that contradict Islam, deconstruct idealized historical concepts, systematically disrupt Internet operations and seek assistance from sympathetic American Muslims."

PATRIOT ACT:

US Attorney Disputes WSJournal Characterization Of Patriot Act Prosecution. In a Wall Street Journal (4/28, 2.11M) letter to the editor, Arizona District US Attorney Paul K. Charlton writes, "Your page-one article 'Volatile Formula: How Patriot Act Helped Convict Man in Baby-Food Ring' (April 4) unfairly characterized the prosecution of Samih Jammal and the application of evidence lawfully gathered under the Patriot Act. … Criticize the use of the Patriot Act if you so desire, but if you intend to use Mr. Jammal's case to do it, please bear these facts in mind: A federal judge and jury found Mr. Jammal guilty of 20 felony counts of theft-related charges," and "the court found that Mr. Jammal's criminal enterprise led to retail losses estimated at $10 million and sentenced Mr. Jammal to 10 years in prison. You also seem to suggest that Mr. Jammal should never have been the subject of an intelligence wiretap," but a FISA judge "found probable cause that Mr. Jammal was acting as an agent of a foreign power or an agent of a foreign terrorist organization," and the trial judge "reviewed the FISA court judge's decision, and affirmed the finding of probable cause. Perhaps the biggest distortion was your failure to give a complete characterization of Hani Hanjour, a 9/11 hijacker whom Mr. Jammal admitted associating with as a matter of public record. You described Hani Hanjour as 'one of the 9/11 hijackers' and as 'a Saudi Arabian who was aboard the American Airlines jet that crashed into the Pentagon.' … Hani Hanjour was one of the five terrorists who took over the cockpit and the only one who piloted the plane into the Pentagon."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI National Security Branch Chief To Retire. Executive Assistant Director Gary Bald announced his retirement after serving less than a year as the chief of the FBI's new National Security Branch. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (4/28) reports FBI Director Robert Mueller "gave no reason for Bald's decision, but praised his leadership. Bald said the time was right to retire, 'weighing our progress on implementation of the NSB as well as family considerations.'" The post was recommended by the 9/11 Commission, but the AP notes Sen. Charles Grassley opposed Bald's appointment "because Bald testified in a civil lawsuit that he had no counterterrorism experience when he moved to headquarters to oversee anti-terrorism strategy in 2003."

United Press International (4/28) reports, "Since August last year, Bald has headed up the National Security Branch of the FBI, which brings together its spy-catchers, counter-terror specialists and intelligence analysts." In a statement Mueller said "Throughout his career, Gary has shown tremendous leadership, vision, and grace under pressure. … He has helped to shape the Bureau in important ways. … I am pleased with the progress we have made under his leadership." He "said the bureau would 'move quickly to fill the important position' Bald was leaving."

"Frustrated" Specter Threatens To Block NSA Surveillance Program Funding. The Washington Post (4/27, 9:56 PM, Kellman, 744K) reports , "Noting that Congress holds the power of the purse, a frustrated Senate chairman threatened to try to block money for President Bush's domestic wiretapping program." Sen. Arlen Specter "said Thursday he delivered a message to Bush that cut to the heart of the debate over executive power. 'I made the point that the president doesn't have a blank check,' Specter said about their meeting Wednesday. 'He didn't choose to engage me on that point.' Without a pledge from Bush to provide more information on the surveillance program, Specter filed an amendment to a spending bill Thursday" which "would enact a 'prohibition on use of funds for domestic electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence purposes unless Congress is kept fully and currently informed.'" The Post notes, "The move got the White House's attention, but not its immediate cooperation. Bush has insisted that the program falls within his authority and has refused to allow Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other officials to answer many of Specter's questions. … For now, Specter said he will not bother having Gonzales return to the committee 'because he won't tell us anything.'"

CNN's The Situation Room (4/27, Blitzer) reported Specter "complained he's not getting satisfactory answers from the White House about the wiretaps, and he's frustrated." Specter "says he's warned President Bush about a possible bill to cut off funding for the NSA wiretaps, and he says he already has several potential co-sponsors for the measure." The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Miller, 958K) notes, "A draft of a proposal circulated by Specter's office would prohibit the use of funds for domestic electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence purposes 'unless Congress is kept fully and currently informed.' In particular, the proposed bill would require the administration to brief all members of the House and Senate Intelligence and Judiciary committees." Specter's move "underscores the tension between key Republicans in Congress and the Bush administration over the limits of presidential power in the war on terrorism."

The Washington Post (4/28, Pincus, Babington, 744K) adds that Specter is trying to generate "greater debate on the warrantless surveillance" and his "concerns about the NSA program were also reflected in much of the House debate on the intelligence bill."

Hatch Supports Bill To Require FISA Approval For NSA Surveillance. CQ (4/28, Perine) reports, "Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, one of President Bush's staunchest Senate allies, declared his support Thursday for legislation that would require the administration to seek approval from a secret federal court for a National Security Agency warrantless surveillance program." His "move is likely to aid" Sen. Specter's efforts to attract more debate about terrorist monitoring. The Administration and Senate Intelligence Chairman Pat Roberts want "a modified version of" Sen. Mike DeWine's bill which would give the administration the option of seeking approval from the FISA court "to serve as the Senate vehicle, but a defection by Hatch could make that more difficult."

TSA To Award Bonuses In Bid To Slow Worker Turnover. USA Today (4/28, Frank, 2.31M) reports, "The Transportation Security Administration will pay airport screeners up to a $1,000 bonus to entice them to stay at the turnover-plagued agency as it prepares for a summer of record air travel. Roughly one in four screeners left last year, a rate nearly twice the rest of the federal workforce," and a GAO reports found that "the number of screeners at some checkpoints is 'not sufficient for peak periods.'" The TSA "will spend $20 million to give most of the nation's 43,000 screeners $500 extra," with "a second $500 bonus if they work at 'hard-to-hire' airports that have trouble filling vacancies."

For-Profit Part Of Trade Group May Get No Bid TSA Contract. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Meckler, 2.11M) reports, "If a provision in a Congressional spending bill stands, a transportation-worker identification program will be awarded without competitive bidding to the American Association of Airport Executives, which may assign it to its newly "created…for-profit company that may do much of the work on its behalf." AAAE officials "said the AAAE didn't guarantee that work from these programs would be funneled to the new company," an "official from the rival firm said his company was explicitly told that the new venture would do the work of" AAAE's Transportation Security Clearinghouse.

The New York Times (4/28, Lipton, 1.19M) notes that AAAE has a partnership agreement with Daon, a biometrics company in Dublin, Ireland, that former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge is a board member of. "Critics of the provision…have questioned how the association, with little experience in high-technology secure identifications and biometrics, could handle such a task."

Internet Helps Spread Conspiracy Theories About 9/11 Attacks. The movie "Loose Change," which offers revisionist theories about the 9/11 attacks, is becoming popular among young people on the Internet. USA Today (4/28, Welch, 2.31M) reports Loose Change "is being downloaded from the Internet and shown in small screenings here and overseas." It "appears especially popular among young people immersed in a Web culture brimming with sites that question the credibility of government. They see 9/11 as the defining moment of their lives." Experts "say the Internet is making it far easier to spread such theories because the traditional media are losing their hold on the news. The immense coverage of controversies and accusations surrounding the war on terror has created fertile ground for people who assign their own interpretations to photos, footage, eyewitnesses, investigations and newspaper accounts of what happened, they say."

Questions Raised About "United 93" Film Accuracy. The Washington Post (4/28, A1, Farhi, 744K) in a front page story reports that while the film "United 93" generally follows the key events of the 9/11 attacks, it "is a dramatic re-creation that includes scenes and images that go far beyond what is known about the attacks." The Post continues, "Those scenes raise questions: How far can a dramatic movie go in imposing its own reality before it distorts the public's understanding of the event? And with memories of 9/11 still vivid and raw, is it too soon for such films to be made?"

Work Begins On Freedom Tower At Ground Zero. The CBS Evening News (4/27, story 9, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Nearly five years after terrorists took down the Twin Towers and after months of political wrangling, work has finally begun on the centerpiece of the new World Trade Center complex, the Freedom Tower. It will be taller than the Twin Towers, rising a symbolic 1,776 feet, which will make it the tallest building in the world."

WPost Says Law To Keep Terrorists From US Is Over-Inclusive. The Washington Post (4/28, A18, 744K) says in an editorial that Congress "tightened a law last year on refugee admissions in order (it thought) to keep terrorists and their supporters out of the country. The effect has been to bar friends and allies. One example: Many Vietnamese Montagnards fought alongside U.S. forces during the Vietnam War and were then murderously oppressed by the Vietnamese government. During the war, the United States helped arm a Montagnard group called the United Front for the Liberation of Oppressed Races, which continued to struggle for autonomy after the war ended. This group ceased to exist in 1992, when a band of nearly 400 fighters disarmed and were resettled in North Carolina. Under Congress's irrational new rules, however, the group has become, legally speaking, a terrorist organization, and 11 Montagnards still stuck in Cambodia would be denied refugee status because in the past they had offered the group 'material support.'"

WAR NEWS:

Probe Of Iraq Spending Expands To Training Of Security Forces. The Washington Times (4/28, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "The Bush administration's special investigator for Iraq reconstruction has expanded inquiries into how the US military is training and equipping the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF), according to an internal Pentagon memo." Special Inspector General Stuart W. Bowen Jr. "asked the Pentagon for reams of documents on the billions of dollars spent to create an Iraqi army, police, border patrol, navy and air force, the memo shows." The Times adds, "Some Pentagon officials say privately that the inspector is overstepping his mandate by probing U.S. military operations in addition to reconstruction dollars. But the chief spokesman for Mr. Bowen said security and reconstruction are intertwined."

"Grand Mafiosi" Seen As Stealing Billions From Iraq's Oil Industry. The Washington Times (4/28, Muir, 90K) reports, "A new class of 'grand mafiosi' is sucking billions of dollars out of Iraq's vital oil sector and crippling efforts to rebuild the nation, according to an official report published in Baghdad." The findings of the Oil Ministry's inspector-general "paint a sordid picture of corruption pervading every corner of the industry, from the oil wells to the gasoline pump." The report "says that since Saddam Hussein's overthrow in 2003, the spread of smuggling had turned Iraq from a major exporter of petroleum products into an importer."

Top Iraqi Official Says US Troop Drawdown Imminent. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, A7, Dreazen, 2.11M) details an interview with National Security Advisor Mowaffak Rubaie in which he "said there would be a substantial withdrawal of U.S. troops this year, with the rest leaving within the next two years," and that his government "was working to formalize a 'conditions-based transition agreement' with the U.S. that would govern the pace and scope of a U.S. military withdrawal from the country. Such an agreement would detail a timeline for turning U.S. military facilities over to the Iraqis and leaving Iraqi forces with primary security responsibility for growing portions of the country." The Journal continues, "Mr. Rubaie's comments are consistent with statements he has made since the beginning of the year, but both Iraqis and Americans agreed that big troop reductions wouldn't be possible until a new government was installed."

Sistani Implores Maliki To Rein In Militias. The Washington Post (4/28, Finer, Sarhan, 744K) reports Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, "Iraq's most revered Shiite Muslim cleric, urged Prime Minister-designate Nouri al-Maliki in a meeting Thursday to deal quickly with sectarian militias blamed for widespread killings, and to ensure that Iraqi police and soldiers remain loyal to the country and not to political factions." The Post notes that Shiite militias "dominate many Iraqi police and army units and have been accused by Sunni Arab leaders and U.S. officials of operating death squads." Maliki met separately with Moqtada Al-Sadr yesterday, after which Sadr "gave a noncommittal answer when asked at a news conference afterward about plans to disband militias."

The New York Times (4/28, Oppel, 1.19M) reports Maliki "traveled to the Shiite holy city of Najaf to meet with two of the powers he must now contend with, the Shiite leaders Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and Moktada al-Sadr." Maliki "was careful not to offend Mr. Sadr, perhaps the most influential single force in the Shiite coalition, suggesting that militias deserve to remain an influence, even if only from within the military." The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Wallace, Fakhrildeen, 958K) reports "the unusually direct political intervention from Sistani" rang "loudest" In Iraq, as he is "regarded as the voice of Shiite moderation." USA Today/AP (4/28) runs a similar report.

Iraqi Vice President's Sister Killed In Drive-By Shooting. ABC World News Tonight (4/27, story 5, :30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Iraq's new Sunni Vice President denounced the terror leader, Abu Musab al Zarqawi, and called for the insurgency to be crushed. Today, the Vice President's sister was killed in a drive-by shooting. His brother had been killed two weeks ago. The Vice President says he remains committed to serving the Iraqi people." The Washington Post (4/28, A12, Hernandez, 744K) and Washington Times/AP (4/28, Wagner), among other sources, also report on the attack.

Violence Said To Continue Unchecked. In a decidedly pessimistic piece, the AP (4/27, Wagner) reported, "One year ago Friday, when Iraq formed its first freely elected government, Americans and Iraqis hoped it would lead to a drop in violence. But Iraqis have continued to die in the thousands, and this year the trend is up. … The numbers offer a counterpoint of caution for Washington's hopes that Iraq's second freely elected government, being formed now, will help curb violence." The New York Times (4/28, Oppel, 1.19M) says Sistani's statement "was a firm message of support for Mr. Maliki," but added that "making a dent in the militias' influence will be difficult to accomplish, as some elements of the Iraqi Army and security forces are already dominated by members loyal to one militia or another. Indeed, in a demonstration of the balancing act Mr. Maliki must perform both as prime minister and as leader of a fractious Shiite coalition, he met next with Mr. Sadr" and "was careful not to offend Mr. Sadr, perhaps the most influential single force in the Shiite coalition, suggesting that militias deserve to remain an influence, even if only from within the military."

Baghdad Visit Said To Showcase Differing Styles Of Rice, Rumsfeld. In a detailed profile of the Secretaries' Rumsfeld and Rice's visit to Iraq this week, the Washington Post (4/28, A16, Kessler, 744K) reports, "For the second time in a month, Rice traveled to Baghdad to jawbone Iraqi leaders with a high-powered male counterpart. Last time, her partner was British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw. The pairing with him was convivial, so filled with easygoing banter that it was quickly dubbed the 'Condi and Jack Show.' This time around, Rice and Rumsfeld often seemed in separate orbits, and the visit had little of the warmth of the earlier one." While the trip was designed to demonstrate internal USG coordination of stabilization policy, "the contrast in the two secretaries' styles was sometimes jarring." While Rice "appeared energized," Rumsfeld "seemed disengaged and bored;" when fielding questions, "his answers were terse; hers were expansive." The Post concludes, "Before the two Cabinet members left Baghdad on Thursday, Rice dismissed any suggestions of tension. 'Secretary Rumsfeld and I have an excellent relationship,' she told Fox News. 'We're working very hard together. We're actually having a great time here in Iraq.'"

GOP Critics Of Rumsfeld "Grin And Bear It." An AP story (4/28, Sidoti) titled "Rumsfeld Critics Must Grin And Bear It" reports, "Senate Republican critics of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld are deferring to President Bush's support for the Pentagon chief, mindful that his fate is out of their hands." But "in the aftermath of calls by several retired generals for Rumsfeld's ouster, those GOP lawmakers remain uncomfortable with him. Given the chance, they offer no words of support." The AP quotes Sen. John McCain saying, "He still is in the confidence of the president. The president reiterated that the other day, so I'll continue to try to work with him."

Sessions Organizes Event For GOP Senators To Show Support For Rumsfeld. The Washington Times (4/28, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column that Sen. Jeff Sessions "organized a pep rally/war briefing where Republicans could express support for [Defense Secretary Donald] Rumsfeld, who seven retired generals have said must go. The setting was breakfast in the Russell Senate Office Building. Mr. Sessions invited 'defense-minded' Republican senators, and 17 showed up to talk with the defense secretary." Sessions spokesman Mike Brumas said the Senator "organized the get-together because 'we're in a time of war. Senator Sessions admires Secretary Rumsfeld and invited a group of defense-minded senators to talk with the secretary about a number of topics.'"

Corruption, Narco-Warlords Among Factors Dragging Down Afghan Security. The Christian Science Monitor (4/28, Montero, 61K) reports, "Nearly five years after the fall of the Taliban, Afghanistan's security situation continues to be dragged down by endemic corruption, roving militias, and a growing nexus between narco-warlords and remnants of the Taliban, officials and analysts say." The Monitor adds, "In the past, violence rarely spilled beyond the south, where NATO troops are slowly replacing US forces. But recent attacks have cropped up in the north and west. … Many governors and chiefs of police, rather than confronting the Taliban and neutralizing drug lords, are increasingly intertwined with them, either for political or monetary gain, some analysts say. Amid the lawlessness, military intelligence has become a political game, a tool for blackmail or settling old scores, analysts allege."

Taliban, Allies Executing Suspected US Informants In Pakistan. The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Watson, Ali, 958K) reports, "Taliban militants and their allies are waging a dirty war in Pakistan's unruly tribal areas, kidnapping and executing people suspected of spying for U.S. forces across the border in Afghanistan." Militants have "killed at least 53 accused spies and pro-government elders in Pakistan over the last two years, according to the independent Human Rights Commission of Pakistan. Many of their bodies were found with notes that claimed the victims had visited U.S. military bases in Afghanistan." Local residents "put the death toll from such executions at about 150." It was "not known whether any of the victims were working as informants or spies for U.S. forces. But secret documents on a memory drive stolen from the American air base at Bagram, north of Kabul, and sold at a bazaar outside its gates, show that U.S. Special Forces apparently used informants in Pakistan as well as Afghanistan."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Hueston Focuses On Lay Stock Sales In Second Day Of Cross-Examination. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Emshwiller, Mcwilliams, 2.11M) reports, "Federal prosecutors hammered at former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay's credibility by showing he made a series of inaccurate stockholding reports that failed to disclose large sales of his Enron shares in the months before the company's December 2001 bankruptcy filing." Lay "appeared taken aback by the assault during his first full day of cross-examination in court here, which followed two hours of tense exchanges with prosecutor John Hueston on Wednesday afternoon. … At times yesterday, he stuttered in response to accusations. Other times, he accused Mr. Hueston of twisting his words or harping on irrelevant points. Mr. Lay said repeatedly that he relied on advice from company attorneys who told him he wasn't required to disclose the disputed stock sales except once a year, since they involved turning the shares back to the company in return for cash rather than sales on the open market. He said that his Securities and Exchange Commission filings complied with the law even though they inflated the picture of his Enron holdings." The Journal notes, "By showing that Mr. Lay wasn't fully forthcoming about his stock sales, the government clearly hoped to buttress its contention that the former top executive was illegally hiding from the public a range of bad news about the company's finances and business operations."

The Washington Post (4/28, D1, Johnson, 744K) reports Lay "maintained his composure after furiously responding to questions and stabbing his finger at…Hueston a day earlier. Hueston attempted to rattle Lay Thursday by throwing back at him Lay's arguments that Enron was the victim of skeptical press reports, disclosures of wrongdoing by former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow, and short-sellers, who Lay said plotted Enron's demise in Florida in early 2001." The Post adds, "Lay answered questions in a firm voice, sometimes talking over Hueston and suggesting that the prosecutor didn't understand business issues. During a discussion of an arcane accounting issue, Lay retorted, 'I think the investors would totally understand it, Mr. Hueston. Maybe in fact, you don't.' Later, Lay told the prosecutor that an exchange about another accounting charge was 'a real waste of the jury's time.'"

USA Today (4/28, Farrell, 2.31M) reports Lay "told jurors…that he didn't think stock sales 'forced' upon him by banks making margin calls were the same as 'discretionary' sales. As a result, he didn't feel the need to disclose the sale of more than 1.7 million shares of Enron stock during 2001, when he encouraged Enron employees to buy the stock and told them he was buying shares, too. … Despite the fact that he sold more than 500,000 shares of Enron stock from late July through August of that year, Lay touted the company as an 'incredible bargain' to his employees in September 2001. He reiterated that belief in court Thursday."

The Houston Chronicle (2/28, Flood, 581K) notes Hueston "went back to Lay's allegations that colluding short sellers…contributed to Enron's downfall. Lay attorney Mike Ramsey previously called short sellers 'vultures.' Hueston showed Lay that his son Mark Lay was short selling Enron stock in March 2001 and made more than $166,000 betting Enron stock would fall. 'I didn't know that,' Lay said. 'He wasn't a vulture was he?' Hueston asked Lay of his son. 'I don't think he's a vulture,' Lay responded. 'He wasn't trying to kill Enron in 2001, was he?' Hueston asked. 'I would think not,' Lay said."

Lay's Contentiousness Clashes With Pre-Trial Image. The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Mulligan, 958K) reports, "Who would have guessed that Kenny Boy could be a tougher sell to a jury than Capt. Queeg?" Ken Lay "is renowned for his courtliness, his philanthropy, his rise from a dirt-poor boyhood in the Missouri Ozarks to a nine-digit fortune." Codefendant Jeff Skilling "shares some of the obsessiveness of Queeg, the Navy skipper of 'The Caine Mutiny.' But unlike Queeg, Skilling didn't unravel on the stand. Where mastery of Enron's finances was at issue, he overpowered co-lead prosecutor Sean M. Berkowitz. ... For Lay, however, it's been a rockier ride. …. His worst moment came Wednesday, when prosecutor John C. Hueston jolted Lay with questions about his attempts to reach actual or potential witnesses in the case — efforts that persisted even after Lay's lawyers told him to stop."

US Attorneys Appoint Stamboulidis Bank Of New York Examiner. The Forbes (4/28, Moyer) reports, "The United States Attorneys in New York named former federal prosecutor George Stamboulidis of Baker & Hostetler and FTI Consulting, a forensic accounting firm, to be the examiners in charge of making sure Bank of New York is in compliance with suspicious activities reporting and monitoring rules." Forbes notes that the appointment "comes after Bank of New York…agreed to pay $38 million in penalties and compensation over charges it failed to comply with mandatory reporting guidelines under the Bank Secrecy Act. That settlement was the culmination of a six-year investigation into a Russian money laundering ring that prosecutors say flushed $7 billion through the U.S. banking system."

Lawmakers Looking At Ways To Change Sarbanes-Oxley. The Financial Times (4/28, Grant) reports, "Signs of a growing desire among some US legislators to re-examine key elements of Sarbanes-Oxley legislation emerged on Thursday as a Republican congressman, Tom Feeney, said he would next week introduce a bill designed to make it 'more acceptable to business.'" Feeney's bill "is the third piece of legislation aimed at changing Sarbanes-Oxley since its passage in 2002 after the Enron and WorldCom accounting scandals. While such efforts are seen as having limited effect until senators Sarbanes and Oxley retire late this year, the bill reflects concern that changes are needed."

Shareholders Activists Target Executive Pay. The Washington Post (4/28, D1, Masters, 744K) reports, "After years of complaining about sky-high executive pay packages, this year shareholder activists are finally getting some traction in their efforts to do something about the issue." The issue "will come up today at the annual meeting of Merrill Lynch & Co., where chief executive E. Stanley O'Neal took home $37.5 million last year, including $2 million in long-term incentive pay." The American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees "is sponsoring a resolution calling for an annual up-or-down vote on the company's pay plan for top executives. Though the vote would be nonbinding, it would give shareholders a way to make their views clear, advocates argue."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Fitzgerald To Decide On Rove Charges In Two To Three Weeks. Special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald is weighing whether to charge Deputy White House Chief of Staff Karl Rove with perjury in the CIA leak investigation and will make a decision soon, according to a New York Times (4/28, Bumiller, Johnston, 1.19M) report. The Times says Fitzgerald is "expected to decide in the next two to three weeks," and following Rove's "fifth appearance before the grand jury on Wednesday, Mr. Fitzgerald is now believed to have assembled all of the facts necessary to determine whether to seek an indictment of Mr. Rove or drop the case." Lawyers "in the case said Mr. Fitzgerald would spend the coming days reviewing the transcript of Mr. Rove's three hours of testimony on Wednesday and weigh it against his previous statements to the grand jury as well as the testimony of others, including a sworn statement that Mr. Rove's lawyer gave to the prosecutor earlier this year." One lawyer "said that Mr. Rove had known for more than a month that he was likely to make another appearance before the grand jury, and that he had known since last fall that he would be subject to further questions from Mr. Fitzgerald before the prosecutor completed his inquiry." The Times also reports that "lawyers in the case" say Fitzgerald has "long been skeptical of Mr. Rove's account of his forgetfulness."

Judge Refuses To Dismiss Charges Against Libby. USA Today (4/28, 2.31M) reports Federal Judge Reggie Walton yesterday "refused…to dismiss charges against I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby, the former White House aide who was indicted on perjury and obstruction charges last year in the CIA leak scandal." Libby's attorneys had "challenged the authority of special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald to handle the case. Libby's lawyers had argued that Fitzgerald was given too much power and that the appointment should have been made by the president. However, Walton said there is no question the attorney general can delegate any of his functions."

The AP (4/28, Locy) reports Walton "said there must be a way to appoint special prosecutors to ensure that 'the perception of fairness withstands the scrutiny of the American public' when high-level government officials are investigated for alleged wrongdoing." Libby "is charged with perjury and obstruction of justice, accused of lying to the FBI and a federal grand jury about how he learned about Plame and what he subsequently told reporters about her."

CNN's The Situation Room (4/27, King) reported, "As any defendant would do, Scooter Libby's defense team is trying to challenge the indictment just about any way it can. And one of its arguments was that special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald was improperly appointed; therefore he does not have the authority to investigate this case or bring indictments." The ruling was "not a surprise, but it does show you how aggressive the Libby defense team is being. They are challenging the indictment, they are demanding access to the most sensitive intelligence documents in the United States government, issuing subpoenas to news organizations, hauling in reporters, they threatened to do for testimony."

Federal Laws Barring Disclosure Of Classified Information Difficult To Enforce. The Washington Post (4/28, A7, Eggen, 744K) reports the firing of a veteran CIA officer Mary McCarthy "for unauthorized contacts with the press has focused attention on the patchwork of federal laws that govern disclosures of classified information, which are written broadly but are difficult to enforce and have historically been used sparingly in cases involving journalists." Numerous experts "on national security law said" McCarthy, "whom the CIA fired 10 days before her retirement for allegedly having undisclosed contacts with reporters, could conceivably be prosecuted under a number of statutes, including those governing espionage, disclosures of classified information and even theft of government property." Yet those experts "warned that any such prosecution is fraught with obstacles, including the difficulty in showing that disclosures were made with knowledge that they would harm national security or were intended to benefit a foreign power." The case "comes amid renewed debate in Congress over whether to increase penalties for leaking or to consider rewriting espionage and classified information laws."

USA Today Supports Leakers. USA Today (4/28, 2.31M) in an editorial examines the latest events surrounding the Plame leak case and the firing of a CIA official accused of leaking information and asks, "Harmful to U.S. interests? Definitely. Essential to protect U.S. values? No doubt. The same dichotomy applies in the secret-prison and wiretapping stories." Yet "as the leak probes continue, it's important to maintain a distinction between those who leak to help themselves and those who leak, at personal risk, to let the public know its leaders are flouting law or abusing power."

FBI To Seek Information On Mollohan From Three Nonprofits. The New York Times (4/28, Rudoren, 1.19M) reports, "The F.B.I. has notified three nonprofit organizations created by Representative Alan B. Mollohan and financed primarily through special federal appropriations he steered their way that they should expect subpoenas soon for financial and other records." The three "nonprofits at issue are the Vandalia Heritage Foundation, the Institute for Scientific Research and the Canaan Valley Institute. The F.B.I.'s notification to them has occurred over the last two days and signals that the bureau is looking deeper into the 500-page complaint, which among other things suggests ties between the special appropriations, or earmarks, and Mr. Mollohan's personal real estate investments."

Abramoff Vacations At Posh Florida Resort. The New York Times (4/28, Shenon, 1.19M) reports former Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff "may be facing financial ruin and a long prison sentence, but he still knows how to vacation. Guests at the oceanfront Turnberry Isle Resort and Country Club in Aventura, Fla., say they were surprised to see Mr. Abramoff, his wife and their five children at the 300-acre golf and tennis resort for more than a week this month for the Passover holiday." The Abramoffs "arranged the trip through a travel agency based in Brooklyn that, according to its Web site, charged a minimum of $3,600 per adult for a nine-night Passover package. A lawyer for Mr. Abramoff, Abbe D. Lowell, said the trip was paid for by Mr. Abramoff's 'extended family,' although Mr. Lowell would not say which family member or members." Lowell said "it was a 'cheap shot to suggest that Mr. Abramoff was living high off the hog' and that the trip, which allowed Mr. Abramoff to meet with his lawyers in Miami on a related criminal case, was intended to benefit his family in a difficult time."

Baltimore Said To Lead Country In Witness Intimidation In Murder Cases. The CBS Evening News (4/27, story 7, 3:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Criminals are literally getting away with murder more and more because witnesses are afraid to testify." CBS (Keteyian) added, "A CBS news investigation reveals that witness intimidation affects or derails up to 30% of all cases involving shootings in major US cities. In homicide cases, that number jumps to 90%, with Baltimore topping the list." Patricia Jessamy, Baltimore City State's Attorney: "We call it the conspiracy of silence. Its alive and well and I consider Baltimore probably to be the epicenter of witness intimidation in the country, but it's not just Baltimore, it's all across the country." Keteyian: "In Baltimore, it has come to this, a special police unit whose only job is to hunt down potential witnesses, some 1400 to date, armed with a prosecutor's promise of protection."

MS-13 Leader Sentenced To 30 Years In Prison. The Washington Post (4/28, Cauvin, 744K) reports DC-area MS-13 leader Juan Carlos Rivas-Moreiera was sentenced yesterday to 30 years in prison "for a near-fatal attack on a rival gang member. … And far from being the worst of his alleged acts, the May 2001 attack in Northwest Washington was only one crime in a life rife with it, the prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Gilberto Guerrero Jr., said." Rivas-Moreiera "is among the reputed members of MS-13…who were charged in Maryland last year in a federal racketeering indictment that details murders, kidnapping, robbery and other crimes." The Post notes, "The indictment was a significant regional strike against local Latino gangs, which have lured isolated and disaffected adolescents into dangerous lifestyles and sown fear in neighborhoods that are heavily populated by immigrants."

Jury Selection Begins Monday For Maryland Trial Of Convicted Sniper. The Washington Times/AP (4/28, Manning) reports, "Many witnesses who testified against convicted sniper John Allen Muhammad in his trial in Virginia are ready to tell their stories again, including some who bear scars from the Bushmaster's bullets. And Muhammad has returned to Montgomery County, where the October 2002 D.C.-area sniper spree began, to face another jury. Jury selection is set to begin Monday in his second trial, a case that likely will echo the 2003 Virginia case that ended in a death sentence for one of the 10 killings. Yet while much of the evidence and testimony during the expected five-week trial will be similar, the new trial could take some unexpected turns." Muhammad "plans to be his own lawyer despite evidence he may be mentally ill. He wants Lee Boyd Malvo…to testify. And jurors will hear evidence about two Maryland killings that weren't part of the first trial."

Virginia Inmate Executed After Kaine Denies Clemency. The Washington Times (4/28, McLaughlin, 90K) reports, "Death row inmate Dexter Lee Vinson was executed last night, hours after Gov. Timothy M. Kaine denied his petition for clemency. Vinson received a lethal injection at the Greensville Correctional Center in Jarratt and was pronounced dead at 9:15 p.m. Vinson, 43, was convicted of the 1997 murder of his ex-girlfriend, Angela Felton, of Portsmouth." Kaine "denied clemency last night, after the U.S. Supreme Court refused to stop the execution. 'Having carefully reviewed the Petition for Clemency and judicial opinions regarding this case, I find no compelling reasons to doubt Mr. Vinson's guilt or to invalidate the sentence recommended by the jury and imposed, and affirmed, by the courts,' Mr. Kaine said in a statement. 'Accordingly, I decline to intervene.'"

The Washington Post (4/28, B4, Rondeaux, Shear, 744K) adds that "Kaine made good on a promise he spoke directly and repeatedly to Virginians last year at campaign rallies and in television ads: that his personal and long-standing opposition to the death penalty, based on his Catholic faith, would not prevent him from allowing the ultimate punishment to be carried out. Kaine's Republican opponent in the governor's race, former attorney general Jerry W. Kilgore, had repeatedly slammed Kaine for his stance on the death penalty, and ran ads featuring the victims of heinous crimes. In one, the father of a crime victim said Kaine would not have executed Adolph Hitler. But Kaine responded with ads of his own, in which he vowed to enforce Virginia's capital punishment laws. 'My faith teaches life is sacred,' he said to the camera. 'But I take my oath of office seriously, and I'll enforce the death penalty.'"

Annual NYPD Report Provides Details Of Murders. The New York Times (4/28, Mcginty, 1.19M) reports, "At the end of each year, the New York Police Department reports the number of killings — there were 540 in 2005. Typically, much is made of how the number has fallen in recent years — to totals not seen since the early 1960's. But beyond summarizing the overarching trends, the police spend little time compiling the individual details. The New York Times obtained the basic records for every murder in the city over the last three years, and while the events make for disturbing reading, the numbers can hint at trends, occasionally solve a mystery and in at least some straightforward way answer for the city the questions of who kills and who is killed in the five boroughs." The Times adds, "Of the rest, men and boys were responsible for 93 percent of the murders; they killed with guns about two-thirds of the time; their victims tended to be other men and boys; and in more than half the cases, the killer and the victim knew each other. … The offender and victim were of the same race in more than three-quarters of the killings," and "more than 90 percent of the killers had criminal records; and of those who wound up killed, more than half had them."

Woman Alleging Duke LAX Rape Made Similar Charge 10 Years Ago. The New York Times (4/28, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "The woman who has accused three Duke University lacrosse players of raping her last month claimed a decade ago that she had been sexually assaulted by three men, the authorities said. The woman's mother said her daughter did not file charges. 'She didn't want to bring charges up against them because they said they were going to kill her if she said anything,' said the mother," but Creedmoor, N.C., Police Chief Ted Pollard "said the woman filed the report when she was 18, in August 1996, but said the assault had happened in June 1993, when she was 14. Chief Pollard said the initial report did not explain why there had been a delay of more than three years between the alleged assault and when she reported it. He said Thursday that his office had only paper records from that time period and had not yet determined whether there had been a follow-up investigation."

Connecticut Trash Hauler Pleads Guilty To Racketeering Charges. The Waste News (4/28) reports, "A Danbury, Conn., trash hauler pleaded guilty to a federal racketeering charge, admitting to taking part in system to divvy up territory, the U.S. Department of Justice said. Joseph R. LoStocco, 47, who owns and operates JR LoStocco Carting in Danbury, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiring to violate the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act." US Attorney Kevin O'Connor noted, "The investigation is very active, and we have no further comment at this time."

US Charges Tennessee Landlord With Housing Discrimination. The Chattanoogan (4/28) reports, "The Justice Department announced Thursday that it has filed a lawsuit against the owner and resident manager of the Fountainbleau Apartments in East Ridge, alleging housing discrimination against individuals on account of their having children. 'No one should be denied an opportunity to live where they choose because they have children,' said Wan J. Kim, Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division. 'The Justice Department is committed to vigorous prosecution of illegal housing discrimination.' The complaint…alleges that the defendants refused to rent apartments to persons with children and steered them to another apartment complex." The Chattanoogan adds, "Fighting illegal housing discrimination is a top priority of the Justice Department, officials said. In February, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales announced Operation Home Sweet Home, a concentrated initiative 'to expose and eliminate housing discrimination in America.'"

New York State Elections Board Adopts Voting Machine Guidelines. The AP (4/28) reports, "After months of haggling, the state Board of Elections has adopted guidelines for new voting machines that can be used in New York. The board also ordered machine makers to disclose information about their political contributions and any lawsuits against them. A statement released by the board says the new standards go beyond Help America Vote Act…requirements and contain a number of features that make them model regulations for the nation. The standards require a voter verifiable paper trail." The AP notes, "New York has been sued by the U-S Justice Department for failing to comply with HAVA provisions requiring states to have new machines in place for the 2006 elections."

New Hampshire Political Parties Sparring Over Phone Jamming Case. The Knight Ridder (4/28, Douglas) reports, "Is it a third-rate political dirty trick by Republicans or a cheap attempt by Democrats to drag the GOP through the mud before November's elections?" New Hampshire Democrats and Republicans "are locked in a legal battle over GOP operatives who tried to suppress voter turnout in a key 2002 U.S. Senate race by jamming Democratic get-out-the-vote phone banks on Election Day. … Democrats describe the phone-jamming case in Nixonian terms, using Watergate-era phrases such as 'follow the money' and 'what did they know and when did they know it?'" KRT adds, "Republican officials are on the defensive. They call the vote-suppression scheme an unfortunate incident that was the work of rogue operatives who did it without party leaders' knowledge. They say the civil suit is a baseless attempt by Democrats to score points and ruin the New Hampshire Republican Party financially.

CAIR Calls For Civil Rights Probe Of Atlanta Vandalism. The AP (4/28) reports the Council On American-Islamic Relations "is asking the FBI to investigate vandalism at a Muslim home in suburban Atlanta as a hate crime. The Douglas County family's van was burned and the words 'Killers go home' spray-painted on the side of their house on April 8." CAIR "said local authorities had been slow to investigate the crime" yet "Douglas County Chief Deputy Stan Copeland said evidence from the scene has been submitted to the state crime lab and that police patrols in the neighborhood have been stepped up as investigators seek new leads." FBI spokesman Stephen Emmett "said late Wednesday that the bureau's civil rights squad here was not familiar with CAIR's request for an investigation. Copeland said Thursday that a local FBI office has been notified about the incident."

Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Act Reintroduced In Congress. The AP (4/28, Haines) reports, "A 1946 lynching in northeast Georgia could be among the civil-rights era murders investigated under" the Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Act, reintroduced yesterday in the House and Senate. "Roger and Dorothy Malcom and George and Mae Murray Dorsey were killed on the banks of the Apalachee River at the Moore's Ford Bridge, about 40 miles east of Atlanta. The four sharecroppers were dragged from a car, beaten and shot dozens of times as a mob of 200 looked on. No one was ever charged in their deaths, even though the FBI's report named 55 suspects." The AP notes, "The bill would create an unsolved crimes section within the civil rights division of the Department of Justice and an unsolved civil rights crime investigative office within the FBI. The sponsors say it would cost $10 million to establish both offices and foster relations between federal and local authorities."

The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (4/28, Mitchell) reports Sen. Jim Talent "reintroduced the bill that passed the Senate last year before dying in a conference committee." Reps. John Lewis and Kenny Hulshof "are sponsoring the legislation in the House. The measure is called the 'Till Bill' after Emmett Till," and Talent said at a press conference yesterday, "The blatant failure for decades to bring Emmett Till 's murderers to justice was and is a national disgrace." The Clarion Ledger notes, "U.S Attorney General Albert Gonzales is supporting the legislation, and FBI offices around the nation are now collecting information about unpunished killings from their area."

National Park Service Issues Permit For Klan Rally At Antietam. USA Today (4/28, Moore, 2.31M) reports, "A Ku Klux Klan group will rally on the Civil War battlefield where a Northern victory led President Abraham Lincoln to issue the Emancipation Proclamation. The National Park Service has issued a permit for a Klan demonstration June 10 on a farmstead at Antietam National Battlefield in western Maryland. … Antietam Battlefield superintendent John Howard says the right to free speech meant he was obligated to issue the permit. … Howard said he has received more than 30 e-mails objecting to the demonstration." USA notes, "Gordon Young, the leader of the local Klan group who applied for the demonstration permit, said Antietam was chosen for convenience but the site is appropriate. 'Our forefathers are flipping in their graves, and we need to do something to stand up and fight back. Immigration, homosexuals — they didn't fight and die for that.'"

ANTITRUST:

US Charges Five Alleged Warez Group Members With Piracy. The IDG News Service (4/27, Gross) reports, "Five U.S. residents face criminal copyright charges for their alleged participation in the online 'warez' file-trading community, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) announced Thursday. The charges come out of an ongoing DOJ crackdown against international online piracy groups that distribute copyrighted movies, software, games and music on the Internet. The five defendants are alleged to be leading members of the 'warez scene,' groups of Internet users who illegally distribute copyrighted materials online." IDG notes, "The charges are part of Operations FastLink and Site Down, the two largest international law enforcement efforts targeted at online distribution of copyrighted material, the DOJ said. The operations have resulted in more than 200 search warrants executed in 16 countries, hundreds of computers being confiscated and more than US$100 million worth of copyrighted software, games, movies and music removed from download sites."

The LinuxElectrons (4/27) reports Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said when announcing the charges, "Large-scale operations like FastLink and SiteDown strike at the core of online piracy. Losses to industry and individuals from online piracy are enormous, and law enforcement will continue to do everything it can to protect valuable copyrighted products and shut down these illegal distribution networks." U.S. Attorney Gretchen C. F. Shappert added, "Intellectual property theft is a growing crime with serious economic consequences. Operations FastLink and SiteDown combine the resources of the Justice Department, 42 separate U.S. Attorney Offices, and FBI agents from 30 separate field offices, in a concerted effort to attack organizations dedicated to the piracy of intellectual property." And Charlotte FBI Special Agent-in-Charge Kevin B. Kendrick noted, "Theft of intellectual property strikes at the very heart of this country's economic vitality. Crimes of this type are a priority within our Cyber Crimes Program and the public can be rest assured that we will continue to aggressively investigate those individuals and organizations involved in activity such as this in an effort to bring them to justice."

UPI (4/28) reports, "The following individuals were charged with criminal copyright infringement in Charlotte, N.C., the Department of Justice said: Kevin Fuchs, 25, of West Amherst, N.Y.; and Cuong Quoc Trang, 35, of Parker, Colo., were charged by indictment with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement, violating the Digital Millennium Copyright Act, and copyright infringement.

Authorities charged Matthew Alderman, 24, of Ashland, Ore., with criminal copyright infringement, and David Morvant, 35, of Thibodaux, La., and Michael Hays, 51, of Delafield, Wis., with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement." UPI also notes Fisher said, "Large-scale operations like FastLink and SiteDown strike at the core of online piracy. Losses to industry and individuals from online piracy are enormous, and law enforcement will continue to do everything it can to protect valuable copyrighted products and shut down these illegal distribution networks."

Newspaper Workers Union Opposes McClatchy Purchase Of KRT Papers. The Sacramento Business Journal (4/28) reports, "The Newspaper Guild-Communications Workers of America Thursday called on state and federal regulators to scrutinize the $1 billion sale of the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times, Monterey Herald and St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press" to McClatchy Co. "The union has been working with The Yucaipa Cos. of Los Angeles to try to buy the 12 papers that McClatchy said it intends to sell when it completes its purchase of…Knight Ridder Inc. 'We believe that a common interest exists among McClatchy shareholders, employees and the communities served by the 12 Knight Ridder newspapers being sold by McClatchy Co.,' union president Linda Foley said in a statement. 'TNG-CWA continues to believe that the bid by The Yucaipa Cos. for all 12 newspapers is likely to deliver the best value and we call on McClatchy Co. to provide evidence that shareholder, employee and community interests are being best served by yesterday's announcement,' Foley said."

MediaNews CEO Assures Pioneer Press Will See Few Changes. Knight Ridder (4/28, Welbes) reports, "The fate of the St. Paul Pioneer Press became a little clearer Thursday as William Dean Singleton said that the paper won't see major changes after his company becomes its owner sometime this summer. 'You're joining us because we want you,' Singleton, the CEO of MediaNews Group Inc., told employees packed into a stifling conference room. 'We think there's a lot of opportunity here and if we didn't want it, we wouldn't have bought it.' … The deal, expected to close this summer, won't cause the loss of jobs, wages or benefits at the Pioneer Press, Singleton said. He added that the status of the newspaper's labor contracts, which cover about 90 percent of its 960 workers, will be up to local management. Publisher Par Ridder will remain with the newspaper." KRT also notes the union's announcement yesterday and adds, "The U.S. Department of Justice recently told McClatchy that it's seeking additional information about the Twin Cities newspaper market."

Judge Rules Seattle Papers Antitrust Case Can Proceed. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (4/28, Richman) reports, "The judge in the 3-year-old contract dispute between Seattle's two daily newspapers refused today to halt all court proceedings in that case, ruling that antitrust and breach of contract claims by a self-styled citizens group can proceed against the owner of the Seattle P-I and The Seattle Times Co. The ruling, from King County Superior Court Judge Greg Canova, also raises the possibility that The Times Co. may withdraw from a binding arbitration agreement -- an event that would start two 18-month clocks ticking toward the automatic end of the Joint Operating Agreement that has bound the two newspapers since 1983."

Microsoft Assails European Commission Antitrust Ruling. The Financial Times (4/28, Buck) reports, "Microsoft yesterday accused the European Commission of 'the biggest encroachment on intellectual property in European competition law history', and likened the regulator's antitrust ruling to 'opening the vaults of a bank' and handing out money to passers-by. The software group's withering attack formed part of a legal challenge in the European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg to the Commission's March 2004 decision that found Microsoft guilty of abusing its dominant position and imposed a record €497m ($616m) fine. … But the Commission's legal team disputed Microsoft's arguments vehemently, saying the group had 'rigged the rules' of the market to ensure its rivals were unable to compete. The regulator dismissed, in particular, Microsoft's claim that the ruling infringed its intellectual property, saying the group had only been able to cite four European patents in its defence."

The AP (4/28, White) reports, "Judge John D. Cooke, in a terse exchange with Commission lawyer Anthony Whelan, asked whether Microsoft's proprietary information should be given away to its rivals, including patent information. 'The information which forms interoperability is hugely valuable commercial information. In the commercial sense this is highly valuable information, that's why it's difficult to understand the attitude of the Commission that these are mere trade secrets,' the judge said -- a reflection of Microsoft's assertion that to give over the code would be forfeiting the hundreds of years in manpower that went into devising it. Cooke, who will write the draft ruling, wanted to know if 'competition rules require that be taken away from Microsoft, conveying a huge commercial advantage.' Whelan said the value Microsoft placed on the code was merely a reflection of the amount of time and effort it had put into creating it, nothing more." The New York Times (4/28, Meller, 1.19M) notes, "During cross-examination…the sharpest questions were reserved for the commission." Cooke "appeared to chastise commission lawyers for not taking the company's concerns about protecting its intellectual property seriously."

Fifth Indianapolis Firm Pleads Guilty To Concrete Price-Fixing. The Indianapolis Star (4/28, Wall, 267K) reports, "Carmel Concrete Products and its president, Scott D. Hughey, have agreed to plead guilty and pay criminal fines for fixing the price of ready-mixed concrete in the Indianapolis area, the Department of Justice announced" yesterday. "Carmel Concrete is the fifth Indianapolis-area concrete firm to either admit guilt or be charged in the ongoing federal probe." The Star notes, "In all, those firms have agreed to pay more than $30 million in fines. Nine concrete executives have agreed to fines or jail time. U.S. District Court Judge Larry J. McKinney will determine the size of a fine for Carmel Concrete…and the length of any jail term for Scott Hughey. … 'Price-fixing conspiracies, such as the one that dominated the Indianapolis ready mixed concrete market for nearly four years, harm our free market system,' said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Department's Antitrust Division. 'This type of conduct deprives consumers of their right to competitive pricing.'"

Small Supplier Sues Chanel For Allegedly Counterfeiting Design. In a front-page story, The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Passariello, 2.11M) reports, "Carmen Colle has crocheted bustiers for Chanel and spun sweaters for Yves Saint Laurent. … But now Ms. Colle," a small supplier to fashion houses called a "petit main," has filed "a €5.3 million ($6.6 million) lawsuit that may unravel her business." Colle "claims Chanel, which she has supplied for years, copied one of her designs -- a crocheted floral pattern -- on a line of $1,800 to $3,000 cardigans, skirts and dresses. The iconic French fashion house says the allegations are unfounded. But a judge in a Paris commercial court has allowed Ms. Colle to pursue her case, which deals with a recurring issue for fashion firms today: counterfeiting." The Journal adds that at a "January hearing, the judge asked Chanel and Ms. Colle to enter into mediation. The two sides didn't come to an agreement, however, so the case went back to court last month. The judge is expected to issue a verdict on May 12."

Ten States Sue EPA Over Power Plant Pollution. The AP (4/28, Barrett) reports, "Ten states fired a new legal salvo at the federal government Thursday in a long-running court battle over global warming and pollution from power plants. The states, joined by environmental groups, sued the Environmental Protection Agency over its decision not to regulate carbon dioxide pollution as a contributor to global warming." New York, California, Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Mexico, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Wisconsin "filed the lawsuit in the US Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit." The states, led by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, "want the government to require tighter pollution controls on the newest generation of power plants."

The New York Times (4/28, Hakim, 1.19M) says "a similar suit involving many of the same states and led by Massachusetts was dismissed last year by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, where the new lawsuit was filed. Another suit by several of the same states sought to compel power producers to reduce emissions and was dismissed last year in Federal District Court in Manhattan. Both cases are being appealed."

Maryland Sues ExxonMobile Over Gasoline Leak. The Baltimore Sun (4/28, Wheeler, 296K) reports, "In the biggest environmental enforcement action in recent years in Maryland, the state filed suit Thursday seeking nearly $12 million in penalties from Exxon Mobil Corp. and a local service station operator for a massive gasoline leak that officials say has fouled well water in the Jacksonville area of Baltimore County." State Environment Department Sec. Kendl P. Philbrick "called the leak, one of the largest ever in the state, 'catastrophic,' and said an investigation continues into whether criminal charges might be filed as well." The Sun notes, "The suit charges that more than 25,000 gallons of unleaded regular gas dribbled from a small hole accidentally drilled in a buried fuel line by a contractor performing maintenance at the station in mid-January. The leak was not reported to state environmental officials until Feb. 17, more than a month later, although, the lawsuit says, the station's operator noted losses of almost 700 gallons of gasoline daily during that time."

NOAA Finds Navy Sonar Most Likely Caused Hawaii Whale Stranding. The Washington Post (4/28, A8, Kaufman, 744K) reports, "Federal marine specialists have concluded that Navy sonar was the most likely cause of the unusual stranding of melon-headed whales in a Hawaiian bay in 2004. The appearance of as many as 200 of the normally deep-diving whales in Hanalei Bay in Kauai occurred while a major American-Japanese sonar training exercise was taking place at the nearby Pacific Missile Range Facility." The Post adds, "While the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration scientists said they could not definitely state that sonar caused the strandings, they said extensive study led them to the conclusion that there was no other likely cause. … The Navy has said it was virtually impossible for its sonar to have led to the Hanalei Bay stranding, and officials maintained that position yesterday."

DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Announces 9,000 Fugitives Arrested Nationwide In Operation Falcon II. The CBS Evening News (4/27, story 6, 1:50, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Federal and local police working together have just completed a 27-state roundup of fugitives that they call the worst of the worst. Many are violent sexual offenders." CBS (Bowers) added authorities made "more than 9,000 arrests made in the last few days in 27 states, more than 1100 of them accused sexual predators." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales: "The very first arrests made under Falcon II for failure to register as a sex offender, put away Reginald Dozier, who had raped a child." Bowers: "Dozier was the first of what authorities are calling the Falcon 15, the most wanted sex offenders arrested in the sweep, men wanted for everything from child rape to failure to register with authorities." Falcon II "cost close to a half million dollars, money appropriated from Congress specifically for this operation, so when the week is gone, so is the money. Though what isn't gone is the work; despite all the Falcon 2 arrests, there could be as many as 500,000 wanted sex offenders still out there." NBC Nightly News (4/27, story 8, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) also briefly reported on the arrests, and CNN's Live From (4/27) and Fox News' DaySide With Linda Vester (4/27) carried the remarks by Gonzales and USMS Director John Clark live. MSNBC's Abrams Report (4/27) interviewed US Marshals Service Chief Inspector Billy Sorukas about the arrests. Additionally, CNN, MSNBC and Fox News briefly reported the story during periodic news updates throughout their evening programming.

The AP (4/28, Sherman) reports, "Ten years to the day after allegedly raping a 14-year-old girl, a California man was arrested in a roundup of fugitives that law enforcement officials say snared more than 1,100 sex offenders. The concentrated search for people wanted for federal, state and local crimes 'targeted the worst of the worst,'" Gonzales said. "Authorities arrested 9,037 people April 17 to last Sunday in a 27-state dragnet led by the U.S. Marshals Service and timed to coincide with National Victims Rights Week. … No other single law enforcement operation had resulted in the capture of as many suspected sex offenders, the Justice Department said." The AP notes, "Nearly 80,000 fugitives were arrested last year, just under half by the Marshals Service and the rest by state and local police working with federal authorities. … The operations in the past two years produced roughly 10 times the average number of weekly arrests, but even that barely dents the fugitive caseload. The FBI database contains names of a million fugitives. The director of the Marshals Service, John Clark, said Thursday there are a 'few million fugitives' in the United States, most of them wanted on state and local charges."

Bloomberg (4/28, Schmidt) also reports Gonzales said that "the operation 'targeted the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country.'" Bloomberg notes, "Authorities also seized 111 guns, more than 91 kilograms of narcotics, $120,265 in cash and 14 cars. Last year, more than 79,000 fugitives were arrested and there are 'a few million' still at large, mostly on state and local warrants…Clark said. FALCON stands for Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally. The government conducted a similar operation last year."

Gonzales' announcement was covered extensively by local newspapers and on local TV news across the country, with the stories emphasizing the arrests in those communities. Some examples: The Arizona Daily Star (4/28) reports, "Forty-six people wanted for immigration offenses, including people smuggling, were among the 117 fugitives rounded up in Tucson and Southern Arizona during a weeklong law enforcement operation, officials said. … Operation Falcon targeted those 'who had for too long escaped the grip of justice,' said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in a press statement Thursday. 'With these criminals off the streets, fewer Americans will live with the threat of violent crime in their communities,' he said."

The Chicago Sun-Times (4/28) reports, "In Chicago, 403 fugitives -- twice as many as the last time investigators did this -- were arrested during the sweep, which began April 17, said Geoffrey Shank, commander of the U.S. Marshals Service Great Lakes Regional Fugitive Task Force. In the Great Lakes Region, 1,225 fugitives were arrested. Chicago also netted more gang members than any other city and pulled two of the 15 most wanted off the streets, authorities said."

The Baton Rouge Advocate (4/28, Troxler) reports, "A nationwide crackdown on wanted suspects running from the law has found its way to Louisiana. As part of Operation Falcon, which has a primary focus of tracking down those suspected of sex crimes and violent crimes against women, 68 people were arrested in the middle part of the state. … U.S. Attorney David Dugas said the well-coordinated effort will continue throughout the year, but it gets extra emphasis this week. 'It's dangerous work,' he said. 'These are fugitives who are trying to escape the law. They know law enforcement is looking at them. It takes skill, it takes planning, it takes dedication by the agents -- and that's what we saw this week.'"

Under the headline "Sweep Nabs 'Worst Of The Worst'," The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (4/28, 200K) reports, "The long arm of the law rounded up 110 Minnesota fugitives — several wanted for violent sex crimes — over the past week," in "a 27-state effort by the U.S. Marshals Service to capture fugitives. … Al Garber, U.S. Marshal for the District of Minnesota coordinated the Minnesota apprehensions. In all, officers from 18 law enforcement agencies searched for fugitives in the Twin Cities, Duluth and Rochester from April 17 through Sunday." The Minneapolis Star Tribune (4/28, Aamot, 424K) adds, "In Minnesota, all but about 20 of the fugitives were captured in the Twin Cities area, officials said. … At a news conference at the federal courthouse, officials displayed several weapons confiscated in the sweep, including a gun and a device U.S. Marshal Al Garber called a 'knuckle-knife.' The fugitives caught in Minnesota included a man who had raped an 8-year-old boy, a gang member dragged from a crawl space and a career criminal with a record dating to 1967, Garber said. 'The goal was to make our neighborhoods safer, and by taking 110 people off the street, we did that' to a large measure, he said."

The AP (4/28, Sherman) reports, "Hundreds of California residents are among 9,037 fugitives arrested nationally in a weeklong roundup that focused on sex offenders, top law enforcement officials said Thursday. … Among the 256 apprehended in the inland region that stretches from Bakersfield to the Oregon border was a murder suspect from Mexico living in Modesto who will be deported, said Antonio Amador, marshal for that district. … 'As law enforcement knows, fugitives generally have criminal records and continue to commit crimes,' Amador said at a Sacramento news conference. 'In fact, 95 percent of those arrested had (previous) criminal records.'" The AP notes, "The Marshals Service spent $531,000 on the weeklong exercise, most of it to pay overtime to local and state police, said David Dimmitt, chief deputy U.S. Marshal."

The WHOI-TV Creve Coeur, IL (4/27, Spencer) reports, "Peoria County Sheriff Mike McCoy said before this program, it would have been impossible to track down many of these offenders. 'When you have someone like the Marshall's Office and this task force that has jurisdiction to go anywhere, to investigate anywhere, has the ability to call an office up throughout the country, through the world and say hey look we are looking for this guy, we got a report he is in your area. Will you go check it out?' McCoy said."

The KTEN-TV Ada, OK (4/27) reports, "A historic day for law enforcement nationwide, had a significant impact in Southeastern Oklahoma. … Today, U.S. Marshals visited Durant, commending Bryan County officials on their contributions." KTEN adds, "Twenty-five different departments in Eastern, Oklahoma captured over 500 fugitives. Local task forces working with the marshals talked about the operation. … 'Most of them will tell you that they're just doing their jobs, but just doing their jobs most likely saved or impacted many lives in a positive way that can't be calculated,' John Loyd, U.S. Marshals said. Loyd also said the raids yielded over a hundred guns, thousands in cash and opened doors to even more illegal activity in the area." The Muskogee (OK) Phoenix (4/28, McMahan) adds, "The number of arrests in the Eastern District was the third highest of any area in the United States where the operation was carried out, said U.S. Marshal John Loyd. Only the Houston and San Antonio areas had a higher number of arrests. … Of the 506 fugitives arrested in eastern Oklahoma, 35 were wanted for violent sexual offenses, including rape, forcible sodomy and sexual assault, Loyd said."

The Houston Chronicle (4/28, Lezon, 581K) reports, "In Houston, 328 fugitives were arrested, more than 40 of them wanted for sexual-related offenses, officials said. 'Pretty significant numbers, I think,' said Deputy U.S. Marshal Marianne Matus, from her Houston office. Carlos Bermudez, 30, offered no resistance when he was arrested at his golf-course maintenance job in The Woodlands last Friday, Matus said. … Federal authorities said he was among 15 of the 'worst of the worst' fugitives targeted in the crackdown, according to a news release from the U.S. Marshals Service." The KGBT-TV Harlingen, TX (4/27, Pedraza) reports, "An undercover agent says they were pleased with the number of arrests. … 'Valleywide there were 148 fugitives arrested and 213 warrants were cleared.'" KGBT notes that "Gonzales says Falcon III is coming in the next few months. He says it will target violent criminals on the east coast. The U.S. Marshall's Service in McAllen is already looking forward to another big round up. … 'We're going to continue searching for these individuals,' said the agent about the accused criminals still at large. 'We're not going to stop... we're going to be diligent in our efforts to bring them to justice.'"

The KITV-TV Honolulu (4/27) reports that "one of the nation's Top 15 most wanted was found on Oahu. From Waikiki to Maui, law enforcement involved in Operation Falcon II combed the islands for a week picking up wanted fugitives," arresting 249. "'What you may see is a reduction in crime; career criminals have been captured. What you may see are safer communities because predators are jailed,' U.S. Marshal Dutch Hanohano said."

The WANE-TV Fort Wayne (4/27) reports, "Altogether in northern Indiana, officers rounded up more than 46 fugitives on narcotics violations, seven on weapons-related offenses and several others for failing to registered as sex offenders. … John Clark, the director of the U.S. Marshalls Service says, 'There is an old phrase, "you can run but you can't hide" and for many fugitives out there, they think they can hide and they may, but not for long.' … Dave Murtaugh, the head of the U.S. Marshalls Service Northern Indiana District says, 'We're not going to let them rest.'"

The KCNC-TV Denver (4/28, Gionet) reports that "the U.S. Marshals Service rounded up 140 fugitives in Colorado as a part of Operation Falcon II…U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez announced Thursday. … One violent fugitive from Colorado was caught in Baltimore. Mark

Hayward was wanted in Douglas County for kidnapping and sexual assaulting a 15-year old girl he met over the internet."

The KAPP-TV Yakima, WA (4/27) reports, "Almost 200 fugitives were arrested locally during the roundup. That's double the number of criminals from last year. … Although the operation was assisted through federal dollars, they targeted criminals wanted by local authorities. The U.S. Marshals worked in conjunction with the Yakima Police Department, Yakima Tribal Police and the Sheriff's Department."

The KTVA-TV Anchorage (4/27) reports, "It is being called the largest sex offender bust in the nation's history and it's Alaska's biggest multi-agency bust ever. … We had 14 arrests in Fairbanks, 16 arrests on the Kenai Peninsula, 20 arrests in the Mat-Su Valley and 32 arrests in Anchorage," said Randy Johnson, U.S. Marshal, Alaska. 84 fugitives in all, the largest coordinated bust in Alaska in history with crimes ranging from drugs, and probation violations, to more dangerous offenses." KTVA notes that "the Last Frontier is often the last resort for the nation's criminals who think they can come and disappear into the Bush but Alaskan authorities say they will be caught. 'We want people to know this is not a place that they can come and hide. We will come and find them. We have a lot of investigative tools at our beck and call and we will come and find them anywhere they are, anywhere in the state,' said Marc Otte, Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal, Alaska."

The KGO-TV San Francisco (4/27, Ishimaru) reports, "U.S. marshals invited ABC7 on an exclusive ride-along for some of the Bay Area sweeps targeting sex offenders. … Chief Dep. Thomas Figmik, U.S. Marshals Service: 'Operation Falcon targeted offenders wanted for the worst crimes, such as murder, kidnap, arson, assault, robbery, narcotics and rape. The operation was inspired by the Department of Justice's National Victims Crimes Week, the theme of which was justice isn't served until crime victims are.'

The Grand Forks Herald (4/28, 32K) reports, "Fifty-four people are in custody in North Dakota as part of a nationwide roundup of fugitives, U.S. Attorney Drew Wrigley said Thursday. … U.S. Marshal Dave Carpenter said seven of the arrests in North Dakota were people wanted for sex crimes." The Herald notes, "North Dakota got about $8,000 for the roundup, up from about $5,000 last year, Carpenter said. The state's courts and jails will be busy in coming weeks, Carpenter said."

The KTRV-TV Boise (4/27, Patterson) reports, "In Idaho alone, 74 violent offenders are now in jail. … 'A sex offender is a very special kind' of criminal,' said U.S. Marshal Pat McDonald on Thursday. 'They stay below the radar. They move around a lot.' Of the 74 people arrested last week in Idaho during Operation Falcon, seven were wanted for violent sexual offenses, five for failing to register as a sex offender. … 'We got 14 different sex offenders, re-offenders, we got five unregistered sex offenders. One 2 miles from my house,' said Deputy Kevin Platts of the U.S. Marshals Service."

The Fort Wayne News-Sentinel (4/28) reports, "A nationwide roundup this month has put 210 central Indiana fugitives in custody," and "the dragnet captured at least 11 people who were wanted for violent sexual offenses such as rape, forcible sodomy and sexual assault, according to federal prosecutors. … '(This) serves as an excellent example of local, state, and federal law enforcement agencies working together in a united effort to bring fugitives to justice,' U.S. Attorney Susan Brooks said." The WISH-TV Indianapolis (4/27) reports former Hamilton County youth pastor Joshua Kramp "has been arrested, charged with sexual misconduct with a minor." He "was arrested on a golf course following a nationwide sweep of fugitives by the U.S. Marshals. … 'The arrest of Josh Kramp is a great example of why Operation Falcon works,' says Captain Kevin Jowett of the Hamilton County Sheriff's Department.

The Billings (MT) Gazette (4/28, Neary) reports, "Local police teamed up with the U.S. Marshals Service to arrest 21 fugitives in Wyoming," and "Timothy Moseley, chief deputy United States Marshal in Cheyenne, said Thursday his agency worked with 17 law enforcement officers from various agencies in Laramie, Natrona and Teton counties on the arrests. … 'The complete success of this operation lies solely at the feet of the state and local agencies that participated. Without their help and their manpower, we would not have been nearly as successful as we were,' Moseley said. 'We targeted sexual predators, and we managed to arrest two pretty heinous characters,' Moseley said."

The Bay News 9 Tampa (4/27) reports, "As part of Operation Falcon II, task force officers with the U.S. Marshal's Office arrested a suspect in a local rape. Darryl William Floyd, 37, is accused of sexually assaulting his then stepdaughter in April 2004. A doctor determined the then 13-year-old victim had been molested on two different occasions."

Senate Panel Approves Nomination Of Junker For Northern Iowa US Marshal. The AP (4/28) reports, "Butler County Sheriff Timothy Junker has been appointed to be the next US Marshal for the Northern District of Iowa. Junker, of Allison, is in his fifth term as sheriff. The nomination by President Bush must be confirmed by the full Senate. Senator Charles Grassley says it was approved unanimously by the Senate Judiciary Committee" yesterday.

Judge Rules NYC May Access ATF Information On Gun Makers. The AP (4/27, Caruso) reports, "For the fourth time, New York City's lawsuit against several gun manufacturers has survived an attempt by Congress to kill it off. A federal judge in Brooklyn ruled Thursday that the city may have access to gun tracing information gathered by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, even though a recently passed measure expressly forbids such data from being used in civil suits. … The decision is a victory for the city, which intends to rely heavily on weapons tracing information to prove its claim that gun manufacturers create a public nuisance by recklessly distributing firearms." The AP notes, "Lawrence Greenwald, an attorney for Beretta U.S.A., said the gun companies were likely to appeal."

The New York Times (4/28, Cardwell, 1.19M) reports in "Metro Briefing" that "in his decision, Judge Jack B. Weinstein…wrote that 'the proverbial cat is already out of A.T.F.'s bag' and that it made no sense 'to distort the terms of a federal budgetary measure in order to wrestle the cat back in.'"

Bloomberg's Handling Of Gun Violence Issue Noted. In his Washington Post column (4/28, A19), E.J. Dionne says, "Have you noticed that Washington politicians have given up on thinking about new solutions to gun violence? New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg has noticed, and he's angry. Good for him." Bloomberg is "a Republican, if hardly a partisan sort, and it may take a Republican to restart a debate that many Democrats have fled after a careful examination of the electoral map -- and years of exhaustion from demagoguery on the issue." With Boston's Democratic mayor, Thomas Menino, Bloomberg "brought 13 other big-city mayors together here on Tuesday to call for 'national leadership in the war on gun violence.'"

Federal Investigators Arrest Major Connecticut Gun Dealer. The AP (4/28) reports on of Connecticut's "largest gun dealers has been arrested on numerous federal firearms charges in a case that authorities say shows how guns wind up in the hands of criminals." Frank D'Andrea, "who ran the Gun Case in Shelton, was arrested last week and released after posting a $200,000 bond, authorities announced Thursday. … Federal investigators said that over a two-year period 100 guns seized at crime scenes had passed through D'Andrea's store. 'This investigation has revealed a disturbing lack of control and mismanagement by one of Connecticut's largest gun dealers, and blatant disregard for federal firearms possession and reporting laws,' said U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor. 'This case goes to the heart of how legal guns become illegal guns on the street. Gun store operators are the first line of defense for stopping gun crimes on our streets, and this case will be prosecuted to the fullest extent.'" The AP notes, "A routine inspection by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco Firearms and Explosives last year began to uncover the violations, authorities said. 'Stopping the illegal flow of firearms continues to be one of our top priorities and today is just another example of how we do that,' said ATF Special Agent in Charge Glenn N. Anderson."

The Connecticut Post (4/278, Mayko) reported, "The move came just months after U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor rented a billboard across the street from D'Andrea's former store in Stratford. The poster read 'Buy a gun for a criminal, go to federal prison.' … O'Connor said Wednesday that ATF investigators determined that, over a two-year period, 100 guns seized at crime scenes had passed through D'Andrea's store. 'Federally licensed gun dealers have a tremendous responsibility to sell weapons appropriately,' O'Connor said."

ATF, Hawaii Police Offer $5,000 Reward In School Arson. The AP (4/28) reports, "The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives…and Hawaii Police Department are offering a reward of up to $5,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of anyone involved in the arson of Waiakea High School. The fire occurred in the early morning hours on April 11, 2006, at the high school, located at 155 W. Kawili Street in Hilo. Police responded at approximately 1:15 a.m. No one was injured in the fire and the property damage is estimated at $1.5 million. 'We take this incident seriously and are committed to pursuing every investigative lead,' said ATF Special Agent in Charge Kelvin N. Crenshaw."

FDA Statement On Marijuana Continues To Be Scrutinized. In the New York Times (4/28, 1.19M), op-ed contributor Henry Miller writes that the FDA "staked out its position on the long-standing controversy over the medical use of marijuana — and made a lot of people smoking mad. … The regulators were denounced as elevating politics over science. But the F.D.A. did no such thing. To be sure, its one-page statement was far shorter and less detailed than the institute's book-length report, but its conclusions were essentially the same. The F.D.A. also recently gave the go-ahead for clinical trials of a new drug derived from marijuana — further demonstrating that its position is both sensible and proper."

The Jacksonville (NC) Daily News (4/28) writes, "Last week, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, for reasons that are far from clear, chose to enter the debate over medical marijuana with a thoroughly unscientific — one might even say anti-scientific — blanket denial that marijuana has any medical value at all. … Scientific American magazine noted on its Web site the next day, the statement simply ignores 'the existence of a 1999 report by the Institute of Medicine of the National Academy of Sciences, which concluded that marijuana was moderately well-suited for particular conditions.'"

US Anti-Drug Policy Seen As Empowering Organized-Crime Rings. In the Wall Street Journal (4/28, 2.11M), columnist Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes, "A serious discussion about U.S. security interests has to begin by acknowledging the great cost of prohibition and the war on drugs to U.S. foreign policy objectives. A U.S. policy that unintentionally empowers brutal organized-crime rings is counterproductive to U.S. hopes for a stable and prosperous Latin America. The problem is particularly acute for America's southern neighbor. Drug violence is spiraling throughout Mexico and innocents are paying the ultimate price."

IMMIGRATION:

May Day Boycott Plans Divide Pro-Immigration Activists. USA Today (4/28, Kasindorf, Keen, 2.31M) reports, "Masses of illegal immigrants and their supporters around the USA plan to boycott workplaces, stores and schools on Monday, but the move is dividing some pro-immigration activists and business owners." Organizers "of the May Day walkout call it el gran paro — 'the big stop' — and 'a day without immigrants.'"

The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Becerra, Blankstein, 958K) reports, "Two immigrant rights demonstrations Monday in Los Angeles could each draw a half-million marchers or more, police said Thursday, as officials expressed concern about a major disruption of traffic, commerce and school." Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, Cardinal Roger Mahony and "others have encouraged protesters to attend the late-afternoon march from MacArthur Park down Wilshire Boulevard to La Brea Avenue, prompting authorities to say that crowd might be the larger of the two." Officials "in Santa Ana, Huntington Park, Oxnard, Riverside, Pomona and San Diego said they expect smaller but boisterous protests." Police in Chicago, "meanwhile, estimated that as many as 500,000 could take to the streets in that city, while Seattle officials and protest organizers said they expect anywhere from 10,000 to 50,000 marchers."

Rumors Of ICE Raids Generate Fear Among Illegal Immigrants. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Jordan, Trevisani, 2.11M) reports, "Thousands of illegal immigrants across the U.S. stayed away from work and school, skipped medical appointments and scrapped purchases this week as rumors spread that authorities are rounding up undocumented residents." The "rising panic is fallout from last week's move by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to crack down on employers who purposely hire undocumented immigrants. Immigration and Customs Enforcement investigations over the past year resulted in the arrest on April 19 of 1,187 employees and seven current and former managers of IFCO Systems North America." The "origin of the rumors is unclear." The situation "could hamper Monday's planned 'National Day of Action,' another round of immigration rallies that has been expected to draw millions to the streets of major U.S. cities."

Two-Thirds Of Hispanics Blame Bush Or GOP For Inaction On Immigration Reform. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll "shows a 46% plurality of Hispanics place immigration atop 'must do' list. The poll, conducted in English, included an expanded sample of Hispanic respondents. Eight in 10 embrace Senate guest-worker compromise differentiating among illegal immigrants based on residence. Though Republicans blame Democrats for earlier collapse of that deal, two-thirds of Hispanics would hold Bush or his party responsible for inaction. The poll's margin of error is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points." The Journal adds, "White voters favor Republican control of Congress by 45%-39%; Hispanics prefer Democrats, 55%-22%."

Mexican Demographic Changes May Limit Number Of Workers Migrating To US. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Kronholz, Lyons, Mexico, 2.11M) reports that "thanks to a decades-long family-planning campaign, most Mexicans are having far fewer children than was typical a generation ago." In 1968, "the average Mexican woman had nearly seven children. Today, the figure is just above two, comparable to the U.S." This "sweeping demographic shift has fostered hope that someday Mexico will produce a healthy middle class." The "new, smaller Mexican family may help change that by allowing parents to invest more in their children's education, finally producing the generation that lifts Mexico into the developed world." A slowdown of immigrants seeking work in the north "would be especially likely if a growing middle class makes more Mexicans comfortable at home and averse to risking a dash across the border."

Spanish-Language Version Of Star-Spangled Banner Generates Outrage. ABC World News Tonight (4/27, story 7, 3:30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "With Congress debating a crackdown on undocumented immigrants, Latino singers decided to record a Spanish-language version of the national anthem. They wanted to make a point about America being an inclusive nation that many immigrants and cultures are absorbed in. But there are those who say sing it in English or don't sing it at all." ABC (Avila) added, "The idea came from music executive Adam Kidron, who sympathized with immigrant demonstrations, but was bothered by the number of Mexican flags in the crowd. He hopes the new Spanish language national anthem will demonstrate Latino patriotism and encourage more American flags." But this "Spanish language rendition has sparked incredible outrage."

The Washington Post (4/28, A1, Montgomery, 744K) reports in a front page story that "outrage over what's being called 'The Illegal Alien Anthem' is already building in the blogosphere and among conservative commentators. Timed to debut the week Congress returned to debate immigration reform, with the country riven by the issue, 'Nuestro Himno' is intended to be an anthem of solidarity for the movement that has drawn hundreds of thousands of people to march peacefully for immigrant rights in Washington and cities across the country, says Adam Kidron, president of Urban Box Office, the New York-based entertainment company that launched the project."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Homeland Security Panel Calls For Abolition Of FEMA. The Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee issued a report Thursday that, among other things, called for the abolition of the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the creation of a successor agency to be called the National Preparedness and Response Authority. The White House "flatly rejected any proposal to abolish FEMA," NBC reported in its lead story, and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff also rebuffed the idea. ABC and CBS also gave prominent coverage to the report's release. ABC World News Tonight (4/27, story 4, 2:20, Kerley, 8.78M) said the report said the "massive FEMA failures, the bungling bureaucracy during Hurricane Katrina, can't be fixed," so FEMA "should be dismantled." But critics say their plan "only amounts to reshuffling and renaming the agency." In New Orleans, the President "said the country is already better prepared," and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff was "blunt." Chertoff: "I don't have a lot time to fuss about the naming issue." NBC Nightly News (4/27, lead story, 3:25, Reid, 9.87M) said that "in 86 recommendations, the report describes the proposed agency as far more powerful than FEMA, with a much larger budget, a director who would report directly to the President during a crisis, so powerful the report compares the position to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs." But White House Homeland Security Advisor Frances Townsend "flatly rejected any proposal to abolish FEMA."

CNN's The Situation Room (4/27, Blitzer) reported that the proposed National Preparedness and Response Authority "would still be part of the Department of Homeland Security, but a distinct agency like the Coast Guard or the Secret Service. Senators say the director of the new agency should have a direct line of communication with the president, and have significant experience in crisis management unlike the former FEMA chief, Michael Brown."

The AP (4/27, Jordan) writes that the report "ripped the Bush administration anew," but "with a new hurricane season just weeks away, senators conceded that few if any of their proposals could become reality in time. The bipartisan investigation into one of the worst natural disasters in the nation's history singled out President Bush and the White House as appearing indifferent to the devastation until two days after the storm hit." The Senate report "is the third major federal report on the government failures exposed by the Aug. 29 storm."

Knight Ridder (4/28, Hutcheson) calls the report "a scorching account of government failure." In addition to Bush, the Senate document singles out Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin, "and a host of other officials for failing to anticipate the devastation or provide adequate help to victims." Knight Ridder points out that Lieberman, "a centrist whose bid for re-election next fall is being challenged by a liberal rival in the Democratic primary," was especially critical of Bush "in a solo chapter at the end of the full report." Lieberman "also accused the Bush administration of stonewalling the panel's investigation."

The Washington Times (4/28, Curl, 90K) reports Democrats "seized on the Senate panel's report, hoping to position themselves in the November congressional elections." Louisiana Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu said, "The handling of Hurricane Katrina by the Department of Homeland Security and FEMA was an organizational nightmare of immense proportions and that tragic administrative bumbling caused untold hardship for the people of Louisiana."

The Washington Post (4/28, A6, Hsu, 744K) says the report "sparked a sharp congressional debate over whether to abolish and rebuild FEMA." Collins said FEMA "'has become a symbol of a bumbling bureaucracy' that must be dismantled, and merely 'tweaking the organizational chart' will not solve failures exposed by the hurricane." But Townsend said, "As we're headed into this hurricane season, now is not the time to really look at moving organizational boxes." And Chertoff, "speaking at George Mason University, endorsed several Senate findings, but opposed making FEMA an independent agency and said renaming it would be like 'slapping a fresh coat of paint on.'" Chertoff said, "I'm held accountable. I want to make sure as a consequence that I have full command and control over my department."

CQ Today (4/27, Starks) also writes that while the panelists' view that FEMA "performed miserably during Hurricane Katrina is widely shared in Congress," lawmakers in both parties "are sharply divided on whether FEMA or any successor agency should be independent or part of the Department of Homeland Security."

Under the headline "Divisions Arise On Whether FEMA Requires A Tear-Down," the Los Angeles Times (4/28, Neuman, 958K) reports, "Congress and the White House are headed toward a collision over one of the big questions left unresolved" following Katrina: whether to "beef up" FEMA within DHS, "or to create a politically independent agency to handle national emergencies. … And as President Bush made his 11th visit to the Gulf Coast since the storm hit Aug. 29, the White House urged a strengthening -- but no reshuffling -- of current operations."

The Financial Times (4/28, Alden) quotes Collins saying, "FEMA is discredited, demoralised and dysfunctional. It is beyond repair." And while the report was generous in its distribution of blame, "the committee laid particular blame on Michael Brown." Collins "accused Mr Brown of 'blatant insubordination' during the crisis, and the committee's report said he was 'unqualified and counterproductive.'"

Army Corps Of Engineers Racing To Rebuild New Orleans Levee System. NBC Nightly News (4/27, story 7, 4:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "All eyes are on the levee system as they rebuild, and the Army Corps of Engineers tries to rebuild faith in the levees as well." NBC (Savidge) added, "It's a race New Orleans can't afford to lose: Repair its hurricane protection system before the next hurricane season starts. The job, 73% finished, 36 days to go, and the man in charge says it'll be done June 1." Brigadier General Robert Crear, US Army Corps of Engineers: "Some people would consider that almost impossible, but we've been working 24-hour shifts, seven days a week for the last eight months."

Ex-FEMA Chief Witt Calls For Independent FEMA. In a letter to the editor of USA Today (4/28, 2.31M), Clinton Administration FEMA Director James Lee Witt writes, "Even with the release of the Senate's report on Hurricane Katrina, the American public is not being well served by its government with the recommendations. It is time for Congress and the administration to do what is right and pull FEMA out of the Department of Homeland Security -- as Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., and other lawmakers suggest. FEMA and DHS should each stand alone. One agency can't effectively serve two disparate functions. … Let's give FEMA Director David Paulison an independent agency, a system and the support he needs to be a success. And let's give our citizens the confidence that they're being well served."

Krugman Says New Agency Would Not End Cronyism. In his New York Times (4/28, 1.19M) column, Paul Krugman writes, "The U.S. government is being stalked by an invisible bandit, the Crony Fairy, who visits key agencies by dead of night, snatches away qualified people and replaces them with unqualified political appointees. There's no way to catch or stop the Crony Fairy, so our only hope is to change the agencies' names. That way she might get confused, and leave our government able to function. … I guess it's impossible to select qualified people to run FEMA; if you try, the Crony Fairy will spirit them away and replace them with Michael Brown. But she might not know her way to" the National Preparedness and Response Agency.

Bush To Approve Dubai-Owned Firm's Takeover Of US Military Manufacturing Plants. The New York Times (4/28, Rutenberg, Sanger, 1.19M) reports, "President Bush is expected on Friday to announce his approval of a deal under which a Dubai-owned company would take control of nine plants in the United States that manufacture parts for American military vehicles and aircraft, say two administration officials familiar with the terms of the deal." The officials, "who were granted anonymity so they could speak freely about something the president had not yet announced," said that "the final details had not yet been set and that Mr. Bush might put conditions on the transaction to keep military technology in the United States." But "his action is almost certain to attract scrutiny in Congress."

Bush Asks Congress For Authority To Raise CAFE Standards. The CBS Evening News (4/27, story 3, 0:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported the President yesterday asked Congress "to give him the authority to raise fuel economy standards on all cars. He made the announcement while visiting a Mississippi gas station." While Bush's proposal was noted by all three networks and receives mentions in most print stories on the gas price issue, it was largely overshadowed by a Senate GOP announcement of steps to help Americans deal with the rising fuel costs.

ABC World News Tonight (4/27, story 2, 1:25, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported, "This is a pretty significant shift by the President. The Administration opposed this kind of move as recently as when the energy bill was passed last August. It's something that Democrats and some moderate Republicans have been calling for a long time. They want to raise the current standard, from the current 27.5 miles per gallon up to about 36 or 40 miles per gallon. The President is now saying he wants the authority to do this on his own. The question would be, how high does he want to raise them? Will he go up to 36 or 40? Or will he do something less? But this is a significant shift." NBC Nightly News (4/27, story 3, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) noted Bush made his remarks during "an unscheduled stop at a gas station in Biloxi," MS. Bush "pointed out that high gas prices are the equivalent of a tax increase on working people in this country."

Meanwhile, says the Washington Times (4/28, Bellantoni, 90K), in a letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta "formally asked for legislation that would allow the Corporate Average Fuel Economy standard for cars, now set at 27.5 miles per gallon for each manufacturer, to be raised through an administrative process."

counter high gasoline costs, but linked the assistance to drilling in an Alaska wildlife refuge, assuring the measure would face stiff opposition from most Democrats." Fox News' Special Report (4/27, Baier) reported on the proposed rebate, and says that "where the money would come from is a bit unclear at the moment. It's part of a 10 point plan being proposed by senate republicans. Also include tax breaks for those purchasing hybrid cars." CNN's The Situation Room (4/27, Bash) said that "it is probably unlikely -- given the partisanship -- that they will actually pass any of these proposals this election year. It's very unlikely, most people say."

The issue of gas prices continued to receive widespread media attention last night and this morning. Last night it led two out of three network newscasts. ABC World News Tonight (4/27, lead story, 2:55, B. Stark, 8.78M) added, "In Washington today, it was hard to find a politician who wasn't talking about gas prices." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist: "Our plan would give taxpayers a $100 gas tax holiday rebate check." The proposals "ranged from a gas-tax-holiday and hundred-dollar rebate checks for drivers to a bill that would reward commuters who switch to bikes." NBC Nightly News (4/27, story 4, 0:15, Williams, 9.87M) also outlined the GOP plan, "Among the proposals they have outlined, a $100 per taxpayer rebate linked to opening Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge for drilling, looser permitting rules for new refineries, and a rollback of recent tax breaks for the oil industry."

Meanwhile, the CBS Evening News (4/27, lead story, 2:30, Pitts, 7.66M) reported, "Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke came to Congress today with the same concerns as most Americans -- gas prices." Bernanke: "…rising energy prices pose a risk to both economic activity and inflation." Pitts: "The big three automakers are feeling the pain too. They're set to meet with President Bush for the first time sometime in May to discuss their woes. Gas prices help put the brakes on SUV sales." Bernanke "also made clear today the US economy is doing just fine at the moment, but we're just beginning to feel the effects of these rising oil prices. And, for that, there is no quick fix."

Appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (4/27), Frist said of rising gas prices, "As most people understand, there is no silver bullet, but it is a matter of supply and demand and we're 60 percent dependent on foreign oil. … What we need to do is focus on supply and demand issues. On the supply side, we can slow down filling or pause the filling of the strategic petroleum reserve. We have to go back and address our refinery capacity. Right now, our refineries are down below Katrina level. On the demand side, we need to give the authority to the administration to be able to control and to regulate those fuel economy standards, and we need in the midterm to long-term focus on ethanol production, production from soy, biomass, alternative fuels, wind, solar. A lot we can do, and that's why the Republicans today put out an eight point plan to look at supply, demand, make sure there's no price gouging as well."

The Financial Times (4/28, Yeager, Alden) reports Frist "acknowledged that the measures would have a limited impact," but "with the Republicans trailing badly in the polls, Congress and the White House are under pressure to respond." The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Fialka, Gold, Meckler, 2.11M) says "the industry-bashing in recent days from normally pro-business, antiregulation Republicans in response to surging pump prices has been striking." But "the Senate bill also includes some carrots for energy producers, including new tax incentives for increasing oil-refining capacity. And the plan would open up a supposedly oil-rich area along the coast of Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge for oil exploration."

The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Reynolds, 958K) says Democrats "derided the GOP plan, and its political chances appeared weak." The Democrats "noted that although the package incorporated some ideas they already had introduced, it contained a provision that almost assuredly would torpedo its passage: opening the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas drilling." The New York Times (4/28, Hulse, 1.19M) says Democrats "pressed their own ideas, including a proposal by Senator Robert Menendez, Democrat of New Jersey, for a 60-day suspension on the 18.4-cent-per-gallon federal tax on gasoline and 24-cent diesel tax. 'It is direct relief at the pump,' Mr. Menendez said." Meanwhile Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon, "tied up the Senate for almost five hours on Thursday in an effort to force a vote on his proposal to prohibit oil companies from escaping federal royalties for drilling on public lands when oil prices exceeded $55 per barrel."

As Senate Republicans Thursday revealed plans aimed at helping Americans deal with rising gas prices, Fox News' Big Story with John Gibson (4/27) questioned whether Americans are "willing enough to look at other alternative sources" like ethanol. Minnesota Governor Tim Pawlenty told Fox News that President Bush's request for the EPA to drop gas requirements will "hurt Minnesota and hurt the energy policy in the United States." Our country, he said, "has been asleep at the switch on energy policy since Jimmy Carter…30 years ago." Instead, the governor said "states have been leading the way with innovation and taking risks." And with today's "skyrocketing world demand" for oil, Gov. Pawlenty said the US has "to find more supply in other ways, things like renewable fuels from ethanol, so we can get more supply to accommodate demand to take off price pressures."

electorate, despite a robust economy." A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll "underscores a striking gap between Americans' mood and the nation's economic performance. … The upshot: Two-thirds of Americans say the nation is 'off on the wrong track,' President Bush's approval rating has fallen to 36% and Congress fares even worse at 22% approval." That" is a worrisome sign for Republicans, who are seeking to defend their House and Senate majorities with little more than six months remaining before Election Day. Continuing a trend that has persisted for a year, Democrats lead -- beyond the poll's 3.1 percentage point margin of error -- in public preference for which party should control Congress. The survey of 1,005 adults was conducted April 21-24." Democrats also "enjoy an edge in intensity; by 11 percentage points." Approval of the job Congress is doing "has plummeted to 22%, from 33% just last month. That's worse than the marks a Democratic-controlled Congress received at a similar point in 1994, the year Newt Gingrich led Republicans back to power on Capitol Hill."

ExxonMobil Reports $8.4 Billion Profit. NBC Nightly News (4/27, story 5, 1:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "ExxonMobil just today reported $8.4 billion for the first quarter, the fifth-highest quarterly earnings number on record. Those numbers are infuriating a lot of Americans." NBC (Myers) added, "For outraged consumers, the staggering profit numbers boil down to this -- Exxon earned 9.5 cents on every dollar of gasoline and oil sold, cashing in at every stage of the process." The Washington Post (4/28, A1, Mufson, Murray, 744K) and USA Today (4/28, Healey, Krantz, 2.31M) run similar reports.

Prices Of Oil, Gasoline Down In New York Trading. The Washington Times (4/28, Hill, 90K) reports, "Oil and gasoline prices took another tumble in New York trading yesterday on signs of increasing supplies and slackening demand in the United States and China, adding to an 18-cent drop in wholesale gas prices that likely will produce relief at the pump in the days ahead." Since peaking above $75 last week, "the price of premium crude oil has fallen to just under $71 yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange, while gas for delivery in May has plummeted to $2.07 a gallon after touching a high of $2.25." the Times adds, "Pump prices have flattened out at $2.92 nationwide for regular unleaded, 50 percent higher than they were in February but not yet reflecting the declines in the futures and wholesale markets."

High Oil Prices Affecting Airport Costs. The CBS Evening News (4/27, story 2, 2:05, Orr, 7.66M) reported, "If you fly, you're also paying more due to record oil prices. And ticket prices are being jacked up more often then you realize." Darryl Jenkins, "who tracks the airline industry, say flyers have been hit with 22 separate price hikes in just over a year, raising fares on average by at least 10% and much more on some routes. For example, a flight from Chicago to LA, which cost about $200 last July, now costs $260." Jenkins: "Jet fuel and its impact on the airline business is now greater than the impact that 9/11 had on the airline business."

Religious Leaders Call For Prayer To Lower Gasoline Prices. ABC World News Tonight (4/27, story 3, :15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Not far from Capitol Hill today, a group of religious leaders felt the best way to lower gas prices was to pray. They held a vigil outside a gas station and urged all Americans to ask God to help lawmakers set good energy policy and to ensure honesty among oil companies."

House GOP Uses Hydrogen-Powered Car In Event To Highlight Gasoline Prices. The Washington Post (4/29, A17, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "The Republican House leadership, hopping aboard the new anti-oil-addiction campaign, staged a fine media event yesterday at a BP gas station at Ninth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue SE that featured a hydrogen-powered car. House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.), along with other top House Republicans, was photographed in and around the snappy blue General Motors HydroGen 3 van. The event followed one by Senate Democrats on Wednesday, who rode in their gas guzzlers to an Exxon station a block from their offices to blame Republicans for high fuel prices."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (4/28, 958K) says in his speech on Tuesday to the Renewable Fuels Association, President Bush proposed "dubious policies that…might save a few cents per gallon in the short term, while doing little to address the underlying problem of U.S. oil dependence," thereby ushering "in a silly season for wrongheaded, economically ignorant proposals by headline-chasing politicians." In fact, the "prospects for successful detox [now] seem all the more distant as public officials scramble to follow the president's lead in dreaming up their own 'solutions' to the oil market," but all these "gas-price proposals should be ignored and scorned." Instead, sensible policy "would focus on curbing consumption."

The Wall Street Journal (4/28, 2.11M) editorializes, "Let's hope the folks who make those cable-TV videos of loopy college kids vamping on spring break are headed for Capitol Hill. The Members aren't yet taking their shirts off in response to higher gasoline taxes, but give them time. They're certainly pulling enough other stunts to laugh at." The "Senate Republican proposal for a $100 rebate, unveiled yesterday," is "destined for the pandering hall of fame."

Under the headline "Pander At The Pump," the New York Times (4/28, 1.19M) editorializes, "The battle to see which political party can out-pander the other on the subject of gasoline prices is embarrassing. If American consumers are having sticker shock at the pumps, it's because of a series of policy failures that stretch back decades. The last thing the country needs now is another irresponsible quick fix." Congress's "frantic gestures this week are, at bottom, an attempt to divert attention from its past failures to act, and its resulting inability to shield Americans from the burden of high prices at the pump." But "the pain of high gas prices will only get worse unless Congress changes its priorities, now."

Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (4/28, 1.19M), "The beginning of leadership for the president is to tell the American people the truth: This is not your parents' energy crisis. The price of oil is not soaring just because of greedy oil companies. It is soaring because of structural changes in the global energy market that could have vast consequences for America and the world if we do not respond in a comprehensive manner. Toward that end, we need a tax on gasoline at the pump that will keep prices around $4 a gallon."

Charles Krauthammer writes in the Washington Post (4/28, A19, 744K), "If you thought the Dubai port deal marked a record high in Washington cynicism, think again. Nothing can match the spectacle of politicians scrambling for cover during a spike in gasoline prices." And "this time the panderfest has gone all the way to the Oval Office."

Michael Kinsley, in a column titled "Tax The Windfall," writes in the Washington Post (4/28, A19, 744K), "Because of the war, the government is adding hundreds of billions to the burden of debt that all taxpayers, including other businesses, will have to pay off. Because of the war, American soldiers by the hundreds, and Iraqis by the thousands, are paying the ultimate tax of death by government policy. And because of the war, American oil companies are raking in extra billions in profits."

Eugene Robinson writes in the Washington Post (4/28, A19, 744K), "That was no impostor, that was the actual George W. Bush the other day, wagging his finger at the good people who run the oil bidness and pledging to hold them accountable, or at least pretend to. Pushing alternative fuels? Investigating windfall profits? Is the president unwell? No, he's fine. H is fixes for high gasoline prices also include loosening some of those bothersome clean air regulations and, as usual, a call for drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. He's just scared, and I don't blame him. With gas prices soaring over $3 a gallon, it's time for some serious panic."

Bush Visits Gulf Coast For 11th Time Since Katrina. NBC Nightly News (4/27, lead story, 3:25, Williams, 9.87M), on location in New Orleans, reported, "President Bush visited this city today and made a second stop next door in Biloxi, Mississippi, thanking volunteers at each location. But again today, another story came along and collided with the planned choreography of the day." NBC (Reid) added Chairman Susan Collins and ranking Democrat Joseph Lieberman "concluded that, eight months later, FEMA is still not ready for a hurricane the size of Katrina. The report says it took Hurricane Katrina to reveal that FEMA is so dysfunctional, it should be scrapped."

The CBS Evening News (4/27, story 4, 2:25, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "While the President slipped into a carpenter's apron in Louisiana today to pitch in with rebuilding the Gulf Coast, back in Washington an entirely different sort of post-Katrina hammering was underway, with senators calling for FEMA to be abolished." But "34 days from hurricane season, the President promised an efficient response should disaster strike again." Bush: "One of the things that we're working on is to make sure that we've learned the lessons from Katrina."

The New York Times (4/28, Rutenberg, 1.19M) emphasizes the presidential visit to ailing New Orleans in its coverage, writing that Bush promised "to make federal rebuilding efforts 'as efficient as possible' while signaling that his administration was listening to its critics." The trip "was planned to highlight the progress of rebuilding efforts on the Gulf Coast and, this being National Volunteer Week, the role volunteers have played in them." Bush visited the home of Ethel Williams, which is being repaired through charitable efforts, and "the White House seemed to get the sort of image it was seeking, that of the president with his arm around Ms. Williams." With Blanco and Nagin, "both Democrats, standing nearby, she told him, 'I'm proud that you're here, Mr. President, and I won't ever forget you.'"

Under the headline "In New Orleans, Bush Urges Volunteerism," the Washington Post (4/28, A6, VandeHei, 744K) reports Bush "wrapped his arm around a symbol of the devastation and hope of this ravaged city: Ethel Williams, one of the thousands of people who lost almost everything to Hurricane Katrina." At her house, Bush said, "If you are interested in helping the victims of Katrina, interested in helping them get back on their feet, come on down here." The New Orleans Times-Picayune (4/28, Varney, 257K) reports on Bush "talking with residents, pounding nails at a reconstruction site in the 9th Ward, and once again calling on Congress to approve his request of additional money for housing and levee reconstruction in the state." Bush "noted there was no shortage of work to be done, and, with Catholic Charities banners undulating on Williams' porch, he pointed to the work done in the 9th Ward by volunteers from all over the United States."

CNN's The Situation Room (4/27, Henry) reported Bush made his "11th trip to the Gulf region since Hurricane Katrina, and he really found the Ninth Ward in New Orleans to be pretty much devastated, homes still demolished, trash piled high, streets still pretty lifeless. And the President put on a carpenter's apron at one point to try to help some volunteers rebuild a home." The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Cooper, 2.11M) also notes that it was Bush's "11th trip to the area." The President "found that after a start that by nearly every measure was scattershot and halting, federal and state efforts, fortified by some $85 billion from Congress, are beginning to show progress. Cleanup and reconstruction in the region are moving ahead, especially with the basics: removing debris, providing temporary housing and rebuilding the area's demolished infrastructure." The AP (4/28, Loven) also covers the Bush visit.

Lobbying Reform Bill Survives House Vote By 216-207 Margin. The AP (4/28, Abrams) reports, "A Republican-backed lobbying overhaul bill narrowly survived Thursday, averting what would have been a stunning blow to the party's drive to repair the scandal-tarnished reputation of Congress before the fall elections." The 216-207 House vote "to advance debate on the bill came after GOP leaders spent hours urging their own members not to abandon them on the legislation. The turning point came when they persuaded Republican members of the Appropriations Committee to go along with measures in the bill to limit earmarks, or special interest projects." The AP adds, "In the end 12 Republicans, mostly lawmakers who thought the bill was too weak, voted against it. Democrats were unanimous in opposition."

The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Rogers, 2.11M) reports "dozens more" Republicans "had threatened to jump ship until Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) interceded to quell a rebellion by members of the House Appropriations Committee. … By holding the party together, Mr. Hastert avoided what would have been a huge defeat, killing both lobbying overhaul and any chance of a budget resolution this spring." But "when debate resumes next week, critics say the shortcomings of the Republican package will also become more apparent -- as well as the restrictive terms of debate."

The Washington Post (4/28, A4, Weisman, Birnbaum, 744K) reports Hastert "promised appropriators that they would not alone be targeted by a provision that requires narrowly tailored 'earmarks' be identified by the names of their sponsors and be subject to a special type of vote that could remove them." The leadership also "pledged to broaden the earmark provision in later negotiations with the Senate so that it will apply to all sorts of legislation, from transportation to taxation." The Post adds, "Appropriators were incensed that the pending ethics bill would apply the strict new rules only to their 11 annual spending bills, which fund the federal government. Had the provision been in place last year, they complained, it would not have blocked the so-called Bridge to Nowhere in Alaska, which helped spawn Congress's anti-earmarks drive in the first place." The Washington Times (4/28, Hurt, Bellantoni, 90K) also says that "for much of yesterday…the legislation appeared to be doomed. Shortly after the vote, one Democrat hurriedly issued a press release with a subject line: 'GOP Lobby Bill Dies in the US House.'"

Knight Ridder (4/28, Kuhnhenn) says Republicans "narrowly defused a revolt within their ranks that would have killed lobby and ethics legislation, but then delayed a final vote on the package until next week." The legislation "still faces broad, if not unanimous, opposition from Democrats and a handful of Republican moderates."

USA Today (4/28, Drinkard, 2.31M) headline its report "Lobbying Bill Quite Different From 1st Draft," and says that under the House bill, "lobbyists would still be able to buy gifts for lawmakers, as long as they are worth $50 or less. Instead of banning privately financed trips, they would be suspended until the ethics committee could come up with new rules to govern them." House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., called the measure "a ruse." She added, "It is an embarrassingly trivial response to the culture of corruption that has thrived under the Republican Congress." The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Simon, 958K) runs a similar report.

Henninger Says Supreme Court Would Be Diminished By Televising Oral Arguments. In his Wall Street Journal column (4/28), Daniel Henninger says that after attending oral arguments for two cases at the Supreme Court, the "issues that rage around the Court over constitutional interpretation are worth fighting over. But in an op-ed piece this week, Judiciary Chairman Specter raged that the public deserved to have the Court's 'power' televised. He is wrong. TV of its nature would surely diminish the Court. Anyone who wishes may listen to past oral arguments at www.oyez.org/oyez/frontpage1. That includes, quite eerie to hear, Roe v. Wade."

NYTimes Columnist Says Scalia Needs To Be "Reined In." In a New York Times column (4/26), Adam Cohen says Justice Antonin Scalia "has gone too far — and he keeps on doing it. He made national headlines recently for making a gesture that may or may not be obscene. If it wasn't obscene, it was certainly coarse and undignified." Scalia's "public statements often make him sound more like a political partisan than a judge," and "worst of all, Justice Scalia refuses to abide by the basic principles of recusal." Scalia is "certainly hurting his own reputation," but his "actions are damaging the reputation and moral authority of the Supreme Court." Whatever "the reason, Justice Scalia needs to be reined in. If he will not police himself, his colleagues and Congress should do it, to protect the dignity of the court, and to ensure that the parties before him get a fair hearing."

Leavandosky "replaces David Thomas, now a principal at Mehlman Vogel Castagnetti." Joseph H. Lanier "has joined Pillsbury Winthrop Shaw Pittman as senior counsel. Lanier was legal counsel to Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky." Bill Holbrook

Judge Dismisses Most Of Red Cross Whistleblower Lawsuit. The AP (4/28, de la Cruz) reports, "A whistleblower who claims the American Red Cross failed to immediately alert regulators when more than 600 pints of contaminated blood were released in New Jersey saw the bulk of her lawsuit dismissed Thursday in federal court. Michelle Hoyte also claims the agency fired her for complaining to her managers about the tainted blood. That part of her lawsuit is still intact, but the Red Cross has filed a motion to have that final portion dismissed as well. After the brief hearing, in which a judge dismissed the False Claims Act portion of her lawsuit, Hoyte said she remained worried that the Justice Department and the Food and Drug Administration are not doing enough to make sure the Red Cross's blood supply is carefully monitored.

Sago Mine Survivor Details Efforts To Survive After Explosion. The networks last night all reported on the letter written by Randal McCloy in which the Sago Mine disaster survivor discusses the efforts that he and his fellow miners made to escape after the explosion that trapped them. ABC World News Tonight (4/27, story 8, 2:25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported McCloy "sent letters to the families of each other the victims, describing how their loved ones helped each other, and fought to live." ABC (Wiener) added, "Since he came home from the hospital, Randal McCloy has been hailed as a hero by his West Virginia neighbors. His new 2-page letter seeks to portray his 12 fallen colleagues as heroes, too." The CBS Evening News (4/27, story 5, 2:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The disaster's sole survivor wrote to families of the dead men and revealed that at least four of the emergency oxygen packs they carried did not work." NBC Nightly News (4/27, story 9, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "McCloy's letter is filled with details about the desperate struggle of the 13 miners to survive."

Iran Says It Will Defy Any UN Resolution On Its Nuclear Program. The New York Times (4/28, Broad, Sciolino, 1.19M) reports, "Iran vowed yesterday to defy any United Nations Security Council resolution on its nuclear activities on the eve of a major report by atomic inspectors on the status of its nuclear program." Javad Zarif, the Iranian ambassador to the United Nations, told reporters in New York that "Iran would consider illegitimate any Council resolution calling on Iran to stop uranium enrichment that invoked the so-called Chapter 7 clause, which could open the door to penalties and possibly to military action." Meanwhile, the Washington Times (4/28, Pisik, 90K) quotes Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad telling a crown in Iraq, "We want nuclear technology for peace and progress of nations, and if some believe that they can prevent us with psychological warfare and resolutions, they are mistaken. … We have obtained the technology for producing nuclear fuel. ... No one can take it away from our nation."

CNN's The Situation Room (4/27, Verjee) reported, "In Bulgaria today, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the world cannot sit by if Iran thumbs its nose at the international community. Rice says Iran is highly unlikely to give in to international pressure to suspend its nuclear program." The New York Times (4/28, Weisman, 1.19M) reports Rice stressed at the NATO Ministerial "that the latest talks between United Nations monitors and Iranian envoys had apparently failed to break the impasse over Iran's nuclear activities and that the United Nations Security Council had no choice but to rebuke Iran. 'What is clear is that it is highly unlikely that Iran is going to accede to the demands of the international community… In order to be credible the Security Council of course has to act.' The United Nations' credibility is at stake, Ms. Rice said, and 'it cannot have its word and its will completely ignored by a member state.'" The Times cautions that, "despite her tough words, it was far from clear whether Russia would drop its opposition to a resolution at the Security Council that would implicitly threaten sanctions. … Past opposition by Russia, China and others has forced the United States to back down from its demand…, but now American and European diplomats hope that a new critical finding by the International Atomic Energy Agency will bolster support for the action it wants."

The Financial Times (4/28, Dombey) keys on the continuing obstacles to American success, saying Beijing and Moscow again "warned against escalating the dispute over Iran's nuclear programme." Russian President Vladimir Putin "warned against too great an intervention by the Security Council – a path Moscow feels could lead to confrontation. … The Chinese government also called for restraint. Moscow and Beijing, which have growing energy and economic links with Iran, fear that a UN resolution might be used to justify military action at a later stage." The Times says Washington "has stepped up efforts to assuage" fears, and quotes Counselor Zelikow saying, "Forcible change of the Iranian regime is not the objective of American policy."

USA Today (4/28, Slavin, 2.31M) reports the US "diplomatic offensive could lead to limited sanctions, but there is little international consensus now for stronger measures." The Los Angeles Times (4/28, Richter, 958K) runs a similar story.

Wire services continued to cover the controversy broadly. An AP (4/27, Ames) story noted German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier "suggested Thursday that the United States and Iran could hold direct discussions on the Islamic republic's nuclear standoff with the West if Tehran agrees to talk to Washington about the chaos in Iraq." Steinmeier "said he still hoped for a negotiated solution, but insisted Iran 'must dissolve the suspicion that it uses its civil nuclear program for the development of weapons.'" A separate AP (4/27, Gearan) piece reported Rice said that "Iran seems determined to defy international demands to control its disputed nuclear program, so it is time for the U.N. Security Council to act." The AP also said "quick action" by the UNSC "seems remote because of splits among its members. The United States is pressing for a strong response and Rice wants such steps to remain an option."

Israel Says Iran Has North Korean Missiles. The AP (4/27, Heller) reported, "Iran has received its first batch of North Korean-made surface-to-surface missiles that put European countries within firing range, Israel's military intelligence chief said in an interview published Thursday. … Military intelligence chief Maj. Gen. Amos Yadlin, who spoke to Haaretz, has warned of the new Iranian missiles in several recent interviews to the media. Iran already has missiles capable of reaching Israel, but the BM-25s are a significant upgrade over its existing top-of-the-line missiles -- the Shihab-4 and Shihab-3." In a story this morning, the Christian Science Monitor (4/28, Prusher, 61K) says Israel "has been moving into a more proactive position in the campaign to contain Tehran."

Pakistan Tells US It Would Not Back Use Of Force Against Iran. The AP (4/28, Schweid) reports, "Pakistan notified the Bush administration on Thursday it would not support the use of force to halt Iran's nuclear programs. 'We are against any resort to force,' Foreign Secretary Riaz Khan said after a meeting with Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns."

Poll Finds Americans Support Strikes Against Iran By 48%-42% Margin. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column that a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll shows that "despite Iraq, Americans don't reject strikes against a nuclear Iran. By 48%-42%, public says U.S. should join coalition to attack Iran's nuclear capability if Tehran approaches development of a weapon."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (4/28, 2.11M) editorializes, "A funny thing happened on the way to the Iranian bomb: The more alarming the mullahs' behavior, the more nonchalant the rest of the world seems to be about it." The Journal adds, "How so many apparently thoughtful people can face the idea of an Iranian bomb with relative equanimity remains a mystery to us. Whether they are as "cool" with the idea of fissile material in Mr. Bashir's hands is another matter. Whatever the case, they should consider that acquiescing to a bomb for Iran may also mean agreeing to one for many more of the world's worst actors."

Bush Imposes Sanctions On Four Accused Of Darfur War Crimes. ABC World News Tonight (4/27, story 6, 2:35, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush imposed sanctions against four men suspected of war crimes in the Darfur region of Sudan. The government is accused of helping Arab militias kill nearly 200,000 people in Darfur and driving 2 million people from their homes." ABC (Karl) added, "The UN today warned the situation in Darfur has taken a dramatic turn for the worse, with violence forcing 200,000 people from homes in the last two months alone. An attack just this week by the Sudanese air force sent 20,000 people fleeing to refugee camps." Jan Egeland, UN Emergency Relief Coordinator: "It is the worst crisis in the world at the moment, because it's totally out of control." Karl: "There are 7,000 African peacekeepers in Darfur. They've been unable to stop the violence. Calls for greater action are now coming from US lawmakers, American religious groups and even celebrities. The actor, George Clooney, just returned from the region."

Rice Says NATO To Take On More "Robust" Role In Darfur Region. The Washington Times (4/28, Kralev, 90K) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "said yesterday that NATO leaders have agreed to take on a more 'robust' role in Sudan's Darfur region and urged other international bodies to prepare the way. NATO diplomats said that earlier disagreements among the allies over involvement in Darfur had been resolved, but impediments remained, such as the Sudanese government's objection to a U.N. peacekeeping mission. 'Everybody recognizes that the [African Union] mission, while it has been successful thus far, is not robust enough to deal with the continued violence in Darfur and, particularly, problems that are emerging in western Darfur given the situation and problems on the border with Chad,' Miss Rice said." Meanwhile, White House spokesman Scott McClellan "said, 'An unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security and foreign policy of the United States is posed by the persistence of violence in Sudan's Darfur region, particularly against civilians.'" Rice, following "a meeting of the 26 NATO foreign ministers in Sofia, the Bulgarian capital, said that 'NATO is ready to work' with the United Nations and the African Union [AU] 'to try to bring about that more robust mission.'"

Chadian Rebels Said To Be Using Weapons Obtained From China. The Washington Times (4/28, Pepper, 90K) reports, "Many of the weapons used by Chadian rebels who nearly overthrew the government this month -- from the ubiquitous Kalashnikov rifles and rocket-propelled grenades to more advanced artillery pieces mounted on Toyota Land Cruisers -- come from China, probably indirectly through Sudan." While Chadian President Idriss Deby "and international relief groups were quick to accuse Sudan of promoting the attack two weeks ago on the capital, N'Djamena, by about 350 rebels," China's "insatiable appetite for oil to feed its economic growth gave Beijing an interest in the outcome as well. … 'Chinese firms from the People's Republic [of China] have been providing a range of large and small arms to African armed forces regardless of their persistent grave human rights violations, especially to countries with oil deposits, such as Sudan, or valuable natural resources, such as Liberia,' said Brian Wood, the head of arms research at Amnesty International." China "is one of the largest suppliers of arms to Sudan, Africa's largest country, which has tense relations with Chad. And China is heavily invested in Sudan's oil sector, with more than 10,000 workers and $3 billion spent on its oil sector since 1999."

Civilians Caught Up In Conflict Along Chad, Sudan Border. A front page article in the Washington Post (4/28, A1, Wax, 744K) reports that in the "desert region of Chad near the Sudanese border, civilians are caught in a conflict so confusing that they -- and even the combatants -- have trouble telling who is fighting whom. … Chadian government troops are posted at key points along the border to halt what they say is a revolt by rebels based in Sudan. The soldiers wear red armbands to set them apart from the rebels, who wear similar uniforms." The rebels, "who are fighting to topple Chadian President Idriss Deby, represent at least 12 groups united under several coalitions." Chad "blames the Sudanese, saying they back the insurrection, an allegation that Sudan denies." Sudan "blames the Chadians, saying they support a different group of rebels in the Darfur region of western Sudan." Chadians, meanwhile, "tend to blame France, Chad's former colonial power, which they accuse of being involved in the violence by backing the president." The Post adds that "two things are certain: The chaos in Darfur has extended deep into Chad, and a rapidly increasing number of civilians continue to suffer in one of Africa's most complex crises."

US Strategy To Train, Fund Chad Military Said To Run Risk Of Backfiring. In a piece in the New York Times (4/28, 1.19M), Raffi Khatchadourian, who traveled to Chad in 2005 for the International Reporting Project at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies, relates that the U.S. military, since '03, "has been training and equipping" Chad President Idriss Déby's army. This summer, U.S. forces "will continue to advise Chadian soldiers, and Congress is expected to allocate $500 million for a five-year program to train and equip several Saharan armies," hoping "these initiatives will help contain the threat of terrorism by bringing order to the Great Desert and its borderlands." But "dispensing military aid to Chad now -- with Mr. Déby fighting hundreds of rebels backed by Sudan -- seems reckless. It puts American military equipment and expertise in the hands of a desperate dictator. Worse still, it risks pouring additional fuel into the human furnace of Darfur, and it may well come to impede the careful diplomatic work required to solve that crisis."

Rice Condemns Arrest Of Belarus Opposition Leader. The New York Times (4/28, Myers, 1.19M) reports Belarus authorities arrested the nation's chief opposition leader, Aleksandr Milinkevich, and "swiftly sentenced him to 15 days behind bars, accusing him of participating in an unauthorized rally the day before against President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko." The arrest of the former presidential candidate "intensified a crackdown on political opponents in the wake of unusually strong public protests against a vote denounced as a fraud." Leaders of three other political movements were also arrested Thursday. During a visit to nearby Bulgaria, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "assailed the arrest of Mr. Milinkevich as 'reprehensible,' saying that 'the United States roundly condemns this act and sincerely hopes that the Belarus government accepts the will of the international community that it act in accordance with accepted international principles in the treatment of political opposition.'"

Cairo Protest Over Judiciary Turns Violent As Police Intervene. The New York Times (4/28, Slackman, 1.19M) reports "thousands of riot police officers sealed off access" to the High Court in Cairo, "beating and arresting protesters who had turned out to support two judges facing a disciplinary panel because they had accused the government of election fraud." The "huge show of force, appearing larger even than what was deployed in the Sinai after four bombings there this week, seemed to signal that President Hosni Mubarak's government had reached a breaking point over shows of dissent." The Washington Post (4/28, A12, Williams, 744K) reports the two judges "are being prosecuted for denouncing fraud in a series of elections last year. The show of force was impressive: The number of black-clad, helmeted officers on the street was far larger than during a series of small anti-Mubarak demonstrations last year."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Juror In Terror Trial Disavows Verdict (SFC)

By Demian Bulwa

San Francisco Chronicle, April 28, 2006

Sacramento -- One of 12 jurors who convicted a 23-year-old Lodi man Tuesday on charges that he trained for holy war disavowed the verdict late Thursday, alleging that she was bullied into a guilty finding amid a pattern of misconduct by fellow panelists.

"I never once throughout the deliberation process and the reading of the verdict believed Hamid Hayat to be guilty," Arcelia Lopez, a 44-year-old school nurse from Sacramento, said in a 2,000-word affidavit filed to the U.S. District Court in Sacramento by the defense just after 9 p.m.

Among other accusations, Lopez said the jury's foreman, near the start of the two-month trial, "gestured as if he was tying a rope around his neck" and said, "Hang him." Lopez said the gesture was repeated throughout the trial and that she believed it was a reference to Hayat.

Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, said Lopez's claims should prompt U.S. District Judge Garland Burrell Jr. to grant the young man a new trial. Hayat now faces 30 to 39 years in prison at a July 14 sentencing.

Prosecutors could not be reached for comment at the late hour.

But one juror, speaking condition of anonymity, called the accusations "a complete outrage" borne of "juror regret." The juror said Lopez changed her vote to guilty Monday, which at first made the juror uncomfortable.

"When she decided to change her vote, which was completely under her own will, I asked her flat-out to her face, in front of everybody, if she was changing her mind based on her own free will and the evidence presented the jury," the juror said. "She said yes."

The juror, who declined to address specific misconduct allegations, continued: "We argued as jurors do -- that's deliberation. If she saw that as pressure, it was in her own mind. I don't think other jurors saw it that way."

Attempts to reach other jurors were unsuccessful. A few declined to comment.

The jury of six men and six women, after deliberating for nine days, found Hayat guilty of providing "material support" to terrorists by training at a camp in Pakistan and returning to the United States to await attack orders. He was also convicted of three counts of lying to the FBI.

Lopez, the final holdout for acquittal, acknowledged in the affidavit that, when polled by a clerk Tuesday, she "responded to the court that I agreed with the verdict."

"I deeply regret my decision," said Lopez in the affidavit, adding that she cried several times during deliberations and, last Saturday, sought treatment for migraine headaches at an emergency room.

DOJ_NMG_0027130

James Wedick, a former FBI agent and the lead defense investigator, contacted Lopez on Wednesday and later asked her if she would allow the defense to prepare an affidavit.

Vic Amar, a professor at Hastings Law School in San Francisco, said Judge Burrell would likely investigate the allegations.

"In general, changes of heart by a juror are not a basis for undoing a verdict unless there are specific influences he or she can point to, like a bribe or a threat or some improper evidence that was looked at," Amar said.

Also Tuesday, a separate jury of eight women and four men failed to agree on whether to convict Hayat's father, 48-year-old Umer Hayat, on two counts of lying. Prosecutors have not yet decided whether to retry the elder Hayat, who is due back in court Friday for a bail hearing.

The dual trials in Sacramento centered on the FBI's videotaped interrogations of the Hayats last June at the agency's office in the capital. Hayat, already on the FBI's radar because of comments he made to an informant, had just returned from a two-year trip to Pakistan.

Prosecutors described the confessions as clear proof of guilt, but defense attorneys said the men have no experience with terrorist camps and were manipulated into telling agents whatever they wanted to hear.

Lopez said jurors inappropriately talked about media reports regarding the case. In particular, she said, jurors expressed interest in finding out what dismissed juror Andrea Clabaugh, 39, of Carmichael, said to reporters on March 22. Clabaugh had said the evidence thus far had not convinced her of Hayat's guilt.

One juror "suggested the Chronicle or the (Sacramento) Bee," Lopez recalled.

Burrell repeatedly admonished the jurors to avoid exposure to media reports on the case. Such exposure can be grounds to overturn a verdict.

Lopez said the foreman, Joseph Cote, 64, of Folsom, made offensive comments about Hayat during deliberations. She quoted him as saying, "If you put them in the same costume then they all look alike."

The foreman sent a note last Friday to Burrell complaining that one juror "does not seem to fully comprehend the deliberation process." Lopez said this was a reference to her belief that Hayat was innocent.

Lopez said Cote "personally attacked me repeatedly as someone who couldn't process the information and who just couldn't see that (Hayat) was guilty because he thought I didn't have the mental capacity to understand."

She said she didn't even know about the note until Burrell responded in writing on Monday morning, asking jurors to "please continue your deliberations."

Lopez said another juror, Rebecca Harris, 58, of Clements, brought in a long, type-written note Monday and read it to the panel. Harris complained that her health was failing and, Lopez said, blamed it on her.

"The message of the statement was clearly to put pressure on me to change my vote," Lopez said in the affidavit. "She said that she herself couldn't take it anymore and that if I didn't change my vote, she would consider getting off the jury herself due to the stress."

In the end, "I explained to the other jurors that it was okay that I disagreed and that we did not have to have a unanimous verdict," Lopez said in the affidavit. "But they did not all agree. They continued to pressure me to change my vote. At this point I was under so much stress and pressure, that I agreed to change my vote."

Alternate juror Montell Hall, 69, of Roseville, who did not sit through deliberations, said Thursday that the panel followed the rules when he was present.

"If there was any (misconduct), I would have been the one to do it," the semi-retired engineer and consultant joked. "I was very outspoken, but I didn't talk about the trial (during testimony)."

Hall said he too would have voted for conviction.

"I was absolutely sure in my own mind that he was guilty," Hall said. "Mostly it was the confession that made me sure, and the way he acted during the confession ... the kid was his own worst enemy."

Terror juror bullied? (SR)

By Jeff Hood

The Stockton Record, April 28, 2006

Hamid Hayat's conviction on terrorism charges was delayed by a lone juror who refused to believe the Lodi man was guilty, according to a jury note unsealed Wednesday, one day after the verdict.

The note from foreman Joseph A. Cote, delivered to U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. on Friday, read "There is impass (sic) with a juror who does not seem to fully comprehend the deliberation process. I'm available to discuss this with you and counsel at any time."

Burrell ordered jurors on Monday to continue their work, and the impasse ended Tuesday, the ninth day of deliberations. That's when the holdout joined the 11 others in voting to convict the 23-year-old Hayat of attending a militant training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and 2004 to train for an Islamic holy war in the United States. He also was convicted on three counts of lying about his training.

Earlier Tuesday at Sacramento's federal court, Burrell declared a mistrial in the lying case against Hayat's father, Umer, after jurors deadlocked on two charges.

Defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi said the guilty verdict suggests that the 12th juror was bullied into voting for conviction, a possible basis for appealing the decision. She said she talked briefly with Cote on Wednesday, who referred to the juror as a woman.

"He's saying that she couldn't see the evidence, couldn't see he was guilty," Mojaddidi said, adding Cote would not reveal the juror's identity.

Mojaddidi said a female juror was visibly upset in the court when she confirmed her guilty vote for Burrell.

"I think the judge noticed it," she said. "The judge was staring at her."

U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott said Wednesday that last-minute changes of heart are a part of the jury process and to suggest anything else is speculation.

"My entire legal career, I've been in and around jury trials, and this happens," Scott said. "It's the back and forth of jury deliberations, and it's the way it works, so there's nothing really out of the ordinary about it."

Meanwhile, FBI agents resumed their surveillance of Muslims named by Umer Hayat as having received paramilitary training in Pakistan. Federal law enforcement authorities said Tuesday they are continuing their investigations into possible ties between local Muslims and terrorist groups.

But that might not be the last of the charges facing Lodi residents, Scott said.

"Certainly there are people of interest to us," Scott said, declining to elaborate in a telephone interview Wednesday. He referred questions to FBI agents, who also said the probe was continuing but refused to give more details.

"There are aspects of this (case) which remain under investigation," said Drew Parenti, the agent in charge of the Sacramento office.

Lodi Mayor Susan Hitchcock and police Capt. Gary Benincasa said the FBI has not shared any additional suspicions with them, and neither has seen indications of terror-related activity.

Scott's comment about a continuing investigation "reopens an old wound," aggravating suspicions of and within the Muslim community that had just begun to heal, said Hitchcock.

"This is going to cause everyone unease," she said. "I hope they're speaking from real knowledge, not just hearsay or something like that, because the city of Lodi is ready to move on. This is not something we want to be known for. We want to be known for our fine wines."

One of the men named in Umer Hayat's confession declined an interview Wednesday. He said attorney Lindsay Weston of Davis advised him not to submit to a reporter's interview request under any circumstances.

Weston said the government will not hesitate to subpoena reporters to disclose information obtained in confidence from sources if it isn't already eavesdropping on Muslims' conversations.

When a woman sitting in a parked car near the man's home was asked by The Record if she was with the FBI, the woman smiled, waved and said, "Have a nice day."

Attendance at the Lodi Muslim Mosque's early-afternoon prayer service was sparse, with one member complaining the constant media presence outside discouraged others from praying.

One Egyptian-born Muslim, who only occasionally prays at the mosque during work breaks, said many members are fearful. Nearly all have their roots in Pakistan, like the Hayats.

"They never talk to me because they think I am FBI," the man said.

Also Wednesday, the convicted man's cousin said he could have testified that Hamid Hayat never attended the terrorist camp but wasn't called to the stand as an alibi witness.

Usama Ismail said he lived in Pakistan for 31/2 years before returning to Lodi in March 2005 and never went more than two weeks without seeing his cousin. And even in those times, they would chat by cell phone.

"If he went to a place like that, I would have known," Ismail said. "I'm not that dumb to go and perjure myself and say he didn't go if he did. I was there that whole time. Sometimes we'd go to Islamabad and eat at KFC. That was like royalty."

Mojaddidi said Ismail was represented by an attorney who didn't want the 20-year-old Lodi resident testifying.

The sole San Joaquin County juror in the case, Rebecca Harris of Clements, said Hamid Hayat's confession was the single most compelling piece of evidence.

"It was his words," the 58-year-old bank regulator said late Tuesday.

Harris declined to discuss the jury's deliberations in detail, but she said she was confident the outcome was right.

Harris said jurors did not vote on the matter immediately once they began deliberating. She said jurors were respectful, but otherwise she declined to discuss dynamics in the room.

"It was not an easy decision," she said.

Mojaddidi said jurors' emphasis on the confession brings up another possible ground for appealing, this one based on a March 31 ruling by Burrell. The judge disallowed testimony from retired FBI agent Jim Wedick, who would have testified the confession was not reliable. Burrell said the testimony would have been redundant.

Hamid Hayat is scheduled to be sentenced July 14.

Juror Illness Causes Delay In Moussaoui Deliberations (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

The death penalty case of Sept. 11, 2001, conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, which has stretched over more than four years amid numerous delays and complications, was delayed once again yesterday. A juror called in sick.

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema told attorneys on both sides that she was sending the jury home. Brinkema initially proposed waiting until Monday to restart deliberations in the al-Qaeda conspirator's sentencing hearing because the juror was on medication.

"I don't want any juror in this serious of a case . . . working if he is not feeling 100 percent. It's obviously a stressful situation," Brinkema told the remaining 11 jurors who filed into the U.S. District courtroom in Alexandria.

After prosecutors and defense attorneys suggested that would be too long a delay, Brinkema sent the jury home for the day. Later yesterday, the juror told the court that he was feeling better, so the jury is supposed to start what could be its third full day of deliberations today.

Moussaoui, who often shoots one-liners -- some vitriolic, some humorous -- to spectators after the jury and judge have left the courtroom, tried to take credit for the juror's undisclosed illness.

"Moussaoui's biological warfare!" he called out, smiling.

Moussaoui, 37, was charged in December 2001 with conspiring with al-Qaeda in the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon. The trial date was moved back several times because of the vast amount of classified material and the complications caused by Moussaoui's initially being allowed to represent himself.

The case was then put on hold for more than two years during a legal dispute over whether Moussaoui and his attorneys could question top al-Qaeda detainees they said could help clear him. An appeals court said in 2004 that Moussaoui could not interview the captives but that their statements to interrogators could be read to a jury.

He pleaded guilty last year, becoming the only person convicted in this country in the Sept. 11 attacks. The sentencing hearing began March 6.

This month, the 12-member jury found that Moussaoui was eligible for the death penalty because his lies to the FBI when he was arrested in August 2001 allowed the Sept. 11 plot to go forward. Jurors then returned to court for a second phase that featured emotional testimony from several dozen family members of Sept. 11 victims.

After closing arguments Monday, jurors began their deliberations in the jury room on the seventh floor of the courthouse.

Juror's Illness Stalls Moussaoui Trial Deliberations (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Jury deliberations in the Zacarias Moussaoui conspiracy trial were expected to resume today after being halted Thursday when a juror fell ill.

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema did not divulge the juror's name or illness, saying only that the juror was a male who needed treatment by a doctor and prescription medicine.

The nine men and three women began deliberating Monday afternoon and have spent about 16 hours debating whether Moussaoui, who has pleaded guilty in the Sept. 11 conspiracy, should be executed or spend his life in prison with no parole.

The jurors were set to restart their discussions Thursday morning when it was announced that the juror was not present and could not participate in the deliberations. Brinkema at first wanted to put off the deliberations until Monday to give the juror time to recover.

"This is the most sensitive time in the case," she said, referring to jury deliberations. "I don't want any juror in this serious of a case working if he or she is not feeling 100%."

But Thursday afternoon, the court announced that the juror was "feeling better" and that deliberations would resume today.

Moussaoui, 37, twice testified in the trial and said he was being groomed by the Al Qaeda terrorist organization to fly a fifth plane into the White House on Sept. 11. But he was arrested three weeks before the attacks on New York and the Pentagon.

On Thursday, Moussaoui continued his practice of shouting anti-American boasts and taunts. After the juror's illness was announced, he yelled, "Moussaoui biological warfare!"

Man Found Guilty In Milwaukee Bomb Plot (WP/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

MILWAUKEE -- A man who authorities say idolized Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh was found guilty Thursday of threatening to blow up a federal building in downtown Milwaukee.

A jury deliberated about 3 1/2 hours before finding Steven Parr, 41, guilty on the charge of threatening to blow up the Reuss Federal Plaza.

Parr, of Janesville, could face up to life in prison. No sentencing date was immediately set.

Prosecutors said testimony in the four-day trial showed Parr idolized McVeigh, who was put to death for the Oklahoma City bombing 11 years ago that killed 168 people.

Parr had studied bomb-making books and previously built small explosive devices, prosecutors said.

Authorities said Parr was days away from being released from state prison in September 2004 after serving time on drug charges when he told a cellmate about his plan to use a truck bomb to blow up the 14-story building.

The cellmate alerted authorities.

The cellmate, whose name was not disclosed, said in letters to the FBI that Parr had extensive knowledge in bomb-making and considered Ted Kaczynski, the Unabomber, another of his heroes, according to a complaint.

Five Relatives Of Terror Suspect Arrested (AP)

By Paul Foy, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 28, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY -- Five relatives of a U.S. citizen suspected of being a senior al-Qaida operative were arrested in California and Utah on charges of defrauding banks of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

The FBI said it was investigating whether any of the money was used to finance Middle East terrorism.

Four of the five defendants -- all U.S. citizens or legal residents from Jordan where the family of al-Qaida suspect Shawqi Omar has extensive ties -- were arraigned Thursday. The fifth was excused for medical reasons.

Nothing in the indictments ties any of the relatives to a terror network, and federal prosecutors officially referred to the case as a criminal enterprise. But agents are working to determine where all the money went, said Greg Bretzing, a supervisor in the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force in Salt Lake City.

"This is an ongoing investigation. This is nowhere close to being over," he said.

The FBI said Omar's relatives netted $327,000 from fraudulent bank loans and bad mortgages in Utah, and Bretzing said some of the money wound up in Jordan with Omar's relatives.

Omar, a 44-year-old Kuwaiti native with U.S. and Jordanian citizenship, has been indicted in Jordan with Iraq insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in an aborted chemical attack on the Jordanian intelligence agency.

Omar has been held by the U.S. military in Iraq since he was arrested in Baghdad in 2004. He has not been charged in Iraq with any crime, but the U.S. government claims he had bomb-making materials and was harboring an Iraqi insurgent and four Jordanian fighters at the time of his arrest.

In one of the allegedly fraudulent transactions, two relatives are accused of using the same Mercedes-Benz sedan as collateral for loans totaling $80,000 that they failed to repay to two Utah banks, court documents said.

Neither of the two owned the car, which belonged to another family member, according to the documents.

Paul Toller, a Utah First Credit Union vice president, said it loaned $40,000 to Omar's brother using the Mercedes as collateral.

But Sharif Omar was a used-car dealer who had "borrowed and repaid on other car loans," and that nothing about the Mercedes-backed loan appeared suspicious, Toller said.

Soon after taking out the loan -- which Sharif Omar told a bank officer was for home improvements -- he stopped making payments. Investigators contend he gave the $40,000 to a nephew, who included it in a wire transfer to an account in Amman, Jordan.

Sharif Omar, 37, pleaded not guilty Thursday in federal court in Salt Lake City and was released pending trial. If convicted, he faces up to 60 years in prison and $1.75 million in fines on charges of bank fraud and money laundering, a prosecutor said.

Another brother, 42-year-old Bassam Omar, an engineer who owns several Utah businesses, was also indicted. Family members say he was the joint owner of the Baghdad construction company Shawqi Omar was managing at the time of his arrest.

He denied that Shawqi Omar is a member of al-Qaida in an NBC News interview in February. "He is not a terrorist, and it's not fair to him or us," he said.

Another of Shawqi Omar's brothers, who was not indicted, accused federal agents of manufacturing ties between Omar's alleged terrorist actions and the family's U.S. business holdings.

"There is no connection," Gus Omar, who works at one of three Utah car dealerships owned by the family, told The Salt Lake Tribune.

Al-Qaida suspect's relatives nabbed on fraud charges (SLT)

By Matthew D. LaPlante and Matt Canham

The Salt Lake Tribune, April 28, 2006

Counterterrorist agents pounced on five men, one in Utah and four in California, on Wednesday as part of an investigation into the U.S. connections of a suspected senior al-Qaida operative imprisoned in Iraq.

But for now, the federal indictments against the men - all of whom have ties to Utah and all of whom are related to accused terrorist Shawqi Omar - involve only fraud and money laundering.

But FBI agents say that some of the money alleged to have been stolen in various schemes wound up in Jordan. And now they want to know whether that cash has ended up in the hands of terrorists.

"We would be derelict not to investigate where that money is going," said agent Greg Bretzing, a supervisor in the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force in Utah.

The Omar family has extensive ties in Jordan, where Shawqi Omar moved his family in 1995 and where he now stands accused of helping terrorist mastermind Abu Musab al-Zarqawi plot a chemical attack.

Al-Zarqawi claims to be al-Qaida's Iraqi leader and has been implicated in scores of bombings, kidnappings and beheadings. The U.S. government has put a $25 million bounty on his head.

Federal investigators believe Shawqi Omar acted as al-Zarqawi's "personal emissary" in several Iraqi cities. But back in Utah, Omar's brother Gus says there is no connection.

"If you're a Sunni and from Jordan and in Iraq, then you're bound to meet somebody who has met Zarqawi, but Shawqi doesn't know him," said Gus Omar, who has not been implicated in the case against his brothers.

In court filings, U.S. military officials have offered evidence to the contrary, saying Omar had taken al-Zarqawi's sister-in-law as a second wife.

Omar, who worked as a refrigerator repairman when he lived in Utah in the late-1980s, was arrested in Iraq on Oct. 29, 2004. U.S. military officials have alleged the 44-year-old man, acting on al-Zarqawi's behalf, was harboring one Iraqi insurgent and four Jordanian fighters at his Baghdad home. He had also plotted the kidnapping of American workers in Iraq, U.S. officers alleged.

Omar could be the first American citizen to be tried in the Iraqi court system, if military officials prevail in an ongoing legal battle. It is a prospect his family in the United States is fighting to prevent. A document filed by Omar's lawyers this week, in which they have again requested access to their client, alleged that U.S. troops beat Omar and tortured him with electric shocks.

Bassam Omar, who family members say was the joint owner of the construction company Shawqi Omar was managing in Baghdad at the time of his arrest, has denied his brother is a member of al-Qaida.

"He is not a terrorist," he told NBC News in February, "and it's not fair to him or us."

Now Bassam Omar is behind bars.

The San Diego engineer, who owns several Utah businesses, was taken into federal custody on Wednesday, hours after another Omar brother, Sharif, was arrested at his home in the Salt Lake City suburb of Cottonwood Heights.

Two nephews and a brother-in-law were also detained in California.

The Utah arrest came as a shock to neighbors in the upscale gated subdivision where Sharif Omar has lived with his wife and three children for more than a year.

"Of anybody here, he's the last guy I would have expected to get arrested," said neighbor Bob Skanchy.

Friends said that Sharif Omar's family seemed to have rapidly climbed the economic ladder over the past few years, though state records indicate most of the dozens of businesses he and his relatives have owned along the Wasatch Front have closed.

Skanchy said homes in the community can cost upwards of $500,000. Two luxury sport utility vehicles were parked in front of the Omar home Wednesday afternoon.

Inside the newly built house, Hannah Omar said she had yet to be told why her husband had been arrested.

"I don't know what's going on," she said. "I haven't even talked to our lawyer."

She'll have an opportunity to learn more today at her husband's arraignment on charges of bank fraud and money laundering.

The four indictments allege that the Omar family members, aided by three other Utahns, defrauded banks of hundreds of thousands of dollars with bad mortgage and car loans from 2000 to 2004.

In at least one instance, Omar nephew Ihab Ramadan allegedly wired $50,000 to an account in Amman, Jordan, according to the indictments. Ramadan was arrested at his Chula Vista, Calif., home early Wednesday.

Another Omar nephew, Alaa Ramadan, was arrested at Los Angeles International Airport after FBI agents received word he was returning from Jordan, where friends say he has lived for several years. The fifth family member, identified as Omar's brother-in-law Ahmad Abudan, was arrested in the San Diego area on the same day.

A federal grand jury in Utah indicted the men several months ago but those charges were kept under seal until the agents were sure of Alaa Ramadan's return. Omar family members said Alaa made his living in real estate and spends most of his time in the Middle East.

The other Utahns named in the indictments for their role in an alleged mortgage scam - Rebecca Teece, James Gibbons and Teri Hansen - have been summoned to appear in court but have not been arrested, though Gibbons is currently in custody on unrelated charges.

The Omar family has worked tirelessly to ensure that Shawqi Omar, currently being held at a U.S. prison facility in Iraq known as Camp Bucca, will be provided legal council and not be turned over to the Iraqi court system.

According to documents filed Friday in a Washington, D.C., federal court, Omar's attorney Susan Burke claims he is being tortured. She said she received an unexpected phone call from Omar on April 13, in which her client told her that "Americans, claiming to be Federal Bureau of Investigation agents, beat him severely and applied electric shocks to his body."

"The agents claimed they could kill him if they wanted to," Burke wrote. "The American agents threatened to rape his son if Mr. Omar failed to provide information. A translator believed by Mr. Omar to be Moroccan threatened to rape Mr. Omar's wife, who was also in United States' military custody at the time."

Burke - who earlier won a temporary injunction barring Omar's transfer to an Iraqi court - has requested access to Omar's medical files, any photographs taken after the alleged beatings and tape recordings of their conversation.

She also demanded immediate and continued contact with her client, who U.S. officials have alleged would often use his U.S. passport to gain access to guarded Baghdad hotels in order to entice foreigners to his home, where they would be kidnapped for ransom.

Regardless of the allegations in Iraq, Gus Omar believes the FBI is manufacturing a connection between Shawqi Omar's alleged terrorist actions and the family's U.S. business holdings.

"There is no connection," said Gus Omar, who works at a car dealership in Murray owned by the recently arrested Omar brothers.

Bretzing, the FBI counterterrorism supervisor, said Utah's FBI office previously received a tip about the family's alleged financial misdeeds, but didn't start its investigation until January 2005.

That came at a time when counterterrorism agents throughout the country were investigating Shawqi Omar's American ties.

The FBI's top officer in Salt Lake City said the counterterrorism task force isn't done yet.

"From our perspective, this investigation is not over," said Timothy Fuhrman. "This is another tool in our tool box to advance the investigation. . . . Sometimes you get an indictment and then people cooperate."

It would not be the first time federal investigators have leveraged mortgage fraud charges against a suspect in order to gain compliance in a terrorism investigation.

In December, a federal jury acquitted University of South Florida doctoral student Sameeh Hammoudeh of charges that he helped fund and supported a Palestinian terrorist group.

But Hammoudeh remains in custody and he has been ordered to be deported from the United States because officials were able to obtain a conviction on other charges - including mortgage fraud.

Detainee Defiantly Admits Charges (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

GUANTANAMO BAY NAVAL STATION, Cuba — The only indicted detainee mentioned in the Sept. 11 commission report made a defiant first appearance before the war crimes tribunal Thursday, vowing, "I'm going to make this easy." He said he had taken up arms against the United States and would proudly serve any sentence.

Ghassan Abdullah Al Sharbi denounced the tribunal and his detention as illegitimate and rejected the Navy lawyer assigned to represent him.

He declared himself ready to concede to — "I don't like the word confession," he said — all the accusations of conspiracy to commit terrorism that have been brought against him.

Appearing in the military commissions courtroom in tan prison garb, the 31-year-old Saudi insisted on serving as his own legal counsel, as have three more of the 10 charged suspects.

Sharbi, who holds a bachelor's degree in electrical engineering from Arizona's Embry-Riddle Aeronautics University and speaks fluent English, is charged with plotting with other Al Qaeda suspects to build remote-controlled explosive devices for use against U.S. forces who invaded Afghanistan a month after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Sharbi's name appears in a footnote of the Sept. 11 commission report to Congress, noting he was enrolled at Embry-Riddle when Al Qaeda was allegedly encouraging Muslim sympathizers to enroll in flight training in Arizona.

Although he is not accused of direct involvement in the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the report noted he had sworn allegiance to Osama bin Laden weeks earlier.

Little was known about the Saudi suspect before his appearance Thursday. He had refused until this week to meet with any attorney, and a transcript of his only other appearance in the tribunal process was released less than two months ago in a massive document dump by the Pentagon after a Freedom of Information Act court order.

"I did not come here to defend myself," Sharbi told the presiding officer in his case, Navy Capt. Daniel O'Toole. "I came in to tell you I did what I did and am willing to pay the price, no matter what it is. Even if I spend hundreds of years in jail , that would be an honor to me."

O'Toole observed that Sharbi is articulate and intelligent but ruled he is not qualified to serve as his own attorney.

Navy Lt. William C. Kuebler, assigned by the government to represent Sharbi, told O'Toole he had been advised by legal authorities in California, where he is licensed to practice law, that it would be an ethics violation for him to defend the accused against his wishes.

O'Toole said he would take under consideration Kuebler's motion on the ethics issue and his challenge to O'Toole's ruling that Sharbi can't represent himself.

Sharbi had refused until Sunday to meet with Kuebler, and the chief defense counsel, Marine Col. Dwight Sullivan, said his staff had no idea how Sharbi planned to present himself until he appeared Thursday morning.

Soft-spoken but imbued with a cut-to-the-chase impatience, Sharbi told the court: "I'm going to make this easy for you guys: I'm proud of what I did and there isn't any reason of hiding."

He said he was planning to testify that "I fought against the United States. I took up arms."

Questioned by O'Toole if he understood the tribunal's rules and procedures, Sharbi said he didn't, but promised to behave in the courtroom.

"I'm not going to be violent or cause trouble. I'm not going to make commotions," he said.

Asked if he was familiar with the tribunal's purpose, Sharbi remarked: "Same circus, different clown."

The defendant, with long, thinning hair and a full beard, sat with his hands folded throughout the preliminary proceedings after declining to have Kuebler speak on his behalf. He quoted the military attorney as saying he also considered the war crimes tribunal illegitimate and "a black eye" on the United States' image.

After O'Toole repeatedly queried the defendant about whether he would agree to be represented by any lawyer, Sharbi replied: "I understand and I advise you not to waste time with me on that point. It's my decision and I'm not going to change it."

Sharbi was arrested March 28, 2002, at an alleged Al Qaeda safe house in Faisalabad, Pakistan, along with two other charged detainees here, fellow Saudi Jabran Said bin Al-Qahtani and Algerian Sufyian Barhoumi.

In his Combatant Status Review Tribunal, a forum at which all 558 Guantanamo detainees appeared between July 2004 and January 2005, Sharbi denounced the United States as "the infidel against God" and deplored capitalism and homosexuality as evidence of U.S. society's perversions.

"May God help me fight the infidels or the unfaithful ones," he chanted at the end of the review hearing, according to a transcript recently released to the Associated Press after a Freedom of Information challenge. It was not clear from the documents when the hearing was held.

Ten of the 490 detainees now at Guantanamo have been charged with offenses. The chief prosecutor, Air Force Col. Morris Davis, said this week charges were expected soon against about two dozen others, including possible capital charges.

Another Pentagon official announced that 141 other detainees had been deemed eligible for release or transfer and would be departing the island.

Al Qaeda Wields Press As Terror Weapon, Report Finds (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

Terrorists use the press and public relations as weapons, said a study released Wednesday by Arizona State University.

"People are surprised the jihadis think of the media as a weapon," said Steven Corman, director of the school's Consortium for Strategic Communication and a Defense Department consultant on communications networks and counterterrorism.

His study analyzed almost 300 al Qaeda statements, letters and other documents, many of them captured during U.S. military actions in the Middle East and recently declassified by the Pentagon.

The report found that jihadist operations use consistent patterns of outreach that establish them socially and religiously, generate public sympathy and intimidate opponents. Threats, in fact, are part of terrorist "talking points."

"Jihadis pursue these strategies using sophisticated, modern methods of communications and public relations," Mr. Corman said. "There's evidence in the documents that jihadis segment audiences and adapt their message to the audience."

This week, audio and video messages from Osama bin Laden and Abu Musab Zarqawi were posted on the Internet and immediately picked up by international news organizations.

The report cites similar demonstrations as the "ideological machinery" of terrorist organizations, which maintain formal information committees and are adept at using print, broadcast and online resources on a global basis. The Internet provides such a promising terrorist forum that Mr. Corman suggests the United States create a permanent "geek battalion" to disrupt jihadist message boards and Web sites.

The United States monitors terrorist messages through clandestine agencies or within the State Department's Office of Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs. That office follows the objectives set forth by Undersecretary Karen Hughes: to "isolate and marginalize the violent extremists; confront their ideology of tyranny and hate;" and "undermine their efforts to portray the West as in conflict with Islam by empowering mainstream voices and demonstrating respect for Muslim cultures and contributions," the office's mission statement says.

Mr. Corman and co-author Jill Schiefelbein said the Arizona study is a response to "controversies about efforts by the U.S. to influence foreign media coverage of jihadi activities. ... While we deliberate such issues, the jihadis are busy executing a communications and media strategy of their own."

The authors worked closely with the Combating Terrorism Center, a research facility established in 2003 at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, N.Y.

Mr. Corman offered six measures to counter al Qaeda's media savvy. He recommended that the United States try to improve its credibility with Muslim audiences, "degrade" the jihadis' outreach efforts, draw attention to terrorist messages that contradict Islam, deconstruct idealized historical concepts, systematically disrupt Internet operations and seek assistance from sympathetic American Muslims.

PATRIOT ACT:

Legitimate Wiretap Helped Bag A Criminal (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

Your page-one article "Volatile Formula: How Patriot Act Helped Convict Man in Baby-Food Ring1" (April 4) unfairly characterized the prosecution of Samih Jammal and the application of evidence lawfully gathered under the Patriot Act.

The Patriot Act tore down the wall that existed between criminal and intelligence investigations, allowing agents to share information to prevent the sort of conspiracies that led to the catastrophic events of 9/11. Like any right-minded American, I welcome a fair discussion that raises concerns about the Patriot Act. But you attack its use by attempting to portray Mr. Jammal as a minor gray-marketeer or a "local grocery wholesaler."

Criticize the use of the Patriot Act if you so desire, but if you intend to use Mr. Jammal's case to do it, please bear these facts in mind:

A federal judge and jury found Mr. Jammal guilty of 20 felony counts of theft-related charges, including conspiracy, money laundering, false statements and illegal structuring of financial transactions. He was no struggling immigrant peddler trading dollar bills for baby formula on the gray market. At a sentencing hearing, the court found that Mr. Jammal's criminal enterprise led to retail losses estimated at $10 million and sentenced Mr. Jammal to 10 years in prison.

You also seem to suggest that Mr. Jammal should never have been the subject of an intelligence wiretap. Note that a U.S. District Court judge, sitting by designation to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, found probable cause that Mr. Jammal was acting as an agent of a foreign power or an agent of a foreign terrorist organization. At Mr. Jammal's request, another U.S. District Court judge, the trial court judge, reviewed the FISA court judge's decision, and affirmed the finding of probable cause.

Perhaps the biggest distortion was your failure to give a complete characterization of Hani Hanjour, a 9/11 hijacker whom Mr. Jammal admitted associating with as a matter of public record. You described Hani Hanjour as "one of the 9/11 hijackers" and as "a Saudi Arabian who was aboard the American Airlines jet that crashed into the Pentagon." According to the 9/11 Report, there were 64 people "aboard" American Airlines flight 77. Hani Hanjour was one of the five terrorists who took over the cockpit and the only one who piloted the plane into the Pentagon.

Prosecutors confront enormous logistical challenges when the government decides to use FISA evidence in a criminal case. That doesn't mean these challenges are insurmountable or that civil liberties and the procedural rights of criminal defendants can't be adequately protected.

Indeed, the Department of Justice, the defense bar and the courts have been navigating these logistical challenges in significant criminal cases for years, while at the same time keeping a weather eye out for liberty interests. Mr. Jammal's counsel had access to all of the FISA intercepts in this case. If any evidence supported Mr. Jammal's defense, it could have been presented at trial. Mr. Jammal's appellate counsel will have the same opportunity on appeal.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Official To Retire Shortly After Promotion (AP)

AP, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A senior FBI official is retiring less than a year after he took the bureau's top national security post.

Gary Bald will step down as head of the FBI's new National Security branch on June 2, ending a nearly 29-year career with the FBI, Director Robert Mueller said Thursday.

Mueller gave no reason for Bald's decision, but praised his leadership. Bald said the time was right to retire, "weighing our progress on implementation of the NSB as well as family considerations."

The National Security office brings counterintelligence, counterterrorism and intelligence operations under one umbrella. It was recommended last year by a presidential commission and adopted by President Bush.

Before Mueller and John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, jointly announced Bald's appointment in August, Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, urged them to turn to someone else.

Grassley was irked because Bald testified in a civil lawsuit that he had no counterterrorism experience when he moved to headquarters to oversee anti-terrorism strategy in 2003. Bald's deposition was among hundreds of pages of testimony in a suit by an Arab-American FBI agent that were obtained by The Associated Press.

"This is not a position for on-the-job training," Grassley said in a letter to Negroponte. "I wanted to make sure that you were aware of Mr. Bald's recent testimony about his background and expertise in counterterrorism."

Security & Terrorism FBI national security chief to quit (UPI)

UPI, April 28, 2006

The man who heads the new section of the FBI devoted to national security is retiring after nearly 30 years with the bureau.

Executive Assistant Director Gary Bald will step down on June 2, 2006, after just ten months in the new post, the FBI said in a statement Thursday.

Since August last year, Bald has headed up the National Security Branch of the FBI, which brings together its spy-catchers, counter-terror specialists and intelligence analysts. The branch was put together last year in response to the recommendations of the presidential commission that investigated U.S. intelligence failures in the run up to the Iraq invasion.

"Throughout his career, Gary has shown tremendous leadership, vision, and grace under pressure," said FBI Director Robert Mueller in the statement. "He has helped to shape the Bureau in important ways... I am pleased with the progress we have made under his leadership."

Mueller said the bureau would "move quickly to fill the important position" Bald was leaving.

Bald began his Bureau career in 1977 in the Laboratory Division. He led the internal investigation into the James "Whitey" Bulger corruption and misconduct case in Boston. He was Special Agent in Charge of the Baltimore Field Office from September 2002 until November 2003, overseeing the FBI's efforts in the Washington-area sniper investigation.

He was assistant director of the Counterterrorism Division and then the executive assistant director for counter-terrorism and counter-intelligence 2004-2005, before being selected to head the new National Security Branch last year.

In the statement, Bald said, "The decision to leave the Bureau after almost 29 years was a difficult one, but weighing our progress on implementation of the NSB as well as family considerations, I decided that now is a good time for the transition."

Sen. Specter Threatens To Block NSA Funds (WP)

By Laurie Kellman

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Noting that Congress holds the power of the purse, a frustrated Senate chairman threatened to try to block money for President Bush's domestic wiretapping program.

Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said Thursday he delivered a message to Bush that cut to the heart of the debate over executive power.

"I made the point that the president doesn't have a blank check," Specter said about their meeting Wednesday. "He didn't choose to engage me on that point."

Without a pledge from Bush to provide more information on the surveillance program, Specter filed an amendment to a spending bill Thursday that amounted to a warning to the White House.

The amendment would enact a "prohibition on use of funds for domestic electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence purposes unless Congress is kept fully and currently informed."

Specter also said he would turn the amendment into a bill and hold hearings.

"Institutionally, the presidency is walking all over Congress at the moment," Specter said. "If we are to maintain our institutional prerogative, that may be the only way we can do it."

Specter made clear that, for now, the threat was just that.

"I'm not prepared to call for the withholding of funds," he told reporters later.

"But I think that it is important to elevate the public consciousness as to what is going on," Specter said. "The four hearings we have had and the way the matter is drifting, in my view, is insufficient to safeguard civil liberties."

The move got the White House's attention, but not its immediate cooperation. Bush has insisted that the program falls within his authority and has refused to allow Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other officials to answer many of Specter's questions.

"The appropriate members of Congress have been and continue to be informed with respect to the Terrorist Surveillance Program," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said.

"The administration remains confident that a majority of members of Congress continue to recognize the importance of protecting Americans through lawful intelligence activities directed at terrorists," Perino said.

Specter said he hoped to jolt the public's awareness and "an inert Congress ... which has not stood up to the executive branch."

"You have a Congress which candidly is more concerned about re-election and fundraising and who controls the House and the Senate than about asserting constitutional prerogatives," Specter said. "That's not the way it ought to be. These are matters which require some active congressional action and that's what I'm looking toward."

For now, Specter said he will not bother having Gonzales return to the committee "because he won't tell us anything."

Threatening to withhold money from the wiretapping program is not unprecedented.

Democrats on the House Intelligence Committee tried to attach an amendment to the 2007 intelligence authorization bill to withhold money from the National Security Agency if the White House did not disclose information about the cost of the warrantless surveillance program.

The figure was given to a select group of members who have been briefed more fully on the NSA program, and is classified.

Wiretap Funding Cutoff Is Warned (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027140

WASHINGTON — The chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee said Thursday he might seek to block funding of a domestic eavesdropping program in an effort to force the Bush administration to answer lawmakers' questions about the operation.

In a warning to the White House, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said he planned to introduce legislation that would cut off funds for the surveillance program, which he described as a threat to civil liberties and a violation of domestic espionage laws.

Specter said he was not yet prepared to support a cutoff of funding, which he said would be a measure of last resort. But he warned that if the Bush administration was unwilling to comply with existing laws or help draft new domestic surveillance legislation, the only way for Congress to exercise any control might be to deny funding.

"What's the use of passing another statute if the president won't pay any attention to it?" Specter said. "When you talk about withholding funds, there you're talking about a real authority."

Specter offered a funding cutoff measure as an amendment to an emergency war spending bill, but said he did not intend to push for the amendment's passage. He said that measure could be converted into legislation that would provide an opportunity for congressional hearings.

A draft of a proposal circulated by Specter's office would prohibit the use of funds for domestic electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence purposes "unless Congress is kept fully and currently informed." In particular, the proposed bill would require the administration to brief all members of the House and Senate Intelligence and Judiciary committees.

To date, the White House has restricted such briefings to members of newly created subcommittees on the two intelligence panels.

The salvo from Specter underscores the tension between key Republicans in Congress and the Bush administration over the limits of presidential power in the war on terrorism.

The domestic surveillance program was launched in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, when President Bush authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop — without first obtaining court warrants — on the communications of U.S. residents. The White House has said that the eavesdropping is restricted to international calls between U.S. residents and individuals overseas who are suspected of having ties to the Al Qaeda terrorist network.

The program was kept secret from all but a handful of members of Congress until last year, when its existence was reported by the New York Times. The White House has argued that the president has the constitutional authority to approve such spying measures during wartime.

"The administration remains confident that a majority of members of Congress continue to recognize the importance of protecting Americans through lawful intelligence activities directed at terrorists," said Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman.

Many in Congress have rejected that argument and are pushing for an overhaul of espionage laws to subject the domestic surveillance program to greater outside scrutiny.

Specter has advocated legislation that would modify existing laws and require the government to obtain the approval of a special intelligence court. Another proposal, backed by Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio), would allow the government to bypass the special court in certain cases, but require disclosure to congressional intelligence subcommittees.

Specter said he had informed Bush of his intention to consider legislation that would deny funding for the program. Specter was particularly critical of Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales, saying that his testimony on the spying program before the Judiciary Committee had been so unresponsive that it would be pointless to call him to testify again.

Specter Wants More Debate On Spying (WP)

By Walter Pincus And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

New expressions of frustration over how little information the administration has shared about the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping on Americans flared yesterday in the Senate, one day after House Republicans barred amendments that would have expanded oversight of the controversial program.

Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said yesterday that he will file an amendment to block the NSA program's funding -- but said he will not seek a vote on it at this time -- in hope of stirring greater debate on the warrantless surveillance, part of the agency's monitoring of alleged terrorists.

"Where is the outrage?" asked Specter, who has chaired hearings that questioned the NSA program's constitutionality.

Questions about the legality of the NSA program and the Bush administration's refusal to brief the full intelligence panel on it led Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), ranking Democrat on the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, for the first time on Wednesday to vote against the annual intelligence authorization bill, which passed the House.

Harman, one of the few House members to receive briefings on the NSA program, said she believes in the program's approach but argued unsuccessfully on the floor Wednesday for a measure requiring greater congressional review.

"I do not support violating the law or the Constitution," she said. "Enhanced security without respect for law gives away the very values we are fighting to defend, and I believe that the program . . . can and must fully comply with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and with our Constitution."

The version of the fiscal 2007 Intelligence Authorization bill that passed the House contained no language on the NSA program. But lawmakers added provisions that could have an impact on the estimated $44 billion to be spent next year by the 16 agencies that make up the intelligence community, as well as the operations of Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte and his growing, one-year-old organization. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Congress created Negroponte's office to oversee and improve coordination of the intelligence agencies.

Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), chairman of the House intelligence committee, said Wednesday that his panel will be monitoring Negroponte's progress in restructuring the intelligence community and that "we would all like it to go faster because of the significant threats that we face as a nation." Although Hoekstra has been critical of the DNI in the past, he said the office "is beginning to bear fruit" and "incremental but real improvements have been made since the standup."

Harman expressed a gloomier view. She said Negroponte "has not taken command yet" of the intelligence community, "giving away authority to the Pentagon, which is happy to receive it, as it expands its own role in intelligence gathering abroad and here at home."

She added that "the CIA is in free fall," and that "300 years of experience have either been pushed out or left in frustration, and morale is dangerously low."

The committee took a step toward reining in Pentagon domestic intelligence activities. The Defense Department inspector general was directed to audit the activities of the Pentagon's newest and fastest-growing intelligence agency, the Counterintelligence Field Activity. Created four years ago, CIFA has been increasing authority to coordinate and direct intelligence collection involved in protection of Defense Department facilities at home and abroad.

An amendment by Rep. David E. Price (D-N.C.) that was approved goes after the increasing practice of agencies, particularly at the Pentagon, to contract out analysis and collection of intelligence.

CIFA officials, for example, have said they spend 70 percent of their budget -- the amount of which is classified -- on contractors. Under Price's amendment, the DNI would set regulations for the hiring and training of contractors, and provide an annual report of contracts above $1 million with a description of the activities and whether they are classified or unclassified programs.

Specter's concerns about the NSA program were also reflected in much of the House debate on the intelligence bill.

Harman and other Democrats were angry that Republicans on the House Rules Committee prevented a bipartisan amendment that would have required classified briefings on the NSA surveillance program, which includes listening to U.S. citizens, to all members of the House Intelligence and Judiciary committees. That proposal is similar to the one that Specter said he may soon introduce, although he would also include the parallel Senate panels.

At present, lawmakers on a limited number of House and Senate intelligence committees are briefed on the NSA program along with top leaders of the House and Senate.

At the White House yesterday, spokeswoman Dana Perino said: "The appropriate members of Congress have been and continue to be informed with respect to the terrorist surveillance program."

TSA Tries Bonuses To Retain Workers (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Transportation Security Administration will pay airport screeners up to a $1,000 bonus to entice them to stay at the turnover-plagued agency as it prepares for a summer of record air travel.

Roughly one in four screeners left last year, a rate nearly twice the rest of the federal workforce. Gale Rossides, an associate TSA administrator, said the bonuses are aimed at preventing a screener shortage during the upcoming peak travel months — when long lines could lead to higher security risks for travelers.

The TSA will spend $20 million to give most of the nation's 43,000 screeners $500 extra. The first bonus will be paid May 11 to screeners who've been on the job a year and who are deemed less likely to leave. Other screeners will get $500 for working through the summer.

Screeners will get a second $500 bonus if they work at “hard-to-hire” airports that have trouble filling vacancies.

“We understand the $500 may not be as much as some people want, but it is a commitment on our part to try to begin to invest in the workforce,” Rossides said.

The number of screeners at some checkpoints is “not sufficient for peak periods,” according to a report by the Government Accountability Office, Congress' investigative arm. Screeners are the front line of defense against smuggling weapons on planes.

The Air Transport Association projects the number of people taking flights this summer to increase from last summer's record of 206 million.

Screeners make $23,504 to $44,580 depending on experience and where they work. Rossides said many screeners leave in their first year as they struggle to adjust to fluctuating work schedules and a "hectic pace."

The bonus "isn't going to retain anybody," said Kimberly Kraynak, a $39,000-a-year screener at Pittsburgh International Airport. She called $500 "a joke."

Added Boston screener A.J. Castilla, who makes $37,064: "What will $500 mean? I could probably take a weekend off somewhere and de-stress a little."

The screener attrition rate grew to 24.5% from about 15% in 2003 when the TSA began to take over aviation security from private companies. Those companies, with turnover exceeding 100%, were criticized for using inexperienced screeners who missed weapons.

TSA chief Kip Hawley told screeners in an April 20 newsletter that the longer they stay on the job, "the higher the performance of their security duties will be." Hiring and training a new screener costs $12,000.

Los Angeles International Airport warned Hawley in an April 12 letter that it was losing 40 to 50 screeners a month and could be short 300 screeners out of 2,000 by August. That would create "significant security concerns" because passengers thronged in checkpoint lines would be a terrorist target, airport executive director Lydia Kennard and chairman Steven Holt wrote.

The Airports Council International is pushing TSA to hire laborers to speed up security lines by loading bags on belts and ushering passengers through queues.

Trade Group's Arm To Get TSA Contract (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- An airport trade group designated by Congress to handle background checks for two Transportation Security Administration programs has created a for-profit company that may do much of the work on its behalf.

If a provision in a Congressional spending bill stands, a transportation-worker identification program will be awarded without competitive bidding to the American Association of Airport Executives, which may assign it to its for-profit venture. In March, the AAAE joined with Daon Inc., a closely held company with expertise in handling biometric data, to create the Security Biometric Clearing Network. At least one other company placed a bid to join the venture. Neither officials from Daon nor the AAAE would disclose the amount of Daon's winning bid, but an official from another company that talked with the AAAE said the association was looking for about $15 million.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the AAAE established the Transportation Security Clearinghouse to expedite processing of background checks on airport workers. The group receives $7 from every $29 fee paid per job application and generally is credited with speeding up and improving the process. Last year, in an insert into a spending bill, Congress directed the TSA to use the clearinghouse as the central contractor for two programs in development.

Competitors said the AAAE shouldn't have an automatic right to the contract. "It's our hope that this earmark language will be carefully reviewed by Congress, with the intent of ensuring a fair and open competition," BearingPoint Inc., a management- and technology-consulting company in McLean, Va., said in a statement.

The Transportation Worker Identification Card program, which is slated to begin this summer, will require workers with access to secure areas of U.S. ports to undergo background checks and have biometric identity cards. TSA plans to start with nearly 400,000 longshoremen and maritime workers and eventually include 750,000 workers. A second program, Registered Traveler, will allow people who pay a fee and submit to background checks to use expedited security lines at airports.

The AAAE and Daon officials said the AAAE didn't guarantee that work from these programs would be funneled to the new company. The official from the rival firm said his company was explicitly told that the new venture would do the work of the existing clearinghouse. Daon Chief Executive Tom Grissen said he hopes that will be the case but has received no such promise. "The thought would be both AAAE and Daon would want the SBCN (the joint venture) to be successful," he said. Mr. Grissen said he is an officer of the venture but declined to specify what position he holds. Neither he nor the AAAE would say what positions are held by AAAE officials. Daon, of Reston, Va., is owned by Dermot Desmond, an Irish citizen.

An AAAE official said the company was formed to work with the clearinghouse. He said the association hoped that the new company could win contracts for credentialing programs in banking, financial services and other areas that the nonprofit association couldn't legally handle. "The only way to drive down costs is to increase volume," he said. The Bush administration opposes the congressional mandate that TSA use the clearinghouse, which is supported by Rep. Harold Rogers (R., Ky.), chairman of the House Appropriations Committee's homeland-security panel.

Trade Group Confirms Deal With Tiny Firm For ID Cards (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 27 — A small biometrics company, whose board includes former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge, stands to profit from a provision that a powerful Republican congressman wrote into budget law last year.

The law mandates that the Homeland Security Department hire a trade group, the American Association of Airport Executives and its Transportation Security Clearinghouse division, to manage what could turn into contracts together worth hundreds of millions of dollars for a new airport-security program and to issue tamperproof identification cards to millions of transportation workers.

Critics of the provision, written into an appropriation bill at the request of Representative Harold Rogers, the Kentucky Republican who is chairman of the House appropriations subcommittee that oversees domestic security, have questioned how the association, with little experience in high-technology secure identifications and biometrics, could handle such a task.

An executive at the association confirmed in a meeting and conference call among industry officials on Thursday that its clearinghouse had a partnership agreement with Daon, a biometrics company in Dublin, Ireland, according to a transcript of the meeting.

"The partnership with Daon, which is an operational one and related to the clearinghouse, it is really in the interest of making this program successful," said Carter Morris, senior vice president at the airport group, according to the transcript of the call.

The disclosure outraged other potential bidders for the work.

"It is very bad public policy to have an earmark that steers critical aspects of this key national security program to a private organization," said Walter G. Hamilton, chairman of the International Biometric Industry Association.

Daon, backed by Dermot Desmond, one of Ireland's most well-known entrepreneurs, identified landing business with the Homeland Security Department as a crucial corporate strategy nearly three years ago. The company, which has an office in Reston, Va., was a co-sponsor last year of an airport-security conference and a golf outing in Ireland organized by the American Association of Airport Executives. Mr. Rogers attended the conference, a trip paid by the airport group. Mr. Rogers has a long association with the group, receiving thousands of dollars in contributions for his election campaigns over the years and taking other trips to its annual meetings in Hawaii and California.

Mr. Ridge, while homeland security secretary, promoted using technology that relied on fingerprints, the eye iris or face shapes to confirm identities. Since he left the department in February 2004, he has advised companies in related businesses, including Savi Technology, which makes high-tech ship container-security devices.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Ridge, S. Michele Nix, confirmed that he was on the Daon board. She added that Mr. Ridge was not even aware of the language in question being written into the appropriation bill.

The chief executive officer at Daon, Thomas A. Grissen, did not reply on Thursday to messages on his voice mail and with staff members in Reston.

Biometrics is a fast-growing field filled with many small venture-capital-based companies like Daon that are furiously competing for a chunk of the billions of dollars in potential domestic security contracts.

The Transportation Worker Identification Credential program and a separate program, Registered Traveler, which allows airline passengers to move faster than normal through security checkpoints, are two of the biggest targets for those companies. The provision arranged by Mr. Rogers mandates that the Homeland Security Department hire the aviation group for the "purposes of collecting and aggregating biometric data necessary for background vetting; providing all associated record keeping, customer service, and related functions" for both contracts.

Mr. Rogers said he had added the mandate because the aviation group proven in the last four years that it could help the government with security-related background checks for airport workers. The Homeland Security Department is at least two years behind in introducing similar check for other transportation workers, including those at ports.

"There is absolutely no reason to waste more time and money reinventing the wheel," Mr. Rogers said Wednesday, in explaining the mandate, which the Homeland Security Department and others in the Bush administration opposed. His spokeswoman, Leslie Cupp, did not respond to a request for comment on Thursday.

Other biometrics companies are seeking to have the provision rescinded or removed in the budget bill this year.

Conspiracy Film Rewrites Sept. 11 (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, April 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027144

Gypsy Taub, a mother of three from Oakland, does not believe that 9/11 happened. At least not the way the government said it did.

A Russian émigré, Taub is one of a growing number of people in the USA who are using the Internet, college campuses and pamphleteering to get the word out.

“Oh yeah, absolutely. On the day it happened, I thought it was the government that did it,” she said.

Taub is promoting one of the latest presentations of revisionist theories on the al-Qaeda terrorist attacks in 2001, a film that says, among other things, that the Pentagon was hit by a cruise missile fired by the military as an excuse to go to war.

Called Loose Change, it is being downloaded from the Internet and shown in small screenings here and overseas. It is not alone in the genre, and it is not unusual in American history either to offer simplistic explanations or demonize opponents. Presidents from Andrew Jackson to Lyndon Johnson were accused by their contemporaries of massive government conspiracies.

The film appears especially popular among young people immersed in a Web culture brimming with sites that question the credibility of government. They see 9/11 as the defining moment of their lives.

“This is our generation's Vietnam, our generation's Kennedy assassination," says Korey Rowe, 23, the film's producer.

Professors and researchers of film and politics say the Internet is making it far easier to spread such theories because the traditional media are losing their hold on the news. The immense coverage of controversies and accusations surrounding the war on terror has created fertile ground for people who assign their own interpretations to photos, footage, eyewitnesses, investigations and newspaper accounts of what happened, they say.

“The information revolution now gives us access to too much information,” says Jonathan Taplin, who teaches at the Annenberg School for Communications at the University of Southern California. “Our problems are that we're just overwhelmed, so in some sense we just basically don't even know where to turn."

Craig Smith, director of the Center for First Amendment Studies at California State University, Long Beach, cites the unusual nature of 9/11: four airliners simultaneously hijacked and no defenses stop them.

“You would say, come on, I can't even buy that as a movie script,” Smith says. “All of this feeds this readiness for paranoia.”

Made by Rowe and friend Dylan Avery, 22, from Oneonta, N.Y., on a laptop computer for less than $10,000, the film contrasts sharply with United 93, a film opening today that portrays the struggle for the jetliner that crashed in Shanksville, Pa.

Internet chat rooms are full of promos for screenings of Loose Change in such locales as the Santa Cruz Veterans Memorial Building in California; the Université de Sherbrooke, Quebec; Graz, Austria; and a theater in London's Soho district.

“It's been breaking like nobody's business the last two months," says Taub, 36, who is sponsoring a showing Tuesday night in Oakland. “It's all over the place."

Most of what the film alleges is refuted by the evidence at hand. Anything not answered definitively by the government is interpreted by the film as proof of a coverup.

Among the assertions in Loose Change is that a missile hit the Pentagon even though eyewitnesses saw the jet, numerous pieces of wreckage were found including the flight recorder, and those on the flight and in its path at the Pentagon are dead.

There is also the claim that because jet fuel burns at up to 1,500 degrees and steel melts at 2,750 degrees, the World Trade Center's infrastructure could not have been brought down by the airliners. However, as reported by the Journal of the Minerals, Metals and Materials Society, steel loses 50% of its strength at 1,200 degrees, enough for a failure.

“The only thing they (the filmmakers) seem to have gotten right about the Sept. 11 attacks is the date when they occurred," says Debra Burlingame, whose brother was the pilot of American Flight 77 that crashed into the Pentagon.

“They aren't truth-tellers looking to save the world,” she says. “They're con artists hoping to sucker conspiracy-theory paranoids or anti-government malcontents into shelling out their hard-earned dollars."

Some college students who saw Loose Change and are promoting it say it's good to raise questions.

The movie “at the very least suggests that we don't know the whole truth, and that some things are quite fishy," says Matt Latham, a freshman at the University of California, Santa Cruz.

Christian Pecaut, 25, a Stanford graduate who is promoting the film at the University of California, Berkeley campus, said the film is “catchy, hip,” with an “upbeat soundtrack.”

Aaron Williams, a senior at Texas A&M University and president of the philosophy club, believes the film. “Government is corrupt and absolute power corrupts absolutely,” he says.

Penelope Price, a documentary filmmaker and professor at Scottsdale Community College, said she brought the filmmakers to the campus to stimulate critical thinking.

“Students love it," she said. “These guys have done a great job of marketing on the Web, and that was another reason I wanted to bring them in."

DOJ_NMG_0027145

Conservative writer David Horowitz, a former 1960s radical, says conspiratorial thinking can offer a world view that is somehow less scary than reality. “Conspiracy theories are a kind of secular religion," he says, adding that campus faculties sometimes encourage anti-government feelings. “People feel great anxiety … by the thought that nobody's in control."

People believe in conspiracy theories because the truth “is either too simple or too remote," says sociologist Clifton Bryant of Virginia Tech University, who has made a study of “deviant logic" and behavior.

“We're always ready to believe something about which we know nothing," he says.

When Hollywood Makes History (WP)

By Paul Farhi

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

"United 93," Hollywood's first big-budget film about the events of Sept. 11, 2001, is faithful to the major aspects of the tragic morning it depicts. The movie tracks the key events detailed in the 9/11 Commission Report, the most definitive source on the subject: the commandeering of the United jet by four terrorists, the panic of the passengers and the heroic rebellion that ended with the plane crashing in a field near Shanksville, Pa.

But the movie, which opens nationwide today, is a dramatic re-creation that includes scenes and images that go far beyond what is known about the attacks.

Those scenes raise questions: How far can a dramatic movie go in imposing its own reality before it distorts the public's understanding of the event? And with memories of 9/11 still vivid and raw, is it too soon for such films to be made?

The questions have special relevance as film producers prepare other 9/11-related projects. Oliver Stone, who portrayed the assassination of John F. Kennedy as the result of a conspiracy in "JFK," is the director of this summer's "World Trade Center." Sony Pictures, meanwhile, is developing the film "102 Minutes," based on the bestseller about the time span between the first tower's crash and its collapse. A TV miniseries based on the 9/11 Commission Report is also in the works.

"United 93's" director, Paul Greengrass, has said he sought to create the "plausible truth" of what happened, given that many details are unknown.

The film asserts that the hijackers' intended target was the Capitol. In one scene, Ziad Jarrah, the Lebanese terrorist who piloted the plane, props a picture of the building on the cockpit's console, imposing a cinematic answer to a question that the 9/11 Commission could not resolve: whether the terrorists were trying to hit the Capitol or the White House. Investigators said that point was a source of contention among the 9/11 plotters, with Osama bin Laden favoring a strike on the White House and others, including Mohamed Atta, favoring the Capitol.

"United 93" also suggests that the terrorists killed the pilot and co-pilot, for example, but what occurred is unclear. A United 93 flight recorder picked up the terrorists ordering someone repeatedly to "sit down" and discussing whether to "bring the pilot back" late in the hijacking.

"United 93" also shows the passengers breaching the cockpit with a beverage cart and wrestling the terrorists for control as the plane plummets. Although the 9/11 report states that the passengers fought back in the flight's final moments, the commission had no indication that the passengers entered the cockpit. The report suggests the opposite: "The hijackers remained at the controls but must have judged that the passengers were only seconds from overcoming them."

Universal Pictures, the film's distributor, says researchers consulted numerous sources, including the 9/11 Commission Report, military and civilian aviation authorities, and more than 100 family members and friends of the victims. The movie's advisers included Ben Sliney, who headed the Federal Aviation Administration's Command Center in Herndon on Sept. 11; Sliney portrays himself in the film.

Lloyd Levin, a "United 93" co-producer, acknowledges that the film went beyond known facts about the flight, but he justifies the movie's approach as artistically necessary. "Our mandate was not the same as the 9/11 Commission Report," Levin said. "Our mandate was to what Paul wanted to say with this movie. We're not journalists. Paul is an artist."

He called some of the questionable depictions "choices we had to make." Whether the passengers actually breached the cockpit is "a moot point, because at that point you're in the area of metaphor," he said.

Those choices might satisfy moviegoers but they rankle those interested in a more literal portrait of the events of Sept. 11.

"I would prefer history tell itself, rather than have Hollywood tell it," said Carie Lemack, whose mother, Judy Larocque, was killed on American Airlines Flight 11, the first plane to hit the World Trade Center. "There's so much we just don't know. Unfortunately, they're taking artistic license with history and people will believe it's accurate. Speculation is okay for drama, but it's less okay when it's purporting to tell history. If they didn't know, why didn't they just leave it out?"

Lemack, co-founder of the organization Families of September 11, has not seen the movie, but she says she was surprised and upset by its trailer and promotional poster, which shows smoke pouring from the World Trade Center towers. She also says the filmmakers missed an opportunity to spur moviegoers to find out more about terrorism and call them to action. (Universal will donate 10 percent of the movie's first weekend ticket sales to a memorial fund.)

The decision to counterattack the terrorists was made after passengers learned that other hijacked planes had crashed, according to the 9/11 report and the film. In addition to the cockpit recordings, eyewitness accounts came from crew members and passengers, who used cellphones and air phones to contact people on the ground. But those accounts were sometimes contradictory and fragmentary, and the 9/11 Commission acknowledged that many details never will be known.

Levin acknowledges that in dramatizing the course of the flight, "United 93" makes creative leaps to fill in the blanks. For example, it's not clear who among the passengers spearheaded the response to the terrorists. One passenger, in a phone call from the plane, left it vague: "Everyone's running up to first class. I've got to go. Bye." The 9/11 Commission could not identify whose voices are heard as the passengers storm the cockpit door. "United 93" tackles this uncertainty with a reasonable assumption: that the charge was led by the strongest, most athletic men, including a judo champion.

Other scenes appear to be wholly invented. In one, a passenger who argued for cooperating with the hijackers is restrained by others as the counterattack begins. In another, the passengers are shown overwhelming two hijackers and apparently killing them. Both depictions might be dramatically satisfying, but there's no evidence that either of those events occurred.

Many of the victims' immediate relatives have endorsed the movie, saying it fairly represents their final hours. David Beamer, whose son Todd Beamer was killed, told the Associated Press this week: "Our personal reaction was one of relief, because they got it right. When it comes to September 11 and United Flight 93, we don't need another movie. This one got it."

But others question whether it was necessary to make even one movie about an event that many have lived through.

Bruce Hoffman, a Washington-based counterterrorism expert with the Rand Corp., notes that the news media have long avoided replaying some of the more disturbing images of Sept. 11. But, he says: "These equally horrible events are now being depicted as entertainment. I don't know why that's more acceptable.

"Producers and directors can have the purest and best intentions to re-create the horror and tragedy and bravery of the passengers. But the bottom line is, it's still entertainment. You have to question whether making it into entertainment cheapens and demeans it."

How Not To Treat Friends (WP)

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

CONGRESS tightened a law last year on refugee admissions in order (it thought) to keep terrorists and their supporters out of the country. The effect has been to bar friends and allies.

One example: Many Vietnamese Montagnards fought alongside U.S. forces during the Vietnam War and were then murderously oppressed by the Vietnamese government. During the war, the United States helped arm a Montagnard group called the United Front for the Liberation of Oppressed Races, which continued to struggle for autonomy after the war ended. This group ceased to exist in 1992, when a band of nearly 400 fighters disarmed and were resettled in North Carolina. Under Congress's irrational new rules, however, the group has become, legally speaking, a terrorist organization, and 11 Montagnards still stuck in Cambodia would be denied refugee status because in the past they had offered the group "material support."

The Montagnards are not the law's only, or even principal, victims. Thousands of ethnic victims of the Burmese military regime, living in camps in Thailand, expected after long waits to receive refugee status; now they're stuck in limbo. So are large numbers of Colombians who were forced to support the leftist rebels of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia. Liberians, Somalis and anti-Castro Cuban dissidents are also being branded terrorists and kept out.

Misguided law now prevents the admission of a member or backer of any group of "two or more individuals" that "engages in, or has a subgroup which engages in," activities as commonplace as using an "explosive, firearm or other weapon or dangerous device." The law treats a Montagnard who once aided a U.S.-backed group no differently from an al-Qaeda operative. The administration has the authority to override this absurdity in certain instances, though not all. But it has not used this limited power, and even the need for a waiver is galling. America should not be "forgiving" people who did not, in fact, support terrorism. These are victims -- exactly the sort of people refugee and asylum programs are meant to protect.

An amendment being offered to the supplemental appropriations bill by Sens. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) would solve the problem cleanly. It would clarify that only associates and supporters of groups certified by the government as terrorist organizations should be denied refugee status and that those forced to aid terrorists are not themselves terrorists. Congress did not mean to create this problem. Fixing it should not be controversial.

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Spending Probe Expands To Security Forces (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

The Bush administration's special investigator for Iraq reconstruction has expanded inquiries into how the U.S. military is training and equipping the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF), according to an internal Pentagon memo.

Special Inspector General Stuart W. Bowen Jr. asked the Pentagon for reams of documents on the billions of dollars spent to create an Iraqi army, police, border patrol, navy and air force, the memo shows.

Some Pentagon officials say privately that the inspector is overstepping his mandate by probing U.S. military operations in addition to reconstruction dollars. But the chief spokesman for Mr. Bowen said security and reconstruction are intertwined.

"There is Iraq relief and reconstruction money that is for security and that is in our mandate," said spokesman James P. Mitchell. "There has been an American investment in the security and justice sectors, and we have an obligation to look at that."

Mr. Mitchell said Mr. Bowen has been seeking more documents from the Pentagon. An April memo signed by a senior Pentagon official confirms he will receive them. "We needed to get that high level of support, and we have that," he said.

Congress created, and President Bush appointed, the special inspector general to provide critically needed oversight on $24 billion in U.S. funds and billions of dollars in Iraq oil money being used to rebuild Iraq after the 2003 ousting of Saddam Hussein. Mr. Bowen's reports and audits mostly have dealt with water, electricity, oil and infrastructure projects that are considered crucial if Iraq is to emerge as a functioning democracy.

Just as important is the U.S. nurturing of the ISF, which now numbers about 250,000. Withdrawing about 132,000 American troops in Iraq is dependent on the ISF's ability to fight the deadly insurgency largely on its own.

Mr. Mitchell said the inspector general has looked at ISF issues, but the new Pentagon data will allow for a closer examination.

The Pentagon memo to Mr. Bowen vouched for SIGIR, the acronym for Mr. Bowen's office. "The Department of Defense fully supports SIGIR's work in support of the Iraqi reconstruction effort," said the memo, signed by William R. Marriott, executive secretary in the office of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Mr. Bowen has submitted a request for documents in three areas: the creation of the ISF, the building of security facilities, and what is called "capacity building" in the new ministries of Interior and Defense, the Marriott memo said. The memo was a response to an April 4 letter from Mr. Bowen.

On the ISF request, the Pentagon response was that Mr. Bowen should rely on the quarterly reports it provided to Congress.

"The report provides extensive information on the objectives for training and equipping Iraq's security forces, the metrics for measuring their progress and amplifying data," Mr. Marriott stated. "Because the report provides metrics and data specifically requested by Congress, it should be sufficient for purposes of writing your quarterly report."

The memo said the Pentagon's Defense Reconstruction Support Office will supply information on building bases for the ISF, but that the Pentagon is unaware of any U.S. funds for Interior or Defense capacity building.

To some in the Pentagon, Mr. Bowen's request for ISF documents is a foray into areas Congress never authorized. They characterized Mr. Marriott's response as reserved.

"This is further evidence that SIGIR is overreaching," said a senior defense official, who asked not to be identified because he is not authorized to speak for the Pentagon. "Congress never intended him to investigate all these things."

This same official has been critical of some of SIGIR's draft reports because officials become tied up with correcting them instead of focusing on reconstruction.

Mr. Mitchell said most draft findings come back with the notation "concur." He said Mr. Bowen's reports and recommendations have resulted in improved use of taxpayer money.

"We're focusing on all the sectors, but because it's so important and we have identified and talked about the 'reconstruction gap,' which was a function of moving money into security and putting more money into security, it's kind of hard to report on what the U.S. is doing in Iraq without looking at security," Mr. Bowen said.

The gap refers to the difference between the number of construction projects originally planned and the number built, which was reduced because money was shifted to security.

'Grand Mafiosi' Corrupting Iraq's Oil Sector (WT)

By Jim Muir, London Daily Telegraph

DOJ_NMG_0027148

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A new class of "grand mafiosi" is sucking billions of dollars out of Iraq's vital oil sector and crippling efforts to rebuild the nation, according to an official report published in Baghdad.

The findings of the Oil Ministry's inspector-general paint a sordid picture of corruption pervading every corner of the industry, from the oil wells to the gasoline pump.

The report says that since Saddam Hussein's overthrow in 2003, the spread of smuggling had turned Iraq from a major exporter of petroleum products into an importer.

"These problems have led to the loss of billions of dollars, both in direct actual losses and in lost opportunities," according to the report.

"This is robbing Iraq of historic opportunities for revival and reconstruction and of basic necessities for a ruined nation and heavily burdened people."

The report calls for "radical and urgent action" to stop the abuses and punish those involved, including new legislation and penalties to make oil smuggling a crime of "grand economic sabotage."

Walid Khadduri, economics editor of the pan-Arab al-Hayat newspaper, estimates that smuggling and other rackets in Iraq are costing the country more than $18 billion a year in direct losses and missed opportunities.

"There is no accountability, no punishment and it goes all the way to the top -- the smuggling gangs are in cahoots with local authorities and politicians because they need protection," he said. "There was corruption under Saddam, but nowhere near this."

The ministry report says smuggling has created a "new class of grand mafiosi" and that a corrosive environment of corruption is affecting everybody in the oil business and destroying public faith in politicians.

The report documents abuses ranging from direct theft from oil consignments and pipelines, to fraud involving false documentation for imported oil.

Even roadside supplies of black-market gasoline sold locally were worth an estimated $900 million a year to the illegal profiteers, according to the report.

The report estimates that 10 percent to 20 percent of the refined products that Iraq now is obliged to import from neighboring Turkey, Syria and Jordan are being smuggled back to their countries of origin after receiving Iraqi government subsidies to bring the price down for local consumption.

Part of the problem is that product prices in those countries are significantly higher than Iraqi levels, which are government-subsidized to the tune of about $7 billion a year to keep them within reach of the distressed Iraqi consumer.

Iraqi Official Expects Start Of U.S. Exit, With A Big Pullout This Year (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- A senior Iraqi official said there would be a substantial withdrawal of U.S. troops this year, with the rest leaving within the next two years.

Speaking to senior U.S., Iraqi and British security officials, Iraqi National Security Adviser Mowaffak Rubaie said the Iraqi government was working to formalize a "conditions-based transition agreement" with the U.S. that would govern the pace and scope of a U.S. military withdrawal from the country. Such an agreement would detail a timeline for turning U.S. military facilities over to the Iraqis and leaving Iraqi forces with primary security responsibility for growing portions of the country.

"Certainly at the end of the year there is going to be a sizable gross reduction in U.S. troops," Mr. Rubaie said as he stood beside Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. "At the end of next year, we will hope, or the next couple of years, we will hope that most of the coalition forces will go back home safely."

Mr. Rumsfeld declined to comment on the timing of a drawdown of the 132,000 U.S. troops, as did his aides. During his visit to Iraq, Mr. Rumsfeld has declined to address the possibility of a withdrawal, but other U.S. commanders have confirmed that one is likely to begin this year.

Mr. Rubaie's comments are consistent with statements he has made since the beginning of the year, but both Iraqis and Americans agreed that big troop reductions wouldn't be possible until a new government was installed. Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. military commander in Iraq, said Wednesday that the selection of a Shiite prime-minister nominee, which helped break months of political paralysis over the makeup of Iraq's next government, sets the stage for the beginning of a U.S. military withdrawal.

Although Gen. Casey declined to specify how many troops are likely to be withdrawn, some Defense Department officials privately have spoken of cutting this year the U.S. presence by as many as 30,000.

DOJ_NMG_0027149

Speaking to U.S. reporters Wednesday, Gen. J. D. Thurman, whose forces have primary responsibility for the Baghdad area, said he has ordered his soldiers to allow Iraqi forces to take the lead whenever possible during searches of buildings, offices or mosques in the city.

Top Iraqi Ayatollah Urges Action To Rein In Militias (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Saad Sarhan

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, April 27 -- Iraq's most revered Shiite Muslim cleric urged Prime Minister-designate Nouri al-Maliki in a meeting Thursday to deal quickly with sectarian militias blamed for widespread killings, and to ensure that Iraqi police and soldiers remain loyal to the country and not to political factions.

Wading into what has emerged as the first major issue facing Maliki, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani said it had "become necessary to have weapons only in the hands of government forces," according to a statement released by his office.

The government must also "rebuild these forces on sound, patriotic bases so that their allegiance shall be to the homeland alone, not to any other political or other groups," Sistani told Maliki, who was chosen by a coalition of Shiite religious parties. The two men met Thursday in the southern city of Najaf, home to Iraq's Shiite clerical leaders.

Shiite militias such as the Mahdi Army, led by the firebrand cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, and the Badr Organization, which is tied to Iraq's largest political party, dominate many Iraqi police and army units and have been accused by Sunni Arab leaders and U.S. officials of operating death squads.

Maliki also met on Thursday with Sadr, who gave a noncommittal answer when asked at a news conference afterward about plans to disband militias.

"In fact, all the factions which are inside or outside the government converge in the interest and service of the Iraqi people," said Sadr, whose Mahdi Army clashed with U.S. forces in 2004 and has been the target of a recent series of raids in Baghdad and southern Iraq.

Also on Thursday, a roadside bomb attack against an Italian army convoy in Nasiriyah, about 200 miles south of Baghdad, killed three Italian soldiers and one from Romania, Italian officials announced. Romano Prodi, who will head Italy's next government, said the killings would not expedite a planned withdrawal of the more than 2,500 Italian troops in Iraq.

"We won't fly away. Of course we shall work in Iraq for peace in order to help reconstruction," he said at a news conference in Rome, according to the Associated Press, which reported that 27 Italian soldiers have died in Iraq, including 19 in the bombing of a barracks in 2003.

Two insurgent groups asserted responsibility for the attacks in Internet postings -- the Islamic Army in Iraq and the Imam Hussein Brigades. Neither claim could be immediately verified.

Maliki and U.S. officials in Baghdad have said one of the new government's top priorities should be dealing with the armed groups -- perhaps by incorporating their members into the security forces on an individual basis -- though no detailed plan has been announced.

Asked Thursday who would be named to head the country's security ministries, which U.S. officials have said should be put beyond the control of politicians with ties to militias, Maliki said the posts "would be given to independent members, but it's not definite yet."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who visited Iraq this week along with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, said the establishment of a new Iraqi government after months of haggling over the prime minister's post would pave the way for enacting policies to stem militia violence.

Sadr called the visit by the American cabinet secretaries "a flagrant interference in Iraqi affairs."

Shiite militias now rival Iraq's Sunni Arab-led insurgency as the country's top security threat, U.S. officials say. But a military spokesman in Baghdad said Thursday that the solutions to the two threats would be different.

"The only way we can deal with Zarqawi or al-Qaeda is to kill or capture them," Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch said. "We believe there are other ways to solve the militia problem. . . . The solution to the militia problem is, indeed, a political solution."

Elsewhere in Iraq on Thursday, police in and around Baqubah, about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, repelled attacks on several police stations and road checkpoints, killing 19 insurgents and capturing 25 others, according to Maj. Gen. Ghassan Abbas Bawi, police commander in Diyala province.

At least 10 police officers were also killed in the clashes, which sparked a series of evening raids by security forces in the southern part of the city, which has been hit by a large number of attacks in recent weeks. Police also announced a province-wide curfew Friday from 6 a.m. to 4 p.m.

Iraq's New Premier Gains Support In Talks With Shiite Leaders (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0027150

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, April 27 — Hours after ending two days of meetings with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, the Iraqi prime minister-designate, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, traveled to the Shiite holy city of Najaf to meet with two of the powers he must now contend with, the Shiite leaders Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and Moktada al-Sadr.

Violence cast a shadow on the meetings, with the drive-by killing in Baghdad of the sister of Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi and the deaths of one Romanian and three Italian soldiers near Nasiriya, which spurred calls from some Italian political leaders to speed up the withdrawal of the country's 2,600 remaining troops in Iraq.

In his meeting with Ayatollah Sistani, Mr. Maliki won a statement from the religious leader calling for an end to militias and urging that the Iraqi security forces be freed from the grip of sectarian and political dominance. "Weapons should be carried only by government forces" loyal to the government and not to leaders of political or other groups, the ayatollah said.

It was a firm message of support for Mr. Maliki, who said on Thursday that he believed he could complete the selection of his cabinet within a week. Mr. Maliki, with prodding from the United States ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, has made a priority of reducing the influence of the militias that have helped push Iraq to the brink of civil war.

Sunni Arab leaders say that hundreds of young Sunni men who have been found murdered with drill holes in their limbs or head or other signs of torture are the victims of Shiite death squads often wearing official police or security forces uniforms.

But making a dent in the militias' influence will be difficult to accomplish, as some elements of the Iraqi Army and security forces are already dominated by members loyal to one militia or another.

Indeed, in a demonstration of the balancing act Mr. Maliki must perform both as prime minister and as leader of a fractious Shiite coalition, he met next with Mr. Sadr, the anti-American cleric who oversees the militia known as the Mahdi Army, thousands of young Shiite men who control northeastern Baghdad and have fought fierce battles with the American military.

Mr. Maliki was careful not to offend Mr. Sadr, perhaps the most influential single force in the Shiite coalition, suggesting that militias deserve to remain an influence, even if only from within the military.

"Merging the militias into the military," Mr. Maliki said, "is not to disrespect them but to reward them for their role in the struggle against dictatorship," a reference to fighting by Kurdish and Shiite forces against Saddam Hussein. "And it is a solution to the problem of having weapons outside the government."

Mr. Maliki also pledged to name nonsectarians to run the Iraqi Interior and Defense Ministries.

Mr. Maliki's political pilgrimage to Najaf came as Baghdad residents were reminded that even the most powerful Iraqi leaders cannot protect family members from the savage violence here.

Mr. Hashemi's sister was shot dead in a morning rush-hour ambush near her home. Her death came only two weeks after the murder of Mr. Hashemi's brother, and served as another indication of how insurgents are intent on terrorizing leaders of the new government. While government leaders are heavily guarded, their families are often easier targets.

Mr. Hashemi's sister, Maysoon al-Hashemi, 61, who was director of women's affairs in her brother's Iraqi Islamic Party, was buried a few hours later. Co-workers recalled how bravely she took the news that her brother Mahmoud had been assassinated on April 13.

Inside the Green Zone on Thursday, an American military spokesman offered an optimistic view of the situation in Iraq, saying the country was "moving away" from civil war.

"All indications now are the acts of violence — ethnosectarian violence is decreasing," Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch said at a news briefing. He cited a 60 percent decrease in casualties in Baghdad in the week starting April 16 compared with the previous week. Yet he also acknowledged that casualties had soared by 90 percent in the past 10 weeks, since before the bombing of the Askariya Shrine in Samarra in late February set off a wave of sectarian violence.

Other newly released American government findings cast Iraq's situation in even less positive terms. The Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, reported that attacks against American-led forces, Iraqis and infrastructure increased 23 percent from 2004 to 2005.

"The insurgency intensified through October 2005 and has remained strong and resilient since then," the G.A.O. said in a 31-page report. "Many Iraqis in Baghdad and the central and northern Sunni areas have lost confidence in the Iraqi Army and police to improve the security situation. In some Sunni areas, support for the insurgents has increased, and Iraqi Shias have expressed greater confidence in their militias."

The G.A.O. also found that in contrast to past assertions that four provinces were facing serious problems, six were in "serious" shape and one was "critical." The finding was based on a study by the military and American Embassy in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0027151

Before leaving Iraq, Ms. Rice and Mr. Rumsfeld voiced support again for Mr. Maliki as a strong leader who could re-establish confidence in the government, while Iraq's national security adviser, Dr. Muwaffak al-Rubaie, suggested there could be a large reduction in American troops by 2007.

Powerful Iraqi Cleric Call For Disarmament (LAT)

By Bruce Wallace And Saad Fakhrildeen

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

NAJAF, Iraq — Reaching across a sectarian divide, Iraq's highest-ranking Shiite Muslim cleric called on militias to disarm today, saying only government forces should be permitted to carry weapons on the streets.

Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the Iranian-born religious leader regarded as the Shiite majority's most powerful moral voice, also urged Iraqis to form a government blind to religious and ethnic differences.

"Weapons must be in the hands of government security forces that should not be tied to political parties but to the nation," said a statement of remarks released by Sistani's office in the Shiite holy city of Najaf.

"The first task for the government is fighting insecurity and putting an end to the terrorist acts that threaten innocents with death and kidnapping."

Leaders of Iraq's Sunni minority have claimed to be under siege from marauding gangs of Shiite gunmen, some alleged to be working within the government's own security forces.

Sistani's statement followed a visit to his home in Najaf by Prime Minister-designate Nouri Maliki. The new Iraqi leader came to pay political homage to Sistani while in the midst of trying to form a government acceptable to all of Iraq's fractious political parties, some of whose claim to power is backed by heavily armed militias.

The new leader is getting plenty of advice as he works to pull a government together.

Many here worry Maliki may be forced to fill key government posts according to a sectarian formula for sharing power across the spectrum of Shiite, Sunni, Kurdish and secular parties.

Avoiding a government with sectarian hues was the main subject of discussions between Maliki and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice during her visit, along with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, to Baghdad this week. Rice left for Bulgaria later today, telling reporters in the heavily guarded Green Zone she was convinced Maliki and his advisors were committed to appointing ministers based on competence.

"Obviously, the key now is to get the government up and running, to get ministers who are capable and who also will reflect the value of a national unity government, and then to get about the work of dealing with the security situation, dealing with the economic situation," she said, according to news agencies.

But it was the unusually direct political intervention from Sistani that rang loudest here. The cleric is regarded as the voice of Shiite moderation, though he prefers to exercise his influence through subtle backroom whispers. Last week, it was a nudge from Sistani that contributed to the decision by interim Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari to abandon his quest to keep the top job in the face of great opposition.

Sistani was more direct today. Maliki emerged from their meeting to tell reporters that the cleric had "advised us, as always, to be Iraqis first."

Maliki also said his government would merge militias into the legitimate state security forces, a proposal that challenges the power of some of his own strongest backers, notably radical cleric Muqtada Sadr.

The two men held a joint news conference in which Sadr denounced the Rice-Rumsfeld visit for "its blatant interference in Iraqi affairs," repeated his call for an end to the U.S. occupation, but dodged the question of whether he would disband his own militia known as the Al Mahdi army.

U.S. Army Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch today said insurgent attacks in Baghdad had decreased by 10% last week and said the number of victims of ethnic and sectarian violence in the capital was the lowest last week since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra.

"We don't see us moving toward a civil war in Iraq," he said. "In fact we're seeing a movement away."

But the violence continued at a steady throb across Iraq. The sister of Tariq Hashemi, Iraq's new vice president and leading Sunni politician, was killed along with her bodyguard in a drive-by shooting as she left home for work in Baghdad.

The murder came just two weeks after one of Hashemi's brothers was assassinated, and two days after a video from Al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab Zarqawi declared that Sunnis who cooperated with the new government were American "agents" and would be killed.

Elsewhere, three Italian and a Romanian soldier died in a roadside bombing of their convoy near their base in Nasiriyah, 200 miles south of Baghdad. There were also clashes between U.S. forces and insurgents in Ramadi.

Police said 16 bodies were also recovered in Baghdad and other cities, victims of execution-style killings.

Top Shiite Cleric Endorses Plan To Disband Militias (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — The incoming prime minister won the backing Thursday of Iraq's top Shiite cleric for his plan to disband militias, which the United States believes is critical to calming sectarian strife and halting the country's slide toward civil war.

The endorsement of Prime Minister-designate Nouri al-Maliki's plan came during a meeting in Najaf with Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani. The ayatollah told al-Maliki, a Shiite tapped last weekend to form a government, that security should be his top priority.

"Therefore, weapons must be exclusively in the hands of government forces, and these forces must be built on a proper national basis so that their loyalty is to the country alone, not to political or other sides," a statement from Sistani's office said.

Al-Maliki has said he plans to integrate militias, many linked to Shiite parties, into the army and police. To ensure their loyalty, he wants to appoint defense and interior ministers without connections to militias. Attempts by previous Iraqi governments to abolish militias have failed, and their numbers have grown.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the second-ranking U.S. general in Iraq, said Wednesday that militias pose an urgent threat to the country's stability and were "an issue we've got to get fixed."

The leader of one major militia, radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, refrained Thursday from endorsing calls to disband his Mahdi Army. After a separate meeting with al-Maliki, the cleric was asked whether he would give up his militia. He replied: "All groups inside or outside the government work for the people's interest and service."

Sectarian tensions rose dramatically after the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, triggering reprisal attacks against Sunni mosques and clerics.

In a briefing Thursday, however, U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch said that "we are not seeing widespread militia operations across Iraq" and that "ethno-sectarian" attacks had dropped by half in Baghdad over the last week.

Lynch also said U.S. forces had found no "widespread movement" of Shiites and Sunnis away from religiously mixed areas.

"So we do not see us moving toward a civil war in Iraq," Lynch said. "In fact we see us moving away from it."

Al-Maliki has until late May to present his Cabinet to parliament, the final step in building a national unity government.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld departed Thursday after two days of talks with al-Maliki and other Iraqi officials.

Also Thursday:

•Gunmen assassinated Mayson al-Hashimi, the sister of Sunni Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi. She was killed as she left her home in a southwestern Baghdad neighborhood, police said. Her bodyguard was also slain.

•Three Italian soldiers and one Romanian soldier were killed in a bombing in southern Iraq. The soldiers were killed near Nasiriyah, 200 miles southeast of Baghdad, when a bomb exploded near their four-vehicle convoy in a Shiite area. The death was Romania's first combat loss of the war.

Gunmen In Baghdad Kill Sister Of Iraqi Vice President (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, April 27 -- Two sedans loaded with gunmen sped through the streets of Baghdad on Thursday morning, chasing the sister of Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi.

As one of the attackers' cars cut off the sport-utility vehicle carrying Mayson al-Hashimi, the other drove past, spraying the vehicle with bullets and killing the 60-year-old woman, whose biggest offense was being related to a prominent Sunni leader.

A wounded survivor traveling with Hashimi told the police what had happened, police Gen. Raad Khudaier Tamimi said. Meanwhile, attackers left behind a note, Tamimi said.

"This is a punishment for those who collaborate," the note said. It was signed, "Monotheism and Jihad."

Mayson al-Hashimi was the second sibling whom Tariq al-Hashimi, one of Iraq's two vice presidents, has lost since April 13, when another pack of gunmen killed his brother, Mahmoud al-Hashimi.

That was before Tariq al-Hashimi and his fellow vice president, Adel Abdul Mahdi -- both of whom served in the transitional government -- took office on Saturday at a meeting of Iraq's newly formed parliament. Hashimi, a Sunni, vowed with his Shiite and Kurdish colleagues to defeat the country's insurgent movement and restore national stability.

DOJ_NMG_0027153

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had called Hashimi earlier this month to express her condolences for his brother's killing. She also met the vice president in a one-on-one session during her visit to Iraq on Wednesday. A day later, Hashimi's sister was killed.

Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, a U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, paid tribute to Hashimi: "He and many others like him are true Iraqi patriots," he said. "They're doing what they're doing at great risk and great personal sacrifice."

Living in Iraq has its share of dangers, but stepping into the limelight of politics makes it that much easier for a lawmaker and his family to wind up in the cross hairs of any number of armed factions. Few politicians have been spared threats or tragedy. Abdul Mahdi -- a Shiite -- lost his brother at the hands of insurgents last fall. Attackers killed two sons of Mithal Alousi, a secular Sunni politician, after he made an unpopular visit to Israel.

Provincial governors, who have less security, have even more problems: The governor of Nineveh province in northern Iraq has survived at least three attempts on his life and has lost a son and five other relatives.

The sister of Interior Minister Bayan Jabr, another Shiite, was kidnapped in January but later released. The brother of Saleh al-Mutlak, an outspoken Sunni political leader, met another fate: Police found his body on April 17, a few days after he was kidnapped.

Mutlak, a friend of Hashimi's, said he could sympathize with his colleague's loss.

"We feel very sorry for him," he said in a telephone interview.

"I have other brothers, but he was the most active one among all of them," Mutlak said of his slain brother, Taha al-Mutlak. "He had a very strong personality, was very influential in society. He did a lot in politics, and in a very short period. I think this is why they targeted him, because they saw that he was very influential."

One of the hardest things to deal with, Mutlak said, is not knowing who did it.

"Our people are being killed every day, and we don't know who did it, who hates Iraq and Iraqis," Mutlak said. "Is this al-Qaeda or is it a regional power?" A moment later he acknowledged that "regional power" was an allusion to Iran, a neighboring Shiite theocracy that many Sunnis believe is supporting Shiite militias in Iraq.

There was little clarity even in the note left behind by Mayson al-Hashimi's attackers. Monotheism and Jihad was the name of the Sunni insurgent organization led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, but the group changed its name months ago to al-Qaeda in Iraq and has often acted recently under the name Mujaheddin Shura Council.

With no answers, Mutlak said, he had no choice but to return to his mission in politics.

"My life is not important anymore," he said. "The lives of Iraqis -- if I can do something good for them, I will not hesitate at all."

Sunni Leader's Sister Fatally Shot In Baghdad (WT/AP)

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A sister of Iraq's new Sunni Arab vice president was killed yesterday in a drive-by shooting in Baghdad, a day after the politician called for the Sunni-dominated insurgency to be crushed by force.

In southern Iraq, a bomb hit an Italian military convoy, killing four soldiers -- three Italians and a Romanian -- and seriously injuring another passenger, officials in Rome said. The bomb struck the convoy near an Italian military base in Nasariyah, a heavily Shi'ite city 200 miles southeast of Baghdad, a local Iraqi government spokesman said.

Elsewhere, a U.S. jet fired two missiles at insurgent positions in Ramadi, U.S. officers said. Fighting also broke out between Iraqi forces and insurgents northeast of Baghdad, killing several Iraqi police officers and civilians.

The violence came as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld visited Baghdad to meet with officials in Iraq's new government. Nouri al-Maliki, a Shi'ite hard-liner recently tapped as Iraq's prime minister, is trying to form a national unity government aimed at stopping a wave of sectarian violence.

Yesterday, Mr. al-Maliki met with Iraq's top shi'ite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Husseini al-Sistani, and won his backing for his plan to disband militias, which Washington sees as the key to calming sectarian strife.

Mayson Ahmed Bakir al-Hashimi, 60, whose brother, Tariq al-Hashimi, was appointed by parliament as vice president Saturday, was killed by gunmen in a sedan as she left her southwestern Baghdad home with her bodyguard, police said. The bodyguard also died.

It was the second recent killing in Mr. al-Hashimi's immediate family. On April 13, his brother, Mahmoud al-Hashimi, was shot while driving in a mostly Shi'ite area of eastern Baghdad.

Mrs. al-Hashimi had worked on the government's audit commission and was married with two grown children.

DOJ_NMG_0027154

"What astonished us is that they targeted a woman. This shows how wicked the attackers are," said Ziyad al-Ani, a senior official in the vice president's Iraqi Islamic Party. He said the killings "by the enemies of Iraq" will fail in their goal of driving Mr. al-Hashimi and his party from government.

The party is one of three major Sunni political groups in the Iraqi Accordance Front, which won 44 seats in the Dec. 15 parliamentary election.

On Wednesday, Mr. al-Hashimi called for Iraq's insurgency to be put down by force. Shi'ites had demanded that Sunni officials make such a statement to demonstrate their commitment to building a democratic system.

Mr. al-Hashimi also shrugged off a video released this week by Abu Musab Zarqawi, during which the al Qaeda in Iraq leader tried to rally Sunnis to fight the new government and denounced Sunnis who cooperate with it as "agents" of the Americans.

"I say, yes, we're agents. We're agents for Islam, for the oppressed. We have to defend the future of our people," Mr. al-Hashimi said at a press conference with President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, and his fellow vice president, Shi'ite Adil Abdul-Mahdi.

New Government Doesn't Slow Iraq Killings (AP)

By Thomas Wagner

AP, April 28, 2006

One year ago Friday, when Iraq formed its first freely elected government, Americans and Iraqis hoped it would lead to a drop in violence. But Iraqis have continued to die in the thousands, and this year the trend is up.

Figures compiled by The Associated Press over the past 12 months show more than 8,000 people have been killed and there are increasing cases of civilians being kidnapped, killed and dumped in public places.

The numbers offer a counterpoint of caution for Washington's hopes that Iraq's second freely elected government, being formed now, will help curb violence.

American officials tout the selection of a new prime minister April 22 as the start of a unity government that could bring closer the departure of U.S. troops. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld visited Iraq on Wednesday to show their support.

But optimistic forecasts that accompanied other milestones — the 2004 restoration of Iraqi sovereignty after U.S. occupation and the formation of the first elected government 10 months later — turned sour.

Twice last year, on Jan. 30 and Dec. 15, millions of Iraqis risked their lives to vote in free elections for new parliaments, then watched their chosen legislators squabble for months over forming a government.

When the first freely elected government in decades took office a year ago Friday, Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari said Iraqis who had "challenged tyranny" at the polls "will help this government to succeed and will not be intimidated."

A year later, al-Jaafari has been denied a second term, blamed for failing to deliver on that pledge.

When al-Jaafari took over, U.S. officials and many Iraqis hoped security would improve, but the insurgency soon resumed. Sectarian tensions also began to rise and, with the bombing of an important Shiite shrine two months ago, burst into outright fighting.

AP's figures show that at least 8,107 Iraqis have been killed and 10,519 wounded, most of them civilians, in the year beginning April 28, 2005.

The top killer was bombs (3,895), followed by gunfire (1,960) and the discovery of dumped bodies (1,684).

In March alone, at least 1,038 Iraqis were killed in war-related violence, according to AP figures — the highest monthly total in the past 12 months.

Three of the five largest surges in violence during the year have occurred since January. That is especially true regarding the dumping of bodies. Four of the five biggest increases in that category occurred in the months of March and April.

When it comes to deaths by gunfire, the first, third and fourth largest increases have occurred since mid-January. Serious suicide bombings happened throughout the year, but the worst such attacks — killing more than 120 people — came Jan. 5.

These numbers include civilians, government officials, and police and security forces, and are considered only a minimum based on AP reporting. The actual number is likely higher, as many killings go unreported or uncounted.

AP's tally is compiled from hospital, police and military officials cited in news stories, as well as accounts from reporters and photographers at the scenes. The security personnel include Iraqi military, police and police recruits, and bodyguards. Insurgent deaths are not a part of the Iraqi count.

Also not included in this count are the nearly 1,000 Shiite pilgrims killed in August 2005 during a bridge stampede caused by someone shouting there was a suicide bomber in their midst.

AP began collecting this information on April 28, 2005, when the first freely elected government after Saddam Hussein's downfall took office.

DOJ_NMG_0027155

The AP study reaches back one year. Other studies suggest that the violence has increased yearly since the U.S. invasion. Iraq Body Count, a British anti-war group, said more than 12,600 Iraqi civilians were killed in the year ending March 1, up 10 percent from the previous year and about double the total for the first year after the U.S. invaded.

In Iraq's widespread violence, it often is difficult to tell whether insurgents, militias or common criminals are responsible for killings.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad recently said Iraq's militias are killing more people than insurgents are.

And the protracted legislative squabbling before the new prime minister-designate, Nouri al-Maliki, was picked may have allowed the militias to break free of the limited control that political parties have over them and to step up sectarian killings, said Toby Dodge, an Iraq specialist at the International Institute of Strategic Studies in London.

Civil war may already be largely under way in Iraq, said Bob Ayers of the Chatham House think tank in London. Either way, Iraq faces tough choices and problems.

"The freedom to vote is unique. The Iraqi people clearly wanted to do that," he said. "But imposing democracy and changing the government structure doesn't change the country's historical, cultural and religious problems."

The AP's News Research Center in New York contributed to this report.

Rice, Rumsfeld In Separate Orbits In Baghdad (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, April 27 -- A full 10 seconds of silence passed after a reporter asked Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld what the intense secrecy and security surrounding their visit to Iraq signified about the stability of the country three years after the U.S.-led invasion. Rice turned to Rumsfeld to provide the answer. Rumsfeld glared at the reporter.

"I guess I don't think it says anything about it," he snapped. He went on to say that President Bush had directed him and Rice to go to Iraq to "meet with the new leadership, and it happens that they are located here," a reference to the heavily fortified Green Zone where U.S. officials -- and many Iraqi leaders -- live and work.

Rice broke in, calming the tension. "The security situation will continue to take our attention and the attention of the Iraqis," she said, adding, "The terrorists are ultimately going to be defeated by a political process here."

For the second time in a month, Rice traveled to Baghdad to jawbone Iraqi leaders with a high-powered male counterpart. Last time, her partner was British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw. The pairing with him was convivial, so filled with easygoing banter that it was quickly dubbed the "Condi and Jack Show."

This time around, Rice and Rumsfeld often seemed in separate orbits, and the visit had little of the warmth of the earlier one. One purpose of this joint trip was to get the sometimes conflicting military and political operations in sync for the transition to a permanent Iraqi government. But the contrast in the two secretaries' styles was sometimes jarring.

Even though her arrival here followed an exhausting sprint through Greece and Turkey, Rice appeared energized by the task at hand. Rumsfeld arrived directly from Washington -- after a recent Asian tour -- but he seemed disengaged and bored, both to reporters traveling with him and to some U.S. officials. Some said he seemed irritated by the whole exercise. He did not speak a word to reporters with him on the flight to Baghdad.

During a joint meeting with reporters traveling with the secretaries, Rumsfeld frequently doodled with a black felt-tip pen or stared absent-mindedly at the ceiling when Rice spoke. Rice would occasionally cast a nervous glance at Rumsfeld as he prepared to respond to a question. His answers were terse; hers were expansive.

Rice, in that briefing and a separate one with Iraqi journalists, eagerly cast the Iraqi transition as part of the administration's quest for democracy in the Middle East. She told the Iraqi journalists that differences were "being overcome by politics and compromise, not by violence and not by repression," making Iraq "a tremendous pillar of stability through the Middle East." She added, "It's wonderful to be here and to be a small part of that."

But the administration's mantra of freedom and democracy never passed Rumsfeld's lips. Asked how the Iraqi government should eliminate the militias that have terrorized the populace, Rumsfeld appeared to suggest it was a relatively easy task. "Other countries have dealt with these issues and done them in a reasonably orderly way and over a period of time in a manner that was, in many instances, without much violence," he said.

The two secretaries recently had a widely publicized dispute over a comment by Rice that the administration had probably made "thousands" of "tactical errors" in Iraq. Aides later said she had meant it figuratively, but it generated headlines around the world. In a radio interview, Rumsfeld dismissed it as a comment made by someone who didn't understand warfare.

Asked about the flap here in Baghdad, Rumsfeld replied, "I wasn't aware of what she meant." (The transcript shows that the radio interviewer described her remarks carefully and placed them in context.) Rumsfeld made no effort to smooth over the issue but pointed to Rice and said, "She's right here, and you can ask her." Rice noted that her comment about tactical errors had been made "not in the military sense."

Rice courted the news media, racing through five television interviews in 17 minutes. Rumsfeld gave no separate interviews. At one point, he arrived early for a meeting and saw an array of television cameras inside the room. He shook his head at the reporters and turned on his heel.

Before the two Cabinet members left Baghdad on Thursday, Rice dismissed any suggestions of tension. "Secretary Rumsfeld and I have an excellent relationship," she told Fox News. "We're working very hard together. We're actually having a great time here in Iraq."

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

Rummy's friends

Sen. Jeff Sessions, a wily ex-prosecutor from the Deep South, knows when a man is in trouble, and that man is Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. So Mr. Sessions organized a pep rally/war briefing where Republicans could express support for Mr. Rumsfeld, who seven retired generals have said must go.

The setting was breakfast in the Russell Senate Office Building. Mr. Sessions invited "defense-minded" Republican senators, and 17 showed up to talk with the defense secretary.

"There were spontaneous and supportive comments for Secretary Rumsfeld and an affirmation of his leadership," said Sessions spokesman Mike Brumas.

He said the senator from Alabama organized the get-together because "we're in a time of war. Senator Sessions admires Secretary Rumsfeld and invited a group of defense-minded senators to talk with the secretary about a number of topics."

During the one-hour chat, Mr. Rumsfeld discussed the new government in Iraq and the need for another wartime supplemental budget bill.

Mr. Brumas declined to say which senators attended. But it is known that two heavyweights, Senate Armed Services Chairman John W. Warner of Virginia, and his planned successor, Sen. John McCain of Arizona, did not attend.

Mr. McCain has expressed a lack of confidence in Mr. Rumsfeld. The two butted heads over the senator's "hold" on several Defense Department nominees.

Mr. Warner wrote Mr. Sessions a note saying he had another engagement.

Keane's view

Retired Gen. John Keane, former Army vice chief of staff who has been to Iraq several times, thinks that Iraqi hearts and minds are the path to winning the war.

He talked about the insurgency in the aftermath of four retired Army major generals' demanding the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"If this protracted insurgency, which we're now in the fourth year of, was reaching its culmination point in terms of defeat of the insurgency and a government seated, we would not be having this conversation," Gen. Keane told us.

"Much of the underlining frustration deals with the very nature of the war we are fighting and the fact we are four years into it and we are still losing American lives and having soldiers maimed in this conflict. But the reality is ... an urban insurgency neutralizes the United States' military power. The premium is placed on gaining support of the Iraqi people and only secondary to that is killing and capturing of the insurgency. Even when a counterinsurgency is successful, history tells us it takes about seven to eight years to achieve that end.

"I think the insurgency is considerably weaker in one very large respect and its the most important respect. It doesn't enjoy the same support of the people it once had. The people are reaching for democracy and they do not support the insurgents. The majority of the Sunnis is what I'm talking about."

Get tough

Princeton historian Bernard Lewis, a pre-eminent Middle East scholar and authority on Islam and its conflict with the Western world, said the Bush administration needs to do more against the insurgents in Iraq.

"In two simple words: Get tough," Mr. Lewis told a lunch forum of reporters sponsored by the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life.

Mr. Lewis said defeating Iraqi insurgents, and Islamic terrorists there and elsewhere, will require much more aggressive action.

DOJ_NMG_0027157

Despite negative press reports, Mr. Lewis said, things are going well in Iraq as far as developing democracy and advancing opportunities for women. But the Bush administration appears to be close to "snatching defeat from the jaws of victory" there, he said.

"The best policy would be to deal with it by suppressing it," Mr. Lewis said, instead of using "halfhearted" measures that involve compromising with insurgents.

On Iran, Mr. Lewis said, the current ruler in Tehran, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is a dangerous radical who holds "apocalyptic" visions of Islam. The Iranian leader's recent visit to Syria successfully suppressed a move toward democracy in the Arab fascist state that was not countered by the United States, he said.

Even more dangerous is an Iran armed with nuclear weapons. If the Iranians succeed in their quest, they will use nuclear weapons against their enemies "without an address" on the delivery. "It will come through terrorists," Mr. Lewis said.

Mr. Lewis said one of the roots of current Islamic extremism lies in Saudi Arabian Wahhabism, which he described as an extremely violent and intolerant strain of Islam that is fueled by Saudi leaders and oil money.

"Wahhabism is to Islam what the Ku Klux Klan is to Christianity," he said. Islamic extremism also has been driven by Salafist Sunni Muslims and by Iran's revolutionary-style Shi'ism, he said.

Earth Day

The Air Force sent a memo to personnel reminding them to be respectful of Earth Day last week.

The memo said the Environmental Protection Agency has recognized the Air Force as "the number one purchaser of green power."

It said the Air Force provides a "natural habitat for more than 70 threatened and endangered species" while "maintaining and enhancing ecological integrity on over 575,000 acres of forested landscapes."

"The Air Force is making great strides in our priorities to win the global war on terror, take care of our airmen and recapitalize our forces," the memo said. "Preserving our natural assets remain a key factor of success in these goals, and through our dedication to protecting and maintaining our planet, these assets will remain intact for generations to come."

CIA and State

We asked Dan Gallington, who once was chief counsel to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, to discuss whether the CIA's bureaucracy is working against President Bush's policies in the war on al Qaeda.

"I wouldn't say they are anti-Bush as much as to say they generally support the more conciliatory policy positions of the State Department bureaucracy," Mr. Gallington said. "Even though CIA is not a policy organization, they actively participate in influencing national security policy.

"I would say it seems clear that the leaks out of the CIA in recent years are both substantively, and in timing, seem intended to embarrass the president."

He said a "purge" is the answer for a leak-weary Bush administration. "It's already under way," he said.

Corruption Eroding Afghan Security (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, April 28, 2006

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN - Nearly five years after the fall of the Taliban, Afghanistan's security situation continues to be dragged down by endemic corruption, roving militias, and a growing nexus between narco-warlords and remnants of the Taliban, officials and analysts say.

The melting snows of spring often bring an uptick in violence, as rebels emerge from their mountain redoubts. Yet there are indications of a deepening instability beyond the seasonal surge. More than 70 foreign troops, mostly Americans, have been killed this past year, making it the deadliest period since the conflict began. Violence, meanwhile, seems to be spreading beyond the volatile south, encroaching on areas formerly considered outside the zones of conflict.

"What is often labeled as Taliban violence is not," says Joanna Nathan, a senior analyst for the International Crisis Group in Kabul. "It's a whole set of fluid alliances, cross- border attacks from Pakistan, drugs, tribal feuds, and of course the Taliban."

What these security issues have in common, she and others say, is the poor governance and official corruption among provincial governors, police chiefs, and others tasked with securing the country and bringing development. The implication: Stabilizing the country increasingly means providing better government.

"The state we're in now is because of the policy decision to co-opt those people who in the past committed human rights abuses. There's a culture of impunity. They continue in many cases to abuse the rights of people under them," says Ms. Nathan, adding that this not only causes violent flare-ups, but creates sympathy for the Taliban. These troubles, she says, are by no means limited to the south. "There are drug problems in the north, tribal problems, sheer criminality."

In the past, violence rarely spilled beyond the south, where NATO troops are slowly replacing US forces. But recent attacks have cropped up in the north and west, too:

• Rockets slammed into a nongovernmental organization and a house in the northeastern province of Badakhshan on Tuesday when militants protesting poppy eradication missed a police station. No casualties were reported.

• Also on Tuesday, two bomb blasts along the road to Kabul's airport wounded three people. That followed a powerful rocket attack near the US Embassy and the presidential palace on April 19, wounding one Afghan security contractor.

• Bomb blasts were reported Saturday outside a politician's home 30 miles west of the northern city of Mazar-e Sharif.

• And the prosperous western province of Herat, once considered a model of stability, was rocked by a suicide bombing in early April, killing two Afghans outside a NATO compound.

"We do have a problem in the south, but it is spreading north. The path for these activities in the north has already formed," says Gen. Hilaluddin Hilal, the former deputy minister of the Interior Ministry, and now a member of parliament.

Many governors and chiefs of police, rather than confronting the Taliban and neutralizing drug lords, are increasingly intertwined with them, either for political or monetary gain, some analysts say. Amid the lawlessness, military intelligence has become a political game, a tool for blackmail or settling old scores, analysts allege.

President Hamid Karzai has replaced or re-assigned a number of governors in an effort to tackle these problems, which have plagued Afghanistan since the fall of the Taliban. Badsha Khan, for example, once the governor of Paktia Province, was removed in 2002 amid allegations of corruption and passing information to US forces that led to the bombing of his political enemies.

In the northern Balkh Province, Gov. Atta Mohammad Nur sacked several officials this February for their alleged involvement in the drug trade, including the district government head, the chief of police, the chief of security, the chief of staff, and the prosecutor.

But many such types remain. "There is probably no smoking gun, and it might be not be easy to present [a] case before a court," says one Western diplomat, speaking on the condition of anonymity. "But the names of quite a few of these people are well known."

Government officials insist they are cracking down, but Kabul's writ is still weak in many places. Even the more sanguine government officials, when speaking off the record, say that collusion between governors and the Taliban has hampered counterterrorism. Many villagers have little incentive to cooperate, officials say, when they see their government representatives siding with the enemy.

More than breeding resentment, corruption is playing into the hands of the Taliban.

"[P]eople had the expectation that the government would do something for them, that their lives would improve. But it didn't happen," says Mullah Abdul Salam Rocketi, a former Taliban commander who is now a member of Parliament. "When people get disappointed, it benefits the Taliban."

Others agree, saying that such widespread corruption and lawlessness was what brought the Taliban to power in the first place in 1995.

Remedies, such as there are, include more concerted efforts to disarm illegal militias. So far, some 60,000 people have been disarmed under a UN initiative, but many observers say greater resources and political will need to be put toward this effort. The arrival of NATO troops in the south might also bolster security, provided that such an effort is coupled with serious commitments to governance and nation-building.

Suspected U.S. Spies Targeted (LAT)

By Paul Watson And Zulfiqar Ali

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan — Taliban militants and their allies are waging a dirty war in Pakistan's unruly tribal areas, kidnapping and executing people suspected of spying for U.S. forces across the border in Afghanistan.

Militants have killed at least 53 accused spies and pro-government elders in Pakistan over the last two years, according to the independent Human Rights Commission of Pakistan. Many of their bodies were found with notes that claimed the victims had visited U.S. military bases in Afghanistan. Local residents put the death toll from such executions at about 150.

The headless corpse of the latest victim, taxi driver Khun Majan, was found in a ditch Tuesday near the town of Angoor Adda, a suspected Taliban haven in the South Waziristan tribal region, eight days after relatives reported he had been kidnapped.

"He visited a U.S. forces base in the Birmal area, Paktika province of Afghanistan, and was providing information about mujahedin to our enemies," said a note on his body.

It was not known whether any of the victims were working as informants or spies for U.S. forces.

But secret documents on a memory drive stolen from the American air base at Bagram, north of Kabul, and sold at a bazaar outside its gates, show that U.S. Special Forces apparently used informants in Pakistan as well as Afghanistan. The files contained what appeared to be highly sensitive material, including the identities of informants and their families, and some of the information the sources had provided.

None of the informants' names that appeared on the drive sold at the Bagram bazaar, however, matched those of victims killed in Pakistan. And many of the killings predate the files found on the drive.

Abductions and summary executions of people accused of spying for the U.S. or supporting Pakistan's government in the northwestern tribal areas began in June 2004, during an offensive by Pakistani forces against suspected Al Qaeda terrorists, said Pakistani officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to talk to the press.

Most of the victims were killed in the last year as Afghanistan's insurgency gained strength, mainly in the southern and eastern territories near routes leading into the country from Pakistan. About 85% of the victims are from South Waziristan, a Pushtun tribal area.

The Pakistani government has said it pushed foreign militants from South Waziristan by late 2004. Intense fighting continues in North Waziristan.

Besides the killing of Majan, other recent executions included the beheading of four Pushtun tribesmen between April 15 and April 21 in North Waziristan. All were suspected of being spies.

At first, militants shot their captives on the spot. But more recently the captives have been held for several days, apparently for interrogation, and later beheaded, sources in the tribal areas said. A note is then left on the body that identifies the victim as an alleged spy, in a warning to others not to cooperate with Pakistani officials or U.S. forces across the border.

On Dec. 25, 2004, Shah Alam Khan, the brother of Pakistan's ambassador to the Persian Gulf emirate of Qatar and a close friend of Afghan President Hamid Karzai, was gunned down by militants in Wana, South Waziristan, according to the Human Rights Commission.

On March 30, five people came to the home of moderate Muslim cleric Maulana Zahir Shah Bhittani, who was staunchly opposed to Taliban and other militants preaching jihad in the tribal areas. The cleric was the principal of a madrasa, or Islamic school, in Lakki Marwat, south of Peshawar, the capital of North-West Frontier Province.

The men knocked on the cleric's door at night and said they needed him to perform faith healing on a patient, family members said. But they overpowered him and forced him into a pickup truck. Two days later, his corpse was found in the Sararogha area of South Waziristan.

A note on his body, written in Pashto, said: "All those who, on the directive of our enemy and in the guise of a cleric, try to propagate against jihad and Islam [or] betray innocent Muslims and misguide people will meet the same fate as Zahir Shah."

The note claimed that the cleric had, "along with some Englishmen, entered an embassy in Islamabad and obtained monetary assistance. He also received some directives from there."

Militants also have recorded on compact discs what they purport to be videotaped confessions of spies for the U.S. in the tribal areas, before beheading them.

On a CD released recently in Miram Shah, administrative center of North Waziristan, a purported spy says an American offered him the equivalent of $3,300 in Pakistani rupees to work on persuading local people to turn against the Taliban.

After recording his message, his masked abductors killed him, chanting "God is great!" in full view of the camera.

"Hypocrites will meet the same fate," the masked men said on the CD. "This person was slaughtered for providing information regarding mujahedin activities to the Americans."

The Los Angeles Times revealed April 10 that drives that contained documents marked "secret" — including one that listed the names, photographs and telephone numbers of people said to be informants — were for sale outside the Bagram base. Merchants told The Times that the drives had been on the market for as long as four years.

They continued to be for sale as recently as Wednesday, after U.S. military brass launched a criminal investigation into the loss of the drives from the base, where U.S. forces operate a secretive detention and interrogation center for terrorism suspects.

"We're obviously concerned that certain sources or assets have been compromised," Col. Tom Collins, a spokesman for U.S. forces in Afghanistan, said recently.

The military is "making all attempts to protect the identities of people who are helping us to defeat the enemy," Collins added this week.

The Times did not disclose any details that could identify the Afghan spies named in the documents, which included detailed accounts of information they had provided from their missions in Afghanistan and trips into Pakistan.

One of the drives apparently belonged to a member of the Army's 7th Special Forces Group (Airborne), based at Ft. Bragg, N.C.

DOJ_NMG_0027160

The unit has recently carried out missions in southern Afghanistan, where the U.S.-led coalition is battling a growing insurgency by Taliban, Al Qaeda and other fighters.

One document on that drive, marked "secret," reported that an Afghan informant arranged for an Afghan friend living in the southwestern Pakistani city of Quetta to visit a U.S. base in Afghanistan.

During the December meeting with a Special Forces officer, the three men discussed the possibility of using the visitor as a guide for U.S. troops, which would cross into Pakistan to capture or kill Taliban leaders.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Lay On Defensive At Enron Trial (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller And Gary McWilliams

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

HOUSTON -- Federal prosecutors hammered at former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay1's credibility by showing he made a series of inaccurate stockholding reports that failed to disclose large sales of his Enron shares in the months before the company's December 2001 bankruptcy filing.

Mr. Lay, who faces federal conspiracy and fraud charges in connection with Enron's collapse, appeared taken aback by the assault during his first full day of cross-examination in court here, which followed two hours of tense exchanges with prosecutor John Hueston2 on Wednesday afternoon. Mr. Lay hasn't been charged with improper sales of stock.

At times yesterday, he stuttered in response to accusations. Other times, he accused Mr. Hueston of twisting his words or harping on irrelevant points.

Mr. Lay said repeatedly that he relied on advice from company attorneys who told him he wasn't required to disclose the disputed stock sales except once a year, since they involved turning the shares back to the company in return for cash rather than sales on the open market. He said that his Securities and Exchange Commission filings complied with the law even though they inflated the picture of his Enron holdings. In 2001, Mr. Lay obtained $70 million through these stock transactions with Enron. (Testimony excerpts3)

Mr. Hueston even sought to use Mr. Lay's son against him.

Mr. Lay and his co-defendant, former Enron President Jeffrey Skilling4, have consistently claimed that a concerted attack by short-sellers helped drive down Enron's share price, and contributed to the company's 2001 collapse. (Short-sellers are traders who, using borrowed shares, make profits when a stock goes down.) Mr. Hueston noted that Mr. Lay's lead attorney, Michael Ramsey, referred to short-sellers as "vultures."

Mr. Hueston then introduced evidence that Mr. Lay's son, Mark, had executed four short sales on Enron stock in March 2001. Was he a vulture? asked the prosecutor.

"I don't think he's a vulture," said Mr. Lay in a subdued voice, adding that he wasn't aware of his son's stock transactions.

As for Mr. Lay's SEC filings about his stockholdings, Mr. Hueston showed that the Enron chairman didn't include his company stock transactions in those filings.

In 2001, Mr. Lay's monthly SEC stock-ownership filings through October showed his Enron holdings hovering around 2.7 million shares.

Yet his actual holdings had declined to some 991,000 shares because of the sales back to the company, according to evidence presented by Mr. Hueston.

Mr. Lay was quietly selling off a large chunk of his holdings while telling employees and investors the shares were a "bargain," prosecutors contend. As late as September 2001, he was telling employees that he was buying stock without telling them of his far larger sales back to the company. Mr. Lay argued that his stock transactions with Enron were done to raise cash to pay pressing margin calls on personal loans. He said he didn't feel the need to report such "forced" stock sales to Enron employees or others. He added that he held on to as many Enron shares as he could because he felt the stock was undervalued.

By showing that Mr. Lay wasn't fully forthcoming about his stock sales, the government clearly hoped to buttress its contention that the former top executive was illegally hiding from the public a range of bad news about the company's finances and business operations.

Mr. Hueston also attacked Mr. Lay on his bullish remarks in 2001 about Enron's high-profile retail energy unit, which government witnesses have testified was struggling with problem contracts and large hidden losses. The prosecutor noted that up until September 2001 Mr. Lay and other executives had been highlighting the rapid growth of the unit's service contracts, predicting the total would hit $30 billion in 2001.

However, Mr. Hueston presented evidence from an Oct. 8, 2001, Enron board meeting showing that the company expected to fall short of that target by about $4.5 billion.

About a week later, Mr. Lay told securities analysts that Enron would no longer report total contract values because it was no longer a valid measure. He didn't mention anything about falling short of the previously announced $30 billion target, Mr. Hueston said.

Was the prospect of falling short of the contract target and then dropping it as a growth measure "pure coincidence?" the prosecutor asked.

"I don't know if it was pure coincidence," Mr. Lay said, adding that executives of the retail unit "convinced me and others" that there were better measures. Repeatedly yesterday, Mr. Lay said he relied heavily on others for the information and descriptions he provided to investors. Mr. Hueston pushed back that Mr. Lay, as chief executive, had the option to make the final decisions about what he and the company would tell the public.

The trial resumes Monday.

Stock Sales Scrutinized In Enron Trial (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

HOUSTON, April 27 -- A federal prosecutor used evidence that the son of Enron Corp. founder Kenneth L. Lay bet the company's stock price would fall to poke holes in Lay's contention that short-sellers -- not fraud -- helped push Enron into bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

In his second day of cross-examination, Lay maintained his composure after furiously responding to questions and stabbing his finger at Assistant U.S. Attorney John C. Hueston a day earlier. Hueston attempted to rattle Lay Thursday by throwing back at him Lay's arguments that Enron was the victim of skeptical press reports, disclosures of wrongdoing by former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow, and short-sellers, who Lay said plotted Enron's demise in Florida in early 2001. Short-sellers bet that a stock price will fall, borrowing shares to sell at one price, hoping they will be able to buy the stock later at a lower price, profiting from the difference.

Mark Lay, a former Enron employee, executed four short sales of Enron stock in March 2001, Hueston said.

"Was your son in Florida, sir?" the prosecutor asked.

"I guess I should ask him now," Lay replied wryly as several jurors smiled.

Lay, 64, faces six counts of fraud and conspiracy based on optimistic public statements he made after returning to Enron's helm in August 2001 after the abrupt resignation of his protege and fellow defendant Jeffrey K. Skilling.

Lay answered questions in a firm voice, sometimes talking over Hueston and suggesting that the prosecutor didn't understand business issues. During a discussion of an arcane accounting issue, Lay retorted, "I think the investors would totally understand it, Mr. Hueston. Maybe in fact, you don't."

Later, Lay told the prosecutor that an exchange about another accounting charge was "a real waste of the jury's time."

Lay mostly held firm in his defense that he relied on countless other people to make business decisions when he returned as chief executive, including accountants, lawyers and his own subordinates. Prosecutors argue that Lay was far more involved in the details of Enron's operations then he would care to admit, bringing as evidence budget documents, corporate board presentations and handwritten notes jotted by Lay himself.

"I'm not an accountant; I'm not a lawyer," Lay said. "There are a lot of things I'm not."

He also disputed the accounts of several former deputies who testified earlier in the 13-week trial, saying that some meetings simply never took place and others were a dim memory four years later. Lay repeatedly contradicted government witness David W. Delainey, who testified that the company's highly touted retail business was a disaster akin to "retooling a plane in flight."

"That's kind of what business is all about, other things in life, too," said Lay, who argues that he is an optimistic person. "We're always retooling. You've got to make adjustments as you go along."

The prosecutor spent much of the day walking the jury through Lay's sales of more than $70 million worth of Enron stock to the company in its final months. Hueston said Lay failed to disclose those sales to employees and investors, who believed based on information available in late 2001 that Lay had actually increased his Enron holdings in that period. Lay told jurors he had amassed $100 million in personal debts by 2001. He said he broke no laws with his stock sales.

"Mr. Hueston, despite your efforts here, I was fully complying with all the laws and regulations," Lay protested. "I know you're trying to portray a different story. I was doing exactly what I was told I needed to do."

DOJ_NMG_0027162

Hueston told the judge after the court session ended Thursday that he hoped to finish questioning Lay early next week. U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III, who has zealously guarded the jury's time, signaled that his patience for additional questions by Lay's lawyers could be thin, given Lay's self-defense mechanisms.

"Mr. Lay has pretty well covered a lot of what you would on redirect," Lake told the defense team, as spectators laughed.

Lay Denies He Tried To Hide Sale Of Stock (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, April 28, 2006

HOUSTON — Former Enron CEO Ken Lay told jurors here Thursday that he didn't think stock sales "forced" upon him by banks making margin calls were the same as "discretionary" sales. As a result, he didn't feel the need to disclose the sale of more than 1.7 million shares of Enron stock during 2001, when he encouraged Enron employees to buy the stock and told them he was buying shares, too.

During the second day of cross examination in his trial on charges of misrepresenting Enron's financial health to investors, Lay bristled at suggestions by prosecutor John Hueston that he was trying to hide his 2001 stock sales from the public.

"I always differentiated between discretionary decisions to buy shares (and) forced sales to meet margin calls on a line of credit," he said. "I didn't really see there was any need to disclose" the sales, he added.

Despite the fact that he sold more than 500,000 shares of Enron stock from late July through August of that year, Lay touted the company as an "incredible bargain" to his employees in September 2001. He reiterated that belief in court Thursday.

"I strongly and firmly believed it was an incredible bargain," he said.

Lay had personal debts of about $100 million that year, mostly backed by Enron stock. As Enron's share price sank through the course of 2001, various banks made margin calls on Lay (a margin call is triggered when the equity level of an account falls below a set level). But rather than let the banks sell the stock he'd pledged to cover the margins, which would have resulted in the public disclosure of his sales, Lay was allowed to sell his stock back to Enron using a special line of credit available only to a few top executives. Lay insisted that company lawyers told him those sales didn't need to be reported immediately.

The government has accused Lay, 64, and former CEO Jeff Skilling, 52, of conspiring to hide Enron's true financial condition from the public. The two men contend that Enron was a healthy company brought low in 2001 in a panic fueled by short-sellers and a series of negative articles that appeared in the media.

Hueston challenged that defense, saying that before the negative articles started appearing in October 2001, the company was put on notice by Moody's, a credit rating service, that it might be downgraded.

Lay explained that institutional shareholders, who owned about 60% of the company's stock, would understand that the Moody's announcement was not a big deal. Hueston asked about the other 40% of Enron's shareholders, which included "average Joes."

"I'd like to think that Enron didn't have any shareholders who were average Joes," Lay said. "They were somewhat superior to that."

Another testy day for Lay in the Enron trial (HC)

By MARY FLOOD

The Houston Chronicle, April 28, 2006

Ken Lay is accustomed to being in control, and Thursday he tried to rule his cross-examination from the witness stand.

The former Enron chief showed his disdain for the prosecutor by suggesting he couldn't understand what investors would, by asking him questions and even by calling for a new line of inquiry.

"We've spent more than an hour on this," Lay complained testily to prosecutor John Hueston when, after an afternoon break, the lawyer returned to the complicated matter of a writing down the value of a British water utility Enron owned.

"Obviously you can go where you want to, but I think it's a real waste of the jury's time," Lay said, though his indictment includes an allegation that he lied to analysts in October 2001 about whether Enron would have to write down the value of the water company on its books.

Though most of Thursday was calmer than Wednesday, which featured fireworks between Hueston and Lay, the former CEO and chairman of Enron was impatient in his second day on cross-examination.

There was still plenty there to see, with the courtroom full by afternoon.

When discussing that Lay didn't plan to change direction in the company when he came back as CEO in mid-2001, Lay said to Hueston: "I think the investment community would understand it, maybe you don't, but they would."

At another point, Lay told Hueston that he should just call another witness to explain a presentation Enron made to bankers in late 2001. "You need to call Jeff McMahon and put him on the stand," Lay snapped.

Lay also indignantly declared he did nothing illegal or improper when he told employees he was buying stock and they should too in late 2001, even though Lay was also quietly selling millions more in stock back to the company.

Lay told the 12 jurors and four alternates that his $4 million in stock purchases in 2001 were voluntary. But, he said, his more than $70 million in stock sales — which he didn't have to disclose monthly because he traded stock for cash in a revolving credit line at Enron — were "forced" by his personal finances and margin calls on his $100 million in private loans.

"If the market had found out you had sold $70 million of stock in that time, that actually would have caused the stock to tumble?" asked Hueston of Lay's 2001 stock sales to the company.

"It depends, Mr. Hueston," Lay said. He said if the market understood he was using the cash from internal stock sales to keep his private bankers from selling Enron stock used as private loan collateral, the market might see it as a good sign that he had faith in Enron.

"There was no requirement that I disclose any of that," Lay said of his internal stock sales. "You're trying to mislead the jury as to somehow I was doing something illegal, and I'm not."

Stock salesHe said he preferred selling stock to the company, a deal arranged for him in 1999 though not disclosed on the proxy forms. Though Lay had to make monthly filings about his stock purchases, he only had to account for his internal sales annually. Thus his public monthly holding total never reflected his frequent 2001 stock sales and made it appear his Enron stock holdings were growing when they were actually shrinking.

"I found it more convenient to use the line of credit," he said.

Lay's sales to Enron are not considered insider trading because it is assumed the company has all the material knowledge that he has. But the government has included his failure to tell employees about those sales in a conspiracy charge and a wire fraud charge against Lay. They are two of the six charges he faces. Codefendant Jeff Skilling faces 28 charges.

Thursday, Hueston went back to Lay's allegations that colluding short sellers, people who bet a stock will go down, contributed to Enron's downfall. Lay attorney Mike Ramsey previously called short sellers "vultures."

Hueston showed Lay that his son Mark Lay was short selling Enron stock in March 2001 and made more than $166,000 betting Enron stock would fall.

"I didn't know that," Lay said.

"He wasn't a vulture was he?" Hueston asked Lay of his son.

"I don't think he's a vulture," Lay responded.

"He wasn't trying to kill Enron in 2001, was he?" Hueston asked.

"I would think not," Lay said.

The jury has also heard that Skilling made $15 million after leaving Enron by short selling a competitor's stock.

Hueston also questioned Lay about his characterization in late 2001 that Enron's retail business was growing and that it had a projected $30 billion in contract value for 2001. But, Hueston showed, shortly after it was clear Enron would not make that target, it stopped using the same measurements for success. Lay said the change was because the business was maturing and other measures would work better.

The prosecution questioned Lay about his contention that an Oct. 17, 2001, Wall Street Journal story hurt Enron's stock price by twisting an earnings report in a negative way. Hueston noted that news stories about Moody's credit rating agency investigating Enron's rating might also have done that.

Lay argued that Enron's savvy shareholders would have known about Moody's decision the day before and would not have waited until newspapers covered the announcement. Hueston asked whether the "average Joe" shareholder might not have learned about the Moody's decision Oct. 17, 2001.

"I'd like to think Enron didn't have any shareholders who were average Joes. I'd like to think they were somewhat superior to that," Lay said.

No ValhallaU.S. District Judge Sim Lake told lawyers at the end of the day that he plans to rule that information about the Valhalla scandal, evidence about an 18-year-old incident in which Lay did not immediately fire company wrongdoers, will not be part of this trial.

Prosecutors had hoped to question Lay about it but the judge said he'll be agreeing with the Lay team that the door was not opened to that questioning by anything Lay said on direct examination. The judge had previously noted that the incident was very remote and it did not involve a conviction.

Lay is set to continue on the stand through most of Monday.

Surprise Of Enron Trial Is Lay's Surly Manner (LAT)

By Thomas S. Mulligan, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

Known for charm, the ex-chairman may have damaged his case with sarcasm and snippiness.

HOUSTON — Who would have guessed that Kenny Boy could be a tougher sell to a jury than Capt. Queeg?

Enron Corp. founder Kenneth L. Lay — Kenny Boy to his friend President Bush — is renowned for his courtliness, his philanthropy, his rise from a dirt-poor boyhood in the Missouri Ozarks to a nine-digit fortune.

Codefendant Jeffrey K. Skilling, who invented Enron's most profitable business and ran the company during most of its heyday, also is known for getting in a bar fight while under indictment and for publicly calling an investment analyst by another name for a sphincter.

At the start of their federal fraud and conspiracy trial three months ago, the betting was that the volatile Skilling's performance on the witness stand might drag Lay down, not the other way around.

Former Chief Executive Skilling, 52, shares some of the obsessiveness of Queeg, the Navy skipper of "The Caine Mutiny." But unlike Queeg, Skilling didn't unravel on the stand. Where mastery of Enron's finances was at issue, he overpowered co-lead prosecutor Sean M. Berkowitz. When the nimble Berkowitz pushed certain buttons, Skilling showed flashes of anger and arrogance, but he generally kept his head.

For Lay, however, it's been a rockier ride. Although nobody knows what the 12 Texans in the jury box are thinking, during his first four days on the stand, Lay, 64, has shown some attributes that clash with his reputation as affable, openhanded and shrewd.

His worst moment came Wednesday, when prosecutor John C. Hueston jolted Lay with questions about his attempts to reach actual or potential witnesses in the case — efforts that persisted even after Lay's lawyers told him to stop.

"You've got to question the judgment of the person," said Mark C. Zauderer of New York law firm Flemming Zulack Williamson Zauderer. "No lawyer would have his client in the dock calling potential witnesses. It could be very suspect in the minds of the jury."

Lay probably didn't help matters by responding to Hueston's blitz with sarcasm. The jury of eight women and four men has hardly been immune to humor during the trial — even Skilling's mordant wit sometimes connected — but nobody cracked a smile at Lay's comebacks Wednesday.

Noting Lay's $120,000 investment in a company whose main customer was Enron, Hueston asked whether he had made conflict-of-interest filings required by Enron's code of conduct.

"I don't know," Lay shot back. "Have you checked it? I imagine you have. You guys are pretty thorough."

After describing himself in early testimony as "more of a delegator" than a micromanager, Lay quickly proved himself adept at delegating blame. If something worked out, it was his idea. If it blew up, it was somebody else's.

Asked to name his biggest mistakes at Enron, Lay unhesitatingly listed "hiring Andy Fastow" and promoting him to chief financial officer.

Andrew S. Fastow turned out to be a crook who secretly stole millions from Enron and allegedly helped cook the books. Lay didn't mention it, but he had to know the jury would recall that hiring and promoting Fastow was entirely Skilling's doing.

It wasn't the only time Lay subtly undercut his codefendant. He cited Skilling's surprise resignation in August 2001 as a source of uncertainty in the financial markets that set the stage for the investor and creditor panic that Lay said ultimately brought Enron down.

Moreover, by praising Skilling as an executive who "really gets into the details, the guts of how things work," Lay may have signaled that Skilling, far more than Lay, would have grasped the intricacies of Enron's accounting and financial reporting — the things at the heart of the criminal case.

Lay blamed two aides for what turned out to be one of the biggest PR gaffes of the century: rebuffing the Wall Street Journal in the fall of 2001 when the paper had questions about Fastow and his mysterious LJM partnerships — complex financial structures that the government says let Enron hide problem assets and falsely pump up profit.

With Enron offering only a brief statement written by its lawyers, the company lost any control over the debate and was powerless when the resulting stories eviscerated its stock. A livid Skilling even called from retirement to ask why Enron wasn't defending itself.

In Lay's view, his own instincts had been right all along. Stonewalling the Journal, he testified, went "against every bone in my body."

One of the witnesses whom Lay admitted trying to reach was a former Enron risk manager named Wincenty "Vince" Kaminski. Jurors would remember him as a professor type with a Polish accent and a healthy ego who testified that he tried vainly to warn higher-ups that Fastow's LJM partnerships were a stupid idea and that Enron shouldn't be involved with them.

DOJ_NMG_0027165

In testimony Tuesday, Lay seemed to impugn his former colleague's courage. He acknowledged that Kaminski had been an early skeptic of the LJM deals, but added that it was only after the Journal stories hit and the partnerships blew up in scandal that "his level of dislike intensified."

To be sure, Lay is operating under the disadvantage of losing his lead defense lawyer, Michael W. Ramsey, who has undergone two heart-vessel operations during the trial.

And Lay did seem to claw back some lost ground with the jury Thursday, if only because of Hueston's insistence on spending three hours browbeating him over an accounting issue known as the "Wessex goodwill impairment."

Lay showed impatience with repeated variations on the same highly technical questions — a feeling shared by U.S. District Judge Sim Lake, who has complained about the recent slow pace of the trial. Near the end of the day, Lay burst out: "Mr. Hueston, go where you want to, but I think this is a real waste of the jury's time."

Had Lay been running for mayor at that point, he'd have had at least 12 votes.

Examiners Appointed In BoNY Case (Forbes)

By Liz Moyer

Forbes, April 28, 2006

The United States Attorneys in New York named former federal prosecutor George Stamboulidis of Baker & Hostetler and FTI Consulting, a forensic accounting firm, to be the examiners in charge of making sure Bank of New York is in compliance with suspicious activities reporting and monitoring rules.

The appointment, announced jointly on Thursday by the U.S. attorneys for the Eastern and Southern Districts, comes after Bank of New York (nyse: BK - news - people) agreed to pay $38 million in penalties and compensation over charges it failed to comply with mandatory reporting guidelines under the Bank Secrecy Act.

That settlement was the culmination of a six-year investigation into a Russian money laundering ring that prosecutors say flushed $7 billion through the U.S. banking system. A former executive of the bank and her husband pleaded guilty to federal money-laundering charges in 2000 in connection with the investigation.

Stamboulidis was named in 2003 to be the special examiner overlooking Merrill Lynch's compliance and monitoring procedures in the wake of that firm's entanglement in the financing of certain off balance sheet deals connected to the now-defunct Enron.

New Challenge To Sarbanes-Oxley Law (FT)

By Jeremy Grant

Financial Times, April 28, 2006

Signs of a growing desire among some US legislators to re-examine key elements of Sarbanes-Oxley legislation emerged on Thursday as a Republican congressman, Tom Feeney, said he would next week introduce a bill designed to make it "more acceptable to business".

Mr Feeney's bill is the third piece of legislation aimed at changing Sarbanes-Oxley since its passage in 2002 after the Enron and WorldCom accounting scandals. While such efforts are seen as having limited effect until senators Sarbanes and Oxley retire late this year, the bill reflects concern that changes are needed.

Business has complained about compliance and auditing requirements that cost companies hundreds of millions of dollars a year.

Sarbanes-Oxley is also being blamed for the growing number of US companies seeking listings on foreign stock exchanges, where rules are less strict. Mr Feeney said Sarbanes-Oxley had "for the most part created a lot of good" but section 404 was "an enormous burden on the US economy".

Compliance costs had "spiralled out of control" as a result of section 404, which requires management to report on the quality of their controls. He said stock and derivatives exchanges were worried that the stricter regulatory environment could threaten America's position as the world's pre-eminent risk management centre.

"We are now busy as a consequence largely of Sarbanes-Oxley of out-sourcing America's lead in world capital formation," he said, warning that the flow of US companies listing abroad could cause the US to "lose market share to Shanghai as well". His proposed legislation would make it voluntary for companies with annual turnover of $700m or less to comply with section 404.

It would also require the Securities and Exchange Commission to define more clearly what a "material accounting error" was, Mr Feeney said.

A third element would allow a company's external auditors to give advice to internal auditors. Instead of being subjected to annual audits, companies with market capitalisation over $700m could have random audits. Finally, Mr Feeney said he would propose that the SEC study UK accounting principles to see how section 404 could be implemented more smoothly.

DOJ_NMG_0027166

Pete Sessions, a Texas Republican who supports Mr Feeney's effort, said he was "not sure that the SEC is over-regulating". Instead, he said, he believed it was "not providing enough definition or direction as to what is good and bad".

He said he believed SEC chairman Christopher Cox "understands the enormity of the problem". Asked what progress would be likely to make changes with the proposed bill, he said: "We're going to ram this down the throats of the naysayers. We need to get this done."

A Campaign To Tighten Executive Pay (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

After years of complaining about sky-high executive pay packages, this year shareholder activists are finally getting some traction in their efforts to do something about the issue.

The issue will come up today at the annual meeting of Merrill Lynch & Co., where chief executive E. Stanley O'Neal took home $37.5 million last year, including $2 million in long-term incentive pay. The American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees is sponsoring a resolution calling for an annual up-or-down vote on the company's pay plan for top executives. Though the vote would be nonbinding, it would give shareholders a way to make their views clear, advocates argue.

Closer to Washington, a carpenters union's proposal to tie Towson-based Black & Decker Corp. chief executive Nolan D. Archibald's bonuses and long-term stock grants to the company's performance garnered support from 47 percent of the shares voted at the hardware company's annual meeting last week. Archibald was paid $11.7 million plus stock options, which the company's proxy statement said were valued between $7.7 million and $19 million in 2005.

Yesterday, up to 22 percent of shareholders of drugmaker Pfizer Inc. withheld support from directors who approved a pension plan that will pay chief executive Hank McKinnell $6.5 million a year or a lump sum of $83 million when he retires.

"If management increasingly takes more and more, there's less for shareholders," said Frederick E. Rowe Jr., president of Investors for Director Accountability, which urged the withhold vote at Pfizer. Reining in executive compensation has been one of the hottest shareholder issues since the stock market bubble burst in 2000, but for years, proposals have drawn little interest outside of a small group of activist investors.

This year, that seems to be changing. Though fewer compensation proposals were put forward -- 159 so far versus 252 last year -- a larger percentage are making it onto proxy ballots and receiving significant support, according to Institutional Shareholder Services, which tracks and evaluates proxy votes for large investors such as pension plans and mutual funds.

A proposal at Lucent Technologies Inc. to tie incentive compensation -- bonuses, stock and stock options -- to company performance passed with 54 percent of the vote in February after falling short last year. And shareholders at Morgan Stanley defied management this month to adopt a proposal requiring shareholder approval for any future severance packages worth more than three times salary. The vote was widely seen as a slap at the $44 million in cash awarded to chief executive Philip J. Purcell when he was ousted last year.

Executive pay "has always been an irritant but now it's risen to the top of the pile for U.S. investors," said ISS Vice President Patrick McGurn. "We're seeing a steady stream of 40 percent support or more for these pay-for-superior-performance resolutions. Investors are starting to say, 'If not now, when?' "

Even institutional investors that have traditionally voted with management are growing concerned. An ISS survey of 320 institutional investors worldwide found that 21 percent of U.S. investors and 36 percent in Canada ranked executive compensation as the most important corporate governance issue, far outpacing issues such as company performance and financial reporting.

Observers and activists say the issue has gained steam for two reasons: Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox spotlighted the issue with a proposal to force companies to disclose more compensation information, including previously hidden perks. In addition, chief executive pay has continued to rise.

According to a survey by Mercer Consulting of 350 large public companies, median total direct compensation -- salary, bonus and present-day value of long-term stock and option grants -- rose 5 percent in 2005, to $6.8 million. The median value of chief executive salary and bonuses alone rose 7.1 percent, to $2.4 million.

"It just seems to get worse and worse. At the moment the most we can hope for is to slow it down, and that's not acceptable," said Jack Bogle, the retired chief executive of Vanguard Investments who is sharply critical of high executive salaries in his recent book "The Battle for the Soul of Capitalism."

The rise in executive compensation was in line with the 6.8 percent median increase in total shareholder return but far outpaced the consumer price index, which rose 3.4 percent. Real hourly non-farm wages rose 2.1 percent in 2005, according to the Labor Department.

"People have had enough," said Richard Ferlauto, director of pension and benefit policy for AFSCME, which has resolutions asking for an annual up-or-down shareholder vote on executive pay on ballots not only at Merrill but also at U.S. Bancorp, where the proposal drew about 39.5 percent support, Countrywide Financial Corp. and Home Depot Inc.

Company officials argued in interviews and in proxy materials sent to investors that they are working to align executive pay with performance and that the activists' proposals are too rigid. Black & Decker's management, for example, opposed its shareholder pay-for-performance proposal, arguing that the company needed to "maintain the flexibility" to reward good performances.

Both Mercer's statistics and a rival survey of 200 large firms by Pearl Meyer & Partners found that chief executive compensation rose more slowly in 2005 than in 2004, when the increase in total shareholder return was higher. In addition, most chief executives' salaries now move in the same direction as company results. "You don't see a lot of people in the bad-boy box where pay went up and the company's stock went down," said Pearl Meyer managing partner Jan Koors. But, she noted, "The median continues to rise."

That's the issue raised by the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America's "pay for superior performance" proposal, which made it onto ballots at 17 companies, including Black & Decker. The nonbinding resolution asks companies to withhold incentive compensation from chief executives unless earnings or shareholder returns outperform median performance by the company's peers. The proposal drew 39 percent support at Dupont on Wednesday and is pending at 14 other companies.

"You should get superior pay for superior performance. What we have now is superior pay for average or below-average performance," said Ed Durkin, director of corporate affairs for the carpenters union.

Pfizer shareholders proposed withholding votes from directors after the SEC turned down an AFL-CIO proposal that would have required shareholder approval for pensions that exceeded an executive's salary. The activists complained that Pfizer shares have fallen 44 percent since McKinnell took the helm in 2001. Company officials argued that they are already addressing the problem. In 2005, McKinnell's salary and bonus totaled $5.97 million, down 4 percent from 2004. Pfizer shares dropped 13 percent last year.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutor Weighs Charges Against Rove In Leak Case (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller And David Johnston

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 27 — Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the special prosecutor in the C.I.A. leak case, is expected to decide in the next two to three weeks whether to bring perjury charges against Karl Rove, the powerful adviser to President Bush, lawyers involved in the case said Thursday.

With the completion of Mr. Rove's fifth appearance before the grand jury on Wednesday, Mr. Fitzgerald is now believed to have assembled all of the facts necessary to determine whether to seek an indictment of Mr. Rove or drop the case.

Lawyers in the case said Mr. Fitzgerald would spend the coming days reviewing the transcript of Mr. Rove's three hours of testimony on Wednesday and weigh it against his previous statements to the grand jury as well as the testimony of others, including a sworn statement that Mr. Rove's lawyer gave to the prosecutor earlier this year. The lawyers were granted anonymity so they could speak about the internal legal deliberations in Mr. Rove's case.

A lawyer with knowledge of the case said that Mr. Rove had known for more than a month that he was likely to make another appearance before the grand jury, and that he had known since last fall that he would be subject to further questions from Mr. Fitzgerald before the prosecutor completed his inquiry.

Mr. Rove was relieved of his day-to-day domestic policy duties at the White House in a staff shake-up last week, but White House officials say the change was unrelated to his legal complications.

Randall Samborn, a spokesman for Mr. Fitzgerald, declined to comment.

Mark Corallo, a spokesman for Mr. Rove, said Mr. Rove would be cleared. "We're confident at the end of this that Mr. Fitzgerald is going to find that Karl has been totally truthful and not only has done nothing wrong but has done everything right," Mr. Corallo said.

Mr. Fitzgerald must specifically decide whether Mr. Rove misled the grand jury in testimony he gave in 2004 about his conversations with reporters about Valerie Wilson, the intelligence officer at the heart of the C.I.A. leak case.

In his February 2004 testimony, Mr. Rove acknowledged talking to the columnist Robert D. Novak about Ms. Wilson, but he did not tell the grand jury about a second conversation he had about her with Matthew Cooper, a Time magazine reporter. Mr. Novak revealed her name and C.I.A. employment in a column on July 14, 2003.

Critics of the Bush administration have asserted that the revelation was retaliation against her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former diplomat who had publicly accused the administration of twisting some of the intelligence used to justify going to war with Iraq.

Mr. Rove later voluntarily told the grand jury about the conversation with Mr. Cooper, and said that he had forgotten about it in the rush of his daily business. But Mr. Fitzgerald has long been skeptical of Mr. Rove's account of his forgetfulness, lawyers in the case say. On Wednesday Mr. Fitzgerald questioned Mr. Rove about how he came to remember his conversation with Mr. Cooper.

Robert D. Luskin, Mr. Rove's lawyer, issued a statement on Wednesday declaring that Mr. Rove had testified "voluntarily and unconditionally" about a matter that had arisen since Mr. Rove's last grand jury appearance, in October 2005. Mr. Luskin was evidently referring to the testimony of Viveca Novak, a former reporter at Time magazine, who has said that she told Mr. Rove's lawyer in early 2004 that she believed that Mr. Rove had been a source for Mr. Cooper.

Mr. Rove admitted from the outset to investigators that he spoke to Mr. Novak on July 9, 2003, about Ms. Wilson. It was in that conversation that Mr. Rove first learned the name of Ms. Wilson from Mr. Novak, lawyers in the case said.

Mr. Rove's conversation with Mr. Cooper occurred two days later. In that conversation, Mr. Rove did not mention Ms. Wilson's name, but, Mr. Cooper said, Mr. Rove did say that she worked at the C.I.A.

Mr. Fitzgerald did not learn of Mr. Rove's conversation with Mr. Cooper until long after the investigation had begun, when a search of Mr. Rove's e-mail messages uncovered one that he had sent to Stephen J. Hadley, then the deputy national security adviser, about the Cooper conversation.

It is still not publicly known why Mr. Rove's e-mail message to Mr. Hadley was not turned over earlier, but a lawyer in the case said White House documents were collected in response to several separate requests that may not have covered certain time periods or all relevant officials. Mr. Rove had no role in the search for documents, which was carried out by an administrative office in the White House.

Also on Thursday, a federal judge refused to dismiss charges against I. Lewis Libby Jr., the former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney who was indicted on perjury and obstruction charges in the leak case last year.

The judge, Reggie B. Walton of Federal District Court, turned down a motion by lawyers for Mr. Libby who challenged Mr. Fitzgerald's authority to handle the case.

Judge Rules Charges Against Libby Stand (USAT)

USA Today, April 28, 2006

A federal judge refused Thursday to dismiss charges against I. Lewis “Scooter” Libby, the former White House aide who was indicted on perjury and obstruction charges last year in the CIA leak scandal.

In a 31-page opinion, Judge Reggie Walton turned down a motion by lawyers for Vice President Cheney's one-time top assistant, who challenged the authority of special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald to handle the case. Libby's lawyers had argued that Fitzgerald was given too much power and that the appointment should have been made by the president. However, Walton said there is no question the attorney general can delegate any of his functions. After then-attorney general John Ashcroft recused himself from the investigation, Ashcroft's deputy James Comey appointed Fitzgerald to conduct the probe into who leaked the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame in 2003.

Lawmakers from California, New York and New Jersey denounced a proposal to change HIV/AIDS funding that could shift tens of millions of dollars from the West and Northeast to the South. The Bush administration and Southern lawmakers including Rep. Charlie Norwood, R-Ga., countered that changes are needed to bring fairness to the way $2 billion is distributed each year. Investigators with the Government Accountability Office have found that some funding formulas disproportionately benefit states with urban areas because of a quirk that double-counts AIDS patients in 51 metropolitan areas. A separate quirk that counts some dead patients helps only San Francisco, giving the city an extra $7 million a year. The White House wants to eliminate both these quirks, but it has not revealed its plan and how it would affect states.

A senior FBI official is retiring less than a year after taking charge of the bureau's National Security Branch. Gary Bald will end his nearly 29-year career with the FBI on June 2, Director Robert Mueller said. Mueller gave no reason for Bald's decision but praised his leadership. Bald said the time was right to retire, “weighing our progress on implementation of the NSB as well as family considerations.” The branch brings together counterintelligence, counterterrorism and intelligence.

Pakistan would not support the use of force to halt neighbor Iran's nuclear programs, Foreign Secretary Riaz Khan said after a meeting with Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns in Washington. “We want this issue resolved diplomatically,” Khan said. Judge Won't Dismiss Case Against Libby (AP)

By Toni Locy

The Associated Press, April 27, 2006

A federal judge refused Thursday to dismiss charges against I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the former top White House aide who was indicted on perjury and obstruction charges last year in the CIA leak scandal.

In a 31-page opinion, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton turned down a motion by lawyers for Vice President Dick Cheney's one-time top assistant, who challenged the authority of Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald to handle the case.

Libby's lawyers had argued that Fitzgerald was given too much power — more than the attorney general — and that the appointment should have been made by the president with the Senate's approval.

Walton said Thursday he did not need to "look far" in the law to reject the claim by Libby's defense team. The judge said there is no question the attorney general can delegate any of his functions.

"There was no wholesale abdication of the attorney general's duty to direct and supervise litigation," he wrote.

Then-Attorney General John Ashcroft had recused himself from the investigation because of his White House contacts. James Comey, who was deputy attorney general at the time, appointed Fitzgerald, giving him wide berth to conduct the investigation into who leaked the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame to reporters in 2003.

"This case provides the clearest example of why such broad discretion is necessary," Walton wrote. "Here, the attorney general believed there was a conflict of interest ... It was, therefore, entirely appropriate for the attorney general to remove himself completely from the investigation."

Walton said there must be a way to appoint special prosecutors to ensure that "the perception of fairness withstands the scrutiny of the American public" when high-level government officials are investigated for alleged wrongdoing.

Libby, 55, is charged with perjury and obstruction of justice, accused of lying to the FBI and a federal grand jury about how he learned about Plame and what he subsequently told reporters about her.

Conservative columnist Robert Novak named her in a column July 14, 2003, eight days after Plame's husband, former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, alleged in an opinion piece in The New York Times that the Bush administration had twisted prewar intelligence on Iraq to justify going to war.

The CIA sent Wilson to Niger in early 2002 to determine whether there was any truth to reports that Iraq had tried to buy yellowcake uranium from Niger to make a nuclear weapon. Wilson discounted the reports. But the allegation nevertheless wound up in President Bush's 2003 State of the Union address.

Walton said Comey made the legal analysis more difficult by failing to appoint Fitzgerald under Justice Department rules for special prosecutors. As a result, the judge said he had to rely on a series of letters Comey wrote to Fitzgerald outlining the CIA leak investigation.

The judge concluded that Fitzgerald's powers are limited because he can be removed by the Justice Department. Walton also said Fitzgerald's authority will expire when the CIA leak investigation and resulting prosecutions are concluded.

"The integrity of the rule of law ... is challenged to the greatest degree when high-level government officials come under suspicion for violating the law," Walton wrote. "And a criminal investigation of any individuals, prominent or not ... must be above reproach to preserve respect for the fairness of our system of justice."

Little Is Clear In Laws On Leaks (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

The firing of a veteran CIA officer for unauthorized contacts with the press has focused attention on the patchwork of federal laws that govern disclosures of classified information, which are written broadly but are difficult to enforce and have historically been used sparingly in cases involving journalists.

Numerous experts on national security law said Mary O. McCarthy, whom the CIA fired 10 days before her retirement for allegedly having undisclosed contacts with reporters, could conceivably be prosecuted under a number of statutes, including those governing espionage, disclosures of classified information and even theft of government property.

Yet those experts warned that any such prosecution is fraught with obstacles, including the difficulty in showing that disclosures were made with knowledge that they would harm national security or were intended to benefit a foreign power.

In addition, McCarthy's attorney, Ty Cobb, said on Monday that she did not leak classified information to reporters, disputing a key accusation in a CIA statement issued last week. Cobb also said McCarthy did not disclose the existence of secret CIA-run prisons in Eastern Europe to a Washington Post reporter, which has been a primary focus of an internal leak investigation ordered by CIA Director Porter J. Goss.

"From the criminal side, there are a lot of difficulties with respect to this case," said Mark S. Zaid, a Washington lawyer who has represented many former employees in disputes with the CIA and other intelligence agencies. "I wouldn't be surprised if they decline prosecution, because it might create more problems than it's worth."

The case comes amid renewed debate in Congress over whether to increase penalties for leaking or to consider rewriting espionage and classified information laws. This week, the House approved a bill requiring the director of national intelligence to study yanking pensions for those caught revealing secrets.

Unlike in similar cases, such as the New York Times's disclosure of a warrantless eavesdropping program run by the National Security Agency, the CIA has not formally asked the Justice Department or the FBI to open a criminal probe into The Post's article on prisons, law enforcement officials said this week. Reporters at The Post and the Times were awarded Pulitzer Prizes this month for those articles.

In the latter half of the 20th century, including the Cold War years, the government prosecuted only one non-espionage leak case in federal courts. But the Justice Department has more recently signaled its willingness to test the boundaries of espionage law in a case involving two pro-Israel lobbyists, and the CIA and other intelligence agencies have launched aggressive internal probes to detect and punish leakers.

No statute in the U.S. criminal code covers all unauthorized disclosures of classified information, and Congress has debated whether an overarching law should be enacted. President Bill Clinton vetoed one such attempt shortly before he left office, and the Justice Department opposed a similar proposal in 2002, saying most, if not all, incidents can be dealt with under existing laws and administrative procedures.

The Intelligence Identities Protection Act outlaws deliberate identification of covert agents; other laws focus on electronic communications, codes, atomic secrets and other sensitive data.

The pivotal statute is the Espionage Act of 1917, which was aimed at traditional foreign spies when written but, according to the government, is broad enough to encompass a much wider array of situations.

The law outlaws unauthorized disclosure or receipt of a wide range of information "relating to the national defense" and is not explicitly limited to classified data. Many legal experts and defense lawyers argue that the law is so expansive it may be unconstitutional and, said Syracuse University law professor William C. Banks, "shot full of holes."

"It's been very difficult for the government to use the Espionage Act to obtain a conviction for simply leaking information," said Banks, who also runs the Institute for National Security and Counterterrorism at Syracuse. "It was written to cover conventional espionage and spying, not conventional leaking within the government."

But the government was successful in using the statute in the case of Samuel L. Morison, a former Navy intelligence analyst convicted of espionage and theft during the Reagan administration for leaking secret U.S. spy satellite photographs to Jane's Defense Weekly. A judge in the case ruled against defense assertions that the Espionage Act was unconstitutionally vague.

Currently, two lobbyists for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) are accused of receiving classified information during conversations with government officials, including former Pentagon employee Lawrence A. Franklin, who has been sentenced to 12 years in prison. In bringing the case, the government for the first time indicted two nongovernmental employees under the espionage law.

Prosecutors have also alarmed journalism groups and free-speech advocates by asserting that reporters could be prosecuted under the Espionage Act for receiving and publishing classified information. The laws governing classified material do not make it illegal to publish such material except in specific circumstances; for example, one statute outlaws reproducing or publishing photographs or drawings of designated military installations without government permission.

But in a brief filed in the AIPAC case, Justice Department lawyers argued there "plainly is no exemption in the statutes for the press," saying the Espionage Act and some Supreme Court opinions indicate that journalists can be prosecuted for revealing classified information.

At the same time, the lawyers said that prosecuting a reporter "would raise legitimate and serious issues and would not be undertaken lightly," adding that "the fact that there has never been such a prosecution speaks for itself."

Such disputes have renewed calls to revise the laws on classified information and espionage.

"The system is ossified, complicated and a relic of the Cold War period," said Elizabeth Rindskopf Parker, a former CIA and NSA general counsel who is dean of the University of the Pacific's law school and was recently named to a government board formed to oversee classification issues. "I think it needs to be looked at seriously again."

All Leaks Aren't Equal; It's The Meaning That Matters (USAT)

USA Today, April 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027171

For those not paying close daily attention, here's a catch-up on the Bush administration's hunt to uncover people who leak information it wants hidden:

•Wednesday, President Bush's closest political ally, Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, was called for the fifth time before a grand jury exploring the leak of a CIA operative's name. Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff is already under indictment as part of this probe; he says Bush himself authorized his disclosures.

•Last week, in an unrelated incident, the CIA very publicly fired a high-ranking CIA officer for unspecified leaks — which she denies.

•Meanwhile, hunts continue to discover who provided information to The Washington Post and The New York Times for two stories that embarrassed the administration. One disclosed that the CIA had been operating a covert prison system for gloves-off interrogation of terrorism suspects, possibly violating U.S. and international laws. The other revealed the government was eavesdropping without court warrants on telephone conversations of thousands of U.S. residents.

Are these, as the administration claims, outrageous leaks that jeopardize national security? Or are they attempts by honest people to expose abuse of power?

The vast majority of Washington leaks are neither. They usually have nothing to do with national security, and they come from a politician, bureaucrat or lobbyist trying to manipulate the news media into peddling a selective version of reality on a no-name basis.

But occasionally, a leak is something more.

Coincidentally, a memoir arrived this week from Watergate's "Deep Throat." It reminds us that some leaks are leaks of conscience, from public-spirited individuals trying to blow the whistle on government practices at odds with American ideals.

W. Mark Felt, then second-in-command at the FBI, writes: "From the start, it was clear that senior administration officials were up to their necks in this mess, and that they would stop at nothing to sabotage our investigation." Events proved how right he was.

Felt is one of many. Defense analyst Daniel Ellsberg leaked the Pentagon papers in 1971, after he couldn't get anyone in the administration or Congress to take seriously the implications of the detailed history of U.S. involvement in Vietnam that he had compiled.

More recently, a still-unidentified person leaked the photos of prisoner abuse at Iraq's Abu Ghraib, sensing that the only way to stop such practices was to appeal to the sensibilities of the public.

Harmful to U.S. interests? Definitely. Essential to protect U.S. values? No doubt. The same dichotomy applies in the secret-prison and wiretapping stories.

Nor is the leak of conscience limited to government. Embarrassed employees of the tobacco industry exposed its coverup aimed at denying the deadliness of their product.

That is not to say that employees anywhere should have free rein to say anything. At the CIA, for instance, employees are generally prohibited from talking to the news media or writing about their experiences. Even in more normal circumstances, confidentiality is essential to conducting business.

But as the leak probes continue, it's important to maintain a distinction between those who leak to help themselves and those who leak, at personal risk, to let the public know its leaders are flouting law or abusing power.

People can decide whether the programs and policies exposed are noble or shameful — just as they were able to draw conclusions about Watergate, Vietnam, Abu Ghraib and the tobacco industry. And despite the cries of those who would operate in secret, isn't that how democracy is supposed to work?

F.B.I. Set To Present Subpoenas To Lawmaker's Nonprofits (NYT)

By Jodi Rudoren

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

The F.B.I. has notified three nonprofit organizations created by Representative Alan B. Mollohan and financed primarily through special federal appropriations he steered their way that they should expect subpoenas soon for financial and other records.

Mr. Mollohan, Democrat of West Virginia, stepped down from the House ethics committee last week over accusations of financial impropriety that stem largely from a complaint the conservative National Legal and Policy Center has filed with the United States attorney in Washington.

The nonprofits at issue are the Vandalia Heritage Foundation, the Institute for Scientific Research and the Canaan Valley Institute. The F.B.I.'s notification to them has occurred over the last two days and signals that the bureau is looking deeper into the 500-page complaint, which among other things suggests ties between the special appropriations, or earmarks, and Mr. Mollohan's personal real estate investments.

Mr. Mollohan's office did not return repeated calls yesterday. Nor did Vandalia's president, Laura Kurtz Kuhns, whose ownership of vacant lots on Bald Head Island, N.C., with Mr. Mollohan and their spouses is a prime focus of the conservative group's complaint.

Though Ms. Kuhns could not be reached, an official of Mr. Mollohan's network of nonprofit groups confirmed that Vandalia had been told to expect a subpoena. And leaders of the two other nonprofits — Kiena L. Smith, Canaan Valley's executive director, and James L. Estep, president of the Institute for Scientific Research — said they planned to cooperate fully with the F.B.I.

Mr. Estep said an investigator for the bureau called the institute's office yesterday to get confirmation of the mailing address and warn of a coming "informational subpoena."

Mr. Estep, who also heads the West Virginia High Technology Consortium Foundation, a nonprofit created by Mr. Mollohan that has not been contacted by the authorities, added: "They're welcome to come into either organization, and we will provide whatever they want and answer whatever questions they have. We have nothing to hide."

Ms. Smith said her receptionist took a call Wednesday in which an F.B.I. representative promised a subpoena for financial records within "a couple of days."

"We have 10 public audits, it's fine," she said. "Anybody can look at our records. They're public information."

Lobbyist Stripped Of Good Name, But Not Of Good Vacation (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 27 — Jack Abramoff may be facing financial ruin and a long prison sentence, but he still knows how to vacation.

Guests at the oceanfront Turnberry Isle Resort and Country Club in Aventura, Fla., say they were surprised to see Mr. Abramoff, his wife and their five children at the 300-acre golf and tennis resort for more than a week this month for the Passover holiday.

Like many other guests at the resort then, the Abramoffs arranged the trip through a travel agency based in Brooklyn that, according to its Web site, charged a minimum of $3,600 per adult for a nine-night Passover package.

A lawyer for Mr. Abramoff, Abbe D. Lowell, said the trip was paid for by Mr. Abramoff's "extended family," although Mr. Lowell would not say which family member or members. He said Mr. Abramoff "definitely did not pay" for the holiday.

Mr. Lowell said in an interview that it was a "cheap shot to suggest that Mr. Abramoff was living high off the hog" and that the trip, which allowed Mr. Abramoff to meet with his lawyers in Miami on a related criminal case, was intended to benefit his family in a difficult time.

The tour agency, Presidential Kosher Holidays, which the Abramoffs had used in the past to arrange Passover vacations, would not comment, saying it protects its clients' privacy. The company charges rates on a sliding scale for children based on their ages, but it declined to reveal the children's rates to a reporter.

In court papers last month, Mr. Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty in Washington to seeking to corrupt Congress members and other public officials, in part by sending them on expensive trips, insisted that he was financially ruined as a result of his plea bargain with the Justice Department.

"Mr. Abramoff is broke," his lawyers said in a court filing in Miami, where they were asking for leniency for Mr. Abramoff after he pleaded guilty there to fraud involving his purchase of a casino-boat fleet. "He is tormented daily that his wife will not be able to support the large family on her own."

Turnberry Isle, on the Atlantic coast between Miami and Fort Lauderdale, is often found on lists of the nation's best resorts. According to its Web site, room rates this month begin at $559 a night. It has two 18-hole golf courses designed by Robert Trent Jones, 11 tennis courts, two swimming pools, three restaurants and a marina.

The Web site of Presidential Kosher Holidays described the resort package as "everything you could want in a Passover vacation" including "gourmet Glatt Kosher cuisine."

Guests at Turnberry Isle said Mr. Abramoff, who is praised by friends for his devotion to Judaism and to his family, did not appear eager to make his presence known.

"I was passingly aware of Mr. Abramoff, whom I saw a couple of times in the course of my stay," said Gil Graff, director of the Bureau of Jewish Education of Greater Los Angeles, who was taken to the resort by Presidential Kosher Holidays to provide lectures to the Passover guests on modern Jewish history. "I know that he was present."

Modi Rosenfeld, a comedian from New York who entertained the Passover guests at the resort, said he was asked by organizers of his appearance not to do political humor because someone in the audience was "political" and was "in the news."

Mr. Rosenfeld said he did not know that they were referring to Mr. Abramoff. "They said, Can you not do anything political?" said Mr. Rosenfeld, who uses only his first name professionally. "I said, 'Not a problem.' I kept the political humor down to a few bare jokes."

Mr. Rosenfeld said that had he known that the celebrity in the audience was Mr. Abramoff, whose lobbying operation earned more than $80 million in fees in recent years, "I would have charged more — a lot more."

Former MS-13 Leader Gets 30 Years (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

The judge wanted Juan Carlos Rivas-Moreiera to understand exactly what he was saying yesterday in D.C. Superior Court.

So when the time came to explain why he was about to sentence the onetime MS-13 leader to 30 years in prison for a near-fatal attack on a rival gang member, Judge Hiram E. Puig-Lugo took the unusual step of addressing him in their shared mother tongue.

Speaking in Spanish, Puig-Lugo said that rarely had he seen a defendant as smart as Rivas-Moreiera and never had he seen a defendant so involved in his own defense.

"You could have been a businessman, or an attorney, or a doctor, or a teacher -- or a judge," Puig-Lugo told him.

Instead, Rivas-Moreiera, 25, used his smarts and charisma to rise to the top of the MS-13 Marineros, a Maryland clique of the notorious Latino gang that has its roots in Central America.

And far from being the worst of his alleged acts, the May 2001 attack in Northwest Washington was only one crime in a life rife with it, the prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Gilberto Guerrero Jr., said.

Rivas-Moreiera, of Silver Spring, is among the reputed members of MS-13, or Mara Salvatrucha, who were charged in Maryland last year in a federal racketeering indictment that details murders, kidnapping, robbery and other crimes.

The indictment was a significant regional strike against local Latino gangs, which have lured isolated and disaffected adolescents into dangerous lifestyles and sown fear in neighborhoods that are heavily populated by immigrants.

"It is a loss for our community that you chose to use your intelligence in the way you did," Puig-Lugo said. "Every time you recruit somebody to be part of your mara " -- as gangs are called -- "you are stealing someone from our community."

A lawyer. A teacher. A doctor.

But pained as the judge appeared by the sight of such potential squandered, it was the harrowing events of May 19, 2001, that led him, he said, to depart from the District's sentencing guidelines and hand down a penalty considerably closer to the maximum.

On that night, Rivas-Moreiera was out for revenge, according to the account laid out by prosecutors in court papers and at trial. Seven months earlier, he had been attacked by Roque Elias Lopez-Gonzalez, a member of Mara R, another gang. Although Lopez-Gonzalez was quickly outnumbered and overpowered, Rivas-Moreiera wasn't willing to forget, and that night in May, he was still smarting.

Accompanied by two fellow gang members, he went looking for anyone who belonged to Mara R. They found Elgar Hernandez in a liquor store at 14th Street NW and Florida Avenue. When Rivas-Moreiera asked Hernandez what gang he was with, Hernandez told him "La R," as Mara R is also known. Rivas-Moreiera said he and his friends were also from "La R."

They weren't, and that soon became clear to Hernandez.

The three strangers jumped him a short time later in an alley off Chapin Street NW. One of them put a gun to Hernandez's head and forced him into their car. This, he was told, was payback, no matter that Hernandez had nothing to do with the earlier attack.

As they drove along Piney Branch Parkway NW, Hernandez was stabbed through the chest and in the heart, setting off a furious struggle inside the car. Hernandez managed to pull the knife out of his chest and throw it out the window. And when the car slowed at 17th Street, he got out.

When passersby spotted him, someone called 911, and Hernandez was taken to Washington Hospital Center, where he had open-heart surgery and survived to testify against Rivas-Moreiera.

But his testimony would not be enough. The first two trials, both last year, ended in hung juries.

Only after prosecutors made a deal with an MS-13 member to have him testify did they manage to win a conviction against Rivas-Moreiera, who was found guilty in February of assault with a dangerous weapon, aggravated assault while armed and threats.

Rivas-Moreiera's attorney, Ross Hecht, said in court that his client plans to appeal. Given that he faces the federal charges in Maryland, Rivas-Moreiera chose not to address the court.

DOJ_NMG_0027174

The U.S. attorney's office had urged the judge to depart from the voluntary sentencing guidelines, pushing for a penalty beyond the recommended 10 to 20 years.

The judge agreed.

"You are not going to keep hurting our community," Puig-Lugo said, citing the cruel and violent nature of the attack, the link to organized crime and the threats that Rivas-Moreiera made against the victim, the victim's family and a witness in the case.

"I'm sorry to have to issue such a harsh sentence," Puig-Lugo said, "but your conduct over the years leaves me no choice."

Sniper Trial To Echo First Case (WT/AP)

By Stephen Manning, Associated Press

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

The beat-up Chevrolet Caprice, a hole drilled in the trunk for a gun barrel, is back in Maryland. So is the Bushmaster rifle, fixed with a sniper scope, that authorities think fired the fatal .223-caliber bullets.

Many witnesses who testified against convicted sniper John Allen Muhammad in his trial in Virginia are ready to tell their stories again, including some who bear scars from the Bushmaster's bullets.

And Muhammad has returned to Montgomery County, where the October 2002 D.C.-area sniper spree began, to face another jury.

Jury selection is set to begin Monday in his second trial, a case that likely will echo the 2003 Virginia case that ended in a death sentence for one of the 10 killings. Yet while much of the evidence and testimony during the expected five-week trial will be similar, the new trial could take some unexpected turns.

Muhammad, 45, plans to be his own lawyer despite evidence he may be mentally ill. He wants Lee Boyd Malvo, 21, also convicted in Virginia and serving a life sentence, to testify. And jurors will hear evidence about two Maryland killings that weren't part of the first trial.

"This trial addresses completely different victims," said Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler, whose office will prosecute Muhammad. "The first trial was about one murder in Virginia. This trial will be about six murders here in Montgomery County."

Mr. Gansler was the first to file homicide charges in 2002, but lost the right to try Muhammad and of Malvo first to Virginia, which is more inclined to impose the death penalty. He argues his county was home to the most killings and bills the retrials of the two men later this year as insurance if their Virginia convictions are overturned.

But there are questions whether the new trial is necessary or worth the cost.

The severest punishment Muhammad faces in Maryland is life in prison. The most Muhammad could likely hope for in Virginia is to have his death sentence replaced by a life term, said his Virginia attorney, Peter D. Greenspun.

"There is no reason for this prosecution to occur," Mr. Greenspun said. "It's not as if there is a reversal, then John Muhammad walks out onto the street."

Virginia spent $3 million to prosecute the snipers. While Maryland's costs have not approached that level, expenses are mounting.

Montgomery County has spent $210,000 on courtroom security and transportation, a figure Sheriff Ray Kight expects to double by the end of the trials. Jailing the pair from their arrival last summer to January cost roughly $240,000.

However, most of the preparation work on evidence and witnesses was done for the Virginia trial. Mr. Gansler's prosecutors are salaried. And Muhammad's three standby attorneys are working for free.

Some relatives of the Maryland victims think the two should be held accountable, regardless of the cost.

Victoria Snider, sister of James "Sonny" Buchanan, plans to attend the trial often even though it means revisiting grim details of her brother's death.

"I won't lie, it is emotional," she said. "But it is also important that justice be served on both of them."

Kaine Denies Clemency; Killer Executed (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

RICHMOND -- Death row inmate Dexter Lee Vinson was executed last night, hours after Gov. Timothy M. Kaine denied his petition for clemency.

Vinson received a lethal injection at the Greensville Correctional Center in Jarratt and was pronounced dead at 9:15 p.m.

Vinson, 43, was convicted of the 1997 murder of his ex-girlfriend, Angela Felton, of Portsmouth. A 25-year-old mother of three, Mrs. Felton was abducted and brought to an abandoned house, where she was stabbed and sexually mutilated. She bled to death.

It was the first death penalty case Mr. Kaine, a Democrat and a devout Catholic, had considered since taking office in January. The death penalty became a major issue during the gubernatorial race last year when Republican Jerry W. Kilgore criticized Mr. Kaine's opposition to capital punishment.

Mr. Kaine vowed that he would uphold Virginia's capital punishment law, despite the teachings of his faith.

Mr. Kaine denied clemency last night, after the U.S. Supreme Court refused to stop the execution.

"Having carefully reviewed the Petition for Clemency and judicial opinions regarding this case, I find no compelling reasons to doubt Mr. Vinson's guilt or to invalidate the sentence recommended by the jury and imposed, and affirmed, by the courts," Mr. Kaine said in a statement. "Accordingly, I decline to intervene."

Vinson became the 95th inmate Virginia has executed since the Supreme Court reinstated capital punishment in 1976. Only Texas has executed more, with 362.

Vinson denied he had anything to do with Mrs. Felton's slaying, and his attorneys had argued that their client's trial was riddled with holes.

Court records show that witnesses said they saw Vinson near the house where Mrs. Felton's body was found. Court papers also show that investigators said Vinson's palm print was found at the crime scene and that a drop of Mrs. Felton's blood was found on a pair of shorts in Vinson's home.

Earlier this week, Vinson's attorneys scrambled to delay the execution by filing appeals.

One appeal argued that there were several shortcomings in Vinson's trial. The other petition asked the Supreme Court to delay his execution until the court decides whether a Florida inmate could challenge that lethal injection violates his civil rights because it is a form of cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Constitution.

The question centers on whether inmates feel excruciating pain when the final drug in the lethal mixture is administered.

Like Florida, Virginia administers three drugs. The first is an anesthetic that puts the inmate to sleep. The second is a chemical that causes paralysis, and the third is potassium chloride, which stops the heart.

Dressed in a light blue, button-down shirt and denim pants, Vinson did not look through the glass at witnesses, including several of the victim's family members, as he was brought into the death chamber at 8:58 p.m.

When asked whether he had any final words, Vinson shook his head sharply back and forth several times.

His expression remained blank as he was strapped to the gurney. The drugs began to flow at 9:08 p.m.; he was pronounced dead seven minutes later.

His last visitors were his sisters. He ate his final meal at 4:15 p.m., but corrections officials would not reveal what he ate, at Vinson's request.

Mrs. Felton's former mother-in-law, Wilhelmena Gatling, said yesterday that she hoped Vinson's death would bring some comfort to Mrs. Felton's children, now teenagers.

"I think it will bring closure to the children, but I don't believe in the death penalty, so it's not going to bring closure to me," Mrs. Gatling said. "But as long as the children can go on, I can go on.

"She was a great mother and daughter-in-law," Mrs. Gatling added. "I don't care what you do, you can't replace a mother."

Kaine Allows Execution Despite His Beliefs (WP)

By Candace Rondeaux And Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine rejected a plea for clemency yesterday from convicted killer Dexter Lee Vinson, allowing his execution to go forward in the first test of Kaine's stated public resolve to uphold the death penalty despite his personal opposition.

Vinson, 43, was executed by lethal injection last night in Virginia's death chamber for abducting, stabbing and sexually mutilating his ex-girlfriend in Portsmouth in 1997. He was pronounced dead at 9:15 at the Greensville Correctional Center in Jarratt, said Larry Traylor, a Department of Corrections spokesman.

"I find no compelling reasons to doubt Mr. Vinson's guilt or to invalidate the sentence recommended by the jury and imposed, and affirmed, by the courts," Kaine said in a brief statement issued 2 1/2 hours before Vinson was put to death. "Accordingly, I decline to intervene."

With those words, Kaine made good on a promise he spoke directly and repeatedly to Virginians last year at campaign rallies and in television ads: that his personal and long-standing opposition to the death penalty, based on his Catholic faith, would not prevent him from allowing the ultimate punishment to be carried out.

Kaine's Republican opponent in the governor's race, former attorney general Jerry W. Kilgore, had repeatedly slammed Kaine for his stance on the death penalty, and ran ads featuring the victims of heinous crimes. In one, the father of a crime victim said Kaine would not have executed Adolph Hitler.

But Kaine responded with ads of his own, in which he vowed to enforce Virginia's capital punishment laws. "My faith teaches life is sacred," he said to the camera. "But I take my oath of office seriously, and I'll enforce the death penalty."

The campaign-trail bashing proved a boon for Kaine, whose public declarations about his personal faith appeared to bolster -- not hurt -- his numbers in the polls and helped lift him to victory in November.

On Thursday, the new governor waited in his third-floor office across from the state Capitol to hear the outcome of Vinson's final court appeals, and to weigh Vinson's request for clemency. An aide said he consulted frequently with his chief counsel, Larry Roberts, and a small "brain trust of lawyers of his own choosing."

Delacey Skinner, Kaine's communications director, said, "This is a decision that he makes alone."

The clemency petition called on the governor to commute the convicted murderer's sentence to life in prison without parole. Vinson's attorneys contended that a key witness in the case had lied about seeing Vinson kill the victim, Angela Felton. They also disputed findings about forensic evidence in his case and said he deserved a new trial because his Portsmouth defense attorneys had a conflict of interest.

Days before the execution, a Vatican representative and two Virginia Catholic clergymen -- Arlington Bishop Paul S. Loverde and Bishop Francis DiLorenzo of Richmond -- also urged Kaine to halt Vinson's execution, calling the death penalty "unjustified."

Years ago, Kaine, who once worked with a Catholic mission in Honduras, echoed that same view when as a young lawyer in private practice he defended two death row inmates. In 1987, as he awaited the execution of one of his clients, Kaine told The Washington Post that "murder is wrong in the gulag, in Afghanistan, in Soweto, in the mountains of Guatemala, in Fairfax County . . . and even the Spring Street Penitentiary."

Shortly before Vinson was put to death yesterday, some observers speculated that political pressure would push Kaine to deny Vinson's clemency petition. But during a recent radio interview Kaine eschewed the suggestion that politics might play a role in his first death penalty decision and called Vinson's crime "very gruesome."

"The pressure of trying to make the right decision about whether there is or is not doubt about guilt when somebody's life is at stake is so much more pressure than whatever the political pressure of the day would be," Kaine said.

Yesterday's execution marked the first in Virginia since September 2004.

A Portsmouth jury convicted Vinson in 1998 of capital murder, carjacking, abduction with intent to defile and sexual penetration with an inanimate object, a year after the severely mutilated body of Felton, a 25-year-old mother of three, was found in a vacant house in Portsmouth.

In the years since her daughter's mutilated body was found wrapped in a dirty wool blanket in Portsmouth, Frances Peace has imagined Vinson's death a million times. She said she always thought she would be there to witness his execution. But days beforehand she was unsure if that's what her daughter would have wanted or if she could even summon the strength to attend.

"I want to be there for her. But I don't think it would be good for me to go," Peace said. "I think that's what she's telling me -- 'Mom, don't go. It's alright.' It's not going to bring her back."

Vinson entered the chamber two minutes before his scheduled execution. Several of Felton's family members attended the execution as witnesses. He offered no resistance as several guards strapped him to the gurney. Asked if he had any last words, Vinson shook his head and declined to make a statement. The blue curtain to the witness chamber closed, and reopened eight minutes later.

New York Killers, And Those Killed, By Numbers (NYT)

By Jo Craven McGinty

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

The oldest killer was 88; he murdered his wife. The youngest was 9; she stabbed her friend. The women were more than twice as likely as men to murder a current spouse or lover. But once the romance was over, only the men killed their exes. The deadliest day was on July 10, 2004, when eight people died in separate homicides.

Five people eliminated a boss; 10 others murdered co-workers. Males who killed favored firearms, while women and girls chose knives as often as guns. More homicides occurred in Brooklyn than in any other borough. More happened on Saturday. And roughly a third are unsolved.

At the end of each year, the New York Police Department reports the number of killings — there were 540 in 2005. Typically, much is made of how the number has fallen in recent years — to totals not seen since the early 1960's. But beyond summarizing the overarching trends, the police spend little time compiling the individual details.

The New York Times obtained the basic records for every murder in the city over the last three years, and while the events make for disturbing reading, the numbers can hint at trends, occasionally solve a mystery and in at least some straightforward way answer for the city the questions of who kills and who is killed in the five boroughs.

From 2003 through 2005, 1,662 murders were committed in New York. No information, beyond an occasional physical description, is available on the killers in the unsolved cases.

Of the rest, men and boys were responsible for 93 percent of the murders; they killed with guns about two-thirds of the time; their victims tended to be other men and boys; and in more than half the cases, the killer and the victim knew each other.

The police said they were more interested in disrupting crime patterns. "We're looking for things with operational implications — time of day, day of the week — to see that we deploy officers at the right times and in sufficient numbers," said Michael J. Farrell, deputy commissioner for strategic initiatives.

The offender and victim were of the same race in more than three-quarters of the killings. And according to Mr. Farrell, they often had something else in common: More than 90 percent of the killers had criminal records; and of those who wound up killed, more than half had them.

"If the average New Yorker is concerned about being murdered in a random crime, the odds of that happening are really remote," Mr. Farrell said. "If you are living apart from a life of crime, your risk is negligible."

Criminologists confirm that assessment. "People will be shocked to see how safe it is to live in New York City," said Andrew Karmen, a sociology professor at John Jay College of Criminal Justice and an expert on victimology. "Victims and offenders are pretty much pulled from the same background. Very often, young victims have young killers. Very often, the victim and killer knew each other."

But plenty of times, events diverge from the norm.

At least a quarter of the city's murders in these three years, were committed by strangers, and in those instances, most were the result of a dispute. Stranger homicides now happen at almost twice the rate of 50 years ago, when, according to a classic study by Marvin Wolfgang, a criminologist, about 14 percent of murders were committed by strangers.

"Homicide used to be regarded as an acquaintance phenomenon with relatively rare incidents involving strangers," said Steven F. Messner, a homicide expert and a professor of sociology at the State University of New York at Albany. "It's still characteristically an acquaintance event. But the stranger homicides are now nontrivial."

After four years as commander of the Brooklyn North homicide squad, Lt. John Cornicello said the murders in his section of the borough had begun to run together. Yet from memory, he rolled off the details of several: The good Samaritan shot for his Lincoln Navigator after offering a ride to a group of stranded people. The ".40-caliber killer," a serial murderer who shot and killed but did not rob four shopkeepers because he believed they were Middle Eastern.

"More and more, they seem to be the result of stupidity," Lieutenant Cornicello said. "Take the Potato Wedge Killer."

In that recent case, a customer at a KFC restaurant became incensed when he did not receive enough starch with his fried chicken order. After demanding both a refund and an order of potato wedges, he later confronted the cashier with whom he had argued and stabbed him to death.

Among all the city's victims, the oldest was 91; she died during a robbery. Whites and Asians, who seldom murdered, were also infrequently killed: Together, they represented 75 or fewer victims each year. Most homicides occurred outdoors. The deadliest hour was 1 to 2 a.m.

And a small but unsettling number of children were among the victims, including 21 infants and 32 children ages 1 to 10, most of whom died at the hands of a parent.

According to Professor Karmen, 10 is the safest age. "You're too old to be abused or neglected as a child," he said, "and you're not old enough to be out on the streets."

An interesting, though uncommon, group of murders that made it into the police accounting in these years involved a handful of victims who died of injuries they had first suffered in crimes committed one or more years before.

Stabbed, shot, beaten or burned, they survived long enough to be counted as murder victims in another calendar year.

Sixty-nine victims fit this description.

In some instances, they were injured decades ago. The medical examiner alerts the police when such deaths occur, according to Sgt. Edward Yee of the Police Department's crime analysis unit, and the police add the victims to that year's murder tally.

For example, 21 deaths that were counted as murders in 2005 resulted from injuries that occurred in earlier years.

The oldest involved a shooting in 1975, when a man attacked his brother in a domestic dispute. That raised the murder toll to 540, the lowest figure recorded by the city in four decades, but only 519 murders were committed last year.

Subtracting these belated deaths makes the recent decline in the number of homicides — which has grabbed headlines — seem even more stunning. But for the purpose of generating the annual murder tally, the police do not distinguish between fresh and delayed murders.

"No one does," Mr. Farrell said, referring to other police departments.

DOJ_NMG_0027178

Within the city, 40 percent of the murders occurred in Brooklyn. The 75th Precinct, with 90, had the most of any precinct, but there were hot spots scattered throughout the city, in Brooklyn's 73rd, 79th and 83rd Precincts, for example, and in the 44th and 46th Precincts in the Bronx. In and around the 32nd Precinct in Harlem could be dangerous, too.

No one is certain what explains the recent decreases in the overall number of homicides, but many criminologists believe social factors may help explain why, and where, most murders continue to occur.

"The problem of crime and violence is rooted in neighborhood conditions — high rates of poverty, family disruption, failing schools, lack of recreational opportunities, active recruitment by street gangs, drug markets," Professor Karmen said. "People forced to reside under those conditions are at a greater risk of getting caught up in violence, as victims or as perpetrators."

The police are generally unimpressed by such theories, as well as the minutiae surrounding the deaths.

"Crime is concentrated," Mr. Farrell said. "Who knows why? We're looking at what we can affect."

The roughly one-third of the homicides that remain unsolved create one of the larger categories of murder. Typically, 50 to 55 percent of murders are solved in the same calendar year in which the crime is committed, according to Paul J. Browne, a deputy police commissioner in New York.

The police clear an additional number of murders from previous years, for an overall annual clearance rate of about 70 percent. That beats the national average, which is closer to 62 percent, according to F.B.I. statistics.

In New York, several things may contribute to the number of open cases, according to the police and criminologists. A significant number may have been stranger murders, which are particularly hard to solve. It can take months to collect witness statements.

And sometimes, detectives just cannot get the right person to talk.

"The big secret of detective work," Lieutenant Cornicello said, "is that you've got to get somebody else to tell you what happened."

Duke Accuser Filed Earlier Assault Report (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

DURHAM, N.C., April 27 — The woman who has accused three Duke University lacrosse players of raping her last month claimed a decade ago that she had been sexually assaulted by three men, the authorities said. The woman's mother said her daughter did not file charges.

"She didn't want to bring charges up against them because they said they were going to kill her if she said anything," said the mother, who is not being named because of the nature of the crimes her daughter, a 27-year-old single mother with two children, has said were committed.

The earlier assault was said to have occurred in Creedmoor, N.C., a town about 16 miles northeast of Durham that was the home of the woman's boyfriend at the time, the mother said. The mother said her daughter was 18 then.

But the Creedmoor police chief, Ted Pollard, said the woman filed the report when she was 18, in August 1996, but said the assault had happened in June 1993, when she was 14.

Chief Pollard said the initial report did not explain why there had been a delay of more than three years between the alleged assault and when she reported it. He said Thursday that his office had only paper records from that time period and had not yet determined whether there had been a follow-up investigation.

"It says she was beaten, assaulted and sexually assaulted by three African-American males," Chief Pollard said. "And she identified the three males."

The Creedmoor case was first reported by Essence magazine.

The initial report was taken by Brian Bishop, who was a lieutenant in the Creedmoor Police Department at the time and now is an investigator with the Durham Police Department, Chief Pollard said. The Durham department is investigating the rape accusations at Duke.

Last week, two Duke players were indicted on charges of first-degree forcible rape, first-degree sexual offense and kidnapping : Collin Finnerty, 19, of Garden City, N.Y., and Reade Seligmann, 20, of Essex Fells, N.J. Michael B. Nifong, the Durham County district attorney, has said he is gathering evidence to indict a third person.

Some defense lawyers have attacked the accuser's credibility.

The mother, in an interview late Thursday, said of the alleged assault in Creedmoor, "She told me that it happened, and I believe her."

Connecticut hauler pleads guilty to racketeering (Waste News)

Waste News, April 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027179

April 27 -- A Danbury, Conn., trash hauler pleaded guilty to a federal racketeering charge, admitting to taking part in system to divvy up territory, the U.S. Department of Justice said.

Joseph R. LoStocco, 47, who owns and operates JR LoStocco Carting in Danbury, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiring to violate the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act.

LoStocco faces a maximum term of 20 years and a fine of up to $250,000, according to Kevin O´Connor, U.S. Attorney for the District of Connecticut.

"This guilty plea stems from a federal investigation into waste industry practices in Connecticut and New York," O´Connor said. "The investigation is very active, and we have no further comment at this time."

Justice Department Sues Fountainbleau Apartments On Housing Discrimination (CHA)

Chattanoogan, April 28, 2006

The Justice Department announced Thursday that it has filed a lawsuit against the owner and resident manager of the Fountainbleau Apartments in East Ridge, alleging housing discrimination against individuals on account of their having children.

"No one should be denied an opportunity to live where they choose because they have children," said Wan J. Kim, Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division. "The Justice Department is committed to vigorous prosecution of illegal housing discrimination."

The complaint, filed in federal district court in Chattanooga, alleges that the defendants refused to rent apartments to persons with children and steered them to another apartment complex. The Department conducted its investigation through the use of fair-housing testers - individuals who pose as renters for purposes of gathering information about possible discriminatory practices in the rental of apartments.

The lawsuit seeks an order prohibiting the defendants from engaging in unlawful housing discrimination, monetary damages for victims of the defendants' unlawful conduct, and the payment of a civil penalty to the government.

Fighting illegal housing discrimination is a top priority of the Justice Department, officials said. In February, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales announced Operation Home Sweet Home, a concentrated initiative "to expose and eliminate housing discrimination in America."

The initiative was inspired by the plight of displaced victims of Hurricane Katrina who were suddenly forced to find new places to live, it was stated. Operation Home Sweet Home, however, is not limited to the areas hit by Hurricane Katrina, but targets housing discrimination all over the country - including Tennessee.

The federal Fair Housing Act prohibits discrimination in housing on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, familial status, national origin and disability.

New York election board sets machine standards (AP)

AP, April 28, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. After months of haggling, the state Board of Elections has adopted guidelines for new voting machines that can be used in New York.The board also ordered machine makers to disclose information about their political contributions and any lawsuits against them.A statement released by the board says the new standards go beyond Help America Vote Act (HAVA) requirements and contain a number of features that make them model regulations for the nation.The standards require a voter verifiable paper trail.The adoption of the standards means machine manufacturers can begin submitting their wares to the board for testing that could lead to eventual sales in the lucrative New York market. State law requires New York's old lever-action machines to be replaced in time for the 2007 election.New York has been sued by the U-S Justice Department for failing to comply with HAVA provisions requiring states to have new machines in place for the 2006 elections.

Phone-jamming Case Invokes Images Of Watergate (KRT)

By William Douglas

Knight Ridder, April 28, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. - Is it a third-rate political dirty trick by Republicans or a cheap attempt by Democrats to drag the GOP through the mud before November's elections?

Democrats and Republicans here are locked in a legal battle over GOP operatives who tried to suppress voter turnout in a key 2002 U.S. Senate race by jamming Democratic get-out-the-vote phone banks on Election Day.

DOJ_NMG_0027180

The case has national implications. New Hampshire Democrats, through a civil lawsuit, are trying to question Ken Mehlman, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, and White House officials about why one GOP official who was involved in the scheme called the White House repeatedly.

Democrats describe the phone-jamming case in Nixonian terms, using Watergate-era phrases such as "follow the money" and "what did they know and when did they know it?"

"It's been the gift that's kept on giving for the Democrats," said Dante Scala, a political-science professor at Manchester's St. Anselm College. "It's been gradually going up the ladder, and now it's in Ken Mehlman's office."

Democrats say smoking guns abound in the case:

-A Republican operative who later was convicted in the case called Mehlman's former office in the White House nearly two dozen times.

-The RNC paid millions of dollars in legal expenses for the operative, though it was under no legal obligation to do so.

-Contributions were made to the state GOP by Indian tribes whom disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff represented and by former House Speaker Tom DeLay's political action committee in amounts that together almost equaled the cost of the phone-jamming scheme.

"There are some parallels to Watergate," Howard Dean, the Democratic National Committee chairman, said last week. "This is a third-rate, silly effort that definitely turns out to be rooted in the White House."

Republican officials are on the defensive. They call the vote-suppression scheme an unfortunate incident that was the work of rogue operatives who did it without party leaders' knowledge. They say the civil suit is a baseless attempt by Democrats to score points and ruin the New Hampshire Republican Party financially. State GOP officials filed a countersuit charging that the state Democratic Party had "ulterior and improper" motives in suing them.

"This is taking a local political issue and exploiting it to the national level," Ovide Lamontagne, the New Hampshire GOP's attorney, said of the Democratic lawsuit. "They are not interested in justice. They're interested in political exploitation."

As Democratic and Republican lawyers file motion after motion, there's no argument about the basic facts. On Nov. 5, 2002, hot lines that state Democrats and a firefighter's association had set up to urge people to the polls were jammed by more than 800 hang-up calls. State Republican officials say that once they learned of the scheme, they tried to stop it.

The jamming occurred during what was billed as a hotly contested Senate race between Republican John Sununu, who was then a member of the House of Representatives, and Democrat Jeanne Shaheen, then New Hampshire's governor. Party control of the Senate was thought to possibly turn on the outcome.

In the end, the race wasn't close. Sununu defeated Shaheen by about 20,000 votes, weakening Democratic arguments that the suppression scheme cost them the election.

"We'll never know how effective it was. ... Sununu won by a bigger margin than anyone expected," said Kathleen Sullivan, the New Hampshire Democratic Party chairwoman. "But that's not the point. It was wrong. ... We have 400 (state) legislative races. The intent may have been to influence one election, but it may have affected hundreds of races."

Three men have been convicted. James Tobin, 45, who headed the Republican National Committee's New England efforts in 2002 and was the regional director for President Bush's 2004 re-election campaign, was convicted in December of one count of aiding and abetting telephone harassment and one count of conspiracy to commit telephone harassment. He faces up to seven years in prison for both felonies. He's scheduled to be sentenced in May.

Chuck McGee, former executive director of the state Republican Party, pleaded guilty to hatching the scheme and served seven months in prison.

Allen Raymond, former president of GOP Marketplace LLC, a Virginia-based company, pleaded guilty to helping to execute the plan and is serving a three-month sentence.

Last month, a federal grand jury indicted a fourth man, Shaun Hansen, 34, of Spokane Wash., and charged him with the same crimes as Tobin. Prosecutors say that Hansen, former co-owner of an Idaho-based telemarketing company, was paid $2,500 to have his employees place hundreds of hang-up calls to disrupt the New Hampshire get-out-the-vote effort.

Hansen pleaded not guilty. But he told the Idaho State Journal in July 2004 that GOP Marketplace hired his company to call six phone lines that the New Hampshire Democratic Party and the firefighter's association used. He said he didn't know the reason for the calls.

Democrats say the case has gotten more and more curious as it's gone along. They noticed that Tobin had high-powered legal representation and later learned that the RNC was paying the bills.

RNC Chairman Mehlman said in CNN interviews this month that the decision to pay for Tobin's lawyers was made before he became the chairman, and he defended the payments, maintaining "it was right to honor the decision."

Throughout the controversy, state GOP officials maintained that Tobin and McGee acted on their own. Mehlman says the national party had nothing to do with the scheme.

Fuel was added to the fire after the Senate Majority Project, a Democratic activist group, found records from Tobin's trial detailing 22 telephone calls that he placed from New Hampshire to the White House political office - which Mehlman headed at the time - on Nov. 5-6.

"I have a hard time believing they didn't discuss this," said Sullivan, the state Democratic chairwoman.

Mehlman said the number of calls wasn't unusual, given the competitiveness of the Sununu-Shaheen race and its potential impact on Congress.

"To be clear, none of my conversations, nor the conversations of my staff, involved discussion of the phone-jamming incident," Mehlman said in a written statement on April 11.

White House officials declined to discuss the case because it's an ongoing legal matter.

In addition to the legal bills, state Democrats say they've found another curious national GOP link to the scheme: $15,000 in contributions to the state Republican Party from two of Abramoff's Indian tribe clients and from Americans for a Republican Majority, a DeLay-led political action committee, about a week before the election.

Sullivan, the state Democratic leader, questioned the timing of the three donations and called the Indian ones unusual because tribes don't usually give directly to state parties unless there are casino-gaming interests in that state.

Abramoff pleaded guilty to unrelated fraud charges in January and is cooperating with federal investigators in a major corruption probe. On April 4, DeLay announced his impending resignation from Congress amid allegations of corruption.

Democrats have taken all these circumstantial links and run with them. Sens. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., fired off a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on April 20 asking whether the Justice Department is looking into it.

Dean has hawked the New Hampshire story on TV news shows, and he sent a letter to Mehlman earlier this month asking whether the White House authorized the phone-jamming.

These actions are all part of the Democrats' campaign to indict the Republican Party for fostering a "culture of corruption," according to Scala of St. Anselm's. "They've kind of successfully seized the high ground in being the anti-corruption party," he said.

Republicans complain that the Democrats are showboating and piling on.

"They're just thrilled by being able to distract us, cost us money," said Wayne Semprini, the New Hampshire Republican Party chairman. "Apart from this being a gigantic nuisance, it's siphoning off resources that we could put in campaigns throughout the state ... money that could be used for legitimate election efforts."

FBI Asked To Look Into Georgia Vandalism At Muslim Home (MACT)

By Doug Gross

The Macon Telegraph, April 28, 2006

ATLANTA - A national Islamic civil rights group is asking the FBI to investigate vandalism at a Muslim home in suburban Atlanta as a hate crime.

The Douglas County family's van was burned and the words "Killers go home" spray-painted on the side of their house on April 8.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations in Washington said local authorities had been slow to investigate the crime.

But Douglas County Chief Deputy Stan Copeland said evidence from the scene has been submitted to the state crime lab and that police patrols in the neighborhood have been stepped up as investigators seek new leads.

Stephen Emmett, a spokesman for the FBI in Atlanta, said late Wednesday that the bureau's civil rights squad here was not familiar with CAIR's request for an investigation. Copeland said Thursday that a local FBI office has been notified about the incident.

Mohamed and Sonia Kamran said someone smashed in the window of their minivan in the driveway and torched it. Firefighters pointed out that someone had painted the message on the wall.

The family called the sheriff's department and filed a report.

Copeland said Sonia Kamran had recently been involved in an argument outside a local store in which someone insulted her for wearing a traditional Muslim outfit that covers her face.

"I'm afraid, with what's going on in the world now, there's somebody out there that just wanted to make a statement," he said.

The Kamrans could not be reached by telephone Thursday. A call left on their answering machine was not returned.

CAIR spokesman Ibrahim Hooper said the Kamrans' experience was part of a growing pattern of anti-Muslim acts in the U.S.

"We attribute it to a rise in Islamo-phobia in our nation," he said.

Yusuf Burke, a CAIR representative in Atlanta, said such incidents are not common in Georgia, but there have been a few. The most notable was the destruction of Islamic Center of Savannah mosque by fire in 2003.

More recently, Burke said, there was minor vandalism at a mosque in Clarkston, and about two weeks ago a window was broken at a mosque in Fayetteville.

Burke said it is necessary to make a point of having such incidents investigated fully by authorities so the perpetrators "don't think they can keep on doing it."

Copeland said his office is determined to try to catch whoever is responsible for the attack.

"I don't care what your opinion is, we're not going to tolerate this kind of action," he said.

Talent, Others, Pushing To Solve Civil Rights-era Murders (AP)

By Errin Haines

AP, April 28, 2006

ATLANTA - A 1946 lynching in northeast Georgia could be among the civil-rights era murders investigated under a plan reintroduced Thursday by four lawmakers, including Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo.

The Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Act could address the lynching near Monroe, Ga., where Roger and Dorothy Malcom and George and Mae Murray Dorsey were killed on the banks of the Apalachee River at the Moore's Ford Bridge, about 40 miles east of Atlanta. The four sharecroppers were dragged from a car, beaten and shot dozens of times as a mob of 200 looked on.

No one was ever charged in their deaths, even though the FBI's report named 55 suspects.

"We are rejecting the reasons of yesterday that left these horrible crimes unpunished," said Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., at a press conference in Washington, D.C. "Our purpose here is not to open up old wounds, but to begin the process of healing."

The bill would create an unsolved crimes section within the civil rights division of the Department of Justice and an unsolved civil rights crime investigative office within the FBI. The sponsors say it would cost $10 million to establish both offices and foster relations between federal and local authorities.

The legislation was first introduced last year by Talent and Christopher Dodd, D.-Conn. Rep. Kenny Hulshof, R-Mo., also joined the effort Thursday.

Talent said the idea for the office came from Alvin Sykes, a Kansas City civil rights advocate. Sykes played a key role in urging prosecutors to reopen the case of Emmett Till, a black boy from Chicago who was murdered after he whistled at a white woman in Mississippi in 1955.

"It's America's obligation to unearth the truth and do justice because there cannot be healing without the truth," Talent said.

The new offices would focus on deaths that occurred before 1970 and remain unsolved by state and local officials.

The Georgia Association of Black Elected Officials, led by state Rep. Tyrone Brooks, D-Atlanta, has been urging local prosecutors to pursue the Moore's Ford lynching for years, and re-enacted the bloody scene last year. On Thursday, Brooks praised Lewis, whose district is centered in Atlanta, and his co-sponsors for their renewed efforts.

"I'm going to urge them to keep Moore's Ford at the top of their agenda," Brooks said, adding that the case represents the last public mass lynching in America.

Although the Georgia Bureau of Investigation and FBI have said the case remains open, Brooks told The Associated Press he believes federal involvement will be the key to arrest, prosecution and closure in the Moore's Ford case and others like it.

"The case involved so many local officials ... they were so closely intertwined it's been almost impossible to get the local officials to move," Brooks said. "This can lead us toward reconciliation and healing."

Congress to consider cold case bill again (Clarion-Ledger)

By Jerry Mitchell

The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, April 28, 2006

A Missouri senator and two congressmen have re-introduced a bill in Congress to set up a cold case unit in the U.S. Department of Justice to investigate unresolved civil rights-era killings.

U.S. Sen. Jim Talent, a Republican, today reintroduced the bill that passed the Senate last year before dying in a conference committee. U.S. Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., and U.S. Rep. Kenny Hulshof, R-Mo., are sponsoring the legislation in the House.

The measure is called the “Till Bill” after Emmett Till, a 14-year-old African American from Chicago killed in the Mississippi Delta on Aug. 28, 1955, for allegedly wolf-whistling at a white woman. The husand of the woman, Roy Bryant, and his half brother, J.W. Milam, were acquitted of the crime by an all-white jury but later confessed in a Look magazine article to kidnapping and killing Till. No one was ever punished for the killing.

"The blatant failure for decades to bring Emmett Till 's murderers to justice was and is a national disgrace, " U.S. Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., said at a news conference today. "It's America's obligation to unearth the truth and do justice because there cannot be healing without the truth. "

District Attorney Joyce Chiles of Greenville is getting assistance from state and federal prosecutors to see if Till's slaying should be presented again to a grand jury for possible indictments. However, Bryant and Milam are dead.

U.S Attorney General Albert Gonzales is supporting the legislation, and FBI offices around the nation are now collecting information about unpunished killings from their area.

KKK Plans Rally At Antietam Civil War Site (USAT)

By Martha T. Moore

USA Today, April 28, 2006

A Ku Klux Klan group will rally on the Civil War battlefield where a Northern victory led President Abraham Lincoln to issue the Emancipation Proclamation.

The National Park Service has issued a permit for a Klan demonstration June 10 on a farmstead at Antietam National Battlefield in western Maryland. The battle in 1862 remains the bloodiest day in U.S. history.

The National Socialist Movement, a neo-Nazi organization, demonstrated last year at Yorktown Battlefield in Virginia and in 2004 at Valley Forge National Historical Monument in Pennsylvania, both Revolutionary War sites.

Antietam Battlefield superintendent John Howard says the right to free speech meant he was obligated to issue the permit. “The First Amendment is very clear on that,” he said. “The framers of the Constitution decided this for me in 1791. It applies to all, not just people we like.”

Howard said he has received more than 30 e-mails objecting to the demonstration.

A white supremacist rally at Antietam is “an insult” to those who died there from North and South, says the Rev. Malcolm Stranathan, pastor of Salem United Methodist Church in nearby Keedysville, Md. “They were fighting for ideals that are far beyond what the Klan is about.” To counter the Klan rally, Stranathan is organizing a prayer service in a chapel elsewhere on the battlefield and a concert and children's event in a local park.

“Because the Klan thrives on press, whether it's positive or negative, it's better to avoid their event altogether,” he says. “Confrontation just lends itself to you playing in their field.”

The Antietam battle on Sept. 17, 1862, between Confederate forces led by Gen. Robert E. Lee and the Union Army under Gen. George McClellan left more than 23,000 dead or wounded. The battle halted Lee's advance into the North and gave Lincoln the political momentum to issue the Emancipation Proclamation, which freed slaves in Southern states.

Gordon Young, the leader of the local Klan group who applied for the demonstration permit, said Antietam was chosen for convenience but the site is appropriate. “Our forefathers are flipping in their graves, and we need to do something to stand up and fight back. Immigration, homosexuals — they didn't fight and die for that.”

Howard said the group requested a permit for 100 people to demonstrate. Park police will designate separate areas for media and for counterdemonstrators.

A Klan march organized by Young in 2004 in nearby Sharpsburg had nine participants.

Five U.S. residents face criminal copyright charges for their alleged participation in the online "warez" file-trading community, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) announced Thursday.

The charges come out of an ongoing DOJ crackdown against international online piracy groups that distribute copyrighted movies, software, games and music on the Internet. The five defendants are alleged to be leading members of the "warez scene," groups of Internet users who illegally distribute copyrighted materials online.

Warez groups, using servers worldwide, are often the first distributors of copyrighted works online, before the works filter down to peer-to-peer and other public networks, the DOJ said.

Kevin Fuchs, 25, of West Amherst, New York, and Cuong Quoc Trang, 35, of Parker, Colorado, were charged in an indictment with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement, violating the Digital Millennium Copyright Act, and copyright infringement, the DOJ said.

Matthew Alderman, 24, of Ashland, Oregon, was charged with criminal copyright infringement, and David Morvant, 35, of Thibodaux, Louisiana, and Michael Hays, 51, of Delafield, Wisconsin, were charged with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement.

The charges are part of Operations FastLink and Site Down, the two largest international law enforcement efforts targeted at online distribution of copyrighted material, the DOJ said. The operations have resulted in more than 200 search warrants executed in 16 countries, hundreds of computers being confiscated and more than US$100 million worth of copyrighted software, games, movies and music removed from download sites.

Countries participating in the U.S.-led operations included France, Canada, Sweden, Denmark, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, Portugal, Hungary, Israel, Spain, Australia, Singapore, Brazil, Belgium, and Germany.

The charges are being prosecuted by the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of North Carolina. The office charged eight other alleged warez leaders with copyright-related crimes in July.

Operation FastLink has resulted in 28 felony convictions so far. In Operation Site Down, 53 people have been charged and 23 convicted of felony offenses.

Five Additional Defendants Charged in Crackdown Against Internet Warez Groups (LinuxElectrons)

LinuxElectrons, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Five individuals were charged with criminal copyright infringement in Charlotte, North Carolina, as part of an ongoing federal crackdown against international online piracy groups responsible for most of the illegal distribution of copyrighted movies, software, games and music on the Internet, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher of the Criminal Division, U.S. Attorney Gretchen C. F. Shappert of the Western District of North Carolina, and FBI Special Agent-in-Charge Kevin B. Kendrick of the Charlotte Division announced today.

Kevin Fuchs, 25, of West Amherst, New York; and Cuong Quoc Trang, 35, of Parker, Colorado, were charged by indictment with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement, violating the Digital Millennium Copyright Act, and copyright infringement. A criminal information charged Matthew Alderman, 24, of Ashland, Oregon, with criminal copyright infringement, and David Morvant, 35, of Thibodaux, Louisiana, and Michael Hays, 51, of Delafield, Wisconsin, with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement.

Operations FastLink and Site Down—the two largest and most aggressive international enforcement actions against criminal organizations involved in the illegal online distribution of copyrighted material—resulted in a total of more than 200 search warrants executed in 16 countries; the confiscation of hundreds of computers and illegal online distribution hubs; and the removal of more than 100 million dollars worth of illegally-copied copyrighted software, games, movies, and music from illicit distribution channels. Countries participating in these U.S.-led operations included: France, Canada, Sweden, Denmark, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, Portugal, Hungary, Israel, Spain, Australia, Singapore, Brazil, Belgium, and Germany.

"Large-scale operations like FastLink and SiteDown strike at the core of online piracy," said Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher of the Criminal Division. "Losses to industry and individuals from online piracy are enormous, and law enforcement will continue to do everything it can to protect valuable copyrighted products and shut down these illegal distribution networks." Both Operations FastLink and Site Down were the culmination of multiple FBI undercover investigations, but only one of those investigations participated in both operations: the Charlotte undercover investigation responsible for today's charges. These charges are the latest in a series of actions taken by the Department of Justice to crack down on illegal online piracy. Operation FastLink has yielded 28 felony convictions to date while in Operation Site Down, 53 individuals have been charged and 23 individuals convicted of felony offenses.

"Intellectual property theft is a growing crime with serious economic consequences," said U.S. Attorney Shappert. "Operations FastLink and SiteDown combine the resources of the Justice Department, 42 separate U.S. Attorney Offices, and FBI agents from 30 separate field offices, in a concerted effort to attack organizations dedicated to the piracy of intellectual property."

The five defendants charged today are alleged to have been leading members in the illegal software, game, movie, and music trade online, commonly referred to as the "warez scene." They are charged with playing key roles in these organized warez groups that act as "first-providers" of copyrighted works to the Internet—the so-called "release" groups that are the original sources for a majority of the pirated works distributed and downloaded via the Internet. Once a warez release group prepares a stolen work for distribution, the material is distributed in minutes to secure, top-level warez servers throughout the world. From there, within a matter of hours, the pirated works are distributed globally, filtering down to peer-to-peer and other public file sharing networks accessible to anyone with Internet access. These warez groups supply the for-profit criminal distribution networks that cost the copyright industry billions of dollars each year.

"Theft of intellectual property strikes at the very heart of this country's economic vitality," said FBI Special Agent-in-Charge Kendrick. "Crimes of this type are a priority within our Cyber Crimes Program and the public can be rest assured that we will continue to aggressively investigate those individuals and organizations involved in activity such as this in an effort to bring them to justice."

These cases are being prosecuted by Senior Litigation Counsel Eric Klumb, Senior Counsel Corbin Weiss of the Department's Computer Crime and Intellectual Property Section, and Assistant U.S. Attorney Corey Ellis of the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of North Carolina.

Hi-Tech Five arrested on copyright infringement (UPI)

UPI, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 27 (UPI) -- Five people were arrested for copyright infringement as the federal crackdown against online piracy groups continues.

The following individuals were charged with criminal copyright infringement in Charlotte, N.C., the Department of Justice said: Kevin Fuchs, 25, of West Amherst, N.Y.; and Cuong Quoc Trang, 35, of Parker, Colo., were charged by indictment with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement, violating the Digital Millennium Copyright Act, and copyright infringement. Authorities charged Matthew Alderman, 24, of Ashland, Ore., with criminal copyright infringement, and David Morvant, 35, of Thibodaux, La., and Michael Hays, 51, of Delafield, Wis., with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement.

"Large-scale operations like FastLink and SiteDown strike at the core of online piracy," said Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher of the Criminal Division. "Losses to industry and individuals from online piracy are enormous, and law enforcement will continue to do everything it can to protect valuable copyrighted products and shut down these illegal distribution networks."

Union objects to sale of 4 Knight Ridder papers (SBJ)

The Sacramento Business Journal, April 28, 2006

The Newspaper Guild-Communications Workers of America Thursday called on state and federal regulators to scrutinize the $1 billion sale of the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times, Monterey Herald and St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press.

Sacramento-based McClatchy Co. (NYSE:MNI) said on Wednesday it plans to sell the papers to Denver-based MediaNews Group Inc. and New York-based Hearst Co. in a complex deal that is expected to be completed this summer.

The union has been working with The Yucaipa Cos. of Los Angeles to try to buy the 12 papers that McClatchy said it intends to sell when it completes its purchase of San Jose-based Knight Ridder Inc.

"We believe that a common interest exists among McClatchy shareholders, employees and the communities served by the 12 Knight Ridder newspapers being sold by McClatchy Co.," union president Linda Foley said in a statement.

"TNG-CWA continues to believe that the bid by The Yucaipa Cos. for all 12 newspapers is likely to deliver the best value and we call on McClatchy Co. to provide evidence that shareholder, employee and community interests are being best served by yesterday's announcement," Foley said.

McClatchy, which saw its stock drop 51 cents per share Thursday to $44.20, said the sale announced Wednesday has a valuation of 11.5 times earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation, and amortization, and a premium to the 9.5 times that McClatchy agreed to pay for the whole of Knight Ridder.

The union didn't say what kind of multiple its deal represents.

The union regulators need to assess the antitrust implications of the deal to sell MediaNews three newspapers in California, where MediaNews already owns other newspapers.

"The newspaper industry is already dominated by a small circle of ownership groups. Yesterday's news drew that circle even smaller," Foley said.

MediaNews CEO Expects No Major Changes At St. Paul Newspaper (KRT)

By John Welbes

Knight Ridder, April 28, 2006

ST. PAUL, Minn. - The fate of the St. Paul Pioneer Press became a little clearer Thursday as William Dean Singleton said that the paper won't see major changes after his company becomes its owner sometime this summer.

"You're joining us because we want you," Singleton, the CEO of MediaNews Group Inc., told employees packed into a stifling conference room. "We think there's a lot of opportunity here and if we didn't want it, we wouldn't have bought it."

His arrival at the Pioneer Press followed the announcement Wednesday of a four-paper acquisition by MediaNews, which is based in Denver. Singleton's company, teaming with Hearst Corp., is buying the St. Paul paper and three California papers in a complicated, $1 billion deal.

The deal, expected to close this summer, won't cause the loss of jobs, wages or benefits at the Pioneer Press, Singleton said. He added that the status of the newspaper's labor contracts, which cover about 90 percent of its 960 workers, will be up to local management. Publisher Par Ridder will remain with the newspaper.

"We've been in competitive markets and we thought it'd be fun" to enter another one in the Twin Cities, he said. MediaNews owns 49 daily newspapers, the largest being the Denver Post and the Detroit News.

Sporting a navy pinstripe suit and a Texas drawl, Singleton said he intends to continue competing with the Minneapolis-based Star Tribune. That will involve going after growing areas on the fringe of the Twin Cities and trying to take away market share.

He said he's "totally on board" with the newspaper's current strategy, which involves pursuing local news and local advertisers - both large and small - to keep the paper growing.

"You'll be happy after the closing," Singleton said. "You will barely know it happens."

Singleton said given the challenging newspaper industry environment, he couldn't promise there would never be layoffs at the paper. But he added if there are, they'll be in response to local market conditions.

Singleton generated laugher and applause when he explained why he won't pursue a joint operating agreement with the Star Tribune.

Such a deal allows newspapers to combine business operations while maintaining separate newsrooms_a cost-saving move. But he said regulators only permit that in a market where one of the papers is failing. The Pioneer Press isn't failing, he said, and "the Star Tribune isn't failing - yet."

Afterwards, several employees said they found the meeting reassuring.

"I think it kind of eased my mind," said Aric Sorenson, an advertising account executive. He said he is glad that he can now answer advertisers' questions about the paper's future.

Because Ridder is remaining as the paper's publisher, it's also expected that his team of top managers will remain.

The newspaper industry as a whole is working through tough times, as more advertisers are taking their ads to specialized online site and fewer young people are subscribing.

Singleton said he and the top people at his papers are trying to craft the best strategy for growth on the Internet side of the business.

"Long term we've got to get paid for news (online) or we can't keep producing it," he said. But he said that has to be an industry-wide solution and not just one paper acting alone.

Larger issues still surround McClatchy's deal to buy Knight Ridder, the Pioneer Press' parent company. McClatchy, which owns the Star Tribune, is selling off 12 of Knight Ridder's 32 newspapers - including St. Paul - to help finance the deal. McClatchy said antitrust issues in the Twin Cities prompted its sale of the Pioneer Press. MediaNews' $1 billion deal also includes the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times and Monterey County Herald, all in California.

On Thursday, a union that represents hundreds of Knight Ridder Newspapers employees said that the four-newspaper deal announced Wednesday "warrants closer scrutiny by regulators, shareholders and communities" served by the papers.

Linda Foley, president of The Newspaper Guild-Communications Workers of America said small circle of companies that dominates the newspaper industry just got smaller, and antitrust concerns need to be examined.

Some of those reviews are already underway. The U.S. Department of Justice recently told McClatchy that it's seeking additional information about the Twin Cities newspaper market.

That second review for the Twin Cities area may slow things down, as the Department of Justice can take more time to complete its work, said Stephen Barnett, an antitrust expert and law professor at the University of California at Berkeley.

The pending sale of the Pioneer Press to MediaNews, though, could speed it back up, he said. Once McClatchy sells the paper to someone not currently competing in the Twin Cities market, he said antitrust pressures are relieved.

"It's a capitalistic economy and McClatchy can decide to sell to anyone it wants to, other than a competitor (in the Twin Cities market)," Barnett said.

Judge refuses to halt court proceedings in Seattle dailies' JOA fight (SEAPI)

By DAN RICHMAN

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, April 28, 2006

The judge in the 3-year-old contract dispute between Seattle's two daily newspapers refused today to halt all court proceedings in that case, ruling that antitrust and breach of contract claims by a self-styled citizens group can proceed against the owner of the Seattle P-I and The Seattle Times Co.

The ruling, from King County Superior Court Judge Greg Canova, also raises the possibility that The Times Co. may withdraw from a binding arbitration agreement -- an event that would start two 18-month clocks ticking toward the automatic end of the Joint Operating Agreement that has bound the two newspapers since 1983.

Hearst Corp., the P-I's owner, says the P-I can't survive outside the JOA. The Times Co. says the JOA is ruining it financially.

The publishers sought to stop the court proceedings so they could move their fight into binding arbitration, which would deliver a non-appealable decision by May 31, 2007, on whether The Times Co. can exit the JOA.

The Committee for a Two-Newspaper Town argued -- and the judge today agreed -- that the publishers are entitled to put a hold only on the claims between them, not on the committee's separate assertion that the JOA violates federal antitrust laws and that The Times Co.'s conduct within the JOA has constituted a breach of contract.

The Times Co. has said it might withdraw from the arbitration agreement if all claims in the case were not stayed. Times Co. spokeswoman Jill Mackie said Publisher Frank Blethen, President and Chief Operating Officer Carolyn Kelly, and the company's attorneys would confer later today on how to proceed.

Dmitri Iglitzin, an attorney for the committee, said, "The committee is very pleased." He said no meeting of the committee has been scheduled to decide whether to proceed with its claims.

Microsoft Attacks Brussels In Court (FT)

By Tobias Buck

Financial Times, April 28, 2006

Microsoft yesterday accused the European Commission of "the biggest encroachment on intellectual property in European competition law history", and likened the regulator's antitrust ruling to "opening the vaults of a bank" and handing out money to passers-by.

The software group's withering attack formed part of a legal challenge in the European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg to the Commission's March 2004decision that found Microsoft guilty of abusing its dominantposition and imposed a record €497m ($616m) fine.

Ian Forrester QC, a partner at White and Case, which is acting for Microsoft, insisted the Commission had been wrong to punish Microsoft for refusing to supply information about the Windows operating system to rival companies.

Brussels argues the information was necessary to allow other companies to develop server software that is "interoperable", or runs smoothly, with Windows-driven servers and computers.

Mr Forrester argued that the Commission's order to make available 12,500 pages of interoperability information infringed several Microsoft patents without proper justification.

He said Brussels had failed to show that the interoperability information demanded by the regulator was "indispensable" for other companies to enter the market.

The Commission's case, Mr Forrester added, was "like a jellyfish - shapeless, and very painful".

DOJ_NMG_0027188

But the Commission's legal team disputed Microsoft's arguments vehemently, saying the group had "rigged the rules" of the marketto ensure its rivals were unable to compete. The regulator dismissed, in particular, Microsoft's claim that the ruling infringed its intellectual property, saying the group had only been able to cite four European patents in its defence.

The Commission claimed that, crucially, Microsoft had never at the time defended its refusal to supply rivals with interoperability information by referring to intellectual property rights.

The group was therefore not in a position to cite IP rights as a justification for its abuse, according to Anthony Whelan, representing the Commission before court.

The two sides also sparred over whether Microsoft's behaviour had actually threatened to eliminate competition.

Mr Whelan insisted that Microsoft had already attained a market share of at least 60 per cent and that the threat of elimination was real: "There is a reshuffling of the fringe [of the market] but the fringe remains just that."

The 13 judges will today have the chance to put questions to the two parties. The hearing is due to end on Friday.

EU judges to mull record Microsoft fine (AP)

By AOIFE WHITE

AP, April 28, 2006

Microsoft will try Friday to convince a panel of judges that a record antitrust fine levied against it two years ago should be thrown out or reduced in the last session of a five-day hearing.

The European Union ruled in March 2004 that the world's largest software company had to pay a record euro497 million (US$613 million) fine after a five-year investigation concluded it had taken advantage of its position as the leading supplier of operating systems.

Microsoft has appealed the fine, and the ruling, since Monday, attacking the European Commission's order to share information with rival software makers and produce a version of its Windows operating system without Media Player software. Microsoft claims the European regulator has made "serious errors" and is compromising its innovative designs.

In the first two days of the hearing, which is scheduled to end Friday, the 13-judge panel of the Court of First Instance centered on the company's bundled Media Player. On Wednesday and Thursday, hearings focused on a challenge to the order Microsoft give information to rivals to make its server software work more smoothly with the ubiquitous Windows program.

Judge John D. Cooke, in a terse exchange with Commission lawyer Anthony Whelan, asked whether Microsoft's proprietary information should be given away to its rivals, including patent information.

"The information which forms interoperability is hugely valuable commercial information. In the commercial sense this is highly valuable information, that's why it's difficult to understand the attitude of the Commission that these are mere trade secrets," the judge said -- a reflection of Microsoft's assertion that to give over the code would be forfeiting the hundreds of years in manpower that went into devising it.

Cooke, who will write the draft ruling, wanted to know if "competition rules require that be taken away from Microsoft, conveying a huge commercial advantage."

Whelan said the value Microsoft placed on the code was merely a reflection of the amount of time and effort it had put into creating it, nothing more.

The Commission has never asked Microsoft to open up its source code -- the recipe for Windows -- but Microsoft offered earlier this year to grant some access to rivals under certain conditions if it would appease both EU and U.S. regulators.

James Flynn, a lawyer for the European Committee for Interoperable Systems, an industry group that includes Sun Microsystems Inc., IBM Corp. and Oracle Corp., said that Microsoft's "information is not kept secret because it is valuable. It is valuable because it is kept secret."

Microsoft lawyer Ian Forrester rejected any suggestion that the company had deliberately exaggerated the importance of certain algorithms it would have to disclose.

Microsoft and EU officials were still discussing just what needed to be handed over, he said, explaining that Microsoft believed that to meet the terms of the Commission order and hand over "complete and accurate" information, it would have to give access to key parts of its code.

While a court decision on the ruling is not due for months, a decision backing the commission could force Microsoft to change the way it does business in the future and endorse the EU's ability to hold back aggressive corporate behavior.

An appeal is not certain since Microsoft would need strong legal arguments to protest the ruling to the EU's highest court, the European Court of Justice.

Judges Stress Intellectual Property In Microsoft Appeal (NYT)

By Paul Meller

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

LUXEMBOURG, April 27 — Lawyers for the European Commission and Microsoft faced tough questioning on Thursday about the 2004 antitrust ruling against the company.

During cross-examination by 13 judges of the European Court of First Instance who are hearing Microsoft's appeal of the ruling, the sharpest questions were reserved for the commission. Judge John Cooke, who will write the decision in the case, appeared to chastise commission lawyers for not taking the company's concerns about protecting its intellectual property seriously.

Under the 2004 ruling, Microsoft was ordered to disclose technical details to rival makers of software for computer servers to allow them to develop programs that work as smoothly with the Windows operating system as Microsoft's own software does. The company contends this order breaches its intellectual property rights, while the commission argues that Microsoft is seeking to preserve trade secrets that fall short of legal protection.

On Wednesday, Anthony Whelan, the commission's top lawyer handling the software development part of the case, argued that patent and copyright claims must be scrutinized by independent bodies before they were granted protection, whereas trade secrets did not. Yet the bulk of Microsoft's intellectual property argument revolves around the trade secrets in Windows that the commission wants the company to reveal.

"Trade secrets are not entitled to the degree of protection that Microsoft claims," Mr. Whelan asserted.

Judge Cooke turned to the issue on Thursday. "These are not just trivial trade secrets," he said. "This is hugely valuable information developed by a major corporation taking hundreds of man-hours to develop." He added that he found it hard to follow the commission's logic in defense of its 2004 ruling.

Microsoft was delighted by the amount of attention the judges gave to the intellectual property aspect of its appeal.

"The idea that this is not an I.P. case was scotched," a Microsoft spokesman, Tom Brookes, said. "Judging by the judges' questions, they recognized that I.P. is core here."

But Microsoft's top lawyer arguing the interoperability part of the appeal, Ian Forrester, did not escape Judge Cooke's scrutiny. At one point, he seemed to accuse Microsoft of exaggerating the scope of the commission's order to make it seem unreasonable.

"Is that Microsoft's stance?" Judge Cooke asked. Mr. Forrester, who has been highly articulate in the hearing, was rendered speechless for some seconds before denying that Microsoft had been exaggerating.

The judges' cross-examinations do not necessarily reveal their thinking, representatives from both sides said.

"The judge was just being provocative," said Thomas Vinje, a lawyer representing the European Committee for Interoperable Systems, a trade group and one of the commission's main allies in the case.

Microsoft's general counsel for Europe agreed. "It's not possible to predict from the questions what the outcome will be," the lawyer, Horacio E. Gutiérrez, said, adding that Judge Cooke in particular had shown "a tremendous grasp of the economic, technical and legal arguments."

The fact that the judges homed in on the commission's legal team could mean that they agree with them and are just making sure that a decision to uphold the 2004 ruling is watertight, many lawyers attending the hearing said.

A decision in the case is not expected for months.

Concrete exec admits price-fixing (INDYSTAR)

By J.K. Wall

The Indianapolis Star, April 28, 2006

Carmel Concrete Products and its president, Scott D. Hughey, have agreed to plead guilty and pay criminal fines for fixing the price of ready-mixed concrete in the Indianapolis area, the Department of Justice announced today

Carmel Concrete is the fifth Indianapolis-area concrete firm to either admit guilt or be charged in the ongoing federal probe. Two other companies, Irving Materials Inc. and Builder's Concrete & Supply Co. Inc., agreed to plead guilty. One company, Beaver Materials Corp., has been indicted. And a fifth firm, Shelby Materials, won amnesty from penalties by admitting guilt.

In all, those firms have agreed to pay more than $30 million in fines. Nine concrete executives have agreed to fines or jail time.

U.S. District Court Judge Larry J. McKinney will determine the size of a fine for Carmel Concrete, the operating name of Hughey Inc., and the length of any jail term for Scott Hughey. As an individual, Hughey will pay a fine between $30,000 and $50,000.

DOJ_NMG_0027190

"Price-fixing conspiracies, such as the one that dominated the Indianapolis ready mixed concrete market for nearly four years, harm our free market system," said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Department's Antitrust Division. "This type of conduct deprives consumers of their right to competitive pricing."

A Tiny Supplier Sues France's Chanel, But Does The Suit Fit? (WSJ)

By Christina Passariello

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

Carmen Colle has crocheted bustiers for Chanel and spun sweaters for Yves Saint Laurent. As a "petit main," or little hand, of French fashion, she even wove a metal bra for Christian Lacroix.

But now Ms. Colle, a former steelworker, is venturing where few little hands have dared: the courtroom. In a €5.3 million ($6.6 million) lawsuit that may unravel her business, Ms. Colle claims Chanel, which she has supplied for years, copied one of her designs -- a crocheted floral pattern -- on a line of $1,800 to $3,000 cardigans, skirts and dresses.

The iconic French fashion house says the allegations are unfounded. But a judge in a Paris commercial court has allowed Ms. Colle to pursue her case, which deals with a recurring issue for fashion firms today: counterfeiting. This time the glitzy world of high-fashion faces a challenge from the unglamorous realm of suppliers.

On one side is Chanel SA, the aristocratic Parisian label known for its $5,000 skirt suits and six-figure gowns long favored by women from Jackie Kennedy to Nicole Kidman. On the other is Ms. Colle, a stocky mother of five who founded a knitwear business called World Tricot in the eastern French town of Lure.

Luxury-goods firms complain endlessly about being ripped off by counterfeiters. Each year, they spend millions of dollars going after copycats. But a thinly draped secret in the fashion industry is that the big guys also sometimes purloin ideas.

Fashion houses often outsource specialized products, such as hand-knitted or embroidered garments, to small suppliers. These contractors -- who offer their own original ideas, or take direction from clients -- submit samples in hopes of getting an order. They rarely copyright their designs, but French counterfeit laws offer some protection even if they fail to register their samples. Suppliers say that there is always the risk of their work being rejected and later ripped off.

"It's very ambiguous," says Sébastien Barilleau, a Paris-based "petit main" who supplies embroidery for fashion houses including Chanel and Givenchy. "You go to a fashion show and see a design that looks like something similar to what you sent to the client. But that's just the way it works."

Chanel, which declined to comment on specifics of the case, said that the idea for the design in question was generated in-house. "In the present case, Chanel had World Tricot as well as other suppliers make knit samples ..." the company said in a previously released statement. "The [design] theme had already been evoked in previous collections with great success and produced by other suppliers."

The fashion house told a judge that the white-crocheted design in dispute was made by another of its 268 suppliers, Mely's Maglieria Srl of Italy, according to a person present at a January hearing. Mely's declined to comment.

Ms. Colle has a different account. In the spring of 2004, she says, her daughter Sylviane, who had joined World Tricot, knitted a postcard-sized patch of white cotton in a pattern of vertical flower rows.

It looked "very Chanel," thought Ms. Colle, who submitted it to the company's design team. Within days, Chanel sent Ms. Colle a sketch of a vest and asked World Tricot for a prototype based on the white-flowered pattern. Both parties agree that the company sent one in, and that Chanel never placed an order.

Six months later, Ms. Colle says she was walking by a Chanel boutique in Tokyo and saw what she claims is her company's design, entwined with black silk ribbon, crocheted on a cotton cardigan, dress and coat. "I never go into the boutiques, so I couldn't believe it," she says. Upon her return, Ms. Colle took Chanel straight to court. Her lawsuit seeks €3.3 million in damages for alleged counterfeiting and €2 million for breach of contract.

At the January hearing, the judge asked Chanel and Ms. Colle to enter into mediation. The two sides didn't come to an agreement, however, so the case went back to court last month. The judge is expected to issue a verdict on May 12.

Since the suit was filed last July, Ms. Colle's business has faltered. Chanel placed a final order last August, and doesn't plan to send any more business Ms. Colle's way, a company spokeswoman confirms. Orders from other houses have dried up as well.

Suing the fashion giant "was a very difficult decision," says Ms. Colle, tearing up behind her gold-rimmed glasses. "But if I don't fight, I'm just an accomplice."

The daughter of Italian émigrés to Lure, Ms. Colle dropped out of school when she was 14. She got a job in a steel mill to supplement her father's income as a woodcutter.

In her early thirties, Ms. Colle decided to become a social worker. Frustrated that she couldn't find jobs for the area's poor, she founded World Tricot SA in 1987 out of an apartment in Lure, employing refugee women from countries such as Cambodia and Algeria. Since she didn't have money for furniture, her first five employees took turns sitting in one chair, hand-knitting sweaters, scarves and other wool products.

Ms. Colle studied fashion magazines like Elle and Vogue for clues to different designer styles. She read trade magazines to learn the names of fashion executives.

Her first foray into the business, in 1989, was a flop. She set up a meeting with Jacqueline Jacobson, founder of Dorothée Bis -- a brand known for its ribbed sweaters which has since been acquired by BCBG Max Azria -- to present a sample of her wares. But no orders resulted.

Ms. Colle didn't give up. After she sent the next samples, wrapped in cream-colored tissue paper, Ms. Colle says Ms. Jacobson placed an order. It was the beginning of Ms. Colle's new career as one of French fashion's "petits mains," a term first used to describe the seamstresses who hand-stitched custom-made, haute couture gowns. In 1990, Ms. Colle signed on two important clients: French fashion house Christian Lacroix and Popy Moreni, an Italian designer based in Paris.

Word soon spread about World Tricot's craftsmanship. The company signed on more clients, and Ms. Colle hired more workers. In 1999, she landed the most prestigious couture name of all: Chanel.

For five years, Ms. Colle took a five-hour train ride into Paris as often as once a week to visit Chanel's elegant offices on the chic Rue Cambon. Every few months, she presented new samples. If Chanel liked one, the fashion house would ask World Tricot to make a prototype -- a skirt or a sweater with the proposed pattern. Karl Lagerfeld, the house's eccentric designer, was the final arbiter. If he approved the prototype, Chanel would place an order.

By the end of the 2004-2005 financial year, Ms. Colle says World Tricot had €1.9 million in sales, with knitwear for Chanel accounting for 89% of the total.

Now, with orders falling sharply, she has laid off 20% of her 25-person work force. To make up income, she recently launched her own knitwear brand, called Angèle Batist, which she shows to clients during private viewings at hotels in Paris, New York and Tokyo. Last month, Sen. Hillary Clinton ordered a black knit skirt for €500, Ms. Colle says. A spokeswoman for the senator didn't return calls for comment.

10 States Sue E.P.A. On Emissions (NYT)

By Danny Hakim

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

ALBANY, April 27 — In the latest legal broadside against the Bush administration's policy on global warming, New York, California and eight other states sued the Environmental Protection Agency on Thursday for refusing to regulate carbon dioxide emissions from power plants.

Attorney General Eliot Spitzer of New York, the lead plaintiff, said the agency's refusal "continues a sad course of conduct on the part of the Bush administration and reflects a disregard for science, statute and wise policy."

A similar suit involving many of the same states and led by Massachusetts was dismissed last year by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, where the new lawsuit was filed. Another suit by several of the same states sought to compel power producers to reduce emissions and was dismissed last year in Federal District Court in Manhattan. Both cases are being appealed.

"This is more of the same — yet another attempt by some states and environmental groups to change U.S. climate policy through litigation," Dan Riedinger, a spokesman at the Edison Electric Institute, a trade group of power companies, said in a statement.

Such suits, Mr. Riedinger said, seek "to circumvent the ongoing policy debate in Congress, which alone has the authority to make or change federal environmental laws."

James R. Milkey, chief of the environmental protection division of the Massachusetts attorney general's office, said the new case was more narrowly focused on what has become a central policy question about global warming: whether the E.P.A. has the authority to regulate carbon dioxide, the principal contributor to global warming, as a pollutant.

"We feel we have an extraordinarily strong argument on that point," Mr. Milkey said.

New York City, the District of Columbia and three environmental groups also joined in the suit, along with Connecticut, Massachusetts, Maine, New Mexico, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Wisconsin.

The suit seeks to force the environmental agency to start regulating emissions of heat-trapping gases, like carbon dioxide, from power plants and to tighten regulations of conventional smog-forming pollutants. The basis for the argument is that the agency has not lived up to requirements in the Clean Air Act to ensure public health.

With 135 new coal-powered plants on the drawing board nationwide, environmental groups see tougher emission controls as an urgent need before the building of plants that can last for half a century or more. The proposed plants would "blow a hole in the world's effort to curb global warming," said Daniel Becker, director of the global warming program at the Sierra Club, a party to the suit. "A little over a third of U.S. global warming pollutants come from power plants, and the bulk of it from coal-fired power plants."

The Bush administration has argued that voluntary measures are the best way to proceed on global warming, rather than requirements on industry to reduce emissions.

"E.P.A. will review all options and make an informed decision on how to proceed," said Jennifer Wood, a spokeswoman for the agency. "E.P.A.'s climate protection programs continue to exceed the agency's greenhouse gas emissions goals and are on target to meet the president's 18 percent goal to reduce greenhouse gas intensity by 2012."

The administration's decision not to classify carbon dioxide as a pollutant has complicated the desire of several states to regulate emissions from cars.

California is in the midst of a legal battle with automakers over the state's new law putting strict curbs on emissions from the tailpipes of cars and trucks. New York and other states are planning to mimic California's standards and have also been sued by the auto industry. The industry has been supported by the Bush administration.

Environmentalists and lawyers for the states argue that the Clean Air Act compels the federal government to regulate carbon dioxide.

"Does the Clean Air Act care about climate?" asked David Doniger, a lawyer at the Natural Resources Defense Council. "Yeah, it says so."

The E.P.A. does not dispute global warming as a concept. Its Web site says that climate change is expected to raise sea levels and alter precipitation trends.

"Changing regional climate could alter forests, crop yields and water supplies," the agency says. "It could also affect human health, animals and many types of ecosystems."

Md. Sues Exxon Over Gas Leak (BSUN)

By Timothy B. Wheeler

The Baltimore Sun, April 28, 2006

In the biggest environmental enforcement action in recent years in Maryland, the state filed suit Thursday seeking nearly $12 million in penalties from Exxon Mobil Corp. and a local service station operator for a massive gasoline leak that officials say has fouled well water in the Jacksonville area of Baltimore County.

"We are holding those responsible accountable," Kendl P. Philbrick, secretary of the Maryland Department of the Environment, said at a news conference at the agency's Baltimore headquarters. He called the leak, one of the largest ever in the state, "catastrophic," and said an investigation continues into whether criminal charges might be filed as well.

The 15-count civil suit, filed in Baltimore County Circuit Court, accuses the giant oil corporation and Storto Enterprises Inc., operator of the Jacksonville Exxon station, of violating state environmental laws and regulations by allowing gasoline to leak from an underground fuel line and not detecting or reporting it promptly.

The suit charges that more than 25,000 gallons of unleaded regular gas dribbled from a small hole accidentally drilled in a buried fuel line by a contractor performing maintenance at the station in mid-January. The leak was not reported to state environmental officials until Feb. 17, more than a month later, although, the lawsuit says, the station's operator noted losses of almost 700 gallons of gasoline daily during that time.

The lawsuit charges that Exxon Mobil and its operator failed to install or maintain a properly functioning leak detection system that might have confirmed the gasoline release before it became so large.

Cleaning up

In addition to penalties, the state's lawsuit asks a court to require Exxon and its operator to complete the cleanup of the gasoline that leaked -- a process that, Philbrick acknowledged Thursday, could take years.

Exxon Mobil spokeswoman Betsy Eaton declined to respond to the specifics of the lawsuit, saying, "Our primary focus continues to be on the recovery and remediation of the gasoline leaked at Jacksonville." A telephone call to the Fallston address listed for Storto Enterprises was not returned.

G. Macy Nelson, a plaintiffs' environmental lawyer based in Towson who is not involved in the case, applauded the state's lawsuit. He said he couldn't think of a similar enforcement action being taken against a company.

"Historically, in my experience, MDE has gone after polluters but has done so with a very light hand," he said. "This sounds aggressive. Maryland has a lot of strong environmental statutes that provide effective tools, if they'll only use them."

He said the state's case is particularly strong because it is seeking penalties and needs only to show that the company has violated environmental laws, but does not, for example, have to prove damages to property.

Though only six residential and commercial wells in the Jacksonville area have been contaminated enough by gasoline or its components to exceed guidelines for safe drinking water, state officials say 62 residential wells show traces of methyl tertiary butyl ether, or MTBE, a gasoline additive that spreads readily through ground water. Though not believed harmful at the low levels seen in almost all the wells, MTBE has caused cancer in laboratory animals.

More than 200 residential wells have been tested, and the six seriously tainted wells have been equipped with carbon filtration systems to remove the contaminants.

More than 10,600 gallons of gasoline have been recovered since the leak was reported Feb. 16, state officials say, and perhaps another 3,000 gallons' worth of fuel vapors have been suctioned out of the ground -- substantially less than the oil company had been claiming.

Philbrick said recovery efforts had been aided by Exxon's quick response once the leak was reported, by dry weather and by the area's geology, which confined the leak to a narrow band underground. The company's aggressive cleanup, however, does not absolve it, he said.

Official's vow

The legal action comes less than two months after Philbrick vowed at a news conference in Jacksonville to take strong enforcement action against Exxon Mobil. He also ordered other service stations in the state to check their leak detection systems and vowed to tighten underground fuel storage regulations to prevent anymore such leaks.

How much, if anything, Exxon Mobil and Storto will have to pay in penalties will depend on whether a judge or jury finds that the companies violated state laws and regulations. The amount of penalties imposed could be set by the court, or it could be negotiated downward in an out-of-court settlement.

But the law allows penalties of up to $25,000 a day for each violation, and an additional penalty of $100 per gallon for illegal releases of more than 25,000 gallons. State officials said they were seeking the maximum penalties because of the size and severity of the leak.

Though courts rarely grant maximum penalties in such cases, if they are awarded in this lawsuit, they would equal all the administrative and civil penalties the state environmental agency has collected in more than 12,000 cases brought since 1997, according to figures supplied by a spokesman for Attorney General J. Joseph Curran.

Six years ago, the state collected nearly $2 million in a settlement from Potomac Electric Power Co. and its contractor after a pipeline ruptured, spilling 125,000 gallons of oil into a marsh along the Patuxent River. That incident in 2000 was the largest oil spill ever in the state.

Exxon Mobil also faces a class-action lawsuit, filed on behalf of Jacksonville area residents, which seeks $535 million in punitive damages and an order requiring the company to pay for cleaning up the contamination, filtering residents' well water or supplying them with an alternate source.

Del. A. Wade Kach, a Baltimore County Republican who represents the Jacksonville area, welcomed the state action. "I can't believe anyone can lose 25,000 gallons of inventory and not notice," Kach said. "I don't understand it at all."

Sonar Called Likely Stranding Cause (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

Federal marine specialists have concluded that Navy sonar was the most likely cause of the unusual stranding of melon-headed whales in a Hawaiian bay in 2004.

The appearance of as many as 200 of the normally deep-diving whales in Hanalei Bay in Kauai occurred while a major American-Japanese sonar training exercise was taking place at the nearby Pacific Missile Range Facility.

The report is the latest in a series of scientific reviews linking traditional mid-frequency naval sonar to whale strandings. Sonar has been used for decades, but it was only recently that the apparent connection to strandings was established.

While the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration scientists said they could not definitely state that sonar caused the strandings, they said extensive study led them to the conclusion that there was no other likely cause.

"Our analyses indicate there was no significant weather, natural oceanographic event or known biological factors that would explain the animals' movement into the bay nor the group's continued presence in the bay," said Teri Rowles, NOAA Fisheries Service's lead marine mammal veterinarian and lead author of the report.

NOAA concluded that sonar was "a plausible, if not likely, contributing factor" to the stranding.

The Navy has said it was virtually impossible for its sonar to have led to the Hanalei Bay stranding, and officials maintained that position yesterday. "I think that if you look at the report, there are just so many unknown factors at work that to say sonar was a plausible if not likely cause is erroneous," said Lt. Commander Christy Hagen of the U.S. Pacific Fleet in Hawaii.

The Navy is planning another major sonar testing maneuver in the same area in July and -- for the first time -- NOAA has formally asked the Navy to use expanded measures to protect whales from the possible effects of its sonar.

The active sonar used by navies sends out loud pings of sound that seem to frighten and disorient whales, especially deep-diving species such as the beaked and melon-headed whales. The effect was documented off Greece in 1996 and established later during naval exercises in the Bahamas, off the Canary Islands and off Spain.

The findings have complicated the Navy's efforts to set up a 500-square-nautical-mile sonar training facility off the coast of North Carolina. Naval officials say the sonar training is essential, especially now that possibly hostile foreign navies have developed diesel submarines that are not detected by the kind of passive sonar used to follow large nuclear submarines.

Rowles said that the melon-headed stranding in Hawaii was highly unusual, and only the second recorded in the United States in modern times. The other occurred off Florida earlier this year, and Rowles said NOAA is trying to determine if any naval activity occurred in the area.

In the 2000 Bahamas stranding, a local marine biologist collected some of the whales that died onshore and froze them for later study -- which helped NOAA conclude that sonar was the likely cause. In Hanalei Bay, the whales were ultimately led back to sea and one young animal died, apparently of starvation. So there was no physical evidence of injury to examine.

Yesterday's NOAA conclusion was based instead on the lack of other possible causes, the unusual nature of the whale movement, and an analysis that concluded the extensive sonar use occurred close enough to Hanalei Bay for the whales to swim there by early July 3.

A number of environmental groups have become increasingly concerned about the effects of sonar, and the Natural Resources Defense Council has sued the Navy a number of times on the issue. Michael Jasny, a senior consultant with NRDC, said the NOAA report was worrisome.

"This was by far the largest stranding of melon-headed whales ever recorded in Hawaii," he said. "Once again, the Navy's denial has been contradicted by the official government investigation. It's time for the Navy to stop this needless infliction of harm."

DEA/ATF/USMS:

More than 9,000 fugitives caught in a week (AP)

By MARK SHERMAN

AP, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Ten years to the day after allegedly raping a 14-year-old girl, a California man was arrested in a roundup of fugitives that law enforcement officials say snared more than 1,100 sex offenders.

The concentrated search for people wanted for federal, state and local crimes "targeted the worst of the worst," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday at a news conference announcing the results of "Operation Falcon II."

Authorities arrested 9,037 people April 17 to last Sunday in a 27-state dragnet led by the U.S. Marshals Service and timed to coincide with National Victims Rights Week. Among those apprehended were 1,102 people wanted for violent sex crimes or failure to register as sex offenders.

No other single law enforcement operation had resulted in the capture of as many suspected sex offenders, the Justice Department said. The arrests came mainly in states west of the Mississippi River, and in Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands.

Gonzales has directed investigators to focus on sex crimes as part of his effort to call attention to child pornography and other crimes against children.

One of those arrested last week was Primo Montes, 37, who was picked up April 18 as he tried to visit his pregnant wife in Escondido, Calif. Ten years earlier, Montes and a second man allegedly raped a 14-year-old girl. Montes fled to Mexico to escape prosecution, but investigators learned he might try to see his wife, the Marshals Service said in a summary of the case.

Marshals arrested Montes when he appeared.

Nearly 80,000 fugitives were arrested last year, just under half by the Marshals Service and the rest by state and local police working with federal authorities. More than 10,000 of those arrests came during a similar nationwide sweep last year.

The operations in the past two years produced roughly 10 times the average number of weekly arrests, but even that barely dents the fugitive caseload. The FBI database contains names of a million fugitives. The director of the Marshals Service, John Clark, said Thursday there are a "few million fugitives" in the United States, most of them wanted on state and local charges.

The agency spent $531,000 on the weeklong exercise, most of it to pay overtime to local and state police, said David Dimmitt, chief deputy U.S. Marshal. More than 2,100 officers from 786 federal, state and local law enforcement agencies took part.

A second phase, targeting the eastern U.S., will take place in the coming months, Gonzales said

Among those caught was William Wisham, 60, who authorities said failed to register as a sex offender when he moved to a motel in Victorville, Calif. Investigators found letters to children and notes explaining why he enjoys sex with children, as well as child pornography, candy and methamphetamines, authorities said.

Police are working to locate children listed in Wisham's diary-style notes.

On the Hawaiian island of Oahu, police arrested Herbert Damwijk, 30, who is wanted in Washington state on two counts of child rape and molestation against 8-year-old girls, the department said. He was arrested April 17 at his father's residence and awaits extradition to Washington.

Reginald Dozier, 39, was arrested in Belleville, Ill., at 12:01 a.m. on April 17, the first minute of the operation, for failing to register as a sex offender. Dozier had earlier been convicted of raping a girl younger than 13 and giving her gonorrhea.

More Than 1,100 Sex Offenders Arrested In U.S. Fugitive Sweep (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, April 28, 2006

More than 1,100 people wanted for sex crimes were arrested in a 27-state sweep of fugitives, U.S. officials said.

Those caught in the sweep were part of a group of 9,037 fugitives arrested in a weeklong effort dubbed Operation FALCON II, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said today at a news conference in Washington.

The operation ``targeted the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country," he said.

The dragnet, which involved federal, state and local law enforcement authorities, took place during the week of April 17 and was timed to highlight National Crime Victims' Rights Week, which began April 23. Most of those arrested were in the western half of the U.S. Gonzales said a second sweep in the eastern part of the country will take place ``in the coming months."

Justice Department officials said the 1,102 sex offenders arrested represented the largest number ever captured during a single law enforcement operation. Authorities also seized 111 guns, more than 91 kilograms of narcotics, $120,265 in cash and 14 cars.

Last year, more than 79,000 fugitives were arrested and there are ``a few million" still at large, mostly on state and local warrants, U.S. Marshals Service Director John Clark said.

FALCON stands for Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally. The government conducted a similar operation last year.

117 swept up in Southern Arizona as part of national dragnet (AZSTAR)

The Arizona Daily Star, April 28, 2006

Forty-six people wanted for immigration offenses, including people smuggling, were among the 117 fugitives rounded up in Tucson and Southern Arizona during a weeklong law enforcement operation, officials said.

The dragnet was part of the nationwide Operation Falcon II. The project started April 17 and concluded Sunday. In total, 9,037 people were arrested in 27 states.

Local officers also nabbed four wanted sex offenders, 21 people wanted in connection with drug crimes and 21 wanted in violent crime cases, in addition to 25 others. Two soldiers also were arrested for being absent without leave from Fort Huachuca. They were turned over to the Army's Criminal Investigation Division for prosecution.

Operation Falcon targeted those "who had for too long escaped the grip of justice," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in a press statement Thursday.

"With these criminals off the streets, fewer Americans will live with the threat of violent crime in their communities," he said.

News Area fugitives picked off (CHIST)

Chicago Sun-Times, April 28, 2006

Several hundred fugitives were pulled from Chicago's streets this month -- including two who were among the most wanted -- in a federal and local law enforcement sweep spanning 27 states.

In Chicago, 403 fugitives -- twice as many as the last time investigators did this -- were arrested during the sweep, which began April 17, said Geoffrey Shank, commander of the U.S. Marshals Service Great Lakes Regional Fugitive Task Force. In the Great Lakes Region, 1,225 fugitives were arrested.

Chicago also netted more gang members than any other city and pulled two of the 15 most wanted off the streets, authorities said.

One of the most wanted was Clifford Cash, 30, a reputed member of the Gangster Disciples street gang who had failed to register as a sex offender -- for convictions that included an attack on a minor in the early 1990s. Cash was paroled from the Illinois Department of Corrections in 2004 after a 10-year sentence but failed to register, according to state records.

The other was Antoine Sallay, 26, who was originally convicted for the criminal sexual assault of a child under 13 and was released from prison in 2003. Since his arrest, investigators have linked him through DNA to two other criminal sexual assaults against children in the Chicago area.

While 163 reputed gang members were arrested nationwide, the Chicago team caught 64.

The concentrated search for people wanted for federal, state and local crimes "targeted the worst of the worst," U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday at a news conference.

A similar roundup was conducted last year.

Gonzales has directed investigators to focus on sex crimes as part of his effort to call attention to child pornography and other crimes against children.

9,037 nabbed nationwide

Nationwide, 9,037 people were arrested between April 17 and last Sunday in the dragnet timed to coincide with National Victims Rights Week. Among those apprehended were 1,102 people wanted for violent sex crimes or failure to register as sex offenders. Locally, there were 53 arrests for violent sex crimes and 49 for failing to register as a sex offender.

"Sometimes the victims get lost," Shank said. "They even get lost on us as we're running down a street chasing a guy. You're not thinking about the family or the victim. But this week we wanted to step forward . . . and concentrate on individuals who were wanted for crimes that relate directly to sexual offenses."

No other single law enforcement operation had resulted in the capture of as many suspected sex offenders, the Justice Department said. The arrests came mainly in states west of the Mississippi River, and in Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands.

Reginald Dozier, 39, was arrested in Downstate Belleville at 12:01 a.m. on April 17, the first minute of the operation, for failing to register as a sex offender. Dozier had earlier been convicted of raping a girl younger than 13.

The FBI database contains names of a million fugitives. The director of the Marshals Service, John Clark, said Thursday there are a "few million fugitives" in the United States, most of them wanted on state and local charges.

A second phase, targeting the eastern United States, will take place in the coming months, Gonzales said.

Operation Falcon makes arrests in La. (BRA)

By BRETT TROXLER

The Baton Rouge Advocate, April 28, 2006

A nationwide crackdown on wanted suspects running from the law has found its way to Louisiana. As part of Operation Falcon, which has a primary focus of tracking down those suspected of sex crimes and violent crimes against women, 68 people were arrested in the middle part of the state.

Of the 68 arrests, five were taken in on rape and violent sex crime charges. Seven arrests were made on weapons-related charges, and local authorities even caught a suspect wanted for attempted murder.

U.S. Attorney David Dugas said the well-coordinated effort will continue throughout the year, but it gets extra emphasis this week.

"It's dangerous work," he said. "These are fugitives who are trying to escape the law. They know law enforcement is looking at them. It takes skill, it takes planning, it takes dedication by the agents -- and that's what we saw this week."

The man brought in for attempted second degree murder was Dedrick Ghoram, according to the U.S. marshals. That warrant was issued by the Baton Rouge Police Department.

Sweep Nabs 'Worst Of The Worst' (STPPP)

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, April 28, 2006

The long arm of the law rounded up 110 Minnesota fugitives — several wanted for violent sex crimes — over the past week, federal authorities announced Thursday in Minneapolis.

The roundup was part of a 27-state effort by the U.S. Marshals Service to capture fugitives. The dragnet was focused on sex offenders, who made up more than 1,100 of the 9,037 fugitives taken into custody nationwide.

Al Garber, U.S. Marshal for the District of Minnesota coordinated the Minnesota apprehensions. In all, officers from 18 law enforcement agencies searched for fugitives in the Twin Cities, Duluth and Rochester from April 17 through Sunday.

The operation carried the name "Operation Falcon II" — it's the second year the initiative has been undertaken — and was aimed at fugitives labeled by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales as "the worst of the worst."

In Minnesota, that included offenders wanted for a variety of crimes, including sexual assault and drug trafficking. The federal emphasis was on nabbing sexual predators and convicted sex offenders who had failed to properly register their whereabouts.

The dragnet concentrated on states in the western U.S. A subsequent weeklong roundup will target states east of the Mississippi.

National crime sweep nets 110 fugitives in Minnesota (MINNST)

By Gregg Aamot

Minneapolis Star Tribune, April 28, 2006

More than 100 fugitives, including sex offenders and gang members, were captured this month in Minnesota as part of a national crime sweep, the U.S. attorney announced Thursday.

The arrests were part of "Operation Falcon II," an initiative involving federal, state and local law enforcement agencies. The 110 people snared in Minnesota were "the worst of the worst criminals," U.S. Attorney Rachel Paulose said.

Nationwide, more than 9,000 people were captured in a sweep of states west of the Mississippi River between April 17 and April 23. The U.S. Marshals Service led the dragnet, which coincided with National Victims Rights Week.

Of the arrests, more than 1,100 were wanted for violent sex crimes.

In Minnesota, all but about 20 of the fugitives were captured in the Twin Cities area, officials said. Officers from 18 agencies across the state helped the U.S. Marshals Service in the arrests.

At a news conference at the federal courthouse, officials displayed several weapons confiscated in the sweep, including a gun and a device U.S. Marshal Al Garber called a "knuckle-knife." The fugitives caught in Minnesota included a man who had raped an 8-year-old boy, a gang member dragged from a crawl space and a career criminal with a record dating to 1967, Garber said.

"The goal was to make our neighborhoods safer, and by taking 110 people off the street, we did that" to a large measure, he said.

Officials said such intense dragnets are significant because agencies don't always have the money or manpower needed to join forces in coordinated efforts. Whether such sweeps would happen every year was the decision of U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Palouse said.

A search for fugitives in the eastern half of the United States was also planned, though officials wouldn't say when.

Hundreds Of Californians Among More Than 9,000 In Fugitive Roundup (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - Hundreds of California residents are among 9,037 fugitives arrested nationally in a weeklong roundup that focused on sex offenders, top law enforcement officials said Thursday.

The arrests were made as part of "Operation Falcon II," a 27-state dragnet led by the U.S. Marshals Service and timed to coincide with National Victims Rights Week.

More than 1,100 of the fugitives nationally were wanted in connection with violent sex crimes, a group that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has made a priority in his 15 months at the Justice Department. The operation "targeted the worst of the worst," Gonzales said at a news conference at the Justice Department.

Among the 256 apprehended in the inland region that stretches from Bakersfield to the Oregon border was a murder suspect from Mexico living in Modesto who will be deported, said Antonio Amador, marshal for that district.

Four of the 256 were homicide suspects, 30 were suspected of sex crimes, 108 were wanted on drug charges and 49 for allegedly committing other violent crimes.

"As law enforcement knows, fugitives generally have criminal records and continue to commit crimes," Amador said at a Sacramento news conference. "In fact, 95 percent of those arrested had (previous) criminal records."

Authorities in Los Angeles, Orange, Riverside, and San Bernardino counties rounded up 262 fugitives, including two wanted on murder charges, 81 on drug charges, 59 on violent sex charges and 11 for allegedly failing to register as sex offenders.

Among the 262 was William Wisham, who authorities said failed to register as a sex offender when he moved to a motel in Victorville. Investigators found letters to children, notes explaining why he enjoys sex with children, child pornography, candy and methamphetamines, Marshal Adam Torres said in a statement.

Police are working to locate children listed in Wisham's diary-style notes.

In the San Francisco Bay area, 146 fugitives were apprehended, including 23 charged with sex offenses and 44 with narcotics violations.

In San Diego and Imperial counties, 194 fugitives were caught, including five charged with murder, 124 with narcotics violations, six with violent sex offenses and five with failing to register as sex offenders.

Primo Montes was arrested April 18 in Escondido, 10 years to the day after he and another man allegedly raped and molested a 14-year-old girl. Montes fled to Mexico before trial, but investigators staked out his pregnant wife's home in Escondido after receiving a tip that he might visit.

In southern Nevada, 35 of the 100 people arrested were wanted on sex charges or for allegedly failing to register as sex offenders. A local task force also arrested two individuals wanted on murder charges, 39 on drug charges, 13 on assault charges and seven wanted on weapons charges.

Nationwide during the week of April 17-23, federal, state and local authorities arrested 1,102 people wanted for violent sex crimes or for failing to register as a sex offender after a prior conviction for sexual assault.

It was the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement operation, the department said. The arrests were made mainly in states west of the Mississippi River.

The Marshals Service spent $531,000 on the weeklong exercise, most of it to pay overtime to local and state police, said David Dimmitt, chief deputy U.S. Marshal. More than 2,100 officers from 786 federal, state and local law enforcement agencies took part.

Last year's sweep netted more than 10,000 fugitives, 10 times the average in a week, but just 1 percent of the 1 million fugitives in the FBI's national database. Marshals Director John Clark said there are a "few million fugitives" in the United States, most of them wanted on state and local charges.

Marshals arrested 35,500 federal fugitives for all the government budget year that ended Sept. 30. They worked with state and local authorities to nab another 44,000 people, according to the Marshals' Web site.

Operation Falcon puts thousands behind bars Police sting operation conducted nationwide and locally (WHOI)

By Brock Spencer

WHOI-TV Creve Coeur, IL, April 27, 2006

A week long police sting operation netted more than 9,000 arrests nationwide. And, more than a hundred of those arrests were made right here in central Illinois.

It's called "Operation Falcon II" led by the U.S. Marshall Service.

Law enforcement from local, state, and federal departments all worked together during the stings. Arrests included everything from homicide and kidnapping to robbery and burglary.

All of the stings in 27 states were made between April 17 - 23. Peoria County Sheriff Mike McCoy said before this program, it would have been impossible to track down many of these offenders.

"When you have someone like the Marshall's Office and this task force that has jurisdiction to go anywhere, to investigate anywhere, has the ability to call an office up throughout the country, through the world and say hey look we are looking for this guy, we got a report he is in your area. Will you go check it out?" McCoy said.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the focus of this year's "Operation Falcon II" was on sex offenders. The justice department estimates it was the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement operation.

"Among those arrests were more than 1,100 fugitives wanted for committing felony sex offenses or violent sexual assaults or for failing to register as sex offenders," Gonzales said.

Last year's sweep, just called Operation Falcon, rounded-up around 10,000 fugitives.

Operation Falcon II Targets Sexual Predators (KTEN)

KTEN-TV Ada, OK, April 27, 2006

A historic day for law enforcement nationwide, had a significant impact in Southeastern Oklahoma. Operation Falcon II, led by U.S. Marshals, netted thousands of arrests across the western half of the country. The week-long sting focused on capturing sex predators and wanted fugitives.

Today, U.S. Marshals visited Durant, commending Bryan County officials on their contributions. From April 17 through the 23, law enforcement agencies of all levels participated in operation Falcon II. Determined to bring violent sex criminals to justice, officers in Bryan County united, coming down hard on fugitives.

In 27 states law enforcement raided homes, made traffic stops and even swarmed hotels to clean up thousands of existing warrants. Mirroring the efforts of a year ago when U.S. Marshals conducted Falcon I, teams arrested sex offenders, gang members and other wanted felons. Twenty-five different departments in Eastern, Oklahoma captured over 500 fugitives. Local task forces working with the marshals talked about the operation.

"With law enforcement at the local state and federal levels it is absolutley essential that we all work in one accord and in cooperation with one another, and this operation is a prime example of that," said David Ross, Durant OHP.

"Most of them will tell you that they're just doing their jobs, but just doing their jobs most likely saved or impacted many lives in a positive way that can't be calculated," John Loyd, U.S. Marshals said.

Loyd also said the raids yielded over a hundred guns, thousands in cash and opened doors to even more illegal activity in the area. The highest priority was given to sexual predators and unregistered sex offenders, since these issues top the list of local problems.

The U.S. Marshals say operation Falcon II is the most ambitious endeavor in their 216 year history.

Authorities arrest more than 500 in warrant sweep (Phoenix)

By Liz McMahan

The Muskogee (OK) Phoenix, April 28, 2006

More than 500 people wanted for felonies were arrested in Eastern Oklahoma last week, it was announced Thursday by the U.S. Marshals Service.

The arrests came through the joint efforts of local, county, state and federal officers from throughout the 26-county Eastern District of Oklahoma as part of Operation Falcon II, a nationwide effort to serve outstanding felony warrants.

The number of arrests in the Eastern District was the third highest of any area in the United States where the operation was carried out, said U.S. Marshal John Loyd. Only the Houston and San Antonio areas had a higher number of arrests.

This was the second year the U.S. Marshals Service has conducted the operation. This year's focus was on finding sexual predators.

Of the 506 fugitives arrested in eastern Oklahoma, 35 were wanted for violent sexual offenses, including rape, forcible sodomy and sexual assault, Loyd said. Sixteen of those arrested were wanted on charges of failure to register as sex offenders. One person was arrested on a homicide charge, Loyd said.

The sweep filled the Muskogee and Wagoner County jails. Muskogee County Sheriff Charles Pearson said 100 offenders were booked through his facility the first day.

Wagoner County Sheriff Johnny Cannon said his jail received more than 70 new prisoners from the project. His jail population normally averages 70 or 75 inmates but has been 80 to 85 since the beginning of the operation.

'Worst of worst' among 328 in Houston area arrested in sting (HOU)

By DALE LEZON

Houston Chronicle, April 28, 2006

A Spring man, who is accused of sexually assaulting a boy and whom law enforcement officials consider among the "worst of the worst," was one of more than 300 Houston-area fugitives arrested during a recent crackdown.

The arrests were part of a weeklong blitz by federal and local law enforcement agencies, including the Houston Police Department, dubbed "Operation Falcon II," which targeted suspects accused of violent and sexual crimes.

The roundup ran April 17-23 and covered 27 mostly Western states, as well as Guam and the Northern Marinana Islands, both U.S. territories.

Overall, 9,000 fugitives were picked up, including more than 1,100 wanted for sexual crimes.

In Houston, 328 fugitives were arrested, more than 40 of them wanted for sexual-related offenses, officials said.

"Pretty significant numbers, I think," said Deputy U.S. Marshal Marianne Matus, from her Houston office.

Carlos Bermudez, 30, offered no resistance when he was arrested at his golf-course maintenance job in The Woodlands last Friday, Matus said. She said he lived in Spring.

He had been wanted in Las Vegas since 2004 on 10 counts of sexual assault of a minor and 10 counts of lewdness with a minor.

Federal authorities said he was among 15 of the "worst of the worst" fugitives targeted in the crackdown, according to a news release from the U.S. Marshals Service.

Others arrested include people accused of violent crimes, as well as those who had failed to register as sex offenders.

No one was injured during the arrests, Matus said.

Last year, law enforcement officials arrested 10,000 fugitives during a similar weeklong roundup nationwide.

Nationwide Raid Includes Nearly 150 Valley Arrests (KGBT)

By Ray Pedraza

KGBT-TV Harlingen, TX, April 27, 2006

A nationwide sweep for violent criminals, known as Operation FALCON II, has netted over 9,000 arrests including some here in the Valley.

FALCON, which is a code name for Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally, is being dubbed as one of the biggest round-ups in law enforcement history rounding up criminals in 27 states from Illinois to Missouri.

Included in the 9,000 arrests were 1,100 wanted for violent sexual assaults, many against children.

"This is an important step in ensuring that the culture of law is respected, the judicial process is observed, sentences are meaningful and hardtime is served," said United States Attorney General Alberto Gonzales of the operation.

In the Valley, lawmen raided homes in the twilight hours across all four counties last week ... catching many of the unsuspecting criminals in bed.

An undercover agent says they were pleased with the number of arrests.

"It was a successful operation," said the agent. "Valleywide there were 148 fugitives arrested and 213 warrants were cleared."

The warrants ranged from aggravated assault to homicide but the most warrants cleared here were narcotics, probation and parole violators. Nationally and locally, authorities were hoping to capture more sexual predators.

"We are targeting sexual offenders. Sexual offenders pose a potential danger especially for women and children in the area and we're trying to put them away and bring them to justice," added the agent.

Congress allotted half a million dollars to fund this operation and Gonzales says Falcon III is coming in the next few months. He says it will target violent criminals on the east coast.

The U.S. Marshall's Service in McAllen is already looking forward to another big round up.

"We're going to continue searching for these individuals," said the agent about the accused criminals still at large. "We're not going to stop... we're going to be diligent in our efforts to bring them to justice."

249 Fugitives Arrested In Hawaii As Part Of Nationwide Sweep (KITV)

KITV-TV Honolulu, April 27, 2006

HONOLULU -- Hawaii law enforcement teams rounded up 249 Hawaii fugitives in a weeklong nationwide law enforcement sweep dubbed Operation Falcon II that nabbed more than 9,000 fugitives.

In Hawaii, it involved U.S. marshals, sheriffs, police and federal agents.

This year's operation focused on sexual predators, and one of the nation's Top 15 most wanted was found on Oahu.

From Waikiki to Maui, law enforcement involved in Operation Falcon II combed the islands for a week picking up wanted fugitives. The seven-day sweep included 27 states, Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands.

"What you may see is a reduction in crime; career criminals have been captured. What you may see are safer communities because predators are jailed," U.S. Marshal Dutch Hanohano said.

Herbert Damwijk was wanted for child rape and molestation in Washington state. He was found in Hauula.

"This guy is wanted for raping and molesting two young beautiful, young, innocent 8-year-old girls," Hanohano said.

Damwijk was living on a property that consists of several homes at which individual rooms are rented out.

The Fugitive Task Force arrived early in the morning.

"He was taken by surprise. He came to the door all groggy, and we just downed him right at the door," Deputy Sheriff Chester Kau said.

Many of those who live in the complex are university students. Those who know Damwijk said he never caused problems there.

"Overall, he's a pretty nice guy; kept to himself for the most part. Just a little bit, you know, a little bit weird," neighbor Mark Wood said.

On Maui, authorities arrested Kelepi Mafi. He was wanted in connection with the sexual assault of a 12-year-old girl. Four other sex offenders were captured in Hawaii.

Local Police Round-Up Criminals As Part of Nationwide Sweep (WANE)

WANE-TV Fort Wayne, April 27, 2006

Officers from the Allen County Sheriff's Department and Fort Wayne and New Haven police joined the U-S Marshalls service in scouring local neighbors, handing out warrants and rounding up suspected criminals. Altogether in northern Indiana, officers rounded up more than 46 fugitives on narcotics violations, seven on weapons-related offenses and several others for failing to registered as sex offenders. This local effort was part of a weeklong nationwide sweep called Operation Falcon 2, by U-S Marshalls and local officers in more than 20 states. In all, more than three thousand people were taken-in. John Clark, the director of the U.S. Marshalls Service says, "There is an old phrase, 'you can run but you can't hide' and for many fugitives out there, they think they can hide and they may, but not for long." And, even though this sweep has ended, authorities say area fugitives who managed to escape the net this time shouldn't think they can breathe easy. Dave Murtaugh, the head of the U.S. Marshalls Service Northern Indiana District says, "We're not going to let them rest. Allen County Sheriff's Department and the Fort Wayne Police Department are working diligently to keep the community safe."

U.S. Marshals Nab Thousands Of Wanted Criminals (KCNC)

By Alan Gionet

KCNC-TV Denver, April 28, 2006

Last week the U.S. Marshals Service rounded up 140 fugitives in Colorado as a part of Operation Falcon II, a nationwide effort to catch wanted criminals, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez announced Thursday.

Fifteen of the fugitives arrested between April 17 and 23 were wanted for violent sexual offenses and six were wanted for failing to register as sex offenders, according to the U.S. Marshals Service.

The nationwide operation focused on sexual predators and coincided with "National Crime Victims' Rights Week."

One violent fugitive from Colorado was caught in Baltimore. Mark Hayward was wanted in Douglas County for kidnapping and sexual assaulting a 15-year old girl he met over the internet.

"With the amount of activity that happens on the internet now and the fact that he was corresponding on the internet with her and did occur in other states as well," said Michelle Kivela with Lone Tree police. "It's concerning to us."

Investigators said there was no record of any other sexual offenses on Hayward's criminal record. Hayward said he met the girl on myspace.com.

Others caught in Colorado were wanted for homicide, robbery, narcotics charges and other violent crimes.

Nationwide, more than 9,000 fugitives were arrested and 111 guns were seized.

Operation Falcon II Sweeps Yakima (KAPP)

KAPP-TV Yakima, WA, April 27, 2006

Local law enforcement officers took part in a week-long nationwide warrant round up. Almost 200 fugitives were arrested locally during the roundup. That's double the number of criminals from last year. Sex offenders were the priority and fugitives with gang ties and violent criminals came next. Yakima County Sheriff Ken Irwin says he's pleased with the outcome. He says these fugitives are the worst of the worst.

Although the operation was assisted through federal dollars, they targeted criminals wanted by local authorities. The U.S. Marshals worked in conjunction with the Yakima Police Department, Yakima Tribal Police and the Sheriff's Department.

Among all of the arrests, 26 documented gang members were arrested, officers seized 16 guns, and 9 unregistered sex offenders were found. Officers say they're sending out a clear message to criminals, "You can run, but you can't hide."

Feds arrest 84 in fugitive roundup (KTVA)

KTVA-TV Anchorage, April 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027202

A massive sting operation has netted over nine thousand of the nation's most dangerous criminals and locally, the operation gave Alaska law enforcement a chance to find and arrest our worst criminal offenders.

It is being called the largest sex offender bust in the nation's history and it's Alaska's biggest multi-agency bust ever.

Operation Falcon II, which stands for Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally, took a pretty big bite out of Alaska's most wanted list.

We had 14 arrests in Fairbanks, 16 arrests on the Kenai Peninsula, 20 arrests in the Mat-Su Valley and 32 arrests in Anchorage," said Randy Johnson, U.S. Marshal, Alaska.

84 fugitives in all, the largest coordinated bust in Alaska in history with crimes ranging from drugs, and probation violations, to more dangerous offenses.

"A violent crime or a sexual predatory type, those are the ones we focused on and we focused on the most violent ones first and worked downward from that towards the lower end of the spectrum," said Marc Otte, Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal, Alaska.

Code named Falcon II, it was a nationwide week-long operation with focus on the west coast netting over nine thousand people, but don't think these U.S. Marshals only work one week out of the year.

"This is an ongoing initiative, Falcon II focused that initiative with a high amount of manpower and some funding, but the Alaska Fugitive Task Force is here, it is working everyday and there is no place for anybody to hide if they're wanted.

Locally, last year Falcon I only nabbed 8 people.

"This was a very successful effort and you can see how much improved it was from last year so congratulations to everyone because all Alaskan citizens are safer."

But Falcon II isn't necessarily done. The cooperation between agencies remains. Alaska sent about 2 dozen leads to the lower 48 and warrants were sent up here as well

And the Last Frontier is often the last resort for the nation's criminals who think they can come and disappear into the Bush but Alaskan authorities say they will be caught.

"We want people to know this is not a place that they can come and hide. We will come and find them. We have a lot of investigative tools at our beck and call and we will come and find them anywhere they are, anywhere in the state," said Marc Otte, Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal, Alaska.

The week long effort brought eighty four people into custody but turns out that other fugitives heard the authorities were looking for them and turned themselves in not to mention the other cases that couldn't be solved within that week. There are about a hundred of them. Authorities say they plan to have them in custody soon.

Those arrests come at a time when the state is toughening up the penalties for people who commit sex crimes.

In fact, the Governor plans to sign a new bill into law this evening that would nearly triple the jail time for sex offenders. Convicted sex offenders would face a minimum of twenty years in prison and 25 if their crime involved a child.

U.S. Marshal Sweep Nets Sex Offenders (KGO)

By Heather Ishimaru

KGO-TV San Francisco, April 27, 2006

Apr. 27 - U.S. marshals invited ABC7 on an exclusive ride-along for some of the Bay Area sweeps targeting sex offenders. It's a report you'll see only on 7.

A week-long series of raids netted only a small fraction of the one million fugitives on the loose, but authorities are claiming success in a roundup called Operation Falcon Two.

In all, police agencies arrested more than 9,000 people in 27 states, 1,100 of them for violent sex crimes and 163 of those arrests were here in the Bay Area.

Chief Dep. Thomas Figmik, U.S. Marshals Service: "Operation Falcon targeted offenders wanted for the worst crimes, such as murder, kidnap, arson, assault, robbery, narcotics and rape. The operation was inspired by the Department of Justice's National Victims Crimes Week, the theme of which was justice isn't served until crime victims are."

When serving arrest warrants and checking on parolees, police rely heavily on the element of surprise.

Last week, during Project Falcon Two, U.S. marshals and local police went after their targets very early in the morning and late at night.

At 1 a.m. in Dublin, the element of surprise was enhanced by the passage of time. It was 24 years since Jack Duffy walked away from a Michigan prison.

The supervising deputy asks if Duffy's wife and son know why they're there.

Deputy: "Does your family know about this?

Jack Duffy: "No."

Deputy: "Ok do you want to say anything or no? Ok we'll leave that option up to you and we won't say anything about it."

Duffy was only one of the one million fugitives in the FBI's national database. The majority are more recent cases, like sex offender Curtis Arnold. As conditions of his parole, he's not allowed to have pornography or knives longer than two inches.

Deputy Robert Tejada, U.S. Marshal Service: "Two knives were found and about 20 pornographic tapes were found in his possession."

Project Falcon often targeted one person in trouble with the law and stumbled on others. The target at this house wasn't home but two women wanted for burglary were.

And there was no target at a Richmond housing project. Police didn't know what they'd find when they went there but they chose the location because it was where a murder took place just four nights ago.

This suspect took off running when he saw officers. They say he dumped an automatic weapon during the chase.

"At least we got the gun off the street."

Not everyone here is happy about the crackdown. Some are.

Angelo King, Richmond resident: "I'm cool. I'm cool with it. You know me myself I'm a grown man and I'm scared to come out myself."

And in rRchmond at least, police say Project Falcon is only one piece of the complex puzzle of keeping the peace.

Lt. Mark Gagan, Richmond police department: "This is one way of dealing with people & that lower percentage of people that are absolutely not going to try to stay out of prison. The people that are using guns and violence to get across their message."

The marshals were given a budget of $540,000 dollars for the entire national operation. Most of that went to officer overtime and fuel costs.

U.S. Attorney Reports 54 Arrests As Part Of Fugitive Roundup (GFH)

The Grand Forks Herald, April 28, 2006

FARGO, N.D. - Fifty-four people are in custody in North Dakota as part of a nationwide roundup of fugitives, U.S. Attorney Drew Wrigley said Thursday.

The arrests were part of "Operation Falcon II," a 27-state dragnet timed to coincide with National Victims Rights Week. Nationally, officials said more than 1,100 people wanted for violent sex crimes were among the 9,037 arrests.

During the week of April 17-23, federal, state and local authorities arrested 1,102 people wanted for violent sex crimes or for failing to register as a sex offender after a prior conviction for sexual assault.

It was the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement operation, the department said. The arrests were made mainly in states west of the Mississippi River, and also in Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands.

"Here in North Dakota, there were 54 arrests made inside of this one week," Wrigley said Thursday. "Last year was very successful with 26 felons arrested. This year, we're to 54."

U.S. Marshal Dave Carpenter said seven of the arrests in North Dakota were people wanted for sex crimes.

Wrigley said the bulk of the arrests were other crimes, including robbery, burglary and fraud. Some were drug-related, he said.

"In addition, 10 other warrants were cleared - what we call administratively - they figured out people were incarcerated somewhere else or for some other reason they were cleared," Wrigley said. "So (it was) a very successful operation for the U.S. Marshal's Service and the other agencies involved."

Arrests were made in Bismarck, Fargo, Jamestown, Mandan, Minot, Wahpeton and other cities in the region, Wrigley said. Two arrests for North Dakota warrants were made in Wyoming and South Dakota, he said.

Timothy Moseley, chief deputy United States Marshal in Cheyenne, Wyo., said authorities arrested one man from North Dakota in Wyoming who was wanted on charges that he had sexually molested children.

The Marshals Service spent $531,000 nationwide on the weeklong exercise, most of it to pay overtime to local and state police, said David Dimmitt, chief deputy U.S. Marshal. More than 2,100 officers from 786 federal, state and local law enforcement agencies took part.

North Dakota got about $8,000 for the roundup, up from about $5,000 last year, Carpenter said.

The state's courts and jails will be busy in coming weeks, Carpenter said.

"It's going to create a bulge in system but I don't think it's anything we can't work through," he said.

Operation Falcon II Puts Dozens of Violent Fugitives Behind Bars in Idaho (KTRV-TV)

By Shannon Patterson

KTRV-TV Boise, April 27, 2006

Boise, ID -- A week-long sting across the nation has put thousands of fugitives behind bars.

In Idaho alone, 74 violent offenders are now in jail.

Operation Falcon II focused on tracking down sexual offenders.

"A sex offender is a very special kind of criminal," said U.S. Marshal Pat McDonald on Thursday. "They stay below the radar. They move around a lot."

Of the 74 people arrested last week in Idaho during Operation Falcon, seven were wanted for violent sexual offenses, five for failing to register as a sex offender. Others were arrested on everything from assault to burglary to driving under the influence, like Darby Campbell, whose rap sheet is lengthy.

"It's 24 feet long, contains 21 arrests," McDonald said as he unrolled the record for reporters. "These are the kind of people that we want to remove from the street."

To track the suspects down, U.S. Marshals partnered with law enforcement agencies across the valley and hit the street, knocking on doors and finding criminals intent on staying hidden.

"We got 14 different sex offenders, re-offenders, we got five unregistered sex offenders. One 2 miles from my house," said Deputy Kevin Platts of the U.S. Marshals Service.

He says that man, Billy Shearin, was renting a room from a family with a three year old girl, and often took neighborhood children to school when their parents were unable to.

"And of course at that point we were able to tell the family," said Platts. "They had no idea that he was an unregistered sex offender, and of course they had a little girl in the house."

Boise Police are now investigating whether Shearin may face additional sex crimes charges.

Investigators say since most of those arrested during Operation Falcon have committed several crimes, it's likely they would have committed more, if not taken into custody.

"So we'll never know what the impact of this is because these people were removed off the streets before they could re-offend," according to Platts.

"We focused on the bad guys, and we were successful enough to get a bunch of 'em," said McDonald.

Operation Falcon goes much further than Idaho's borders. More than 10,000 thousand fugitives were arrested across the country.

Fugitive Roundup Nets 210 Indiana Fugitives (FWNS)

The Fort Wayne News-Sentinel, April 28, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS - A nationwide roundup this month has put 210 central Indiana fugitives in custody, authorities said Thursday.

Operation Falcon II - a joint effort between federal and local law enforcement officials - netted some 9,000 fugitives in 27 states between April 17 and last Sunday.

In Indiana, the dragnet captured at least 11 people who were wanted for violent sexual offenses such as rape, forcible sodomy and sexual assault, according to federal prosecutors.

Four others were wanted on charges for failure to register as sex offenders. Authorities also reported seizing 11 firearms - including two AK-47s - and two pounds of marijuana.

"(This) serves as an excellent example of local, state, and federal law enforcement agencies working together in a united effort to bring fugitives to justice," U.S. Attorney Susan Brooks said.

This month's effort was timed to coincide with National Victims Rights Week.

No other single law enforcement operation had resulted in the capture of as many suspected sex offenders, the Justice Department said.

Former Hamilton County Youth Pastor Arrested for Sexual Misconduct with Minor (WISH-TV)

WISH-TV Indianapolis, April 27, 2006

A former Hamilton County youth pastor has been arrested, charged with sexual misconduct with a minor.

The former youth pastor was arrested on a golf course following a nationwide sweep of fugitives by the U.S. Marshals.

"It's sad that it happened right in my neighborhood," says Sherry Purkey of Cicero, "That bothers me."

For nearly 30 years, Jon Purkey and his family have lived in their 2-story home directly next door to Cicero Weslyan Church. While working in the their yard, the Purkeys can not believe the news. Joshua Kramp, the former youth pastor at the church, is behind bars, accused of molesting a child.

"Shock is my reaction," says Jon Purkey, "I know Josh and Josh is a gentleman, was a gentleman to me and nice to my family."

Investigators say 27-year-old Kramp had a sexual relationship with a 13-year-old girl while at the church.

After a 4-month investigation called "Operation Falcon II" involving U.S. Marshals, police caught up with Kramp in his homestate of Michigan, while responding to a disturbance call.

"The arrest of Josh Kramp is a great example of why Operation Falcon works," says Captain Kevin Jowett of the Hamilton County Sheriff's Department.

Jon Purkey says although Kramp is behind bars facing numerous charges, his quiet community will recover. "As a community, we'll pull together and hopefully we'll support what's going to take to get him better."

This sweep was not only in Indiana. In 20 other states, more than 9,000 wanted criminals have been arrested. 1100 were wanted for violent sexual assaults, many against children.

Last year's nationwide operation, also named Falcon, rounded up thousands of gang members and drug dealers.

Local police teamed up with the U.S. Marshals Service to arrest 21 fugitives in Wyoming this month as part of a 27-state dragnet.

In the entire sweep, called "Operation Falcon II," law enforcement arrested 9,037 people, mostly in western states. Among those arrested were 1,102 wanted for violent sex crimes or for failure to register as sex offenders.

Timothy Moseley, chief deputy United States Marshal in Cheyenne, said Thursday his agency worked with 17 law enforcement officers from various agencies in Laramie, Natrona and Teton counties on the arrests. The operation lasted from April 17 through last Sunday.

"The complete success of this operation lies solely at the feet of the state and local agencies that participated. Without their help and their manpower, we would not have been nearly as successful as we were," Moseley said.

"We targeted sexual predators, and we managed to arrest two pretty heinous characters," Moseley said. He said teams arrested one man from North Dakota in Wyoming who was wanted on charges that he had sexually molested children, and arrested another man from Colorado in the state wanted on charges of rape and aggravated assault.

Mavis Dezulovich, public affairs specialist with the U.S. Marshal's Service in Arlington, Va., said the agency couldn't release the names of people who were arrested.

"I think the influx of manpower from the state and local agencies is what really makes these operations different," Moseley said. "We hunt for these predators everyday, but we don't always have the assistance and manpower we need to accomplish these goals."

Last year, in the first Operation Falcon, law enforcement in Wyoming arrested 60 people, Moseley said. He said last year's sweep concentrated on violent felons, which meant that there was a larger pool of warrants to choose from.

Dezulovich said this year's operation cleared 21 warrants in Wyoming. She said said the operation cleared two warrants for sexual assault; one sex offender who had failed to register; one assault charge; five burglary/larceny charges; five fraud charges; three narcotics charges; one stolen vehicle charge; one weapons charge; and two other charges.

Arrest made in 2004 rape case (BN9)

Bay News 9 Tampa, April 27, 2006

As part of Operation Falcon II, task force officers with the U.S. Marshal's Office arrested a suspect in a local rape.

Darryl William Floyd, 37, is accused of sexually assaulting his then stepdaughter in April 2004. A doctor determined the then 13-year-old victim had been molested on two different occasions.

Hillsborough County deputies tried to question Floyd, but he fled the Bay area. He was apprehended in Miami on April 20 and is being charged with lewd and lascivious molestation of a minor. He is being held at the Hillsborough County Jail on $15,000 bond.

Operation Falcon II was a 27-state dragnet led by the U.S. Marshal's Service that was timed to coincide with National Victims Rights Week. This year's focus was on sex offenders, a group that U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has made a priority in his 15 months at the Justice Department.

The operation "targeted the worst of the worst," Gonzales said at a news conference at the Justice Department.

During the week of April 17-23, federal, state and local authorities arrested 1,102 people wanted for violent sex crimes or for failing to register as a sex offender after a prior conviction for sexual assault. It was the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement operation, the department said.

NYC's Gun Lawsuit Evades Congressional Attempt To Kill It (AP)

By David B. Caruso

AP, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK -- For the fourth time, New York City's lawsuit against several gun manufacturers has survived an attempt by Congress to kill it off.

A federal judge in Brooklyn ruled Thursday that the city may have access to gun tracing information gathered by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, even though a recently passed measure expressly forbids such data from being used in civil suits.

U.S. Judge Jack B. Weinstein said the new rule doesn't apply to information already in the city's possession.

The decision is a victory for the city, which intends to rely heavily on weapons tracing information to prove its claim that gun manufacturers create a public nuisance by recklessly distributing firearms.

"The court's ruling that we can use this gun trace data as evidence is great news for every police officer, parent and child that walks our streets and will help our case against irresponsible gun manufacturers," Republican Mayor Michael Bloomberg said in a written statement.

Lawrence Greenwald, an attorney for Beretta U.S.A., said the gun companies were likely to appeal.

Congress has made several attempts to kill off such suits.

In 2004, lawmakers passed a budget rider prohibiting government agencies from using federal funds to disseminate firearm licensing information to the public.

A judge said it didn't apply to New York's lawsuit because it was acting as a private plaintiff in the case, not "the public."

ATF began turning over information, then stopped when Congress passed a new rider in 2005. This one, more finely crafted, said gun tracing data would be "immune from legal process and shall not be the subject of subpoena or other discovery in any civil action."

A court said ATF still had to comply with requests pending when the rider was passed.

Last October, President Bush signed a law requiring that nearly all civil liability suits against the gun industry be immediately dismissed.

Weinstein ruled in December that the law contained exceptions that would allow New York's suit to continue.

Even before that ruling, Congress had passed another revised budget rider. This one barred any ATF tracing data from being used as evidence in a pending suit.

"Nor shall testimony or other evidence be permitted based upon such data," Congress added, for good measure.

In an opinion that turned on two possible grammatical interpretations of the phrase "such data," Weinstein said he believed it applied only to data that would be collected by ATF in the future.

Lawyers for the gun manufacturers argued that it meant that all tracing data should remain secret, except in criminal prosecutions.

"ATF and Congress has taken a position ... that this is essentially law enforcement information, intended for use in law enforcement," Greenwald said. "It is quite another thing to open it up to the whole world in a civil case."

BROOKLYN: CITY CAN USE GUN DATA IN LAWSUITS

A federal judge ruled yesterday that the city could use data about handguns, including sales history, from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives in its lawsuit against several gun manufacturers. Although the city was able to have access to the data in its suit, originally filed in 2000, the gun manufacturers had argued that the lawsuit should be dismissed because of a Congressional appropriations bill amendment that made the data inadmissible. But in his decision, Judge Jack B. Weinstein of Federal District Court wrote that "the proverbial cat is already out of A.T.F.'s bag" and that it made no sense "to distort the terms of a federal budgetary measure in order to wrestle the cat back in."

A New Gun Argument (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- Have you noticed that Washington politicians have given up on thinking about new solutions to gun violence? New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg has noticed, and he's angry. Good for him.

Bloomberg is a Republican, if hardly a partisan sort, and it may take a Republican to restart a debate that many Democrats have fled after a careful examination of the electoral map -- and years of exhaustion from demagoguery on the issue.

Teaming up with Boston's Democratic mayor, Thomas Menino, Bloomberg brought 13 other big-city mayors together here on Tuesday to call for "national leadership in the war on gun violence."

"If the leadership won't come from Congress or come from the White House, then it has to come from us," said Bloomberg.

The mayors, Menino said, do not want to meddle with the rights of hunters. They are concerned about the trafficking of illegal guns and the powerlessness of individual cities to enforce their own weapons laws because of loopholes in federal rules and because criminals can easily obtain weapons in jurisdictions with looser regulations.

Our dysfunctional political system has become especially dysfunctional on gun violence.

The National Rifle Association regularly says that we don't need new laws and should simply enforce the regulations on the books. But if many of the existing laws are unenforceable, that statement is meaningless.

Opponents of even modest gun regulation win the upper hand rhetorically by invoking two words: freedom and elitism. None of us is really free, the argument goes, unless all of us have essentially unfettered access to weapons, and any new gun laws are seen as leading down a slippery slope to a total ban on gun ownership. Supporters of gun regulations are always cast as metropolitan highbrows lacking in respect for the way of life of law-abiding country folks.

At a structural level, Congress has a deep bias in favor of the rural point of view because the Senate is stacked in favor of rural states. Idaho, Wyoming and Montana have two senators each, and so do California, New York and Illinois.

According to the latest Census Bureau estimates, the six senators from those three rural states represent 2,874,060 people. The six from the three states that include big urban and suburban populations represent 68,150,148 people. By these figures, you might calculate the rough odds against gun regulations at 24 to 1.

Changing the political argument is easier than changing the Senate. Mayors -- joined soon, Menino hopes, by suburban county executives -- are the right people to start the work.

Yes, there is a cultural difference between big cities and rural areas, but it's a difference in how guns are used. Rural people treasure their guns mostly for hunting and recreation, and as collectors. In inner cities, guns -- especially handguns -- are used almost entirely to threaten or kill other human beings.

"There are neighborhoods where if you say 'duck,' people get out of the way because they're worried they'll be shot," Milwaukee Mayor Tom Barrett said in an interview. "But there are other parts of the country where if you say 'duck,' people will grab their rifles to go duck hunting."

We desperately need a new politics of gun regulation in which law-abiding gun owners see the fight for tougher laws not as a form of disrespect for their culture but as an acknowledgment that if our gun rules are an unenforceable hodgepodge, illegal guns will inevitably get into the hands of kids and criminals in the cities and suburbs.

"I'm fighting for freedom, too," said Barrett. "I'm fighting for the freedom of a grandma to sit on her front porch and not get hit when there's a drive-by shooting. I'm fighting for the freedom of kids to play in the park without being caught in a crossfire."

The mayors have to act for another reason: Democrats have lost their nerve on the gun issue. Barrett traces this to the passage of the assault weapons ban in 1994. (Congress let it expire in September 2004.) Many Democrats who supported the ban were defeated in that fall's election.

"So Democrats who might be inclined to do something are now inclined to stay away from the issue," said Barrett, a Democratic member of Congress at the time. "And most Republicans aren't inclined to do anything at all."

Railing against this state of affairs is useless. Better that a savvy group of mayors takes the lead in the difficult struggle to change the underlying politics by reminding Americans that this issue is about saving the lives of innocent kids -- and of grandmas in their rocking chairs.

Major Gun Dealer Arrested (AP)

AP, April 28, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. --One of the state's largest gun dealers has been arrested on numerous federal firearms charges in a case that authorities say shows how guns wind up in the hands of criminals.

DOJ_NMG_0027208

Frank D'Andrea, 61, who ran the Gun Case in Shelton, was arrested last week and released after posting a $200,000 bond, authorities announced Thursday. The store was recently moved to Milford, where it is called Guns & Safes Unlimited.

Federal investigators said that over a two-year period 100 guns seized at crime scenes had passed through D'Andrea's store.

"This investigation has revealed a disturbing lack of control and mismanagement by one of Connecticut's largest gun dealers, and blatant disregard for federal firearms possession and reporting laws," said U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor. "This case goes to the heart of how legal guns become illegal guns on the street. Gun store operators are the first line of defense for stopping gun crimes on our streets, and this case will be prosecuted to the fullest extent."

D'Andrea is under court order to come up with a plan to limit his involvement in the business while the case is pending.

"He firmly insists on his innocence," said Lawrence Church, D'Andrea's lawyer.

D'Andrea repeatedly failed to properly conduct required background checks on firearm purchasers; falsely stated on multiple occasions that background checks on customers had been conducted when they had not; unlawfully kept and transferred various firearms off his books; and sold firearms to customers who had said that they were prohibited from buying them because of criminal records or other issues, authorities said.

D'Andrea on 11 occasions failed to report multiple gun sales to the same person, authorities said. He also failed to report hundreds of guns that were lost or stolen, they said.

D'Andrea was charged with mail fraud and obstruction of justice for allegedly shipping a number of firearms that are illegal under Connecticut law out of his store during the ATF audit in order to prevent their discovery.

He allegedly possessed two unregistered "Street Sweepers," an automatic shotgun, and other assault weapons that are illegal under Connecticut law, according to a criminal complaint.

A routine inspection by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco Firearms and Explosives last year began to uncover the violations, authorities said.

"Stopping the illegal flow of firearms continues to be one of our top priorities and today is just another example of how we do that," said ATF Special Agent in Charge Glenn N. Anderson.

Gun dealer arrested for bad record keeping (CP)

By MICHAEL P. MAYKO

The Connecticut Post, April 28, 2006

BRIDGEPORT — One of the state's biggest gun dealers was arrested after federal agents say they uncovered numerous record-keeping violations at his shop, including the sale of three guns to a person charged with a felony.

Frank D'Andrea of Soundview Avenue, Shelton, is free on $200,000 bond but is under orders from U.S. Magistrate Judge Holly B. Fitzsimmons to come up with a plan to run his business with limited involvement while the case is pending. D'Andrea recently moved his D'Andrea's Gun Case from Barnum Avenue in Stratford to Woodmont Road in Milford and renamed it D'Andrea's Guns and Safes Unlimited. The business is still open, Lawrence Church, D'Andrea's lawyer, said Wednesday.

The move came just months after U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor rented a billboard across the street from D'Andrea's former store in Stratford. The poster read "Buy a gun for a criminal, go to federal prison."

O'Connor said Wednesday that ATF investigators determined that, over a two-year period, 100 guns seized at crime scenes had passed through D'Andrea's store. "Federally licensed gun dealers have a tremendous responsibility to sell weapons appropriately," O'Connor said.

D'Andrea, a lifelong area resident who graduated from Harding High School and is a Marine Corps veteran, has operated a gun store for about 30 years at various sites. While D'Andrea has cooperated with the federal government in several cases over the years, authorities said, he also has been an outspoken critic of restrictive gun laws.

Church said he advised his client not to discuss the case.

"He firmly insists on his innocence," Church said.

The arrest is based on an affidavit filed by Special Agent James Sullivan of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

The 22-page affidavit lists numerous, mostly record-keeping, violations. Sullivan charged that D'Andrea on 11 occasions failed to report multiple gun sales to the same person; on 34 occasions failed to get certification of the 90-day state residency requirement before selling guns to aliens; and on 32 occasions failed to insure that all of the questions on a required ATF transaction form were answered before the gun was transferred.

D'Andrea is charged with disposing of firearms without making entries into his record books; making false statements and representation on required forms; failing to conduct required background checks on purchasers; transferring guns to people who failed to certify they were not prohibited from buying guns; failing to report multiple sales to the same person; failing to report the theft or loss of firearms; and receiving or possessing firearms that are not registered.

Most of these charges carry a maximum possible sentence of five years in prison.

"The reason we have these record-keeping requirements is to prevent guns from falling into the wrong hands," O'Connor said. D'Andrea also is accused of mail fraud, which carries a possible 20-year term, and obstruction of justice, which carries a five-year term. Both those charges stem from his allegedly transferring guns through a broker to another dealer while the investigation was ongoing.

It is expected that Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Reynolds will take his evidence against D'Andrea to a federal grand jury next month.

The evidence was uncovered during a routine ATF inspection of D'Andrea's record-keeping last spring. That inspection led to an ATF search and seizure at the store and D'Andrea' s home Dec. 12.

Early during their audit of D'Andrea's store, ATF inspectors determined 74 guns in the inventory were missing. Checking firearm records they said they discovered that three of those guns turned up during a crime or were seized during the investigation of a crime. Sullivan said one of the missing guns — a Colt Assault Rifle 15 — previously was found in possession of a Woodbridge man. After police seized the gun from the man, ATF agents traced its serial number and found it still listed as though it was in the possession of D'Andrea's store, Sullivan said, adding the weapon never was reported sold or stolen.

The audit also showed that three guns were sold to an individual who was under arrest in a felony. No one charged with a felony can possess a gun while the case is pending. Federal law prohibits convict felons from possessing a gun.

Sullivan said the inspection determined that on 31 occasions D'Andrea failed to properly record the National Instant Criminal Background Check System and in six instances made false representations regarding the checks on ATF forms.

The inspection also found 73 instances in which D'Andrea failed to record gun sales and 59 instances of incorrectly recording gun sales on his Acquisitions and Dispositions Record.

One of the guns not recorded but found in the store was a Street Sweeper, which street gangs prefer for drive-by shootings, authorities said.

As the inspection proceeded, Sullivan accused D'Andrea of unlawfully disposing of firearms.

A former store employee told ATF inspectors that D'Andrea asked him to ship two Thompson submachine guns and a shotgun by Federal Express to a dealer in Florida, according to Sullivan's affidavit.

Reward offered in Waiakea High School arson (AP)

AP, April 28, 2006

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) and Hawaii Police Department are offering a reward of up to $5,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of anyone involved in the arson of Waiakea High School.

The fire occurred in the early morning hours on April 11, 2006, at the high school, located at 155 W. Kawili Street in Hilo. Police responded at approximately 1:15 a.m. No one was injured in the fire and the property damage is estimated at $1.5 million.

“We take this incident seriously and are committed to pursuing every investigative lead,” said ATF Special Agent in Charge Kelvin N. Crenshaw.

“We urge anyone to call if you have any information that would assist us in apprehending the responsible persons in this case,” said Captain Chad Fukui, commander of the Hawaii Police Department's East Hawaii Criminal Investigations Division.

Two hotline numbers have been established: 1-888-ATF-FIRE and local police at 961-2383. All calls are confidential.

Reefer Medicine (NYT)

By Henry I. Miller

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

Stanford, Calif.

LAST week, the Food and Drug Administration staked out its position on the long-standing controversy over the medical use of marijuana — and made a lot of people smoking mad. The F.D.A. endorsed a multi-agency study that found that "no animal or human data supported the safety or efficacy of marijuana for general medical use." This came as an affront to those who claim that cannabis is an appropriate treatment for ailments from nausea and vomiting to muscle spasticity and intractable pain.

Many news reports and commentaries accused the F.D.A. of contradicting a 1999 report by the Institute of Medicine that recommended further research on marijuana's medical potential. The regulators were denounced as elevating politics over science.

But the F.D.A. did no such thing. To be sure, its one-page statement was far shorter and less detailed than the institute's book-length report, but its conclusions were essentially the same. The F.D.A. also recently gave the go-ahead for clinical trials of a new drug derived from marijuana — further demonstrating that its position is both sensible and proper.

In their 1999 report, the Institute of Medicine's panel of experts flatly rejected the idea that herbal (usually smoked) cannabis would ever be considered a safe and effective medicine for widespread use. They noted that marijuana appears to be modestly effective in treating the nausea and vomiting induced by chemotherapy and the wasting caused by AIDS — though not as effective as some approved medicines are. But they also said that because smoked marijuana can increase the risk of lung damage, cancer and complications during pregnancy, it is appropriate only for short-term use (less than six months) by acutely suffering patients who have failed to find relief with other therapies and who are under the close supervision of a doctor.

It is not the F.D.A. but the 11 states that have passed laws allowing the use of smoked marijuana for various medical problems that are at odds with the Institute of Medicine's position.

More promising than smoked marijuana, the institute said, is the potential of drugs made with cannabinoids — the bioactive substances found in marijuana. It called for clinical trials of such medicines and the development of safe ways to deliver them.

In January, the F.D.A. approved advanced clinical trials of a marijuana-derived drug called Sativex, which comes in the form of a mouth spray. Sativex has been approved in Canada for the treatment of neuropathic pain associated with multiple sclerosis, and it is available by prescription (though not yet fully licensed) in Spain and Britain. According to GW Pharmaceuticals, the British company that makes the drug, more than 1,500 patients in those three countries are using Sativex to alleviate pain, muscle spasticity and other serious problems.

Federal law requires that before any drug is marketed, it must first be judged safe and effective by qualified experts. And that judgment requires the review of scientific evidence — not anecdotal reports and patient testimonials but hard data from carefully designed animal testing and clinical trials. While far from perfect in practice, this approach goes a long way toward ensuring that patients are protected from exposure to unsafe or ineffective products. Even for terminally ill patients, this commitment to safety and effectiveness is important, because the suffering of a dying patient can be aggravated by an imprudent medical intervention.

Smoked marijuana cannot be subjected to careful, well-controlled trials, because it does not come in a standard, reproducible formula or dose, and cannot meet the accepted standards for drug purity, potency and quality. Different strains of cannabis vary radically in their cannabinoid composition and in the contaminants — fungi, bacteria, pesticides, heavy metals and other substances — they contain. And smoking is not a precise way of delivering any substance to the bloodstream.

Other plant-derived drugs — morphine, codeine and Taxol, to name a few — have made it through the F.D.A.'s review process, and there is no reason drugs made from cannabis should not be required to meet the same standards.

Sativex contains an equal ratio of two cannabinoids: tetrahydrocannabinol, which is psychoactive, and cannabidiol, which is not. Its spray dispenser delivers a precise dose of the drug, which is absorbed through the mucous membranes of the mouth. The composition of the drug and the manner in which it is delivered together ensure that its active ingredients can be medically effective without causing the kind of "high" that many patients view as an undesirable side effect.

THE availability of drugs like Sativex should (but won't) end the rancorous debate over medical marijuana. Even if it did, the issue of whether marijuana should be legalized as a recreational drug would remain.

Meanwhile, F.D.A. officials must ensure that the testing and potential approval of cannabinoid-containing drugs are not hindered by political agendas or other nonscientific considerations, inside or outside the agency. For the benefit of patients in need, this is something about which the F.D.A., the parts of our government waging the "war on drugs" and other interested parties should be able to agree.

Henry I. Miller, a doctorand a fellow at the Hoover Institution, headed the Food and Drug Administration's Office of Biotechnology from 1989 to 1993.

Politics Produces A Cloud Of Smoke (JDN)

Jacksonville Daily News, April 28, 2006

Last week, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, for reasons that are far from clear, chose to enter the debate over medical marijuana with a thoroughly unscientific — one might even say anti-scientific — blanket denial that marijuana has any medical value at all.Specifically, the grandiosely titled “Inter-Agency Advisory Regarding Claims That Smoked Marijuana Is a Medicine” referenced a “past examination” that “concluded that no sound scientific studies supported medical use of marijuana for treatment in the United States, and no animal or human data supported the safety or efficacy of marijuana for general medical use.”

DOJ_NMG_0027211

That is simply not true. As Scientific American magazine noted on its Web site the next day, the statement simply ignores "the existence of a 1999 report by the Institute of Medicine of the National Academy of Sciences, which concluded that marijuana was 'moderately well-suited for particular conditions, such as chemotherapy-induced nausea and vomiting and AIDS wasting.'"

The Institute of Medicine report, which was commissioned by the "drug czar" at the time, Gen. Barry McCaffrey, and included a series of hearings around the country as well as a complete review of the scientific literature worldwide, summarized its conclusions as follows:

"Advances in cannabinoid science of the past 16 years have given rise to a wealth of new opportunities for the development of medically useful cannabinoid-based drugs. The accumulated data suggest a variety of indications, particularly for pain relief, antiemesis and appetite stimulation. For patients such as those with AIDS or who are undergoing chemotherapy, and who suffer simultaneously from severe pain, nausea and appetite loss, cannabinoid drugs might offer broad-spectrum relief not found in any other single medication. The data are weaker for muscle spasticity but moderately promising. The least-promising categories are movement disorders, epilepsy and glaucoma. Animal data are moderately supportive of a potential for cannabinoids in the treatment of movement disorders and might eventually yield stronger encouragement."

The Institute of Medicine report does say that "it does not follow from this that smoking marijuana is good medicine," which is the only sentence Gen. McCaffrey ever quoted.

That statement is followed, however, by noting that "patients who are currently suffering from debilitating conditions unrelieved by legally available drugs, and who might find relief with smoked marijuana, will find little comfort in a promise of a better drug 10 years from now."

Therefore, "Until a nonsmoked rapid-onset cannabinoid drug-delivery system becomes available, we acknowledge that there is no clear alternative for people suffering from chronic conditions that might be relieved by smoking marijuana, such as pain or AIDS wasting."

The FDA statement was not preceded by any new studies or surveys of the literature; it was simply posted on the agency's Web site.

It represents a willful determination to ignore science to buttress the harmful policy of marijuana prohibition.

Drugs Beget Thugs In The Americas (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

"It is an established fact that alcoholism, cocainism, and morphinism are deadly enemies of life, of health, and of the capacity for work and enjoyment; and a utilitarian must therefore consider them as vices. But this is far from demonstrating that the authorities must interpose to suppress these vices by commercial prohibitions, nor is it by any means evident that such intervention on the part of the government is really capable of suppressing them or that, even if this end could be attained, it might not therewith open up a Pandora's box of other dangers, no less mischievous than alcoholism and morphinism."

-- Ludwig von Mises in "Liberalism," 1927

The Mexican state of Campeche, tucked into the curve that forms the Gulf of Mexico in the south, is about as far from either the posh suburbs or the mean urban streets of North America as you can get. Arguably, there are parts of the region that have changed very little since Graham Greene wrote his 1940 novel about a whiskey priest on the run from an anti-clerical zealot in neighboring Tabasco.

Yet as last week's massive drug bust there showed, it is very much part of the international market place. The capture of 5.2 tons of cocaine at the airport in Ciudad del Carmen, flown in from Venezuela, is a reminder that as long as there are consumers who want to ingest illegal substances there will be suppliers. For every shipment that gets stopped you can bet nine others get through. We know this because decades into the war on drugs, prohibited narcotics are still widely available in the U.S.

The more disturbing lesson provided by the Campeche bust is the revelation of the underworld monster that prohibition has created and that is now emerging from the Pandora's box that Mises warned of. A mighty and unflinching organized-crime network is overwhelming Latin American law enforcement.

In the debate about Mexican immigration to the U.S. there has been a lot of legitimate criticism about Mexico's failure to create an economically viable environment for its own people. When exporting human capital is a top priority something in the policy mix is dreadfully wrong and there is no doubt that the Mexican political class has a lot to answer for.

But the drug war also figures in the equation. Nobel economist Douglas North taught us the importance of institutions in development economics. Yet prohibition and the war on drugs are fueling a criminal underworld that handily crushes nascent democratic institutions in countries that we keep expecting to develop. Is it reasonable to blame Mexico for what enormously well-funded organized-crime operations are doing to its political, judicial and law enforcement bodies when we know that Al

Capone's power during alcohol prohibition accomplished much the same in the U.S.? These are realities of the market, of supply and demand and prices under prohibition that no amount of wishing or moralizing can change.

A serious discussion about U.S. security interests has to begin by acknowledging the great cost of prohibition and the war on drugs to U.S. foreign policy objectives. A U.S. policy that unintentionally empowers brutal organized-crime rings is counterproductive to U.S. hopes for a stable and prosperous Latin America.

The problem is particularly acute for America's southern neighbor. Drug violence is spiraling throughout Mexico and innocents are paying the ultimate price. One target city is Nuevo Laredo where eight months ago Mexican federal authorities arrived to quell unprecedented cartel violence. Today the murder rate is up; the Mexican general who was in charge of restoring order has gone missing; the news media has suffered atrocious assaults, including a grenade attack; and there is concern that the government's anti-drug units have been infiltrated.

Last month four federal intelligence officers were gunned down in the middle of the day near a school. That's about the same time some 600 federal police were sent to the city as reinforcements.

The rest of Mexico is under siege as well. In February the police chief of an upscale district of Monterrey was gunned down. An April 21 report in the Los Angeles Times captured the attitude of the drug lords: "'So that you learn to respect,' read a message scrawled on a red sheet attached to a Guerrero state government building in Acapulco, where passers-by in the early morning hours discovered the heads of former Police Commander Mario Nunez Magana, 35, of the Municipal Preventive Police, and another man, who was not identified."

More than 140 people have been killed in drug violence this year in the states of Guerrero and Michocan. The L.A. Times also reported that the beheadings occurred hours after the state governor "announced a $12 million project to give more firepower to police, who say they often are outgunned by the cartels." Outgunned they were on March 26 in the border city of Matamoros. As reported by Knight-Ridder, three agents with Mexico's Federal Investigations Agency were chased through the city's downtown "where they were attacked by suspects armed with AK-47s and other high-powered weapons."

Two more scary developments are notable. The first is the link between organized crime and political enemies of the U.S. In Colombia the rebel army known as the FARC is now a full-fledged narcotics trafficking operation. Officials believe that Venezuela, headed by the menacing Hugo Chávez, has become a major transit point for drugs. A 2006 State Department narcotics report noted that "rampant corruption at the highest levels of law enforcement and a weak judicial system" have made matters worse in Venezuela. Some in Mexico worry that drug money could play a corrosive role in July's presidential election.

A second, depressing development is the increase in drug consumption in poor countries as those doing the trafficking are paid in kind and push drugs locally to collect their money. A worthless weed has been made all the more dangerous by prohibition which gives it value and provides the incentives to get poor children hooked. Where's the morality in a policy with such pernicious, if unintended, consequences?

The question is not whether dangerous drugs are innocuous. Let's agree they are not. The question is which policy is best to manage the problem. We can't make that calculation until we face honestly all of the costs of prohibition and the suffering of our neighbors.

Immigration Issues Coming To A 'big Stop' (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf And Judy Keen

USA Today, April 28, 2006

LOS ANGELES — Masses of illegal immigrants and their supporters around the USA plan to boycott workplaces, stores and schools on Monday, but the move is dividing some pro-immigration activists and business owners.

Organizers of the May Day walkout call it el gran paro — "the big stop" — and "a day without immigrants." Building on huge marches staged in recent weeks, the boycotts and rallies in many cities will demonstrate immigrants' economic importance as Congress debates legislation, says Armando Navarro of the California-based National Alliance for Human Rights.

"It was one thing to march," Navarro says. "Now we're going to hit 'em where it hurts — in the pocketbooks."

The boycott's "size and impact remain to be seen," says Juan Jose Gutierrez of Latino Movement USA. That group's slogan: "No work, no school, no shopping, no commerce."

Gutierrez says he expects "substantial" worker absences, from Georgia poultry-processing plants to West Coast construction sites. David Jones, president of the Arizona Contractors Association, says builders there expect some no-shows and a work slowdown.

DOJ_NMG_0027213

As many as 12 million illegal immigrants are in the USA, and they make up about 5% of the workforce, the Pew Hispanic Center says.

Raul Murillo, director of the Los Angeles chapter of the Hermandad Mexicana immigrant organization, says he's among those acting to oppose a bill passed by the House of Representatives in December that would make illegal immigrants felons. The Senate is still considering an immigration bill.

Businesses with largely immigrant workforces are preparing for Monday in varying ways:

•Cargill, the No. 2 U.S. beef producer and No. 3 pork producer, is closing seven meat-processing plants with 14,000 employees in Iowa, Texas, Kansas, Nebraska, Illinois and Colorado. "We share a lot of the same concerns many of our employees have," spokesman Mark Klein says. "The immigration process is broken, and we need true solutions to it."

•Tyson Foods is discouraging workers from missing shifts, spokesman Gary Mickelson says. "We don't want our team members to jeopardize their good employment records and incomes by taking unauthorized time away from work," he says.

•All Las Vegas casinos are asking workers to stay on the job, sign petitions to lawmakers and attend a downtown "celebration of immigration" at 6 p.m., says Yvette Monet of MGM Mirage.

•The 17 Spanish-language radio stations owned by Clear Channel Communications will broadcast music without comment from disc jockeys. "Words are my life, but sometimes silence makes a bigger point," morning host Alex Lucas says.

Many Hispanic-owned businesses will be closed. Salvador Pedroza Moreno, owner of Economy Roofing in Chicago, says he'll give his seven workers the day off with pay to attend a march. In Tucson, Ricardo Cazares is shutting Alejandro's Tortilla Factory & Bakery, which has 55 workers. "There are sales that I know will be lost, but if we want something, we have to pay a price for it," he says.

Rallies are scheduled in many cities. Jessica Aranda of the March 10 Movement, a Chicago coalition that drew 100,000 to a march last month, says Monday will draw a bigger crowd. "Our community is coming into our own and realizing our own power," she says.

In nine New York City neighborhoods, "human chains" of Hispanic store owners, workers and customers will link hands for about 20 minutes, says Chung-Wha Hong, executive director of the New York Immigration Coalition.

"Some business owners couldn't afford to shut down their businesses all day," she says. "This is an alternative action for people who wanted to join something."

Navarro of the National Alliance for Human Rights says he expects Monday's economic action to get Congress' attention. "Timing is everything in politics, and the timing is with us right now," he says. But others who favor laws that support immigration rights say the walkouts could spark a backlash.

Encouraging children to skip school "just adds fuel to the argument that we don't care about our children's education," says Jose Lagos, a community organizer with Honduran Unity in Miami.

Angelica Salas of the Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights in Los Angeles says her group urges workers to get permission from their bosses before taking the day off. If undocumented workers walk out and get fired, "there's very little that they can do," she says.

Hector Flores, president of the League of United Latin American Citizens, says his 100,000-member organization opposes worker absenteeism and school walkouts, "but we don't want people to consume anything on that day."

Last month, announcements by Spanish-radio disc jockeys helped build crowds at rallies. Now, the top-rated Renan Almendarez Coello (known as El Cucuy, "the boogeyman") opposes walkouts. "We came here to work and not to say 'don't work,' " he said last week.

Cardinal Roger Mahony of Los Angeles, who has said he'd order priests not to obey laws against helping illegal immigrants, is cautious about Monday's boycott and instead is promoting a 4 p.m. rally — after school hours. That event could cut crowds at the boycott organizers' noon rally at City Hall.

"If both events go well, that would be great," says Mike Garcia, president of a Service Employees International Union local in Los Angeles, which is neutral on the boycott. "It shows there are differences in strategies, but everybody's fighting for the same thing."

L.A. Authorities Brace For Huge Immigration Marches (LAT)

By Hector Becerra And Andrew Blankstein

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

Two immigrant rights demonstrations Monday in Los Angeles could each draw a half-million marchers or more, police said Thursday, as officials expressed concern about a major disruption of traffic, commerce and school.

LAPD Assistant Chief George Gascon said the estimates are based on street intelligence and what he described as a well-organized campaign involving radio stations, churches and community groups. Police do not expect trouble, he added.

DOJ_NMG_0027214

Demonstrations are planned for downtown at noon and Mid-Wilshire at 4 p.m. Gascon said the LAPD is gearing up to deal with hundreds of thousands of demonstrators at each.

Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, Cardinal Roger Mahony and others have encouraged protesters to attend the late-afternoon march from MacArthur Park down Wilshire Boulevard to La Brea Avenue, prompting authorities to say that crowd might be the larger of the two.

Officials in Santa Ana, Huntington Park, Oxnard, Riverside, Pomona and San Diego said they expect smaller but boisterous protests.

Police in Chicago, meanwhile, estimated that as many as 500,000 could take to the streets in that city, while Seattle officials and protest organizers said they expect anywhere from 10,000 to 50,000 marchers.

Officials acknowledged that it is difficult to predict the size of any protest crowd, noting that at a march last month, the LAPD had expected far fewer protesters than the estimated 500,000 people who showed up outside Los Angeles City Hall.

But if the LAPD's estimates prove correct, Monday's marches would approach the scope of that event — one of the largest protests in Los Angeles' history. Officials said Monday's demonstrations could prove more disruptive, however, because they will occur on a weekday and they include a call for people to boycott school and work and refrain from shopping.

Some small-business owners say they plan to close down Monday, either to support the marchers or because they think it would be difficult to do business.

State and local school officials urged students to stay in classes, and transportation officials planned street closures and bus route detours.

"We want students to exercise free speech, but not at the expense of their education," said state Supt. of Public Instruction Jack O'Connell. "If students need to protest, they should feel free to do so after school."

The LAPD is coordinating an action plan with the Sheriff's Department, transportation agencies, the school district and other law enforcement. Officials said they also have been in contact with organizers in hopes of minimizing any conflicts and making sure the demonstrations run smoothly.

"We feel very confident at this point about the way the demonstrators have been conducting themselves, and we don't anticipate any problems," Gascon said. "We want to protect the demonstrators' 1st Amendment rights as well as the property rights and the rights of everyone else in the community."

Authorities voiced concern that because the protest falls on May Day, revolutionary groups and anarchists who have given police trouble in the past might join the marchers.

"We are not sure what they will add to the mix," said LAPD Capt. Andy Smith of the Central Division.

The noon march in Los Angeles is scheduled to begin at Olympic Boulevard and Broadway and proceed north toward City Hall. It is organized by the March 25 Coalition, which has called for a boycott of work, school and consumer activity. Leaders say the goal is to demonstrate the vital role of immigrants in the economy.

The second march is scheduled to begin at MacArthur Park and head west on Wilshire Boulevard toward La Brea. Organizers include the Archdiocese of Los Angeles and labor and civic groups. They say they want to give people who cannot take the day off work a way to participate in the fight for immigrant rights, and have urged students not to miss school.

LAPD officials said they have heard about a possible third demonstration being organized for Monday night in downtown, but did not know how big it might be.

It is unclear how businesses will be affected by the protests. Most larger shops and companies appear to be planning regular operations Monday. But local businesses with large numbers of immigrant workers, as well as those owned by immigrants and establishments along protest routes, could face substantial disruptions.

Some restaurants, grocery stores, garment factories, farmers, meat packers, gardeners and truckers say they plan to suspend some or all operations. Households may not get their usual gardening or housecleaning services, while some commercial establishments may not receive expected deliveries. Some workers who plan to demonstrate have already cleared their absences with their employers, while others plan to work from home to avoid traffic problems.

Additionally, some activists have vowed to disrupt work at the Port of Los Angeles, Los Angeles International Airport and elsewhere, though it is unclear uncertain how much support they have.

With the demonstration approaching, Villaraigosa and other officials appealed Thursday for students to stay in school Monday.

"It's very important to keep our kids in school and to make sure they get a good education, including on May 1st," he said, speaking first in English, then Spanish. "After school, they can join in the marches as is their 1st Amendment right."

But some groups rejected such pleas, saying students have a moral duty to protest immigration legislation they feel is wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0027215

"I believe children have more to learn protesting on the streets with their parents, expressing their rights, than in the classrooms," said Nativo Lopez, president of Hermandad Mexicana, which was organizing a demonstration in Santa Ana.

Los Angeles Unified Supt. Roy Romer said there would be no districtwide order to place schools on lockdown, during which students are not allowed to leave classrooms. Instead, principals on each campus will decide how to react if students try to leave campus during the school day.

"Monday, we need to be in school," Romer said at a news conference with O'Connell at Lincoln High School in Lincoln Heights. "We will be able to keep children safer at school, we will be able to continue their education, and after school hours there will be appropriate occasion to express themselves."

In Huntington Park, the scheduled ending point for a smaller demonstration, police said they were expecting many students to miss class. But stopping them would not be a priority, said Assistant Police Chief Cosme Lozano.

"We will have plenty of other things to worry about," he said. "We're not going to make mass truancy detentions a priority, but it will be a tool for us to use if we have to."

In Sacramento, the California Senate in a party-line vote approved a resolution designating Monday as the "Great American Boycott 2006." Democrats argued that protests are a venerable tradition going back to the Boston Tea Party. But Republicans criticized the measure as condoning illegality and encouraging student truancy.

Several Democratic lawmakers said they would be participating in the demonstrations Monday, and leaders decided that neither the Senate or Assembly would conduct business that day.

However, lawmakers can still receive their $138 per diem, a move Republicans called hypocritical, since most immigrants skipping work for protests are not paid.

Illegal Immigrants Skip Work Amid Unfounded Rumors Of Government Roundup (WSJ)

By Miriam Jordan And Paulo Trevisani Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

Thousands of illegal immigrants across the U.S. stayed away from work and school, skipped medical appointments and scrapped purchases this week as rumors spread that authorities are rounding up undocumented residents.

The rising panic is fallout from last week's move by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to crack down on employers who purposely hire undocumented immigrants. Immigration and Customs Enforcement investigations over the past year resulted in the arrest on April 19 of 1,187 employees and seven current and former managers of IFCO Systems North America. Officials of the company, a supplier of wooden pallets and crates with plants across the country, are charged with conspiring to hire illegal immigrants, including helping them secure fake documents.

After hundreds of no-shows for medical appointments throughout Contra Costa County in northern California, the chief health official yesterday sought to reassure patients by circulating a letter stating that visiting a clinic wouldn't endanger them. In Newark, N.J., teachers reported unusual absenteeism for four consecutive days. At parking lots of home-improvement stores in Florida, such as Home Depot, only a few immigrants sought day-laborer jobs, when normally dozens show up.

The origin of the rumors is unclear. "These reports are baseless," says Virginia Kice, a spokeswoman for ICE. "We don't conduct random raids." The agency has been flooded with calls from Spanish-language media outlets seeking information.

The situation could hamper Monday's planned "National Day of Action," another round of immigration rallies that has been expected to draw millions to the streets of major U.S. cities. Protests calling for immigration reform have drawn huge crowds in the past month as immigrant workers press for legal work status amid a divisive congressional debate.

In the face of the current fear, organizers of Monday's protests are trying to calm potential protestors to ensure another big turnout. "We have been telling the public not to be intimidated," says Juan Carlos Hidalgo, programming director for a top-rated Spanish-language radio station KLEX in Los Angeles.

Peter Dyga, vice-president for government affairs of the Associated Builders and Contractors in Coconut Creek, Fla., says hundreds of construction workers had either walked off the job or just didn't show up this week. "We've never seen anything like this. We are in a sticky situation as an industry," he says.

In Newark, a Brazilian immigrant named Katia who declined to give her last name, has avoided leaving her house since Friday, when she first heard about possible raids. "I am just walking one block to take my daughter to school," she says. "I didn't even take her to karate classes last Monday."

Restaurant and grocery store owners reported a dramatic drop in business in many U.S. cities as illegal immigrants avoided being in public. "I just got off the phone with a mother who was afraid to go to the pharmacy to have her child's prescription for antibiotics filled," says Concepcion James, manager of Bay Point Family Health Center, which caters to low-income families in Bay Point, Calif. Only a handful of parents brought their children yesterday for a free day of eye exams, which normally draws hundreds.

What has alarmed many immigrants is the specificity of the rumors, although none turned out to be true: In Newark, there was talk that U.S. agents were posted at bridges and roads connecting the city to New York and other towns. In Concord, Calif., a white Bronco parked outside a home-repair shop supposedly carried undercover immigration agents. In Fort Worth, Texas, a call about a rumored immigration sting sent Star-Telegram reporters scrambling Tuesday night to an area near the Fort Worth Stockyards, according to the newspaper's account.

With 12 million illegal immigrants in the country, ICE normally targets those with criminal records who have evaded deportation orders. In terms of employers, the agency typically investigates companies believed to systematically hire undocumented immigrants for commercial gain.

Other recent incidents have added fuel to the fire. In Chinook, Wash., on Tuesday, ICE agents apprehended 16 illegal immigrants at a fish processing plant. On Monday, ICE agents in Miami announced the arrests of 183 undocumented immigrants, including 130 who had evaded deportation orders. Another 53 illegal immigrants were arrested because they were in the area when the arrests took place.

The new workplace enforcement is interpreted by some political analysts as an attempt to placate hard-line Republicans who believe the Bush administration is turning a blind eye to the widespread practice by U.S. businesses of hiring undocumented immigrants. The crackdown also indicates the extent to which the political tussle over immigration could affect several sectors of the economy that rely on immigrant workers. An ICE spokeswoman said the workplace enforcement represents the second phase of a multi-year program to reduce illegal immigration.

Community leaders believe that the political debate over illegal immigration, including a House bill that would make illegal immigrants and those who help them subject to criminal prosecution, has helped stoke panic in immigrant communities.

"Everybody knows someone who knows someone who has been arrested," says Ilton Marques, a butcher at Emporium Supermarket in Newark. "But nobody actually saw anything."

Hispanics Seek Immigration Action (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

See weekday Washington Wire updates at www.washwire.com1.

HISPANICS WANT action on immigration reform.

While other Americans rate curbing budgetary "earmarks" their top single objective for Congress, new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll2 shows a 46% plurality of Hispanics place immigration atop "must do" list. The poll, conducted in English, included an expanded sample of Hispanic respondents. Eight in 10 embrace Senate guest-worker compromise differentiating among illegal immigrants based on residence. Though Republicans blame Democrats for earlier collapse of that deal, two-thirds of Hispanics would hold Bush or his party responsible for inaction. The poll's margin of error is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

White voters favor Republican control of Congress by 45%-39%; Hispanics prefer Democrats, 55%-22%.

HEALTH CARE LOOMS as top election-year concern.

Three in 10 Americans call it a top priority, outpacing those citing job creation, terrorism or Iran's nuclear program. Strong majority applauds Massachusetts Gov. Romney's plan to mandate that individuals buy insurance, though Republicans are less enthusiastic than Democrats and independents.

Bush's party makes modest headway in defending Medicare prescription drug benefit as May 15 enrollment deadline approaches. Senate Republicans brace for May battles over medical malpractice and "association health plan" legislation. NFIB and Realtors back the association bill, but opposition from AARP, American Cancer Society and American Diabetes Association clouds prospects.

MCCAIN WIDENS early lead over Clinton for 2008.

In a prospective presidential matchup, the Arizona Republican leads the New York Democrat, 46%-37%, up from two-percentage edge in November. The fourth-term maverick draws 13% support from Democrats, while Clinton receives just 6% support from Republicans.

But former first lady benefits from a more enthusiastic base, as 41% of Democrats call themselves "optimistic" about another Clinton presidency. Just 28% of Republicans are optimistic about McCain.

Bill Clinton's positive ratings hit 50% for first time since he left the White House; his negative falls to 33%.

MULFORD EMERGES as additional contender to succeed Snow at Treasury. The current U.S. ambassador to India, a Treasury undersecretary for the elder President Bush, has Wall Street credibility as a former top Credit Suisse First Boston official. Another name in the buzz: Commerce Secretary Gutierrez, an ex-Kellogg CEO.

DOJ_NMG_0027217

CONSENSUS: Six in 10 Republicans, Democrats, and independents fault oil companies for gas-price increases. But they split on Bush's culpability; just 9% of Republicans blame the president, while 46% of Democrats and 31% of independents do.

COULD BE WORSE: While only 24% of Americans call the nation "headed in the right direction," that's 10 percentage points more than said so in July 1992 during first President Bush's unsuccessful re-election bid. That campaign was colored by Perot's independent candidacy; today, 45% want a new independent party to compete for the presidency and 29% oppose the idea.

STALLED: FDA again delays release of new manufacturing standards for dietary supplements, frustrating lawmakers and industry who've been waiting for regulation under terms of 1994 law. Just 15% of Americans call themselves optimistic that Bush will do a good job in rest of term, while 35% are pessimistic.

DESPITE IRAQ, Americans don't reject strikes against a nuclear Iran.

By 48%-42%, public says U.S. should join coalition to attack Iran's nuclear capability if Tehran approaches development of a weapon. Support falls to 42%, with 46% opposed, when respondents are asked if the U.S. should act on its own.

Majorities in all regions, races and age groups say U.S. should change directions and scale back objectives in Iraq. But six in 10 conservatives and white evangelical Christians favor remaining "on the current course." Two-thirds of all respondents say resignation of Pentagon chief Rumsfeld would be only "a symbolic gesture" that wouldn't make much difference.

Industry insiders say Dubai Ports World may face cut-rate offers for U.S. assets, could ask Congress to cover losses.

MINOR MEMOS: Amid bickering over ballot security, majorities of blacks and Hispanics back requiring photo ID at voting sites ... Notwithstanding media focus, just 3% rank Duke lacrosse team rape scandal as top concern.

Population Shift Smaller Families In Mexico May Stir U.S. Job Market (WSJ)

By June Kronholz And John Lyons

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

U.S. employers have long counted on men like Elizardo Ramírez, who left his concrete-block home and 12 children in Mexicali, Mexico, to spend most of his working life in California picking tomatoes and lettuce. Two of Mr. Ramírez's sons followed him to low-skilled jobs in the U.S.

But Americans who are convinced the spigot of workers like the Ramírezes will never run dry might want to visit another of the Ramírez children still in Mexicali: Sandra Ramírez de Llanes. Ms. Llanes and her husband, Osvaldo, have just one child. They're saving for 15-year-old Jose Oswaldo to go to college and become an engineer -- in Mexico.

Unusual for their generation, Ms. Llanes and her husband have themselves risen to the middle class, thanks to jobs at a bank. "We've struggled," says Ms. Llanes. "But through it all, it never occurred to us to go to the U.S."

The Llanes family reflects Mexico's past and present -- and, perhaps, illuminates a future that would have important consequences for the U.S. economy. Thanks to a decades-long family-planning campaign, most Mexicans are having far fewer children than was typical a generation ago. When Ms. Llanes was born in 1968, the average Mexican woman had nearly seven children. Today, the figure is just above two, comparable to the U.S.

This sweeping demographic shift has fostered hope that someday Mexico will produce a healthy middle class of people like the Llaneses. Most Mexicans today are far too poor for luxuries the Llaneses enjoy, such as a computer for Jose Oswaldo. But the new, smaller Mexican family may help change that by allowing parents to invest more in their children's education, finally producing the generation that lifts Mexico into the developed world.

Mexico's new demographics could have a big impact on the U.S. Although the flood of Mexicans heading north is whipping up debate in Washington, the crossings may slow in future decades. That could happen simply because smaller families limit the pool of potential migrants. A slowdown would be especially likely if a growing middle class makes more Mexicans comfortable at home and averse to risking a dash across the border.

A reduction in the supply of cheap Mexican labor would be sure to have ripple effects on the U.S. economy. It could raise costs for employers as they searched for immigrant labor from more distant places such as Asia. If, as some contend, the current flood of immigrants is hurting lower-skilled native-born Americans, the easing of the flood might help them.

Currently an estimated 459,000 Mexicans come to the U.S. each year, according to the Pew Hispanic Center in Washington, most of them younger people looking for low-skilled work. That reflects Mexico's demographics: There are millions of Mexicans in their 20s and 30s born to big families that had no means to support education. The median age of Mexico's 107 million people is 25, meaning half are older than that age and half are younger. In the U.S., the median is 36.

But the Population Division of the United Nations predicts that by 2050, the situation will be reversed: Mexico's median age will rise to 42, while the U.S. will rise to 41.

DOJ_NMG_0027218

While an older Mexico with smaller families may be a richer one, that outcome is by no means assured. Robert Pastor, director of the Center for North American Studies at American University in Washington, says the "critical challenge" for Mexicans is "what they will do with the next 20 years."

Mexico's large working-age population means it should have more tax revenue to spend on job training, infrastructure such as power and transportation, and a social-security system. But it could miss the opportunity. Currently taxes are low and many rich people evade them. The public-education system is weak and the poor often inherit the low-wage jobs of their parents.

If an aging Mexico stagnates, the drive to emigrate to the U.S. may grow stronger than ever. And U.S. companies that hope a boom in Mexico's middle class will boost purchases of American goods would be disappointed.

Aging expert Richard Jackson says it's hard to predict whether Mexico will prosper. "Every country that ever got old got rich first," says Mr. Jackson, senior fellow at Washington's Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Ms. Llanes's tale offers some hints of how a brighter future might develop for Mexico. She tells of an impoverished childhood. On one grim day, she says, her mother showed her how to feed the family's littlest children only the cloudy water in which she had boiled the rice for everyone else. Ms. Llanes's father, Mr. Ramírez, had joined the mass migration from rural farmland to big cities by coming to Mexicali, right across the border from California, in the mid-1950s.

As the family grew, Mr. Ramírez, an uneducated day laborer who died in 1997, found it hard to make ends meet. He joined a guest-worker program that brought him to seasonal agriculture jobs in the U.S.

"We hardly got to know him as a father. He had to work so much to support us," Ms. Llanes says. One by one, the Ramírez children dropped out of school to help feed the family.

Ms. Llanes recalls envying a neighbor family with just three children who wore store-bought clothes and went to college. "Seeing how they lived...is what made me decide that I would have a small family," she says. But she remembers how older women wondered whether the family was so small because of fertility problems or marital discord.

Rapid population growth was long seen as both a religious obligation in largely Roman Catholic Mexico and as a goal of public policy. In the early 1970s, demographers began warning that Mexico's population, then around 50 million, could triple to 150 million by 2000.

In a policy U-turn, the government set up family-planning clinics, offered free contraception, set sterilization quotas at clinics and began an advertising campaign that is still widely remembered. "The small family lives better," proclaimed television and radio commercials. In a soap opera called "Accompany Me," popular when Ms. Llanes was growing up, a young woman lived in a cramped tenement with 13 siblings. "You've condemned your children to live in a hell," she screamed at her mother in one episode.

Today, the government still sends the same message. The Mexican Senate recently voted to extend sex education to kindergarten.

The population-control efforts had a huge impact, but not before a flood of Mexicans born in the 1970s, '80s and '90s began moving to the U.S. About 11 million Mexican immigrants now live in the U.S., up from less than a million in 1970, according to the Pew Hispanic Center.

The vast flow has relieved pressure on Mexico from millions of jobless young people and helped keep its population in check. Rodolfo Tuirán, former head of Mexico's National Population Council, says Mexico would have another 16 million people today if it hadn't been for the migrants and the children they had in the U.S. instead of Mexico.

Two of Ms. Llanes's brothers joined the movement north. Alvaro Ramírez is a farm hand in El Centro, Calif., and Bartolo Ramírez works at a gas station in Calexico, Calif., just over the border from Mexicali.

Ms. Llanes decided on another path. After finishing junior high school, she enrolled in a one-year secretarial course because "it would have been selfish for me to go on to high school," she says.

At age 17, she began work at a Mexicali bank where she met her future husband. Osvaldo Llanes also had moved from the countryside and concluded that high school would be a luxury. Instead, he took a brief accounting course, joined the bank as a clerk and at age 43, now runs four branches of Banamex, a unit of U.S. giant Citigroup Inc.

On their $26,000 yearly income, the Llaneses live in a three-bedroom home in one of the new U.S.-style housing developments that have sprung up for the thousands of young, middle-class families in the increasingly prosperous north. They own a second house as an investment.

Young Jose Oswaldo talks of studying engineering in college and, to make sure that happens, his parents are putting $40 a month in his college fund. That kind of investment in children's education could bode well for Mexico and over the long term reduce the incentive to emigrate to the U.S.

In the shorter term, however, economic development may fuel immigration by giving would-be migrants the cash to cross the border. The Pew Hispanic Center says many Mexicans move to the U.S. not because they are jobless but because they want a better job than the one they have. Its polls show that 49% of Mexican adults would move to the U.S. if they could.

The Mexican government's most optimistic forecast still puts migration at almost 400,000 a year for the next 25 years -- and more than 500,000 if things go badly with the Mexican economy. In part that's because inland farming states that send the most workers to the U.S. are likely to be the last to share in any new prosperity.

Mexico's economy has long had trouble creating the kind of opportunities that Mr. and Ms. Llanes enjoyed. The Mexican government said recently that its economy created no new private-sector jobs in the first four years of President Fox's six-year term, even though more than a million new workers enter the labor force yearly.

In another few decades Mexico will have the same kind of aging society as developed nations do today, but it is ill-prepared for it. The pension system for state workers faces a shortfall. Private employers are required to contribute to a pension system but about half the work force is working off the books. These people have little chance of a comfortable pension.

If Mexico doesn't build a nationwide pension system, "coming to the U.S. is your social security," says Steve Camarota, a demographer at the Center for Immigration Studies, a Washington research group that advocates less immigration.

Mr. Pastor of American University agrees. "We're going to have an unending wave" of illegal immigrants, he says, unless governments make adjustments -- not only in Mexico but also in other sluggish and aging Latin American countries. The median age in Brazil will rise to 39 in 2050 from 27 today, the U.N. predicts.

Mrs. Llanes is determined that Jose Oswaldo stay in his home country. "I want to prepare my son well enough so he can find opportunities in Mexico," she says.

An Anthem's Discordant Notes (WP)

By David Montgomery

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

Oh say can you see -- a la luz de la aurora?

The national anthem that once endured the radical transformation administered by Jimi Hendrix's fuzzed and frantic Stratocaster now faces an artistic dare at least as extreme: translation into Spanish.

The new take is scheduled to hit the airwaves today. It's called "Nuestro Himno" -- "Our Anthem" -- and it was recorded over the past week by Latin pop stars including Ivy Queen, Gloria Trevi, Carlos Ponce, Tito "El Bambino," Olga Tañon and the group Aventura. Joining and singing in Spanish is Haitian American artist Wyclef Jean.

The different voices contribute lines the way 1985's "We Are the World" was put together by an ensemble of stars. The national anthem's familiar melody and structure are preserved, while the rhythms and instrumentation come straight out of Latin pop.

Can "The Star-Spangled Banner," and the republic for which it stands, survive? Outrage over what's being called "The Illegal Alien Anthem" is already building in the blogosphere and among conservative commentators.

Timed to debut the week Congress returned to debate immigration reform, with the country riven by the issue, "Nuestro Himno" is intended to be an anthem of solidarity for the movement that has drawn hundreds of thousands of people to march peacefully for immigrant rights in Washington and cities across the country, says Adam Kidron, president of Urban Box Office, the New York-based entertainment company that launched the project.

"It's the one thing everybody has in common, the aspiration to have a relationship with the United States . . . and also to express gratitude and patriotism to the United States for providing the opportunity," says Kidron.

The song was being prepared for e-mailing as MP3 packages to scores of Latino radio stations and other media last night, and Kidron was calling for stations to play the song simultaneously at 7 Eastern time this evening.

However, the same advance buzz that drew singers to scramble for inclusion in the recording sessions this week in New York, Miami, Texas, Mexico, Puerto Rico and the Dominican Republic has also spurred critics who say rendering the song in Spanish is a rejection of assimilation into the United States.

Even some movement supporters are puzzled by the use of Spanish.

"Even our Spanish media are saying, 'Why are we doing this, what are you trying to do?' " said Pedro Biaggi, the morning host with El Zol (99.1 FM), the most popular Hispanic radio station in the Washington area. "It's not for us to be going around singing the national anthem in Spanish. . . . We don't want to impose, we don't own the place. . . . We want to be accepted."

Still, Biaggi says he will play "Nuestro Himno" this morning if the song reaches the station in time. But he will talk about the language issue on the air and solicit listeners' views. He says he accepts the producers' explanation that the purpose is to spread the values of the anthem to a wider audience. He adds he will also play a version of "The Star-Spangled Banner" in English -- as he aired the Whitney Houston version earlier this week, when the controversy was beginning to brew.

In the Spanish version, the translation of the first stanza is relatively faithful to the spirit of the original, though Kidron says the producers wanted to avoid references to bombs and rockets. Instead, there is "fierce combat." The translation of the more obscure second stanza is almost a rewrite, with phrases such as "we are equal, we are brothers."

DOJ_NMG_0027220

An alternate version to be released next month includes a rap in English that never occurred to Francis Scott Key:

Let's not start a war

With all these hard workers

They can't help where they were born

"Nuestro Himno" is as fraught with controversial cultural messages as the psychedelic "Banner" Hendrix delivered at the height of the Vietnam War.

Pressed on what he was trying to say with his Woodstock performance in 1969, Hendrix replied (according to biographer Charles Cross), "We're all Americans. . . . It was like 'Go America!' . . . We play it the way the air is in America today."

Now the national anthem is being remade again according to the way the air is in America, and the people behind "Nuestro Himno" say the message once more is: We're all Americans. It will be the lead track on an album about the immigrant experience called "Somos Americanos," due for release May 16. One dollar from each sale will go to immigrant rights groups, including the National Capital Immigration Coalition, which organized the march on the Mall on April 10.

But critics including columnist Michelle Malkin, who coined "The Illegal Alien Anthem" nickname, say the rendition crosses a line that Hendrix never stepped over with his instrumental version. Transforming the musical idiom of "The Star-Spangled Banner" is one thing, argue the skeptics, but translating the words sends the opposite message: We are not Americans.

"I'm really appalled. . . . We are not a bilingual nation," said George Taplin, director of the Virginia Chapter of the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, part of a national countermovement that emphasizes border control and tougher enforcement, and objects to public funding for day-laborer sites. "When people are talking about becoming a part of this country, they should assimilate to the norm that's already here," Taplin said. "What we're talking about here is a sovereign nation with our ideals and our national identity, and that [anthem] is one of the icons of our nation's identity. I believe it should be in English as it was penned."

Yet, even in English, 61 percent of adults don't know all the words, a recent Harris poll found.

Appealing to such symbols of national identity to plug into their profound potency is how new movements compete for space within that identity. During the rally on the Mall, the immigrants and their supporters also waved thousands of American flags and recited the Pledge of Allegiance. But they didn't translate the pledge into Spanish. They said it in English.

Juan Carlos Ruiz, the general coordinator of the National Capital Immigration Coalition, said there's not a contradiction. The pledge was printed phonetically for Spanish speakers, and many reciting the sounds may not have understood the meaning. Putting the anthem in Spanish is a way to relay the meaning to people who haven't learned English yet, Ruiz said.

"It's part of the process to learn English," not a rejection of English, he said.

While critics sketch a nightmare scenario of a Canada-like land with an anthem sung in two languages, immigrant rights advocates say they agree learning English is essential. Studies of immigrant families suggest the process is inevitable: Eighty-two percent to 90 percent of the children of immigrants prefer English.

"The first step to understanding something is to understand it in the language you understand, and then you can understand it in another language," said Leo Chavez, director of Chicano/Latino Studies at the University of California at Irvine. "What this song represents at this moment is a communal shout, that the dream of America, which is represented by the song, is their dream, too."

Since its origins as the melody to an English drinking song called "To Anacreon in Heaven," circa 1780, "The Star-Spangled Banner" has had a long, strange trip. Key wrote the poem after watching the bombardment of Fort McHenry in 1814. It became the national anthem in 1931.

At least 389 versions have been recorded, according to Allmusic.com, a quick reference used by musicologists to get a sense of what's on the market. Now that Hendrix's "Banner" has mellowed into classic rock, it's hard to imagine that once some considered it disrespectful. The other recordings embrace a vast musical universe: from Duke Ellington to Dolly Parton to Tiny Tim. But musicologists cannot name another foreign-language version.

"America is a pluralistic society, but the anthem is a way that we can express our unity. If that's done in a different language, that doesn't seem to me personally to be a bad thing," said Michael Blakeslee, deputy executive director of the National Association for Music Education, which is leading a National Anthem Project to highlight the song and the school bands that play it in every style, from mariachi to steel drum.

"I assume the intent is one of making a statement about 'we are a part of this nation,' and those are wonderful sentiments and a noble intent," said Dan Sheehy, director of Smithsonian Folkways Recordings.

Benigno "Benny" Layton wonders. He's the leader of Los Hermanos Layton, a band of conjunto- and Tejano-style musicians in Elsa, Tex., 22 miles from Mexico. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, he recorded a traditional conjunto version of "The Star-Spangled Banner." It was instrumental.

DOJ_NMG_0027221

"I'm a second-generation American," Layton said. "I love my country, and I love my [Mexican musical] heritage, and I try to keep it alive. But some things are sacred that you don't do. And translating the national anthem is one of them."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Committee Blames Bush For Slow Response To Katrina (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

Knight Ridder, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - In a scorching account of government failure, a bipartisan Senate committee on Thursday blamed the botched response to Hurricane Katrina on a failure of leadership that stretched from the White House to the mayor's office in New Orleans.

Although the report's call for disbanding the Federal Emergency Management Agency has garnered the most attention, the assessment also scolds President Bush, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and a host of other officials for failing to anticipate the devastation or provide adequate help to victims.

The bipartisan report by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee concluded that Bush "could have done more" to mobilize federal resources. It says the initial White House response "was halting and inadequate."

Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, the panel's top Democrat, was even more critical of the president. Lieberman, a centrist whose bid for re-election next fall is being challenged by a liberal rival in the Democratic primary, asserted his conclusions in a solo chapter at the end of the full report.

"Despite the clear warnings before landfall that Katrina would be catastrophic, the president and the White House staff were not sufficiently engaged and failed to initiate a sufficiently strong and proactive response," Lieberman wrote. "After the hurricane, the White House continued to demonstrate a lack of understanding of the magnitude of the catastrophe."

He also accused the Bush administration of stonewalling the panel's investigation. The Senate committee interviewed 325 witnesses and reviewed more than 838,000 pages of government documents in attempting to determine what went wrong.

"In too many cases, we faced agencies and departments that saw our efforts as a nuisance," Lieberman said. "And the worst offender was the entity that should have stood above the fray and worked hardest with the committee to uncover the government's failings in Katrina: the White House."

The report hints at similar frustrations by noting that the committee "has been unable to conclude" why the president waited five days after landfall to order troops to the stricken region. The hurricane and flooding killed more than 1,500 people and left thousands more homeless in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

White House officials defended their response and Bush's role in overseeing it. Fran Townsend, the president's homeland security adviser, noted that the committee praised Bush's pre-storm warnings and his decision to declare a disaster before the storm hit.

"It was the president and his staff that brought all the resources of the federal government to bear," Townsend told reporters who were traveling with Bush on Thursday to storm-damaged areas in Louisiana and Mississippi. "Can we do better? Absolutely. Will we do better? Absolutely."

Although the committee's findings generally echo other assessments of the Katrina response, Lieberman's report provides new details about what was going on behind the scenes at the White House as officials grappled with one of the most destructive natural disasters in history.

Citing testimony from former FEMA director Michael Brown, Lieberman concluded that Bush didn't realize the impact of the storm until a day and a half after landfall, when Brown told the president that up to 90 percent of New Orleans residents had been forced from their homes.

"My God, you mean it is that bad?" Brown recalled Bush saying.

In a video teleconference Aug. 27, two days before landfall, Brown warned Bush's advisers to prepare for a catastrophe. The aides were with the president at his Texas ranch, but Bush didn't participate in the call.

"I've got to tell you my gut hurts on this one. It hurts. I've got cramps. So we need to take this one very, very seriously," Brown said, according to a transcript of the teleconference.

Lieberman said Deputy White House Chief of Staff Joe Hagin, the top White House official at the session, didn't question Brown about his dire forecast and offered a "perplexingly optimistic" response. Hagin told Brown that "it sounds like the planning, as usual, is in good shape."

The report faults virtually every official who played a major role in the response. Among the complaints:

-Nagin "wasted time in waiting to order a mandatory evacuation."

DOJ_NMG_0027222

-Blanco "submitted an inadequate and erroneous request for assistance to the president and generally failed to ask the federal government for sufficient assistance before the storm."

-Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "failed to effectively lead the federal response" and "should have been more engaged in preparations."

-Brown, who has since resigned, "was insubordinate, unqualified and counterproductive."

The Senate committee concluded that leadership failures after the storm were particularly harmful because officials had failed to prepare for a catastrophic storm despite repeated warnings.

"The results were a tragic loss of life and human suffering on a massive scale," the committee concluded.

White House Aide Rejects Proposal To Scrap FEMA (WT)

By Joseph Curl

Washington Times, April 28, 2006

The White House yesterday rejected calls from Congress to dismantle the Federal Emergency Management Agency, blamed for bureaucratic bungling after Hurricane Katrina ravaged the Gulf Coast last year.

"As we're headed to this hurricane season, now is not really time to really look at moving organizational boxes," Frances F. Townsend, homeland security adviser to President Bush, told reporters aboard Air Force One en route to New Orleans.

A Senate panel yesterday recommended that FEMA be replaced by a new agency that would be better able to respond to major disasters. While Ms. Townsend rejected scrapping the federal emergency agency, she agreed that some restructuring could help.

"Yes, there's a better way to organize it. ... We look forward to working with the committee," she said. "I think we all share the same common goal and that is having a strong, capable FEMA that is better able to serve the American people when they're in greatest need."

The president, making his 11th trip to the Gulf Coast yesterday, said his administration is working to ensure that there is not a repeat of the devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina.

"We pray that there is no hurricane this coming year, but we're working together to make sure the response will be as efficient as possible," Mr. Bush said.

Democrats seized on the Senate panel's report, hoping to position themselves in the November congressional elections.

"This report confirms in stark terms what the people of Louisiana have known for many months," said Sen. Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana. "The handling of Hurricane Katrina by the Department of Homeland Security and FEMA was an organizational nightmare of immense proportions and that tragic administrative bumbling caused untold hardship for the people of Louisiana."

Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, blamed Mr. Bush for the extent of devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina, which left more than 1,500 people dead.

"The White House shares responsibility for the inadequate prelandfall preparations," he said. "The president did not leave his Texas ranch to return to Washington until two days after landfall, and only then convened his Cabinet as well as a White House task force to oversee federal response efforts."

But the president said he has learned from Hurricane Katrina and the federal government is ready for the coming hurricane season.

"One of the things that we're working on is to make sure that we've learned the lessons from Katrina -- we've learned lessons at the federal level and state level and the local level. And we're now working closely together in preparation of the upcoming hurricane season," Mr. Bush said.

"All of us in positions of responsibility appreciate those who are working to help us understand how to do our jobs better. And we pray there is no hurricane this coming year, but we are working together to make sure that if there is one the response will be as efficient as possible," he said.

Congress, White House Divided Over Rebuilding FEMA (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

Washington Post, April 28, 2006

The Federal Emergency Management Agency and Department of Homeland Security are not adequately prepared for the hurricane season that begins in 34 days, the White House and Senate leaders said yesterday as a critical Senate investigation into the response to Hurricane Katrina sparked a sharp congressional debate over whether to abolish and rebuild FEMA.

DOJ_NMG_0027223

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said FEMA "has become a symbol of a bumbling bureaucracy" that must be dismantled, and merely "tweaking the organizational chart" will not solve failures exposed by the hurricane.

"Are we prepared enough? We're not, and we're still operating with a flawed system" heading into the June 1 start of the storm season, Collins said.

She and ranking member Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) released 86 recommendations from the panel's forthcoming report, "Hurricane Katrina: A Nation Still Unprepared."

The eight-month, bipartisan investigation's central finding is that FEMA should be replaced by a new National Preparedness and Response Authority. Its head would report to the secretary of Homeland Security but serve as the president's top adviser for national emergency matters, akin to the military role played by the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The new agency would recombine disaster preparedness and response activities, reclaim power over billions of dollars of state and local grants, gain responsibility for securing critical infrastructure, and restore an emphasis on natural, as well as terrorist, threats. Those functions and approaches were dispersed or downgraded by the Bush administration as FEMA was merged into DHS.

The White House yesterday rejected the Senate committee plan but said that storm preparations are not yet complete.

"As we're headed into this hurricane season, now is not the time to really look at moving organizational boxes," said Frances Fragos Townsend, homeland security adviser to President Bush, who accompanied him to the Gulf Coast to see recovery operations. "We are far better prepared today than we were this time last year, and we'll be even better prepared by June 1."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, speaking at George Mason University, endorsed several Senate findings, but opposed making FEMA an independent agency and said renaming it would be like "slapping a fresh coat of paint on."

"I'm held accountable. I want to make sure as a consequence that I have full command and control over my department," he said.

Several members of Congress and outside experts praised the report, however, or said it did not go far enough. Wherever FEMA goes, they said, it is critical to strengthen its leadership, budget, regional commands, ties to states and cities, and core functions. Any reorganization would be FEMA's third in four years.

House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter T. King (R-N.Y.), ranking member Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) and others introduced a bill yesterday that would alter FEMA but not dismantle it.

But Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.), a member of Collins's committee, said FEMA should be restored to independent Cabinet-level status. House panels are preparing related bills as the House plans a week of action on Katrina issues May 22.

The timing is driven by hurricane season and this fall's elections, as Congress races to act with or without the White House.

"Leadership is aware this is all coming to a head. They'd prefer to be on the same sheet of music as DHS, of course," said a House Republican official who requested anonymity because he is not allowed to speak for members. "But they're also aware that if legislation to take FEMA out [of DHS] was sent to the floor tomorrow, it would get 400 votes."

"I don't believe re-creating a broken wheel within DHS moves us closer to realizing" Katrina's lessons, Rep. William Shuster (R-Pa.) said.

David Heyman, director of the homeland security program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, called the report one of the most comprehensive reviews of national preparedness since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. "If we implement just half of the recommendations from the report, we will be twice as prepared as we are today," he said.

Divisions Arise On Whether FEMA Requires A Tear-Down (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Congress and the White House are headed toward a collision over one of the big questions left unresolved in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina — whether to beef up the nation's key disaster response agency within the Department of Homeland Security or to create a politically independent agency to handle national emergencies.

Just weeks before the 2006 hurricane season officially begins June 1, a Senate committee on Thursday called for the Federal Emergency Management Agency to be dismantled and reconstituted as a new, stronger agency within Homeland Security.

Many House members, meanwhile, are pushing to restore FEMA to its pre-2003 status as an independent agency, this time with Cabinet rank and additional funding muscle.

And as President Bush made his 11th visit to the Gulf Coast since the storm hit Aug. 29, the White House urged a strengthening — but no reshuffling — of current operations.

"Now is not the time to really look at moving organizational boxes," said Frances F. Townsend, the president's domestic security advisor, who traveled with Bush to Louisiana and Mississippi on Thursday.

The disagreement is a direct echo of the debate that erupted after the Sept. 11 attacks, when the White House initially resisted congressional efforts to reorganize all domestic security and disaster preparedness agencies under one roof. The White House eventually agreed to the creation of the Department of Homeland Security, which united 22 separate programs, employing more than 170,000 people, in March 2003.

This time, the debate takes place in an election year, when politicians facing the voters are under pressure not just to write reports about what went wrong but to take action to fix the problems. Adding to the unpredictability is the deep divide within both political parties over the best course of action.

There is one significant point of agreement: FEMA botched the federal response to Katrina, which killed more than 1,300 people along the Gulf Coast and left hundreds of thousands homeless. So far, the federal tab for relief and reconstruction costs has reached $100 billion.

"FEMA is discredited, demoralized and dysfunctional," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), whose Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee issued its recommendations Thursday. "It is beyond repair. Just tweaking the organizational chart will not solve the problem."

Collins, the panel's chairwoman, and its ranking Democrat, Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, are proposing that FEMA's functions be absorbed into a new agency, the National Preparedness and Response Authority, which would remain under the secretary of Homeland Security but have broad jurisdiction and direct access to the president during crises.

"This will be a dramatically different agency from FEMA," Colins said.

But Collins and Lieberman, who plan to start drafting legislation next week, face an uphill battle in the Senate, where Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) shares the White House view that this no time for a reorganization.

"We're very leery, headed into hurricane season, of rewriting the entire FEMA operation," said a Frist spokesman who asked not to be identified when discussing party issues. "As the storms come ashore, FEMA personnel would be diverting time to testify on a rewrite."

Many in the House, including Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.), chairman of the House Select Committee on Katrina that issued its report in February, favor making FEMA a separate agency, with Cabinet rank.

"Re-branding FEMA doesn't fix the problem, it just puts a new acronym on it," said David Marin, the select committee's director and a Davis spokesman.

Defenders of the Senate proposal say it is being mischaracterized. The new agency's "leaders would have to have emergency management experience, which would put an end to the Bush administration's penchant for rewarding political types with important security jobs," said a Senate staffer who asked not to be identified when discussing the issue.

And a bipartisan group of congressmen — including Peter King (R-N.Y.) and Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), the chairman and the top Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee, respectively — on Thursday endorsed legislation, along the lines of the Senate recommendation, to keep an enhanced FEMA within Homeland Security to ensure that it has all the resources of the larger department, such the Coast Guard and the operations center.

"FEMA must be equipped with the proper resources, communications and leadership to handle a worst-case scenario," King said.

But many House Republicans are divided on the issue. The House is planning to devote the last week in May to Katrina-related issues — and Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) is inclined to support the White House approach of strengthening FEMA without changing its operational status within Homeland Security, said one House aide who requested anonymity when discussing the leadership's strategy.

But Hastert also knows, said the aide, that members on the House side "are very sensitive to the need to be seen as doing something — not just putting out reports" and that the proposal to restore FEMA as a separate agency is vastly popular. "If it came to the floor today it would get 400 votes," the aide said.

In the Senate, many Democrats — including Frank R. Lautenberg of New Jersey and Daniel K. Akaka of Hawaii, who were on the panel that issued the report Thursday — also want FEMA to stand alone, disagreeing with the Collins-Lieberman approach of taking it apart and putting it back together within Homeland Security.

"Unless FEMA has a direct line to the president, the people of Hawaii and the nation are at risk," Akaka said in a statement. "FEMA must be restored as an independent agency."

And in the White House, Bush is still trying to recapture his credibility, which crumbled during the disaster. Lieberman singled out the president for being "surprisingly detached" until two days after Katrina hit, when the White House began to marshal the full resources of the federal government.

"President Bush won our admiration and gratitude for the way he took charge in responding to the attacks against America of Sept. 11," said Lieberman. "In the case of Hurricane Katrina, he failed to provide that same presidential leadership when it was needed, and America suffered."

During his visit to the Gulf Coast on Thursday, Bush put on gloves and a carpenter's apron in New Orleans' devastated 9th Ward and grabbed a hammer to pound a few nails for a Habitat for Humanity project to build 280 housing units.

"What we need to do is take recommendations and make sure, as hurricane season approaches, that FEMA and all branches are ready to respond," he told Brian Williams of "NBC Nightly News." "I know my job is to work with relevant agencies and get them ready."

The Senate committee plans to issue its full 800-page report, "Hurricane Katrina: A Nation Still Unprepared," on Tuesday.

Delayed Katrina Response "was A Failure By Leaders" (FT)

By Edward Alden

Financial Times, April 28, 2006

The poor response to Hurricane Katrina was "a failure of leadership at all levels of government" that requires an overhaul of the country's disaster response capabilities, the Senate committee investigating the disaster said on Thursday.

The Senate homeland security committee, whose leaders were instrumental in the creation of the Department of Homeland Security following the September 11 terrorist attacks, called for the dismantling of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the disaster response agency created in 1979, which was folded into the new DHS in 2003.

"FEMA is discredited, demoralised and dysfunctional," said Susan Collins, the Maine Republican who led the investigation. "It is beyond repair."

Katrina, which struck New Orleans and the Mississippi gulf coast last August, was the most destructive natural disaster in US history, leaving 1,500 people dead and stranding tens of thousands. The belated federal response undermined President George W. Bush's reputation as a strong leader in a crisis, starting a slide in his popularity.

The committee's report could trigger another effort to overhaul the homeland security department, which has been struggling to integrate 22 different agencies and 185,000 employees. The committee acknowledged that the department, created largely owing to pressure from the Senate after similar recriminations following the terrorist attacks, had failed in its first real test.

The report found fault in the response by local, state and federal governments, and said the country should have been far better prepared for the disaster.

But the committee laid particular blame on Michael Brown, the former FEMA director who has said he was a made a scapegoat for the government's inadequacies. Mr Bush's praise of Mr Brown in the days after the hurricane – the president told him "you're doing a heck of a job, Brownie" during a trip to the region – became a symbol of cronyism over competence that has dogged Mr Bush since.

Ms Collins accused Mr Brown of "blatant insubordination" during the crisis, and the committee's report said he was "unqualified and counterproductive".

"It was clear that he was disengaged from the onset of Katrina. He failed to communicate absolutely vital information about the condition of the levees in New Orleans," she said.

The report calls for a new National Preparedness and Response Authority that would be a new independent agency within the DHS. Its head would directly advise the president on emergency management, much like the chairman of the joint chiefs of staff directly advises the president on military issues.

The White House response to the report was muted. "As we're headed to this hurricane season, now is not really the time to really look at moving organisational boxes," said Fran Townsend, homeland security adviser to Mr Bush.

The report is only mildly critical of Mr Bush. It says that while his initial response was "halting and inadequate, in part due to poor situational awareness", ultimately he "brought the full resources of the federal government to bear".

Fixing FEMA (USAT)

By James Lee Witt

USA Today (editorial), April 28, 2006

USA TODAY's editorial "New hurricane season looms, with FEMA still in shambles" effectively shined a light on the problems we still face as a nation with the continuing upset at the Federal Emergency Management Agency (April 17).

Even with the release of the Senate's report on Hurricane Katrina, the American public is not being well served by its government with the recommendations. It is time for Congress and the administration to do what is right and pull FEMA out of the Department of Homeland Security — as Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., and other lawmakers suggest. FEMA and DHS should each stand alone. One agency can't effectively serve two disparate functions.

Though it's true that both agencies respond to catastrophes in a similar manner, their approaches are intrinsically different, especially before a natural or man-made disaster.

FEMA's job is to provide leadership and support to reduce the loss of life and property through a comprehensive, risk-based, all-hazards program of mitigation, preparedness, response and recovery. In the 1990s, FEMA was an effective, highly respected, stand-alone agency with its director serving on the presidential Cabinet.

DHS' job includes dealing with national security, border patrol, interior enforcement and intelligence sharing. These aspects absorb the majority of DHS' focus — and funding. In years to come, do we want the department to be diverted from its mission of protecting the nation from terrorism from June 1 to Nov. 30, when we are in the middle of hurricane season?

While the Senate recommendations do acknowledge that FEMA must be mended, we don't have the luxury of trying another experimental restructuring of the department. We arrived at this crisis as a result of FEMA losing its position as an independent agency. The first key to fixing FEMA is for Congress to return it to its pre-2001 incarnation. When a successful structure once existed, it makes sense to return to the system that worked.

Let's give FEMA Director David Paulison an independent agency, a system and the support he needs to be a success. And let's give our citizens the confidence that they're being well served.

The Crony Fairy (NYT)

By Paul Krugman
New York Times, April 28, 2006

The U.S. government is being stalked by an invisible bandit, the Crony Fairy, who visits key agencies by dead of night, snatches away qualified people and replaces them with unqualified political appointees. There's no way to catch or stop the Crony Fairy, so our only hope is to change the agencies' names. That way she might get confused, and leave our government able to function.

That, at least, is how I interpret the report on responses to Hurricane Katrina that was just released by the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs.

The report points out that the Federal Emergency Management Agency "had been operating at a more than 15 percent staff-vacancy rate for over a year before Katrina struck" — that means many of the people who knew what they were doing had left. And it adds that "FEMA's senior political appointees ... had little or no prior relevant emergency-management experience."

But the report says nothing about what caused the qualified people to leave and who appointed unqualified people to take their place. There's no hint that, say, President Bush might have had any role. So those political appointees must have been installed by the Crony Fairy.

Rather than trying to fix FEMA, the report calls for replacing it with a new organization, the National Preparedness and Response Agency. As far as I can tell, the new agency would have exactly the same responsibilities as FEMA. But "senior N.P.R.A. officials would be selected from the ranks of professionals with experience in crisis management." I guess it's impossible to select qualified people to run FEMA; if you try, the Crony Fairy will spirit them away and replace them with Michael Brown. But she might not know her way to N.P.R.A.

O.K., enough sarcasm. Let's talk about the history of FEMA.

In the early 1990's, FEMA's reputation was as bad as it is today. It was a dumping ground for political cronies, headed by a man whose only apparent qualification for the job was that he was a close friend of the first President Bush's chief of staff. FEMA's response to Hurricane Andrew in 1992 perfectly foreshadowed Katrina: the agency took three days to arrive on the scene, and when it did, it proved utterly incompetent.

Many people thought that FEMA was a lost cause. But Bill Clinton proved them wrong. He appointed qualified people to lead the agency and gave them leeway to hire other qualified people, and within a year FEMA's morale and performance had soared. For the rest of the Clinton years, FEMA was among the most highly regarded agencies in the federal government.

What happened to that reputation? The answer, of course, is that the second President Bush returned to his father's practices. Once again, FEMA became a dumping ground for cronies, and many of the good people who had come in during the Clinton years left. It took only a few years to transform one of the best agencies in the U.S. government into what Senator Susan Collins calls "a shambles and beyond repair."

In other words, the Crony Fairy is named George W. Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0027227

So what's the point of creating a new agency to replace FEMA? The history of FEMA and other agencies during the Clinton years shows that a president who is serious about governing can rebuild effective government without renaming the boxes on the organizational chart.

On the other hand, the history of the Bush administration, from the botched reconstruction of Iraq to the botched start-up of the prescription drug program, shows that a president who isn't serious about governing, who prizes loyalty and personal connections over competence, can quickly reduce the government of the world's most powerful nation to third-world levels of ineffectiveness.

And bear in mind that Mr. Bush's pattern of cronyism didn't change after Katrina. For example, he appointed Julie Myers, the inexperienced niece of Gen. Richard Myers, to head Immigration and Customs Enforcement — an agency that, like FEMA, is supposed to protect us against terrorism as well as other threats. Even at the C.I.A., the administration seems more interested in purging Democrats than in improving the quality of intelligence.

So let's skip the name change for FEMA, O.K.? The United States will regain effective government if and when it gets a president who cares more about serving the nation than about rewarding his friends and scoring political points. That's at least a thousand days away. Meanwhile, don't count on FEMA, or on any other government agency, to do its job.

Bush Set To Approve Takeover Of 9 Military Plants By Dubai (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 27 — President Bush is expected on Friday to announce his approval of a deal under which a Dubai-owned company would take control of nine plants in the United States that manufacture parts for American military vehicles and aircraft, say two administration officials familiar with the terms of the deal.

The officials, who were granted anonymity so they could speak freely about something the president had not yet announced, said that the final details had not yet been set and that Mr. Bush might put conditions on the transaction to keep military technology in the United States.

But his action is almost certain to attract scrutiny in Congress, because of the political furor that erupted over the administration's approval of a deal earlier this spring that would have given another Dubai-owned company, Dubai Ports World, leases to operate several American port terminals through its acquisition of a British company, the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company.

Dubai Ports agreed to drop the port deal after it became clear that Republicans were abandoning Mr. Bush and opposing the takeover.

In this case, the plants in question are owned by Doncasters Group Ltd., a British company that is being purchased for $1.2 billion from the Royal Bank of Scotland Group by Dubai International Capital, which is owned by the United Arab Emirate government.

Because the plants make turbine blades for tanks and aircraft, the deal was reviewed by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, which sent it on to Mr. Bush himself for a decision, a step used only when the potential security risks or political considerations are particularly acute.

Administration officials alerted Congress that the deal would go through the committee's review process in an effort to head off the kind of public debate that surrounded the ports deal.

Opponents of the ports transactions argued that the terrorists involved in the Sept. 11 attacks had filtered money through the United Arab Emirates, where Dubai is the major shipping center. Mr. Bush argued that blocking the deal would have sent the wrong message to a friendly Arab state. His support, however, was not enough to quell the political furor.

One official who was briefed on the Doncasters transaction said there would be provisions in the agreement protecting American military secrets. But it was unclear whether that would satisfy Congressional objections. With nine Doncasters plants in Georgia and Connecticut making parts for American military contractors, the prospect of a takeover by the Dubai company has already caused nervousness among some lawmakers.

Representative John Barrow, Democrat of Georgia, likened the Doncasters deal to "outsourcing" part of the nation's industrial-military complex.

But Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York, the chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security and one of the foremost critics of the ports deal, said on Thursday that he would not necessarily have a problem this time around, in large part because the White House had given the deal a thorough review.

"It's a significant improvement over what happened before," Mr. King said. "It's been much more thorough, much more detailed."

A senior Republican Congressional aide who was granted anonymity because he was not authorized to talk about the matter, said he did not believe the president's approval of the deal would cause quite the same stir as the ports deal.

GOP Urges $100 Rebate To Ease Pain At The Pump (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

Republican leaders yesterday proposed giving drivers a $100 tax rebate in the face of record-high gas prices, one element of a broad plan that includes oil exploration in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Republicans promised swift tax relief and tax incentives to promote the use of hybrid cars at a press conference held hours after Exxon Mobil posted profit figures of $8.4 billion for the first quarter of 2006 -- a record for any company in the first three months of the year and a 7 percent increase over last year's first-quarter profits, which also were a record.

"We are going to be able to say to the hard-hit users of automobiles in our country that we are going to ease their burden ... by giving them $100 rebate to help offset the very steep gas prices," said Sen. Pete V. Domenici, New Mexico Republican and chairman of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee.

Meanwhile yesterday, President Bush called for Congress to give him the power to require tighter fuel-efficiency standards for passenger cars, a call echoed by Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta.

"I encourage them to give me that authority," Mr. Bush said in a trip to Mississippi. "It's authority that I use for light trucks. And I intend to use it wisely if Congress would give me that authority."

In a letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Mr. Mineta formally asked for legislation that would allow the Corporate Average Fuel Economy standard for cars, now set at 27.5 miles per gallon for each manufacturer, to be raised through an administrative process.

Democrats, who mostly oppose drilling in the Arctic, quickly dismissed the Republican congressional package as the "same old, same old," and said pump prices topping $3 per gallon will be the last straw and cost Republicans their congressional majority.

The Republicans were responding to mounting political pressure from voters who are spending an average of $44 each time they fill a 15-gallon tank.

"What the American consumer is saying is: 'filling up your gas tank shouldn't empty your wallet,' " said Sen. John Thune, South Dakota Republican.

The national average price of a gallon of gas was $2.93 yesterday and hit as high as $3.16 in Manhattan, according to AAA.

"High gas prices are going to be the final nail in the GOP coffin this election year," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, who heads the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

"Every time drivers fill their cars up, they get a stark reminder how this Republican Congress takes a 'see no evil, hear no evil' approach to the oil industry as gas prices set new records," Mr. Schumer said. "It's time for the American consumer to have a Congress that works hand in hand with them and not with the oil executives."

Much of yesterday was consumed with dueling press conferences at which each party blamed the other for pump prices.

Republicans said Democrats have long obstructed an obvious solution -- exploring for oil in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR) in Alaska.

"I cannot understand what coherent political philosophy cuts its own country off from oil," said Sen. Jim Talent, Missouri Republican. "It is time to open up the Arctic."

Sen. Lisa Murkowski, Alaska Republican, said exploring ANWR is the country's best opportunity for a long-term source of oil.

"There is nothing unpredictable about a supply of oil on the north coastal plain that could potentially supply a million barrels of oil per day for 30 years," she said.

Last year, ANWR exploration was stripped from a defense spending bill because of a lack of support. President Clinton vetoed ANWR in his first term, and most Democrats have long opposed it.

Mr. Schumer said that if Democrats win back Congress, they will cut the country's dependence on foreign oil in half by 2020 and start a "massive" project to develop alternative energy sources.

He also criticized the energy bill passed last year as "helping big oil" and noted that gas prices were $2.22 per gallon when it was signed in June.

"That energy bill was corporate welfare in its worst example," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0027229

Mr. Emanuel said the energy industry spent $86 million to lobby for the energy bill, which included $14.5 billion in subsidies for oil companies.

The Democrats also dismissed the ANWR element of the Republican plan, saying the majority party was "playing politics."

"They've offered you status quo policies that do not change the course of how we achieve energy independence," Mr. Emanuel said.

Other notable elements in the eight-point Republican plan are the inclusion of nearly $3 billion to research biofuels and ways to make better-performing hybrid cars, an idea first suggested by Mr. Bush. The plan also would give administration officials the authority to prosecute price gougers.

Mr. Frist said he wants the whole plan attached to the supplemental spending bill for a quick vote.

Republicans Promise To Ease Petrol Price Burden (FT)

By Holly Yeager And Edward Alden

Financial Times, April 28, 2006

Republican leaders in Congress on Thursday sought to respond to growing national anger over the rising price of petrol, promising a series of measures they hope will bring down prices and prevent the situation from causing further political damage.

"Americans are unfairly being asked to empty their wallets at the gas pump," said Bill Frist, majority leader in the Senate, who on Thursday led a group of Republicans in offering a package of eight proposals, including a $100 (€80.46, £56) "gas tax holiday rebate cheque", intended to ease the burden higher fuel costs have imposed on consumers.

Mr Frist acknowledged that the measures would have a limited impact, but with the Republicans trailing badly in the polls, Congress and the White House are under pressure to respond.

Democrats, who have been campaigning on the price issue in congressional races that are starting to heat up in advance of the November mid-term elections, immediately denounced the plan as a sop to "Big Oil", saying it would do nothing to conserve energy or limit the record profits being earned by the oil companies.

Both parties have scrambled to offer legislative fixes to the high prices, but those backed by Mr Frist, and another set backed by Republican leaders in the House of Representatives, are the most likely to move forward.

Mr Frist's package would repeal some tax incentives for oil companies, while expanding others to promote the use of hybrid vehicles and increase refinery capacity. It would also urge the Bush administration to suspend deposits into the Strategic Petroleum Reserve for six months, to increase the supply available to consumers. President George W. Bush said this week he would temporarily halt the deposits.

House and Senate leaders both returned to a long-running debate over the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR), arguing that opening the area to oil exploration was critical to reducing US dependence on foreign oil.

"We haven't done what we need to do in this country to increase our supply," said Lisa Murkowski, Republican senator from Alaska.

Democrats – and some moderate Republicans – have traditionally opposed the proposal on environmental grounds, and were able to block it again last year. But in the current climate, there are signs that both parties may be ready to think about energy demands in new ways.

Pete Domenici, chairman of the Senate energy committee, said he would support a proposal from Democrats to suspend the 18.4-cents-a-gallon federal tax on gasoline for 60 days, if Democrats supported the move to open ANWR. The fees collected from oil companies who explore there could be used to offset the loss in tax revenues, he said.

Bush To Seek Overhaul Of Cars' Fuel-Economy Levels (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka, Russell Gold And Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

Responding to public anger over gasoline prices, the White House and Senate Republican leaders backed new measures to shift the burden to car makers and oil companies.

Both President Bush and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist yesterday urged Congress to pave the way for higher passenger-car fuel-economy standards. White House spokesman Scott McClellan said a rise would "save jobs, save lives and save fuel." Mr. Bush said during a visit to a Mississippi gasoline station that he would ask Congress for clearer authority to raise the levels, and Mr. Frist, as part of a new energy bill, offered to give it. Detroit has long resisted higher economy standards -- but the administration said it would support higher levels only if it could restructure the overall program, which could wind up helping domestic auto makers.

The Senate energy bill also proposes a tax-accounting change that oil companies said could cost them billions of dollars and curb tax incentives for oil exploration granted just last year. Some of that revenue would be turned over to consumers in the form of a $100 tax rebate, to be mailed by Aug. 30, on this year's federal income taxes.

The industry-bashing in recent days from normally pro-business, antiregulation Republicans in response to surging pump prices has been striking. But the Senate bill also includes some carrots for energy producers, including new tax incentives for increasing oil-refining capacity. And the plan would open up a supposedly oil-rich area along the coast of Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge for oil exploration, although similar attempts in the past have proved controversial and have been stripped out of bills.

"I think this is a bold bill that does everything possible to increase our supply and ease the burden on consumers," said Sen. Pete Domenici, (R., N.M.), chairman of the Senate Energy Committee.

Even if the bill passes the Senate, it's unclear how far it would get in the more conservative House.

The Senate bill reflects the intensifying election-year posturing against oil companies in many ways. It proposes a federal law that, for the first time, would define "price gouging," and allows the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department to prosecute companies and dealers found to have manipulated prices beyond market limits. The provision, modeled after state antigouging laws, would first require the president to issue an emergency proclamation claiming that "an abnormal market disruption" had occurred in a given area before federal cases could be brought.

One particularly contentious measure in the package would require companies to move away from so-called last-in, first-out accounting practices. The move, set for future tax years, would require oil companies, for example, to account for profits by assuming the oldest barrel in their inventory is the first one sold. It could expose billions of dollars more to federal taxes in times when prices are rapidly rising, as they have been in recent weeks.

"This would be extremely punitive," said Robert Slaughter, president of the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association. "It would have the same impact as a windfall-profits tax."

While the proposed accounting change is part of an energy bill and the rhetoric is focused on oil companies, it would, as proposed, affect all industries and sparked an outcry from other sectors, including retailers.

Since 1990, fuel-efficiency standards for passenger cars have been stuck at a fleet average of 27.5 miles per gallon, as auto makers have opposed any increases -- under the current formulas. But the administration yesterday said it would oppose simply increasing the Corporate Average Fuel Economy, or CAFE, standards that passenger cars must achieve. Rather, the administration wants to overhaul the program in its entirety, much as it did this year for light trucks.

"The administration would oppose any increase in passenger-car CAFE standards without corresponding reform," Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta said in a letter yesterday to Sen. Frist. "It is imperative that CAFE standards be set through an administrative process based on sound science and data."

GOP Offers Consumer Fuel-Relief Package (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

It includes a $100 rebate, but its Arctic drilling component will probably doom it. Democrats' proposals are expected to fare no better.

WASHINGTON — Fearing public ire over rising gasoline prices, Republicans on Thursday unveiled a series of proposals aimed at giving consumers some relief, including a $100 rebate.

Democrats derided the GOP plan, and its political chances appeared weak.

The Democrats said that although the package incorporated some ideas they already had introduced, it contained a provision that almost assuredly would torpedo its passage: opening the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas drilling, a measure that repeatedly has stalled in Congress.

"Joining a rebate for consumers with [the drilling proposal] is not, I believe, a sincere effort," said Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.).

Emotion over fuel costs ran high on Capitol Hill, illustrated by a five-hour filibuster staged by Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.). He refused to leave the Senate floor in an effort — ultimately unsuccessful — to press for a vote on forcing oil companies to pay more to the government for the right to drill for oil on public land. Some of that drilling is exempt from payments.

"Government subsidies may be needed when the price is low, when we have to simulate production," Wyden said. But such relief is uncalled for "at a time when prices are soaring to record-high levels."

By the end of the day, the two parties essentially played to a draw — neither the rebate idea nor Democratic proposals, which include a moratorium on federal gasoline taxes, appeared to have much chance of becoming law.

DOJ_NMG_0027231

But the theatrics made clear that each party wanted to demonstrate its sensitivity to rising prices — and wanted to direct public anger toward the opposing camp.

At an outdoor news conference with the Capitol dome as a backdrop, Republicans blamed the price surge on Democrats, who they said had blocked measures to increase oil production, such as drilling in the Arctic.

"Those who stand up and criticize … and suggest that somehow or another that the blame [for gasoline costs] is upon those of us who had been pushing for increased supply of energy in this country, I think they need to look in the mirror," said Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), chairman of a GOP task force that drew up the party's proposals. "Democrats are the ones who have simply blocked every attempt for us to build transmission networks — whether it's electric transmission networks, or whether it's oil and gas networks, or whether it's energy generating, or whether it's oil and gas production."

Democrats blamed the high prices on Republicans, who they accused of being too cozy with large oil companies and too eager to pass out tax breaks to them. They dismissed the rebate as a meaningless gesture, arguing it would wind up in oil company coffers because consumers would use it to buy gasoline.

"It is disappointing that neither skyrocketing gas prices nor obscene oil company profits can break the bond between Bush Republicans and Big Oil," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

The back-and-forth in Washington came as the world's largest publicly traded oil company, Exxon Mobil, reported first-quarter profits of $8.4 billion, up 7% from the first three months of 2005.

The increase fell short of Wall Street expectations. But the report accelerated the criticism of oil companies from politicians.

"Quarter after quarter, oil companies post unheard-of profits at the expense of farms, businesses and family budgets," said Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.).

"We need to figure out what's behind these prices and work together to put stronger consumer protections on the books."

The high gasoline prices — above $3 a gallon in some regions of the country — result from a confluence of forces that have constricted supply. Experts say few measures under discussion on Capitol Hill would have much effect.

"Unfortunately, there's nothing, really, that can be done that's going to affect energy prices or gasoline prices in the very short run," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke told lawmakers at a hearing Thursday.

But with elections coming in November, lawmakers appeared undeterred.

"There is no silver bullet," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). "There is nothing, nothing we can do that can compensate for the fact that today we're 60% dependent on foreign sources of oil. But we can put forth a bold agenda."

Under the Republican plan, a $100 rebate would be sent to taxpayers making less than $125,000 a year.

Stabenow has proposed a $500 rebate, which she said would cover the average cost of higher gas prices for most families.

The GOP package also called for:

• A summer suspension of the 18.4-cent-per-gallon federal retail gasoline tax, to be paid for by ending some oil industry tax breaks. Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) previously proposed a 60-day gas-tax holiday.

• New authority for the Federal Trade Commission to investigate possible price gouging. Democrats accused Republicans of undermining their own proposal, however, by limiting the measure to retail pricing and excluding wholesale distributors from scrutiny.

• Increased incentives for the development and purchase of hybrid vehicles.

• New authority for the Department of Transportation to increase fuel efficiency standards for automobiles.

Many Republicans, including President Bush, previously had opposed raising those fuel efficiency requirements, known as CAFE standards. But on Thursday, Bush endorsed the idea.

At a gas station in Biloxi, Miss., Bush said he would "use it wisely if Congress would give me that authority."

Bush earlier this week announced steps that underscored his concern about gasoline prices, including a suspension of government oil purchases to refill the Strategic Petroleum Reserve. But, as with the various congressional proposals, experts said the White House moves would have little impact on the rising fuel costs.

During his mini-filibuster, Wyden said existing royalty-payment breaks for oil companies had cost the federal government at least $20 billion in lost revenue.

"Oil companies are supposed to pay royalties to the federal government when they extract oil from federal lands. But in order to stimulate production of oil in our country, the federal government, over the last decade, has been discounting these royalty fees," Wyden said. "So, on top of the oil companies' record profits, record tax breaks and record prices consumers are paying at the pump, there are now record amounts of royalty relief granted to the oil companies as well."

Wyden's position earned quick support from at least one Republican, Sen. Jon Kyl of Arizona. He offered to cosponsor Wyden's measure, which would suspend the subsidies whenever the price of oil topped $55 a barrel.

DOJ_NMG_0027232

Still, votes on this and other proposals could be stymied by Senate rules. They have been offered as amendments to an emergency spending bill for the military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and for post-Hurricane Katrina relief efforts. Parliamentary procedures for the legislation may block action on the energy-related measures.

G.O.P. Senators Hurry To Quell Furor Over Gas (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 27 — Senate Republicans tried on Thursday to get the upper hand in the escalating political battle over high gasoline prices by proposing a $100 rebate for taxpayers and by suggesting that they might increase taxes on oil-industry profits.

The Republican proposal also called for opening the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil production, a provision sure to draw opposition from many Democrats and even some Republicans.

"The American consumer is the one that needs the break today, and we need to be taking steps to make sure that they aren't emptying their wallet every time they fill their tank," said Senator John Thune, Republican of South Dakota, as the leadership unveiled its legislative response to an issue quickly taking over the Congressional agenda.

The Republican plan includes a provision that could levy a significant tax on oil company profits, a provision that President Bush promised to veto when a version appeared in a Senate bill last year. The proposal came on a day when Exxon Mobil reported a 7 percent gain in its first-quarter earnings. [Page C3.]

Greeting surprised customers at a BP service station in Biloxi, Miss., on Thursday, Mr. Bush compared rising gasoline prices to a new tax. In brief remarks there, confronting an issue that is adding to his political woes, he endorsed one aspect of the Senate proposal by encouraging Congress to give him the same authority to set standards for gasoline mileage of cars as he has over light trucks, sport utility vehicles, pickups and minivans.

The president also promised to curb price gouging, increase refinery capacity and support alternative fuels.

"One of the things we've got to do is make these trucks run on ethanol and batteries that won't require gasoline," he said. "That's what the future is going to be."

Democrats quickly dismissed the new Republican approach as a backdoor effort to overcome deep-seated opposition to drilling in the Arctic refuge.

"Americans are struggling to pay the rising cost of gas," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, "and they are not interested in handouts to help oil companies make more money by letting them drill in wildlife refuges."

Democrats pressed their own ideas, including a proposal by Senator Robert Menendez, Democrat of New Jersey, for a 60-day suspension on the 18.4-cent-per-gallon federal tax on gasoline and 24-cent diesel tax.

"It is direct relief at the pump," Mr. Menendez said.

Some Republicans, including Mr. Thune, have also endorsed a suspension of those taxes.

Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon, tied up the Senate for almost five hours on Thursday in an effort to force a vote on his proposal to prohibit oil companies from escaping federal royalties for drilling on public lands when oil prices exceeded $55 per barrel. (Prices recently rose above $75 a barrel.) But Republicans blocked that effort.

"You cannot get a vote up or down in the United States Senate on a rip-off of taxpayer money," Mr. Wyden said.

The exchanges in the Senate and elsewhere on Capitol Hill illustrated both the political dangers and potential opportunities presented by the rise in gasoline prices and the accompanying consumer discomfort.

"This gas price issue is huge," said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine.

Democrats say they believe that the public unhappiness will play into their efforts to regain control of the House and Senate this fall as they try to convince voters of the close ties between Republicans and oil companies and remind voters of industry-friendly legislation advocated by Republicans.

"High gas prices are going to be the final nail in the G.O.P.'s coffin this election year," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

But Republicans say they believe that their new proposal, which is promoted as an eight-point plan and which was announced at a news conference attended by several senators facing re-election this year, could strike a public chord, particularly with its promise of a $100 check to millions of taxpayers.

It is unclear when the Senate might move forward on the issue or how the Bush administration and the House, where Republicans and Democrats have their own ideas circulating, will respond.

But a chief aide to Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, said the midterm elections would be a catalyst for Congressional action.

DOJ_NMG_0027233

"The political will is there," said Eric Ueland, chief of staff to Mr. Frist. "The need is very real. And the urge to help constituents directly and quickly is omnipresent."

The price tag for the Republican package had not been calculated, but aides said it would cost less than $20 billion. The proposed rebate was patterned after a refund sent to taxpayers early in Mr. Bush's first term as a down payment on an initial set of tax cuts.

The $100 payment would not be tied to gasoline consumption but would be sent to taxpayers at the end of the summer, going to single-filing taxpayers with adjusted gross incomes below $145,950, and to couples earning less than $218,950. The Finance Committee estimated that at least 100 million taxpayers would qualify.

Republican authors of the plan said opening the Arctic refuge to drilling was essential because it could provide federal revenue to pay for the initiative as well as increase domestic oil production.

"We need to open up the reserve of oil and gas that we have in this country," said Senator Jim Talent of Missouri, one of the Republicans up for re-election. "With all due respect, I cannot understand what coherent political philosophy cuts its own country off from oil."

The Republican package would also ease environmental regulations and provide other incentives to add to oil refinery capacity, outlaw unjustifiable price increases and increase tax breaks for owners of hybrid vehicles.

In a proposal expected to draw significant opposition from the oil industry and perhaps the business community at large, the Republican plan would repeal a method of accounting for inventories, known as last in first out, or LIFO. The method, which is used in many industries, gives oil companies a chance to avoid some large capital gains taxes through its accounting of sales from inventory.

The Senate had previously considered a similar provision that would have prohibited major oil companies from using the LIFO method for one year. It was expected to raise about $5 billion, but it generated a storm of opposition from oil companies and Mr. Bush threatened to veto the bill unless lawmakers rejected it.

The new proposal would prevent all companies from using the LIFO method, not just oil companies, and the prohibition would be permanent, instead of limited to one year.

On the fuel-economy issue, federal transportation officials say they need new authority to set higher standards for cars. as they did for trucks last month. The Senate bill would give them that ability.

But any change in federal standards for mileage would be a long-term fix since automakers are required to have 18 months' notice of any change and creating the new rule would involve a process that would take months in itself.

At the White House, a spokeswoman said the administration would consider the Congressional proposals but would make no commitments.

"We are taking all options into account that seek to relieve what is certainly the burden of high gasoline prices on American consumers," said the spokeswoman, Dana Perino.

Ms. Perino said the president remained focused on solving the fundamental problem of supply and demand "so that we can end a vicious cycle."

Lawmakers were grappling for other ways to contend immediately with gasoline prices and oil industry profits. On Thursday, the Senate Judiciary Committee quickly passed legislation that would make it a violation of antitrust laws to manipulate oil supplies to drive up prices.

In the House, Republicans, voting largely along party lines, rejected a symbolic effort by Democrats to urge House tax negotiators to support the Senate on rolling back tax breaks for oil companies.

Republicans Sag In New Poll (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

Rising gas prices have intensified discontent with Washington and handed Congress a frightening midterm election backdrop: a deeply pessimistic electorate, despite a robust economy.

A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll underscores a striking gap between Americans' mood and the nation's economic performance. Fully 77% call themselves uneasy about the state of the economy rather than confident, even as data showed new-home sales and factory orders remain strong. Economists expect a similar message tomorrow when the government reports on first-quarter growth.

Public unease partly reflects fallout from the prolonged and unpopular Iraq war. But it also shows the impact of pump prices topping $3 a gallon in many places, passing Iraq to become the nation's highest-priority issue. The upshot: Two-thirds of Americans say the nation is "off on the wrong track," President Bush's approval rating has fallen to 36% and Congress fares even worse at 22% approval.

"There's almost nothing that the public is satisfied with," says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who conducts the Journal/NBC poll with Republican counterpart Bill McInturff. "What they're telling you is, they want change on every front."

That is a worrisome sign for Republicans, who are seeking to defend their House and Senate majorities with little more than six months remaining before Election Day. Continuing a trend that has persisted for a year, Democrats lead -- beyond the poll's 3.1 percentage point margin of error -- in public preference for which party should control Congress. The survey of 1,005 adults was conducted April 21-24.

And in the run-up to November, Democrats also enjoy an edge in intensity; by 11 percentage points, their partisans are more likely to express high interest in the midterm campaigns. The biggest bright spot for Republicans is that Democrats have made no progress improving their national image, an indication that they aren't yet positioned to take advantage of their opportunity for far-reaching November gains.

Public unhappiness with government is strongly at odds with bullishness on Wall Street, as new data underscored the economy's current strength. The Commerce Department yesterday reported sales of new single-family homes rose 13.8% in March, the largest increase in 13 years.

Orders for big-ticket manufactured goods rose 6.1% in March, the largest increase in nearly a year. Indeed, that data fueled bond-market worries the economy is so strong that the Fed will be reluctant to stop lifting short-term interest rates after May, when the central bank is expected to bump rates up a notch.

Public unhappiness also represents a powerful source of frustration for Republicans, who want Mr. Bush and Congress to get more credit for the economy. Doing just that is a top priority of new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten and congressional Republican leaders, who are aiming to take a first step by accelerating House-Senate negotiations on tax-cut legislation that would extend the current 15% rates on capital gains and dividends.

Yet worries about gasoline prices, offshoring of jobs, rising health-care costs and precarious private pension plans are creating anxiety even among workers who do have jobs. Moreover, the fruits of the economy's recent strength aren't evenly shared: Workers at the bottom and the middle are benefiting less than those at the top.

Richard Curtin, who oversees the University of Michigan's consumer-confidence surveys, says the gap between views of the economy among those who make more than $50,000 and those who make less is wider than it has ever been in the university's polling. Especially for those with moderate incomes, says Mr. Hart, the Journal/NBC pollster, gas prices "are the real numbers that people are living with."

That helps explain why just 19% of Americans say the strong employment picture, rising stock prices and low inflation rate leave them feeling confident about the nation's economic health. Four times that many respondents said that gas prices, rising interest rates and the federal budget deficit have them feeling uneasy.

The poll also explains why oil companies suddenly find themselves in the cross hairs of political debates over potential price-gouging and even windfall-profits taxes. In the wake of record oil-industry profits, some 60% of Americans find oil companies responsible for rising gas prices -- far outpacing the proportion who blame oil-producing nations, President Bush or Congress.

Yet the toll on Mr. Bush is reflected in his 36% approval rating, the lowest he has ever received in the Journal/NBC survey, and the 35% positive mark on handling the economy. Amid continued violence in Iraq and a looming confrontation with Iran over its nuclear ambitions, Americans disapprove of Mr. Bush's handling of foreign policy by roughly 2 to 1.

Approval of the job Congress is doing has plummeted to 22%, from 33% just last month. That's worse than the marks a Democratic-controlled Congress received at a similar point in 1994, the year Newt Gingrich led Republicans back to power on Capitol Hill.

In particular, Americans who don't approve of Congress blame their sour mood on partisan contention and gridlock in Washington. Some 44% call themselves "tired of Republicans and Democrats fighting each other"; 36% say "nothing seems to get done" on important issues. A further 34% cite corruption among lawmakers. Among all Americans, a 39% plurality say the single most important thing for Congress to accomplish this year is curtailing budgetary "earmarks" benefiting only certain constituents.

Ranking just behind ending "earmarks" is congressional action on immigration overhaul, the top priority of 32%. By 61%-35%, Americans say illegal immigrants within the U.S. should be allowed to stay rather than be deported so long as they pay taxes and pass security checks. By 68%-28%, they express support for a potential Senate compromise that would allow for different treatment of those who have been in the U.S. at least five years, those here for two to five years, and those in the U.S. for less than two years.

Americans take dim views of both parties, giving Democrats a positive rating of just 33% and Republicans 35%. But they have different expectations for the minority and for the party that controls Congress and the White House. If no progress is made on key issues, the Journal/NBC poll shows, 51% would blame either Mr. Bush or congressional Republicans, compared with 16% who would blame congressional Democrats. One in four voters would blame all parties.

Profits, Prices Spur Oil Outrage (WP)

By Steven Mufson And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

Exxon Mobil Corp. reported $8.4 billion in first-quarter profit yesterday, as members of Congress outraged over high gasoline prices hastened to propose measures that would boost taxes on oil firms, open new areas to drilling and provide rebates to taxpayers but would not necessarily alter prices at the pumps.

The earnings outstripped the oil giant's profit in the first quarter of last year. Given current oil market conditions, analysts said, that puts Exxon Mobil on track to break the $36 billion record profit it made last year.

Meanwhile, President Bush sought to show that he was responding to calls for action in the face of rising gasoline prices. While visiting a gasoline station in Biloxi, Miss., Bush renewed his call for Congress to give him the authority to "raise" mileage standards for all passenger cars. White House officials said later, however, that they didn't know when or how the president would use that authority.

Congress has the authority to approve changes in mileage standards for passenger cars, and the executive branch can set them for light trucks without approval from Congress. But neither Congress nor the administration has shown much interest in raising passenger car standards, which were set in the 1970s and haven't changed since 1985. In March, the Bush administration said it would raise average fuel economy standards by 1.9 miles a gallon for sport-utility vehicles, pickups and vans for models in 2008 through 2011, a long-awaited move that environmentalists said was too modest.

In Congress, anger over gasoline prices brought action in the Senate to a screeching halt yesterday, with Democrats interrupting debate over an emergency military spending bill to protest a key oil company subsidy. In a highly unusual move, Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) waged a solo filibuster on the Senate floor in an attempt to force a vote on a provision that would halt support for what Wyden said was about $35 billion for oil and gas companies. "This is the big one, folks, in terms of energy subsidies," Wyden said during the five-hour standoff. "This is the one where there is no logical case . . . when oil is $70 per barrel."

Various committees and individual lawmakers scrambled to offer relief to consumers, punish suppliers and promote favorite energy-related provisions, most of them offering little or no immediate relief at the gas station pumps.

Senate GOP leaders rolled out a fat package of energy measures, including a $100 rebate to most taxpayers, and reaffirmed authority for state and federal officials to fight price gouging. The proposal also would allow drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska; Democrats called the controversial idea a deal-killer for the rest of the package.

Democrats unveiled their own ideas, including various windfall-profit rebates, a temporary suspension of the federal gas tax and alternative energy investments.

For all the criticism from Congress, Exxon Mobil's earnings fell slightly short of analysts' expectations, and company shares fell 68 cents to close at $62.42 a share.

In an attempt to simultaneously impress investors and calm politicians, Exxon Mobil spokesman Ken Cohen stressed that compared with the year-earlier quarter, the company had increased its worldwide oil and gas production by 5 percent, boosted capital spending by 41 percent and paid worldwide taxes that amounted to a 46 percent rate.

But analysts, while impressed by the production numbers, noted that much of the increase in capital spending came from sharply rising costs for oil services and that the high tax rates were a result of high crude oil prices. In many countries, sliding-scale tax rates rise as prices do; Norway taxes some portion of output at rates as high as 70 percent, and Libya's effective tax rates can go as high as 90 percent, analysts said.

Exxon also said it spent $5 billion buying back its own shares, more than the $4.1 billion spent on exploration and production. The company said it expected to spend $6 billion repurchasing its own shares in each of the remaining quarters this year.

Wall Street analysts discounted the likelihood of congressional action against oil companies. "As someone in the industry for more than 25 years, I've seen it before," said Fadel Gheit, an oil company analyst at Oppenheimer & Co. "Penalizing oil companies does not lower prices at the pump. If we have a windfall profits tax, it will just create another moneybag for the government. It will not increase oil production by one barrel. It will not lower gasoline prices by one cent or alter our dependence on OPEC countries."

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke also cautioned Congress on the various proposals being floated. In response to a question at a hearing of the Joint Economic Committee, Bernanke said, "Unfortunately, after many years of not really doing as much as we should on the energy front, this situation has arisen. And I don't see any way to make a marked impact on it in the very short run."

Bernanke said a windfall profits tax would reduce incentives for companies. "What we need to do," he said, "is think about whether there are actions we can take that over at least a number of years will put us on a more secure footing."

And he added, "I would like to let the market system work as much as possible to generate new supplies, both of oil but also of alternatives, and for the prices, painful as they may be, to help generate more conservation and alternative uses of energy on the demand side."

While many of the proposals in Congress are familiar, costly and unlikely to be enacted, bipartisan political pressure for action could result in tougher scrutiny and possible sanctions against the oil industry -- until recently one of the closest allies of the Bush administration and the Republican-led Congress

The Senate Finance Committee, for instance, requested federal income tax returns for the past five years from the 15 largest oil and gas companies, based on sales, in what could amount to a congressional audit. "We're seeing record profits and significant executive compensation in the oil and gas industry," said Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa). "I want to make sure the oil companies aren't taking a speed pass by the tax man."

The Senate Judiciary Committee unanimously voted to allow the Justice Department to prosecute countries that belong to the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries for price fixing in violation of U.S. antitrust laws. "What you have today is an oligopoly, effectively, and I think it's a disaster for the American people," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), a member of the panel.

Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said GOP leaders had assured him they were eager to push the legislation to the floor, pointing out the political pressure -- including a series of Democratic news conferences held in recent days at Capitol area gas stations.

ExxonMobil's Quarterly Profit: $8.4 Billion (USAT)

By James R. Healey And Matt Krantz

USA Today, April 28, 2006

ExxonMobil, the biggest publicly traded oil company, said Thursday its first-quarter profit jumped 6.9% from a year ago, to $8.4 billion.

That was a first-quarter record for Exxon, and the fourth-best first quarter ever reported by a company in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index. While short of Wall Street forecasts, it triggered fresh outrage elsewhere as ExxonMobil became the lightning rod for fury over high gasoline prices.

“While ExxonMobil executives are popping champagne and celebrating their record profits, American families are popping antacids under the strain of soaring gas prices,” said Sen. Robert Menendez, D-N.J., in a remark typical of the howls. Other reaction:

•The Bush administration, criticized by environmentalists for not raising fuel-economy standards, asked Congress for authority to boost mileage requirements in cars for the first time since the mid-1980s. Even on a fast track, it would be two years from Congress' go-ahead before cars covered by new standards hit showrooms.

•Senate Republicans proposed a measure that would give taxpayers $100 checks to offset high fuel prices and suspend the 18.4-cent-per-gallon fuel tax until Sept. 30.

Checks would go to individuals with taxable income of up to $125,000 and couples with taxable income up to $150,000.

Calling $100 a “token gesture,” Sen. Debbie Stabenow, D-Mich., proposed $500, which she said is how much more an average family will spend on energy this year.

•Consumer advocates sharpened their rhetoric. Americans must “choose between filling their tanks and paying their bills, and ExxonMobil is laughing all the way to the bank,” said Anna Aurilio of the U.S. Public Interest Research Group, reflecting the general tone.

The average price of gasoline in the USA is $2.927 per gallon, up 0.6 cents overnight and 69.8 cents more than a year ago, travel club AAA reported Thursday. The price has been edging closer to the peak $3.057 reported by AAA Sept. 5 after hurricane damage to energy operations in the Gulf of Mexico.

Most of Exxon's first-quarter earnings were from oil and natural gas, not from selling gasoline.

And Exxon's profit margins are below-average compared with others that have triggered no outcry. Exxon's first-quarter profit margin was 9.4%, meaning it kept 9.4 cents of every $1 in revenue. Microsoft kept 27.3 cents of every $1 in revenue in its most recent quarter; General Electric, 11.4 cents and McDonald's, 12.3 cents. In fact, Exxon is below the 11-cent average of Standard & Poor's 500 companies, says analyst Howard Silverblatt.

DOJ_NMG_0027237

The furor is likely to continue. Reuters Estimates predicts ExxonMobil's operating profit, which excludes one-time items, will rise 2.9% this year to a record $35 billion.

Market Fuel Prices Drop (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

Oil and gasoline prices took another tumble in New York trading yesterday on signs of increasing supplies and slackening demand in the United States and China, adding to an 18-cent drop in wholesale gas prices that likely will produce relief at the pump in the days ahead.

Since peaking above $75 last week, the price of premium crude oil has fallen to just under $71 yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange, while gas for delivery in May has plummeted to $2.07 a gallon after touching a high of $2.25.

Pump prices have flattened out at $2.92 nationwide for regular unleaded, 50 percent higher than they were in February but not yet reflecting the declines in the futures and wholesale markets.

The biggest factors causing price drops have been signs that demand for gas is running about 1 percentage point behind last year's level -- most likely in response to the rapid run-up in pump prices since last month -- even as refineries are racing to take advantage of high prices and increase scarce supplies of summer fuels.

"At the end of the day, the best cure for high prices is high prices," said David Hackett, president of Stillwater Associates LLC, an energy-consulting company, noting that consumers are angry about high prices and apparently are beginning to balk at paying them.

U.S. Energy Department figures show that demand for fuel at gas stations over the past month was running 44,000 barrels below last year's levels, while supplies rose by 231,000 barrels. Refineries gearing up for the summer driving season operated at 88.2 percent of capacity last week, up 2 percent from the week before.

Also easing pressure on fuel prices yesterday was a move by China to raise interest rates to slow down its torrid 10 percent annual growth rate. China is the second-largest consumer of oil behind the U.S.

The U.S. Federal Reserve also has been raising interest rates to cool demand and head off a bout of inflation that it fears could be sparked by high energy prices. Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke testified yesterday that high gas prices pose "risks" for economic growth as well as inflation. When gas prices topped $3 last fall, they helped to deflate U.S. economic growth to a sluggish rate of 1.6 percent.

Mr. Bernanke said he expects this spring's jump in gas prices to shave "a few tenths" of a percent off economic growth in the spring quarter but not endanger the economy overall. He says he sees little respite from chronically high energy prices in the next few years, as supplies are barely growing fast enough to keep up with demand for fuel worldwide.

Mr. Bernanke said a so-called "windfall profit tax" on oil companies gaining popularity on Capitol Hill would not result in an increase in supplies.

"Unfortunately nothing can be done to affect oil or gasoline prices in the short term," he said. Conservation and initiatives to find alternative sources of energy were needed to put downward pressure on oil and gas prices in the long run, he said.

While this week has seen a softening of fuel prices, other events lie ahead that could reverse the declining trend and drive oil and gas prices back up to record levels -- including the nuclear standoff with Iran, the upcoming hurricane season and the peak summer driving season between Memorial Day and Labor Day.

Most economists agree with Mr. Bernanke that fuel markets for the most part have been responding to thin supplies and robust demand, notwithstanding accusations in Washington that oil companies are engaging in conspiracies, profiteering and price gouging.

Walter Lukken, a member of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, which regulates the energy futures markets, testified before Congress yesterday that the commission thinks the markets "accurately reflect" tight world energy supplies and a pickup in growth and demand this year.

"The evidence we have seen indicates that futures markets for crude oil and unleaded gasoline and other energy products have been properly performing," he told the House Agriculture Committee.

Blaming the markets for high prices is "like blaming a thermometer when it's hot outside," he said. The commission is devoting nearly three-quarters of its surveillance resources to energy issues and has a dozen open investigations involving energy, he said.

Commission investigations have led to charges against 27 companies and 23 persons, as well as civil penalties totaling nearly $300 million since December 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0027238

"We have seen no evidence to date to suggest that the recent price rises in gasoline futures being traded on our markets are attributable to" rule breaking, said James Newsome, a former commission chairman and current chief executive officer of the New York Mercantile Exchange.

A 'Commitment' Goes Only So Far (WP)

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

The Republican House leadership, hopping aboard the new anti-oil-addiction campaign, staged a fine media event yesterday at a BP gas station at Ninth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue SE that featured a hydrogen-powered car.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.), along with other top House Republicans, was photographed in and around the snappy blue General Motors HydroGen 3 van.

The event followed one by Senate Democrats on Wednesday, who rode in their gas guzzlers to an Exxon station a block from their offices to blame Republicans for high fuel prices.

Hastert, who appeared to have walked to the station, left in the very fuel-efficient vehicle, apparently headed for his office. But he went only a block or so before he got out and stepped into his pre-positioned gas-guzzling armored SUV to take him back to his office. Alert photographers, suspecting a ploy, had followed the speaker and captured the bait-and-switch.

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean , showing why he deserves a raise, explained that Hastert "wanted to ride the van" -- really he did -- "to show his commitment to new energy-efficient vehicles."

The problem, Bonjean said, was that Hastert's security detail wouldn't have it. Way too dangerous. Perhaps the security folks thought the vehicle was related to the ill-fated Hindenburg?

In any event, "the security officials demanded that he ride in the much more secure armored SUV," Bonjean said.

Okay. But next time they gin up one of these events, could he at least do more than just drive around the corner?Good News Comes in Waves

Let's face it, the media continue to emphasize the bad news out of Iraq and absolutely refuse to highlight the important good news coming out of there of late.

Fortunately, the Republican National Committee puts out a weekly "Iraq Facts" page on its Web site that focuses on all the good news out of Iraq. This week's "Other Good News" section tells us: "Baghdad is to get its first water park and wave machine -- thanks to a Scottish company" called Murphy's Waves.

The RNC cites a report on the Web site of Scotland's Glasgow Daily Record a couple of weeks ago, quoting Murphy's international sales manager, Jim Stuart , who says he's "delighted to be involved in this project and it shows that rebuilding in Iraq really is happening."

The wave-machine pool project has been in the works for a couple of years, he said, when someone from a company called Baghdad Pools called and said he wanted to build a "fun pool for the city."

What better way to cope with the coming brutally hot summer in Baghdad with temps hitting 120 degrees? In the prewar days you might have had air conditioning, but electricity is still not up to prewar levels -- even to WWII levels.

So why not ride the great waves?Are You Expendable?

The State Department, anxious to fill openings in Iraq, recently sent out a cable detailing job opportunities for spouses and other family members in Baghdad. Some -- office managers, housing coordinators, cashiers and such -- appear fairly safe, since they are in the Green Zone.

But then there is "Expendable Supply Manager."

The job doesn't appear to pay much, and it sounds as though they aren't going to care enough to provide any security for you.

Congress Gone Wild (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

Let's hope the folks who make those cable-TV videos of loopy college kids vamping on spring break are headed for Capitol Hill. The Members aren't yet taking their shirts off in response to higher gasoline taxes, but give them time. They're certainly pulling enough other stunts to laugh at.

Take the Senate Republican proposal for a $100 rebate, unveiled yesterday but destined for the pandering hall of fame. "As we see skyrocketing gas prices around the country, it is time for this Congress to act," declared South Dakota's John Thune on the Senate floor. And so the Members shall, bravely marching off to battle higher prices by writing every taxpayer (below a certain income level) a one-time check worth about two tanks of gas if you're driving an SUV.

The gesture calls to mind other great moments in feckless legislating, such as Jimmy Carter's "$50 rebate," offered in 1977 to spur the economy. As one wag noted at the time, this was about as useful as scattering money from airplanes. Adjusting for inflation, the GOP's $100 version is worth a lot less now than $50 in 1977 -- and Republicans should expect it to do about as much for their political standing as it did for Jimmy Carter's.

But wait, there's more. Mr. Thune also disclosed that Congress will attempt to waive the 18.4-cent-a-gallon federal gasoline tax -- but only through September 30, when presumably the summer driving and political panic seasons will have passed. Lest you think any of this will add to the deficit, the GOP will pay for it by suspending "a number of tax credits and royalty waivers received by oil corporations."

Now, we don't think oil companies need tax incentives or subsidies to drill for oil at $70 a barrel, or for that matter at $25. What they need is the permission to drill where oil and gas can be found. And one reason for today's high prices is that Congress has systematically ruled out huge parcels of American land, on- and off-shore, for energy exploration. However, now that prices are high, Congress is reacting to the problem it helped cause by temporarily rescinding whatever paltry incentives it offered companies to explore for oil in the fewer places where they are allowed to drill.

As for suspending the gas tax, one way to reduce gas prices is by lowering the demand for gasoline, and the fastest way to do that is by letting the price system work. Liberals in particular want gas taxes to be high (to reduce carbon emissions, for example), except when gas prices are high. In other words, the goal of all of these temporary policy changes isn't really to change anyone's behavior in the long run. The point is merely to redistribute money from the oil companies to voters, er, consumers in an election year. We trust that the voters, being smarter than politicians, will treat all this with the snickering it deserves.

Oh, and let's not forget the contribution made yesterday by Senator Arlen Specter's Judiciary Committee. By bipartisan voice vote, the Committee created a new federal and state task force to investigate information-sharing among oil companies. As a grandstanding bonus, it would also allow lawsuits against OPEC for controlling output and fixing oil prices. Even the Members know that cars will run on nuclear power before suits against OPEC succeed in U.S. courts.

And the idea that oil companies are colluding to raise prices has been contradicted by countless Federal Trade Commission studies. Oil exploration is a capital-intensive business that requires huge economies of scale and long time horizons. From the time a potential drilling site is spotted to the day any oil gets to the pump can take a decade. Bigger companies can afford to take bigger risks. So busting up oil companies would almost certainly lead to less oil exploration and production, and thus higher oil and gas prices.

But forgive us for talking about actual substance. Like college kids on spring break, Congress is letting it all hang out in a political bender of a kind we haven't seen in years. This is what happens when a President is at 36% job approval, and there is no Beltway chaperone. And to think there are still six long months until Election Day.

Pander At The Pump (NYT)

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

The battle to see which political party can out-pander the other on the subject of gasoline prices is embarrassing. If American consumers are having sticker shock at the pumps, it's because of a series of policy failures that stretch back decades. The last thing the country needs now is another irresponsible quick fix.

Senate Republicans have proposed to assuage the pain of high gas prices by sending many taxpayers $100 apiece — enough for about two tanks of gas. Meanwhile, a cadre of Senate Democrats is carrying on about a temporary suspension of the federal gas tax, which is 18.4 cents per gallon, the same level it was in 1993. At best, the suspension would temporarily reduce prices a fraction, causing car owners to drive a little more. That rise in demand would send prices back up again.

Lawmakers from both houses and parties are calling for investigations into any price gouging or other rip-offs by oil companies and filling stations. It's perfectly all right to look into these things, but no one imagines that the result will be much more than a series of photo-ops.

Suspending environmental safeguards — as President Bush proposed in his energy speech earlier this week — might send prices down a bit, at the price of dirtier air. It's appalling that a generation after the first oil shock, in 1973, politicians are still reacting with such hysteria.

The main problem is not environmental regulations or even rapacious oil companies. It certainly isn't the fact that the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge has been kept off limits for drilling. Americans' outsized demand for oil and gasoline pushes up prices, and now that the economies of huge countries like China and India have taken off, there will continue to be more competition for the world's available oil. There are policy solutions for the problem of excess demand, chief among them higher fuel economy standards. But more than five years into the Bush administration, there has been only a minuscule increase in mileage standards for S.U.V.'s and no increase for cars.

The oil companies' mind-boggling profits have produced calls for a windfall profits tax. It would not be too difficult to set up a system that would capture a percentage of the companies' extraordinary profits, and the money could be used for long-term solutions, like research into alternate fuels and mass transit. That would be fair. Oil companies are indeed profiting from events that have little to do with their efforts. If some of those profits were taxed and flowed into the public treasury, the money could go toward public purposes.

But critics who say such a tax discourages investment in exploration and drilling have a point. Though they invariably overstate their case, their opposition would make a windfall tax a heavy lift politically, thereby draining effort from other, more direct, solutions, like better mileage standards and ultimately — the hardest sell of all — a bolstered federal gas tax to encourage conservation.

It's important during this debate not to discount the genuine pain being felt by the poor and middle-class families who must drive long distances just to get to work and school. But their problem is more than gasoline prices. It's their vulnerability to the price increases, which results from stagnating wages and a lack of savings. If the Bush administration had devoted as much political capital in the past five years to wage and job growth initiatives as it has to cutting taxes for the wealthy, these struggling families would be better able to weather higher prices at the pump.

Congress's frantic gestures this week are, at bottom, an attempt to divert attention from its past failures to act, and its resulting inability to shield Americans from the burden of high prices at the pump. But the pain of high gas prices will only get worse unless Congress changes its priorities, now.

Gas Pump Geopolitics (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

In recent days critics have accused President Bush and his new chief of staff of doing nothing more than shuffling around the deck chairs on the Titanic, as they shift, hire and fire senior White House officials while the president's popularity continues to plummet. Personally, I think that is a totally unfair charge — unfair to the captain of the Titanic.

After all, he knew where he was going. His lookouts just couldn't see the iceberg spar lurking beneath the surface in their path until it was too late. This administration, and its captain, have been staring the iceberg right in the face for years — it's called dependence on foreign crude oil. It has been totally visible, for miles and miles. And yet the Bush team has just kept sailing right into it, refusing to ask the American people to do anything hard to put America on a different energy course.

What is this iceberg staring us in the face? It is the fact that energy, broadly defined, has become the most important geostrategic and geoeconomic challenge of our time — much as the Soviet Union was during the cold war — for four reasons:

First, we are financing both sides in the war on terrorism: financing the U.S. military with our tax dollars, and Islamist radicals and states with our energy purchases.

Second, continued dependence on fossil fuels is going to bring on climate change so much faster in an age when millions of new consumers in India and China are driving cars and buying homes. And that's why renewable fuels and energy-efficient cars, buildings and appliances are going to be the biggest growth industry of the 21st century. The tougher the energy-efficiency standards we impose on our own companies, the more likely it is that they will dominate this new industry.

Third, because of the steady climb in oil prices, the seemingly unstoppable wave of free markets and free peoples that we thought was unleashed by the fall of the Berlin Wall is now being stymied by a counterwave of petro-authoritarian states — like Iran, Venezuela, Russia, Nigeria and Sudan — which now have more petro-dollars than ever to do the worst things for the longest time. They will poison the post-cold-war world unless we bring down the price of crude.

Fourth, we will never plant the seeds of democracy in Iraq and the wider Arab world if we don't also bring down the price of oil. These Arab oil regimes will not change unless they have to, and as long as oil prices are soaring they won't have to. Iraq will become just another Arab state that taps oil wells instead of developing its people.

The beginning of leadership for the president is to tell the American people the truth: This is not your parents' energy crisis. The price of oil is not soaring just because of greedy oil companies. It is soaring because of structural changes in the global energy market that could have vast consequences for America and the world if we do not respond in a comprehensive manner.

Toward that end, we need a tax on gasoline at the pump that will keep prices around $4 a gallon (still roughly $1 less than most Europeans pay), or we need a tax on vehicles that will make gas guzzlers prohibitively costly and hybrids and smaller cars enormously attractive. The sooner and the more we take the price of gasoline up — and keep it there — the sooner we can bring it down forever. If we want to make wind, solar and biomass more competitive, gasoline has to cost more, not less.

The president can start by pushing the bipartisan Fuel Choices for American Security Act, now wending its way through Congress. This bill would mandate that every car sold in America would not just have seat belts, but would also be flex-fuel capable so it could run on ethanol, methanol or gasoline. It would also pave the way for the rapid commercialization of plug-in hybrid vehicles, which would combine electricity and gasoline to get 100 miles out of every gallon of gasoline consumed.

Finally, the bill would offer Detroit loan guarantees for transforming its fleets in this direction. "We're going to have to bail out Detroit anyway, so let's at least get some public benefit," the energy expert Anne Korin said.

Yes, the president has wasted so much time, but if he finally rises to this challenge, Democrats — who should have taken the lead on this issue a long time ago — have got to work with him. If the Democrats shirk this energy challenge, as the Republicans have, I'm certain there is going to be a third party in the 2008 election. It is going to be called the Geo-Green Party, and it is going to win a lot of centrist voters. The next Ross Perot will be green.

Say It With Me: Supply And Demand (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

If you thought the Dubai port deal marked a record high in Washington cynicism, think again. Nothing can match the spectacle of politicians scrambling for cover during a spike in gasoline prices. And this time the panderfest has gone all the way to the Oval Office. President Bush has joined the braying congressional hordes by ordering the Energy and Justice departments and the Federal Trade Commission to launch an investigation into possible gasoline price fixing.

What a disgrace.

Precisely 10 years ago (April 29, 1996) as gas prices reached a shocking $1.27 a gallon, President Bill Clinton ordered his Energy and Justice departments to launch investigations to find out why. In my column that week, I offered a wild guess as to why: "supply is down and demand is up." I offered Energy Secretary Hazel O'Leary and Attorney General Janet Reno a $100 bet (I roll high on sure things) that their million-dollar probes would do nothing more than confirm my hunch.

No takers. Even Cabinet secretaries don't throw away C-notes. Sure enough, months later these perfectly pointless investigations discounted charges of price gouging and attributed the price hike to . . . increased demand and decreased supply.

Today, every time an Iranian mullah opens his mouth about nukes, the risk premium for Persian Gulf supply interruptions jumps again. Crude oil prices alone account for about $1.70 of what you pay for a gallon at the pump. So 10 years later, I'll wager again. Here's what the Bush search for price gougers and profiteers will find:

· Demand is up. China has come from nowhere to pass Japan as the number No. 2 oil consumer in the world. China and India -- between them home to eight times the U.S. population -- are industrializing and gobbling huge amounts of energy.

American demand is up because we've lived in a fool's paradise since the mid-1980s. Until then, beginning with the oil shocks in 1973, Americans had changed appliances and cars and habits and achieved astonishing energy conservation. Energy use per dollar of gross domestic product was cut by 30 percent in little over a decade. Oil prices collapsed to about $10 a barrel.

Then amnesia set in, mile-per-gallon ratings disappeared from TV ads and we became "a country of a million Walter Mittys driving 75 mph in their gas-guzzling Bushwhack-Safari sport-utility roadsters with a moose head on the hood, a country whose crude oil production has dropped 32 percent in the last 25 years but which will not drill for oil in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge for fear of disturbing the mating habits of caribou."

I wrote that during the '96 witch hunt for price gougers. Nothing has changed. Except that since then, U.S. crude oil production has dropped an additional 12.3 percent. Which brings us to:

· Supply is down. Start with supply disruptions in Nigeria, decreased production in Iraq, and the continuing loss of 5 percent of our national refining capacity because of damage from hurricanes Katrina and Rita. Add to that the mischief of idiotic new regulations. Last year's energy bill mandates arbitrary increases in blended ethanol use that so exceed current ethanol production that it is causing gasoline shortages and therefore huge price spikes.

Why don't we import the missing ethanol? Brazil makes a ton of it, and very cheaply. Answer: the Iowa caucuses. Iowa grows corn and chooses presidents. So we have a ridiculously high 54-cent ethanol tariff and ethanol shortages.

Another regulation requires specific ("boutique") gasoline blends for different cities depending on their air quality. Nice idea. But it introduces debilitating rigidities into the gasoline supply system. If Los Angeles runs short, you cannot just move supply in from Denver. You get shortages and more price spikes.

And don't get me started on the missing supply of might-have-been American crude. Arctic and outer continental shelf oil that the politicians kill year after year would have provided us by now with a critical and totally secure supply cushion in times of tight markets.

In March 2000, the price of gas hit $1.80 per gallon. Scandalized congressional Republicans shamelessly pushed for repeal of Clinton's whopping 4.3-cent gas tax increase. Now that the president is a Republican, what do you think Senate Democrats are proposing? A 60-day suspension of the federal gas tax. It would cost $6 billion and counteract the only good thing that comes with high gas prices -- the incentive to conserve.

George Shultz once said, "Nothing ever gets settled in this town." But even Shultz, who has seen everything, must marvel at the perfect regularity, the utter predictability, of the bottomless cynicism of Washington in the grip of gasoline fever.

Tax The Windfall (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

In, I guess, the early 1990s, when I worked for CNN, I found myself one evening at a Washington reception, chatting with an oil company executive and one from a defense contractor. The oilman said, "How's business?" How's business! Delighted and emboldened by the discovery that businessmen actually say this to one another, I arched a conspiratorial eyebrow and said, "Well, we could use another war."

The defense contractor said, "So could we."

The oilman said, "So could we -- as long as it's in the Middle East."

I was joking, and I'm pretty sure the other two were as well. Corporate executives are human beings (except for Ken Lay). They profit from war, but that doesn't mean they want it. Well, maybe a few of them have mixed feelings about that. But until I see hard evidence, I am not going to believe that American business executives would induce the government to start a war, even if they had the power to do so.

These days even President Bush is dissing the oil companies. He doesn't accuse them of starting the Iraq war, of course, but he does now favor looking into other possible misdeeds, such as antitrust violations. For Republican Sen. Arlen Specter and a chorus of Democrats, oil company misdeeds are enough to justify a tax on their "excess profits."

This hunt for a smoking gun misses the point. Taxes are not a form of punishment. And you don't need to find wrongdoing to justify a special tax on their profits. You only need a pocket calculator -- to figure out how much they owe.

The math is rough, but it's not complicated. About a third of the oil consumed in the United States comes from wells in the United States. That's about 150 million barrels a month. The oil industry refers to this as "production," but a more accurate term would be "extraction." Nature produced the oil and charges nothing for it.

Oil is oil, no matter where it comes from, so the price of those 150 million barrels will go up and down with the price of the 300 million or so barrels we import every month. A year ago, that price was about $46 a barrel. Now it's over $70 a barrel. The cost of extracting those 150 million American barrels depends a lot on how you figure and varies well by well. But we can make a few reasonable simplifying assumptions. First, no one was forced to pump oil at gunpoint a year ago. So, however you figure, in April 2005 it must have been possible to extract 150 million barrels of oil from American ground for less than $46 a barrel, including a reasonable profit.

Costs change: Wells have to be pumped harder, or they run dry. Gradually, we are running out of oil and need to import more and more. But these changes are nothing like the fluctuations in the price that oil can be sold for. If 150 million barrels could be extracted a year ago for $46 a barrel, it shouldn't cost much more than that to extract another 150 million barrels in 2006.

Let's round a bit and say that American oil extractors are getting an extra $25 a barrel. For 150 million barrels a month, that's $45 billion a year. And that's just for the oil that's extracted. The oil that remains in the ground also is about $25 a barrel more valuable. Other energy resources, used and unused, are more valuable by a similar amount.

To get this windfall, the oil companies didn't have to conspire with the Bush administration to start a war in Iraq. They didn't have to conspire among themselves to raise prices at the pump. If you own oil anywhere in the world, you didn't have to do a damn thing. Just close your eyes, make a wish, open them and -- surprise -- you're getting an extra $25 a barrel.

Ordinarily, and wisely, the U.S. government doesn't try to guess what is or is not a reasonable profit, and it doesn't try to tax away profit that is unreasonable. As a general principle, the government tries to tax all business profits at a rate that will produce enough revenue to help cover the cost of government without unduly destroying the incentive to produce. Under Republican administrations, the government usually goes further and gives business a bunch of absurd tax breaks. The oil industry has been a special pet over the years.

Ordinarily, we shouldn't want the government to decide when profits become "excess." But the case of huge profits from the run-up in oil prices is different, for two reasons. First, it is unusually clear that these profits have nothing to do with productivity. Diverting them to the Treasury would have no effect on the incentive to extract more oil from American ground. Second, some or all of these profits are directly related to a situation that is imposing huge sacrifices -- financial and otherwise -- on others: that is, the Iraq war.

Because of the war, the government is adding hundreds of billions to the burden of debt that all taxpayers, including other businesses, will have to pay off. Because of the war, American soldiers by the hundreds, and Iraqis by the thousands, are paying the ultimate tax of death by government policy. And because of the war, American oil companies are raking in extra billions in profits.

DOJ_NMG_0027243

The oil companies, like other big corporations, are mostly owned by ordinary citizens, either directly or through mutual and retirement funds. Presumably some of them support the war and others don't. Do any of these shareholders, pro-war or antiwar, want to pocket $45 billion (or whatever number you choose) from a war that is costing others so much?

Eating Our Greens (WP)

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

That was no impostor, that was the actual George W. Bush the other day, wagging his finger at the good people who run the oil bidness and pledging to hold them accountable, or at least pretend to. Pushing alternative fuels? Investigating windfall profits? Is the president unwell?

No, he's fine. His fixes for high gasoline prices also include loosening some of those bothersome clean air regulations and, as usual, a call for drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. He's just scared, and I don't blame him. With gas prices soaring over $3 a gallon, it's time for some serious panic.

One of the unwritten stanzas of the American creed is that a tank of gas, whenever an American needs one, is a birthright. The gauge gets low, you pull into the service station, you pump your gas, you're back on the road. Gas isn't a purchase you're supposed to have to weigh against other things you need.

Gasoline isn't fuel, it's freedom -- and when freedom is priced like a luxury item, Americans tend to turn on incumbent politicians with a snarl.

It's true that gas is still cheaper here than in the rest of the industrialized world, although the gap is shrinking. It's also true, in my view, that the world would be better off (though it would put Americans in a really foul mood) if the price went a good deal higher, perhaps through a big hike in the federal gasoline tax. That would raise much-needed revenue, since Bush is the most profligate spender since Louis XIV, and also discourage people from driving so much, which would cut carbon emissions and push back the day when palm trees take root at Kennebunkport.

So, yes, we should all eat our peas. But here's what I want to know: What are the implications of gas prices of $3 and higher for our collective relationship with our alter egos, our suits of armor, our advertisements for ourselves, our dreams made tangible, our autobiographies written in steel, glass, rubber and plastic: our automobiles?

That Americans are in love with their cars is a cliche, but often cliches are true. In other countries people have a much more sensible view of automotive hardware. In London, for example, a city where petrol costs an arm and a leg and the streets are barely wide enough for a Victorian hansom, people tend to drive small cars. If all Londoners were replaced by Americans tomorrow, I suspect one of our first projects would be to widen the streets so that two Hummers could pass without slowing down.

I'm not being judgmental here. I don't own a Hummer, but neither do I own a Prius or one of the other little gas-electric hybrids that sip fuel by the demitasse rather than the gallon. (Volvo XC wagon, if you must know.) My conscience tells me I ought to own a hybrid, and I applaud those who do -- economists say this guilt makes no sense, since whatever gas I didn't consume would be used by others in Seattle, Shanghai or Seoul, but that strikes me as shortsighted economist-think that ignores the future of the planet.

I could plead the excuse of being tall, but I've actually sat in a Prius, and it was pretty comfortable. The truth is, I have trouble with the idea of puttering around in an oversize golf cart with skinny little tires, grandmotherly acceleration and an aura that's all virtue, no vroom.

And what about that one snowy day every year -- well, most years anyway -- when I really need that four-wheel drive? What would I do then?

If humans were perfectly rational beings, life would be boring. Different societies have different subjects about which their views are, basically, insane. One of America's defining insanities is the automobile. Look around as you drive in to work tomorrow. Why is that woman driving alone in an SUV as roomy as some Tokyo apartments? Why is that guy driving a Porsche that'll do 150 when he'll never have the nerve to push it past 90, even on a clear stretch of interstate with no county mounties in sight?

But the economists are right about one thing: Irrationality can make a valiant stand against price, but ultimately it succumbs. At $3 a gallon and more, fewer people will buy SUVs. At some higher figure -- maybe much higher, but that seems to be where we're headed -- we'll all downsize into Prius Nation.

But could I have fatter tires on mine? And four-wheel drive? You know, for when it snows.

Bush In New Orleans As Senators Release Report (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

DOJ_NMG_0027244

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, April 27 — Facing renewed criticism of his administration's response to Hurricane Katrina, President Bush came to this storm-ravaged city on Thursday promising to make federal rebuilding efforts "as efficient as possible" while signaling that his administration was listening to its critics.

"All of us in positions of responsibility appreciate those who are working to help us to understand how to do our jobs better," Mr. Bush said on a visit to the heavily damaged Lower Ninth Ward.

Mr. Bush's trip was planned to highlight the progress of rebuilding efforts on the Gulf Coast and, this being National Volunteer Week, the role volunteers have played in them. But it came on a day that a panel of senators, in a bipartisan report, called the Federal Emergency Management Agency the living "symbol of a bumbling bureaucracy."

Speaking to reporters aboard Air Force One en route here, Frances Fragos Townsend, Mr. Bush's domestic security adviser, said that with hurricane season approaching, "now is not the time to really look at moving organizational boxes."

At the home of Ethel Williams, whose bungalow is one of many being restored with help from Operation Helping Hand of Catholic Charities, Mr. Bush praised progress toward recovery here.

The White House seemed to get the sort of image it was seeking, that of the president with his arm around Ms. Williams. With Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco and Mayor C. Ray Nagin, both Democrats, standing nearby, she told him, "I'm proud that you're here, Mr. President, and I won't ever forget you." Mr. Bush said she had promised to have him over one day for a home-cooked meal.

The naming of the Fox News commentator Tony Snow as White House press secretary this week seemed to have created new tension on Thursday with reporters who cover the president.

On Air Force One, the outgoing press secretary, Scott McClellan, was questioned about why the televisions on the plane and in the White House were so often tuned to Fox News Channel, with one questioner asking if there was a general White House edict requiring it.

Mr. McClellan said there was no such edict. After a few minutes he returned to say of the television channel, "They're going to be changing it, at your all's request, to the channel that you requested, which is CNN — from the press corps."

In New Orleans, Bush Urges Volunteerism (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, April 27 -- President Bush on Thursday wrapped his arm around a symbol of the devastation and hope of this ravaged city: Ethel Williams, one of the thousands of people who lost almost everything to Hurricane Katrina.

Making his 11th trip here since the deadly storm and floods, this time to the obliterated Ninth Ward, Bush came here on National Volunteer Day to implore more Americans to help Williams and others like her. His motorcade wound through the deserted, storm-damaged streets that offered stark reminders of the work that lies ahead: shuttered houses, littered lawns, lifeless roads.

But Williams, who fled briefly to Texas after the storm, is back here on Pauline Street, watching Catholic Charities volunteers gut her modest one-story bungalow and prepare to rebuild it. Bush placed his left arm around Williams's shoulder, surrounded himself with local Democratic politicians and praised the volunteers.

"If you are interested in helping the victims of Katrina, interested in helping them get back on their feet, come on down here," Bush said. Williams thanked the president and offered to cook him dinner when her restoration project is complete.

Back in Washington, Congress was again undercutting Bush's political restoration effort. As Bush was taking off for his morning flight here, Republicans and Democrats were arguing that the Bush administration's emergency-response agency is a disaster and should be overhauled. They cited the government's slow response to Katrina as evidence that the Federal Emergency Management Agency should be abolished and replaced with a new, more effective organization.

At the same time, lawmakers haggled over how much to spend to rebuild New Orleans and other cities damaged by last year's storm. Government spending is expected to top $100 billion this year, which some lawmakers from outside the region consider too high.

Two days before this visit, the White House budget office asked Congress for another $2.2 billion in emergency funding to help repair and fortify the levees.

Frances Fragos Townsend, the president's homeland security adviser, told reporters on Air Force One that with the hurricane season coming, the government should focus on preparation, not reorganization. The Atlantic hurricane season begins June 1.

Bush spent the entire day in New Orleans and on Mississippi's Gulf Coast, promising additional assistance and a better response next time disaster strikes. But volunteerism was his message of the day.

DOJ_NMG_0027245

After leaving Williams's house, Bush toured a Habitat for Humanity project a few blocks away, where he put on a carpenter's apron and gloves, grabbed a hammer and pounded a few nails. The volunteers were turning a vacant lot bigger than a football field into an 81-unit housing complex. In Mississippi, Bush stopped at a tent city to visit with 120 people helping remove debris and build houses through a group called the Hands on Network.

Bush Visits To Call Attention To Work Yet To Be Done (NOTP)

By James Varney

New Orleans Times-Picayune, April 28, 2006

President Bush paid another visit Thursday to storm-mauled New Orleans, talking with residents, pounding nails at a reconstruction site in the 9th Ward, and once again calling on Congress to approve his request of additional money for housing and levee reconstruction in the state.

Bush also used the occassion, his 10th south Louisiana visit since Hurricane Katrina, to highlight New Orleans' sputtering recovery and to urge more volunteers to come to the wounded city. Indeed, volunteerism was a theme of a trip that began with him presenting the President's Volunteer Service Medal to Tris Coffin, 87, of River Ridge, under a wing of Air Force One.

Soon after, following a tour of a gutted house in the 2000 block of Pauline Street, Bush and the home's owner, Ethel Williams, a 72-year-old woman who evacuated to Texas, came to the curb and briefly addressed a flock of reporters.

"The leaders down here tell me they could use 2,500 more volunteers," Bush said, his left arm draped over Williams' frail shoulders. "Well, if you're interested in helping the victims of Katrina, if you want to help them get back on their feet, then come on down to New Orleans."

Bush noted there was no shortage of work to be done, and, with Catholic Charities banners undulating on Williams' porch, he pointed to the work done in the 9th Ward by volunteers from all over the United States.

"It's a chance to give something back to your country, too," he said.

As Bush spoke, he was flanked by Mayor Ray Nagin, Gov. Kathleen Blanco and U.S. Rep. William Jefferson (D-New Orleans).

Bush said he was "calling on Congress" to keep his proposals for $4.2 billion in Community Development Block Grants and $2.2 billion for levee repairs "intact for Louisiana."

The money is part of a bill enfolding hurricane relief and war money for Iraq and Afghanistan. But rancor over the bill has risen and Bush is threatening the first veto of his tenure in the White House if what he regards as ancillary spending isn't stripped from the final version. Jefferson said he was confident that, at the end of the day, both amounts would pass congress.

Nagin and Blanco were on the tarmac when Bush, Jefferson and a handful of other dignitaries, including Bush's hurricane czar, Donald Powell, touched down on Air Force One at 11:13 a.m. Bush gave Blanco a kiss and spoke with her and her husband, Coach, then shuffled to his left and shook hands vigorously with Nagin. The two men talked animatedly for perhaps 30 seconds, at times grabbing each other by the shoulders.

The same clutch of politicians then flew on Marine One to a Port of New Orleans container yard near the former Desire housing development, and took a motorcade into the 9th Ward.

After his brief remarks outside Williams' house, one reporter tried to ask if the president had any reaction to this week's finding by a senate panel that an underfunded and dysfunctional Federal Emergency Management Agency was beyond repair and should be scrapped. Bush simply turned away.

Throughout the trip, Bush and Nagin gave every indication of enjoying a genuine friendship, a relationship both men have claimed is real but which Nagin acknowledged was a surprising development. The mayor famously railed against what he considered the tardy federal response to New Orleans' desperate hour of need after Katrina struck, and when he first met Bush on the tarmac of Louis Armstrong International Airport, four days after the storm, Nagin's bearing reflected his anger. That mood has dissipated over frequent meetings since, however, and both men now claim their relationship is a solid one, with Nagin once saying Bush told him he respected the mayor's honesty in Katrina's aftermath.

After visting Williams' house, the politicians zipped just two blocks away to a Habitat for Humanity rebuilding site on North Roman Street called Musician's Village. There Bush, Blanco, Nagin and Jefferson strapped on tool belts and hoisted triangular roof beam sections up to laborers scampering across the wooden skeletons of new houses. The four then went inside the framework, began to shake hands and chat with individual volunteers, and then Nagin and Bush climbed on step ladders and started hammering home nails handed up to them by Blanco and Jefferson.

Nagin, in particular, attacked the job with zest, and sweat began to gleam on his shaved head. Bush watched him for a moment, bemused, and then told the mayor to take it easy.

"I'm getting some aggression out," Nagin replied, adding cryptically there were, "a lot of people he'd like to hit with a hammer."

DOJ_NMG_0027246

As reporters and cameramen swarmed beneath the two, they continued to banter.

"A southpaw, eh?" Bush said. "So you're a lefty?"

"Oh, yeah," Nagin replied, "I'm lefty about everything."

"You write lefty?" the president asked.

"Oh, yeah," Nagin said, laughing.

Bush insisted, however, that his visit was not all for light conversation. He said his talks with Nagin and Blanco were centered on reconstruction funding and on lines of communication, a topic that also dominated discussions last week the local leaders had with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

"I've had a good meeting with the mayor and the governor," Bush said. "We're all trying to learn the lessons of Katrina, especially with another hurricane season approaching."

Bush Sees Progress On Gulf Coast Visit (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

BILOXI, Miss. -- Long after Hurricane Katrina savaged the Gulf Coast, progress on the ground may be catching up to President Bush's upbeat bulletins about rebuilding the region.

Mr. Bush made his 11th trip to the area yesterday. He found that after a start that by nearly every measure was scattershot and halting, federal and state efforts, fortified by some $85 billion from Congress, are beginning to show progress. Cleanup and reconstruction in the region are moving ahead, especially with the basics: removing debris, providing temporary housing and rebuilding the area's demolished infrastructure.

In January, the president was criticized for saying he could see "dramatic" improvement in the region as heaps of trash clogged the streets just outside the Bay St. Louis, Miss., school where he was speaking. But yesterday, on a visit to encourage volunteers to pitch in on the massive reconstruction, his comments seemed better rooted to the situation on the ground.

Mr. Bush's tour included initiatives in two neighborhoods in New Orleans, and a base camp for volunteers supporting relief, recovery and rebuilding in the city of Biloxi and surrounding communities.

"There's lots of progress," he said. "There's still a lot to be done."

The numbers tell the tale.

Katrina left 100 million tons of debris across Louisiana and Mississippi, destroyed homes and businesses and displaced tens of thousands of people. Evacuees slowly are making their way back to damaged communities. New building permits are up sharply. Officials say that debris removal is nearing 90% completion in Mississippi and 70% in Louisiana. Although temporary housing remains a problem in New Orleans, the Federal Emergency Management Agency has placed 11,000 trailers in the city. And the Small Business Administration, after a fitful start in handing out aid, now has approved loans totaling $8 billion.

To be sure, problems remain. Nearly $20 billion in administration-backed spending to upgrade the New Orleans flood-protection system and provide rebuilding help remains bottled up in Congress; temporary housing efforts are still bogged down by bickering between FEMA and New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin; and some of Mr. Bush's aid proposals for the region -- primarily his "Go Zone" package of tax-free bonds and special depreciation allowances for companies that operate in Louisiana and Mississippi -- remain largely untapped and bogged down by technical problems, experts say.

"We've found that a lot of it is somewhat impractical," said Fred Chevalier, a bond attorney for the New Orleans law firm of Jones Walker. He estimates that only a fraction of the nearly $8 billion in allowances permitted under the program has been tapped, and that the program will remain unattractive to businesses unless the White House backs a series of technical modifications to it.

Donald Powell, Mr. Bush's envoy to the region, is more optimistic. In January, he cited the goal of picking up trash as a measure of progress in the region. These days, he has moved on to other aspects of the recovery, such as ironing out the kinks in the Go Zone programs, which he cited as "a No. 1 issue."

"There are days when I feel good and days when I don't feel very good," Mr. Powell said. He added that the final $20 billion being sought by the Bush administration to help the region should be enough to complete the job.

Meanwhile, two looming uncertainties could affect the reconstruction effort down the road.

One is the fate of FEMA, the agency that received much of the blame for the federal government's initial clumsy response to the disaster. FEMA continues to be the key conduit for much of the recovery's support efforts. Yesterday, a Senate investigative panel said FEMA is flawed beyond repair and should be dismantled in favor of a more streamlined, focused disaster agency. If that happens, the new FEMA may be more responsive and better financed, boosting reconstruction efforts. But the transition to a new authority could be disruptive in the near term.

DOJ_NMG_0027247

The coming mayoral runoff in New Orleans also is a factor. The campaign has distracted efforts to create a cohesive plan for redeveloping the city, which the next mayor must carry through.

The late-May election pits Mr. Nagin, who has been both lambasted and praised for his performance in office during the crisis, against Mitch Landrieu, Louisiana's lieutenant governor who is widely perceived as the more liberal of the two. He is the brother of Sen. Mary Landrieu (D., La.), one of President Bush's harshest critics on the federal disaster response.

Both men are Democrats, but people close to the White House say Mr. Bush likes Mr. Nagin and certainly prefers him to anyone from the Landrieu family. So, while Mr. Bush's visit to the city was officially billed as a tribute to volunteerism, they said it was also designed to bolster Mr. Nagin's political prospects with the city's white conservative establishment, where support for Mr. Nagin has flagged.

At a site where Habitat for Humanity is building 81 new homes, Mr. Bush donned work gloves and a tool pouch to help raise roof frames onto one house. Mr. Bush and Mr. Nagin traded jokes about the campaign as they pounded nails into the frame. "I got a few people I'd like to hit," the mayor said.

Bush Visits Storm-Ravaged Gulf Coast (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, April 27, 2006

Surrounded by evidence of the incomplete recovery from Hurricane Katrina, President Bush on Thursday tried to calm fears across the Gulf Coast that another monster storm could be lurking in the upcoming hurricane season.

"If there is one, the response will be as effective as possible," said Bush, whose administration has been faulted for a flawed response to Katrina that exacerbated the hurricane's destruction.

Sensitive to voters' anger over soaring gasoline prices, Bush also said he wants Congress to give the Transportation Department the power to increase auto fuel economy standards — an idea proposed in an energy plan by Senate Republicans. The department already has such authority over pickup trucks, SUVs and vans.

Later Thursday, Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta wrote a letter to House and Senate leaders of both parties urging "prompt action" on the president's request. Mineta wrote it was "imperative that (fuel-economy) standards be set through an administrative process based on sound science and data."

The 2006 hurricane season begins June 1, and the president said his administration is working with local officials to make sure communications are clearer and supplies are effectively positioned in advance.

Don Powell, Bush's liaison to hurricane relief efforts, said the restoration of New Orleans' levees to their pre-Katrina condition is expected to be completed by June 1.

Bush's comments, on his 11th visit to the Gulf Coast since Katrina struck in August, came as a seven-month Senate inquiry indicated the United States still was woefully unprepared for a storm of that scope. The Senate review followed a House investigation that was similarly critical of Bush and other top federal officials, and milder White House conclusions that blamed the Homeland Security Department for most of the breakdowns.

"We are far better prepared today than we were this time last year," said Frances Fragos Townsend, Bush's homeland security adviser. "And we will be far better prepared by June 1."

The president said, "All of us in positions of responsibility appreciate those who are helping us to understand how to do our jobs better."

Bush's trip to still-devastated Louisiana and Mississippi was intended to encourage volunteers to pitch in on the massive reconstruction effort.

In New Orleans, the president stopped at a modest bungalow being restored by volunteers in the Ninth Ward, one of the city's majority-black neighborhoods that endured the storm's brunt and remain largely uninhabitable.

The street was piled high in places with trash. Yards were overgrown with weeds. White government trailers that are the main housing for the displaced sat in many front yards.

With less half of the New Orleans pre-storm population back, few residents were evident. The president's motorcade parked in front of one of the city's many shuttered schools.

Ethel Williams, the owner of the single-story green and white duplex, thanked those who are gutting her house so she can return to her home from Texas, where she fled during the storm.

"I'm proud that you're here, Mr. President, and I won't ever forget you," she said, her arm around Bush's waist. The high-water mark from Katrina's flooding was visible behind her, about one-third of the way up her home's single story.

Bush said, "If you're interested in helping the victims of Katrina, interested in helping them get back on their feet, come on down here."

DOJ_NMG_0027248

From Williams' home, Bush went to a nearby large vacant lot where Habitat for Humanity is building 81 new homes, several feet off the ground for protection against future floods, for New Orleans musicians.

Bush, wearing casual blue pants and checked shirt, put on work gloves and a carpenter's apron as he wandered around the construction site and chatted with workers. The president, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco and New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin helped raise roof frames onto one house.

Bush and Nagin traded jokes as they pounded nails into the frame. "I got a few people I'd like to hit," quipped Nagin, who faces a runoff election next month against a fellow Democrat, Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu, in his bid for another term.

Later, in Biloxi, Miss., the president visited a base camp that houses and deploys volunteers to projects around the community from a Methodist church.

He sat around a table nodding approvingly at volunteers who had come from all over the country, and checked their organic farming and pet-rescue efforts. Bush posed for pictures with several dozen people who have been living in a church balcony and a tent city outside.

"Character-building," commented Bush.

Katrina was one of the worst natural disasters in U.S. history, killing more than 1,300 people, leaving hundreds of thousands of homeless and causing tens of billions of dollars in damage. The government's lagging help for disaster victims has contributed to a persistent second-term slump for Bush.

House Lobbying Bill Narrowly Advances (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams

AP2, April 27, 2006

A Republican-backed lobbying overhaul bill narrowly survived Thursday, averting what would have been a stunning blow to the party's drive to repair the scandal-tarnished reputation of Congress before the fall elections.

The 216-207 House vote to advance debate on the bill came after GOP leaders spent hours urging their own members not to abandon them on the legislation. The turning point came when they persuaded Republican members of the Appropriations Committee to go along with measures in the bill to limit earmarks, or special interest projects.

In the end 12 Republicans, mostly lawmakers who thought the bill was too weak, voted against it. Democrats were unanimous in opposition.

Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., the main sponsor of the bill, said the bill would add new transparency to lawmaker-lobbyist relations. "What we are doing here today is another indication of our strong commitment to the issue of reform."

Rep. Christopher Shays (news, bio, voting record) of Connecticut, one of the Republicans voting against the resolution, disagreed. "We're losing our moral authority to lead this place," said Shays, who like Democrats, objected to procedures that barred them from offering amendments they said would have strengthened a weak bill.

The rejected amendments included imposing a ban on gifts from lobbyists, creating a new office to oversee ethics violations in the House, and making retiring lawmakers wait longer before becoming lobbyists.

Majority Leader John Boehner said the House would return to the bill next Tuesday. "Changing anything here in Washington is almost impossible," the Ohio Republican said. "The status quo is a powerful force."

The debate Thursday followed months of negotiations to craft a lobbying overhaul bill in the wake of the scandals generated by disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the bribery conviction of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif.

The most prominent issue during the day was earmarks, the pet projects that find their way into larger bills, often at the urging of lobbyists. Republican fiscal conservatives demanded greater disclosure of earmark sponsors, while members of the Appropriations Committee objected that the new disclosure rules applied only to appropriation bills, not policy and tax bills.

Earlier this month GOP leaders were unable to deliver on a $2.8 trillion budget blueprint because of a similar struggle between conservatives and the Appropriations Committee over budget reforms.

"After months of scandal and years of deficit spending, we have come to a moment of truth," said Rep. Mike Spence, R-Ind., a leader of the conservatives. "We will show today who in this body is committed to reform and who is not."

"This is the acid test today," said Rep. Jeff Flake (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., a leading opponent of earmarks.

Republican Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo., said it wasn't until five minutes before the vote that he learned that Appropriations Committee leaders would go along with a leadership promise to extend the earmark provisions to all committees when the House and Senate negotiate a final version of the bill.

GOP leaders brought the lobbying bill to the floor Thursday morning but then abruptly pulled it because of the earmarks dispute. They resumed debate four hours later after a two-hour closed-door meeting with the party rank-and-file.

DOJ_NMG_0027249

"Virtually everyone seems to be unhappy with some aspect of this," Dreier said Wednesday. He has overseen the lobbying issue since last January when the House, reacting to the Abramoff scandal, took the initial step of banning members-turned-lobbyists from the House floor and gym.

As Republican leaders huddled to try to salvage the bill, Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., criticized their efforts.

"This is a bill they thought they could get away with," Pelosi told a press conference.

"It's a ruse, and I think they thought it was worth a try. But people are seeing through it, and their members are hearing from the public."

The House bill requires lobbyists to file quarterly reports on their activities, up from the current twice-a-year reports; suspends all privately funded travel through the end of the year; requires appropriations bills to list earmarks; and takes away the retirement benefits of lawmakers convicted of corruption-related crimes.

The Senate bill, passed last month on a 90-8 vote, goes further in banning gifts and meals from lobbyists. It also requires that lobbyists report on grass-roots lobbying involving the use of phone calls and ads to encourage the public to contact their lawmakers, and extends to two years, up from the current one, the waiting period before a former lawmaker can take a job lobbying Congress.

House Advances Ethics Measure By Slim Margin (WSJ)

By David Rogers
The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Lobbying overhaul and ethics legislation narrowly advanced in the House after a day of turmoil that dramatized the continued Republican divisions over how to respond to the wave of scandals threatening the party's power.

Twelve Republicans, including the former chairman of the House Ethics Committee, opposed the leadership on a pivotal 216-207 procedural vote. Dozens more had threatened to jump ship until Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) interceded to quell a rebellion by members of the House Appropriations Committee.

"The speaker is the speaker; you only have one speaker at a time," said Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R., Calif.).

By holding the party together, Mr. Hastert avoided what would have been a huge defeat, killing both lobbying overhaul and any chance of a budget resolution this spring. But when debate resumes next week, critics say the shortcomings of the Republican package will also become more apparent -- as well as the restrictive terms of debate.

As adopted last night, the rule would effectively bar many amendments sought by public-interest groups pushing for stronger changes. These would include a ban on members taking below-cost flights on corporate aircraft and the creation of an independent professional office of public integrity to complement the troubled Ethics Committee structure.

"There are some good things in the bill, but it doesn't go far enough," said Rep. Joel Hefley (R., Colo.), the former chairman of the ethics panel. "We're losing our moral authority to lead this place," said Rep. Christopher Shays (R., Conn.). "When I was elected 10 years ago ... I really believed we would be allowed to have debates. And every year I see less and less of it."

The fight with Appropriations Committee Republicans dealt primarily with a set of proposed procedures intended to discourage the practice of members slipping "earmarks" into spending bills, designating funds for home-state projects or special interests.

The conviction of former Rep. Randall "Duke" Cunningham (R., Calif.) centered on bribes he had received in return for helping to write earmarks into appropriations bills for favored defense contractors. Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who pleaded guilty to three felonies in January and is cooperating with prosecutors in a congressional corruption probe, helped to orchestrate some earmarks for his clients.

The proposed rules changes would demand more transparency when appropriations bills come to the House, and a special point of order is created to allow members to challenge any earmark that is added in final House-Senate negotiations -- without having been voted on first by either chamber.

Mr. Lewis and other Appropriations Republicans said they were prepared to accept the changes, but wanted the rules applied equally to other committees that approve earmarks in their bills.

Mr. Lewis has a long record of earmarks and close ties to defense lobbyists, but he has tried to reduce the number of earmarks in House bills, and many on the committee felt the panel was being singled out.

DOJ_NMG_0027250

At a morning meeting, Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio) sought to resolve the issue by promising that the final bill -- after talks with the Senate -- would be comprehensive. But his assurance wasn't enough, forcing Mr. Hastert to put the House in recess for most of the day as Republicans caucused.

"It's been a full day of personalities," the speaker said.

"I honestly didn't know what we were fighting about," said one top leadership aide. But fight they did -- members and staff alike -- quite openly.

"We're doing to ourselves what the Democrats did to themselves," said a House Republican, and the turmoil contributed to the delay again of an agreement on tax legislation.

One of the last major issues to be settled is what offsetting revenue raisers can be approved to bring down the bill's net cost within the prescribed $70 billion total for five years. "They're pretty close in their parameters," said Mr. Hastert, and he and tax writers remained confident they can reach a settlement next week.

Ethics Bill Clears The House In Tight Vote (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

The House narrowly cleared the way yesterday to vote on an overhaul of congressional lobbying rules after hours of contentious, closed-door meetings yielded a Republican agreement to broaden measures to rein in home-district pet projects and other narrow special-interest amendments.

The 216 to 207 vote followed a tumultuous day in which the measure had to be set aside for five hours while Republicans met in emergency session to revive the faltering legislation. Up to the moment a vote was held last evening, House Republican leaders feared an embarrassing defeat.

But a last-minute deal between House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and rebellious Republicans on the House Appropriations Committee salvaged the legislation, which is now scheduled for a vote Tuesday.

Hastert promised appropriators that they would not alone be targeted by a provision that requires narrowly tailored "earmarks" be identified by the names of their sponsors and be subject to a special type of vote that could remove them. The leadership pledged to broaden the earmark provision in later negotiations with the Senate so that it will apply to all sorts of legislation, from transportation to taxation.

Appropriators were incensed that the pending ethics bill would apply the strict new rules only to their 11 annual spending bills, which fund the federal government. Had the provision been in place last year, they complained, it would not have blocked the so-called Bridge to Nowhere in Alaska, which helped spawn Congress's anti-earmarks drive in the first place. That much-criticized project was part of an authorization bill drafted by the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, not an appropriations bill.

Even with the eleventh-hour backing of the GOP appropriators, the measure that passed yesterday, called a rule, almost failed. The vote had to be held open longer than usual before it garnered a majority. A solid phalanx of Democrats and 12 Republicans, including House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (Wis.) and fellow party members pushing for stronger measures, cast votes against the legislation.

The bill would require lobbyists to file quarterly instead of semiannual disclosures, and to include in those reports the donations they give to federal candidates and political action committees. Lobbyists would also have to make public the value of any gift that they give to lawmakers or congressional aides. In addition, appropriations bills would have to list any earmarks that they contain, as well as the sponsors of those projects. Ethics training would become mandatory for House employees under the legislation.

The measure was slated to come to a vote at noon but was abruptly yanked from the House floor after a brief debate. Aides confirmed that it was clear then that the rule did not have enough support to pass, largely because of the appropriators' defection. Earlier in the morning, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) had met privately with GOP appropriators and learned about their firm objection to being singled out in the ethics bill.

By 12:15, Republican leaders convened an emergency, members-only conference in one of the Capitol's largest and most ornate rooms, the House Ways and Means Committee chamber in the Longworth House Office Building.

In contrast to the regal surroundings, participants said the meeting was loud and pointed. Several appropriators frankly expressed their opposition; other lawmakers said the defeat of the measure would be a black eye for Republicans who are trying with the bill to distance themselves from former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, whose guilty plea in January prompted the reform effort.

Still others, such as Rep. Christopher Shays (Conn.) said the bill was less than a window dressing and should be rejected. Later, to reporters, he called the bill "pathetic." On the House floor, he added: "We're losing our moral authority to lead this place."

DOJ_NMG_0027251

But it was not until a later, 45-minute meeting in the Capitol among the appropriators -- including former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) -- Hastert and Boehner that the accord was struck to save the ethics bill.

House GOP Saves 'Pork' Reform Bill (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

Republican leaders in the House reached a last-minute deal yesterday to save a bill that includes the most significant reform in recent history to the process by which billions of dollars in federal "pork" are doled out each year in political favors.

The reforms -- part of a much larger bill aimed at curtailing the influence of lobbyists on Congress -- would require greater disclosure about special projects inserted into spending bills by lawmakers, also known as earmarks or pork. Most significantly, the legislation would require members of Congress to attach their names to their proposed earmarks, which sometimes are inserted secretly and anonymously.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner said Republicans are committed to fixing the problems that led to abuses such as the bribery scandal involving former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican who was sentenced to eight years in prison.

"This really does allow us to make some real reforms," the Ohio Republican said. "Changing anything here in Washington is almost impossible. The status quo is a powerful force."

Yesterday's largely party-line 216-207 vote was on a procedural motion that paves the way for a final vote on the bill in the House next week.

For much of yesterday, however, the legislation appeared to be doomed.

Shortly after the vote, one Democrat hurriedly issued a press release with a subject line: "GOP Lobby Bill Dies in the U.S. House."

Yesterday morning, Republican leaders brought the bill to the floor for debate. But they quickly shut down floor discussion and pulled the bill because of strong opposition from Republican members of the influential Appropriations Committee, which is responsible for approving all spending by the federal government. Leading that opposition was Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis, California Republican.

Throughout the day, Republicans huddled in closed meetings, searching for a deal that would win the handful of votes needed from the Republican appropriators to pass the bill. Only as the vote began on the House floor did word begin to leak out that a deal had been reached to save House Republican leadership from an embarrassing defeat on high-profile legislation.

Afterward, House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican, said, "In the eight years I've been whip and chief deputy whip, I was never less certain five minutes before we started the vote."

Democrats, who were unanimous in their opposition, derided the bill.

"Tragically, the party of Abraham Lincoln has become the party of Abramoff," Rep. Lloyd Doggett, Texas Democrat, said in reference to casino lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who recently pleaded guilty in a federal corruption case.

"With all of your special interest wining and dining, what a Grand Old Party it is," Mr. Doggett said on the floor before the vote. "But it is a grand party for everyone but the taxpayers, who have to pick up the tab."

Before the vote, House Rules Chairman David Dreier, California Republican, said Republicans wanted "to ensure that the tragic problem of corruption that we have witnessed will never happen again."

He went on to say, "The Republican Party is the party of reform."

When Mr. Dreier was done, Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat and ranking member of the Appropriations Committee, responded: "I want to congratulate the gentleman from California for giving that speech with a straight face."

House Republicans Manage To Delay Vote On Ethics Reform Legislation (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - House Republican leaders on Thursday narrowly defused a revolt within their ranks that would have killed lobby and ethics legislation, but then delayed a final vote on the package until next week.

The legislation still faces broad, if not unanimous, opposition from Democrats and a handful of Republican moderates who say the legislation falls far short of what Congress needs to remove the stain of scandal rising from recent criminal convictions for influence-peddling.

The legislative package, which will be voted on Tuesday, restricts some congressional travel, requires more frequent public disclosure of lobbying activity and forces public identification of sponsors of special-interest "earmarks" inserted into spending bills.

The measure's defeat would have been an embarrassing setback for House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio. Both vowed to tackle ethics and lobbying legislation in the wake of guilty pleas for corruption by disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif.

Allegations of influence-peddling also have spilled into Democratic ranks. Rep. Alan Mollohan, D-W.Va., had to step down recently as the top Democrat on the House ethics committee after publicity stirred controversy over spending provisions that he'd inserted into legislation benefiting his friends and business associates.

House Republican appropriators, the lawmakers who draft spending bills, had threatened to vote against the legislation because they objected to its restrictions on "earmarks," the special spending items that members of Congress routinely insert into appropriations bills to benefit constituents. The appropriators said it wasn't fair to restrict such items only in appropriations bills and not in tax or policy legislation.

The appropriators, led by their chairman, Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., eventually relented after Hastert and Boehner promised to apply earmark restrictions to all forms of legislation when the final bill gets reconciled with a Senate version passed in March.

Following the GOP leaders' pledge, the House voted 216-207, largely along partisan lines, to accept the rule governing debate on the bill, indicating likely passage.

"The leader and the speaker gave their word to our members," Lewis said. "We can't ask for any more than that from our speaker. Comprehensive earmark reform is fundamental to our being able to go forward positively and effectively."

Still, many Republican advocates of changing the earmark system were suspicious of the appropriators' motives.

Many House conservatives are suspicious "that the desire to expand earmark reform is actually a desire to kill earmark reform," said Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind.

The House legislation would ban all privately funded travel by members or their staffs until Dec. 15, six weeks after the November elections. It also would prevent lobbyists from accompanying lawmakers on corporate jets.

Lobbyists would have to file quarterly lobbying disclosure reports. They also would have to reveal previous employment in the legislative and executive branches of government.

The controversial earmark provision would require the appropriations committee to include a list of earmarks in spending bills and to identify any member whose earmark appears in the bill. Any House-Senate negotiated spending bill that adds earmarks also would be subject to parliamentary challenge.

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California called the bill "an embarrassingly trivial response to the culture of corruption that has thrived under this Republican Congress."

The Senate version contains tougher restrictions on lobbying and ethics. Unlike the House bill, it bans all gifts and meals from lobbyists and extends from one to two years the period that former members have to wait before they can lobby Congress. In addition, the Senate's restrictions on earmarks apply to tax and policy legislation as well as to spending bills.

Lobbying Bill Quite Different From 1st Draft (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Just three months ago, House Speaker Dennis Hastert went before TV cameras to say he was “deeply disturbed” by the money-and-influence scandal that was sweeping the capital. His top remedies: to ban gifts from lobbyists to members of Congress, and to prohibit “fact-finding” trips paid for by private interests.

To get it done, he appointed his Rules Committee chairman, Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif. The House of Representatives, Dreier said, needed to be bold and avoid “the tranquilizing drug of gradualism.”

On Thursday, the House set the bill up for final passage next week. It bears little resemblance to Hastert's early prescription. Lobbyists would still be able to buy gifts for lawmakers, as long as they are worth $50 or less. Instead of banning privately financed trips, they would be suspended until the ethics committee could come up with new rules to govern them.

No Democrat voted to move ahead. Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., called the measure “a ruse.”

She added, “It is an embarrassingly trivial response to the culture of corruption that has thrived under the Republican Congress.”

Dreier said no one is happy about the bill, but he defends it as a step forward: “It makes it harder to abuse the rules, and easier to enforce them.”

So what happened? What looked like a straightforward response to the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal was complicated by competing pressures among House Republicans and from interest groups. “That was the wisdom of the House,” was how Hastert explained it on Thursday.

Abramoff courted lawmakers with free meals, trips and campaign contributions. He pleaded guilty Jan. 3 to corruption charges, and is cooperating with prosecutors while he awaits sentencing in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0027253

On Jan. 28, Dreier began circulating a draft bill that included a ban on privately financed travel; a $20 limit on gifts from lobbyists, and a ban on sports and entertainment tickets. Dreier's draft called for lobbyists to say who they were raising money for and to detail the parties they sponsor for them, such as lavish soirees at national political conventions.

The first sign of change came five days later when Rep. John Boehner of Ohio was elected House majority leader by his fellow Republicans. He had derided Hastert's proposed travel ban as "childish" and dismissed calls for an end to lobbyist-paid lunches.

Boehner made no apologies for his close ties to lobbyists, even boasting that his relationship with them was "frankly, a very good one." He called for greater disclosure of lobbyist-lawmaker ties, rather than new rules to ban certain behavior.

Boehner did push for curbs on "earmarks," pet projects inserted in spending bills, often at the last minute. Abramoff had called the House Appropriations Committee "the favor factory" because it could reward lobbyists with earmarks.

But objections remained. House moderates such as Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., an author of campaign-finance restrictions enacted in 2002, pushed for stricter rules. Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., protested singling out his panel for scrutiny.

Five House committees weighed in. The Judiciary Committee added requirements that lobbyists disclose the names of the lawmakers and staff they try to influence.

That went too far for some of the panel's Republicans, such as Rep. Steve King of Iowa, who said it would be unwieldy. "The best you can do is follow the money. You can't follow the people," he said.

King said Hastert's push for stricter rules on lobbying was an effort to protect rank-and-file members from any voter backlash to the lobbying scandal. But King said his congressional district, in western Iowa, "surely has forgotten about all of this."

Conservative groups allied with Republicans started to complain. The Family Research Council, Focus on the Family and the National Right to Life Committee wrote to Hastert, Boehner, Dreier and Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo. They said the provision on detailing lobbying contacts "would impose severely onerous record-keeping requirements for organizations such as our own."

Paul Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, also pressed to not name lobbying targets, and praised Boehner and Dreier for "stepping back and saying, 'Maybe we need to slow down a little bit.' " He added, "Cooler heads prevailed."

To satisfy Lewis and his committee, Hastert huddled Thursday with the 37 Republicans on the first floor of the Capitol. He promised them they wouldn't be singled out. Hastert pledged that any final lobbying agreement with the Senate would require that all earmarks — including those in tax and policy legislation — be labeled with the name of their sponsor. "We can't ask for more than that," Lewis said.

Government watchdog groups protested. Common Cause President Chellie Pingree said it was as if Congress had forgotten the Abramoff scandal.

"We will be back to business as usual, if not worse," Pingree said. "Lobbyists could continue to organize fundraising events, go on trips with members of Congress, give gifts, and provide discounts on chartered jets." Current rules allow lawmakers to fly on corporate jets for the cost of a first-class ticket — far less than such flights are worth.

Shays lashed out at his party's House leaders as "clueless about the need for reform."

He added, "Republicans are losing our moral authority to lead this place, and I can't say much more about the Democrats. It's a race to the bottom."

GOP Barely Keeps House Ethics Bill On Track (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Republican leaders overcame a rift within party ranks Thursday to clear the way for passage of legislation to tighten ethics and lobbying rules, a key to the GOP effort to repair Congress' image before the November elections.

The bill narrowly cleared a procedural hurdle, but only after Republican leaders scrambled to bring together their rank and file to avoid an embarrassing setback on one of their priorities. It showed just how much the leaders had to work to unite the once lock-step GOP team, and underscored the difficulty that lay ahead in trying to change the way lawmakers and lobbyists go about their jobs.

The vote was 216 to 207, with no Democrats in favor. Twelve Republicans and one independent also voted no. The California delegation split along party lines, with Rep. Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Carson) not voting.

A final vote is expected next week. The House legislation will then have to be reconciled with a Senate bill approved 90 to 8 late last month.

The issue has come to the fore amid public opinion polls showing widespread dissatisfaction with Congress.

"It's our only chance to maintain the majority, it really is," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.).

Democrats, government watchdog groups and a handful of Republicans have assailed the bill as weak, saying it would do little to change the way business is conducted on Capitol Hill, which has been rocked by a spate of ethics scandals.

The bill would put a moratorium on privately funded congressional travel, deny congressional pensions to lawmakers convicted of abusing the public trust and require a public accounting of projects tucked into spending bills, often at the behest of lobbyists.

Unlike the Senate bill, the House measure would not prohibit lobbyists from buying gifts or meals for lawmakers or extend the period former lawmakers must wait after leaving Capitol Hill before lobbying their onetime colleagues. It would require lobbyists to disclose the meals they buy for lawmakers and staffers, but they would not be forced to disclose their contacts with lawmakers or their role in arranging fundraisers.

"We need bold reform — and regretfully, this bill does not do it," Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) said.

"A ruse — that's what this is," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) added, signaling that Democrats planned to continue to highlight ethics as a campaign issue this year.

The renewed call for ethics and lobbying reform comes in the wake of guilty pleas to political corruption by former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe) and disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, money-laundering charges that forced former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) from his leadership post, and an investigation of influence-peddling in Washington. Some Democrats have also come under scrutiny for alleged ethics lapses.

House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R-San Dimas), the House GOP's point man on drafting ethics rules, called the bill a "vast improvement over the status quo."

"If everybody is unhappy with a piece of legislation, it's probably a pretty good bill," Dreier said, quoting former House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski, an Illinois Democrat who served time for mail fraud in the mid-1990s.

Earlier in the day, the legislation appeared in jeopardy because of a bitter dispute within the GOP over proposed rules aimed at reining in projects slipped into spending bills, frequently at lobbyists' requests.

House conservatives upset with the explosion of "pork-barrel" spending succeeded in including language that would require projects, as well as the projects' congressional sponsors, to be identified in spending bills and would give lawmakers a new opportunity to challenge funding requests added to spending bills late in the legislative process.

But the proposed change was resisted by House Appropriations Committee members, who have the power to earmark money for lawmakers' pet projects.

The panel's chairman, Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands), and many of its members signaled that they would withhold their support unless the rule change applied to all bills. Without that, they said, Congress could encounter the same kind of public outcry it got last year when the $223-million "bridge to nowhere" — connecting the town of Ketchikan, Alaska, to an island with an airport and about 50 inhabitants — was included in a highway bill.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) picked up the votes of Lewis and others after pledging to ensure that no House-Senate compromise bill would come before the House for final approval unless it included "comprehensive earmark reform" applying to all bills.

"Changing anything here in Washington is almost impossible," Boehner said after the vote.

Scalia Floats And Breyer Rocks For A Day In Court (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

On Jan. 22, 1973, the Supreme Court of the United States decided Roe v. Wade, creating the right to an abortion. This column is not about abortion. It is about the Supreme Court.

The preceding two sentences would strike some as a contradiction. As proved by the nomination hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee for John Roberts and Samuel Alito, the Supreme Court resides now in the political mind as all about the right to an abortion, with the rest of the world mere footnotes.

This week offered the last oral arguments in the Court's current term, and on Monday I went to see and hear what the nine Justices do when they are not thinking about abortion. Like a New Yorker who has never been to the Statue of Liberty and a Washingtonian who's never visited the White House, I've managed a career in political journalism without attending an oral argument before the Supreme Court. In a perfect world, all Americans would. Sen. Arlen Specter is proposing to make the Court's corner of the world perfect, but more (well, a little) on him later.

Attending the Supreme Court may be better than going to church insofar as you can't attend the Court in your gym clothes. The Court's hearing chamber may be the last best place to experience authentic decorum anywhere in America. Cell phones? They even forbid reading material. As the moment to begin arrives, a clerk instructs, "Remain absolutely silent." The best yet: "If you find yourself falling asleep, you are free to leave the courtroom." A somnolent 7-year-old in front of me was admonished twice.

The Court is not wholly immune from the compulsions of popular culture. When they entered the chamber, one felt in the presence of celebrities. They sit beneath a large suspended clock, with Roman numerals. Its sweeping second hand is visible to the attorneys who have 30 minutes to make their case. As the 10 a.m. start approached, the room fell from murmurs to whispers to still silence.

The Court heard oral arguments for two cases. The first, anyone could understand; the second, no one could understand. Both held the audience rapt.

The question before the Court in Brigham City v. Stuart was whether police in Utah, responding to complaints about a loud party in a house at 3 a.m., and arriving on the sidewalk to see a kitchen fight among four apparently intoxicated individuals, were wrong to enter the house without getting a warrant. Utah's courts ruled against the police.

Before a word of argument, Justice Scalia, his seniority placing him next to Chief Justice Roberts, had rocked backward, his face suffused with skepticism. To his left, Justice Souter had fixed the attorneys with a stiff, slightly scary New Hampshire stare. Justice Breyer, at one end of the bench, appeared grandly bored (he is not, as Michael P. Studebaker, Mr. Stuart's attorney, will learn). Justice Thomas famously asks no questions at oral argument, but he and Justice Breyer appear to be bench buddies, rocking back to smile and chat each other up over some point of shared amusement.

Brigham City is a case designed to amuse, insofar as Mr. Stuart's attorney is arguing that the police should have telephoned a judge for a warrant even as a fistfight was under way. The Fourth Amendment issue is that the states have varying and conflicting standards in such instances.

There is much discussion of warrants, knocks and noise levels.

Justice Souter: "Why knock if it's obviously a futile gesture, if no one will hear?"

Justice Scalia: "Why is the trial court obsessed with knocking?"

Justice Breyer: "The Constitution says 'reasonable.' A policeman isn't a lawyer. . . . A warrant would take half an hour. There would be more drinking, more violence. What's wrong?"

Mr. Studebaker: "It still requires a warrant."

Justice Breyer, appearing to side with the police, and with emphasis: "I'm saying it's not. It's reasonable." Justice Scalia has now sunk so low in his chair that only the top half of his face is visible to the gallery. He looks like he's floating in a Jacuzzi. Justice Stevens brings down the house with the morning's best probable-cause line: "The adults were intoxicated? That's a serious crime in Utah!"

Chief Justice Roberts, peering over his reading glasses, ends it: "The case is submitted."

Kircher v. Putnam Funds Trust is from another planet. A class-action securities case raising issues of federal and state jurisdiction (of material interest to the mutual-fund industry), it is impossibly abstruse. Yet the colloquy between the Justices and the two competing lawyers fixates the audience. It is an 11-piece orchestra playing a complex legal concerto, and at the end the impulse is to applaud.

Later, the Justices will discuss the cases in a book-lined conference room around a rectangular table. Each Justice has three stacked pads of paper -- small, medium and large. Clerks never sit in. There is no record of the conversation. Unlike the sprawling office edifices of Congress in the nearby streets, the Court occupies one square building. On a tour of its nooks and crannies, one encounters virtually no one. The Court's work is done by nine Justices and some 37 clerks, plus a legal team to help choose among 10,000 submitted cases.

Agreed: The issues that rage around the Court over constitutional interpretation are worth fighting over. But in an op-ed piece this week, Judiciary Chairman Specter raged that the public deserved to have the Court's "power" televised. He is wrong. TV of its nature would surely diminish the Court. Anyone who wishes may listen to past oral arguments at www.oyez.org/oyez/frontpage1. That includes, quite eerie to hear, Roe v. Wade.

Institutions matter. The Congress is approaching dysfunction. Perhaps the country can survive that. The American presidency has morphed beyond human scale. But to enter the Supreme Court and encounter the place, the people and its essential purpose is to feel carbon-dated to 1789. Though often maddening, its majesty remains intact.

Reining In Justice Scalia (NYT)

By Adam Cohen

The New York Times, April 26, 2006

"You know what I say to those people? That's Sicilian."

—Justice Antonin Scalia

Justice Antonin Scalia has gone too far — and he keeps on doing it.

DOJ_NMG_0027256

He made national headlines recently for making a gesture that may or may not be obscene. If it wasn't obscene, it was certainly coarse and undignified.

He recently called those who disagree with his unconventional views of the Constitution "idiots."

His public statements often make him sound more like a political partisan than a judge. He is particularly bad on the subject of Bush v. Gore, the decision that put President Bush in the White House, a low point in the Supreme Court's history that Justice Scalia should not be pulling down any lower.

Worst of all, Justice Scalia refuses to abide by the basic principles of recusal, the law that forbids judges from hearing cases in which they are not impartial, or will not be viewed as impartial. A few weeks ago, he took part in a case involving the rights of detainees after making inflammatory statements that seriously called his fairness into question.

Justice Scalia is certainly hurting his own reputation. After one of his ethical lapses involving Vice President Dick Cheney, Jay Leno joked on "The Tonight Show" about an "embarrassing moment" when Mr. Cheney visited the White House — "Security made him empty his pockets and out fell Justice Antonin Scalia!"

More important, Justice Scalia's actions are damaging the reputation and moral authority of the Supreme Court. Not since Abe Fortas and William O. Douglas stirred up controversy in the 1960's and 70's has there been a justice whose personal conduct has done as much to diminish the court's reputation.

The rate of Justice Scalia's disturbing words and deeds is increasing — now, it seems, he can be counted on to embarrass the court publicly roughly every few weeks. There is debate among court-watchers about why this is happening. But whatever the reason, Justice Scalia needs to be reined in.

If he will not police himself, his colleagues and Congress should do it, to protect the dignity of the court, and to ensure that the parties before him get a fair hearing.

I. Injudicious Public Statements

There is a long tradition of Supreme Court justices speaking at law schools, and in other public forums. In general, this is a good thing. The American people should be able to see their justices up close, and learn their views about the law, and the justices should get out of the monastic world of the court and interact with real people.

It is critical, though, that the justices uphold the court's integrity and independence. Alone among his Supreme Court colleagues, Justice Scalia seems indifferent to this basic point.

His most recent major blow-up occurred in a Boston church. After he was asked about the impact of his religion on his judicial decisions, Justice Scalia placed his fingertips under his chin and flicked them outward. The Boston Herald reported that the gesture was obscene. Justice Scalia wrote a letter to the editor insisting that it was merely an Italian way of indicating, roughly, "I could not care less."

Whether the gesture was obscene is subject to debate. The Philadelphia Inquirer surveyed residents of South Philly, and found opinion divided. Some Italian-Americans said the gesture simply meant "fuggeddaboutit," while others said it was vulgar. Sonny D'Angelo of D'Angelo Brothers butcher shop told the paper that he was brought up to regard it as obscene, adding that "My father would go berserk if I used that gesture."

The photographer who took a now-famous picture of the gesture, Peter Smith, a Boston University assistant photojournalism professor, said that when Justice Scalia made the gesture he also uttered an obscenity in Italian.

In February, speaking to a meeting of the conservative Federalist Society, Justice Scalia dismissed those who believe that the Constitution is a living document that evolves over time. "You would have to be an idiot to believe that," he said. Among the people who are "idiots" by Justice Scalia's formulation: the vast majority of constitutional law professors, and most of his colleagues on the Supreme Court, who continually reaffirm their belief in a living Constitution.

In a speech at the University of Fribourg in Switzerland on March 8, Justice Scalia was even more off-base. On the subject of whether detainees captured in war should be given a jury trial in civil court, he said "Give me a break," even though closely related questions were at issue in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which was headed to the Supreme Court in a matter of weeks.

The loose cannon keeps on firing. On April 12, during a visit to the University of Connecticut, Justice Scalia said of his decision not to recuse himself from a case involving Vice President Dick Cheney, which he participated in after going on a hunting trip with Mr. Cheney, "I think the proudest thing I have done on the bench is not allow myself to be chased off that case." Justice Scalia's decision was widely criticized by commentators, lawyers, and law professors, including some of the nation's leading experts on judicial ethics. It is bizarre that he would call it his proudest accomplishment on the bench.

II. Refusing to Recuse

Justice Scalia has refused to follow the law on recusals, participating in cases where his impartiality has been seriously called into doubt.

The law of recusal is clear. Supreme Court Justices are bound by a federal statute The Supreme Court has emphasized that the law should be read broadly to avoid "even the appearance of impropriety."

DOJ_NMG_0027257

Justice Scalia failed to do this in two important, and highly political, cases.

The first was a lawsuit by the Sierra Club and Judicial Watch against Vice President Dick Cheney, seeking to learn the identity of members of a secret energy task force he met with early in President Bush's first term. Critics of the administration have long suspected that those meetings were a forum for oil companies, and other powerful corporations, to shape the administration's energy policies. The court decided the case in June, 2004, in the middle of President Bush and Mr. Cheney's re-election campaign.

Shortly before it was argued, Justice Scalia went on a small hunting trip with Mr. Cheney, who was an old friend. The two men flew down to Louisiana together on Air Force Two, and hunted together.

The Sierra Club filed a motion asking Justice Scalia to recuse himself from Mr. Cheney's case. Justice Scalia, refused and then voted in Mr. Cheney's favor.

When he decided not to remove himself from the case, Justice Scalia wrote a 21-page memorandum setting out his position. It is thoroughly unconvincing, as Hofstra Law School professor Monroe Freedman, who is one of the nation's leading legal ethics experts, explained in "Duck-Blind Justice: Justice Scalia's Memorandum in the Cheney Case," in the Georgetown Journal of Legal Ethics.

The memo is filled with specious arguments. Justice Scalia acknowledged that friendship between a judge and a party to a lawsuit can be grounds for recusal. But he argued that this was mainly true when the party is sued in his personal capacity. In a case where a friend is sued in his official capacity, according to Justice Scalia, a judge only needs to recuse himself when the party's "reputation and integrity" are at stake. In the case before him, Justice Scalia wrote, Mr. Cheney was being sued in his capacity as chair of the Energy Group, in what was a "'run-of-the-mill' dispute about an administrative decision."

The argument is hard to take seriously. The energy task force lawsuit was anything but run-of-the-mill. Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney's political opponents were using the task force as a political weapon in the 2004 election, and if Mr. Cheney had been forced to reveal who had attended meetings, it might well have produced information that would have shown up in political attack ads. Justice Scalia seemed to be suggesting that if Mr. Cheney, an extremely wealthy man, were being personally sued for a small amount of money, he would have recused himself, but that this suit was so much less important to Mr. Cheney that recusal was unnecessary. That makes no sense at all. It is hard to believe Justice Scalia could have convinced a judge to accept his argument, but fortunately for him, he only had to persuade himself.

Justice Scalia's memo has other serious flaws. He accepted a free ride for himself and two family members on Air Force Two from Mr. Cheney right before hearing the case. Taking things of value from one of the parties to a case is the most basic conflict for a judge. But Justice Scalia dismissed objections with the most clichéd defense of bribe-takers — that it was absurd to think he could be "bought so cheap." In fact, the value of three luxury plane rides is not insubstantial at all compared to the salary of a Supreme Court Justice.

Professor Freedman noted in his article that 8 of the 10 largest-circulation newspapers (including this one) ran editorials calling for Justice Scalia's recusal, as did 20 of the top 30, and none argued against it. "Unless we are to believe that all these editorialists are unreasonable people," Professor Freedman wrote, "the conclusion is inescapable that a reasonable person might question Scalia's impartiality in the case." A few weeks ago, Justice Scalia again participated in a case in which many reasonable people questioned his impartiality — because of his own comments. In his University of Fribourg appearance, he was quoted saying that "War is war, and it has never been the case that when you captured a combatant you have to give them a jury trial in your civil courts." As Tony Mauro, a veteran Supreme Court reporter, has pointed out, that seemed to directly prejudge a case he was to hear a few weeks later, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, in which an alleged Al Qaeda member captured in Afghanistan was challenging the use of military tribunals to try detainees held in Guantanamo.

Justice Scalia made things worse by saying, in the same discussion, "I had a son on that battlefield, and they were shooting at my son." The strong suggestion was that he was connecting the question of what rights detainees have to the danger posed to his son Matthew, who was an Army captain in Iraq. A group of retired generals and admirals who filed a friend-of-the-court brief on behalf of Mr. Hamdan asked Justice Scalia to recuse himself. He refused. At oral argument, according to Mr. Mauro's account, Justice Scalia at times "appeared to take over [the government's] ... argument," doing battle with the justices who appeared most sympathetic to Mr. Hamdan.

Justice Scalia clearly does not like the recusal law as it exists in the statute books—and he seems intent on replacing it with a more forgiving standard of his own creation. At his University of Connecticut appearance, when he was asked about the Cheney case, he replied, "For Pete's sake, if you can't trust your Supreme Court justice more than that, get a life." But Justice Scalia, who is so critical of liberal judges for making up legal standards, has made up his own standard here. If he had fairly applied the one in the statute, he would have removed himself from the case.

III. Justice Scalia, Political Partisan

DOJ_NMG_0027258

Justice Scalia speaks, frequently, as an undisguised right-wing ideologue. In his University of Fribourg appearance, he was quoted saying, about President Clinton's false statements in the Monica Lewinsky matter, "we really don't like our presidents fooling around in the Oval Office." The questioner was asking about the dishonesty of American presidents, but Justice Scalia sounded like a right-wing talk show host in his response. He was certainly not giving a legal answer to the question, since the articles of impeachment against President Clinton were for perjury and obstruction of justice, not sex in the White House.

His comments about Bush v. Gore have also been strikingly political in tone, which is particularly unfortunate given the black mark the case has already made on the court's reputation. In the same Fribourg appearance, again according to the Washington Post, Justice Scalia said on the subject of Bush v. Gore, that if all of the votes that Democrats had wanted counted were indeed counted, "They would have lost anyway." The important point is that no one will ever know who would have won if all of the votes had been counted, and the Supreme Court ordered the vote counting stopped. He was also quoted as saying, "Oh God. Get over it," as if there were a statute of limitations for raising questions about the legitimacy of Supreme Court rulings.

In the Supreme Court, the case broke down sharply along partisan lines, with the five conservative justices voting for George W. Bush, and the four liberals dissenting. But Justice Scalia rejected charges that the court had approached the case in political terms while at the same time stating, outrageously, that the Florida Supreme Court judges had been politically motivated when they ordered that more votes be counted. The Supreme Court's prestige was sorely tested in Bush v. Gore, when it had to resolve a deeply divisive dispute over who had rightfully been elected president. The reason the court's decision was accepted, though — by an electorate that had cast 500,000 more of its votes for Mr. Gore than Mr. Bush — is that it was regarded as a legal decision, not a political one. Justice Scalia's discussion of the case undermines the public's faith in the decision, and the court.

IV. Why Is He Doing This?

There is no way to know why Justice Scalia has been acting in a way that has been so injurious to his own reputation, and the reputation of the court.

It may simply be a product of his booming self-confidence, in his intellectual ability and his moral vision. He may simply be speaking his mind because he feels he can.

Some court-watchers have conjectured that Justice Scalia may have been motivated by a deep desire to be appointed Chief Justice. He may have curried favor with Vice President Cheney before the election in the hope that it would help him to be nominated. And Justice Scalia may be speaking out now because he feels that, with a new Chief Justice, John G. Roberts, who is much younger than he is, he has nothing left to lose.

Justice Scalia, for his part, has been quoted saying that he has been on something of a public relations kick. "My kids have been working on me to get out and do more public appearances," he told a reporter from the New York Daily News last year. "They think it makes it harder to demonize you — and I agree." He may want to reassess his strategy.

In the end, why he is doing it doesn't matter that much. Getting him to stop matters a lot.

V. What Is to Be Done?

If Justice Scalia keeps making outrageous statements, and violating recusal law, at his current pace, it will do serious damage to the Supreme Court.

The simplest solution would be for Justice Scalia to begin policing himself. Unfortunately, he seems convinced that he is above reproach, despite all of the reproach he has received.

The next obvious place to look for corrective action is Justice Scalia's colleagues on the court. The Supreme Court has always jealously guarded its prerogatives when it comes to setting its own rules — Justice Anthony Kennedy recently told Congress that the Supreme Court, not Congress, should decide if its proceedings are televised. But with that assertion of authority comes responsibility.

Chief Justice Roberts, and perhaps other members of the court, should persuade Justice Scalia to give up his unseemly public utterances, and to recuse himself from cases when the law indicates that he should.

If Justice Scalia keeps flouting basic recusal principles, the court should consider changing its rules. Currently, justices are the only federal judges who are allowed to decide on their own whether to recuse themselves. There is an inherent illogic in allowing a judge to be the final word on his own impartiality — if they are so biased that they cannot hear a case, they may well be too biased to decide if they are too biased. But it is a system that works only if justices do their utmost to be fair to the arguments for recusal.

The court could decide to allow the justices as a whole, or an alternating panel of three justices, to rule on recusal motions aimed at their colleagues. Such an approach would have its own problems — conceivably, justices in one ideological camp could vote to recuse their ideological opposites to affect the outcome of a case. But if individual justices abuse their right to decide their own motions, such a change would be an improvement.

Finally, Congress should be doing more. Respected members from both parties should speak out when Justice Scalia makes outrageous comments, and make it clear that better is expected of him.

They should also reconsider the rules of recusal. Congress could amend the federal recusal statute to require that the whole Supreme Court, or a panel of justices, rule on recusal motions. Short of amending the law, some pointed criticism from members of Congress, particularly on the Republican side of the aisle, could encourage Justice Scalia to do better in ruling on his own recusal motions.

More than any modern justice, Justice Scalia seems intent on presenting himself to the world as an outspoken champion of conservative values. But conservatives are people who believe in respecting and preserving existing institutions. There is nothing conservative about diminishing a great institution like the Supreme Court by making inflammatory and partisan off-the-bench statements and ignoring the rules of ethical judging.

Whistleblower alleging Red Cross let tainted blood be released sees bulk of lawsuit dismissed (AP)

By DONNA DE LA CRUZ

AP, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A whistleblower who claims the American Red Cross failed to immediately alert regulators when more than 600 pints of contaminated blood were released in New Jersey saw the bulk of her lawsuit dismissed Thursday in federal court.

Michelle Hoyte also claims the agency fired her for complaining to her managers about the tainted blood. That part of her lawsuit is still intact, but the Red Cross has filed a motion to have that final portion dismissed as well.

After the brief hearing, in which a judge dismissed the False Claims Act portion of her lawsuit, Hoyte said she remained worried that the Justice Department and the Food and Drug Administration are not doing enough to make sure the Red Cross's blood supply is carefully monitored. Blood banking has become the Red Cross's biggest moneymaker, bringing in $2.14 billion in revenue in the last fiscal year.

"There's supposed to be an internal system for people to report incidents like this," Hoyte said. "But the employees are afraid to do so for fear of being dismissed."

At the hearing, John R. Fleder, attorney for the Red Cross, said the organization and the FDA are actively monitoring the blood supply.

"It's top priority is the safety, security and availability of the nation's blood supply," Fleder said of the Red Cross.

According to her lawsuit, Hoyte supervised a February 2004 audit of the Red Cross's Penn-Jersey blood collection facility in Philadelphia. The auditors discovered that 607 pints of blood were not collected properly and were exposed to air, violating agency procedures. Officials suspended the worker who collected the blood but Hoyte alleges they did not immediately alert regulators, or recall the blood.

The lawsuit says that it is still not known whether the blood that was released caused any infections or illnesses, or exactly what hospitals, blood banks or other facilities received the pints.

Hoyte complained to her managers about the blood and also went to the FDA, where she used to work. The FDA investigated her claim last year and found that 539 of the 607 units had been exposed to air.

In spite of the FDA's findings, Hoyte's attorney, Vincent McKnight, said the Red Cross has not been fined.

Hoyte included the Justice Department as a plaintiff in her case, but the government sought Thursday to have her False Claims Act motion dismissed, saying the government has investigated the case and the FDA has taken action. The Red Cross supported the motion, and U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman granted it.

The False Claims Act is designed to stop fraud in government procurement contracts. Many whistleblower lawsuits are filed under this law.

McKnight said he and Hoyte are discussing whether to appeal Thursday's ruling, but would continue the lawsuit suing the Red Cross for wrongful termination. Hoyte, who suffers from multiple sclerosis, said she does not have another job.

Iran Vows To Defy U.N. On Nuclear Program (NYT)

By By William J. Broad And Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027260

Iran vowed yesterday to defy any United Nations Security Council resolution on its nuclear activities on the eve of a major report by atomic inspectors on the status of its nuclear program.

Javad Zarif, the Iranian ambassador to the United Nations, told reporters in New York that Iran would consider illegitimate any Council resolution calling on Iran to stop uranium enrichment that invoked the so-called Chapter 7 clause, which could open the door to penalties and possibly to military action.

The United States has been pressing for such a resolution. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that the Security Council had no choice but to rebuke Iran and that negotiations had apparently broken down between International Atomic Energy Agency monitors and Iranian envoys.

Today, the agency will deliver to the Security Council a report expected to be highly critical of Iran's compliance with demands that it stop enriching uranium.

The Council is expected to meet, probably next week, to debate what, if any, punitive action to take against Iran.

"If the Security Council decides to take decisions that are not within its competence, Iran is not obliged to obey them," Mr. Zarif said, speaking to reporters at the residence of the Iranian Mission to the United Nations in Manhattan.

He said the matter should properly be handled by the atomic energy agency, not the United Nations.

He also sought to portray Iran's defiant stance as nothing more than a logical response to American threats against Iran.

"We're not upping the ante," he said. "We're simply responding to others upping the ante."

Ms. Rice, speaking in Bulgaria at a conference of envoys from NATO and the European Union, said, "What is clear is that it is highly unlikely that Iran is going to accede to the demands of the international community."

She added, "In order to be credible, the Security Council of course has to act."

Chapter 7 of the United Nations Charter deals with "threats to the peace, breaches of peace, and acts of aggression," and its application in this case would make Iranian compliance binding under international law.

As a signatory of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, Iran has the right to enrich uranium, but the United States and its European allies have argued that Iran's concealment of nuclear activities in the past means it has forfeited that right.

In January, Iran restarted its effort to make atomic fuel after negotiations with Britain, France and Germany over the fate of its atomic program broke down, and a month ago the Council voted unanimously to give Iran 30 days to show it had stopped enriching uranium.

Yesterday in Vienna, Iranian officials delivered a confidential letter to the agency that emphasized its determination to press on with its nuclear program, defying calls from other nations to freeze its activities, according to a European official who had seen the document.

The letter was a response to the agency's demand for more cooperation from Iran to investigate suspicions that Iran has been researching ways to produce warheads or delivery systems for weapons. Iran has denied such activities. The letter reflected a hardening of Iran's position and asked other nations to make concessions to Iran, the official said.

A senior Iranian official confirmed the delivery of the letter, which he said would probably be made public today.

Although the United States is pushing for tough measures, it is far from clear whether Russia would drop its opposition to a Chapter 7 resolution at the Security Council.

Past opposition by Russia, China and others has forced the United States to back down from its demand for such a resolution, but now American and European diplomats hope that a new critical finding by the International Atomic Energy Agency will increase support for the action it wants.

Iran insists that its activities are for peaceful purposes only, and its leaders have kept up a barrage of criticism of the United States, Europe and others who suspect it of concealing a nuclear weapons program. In the past several days, Iranian officials have threatened to strike at American military targets if the United States attacks Iran. The officials have also offered to share nuclear technology with other nations, including Sudan.

Last week, Iran informed the monitoring agency that it would provide only the minimal level of cooperation legally required under its safeguards agreement with the agency as a signatory to the nonproliferation treaty.

That decision made it much harder for the agency's nuclear inspectors to visit sites in Iran and led Dr. Mohamed ElBaradei, the agency's director general, to cancel a trip to Iran by his senior inspectors.

Meanwhile, European diplomats said Iran was expanding its efforts to enrich uranium on an industrial scale with centrifuges — tall, thin machines whose rotors spin extraordinarily fast to concentrate uranium's rare form, uranium 235, which can fuel nuclear reactors or atom bombs.

Diplomats familiar with what Iran has told atomic inspectors in recent days said the country had started work on second and third "cascades" of 164 centrifuges, preparing to match the first already in operation at its enrichment facility in Natanz.

DOJ_NMG_0027261

David Albright, an expert on the Iranian centrifuge program and president of the Institute for Science and International Security, a private research group in Washington, said the Iranian expansion made technical sense but did not necessarily bespeak a major advance.

"I don't think the first cascade is running all that well," he said. "So that's an incentive to build more to learn how to get them working more efficiently. They might need to do many experiments."

Ahmadinejad Defiant Ahead Of Key Nuclear Report (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed yesterday not to abandon the country's nuclear program, challenging the United Nations one day before the U.N. nuclear agency is to issue a key report on Iran's efforts to refine uranium into nuclear fuel.

"We want nuclear technology for peace and progress of nations, and if some believe that they can prevent us with psychological warfare and resolutions, they are mistaken," he told a rally in northern Iran.

Uranium can be processed into fuel for an nuclear reactor or to make atomic bombs.

"We have obtained the technology for producing nuclear fuel. ... No one can take it away from our nation," Mr. Ahmadinejad said.

The U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) is to report today on compliance with a U.N. Security Council resolution calling on Iran to stop enriching uranium.

The Bush administration, which has been laying the groundwork for a tougher Security Council resolution demanding that Iran give up its fuel-enrichment activities, said the council's credibility is at stake.

"What is clear is that it is highly unlikely that Iran is going to accede to the demands of the international community," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in Bulgaria yesterday, at a conference of envoys from NATO and the European Union.

"In order to be credible, the Security Council of course has to act," Miss Rice said.

U.S. diplomats say they will renew efforts in the Security Council to secure a legally binding resolution demanding that Iran curtail enrichment activities.

Such a resolution could boost the IAEA recommendations to the force of international law and pave the way for military or economic measures.

Britain and France, who with Germany have been negotiating with Iran over the nuclear program for nearly three years, are supportive.

But Russia and China, which like Britain, France and the United States have veto powers in the Security Council, are reluctant to approve a legally binding resolution.

An exiled opposition group said Iran was working at secret military sites to develop a better type of centrifuge than the "P-1" machines at its Natanz enrichment plant, which would allow it to make fuel for an atomic bomb faster than current estimates.

The Paris-based National Council of Resistance of Iran, which has reported accurately on hidden Iranian nuclear sites in the past but whose claims could not be verified, said Iran was researching "P-2" centrifuges in secret areas of Natanz and a site near Tehran.

In New York, meanwhile, Iran's ambassador to the United Nations, Javad Zarif, said Tehran had offered a comprehensive package designed to allay fears about its nuclear production.

Rice Urges U.N. To Rebuke Iran For Nuclear Program (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

SOFIA, Bulgaria, April 27 – Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said today that the latest talks between United Nations monitors and Iranian envoys had apparently failed to break the impasse over Iran's nuclear activities and that the United Nations Security Council had no choice but to rebuke Iran.

"What is clear is that it is highly unlikely that Iran is going to accede to the demands of the international community," Ms. Rice said at the opening of a conference of envoys from NATO and the European Union. She added that "in order to be credible the Security Council of course has to act."

The United Nations' credibility is at stake, Ms. Rice said, and "it cannot have its word and its will completely ignored by a member state."

DOJ_NMG_0027262

Despite her tough words, it was far from clear whether Russia would drop its opposition to a resolution at the Security Council that would implicitly threaten sanctions. The United States wants a resolution criticizing Iran under Chapter 7 of the United Nations charter, a provision that implies that sanctions are possible if it is flouted.

Past opposition by Russia, China and others has forced the United States to back down from its demand for such a resolution, but now American and European diplomats hope that a new critical finding by the International Atomic Energy Agency will bolster support for the action it wants.

Such a report is expected Friday by the agency in Vienna. Iranian officials have been meeting with agency officials in the last few days, but they do not appear to have changed the situation, diplomats at the agency said.

Iran insists that its activities are for peaceful purposes only, and its leaders have kept up a steady volley of criticism of the United States, Europe and others suspecting it of having a weapons program, even while Iranian envoys have met with international atomic agency inspectors this week.

Ms. Rice arrived in Bulgaria Thursday afternoon after conferring with Iraqi leaders in Baghdad along with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. The occasion was a session of more than 30 envoys representing countries in both NATO, which is a military alliance, and the European Union, a political and economic body.

Though the issue of Iran was not on the formal agenda, it loomed over most other matters because of the escalating threats and Iran's defiance. Many in Europe are worried that the United States plans to carry out a military strike against Iran as it did against Iraq.

A Bulgarian journalist, citing the news that the United States and Bulgaria plan to sign a basing agreement on Friday allowing American forces to use military centers in this country, asked Ms. Rice if the agreement would require Bulgarian permission for any American troop deployment from such a base.

He did not mention Iran, but Ms. Rice felt compelled to assuage Bulgarian feelings by saying that the United States was still concentrating on getting a diplomatic or political solution to the Iran confrontation and did not contemplate military action. Any such action, she said, would be done in cooperation with Bulgaria, she said.

In a speech northwest of Tehran today, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was defiant, saying his country would not give up its right to pursue its nuclear activities, even if sanctions or other punitive measures are imposed.

"We want nuclear technology for peace and progress of nations and if some believe that they can prevent us with psychological warfare and resolutions, they are mistaken," Mr Ahmadinejad said in a speech in northwest Iran that was reported on the ISNA news agency.

"Our people have mastered the nuclear technology and no one can take it away from them," the president added.

Iran's supreme religious leader vowed Wednesday that Iran would retaliate "twofold" if it were attacked by the United States over its refusal to comply with demands regarding its nuclear activities.

"Iranian people and the Islamic regime will not invade any country, but the Americans should know that if they invade Iran, their interests around the world would be harmed," the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, told workers gathered ahead of May Day, the international workers' holiday.' "Iran will respond twofold to any attack."

Russia And China Warn UN Not To Antagonise Iran (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, April 28, 2006

Russia and China on Thursday warned against escalating the dispute over Iran's nuclear programme. The call came on the eve of an eagerly awaited report on whether the country has met United Nations demands.

The US and the European Union believe Friday's report by Mohamed El Baradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, will set the stage for a UN Security Council resolution, since there is little chance that Tehran will meet the council's demand for "full and sustained suspension" of uranium enrichment, which can produce weapons-grade material.

But on Thursday Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, warned against too great an intervention by the Security Council – a path Moscow feels could lead to confrontation.

"We think that the IAEA must continue to play a key role and it must not shrug off its responsibilities to resolve such questions and shift them on to the UN Security Council," he said at a summit with Angela Merkel, German chancellor.

European officials argue that, far from sidelining the IAEA, any action by the council would seek to bolster its authority.

The Chinese government also called for restraint. Moscow and Beijing, which have growing energy and economic links with Iran, fear that a UN resolution might be used to justify military action at a later stage.

The US has stepped up efforts to assuage such concerns. "Forcible change of the Iranian regime is not the objective of American policy," Philip Zelikow, a top adviser to US secretary of state Condoleezza Rice, told the Financial Times.

DOJ_NMG_0027263

"Right now, we haven't completed implementing a diplomatic strategy. That diplomatic strategy involves underscoring to the Iranian regime the costs of its behaviour."

US and EU diplomats hope to win Security Council backing for a resolution on Iran by mid-June. Such a resolution would not involve sanctions but would probably set out a new deadline for Iran to halt nuclear enrichment.

Mr ElBaradei has been pushing Iran for a "technical break" in uranium enrichment to allow negotiations over the nuclear programme to resume.

U.S. Looks To Turn Up Heat On Iran Nukes, But Question Is How (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, April 28, 2006

The Bush administration plans to increase pressure on Iran after today's United Nations-imposed deadline for the country to halt its uranium-enrichment program.

The diplomatic offensive could lead to limited sanctions, but there is little international consensus now for stronger measures.

The first step would be a binding resolution from the U.N. Security Council demanding that Iran end uranium enrichment, which the United States says is part of an effort to build a nuclear bomb. U.S. officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, say they will seek such a resolution next month.

Mohammed ElBaradei, the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, is to provide a report today to the Security Council that documents Iran's escalation of the uranium-enrichment program.

Iran has shown no sign of backing down. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Thursday that since Iran "has acquired nuclear fuel production technology … nobody can take it back." Iran claimed two weeks ago to have enriched uranium, a fuel that can be used for power plants or bombs. Iran says its intentions are peaceful.

There is little consensus about how to deal with Iran beyond the initial resolution. Russia and China, both of which hold veto power on the Security Council, have not yet said whether they would back even limited sanctions against Iran. "It's still too early to run ahead and say what decision we might take together," Russian President Vladimir Putin said Thursday.

Rice, in Bulgaria for a meeting with NATO foreign ministers, sidestepped questions about what Russia and China would do. "In order to be credible, the Security Council has to act," she said.

Britain, France and Germany have said they would support measures that targeted Iranian leaders.

For example, the United States and European nations might ask the Security Council to impose a ban on travel by top Iranian officials and to freeze their overseas bank accounts, said Nicholas Burns, the top U.S. diplomat dealing with the issue.

The United States might also work outside the United Nations and attempt to craft a coalition of countries to restrict arms sales and other trade and investment in Iran if the initial steps don't work. "If the Security Council cannot act over a reasonable period of time, then there will be an opportunity for groups of countries to organize themselves for the purpose of isolating the Iranians diplomatically and economically," Burns said.

The Bush administration and its European allies have ruled out broad economic restrictions that could hurt ordinary Iranians. Rice and Burns have drawn a contrast with the punishment meted out to Iraq after it invaded Kuwait in 1990. Those sanctions, which initially blocked Iraqi oil exports, were devastating to most Iraqis but left the regime of Saddam Hussein intact.

Burns said last week that U.N. diplomacy would unfold over several months. He said he expects Iran to be "the leading issue to be discussed" when the leaders of top industrialized democracies plus Russia meet in July.

The rising price of oil is complicating U.S. efforts to pressure Iran, said Cliff Kupchan, an Iran and Russia expert at the Eurasia Group, a political consulting firm based in New York.

Iran produces 4 million barrels of oil a day, about 5% of the world's total, Kupchan said. Europe and China fear that pressure on Iran will lead to higher energy prices, he said. Those fears would make them reluctant to support sanctions, he said.

"The Iranians are holding a very strong hand at the moment," Kupchan said.

Rice Calls On U.N. To Get Tough On Iran (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

SOFIA, Bulgaria — On the eve of a United Nations deadline for Iran to halt uranium enrichment, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Thursday called for diplomatic action against Tehran, warning that the U.N. Security Council cannot permit the regime to "simply ignore its will and its word."

Rice, appearing at a NATO meeting, said Iran probably would ignore a deadline set for today by the United Nations watchdog agency for a halt to enrichment. When the International Atomic Energy Agency reports this failure, she said, the council must ask itself whether it will remain credible if it allows Iran to "simply flout the will of the international community" without penalty.

As the most important world security institution, the Security Council "cannot have its will and its word simply ignored by a member state," she declared.

Iran says it is seeking the ability to enrich uranium to supply its civilian power plants. The Bush administration believes Iran wants to develop nuclear weapons, and it has been trying to build international pressure on the regime as the deadline has approached.

The United States, Britain and France would like a U.N. resolution that would make compliance to the U.N. demands compulsory and could open the way for sanctions.

But countries such as Russia and China have appeared unwilling to accept tougher language, or sanctions against Iran, and top Iranian officials have defiantly declared all week that they will not comply.

Rice sought to enlist more support this week as she met with leaders in Greece and Turkey and, on Thursday, with top officials from the 26-member North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Though the alliance has taken no position on the issue, Rice discussed Iran's nuclear ambitions with officials of other NATO member nations over dinner.

But there have been signs all week that many countries are not fully convinced, and some fear that if diplomacy fails, the Bush administration will turn to military action, as it did three years ago in the case of Iraq.

Earlier in the week, Greek and Turkish officials told Rice that they were worried that the U.S. would be asking for use of their territory or other help in military action against Tehran. On Thursday, Rice sought to allay similar concerns that the Bush administration might cite a just-completed defense accord with Bulgaria to justify using military bases here for an attack on Iran.

"Let me go right to the heart of this question, because I know this is on people's minds," Rice said at a news conference. Although President Bush "doesn't take any of his options off the table," she said, referring to military action, "we are committed to a diplomatic course" to bring enough pressure on Iran to compel it to give up its nuclear weapons ambitions.

The agreement with Bulgaria, which is to be signed today, will allow the U.S. military to have as many as 2,500 troops at a time on Bulgarian soil. On Thursday, a Bulgarian national party called Attack organized a rally against the deal, drawing several thousand protesters in Sofia, the capital.

The demonstrators waved banners that read, "Condi, ask the Bulgarian people," and "U.S. bases war." Rice's visits in Athens and Ankara, Turkey's capital, also drew protesters.

Meanwhile, an Iranian exile group claimed that Tehran was working at secret military sites to develop a type of centrifuge machine that would enable it to make fuel for an atom bomb faster than current estimates.

The National Council of Resistance of Iran, which has reported accurately on hidden Iranian nuclear sites in the past, told Reuters news service that Tehran was researching "P-2" centrifuges in secret areas of its Natanz enrichment plant and the Ab-Ali site near Tehran. The group, which is on a U.S. list of terrorist groups, said both areas were linked to Iran's Defense Ministry. Tehran says its nuclear program is only for generating electricity and has no links to the military.

Germany Suggests U.S-Iran Nuclear Talks (AP)

By Paul Ames, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 28, 2006

Germany's foreign minister suggested Thursday that the United States and Iran could hold direct discussions on the Islamic republic's nuclear standoff with the West if Tehran agrees to talk to Washington about the chaos in Iraq.

The United States, which has no diplomatic relations with Iran, said in March that it was ready to talk to Tehran about calming the unrest in Iraq. Iranian and U.S. officials have insisted the talks will deal only with Iraq, and President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad this week questioned even the need for those discussions.

"If there are talks with Iran anyway on the situation in Iraq, then nobody would understand if the current central issue in world politics would not come up," German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, told reporters on the sidelines of a NATO meeting.

Steinmeier has suggested direct talks before, but the U.S. has not favored taking up the nuclear issue directly with Tehran, preferring to work through the United Nations.

European negotiations with Iran, led by Germany, France and Britain, have failed to persuade Iran to stop enriching uranium — which can be used to fuel peaceful reactors or make bombs — and meet other international demands.

The Iran question was not on the official agenda of the NATO foreign ministers' meeting, but, on the eve of a U.N. deadline for Tehran to halt enrichment, it was to be discussed at an informal dinner bringing together NATO and European Union nations.

"We have to do everything we can to stop the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction," said NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said before the meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0027265

The United States, France and Britain say if Iran does not meet Friday's U.N. Security Council deadline, they will seek to make the demand to halt enrichment compulsory — despite opposition from Russia and China, the other two veto-wielding council members. The three Western nations also have warned that noncompliance could lead to sanctions, but other allies are wary.

Steinmeier said he still hoped for a negotiated solution, but insisted Iran "must dissolve the suspicion that it uses its civil nuclear program for the development of weapons."

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov is due to join the NATO talks Friday, ahead of a scheduled presentation to the Security Council by Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, on Iran's compliance with its demands.

The opening session of the NATO meeting Thursday focused on bids by Ukraine, Georgia, Albania, Croatia and Macedonia to join the alliance. De Hoop Scheffer has said a final decision was unlikely before 2008.

Further expansion of the Western alliance in the former Soviet bloc would face opposition, which has complained that the entry of Ukraine and Georgia would be "highly painful" for Moscow, and could call international arms agreements into question and provoke a reorganization of Russia's armed forces.

Several thousand Bulgarians, meanwhile, joined an ultranationalist demonstration close to the NATO meeting against an agreement Rice is due to sign Friday with Bulgaria. It grants U.S. troops access to use military facilities in the country. The deal is part of a strategy of shifting troops to based in Europe farther east and will deploy up to 2,500 U.S. troops to Bulgaria.

Thursday's meeting also discussed proposals for NATO to develop closer ties with other democracies including Australia, Japan, New Zealand and South Korea to coordinate political positions and peacekeeping operations.

On Friday, Rice is expected to push NATO allies for more robust support for African peacekeepers struggling to end political and ethnic strife in Sudan's Darfur region. Ministers will also discuss the expanding NATO mission in Afghanistan, which is moving into the country's volatile southern region in the face of mounting attacks blamed on remnants of the ousted Taliban regime.

Rice Says U.N. Must Act On Iran Nuke Plan (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, April 28, 2006

Iran seems determined to defy international demands to control its disputed nuclear program, so it is time for the U.N. Security Council to act, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday.

"Is the Security Council going to be credible?" Rice asked after meetings with NATO foreign ministers.

Tehran faces a Friday deadline from the Security Council to stop enriching uranium, a process that can lead either to nuclear power for electricity or to development of weapons. "It's pretty clear Iran is not going to meet those requirements," Rice said. "When that happens the international community, represented by the Security Council, is going to have a choice."

Quick action by the council to impose economic or punitive sanctions seems remote because of splits among its members. The United States is pressing for a strong response and Rice wants such steps to remain an option.

The United States and European allies accuse Iran of hiding ambitions to build a bomb behind a legitimate energy program. Iran denies it but says it must retain control of sensitive nuclear technology, including uranium enrichment.

The United States has long sought the Security Council review now under way, but the powerful U.N. body is divided over what to do next.

Russia and China, both veto-wielding permanent members of the Security Council, oppose sanctions against Iran. The United States, France and Britain say if Tehran does not meet the deadline, they will make the enrichment demand and other conditions compulsory.

"In order to be credible the Security Council has to act," Rice told reporters at the NATO session. "The Security Council is the primary and most important institution for the maintenance of peace and stability and security and it cannot have its word and its will simply ignored by a member state."

U.S. diplomats are gauging support in Europe for another course: A network of independent sanctions and restrictions, such as a travel ban on Iranian leaders, that might persuade the clerical leadership to back down.

Many European countries have already indicated a willingness to take such measures on their own, such as asset seizures and potential export bans.

The U.S. already has a near total ban on economic and diplomatic contact with Iran, but European nations and Russia maintain broad ties. Russia is a major commercial partner of Tehran, including exporting its oil.

Earlier Thursday, Russian President Vladimir Putin said the Security Council should not assume responsibility for the Iranian nuclear issue.

DOJ_NMG_0027266

"It's still too early to run ahead and say what decision we might take together," he said. "The main thing is ... that whatever decision is taken is a consensus decision."

Rice was making the case for continued pressure as part of two days of meetings with European colleagues that followed her unannounced trip to Iraq this week. In Baghdad, Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld endorsed newly selected Iraqi leaders who the United States hopes can regain traction against a violent insurgency and spreading sectarian killings.

Rice tried to reassure Europeans that the United States is not planning military action against Iran.

"I have been talking with my colleagues around the world about the diplomatic agenda regarding Iran," Rice said. "The president of the United States doesn't take any of his options off the table but we are committed to a diplomatic course" that should succeed "with enough unity and with enough strength and enough common purpose."

Iran Gets First North Korean-Made Missiles (AP)

By Aron Heller

AP, April 27, 2006

Iran has received its first batch of North Korean-made surface-to-surface missiles that put European countries within firing range, Israel's military intelligence chief said in an interview published Thursday.

The BM-25 missiles have a range of 1,550 miles and are capable of carrying nuclear warheads, the Haaretz daily reported.

The report came as U.N. members consider slapping sanctions on Iran for refusing to halt its uranium enrichment. The United States, Israel and other Western countries say Iran is trying to get nuclear arms, but the Islamic regime says its atomic program is for civilian purposes only.

The U.N. Security Council has given Iran until Friday to stop enriching uranium, a necessary step for developing nuclear weapons. Should Iran refuse to comply, which it has indicated it will do, the Security Council is likely to consider taking punitive measures.

Israeli security officials confirmed the Haaretz report. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak to the media.

Military intelligence chief Maj. Gen. Amos Yadlin, who spoke to Haaretz, has warned of the new Iranian missiles in several recent interviews to the media. Iran already has missiles capable of reaching Israel, but the BM-25s are a significant upgrade over its existing top-of-the-line missiles — the Shihab-4 and Shihab-3.

Those missiles spurred Israel to develop its Arrow-2 anti-ballistic missile system, which is can intercept the Iranian missiles.

Israeli concerns have been heightened in recent months by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's calls to wipe Israel "off the map."

Iran has also tested several long-range missiles in recent weeks, including a "top secret" missile capable of being fired from helicopters and jet fighters, Iranian state-run television reported.

Iran also tested the Fajr-3, a missile it said can avoid radar and hit several targets simultaneously using multiple warheads. Iran also tested what it calls two new torpedoes.

U.S. intelligence officials have said that Iran is at an advanced stage of developing a missile that can carry a nuclear warhead. The United States has informed the International Atomic Energy Agency of the details of the Iranian missile program.

On Tuesday, an Israeli satellite meant to spy on Iran's nuclear program was launched by Russia. The satellite is designed to spot images on the ground as small as 27 1/2 inches, an Israeli defense official said.

Israel Raises Profile In Iran Fray (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, April 28, 2006

JERUSALEM - Amid the soaring rhetoric over Western efforts to curb Iran's nuclear program, Israel has been moving into a more proactive position in the campaign to contain Tehran.

This week, Israel launched a satellite to spy on Iran, and its leaders have called on the international community to stop that country from acquiring nuclear weapons. It also accused Tehran of backing Palestinian terrorists.

And as concern here grows over Iran's defiant nuclear drive, one of Israel's leading newspapers reported Thursday that Iran has purchased ground-to-ground missiles from North Korea, extending its range for delivering warheads.

"The Israelis are making a statement that Israel has its own ways and means of defending itself," says Meir Javedanfar, an Iranian-born Middle East analyst based in Tel Aviv.

Given the charged atmosphere in the region, many have questioned whether Israel, which maintains its own unofficial nuclear program, would make some kind of "preemptive strike" on Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0027267

In 1981, Israel struck the nuclear reactor Iraq was developing, known as Osirak. Though criticized at the time, Israeli officials say they were later thanked for neutralizing Iraq's nuclear capabilities.

Today, however, the Middle East is quite different, say analysts and officials here, and Iran's pursuit to enrich uranium, which it says is for peaceful purposes, is seen as an international issue, not a local one.

Somewhat akin to years of crisis over Iraq's weapons program, Israel has been encouraged to take a backseat in the standoff with Iran. In 1991, Israel complied with US requests not to respond to Iraqi missile attacks. Through quieter channels, however, Israel has long been making the case against an armed Iran.

But, analysts say, recent changes in the region have led to a more vocal Israel, from US frustration with Iran's meddling in Iraq to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's inflammatory statements - he calls for Israel to be destroyed and denies the Holocaust occurred.

"The Israeli government before the elections was taking a more moderate line. It was an uncertain period: Ariel Sharon was sick, elections were looming," says Mr. Javenanfar, the director of Meepas, a political analysis company. "[Prime Minister Ehud] Olmert feels more secure now and feels that the international community is standing by Israel. This wasn't so much the case during the intifada, but it's changing, particularly since Iran was given a 30-day period to stop uranium enrichment and they say they won't."

Those 30 days end Friday, the deadline for the International Atomic Energy Agency to submit its report on Iran to the UN Security Council. The report is expected to be highly critical of Iran for refusing the council's request to freeze uranium enrichment.

While Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev says Israel has no interest in a one-on-one confrontation with Iran, he says, "We do have clear concerns. We are supporting united, international efforts on this issue."

The launch of the Eros-B spy satellite by Israel Aircraft Industries on Tuesday, Mr. Regev says, is a part of a long-term intelligence effort that is not tied to recent tension. And some of the official statements made about Iran during the course of the week were issued as part of Holocaust Remembrance Day. It is a day when Israelis reflect on their survival, and this year conversations often turned to Ahmadinejad's threats from the east.

"I call on the Western world to not stand silently in the face of the nations that are trying to acquire nuclear weapons and [who] preach the destruction of the State of Israel," Israeli President Moshe Katsav said in his annual address at the country's main Holocaust museum and memorial, Yad Vashem.

On the same day, Israel's outgoing defense minister, Shaul Mofaz, said that Iran had given close to $10 million to "terror groups" operating in the Palestinian territories since the start of the year. He also suggested that more should be done to encourage the demise of the current regime.

"The Iranian people need to know that the regime's efforts to lead global terror will negatively affect them," Mr. Mofaz said at the opening of the Center for Iranian studies at Tel Aviv University. "More can be done from outside Iran to raise the Iranian people's awareness that the current regime will bring destruction on them." Both Mofaz and Katsav are Iranian-born Israelis.

Thursday's report in the newspaper Haaretz, which said that Iran had acquired a ground-to-ground missile with a range of about 1,560 miles was viewed here as fresh proof that Iran's atomic program is not simply aimed at creating nuclear energy for civilian uses.

"The problem is Tehran is not just a nuclear power, but that they're working on delivery systems," says Regev, of the Foreign Ministry. "With the parallel track on their delivery systems, we can see that their program is not benign."

Gary Sick, an expert on Iranian affairs at Columbia University School of International and Public Affairs, says that both the Iranians and Israelis have made statements recently that have turned up the heat to uncomfortable levels.

He aruges that the West's pursuit of a military option can only make things worse. "If there were a strike of some sort against Iran, it would certainly drive them underground, make them become more secretive, and they would drop out of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Iran will say, 'We weren't planning a bomb before, but now we have no choice,' " Dr. Sick says.

"What I do worry about in this whole process," he adds, "is that there will be some unexplained incident that happens deliberately or not deliberately, that will be perceived wrongly by one side or the other - that's how WWI got started."

Pakistan Official: No Force Against Iran (AP-)

By Barry Schweid

AP, April 27, 2006

Pakistan notified the Bush administration on Thursday it would not support the use of force to halt Iran's nuclear programs.

"We are against any resort to force," Foreign Secretary Riaz Khan said after a meeting with Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns.

"We want this issue resolved diplomatically," Khan said.

DOJ_NMG_0027268

Pakistan is a close ally of the United States in trying to counter terror and in promoting postwar stability in Afghanistan.

It is also a neighbor of Iran. "We want friendly relations with Iran. Pakistan has had a long-standing relationship with Iran," Khan said. "We wish them well, and all of our neighbors."

The U.S.-Pakistan meeting was designed to strengthen ties between the two countries in the wake of a U.S. decision to provide India with nuclear technology.

Burns said the Bush administration has good relations with both countries.

Responding at a joint news conference to Khan's statements on Iran, Burns said, "We have not given up hope there can be a diplomatic solution."

The Bush administration accuses Iran of trying to develop nuclear weapons. While President Bush has emphasized his preference for a diplomatic solution, he has also said the military option has not been taken off the table.

Meanwhile, Burns announced that Congress would be informed shortly that the United States intends to proceed with the sale of F-16 fighter jets to Pakistan. Congressional approval is required.

Khan said he did not know how many planes Pakistan would purchase. But he said due to strained resources following a devastating earthquake last year, Pakistan had scaled down its request and that used planes would be substituted for some of the new ones.

India, which depends on aging Russian planes for its air force, has expressed disappointment with the long-brewing weapons sale to Pakistan.

The two nuclear-armed neighbor countries have been rivals for decades, and have fought three wars since their independence from Britain in 1947.

Iran's Latest (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

A funny thing happened on the way to the Iranian bomb: The more alarming the mullahs' behavior, the more nonchalant the rest of the world seems to be about it. But one development may give even the most adamant pooh-poohers pause.

Just this month, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad announced that Iran had enriched uranium to reactor-grade levels in a 164-centrifuge cascade, a major technical achievement that puts Iran within hopping distance of an actual bomb. Mr. Ahmadinejad followed this up by announcing that Iran was working on an advanced centrifuge of Pakistani design, the possession of which Iran had previously denied to inspectors of the International Atomic Energy Agency. These centrifuges are capable of enriching uranium at four times the rate of Iran's declared centrifuges.

Next, Iran rebuffed IAEA requests to inspect the new centrifuges, a violation of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty to which Iran is a signatory. Iran then threatened to withdraw from the NPT altogether if the United Nations imposed sanctions for its violations thereof. The U.N. Security Council has imposed a deadline of today for Iran to stop enriching uranium.

Tehran states flatly that it will ignore it. Israeli intelligence also reports this week that Iran has purchased an upgraded version of the Soviet SS-6 ballistic missile from North Korea, which is capable of carrying a nuclear payload and has a range of about 1,600 miles, putting parts of Europe well within range. The threat seems all the more pressing following warnings Wednesday by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's Supreme Leader, that Iran would attack U.S. interests "in every possible part of the world" if the U.S. launches air strikes against Iran's nuclear sites.

And the international community's response? Russia and China, both veto-wielding members of the Security Council, are adamantly opposed to U.N. sanctions on Iran. Their view is mainly shared by Richard Lugar, Chairman of the Senate Foreign Committee, who thinks President Bush "ought to cool this one" by negotiating directly with Tehran.

In Europe, British Foreign Minister Jack Straw has reportedly told Cabinet colleagues that it would be "illegal" for Britain to participate in any prospective military action against Iran. German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier agrees: "We will not stop Iran with war," he recently told the news weekly Der Spiegel.

Which brings us to Iran's latest. On Tuesday, the Associated Press reported that Mr. Khamenei offered to share the nuclear genie with the government of Sudan. "The Islamic Republic of Iran is prepared to transfer the experience, knowledge and technology of its scientists," Mr. Khamenei told visiting Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir. Mr. Bashir, whose government abets the massacre of Darfuris, says Sudan could use a nuclear reactor to generate electricity. Uh huh.

How so many apparently thoughtful people can face the idea of an Iranian bomb with relative equanimity remains a mystery to us. Whether they are as "cool" with the idea of fissile material in Mr. Bashir's hands is another matter. Whatever the case, they should consider that acquiescing to a bomb for Iran may also mean agreeing to one for many more of the world's worst actors.

NATO To Intensify Its Role In Sudan's Darfur Region (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0027269

By Nicholas Kralev
The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

SOFIA, Bulgaria -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that NATO leaders have agreed to take on a more "robust" role in Sudan's Darfur region and urged other international bodies to prepare the way.

NATO diplomats said that earlier disagreements among the allies over involvement in Darfur had been resolved, but impediments remained, such as the Sudanese government's objection to a U.N. peacekeeping mission.

"Everybody recognizes that the [African Union] mission, while it has been successful thus far, is not robust enough to deal with the continued violence in Darfur and, particularly, problems that are emerging in western Darfur given the situation and problems on the border with Chad," Miss Rice said.

In Washington, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "An unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security and foreign policy of the United States is posed by the persistence of violence in Sudan's Darfur region, particularly against civilians."

Miss Rice, speaking to reporters after a meeting of the 26 NATO foreign ministers in Sofia, the Bulgarian capital, said that "NATO is ready to work" with the United Nations and the African Union (AU) "to try to bring about that more robust mission."

"There are certain kinds of support that are needed by [the AU] mission and that will be needed by the U.N. mission, and I would hope that everyone would put aside whatever constraints there are, so that we can respond to what is a really quite difficult humanitarian and security situation in Darfur," she said.

NATO currently provides limited assistance for the AU with transportation of troops, but U.S. officials said the alliance could help with logistics, communications, intelligence and other areas, while stopping short of intervening on the ground.

A senior U.S. official said that NATO would be "enabling collaborative efforts" of other international players and cannot do much before they make the first steps.

"We have to be able to get into Sudan," the official said, alluding to Sudan's refusal to let U.N. peacekeepers in.

Hedi Annabi, U.N. assistant secretary-general for peacekeeping, said yesterday that, even though Sudan is not in favor of a U.N. takeover from the AU, it is willing to discuss how the world organization could help if a peace deal is reached to end the conflict.

The 7,000 AU troops in Darfur are poorly equipped and have not been able to stop the violence that has taken hundreds of thousands of lives and forced more than 2 million to leave their homes.

The AU Peace and Security Council has agreed in principle to hand over peacekeeping to the United Nations after its mandate ends Sept. 30, but the full union must give final approval.

On Tuesday, the U.N. Security Council adopted a resolution imposing sanctions on individuals deemed at least partly responsible for the Darfur crisis.

Sudan has supported Janjaweed militias, which are massacring innocents in response to a revolt by two militias in its western region.

As part of the resolution's implementation, President Bush yesterday issued an executive order freezing the assets of such individuals.

"These sanctions are aimed at those responsible for heinous actions being committed in Darfur," Mr. McClellan said.

"The United States will continue to work with its international partners to provide humanitarian assistance, support human rights and bring peace to Darfur."

The crisis has forced Chad to seal its border with Darfur, which is threatening food deliveries to 400,000 displaced people.

Rebels' Arms Made In China (WT)

By Daniel Pepper
The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

ALONG THE CHAD-SUDAN BORDER -- Many of the weapons used by Chadian rebels who nearly overthrew the government this month -- from the ubiquitous Kalashnikov rifles and rocket-propelled grenades to more advanced artillery pieces mounted on Toyota Land Cruisers -- come from China, probably indirectly through Sudan.

Chadian President Idriss Deby and international relief groups were quick to accuse Sudan of promoting the attack two weeks ago on the capital, N'Djamena, by about 350 rebels, who fought to within a few miles of the city before being turned back. But China's insatiable appetite for oil to feed its economic growth gave Beijing an interest in the outcome as well.

The Chadian rebels' weapons, viewed by a reporter during a rare visit to their bases along the 800-mile Chad-Sudan border, were traced to Chinese state-owned arms manufacturers, with the aid of an arms-monitoring-group based in Manchester, England, that used a sampling of serial numbers on the munitions.

"Chinese firms from the People's Republic [of China] have been providing a range of large and small arms to African armed forces regardless of their persistent grave human rights violations, especially to countries with oil deposits, such as Sudan, or valuable natural resources, such as Liberia," said Brian Wood, the head of arms research at Amnesty International. "Rebel groups in Africa have also received Chinese arms, for example, in Angola and" the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

According to the Chinese government's regulations governing arms exports, any sales to foreign countries must "not upset regional or global peace, security and stability" and "must be for the legitimate self-defense of the recipient country." The acquisition of these weapons by the Chadian rebels contravenes both criteria.

An official at China's arms-control department referred all questions to a spokesman who did not return phone calls.

China is one of the largest suppliers of arms to Sudan, Africa's largest country, which has tense relations with Chad. And China is heavily invested in Sudan's oil sector, with more than 10,000 workers and $3 billion spent on its oil sector since 1999.

Relations between Chad and Sudan have been soured in part by the Chadian president's provision since 2003 of arms, ammunition and safe passage through Chad for the Sudan Liberation Army and other rebels fighting in Sudan's Darfur region. The Sudanese government appears to be retaliating by providing similar aid to the Chadian rebels.

Chad, besides being last on Transparency International's 2005 corruption index, is Africa's newest petro-state, with proven recoverable oil reserves estimated at about 1 billion barrels. But China, whose thirst for oil has made it a presence in Sudan and other African oil states, so far lacks a foothold in Chad. Chad maintains diplomatic relations with the Republic of China, or Taiwan, which Beijing considers part of China.

It does have a relationship, however, with the leader of the Chadian rebels, Muhammad Nour, who worked as a consultant to various Chinese oil companies exploring business opportunities in West Africa in the 1990s, and maintains close relations with his former clients, whom he will not identify. Mr. Nour's brother, a close adviser, recently returned from a three-week trip to China, which he said was "for health purposes."

In an interview at his military encampment set along a dry riverbed near the border, Mr. Nour rejected the notion that his fighting force had any direct relationship with China.

"There is no relationship between us and the Chinese state. But they are being prudent," the rebel leader said.

Joshua Eisenman, a fellow in Asia studies at the American Foreign Policy Council, said China could be driven by its rivalry with Taiwan for friendly votes at the United Nations and other international organizations.

"China will encourage and seize any homegrown opportunity to further isolate Taiwan in Africa," he said. "I doubt Beijing would seek to topple a government just to undermine Taiwan; but if a Taiwan-friendly African government falls, it's icing on the cake for Beijing."

Conflict Stirs Up Confusion On Border Of Chad, Sudan (WP)

By Emily Wax

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

KOUKOU ANGARANA, Chad -- In this desolate, sand-blown desert region of Chad near the Sudanese border, civilians are caught in a conflict so confusing that they -- and even the combatants -- have trouble telling who is fighting whom.

Or exactly why.

Chadian government troops are posted at key points along the border to halt what they say is a revolt by rebels based in Sudan. The soldiers wear red armbands to set them apart from the rebels, who wear similar uniforms and have an equally aggressive driving style, roaring through villages in pickup trucks, leaving behind clouds of billowing dust.

The insurgents, who are fighting to topple Chadian President Idriss Deby, represent at least 12 groups united under several coalitions. To make matters even more dizzying, some of them are Deby's estranged relatives, including a set of twin nephews.

Chad blames the Sudanese, saying they back the insurrection, an allegation that Sudan denies. An African Union investigation found this week that many of the captured attackers who invaded the capital April 13 had Sudanese and Central African Republic identification and said they were conscripted to fight by Sudan, which Sudan denies.

Sudan blames the Chadians, saying they support a different group of rebels in the Darfur region of western Sudan, some of whom have offices and villas in Chad's capital, N'Djamena.

And Chadians tend to blame France, Chad's former colonial power, which they accuse of being involved in the violence by backing the president.

Here in the inhospitable, rugged and lunar-like terrain of eastern Chad, where refugees huddle under thorn trees, two things are certain: The chaos in Darfur has extended deep into Chad, and a rapidly increasing number of civilians continue to suffer in one of Africa's most complex crises.

DOJ_NMG_0027271

Across Africa, conflicts tend to spill across national borders and destabilize entire regions. Fighting in the central African country of Congo, for example, has flared off and on for about a decade, at times drawing in more than a dozen rebel groups backed by several neighboring countries.

Rebels in northern Uganda have been backed by Sudan as payback for Uganda's support of rebels in southern Sudan who were fighting the Sudanese government. The war in the 1990s in Sierra Leone spread into Liberia and Ivory Coast.

"For me, Darfur has become like West Africa and eastern Congo, where the war is exported and the region is inflamed and flowing over borders," said Olivier Bercault, a researcher with Human Rights Watch who was visiting N'Djamena this week. "It's just very sad for the civilians caught up in it all."

About two weeks ago, rebels drove across the vast desert toward N'Djamena. A French warplane fired warning shots at the rebels on April 13 as they marched into the city, where government troops thwarted the coup attempt. By the end of the day, more than 350 people were dead.

In Koukou Angarana, about 50 miles from the Sudanese border, witnesses said the rebels briefly stopped in the trading town on their way to the capital, killing one police officer and injuring two others. The rebels kidnapped 12 police officers and forestry service workers, local leaders said, and demanded satellite phones from U.N. workers.

The raid stunned the townspeople, who in recent months have been attacked by what they believed were Janjaweed, or militiamen backed by the Sudanese government.

"Were these rebels Chadians? Were they Janjaweed?" said Ibrahum Abdul Majaid, who witnessed the violence. "Maybe they were hired by the Sudanese government."

"There was also a Libyan, perhaps just a mercenary," added Philomena Santoro, who works for INTERSOS, an Italian humanitarian group that provides water and food to the refugee camps in the area. "Then again, maybe some of them were just bandits. We have a lot of that here in the lawless border, too."

The violence in Darfur has displaced more than 2 million civilians and forced nearly 250,000 into Chad. Tens of thousands of people have died in the conflict.

While the Bush administration labeled the atrocities in Darfur a genocide nearly two years ago, no solution has been found to stem the violence, an example of the world's inability to solve such crises, experts and human rights activists said.

The United States has proposed sending several hundred NATO advisers to support an African Union peacekeeping mission in Darfur. Sudan has rejected the idea as a Western invasion of a Muslim country, and some leaders have likened the scenario to the situation in Iraq. On Sunday, Osama bin Laden called for an Islamic holy war in Sudan, saying fighters should rise up against a Western peacekeeping force that would be sent to Darfur to protect African Muslims against government-backed Arab and Muslim fighters.

The U.S. ambassador to Chad, Marc M. Wall, visited this border town Wednesday to reassure the population of the U.S. commitment to protecting them and to deciphering the situation. Chadian military officials told Wall that some of the rebels who drove through the town last week wore Sudanese government uniforms and did not speak French, as Chadians do.

"Information of aid, indirect or direct, by Sudan is troubling to us," Wall told a group of local leaders, adding that the situation was "fragile and dangerous."

Many Chadians helped shelter Sudanese refugees, but the violence has pushed about 60,000 Chadians off their farms.

The devastation and suffering were in full view for Wall as he walked through the sand past a long row of thorn trees where Chadian women and children were living in the open air. Teapots hung from branches, and sweaty infants with blank stares sat in the sand in the hot sun.

"We are so confused. Who is rebel? Who is Janjaweed?" said Halima Mohamed, 25, a displaced Chadian, who was cradling a relative's baby under a tree with other women forced from their village five miles from the Sudanese border. "It's all mixed. Sudan's troubles have come here. We don't know when it will end. I don't feel safe."

Humanitarian workers from the Office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees said some of the Chadians want to live in the refugee camps. But because they are displaced people in their own country, they cannot be classified as refugees.

"If it wasn't totally out of control before, it certainly is now," Matthew Conway, a UNHCR spokesman, said as he looked at a group of Chadians living under trees. "There are many who have been seriously attacked. There is also a very poor population who may come in and want even a bowl or a plastic mat or bucket to help improve their lives."

Meanwhile, the Sudanese refugees, whose villages were burned when the Darfur conflict began, wonder where they can go next.

"What are we going to do now?" asked Fatih Younis Haroon, 39, a former clerk who fled Darfur two years ago with his five children.

While the civilians languish in misery, the war has entered the digital revolution. Rebels prefer a text message 15 minutes before arranging a satellite phone interview, and their plans are posted on a Web site in French.

DOJ_NMG_0027272

The rebel commanders issue orders from satellite phones in Sudan, while the high-ranking leaders dash off daily e-mails from hideaways in Paris. One of Deby's nephews, Tom Erdimi, who had a falling out with the president last year, organizes a separate rebel movement from his house in Texas.

Chadian human rights groups say Deby is using the rebel attack to distract attention from serious domestic issues of corruption and desperate poverty. In an interview at his campaign headquarters, the president said the word "rebel" should not be used to characterize his opponents.

"Sudan mercenaries are what they are," he said. "There is not a rebellion in Chad. This is an invasion by Sudan."

Deby, who is seeking to extend his 16-year rule in elections May 3, said Chad was not experiencing any internal problems and denied any disputes within his family. "Sudan wants to export its fundamentalism and genocide to Chad and the whole of central Africa," he said.

Rebel leaders acknowledge that they are operating from Darfur. Some of the rebels arrested after their coup attempt told African Union investigators Sunday that one of the main Chadian rebel leaders, Mahamat Nour, an ex-army captain, was recruiting young boys from refugee camps in Darfur and fighters from Central African Republic.

"The Sudanese do not disturb us," Albissaty Saleh Allazam, a spokesman for an umbrella rebel group, wrote in an e-mail. "Because Sudan lost assurance in Deby who created part of the conflict of Darfur. In a word, Sudan chose neutrality. If neutrality means support, so, Sudan backed us."

The villagers along the border worry that the rebels, the Janjaweed, bandits or mercenaries will attack again, but they say their village has always been vulnerable to such violence. Koukou Angarana, translated loosely, means, "Your grandmother is telling you to watch out, take care." The border between Sudan and Chad, they say, is a very dangerous place.

Blowback In Africa (NYT)

By Raffi Khatchadourian

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

EVER since Chad gained independence 46 years ago, it has been a world-class model of political dysfunction. In the 1970's, Chad's president, François Tombalbaye, compelled civil servants to renounce Western customs, undergo a tribal initiation rite known as yondo and profess belief in a nationalist creed he called Chaditude. He was executed in 1975. In the 1980's, a rebel leader named Hissène Habré led an army to the presidential palace and seized power. He became known as the "African Pinochet" and murderously pursued opponents for nearly a decade.

In 1990, Mr. Habré was chased out by an armed faction led by Chad's current president, Idriss Déby. Now Mr. Déby is facing his own rebellion.

Americans might dismiss this numbing cycle of coups as esoteric history belonging to a troubled and distant country. They shouldn't. The C.I.A. armed Mr. Habré for years, and since 2003, the United States military has been training and equipping Mr. Déby's army, making his fight to stay in office our fight, too.

Last year, Chad took part in a vast, international military exercise organized by the United States — the largest exercise of its kind in Africa since World War II, according to the Defense Department. This summer, American forces will continue to advise Chadian soldiers, and Congress is expected to allocate $500 million for a five-year program to train and equip several Saharan armies — including Mr. Déby's.

The military hopes these initiatives will help contain the threat of terrorism by bringing order to the Great Desert and its borderlands. For centuries, the Sahara has been a lawless realm, and with millions of Muslims living across the region in isolated communities, counterterrorism officials fear that Islamic militants may seek sanctuary there.

But dispensing military aid to Chad now — with Mr. Déby fighting hundreds of rebels backed by Sudan — seems reckless. It puts American military equipment and expertise in the hands of a desperate dictator. Worse still, it risks pouring additional fuel into the human furnace of Darfur, and it may well come to impede the careful diplomatic work required to solve that crisis.

So far, American officials have made much of Sudanese assistance to the rebels, framing the recent conflict in Chad as an outgrowth of the tragedy in Darfur. There is some truth to this. But the violence in Chad also has its own political narrative. During his 16 years in power, Mr. Déby has ruled Chad brutally. His security forces have committed torture, rapes, summary executions and mass killings.

Mr. Déby is a member of the Zaghawa — a northern tribe making up roughly 5 percent of Chad's population — and last year the State Department described his regime as a Zaghawa oligarchy shielded by a security and intelligence apparatus that violates human rights with impunity. In 2004, Mr. Déby altered Chad's Constitution to grant himself another term in office. Elections are scheduled for next Wednesday. There is little likelihood they will be fair.

Only one compelling argument exists for giving Chad military aid, and it follows from the logic of lesser evils. Many of the refugees fleeing Darfur are Zaghawa, and Mr. Déby has taken them in. If his regime collapses, tens of thousands of people will once again be at the mercy of Sudan's janjaweed marauders, and the genocide may spread.

This argument, though, is complicated by another unsettling development. In recent months, scores of Chadian soldiers have defected to the rebel militias. If the defections continue, they raise the horrific possibility that American military equipment and expertise could end up going to men aligned with the janjaweed. In that case, our military assistance to Chad, far from containing political anarchy, would only add to it.

Opposition Leader In Belarus Jailed Over Rally Against President (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

New York Times, April 28, 2006

MOSCOW, April 27 — The authorities in Belarus arrested the country's main opposition leader on Thursday and swiftly sentenced him to 15 days behind bars, accusing him of participating in an unauthorized rally the day before against President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko.

The arrest of the opposition leader, Aleksandr Milinkevich, who challenged Mr. Lukashenko in the presidential election last month, intensified a crackdown on political opponents in the wake of unusually strong public protests against a vote denounced as a fraud. Mr. Milinkevich, 57, a former physics professor, had been warned many times but until now had not been imprisoned.

Another opposition politician, Vintsuk Vyachorka of the Belarussian National Front, was arrested Wednesday after thousands rallied on the 20th anniversary of the accident at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant, which sent radioactive waste across Belarus. The date has in recent years been marked in Belarus by protests against Mr. Lukashenko's authoritarian rule.

Two other political leaders, Sergei Kalyakin of the Communist Party and Aleksandr I. Bukhvostov of the Labor Party, were arrested Thursday in what appeared to be a sweep against Mr. Lukashenko's critics.

The European Union and the United States have sharply criticized the postelection arrests. Each has imposed travel restrictions on Mr. Lukashenko and on 30 other officials in retaliation for what Western officials called electoral fraud and subsequent repressive measures against the opposition.

In Sofia, Bulgaria's capital, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice assailed the arrest of Mr. Milinkevich as "reprehensible," saying that "the United States roundly condemns this act and sincerely hopes that the Belarus government accepts the will of the international community that it act in accordance with accepted international principles in the treatment of political opposition."

The NATO secretary general, Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, condemned the arrest as antidemocratic on behalf of the NATO and European Union envoys meeting in Sofia. He called on the government of Belarus to release Mr. Milinkevich immediately "and to refrain from these kinds of actions."

"I think the Euro-Atlantic community cannot accept these kinds of things in the heart of Europe," he said.

A senior State Department official said in a telephone interview that the United States and the European Union were preparing additional punitive measures, including financial penalties against Mr. Lukashenko and others. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of department protocol, called the latest wave of arrests "a last gasp effort to maintain control over things."

But Andrei Sannikov, a leader of the human rights organization Charter 97, said the arrests underscored Mr. Lukashenko's defiance.

"He's challenging Europe," Mr. Sannikov said via telephone from Minsk. "He's saying you can make whatever statements you want, and he will do whatever he wants."

Mr. Milinkevich finished the election a distant second, with 6 percent of the vote, compared with 82 percent for Mr. Lukashenko, according to the government's announced results, which have met skepticism at home and abroad. The election prompted protests, centered on an encampment on October Square, which the police broke up five days later.

Melee In Cairo Reveals Stress In Government (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

CAIRO, April 27 — Thousands of riot police officers sealed off access to the High Court on Thursday, beating and arresting protesters who had turned out to support two judges facing a disciplinary panel because they had accused the government of election fraud.

The huge show of force, appearing larger even than what was deployed in the Sinai after four bombings there this week, seemed to signal that President Hosni Mubarak's government had reached a breaking point over shows of dissent.

The focus was a relatively small demonstration over the treatment of the two judges and in support of more than 80 others who had been staging a sit-in for more than a week at the stately old Judges Club to demand an independent judiciary.

The persistent demands by the group, who represent thousands of judges across the country, has united a wide swath of political opposition and has sparked new life in a reform movement that had withered after the presidential election in September.

Since then the government has increasingly retrenched from a position of generally allowing more political freedom.

By Thursday, after days of dealing with the attacks in the Sinai and low-intensity clashes between the police and protesters in Cairo, the government seemed overwhelmed.

Around 8 a.m., massive green troop carriers rumbled into the center of the city and deployed more than 3,000 troops, a number that swelled to about 10,000 by midday, according to witnesses and videotapes.

The army of riot officers pressed in with long wooden poles and body-length shields to seal off the judges from a relatively small group of supporters on the street. Eyewitnesses said at least 50 demonstrators were arrested, though there was no way to verify that.

The police also arrested a journalist for the television network Al Jazeera who had reported — incorrectly — that an insurgent attack on the police had spread into the previously calm delta region, a report that instantly caused a tumult in the capital.

The network retracted the report, but the government held the newsman, saying he was guilty of "spreading confusion."

The demonstrators had gathered especially to support Mahmoud Mekky and Hesham Bastawisi, the two judges brought before the disciplinary panel because they had accused the government and other judges of forgery in connection with the last parliamentary elections. Their case was postponed for two weeks while the panel considered several defense motions.

The authorities also lifted the judicial immunity of seven judges who had complained about fraud in past elections, paving the way for those judges to be questioned by the police.

"I am so happy that they are doing this to us, because it proved that they are the ones that people want to try, not us," Judge Bastawisi said Thursday after his appearance in court. "It is not us that are going to court, but it is the ruling regime, and they already got the verdict from the people."

In a Labor Day speech on Thursday to workers gathered in a conference hall in Cairo, President Mubarak portrayed the dispute with the judges as an intramural matter, not involving the government.

"I tell the judges who make up Egypt's proud judiciary that you are the guardian of justice and protector of the law," he said. "I hope you reach among yourselves a just conclusion that preserves the high interest of the homeland and improves what we are already seeking: an independent judiciary, as well as your prestigious status in our hearts."

But the president's words did little to soften the government's treatment of the protesters.

"It is an indicator the system is breaking down," said Rajia Amran, a lawyer who turned out Thursday to support the judges and described their cause as "the last bastion of freedom in this country."

"They are panicking; they are in the dark and don't know what to do."

Youssef Rashwan, a technician in an iron and steel factory, said he came out "to support the judges in their honorable stance."

"Look how the regime treats the civil peaceful opposition," he said. "No wonder that people blow themselves up. There is no way to go because the security treats all opposition the same way, just oppression."

There are 9,000 judges in Egypt, and an estimated 7,000 have joined forces to press the government for a new law that, they argue, will allow them to be independent.

Those leading the fight, including some of Egypt's most senior jurists, have been pressing the government since 1991 to ensure that judges are free from government pressure.

They say the minister of justice, who is appointed by President Mubarak, can threaten, intimidate and punish those who challenge the will of the government — an accusation that government officials deny.

But the tension reached a new level about a year ago when the judges began demanding that they have the sole right to monitor elections. They complain that even though judges watch polling sites, government appointees tally votes.

"It is enough that for the past 52 years, we have been carrying the liability of rigging the elections in this country," Zakariya Ahmed Abdel Aziz, chairman of the Judges Club, said at a meeting in August.

Ghada Shahbandar, leader of an electoral monitoring group, said: "We can not aspire to have reform without an independent judiciary. It is the first and most important block in the reform process."

After the parliamentary elections ended in December, a group of judges leveled accusations of forgery and fraud, and for that they were chosen for discipline and investigation. The move was approved by senior members of a judicial panel at the recommendation of the minister of justice, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0027275

Mahmoud al-Khudeiry, head of the Judges Club in Alexandria, was one of the seven who had his judicial immunity lifted and is now facing the prospect of police interrogation.

He has served on the bench for 43 years and said he had not seen such antagonism between the bench and the executive since the 1960's, when Nasser staged what is known as the Judges' Massacre by firing jurists who did not bend to his pressure.

"We don't know how it will end or where it will end," Mr. Khudeiry said Monday, as he greeted supporters who came to the Judges Club. "All we know is, we insist on our demands and we persist in our way until we achieve our demands."

Mubarak Vs. A Dissenting Judiciary (WP)

By Daniel Williams

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

CAIRO, April 27 -- Thousands of police surrounded the stately square building on Abdel Khaleq Tharwat Street downtown Thursday, while up on the balcony a group of bespectacled judges stood in protest, cellphones trilling in their hands.

The place was the Judges Club, a palatial gathering spot for jurists that is outfitted with giant chandeliers and gilt-framed mirrors. This week, it was the scene of sit-ins against the 25-year rule of President Hosni Mubarak.

The police sealed off the Judges Club as well as the High Court building where two magistrates are being prosecuted for denouncing fraud in a series of elections last year. The show of force was impressive: The number of black-clad, helmeted officers on the street was far larger than during a series of small anti-Mubarak demonstrations last year. Several demonstrators who dared brave the massive cordon were hustled into detention.

Abdel Khaleq Tharwat Street is the latest battleground in the government's campaign against pro-democracy dissidents. The targets this time are judges who are battling to free the bench from what they say is Mubarak's control.

For the judges, Exhibit A of government interference and harassment is the case of the two magistrates, Hesham Bastawisi and Mahmoud Mekky.

The two men appeared at a hearing Thursday in which they faced disciplinary charges of insulting the judiciary for saying that fellow judges, handpicked by the government to monitor the elections, failed to stop or even denounce vote-rigging. They had set up an independent committee to observe the elections and take complaints.

The court session Thursday was brief, and the magistrates were ordered to appear again May 11. They face being removed from the judiciary.

"The government wants to block the independence of the judiciary," said Nasser Amin, a human rights activist who promotes judicial reform. "Judges are speaking out against arbitrary laws and repression of individuals, and so the authorities feel they must stop them."

Many Egyptians regard judges as a potential counterbalance to the near-absolute presidential powers in Egypt, Amin said.

On Wednesday evening, police broke up a demonstration that had gone on for nine days across from the Judges Club. They hauled off protesters who were chanting, "God grant the judges strength to resist" and "Down with Hosni Mubarak."

At one point, a one-legged man on crutches charged the police, yelling, "Away with the tyrant!" He lost his grip on the crutches but nonetheless twirled around and around shouting epithets.

Since the parliamentary elections last year that Mubarak's party won handily, his government has taken the offensive against some of its harshest critics and political rivals.

Though under pressure from the United States to democratize, the government imprisoned Ayman Nour, the distant second-place finisher in the presidential vote last year, on charges of falsifying official documents. Two journalists have been jailed for "defaming" government officials. On Thursday, a reporter from al-Jazeera television who was working in Dahab, the scene of bombings Monday that killed at least 18 civilians, was detained for broadcasting "false information likely to harm the country's reputation."

The government has renewed roundups of members of the Muslim Brotherhood, a formally banned Islamic group that has become the only large, well-organized political opposition in Egypt. Mubarak postponed municipal elections for two years, a move that opposition activists said was designed to head off Brotherhood candidacies.

The president also has hinted that he would extend emergency laws in place since 1981 that curb free speech and political activities.

Judges resisted government requests to supervise the recent elections, as required by law. Dissenting magistrates, asserting that the eventual observers were handpicked and biased, issued a report that was publicized on pan-Arab television.

"We're insisting that the elections were flawed. The government can't stand that because people will believe us and not them," said Bastawisi, a 29-year court veteran and currently an appeals court judge.

This was not the first time Bastawisi has participated in an electoral protest. In 1985, he and other judges condemned fraud, without effect. Last year, he said, some judges were complicit in the fraud -- statements of the sort that have landed him in court. "I don't care," he said in an interview. "At this point, cooperating with the state is a crime."

Bastawisi noted that the parliamentary elections featured police blockades of polling stations and that 11 people who tried to break through the cordons were killed. "The people responsible for this should be put on trial. Instead, we are attacked."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Juror In Terror Trial Disavows Verdict (SFC)

By Demian Bulwa

San Francisco Chronicle, April 28, 2006

Sacramento -- One of 12 jurors who convicted a 23-year-old Lodi man Tuesday on charges that he trained for holy war disavowed the verdict late Thursday, alleging that she was bullied into a guilty finding amid a pattern of misconduct by fellow panelists.

"I never once throughout the deliberation process and the reading of the verdict believed Hamid Hayat to be guilty," Arcelia Lopez, a 44-year-old school nurse from Sacramento, said in a 2,000-word affidavit filed to the U.S. District Court in Sacramento by the defense just after 9 p.m.

Among other accusations, Lopez said the jury's foreman, near the start of the two-month trial, "gestured as if he was tying a rope around his neck" and said, "Hang him." Lopez said the gesture was repeated throughout the trial and that she believed it was a reference to Hayat.

Hayat's attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, said Lopez's claims should prompt U.S. District Judge Garland Burrell Jr. to grant the young man a new trial. Hayat now faces 30 to 39 years in prison at a July 14 sentencing.

Prosecutors could not be reached for comment at the late hour.

But one juror, speaking condition of anonymity, called the accusations "a complete outrage" borne of "juror regret." The juror said Lopez changed her vote to guilty Monday, which at first made the juror uncomfortable.

"When she decided to change her vote, which was completely under her own will, I asked her flat-out to her face, in front of everybody, if she was changing her mind based on her own free will and the evidence presented the jury," the juror said. "She said yes."

The juror, who declined to address specific misconduct allegations, continued: "We argued as jurors do -- that's deliberation. If she saw that as pressure, it was in her own mind. I don't think other jurors saw it that way."

Attempts to reach other jurors were unsuccessful. A few declined to comment.

The jury of six men and six women, after deliberating for nine days, found Hayat guilty of providing "material support" to terrorists by training at a camp in Pakistan and returning to the United States to await attack orders. He was also convicted of three counts of lying to the FBI.

Lopez, the final holdout for acquittal, acknowledged in the affidavit that, when polled by a clerk Tuesday, she "responded to the court that I agreed with the verdict."

"I deeply regret my decision," said Lopez in the affidavit, adding that she cried several times during deliberations and, last Saturday, sought treatment for migraine headaches at an emergency room.

DOJ_NMG_0027280

James Wedick, a former FBI agent and the lead defense investigator, contacted Lopez on Wednesday and later asked her if she would allow the defense to prepare an affidavit.

Vic Amar, a professor at Hastings Law School in San Francisco, said Judge Burrell would likely investigate the allegations.

"In general, changes of heart by a juror are not a basis for undoing a verdict unless there are specific influences he or she can point to, like a bribe or a threat or some improper evidence that was looked at," Amar said.

Also Tuesday, a separate jury of eight women and four men failed to agree on whether to convict Hayat's father, 48-year-old Umer Hayat, on two counts of lying. Prosecutors have not yet decided whether to retry the elder Hayat, who is due back in court Friday for a bail hearing.

The dual trials in Sacramento centered on the FBI's videotaped interrogations of the Hayats last June at the agency's office in the capital. Hayat, already on the FBI's radar because of comments he made to an informant, had just returned from a two-year trip to Pakistan.

Prosecutors described the confessions as clear proof of guilt, but defense attorneys said the men have no experience with terrorist camps and were manipulated into telling agents whatever they wanted to hear.

Lopez said jurors inappropriately talked about media reports regarding the case. In particular, she said, jurors expressed interest in finding out what dismissed juror Andrea Clabaugh, 39, of Carmichael, said to reporters on March 22. Clabaugh had said the evidence thus far had not convinced her of Hayat's guilt.

One juror "suggested the Chronicle or the (Sacramento) Bee," Lopez recalled.

Burrell repeatedly admonished the jurors to avoid exposure to media reports on the case. Such exposure can be grounds to overturn a verdict.

Lopez said the foreman, Joseph Cote, 64, of Folsom, made offensive comments about Hayat during deliberations. She quoted him as saying, "If you put them in the same costume then they all look alike."

The foreman sent a note last Friday to Burrell complaining that one juror "does not seem to fully comprehend the deliberation process." Lopez said this was a reference to her belief that Hayat was innocent.

Lopez said Cote "personally attacked me repeatedly as someone who couldn't process the information and who just couldn't see that (Hayat) was guilty because he thought I didn't have the mental capacity to understand."

She said she didn't even know about the note until Burrell responded in writing on Monday morning, asking jurors to "please continue your deliberations."

Lopez said another juror, Rebecca Harris, 58, of Clements, brought in a long, type-written note Monday and read it to the panel. Harris complained that her health was failing and, Lopez said, blamed it on her.

"The message of the statement was clearly to put pressure on me to change my vote," Lopez said in the affidavit. "She said that she herself couldn't take it anymore and that if I didn't change my vote, she would consider getting off the jury herself due to the stress."

In the end, "I explained to the other jurors that it was okay that I disagreed and that we did not have to have a unanimous verdict," Lopez said in the affidavit. "But they did not all agree. They continued to pressure me to change my vote. At this point I was under so much stress and pressure, that I agreed to change my vote."

Alternate juror Montell Hall, 69, of Roseville, who did not sit through deliberations, said Thursday that the panel followed the rules when he was present.

"If there was any (misconduct), I would have been the one to do it," the semi-retired engineer and consultant joked. "I was very outspoken, but I didn't talk about the trial (during testimony)."

Hall said he too would have voted for conviction.

"I was absolutely sure in my own mind that he was guilty," Hall said. "Mostly it was the confession that made me sure, and the way he acted during the confession ... the kid was his own worst enemy."

Terror juror bullied? (SR)

By Jeff Hood

The Stockton Record, April 28, 2006

Hamid Hayat's conviction on terrorism charges was delayed by a lone juror who refused to believe the Lodi man was guilty, according to a jury note unsealed Wednesday, one day after the verdict.

The note from foreman Joseph A. Cote, delivered to U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. on Friday, read "There is impass (sic) with a juror who does not seem to fully comprehend the deliberation process. I'm available to discuss this with you and counsel at any time."

Burrell ordered jurors on Monday to continue their work, and the impasse ended Tuesday, the ninth day of deliberations. That's when the holdout joined the 11 others in voting to convict the 23-year-old Hayat of attending a militant training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and 2004 to train for an Islamic holy war in the United States. He also was convicted on three counts of lying about his training.

Earlier Tuesday at Sacramento's federal court, Burrell declared a mistrial in the lying case against Hayat's father, Umer, after jurors deadlocked on two charges.

Defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi said the guilty verdict suggests that the 12th juror was bullied into voting for conviction, a possible basis for appealing the decision. She said she talked briefly with Cote on Wednesday, who referred to the juror as a woman.

"He's saying that she couldn't see the evidence, couldn't see he was guilty," Mojaddidi said, adding Cote would not reveal the juror's identity.

Mojaddidi said a female juror was visibly upset in the court when she confirmed her guilty vote for Burrell.

"I think the judge noticed it," she said. "The judge was staring at her."

U.S. Attorney McGregor Scott said Wednesday that last-minute changes of heart are a part of the jury process and to suggest anything else is speculation.

"My entire legal career, I've been in and around jury trials, and this happens," Scott said. "It's the back and forth of jury deliberations, and it's the way it works, so there's nothing really out of the ordinary about it."

Meanwhile, FBI agents resumed their surveillance of Muslims named by Umer Hayat as having received paramilitary training in Pakistan. Federal law enforcement authorities said Tuesday they are continuing their investigations into possible ties between local Muslims and terrorist groups.

But that might not be the last of the charges facing Lodi residents, Scott said.

"Certainly there are people of interest to us," Scott said, declining to elaborate in a telephone interview Wednesday. He referred questions to FBI agents, who also said the probe was continuing but refused to give more details.

"There are aspects of this (case) which remain under investigation," said Drew Parenti, the agent in charge of the Sacramento office.

Lodi Mayor Susan Hitchcock and police Capt. Gary Benincasa said the FBI has not shared any additional suspicions with them, and neither has seen indications of terror-related activity.

Scott's comment about a continuing investigation "reopens an old wound," aggravating suspicions of and within the Muslim community that had just begun to heal, said Hitchcock.

"This is going to cause everyone unease," she said. "I hope they're speaking from real knowledge, not just hearsay or something like that, because the city of Lodi is ready to move on. This is not something we want to be known for. We want to be known for our fine wines."

One of the men named in Umer Hayat's confession declined an interview Wednesday. He said attorney Lindsay Weston of Davis advised him not to submit to a reporter's interview request under any circumstances.

Weston said the government will not hesitate to subpoena reporters to disclose information obtained in confidence from sources if it isn't already eavesdropping on Muslims' conversations.

When a woman sitting in a parked car near the man's home was asked by The Record if she was with the FBI, the woman smiled, waved and said, "Have a nice day."

Attendance at the Lodi Muslim Mosque's early-afternoon prayer service was sparse, with one member complaining the constant media presence outside discouraged others from praying.

One Egyptian-born Muslim, who only occasionally prays at the mosque during work breaks, said many members are fearful. Nearly all have their roots in Pakistan, like the Hayats.

"They never talk to me because they think I am FBI," the man said.

Also Wednesday, the convicted man's cousin said he could have testified that Hamid Hayat never attended the terrorist camp but wasn't called to the stand as an alibi witness.

Usama Ismail said he lived in Pakistan for 31/2 years before returning to Lodi in March 2005 and never went more than two weeks without seeing his cousin. And even in those times, they would chat by cell phone.

"If he went to a place like that, I would have known," Ismail said. "I'm not that dumb to go and perjure myself and say he didn't go if he did. I was there that whole time. Sometimes we'd go to Islamabad and eat at KFC. That was like royalty."

Mojaddidi said Ismail was represented by an attorney who didn't want the 20-year-old Lodi resident testifying.

The sole San Joaquin County juror in the case, Rebecca Harris of Clements, said Hamid Hayat's confession was the single most compelling piece of evidence.

"It was his words," the 58-year-old bank regulator said late Tuesday.

Harris declined to discuss the jury's deliberations in detail, but she said she was confident the outcome was right.

DOJ_NMG_0027282

Harris said jurors did not vote on the matter immediately once they began deliberating. She said jurors were respectful, but otherwise she declined to discuss dynamics in the room.

"It was not an easy decision," she said.

Mojaddidi said jurors' emphasis on the confession brings up another possible ground for appealing, this one based on a March 31 ruling by Burrell. The judge disallowed testimony from retired FBI agent Jim Wedick, who would have testified the confession was not reliable. Burrell said the testimony would have been redundant.

Hamid Hayat is scheduled to be sentenced July 14.

Juror Illness Causes Delay In Moussaoui Deliberations (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

The death penalty case of Sept. 11, 2001, conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, which has stretched over more than four years amid numerous delays and complications, was delayed once again yesterday. A juror called in sick.

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema told attorneys on both sides that she was sending the jury home. Brinkema initially proposed waiting until Monday to restart deliberations in the al-Qaeda conspirator's sentencing hearing because the juror was on medication.

"I don't want any juror in this serious of a case . . . working if he is not feeling 100 percent. It's obviously a stressful situation," Brinkema told the remaining 11 jurors who filed into the U.S. District courtroom in Alexandria.

After prosecutors and defense attorneys suggested that would be too long a delay, Brinkema sent the jury home for the day. Later yesterday, the juror told the court that he was feeling better, so the jury is supposed to start what could be its third full day of deliberations today.

Moussaoui, who often shoots one-liners -- some vitriolic, some humorous -- to spectators after the jury and judge have left the courtroom, tried to take credit for the juror's undisclosed illness.

"Moussaoui's biological warfare!" he called out, smiling.

Moussaoui, 37, was charged in December 2001 with conspiring with al-Qaeda in the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon. The trial date was moved back several times because of the vast amount of classified material and the complications caused by Moussaoui's initially being allowed to represent himself.

The case was then put on hold for more than two years during a legal dispute over whether Moussaoui and his attorneys could question top al-Qaeda detainees they said could help clear him. An appeals court said in 2004 that Moussaoui could not interview the captives but that their statements to interrogators could be read to a jury.

He pleaded guilty last year, becoming the only person convicted in this country in the Sept. 11 attacks. The sentencing hearing began March 6.

This month, the 12-member jury found that Moussaoui was eligible for the death penalty because his lies to the FBI when he was arrested in August 2001 allowed the Sept. 11 plot to go forward. Jurors then returned to court for a second phase that featured emotional testimony from several dozen family members of Sept. 11 victims.

After closing arguments Monday, jurors began their deliberations in the jury room on the seventh floor of the courthouse.

Juror's Illness Stalls Moussaoui Trial Deliberations (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Jury deliberations in the Zacarias Moussaoui conspiracy trial were expected to resume today after being halted Thursday when a juror fell ill.

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema did not divulge the juror's name or illness, saying only that the juror was a male who needed treatment by a doctor and prescription medicine.

The nine men and three women began deliberating Monday afternoon and have spent about 16 hours debating whether Moussaoui, who has pleaded guilty in the Sept. 11 conspiracy, should be executed or spend his life in prison with no parole.

The jurors were set to restart their discussions Thursday morning when it was announced that the juror was not present and could not participate in the deliberations. Brinkema at first wanted to put off the deliberations until Monday to give the juror time to recover.

"This is the most sensitive time in the case," she said, referring to jury deliberations. "I don't want any juror in this serious of a case working if he or she is not feeling 100%."

But Thursday afternoon, the court announced that the juror was "feeling better" and that deliberations would resume today.

DOJ_NMG_0027283

Moussaoui, 37, twice testified in the trial and said he was being groomed by the Al Qaeda terrorist organization to fly a fifth plane into the White House on Sept. 11. But he was arrested three weeks before the attacks on New York and the Pentagon.

On Thursday, Moussaoui continued his practice of shouting anti-American boasts and taunts. After the juror's illness was announced, he yelled, "Moussaoui biological warfare!"

Man Found Guilty In Milwaukee Bomb Plot (WP/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

MILWAUKEE -- A man who authorities say idolized Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh was found guilty Thursday of threatening to blow up a federal building in downtown Milwaukee.

A jury deliberated about 3 1/2 hours before finding Steven Parr, 41, guilty on the charge of threatening to blow up the Reuss Federal Plaza.

Parr, of Janesville, could face up to life in prison. No sentencing date was immediately set.

Prosecutors said testimony in the four-day trial showed Parr idolized McVeigh, who was put to death for the Oklahoma City bombing 11 years ago that killed 168 people.

Parr had studied bomb-making books and previously built small explosive devices, prosecutors said.

Authorities said Parr was days away from being released from state prison in September 2004 after serving time on drug charges when he told a cellmate about his plan to use a truck bomb to blow up the 14-story building.

The cellmate alerted authorities.

The cellmate, whose name was not disclosed, said in letters to the FBI that Parr had extensive knowledge in bomb-making and considered Ted Kaczynski, the Unabomber, another of his heroes, according to a complaint.

Five Relatives Of Terror Suspect Arrested (AP)

By Paul Foy, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 28, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY -- Five relatives of a U.S. citizen suspected of being a senior al-Qaida operative were arrested in California and Utah on charges of defrauding banks of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

The FBI said it was investigating whether any of the money was used to finance Middle East terrorism.

Four of the five defendants -- all U.S. citizens or legal residents from Jordan where the family of al-Qaida suspect Shawqi Omar has extensive ties -- were arraigned Thursday. The fifth was excused for medical reasons.

Nothing in the indictments ties any of the relatives to a terror network, and federal prosecutors officially referred to the case as a criminal enterprise. But agents are working to determine where all the money went, said Greg Bretzing, a supervisor in the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force in Salt Lake City.

"This is an ongoing investigation. This is nowhere close to being over," he said.

The FBI said Omar's relatives netted $327,000 from fraudulent bank loans and bad mortgages in Utah, and Bretzing said some of the money wound up in Jordan with Omar's relatives.

Omar, a 44-year-old Kuwaiti native with U.S. and Jordanian citizenship, has been indicted in Jordan with Iraq insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in an aborted chemical attack on the Jordanian intelligence agency.

Omar has been held by the U.S. military in Iraq since he was arrested in Baghdad in 2004. He has not been charged in Iraq with any crime, but the U.S. government claims he had bomb-making materials and was harboring an Iraqi insurgent and four Jordanian fighters at the time of his arrest.

In one of the allegedly fraudulent transactions, two relatives are accused of using the same Mercedes-Benz sedan as collateral for loans totaling $80,000 that they failed to repay to two Utah banks, court documents said.

Neither of the two owned the car, which belonged to another family member, according to the documents.

Paul Toller, a Utah First Credit Union vice president, said it loaned $40,000 to Omar's brother using the Mercedes as collateral.

But Sharif Omar was a used-car dealer who had "borrowed and repaid on other car loans," and that nothing about the Mercedes-backed loan appeared suspicious, Toller said.

Soon after taking out the loan -- which Sharif Omar told a bank officer was for home improvements -- he stopped making payments. Investigators contend he gave the $40,000 to a nephew, who included it in a wire transfer to an account in Amman, Jordan.

Sharif Omar, 37, pleaded not guilty Thursday in federal court in Salt Lake City and was released pending trial. If convicted, he faces up to 60 years in prison and $1.75 million in fines on charges of bank fraud and money laundering, a prosecutor said.

Another brother, 42-year-old Bassam Omar, an engineer who owns several Utah businesses, was also indicted. Family members say he was the joint owner of the Baghdad construction company Shawqi Omar was managing at the time of his arrest.

He denied that Shawqi Omar is a member of al-Qaida in an NBC News interview in February. "He is not a terrorist, and it's not fair to him or us," he said.

Another of Shawqi Omar's brothers, who was not indicted, accused federal agents of manufacturing ties between Omar's alleged terrorist actions and the family's U.S. business holdings.

"There is no connection," Gus Omar, who works at one of three Utah car dealerships owned by the family, told The Salt Lake Tribune.

Al-Qaida suspect's relatives nabbed on fraud charges (SLT)

By Matthew D. LaPlante and Matt Canham

The Salt Lake Tribune, April 28, 2006

Counterterrorist agents pounced on five men, one in Utah and four in California, on Wednesday as part of an investigation into the U.S. connections of a suspected senior al-Qaida operative imprisoned in Iraq.

But for now, the federal indictments against the men - all of whom have ties to Utah and all of whom are related to accused terrorist Shawqi Omar - involve only fraud and money laundering.

But FBI agents say that some of the money alleged to have been stolen in various schemes wound up in Jordan. And now they want to know whether that cash has ended up in the hands of terrorists.

"We would be derelict not to investigate where that money is going," said agent Greg Bretzing, a supervisor in the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force in Utah.

The Omar family has extensive ties in Jordan, where Shawqi Omar moved his family in 1995 and where he now stands accused of helping terrorist mastermind Abu Musab al-Zarqawi plot a chemical attack.

Al-Zarqawi claims to be al-Qaida's Iraqi leader and has been implicated in scores of bombings, kidnappings and beheadings. The U.S. government has put a $25 million bounty on his head.

Federal investigators believe Shawqi Omar acted as al-Zarqawi's "personal emissary" in several Iraqi cities. But back in Utah, Omar's brother Gus says there is no connection.

"If you're a Sunni and from Jordan and in Iraq, then you're bound to meet somebody who has met Zarqawi, but Shawqi doesn't know him," said Gus Omar, who has not been implicated in the case against his brothers.

Shawqi Omar in Utah

In court filings, U.S. military officials have offered evidence to the contrary, saying Omar had taken al-Zarqawi's sister-in-law as a second wife.

Omar, who worked as a refrigerator repairman when he lived in Utah in the late-1980s, was arrested in Iraq on Oct. 29, 2004. U.S. military officials have alleged the 44-year-old man, acting on al-Zarqawi's behalf, was harboring one Iraqi insurgent and four Jordanian fighters at his Baghdad home. He had also plotted the kidnapping of American workers in Iraq, U.S. officers alleged.

Omar could be the first American citizen to be tried in the Iraqi court system, if military officials prevail in an ongoing legal battle. It is a prospect his family in the United States is fighting to prevent. A document filed by Omar's lawyers this week, in which they have again requested access to their client, alleged that U.S. troops beat Omar and tortured him with electric shocks.

Bassam Omar, who family members say was the joint owner of the construction company Shawqi Omar was managing in Baghdad at the time of his arrest, has denied his brother is a member of al-Qaida.

"He is not a terrorist," he told NBC News in February, "and it's not fair to him or us."

Now Bassam Omar is behind bars.

The San Diego engineer, who owns several Utah businesses, was taken into federal custody on Wednesday, hours after another Omar brother, Sharif, was arrested at his home in the Salt Lake City suburb of Cottonwood Heights.

Two nephews and a brother-in-law were also detained in California.

The Utah arrest came as a shock to neighbors in the upscale gated subdivision where Sharif Omar has lived with his wife and three children for more than a year.

"Of anybody here, he's the last guy I would have expected to get arrested," said neighbor Bob Skanchy.

Friends said that Sharif Omar's family seemed to have rapidly climbed the economic ladder over the past few years, though state records indicate most of the dozens of businesses he and his relatives have owned along the Wasatch Front have closed.

Skanchy said homes in the community can cost upwards of $500,000. Two luxury sport utility vehicles were parked in front of the Omar home Wednesday afternoon.

Inside the newly built house, Hannah Omar said she had yet to be told why her husband had been arrested.

"I don't know what's going on," she said. "I haven't even talked to our lawyer."

She'll have an opportunity to learn more today at her husband's arraignment on charges of bank fraud and money laundering.

The four indictments allege that the Omar family members, aided by three other Utahns, defrauded banks of hundreds of thousands of dollars with bad mortgage and car loans from 2000 to 2004.

In at least one instance, Omar nephew Ihab Ramadan allegedly wired $50,000 to an account in Amman, Jordan, according to the indictments. Ramadan was arrested at his Chula Vista, Calif., home early Wednesday.

Another Omar nephew, Alaa Ramadan, was arrested at Los Angeles International Airport after FBI agents received word he was returning from Jordan, where friends say he has lived for several years. The fifth family member, identified as Omar's brother-in-law Ahmad Abudan, was arrested in the San Diego area on the same day.

A federal grand jury in Utah indicted the men several months ago but those charges were kept under seal until the agents were sure of Alaa Ramadan's return. Omar family members said Alaa made his living in real estate and spends most of his time in the Middle East.

The other Utahns named in the indictments for their role in an alleged mortgage scam - Rebecca Teece, James Gibbons and Teri Hansen - have been summoned to appear in court but have not been arrested, though Gibbons is currently in custody on unrelated charges.

The Omar family has worked tirelessly to ensure that Shawqi Omar, currently being held at a U.S. prison facility in Iraq known as Camp Bucca, will be provided legal council and not be turned over to the Iraqi court system.

According to documents filed Friday in a Washington, D.C., federal court, Omar's attorney Susan Burke claims he is being tortured. She said she received an unexpected phone call from Omar on April 13, in which her client told her that "Americans, claiming to be Federal Bureau of Investigation agents, beat him severely and applied electric shocks to his body."

"The agents claimed they could kill him if they wanted to," Burke wrote. "The American agents threatened to rape his son if Mr. Omar failed to provide information. A translator believed by Mr. Omar to be Moroccan threatened to rape Mr. Omar's wife, who was also in United States' military custody at the time."

Burke - who earlier won a temporary injunction barring Omar's transfer to an Iraqi court - has requested access to Omar's medical files, any photographs taken after the alleged beatings and tape recordings of their conversation.

She also demanded immediate and continued contact with her client, who U.S. officials have alleged would often use his U.S. passport to gain access to guarded Baghdad hotels in order to entice foreigners to his home, where they would be kidnapped for ransom.

Regardless of the allegations in Iraq, Gus Omar believes the FBI is manufacturing a connection between Shawqi Omar's alleged terrorist actions and the family's U.S. business holdings.

"There is no connection," said Gus Omar, who works at a car dealership in Murray owned by the recently arrested Omar brothers.

Bretzing, the FBI counterterrorism supervisor, said Utah's FBI office previously received a tip about the family's alleged financial misdeeds, but didn't start its investigation until January 2005.

That came at a time when counterterrorism agents throughout the country were investigating Shawqi Omar's American ties.

The FBI's top officer in Salt Lake City said the counterterrorism task force isn't done yet.

"From our perspective, this investigation is not over," said Timothy Fuhrman. "This is another tool in our tool box to advance the investigation. . . . Sometimes you get an indictment and then people cooperate."

It would not be the first time federal investigators have leveraged mortgage fraud charges against a suspect in order to gain compliance in a terrorism investigation.

In December, a federal jury acquitted University of South Florida doctoral student Sameeh Hammoudeh of charges that he helped fund and supported a Palestinian terrorist group.

But Hammoudeh remains in custody and he has been ordered to be deported from the United States because officials were able to obtain a conviction on other charges - including mortgage fraud.

Detainee Defiantly Admits Charges (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027286

GUANTANAMO BAY NAVAL STATION, Cuba — The only indicted detainee mentioned in the Sept. 11 commission report made a defiant first appearance before the war crimes tribunal Thursday, vowing, "I'm going to make this easy." He said he had taken up arms against the United States and would proudly serve any sentence.

Ghassan Abdullah Al Sharbi denounced the tribunal and his detention as illegitimate and rejected the Navy lawyer assigned to represent him.

He declared himself ready to concede to — "I don't like the word confession," he said — all the accusations of conspiracy to commit terrorism that have been brought against him.

Appearing in the military commissions courtroom in tan prison garb, the 31-year-old Saudi insisted on serving as his own legal counsel, as have three more of the 10 charged suspects.

Sharbi, who holds a bachelor's degree in electrical engineering from Arizona's Embry-Riddle Aeronautics University and speaks fluent English, is charged with plotting with other Al Qaeda suspects to build remote-controlled explosive devices for use against U.S. forces who invaded Afghanistan a month after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Sharbi's name appears in a footnote of the Sept. 11 commission report to Congress, noting he was enrolled at Embry-Riddle when Al Qaeda was allegedly encouraging Muslim sympathizers to enroll in flight training in Arizona.

Although he is not accused of direct involvement in the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the report noted he had sworn allegiance to Osama bin Laden weeks earlier.

Little was known about the Saudi suspect before his appearance Thursday. He had refused until this week to meet with any attorney, and a transcript of his only other appearance in the tribunal process was released less than two months ago in a massive document dump by the Pentagon after a Freedom of Information Act court order.

"I did not come here to defend myself," Sharbi told the presiding officer in his case, Navy Capt. Daniel O'Toole. "I came in to tell you I did what I did and am willing to pay the price, no matter what it is. Even if I spend hundreds of years in jail, that would be an honor to me."

O'Toole observed that Sharbi is articulate and intelligent but ruled he is not qualified to serve as his own attorney.

Navy Lt. William C. Kuebler, assigned by the government to represent Sharbi, told O'Toole he had been advised by legal authorities in California, where he is licensed to practice law, that it would be an ethics violation for him to defend the accused against his wishes.

O'Toole said he would take under consideration Kuebler's motion on the ethics issue and his challenge to O'Toole's ruling that Sharbi can't represent himself.

Sharbi had refused until Sunday to meet with Kuebler, and the chief defense counsel, Marine Col. Dwight Sullivan, said his staff had no idea how Sharbi planned to present himself until he appeared Thursday morning.

Soft-spoken but imbued with a cut-to-the-chase impatience, Sharbi told the court: "I'm going to make this easy for you guys: I'm proud of what I did and there isn't any reason of hiding."

He said he was planning to testify that "I fought against the United States. I took up arms."

Questioned by O'Toole if he understood the tribunal's rules and procedures, Sharbi said he didn't, but promised to behave in the courtroom.

"I'm not going to be violent or cause trouble. I'm not going to make commotions," he said.

Asked if he was familiar with the tribunal's purpose, Sharbi remarked: "Same circus, different clown."

The defendant, with long, thinning hair and a full beard, sat with his hands folded throughout the preliminary proceedings after declining to have Kuebler speak on his behalf. He quoted the military attorney as saying he also considered the war crimes tribunal illegitimate and "a black eye" on the United States' image.

After O'Toole repeatedly queried the defendant about whether he would agree to be represented by any lawyer, Sharbi replied: "I understand and I advise you not to waste time with me on that point. It's my decision and I'm not going to change it."

Sharbi was arrested March 28, 2002, at an alleged Al Qaeda safe house in Faisalabad, Pakistan, along with two other charged detainees here, fellow Saudi Jabran Said bin Al-Qahtani and Algerian Sufyian Barhoumi.

In his Combatant Status Review Tribunal, a forum at which all 558 Guantanamo detainees appeared between July 2004 and January 2005, Sharbi denounced the United States as "the infidel against God" and deplored capitalism and homosexuality as evidence of U.S. society's perversions.

"May God help me fight the infidels or the unfaithful ones," he chanted at the end of the review hearing, according to a transcript recently released to the Associated Press after a Freedom of Information challenge. It was not clear from the documents when the hearing was held.

Ten of the 490 detainees now at Guantanamo have been charged with offenses. The chief prosecutor, Air Force Col. Morris Davis, said this week charges were expected soon against about two dozen others, including possible capital charges.

Another Pentagon official announced that 141 other detainees had been deemed eligible for release or transfer and would be departing the island.

Al Qaeda Wields Press As Terror Weapon, Report Finds (WT)

By Jennifer Harper

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

Terrorists use the press and public relations as weapons, said a study released Wednesday by Arizona State University.

"People are surprised the jihadis think of the media as a weapon," said Steven Corman, director of the school's Consortium for Strategic Communication and a Defense Department consultant on communications networks and counterterrorism.

His study analyzed almost 300 al Qaeda statements, letters and other documents, many of them captured during U.S. military actions in the Middle East and recently declassified by the Pentagon.

The report found that jihadist operations use consistent patterns of outreach that establish them socially and religiously, generate public sympathy and intimidate opponents. Threats, in fact, are part of terrorist "talking points."

"Jihadis pursue these strategies using sophisticated, modern methods of communications and public relations," Mr. Corman said. "There's evidence in the documents that jihadis segment audiences and adapt their message to the audience."

This week, audio and video messages from Osama bin Laden and Abu Musab Zarqawi were posted on the Internet and immediately picked up by international news organizations.

The report cites similar demonstrations as the "ideological machinery" of terrorist organizations, which maintain formal information committees and are adept at using print, broadcast and online resources on a global basis. The Internet provides such a promising terrorist forum that Mr. Corman suggests the United States create a permanent "geek battalion" to disrupt jihadist message boards and Web sites.

The United States monitors terrorist messages through clandestine agencies or within the State Department's Office of Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs. That office follows the objectives set forth by Undersecretary Karen Hughes: to "isolate and marginalize the violent extremists; confront their ideology of tyranny and hate;" and "undermine their efforts to portray the West as in conflict with Islam by empowering mainstream voices and demonstrating respect for Muslim cultures and contributions," the office's mission statement says.

Mr. Corman and co-author Jill Schiefelbein said the Arizona study is a response to "controversies about efforts by the U.S. to influence foreign media coverage of jihadi activities. ... While we deliberate such issues, the jihadis are busy executing a communications and media strategy of their own."

The authors worked closely with the Combating Terrorism Center, a research facility established in 2003 at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, N.Y.

Mr. Corman offered six measures to counter al Qaeda's media savvy. He recommended that the United States try to improve its credibility with Muslim audiences, "degrade" the jihadis' outreach efforts, draw attention to terrorist messages that contradict Islam, deconstruct idealized historical concepts, systematically disrupt Internet operations and seek assistance from sympathetic American Muslims.

PATRIOT ACT:

Legitimate Wiretap Helped Bag A Criminal (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

Your page-one article "Volatile Formula: How Patriot Act Helped Convict Man in Baby-Food Ring1" (April 4) unfairly characterized the prosecution of Samih Jammal and the application of evidence lawfully gathered under the Patriot Act.

The Patriot Act tore down the wall that existed between criminal and intelligence investigations, allowing agents to share information to prevent the sort of conspiracies that led to the catastrophic events of 9/11. Like any right-minded American, I welcome a fair discussion that raises concerns about the Patriot Act. But you attack its use by attempting to portray Mr. Jammal as a minor gray-marketeer or a "local grocery wholesaler."

Criticize the use of the Patriot Act if you so desire, but if you intend to use Mr. Jammal's case to do it, please bear these facts in mind:

A federal judge and jury found Mr. Jammal guilty of 20 felony counts of theft-related charges, including conspiracy, money laundering, false statements and illegal structuring of financial transactions. He was no struggling immigrant peddler trading dollar bills for baby formula on the gray market. At a sentencing hearing, the court found that Mr. Jammal's criminal enterprise led to retail losses estimated at $10 million and sentenced Mr. Jammal to 10 years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0027288

You also seem to suggest that Mr. Jammal should never have been the subject of an intelligence wiretap. Note that a U.S. District Court judge, sitting by designation to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, found probable cause that Mr. Jammal was acting as an agent of a foreign power or an agent of a foreign terrorist organization. At Mr. Jammal's request, another U.S. District Court judge, the trial court judge, reviewed the FISA court judge's decision, and affirmed the finding of probable cause.

Perhaps the biggest distortion was your failure to give a complete characterization of Hani Hanjour, a 9/11 hijacker whom Mr. Jammal admitted associating with as a matter of public record. You described Hani Hanjour as "one of the 9/11 hijackers" and as "a Saudi Arabian who was aboard the American Airlines jet that crashed into the Pentagon." According to the 9/11 Report, there were 64 people "aboard" American Airlines flight 77. Hani Hanjour was one of the five terrorists who took over the cockpit and the only one who piloted the plane into the Pentagon.

Prosecutors confront enormous logistical challenges when the government decides to use FISA evidence in a criminal case. That doesn't mean these challenges are insurmountable or that civil liberties and the procedural rights of criminal defendants can't be adequately protected.

Indeed, the Department of Justice, the defense bar and the courts have been navigating these logistical challenges in significant criminal cases for years, while at the same time keeping a weather eye out for liberty interests. Mr. Jammal's counsel had access to all of the FISA intercepts in this case. If any evidence supported Mr. Jammal's defense, it could have been presented at trial. Mr. Jammal's appellate counsel will have the same opportunity on appeal.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Official To Retire Shortly After Promotion (AP)

AP, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A senior FBI official is retiring less than a year after he took the bureau's top national security post.

Gary Bald will step down as head of the FBI's new National Security branch on June 2, ending a nearly 29-year career with the FBI, Director Robert Mueller said Thursday.

Mueller gave no reason for Bald's decision, but praised his leadership. Bald said the time was right to retire, "weighing our progress on implementation of the NSB as well as family considerations."

The National Security office brings counterintelligence, counterterrorism and intelligence operations under one umbrella. It was recommended last year by a presidential commission and adopted by President Bush.

Before Mueller and John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, jointly announced Bald's appointment in August, Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, urged them to turn to someone else.

Grassley was irked because Bald testified in a civil lawsuit that he had no counterterrorism experience when he moved to headquarters to oversee anti-terrorism strategy in 2003. Bald's deposition was among hundreds of pages of testimony in a suit by an Arab-American FBI agent that were obtained by The Associated Press.

"This is not a position for on-the-job training," Grassley said in a letter to Negroponte. "I wanted to make sure that you were aware of Mr. Bald's recent testimony about his background and expertise in counterterrorism."

Security & Terrorism FBI national security chief to quit (UPI)

UPI, April 28, 2006

The man who heads the new section of the FBI devoted to national security is retiring after nearly 30 years with the bureau.

Executive Assistant Director Gary Bald will step down on June 2, 2006, after just ten months in the new post, the FBI said in a statement Thursday.

Since August last year, Bald has headed up the National Security Branch of the FBI, which brings together its spy-catchers, counter-terror specialists and intelligence analysts. The branch was put together last year in response to the recommendations of the presidential commission that investigated U.S. intelligence failures in the run up to the Iraq invasion.

"Throughout his career, Gary has shown tremendous leadership, vision, and grace under pressure," said FBI Director Robert Mueller in the statement. "He has helped to shape the Bureau in important ways... I am pleased with the progress we have made under his leadership."

Mueller said the bureau would "move quickly to fill the important position" Bald was leaving.

DOJ_NMG_0027289

Bald began his Bureau career in 1977 in the Laboratory Division. He led the internal investigation into the James "Whitey" Bulger corruption and misconduct case in Boston. He was Special Agent in Charge of the Baltimore Field Office from September 2002 until November 2003, overseeing the FBI's efforts in the Washington-area sniper investigation.

He was assistant director of the Counterterrorism Division and then the executive assistant director for counter-terrorism and counter-intelligence 2004-2005, before being selected to head the new National Security Branch last year.

In the statement, Bald said, "The decision to leave the Bureau after almost 29 years was a difficult one, but weighing our progress on implementation of the NSB as well as family considerations, I decided that now is a good time for the transition."

Sen. Specter Threatens To Block NSA Funds (WP)

By Laurie Kellman

The Washington Post, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Noting that Congress holds the power of the purse, a frustrated Senate chairman threatened to try to block money for President Bush's domestic wiretapping program.

Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said Thursday he delivered a message to Bush that cut to the heart of the debate over executive power.

"I made the point that the president doesn't have a blank check," Specter said about their meeting Wednesday. "He didn't choose to engage me on that point."

Without a pledge from Bush to provide more information on the surveillance program, Specter filed an amendment to a spending bill Thursday that amounted to a warning to the White House.

The amendment would enact a "prohibition on use of funds for domestic electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence purposes unless Congress is kept fully and currently informed."

Specter also said he would turn the amendment into a bill and hold hearings.

"Institutionally, the presidency is walking all over Congress at the moment," Specter said. "If we are to maintain our institutional prerogative, that may be the only way we can do it."

Specter made clear that, for now, the threat was just that.

"I'm not prepared to call for the withholding of funds," he told reporters later.

"But I think that it is important to elevate the public consciousness as to what is going on," Specter said. "The four hearings we have had and the way the matter is drifting, in my view, is insufficient to safeguard civil liberties."

The move got the White House's attention, but not its immediate cooperation. Bush has insisted that the program falls within his authority and has refused to allow Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other officials to answer many of Specter's questions.

"The appropriate members of Congress have been and continue to be informed with respect to the Terrorist Surveillance Program," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said.

"The administration remains confident that a majority of members of Congress continue to recognize the importance of protecting Americans through lawful intelligence activities directed at terrorists," Perino said.

Specter said he hoped to jolt the public's awareness and "an inert Congress ... which has not stood up to the executive branch."

"You have a Congress which candidly is more concerned about re-election and fundraising and who controls the House and the Senate than about asserting constitutional prerogatives," Specter said. "That's not the way it ought to be. These are matters which require some active congressional action and that's what I'm looking toward."

For now, Specter said he will not bother having Gonzales return to the committee "because he won't tell us anything."

Threatening to withhold money from the wiretapping program is not unprecedented.

Democrats on the House Intelligence Committee tried to attach an amendment to the 2007 intelligence authorization bill to withhold money from the National Security Agency if the White House did not disclose information about the cost of the warrantless surveillance program.

The figure was given to a select group of members who have been briefed more fully on the NSA program, and is classified.

Wiretap Funding Cutoff Is Warned (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027290

WASHINGTON — The chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee said Thursday he might seek to block funding of a domestic eavesdropping program in an effort to force the Bush administration to answer lawmakers' questions about the operation.

In a warning to the White House, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said he planned to introduce legislation that would cut off funds for the surveillance program, which he described as a threat to civil liberties and a violation of domestic espionage laws.

Specter said he was not yet prepared to support a cutoff of funding, which he said would be a measure of last resort. But he warned that if the Bush administration was unwilling to comply with existing laws or help draft new domestic surveillance legislation, the only way for Congress to exercise any control might be to deny funding.

"What's the use of passing another statute if the president won't pay any attention to it?" Specter said. "When you talk about withholding funds, there you're talking about a real authority."

Specter offered a funding cutoff measure as an amendment to an emergency war spending bill, but said he did not intend to push for the amendment's passage. He said that measure could be converted into legislation that would provide an opportunity for congressional hearings.

A draft of a proposal circulated by Specter's office would prohibit the use of funds for domestic electronic surveillance for foreign intelligence purposes "unless Congress is kept fully and currently informed." In particular, the proposed bill would require the administration to brief all members of the House and Senate Intelligence and Judiciary committees.

To date, the White House has restricted such briefings to members of newly created subcommittees on the two intelligence panels.

The salvo from Specter underscores the tension between key Republicans in Congress and the Bush administration over the limits of presidential power in the war on terrorism.

The domestic surveillance program was launched in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, when President Bush authorized the National Security Agency to eavesdrop — without first obtaining court warrants — on the communications of U.S. residents. The White House has said that the eavesdropping is restricted to international calls between U.S. residents and individuals overseas who are suspected of having ties to the Al Qaeda terrorist network.

The program was kept secret from all but a handful of members of Congress until last year, when its existence was reported by the New York Times. The White House has argued that the president has the constitutional authority to approve such spying measures during wartime.

"The administration remains confident that a majority of members of Congress continue to recognize the importance of protecting Americans through lawful intelligence activities directed at terrorists," said Dana Perino, a White House spokeswoman.

Many in Congress have rejected that argument and are pushing for an overhaul of espionage laws to subject the domestic surveillance program to greater outside scrutiny.

Specter has advocated legislation that would modify existing laws and require the government to obtain the approval of a special intelligence court. Another proposal, backed by Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio), would allow the government to bypass the special court in certain cases, but require disclosure to congressional intelligence subcommittees.

Specter said he had informed Bush of his intention to consider legislation that would deny funding for the program. Specter was particularly critical of Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales, saying that his testimony on the spying program before the Judiciary Committee had been so unresponsive that it would be pointless to call him to testify again.

Specter Wants More Debate On Spying (WP)

By Walter Pincus And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

New expressions of frustration over how little information the administration has shared about the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping on Americans flared yesterday in the Senate, one day after House Republicans barred amendments that would have expanded oversight of the controversial program.

Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said yesterday that he will file an amendment to block the NSA program's funding -- but said he will not seek a vote on it at this time -- in hope of stirring greater debate on the warrantless surveillance, part of the agency's monitoring of alleged terrorists.

"Where is the outrage?" asked Specter, who has chaired hearings that questioned the NSA program's constitutionality.

Questions about the legality of the NSA program and the Bush administration's refusal to brief the full intelligence panel on it led Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), ranking Democrat on the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, for the first time on Wednesday to vote against the annual intelligence authorization bill, which passed the House.

Harman, one of the few House members to receive briefings on the NSA program, said she believes in the program's approach but argued unsuccessfully on the floor Wednesday for a measure requiring greater congressional review.

"I do not support violating the law or the Constitution," she said. "Enhanced security without respect for law gives away the very values we are fighting to defend, and I believe that the program . . . can and must fully comply with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act and with our Constitution."

The version of the fiscal 2007 Intelligence Authorization bill that passed the House contained no language on the NSA program. But lawmakers added provisions that could have an impact on the estimated $44 billion to be spent next year by the 16 agencies that make up the intelligence community, as well as the operations of Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte and his growing, one-year-old organization. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Congress created Negroponte's office to oversee and improve coordination of the intelligence agencies.

Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), chairman of the House intelligence committee, said Wednesday that his panel will be monitoring Negroponte's progress in restructuring the intelligence community and that "we would all like it to go faster because of the significant threats that we face as a nation." Although Hoekstra has been critical of the DNI in the past, he said the office "is beginning to bear fruit" and "incremental but real improvements have been made since the standup."

Harman expressed a gloomier view. She said Negroponte "has not taken command yet" of the intelligence community, "giving away authority to the Pentagon, which is happy to receive it, as it expands its own role in intelligence gathering abroad and here at home."

She added that "the CIA is in free fall," and that "300 years of experience have either been pushed out or left in frustration, and morale is dangerously low."

The committee took a step toward reining in Pentagon domestic intelligence activities. The Defense Department inspector general was directed to audit the activities of the Pentagon's newest and fastest-growing intelligence agency, the Counterintelligence Field Activity. Created four years ago, CIFA has been increasing authority to coordinate and direct intelligence collection involved in protection of Defense Department facilities at home and abroad.

An amendment by Rep. David E. Price (D-N.C.) that was approved goes after the increasing practice of agencies, particularly at the Pentagon, to contract out analysis and collection of intelligence.

CIFA officials, for example, have said they spend 70 percent of their budget -- the amount of which is classified -- on contractors. Under Price's amendment, the DNI would set regulations for the hiring and training of contractors, and provide an annual report of contracts above $1 million with a description of the activities and whether they are classified or unclassified programs.

Specter's concerns about the NSA program were also reflected in much of the House debate on the intelligence bill.

Harman and other Democrats were angry that Republicans on the House Rules Committee prevented a bipartisan amendment that would have required classified briefings on the NSA surveillance program, which includes listening to U.S. citizens, to all members of the House Intelligence and Judiciary committees. That proposal is similar to the one that Specter said he may soon introduce, although he would also include the parallel Senate panels.

At present, lawmakers on a limited number of House and Senate intelligence committees are briefed on the NSA program along with top leaders of the House and Senate.

At the White House yesterday, spokeswoman Dana Perino said: "The appropriate members of Congress have been and continue to be informed with respect to the terrorist surveillance program."

TSA Tries Bonuses To Retain Workers (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Transportation Security Administration will pay airport screeners up to a $1,000 bonus to entice them to stay at the turnover-plagued agency as it prepares for a summer of record air travel.

Roughly one in four screeners left last year, a rate nearly twice the rest of the federal workforce. Gale Rossides, an associate TSA administrator, said the bonuses are aimed at preventing a screener shortage during the upcoming peak travel months — when long lines could lead to higher security risks for travelers.

The TSA will spend $20 million to give most of the nation's 43,000 screeners $500 extra. The first bonus will be paid May 11 to screeners who've been on the job a year and who are deemed less likely to leave. Other screeners will get $500 for working through the summer.

Screeners will get a second $500 bonus if they work at “hard-to-hire” airports that have trouble filling vacancies.

“We understand the $500 may not be as much as some people want, but it is a commitment on our part to try to begin to invest in the workforce,” Rossides said.

The number of screeners at some checkpoints is “not sufficient for peak periods,” according to a report by the Government Accountability Office, Congress' investigative arm. Screeners are the front line of defense against smuggling weapons on planes.

DOJ_NMG_0027292

The Air Transport Association projects the number of people taking flights this summer to increase from last summer's record of 206 million.

Screeners make $23,504 to $44,580 depending on experience and where they work. Rossides said many screeners leave in their first year as they struggle to adjust to fluctuating work schedules and a "hectic pace."

The bonus "isn't going to retain anybody," said Kimberly Kraynak, a $39,000-a-year screener at Pittsburgh International Airport. She called $500 "a joke."

Added Boston screener A.J. Castilla, who makes $37,064: "What will $500 mean? I could probably take a weekend off somewhere and de-stress a little."

The screener attrition rate grew to 24.5% from about 15% in 2003 when the TSA began to take over aviation security from private companies. Those companies, with turnover exceeding 100%, were criticized for using inexperienced screeners who missed weapons.

TSA chief Kip Hawley told screeners in an April 20 newsletter that the longer they stay on the job, "the higher the performance of their security duties will be." Hiring and training a new screener costs $12,000.

Los Angeles International Airport warned Hawley in an April 12 letter that it was losing 40 to 50 screeners a month and could be short 300 screeners out of 2,000 by August. That would create "significant security concerns" because passengers thronged in checkpoint lines would be a terrorist target, airport executive director Lydia Kennard and chairman Steven Holt wrote.

The Airports Council International is pushing TSA to hire laborers to speed up security lines by loading bags on belts and ushering passengers through queues.

Trade Group's Arm To Get TSA Contract (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- An airport trade group designated by Congress to handle background checks for two Transportation Security Administration programs has created a for-profit company that may do much of the work on its behalf.

If a provision in a Congressional spending bill stands, a transportation-worker identification program will be awarded without competitive bidding to the American Association of Airport Executives, which may assign it to its for-profit venture. In March, the AAAE joined with Daon Inc., a closely held company with expertise in handling biometric data, to create the Security Biometric Clearing Network. At least one other company placed a bid to join the venture. Neither officials from Daon nor the AAAE would disclose the amount of Daon's winning bid, but an official from another company that talked with the AAAE said the association was looking for about $15 million.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the AAAE established the Transportation Security Clearinghouse to expedite processing of background checks on airport workers. The group receives $7 from every $29 fee paid per job application and generally is credited with speeding up and improving the process. Last year, in an insert into a spending bill, Congress directed the TSA to use the clearinghouse as the central contractor for two programs in development.

Competitors said the AAAE shouldn't have an automatic right to the contract. "It's our hope that this earmark language will be carefully reviewed by Congress, with the intent of ensuring a fair and open competition," BearingPoint Inc., a management- and technology-consulting company in McLean, Va., said in a statement.

The Transportation Worker Identification Card program, which is slated to begin this summer, will require workers with access to secure areas of U.S. ports to undergo background checks and have biometric identity cards. TSA plans to start with nearly 400,000 longshoremen and maritime workers and eventually include 750,000 workers. A second program, Registered Traveler, will allow people who pay a fee and submit to background checks to use expedited security lines at airports.

The AAAE and Daon officials said the AAAE didn't guarantee that work from these programs would be funneled to the new company. The official from the rival firm said his company was explicitly told that the new venture would do the work of the existing clearinghouse. Daon Chief Executive Tom Grissen said he hopes that will be the case but has received no such promise. "The thought would be both AAAE and Daon would want the SBCN (the joint venture) to be successful," he said. Mr. Grissen said he is an officer of the venture but declined to specify what position he holds. Neither he nor the AAAE would say what positions are held by AAAE officials. Daon, of Reston, Va., is owned by Dermot Desmond, an Irish citizen.

An AAAE official said the company was formed to work with the clearinghouse. He said the association hoped that the new company could win contracts for credentialing programs in banking, financial services and other areas that the nonprofit association couldn't legally handle. "The only way to drive down costs is to increase volume," he said. The Bush administration opposes the congressional mandate that TSA use the clearinghouse, which is supported by Rep. Harold Rogers (R., Ky.), chairman of the House Appropriations Committee's homeland-security panel.

Trade Group Confirms Deal With Tiny Firm For ID Cards (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 27 — A small biometrics company, whose board includes former Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge, stands to profit from a provision that a powerful Republican congressman wrote into budget law last year.

The law mandates that the Homeland Security Department hire a trade group, the American Association of Airport Executives and its Transportation Security Clearinghouse division, to manage what could turn into contracts together worth hundreds of millions of dollars for a new airport-security program and to issue tamperproof identification cards to millions of transportation workers.

Critics of the provision, written into an appropriation bill at the request of Representative Harold Rogers, the Kentucky Republican who is chairman of the House appropriations subcommittee that oversees domestic security, have questioned how the association, with little experience in high-technology secure identifications and biometrics, could handle such a task.

An executive at the association confirmed in a meeting and conference call among industry officials on Thursday that its clearinghouse had a partnership agreement with Daon, a biometrics company in Dublin, Ireland, according to a transcript of the meeting.

"The partnership with Daon, which is an operational one and related to the clearinghouse, it is really in the interest of making this program successful," said Carter Morris, senior vice president at the airport group, according to the transcript of the call.

The disclosure outraged other potential bidders for the work.

"It is very bad public policy to have an earmark that steers critical aspects of this key national security program to a private organization," said Walter G. Hamilton, chairman of the International Biometric Industry Association.

Daon, backed by Dermot Desmond, one of Ireland's most well-known entrepreneurs, identified landing business with the Homeland Security Department as a crucial corporate strategy nearly three years ago. The company, which has an office in Reston, Va., was a co-sponsor last year of an airport-security conference and a golf outing in Ireland organized by the American Association of Airport Executives. Mr. Rogers attended the conference, a trip paid by the airport group. Mr. Rogers has a long association with the group, receiving thousands of dollars in contributions for his election campaigns over the years and taking other trips to its annual meetings in Hawaii and California.

Mr. Ridge, while homeland security secretary, promoted using technology that relied on fingerprints, the eye iris or face shapes to confirm identities. Since he left the department in February 2004, he has advised companies in related businesses, including Savi Technology, which makes high-tech ship container-security devices.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Ridge, S. Michele Nix, confirmed that he was on the Daon board. She added that Mr. Ridge was not even aware of the language in question being written into the appropriation bill.

The chief executive officer at Daon, Thomas A. Grissen, did not reply on Thursday to messages on his voice mail and with staff members in Reston.

Biometrics is a fast-growing field filled with many small venture-capital-based companies like Daon that are furiously competing for a chunk of the billions of dollars in potential domestic security contracts.

The Transportation Worker Identification Credential program and a separate program, Registered Traveler, which allows airline passengers to move faster than normal through security checkpoints, are two of the biggest targets for those companies. The provision arranged by Mr. Rogers mandates that the Homeland Security Department hire the aviation group for the "purposes of collecting and aggregating biometric data necessary for background vetting; providing all associated record keeping, customer service, and related functions" for both contracts.

Mr. Rogers said he had added the mandate because the aviation group proven in the last four years that it could help the government with security-related background checks for airport workers. The Homeland Security Department is at least two years behind in introducing similar check for other transportation workers, including those at ports.

"There is absolutely no reason to waste more time and money reinventing the wheel," Mr. Rogers said Wednesday, in explaining the mandate, which the Homeland Security Department and others in the Bush administration opposed. His spokeswoman, Leslie Cupp, did not respond to a request for comment on Thursday.

Other biometrics companies are seeking to have the provision rescinded or removed in the budget bill this year.

Conspiracy Film Rewrites Sept. 11 (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, April 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027294

Gypsy Taub, a mother of three from Oakland, does not believe that 9/11 happened. At least not the way the government said it did.

A Russian émigré, Taub is one of a growing number of people in the USA who are using the Internet, college campuses and pamphleteering to get the word out.

“Oh yeah, absolutely. On the day it happened, I thought it was the government that did it,” she said.

Taub is promoting one of the latest presentations of revisionist theories on the al-Qaeda terrorist attacks in 2001, a film that says, among other things, that the Pentagon was hit by a cruise missile fired by the military as an excuse to go to war.

Called Loose Change, it is being downloaded from the Internet and shown in small screenings here and overseas. It is not alone in the genre, and it is not unusual in American history either to offer simplistic explanations or demonize opponents. Presidents from Andrew Jackson to Lyndon Johnson were accused by their contemporaries of massive government conspiracies.

The film appears especially popular among young people immersed in a Web culture brimming with sites that question the credibility of government. They see 9/11 as the defining moment of their lives.

“This is our generation's Vietnam, our generation's Kennedy assassination," says Korey Rowe, 23, the film's producer.

Professors and researchers of film and politics say the Internet is making it far easier to spread such theories because the traditional media are losing their hold on the news. The immense coverage of controversies and accusations surrounding the war on terror has created fertile ground for people who assign their own interpretations to photos, footage, eyewitnesses, investigations and newspaper accounts of what happened, they say.

“The information revolution now gives us access to too much information,” says Jonathan Taplin, who teaches at the Annenberg School for Communications at the University of Southern California. “Our problems are that we're just overwhelmed, so in some sense we just basically don't even know where to turn."

Craig Smith, director of the Center for First Amendment Studies at California State University, Long Beach, cites the unusual nature of 9/11: four airliners simultaneously hijacked and no defenses stop them.

“You would say, come on, I can't even buy that as a movie script,” Smith says. “All of this feeds this readiness for paranoia.”

Made by Rowe and friend Dylan Avery, 22, from Oneonta, N.Y., on a laptop computer for less than $10,000, the film contrasts sharply with United 93, a film opening today that portrays the struggle for the jetliner that crashed in Shanksville, Pa.

Internet chat rooms are full of promos for screenings of Loose Change in such locales as the Santa Cruz Veterans Memorial Building in California; the Université de Sherbrooke, Quebec; Graz, Austria; and a theater in London's Soho district.

“It's been breaking like nobody's business the last two months," says Taub, 36, who is sponsoring a showing Tuesday night in Oakland. “It's all over the place."

Most of what the film alleges is refuted by the evidence at hand. Anything not answered definitively by the government is interpreted by the film as proof of a coverup.

Among the assertions in Loose Change is that a missile hit the Pentagon even though eyewitnesses saw the jet, numerous pieces of wreckage were found including the flight recorder, and those on the flight and in its path at the Pentagon are dead.

There is also the claim that because jet fuel burns at up to 1,500 degrees and steel melts at 2,750 degrees, the World Trade Center's infrastructure could not have been brought down by the airliners. However, as reported by the Journal of the Minerals, Metals and Materials Society, steel loses 50% of its strength at 1,200 degrees, enough for a failure.

“The only thing they (the filmmakers) seem to have gotten right about the Sept. 11 attacks is the date when they occurred," says Debra Burlingame, whose brother was the pilot of American Flight 77 that crashed into the Pentagon.

“They aren't truth-tellers looking to save the world,” she says. “They're con artists hoping to sucker conspiracy-theory paranoids or anti-government malcontents into shelling out their hard-earned dollars."

Some college students who saw Loose Change and are promoting it say it's good to raise questions.

The movie “at the very least suggests that we don't know the whole truth, and that some things are quite fishy," says Matt Latham, a freshman at the University of California, Santa Cruz.

Christian Pecaut, 25, a Stanford graduate who is promoting the film at the University of California, Berkeley campus, said the film is “catchy, hip,” with an “upbeat soundtrack.”

Aaron Williams, a senior at Texas A&M University and president of the philosophy club, believes the film. “Government is corrupt and absolute power corrupts absolutely,” he says.

Penelope Price, a documentary filmmaker and professor at Scottsdale Community College, said she brought the filmmakers to the campus to stimulate critical thinking.

“Students love it," she said. “These guys have done a great job of marketing on the Web, and that was another reason I wanted to bring them in."

Conservative writer David Horowitz, a former 1960s radical, says conspiratorial thinking can offer a world view that is somehow less scary than reality. “Conspiracy theories are a kind of secular religion," he says, adding that campus faculties sometimes encourage anti-government feelings. “People feel great anxiety … by the thought that nobody's in control."

People believe in conspiracy theories because the truth “is either too simple or too remote," says sociologist Clifton Bryant of Virginia Tech University, who has made a study of “deviant logic" and behavior.

“We're always ready to believe something about which we know nothing," he says.

When Hollywood Makes History (WP)

By Paul Farhi

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

"United 93," Hollywood's first big-budget film about the events of Sept. 11, 2001, is faithful to the major aspects of the tragic morning it depicts. The movie tracks the key events detailed in the 9/11 Commission Report, the most definitive source on the subject: the commandeering of the United jet by four terrorists, the panic of the passengers and the heroic rebellion that ended with the plane crashing in a field near Shanksville, Pa.

But the movie, which opens nationwide today, is a dramatic re-creation that includes scenes and images that go far beyond what is known about the attacks.

Those scenes raise questions: How far can a dramatic movie go in imposing its own reality before it distorts the public's understanding of the event? And with memories of 9/11 still vivid and raw, is it too soon for such films to be made?

The questions have special relevance as film producers prepare other 9/11-related projects. Oliver Stone, who portrayed the assassination of John F. Kennedy as the result of a conspiracy in "JFK," is the director of this summer's "World Trade Center." Sony Pictures, meanwhile, is developing the film "102 Minutes," based on the bestseller about the time span between the first tower's crash and its collapse. A TV miniseries based on the 9/11 Commission Report is also in the works.

"United 93's" director, Paul Greengrass, has said he sought to create the "plausible truth" of what happened, given that many details are unknown.

The film asserts that the hijackers' intended target was the Capitol. In one scene, Ziad Jarrah, the Lebanese terrorist who piloted the plane, props a picture of the building on the cockpit's console, imposing a cinematic answer to a question that the 9/11 Commission could not resolve: whether the terrorists were trying to hit the Capitol or the White House. Investigators said that point was a source of contention among the 9/11 plotters, with Osama bin Laden favoring a strike on the White House and others, including Mohamed Atta, favoring the Capitol.

"United 93" also suggests that the terrorists killed the pilot and co-pilot, for example, but what occurred is unclear. A United 93 flight recorder picked up the terrorists ordering someone repeatedly to "sit down" and discussing whether to "bring the pilot back" late in the hijacking.

"United 93" also shows the passengers breaching the cockpit with a beverage cart and wrestling the terrorists for control as the plane plummets. Although the 9/11 report states that the passengers fought back in the flight's final moments, the commission had no indication that the passengers entered the cockpit. The report suggests the opposite: "The hijackers remained at the controls but must have judged that the passengers were only seconds from overcoming them."

Universal Pictures, the film's distributor, says researchers consulted numerous sources, including the 9/11 Commission Report, military and civilian aviation authorities, and more than 100 family members and friends of the victims. The movie's advisers included Ben Sliney, who headed the Federal Aviation Administration's Command Center in Herndon on Sept. 11; Sliney portrays himself in the film.

Lloyd Levin, a "United 93" co-producer, acknowledges that the film went beyond known facts about the flight, but he justifies the movie's approach as artistically necessary. "Our mandate was not the same as the 9/11 Commission Report," Levin said. "Our mandate was to what Paul wanted to say with this movie. We're not journalists. Paul is an artist."

He called some of the questionable depictions "choices we had to make." Whether the passengers actually breached the cockpit is "a moot point, because at that point you're in the area of metaphor," he said.

Those choices might satisfy moviegoers but they rankle those interested in a more literal portrait of the events of Sept. 11.

"I would prefer history tell itself, rather than have Hollywood tell it," said Carie Lemack, whose mother, Judy Larocque, was killed on American Airlines Flight 11, the first plane to hit the World Trade Center. "There's so much we just don't know. Unfortunately, they're taking artistic license with history and people will believe it's accurate. Speculation is okay for drama, but it's less okay when it's purporting to tell history. If they didn't know, why didn't they just leave it out?"

Lemack, co-founder of the organization Families of September 11, has not seen the movie, but she says she was surprised and upset by its trailer and promotional poster, which shows smoke pouring from the World Trade Center towers. She also says the filmmakers missed an opportunity to spur moviegoers to find out more about terrorism and call them to action. (Universal will donate 10 percent of the movie's first weekend ticket sales to a memorial fund.)

The decision to counterattack the terrorists was made after passengers learned that other hijacked planes had crashed, according to the 9/11 report and the film. In addition to the cockpit recordings, eyewitness accounts came from crew members and passengers, who used cellphones and air phones to contact people on the ground. But those accounts were sometimes contradictory and fragmentary, and the 9/11 Commission acknowledged that many details never will be known.

Levin acknowledges that in dramatizing the course of the flight, "United 93" makes creative leaps to fill in the blanks. For example, it's not clear who among the passengers spearheaded the response to the terrorists. One passenger, in a phone call from the plane, left it vague: "Everyone's running up to first class. I've got to go. Bye." The 9/11 Commission could not identify whose voices are heard as the passengers storm the cockpit door. "United 93" tackles this uncertainty with a reasonable assumption: that the charge was led by the strongest, most athletic men, including a judo champion.

Other scenes appear to be wholly invented. In one, a passenger who argued for cooperating with the hijackers is restrained by others as the counterattack begins. In another, the passengers are shown overwhelming two hijackers and apparently killing them. Both depictions might be dramatically satisfying, but there's no evidence that either of those events occurred.

Many of the victims' immediate relatives have endorsed the movie, saying it fairly represents their final hours. David Beamer, whose son Todd Beamer was killed, told the Associated Press this week: "Our personal reaction was one of relief, because they got it right. When it comes to September 11 and United Flight 93, we don't need another movie. This one got it."

But others question whether it was necessary to make even one movie about an event that many have lived through.

Bruce Hoffman, a Washington-based counterterrorism expert with the Rand Corp., notes that the news media have long avoided replaying some of the more disturbing images of Sept. 11. But, he says: "These equally horrible events are now being depicted as entertainment. I don't know why that's more acceptable.

"Producers and directors can have the purest and best intentions to re-create the horror and tragedy and bravery of the passengers. But the bottom line is, it's still entertainment. You have to question whether making it into entertainment cheapens and demeans it."

How Not To Treat Friends (WP)

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

CONGRESS tightened a law last year on refugee admissions in order (it thought) to keep terrorists and their supporters out of the country. The effect has been to bar friends and allies.

One example: Many Vietnamese Montagnards fought alongside U.S. forces during the Vietnam War and were then murderously oppressed by the Vietnamese government. During the war, the United States helped arm a Montagnard group called the United Front for the Liberation of Oppressed Races, which continued to struggle for autonomy after the war ended. This group ceased to exist in 1992, when a band of nearly 400 fighters disarmed and were resettled in North Carolina. Under Congress's irrational new rules, however, the group has become, legally speaking, a terrorist organization, and 11 Montagnards still stuck in Cambodia would be denied refugee status because in the past they had offered the group "material support."

The Montagnards are not the law's only, or even principal, victims. Thousands of ethnic victims of the Burmese military regime, living in camps in Thailand, expected after long waits to receive refugee status; now they're stuck in limbo. So are large numbers of Colombians who were forced to support the leftist rebels of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia. Liberians, Somalis and anti-Castro Cuban dissidents are also being branded terrorists and kept out.

Misguided law now prevents the admission of a member or backer of any group of "two or more individuals" that "engages in, or has a subgroup which engages in," activities as commonplace as using an "explosive, firearm or other weapon or dangerous device." The law treats a Montagnard who once aided a U.S.-backed group no differently from an al-Qaeda operative. The administration has the authority to override this absurdity in certain instances, though not all. But it has not used this limited power, and even the need for a waiver is galling. America should not be "forgiving" people who did not, in fact, support terrorism. These are victims -- exactly the sort of people refugee and asylum programs are meant to protect.

An amendment being offered to the supplemental appropriations bill by Sens. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) would solve the problem cleanly. It would clarify that only associates and supporters of groups certified by the government as terrorist organizations should be denied refugee status and that those forced to aid terrorists are not themselves terrorists. Congress did not mean to create this problem. Fixing it should not be controversial.

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Spending Probe Expands To Security Forces (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

The Bush administration's special investigator for Iraq reconstruction has expanded inquiries into how the U.S. military is training and equipping the Iraqi Security Forces (ISF), according to an internal Pentagon memo.

Special Inspector General Stuart W. Bowen Jr. asked the Pentagon for reams of documents on the billions of dollars spent to create an Iraqi army, police, border patrol, navy and air force, the memo shows.

Some Pentagon officials say privately that the inspector is overstepping his mandate by probing U.S. military operations in addition to reconstruction dollars. But the chief spokesman for Mr. Bowen said security and reconstruction are intertwined.

"There is Iraq relief and reconstruction money that is for security and that is in our mandate," said spokesman James P. Mitchell. "There has been an American investment in the security and justice sectors, and we have an obligation to look at that."

Mr. Mitchell said Mr. Bowen has been seeking more documents from the Pentagon. An April memo signed by a senior Pentagon official confirms he will receive them. "We needed to get that high level of support, and we have that," he said.

Congress created, and President Bush appointed, the special inspector general to provide critically needed oversight on $24 billion in U.S. funds and billions of dollars in Iraq oil money being used to rebuild Iraq after the 2003 ousting of Saddam Hussein. Mr. Bowen's reports and audits mostly have dealt with water, electricity, oil and infrastructure projects that are considered crucial if Iraq is to emerge as a functioning democracy.

Just as important is the U.S. nurturing of the ISF, which now numbers about 250,000. Withdrawing about 132,000 American troops in Iraq is dependent on the ISF's ability to fight the deadly insurgency largely on its own.

Mr. Mitchell said the inspector general has looked at ISF issues, but the new Pentagon data will allow for a closer examination.

The Pentagon memo to Mr. Bowen vouched for SIGIR, the acronym for Mr. Bowen's office. "The Department of Defense fully supports SIGIR's work in support of the Iraqi reconstruction effort," said the memo, signed by William R. Marriott, executive secretary in the office of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Mr. Bowen has submitted a request for documents in three areas: the creation of the ISF, the building of security facilities, and what is called "capacity building" in the new ministries of Interior and Defense, the Marriott memo said. The memo was a response to an April 4 letter from Mr. Bowen.

On the ISF request, the Pentagon response was that Mr. Bowen should rely on the quarterly reports it provided to Congress.

"The report provides extensive information on the objectives for training and equipping Iraq's security forces, the metrics for measuring their progress and amplifying data," Mr. Marriott stated. "Because the report provides metrics and data specifically requested by Congress, it should be sufficient for purposes of writing your quarterly report."

The memo said the Pentagon's Defense Reconstruction Support Office will supply information on building bases for the ISF, but that the Pentagon is unaware of any U.S. funds for Interior or Defense capacity building.

To some in the Pentagon, Mr. Bowen's request for ISF documents is a foray into areas Congress never authorized. They characterized Mr. Marriott's response as reserved.

"This is further evidence that SIGIR is overreaching," said a senior defense official, who asked not to be identified because he is not authorized to speak for the Pentagon. "Congress never intended him to investigate all these things."

This same official has been critical of some of SIGIR's draft reports because officials become tied up with correcting them instead of focusing on reconstruction.

Mr. Mitchell said most draft findings come back with the notation "concur." He said Mr. Bowen's reports and recommendations have resulted in improved use of taxpayer money.

"We're focusing on all the sectors, but because it's so important and we have identified and talked about the 'reconstruction gap,' which was a function of moving money into security and putting more money into security, it's kind of hard to report on what the U.S. is doing in Iraq without looking at security," Mr. Bowen said.

The gap refers to the difference between the number of construction projects originally planned and the number built, which was reduced because money was shifted to security.

'Grand Mafiosi' Corrupting Iraq's Oil Sector (WT)

By Jim Muir, London Daily Telegraph

DOJ_NMG_0027298

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A new class of "grand mafiosi" is sucking billions of dollars out of Iraq's vital oil sector and crippling efforts to rebuild the nation, according to an official report published in Baghdad.

The findings of the Oil Ministry's inspector-general paint a sordid picture of corruption pervading every corner of the industry, from the oil wells to the gasoline pump.

The report says that since Saddam Hussein's overthrow in 2003, the spread of smuggling had turned Iraq from a major exporter of petroleum products into an importer.

"These problems have led to the loss of billions of dollars, both in direct actual losses and in lost opportunities," according to the report.

"This is robbing Iraq of historic opportunities for revival and reconstruction and of basic necessities for a ruined nation and heavily burdened people."

The report calls for "radical and urgent action" to stop the abuses and punish those involved, including new legislation and penalties to make oil smuggling a crime of "grand economic sabotage."

Walid Khadduri, economics editor of the pan-Arab al-Hayat newspaper, estimates that smuggling and other rackets in Iraq are costing the country more than $18 billion a year in direct losses and missed opportunities.

"There is no accountability, no punishment and it goes all the way to the top -- the smuggling gangs are in cahoots with local authorities and politicians because they need protection," he said. "There was corruption under Saddam, but nowhere near this."

The ministry report says smuggling has created a "new class of grand mafiosi" and that a corrosive environment of corruption is affecting everybody in the oil business and destroying public faith in politicians.

The report documents abuses ranging from direct theft from oil consignments and pipelines, to fraud involving false documentation for imported oil.

Even roadside supplies of black-market gasoline sold locally were worth an estimated $900 million a year to the illegal profiteers, according to the report.

The report estimates that 10 percent to 20 percent of the refined products that Iraq now is obliged to import from neighboring Turkey, Syria and Jordan are being smuggled back to their countries of origin after receiving Iraqi government subsidies to bring the price down for local consumption.

Part of the problem is that product prices in those countries are significantly higher than Iraqi levels, which are government-subsidized to the tune of about $7 billion a year to keep them within reach of the distressed Iraqi consumer.

Iraqi Official Expects Start Of U.S. Exit, With A Big Pullout This Year (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- A senior Iraqi official said there would be a substantial withdrawal of U.S. troops this year, with the rest leaving within the next two years.

Speaking to senior U.S., Iraqi and British security officials, Iraqi National Security Adviser Mowaffak Rubaie said the Iraqi government was working to formalize a "conditions-based transition agreement" with the U.S. that would govern the pace and scope of a U.S. military withdrawal from the country. Such an agreement would detail a timeline for turning U.S. military facilities over to the Iraqis and leaving Iraqi forces with primary security responsibility for growing portions of the country.

"Certainly at the end of the year there is going to be a sizable gross reduction in U.S. troops," Mr. Rubaie said as he stood beside Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. "At the end of next year, we will hope, or the next couple of years, we will hope that most of the coalition forces will go back home safely."

Mr. Rumsfeld declined to comment on the timing of a drawdown of the 132,000 U.S. troops, as did his aides. During his visit to Iraq, Mr. Rumsfeld has declined to address the possibility of a withdrawal, but other U.S. commanders have confirmed that one is likely to begin this year.

Mr. Rubaie's comments are consistent with statements he has made since the beginning of the year, but both Iraqis and Americans agreed that big troop reductions wouldn't be possible until a new government was installed. Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. military commander in Iraq, said Wednesday that the selection of a Shiite prime-minister nominee, which helped break months of political paralysis over the makeup of Iraq's next government, sets the stage for the beginning of a U.S. military withdrawal.

Although Gen. Casey declined to specify how many troops are likely to be withdrawn, some Defense Department officials privately have spoken of cutting this year the U.S. presence by as many as 30,000.

DOJ_NMG_0027299

Speaking to U.S. reporters Wednesday, Gen. J. D. Thurman, whose forces have primary responsibility for the Baghdad area, said he has ordered his soldiers to allow Iraqi forces to take the lead whenever possible during searches of buildings, offices or mosques in the city.

Top Iraqi Ayatollah Urges Action To Rein In Militias (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Saad Sarhan

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, April 27 -- Iraq's most revered Shiite Muslim cleric urged Prime Minister-designate Nouri al-Maliki in a meeting Thursday to deal quickly with sectarian militias blamed for widespread killings, and to ensure that Iraqi police and soldiers remain loyal to the country and not to political factions.

Wading into what has emerged as the first major issue facing Maliki, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani said it had "become necessary to have weapons only in the hands of government forces," according to a statement released by his office.

The government must also "rebuild these forces on sound, patriotic bases so that their allegiance shall be to the homeland alone, not to any other political or other groups," Sistani told Maliki, who was chosen by a coalition of Shiite religious parties. The two men met Thursday in the southern city of Najaf, home to Iraq's Shiite clerical leaders.

Shiite militias such as the Mahdi Army, led by the firebrand cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, and the Badr Organization, which is tied to Iraq's largest political party, dominate many Iraqi police and army units and have been accused by Sunni Arab leaders and U.S. officials of operating death squads.

Maliki also met on Thursday with Sadr, who gave a noncommittal answer when asked at a news conference afterward about plans to disband militias.

"In fact, all the factions which are inside or outside the government converge in the interest and service of the Iraqi people," said Sadr, whose Mahdi Army clashed with U.S. forces in 2004 and has been the target of a recent series of raids in Baghdad and southern Iraq.

Also on Thursday, a roadside bomb attack against an Italian army convoy in Nasiriyah, about 200 miles south of Baghdad, killed three Italian soldiers and one from Romania, Italian officials announced. Romano Prodi, who will head Italy's next government, said the killings would not expedite a planned withdrawal of the more than 2,500 Italian troops in Iraq.

"We won't fly away. Of course we shall work in Iraq for peace in order to help reconstruction," he said at a news conference in Rome, according to the Associated Press, which reported that 27 Italian soldiers have died in Iraq, including 19 in the bombing of a barracks in 2003.

Two insurgent groups asserted responsibility for the attacks in Internet postings -- the Islamic Army in Iraq and the Imam Hussein Brigades. Neither claim could be immediately verified.

Maliki and U.S. officials in Baghdad have said one of the new government's top priorities should be dealing with the armed groups -- perhaps by incorporating their members into the security forces on an individual basis -- though no detailed plan has been announced.

Asked Thursday who would be named to head the country's security ministries, which U.S. officials have said should be put beyond the control of politicians with ties to militias, Maliki said the posts "would be given to independent members, but it's not definite yet."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who visited Iraq this week along with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, said the establishment of a new Iraqi government after months of haggling over the prime minister's post would pave the way for enacting policies to stem militia violence.

Sadr called the visit by the American cabinet secretaries "a flagrant interference in Iraqi affairs."

Shiite militias now rival Iraq's Sunni Arab-led insurgency as the country's top security threat, U.S. officials say. But a military spokesman in Baghdad said Thursday that the solutions to the two threats would be different.

"The only way we can deal with Zarqawi or al-Qaeda is to kill or capture them," Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch said. "We believe there are other ways to solve the militia problem. . . . The solution to the militia problem is, indeed, a political solution."

Elsewhere in Iraq on Thursday, police in and around Baqubah, about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, repelled attacks on several police stations and road checkpoints, killing 19 insurgents and capturing 25 others, according to Maj. Gen. Ghassan Abbas Bawi, police commander in Diyala province.

At least 10 police officers were also killed in the clashes, which sparked a series of evening raids by security forces in the southern part of the city, which has been hit by a large number of attacks in recent weeks. Police also announced a province-wide curfew Friday from 6 a.m. to 4 p.m.

Iraq's New Premier Gains Support In Talks With Shiite Leaders (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0027300

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, April 27 — Hours after ending two days of meetings with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, the Iraqi prime minister-designate, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, traveled to the Shiite holy city of Najaf to meet with two of the powers he must now contend with, the Shiite leaders Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and Moktada al-Sadr.

Violence cast a shadow on the meetings, with the drive-by killing in Baghdad of the sister of Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi and the deaths of one Romanian and three Italian soldiers near Nasiriya, which spurred calls from some Italian political leaders to speed up the withdrawal of the country's 2,600 remaining troops in Iraq.

In his meeting with Ayatollah Sistani, Mr. Maliki won a statement from the religious leader calling for an end to militias and urging that the Iraqi security forces be freed from the grip of sectarian and political dominance. "Weapons should be carried only by government forces" loyal to the government and not to leaders of political or other groups, the ayatollah said.

It was a firm message of support for Mr. Maliki, who said on Thursday that he believed he could complete the selection of his cabinet within a week. Mr. Maliki, with prodding from the United States ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, has made a priority of reducing the influence of the militias that have helped push Iraq to the brink of civil war.

Sunni Arab leaders say that hundreds of young Sunni men who have been found murdered with drill holes in their limbs or head or other signs of torture are the victims of Shiite death squads often wearing official police or security forces uniforms.

But making a dent in the militias' influence will be difficult to accomplish, as some elements of the Iraqi Army and security forces are already dominated by members loyal to one militia or another.

Indeed, in a demonstration of the balancing act Mr. Maliki must perform both as prime minister and as leader of a fractious Shiite coalition, he met next with Mr. Sadr, the anti-American cleric who oversees the militia known as the Mahdi Army, thousands of young Shiite men who control northeastern Baghdad and have fought fierce battles with the American military.

Mr. Maliki was careful not to offend Mr. Sadr, perhaps the most influential single force in the Shiite coalition, suggesting that militias deserve to remain an influence, even if only from within the military.

"Merging the militias into the military," Mr. Maliki said, "is not to disrespect them but to reward them for their role in the struggle against dictatorship," a reference to fighting by Kurdish and Shiite forces against Saddam Hussein. "And it is a solution to the problem of having weapons outside the government."

Mr. Maliki also pledged to name nonsectarians to run the Iraqi Interior and Defense Ministries.

Mr. Maliki's political pilgrimage to Najaf came as Baghdad residents were reminded that even the most powerful Iraqi leaders cannot protect family members from the savage violence here.

Mr. Hashemi's sister was shot dead in a morning rush-hour ambush near her home. Her death came only two weeks after the murder of Mr. Hashemi's brother, and served as another indication of how insurgents are intent on terrorizing leaders of the new government. While government leaders are heavily guarded, their families are often easier targets.

Mr. Hashemi's sister, Maysoon al-Hashemi, 61, who was director of women's affairs in her brother's Iraqi Islamic Party, was buried a few hours later. Co-workers recalled how bravely she took the news that her brother Mahmoud had been assassinated on April 13.

Inside the Green Zone on Thursday, an American military spokesman offered an optimistic view of the situation in Iraq, saying the country was "moving away" from civil war.

"All indications now are the acts of violence — ethnosectarian violence is decreasing," Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch said at a news briefing. He cited a 60 percent decrease in casualties in Baghdad in the week starting April 16 compared with the previous week. Yet he also acknowledged that casualties had soared by 90 percent in the past 10 weeks, since before the bombing of the Askariya Shrine in Samarra in late February set off a wave of sectarian violence.

Other newly released American government findings cast Iraq's situation in even less positive terms. The Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, reported that attacks against American-led forces, Iraqis and infrastructure increased 23 percent from 2004 to 2005.

"The insurgency intensified through October 2005 and has remained strong and resilient since then," the G.A.O. said in a 31-page report. "Many Iraqis in Baghdad and the central and northern Sunni areas have lost confidence in the Iraqi Army and police to improve the security situation. In some Sunni areas, support for the insurgents has increased, and Iraqi Shias have expressed greater confidence in their militias."

The G.A.O. also found that in contrast to past assertions that four provinces were facing serious problems, six were in "serious" shape and one was "critical." The finding was based on a study by the military and American Embassy in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0027301

Before leaving Iraq, Ms. Rice and Mr. Rumsfeld voiced support again for Mr. Maliki as a strong leader who could re-establish confidence in the government, while Iraq's national security adviser, Dr. Muwaffak al-Rubaie, suggested there could be a large reduction in American troops by 2007.

Powerful Iraqi Cleric Call For Disarmament (LAT)

By Bruce Wallace And Saad Fakhrildeen

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

NAJAF, Iraq — Reaching across a sectarian divide, Iraq's highest-ranking Shiite Muslim cleric called on militias to disarm today, saying only government forces should be permitted to carry weapons on the streets.

Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the Iranian-born religious leader regarded as the Shiite majority's most powerful moral voice, also urged Iraqis to form a government blind to religious and ethnic differences.

"Weapons must be in the hands of government security forces that should not be tied to political parties but to the nation," said a statement of remarks released by Sistani's office in the Shiite holy city of Najaf.

"The first task for the government is fighting insecurity and putting an end to the terrorist acts that threaten innocents with death and kidnapping."

Leaders of Iraq's Sunni minority have claimed to be under siege from marauding gangs of Shiite gunmen, some alleged to be working within the government's own security forces.

Sistani's statement followed a visit to his home in Najaf by Prime Minister-designate Nouri Maliki. The new Iraqi leader came to pay political homage to Sistani while in the midst of trying to form a government acceptable to all of Iraq's fractious political parties, some of whose claim to power is backed by heavily armed militias.

The new leader is getting plenty of advice as he works to pull a government together.

Many here worry Maliki may be forced to fill key government posts according to a sectarian formula for sharing power across the spectrum of Shiite, Sunni, Kurdish and secular parties.

Avoiding a government with sectarian hues was the main subject of discussions between Maliki and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice during her visit, along with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, to Baghdad this week. Rice left for Bulgaria later today, telling reporters in the heavily guarded Green Zone she was convinced Maliki and his advisors were committed to appointing ministers based on competence.

"Obviously, the key now is to get the government up and running, to get ministers who are capable and who also will reflect the value of a national unity government, and then to get about the work of dealing with the security situation, dealing with the economic situation," she said, according to news agencies.

But it was the unusually direct political intervention from Sistani that rang loudest here. The cleric is regarded as the voice of Shiite moderation, though he prefers to exercise his influence through subtle backroom whispers. Last week, it was a nudge from Sistani that contributed to the decision by interim Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari to abandon his quest to keep the top job in the face of great opposition.

Sistani was more direct today. Maliki emerged from their meeting to tell reporters that the cleric had "advised us, as always, to be Iraqis first."

Maliki also said his government would merge militias into the legitimate state security forces, a proposal that challenges the power of some of his own strongest backers, notably radical cleric Muqtada Sadr.

The two men held a joint news conference in which Sadr denounced the Rice-Rumsfeld visit for "its blatant interference in Iraqi affairs," repeated his call for an end to the U.S. occupation, but dodged the question of whether he would disband his own militia known as the Al Mahdi army.

U.S. Army Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch today said insurgent attacks in Baghdad had decreased by 10% last week and said the number of victims of ethnic and sectarian violence in the capital was the lowest last week since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra.

"We don't see us moving toward a civil war in Iraq," he said. "In fact we're seeing a movement away."

But the violence continued at a steady throb across Iraq. The sister of Tariq Hashemi, Iraq's new vice president and leading Sunni politician, was killed along with her bodyguard in a drive-by shooting as she left home for work in Baghdad.

The murder came just two weeks after one of Hashemi's brothers was assassinated, and two days after a video from Al Qaeda in Iraq leader Abu Musab Zarqawi declared that Sunnis who cooperated with the new government were American "agents" and would be killed.

Elsewhere, three Italian and a Romanian soldier died in a roadside bombing of their convoy near their base in Nasiriyah, 200 miles south of Baghdad. There were also clashes between U.S. forces and insurgents in Ramadi.

Police said 16 bodies were also recovered in Baghdad and other cities, victims of execution-style killings.

Top Shiite Cleric Endorses Plan To Disband Militias (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD — The incoming prime minister won the backing Thursday of Iraq's top Shiite cleric for his plan to disband militias, which the United States believes is critical to calming sectarian strife and halting the country's slide toward civil war.

The endorsement of Prime Minister-designate Nouri al-Maliki's plan came during a meeting in Najaf with Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani. The ayatollah told al-Maliki, a Shiite tapped last weekend to form a government, that security should be his top priority.

"Therefore, weapons must be exclusively in the hands of government forces, and these forces must be built on a proper national basis so that their loyalty is to the country alone, not to political or other sides," a statement from Sistani's office said.

Al-Maliki has said he plans to integrate militias, many linked to Shiite parties, into the army and police. To ensure their loyalty, he wants to appoint defense and interior ministers without connections to militias. Attempts by previous Iraqi governments to abolish militias have failed, and their numbers have grown.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the second-ranking U.S. general in Iraq, said Wednesday that militias pose an urgent threat to the country's stability and were "an issue we've got to get fixed."

The leader of one major militia, radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, refrained Thursday from endorsing calls to disband his Mahdi Army. After a separate meeting with al-Maliki, the cleric was asked whether he would give up his militia. He replied: "All groups inside or outside the government work for the people's interest and service."

Sectarian tensions rose dramatically after the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, triggering reprisal attacks against Sunni mosques and clerics.

In a briefing Thursday, however, U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch said that "we are not seeing widespread militia operations across Iraq" and that "ethno-sectarian" attacks had dropped by half in Baghdad over the last week.

Lynch also said U.S. forces had found no "widespread movement" of Shiites and Sunnis away from religiously mixed areas.

"So we do not see us moving toward a civil war in Iraq," Lynch said. "In fact we see us moving away from it."

Al-Maliki has until late May to present his Cabinet to parliament, the final step in building a national unity government.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld departed Thursday after two days of talks with al-Maliki and other Iraqi officials.

Also Thursday:

·Gunmen assassinated Mayson al-Hashimi, the sister of Sunni Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi. She was killed as she left her home in a southwestern Baghdad neighborhood, police said. Her bodyguard was also slain.

·Three Italian soldiers and one Romanian soldier were killed in a bombing in southern Iraq. The soldiers were killed near Nasiriyah, 200 miles southeast of Baghdad, when a bomb exploded near their four-vehicle convoy in a Shiite area. The death was Romania's first combat loss of the war.

Gunmen In Baghdad Kill Sister Of Iraqi Vice President (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, April 27 -- Two sedans loaded with gunmen sped through the streets of Baghdad on Thursday morning, chasing the sister of Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi.

As one of the attackers' cars cut off the sport-utility vehicle carrying Mayson al-Hashimi, the other drove past, spraying the vehicle with bullets and killing the 60-year-old woman, whose biggest offense was being related to a prominent Sunni leader.

A wounded survivor traveling with Hashimi told the police what had happened, police Gen. Raad Khudaier Tamimi said. Meanwhile, attackers left behind a note, Tamimi said.

"This is a punishment for those who collaborate," the note said. It was signed, "Monotheism and Jihad."

Mayson al-Hashimi was the second sibling whom Tariq al-Hashimi, one of Iraq's two vice presidents, has lost since April 13, when another pack of gunmen killed his brother, Mahmoud al-Hashimi.

That was before Tariq al-Hashimi and his fellow vice president, Adel Abdul Mahdi -- both of whom served in the transitional government -- took office on Saturday at a meeting of Iraq's newly formed parliament. Hashimi, a Sunni, vowed with his Shiite and Kurdish colleagues to defeat the country's insurgent movement and restore national stability.

DOJ_NMG_0027303

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had called Hashimi earlier this month to express her condolences for his brother's killing. She also met the vice president in a one-on-one session during her visit to Iraq on Wednesday. A day later, Hashimi's sister was killed.

Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, a U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, paid tribute to Hashimi: "He and many others like him are true Iraqi patriots," he said. "They're doing what they're doing at great risk and great personal sacrifice."

Living in Iraq has its share of dangers, but stepping into the limelight of politics makes it that much easier for a lawmaker and his family to wind up in the cross hairs of any number of armed factions. Few politicians have been spared threats or tragedy. Abdul Mahdi -- a Shiite -- lost his brother at the hands of insurgents last fall. Attackers killed two sons of Mithal Alousi, a secular Sunni politician, after he made an unpopular visit to Israel.

Provincial governors, who have less security, have even more problems: The governor of Nineveh province in northern Iraq has survived at least three attempts on his life and has lost a son and five other relatives.

The sister of Interior Minister Bayan Jabr, another Shiite, was kidnapped in January but later released. The brother of Saleh al-Mutlak, an outspoken Sunni political leader, met another fate: Police found his body on April 17, a few days after he was kidnapped.

Mutlak, a friend of Hashimi's, said he could sympathize with his colleague's loss.

"We feel very sorry for him," he said in a telephone interview.

"I have other brothers, but he was the most active one among all of them," Mutlak said of his slain brother, Taha al-Mutlak. "He had a very strong personality, was very influential in society. He did a lot in politics, and in a very short period. I think this is why they targeted him, because they saw that he was very influential."

One of the hardest things to deal with, Mutlak said, is not knowing who did it.

"Our people are being killed every day, and we don't know who did it, who hates Iraq and Iraqis," Mutlak said. "Is this al-Qaeda or is it a regional power?" A moment later he acknowledged that "regional power" was an allusion to Iran, a neighboring Shiite theocracy that many Sunnis believe is supporting Shiite militias in Iraq.

There was little clarity even in the note left behind by Mayson al-Hashimi's attackers. Monotheism and Jihad was the name of the Sunni insurgent organization led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, but the group changed its name months ago to al-Qaeda in Iraq and has often acted recently under the name Mujaheddin Shura Council.

With no answers, Mutlak said, he had no choice but to return to his mission in politics.

"My life is not important anymore," he said. "The lives of Iraqis -- if I can do something good for them, I will not hesitate at all."

Sunni Leader's Sister Fatally Shot In Baghdad (WT/AP)

By Thomas Wagner, Associated Press

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A sister of Iraq's new Sunni Arab vice president was killed yesterday in a drive-by shooting in Baghdad, a day after the politician called for the Sunni-dominated insurgency to be crushed by force.

In southern Iraq, a bomb hit an Italian military convoy, killing four soldiers -- three Italians and a Romanian -- and seriously injuring another passenger, officials in Rome said. The bomb struck the convoy near an Italian military base in Nasariyah, a heavily Shi'ite city 200 miles southeast of Baghdad, a local Iraqi government spokesman said.

Elsewhere, a U.S. jet fired two missiles at insurgent positions in Ramadi, U.S. officers said. Fighting also broke out between Iraqi forces and insurgents northeast of Baghdad, killing several Iraqi police officers and civilians.

The violence came as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld visited Baghdad to meet with officials in Iraq's new government. Nouri al-Maliki, a Shi'ite hard-liner recently tapped as Iraq's prime minister, is trying to form a national unity government aimed at stopping a wave of sectarian violence.

Yesterday, Mr. al-Maliki met with Iraq's top shi'ite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Husseini al-Sistani, and won his backing for his plan to disband militias, which Washington sees as the key to calming sectarian strife.

Mayson Ahmed Bakir al-Hashimi, 60, whose brother, Tariq al-Hashimi, was appointed by parliament as vice president Saturday, was killed by gunmen in a sedan as she left her southwestern Baghdad home with her bodyguard, police said. The bodyguard also died.

It was the second recent killing in Mr. al-Hashimi's immediate family. On April 13, his brother, Mahmoud al-Hashimi, was shot while driving in a mostly Shi'ite area of eastern Baghdad.

Mrs. al-Hashimi had worked on the government's audit commission and was married with two grown children.

DOJ_NMG_0027304

"What astonished us is that they targeted a woman. This shows how wicked the attackers are," said Ziyad al-Ani, a senior official in the vice president's Iraqi Islamic Party. He said the killings "by the enemies of Iraq" will fail in their goal of driving Mr. al-Hashimi and his party from government.

The party is one of three major Sunni political groups in the Iraqi Accordance Front, which won 44 seats in the Dec. 15 parliamentary election.

On Wednesday, Mr. al-Hashimi called for Iraq's insurgency to be put down by force. Shi'ites had demanded that Sunni officials make such a statement to demonstrate their commitment to building a democratic system.

Mr. al-Hashimi also shrugged off a video released this week by Abu Musab Zarqawi, during which the al Qaeda in Iraq leader tried to rally Sunnis to fight the new government and denounced Sunnis who cooperate with it as "agents" of the Americans.

"I say, yes, we're agents. We're agents for Islam, for the oppressed. We have to defend the future of our people," Mr. al-Hashimi said at a press conference with President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, and his fellow vice president, Shi'ite Adil Abdul-Mahdi.

New Government Doesn't Slow Iraq Killings (AP)

By Thomas Wagner

AP, April 28, 2006

One year ago Friday, when Iraq formed its first freely elected government, Americans and Iraqis hoped it would lead to a drop in violence. But Iraqis have continued to die in the thousands, and this year the trend is up.

Figures compiled by The Associated Press over the past 12 months show more than 8,000 people have been killed and there are increasing cases of civilians being kidnapped, killed and dumped in public places.

The numbers offer a counterpoint of caution for Washington's hopes that Iraq's second freely elected government, being formed now, will help curb violence.

American officials tout the selection of a new prime minister April 22 as the start of a unity government that could bring closer the departure of U.S. troops. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld visited Iraq on Wednesday to show their support.

But optimistic forecasts that accompanied other milestones — the 2004 restoration of Iraqi sovereignty after U.S. occupation and the formation of the first elected government 10 months later — turned sour.

Twice last year, on Jan. 30 and Dec. 15, millions of Iraqis risked their lives to vote in free elections for new parliaments, then watched their chosen legislators squabble for months over forming a government.

When the first freely elected government in decades took office a year ago Friday, Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari said Iraqis who had "challenged tyranny" at the polls "will help this government to succeed and will not be intimidated."

A year later, al-Jaafari has been denied a second term, blamed for failing to deliver on that pledge.

When al-Jaafari took over, U.S. officials and many Iraqis hoped security would improve, but the insurgency soon resumed. Sectarian tensions also began to rise and, with the bombing of an important Shiite shrine two months ago, burst into outright fighting.

AP's figures show that at least 8,107 Iraqis have been killed and 10,519 wounded, most of them civilians, in the year beginning April 28, 2005.

The top killer was bombs (3,895), followed by gunfire (1,960) and the discovery of dumped bodies (1,684).

In March alone, at least 1,038 Iraqis were killed in war-related violence, according to AP figures — the highest monthly total in the past 12 months.

Three of the five largest surges in violence during the year have occurred since January. That is especially true regarding the dumping of bodies. Four of the five biggest increases in that category occurred in the months of March and April.

When it comes to deaths by gunfire, the first, third and fourth largest increases have occurred since mid-January. Serious suicide bombings happened throughout the year, but the worst such attacks — killing more than 120 people — came Jan. 5.

These numbers include civilians, government officials, and police and security forces, and are considered only a minimum based on AP reporting. The actual number is likely higher, as many killings go unreported or uncounted.

AP's tally is compiled from hospital, police and military officials cited in news stories, as well as accounts from reporters and photographers at the scenes. The security personnel include Iraqi military, police and police recruits, and bodyguards. Insurgent deaths are not a part of the Iraqi count.

Also not included in this count are the nearly 1,000 Shiite pilgrims killed in August 2005 during a bridge stampede caused by someone shouting there was a suicide bomber in their midst.

AP began collecting this information on April 28, 2005, when the first freely elected government after Saddam Hussein's downfall took office.

DOJ_NMG_0027305

The AP study reaches back one year. Other studies suggest that the violence has increased yearly since the U.S. invasion. Iraq Body Count, a British anti-war group, said more than 12,600 Iraqi civilians were killed in the year ending March 1, up 10 percent from the previous year and about double the total for the first year after the U.S. invaded.

In Iraq's widespread violence, it often is difficult to tell whether insurgents, militias or common criminals are responsible for killings.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad recently said Iraq's militias are killing more people than insurgents are.

And the protracted legislative squabbling before the new prime minister-designate, Nouri al-Maliki, was picked may have allowed the militias to break free of the limited control that political parties have over them and to step up sectarian killings, said Toby Dodge, an Iraq specialist at the International Institute of Strategic Studies in London.

Civil war may already be largely under way in Iraq, said Bob Ayers of the Chatham House think tank in London. Either way, Iraq faces tough choices and problems.

"The freedom to vote is unique. The Iraqi people clearly wanted to do that," he said. "But imposing democracy and changing the government structure doesn't change the country's historical, cultural and religious problems."

The AP's News Research Center in New York contributed to this report.

Rice, Rumsfeld In Separate Orbits In Baghdad (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

BAGHDAD, April 27 -- A full 10 seconds of silence passed after a reporter asked Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld what the intense secrecy and security surrounding their visit to Iraq signified about the stability of the country three years after the U.S.-led invasion. Rice turned to Rumsfeld to provide the answer. Rumsfeld glared at the reporter.

"I guess I don't think it says anything about it," he snapped. He went on to say that President Bush had directed him and Rice to go to Iraq to "meet with the new leadership, and it happens that they are located here," a reference to the heavily fortified Green Zone where U.S. officials -- and many Iraqi leaders -- live and work.

Rice broke in, calming the tension. "The security situation will continue to take our attention and the attention of the Iraqis," she said, adding, "The terrorists are ultimately going to be defeated by a political process here."

For the second time in a month, Rice traveled to Baghdad to jawbone Iraqi leaders with a high-powered male counterpart. Last time, her partner was British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw. The pairing with him was convivial, so filled with easygoing banter that it was quickly dubbed the "Condi and Jack Show."

This time around, Rice and Rumsfeld often seemed in separate orbits, and the visit had little of the warmth of the earlier one. One purpose of this joint trip was to get the sometimes conflicting military and political operations in sync for the transition to a permanent Iraqi government. But the contrast in the two secretaries' styles was sometimes jarring.

Even though her arrival here followed an exhausting sprint through Greece and Turkey, Rice appeared energized by the task at hand. Rumsfeld arrived directly from Washington -- after a recent Asian tour -- but he seemed disengaged and bored, both to reporters traveling with him and to some U.S. officials. Some said he seemed irritated by the whole exercise. He did not speak a word to reporters with him on the flight to Baghdad.

During a joint meeting with reporters traveling with the secretaries, Rumsfeld frequently doodled with a black felt-tip pen or stared absent-mindedly at the ceiling when Rice spoke. Rice would occasionally cast a nervous glance at Rumsfeld as he prepared to respond to a question. His answers were terse; hers were expansive.

Rice, in that briefing and a separate one with Iraqi journalists, eagerly cast the Iraqi transition as part of the administration's quest for democracy in the Middle East. She told the Iraqi journalists that differences were "being overcome by politics and compromise, not by violence and not by repression," making Iraq "a tremendous pillar of stability through the Middle East." She added, "It's wonderful to be here and to be a small part of that."

But the administration's mantra of freedom and democracy never passed Rumsfeld's lips. Asked how the Iraqi government should eliminate the militias that have terrorized the populace, Rumsfeld appeared to suggest it was a relatively easy task. "Other countries have dealt with these issues and done them in a reasonably orderly way and over a period of time in a manner that was, in many instances, without much violence," he said.

The two secretaries recently had a widely publicized dispute over a comment by Rice that the administration had probably made "thousands" of "tactical errors" in Iraq. Aides later said she had meant it figuratively, but it generated headlines around the world. In a radio interview, Rumsfeld dismissed it as a comment made by someone who didn't understand warfare.

Asked about the flap here in Baghdad, Rumsfeld replied, "I wasn't aware of what she meant." (The transcript shows that the radio interviewer described her remarks carefully and placed them in context.) Rumsfeld made no effort to smooth over the issue but pointed to Rice and said, "She's right here, and you can ask her." Rice noted that her comment about tactical errors had been made "not in the military sense."

Rice courted the news media, racing through five television interviews in 17 minutes. Rumsfeld gave no separate interviews. At one point, he arrived early for a meeting and saw an array of television cameras inside the room. He shook his head at the reporters and turned on his heel.

Before the two Cabinet members left Baghdad on Thursday, Rice dismissed any suggestions of tension. "Secretary Rumsfeld and I have an excellent relationship," she told Fox News. "We're working very hard together. We're actually having a great time here in Iraq."

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

Rummy's friends

Sen. Jeff Sessions, a wily ex-prosecutor from the Deep South, knows when a man is in trouble, and that man is Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. So Mr. Sessions organized a pep rally/war briefing where Republicans could express support for Mr. Rumsfeld, who seven retired generals have said must go.

The setting was breakfast in the Russell Senate Office Building. Mr. Sessions invited "defense-minded" Republican senators, and 17 showed up to talk with the defense secretary.

"There were spontaneous and supportive comments for Secretary Rumsfeld and an affirmation of his leadership," said Sessions spokesman Mike Brumas.

He said the senator from Alabama organized the get-together because "we're in a time of war. Senator Sessions admires Secretary Rumsfeld and invited a group of defense-minded senators to talk with the secretary about a number of topics."

During the one-hour chat, Mr. Rumsfeld discussed the new government in Iraq and the need for another wartime supplemental budget bill.

Mr. Brumas declined to say which senators attended. But it is known that two heavyweights, Senate Armed Services Chairman John W. Warner of Virginia, and his planned successor, Sen. John McCain of Arizona, did not attend.

Mr. McCain has expressed a lack of confidence in Mr. Rumsfeld. The two butted heads over the senator's "hold" on several Defense Department nominees.

Mr. Warner wrote Mr. Sessions a note saying he had another engagement.

Keane's view

Retired Gen. John Keane, former Army vice chief of staff who has been to Iraq several times, thinks that Iraqi hearts and minds are the path to winning the war.

He talked about the insurgency in the aftermath of four retired Army major generals' demanding the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"If this protracted insurgency, which we're now in the fourth year of, was reaching its culmination point in terms of defeat of the insurgency and a government seated, we would not be having this conversation," Gen. Keane told us.

"Much of the underlining frustration deals with the very nature of the war we are fighting and the fact we are four years into it and we are still losing American lives and having soldiers maimed in this conflict. But the reality is ... an urban insurgency neutralizes the United States' military power. The premium is placed on gaining support of the Iraqi people and only secondary to that is killing and capturing of the insurgency. Even when a counterinsurgency is successful, history tells us it takes about seven to eight years to achieve that end.

"I think the insurgency is considerably weaker in one very large respect and its the most important respect. It doesn't enjoy the same support of the people it once had. The people are reaching for democracy and they do not support the insurgents. The majority of the Sunnis is what I'm talking about."

Get tough

Princeton historian Bernard Lewis, a pre-eminent Middle East scholar and authority on Islam and its conflict with the Western world, said the Bush administration needs to do more against the insurgents in Iraq.

"In two simple words: Get tough," Mr. Lewis told a lunch forum of reporters sponsored by the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life.

Mr. Lewis said defeating Iraqi insurgents, and Islamic terrorists there and elsewhere, will require much more aggressive action.

DOJ_NMG_0027307

Despite negative press reports, Mr. Lewis said, things are going well in Iraq as far as developing democracy and advancing opportunities for women. But the Bush administration appears to be close to "snatching defeat from the jaws of victory" there, he said.

"The best policy would be to deal with it by suppressing it," Mr. Lewis said, instead of using "halfhearted" measures that involve compromising with insurgents.

On Iran, Mr. Lewis said, the current ruler in Tehran, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is a dangerous radical who holds "apocalyptic" visions of Islam. The Iranian leader's recent visit to Syria successfully suppressed a move toward democracy in the Arab fascist state that was not countered by the United States, he said.

Even more dangerous is an Iran armed with nuclear weapons. If the Iranians succeed in their quest, they will use nuclear weapons against their enemies "without an address" on the delivery. "It will come through terrorists," Mr. Lewis said.

Mr. Lewis said one of the roots of current Islamic extremism lies in Saudi Arabian Wahhabism, which he described as an extremely violent and intolerant strain of Islam that is fueled by Saudi leaders and oil money.

"Wahhabism is to Islam what the Ku Klux Klan is to Christianity," he said. Islamic extremism also has been driven by Salafist Sunni Muslims and by Iran's revolutionary-style Shi'ism, he said.

Earth Day

The Air Force sent a memo to personnel reminding them to be respectful of Earth Day last week.

The memo said the Environmental Protection Agency has recognized the Air Force as "the number one purchaser of green power."

It said the Air Force provides a "natural habitat for more than 70 threatened and endangered species" while "maintaining and enhancing ecological integrity on over 575,000 acres of forested landscapes."

"The Air Force is making great strides in our priorities to win the global war on terror, take care of our airmen and recapitalize our forces," the memo said. "Preserving our natural assets remain a key factor of success in these goals, and through our dedication to protecting and maintaining our planet, these assets will remain intact for generations to come."

CIA and State

We asked Dan Gallington, who once was chief counsel to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, to discuss whether the CIA's bureaucracy is working against President Bush's policies in the war on al Qaeda.

"I wouldn't say they are anti-Bush as much as to say they generally support the more conciliatory policy positions of the State Department bureaucracy," Mr. Gallington said. "Even though CIA is not a policy organization, they actively participate in influencing national security policy.

"I would say it seems clear that the leaks out of the CIA in recent years are both substantively, and in timing, seem intended to embarrass the president."

He said a "purge" is the answer for a leak-weary Bush administration. "It's already under way," he said.

Corruption Eroding Afghan Security (CSM)

By David Montero

The Christian Science Monitor, April 28, 2006

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN - Nearly five years after the fall of the Taliban, Afghanistan's security situation continues to be dragged down by endemic corruption, roving militias, and a growing nexus between narco-warlords and remnants of the Taliban, officials and analysts say.

The melting snows of spring often bring an uptick in violence, as rebels emerge from their mountain redoubts. Yet there are indications of a deepening instability beyond the seasonal surge. More than 70 foreign troops, mostly Americans, have been killed this past year, making it the deadliest period since the conflict began. Violence, meanwhile, seems to be spreading beyond the volatile south, encroaching on areas formerly considered outside the zones of conflict.

"What is often labeled as Taliban violence is not," says Joanna Nathan, a senior analyst for the International Crisis Group in Kabul. "It's a whole set of fluid alliances, cross- border attacks from Pakistan, drugs, tribal feuds, and of course the Taliban."

What these security issues have in common, she and others say, is the poor governance and official corruption among provincial governors, police chiefs, and others tasked with securing the country and bringing development. The implication: Stabilizing the country increasingly means providing better government.

"The state we're in now is because of the policy decision to co-opt those people who in the past committed human rights abuses. There's a culture of impunity. They continue in many cases to abuse the rights of people under them," says Ms. Nathan, adding that this not only causes violent flare-ups, but creates sympathy for the Taliban. These troubles, she says, are by no means limited to the south. "There are drug problems in the north, tribal problems, sheer criminality."

DOJ_NMG_0027308

In the past, violence rarely spilled beyond the south, where NATO troops are slowly replacing US forces. But recent attacks have cropped up in the north and west, too:

· Rockets slammed into a nongovernmental organization and a house in the northeastern province of Badakhshan on Tuesday when militants protesting poppy eradication missed a police station. No casualties were reported.

· Also on Tuesday, two bomb blasts along the road to Kabul's airport wounded three people. That followed a powerful rocket attack near the US Embassy and the presidential palace on April 19, wounding one Afghan security contractor.

· Bomb blasts were reported Saturday outside a politician's home 30 miles west of the northern city of Mazar-e Sharif.

· And the prosperous western province of Herat, once considered a model of stability, was rocked by a suicide bombing in early April, killing two Afghans outside a NATO compound.

"We do have a problem in the south, but it is spreading north. The path for these activities in the north has already formed," says Gen. Hilaluddin Hilal, the former deputy minister of the Interior Ministry, and now a member of parliament.

Many governors and chiefs of police, rather than confronting the Taliban and neutralizing drug lords, are increasingly intertwined with them, either for political or monetary gain, some analysts say. Amid the lawlessness, military intelligence has become a political game, a tool for blackmail or settling old scores, analysts allege.

President Hamid Karzai has replaced or re-assigned a number of governors in an effort to tackle these problems, which have plagued Afghanistan since the fall of the Taliban. Badsha Khan, for example, once the governor of Paktia Province, was removed in 2002 amid allegations of corruption and passing information to US forces that led to the bombing of his political enemies.

In the northern Balkh Province, Gov. Atta Mohammad Nur sacked several officials this February for their alleged involvement in the drug trade, including the district government head, the chief of police, the chief of security, the chief of staff, and the prosecutor.

But many such types remain. "There is probably no smoking gun, and it might be not be easy to present [a] case before a court," says one Western diplomat, speaking on the condition of anonymity. "But the names of quite a few of these people are well known."

Government officials insist they are cracking down, but Kabul's writ is still weak in many places. Even the more sanguine government officials, when speaking off the record, say that collusion between governors and the Taliban has hampered counterterrorism. Many villagers have little incentive to cooperate, officials say, when they see their government representatives siding with the enemy.

More than breeding resentment, corruption is playing into the hands of the Taliban.

"[P]eople had the expectation that the government would do something for them, that their lives would improve. But it didn't happen," says Mullah Abdul Salam Rocketi, a former Taliban commander who is now a member of Parliament. "When people get disappointed, it benefits the Taliban."

Others agree, saying that such widespread corruption and lawlessness was what brought the Taliban to power in the first place in 1995.

Remedies, such as there are, include more concerted efforts to disarm illegal militias. So far, some 60,000 people have been disarmed under a UN initiative, but many observers say greater resources and political will need to be put toward this effort. The arrival of NATO troops in the south might also bolster security, provided that such an effort is coupled with serious commitments to governance and nation-building.

Suspected U.S. Spies Targeted (LAT)

By Paul Watson And Zulfiqar Ali

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan — Taliban militants and their allies are waging a dirty war in Pakistan's unruly tribal areas, kidnapping and executing people suspected of spying for U.S. forces across the border in Afghanistan.

Militants have killed at least 53 accused spies and pro-government elders in Pakistan over the last two years, according to the independent Human Rights Commission of Pakistan. Many of their bodies were found with notes that claimed the victims had visited U.S. military bases in Afghanistan. Local residents put the death toll from such executions at about 150.

The headless corpse of the latest victim, taxi driver Khun Majan, was found in a ditch Tuesday near the town of Angoor Adda, a suspected Taliban haven in the South Waziristan tribal region, eight days after relatives reported he had been kidnapped.

"He visited a U.S. forces base in the Birmal area, Paktika province of Afghanistan, and was providing information about mujahedin to our enemies," said a note on his body.

It was not known whether any of the victims were working as informants or spies for U.S. forces.

DOJ_NMG_0027309

But secret documents on a memory drive stolen from the American air base at Bagram, north of Kabul, and sold at a bazaar outside its gates, show that U.S. Special Forces apparently used informants in Pakistan as well as Afghanistan. The files contained what appeared to be highly sensitive material, including the identities of informants and their families, and some of the information the sources had provided.

None of the informants' names that appeared on the drive sold at the Bagram bazaar, however, matched those of victims killed in Pakistan. And many of the killings predate the files found on the drive.

Abductions and summary executions of people accused of spying for the U.S. or supporting Pakistan's government in the northwestern tribal areas began in June 2004, during an offensive by Pakistani forces against suspected Al Qaeda terrorists, said Pakistani officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to talk to the press.

Most of the victims were killed in the last year as Afghanistan's insurgency gained strength, mainly in the southern and eastern territories near routes leading into the country from Pakistan. About 85% of the victims are from South Waziristan, a Pushtun tribal area.

The Pakistani government has said it pushed foreign militants from South Waziristan by late 2004. Intense fighting continues in North Waziristan.

Besides the killing of Majan, other recent executions included the beheading of four Pushtun tribesmen between April 15 and April 21 in North Waziristan. All were suspected of being spies.

At first, militants shot their captives on the spot. But more recently the captives have been held for several days, apparently for interrogation, and later beheaded, sources in the tribal areas said. A note is then left on the body that identifies the victim as an alleged spy, in a warning to others not to cooperate with Pakistani officials or U.S. forces across the border.

On Dec. 25, 2004, Shah Alam Khan, the brother of Pakistan's ambassador to the Persian Gulf emirate of Qatar and a close friend of Afghan President Hamid Karzai, was gunned down by militants in Wana, South Waziristan, according to the Human Rights Commission.

On March 30, five people came to the home of moderate Muslim cleric Maulana Zahir Shah Bhittani, who was staunchly opposed to Taliban and other militants preaching jihad in the tribal areas. The cleric was the principal of a madrasa, or Islamic school, in Lakki Marwat, south of Peshawar, the capital of North-West Frontier Province.

The men knocked on the cleric's door at night and said they needed him to perform faith healing on a patient, family members said. But they overpowered him and forced him into a pickup truck. Two days later, his corpse was found in the Sararogha area of South Waziristan.

A note on his body, written in Pashto, said: "All those who, on the directive of our enemy and in the guise of a cleric, try to propagate against jihad and Islam [or] betray innocent Muslims and misguide people will meet the same fate as Zahir Shah."

The note claimed that the cleric had, "along with some Englishmen, entered an embassy in Islamabad and obtained monetary assistance. He also received some directives from there."

Militants also have recorded on compact discs what they purport to be videotaped confessions of spies for the U.S. in the tribal areas, before beheading them.

On a CD released recently in Miram Shah, administrative center of North Waziristan, a purported spy says an American offered him the equivalent of $3,300 in Pakistani rupees to work on persuading local people to turn against the Taliban.

After recording his message, his masked abductors killed him, chanting "God is great!" in full view of the camera.

"Hypocrites will meet the same fate," the masked men said on the CD. "This person was slaughtered for providing information regarding mujahedin activities to the Americans."

The Los Angeles Times revealed April 10 that drives that contained documents marked "secret" — including one that listed the names, photographs and telephone numbers of people said to be informants — were for sale outside the Bagram base. Merchants told The Times that the drives had been on the market for as long as four years.

They continued to be for sale as recently as Wednesday, after U.S. military brass launched a criminal investigation into the loss of the drives from the base, where U.S. forces operate a secretive detention and interrogation center for terrorism suspects.

"We're obviously concerned that certain sources or assets have been compromised," Col. Tom Collins, a spokesman for U.S. forces in Afghanistan, said recently.

The military is "making all attempts to protect the identities of people who are helping us to defeat the enemy," Collins added this week.

The Times did not disclose any details that could identify the Afghan spies named in the documents, which included detailed accounts of information they had provided from their missions in Afghanistan and trips into Pakistan.

One of the drives apparently belonged to a member of the Army's 7th Special Forces Group (Airborne), based at Ft. Bragg, N.C.

DOJ_NMG_0027310

The unit has recently carried out missions in southern Afghanistan, where the U.S.-led coalition is battling a growing insurgency by Taliban, Al Qaeda and other fighters.

One document on that drive, marked "secret," reported that an Afghan informant arranged for an Afghan friend living in the southwestern Pakistani city of Quetta to visit a U.S. base in Afghanistan.

During the December meeting with a Special Forces officer, the three men discussed the possibility of using the visitor as a guide for U.S. troops, which would cross into Pakistan to capture or kill Taliban leaders.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Lay On Defensive At Enron Trial (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller And Gary McWilliams

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

HOUSTON -- Federal prosecutors hammered at former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay1's credibility by showing he made a series of inaccurate stockholding reports that failed to disclose large sales of his Enron shares in the months before the company's December 2001 bankruptcy filing.

Mr. Lay, who faces federal conspiracy and fraud charges in connection with Enron's collapse, appeared taken aback by the assault during his first full day of cross-examination in court here, which followed two hours of tense exchanges with prosecutor John Hueston2 on Wednesday afternoon. Mr. Lay hasn't been charged with improper sales of stock.

At times yesterday, he stuttered in response to accusations. Other times, he accused Mr. Hueston of twisting his words or harping on irrelevant points.

Mr. Lay said repeatedly that he relied on advice from company attorneys who told him he wasn't required to disclose the disputed stock sales except once a year, since they involved turning the shares back to the company in return for cash rather than sales on the open market. He said that his Securities and Exchange Commission filings complied with the law even though they inflated the picture of his Enron holdings. In 2001, Mr. Lay obtained $70 million through these stock transactions with Enron. (Testimony excerpts3)

Mr. Hueston even sought to use Mr. Lay's son against him.

Mr. Lay and his co-defendant, former Enron President Jeffrey Skilling4, have consistently claimed that a concerted attack by short-sellers helped drive down Enron's share price, and contributed to the company's 2001 collapse. (Short-sellers are traders who, using borrowed shares, make profits when a stock goes down.) Mr. Hueston noted that Mr. Lay's lead attorney, Michael Ramsey, referred to short-sellers as "vultures."

Mr. Hueston then introduced evidence that Mr. Lay's son, Mark, had executed four short sales on Enron stock in March 2001. Was he a vulture? asked the prosecutor.

"I don't think he's a vulture," said Mr. Lay in a subdued voice, adding that he wasn't aware of his son's stock transactions.

As for Mr. Lay's SEC filings about his stockholdings, Mr. Hueston showed that the Enron chairman didn't include his company stock transactions in those filings.

In 2001, Mr. Lay's monthly SEC stock-ownership filings through October showed his Enron holdings hovering around 2.7 million shares.

Yet his actual holdings had declined to some 991,000 shares because of the sales back to the company, according to evidence presented by Mr. Hueston.

Mr. Lay was quietly selling off a large chunk of his holdings while telling employees and investors the shares were a "bargain," prosecutors contend. As late as September 2001, he was telling employees that he was buying stock without telling them of his far larger sales back to the company. Mr. Lay argued that his stock transactions with Enron were done to raise cash to pay pressing margin calls on personal loans. He said he didn't feel the need to report such "forced" stock sales to Enron employees or others. He added that he held on to as many Enron shares as he could because he felt the stock was undervalued.

By showing that Mr. Lay wasn't fully forthcoming about his stock sales, the government clearly hoped to buttress its contention that the former top executive was illegally hiding from the public a range of bad news about the company's finances and business operations.

Mr. Hueston also attacked Mr. Lay on his bullish remarks in 2001 about Enron's high-profile retail energy unit, which government witnesses have testified was struggling with problem contracts and large hidden losses. The prosecutor noted that up until September 2001 Mr. Lay and other executives had been highlighting the rapid growth of the unit's service contracts, predicting the total would hit $30 billion in 2001.

However, Mr. Hueston presented evidence from an Oct. 8, 2001, Enron board meeting showing that the company expected to fall short of that target by about $4.5 billion.

About a week later, Mr. Lay told securities analysts that Enron would no longer report total contract values because it was no longer a valid measure. He didn't mention anything about falling short of the previously announced $30 billion target, Mr. Hueston said.

Was the prospect of falling short of the contract target and then dropping it as a growth measure "pure coincidence?" the prosecutor asked.

"I don't know if it was pure coincidence," Mr. Lay said, adding that executives of the retail unit "convinced me and others" that there were better measures. Repeatedly yesterday, Mr. Lay said he relied heavily on others for the information and descriptions he provided to investors. Mr. Hueston pushed back that Mr. Lay, as chief executive, had the option to make the final decisions about what he and the company would tell the public.

The trial resumes Monday.

Stock Sales Scrutinized In Enron Trial (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

HOUSTON, April 27 -- A federal prosecutor used evidence that the son of Enron Corp. founder Kenneth L. Lay bet the company's stock price would fall to poke holes in Lay's contention that short-sellers -- not fraud -- helped push Enron into bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

In his second day of cross-examination, Lay maintained his composure after furiously responding to questions and stabbing his finger at Assistant U.S. Attorney John C. Hueston a day earlier. Hueston attempted to rattle Lay Thursday by throwing back at him Lay's arguments that Enron was the victim of skeptical press reports, disclosures of wrongdoing by former finance chief Andrew S. Fastow, and short-sellers, who Lay said plotted Enron's demise in Florida in early 2001. Short-sellers bet that a stock price will fall, borrowing shares to sell at one price, hoping they will be able to buy the stock later at a lower price, profiting from the difference.

Mark Lay, a former Enron employee, executed four short sales of Enron stock in March 2001, Hueston said.

"Was your son in Florida, sir?" the prosecutor asked.

"I guess I should ask him now," Lay replied wryly as several jurors smiled.

Lay, 64, faces six counts of fraud and conspiracy based on optimistic public statements he made after returning to Enron's helm in August 2001 after the abrupt resignation of his protege and fellow defendant Jeffrey K. Skilling.

Lay answered questions in a firm voice, sometimes talking over Hueston and suggesting that the prosecutor didn't understand business issues. During a discussion of an arcane accounting issue, Lay retorted, "I think the investors would totally understand it, Mr. Hueston. Maybe in fact, you don't."

Later, Lay told the prosecutor that an exchange about another accounting charge was "a real waste of the jury's time."

Lay mostly held firm in his defense that he relied on countless other people to make business decisions when he returned as chief executive, including accountants, lawyers and his own subordinates. Prosecutors argue that Lay was far more involved in the details of Enron's operations then he would care to admit, bringing as evidence budget documents, corporate board presentations and handwritten notes jotted by Lay himself.

"I'm not an accountant; I'm not a lawyer," Lay said. "There are a lot of things I'm not."

He also disputed the accounts of several former deputies who testified earlier in the 13-week trial, saying that some meetings simply never took place and others were a dim memory four years later. Lay repeatedly contradicted government witness David W. Delainey, who testified that the company's highly touted retail business was a disaster akin to "retooling a plane in flight."

"That's kind of what business is all about, other things in life, too," said Lay, who argues that he is an optimistic person. "We're always retooling. You've got to make adjustments as you go along."

The prosecutor spent much of the day walking the jury through Lay's sales of more than $70 million worth of Enron stock to the company in its final months. Hueston said Lay failed to disclose those sales to employees and investors, who believed based on information available in late 2001 that Lay had actually increased his Enron holdings in that period. Lay told jurors he had amassed $100 million in personal debts by 2001. He said he broke no laws with his stock sales.

"Mr. Hueston, despite your efforts here, I was fully complying with all the laws and regulations," Lay protested. "I know you're trying to portray a different story. I was doing exactly what I was told I needed to do."

DOJ_NMG_0027312

Hueston told the judge after the court session ended Thursday that he hoped to finish questioning Lay early next week. U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III, who has zealously guarded the jury's time, signaled that his patience for additional questions by Lay's lawyers could be thin, given Lay's self-defense mechanisms.

"Mr. Lay has pretty well covered a lot of what you would on redirect," Lake told the defense team, as spectators laughed.

Lay Denies He Tried To Hide Sale Of Stock (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, April 28, 2006

HOUSTON — Former Enron CEO Ken Lay told jurors here Thursday that he didn't think stock sales "forced" upon him by banks making margin calls were the same as "discretionary" sales. As a result, he didn't feel the need to disclose the sale of more than 1.7 million shares of Enron stock during 2001, when he encouraged Enron employees to buy the stock and told them he was buying shares, too.

During the second day of cross examination in his trial on charges of misrepresenting Enron's financial health to investors, Lay bristled at suggestions by prosecutor John Hueston that he was trying to hide his 2001 stock sales from the public.

"I always differentiated between discretionary decisions to buy shares (and) forced sales to meet margin calls on a line of credit," he said. "I didn't really see there was any need to disclose" the sales, he added.

Despite the fact that he sold more than 500,000 shares of Enron stock from late July through August of that year, Lay touted the company as an "incredible bargain" to his employees in September 2001. He reiterated that belief in court Thursday.

"I strongly and firmly believed it was an incredible bargain," he said.

Lay had personal debts of about $100 million that year, mostly backed by Enron stock. As Enron's share price sank through the course of 2001, various banks made margin calls on Lay (a margin call is triggered when the equity level of an account falls below a set level). But rather than let the banks sell the stock he'd pledged to cover the margins, which would have resulted in the public disclosure of his sales, Lay was allowed to sell his stock back to Enron using a special line of credit available only to a few top executives. Lay insisted that company lawyers told him those sales didn't need to be reported immediately.

The government has accused Lay, 64, and former CEO Jeff Skilling, 52, of conspiring to hide Enron's true financial condition from the public. The two men contend that Enron was a healthy company brought low in 2001 in a panic fueled by short-sellers and a series of negative articles that appeared in the media.

Hueston challenged that defense, saying that before the negative articles started appearing in October 2001, the company was put on notice by Moody's, a credit rating service, that it might be downgraded.

Lay explained that institutional shareholders, who owned about 60% of the company's stock, would understand that the Moody's announcement was not a big deal. Hueston asked about the other 40% of Enron's shareholders, which included "average Joes."

"I'd like to think that Enron didn't have any shareholders who were average Joes," Lay said. "They were somewhat superior to that."

Another testy day for Lay in the Enron trial (HC)

By MARY FLOOD

The Houston Chronicle, April 28, 2006

Ken Lay is accustomed to being in control, and Thursday he tried to rule his cross-examination from the witness stand.

The former Enron chief showed his disdain for the prosecutor by suggesting he couldn't understand what investors would, by asking him questions and even by calling for a new line of inquiry.

"We've spent more than an hour on this," Lay complained testily to prosecutor John Hueston when, after an afternoon break, the lawyer returned to the complicated matter of a writing down the value of a British water utility Enron owned.

"Obviously you can go where you want to, but I think it's a real waste of the jury's time," Lay said, though his indictment includes an allegation that he lied to analysts in October 2001 about whether Enron would have to write down the value of the water company on its books.

Though most of Thursday was calmer than Wednesday, which featured fireworks between Hueston and Lay, the former CEO and chairman of Enron was impatient in his second day on cross-examination.

There was still plenty there to see, with the courtroom full by afternoon.

When discussing that Lay didn't plan to change direction in the company when he came back as CEO in mid-2001, Lay said to Hueston: "I think the investment community would understand it, maybe you don't, but they would."

DOJ_NMG_0027313

At another point, Lay told Hueston that he should just call another witness to explain a presentation Enron made to bankers in late 2001. "You need to call Jeff McMahon and put him on the stand," Lay snapped.

Lay also indignantly declared he did nothing illegal or improper when he told employees he was buying stock and they should too in late 2001, even though Lay was also quietly selling millions more in stock back to the company.

Lay told the 12 jurors and four alternates that his $4 million in stock purchases in 2001 were voluntary. But, he said, his more than $70 million in stock sales — which he didn't have to disclose monthly because he traded stock for cash in a revolving credit line at Enron — were "forced" by his personal finances and margin calls on his $100 million in private loans.

"If the market had found out you had sold $70 million of stock in that time, that actually would have caused the stock to tumble?" asked Hueston of Lay's 2001 stock sales to the company.

"It depends, Mr. Hueston," Lay said. He said if the market understood he was using the cash from internal stock sales to keep his private bankers from selling Enron stock used as private loan collateral, the market might see it as a good sign that he had faith in Enron.

"There was no requirement that I disclose any of that," Lay said of his internal stock sales. "You're trying to mislead the jury as to somehow I was doing something illegal, and I'm not."

Stock salesHe said he preferred selling stock to the company, a deal arranged for him in 1999 though not disclosed on the proxy forms. Though Lay had to make monthly filings about his stock purchases, he only had to account for his internal sales annually. Thus his public monthly holding total never reflected his frequent 2001 stock sales and made it appear his Enron stock holdings were growing when they were actually shrinking.

"I found it more convenient to use the line of credit," he said.

Lay's sales to Enron are not considered insider trading because it is assumed the company has all the material knowledge that he has. But the government has included his failure to tell employees about those sales in a conspiracy charge and a wire fraud charge against Lay. They are two of the six charges he faces. Codefendant Jeff Skilling faces 28 charges.

Thursday, Hueston went back to Lay's allegations that colluding short sellers, people who bet a stock will go down, contributed to Enron's downfall. Lay attorney Mike Ramsey previously called short sellers "vultures."

Hueston showed Lay that his son Mark Lay was short selling Enron stock in March 2001 and made more than $166,000 betting Enron stock would fall.

"I didn't know that," Lay said.

"He wasn't a vulture was he?" Hueston asked Lay of his son.

"I don't think he's a vulture," Lay responded.

"He wasn't trying to kill Enron in 2001, was he?" Hueston asked.

"I would think not," Lay said.

The jury has also heard that Skilling made $15 million after leaving Enron by short selling a competitor's stock.

Hueston also questioned Lay about his characterization in late 2001 that Enron's retail business was growing and that it had a projected $30 billion in contract value for 2001. But, Hueston showed, shortly after it was clear Enron would not make that target, it stopped using the same measurements for success. Lay said the change was because the business was maturing and other measures would work better.

The prosecution questioned Lay about his contention that an Oct. 17, 2001, Wall Street Journal story hurt Enron's stock price by twisting an earnings report in a negative way. Hueston noted that news stories about Moody's credit rating agency investigating Enron's rating might also have done that.

Lay argued that Enron's savvy shareholders would have known about Moody's decision the day before and would not have waited until newspapers covered the announcement. Hueston asked whether the "average Joe" shareholder might not have learned about the Moody's decision Oct. 17, 2001.

"I'd like to think Enron didn't have any shareholders who were average Joes. I'd like to think they were somewhat superior to that," Lay said.

No ValhallaU.S. District Judge Sim Lake told lawyers at the end of the day that he plans to rule that information about the Valhalla scandal, evidence about an 18-year-old incident in which Lay did not immediately fire company wrongdoers, will not be part of this trial.

Prosecutors had hoped to question Lay about it but the judge said he'll be agreeing with the Lay team that the door was not opened to that questioning by anything Lay said on direct examination. The judge had previously noted that the incident was very remote and it did not involve a conviction.

Lay is set to continue on the stand through most of Monday.

Surprise Of Enron Trial Is Lay's Surly Manner (LAT)

By Thomas S. Mulligan, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

Known for charm, the ex-chairman may have damaged his case with sarcasm and snippiness.

HOUSTON — Who would have guessed that Kenny Boy could be a tougher sell to a jury than Capt. Queeg?

Enron Corp. founder Kenneth L. Lay — Kenny Boy to his friend President Bush — is renowned for his courtliness, his philanthropy, his rise from a dirt-poor boyhood in the Missouri Ozarks to a nine-digit fortune.

Codefendant Jeffrey K. Skilling, who invented Enron's most profitable business and ran the company during most of its heyday, also is known for getting in a bar fight while under indictment and for publicly calling an investment analyst by another name for a sphincter.

At the start of their federal fraud and conspiracy trial three months ago, the betting was that the volatile Skilling's performance on the witness stand might drag Lay down, not the other way around.

Former Chief Executive Skilling, 52, shares some of the obsessiveness of Queeg, the Navy skipper of "The Caine Mutiny." But unlike Queeg, Skilling didn't unravel on the stand. Where mastery of Enron's finances was at issue, he overpowered co-lead prosecutor Sean M. Berkowitz. When the nimble Berkowitz pushed certain buttons, Skilling showed flashes of anger and arrogance, but he generally kept his head.

For Lay, however, it's been a rockier ride. Although nobody knows what the 12 Texans in the jury box are thinking, during his first four days on the stand, Lay, 64, has shown some attributes that clash with his reputation as affable, openhanded and shrewd.

His worst moment came Wednesday, when prosecutor John C. Hueston jolted Lay with questions about his attempts to reach actual or potential witnesses in the case — efforts that persisted even after Lay's lawyers told him to stop.

"You've got to question the judgment of the person," said Mark C. Zauderer of New York law firm Flemming Zulack Williamson Zauderer. "No lawyer would have his client in the dock calling potential witnesses. It could be very suspect in the minds of the jury."

Lay probably didn't help matters by responding to Hueston's blitz with sarcasm. The jury of eight women and four men has hardly been immune to humor during the trial — even Skilling's mordant wit sometimes connected — but nobody cracked a smile at Lay's comebacks Wednesday.

Noting Lay's $120,000 investment in a company whose main customer was Enron, Hueston asked whether he had made conflict-of-interest filings required by Enron's code of conduct.

"I don't know," Lay shot back. "Have you checked it? I imagine you have. You guys are pretty thorough."

After describing himself in early testimony as "more of a delegator" than a micromanager, Lay quickly proved himself adept at delegating blame. If something worked out, it was his idea. If it blew up, it was somebody else's.

Asked to name his biggest mistakes at Enron, Lay unhesitatingly listed "hiring Andy Fastow" and promoting him to chief financial officer.

Andrew S. Fastow turned out to be a crook who secretly stole millions from Enron and allegedly helped cook the books. Lay didn't mention it, but he had to know the jury would recall that hiring and promoting Fastow was entirely Skilling's doing.

It wasn't the only time Lay subtly undercut his codefendant. He cited Skilling's surprise resignation in August 2001 as a source of uncertainty in the financial markets that set the stage for the investor and creditor panic that Lay said ultimately brought Enron down.

Moreover, by praising Skilling as an executive who "really gets into the details, the guts of how things work," Lay may have signaled that Skilling, far more than Lay, would have grasped the intricacies of Enron's accounting and financial reporting — the things at the heart of the criminal case.

Lay blamed two aides for what turned out to be one of the biggest PR gaffes of the century: rebuffing the Wall Street Journal in the fall of 2001 when the paper had questions about Fastow and his mysterious LJM partnerships — complex financial structures that the government says let Enron hide problem assets and falsely pump up profit.

With Enron offering only a brief statement written by its lawyers, the company lost any control over the debate and was powerless when the resulting stories eviscerated its stock. A livid Skilling even called from retirement to ask why Enron wasn't defending itself.

In Lay's view, his own instincts had been right all along. Stonewalling the Journal, he testified, went "against every bone in my body."

One of the witnesses whom Lay admitted trying to reach was a former Enron risk manager named Wincenty "Vince" Kaminski. Jurors would remember him as a professor type with a Polish accent and a healthy ego who testified that he tried vainly to warn higher-ups that Fastow's LJM partnerships were a stupid idea and that Enron shouldn't be involved with them.

In testimony Tuesday, Lay seemed to impugn his former colleague's courage. He acknowledged that Kaminski had been an early skeptic of the LJM deals, but added that it was only after the Journal stories hit and the partnerships blew up in scandal that "his level of dislike intensified."

To be sure, Lay is operating under the disadvantage of losing his lead defense lawyer, Michael W. Ramsey, who has undergone two heart-vessel operations during the trial.

And Lay did seem to claw back some lost ground with the jury Thursday, if only because of Hueston's insistence on spending three hours browbeating him over an accounting issue known as the "Wessex goodwill impairment."

Lay showed impatience with repeated variations on the same highly technical questions — a feeling shared by U.S. District Judge Sim Lake, who has complained about the recent slow pace of the trial. Near the end of the day, Lay burst out: "Mr. Hueston, go where you want to, but I think this is a real waste of the jury's time."

Had Lay been running for mayor at that point, he'd have had at least 12 votes.

Examiners Appointed In BoNY Case (Forbes)

By Liz Moyer

Forbes, April 28, 2006

The United States Attorneys in New York named former federal prosecutor George Stamboulidis of Baker & Hostetler and FTI Consulting, a forensic accounting firm, to be the examiners in charge of making sure Bank of New York is in compliance with suspicious activities reporting and monitoring rules.

The appointment, announced jointly on Thursday by the U.S. attorneys for the Eastern and Southern Districts, comes after Bank of New York (nyse: BK - news - people) agreed to pay $38 million in penalties and compensation over charges it failed to comply with mandatory reporting guidelines under the Bank Secrecy Act.

That settlement was the culmination of a six-year investigation into a Russian money laundering ring that prosecutors say flushed $7 billion through the U.S. banking system. A former executive of the bank and her husband pleaded guilty to federal money-laundering charges in 2000 in connection with the investigation.

Stamboulidis was named in 2003 to be the special examiner overlooking Merrill Lynch's compliance and monitoring procedures in the wake of that firm's entanglement in the financing of certain off balance sheet deals connected to the now-defunct Enron.

New Challenge To Sarbanes-Oxley Law (FT)

By Jeremy Grant

Financial Times, April 28, 2006

Signs of a growing desire among some US legislators to re-examine key elements of Sarbanes-Oxley legislation emerged on Thursday as a Republican congressman, Tom Feeney, said he would next week introduce a bill designed to make it "more acceptable to business".

Mr Feeney's bill is the third piece of legislation aimed at changing Sarbanes-Oxley since its passage in 2002 after the Enron and WorldCom accounting scandals. While such efforts are seen as having limited effect until senators Sarbanes and Oxley retire late this year, the bill reflects concern that changes are needed.

Business has complained about compliance and auditing requirements that cost companies hundreds ofmillions of dollars a year.

Sarbanes-Oxley is also being blamed for the growing number of US companies seeking listings on foreign stock exchanges, where rules are less strict. Mr Feeney said Sarbanes-Oxley had "for the most part created a lot of good" but section 404 was "an enormous burden on the US economy".

Compliance costs had "spiralled out of control" as a result of section 404, which requires management to report on the quality of their controls. He said stock and derivatives exchanges were worried that the stricter regulatory environment could threaten America's position as the world's pre-eminent risk management centre.

"We are now busy as a consequence largely of Sarbanes-Oxley of out-sourcing America's lead in world capital formation," he said, warning that the flow of US companies listing abroad could cause the US to "lose market share to Shanghai as well". His proposed legislation would make it voluntary for companies with annual turnover of $700m or less to comply with section 404.

It would also require the Securities and Exchange Commission to define more clearly what a "material accounting error" was, Mr Feeney said.

A third element would allow a company's external auditors to give advice to internal auditors. Instead of being subjected to annual audits, companies with market capitalisation over $700m could have random audits. Finally, Mr Feeney said he would propose that the SEC study UK accounting principles to see how section 404 could be implemented more smoothly.

DOJ_NMG_0027316

Pete Sessions, a Texas Republican who supports Mr Feeney's effort, said he was "not sure that the SEC is over-regulating". Instead, he said, he believed it was "not providing enough definition or direction as to what is good and bad".

He said he believed SEC chairman Christopher Cox "understands the enormity of the problem". Asked what progress would be likely to make changes with the proposed bill, he said: "We're going to ram this down the throats of the naysayers. We need to get this done."

A Campaign To Tighten Executive Pay (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

After years of complaining about sky-high executive pay packages, this year shareholder activists are finally getting some traction in their efforts to do something about the issue.

The issue will come up today at the annual meeting of Merrill Lynch & Co., where chief executive E. Stanley O'Neal took home $37.5 million last year, including $2 million in long-term incentive pay. The American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees is sponsoring a resolution calling for an annual up-or-down vote on the company's pay plan for top executives. Though the vote would be nonbinding, it would give shareholders a way to make their views clear, advocates argue.

Closer to Washington, a carpenters union's proposal to tie Towson-based Black & Decker Corp. chief executive Nolan D. Archibald's bonuses and long-term stock grants to the company's performance garnered support from 47 percent of the shares voted at the hardware company's annual meeting last week. Archibald was paid $11.7 million plus stock options, which the company's proxy statement said were valued between $7.7 million and $19 million in 2005.

Yesterday, up to 22 percent of shareholders of drugmaker Pfizer Inc. withheld support from directors who approved a pension plan that will pay chief executive Hank McKinnell $6.5 million a year or a lump sum of $83 million when he retires.

"If management increasingly takes more and more, there's less for shareholders," said Frederick E. Rowe Jr., president of Investors for Director Accountability, which urged the withhold vote at Pfizer. Reining in executive compensation has been one of the hottest shareholder issues since the stock market bubble burst in 2000, but for years, proposals have drawn little interest outside of a small group of activist investors.

This year, that seems to be changing. Though fewer compensation proposals were put forward -- 159 so far versus 252 last year -- a larger percentage are making it onto proxy ballots and receiving significant support, according to Institutional Shareholder Services, which tracks and evaluates proxy votes for large investors such as pension plans and mutual funds.

A proposal at Lucent Technologies Inc. to tie incentive compensation -- bonuses, stock and stock options -- to company performance passed with 54 percent of the vote in February after falling short last year. And shareholders at Morgan Stanley defied management this month to adopt a proposal requiring shareholder approval for any future severance packages worth more than three times salary. The vote was widely seen as a slap at the $44 million in cash awarded to chief executive Philip J. Purcell when he was ousted last year.

Executive pay "has always been an irritant but now it's risen to the top of the pile for U.S. investors," said ISS Vice President Patrick McGurn. "We're seeing a steady stream of 40 percent support or more for these pay-for-superior-performance resolutions. Investors are starting to say, 'If not now, when?' "

Even institutional investors that have traditionally voted with management are growing concerned. An ISS survey of 320 institutional investors worldwide found that 21 percent of U.S. investors and 36 percent in Canada ranked executive compensation as the most important corporate governance issue, far outpacing issues such as company performance and financial reporting.

Observers and activists say the issue has gained steam for two reasons: Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox spotlighted the issue with a proposal to force companies to disclose more compensation information, including previously hidden perks. In addition, chief executive pay has continued to rise.

According to a survey by Mercer Consulting of 350 large public companies, median total direct compensation -- salary, bonus and present-day value of long-term stock and option grants -- rose 5 percent in 2005, to $6.8 million. The median value of chief executive salary and bonuses alone rose 7.1 percent, to $2.4 million.

"It just seems to get worse and worse. At the moment the most we can hope for is to slow it down, and that's not acceptable," said Jack Bogle, the retired chief executive of Vanguard Investments who is sharply critical of high executive salaries in his recent book "The Battle for the Soul of Capitalism."

The rise in executive compensation was in line with the 6.8 percent median increase in total shareholder return but far outpaced the consumer price index, which rose 3.4 percent. Real hourly non-farm wages rose 2.1 percent in 2005, according to the Labor Department.

"People have had enough," said Richard Ferlauto, director of pension and benefit policy for AFSCME, which has resolutions asking for an annual up-or-down shareholder vote on executive pay on ballots not only at Merrill but also at U.S. Bancorp, where the proposal drew about 39.5 percent support, Countrywide Financial Corp. and Home Depot Inc.

Company officials argued in interviews and in proxy materials sent to investors that they are working to align executive pay with performance and that the activists' proposals are too rigid. Black & Decker's management, for example, opposed its shareholder pay-for-performance proposal, arguing that the company needed to "maintain the flexibility" to reward good performances.

Both Mercer's statistics and a rival survey of 200 large firms by Pearl Meyer & Partners found that chief executive compensation rose more slowly in 2005 than in 2004, when the increase in total shareholder return was higher. In addition, most chief executives' salaries now move in the same direction as company results. "You don't see a lot of people in the bad-boy box where pay went up and the company's stock went down," said Pearl Meyer managing partner Jan Koors. But, she noted, "The median continues to rise."

That's the issue raised by the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America's "pay for superior performance" proposal, which made it onto ballots at 17 companies, including Black & Decker. The nonbinding resolution asks companies to withhold incentive compensation from chief executives unless earnings or shareholder returns outperform median performance by the company's peers. The proposal drew 39 percent support at Dupont on Wednesday and is pending at 14 other companies.

"You should get superior pay for superior performance. What we have now is superior pay for average or below-average performance," said Ed Durkin, director of corporate affairs for the carpenters union.

Pfizer shareholders proposed withholding votes from directors after the SEC turned down an AFL-CIO proposal that would have required shareholder approval for pensions that exceeded an executive's salary. The activists complained that Pfizer shares have fallen 44 percent since McKinnell took the helm in 2001. Company officials argued that they are already addressing the problem. In 2005, McKinnell's salary and bonus totaled $5.97 million, down 4 percent from 2004. Pfizer shares dropped 13 percent last year.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutor Weighs Charges Against Rove In Leak Case (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller And David Johnston

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 27 — Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the special prosecutor in the C.I.A. leak case, is expected to decide in the next two to three weeks whether to bring perjury charges against Karl Rove, the powerful adviser to President Bush, lawyers involved in the case said Thursday.

With the completion of Mr. Rove's fifth appearance before the grand jury on Wednesday, Mr. Fitzgerald is now believed to have assembled all of the facts necessary to determine whether to seek an indictment of Mr. Rove or drop the case.

Lawyers in the case said Mr. Fitzgerald would spend the coming days reviewing the transcript of Mr. Rove's three hours of testimony on Wednesday and weigh it against his previous statements to the grand jury as well as the testimony of others, including a sworn statement that Mr. Rove's lawyer gave to the prosecutor earlier this year. The lawyers were granted anonymity so they could speak about the internal legal deliberations in Mr. Rove's case.

A lawyer with knowledge of the case said that Mr. Rove had known for more than a month that he was likely to make another appearance before the grand jury, and that he had known since last fall that he would be subject to further questions from Mr. Fitzgerald before the prosecutor completed his inquiry.

Mr. Rove was relieved of his day-to-day domestic policy duties at the White House in a staff shake-up last week, but White House officials say the change was unrelated to his legal complications.

Randall Samborn, a spokesman for Mr. Fitzgerald, declined to comment.

Mark Corallo, a spokesman for Mr. Rove, said Mr. Rove would be cleared. "We're confident at the end of this that Mr. Fitzgerald is going to find that Karl has been totally truthful and not only has done nothing wrong but has done everything right," Mr. Corallo said.

Mr. Fitzgerald must specifically decide whether Mr. Rove misled the grand jury in testimony he gave in 2004 about his conversations with reporters about Valerie Wilson, the intelligence officer at the heart of the C.I.A. leak case.

In his February 2004 testimony, Mr. Rove acknowledged talking to the columnist Robert D. Novak about Ms. Wilson, but he did not tell the grand jury about a second conversation he had about her with Matthew Cooper, a Time magazine reporter. Mr. Novak revealed her name and C.I.A. employment in a column on July 14, 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0027318

Critics of the Bush administration have asserted that the revelation was retaliation against her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former diplomat who had publicly accused the administration of twisting some of the intelligence used to justify going to war with Iraq.

Mr. Rove later voluntarily told the grand jury about the conversation with Mr. Cooper, and said that he had forgotten about it in the rush of his daily business. But Mr. Fitzgerald has long been skeptical of Mr. Rove's account of his forgetfulness, lawyers in the case say. On Wednesday Mr. Fitzgerald questioned Mr. Rove about how he came to remember his conversation with Mr. Cooper.

Robert D. Luskin, Mr. Rove's lawyer, issued a statement on Wednesday declaring that Mr. Rove had testified "voluntarily and unconditionally" about a matter that had arisen since Mr. Rove's last grand jury appearance, in October 2005. Mr. Luskin was evidently referring to the testimony of Viveca Novak, a former reporter at Time magazine, who has said that she told Mr. Rove's lawyer in early 2004 that she believed that Mr. Rove had been a source for Mr. Cooper.

Mr. Rove admitted from the outset to investigators that he spoke to Mr. Novak on July 9, 2003, about Ms. Wilson. It was in that conversation that Mr. Rove first learned the name of Ms. Wilson from Mr. Novak, lawyers in the case said.

Mr. Rove's conversation with Mr. Cooper occurred two days later. In that conversation, Mr. Rove did not mention Ms. Wilson's name, but, Mr. Cooper said, Mr. Rove did say that she worked at the C.I.A.

Mr. Fitzgerald did not learn of Mr. Rove's conversation with Mr. Cooper until long after the investigation had begun, when a search of Mr. Rove's e-mail messages uncovered one that he had sent to Stephen J. Hadley, then the deputy national security adviser, about the Cooper conversation.

It is still not publicly known why Mr. Rove's e-mail message to Mr. Hadley was not turned over earlier, but a lawyer in the case said White House documents were collected in response to several separate requests that may not have covered certain time periods or all relevant officials. Mr. Rove had no role in the search for documents, which was carried out by an administrative office in the White House.

Also on Thursday, a federal judge refused to dismiss charges against I. Lewis Libby Jr., the former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney who was indicted on perjury and obstruction charges in the leak case last year.

The judge, Reggie B. Walton of Federal District Court, turned down a motion by lawyers for Mr. Libby who challenged Mr. Fitzgerald's authority to handle the case.

Judge Rules Charges Against Libby Stand (USAT)

USA Today, April 28, 2006

A federal judge refused Thursday to dismiss charges against I. Lewis “Scooter” Libby, the former White House aide who was indicted on perjury and obstruction charges last year in the CIA leak scandal.

In a 31-page opinion, Judge Reggie Walton turned down a motion by lawyers for Vice President Cheney's one-time top assistant, who challenged the authority of special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald to handle the case. Libby's lawyers had argued that Fitzgerald was given too much power and that the appointment should have been made by the president. However, Walton said there is no question the attorney general can delegate any of his functions. After then-attorney general John Ashcroft recused himself from the investigation, Ashcroft's deputy James Comey appointed Fitzgerald to conduct the probe into who leaked the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame in 2003.

Lawmakers from California, New York and New Jersey denounced a proposal to change HIV/AIDS funding that could shift tens of millions of dollars from the West and Northeast to the South. The Bush administration and Southern lawmakers including Rep. Charlie Norwood, R-Ga., countered that changes are needed to bring fairness to the way $2 billion is distributed each year. Investigators with the Government Accountability Office have found that some funding formulas disproportionately benefit states with urban areas because of a quirk that double-counts AIDS patients in 51 metropolitan areas. A separate quirk that counts some dead patients helps only San Francisco, giving the city an extra $7 million a year. The White House wants to eliminate both these quirks, but it has not revealed its plan and how it would affect states.

A senior FBI official is retiring less than a year after taking charge of the bureau's National Security Branch. Gary Bald will end his nearly 29-year career with the FBI on June 2, Director Robert Mueller said. Mueller gave no reason for Bald's decision but praised his leadership. Bald said the time was right to retire, “weighing our progress on implementation of the NSB as well as family considerations.” The branch brings together counterintelligence, counterterrorism and intelligence.

Pakistan would not support the use of force to halt neighbor Iran's nuclear programs, Foreign Secretary Riaz Khan said after a meeting with Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns in Washington. “We want this issue resolved diplomatically,” Khan said. Judge Won't Dismiss Case Against Libby (AP)

By Toni Locy

The Associated Press, April 27, 2006

A federal judge refused Thursday to dismiss charges against I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the former top White House aide who was indicted on perjury and obstruction charges last year in the CIA leak scandal.

In a 31-page opinion, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton turned down a motion by lawyers for Vice President Dick Cheney's one-time top assistant, who challenged the authority of Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald to handle the case.

Libby's lawyers had argued that Fitzgerald was given too much power — more than the attorney general — and that the appointment should have been made by the president with the Senate's approval.

Walton said Thursday he did not need to "look far" in the law to reject the claim by Libby's defense team. The judge said there is no question the attorney general can delegate any of his functions.

"There was no wholesale abdication of the attorney general's duty to direct and supervise litigation," he wrote.

Then-Attorney General John Ashcroft had recused himself from the investigation because of his White House contacts. James Comey, who was deputy attorney general at the time, appointed Fitzgerald, giving him wide berth to conduct the investigation into who leaked the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame to reporters in 2003.

"This case provides the clearest example of why such broad discretion is necessary," Walton wrote. "Here, the attorney general believed there was a conflict of interest ... It was, therefore, entirely appropriate for the attorney general to remove himself completely from the investigation."

Walton said there must be a way to appoint special prosecutors to ensure that "the perception of fairness withstands the scrutiny of the American public" when high-level government officials are investigated for alleged wrongdoing.

Libby, 55, is charged with perjury and obstruction of justice, accused of lying to the FBI and a federal grand jury about how he learned about Plame and what he subsequently told reporters about her.

Conservative columnist Robert Novak named her in a column July 14, 2003, eight days after Plame's husband, former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, alleged in an opinion piece in The New York Times that the Bush administration had twisted prewar intelligence on Iraq to justify going to war.

The CIA sent Wilson to Niger in early 2002 to determine whether there was any truth to reports that Iraq had tried to buy yellowcake uranium from Niger to make a nuclear weapon. Wilson discounted the reports. But the allegation nevertheless wound up in President Bush's 2003 State of the Union address.

Walton said Comey made the legal analysis more difficult by failing to appoint Fitzgerald under Justice Department rules for special prosecutors. As a result, the judge said he had to rely on a series of letters Comey wrote to Fitzgerald outlining the CIA leak investigation.

The judge concluded that Fitzgerald's powers are limited because he can be removed by the Justice Department. Walton also said Fitzgerald's authority will expire when the CIA leak investigation and resulting prosecutions are concluded.

"The integrity of the rule of law ... is challenged to the greatest degree when high-level government officials come under suspicion for violating the law," Walton wrote. "And a criminal investigation of any individuals, prominent or not ... must be above reproach to preserve respect for the fairness of our system of justice."

Little Is Clear In Laws On Leaks (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

The firing of a veteran CIA officer for unauthorized contacts with the press has focused attention on the patchwork of federal laws that govern disclosures of classified information, which are written broadly but are difficult to enforce and have historically been used sparingly in cases involving journalists.

Numerous experts on national security law said Mary O. McCarthy, whom the CIA fired 10 days before her retirement for allegedly having undisclosed contacts with reporters, could conceivably be prosecuted under a number of statutes, including those governing espionage, disclosures of classified information and even theft of government property.

Yet those experts warned that any such prosecution is fraught with obstacles, including the difficulty in showing that disclosures were made with knowledge that they would harm national security or were intended to benefit a foreign power.

In addition, McCarthy's attorney, Ty Cobb, said on Monday that she did not leak classified information to reporters, disputing a key accusation in a CIA statement issued last week. Cobb also said McCarthy did not disclose the existence of secret CIA-run prisons in Eastern Europe to a Washington Post reporter, which has been a primary focus of an internal leak investigation ordered by CIA Director Porter J. Goss.

"From the criminal side, there are a lot of difficulties with respect to this case," said Mark S. Zaid, a Washington lawyer who has represented many former employees in disputes with the CIA and other intelligence agencies. "I wouldn't be surprised if they decline prosecution, because it might create more problems than it's worth."

The case comes amid renewed debate in Congress over whether to increase penalties for leaking or to consider rewriting espionage and classified information laws. This week, the House approved a bill requiring the director of national intelligence to study yanking pensions for those caught revealing secrets.

Unlike in similar cases, such as the New York Times's disclosure of a warrantless eavesdropping program run by the National Security Agency, the CIA has not formally asked the Justice Department or the FBI to open a criminal probe into The Post's article on prisons, law enforcement officials said this week. Reporters at The Post and the Times were awarded Pulitzer Prizes this month for those articles.

In the latter half of the 20th century, including the Cold War years, the government prosecuted only one non-espionage leak case in federal courts. But the Justice Department has more recently signaled its willingness to test the boundaries of espionage law in a case involving two pro-Israel lobbyists, and the CIA and other intelligence agencies have launched aggressive internal probes to detect and punish leakers.

No statute in the U.S. criminal code covers all unauthorized disclosures of classified information, and Congress has debated whether an overarching law should be enacted. President Bill Clinton vetoed one such attempt shortly before he left office, and the Justice Department opposed a similar proposal in 2002, saying most, if not all, incidents can be dealt with under existing laws and administrative procedures.

The Intelligence Identities Protection Act outlaws deliberate identification of covert agents; other laws focus on electronic communications, codes, atomic secrets and other sensitive data.

The pivotal statute is the Espionage Act of 1917, which was aimed at traditional foreign spies when written but, according to the government, is broad enough to encompass a much wider array of situations.

The law outlaws unauthorized disclosure or receipt of a wide range of information "relating to the national defense" and is not explicitly limited to classified data. Many legal experts and defense lawyers argue that the law is so expansive it may be unconstitutional and, said Syracuse University law professor William C. Banks, "shot full of holes."

"It's been very difficult for the government to use the Espionage Act to obtain a conviction for simply leaking information," said Banks, who also runs the Institute for National Security and Counterterrorism at Syracuse. "It was written to cover conventional espionage and spying, not conventional leaking within the government."

But the government was successful in using the statute in the case of Samuel L. Morison, a former Navy intelligence analyst convicted of espionage and theft during the Reagan administration for leaking secret U.S. spy satellite photographs to Jane's Defense Weekly. A judge in the case ruled against defense assertions that the Espionage Act was unconstitutionally vague.

Currently, two lobbyists for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) are accused of receiving classified information during conversations with government officials, including former Pentagon employee Lawrence A. Franklin, who has been sentenced to 12 years in prison. In bringing the case, the government for the first time indicted two nongovernmental employees under the espionage law.

Prosecutors have also alarmed journalism groups and free-speech advocates by asserting that reporters could be prosecuted under the Espionage Act for receiving and publishing classified information. The laws governing classified material do not make it illegal to publish such material except in specific circumstances; for example, one statute outlaws reproducing or publishing photographs or drawings of designated military installations without government permission.

But in a brief filed in the AIPAC case, Justice Department lawyers argued there "plainly is no exemption in the statutes for the press," saying the Espionage Act and some Supreme Court opinions indicate that journalists can be prosecuted for revealing classified information.

At the same time, the lawyers said that prosecuting a reporter "would raise legitimate and serious issues and would not be undertaken lightly," adding that "the fact that there has never been such a prosecution speaks for itself."

Such disputes have renewed calls to revise the laws on classified information and espionage.

"The system is ossified, complicated and a relic of the Cold War period," said Elizabeth Rindskopf Parker, a former CIA and NSA general counsel who is dean of the University of the Pacific's law school and was recently named to a government board formed to oversee classification issues. "I think it needs to be looked at seriously again."

All Leaks Aren't Equal; It's The Meaning That Matters (USAT)

USA Today, April 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027321

For those not paying close daily attention, here's a catch-up on the Bush administration's hunt to uncover people who leak information it wants hidden:

·Wednesday, President Bush's closest political ally, Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, was called for the fifth time before a grand jury exploring the leak of a CIA operative's name. Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff is already under indictment as part of this probe; he says Bush himself authorized his disclosures.

·Last week, in an unrelated incident, the CIA very publicly fired a high-ranking CIA officer for unspecified leaks — which she denies.

·Meanwhile, hunts continue to discover who provided information to The Washington Post and The New York Times for two stories that embarrassed the administration. One disclosed that the CIA had been operating a covert prison system for gloves-off interrogation of terrorism suspects, possibly violating U.S. and international laws. The other revealed the government was eavesdropping without court warrants on telephone conversations of thousands of U.S. residents.

Are these, as the administration claims, outrageous leaks that jeopardize national security? Or are they attempts by honest people to expose abuse of power?

The vast majority of Washington leaks are neither. They usually have nothing to do with national security, and they come from a politician, bureaucrat or lobbyist trying to manipulate the news media into peddling a selective version of reality on a no-name basis.

But occasionally, a leak is something more.

Coincidentally, a memoir arrived this week from Watergate's "Deep Throat." It reminds us that some leaks are leaks of conscience, from public-spirited individuals trying to blow the whistle on government practices at odds with American ideals.

W. Mark Felt, then second-in-command at the FBI, writes: "From the start, it was clear that senior administration officials were up to their necks in this mess, and that they would stop at nothing to sabotage our investigation." Events proved how right he was.

Felt is one of many. Defense analyst Daniel Ellsberg leaked the Pentagon papers in 1971, after he couldn't get anyone in the administration or Congress to take seriously the implications of the detailed history of U.S. involvement in Vietnam that he had compiled.

More recently, a still-unidentified person leaked the photos of prisoner abuse at Iraq's Abu Ghraib, sensing that the only way to stop such practices was to appeal to the sensibilities of the public.

Harmful to U.S. interests? Definitely. Essential to protect U.S. values? No doubt. The same dichotomy applies in the secret-prison and wiretapping stories.

Nor is the leak of conscience limited to government. Embarrassed employees of the tobacco industry exposed its coverup aimed at denying the deadliness of their product.

That is not to say that employees anywhere should have free rein to say anything. At the CIA, for instance, employees are generally prohibited from talking to the news media or writing about their experiences. Even in more normal circumstances, confidentiality is essential to conducting business.

But as the leak probes continue, it's important to maintain a distinction between those who leak to help themselves and those who leak, at personal risk, to let the public know its leaders are flouting law or abusing power.

People can decide whether the programs and policies exposed are noble or shameful — just as they were able to draw conclusions about Watergate, Vietnam, Abu Ghraib and the tobacco industry. And despite the cries of those who would operate in secret, isn't that how democracy is supposed to work?

F.B.I. Set To Present Subpoenas To Lawmaker's Nonprofits (NYT)

By Jodi Rudoren

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

The F.B.I. has notified three nonprofit organizations created by Representative Alan B. Mollohan and financed primarily through special federal appropriations he steered their way that they should expect subpoenas soon for financial and other records.

Mr. Mollohan, Democrat of West Virginia, stepped down from the House ethics committee last week over accusations of financial impropriety that stem largely from a complaint the conservative National Legal and Policy Center has filed with the United States attorney in Washington.

The nonprofits at issue are the Vandalia Heritage Foundation, the Institute for Scientific Research and the Canaan Valley Institute. The F.B.I.'s notification to them has occurred over the last two days and signals that the bureau is looking deeper into the 500-page complaint, which among other things suggests ties between the special appropriations, or earmarks, and Mr. Mollohan's personal real estate investments.

Mr. Mollohan's office did not return repeated calls yesterday. Nor did Vandalia's president, Laura Kurtz Kuhns, whose ownership of vacant lots on Bald Head Island, N.C., with Mr. Mollohan and their spouses is a prime focus of the conservative group's complaint.

Though Ms. Kuhns could not be reached, an official of Mr. Mollohan's network of nonprofit groups confirmed that Vandalia had been told to expect a subpoena. And leaders of the two other nonprofits — Kiena L. Smith, Canaan Valley's executive director, and James L. Estep, president of the Institute for Scientific Research — said they planned to cooperate fully with the F.B.I.

Mr. Estep said an investigator for the bureau called the institute's office yesterday to get confirmation of the mailing address and warn of a coming "informational subpoena."

Mr. Estep, who also heads the West Virginia High Technology Consortium Foundation, a nonprofit created by Mr. Mollohan that has not been contacted by the authorities, added: "They're welcome to come into either organization, and we will provide whatever they want and answer whatever questions they have. We have nothing to hide."

Ms. Smith said her receptionist took a call Wednesday in which an F.B.I. representative promised a subpoena for financial records within "a couple of days."

"We have 10 public audits, it's fine," she said. "Anybody can look at our records. They're public information."

Lobbyist Stripped Of Good Name, But Not Of Good Vacation (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 27 — Jack Abramoff may be facing financial ruin and a long prison sentence, but he still knows how to vacation.

Guests at the oceanfront Turnberry Isle Resort and Country Club in Aventura, Fla., say they were surprised to see Mr. Abramoff, his wife and their five children at the 300-acre golf and tennis resort for more than a week this month for the Passover holiday.

Like many other guests at the resort then, the Abramoffs arranged the trip through a travel agency based in Brooklyn that, according to its Web site, charged a minimum of $3,600 per adult for a nine-night Passover package.

A lawyer for Mr. Abramoff, Abbe D. Lowell, said the trip was paid for by Mr. Abramoff's "extended family," although Mr. Lowell would not say which family member or members. He said Mr. Abramoff "definitely did not pay" for the holiday.

Mr. Lowell said in an interview that it was a "cheap shot to suggest that Mr. Abramoff was living high off the hog" and that the trip, which allowed Mr. Abramoff to meet with his lawyers in Miami on a related criminal case, was intended to benefit his family in a difficult time.

The tour agency, Presidential Kosher Holidays, which the Abramoffs had used in the past to arrange Passover vacations, would not comment, saying it protects its clients' privacy. The company charges rates on a sliding scale for children based on their ages, but it declined to reveal the children's rates to a reporter.

In court papers last month, Mr. Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty in Washington to seeking to corrupt Congress members and other public officials, in part by sending them on expensive trips, insisted that he was financially ruined as a result of his plea bargain with the Justice Department.

"Mr. Abramoff is broke," his lawyers said in a court filing in Miami, where they were asking for leniency for Mr. Abramoff after he pleaded guilty there to fraud involving his purchase of a casino-boat fleet. "He is tormented daily that his wife will not be able to support the large family on her own."

Turnberry Isle, on the Atlantic coast between Miami and Fort Lauderdale, is often found on lists of the nation's best resorts. According to its Web site, room rates this month begin at $559 a night. It has two 18-hole golf courses designed by Robert Trent Jones, 11 tennis courts, two swimming pools, three restaurants and a marina.

The Web site of Presidential Kosher Holidays described the resort package as "everything you could want in a Passover vacation" including "gourmet Glatt Kosher cuisine."

Guests at Turnberry Isle said Mr. Abramoff, who is praised by friends for his devotion to Judaism and to his family, did not appear eager to make his presence known.

"I was passingly aware of Mr. Abramoff, whom I saw a couple of times in the course of my stay," said Gil Graff, director of the Bureau of Jewish Education of Greater Los Angeles, who was taken to the resort by Presidential Kosher Holidays to provide lectures to the Passover guests on modern Jewish history. "I know that he was present."

Modi Rosenfeld, a comedian from New York who entertained the Passover guests at the resort, said he was asked by organizers of his appearance not to do political humor because someone in the audience was "political" and was "in the news."

DOJ_NMG_0027323

Mr. Rosenfeld said he did not know that they were referring to Mr. Abramoff. "They said, Can you not do anything political?" said Mr. Rosenfeld, who uses only his first name professionally. "I said, 'Not a problem.' I kept the political humor down to a few bare jokes."

Mr. Rosenfeld said that had he known that the celebrity in the audience was Mr. Abramoff, whose lobbying operation earned more than $80 million in fees in recent years, "I would have charged more — a lot more."

Former MS-13 Leader Gets 30 Years (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

The judge wanted Juan Carlos Rivas-Moreiera to understand exactly what he was saying yesterday in D.C. Superior Court.

So when the time came to explain why he was about to sentence the onetime MS-13 leader to 30 years in prison for a near-fatal attack on a rival gang member, Judge Hiram E. Puig-Lugo took the unusual step of addressing him in their shared mother tongue.

Speaking in Spanish, Puig-Lugo said that rarely had he seen a defendant as smart as Rivas-Moreiera and never had he seen a defendant so involved in his own defense.

"You could have been a businessman, or an attorney, or a doctor, or a teacher -- or a judge," Puig-Lugo told him.

Instead, Rivas-Moreiera, 25, used his smarts and charisma to rise to the top of the MS-13 Marineros, a Maryland clique of the notorious Latino gang that has its roots in Central America.

And far from being the worst of his alleged acts, the May 2001 attack in Northwest Washington was only one crime in a life rife with it, the prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Gilberto Guerrero Jr., said.

Rivas-Moreiera, of Silver Spring, is among the reputed members of MS-13, or Mara Salvatrucha, who were charged in Maryland last year in a federal racketeering indictment that details murders, kidnapping, robbery and other crimes.

The indictment was a significant regional strike against local Latino gangs, which have lured isolated and disaffected adolescents into dangerous lifestyles and sown fear in neighborhoods that are heavily populated by immigrants.

"It is a loss for our community that you chose to use your intelligence in the way you did," Puig-Lugo said. "Every time you recruit somebody to be part of your mara " -- as gangs are called -- "you are stealing someone from our community."

A lawyer. A teacher. A doctor.

But pained as the judge appeared by the sight of such potential squandered, it was the harrowing events of May 19, 2001, that led him, he said, to depart from the District's sentencing guidelines and hand down a penalty considerably closer to the maximum.

On that night, Rivas-Moreiera was out for revenge, according to the account laid out by prosecutors in court papers and at trial. Seven months earlier, he had been attacked by Roque Elias Lopez-Gonzalez, a member of Mara R, another gang. Although Lopez-Gonzalez was quickly outnumbered and overpowered, Rivas-Moreiera wasn't willing to forget, and that night in May, he was still smarting.

Accompanied by two fellow gang members, he went looking for anyone who belonged to Mara R. They found Elgar Hernandez in a liquor store at 14th Street NW and Florida Avenue. When Rivas-Moreiera asked Hernandez what gang he was with, Hernandez told him "La R," as Mara R is also known. Rivas-Moreiera said he and his friends were also from "La R."

They weren't, and that soon became clear to Hernandez.

The three strangers jumped him a short time later in an alley off Chapin Street NW. One of them put a gun to Hernandez's head and forced him into their car. This, he was told, was payback, no matter that Hernandez had nothing to do with the earlier attack.

As they drove along Piney Branch Parkway NW, Hernandez was stabbed through the chest and in the heart, setting off a furious struggle inside the car. Hernandez managed to pull the knife out of his chest and throw it out the window. And when the car slowed at 17th Street, he got out.

When passersby spotted him, someone called 911, and Hernandez was taken to Washington Hospital Center, where he had open-heart surgery and survived to testify against Rivas-Moreiera.

But his testimony would not be enough. The first two trials, both last year, ended in hung juries.

Only after prosecutors made a deal with an MS-13 member to have him testify did they manage to win a conviction against Rivas-Moreiera, who was found guilty in February of assault with a dangerous weapon, aggravated assault while armed and threats.

Rivas-Moreiera's attorney, Ross Hecht, said in court that his client plans to appeal. Given that he faces the federal charges in Maryland, Rivas-Moreiera chose not to address the court.

DOJ_NMG_0027324

The U.S. attorney's office had urged the judge to depart from the voluntary sentencing guidelines, pushing for a penalty beyond the recommended 10 to 20 years.

The judge agreed.

"You are not going to keep hurting our community," Puig-Lugo said, citing the cruel and violent nature of the attack, the link to organized crime and the threats that Rivas-Moreiera made against the victim, the victim's family and a witness in the case.

"I'm sorry to have to issue such a harsh sentence," Puig-Lugo said, "but your conduct over the years leaves me no choice."

Sniper Trial To Echo First Case (WT/AP)

By Stephen Manning, Associated Press

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

The beat-up Chevrolet Caprice, a hole drilled in the trunk for a gun barrel, is back in Maryland. So is the Bushmaster rifle, fixed with a sniper scope, that authorities think fired the fatal .223-caliber bullets.

Many witnesses who testified against convicted sniper John Allen Muhammad in his trial in Virginia are ready to tell their stories again, including some who bear scars from the Bushmaster's bullets.

And Muhammad has returned to Montgomery County, where the October 2002 D.C.-area sniper spree began, to face another jury.

Jury selection is set to begin Monday in his second trial, a case that likely will echo the 2003 Virginia case that ended in a death sentence for one of the 10 killings. Yet while much of the evidence and testimony during the expected five-week trial will be similar, the new trial could take some unexpected turns.

Muhammad, 45, plans to be his own lawyer despite evidence he may be mentally ill. He wants Lee Boyd Malvo, 21, also convicted in Virginia and serving a life sentence, to testify. And jurors will hear evidence about two Maryland killings that weren't part of the first trial.

"This trial addresses completely different victims," said Montgomery County State's Attorney Douglas F. Gansler, whose office will prosecute Muhammad. "The first trial was about one murder in Virginia. This trial will be about six murders here in Montgomery County."

Mr. Gansler was the first to file homicide charges in 2002, but lost the right to try Muhammad and of Malvo first to Virginia, which is more inclined to impose the death penalty. He argues his county was home to the most killings and bills the retrials of the two men later this year as insurance if their Virginia convictions are overturned.

But there are questions whether the new trial is necessary or worth the cost.

The severest punishment Muhammad faces in Maryland is life in prison. The most Muhammad could likely hope for in Virginia is to have his death sentence replaced by a life term, said his Virginia attorney, Peter D. Greenspun.

"There is no reason for this prosecution to occur," Mr. Greenspun said. "It's not as if there is a reversal, then John Muhammad walks out onto the street."

Virginia spent $3 million to prosecute the snipers. While Maryland's costs have not approached that level, expenses are mounting.

Montgomery County has spent $210,000 on courtroom security and transportation, a figure Sheriff Ray Kight expects to double by the end of the trials. Jailing the pair from their arrival last summer to January cost roughly $240,000.

However, most of the preparation work on evidence and witnesses was done for the Virginia trial. Mr. Gansler's prosecutors are salaried. And Muhammad's three standby attorneys are working for free.

Some relatives of the Maryland victims think the two should be held accountable, regardless of the cost.

Victoria Snider, sister of James "Sonny" Buchanan, plans to attend the trial often even though it means revisiting grim details of her brother's death.

"I won't lie, it is emotional," she said. "But it is also important that justice be served on both of them."

Kaine Denies Clemency; Killer Executed (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

RICHMOND -- Death row inmate Dexter Lee Vinson was executed last night, hours after Gov. Timothy M. Kaine denied his petition for clemency.

Vinson received a lethal injection at the Greensville Correctional Center in Jarratt and was pronounced dead at 9:15 p.m.

Vinson, 43, was convicted of the 1997 murder of his ex-girlfriend, Angela Felton, of Portsmouth. A 25-year-old mother of three, Mrs. Felton was abducted and brought to an abandoned house, where she was stabbed and sexually mutilated. She bled to death.

DOJ_NMG_0027325

It was the first death penalty case Mr. Kaine, a Democrat and a devout Catholic, had considered since taking office in January. The death penalty became a major issue during the gubernatorial race last year when Republican Jerry W. Kilgore criticized Mr. Kaine's opposition to capital punishment.

Mr. Kaine vowed that he would uphold Virginia's capital punishment law, despite the teachings of his faith.

Mr. Kaine denied clemency last night, after the U.S. Supreme Court refused to stop the execution.

"Having carefully reviewed the Petition for Clemency and judicial opinions regarding this case, I find no compelling reasons to doubt Mr. Vinson's guilt or to invalidate the sentence recommended by the jury and imposed, and affirmed, by the courts," Mr. Kaine said in a statement. "Accordingly, I decline to intervene."

Vinson became the 95th inmate Virginia has executed since the Supreme Court reinstated capital punishment in 1976. Only Texas has executed more, with 362.

Vinson denied he had anything to do with Mrs. Felton's slaying, and his attorneys had argued that their client's trial was riddled with holes.

Court records show that witnesses said they saw Vinson near the house where Mrs. Felton's body was found. Court papers also show that investigators said Vinson's palm print was found at the crime scene and that a drop of Mrs. Felton's blood was found on a pair of shorts in Vinson's home.

Earlier this week, Vinson's attorneys scrambled to delay the execution by filing appeals.

One appeal argued that there were several shortcomings in Vinson's trial. The other petition asked the Supreme Court to delay his execution until the court decides whether a Florida inmate could challenge that lethal injection violates his civil rights because it is a form of cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Constitution.

The question centers on whether inmates feel excruciating pain when the final drug in the lethal mixture is administered.

Like Florida, Virginia administers three drugs. The first is an anesthetic that puts the inmate to sleep. The second is a chemical that causes paralysis, and the third is potassium chloride, which stops the heart.

Dressed in a light blue, button-down shirt and denim pants, Vinson did not look through the glass at witnesses, including several of the victim's family members, as he was brought into the death chamber at 8:58 p.m.

When asked whether he had any final words, Vinson shook his head sharply back and forth several times.

His expression remained blank as he was strapped to the gurney. The drugs began to flow at 9:08 p.m.; he was pronounced dead seven minutes later.

His last visitors were his sisters. He ate his final meal at 4:15 p.m., but corrections officials would not reveal what he ate, at Vinson's request.

Mrs. Felton's former mother-in-law, Wilhelmena Gatling, said yesterday that she hoped Vinson's death would bring some comfort to Mrs. Felton's children, now teenagers.

"I think it will bring closure to the children, but I don't believe in the death penalty, so it's not going to bring closure to me," Mrs. Gatling said. "But as long as the children can go on, I can go on.

"She was a great mother and daughter-in-law," Mrs. Gatling added. "I don't care what you do, you can't replace a mother."

Kaine Allows Execution Despite His Beliefs (WP)

By Candace Rondeaux And Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine rejected a plea for clemency yesterday from convicted killer Dexter Lee Vinson, allowing his execution to go forward in the first test of Kaine's stated public resolve to uphold the death penalty despite his personal opposition.

Vinson, 43, was executed by lethal injection last night in Virginia's death chamber for abducting, stabbing and sexually mutilating his ex-girlfriend in Portsmouth in 1997. He was pronounced dead at 9:15 at the Greensville Correctional Center in Jarratt, said Larry Traylor, a Department of Corrections spokesman.

"I find no compelling reasons to doubt Mr. Vinson's guilt or to invalidate the sentence recommended by the jury and imposed, and affirmed, by the courts," Kaine said in a brief statement issued 2 1/2 hours before Vinson was put to death. "Accordingly, I decline to intervene."

With those words, Kaine made good on a promise he spoke directly and repeatedly to Virginians last year at campaign rallies and in television ads: that his personal and long-standing opposition to the death penalty, based on his Catholic faith, would not prevent him from allowing the ultimate punishment to be carried out.

Kaine's Republican opponent in the governor's race, former attorney general Jerry W. Kilgore, had repeatedly slammed Kaine for his stance on the death penalty, and ran ads featuring the victims of heinous crimes. In one, the father of a crime victim said Kaine would not have executed Adolph Hitler.

DOJ_NMG_0027326

But Kaine responded with ads of his own, in which he vowed to enforce Virginia's capital punishment laws. "My faith teaches life is sacred," he said to the camera. "But I take my oath of office seriously, and I'll enforce the death penalty."

The campaign-trail bashing proved a boon for Kaine, whose public declarations about his personal faith appeared to bolster -- not hurt -- his numbers in the polls and helped lift him to victory in November.

On Thursday, the new governor waited in his third-floor office across from the state Capitol to hear the outcome of Vinson's final court appeals, and to weigh Vinson's request for clemency. An aide said he consulted frequently with his chief counsel, Larry Roberts, and a small "brain trust of lawyers of his own choosing."

Delacey Skinner, Kaine's communications director, said, "This is a decision that he makes alone."

The clemency petition called on the governor to commute the convicted murderer's sentence to life in prison without parole. Vinson's attorneys contended that a key witness in the case had lied about seeing Vinson kill the victim, Angela Felton. They also disputed findings about forensic evidence in his case and said he deserved a new trial because his Portsmouth defense attorneys had a conflict of interest.

Days before the execution, a Vatican representative and two Virginia Catholic clergymen -- Arlington Bishop Paul S. Loverde and Bishop Francis DiLorenzo of Richmond -- also urged Kaine to halt Vinson's execution, calling the death penalty "unjustified."

Years ago, Kaine, who once worked with a Catholic mission in Honduras, echoed that same view when as a young lawyer in private practice he defended two death row inmates. In 1987, as he awaited the execution of one of his clients, Kaine told The Washington Post that "murder is wrong in the gulag, in Afghanistan, in Soweto, in the mountains of Guatemala, in Fairfax County . . . and even the Spring Street Penitentiary."

Shortly before Vinson was put to death yesterday, some observers speculated that political pressure would push Kaine to deny Vinson's clemency petition. But during a recent radio interview Kaine eschewed the suggestion that politics might play a role in his first death penalty decision and called Vinson's crime "very gruesome."

"The pressure of trying to make the right decision about whether there is or is not doubt about guilt when somebody's life is at stake is so much more pressure than whatever the political pressure of the day would be," Kaine said.

Yesterday's execution marked the first in Virginia since September 2004.

A Portsmouth jury convicted Vinson in 1998 of capital murder, carjacking, abduction with intent to defile and sexual penetration with an inanimate object, a year after the severely mutilated body of Felton, a 25-year-old mother of three, was found in a vacant house in Portsmouth.

In the years since her daughter's mutilated body was found wrapped in a dirty wool blanket in Portsmouth, Frances Peace has imagined Vinson's death a million times. She said she always thought she would be there to witness his execution. But days beforehand she was unsure if that's what her daughter would have wanted or if she could even summon the strength to attend.

"I want to be there for her. But I don't think it would be good for me to go," Peace said. "I think that's what she's telling me -- 'Mom, don't go. It's alright.' It's not going to bring her back."

Vinson entered the chamber two minutes before his scheduled execution. Several of Felton's family members attended the execution as witnesses. He offered no resistance as several guards strapped him to the gurney. Asked if he had any last words, Vinson shook his head and declined to make a statement. The blue curtain to the witness chamber closed, and reopened eight minutes later.

New York Killers, And Those Killed, By Numbers (NYT)

By Jo Craven McGinty

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

The oldest killer was 88; he murdered his wife. The youngest was 9; she stabbed her friend. The women were more than twice as likely as men to murder a current spouse or lover. But once the romance was over, only the men killed their exes. The deadliest day was on July 10, 2004, when eight people died in separate homicides.

Five people eliminated a boss; 10 others murdered co-workers. Males who killed favored firearms, while women and girls chose knives as often as guns. More homicides occurred in Brooklyn than in any other borough. More happened on Saturday. And roughly a third are unsolved.

At the end of each year, the New York Police Department reports the number of killings — there were 540 in 2005. Typically, much is made of how the number has fallen in recent years — to totals not seen since the early 1960's. But beyond summarizing the overarching trends, the police spend little time compiling the individual details.

The New York Times obtained the basic records for every murder in the city over the last three years, and while the events make for disturbing reading, the numbers can hint at trends, occasionally solve a mystery and in at least some straightforward way answer for the city the questions of who kills and who is killed in the five boroughs.

From 2003 through 2005, 1,662 murders were committed in New York. No information, beyond an occasional physical description, is available on the killers in the unsolved cases.

Of the rest, men and boys were responsible for 93 percent of the murders; they killed with guns about two-thirds of the time; their victims tended to be other men and boys; and in more than half the cases, the killer and the victim knew each other.

The police said they were more interested in disrupting crime patterns. "We're looking for things with operational implications — time of day, day of the week — to see that we deploy officers at the right times and in sufficient numbers," said Michael J. Farrell, deputy commissioner for strategic initiatives.

The offender and victim were of the same race in more than three-quarters of the killings. And according to Mr. Farrell, they often had something else in common: More than 90 percent of the killers had criminal records; and of those who wound up killed, more than half had them.

"If the average New Yorker is concerned about being murdered in a random crime, the odds of that happening are really remote," Mr. Farrell said. "If you are living apart from a life of crime, your risk is negligible."

Criminologists confirm that assessment. "People will be shocked to see how safe it is to live in New York City," said Andrew Karmen, a sociology professor at John Jay College of Criminal Justice and an expert on victimology. "Victims and offenders are pretty much pulled from the same background. Very often, young victims have young killers. Very often, the victim and killer knew each other."

But plenty of times, events diverge from the norm.

At least a quarter of the city's murders in these three years, were committed by strangers, and in those instances, most were the result of a dispute. Stranger homicides now happen at almost twice the rate of 50 years ago, when, according to a classic study by Marvin Wolfgang, a criminologist, about 14 percent of murders were committed by strangers.

"Homicide used to be regarded as an acquaintance phenomenon with relatively rare incidents involving strangers," said Steven F. Messner, a homicide expert and a professor of sociology at the State University of New York at Albany. "It's still characteristically an acquaintance event. But the stranger homicides are now nontrivial."

After four years as commander of the Brooklyn North homicide squad, Lt. John Cornicello said the murders in his section of the borough had begun to run together. Yet from memory, he rolled off the details of several: The good Samaritan shot for his Lincoln Navigator after offering a ride to a group of stranded people. The ".40-caliber killer," a serial murderer who shot and killed but did not rob four shopkeepers because he believed they were Middle Eastern.

"More and more, they seem to be the result of stupidity," Lieutenant Cornicello said. "Take the Potato Wedge Killer."

In that recent case, a customer at a KFC restaurant became incensed when he did not receive enough starch with his fried chicken order. After demanding both a refund and an order of potato wedges, he later confronted the cashier with whom he had argued and stabbed him to death.

Among all the city's victims, the oldest was 91; she died during a robbery. Whites and Asians, who seldom murdered, were also infrequently killed: Together, they represented 75 or fewer victims each year. Most homicides occurred outdoors. The deadliest hour was 1 to 2 a.m.

And a small but unsettling number of children were among the victims, including 21 infants and 32 children ages 1 to 10, most of whom died at the hands of a parent.

According to Professor Karmen, 10 is the safest age. "You're too old to be abused or neglected as a child," he said, "and you're not old enough to be out on the streets."

An interesting, though uncommon, group of murders that made it into the police accounting in these years involved a handful of victims who died of injuries they had first suffered in crimes committed one or more years before.

Stabbed, shot, beaten or burned, they survived long enough to be counted as murder victims in another calendar year.

Sixty-nine victims fit this description.

In some instances, they were injured decades ago. The medical examiner alerts the police when such deaths occur, according to Sgt. Edward Yee of the Police Department's crime analysis unit, and the police add the victims to that year's murder tally.

For example, 21 deaths that were counted as murders in 2005 resulted from injuries that occurred in earlier years.

The oldest involved a shooting in 1975, when a man attacked his brother in a domestic dispute. That raised the murder toll to 540, the lowest figure recorded by the city in four decades, but only 519 murders were committed last year.

Subtracting these belated deaths makes the recent decline in the number of homicides — which has grabbed headlines — seem even more stunning. But for the purpose of generating the annual murder tally, the police do not distinguish between fresh and delayed murders.

"No one does," Mr. Farrell said, referring to other police departments.

DOJ_NMG_0027328

Within the city, 40 percent of the murders occurred in Brooklyn. The 75th Precinct, with 90, had the most of any precinct, but there were hot spots scattered throughout the city, in Brooklyn's 73rd, 79th and 83rd Precincts, for example, and in the 44th and 46th Precincts in the Bronx. In and around the 32nd Precinct in Harlem could be dangerous, too.

No one is certain what explains the recent decreases in the overall number of homicides, but many criminologists believe social factors may help explain why, and where, most murders continue to occur.

"The problem of crime and violence is rooted in neighborhood conditions — high rates of poverty, family disruption, failing schools, lack of recreational opportunities, active recruitment by street gangs, drug markets," Professor Karmen said. "People forced to reside under those conditions are at a greater risk of getting caught up in violence, as victims or as perpetrators."

The police are generally unimpressed by such theories, as well as the minutiae surrounding the deaths.

"Crime is concentrated," Mr. Farrell said. "Who knows why? We're looking at what we can affect."

The roughly one-third of the homicides that remain unsolved create one of the larger categories of murder. Typically, 50 to 55 percent of murders are solved in the same calendar year in which the crime is committed, according to Paul J. Browne, a deputy police commissioner in New York.

The police clear an additional number of murders from previous years, for an overall annual clearance rate of about 70 percent. That beats the national average, which is closer to 62 percent, according to F.B.I. statistics.

In New York, several things may contribute to the number of open cases, according to the police and criminologists. A significant number may have been stranger murders, which are particularly hard to solve. It can take months to collect witness statements.

And sometimes, detectives just cannot get the right person to talk.

"The big secret of detective work," Lieutenant Cornicello said, "is that you've got to get somebody else to tell you what happened."

Duke Accuser Filed Earlier Assault Report (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

DURHAM, N.C., April 27 — The woman who has accused three Duke University lacrosse players of raping her last month claimed a decade ago that she had been sexually assaulted by three men, the authorities said. The woman's mother said her daughter did not file charges.

"She didn't want to bring charges up against them because they said they were going to kill her if she said anything," said the mother, who is not being named because of the nature of the crimes her daughter, a 27-year-old single mother with two children, has said were committed.

The earlier assault was said to have occurred in Creedmoor, N.C., a town about 16 miles northeast of Durham that was the home of the woman's boyfriend at the time, the mother said. The mother said her daughter was 18 then.

But the Creedmoor police chief, Ted Pollard, said the woman filed the report when she was 18, in August 1996, but said the assault had happened in June 1993, when she was 14.

Chief Pollard said the initial report did not explain why there had been a delay of more than three years between the alleged assault and when she reported it. He said Thursday that his office had only paper records from that time period and had not yet determined whether there had been a follow-up investigation.

"It says she was beaten, assaulted and sexually assaulted by three African-American males," Chief Pollard said. "And she identified the three males."

The Creedmoor case was first reported by Essence magazine.

The initial report was taken by Brian Bishop, who was a lieutenant in the Creedmoor Police Department at the time and now is an investigator with the Durham Police Department, Chief Pollard said. The Durham department is investigating the rape accusations at Duke.

Last week, two Duke players were indicted on charges of first-degree forcible rape, first-degree sexual offense and kidnapping : Collin Finnerty, 19, of Garden City, N.Y., and Reade Seligmann, 20, of Essex Fells, N.J. Michael B. Nifong, the Durham County district attorney, has said he is gathering evidence to indict a third person.

Some defense lawyers have attacked the accuser's credibility.

The mother, in an interview late Thursday, said of the alleged assault in Creedmoor, "She told me that it happened, and I believe her."

Connecticut hauler pleads guilty to racketeering (Waste News)

Waste News, April 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027329

April 27 -- A Danbury, Conn., trash hauler pleaded guilty to a federal racketeering charge, admitting to taking part in system to divvy up territory, the U.S. Department of Justice said.

Joseph R. LoStocco, 47, who owns and operates JR LoStocco Carting in Danbury, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiring to violate the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act.

LoStocco faces a maximum term of 20 years and a fine of up to $250,000, according to Kevin O´Connor, U.S. Attorney for the District of Connecticut.

"This guilty plea stems from a federal investigation into waste industry practices in Connecticut and New York," O´Connor said. "The investigation is very active, and we have no further comment at this time."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justice Department Sues Fountainbleau Apartments On Housing Discrimination (CHA)

Chattanoogan, April 28, 2006

The Justice Department announced Thursday that it has filed a lawsuit against the owner and resident manager of the Fountainbleau Apartments in East Ridge, alleging housing discrimination against individuals on account of their having children.

"No one should be denied an opportunity to live where they choose because they have children," said Wan J. Kim, Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division. "The Justice Department is committed to vigorous prosecution of illegal housing discrimination."

The complaint, filed in federal district court in Chattanooga, alleges that the defendants refused to rent apartments to persons with children and steered them to another apartment complex. The Department conducted its investigation through the use of fair-housing testers - individuals who pose as renters for purposes of gathering information about possible discriminatory practices in the rental of apartments.

The lawsuit seeks an order prohibiting the defendants from engaging in unlawful housing discrimination, monetary damages for victims of the defendants' unlawful conduct, and the payment of a civil penalty to the government.

Fighting illegal housing discrimination is a top priority of the Justice Department, officials said. In February, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales announced Operation Home Sweet Home, a concentrated initiative "to expose and eliminate housing discrimination in America."

The initiative was inspired by the plight of displaced victims of Hurricane Katrina who were suddenly forced to find new places to live, it was stated. Operation Home Sweet Home, however, is not limited to the areas hit by Hurricane Katrina, but targets housing discrimination all over the country - including Tennessee.

The federal Fair Housing Act prohibits discrimination in housing on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, familial status, national origin and disability.

New York election board sets machine standards (AP)

AP, April 28, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. After months of haggling, the state Board of Elections has adopted guidelines for new voting machines that can be used in New York.The board also ordered machine makers to disclose information about their political contributions and any lawsuits against them.A statement released by the board says the new standards go beyond Help America Vote Act (HAVA) requirements and contain a number of features that make them model regulations for the nation.The standards require a voter verifiable paper trail.The adoption of the standards means machine manufacturers can begin submitting their wares to the board for testing that could lead to eventual sales in the lucrative New York market. State law requires New York's old lever-action machines to be replaced in time for the 2007 election.New York has been sued by the U-S Justice Department for failing to comply with HAVA provisions requiring states to have new machines in place for the 2006 elections.

Phone-jamming Case Invokes Images Of Watergate (KRT)

By William Douglas

Knight Ridder, April 28, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. - Is it a third-rate political dirty trick by Republicans or a cheap attempt by Democrats to drag the GOP through the mud before November's elections?

Democrats and Republicans here are locked in a legal battle over GOP operatives who tried to suppress voter turnout in a key 2002 U.S. Senate race by jamming Democratic get-out-the-vote phone banks on Election Day.

DOJ_NMG_0027330

The case has national implications. New Hampshire Democrats, through a civil lawsuit, are trying to question Ken Mehlman, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, and White House officials about why one GOP official who was involved in the scheme called the White House repeatedly.

Democrats describe the phone-jamming case in Nixonian terms, using Watergate-era phrases such as "follow the money" and "what did they know and when did they know it?"

"It's been the gift that's kept on giving for the Democrats," said Dante Scala, a political-science professor at Manchester's St. Anselm College. "It's been gradually going up the ladder, and now it's in Ken Mehlman's office."

Democrats say smoking guns abound in the case:

-A Republican operative who later was convicted in the case called Mehlman's former office in the White House nearly two dozen times.

-The RNC paid millions of dollars in legal expenses for the operative, though it was under no legal obligation to do so.

-Contributions were made to the state GOP by Indian tribes whom disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff represented and by former House Speaker Tom DeLay's political action committee in amounts that together almost equaled the cost of the phone-jamming scheme.

"There are some parallels to Watergate," Howard Dean, the Democratic National Committee chairman, said last week. "This is a third-rate, silly effort that definitely turns out to be rooted in the White House."

Republican officials are on the defensive. They call the vote-suppression scheme an unfortunate incident that was the work of rogue operatives who did it without party leaders' knowledge. They say the civil suit is a baseless attempt by Democrats to score points and ruin the New Hampshire Republican Party financially. State GOP officials filed a countersuit charging that the state Democratic Party had "ulterior and improper" motives in suing them.

"This is taking a local political issue and exploiting it to the national level," Ovide Lamontagne, the New Hampshire GOP's attorney, said of the Democratic lawsuit. "They are not interested in justice. They're interested in political exploitation."

As Democratic and Republican lawyers file motion after motion, there's no argument about the basic facts. On Nov. 5, 2002, hot lines that state Democrats and a firefighter's association had set up to urge people to the polls were jammed by more than 800 hang-up calls. State Republican officials say that once they learned of the scheme, they tried to stop it.

The jamming occurred during what was billed as a hotly contested Senate race between Republican John Sununu, who was then a member of the House of Representatives, and Democrat Jeanne Shaheen, then New Hampshire's governor. Party control of the Senate was thought to possibly turn on the outcome.

In the end, the race wasn't close. Sununu defeated Shaheen by about 20,000 votes, weakening Democratic arguments that the suppression scheme cost them the election.

"We'll never know how effective it was. ... Sununu won by a bigger margin than anyone expected," said Kathleen Sullivan, the New Hampshire Democratic Party chairwoman. "But that's not the point. It was wrong. ... We have 400 (state) legislative races. The intent may have been to influence one election, but it may have affected hundreds of races."

Three men have been convicted. James Tobin, 45, who headed the Republican National Committee's New England efforts in 2002 and was the regional director for President Bush's 2004 re-election campaign, was convicted in December of one count of aiding and abetting telephone harassment and one count of conspiracy to commit telephone harassment. He faces up to seven years in prison for both felonies. He's scheduled to be sentenced in May.

Chuck McGee, former executive director of the state Republican Party, pleaded guilty to hatching the scheme and served seven months in prison.

Allen Raymond, former president of GOP Marketplace LLC, a Virginia-based company, pleaded guilty to helping to execute the plan and is serving a three-month sentence.

Last month, a federal grand jury indicted a fourth man, Shaun Hansen, 34, of Spokane Wash., and charged him with the same crimes as Tobin. Prosecutors say that Hansen, former co-owner of an Idaho-based telemarketing company, was paid $2,500 to have his employees place hundreds of hang-up calls to disrupt the New Hampshire get-out-the-vote effort.

Hansen pleaded not guilty. But he told the Idaho State Journal in July 2004 that GOP Marketplace hired his company to call six phone lines that the New Hampshire Democratic Party and the firefighter's association used. He said he didn't know the reason for the calls.

Democrats say the case has gotten more and more curious as it's gone along. They noticed that Tobin had high-powered legal representation and later learned that the RNC was paying the bills.

RNC Chairman Mehlman said in CNN interviews this month that the decision to pay for Tobin's lawyers was made before he became the chairman, and he defended the payments, maintaining "it was right to honor the decision."

Throughout the controversy, state GOP officials maintained that Tobin and McGee acted on their own. Mehlman says the national party had nothing to do with the scheme.

Fuel was added to the fire after the Senate Majority Project, a Democratic activist group, found records from Tobin's trial detailing 22 telephone calls that he placed from New Hampshire to the White House political office - which Mehlman headed at the time - on Nov. 5-6.

"I have a hard time believing they didn't discuss this," said Sullivan, the state Democratic chairwoman.

Mehlman said the number of calls wasn't unusual, given the competitiveness of the Sununu-Shaheen race and its potential impact on Congress.

"To be clear, none of my conversations, nor the conversations of my staff, involved discussion of the phone-jamming incident," Mehlman said in a written statement on April 11.

White House officials declined to discuss the case because it's an ongoing legal matter.

In addition to the legal bills, state Democrats say they've found another curious national GOP link to the scheme: $15,000 in contributions to the state Republican Party from two of Abramoff's Indian tribe clients and from Americans for a Republican Majority, a DeLay-led political action committee, about a week before the election.

Sullivan, the state Democratic leader, questioned the timing of the three donations and called the Indian ones unusual because tribes don't usually give directly to state parties unless there are casino-gaming interests in that state.

Abramoff pleaded guilty to unrelated fraud charges in January and is cooperating with federal investigators in a major corruption probe. On April 4, DeLay announced his impending resignation from Congress amid allegations of corruption.

Democrats have taken all these circumstantial links and run with them. Sens. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., fired off a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on April 20 asking whether the Justice Department is looking into it.

Dean has hawked the New Hampshire story on TV news shows, and he sent a letter to Mehlman earlier this month asking whether the White House authorized the phone-jamming.

These actions are all part of the Democrats' campaign to indict the Republican Party for fostering a "culture of corruption," according to Scala of St. Anselm's. "They've kind of successfully seized the high ground in being the anti-corruption party," he said.

Republicans complain that the Democrats are showboating and piling on.

"They're just thrilled by being able to distract us, cost us money," said Wayne Semprini, the New Hampshire Republican Party chairman. "Apart from this being a gigantic nuisance, it's siphoning off resources that we could put in campaigns throughout the state ... money that could be used for legitimate election efforts."

FBI Asked To Look Into Georgia Vandalism At Muslim Home (MACT)

By Doug Gross

The Macon Telegraph, April 28, 2006

ATLANTA - A national Islamic civil rights group is asking the FBI to investigate vandalism at a Muslim home in suburban Atlanta as a hate crime.

The Douglas County family's van was burned and the words "Killers go home" spray-painted on the side of their house on April 8.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations in Washington said local authorities had been slow to investigate the crime.

But Douglas County Chief Deputy Stan Copeland said evidence from the scene has been submitted to the state crime lab and that police patrols in the neighborhood have been stepped up as investigators seek new leads.

Stephen Emmett, a spokesman for the FBI in Atlanta, said late Wednesday that the bureau's civil rights squad here was not familiar with CAIR's request for an investigation. Copeland said Thursday that a local FBI office has been notified about the incident.

Mohamed and Sonia Kamran said someone smashed in the window of their minivan in the driveway and torched it. Firefighters pointed out that someone had painted the message on the wall.

The family called the sheriff's department and filed a report.

Copeland said Sonia Kamran had recently been involved in an argument outside a local store in which someone insulted her for wearing a traditional Muslim outfit that covers her face.

"I'm afraid, with what's going on in the world now, there's somebody out there that just wanted to make a statement," he said.

The Kamrans could not be reached by telephone Thursday. A call left on their answering machine was not returned.

CAIR spokesman Ibrahim Hooper said the Kamrans' experience was part of a growing pattern of anti-Muslim acts in the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0027332

"We attribute it to a rise in Islamo-phobia in our nation," he said.

Yusuf Burke, a CAIR representative in Atlanta, said such incidents are not common in Georgia, but there have been a few. The most notable was the destruction of Islamic Center of Savannah mosque by fire in 2003.

More recently, Burke said, there was minor vandalism at a mosque in Clarkston, and about two weeks ago a window was broken at a mosque in Fayetteville.

Burke said it is necessary to make a point of having such incidents investigated fully by authorities so the perpetrators "don't think they can keep on doing it."

Copeland said his office is determined to try to catch whoever is responsible for the attack.

"I don't care what your opinion is, we're not going to tolerate this kind of action," he said.

Talent, Others, Pushing To Solve Civil Rights-era Murders (AP)

By Errin Haines

AP, April 28, 2006

ATLANTA - A 1946 lynching in northeast Georgia could be among the civil-rights era murders investigated under a plan reintroduced Thursday by four lawmakers, including Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo.

The Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Act could address the lynching near Monroe, Ga., where Roger and Dorothy Malcom and George and Mae Murray Dorsey were killed on the banks of the Apalachee River at the Moore's Ford Bridge, about 40 miles east of Atlanta. The four sharecroppers were dragged from a car, beaten and shot dozens of times as a mob of 200 looked on.

No one was ever charged in their deaths, even though the FBI's report named 55 suspects.

"We are rejecting the reasons of yesterday that left these horrible crimes unpunished," said Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., at a press conference in Washington, D.C. "Our purpose here is not to open up old wounds, but to begin the process of healing."

The bill would create an unsolved crimes section within the civil rights division of the Department of Justice and an unsolved civil rights crime investigative office within the FBI. The sponsors say it would cost $10 million to establish both offices and foster relations between federal and local authorities.

The legislation was first introduced last year by Talent and Christopher Dodd, D.-Conn. Rep. Kenny Hulshof, R-Mo., also joined the effort Thursday.

Talent said the idea for the office came from Alvin Sykes, a Kansas City civil rights advocate. Sykes played a key role in urging prosecutors to reopen the case of Emmett Till, a black boy from Chicago who was murdered after he whistled at a white woman in Mississippi in 1955.

"It's America's obligation to unearth the truth and do justice because there cannot be healing without the truth," Talent said.

The new offices would focus on deaths that occurred before 1970 and remain unsolved by state and local officials.

The Georgia Association of Black Elected Officials, led by state Rep. Tyrone Brooks, D-Atlanta, has been urging local prosecutors to pursue the Moore's Ford lynching for years, and re-enacted the bloody scene last year. On Thursday, Brooks praised Lewis, whose district is centered in Atlanta, and his co-sponsors for their renewed efforts.

"I'm going to urge them to keep Moore's Ford at the top of their agenda," Brooks said, adding that the case represents the last public mass lynching in America.

Although the Georgia Bureau of Investigation and FBI have said the case remains open, Brooks told The Associated Press he believes federal involvement will be the key to arrest, prosecution and closure in the Moore's Ford case and others like it.

"The case involved so many local officials ... they were so closely intertwined it's been almost impossible to get the local officials to move," Brooks said. "This can lead us toward reconciliation and healing."

Congress to consider cold case bill again (Clarion-Ledger)

By Jerry Mitchell

The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, April 28, 2006

A Missouri senator and two congressmen have re-introduced a bill in Congress to set up a cold case unit in the U.S. Department of Justice to investigate unresolved civil rights-era killings.

U.S. Sen. Jim Talent, a Republican, today reintroduced the bill that passed the Senate last year before dying in a conference committee. U.S. Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., and U.S. Rep. Kenny Hulshof, R-Mo., are sponsoring the legislation in the House.

The measure is called the “Till Bill” after Emmett Till, a 14-year-old African American from Chicago killed in the Mississippi Delta on Aug. 28, 1955, for allegedly wolf-whistling at a white woman. The husand of the woman, Roy Bryant, and his half brother, J.W. Milam, were acquitted of the crime by an all-white jury but later confessed in a Look magazine article to kidnapping and killing Till. No one was ever punished for the killing.

DOJ_NMG_0027333

"The blatant failure for decades to bring Emmett Till 's murderers to justice was and is a national disgrace, " U.S. Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., said at a news conference today. "It's America's obligation to unearth the truth and do justice because there cannot be healing without the truth. "

District Attorney Joyce Chiles of Greenville is getting assistance from state and federal prosecutors to see if Till's slaying should be presented again to a grand jury for possible indictments. However, Bryant and Milam are dead.

U.S Attorney General Albert Gonzales is supporting the legislation, and FBI offices around the nation are now collecting information about unpunished killings from their area.

KKK Plans Rally At Antietam Civil War Site (USAT)

By Martha T. Moore

USA Today, April 28, 2006

A Ku Klux Klan group will rally on the Civil War battlefield where a Northern victory led President Abraham Lincoln to issue the Emancipation Proclamation.

The National Park Service has issued a permit for a Klan demonstration June 10 on a farmstead at Antietam National Battlefield in western Maryland. The battle in 1862 remains the bloodiest day in U.S. history.

The National Socialist Movement, a neo-Nazi organization, demonstrated last year at Yorktown Battlefield in Virginia and in 2004 at Valley Forge National Historical Monument in Pennsylvania, both Revolutionary War sites.

Antietam Battlefield superintendent John Howard says the right to free speech meant he was obligated to issue the permit. “The First Amendment is very clear on that,” he said. “The framers of the Constitution decided this for me in 1791. It applies to all, not just people we like.”

Howard said he has received more than 30 e-mails objecting to the demonstration.

A white supremacist rally at Antietam is “an insult” to those who died there from North and South, says the Rev. Malcolm Stranathan, pastor of Salem United Methodist Church in nearby Keedysville, Md. “They were fighting for ideals that are far beyond what the Klan is about.” To counter the Klan rally, Stranathan is organizing a prayer service in a chapel elsewhere on the battlefield and a concert and children's event in a local park.

“Because the Klan thrives on press, whether it's positive or negative, it's better to avoid their event altogether,” he says. “Confrontation just lends itself to you playing in their field.”

The Antietam battle on Sept. 17, 1862, between Confederate forces led by Gen. Robert E. Lee and the Union Army under Gen. George McClellan left more than 23,000 dead or wounded. The battle halted Lee's advance into the North and gave Lincoln the political momentum to issue the Emancipation Proclamation, which freed slaves in Southern states.

Gordon Young, the leader of the local Klan group who applied for the demonstration permit, said Antietam was chosen for convenience but the site is appropriate. “Our forefathers are flipping in their graves, and we need to do something to stand up and fight back. Immigration, homosexuals — they didn't fight and die for that.”

Howard said the group requested a permit for 100 people to demonstrate. Park police will designate separate areas for media and for counterdemonstrators.

A Klan march organized by Young in 2004 in nearby Sharpsburg had nine participants.

Five U.S. residents face criminal copyright charges for their alleged participation in the online "warez" file-trading community, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) announced Thursday.

The charges come out of an ongoing DOJ crackdown against international online piracy groups that distribute copyrighted movies, software, games and music on the Internet. The five defendants are alleged to be leading members of the "warez scene," groups of Internet users who illegally distribute copyrighted materials online.

Warez groups, using servers worldwide, are often the first distributors of copyrighted works online, before the works filter down to peer-to-peer and other public networks, the DOJ said.

Kevin Fuchs, 25, of West Amherst, New York, and Cuong Quoc Trang, 35, of Parker, Colorado, were charged in an indictment with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement, violating the Digital Millennium Copyright Act, and copyright infringement, the DOJ said.

Matthew Alderman, 24, of Ashland, Oregon, was charged with criminal copyright infringement, and David Morvant, 35, of Thibodaux, Louisiana, and Michael Hays, 51, of Delafield, Wisconsin, were charged with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement.

The charges are part of Operations FastLink and Site Down, the two largest international law enforcement efforts targeted at online distribution of copyrighted material, the DOJ said. The operations have resulted in more than 200 search warrants executed in 16 countries, hundreds of computers being confiscated and more than US$100 million worth of copyrighted software, games, movies and music removed from download sites.

Countries participating in the U.S.-led operations included France, Canada, Sweden, Denmark, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, Portugal, Hungary, Israel, Spain, Australia, Singapore, Brazil, Belgium, and Germany.

The charges are being prosecuted by the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of North Carolina. The office charged eight other alleged warez leaders with copyright-related crimes in July.

Operation FastLink has resulted in 28 felony convictions so far. In Operation Site Down, 53 people have been charged and 23 convicted of felony offenses.

Five Additional Defendants Charged in Crackdown Against Internet Warez Groups (LinuxElectrons)

LinuxElectrons, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Five individuals were charged with criminal copyright infringement in Charlotte, North Carolina, as part of an ongoing federal crackdown against international online piracy groups responsible for most of the illegal distribution of copyrighted movies, software, games and music on the Internet, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher of the Criminal Division, U.S. Attorney Gretchen C. F. Shappert of the Western District of North Carolina, and FBI Special Agent-in-Charge Kevin B. Kendrick of the Charlotte Division announced today.

Kevin Fuchs, 25, of West Amherst, New York; and Cuong Quoc Trang, 35, of Parker, Colorado, were charged by indictment with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement, violating the Digital Millennium Copyright Act, and copyright infringement. A criminal information charged Matthew Alderman, 24, of Ashland, Oregon, with criminal copyright infringement, and David Morvant, 35, of Thibodaux, Louisiana, and Michael Hays, 51, of Delafield, Wisconsin, with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement.

Operations FastLink and Site Down—the two largest and most aggressive international enforcement actions against criminal organizations involved in the illegal online distribution of copyrighted material—resulted in a total of more than 200 search warrants executed in 16 countries; the confiscation of hundreds of computers and illegal online distribution hubs; and the removal of more than 100 million dollars worth of illegally-copied copyrighted software, games, movies, and music from illicit distribution channels. Countries participating in these U.S.-led operations included: France, Canada, Sweden, Denmark, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, Portugal, Hungary, Israel, Spain, Australia, Singapore, Brazil, Belgium, and Germany.

“Large-scale operations like FastLink and SiteDown strike at the core of online piracy,” said Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher of the Criminal Division. “Losses to industry and individuals from online piracy are enormous, and law enforcement will continue to do everything it can to protect valuable copyrighted products and shut down these illegal distribution networks." Both Operations FastLink and Site Down were the culmination of multiple FBI undercover investigations, but only one of those investigations participated in both operations: the Charlotte undercover investigation responsible for today's charges. These charges are the latest in a series of actions taken by the Department of Justice to crack down on illegal online piracy. Operation FastLink has yielded 28 felony convictions to date while in Operation Site Down, 53 individuals have been charged and 23 individuals convicted of felony offenses.

"Intellectual property theft is a growing crime with serious economic consequences," said U.S. Attorney Shappert. "Operations FastLink and SiteDown combine the resources of the Justice Department, 42 separate U.S. Attorney Offices, and FBI agents from 30 separate field offices, in a concerted effort to attack organizations dedicated to the piracy of intellectual property."

The five defendants charged today are alleged to have been leading members in the illegal software, game, movie, and music trade online, commonly referred to as the "warez scene." They are charged with playing key roles in these organized warez groups that act as "first-providers" of copyrighted works to the Internet—the so-called "release" groups that are the original sources for a majority of the pirated works distributed and downloaded via the Internet. Once a warez release group prepares a stolen work for distribution, the material is distributed in minutes to secure, top-level warez servers throughout the world. From there, within a matter of hours, the pirated works are distributed globally, filtering down to peer-to-peer and other public file sharing networks accessible to anyone with Internet access. These warez groups supply the for-profit criminal distribution networks that cost the copyright industry billions of dollars each year.

"Theft of intellectual property strikes at the very heart of this country's economic vitality," said FBI Special Agent-in-Charge Kendrick. "Crimes of this type are a priority within our Cyber Crimes Program and the public can be rest assured that we will continue to aggressively investigate those individuals and organizations involved in activity such as this in an effort to bring them to justice."

These cases are being prosecuted by Senior Litigation Counsel Eric Klumb, Senior Counsel Corbin Weiss of the Department's Computer Crime and Intellectual Property Section, and Assistant U.S. Attorney Corey Ellis of the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Western District of North Carolina.

Hi-Tech Five arrested on copyright infringement (UPI)

UPI, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 27 (UPI) -- Five people were arrested for copyright infringement as the federal crackdown against online piracy groups continues.

The following individuals were charged with criminal copyright infringement in Charlotte, N.C., the Department of Justice said: Kevin Fuchs, 25, of West Amherst, N.Y.; and Cuong Quoc Trang, 35, of Parker, Colo., were charged by indictment with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement, violating the Digital Millennium Copyright Act, and copyright infringement. Authorities charged Matthew Alderman, 24, of Ashland, Ore., with criminal copyright infringement, and David Morvant, 35, of Thibodaux, La., and Michael Hays, 51, of Delafield, Wis., with conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement.

"Large-scale operations like FastLink and SiteDown strike at the core of online piracy," said Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher of the Criminal Division. "Losses to industry and individuals from online piracy are enormous, and law enforcement will continue to do everything it can to protect valuable copyrighted products and shut down these illegal distribution networks."

Union objects to sale of 4 Knight Ridder papers (SBJ)

The Sacramento Business Journal, April 28, 2006

The Newspaper Guild-Communications Workers of America Thursday called on state and federal regulators to scrutinize the $1 billion sale of the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times, Monterey Herald and St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press.

Sacramento-based McClatchy Co. (NYSE:MNI) said on Wednesday it plans to sell the papers to Denver-based MediaNews Group Inc. and New York-based Hearst Co. in a complex deal that is expected to be completed this summer.

» Get the latest business news on the go! Brought to you by Cingular

The union has been working with The Yucaipa Cos. of Los Angeles to try to buy the 12 papers that McClatchy said it intends to sell when it completes its purchase of San Jose-based Knight Ridder Inc.

"We believe that a common interest exists among McClatchy shareholders, employees and the communities served by the 12 Knight Ridder newspapers being sold by McClatchy Co.," union president Linda Foley said in a statement.

"TNG-CWA continues to believe that the bid by The Yucaipa Cos. for all 12 newspapers is likely to deliver the best value and we call on McClatchy Co. to provide evidence that shareholder, employee and community interests are being best served by yesterday's announcement," Foley said.

McClatchy, which saw its stock drop 51 cents per share Thursday to $44.20, said the sale announced Wednesday has a valuation of 11.5 times earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation, and amortization, and a premium to the 9.5 times that McClatchy agreed to pay for the whole of Knight Ridder.

The union didn't say what kind of multiple its deal represents.

The union regulators need to assess the antitrust implications of the deal to sell MediaNews three newspapers in California, where MediaNews already owns other newspapers.

"The newspaper industry is already dominated by a small circle of ownership groups. Yesterday's news drew that circle even smaller," Foley said.

MediaNews CEO Expects No Major Changes At St. Paul Newspaper (KRT)

By John Welbes

Knight Ridder, April 28, 2006

ST. PAUL, Minn. - The fate of the St. Paul Pioneer Press became a little clearer Thursday as William Dean Singleton said that the paper won't see major changes after his company becomes its owner sometime this summer.

"You're joining us because we want you," Singleton, the CEO of MediaNews Group Inc., told employees packed into a stifling conference room. "We think there's a lot of opportunity here and if we didn't want it, we wouldn't have bought it."

His arrival at the Pioneer Press followed the announcement Wednesday of a four-paper acquisition by MediaNews, which is based in Denver. Singleton's company, teaming with Hearst Corp., is buying the St. Paul paper and three California papers in a complicated, $1 billion deal.

The deal, expected to close this summer, won't cause the loss of jobs, wages or benefits at the Pioneer Press, Singleton said. He added that the status of the newspaper's labor contracts, which cover about 90 percent of its 960 workers, will be up to local management. Publisher Par Ridder will remain with the newspaper.

"We've been in competitive markets and we thought it'd be fun" to enter another one in the Twin Cities, he said. MediaNews owns 49 daily newspapers, the largest being the Denver Post and the Detroit News.

Sporting a navy pinstripe suit and a Texas drawl, Singleton said he intends to continue competing with the Minneapolis-based Star Tribune. That will involve going after growing areas on the fringe of the Twin Cities and trying to take away market share.

He said he's "totally on board" with the newspaper's current strategy, which involves pursuing local news and local advertisers - both large and small - to keep the paper growing.

"You'll be happy after the closing," Singleton said. "You will barely know it happens."

Singleton said given the challenging newspaper industry environment, he couldn't promise there would never be layoffs at the paper. But he added if there are, they'll be in response to local market conditions.

Singleton generated laugher and applause when he explained why he won't pursue a joint operating agreement with the Star Tribune.

Such a deal allows newspapers to combine business operations while maintaining separate newsrooms_a cost-saving move. But he said regulators only permit that in a market where one of the papers is failing. The Pioneer Press isn't failing, he said, and "the Star Tribune isn't failing - yet."

Afterwards, several employees said they found the meeting reassuring.

"I think it kind of eased my mind," said Aric Sorenson, an advertising account executive. He said he is glad that he can now answer advertisers' questions about the paper's future.

Because Ridder is remaining as the paper's publisher, it's also expected that his team of top managers will remain.

The newspaper industry as a whole is working through tough times, as more advertisers are taking their ads to specialized online site and fewer young people are subscribing.

Singleton said he and the top people at his papers are trying to craft the best strategy for growth on the Internet side of the business.

"Long term we've got to get paid for news (online) or we can't keep producing it," he said. But he said that has to be an industry-wide solution and not just one paper acting alone.

Larger issues still surround McClatchy's deal to buy Knight Ridder, the Pioneer Press' parent company. McClatchy, which owns the Star Tribune, is selling off 12 of Knight Ridder's 32 newspapers - including St. Paul - to help finance the deal. McClatchy said antitrust issues in the Twin Cities prompted its sale of the Pioneer Press. MediaNews' $1 billion deal also includes the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times and Monterey County Herald, all in California.

On Thursday, a union that represents hundreds of Knight Ridder Newspapers employees said that the four-newspaper deal announced Wednesday "warrants closer scrutiny by regulators, shareholders and communities" served by the papers.

Linda Foley, president of The Newspaper Guild-Communications Workers of America said small circle of companies that dominates the newspaper industry just got smaller, and antitrust concerns need to be examined.

Some of those reviews are already underway. The U.S. Department of Justice recently told McClatchy that it's seeking additional information about the Twin Cities newspaper market.

That second review for the Twin Cities area may slow things down, as the Department of Justice can take more time to complete its work, said Stephen Barnett, an antitrust expert and law professor at the University of California at Berkeley.

The pending sale of the Pioneer Press to MediaNews, though, could speed it back up, he said. Once McClatchy sells the paper to someone not currently competing in the Twin Cities market, he said antitrust pressures are relieved.

"It's a capitalistic economy and McClatchy can decide to sell to anyone it wants to, other than a competitor (in the Twin Cities market)," Barnett said.

Judge refuses to halt court proceedings in Seattle dailies' JOA fight (SEAPI)

By DAN RICHMAN

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, April 28, 2006

The judge in the 3-year-old contract dispute between Seattle's two daily newspapers refused today to halt all court proceedings in that case, ruling that antitrust and breach of contract claims by a self-styled citizens group can proceed against the owner of the Seattle P-I and The Seattle Times Co.

The ruling, from King County Superior Court Judge Greg Canova, also raises the possibility that The Times Co. may withdraw from a binding arbitration agreement -- an event that would start two 18-month clocks ticking toward the automatic end of the Joint Operating Agreement that has bound the two newspapers since 1983.

Hearst Corp., the P-I's owner, says the P-I can't survive outside the JOA. The Times Co. says the JOA is ruining it financially.

The publishers sought to stop the court proceedings so they could move their fight into binding arbitration, which would deliver a non-appealable decision by May 31, 2007, on whether The Times Co. can exit the JOA.

The Committee for a Two-Newspaper Town argued -- and the judge today agreed -- that the publishers are entitled to put a hold only on the claims between them, not on the committee's separate assertion that the JOA violates federal antitrust laws and that The Times Co.'s conduct within the JOA has constituted a breach of contract.

The Times Co. has said it might withdraw from the arbitration agreement if all claims in the case were not stayed. Times Co. spokeswoman Jill Mackie said Publisher Frank Blethen, President and Chief Operating Officer Carolyn Kelly, and the company's attorneys would confer later today on how to proceed.

Dmitri Iglitzin, an attorney for the committee, said, "The committee is very pleased." He said no meeting of the committee has been scheduled to decide whether to proceed with its claims.

Microsoft Attacks Brussels In Court (FT)

By Tobias Buck

Financial Times, April 28, 2006

Microsoft yesterday accused the European Commission of "the biggest encroachment on intellectual property in European competition law history", and likened the regulator's antitrust ruling to "opening the vaults of a bank" and handing out money to passers-by.

The software group's withering attack formed part of a legal challenge in the European Court of First Instance in Luxembourg to the Commission's March 2004decision that found Microsoft guilty of abusing its dominantposition and imposed a record €497m ($616m) fine.

Ian Forrester QC, a partner at White and Case, which is acting for Microsoft, insisted the Commission had been wrong to punish Microsoft for refusing to supply information about the Windows operating system to rival companies.

Brussels argues the information was necessary to allow other companies to develop server software that is "interoperable", or runs smoothly, with Windows-driven servers and computers.

Mr Forrester argued that the Commission's order to make available 12,500 pages of interoperability information infringed several Microsoft patents without proper justification.

He said Brussels had failed to show that the interoperability information demanded by the regulator was "indispensable" for other companies to enter the market.

The Commission's case, Mr Forrester added, was "like a jellyfish - shapeless, and very painful".

DOJ_NMG_0027338

But the Commission's legal team disputed Microsoft's arguments vehemently, saying the group had "rigged the rules" of the marketto ensure its rivals were unable to compete. The regulator dismissed, in particular, Microsoft's claim that the ruling infringed its intellectual property, saying the group had only been able to cite four European patents in its defence.

The Commission claimed that, crucially, Microsoft had never at the time defended its refusal to supply rivals with interoperability information by referring to intellectual property rights.

The group was therefore not in a position to cite IP rights as a justification for its abuse, according to Anthony Whelan, representing the Commission before court.

The two sides also sparred over whether Microsoft's behaviour had actually threatened to eliminate competition.

Mr Whelan insisted that Microsoft had already attained a market share of at least 60 per cent and that the threat of elimination was real: "There is a reshuffling of the fringe [of the market] but the fringe remains just that."

The 13 judges will today have the chance to put questions to the two parties. The hearing is due to end on Friday.

EU judges to mull record Microsoft fine (AP)

By AOIFE WHITE

AP, April 28, 2006

Microsoft will try Friday to convince a panel of judges that a record antitrust fine levied against it two years ago should be thrown out or reduced in the last session of a five-day hearing.

The European Union ruled in March 2004 that the world's largest software company had to pay a record euro497 million (US$613 million) fine after a five-year investigation concluded it had taken advantage of its position as the leading supplier of operating systems.

Microsoft has appealed the fine, and the ruling, since Monday, attacking the European Commission's order to share information with rival software makers and produce a version of its Windows operating system without Media Player software. Microsoft claims the European regulator has made "serious errors" and is compromising its innovative designs.

In the first two days of the hearing, which is scheduled to end Friday, the 13-judge panel of the Court of First Instance centered on the company's bundled Media Player. On Wednesday and Thursday, hearings focused on a challenge to the order Microsoft give information to rivals to make its server software work more smoothly with the ubiquitous Windows program.

Judge John D. Cooke, in a terse exchange with Commission lawyer Anthony Whelan, asked whether Microsoft's proprietary information should be given away to its rivals, including patent information.

"The information which forms interoperability is hugely valuable commercial information. In the commercial sense this is highly valuable information, that's why it's difficult to understand the attitude of the Commission that these are mere trade secrets," the judge said -- a reflection of Microsoft's assertion that to give over the code would be forfeiting the hundreds of years in manpower that went into devising it.

Cooke, who will write the draft ruling, wanted to know if "competition rules require that be taken away from Microsoft, conveying a huge commercial advantage."

Whelan said the value Microsoft placed on the code was merely a reflection of the amount of time and effort it had put into creating it, nothing more.

The Commission has never asked Microsoft to open up its source code -- the recipe for Windows -- but Microsoft offered earlier this year to grant some access to rivals under certain conditions if it would appease both EU and U.S. regulators.

James Flynn, a lawyer for the European Committee for Interoperable Systems, an industry group that includes Sun Microsystems Inc., IBM Corp. and Oracle Corp., said that Microsoft's "information is not kept secret because it is valuable. It is valuable because it is kept secret."

Microsoft lawyer Ian Forrester rejected any suggestion that the company had deliberately exaggerated the importance of certain algorithms it would have to disclose.

Microsoft and EU officials were still discussing just what needed to be handed over, he said, explaining that Microsoft believed that to meet the terms of the Commission order and hand over "complete and accurate" information, it would have to give access to key parts of its code.

While a court decision on the ruling is not due for months, a decision backing the commission could force Microsoft to change the way it does business in the future and endorse the EU's ability to hold back aggressive corporate behavior.

An appeal is not certain since Microsoft would need strong legal arguments to protest the ruling to the EU's highest court, the European Court of Justice.

Judges Stress Intellectual Property In Microsoft Appeal (NYT)

By Paul Meller

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

LUXEMBOURG, April 27 — Lawyers for the European Commission and Microsoft faced tough questioning on Thursday about the 2004 antitrust ruling against the company.

During cross-examination by 13 judges of the European Court of First Instance who are hearing Microsoft's appeal of the ruling, the sharpest questions were reserved for the commission. Judge John Cooke, who will write the decision in the case, appeared to chastise commission lawyers for not taking the company's concerns about protecting its intellectual property seriously.

Under the 2004 ruling, Microsoft was ordered to disclose technical details to rival makers of software for computer servers to allow them to develop programs that work as smoothly with the Windows operating system as Microsoft's own software does. The company contends this order breaches its intellectual property rights, while the commission argues that Microsoft is seeking to preserve trade secrets that fall short of legal protection.

On Wednesday, Anthony Whelan, the commission's top lawyer handling the software development part of the case, argued that patent and copyright claims must be scrutinized by independent bodies before they were granted protection, whereas trade secrets did not. Yet the bulk of Microsoft's intellectual property argument revolves around the trade secrets in Windows that the commission wants the company to reveal.

"Trade secrets are not entitled to the degree of protection that Microsoft claims," Mr. Whelan asserted.

Judge Cooke turned to the issue on Thursday. "These are not just trivial trade secrets," he said. "This is hugely valuable information developed by a major corporation taking hundreds of man-hours to develop." He added that he found it hard to follow the commission's logic in defense of its 2004 ruling.

Microsoft was delighted by the amount of attention the judges gave to the intellectual property aspect of its appeal.

"The idea that this is not an I.P. case was scotched," a Microsoft spokesman, Tom Brookes, said. "Judging by the judges' questions, they recognized that I.P. is core here."

But Microsoft's top lawyer arguing the interoperability part of the appeal, Ian Forrester, did not escape Judge Cooke's scrutiny. At one point, he seemed to accuse Microsoft of exaggerating the scope of the commission's order to make it seem unreasonable.

"Is that Microsoft's stance?" Judge Cooke asked. Mr. Forrester, who has been highly articulate in the hearing, was rendered speechless for some seconds before denying that Microsoft had been exaggerating.

The judges' cross-examinations do not necessarily reveal their thinking, representatives from both sides said.

"The judge was just being provocative," said Thomas Vinje, a lawyer representing the European Committee for Interoperable Systems, a trade group and one of the commission's main allies in the case.

Microsoft's general counsel for Europe agreed. "It's not possible to predict from the questions what the outcome will be," the lawyer, Horacio E. Gutiérrez, said, adding that Judge Cooke in particular had shown "a tremendous grasp of the economic, technical and legal arguments."

The fact that the judges homed in on the commission's legal team could mean that they agree with them and are just making sure that a decision to uphold the 2004 ruling is watertight, many lawyers attending the hearing said.

A decision in the case is not expected for months.

Concrete exec admits price-fixing (INDYSTAR)

By J.K. Wall

The Indianapolis Star, April 28, 2006

Carmel Concrete Products and its president, Scott D. Hughey, have agreed to plead guilty and pay criminal fines for fixing the price of ready-mixed concrete in the Indianapolis area, the Department of Justice announced today

Carmel Concrete is the fifth Indianapolis-area concrete firm to either admit guilt or be charged in the ongoing federal probe. Two other companies, Irving Materials Inc. and Builder's Concrete & Supply Co. Inc., agreed to plead guilty. One company, Beaver Materials Corp., has been indicted. And a fifth firm, Shelby Materials, won amnesty from penalties by admitting guilt.

In all, those firms have agreed to pay more than $30 million in fines. Nine concrete executives have agreed to fines or jail time.

U.S. District Court Judge Larry J. McKinney will determine the size of a fine for Carmel Concrete, the operating name of Hughey Inc., and the length of any jail term for Scott Hughey. As an individual, Hughey will pay a fine between $30,000 and $50,000.

DOJ_NMG_0027340

"Price-fixing conspiracies, such as the one that dominated the Indianapolis ready mixed concrete market for nearly four years, harm our free market system," said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Department's Antitrust Division. "This type of conduct deprives consumers of their right to competitive pricing."

A Tiny Supplier Sues France's Chanel, But Does The Suit Fit? (WSJ)

By Christina Passariello

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

Carmen Colle has crocheted bustiers for Chanel and spun sweaters for Yves Saint Laurent. As a "petit main," or little hand, of French fashion, she even wove a metal bra for Christian Lacroix.

But now Ms. Colle, a former steelworker, is venturing where few little hands have dared: the courtroom. In a €5.3 million ($6.6 million) lawsuit that may unravel her business, Ms. Colle claims Chanel, which she has supplied for years, copied one of her designs -- a crocheted floral pattern -- on a line of $1,800 to $3,000 cardigans, skirts and dresses.

The iconic French fashion house says the allegations are unfounded. But a judge in a Paris commercial court has allowed Ms. Colle to pursue her case, which deals with a recurring issue for fashion firms today: counterfeiting. This time the glitzy world of high-fashion faces a challenge from the unglamorous realm of suppliers.

On one side is Chanel SA, the aristocratic Parisian label known for its $5,000 skirt suits and six-figure gowns long favored by women from Jackie Kennedy to Nicole Kidman. On the other is Ms. Colle, a stocky mother of five who founded a knitwear business called World Tricot in the eastern French town of Lure.

Luxury-goods firms complain endlessly about being ripped off by counterfeiters. Each year, they spend millions of dollars going after copycats. But a thinly draped secret in the fashion industry is that the big guys also sometimes purloin ideas.

Fashion houses often outsource specialized products, such as hand-knitted or embroidered garments, to small suppliers. These contractors -- who offer their own original ideas, or take direction from clients -- submit samples in hopes of getting an order. They rarely copyright their designs, but French counterfeit laws offer some protection even if they fail to register their samples. Suppliers say that there is always the risk of their work being rejected and later ripped off.

"It's very ambiguous," says Sébastien Barilleau, a Paris-based "petit main" who supplies embroidery for fashion houses including Chanel and Givenchy. "You go to a fashion show and see a design that looks like something similar to what you sent to the client. But that's just the way it works."

Chanel, which declined to comment on specifics of the case, said that the idea for the design in question was generated in-house. "In the present case, Chanel had World Tricot as well as other suppliers make knit samples ..." the company said in a previously released statement. "The [design] theme had already been evoked in previous collections with great success and produced by other suppliers."

The fashion house told a judge that the white-crocheted design in dispute was made by another of its 268 suppliers, Mely's Maglieria Srl of Italy, according to a person present at a January hearing. Mely's declined to comment.

Ms. Colle has a different account. In the spring of 2004, she says, her daughter Sylviane, who had joined World Tricot, knitted a postcard-sized patch of white cotton in a pattern of vertical flower rows.

It looked "very Chanel," thought Ms. Colle, who submitted it to the company's design team. Within days, Chanel sent Ms. Colle a sketch of a vest and asked World Tricot for a prototype based on the white-flowered pattern. Both parties agree that the company sent one in, and that Chanel never placed an order.

Six months later, Ms. Colle says she was walking by a Chanel boutique in Tokyo and saw what she claims is her company's design, entwined with black silk ribbon, crocheted on a cotton cardigan, dress and coat. "I never go into the boutiques, so I couldn't believe it," she says. Upon her return, Ms. Colle took Chanel straight to court. Her lawsuit seeks €3.3 million in damages for alleged counterfeiting and €2 million for breach of contract.

At the January hearing, the judge asked Chanel and Ms. Colle to enter into mediation. The two sides didn't come to an agreement, however, so the case went back to court last month. The judge is expected to issue a verdict on May 12.

Since the suit was filed last July, Ms. Colle's business has faltered. Chanel placed a final order last August, and doesn't plan to send any more business Ms. Colle's way, a company spokeswoman confirms. Orders from other houses have dried up as well.

Suing the fashion giant "was a very difficult decision," says Ms. Colle, tearing up behind her gold-rimmed glasses. "But if I don't fight, I'm just an accomplice."

The daughter of Italian émigrés to Lure, Ms. Colle dropped out of school when she was 14. She got a job in a steel mill to supplement her father's income as a woodcutter.

In her early thirties, Ms. Colle decided to become a social worker. Frustrated that she couldn't find jobs for the area's poor, she founded World Tricot SA in 1987 out of an apartment in Lure, employing refugee women from countries such as Cambodia and Algeria. Since she didn't have money for furniture, her first five employees took turns sitting in one chair, hand-knitting sweaters, scarves and other wool products.

Ms. Colle studied fashion magazines like Elle and Vogue for clues to different designer styles. She read trade magazines to learn the names of fashion executives.

Her first foray into the business, in 1989, was a flop. She set up a meeting with Jacqueline Jacobson, founder of Dorothée Bis -- a brand known for its ribbed sweaters which has since been acquired by BCBG Max Azria -- to present a sample of her wares. But no orders resulted.

Ms. Colle didn't give up. After she sent the next samples, wrapped in cream-colored tissue paper, Ms. Colle says Ms. Jacobson placed an order. It was the beginning of Ms. Colle's new career as one of French fashion's "petits mains," a term first used to describe the seamstresses who hand-stitched custom-made, haute couture gowns. In 1990, Ms. Colle signed on two important clients: French fashion house Christian Lacroix and Popy Moreni, an Italian designer based in Paris.

Word soon spread about World Tricot's craftsmanship. The company signed on more clients, and Ms. Colle hired more workers. In 1999, she landed the most prestigious couture name of all: Chanel.

For five years, Ms. Colle took a five-hour train ride into Paris as often as once a week to visit Chanel's elegant offices on the chic Rue Cambon. Every few months, she presented new samples. If Chanel liked one, the fashion house would ask World Tricot to make a prototype -- a skirt or a sweater with the proposed pattern. Karl Lagerfeld, the house's eccentric designer, was the final arbiter. If he approved the prototype, Chanel would place an order.

By the end of the 2004-2005 financial year, Ms. Colle says World Tricot had €1.9 million in sales, with knitwear for Chanel accounting for 89% of the total.

Now, with orders falling sharply, she has laid off 20% of her 25-person work force. To make up income, she recently launched her own knitwear brand, called Angèle Batist, which she shows to clients during private viewings at hotels in Paris, New York and Tokyo. Last month, Sen. Hillary Clinton ordered a black knit skirt for €500, Ms. Colle says. A spokeswoman for the senator didn't return calls for comment.

10 States Sue E.P.A. On Emissions (NYT)

By Danny Hakim

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

ALBANY, April 27 — In the latest legal broadside against the Bush administration's policy on global warming, New York, California and eight other states sued the Environmental Protection Agency on Thursday for refusing to regulate carbon dioxide emissions from power plants.

Attorney General Eliot Spitzer of New York, the lead plaintiff, said the agency's refusal "continues a sad course of conduct on the part of the Bush administration and reflects a disregard for science, statute and wise policy."

A similar suit involving many of the same states and led by Massachusetts was dismissed last year by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, where the new lawsuit was filed. Another suit by several of the same states sought to compel power producers to reduce emissions and was dismissed last year in Federal District Court in Manhattan. Both cases are being appealed.

"This is more of the same — yet another attempt by some states and environmental groups to change U.S. climate policy through litigation," Dan Riedinger, a spokesman at the Edison Electric Institute, a trade group of power companies, said in a statement.

Such suits, Mr. Riedinger said, seek "to circumvent the ongoing policy debate in Congress, which alone has the authority to make or change federal environmental laws."

James R. Milkey, chief of the environmental protection division of the Massachusetts attorney general's office, said the new case was more narrowly focused on what has become a central policy question about global warming: whether the E.P.A. has the authority to regulate carbon dioxide, the principal contributor to global warming, as a pollutant.

"We feel we have an extraordinarily strong argument on that point," Mr. Milkey said.

New York City, the District of Columbia and three environmental groups also joined in the suit, along with Connecticut, Massachusetts, Maine, New Mexico, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Wisconsin.

The suit seeks to force the environmental agency to start regulating emissions of heat-trapping gases, like carbon dioxide, from power plants and to tighten regulations of conventional smog-forming pollutants. The basis for the argument is that the agency has not lived up to requirements in the Clean Air Act to ensure public health.

With 135 new coal-powered plants on the drawing board nationwide, environmental groups see tougher emission controls as an urgent need before the building of plants that can last for half a century or more. The proposed plants would "blow a hole in the world's effort to curb global warming," said Daniel Becker, director of the global warming program at the Sierra Club, a party to the suit. "A little over a third of U.S. global warming pollutants come from power plants, and the bulk of it from coal-fired power plants."

The Bush administration has argued that voluntary measures are the best way to proceed on global warming, rather than requirements on industry to reduce emissions.

"E.P.A. will review all options and make an informed decision on how to proceed," said Jennifer Wood, a spokeswoman for the agency. "E.P.A.'s climate protection programs continue to exceed the agency's greenhouse gas emissions goals and are on target to meet the president's 18 percent goal to reduce greenhouse gas intensity by 2012."

The administration's decision not to classify carbon dioxide as a pollutant has complicated the desire of several states to regulate emissions from cars.

California is in the midst of a legal battle with automakers over the state's new law putting strict curbs on emissions from the tailpipes of cars and trucks. New York and other states are planning to mimic California's standards and have also been sued by the auto industry. The industry has been supported by the Bush administration.

Environmentalists and lawyers for the states argue that the Clean Air Act compels the federal government to regulate carbon dioxide.

"Does the Clean Air Act care about climate?" asked David Doniger, a lawyer at the Natural Resources Defense Council. "Yeah, it says so."

The E.P.A. does not dispute global warming as a concept. Its Web site says that climate change is expected to raise sea levels and alter precipitation trends.

"Changing regional climate could alter forests, crop yields and water supplies," the agency says. "It could also affect human health, animals and many types of ecosystems."

Md. Sues Exxon Over Gas Leak (BSUN)

By Timothy B. Wheeler

The Baltimore Sun, April 28, 2006

In the biggest environmental enforcement action in recent years in Maryland, the state filed suit Thursday seeking nearly $12 million in penalties from Exxon Mobil Corp. and a local service station operator for a massive gasoline leak that officials say has fouled well water in the Jacksonville area of Baltimore County.

"We are holding those responsible accountable," Kendl P. Philbrick, secretary of the Maryland Department of the Environment, said at a news conference at the agency's Baltimore headquarters. He called the leak, one of the largest ever in the state, "catastrophic," and said an investigation continues into whether criminal charges might be filed as well.

The 15-count civil suit, filed in Baltimore County Circuit Court, accuses the giant oil corporation and Storto Enterprises Inc., operator of the Jacksonville Exxon station, of violating state environmental laws and regulations by allowing gasoline to leak from an underground fuel line and not detecting or reporting it promptly.

The suit charges that more than 25,000 gallons of unleaded regular gas dribbled from a small hole accidentally drilled in a buried fuel line by a contractor performing maintenance at the station in mid-January. The leak was not reported to state environmental officials until Feb. 17, more than a month later, although, the lawsuit says, the station's operator noted losses of almost 700 gallons of gasoline daily during that time.

The lawsuit charges that Exxon Mobil and its operator failed to install or maintain a properly functioning leak detection system that might have confirmed the gasoline release before it became so large.

DOJ_NMG_0027343

Cleaning up

In addition to penalties, the state's lawsuit asks a court to require Exxon and its operator to complete the cleanup of the gasoline that leaked -- a process that, Philbrick acknowledged Thursday, could take years.

Exxon Mobil spokeswoman Betsy Eaton declined to respond to the specifics of the lawsuit, saying, "Our primary focus continues to be on the recovery and remediation of the gasoline leaked at Jacksonville." A telephone call to the Fallston address listed for Storto Enterprises was not returned.

G. Macy Nelson, a plaintiffs' environmental lawyer based in Towson who is not involved in the case, applauded the state's lawsuit. He said he couldn't think of a similar enforcement action being taken against a company.

"Historically, in my experience, MDE has gone after polluters but has done so with a very light hand," he said. "This sounds aggressive. Maryland has a lot of strong environmental statutes that provide effective tools, if they'll only use them."

He said the state's case is particularly strong because it is seeking penalties and needs only to show that the company has violated environmental laws, but does not, for example, have to prove damages to property.

Though only six residential and commercial wells in the Jacksonville area have been contaminated enough by gasoline or its components to exceed guidelines for safe drinking water, state officials say 62 residential wells show traces of methyl tertiary butyl ether, or MTBE, a gasoline additive that spreads readily through ground water. Though not believed harmful at the low levels seen in almost all the wells, MTBE has caused cancer in laboratory animals.

More than 200 residential wells have been tested, and the six seriously tainted wells have been equipped with carbon filtration systems to remove the contaminants.

More than 10,600 gallons of gasoline have been recovered since the leak was reported Feb. 16, state officials say, and perhaps another 3,000 gallons' worth of fuel vapors have been suctioned out of the ground -- substantially less than the oil company had been claiming.

Philbrick said recovery efforts had been aided by Exxon's quick response once the leak was reported, by dry weather and by the area's geology, which confined the leak to a narrow band underground. The company's aggressive cleanup, however, does not absolve it, he said.

Official's vow

The legal action comes less than two months after Philbrick vowed at a news conference in Jacksonville to take strong enforcement action against Exxon Mobil. He also ordered other service stations in the state to check their leak detection systems and vowed to tighten underground fuel storage regulations to prevent anymore such leaks.

How much, if anything, Exxon Mobil and Storto will have to pay in penalties will depend on whether a judge or jury finds that the companies violated state laws and regulations. The amount of penalties imposed could be set by the court, or it could be negotiated downward in an out-of-court settlement.

But the law allows penalties of up to $25,000 a day for each violation, and an additional penalty of $100 per gallon for illegal releases of more than 25,000 gallons. State officials said they were seeking the maximum penalties because of the size and severity of the leak.

Though courts rarely grant maximum penalties in such cases, if they are awarded in this lawsuit, they would equal all the administrative and civil penalties the state environmental agency has collected in more than 12,000 cases brought since 1997, according to figures supplied by a spokesman for Attorney General J. Joseph Curran.

Six years ago, the state collected nearly $2 million in a settlement from Potomac Electric Power Co. and its contractor after a pipeline ruptured, spilling 125,000 gallons of oil into a marsh along the Patuxent River. That incident in 2000 was the largest oil spill ever in the state.

Exxon Mobil also faces a class-action lawsuit, filed on behalf of Jacksonville area residents, which seeks $535 million in punitive damages and an order requiring the company to pay for cleaning up the contamination, filtering residents' well water or supplying them with an alternate source.

Del. A. Wade Kach, a Baltimore County Republican who represents the Jacksonville area, welcomed the state action. "I can't believe anyone can lose 25,000 gallons of inventory and not notice," Kach said. "I don't understand it at all."

Sonar Called Likely Stranding Cause (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

Federal marine specialists have concluded that Navy sonar was the most likely cause of the unusual stranding of melon-headed whales in a Hawaiian bay in 2004.

The appearance of as many as 200 of the normally deep-diving whales in Hanalei Bay in Kauai occurred while a major American-Japanese sonar training exercise was taking place at the nearby Pacific Missile Range Facility.

The report is the latest in a series of scientific reviews linking traditional mid-frequency naval sonar to whale strandings. Sonar has been used for decades, but it was only recently that the apparent connection to strandings was established.

While the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration scientists said they could not definitely state that sonar caused the strandings, they said extensive study led them to the conclusion that there was no other likely cause.

"Our analyses indicate there was no significant weather, natural oceanographic event or known biological factors that would explain the animals' movement into the bay nor the group's continued presence in the bay," said Teri Rowles, NOAA Fisheries Service's lead marine mammal veterinarian and lead author of the report.

NOAA concluded that sonar was "a plausible, if not likely, contributing factor" to the stranding.

The Navy has said it was virtually impossible for its sonar to have led to the Hanalei Bay stranding, and officials maintained that position yesterday. "I think that if you look at the report, there are just so many unknown factors at work that to say sonar was a plausible if not likely cause is erroneous," said Lt. Commander Christy Hagen of the U.S. Pacific Fleet in Hawaii.

The Navy is planning another major sonar testing maneuver in the same area in July and -- for the first time -- NOAA has formally asked the Navy to use expanded measures to protect whales from the possible effects of its sonar.

The active sonar used by navies sends out loud pings of sound that seem to frighten and disorient whales, especially deep-diving species such as the beaked and melon-headed whales. The effect was documented off Greece in 1996 and established later during naval exercises in the Bahamas, off the Canary Islands and off Spain.

The findings have complicated the Navy's efforts to set up a 500-square-nautical-mile sonar training facility off the coast of North Carolina. Naval officials say the sonar training is essential, especially now that possibly hostile foreign navies have developed diesel submarines that are not detected by the kind of passive sonar used to follow large nuclear submarines.

Rowles said that the melon-headed stranding in Hawaii was highly unusual, and only the second recorded in the United States in modern times. The other occurred off Florida earlier this year, and Rowles said NOAA is trying to determine if any naval activity occurred in the area.

In the 2000 Bahamas stranding, a local marine biologist collected some of the whales that died onshore and froze them for later study -- which helped NOAA conclude that sonar was the likely cause. In Hanalei Bay, the whales were ultimately led back to sea and one young animal died, apparently of starvation. So there was no physical evidence of injury to examine.

Yesterday's NOAA conclusion was based instead on the lack of other possible causes, the unusual nature of the whale movement, and an analysis that concluded the extensive sonar use occurred close enough to Hanalei Bay for the whales to swim there by early July 3.

A number of environmental groups have become increasingly concerned about the effects of sonar, and the Natural Resources Defense Council has sued the Navy a number of times on the issue. Michael Jasny, a senior consultant with NRDC, said the NOAA report was worrisome.

"This was by far the largest stranding of melon-headed whales ever recorded in Hawaii," he said. "Once again, the Navy's denial has been contradicted by the official government investigation. It's time for the Navy to stop this needless infliction of harm."

DEA/ATF/USMS:

More than 9,000 fugitives caught in a week (AP)

By MARK SHERMAN

AP, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Ten years to the day after allegedly raping a 14-year-old girl, a California man was arrested in a roundup of fugitives that law enforcement officials say snared more than 1,100 sex offenders.

The concentrated search for people wanted for federal, state and local crimes "targeted the worst of the worst," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday at a news conference announcing the results of "Operation Falcon II."

Authorities arrested 9,037 people April 17 to last Sunday in a 27-state dragnet led by the U.S. Marshals Service and timed to coincide with National Victims Rights Week. Among those apprehended were 1,102 people wanted for violent sex crimes or failure to register as sex offenders.

No other single law enforcement operation had resulted in the capture of as many suspected sex offenders, the Justice Department said. The arrests came mainly in states west of the Mississippi River, and in Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands.

Gonzales has directed investigators to focus on sex crimes as part of his effort to call attention to child pornography and other crimes against children.

One of those arrested last week was Primo Montes, 37, who was picked up April 18 as he tried to visit his pregnant wife in Escondido, Calif. Ten years earlier, Montes and a second man allegedly raped a 14-year-old girl. Montes fled to Mexico to escape prosecution, but investigators learned he might try to see his wife, the Marshals Service said in a summary of the case.

Marshals arrested Montes when he appeared.

Nearly 80,000 fugitives were arrested last year, just under half by the Marshals Service and the rest by state and local police working with federal authorities. More than 10,000 of those arrests came during a similar nationwide sweep last year.

The operations in the past two years produced roughly 10 times the average number of weekly arrests, but even that barely dents the fugitive caseload. The FBI database contains names of a million fugitives. The director of the Marshals Service, John Clark, said Thursday there are a "few million fugitives" in the United States, most of them wanted on state and local charges.

The agency spent $531,000 on the weeklong exercise, most of it to pay overtime to local and state police, said David Dimmitt, chief deputy U.S. Marshal. More than 2,100 officers from 786 federal, state and local law enforcement agencies took part.

A second phase, targeting the eastern U.S., will take place in the coming months, Gonzales said

Among those caught was William Wisham, 60, who authorities said failed to register as a sex offender when he moved to a motel in Victorville, Calif. Investigators found letters to children and notes explaining why he enjoys sex with children, as well as child pornography, candy and methamphetamines, authorities said.

Police are working to locate children listed in Wisham's diary-style notes.

On the Hawaiian island of Oahu, police arrested Herbert Damwijk, 30, who is wanted in Washington state on two counts of child rape and molestation against 8-year-old girls, the department said. He was arrested April 17 at his father's residence and awaits extradition to Washington.

Reginald Dozier, 39, was arrested in Belleville, Ill., at 12:01 a.m. on April 17, the first minute of the operation, for failing to register as a sex offender. Dozier had earlier been convicted of raping a girl younger than 13 and giving her gonorrhea.

More Than 1,100 Sex Offenders Arrested In U.S. Fugitive Sweep (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, April 28, 2006

More than 1,100 people wanted for sex crimes were arrested in a 27-state sweep of fugitives, U.S. officials said.

Those caught in the sweep were part of a group of 9,037 fugitives arrested in a weeklong effort dubbed Operation FALCON II, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said today at a news conference in Washington.

The operation ``targeted the worst of the worst fugitive felons in the country," he said.

The dragnet, which involved federal, state and local law enforcement authorities, took place during the week of April 17 and was timed to highlight National Crime Victims' Rights Week, which began April 23. Most of those arrested were in the western half of the U.S. Gonzales said a second sweep in the eastern part of the country will take place ``in the coming months."

Justice Department officials said the 1,102 sex offenders arrested represented the largest number ever captured during a single law enforcement operation. Authorities also seized 111 guns, more than 91 kilograms of narcotics, $120,265 in cash and 14 cars.

Last year, more than 79,000 fugitives were arrested and there are ``a few million" still at large, mostly on state and local warrants, U.S. Marshals Service Director John Clark said.

FALCON stands for Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally. The government conducted a similar operation last year.

117 swept up in Southern Arizona as part of national dragnet (AZSTAR)

The Arizona Daily Star, April 28, 2006

Forty-six people wanted for immigration offenses, including people smuggling, were among the 117 fugitives rounded up in Tucson and Southern Arizona during a weeklong law enforcement operation, officials said.

The dragnet was part of the nationwide Operation Falcon II. The project started April 17 and concluded Sunday. In total, 9,037 people were arrested in 27 states.

Local officers also nabbed four wanted sex offenders, 21 people wanted in connection with drug crimes and 21 wanted in violent crime cases, in addition to 25 others. Two soldiers also were arrested for being absent without leave from Fort Huachuca. They were turned over to the Army's Criminal Investigation Division for prosecution.

Operation Falcon targeted those "who had for too long escaped the grip of justice," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in a press statement Thursday.

"With these criminals off the streets, fewer Americans will live with the threat of violent crime in their communities," he said.

News Area fugitives picked off (CHIST)

Chicago Sun-Times, April 28, 2006

Several hundred fugitives were pulled from Chicago's streets this month -- including two who were among the most wanted -- in a federal and local law enforcement sweep spanning 27 states.

In Chicago, 403 fugitives -- twice as many as the last time investigators did this -- were arrested during the sweep, which began April 17, said Geoffrey Shank, commander of the U.S. Marshals Service Great Lakes Regional Fugitive Task Force. In the Great Lakes Region, 1,225 fugitives were arrested.

Chicago also netted more gang members than any other city and pulled two of the 15 most wanted off the streets, authorities said.

One of the most wanted was Clifford Cash, 30, a reputed member of the Gangster Disciples street gang who had failed to register as a sex offender -- for convictions that included an attack on a minor in the early 1990s. Cash was paroled from the Illinois Department of Corrections in 2004 after a 10-year sentence but failed to register, according to state records.

The other was Antoine Sallay, 26, who was originally convicted for the criminal sexual assault of a child under 13 and was released from prison in 2003. Since his arrest, investigators have linked him through DNA to two other criminal sexual assaults against children in the Chicago area.

While 163 reputed gang members were arrested nationwide, the Chicago team caught 64.

The concentrated search for people wanted for federal, state and local crimes "targeted the worst of the worst," U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday at a news conference.

A similar roundup was conducted last year.

Gonzales has directed investigators to focus on sex crimes as part of his effort to call attention to child pornography and other crimes against children.

9,037 nabbed nationwide

Nationwide, 9,037 people were arrested between April 17 and last Sunday in the dragnet timed to coincide with National Victims Rights Week. Among those apprehended were 1,102 people wanted for violent sex crimes or failure to register as sex offenders. Locally, there were 53 arrests for violent sex crimes and 49 for failing to register as a sex offender.

"Sometimes the victims get lost," Shank said. "They even get lost on us as we're running down a street chasing a guy. You're not thinking about the family or the victim. But this week we wanted to step forward . . . and concentrate on individuals who were wanted for crimes that relate directly to sexual offenses."

No other single law enforcement operation had resulted in the capture of as many suspected sex offenders, the Justice Department said. The arrests came mainly in states west of the Mississippi River, and in Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands.

Reginald Dozier, 39, was arrested in Downstate Belleville at 12:01 a.m. on April 17, the first minute of the operation, for failing to register as a sex offender. Dozier had earlier been convicted of raping a girl younger than 13.

The FBI database contains names of a million fugitives. The director of the Marshals Service, John Clark, said Thursday there are a "few million fugitives" in the United States, most of them wanted on state and local charges.

A second phase, targeting the eastern United States, will take place in the coming months, Gonzales said.

Operation Falcon makes arrests in La. (BRA)

The Baton Rouge Advocate, April 28, 2006

A nationwide crackdown on wanted suspects running from the law has found its way to Louisiana. As part of Operation Falcon, which has a primary focus of tracking down those suspected of sex crimes and violent crimes against women, 68 people were arrested in the middle part of the state.

Of the 68 arrests, five were taken in on rape and violent sex crime charges. Seven arrests were made on weapons-related charges, and local authorities even caught a suspect wanted for attempted murder.

U.S. Attorney David Dugas said the well-coordinated effort will continue throughout the year, but it gets extra emphasis this week.

"It's dangerous work," he said. "These are fugitives who are trying to escape the law. They know law enforcement is looking at them. It takes skill, it takes planning, it takes dedication by the agents -- and that's what we saw this week."
