"Frankly, much of this is still up to the president," he said. "How much does his legacy matter, to the point where he wants to take on a portion of his base? If he doesn't do that, how much will he be able to get done?"

There have been big bipartisan successes for this White House. But the ones typically mentioned by Bush, including the Patriot Act and the No Child Left Behind education law, happened early in his first term and later became divisive.

Scott Lilly, a longtime Democratic leadership aide in Congress, said he's deeply skeptical that Bush has gone bipartisan.

DOJ_NMG_0112134

"This is much more about tactical advantage than it is a sincere effort to reach out to people," said Lilly, now a senior fellow at the liberal Center for American Progress. "He's trying to set the dialogue of the debate so that when there isn't cooperation, he can point the finger at Congress and say, 'I tried to do these things, but they wouldn't work with me.'"

For now, Bush has a big month ahead.

He plans to unveil a new strategy in Iraq, probably next week, followed by his annual State of the Union speech and his budget proposal. He is still the commander in chief, still the leader with the biggest microphone and the power of veto.

"He's got some weapons," Ornstein said. "I wouldn't count him out quite yet."

Iraq May Quash 'bipartisan' Congress (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

America's 110th Congress begins on Thursday, ushering in what both the new Democratic majority and President George W. Bush have promised will be a new era of bipartisanship.

But few believe the rhetoric of bipartisan co-operation will survive Mr Bush's announcement of a "new way forward in Iraq", which is expected within 10 days.

In spite of the electorate's repudiation of Mr Bush's Iraq strategy at midterm elections in November, the White House looks set to announce a "surge" of up to 30,000 new troops in a move that would also go against the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which published its report last month.

Democratic leaders, in-cluding Nancy Pelosi, who will be sworn in on Thursday as America's first female speaker of the House of Representatives, and Harry Reid, the Senate leader, have ruled out supporting an increase in US forces in Iraq – as have a growing number of Republicans. Almost all Democrats and some Republicans favour a reduction in the existing 140,000 troop level.

But Mr Bush has made clear he does not feel bound by the results of the recent elections on his Iraq policy. In a statement yesterday, he promised to work with the new Congress but said: "The Congress has changed; our obligations to the country haven't changed."

Few believe Mr Bush is prepared to compromise on his most basic principles, which includes "victory" in Iraq, an extension of the controversial tax cuts that were pushed through in his first term, and opposition to the funding of stem cell research. The Democrats have promised contrary action on all three.

"Mr Bush talks the talk of bipartisanship but then he doesn't actually change his positions," says Thomas Mann, congressional scholar at the Brookings Institution. "His idea of bipartisanship is for members of both parties to support him."

For their part, the Democratic leaders are under fire for plans to bypass the normal deliberative committee process by going straight to a House floor vote to push through their six main election promises. "The Democrats are missing a golden tactical opportunity to prove they can work with Republicans," said Alice Rivlin, the first head of the Congressional Budget Office.

Ms Pelosi's pledges, to be passed within the first 100 legislative hours (in an echo of the Republican party's 100-day "contract with America" agenda in early 1995), include halving interest rates on student loans, raising the minimum wage, abolishing tax breaks for oil companies, reducing prescription drug prices and providing federal funding for stem cell research. Most of Ms Pelosi's 100-hour agenda is symbolic.

But Mr Bush, who has vetoed only one piece of legislation in six years, will almost certainly wield his pen for a second time over any moves to support stem cell research.

Mr Bush and Ms Pelosi do see eye to eye on the need to clean up the "culture of corruption" in Congress, which electoral analysts say was the second most important factor motivating people to vote last November.

On Thursday, Mr Bush called on Congress to halve within a year the number of "earmarks", or pork-barrel clauses, inserted into broader legislation.

"People want to end the secretive process by which Washington insiders are able to get billions of dollars directed to projects that have never been reviewed or voted on by Congress," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0112135

On Thursday Ms Pelosi is expected to announce a number of ethics reforms, including banning lawmakers from travelling in corporate jets, prohibiting gifts from lobby firms, establishing an independent ethics commission and forcing lawmakers to disclose the earmarks they sponsor.

White House officials are relatively confident about working with Democrats to reform US immigration, restructure social security and promote alternative energy fuels. But much of this could be rendered academic by the brewing storm over Iraq, which took another nasty turn last weekend when the 3,000th US soldier died, bringing to 25,000 the number of Americans killed or injured in Iraq.

If Mr Bush next week increases US troop exposure to the growing violence in Iraq without convincing Americans they are on the road to "victory", promises of bipartisan co-operation are likely to go up in smoke.

Rather than heralding a new era of partnership between the White House and Capitol Hill, the politics of the coming weeks and months are likely to pivot on one question, says Bruce Riedel, a former national security official: "Who lost Iraq?"

Bush Reaches Out, But Keeps One Hand On The Wheel (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 — In an article published on a friendly op-ed page, and from the regal confines of the White House, President Bush greeted the incoming Democratic leadership of Congress on Wednesday with a message of bipartisanship.

But he also sent another message: I'm still the guy with the big plane, the big office (the oval one) and the presidential seal.

With the op-ed, in The Wall Street Journal, and in the Rose Garden appearance, Mr. Bush sought to set the governing agenda one day before Democrats were officially to take control of Congress and alter the balance of power that has favored Mr. Bush's party for nearly his entire presidency.

In doing so, Mr. Bush mixed calls for unity in governing with a series of red flags on his signature issues.

Tax increases? Forget it.

"The elections have not reversed the laws of economics," Mr. Bush wrote in The Journal. "It is a fact that economies do best when you reward hard work by allowing people to keep more of what they have earned."

The war in Iraq? "We now have the opportunity to build a bipartisan consensus to fight and win the war," he wrote. In other words, we're staying.

That new Democratic majority? It isn't really so big.

"The minority party, especially where the margins are close," Mr. Bush wrote, "has a strong say in the form bills take." And the president, he added — lest anyone forget — has the constitutional authority "to use his judgment whether they should be signed into law."

Several Democrats said Mr. Bush's words on Wednesday had raised questions about what kind of president would show up when they get down to the business of governing side by side.

Some Democrats may have hoped it would be the George W. Bush who contritely acknowledged a "thumpin' " for his party the day after the elections in November. But the evidence suggests it is more likely to be the man who all but ignored the disputed circumstances of his election in 2000, governed from then as if he had an expansive mandate and who — even as he has employed soothing tones in speaking to and about Democrats for the last two months — has gradually but firmly reasserted himself on both foreign and domestic policy.

"I think what the op-ed showed was the fundamental division within the White House and probably within the president's head whether to stick to the old issues and just talk bipartisanship versus really doing it," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, the new vice chairman of the Democratic caucus in the Senate, in an interview.

The first few weeks of January are traditionally when the White House carefully rolls out new or repackaged policy initiatives before the president's State of the Union address, a period when he can set the agenda. But for the first time since early 2002, when Democrats controlled the Senate, Mr. Bush has to share power and the national microphone. He also has to show that he has a domestic agenda at a time when his presidency is largely consumed by Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0112136

Both sides were making some effort on Wednesday to play nice. White House officials noted that the president had highlighted several areas in which he has shown a willingness to work more closely with Democrats, like on a new minimum wage and a new immigration law.

And the White House arranged for a plane to bring the incoming Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, and Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, back to Washington from Gerald R. Ford's funeral in Grand Rapids, Mich., in time for a reception with Mr. Bush and the other Congressional leaders.

In a memorandum that Mr. Reid issued Wednesday to fellow Democrats, he wrote, "I'm encouraged that President Bush said today that he wants to work in bipartisanship."

But, he added, "I hope he means it." And in defining his own approach to bipartisanship, Mr. Reid went on to praise Senator Gordon H. Smith, Republican of Oregon, saying Mr. Smith's commentary last month on the administration's war policy — in which Mr. Smith said it "may even be criminal" — had "signaled a sea change over how Congress will address the Iraq war."

Mr. Reid promised to work with Republicans to "bring oversight and accountability to the Bush administration's conduct of the war and ensure a new policy that meets conditions on the ground" but also "allows our troops to come home."

Democrats were moving quickly to hold the administration accountable, in their view, for its mistakes, promising to hold as many as a dozen oversight hearings on the war alone in the next few weeks.

In interviews, White House officials did not hesitate to acknowledge that they were taking advantage of the last day before the Democrats take control to assert some presidential power.

Nor did they dispute Democrats' suspicions that the White House placed Mr. Bush's opinion piece in The Journal to reassure a target audience of nervous fiscal conservatives — and the financial markets — that he remained philosophically opposed to any tax increases.

But administration officials disputed Democratic assertions that the president was trying to upstage them before their big day.

"It's an appropriate time to say where we are on these things and to again reiterate the president's view that we can work together to find common ground," said Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman. "It also doesn't mean that a Democrat-controlled Congress passes whatever they want and we sign it — that's not bipartisanship."

But it was clear that as both sides spoke about bipartisanship, they were defining it on different terms.

Mr. Fratto acknowledged as much, saying, "We'll have to see as we go forward over the next six months, in particular, if everyone has the same understanding of what bipartisanship means."

Bush Seeks Cooperation 'Without Compromising Principles' (USAT)

By Douglas Stanglin

USA Today, January 4, 2007

On the eve of the Democratic takeover of Congress, President Bush is laying out his legislative agenda for the new year and calling on Congress and the White House to seek common ground "without compromising our principles."

"It's time to set aside politics and focus on the future," Bush said in remarks in the Rose Garden after meeting with his cabinet.

Bush, in his comments and in a column in The Wall Street Journal today, said he has been encouraged by the "productive meetings" he has held with news leaders in Congress from both parties.

ON DEADLINE: Read and comment on Bush's column | Video

"If the Congress chooses to pass bills that are simply political statements, they will have chosen stalemate," he said. "If a different approach is taken, the next two years can be fruitful ones for our nation."

"I am hopeful we can find common ground without compromising our principles," he wrote.

Among the items that Bush said are high on his priority list are: reforming entitlement programs like Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid; making tax cuts permanent, curbing "earmarks," or pork-barrel projects that have not been reviewed or voted on by Congress; and passing a line-item veto to allow presidents to veto individual budget items.

DOJ_NMG_0112137

Bush said he'll submit a five-year budget proposal that will balance the federal budget by 2012. He also said the two sides should come together on greater energy security, immigration reform and affordable health care.

When the 100th Congress convenes at noon Thursday, Democrats will hold a 233-202 edge in the House and will control the Senate by 51-49.

Nancy Pelosi, of California, will be sworn in on Thursday as the nation's first female speaker of the House and Sen. Harry Reid, of Nevada, will be selected as Majority Leader.

Bush said the change in leadership as a result of the November midterm elections offers Congress and the White House alike a challenge and an opportunity to find agreements acceptable to both sides.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said Democrats ran in the midterm election on a message of compromise, and want to work with Bush.

"We hope that when the president says compromise, it means more than 'do it my way,' which is what he's meant in the past," Schumer said.

He said fiscal restraint is one area where the executive and legislative branches of government can work together.

On Iraq, an area that is sure to prove contentious between the White House and Congress, Bush called for a "bipartisan consensus to fight and win the war."

He noted that he will be addressing the nation in the days ahead on a new strategy on Iraq, but offered little preview except to say the United States can help Iraq "defeat the extremists" inside and outside of Iraq to give the new political leadership breathing space.

"Ultimately, Iraqis must resolve the most pressing issues facing them," Bush wrote. "We can't do it for them."

The president's list of priorities did not include two of the top items on the Democrats' list — a higher minimum wage and federal funding of embryonic stem cell research.

These are expected to be passed in the first 100 hours of business after the 110th Congress officially convenes at noon Thursday.

A boost to the $5.15-an-hour federal minimum wage would be the first since 1997. Democratic leaders have proposed raising it in stages to $7.25 an hour. President Bush has said he supports the idea, along with help for small businesses.

A new Associated Press-AOL News poll on legislative priorities found broad support for raising minimum wage and passing a stem cell bill, as well as an overwhelming majority in favor of making it easier for people to buy prescription drugs from other countries.

The AP said its poll showed 80% of survey respondents favor the increase in the minimum wage, while 69% of adults favor the government taking steps to make it easier for people to buy prescription drugs from other countries, where some medicines cost significantly less than in the U.S.

Some 56% of adults support easing restrictions on using federal money to pay for research on embryonic stem cells, the AP reported. Supporters say such research could lead to treatments for everything from Parkinson's disease to spinal cord injuries.

Bush and other opponents say the embryos from which the cells are extracted are human lives that should not be destroyed in the name of science.

Bush Tells Congress What He'd Like (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman And Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As President Bush used a Rose Garden moment Wednesday to offer up a menu of spending cuts, the newly empowered Democrats in Congress were poised to swiftly pass their own priorities, none of them on the president's wish list.

On the eve of the start of the 110th Congress, Bush outlined his legislative priorities—highlighted by calls to trim Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid and balance the federal budget in five years—that underscored the clear contrast with the agenda of Democrats who will control Capitol Hill for the first time in Bush's presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0112138

Bush promised to deliver a new budget that will hold back spending and set clear budget priorities.

"It will address the most urgent needs of our nation—in particular, the need to protect ourselves from radicals and terrorists, the needs to win the war on terror, the need to maintain a strong national defense, and the need to keep this economy growing by making tax relief permanent," Bush said as members of his Cabinet stood behind him.

And in the Wall Street Journal, Bush wrote of his desire to work in a bipartisan manner, something he has avoided for much of his presidency. After members of the new Congress take their oaths of office, "I will have the privilege of working with them for the next two years—one-quarter of my presidency, plenty of time to accomplish important things for the American people," he wrote.

But the newly elected members of Congress will be sworn in Thursday with swift plans for consideration of legislation that is decidedly not in sync with the president.

In the House, lawmakers plan to vote Tuesday to enact the recommendations of the Sept. 11 Commission. On Wednesday, they will vote to raise the minimum wage. On Thursday, Jan. 11, they will consider expanding federally funded embryonic stem cell research. And on Friday, Jan. 12, the House plans to vote on legislation allowing the federal government to negotiate for lower prescription drug prices for senior citizens participating in Medicare.

Democrats said they appreciated Bush's attempt at calling for a bipartisan working relationship, even if his proposals don't mesh with their own.

"I think he's right in concept," said the incoming House majority leader, Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.). "The American public are hopeful, almost pleading, that the president and the House and the Senate sit down together and address the serious problems confronting our country. They want solutions, not politics. Hopefully we'll give them that."

New Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) predicted in a memo to Senate Democrats that the 110th Congress will be guided by bipartisan cooperation.

"I'm encouraged that President Bush said today that he wants to work in bipartisanship, and I hope he means it. We share many of America's priorities, and have committed to taking up business, lobbying and ethics reform that improves the earmarking process as our first order of business," Reid said, referring to lawmakers' practice of tacking pork-barrel spending items onto legislation on other topics.

Meanwhile, House Republicans have launched a public relations campaign complaining that the Democrats are not treating them fairly in the minority even though they do not officially become the minority party until noon Thursday.

"We are disappointed that at this point in the game, half of the Congress has been cut out of the process," said Rep. Adam Putnam (R-Fla.), chairman of the House Republican Conference.

Republicans say the new Democratic leaders won't let them offer amendments to the first half dozen bills to reach the House floor and have cut them out of the decision-making about how the bills are being drafted.

Hoyer, however, said Democrats made a commitment to the public during the 2006 elections to pass certain bills without change during the first 100 legislative hours.

"We view the first hundred hours as a mandate from the American people," Hoyer said. "We said if you elect us, this is what we will do."

Before any legislation is passed, lawmakers in the House and Senate will be sworn in Thursday, marking a historic shift in the balance of power in Washington. Republicans will lose control of the House after 12 years in power while the first woman speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, takes office.

Republicans will also lose the upper hand in the Senate, where they have held the majority for the last four years. But Democrats have a tenuous grip on the majority with just 51 total votes. And one of those votes belongs to Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.), who is still hospitalized following brain surgery.

In the House, Democrats plan to immediately offer a new set of rules to ban gifts and travel from lobbyists, end privately funded flights on corporate jets and institute pay-as-you-go requirements to cover the cost of new spending initiatives. The rules also call for the end of the two-day work week, a fixture of the last Congress.

Americans Question Whether Congress Will Be Able To Pass Laws, Survey Shows (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0112139

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

As the new Congress is sworn in this week, fewer Americans think Democrats, Republicans and President Bush will be able to work together to pass legislation in the next two years, according to a Harris Interactive poll.

Nearly half of Americans (47%) believe the results of the congressional elections were a good thing for the U.S., according to the online survey, while 19% say the outcome was bad and 35% aren't sure.

At the same time, 43% say having a president and a majority in Congress belonging to different parties is an advantage for the U.S., while 24% say it is worse for the country and 32% aren't sure.

When asked what will be the most likely outcome in Washington this year, 25% said they think Democrats and Republicans in Congress are likely to be able to work out compromise legislation, a third said Democrats will pass legislation, but the president will veto it, and 18% said Democrats and the president are most likely to compromise to pass legislation.

Among the series of issues that might be on the agenda of the new Congress, just over three-quarters of those polled said they would back a minimum wage increase from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour, compared with 17% who oppose the increase; 69% back legislation to speed up the removal of troops from Iraq vs. 23% who oppose.

See full results of the poll: "In January, the new Congress, which was elected in November, will be sworn into office. How much would you support or oppose the following items that might be on the agenda of the new Congress?"

Base: All Adults

NOTE: Percentages may not add exactly to 100 due to rounding. * * * "In the beginning of January, the new Congress, which was elected in November will be sworn into office. How much would you support or oppose the following items that might be on the agenda of the new Congress?"

SUMMARY OF SUPPORT RESPONSES

Base: All Adults * * * "Thinking about the recent congressional elections, do you believe that the outcome is a good thing or bad thing for the United States?"

Base: All Adults

NOTE: Percentages may not add exactly to 100 due to rounding. * * * "Which of these is more likely to occur in Washington, DC in the next two years?"

Base: All Adults

NOTE: Percentages may not add exactly to 100 due to rounding. * * * "Not thinking of this time or any particular president, do you think it is better or worse for the country to have a president and a majority in Congress belonging to different parties?"

Base: All Adults

NOTE: Percentages may not add exactly to 100 due to rounding.

Methodology:

Harris Interactive conducted this online survey in the U.S., Dec. 12-18, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 2,309 adults. Figures for age, gender, race/ethnicity, education, income and region were weighted where necessary to align with population proportions. Propensity score weighting was also used to adjust for respondents' propensity to be online. In theory, with probability samples of this size, one can say with 95% certainty that the overall results have a sampling error of +/- 2 percentage points of what they would be if the entire U.S. adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. This online sample is not a probability sample.

<hr/>About Harris Interactive

Harris Interactive is a world-wide market research and consulting firm, best known for The Harris Poll and its use of the Internet to conduct scientifically accurate market research. For more information, see www.harrisinteractive.com1. To become a participant in The Harris Poll Online and join future online surveys, see www.harrispollonline.com2.

Bush To Seek Renewal Of Education Law (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, January 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112140

President Bush plans to meet with lawmakers next week to jump-start talks over the renewal of the No Child Left Behind education law, a Democratic congressional aide said Wednesday.

The top Democrats and Republicans on the House and Senate committees that deal with education issues planned to attend the White House meeting Monday, said the aide on the condition of anonymity because the White House had not announced the session.

Monday is also the day the Bush administration is commemorating the fifth anniversary of the what is widely considered the most significant federal education law in decades.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, in an interview with The Associated Press on Wednesday, said she was "optimistic about the ability to make progress this year" on renewing the law for five more years.

The law aims to ensure that all children can read and do math at grade level by 2014, a goal that has placed unprecedented demands on schools. They have been required to increase testing, raise teacher quality and pay more attention on the achievements of minority children.

Poor schools that get federal aid but do not make enough progress must provide tutoring, offer public school choice to students or initiate other reforms such as overhauling their staffs.

Spellings said renewing the law is something upon which Bush and Democrats, who won control of Congress in November, agree.

"It's on everybody's list of things where we might forge agreement as we have done before," she said.

Spellings said there were a few "bright-line principles" that the administration would not agree to alter under a rewrite of the law. Among them is the requirement that all students are proficient in reading and math by 2014 — a goal many observers call unrealistic.

Spellings said the administration was open to debating how progress should be measured. Critics, including the teachers' unions, have said the current law does not give enough credit to schools that make significant strides in student achievement but fall short of reaching an annual target.

Democrats also say Republicans have not spent the money needed to fully fund the law. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., who are to lead the committees overseeing education, say the administration has provided about $50 billion less than originally called for by Congress.

Republicans say it is common for legislation to be funded at less than the full level Congress authorizes.

Spellings declined to preview the amount Bush would seek when he releases his annual budget in February. She did indicate an interest in getting more money to teachers who work in schools that have difficulty attracting people.

Bush sought $500 million from Congress for that purpose last year and got about $100 million.

"Our best teachers, or are most experienced teachers, are in places with our least challenged learners," Spellings said.

Spellings also reaffirmed the administration's view that the law, which focuses on early and middle grades, should be expanded in high schools.

'No Child' Law On Track, Spellings Says (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said yesterday that she welcomed proposals to "perfect and tweak" the No Child Left Behind law as Congress prepares for what could become a divisive debate on renewal of the landmark education initiative.

But in an interview five days before the act's fifth anniversary, Spellings said its implementation was on track. She rejected calls for a major rewrite of the law, including some proposals advanced yesterday by a coalition of about 100 groups with a stake in education.

"We've made more progress in the last five years than the previous 28 years," Spellings said. "Can the law be improved? Should we build on what we've done and all of that sort of thing? You bet. But I don't hear people saying: 'You know what? We really don't need to have education for all students.' "

DOJ_NMG_0112141

Her remarks come as various groups begin to weigh in on the law and what they believe works and what does not. The No Child Left Behind law is scheduled to be reauthorized by Congress, but it is uncertain when lawmakers will act.

The Forum on Educational Accountability -- a coalition that includes education, religious, civil rights and disability rights groups -- said yesterday that the law overemphasizes standardized tests and arbitrary academic targets. The coalition also criticized penalties the law imposes on schools that fail to meet standards.

"We don't have to throw out the whole law and make a big political battle," said Reginald M Felton, a senior lobbyist for the National School Boards Association, a member of the coalition. "But we need to change from the punitive, 'gotcha!' kind of approach to actual support for progress."

The coalition includes the National Parent Teacher Association, the NAACP and the National Education Association, a teachers union. The coalition has called for more federal education funding to help schools meet the law's mandates.

Spellings said the past five years have laid the foundation for the law's key goal of ensuring that every child can read and write at grade level by 2014. Under the law, states must test all students in reading and math from grades 3 to 8 and once in high school. Schools that fail to make adequate progress face a range of penalties.

The Bush administration has granted some states flexibility in how they carry out the law. For example, North Carolina and Tennessee are experimenting with a way to rate schools that emphasizes the year-to-year academic growth of students rather than how scores compare with fixed benchmarks.

"Have we learned something as we've made public policy for the last five years that we ought to act on going forward? Absolutely," Spellings said. "And I've done some of those things."

She added, "Those are some of the areas that ought to be discussed in the context of reauthorization."

The law, which passed Congress in 2001 with overwhelming bipartisan support, was signed by President Bush on Jan. 8, 2002.

Yesterday, Spellings lauded the incoming education committee chairmen, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), as "stalwarts" who have "stayed very true to the core principles of this law."

Gates Picks Intelligence Undersecretary (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates has chosen a career military intelligence officer, retired Lt. Gen. James R. Clapper Jr., to be undersecretary of defense for intelligence, according to administration officials.

Clapper, who retired in June after five years as director of the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency (NGA), ran the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) during the 1990s, and handled Air Force intelligence during the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

A senior intelligence official yesterday confirmed that Gates had chosen Clapper but added: "The White House has the final say." On Capitol Hill, a spokesperson for Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), incoming chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, said the staff had unofficially been told of Clapper as Gates's choice, but added that "nothing official has been sent to the senator." Maj. Patrick Ryder, a Defense Department spokesman, said that he could not confirm Clapper's choice, saying: "This is a presidential decision, which will come from the White House."

There was no comment late yesterday from the White House. Clapper did not return a call seeking comment.

Clapper would replace Stephen A. Cambone, who was the first person to hold the undersecretary for intelligence position, which was created by then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in 2003 to coordinate the wide-ranging defense intelligence activities. While the director of national intelligence is the president's top intelligence advisor, the defense undersecretary coordinates the largest components of the intelligence community and almost 80 percent of the roughly $42 billion national intelligence budget.

Cambone was a close and longtime associate of Rumsfeld, but Clapper sometimes took positions opposite the secretary, such as in 2004 when he supported putting the NGA under the new director of national intelligence rather than within the Defense Department.

Staff writer Dafna Linzer contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0112142

Bush, Democrats Joust Over Earmarks (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — Eager to set themselves apart from a Republican-led Congress tarnished by scandal, Democrats outlined a plan Wednesday to end the secrecy around earmarks inserted in legislation to funnel public money to favored interests.

"We're going to stamp out corruption, and the proof is in the package," Rep. Louise M. Slaughter (D-N.Y.) said as she outlined reform measures that Democrats would put to a vote today and Friday.

But in a sign of how much the election has pushed reform to the top of the agenda, President Bush strode before cameras Wednesday to highlight his overhaul ideas even before the Democrats unveiled theirs.

"We need to do more," said the president, who read a brief statement in the Rose Garden that called on the new Democratic Congress to halve the number and cost of earmarks.

The jousting between the two ends of Pennsylvania Avenue raised the prospect of a tussle over who could claim the mantle of reform, and bolstered reformers' hopes that calls for change to the secretive earmarking process might no longer by ignored on Capitol Hill.

Under Republican congressional leadership, the amount of federal funds earmarked has nearly tripled since 1994, reaching $67.1 billion in fiscal 2006, according to the Congressional Research Service.

The new rules House Democrats plan to adopt would mandate disclosure of the authors of earmarks and more complete explanations of what the earmarks will fund — measures reformers have demanded for years.

House Democrats also plan to pass new bans on gifts and meals from lobbyists, and a prohibition on the use of corporate jets by House members.

Senate Democrats will soon draw up their own rules, but a spokesman for incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) would not discuss them.

The House reform package — which is among a list of initiatives Democrats promised to enact in their first days in power — comes after Republicans lost control of Congress amid ethics scandals that led to the resignations of four GOP House members since September 2005.

It drew praise from a number of reform advocates, including Fred Wertheimer, president of the watchdog group Democracy 21. Wertheimer called the ethics package "important progress in changing the way business is done in Congress."

But the plan neither settled the debate over earmarking nor allowed Democrats to claim control of the reform agenda without a challenge.

Though House Democratic leaders are seeking to dramatically increase transparency in the earmarking process, they would not mandate that information about who inserts an earmark be posted in a place the public can easily access it, such as the Internet.

"I want more," said Steve Ellis, vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense, a nonpartisan watchdog that tracks congressional spending.

Democrats also do not plan to make it easier to remove earmarks when legislation comes to the full House for a vote.

Earmarks are often included in the conference reports that are drawn up by senior lawmakers from the House and Senate to settle differences between versions of legislation passed by the two chambers. These reports cannot be amended on the floor.

Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), who has been complaining about earmarking for years, said he was particularly disappointed that lawmakers like him would often be unable to offer amendments that would strip out objectionable earmarks.

"I would have liked to see a requirement that earmarks be in the legislative text rather than in a conference committee report," Flake said. "When they are in a conference committee report, it's far more likely that they will end up in the middle in the night."

Democrats nonetheless were quick to label the expected adoption as historic.

"This is the most significant package that has ever passed the Congress," noted Rep. Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), a longtime reform advocate.

DOJ_NMG_0112143

But if Democrats were able to outmaneuver Republicans on ethics in the fall congressional campaign, they now could face a second showdown with the White House.

Bush has only occasionally criticized the proliferation of earmarking. And since taking office, he has never vetoed an appropriations bill, even as the number of earmarks in the spending measures more than doubled to about 13,000.

On Wednesday morning, however, the president made earmarks the focus of his public remarks as he outlined areas where he said he could work with the new Congress.

"People want to end the secretive process by which Washington insiders are able to get billions of dollars directed to projects, many of them pork-barrel projects that have never been reviewed or voted on by the Congress," Bush said just a few hours before Democrats announced their plans.

Casting himself as the reformer, Bush called on Congress to stop putting earmarks in conference reports and to disclose even more information about why earmarks are being sought.

And he reiterated calls he has made in the past for a version of the line-item veto, which Bush has said would help restrain spending by allowing him to strip out wasteful earmarks.

That suggestion was immediately rejected by incoming House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who gave a hint of how the battle over reform may turn into a showdown over congressional authority.

"The president would like to say to the United States: Only the president can add investments in communities, so Congress has to come hat in hand to the president," Hoyer said. "That would substantially skew the relationship and undermine the independence of the Congress of the United States."

GOP Earmark Epiphany (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

Could it be possible that one benefit of this new era of divided government in Washington is spending restraint? We'll believe it when we see it, but one good portent was President Bush's op-ed yesterday in these pages.

Mr. Bush stressed spending control, and yesterday he also offered his own proposal for Congress to restrain its "earmarking" of tens of thousands of pork-barrel projects each year. The White House wants Members to disclose the sponsor, the cost, the beneficiary and the justification for each such earmark -- in a move that echoes what such House GOP reformers as Jeff Flake of Arizona were trying to pass last year. John Boehner, the new House minority leader, quickly seconded this motion.

Our only caveat is: What took them so long? Mr. Bush never did say much about earmarks when the GOP was in charge and the likes of Jerry Lewis, Roy Blunt, Don Young and Dave Hobson were setting earmark records. Perhaps now that they're in the minority, Republicans can reclaim some of their fiscal virtue -- though the voters will be forgiven if they put such promises on probation given the GOP's recent past.

Competition between the parties doesn't always produce spending control or smaller government -- witness the late 1990s, when Bill Clinton gave the GOP higher defense outlays in return for more domestic spending. But at least in the early days of Democratic control, both parties are at least trying to sound like fiscal conservatives. Who knows? Maybe we'll even see a few vetoes.

Pelosi Walks Tightrope Enforcing Rules (WP)

By Michael Grunwald And Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

On June 15, beneath the crystal chandeliers and Corinthian pilasters of the Cannon Caucus Room, House Democrats had to decide how they really felt about the "culture of corruption." After months of expressing outrage over Republican scandals, what would they do about the $90,000 the FBI had found in the freezer of one of their own?

To House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the answer was obvious: Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) had to give up his coveted spot on the Ways and Means Committee. But at the closed-door caucus meeting, several black Democrats complained that Pelosi was not their emperor or queen, while Jefferson implored his colleagues to keep him on Ways and Means for the sake of Hurricane Katrina's victims. No one spoke up for Pelosi -- except Pelosi.

DOJ_NMG_0112144

She began by praising Jefferson's wife and five daughters: Jamila, Jalila, Jelani, Nailah and Akilah. But she quickly made it clear that Jefferson's legal problems had become her political problem: "I am not an emperor or a queen. But neither am I a fool."

Pelosi explained that Democrats should be the party of ethics, that appearances count, that dealing forcefully with Jefferson's scandal would help everyone else in the room. "You didn't elect me emperor or queen," she said. "You elected me leader."

The Democrats overwhelmingly voted Jefferson off the committee. And in November, Americans voted Democrats into the majority, citing corruption as one of the issues that soured them on the GOP.

Today, after becoming the first Democratic speaker in 12 years and the first female speaker in the history of the House, Pelosi will offer a comprehensive package of ethics reforms, a down payment on her pledge to run "the most ethical Congress ever."

But it is not yet clear whether Jefferson's ouster heralded a new era of honesty and accountability, or just a one-off political calculation inspired by the 2006 campaign. After the midterm elections, Pelosi ignored the ethical cloud around Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) to support his bid to be majority leader, and she nearly chose Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.) to chair the intelligence committee even though the House once impeached him when he was a federal judge. And, in December, when Jefferson faced a fight for his political life in a runoff against state Rep. Karen R. Carter, an African American Democrat with none of his ethical baggage, Pelosi refused to get involved.

Today, Jefferson will take his seat in Pelosi's House. His inconvenient presence will be a constant reminder of the fine line the new speaker will have to walk between rhetoric and reality, between the cross-cutting demands of her caucus and the demands of the public.

"Pelosi wouldn't even take my calls," Carter said. "None of the Democrats in Washington would take my calls. They all said they wanted to get rid of corruption, but I guess it wasn't their top priority."

Pelosi and Jefferson declined to comment for this story. But Brendan Daly, Pelosi's spokesman, said his boss will be as outspoken about ethics while in power as she was while in the minority.

"If there's something that needs to be addressed, we'll address it," he said. "The politics are not the reason."'Culture of Corruption'

In 1994, Republicans seized control of the House as the party of reform, pledging in their "Contract With America" to "restore accountability to Congress." By 2006, that pledge was a punch line. House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) and his K Street Project had turned the corporate lobbying community into a virtual subsidiary of the GOP. Republican leaders routinely moved bills stuffed with earmarks and special-interest giveaways late at night, without giving members a chance to read them. A huge scandal was swirling around Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and investigators were swarming around DeLay, Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) and Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio).

Many House Democrats were genuinely outraged by what they regarded as misrule by the GOP. But Pelosi and her top political adviser, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), also saw that the Republican "culture of corruption" could be a winning issue.

In 2005, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), led by Emanuel, unveiled a "House of Scandal" Web site, and Emanuel co-wrote a "Special Interest Lobbying and Ethics Accountability Act." Pelosi, who used to serve on the House ethics committee, later introduced an "Honest Leadership and Open Government Act." Their focus groups suggested that simple anti-corruption campaigns would not work, but that voters would respond to messages that tied Republican coziness with special interests such as the petroleum and pharmaceutical industries and to quality-of-life issues such as gas and drug prices.

"The point was that Republicans had sold the country to the highest bidder," Emanuel said.

But the Democrats had a few problems of their own, such as Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (W.Va.), the ranking Democrat on the ethics committee. Mollohan had fought Republican efforts to completely defang the already weakened committee, but a conservative nonprofit group revealed that he had become rich while serving in Congress, often through real estate deals with beneficiaries of his earmarks.

Pelosi liked Mollohan, and she thought that he was being targeted by House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.) and other Republicans as payback. But the story of Mollohan's millions did not go away, and within days, she asked him to leave the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, as the House ethics panel is formally known. She wanted to draw a clear distinction between Democrats and Republicans, who had given DeLay and Ney standing ovations long after their ethical problems became clear.

DOJ_NMG_0112145

Mollohan grudgingly agreed to step aside. "There was no alternative," recalled Murtha, a close friend of Mollohan's and Pelosi's.

But Pelosi never pressured Mollohan to give up his seat on the House Appropriations Committee. "She would have talked to me if she was even considering it," Murtha said.

Pelosi faced a trickier dilemma with Jefferson, whose former aide had implicated him in a bribery scheme. For months, Pelosi took no action, saying the legal system should run its course. Jefferson was allowed to brief House Democrats about Katrina at a caucus meeting, and he held a campaign fundraiser at Democratic headquarters.

A Harvard Law School graduate who had picked cotton as a boy, Jefferson was Louisiana's first African American representative since Reconstruction. And Pelosi was wary of antagonizing the Congressional Black Caucus, one of her party's most influential factions.

But on May 20, 2006, at 7:15 p.m., federal agents raided Jefferson's office on Capitol Hill, the first time that had ever happened to a sitting congressman. And the FBI affidavit justifying the raid revealed the inconvenient $90,000 in the freezer, along with transcripts of a taped conversation that appeared to capture Jefferson soliciting a bribe.

Pelosi quickly realized that late-night jokes about "Dollar Bill" and his cold cash were muddying her message about GOP corruption. She joined with Hastert in condemning the raid as an executive-branch intrusion on congressional prerogatives, but she also met privately with Jefferson and asked him to leave Ways and Means.

He refused, saying his lawyers were not letting him tell his side of the story. But she insisted that he must step down, just as a police officer would be suspended during an official investigation. When he balked, she sent a formal letter requesting his resignation from Ways and Means, "in the interest of upholding the high ethical standard of the House Democratic Caucus."

Jefferson replied that Pelosi's request was "perplexing and unreasonable," noting that his legal problems had nothing to do with Ways and Means. He wrote that it was also "discriminatory" because no other House member under federal investigation has been asked to leave a "substantive, legislative committee," an obvious reference to Mollohan and the appropriations panel.

Jefferson's allies took up his cause. Rep. Melvin Watt (D-N.C.), a Yale Law School graduate who heads the Black Caucus, told Pelosi at the June meeting that her decisions on ethical issues would be totally arbitrary without a "bright line standard." Pelosi said her standard was common sense, noting: "Anybody with $90,000 in their freezer, you have a problem at that point."

That was not good enough for Watt. "Okay, how much cash in the freezer does it take?" he asked in an interview. "The problem is not that there's a double standard. The problem is there's no standard."

In early June, after Republicans retained Cunningham's seat in a special election, some pundits declared the corruption issue a political loser. But Pelosi saw that the GOP had been forced to spend heavily to defend a conservative district. She had faith in the corruption issue, as long as voters could see that the two parties were not equally corrupt. That meant distancing Democrats from "Dollar Bill." "We wanted our members to be able to say: 'We deal with this kind of thing, and they don't,' " one leadership aide recalled.

At the Democrats' June 15 meeting, Reps. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick (Mich.), Jesse L. Jackson Jr. (Ill.) and Watt all spoke on Jefferson's behalf before Pelosi took the floor. Pelosi said that she did not want to force this decision on the caucus, but that Jefferson, unlike "other people" -- another reference to Mollohan -- had refused to step down. "We're about high ethical standards," she said.

When she was done, one of Jefferson's supporters demanded a secret ballot. "I would have it no other way," Pelosi replied.

The Democrats then followed their leader.

Pelosi is a San Francisco liberal, and some critics expect her to steer her caucus to the far left. But her allies say the Jefferson affair shows that she cares less about ideology than unity. "It was a real defining moment for her leadership," said Rep. Mike Thompson (D-Calif.).'Incumbent-Protection'

During the Democratic landslide on Nov. 7, more voters told exit pollsters that corruption was "extremely important" to their vote, rather than terrorism, the economy or the war in Iraq. Emanuel counted eight races in which charges of personal misconduct had cost incumbents their seats. That did not bode well for Jefferson, who had limped into a runoff with Carter, a young state legislator from a prominent Democratic family in New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0112146

Carter ran on corruption, arguing that Jefferson had become a pariah in Washington. Louisiana Democrats endorsed her, and she hoped that the national party might as well. She knew the DCCC did not usually help challengers against Democratic incumbents, but she figured incumbents were not usually caught with $90,000 in their freezers.

So she called Pelosi. Several times. "Her people told me, 'She's very busy, Karen. Call back after the leadership elections," Carter recalled. So she did. Several times.

The result: "She's very busy, Karen."

Carter eventually got through to Pelosi's chief of staff, John Lawrence, but she never heard from Pelosi. She also made several calls to Emanuel but only heard back from his political director, Sean Sweeney.

"You know, this isn't my first rodeo. I understand they had a sitting congressman who hadn't been indicted," Carter said. "But they had run around the country saying they were going to end the 'culture of corruption.' I thought they might, at least, return my calls."

In fact, Democratic leaders never really considered helping Carter. "We're an incumbent-protection organization," said Sarah Feinberg, DCCC spokeswoman. The leaders privately rooted for Carter to unseat their most notorious albatross, but they did not want to alienate the Black Caucus or scare every Democratic incumbent with a potential primary opponent.

"Obviously, having Jefferson around complicates our message," said one leadership aide. "But taking him on would have created so many more problems." DCCC officials also thought that helping Carter would make her look like the candidate of Washington, and of whites.

But Carter was eager for the help. It would have bolstered her message that Jefferson was a Hill pariah, and would have undercut Jefferson's message that he was a victim of a GOP plot.

In the end, although she was supported by several prominent Louisiana political figures such as former senator John Breaux (D), Carter did not receive a single endorsement from incumbent House members.

Meanwhile, the Black Caucus -- as well as individual legislators such as incoming House Majority Whip James E. Clyburn (D-S.C.) -- poured money into Jefferson's campaign. Watt taped a radio ad for him, and Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee (D-Tex.) campaigned for him. Their calculations were simple. "Jefferson, over time, has supported me, and I've supported him," Clyburn explained.

Ultimately, Jefferson won handily enough that even Carter does not blame her defeat on national Democrats. But she does wonder about their commitment to reform.

"I kept saying: 'This is the culture of corruption, and you can help stop it,' " Carter said. "They chose to ignore me. If the leadership had made a clear statement that this kind of behavior was unacceptable, maybe they wouldn't have to deal with him anymore."

Pelosi has kept Jefferson off the Ways and Means Committee in the 110th Congress. She did grant him a spot on the Small Business Committee, but even clean-government advocates said that she has done all that could be expected.

The advocates are less impressed by her handling of Mollohan, who will lead the House Appropriations subcommittee that funds the FBI while its agents investigate him. Pelosi also raised eyebrows with her support for Murtha, whose candidacy for majority leader was doomed by ethical controversies from the 1980s. And after she backed off her plan to woo the Black Caucus by giving the intelligence committee to Hastings, who had lost his judgeship over bribery allegations, she reached out to the Hispanic caucus by turning to Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Tex.), who was also embroiled in his own ethical controversy over funding for a border-security firm.

Ultimately, Pelosi thinks she will be judged by the record of the Democratic majority, and by the ethics overhaul it will begin today. Members would be barred from accepting -- from lobbyists or their clients -- gifts, meals, flights on corporate jets or trips that last longer than a day. They would also have to disclose all of their earmarks, and to certify that the provisions will not benefit them personally. The goal is to end K Street's reign over Capitol Hill -- or, as Clyburn puts it, to "cut the umbilical cord between lobbyists and legislation."

DOJ_NMG_0112147

"She takes ethics really seriously," said George Crawford, a former Pelosi aide who is now a lobbyist. "She's not just going to bow to the politics of the moment."

But it is true that Pelosi's $90,000-in-the-freezer standard is not a real standard at all. She has handled Jefferson, Mollohan, Murtha and Hastings on a case-by-case basis, evaluating the seriousness of the allegations, as well as the potential fallout inside and outside the caucus. She is now the leader of the House, but she is still the leader of House Democrats.

"In the end, she's going to do what she thinks is in the best interests of the caucus," Crawford said.

House Democrats Prepare To Tighten Lobbyist Rules (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

In their first act as the House majority, Democrats today will introduce a package of rule changes to ban gifts and trips from lobbyists, restrict privately funded junkets and begin to sever the cozy relations between lobbyists and lawmakers that scandalized the last Congress.

But a number of loopholes in the proposal have led ethics watchdogs to warn Democrats that their work will be far from done, even if the new rules are secured today. Under the changes, lobbying groups would be able to finance lawmakers' travel as long as those funds were channeled through a nonprofit foundation. And almost all banned perks would still be permitted if given in the context of a campaign fundraiser.

As if to underscore the need for rule changes, the House ethics committee found yesterday that Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.) took part in a 2003 junket to Scotland financed by lobbyist Jack Abramoff that violated House rules. The panel decided against censuring Feeney after he agreed to reimburse the government the trip's $5,643 cost.

The details of the ethics package were greeted warmly by watchdog groups, which have been pushing for a strong response to the influence-peddling scandals that erupted last year. Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, called it a "strong package." Joan Claybrook, president of Public Citizen, hailed it as "a meaningful step forward."

But the same groups said Congress must establish an independent ethics watchdog to enforce the new rules, especially in light of actions such as yesterday's ruling on Feeney's trip. The ethics committee also decided yesterday not to punish anyone for not deterring the behavior of former congressman Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

Under the rule changes, "the importance of creating a new, stronger enforcement entity such as an Office of Public Integrity becomes even greater. Effective enforcement is the linchpin to this entire process," said Meredith McGehee, policy director of the Campaign Legal Center.

The changes would prohibit House members or employees from knowingly accepting gifts or travel from a registered lobbyist, foreign agent or lobbyist's client. Lawmakers could no longer fly on corporate jets. In addition, congressional travel financed by outside groups would have to be preapproved by the ethics committee and immediately disclosed to the public.

The rule changes would also combat many of the strong-arm tactics that Republicans used to leave House Democrats virtually irrelevant when the GOP was in control. Votes could no longer be held open indefinitely while leaders twist arms to win the outcome they want. Lawmakers in both parties would have to be notified before final legislative negotiations begin between the House and Senate. Those negotiations would largely have to be held in public, and once they were complete, changes could not be slipped into legislative agreements in the dead of night.

Another slate of changes is to be voted on tomorrow to rein in swollen budget deficits. Parliamentary rules approved in 1974 to block Senate filibusters on bills that raise taxes or cut entitlement spending could no longer be used to cut taxes and increase the deficit, as Republicans did several times. Under the new rules, any law that cuts taxes or increases spending would have to be offset by tax increases or spending cuts.

Special-interest or home-district pet projects -- known as earmarks -- would have to be claimed by their sponsors, who would have to spell out who benefits. That measure would apply not only to spending bills but also to tax measures and policy legislation, which in recent years have been larded with narrowly targeted provisions.

"My one-word reaction to these earmark transparency [changes] compared to previous efforts: better," said Steve Ellis, vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense.

DOJ_NMG_0112148

The changes, especially the ban on lobbyist-funded meals and gifts, left some Washington businesses grumbling.

"If members of Congress are changing their votes because they are influenced by our [food], then this country is in a lot of trouble," said Patricia Beggiato, special events coordinator at Sesto Senso restaurant. "I guess lobbyists will just have to take each other out for lunch and dinner."

Matt Williams, spokesman for Washington Sports and Entertainment, which owns the Wizards basketball team, said: "This ban will certainly negatively affect the business we do with one of the major industries in our region -- the federal government."

Others said they are not concerned. "We don't believe it will have any effect," a Washington Redskins spokesman said.

Many lobbying groups would still be able to take lawmakers on junkets through their nonprofit foundation affiliates, despite the travel ban.

Lobbyists and their clients would continue to fete lawmakers at restaurants, sporting events and faraway resorts as long as those events are part of campaign fundraisers. Campaign finance laws, which are distinct from House rules, permit outsiders to provide all manner of benefits to lawmakers as long as those benefits are accompanied by checks written to the lawmakers' reelection coffers.

"We would be able to take people out to lunch, but only if we give them a check while we do it," said Paul A. Miller, immediate past president of the American League of Lobbyists. "That looks more corrupting than what we have under the current system."

In another exception, lawmakers would be allowed to attend receptions and other "widely attended events" paid for by interest groups and lobbyists, according to Kenneth Gross, an ethics expert at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP.

Ethics Overhaul Tops The Agenda In New Congress (NYT)

By Carl Hulse and David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 — On the brink of regaining power after 12 years, House Democrats said Wednesday that they would move immediately to try to sever ties between lawmakers and lobbyists who figured into scandals that helped Democrats win control of Congress.

Democrats, who campaigned relentlessly last year on the theme of a Republican culture of corruption, introduced the proposed ethics rules as part of a week of choreography designed to deliver the message that they did not intend to do business as usual in Washington. In some cases, like restrictions on the use of corporate jets, the rules on gifts and travel by lobbyists go further than what Democrats had pledged earlier.

Another part of the Democrats' package called for detailed disclosure of pet projects or special-interest tax benefits that individual lawmakers insert into major bills. On Wednesday, President Bush jumped into the debate on such spending projects, called earmarks, urging that their number and cost be cut in half this year, a proposal that Democrats immediately rejected.

The ethics issue continued to reverberate Wednesday, officially the last day of Republican control. Two House Republicans, Representative Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania and Tom Feeney of Florida, agreed to pay for trips that the ethics committee determined had been improperly paid for by outside interests.

Mr. Feeney's case involved a $5,640 trip to Scotland originally paid for by Jack Abramoff, the now-imprisoned lobbyist who was at the center of the Congressional corruption scandals. Mr. Weldon, who was defeated for re-election, will pay $23,000 for an undisclosed trip.

The rules changes would also take aim at the so-called K Street Project, the effort associated with the hardball tactics of the former Republican leader Tom DeLay, to pressure trade groups and lobbying firms to hire Republicans or face the legislative consequences. The proposal would prohibit lawmakers and staff members from trying to exert partisan influence on hiring decisions.

"I think this package is more than a good-faith effort," said Meredith McGehee, policy director of the Campaign Legal Center, an ethics group. Referring to the incoming House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, Ms. McGehee said, "If these rule changes are any indication, she is serious."

DOJ_NMG_0112149

But the ethics rules do not address the most valuable gifts that come from lobbyists and others interested in legislation: campaign donations. And the Democratic Party's fund-raising machine — revved up by the advantages of being in the majority — continued apace this week with individual members inviting lobbyists and other contributors to a host of events.

On Thursday night, Mrs. Pelosi is having a $1,000-a-head fund-raiser with performances by Tony Bennett, Carole King, Wyclef Jean and the surviving members of the Grateful Dead. "Ms. Pelosi is a huge Dead fan," her spokeswoman said.

Senator Richard J. Durbin was among those who stopped by a reception Wednesday evening for a fellow Illinois Democrat, Representative Melissa Bean, who won a close and expensive re-election race in November. The reception, at Johnny's Half Shell, a restaurant on Capitol Hill popular with lobbyists and lawmakers, drew lobbyists from both parties.

As they prepared for the pomp and festivities that will mark the Capitol Hill power switch, Democrats got a taste of the potential difficulties of governing with thin majorities in the House and Senate as well as a Republican White House and a presidential election two years off.

While Democrats sought to introduce their ethics legislation at a news conference, the antiwar activist Cindy Sheehan and others interrupted with chants of "Troops home now; de-escalate, investigate." The scene vividly illustrated the pressure that Democrats will face from the left wing of their party to challenge President Bush more aggressively on Iraq. Ms. Sheehan and other antiwar advocates felt they contributed to the Democrats' takeover of Congress.

At the same time, Republicans made clear they intend to hold Democrats accountable for their pledge to allow more minority party participation in legislation. They assailed Democrats' plans to push through major legislation right away without allowing Republican alternatives. Though the Republicans severely limited Democrats' input when they were in charge, they rejected accusations that they were hypocritical.

"The important point here is that the American people were promised a new way of doing business in the United States Congress," said Representative Adam H. Putnam of Florida, chairman of the House Republican Conference.

Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the new majority leader, said Republicans would get their chance after Democrats disposed of legislation on national security, minimum wage, prescription drug costs, stem cell research, student loan costs and energy.

"We said to the American people, 'If you elect us, if you put us in charge, this is what we are going to do and we are going to do it in the first 100 hours,' " Mr. Hoyer told reporters.

Democrats were dogged by technical difficulties when a changeover in House Web sites delayed the formal posting of their ethics proposal.

The Senate will convene Thursday as well, with Democrats and Republicans meeting first in an unofficial closed-door session in the old Senate chambers to try to find some common ground. Aides said the Senate was going to take up its own ethics package next week, allowing a week or more of floor debate to shape legislation.

Besides the rules barring lawmakers from accepting gifts, meals or trips from lobbyists or the organizations that employ them, the House Democratic plan would also require preapproval from the Ethics Committee for any trips paid for by other outside groups aside from educational institutions.

On the subject of corporate jets, Democrats had previously discussed raising the rate at which lawmakers reimburse corporations or other sponsors for flights, but still allowing use of the jets. But the rules proposed Wednesday would bar lawmakers from any use of corporate jets.

Previous Democratic and Republican proposals about shedding light on earmarks, the pet projects lawmakers insert into major spending bills, left large loopholes, particularly in regard to military contracts.

In contrast, the new rules appear to apply to all spending earmarks as well as tax or tariff provisions that benefit fewer than 10 companies or people. They would also require disclosure of such items in each bill as well as the individual sponsors.

The rules would further require each House member requesting an earmark or limited tax provision to certify that he or she would not profit from the provision.

Democratic leaders also said that in February they would take up potential new restrictions on members of Congress and staff members becoming lobbyists, and that in March they would consider creating an outside panel to enforce the ethics rules — a step that lawmakers of both parties have resisted.

DOJ_NMG_0112150

President Bush called for the Democrats to adopt even more drastic restrictions on earmarks, a perennial bane to executive branch officials who resent Congressional meddling in their budgets.

"One important message we all should take from the elections is that people want to end the secretive process by which Washington insiders are able to get billions of dollars directed to projects, many of them pork barrel projects that have never been reviewed or voted on by the Congress," Mr. Bush said. He called on Democrats to require "full disclosure" of "the costs, the recipients, and the justifications for every earmark" as well as sponsors.

For New Congress, A Long 'To Do' List (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON

Sweeping back into power in both the House and Senate, Democrats Thursday launch a 100-hour legislative blitz to signal new management on Capitol Hill.

Early action will come mainly from the House of Representatives, where a 31-seat margin gives Democrats - led by Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the nation's first female speaker - more room to maneuver than in the Senate, where Democrats have just a two-seat margin.

Most items on House Democrats' early-action agenda had been rejected by the previous 109th Congress, when Republicans ruled. Among them are pocketbook issues that, Democratic leaders say, will directly impact the lives of Americans: a higher minimum wage, lower interest rates on student loans, and a provision to empower the government to negotiate lower prescription-drug prices for seniors.

Other measures slated for the fast track, which are popular among voters and have support from at least some Republican lawmakers, include more federal funding for stem-cell research, reduced subsidies for big oil companies, and implementation of more recommendations of the 9/11 Commission.

At the same time, Democrats feel pressure - from their own caucus as well as from outside groups - to take up the tough issues that won them their majority, such as finding an exit strategy for the war in Iraq. That begins first in the Senate, where Democrats plan to begin hearings next week on the Iraq war, in anticipation of President Bush's expected announcement of a "new way forward" in Iraq.

The blitz on the House side begins Thursday with rule changes to break with the lobbyist scandals of the 109th Congress and ensure a more open government. Incoming Speaker Pelosi says the new ethics rules will change the GOP "auction house" back to the people's House, and give some rights to the minority.

Democrats campaigned to end the "culture of corruption" in Washington.

The House reform package would ban gifts and meals from lobbyists and the organizations that employ them, require pre-approval from the ethics committee for travel paid for by outside groups, prohibit the official use of corporate jets, require full disclosure of all earmarks, and consider creating an outside group to enforce ethics laws.

It also guarantees certain rights to the minority party, including adequate notice of meetings and time to review legislation.

But even before the final details on the new ethics rules were released, Republicans charged that they had been left out of the process - and hadn't seen a draft of proposed rules changes until a day before the vote.

"The idea that these are issues that have been around for a long time and that they don't need debate, that doesn't pass muster," said minority whip Roy Blunt (R) of Missouri at a press briefing Wednesday.

Other members concur. "You either believe in minority rights or you don't," says Jo Maney, a spokeswoman for Rep. David Dreier (R) of California, the outgoing chairman of the Rules Committee.

"When Republicans took control of the House in 1995 after 42 years, they pledged to restore minority rights by ending proxy voting and guaranteeing Democrats a vote on their own alternative bills. But with their slim majorities, Republicans often ruled out Democratic amendments on bills and held 15-minute votes open until GOP leaders could change the outcome on the floor.

In the new Congress, Republicans say they have no guarantee of a vote for their version of legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0112151

Senate Democrats, meanwhile, also plan to lead off with lobby and ethics reform this week, but will take more time for debate.

In the last Congress, the Senate passed a version of lobby reform by a 98 to 8 vote, but never reconciled its differences with the House over a final version of the bill. The Senate bill banned all gifts and meals from lobbyists and required lawmakers to wait two years before accepting lobby jobs after leaving Congress.

"The Senate passed a bill last year that will be the starter," says Jim Manley, a spokesman for incoming majority leader Harry Reid.

On the day before Congress officially convened, President Bush who will be working with a Democratic Congress for the first time in his tenure, called on lawmakers to make fiscal restraint a priority. He also asked Congress for the line-item veto, which would permit him to cut specific spending from legislation without vetoing the entire bill. He asked lawmakers to cut back on earmarks, or pet projects, and extend tax cuts. Bush said he will present Congress with a budget proposal next month that would balance the federal budget by 2012.

House Democrats already plan to make fiscal restraint a centerpiece of their agenda. They will vote to require pay-as-you-go budget rules as part of their "honest leadership, open government" rules package.

The Democratic caucus includes a record 44 members of the Blue Dog coalition of fiscal conservatives, who are expected to weigh in against unfunded new spending by freer-spending Democrats.

"We know that these moderates make the difference between being in the majority and being in the minority, and they will be given deference," said Rep. John Spratt (D) of South Carolina, incoming chairman of the House Budget Committee, in an interview on C-SPAN Wednesday. He has led House opposition to soaring budget deficits in the Bush years.

First Act For Dems Is Ethics Cleanup (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democrats take control of the House today for the first time in a dozen years and plan as their first act to tackle a problem that helped them oust the Republicans in November: potential corruption involving lobbyists.

The changes range from a total ban on gifts and meals from lobbyists to greater restrictions on lawmakers' travel.

Efforts to cut down on the special projects that lawmakers add, often secretly, to spending bills, face a tougher battle. President Bush on Wednesday called for Congress to reduce the number and cost of those projects, known as earmarks, by half in the next year.

"Earmarks often divert precious funds from vital priorities like national defense," Bush said.

The ethics changes proposed by House Democrats would not limit earmarks. Instead, they would require lawmakers to disclose the special projects and declare in writing whether they or their spouses have financial stakes in the projects. Tax breaks that benefit 10 or fewer people also would be disclosed.

Incoming Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., predicted there would be fewer earmarks in the Democratic Congress because of new rules. But he said Congress should retain the power to funnel money to specific projects. "Every president would like to say to Congress, 'Only the president can add (projects),' " Hoyer said. "That would substantially skew the relationship and undermine the independence of the U.S. Congress."

Spending watchdog David Williams of Citizens Against Government Waste said the new transparency is a good step. But "Democrats are still politicians and … the main way to get elected is to get pork," he said. For his part, Bush had "ample opportunity" to offer ways to clamp down on earmarks during his presidency but failed to do so, Williams said.

The number of earmarks and their price tag has grown dramatically in recent years. Williams' group reports that the pork-barrel spending has nearly tripled in the last decade to $29 billion in 2006.

Incoming Democratic leaders said the rules changes are designed to clean up a Congress buffeted by corruption charges that have led to investigations of several lawmakers and jail terms for former Republican congressman Duke Cunningham of California and former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

DOJ_NMG_0112152

"We're bringing back a Congress we can be proud of," said Rep. Louise Slaughter, D-N.Y., who will lead the panel that oversees rules for House members.

Other House Democratic changes would:

•Ban gifts and meals from lobbyists. Current rules set a $100 limit on gifts and meals from the same person in one year.

•Trips organized and paid for by lobbyists also would be limited. Lawmakers still could travel at expense of colleges and foundations that want to influence public policy, but the travel would have to be approved beforehand by the House ethics panel.

•Bar congressional travel on corporate jets.

Democratic leaders have decided to delay until March a decision on whether to create an outside body to investigate and help enforce ethics violations.

Democrats Promise Action On Ethics, Iraq (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 4, 2007

Congressional Democrats stepped hungrily to the brink of power on Wednesday, promising immediate action to limit the influence of lobbyists and constant prodding of the Bush administration to bring U.S. troops home from Iraq.

President Bush pushed back against the political opposition as he contemplated divided government for his final two years in the White House. He said he would soon propose a five-year plan to balance the budget, and he challenged Democrats to avoid passing "bills that are simply political" statements.

"There is nothing political about finding a policy to end the war in Iraq, raising the minimum wage, achieving energy independence or helping kids afford college," shot back Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, due to become majority leader at the stroke of noon on Thursday. "In fact, politics has prevented progress on these issues for too many years."

Even as they prepared to take control of Congress, Democrats received a brusque reminder that they face pressure from the political left as well as resistance from Republicans.

At one point during the day, Rep. Rahm Emanuel, a member of the Democratic leadership, was addressing reporters when he was loudly interrupted by Cindy Sheehan and other anti-war activists. "De-escalate, investigate, troops home now!" they shouted, while he smiled gamely.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, in line to become the nation's first female House speaker, spent much of her day at ceremonial events. She attended a Catholic Mass in remembrance of the children of Darfur and Katrina, then a tea in her honor.

That left it to her lieutenants to outline plans for the Democrats' initial stretch in the majority.

Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the incoming majority leader, said the first six bills and a series of stiffer ethics rules would be passed within two weeks.

The first step, he said, would take place by early evening on Thursday, and consist of several measures crafted in response to the scandals that weakened Republicans in last fall's elections.

In addition to expanding restrictions on privately financed trips enjoyed by lawmakers, House Democrats said they will prohibit travel on corporate jets and require greater disclosure of earmarks, the pet projects inserted into legislation at the behest of individual lawmakers.

The rules do not prohibit lawmakers from taking trips financed by foundations that seek to influence public opinion. Those trips will require pre-approval from the ethics committee.

Current rules ban congressional travel paid for by lobbyists or foreign governments, and violations of the existing restrictions played heavily in the scandal involving Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Democrats appeared to backtrack from their campaign-season pledge in at least one area. They were sharply critical last year of Republicans for keeping a roll call vote open for hours so leaders could find enough votes to pass Medicare legislation. But rather than ban the practice, the proposed new rule declares that a vote "shall not be held open for the sole purpose of reversing the outcome."

Two months after the voters ordered a change in congressional control, Democrats and Republicans in the House and Senate, as well as Bush, pledged to work in a bipartisan spirit.

DOJ_NMG_0112153

"Democrats are committed to working with Republicans to get results," Reid wrote in a memo distributed to the party's rank-and-file. He said an unprecedented all-senators meeting set for Thursday morning would "allow us to start off on the right foot, as colleagues instead of adversaries."

Those promises could scarcely obscure the political jockeying under way.

After long pledging a new era of civility and openness in the House, Democrats said they would not allow Republicans the chance to amend any of the first half-dozen bills to be brought to a vote during the first 100 hours of the new Congress. The measures relate to the minimum wage, stem cell research, energy, student loans and recommendations by the commission that investigated the terrorist attacks of 2001.

"We view the first 100 hours as essentially a mandate from the American people," Hoyer told reporters, explaining the decision to safeguard those measures from Republican attack.

Republicans were quick to complain — after spending years ignoring Democratic complaints along the same lines. Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif., sent Democrats a letter saying they were violating promises Pelosi had made to allow a "fair debate consisting of a full amendment process that grants the minority the right to offer its alternatives, including a substitute."

More broadly, Republican leaders lined up to support Bush's call for a balanced budget by 2012 while protecting tax cuts passed while they held power.

"In February, the president will submit a budget to Congress that will grow the economy by making tax cuts for working families permanent, and I support those efforts," said Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the incoming Republican leader.

Bush said at the White House that his proposal "will restrain spending while setting priorities. It will address the most urgent needs of our nation, in particular the need to protect ourselves from radicals and terrorists, the need to win the war on terror, the need to maintain a strong national defense and the need to keep this economy growing by making tax relief permanent."

"We welcome the president's newfound commitment to a balanced budget, but his comments make us wary," said Rep. John Spratt of South Carolina, the incoming Democratic chairman of the House Budget Committee. "We will simply have to scrutinize the president's budget when it comes next month to see if the rhetoric matches reality."

New Congress, Leftover Challenge (NYT)

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

The nation should welcome the ambitious agenda being offered today by the new Congress's Democratic majority, from raising the minimum wage to advancing stem cell research to restoring oversight of the executive branch. But the real test for the 110th Congress will be its willingness to clean up its own act by adopting forceful and credible ethics reform. That is what the Democratic leadership promised voters. Any hesitation will be rightly seen as a cynical re-endorsement of the Capitol's lobbyist-enabling, corruption-steeped business as usual.

Congress's ethics rules have been rife with loopholes and wrist-slapping punishments that grease rather than police the quid pro quo world of Washington. Fixing some of these problems requires nothing more than a majority vote on the House or Senate rules.

House Democrats appear ready to start with a firm, and long needed, ban on gifts, entertainment and junket travel — including low-cost V.I.P. rides on corporate jets — arranged by lobbyists or their clients. The ban should cover staffers as well, and the Senate should match it. Even that will require wary monitoring, particularly of a provision that would allow members preapproved day trips for speeches, with travel paid by non-lobbying groups.

Both houses should also bar Congressional alumni and other lobbyists from the debating floors and other Capitol inner sanctums. And members of Congress with other ambitions should be blocked from slyly negotiating lucrative private jobs while they're still on the public's payroll and sworn to defend the public's interest. There should be early disclosure of all job feelers.

The back-scratching closeness of politicians seeking campaign donations and deep-pocket interests seeking favors is a capital disgrace. Part of the solution is to douse their dealings with sunshine through prompt and detailed filing disclosures. And there should be full disclosure of the cornucopia of "earmarks" — costly favors inserted without debate or any requirement to disclose authorship in mammoth spending bills. Earmark authors and beneficiaries should be unmasked in time to be mocked by taxpayers.

DOJ_NMG_0112154

Broader reforms will require longer legislative debate, not just a rule change. Paramount is the need to create an independent office for ethics enforcement to end the clubbiness that more often than not covers up or excuses abuses. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has ordered a bipartisan study of this vital proposal by March. We expect this overdue step to receive the forceful support of Ms. Pelosi and Harry Reid, the Senate majority leader. The voters are watching, and lawmakers dare not slip away from the promise to clean up their act.

A Chance To Change The Game (WP)

By Barack Obama

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

This past Election Day, the American people sent a clear message to Washington: Clean up your act.

After a year in which too many scandals revealed the influence special interests wield over Washington, it's no surprise that so many incumbents were defeated and that polls said "corruption" was the grievance cited most frequently by the voters.

It would be a mistake, however, to conclude that this message was intended for only one party or politician. The votes hadn't even been counted in November before we heard reports that corporations were already recruiting lobbyists with Democratic connections to carry their water in the next Congress.

That's why it's not enough to just change the players. We have to change the game.

Americans put their faith in Democrats because they want us to restore their faith in government -- and that means more than window dressing when it comes to ethics reform.

Last year, I was hopeful that scandals would finally shame Congress into meaningful ethics legislation. But after the headlines faded, so did the enthusiasm for reform. In the end, I found myself voting against the final ethics bill because it was too weak and unresponsive to the obvious need for comprehensive reform.

This time around, we must do more.

We must stop any and all practices that would lead a reasonable person to believe that a public servant has become indebted to a lobbyist. That means a full ban on gifts and meals. It means no free travel or subsidized travel on private jets. And it means closing the revolving door to ensure that Capitol Hill service -- whether as a member of Congress or as a staffer -- isn't all about lining up a high-paying lobbying job. We should no longer tolerate a House committee chairman shepherding the Medicare prescription drug bill through Congress at the same time he's negotiating for a job as the pharmaceutical industry's top lobbyist.

But real reform also means real enforcement. We need to finally take the politics and the partisanship out of ethics investigations. Whether or not the House ethics committee has been covering for its colleagues, the secrecy with which its members have operated has led people to question why legislators who are serving jail time were not caught and stopped by the committee in the first place. It's led people to wonder why Congress cannot seem to police itself.

I have long proposed a nonpartisan, independent ethics commission that would act as the American people's public watchdog over Congress. The commission would be staffed with former judges and former members of Congress from both parties, and it would allow any citizen to report possible ethics violations by lawmakers, staff members or lobbyists. Once a potential violation is reported, the commission would have the authority to conduct investigations, issue subpoenas, gather records, call witnesses, and provide a report to the Justice Department or the House and Senate ethics committees that -- unlike current ethics committee reports -- is available for all citizens to read.

This would improve the current process in two ways. First, it would take politics out of the fact-finding phase of ethics investigations. Second, it would exert greater public pressure on Congress to punish wrongdoing quickly and severely. Others have proposed similar good ideas on enforcement, and I am open to all options. We must restore the American people's confidence in the ethics process by ensuring that political self-interest can no longer prevent politicians from enforcing ethics rules.

The truth is, we cannot change the way Washington works unless we first change the way Congress works. On Nov. 7, voters gave Democrats the chance to do this. But if we miss this opportunity to clean up our act and restore this country's faith in government, the American people might not give us another one.

DOJ_NMG_0112155

The writer is a Democratic senator from Illinois.

An Ethics Down Payment (WP)

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

THE ETHICS package unveiled by House Democrats yesterday represents a significant down payment on the promise to end the "culture of corruption." It would prohibit lawmakers and staff members from accepting gifts -- meals, entertainment and the like -- from lobbyists and organizations that employ lobbyists. It would prohibit lawmakers from taking cut-rate corporate jet flights for official or campaign travel, ending one of the most delicious perks of congressional leadership. It would dramatically curtail free trips.

Travel paid for by lobbyists or organizations that lobby would be prohibited in most instances; of such travel, only trips subsidized by universities or lasting a single day (with an overnight stay) would be permitted. We would have preferred an outright ban on such travel, as Democrats originally promised. Still, this formulation would eliminate the most abusive travel-as-free-vacation. Similarly, the proposal seeks to limit the potential for abusing travel paid for by nonprofit entities by requiring advance approval from the ethics committee, limiting lobbyists' involvement in such trips and preventing funds from other sources from being earmarked to pay for the travel (as with the golfing junkets arranged by lobbyist Jack Abramoff).

We would have liked to see more. For example, while ending gifts from lobbyists, the rules don't crack down on their ability to host glitzy convention parties to "honor" lawmakers. It makes little sense to bar a free lunch but permit a lavish party. In addition, spouses of lawmakers and staff members would remain free to tag along on trips, all expenses paid. There's no justification for permitting this freebie.

The key to the effectiveness of all these rules changes will be in their implementation, which is the challenge awaiting Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). One issue is how diligent the ethics committee will be in screening travel requests. Another is how ethics enforcement will be strengthened. Ms. Pelosi has said she will name a panel to look into creating some kind of independent ethics arm; one such model is discussed on the opposite page today by Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.). As the lackluster performance of the ethics committee over the past several years has shown, some such change is critical. Ethics rules that are not vigorously overseen and enforced are not worth the Congressional Record they're printed in.

The Democrats' Agenda (USAT)

USA Today, January 4, 2007

The most brazen failure of the previous Congress was its arrogant refusal to take its ethics lapses as seriously as voters did. Somehow, the spectacle of lawmakers being indicted and sent to prison failed to move GOP leaders to crack down on a seamy world in which lobbyists routinely shower members with meals, gifts and trips.

Now Democrats promise the discipline Republicans never got around to. Rules they unveiled late Wednesday, and plan to adopt today, include bans on lobbyist gifts and meals and most privately funded travel, with modest and seemingly legitimate exceptions.

In a major change, members would no longer be able to hitch rides on corporate jets, a beloved but outrageous perk that has afforded members elite level travel and given lobbyists priceless access.

This is a step forward, but if it is the only step it will not be enough. Money rules in Washington because even the most ethical candidates need wads of it to get elected and those of lesser principle are easily seduced by lobbyists' solicitations. Public financing of campaigns would have greater impact and is an idea that should be pursued later on.

Eye On The Clock, House Democrats Put Their Focus On '100 Hours' (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

It sure sounds like a race against time. Democrats have given themselves a mere 100 hours to break the bonds between lobbyist and lawmaker, boost homeland security, raise the minimum wage, fund stem cell research, lower prescription drug prices, slash student loan interest rates and free the country from its dependence on international oil.

DOJ_NMG_0112156

A hundred hours to pass at least eight significant pieces of legislation and rule changes -- 4.17 days! Heck, Republicans had all year to pass 11 routine spending bills and managed only two. But, hey, who's really counting?

"We think we'll do it in less than a hundred hours," boasted incoming House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) in a fit of bravado yesterday. "But," he added, "it all depends on how you're counting a hundred hours."

To begin with, if you're a House Democrat, you don't start the clock running today, when the 110th Congress is sworn in and voting begins, or even tomorrow, when a package of measures reaches the floor to rein in fiscal profligacy. You fire the starting gun on Tuesday, six days into the 110th Congress. Now that's a head start.

Then you count only legislative hours, that is, the hours that the House is actually in session and voting. Forget the weekends, the night hours, Martin Luther King Day on Jan. 15, or, for that matter, the next day, when votes don't start until well after sundown.

If all goes according to plan, the House will get through its hundred-hour agenda in 15 days, or 360 hours, by standard definition. Today, the House will take up an ethics package. Tomorrow, new budget controls. On Tuesday, the House will enact most of the security recommendations of the bipartisan commission that examined the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. On Wednesday, the minimum wage goes up. On Thursday, it's federal funding for stem cell research, and on Friday, Democrats intend to give the government the authority to negotiate drug prices for Medicare. On Jan. 17, interest rates for student borrowers will be slashed, and on Jan. 18, tax breaks for Big Oil will go by the wayside, making room for alternative energy research.

That may not be 100 hours, but let's not be too literal about these things. After all, the Bible tells us that Abraham died at 175; his wife, Sarah, gave birth to Isaac at the matronly age of 90; and Noah made it to age 950. Talk about a drain on the Social Security system.

Majority Playing The Name Game (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, January 4, 2007

A Democratic majority may mean a new direction on big issues such as the Iraq war, immigration and trade. But before addressing such profound matters, Democrats will make a few decidedly more superficial changes to distinguish the 110th Congress from the 109th, when Republicans ran things.

Democrats, organizing their new majority this week, plan to tweak the names of several committees and subcommittees, in addition to altering the lobbying and congressional travel rules that are also part of the initial rules package.

What's in a name? Some changes seem to reflect a personal preference rather than indicate sweeping policy changes. The Committee on International Relations, for example, will once again be called the Committee on Foreign Affairs. New chairman Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) wanted the change in order to preserve the "traditions and history" of the committee, which for most of its life has gone by the Foreign Affairs title, said committee spokeswoman Lynne Weil.

But a new label can be more than mere wordplay, potentially signaling a change in the political priorities, responsibilities or emphases of a committee and its members.

The most salient change may be to the Committee of Government Reform, which will add the word "oversight" to its title. Democrats have accused House Republicans of going easy on the Bush administration. The "oversight" addition not only returns the committee name to its moniker under the last Democratic majority, but no doubt indicates the committee will serve as one of the more active investigative arms of Congress (see related story).

The Armed Services Committee keeps its name, but the Tactical Air and Land Forces subcommittee drops "tactical" to become the Air and Land Forces subcommittee.

Perhaps more substantive, the committee is adding an oversight and investigation subcommittee, which Republicans ditched when they took over.

Name changes typically accompany a shift in control of Congress, although committee names have been adopted after a change in chairmanship, or to reflect shifts in jurisdiction.

Republicans changed the name of the Education and Labor Committee to Education and the Workforce, even though Republicans were responsible for creating the Education and Labor Committee in the first place.

DOJ_NMG_0112157

Jehu Baker, an Illinois Republican, introduced a resolution to create the committee in 1867, declaring that "in view of the greater liberty and larger recognition of manhood which have followed the suppression of the rebellion, it is eminently fitting that the Government should be placed, if possible, in a better relation to the working people of the country," according to the National Archives website.

In years since, labor became a key Democratic ally, a fact underscored by the return to the old name under new chairman George Miller (D-Calif.).

In addition, the House Resources Committee will forthwith be known as the House Natural Resources Committee. The Science Committee will become the House Science and Technology Committee.

The Constitution does not mention committees, giving the House and Senate the authority to write their own procedural rules. Standing committees and their powers are defined in the rules adopted by each body.

One committee name with staying power has been the House Ways and Means Committee, the oldest standing committee in Congress. A select committee in the first Congress, Ways and Means earned permanent status in 1802. (The phrase "ways and means" is even older, used in the English Parliament and in colonial and state legislatures before Congress was established.)

As the only standing committee at that time, Ways and Means originally had broad authority, which included not only the power to raise revenue but also the power to spend it.

The Appropriations Committee wasn't established until after the Civil War, according to the National Archives. "It is utterly impossible in the present condition of our finances that our committee can do all this labor," an Ohio Democrat, Rep. Samuel Cox, said, according to the National Archives.

In 1946, Congress adopted broad changes to the committee structure. The act reduced the number of standing committees by consolidating jurisdictions, while also increasing the number of subcommittees, according to the Encyclopedia of Congress.

Rep. Frank Opens Door To Business (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Businesses wondering how to deal with the Democrats taking charge in Congress today have a blunt offer from a top lawmaker in the majority: Support our priorities and we'll support yours.

The "grand bargain" laid out by Rep. Barney Frank represents a road map to how Democrats may strike deals to aid unionization, expand health-care coverage and find common ground on other issues, while giving businesses concessions on immigration, trade and investment.

In practice, it may be difficult for Mr. Frank either to deliver his party's side of the deal or find a partner with whom to bargain. Still, the Massachusetts Democrat's remarks may represent a guiding philosophy to how Capitol Hill's new majority will try to use popular unease over growing income inequality, flat wages and soaring executive pay as fuel for legislative priorities. Many Democrats exploited those concerns in winning November's midterm elections. (See related article.1)

"There are two outcomes possible," Mr. Frank said yesterday in a speech at the National Press Club. "Either people will join with us in solving the health-care problem, getting a humane immigration policy, good rules that welcome responsible foreign investment, going forward with trade with reasonable...environmental and labor standards, allowing people to join a union, and we will then be able to go forward in a pro-growth way, engage with the rest of the world, implement productivity-enhancing technology."

Alternatively, he said, conservatives can "continue...union busting" and leave a growing number of people without health care. "Then people should not be surprised when there is no renewal of trading authority, if you have resistance to sensible immigration policy. That's the choice that has to be made."

Mr. Frank takes over as chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, giving him formal sway over key business concerns ranging from regulation of mortgage companies Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac and executive pay, but not big issues such as trade, taxes and health care. That means his influence may be as much philosophical as practical.

DOJ_NMG_0112158

His influence "is more as a thinker than someone who has a big stick," says Andy Laperriere, a policy analyst for the brokerage firm ISI Group Inc. "In terms of who Democrats look to for someone who thinks about important economic issues, Frank is influential."

But, Mr. Laperriere said, "It's not clear how such a grand bargain can be agreed to on the business-community side. Exactly who is the business community? Thousands of major companies and hundreds of trade associations." Furthermore, he noted that some things business might agree to are anathema to Republicans.

Still, lobbyist Vin Weber said, "I would give more credence to this coming from Barney Frank than just about anybody else." Mr. Weber, a former Republican congressman from Minnesota who served with Mr. Frank, said he has credibility with liberal Democrats, "which is where the rub would come in terms of striking any kind of accommodation with the business community."

Some of Mr. Frank's proposals are largely symbolic: He plans hearings over the next two years on the causes, consequences and responses to increased inequality and weak wage growth. He also warned Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke against blaming higher wages for inflation.

More specifically, Mr. Frank wants to pass a bill allowing unions to organize workplaces when a majority of employees sign cards indicating their interest in a union. That would strip employers of the ability to call in federal regulators to oversee a secret ballot. The bill will speed unionization efforts and is a huge priority for labor groups, but it falls outside Mr. Frank's authority.

He has signaled a willingness to support renewing the president's authority to negotiate trade deals and then submit them to Congress for only an up-or-down vote, which expires this summer, but he wants those deals to contain environmental and worker protections. Trade deals, however, are under the jurisdiction of the Ways and Means Committee, headed by New York Rep. Charles Rangel.

In a telephone interview, Mr. Frank acknowledged his limitations. "What I'm trying to do is create a political climate where this sort of thing would be possible," he said.

Where his committee does have oversight, Mr. Frank said he is taking a cooperative approach. Mr. Frank said he would once again work with Donald Evans, former Commerce Secretary under President Bush and the current head of the Financial Services Forum, to pass rules governing the Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States. (The House passed legislation last year but it stalled in the Senate.) That committee has begun more tightly screening foreign purchases of U.S. companies after an uproar derailed a Dubai-based company's takeover of some U.S. ports.

Mr. Frank plans to reintroduce a bill tightening regulation of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac that died last year over administration demands that the companies limit the size of their mortgage portfolios. Mr. Frank said he also favors authorizing the Federal Housing Administration to insure pricier, and presumably safer, mortgages in higher-cost markets as a way to offset defaults by lower-income borrowers. He also will aim, as he did last year, to significantly curtail the ability of nonfinancial companies to own banks with federal deposit insurance in the event the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. doesn't do it.

Even if Mr. Frank is unable to shepherd many of his initiatives into law, he is still in a position to ensure that business priorities continue to stay bottled up in a divided congress. That, he suggested, should motivate business groups to compromise.

Democrats Hope To Take From Oil, Give To Green Energy (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 4, 2007

House Democrats are crafting an energy package that would roll back billions of dollars worth of oil drilling incentives, raise billions more by boosting federal royalties paid by oil and gas companies for offshore production, and plow the money into new tax breaks for renewable energy sources, congressional sources said yesterday.

Eager to paint themselves as different from the Bush administration and the past Republican majority, Democratic leaders are targeting a manufacturing tax cut in 2004 that they say gave unneeded incentives to the oil industry, Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland said in a briefing yesterday. Hoyer said Democrats are also planning to force oil companies to pay royalties on deepwater Gulf of Mexico tracts leased in 1998 and 1999; the Interior Department has said that the leases inadvertently failed to include provisions for royalty payments once oil prices rose above certain thresholds.

DOJ_NMG_0112159

The repeal of the 2004 tax cuts for the oil and gas industry would generate nearly $5 billion, Democratic lawmakers said, quoting estimates by the Joint Committee on Taxation. The royalty payments would yield between $9 billion and $11 billion, Hoyer said.

But energy industry and congressional sources said that the details of the package remain in flux, in part because of disagreements among Democrats over how the revenue would be used and whether to also roll back oil and gas industry incentives in the Energy Policy Act of 2005, which was supported by many Democrats.

Democratic leaders said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi would introduce the energy package on Jan. 18, toward the end of the "100 hours" of legislative initiatives.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel and House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell want to be able to hold hearings before some of the key details of such a package are set. As a result, Pelosi will probably introduce the revenue-raising components first and set aside the money in a "fund" to be divvied up later.

Renewable energy lobbyists said that would set off a feeding frenzy among boosters of hydropower, nuclear, biofuel, geothermal and solar energy. Solar producers, for example, have a proposal to expand and extend tax credits for residential solar installations for eight years, which would cost $400 million.

"The Democrats are appropriately shifting money from the 20th-century technologies to the 21st-century industries," said Rhone Resch, president of the Solar Energy Industries Association. "If we want to see solar, wind and biofuels, we have to make that investment today."

Figuring out how to distribute incentives for renewable energy could be controversial. Some Democratic House members want to exclude nuclear power. Some renewable-energy advocates fear that Congress will scramble to provide too many incentives for corn-based ethanol production.

Pelosi's staff has asked the Congressional Budget Office to estimate revenue from several proposals, most based on ones introduced last year by Democratic lawmakers, including Reps. Maurice D. Hinchey (N.Y.), Edward J. Markey (Mass.), Jim McDermott (Wash.) and Brian Higgins (N.Y.).

McDermott's would alter the 2004 tax cut, which was adopted as a way to stimulate job growth by effectively trimming tax rates for a broad range of U.S. manufacturers, agriculture and extractive industries. Mark Kibbe, senior tax analyst for the American Petroleum Institute, said that when fully phased in by 2009 the provision would trim the corporate tax rate from 35 percent to 32 percent. McDermott's bill would eliminate the break for the oil and gas industry.

"From the perspective of our industry, it helped make U.S. oil and gas exploration projects or refining projects more cost-competitive with those abroad," Kibbe said.

The most likely change in the Energy Policy Act of 2005 would be the repeal of a clause that allowed oil companies to deduct geological and geophysical exploration costs instead of treating them as capital expenditures to be amortized over a longer period of time, said congressional aides and environmental lobbyists. This change would generate less than $1 billion in revenue over 10 years, they estimated.

A variety of proposals would target the question of royalties on the 1998 and 1999 Gulf of Mexico leases. (The Justice Department is investigating possible relationships between Interior Department officials and oil companies that received the leases, said two sources briefed on the investigations last month.)

Five companies representing about a quarter of the leases in dispute agreed last month to insert price thresholds for future royalty payments, but another four dozen firms have not agreed to change the terms of those leases.

"There are a lot of issues with that, such as the sanctity of contracts," said API's Kibbe. "The API doesn't think it's a bad idea to renegotiate contracts, as long as both parties think it's a good idea. "

But Democratic and many Republican lawmakers are adamant on the issue. Markey and Hinchey would bar companies that refuse to renegotiate those leases from getting any future leases on federal lands or in federal waters. Pelosi's office has even discussed a proposal made last year by then-GOP congressman Richard W. Pombo, who wanted to impose a $9-a-barrel "conservation fee" on oil produced in federal waters by companies that refused to renegotiate the 1998 and '99 leases.

"It deprives the American people of the production they own," Hinchey said. "If they think it's too expensive, we should leave it there."

DOJ_NMG_0112160

Many House Democrats also want to prod oil companies into making back payments on the disputed leases. Those back payments could amount to $900 million to $2 billion, according to the General Accounting Office.

Environmental groups were happy. "The oil and gas bill is a clear departure from the previous Congress's infatuation with oil and gas handouts," said Erich Pica of Friends of the Earth.

Dems To Push Part D; Opponents' Lobbies Ready For Medicare Battle (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, January 4, 2007

Although the House Democratic leadership plans to move swiftly to pass legislation requiring direct federal negotiation of prescription drug prices under Medicare, opponents of the policy expect the battle to continue in the coming months.

By taking immediate action on the Medicare Part D prescription-drug benefit as part of her "100 hours" agenda soon after the 110th Congress convenes today, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) will make it nearly impossible for drug makers, health-insurance companies and lobbies to stop the bill from passing.

Because the Democratic leadership also intends to skip the committee process and limit the Republican minority's ability to amend such early bills on the House floor, interest groups that want to obstruct additional federal involvement in Part D are looking forward.

Under the proposal, expected to hit the House floor as early as next week, the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) would be required to negotiate with drug manufacturers on the prices they charge Medicare for their products, although the legislation would be short on specifics, according to reports.

Many Democratic candidates, as part of a nationwide strategy, made bulk negotiation of drug prices under Medicare a recurrent theme of their campaigns. Republicans and their allies in the healthcare sector countered by pointing to the high levels of satisfaction with Part D that beneficiaries have reported to independent pollsters.

Under current law, HHS is expressly forbidden to participate in or influence negotiations between the private companies that administer Part D on behalf of the government.

The administration and congressional Republicans generally regard negotiations as tantamount to federal price-setting, a view shared by anxious drug makers.

President Bush and HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt have repeatedly rejected negotiations, arguing that the private health insurers and pharmacy benefit managers that administer Part D plans are doing a better job lowering prices than the government could.

In the past, the Congressional Budget Office has backed up these assertions, although other analyses, such as one issued in October by the Democratic staff of the House Government Reform Committee, conclude that the Department of Veterans Affairs and other federal agencies pay less for many commonly used medicines than Part D plans do.

Healthcare businesses that stand to lose from Democratic action on Part D, led by the pharmaceutical sector, responded to the Democrats' electoral victory in November by signing on additional Democratic lobbyists and preparing to play defense on the new majority's attempts to make changes to Part D.

The efforts are not expected to bear fruit during the early weeks of the 110th Congress, but lobbies are anticipating attempts by congressional Democrats to propose a larger role for HHS in the negotiation of drug prices.

Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.), who chairs the Ways and Means Committee's Health Subcommittee, has pledged his support for the narrow bill headed for the floor, but also has suggested that additional legislation on drug pricing should be considered under Medicare.

According to members of the health-insurance industry, the debate over Part D will last longer than 100 hours.

"Our function will be to continue to show that our plans are providing value" by offering affordable drug coverage to Medicare beneficiaries and bringing down the price of medicines, a spokesman for America's Health Insurance Plans, Mohit Ghose, said. "We're open to making improvements [to Part D] provided that we're not undermining the successes that we've already achieved."

DOJ_NMG_0112161

Affected healthcare lobbies also are looking forward to the Senate's consideration of the issue. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) joined Pelosi in promising during the campaign that Congress would pass legislation establishing federal negotiations of drug prices.

Such legislation faces less certain prospects in the more closely divided upper chamber. Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.), who was one of only two Democrats who helped draft the bill that created Part D, has not endorsed the leadership's plan.

Although Baucus has issued strong criticisms of the Bush administration's handling of the drug benefit, he does not share the view of many other Democrats that its structure is fundamentally flawed.

Moreover, Baucus has opposed legislation to establish HHS negotiation of drug prices. Twice last year, Baucus and Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) voted against such bills.

Business Mobilizes To Defend Turf (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon And John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

The industries that expect to take the biggest hits from the new Democratic Congress are scrambling their marketing, public-relations and advertising forces to shore up their defenses.

Eager to demonstrate a sharp contrast with Republicans who dominated Capitol Hill for 12 years, new Democratic leaders are vowing to raise the federal minimum wage; reduce oil-company subsidies; give the government bargaining authority in purchasing Medicare prescription drugs; shrink student-loan fees; and impose mandatory controls on emissions of carbon dioxide and other so-called greenhouse gases that contribute to climate change.

LOBBYING PUSH

• The News: Businesses plan campaigns to burnish their image as Democrats take control in Congress.

• What's at Stake: Billions of dollars in subsidies and other breaks for oil companies, prescription-drug makers, student-loan firms and small businesses.

• What's Next: House will pass several measures soon, but some may stall in the Senate.

The worried industries and their trade groups are responding by hiring new lobbying talent, planning mass-market ad campaigns and, in some cases, focusing on getting goodies attached to legislation that they would rather see killed but know they can't stop.

The petroleum industry, for example, is preparing an ad campaign that seeks to justify oil companies' huge size -- and profits. The drug industry is weighing a mass-media counterattack of its own, emphasizing the good performance of the Medicare prescription-drug program. Student-loan titan Sallie Mae is rallying grass-roots support from college administrators. Small-business representatives are talking up tax breaks to offset what appears to be an inevitable increase in the minimum wage.

Many businesses "are gearing up to respond" both to unfriendly legislation and to the prospect of congressional investigations, says George Crawford, a former top aide to new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi. Now with the law firm of King & Spalding in Washington, he has attracted some big new clients in recent months, including Exxon Mobil Corp. and drug maker Amgen Inc.

Many businesses may find it challenging to win new allies among congressional Democrats. The petroleum industry, for example, was demonized as "Big Oil" by Democrats last summer as gasoline prices soared. Now, it faces vows by Ms. Pelosi to move quickly to roll back oil-company subsidies and use the money to establish a fund for wind, solar and other alternative-energy sources.

Democrats are targeting breaks that include tax incentives for geologic research to find oil and favorable royalty deals for domestic oil production. While details remain in flux, some environmentalists estimate the changes would cost the industry $15 billion to $20 billion in the next decade.

In response, the American Petroleum Institute will wage an image-improvement campaign on television and in newspapers to show why Big Oil needs to be big. "We're now in a global market, whether people like it or not," says Red Cavaney, the group's president. The industry contends that private companies hold only about 6% of the world's oil reserves, and that to get access to more oil, companies need to form partnerships with government-owned oil companies, which sit on about 80% of proven reserves. To do that, Mr. Cavaney says, companies must show they have the capital and expensive oil-finding technology to produce the oil.

DOJ_NMG_0112162

Other energy interests are focused on highlighting the costs of climate-change proposals. The National Mining Association, which represents coal-mining companies and mining-equipment makers, recently met with about 20 staffers from the congressional energy committees to show off new tools the industry hopes lawmakers will use in writing legislation. One is a new computer model that, according to the association, calculates the cost of climate-change proposals. For example, a mandatory cap on coal emissions will produce higher electricity prices and job losses at companies that may have to shut down or move overseas because of rising energy costs, according to Luke Popovich, spokesman for the association.

The utilities lobby, lead by the Edison Electric Institute, will deal with emissions controls by emphasizing its efforts to promote energy efficiency and suggesting ways the government could help the industry get new technology that reduces pollution.

Drug companies and labor-intensive businesses such as retailers and restaurants also stand to lose out in the Democratic agenda. House Democrats have promised to pass an increase in the minimum wage to $7.25 from the current $5.15. They also have vowed to give the government the authority to bargain with pharmaceutical companies over Medicare drug prices. That was barred in a Republican-written law passed three years ago.

Already, critics of a minimum-wage increase, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, retailers and small-business groups, are sensing defeat and focusing on securing the best deal they can in whatever legislation passes. "We're working with the administration and members of both sides to minimize the damage," with offsets such as tax breaks and regulatory relief, says John Gay, senior vice president for government affairs at the National Restaurant Association.

Mr. Gay says he realized the political world had changed when Kentucky Sen. Mitch McConnell, the new Senate Republican leader, said after the November elections that he wanted to reach a deal with the Democrats on the minimum wage. And just before the holiday break, President Bush said in the strongest terms yet that he supports a $2.10 increase in the minimum wage, if it is paired with more help for the small businesses that will be disproportionately affected.

Small-business advocates such as the National Federation of Independent Business want any minimum-wage bill to increase the amount of new equipment their members can write off completely for tax purposes in the first year (as opposed to depreciating over a number of years). Restaurateurs are pressing for a broadening of another tax incentive involving the accelerated depreciation of additions and renovations. And some business interests are pushing for a three-year, rather than two-year, phase-in of any increase in the minimum wage.

House Democrats hope they can win a minimum-wage boost without the concessions. "Give us a clean vote on our issue, and [don't] tie us to other things that muddy the water," says Rep. Dennis Moore of Kansas. But industry lobbyists say Democratic leaders acknowledge privately that a deal with industry is likely to be necessary to get the measure through the closely divided Senate, where 60 votes are required to pass almost anything.

In contrast to those opposing the minimum-wage issue, the outlook for drug companies is brighter. While a proposal to allow the government to bargain with drug makers over Medicare drug prices is likely to pass the House, it could face a tougher time in the Senate. The drug industry will argue that the prescription-drug benefit has worked better than expected, is popular with seniors, and that Congress shouldn't tamper with its fundamental features.

"Messing with it and damaging it would not be a smart thing to do, and we are going to encourage Congress to think about that," says Billy Tauzin, a former Louisiana congressman who heads the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the drug makers' trade group. He hinted that the industry is preparing a big ad campaign -- just in case.

If Congress heads toward passing "anything like price controls, we obviously have a big job to do," he says. "If Congress is reasonable and works with us to improve the program, it's a different matter."

The 100 Hours Rush (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112163

Congratulations to Speaker Nancy Pelosi and her fellow Democrats, who begin their new control of Congress today. They also deserve full marks for paying attention while in the minority, because it's clear Democrats learned a few things from Tom DeLay -- to wit, how to rush through legislation without any minority participation or public debate.

House Democrats plan to pass a pile of legislation in their first 100 hours, bringing the measures quickly to the floor without committee hearings. These are issues they campaigned on last year and that do well in polls at first blush, such as a higher minimum wage, price controls on prescription drugs and "ethics reform." The rush is supposed to show Democratic resolve to get things done, but it's enough to make us wonder if they're afraid that some of their ideas won't hold up under scrutiny.

Take an increase in the federal minimum wage -- to $7.25 an hour in 2009 from $5.15. This was a big hit with Big Labor, and even President Bush has endorsed it in principle. Still, there are negative consequences when the government increases labor costs, and they deserve to be aired, not muffled. No serious economist disputes that a higher wage floor will reduce employment. The debate is only over how many people will lose their jobs. Minorities, low-skilled workers and small businesses get hit hardest, and if a wage hike does less harm this time it will be because in the current tight labor market most employers are already paying above the minimum.

The need for scrutiny is even more compelling on price controls for Medicare prescription drugs. Under the Medicare Part D benefit that took effect last year, private companies negotiate prices. Democrats want to allow the government to deal directly with drug companies. They argue that this would lead to lower prices for medicines, but the more likely outcome is fewer drug choices and price controls.

Democrats point to the Department of Veteran Affairs as a model, but we doubt seniors will like that story when they learn about it. The government already negotiates drug prices directly with the VA. But as Robert Goldberg wrote last month in the Weekly Standard, "Far from negotiating prices, the VA imposes them. Federal law requires companies to sell to the VA at 24% below wholesale price. If they won't, they are banned from selling medicines to Medicaid, Medicare and the public health service."

The VA has created a list of approved drugs for its patients. Companies that don't pay the VA price don't make the list, and a slew of drugs fall into that category. They include Azilect and Tysabri, two of the newest therapies for Parkinson's and multiple sclerosis, respectively. That's what happens when keeping prices down takes priority over getting the best available medicines to patients. Both drugs are available through Medicare Part D, by the way. Maybe Congress ought to debate this.

On ethics reform, Democrats are offering a hodge-podge of good, bad and ridiculous. The good includes earmark reform, if they are really serious in reducing the number and increasing the transparency of the spending process (see below). The ridiculous is a mandate for ethics training for all House employees, which makes us wonder who they're hiring in the first place.

As for the bad, most of the rest of these "reforms" are about controlling the lobbyists, not the Members, which gets it exactly backward. Putting restrictions on the right of citizens to petition government is a strange way of handling ethically challenged politicians. If a Member can be bought with a free lunch or skybox ticket from a lobbyist, he shouldn't be in Congress anyway. And even as they're forgoing lunch, the Members will still be telling corporate lobbyists they'd better ante up that PAC money, or else.

Most slippery is the attempt by Democrats to disguise so-called "pay as you go" budgeting, or paygo, as ethics reform. This is supposed to be a mechanism for reducing the deficit, but in practice it keeps the spending spigots open and makes tax cuts next to impossible. Under paygo, tax cuts must be offset by less spending, but existing entitlement programs that grow automatically every year are exempt from the rules. Under paygo rules, the Bush tax cuts that expire in 2010 have no chance of being extended -- as Democrats well know.

The country spoke loud and clear on behalf of Democrats last November, but we doubt this means it voted for everything on the party's partisan wish list. Attempting to shove these measures through the House without allowing votes on amendments or alternatives isn't the way a confident majority behaves. We guess this is why the Founders created the Senate.

GOP Will Push For 'Alternatives' (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112164

House Republican leaders yesterday said they will develop an agenda as the new Democrat-led Congress proceeds and decried plans to pass a series of measures immediately with little input from the minority.

"We think we need to have an opportunity to offer alternatives," said Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, who will be the minority whip when the 110th Congress convenes today.

Mr. Blunt, incoming Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio and several other Republican leaders said Democrats promised voters "a new way of doing business" on Capitol Hill.

"The important point here is that the American people were promised ... a fresh start," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam of Florida, the chairman of the House Republican Conference. "This is a missed opportunity to really change the way the House does business."

The spokeswoman for House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said Republicans will have more opportunities "to put forward their proposals and have their ideas considered than Democrats ever did under Republican majorities."

In the first 100 hours, Democrats will pass measures that "weren't given a fair hearing in previous Congresses," Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said.

Boehner spokesman Kevin Smith said Republicans did not shut out Democrats after taking leadership in 1995.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, the Maryland Democrat who will be sworn in as majority leader today, said that his party regained control of the House by promising six specific actions "immediately."

"We view the first 100 hours essentially as a mandate from the American people," Mr. Hoyer said. "We told everybody: If you elect us, this is what we're going to do immediately."

Democrats propose to enact recommendations from the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States, increase the minimum wage, expand federal funding of embryonic-stem-cell research, negotiate for lower prescription drug prices, cut student loan interest rates and reduce government subsidies for oil companies.

Those measures also will have to pass the Senate, and if they don't, Mr. Hoyer said, "the American people will make a judgment on that."

Mrs. Pelosi will present a rules package today that includes a series of ethics provisions that will ban gifts to and trips for congressmen funded by lobbyists.

The rules package is traditionally the first measure passed each Congress.

Republicans complained yesterday that Mrs. Pelosi shared the rules package with them less than 24 hours before the vote.

The first 100 hours is understood to mean the first 100 hours of legislative activity. Even though Congress will convene today, the Democrats are not scheduled to complete the last of their six measures until Jan. 18 or 19.

Hoyer Defends Democrats' Plan To Block Republican Amendments (BLM)

By Laura Litvan And Nicholas Johnston

Bloomberg, January 4, 2007

Jan. 3 (Bloomberg) -- The voters' decision last November to give Democrats control of Congress justifies party leaders in blocking Republicans from amending a wave of bills that will move through the House this month, said incoming House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer.

Hoyer, a Maryland Democrat, said his party campaigned on a ``100-hour" agenda that includes raising the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from $5.15 and should be able to move that measure through the chamber without interference. Democrats will later make good on a separate campaign promise to allow the minority party more opportunity to amend bills on the House floor or in committee.

``We view the first 100 hours as essentially a mandate from the American people," Hoyer told reporters.

His comments come amid a controversy that began Dec. 14 when House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat, said for the first time that Republicans wouldn't get a chance to offer amendments to those initial bills. House Republican leaders have protested the move, and some key committee chairmen yesterday sent letters to Democrats complaining that they are being locked out of the process.

DOJ_NMG_0112165

Democrats take control of the House and Senate at noon tomorrow after elections that left their party with 51 of the Senate's 100 seats and 233 of the House's 435 seats.

When Republicans were in the majority, they routinely blocked Democrats from amending bills and angered Democrats by often moving legislation to the floor without adequate time for lawmakers to review the contents.

Republican leaders today said Democrats weren't following campaign promises to run the House more openly.

`Totally Inconsistent'

``It's totally inconsistent with what we have been promised," David Drier of California, the senior Republican on the House Rules Committee, told reporters.

Republicans ``have not seen one line" of any proposed legislation, and committees won't be able to debate any of the bills that will be passed in the first weeks of the session, said incoming Minority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri. When Republicans took control of the House in 1995, Blunt said all of their election-year agenda was first passed by committees.

``The American people were promised a new way of doing business," said Adam Putnam, a Floridian who is chairman of the Republican Conference. ``We are disappointed that, at this point in the game, half of the Congress has been cut out of the process."

In The House, Suddenly Righteous Republicans (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

Thirty-one-year-old Rep. Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.) is not a large man, standing perhaps 5 feet 3 inches tall in thick soles. But he packed a whole lot of chutzpah when he walked into the House TV gallery yesterday to demand that the new Democratic majority give the new Republican minority all the rights that Republicans had denied Democrats for years.

"The bill we offer today, the minority bill of rights, is crafted based on the exact text that then-Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi submitted in 2004 to then-Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert," declared McHenry, with 10 Republican colleagues arrayed around him. "We're submitting this minority bill of rights, which will ensure that all sides are protected, that fairness and openness is in fact granted by the new majority."

Omitted from McHenry's plea for fairness was the fact that the GOP had ignored Pelosi's 2004 request -- while routinely engaging in the procedural maneuvers that her plan would have corrected. Was the gentleman from North Carolina asking Democrats to do as he says, not as he did?

"Look, I'm a junior member," young McHenry protested. "I'm not beholden to what former congresses did."

Anne Kornblut of the New York Times asked McHenry if his complaint might come across as whining.

"I'm not whining," he whined.

Even before officially relinquishing majority status today when the 110th Congress convenes, Republicans were protesting the Democrats' heavy-handed leadership. But Republicans expecting Democrats to rule the House with an iron fist are likely to be pleasantly surprised: The incoming majority was having enough trouble keeping its own supporters in line.

House Democratic leaders were giving their first news conference of the year when the session in the Cannon building was hijacked by Cindy Sheehan and other antiwar demonstrators, some wearing tie-dyed apparel and pins comparing President Bush to Adolf Hitler. Just after Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) vowed, "We're gonna cut the interest rate in half for student loans," hecklers began to chant "De-escalate! Investigate! Troops home now!"

"That is exactly what we're talking about," Emanuel said, trying to appease the protesters. But the hecklers kept chanting, and he fled.

The Democratic leaders in retreat, Sheehan seized the microphone. "We put them back in power," she said of the Democrats. Passing out fliers calling for defunding the Iraq war, Sheehan shouted: "These are our demands. And they're not requests -- they're demands."

If yesterday was any indication, the 110th Congress will be highly entertaining, if not terribly productive. So far, it's hard to tell which will be a larger impediment to Democratic leaders: the McHenrys or the Sheehans.

DOJ_NMG_0112166

The day began when House Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) led fellow House GOP leaders to a news conference in a Capitol basement hall. At 32, he is a year older than McHenry, and several inches taller, but no less outraged by Democrats' refusal to bestow on Republicans the rights that Republicans refused to bestow on Democrats.

"We are disappointed," protested Putnam, whose fair skin was covered with a layer of makeup.

"We're clearly disappointed," seconded Roy Blunt (Mo.).

"I'm disappointed, as are some others," added Kay Granger (Tex.).

"I am very disappointed," concurred David Dreier (Calif.).

It fell to CNN's Dana Bash to point out the awkward truth. "You can play back, almost verbatim, Democrats . . . saying almost exactly what you all just said," she said. "So is there a little bit of hypocrisy in you saying that you want minority rights?"

"This is a missed opportunity to really change the way that the House does business," Putnam offered, citing Democrats' campaign promises for "a new way of doing business."

"What stopped you from taking that opportunity when you were still in the majority?" inquired Rick Klein of the Boston Globe.

"Well, I'll let Chairman Dreier speak to that," Putnam ventured.

Republicans must have known they'd have some explaining to do, because they scheduled back-to-back news conferences on their minority rights. As soon as Putnam's session ended, Granger took the elevator up three flights and joined McHenry and his cohort in the TV gallery.

Granger had not updated her talking points. "It's very disappointing," she said.

Further disappointment came when the first questioner elicited the confession that none of the lawmakers had previously sympathized with Pelosi's plea for minority rights. McHenry unfurled excuses: "We were not in Congress. . . . I didn't have the opportunity. . . . She did not put it in legislative form."

It had all the makings of a PR debacle. Fortunately for McHenry, the Democrats were otherwise engaged. An hour after fleeing the microphone because of Sheehan's heckling, Emanuel and other Democratic leaders returned for another attempt to talk about ethics and the minimum wage.

"Rahm, would you answer Cindy Sheehan, though?"

"An hour or so ago you had to stop your remarks because [of] Cindy Sheehan."

"What are Democrats going to do about the war in Iraq?"

For the new majority, it must have been, well, disappointing.

Lessons From The GOP (WT)

By Robert Walker

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

Governing is hard. Governing is particularly hard in the legislative process when promises include explicit deadlines, a commitment to specific legislative proposals and an agreement to respect minority rights.

Just like the Democrats now taking control of the House of Representatives, Republicans in 1995 had promised a legislative process fraught with difficulty. And we immediately encountered the same problems that the Democratic leadership is now facing — concerns about the ability to meet the promised schedule, arguments about the details of the legislation and the potential for missteps if the minority really was given the right to debate, amend, modify or defeat the bills being offered.

In 2007 it remains to be seen if Democrats will be as successful at living up to their promises of minority rights as Republicans were a decade ago. In the earliest days of Republican control of the House our assurances of openness and protection of minority rights were implemented. We provided the minority with additional resources to do their job and eliminated many of the elements of committee fiefdoms that had previously existed. Seventy-five percent of the bills that encompassed the Republican action plan, the Contract with America, were considered under completely open rules or rules that limited only debate time but not the ability to offer amendments.

That Republican commitment to openness and minority participation came at some cost. Among the earliest bills we brought to the House floor was one to eliminate unfunded mandates, the practice of the federal government imposing costs on state and local governments. The bill took two weeks to complete with more than four dozen amendments offered of which 19 were adopted. It was an experience that led the Republican leadership to restrict time on subsequent bills because we had promised to enact our whole agenda in 100 days. But even though time restrictions were adopted, the vast majority of bills were open to unrestricted amendment.

DOJ_NMG_0112167

The extension of minority rights that we championed was enacted on the opening day of the 104th Congress. Among the reforms passed was an accurate congressional record, the elimination of proxy voting in committees and an allocation of one-third of the staff at committees to the minority. The purpose behind the changes grew from our experience in the minority where substantial changes in the Congressional Record altered the meaning of floor debate and thereby distorted the proceedings; votes in committee where the tally of those present gave a victory to the minority only to have that victory reversed when the chairman used proxy votes of those not present to enforce his view; and situations where the majority staff so significantly outnumbered the minority staff as to make legislation competition impossible.

In addition, within the Republican Party rules another major reform limited the ability of the majority to establish legislative fiefdoms where committee chairs exercised power in arbitrary ways. The party rules established a three term limit on committee chairmen assuring regular, orderly transfers of power.

Unfortunately, as the pressures of legislating grew, the Republicans in the House lost some of their zeal for openness and minority participation. Rules became more closed meaning that amendments were restricted or completely eliminated. And the result of the loss of openness was a loss of civility and comity in the House.

Some important things were kept — committee chairman term limits, elimination of ghost (proxy) votes, sufficient minority staffing and an accurate record of proceedings. But the restrictions on procedure more and more shut the Democrats out of offering their alternatives within the legislative process. And that situation led to calls for reform by the Democrats, calls that became a part of their 2006 political campaign and contributed to their victory.

How well will the Democrats do in keeping the campaign promises? The rules package offered on opening day in the 110th Congress contains special rules for enactment of their 100-hour legislative plan. Those special rules allow for no minority participation. The bills will not be considered in committee (unlike the 1995 Republican process that brought all the Contract bills through the appropriate committees) and no amendments will be permitted. The only action granted to the minority will be a motion to recommit the bill to a committee from which it never emerged. In addition, the Democrats have not imposed term limits on their committee chairmen, meaning at least one of the reforms of a decade ago has been abandoned.

Hopefully these initial steps are not harbingers of what is to come but are merely an indication of a party trying to govern and finding that governing is hard. But legislating by fiat is destructive. It destroys legislative quality. It destroys civility. And it destroys the debate on issues to which all American are entitled.

Republicans should have remained true to the principle of openness, full debate and minority participation. Democrats, we can hope, learned that lesson.

Former Rep. Robert Walker, who served as part of the House leadership under Speaker Newt Gingrich, is chairman of Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates.

Political Gadfly Cindy Sheehan Disrupts Democrats' Policy Meet (AFP)

AFP, January 4, 2007

Antiwar activist Cindy Sheehan and about a dozen other peace protesters demonstrated at the House of Representatives to urge Democrats to aggressively investigate the war in Iraq.

"De-escalate! Investigate! Troops home now!" Sheehan and the other protesters chanted at Democratic leaders in the House Cannon Office Building, who had assembled for a press conference on their agenda as they prepare to take power Thursday.

Democrats, who take control of Congress Thursday for the first time in 12 years, have vowed to hold President George W. Bush's administration accountable for its handling of the Iraq war.

Protest organizer David Swanson told AFP said they wanted to underscore their displeasure that Democrats, in the view of peace activists, are not aggressively holding the Bush administration accountable for missteps in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0112168

"We were there to lobby. We wanted to tell them that 'we in the peace movement won this war for you, and we have the impression that you're turning your back on us from day one,'" he said.

"We want Democrats to turn off the money and investigate the crimes," Swanson said.

"Pelosi (incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi) has said cutting off the money is off the table and impeachment is off the table. This is not what we elected her to do."

Sheehan, whose son Casey was killed in Iraq in April 2004, rose to national prominence that same summer when she camped outside of President George W. Bush's Texas ranch to demonstrate her opposition to the US-led war.

She has remained a constant gadfly on the Iraq issue, with antiwar protests, a book, letter writing campaigns, and various civil disobedience actions.

Cindy Sheehan Disrupts Democrats Talk On Ethics (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, January 4, 2007

The war in Iraq and congressional scandals, twin forces that helped Democrats recapture the House and Senate, collided yesterday when antiwar protesters' shouting forced House Democratic leaders to cut short a press conference hyping their proposed reforms.

House Democratic leaders had gathered in the Cannon Caucus room to discuss wide-ranging and symbolic changes to the House rules, including a complete gift ban and new restrictions on travel, earmarks and legislative procedures when activists, including Cindy Sheehan, drove lawmakers from the microphones.

If the rules are adopted after the full House votes on them today, lawmakers' ability to accept junkets from lobbyists will be curtailed, they will have to attach their names to earmarks and spending and tax deductions, credits, exclusions or preferences directed to 10 or fewer beneficiaries will be banned. The proposals also include measures to give the ethics committee power to pre-approve privately funded trips and require lawmakers to report more quickly the costs of the trips.

But when Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) stepped up to pronounce that Democrats fundamentally would "change the relationship between lawmakers and legislators," Sheehan and her allies started shouting, "De-escalate, investigate, bring our troops home now!"

Emanuel's aides said he was willing to talk to Sheehan and her cohorts, but he and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), Majority Whip James Clyburn (D-S.C.) and incoming Rules Committee Chairman Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.) headed inside the Cannon Caucus room when it appeared the shouting would not stop.

"They are not including the peace movement's voice," Sheehan said, adding that she would have talked to Emanuel and the other leaders had she noticed them waiting to listen. After the leaders huddled inside the closed-door meeting, the shouting stopped and the protesters left.

Most rank-and-file Democrats missed the commotion because they had retired inside their first meeting since recapturing the majority. But many lawmakers, including freshman Reps.-elect Chris Carney (D-Pa.) and Joe Sestak (D-Pa.), said this was the first time they had been able to see a draft of the ethics reforms. They, and the rest of the caucus, will have 24 hours to review the rules changes.

Despite the short review period, which complies with one of the rules changes giving lawmakers 24 hours to review legislation before it is considered at the subcommittee level and on the House floor, Democrats whipping the proposed changes had run into little resistance, said House Democratic sources.

"They talked about it enough during the campaign. It'll make some people uncomfortable and make lives a little more difficult," a Democratic lobbyist with close ties to leadership said. "But they got a message from voters and this is something they have to do. They'd rather be in the majority."

But some lawmakers raised concerns about whether they would be able to attend events in their district when House Democratic staffers briefed them in regional conference calls last month. For example, if a union held a barbeque could a lawmaker accept their food or if he visited a plant could he eat with the employees? The staffers did not have answers to the questions, said Democratic sources familiar with the calls.

DOJ_NMG_0112169

Democracy21 and Public Citizen, government watchdog groups, favorably greeted the proposed rules changes.

Still, the rules contain some loopholes. Lawmakers would be allowed to accept trips paid for by universities so they can speak at graduation ceremonies and junkets sponsored by other non-profit groups, such as the Faith and Politics Institute, which has flown lawmakers to South Africa to educate them on civil rights issues.

In addition, Democrats decided to address more complex issues later. They did not propose creating an independent ethics agency. While top Democrats are predisposed to such an agency, Hoyer and others are concerned about problems that the independent counsels have encountered since 1980, said a senior Democratic spokesman. A bipartisan panel will convene later this year to consider a plan.

There is no provision to strip lawmakers of their pensions if they are convicted of a crime while serving in office. It is unclear if such a provision will be considered later this year, Democratic aides said.

Moreover, some lobbyists voiced concerns that the culture of Washington is so ingrained that lawmakers and staffers would find ways to circumvent the measures. For example, to get around the gift ban, lobbyists might start paying for meals under the guise of a campaign event, and businesses could create non-profit foundations to organize fact-finding trips.

The Democrats also renamed committees, granted power to the newly named Oversight and Government Reform Committee to depose witnesses and banned lawmakers-turned-lobbyists and their spouses from using the House gym.

Meanwhile, Pelosi has moved to cement her authority by placing staffers in key Democratic offices. Her spokeswoman, Jennifer Crider, will become the communications director for newly appointed Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) and Carrie James, a press aide to Pelosi who worked for Rep.-elect Patrick Murphy's (D-Pa.) campaign, will become the deputy communications director for the Democratic Caucus.

And on Friday evening, freshman Democratic and Republican lawmakers leave for Williamsburg, Va., to attend a conference sponsored by the Congressional Research Service.

Cindy Sheehan Routs The Democrats (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

Cindy Sheehan, the "peace activist" who famously besieged President Bush at Prairie Chapel Ranch, yesterday routed the leaders of the new House Democratic majority from their press conference where they attempted to present their legislative agenda.

Chants of "de-escalate, investigate, troops home now," drowned out the new majority leaders, including Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the chairman of the Democratic House Caucus.

The flustered lawmakers retreated to a room behind closed doors, and surrendered the field to Mrs. Sheehan, whose son, an Army soldier, was killed in Iraq in 2004.

With her quarry in full retreat, she scolded Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi for abandoning the war issue in the agenda for the first 100 hours of the 110th Congress, which convenes today. The agenda focuses on other promises from last year's campaigns, including raising the minimum wage, stricter ethics rules and cutting student loan interest rates.

"Speaker Pelosi and the Democratic leadership can no longer tell us what is on the table," Mrs. Sheehan said. "We are the ones that put them in power and they are not including the peace movement. ... It needs to be at least included in the discussion."

She demanded the elimination of funding for the war, an investigation and impeachment of President Bush for what she called "lies" to justify the war.

Mrs. Sheehan was leading about 75 others lobbying congressional offices when they happened upon the press conference. The Democrats were there to present new ethics proposals as part of the 100-hour agenda with which they plan to begin the House majority today.

"Iraq is a high priority for Democrats," said Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider, and a legislative agenda was not the place to address the war issue.

She said the call last year from Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, for troop withdrawal "changed the course of the debate [and] sent a signal that Democrats will stand up and hold the administration accountable."

DOJ_NMG_0112170

Mrs. Pelosi did not attend the press conference.

After the interruption by the Sheehan-led activists, Mr. Emanuel and other top Democrats returned to the microphone and, in response to reporters' questions, addressed some of Mrs. Sheehan's demands.

"Well, we're going to do the one thing that's been missing ... and that's oversight," Mr. Emanuel said. "We have had a policy where the Congress -- from resources to strategy -- has abdicated its responsibility of overseeing an administration's foreign policy in that area. And the American people, both in blood, treasure, and prestige, is now paying the price for a Congress that abdicated its responsibility."

Mr. Emanuel promised hearings on the war that would answer the types of questions Mrs. Sheehan and the voters are asking.

"That is the most important thing to do, because when you have questions asked, you do not get a Congress that just rubber-stamps the policy," he said. "Now you see the consequence of a rubber-stamp policy, which is what we have in Iraq."

After the press conference, Mrs. Sheehan told reporters that Democrats had abandoned the party's grass-roots anti-war supporters as soon as the election was over.

"I'm disappointed to see that they are talking about giving the president more money for the war," she said. "I'm disappointed to hear that impeachment is off the table. We are here to let them know that we are setting the table now."

Most analysts credited the Iraq war issue with fueling anti-Republican sentiment that propelled Democrats to a congressional majority for the first time in 12 years.

Where Up Is Still Down, But The Rest Is Changing (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich and Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 — There were comparisons to “Alice in Wonderland,” “Star Trek,” “The Twilight Zone,” and all manner of clichés to convey the strangeness engulfing Washington this week as the Democrats prepared to assume control of Congress after 12 years in the minority wilderness. But nothing distilled the new aura of things like this conceit: Steny Hoyer, Rock Star.

“Here he comes, here he comes,” a member of the press throng effervesced when Mr. Hoyer of Maryland, the incoming House majority leader, strode into the room as if he owned the place. Which, in effect, he does — at least the larger, plusher office he is inheriting, which used to belong to Tom DeLay, Mr. Hoyer was compelled to point out. (Not that anyone’s keeping track.)

Mr. Hoyer surveyed the conference room and held his arms slightly apart, as if to frame the unusual site before him: a crush of 60 or so reporters, camera operators, TV types and assorted security people, staff members and hangers-on to befit the status of an emerging fuss magnet.

The fussers were present for Mr. Hoyer’s “pen and pad” briefing, and in considerably greater numbers than during his days in the minority.

“We’re going to reserve some seats for those who came to these pen and pads when I was irrelevant,” Mr. Hoyer said, a line he had deployed before, but which served the recurring purpose of marking the juxtaposition of fortunes that are on full display in the up-is-down realm of Capitol Hill. “There are some who think I’m still irrelevant,” he added, not proffering guesses.

Mr. Hoyer wore a shiny white dress shirt, a red power tie and an occasional look of stunned confusion. To his right, movers passed the window, carrying lamps and tables. Mr. Hoyer was hard to decipher at times, speaking in the mumble of someone accustomed to smaller audiences.

‘It’s Not Whining’

Not so the Republicans convened upstairs.

Waving his hands and stomping his feet, Representative Patrick T. McHenry of North Carolina acted out on Wednesday what the rest of the Republican caucus must have felt.

“It is so hypocritical, just on its face,” Mr. McHenry fumed.

DOJ_NMG_0112171

His complaint: That Democrats, on the verge of taking control of Congress, were planning to run the place their way, driving the legislative agenda themselves without input from the Republican minority.

Wasn't that, someone asked, how the Republicans had run Congress for more than a decade?

"We didn't campaign on this openness," Mr. McHenry argued, denying that he and his colleagues were just being sore losers. "It's not whining," he said. "It's a matter of calling them out on their rhetoric."

Democrats had not even taken over yet. But Republicans, suddenly facing a minimum two-year sentence out of power, coalesced on their first day back around a message of kvetching.

They held up reports that Democrats would conduct their first 100 hours without allowing amendments from Republicans. They held press conferences to deplore the new regime, citing letters from Mrs. Pelosi from when she was in the minority, requesting a piece of the legislative action.

"There are lots of messages that came across in this November election, and one of the messages was change in doing things differently," said Representative Kay Granger, Republican of Texas.

Watch for Falling Marble

Across town, Representative Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut presided over an afternoon tea that brought together Democratic women for what she described as "our understated way of saying we've arrived."

But as with much of the week's festivities, there was nothing understated about whom the celebration was for: a giant photograph of the incoming speaker, Nancy Pelosi, was on a screen at the front of the room, alongside one of Ann Richards, the first woman to be governor of Texas, who died in September.

When Mrs. Pelosi takes the gavel, Ms. DeLauro said, "The sound you hear will be the glass ceiling in this country, and the marble ceiling in this institution, shattering."

Drop the Pacifier and Smile

"Who is that guy?" a staffer asked, pointing to a big-shotty looking man with a small entourage in the Cannon office building. Must be a new member, he concluded.

Nope, it was Paul Pelosi, the new speaker's husband, leading members of the first family of Congress to get ID card photographs.

This included Paul Michael Vos, the 6-week-old grandson of the speaker and Mr. Pelosi and the son of the filmmaker Alexandra Pelosi, whose HBO documentary "Journeys with George" chronicled George W. Bush's first presidential campaign.

Paul's birth nearly conflicted with Grandma Pelosi's last-minute campaign plans, but he had the good sense not to go off message and showed up after Election Day.

And yes, newborns require photo ID's on Capitol Hill. His father, Michiel Vos, dutifully carried his son into the room marked "ID services." Fifteen minutes later, he emerged crying (the baby, not the father), but with a shiny new photo ID clipped to his adorable onesie.

Hello, but First, This Protest

Down the hallway, Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois was starting to address another news media mob that had waited for him to emerge from a meeting of the House Democratic Caucus. Mr. Emanuel wished everyone a happy new year, apologized for being late and was promptly drowned out by a group of antiwar protesters, led by the ubiquitous Cindy Sheehan.

"De-escalate, investigate," the group chanted. "Troops home now."

Mr. Emanuel and Mr. Hoyer consulted briefly and decided to leave their podium and return later.

"Looks like we're taking a little break," Mr. Hoyer said as he and Mr. Emmanuel rushed away.

Ms. Sheehan was happy to take over the microphone, not to mention the lingering throng of reporters.

She called for a greater role for the peace movement in the Democratic majority, which she said was ignoring the people who put them in power —the peace movement. She called for an end to financing the war.

"And these are not requests," said Ms. Sheehan, whose son Casey was killed in Iraq. "These are demands."

The Democrats eventually returned, and Ms. Sheehan vowed to stay around all week.

"It looks like business as usual, and that's why we're here," Ms. Sheehan said in a brief interview. "We want business as unusual."

DOJ_NMG_0112172

Pelosi Becomes First Female Speaker, Preparing To Confront Bush (BLOOM)

By Laura Litvan

Bloomberg, January 4, 2007

Jan. 4 (Bloomberg) -- Nancy Pelosi, making history today as the first female speaker of the House, is taking office with two goals: becoming an effective counterweight to President George W. Bush, and proving that a woman can thrive at the summit of U.S. political power.

Pelosi's attacks on Bush as minority leader are credited by many Democrats with helping them win control of Congress for the first time since 1992. As speaker, she'll be dealing with a narrow majority and a president with veto power, making decisions about when to work with Bush and when to confront him.

While women have served as Supreme Court justices, lawmakers and in senior Cabinet roles, none has ever led her party in political combat at this level. Her success at retiring the notion that women aren't qualified to manage the responsibilities of top leadership may affect others' aspirations, including New York Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's possible bid for the White House in 2008.

``As people see Nancy Pelosi on the national stage, setting the agenda and leading the people's House, it helps to set the stage for Senator Clinton in her run for president, and indeed for other women who may want to run for Senate or run for governor," said Ellen Moran, executive director of EMILY's List, which raises political funds for Democratic women.

Second in Line

In an interview three days before the Nov. 7 elections, Pelosi, 66, said her ascension to the speakership would show that women ``can breathe in that rarified atmosphere." No woman has been as close to the presidency itself: The California congresswoman will be second in line, behind only Vice President Dick Cheney.

Over the past five years, Pelosi emerged as one of the top congressional critics of the war in Iraq. In 2002, she broke with then-Minority Leader Richard Gephardt of Missouri and led a bloc of Democrats who voted against the resolution authorizing the war. She was also one of the first members of Congress to question Bush's assertion that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction, a claim that was used to justify the March 2003 invasion and that later proved inaccurate.

Pelosi will have her first opportunity to spar with Bush over Iraq in February when the White House submits a request for more money for the war. Pelosi has warned that Democrats will attach conditions to the approval of further funds.

Unity and Discipline

Pelosi, who was largely able to maintain House Democrats' unity and discipline when they were in the minority, may have a tougher job now that they are in power. Members have already defied her by rejecting Representative John Murtha of Pennsylvania, her choice for the No. 2 job of majority leader, in favor of Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the current No. 2.

At the same time, she will face the task of trying to push her agenda through a still closely divided House. Democrats will hold 233 seats in the new House, Republicans 202. Things are even tighter in the Senate, where Democrats hold only 51 of the 100 seats -- and one Democrat, Tim Johnson of South Dakota, remains hospitalized after brain surgery.

Bush, 60, vowed yesterday to cooperate with the Democrats - - even as he warned that he would oppose tax increases. ``Congress has changed," he said in remarks at the White House after a meeting with his Cabinet. ``Our obligations to the country haven't changed."

House Republicans say Pelosi is already backsliding on promises to allow more open debate to the House floor. She indicated last month that she won't let Republicans try to amend key parts of Democrats' agenda, including legislation to raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, curbing subsidies for oil and gas companies and reducing student-loan interest rates.

A Political Family

The new speaker is hardly a stranger to rough-and-tumble politics. Her father, Thomas D'Alesandro, was mayor of Baltimore and a congressman; a brother also served as Baltimore mayor.

Pelosi, who represents San Francisco, wasn't elected to Congress until 1987, when she was 47 and the youngest of her five children was in high school. She eventually rose to become the top Democrat on the intelligence committee and the appropriations subcommittee on foreign operations.

DOJ_NMG_0112173

In 2001, she defeated Hoyer to become Democratic whip. She became minority leader -- the first woman to lead a party in Congress -- after Gephardt stepped down late the next year.

Her elevation to speaker comes during a year when record numbers of women will hold seats in Congress -- 16 in the Senate and 71 in the House. Moran said the Washington-based EMILY's List group sees an opportunity to raise record levels of cash in 2008 after raising $45 million in 2006.

Susan MacManus, a political science professor at the University of South Florida in Tampa, said the significance of Pelosi's new role goes beyond issues of partisanship, showing that women can make decisions on the weightiest issues of government.

Even though two of the last three secretaries of state are women, ``quietly, people are thinking maybe women can't handle the stresses of war and international negotiations," MacManus said. ``Pelosi is going to be right there in the middle of military and foreign policy. Her dealings on these issues are absolutely essential to the success of other women."

Pelosi's Political Rise Is Breakthrough (AP)

By Stephen Ohlemacher

AP, January 4, 2007

It shouldn't be surprising that it took more than 200 years for Congress to select a female speaker of the House. The United States isn't exactly at the forefront when it comes to women in politics.

Women make up a larger share of the national legislature in 79 other countries, including China, Cuba, North Korea and Vietnam, according to the Inter-Parliamentary Union, an association of national legislatures. The U.S. even trails a couple of fledgling democracies: Afghanistan and Iraq.

"When my colleagues elect me as speaker on Jan. 4, we will not just break through a glass ceiling, we will break through a marble ceiling," said Rep. Nancy Pelosi, who is set to lead the House when the Democrats take over Thursday. "In more than 200 years of history, there was an established pecking order — and I cut in line."

At a tea to honor Pelosi and the late former Texas governor Ann Richards on Wednesday, Pelosi said her ascension hadn't come easily. "We have waited more than 200 years for this time to come. But we did not just wait, we worked," she said.

And she alluded to one of the reasons women have been slow to climb the political ladder, saying federal policy has never recognized women's need for child care. "This Congress is going to be about children," she said.

There were 22 women in the House when Pelosi was first elected to her California district in 1987. There will be a record 71 female representatives when she takes over as speaker, giving women 16 percent of the seats.

"The biggest obstacle women candidates face is not about gender, it's about the lack of opportunity," said Ellen R. Malcolm, president of EMILY's List, which helps Democratic women who favor abortion rights get elected to public office. "Ninety-eight percent of incumbents who run for re-election are re-elected in most years. ... The bottom line is there are very few opportunities."

Once women decide to run for office, they are just as successful as men, according to experts who study the issue. However, women are much less likely to run.

One big reason is child care. Women are much more likely than men to be responsible for child care, and that doesn't always fit into the usually chaotic schedule of a member of Congress.

"All these women, even if they are extremely qualified, they are still so much involved in their family life they couldn't even consider running for office," said Richard Fox, professor of political science at Union College in New York.

Fox did an extensive survey of women in professions that produce many lawmakers: education, business and the law. He worked on the study with Jennifer Lawless, an assistant political science professor at Brown University who ran for Congress this year, losing the Democratic primary in Rhode Island to incumbent Rep. James Langevin.

Among their conclusions:

_Women are less likely than men to be asked to run for office by party leaders and other officials.

_When women are asked to run, they are just as likely as men to do it.

DOJ_NMG_0112174

_Women are more likely than men to think they are unqualified to serve, even when they have the same qualifications as male candidates.

"A man can wake up one morning, look in the mirror and say, 'By God, I would be the best state legislator that Nebraska has ever seen,'" said Debbie Walsh, director of the Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University. "Men don't need to be asked."

Rep. Jeanette Rankin, R-Mont., was the first woman elected to Congress, in 1916, four years before the 19th Amendment gave women the right to vote (women could already vote in Montana).

Before 1970, more than 40 percent of the women in Congress gained office by succeeding their dead husbands. Since then, fewer than 10 percent have followed their husbands, according to data collected by Dennis Simon, a political science professor at Southern Methodist University.

The number of women in Congress has grown slowly, with the biggest jump coming in 1992, the "Year of the Woman," when it nearly doubled, to 54.

Pelosi, 66, grew up in politics as the daughter and sister of Baltimore mayors. But she waited until her youngest daughter was in high school before she ran for Congress, a path followed by many women.

Women are, on average, older than men when they are first elected to Congress, giving them less time to rise in leadership, which is based largely on seniority.

Lena Saradnik was elected in November to the Arizona State Legislature for the first time at age 59. She said it would have been tough to run for political office while her daughter, now 30, was still young.

Saradnik, a Democrat from Tucson, said she could see herself joining Pelosi in Congress some day, but she's realistic about her prospects.

"If I were younger, I would probably say, absolutely," Saradnik said.

Saradnik said she decided to run for office after being approached by a local Democratic official. She was helped by a training program called Emerge America, which teaches public speaking, fundraising and media skills to female Democrats. Republicans have a similar programs called the Excellence in Public Service Series.

Marya Stark, executive director of Emerge America, predicted that more women will be inspired to run for office with Pelosi serving as speaker and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., being a potential candidate for president.

Pelosi embraces her role as the first female speaker, but she wants to be judged by the same standards as the 51 men who came before her.

"I have always asked my colleagues to judge me by the quality of my leadership and the results we achieve together, not as the first woman," Pelosi said.

But, she added: "Becoming the first woman speaker will send a message to young girls and women across the country that anything is possible for them, that women can achieve power, wield power and breathe the air at that altitude. As the first woman speaker of the House, I will work to make certain that I will not be the last."

___

On the Net:

Center for American Women and Politics: http://www.cawp.rutgers.edu/

Inter-Parliamentary Union: http://www.ipu.org/wmn-e/classif.htm

Pelosi Shows She's The Head Of Her Party (LAT)

By Faye Fiore And Tina Daunt

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — Most Americans still don't know who Nancy Pelosi is, and this was her last chance to script an introduction before Congress convenes today and she becomes the first female speaker of the House.

So on Wednesday, Pelosi kicked off a three-day celebration of her ascension packed with more product placement than an infomercial.

DOJ_NMG_0112175

The cannoli at the reception after the morning Mass were from the bakery on the street in Baltimore's Little Italy where she grew up. The white lilies on the altar were her favorite flower. The chapel belonged to Trinity University, the Roman Catholic women's college she graduated from in 1962.

Pelosi sat in the front row surrounded by five of her grandchildren. The sixth sounded off midservice and had to be walked around by his mother, reminding everyone that his grandmother ditched Washington seven weeks ago to sit at his crib side.

"We've waited over 200 years for this time," Pelosi said at an afternoon tea turned power rally. "America's working women, women working at home, whatever they choose to do, they have a friend in the Capitol of the United States."

Five hundred women wore Rosie the Riveter buttons with Pelosi's face superimposed, with pearl earrings, above the slogan: "A woman's place is in the House ... as Speaker."

It was her first full day on the national stage, and she used it to tell the country who she is, where she came from and where she plans to go — the little Italian American girl from a political household who later raised five children before running for the House and making history as the nation's highest-ranking elected woman in 217 years of government.

Unfurling a roadmap

The installation of a new speaker is the closest Congress comes to a presidential inauguration. Some critics accused her of putting on a "Nancy Fest," but supporters said the events were as much political roadmap as biography.

"This is fitting," said Democratic strategist Donna Brazile. "She's not just tracing her steps, we're learning the path she intends to take us on."

The morning Mass at Trinity University was dedicated to the children of Darfur and Hurricane Katrina, the afternoon tea to the late Texas Gov. Ann Richards and other female political luminaries whom Pelosi says she "stood on the shoulders of" to get where she is. An interfaith Mass this morning is dedicated to the armed forces.

But it wasn't all selfless tribute.

Pelosi is the House Democrats' most prolific fundraiser, and supporters will pay $1,000 a seat and political action committees $15,000 to hear Carole King, Wyclef Jean and Tony "I Left My Heart in San Francisco" Bennett perform at tonight's celebration concert at the National Building Museum in downtown Washington.

Democrats were in the mood to celebrate, and Pelosi planned to give them plenty of opportunity: a dinner at the Italian Embassy on Wednesday and a party Friday in Baltimore, during which the block she grew up on is to be renamed Via Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi.

Plenty of California's top Democrats flew in — Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom, recently defeated gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides and former California Senate leader John Burton.

Democrats dismissed criticism that it was over the top.

"We've eaten so much crow over the last 12 years I have no problem with popping the champagne, if only to remind us we've worked hard but now it's time for us to work for the American people," Brazile said.

But when it comes to Pelosi, there isn't much consensus in Washington. She will have to find common cause not only with Republicans but within her diverse caucus of conservative Blue Dogs and old-style liberals. With a 16-vote majority, she must hold the Democrats together on the contentious issues of war, Medicare overhaul and oil profit rollbacks while battling GOP rivals intent on sinking her in the next two years.

Already, there were signs of what's to come.

House Republicans grumbled that Pelosi planned to shut them out of the "First 100 Hours" agenda by refusing to allow hearings or amendments (which is what the GOP frequently did to Democrats, but Pelosi promised not to be like them).

Pelosi protesters

Outside the church, a tiny band of antiabortion protesters chanted, "Speaker Pelosi, Catholics don't kill children." And former U.S. Rep. Robert K. Dornan, an Orange County Republican known for his outbursts, sneaked into the invitation-only service and emerged to brand his former House colleague "the most arrogant pro-abortion person in Congress."

But those were blips on the celebration screen.

DOJ_NMG_0112176

An energy seemed to build around her throughout the day. The Mellon Auditorium, where finger sandwiches and petits fours were set out for 500, roared at times with approval for the most powerful woman in Washington, who at one point stood on the stage and flexed her biceps.

"Know your power," Pelosi said, recalling advice the late Rep. Lindy Boggs gave her, adding: "And we took it."

Her personal touch

Every event had personal or political significance that bore her stamp. A famous micromanager, Pelosi approved details down to the music for the Mass, which her eldest daughter had played over the phone before Christmas so her mother could review.

It included an African American spiritual, "Plenty Good Room," with lyrics that seemed to foreshadow the ethics package Pelosi has made the first order of House business today: "I would not be a sinner ... I would not be a liar ... I would not be a cheater."

One of Pelosi's campaign promises was to take the House gavel away from special interests and pass it to "the hands of America's children." And the theme of children was prominent Wednesday.

Banners with images of the young victims of Katrina and Darfur were displayed on the chapel walls. Father Robert F. Drinan, a Jesuit priest and former member of Congress, opened the homily saying, "Congress is 16% women and for the first time ever, the speaker is a mother. Today we are re-pledging our lives to the children."

Though the events were clearly designed to send a message, the day also had an insular feel. Television coverage focused on President Ford's burial, and what media interest there was in Pelosi was almost rebuffed by her office. Several events were closed to the press.

The media were held on the sidewalk outside the Trinity chapel, zoom lenses aimed at the steps almost a football field away, only to have Pelosi slip out a side door.

Pelosi Ready To Make History As New Speaker (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

A new Congress convenes today with a narrow Democratic majority lording over a despondent Republican minority.

While the full weight of Republicans' powerlessness sinks in after 12 years of control, Democrats are celebrating the historic election today of the first female speaker of the House.

"We have waited over 200 years for this time to come," Mrs. Pelosi said on the eve of her selection as speaker, a position that makes her second in line to the presidency after Vice President Dick Cheney.

"We will not just break through a glass ceiling, we will break through a marble ceiling," she said. "In more than 200 years of history, there was an established pecking order -- and I cut in line."

After calling herself "the most powerful woman in America," Mrs. Pelosi flexed her right muscle like a weight lifter to much applause at an event yesterday titled a "women's tea."

"All right, let's hear it for the power," she screamed as the jubilant applause continued.

When Mrs. Pelosi tried leaving the podium, Rep. Rosa DeLauro, Connecticut Democrat, asked her to stay.

"There is so much love and warmth that's in this room today and that's because of the new speaker," Mrs. DeLauro said. "And that tells you about what the future is all about in the House of Representatives."

Yesterday's event was part of three days of festivities to mark the historic moment. Later, Mrs. Pelosi and special guests dined at the Italian Embassy.

Today will be the official vote by her colleagues installing her as speaker, followed by a "swearing-in celebration concert" in the Great Hall of the National Building Museum.

Tomorrow will feature an "open house for the People's House," a nod to Democrats' professed commitment to the common man. For the rest of the day, Mrs. Pelosi will celebrate her roots with a visit to a statue of her late father, former Baltimore Mayor Thomas D'Alesandro, and later the dedication of a Baltimore street to Mrs. Pelosi.

DOJ_NMG_0112177

But wary of accusations of arrogance, Democrats have included other, less celebratory events. Those include a Mass yesterday at Trinity University in remembrance of "the children of Darfur and Katrina and a prayer service this morning at St. Peter's Catholic Church to honor the troops."

Out of the gate, Democrats are pushing through their "Six of '06" agenda that they say is a mandate after the November elections.

In less than two weeks -- during the first 100 hours of official action -- they vow to pass legislation implementing the September 11 panel recommendations, increasing the minimum wage, expanding stem-cell research, allowing the government to negotiate prices for prescription drugs, cutting interest rates on student loans and ending subsidies for oil companies while expanding renewable energy exploration.

"Next week, the clock will start ticking on the 100 hours agenda," said incoming Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat. "Democrats ran on this agenda and were elected on this agenda. We promised the American people swift passage of these bills and we fully intend to make good on that promise."

In particular, he pointed out the Democratic Party's determination to move toward energy independence with cleaner fuels.

"I don't mean that we will not use any energy from any other sources but that we will not be dependent upon foreign states for our economic well-being, our military security and well-being, as well as frankly energy independence, meaning that we need to become environmentally sensitive in our use of energy as the 60 degree weather today points out," he said. "I live 80 feet from a river, and in January, I have 60 degree weather and I am convinced that 20 years from now, my house is going to be under the river, not on the river. So I am very concerned about that, and we are as a party."

Also among the first items of their agenda will be raising the minimum wage by $2.10 over the next two years.

"With the minimum wage frozen at $5.15 per hour for the past nine years and four months, it is extremely difficult for minimum-wage earners to meet their basic needs, and yet millions of Americans are forced to live in these conditions," Mr. Hoyer said. "Americans who work hard to earn an honest living should not be relegated to poverty."

Not part of Democrats' early agenda, however, is anything to do with the war in Iraq, which many credit for giving them control of both chambers of Congress.

A press conference yesterday was crashed by anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan -- usually a thorn in the sides of pro-war Republicans -- who demanded that the new Democratic majority take immediate steps to end the war.

Shortly after, Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat, promised to make sure "that the people's voices are heard in the people's house," Mrs. Sheehan and others stormed the press conference, chanting anti-war slogans.

Pelosi's Coming-Out Party (TIME)

By Ana Marie Cox

Time, January 4, 2007

It just so happens that incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi will be launching her career as Democratic House leader the same week that the District hosted memorial service for Gerald Ford. That small twist of fate points up one of the capitol's cardinal rules: in Washington, you never run out of chances to make a first impression.

After all, the Gerald Ford being honored this week is not the same man who tried to jolly America out of economic doldrums with "whip inflation now" buttons. He's also not the same person who came into the White House to begin with. Ford served as President for two and half years; he served in the House for 24 years. He arrived in 1949 as a surprise winner in his G.O.P. primary, who got to Congress largely because of his tenacious campaigning and charm. He was known as a congenial back-slapper and talented maneuverer among the House's often-vicious rivalries. When Nixon tapped him for the White House, the Vice Presidency came at the cost of giving up what Ford told colleagues was his true dream: Speaker of the House.

As Nancy Pelosi knows, that is the more powerful position — at least, it traditionally has been. The speaker's power comes not from public pomp or grand acts of statesmanship, but from hundreds of small ones, usually far beneath the radar of the general public. When Americans notice who the Speaker of the House is, it's usually because they've done something wrong — unless, like Tip O'Neill, they've been in office longer than any of the Presidents they served. Newt Gingrich's notoriety was a rare exception — and his steep fall from grace a cautionary example.

DOJ_NMG_0112178

So who can begrudge Pelosi her four-day "coronation," as right-wing wags have dubbed it? The events themselves are hardly ostentatious: there's a mass, a tea, and prayer service. The most raucous thing on the schedule is a concert by Tony Bennett. Add a tote bag and it'd be a PBS telethon. Indeed, the demographic-pleasing tenor of the events reeks of a self-conscious desire to highlight all soft-focus interest groups that come with the Pelosi package: Italian, female, Catholic, grandmother. With so many facets illuminated, perhaps Pelosi's people are hoping no one notices what's been left out: the only nod to Pelosi's actual home district and voting record may well be Bennett's theme song, "I Left My Heart in San Francisco."

Ford's minor claim on a presidential legacy came about in part because the skilled House gamesman was not prepared to manage expectations once he was elevated into the presidency. Observers assumed that he would tack hard to the side of openness and sunlight to escape Nixon's shadow. But he wound up relying on a coterie of insiders — Nixon's own shadows — from Henry Kissinger to the young Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld, who had no less zeal for the imperial presidency than their predecessors under Nixon.

Pelosi's first challenge is similar to Ford's, and may provide the same kind of disappointment: To succeed, she needs to provide a solid counterpoint to the corruption and arrogance that doomed the G.O.P. Yet the Democrats' "100-hour agenda" already entails suspending the gauzy promise of bipartisan civility that moderate Democrats ran on. Rather, the Democrats will use House rules to prohibit opposition measures — the exact sort of "tyranny of the majority" that the former minority party has been railing against for years. Whatever the stage set (tea or Mass), the week ahead will likely be less a coronation for Pelosi than a long, behind-the-scenes horse-trading auction.

And yet this could be the good news. As the first female Speaker and a San Francisco liberal, Pelosi can use this moment in the spotlight to define herself as anything but a bleeding heart. Pelosi's brazen decision to have her "People's Open House" be invitation-only could paint her as cynical or, with the right spin, as simply a savvy realist. A successful reintroduction for Pelosi should combine the warm fuzzy of a northern California family woman with the bare-knuckle skills of a backroom pol: the iron grandma.

If Pelosi can pull it off, perhaps there's hope for another prominent female politician, whose White House ambitions have been dogged by an apparently immutable public image: Hillary Clinton. The last event of Pelosi's swearing-in celebrations is the renaming of the 200 block of Albemarle St., in Baltimore, as Via Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi. President Street is only a block away.

A Snit In First Class (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

I have a dream, my friends. I have a dream that we are approaching the day when a ranch-owning millionaire Republican like George Bush will make peace with a vineyard-owning millionaire Democrat like Nancy Pelosi.

I have a dream that Pelosi, who was chauffeured to school as a child and who, with her investor husband, owns minority shares in the Auberge du Soleil resort hotel and the CordeValle Golf Club, will look over her famous strand of South Sea Tahitian pearls and forge bonds of understanding with the zillionaire corporate barons in the opposing party.

Furthermore, I dream of a great harmonic convergence among the obscenely rich — between Randian hedge fund managers on the right and helipad environmentalists on the left. I dream that the big-money people who seem to dominate our politics will put aside their partisan fury and discover the class solidarity that Karl Marx always said they shared, and their newfound civility will trickle down to the rest of us. I dream that Berkeley will make peace with Buckhead, Streisand with De Vos, Huffington with O'Reilly.

I have my dreams, but of course, I am realistic too, for I am aware that at present there is no peace among the secluded island villas. I look out across the second homes of America and its surrounding tropical regions and I see polarization among the Kate Spade devotees and bitterness among the Rolexes. And I know that both Bush and Pelosi are part of an upper-income whirlwind of strife.

Some people believe that Pelosi is an airhead, but that is wrong. Some people believe she is a radical San Francisco liberal, but that, too, is wrong. The main fact to know about Pelosi is that she is a creature of the modern fund-raising system.

DOJ_NMG_0112179

Some politicians rise because they run political machines. Some rise because they are great communicators. Pelosi has risen because she is a master of the thousand-dollar-a-plate fundraising circuit.

Living amid a web of investors, venture capitalists and West Coast technology tycoons, she raised heroic amounts of money for the Democratic Party before she ever thought of running for anything herself. In 1984, she was the state party chairwoman. In 1986, she was the national fund-raising chairwoman for the Senate Democrats.

Since coming to the House, she has discovered what many a savvy pol has discovered — that the fastest way to ascend in Congress is to raise a lot of money and give it to your peers.

She paid her dues selecting party favors, arranging seating charts (after that, legislation is easy), and laying thick dollops of obsequiousness on cranky old moguls and their helmet hair spa-spouses. She has done what all political fund-raisers do: tell rich people things they already believe, demonize the other side, motivate the giving with Manichaean tales of good versus evil.

It is no wonder The Los Angeles Times calls her a "rabid Democrat" or that Time magazine calls her "hyperpartisan." It is not a surprise, as The Washington Post reported this week, that despite campaign promises about changing the tone in Washington, Pelosi has decided to exclude Republicans from the first burst of legislation — to forbid them to offer amendments or alternatives.

She is part of the clash of the rival elites, with the dollars from Brookline battling dollars from Dallas, causing upper-class strife that even diminutive dogs, vibrant velvets and petite salades can't fully soothe.

It pains me to see plutocrats fight, because it sets such a poor example for those of us in the lower orders who fly commercial. It pains me even more because politicians from the rival blueblood clans go to embarrassing lengths to try to prove they are most authentically connected with working Americans.

Think of John Kerry visiting a Wendy's or Bill Frist impersonating a Bible thumper. This week, witness Pelosi going on her all-about-me inauguration tour, which is designed to rebrand her as a regular Catholic grandma from Baltimore. Members of the middle classes never have to mount campaign swings to prove how regular they are, but these upper-bracket types can't help themselves, and they always lay it on too thick.

So I harbor my dreams of reconciliation, but in the meantime, why oh why can't we have a decent overclass in this country — a group of highly attractive dimwits who spread bland but worthy stability over our political scene. Why oh why do we have to have this endless canapé war — the people of the vineyard against the people of the ranch.

Next Article in Opinion (5 of 12) »

Passed Over By Pelosi, Harman Doesn't Get Even. She Gets Mad. (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

Catfight aftermath:Rep. Jane Harmanis still quite irked that House Speaker-designeeNancy Pelosinixed her for chairman of the House intelligence committee -- and she's not exactly being stoic about it.

Friends and colleagues say Harman has openly complained that she was cut loose by her fellow California Democrat and one-time friend, Pelosi, who picked insteadSilvestreReyes(D-Tex.), a former Border Patrol agent. A Harvard Law graduate with a gold-plated political rÃ©sumÃ©, Harman was the ranking Democrat on the intelligence committee and first in line for the chairmanship.

She has lamented that Congress has lost its luster for her and that she is hoping for a job in a Democratic administration, according to a friend. "She's obsessed," the source said. "It's been hard for her not to take it personally, but it's over."

In 2003, Pelosi handpicked Harman to become the ranking Democrat on the panel, a post that Pelosi had occupied. But Pelosi made it known last year that Harman was out if Democrats took back the House. Pelosi and other liberal Democrats believed that Harman, a moderate, failed to challenge the administration's alleged abuses of intelligence. Harman was stunned by the news and launched an overtly aggressive campaign to win the chairmanship, which only served to strengthen Pelosi's resolve. A former House member who knows both women well said Harman "really needs to grow up" and "she's not simply entitled to a chairmanship."

Harman's office issued a statement saying the flap is "something in the past tense" and that the congresswoman is "looking forward to continuing to have a strong voice on national security issues" through her other committees.

As for Pelosi . . . she has clearly moved on.A Complex Greeting

Nothing is ever simple when it comes toJohn Kerry.

The senator from Massachusetts and his wife,Teresa Heinz Kerry, sent out 75,000 Christmas cards with pictures of trees at each season. The Kerrys gushed over their "gratitude for the beauty of these trees and the life they represent."

But it didn't end there.

The card came in an odd-looking envelope, one of those with a return-mail flap and instructions to send it to . . . well, to a recycling company, so "it can be made into new carpet tile."

Carpet tile?

We want a "world without waste . . . where every product either returns safely to the soil or becomes a new product."

So the card instructs: "1. Remove this panel and insert it along with the card into the envelope. 2. Expose adhesive strip and fold the flap over to seal the envelope. 3. Drop this mailer into any U.S. mailbox."

Who else would send a Christmas card with a to-do list?Food for Thought

Call it the McDonald's clause. Underpaid Hill aides who have long relied on journalists' expense accounts for pricey meals and fine wines better start thinking fast food.

The proposed ethics package, crafted by Democrats and first up on the House calendar, bans legislators and staffers from receiving gifts and meals not only from lobbyists but also from the organizations that employ them.

So, to spell it out: Any news organization that employs a lobbyist -- and there are many, including The Washington Post -- no longer will be able to court congressional sources over an expensive steak, or even cheap fries.

The new ban and how to interpret it has caused much confusion on the Hill. There is a long list of "common sense" exemptions, which would suggest that Hill folks will need to carry a laminated copy of the bill with them at all times.The Elephant in the Room

As the new Democratic Senate gets sworn in today, the big question is whether Sen.Tim Johnson's serious medical condition will affect the party's fragile majority.

His office made it clear yesterday that the South Dakota Democrat's recovery from a brain hemorrhage will be slow and that he will not be voting anytime soon. He spent his 60th birthday last week in the intensive-care unit of George Washington University Hospital, where he has been in critical condition since emergency brain surgery Dec. 13.

He has not spoken since the surgery, said a spokesman, and he remains on a ventilator at night. Johnson is up for reelection in two years, but until then no authority can remove him from office.

"One vote really shouldn't matter if senators keep their pledge and work in a bipartisan manner," saidJim Manley, spokesman for incoming Senate Majority LeaderHarry Reid(Nev.).

Julianne Fisher, a spokesman for Johnson, said his staff has sought guidance fromSen. Joseph Biden(D-Del.), who was out for seven months in 1988 after surgery for two brain aneurysms.

Biden's office offered this first piece of advice to Johnson's staff: Stop sending out mail in the senator's name.November Surprise

George McGovern, the liberal 1972 Democratic presidential nominee, dropped a little bombshell to Larry King the other night: He voted Republican in 1976, for Gerald Ford.

McGovern said he finally told his wife, Eleanor, that Thanksgiving. Her reply: "So did I."

House Panel To Review 3 Challenges To Elections Of GOP Lawmakers (USAT)

By Ana Radelat

USA Today, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — When Rep. Jim McCrery takes the congressional oath of office Thursday, he'll be one of three Republican lawmakers whose elections to the House are still in dispute because of challenges filed by candidates they defeated.

DOJ_NMG_0112181

All three elections may be scrutinized by the House Administration Committee, but in the meantime, McCrery and the other two House members will be allowed to serve.

Their challengers stand only a slim chance of victory.

More than 100 election challenges have been filed by losing candidates since 1933, but nearly all have been dismissed by the House.

"I am confident that this challenge will be dismissed, as similar challenges to other members of Congress have been in the past," McCrery said Wednesday.

Democrat Patti Cox filed a challenge with the House last month that says McCrery violated the qualification clause of the Constitution.

That clause requires a House member to be at least 25 years old, a citizen of the United States for at least seven years and, when elected, "an inhabitant of the state in which he shall be chosen."

McCrery sold his house in Shreveport in 2004 and moved his family to McLean, Va., across the Potomac River from Washington.

Cox says McCrery hasn't had a residence in Louisiana since then. But McCrery says he's had places to stay in Shreveport since his move.

"I was born in Shreveport, and have been a resident of Louisiana my entire life, except for three years in elementary school," McCrery said. "I own property in Caddo Parish and pay both property and income taxes in Louisiana. I vote in Louisiana, and have always kept a residence in Shreveport while serving in Congress."

The other lawmakers facing election-related challenges are Florida Republicans Tom Feeney and Vern Buchanan. Feeney's election is being contested by Democrat Clint Curtis, and Buchanan is being challenged by Christine Jennings.

An echo of Florida's problems in the 2000 presidential election, those challenges focus on the integrity of touch-screen voting machines used in the Nov. 7 elections.

George Shevlin, staff director for the Democrats who will take control of the House Administration Committee in the 110th Congress, said it's likely the panel will set up a three-member task force to review each complaint.

After the investigations, which could take months, the House would vote to accept or reject the panel's recommendation to keep or unseat a member.

Cox also has fought McCrery's re-election in state and federal courts in Louisiana. She said she knows she has little chance of success, but the fight "is consuming me."

She said what she wants McCrery to provide is simple — some evidence that he has lived in Louisiana recently.

"If he's a resident of Louisiana, he's in and that's that," Cox said.

McCrery, who is about to begin serving his 11th term, is preparing a response to the challenge, said spokesman Michael Steel.

An electoral complaint based on residency hasn't been upheld since 1824, when John Bailey, elected from Massachusetts to the 18th Congress, was unseated after House colleagues determined he was living in Washington instead of Massachusetts on Election Day.

The 110th Congress will seat 233 Democrats and 202 Republicans in the House. Those numbers could change, of course, if any of the election challenges are upheld.

Most challenges, including the two from Florida, are filed after a bitter, close election.

But McCrery was re-elected with about 57% of the vote and Cox received 13%. Two other candidates received the rest.

A Democratic Trade Agenda (WSJ)

By Max Baucus

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

Forty-five years ago, President Kennedy challenged America to confront competitive challenges in Europe and Asia with a new, expansive trade policy. In response, Congress passed a landmark bill creating the forerunner of the U.S. Trade Representative and trade adjustment assistance for workers hurt by international trade. Today we face another crossroads.

DOJ_NMG_0112182

At a time when our country's competitive strength depends increasingly on an aggressive trade policy, Americans are far less willing to embrace one. Many equate trade and globalization with ballooning deficits, stagnating wages and layoffs. Meanwhile, even as China and India have continued their economic reawakening, America has lacked the leadership to tackle the associated challenges through trade. U.S. policy has lurched frantically from one trade agreement to the next, eking out just enough votes to push each one through Congress.

Some think that the new Democratic congressional majority will be bad for trade policy. While it is true that some candidates criticized trade in their campaigns, I believe that the new Congress will have both the desire and opportunity to renew U.S. trade policy, with a unifying purpose that Americans can understand and support. Through trade, we must bolster the nation's innovative economy in an increasingly global marketplace. At the same time, we must tackle with equal vigor the negative domestic consequences of globalization, from trade deficits to job losses.

Congress should begin by renewing the administration's fast-track negotiating authority for trade agreements. The current grant expires in June, and trading partners will not negotiate trade agreements with us unless Congress gives the president the ability to bring these agreements to fruition. The success of America's ranches and farms, as well as the success of businesses big and small, requires that the president have this ability. Exports account for 10% of GDP; our $62.4 billion in agriculture exports alone generated an additional $92 billion in additional economic activity last year. My home state of Montana exports fully 60% of the wheat grown there.

Fast-track authority should be improved as it is renewed, with better trade enforcement capability and better environmental and labor provisions. By making those changes, we can protect American interests, project America's values, and help to create consumer classes capable of purchasing more U.S.-made goods. And as we address expiring fast-track authority, we must take on -- head-on -- globalization's downsides, especially worker displacement and the unsustainable trade deficit.

The trade deficit requires action on several fronts, which include beefing up U.S. export promotion programs and dedicating more time and resources to trade enforcement. We must also recognize that the trade deficit has causes closer to home, especially Americans' negative savings rate.

When it comes to helping workers, we must make the Trade Adjustment Assistance (TAA) program, which expires in September, more reflective of today's innovative economy.

TAA is our commitment that America will provide wage and health benefits while trade-displaced workers retool, retrain, and find better jobs. And a renewed TAA must do what today's program does not. TAA must be available to the eight out of 10 American workers who make their money in services professions; and it must apply to all workers displaced by trade, not just those affected by free-trade agreements. In fact, we should seriously examine the idea of expanding TAA into "GAA" -- Globalization Adjustment Assistance that would offer benefits not only to workers displaced by trade, but to those displaced by all aspects of globalization.

In addition to these new priorities, we must refocus current trade efforts. The Doha round is of obvious importance, but the world's economies do not appear ready to make the hard choices necessary to bring the round to an ambitious conclusion. Doha may yet progress in time, as the Uruguay round did after 1990. But until then, America should move forward on commercially significant initiatives with our largest trading partners. We should lay the foundations for a future free-trade agreement with the European Union and Japan by concluding a first ever free-trade agreement in services. We should stitch our current patchwork quilt of free-trade agreements into a seamless, coherent network that we can later open to other countries. Even more immediately, we must enforce China's trade and investment commitments. Doing that will help to boost the U.S. gross domestic product by $86.5 billion over the next three years.

President Kennedy's free-trade challenge helped to cement the nation's role as a global economic leader, and engaging with the world has helped Americans prosper at home. Twelve million American jobs depend on trade today -- and the right trade policy improvements will create more jobs and better opportunities for American workers and businesses in the future.

Mr. Baucus is a Democratic senator from Montana and the incoming chairman of the Finance Committee.

The Chairman's Turf (WP)

By David Montgomery

DOJ_NMG_0112183

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

EL PASO Silvestre Reyes is straight out of Border Country, that place of lawmen and bandits, pluck and luck.

Grows up on a cotton farm along the Rio Grande, oldest of 10, struggling with English as a kid. Helicopter gunner in Vietnam, some college, marries his high school sweetheart (honeymoon at the Mesa Motel), lands a solid government job -- Border Patrol. He works like hell for 26 years, gets shot at by Mexican train robbers, rises from agent to bridge inspector to chief for West Texas and Arizona.

"Outdoor work," he calls it, for someone with "a flair for a little danger" -- but unexpected work for the boy who used to warn undocumented farm workers when la migra came around.

Next, a grateful citizenry sends its tough but soft-spoken lawman to Congress, reelects him five times, the first Latino to represent his 80 percent Hispanic district.

Reyes is, in short, that most cherished of political properties, the real guy, a man of the people, not just someone who pretends to be.

"He is a Real Life 101 politician. He's been there," says Cindy Ramos-Davidson, chief executive of the El Paso Hispanic Chamber of Commerce. "He can talk with the best of the best and the lowest of the lowest. There are a lot of people in elected office who have never had Real Life 101. It's wondering where the next paycheck is coming from, it's balancing family life and work life. It's helped him stay human, for lack of a better word. "

Now, though, he stands at a perilous political intersection. Today he becomes the new chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, assigned to ride herd on 16 spy agencies with an estimated collective budget of $42 billion.

In Washington's power corridors you can hear the whispers. Isn't this one of those jobs that demand intellectual firepower? (Never mind those other whispers, as old as the republic, that not a few in Congress, even some of the stars, are, actually, well, dopes.)

All that Real Life stuff is swell. But the new outlaws are more lethal and formidable than ever. Is an instinct for the Common Man what the nation requires to ensure the global war on terror is successful -- and constitutional?

Can credential-crazy Washington countenance an intelligence chief with a two-year community college degree? Not to mention that ambush from Congressional Quarterly, where Reyes blew the question of whether al-Qaeda is Sunni or Shiite.

It's a big challenge for a lawman from a dusty border town.

"The border is a tough area to work," Reyes says one morning, standing down here in that dust at the edge of two countries. "Sometimes there are no rules. The big rule is 'Survive.' "A Sound of a Horn

His grandfather once rode with Mexican revolutionary Pancho Villa -- carried a rifle, wore bandoleers and a big sombrero, the full rebel regalia -- then fled to this valley to farm. His father dropped out of the sixth grade to work these fields. Up into this life came young Silvestre, named after his grandfather.

He didn't need much English to be the lookout.

"There was a kind of early-warning system whenever the Border Patrol was working the valley," Reyes recalls, gazing across the land at Mexico. "My job was to be at the entrance to our farm. We had a truck that had this big air horn. Whenever I saw the migra coming, I would blow three blasts on the horn. All the workers would scatter and hide.

"Of course the Border Patrol knew what was going on. They'd come up and ask me what I was doing.

"Just playing on the horn. "

A deadpan twinkle gleams out of Reyes's round face.

So his first job was in intelligence. Eight years old and already he was a little bit cagey and shrewd, this boy in Border Country.

Later, he tamed the wild El Paso-Juarez line, revolutionized border security for all of America, climbed from the edge of this desert to become the first Latino to chair such a key congressional committee. He'll soon find out if frontier wiles can tame the bureaucratic badlands of "black" budgets and shadow kingdoms. Already he's been outsmarted once.

The gotcha pop quiz, the ritual Washington hazing once you've achieved real power and better guard it in hostile territory: Reyes was doing all right until the al-Qaeda question.

"Predominantly -- probably Shiite," he said to Congressional Quarterly.

DOJ_NMG_0112184

Guess again, congressman! Ah, yes, that ineluctable rite of passage, a rookie pooh-bah's baptismal gaffe. Over to you, Jay Leno: "Apparently the term 'intelligence committee' is just a suggestion."

Reyes tried to brush it off, tried to explain -- it was late in the day; he knew the answer but misspoke; and heck: "I got through all the hard ones, I talked about the 12th Imam!"

Finally he stopped spinning and did something much more typical for someone who never intended to be a politician. He conceded his blunder.

"When you screw up," he says, "you admit it, then you move on."Accidental Career

Ask about Reyes, 62, around El Paso and Capitol Hill, and you keep hearing those cliched themes: He's a nice guy, he's "human," and "what you see is what you get."

You hear it enough about Reyes -- universally known as "Silver" since his school days, even by his wife of 38 years, Carolina -- that you wonder if he might be too nice to be intelligence chairman, not Machiavellian enough. To do a good job in Washington, backs must be stabbed.

He doesn't have the plotting ambition of the career pol. He wound up as intelligence chairman almost by accident, when Speaker Nancy Pelosi passed over two candidates ahead of him -- she didn't get along with one, didn't like the ethics cloud over the other. Reyes was in his garage building shelves to store Christmas decorations when she called to anoint him.

He landed in Congress in the first place only when, as the popular local Border Patrol chief, he reluctantly yielded to entreaties from El Paso business types to run.

"He has always started at the bottom," Carolina Reyes says. "He never said, 'I'm going to become chief.' He never said, 'I'm going to be a politician.' . . . He does his job, and comes up with good ideas, and gets promoted."

Yet here he is, astride the juncture of several key fault lines in American culture: a Latino Democrat, when his party is trying to solidify itself as the party for minorities; a veteran with a law enforcement background, when his party is trying to bolster its bona fides on national security; a congressional player on national security policy at a time of war; a former border guard who can shore up the Democrats' enforcement flank in the immigration debate.

That career with the Border Patrol was born only after he had taken every federal agency entrance exam he could think of, and the Border Patrol was the first to call.

He went from having been a lookout to being one of the lookers. For a few years, he worked one of the bridges between El Paso and Juarez.

Lean out the booth window, peer into the car: "Citizenship? What are you bringing from Mexico?" He learned how to read people fast. What were they leaving? What did they want? This is how intelligence works in the field.

Sometimes he practices a little craft on his colleagues. Behind the almost always deadpan face -- it is the jowly, deceptive deadpan of comedian Jonathan Winters, just before a deadly punch line -- is the winking soul of a connoisseur of pranks. Many have failed to recognize the twinkle until it's too late. They tell Silver Reyes stories, fondly, even as they plot paybacks.

"I get accused of all these weird things," Reyes protests.

Once, someone passed on to an aide of Vice President Gore the happy news that Rep. Solomon Ortiz (D-Tex.), a bachelor for decades, had just married someone with a made-up-sounding name like Ramona Corona. This happened at the vice president's residence, during a reception for the Hispanic Caucus. So Gore publicly congratulated Ortiz on his nuptials to Ramona Corona. Suddenly the dean of the caucus, who had been enjoying the company of two pretty young things seated on either side of him, had a lot of explaining to do.

"I knew real quick it came from Silver," says Ortiz, still single.

There was the time in 2003 when Reyes and Rep. Eliot Engel (D-N.Y.) were part of a delegation to North Korea whose representatives insisted on beginning each session with rote denunciations of the United States. Bored, Engel was slipping his shoes on and off beneath the table. Finally he tried to put them on, and they weren't there! He blindly probed the floor in all directions with his stocking feet while the North Koreans droned on.

"When the tirade ended, and the meeting ended, I got up, and I saw my shoes all the way on the other side of Silver," Engel says.

Just playing on the horn.

DOJ_NMG_0112185

A prankster is a student of human nature. A little part of him remains detached, on the lookout for weakness, absurdity, vanity. Good qualities, perhaps, for questioning spy chiefs. And an even more startling one:

"He doesn't think he knows everything," says Engel. "He's willing to listen and willing to learn."

"He asks tough questions," says Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), who just lost his reelection bid. "He won't be pushed around."

A final lesson from Real Life 101: He quit college to go to work, not realizing it would expose him to the draft. He went almost directly to boot camp, then to war. During an enemy rocket attack, he lost the hearing in his right ear.

Years later, in Congress, confronted with President Bush's eagerness to take on Iraq, Reyes recalled his direct experience with the unpredictable hell of war. He considered the intelligence he was privy to as a committee member. And on the Iraq war resolution, he voted no.

A lot of folks now say he passed that yes-or-no quiz with flying colors.Law of Absolutes

A border implies a binary logic of either or, one or the other, but Border Country teaches that nothing is that simple. No matter how far away he goes, Reyes carries within him this rich interior and exterior landscape -- paradoxical, organic, alive -- that shaped him.

From an overlook where the purple mountains cut triangles against the blue sky, El Paso and Ciudad Juarez look like a single city, with a combined population of 2.1 million, sprawling across the valley. But down on the ground, the picture sharpens, the border draws its distinctions -- riverbed, chain-link fence, markers in the lonely scrubland insisting vainly on who is who and where is where.

The billboards on both sides are in Spanish, but Juarez feels different. The streets meander, filled to bursting, traffic surging to el Norte . El Paso is a community with a bit of a chip on its shoulder. Eighty percent Hispanic, it feels isolated from the rest of Texas in a different time zone, disparaged by Anglo America, misunderstood by Washington, burdened yet bonded with Mexico.

One recent morning, Reyes stood in the dust of the frontier at the end of the infamous "black bridge," the old rail trestle where a friend and fellow agent was hit over the head and killed, where hundreds of would-be immigrants would mass on the Mexican side and sprint across in "banzai runs," overwhelming the Border Patrol.

"To appreciate the peace and tranquility that is here now, you've got to imagine what it was like," he says.

It was chaos.

When the river was dry, the Mexicans walked over. When the river flowed, entrepreneurs set up ferry services; peddlers sold Cokes and snacks. There were crazy hot-pursuit chases on downtown streets, through back yards, even across the campus of a high school on the border.

Enough! decided the first Latino sector chief in Border Patrol history. One Sunday morning in 1993, El Paso and Juarez awoke to find the border sealed by 400 agents spread along 20 miles.

At first there was an uproar. Protesters threw rocks, closed bridges, burned effigies. Merchants fretted about lost sales. The Catholic Church pleaded for mercy. The Mexican government complained to the State Department. Even Border Patrol brass in Washington gave Reyes a hard time.

On just whose side was this grandson of one of Pancho Villa's riders?

"This is the ex-Border Patrol agent who made a career of deporting his people," says El Paso immigration lawyer Carlos Spector.

Reyes made one concession: He changed the name of his crackdown from Operation Blockade to the more politically correct Operation Hold the Line. He was ready to outlast a political siege of weeks. "I knew the system pretty well, I could identify overtime money that I needed to get through the first four to six weeks," he recalls with relish, and he had squirreled it away in anticipation. Daily illegal crossings plummeted from up to 10,000 to a few hundred. Reyes was summoned to the Oval Office, where, standing humbly in his pressed green uniform like a Boy Scout with an easel and a wooden pointer, he briefed President Clinton and Attorney General Janet Reno.

"He literally changed the culture of the Border Patrol through his own initiative," says David Aguilar, the current national chief of the Border Patrol. "He is very innovative, very aggressive, very focused."

The Border Patrol adopted the maverick chief's innovation nationwide -- and Reyes became a hero to the tough-on-illegal-immigrants crowd, the Minuteman types.

DOJ_NMG_0112186

His own view is not so simple. He felt -- feels -- compassion for border crossers, understands their yearning and risk-taking. He was once their lookout.

"You see the misery coming across the border," he says. "You recognize that they're not criminals, that these are people that are down and out because of economic circumstances. . . . The only difference between you and them is fate."

Haunted by the misery, he used to startle his wife, coming in unexpectedly from his midnight shift. He would start pulling clothes out of his closet to give to border crossers he had detained. "He would also come home for lunch during the day," Carolina Reyes says, "and I would say, 'But you took your lunch,' and he would say, 'We gave our lunches to the people that we found. They were starving.' "

Then he would deport them. Dash those dreams, not unlike the dreams of his grandfather. "You took an oath to enforce the law, you're carrying a badge and a gun," Reyes says. "The way you honor that commitment is by treating them with dignity and respect."

His perspective on the immigration debate is formed by the messy reality on the ground in Border Country. He calls the 700-mile border fence law signed by President Bush "ridiculous, ludicrous and stupid." He supports a path to citizenship for undocumented workers.

"People talk about illegal immigration and they cite statistics," he says. "You're handling not statistics, but people, family units."

Still: The 12 million undocumented immigrants in the United States are "a shadow world where people who want to hurt us can operate," he says. "The only way we are going to reduce that shadow world is to have a legalization program. I think it's a part of the national security strategy."

A quarter-century in the field of Border Country yields Reyes this intelligence: Misery can lead to desperation, and desperation sometimes turns peace into chaos.Invisible Borders

On a recent night in December, all of El Paso society has converged at the downtown art museum to salute Reyes -- 1,000 people from politics, business, the military, education, charity, bursting with local pride. They blame the "sharks" in Washington for the public shaming of the pop quiz.

Reyes gets up to speak, and the microphone begins to squeal. "It's already the CIA doing this," he cracks. Then he chokes up. The audience is equally emotional. He is the local boy, he has made good. "Que viva Silvestre!" they shout, and they send him off to cross one more frontier, migrating from a mid-bench seat in the political minority into the leadership.

The borders in Washington are no less dicey for being invisible. They define fiefdoms -- Congress, the White House, the media, the intelligence agencies -- and are subject to rogue incursions and political banditry.

"One of the first things we're going to have to do is reclaim our turf," reflects the chairman. "We have ceded and abdicated our role as a co-equal branch of government."

Today, he goes on the lookout again. On border patrol.

Staff researcher Rena Kirsch contributed to this report.

Johnson Improving; Will Still Need Months Of Rehabilitation (AL)

By Faith Bremner

Argus Leader, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON – New test results show Sen. Tim Johnson, who has needed a ventilator to breathe and prolonged doses of medication to prevent swelling on his brain, has improved but will need several months of rehabilitation and physical therapy to continue his recovery from surgery.

An angiogram Wednesday at George Washington University Hospital confirmed that surgeons had successfully corrected the tangle of arteries and veins that caused debilitating stroke-like symptoms and bleeding in Johnson's brain. The procedure involves injecting dye into an artery to light up the blood vessels.

DOJ_NMG_0112187

But Johnson, 60, remains in critical condition three weeks after emergency brain surgery Dec. 13 and his long-term outlook is not clear, Dr. Vivek Deshmukh, head of Johnson's surgical team, said Wednesday.
Deshmukh said the senator had developed fluid in his lungs, an effect of the initial bleeding, which is why Johnson has been on a ventilator. Johnson also had been sedated for about two weeks to rest and minimize swelling on his brain.
That was a relatively long stretch – often patients are sedated for only a few days – that doctors say indicates the senator's condition is severe, his symptoms difficult to shake, and the risk of long-term damage that could affect his ability to move and talk still significant.
Johnson was rushed to the hospital after becoming disoriented on a call with reporters and had surgery hours later.
Johnson's doctors have said that when he arrived at the hospital, he was feeling weakness on his right side. Based on that, doctors have said the tangle of vessels probably was on the left side of Johnson's brain. Damage in that area can cause permanent speech problems and areas of paralysis on the right side of a patient's body.
Dr. Keith Siller, medical director of the Comprehensive Stroke Care Center at New York University Medical Center, who is not involved in Johnson's care, said the big question, now, is how much damage Johnson's brain suffered in the initial bleed.
"The surgery does not erase the stroke that has taken place," he said.
Dr. Sean Grady, chairman of the Department of Neurosurgery at the University of Pennsylvania, said it probably will be days to weeks before doctors can judge whether Johnson will be able to speak, because the ventilator tube has obstructed his vocal cords.
The key neurological milestone will come in about three months, when doctors assess how much his brain has recovered from the injury. Typically, Grady said, recovery takes six to 12 months.
Deshmukh said in a statement that Johnson's "overall medical condition has improved steadily" since the surgery and that the senator is approaching "the next phase" of his recovery: physical therapy.
Johnson has been removed from sedation and now needs ventilator assistance only at night.
Deshmukh said the two-term Democrat's breathing is stronger and he "continues to be responsive to both his family and physicians – following commands, squeezing his wife's hand and understanding speech."
Johnson's wife, Barbara, said Wednesday that "Tim has had some challenging days since surgery, but step by step, he's been making great progress.
"We know there is a long road in front of us," she added, "but Tim's determination will make all the difference and he'll be back at work as soon as he can be."
The tangle of blood vessels that caused Johnson's illness is called arteriovenous malformation. Doctors say people are typically born with it and only suffer severe problems if the tangled vessels grow too large and burst, causing bleeding in the brain, as in Johnson's case.

DOJ_NMG_0112188

According to the National Library of Medicine, about 300,000 Americans have the condition, but only about 36,000 show symptoms. Of those who suffer ruptures, about 10 percent die.

Sen. Johnson Angiogram Good News (RCJA)

By Bill Harlan

Rapid City Journal Johnson's Angiogram, January 4, 2007

An angiogram Wednesday morning showed no sign of the blood-vessel defect that felled Sen. Tim Johnson three weeks ago, and a neurosurgeon says the senator is being weaned off the ventilator that has helped him breath since his emergency brain surgery.

"His breathing has steadily improved and now he only requires ventilator assistance at night," Dr. Vivek Deshmukh said in a written statement released by Johnson's office.

The ventilator was necessary because fluid had developed in Johnson's lungs as a result of a leaking "arteriovenous malformation," or "AVM."

Doctors describe AVMs as tangles of blood vessels that are often present from birth. AVMs can go undetected for decades. But they also can leak, causing an "intracranial hemorrhage" that results in stroke-like symptoms.

Johnson's symptoms were first noticed when he had difficulty speaking during a conference call with reporters Dec. 13. He also had weakness on the right side of his body.

Johnson was sedated for more than two weeks after the surgery, but Julianne Fisher, a spokesman for the senator, said doctors had discontinued the sedation.

The senator's wife, Barb Johnson, said Wednesday that the family was pleased with the angiogram results.

"Tim has had some challenging days since surgery, but step by step, he's been making great progress," she said in a written statement. "We know there is a long road in front of us, but Tim's determination will make all the difference, and he'll be back at work as soon as he can be."

Deshmukh said Johnson has continued to respond to his family and to doctors. He has been following commands and squeezing his wife's hand.

Johnson also understands speech, Fisher said, but he has not spoken. The ventilator -- a mechanical device that aids breathing through an incision in the neck and a tube down the throat -- prevents him from talking, Fisher said. Doctors hope to take Johnson off the ventilator within a week, she said. Then they'll test his speech.

Fisher said Johnson's condition has steadily improved in the past three weeks but that his recovery is expected to take "several months." Treatment will include physical therapy.

Johnson remains in intensive care at George Washington University Hospital. He's still listed in critical condition, Fisher said, because he's in intensive care and because he's still using the ventilator.

Johnson's illness could have significant political consequences because Democrats hold a 51-49 majority in the upcoming Senate. Republican Gov. Mike Rounds would appoint a replacement if Johnson resigned or died, and Vice President Dick Cheney would cast tie-breaking votes in a 50-50 Senate.

However, there is precedent for senators keeping their seats while they are incapacitated, even for long periods of time.

Contact Bill Harlan at 394-8424 or at bill.harlan@rapidcityjournal.com

Johnson Recovery Expected To Require Several Months (USAT)

By Jeff Martin

USA Today, January 4, 2007

Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., has been on a ventilator to help with his breathing after he developed fluid in his lungs, a doctor said today, but medical experts see his test today as a positive sign for his recovery.

Johnson underwent an angiogram this morning at George Washington University Hospital, according to a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0112189

"Today's angiogram revealed no evidence of residual arteriovenous malformation," said neurosurgeon Vivek Deshmukh said of the condition that caused bleeding in Johnson's brain.

The senator's recovery, which will involve physical therapy and rehabilitation, is expected to take several months, Johnson's office said in a statement.

Johnson "continues to be responsive to both his family and physicians— following commands, squeezing his wife's hand, and understanding speech."

Johnson underwent surgery Dec. 13 in Washington for a condition known as arteriovenous malformation. At the time, his condition put Democrats' control of the Senate in doubt. Losing the South Dakota senator could have split the chamber evenly between Democrats and Republicans, which would effectively put the chamber in GOP control, since Vice President Cheney has the power to break ties.

Though doctors had placed him on a ventilator, "his breathing has steadily improved and now he only requires ventilator assistance at night," Deshmukh said.

"My family and I are so pleased with today's angiogram results, and I want thank everyone for their constant prayers and support," the senator's wife, Barb Johnson, said in a statement.

"Tim has had some challenging days since surgery, but step by step, he's been making great progress. We know there is a long road in front of us, but Tim's determination will make all the difference and he'll be back at work as soon as he can be. We ask that everyone keep us in their prayers," she said.

Senator's Recovery Could Take Months (NYT)

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

Senator Tim Johnson's recovery from a brain hemorrhage is expected to take several months, the senator's office said. A test showed that Mr. Johnson, a South Dakota Democrat, no longer had the tangle of arteries and veins in his brain that caused bleeding last month, resulting in emergency surgery. He has been in critical condition since Dec. 13. While the statement said Mr. Johnson's overall medical condition had steadily improved, it also said he faced several months of physical therapy and rehabilitation. Dr. Vivek Deshmukh, who leads Mr. Johnson's surgical team, said in a statement that the senator "continues to be responsive to both his family and physicians — following commands, squeezing his wife's hand and understanding speech." The senator's illness raised questions about his party's keeping its one-vote majority in the Senate.

Reps. Agree To Pay Back Travel Costs (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, January 4, 2007

Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.) and former Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) have agreed to repay the costs for two separate, privately funded overseas trips, which received new scrutiny as the scandal involving disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff unfolded.

One day before members are sworn in and a new Congress begins, the House ethics committee quietly released two succinct findings, concluding that the attendance by several members of Weldon's family on an undisclosed trip violated House gift rules, and that a trip Feeney took to Scotland in August 2003 with Abramoff also did not comply with House gift rules.

The panel notified Weldon that he must pay "certain expenses of the trip, which exceeded $23,000" to the trip's donors, and noted that Weldon, through counsel, had agreed to make the payments and notify the committee when he has done so.

"We intend to monitor his efforts to repay the expense and to make further public statements if necessary or appropriate," the panel reported in a written statement from Chairman Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and ranking member Howard Berman (D-Calif.)

The committee reported that Feeney contacted it in March 2005 after media reports alleged that Abramoff had paid for the golfing trip to Scotland's renowned St. Andrews course and that the trip was substantially recreational in nature. House rules bar lobbyists from paying for members' travel, and purely recreational junkets. As required, Feeney had reported the trip, noting in his disclosure that expenses related to it totaled $5,643.

DOJ_NMG_0112190

After Feeney voluntarily provided "additional information" about the trip, the members of the panel concluded that it "did not comply with House rules," the one-paragraph release said, adding that Feeney has agreed to pay the cost of the trip to the U.S. Treasury.

"Once we found out that there was some discrepancy, we wanted to do something to make it right," said Feeney Chief of Staff Jason Roe, adding that his boss agrees with the committee's conclusions "100 percent."

The ethics committee did not disclose the details of the Weldon trip in question, noting only that it occurred in January 2003. According to PoliticalMoneyLine, the only trip Weldon took that month was to Russia on the 25th to "speak on topic (sic) of U.S. Russian energy cooperation at the opening event of a Russian energy company."

The FBI is investigating whether Weldon used his influence to help secure lobbying and consulting contracts for his daughter. In particular, the agents were looking into whether Weldon's work between 2002 and 2004 to help two Russian companies and two Serbian brothers connected to former Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic, according to The Washington Post.

In their three-paragraph finding, the committee yesterday said Weldon had contacted the panel prior to taking the trip to seek guidance on whether the trip complied with gift rule provisions allowing a member to accept travel and other benefits resulting from outside activities unrelated to official duties. The panel said at the time its counsel advised Weldon through his staff that he could not "rely on that provision of the gift rule." He then sought a gift rule waiver, but withdrew the request prior to a written response.

The committee reported that Weldon, through his counsel, maintained that he and the trip's sponsor believed that the trip was unrelated to his official duties and, therefore, not subject to gift-rule limitations. The panel, however, disagreed. It concluded that the trip was indeed "officially-connected," and because of that, and the fact that several members of Weldon's family had accompanied him, violated House gift rules. At the time, gift rules allowed only a spouse or child to accompany members on privately sponsored trips.

The committee also noted that it had made these conclusions and called on Weldon to pay the trip's donors in the "middle of this year." News of the FBI probe broke in the middle of a tough campaign that Weldon lost.

Gary Ruskin, who runs the Congressional Accountability Project, was not surprised that the panel waited until the last day of the 109th Congress to release the findings.

"You have to expect the worst from this ethics committee," Ruskin said. "It is unusually harsh for the toothless House ethics committee, which wouldn't even slap Attila the Hun on the wrist."

Even though Feeney voluntarily contacted the panel, Ruskin said the requirement that he pay back the cost of the trip wouldn't act as a deterrent for others because there was no censure or any other kind of punishment.

The Feeney finding also raises new questions about other members and staff who were on the Scotland trip, as well as other foreign travel that has come under FBI scrutiny in the Abramoff-related investigations.

Roe brushed off suggestions that Feeney was singled out by the ethics panel after voluntarily contacting it.

"I'm not going to pass judgment on other people's situations," Roe said. "I work for Tom Feeney and we are primarily concerned about Tom Feeney and his reputation."

The ethics committee on Dec. 29 quietly issued findings on Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) in the wake of allegations that members of his staff were compelled to carry out campaign-related work or personal work for the congressman. Conyers acknowledged what he characterized as a "lack of clarity" in his communications with staff members regarding their official duties and responsibilities, and accepted responsibility for his actions, according to the panel's statement.

Litmus Test For Pro-Life Democrats (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

Near the top of the new Democratic congressional majority's agenda is passage of stem cell research legislation vetoed last year by President Bush, a measure that will answer a major question. There is no doubt the new bill will pass both houses of Congress. What remains in doubt are the votes to be cast by newly elected Democrats who campaigned as pro-life advocates, particularly Pennsylvania Sen.-elect Bob Casey Jr.

DOJ_NMG_0112191

Outside the boundaries of his state, Casey is best known as the son of the Democrat most revered in the pro-life movement: the late Gov. Robert Casey. Denied the podium at the 1992 Democratic National Convention because of his antiabortion views, the elder Casey planned a serious independent campaign for president before being stopped by poor health. But will the son, less ardent a pro-lifer than the father, vote against the embryonic stem cell research bill as he promised during the campaign? Will seven self-described pro-life Democrats newly elected to the House do the same?

Casey's vote may determine whether Bush's second veto is overridden by the Senate. A veto would probably be sustained in the House, with or without help from the seven Democrats. But apart from the stem cell bill, what's at stake is whether pro-lifers have a place in today's Democratic Party. Certainly, that small fraction will be under intense pressure from party leaders.

Casey won a nationally spotlighted contest, defeating the eminent Republican conservative Sen. Rick Santorum. He cut into Santorum's conservative base by winning 36 percent of the state's hard pro-life vote.

The only recorded statement by Casey on stem cell research came in an interview on the Catholic Web site IgnatiusInsight.com on July 29, 2005: "I am and I have always been pro-life. I support the current federal policy on embryonic stem cell research and would oppose the Castle bill to expand federal support of embryonic stem cell research."

That referred to the bill sponsored by Republican Rep. Mike Castle of Delaware that died in 2006 when the House sustained Bush's veto. But a new version is likely to be considered in the Senate, where a supporter -- then-Majority Leader Bill Frist -- conceded in a private session last year that the Castle bill was flawed and needed to be rewritten.

So would Casey oppose any legislation that authorizes federally financed stem cell research on "leftover" embryos from in-vitro fertilization clinics, as the Castle bill did? Casey the younger plays his cards close to his vest, and my efforts to get a commitment one way or another from the new senator or an aide were unavailing.

This is the arithmetic in the Senate, where a vetoed bill would go first: It would take 33 senators to sustain a Bush veto, if ailing Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson (S.D.) were unable to vote. Of the 36 Republicans who voted against the Castle bill, five were defeated for reelection: Santorum, George Allen in Virginia, Conrad Burns in Montana, Mike DeWine in Ohio and James Talent in Missouri. Nebraska Sen. Ben Nelson was the only Senate Democrat who voted no last year, and that means one more Democrat would be needed this year. Casey's vote could be central.

The House sustained last year's veto by a 50-vote margin, and 13 of those members were defeated in November. So even if there are Republican defections, the burden will not fall on seven avowedly pro-life Democrats newly elected to the House: Heath Shuler (N.C.), Charlie Wilson (Ohio), Joe Donnelly (Ind.), Brad Ellsworth (Ind.), Baron Hill (Ind.), Jason Altmire (Pa.) and Chris Carney (Pa.).

But with incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi putting this legislation on her "100 hours" list, these pro-life House Democrats nevertheless will be under intense pressure, as will Nelson; Sen.-elect Jon Tester, the pro-lifer who defeated Burns in Montana; and Bobby Casey.

Casey was embraced by pro-choice Democrats -- led by Sen. Chuck Schumer (N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, and Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell -- as the best bet against Santorum. But they may not have bargained on Casey opposing them on the central party issue of stem cell research. The question of how much of a pro-lifer Casey is or can be in the 21st-century Democratic Party may be answered soon.

OTHER NEWS:

Inflation Remains Chief Concern For Fed Members (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — Inflation is the Federal Reserve's top concern, despite indications the economy may be slowing more than expected, according to minutes of a Dec. 12 meeting released Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0112192

"Several members judged … the downside risks to economic growth in the near term had increased a little and become a bit more broadly based than previously thought," the minutes said.

"Nonetheless, all members agreed that the risk that inflation would fail to moderate as desired remained the predominant concern," according to the minutes of the policymaking Federal Open Market Committee.

The Fed voted in December to hold rates steady at 5.25%, while adding in a statement that additional rate increases were possible.

The minutes, which term the economy "probably a touch softer" than expected, also show that one member of the committee wanted the December statement changed to include the possibility of a rate cut as well as an increase.

But the emphasis was on inflation, with the minutes saying "price pressures were not viewed as convincingly on a downward trend."

Policymakers' next meeting is Jan. 30-31.

The minutes put a damper on stock and bond markets, which have been pricing in rate cuts based on slower economic activity. The Dow Jones industrial average closed at 12,474.52, up 11.37 after hitting an all-time high of 12,580.35 earlier in the day.

Stephen Stanley of Greenwich Capital Markets noted that the inflation picture has improved since the Fed meeting, but that recent data also show economic growth a bit better.

"The Fed remains firmly on hold, nowhere near a tightening or an ease (and quite possibly even further away from a move in either direction)," Stanley told clients.

The Fed raised its target for short-term interest rates from mid-2004 to mid-2006 to blunt inflation. Rates have been at 5.25% since June. Core inflation, which excludes food and energy prices, is at a 2.6% annual pace, above the Fed's informal, preferred 1%-2% range.

Recent data have been mixed. U.S. construction spending fell 0.2% in November, bogged down by the eighth monthly decline in housing. That was partly offset by strong non-residential construction.

Also Wednesday, the private Institute for Supply Management said manufacturing activity rose a bit in December as new orders and production improved. The index moved from 49.5 to 51.4. A reading under 50 signifies contraction.

Data is just one Fed concern. The new, Democrat-controlled Congress will be watching the Fed closely.

Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., incoming chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, said Wednesday he was concerned the Fed would use recent improvement in wages as a reason to raise rates. Rising wages help workers, but can breed inflation.

"I'm afraid … you'll have people in the Fed saying, 'Geez, wages are going up, we better raise interest rates,' " Frank said, noting wages have been stagnant in recent years. "If corporate profits go up, it's a good thing. If wages go up, it's (viewed as) a bad thing."

Fed Worry Tests Rosy Outlook (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Some Federal Reserve officials may be beginning to share the bond market's pessimism about the outlook for economic growth, a summary of the Fed's Dec. 12 policy meeting shows.

But those reservations aren't widespread, and a subsequent rebound in some recent economic indicators may have alleviated the anxiety at the Fed and lessened the odds that interest-rate cuts, which bond-market investors expect, will materialize.

A stock-market rally ended abruptly yesterday with stocks taking a sharp downward turn when the minutes were released at 2 p.m. as the market's recent optimism apparently was shaken by hints that some at the Fed have doubts about the economy. Stocks later rebounded, although they didn't recover all the lost ground (See related story.6)

DOJ_NMG_0112193

At the December meeting, Fed officials said their "outlook for economic growth and inflation...changed relatively little" from the late-October meeting. While the economy "was probably a touch softer than had been expected" then, policy makers still expected it to grow at a bit below its long-term trend over the coming year.

At that meeting, the Fed left its short-term interest-rate target at 5.25% and said afterward that inflation was its principal concern and that any decision on raising rates would depend on incoming data. The language suggested that the Fed, at least in mid-December, saw its next decision as whether to raise rates or leave them alone.

The minutes suggest Fed officials see monetary policy on hold for some months. "Nearly all members felt that maintaining the current target for now was most likely to foster moderate economic growth and a gradual ebbing of core inflation from its elevated levels."

But the summary said that "several" of the Fed's 11 voting policy makers thought the "subdued tone" of some recent economic indicators "meant that the downside risks to economic growth in the near term had increased a little and become a bit more broadly based than previously thought." One of those, whom the minutes didn't name, argued the statement released after the meeting should say rates could be either raised or lowered depending on the evolution of growth and inflation. If the Fed does adopt such a "neutral" statement in coming months, it would likely be seen as a prelude to cutting rates, which markets have expected for months despite Fed officials' rhetoric to the contrary.

ECONOMIC FORECASTING SURVEY

7

See complete coverage of The Wall Street Journal's economic forecasting survey, including interactive graphics with full results, an archive of prior surveys and downloadable data. Surveys conducted 10 times each year. Go to WSJ.com/Economists8

Some of the concerns officials had about growth at the December meeting may have been mollified by recent data. Yesterday's data showed strength in nonresidential construction, a reflection of business capital spending. And an upturn in a purchasing managers' survey for December may have eased concerns of Fed officials who, at the December meeting, called manufacturing a source of "downside risk."

Also, in December, Fed officials said they didn't see signs that inflation was "convincingly on a downward trend," but subsequent data has added to the evidence that it might be.

The minutes were released yesterday, a day later than the usual three-week lag because of the day of mourning for President Gerald Ford.

Fed Remains Focused On Risks To Inflation (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

The new Democrat Congress will take a tougher approach to supervising the Federal Reserve than its Republican predecessor, Barney Frank, the incoming chairman of the House financial services committee, signalled on Wednesday.

His remarks came as the Fed released minutes from its December 12 policy meeting showing it was largely unmoved by signs of economic weakness in the final months of 2006 and remained defiantly focused on the risks to inflation. The minutes, coupled with a stronger-than-expected survey of manufacturing, sent equities lower, while bond yields fell slightly.

In a speech to the National Press Club, Mr Frank said “there are people who think the Fed should be above democracy”.

He added: “We can debate the most fundamental questions in human existence, but God forbid anybody in elected office should talk about whether or not we need a 25 basis-point increase from the Fed.”

Mr Frank said interest rates were a matter of “public policy” and suggested the Democrat Congress would be both more hands-on and less deferential in its scrutiny of the Fed than the outgoing Republican Congress.

His remarks may trouble Fed policymakers, who will not want interest rate decisions to be politicised. They could also make some Fed officials additionally cautious about raising the issue of a numerical inflation objective, for fear that this could trigger a broader debate about what the Fed should target.

However, Fed insiders do not expect Mr Frank or his party to be hostile to the central bank.

DOJ_NMG_0112194

Ben Bernanke, chairman of the Fed, recognises the importance of the Fed being seen to be accountable to Congress, and has invested considerable time meeting senior elected officials, including Mr Frank. If he does decide to push ahead with an inflation objective, he will try to explain why he sees this as consistent with the Fed's existing Congressional mandate.

Nonetheless, an increase in political scrutiny would come at an awkward time, with the Fed at odds with the bond market over the prospects for the US economy. Wednesday's minutes show the Fed policymakers meeting on December 12 viewed near-term weakness as primarily the result of short-term factors that would not significantly effect the forecasts on which it bases its policy decisions.

Indeed, "the outlook for economic growth and inflation was thought to have changed relatively little since the previous meeting" in late October. All the policymakers also "agreed that the risk that inflation would fail to moderate as desired remained the predominant concern".

Fed officials did not ignore the weaker data entirely. Several policymakers judged that "the downside risks to economic growth in the near term had increased a little".

And for the first time in recent months, one committee member suggested the Fed explicitly refer to the possibility that it might have to cut rates if growth weakened further.

However, the tone of the minutes suggests the Fed still does not buy the market's view that the economy faces sustained weakness that will demand interest rate cuts. Wednesday's data appeared to support that view.

The Institute for Supply Management said its index of manufacturing activity climbed into positive territory in December.

The index rose to 51.4 last month after its worst reading in five years in the previous month, when it fell below the 50 mark – indicating a contraction.

Additional reporting by Anuj Gangahar in New York and Eoin Callan in Washington

Fed Reveals Concern Over Housing Slump (WP/AP)

By Jeannine Aversa And Tim Paradis

The Washington Post/AP, January 4, 2007

Heightened concern about a harsher-than-expected housing slump was a key factor in the Federal Reserve's decision to hold interest rates steady at its policymaking meeting last month.

Minutes of the Fed's deliberations, released yesterday, show that policymakers expressed worry over the real estate bust while they repeated that their aim was to make sure inflation continues to recede.

The bleak assessment of the housing market unnerved investors who were betting that the sector's problems would not spill over into other sectors of the economy. Release of the minutes sapped strength from the market on a day that had seen triple-digit gains and a new trading high for the Dow Jones industrials. The Dow ended the day up 11.37, or 0.09 percent, at 12,474.52.

"The concern is that the Fed was seeing something at their last meeting that suggested potentially more pronounced weakness than we had all been anticipating in the economy," said Drew Matus, senior economist at Lehman Brothers.

The Fed left its benchmark short-term interest rate unchanged at 5.25 percent last month, its fourth straight meeting without changing the rate. But the Fed also left the door open to a rate increase, if needed, to thwart inflation.

However, one Fed member, who was not identified in the minutes, said the central bank should have held out the possibility of a rate cut. That member thought the Fed's statement last month "should emphasize that policy could be adjusted in either direction, depending on the evolution of the outlook for inflation and economic growth."

The Fed's statement after the meeting, however, did not speculate about a rate cut. Rather, policymakers stuck to previous language about the possibility of a rate increase, something most economists think is not likely to happen.

Many economists say the Fed will hold rates steady at its next meeting, Jan. 30-31, and further into the new year. The next rate move, many analysts and investors say, will probably be a rate cut later in 2007.

At their December meeting, Fed policymakers said economic growth had slowed in 2006, partly reflecting a "substantial cooling" of the housing market. That description went beyond the Fed's previous assessment in late October and suggested that a sharper slump in housing could be taking place.

DOJ_NMG_0112195

The policymakers suggested that the economy was in for sluggish growth because of the housing slump and that people needed to stay alert for signs that weakness in housing could infect the rest of the economy.

The minutes noted that growth in business investment had slowed and manufacturing had cooled, in part reflecting the struggling automotive industry. Consumer spending -- the lifeblood of the economy -- seemed to be holding up fairly well, yet there were risks that could change.

"Considerable uncertainty regarding the ultimate extent of the housing market correction meant that spillovers to consumption could become more evident, especially if house prices were to decline significantly," the minutes said.

Meanwhile, policymakers also made clear that they wanted to see "core" inflation, which excludes food and energy prices, move lower. They stuck to their forecast that this was likely to occur in the months ahead.

That said, "all members agreed that the risk that inflation would fail to moderate as desired remained the predominant concern," according to the minutes.

Fed's Ideal Rate Of Growth Could Be Slower In The Future (WSJ)

By David Wessel

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

It is easy to cast this as an academic, number-clogged debate. In fact, it is an instance where what the Fed thinks matters to all of us, not just bond traders. The Fed's estimate for trend growth determines whether officials will let the economy expand at, say, 3% on average, or just 2.75%. The difference sounds small, but adds up over time. An extra one-quarter percentage point in annual growth would mean $130 billion more goods and services for Americans to share by 2026.

An economy's speed limit is largely defined by two factors: how rapidly the number of workers increases and their "productivity," or how much each of them produces.

The Fed doesn't disclose its precise projection for the safe speed limit. A public summary of Fed officials' October meeting noted that "the staff...had again reduced its projection for potential...growth." The comment followed a research paper that argued that something significant is happening to the U.S. labor force: Growth is slowing, and the phenomenon isn't temporary. The aging of the big baby-boom generation is bringing it to the brink of retirement, and the proportion of women who work seems to have peaked.

Nothing is certain here. Improved health and longevity or skimpier pensions may keep baby boomers working longer. Technology may reduce employers' demand for labor. Immigration could increase. Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke, in a speech in November, said: "Some slowing in the growth of the labor force...seems likely over the next few years at least." Fed board member Susan Bies has noted that a 0.2-percentage-point slowdown in labor-force growth means it takes fewer new jobs to keep the nation's unemployment rate steady -- 110,000 jobs a month, instead of 140,000 a month.

Productivity is particularly tough to forecast. After a remarkable spurt that survived the bursting of the tech-stock bubble, the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, and the energy-price increases exacerbated by war in the Middle East, there are some signs that productivity growth may be slowing a bit from the pace of the early 2000s.

Former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan made the call of his career when he saw, before nearly anyone else, that productivity was taking off in the mid-1990s. His successor hasn't, yet, joined the productivity pessimists. "I remain optimistic," Mr. Bernanke said in November, "that the recent favorable [productivity] trends will continue." He pointed to the continued decline in the price of computer power and said that was spurring on biotechnology and other new industries, while increasing the efficiency of old ones.

The just-released minutes of the Fed's December meeting record concern that the underlying pace of productivity growth "could be weaker than currently thought."

Bank of America economists Mickey Levy and Peter Kretzmer point out in a recent research note that even if marked down a bit, the potential growth rate of the U.S. economy remains higher than that of nearly any other industrialized country -- roughly 3% for the U.S. by today's consensus, versus 2% or 2.25% for continental Europe and 1.75% for Japan.

That means the overall U.S. economy will be even bigger relative to Europe and Japan 20 years hence than it is now. It doesn't mean Europeans and Japanese will be miserable: With a slower-growing population, it takes less growth to deliver rising living standards to each person. (A country with a population increasing 10% a year has to have economic growth of 10% a year just to break even.)

DOJ_NMG_0112196

The Fed can't turn the dials on population growth or on productivity. All it can do is try to gauge trends accurately. Continued strong productivity growth will lead the Fed to tolerate faster economic growth. That puts the onus on the rest of the society -- business, unions, workers, regulators, legislators, schools -- to work at doing what is possible to maintain healthy productivity growth, the secret to prosperity for our children and grandchildren.

US Markets Surrender To Inflation Fears (FT)

By Michael Mackenzie And Anuj Gangahar

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

US stocks surrendered a firm start to the new trading year on Wednesday after the Federal Reserve signalled there was little chance of an interest rate cut until core inflation moderates.

Stock investors returned from a four-day break amid lower oil prices and evidence of better-than-expected holiday retail sales. The bullish mood continued after a manufacturing survey proved to be stronger than expected and price pressures fell, reducing inflation fears.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average set a new intra-day record high of 12,580.35 during morning trade, while technology shares boosted the Nasdaq Composite.

Stocks then pared some of their gains ahead of the Fed's December meeting minutes being released. The Fed then released minutes from its December 12 policy meeting showing it was largely unmoved by signs of economic weakness in the final months of 2006 and remained defiantly focused on the risks to inflation.

Selling erupted at policy makers' concerns over core inflation. "The market was set up for a bout of profit taking this week, it just required a catalyst," said Marc Pado, chief market strategist at Cantor Fitzgerald.

He expects choppy trading will continue until next week and then the focus will shift to fourth-quarter earnings results.

At the close, the S&P 500 fell 0.1 per cent, or 1.53 points, to 1,416.77. Industrials was the best performing main group in the index while the energy sector led losses.

The Nasdaq Composite, led the leading averages, rising 1.6 per cent at one stage before it settled 0.3 per cent, or 7.87 points, firmer at 2,413.87. The Dow closed 0.1 per cent, or 11.37 points, higher at 12,474.52.

Earlier in the day US stocks and bonds had staged a powerful surge as investors responded to news of a stronger than expected holiday shopping season, fresh economic data on employment and a decline in oil prices.

A decline in oil prices added to the strong sentiment that drove the Dow Jones industrials to a triple-digit or 0.9 per cent advance and a new trading high of 12,580.35 before midday in New York. Crude oil fell to less than $60 a barrel as the mild weather in the northeast US curbed heating demand.

Investors appeared to shrug off a weak employment report from a division of payroll company Automatic Data Processing that unnerved the bond market briefly early in the day.

Bonds rose in response to the ADP report, with the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note falling to 4.69 percent from 4.71 percent late on Friday. Analysts said the report might improve the chances for an interest rate cut in the early part of the year.

With markets closed on Tuesday to mark the funeral of President Ford, Wednesday marked the end of the longest hiatus on Wall Street since the aftermath of the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks.

Stocks Give Up Early Gains (WSJ)

By Worth Civils

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

The New Year's celebration on Wall Street was short-lived, as stocks gave up big gains that had taken the Dow Jones Industrial Average to a new intraday high Wednesday, the first trading day of the year after a four-day break.

DOJ_NMG_0112197

Traders weighed mixed economic data and the minutes from the latest meeting of Federal Reserve policy makers. A key manufacturing report was stronger than expected, allaying fears of a recession, but a weak forecast of monthly payrolls data to be released Friday surprised and unnerved some investors.

The Fed minutes showed1 policy makers were more worried about an economic slowdown, but were also still on the lookout for inflation pressures, indicating they could keep rates unchanged for a while. "My sense is that the minutes amplified the…growing perception that [the Fed] is not cutting rates anytime soon," said Peter Hooper, chief economist at Deutsche Bank Securities.

The combination of slowing growth and a still-hawkish Fed was not welcomed by stock investors, many of whom had expected a cut in interest rates early this year. Helped in part by stock gains in foreign markets on Tuesday, the Dow industrials were up more than 100 points earlier in the session, reaching a new intraday high of 12580.35 on the back of Wal-Mart Stores and Home Depot. But the gains slowly eroded in afternoon trading, with most of the losses coming after the Fed minutes were released at 2 p.m. EST.

The Dow, which fell more than 50 points into the red at one point, finished the day up just 11.37 points at 12474.52. The biggest decliner was General Motors, off 4.1% amid disappointing auto sales last month. Exxon Mobil lost 3.3% as crude-oil prices sank $2.73, or 4.5%, to $58.32 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Other averages also turned negative after broad gains earlier in the session, with the S&P 500-stock index off 1.67 to 1416.63 for the day. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index, which had been up as much as 1.5% earlier, finished ahead 7.87 at 2423.16, helped by a 1.6% gain in Dell shares and a 1.5% rise by Cisco Systems.

Some observers were skeptical of the Fed-induced selloff. "I don't understand what the reaction was to the minutes -- they were not that different than before," said David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's. "I think to some extent, the minutes were more of an excuse than a reason," Mr. Wyss said. He thinks some of pullback can be attributed to tax-related selling. "There is a tendency to rebalance [portfolios] after the first of the year," he said.

The volatile action Wednesday could also reflect still holiday-thin trading desks, as the stock market is open only three days this week after a four-day break, the longest since the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. The market was closed Monday for New Year's Day and Tuesday in honor of former President Gerald R. Ford, who died last week.

THE YEAR IN MARKETS

• 2006 Market Scorecard2

• The Year in Private Equity3

• MarketBeat: 2006 Revisited4

• 2007 Outlook: Hoping for Goldilocks5

MARKET WRAP

European Shares Hover Around Six-Year Highs6

Asian Shares Close Mixed7

Dow Drops on Last Day of 20068

In economic data, the Institute of Supply Management's manufacturing survey for December beat expectations9, coming in at 51.4. It fell last month below the 50 mark, indicating contraction in the sector, for the first time since early 2003. The slowdown in another closely watched sector of the economy, housing, hit construction spending, which the Commerce Department said fell 0.2% in November, following declines in previous months.

Earlier, Automatic Data Processing estimated that private, non-farm payrolls shrank by 40,000 jobs in December, the first negative reading on job growth in more than three years. Several economists lowered their own forecasts after the ADP figure, even though it has proved unreliable in the past. The consensus estimate for December's report is for total payroll growth of 115,000 jobs.

Monthly auto sales reports10 mostly disappointed investors, as well. Ford Motor and GM both reported a 13% drop in U.S. sales last month. Chrysler said its December sales rose less than 1% amid a new customer-incentive plan. In addition to GM's slide, shares of Ford were flat, while the American-traded shares of DaimlerChrysler were ahead 1%.

DOJ_NMG_0112198

Home Depot got a 2.3% boost after it announced that Bob Nardelli will leave11 his position as chairman, president and CEO. Frank Blake, the retailer's current vice chairman of the board and executive vice president, succeeds Mr. Nardelli, effective immediately. Wal-Mart was up 3% after the giant retailer said December same-store sales were expected to be up 1.6% over year-earlier levels, well above the company's previous estimate of a 1% gain.

In major market action:

Stocks rose12. On the New York Stock Exchange, 1,815 stocks advanced and 1,610 declined on volume of 2.07 billion shares.

Bonds were up.13The 10-year Treasury note added 6/32, or $1.88 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.66, and the 30-year bond gained 12/32, yielding 4.77%.

The dollar advanced.14The euro traded at $1.3161 from $1.3279 late Tuesday, and the dollar was at 119.39 yen from 118.81 yen.

Markets Finish Mixed As Fed Hints At Nagging Concern With Inflation (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

Stocks surged early yesterday, the first trading day of 2007, but fell sharply after minutes from a Federal Reserve meeting indicated that inflation remained the chief concern of policy makers even as they started to worry about a weakening economy. Markets closed mixed for the day.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index closed down slightly, at 1,416.63, after being up 0.8 percent. The Nasdaq composite index surged 1.6 percent early, but reversed course in the afternoon, falling 0.9 percent; it closed up 7.87 points, or 0.33 percent, at 2,423.16.

The Dow Jones industrial average also seesawed to a modest gain of 11.37 points, closing at 12,474.52. Bonds were up slightly and the dollar rose against the euro and yen.

Like markets in Europe and Asia, American stock markets, which were closed Tuesday in observance of the day of mourning for President Gerald R. Ford, began the year on an upbeat note. Investors were encouraged by Wal-Mart's posting of sales that were stronger than expected, and by a report showing an increase in manufacturing activity last month.

But the rally started to sag in early afternoon and collapsed shortly after the Fed released the minutes of its Dec. 12 meeting. Energy stocks were among the biggest losers as crude oil futures fell by $2.73, to $58.32 a barrel, the first time they have closed below $60 since November.

The Fed, as it has done repeatedly in recent months, indicated in its minutes that while inflation had moderated, the central bank's policy makers were worried that it remained too high and that they might need to raise short-term interest rates. The minutes noted, however, that one unnamed member of the policy-making committee wanted the Fed to acknowledge that it could also cut rates to reinvigorate the economy.

"It was a blunt reminder to the stock market that the Fed's going to err on the side of avoiding inflation," said Ethan S. Harris, chief United States economist at Lehman Brothers.

Stocks climbed steadily in the last six months of 2006, partly on the expectation that the Fed, which last raised interest rates in June, to 5.25 percent, would start cutting rates in the first half of 2007. But some economists and market specialists have suggested that that view was inconsistent with investors' optimism that the economy and corporate profits would hold up well in the coming year.

"There is a sense in the stock market that you can have your cake and eat it too, that you can have good growth and rate cuts from the Fed," Mr. Harris said.

The bond and futures markets, by contrast, have become a little less hopeful in recent weeks about interest rate cuts, and are now priced with the expectation that the Fed's first rate cut will come in late June. Yields on the 10-year Treasury note, which move in the opposite direction of the price, have risen to 4.66 percent, from a low of 4.02 percent at the start of December. Bond prices and yields were little changed in yesterday's trading after the Fed's announcement.

DOJ_NMG_0112199

"The bond market got the reaction to the Fed minutes right," said Joseph Biondo, a senior portfolio manager at Biondo Investment Advisors, "and the stock market didn't."

Still, market specialists said the stocks' late-afternoon recovery suggested that investors were not as moved by the Fed as it first seemed. Also, the energy sector was responsible for much of the decline in stock prices — the S.& P. Energy index fell 3.7 percent for the day. Analysts said warmer-than-expected temperatures on the East Coast helped drive down prices for crude oil and other commodities.

Another concern for the markets is the possibility that profit growth will slow. Companies will start reporting results for the fourth quarter later this month and, for the first time in four and a half years, profits may not post double-digit gains, said Sam Stovall, chief investment strategist for S.& P.'s Equity Research Service. He said he expected stocks to register a gain in 2007, but that the markets might first experience a correction typically seen late in an economic expansion.

US Manufacturing Pulls Back From Brink Of Recession (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

The US manufacturing sector bounced back from the brink of recession last month as factory activity rose in December after a slump.

The Institute for Supply Management said on Wednesday that that its index of manufacturing activity climbed into positive territory, rising to 51.4 last month after its first negative reading in five years.

A reading below 50 indicates contraction, one above 50 signals expansion.

The rise in the index was greater than economists expected and signals that factories are continuing to expand in spite of recent weakness in a number of key sectors. Computer and auto makers reported a pick up in demand, while chemicals manufacturers experienced a slowdown.

Manufacturers remain upbeat about the year ahead and are looking to overseas demand to offset a slowdown in domestic orders.

Jeoff Hall, an economist at Thomson Financial, said: "The manufacturing recession will be shallow and not tip the wider economy into recession. Given the high level of export orders, we were surprised to see such a rapid deterioration in business conditions recently."

Investors responded positively to the benign economic data, propelling US stocks higher on the opening trading day of the year. The Dow Jones Industrial Average touched a new intra-day record high of 12,566.57.

However, there was continued weakness in residential construction activity as spending fell, according to a separate report, but the decline was less than expected.

Why Manufacturing Shows Resilience (WSJ)

By Timothy Aeppel

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

U.S. manufacturing is showing surprising resilience in the face of a sharp slump in autos and housing, and in the coming year it is expected to expand roughly in line with the overall economy.

A closely watched manufacturing index turned positive in December, reversing a decline the month before that had sparked gloom about the outlook for the sector. New orders and production both edged up last month, while pricing pressures eased.

IN SUMMARY

• The News: A new report points to unexpected vitality in factory sector.

• The Background: After a prolonged boom, many manufacturers got stuck with excess inventories as the economy slowed in recent months.

• The Bottom Line: No manufacturing recession, but growth in the sector will fall into line with slower growth of the larger economy.

DOJ_NMG_0112200

Norbert Ore, an economist at the Institute for Supply Management, which released the report yesterday, said some manufacturers are suffering -- including makers of housing-related products from bricks and backhoes to rugs and refrigerators. "But there are also pockets of strength," he said, such as oil exploration and aerospace.

Manufacturing is just one part of the nation's economy that has been sending mixed signals lately. Another report released yesterday suggests the U.S. job market may have shed workers in December. Private employment fell a seasonally adjusted 40,000 last month, according to a report by Automatic Data Processing, the payroll-processing company, and Macroeconomic Advisers, an economic-forecasting firm. The government releases its monthly jobs report tomorrow.

Separately, the U.S. Commerce Department said yesterday that total construction spending fell 0.2% in November to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $1.184 trillion. That report also offered a mixed picture, with residential construction down 1.6% from the previous month, the eighth consecutive monthly decline, while nonresidential construction of hotels and office buildings rose 1.2%.

Manufacturing is coming off a boom that prompted producers to expand. Factory construction rose 20% last year and, in many cases, manufacturers ended up with bloated warehouses as economic growth cooled in recent months. While the economy expanded an estimated 3.3% last year, manufacturing output surged 4.8%.

That is likely to change. "What you're going to see, going forward, is a manufacturing sector that, instead of growing a lot faster than the overall economy, will be growing more in line with the economy," said David Huether, chief economist at the National Association of Manufacturers. Forecasters expect the U.S. economy to expand about 2.3% this year.

The Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI, an Arlington, Va., policy and research group, is predicting a "pronounced slowing" in manufacturing growth this year. For instance, household-appliance production is expected to decline 5% and output of heavy-duty trucks to fall 23%. Surging demand for cellular phones and digital televisions is set to push up semiconductor shipments 10% this year and shipments of airplane parts 9%.

Machinery production has been one of the bright spots for manufacturing during the past two years and, overall, is expected to remain robust. But Daniel Meckstroth, one of the group's economists, noted that output of construction machinery is expected to slide 1% in 2007, as a result of the housing slump, while output of oil and gas machinery is expected to grow 11% and industrial machinery 8%.

One nagging problem is inventories. As long as producers are stuck with excess goods, they will be focused on curbing output in line with demand. The latest ISM report showed customer inventories stood at 50.5% in December, the third straight month above 50%, which indicates that inventories are too high. Inventories of autos are particularly large.

Van Jolissaint, chief economist of auto maker DaimlerChrysler AG, said he thinks most of the big production cuts already have been made in his sector and that conditions should improve by the second half of the year, particularly if employment and income gains don't falter.

As the year progresses, he added, the housing sector should bottom out, too. "I'm actually pretty optimistic, not from the auto point of view, but from the point of view of the overall economy in 2007," Mr. Jolissaint said.

Many U.S. manufacturers are counting on exports to soften the blow of slower growth at home. Nordson Corp., a Westlake, Ohio, maker of machines used to spread adhesives on assembly lines, sells two-thirds of its machines outside the U.S. and says surging exports have more than offset the drop in sales at home. The company expects strong overseas growth to continue this year.Some sectors face an uncertain future. "We saw the contraction in housing hit us fairly rapidly this last fall," said Fletcher Steele, president of Pine Hall Brick Co. in Winston-Salem, N.C. Sales at the closely held company plunged 30% in November from a year earlier and were down 20% in December, he said.

Pine Hall, which sells more than 80% of its bricks to homebuilders, has idled half of the eight kilns in its four factories in North Carolina and Georgia. The company normally builds inventories during the slow winter months, but this year Mr. Steele isn't sure how much inventory building he will do.

The recent decline in commodity prices has been a double-edged sword for manufacturers. Less costly commodities, which translate into lower raw-materials costs, are a welcome break for factories after several years of hefty increases; yesterday, sharp declines in metals prices pummeled mining stocks, sending Freeport McMoRan Copper & Gold Inc. plunging $5.24, or 9.4%, to $50.49 as of 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

DOJ_NMG_0112201

Many manufacturers, however, built up supplies of metals and other commodities when prices were high, anticipating further price increases. Those companies now are stuck with pricey stockpiles and are unlikely to feel any immediate relief from lower raw-materials prices.

Another uncertainty dogging manufacturers is the value of the dollar. Ronald DeFeo, chief executive of Terex Corp., a Westport, Conn., maker of mining and construction machinery, says he worries the dollar's value could continue to fall relative to other major countries. While the weaker dollar benefits his big factory in Redmond, Wash., which makes aerial platforms that are exported world-wide, it hurts his crane and other equipment operations in Europe.

Small Employers Struggle To Fill Jobs (USAT)

By Jim Hopkins

USA Today, January 4, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — Small employers ramping up hiring plans to levels not seen in two years face a labor shortage that's forcing many to increase wages and benefits.

The pinch is tightest in 26 states with below-average jobless rates, new Labor Department data and private surveys show. More than half those states are especially dependent on small employers, those with fewer than 500 workers.

Nationwide, the share of small firms planning to hire through early 2007 rose to 19% in November from 16% the month before, say surveys by the National Federation of Independent Business trade group. November's share was the highest since November 2004.

In New Hampshire, Jody Rodgers plans to hire up to 20 workers as she expands her 55-employee pet boarding and grooming chain, The Barking Dog. She offers "great benefits," including health insurance, bonuses and paid vacations.

Still, Rodgers struggles to find qualified applicants amid a tight labor supply. "It's not pretty out there," she says.

New Hampshire is one of the 26 states. Its jobless rate rose slightly to 3.5% in November. But it remains well below the 4.5% U.S. average.

Small-business advisers say many of the USA's 5.7 million small employers must consider raising wages and adding benefits such as flexible working hours to better compete with big corporations.

"This position that you have traditionally paid $12 an hour for, you're going to need to now pay $14 to $15 an hour," says Sandra Dickerson, CEO of Your People Professionals, a recruiter and employment manager in Santa Maria, Calif.

The National Federation of Independent Business says wages already are headed higher. In November's survey of 451 companies, 20% planned to raise wages, up from 18% the month before.

"More owners are paying more, trying to keep workers and to get workers," says Bill Dunkelberg, the 600,000-member trade group's chief economist.

Small employers that don't want to raise wages can try other carrots that don't require spending more right away, says Tim Doherty, CEO of Doherty Employer Services in Minneapolis. Non-cash incentives include letting employees work from home one day a week or giving more personal time off.

Those are options small companies can offer to be more competitive with corporate giants that have less-flexible workplace policies. "They don't need to be bound by large-company constraints," Doherty says.

A Mostly Winning Economy (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

ECONOMIC PROSPERITY prompts presidents to exaggerate their influence, while privation causes them to lament their impotence. So it was hardly surprising to hear President Bush emerge from his first Cabinet meeting of 2007 on Wednesday talking about "the need to keep this economy growing by making tax relief permanent." Bush's fondness for his first-term tax cuts, most of which are to expire in 2010, is well known. But if he and Congress want to keep the economy growing, they should shore up its foundation.

The economy enters the new year riding a couple of winning streaks. The U.S. gross domestic product has been growing for a record 20 consecutive quarters, and blue-chip companies in the Standard & Poor's 500 have racked up 18 straight quarters of 10% or greater increases in profits. Those streaks began before the Bush tax cuts took full effect, though they have been abetted by the twin stimuli of the tax cuts and large increases in federal spending. "Making tax relief permanent" makes for a good political sound bite, but it hardly amounts to economic policy.

DOJ_NMG_0112202

Nevertheless, there's some grumbling about the prospects for 2007, particularly for those outside the executive suite. The deflation of the housing bubble continues, taking a toll on the residential construction industry and putting a damper on consumer spending. The long decline of the U.S. industrial sector, most evident in the auto industry, continues as well.

Yet the economy may be able to dodge those bullets. Housing sales crept upward at the end of the year. Moreover, with the decline in homebuilding, the price of materials has fallen, helping other construction sectors. At the same time, low interest rates, reduced energy prices and strength in other parts of the economy have led most forecasters to predict continued GDP growth in 2007.

Boosting the industrial sector is a harder task. Some Democrats on Capitol Hill, along with some liberal think tanks and advocacy groups, have raised the specter of protectionist trade policies and new rules to limit offshoring. When combined with higher barriers to immigration, they say, these policies would also help narrow the gap between the wealthiest Americans and everybody else. Such steps would be misguided, particularly at a time when the tightening labor market has finally started to drive up real wages.

In the long term, the best ways to improve wages are to create more highly skilled workers and provide a larger market for their talents. House Democratic leaders already have acknowledged this; when they unveiled their economic strategy in November 2005, one of the first three planks called for training more scientists and engineers and extending high-speed Internet access throughout the country.

In times of relative prosperity, Washington has the luxury of focusing more on the long term. Congressional Democrats should use this moment to promote policies that help more Americans share in the nation's economic growth, not to advocate for a return to a less globalized, more protectionist era. Bush, for his part, should be looking for ways to minimize the effect of the tax code on the economy, not embellishing its effect.

Gerald Ford Is Laid To Rest In Michigan (AP)

By Kathy Barks Hoffman

AP, January 4, 2007

Gerald R. Ford was laid to rest on the grounds of his presidential museum Wednesday after eight days of mourning and remembrance that spanned the country, from the California desert to the nation's capital and back to Ford's boyhood home.

The sunset burial capped the official mourning for the 38th president, from services in California, to ceremonies at the nation's capital, and a 17-hour viewing Tuesday night and Wednesday at the museum in his hometown.

At a graveside service that included a 21-gun salute and a 21-aircraft flyover, Vice President Dick Cheney presented former first lady Betty Ford with the American flag that was draped over her husband's casket.

Earlier at the Ford family's longtime church, Ford was remembered as a man not afraid to laugh, make tough decisions or listen to the advice of his independent wife in eulogies delivered during a funeral at the church the couple attended for six decades.

An honor guard carried the casket inside Grace Episcopal Church, where Ford's defense secretary, Donald Rumsfeld, and Ford's successor, Jimmy Carter, recalled his public service.

His widow, Betty, wiped away tears as she sat with the couple's four children and more than 300 dignitaries and family friends, including Vice President Dick Cheney and golfing legend Jack Nicklaus.

"He was one of us," Rumsfeld said, "And that made him special and needed in a dark and dangerous hour for our nation."

Rumsfeld, who recently left his post as President Bush's defense secretary, remembered Ford as a courageous and steady leader who healed the nation after Watergate.

Rumsfeld said the Navy is considering naming a new aircraft carrier after Ford, a Navy veteran. A decision is expected later this month.

"How fitting it would be that the name Gerald R. Ford will patrol the high seas for decades to come in defense of the nation he loved so much," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0112203

Carter described the close personal friendship he and Ford developed over the years.

"I relished his sound advice," Carter said as his wife, Rosalynn, cried. "I want to thank my predecessor for all he did to heal our land."

Thousands of flag-waving mourners lined the roads under sunny skies as the motorcade bearing Ford's casket traveled between his presidential museum in downtown Grand Rapids to the church, before returning to the museum.

The viewing had to be extended Wednesday until nearly noon so everyone in line could pay their respects. Some 57,000 mourners waited hours to file past the flag-draped casket during the night. Some stopped and made silent prayers.

"We're here to honor him," said Philip Bareham of Lansing, who was the last person to view the casket and whose parents were among Ford's earliest supporters and political allies. "We just love this family. They are so down to earth."

Ford represented Grand Rapids in Congress for 25 years. His family had belonged to Grace Episcopal Church since the early 1940s.

Richard Norton Smith, an author, presidential historian and former director of Ford's museum and library, reminded mourners how important Ford's hometown was to him.

"Grand Rapids returned his affection many times over," which was "unforgettably demonstrated by the tens of thousands who stood in line for hours outside the museum, braving the cold to assure that his last night was anything but lonely," Smith said.

Draped over the back of one pew at the funeral was a blue blanket with the letter "M" emblazoned on it, symbolizing Ford's alma mater, the University of Michigan, where he played football for national championship teams in 1932 and 1933.

Many of the mourners at the museum and lining the roads during his funeral procession on Wednesday wore Michigan hats and sweat shirts in his honor.

Ford, who became president after Richard Nixon resigned, died Dec. 26 at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif. He was 93.

Pride, Grief Flow As Ford Laid To Rest In Hometown (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, January 4, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. — Gerald Rudolph Ford was buried on a hillside at his presidential museum Wednesday after a poignant send-off from his hometown and tributes from a protégé and a former rival.

The final moments of a week-long commemoration of the 38th president's life were marked by a 21-gun salute, a bugler sounding tapsand a flyover of 21 military jets in the "missing man" formation, with one jet veering off from the others.

Betty Ford sat at the gravesite as the U.S. Army Chorus sang Goin' Home. Her daughter, Susan Ford Bales, put an arm around her mother to comfort her.

As Eternal Father, Strong to Save was played and the sun neared the horizon, Vice President Cheney presented the U.S. flag that had covered Ford's casket to the former first lady. She kissed the folded flag.

Ford died Dec. 26 at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif. He was 93.

The funeral, which Ford helped plan, prompted tears and laughter from family, friends and politicians. Mrs. Ford dabbed her eyes with a handkerchief as the casket was carried down the aisle of Grace Episcopal Church in East Grand Rapids.

She smiled, though, when Donald Rumsfeld, who served as her husband's Defense secretary and White House chief of staff, began his eulogy. He described the former president as "one of us." Sniffing back tears, he said Ford was "special and needed in a dark and dangerous hour for our nation" after President Nixon's resignation in the wake of the Watergate scandal.

Neighbors and friends

Jimmy Carter, who beat Ford in the 1976 presidential election, began and ended his eulogy with the first sentence of his inaugural address. "For myself and for our nation, I want to thank my predecessor for all he has done to heal our land," Carter said, his voice breaking, after describing the "intense personal friendship" he and Ford shared after their White House years.

Betty Ford, 88, sat with her daughter and sons Michael, Jack and Steven. Michael and Steven Ford gave readings, and three of the Fords' grandchildren read prayers at the funeral, which ended about an hour behind schedule.

In the other front pew were Cheney and his wife, Lynne; Carter and his wife, Rosalynn; and Rumsfeld and his wife, Joyce. Nearby, a blue stadium blanket was draped over a pew to honor Bo Schembechler, the former football coach at Ford's alma mater, the University of Michigan. Schembechler died in November. Ford's passion for another sport was represented, too: Golfer Jack Nicklaus was an honorary pallbearer.

DOJ_NMG_0112204

Ford lived in California for his last 30 years, and services for him were held in Palm Desert, Calif., and in Washington, D.C. But the farewell in this city of 164,000 was different. There was a heartfelt outpouring of pride and grief from people who consider themselves his neighbors and friends.

Thousands of people lined the streets and bridges between the church and the museum. Some wept or waved flags as the black hearse with presidential seals on its doors moved slowly past.

The skies were clear with a steady breeze, but temperatures were in the 40s.

Military officials said about 57,000 people filed past Ford's casket during 18 hours of public viewing in the museum. Ryan Sharpe, 25, a computer software technician, was born after Ford's presidency, but he came to represent family members who couldn't be here.

"He was a simple man, somebody you might want to have a beer with," Sharpe said. "I just wanted to say, 'Rest in peace, Mr. President.' "

Antoinette Tomaszewski, a floral designer in her 50s, said a prayer as she walked by the casket. "You could feel a quieting come over you," she said. "All we can do is pray for him now." The visit was important to her because Ford's signature is on the naturalization papers of her father, an immigrant from Kiev, Ukraine, she said.

"You could hear a pin drop," said Bill Kleinhans, 59, who helps inventors market their products. "You feel a sadness at the loss of such a great man, but the good part is that his life story is now being told — things like his personal integrity."

'I'm from Grand Rapids'

Ford loved his hometown. His mother brought him here from Omaha when he was just 2 weeks old. He was a football star at South High School, which is now the Gerald R. Ford Job Corps Center. He worked in a paint store and at a hamburger stand.

He came back after attending Yale Law School to open a law practice and later represented Grand Rapids in Congress for a quarter-century. In August 1947, mutual friends introduced him to a local woman, Betty Bloomer Warren. They were married for 58 years.

"The proudest boast I can make is that I'm from Grand Rapids," Ford said in May 2000 after the airport here was renamed for him. "About 86 years ago, the people of Grand Rapids took me in for the first time," he said. "Their hearts, their support have never faded. What I've accomplished in this life, I owe to Grand Rapids."

In his eulogy, Richard Norton Smith, former director of the Gerald R. Ford Museum and Library, recalled Ford recently saying, "When I wake up at night and can't sleep, I remember Grand Rapids."

Because tens of thousands of people lined up through a cold night to say goodbye, Smith said, "His last night was anything but lonely."

Ford Buried At Presidential Museum In Michigan (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. (AP) -- Gerald R. Ford was laid to rest on the grounds of his presidential museum yesterday during a ceremony watched by thousands who lined streets and bridges to catch a glimpse of history.

The sunset burial capped the official mourning for the 38th president, from services in California to ceremonies in the nation's capital to a 17-hour viewing Tuesday night and yesterday at the museum in his hometown.

At a graveside service that included a 21-gun salute and a 21-aircraft flyover, Vice President Dick Cheney presented former first lady Betty Ford with the American flag that was draped over her husband's casket.

At the funeral, former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld -- who held the same position in Mr. Ford's administration -- announced that the Navy will name its next aircraft carrier USS Gerald R. Ford.

The Navy had not planned to make the announcement so quickly, but Pentagon officials later confirmed what Mr. Rumsfeld said during his eulogy at the funeral.

"How fitting it would be that the name Gerald R. Ford will patrol the high seas for decades to come in defense of the nation he loved so much," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

DOJ_NMG_0112205

In eulogies delivered during a funeral at the church that Mr. and Mrs. Ford attended for six decades, the former president was remembered as a man not afraid to laugh, make tough decisions or listen to the advice of his independent wife.

An honor guard carried the casket inside Grace Episcopal Church. Both Mr. Rumsfeld and Mr. Ford's successor, Jimmy Carter, recalled his public service.

Mrs. Ford wiped away tears as she sat with the couple's four children and more than 300 dignitaries and family friends.

"He was one of us," Mr. Rumsfeld said. "And that made him special and needed in a dark and dangerous hour for our nation."

Mr. Rumsfeld, who recently left his post as President Bush's defense secretary, remembered Mr. Ford as a courageous and steady leader who healed the nation after Watergate.

Mr. Carter described the close personal friendship that he and Mr. Ford developed over the years.

"I relished his sound advice," Mr. Carter said. "I want to thank my predecessor for all he did to heal our land."

Thousands of flag-waving mourners lined the roads under sunny skies as the motorcade bearing Mr. Ford's casket traveled between his presidential museum in downtown Grand Rapids to the church, before returning to the museum.

The viewing had to be extended yesterday until nearly noon so everyone in line could pay their respects. About 57,000 mourners waited hours to file past the flag-draped casket during the night. Some stopped and made silent prayers.

"We're here to honor him," said Philip Bareham of Lansing, who was the last person to view the casket and whose parents were among Mr. Ford's earliest supporters and political allies. "We just love this family. They are so down-to-earth."

Mr. Ford represented Grand Rapids in Congress for 25 years and became president after Richard M. Nixon resigned. He died Dec. 26 at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif., at age 93.

Ford Is Buried After Thousands In Hometown Pay Respects (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich., Jan. 3 — Gerald R. Ford was buried on Wednesday on a grassy hill beside the rushing waters of the Grand River as the sun set, a final farewell in a week of remembrances for the nation's 38th president.

Though Mr. Ford had lived elsewhere for decades, Grand Rapids made it clear that it still considered this his true home and that it still considered him one of its most beloved, famous — and yet ordinary — men.

In a city of 195,000 residents, some 57,000 waited since Tuesday evening in a line that wound through two miles of downtown to walk silently past Mr. Ford's coffin inside his presidential museum, steps from where he would be buried.

In temperatures that dipped into the low 30s, some people cheerfully waited six hours, deep into the night and morning, for a minute or two beside the former president, who died on Dec. 26 at age 93.

"We needed to be here — this is how we feel about him here," Mary Castro said shortly before 3 a.m. Wednesday, still waiting to reach the museum after four hours in line. A family, carrying a 2-year-old in blankets beside her, nodded.

"He was an everyday, down-to-earth guy, so accessible, not one of these politicians nowadays who needs all sorts of bodyguards," said Ms. Castro, 62, of suburban Comstock Park. "And he understood the importance of forgiveness."

If the nation remembered Mr. Ford for his sudden arrival as president in 1974 in the midst of turmoil over the Watergate scandal and for his decision to pardon President Richard M. Nixon, Grand Rapids's memory was utterly different. Here, he was the boy who grew up on these streets, who played football for South High School, who became an Eagle Scout and who this region sent to the House of Representatives from 1949 until the 1970s.

He had taken the time to speak to elementary school government classes, to write birthday cards, to present crowns to homecoming queens. He was, some said, a perfect reflection of what people here are about.

"He was one of us," said Dwayne Hiljer, 69 and a retired salesman who drove three hours from his home near Detroit. "I've been around for presidents since Roosevelt, and this is the only one that was always totally honest with you."

Even after Mr. Ford's body was driven away from the museum — the lines cut short when time ran out — Grand Rapids followed him. Residents lined the streets, Boy Scouts in uniforms (and no coats) saluting, as his hearse and motorcade led the way to a final funeral service. The city gathered again along the bridges and the roofs of downtown buildings at dusk when the burial service began.

DOJ_NMG_0112206

Mr. Ford was actually born in Omaha, but moved here as an infant with his mother. He had lived, at various times, in eight homes in the area.

During the funeral at Grace Episcopal Church, gleaming with stained glass, in East Grand Rapids, mourners remembered his modest roots and modest approach.

"There's an old saying in Washington that every member of the United States Congress looks in the mirror and sees a future president," Donald H. Rumsfeld, who served as defense secretary and chief of staff to Mr. Ford, said in a eulogy. "Well, Jerry Ford was different. I suspect that when he looked in the mirror even after he became president, he saw a citizen and a public servant."

The Fords had been longtime members of the church. Mr. Ford married his wife, Betty, at the parish's earlier building in 1948. Their first three children were baptized there. The funerals for Mr. Ford's mother and stepfather were held there.

The service on Wednesday, before 400 people, was more intimate, more personal than some earlier events.

Mr. Ford's grandchildren read prayers. Honorary pallbearers included a list of community leaders and friends from Grand Rapids, as well as Jack Nicklaus, the golfer; Mary Sue Coleman, the University of Michigan president; and Pepi Gramshammer, the skier. A University of Michigan blanket, yellow and blue, was left on a pew in honor of Bo Schembechler, the longtime Michigan football coach whom Mr. Ford had chosen to be an honorary pallbearer but who died late last year. Mr. Ford played for Michigan in the 1930s.

Richard Norton Smith, who used to be the director of the Ford museum and presidential library, described a man who knew how to laugh at himself and to get along despite divisiveness and partisanship.

"No one ever called Gerald Ford an imperial president," Mr. Smith said. "Perhaps that was because no figure in memory was so immune to Washington's besetting disease of self-importance."

Mr. Ford, a longtime member of Congress, succeeded Vice President Spiro T. Agnew and then Mr. Nixon after both men left office because of scandals.

Former President Jimmy Carter, who defeated Mr. Ford in 1976 but later became his close friend, said the precise words he used in his own inauguration — 30 years ago — remained the most appropriate tribute he could make to Mr. Ford, whose decision to pardon Mr. Nixon had drawn angry critics as well as supporters, who said he had helped spare the country more turmoil.

"For myself and for our nation, I want to thank my predecessor," Mr. Carter said on Wednesday, pausing to gather his emotions, "for all he did to heal our land."

As dusk fell on a cold, clear afternoon, Mr. Ford's family, emotional and holding on to one another, gathered for the burial outside the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum, near the grass beside the Grand River. The Army chorus somberly sang "Goin' Home." The Rev. Dr. Robert G. Certain said a prayer. Canons sent a cloud of thick smoke and loud echoes across a silent downtown. F-15s zipped loudly past in formation, traveling north along the river's edge.

Vice President Dick Cheney handed the flag — the carefully folded flag from Mr. Ford's coffin — to Mrs. Ford, who nodded and clutched it briefly to her face.

Ford Laid To Rest In Michigan (CHIT)

By Tim Jones

Chicago Tribune, January 4, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. -- The hometown that nurtured, voted for and never forgot Gerald R. Ford laid him to rest Wednesday after a simple but heartfelt funeral and an extraordinary display of public affection.

This was the final homecoming for the nation's 38th president, who on a day of brilliant sunshine and cold temperatures was hailed as a citizen, public servant and, as a young congressman, a most unusual Washington politician—one who did not see a future president whenever he looked in the mirror.

DOJ_NMG_0112207

"He put us on the right path when the way ahead was uncertain," said an emotional Donald Rumsfeld, who sniffled every few seconds as he struggled through his 12-minute eulogy. Rumsfeld, the former Defense Secretary, served in the Ford administration.

Wednesday's ceremonies marked the official end of national mourning that started in California, moved to Washington and concluded in the western Michigan city where Ford grew up, practiced law and later represented in Congress. This stop, lasting a little more than 24 hours, packed an emotional wallop.

While the 80-minute funeral at Grace Episcopal Church was dominated by personal friends and dignitaries, including Vice President Dick Cheney, former President Jimmy Carter, golf legend Jack Nicklaus and Rumsfeld, the goodbye was led by tens of thousands of Grand Rapids and Michigan residents who lined the streets and filed through the Gerald R. Ford Museum to pay their respects.

Ford helped plan his own funeral and wanted it to be an unpretentious reflection of his life. For all of the careful orchestration, there was no anticipating the throng of people who started showing up before Ford's casket arrived Tuesday afternoon.

About 57,000 people, many of whom waited outside for up to eight hours in freezing overnight temperatures, walked through the museum during the 17 hours that Ford's body lay in state. The lines never stopped until authorities cut them off late Wednesday morning, about two hours before the start of the funeral.

"His last night was anything but lonely," Richard Norton Smith, presidential historian and former director of the Ford Museum, in downtown Grand Rapids, said in his eulogy.

Crowds of people, including a little girl with long red hair holding a small American flag as she leaned over a security fence, stood along city streets as the motorcade slowly drove the 6 miles between the museum and the church, and then back. The drapes in the hearse were open, allowing those gathered to catch a glimpse of the flag-draped casket.

People who had had never met or seen Ford showed up hours in advance, bundling their young children in blankets and effectively camping out along the funeral route.

At Grace Episcopal, 88-year-old former First Lady Betty Ford, always accompanied by her daughter and three sons, dabbed at her eyes with a handkerchief as Rumsfeld, Carter and Smith eulogized the former president, often poignantly. Ford was a president who was not afraid to laugh at himself, Smith said.

For all of the solemnity of the event, the 93-year-old Ford's return to the city he left more than 50 years ago was not a regal affair. It was more Truman-esque in tone, in keeping with the plainspoken tendencies of Ford, who represented this area in Congress for 25 years before assuming the vice presidency in 1973. He became president the next year.

Ford, like former President Harry Truman when he died, has enjoyed a rehabilitation of his reputation. In the weeklong series of funerals and remembrances, Ford's controversial pardon of former President Richard Nixon in 1974, which probably cost him his bid for election two years later, is now praised as a nation-healing gesture.

"He was better at statesmanship than salesmanship," Smith observed, underscoring a recurring theme heard on the streets in Grand Rapids and even echoed in the funeral service—that national politics has taken a turn for the worse.

Carter, a Democrat who defeated Ford in 1976, recalled the "intense personal friendship" he and his wife Rosalynn shared with the Fords.

"I want to thank my predecessor for all he did to heal our land," Carter said in his eulogy, as his wife Rosalynn cried. That was also the first remark Carter made in his inaugural address in 1977.

Carter said that when the two couples traveled together, he always regretted reaching their destination because it meant the end of the time they would enjoy each other.

As the sun began to set, a gravesite service outside the museum featured a Marine Corps choir, a 21-gun salute and a thundering 21-aircraft flyover that shook windows in the downtown area.

After the flag that draped Ford's casket was removed and folded, Cheney, a former chief of staff for Ford, presented it to Betty Ford. She gently hugged it.

Ford's Body Is Laid To Rest In Hometown (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0112208

By P.j. Huffstutter

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH. — Gerald Rudolph Ford was laid to rest on the grounds of his presidential museum along the grassy shore of the Grand River on Wednesday after an intimate service attuned to close friends and family.

As the sun set over his hometown, the ceremonies ended nearly a week of mourning for the earnest Midwestern congressman who became an unelected president — and the man who steadied the nation in the wake of the Watergate scandal and the Vietnam War.

Ford died Dec. 26 at age 93 at his home in Rancho Mirage.

A presidential jet delivered his body home to Michigan on Tuesday, where in an 18-hour period an estimated 57,000 people came to view his casket and pay their final respects.

Wednesday began and ended with crisp temperatures and crystal blue skies. Mourners lined the streets, filled alleys and crowded onto bridges to see the hearse and military motorcade as it traveled the six-mile route to Grace Episcopal Church for a final private service.

In front of the church, the crowd stood 20 people deep. No one spoke. No one jostled for space or a better view as the hearse pulled up. Some saluted as the motorcade pulled to a stop.

Only the sound of American flags snapping in the wind could be heard as a military honor guard carried the casket up the curved driveway and into the two-story brick church.

"I waited eight hours to see his casket," said Joe Hogan, 56, a truck driver from Allendale. "I came to the church to say a final goodbye. He was our man. He was Michigan's president.

"It's only fitting that he's home with us now."

Inside the church, former President Carter, Vice President Dick Cheney and recently resigned Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who was Ford's chief of staff and later his Defense secretary, joined other dignitaries, friends and family members.

Widow Betty Ford, who looked frail and spent, swayed slightly as the casket moved down the aisle. Her sons discreetly put their arms around her as their father's body was placed in front of a simple wooden altar and an ornate deep-blue stained glass window.

Throughout the nearly two-hour service, formal tributes gave way to moments of personal sorrow and warm humor.

Speaking to those gathered in the 350-seat church, to which the family has belonged since the 1940s, Carter remembered a deal he had struck long ago with Ford: Whoever died first would deliver the other's eulogy.

Carter began and ended his tribute to his close friend and former political rival by quoting his 1977 inauguration speech: "For myself, and for our nation, I want to thank my predecessor for all that he has done to heal our land."

Richard Norton Smith, former director of the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Library & Museum, recounted a meeting he had at the family home seven years ago to discuss the former president's funeral plans. After a review of the events to come, Smith said, Ford was called out of the room to take a phone call.

"A few minutes later, he returned with a grin on his face and a question on his lips," Smith said. " 'Well,' he asked in a booming voice, 'Have you got me resurrected yet?' I told him I was afraid that was somewhat outside the purview of the Military District of Washington."

The crowd burst into laughter. Betty Ford giggled so hard, she bent over and her face brightened for a moment.

Rumsfeld recalled the many hurdles Ford faced when he pardoned former President Nixon.

"Because Gerald Ford was there to restore the strength of the presidency, to rebuild our defenses and to demonstrate firmness and clarity, America could again, in Lincoln's words, stand as 'the last best hope of Earth,' " Rumsfeld said, his voice cracking. "He reminded Americans of who they were, and he put us on the right path when the way ahead was, at best, uncertain."

As the hearse slowly drove back to the museum, the motorcade passed a wooden sign that had been covered in red, white and blue ribbons: "Welcome to East Grand Rapids. Home of Gerald R. Ford. 38th President of the United States."

The day's journey ended at the museum — a center Ford helped design down to the smallest detail.

DOJ_NMG_0112209

At a graveside service that included a 21-gun salute, cannon smoke wafted across the river as the rumbling shots shook nearby buildings. After a 21-aircraft flyover roared across a sunset sky, Cheney presented Betty Ford with the American flag that had been draped over her husband's casket.

Tears pooling in her eyes, she gently kissed the flag and clutched it to her chest.

A Final Return Home (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich., Jan. 3 -- Gerald R. Ford's family and closest friends laid the former president to rest beside a fast-flowing river in the heart of a city that adored him. During the last stretch of a somber week of benedictions, an admirer praised him as a courageous leader "who never confused moderation with weakness nor compromise with surrender."

A once bright winter sun melted into twilight as Ford's widow, Betty, received from Vice President Cheney the American flag that had adorned the coffin of the 38th president. Ford's death Dec. 26 at age 93 ended an odyssey that carried him from a humble start in the Midwest to a heartfelt national farewell.

Former president Jimmy Carter, who defeated Ford in 1976 and later became a friend, began and ended his benediction the way he began his inaugural address. Now white-haired, his voice breaking, Carter repeated: "For myself and for our nation, I want to thank my predecessor for all he did to heal our land."

The memorial service, held at Grace Episcopal Church, where Gerald and Betty Ford were married in 1948, brought together a lifetime of friends and acquaintances from the highly placed to the less than mighty.

Among the eulogists was former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who recalled the calamity of President Richard M. Nixon's resignation, which thrust Ford into the Oval Office on Aug. 9, 1974. It was a time when "the pressures were enormous . . . and the American people were holding their breath, wondering what would happen next."

When Ford reassured the country, Rumsfeld said, "his special magic" was that few doubted his word.

Historian Richard Norton Smith, who often visited Ford, described him to mourners as "utterly without pretense." He recalled that in the last chapter of his life, the former president told him, "When I wake up at night and can't sleep, I think of Grand Rapids."

The city returned the favor Tuesday and Wednesday. Tens of thousands of residents lined the streets to glimpse his passing hearse or stood for hours in the windy cold to view his coffin.

It seemed every third mourner had a personal story to share. Often, it was about a good deed that Ford had done, or a recollection that suggested a simpler, more civil time when the people felt closer to those in power.

Eagle Scout Jason Beaton, 18, related that his grandmother used to double-date with Ford. Linda Komejan, 52, said Ford interceded to get a driver's license for her mentally handicapped uncle, allowing him to get to work.

Retired teacher Marian Krupiczewicz, 59, recalled going to Ford's Capitol Hill office in the 1960s as a teenager and sitting in his chair: "There'd even be papers on his desk. It was different then."

"I remember as a kid going out to East Grand Rapids, riding my bike out there, because the president was coming to town," said William Dekker, 46. "Thirty years later, it's the same thing."

Handmade signs declared, "Welcome Home, Mr. President."

As the Episcopal service of thanksgiving began, many of the 31 men and women named honorary pallbearers took their seats, among them Cheney and golfer Jack Nicklaus. A maize-and-blue University of Michigan football blanket marked the pew that former coach Bo Schembechler, who died in November, would have occupied.

Son Michael Ford read the 23rd Psalm and son Steven read in a quavering voice from Paul's Letter to the Romans. Rumsfeld, who served as Ford's White House chief of staff, recalled that Ford never lowered himself to the partisanship that often marked Washington dealings.

"He reminded Americans of who they were and he put us on the right path when the way ahead was at best uncertain," Rumsfeld said, recalling Ford's 895-day presidency. "It is commonly said that Ford healed the nation, and he did."

DOJ_NMG_0112210

After the church service, the cortege made its way back across town to the gravesite beside the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum. A military band played "Ruffles and Flourishes" for the final time, followed by a medley of patriotic songs, among them "The Star-Spangled Banner" and "God Bless America."

The family followed the pallbearers and the coffin, Betty Ford helped from a wheelchair by Steven Ford and her military escort. As artillery fired a 21-gun salute and 21 military jets staged a precision flyover, the coffin lay beneath an inscription chosen by the Fords: "Lives committed to God, country and love."

Ford's Legacy: A Call For Unity In Congress (BSH)

By Kathleen Gray And Marisol Bello

Biloxi Sun Herald, January 4, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. - In recent years, former President Gerald R. Ford often lamented that partisanship was tearing apart the fabric of Congress and loyalty to special interests was displacing public duty.

"It was very disturbing to him," said Martin Allen Jr., a friend from Grand Rapids and chairman emeritus of the Gerald R. Ford Foundation. "As minority leader he always tried to craft a consensus."

The foundation now hopes to use Ford's record of bipartisanship as an example for future politicians.

"We want to study his legacy and show people interested in running for office that there's another way," Allen said Tuesday night.

The foundation sponsored a conference in Washington last year to examine how Ford did his job and now hopes to make it an annual event, promoting a legacy dedicated to Ford's strong sense of patriotism before partisanship.

As a Republican president, Ford didn't always get along with Democrats, vetoing 66 bills in his two years in office. Democrats mustered the votes to override 12 of the vetoes. But both the Democrat-controlled House and Senate overwhelmingly confirmed Ford's appointment as vice president (the combined vote was 479-38).

In the mourning since Ford's death, historians, Democrats and Republicans have all remarked on Ford's ability to work with both parties.

Friends recalled that Ford shared staffers with John F. Kennedy when they were congressmen and that Ford was c lose to Thomas (Tip) O'Neill, a powerful Boston Democrat in the House.

"He loved that part of it," Allen said of working with the other party. "You don't find very much of that anymore."

In his eulogy Wednesday, former President Jimmy Carter spoke fondly of the friendship he forged with Ford after the two battled for the presidency in 1976.

"I relished his strong advice. He reluctantly departed from his party to give me support on some of my most difficult challenges," Carter said, adding that the one call that he, Anwar Sadat and Menachem Begin made together after crafting a Middle East peace accord was to Ford.

"Our mutual respect blossomed into a valued personal friendship," Carter said.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said after Ford's death that a fitting tribute to his memory would be a return to civility in Washington.

The thousands of people who stood hours in line for a momentary glimpse of his casket were a testament to the public's hunger to see a return to the collegiality that marked the Congress of Ford's generation, Allen said.

"We have more politicians than statesmen and we need a statesman more than ever," said Philip Bareham, 46, of Lansing, Mich. "Today, it's like a boxing match."

Sarah Parker-Hermuth, 30, of Grand Rapids said the country could use a politician like Ford again, but she wondered whether such a candidate would survive today. "He would not adhere to the same campaign tactics," she said.

That was a lesson that Ford taught Allen.

"He told me once to go back to the museum and look at all the commercials from the 1976 campaign," Allen said, referring to the Gerald R. Ford Museum in Grand Rapids. "There were no personal attacks."

DOJ_NMG_0112211

Former Rep. Joe Schwarz of Battle Creek, Mich., a moderate Republican who was targeted by conservative groups in his failed bid for re-election last year, said the Ford foundation's goals are honorable and a welcome initiative. But he said he doubts change will come quickly.

When he reached across the aisle in the past two years to develop working relationships with Democrats, Schwarz said he lost points with the GOP.

"In the House, the conservatives really stick together. They have their own agenda and pursue that agenda above all else," Schwarz said. "Gerald Ford didn't look at ideas as Republican or Democrat. He took each idea ... on its merits."

Norman Ornstein, co-author of "The Broken Branch," which examined Congress, said he's "wildly enthusiastic" about the foundation's initiative and hopes to help.

"What we've had in the past few years is generally corrosive, tribal politics," he said. "Putting some resources and prestige of the foundation into socializing and educating politicians into the cost of continuing to behave this way would be wonderful."

Navy To Name Aircraft Carrier After Ford (AP)

AP, January 4, 2007

The Navy will name its next aircraft carrier USS Gerald R. Ford in honor of the president who was buried Wednesday in his home town of Grand Rapids, Mich., officials said.

The Navy had not planned to make the announcement yet, but Donald H. Rumsfeld, the former defense secretary who served in the Ford administration, divulged the news during his eulogy at the funeral.

"How fitting it would be that the name Gerald R. Ford will patrol the high seas for decades to come in defense of the nation he loved so much," he said.

Later at the Pentagon the Navy confirmed that it would make an official announcement "in a few weeks." It said it was still working on details of the ceremony with members of the Ford family.

Ford served in the Navy during World War II.

Ford To City: OK (WSJ)

By Felix G. Rohatyn

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

NEW YORK -- The year 1975 was a difficult one for the city. A new mayor, Abe Beame, and a new governor, Hugh Carey, were elected as the economy was faltering due to a recession, an Arab oil boycott, the war in Vietnam and inflation. At the national level, Watergate and the Nixon resignation suddenly elevated Gerald Ford to the presidency.

But a crisis had been building up here for some time. The city's financial condition was deeply concerning, running a significant deficit as a result of an exodus of private sector jobs and an influx of new municipal employees. Politically New York was always a Democratic city, a union city, with a strong Republican business community and little contact between the two. Morale was bad, the city was dirty, crime was up and the economy was weak.

In April, New York and its lead underwriter, the Bankers Trust Company, was preparing its spring financing when I took a call from a broker offering to sell short-term city notes. "It is a bargain," he said, "9.5% interest, triple tax free, backed by the city's credit. How can you say no?" The terms reflected desperation more than a bargain. Sure enough, soon thereafter, Bankers Trust refused to proceed with the offering to underwrite the city's financing on the grounds that there was "insufficient assurance of repayment." Almost without anyone noticing, the markets had closed on New York.

Year after year, and with the support of the state, the city spent more than it took in. It had the choice of raising taxes, cutting spending or borrowing. Naturally the politicians chose to borrow and, in addition, characterized tens of millions of expenses as capital investments. The result was to constantly reduce the city's ability to make capital improvements while, simultaneously, increasing the debt by $1 billion annually. While the mayor had just agreed to a major pay increase for the municipal work force, no one really knew the level of the city's deficit.

By the beginning of May we had little over a month to avoid a default -- the next debt maturity of $1 billion would occur on June 18. At that point, Gov. Carey, brilliant and courageous, stepped into the picture. Since the state did not have the wherewithal to bail out the city, he and Mayor Beame turned to Washington and to President Ford for an emergency loan. Ford was a man of decency and common sense. He was also in the middle of the presidential campaign of 1976, which pushed him further to the right. His most important advisers and cabinet members were ideological conservatives, led by Treasury Secretary Bill Simon. New York was viewed as the liberal capital of the U.S. and any thought of "bailing out" the city unleashed strong opposition in Congress. Secretary Simon rejected our request and suggested we return with a plan. His idea of a plan included large increases in sales taxes and transit fares, tuition at City University and significant cutback in labor costs and benefits, conditions no Democratic governor could accept.

DOJ_NMG_0112212

Gov. Carey appointed a bipartisan committee of business leaders to review the impact of a New York bankruptcy. The committee unanimously recommended against it because of its unfathomable risks and we turned to a structure which became the Municipal Assistance Corporation. The MAC was a financing mechanism, which could sell its own bonds backed by the New York sales tax and which might give the city time to bring its budget into balance. The banks and labor leadership joined in the recommendation and on June 18 the state legislature voted to create MAC. Gov. Carey immediately christened it "Big MAC" and the underwriters began selling its bonds.

Unfortunately, Mayor Beame, who had obtained significant concessions from labor in our prior negotiations, gave them all back as soon as MAC was established; the result was a collapse in the price of MAC bonds, a market loss of $100 million after the public offering and a closing of the public market for MAC bonds, as well as for city bonds. By now we knew we had to take authority for the city's finances away from the mayor if we had any hope of avoiding bankruptcy. We could only rely on the governor and, ultimately, we knew we would need federal assistance.

We created the Emergency Financial Control Board, chaired by the governor, to control the budget. With the EFCB in control of the budget and the MAC in control of the financing, the state effectively controlled the city. The unions went along even though they were kept outside these structures because they knew this was the city's only chance. They committed to investing part of their pension funds in MAC bonds while the banks extended their existing loans.

During the summer we floated a few bond issues but we knew we only had limited capabilities and that we would run out of capacity before Christmas. By the beginning of November things looked bleaker and bleaker.

In Washington we testified in front of congressional committees, facing the opposition of the president, although that opposition seemed to soften somewhat due to the weakness of the securities and the foreign exchange markets facing a New York bankruptcy. And then, on Oct. 29, Ford gave his famous "drop dead" speech. He never spoke those words; but he indicated that he would veto any legislation proposing a financial bailout -- and the meaning was quite similar. The Daily News engraved them in stone.

At the first Western Economic Summit in France, with Ford in attendance, Fed Chairman Arthur Burns asked French President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing and German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt their opinion of the potential economic impact of a New York bankruptcy. They were direct in their answer: "It would be a catastrophe. It would cause a global dollar crisis."

Ford deserves great credit for his willingness to change his mind. On his return to Washington, he signed legislation providing credit to the city; this unlocked other pieces of the package: from the banks, the pension funds and insurance companies. It saved New York but it did not save his presidency. Jimmy Carter was elected in 1976.

In 1980 the city balanced its budget; in 1981 it re-entered the securities markets and repaid the government guarantees. Since those dark days the city's recovery was uninterrupted, except for 9/11. New York's present economic boom is ample proof that those who opposed bankruptcy were right, and that in a crisis, bipartisanship and business-labor cooperation will go a long way. One of Ford's greatest achievements may have been that he knew when he had pushed New York City to the limit and that, contrary to some of his colleagues, he also knew when to stop.

Mr. Rohatyn was chairman of New York's Municipal Assistance Corporation from 1975-1993.

While The Nation Mourned, Their Trip Continued (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

A day after the death of former president Gerald R. Ford, Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) embarked on what could be called his first official activity as the incoming Senate majority leader.

DOJ_NMG_0112213

But it had nothing to do with Ford's funeral. Instead, Reid boarded a government plane bound for six days in South America, accompanied by wife Landra and five other Democratic and Republican senators and their spouses Dec. 27. Their mission: improved relations -- and New Year's in Machu Picchu.

The "Machu Men," as they were dubbed, included Reid and Sens. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) and Robert F. Bennett (R-Utah).

Highlighting their trip: three hours of presidential meetings and two days touring the Incan ruins in Peru.

The senators did not change course after Ford's death, figuring they would insult leaders in a region none too happy with the United States to begin with, according to a Reid aide.

"This was a critical trip," said Reid spokesman James Manley. The group was seeking "cooperation on several fronts, including trade," as shown in official meetings -- and shopping at handicrafts bazaars.

They reported first to the U.S. embassy in Bolivia, for briefings -- a crafts exhibit, lunch and bipartisan gift-giving. Reid received a replica of the hand-knit sweater President Evo Morales wore on the campaign trail. Bennett got a "multicolored, pretty silly-looking hat," according to someone who saw it.

At the presidential palace, the senators had a "long, intense conversation," with Morales, Reid told reporters afterwards.

Dec. 29, it was on to Ecuador, for nearly an hour with President-elect Rafael Correa, known for his colorful neckties and epithets. The senators agreed to support extended trade benefits for Ecuador, despite Correa's vow to kill the lease on an air base used by the United States to hunt coke smugglers.

"We respect the sovereignty of Ecuador," Reid said, before the group left to see indigenous villages, their leaders and handicrafts.

Next came New Year's Eve, and two official holidays, meaning "not paid for with government money." The group dined in Cuzco and left early on New Year's Day for sightseeing in Machu Picchu.

Tuesday, as official Washington mourned Ford, the group clocked an hour with Peruvian President Alan Garcia, then flew home. Reid and Durbin, seeking a last chance to express their grief, then scored a government jet to Michigan for Ford's burial yesterday.

The senators and their spouses, Manley pointed out, were "the most high-powered, largest delegation to visit this region in many years."

After their visit, however, Morales announced that from now on, American tourists will need visas.

In Meetings With Allies, Clinton Hones ’08 Strategy (NYT)

By PATRICK HEALY And ADAM NAGOURNEY

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

The topic was the Democratic sweep in New Hampshire in November, and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton couldn’t get enough of it.

Skip to next paragraph Dining in Washington recently with three allies from New Hampshire, which has the first-in-the-nation primary, Mrs. Clinton was by turns probing and absorbing and, a participant said, clearly informed. How did the Democrats manage to unseat the state’s two Republican members of Congress? What were the key issues? And who were the new players to have emerged there in the 10 years since she last visited — and since her husband, Bill Clinton, used a strong second-place finish in the New Hampshire primary to vault his way to the Democratic nomination and the White House 15 years ago?

“She’s always been a student of government and of how you get there,” said Patricia McMahon, one of the dinner guests, a former Clinton White House aide who is now a state representative.

This meeting was one of a series of nearly nonstop political consultations that Mrs. Clinton has engaged in — over dinner and drinks, at private offices and at her home in Washington — since Election Day, in what her advisers say are preparations for a probable announcement that she is taking the first steps into the presidential campaign.

Mrs. Clinton, the New York Democrat, was described by participants as leaving little doubt that she plans to run, without saying so directly. Depending on her audience, she appears to be either seeking information to use in campaign strategy, pressing potential supporters to hold tight and wait for her to announce, or gauging how certain issues — in particular, her initial vote for the war in Iraq — might play.

DOJ_NMG_0112214

The sessions are the subject of much discussion in Democratic circles, and they seem designed in part to counter any impression that Mrs. Clinton is surrounded by an insular circle of longtime advisers and friends who are detached from many of the grassroots Democrats who have grown in influence since the last time a Clinton ran for president.

According to participants, Mrs. Clinton has pressed to find out everything from whether former Vice President Al Gore will run again (he is inclined not to, people tell her) to how much support remains for Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the party's 2004 candidate, among Democratic leaders (anemic, she has heard).

Mrs. Clinton told Democrats that she viewed her two strongest potential Democratic opponents as Senator Barack Obama of Illinois and John Edwards, the former senator from North Carolina. They said that she viewed Mr. Obama as her biggest obstacle to the nomination, but that she believed the threat of his candidacy will diminish as voters learn how inexperienced he is in government and foreign affairs.

Without mentioning Mr. Obama by name, Mrs. Clinton and her camp are already asserting that experience will be a key attribute for any successful candidate during difficult times — an argument that her team will no doubt make in a more aggressive way against Mr. Obama if they both jump into the race.

Mrs. Clinton is holding her discussions at a time of tremendous fluidity in presidential politics. The emergence of Mr. Obama, the Democratic takeover of Congress, the continued deterioration in Iraq, and the decisions by Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana and former Governor Mark Warner of Virginia not to run all have made her consultations more important and the situation she faces more complex.

According to participants, it is clear that Mrs. Clinton is far along in plotting a campaign, and she is honing strategy at the same time that she is making overtures to people in states that heavily influence the presidential nominating process. New Hampshire is expected to hold the first primary in January 2008, after caucuses in Iowa and Nevada.

Mrs. Clinton has gone to great lengths to try to keep these meetings private. She and her aides have strongly asked Democrats not to report what has taken place there, from what she says to what she eats and where (she had the lamb at Ruth's Chris, the Dover sole at the Four Seasons). Many people who discussed the meetings did so on the condition of anonymity, and some of her advisers pointedly refused to talk, including Paul Begala, the Democratic consultant who worked as a senior adviser to Mr. Clinton in the 1992 race and is close to Mrs. Clinton.

"As I tell the boys: N.H.D.: Not. Happening. Dude," Mr. Begala wrote in an e-mail, the boys a reference to his sons.

Still, several Democrats were willing to share what they described as long discussions about politics and policy with a former first lady who wants to be president.

Senator Clinton told one New Hampshire Democrat that if all things were equal, she would prefer to delay the formal start of her campaign until later this year and focus instead on notching accomplishments as a prominent member of the new Democratic majority in the Senate. At several meetings, Mrs. Clinton has wondered, with obvious exasperation, why her husband was able to delay making his presidential announcement in 1991 until October, while she is under increasing pressure to make hers earlier in the year, participants said.

"I recommended that she didn't need to jump in early, that I would like to see some progress in the Senate, and she said she felt the same way," said the Democrat, William Shaheen, who was a senior New Hampshire aide to Mr. Gore in 2000 and Mr. Kerry in 2004.

Skip to next paragraph Some of her aides said that while she is likely to announce within the next few weeks that she is creating a presidential exploratory committee, a step that would allow her to start raising money, a formal announcement might take longer. And some of the advice she has heard has been to wait.

"Senator Clinton was clear that she'd like to focus on the Senate, but sometimes events come into it, other people start beating the drum quicker, and you can lose key people if you wait," Mr. Shaheen said.

Jeanne Shaheen, a former New Hampshire governor and Mr. Shaheen's wife, said that Mrs. Clinton had consulted her as well, and that she had asked "all the right kinds of questions."

DOJ_NMG_0112215

"She clearly is thinking about what to do and not taking anything for granted," said Mrs. Shaheen, who is now the director of the Institute of Politics at Harvard. "She has a special relationship with the people in New Hampshire, from her years in the White House, and I think she was trying to get a sense of what a campaign would be like if she decides to run."

Mrs. Clinton has talked, both in person or by telephone, to influential Democrats in New Hampshire, Iowa, South Carolina and Nevada, the states that will begin the nomination process with caucuses and primaries a year from now. She has pressed Democrats to find out what campaign staff her prospective opponents like Mr. Edwards have assembled in states like Iowa. And she asked precisely where she should go in places like Iowa and New Hampshire if she, as expected, does a round of trips there after forming a presidential exploratory committee.

No detail has been too minor for Mrs. Clinton. She has asked Democrats from New Hampshire and Iowa about the concerns in certain regions and counties of their states, dwelling on energy issues, health care, education and the war in Iraq. She has asked about the influence of independent voters (they make up the biggest voting bloc in New Hampshire and can vote in the Democratic primary there). Mrs. Clinton has less experience with presidential politics in Iowa than in New Hampshire because in 1992, when her husband ran, Senator Tom Harkin of Iowa was also seeking the presidential nomination, so the rest of the candidates steered clear of that state's race.

Mrs. Clinton has not been to Iowa since the 2004 election.

The senator spent the week between Christmas and New Year's Day on vacation with her husband in the Caribbean, but her associates said Tuesday that she would return this week to working through her long call list with Democrats around the country and holding private lunches and dinners in Washington and New York.

The New Hampshire Democratic Party has invited Senator Clinton to be a keynote speaker at a major fund-raiser this winter, and officials there say they expect her to attend and are waiting to hear about a date. They say it could be anytime from late January through March.

Some New Hampshire Democrats expressed concern that Mrs. Clinton's first dinner with political players from their state, on Dec. 9, was limited to three Democrats who were active in her husband's campaigns in the 1990s and not a broader group that reflected the vanguard of state party politics today.

Terie Norelli, who became speaker of the New Hampshire House in December and the first Democratic speaker in 70 years, said she had not heard from Mrs. Clinton. "It'll only be tricky for her if she stops with those people," Ms. Norelli said. "Democratic politics has certainly changed since the 1990s, if you look at how many Democrats have been elected to the House, and the two new Democrats going to Congress. It would be wise for any candidate to move on and reach out to many of the new activists that we have."

Giuliani Leak: Attention Turns To Florida (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

Mischief in presidential politics in Florida?

The mystery thus far: Advisers to Rudolph W. Giuliani say that someone stole an aide's luggage during a political trip last fall, found a 140-page strategy notebook inside and photocopied it, then returned the luggage in some manner and gave the goods to a Giuliani opponent.

The contents of the notebook ended up splashed across The Daily News in New York on Tuesday. Not to be outdone, The New York Post reported yesterday that political operatives believed that the theft happened on a campaign trip through Florida.

While it does not prove anything per se, a spokeswoman for the governor of Florida, Charlie Crist, a Republican, confirmed yesterday that luggage from the Giuliani entourage was indeed missing during a campaign trip last fall.

"They were traveling with us, and we did find a piece of luggage, and we just worked as quickly as possible to get it back to the owner," said Erin Isaac, the spokeswoman.

Ms. Isaac said she had no information about allegations by Mr. Giuliani's office that someone, somewhere, stole and photocopied the notebook; she added that the governor's office was not conducting an inquiry into those allegations.

DOJ_NMG_0112216

She said that the piece of luggage was left on a Crist plane "during the chaos of the campaign," and that nothing fishy happened with the bag when it was in their custody.

"No copies were made. The bag was found and held until we were able to return it to the owner," Ms. Isaac said.

She said that Mr. Crist's campaign switched planes all the time last fall, and that she did not have specifics about the plane, luggage or trip involving the Giuliani contingent.

Sunny Mindel, a spokeswoman for Mr. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, issued a statement yesterday that underscored one certainty in this mystery: Mr. Giuliani, as a possible Republican candidate for president, cannot afford to alienate the Republican who is set to lead Florida through the 2008 balloting.

"We have no question that whatever happened had nothing to do with Governor Crist or his staff," said the statement from Anthony Carbonetti, a senior political adviser to Mr. Giuliani. "The mayor has the highest regard for Governor Crist."

Romney Takes Step Toward An '08 Run (NYT)

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 — On his last full day as governor of Massachusetts, Mitt Romney created a presidential exploratory committee Wednesday, the first formal step in a likely run for the 2008 Republican nomination.

Kate Phillips and The Times's politics staff report on the latest political news from around the nation.

More Politics News"After talking to my family, I have decided to take this initial step of forming an exploratory committee in order to raise the resources and build the campaign organization required to pursue the highest office in our country," Mr. Romney said in a statement issued in Boston.

By filing papers here, Mr. Romney became the latest in a parade of prospects who have formed such committees, a step that permits them to raise and spend money specifically on exploratory efforts.

Romney Submits Paperwork For 2008 Bid (AP)

By Glen Johnson

AP, January 4, 2007

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney took the initial step in a 2008 presidential bid, another hopeful in a crowded Republican field headlined by the party's more familiar names of John McCain and Rudy Giuliani.

The governor filed papers to create an exploratory committee just an hour before he left the Statehouse for the final time on Wednesday, concluding his one and only term in elective office. Democrat Deval Patrick will succeed Romney on Thursday.

"After talking to my family, I have decided to take this initial step of forming an exploratory committee in order to raise the resources and build the campaign organization required to pursue the highest office in our country," Romney said in a statement.

If elected, Romney would become the first Mormon president. The 59-year-old former venture capitalist is the son of former Michigan Gov. George Romney, who waged a short-lived campaign for the Republican nomination in 1968.

In opinion polls, McCain, the Arizona senator and 2000 candidate, and former New York Mayor Giuliani often share the top spot while Romney, best known for his work on the 2002 Winter Olympics, registers in single digits. But the governor has taken similar steps in pursuing the presidency, hiring staff and establishing a fundraising base a full year before the first primary votes are cast.

"Given his pedigree," said Richard Bond, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee and declared backer of McCain, "he is a serious candidate."

Other Republican candidates include Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback and former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson, who have established exploratory committees. California Rep. Duncan Hunter and former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore have said they intend to follow suit. Others said to be mulling a bid include Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, New York Gov. George Pataki, Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel, and former Oklahoma Gov. Frank Keating.

In recent weeks, Romney has faced questions about his conservative credentials on issues such as gay rights and abortion. Romney challenged Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy in 1994, and in a letter he promised a gay Republican group he would be a stronger advocate for gays than his rival.

DOJ_NMG_0112217

Romney ran as a moderate during his gubernatorial campaign. Despite saying he personally opposed abortion, he not only pledged to leave the state's abortion laws intact, but noted his mother, Lenore, ran for U.S. Senate in Michigan in 1970 as a supporter of abortion rights.

He now stresses his opposition to abortion in speeches across the country.

In 2002, Romney's supporters also handed out fliers with well wishes from him and his running mate at Boston's annual Gay Pride Parade. And he was endorsed by the Log Cabin Republicans, a group of gay party activists.

Nonetheless, Romney has insisted his opposition to gay marriage has been unflinching. He has lambasted the Supreme Judicial Court for its November 2003 decision making Massachusetts the first state to legalize gay marriage.

"While Mitt Romney says he's not a multiple-choice candidate, his record shows that he has routinely changed his position on everything from abortion to taxes, making it difficult to know where he stands," said Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Stacie Paxton.

Willard Mitt Romney received his B.A. in 1971 from Brigham Young University, where he was class valedictorian, and then went on to simultaneously earn degrees from Harvard Business and Law schools, graduating cum laude from law school and in the top 5 percent of his business school class.

The Michigan native remained in Boston, where he helped found a multibillion-dollar venture capital firm, Bain Capital, and amassed a multimillion-dollar fortune funding such companies as Staples, the office-supply giant.

His only major failure was an unsuccessful campaign in 1994 against Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass. Romney rebounded politically in 2002, when he won the governor's office.

Romney sought and won the chairmanship of the Republican Governors Association, which allowed him to spend the 2006 midterm elections traveling the country and dispensing cash to his party's gubernatorial candidates.

He raised a record $20 million and was especially generous with RGA money in early presidential states like Iowa, Florida and his native Michigan.

Romney Takes 1st Step For Presidential Bid (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — Leaving one political office with his eyes on another, Mitt Romney took the first formal step Wednesday into the race for the Republican presidential nomination on his last full day as governor of Massachusetts.

While not yet declaring his candidacy, Romney filed papers with the Federal Election Commission setting up a presidential exploratory committee, a step that allows him to raise and spend money in the initial pursuit of the party's 2008 nomination.

The one-term governor is positioning himself as a conservative alternative to Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. McCain and Giuliani formed exploratory committees late last year.

Romney has established support teams in some of the small states that have played an important role in selecting presidential nominees, going head-to-head with McCain in the early effort to line up effective organizations in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

"He has been extremely aggressive," said Tobe Berkovitz, a longtime political consultant who is now associate dean at Boston University's school of communications. "He's gotten himself in position to break into the top tier."

Romney, who ran unsuccessfully for the Senate against Sen. Edward M. Kennedy in 1994, is already facing accusations that he has shifted positions on several social issues, such as gay rights. He opposes same-sex marriage after having sought to position himself in the 1994 campaign as a stronger supporter of "full equality for America's gay and lesbian citizens" than Kennedy.

The Democratic National Committee on Wednesday challenged Romney over his past statements on abortion. In 1994, the Democrats contend, Romney said: "I believe that abortion should be safe and legal." Last February, Romney said, according to the Democrats: "I've never used either title, pro-life or pro-choice, in the past. I said I don't favor abortion."

In October, he said: "I call myself firmly pro-life."

His position on such hot-button social issues, Berkovitz said, "could be his Achilles' heel with Republican activists."

DOJ_NMG_0112218

Romney's communications director, Kevin Madden, said: "If the DNC is after us, we must be doing something right."

Romney, 59, would be the first president to be a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter--day Saints, if elected.

In a Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll in June, 37% of those surveyed said they did not think they could vote for a Mormon for the presidency — a challenge Romney's father, Gov. George Romney of Michigan, faced in 1968 when he ran for the Republican presidential nomination.

Ron Kaufman, a longtime political advisor to the family of President Bush and a member of the Republican National Committee from Massachusetts who is assisting Romney, said religion would not matter to voters in 2008.

"People are going to want someone who is a moral, ethical person," he said, adding that Romney "governed a very, very blue state as a conservative."

Romney plans to hold a daylong fundraising effort on Monday, summoning supporters to phone banks at Boston's waterfront convention center.

Announcing the formation of the campaign exploration organization, he told reporters in Boston: "I have a feeling we are going to be pretty busy. We have filed exploratory papers today. So, the process is moving forward on that front."

Governor Romney Will Form Presidential Exploratory Committee (BLOOM)

By Heidi Przybyla

Bloomberg, January 4, 2007

Jan. 3 (Bloomberg) -- Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney will take his first formal step toward a presidential run later today by filing papers to form an exploratory committee, a senior aide said.

The registration with the Federal Election Commission will allow the Republican governor to raise and spend money for a likely presidential campaign, the aide said, requesting anonymity because Romney hasn't yet made an official announcement about the exploratory committee. Romney leaves office tomorrow after deciding not to seek a second term.

In the past year Romney, 59, has moved closer to the front of the Republican field, aided by a signature health care bill in Massachusetts and the withdrawal of two high-profile rivals from contention for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, outgoing Senators George Allen of Virginia and Bill Frist of Tennessee.

Romney plans to make an official announcement about his presidential campaign later this year. For now he'll focus on traveling the country raising money and gauging support for his likely run, according to the aide. Polls show he trails both Senator John McCain and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, both of whom have formed exploratory committees.

A Dec. 11-14 Gallup poll found McCain and Giuliani are tied for first place, each with 28 percent of the vote. Romney comes in fifth, with four percent, behind Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

Romney is a former chairman of Boston-based management- consulting firm Bain & Co. He also oversaw the 2002 Salt Lake City Winter Olympics Games before running for governor. He lost a 1994 campaign to unseat Democratic Senator Edward Kennedy.

Romney Files For '08 Campaign (DN)

By Gordon Trowbridge

Detroit News, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, the son of a Michigan governor, kicked off his 2008 presidential campaign Wednesday, filing documents with the Federal Election Commission that allow his fledgling campaign to make and spend money.

The filing is an all-but-final declaration of a run by Romney, who as the son of Gov. George Romney grew up in Bloomfield Hills before moving on to financial and political success in Massachusetts. He becomes the closest thing to a favorite-son presidential candidate for Michigan since his father's unsuccessful 1968 bid for the GOP nomination.

Romney has made regular trips to Michigan in the past year, campaigning for state Republicans and building political connections. He has signed up big Michigan names such as state Attorney General Mike Cox and Oakland County Executive Brooks Patterson, as well as a number of big donors to President Bush in the state. There was even talk for much of last year that he would base his presidential campaign in Oakland County.

DOJ_NMG_0112219

But in Michigan and across the country, he faces a substantial obstacle: Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

"Last time around, McCain was very popular in Michigan," said Philip Abbot, a political scientist at Wayne State University, who noted McCain's victory in Michigan's 2000 presidential primary. Since then, McCain has built his own formidable Michigan operation.

Former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani also has spent plenty of time campaigning for GOP candidates in the state.

Romney Forms Presidential Committee, Focuses On Fundraising (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

Outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a successful businessman from a prominent Michigan Republican family, joined the 2008 sweepstakes yesterday, formally establishing a presidential committee and turning his attention to the substantial fundraising and organizational demands of a national campaign.

On a day he participated in a ritualistic walk from the statehouse that symbolically marked the end of his single term as governor of one of the most liberal states in the union, Romney set his sights on winning his party's presidential nomination against such nationally known opponents as Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

Romney's filing, delayed for a day out of respect for the national day of mourning for former president Gerald R. Ford, set up what is called a presidential exploratory committee, but the time for exploring ended for Romney some time ago. Along with McCain, Romney has been aggressively building a national network for months, particularly in Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Michigan -- all states with early caucuses or primaries next year.

With a new headquarters open for business in Boston, Romney plans to move into full-scale campaign activity immediately. He will speak to a group of Southern conservatives this weekend in Georgia and will host a major fundraising event in Boston Monday. A formal announcement of his candidacy will come later, aides said.

Romney trails far behind McCain and Giuliani in national polls, which at this stage often reflect the best name recognition. Republican strategists see the little-known Romney as a potentially formidable candidate whose stage presence, discipline and communications skills will help offset his limited experience as an elected official.

Romney, 59, is the son of the late George Romney, who was governor of Michigan from 1963 to 1969 and who unsuccessfully sought the Republican presidential nomination in 1968. Mitt Romney is a graduate of Harvard Law School and Harvard Business School and served as chief executive of Bain & Co. Inc., a management consulting firm, and later founded Bain Capital, a venture capital firm.

In 1999, Romney was called in to salvage the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City after the organizing committee's scandals and financial problems threatened the Games' success. He turned around the operation, eliminated a huge deficit and helped to stage what were ultimately highly successful Games.

His first try in politics ended in failure. He ran for the Senate in 1994 against a Massachusetts icon, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D), losing by 17 percentage points but establishing himself as an effective campaigner.

The echoes of that race could affect his bid for the Republican nomination in 2008. He said then that he would be a more effective advocate for gay rights than Kennedy was, and he defended Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion, while declaring himself personally opposed to abortion.

Romney has since said that his views on abortion have changed dramatically -- he now favors overturning Roe-- and he has become a leading opponent of same-sex marriage. Critics say he has shifted positions to make himself more acceptable to social and religious conservatives. His advisers say that his conversion on abortion is genuine and that, although he is vocal on the issue of same-sex marriage, he still opposes discrimination against gays.

Romney is a Mormon and has played leadership roles in his church. His religion could provide an obstacle to his success in GOP primaries and caucuses, given reservations about the Mormon church among many evangelicals. Recent polling by The Washington Post and ABC News showed that one in three Americans said they are less likely to support a Mormon presidential candidate.

Romney Exits With Pomp, Ambition (BOS)

By Andrea Estes And Scott Helman

The Boston Globe, January 4, 2007

Governor Mitt Romney took the ceremonial "lone walk" out of the State House and into the 2008 presidential race yesterday, concluding his final day as governor by filing papers to set up an exploratory committee for a campaign for president.

The one-term governor turned over symbolic gifts to incoming governor Deval Patrick, then joined his wife, Ann, on a red-carpeted walk down the 31 State House steps, where about 200 supporters cheered and cannons fired a 19-gun salute.

As Romney was wrapping up his State House duties, his campaign operatives were filing papers with the Federal Election Commission, allowing Romney to start raising money for his White House campaign. They set up a committee and launched a new website, www.MittRomney.com.

The filing begins a march toward next year's primaries, joining a Republican field that includes Senator John McCain of Arizona and former mayor Rudy Giuliani of New York City.

Today, Romney is to address the media from his new presidential campaign headquarters in the North End. He is not expected to join Patrick at his inauguration.

Romney this weekend is to head to Georgia for a gathering of southern conservatives, and on Monday hold a major fund-raiser for his presidential campaign at the South Boston convention center.

Though the first presidential primary is more than a year away, a major test of Romney's viability will be how much money he can raise. Because there are federal contribution limits of $2,100 per person, Romney can no longer rely on a relatively small group of large contributors. His challenge now is to raise small donations from many contributors, and his fund-raisers have already been busy courting Republican players to help him do that.

Through his Commonwealth Political Action Committee, which he set up in 2004 to support Republican candidates around the country, Romney raised $8.8 million by November.

Romney's departure from the State House, which took about 25 minutes, came one day earlier than the end of his four-year term of office. If he had left the building today, as has been the tradition, he would have been forced to walk through crowds of Patrick supporters gathered for the new governor's unusual outdoor inauguration. By staging the lone walk a day early, the governor commanded the spotlight, following a schedule that had been scripted down to the second.

Romney, who yesterday called being governor "a great job," turned over the symbols of office to Patrick at around 5 p.m. inside the governor's office. As photographers snapped pictures, Romney described the gifts -- a pewter key to the governor's office door; a Bible left by Governor Benjamin Butler when he left office in 1884, a gavel and a copy of the Massachusetts General Laws inscribed by each governor with a note to his or her successor.

Romney read aloud his inscription to Patrick. "Transmitted to Governor Patrick and the People of Massachusetts," said Romney. "To serve another person is an honor. To serve a great people has been a great honor. To help another person is rewarding. To help many thousands of people has been immeasurably rewarding. Each of those who has served and helped others these last four years, has spent themself in a great work, and so leaves a far richer person. May God continue to bless the people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts."

"Thank you so much," Patrick said. "Thank you for your service."

The two men left the office -- Romney to begin his walk out of the State House and Patrick to attend an inaugural event in Worcester.

After walking out of the governor's office, Romney made a series of stops, greeting people who he said symbolized achievements of his administration. He met with the family of Melanie Powell of Marshfield, who was killed by a drunk driver, and in whose memory the state's drunken driving bill was enacted in 2005. He also met with a family that lost their home in Hurricane Katrina, two families who couldn't afford medical care before the state's new healthcare law was passed, and with members of the National Guard. He also greeted a group of students who received new scholarships to state colleges because of their high MCAS scores.

He also shook hands with Lieutenant Governor Kerry Healey, who was defeated by Patrick in the November election.

DOJ_NMG_0112221

Several minutes ahead of schedule, Romney and his wife emerged from the center doors of the State House. They paused halfway down the steps, bathed in light, for the cannon salute. When they reached the street, they shook hands with supporters who lined both sides of Beacon Street. The crowd applauded; supporters took photos of the couple with their cellphones.

One of the first to say goodbye was Kris Mineau, president of the Massachusetts Family Institute, who stood at the front of the crowd. He has worked closely with Romney on a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage intended for the 2008 ballot.

Two hecklers followed Romney through Boston Common to a waiting car, one of them shouting "You're a hateful man." A supporter tried to drown the hecklers out, shouting, "There's our next president."

Though technically still governor until Patrick is sworn in today, Romney completed his final work day yesterday. After swearing in the Legislature, Romney signed a few dozen bills, including one that allows racetracks to continue simulcasting and another that overhauls rules for teenage drivers. He failed to sign a bill increasing the pay of the Boston Licensing Board, but OK'd a 4.8 percent payraise for state lawmakers over two years.

Though he just took the first formal step toward a presidential run, Romney has made it clear for the past two years that he was seriously considering getting into the race. His frequent out-of-state travel and jokes about Massachusetts' liberal reputation has irked some political leaders, both Democrats and Republicans, who have accused him of ignoring the job he was elected to do in 2002.

"I think once voters in other states understand what happened under Mitt Romney's leadership in Massachusetts, they will recoil from the notion that he should lead the country," said Philip Johnston, chairman of the state Democratic Party.

Yesterday's paperwork was filed by Benjamin Ginsberg, a prominent Republican lawyer, who will serve as Romney's national counsel. Romney has spent months signing up political talent in preparation for his run.

On Monday, Romney is to host a fund-raiser at the Boston Convention & Exhibition Center in South Boston. Supporters and activists working for Romney around the country are to gather to raise money and begin to plot out a campaign strategy. The event is to run from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. A call center is to be set up for the day, where volunteers will raise money.

Mitt's Maximum Exposure: '08 Contender Makes Most Of Exit (BOSH)

By Casey Ross

Boston Herald, January 4, 2007

Gov. Mitt Romney last night turned the traditional "long walk" out of the State House into a tightly scripted tribute to himself and his administration, crafted with an eye to the 2008 race for president he officially entered yesterday.

Stopping along the way to talk to groups of well-wishers selected to represent his administration's achievements, Romney left the State House at about 5 p.m. and entered a crowded presidential field where he faces tough competition, questions about his Mormonism and inevitable attacks on his record in Massachusetts.

Romney's self-celebratory walk-off drew hoots from political adversaries.

"What's going to follow him (on the presidential trail) is a litany of broken promises," Democratic strategist Mary Anne Marsh said. "He was supposed to be traveling the country and bringing us jobs. Instead, he was traveling the country and making jokes about Massachusetts."

Kevin Madden, spokesman for Romney's campaign, shot back, "Any time the Democrats are attacking Gov. Romney, it shows two things: First, they're terrified of his prospective candidacy; and second . . . you must be doing something right."

About an hour before Romney left the State House, he filed paperwork establishing an exploratory committee that allows him to raise money for his 2008 presidential bid.

Romney, who was out of state much of the last year, also signed several bills into law yesterday, including a teen safe-driving bill. But he failed to take action on several others that now must start over in the Legislature.

Among the unsigned bills were proposals to expand patient confidentiality protection and increase salaries for the Boston Licensing Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0112222

An aide said Romney did not have enough time to scrutinize the bills piled on his desk by the Legislature. “There simply was not enough time left in the session to adequately review each and every piece of legislation,” Romney spokesman Eric Fehrnstrom said.

During a brief ceremony with Gov.-elect Deval Patrick, Romney said he was honored to have served as governor. He then handed over the symbols of office to Patrick, including a set of the General Laws that bears a personal inscription from each governor.

Romney’s inscription to Patrick reads, in part: “To serve another person is an honor, to serve a great people has been a great honor . . . Each of those who has served and helped others these last four years, has spent themself in a great work, and so leaves a far richer person.”

Romney’s red-carpeted exit ended unceremoniously, with a heckler holding a sign reading “Go to hell, Mitt!” The heckler yelled, “You’re filthy scum!” as the governor ducked into a waiting car with his wife.

Romney campaign officials said he’ll start building his exploratory committee today in his new North End office. Romney yesterday launched a campaign Web site - www.MittRomney.com - immediately after he filed paperwork with the Federal Election Commission. [continue]

Gov. Seeks To Guarantee Health Insurance For All Calif. Kids (LAT)

By Jordan Rau

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger will propose that all Californian children, including those of undocumented immigrants, be guaranteed medical insurance as part of the health-care overhaul he intends to unveil next week, according to officials familiar with the plan.

If enacted by the Legislature, his proposal would affect about 763,000 children who currently lack insurance. While the administration has not revealed details of how it would pay for such a program, officials estimate that extending insurance to all children could cost the state as much as $400 million a year.

That would be a small piece of Schwarzenegger's stated goal: to ensure medical coverage for all of the 6.5 million Californians who now have none. Experts say that could cost upward of $10 billion a year.If successful, the governor's effort to cover all children would be a substantial political feat. Only a handful of other states guarantee coverage for all those under 18. Schwarzenegger himself vetoed a measure to cover all children in 2005, complaining that lawmakers offered no way to pay for it.

California's Republican legislators, who blocked a more modest effort to extend health care coverage last year, are sure to rebel against a plan that includes children of illegal immigrants.

Schwarzenegger is scheduled to announce his full health plan Monday. His office is still finalizing many parts of that package, but aides have made clear that it will be an ambitious effort to restrain health care costs and reduce the state's uninsured population.

All sectors of the health care industry, including hospitals, insurers, doctors, patients, businesses and government, would pay some of the costs under Schwarzenegger's plan. People familiar with the proposal say it includes new requirements for businesses to cover employees, though the details were unclear. The more cost employers and workers shouldered, the less the state would have to spend.

In addition, a number of measures favored by some aides, such as limiting the profits of insurers, remain undecided.

"There is no final health plan," said Adam Mendelsohn, Schwarzenegger's communications director. "As has been the case from the start, all ideas are on the table and the final touches are being applied. The administration is not confirming the inclusion of any one piece."

But several independent sources said Schwarzenegger has committed to the framework of the children's insurance portion. Administration officials have privately told people outside government that they intend to guarantee medical coverage for children of families earning up to 300 percent of the poverty level, or $60,000 a year for a family of four. Those families have 90 percent of the children without insurance, but the cutoff is not yet set in stone.

DOJ_NMG_0112223

Schwarzenegger's proposal goes further than one put forward last month by Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata, D-Oakland, which excluded illegal immigrants. Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez, D-Los Angeles, incorporated children of undocumented residents into his plan, which was also announced in December.

"A lot of us are really looking to (Schwarzenegger) for leadership," said Wendy Lazarus, founder of the Children's Partnership, a nonpartisan child advocacy group based in Santa Monica and Washington, D.C. "Assuming he is going to tell us that he is going to cover all kids, this is great news for California's kids."

About 90 percent of California's children already have insurance, either through their parents' coverage or through state Medi-Cal programs that help the impoverished. For years, advocates have been pressing lawmakers to finish the job, arguing that the electorate would be particularly sympathetic to the plight of children.

"It's the low-hanging fruit of the health-care reform debate," said Dr. Bob Ross, president of the California Endowment, a private foundation in Los Angeles created to push for expanded access to health care.

"Kids are relatively cheaper to cover" than adults, he said. "From a public health standpoint, it's smarter to cover all children regardless of immigration. You just don't want unimmunized kids surfing around in the population."

Such arguments have yet to win the day in Sacramento. Last year, Schwarzenegger backed a budget plan that would have helped fund local children's initiatives. Republican lawmakers blocked the proposal, because it would have included coverage for children of illegal immigrants.

"We believe Californians do not want to reward illegal behavior," said the Assembly Republican leader, Mike Villines of Clovis. "There are so many here (legally) who are hurting and trying to make ends meet, we've got to focus on them first."

The GOP is a minority in both houses of the Legislature, but most proposals involving state spending require a two-thirds vote, giving Republicans the power to stop them. However, it is possible that Schwarzenegger's plan could be molded to need a simple majority vote, like the last major piece of health care legislation to become law.

That measure, a 2003 mandate that most employers provide insurance for their workers, was repealed by the voters the following year.

Schwarzenegger has previously taken incremental steps to expand existing programs aimed at children's health, including the addition of $80 million to the state budget last year.

Martha Escutia, a former Democratic state senator from Whittier who pressed for coverage of all children including those of illegal immigrants, said Schwarzenegger told her in 2004 that he agreed with her.

"I said very bluntly that there was no way we could distinguish between children based on legal status," she recalled Wednesday. "And the governor agreed. He said, 'Children are children.' I remember him saying that very clearly."

Sixty-nine percent of Californian children without health insurance in 2005 were eligible for existing programs but were not enrolled, according to the UCLA Center for Health Policy Research. That was due to a variety of factors, including inadequate funds in some country programs to cover all those who qualified, and some of the bureaucratic requirements for entering state programs.

Many parents, for instance, are required to prove that their earnings are low enough to qualify their children.

There is disagreement about how many of the uninsured children are from undocumented families. A 2003 UCLA survey said that 33 percent were not citizens, but that does not mean they were in the country illegally. Ross, of the California Endowment, said the number was below 15 percent.

Most of the other states that already guarantee coverage for all children do it through state-paid programs for those from poor families, and by allowing better-off families to cover their children by paying a portion of the costs for the same programs.

Typically, the more a family earns, the more it pays. Connecticut, Illinois, Maine, Maryland, New Hampshire, New Jersey and Vermont all have such programs.

Lazarus, of the Children's Partnership, said that while California would not be the first to cover all children, it has fewer employers providing insurance and more illegal immigrants than other states, making coverage more challenging.

"For California to step up at this time when states and Congress are really focused on health care reform means that California could have a really significant leadership role across the nation," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0112224

Online Database Opens A Window For Parents To Compare Schools (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, January 4, 2007

Want to know how early your son's second-grade teacher has to arrive at school each morning? Whether she hands in lesson plans each week?

Whether she's allowed to spank your son?

A website by the National Council on Teacher Quality (www.nctq.org/cb), scheduled to launch today, promises to shine a light on teachers' working conditions. It gathers the minutiae of union collective-bargaining agreements and state policies for the nation's 50 largest school districts into a consumer-friendly database that allows anyone to compare districts. Together, the 50 districts educate 8 million children — about one in six public school children in the USA — and employ nearly half a million teachers.

The council, a Washington-based research group, hopes to expand the database by year's end to include the top 100 districts.

Director Kate Walsh says the site will help parents, policymakers, journalists and others understand how teacher contracts work by giving them access to largely unfiltered information about teachers' workdays, salaries, benefits and more.

"None of us benefits from having our heads in the sand," she says.

Want to find out how many days teachers in Duval County, Fla., work without students in the building? It comes out to 18. In New York City, it's 5.5. In Albuquerque, zero.

Teachers unions say the data could be misinterpreted — unions often agree to contract provisions to comply with local or state regulations, or contracts are hard to compare for other reasons, says Edward McElroy, president of the American Federation of Teachers.

"It is important for the public to realize that labor relations are far more complex than what this database captures," McElroy says. "This is just one layer of a three-dimensional onion."

Bill Raabe, director of collective bargaining and member advocacy for the National Education Association, the USA's largest teachers union, says he's concerned that users could draw "erroneous conclusions" from what they read — for instance, if a contract is silent on class size, it doesn't mean that the union didn't address it. The issue could simply be dealt with by state law.

"The contract is really just a piece of the picture," he says.

In the end, the new database could aid teachers in a few districts during their next round of contract talks: What better way to show they're getting a raw deal, comparatively speaking?

"It's a whole field that's largely unexplored," Walsh says.

The contracts are public documents, but they're not always accessible, says Andrew Rotherham, co-editor of the 2006 book Collective Bargaining in Education.

He says he was "stunned" at the lack of information available in most districts. Walsh's database, he adds, "moves you past the sort of anecdotes" that typically frame teacher issues.

"This transparency is good for everyone."

The Right Minimum Wage (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

A federal minimum wage is an idea whose time came in 1938, when public confidence in markets was at a nadir and the federal government's confidence in itself was at an apogee. This, in spite of the fact that with 19 percent unemployment and the economy contracting by 6.2 percent in 1938, the New Deal's frenetic attempts had failed to end, and perhaps had prolonged, the Depression.

Today, raising the federal minimum wage is a bad idea whose time has come, for two reasons, the first of which is that some Democrats have an evidently incurable disease -- New Deal Nostalgia. Witness Nancy Pelosi's "100 hours" agenda, a genuflection to FDR's 100 Days. Perhaps this nostalgia resonates with the 5 percent of Americans who remember the 1930s.

DOJ_NMG_0112225

Second, President Bush has endorsed raising the hourly minimum from $5.15 to $7.25 by the spring of 2009. The Democratic Congress will favor that, and he may reason that vetoing this minor episode of moral grandstanding would not be worth the predictable uproar -- Washington uproar often is inversely proportional to the importance of the occasion for it. Besides, there would be something disproportionate about the president vetoing this feel-good bit of legislative fluff after not vetoing the absurdly expensive 2002 farm bill, or the 2005 highway bill larded with 6,371 earmarks or the anti-constitutional McCain-Feingold speech-rationing bill.

Democrats consider the minimum-wage increase a signature issue. So, consider what it says about them:

Most of the working poor earn more than the minimum wage, and most of the 0.6 percent (479,000 in 2005) of America's wage workers earning the minimum wage are not poor. Only one in five workers earning the federal minimum lives in families with earnings below the poverty line. Sixty percent work part time, and their average household income is well over $40,000. (The average and median household incomes are $63,344 and $46,326, respectively.)

Forty percent of American workers are salaried. Of the 75.6 million paid by the hour, 1.9 million earn the federal minimum or less, and of these, more than half are under 25 and more than a quarter are between ages 16 and 19. Many are students or other part-time workers. Sixty percent of those earning the federal minimum or less work in restaurants and bars and earn tips -- often untaxed, perhaps -- in addition to wages. Two-thirds of those earning the federal minimum today will, a year from now, have been promoted and be earning 10 percent more. Raising the minimum wage predictably makes work more attractive relative to school for some teenagers and raises the dropout rate. Two scholars report that in states that allow people to leave school before 18, a 10 percent increase in the state minimum wage caused teenage school enrollment to drop 2 percent.

The federal minimum wage has not been raised since 1997, so 29 states with 70 percent of the nation's workforce have set minimum wages between $6.15 and $7.93 an hour. Because aging liberals, clinging to the moral clarities of their youth, also have Sixties Nostalgia, they are suspicious of states' rights. But regarding minimum wages, many have become Brandeisians, invoking Justice Louis Brandeis's thought about states being laboratories of democracy.

But wait. Ronald Blackwell, the AFL-CIO's chief economist, tells the New York Times that state minimum-wage differences entice companies to shift jobs to lower-wage states. So: States' rights are bad, after all, at least concerning -- let's use liberalism's highest encomium -- diversity of economic policies.

The problem is that demand for almost everything is elastic: When the price of something goes up, demand for it goes down. Obviously were the minimum wage to jump to, say, $15 an hour, that would cause significant unemployment among persons just reaching for the bottom rung of the ladder of upward mobility. But suppose those scholars are correct who say that when the minimum wage is low and is increased slowly -- proposed legislation would take it to $7.25 in three steps -- the negative impact on employment is negligible. Still, because there are large differences among states' costs of living and the nature of their economies, Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) sensibly suggests that each state be allowed to set a lower minimum.

But the minimum wage should be the same everywhere: $0. Labor is a commodity; governments make messes when they decree commodities' prices. Washington, which has its hands full delivering the mail and defending the shores, should let the market do well what Washington does poorly. But that is a good idea whose time will never come again.

U.S. Patrols Somalia For Terrorist Watch (AP)

By George Gedda

AP, January 4, 2007

U.S. Navy vessels are deployed off the coast of Somalia to make sure al-Qaida or allied jihadists don't escape the country by sea now that the once-dominant Islamist forces there are in retreat, the State Department said Wednesday.

Of particular concern is the fate of three al-Qaida militants who were believed by U.S. officials to be under the protection of the Islamic Courts Union in Mogadishu until Ethiopian forces drove the Courts from power in recent days.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the missions off the coast are being carried out by a U.S. task force based in the Horn of Africa,

The al-Qaida militants are believed to have had a role in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, and in the 2002 bombing of a hotel in Kenya.

DOJ_NMG_0112226

Kenya sent extra troops to its border with Somalia on Wednesday to keep Islamic militants from entering the country

McCormack said the administration is planning to provide food to Somalia, adding that U.S. officials will take part in a donors conference soon to determine further needs and how they can be met.

Also planned is a meeting of U.S., European and African countries, along with international institutions on Friday in Kenya for a discussion of humanitarian and security issues.

McCormack said the United States continues to support the creation of an all-Africa force to help out the transitional government as it seeks to consolidate its authority in Mogadishu. Until the Islamic Courts were forced out, the government had been confined to the western town of Baidoa, unable to assert its authority nationwide despite U.N. and United States backing.

The U.S. efforts on the humanitarian and peacekeeping fronts are part of an overall international initiative "to move Somalia out of the category of a failed state," McCormack said.

The spokesman stopped short of an outright endorsement of the Ethiopian attack but said it was apparent that the Islamic Courts had fallen under the control "of those that had links to al-Qaida and other terrorist groups."

These groups, he said, "quite clearly were interested in imposing draconian types of interpretations" of Islamic law on Somalia in contravention of the polices of the transitional government.

Before Ethiopian troops launched their offensive last week, "we certainly would have hoped that there could have been a negotiated, political dialogue," McCormack said.

"But it became apparent over time, and certainly very apparent in the recent weeks, that that wasn't going to happen and that the Islamic Courts were intent upon trying to seize control over all of Somalia through use of arms," he said.

US Seeks Return To Mogadishu (FT)

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

The US is seeking to re-establish a presence in Mogadishu, capital of Somalia, after an absence of 12 years following the ousting of Islamist forces this week by Ethiopian-backed Somali allies.

Jendayi Frazer, assistant secretary of state, hopes to include Mogadishu in a tour that began on Wednesday with the aim of shoring up Somalia's transitional government with multinational African forces and US humanitarian aid.

A US official confirmed that if the visit went ahead, Ms Frazer would be the most senior US official to set foot in Somalia since before the 1993 battle against a Mogadishu warlord that cost the lives of 19 American servicemen in one day and precipitated the US withdrawal in 1994.

The Bush administration tacitly supported Ethiopia's intervention last month but now fears Meles Zenawi, the prime minister, will pull out his forces before Somalia is stabilised. Ms Frazer is expected to meet Mr Meles and Yoweri Museveni, the Ugandan president, in Addis Ababa, and co-host an international meeting on Somalia in Nairobi tomorrow.

The US sees Uganda playing a key role in an African stabilisation force in Somalia. So far only Uganda and Nigeria have indicated willingness to participate.

Ms Frazer last month accused the Islamic Courts Union, which had seized power in Mogadishu from US-backed warlords in June, of being under the control of "East Africa al-Qaeda cells".

US warships are patrolling the Somali coast to prevent the escape of al-Qaeda suspects.

A Kenyan official said refugees were being allowed across the border under tight security but the frontier was otherwise closed. Somali and Ethiopian troops pursued Islamist fighters in the south of the country.

A visible US presence in Mogadishu would represent at least a symbolically important moment of progress for the Bush administration in a widening region of conflict and proxy wars that have involved Somalia, Ethiopia, Eritrea, parts of Sudan, and the Central African Republic.

But there are concerns in the administration and among its critics that the US will be seen in the Muslim world to be waging another proxy war against Islamist adversaries.

Officials at a European Union meeting in Brussels urged Somalia's transitional government to negotiate with opposition forces to pave the way for a peacekeeping force. John Sawers, a UK official, said: "It is important we create the conditions whereby Ethiopia can withdraw." But he said it was unlikely a pull-out would be possible within the two weeks suggested by Mr Meles.

DOJ_NMG_0112227

Reporting by Guy Dinmore in Washington, Andrew England in Cairo, Andrew Bounds in Brussels and Mark Turner at the United Nations

Kenya Closes Border But Denies Turning Back Refugees (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

BAIDOA, Somalia, Jan. 3 — Kenyan officials announced Wednesday that they were closing their northern border because of the conflict in Somalia, but denied that they had turned back hundreds of refugees.

For the past few days, Ethiopian-led forces have been hunting down the remnants of Somalia's once powerful Islamist movement, pushing fighters steadily south toward the Kenyan border. Ethiopian officials have said the Islamist fighters are headed to a remote jungle outpost called Ras Kamboni, which terrorism suspects have used before as a hide-out.

It now seems that Somalia's problems have sucked in yet another country, and with the final throes of the conflict on their doorstep, Kenyan officials said they had no choice but to act.

"We needed to close the border so we could closely vet all refugees," said Alfred N. Mutua, a spokesman for the Kenyan government.

But Mr. Mutua denied news reports and accusations from United Nations officials that Kenyan border guards had deported 600 Somalis seeking asylum, saying that the closing applied only to cross-border trade and nonrefugee traffic, to prevent the Islamists from slipping into the country.

United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees António Guterres told Agence France-Presse on Wednesday that Kenya "has a humanitarian obligation to allow civilians at risk to seek asylum on its territory."

Mr. Mutua said that 10 foreign Islamist fighters were caught Monday trying to cross the border in a throng of refugees. The fighters were carrying briefcases packed with cash. Kenyan officials said they probably had been financiers of Somalia's Islamist movement, which was routed last week by Ethiopian soldiers supporting Somalia's transitional government.

As hundreds of Somalis continue to line up at the border each day, hoping for asylum, Kenya has buttressed its patrols with extra troops and helicopters. Residents on the Kenyan side of the border have reported skirmishes in Kenya, but Mr. Mutua said that was not the case.

"We're just trying to make sure none of the problems from Somalia spill across the border, and so far none has," he said.

In Mogadishu, Somalia's battle-scarred capital, several weapons were collected Wednesday in the transitional government's drive to disarm one of the most heavily armed citizenries in the world. On Monday, Ali Mohammed Gedi, the transitional prime minister, issued one of his first edicts, demanding that Somali warlords and gunmen turn in their military-grade weapons by Thursday. If they did not, he said, homes would be searched.

Elders from one of Mogadishu's more powerful subclans turned over a pickup truck equipped with an antiaircraft gun and 20 young fighters. Transitional government officials said the weapons and men would be folded into Somalia's new national army.

Meanwhile, Islamist leaders continued to insist that they had not been defeated.

"I cannot say where we are, but we are in Somalia and we are not afraid anymore," Abdulrahim Ali Modei, the Islamists' spokesman, said Wednesday in a telephone call to a Somali radio station.

Iran's President Promises More Nuclear Fuel And A Celebration (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

TEHRAN, Jan. 3 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad warned Wednesday that Iran would not back down from its nuclear ambitions and said his country would soon start producing nuclear fuel on an industrial scale.

"Iran has the fuel cycle, and very soon we will push the button on nuclear fuel production for industrial uses," Mr. Ahmadinejad said in a speech in the southern city of Ghotvand in Khuzestan Province, according to the ISNA news agency.

DOJ_NMG_0112228

The United Nations Security Council passed a resolution late last month banning the trade of goods and technology that could benefit Iran's uranium enrichment, reprocessing and ballistic missile systems. Enriched uranium can be used for making nuclear weapons or as fuel for nuclear plants.

The resolution gave Iran a two-month deadline to suspend its enrichment program, but Iran says that it has the right to enrich uranium as a member of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

"The Iranian people will not retreat one iota from their rights," Mr. Ahmadinejad vowed Wednesday, adding that Iran would celebrate its nuclear achievements in February, on the 28th anniversary of the victory of the Iranian revolution of 1979.

"The Iranian people have made their decision to continue this path wisely and will not pay attention to empty cries of the materialists and the bullying of the decadent powers," he said.

Other senior officials have also warned that Iran would not surrender in the face of pressure.

Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, an influential cleric and head of the Expediency Council, warned last week that pressing Iran could have consequences.

"This is a very dangerous resolution," he said during Friday Prayer at Tehran University. "They are creating problems for themselves and the region," he said, adding that "many will suffer from the smoke of this fire."

One former nuclear negotiator for Iran, Hossein Moussavian, warned the nation's current negotiators on Wednesday that ignoring the resolution and calling it illegal would not help. He said the resolution could have severe consequences for Iran, ISNA reported. "We can say inside the country that this resolution is illegal, but we have to have a correct understanding of the international community's considerations," he was quoted as saying.

Iran To Launch Production Of Industrial Nuclear Fuel (AFP)

By Farhad Pouladi

AFP, January 4, 2007

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has vowed Iran will step up its atomic programme despite UN sanctions, predicting Tehran would soon "push the button" to produce nuclear fuel for industrial uses.

"Iran has the fuel cycle and very soon we will push the button on nuclear fuel production for industrial uses," said Ahmadinejad in a speech in Ghotvand, in western Khuzestan province, according to the IRNA news agency on Wednesday.

"The Iranian people have taken their decision and will in no way pay attention to empty cries of the materialists and the bullying of the decadent powers."

Iran has already announced it has enriched uranium to levels of around five percent. Producing nuclear fuel that could theoretically be used in a power station would be another important step in mastering the nuclear fuel cycle.

Ahmadinejad's latest comments come in defiance of a UN Security Council resolution at the end of last year which imposed sanctions against Tehran for its failure to suspend uranium enrichment.

Western powers want Iran to suspend enrichment, a process that they fear could be used to make nuclear weapons. Iran insists its atomic programme is entirely peaceful and it has every right to the full nuclear fuel cycle.

Iranian officials have already predicted Iran would be able to make a major announcement on its nuclear programme during the 28th anniversary celebrations of the Islamic revolution in February.

"The Iranian people will not retreat one iota from their rights and the revolutionary celebration will be a celebration that proves Iran's nuclear rights," Ahmadinejad said.

"The Iranian people are insisting on their position and want nothing more than their rights. The bullying powers should know that whatever fuss they make they have to surrender to the Iranian people's will."

He did not go into details on the scale of the fuel production, but producing nuclear fuel for an atomic power station would involve the continuous running of centrifuges to produce enriched uranium of high quality and quantity.

Iran has also said it wants to install 3,000 uranium enriching centrifuges at its enrichment plant in Natanz, central Iran, by March but it is unclear which stage these plans have reached.

In October, Iran only had two cascades of 164 centrifuges in Natanz declared to the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) so the plan to install 3,000 centrifuges would take its enrichment to a new level.

DOJ_NMG_0112229

Russia is building Iran's first nuclear power station in the southern city of Bushehr, a much delayed project which is due to be opened in September 2007. Moscow plans on delivering fuel for the plant in March.

However, Iran has also insisted it has every right to produce its own nuclear fuel on Iranian soil in defiance of international calls for the work to be carried outside the Islamic republic.

Iranian Official Urges New Nuclear Talks (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr And Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

Hossein Mousavian, a former Iranian nuclear negotiator close to the influential former president Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, called on Wednesday for renewed diplomacy with the west to break the crisis over Iran's nuclear programme.

He also implied that Iran had no choice but to accept last month's United Nations Security Council resolution, which imposed sanctions and set a two-month deadline for Tehran to suspend almost all its nuclear activities. But he said Tehran should also continue to bargain over its "rights" to a nuclear fuel cycle.

Mr Mousavian's frank briefing reflected growing concern among pragmatists in Tehran at the direction of the international situation.

President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad has favoured defiance over the nuclear issue and has dismissed the UN resolution as "invalid". The state-run Islamic Republic News Agency on Tuesday quoted him as saying that the country would soon start producing nuclear fuel on an industrial scale and "defend its interests powerfully".

But Mr Mousavian said the UN resolution was "very tricky" and could lead to further sanctions in addition to the measures already agreed against individual Iranians and companies involved in the atomic programme.

"It is easy to get into [the attention of] the Security Council but very difficult to get out," he said.

"The Security Council is the highest authority on international peace and stability, and there is no other authority to which we can appeal."

The remarks suggest that Iran's pragmatists and reformists are taking a more active role in shaping Iran's policy after the poor showing in last month's elections by allies of Mr Ahmadi-Nejad.

In spite of Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's comments on the UN resolution, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei – Iran's supreme leader who has a pre-eminent say in Iran's leadership group – has not as yet spoken in public on Tehran's response.

"Any comment by the leader would be the final word from Iran – and I think he is studying the case as the policymakers discuss how we can make a breakthrough," said a leading Iranian journalist.

Mr Mousavian was centrally involved in Tehran's nuclear negotiations with the European Union between 2003 and 2005, before he and several colleagues were removed after Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's 2005 election win.

He is deputy head of the Centre for Strategic Research, a state body that briefs Iran's leaders and which is associated Mr Rafsanjani.

Iran's pragmatists and reformists polled better than expected three weeks ago in elections for municipal councils and for the Experts Assembly, a clerical body that supervises Ayatollah Khamenei.

Olmert, Mubarak Seek Restart Peace Talks (AP)

By Steve Weizman

AP, January 4, 2007

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak will search for ways to restart Mideast peace talks and free a captured Israeli soldier when they meet Thursday, although Israeli officials said they did not expect a breakthrough on the prisoner issue.

The Red Sea summit comes amid international calls for Israel and the Palestinians to negotiate an end their dispute, in the interest of stabilizing the Middle East in general and Iraq in particular.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit said Friday the summit will explore ways to revive peace talks, stalled since the outbreak of the current Palestinian uprising in September 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0112230

Militants linked to the Islamic Hamas seized Cpl. Gilad Shalit in June, and a Hamas official on Sunday claimed progress toward an agreement for his release, in exchange for Israel freeing some of the 9,100 Palestinians in its prisons.

A Palestinian prisoner release would bolster the domestic standing of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and aid his efforts to build a more pragmatic coalition with the governing Hamas. Israel, meanwhile, says freeing the soldier is key to reviving peace talks with the Palestinians.

Egypt has been mediating efforts to end the standoff since Shalit was captured, and it brokered a shaky Nov. 26 truce with Hamas.

The Israelis and Palestinians each hope for some movement on the prisoner issue but warn that no deal has been struck.

"Gilad Shalit is not going to be freed tomorrow, there is not going to be a dramatic announcement," Olmert spokeswoman Miri Eisin told The Associated Press on Wednesday. "It will be discussed, but unfortunately we're not at that point yet."

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat, who is close to Abbas, agreed.

"To speak of an agreement, at this stage, is premature," he said.

Olmert and Mubarak last met on June 4, 2006, also in Sharm el-Sheik. Mubarak hosted Abbas in the Red Sea town on Dec. 27, when the Palestinian president proposed closed-door talks with Israel on some of the thorniest issues dividing them, including the status of Jerusalem and Palestinian refugees.

Israeli and Egyptian officials said Olmert and Mubarak will discuss Abbas' coalition-building efforts, bilateral Israel-Egyptian ties and the prospect of joint economic projects at the hour-long summit Thursday evening, and the dinner that will follow. There will also be talk on the broader Middle East, including Iran's nuclear ambitions.

A bipartisan U.S. panel on Iraq headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III has said progress on the Israeli-Palestinian dispute could help ease tensions in Iraq and British Prime Minister Tony Blair says a resolution to the conflict is key to Middle East stability. Israel disputes that conclusion.

Olmert met Abbas last month in the first Israeli-Palestinian summit since June 2005, when then-Prime Minister Ariel Sharon met the Palestinian leader.

A state-run Egyptian newspaper Wednesday quoted Mubarak spokesman Suleiman Awad as saying that Olmert's meeting with Mubarak would be followed at an unspecified date by another Olmert-Abbas meeting, in Sharm el-Sheik.

5 In Gaza Killed In Fatah-Hamas Clashes (NYT/AP)

Associated Press

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

GAZA, Jan. 3 — Five Palestinians were killed Wednesday in a resurgence of factional violence in the Gaza Strip, leading to fears that an already fragile truce between the rival Hamas and Fatah factions would completely collapse.

The latest fighting came two days after Fatah and Hamas militants carried out a series of kidnappings and engaged in gun battles, in violation of a mid-December truce between the groups, which are vying to control the Palestinian government.

Rival gunmen poured into the streets of the northern Gaza town of Beit Lahiya on Wednesday after a 25-year-old militant from Fatah, the faction led by the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, was shot and killed. A woman was shot in the head and killed in the ensuing gun battle, and 12 other people suffered moderate wounds, hospital and security officials said.

Later in the afternoon, gunmen ambushed Fatah-allied Palestinian security officers in the southern Gaza town of Khan Yunis, blasting their police car with bullets and a rocket-propelled grenade, and killing two of the officers, witnesses said. A third officer later died of his wounds.

The security officers were trying to take another officer to a hospital after he was wounded in an earlier clash, Fatah officials said in a statement. The officers had stormed a house where they believed that a kidnapped colleague was being held, it said.

Fatah officials blamed Hamas militiamen for the attack, while Hamas said Fatah militants had initiated the incident.

After nightfall, three smaller militant groups brought Hamas and Fatah officials in together in Khan Yunis and forged an accord to remove gunmen from the streets and release kidnapped activists, according to a statement released after the meeting. But it is unclear if that will lead to a truce in the rest of the territory.

DOJ_NMG_0112231

Also on Wednesday, the news agency Agence France-Presse demanded the immediate release of one of its photographers, who had been abducted at gunpoint in Gaza City on Monday. In a statement, the agency said there had been no word on the fate of the photographer, Jaime Rázuri, 50, a Peruvian.

"Despite assurances from Palestinian officials that they are doing everything possible to help with the search, we are deeply concerned over Jaime's health and safety," the statement said.

In the past most journalists and other foreigners kidnapped in the Gaza Strip have been released unharmed after a few hours. An exception was the abduction last summer of two Fox News journalists, who were held for two weeks but then finally released.

Talks between Fatah and Hamas on forming a national unity government broke down in November, fueling an increase in violence. Mr. Abbas has since threatened to call an early election, which Hamas said it would boycott, calling it a coup attempt. Mr. Abbas wants to resume peace talks with Israel.

Fatah led the Palestinian government since its establishment in 1994, but Hamas won legislative elections last January and formed a government in March.

Late Monday, clashes in the Jabaliya refugee camp near Gaza City broke a weeklong lull in fighting between the groups. In the last few weeks, 17 people have been killed in the internal fighting, leading to fears of civil war.

Aides to the Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya of Hamas, said Wednesday that he planned to cut short a tour of Arab countries to return to Gaza. He was scheduled to travel later this week to Jordan, which has offered to be the host of a meeting between Mr. Haniya and Mr. Abbas in an effort to defuse the tensions between their factions.

Mr. Haniya and Mr. Abbas have agreed in principle to such a meeting, but no date has been announced.

5 Palestinians Killed In Gaza Strip (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 3 -- Renewed factional fighting Wednesday between the rival Hamas and Fatah movements in the Gaza Strip killed five Palestinians, including a 22-year-old woman. More than 10 others were wounded.

The deaths were the first in two weeks as a result of partisan violence, which has spiked periodically over the past year during times of political tension. The fighting brought angry recriminations from leaders of both parties, indicating an end to the short period of calm in Gaza as talks to resolve the political stalemate remain stalled.

In the most brazen act, gunmen opened fire on a car and killed three men belonging to a security service loyal to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, a leader of the secular Fatah party that lost parliamentary elections to Hamas almost a year ago. Fatah leaders blamed Hamas, a radical Islamic movement that does not recognize Israel, for the ambush in the Gaza city of Khan Younis.

A gunman from the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, Fatah's armed wing, was fatally shot north of Gaza City. The woman, Mona Salha, died after being wounded with about a dozen others caught in a Hamas-Fatah skirmish in the same area.

After failing to form a power-sharing government with Hamas acceptable to international donors, who provide nearly half the Palestinian government's annual budget, Abbas announced last month that he intends to call early elections, including for his own office. But he has yet to set a date for the vote, which Hamas officials have called an illegal attempt to overturn their election victory.

Also in Gaza on Wednesday, colleagues of a kidnapped Peruvian photographer with Agence France-Presse warned that his life is in danger unless he receives heart medication soon. Jaime Razuri, 50, was taken Monday by armed men outside the agency's Gaza offices. The agency's office manager, Sakher Abu El-Awn, told [a news agency] that Razuri is suffering from a heart disease that requires regular medication.

"We believe his life is at serious risk, and we urge his captors to release him immediately," Abu El-Awn told the agency.

In another development, an Israeli woman sentenced to three years in prison for aiding a Palestinian group that Israel considers a terrorist organization was released Wednesday after serving 26 months of her term.

DOJ_NMG_0112232

Tali Fahima pleaded guilty in December 2005 to having contacts with a foreign agent, passing information to the enemy and violating the law prohibiting Israelis from entering areas controlled by the Palestinian Authority. The charges stemmed from her association with Zakaria Zubeidi, leader of the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades in Jenin, whom she said she would protect as a "human shield."

Fahima spent 13 months in jail without being charged -- a status known as administrative detention -- before pleading guilty. That time was counted toward her sentence. Her term was to expire in November, but she was released early for good behavior.

How Kim Jong Il Controls A Nation (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, January 4, 2007

SEOUL, SOUTH KOREA

As Kim Jong Il continues to elude efforts to constrain his nuclear program, a grudging regard for the North Korean leader's tactical skills is rising.

Mr. Kim was once thought to be over his head as a leader. But 12 years after the death of his father, Kim Il Sung, the son is showing brilliance as a dictator. Some experts say that Kim, in his own way, may be shrewder than the father who built the nation.

"Kim was in many ways dealt a weaker hand than his father, but he has played it better," says Brian Myers, a North Korea specialist at Dongseo University in Busan, South Korea.

Certainly, Kim has become a skillful player on the world stage. He retains firm hold of the most totalitarian state on earth. His nation has survived an epic famine. Kim has astutely nullified a dawning realization among his people that the world beyond North Korea's borders is a better place. He's even created a new image for himself at home - not as a towering patriarch - but as a figure of sympathy, a beleaguered, America-taunted leader who eats soldier's gruel and deserves care by the masses. He's played a smart propaganda game in South Korea, where some elites admire him as a nationalist torchbearer for "true Korean-ness," and for outwitting the great powers.

Now, Kim has tested a nuclear weapon - the eighth nation to publicly do so - and has developed a ballistic missile program.

"Why shouldn't Kim be seen as extraordinary?" asks Alexander Mansourov of the Asia Pacific Center for Security Studies in Honolulu. "He's poked his finger in the eye of the US hegemon. He's tested missiles and nukes. At home he's more popular than ever."

Abroad, Kim is seen as enigmatic, reclusive - part fox, part oddball. He's reported to hold all-night parties that serve as loyalty tests. He chain-smokes, loves Ferraris, goes gaga over gourmet food, has 30 homes, wears 12-centimeter high (4.7 inch) platform shoes, kidnaps the occasional South Korean actress, and is crazy about karaoke, James Bond films, and the Internet.

Yet that image, though partly true, is itself propaganda, say former Pyongyang diplomats, high-level defectors, and Korea experts. They say the real Kim is a bit unsure, frightened of China and the US, and may suffer from a learning disability. Kim's sister-in-law told a diplomat that Kim is "often timid." His father may not have offered him much respect. Not a TV personality

Bradley Martin, author of "Under the Loving Care of the Fatherly Leader: North Korea and the Kim Dynasty," says Kim may suffer from stage fright. Surprisingly for a state leader, especially a "godhead," Kim's voice has been heard only once by the nation, for a total of nine words. "Glory to the heroic soldiers of the People's Army," he said in 1992 at an obscure rally at a military base. Invitations to one state reception noted that one may speak to Kim, but that Kim would "not speak in reply," a Eastern European diplomat remembers. Kim has never appeared live on TV. Even in the period of mourning after the death of his father, the "Great Leader" - when posters stated mystically that "Kim Jong Il is now Kim Il Sung" - there was no fireside chat by Kim junior to his people.

Yet Kim reportedly micromanages the entire country. His state is a hermetically sealed cult that allows no debate; even top generals and their extended families undergo loyalty tests. A half-dozen concentration camps hold 200,000 inmates, a dozen intelligence units spy on the people and each other. North Korea has the world's fifth-largest army.

DOJ_NMG_0112233

"Everything goes up to Kim, and everything comes down from him. There isn't a whole lot of lateral motion in the North," says Stephen Bradner, a civilian expert in Seoul and longtime adviser to the US military. "We often ask the wrong question. The question is not what North Korea needs, but what Kim Jong Il wants."

"I used to think Kim was irrational and unrealistic," says Lee Jong Heon, who has just published a structural analysis of the North at Chung-Ang University in Seoul. "But when you study his moves, he has kept a grip on the people, and he now heads one of eight nuclear nations. He's been highly rational from his standpoint." But a busy populist

One side of Kim only now emerging is how closely he stays in touch with the people. The Dear Leader is on the road, working the crowds, a great deal. Studies of Korean media show Kim averages about 150 local visits a year. He may not make live televised speeches, but he's at a school, a factory, a farm, a military base - every three days. (He shows up at a military unit once a week.) This suggests a populist streak.

"When someone you worship comes to your factory, it's a personal connection. We tend to overlook this simple fact," says Mr. Mansourov, who has tracked Kim's appearances. "Kim knows the local leaders, the opinion makers, the local cadres. He's not in a fishbowl. He may be a dictator, but he's also a populist."

Kim also appears today to be intensifying his ethnic nationalist message: Korea is different, special, unique, pure - and must remain so. The message has more affinity with Imperial-era race-based fascism in Japan, than to the Stalinism he's often depicted as emulating, argues Mr. Myers.

"The North may not have plasma TVs and shiny cars, but it has people with character and virtue, that's Kim's message," says Myers. "South Korea is physically and spiritually polluted, misogynistic, occupied by the US, [has been] sold down the river, [and] lets its young people grow soft. The real Korean spirit is being held in trust in the North - that message appeals."

There's another fact often overlooked, say North watchers: Kim is getting older. There may be a new urgency to resolve the nuclear question, to seal his dynasty.

Kim was born "Uri" or George, in Khabarovsk lower Siberia in 1942 or '43 (the date is disputed), in a medicine supply house of the Soviet 88th Reconnaissance Brigade, according to South Korean scholar Suh Dae Sook. Kim Il Sung's guerrilla brigade had been bloodied in Manchuria by the Japanese, and he escaped to Russia with his wife. Young Kim was cared for by Korean and Russian servants. This early mix of foreign contact continued later in Pyongyang, so Kim never entirely imbibed Korean habits, where "sameness" is prized. He was early an individualist - adopting different hair-styles, dress, shoes, and behavior.

That "difference" has helped set Kim apart. Now he has nuclear capability. Yet the depths of Kim's pride, how he views his place in history, or how he would react in a threatening crisis, is not clear. In the former Soviet Union and China, and presumably in India and Pakistan, nuclear weapons are held by "mediating structures" of party and military decisionmaking committees. But Kim alone controls the dreaded button in the North.

It is unknown if Kim might ever find it "rational" to use his weapons, say experts. For example, might Kim behave like a jilted husband or postal worker who shoots his family or co-workers, then turns the gun on himself? Mostly, it is felt that Kim wants to avoid the fate that befell dictators such as Nicolae Ceausescu of Romania, who was overthrown and killed.

"If we aren't careful, Kim could see using his weapons as rational," argues Mr. Lee.

Army lore in North Korea, in fact, has Kim telling his generals that if " 'we are ever losing in a war, I will destroy the world if I can. I will not go down quietly,' " Mr. Martin points out. Opportunities lost?

Despite Kim's adroit nuclear card playing, Asia watchers say any appraisal must weighed against what Kim might have done with his rule. Fifteen years ago, as the Soviet Union was collapsing, there was genuine hope in Asia that Kim might be a new kind of leader. He might open up the economy, tone down the cult worship, act more like former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev. Kim could have created special economic zones as China did. Yet Kim has systematically quashed his own reforms, including those of a brilliant technocrat, Kim Dal Hyon, former deputy prime minister of the economy who experimented with the free market in the Tumen River project.

In one sense, Kim is prisoner to his own fantastic ideology of isolation. To allow outside influences into the regime could snap the spell of his own Oz-like deification, experts say.

DOJ_NMG_0112234

"North Korea actually has everything," says Krzysztof Darewicz, a Polish journalist based in Pyongyang during the 1990s. "There's a wealth of valuable minerals, uranium and gold. It is smack-dab in the crossroads of Asia's current economic rise; trade and wealth surround the North. But what has it become? Nothing.

"Kim inherited a nuclear card with no idea what to do next," he adds.

"Kim is one hell of a tactician, but what is his strategy and where will it lead?" asks Martin. "What about his people?" Kim Facts

North Korea's "Dear Leader" Kim Jong Il ...

• Was born in Siberia in 1942 or 43.

• Is 5-foot, 3-inches tall and wears 12-centimeter (4.7 inch) high platform shoes.

• Has only been heard by North Koreans once, in 1992, in a national broadcast. He said: "Glory to the heroic soldiers of the People's Army."

• Has never appeared speaking live on TV in North Korea.

• Has the world's fifth-largest army.

• Gives his top generals loyalty tests.

• Averages about 150 visits per year to schools, military bases, factories.

The Shenyang Six (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

Ban Ki Moon got off to a good start at the United Nations this week when he declined to criticize the execution of Saddam Hussein. Here's another way the new Secretary General could outshine his predecessor: Demand that Beijing live up to its international obligations to let the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees help the tens of thousands of North Korean refugees hiding in northeast China.

As a fellow Korean, Mr. Ban has special moral authority to address this little-known humanitarian crisis. A good place to start would be by making a public plea on behalf of six refugees who tried, but failed, to obtain sanctuary in the U.S. consulate in Shenyang, China, last month. The six are in jail in Shenyang, awaiting deportation under China's policy regarding the North Korean refugees it tracks down.

China's treatment of the North Koreans violates the International Convention Regarding the Status of Refugees, to which it is a party and which bars "refoulement," or the repatriation of refugees to places where their lives or freedom would be in jeopardy. North Koreans who are sent home by Beijing face execution or a term in one of Kim Jong Il's prison camps, which can amount to a death sentence.

The six refugees in jail in Shenyang include two orphan boys, ages 16 and 17; a 22-year-old woman; and three women in their 40s. One of the older women is the mother of a 19-year-old who made it to safety in the U.S. consulate last year and is awaiting resettlement in the U.S. along with two orphan boys -- if China lets them leave. One of the women has relatives in Hawaii; another has family in South Korea.

The six were captured just before Christmas along with two Americans who had been sheltering them in safe houses in another city and were accompanying them to the consulate. Their rescuers -- young women who don't want their names used -- belong to Liberty in North Korea, or LINK, a U.S. non-profit dedicated to helping the refugees. LINK's director, Adrian Hong, was also arrested -- pulled out of his hotel room in Beijing and taken to a prison cell in Shenyang. The three rescuers were deported this week.

That's progress of sorts. Steve Kim, a Huntington, New York, businessman who provided funds to house and care for refugees, was tried, convicted and has been in jail in China since September 2003. Phillip Buck, a pastor from Seattle, was released in August after serving 15 months in prison for helping North Koreans.

Beyond the six jailed refugees is the larger tragedy of the tens of thousands of North Koreans in northeast China and the thousands more who may flee if famine hits North Korea this winter, as expected. The humane solution would be to allow the UNHCR to set up processing centers in China for the refugees, who could then be transferred to transit camps in neighboring countries before being resettled elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0112235

South Korea's constitution requires it to accept escapees from the North, and North Korean asylum seekers are welcome in the U.S. under 2004 legislation. In one of his last acts as Senate Majority Leader, Bill Frist introduced a bill that would authorize $10 billion for the relief and relocation of North Korean refugees. That's a good idea that other Senators could adopt.

Meanwhile, the six refugees incarcerated in Shenyang await a decision from Beijing. As he was being escorted from jail this week, Mr. Hong says he passed the cell where several of the North Koreans were being held. "There is nothing like looking in the eyes of someone who thinks they are going to die," he says. "They all had that look -- like there was no hope."

Mexican U.N. Insider Gets Manager's Post (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 3 — Ban Ki-moon, on his second day as secretary general, appointed a high-level United Nations insider, Alicia Bárcena Ibarra, to the top management post, a signal that he does not plan aggressive reforms in the much-criticized bureaucracy.

Ms. Bárcena, 54, is a career diplomat from Mexico who served for most of last year as the chief of staff for Kofi Annan, Mr. Ban's predecessor. Before that, since July 2003, Ms. Bárcena had been the deputy executive secretary of the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean, a United Nations development agency based in Chile.

United Nations diplomats pointed out that Ms. Bárcena, although a well-regarded diplomat, had little of the front-line administrative experience needed to run the unwieldy United Nations system, which employs 16,500 people worldwide.

Her appointment marked the first time since 1992 that her position, under secretary general for management, has not been held by an American. In years past, the United States government has battled for the position, but this time Washington is lobbying instead for the top policy-making job, under secretary general for political affairs.

Several diplomats said the choice of Ms. Bárcena cast doubt on statements Mr. Ban made on Tuesday, when he said in a meeting with United Nations staff members that he wanted to overhaul "the working culture" of the organization.

"It's a missed opportunity in terms of having a clean break from the Kofi Annan era," said one Security Council diplomat. "It would have made sense if she had immense financial and management experience. But to the contrary, she doesn't."

But the announcement cited Ms. Bárcena's broad knowledge of the sprawling United Nations organization. She has also worked closely with Mr. Ban during the transition from Mr. Annan's leadership, and Mr. Ban has said he will appoint more women to senior positions.

"He has set his agenda, and I am sure that Ms. Bárcena agrees with that agenda," said Michèle Montas, Mr. Ban's spokeswoman.

The management post had been filled since June 2005 by Christopher B. Burnham, a former Marine Corps reserve colonel and investment banker. Under his tenure, the United Nations adopted new protections for whistleblowers, formed an ethics office, updated its financial disclosure policies and reorganized the procurement department, which has been the target of several criminal fraud indictments. Mr. Burnham stepped down in November.

In the meeting Tuesday with Mr. Ban, Stephen Kisambira, the president of the staff members' union, said the United Nations needed "a fundamental change in the mindset of senior management" from a current approach that he said was based on "dominance, disregard and fear."

Mr. Ban also appointed Sir John Holmes, the British ambassador to France, as under secretary general for humanitarian affairs and coordinator of emergency relief.

Britain Free From WWII Payments (WT)

By Al Webb

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

LONDON -- More than six decades after the fact, Britain has finally paid back the billions of dollars it had borrowed from the United States and Canada to help pay for rebuilding the country after World War II.

At the click of a few computer keys in London on the last business day of 2006, $83.25 million was sent electronically winging to Washington and $22.7 million to Ottawa, to free Britain from annual installments it occasionally has struggled to pay.

DOJ_NMG_0112236

The original loan of $4.34 billion -- the equivalent of $27 billion in today's money -- was negotiated by a London team headed by economic mastermind John Maynard Keynes in 1945 to stave off the bankruptcy that posed a serious threat to Britain in the wake of the war's wreckage.

The Canadian share of the loan was $1.2 billion.

The loan was paid off in 50 installments, the last of which leaves Britain free of that debt for the first time since a devastated Nazi Germany surrendered to Allied forces more than 61 years ago.

British Economic Secretary Ed Balls hailed the dispatch of that last payment on Dec. 29, telling journalists, "We finally honor our commitments to the U.S. and Canada for the support they gave us 60 years ago."

"It was vital support which helped Britain defeat Nazi Germany and secure peace and prosperity in the postwar period," Mr. Balls said.

In fact, it was much more than that. World War II had left Britain an economic mess -- a "financial Dunkirk," as Mr. Keynes put it -- and with the abrupt termination in September 1945 of the lend-lease arrangement that had it afloat through the hostilities, the country was on the verge of collapse.

Under the Lend-Lease Act of 1941, signed by President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Washington sent war supplies to allies. Britain received most of that assistance -- $31.4 billion out of the total $50.1 billion. Other major countries that benefited from the Lend-Lease Act were the Soviet Union ($11.3 billion), France ($3.2 billion) and China ($1.6 billion).

No payment was required for supplies sent under the program. The allies' compensation came in the form of services, rent and use of air bases.

However, Washington suddenly terminated the lend-lease shipments on Sept. 2, 1945, with goods still in transit, forcing Britain to negotiate new loans from the United States and Canada for reconstruction.

The large consignment of goods in transit or already in Britain were sold to Britain for about 10 cents on the dollar under the new 50-year loan agreement.

Mr. Keynes and his team won during their negotiations with the U.S. government what amounted to an economic lifeline that allowed Britain to pay for food, fuel and other essentials, while coping with massive bills for arms and munitions left over from the war as it began rebuilding its shattered economy.

"The Americans gave us an excellent deal in two senses," Tim Leunig, an economics history lecturer at the London School of Economics, told the Scotsman newspaper -- the 2 percent rate of interest on the loan, and the fact that the United States even agreed to such a loan.

"First of all," Mr. Leunig said, "2 percent has always been a very low rate of interest. Second, to lend to someone in wartime is very risky."

For his part, Mr. Keynes at the time was less than pleased, particularly about the 2 percent interest on the debt. He accused the United States of behaving badly, suggesting that Washington should write off the loan as a gift, or at least make it interest-free.

Still, it was viewed in economic circles as a bargain, which meant that by the time the last installment cleared the books, the original loan of $4.34 billion had totaled barely $7.1 billion including interest -- little more than small change to today's global economies and the multibillionaires they steadily churn out.

Even so, the repayment road has not always been an easy one for Britain. The installment payments that started in 1950 were deferred six times -- in 1956, 1957, 1964, 1965, 1968 and 1976 -- because of various economic crises, pressures on official reserves and adverse international exchange rates.

So that last payment was, in fact, six years late. Never mind, said a British Treasury spokesman, the important point is, "Britain always repays her debts."

Well, not quite. Britain borrowed money from the United States during World War I, but has never repaid the debt -- although they blame the Americans.

President Hoover declared a moratorium on World War I debts during the Great Depression and global financial crisis, and it was never rescinded.

‘Extraordinary’ Fall In German Jobless (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0112237

By Bertrand Benoit In Berlin

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

Unemployment in Germany recorded another steep monthly drop in December, underscoring the robustness of the year-old rebound under way in Europe's largest economy.

Seasonally adjusted figures released by the Federal Labour Agency on Wednesday put the number of jobseekers in Germany at 4.1m, down 108,000 on the month, a far bigger drop than economists had anticipated after a 86,000 fall in November.

The "extraordinary fall in unemployment", as described by the Agency, put the unemployment rate in the country at 9.8 per cent.

"These figures are considerably better than expected and underpin the view that the recovery in Germany has become self-sustaining," Elga Bartsch, economist at Morgan Stanley, said.

The data, following very upbeat business sentiment surveys at the end of December, will buttress the view shared by a majority of economists that the strong German recovery will last well into 2007 despite a three-point rise in value-added tax, the biggest tax increase in post-war history, this month.

The closely followed Ifo business sentiment index surged to a 16-year high last month after notching up the fastest growth last year since the start of the decade. The German economy is expected to have grown by 2.5 per cent in 2006, exceeding French growth for the first time since 1994.

"The positive development in unemployment is mainly down to the cyclical rebound in job creation," the Labour Agency wrote in its monthly report.

However, economists said several factors, including mild weather in December and new benefits available to unoccupied construction workers as of December 1st, might have flattered the unemployment figures somewhat.

In November, the latest month for which employment data was available, the Agency recorded 46,000 job creations, bringing the total number of positions created in the past year close to half a million.

The main question for economists regarding the fate of the German recovery this year hinges on consumers' reaction to the VAT increase and the magnitude and duration of the expected lull in growth this hefty tax increase could cause.

Anecdotal evidence of robust retail sales over the holiday season, and the positive sentiment evidenced in the retail sub-section of December's Ifo index, suggest consumption picked up at the end of 2006.

However, private spending remains low and some forecasters fear consumers might have brought forward big-ticket purchases in anticipation to the VAT rise, pointing to a possible drop in spending in the first quarter even though the tax increase may take longer to find its way into higher retail prices.

Ritual Sacrifice? Not On My Street, Some Belgians Say (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

BRUSSELS -- At a slaughterhouse here last week, Mohamed Mimoun wrestled a sheep between his legs and took a number. He gasped: It was a two-hour wait to sacrifice his animal for Eid al-Adha, an important Islamic religious festival.

"I should have done this at home, like everyone else," he moaned.

That would have saved Mr. Mimoun a long wait in drenching rain, but it would have been against the law. Killing an animal at home to eat it is legal in Belgium. But a 1988 law expressly forbids the ritual slaughter of animals at home.

Living cheek by jowl in Brussels with the many bureaucrats who run the European Union, Muslims in the city turned an estimated 25,000 sheep toward Mecca this year and cut their throats to celebrate the story of Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his son to God. Eid al-Adha commemorates God's reprieve which allowed Abraham to kill a ram instead of his son. While some, like Mr. Mimoun, head to official slaughterhouses, many Muslims, fearing long waits, kill their sheep illegally in their backyards and basements instead.

Whether at a slaughterhouse or at home, the practice raises the ire of animal-rights activists. For years, they have held anguished protests against the manner in which the sheep are slaughtered, arguing that the sheep should be stunned first to lessen their pain. "It's not normal to have thousands of sheep slaughtered like this in the middle of a major European city," says Ann De Greef, a Belgian animal-rights campaigner.

DOJ_NMG_0112238

On his way to the slaughterhouse, Mr. Mimoun was fined by a policewoman for transporting a live sheep in the closed trunk of his Toyota. By law, it should have been in the back seat.

"She told me I needed to have a seat belt on the sheep," Mr. Mimoun said. The policewoman later said she was joking about the seat belt.

Brussels' Muslim population has grown to more than 15% of the city's one million inhabitants, and what began two decades ago as a debate over animal welfare and hygiene has been transformed into a test of political might. The result is a stalemate.

"We have the right to practice our religion," says Coskun Beyazgül, head of the Muslim Executive Office, a state-sponsored Islamic authority.

While Muslim authorities in France sanction the use of electronic stunning methods, Muslim authorities in Belgium forbid it. For the sacrifice to be completed in accordance with Islam, says Mr. Beyazgül, the lamb must die from a loss of blood while its head is turned toward Mecca in Saudi Arabia, birthplace of the Prophet Muhammad. Stunning the animals before slitting their throats, he says, could lead to the animal dying prematurely, against Islamic principles.

Mr. Beyazgül is also against making donations of money to charity in lieu of sacrificing a live animal, as many Muslims do in the U.S. and other countries. He adds that Muslims here ignore the home-slaughtering ban because Belgian authorities aren't willing to invest in enough capacity at legal slaughtering facilities.

While similar conflicts play out across Europe, the tensions are particularly acute in Brussels, Europe's political capital. Unlike France and other nations with large Muslim minorities, Muslims in Belgium aren't concentrated in ghettos outside major cities; they often live side-by-side with EU officials and other professionals in gentrifying urban neighborhoods.

One man got his lamb home last year on a leash. "It looked like his pet," says Pierre-Yves Lambert, a local political commentator and social worker. "But everyone knew where it was going."

To ease the strain on slaughterhouses, city leaders have suggested the Muslim community spread out the sacrifice over the three days of the festival, which ended this year on Jan. 1. Nothing doing, says Mr. Beyazgül. "Everyone wants to kill their sheep in the morning of the first day," he says. "They want to eat their sheep for lunch."

The rush to slaughter so many sheep within hours led to catastrophe during last year's festival. A temporary slaughterhouse became overwhelmed with long lines and malfunctioning water and drainage systems. In a hurry to get home, some celebrants began slaughtering sheep on top of live sheep as large pools of blood formed.

In response, Belgian politician Jean-Marie Dedecker last year introduced a bill that would have required Muslims to stun the sheep before killing them. Muslims protested, and the bill died.

Mr. Dedecker, who hails from Belgium's Dutch-speaking North, blames Laurette Onkelinx, Belgium's Justice Minister and a French-speaking Socialist, for its defeat. "Most of the Muslims speak French and vote for the Socialists, and Ms. Onkelinx needs their votes to stay in office," he says.

Representatives of Ms. Onkelinx did not return phone calls.

Ms. De Greef and her group, Global Action in the Interest of Animals, scored a win in 2003, when they successfully sued to stop municipal authorities from placing collection bins on city streets for animals' remains. Providing such bins is tantamount to sanctioning illegal home sacrifice, she says.

"The Muslims portray this as an attack on their religion," says Ms. De Greef. "But we think the law is for everybody."

Still, authorities in several towns outside Brussels continued to provide waste bins for last week's festival, drawing protests from Ms. De Greef's group. More than 100,000 sheep were sacrificed in Belgium this year for the religious festival, Mr. Beyazgül said.

But for Muslims like 48-year-old Mr. Mimoun, who want to slaughter their sheep in legal facilities, the annual festival can be costly.

DOJ_NMG_0112239

Mr. Mimoun paid a farmer $230 for his sheep. Then he paid $60 to have a certified Muslim sacrificateur perform the ritual killing for him at the slaughter facility. And he'll have to pay a fine -- the amount of which will be determined by a judge -- for transporting the animal in the trunk of his car.

But Mr. Mimoun, who moved to Belgium from Morocco when he was 4 years old, said it was worth it. "I am a Belgian. This is Europe. I respect the law," he said.

Besides, he added: "I don't like blood."

Spanish PM Pays Price After Bomb Derails Eta Peace Talks (FT)

By Mark Mulligan And Victoria Burnett

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

It was a buoyant José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero who last Friday delivered an unerringly upbeat review of the Spanish government's achievements in 2006.

As well as presiding over a roaring economy and laying the legislative foundation for a healthier, more tolerant Spain, the prime minister had sown the seeds of a peace process that could end 40 years of violence by Eta, the Basque separatist group.

Mr Zapatero ventured that Spain would be even "better off in a year's time than it was at the end of 2006". Less than 24 hours after uttering those words, Mr Zapatero was forced to eat them. A powerful car bomb at Madrid's Barajas airport that killed two people made a mockery of his optimism as it derailed the peace process on which he had staked much of his political credibility.

"This is a huge setback for the prime minister," said Antonio Camuñas, the head of Global Strategies, the Madrid-based lobbying group. "By making the peace process his personal project – there were no teams, no delegation – there was always the risk that a failure would be a personal failure."

The suspension of the Eta process marks the first big defeat for a leader who has managed, through formidable charm, shrewdness and unshakeable conviction, to steer his country leftwards since winning a surprise victory in the March 2004 election, two days after devastating bomb attacks on the Madrid commuter rail network. It underlines the limitations of a determined optimist who, political insiders complain, fails to take counsel or heed political alarm bells.

"Mr Zapatero has dominated his own party much like Tony Blair has dominated the [British] Labour party," said David Mathieson from Fride, a left-leaning Madrid think-tank. "When thing are going well for him, it reflects well on the government; when he stumbles, the whole government wobbles."

The setback over Eta talks had exposed a fundamental flaw in the power base built by Mr Zapatero since election victory, said Mr Camuñas. By alienating moderates within his own socialist party, and securing parliamentary support by ceding to the, at times, radical demands of Spain's regionalist parties, he had driven the opposition Popular party further to the right.

Mr Zapatero must now scramble to regain momentum before next year's general election, analysts say. The Eta talks dominated the agenda in Spain in recent months – to the chagrin of Mr Zapatero's aides – leaving little space to highlight the success of the government's more grassroots policies.

On Friday, Mr Zapatero pointed to tax cuts, market reforms and unprecedented spending on research and development and education. His government has clamped down on smoking in public, drink-driving, domestic violence and pushed through a law to help those caring for the elderly and disabled.

However, critics claim that on the international stage, Mr Zapatero has failed to win Spain a voice commensurate with its growing economic stature.

He has failed to back up ambitious, yet vague, foreign policy proposals with action. Despite promoting a Middle East initiative, the prime minister has not visited the region. He has stopped Spanish troops in Afghanistan from moving to the region where fighting is fiercest.

Allies, however, point to his deft management of issues close to Spanish hearts. Mr Zapatero was quick to withdraw troops from Iraq following his election. He defied sceptics when he won continued European Union development funds for the next five years and has secured promises of greater assistance dealing with the flood of African immigrants who use Spain as a backdoor into Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0112240

Foreign policy also does not traditionally rank high on the electorate's agenda. "Foreign policy is never a vote winner – it can be a vote loser," says Charles Powell, history professor at the San Pablo CEU university in Madrid.

In an attempt to regain political ground at home, the government this week was planning a series of social policy initiatives "that Spaniards really care about", said a Socialist party official.

In an apparent effort to bury the hatchet with the opposition Popular party, the government next week will seek a new, multi-party anti-terrorism pact.

However, officials admitted the chances of reviving peace talks during Mr Zapatero's term in office were virtually nil.

A World Free Of Nuclear Weapons (WSJ)

By George P. Shultz, William J. Perry, Henry A. Kissinger And Sam Nunn

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

Nuclear weapons today present tremendous dangers, but also an historic opportunity. U.S. leadership will be required to take the world to the next stage -- to a solid consensus for reversing reliance on nuclear weapons globally as a vital contribution to preventing their proliferation into potentially dangerous hands, and ultimately ending them as a threat to the world.

Nuclear weapons were essential to maintaining international security during the Cold War because they were a means of deterrence. The end of the Cold War made the doctrine of mutual Soviet-American deterrence obsolete. Deterrence continues to be a relevant consideration for many states with regard to threats from other states. But reliance on nuclear weapons for this purpose is becoming increasingly hazardous and decreasingly effective.

North Korea's recent nuclear test and Iran's refusal to stop its program to enrich uranium -- potentially to weapons grade -- highlight the fact that the world is now on the precipice of a new and dangerous nuclear era. Most alarmingly, the likelihood that non-state terrorists will get their hands on nuclear weaponry is increasing. In today's war waged on world order by terrorists, nuclear weapons are the ultimate means of mass devastation. And non-state terrorist groups with nuclear weapons are conceptually outside the bounds of a deterrent strategy and present difficult new security challenges.

Apart from the terrorist threat, unless urgent new actions are taken, the U.S. soon will be compelled to enter a new nuclear era that will be more precarious, psychologically disorienting, and economically even more costly than was Cold War deterrence. It is far from certain that we can successfully replicate the old Soviet-American "mutually assured destruction" with an increasing number of potential nuclear enemies world-wide without dramatically increasing the risk that nuclear weapons will be used. New nuclear states do not have the benefit of years of step-by-step safeguards put in effect during the Cold War to prevent nuclear accidents, misjudgments or unauthorized launches. The United States and the Soviet Union learned from mistakes that were less than fatal. Both countries were diligent to ensure that no nuclear weapon was used during the Cold War by design or by accident. Will new nuclear nations and the world be as fortunate in the next 50 years as we were during the Cold War? * * *

Leaders addressed this issue in earlier times. In his "Atoms for Peace" address to the United Nations in 1953, Dwight D. Eisenhower pledged America's "determination to help solve the fearful atomic dilemma -- to devote its entire heart and mind to find the way by which the miraculous inventiveness of man shall not be dedicated to his death, but consecrated to his life." John F. Kennedy, seeking to break the logjam on nuclear disarmament, said, "The world was not meant to be a prison in which man awaits his execution."

Rajiv Gandhi, addressing the U.N. General Assembly on June 9, 1988, appealed, "Nuclear war will not mean the death of a hundred million people. Or even a thousand million. It will mean the extinction of four thousand million: the end of life as we know it on our planet earth. We come to the United Nations to seek your support. We seek your support to put a stop to this madness."

Ronald Reagan called for the abolishment of "all nuclear weapons," which he considered to be "totally irrational, totally inhumane, good for nothing but killing, possibly destructive of life on earth and civilization." Mikhail Gorbachev shared this vision, which had also been expressed by previous American presidents.

Although Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev failed at Reykjavik to achieve the goal of an agreement to get rid of all nuclear weapons, they did succeed in turning the arms race on its head. They initiated steps leading to significant reductions in deployed long- and intermediate-range nuclear forces, including the elimination of an entire class of threatening missiles.

DOJ_NMG_0112241

What will it take to rekindle the vision shared by Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev? Can a world-wide consensus be forged that defines a series of practical steps leading to major reductions in the nuclear danger? There is an urgent need to address the challenge posed by these two questions.

The Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) envisioned the end of all nuclear weapons. It provides (a) that states that did not possess nuclear weapons as of 1967 agree not to obtain them, and (b) that states that do possess them agree to divest themselves of these weapons over time. Every president of both parties since Richard Nixon has reaffirmed these treaty obligations, but non-nuclear weapon states have grown increasingly skeptical of the sincerity of the nuclear powers.

Strong non-proliferation efforts are under way. The Cooperative Threat Reduction program, the Global Threat Reduction Initiative, the Proliferation Security Initiative and the Additional Protocols are innovative approaches that provide powerful new tools for detecting activities that violate the NPT and endanger world security. They deserve full implementation. The negotiations on proliferation of nuclear weapons by North Korea and Iran, involving all the permanent members of the Security Council plus Germany and Japan, are crucially important. They must be energetically pursued.

But by themselves, none of these steps are adequate to the danger. Reagan and General Secretary Gorbachev aspired to accomplish more at their meeting in Reykjavik 20 years ago -- the elimination of nuclear weapons altogether. Their vision shocked experts in the doctrine of nuclear deterrence, but galvanized the hopes of people around the world. The leaders of the two countries with the largest arsenals of nuclear weapons discussed the abolition of their most powerful weapons. * * *

What should be done? Can the promise of the NPT and the possibilities envisioned at Reykjavik be brought to fruition? We believe that a major effort should be launched by the United States to produce a positive answer through concrete stages.

First and foremost is intensive work with leaders of the countries in possession of nuclear weapons to turn the goal of a world without nuclear weapons into a joint enterprise. Such a joint enterprise, by involving changes in the disposition of the states possessing nuclear weapons, would lend additional weight to efforts already under way to avoid the emergence of a nuclear-armed North Korea and Iran.

The program on which agreements should be sought would constitute a series of agreed and urgent steps that would lay the groundwork for a world free of the nuclear threat. Steps would include:

• Changing the Cold War posture of deployed nuclear weapons to increase warning time and thereby reduce the danger of an accidental or unauthorized use of a nuclear weapon.

• Continuing to reduce substantially the size of nuclear forces in all states that possess them.

• Eliminating short-range nuclear weapons designed to be forward-deployed.

• Initiating a bipartisan process with the Senate, including understandings to increase confidence and provide for periodic review, to achieve ratification of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty, taking advantage of recent technical advances, and working to secure ratification by other key states.

• Providing the highest possible standards of security for all stocks of weapons, weapons-usable plutonium, and highly enriched uranium everywhere in the world.

• Getting control of the uranium enrichment process, combined with the guarantee that uranium for nuclear power reactors could be obtained at a reasonable price, first from the Nuclear Suppliers Group and then from the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) or other controlled international reserves. It will also be necessary to deal with proliferation issues presented by spent fuel from reactors producing electricity.

• Halting the production of fissile material for weapons globally; phasing out the use of highly enriched uranium in civil commerce and removing weapons-usable uranium from research facilities around the world and rendering the materials safe.

• Redoubling our efforts to resolve regional confrontations and conflicts that give rise to new nuclear powers.

Achieving the goal of a world free of nuclear weapons will also require effective measures to impede or counter any nuclear-related conduct that is potentially threatening to the security of any state or peoples.

Reassertion of the vision of a world free of nuclear weapons and practical measures toward achieving that goal would be, and would be perceived as, a bold initiative consistent with America's moral heritage. The effort could have a profoundly positive impact on the security of future generations. Without the bold vision, the actions will not be perceived as fair or urgent. Without the actions, the vision will not be perceived as realistic or possible.

DOJ_NMG_0112242

We endorse setting the goal of a world free of nuclear weapons and working energetically on the actions required to achieve that goal, beginning with the measures outlined above.

Mr. Shultz, a distinguished fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford, was secretary of state from 1982 to 1989. Mr. Perry was secretary of defense from 1994 to 1997. Mr. Kissinger, chairman of Kissinger Associates, was secretary of state from 1973 to 1977. Mr. Nunn is former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

A conference organized by Mr. Shultz and Sidney D. Drell was held at Hoover to reconsider the vision that Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev brought to Reykjavik. In addition to Messrs. Shultz and Drell, the following participants also endorse the view in this statement: Martin Anderson, Steve Andreasen, Michael Armacost, William Crowe, James Goodby, Thomas Graham Jr., Thomas Henriksen, David Holloway, Max Kampelman, Jack Matlock, John McLaughlin, Don Oberdorfer, Rozanne Ridgway, Henry Rowen, Roald Sagdeev and Abraham Sofaer.

Energy From Another Backyard (WSJ)

By Norval Scott

Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

Saint John, New Brunswick

The oil and natural-gas industry is increasingly looking to Canada as a home for big energy projects Americans don't want in their backyards.

A patch of coniferous forest near here, on Canada's Atlantic coastline, represents both the promise and the challenges of that approach. The land, owned by closely held Canadian energy company Irving Oil, is earmarked for the possible construction of a 300,000-barrel-a-day crude-oil refinery that would cost $5 billion to $7 billion -- the first new refinery in the U.S. or Canada in more than 25 years. Irving hopes a refinery, if it chooses to build one, would be operational by 2013.

The challenges include drawing international partners and a skilled work force to the sparsely populated area, as well as convincing locals that the changes are for the better.

The refinery development is the cornerstone of a concerted regional attempt to construct a huge "energy hub" in New Brunswick, supplying the markets of Boston and New York with gasoline, natural gas and eventually petrochemicals and related products. That would increase U.S. energy reliance on Canada, which already supplies 16% of its imported oil and oil products and about 85% of its imported natural gas.

The effort is the latest sign of increased interest just outside U.S. borders, in part to supply the U.S. market. Two liquefied-natural-gas where gas shipped from overseas in transportable liquid form will be processed for consumer use -- are planned for British Columbia.

Mexico also has drawn interest. In August, an LNG terminal on the country's east coast owned by Royal Dutch Shell PLC of the U.K., Total SA of France and Mitsui & Co. of Japan accepted its first delivery. Others are planned for Mexico's west coast, intended to supply some gas to Southern California. But Mexico's energy infrastructure is less-developed and the nation faces its own supply concerns.

Confronting 'Nimby'

The rise in U.S. energy demand shows no signs of easing, despite higher prices as supplies world-wide become harder to find. The country also has been slow to invest in the infrastructure necessary to bring extra imports to consumers, due in part to concerns about the cyclical nature of the energy business. Also hurting matters is the widespread not-in-my-backyard attitude -- "Nimby" for short -- toward new industrial investment, which has notably delayed development of LNG terminals in the U.S.

Saint John, which is conveniently close to the U.S. Northeast, has both a natural deepwater port that could accommodate more shipping and a large amount of unused land suited for industrial development.

Irving Oil, which already has a 300,000-barrel-a-day refinery at Saint John that exports petroleum products to the U.S., also is building an LNG terminal there in conjunction with Spanish energy company Repsol YPF SA, with plans to import about one billion cubic feet of natural gas a day to meet U.S. demand.

Irving is in talks with potential partners and is gauging local support for the possible new refinery, with an eye to applying for a refining permit early this year. Local officials hope that will contribute to the economic regeneration needed by Saint John, a city hard hit by the decline of both the shipbuilding industry and Atlantic cod stocks. The campaign of New Brunswick's recently elected premier, Shawn Graham, focused on making the province a leader in energy generation.

DOJ_NMG_0112243

"Canada has been a reliable supplier of energy to the U.S., and that's something we'd like to expand," said Irving Oil President Kenneth Irving, grandson of the company founder. "As long as we keep getting [local] encouragement, we're going to try our best to make this a reality."

The company says it is negotiating with potential oil-supplying partners, though it won't disclose names. To attract a partner, Irving is touting the potential refinery as a processor of heavier grades of crude oil, which are tougher to refine and which oil producers can find harder to sell in world markets.

Irving and local supporters hope to win locals and attract skilled labor, which has left the region in recent years due to a lack of work and the oil-sands boom in faraway Alberta. Last month, regional advocacy group Atlantic Canada published a brochure in Alberta's major cities, seeking to draw workers back to Eastern Canada by illustrating the region's affordable living and laid-back lifestyle.

The Irving family owns many local businesses, in fields from construction and shipbuilding to forestry and newspapers. The family's local dominance has led some locals to question whether the regional government is holding Irving Oil to full account. In 2005, the New Brunswick legislature capped property taxes on the LNG terminal at 500,000 Canadian dollars (US$430,000) a year for 25 years. Opponents of the deal say that's about a tenth of what U.S.-based Anadarko Petroleum Corp. will pay in taxes on the similarly-sized, though less expensive, Bear Head LNG terminal in Nova Scotia.

Power Play

"Irving Oil has so much power in Saint John and New Brunswick that people are afraid to stand up to them," said Leland Thomas, a founding member of the group Friends of Rockwood Park, which opposes the route chosen for the pipeline to the LNG plant. "They're not paying full value for what they're getting."

City officials claim the property tax cap was vital to ensure the LNG terminal was built in Saint John. At the time, Mayor Norm McFarlane said the decision "would rest well for the next 50 years here."

Some locals still see the terminal as a safety hazard, with a terrorist attack on LNG facilities a particular concern. "We're taking all the risk, and yet all the supplies are going to the U.S.," said Carol Brown, a Saint John restaurateur who refuses to refuel her car at Irving Oil stations.

Irving Oil says it's had a largely positive response from the local community. The company believes its policy of consulting with locals about the project at an early stage -- before applying for any permits have been made -- will enable it to convince them of its merits. "The information we've had so far has been very encouraging," said Mr. Irving. "We believe this project has the right balance of aligning commercial interests along with those of the community."

DOJ_NMG_0112244

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, JANUARY 4, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Contractors Are Cited In Abuses At Guantanamo (WP) 4
In Padilla Wiretaps, Murky View Of 'Jihad' Case (NYT) 5
Leahy 'Brushed Off' On Secret Terror Docs (UPI)..... 8
Make The CIA Talk (LAT) 8
Millennium Bomber Changes Story About Friend (SEATIMES) ... 9
My Father's Red Scare (NYT)..... 9

Homeland Response:

Pickle Says Terrorist Attack On The Capitol Is Inevitable (HILL) 10
U.S. Requiring Port Workers To Have IDs And Reviews (NYT) . 11
Port Workers To Pay Fee For Homeland Security Card (AP)..... 12
Port Workers Subject To New Security Rules (WT)..... 13
Homeland Security Chief Promises To Upgrade Emergency Communications In 2 Years (AP) 13
Chertoff Vows Emergency Systems Upgrade (AP)..... 14
New Orleans Repeats Mistakes As It Rebuilds (WP)..... 15

War News:

Bush Considering Smaller-than-expected Increase In Troops For Iraq (MCT)..... 17
Snow: Military Levels In Baghdad Too Low (WT)..... 18
Awaiting Bush's Iraq Plan, Democrats Weigh Replies (NYT) 18
Analysis: Behind Troop Surge, A Neocon Force (LAT)..... 19
Getting The Middle East Back On Our Side (NYT) 21
Another Thousand Lives (NYT) 22
Suggester In Chief (WP)..... 23
Negroponte To Leave Intel Director Post (AP) 24
Negroponte Stepping Aside As Top Spy To Become Deputy Secretary Of State (USAT) 25
Intelligence Chief Is Shifted To Deputy State Dept. Post (NYT).. 26
Negroponte To Become Rice's Deputy (WSJ) 27
Negroponte To Leave Job To Be State Dept. Deputy (WP)..... 27
Intelligence Czar Moving To No. 2 State Dept. Post (LAT) 28
Saddam Execution Video Leads To Arrests (AP)..... 29
Despite Misgivings, White House Says Little Against Hanging (NYT) 31
Iraq Defends Hanging, But Holds Hussein Guard (NYT) 31
Guard Accused Of Recording Hanging (USAT) 33
U.S. Voices Misgivings On Execution (WT)..... 34
Baghdad Downplays Saddam Recording (FT)..... 34
Guard At Hanging Blamed For Covert Video Of Hussein (WP) .. 35
From Hussein, A Florid Farewell To The Iraqi People (NYT)..... 36
Iraq Postpones Execution Of Saddam Aides (AFP)..... 37
The Ugly Death Of Saddam Hussein (NYT)..... 38
The Voices On The Gallows (WP)..... 39
Saddam Should Have Been Studied, Not Executed (LAT) 40
Soldier Reaches Plea Deal In The Killing Of 3 Iraqis (NYT)..... 41
Groups Large And Small Mark 3,000th U.S. Death (USAT) 42
U.S. Military Deaths In Iraq Hit 3,005 (AP) 42
Iraq's Woes Are Adding Major Risks To Childbirth (WP) 43
Pentagon Helping Restart Iraqi Factories (AP)..... 45
5 Abducted In Iraq In November Appear Unhurt On Videotape (NYT/AP)..... 46
NATO Vows To Reduce Afghan Civilian Deaths (WP/AP)..... 46

DOJ:

GTSI Wins $42M Justice Department Contract (WASHBIZ) 47
Justice Hardware Standardization Deal Goes To GTSI (GCN)... 47
$42M Justice Department BPA Goes To GTSI (FCW) 48

Corporate Scandals:

Home Depot's CEO Resigns, And His Hefty Payout Raises Ire (WP)..... 48
Moving Out Behind Nardelli's Abrupt Exit (WSJ)..... 49
Home Depot's Nardelli Takes $210 Million Severance Package (LAT) 52
Home Depot Boots CEO Nardelli (USAT) 54
Executive's Fatal Flaw: Failing To Understand New Demands On CEOs (WSJ) 55
Out With The Old (NYT)..... 57
Don't Blame Nardelli (WP) 57
Suit Could Force Sarbanes-Oxley Review (LAW)..... 58

Criminal Law:

Audit Questions Costs, Use Of Justice Grants (USAT)..... 60
Audit Finds Failed Grant Handling (WT)..... 61
Audit: Agency Grants Had Lax Oversight (AP)..... 61
Prosecutors Demand Files Of 3 House Panels (LAT)..... 62
Los Angeles Seeks Federal Help To Fight Gangs (LAT) 63
Ex-coroner's Office Worker Pleads Guilty, To Cooperate (PPG) 64
Former Allegheny County Coroner Aide Pleads Guilty (AP) 64
McFadden-Weaver Indicted In Mortgage Fraud Case (KMBC) .. 65
COUNCILWOMAN CHARGED WITH MORTGAGE FRAUD (KCS) 65
KC Councilwoman Is Indicted For Mortgage Fraud (KCBIZ) 67

Bruno, Despite Investigation, Re-elected Senate Majority Leader (AP) ... 67
Watchdog Sparked FBI Probe, Barks Bruno Pal (NYDN) ... 68
Man Sentenced To 26 Years In Rosenbaum Killing (WP) ... 68
Prosecutors Move To Dismiss Charges Against Former Scout Leader (AP) ... 69
Federal Trial Set For James Kopp In Killing Of Abortion Provider (NSDY/AP) ... 69
Coca-Cola Tries To Block Theft Suspect's Access To Sensitive Information (FINDLAW/AP) ... 70
Former Qualcomm Employee Sentenced To 3 Years' Probation For Stealing Trade Secrets (SDUT/AP) ... 71
Ex-police Officer Gets 15 Years For Child Porn (FWNS) ... 71
Educator Charged With Sex Abuse (WP) ... 72

Civil Law:

Seeking New Rule On Protective Gear, Unions File Lawsuit Against OSHA (HILL) ... 72
Lack Of Rules On Protective Gear Brings Suit Against Labor Dept. (NYT) ... 73
Agencies Warned About Firing Probationary Employees (WP) ... 74
Eugene Doctors' Case Faces Appeal (ERG) ... 75

Civil Rights:

Bush Protesters Face Trial Over Signs At Parade (FINDLAW/AP) ... 75
Atheists Challenge The Religious Right (CSM) ... 76
The Truth About Oaths (USAT) ... 77

Antitrust:

Northrop Refiles Essex Bid With FTC (AP) ... 78
Nokia, Samsung, Matsushita Sued Over Bluetooth (WSJ) ... 79

Environment:

Oak Ridge Contractor Pays Price For Contaminating Local Creek (WATE) ... 79
Green Arlington (WP) ... 80

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Releases Rehnquist Nomination Files (AP) ... 80
Rehnquist FBI File Sheds New Light On Drug Dependence, Confirmation Battles (LAW) ... 81
FBI No Longer Seeks Leaked Documents (MACT) ... 83
Sentence Cut For Cooperating Son In Cocaine Cartel Case (ORS/AP) ... 84
Bank Fights Forfeiture Order On West Buildings (KNOXNS) ... 85
Prosecutor Wants Prison Term For Tyson (AP) ... 86
County Files Criminal Drug Charges Against Mike Tyson (AR) ... 86
Mexico Pres Encourages Soldiers Conducting Anti-Drug Ops (AP) ... 87
Soldiers, Police Pour Into Tijuana To Fight Drug Gangs (AP) ... 87
Mexican President's Anti-drug Offensive Heads For Tijuana (LAT) ... 88
Man Attempts To Run Over Two Deputy U.S. Marshals (AP) ... 89
Jailed Olympian To Return To Canada On Custody Dispute Charges (AP) ... 89

Immigration:

Social Security For Illegal Aliens (WT) ... 90
Immigrants A Driving Force Behind Start-Ups, Study Says (WP) 91
Immigrant Processors Fall Behind (WP) ... 92
Agency Paralyzed By Old Technology (WT/UPI) ... 92

Tax:

Deferred Charge Against KPMG Is Dismissed In Tax-Shelter Case (WSJ) ... 93
Prosecutors End Tax-shelter Case Against KPMG, Dropping Charge After Settlement (FINDLAW/AP) ... 94
Charge Against KPMG Dropped (WP) ... 95

Congress-Administration:

Bush Pushes Balanced Budget On Democrats (AP) ... 95
Bush Signals Budget Accord (WP) ... 96
Bush Resolves To Slash Deficit By 2012 (LAT) ... 98
Bush Warns Democrats On Stalemate (WT) ... 98
Bush's 'zero Deficit' Pledge Challenged (FT) ... 99
Bush Faces Hurdles Delivering On His Balanced-Budget Vow (WSJ) ... 100
What The Congress Can Do For America (WSJ) ... 101
The Democrats' Cautious Tiptoe Around The President's Tax Cuts (NYT) ... 102
Newsview: Bush Fights To Stay Relevant (AP) ... 103
Iraq May Quash 'bipartisan' Congress (FT) ... 104
Bush Reaches Out, But Keeps One Hand On The Wheel (NYT) 105
Bush Seeks Cooperation 'Without Compromising Principles' (USAT) ... 106
Bush Tells Congress What He'd Like (CHIT) ... 107
Americans Question Whether Congress Will Be Able To Pass Laws, Survey Shows (WSJ) ... 108
Bush To Seek Renewal Of Education Law (AP) ... 109
'No Child' Law On Track, Spellings Says (WP) ... 110
Gates Picks Intelligence Undersecretary (WP) ... 111
Bush, Democrats Joust Over Earmarks (LAT) ... 111
GOP Earmark Epiphany (WSJ) ... 112
Pelosi Walks Tightrope Enforcing Rules (WP) ... 113
House Democrats Prepare To Tighten Lobbyist Rules (WP) ... 116
Ethics Overhaul Tops The Agenda In New Congress (NYT) ... 117
For New Congress, A Long 'To Do' List (CSM) ... 118
First Act For Dems Is Ethics Cleanup (USAT) ... 119
Democrats Promise Action On Ethics, Iraq (AP) ... 120
New Congress, Leftover Challenge (NYT) ... 121
A Chance To Change The Game (WP) ... 122
An Ethics Down Payment (WP) ... 122
The Democrats' Agenda (USAT) ... 123
Eye On The Clock, House Democrats Put Their Focus On '100 Hours' (WP) ... 123
Majority Playing The Name Game (HILL) ... 124
Rep. Frank Opens Door To Business (WSJ) ... 125
Democrats Hope To Take From Oil, Give To Green Energy (WP) ... 126
Dems To Push Part D; Opponents' Lobbies Ready For Medicare Battle (HILL) ... 127
Business Mobilizes To Defend Turf (WSJ) ... 128

DOJ_NMG_0112246

The 100 Hours Rush (WSJ) ... 129
GOP Will Push For 'Alternatives' (WT) ... 130
Hoyer Defends Democrats' Plan To Block Republican Amendments (BLM) ... 131
In The House, Suddenly Righteous Republicans (WP) ... 131
Lessons From The GOP (WT) ... 133
Political Gadfly Cindy Sheehan Disrupts Democrats' Policy Meet (AFP) ... 134
Cindy Sheehan Disrupts Democrats Talk On Ethics (HILL) ... 134
Cindy Sheehan Routs The Democrats (WT) ... 135
Where Up Is Still Down, But The Rest Is Changing (NYT) ... 136
Pelosi Becomes First Female Speaker, Preparing To Confront Bush (BLOOM) ... 137
Pelosi's Political Rise Is Breakthrough (AP) ... 138
Pelosi Shows She's The Head Of Her Party (LAT) ... 140
Pelosi Ready To Make History As New Speaker (WT) ... 141
Pelosi's Coming-Out Party (TIME) ... 142
A Snit In First Class (NYT) ... 143
Passed Over By Pelosi, Harman Doesn't Get Even. She Gets Mad. (WP) ... 144
House Panel To Review 3 Challenges To Elections Of GOP Lawmakers (USAT) ... 145
A Democratic Trade Agenda (WSJ) ... 146
The Chairman's Turf (WP) ... 147
Johnson Improving; Will Still Need Months Of Rehabilitation (AL) 150
Sen. Johnson Angiogram Good News (RCJA) ... 151
Johnson Recovery Expected To Require Several Months (USAT) ... 152
Senator's Recovery Could Take Months (NYT) ... 152
Reps. Agree To Pay Back Travel Costs (HILL) ... 153
Litmus Test For Pro-Life Democrats (WP) ... 154

Other News:

Inflation Remains Chief Concern For Fed Members (USAT) ... 155
Fed Worry Tests Rosy Outlook (WSJ) ... 155
Fed Remains Focused On Risks To Inflation (FT) ... 156
Fed Reveals Concern Over Housing Slump (WP/AP) ... 157
Fed's Ideal Rate Of Growth Could Be Slower In The Future (WSJ) ... 157
US Markets Surrender To Inflation Fears (FT) ... 158
Stocks Give Up Early Gains (WSJ) ... 159
Markets Finish Mixed As Fed Hints At Nagging Concern With Inflation (NYT) ... 160
US Manufacturing Pulls Back From Brink Of Recession (FT) ... 161
Why Manufacturing Shows Resilience (WSJ) ... 161
Small Employers Struggle To Fill Jobs (USAT) ... 163
A Mostly Winning Economy (LAT) ... 163
Gerald Ford Is Laid To Rest In Michigan (AP) ... 164
Pride, Grief Flow As Ford Laid To Rest In Hometown (USAT) . 165
Ford Buried At Presidential Museum In Michigan (WT/AP) ... 166
Ford Is Buried After Thousands In Hometown Pay Respects (NYT) ... 166
Ford Laid To Rest In Michigan (CHIT) ... 168
Ford's Body Is Laid To Rest In Hometown (LAT) ... 169
A Final Return Home (WP) ... 170
Ford's Legacy: A Call For Unity In Congress (BSH) ... 170
Navy To Name Aircraft Carrier After Ford (AP) ... 171
Ford To City: OK (WSJ) ... 172
While The Nation Mourned, Their Trip Continued (WP) ... 173
In Meetings With Allies, Clinton Hones '08 Strategy (NYT) ... 173
Giuliani Leak: Attention Turns To Florida (NYT) ... 175
Romney Takes Step Toward An '08 Run (NYT) ... 176
Romney Submits Paperwork For 2008 Bid (AP) ... 176
Romney Takes 1st Step For Presidential Bid (LAT) ... 177
Governor Romney Will Form Presidential Exploratory Committee (BLOOM) ... 177
Romney Files For '08 Campaign (DN) ... 178
Romney Forms Presidential Committee, Focuses On Fundraising (WP) ... 178
Romney Exits With Pomp, Ambition (BOS) ... 179
Mitt's Maximum Exposure: '08 Contender Makes Most Of Exit (BOSH) ... 180
Gov. Seeks To Guarantee Health Insurance For All Calif. Kids (LAT) ... 181
Online Database Opens A Window For Parents To Compare Schools (USAT) ... 182
The Right Minimum Wage (WP) ... 183
U.S. Patrols Somalia For Terrorist Watch (AP) ... 184
US Seeks Return To Mogadishu (FT) ... 185
Kenya Closes Border But Denies Turning Back Refugees (NYT) 185
Iran's President Promises More Nuclear Fuel And A Celebration (NYT) ... 186
Iran To Launch Production Of Industrial Nuclear Fuel (AFP) ... 186
Iranian Official Urges New Nuclear Talks (FT) ... 187
Olmert, Mubarak Seek Restart Peace Talks (AP) ... 188
5 In Gaza Killed In Fatah-Hamas Clashes (NYT/AP) ... 188
5 Palestinians Killed In Gaza Strip (WP) ... 189
How Kim Jong Il Controls A Nation (CSM) ... 190
The Shenyang Six (WSJ) ... 191
Mexican U.N. Insider Gets Manager's Post (NYT) ... 192
Britain Free From WWII Payments (WT) ... 193
'Extraordinary' Fall In German Jobless (FT) ... 194
Ritual Sacrifice? Not On My Street, Some Belgians Say (WSJ) 194
Spanish PM Pays Price After Bomb Derails Eta Peace Talks (FT) ... 196
A World Free Of Nuclear Weapons (WSJ) ... 197
Energy From Another Backyard (WSJ) ... 198

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0112247

TERRORISM NEWS:

Contractors Are Cited In Abuses At Guantanamo (WP)

By Griff Witte And Renae Merle

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

New allegations of detainee abuse at Guantanamo Bay released by the FBI on Tuesday put private contractors at the center of interrogation operations, raising questions once again about where they fit in the military's chain of command.

The FBI's disclosures, which are based on eyewitness reports, refer several times to contractors directing the Army's interrogation efforts at the military detention center in Cuba. In at least one case, FBI agents were told that detainees may have been mistreated on orders from a contractor.

Taken together, the documents suggest a greater role for contractors than was previously known, and contracting experts said they indicate a further blurring of the limits on how much responsibility the private sector can carry in doing the public's work.

"These are incredibly sensitive and important government jobs. That's why you're supposed to have a very clear and public chain of command," said Brookings Institution scholar Peter W. Singer. "But now there's a confusion about proper roles."

A Defense Department official yesterday denied that contractors are supervising military personnel at Guantanamo. "As contractors cannot issue orders to military personnel, military personnel are not required to obey orders from a contractor," said Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, a spokesman for Task Force Guantanamo.

In the FBI documents, one agent described a 2002 incident involving a "civilian army contractor, who was in charge of the Army's interrogators." The agent reported being shown a bearded detainee with duct tape covering much of his head. Asked about it, the contractor "laughed and stated that the detainee had been chanting the Koran and would not stop," the documents said.

The same agent said his primary contact was a "civilian contractor employed by the military, who was responsible for the interrogations," the documents said. The contractor "directed military reservists who conducted the interrogations of the detainees."

The agent, apparently referring to the same contractor, also said the person "exhibited 'bizarre behavior,' meaning he displayed a range of emotions and often 'lost it' or became very angry when something insignificant occurred," the documents said.

Another agent reported seeing detainees in Delta Camp in sweltering rooms as loud rap music played. The agent was told the treatment had been ordered by military contractors, according to an FBI summary of the documents.

The disclosures, which are based on a 2004 survey of FBI personnel, do not mention which company employed the contractors at Guantanamo. Many of the incidents dated to 2002, but it could not be learned yesterday what company held the contract for some of that time. In November 2002, Affiliated Computer Systems was awarded a contract to supply 30 intelligence analysts and 15 to 20 interrogators and strategic debriefers to Guantanamo. ACS was acquired by Lockheed Martin, the Pentagon's largest contractor, in 2003.

"During our period of performance at Guantanamo, our employees were under the direct authority of" the U.S. Southern Command, said Lockheed spokesman Tom Jurkowsky. "We had no authority to, nor did we, direct the actions of any military member, active or reserve."

Lorton-based Chenega Federal Systems took over the work last year when it won a five-year, $152 million contract. The company had 16 "interrogators/strategic briefers" at Guantanamo Bay as of October, according to the Army.

"Chenega was not involved in debriefing or interrogating detainees in 2002 or early 2003," Chenega's communications director, Kristina Woolston, said in a written statement.

The FBI documents were released late Tuesday as part of a lawsuit by the American Civil Liberties Union, and include several new allegations of questionable treatment of Muslim prisoners at Guantanamo Bay. One interrogator infuriated a prisoner by squatting over a Koran, and two agents reported witnessing military personnel using vicious dogs to intimidate prisoners, the records show. The documents also expand upon earlier allegations of mistreatment, including two cases in which detainees were shackled to the floor, subjected to extreme temperatures and allowed to defecate on themselves.

The Army has previously acknowledged five incidents of intentional and unintentional mishandling of the Koran at Guantanamo Bay.

The allegations are reminiscent in certain respects to charges of mistreatment at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq. There, too, contractors who supplied interrogation services were allegedly involved, and some U.S. military personnel said they had mistreated detainees under orders from contractors.

DOJ_NMG_0112248

The U.S. attorney's office was assigned to investigate contractor behavior at Abu Ghraib, but no charges have been filed.

It's unclear how the law would apply to the contractors this time. Contractors have traditionally not been subject to the Uniform Code of Military Justice, the body of laws that governs the behavior of soldiers. Other laws apply to contractors, but many remain untested.

"You have two different types of people operating under different sets of rules," said Scott L. Silliman, executive director of the center on law, ethics and national security at Duke University.

Staff writer Dan Eggen and staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

In Padilla Wiretaps, Murky View Of 'Jihad' Case (NYT)

By Deborah Sontag

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

In 1997, as the government listened in on their phone call, Adham Hassoun, a computer programmer in Broward County, Fla., proposed a road trip to Jose Padilla, a low-wage worker there. The excursion to Tampa would be his treat, Mr. Hassoun said, and a chance to meet "some nice, uh, brothers."

Jose Padilla, left, and Adham Hassoun, who was photographed in 1999, are co-defendants in a terrorism conspiracy case.

Threats & Responses

Go to Complete Coverage » Mr. Padilla, 36, a Brooklyn-born Puerto Rican who had converted to Islam a few years earlier, knew Mr. Hassoun, an outspoken Palestinian, from his mosque. Still, according to a transcript of the conversation obtained by The New York Times, Mr. Padilla equivocated as Mr. Hassoun exhorted.

"We take the whole family and have a blast," Mr. Hassoun said. "We go to, uh, our Busch Gardens, you know ... You won't regret it. Money-back guarantee."

Mr. Padilla, laughing, suggested that they not discuss the matter over the phone.

"Why?" Mr. Hassoun said. "We're going to Busch Gardens. What's the big deal!"

That conversation took place five years before Mr. Padilla, a United States citizen accused of plotting a "dirty bomb" attack against this country, was declared an enemy combatant. Given that Mr. Padilla and Mr. Hassoun are now criminal defendants in a terrorism conspiracy case in Miami, it sounds suspicious, as if Mr. Hassoun were proposing something more sinister than a weekend at the amusement park. He well may have been — but maybe, too, he was sincere or joking about a Muslim retreat.

Deciphering such chatter in order to construct a convincing narrative of conspiracy is a challenge. Yet, prosecutors say, the government will rely largely on wiretapped conversations when it puts Mr. Padilla, Mr. Hassoun, and a third defendant, Kifah Jayyousi, on trial as a "North American support cell" that sent money, goods and recruits abroad to assist "global jihad."

Tens of thousands of conversations were recorded. Some 230 phone calls form the core of the government's case, including 21 that make reference to Mr. Padilla, prosecutors said. But Mr. Padilla's voice is heard on only seven calls. And on those seven, which The Times obtained from a participant in the case, Mr. Padilla does not discuss violent plots.

But this is not the version of Mr. Padilla — Al Qaeda associate and would-be bomber — that John Ashcroft, then the attorney general, unveiled in 2002 when he interrupted a trip to Moscow to trumpet Mr. Padilla's capture. In the four and a half years since then, as the government tested the limits of its power to deal with terrorism outside the traditional law enforcement system, Mr. Padilla is the only accused terrorist to have gone from enemy combatant to criminal defendant.

His criminal trial, scheduled to begin late this month, will feature none of the initial claims about violent plotting with Al Qaeda that the government cited as justification for detaining Mr. Padilla without formal charges for three and a half years. Those claims came from the government's overseas interrogations of terrorism suspects, like Abu Zubaydah, which, the government said, Mr. Padilla corroborated, in part, during his own questioning in a military brig in South Carolina.

But, constrained by strict federal rules of evidence that would prohibit or limit the use of information obtained during such interrogations, the government will make a far more circumscribed case against Mr. Padilla in court, effectively demoting him from Al Qaeda's dirty bomber to foot soldier in a somewhat nebulous conspiracy.

The initial dirty bomb accusation did not disappear. It quietly resurfaced in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. The government filed the dirty bomb charges against Mr. Padilla's supposed accomplice, an Ethiopian-born detainee, at about the same time it indicted Mr. Padilla on relatively lesser offenses in criminal court.

A Change in Strategy

The change in Mr. Padilla's status, from enemy combatant to criminal defendant, was abrupt. It came late in 2005 as the Supreme Court was weighing whether to take up the legality of his military detention and the Bush administration, by filing criminal charges, pre-empted its review. In a way, Mr. Padilla's prosecution was a legal maneuver that kept the issue of his detention without charges out of the Supreme Court. After apprehending him at O'Hare International Airport in Chicago in May 2002, the Bush administration made a choice: to detain Mr. Padilla militarily, in order to thwart further plotting, rather than to follow him in order to gather evidence that might serve a criminal prosecution.

DOJ_NMG_0112249

Senior government officials have said publicly that Mr. Padilla provided self-incriminating information during interrogations, admitting, they said, to undergoing basic terrorist training, to accepting an assignment to blow up apartment buildings in the United States, and to attending a farewell dinner with Khaled Sheikh Mohammed, the suspected master planner of the Sept. 11 attacks, before he flew to Chicago in 2002.

Go to Complete Coverage » But any confessions by Mr. Padilla while he was detained without charges and denied access to counsel — whether or not he was mistreated, as his lawyers claim — would not be admissible in court.

And it is unlikely that information obtained during the harsh questioning of Al Qaeda detainees would be admissible, either — and, further, the government is disinclined to expose sensitive intelligence or invite further scrutiny of secret jails overseas.

Probably as a consequence, the current criminal case zeroes in on what the government sees as an earlier stage of Mr. Padilla's involvement with terrorism. It focuses primarily on the other defendants' support during the 1990s for Muslim struggles overseas, especially in Bosnia, Kosovo and Chechnya. Mr. Padilla, who was appended to their pre-existing case, in which he had been an unnamed co-conspirator, is depicted as their recruit.

Although prosecutors have declined to discuss the government's strategy, their filings and statements in court provide a picture of the case they are expected to present at trial.

The most tangible allegation against Mr. Padilla is that in 2000 he filled out, under an alias, an Arab-language application to attend a terrorist training camp. That application is expected to be offered into evidence alongside the wiretapped conversations, but Mr. Padilla's lawyers say they will contest its admissibility, challenging the government's assertion that the "mujahideen data form" belonged to their client.

Robert Chesney, a specialist in national security law at Wake Forest University, called the prosecution a pragmatic one, analogous to "going after Al Capone on tax evasion."

But Deborah Pearlstein, a lawyer with Human Rights First who has consulted with Mr. Padilla's defense, said that his will never be an ordinary, pragmatic prosecution. "If Jose Padilla were from Day 1 just charged and tried, then maybe," she said. "But this is a case that comes after three and a half years of the most gross deprivation of human rights that we've seen in this country for a long time."

Further, Ms. Pearlstein noted, the government has reserved the option, should the prosecution fail, of returning Mr. Padilla to the military brig. This, she said, "casts a shadow" over the current prosecution.

The Bush administration's military case against Binyam Mohamed, 28, the Ethiopian detainee at Guantánamo, put the current proceedings in a different light, too.

In December 2005, Mr. Mohamed was referred to the military commission in Guantánamo on accusations that he conspired with Mr. Padilla on the dirty bomb plot. It was little noticed at the time.

But accusations against Mr. Padilla that are nowhere to be found in the indictment against him filled the pages of Mr. Mohamed's charging sheet, with Mr. Padilla repeatedly identified by name. The sheet referred to the two men meeting in Pakistan after Sept. 11, 2001, studying how to build an improvised dirty bomb, discussing the feasibility of a dirty bomb attack with Al Qaeda officials and agreeing to undertake the mission to blow up buildings.

Mr. Mohamed's lawyer, Clive Stafford Smith, said that these charges were based on a forced confession by Mr. Mohamed, who, he said, was tortured overseas into admitting to a story that was fed to him. "Binyam was told all along that his job was to be a witness against Padilla, Abu Zubaydah and Khaled Sheikh Mohammed," Mr. Stafford Smith said, adding that his client "has no conscience knowledge that he ever met" Mr. Padilla.

The charges against Mr. Mohamed and other Guantánamo detainees who were headed for prosecution there have been suspended temporarily as a result of the Military Commissions Act passed by Congress in October. Those charges are likely to be reinstated, a Pentagon official said yesterday.

That Mr. Mohamed faced dirty bomb charges and Mr. Padilla does not speaks to the central difference between being a terrorism suspect in Guantánamo and a criminal defendant charged with terrorism offenses in the United States.

Go to Complete Coverage » In Guantánamo, the military commission system that deals with foreign-born terrorism suspects is expected to allow, with some exceptions, the use of information obtained through coercion.

"Federal court rules are restrictive," Professor Chesney of Wake Forest University School of Law said. "The very essence of why they're trying to have that separate military system was to create rules to use information that is deemed by the intelligence community to be trustworthy but wouldn't make it under the federal rules of evidence."

David Cole, a professor of law at Georgetown University and author of books on terrorism and civil liberties, sees the difference between the two systems more critically: "What this says clearly is that they feel that they can get away with using tainted evidence in the military commission system that they can't use in the criminal court system."

DOJ_NMG_0112250

The Wiretapping Case

The criminal case against Mr. Padilla has its roots in the prosecution of Sheikh Omer Abdel Rahman, the blind Egyptian cleric who was convicted in 1995 of conspiring to blow up the United Nations and other New York landmarks.

In the early 1990s, Sheikh Rahman's telephone was tapped, and Mr. Hassoun and Dr. Jayyousi, a Jordanian-born American citizen who holds a doctorate in civil engineering, came to the government's attention through phone calls to or from his line. Then the government, under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, began to eavesdrop on them, which eventually pulled Mr. Padilla into their net, too.

The government presents the three defendants as "joined at the hip," as one prosecutor put it in a hearing last summer. But Judge Marcia G. Cooke of Federal District Court, noting that Mr. Padilla was appended to a case well under way, asked the government, "If they are so joined at the hip, why is Mr. Padilla so late to the dance?"

Dr. Jayyousi, a former school system administrator in both Detroit and Washington, D.C., never met Mr. Padilla, his lawyer, William Swor, said.

It is Mr. Hassoun, the government said, who recruited Mr. Padilla. But both Mr. Hassoun's and Mr. Padilla's lawyers deny that Mr. Padilla was recruited.

Seven Taped Phone Calls

Mr. Padilla's lawyers and relatives say that he left South Florida for Egypt in September 1998 on a spiritual journey. A former juvenile offender, he converted to Islam as part of an effort to straighten out his life, they say. His mosque in Fort Lauderdale sponsored his travel, he told friends, relatives and F.B.I. agents who interviewed him in 2002. Mr. Hassoun belonged to that mosque, and the telephone transcripts seem to indicate that Mr. Hassoun helped, at the least, with Mr. Padilla's travel plans.

The seven taped phone calls that bear Mr. Padilla's voice involve conversations with Mr. Hassoun from 1997 to 2000.

On those calls, Mr. Padilla, unlike some of the other defendants, does not employ what the government says is coded language. According to the government, other defendants refer to their jihad-related plans as "getting some fresh air," "participating in tourism," "opening up a market," "playing football," and so on. This leads to silly-sounding exchanges where "the brothers" discuss going on "picnics" in order "to smell fresh air and to eat cheese" or using $3,500 to buy "zucchini."

In contrast, Mr. Padilla's seven conversations with Mr. Hassoun range from straightforward — Mr. Hassoun tells Mr. Padilla that his grandmother has died; Mr. Padilla tells Mr. Hassoun that he has found himself an 18-year-old Egyptian bride who is willing to wear a veil — to vaguely suggestive or just odd.

In one phone call, the two men talked about a dream. It appeared to be the dream that Mr. Padilla, according to his relatives, cites as having played a crucial role in inspiring him to convert to Islam: the vision of a man in a turban, surrounded by the swirling dust of a desert.

Mr. Hassoun brought it up and told Mr. Padilla that he himself had experienced the same vision. "What do you mean you saw the same dream?" Mr. Padilla asked.

"I saw the dream of the uh ... person with the turban," Mr. Hassoun said.

Mr. Hassoun explained how, in his dream, the turban was wrongly wrapped and so he thought the man might be a spy, in which case, he was prepared "to split his body apart." But then, he said, he understood that "the brother ... was a good one."

"Yeah?" Mr. Padilla said.

In three of the seven conversations, Mr. Padilla made statements that the government has identified as "overt acts" in furtherance of the accused conspiracy.

In the first, Mr. Hassoun asked, "You're ready, right?" and Mr. Padilla said, "God willing, brother, it's going to happen soon." That was the summer of 1997, a year before Mr. Padilla left South Florida for Egypt.

In the second, Mr. Padilla told Mr. Hassoun, during a 1999 conversation from Egypt, that he had asked his ex-wife in the United States to arrange for him to receive an army jacket, a book bag and a sleeping bag, supplies that he had requested because "there was a rumor here that the door was open somewhere." In the third, Mr. Padilla told Mr. Hassoun in April 2000, that he would need a recommendation to "connect me with the good brothers, with the right faith" if he were to travel to Yemen.

Prosecutors say Mr. Padilla is mentioned, although by his Muslim name Ibrahim or by another alias, on 21 additional tapes. One of them refers to Ibrahim as being "in the area of Usama," which the government takes to mean that he was near Osama bin Laden. But Mr. Padilla's lawyers contest that interpretation.

"That is just nonsensical, Your Honor, that these men who for years, according to the government, have been talking in code all of a sudden are going to throw Osama bin Laden's name around," Michael Caruso, a federal public defender, said in court.

DOJ_NMG_0112251

Mr. Padilla has pleaded not guilty. But before his case goes before a jury, his fitness to stand trial will be evaluated. On the basis of Mr. Padilla's lawyers' assertion that he is mentally damaged as a result of his prolonged isolation and his interrogation in the brig, Judge Cooke has ordered a psychiatric evaluation by a Bureau of Prisons doctor to be completed this week.

Now that Mr. Padilla has ended up a criminal defendant after all, the prosecution's case does not fully reflect the Bush administration's view of who he is or what he did.

Leahy 'Brushed Off' On Secret Terror Docs (UPI)

United Press International, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 (UPI) -- The incoming chairman of the powerful Senate Judiciary Committee says the U.S. Justice Department brushed off a request to see secret war-on-terror documents.

"The department's decision to brush off my request for information about the administration's troubling interrogation policies is not the constructive step toward bipartisanship that I had hoped for," said Leahy in a statement.

He accused the department and the the White House of "squander(ing) another opportunity to work cooperatively with Congress," and promised to take the matter up with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at an early oversight hearing this month.

Last November, Leahy requested two documents concerning CIA interrogation methods, the existence of which officials recently acknowledged for the first time in a lawsuit.

In a letter to Gonzales, Leahy said he wanted to see a presidential directive regarding the CIA's interrogation methods and detention facilities located outside of the United States, and an August 2002 Department of Justice communication to the CIA's general counsel about agency interrogation policies and methods -- the so-called second Bybee memorandum.

Tuesday, Leahy released the response from the Justice Department in which officials said that the documents contained "extremely sensitive operational details ... including the specific interrogation techniques employed" by the CIA. The department said it was "longstanding practice" that "non-public" opinions from the department's Office of Legal Counsel were "not disclosed outside of the executive branch," because doing so would chill the administration's ability to get candid advice.

Leahy Spokeswoman Tracy Schmaler told United Press International that classification issues should not be a bar to disclosing the documents. "We have cleared staff, we have secure facilities," she said.

Make The CIA Talk (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

HOWEVER ELSE it might modify its behavior in dealing with a new, Democratic-controlled Congress, the Bush administration is still stonewalling when it comes to sharing information about its tactics in the "war on terror." That's a mistake.

This week, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, disclosed that the Justice Department had spurned his request for two documents. One is a presidential directive regarding Central Intelligence Agency interrogation methods and detention facilities outside the United States. The other is a 2002 Justice Department memo on the subject to the CIA's top lawyer.

Leahy, who raised the possibility of issuing subpoenas to obtain the documents, lamented that the rebuff from the Justice Department "is not the constructive step toward bipartisanship that I had hoped for, given President Bush's promise to work with us." In this case Leahy's complaint is justified.

As Leahy pointed out in his letter to Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales, "photographs and reports of prisoner abuse in Iraq, Guantanamo Bay and elsewhere that have emerged during the past two years depict an interrogation and detention system operating contrary to U.S. law and the Geneva Conventions." Such revelations also have been a boon to anti-American propagandists.

The abuses have stoked suspicions about "alternative" methods used by the CIA in questioning high-profile suspected terrorists held in foreign prisons before being moved to Guantanamo. While insisting that those techniques didn't amount to torture, the president has suggested that they are vital in eliciting information.

Yet what those methods might be is anybody's guess. Congress — and not just its intelligence committees — has a right to know.

In declining to provide Leahy documents, acting Assistant Atty. Gen. James H. Clinger warned that "Al Qaeda seeks information on our interrogation techniques — their methods and their limits — and trains its operatives to resist them. We must avoid assisting their effort." Disclosing legally controversial defense procedures to a Senate committee chairman is not "assisting" Al Qaeda; it's respecting the separation of powers written in the Constitution and ensuring that no policy be declared off-limits to the law.

Leahy could offer to view the documents under safeguards created for sensitive intelligence. But the Judiciary Committee has a legitimate oversight responsibility to see what the CIA has been doing and whether it's violating the law. At some point in the next two years, Democrats may well abuse their majority status and pursue gratuitous or overtly political investigations. This request, however, is legitimate.

DOJ_NMG_0112252

Millennium Bomber Changes Story About Friend (SEATIMES)

By Mike Carter

Seattle Times, January 4, 2007

Convicted millennium bomber Ahmed Ressam has recanted testimony that has been helping to detain a fellow Algerian as an enemy combatant in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

In a letter to U.S. District Judge John Coughenour, Ressam wrote that a Montreal friend, Hassan Zemiri, had nothing to do with plans to detonate bombs at Los Angeles International Airport over the New Year's holiday in 1999.

"It is not right or just to accuse somebody of something not true," Ressam wrote.

Ressam, 39, had testified at the 2001 trial of his co-conspirator, Mohktar Haouari, that Zemiri had aided in the plot.

Zemiri was captured in Afghanistan after an American airstrike in late 2001 near the caves of Tora Bora along the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, said his lawyer, Jim Dorsey of Minneapolis.

Dorsey said Zemiri was in Montreal in 1999 and knew Ressam, who had returned from Osama bin Laden's terrorist-training camps in Afghanistan. News broke in May 2001 that Ressam was cooperating with federal agents. Within weeks, Zemiri and his wife, a Canadian citizen, fled to Afghanistan, his lawyer said.

Zemiri is one of 529 people being held as enemy combatants at the U.S. military base in Cuba. Ressam's testimony about Zemiri's Montreal activities is the basis for Zemiri's five-year incarceration, his lawyer said.

Dorsey was unaware that Ressam had written the letter aiding his client until contacted by The Seattle Times on Wednesday. Dorsey said the letter was "great [but] you just don't know how much good it will do." He referred to the shifting legal status of the detainees as the "through-the-looking-glass weirdness down in Guantánamo."

Ressam sent Coughenour the letter, written in Arabic, in November. The judge ordered the letter translated but then withheld the original and the translation from the court file.

On Tuesday, The Times, through its attorney, asked the judge to file the letter and its translation in the court file. He did so on Wednesday.

According to the translation, Ressam denied that Zemiri "had provided aid and support for the operation I was about to carry out. This is not right, it is false."

Ressam said his initial account about Zemiri was given while "I was in shock and had a severe psychological disorder" after his April 2001 conviction on nine counts, including conspiracy to commit an act of international terrorism.

Customs agents in Port Angeles caught Ressam with explosives in his rental car in December 1999.

Facing a lifetime in prison, Ressam agreed to cooperate and began providing information on his cohorts and others.

He testified only once: at the New York trial of Haouari, a member of Ressam's terrorist cell in Montreal.

After two years of interrogation and a nervous breakdown, Ressam stopped cooperating in 2003. As a result, federal prosecutors said, they had to dismiss indictments against two alleged terrorists: Samir Ait Mohamed, who Ressam had said once planned to detonate a gasoline truck in a Jewish neighborhood in Montreal; and Abu Doha, an alleged al-Qaida recruiter in London.

In testimony, Ressam has acknowledged that Zemiri gave him $3,500 and a video camera to use to make himself look like a tourist.

But Ressam testified that he never gave Zemiri details of his plans to bomb holiday travelers at the Los Angeles airport.

"He knew that you were going to commit a terrorist act, yes or no?" a prosecutor asked.

"A job in America, yes," Ressam replied.

In the recently released letter, Ressam said he had asked his lawyers a year ago to help him contact the FBI or prosecutors about changing his testimony. The lawyers said they would contact Zemiri's lawyers, Ressam wrote. "But recently, I have been having problems with my attorneys and I don't trust them or their promises anymore," Ressam wrote.

His lawyer, federal public defender Thomas Hillier, said Wednesday that he believes Ressam's continued isolation at the federal supermax prison in Colorado has led to the distrust.

"The truth is, we will fight even harder for him now," Hillier said.

My Father's Red Scare (NYT)

By PETER W. KLEIN

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

Vancouver, British Columbia

THIS week the United States government will begin automatically declassifying hundreds of millions of documents from the cold war, under a law meant to streamline the cost and hassle of keeping secret files that are more than 25 years old. Among the dossiers bearing names like Alger Hiss, Theodore Hall and Julius and Ethel Rosenberg will be one labeled "Frigyes Klein": my father, Fred Klein.

My father was never a spy, never a member of the Communist Party. He came by ship to the United States in 1956, fleeing Communism during the Hungarian revolution to pursue the American dream. He worked on a Ford automobile assembly line in Cincinnati by day and moonlighted sharpening lawnmowers at night, saving enough money in a few years to buy a small house. To him, treasonous behavior meant buying a car made outside of America. Nonetheless, as I discovered recently, the F.B.I. kept a file on him from the day he arrived in the United States.

J. Edgar Hoover sent a personal memo to the C.I.A. director calling my father a person of current interest; the case was handled by Alan Belmont, a top bureau official who was instrumental in the case against the Rosenbergs. I discovered this after filing a Freedom of Information Act inquiry as part of some family research for a book. I was shocked to receive 50 F.B.I. pages riddled with my father's name, the edges dotted with weathered stamps marked "SECRET." I matched what I read with stories I remembered from when he was alive, and began piecing the case together.

My father once mentioned that during the voyage over, he got into an altercation with another refugee, a man he didn't know from a town he had never visited. According to the file, this man told an Army captain that my father had been an agent for AVO — the Hungarian K.G.B. — in his town of Tatabanya, that he had interrogated and beaten the man for speaking out against the regime, and that he'd subsequently sent the man to a prison camp. The story was a complete fabrication.

I can only imagine how many names of patriotic, law-abiding Eastern European immigrants like my father are to be found in the millions of documents being released by the F.B.I. and other agencies. In a recent article in this newspaper about the declassification law, L. Britt Snider, a former intelligence official who is advising the White House on the process, warned that most of the documents were boring and suggested that the agencies concentrate first on those that were interesting and important.

But I would caution intelligence officials not to discount both the interest and the importance of files like my father's, if only to avoid repeating some of the embarrassing legacies of the cold-war era.

It has already happened. Last year a Syrian informant told the New York police that five Arabs he knew were importing weapons for a suicide bombing. After several weeks and the involvement of more than 30 New York police agents, as well as federal customs officials, the F.B.I. and Israeli law enforcement, it was determined that the "weapons" were in fact jewelry. As with my father, the informant had a vendetta and had lied to the authorities.

My father's case remained open for more than a decade. His F.B.I. file contains a creepy secret memo from 1963 in which a mole inside the Hungarian community in Cincinnati reported to his handler that he had "heard rumors [about] a family named Klein who do not associate with the Hungarian group." The fact that this level of surveillance was taking place behind my family's back seven years after they arrived in America says something about the pathological level of paranoia during the Red Scare.

The Frigyes Klein file was finally closed in 1968, only after people from the informant's Hungarian hometown admitted to an F.B.I. special agent that my father had not been with the secret police. Twenty-five years from now, some unsuspecting son may stumble across a file about his own father — a patriotic, law-abiding Arab immigrant whose name inexplicably ended up on a list. Like the cold-war-era files, these new ones being drawn up could leave a historical paper trail about an era of scares and witch hunts — if intelligence officials do not learn from the lessons in the documents released today.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Pickle Says Terrorist Attack On The Capitol Is Inevitable (HILL)

By Albert Eisele

The Hill, January 4, 2007

Senate Sergeant at Arms Bill Pickle ended four years in office yesterday with a plea to lawmakers and law enforcement officials to keep their guard up against what he called an inevitable terrorist attack on the Capitol.

"Nothing has changed since 9/11," warned Pickle. "The Capitol is the symbol of America all over the world, and it's clearly the No. 1 or 2 target of terrorists, as it was on 9/11. I truly believe at some point in the future, and I don't know in what shape or form, we will be victimized again.

"Terrorists don't have to hit a home run by knocking down the Capitol Dome. All they have to do is attack the Capitol complex [with an airplane or chemical or biological agents] and cause damage and loss of life, and it would produce shock waves around the country."

DOJ_NMG_0112254

Pickle, a 26-year veteran of the Secret Service who was chosen by then-Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), criticized the outgoing Republican House leadership for resisting his efforts to develop a unified security strategy for the entire 233-acre Capitol complex.

He predicted that incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and the House Democratic leadership "are going to be more responsive" to his successor, former Capitol Police Chief Terrence Gainer, in beefing up Capitol security.

"My biggest regret is that I wish I had been able to overcome some resistance from the House leadership in the area of security," said Pickle, who emphasized he was "not finding fault" with the House sergeant at arms or the Capitol Police. "I haven't been successful in developing a unified strategy with the House, mainly for political reasons."

Asked what concrete steps he would take to improve security, Pickle, 56, said he would like "an aesthetically pleasing and historically accurate fence" around the 233-acre Capitol complex, even though "a number of senators are opposed to it."

It "would not take away from the grandeur and beauty of the Capitol but it would provide chokepoints and would control access to the Capitol campus," he said.

The new $584 million Capitol Visitors Center would not improve security, said Pickle, conceding that balancing the needs for access to the Capitol complex and security of the area may be an impossible goal.

"We have upwards of 100,000 people a day visiting and working in the Capitol complex, and there is a demand to keep it secure from attack, and also a demand to keep it open, and you can't reconcile the two," he said.

"The … fact that we are such an open branch of government gives me great pause. While we might be doing a good job of protecting the Capitol, we have another 18 to 20 buildings with up to 15,000 employees to protect as well."

Pickle said some members and staff are defensive about the hundreds of millions of dollars spent to protect the complex. "My answer is that it's not about you, it's about the Constitution demanding that this body continue to meet and function."

Pickle, who described the last four years as "wonderful," said Frist asked him if he really wanted the job.

"When I said, 'Why do you ask?' he said, 'Because it's the worst job on the Hill. You have 100 bosses, all of whom think they're going to be the next president.'

"What I found was just the opposite of what many people outside the Beltway think. Everyone who comes here is so well-intentioned and nobody works harder than these senators."

Pickle, who plans to form a government-affairs firm specializing in homeland security, transportation and healthcare, displays portraits of his 36 predecessors on his office wall, going back to the first one in 1789.

One, who served from 1919 to 1933, wrote a tell-all book about his experience and was censured by the Senate for doing so.

Asked if he plans to write such a book, Pickle said, "I don't have enough to say."

U.S. Requiring Port Workers To Have IDs And Reviews (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 — More than 750,000 port workers will be required to have criminal background and immigration checks in an antiterrorism program that the Homeland Security Department announced on Wednesday, and industry leaders say the effort could disrupt port traffic nationally.

The Homeland Security Department this week issued 469 pages of final rules for the program, which is intended to make it harder for terrorists to sneak into secure port areas.

Starting in March, workers like longshoremen and truck drivers will have to apply for the card, which will include a fingerprint and a digital photograph.

The applicants will have to prove that they are legally working in the United States. They also cannot have been convicted of any terrorism-related crimes like spying, sedition or treason, as well as other charges like murder, improper transport of hazardous materials or illegal possession or purchase of explosives.

Anyone convicted in the past seven years of a much longer list of crimes like possession of illegal firearms, bribery, arson, robbery or extortion will have to seek a waiver before obtaining a card. People involuntarily committed to mental health centers because of drug or alcohol addiction will have to prove that they have successfully completed rehabilitation.

Industry officials say the restrictions may disqualify thousands of workers, particularly truck drivers, based on estimates that a signification segment of the drivers may be working here illegally.

Union leaders have said workers with criminal records who have served their time or paid fines might lose their jobs.

"We don't want to keep people who are not a terrorist risk to be kept from doing their job," said Steve Stallone, a spokesman for the International Longshore and Warehouse Union.

DOJ_NMG_0112255

Kip Hawley, assistant secretary of the Transportation Security Administration, said in an interview Wednesday that he was confident that the effects would be modest. Drivers of trucks carrying hazardous materials have similar background checks, with 1 percent disqualified, Mr. Hawley said.

"We do not anticipate this will be a huge issue," he added.

The government has expanded the appeals process so workers with criminal histories can present their cases to an administrative law judge.

The cards will first be issued at a few ports and then expand over 18 months until they cover the nation's estimated 770,000 maritime workers.

Applicants will have to pay up to $159 for the card, which will be good for five years. Over all, the government estimates that the program will cost $1.8 billion over the next decade, factoring in related costs like paying escorts required for people without cards who need to enter secure port areas.

Port Workers To Pay Fee For Homeland Security Card (AP)

By Leslie Miller, Associated Press Writer

The AP, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON --Truck drivers, longshoremen and mariners will have to pay up to $159 for a high-tech identity card that will grant them access to U.S. ports.

Groups representing truckers and longshoremen said the fee is too high and will force some workers -- especially truck drivers -- to quit their jobs.

Some workers will have to buy the cards as soon as March. But a time has not been specified for port operators and ship owners to buy the equipment that reads the cards, according to a rule announced Wednesday by the Homeland Security Department.

In Portland, Maine, as many 250 workers will receive the ID cards, but the employer often picks up the tab for them, said Jeffrey Monroe, Portland's ports and transportation director.

The agencies issuing the cards -- the Coast Guard and Transportation Security Administration -- still have to test the card readers and decide on specifications.

TSA chief Kip Hawley said the government's main interest is port security. Until card readers are installed, Coast Guard patrols will conduct random checks of the cards with handheld devices at ports, he said.

Todd Spencer, executive vice president of the Owner-Operator Independent Drivers Association in Grain Valley, Mo., described the fees as "really high" for a program "that isn't even functional." The group represents 148,000 drivers in an industry where turnover averages 120 percent a year, Spencer said.

"It's going to be another reason that drivers are simply going to say, 'Phooey, I'm not going to get any of it,'" Spencer said.

The cards were first ordered by Congress in 2002 as a way to strengthen security at seaports, considered vulnerable to terrorist attacks.

The project stalled, however. Congress passed a port security bill in October that included a requirement that rules for the new card be written by Jan. 1.

The Transportation Workers Identity Credential will be issued initially to 750,000 port workers who pass government background checks.

The card will contain the holder's photograph and name, an expiration date and a serial number. An integrated circuit chip will store the holder's fingerprint template, a PIN chosen by the individual and unique identifying information.

Steve Stallone, spokesman for the San Francisco-based International Longshore and Warehouse Union, said the cards at first would work like the cheap photo IDs already in use at ports.

"We're going to be paying $139 to $159 and we don't know how they work?" Stallone said.

Hawley said the fee was reasonable for a card that is good for five years and includes high-tech identification verification and a security threat assessment. Drivers who have had background checks, either because they carry hazardous material or cross the border, will pay less, he said.

"It's pretty hard to say, 'I can't afford $30 a year for a professional credential,'" Hawley said.

Kevin Hayes, vice president for Long Beach Container Terminal, Inc., at the Port of Los Angeles/Long Beach, said the program could make ports more efficient.

"As a uniform credential, it will speed things up because there will be a lot less thinking involved -- eventually," he said.

Ultimately, as many as 6 million transportation workers in rail yards, airports and seaports will have to buy the card to gain access to secure areas.

DOJ_NMG_0112256

Last April, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff announced that seaport workers would be checked for links to terrorism and to ensure they are legal U.S. residents. Yet only port workers and longshoremen have been checked so far.

People familiar with trucks that ferry cargo in and out of ports contend many drivers are illegally in the United States.

Hawley said the TSA has conducted background checks of truck drivers who have applied for credentials to carry hazardous materials. Fewer than 1 percent failed to pass the checks, he said. "We don't have any apology for requiring a legal residency," Hawley.

Yet Leigh Strope, spokeswoman for the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, said the union does not think it possible for the government to make the program work as it should.

On the Net:

Transportation Security Administration: http://www.tsa.gov

Port Workers Subject To New Security Rules (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

Nearly 1 million workers accessing U.S. ports must undergo criminal background checks, submit fingerprints and pay more than $100 for a biometrics identification card under new rules announced yesterday by the Homeland Security Department.

The rules apply to "commercial drivers authorized to transport hazardous materials in commerce to merchant mariners and workers who require unescorted access to secure areas on vessels and at maritime facilities," the department said.

The technology required to read the biometrics cards, however, has not been created, so the expensive identification card will be used as a flashcard at checkpoints.

"They expect us to spend a lot of money on something that is just a photo ID at this point," said Steve Stallone, spokesman for the International Longshore and Warehouse Union.

Mr. Stallone said union officials are reviewing the new rules, but have not yet taken a position.

"There is a lot here to review and check to see what we think. It's hard to say at this point. But it looks like some of it we like, and some of it we don't like so much. We don't even know what they are doing yet to develop a reader," Mr. Stallone said.

The new rule for the Transportation Worker Identification Credential (TWIC) establishes the enrollment process, fees for the card ranging from $107 to $159, and crimes which will disqualify workers -- a task Congress failed to complete during the last session.

"TWIC applicants will undergo a comprehensive background check that looks at criminal history records, terrorist watch lists, immigration status, and outstanding wants and warrants," said a statement issued by the Homeland Security Department.

Enrollment in the program will begin in March at a small number of ports and then phased in nationwide.

Rather than scan the ID cards through a reader to decipher the biometrics information and fingerprints, workers will "present their cards to authorized personnel who will compare the holder to his or her photo, inspect security features on the TWIC and evaluate the card for signs of tampering."

"Until card-reader technology is tested and a regulation issued on access control, facility owners and operators will not be required to utilize TWIC readers for facility access," the statement said.

One industry insider said the system won't be effective until technology is created that does not require a pin or reader that requires direct contact by a swipe card.

"Contact readers can be destroyed easily in a marine environment. Right now it will be used as a flashcard until the next generation of technology is up and running."

Although the card-reader requirements are not being implemented at this time, "the Coast Guard will institute periodic unannounced checks to confirm the identity of the holder of the TWIC," says the new rules, which are spelled out over nearly 500 pages.

Homeland Security Chief Promises To Upgrade Emergency Communications In 2 Years (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

The AP, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The nation's homeland security chief pledged Wednesday that 75 metropolitan areas would have advanced disaster communications systems by 2009, but acknowledged that friction among emergency agencies continues to hinder progress.

"We are determined to get this job done in the next two years," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said at a news briefing.

DOJ_NMG_0112257

He did not say how much the effort would cost, but so far the government has distributed more than $2.9 billion to communities around the country with mixed results. Democrats who will control Congress this year have also promised to make communications upgrades a priority, but have provided little detail.

Chertoff released a survey of how well the 75 U.S. communities have prepared their first responders to communicate during a catastrophe. More than five years after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, exposed severe weaknesses in the ability of emergency workers to communicate with each other, the report gave only six of the areas studied the highest grades.

Portions of the report had been obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press.

Chertoff said Wednesday that since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, agencies have tried to overcome old turf rivalries that can hamper emergency work.

"In some communities, not all, there are some longstanding cultural differences between different kinds of responders," including police, firefighters and medical personnel, Chertoff said. "I think that is a challenge and that culture has been a challenge."

The report found that while emergency agencies in more than 60 percent of the communities studied had the ability to talk to each other during a crisis, only 21 percent overall showed "the seamless use" of equipment needed to also communicate with state and federal officials.

The report's highest ratings went to the Washington, D.C., area; San Diego; Minneapolis-St. Paul; Columbus, Ohio; Sioux Falls, S.D.; and Laramie County, Wyo.

The lowest scores went to Chicago; Cleveland; Baton Rouge, La.; Mandan, N.D.; and American Samoa. The report includes large and small cities and their suburbs, along with U.S. territories.

In an overview, the report says all 75 areas surveyed have policies in place for helping their emergency workers communicate. But it also finds that "formalized governance (leadership and planning) across regions has lagged."

The study is likely to add fuel to what looms as a battle in Congress this year. Democrats who take over the majority this week have promised to try fixing the problem emergency agencies have communicating with each other but have not said specifically what they will do, how much it will cost or how they will pay for it.

"Five years after 9/11, we continue to turn a deaf ear to gaps in interoperable communications," -- the term used for emergency agencies' abilities to talk to each other, said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. "If it didn't have such potentially devastating consequences, it would be laughable."

The attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, revealed major problems in how well emergency agencies were able to talk to each other during a catastrophe. Many firefighters climbing the World Trade Center towers died when they were unable to hear police radio warnings to leave the crumbling buildings.

The report says first responders in New York now have well-established systems to communicate with each other -- but not the best, most advanced possible. Thirteen U.S. cities score better than New York.

Communities were judged in three categories: operating procedures in place, use of communications systems and how effectively local governments have coordinated in preparation for a disaster.

Most of the areas surveyed included cities and their surrounding communities, based on the assumption that in a major crisis emergency personnel from all local jurisdictions would respond.

The areas with the six best scores were judged advanced in all three categories. The cities with the lowest grades had reached the early implementation stage for only one category, and intermediate grades in the other two categories.

The Chicago Office of Emergency Management and Communications took issue with the report's methodology and findings.

"We strongly disagree with the results of this study, and feel that the parameters of the study were inconsistent and limited," the statement said.

Tammy Lapp, the emergency coordinator for Mandan and Morton County, N.D., said she was not surprised by their low ranking on the scorecard.

"We knew with our limited funds, we were going to fall short," she said.

Chertoff Vows Emergency Systems Upgrade (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

The AP, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — The nation's homeland security chief pledged Wednesday that 75 metropolitan areas would have modern disaster communications systems in place by 2009, even as a report by his agency conceded that many communities have a long way to go.

DOJ_NMG_0112258

While providing no concrete detail, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff essentially promised to scrap old radios and ancient grudges that continue to bedevil communications during crises, even five years after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

A survey released by his agency on Wednesday gave the highest grades for emergency communications to only six of 75 cities and regions studied. In effect, Chertoff was promising an ambitious two-year effort to give them a top-quality emergency communications system, a pledge that raised questions for some analysts.

Richard Rotanz, an adviser at Adelphi University and former emergency response official in Nassau County, N.Y., said the report was unclear about what standards the government planned to reach.

"They should have broken it all down more so you can understand where they are weak and strong," Rotanz said. "Instead, what you get is a very vague description of where things are and where they want to go."

Guy Clinch, an executive for Avaya Inc., which sells communications products to the federal and local governments, said the report seemed "almost intentionally vague" about what Chertoff hopes to accomplish.

Chertoff did not indicate what the price tag would be for the improvements or hard rules for specific technology upgrades.

Since 9/11, the government has distributed more than $2.9 billion to communities around the country with mixed results. Democrats who will control Congress this year have also promised to make communications upgrades a priority, but have provided little detail.

"We are determined to get this job done in the next two years," Chertoff said at a news briefing.

The Associated Press detailed major portions of the report on Tuesday.

The survey found that while emergency agencies in more than 60 percent of the communities studied had the ability to talk to each other during a crisis, only 21 percent overall showed "the seamless use" of equipment needed to also communicate with state and federal officials.

The danger of poor communications in a disaster was glaringly obvious in the 2001 terror attacks, when many New York fire personnel did not hear the call to evacuate the burning towers of the World Trade Center. Overall, 343 firefighters died.

Chertoff said Wednesday that among the hurdles are old turf rivalries between first responders that can hamper emergency work.

"In some communities, not all, there are some long-standing cultural differences between different kinds of responders — fire, police and EMS — that have caused resistance to working together," he said. EMS stands for emergency medical services.

One local official said a similar problem exists between federal and local agencies, but that it, too is improving.

"There has been a sea change since 9/11," said Gerry Connolly, the chairman of Fairfax County, Va., which is part of the nation's capital region.

For federal authorities working with the locals, Connolly said, "that's not a badge of shame any longer."

The report's highest ratings went to the Washington, D.C., area; San Diego; Minneapolis-St. Paul; Columbus, Ohio; Sioux Falls, S.D.; and Laramie County, Wyo.

The D.C.-area's communication system was put to use just this week in handling the funeral for former President Gerald R. Ford, Chertoff said.

The report's lowest scores went to Chicago; Cleveland; Baton Rouge, La.; Mandan, N.D.; and American Samoa. The report includes large and small cities and their suburbs, along with U.S. territories.

Chicago Mayor Richard Daley said Wednesday he was very proud of his city's efforts, despite its low score, arguing that Chicago is "far ahead in dealing with homeland security."

Chertoff said cities in the scorecard should not be compared with each other because each faces a unique set of challenges. He praised Chicago, saying its low grade was because the city and surrounding Cook County need to improve their working relationships.

Other cities were found to need technological upgrades. The Houston area, for instance, has a 16-year-old radio system that "must be replaced," according to the scorecard.

The metropolitan area of New York and New Jersey, Chertoff said, has made a "very, very substantial amount of progress compared to where they were on 9/11," saying it is one place in particular that has seen a concerted effort to overcome long-standing rivalries between police and fire personnel.

New Orleans Repeats Mistakes As It Rebuilds (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

NEW ORLEANS -- By ones and twos, homeowners here are reinhabiting neighborhoods, even the most devastated ones, and many view their return as a triumph over adversity.

DOJ_NMG_0112259

But experts involved in the rebuilding believe that the helter-skelter return of residents to this low-lying metropolis may represent another potential disaster.

After Katrina, teams of planners recommended that broad swaths of vulnerable neighborhoods be abandoned. Yet all areas of the city have at least some residents beginning to rebuild. With billions of dollars in federal relief for homeowners trickling in, more people are expected to follow.

Moreover, while new federal guidelines call for raising houses to reduce the damage of future floods, most returning homeowners do not have to comply or are finding ways around the costly requirement, according to city officials.

"It's terrifying: We're doing the same things we have in the past but expecting different results," said Robert G. Bea, a professor of civil engineering at the University of California at Berkeley and a former New Orleans resident who served as a member of the National Science Foundation panel that studied the city's levees.

"There are areas where it doesn't make any sense to rebuild -- they got 20 feet of water in Katrina," said Tom Murphy, a former Pittsburgh mayor who served on an Urban Land Institute panel for post-Katrina planning. "In those places, nature is talking to us, and we ought to be listening. I don't think we are."

A map of building permits in Orleans Parish, created by GCR & Associates, a New Orleans firm involved in the rebuilding, shows renovations distributed throughout the city's low-lying areas. A similar phenomenon is underway in neighboring St. Bernard Parish, which was even more devastated by the storm.

New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin (D) so far has favored allowing evacuees to inhabit their old neighborhoods as they wish.

Mike Centineo, the city's building chief, said, "Legally and morally, we're doing the right thing," but he acknowledged that most returning homeowners are not raising their houses to meet the new flood guidelines. "You wouldn't want to put people through more than they can endure. It's a catastrophe that happened. No one wants it to happen again. But they're just rebuilding as best they can."

The chairman of the federal Gulf Coast rebuilding office, Donald E. Powell, said recently that "tough decisions" about where to repopulate this half-empty city are necessary.

"The President and I believe planning decisions should not be made in Washington, but rather at the local level," he said in a statement. "However at some point, there needs to be strong local leadership, and that includes making tough decisions about the city's size and the safety of her citizens. Federal tax dollars should not be used to rebuild in places that repeatedly flood or are damaged due to Mother Nature -- in New Orleans or elsewhere."

Whatever decisions are to be made, however, none is likely to come soon. And as time rolls on, and as more houses in vulnerable neighborhoods are reinhabited, it will grow more difficult, politically and financially, to lead residents to safer areas.

Ed Blakely, the city's newly appointed recovery chief, begins work next week. He proposes that, once the Army Corps of Engineers issues reports this spring about which city neighborhoods are riskiest, some returning homeowners be offered the chance to swap their lots for others in less vulnerable locations.

"There is overwhelming evidence that people want to come back to a safer area," Blakely said. "But right now, no one is giving them that choice. They are only acting out of their own sense that they have to be housed."

Any drive around Orleans Parish or suburban St. Bernard Parish shows that people are coming back to even the hardest-hit neighborhoods, albeit sparsely, to renovate their flood-damaged homes.

In the Lakeview, New Orleans East and Gentilly areas of Orleans Parish and in most of St. Bernard Parish, neighborhoods are strange and desolate. Some homes and travel trailers are inhabited, but they are surrounded by empty houses and occasional debris piles. Returning residents say they wonder how long their neighborhoods will seem like ghost towns.

Rochelle Krantz, 64, and her husband are repairing their home in Chalmette. On the day before Christmas, their temporary trailer is adorned with a snowman and several Santa Clauses, but most of the surrounding houses are empty, and the post-flood gloom is pervasive.

"When we come out at night to sit, it's like a cemetery . . . very, very dark and very, very quiet," Krantz said. "We used to hear kids and cars going by. . . . Now, nothing."

Sometimes complete strangers, she said, come up to ask: " 'You're coming back?' And then they say, 'You're nuts!' "

But, she said, the house is paid for.

"We'll leave it in the good Lord's hands," Krantz said.

A few blocks over, Vincent Gangi, 54, a real estate broker, is restoring a large brick house adorned with Greek-revival statues.

"I just don't think it's going to happen again -- something like Katrina happens only once in a hundred years," he said. "By that time, I'll be dead."

The controversy over how to rebuild the New Orleans region began almost as soon as the waters receded.

DOJ_NMG_0112260

In the fall of 2005, planners from the Urban Land Institute, working with the city's Bring New Orleans Back Commission, recommended that large sections of Lakeview, Gentilly, New Orleans East and the Lower Ninth Ward be abandoned, at least temporarily. The panel called for the government to purchase homes at pre-Katrina prices.

There were two reasons for the planners' proposals. First, the levees had proved catastrophically fallible. Even now, they are not guaranteed to stand during the strongest hurricanes. Moreover, the wetlands that once protected the city from storm surges continue to erode, and hurricane experts, including Max Mayfield, the outgoing director or the National Hurricane Center, have repeatedly warned that many homeowners are taking on unacceptable risks in U.S. coastal areas.

Second, it seemed likely that New Orleans's post-Katrina population was destined to be smaller. It made sense to consolidate neighborhoods, planners said, to prevent blight from overtaking sparsely populated, partially abandoned areas.

"What we said was that, in the areas that had gotten 10 feet of water, don't commit to rebuilding anything yet, because it probably won't happen anyway," said Joseph Brown, head of the urban design panel at the Urban Land Institute.

But Nagin, who was hearing complaints that shrinking the city's footprint was unfair, particularly to African Americans, rejected the idea. Everyone should be able to return to their homes, he said.

"I'm not ready to concede that neighborhoods need to be demolished," Nagin said at the time.

Officials in St. Bernard Parish, meanwhile, rejected closing off a particularly hard-hit 36-block section of Chalmette because they could not afford to buy out property owners.

Once the idea of neighborhood closures was dropped, many pinned their hopes for added safety on the new federal guidelines for elevating homes. "Substantially damaged" houses in the area now must be raised, often three feet above the ground. But the requirements contain enormous loopholes, and there is a huge financial incentive to avoid them.

Raising a house can cost upwards of $50,000, especially for the modern suburban homes built on concrete slabs in some of the most flooded areas. The federal government offers grants of as much as $30,000 for repairs, but in many cases much more is required.

"The vast majority simply do not have the financial resources to rebuild differently," said Greg Rigamer, chief executive of GCR & Associates and a consultant in the rebuilding.

Residents could avoid having to comply with the new guidelines by getting permits before the rules were enacted locally -- thousands in New Orleans did -- or if their houses were determined to be less than 50 percent damaged by Katrina.

Many homes, even those that took on 10 feet of water for weeks, have been designated beneath that threshold, including hundreds whose owners appealed larger initial damage assessments.

Among those slowly repopulating the once-flooded areas, many turn to God when considering what will happen in the next hurricane.

"People always say, 'I'm going to pray,' " said Bea, the Berkeley civil engineer. "And I'm thinking, 'I hope God is listening.' "

WAR NEWS:

Bush Considering Smaller-than-expected Increase In Troops For Iraq (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel And Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush plans to order extra U.S. troops to Iraq as part of a new push to secure Baghdad, but in smaller numbers than previously reported, U.S. officials said Wednesday.

The president, who is completing a lengthy review of Iraq policy, is considering dispatching three to four U.S. combat brigades to Iraq, or no more than 15,000 to 20,000 U.S. troops, the officials said. Bush is expected to announce his decision next week.

Typically, a combat brigade comprises about 3,500 combat troops and more than 1,000 support personnel.

"Instead of a surge, it is a bump," said a State Department official. He spoke on condition of anonymity, because Bush hasn't yet unveiled details of what the White House is calling a "new way forward" in Iraq.

Bush had been considering proposals to send a much larger contingent into Baghdad -- as many as 30,000-40,000 soldiers and Marines.

Some experts doubt that the smaller deployment would be sufficient to halt Iraq's escalating civil war between Shiite and Sunni Muslims.

Details of Bush's Iraq strategy are still being finalized and could change. But the smaller troop increase appears to reflect the real-world constraints the president faces as he tries to persuade the American public that victory is still possible in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0112261

Congressional Democrats, who formally take power on Capitol Hill Thursday, widely oppose any increase in the roughly 140,000 U.S. troops now in Iraq. Many want Bush to present a plan for withdrawing those troops.

Meanwhile, the U.S. military has been stretched by four years of war in Afghanistan and Iraq, meaning there are few active-duty combat units available for deployment.

To marshal even 15,000 to 20,000 additional troops, Bush would have to accelerate the return of some units to the battlefield, cutting their time to train between deployments.

Advocates of a "surge" in U.S. troop levels have argued that to be effective in halting the violence, the United States would have to send a significant number of troops for an extended period of time.

Frederick W. Kagan, a scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative policy research center, recently briefed the White House on his plan to send 32,000 additional soldiers and Marines to Baghdad and volatile Anbar province. The troops would remain in Iraq for 18 months.

On Wednesday, Kagan cautioned against over-interpreting the number of troops being sent. More important, he said, is the number of individual combat brigades and battalions sent to Iraq and how they're deployed.

The State Department official said that, even at this late juncture, administration officials are debating what the extra troops would do.

Officials in Baghdad have said that extra troops could be used to secure the capital or add soldiers to military transition teams, who train alongside their Iraqi counterparts.

But in Washington, the thinking increasingly is that the troops would be used to try to secure Baghdad and protect the Iraqi population from relentless violence, State Department officials said.

A senior defense official said that a military study of strategy in Iraq, part of Bush's overall policy review, concluded that the current policy of rapidly training Iraqi security forces and turning responsibility over to them was the wrong course.

That policy was essentially "a rush to failure," the defense official said.

Bush is expected to announce his new Iraq policy to the nation next week, possibly as early as Wednesday, officials said.

The additional troop deployments are only one facet of the plan. The president also is expected to announce another initiative to reconcile Iraqi Sunni and Shia Muslims and to request additional funds to provide jobs to Iraqis who otherwise might join ethnic militias.

To date, billions of dollars in U.S. funds have gone to rebuild Iraq, but the bulk of that money has been awarded to American firms, which hire non-Iraqi contractors.

(Youssef reported from Baghdad.)

Snow: Military Levels In Baghdad Too Low (WT)

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Wednesday it is clear there needs to be a greater military presence in Baghdad.

During a regular White House briefing, Snow told reporters current troop levels in Baghdad are "insufficient" to quell the violence.

Snow said he would leave the announcement of the details of what needs to be done to U.S. President George Bush, who is due to deliver a speech on whether he plans to send more U.S. troops to Iraq.

"I think it is safe to say that there needs to be more in the way of forces within Baghdad -- Iraqi forces in Baghdad, trained and equipped and ready, and this is what the prime minister has said," Snow said. "He's asked not only for larger forces and more responsibility but also more equipment to get the job done."

Snow said no final decisions have been made and discounted a BBC report indicating the president would call on Americans to sacrifice, saying the BBC must have found a "phantom" draft because the speech has yet to be written.

Awaiting Bush's Iraq Plan, Democrats Weigh Replies (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 — Some key Senate Democrats say they could consider supporting a short-term increase in American troop levels in Iraq, a stance that reflects division within the party and could provide an opening for President Bush as he prepares to announce his revised plan for Iraq as early as next week.

Mr. Bush is expected to outline a strategy that would include adding to American forces, but would link that increase to a plan for economic development in Iraq. He has vowed to consult Congressional leaders before delivering his speech to the nation, and he began that process on Wednesday night by inviting House and Senate leaders to a White House reception, though officials said Iraq was not discussed.

DOJ_NMG_0112262

Senator Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who will lead the Armed Services Committee, said he would not "prejudge" the president's proposal. While he would oppose an open-ended commitment, Mr. Levin said, he would not rule out supporting a plan to dispatch more troops if the proposal was tied to a broader strategy to begin reducing American involvement and sending troops home.

"The American people are skeptical about getting in deeper," he said in an interview. "But if it's truly conditional upon the Iraqis' actually meeting milestones and if it's part of an overall program of troop reduction that would begin in the next four to six months, it's something that would be worth considering."

But Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Delaware Democrat who will become chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, has said he is opposed to increasing troop strength regardless of the plan, calling the idea the "absolute wrong strategy." In interviews on Wednesday, several Democratic senators echoed Mr. Biden's view, saying they believed that sending more troops would not resolve the predicament in Iraq.

Democrats have become well-practiced at playing the roles of critic and skeptic, particularly when the subject is the war in Iraq. But as the party formally assumes control of Congress on Thursday, the divisions between the committee leaders, party leadership and rank-and-file senators illustrate the fresh burden they face of articulating a response to Mr. Bush's revised Iraq strategy.

Democrats may find it difficult to speak with one voice in response to Mr. Bush's plan. And at this point, party strategists said, they do not necessarily intend to. Over the next three weeks, Senate Democrats plan to call at least 13 hearings on Iraq, to be held by committees that include Foreign Relations, Armed Services, Intelligence, Homeland Security and Judiciary.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates have agreed to testify, officials said, and invitations were sent this week to a raft of former administration officials, academics and military and Iraqi experts.

Short of reducing military financing, which even the staunchest Congressional war critics have been reluctant to do, Democrats say they believe that one of the most effective tools they have to influence policy is to hold televised hearings.

"What you are going to find is that this is no longer exclusively a Democratic criticism," said Senator Jack Reed, a Rhode Island Democrat who is a member of the Armed Services Committee. "A lot of Republicans are going to be standing up and saying, 'I don't understand what the president's strategy is.' A lot of people will be asking serious questions, and that will be healthy."

Senator Evan Bayh, an Indiana Democrat who also serves on the Armed Services Committee, said a troop increase "might lead to a temporary abatement to the violence, but will only postpone the ultimate day of reckoning."

In an interview, Mr. Bayh added, "This problem is not going to be solved in Washington by the president of the United States; it can only be resolved by Iraqis."

In a memorandum sent Wednesday to members of the Democratic caucus, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, who becomes the majority leader, pledged that "Democrats will work with Republicans to bring oversight and accountability" to the war.

Mr. Reid has said that he will consider supporting a short-term increase in troops, but his spokesman, Jim Manley, declared, "If it's not temporary in nature, it's a nonstarter."

Representative Steny H. Hoyer, a Maryland Democrat who will be the House majority leader, stopped short of saying that Democrats would exercise the power of the purse and decrease financing for American troops. Yet he said the new Congress was "not going to sit silently by while policies are pursued with which we don't agree."

Still, the Bush administration intends to try to find support from the crop of newly elected members of Congress — particularly those who were elected from Republican districts — as the president works to build support for his Iraq strategy before the State of the Union address, now set for Jan. 23.

On the issue of sending more troops to Iraq, the White House is also reaching out to Senate Democrats who are facing re-election in 2008.

"I am not in favor of that unless the president can convince me otherwise," Senator Mark Pryor, an Arkansas Democrat who will serve on the Armed Services Committee, said of a possible troop increase.

"I think that the Congress, after 9/11, was willing to give him the benefit of the doubt on a whole range of issues related to Iraq," Mr. Pryor said, "but we've been there four years now and it's time for him to clearly have the burden of proof."

Analysis: Behind Troop Surge, A Neocon Force (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — Ever since Iraq began spiraling toward chaos, the war's intellectual architects -- the so-called neoconservatives -- have found themselves under attack in Washington policy salons and, more important, within the Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0112263

Paul Wolfowitz, who was the Defense Department's most senior neocon, was shipped off to the World Bank. His Pentagon colleague Douglas Feith departed for academia. John Bolton left the State Department for the United Nations.

But other neocons have moved back into the mainstream of steering Iraq policy. A key part of the new Iraq plan that President Bush is expected to announce next week -- a surge in U.S. troops coupled with a more focused counterinsurgency effort -- has been one of the chief recommendations of these neocons since the fall of Saddam Hussein.

This group -- which includes William Kristol, editor of The Weekly Standard magazine, and Frederick Kagan, a military analyst at the American Enterprise Institute -- was expressing concerns about the administration's blueprint for Iraq even before the invasion almost four years ago. In these neoconservatives' view, not enough troops were being set aside to stabilize the country. They also worried that the Pentagon had formulated a plan that concentrated too heavily on killing insurgents rather than securing law and order for Iraqi citizens.

They have long advocated for a more classic counterinsurgency campaign: a manpower-heavy operation that would take U.S. soldiers out of their large bases dotted across the country and push them into small outposts in troubled towns and neighborhoods to interact with ordinary Iraqis.

Until now, it was an argument that had fallen on deaf ears.

"We have been pretty consistently in this direction from the outset," said Kagan, whose December study detailing his strategy is influencing the administration's current thinking. "I started making this argument even before the war began, because I watched in dismay as we messed up Afghanistan and then heard with dismay the rumors that we would apply some sort of Afghan model to Iraq."

If Bush goes ahead with the surge idea, along with a concomitant shift to a more aggressive counterinsurgency, it would in many ways represent a wholesale repudiation of the outgoing Pentagon leadership.

These leaders -- particularly former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Army Gen. John Abizaid, the departing Middle East commander -- strongly resisted more U.S. troops and a larger push into troubled neighborhoods out of fear it would prevent Iraqis from taking over the job themselves and exacerbate the image of the United States as an occupier.

The plan the administration appears to be moving toward envisions an increase of 20,000 to 30,000 troops, the majority of whom would be sent to Baghdad. The increase would be achieved by delaying the departure of Marine units already in Iraq and speeding the deployment of Army brigades due this spring.

The neoconservative group as a whole had been the driving force in Washington behind a move against Iraq, even before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. They saw Saddam as a lingering threat to world security -- a view bolstered within the administration after the attacks. They argued that transforming Iraq into a democracy could serve as a model with potential to remake the Middle East's political dynamics.

The war effort's unraveling gradually undermined the clout they had wielded. But perhaps the more important hurdle -- especially on military matters -- was the White House's refusal to see its Iraq policy as a failure.

That changed this summer, when the spike in sectarian violence and the failure of an offensive to secure Baghdad created what one Pentagon adviser called a "psychological break" within the administration. Until then, neoconservatives argue, the administration saw little proof that Abizaid's plan, backed by Army Gen. George Casey, the military commander in Iraq, was failing.

The main reason for the new ascendancy of the neocon recommendations, said Kristol, is that "the Rumsfeld-Abizaid-Casey theory was tried and was found wanting. ... Some of us challenged it very early on, but, of course, then we were just challenging it as a competing theory."

Although Kristol, Kagan and their intellectual allies have pushed for their policy for more than three years, they bristle at the notion that the idea of a larger troop presence in Iraq and a different approach to securing the country is wholly a neoconservative idea.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a leading presidential contender, has been pushing for more troops and a different security strategy for nearly as long as Kristol and Kagan. Recently, support for a revised counterinsurgency plan has gained support among military officers, active and retired. Perhaps most notable is retired Army Gen. Jack Keane, a former Army chief of staff who signed onto Kagan's plan last month.

The case for change has been bolstered by actions the military itself has taken, including a successful 2005 Army offensive in the northern Iraqi city of Tall Afar, where midlevel officers used counterinsurgency tactics to suppress sectarian violence. The Pentagon released a new counterinsurgency field manual last month that largely echoed the neocons' thinking.

The troop-surge proposal is not embraced by all neoconservatives. Wolfowitz, for instance, had ridiculed the notion that more troops would be needed to secure Iraq. Richard Perle, a former top adviser to the Pentagon who advocated for smaller troop numbers at the time of the invasion, is known to be skeptical of a surge.

The plan's advocates acknowledge the split within the neocon movement.

DOJ_NMG_0112264

"Before the war, I was arguing for a quarter of a million troops in expectations we'd be there five or 10 years," said Gary Schmitt, an analyst at the American Enterprise Institute who has worked closely with Kristol and Kagan. "Richard Perle, obviously somebody else who's thought of as a neocon, thought we should go in" with far fewer U.S. forces.

The neocons calling for more troops in Iraq and different tactics have pressed their proposals in public writings and speeches and in private conversations within the administration.

Kenneth Adelman, a leading neoconservative thinker, recalled a meeting a year ago of the Defense Policy Board, a group of outside advisers to the Pentagon, during which he pressed Rumsfeld to implement more traditional counterinsurgency ideas, such as keeping soldiers longer in their deployed areas to get to know the local population better.

"What you need for counterinsurgency has been pretty clear for some time: You need to protect the population and get the population to fight the insurgents with you, or at least inform on them," Adelman said. "The fight is over the population, it's not over getting the enemy."

Much like they did when advocating for the invasion, these neocons have promoted their military strategy even at times when it was seen as politically unpalatable.

"What you can say about Fred Kagan and Bill Kristol ... is they've been constant in sounding this theme," said Eliot A. Cohen, a military analyst at Johns Hopkins University's international studies school in Washington who has advised the administration on Iraq policy. "You've had other people who have dropped in and out of this."

Getting The Middle East Back On Our Side (NYT)

By Brent Scowcroft

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

Washington

THE Iraq Study Group report was released into a sea of unrealistic expectations. Inevitably, it disappointed hopes for a clear path through the morass of Iraq, because there is no “silver bullet” solution to the difficulties in which we find ourselves.

But the report accomplished a great deal. It brought together some of America’s best minds across party lines, and it outlined with clarity and precision the key factors at issue in Iraq. In doing so, it helped catalyze the debate about our Iraq policy and crystallize the choices we face. Above all, it emphasized the importance of focusing on American national interests, not only in Iraq but in the region.

However, the report, which calls the situation in Iraq “grave and deteriorating,” does not focus on what could be the most likely outcome of its analysis. Should the Iraqis be unable or unwilling to play the role required of them, the report implies that we would have no choice but to withdraw, and then blame our withdrawal on Iraqi failures. But here the report essentially stops.

An American withdrawal before Iraq can, in the words of the president, “govern itself, sustain itself, and defend itself” would be a strategic defeat for American interests, with potentially catastrophic consequences both in the region and beyond. Our opponents would be hugely emboldened, our friends deeply demoralized.

Iran, heady with the withdrawal of its principal adversary, would expand its influence through Hezbollah and Hamas more deeply into Syria, Lebanon, the Palestinian territories and Jordan. Our Arab friends would rightly feel we had abandoned them to face alone a radicalism that has been greatly inflamed by American actions in the region and which could pose a serious threat to their own governments.

The effects would not be confined to Iraq and the Middle East. Energy resources and transit choke points vital to the global economy would be subjected to greatly increased risk. Terrorists and extremists elsewhere would be emboldened. And the perception, worldwide, would be that the American colossus had stumbled, was losing its resolve and could no longer be considered a reliable ally or friend — or the guarantor of peace and stability in this critical region.

To avoid these dire consequences, we need to secure the support of the countries of the region themselves. It is greatly in their self-interest to give that support, just as they did in the 1991 Persian Gulf conflict. Unfortunately, in recent years they have come to see it as dangerous to identify with the United States, and so they have largely stood on the sidelines.

A vigorously renewed effort to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict could fundamentally change both the dynamics in the region and the strategic calculus of key leaders. Real progress would push Iran into a more defensive posture. Hezbollah and Hamas would lose their rallying principle. American allies like Egypt, Saudi Arabia and the gulf states would be liberated to assist in stabilizing Iraq. And Iraq would finally be seen by all as a key country that had to be set right in the pursuit of regional security.

Arab leaders are now keen to resolve the 50-year-old dispute. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel may be as well. His nation’s long-term security can only be assured by resolving this issue once and for all. However, only the American president can bring them to the same table.

Resuming the Arab-Israeli peace process is not a matter of forcing concessions from Israel or dragooning the Palestinians into surrender. Most of the elements of a settlement are already agreed as a result of the negotiations of 2000 and the “road map" of 2002. What is required is to summon the will of Arab and Israeli leaders, led by a determined American president, to forge the various elements into a conclusion that all parties have already publicly accepted in principle.

DOJ_NMG_0112265

As for Syria and Iran, we should not be afraid of opening channels of communication, but neither should we rush to engage them as negotiating "partners." Moreover, these two countries have differing interests, expectations and points of leverage and should not be treated as though they are indistinguishable.

Syria cannot be comfortable clutched solely in the embrace of Iran, and thus prying it away may be possible. Syria also has much to gain from a settlement with Israel and internal problems that such a deal might greatly ease. If we can make progress on the Palestinian front before adding Syria to the mix, it would both avoid overloading Israel's negotiating capacity and increase the incentives for Damascus to negotiate seriously.

Iran is different. It may not be wise to make Iran integral to the regional strategy at the outset. And the nuclear issue should be dealt with on a separate track. In its present state of euphoria, Iran has little interest in making things easier for us. If, however, we make clear our determination, and if the other regional states become more engaged in stabilizing Iraq, the Iranians might grow more inclined to negotiate seriously.

WHILE negotiations on the Arab-Israel peace process are under way, we should establish some political parameters inside Iraq that encourage moves toward reconciliation and unified government in Iraq. Other suggested options, such as an "80 percent solution" that excludes the Sunnis, or the division of the country into three parts, are not only inconsistent with reconciliation but would almost certainly pave the way to broader regional conflict and must be avoided.

American combat troops should be gradually redeployed away from intervening in sectarian conflict. That necessarily is a task for Iraqi troops, however poorly prepared they may be. Our troops should be redirected toward training the Iraqi Army, providing support and backup, combating insurgents, attenuating outside intervention and assisting in major infrastructure protection.

That does not mean the American presence should be reduced. Indeed, in the immediate future, the opposite may be true, though any increase in troop strength should be directed at accomplishing specific, defined missions. A generalized increase would be unlikely to demonstrably change the situation and, consequently, could result in increased clamor for withdrawal. But the central point is that withdrawing combat forces should not be a policy objective, but rather, the result of changes in our strategy and success in our efforts.

As we work our way through this seemingly intractable problem in Iraq, we must constantly remember that this is not just a troublesome issue from which we can walk away if it seems too costly to continue. What is at stake is not only Iraq and the stability of the Middle East, but the global perception of the reliability of the United States as a partner in a deeply troubled world. We cannot afford to fail that test.

Brent Scowcroft was national security adviser to Presidents Gerald R. Ford and George H. W. Bush. He is now president of the Forum for International Policy.

Another Thousand Lives (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

How long can this go on?

Saddam is dead. The weapons of mass destruction were a mirage. More than 3,000 American G.I.s and scores of thousands of Iraqis have been killed. Voters in the United States have made it clear that they no longer support American involvement in this exercise in sustained barbarism. Incredibly, the U.S. military itself is turning against the war.

And yet the president, against the counsel of his commanders on the ground, apparently is ready to escalate — to send more American lives into the fire he set in Iraq.

In a devastating critique of the war, the newsweekly Army Times led its current edition with the headline: "About-Face on the War — After 3 years of support, troops sour on Iraq." The article detailed a Military Times Poll that found, for the first time, that "more troops disapprove of the president's handling of the war than approve of it."

Only a third of the service members surveyed approved of the president's conduct of the war, while 42 percent disapproved. Perhaps worse was the finding that only half of the troops believed that success in Iraq was likely.

The service members made it clear that they were not attacking their commander in chief personally. His overall approval rating remained high. What has turned them off has been the wretched reality of the war. In the article, David Segal, director of the Center for Research on Military Organization at the University of Maryland, said, "They're seeing more casualties and fatalities and less progress."

In other words, they're seeing the same thing everybody else is seeing — except, perhaps, Mr. Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0112266

On New Year's Day, readers of The New York Times could see the excruciating photo layout of the latest 1,000 American service members to die in Iraq. As in all wars, most of them were young. Many of them were smiling in the photos. All of them died unnecessarily.

The war has been an exercise in futility and mind-boggling incompetence, and yet our involvement continues — with no end in sight, no plans for withdrawal, no idea of where we might be headed — as if the U.S. had fallen into some kind of bizarrely destructive trance from which it is unable to awaken.

And who is paying the price for this insanity — apart from ordinary Iraqis, who are paying the most grievous price of all? The burden of the war in the U.S. is being shouldered overwhelmingly by a contingent of Americans whom no one would categorize as economically privileged.

As Lizette Alvarez and Andrew Lehren wrote in Monday's Times:

"The service members who died during this latest period fit an unchanging profile. They were mostly white men from rural areas, soldiers so young they still held fresh memories of high school football heroics and teenage escapades. Many men and women were in Iraq for the second or third time. Some were going on their fourth, fifth or sixth deployment."

There is no way that this can be justified. It is just wrong.

I've said many times that if a war is worth fighting the way to do it is to mobilize the entire country, drawing the warriors from as wide a swath of the population as possible and raising taxes on everyone as part of an all-out effort to defeat a common enemy.

This war is not worth fighting. And if there were ever serious talk about enacting a draft or raising taxes to fight it, you'd see quickly enough that the vast majority of Americans would not find it worth fighting.

There must be a leader somewhere who can shake the U.S. out of this tragic hypnotic state, who can see that it is beyond crazy to continue our involvement in this war indefinitely, to sacrifice another 1,000 young lives, and then another thousand after that.

All of the tortured, twisted rationales for this war — all of the fatuous intellectual pyrotechnics dreamed up to justify it — have vaporized, and we're left with just the mad, mindless, meaningless and apparently endless slaughter.

Shakespeare, in "Henry VI," said: "Now thou art come unto a feast of death."

We should end our participation in the feast of death in Iraq. It is criminal to continue feeding our troops into the slaughter.

If there were politicians here at home with some of the courage of the troops in the field, we could begin saving lives rather than watching helplessly as the Bush White House continues to sacrifice them. Three thousand and counting is enough.

Suggester In Chief (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

An element of unreality has infected the speculation about President Bush's decision on a new strategy for Iraq. In the weeks since the Iraq Study Group issued its report and the president said he was going to canvass a variety of other sources before making up his mind, the assumption has grown that he will declare the next steps himself.

In reality, Bush's ability to act on his own is severely limited. His hands are tied both at home and abroad. At most, he can suggest what he would like to do, but he is dependent on others to actually do it.

The overseas constraints begin in Iraq, where any policy depends on the cooperation and dubious capacity of the struggling government in Baghdad. That government is consumed by factional fighting and has yet to find the will to deal with its own thuggish Shiite elements or to reach any kind of accommodation with the rebellious Sunni minority.

Cleaning up the corrupt and violence-prone national police force would be the first precondition for any plan to bring order to Iraq, and that is something only the Iraqis can do. Bush can wish it, but he cannot order it.

He is similarly constrained when it comes to improving the efficiency of Iraqi cabinet ministries, accelerating constitutional reform or securing an equitable division of oil royalties. Exhortation is his only tool.

Here at home, the limitations on his freedom of action are at least as tight.

The new Congress that starts today is not the same passive body that approved his decision to go to war and allowed him a free hand in managing or mismanaging the aftermath.

When the White House speculates about increasing the number of U.S. troops in Iraq for some indefinite period, it goes directly against the expressed policy wishes of the new Democratic majority and its most influential members. The incoming chairmen of the Senate Armed Services and Foreign Relations committees, Carl Levin and Joe Biden, have counseled strongly against such a course, and most of the Democrats in the House and Senate favor a gradual drawdown of American forces, not a buildup.

DOJ_NMG_0112267

As commander in chief, the president can order more troops into the war zone, but such a step would undoubtedly provoke the most angry domestic debate of his term.

The larger point made by the Iraq Study Group in its unanimous bipartisan report is that no policy for Iraq can succeed without broad public and congressional support. The nation and its elected representatives, as co-chairmen James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton warned, will not sustain the costs in lives and treasure it would take to rescue a deteriorating situation in Iraq unless there is broad agreement on the course of action.

Sending thousands more American troops into harm's way, when fewer than a fifth of Americans support such a step, is no way to build that support.

More and more of the president's fellow Republicans are making that point to him. Particularly significant were comments on Fox News on Sunday by Sen. Richard Lugar of Indiana, the outgoing chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

He expressed skepticism -- but not outright opposition -- to the idea of expanding the U.S. military presence in Iraq. But his main plea was for the president to take the temperature of Congress, by meeting personally with the Foreign Relations Committee and consulting seriously with its members, before settling on a policy for Iraq.

"The president needs some well-informed friends," Lugar said pointedly, and he warned Bush that people such as himself will not be ready to defend his decision if he simply waits and declares it after private discussions of the kind he has been holding within his war Cabinet.

After an election in which war-weariness was a motivating force for the defeat of Republican candidates, the president has to face the reality that the only decision on Iraq that can possibly command sustained public support is a collective decision shared with Congress -- not a personal order.

Any action he takes may still be thwarted by Iraq's own divisions. But if he does not bring Congress and both parties into the process, the policy will inevitably fail. He has to face that reality.

davidbroder@washpost.com

Negroponte To Leave Intel Director Post (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON - National Intelligence Director John Negroponte will resign after 20 months in the job to become deputy secretary of state, two U.S. government officials said Wednesday night.

Negroponte took over in April 2005 as the nation's first intelligence chief, responsible for overseeing all 16 U.S. spy agencies. He will return to his roots as a career diplomat to become the No. 2 to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, the officials said.

One of the officials said that the timing of Negroponte's departure was uncertain but that it was expected soon. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because there has been no announcement of the move.

Negroponte, 67, is stepping down as President Bush develops a new strategy on Iraq. The president has ordered reviews from his own agencies and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which recommended a series of changes to reverse the "slide toward chaos."

Negroponte has held a series of tough posts in the Bush administration and has been at the center of the Iraq debate since before the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003. He served as U.S. ambassador to the U.N. from 2001 to 2004 and ambassador to Baghdad until March 2005 before becoming intelligence chief. He also was ambassador to Mexico, from 1989-93.

Democrats taking control of Congress on Thursday have promised greater oversight of government agencies. The Senate Intelligence Committee, for instance, is planning hearings this month on the intelligence overhaul that Negroponte helped put in place.

A top candidate for the intelligence chief opening is retired Adm. Mike McConnell, the director of the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996. McConnell is now a senior vice president at Booz Allen Hamilton, a government contractor and consulting firm.

A message left at McConnell's office Wednesday night was not immediately returned.

Negroponte's transition to the State Department must be confirmed by the Senate, as would Bush's choice for his replacement. Both changes will create new openings for the Democrats to debate the administration's intelligence and foreign policy direction.

The Office of the National Intelligence Director and the White House both declined to comment on Negroponte's resignation, which was first reported by NBC News.

The State Department also had no comment, but one official confirmed that Negroponte is to become deputy secretary of state. This official noted Negroponte's diplomatic credentials as a former ambassador.

DOJ_NMG_0112268

In an interview with C-SPAN last month, Negroponte indicated that he wanted to stay on through the Bush administration.

Yet his answer to the question — will he "stay with it for a while?" — didn't close the door to a new assignment. Since last summer, it has been said he was interested in the vacancy at the State Department.

"In my own mind at least, I visualize staying with it through the end of this administration and, then I think, probably that'll be about the right time to pack it in," he told C-SPAN.

Robert Zoellick resigned as Rice's deputy in July to take a position with the Wall Street firm Goldman Sachs. She is said to have approached several candidates for what is widely regarded as a plum assignment, going for months without any takers.

Negroponte's departure creates uncertainty for the position of national intelligence director, which grew out of concerns over intelligence failures before the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Congress established the post in late 2004, following the recommendation of the Sept. 11 commission. Bush tapped Negroponte to set up the new office from scratch.

He brought together experts to focus on how the government collects and analyzes intelligence and helped create new organizations, including the National Counterproliferation Center, which studies the spread of weapons.

Yet, it has been at times a struggle for Negroponte and his staff to bring all 16 spy agencies together under one umbrella. Critics have questioned whether his staff of 1,500 is becoming another clumsy bureaucracy, even as it tries to avoid the intelligence lapses of 9/11 and Iraq.

In public speeches, Negroponte has praised efforts across government to strengthen intelligence, but also stressed its limitations.

"Intelligence is not a panacea — far from it — but we are making progress in intelligence reform, and that is important," he said recently.

Negroponte Stepping Aside As Top Spy To Become Deputy Secretary Of State (USAT)

By Alan Gomez

USA Today, January 4, 2007

National Intelligence Director John Negroponte will resign his position overseeing the nation's 16 spy agencies to become the deputy secretary of State, administration officials confirmed Wednesday night.

A senior State Department official said the announcement could come as early as this week. The official, and other administration officials who confirmed the appointment, spoke on condition of anonymity because the announcement will come from President Bush.

Negroponte's move comes as Bush finalizes a new course for the war in Iraq.

Negroponte, 67, was the first to head the newly created Office of the Director of National Intelligence in 2005.

The office was designed to consolidate the information and capabilities of the separate and sometimes bickering intelligence agencies. Congress created it on the recommendation of the 9/11 Commission and as a response to the intelligence failures and lack of communication between spy agencies leading up to the Sept. 11 attacks.

Tying together the agencies has been difficult.

Rep. Pete Hoekstra, who was head of the House Intelligence Committee, said this summer that the office was "not adding any value" by enlarging the bureaucracy. The Michigan Republican said the office had actually lengthened the time necessary to make things happen in the rapidly changing world of national intelligence.

"We want them to be lean and mean," Hoekstra said.

Hoekstra acknowledged that communication among agencies had improved, and Negroponte's staff pointed to a list the office compiled of 200,000 known terrorists.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who would be Negroponte's direct supervisor, questioned the nation's intelligence apparatus after the Bush administration was surprised by Hamas' victory in last January's Palestinian elections.

"Nobody saw it coming," she said.

In an interview with C-SPAN last month, Negroponte indicated that he wanted to stay on through the Bush administration.

Yet his answer to the question — will he "stay with it for a while?" — didn't close the door to a new assignment.

"In my own mind at least, I visualize staying with it through the end of this administration and, then I think, probably that'll be about the right time to pack it in," he told C-SPAN.

Negroponte's move must be confirmed by the Senate.

If confirmed, he would return to the same department where he made his rise in Washington.

A career diplomat, Negroponte rose to assistant secretary of State in the Reagan administration before becoming deputy national security adviser.

He then served as ambassador to Mexico, the Philippines, the United Nations and most recently Iraq from June 2004 to March 2005.

It was not immediately clear who would fill Negroponte's position.

The job of his No. 2 has been vacant since Gen. Michael Hayden became the CIA director in May.

Intelligence Chief Is Shifted To Deputy State Dept. Post (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 — John D. Negroponte, whom President Bush installed less than two years ago as the first director of national intelligence, will soon leave his post to become the State Department's second-ranking official, administration officials said Wednesday.

Mr. Negroponte will fill a critical job that has been vacant for months, and he is expected to play a leading role in shaping policy in Iraq. But his transfer is another blow to an intelligence community that has seen little continuity at the top since the departure of George J. Tenet in 2004 as director of central intelligence.

Mr. Negroponte had been brought to the intelligence job to help restore credibility and effectiveness to agencies whose reputations were badly damaged by failures related to the attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, and mistaken prewar assessments of Iraq's illicit weapons. He has maintained a low public profile but provides Mr. Bush with a briefing most mornings.

President Bush has hailed the establishment of the intelligence post as an essential step in helping prevent another terrorist attack. On paper, the director of national intelligence outranks the deputy secretary of state, raising questions about why the White House would seek — and why Mr. Negroponte would agree to — the shift.

The move, expected to be announced this week, comes as the president prepares to announce a new strategy for Iraq as sectarian violence worsens there and approval ratings sag at home.

The administration has had great difficulty filling the State Department position. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has asked several people who have turned down the post, according to senior State Department officials.

But administration officials interviewed on Wednesday would not say whether Mr. Negroponte was moving because the White House saw him as uniquely qualified for the diplomatic post, or because President Bush was dissatisfied with his performance as intelligence chief, or whether it was a combination of the two.

Mr. Negroponte has served as ambassador to the United Nations and to Iraq, and administration officials say Ms. Rice was trying to recruit him to bring more Iraq expertise to her office.

Administration officials from two different agencies said Wednesday that the leading candidate to become the new intelligence chief is J. Michael McConnell, a retired vice admiral who led the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996. Admiral McConnell was head of intelligence for the Joint Chiefs of Staff under Gen. Colin L. Powell during the first Persian Gulf war, in 1991.

Mr. Bush had at first been reluctant to set up the intelligence post, but ultimately bowed to Congressional pressure and for the first time made the office a cabinet-level position.

As deputy secretary of state, Mr. Negroponte, who would need Senate confirmation for the post, would fill a pivotal foreign policy position that has been vacant since Robert B. Zoellick resigned to take a post at Goldman Sachs.

The shift of Mr. Negroponte, first reported Wednesday evening by NBC News, marks a further transformation in President Bush's foreign policy team that has already seen Robert M. Gates take over as defense secretary from Donald H. Rumsfeld. Mr. Bush still has other top posts to fill, including that of ambassador to the United Nations, left vacant with the departure of John R. Bolton.

Mr. Negroponte would move to the State Department as the administration is preparing a shift in Iraq strategy.

As a career diplomat who also served as ambassador to Mexico, the Philippines and Honduras, Mr. Negroponte brought a policymaker's perspective to the role of intelligence chief, a post established by Congress at the end of 2004 to address a lack of coordination among intelligence agencies. He took over the job in April 2005, and said in an interview on C-Span last month that he expected to stay in his position until the end of the Bush administration.

Admiral McConnell is a career intelligence officer who is a senior vice president of Booz Allen Hamilton, an international consulting firm. During his tenure at the Pentagon and as director of the National Security Agency, Admiral McConnell worked closely with Mr. Gates during Mr. Gates's time as deputy national security adviser and as director of central intelligence, and with Dick Cheney while he was defense secretary during the first Persian Gulf war.

Senator Susan M. Collins, Republican of Maine and chairwoman of the Senate Government Reform Committee, was a major backer of the intelligence post, and on Wednesday she said of the reported transfer: "The director of national intelligence is an absolutely critical position. I'm disappointed that Negroponte would leave this critical position when it's still in its infancy. There are a number of people who could ably serve as deputy secretary of state, but few who can handle the challenges of chief of intelligence."

DOJ_NMG_0112270

Representative Jane Harman, a California Democrat who also pressed for establishment of the intelligence job, said: "I'm worrying that our deficit in intelligence will not be corrected. I'm sorry Negroponte isn't completing his term because he at least understood intelligence."

Mr. Negroponte's move to the State Department has been rumored for months. Ms. Rice was pushing to bring Mr. Negroponte in as her deputy, and officials in Washington speculated that the career diplomat might be more comfortable returning to the State Department.

The White House press secretary, Tony Snow, declined to comment on the change. "We don't comment on personnel matters until the president has announced his intentions," Mr. Snow said in an e-mail message Wednesday night.

Officials said that one of the priorities in replacing Mr. Negroponte had been to select someone who could pass swiftly through the Senate confirmation process. They also cautioned that the choice of Admiral McConnell was not final.

The job of deputy director of national intelligence is also vacant, and the White House is conscious that a long nomination battle in the Senate, where Democrats are now in the majority, could throw the intelligence office into disarray.

Negroponte To Become Rice's Deputy (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As President Bush crafts a new strategy for the war in Iraq, the White House is set to name U.S. spy chief John Negroponte to the No. 2 position at the State Department to help implement the changes.

Mr. Negroponte, a career diplomat who served as U.S. ambassador to Iraq for a year following Saddam Hussein's fall, will play a central role in executing the new Iraq strategy as well as broader shifts in U.S. Middle East policy, a senior U.S. official said. Mr. Bush is expected to announce his policy changes in a major speech next week.

Mr. Negroponte, 67 years old, fills a key position left vacant since the departure in July of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's previous deputy, Robert Zoellick, who concentrated mainly on China. Mr. Negroponte's departure from the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, however, will leave open the DNI's top two positions, potentially frustrating efforts to solidify changes in the intelligence community brought on by the 9/11 attacks. The 9/11 Commission has sought a strong central command to oversee Washington's 16 different intelligence agencies.

Mr. Negroponte's move to State may well just be one key shift as the administration looks to fill other top foreign-policy posts, American diplomats said. The current U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilizad, is seen as leaving Baghdad soon to become ambassador to the United Nations, following the departure last month of John Bolton. That would put two senior figures with experience in Iraq into crucial diplomatic posts as the administration is looking to remold Iraq policy and bulk up its efforts to restrain Iran.

Mr. Negroponte is "a major expert on Iraq and that's why this moves make sense," said the U.S. official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity. The State Department's deputy job is traditionally an administrative post whose demands don't normally allow one to concentrate on heavy policy work. Mr. Zoellick cited the frustrations of a full plate of issues and concerns when he left the job last year.

The pick of Mr. Negroponte will bring to State another centrist and foreign-policy pragmatist, though so far there is little sign that Ms. Rice or her boss in the White House intend to alter their course in marked ways in their final two years.

Mr. Negroponte was named to the newly created position of DNI nearly two years ago and has faced the difficult task of trying to merge Washington's spy agencies under one command. The DNI's deputy slot became vacant following the move last spring of Gen. Michael Hayden to the directorship of the Central Intelligence Agency. The U.S. official said he expected Mr. Negroponte's successor at the DNI to be named "expeditiously."

Negroponte To Leave Job To Be State Dept. Deputy (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has persuaded John D. Negroponte to leave his post as director of national intelligence and come to the State Department as her deputy, government officials said last night.

Negroponte's move would fill a crucial hole on Rice's team. She has been without a deputy since Robert B. Zoellick left in July for a Wall Street firm. It also comes as President Bush plans to announce a new Iraq strategy; as former Iraq envoy, Negroponte would be expected to play a major role in implementing that plan in his new role.

DOJ_NMG_0112271

Negroponte's decision to step down as the nation's top spy for a sub-Cabinet position marks a sudden reversal. Rice had earlier sought to recruit Negroponte -- as well as other high-profile figures -- for the job, but last month he insisted he was staying at his post.

"In my own mind at least, I visualize staying . . . through the end of this administration, and then I think probably that'll be about the right time to pack it in," he told C-SPAN in an interview broadcast Dec. 3. "I've pulled together a very good team, and they've stayed with me for the past 18 months," he said, "and I hope they'll stay with me as long as I'm in the job."

He reiterated that commitment in an interview with Washington Post editors and reporters on Dec. 14. Negroponte is the first person to hold the post of intelligence czar, created after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

NBC News first reported Negroponte's planned move to State. Administration officials said Negroponte's likely successor as head of U.S. intelligence is retired Navy Adm. John M. McConnell, who directed the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996 under President Bill Clinton. McConnell is now a senior vice president at Booz Allen Hamilton, the Washington contractor and consulting agency.

Government officials last night declined to say how Rice lured Negroponte, 67, though some had suggested earlier that he was unhappy as director of national intelligence and that he would like to return to his roots at the State Department. Negroponte was a Foreign Service officer from 1960 to 1997, serving as ambassador to the Philippines, Honduras and Mexico.

Even with a Democratic-controlled Senate, Negroponte should have little trouble winning confirmation. In the current administration, he has been confirmed as permanent U.S. representative to the United Nations, ambassador to Iraq and director of national intelligence.

One U.S. official said an official announcement will come later this week, probably tomorrow. White House and State Department officials declined to comment.

Observers have been puzzled at how long it has taken Rice to fill the deputy position in a period of intense diplomatic activity.

Rice gave Zoellick wide berth as her deputy. He had primary responsibility for relations with China, the crisis in Sudan, Latin America, economic affairs and Southeast Asia. In a first for a deputy secretary of state, he frequently allowed reporters on his plane when he traveled abroad.

Zoellick left a Cabinet post -- U.S. trade representative -- to take the job as Rice's deputy.

Intelligence Czar Moving To No. 2 State Dept. Post (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — John D. Negroponte, who in 2005 became the first director of national intelligence, overseeing the 16 U.S. spy agencies, will give up that job to become deputy secretary of State, U.S. officials said Wednesday evening.

A veteran diplomat, Negroponte, 67, joined the new agency at a time of growing concern over the failures of U.S. intelligence to anticipate the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and to accurately assess Iraq's illicit weapons programs before the 2003 U.S. invasion. By moving to the No. 2 diplomatic post, vacant since July, he would be returning to more familiar terrain.

A replacement for Negroponte has not been selected, a U.S. official said. But there was speculation that the post could go to J. Michael McConnell, a retired vice admiral who headed the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996. Attempts to reach McConnell, now a senior vice president at the McLean, Va., consulting firm Booz Allen Hamilton, were unsuccessful.

Negroponte's office declined to comment on why the director would cut short his service, which includes giving President Bush his daily intelligence briefing, for what is considered a lower-ranking position. But people close to Negroponte, who spent 37 years as a Foreign Service officer, said they believed he was not happy trying to better integrate sometimes-rivalrous organizations in a specialty outside his own.

The creation of the office Negroponte is leaving was the principal recommendation of the independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks. It was designed, in part, to ensure that the 16 spy agencies shared crucial information.

Some U.S. officials expressed surprise at the news of Negroponte's departure, first reported by NBC, since only last month he seemed to have silenced rumors that he might be taking the State Department job. In an interview broadcast Dec. 3 on C-SPAN, Negroponte said he expected to remain in his current post "through the end of this administration, and then, I think, probably that'll be about the right time to pack it in."

A formal announcement of his change in jobs is expected later this week.

Negroponte's talents will be welcome in the senior ranks of the State Department, which has been stressed by simultaneous crises in the Middle East and elsewhere and has lost several top officials in recent months. Some foreign diplomats have complained that it has became increasingly difficult to win top-level attention on even urgent issues, except for critical items related to the Middle East.

The previous deputy secretary, Robert B. Zoellick, focused mostly on the issues of China, East Asia and trade. Negroponte, who earlier served as the first U.S. ambassador to Iraq, would come to the State Department as the Bush administration formulates a new strategy for U.S. involvement there.

Traditionally, the deputy functions as a kind of chief operating officer for the State Department, in charge of budgets and policy planning. But in practice, the assignments of those in that post have varied widely, depending on the wishes of the secretary and the deputy's own talents.

One State Department official said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other officials would "obviously love to have" Negroponte, who "has had about every kind of big job there is. His resume is pretty hard to top."

The official noted that Negroponte had been ambassador to Mexico, the Philippines and Honduras as well as Iraq. He was U.S. ambassador to the United Nations before the Iraq invasion and was a deputy national security advisor during the Reagan administration, serving under then-national security advisor Colin L. Powell.

His new position requires Senate confirmation. That is not seen as an obstacle, even with the Democrats in control of the Senate; he won confirmation to his current job by a 98-2 vote.

John Brennan, a former senior CIA official and former head of the National Counterterrorism Center, said it would be natural for someone with Negroponte's background to want the deputy State Department post.

"The deputy secretary of State position is usually the aspiration of all officers," Brennan said. "I think that's where his heart is: I think that's where his talent is and his knowledge is."

Some intelligence specialists predicted that Negroponte's departure from the intelligence post would not create great turmoil, as he has been there only a relatively short time.

Mark Lowenthal, a former high-ranking CIA official, predicted that if McConnell was chosen for the intelligence post, the spy agencies would find him "very different from Negroponte. He has more background in intelligence. He comes in fresher than Negroponte — he's had the chance to see how this thing has run without being involved in it.

"I think what's missing right now is a sense of leadership and direction," he said. "After all the community has been through in the last several years — from 9/11 to Iraq to the creation of the DNI — they could use a more inspirational leader."

After joining Booz Allen, McConnell initially sought to steer clear of contracts dealing with the intelligence community, focusing instead on e-commerce and Internet security initiatives. But colleagues said he had become increasingly involved in intelligence-related contracts and was recently approached by the Bush administration about becoming Negroponte's deputy — a position that opened when Michael V. Hayden was confirmed as CIA director. McConnell turned down the offer, but remained on the Bush administration's radar.

Brennan said that if McConnell was given the job, his "objective would be to try to steady the intelligence ship, to continue to have it move forward on coordination and integration, not do a lot that's going to disrupt things or try to put something in place that might not have the legs to be realized under his tenure."

Saddam Execution Video Leads To Arrests (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 4, 2007

Iraqi authorities reported the arrests Wednesday of two guards and an official who supervised Saddam Hussein's hanging and said the guard force was infiltrated by outsiders who taunted the former leader and shot the video showing his body dangling at the end of a rope.

The unauthorized video, which ignited protests by Saddam's fellow Sunni Arabs in various Iraqi cities, threatens to turn the ousted dictator into a martyr. Saddam was shown never bowing his head as he faced death, and asking the hecklers if they were acting in a manly way.

The Bush administration sent conflicting signals Wednesday about the taunting and baiting that accompanied the execution, with the White House declining to join criticism of the procedure and the State Department and U.S. military publicly raising questions about it.

Saddam, who was convicted for the killings of 148 Shiites, was dignified and courteous to his American jailers up to the moment he was handed over to the Iraqis outside the execution chamber, a U.S. military spokesman said.

He "was courteous, as he always had been, to his U.S. military police guards," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell said. "He spoke very well to our military police, as he always had. And when getting off there at the prison site, he said farewell to his interpreter. He thanked the military police squad, the lieutenant, the squad leader, the medical doctor we had present, and the colonel that was on site."

Although Saddam "was still dignified toward us," Caldwell said his demeanor changed "at the prison facility when the Iraqi guards were assuming control of him."

DOJ_NMG_0112273

National Security Adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie and two other top officials variously reported one to three men were being questioned in the investigation into who heckled Saddam as he was minutes from death and took cell phone pictures of his execution.

"The investigation has already had an arrest warrant against one person and two to follow," al-Rubaie told CNN. He said the guard force at the execution was infiltrated by an Arab television station or another outsider.

The clandestine footage appeared on Al-Jazeera television and Web sites just hours after Saddam was hanged Saturday. The tumultuous scenes quickly overshadowed an official execution video, which was mute and showed none of the uproar among those on the floor of the chamber below the gallows.

Sami al-Askeri, a Shiite lawmaker who advises Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, said two "Justice Ministry guards were being questioned. The investigation committee is interrogating the men. If it is found that any official was involved, he will face legal measures."

A second key al-Maliki adviser, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information, said, "In the past few hours, the government has arrested the person who videotaped Saddam's execution. He was an official who supervised the execution and now he is under investigation."

Prosecutor Munqith al-Faroon, one of 14 official witnesses to the execution, told The Associated Press that he saw two government officials using camera phones at the hanging.

"I saw two of the government officials who were ... present during the execution taking all the video of the execution, using the lights that were there for the official taping of the execution," he said. "They used mobile phone cameras. I do not know their names, but I would remember their faces."

Caldwell said no Americans were present for the hanging and that the tumultuous execution would have gone differently had the Americans been in charge.

As the storm over the handling of the hanging gained strength, Caldwell was among several U.S. officials who suggested displeasure with the conduct of the execution.

"If you are asking me: 'Would we have done things differently?' Yes, we would have. But that's not our decision. That's the government of Iraq's decision," the general said.

The White House declined to join in the criticism.

"The president is focused on the new way forward in Iraq so these issues are best addressed out of Iraq, out of Baghdad," deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel said. "Prime Minister Maliki's staff have already expressed their disappointment in the filmings, so I guess we'll leave it at that."

Stanzel said the U.S. military and the U.S. Embassy in Iraq had expressed concerns about the timing of the execution and about "the process and what took place."

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said U.S. officials had questioned holding the execution on a Muslim festival day, the opening of Eid al-Adha, and as well as some procedures.

U.S. Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor said Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and his diplomatic team "did engage the government of Iraq on issues relating to procedures involved in the timing of the execution (of Saddam), given the upcoming holy days. While the government of Iraq gave consideration to U.S. concerns, all decisions made regarding the execution were Iraqi decisions based on their own considerations."

Wednesday's remarks by U.S. officials were the first public confirmation of reports that the Americans had questioned the timing of the hanging.

The second-guessing over the conduct of the execution came as Iraqi and Arab media and an Iraqi government official said preparations were under way to hang two of Saddam's co-defendants in the next few days but that the details still have to be worked out with the American military.

A Cabinet official, speaking anonymously because of the sensitivity of the information, said the two men would hang "at the beginning of next week."

Caldwell said those executions, like Saddam's, were the responsibility of the Iraqi government. "It's a sovereign nation. It's their system. They make those decisions."

Saddam's half brother Barzan Ibrahim, a former intelligence chief, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, the former chief justice of the Revolutionary Court, were originally scheduled to hang with Saddam. But their execution was delayed until after Eid al-Adha, which ended Wednesday for Iraq's majority Shiites.

Al-Arabiya satellite television and Al-Furat TV, run by Iraq's major Shiite Muslim political organization, both reported that Ibrahim and al-Bandar would go to the gallows on Thursday. However, Mariam al-Rays, an al-Maliki adviser, called such reports "baseless."

DOJ_NMG_0112274

In Washington, U.S. Supreme Court Chief Justice John Roberts denied a request by a lawyer for Bandar to block the U.S. military from transferring custody of the condemned man to Iraqi authorities.

U.N. human rights chief Louise Arbour, backed by new Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, appealed to Iraqi President Jalal Talabani to prevent the execution of Ibrahim and al-Bandar, saying she was concerned with "the fairness and impartiality" of their trials.

Despite Misgivings, White House Says Little Against Hanging (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 — The White House declined Wednesday to criticize the conduct of the execution of Saddam Hussein, even as State Department officials and military leaders in Baghdad raised questions about the timing of the hanging and the way the condemned dictator was taunted by Shiite guards as he stood on the gallows.

Spokesmen for President Bush said he had not seen the video of the execution, and Mr. Bush himself refused to answer questions about it. Appearing in the Rose Garden with his cabinet to talk about a balanced budget, the president turned his back and walked away when a reporter called out to ask whether he believed that the hanging had been handled appropriately.

The circumstances surrounding the hanging have prompted public demonstrations among Mr. Hussein's Sunni loyalists in Iraq and outrage around the world. Yet, while Bush administration officials said in quiet background conversations that they agreed that the execution was bungled, the White House insisted in public on Wednesday that the president was concentrating on the future of Iraq and that he was content to leave the investigation to the Iraqis.

"The most important thing to keep in mind is, this is a guy who killed hundreds of thousands of people and received justice," said Tony Snow, the White House press secretary. Mr. Snow said too much attention had been paid to "the last two minutes" of Mr. Hussein's life and not enough to the previous 69 years.

With Mr. Bush set to make a major speech, possibly as soon as next week, outlining a new strategy in Iraq, the handling of the execution has put the White House in a difficult position. The president in November proclaimed Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki "the right guy for Iraq." Now Mr. Maliki faces international criticism for his decision to press ahead with the hanging, and questions about whether he is as committed as Mr. Bush to reconciling sectarian differences in Iraq.

The execution was carried out at the onset of a major Islamic festival that began on Saturday for Sunnis and on Sunday for Shiites. Mr. Hussein was subjected to mockery and cries of "Moktada!" — a reference to Moktada al-Sadr, the Shiite cleric whose militia has been responsible for attacks against Sunnis.

"It really was disappointing to see that they didn't have better control over the execution, so that you wouldn't have had that scene, with the demonstration from Moktada's supporters," said a senior administration official in Washington, speaking on condition of anonymity, to avoid the appearance of interfering in Iraq's sovereign affairs.

But another official said that the White House had decided the execution did not "rise to the level of a presidential comment" and that it was best to let other parts of the administration do the talking.

In Baghdad, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the top American military spokesman, conceded that the United States would have handled the execution differently, but said that the final decisions were up to the Iraqi government. The State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said that American officials had raised questions last week about the timing of the hanging, but that the execution had been warranted as the result of what he called a "very solid" judicial proceeding. He acknowledged that television images of Mr. Hussein being taunted at the gallows could further inflame tensions.

"This happened," Mr. McCormack said. "It wasn't supposed to have happened, but it happened."

Iraq Defends Hanging, But Holds Hussein Guard (NYT)

By James Glanz And John F. Burns

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 3 — The Iraqi prime minister's office on Wednesday mounted its first public defense of the way the government carried out the execution of Saddam Hussein, and said that Iraqi authorities had detained a guard who they believed was involved in recording the moment in a macabre and unauthorized video that has generated revulsion around the world.

Iraqi officials, in their effort to dampen the video's impact, tried to challenge the impression it conveyed that Mr. Hussein, for all his brutal crimes, had behaved with far more dignity in his final minutes than his seemingly thuggish executioners.

"The execution operation has been mischaracterized for political purposes," said Sadiq al-Rikabi, an adviser to Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who was present at the execution. Mr. Rikabi asserted that it had been carried out properly. "What has happened is not an insult or degradation," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0112275

But even as Mr. Maliki's government tried to defend its actions, the United States military, which had held Mr. Hussein in custody until it transferred him to Iraqi authorities about an hour before he was hanged, sought to distance itself from any responsibility for the scenes revealed in the video.

"You know, if you're asking me, 'Would we have done things differently,' yes, we would have," said Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, an American military spokesman in Baghdad, at a news briefing on Wednesday.

"But that's not our decision," he added. "That's an Iraqi government decision."

The reaction from the American military seemed to widen a rift that has been opening recently between the Shiite-led government of Mr. Maliki and its American supporters on a range of issues. They include the government's tolerance of militias, the recent discovery of the unofficial presence of Iranian military officers in Baghdad and the swiftness with which the Iraqis put Mr. Hussein to death after his appeals had been exhausted.

Mr. Maliki's office confirmed Wednesday that until Mr. Hussein's final hours, the American Embassy had sought to delay the execution long enough to avoid having it on a Muslim holiday and to resolve some remaining legal issues.

"The Americans wanted to postpone it," said Maryam al-Rayas, a legal adviser to the prime minister. The decision to go ahead, Ms. Rayas said, was "a victory for the Iraqi government."

The prime minister had decided that beginning the new year with Mr. Hussein dead trumped all other considerations, including the advice of the embassy, said Ms. Rayas, who also characterized the time frame as reasonable.

"There was no rush," she said.

The Iraqi government's detention of one of the guards generated some skepticism, with some Iraqi officials suggesting that Iraq was seeking a low-level scapegoat to blame for the almost Gothic display of intimidation and death that the images depict.

Mr. Rikabi refused to name or otherwise characterize the guard who had been arrested other than to say that he was being held in Baghdad after an investigation had determined that he had shot the video with a cellphone camera.

But Munkith al-Faroun, who was the prosecutor at Mr. Hussein's trial and was present at the execution, has said publicly that 2 of the 14 Iraqi officials and court representatives flown in by American helicopters to witness it were openly videotaping the event with cellphones.

When asked about Mr. Faroun's statements, Mr. Rikabi said, "I do not have this information."

On Wednesday, The New York Times erroneously quoted Mr. Faroun as saying that one of the officials he had seen holding up a cellphone during the execution was Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Mr. Maliki's national security adviser. Mr. Rubaie, in a telephone interview from London, said that along with all the Iraqi officials who were flown to the execution block by American helicopter, he had been searched at the Green Zone helipad and that his cellphone and even his keys were taken from him.

"I did not have a cellphone in the execution chamber," he said.

But, further undermining the assertion that only a single guard had videotaped the execution, Mr. Rubaie said he had seen "two or three" others in the official contingent who did have cellphones. He suggested that they might have been among officials who arrived at Camp Justice, the American camp in northern Baghdad where the hanging took place, by car.

The failure to call more senior officials to account raised suspicions among some Iraqis. "They want to blame it on a guard," one senior Iraqi official said.

Mr. Rubaie told CNN that there could have been as many as two others in the guard contingent who were associated with that scheme.

In the wake of the video's release, there were continuing condemnations of the way justice was meted out to Mr. Hussein after he lost his case in a court specially set up to judge crimes committed during his rule. On Wednesday, the United Nations high commissioner for human rights, Louise Arbour, renewed a previous call for restraint in carrying out the executions of two of Mr. Hussein's co-defendants who were also sentenced to death.

The manner of Mr. Hussein's execution appeared to give a boost to the remnants of his outlawed Baath Party. In the town of Huwaish, north of Baghdad, hundreds of people led by gunmen calling themselves the "mujahedeen of the Baath Party" marched in protest, and in the once prosperous Baghdad neighborhood of Monsour, a large black banner proclaimed that Mr. Hussein's death would set off fighting against "the Americans and their followers."

The banner was signed, in nicely printed lettering, "Baath Party."

At the same time, one of Mr. Hussein's most ruthless enforcers, Izzat Ibrahim al-Douri, who has eluded his American pursuers for nearly four years, was named the Baath Party leader on one of its Web sites. Although the claim could not be independently verified, Mr. Douri has long been considered a leader of the Baathist insurgency.

Asked repeatedly to describe how the American military would have carried out the execution differently, General Caldwell declined to elaborate, saying that the question was hypothetical, since the Iraqis were in control once they received custody of Mr. Hussein outside the execution block.

"It was not our decision as to what occurred at that point, but we would have done it differently," General Caldwell said.

DOJ_NMG_0112276

Still, Mr. Rikabi, the prime minister's political adviser, said that the government rejected all criticism of the execution, including the point at which one of the guards shouted, "Moktada! Moktada! Moktada!" as Mr. Hussein stood on the trapdoor of the gallows — a reference to Moktada al-Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric who leads the militia called the Mahdi Army.

The exclamation came at the end of a standard Muslim prayer that both the guards and Mr. Hussein were saying aloud, Mr. Rikabi said. But the guards were from the Shiite south, where Mr. Sadr is popular, and the prayer there typically ends with the reference to him, Mr. Rikabi said.

"If you go to any mosque in Karbala or Najaf you will hear them shouting like that," he said. "This is their habit."

Seemingly contradicting his own government, Mr. Rubaie said he was ashamed of what had happened during the execution, which he described as "unacceptable" and "disgusting."

"It is not professional, it's the wrong thing to do, and it should not have happened," he said. "But it shouldn't divert the mind of the people from the crimes that Saddam has been condemned to death for."

Guard Accused Of Recording Hanging (USAT)

By James Palmer

USA Today, January 4, 2007

BAGHDAD — The person suspected of illicitly recording Saddam Hussein's execution was arrested Wednesday, an adviser to Iraq's prime minister said.

Mariam al-Rayes, a Shiite lawmaker with close ties to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's office, said a security guard had been arrested and accused of shooting video at the execution at dawn Saturday. The guard was not identified.

The clandestine footage, which was widely available around the world, showed an unruly scene in which the former Iraqi dictator was taunted and cursed in the moments before his death. The video sparked protests among Saddam's fellow Sunni Arabs and some international condemnation.

Britain's Deputy Prime Minister John Prescott described the manner of Saddam's hanging as "deplorable" and the leaking of the mobile phone recoding as "totally unacceptable."

MORE: U.N. chief appeals to Iraqi president

Al-Rayes called the recording and subsequent replay by Iraqi TV stations "an act by those working against the Iraqi government." She said the government had appointed a three-man commission to determine who shouted taunts at Saddam as he stood on the gallows.

There were conflicting reports about how many people have been targeted in the government investigation into the execution.

"The investigation has already had an arrest warrant against one person and two to follow," Iraqi national security adviser Mouwafak al-Rubaie told CNN. He said the guard force at the execution was infiltrated by an Arab television station or another outsider.

The United States distanced itself from the way in which Saddam, who was convicted for the killings of 148 Shiites in 1982, was executed.

"We had absolutely nothing to do with the facility where the execution took place," said Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, a U.S. military spokesman. "We did not dictate any requirements."

Caldwell said the United States would have handled the execution differently. "That was not our decision. That was the government of Iraq's decision. This is a sovereign nation, and they're going to learn from each thing they do," he said.

Caldwell said the military had no alternative but to release Saddam into the custody of the Iraqi government once his final appeal of the death sentence was denied. He said Saddam had been courteous to his American captors and thanked the guards and medical personnel who had cared for him.

The official video of the hanging, which never showed Saddam's actual death, was muted and gave the impression of a dignified execution.

The illicit video, apparently shot on a cellphone camera, showed Shiite officials mocking Saddam. The video inflamed sectarian passions in a country already on the brink of civil war.

Some of the last words Saddam heard, according to the video, were a chant of "Muqtada, Muqtada, Muqtada," a reference to Muqtada al-Sadr, the radical anti-American Shiite cleric whose Mahdi Army militia is believed responsible for killings that have targeted Sunnis and driven many from their homes.

In other Iraq news:

U.S. troops detained 23 people suspected of having ties to senior al-Qaeda leaders during raids in western Iraq, the military said. The raids took place in Ramadi, the capital of Iraq's volatile western Anbar province.

DOJ_NMG_0112277

Four Americans and an Austrian abducted in November in southern Iraq spoke briefly and appeared uninjured in a video believed to have been recorded nearly two weeks ago and delivered Wednesday to the Associated Press.

U.S. Voices Misgivings On Execution (WT)

By David R. Sands And Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

Senior U.S. officials yesterday expressed unease with the Iraq government's handling of the execution of Saddam Hussein, as officials in Baghdad made final preparations to hang two of the former dictator's closest aides.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said U.S. officials raised concerns last week about the timing of Saturday's execution, held on the first day of a major Sunni Muslim holiday, and whether it conformed to Iraq's own legal processes.

In Baghdad, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, spokesman for the U.S. military, also questioned the raucous final moments of Saddam's execution. An unauthorized cell-phone camera recording, widely shown on Arab-language television, shows Saddam being heckled and insulted by Shi'ite Muslims in the crowd as the noose is being placed around his neck.

"If you are asking me, 'Would we have done things differently?' -- yes, we would have," Gen. Caldwell said in a briefing. "But that's not our decision. That's the decision of Iraq's government."

Iraqi authorities reported the arrests yesterday of two guards and an official who supervised Saddam's hanging and said the guard force was infiltrated by outsiders who taunted the former leader and shot the video showing his body dangling at the end of a rope.

Iraqi officials also said they plan to proceed as early as today with the execution of two of Saddam's closest aides and co-defendants -- former intelligence chief Barzan Ibrahim, Saddam's half brother, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, former chief justice of the Revolutionary Court.

The two were originally sentenced to die alongside Saddam for their role in the 1982 killings of 148 Shi'ite Muslims after a failed assassination attempt against Saddam, but their execution was delayed so Saddam could be "executed on a special day," said Moffawak al-Rubaie, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's national security adviser.

Both Gen. Caldwell and Mr. McCormack said no U.S. officials were present at Saddam's hanging or had any say on Saddam's treatment after he was transferred to Iraqi control shortly before his death.

Gen. Caldwell said Saddam thanked his American jailers for the way they treated him as they sent him to his death.

"Saddam ... was dignified, as always, he was courteous as he always had been to his U.S. military police guards," he told reporters in Baghdad.

Mr. McCormack noted that the al-Maliki government has expressed unhappiness with the manner in which the execution was carried out, ordering an investigation to determine who shot the cell-phone video that was quickly leaked to the press.

"It wasn't supposed to have happened, but it happened and the Iraqi government is launching an investigation into it," the State Department spokesman said.

Sunni Muslims have staged protests in the wake of Saddam's death, but Gen. Caldwell said there has been no spike in violence since the hanging, which occurred on the first day of a major Islamic religious holiday that ended yesterday.

In New York, U.N. officials stepped up their criticism of the Iraqi trials that produced the death sentences, appealing to Baghdad to postpone the executions of Saddam's two co-conspirators.

Louise Arbour, the world body's top human rights official, and Philip Alston, the U.N. special rapporteur on capital punishment, cited concerns about the conduct of Saddam's trial, the hasty appeals process and the unruly final moments of the dictator's life.

Mr. Alston, a law professor at New York University, said, "The Iraqi government engaged in an unseemly and evidently politically motivated effort to expedite the execution by denying time for a meaningful appeal and by closing off every avenue to review the punishment."

Mrs. Arbour appealed directly to Iraqi President Jalal Talabani to block the planned executions, saying international law gave both condemned men the right to seek commutation of their sentences or to ask for a pardon.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said President Bush had not seen the footage of Saddam's execution. The president was far more focused on fashioning a new strategy for winning the war in Iraq, Mr. Snow said.

Both Mr. Snow and Mr. McCormack rejected criticisms of the Iraqi trial that led to Saturday's execution, saying Saddam was given a much fairer day in court than the vast number of Iraqis who died at the hands of his regime.

"At the end of the day, justice was served to Saddam Hussein," Mr. McCormack said.

Baghdad Downplays Saddam Recording (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0112278

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

The Iraqi government distanced itself on Wednesday from the scandal surrounding the recording of Saddam Hussein's execution as reports that two other members of his regime would shortly face the gallows looked set to inflame violence.

Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, who was an official observer at the hanging, disavowed the behaviour in the execution chamber, where the former dictator was captured on grainy mobile phone images being taunted by masked executioners. He told CNN that the execution was "not a sectarian lynching" but that some of the behaviour in the execution chamber had been "unacceptable".

The Dubai-based Al Arabiya satellite network and al-Furat TV, run by one of the country's main Shia Islamist political movements, both broadcast that Barzan Ibrahim, Saddam's half-brother and former intelligence chief, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, the former chief justice of the Revolutionary Court, would be put to death on Thursday.

Mr Ibrahim and Mr Bandar were convicted alongside Saddam on November 5 on charges related to the campaign of reprisals ordered against the village of Dujail, where the deposed president suffered a 1982 assassination attempt.

New executions could ignite sectarian tensions heightened by the manner in which Saddam's execution was carried out. A recording of the hanging that has circulated widely both inside and outside Iraq shows at least one of the guards chanting loudly a religious invocation associated with the radical Shia Sadrist movement.

Officials quoted by news agencies said the government had arrested the person who made the recording, although that could not be confirmed independently. Hameed Majeed, a prime ministerial media adviser, said that a guard had been arrested, while another person, quoted anonymously, said the arrested man was an "official".

The recording has become emblematic to many in Iraq of the degree to which radical Shia sentiment has penetrated the state.

The Bush administration waded into the controversy, revealing that it had "raised issues with respect to procedures and timing" of the hanging with the Iraqis.

Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman, declined to give details but echoed Major General -William Caldwell, the US military spokesman in Baghdad, who said the US "would have done things differently". Officials stressed, however, that justice had been done and that what happened in the last two minutes of Saddam's life should not be compared to the crimes he committed over many years.

Guard At Hanging Blamed For Covert Video Of Hussein (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 3 -- The Iraqi government's dismay over the unauthorized release of footage of Saddam Hussein's execution led to the arrest Wednesday of a security guard who used a cellphone camera to record the hanging, according to an adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The prime minister's political adviser, Sadiq al-Rikabi, said Iraqi authorities are questioning the guard to see whether he acted independently or was working with others to undermine the government's desire to reveal only a brief portion of the execution. Rikabi would not identify the guard, who had not been charged, or say where he was being held.

The video, which spread widely on the Internet, shows an unruly spectacle in which an onlooker taunts Hussein by yelling, "Go to hell." Another voice is heard chanting, "Moqtada, Moqtada, Moqtada," in reference to Moqtada al-Sadr, the Shiite Muslim cleric who leads one of Iraq's most powerful militias.

The video outraged Sunni Muslim loyalists of Hussein and was condemned by some Western leaders, such as Britain's deputy prime minister, John Prescott, who called the images "unacceptable."

The release of the footage was "a mistake. It was not something proper or acceptable," Rikabi said. "This execution was not an open event, to have been seen by the people all over the world. This is an implementation of justice, and we needed just a small piece about the execution, just to show the people this is Saddam," he said.

Rikabi said cellphones and cameras were collected from witnesses after the execution to prevent such an incident.

The allegation that a security guard was responsible for the grisly unofficial video was contradicted by the deputy prosecutor in Hussein's trail, Munqith al-Faroun, an official witness to the execution. He said he watched two other official observers using their cellphones to record the execution, but no guards.

Faroun insisted that "it was those who accompanied us who took that video, and I'm responsible for what I say. Maybe one of the guards did it secretly, but there were two officials who were doing it openly."

U.S. officials have privately expressed frustration that Hussein was executed just four days after an appeals court upheld his death sentence and at the start of a Muslim holiday, Eid al-Adha.

DOJ_NMG_0112279

"The ambassador and U.S. mission personnel did engage the government of Iraq on issues relating to procedures involved, and the timing of the execution given the upcoming holy days," said Lou Fintor, a U.S. Embassy spokesman in Baghdad. "While the government of Iraq gave consideration to U.S. concerns, all decisions made regarding the execution were Iraqi decisions based on their own considerations."

During a briefing for reporters in Baghdad on Wednesday, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell stressed that the United States was not responsible for how the execution was conducted.

"If you are asking me, 'Would we have done things differently?' Yes, we would have," Caldwell said. "But that's not our decision. That's the government of Iraq's decision."

In Washington, White House spokesman Tony Snow said attention should focus on Hussein's crimes. "There seems to be a lot of concern about the last two minutes of Saddam Hussein's life and less about the first 69 [years] in which he murdered hundreds of thousands of people," he said.

Calls for clemency continued Wednesday for two other former Iraqi officials sentenced to hang for their participation in the killings of 148 people from the village of Dujail in the 1980s.

U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights Louise Arbour issued a statement saying she "directly appealed" to Iraqi President Jalal Talabani to stay the executions of Awad Haman Bander, the former chief justice of the Revolutionary Court, and Barzan Ibrahim, Hussein's half brother.

"The concerns that I expressed just days ago with respect to the fairness and impartiality of Saddam Hussein's trial apply also to these two defendants," Arbour said.

Rikabi said he did not know when the two would be executed. Another Maliki adviser, Mariam Rayis, said on al-Arabiya television that the executions would not take place Thursday but might occur after the holiday ends Saturday.

Meanwhile, a video appeared on the Internet on Wednesday that purports to show five Western security contractors -- four Americans and an Austrian -- who were kidnapped Nov. 16 when their convoy was ambushed in southern Iraq.

In the video, one of the hostages says, "I'm well, my friends are well. We've been treated well."

Fintor, the U.S. Embassy spokesman, said he was aware of reports of the video but declined to comment further. He said U.S. officials remain in contact with the families of the kidnapped contractors and continue to call for their release.

The U.S. military announced Wednesday that a soldier was killed Dec. 31 when a roadside bomb exploded near a patrol south of Baghdad. The soldier's name was not released pending notification of family members.

The daily discovery of bodies continued Wednesday as Iraqi national police patrols found 35 corpses, 25 of them in Baghdad, according to Col. Khalaf Jalil of the Interior Ministry. A roadside bomb exploded in southwest Baghdad, killing a policeman and wounding two others, he said.

Special correspondents Saad al-Izzi and Waleed Saffar and other Washington Post staff in Iraq, and staff writer Peter Baker in Washington contributed to this report.

From Hussein, A Florid Farewell To The Iraqi People (NYT)

By Marc Santora and John F. Burns

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 3 — The dictator sat alone in his cell, three years in American custody. His beard had gone gray, his sons were dead and the gallows were being readied.

Saddam Hussein in those final days turned to poetry, so often his source of solace in times of difficulty, inspired by his vision of himself as inseparably tied to those he led.

The poem, “Unbind It,” is his rallying call to be sounded from the grave.

It is a mixture of defiance and reflection, but no remorse. No mention of the tens of thousands of lives he was responsible for taking. No expression of guilt or sadness or regret.

The poem, flush with florid phrases that were his trademark, begins with what sounds like a paean to the love between himself and his people, who were about to lose him.

Unbind your soul. It is my soul mate and you are my soul’s beloved.

No house could have sheltered my heart as you have.

He moves quickly to more aggressive language. He refers to the foreigners who swept him from power and to the Iraqis who rose to rule here in his place.

The enemies forced strangers into our sea
And he who serves them will be made to weep.
Here we unveil our chests to the wolves
And will not tremble before the beast.

DOJ_NMG_0112280

The verses were written by Mr. Hussein after he was sentenced to death and, according to his relatives, are believed to be his last written words.

A handwritten copy of the poem was passed along by the Iraqi authorities to his family in Tikrit, along with his final will and testament, according to Mr. Hussein's cousin Muayed Dhamin al-Hazza.

Mr. Hazza read the poem on the telephone, saying he hoped Mr. Hussein's farewell would underline the manner in which the execution was carried out.

Iraqi and American officials confirmed that a poem left among Mr. Hussein's belongings at the American military detention center was delivered to his family.

In the poem, Mr. Hussein praises those who continue to fight for the Iraqi nation and condemns the "wolves" who have brought ruin through their invasion. He portrays himself as a martyr.

His poetry, like his speeches at decisive moments of his dictatorship, was often obscure, highly alliterative and difficult, even for Arabic speakers, to comprehend fully.

At the height of his power, Iraqis brave enough to discuss the subject would shake their heads at his rambling speeches and convoluted verse. Some would suggest, with glances over their shoulders, that in his efforts to show himself as a scholar of Arab history and literature, he inadvertently revealed some of the darker recesses of his mind.

According to news reports, Mr. Hussein even made gifts of his poetry to his American captors.

Iraqis familiar with his style helped translate his death cell poem. Sections that would have been unintelligible in a literal translation have been interpreted loosely in an attempt to reveal the meaning Mr. Hussein intended.

He is most clear when talking about how he sees himself in light of his impending death.

I sacrifice my soul for you and for our nation

Blood is cheap in hard times.

Mr. Hussein told his official biographer that he cared little what people thought of him when he was alive, but that he hoped to be revered as one of the giants of history — as a Nebuchadnezzar or Saladin — 500 years from now.

He ordered that one in every 10 bricks used in reconstructing the ancient palace at Babylon be stamped with his name or an eight-pointed star to symbolize the eight letters in his name in the Arabic alphabet.

For a man whose vanity was in proportion to his brutality, he appears, from the poem, to have seen himself as dying for a greater good. It was a theme he returned to repeatedly in the courtroom where he was condemned to death for crimes against humanity, telling the judges that he was speaking to history.

Many Iraqis viewed the thousands of portraits of Mr. Hussein erected around the country — in business suits, as warrior, as Arab sheik — as a sort of guidebook to his illusions about himself. Even as his secret police murdered tens of thousands, he sealed himself off with the conviction that he was widely loved.

One of his favorite books was "The Old Man and the Sea," but his style could not be mistaken for Hemingway. No short crisp sentences for Mr. Hussein.

While still in power, he wrote, at least in part, two romantic novels. "Zabibah and the King," which is set in a fanciful Arabia of long ago, tells of a lonely king who, while powerful, feels cut off from his liegemen. He encounters Zabibah and is entranced by her beauty and wisdom. But outsiders soon invade the kingdom, which is described as the cradle of civilization, and Zabibah is raped — on Jan. 17, a reference to the beginning of the Persian Gulf war of 1991.

When the book was released, Central Intelligence Agency analysts reportedly pored over it searching for clues into Mr. Hussein's mind.

But they could just as easily have turned to "The Old Man and the Sea," which Mr. Hussein had first read as a young man in a different prison: "A man can be destroyed not defeated."

In that spirit, he urges his followers to be fierce and noble, saying:

We never kneel or bend when attacking

But we even treat our enemy with honor.

Iraq Postpones Execution Of Saddam Aides (AFP)

By Sabah Jerges

AFP, January 4, 2007

Iraq postponed hanging two of Saddam Hussein's henchmen amid international pressure following the ousted dictator's bungled and much criticised hanging.

Meanwhile, two justice ministry guards are being held for questioning in connection with the secret filming of Saddam's final moments.

DOJ_NMG_0112281

Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, Saddam's half brother and former intelligence chief and Awad Ahmed al-Bandar, the head of the revolutionary court, were to have been hanged on Thursday after the end of the Eid al-Adha holiday.

But a senior official from Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's office, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the execution was postponed "due to international pressure."

Baha al-Araji, an influential Shiite lawmaker from radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr's parliamentary bloc, said: "I am sure it will be done on Sunday."

On Wednesday, UN spokeswoman Michele Montas said United Nations Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon was opposed to the death penalty.

"The Secretary General strongly believes in the wisdom of Article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which states everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person," she said.

"He fully endorses the call made today by (UN High Commissioner for Human Rights) Louise Arbour for restraint by the government of Iraq in the execution of the death sentences imposed by the Iraqi high tribunal," she added.

The US military has expressed concern over the manner in which Saddam was hanged, saying it would "have done things differently", and Britain has condemned the leaking of the video.

On November 5, Saddam, Barzan and Bandar were found guilty of ordering the judicial murder 148 Shiite men and boys from the village Dujail in the 1980s, and sentenced to death for crimes against humanity.

Saddam's execution five days ago has angered members of Iraq's Sunni minority and triggered criticism from observers who felt he was humiliated minutes before put to death.

A top Iraqi official denied defended its conduct.

"Where was the humiliation? The shouting of the crowd?" demanded Iraq's National Security Advisor Mowaffaq al-Rubaie, who was present at the execution, during an interview on CNN.

A grisly unofficial video released after Saddam was hanged showed one of the members of the execution party shouting the name of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, a bitter opponent of Saddam.

The two-and-half minute film shot on a mobile telephone camera has spread like wildfire on the Internet and triggered angry outbursts within the Sunni Arab community of Iraq and from international leaders.

One of those present at the execution could be heard shouting "Moqtada! Moqtada! Moqtada!" at a sneering Saddam, inspiring some observers to compare the execution to a sectarian lynching.

"Basically they were doing their congregational prayers and supplications, and they mentioned at the end of their supplication the name of Moqtada," Rubaie said.

"I can't see where is the humiliation, to be quite honest. Moqtada, Moqtada, Moqtada is not a dirty word, not an obscene word, they were not cursing."

Rubaie also explained why the executioners and Iraqi officials danced around Saddam's body after the hanging.

"This is the tradition of the Iraqis -- when they do something they dance around the body and they express their feelings," he said.

"What is wrong with that? If that upsets the feelings of some of the Arab nations and Arab rulers, I think: 'The best of luck to them'.

"To the best of my knowledge and belief after I left the scene I was proud of what had happened and it was played by the book, but when the video was released I saw some wrongdoing and this has to be addressed," he said.

Shiite deputy Sami al-Askari, who was also present at Saddam's execution, said two justice ministry guards had been held for questioning.

"Two guards who are employees of the justice ministry have been held, but there are no charges against them yet," he told AFP.

The Ugly Death Of Saddam Hussein (NYT)

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

Saddam Hussein deserves no one's pity. But as anyone who has seen the graphic cellphone video of his hanging can testify, his execution bore little resemblance to dispassionate, state-administered justice. The condemned dictator appeared to have been delivered from United States military custody into the hands of a Shiite lynch mob.

For the Bush administration, which insists it went to war in Iraq to implant democracy and justice, those globally viewed images were a shaming embarrassment. Unfortunately, all Americans will be blamed, while the Iraqi people are now likely to suffer still more. What should have been a symbolic passage out of Iraq's darkest era will instead fuel a grim new era of spiraling sectarian vengeance.

DOJ_NMG_0112282

The ugly episode shows why Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki is never likely to produce the national unity government that Washington keeps demanding and that Iraq so desperately needs.

Mr. Maliki is now scrambling to extricate himself from the public relations disaster. Yesterday, his office announced the arrest of a guard who allegedly took the unauthorized video. But the fundamental blame belongs to Mr. Maliki, who personally orchestrated the timing and circumstances of last Saturday's execution.

Mr. Maliki ignored pleas for delay from Washington and the legal niceties of Iraq's Constitution. He rushed to deliver Mr. Hussein's death as a holiday gift to his hard-line Shiite constituency, especially followers of the radical cleric and militia leader Moktada al-Sadr, who were allowed to chant abuse at the condemned dictator while he stood at the gallows with the noose around his neck.

Mr. Maliki's usual cheerleaders, President Bush and Britain's prime minister, Tony Blair, have distanced themselves from this repellent spectacle. Yet the Bush administration again finds that it has little credibility to lecture anyone on the basic dignity due to detainees. The Washington Post reported yesterday on an internal F.B.I. investigation that revealed a pattern of deliberate taunting of the religious beliefs of Muslim prisoners at Guantánamo.

As Mr. Bush prepares his latest plan for Iraq, he must face up to bleak realities. As of January, 2007, Iraq lacks an army capable of standing on its own. It lacks a justice system that puts the rule of law over political expediency, while its police force is dominated by sectarian militias and thugs. Most crucially, it lacks a government committed to protect the rights and personal safety of all Iraqis.

Most Americans, whatever their view of the war, understand that the rule of Saddam Hussein brought a murderous curse and untold suffering upon the Iraqi people. Mr. Hussein has now gone to his grave. But the outrageous manner of his killing, deliberately mimicking his own depraved methods, assures that his cruelty will outlive him.

The Voices On The Gallows (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

This is a column I never expected to write.

I never expected to say that the Iraqis who put Saddam Hussein to death made the sadistic dictator look almost noble by their own depraved standards of behavior in that moment.

The mishandled execution carries a larger message that President Bush must absorb for the decisive address he plans to give on Iraq as early as next week: If Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and his aides cannot control a gallows chamber containing 20 people, how can they hope to manage a country that is disintegrating under the weight of religious and ethnic hatreds?

Was Maliki's office complicit in a grisly in-your-face payback by the prime minister's Dawa Party for Hussein's atrocities against its founders and Iraqis at large? Or -- and this could be worse -- did Maliki's people fail to foresee the consequences of their rush to rid themselves of this troublesome prisoner? Either way, the result is a sharp setback for a strategy that depends on national unity to underpin an orderly, secure U.S. exit from Iraq.

Iraqi national unity -- as conceived and manipulated by the Bush administration for its own ends -- has turned out to be fool's gold. (Unfortunately, I did expect to write that, and did so several times in the past year.) Bush now faces the prospect of an insurgent "government" declaring control over Anbar province and other Sunni-dominated areas in a matter of months -- with open support from Iraq's Arab neighbors -- if trends continue.

The urgent issues raised by Hussein's execution are political ones rather than judicial or moral ones. In a moral sense, there is no such thing as a dignified execution. So it is pointless to have wished for one for Saddam Hussein. The taking of a life, even one as despicable as his was, is a tragic moment.

But by turning the event into an occasion for settling 30-year-old scores, Hussein's executioners prevented it from being the chapter-ending event in Iraqi history that it should have been. They also inadvertently exposed the damaging inconsistencies of a U.S. policy that has repeatedly assumed that national unity encompassing Iraq's Shiite majority, its once-privileged Sunni minority and the Kurdish tribes of the north could be brought by Washington to the Iraqis, group by group.

While Washington sought to placate the Sunnis with political compromises and constitutional amendments that were either meaningless or beyond U.S. ability to deliver, the Sunnis responded with a "vote and fight" campaign to regain complete power.

Past American complicity with Hussein contributed to rising fears among Shiites of being abandoned again and to their own savage drive for revenge and protection through retaliatory atrocities. And as recently as November, senior U.S. officials visited Kurdistan to lecture the semi-independent Kurds on why they should be happy to surrender, for the sake of national unity, much of the prosperity and protection they have achieved. The Kurds smiled and promised nothing.

The White House hoped to form a bloc of "moderate" Shiites and Kurds in an "80 percent solution" that would either encourage or force Maliki to renounce the political alliance his Dawa Party has with the radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. Instead of helping Maliki maintain Shiite unity and co-opt Sadr's forces into a political role, U.S. officials made clear that they would not rest until Sadr was destroyed.

DOJ_NMG_0112283

That is one reason the outbursts praising Sadr at Hussein's hanging were so damaging. They demonstrated the continuing close links between Dawa and Sadr -- and the U.S. failure to change them in any meaningful way.

Bush now faces a far more radicalized situation than he did when he endorsed the national unity effort nearly a year ago. Announcing that he is putting an additional 30,000 U.S. troops into Iraq in pursuit of the same chimeras he has been chasing will not postpone disaster. He must instead set radical political goals.

"He should announce that the United States will turn over the Green Zone to the Iraqi government," an Iraqi friend -- who lives outside the U.S.-protected enclave that contains the U.S. Embassy and the homes and offices of Iraqi leaders -- said by telephone from Baghdad. "Our leaders meet there and say things are fine, protected from what their followers are doing to each other elsewhere. That might force them to get to work on the political settlement we need."

This symbolic proposal is meant to encourage the United States to step back from trying to impose an outside blueprint on Iraq's warring factions. Those factions must now find an internal balance on their own -- or watch their country quickly split into three warring entities.

jimhoagland@washpost.com

Saddam Should Have Been Studied, Not Executed (LAT)

By Richard Dawkins

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

THE OBVIOUS objections to the execution of Saddam Hussein are valid and well aired. His death will provoke violent strife between Sunni and Shiite Muslims, and between Iraqis in general and the American occupation forces. This was an opportunity to set a good example of civilized behavior in dealing with a barbarically uncivilized man. In any case, revenge is an ignoble motive. If President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair are eventually put on trial for war crimes, I shall not be among those pressing for them to be hanged.

But I want to add another and less obvious objection: Hussein's mind would have been a unique resource for historical, political and psychological research, a resource that is now forever unavailable to scholars.

Imagine that some science-fiction equivalent of Simon Wiesenthal built a time machine, traveled back to 1945 and returned to the present with a manacled Adolf Hitler. What should we do with him? Execute him? No, a thousand times no. Historians squabbling over exactly what happened in the Third Reich and World War II would never forgive us for destroying the central witness to all the inside stories, and one of the pivotal influences on 20th century history. Psychologists, struggling to understand how an individual human being could be so evil and so devastatingly effective at persuading others to join him, would give their eyeteeth for such a rich research subject.

Kill Hitler? You would have to be mad to do so. Yet that is undoubtedly what we would have done if he hadn't killed himself in 1945. Hussein is not in the same league as Hitler, but, nevertheless, in a small way his execution represents a wanton and vandalistic destruction of important research data.

He should have been locked up, by all means. Kept him in jail for the rest of his life, to be sure. But to execute him was irresponsible. Hussein could have provided irreplaceable help to future historians of the Iran-Iraq war, of the invasion of Kuwait and of the subsequent era of sanctions culminating in the invasion. Uniquely privileged evidence on the American government's enthusiastic arming of Hussein in the 1980s is now snuffed out at the tug of a rope (no doubt to the relief of Donald Rumsfeld and other guilty parties; it is surely no accident that the trial of Hussein neglected those of his crimes that might — no, would — have implicated them).

Political scientists of the future, studying the processes by which unscrupulous leaders arise and take over national institutions, have now lost key evidence forever. But perhaps the most important research in which a living Saddam Hussein could have helped is psychological. Most people can't even come close to understanding how any man could be so cruel as Hitler or Hussein, or how such transparently evil monsters could secure sufficient support to take over an entire country.

What were the formative influences on these men? Was it something in their childhood that turned them bad? In their genes? In their testosterone levels? Could the danger have been nipped in the bud by an alert psychiatrist? How would Hitler or Hussein have responded to a different style of education? We don't have a clear answer to these questions. We need to do the research.

Are there lots of Husseins and lots of Hitlers in every society, with most ending up as football hooligans wrecking trains rather than dictators wrecking countries? If so, what singles out the minority that do come to power? Or were men such as these truly unusual? What can we do to prevent them gaining power in the future? Are there changes we could make to our political institutions that would make it harder for men of Hitler's or Hussein's psychological types to take them over?

DOJ_NMG_0112284

These questions are not just academically fascinating but potentially of vital importance for our future. And they cannot be answered by prejudice or preconception or intuitive common sense. The only way to answer them is by research. It is in the nature of research on ruthless national dictators that the sample size is small. Wasn't the judicial destruction of one of the very few research subjects we had — and a prime specimen at that — an act of vandalism?

Richard Dawkins, An Evolutionary Biologist, Is A Professor At Oxford University.

Soldier Reaches Plea Deal In The Killing Of 3 Iraqis (NYT)

By Paul Von Zlielbauer

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

A soldier from the 101st Airborne Division is scheduled to plead guilty next Tuesday to a reduced charge for mercy killing in connection with the death of three unarmed Iraqi men shot by American infantrymen last spring, according to lawyers for other defendants in the case.

The terms of the plea arrangement will allow the soldier, Specialist Juston R. Graber, originally charged with capital murder, to be convicted of aggravated assault and to receive a nine-month prison sentence in exchange for his testifying against three other members of his squad, the lawyers said.

The three other soldiers, members of the same company as Specialist Graber in the division's Third Brigade, still face courts-martial on premeditated-murder charges, making them eligible for the death penalty or, barring that, life in prison. Army prosecutors have accused them of carrying out an impromptu plan, following a raid on a marshy island northwest of Baghdad, to kill the three Iraqis after cutting off their plastic handcuffs and forcing them to run, still blindfolded, from the squalid hut where they had been discovered.

The two soldiers accused of firing on the men as they fled — Specialist William B. Hunsaker and Pfc. Corey R. Clagett — have said they shot in self-defense after the three broke free from the thin "zip-tie" handcuffs and attacked them.

A third soldier, Staff Sgt. Raymond L. Girouard, the squad's ranking member, is accused of devising the plan to kill the men, then punching Private Clagett and cutting Specialist Hunsaker to give the appearance that they had been attacked.

None of these three defendants have entered a formal pea.

The guilty plea by Specialist Graber, to be entered before an Army judge at Fort Campbell, Ky., and his testimony against the other soldiers will make gaining their acquittal far more difficult than it would have been had all four kept a unified legal front, lawyers for the three others said.

"It changes the complexion of the entire case and makes the case much stronger against Clagett, Hunsaker and Girouard," said Paul Bergrin, a lawyer for Private Clagett who said he had not expected Specialist Graber to get "such an outstanding deal."

"It gives the government's case credibility and corroboration where they didn't have it before," Mr. Bergrin added. "It requires us to rethink our strategy."

Specialist Graber's two military lawyers, Capt. Shaun Lister and Capt. Will Suddeth, did not reply to e-mailed requests for comment or phone messages left with military officials at Fort Hood, Tex., where both are based. Their client's willingness to testify for the prosecution, though, was bitter news to the three other defendants.

Michael Waddington, a lawyer for Specialist Hunsaker, said Specialist Graber's plea arrangement felt like a betrayal, "especially when we've been disclosing our strategy" to his lawyers for months. Specialist Graber's legal team had joined with Mr. Waddington, Mr. Bergrin and Capt. Ted Miller, a lawyer for Sergeant Girouard, in a collaborative pact known as a joint defense agreement, which lawyers often create if their clients face similar charges in the same incident.

Defense lawyers said Specialist Graber's plea was not particularly surprising, given the disparity between the evidence against him and the charges he had faced.

According to the evidence, Specialist Graber made a last-second decision to shoot the dying man after a squad medic declared him beyond help and, according to sworn statements from soldiers not charged in the case, after Sergeant Girouard said, "Put him out of his misery."

But Army prosecutors nonetheless charged Specialist Graber, 21, with premeditated murder, creating an enormous incentive, defense lawyers for the three other soldiers said, for him to plead guilty to a lesser charge that more closely fit the crime.

The first court-martial in the case will be Private Clagett's, scheduled to begin Jan. 15 at Fort Campbell, Mr. Bergrin said. Two other soldiers, Sgt. Leonel Lemus and Pfc. Bradley Mason, are expected to testify for the prosecution that they heard Sergeant Girouard conceive a plan to free the Iraqi men from their handcuffs and have Private Clagett and Specialist Hunsaker kill them.

DOJ_NMG_0112285

But Mr. Bergrin said he would call a powerful witness of his own: Col. Michael Steele, the brigade commander, who, according to several soldiers' sworn testimony, told some soldiers to "kill all military-age males" they encountered during the raid, on May 9.

Colonel Steele's lawyer, Lt. Col. Raymond A. Jackson, said on Wednesday that Colonel Steele had never given such an order, a denial putting him at odds with several soldiers under his command.

The Army has granted Colonel Steele immunity to testify, Mr. Bergrin said, and once on the stand and under oath, "he's going to have to tell the truth."

Groups Large And Small Mark 3,000th U.S. Death (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, January 4, 2007

As the toll in Iraq passes 3,000 U.S. troop deaths, Americans are holding vigils and ceremonies to mark the grim milestone, honor the fallen and plead for an end to the war.

"Our slogan is, 'Yes to the troops, no to the war,' " says Chuck Fager, organizer of one vigil near Fort Bragg in North Carolina.

The small gathering Wednesday afternoon at a traffic circle in Fayetteville, near the home of the Army's 82nd Airborne Division, was one of several this week across the country.

Nancy Lessin of Military Families Speak Out, an organization of military family members, says more than 200 commemorations were using the start of the new year to renew their call for an end to the war.

"The best way to honor those that have died is to make sure no more die," Lessin says.

In Fayetteville, the names of all U.S. troops killed in Iraq were tape-recorded by volunteers to be played during the vigil. In Charleston, W.Va., a muted gong was being sounded 3,000 times at a vigil outside the Robert C. Byrd Courthouse. In Boston, protesters carrying candles and pictures of the 45 Massachusetts servicemembers who have been killed, greeted commuters at the Park Street subway station Tuesday evening.

In Trenton, N.J., a small group of demonstrators assembled Wednesday afternoon outside the Statehouse, where the names of 52 military members from the state who died in Iraq were read and a bell was rung in their honor. Other ceremonies over the past week marked the milestone in Chicago and Kansas City.

Anne Chay, an Andover, Mass., high school teacher whose 19-year-old son has been in Baghdad with the Army since July, spoke at the Boston protest and again Wednesday night in Andover. This was her son's first Christmas away from home.

She described hearing a knock at the door in the night, fearing it could bring the message no mother wants to hear. She also voiced her feeling that the presence of U.S. troops was serving no good purpose.

"We don't appear to be welcome there," she said. "Hearing it firsthand from your son … it's just very discouraging.

Lessin, whose stepson has returned from Iraq with the Marines, says the change in control of Congress gives a new opportunity to press for an end to the war.

While the focus was on opponents of the war, other groups have gathered to demonstrate support for both the troops and the war.

Operation Support Our Troops held a candlelight vigil Christmas night outside Fort Lewis, Wash. Organizer Nadine Gulit, of Issaquah, Wash., whose three grandsons served in Iraq and Afghanistan, says she was saddened by the anti-war protests.

"The message that these protesters are sending to the kids is not what they need to hear," she says.

"The troops need to hear the positive, that the American people stand behind them, that they are not losing their lives in vain," Gulit says.

U.S. Military Deaths In Iraq Hit 3,005 (AP)

AP, January 3, 2007

As of Wednesday, Jan. 3, 2007, at least 3,005 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count. The figure includes seven military civilians. At least 2,407 died as a result of hostile action, according to the military's numbers.

The AP count is 12 higher than the Defense Department's tally, last updated Wednesday at 10 a.m. EST.

The British military has reported 127 deaths; Italy, 33; Ukraine, 18; Poland, 18; Bulgaria, 13; Spain, 11; Denmark, six; El Salvador, five; Slovakia, four; Latvia, three; Estonia, Netherlands, Thailand, two each; and Australia, Hungary, Kazakhstan, Romania, one death each.

The count includes two deaths listed by the Department of Defense that could not be verified as Iraq-related casualties by the AP.

DOJ_NMG_0112286

Since the start of U.S. military operations in Iraq, 22,565 U.S. service members have been wounded, according to a Defense Department tally.

Iraq's Woes Are Adding Major Risks To Childbirth (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Noor Ibrahim lay shivering underneath two blankets on a bed at al-Jarrah Hospital. Steps away was a red plastic bassinet. It was empty.

A few doors down, her recently born son lay wrapped in a pink blanket. He was a chubby boy of nearly nine pounds with a big patch of black hair. His eyes were closed, his head cocked to the left, his mouth slightly open, his skin soft and pale.

The boy was not in a bassinet. He was in a cardboard box. He was not heading to his mother's room. He was heading to the morgue.

"Fresh death," Ibrahim's obstetrician said as she reached into the box and lifted the boy's limp right arm, still covered in blood and amniotic fluid.

Giving birth is painful enough as it is. In war-torn Iraq, it's also becoming more dangerous.

Spontaneous road closures, curfews and gun battles make even getting to the hospital a challenge for expectant mothers. Once they arrive, the women have no guarantee that they will receive adequate health care from a qualified physician.

"It's spiraling downward. It's getting worse each day," said Annees Sadik, an anesthesiologist at al-Jarrah.

Iraq once had a premier health-care system. But the trade embargo of the 1990s and now the exodus of medical professionals have made it no better than a third-world system, doctors say. Hospitals lack the equipment, drugs and medical expertise to make labor easier or to handle complications.

Women are forgoing prenatal visits to doctors as a result. Fearful of going into labor during the nighttime curfew, they are having elective Caesarean sections. Others are relying on midwives in their neighborhoods.

Doctors, especially women, have been targeted by unknown groups for kidnapping and murder. The kidnappers often appear to be motivated by money, seizing professionals because they are among the wealthiest people in Iraq. But many Iraqis also say that insurgents are waging a campaign to eliminate the people with the skills most needed to rebuild Iraq.

As is often the case in Iraq, where bombs usually kill civilians rather than their intended targets, the death of Ibrahim's son was a matter of bad timing. Her mother-in-law, Amira Saeed, told their story as Ibrahim recovered at al-Jarrah. Ibrahim would later confirm the details.

Ibrahim felt labor pains at 9 p.m. Dec. 23 at her home in Madain, a town 15 miles south of Baghdad that has become a flash point for tension between Sunni and Shiite Muslims. Few ambulance crews are willing to pick up patients at night for fear of encountering death squads, militias or rogue police officers. Few doctors are willing to work at hospitals at that time for fear of kidnapping.

Ibrahim decided to bear the pain until morning rather than drive in the dark. At 3 a.m., her water broke. It was still too dark to go out. Once the sun rose, she, her husband and her mother-in-law drove to the public hospital in Madain.

When they arrived, there was no obstetrician and no anesthesiologist, Saeed recalled. A surgeon had just been kidnapped and the doctors refused to go to work. That left the nurses to deliver Ibrahim's baby.

For several hours, Ibrahim pushed. But her baby was big and she got tired. The nurses used forceps to try to pull him out. When that didn't work, they told her to go to another hospital, Saeed said.

The family decided to go to al-Jarrah, a private hospital in the Karrada district of Baghdad. The ambulance driver refused to take them into the capital, even after they offered to pay him, Saeed said.

Ibrahim, her husband and Saeed got back into their own car. They drove for 30 minutes, past several checkpoints, as Ibrahim's baby struggled to break free from her pelvis.An Exodus of Doctors

One of al-Jarrah's most experienced obstetricians carries a pistol to work.

She has received three death threats. Her ultrasound machine has been stolen. She agreed to speak to a reporter only if her name were not used because, she said, she feared for her life.

"I came here to serve my people," said the Iraqi-born and London-educated doctor, who wears a purple hijab, or head covering, and green scrubs when delivering babies.

According to a December 2006 report by the Washington-based Brookings Institution, 34,000 physicians were registered in Iraq before the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. Since then, about 12,000 have fled and 2,000 have been killed, it said.

At al-Jarrah, two doctors have been kidnapped and killed. Two were kidnapped and released. Three have left Baghdad. Thirteen remain on staff.

DOJ_NMG_0112287

"It's a campaign to drain the country," said Aviad Najeed, a surgeon at al-Jarrah. "A very, very well-organized one. We don't know who's behind it."

Sitting in their lounge, a windowless room with lockers and leather chairs, four doctors at al-Jarrah talked about the hope they had after the invasion. They recalled buying oranges and flowers to greet U.S. troops. They thought the Americans would bring the best technology and medicines.

The Iraqi health-care system was once considered one of the best in the Middle East, with the most up-to-date equipment and well-educated doctors. Iraqis could get basic health care free, and each town had at least one hospital. That changed when the U.N. Security Council imposed an embargo after Iraq invaded Kuwait, leading to the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

Medical instruments and drugs used to be shipped from Germany, France, Japan and Switzerland. Now, hospitals buy cheaper supplies from Egypt, Jordan and India, the doctors said.

At al-Jarrah, staff members do not have fetal monitors, so they use a trumpetlike device held over the womb, the doctors said. The delivery room has a chair with rusted metal footrests and an examining table with a hole in the leather cushion.

The hospital has three ultrasound machines, but no one to operate them at night because administrators cannot find a qualified person to stay at the hospital during the curfew.

And when the hospital runs out of blood, which it often does, staff members have to go to Baghdad's central blood bank, located in a neighborhood with frequent shootings, too dangerous for even an ambulance to reach. What do they do when they need blood at night? "We hope for sunrise," said Sadik, the anesthesiologist.

Many private hospitals have closed, and the public hospitals are overwhelmed by victims of the many car bombings and mortar attacks that happen across the city each day, the doctors said.

"I don't know why this is happening," said Najeed, a former military doctor who wore a gray suit and speaks perfect English. "Is this a punishment?"'They Killed Her Baby'

Ibrahim arrived at al-Jarrah on the afternoon of Dec. 24. She was in shock with a ruptured uterus and tears in her vagina.

The obstetrician performed an emergency Caesarean section. It was too late to save the baby. Now, the doctor had to concentrate on the mother.

The baby, the obstetrician said, died because the forceps had crushed his head. Ibrahim lived but might never be able to have another child.

"Look at this disaster," the obstetrician said as she lifted the baby's head, the top of which was slightly caved in. On the right side of his forehead was a spot of blood and a dark purple bruise.

"They killed her baby," the obstetrician said. Then she wrapped him in the pink blanket and sealed the box.

Women are increasingly asking doctors to schedule elective Caesarean sections to avoid experiences such as Ibrahim's, obstetricians said.

At al-Hayat Hospital in Baghdad, doctors used to perform 160 vaginal deliveries a week, said Maysoon Abbas, an obstetrician. As of Dec. 29, they had done 59 during the entire month.

Patients increasingly plead with her to let them have Caesareans before 5 p.m. because they don't want to drive to the hospital at night.

During curfew, ambulance drivers and even police officers sometimes charge women for rides to the hospital, or refuse to take their husbands out of fear that they are suicide bombers, doctors said.

"It's a tragedy," Abbas said. "It is a tragedy."

Unable or unwilling to go to hospitals, many women are receiving inadequate prenatal care, which is contributing to birth defects, doctors said. Al-Jarrah's obstetrician said she used to see one baby a week with congenital abnormalities. Now she sees five or six.

Many women are opting to go to neighborhood midwives when it is time to deliver.

Samira Najeeb, who delivers babies in a small room with pink walls next to her kitchen in her first-floor apartment in Karrada, insists that midwives are just as capable of delivering babies as doctors, despite having less formal training. Each year, she takes a one-month refresher course, she said.

Her mother was a midwife. Her sister is a midwife. Najeeb delivered her first baby when she was 12. Now 40, she keeps a handwritten record of the 350 or so babies she has delivered.

"When there's difficulty getting to the hospital, they come to me," she said. "Now work for me is better than before."A Mother's Painful Plea

In Ibrahim's room at al-Jarrah, 19 hours after their ordeal began, Saeed tended to her daughter-in-law. She had been wheeled out of surgery a few minutes earlier.

Ibrahim is 20 years old. She lost her father in the Iran-Iraq war when she was 2.

She lost her brother-in-law to a kidnapper four months ago.

DOJ_NMG_0112288

Saeed did not want to tell her yet that she had lost her newborn son as well.

After her father died, Ibrahim went to live with her aunt because her mother had too many children to care for. She did not go to high school or college and has never worked at a job, Saeed said. All Ibrahim ever wanted was to be a wife and a mother.

At age 16, she had her first son.

Saeed recalled that her own son, 26, Ibrahim's husband and the owner of an auto parts store, was reluctant to have a second child. Shootouts happen in broad daylight in their neighborhood. Mortar shells destroy homes. But Ibrahim was insistent. She was going to name her new son after her murdered brother-in-law.

Ibrahim moved in and out of consciousness as she recovered. Her lips quivered. She coughed. She told Saeed she was cold.

Saeed, a short, plump woman, took off her abaya and placed it on top of Ibrahim's blankets. "By the name of God, save her," she said, patting Ibrahim's curly, dark brown hair.

"Why am I here? Why am I feeling cold?" Ibrahim asked.

Saeed found a purple bathrobe and placed it on top of Ibrahim.

"My stomach hurts me," Ibrahim said.

She grew more agitated.

"What's wrong with my son?" she asked Saeed.

"Nothing is wrong with him," Saeed answered.

"Did he die?" Ibrahim asked.

"No, he didn't die. He's in the baby's room. He's very tired," Saeed said.

"I want to warm him up," Ibrahim said. "Please keep him warm."

Pentagon Helping Restart Iraqi Factories (AP)

By Pauline Jelinek

AP, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — As President Bush ponders how to salvage the Iraq military campaign, business minds at the Pentagon are moving ahead with a part of the equation _ fighting Iraq's unemployment and trying to boost its economy.

Under a new program, the Defense Department is already helping reopen factories that were owned by Saddam Hussein's government and abandoned by occupation authorities shortly after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. The Pentagon may also start providing them with contracts to support U.S. troops.

One factory restarted operations in the last two weeks, and nine more are to open by the end of this month, adding some 11,000 Iraqis to employment rolls, a Pentagon official said Wednesday. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because the information had not been released yet.

Pentagon officials declined to identify the facilities for fear they or their employees could be attacked amid the country's increasing violence.

Reopening factories that produced everything from cement to buses for Saddam's regime is among the ideas that have been discussed by Bush as he struggles to find the way forward in Iraq after nearly four years of war.

Bush is expected to announce a new Iraq strategy next week. He is widely expected to say he wants to send additional U.S. troops there.

Military commanders have long seen employment as one of the keys to slowing the violence. The idea of restarting factories differs from some previous reconstruction efforts that have had limited success in that it's aimed at providing long-term employment for factory workers as opposed to short-term jobs that came with individual rebuilding projects.

The Pentagon formed a task force six months ago that has identified some 200 factories _ producers of textiles, industrial equipment and other goods _ that could be restarted.

Paul Brinkley, deputy undersecretary of defense in charge of business modernization efforts, said in a recent interview that putting idle Iraqis back to work should help calm violence because it will leave fewer disgruntled men willing to plant bombs or commit other crimes for money.

"I believe there's an indisputable correlation between peoples' livelihoods ... and unrest, civil unrest, social unrest," he said.

Iraqi unemployment is thought to be from 20 percent to 60 percent, with inflation above 50 percent. More than 1.5 million Iraqis, mostly professionals, are believed to have fled abroad, according to the U.N. and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which recommended a new Iraq strategy to Bush last month.

Officials hope the factory reopenings will be the first wave in a series of restarts that will stretch throughout the next year to restore jobs lost after the 2003 invasion. At that time, occupation officials of the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority decided to do nothing with the government facilities, hoping they would quickly be taken over by the private sector.

DOJ_NMG_0112289

Privatization of the businesses never happened as violence gripped the country and disrupted the economy. But if the factories start producing and become well-functioning enterprises, that could be a step toward any privatization effort the new officials may decide upon.

Under the new program, private as well as government factories would be restarted. The American military expects to be among the customers for some of the restarted operations.

"We buy a lot of items, all kinds of items," such as cement and furniture, Brinkley said. "We import a portion of that. But if there are Iraqis who make things that we can buy, it just makes lots of good sense to buy it from Iraqis ... to stimulate the economy, build good will."

The U.S. military is spending more than $100 billion annually for the war. Brinkley said he hopes to spark the Iraqi economy by funneling some of it to newly restarted factories.

While the average worker in American supports four people, the average Iraqi workers supports 13, Brinkley said.

"For every Iraqi you put back to work, it has a huge cascading effect," he said.

5 Abducted In Iraq In November Appear Unhurt On Videotape (NYT/AP)

Associated Press

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 3 (AP) — Four Americans and an Austrian abducted in November in southern Iraq spoke briefly and appeared uninjured in a video believed to have been recorded nearly two weeks ago and delivered Wednesday to The Associated Press.

The men — security contractors for the Crescent Security Group based in Kuwait — appeared separately on the edited video. Three of them said they were being treated well. They were kidnapped Nov. 16 when suspected militiamen in Iraqi police uniforms ambushed a convoy of trucks being escorted by Crescent Security on a highway near the southern border city of Safwan.

“My name is John R. Young,” one captive in a blue-and-white sweat-suit said in the video. “I’m 44 years old. I’m from Kansas City, Mo. The date is 21 December, 2006. I’m well, my friends are well, we’ve been treated well.”

Another man identified himself as Jon Cote of Buffalo, N.Y. Fidgeting and appearing uncomfortable, he said: “I can’t be released until the prisoners from the American jails and the British jails are released.”

The captives were dressed in civilian clothes and spoke in flat, impassive tones. Some had their hands folded in their laps.

A United States Embassy spokesman, Lou Fintor, said that embassy officials were aware that a second tape of the captives was circulating but declined to comment further.

Another video of the captives surfaced last week and was reported by McClatchy Newspapers. It was believed to have been recorded two weeks after the men were kidnapped. The kidnappers were not seen or heard in the video that surfaced Wednesday, which lasted one minute and 40 seconds and was stamped with the dates Dec. 21 and Dec. 22, 2006. It began with an image of a Koran and a map of Iraq over a green background, changing to a title that read, “The National Islamic Resistance in Iraq. The Furkan Brigades. The captivity operation was done in the Safwan district in Basra.”

Safwan is a Sunni Arab city in a predominantly Shiite area. It was unclear whether the kidnappers were holding the contractors to put political pressure on the American-led occupation forces and the Iraqi government, or were seeking a ransom.

Four of the captives were seen sitting alone and cross-legged on a carpet, with black fabric hanging behind them. The video showed only the upper body of the fifth man, who identified himself as Paul Johnson Reuben of Buffalo, Minn., which is near Minneapolis. Mr. Reuben said that the date was Dec. 22, 2006 and that he wanted his family to know he was being treated well. Another man with a beard and a mustache identified himself as Bert Nussbaumer, an Austrian citizen.

Another captive identified himself as Josh Munz, 23, of Redding, Calif.

“I joined the Marine Corps in 2001, and I got out in 2005,” Mr. Munz says. “After I got out of the Marine Corps, I went to work in the construction business, building swimming pools. After that, in July of 2006, I started working for Crescent Security out of Kuwait, and I don’t know how long I’ve been here doing this, but today is December 21, 2006.”

Mr. Reuben’s mother, Johnnie, was happy to hear that her son apparently recorded another video on Dec. 22. “That’s recent, that’s more recent. That makes me more hopeful,” she said Wednesday.

In Vienna, Austria’s Foreign Ministry said it was trying to get a copy of the video to confirm its authenticity, said a spokeswoman, Astrid Harz. Ms. Harz said the parents of Mr. Nussbaumer, 25, had been informed about the existence of the video. The audiotape that surfaced last week, containing a statement from Mr. Nussbaumer, appeared to be authentic, the Foreign Ministry said.

NATO Vows To Reduce Afghan Civilian Deaths (WP/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0112290

By Jason Straziuso

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

KABUL, Jan. 3 -- NATO officials said Wednesday that the organization's forces had killed too many Afghan civilians during fighting last year against a resurgent Taliban movement and would work to change that in 2007.

The acknowledgment came one day after President Hamid Karzai's latest plea for foreign forces to use maximum caution following the deaths of two civilians, reportedly involving NATO troops.

"The single thing that we have done wrong, and we are striving extremely hard to improve on, is killing innocent civilians," Brig. Richard E. Nugee, chief spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force, said at a news conference.

Nugee said the alliance has been reviewing measures to reduce the number of civilian casualties, but he did not elaborate.

NATO forces were accused of killing dozens of civilians in airstrikes, battles and other engagements last year, prompting Karzai to issue several pleas for international forces to use greater caution in their operations.

Still, Nugee said, NATO forces had killed far fewer civilians than the Taliban had.

"There is absolutely no comparison to be made," he said. "The Taliban are killing significant numbers of their own people and showing no remorse at all."

Insurgents launched 117 suicide attacks in 2006, about a sixfold increase over 2005, killing 206 Afghan civilians, 54 Afghan security personnel and 18 NATO soldiers, according to NATO.

Karzai, in a statement Tuesday, expressed "deep regret" over the deaths of two civilians in Nangahar province a few days earlier. The Afghan Interior Ministry had said foreign troops were involved, although a NATO spokesman, Maj. Dominic Whyte, said no NATO or U.S.-led coalition soldiers were responsible.

NATO airstrikes in the Panjwayi district of southern Kandahar province in October reportedly killed dozens of civilians, including 20 members of one family, according to Afghan authorities. A joint Afghan-NATO investigation into the incident has never been released. The New York Times has reported that the investigation found 31 civilians were killed.

DOJ:

GTSI Wins $42M Justice Department Contract (WASHBIZ)

Washington Business Journal, January 4, 2007

Less than a month after winning an IT modernization contract from the Federal Aviation Administration worth as much as $63 million, GTSI has landed a $42 million contract from the Department of Justice.

GTSI says the contract calls for workstation, desktop and laptop computers as part of the Justice Department's efforts to standardize interoperability among its various offices, bureaus and divisions. GTSI is the sole recipient of the three year contract.

GTSI, which resells computer equipment and provides IT services, will work with computer maker Hewlett Packard for the Justice Department contract.

GTSI had been facing a Jan. 9 deadline to file its second and third quarter 2006 financial reports, along with restatements of 2003, 2004, 2005 and first quarter 2006 financial results. It filed its financial reports on Dec. 22, removing the risk of a Nasdaq delisting.

The company said in August it was restating financial results because of accounting errors related to lease sales agreements.

GTSI stock (NASDAQ: GTSI) was down 30 cents to $8.93 in Wednesday trading. Its shares have gained about 25 percent in the last year.

Justice Hardware Standardization Deal Goes To GTSI (GCN)

By Doug Beizer, Contributing Writer

Government Computer News, January 4, 2007

The Justice Department has signed a three-year, $42 million contract with GTSI Corp. to supply its various offices, bureaus and divisions with workstation, desktop and laptop solutions that promote standardization and interoperability.

Under a blanket purchase agreement, GTSI of Chantilly, Va., will furnish solutions and services, including imaging and integration, custom warranty and call support, asset management and reports, warehousing and managed logistics.

Among the solutions and services the company will provide are imaging and integration, custom warranty and call support, asset management and reports, warehousing and managed logistics. GTSI was the sole award winner of the contract.

The Justice Management Division, which is responsible for standardizing the department's IT infrastructure, awarded the contract to GTSI.

The company is teamed with Hewlett-Packard Co., Palo Alto, Calif., and Prism Pointe Technologies, Ridgeland, Miss., an IT services company. HP will serve as the primary hardware supplier on the deal.

Doug Beizer is a staff writer for Government Computer News' affiliate publication, Washington Technology.

$42M Justice Department BPA Goes To GTSI (FCW)

Federal Computer Week, January 4, 2007

The Justice Department has awarded GTSI a $42 million, three-year blanket purchase agreement to provide workstations, desktop and laptop computers, and equipment as part of DOJ's plan to unify the information technology among its offices, bureaus and divisions.

The BPA was awarded by Justice's Management Division, which is responsible for standardizing the department's IT infrastructure as called for by the Office of Management and Budget's strategic sourcing initiatives, GTSI said in an announcement today.

GTSI, a government IT solutions provider based in Chantilly, Va., has teamed with HP, the primary hardware supplier, and Prism Pointe Technologies, a global IT services company, to supply a full line of services, including imaging and integration, custom warranty and call support, asset management and reports, warehousing, and managed logistics.

"GTSI has a long-standing relationship with the DOJ to develop technology solutions that help the DOJ meet its mission of enforcing the law and defending the interests of the United States," said Tom Kennedy, vice president of civilian sales at GTSI, in a statement. "This BPA will enable the bureaus and divisions throughout DOJ to increase efficiencies inside their organization as well as work more effectively with other parts of DOJ."

DOJ's Management Division awarded the three-year blanket purchase agreement as part of the department's efforts to standardize its IT infrastructure.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Home Depot's CEO Resigns, And His Hefty Payout Raises Ire (WP)

By Ylan Q. Mui

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

Robert L. Nardelli has abruptly resigned as chairman and chief executive of Home Depot, pocketing a lavish severance package and leaving shareholders with a stock that has languished even as sales have nearly doubled during his six-year tenure.

In a statement released yesterday, Home Depot's board of directors and Nardelli said they "mutually agreed" to the resignation, which took effect Tuesday. Under the terms of a separation agreement negotiated when he joined the company in 2000, Nardelli, 58, is to receive about $210 million in cash and stock options, including a $20 million severance payment and retirement benefits of $32 million.

Frank Blake, 57, vice chairman and executive vice president, succeeds Nardelli as chairman and chief executive. Blake, like Nardelli, previously worked for General Electric and also was a former deputy secretary of the Energy Department.

Critics took aim yesterday at the size of Nardelli's payout, the latest in a string of extravagant executive bonuses and awards. Paul Hodgson, a senior research associate at the Corporate Library, an executive-compensation research firm, ranked the severance package among the largest he had ever seen, earning Nardelli a spot on his list of the 12 highest-paid chief executives of the worst-performing companies. Shareholder Evelyn Y. Davis called it "unbelievable." Incoming House Financial Services Committee Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.) criticized the package as a sign that executive pay had gotten "out of control."

"Mr. Nardelli's contribution to raising Home Depot's stock value consists of quitting and receiving hundreds of millions of dollars to do so," said Frank, who has vowed to study the issue of executive compensation this year.

The stock of the Atlanta home-improvement company closed yesterday at $41.07, up 91 cents, or 2.3 percent.

Nardelli has been subject to criticism since he took over the company in December 2000, promising to increase sales and profit and to centralize management in a chain once known for its freewheeling culture.

He has succeeded on many fronts, even as he fell short on others, and in recent years found himself defending his hefty salary. Revenue has nearly doubled, to $81.5 billion in 2005 from $45.7 billion in 2000, though that figure fell short of his goal of $100 billion. During that time, profit rose to $5.8 billion from $2.6 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0112292

Nardelli replaced several top executives with former GE colleagues and implemented top-down management. At the same time, he expanded Home Depot's wholesale business to attract professional contractors. He also expanded the company outside the United States.

Yet Nardelli failed to have much effect on Home Depot's stock price, plagued by slowed store expansion, a cooling housing market and increased competition from rival Lowe's, several analysts said. On Dec. 4, 2000, the day before he was named chief executive, shares of the company closed at $40.75. On Friday, the last day of trading before Nardelli announced his resignation, the stock closed at $40.16. Last year, the stock's price ranged from a low of $32.85 to a high of $43.95, finishing down 0.8 percent.

"I think the financial results he delivered have been exceptional," said Stephanie Hoff, senior retail analyst at the investment firm Edward Jones. "The stock price just hasn't kept pace."

That has prompted some shareholders to question the size of Nardelli's compensation. Last year, he received more than $30 million in compensation and stock options. During his six years at the company, he earned about $125.57 million in annual salary, bonuses, stocks and other payments, according to Equilar, a compensation research firm in San Mateo, Calif.

At the company's annual shareholders meeting last spring, Nardelli was the only board member present. He did not give a speech and refused to answer questions, frustrating the 50 or so shareholders who showed up. Last month, activist shareholders Relational Investors sent a letter to Home Depot urging it reevaluate its strategy and the performance of the management team.

The company's board of directors at the time issued a statement saying it "unanimously supports" Nardelli. The about-face yesterday took many investors and industry experts by surprise.

"I think that there were numerous different public relations fiascos of 2006 that ultimately took its toll on Mr. Nardelli and the board," said Michael Cox, an analyst at the investment firm Piper Jaffray. "I think a fresh change is most likely good for the company right now."

Several analysts viewed Nardelli's replacement as an indication that Home Depot was not looking for a major overhaul, however. Hoff said she thought Blake would be more of a consensus-builder than Nardelli, who had a reputation for gruffness.

"This is not the board's response relative to the need for a strategic change in the company," Hoff said. "It's more about him."

Moving Out Behind Nardelli's Abrupt Exit (WSJ)

By Joann S. Lublin, Ann Zimmerman And Chad Terhune

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

Last June, Home Depot Inc.'s board compensation committee decided to review the most contentious aspect of Chairman and Chief Executive Robert Nardelli's tenure: his pay package.

Mr. Nardelli submitted a one-page list of perks he was willing to drop, including personal use of the six corporate jets, according to one person involved in the matter. But he dug in his heels about his guaranteed $3 million annual bonus and his hefty supplemental pension arrangement.

CHANGE AT THE TOP

· The News: After negotiating with Home Depot's board, Robert Nardelli resigned as chairman and chief executive.

· The Background: Under his leadership, the retailer boosted sales, but his high pay and autocratic style drew criticism.

· What's Next: His successor, Frank Blake, must try to repair relations with shareholders. (See related article1)

"I know that things have to change," he said, according to a second person familiar with the situation.

Yesterday, Home Depot, the world's third-largest retailer by sales, announced a big change: Mr. Nardelli was leaving the company, taking an exit package valued at about $210 million, including $20 million in cash severance.

Mr. Nardelli failed to reignite Home Depot's slowing sales and sagging stock price. Other problems compounded his troubles. His autocratic style clashed with a freewheeling culture fostered by the company's founders. His aggressive handling of the company's most recent annual meeting, where no outside directors were on hand and limits were set on shareholders' questions, outraged some investors. And the pay package that had lured him to the company became a lightning rod for criticism that the board felt compelled to address.

Mr. Nardelli grew tired of the constant battering he was taking in the press and on Wall Street, according to a longtime acquaintance, and resented being blamed for Home Depot's share price when other chief executives, such as General Electric Co.'s Jeffrey Immelt, escaped such criticism.

Board members agreed over the past few weeks that Mr. Nardelli should step down, according to the second person familiar with the events. Mr. Nardelli, 58 years old, reached agreement with the board in a meeting Tuesday in Dallas, far from the company's Atlanta headquarters, "There was no smoking gun," this person says. "The board and Bob reached agreement that it was time for a change."

DOJ_NMG_0112293

Pay was a central factor in luring Mr. Nardelli to Home Depot from GE, after he lost a three-man race to become CEO there, and it loomed large as he left. Mr. Nardelli received compensation valued at more than $240 million over his tenure at Home Depot, with a hefty chunk of it in stock options. In the fiscal year ended Jan. 31, 2006, the board awarded him a $7 million bonus and about $14.7 million worth of restricted shares.

In December, activist investor Relational Investors LLC began pushing Home Depot to establish a special committee to review the company's strategic direction and management performance, and to explore possible alternatives, including a sale of the company. It also alerted Home Depot it planned to nominate at least two directors at the company's next annual meeting, in May.

Yesterday, Barney Frank (D., Mass.), chairman designate of House Financial Services Committee, lambasted Mr. Nardelli's exit package, citing the rise of Home Depot shares on the news. "Some defenders of CEO pay argue that CEOs are rewarded for increasing the stock or the overall value of the company, but judging by today's market reaction, Mr. Nardelli's contribution to raising Home Depot's stock value consists of quitting and receiving hundreds of millions of dollars to do so," he said in a statement. The stock yesterday rose 91 cents, or 2.3%, to close at $41.07 a share.

Mr. Nardelli, who could not be reached for comment for this story, will be replaced by Frank Blake, 57, Home Depot's vice chairman and executive vice president, who headed strategic initiatives, among other areas. The new CEO's compensation package is still being determined, said a Home Depot spokesman.

Tough Times

Mr. Nardelli faced tough times for big retailers that have limited options for diversifying. Home Depot and Wal-Mart Stores Inc. ratcheted down their growth projections because new stores were stealing too much business from existing ones. Wall Street no longer views these retailers as growth stories, and their stock prices have languished.

FROM THE ARCHIVES

· Holder Presses Home Depot to Change12

12/19/06

· Page One: Home Depot Struggles to Adjust to New Blueprint13

01/17/03

· Q&A: Nardelli Trims Home Depot Expansion14

06/25/02

· Nardelli Named Home Depot CEO15

12/06/00

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

16

WSJ reporter Joann Lublin speaks17 to Dow Jones Online's Ed Crane about the resignation of Home Depot CEO Robert Nardelli. Plus, WSJ's Alan Murray18 and the CNBC "Squawk Box" team react.

Home Depot's share price fell 8% during Mr. Nardelli tenure, which began in December 2000. The company is locked in a fierce battle with Lowe's, which boasts newer, brighter stores and a better image with many shoppers. Lowe's stock has risen 188% in the past six years.

When he came to Home Depot, Mr. Nardelli had run mines and locomotive factories for General Electric but lacked retail experience. Short, balding, aggressive and hard-working, he was known at GE as a great manufacturing executive, and he pushed GE Power to record profits during the 1990s. But in 2000, he was passed over to succeed Chief Executive John F. Welch Jr., a decision that took him by surprise, according to people with knowledge of those events.

At that time, the number of high-growth markets in the U.S. without Home Depot branches was dwindling fast. New stores increasingly prospered only by stealing business from nearby Home Depots. The company was struggling to maintain earnings growth of 25% annually, a target it had hit with ease for years. The company shocked investors in October 2000 with a profit warning that sent the stock tumbling 28% in one day.

That setback spurred the board to recruit Mr. Nardelli to replace Chief Executive Arthur Blank, one of Home Depot's founders and inspirational leaders.

WHO'S WHO

Biographical information on Home Depot's former and current chiefs

Bob Nardelli, 58 years old

Position: Former CEO of Home Depot.

Career: Nardelli began his career at General Electric in 1971 and advanced through a series of leadership positions. In 1988, he left GE to join Case Corp. in Racine, Wis. Nardelli returned to GE in 1991 and was ultimately named president and CEO of GE Power Systems.

DOJ_NMG_0112294

Education: Bachelor's degree in business, Western Illinois University. M.B.A., University of Louisville.

Frank Blake, 57

Position: New chief executive and chairman of Home Depot. Formerly served as vice chairman of Home Depot's board. He joined Home Depot in 2002 as executive vice president, business development and corporate operations.

Career: Blake previously served as deputy secretary for the Department of Energy. Before that, he served in a variety of executive roles at GE. Blake also served as general counsel for the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and deputy counsel to the elder George Bush when he was vice president.

Education: Bachelors degree, Harvard. J.D., Columbia University School of Law.

Source: Associated Press

Mr. Nardelli set out to stamp out the decentralized "cowboy culture" of the company. Home Depot's founders had allowed store managers to run their stores as autonomous fiefdoms with little regard for uniformity or efficiency. This entrepreneurial spirit had made Home Depot one of the hottest growth stocks ever, and its store count doubled nearly every four years. Its surging stock price made hundreds of early employees millionaires.

Mr. Nardelli's management style was a stark contrast to that of Home Depot's paternalistic founders, Bernard Marcus and Mr. Blank, who were treated like heroes during store tours and personally tutored employees on customer service. Mr. Nardelli often appeared uncomfortable donning the retailer's trademark orange apron and dealing with front-line employees one-on-one.

The pressure to grow intensified in the face of extraordinary returns from Lowe's, which outperformed Home Depot in same-store sales. Lowe's often chose to build across the street from aging Home Depot outlets. It outpaced Home Depot in appliance sales by giving the merchandise more space and by training dedicated salespeople. Lowe's attracted more female shoppers with brighter, cleaner stores. Home Depot now mimics many of these Lowe's techniques.

Mr. Nardelli moved to cut back on higher-paid full-time employees with experience as plumbers or handymen, and to rely more on part-time workers with less experience answering home-improvement questions from customers. Frequently, Mr. Nardelli found himself fending off questions about deteriorating customer service and about whether cost-cutting was the cause of that. Every few months, Home Depot management would roll out another program aimed at improving customer service, from employee bonuses to customer call buttons. But none appeared to have any lasting effect.

Looking for another engine for growth, Mr. Nardelli decided to expand into the building-supply business, spending more than $6 billion over the past two years to acquire more than 25 wholesale suppliers. Their customers range from utilities needing poles to builders looking for lumber to cities in need of fire hydrants.

But selling to the construction trades is a much different business from mass-merchandising tools and paints. Contractors rely on longstanding relationships with suppliers and trained salespeople. Many associate the Home Depot brand with do-it-yourselfers and soccer moms pushing shopping carts, and avoid the stores.

Some analysts and investors worried that Home Depot was snapping up supply businesses with lower profit margins than Home Depot's existing stores. Mr. Nardelli took criticism for not investing more money into renovating Home Depot's aging stores and for not hiring more seasoned employees capable of offering better home-improvement advice.

At Home Depot's annual meeting last May, with disappointment over shareholder returns mounting, Mr. Nardelli ignited a firestorm by refusing to respond to investor concerns about his hefty compensation and for enforcing a strict time limit on comments from the floor. The same month, the company surprised investors with a decision that it would no longer report quarterly same-store sales, a key industry benchmark, arguing that the expansion into building supplies had reduced the importance of that measure. Mr. Nardelli was forced to reverse that decision the following quarter.

Swept Up in Scandal

To make matters worse, Home Depot was also swept up in the scandal over backdated stock options. In mid-December, it wrapped up an internal investigation that concluded that the company routinely backdated stock options for 20 years, and as a result understated compensation expense by $200 million. The practice started in 1981 and ended just before the arrival of Mr. Nardelli. With fiscal 2006 sales of $81.5 billion, the home-improvement retailer is one of the largest companies to admit to backdating stock options. During the previous two decades, the company was run by founders Mr. Marcus and Mr. Blank, but neither founder received stock options. The company wouldn't say who did receive the awards and who made the decision to backdate them.

As criticism over his performance and pay mounted, Mr. Nardelli defended his record. Home Depot, he frequently pointed out, had posted earnings-per-share growth in excess of 20% for four consecutive years, one of only two companies in the Dow Jones Industrial Average to do so.

"There is hardly a financial metric you can point to where we haven't made progress," Mr. Nardelli said in an interview last May. "We are going through an enormous transformation. Sometimes transformation is unsettling, not only internally but also externally to Wall Street."

DOJ_NMG_0112295

By late November, the board's review of Mr. Nardelli's pay package was coming to a head.

Home Depot was paying Mr. Nardelli even more than the amount promised under his contract, thanks in part to bonuses the board awarded him due to growth of sales and diluted earnings per share. A pay consultant retained by the compensation committee concluded that he was making more than his industry peers, according to a person familiar with the situation. In discussions with the committee, Mr. Nardelli had agreed to forgo some perks, but not his guaranteed bonus or supplemental pension.

His demands were a problem for some board members, this person says. Directors would have been happier if he had been more "willing to make concessions on his pay package," says the acquaintance of his. But Mr. Nardelli felt further concessions would represent an admission that he didn't deserve what he had earned, the acquaintance says.

Board members realized that if they stuck strictly to the terms of Mr. Nardelli's written contract and did not give him anything more, his compensation was likely to be lower in fiscal 2006 than in 2005, according to the person familiar with the matter. For that reason, the board decided in November not to try to amend the contract. The directors tentatively agreed that Mr. Nardelli's fiscal 2006 bonus would be less than in 2005, but no final decision was reached, this person says.

The friction over pay was a factor in his departure, this person says. Directors met informally several times late last year prior to their final meeting on Tuesday with Mr. Nardelli.

Ralph Whitworth, co-founder of Relational Investors, says Mr. Nardelli's departure won't deter his firm from seeking board representation. "This paves the way for a review of the company's strategy," Mr. Whitworth says. "This wasn't about who, but about what -- about a strategy that was way off track."

The board briefly discussed, but did not pursue, one alternative -- going private, according to two people familiar with the matter.

Mr. Nardelli's successor, Mr. Blake, is a former GE colleague of his. Mr. Blake offered the advantage of being an established insider. That spared Home Depot a protracted period of uncertainty during an external search, and eliminated the need for it to dole out any "make whole" payments to anyone leaving another company, as Mr. Nardelli had received.

Directors are still working out final details of Mr. Blake's pay deal. They already have decided that Mr. Blake won't have an employment contract as CEO, the second person familiar with the matter says, and that elements of his pay package will resemble "what shareholders have been asking for."

Home Depot's Nardelli Takes $210 Million Severance Package (LAT)

By Martin Zimmerman And Kathy M. Kristof

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

Corporate pay critics were prepared to cheer the abrupt departure of beleaguered Home Depot Inc. chief Robert Nardelli Wednesday — but then they got a look at the bill.

Nardelli, who was one of the nation's best-paid chief executives, will get a severance package valued at $210 million. That dismayed some corporate watchdogs who have seen a string of departing CEOs collect high-dollar payouts in recent months.

"This board should be ashamed of themselves," said Nell Minow, an expert on executive compensation at Corporate Library, a research firm. "I would like to see several board members leave in acknowledgment of their utter failure."

Atlanta-based Home Depot, the nation's biggest home-improvement retailer, gave no reason for Nardelli's departure, which it said was "mutually agreed" upon. Nardelli, however, had become a lightning rod for criticism on several fronts.

Shareholder activists said he was a preeminent example of runaway executive pay, while investors saw the value of their Home Depot stock sink 12% in his tenure. One Wall Street analyst faulted him for an "autocratic" management style.

Despite disappointment over the severance pay, the surprise resignation counts as a win for shareholder advocates who zeroed in on pay packages that provided Nardelli more than $140 million since he took over in December 2000.

"It shows how focused shareholder groups can get results," said Ralph Ward, publisher of Boardroom Insider, an online newsletter that follows corporate pay and related issues. "It may not be quick, but eventually they can wear away a company's leadership by keeping up the pressure."

Daniel Pedrotty, director of the AFL-CIO's office of investment, said he also was distressed by the size of Nardelli's severance, but agreed that the resignation showed that shareholder activists could have an effect.

"I think the tide is beginning to turn," Pedrotty said. "We are extremely encouraged that boards are beginning to assert their independence, but there are miles to go before we are satisfied."

A spokesman declined to comment on the severance package other than to say it was included in the employment contract Nardelli signed when he came to Home Depot from General Electric Co. at the end of 2000.

Some experts said the timing indicated that the Home Depot board might have grown tired of the criticism directed at the 58-year-old Nardelli by shareholder activists, union leaders and pension fund managers.

DOJ_NMG_0112296

Nardelli was the only director to attend the company's annual meeting last May in Delaware, where he provoked critics by refusing to answer questions about his pay.

As recently as Dec. 18, Home Depot's board expressed full support for Nardelli and his management team after San Diego investment firm Relational Investors said it planned to submit a shareholder proposal calling for a review of the company's strategic direction.

"It must have been that the board reached a high level of frustration," said Edward Lawler, a professor at USC's Marshall School of Business, "probably starting with the criticism surrounding his compensation and followed by the controversy surrounding the annual meeting."

Home Depot's board includes Angelo R. Mozilo, chairman of Calasbas-based mortgage lender Countrywide Financial Corp., and Lawrence R. Johnston, chief executive of the Albertsons supermarket chain.

Nardelli's resignation comes amid a wave of executive departures. Through the end of November, U.S. companies had announced 1,347 CEO changes, more than for all of 2005.

A portion of that increase stems from a stock-options backdating scandal, but it also is a sign that executives are under greater scrutiny, said John A. Challenger of the outplacement firm Challenger, Gray & Christmas, which tracks the trend.

"We will likely see more and more shareholders revolt based on compensation issues, even if the executive is accomplishing his or her goals," Challenger said.

There was no indication that options backdating played a role in Nardelli's departure. During an internal investigation late last year, Home Depot found that stock options were routinely backdated at the company during the 1980s and 1990s, but the practice ended after Nardelli took over.

Over the six years that Nardelli was CEO of Home Depot, he took home $143 million in cash, stock and other compensation. In addition, he was granted stock options that would have been worth $469.7 million if the company's stock price had appreciated at the market's historic 10% average annual rate.

By comparison, the average compensation for Fortune 500 CEOs was $13.5 million in 2005, according to a study by the Corporate Library.

Lofty executive pay levels have been a target for corporate reformers for several years. But it's been severance packages that have drawn much of the attention recently.

KB Home CEO Bruce Karatz, who resigned under pressure from the Los Angeles homebuilder in November amid questions about stock option grants, could collect as much as $175 million under his severance agreement.

Henry A. McKinnell, the former CEO of drug maker Pfizer Inc. who was ousted in part because of investor anger about his rich retirement benefits, will get a package totaling more than $180 million.

Nardelli's $210 million deal tops both of those, but is far from a record. For example, former Exxon Mobil CEO Lee Raymond's retirement package was valued at $400 million when he stepped down last year.

A substantial amount of Nardelli's severance pay was included in the employment agreement that he secured before joining the company in 2000. The company promised him at least $4.5 million in annual salary and bonus, plus at least 450,000 stock options each year.

In addition, the company loaned Nardelli $10 million when it hired him and forgave $2 million of that loan each year.

To woo him from GE, Home Depot also gave Nardelli an initial option grant of 3.5 million shares, which would have been worth $285 million if the company's stock price had appreciated at 10% a year. And, it promised a pension equal to 50% of his pay and bonus.

U.S. Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., incoming chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, called the severance package "further confirmation of the need to deal with a pattern of CEO pay that appears to be out of control."

Some analysts noted, however, that much of Home Depot's poor stock market performance occurred during the first two years of Nardelli's reign, when he was struggling to turn the company around.

Over the last four years, Home Depot's stock price rose more than 67%, beating the 61% turned in by the benchmark Standard & Poor's 500 index of big U.S. companies during that period.

In addition, the company's annual sales doubled to $81.5 billion during his tenure, and profit nearly doubled as well.

Home Depot has struggled as the housing market slowed — its stock fell almost 1% last year — but so has its well-regarded competitor Lowe's Cos.

"I think there was some unfair criticism" of Nardelli, said Stephanie Hoff, an analyst with brokerage firm Edward Jones & Co.

That said, Wall Street seemed pleased that Nardelli was being replaced as chairman and CEO by Frank Blake, who had been vice chairman. Home Depot's stock rose more than 2% Wednesday, adding 91 cents to $41.07.

DOJ_NMG_0112297

Richard Ferlauto, director of pension and benefits policy at the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, said the resignation takes the heat off Nardelli, but not the Home Depot board.

"It's Round One," Ferlauto said. "We are not sure who won. We are happy that he's gone, but it's the board that we hold responsible."

Home Depot Boots CEO Nardelli (USAT)

By Del Jones And Matt Krantz

USA Today, January 4, 2007

2006 was not a good year for Bob Nardelli, who lost his job Wednesday.

For one, the Western Illinois University Leathernecks football team blew a halftime lead in the final game to lose to Missouri State and finish the year with a losing record. Western Illinois is Nardelli's favorite team; it's where he was a star player 25 years ago and dreamed of going on to the NFL, but he was too small.

He replaced that dream with the dream of running a giant company. In 2000, he was a top-three finalist to replace Jack Welch as CEO of General Electric in perhaps the most-anticipated and most-hyped changing of the guard in America's corporate history.

He lost out to Jeffrey Immelt.

His next decision may have led to his downfall Wednesday. He weighed many offers and chose to become CEO of Home Depot, a company that had already grown so large, so fast, that it barely went noticed when in six years Nardelli made it twice as big and into the 14th-largest Fortune 500 company and second to Wal-Mart among retailers.

Net income in the most recent quarter, ended October 2006, was up 129% and revenue was up 100% from where they were in the same quarter of 2000, just before Nardelli joined. Net income and revenue of companies in the Standard & Poor's 500 were up about 65% during that time.

However, when Nardelli arrived, Home Depot had reached the $40 billion revenue mark faster than any retailer in history, even Wal-Mart. Investors and employees who remember those heady '90s have been unimpressed ever since. Employees have balked at his attempts to fix what they did not see as broken, and much of Home Depot's executive team resigned because they had become wealthy from stock options and didn't want to deal with change.

The second former GE executive who lost out to Immelt for the GE job was James McNerney, who did well at 3M before moving over to Boeing, where the stock is up 250% since March 2003.

In a September interview, McNerney said Nardelli's job was tougher because Home Depot had grown at an "ungodly rate" for 20 years. He said Nardelli should be measured not on the stock price but on how well he did in a tough situation.

The stock price has languished, most recently because of the slowing housing market and projections that Home Depot's growth is about to stall. The stock price is up 6% from when Nardelli took over, and that includes the 2.3% rise to $41.07 a share Wednesday on the news that the former altar boy, Boy Scout, class officer and ROTC cadet had been replaced by Frank Blake, Nardelli's longtime right-hand man.

By comparison, the S&P 500 is up 7.7%. Competitor Lowe's is up 230% since Nardelli joined Home Depot.

About the only good news for Nardelli is that Home Depot is giving him a $210 million severance package, whose terms were set in the employment contract he received in 2000. But that leaves him as the most visible target for Democrats now in control of Congress. House Financial Services Committee Chairman Barney Frank, D-Mass., pounced on the figure as more evidence that Congress needs to intervene in executive pay, and the Laborers' Union on Wednesday asked Home Depot to adopt a proposal requiring that the board get shareholder approval for what it called extraordinary retirement benefits.

John Challenger, CEO of his own outplacement consulting firm that tracks CEO turnover, says the Nardelli resignation was another sign of growing shareholder power. "We will likely see more and more shareholders revolt based on compensation issues," he said.

To Nardelli, such criticism is not new. Even as Home Depot stock remained stagnant, he was paid $124 million in his first five years, not including stock options. AFSCME, the government employees union whose pension fund owns nearly 23,000 Home Depot shares, estimates he will wind up with nearly $360 million total for his six years, including options' gains.

Nardelli enraged shareholders at Home Depot's annual meeting last spring when many came armed with tough questions about Home Depot's performance and direction and Nardelli's pay. But Nardelli surprised them by being the only board member to attend the meeting, and he restricted their comments to a total of 30 minutes and gave no response.

That caused activist shareholders to go on the attack. Ralph Whitworth's Relational Investors firm has a 0.6% stake in Home Depot and is demanding a meeting and wants to nominate two board members.

Nardelli's ouster "shows that you cannot be an ostrich when it comes to investors," says Nell Minow, editor of The Corporate Library, a shareholder research firm.

DOJ_NMG_0112298

Nardelli has since said he believed corporate annual meetings in general had become little more than forums for attacks by labor unions, not true shareholders. But his strategy to change the way they are conducted backfired and fed into his reputation as being gruff and unresponsive.

Home Depot has also been at the forefront of an ongoing controversy over the backdating of stock options, which has spread to about 200 companies. Home Depot has admitted routinely changing the dates of options grants to benefit employees from 1981 until just before Nardelli became CEO in 2000. Nardelli was cleared by an internal investigation, and the company says it is cooperating with the Securities and Exchange Commission. Indeed, Nardelli appears to be stepping down as one of but a few prominent CEOs in recent years to exit without ethical baggage.

Neither Blake nor Nardelli were available for interviews Wednesday, but in an interview with USA TODAY published in July, Nardelli defended his compensation.

"In five years, we achieved records in sales, gross-margin expansion, earnings per share, average customer ticket and return on capital," Nardelli said.

Stephanie Hoff, a retailing analyst at Edward Jones, said Home Depot was performing well and that by firing Nardelli it had "caved" to critics, who were able to enlist the news media in making Nardelli's blunders overblown. She said it's unfair to blame Nardelli for his compensation package because it was put together by the board, and she hopes the board has taken more care in crafting Blake's package.

Minow also blames the directors for the exit package. "They overpaid him when he arrived. They overpaid him while he was there. And they overpaid him on the way out the door," she says. "They've handled this horribly from beginning to end."

Hoff predicts little if any strategy change at Home Depot under Blake because none is needed. "The only difference is that Blake is not Nardelli," Hoff said.

Some Home Depot customers, however, see room for improvement. An informal survey of USA TODAY's shopper panel found members critical of Home Depot's customer service. Several said it was so hard to find help that they were shopping more at Lowe's.

Such complaints now fall to Blake. At 57, he is one year younger than Nardelli and was prelaw at Harvard when Nardelli was studying business at Western Illinois. Blake was getting a law degree at Columbia when Nardelli was getting an MBA at Louisville. Blake was Nardelli's go-to executive when Nardelli was growing GE Power Systems from $770 million in operating income to $2.8 billion over six years.

Nardelli's biggest problem was that Home Depot's performance was constantly being compared with Lowe's, a competitor able to grow faster partly because it is smaller and not yet in every community.

The rival home improvement retailer's net income and revenue have jumped 254% and 149%, respectively, between the quarters Nardelli was heading Home Depot. Lowe's earnings for this full fiscal year are expected to be 205% higher than in the year Nardelli took over Home Depot.

Home Depot's growth, while impressive, has cooled. Revenue and earnings growth slowed to 17.1% and 17.9%, respectively, during the fiscal year ended Feb. 3, 2002, the first full fiscal year Nardelli was at the helm, says Standard & Poor's Capital IQ. That was down from the more than 27% average annual growth rate in revenue and earnings from 1991until Nardelli joined.

Looking ahead, things are going to get much worse. Earnings growth in the current fiscal year that ends Jan. 28 is expected to be 4.9%, the slowest in the company's history. Earnings are expected to grow 2.8% in the fiscal year that ends Feb. 3, 2008, says Capital IQ.

The slowest earnings growth prior to Nardelli's reign was 10% in the fiscal year that ended in January 2001.

Rumors that Home Depot is setting the table to be bought by a private equity firm have gone unsubstantiated. "Can you finance a deal of this size and order of magnitude?" asks Ed Mullane of merger and buyout tracking service Mergermarket.

Hoff also considers the sale of Home Depot remote. It would approach $100 billion, rivaling AT&T's $102 billion acquisition of BellSouth, the largest deal in 2006.

A native of Old Forge, Pa., Nardelli likes NASCAR and football. Leading is like coaching football, he told USA TODAY in July. You review the film, find deficiencies, fix what you can, and sometimes get a new quarterback, Nardelli said.

Executive's Fatal Flaw: Failing To Understand New Demands On CEOs (WSJ)

By Alan Murray

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

Robert Nardelli's demise as chief executive of Home Depot resulted, in part, from his failure to understand how profoundly the job of CEO has changed in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0112299

Mr. Nardelli was old school. In an interview last fall, as his public-relations problems were compounding, he acknowledged he had gotten "too focused on the idea that you do your job, you take care of your numbers, and the rest will take care of itself." Some of Mr. Nardelli's numbers were hard to argue with. In six years on the job, he doubled Home Depot's sales and more than doubled its earnings.

What Mr. Nardelli missed, however, is that in the post-Enron world, CEOs have been forced to respond to a widening array of shareholder advocates, hedge funds, private-equity deal makers, legislators, regulators, attorneys general, nongovernmental organizations and countless others who want a say in how public companies manage their affairs. Today's CEO, in effect, has to play the role of a politician, answering to varied constituents. And it's in that role that Mr. Nardelli failed most spectacularly.

There were plenty of other reasons a board might want to dump him. He provided no return to shareholders. He pursued a controversial strategy of expanding into the low-margin wholesale business. And he accepted an exorbitant pay package.

But other CEOs have survived similar criticisms. Mr. Nardelli's failure to do so reflects, at least in part, his inability to adapt to a new era of greater scrutiny.

"I used to play football," he said when asked about the challenges of being a public company CEO today. "In football, you always know the score. Now, it's like we are ice-skating, and you've got a bunch of judges on the sideline shouting out the scores."

As failures go, Mr. Nardelli's isn't half bad. He walked away with an exit package of $210 million -- and that figure was calculated before announcement of his resignation boosted the potential value of his stock options yesterday.

Much of the package is due to the rich employment contract he negotiated with the Home Depot board before leaving General Electric Co., where he was one of three finalists to succeed Jack Welch. Mr. Welch convinced his board to give all three finalists large batches of stock options, telling board members they would have to make good on only one man's options, one director says. Upon leaving GE, the board was told, the two runners-up likely would use those awards to negotiate pay at their next jobs -- which is exactly what Mr. Nardelli and James McNerney, who is now CEO of Boeing, did.

Yet Mr. Nardelli's extravagant pay became his biggest problem. It prompted an attack from shareholder advocates like Richard Ferlauto, who runs investment policy for the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, one of the nation's largest labor unions.

Political Error

Mr. Ferlauto helped organize protests at Home Depot's annual meeting last year, prompting Mr. Nardelli to commit his gravest political error: Aware of the protests to come, he convinced other board members to stay away from the meeting, and restricted shareholder questions to one minute. That sealed his public image as a callous and entrenched corporate leader, and even prompted a call from his former boss, Mr. Welch.

In response, Mr. Nardelli belatedly tried to become a politician. He went on a "listening" tour to visit 25 of the company's largest shareholders, and he granted interviews to a number of television and newspaper reporters. He apologized for his ham-handed handling of the annual meeting.

But he didn't apologize for his pay package. And he didn't reduce it.

That left him vulnerable last month when an investment firm, Relational Investors LLC, announced it was mounting a proxy battle to put new directors on the Home Depot board. Ralph Whitworth, who heads Relational, said his complaint had less to do with Mr. Nardelli's pay than his strategy. Mr. Whitworth believes Home Depot erred in expanding into the contractor-supply business. But Mr. Nardelli's weakened standing greatly increased the odds that Mr. Whitworth might win his proxy battle. So Home Depot's directors acted first.

Raised in a blue-collar family and educated in public schools, Mr. Nardelli was upset when informed by Mr. Welch that he had lost out to Ivy Leaguer Jeffrey Immelt for the top job at GE. He believed he had been a better performer, building revenue at the company's power-turbine business from $770 million in 1995 to $2.8 billion in 2000.

But subsequent events have confirmed the wisdom of Mr. Welch's choice. Like Mr. Nardelli, Mr. Immelt has struggled with a languishing stock price. But in addition to generating good operating results, Mr. Immelt has played the CEO's political role with great skill. He has tied his own pay closely to performance. He has eschewed the kind of employment contract that is now rewarding Mr. Nardelli. He has reached out to a wide range of constituent groups. And he has adopted a number of popular initiatives, such as his "eco-imagination" program which, among other things, includes an effort to reduce GE's emissions of greenhouse gases.

As a result, Mr. Immelt wins awards, graces magazine covers, and is widely praised as one of America's best CEOs.

Learned the Lessons

Procter & Gamble Co.'s A.G. Lafley is another CEO who has learned the lessons of the post-Enron era. Instead of catering just to shareholders, he makes a broad appeal to "stakeholders" -- a group that, by his definition, includes shareholders, employees, customers, consumers and the communities in which all these people live. When I asked him last year whether that makes his job sound like that of a global politician, he responded: "Like it or not, we are in a global political world. I've concluded I'm in it anyway, and I might as well deal with it anyway."

DOJ_NMG_0112300

No one exemplifies the new CEO more than Wal-Mart Chief Executive Lee Scott. When Mr. Scott found his company under attack by a well-organized political campaign, he responded in kind. He reached out to his opponents, took polls of opinion leaders and hired political consultants. He also embraced environmentally friendly policies, improved employee health-care coverage and began advocating policies like an increase in the minimum wage.

Mr. Scott insists the environmental positions he's taken and the other policies he's adopted are all good for the company's bottom line. In an interview in his office in Bentonville, Ark., last year, Mr. Scott said: "The generation of people I work with -- like A.G. Lafley, who has been here in this office in the last two months, or Jeff Immelt, who has been in this office in the last three weeks -- feel there is a business reason to do this."

Taking the political route may be necessary to success in the post-Enron world, but it, alone, is not sufficient. Citigroup CEO Charles Prince has tried to appease his critics by making ethics a hallmark of his time at the top, but that hasn't helped the bank's lagging performance or silenced its critics.

In any event, it's clear Mr. Nardelli never bought into the approach favored by his colleagues like Mr. Immelt, Mr. Lafley, and Mr. Scott. Instead, he fretted that the corporate system is under attack.

"I am very concerned with the future of business and the capitalistic system in this country," he said last fall, expressing his concern about the repeated attacks on public companies. "Somebody has yelled fire in the auditorium. If you stand back, you've got to say that we as a country should share a growing concern as it relates to the capitalist system. The things that got us to where we are are under attack."

One consequence of the increased pressures on public companies and their CEOs, Mr. Nardelli noted, is a rush of both money and talent into private equity, which is shielded from many pressures that affect public companies. "Not everyone can go private," he said.

Not everyone, but how about Mr. Nardelli? He wasn't giving interviews or any hint of his plans yesterday. But his strong background in operational management, his distaste for the public spotlight and his hefty severance check in need of investing may make him the perfect candidate for a private-equity firm.

Out With The Old (NYT)

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

There was good news and bad news yesterday for shareholders of Home Depot. The good news is that Robert Nardelli, the imperious chief executive who had presided over a difficult, stagnant period for the company, has resigned. The bad news is that he'll be taking $210 million worth of compensation with him, one of the highest severance packages ever, which is saying a lot in this era of runaway executive pay.

Mr. Nardelli may be best known for his shocking performance at the company's annual meeting in May, which has become a symbol of the arrogance of overpaid, out-of-touch, and unresponsive executives.

As Joe Nocera reported in The Times after attending the meeting, Mr. Nardelli restricted shareholder comments to one minute and one question each — enforced with large digital timers. When one shareholder asked about perceived conflicts of interest for the board of directors, Mr. Nardelli refused to answer, declaring, "This is not the forum in which to address these comments."

The meeting, of course, was exactly the forum for shareholders to voice concerns about the board of directors they were being asked to elect.

Top executives, like Mr. Nardelli, have been coddled to the point that they expect and receive "golden hellos" worth millions on their way in, golden parachutes worth even more on their way out, and the equivalent of golden seat cushions to park on comfortably throughout their tenure — often largely unrelated to their actual performance.

While the fortune Mr. Nardelli is taking with him — including a $20 million cash severance payment — sticks in the craw, we hope this will be the beginning of a new era of accountable management for Home Depot. Robert Monks, the longtime corporate governance advocate, calls it "the scars of progress." There is no question that Mr. Nardelli's departure is a victory for the activist groups that attacked the status quo at Home Depot, and all those who would follow in their footsteps.

Don't Blame Nardelli (WP)

By Allan Sloan

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112301

When regular people lose their jobs -- often through no fault of their own -- they've got to fight tooth and nail for every penny. Yet here's Home Depot's chief executive, Bob Nardelli, leaving with $210 million despite not having done much of a job for anyone other than himself.

It's tempting to huff and puff about executive pay being out of control, which in many cases it clearly is. What's truly amazing here is that if you read Home Depot's documents, you discover that Nardelli did not negotiate any special exit package. Home Depot, as best I can tell, is paying him nothing more than called for by the contract that he signed in 2000 when the company "won" the bidding war to get him.

The problem isn't what Nardelli's getting to leave Home Depot. It's what he got to join the company when he signed his employment contract on Dec. 4, 2000. At the time, Nardelli was considered one of the two hottest CEO prospects in the country, along with Jim McNerney, who now runs Boeing. Nardelli and McNerney, both longtime General Electric executives, had just lost out to Jeff Immelt in the highly publicized battle to succeed Jack Welch as GE's chief.

Ken Langone, one of Home Depot's co-founders and a big fan of the "it's impossible to pay a good CEO too much" school of compensation, played a key role in signing Nardelli. Langone, you may recall, was also heavily involved in the controversial compensation package of Dick Grasso, the departed chief executive of the New York Stock Exchange. I wanted to talk to Langone about all this but, alas, he wouldn't take my call.

The size of Nardelli's package "isn't a surprise to me," said Paul Hodgson, senior research associate at the Corporate Library, which analyzes corporate governance. "The seeds of this debacle were sown in 2000," he said. "Everything was in his contract."

Though $210 million is a huge amount of money, there are corporate chieftains who've walked away with much more. Lee Raymond of Exxon Mobil got $400 million or so. Jack Welch left GE as a billionaire, and Roberto Goizueta left Coca-Cola in similar fashion. But Raymond, Welch and Goizueta were huge successes who spent essentially their whole careers working for one company. Nardelli, in contrast, is a latecomer leaving under a cloud because the performance of Home Depot's stock has lagged.

By Hodgson's math, Nardelli is actually walking away with less than another recently ousted CEO, Hank McKinnell of Pfizer. Hodgson puts McKinnell's package at $213 million, about $15 million more than the number Pfizer has used. Hodgson cautioned that his number for Nardelli may change when Home Depot (which wouldn't talk to me) releases more details.

It's not clear how much Home Depot is paying Nardelli to leave. The company said $210 million, but that includes stock he already owns and retirement benefits that have nothing to do with his departure. The split seems to be about 50-50.

Nardelli's cash severance is $20 million, which is about three years of his annual salary and bonus. He's also getting what the company described as "unvested deferred stock awards" worth about $77 million and unvested options worth $7 million. That adds up to about $104 million.

The rest of his package includes deferred stock in which Nardelli had vested, his various retirement packages and $18 million of miscellaneous benefits (whatever they are) that he stands to get over the next four years. I'm not trying to minimize Nardelli's swag, or to justify it. I'm just trying to show you how lush his contract was.

The world is full of people screaming about how unreasonable it is to lavish such riches on the likes of Nardelli. But as Hodgson says, the problem isn't Nardelli. It's the contract that Home Depot's board gave him. Under the agreement, he was paid mostly on the basis of how long he stayed, not on how well he or the company performed.

The other thing for which you can fault Home Depot's board is that it felt it had to go outside for a CEO six years ago, rather than feeling comfortable appointing someone from within. Hiring a CEO from the outside is expensive. Nardelli and McNerney, the two "losers" in the Jack Welch succession wars, got far more from their new employers to leave GE than Jeff Immelt got for staying.

Maybe someone will learn something from the Nardelli fiasco and companies will be more careful about what they agree to pay newly hired outsider CEOs. But I'll bet that when the cycle turns, companies will bid up the market for star CEOs again.

Repeat after me: The time to have the debate over CEO compensation isn't when the CEO is fired. It's when he's hired.

Suit Could Force Sarbanes-Oxley Review (LAW)

By Alexia Garamfalvi

Legal Times, January 4, 2007

Free Enterprise Fund's constitutional challenge might invalidate the act, tossing SOX debate back to Congress.

The new Congress convening this month may be more willing to tinker with the Sarbanes-Oxley Act than the previous one. After all, the law's chief architects, Rep. Michael Oxley (R-Ohio), former chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, and Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.), the former ranking member on the Banking Committee, have retired.

DOJ_NMG_0112302

But even if Congress doesn't bring the 2002 corporate-reform law to the floor, a D.C.-based free market group's lawsuit challenging its constitutionality could force Congress to reconsider the law.

Late last month, Judge James Robertson of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia heard arguments in a case filed by the Free Enterprise Fund and Beckstead and Watts, a Nevada accounting firm that focuses its auditing businesses on small companies. Beckstead is under investigation by the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board (PCAOB) for auditing deficiencies.

The fund and Beckstead claim the PCAOB lacks accountability and that the provisions of Sarbanes-Oxley that established the board are unconstitutional because they violate the constitutional requirement that key executive branch officials be appointed by the president and infringe upon the president's authority.

Although the suit specifically targets the accounting board, the fund has made no bones about the fact that it hopes to prompt a full-scale review of the act, which Congress passed to restore investor confidence in the wake of a series of corporate scandals involving Enron, WorldCom, and a bevy of other companies. The board was created to oversee the formerly self-regulating accounting industry's auditing of public companies and make sure that accounting firms don't merely rubber-stamp bogus financial statements that were at the core of many of those scandals.

The provisions of the act are not severable, so if the court were to agree that the provisions establishing the board are unconstitutional, it would invalidate the entire law. Congress would then have to pass corrective legislation, which could become a vehicle to offer amendments to other provisions and spark a greater debate about the law.

Echoing many business leaders who have claimed that the costs of complying with Sarbanes-Oxley outweigh its benefits, the fund argues that the law has had enormous unintended consequences on the American economy and that it is driving public companies out of the United States.

Power points

The PCAOB "wields enormous coercive power," Michael Carvin, the fund's lawyer, said at the Dec. 21 oral arguments. In its desire to insulate the board from political pressure, Congress created a quasi-independent entity that is unaccountable to the executive branch, he added.

Carvin, a partner in Jones Day's Washington office, argued in front of the Florida Supreme Court on behalf of George W. Bush in the 2000 Florida election-recount controversy. The fund's counsel on the case includes other Republican luminaries, such as Kenneth Starr, who as independent counsel investigated President Bill Clinton and is now the dean of Pepperdine University's law school, and former Bush Justice Department official Viet Dinh, now a professor at Georgetown University Law Center.

The PCAOB has broad powers to set the standards regulating accounting firms and to investigate and bring disciplinary proceedings against noncompliant firms. Carvin argued that the exercise of this broad power makes the board's five members "principal officers" under the appointments clause of the Constitution, who must be appointed by the president with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The board's attorney, Jeffrey Lamken, a D.C.-based partner with Baker Botts and head of the firm's Supreme Court and appellate practice, countered that the board's members are, in fact, "inferior officers" under the appointments clause, because they are subject to pervasive supervision and oversight by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

But Carvin added that even accepting the government's argument that the board's members are inferior officers, the way in which they are appointed violates the appointments clause because they are appointed by the SEC as a whole, rather than the SEC chairman. The appointments clause calls for inferior officers to be appointed by the head of a department, he said.

Moreover, the way in which the board is structured, with broad powers and minimal oversight, violates separation-of-powers principles, Carvin argued. The Constitution requires that, at a minimum, the president have broad removal authority over all those who wield executive power. But the president has no say in removing board members and no ability to review the board's policies; he is effectively divested of any ability to control the PCAOB, Carvin said.

In fact, the president couldn't even do anything to fire a "board member who had engaged in Watergate-like crimes," Carvin added.

But Lamken argued that the Constitution doesn't require the president to have direct power to remove and supervise inferior officers such as the PCAOB members. "The board doesn't exist in a vacuum; it realizes everything it does is under SEC review," Lamken said, noting that the SEC reviews the board's regulations and decisions, can remove board members, has veto power over the board's budget, and controls the scope of the board's authority. For example, rules the board establishes aren't enforced until the SEC approves them, and sanctions issued by the board are stayed until the SEC reviews them.

Moreover, Lamken pointed out that Beckstead could have asked the SEC to review the report the PCAOB issued as a result of its investigation, but it had never done so.

Executive action

Meanwhile, the government, which intervened in the case, wasn't sympathetic to the fund's claims that the board encroached on executive authority. The Justice Department's Robert Katerberg said the executive branch didn't take such claims lightly, but had concluded that "executive power isn't infringed."

Katerberg reiterated Lamken's argument that Sarbanes-Oxley vested the SEC with review power over every final legal action the PCAOB takes. He added that beyond those review powers, the SEC has the authority to create an even more rigorous system of oversight to rein in the board.

The fund, he claimed, was looking at Sarbanes-Oxley with a "jaundiced" view. "It's impossible not to come to the conclusion that they are looking for constitutional problems," Katerberg said and asked the judge to dismiss the case.

Robertson said he would rule as soon as he could. Although the attorneys at the Dec. 21 hearing argued the merits of the case, the judge could still throw it out on a technical issue. Robertson still has not ruled on the board's motion to dismiss made in May of last year, in which the board claimed that the plaintiffs should have challenged the board's rules before the SEC before being able to bring the lawsuit in court.

Meanwhile, late last month the SEC and the board announced proposed changes to some of Sarbanes-Oxley's most controversial provisions. The changes would relax the rules in the act's Section 404, which regulates how auditors sign off on the effectiveness of public companies' internal controls.

Alexia Garamfalvi can be contacted at agaramfalvi@alm.com.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Audit Questions Costs, Use Of Justice Grants (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — Thousands of Justice Department grants aimed at assisting police and local public-safety programs have been mismanaged, and auditors questioned $726 million in costs over eight years, according to an internal review released Wednesday by the department's inspector general.

Federal auditors found a backlog of more than 12,000 expired grants that had not been properly "closed out," meaning any legal, compliance or audit issues were not fully resolved. Money that could have been applied to other crime-fighting programs was left unused.

"If the grants had been closed out more timely, hundreds of millions of dollars in questioned costs could have been used to provide the Department of Justice with additional resources to fund other programs or returned to the federal government's general fund," the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General concluded in its report.

Federal auditors reviewed $25 billion in grants managed by the Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS), Office of Justice Programs (OJP) and the Office on Violence Against Women (OVW) between 1997 and 2005, before concluding that Justice had "substantially failed" to ensure that grants were closed out appropriately.

The audit also found that more than $106 million was awarded to recipients that did not comply with federal grant rules, such as reporting how the grant money was being used.

A sample of these unidentified grant recipients revealed 37 were awarded 129 additional grants.

Justice officials in the three designated agencies, the primary sources of grant funding to state, local and tribal governments, acknowledged delays in settling grant accounts.

In a written response, Assistant Attorney General Regina Schofield said the department established a system in August to track the grant "close-out" process.

The department said the $290 million, which the audit identified as "questioned costs," were appropriate reimbursements to grant recipients for costs incurred during the funding periods, Schofield said.

The COPS program, established under the Clinton administration to hire an additional 100,000 police officers, has been the target of past criticism for its grant management program.

COPS Director Carl Peed said in a written response that the office was conducting an agency-wide review of "all current close-out policies and practices."

"The inspector general's report states the grant-making components of the Department of Justice are doing a better job of working with grantees to make sure that grants are spent in a timely effective manner," Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said.

In recent years, police agencies, dogged by recent increases in violent crime and thinning ranks, have called for a reinvigoration of the COPS hiring program, which is being phased out.

DOJ_NMG_0112304

Audit Finds Failed Grant Handling (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

The Justice Department's failure to administer federal grants "appropriately and in a timely manner" tied up hundreds of millions of dollars that could have been used for other programs or returned to the government's general fund, an audit said yesterday.

The 97-page audit by the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General (OIG) said that, as a result of the department's failure with grant programs, $726 million was tied up.

The audit said unused grant funds totaling an additional $172 million that were more than 90 days past the grant expiration date had not been freed up.

It also identified a backlog of 12,000 other expired grants, 67 percent of which had been void for more than two years; said 41 percent of the expired grants did not comply with financial- and program-reporting requirements; and noted that the department had awarded 129 new grants worth $106 million to noncompliant grantees.

"While the federal government continues to play an important role in crime-fighting, much of the responsibility for crime control and prevention rests with state, local and tribal governments," said Inspector General Glenn A. Fine, noting that the Justice Department has awarded billions of dollars in grants to help state and local governments improve their ability to prevent crime and administer criminal-justice programs.

"The timely closeout of grants is an essential financial management practice to identify any excess and unallowable funds that should be returned by the grantee, as well as unused funds that should be deobligated and put to better use," Mr. Fine said.

Only 13 percent of the department's grants, the audit said, were officially closed within required time frames after the programs expired. It also said that more than 8,000 grants had yet to be closed two years after their expiration date, and that the government improperly paid $554 million to programs after the grants expired.

Within the department, the Office of Community Oriented Policing Services, the Office of Justice Programs (OJP) and the Office on Violence Against Women are the primary agencies responsible for providing criminal-justice grant funding to state, local and tribal governments.

From Oct. 1, 1999, through March 31, according to the audit, the department awarded 49,151 grants with funds totaling $23.65 billion.

Officials in the three grant-writing agencies acknowledged the problems and agreed generally with most of 44 recommendations outlined in the inspector general's audit. They said delays were caused in many cases by state and local authorities who asked for more time to carry out the grants.

But the Office of Justice Programs, in a written response to the audit, denied allowing grant money to be spent on unauthorized projects, saying it has "never been OJP's practice to allow grantees to draw down any funds for unsupported expenditures."

Prior audits by OIG also have raised significant concerns on grant closeout and oversight procedures within the department. Grant management has been listed by the inspector general as one of the department's top 10 management challenges for the past six years.

Audit: Agency Grants Had Lax Oversight (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 4, 2007

Lax oversight of federal law enforcement grants tied up hundreds of millions of dollars for eight years and potentially shortchanged state and local crime-fighting programs, a Justice Department audit found Wednesday.

The report by Inspector General Glenn A. Fine found that leftover money from thousands of expired grants between October 1997 and December 2005 sat unused because officials failed to keep close track of the programs once they ended.

If the offices had dealt with expired grants in a timely fashion, "hundreds of millions of dollars in questioned costs could have been used to provide the DOJ with additional resources to fund other programs or returned to the federal government's general fund," the audit concluded.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse disputed the bulk of the audit's findings and said that Congress last year took back $125 million in unused money from expired grants. He said Fine's office mistakenly interpreted regulations that govern the grant programs that, if followed, would deprive state, local and tribal authorities of funding.

DOJ_NMG_0112305

At issue is the way three Justice Department offices manage grants for state, local and tribal law enforcement agencies. Fine's office has repeatedly raised what it termed serious concerns with the department's oversight of the grants for community policing, prosecuting crimes against women, and others awarded by the Office of Justice Programs.

The audit looked at nearly 61,000 grants, worth $25 billion, that expired during the eight-year period. Among its findings:

_Only 13 percent of the grants were officially closed — meaning that any administrative, compliance, legal, and audit issues were resolved — within required timeframes after the programs expired. More than 8,000 grants had yet to be closed two years after their expiration date.

_The department gave 129 grants, worth $106 million, to authorities that ultimately did not comply with program requirements, including reporting back how the money was being used.

_The government improperly paid $554 million to programs after the grants expired.

_An estimated $172 million in unused funding had not been redirected to other programs or returned to the Treasury within required timeframes.

In all, the delays tied up more than $726 million that could have been spent elsewhere, the audit concluded.

Justice Department officials in the three offices that managed the grants acknowledged the problems and generally agreed with most of the recommendations to fix them. But they said, in at least some cases, the delays were caused by state and local authorities who asked for more time to carry out the grants.

In a letter responding to the report, the Office of Justice Programs denied suggestions that it allows grant money to be spent on unauthorized projects. "It has not, and has never been OJP's practice to allow grantees to draw down any funds for unsupported expenditures," the letter said.

___

On the Net:

The Justice Department audit can be found at: http://www.usdoj.gov/oig/reports/OJP/a0705/final.pdf

Prosecutors Demand Files Of 3 House Panels (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

The subpoenas step up a U.S. probe of earmarks in spending measures.

WASHINGTON — Federal prosecutors in San Diego have subpoenaed documents from three House committees as part of an investigation into special-interest earmarks in spending bills.

The demand ratchets up an investigation by the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego into contracts awarded by the Defense Department and other agencies. The probe stems from the bribery case against Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe), who pleaded guilty and resigned in 2005.

The scope of the investigation is unclear, although the request for documents is considered unusually broad.

The subpoenas, which follow a failed attempt by the Justice Department to persuade the Republican Congress to voluntarily turn over thousands of documents, could test Democrats' pledge to reform ethics in the new Congress. Last year, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) — who today becomes House speaker — opposed a broad-based Justice Department search warrant targeting Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.).

The subpoenas went to the armed services, appropriations and intelligence committees, whose Republican chairmen reported the subpoenas to outgoing House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) in letters dated two weeks ago.

The subpoenas were made public Wednesday by the Congressional Record online. The House is supposed to turn over the requested records by Jan. 11 or else file an objection with the U.S. District Court in San Diego. Typically, such deadlines are extended.

Prosecutors in San Diego and a spokesman for the general counsel of the House declined to comment, and a Pelosi spokeswoman had no immediate comment.

The subpoenas are an escalation of a nine-month tug-of-war between the Justice Department and House Republicans. Prosecutors had asked the committees to turn over the information voluntarily.

House leaders and their lawyers consider the request constitutionally suspect, saying it runs afoul of the "speech or debate" clause, which protects members of Congress from prosecution for their legislative acts, including earmarks. Some have also complained that the committees would need months to compile such data.

None of the requested documents had been turned over as of Wednesday.

Pelosi campaigned in the fall on a platform of open and honest government, and has made one of her first orders of business an ethics package that would identify members of Congress who inserted earmarks for pet projects into bills.

DOJ_NMG_0112306

The use of earmarks has tripled over the last decade, the Congressional Research Service estimates, with 13,000 earmarks in the last fiscal year adding more than $67 billion to spending bills.

The "speech or debate" privilege is at the core of a legal fight over an FBI search of Jefferson's congressional office in May. The search and seizure of documents followed an FBI sting in which about $90,000 in foil-wrapped $100 bills was found in the freezer of Jefferson's Washington home.

Pelosi and Hastert criticized the office raid and urged the government to return the seized documents. Pelosi later led a successful effort to strip Jefferson of an influential committee assignment until the federal corruption investigation was completed. (Jefferson has not been charged.)

Former Rep. Cunningham is serving an eight-year prison term after pleading guilty to taking $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors and evading more than $1 million in taxes.

A House Intelligence Committee report issued in October concluded that Cunningham had used his position on that panel to steer more than $70 million to companies run by cronies, with much of the money going to businessman Brent R. Wilkes of Poway, Calif.

Wilkes remains under investigation.

The San Diego federal prosecutors have also been examining the relationship between Wilkes and Kyle Dustin "Dusty" Foggo, who resigned as CIA executive director in the spring after federal agents searched his office and home.

Investigators have examined at least one contract that was awarded to Wilkes while Foggo was a senior CIA procurement officer in Germany.

rick.schmitt@latimes.com

Los Angeles Seeks Federal Help To Fight Gangs (LAT)

By Megan Garvey And Patrick Mcgreevy

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa on Wednesday appealed to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales for additional funding and prosecutorial help to combat gang-related crime, kicking off what officials say will be a year-long push to tackle one of the region's most intractable problems.

In the city of Los Angeles, gang crime increased 14 percent in 2006 -- the first rise in four years) and an uptick Villaraigosa and William J. Bratton, chief of the Los Angeles Police Department, say threatens to overshadow last year's overall 8 percent drop in serious and violent crime across the city.

"We agreed that Los Angeles is the epicenter of the nation's gang crisis, and an effective assault on gang crime will require increased suppression, intervention and prevention measures," Villaraigosa said after his 40-minute meeting with Gonzales in Washington, D.C.

The mayor sought millions of dollars in federal grants to target gangs in several trouble spots. In addition, the mayor said he would like the attorney general to provide help in prosecuting civil-rights cases when gang members target others based on race.

Bratton met with Sheriff Lee Baca this week to discuss the rise in racially motivated gang violence and map out ways to better coordinate their gang units, particularly in cases where gangs have shown a pattern of targeting victims because race.

"It's getting to where those rivalries are racially motivated and innocent people are getting shot," Baca said Wednesday.

The latest push to tackle gang crime comes on the heels of numerous anti-gang initiatives -- none of which have done much to diminish the influence and damage done by the region's scores of active street gangs.

A recent report prepared by civil-rights attorney Connie Rice found Los Angeles' gang efforts have floundered because of a lack of coordination among 23 anti-gang programs spread throughout city departments at a cost of $82 million a year.

"What the city is doing is designed to fail," Rice said Wednesday, again calling for a dramatic change in anti-gang efforts. "It's not about altering a program. It's about a paradigm shift. We need smart suppression, not blanket suppression."

Support has grown for creating a "gang czar" to coordinate efforts, something sources say Rice is expected to recommend in a follow-up report due this month. Bratton and others have said they would back such a shift.

LAPD officials blamed the jump in gang crime in part on racial tensions in county jails that resulted in riots earlier this year. At the same time, efforts to get gang members off the streets for minor crimes has been hampered by conditions in the county's jail system, the largest in the nation.

While gang injunctions and computer modeling have helped reduce gang activity in some areas, the early release of inmates from county jails -- where officials say the vast majority of those booked admit a gang affiliation -- has put many charged with offenses such as weapons violations or simple assaults quickly back on the street. More than 150,000 inmates sentenced to county jail have been released since mid-2002 after serving small fractions of their sentences because of budget cutbacks and federal orders against overcrowding.

DOJ_NMG_0112307

The latest police pledge to deal with gang violence is one of many Malcolm Klein, a emeritus professor of sociology at the University of Southern California, has heard over the years.

"We've had this gang problem for multiple decades, and there is no reason to think its going to go away," said Klein, who has studied gang issues for 40 years. "The chief has been here four years, and he's shown very little understanding of gangs.'"

Street gangs come out of local communities that must change and be organized to reduce gang crime, the criminologist said.

Law enforcement officials say police presence remains key to improving dangerous communities. They point to Compton, where an aggressive Sheriff's Department crackdown last year led to a dramatic drop in killings there. In 2006, there were 45 homicides in areas patrolled by the Compton sheriff's station, which includes the city of Compton and nearby unincorporated areas. The year before they had 75. Within the city of Compton itself, last year there were 39 homicides, equaling a 20-year low in 2004.

"I think the more gang members realize that that level of field force is present its going to cause them to back off," said Capt. Ray Peavy, who heads the sheriff's homicide bureau. "Everyone says: 'What are we going to do about the gang problem?' It's the same thing you do about cockroaches or insects, you get someone in there to do whatever they can do to get rid of those creatures."

Baca said a substantial turnaround in local gang activity would "take some significant transformation within the policing community itself."

"Bratton and I have both said you can't arrest your way out of a gang problem," Baca said. "The real problem is these young people don't have an alternative for gangs."

Wes McBride, president of the California Gang Investigators Association, agreed that suppression can only do so much.

"When the cop goes down the street in his car, he may own that street for that moment," McBride said, "but once he's off the street the gangs fill in behind them unless there's another cop car right around the corner."

Ex-coroner's Office Worker Pleads Guilty, To Cooperate (PPG)

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, January 4, 2007

The former chief histologist in the Allegheny County coroner's office pleaded guilty yesterday to three federal charges and agreed to cooperate with prosecutors.

George Hollis, 60, originally was indicted on nine counts, but the remaining six will be dismissed at sentencing.

Mr. Hollis pleaded guilty to theft from an organization that receives federal funds, failure to file a tax return and making false statements.

He also agreed to "provide truthful assistance to the United States," presumably in the upcoming trial of his former boss, Dr. Cyril H. Wecht.

Mr. Hollis was indicted, along with Dr. Wecht, the former county coroner, last year. Dr. Wecht, a forensic pathologist, is charged with 84 counts that accuse him of using his public office for private gain. His trial has been put on hold while the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decides whether the judge in the case should be replaced.

Mr. Hollis, who prepared tissue slides in the office, was employed there until early 2005. During his public employment, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen S. Stallings, Mr. Hollis also did work for Dr. Wecht's private firm, Cyril H. Wecht and Pathology Associates Inc.

During the plea hearing yesterday, Mr. Stallings told U.S. District Judge Arthur J. Schwab that Mr. Hollis spent a "significant and substantial" part of his county work week doing private work.

The amount of lost public time attributable to Mr. Hollis' theft charge is $51,146, Mr. Stallings said. The loss from his failure to pay taxes was $12,182, he added.

The charge for making a false statement stemmed from an interview with the FBI in April 2005 in which Mr. Hollis said he only worked for Dr. Wecht's private business on weekends, Mr. Stallings said.

Former Allegheny County Coroner Aide Pleads Guilty (AP)

AP, January 4, 2007

PITTSBURGH (AP) — A former employee of the Allegheny County Coroner's Office pleaded guilty Wednesday to lying to the FBI during an investigation into former coroner Dr. Cyril Wecht.

DOJ_NMG_0112308

George T. Hollis, 60, pleaded guilty in federal court to making false statements to law enforcement, theft from an organization that receives federal funds and failing to file a tax return.

As part of his plea deal with the U.S. Attorney's office, he also agreed to cooperate in any future proceedings.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Stallings told District Judge Arthur J. Schwab that Hollis spent a "significant and substantial" part of his county work week doing histology work for Wecht's private business. A histologist studies bodily tissue.

Hollis' theft charge related to the value of public time allegedly lost while he did Wecht's private work. Stallings figured the loss at $51,146.

Wecht was indicted in January on charges of using county employees to do work for his private pathology practice.

Hollis is scheduled to be sentenced on March 23.

McFadden-Weaver Indicted In Mortgage Fraud Case (KMBC)

KMBC-TV, January 4, 2007

Councilwoman Says She Won't Resign

KANSAS CITY, Mo. -- Kansas City Councilwoman Saundra McFadden-Weaver and two others were indicted Wednesday in a suspected mortgage fraud scheme.

The seven-count indictment handed down in Kansas City federal court alleged conspiracy and wire fraud. Also indicted were Emanuel Kind, whom the councilwoman has described as an acquaintance and minority contractor. Ricky Hamilton, an employee of a mortgage company in Grandview, was also named.

"I've never intentionally broke the law, and I'm not about to start today," McFadden-Weaver said during a news conference.

The Kansas City Star reported in August that McFadden-Weaver bought a $400,000 Lee's Summit home in 2005. McFadden-Weaver signed mortgage documents attesting that she would live in the home, which would have violated a city charter requirement that she live inside the council district she represents.

McFadden-Weaver said she trusted Kind to make the loan payments.

"I trusted him and he didn't live up to his responsibilities. Now it looks like I've done something wrong," McFadden-Weaver said.

She told KMBC's Micheal Mahoney that she will not resign from the City Council and will continue to campaign for re-election this spring.

COUNCILWOMAN CHARGED WITH MORTGAGE FRAUD (KCS)

By Mark Morris, Lynn Horsley And Michael Mansur

The Kansas City Star, January 4, 2007

A Kansas City councilwoman said Wednesday she had no plans to resign despite federal mortgage-fraud charges filed against her earlier in the day.

Speaking at City Hall at the moment federal prosecutors announced the charges at a courthouse news conference, 3rd District Councilwoman Saundra McFadden-Weaver said she still intended to seek re-election this spring.

“I’m sure in the near future I will be vindicated,” she said of the indictment, which pertains to her $400,000 purchase of a Lee’s Summit home.

Her attorney, Ron Partee, also said the councilwoman would fight the allegations.

“While the indictment is not unexpected, we welcome the opportunity to contest these allegations in court,” Partee said. “We feel confident that the councilwoman will be totally vindicated of any criminal conduct.”

In addition to McFadden-Weaver, 47, the grand jury indicted Emanuel M. Kind, 51, a contractor whom the councilwoman has described as an acquaintance, and Ricky Hamilton, 52, an employee of a Grandview mortgage company.

Hamilton declined Wednesday to comment.

R. Pete Smith, an attorney for Kind, said he would reserve comment until he had time to review the indictment.

Each defendant faces one charge of conspiracy and six counts of wire fraud. If convicted, each could be sentenced to up to five years for conspiracy and 20 years on each of the fraud counts. But actual sentences generally are much lower for defendants without extensive criminal records.

At its core, the government’s case alleges that Kind and McFadden-Weaver — pastor at Community Fellowship Church of Jesus Christ — constructed an elaborate financial scheme to provide her with money to renovate a home on Benton Boulevard that she wanted to purchase from her church.

U.S. Attorney Bradley Schlozman said that after McFadden-Weaver failed to get financing for the renovations, she approached Kind in September 2005 to purchase a home in Lee’s Summit. Under the deal, the $400,000 mortgage would have paid for the home and provided McFadden-Weaver with about $35,000 for the renovations. Kind would have lived in the Lee's Summit home.

DOJ_NMG_0112309

Prosecutors contended that in loan documents, McFadden-Weaver misrepresented her income and promised to live in the Lee's Summit house, which would have violated a city charter requirement that she live in her council district.

"Had the lender known the full truth about McFadden-Weaver's finances or residency intentions, she would have either never received the loan in the first place or she would have had to pay a much higher interest rate," Schlozman said.

Hamilton was charged because he agreed to broker the loan knowing that McFadden-Weaver did not intend to live in Lee's Summit or be responsible for the property.

Ultimately, she bought the house, but never lived in it or made payments on it. After she and Kind unsuccessfully tried to refinance it, a bank foreclosed on the property for $255,500.

Since The Kansas City Star first reported irregularities with the mortgage in August, McFadden-Weaver has said she had not closely read the loan documents. She said Wednesday she trusted others that the deal was legitimate.

"I endeavored to help the wrong person," she said.

McFadden-Weaver held her impromptu news conference near a City Hall room where the city's Ethics Commission was deliberating behind closed doors over its investigation of the councilwoman.

McFadden-Weaver smiled for cameras and cited her successes as a council member, including being the only one to survive a recall vote. She made clear she had no intention of stepping down from the council or backing down from her re-election bid.

"I haven't done anything to feel guilty about, so I don't," she said.

She did say she may have been wrong in trusting Kind.

"He didn't take care of his responsibilities," she said.

McFadden-Weaver added that she probably should have taken more time to examine the loan closing documents. But she suggested she was the victim of a growing national problem of mortgage fraud.

Two hours later, the ethics panel emerged from executive session. Members declined to comment, saying they will issue findings soon.

The commission, inactive this decade until McFadden-Weaver requested its review, has met regularly since October, taking testimony from the councilwoman and others, including the escrow closer who said McFadden-Weaver received clear explanation of the documents she was signing and appeared to understand what she was signing.

Under the city's charter, council members are not required to resign if they face indictment.

Several of McFadden-Weaver's council colleagues said her decision to remain in office was a personal choice and she deserved her day in court. But Councilwoman Becky Nace said council members should be above reproach in their business dealings.

"Clearly, she's made an error in judgment in this instance," Nace said. "I think she should consider resigning her seat."

Mayor Kay Barnes said that although the charges were not related to McFadden-Weaver's public service, they were serious allegations.

"Of course, she is entitled to the presumption of innocence and will have every opportunity to defend herself against these allegations," Barnes said. "At the same time, the citizens of the 3rd Council District are also entitled to full and competent representation. It is important that Councilwoman McFadden-Weaver recognize that obligation."

Mortgage fraud has been a high-profile prosecution priority in western Missouri since summer 2004, when authorities began filing a series of cases against real estate investors and appraisers for transactions in Jackson County.

McFadden-Weaver narrowly lost runs for the council in 1995 and 1999 before she defeated Ron Finley in 2003 with 59 percent of the vote.

But her tenure has been rocky.

She clashed with Barnes in 2004 over her stance on a new downtown arena, and she beat back the recall election — the city's first — in February 2005. Disgruntled constituents cited a variety of complaints about her performance when they mounted the recall effort.

In October, the Missouri Ethics Commission fined McFadden-Weaver $10,000 for problems related to her council campaign committee. She filed campaign finance reports months late and did not properly identify contributors and expenditures, the commission said.

Supporters have said McFadden-Weaver has been unfairly attacked. They contend she still has strong backing in her district. She said she has worked hard to support programs for children and youth, to combat absentee landlords, to promote job opportunities for minorities, and to make sure affordable housing was available in her district.

DOJ_NMG_0112310

McFadden-Weaver is not the first council member to become ensnared in a federal investigation. In the mid 1990s, three council members — Michael Hernandez, Chuck Weber and D. Jeanne Robinson — were convicted of public corruption charges involving real estate transactions and financial irregularities.

@Go to KansasCity.com for video from City Hall.

Councilwoman Saundra McFadden-Weaver's indictment also pertains to her $400,000 purchase of a Lee's Summit home. A bank foreclosed on the property for $255,500.

KC Councilwoman Is Indicted For Mortgage Fraud (KCBIZ)

Kansas City Business Journal, January 4, 2007

Kansas City Councilwoman Saundra McFadden-Weaver was indicted on seven counts of conspiracy and wire fraud for her alleged role in a mortgage fraud scheme.

Also named in the indictment were Emanuel M. Kind and Ricky L. Hamilton.

A federal grand jury in Kansas City returned the indictment against the three at 12:15 p.m. Wednesday, said Bradley Schlozman, U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Missouri.

McFadden-Weaver, 47, and Kind, 51, both live in Kansas City. Hamilton, 52, lives in Grandview and is a mortgage broker at Trinity Mortgage.

The charges against McFadden-Weaver do not involve public money.

The first count of the indictment alleges that McFadden-Weaver, Kind and Hamilton conspired to defraud mortgage lenders by agreeing that McFadden-Weaver would get a loan to buy a home at 301 S.E. Hackamore in Lee's Summit. The alleged plan was to have Kind live in the house and pay the mortgage and other expenses, Schlozman said in a release.

McFadden-Weaver received two loans for a total of $400,000, which she used to buy the Lee's Summit house and to rehabilitate a house at 2518 Benton Blvd. in Kansas City.

Hamilton agreed to broker the loans for McFadden-Weaver, knowing that she did not intend to live in the Lee's Summit house and would have no responsibility for the property, according to the indictment.

As part of the alleged conspiracy, Schlozman said, the three prepared material false and fraudulent and misleading loan applications and documents in support of the loan applications, which were submitted to MILA Inc., a mortgage lending company with main office in Mountlake Terrace, Wash. MILA approved the loans based on the false information.

The lender lost $150,000 on the loans when the property was foreclosed on, Schlozman said.

The defendants each face maximum sentences of five years in prison for each conspiracy charge and 20 years for each wire fraud charge.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Linda Parker Marshall prosecuted the case, which the FBI investigated.

Bruno, Despite Investigation, Re-elected Senate Majority Leader (AP)

By Mark Johnson, The Associated Press

AP, January 4, 2007

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno, who faces a federal inquiry into his outside business activities, was unanimously re-elected to his post Wednesday.

Bruno, 77, retained his position as the most powerful Republican in the Legislature on a voice vote and no one expressed opposition.

Bruno, who staged a coup against fellow Republican Ralph Marino to become majority leader in late 1994, stunned colleagues two weeks ago when he announced he is under federal scrutiny. Among other things, Bruno runs a private consulting business.

Advertisement

The investigation appears to center on Bruno's dealings with businessman Jared Abbruzzese and some of his associates. Bruno directed $500,000 in state grants over the past two years to a private company linked to Abbruzzese.

Bruno has said did nothing wrong and was cooperating with the investigation that he said began in the spring of this year.

"Judge me by what I have done, not what I have not done," Bruno said Wednesday.

Only one GOP state senator, John Bonacic of Orange County, had called for Bruno's ouster before Wednesday's vote. He said the investigation can be used against Republicans in the 2008 election.

Bonacic walked out as the rest of the chamber approved Bruno.

"I told Sen. Bruno I wasn't going to support him and I didn't want to make a speech on the floor," he told The Associated Press. "It would have been disrespectful to him and his family. This was the only way I knew to make sure everyone knew I wasn't supporting him."

Republicans hold a 33-28 majority in the Senate with the departure of state Sen. Michael Balboni. He is joining Gov. Eliot Spitzer's administration to head anti-terrorism efforts.

Sen. Malcolm Smith, a Queens Democrat, was tapped as Senate minority leader.

Assemblyman Ron Canestrari, an Albany County Democrat, was named Assembly majority leader. Canestrari, who heads the Assembly's Higher Education Committee, replaces Paul Tokasz of Cheektowaga who retired from the Assembly at the end of last year. Tokasz had been majority leader since January 2001.

Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver was re-elected to his position as well. He has served as speaker since 1994. Democrats hold a 108-42 advantage in the Assembly.

Republican James Tedisco of Schenectady is continuing as Assembly minority leader.

Watchdog Sparked FBI Probe, Barks Bruno Pal (NYDN)

By Joe Mahoney, Daily News Albany Bureau Chief

New York Daily News, January 4, 2007

ALBANY - A top ally of embattled state Senate Majority Leader Joe Bruno blamed lobbying watchdog David Grandeau yesterday for stirring up the FBI probe of New York's most powerful Republican.

"I have no doubt David Grandeau is behind this," Sen. Dale Volker (R-Depew) told the Daily News yesterday, after Bruno (R-Rensselaer) swept to reelection as Senate president.

Volker also maintained that Bruno is "not the target" of the FBI, and said his boss has been beyond cooperative with investigators.

"He didn't even wait to get a subpoena" to send the feds all pertinent records, Volker said.

Grandeau shrugged off Volker's accusation, saying the lawmaker can offer no proof to support his claim.

"Who cares what Sen. Volker says?" he said.

FBI officials have declined to discuss the probe.

Grandeau, the executive director of the state Lobbying Commission, was once employed by a telecommunications company Bruno owned. Capitol insiders said the relationship between the two became strained in 2004 after a Bruno aide tried unsuccessfully to persuade Grandeau to drop an investigation into a Las Vegas casino that gave Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver (D-Manhattan) a discounted rate on a luxury room.

Bruno declined yesterday to respond to questions concerning the FBI probe.

Before Bruno was reelected to lead the Senate, the only GOP senator who has publicly called on him to step down, John Bonacic of New Paltz, walked out of the chamber, refusing to vote.

Man Sentenced To 26 Years In Rosenbaum Killing (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

One of the men who killed New York Times journalist David E. Rosenbaum last year was sentenced yesterday to 26 years in prison.

Originally charged with first-degree murder, Michael C. Hamlin, 24, could have faced a life sentence had he not agreed to plead guilty to second-degree murder and testify against his cousin and co-defendant, Percey Jordan.

Prosecutors said Jordan was the assailant who actually struck Rosenbaum on a Northwest Washington street last Jan. 6. Jordan was convicted in October of first-degree murder and is to be sentenced Jan. 12 in D.C. Superior Court.

Rosenbaum, 63, died two days after he was robbed and beaten on Gramercy Street while taking an after-dinner walk in his neighborhood. What looked like a brutal, random attack soon swelled into a scandal, as investigators uncovered a string of errors in the emergency medical care provided to Rosenbaum, at the scene, in the ambulance and at Howard University Hospital, where he died.

During his campaign for mayor, Adrian M. Fenty blasted the chief of the Department of D.C. Fire and Emergency Medical Services for the failings. Last week, Fenty named an interim chief to replace Adrian H. Thompson as head of the department while the search for a permanent successor continues.

Rosenbaum's family, frustrated by what they say has been a lack of candor from the city and the hospital, filed a $20 million lawsuit in November in D.C. Superior Court, claiming he was a victim of official negligence and medical malpractice.

But yesterday was not about the emergency medical workers who assumed that Rosenbaum was a drunk old man who had taken a fall, or about the hospital emergency room workers who let Rosenbaum languish on a gurney, oblivious to his grave head injuries, or about any of the other errors catalogued in a 69-page report issued in June by the District's inspector general.

DOJ_NMG_0112312

It was about the man a family still grieves for a year later, and about the man who came home from work one night last January and chose to join his cousin on a violent ride around Washington.

On the surface, Hamlin seemed an unlikely participant. He had a steady job collecting trash for a private hauler and lived with his mother, whom he dutifully drove to her weekly card game before venturing out that Friday night.

His cousin, Jordan, 43, lived closer to the fringes, often sleeping in cars and hustling for money. Testifying at Jordan's trial, Hamlin said Jordan wanted to do the robbery and struck Rosenbaum repeatedly.

Yesterday, he turned to Rosenbaum's relatives and asked for their forgiveness, telling them that they are "in his prayers" every night.

None of the relatives who addressed the court -- Rosenbaum's brother Marcus, son Daniel and son-in-law Toby, who is married to Rosenbaum's daughter, Dottie -- was prepared to offer such compassion yesterday.

Instead they spoke of the man they lost and the need for justice to be done.

"He was kind and he was the one I looked up to and wanted to emulate," Daniel Rosenbaum told Judge Erik P. Christian.

Now all he can think about is his dad dying on a cold sidewalk, all alone.

"I am haunted by the nightmare Michael Hamlin and his cousin inflicted on him -- and on me," Daniel Rosenbaum said.

Prosecutors Move To Dismiss Charges Against Former Scout Leader (AP)

AP, January 4, 2007

NEW HAVEN, Conn. -- Federal prosecutors have moved to dismiss charges against a retired FBI agent who was indicted on child sex charges dating back more than a decade when he was a Boy Scout leader, in response to the death of his accuser.

William Hutton, 63, of Killingworth, was arrested in February on charges that allege he enticed a member of his Scout troop to Maine for the purpose of sexual activity in 1994 and 1995.

Prosecutor John A. Danaher III moved to dismiss the indictment on Dec. 19, and Judge Mark R. Kravitz granted the motion three days later, federal court records show.

On Dec. 26, the prosecutor moved to dismiss a revised indictment that had been returned by a federal grand jury in late March. There was no indication in court records that Kravitz has issued a ruling on that indictment.

Both indictments alleged crimes against the same person, who has never been publicly identified. The newer indictment added allegations that an August 1995 trip also included a stop in New Hampshire for illegal sexual activity.

Both of Danaher's motions cited "the sudden and unexpected death" of the accuser.

Hutton's lawyer, Hugh F. Keefe of New Haven, stressed Hutton had pleaded not guilty.

"Mr. Hutton was very upset by the news of the passing of the gentleman," Keefe said.

Hutton had been released on a $200,000 bond. He may not own any firearms or have any unsupervised contact with children. He was also ordered to stay away from playgrounds, schools, arcades or anywhere children congregate.

The case had been scheduled to go to trial this month in U.S. District Court in New Haven.

Federal Trial Set For James Kopp In Killing Of Abortion Provider (NSDY/AP)

By Carolyn Thompson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 4, 2007

BUFFALO, N.Y. -- More than eight years after James Kopp gunned down an abortion provider in his home, the government will get its chance to prosecute the anti-abortion extremist already convicted of murder _ with the goal of eliminating any distant chance for his release.

Kopp, 52, is serving a 25-year-to-life state sentence after being found guilty of second-degree murder in the 1998 sniper slaying of Dr. Barnett Slepian.

In a federal trial starting this week, the government will argue that by shooting an abortion provider, Kopp violated the 1994 Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act. He is also charged with using a firearm _ a Russian assault rifle _ during a violent crime.

Conviction could carry a sentence of life without parole.

Although Kopp will be in his 70s before becoming eligible for release on the existing conviction, U.S. Attorney Terrance Flynn said consideration for Slepian's family factored into the decision to move forward on the federal charges.

"It was and has been from the beginning, the position of the Department of Justice that we would seek this life-without-parole conviction by a jury and that Mrs. Slepian and her four sons will never be subject to going through a parole hearing in their life," Flynn said.

National Abortion Federation President Vicki Saporta said the aggressive prosecution also would serve as a deterrent to those who share Kopp's extreme views.

DOJ_NMG_0112313

"It's very important that we have laws like FACE and that they are, in fact, enforced," Saporta said.

Authorities hunted 2 1/2 years for Kopp after the shooting, adding him _ along with Osama bin Laden _ to the FBI's list of the Ten Most Wanted fugitives in June 1999. Kopp was captured in Dinan, France in March 2001.

Slepian's widow, Lynne, plans to testify about the Oct. 23, 1998, shooting, which happened just after the family arrived home from a memorial service for the doctor's late father.

One of the Slepian children called 911 after a bullet pierced a double-paned kitchen window, traveled through his father's body and ricocheted off a cabinet and tile wall before landing next to the fireplace in the living room.

Slepian, struck in the back, was bleeding profusely when medics arrived at the stately suburban Amherst home. He was pronounced dead in a hospital emergency room.

"You will hear (Lynne Slepian's) testimony with respect to the heinous act and all the events that led up to her husband's death in their home in front of her children," Flynn said. The testimony will be difficult, Flynn said, but "we feel that it's important that the public hear Mrs. Slepian tell what happened."

Kopp, meanwhile, after parting ways with a handful of lawyers, has been preparing his own defense from the Niagara County jail.

In numerous typewritten motions, the lifelong activist known among peers as "Atomic Dog," has sought to have the federal charges thrown out, arguing among other things that the shooting did not take place at a clinic entrance.

He also failed in a bid to tell jurors that the shooting was justified because it was intended to save the lives of soon-to-be aborted babies.

U.S. District Judge Richard Arcara ruled that a so-called necessity defense does not apply when someone is trying to prevent legal behavior, such as abortion. Kopp will not even be allowed to talk about his religious or moral reasons for opposing abortion, the judge ruled.

Kopp, who is suspected in four nonfatal shootings of doctors in Rochester and Canada in the decade before Slepian's death, has said he was only trying to wound Slepian to prevent him from performing abortions the following day. The bullet, he said, took a "crazy ricochet."

"How can a man get a fair trial if he's not allowed to say, `This is why I did this?'" said John Tomasello, a Kopp supporter who met the activist when they were both arrested during an abortion protest in Burlington, Vt., in 1990.

Tomasello, listed as a character witness for Kopp, said supporters plan to be outside the courthouse with signs during the trial, but that they would honor a judge's order barring abortion-related pins and clothing from the courtroom. U.S. Marshals have been instructed to screen every person attending the trial for such displays.

Flynn said extra security is planned at the courthouse in Buffalo, a city that has seen violent anti-abortion protests in the past. More than 600 people were arrested during "Spring of Life" protests that blocked clinics and doctors' offices for two weeks in 1992.

Since Slepian's shooting, extreme violence against U.S. abortion clinics and providers has steadily waned, according to NAF. Last year, there were no successful violent attacks, though two potential arsons were thwarted when the suspects' acquaintances tipped off police, Saporta said. In 1998, the year Slepian was shot, NAF tracked four clinic arsons, a bombing and numerous incidents of acid being spread at clinics.

Saporta attributed the decline to improved law enforcement responses to clinic violence and the willingness of authorities to track down and prosecute extremists like Kopp and bomber Eric Rudolph.

Jury selection is scheduled to begin Thursday and opening statements are expected on Tuesday.

Coca-Cola Tries To Block Theft Suspect's Access To Sensitive Information (FINDLAW/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 4, 2007

(AP) - ATLANTA-The Coca-Cola Co. sought Wednesday to block a defense lawyer's request for documents in a trade secrets theft case that relate to products the world's largest beverage maker developed but never launched.

The Atlanta-based company filed a motion in federal court to quash a subpoena by Joya Williams' lawyer for the documents in preparation for Williams' Jan. 16 trial. Williams is charged with conspiring to steal trade secrets from Coca-Cola in an effort to sell them to rival Pepsi.

Two co-defendants have already pleaded guilty in the case, and at least one is expected to testify against Williams, a former Coca-Cola secretary who worked for the company's global brand director at its headquarters.

According to the motion, Williams' lawyer, Janice Singer, has subpoenaed 19 categories of records from Coca-Cola.

DOJ_NMG_0112314

The company is objecting to production of two of the categories: documents reflecting all products Coca-Cola developed or which were in development which it decided not to launch within the last three years, and documents reflecting all marketing strategies formulated by or for Coca-Cola that were termed confidential or secret but were not used in the last three years.

Company lawyer Stephen Cowen said Singer's request for those categories of documents amounts to a "fishing expedition" for material that is sensitive and considered valuable trade secret information.

"Although the company may have determined in the recent past not to launch certain products under development or not to adopt certain marketing strategies, the unused products and strategies still very much constitute trade secrets," Cowen wrote.

Singer did not immediately return a call to her office Wednesday seeking comment.

Williams, Edmund Duhaney and Ibrahim Dimson were indicted July 11 on federal conspiracy charges. The three were accused of stealing new product samples and confidential documents from Coca-Cola and trying to sell them to Purchase, New York-based PepsiCo Inc.

The alleged plans were foiled after Pepsi warned Coca-Cola.

Williams has since been fired from her job at Coca-Cola. She has pleaded not guilty.

Former Qualcomm Employee Sentenced To 3 Years' Probation For Stealing Trade Secrets (SDUT/AP)

By Elliot Spagat, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 4, 2007

SAN DIEGO – A former Qualcomm Inc. employee who downloaded nearly 450,000 files of secret source code to his home computer before quitting to take a job with rival Nokia Corp. was sentenced to three years' probation Wednesday for stealing trade secrets.

Michael Laude, 47, had code that represented “virtually all of Qualcomm's product line,” according to the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego.

A thorough investigation produced no evidence that he shared the code with his new employers at Nokia, a major Qualcomm rival, said Mitch Dembin, an assistant U.S. attorney, though Laude “had enough information to bring Qualcomm to its knees.”

A Nokia spokesman, William Plummer, said Nokia was unaware of the theft and never benefited from stolen information. Nokia cooperated with the federal investigation.

Qualcomm, which licenses technology for mobile phones and manufactures semiconductor chips that run them, is embroiled in legal and trade disputes with Nokia and other companies that contend Qualcomm extracts excessive royalty payments for its devices.

Laude's attorney, Jeremy Warren, said his client made a mistake by failing to return the information when he left Qualcomm.

“It's a sad case because he's been a law-abiding guy his whole life and he got into trouble because he's a pack rat,” Warren said. “It's been a very embarrassing moment in his life but, fortunately, no one got hurt here at all.”

Laude held engineering and product management jobs at San Diego-based Qualcomm from June 1992 to October 2002, when he gave a day's notice that he was leaving. The following week, he joined Nokia, which is based in Espoo, Finland.

He pleaded guilty in October 2006 and was sentenced by U.S. District Judge James Lorenz in San Diego federal court.

Technology companies often grant engineers broad access to proprietary code as a way to foster innovation, Dembin said.

“They have always wanted engineers to play with the code, experiment with it, work on it 24 hours a day,” he said. “That's why they have couches and video games in the office.”

Qualcomm raised concerns about Laude to the FBI after Nokia identified him in 2004 as an architect of a software platform designed to compete with Qualcomm's own products, according to the federal government and Qualcomm.

Laude downloaded more than 300,000 Qualcomm files to his home computer during a two-week period after the company granted him access in June 2002 and amassed nearly 150,000 more on his hard drive before leaving the company four months later, the government said.

Qualcomm has since tightened its security practices, said Alex Rogers, a company attorney.

“Our assessment so far is that we were fortunate there was no damage,” he said.

Ex-police Officer Gets 15 Years For Child Porn (FWNS)

The Fort Wayne News-Sentinel, January 4, 2007

MIDDLETOWN, Ind. - A former Henry County police officer was sentenced to 15 years in federal prison for producing child pornography.

U.S. District Court Judge David F. Hamilton sentenced Eric A. Rinehart, 34, of Middletown on Wednesday on two counts of producing pornography that showed minors engaging in sexually explicit conduct, U.S. Attorney Susan Brooks said.

Rinehart, who pleaded guilty to the charges, admitted to making sexually explicit photos and movies involving minors then 16 and 17 years old. The government seized Rinehart's camera and computer, Brooks said.

Hamilton also ordered Rinehart to serve probation when he is released from prison, prosecutors said.

Rinehart had been a five-year member of the Middletown Police Department and a member of a Henry County SWAT team when state police and FBI agents arrested him Aug. 12 at his home in Middletown, about 10 miles southwest of Muncie. He has since resigned.

Educator Charged With Sex Abuse (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

Teacher-Coach, 41, Alleged to Have Had Relationship With 13-Year-Old Student

A 41-year-old D.C. public school teacher has been charged with having sex with a 13-year-old girl in what authorities say was one of several sexual encounters he had with the junior high school student.

Ricardo Roberts, a social studies teacher and basketball coach at J.H. Johnson Junior High School in Southeast Washington, was charged with first-degree child sex abuse after he was arrested last month at his Alexandria home.

He is being held without bond. School officials said he has been suspended from his job.

In charging documents filed after his arrest and in testimony yesterday in D.C. Superior Court, police said Roberts not only had sex with the girl in a classroom but also took her to his home and had sex with her there.

The alleged relationship came to light last month after a witness working in the school after hours Dec. 4 reported seeing the girl emerge from a room where Roberts had been seen changing his clothes a short time earlier, according to the charging papers.

The girl allegedly told a witness that she was in a sexual relationship with Roberts, and that led to a police investigation.

The charging documents gave this chronology of events:

When first interviewed Dec. 19, the girl denied that she and Roberts had sex. She acknowledged that there was talk around the school that she and Roberts were intimate, a rumor she attributed to her reputation for promiscuity.

Interviewed by police the same day at the school at 1400 Bruce Place SE, Roberts denied having a relationship with the girl. He, too, acknowledged rumors of a sexual relationship and, as the girl had, said such rumors were fueled by the girl's reputation for promiscuity, the documents said.

When the girl's mother learned of the investigation, she told police that she did not believe her daughter's account and brought her back to police for more questioning. In that interview, the girl said she had lied the day before because she didn't want to hurt "Coach Rob," who was her volleyball coach and social studies and homeroom teacher last year. She told detectives that between September and December, she and Roberts had sex several times, including two days earlier, on Dec. 18, at Roberts's home, the charging papers stated.

Arguing before Judge Lee F. Satterfield, Roberts's attorney, Kelli Neptune, assailed the credibility of the government's case.

But the prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark O'Brien, said that the witness statements corroborated key elements of the girl's account and that the girl was able to describe in detail the interior of the defendant's home.

The judge found a basis to proceed with the charge against Roberts, whose pregnant wife was in the courtroom yesterday, surrounded by relatives.

Staff writer V. Dion Haynes contributed to this report.

CIVIL LAW:

Seeking New Rule On Protective Gear, Unions File Lawsuit Against OSHA (HILL)

By Jessica Holzer

The Hill, January 4, 2007

The AFL-CIO and the largest union for food and commercial workers filed a lawsuit yesterday to force the Department of Labor to finalize a rule requiring employers to pay for face shields, rubber boots and other protective gear used by low-wage workers in the meatpacking, poultry and construction industries.

DOJ_NMG_0112316

The labor groups contend that the Bush administration has been willfully dragging its feet on completing the standard, which was proposed in 1999 by the Clinton-era Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA), due to an ideological opposition to regulating businesses.

OSHA proposed the regulation after the Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission ruled against the agency in a personal protective equipment (PPE) case, finding that the existing policy was ambiguous on whether employers should pay for PPE.

"The fact that they failed to do so is an indication of how loath they are to take any regulatory action," asserted Peg Seminario, who heads up workplace safety for the AFL-CIO.

A spokesman from the Labor Department said, "We got the press release before the actual complaint arrived, so we are reviewing it now and we'll have more to say in the near future."

The rule would not impose sweeping changes, as the vast majority of businesses already comply with OSHA's longstanding policy that employers, and not employees, pay for protective gear. By OSHA's own estimates, only roughly one in 10 workers covers the cost of such equipment himself.

"It's just not fair to those workers," said Jackie Nowell of the United Food and Commercial Workers (UFCW).

In its most recent notice in November, OSHA vowed to complete the rulemaking by May. But the agency has missed its self-imposed deadlines to finalize the standard since it first promised to do so by July 2000, despite pressure from Congress.

In each of the past four years, the House Appropriations Committee has criticized OSHA's inaction on the rule, and the Senate Appropriations Committee chimed in last year. In 2003, the Congressional Hispanic Caucus joined with the AFL-CIO and the UFCW to petition the agency to complete the rule.

"I'm hopeful that this lawsuit will compel OSHA to implement the rule it promised eight years ago to protect the safety of low-wage workers … We shouldn't have to compromise worker safety for the corporate bottom line," said Rep. Linda Sanchez (D-Calif.), a member of the caucus.

Nowell said that the unions took a deliberately "apolitical" approach by challenging the administration in court rather than pushing for legislation. But she conceded that the shift in power in Congress would put added pressure on OSHA to act.

"I think they'll see that there's another route," she said.

Lack Of Rules On Protective Gear Brings Suit Against Labor Dept. (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

The A.F.L.-C.I.O. and the United Food and Commercial Workers sued the Department of Labor yesterday, asserting that it broke the law by failing to issue regulations requiring employers to pay for protective equipment for their workers.

The two labor organizations said it was wrong for the Labor Department to require employers to provide protective equipment like helmets, face shields and gloves, while often letting employers charge workers for that equipment.

The groups complained that the Labor Department under President Bush had not issued final rules based on those the Clinton Labor Department proposed in 1999. Those proposals would have required companies to pay for all employee protective equipment required by the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, part of the Labor Department.

In an unusual move, the A.F.L.-C.I.O and the food workers' union asked the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit to order Secretary of Labor Elaine L. Chao to issue final rules.

The A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s president, John J. Sweeney, said, "The Bush administration's failure to implement even this most basic safety rule spotlights how it has turned its back on workers in this country."

David James, a Labor Department spokesman, said officials were studying the lawsuit. He said the case "deals with complicated issues that will affect different employers and employees in different ways."

Mr. James said the department had reason to hesitate to turn the 1999 proposal into a final, enforceable rule. "The department takes pride in its excellent safety and enforcement records," he said. "But on this issue, a number of public comments we received take issue with the factual assumptions" in the rule proposed in 1999.

The lawsuit notes that by OSHA's own estimates 400,000 workers have been injured and 50 have died because of the absence of a rule.

A.F.L.-C.I.O. officials said the Labor Department was violating laws on administrative procedures and occupational safety by failing to issue final rules.

In 2004, Richard E. Fairfax, OSHA's director for enforcement, wrote a letter to a corporate safety director saying that while federal regulations required employers to provide personal protective equipment to ensure its use, "OSHA does not view this section as imposing an enforceable obligation on employers to pay for the P.P.E.," a reference to such equipment.

DOJ_NMG_0112317

Peg Seminario, the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s director of occupational safety and health, said that some meat and poultry companies required employees to pay for gloves and that some welding companies required them to pay for visors even though federal rules said employers must provide them.She said that 20 million workers used required protective equipment and that most employers did pay for it.

Joseph Hansen, president of the United Food and Commercial Workers said, "Nothing is standing in the way of OSHA issuing a final rule to protect worker safety and health except the will to do so."

Agencies Warned About Firing Probationary Employees (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

Most federal employees spend a year on probation after being hired, and the rules for job tryouts make it relatively easy for managers to weed out poor performers and show them the door.

But a new report suggests that agencies can no longer assume they have such leeway. Two federal court rulings have found that federal employees on probation may be entitled to challenge the merits of their dismissal, just as a permanent civil service employee can.

"Agencies must now proceed with caution when terminating probationary employees because the cost of violating a probationer's pre-termination procedural rights can be high," said the report by the Merit Systems Protection Board, released this week.

In addition to paying the cost of litigation, federal agencies may be ordered to reinstate people in their jobs and give them back pay and benefits, the report said.

The MSPB report said that "agencies are still learning about the impact" of the court rulings, though one case was decided in 1999 and the other in 2003.

In the two cases, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit interpreted federal employment law and regulations to allow certain employees on probation to challenge agency decisions to end their employment.

An employee in one of the cases had been hired by the Health and Human Services Department in 1991 and was subject to the completion of a one-year probationary period. The employee completed probation, and in 1999, she asked to be moved to a job with the Air Force.

Because the employee was taking a new assignment, the Air Force decided to place her on probation for a year. About six months after the hiring, the Air Force let her go and said the termination had come during her probationary period.

The employee appealed, and the Federal Circuit found that she should be treated as a regular civil service employee, with rights to challenge her dismissal, because she had served for longer than a year in the government.

The MSPB report pointed out that the Office of Personnel Management has not amended federal regulations or the advice it provides agencies about how to determine when employees qualify for full job rights. The report recommended that OPM modify regulations to conform with the court rulings.

Kerry B. McTigue, general counsel at the OPM, said officials are reviewing the MSPB report and "truly considering our options." But he added that the OPM would prefer to have Congress change civil-service law to clarify probation periods and when a person gains procedural rights to challenge management's decisions.

The Bush administration proposed a legislative fix in 2005 as part of a larger, draft personnel bill that Congress has not taken up, McTigue said. New personnel laws for the Defense and Homeland Security departments do make clear the rules for job tryouts for those large workforces, he said.

The merit board regularly provides reports to the president and Congress on civil-service issues, and board members hear appeals from federal employees who face major disciplinary action by their agencies.The Numbers on Open Season

More than 690,000 federal employees and retirees signed up for dental and vision insurance benefits during the program's inaugural enrollment season, the OPM announced.

Interest in the new insurance program increased in the closing days of the enrollment period, jamming the program's Web site and telephone line. The snarl prompted the OPM to accept "belated enrollments" through Dec. 22 rather than end enrollments on Dec. 11 as planned.

Congress approved the program after learning in hearings that dental benefits provided to federal employees had not kept pace with benefits offered in the private sector. The new program permits federal employees to use pretax payroll deductions to pay dental and vision premiums.

The OPM also announced that 227,000 federal employees have opened flexible spending accounts for 2007 to help pay their out-of-pocket medical bills and to help pay dependent care costs. Flexible-spending enrollments are up by 26 percent over the previous year, the OPM said.

DOJ_NMG_0112318

Eugene Doctors' Case Faces Appeal (ERG)

By Tim Christie, The Register-Guard

Eugene (OR) Register-Guard, January 4, 2007

The U.S. Justice Department has appealed a judge's ruling that federal investigators could not gain access to a legal file created on behalf of four Eugene heart surgeons under investigation for alleged Medicare fraud.

Notice of the appeal to the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals was filed in U.S. District Court in Portland on Dec. 29.

Federal authorities want the appeals court to overturn U.S. District Judge Anna Brown's ruling that the four doctors each retained individual attorney-client privilege over the file. The documents in question were created by a Boston lawyer the doctors hired before they sold their practice to PeaceHealth, parent corporation of Sacred Heart Medical Center, in November 2004.

advertisement

Federal authorities want to see the file as part of their long-running investigation into the doctors.

The case involves Drs. David Duke, Stanley Baldwin, Warren Glover and the now-retired Richard Hicks, and their Eugene practice, Cardiovascular Surgical Associates.

The central allegation in the case, according to an affidavit filed in March by a federal investigator, is that the doctors billed Medicare and Medicaid for surgeries in which a single doctor would be listed as the lead surgeon on one operation and as the assisting surgeon on a second operation going on at the same time, or in which a single doctor would be shown assisting multiple surgeries that were happening at the same time.

Medicare regulations specifically prohibit doctors from billing for assisting more than one surgery at a time.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Bush Protesters Face Trial Over Signs At Parade (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Rubinkam, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 4, 2007

(AP) - ALLENTOWN, Pennsylvania-When protesters were arrested at a St. Patrick's Day parade while holding signs likening President George W. Bush to Adolf Hitler, the crowd cheered the police.

Police say the two protesters, Kurt Shotko and Victor Bobrzyk, were arrested only after they refused to stop blocking people's views of the parade last year in Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania. The American Civil Liberties Union suspects a more sinister motive: an attempt to stifle unpopular speech.

Charged with disorderly conduct and resisting arrest, the pair are scheduled for trial in Luzerne County Court this month.

"We think it was about the content of the speech. They weren't blocking anybody's view," said ACLU lawyer Paula Knudson, who is defending Shotko and Bobrzyk in court. "They were being very respectful of the people in the parade."

Police Chief Gerry Dessoye said his officers acted professionally and that the arrests were justified.

"The issue wasn't the size or necessarily the content of the signs; the issue was they were blocking the view," said Dessoye. He contended the case has nothing to do with free speech, and that the protesters "want to turn it into something more than it is."

Amateur video of the March 13 parade, which included Democratic Gov. Ed Rendell and U.S. Rep. Paul Kanjorski, a Pennsylvania Democrat, shows Shotko and Bobrzyk standing in the crowd along the sidewalk, holding aloft large signs attached to wooden poles.

Shotko's banner was headlined, "The Face of Fascism," and had a Hitler-like figure mouthing the words, "Let's steal from the poor, and use the money to kill for God." Below that read: "Stop the Bush crime family."

Bobrzyk's banner was headlined, "Global business creates slavery," and had the Hitler figure saying: "Work makes you free." Below that read: "Adolf Bush."

It is unclear from the video whether the signs blocked anybody's view. But according to a police affidavit, City Administrator J.J. Murphy, a top aide to Mayor Tom Leighton, approached Shotko and Bobrzyk and asked them to either lower the signs or move to the rear of the crowd.

"The signs had writing on them against the Bush administration and the federal government," the affidavit noted.

Police say the protesters refused Murphy's request, prompting him to ask police for their removal from the area.

The video depicts a brief scuffle between Bobrzyk and a police officer. As Bobrzyk and Shotko were placed in handcuffs, the video shows a friend of Shotko's trying to walk away with one of the signs, then an officer ripping it from her hands and throwing it to the ground.

DOJ_NMG_0112319

Shotko, 39, of Scranton, Pennsylvania, who has been staging public protests since the early 1990s and has previous convictions for disorderly conduct, and Bobrzyk, 68, a naturalized American citizen from Poland, face up to several years in prison if convicted.

"You're not going to stop me from trying to talk to people about where our country is at," said Shotko, a one-time congressional candidate. "I'm not afraid of doing time for my free speech."

Atheists Challenge The Religious Right (CSM)

By Jane Lampman

The Christian Science Monitor, January 4, 2007

For some time, the religious right has decried "secular humanism," a philosophy that rejects the supernatural or spiritual as a basis for moral decisionmaking. But now, nonbelievers are vigorously fighting back.

Only a small percentage of Americans admit to being nontheists (between 2 and 9 percent, depending on the poll), but that equates to many millions. And religionists' role in debates over stem-cell research and evolution vs. intelligent design - as well as radical religion in world conflicts - have galvanized some atheists to mount a counteroffensive.

In bestselling books, on websites, and with a national lobbying effort, atheists and other nontheists are challenging the growing religious influence in government and public life. Some are attacking the foundations of religion itself.

Two particularly provocative books, in fact, hit the top of Publishers Weekly's religion bestseller list in December. No. 1, "The God Delusion," by evolutionary biologist Richard Dawkins, and No. 2, "Letter to a Christian Nation," by writer Sam Harris, are no-holds-barred, antireligion polemics that call for the eradication of all manifestations of faith.

"I am attacking God, all gods, anything and everything supernatural, wherever and whenever they have been or will be invented," declares Dr. Dawkins, the famed Oxford professor who wrote "The Selfish Gene."

These offerings are so intolerant of religion of any kind - liberal, moderate, or fundamentalist - that some scientists and secularists have critiqued their peers for oversimplification and for a secular fundamentalism.

"They undermine their own case by writing in a language that suffers from many things they say are true of believers - intolerance, disrespect, extremism," says Alan Wolfe, a professor of religion at Boston College, who is a secularist and author of several books on American religious perspectives.

Yet the authors are anything but modest about their efforts to supplant faith with pure scientific rationality. While critics point out that religion is a genuine reflection of people's experience and will always exist, Mr. Harris suggests it could be equated with slavery, which once was widely acceptable, but eventually was looked upon with horror. He sees it as responsible for many of life's tragedies.

Harris first hit the bestseller bull's-eye in 2004 with "The End of Faith," and he says the responses to that book, particularly those from Christians, spurred his latest epistle.

A mere 96 pages, "Letter" may be dismissed by many for its condescending tone or overheated rhetoric. Yet its bold arguments offer a useful window into nontheist perspectives and could also startle some complacent religionists into a rethinking and refining of perceptions.

Many nontheists don't share this militant perspective, but have decided that keeping silent in religious America no longer makes sense. They are astonished that a majority of Americans question evolution and support teaching intelligent design in the science classroom. They are distressed over polls that show that at least half of Americans are unwilling to vote for an atheist despite the Constitution's requirement that there be no religious test for public office. And they contend that in recent years, Congress has passed bills and the president has issued executive orders that have privileged religion in inappropriate and unconstitutional ways.

As a result, seven organizations of nontheists - including atheists, freethinkers, humanists, and agnostics - began the Secular Coalition for America (SCA), a lobby seeking to increase the visibility and respectability of nontheistic viewpoints in the United States.

"In some parts of the country, children are ostracized if someone finds out their families are atheists," says Lori Lipman Brown, SCA director. "We need to educate the public that people who don't have a god belief can be good neighbors and friends and moral and ethical people."

They also intend to stand up vigorously for their rights. "Some people want to go back to a time when religion was imposed, such as official prayer in public schools," she adds. "For someone to say they can't practice their religion appropriately if all schoolchildren are not required to recite a public prayer is very disturbing."

The SCA intends to lobby the new Congress to override a presidential veto on stem-cell research and to repeal land-use legislation and other laws seen as "privileging one religion over other religions or over those who don't follow religion."

DOJ_NMG_0112320

Still, the group makes clear on its website that while it promotes reason and science as the bases for policymaking, it also supports religious tolerance.

"I have absolutely no problem with anyone believing differently than I believe, as long as they don't impose their religion on me or my government," says Ms. Brown, a former Nevada state senator.

To spotlight the prejudice against atheists holding public office - and to encourage atheists to "come out of the closet," SCA is sponsoring a contest to identify the highest US official who acknowledges being a nonbeliever. They expect to announce contest results in February.

Internet-based groups are also seeking to spread the atheist message, particularly among young adults. The Rational Response Squad (RRS) has chosen a provocative mode using the popular website YouTube. Their "blasphemy challenge" calls on young nonbelievers to create videos in which they renounce belief in the "sky God of Christianity" and upload it on the site; in return they'll receive a free documentary DVD, "The God Who Wasn't There," which includes interviews with Dawkins, Harris, and others. RRS is publicizing its campaign on 25 popular teen websites.

"We wanted to strike up more of a conversation about religion, and this was a way for people to show their nonbelief and encourage others to come out," says Brian Sapient, RRS cofounder.

Mr. Sapient says he was raised Catholic and then a born-again Christian, but later learned that many things he was taught were fictional. RRS now has some 20,000 people on message boards, with about 5,000 actively engaged in debunking religious claims, passing out fliers, and placing DVDs in churches.

As for the blasphemy challenge, "there's about 490 response videos so far, and 85,000 views on our trailer video," he says. Sapient acknowledges this approach may not persuade religious youths. "There are people with a more palatable approach to talking about religion," he says, "but I wonder if those people would be as effective if it weren't for us or Sam Harris or Richard Dawkins shaking up the group a bit."

He also insists that you don't really respect people unless you speak up when you think their beliefs are wrong. It's OK with him, he adds, if religious people try to convince him they are right.

Harris and Dawkins make it clear that they think faith has gotten off too easy for too long. Their books have spurred widespread commentary, much of it a strong critique of their arguments and lack of religious knowledge. But in a culture immersed in combativeness in politics and the media, the intemperate books are selling well.

Yet one critic, New York Times columnist Nicholas Kristof, calls for a truce: "We've suffered enough from religious intolerance that the last thing the world needs is irreligious intolerance."

The Truth About Oaths (USAT)

By Jonathan Turley

USA Today, January 4, 2007

T

he newest member of the Minnesota delegation, Keith Ellison, would appear to be the very model of a god-fearing congressman whom conservatives have longed for. Yet Ellison has been denounced as a constitutional blasphemer after discussing his upcoming oath of office. The problem was not with Ellison's oath, but with his god — Ellison is Muslim (our nation's first in Congress) and intends to use the Quran today to pledge to serve faithfully before Allah.

Judging from the outcry, one would think that Ellison wanted to use the January edition of Penthouse. America's permanently angry class of religious zealots has organized protests. Some have called for a law requiring that all members use the Bible — regardless of whether they believe a single word in it. They do not expect Ellison's conversion, they just want him (and presumably the two new Buddhist members) to pay tribute to their faith system.

President Bush has not addressed the controversy, even though it was started by one of his appointees — a rabid talk show host named Dennis Prager whom Bush appointed to the prestigious United States Holocaust Museum Board.

"Insofar as a member of Congress taking an oath to serve America and uphold its values is concerned," Prager wrote, "America is interested in only one book, the Bible. If you are incapable of taking an oath on that book, don't serve in Congress."

Bush's silence is curious given his tireless campaign against "Islamofascists," extremists who seek to force people to conform to their Islamic faith. In this age of hyphenated fascism, what do we call Jews or Christians who want to force non-believers to swear to the Bible? Judeo-Christofascists?

Of course, the comparison with Islamofascists might not be fair — to Islamofascists. Take the quintessential, Bush-certified Islamofascist regime of Iran. Under Article 3 of the Iranian Constitution, "members representing minority religious groups will take the oath mentioning their own holy books."

It appears that though the Iranian government denies the Holocaust and calls for the eradication of Israel, it views Prager's idea of requiring people to swear to someone else's faith to be … well … extreme. (Iran's parliament has had a Jewish member, Morris Motamed, for years — though the Jewish population is about 25,000 out of 70 million). Various experts on Iran told me that such tailoring of oaths to religions goes back to early Islam. Indeed, Tehran University professor Hossein Bashiriyeh explained that "an oath taken with a holy book other than one's own cannot be religiously and morally 'binding.' … In effect it will amount to not taking an oath at all."

DOJ_NMG_0112321

Nevertheless, last year, a North Carolina judge ruled that a Muslim would have to swear on a Bible rather than a Quran. His reason was a 1777 oath statute that referred to the use of "the Holy Scriptures" to guarantee that anyone lying would be "justly deprived of all the blessings of that holy book." Since Muslims are not seeking "the blessings of that holy book," it was the ultimate triumph of form over substance.

To their credit, various Jewish groups and leaders have denounced Prager, who is Jewish, as a bigot. The Anti-Defamation League called his views "intolerant, misinformed and downright un-American." (On the defensive, Prager recently suggested that he might accept Ellison's use of the Quran if he also brings a Bible "to honor it.")

Yet many leaders have supported Prager.

Rep. Virgil Goode, R-Va., even used Ellison as a lesson on illegal immigration. (Ellison was born in Detroit and converted to Islam in college.) Referring to "the Muslim representative from Minnesota," Goode stressed that "if American citizens don't wake up and adopt (my) position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Quran."

The powerful American Family Association has called for the use of the Bible for all members of Congress. AFA President Tim Wildmon explained that the Quran "represents a change in our society, our culture" if it is to be treated "as equivalent to the Holy Bible." In perhaps the only point of universal agreement, Wildmon noted that, "If calling the Bible superior to the Quran in American tradition and culture is intolerant, then I'm guilty."

Prager was equally unapologetic, dismissing the Quran as if it were some book-of-the-month selection: "Forgive me, but America should not give a hoot what Keith Ellison's favorite book is."

Both Prager and his allies show how intolerance is often based on ignorance. First, all members are actually sworn in at the same time using a generic oath that ends with "so help me God." The Bibles are pulled out for a later, purely ceremonial event for some members. Second, if Wildmon's law were passed, it would clearly violate Article VI of the Constitution, which states that "no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States."

Third, it is entirely untrue that, as Prager claims, the use of a non-Bible would be "the first break of the tradition of having a Bible present at a ceremony of installation of a public official since George Washington inaugurated the tradition." Presidents such as John Quincy Adams, Theodore Roosevelt and Herbert Hoover opted not to use the Bible (Adams used a legal book). Franklin Pierce declined to take a sworn oath at all and instead simply affirmed. Likewise, other members have foregone the Christian Bible. As recently as 2005, Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz, D-Fla., used a Tanakh, a Hebrew Bible without the New Testament, to be sworn into office.

Nevertheless, Prager insists "if Keith Ellison is allowed to change that, he will be doing more damage to the unity of America and to the value system that has formed this country than the terrorists of 9/11." Another possibility: that Prager and his allies are doing the greatest damage to the unity of America by fostering religious divisions and promoting prejudice as principle.

Just as fascism is the ugly face of nationalist politics, Judeo-Christofascism is the ugly face of faith-based politics. When Ellison takes the oath with his hand on Thomas Jefferson's copy of the Quran, he will reaffirm our most basic values as a country and, in a single elegant moment, defeat those who use but do not live the tenets of faith.

Jonathan Turley is the Shapiro Professor of Public Interest Law at George Washington University and a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors.

ANTITRUST:

Northrop Refiles Essex Bid With FTC (AP)

By Donna Borak, Ap Business Writer

AP, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON --Military contractor Northrop Grumman Corp. on Wednesday confirmed plans to refile its merger notice with federal regulators on its planned acquisition of small cybersecurity company Essex Corp.

Los Angeles-based Northrop confirmed Wednesday plans to withdraw and refile its pre-merger notice in order to extend the 30-day regulatory waiting period to provide additional time for federal antitrust authorities to review the proposed sale.

Analysts speculate possible stipulations in the proposed deal may not have been resolved ahead of the deadline, which could potentially delay the completion of the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0112322

"There's been some objections or additional information requested by the regulators," analyst Paul Nisbet of JSA Research Inc., said in a telephone interview. "They must see some various areas that have been pointed out to them by competitors and they're wanting to take a closer look at."

Northrop initially filed its pre-merger notification with the Federal Trade Commission shortly after it announced plans to buy Essex on Nov. 8 for $24 per share, or about $580 million in cash, including assumed debt.

The proposed deal requires the approval of Essex shareholders and the regulatory agency.

Despite the extended review, Essex said shareholders would still meet on Jan. 10 to vote on the proposed acquisition. The deal requires two-thirds majority vote for approval.

The Columbia, Md.-based provider of signal, image and information processing for U.S. intelligence and defense customers said last Friday it had been notified by Northrop on plans to withdraw and refile its pre-merger notice.

"The right people were just not available in the time frame," said Ed Jaehne, chief strategy officer for Essex Corp. Jaehne blamed it on the confluence of the end of the year holiday period and the classified nature of the work conducted by both companies.

Essex expects Northrop to refile its pre-merger notice with the Federal Trade Commission "very shortly" and for the proposed deal to close during the first quarter of 2007, as initially planned.

"We don't envision or expect there to be any issues ultimately from this," said Jaehne.

Representatives from Northrop Grumman and the FTC declined to provide further comment on the review.

Many observers view the acquisition as a way for the military contractor to expand its intelligence and defense offerings.

Essex is expected to be folded into Northrop Grumman Missions Systems division, considered to be one of the more highly classified areas of the defense company.

Antitrust and national security considerations such as the protection of the industrial base could be potential factors requiring additional time to review the acquisition, said Ray Bjorklund, a chief knowledge officer at Federal Sources, Inc., a research and consulting firm in McLean, Va.

Shares of Northrop gained 43 cents to close at $68.13 on the New York Stock Exchange, while shares of Essex gained 10 cents to $23.89 in aftermarket trading, after dropping 12 cents to $23.79 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Nokia, Samsung, Matsushita Sued Over Bluetooth (WSJ)

By Yun-hee Kim

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

A Seattle research foundation has filed a complaint against Matsushita Electric Industrial Co., Samsung Electronics Co. and Nokia Corp. for alleged violation of patents on products containing wireless Bluetooth chipsets.

Bluetooth allows two or more electronic devices to communicate with each other through a radio frequency rather than physical wire connections.

The suit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Washington on Dec. 21 by the Washington Research Foundation, alleges that the three, along with their U.S. units, used and imported into the U.S. products containing Bluetooth chipsets made by companies other than Washington Research licensee Broadcom Corp.

The complaint said the products contained Bluetooth chipsets made by CSR PLC of the U.K.

"Washington Research Foundation therefore does not assert infringement...with regard to any of defendants' products that use only Broadcom's licensed chipsets to enable Bluetooth technology," it said in the complaint. The research group is seeking unspecified damages. A Samsung Electronics spokeswoman acknowledged the company has been sued by the foundation but declined to comment further. Officials at Matsushita and Nokia couldn't be reached for comment.

ENVIRONMENT:

Oak Ridge Contractor Pays Price For Contaminating Local Creek (WATE)

By Tim Miller, 6 News Anchor/Reporter

WATE-TV, January 4, 2007

KNOXVILLE (WATE) -- The environmental cleanup firm Duratek Federal Services has paid a $300,000 fine for sending thousands of gallons of radioactive waste into a local creek.

Duratek pleaded guilty on December 20 to discharging up to 400,000 gallons of water containing radionuclides, into Bear Creek, near Oak Ridge in September of 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0112323

During a period of heavy rain, the company should have emptied overflow into a sediment pond as the permit required. But instead, the contaminated water was sent into a drainage ditch which emptied into the creek.

In announcing the fines at the U.S. Courthouse in Knoxville Wednesday afternoon, officials said Duratek had been contracted to clean up a site at an above-grade disposal facility on the Oak Ridge National Laboratory reservation.

An FBI special agent in charge said the company violated the trust put in them.

Guy Blackwell, a senior assistant U.S. attorney, was the lead prosecutor in the case. He said, "Their explanation was that we knew that we had to get it out of the ponds, we knew it was going to overflow, so we did the best we could under the circumstances. But that wasn't good enough for us."

Officials from the Tennessee Department of Environment and Conservation said the contamination did not do permanent damage to the environment or any health consequences, and that the company took immediate steps to ensure compliance with state and federal regulations.

Proceeds from the fine were distributed on Wednesday to several groups.

TDEC received $240,000 for the maintenance of the ATG Facility on Bear Creek Road. The site has long been in need of environmental cleanup.

$20,000 went to TVA Police for their criminal investigative division. The money will fund specialized training and equipment in the environmental field.

Checks were also presented to the Southern Environmental Enforcement Network Inc. and to the Economic Crimes Funds in the Seventh and Ninth Judicial Districts.

Duratek has since merged with Envirocare and BNG America and is now known as EnergySolutions.

Green Arlington (WP)

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

WITH A NEW Democratic Congress, you can expect to hear a lot more about global warming from federal legislators over the next two years. But as Congress and the White House inevitably spar over how and how much to cut greenhouse emissions, state and local governments across the country will choose to address climate change on their own. In the Washington area, the District and Montgomery County recently enacted solid measures to cut carbon emissions, joining states such as California and cities such as New York. Fortunately, other localities are following their lead.

Paul Ferguson, the new chairman of the Arlington County Board, announced this week that he wants to implement a raft of new measures to cut his jurisdiction's greenhouse emissions 10 percent by 2012. Under the plan, the county will voluntarily meet national "green" building standards -- which emphasize energy efficiency -- in its new public structures and give private developers incentives to do the same. Arlington will experiment with solar power panels and purchase 5 percent of its electricity from renewable sources -- at this point, energy from wind farms in West Virginia. And the county will plant more trees and pass out free energy-saving light bulbs.

The Post's Annie Gowen reported yesterday that slashing emissions will cost the county around $6 million -- a high price, perhaps, when the county is facing a budget shortfall. But, Mr. Ferguson points out, $5 million of that will go to improving public buildings, a cost spread out over years and mitigated by savings on electricity.

Altering building codes and encouraging the use of energy-efficient bulbs are some of the inexpensive yet effective ways to combat global climate change. Buildings alone are responsible for at least 38 percent of greenhouse emissions in the United States, and control over building codes and land use gives local governments the tools to quickly and relatively painlessly reduce that number. We hope that more cities, counties and states take note while the federal government fails to lead.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Releases Rehnquist Nomination Files (AP)

By MARK SHERMAN And PETE YOST, Associated Press Writers

AP, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) - The FBI was directed by two Republican administrations to run background checks on Senate witnesses critical of William Rehnquist, first when he was named to the Supreme Court in 1971 and again when he was nominated as chief justice in 1986.

Newly released FBI documents show that the inquiries were ordered by officials in the Nixon administration and in the Reagan administration.

In addition, the documents provide details about Rehnquist's dependence on painkillers.

The disclosures were among 1,561 pages released by the bureau to The Associated Press, other news organizations and scholars in response to requests made under the Freedom of Information Act following Rehnquist's death in September 2005.

Another 207 pages were withheld under the federal disclosure law, while the FBI said an entire section of Rehnquist's file could not be found.

Much of the FBI's file on Rehnquist appear to have been compiled almost exclusively for his two Senate confirmations - his initial nomination to the court by President Nixon and his nomination as chief justice by Reagan in 1986.

Democrats were hopeful the FBI would turn up damaging material from Rehnquist's past, principally on civil rights issues. Top Republican officials appeared determined to prevent surprises from sinking his nominations.

In 1971, Deputy Attorney General Richard Kleindienst directed the FBI to conduct criminal investigations of witnesses who were planning to testify at a Senate hearing against Rehnquist's confirmation.

Fifteen years later, the FBI once again was enlisted to conduct background checks on witnesses who were scheduled to testify against Rehnquist's nomination to become chief justice.

``Thurmond just gave these names to Bolton they will testify for the Democrats and we want to know what they are going to say," Justice Department official Gene Hickhock told a counterpart at the FBI, according to a memo in Rehnquist's file.

The late Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., was chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee in 1986 when Rehnquist was nominated to be chief justice. John Bolton, who resigned in December as President Bush's U.N. ambassador, was an assistant attorney general under Reagan.

Alexander Charns, a Durham, N.C., lawyer who also received the file and has extensively researched the FBI's relationship with the court, said the new disclosures show the two administrations went to some lengths to discredit Rehnquist opponents.

``In many ways, I guess it's the same old story of the political use of the FBI," Charns said.

The documents show that the FBI was aware in 1971 that Rehnquist had owned a home in Phoenix with a deed that allowed him to sell only to whites. The restrictive covenant was not disclosed until his 1986 confirmation hearings, at which Rehnquist said he became aware of the clause only days earlier.

Also detailed in the declassified file was Rehnquist's 1981 hospital stay for treatment of back pain and his dependence on powerful prescription pain-relief medication.

The FBI investigated his dependence on Placidyl, which Rehnquist had taken for at least 10 years, according to a summary of a 1970 medical examination.

When Rehnquist checked into a hospital in 1981 for a weeklong stay, doctors stopped administering the drug, causing what a hospital spokesman at the time said was a ``disturbance in mental clarity."

The FBI file, citing one of his physicians, said Rehnquist experienced withdrawal symptoms that included going to the hospital lobby in his pajamas in a bid to escape. He imagined that there was a Central Intelligence Agency plot against him, and he also seemed to discern changes in the patterns on the hospital curtains.

Rehnquist thought he heard voices outside his room discussing various plots against him.

The doctor said Placidyl is a highly toxic drug and that she could not understand why anyone would prescribe it, especially for long periods.

Prior to his hospitalization, Rehnquist occasionally slurred his speech in his questions to lawyers at Supreme Court arguments. Those problems ceased when he changed medications, the doctor said.

Charns said that some of the censored documents provide intriguing hints of what else Rehnquist's file might contain.

In one previously secret memo from 1971, an FBI official wrote, ``No persons interviewed during our current or 1969 investigation furnished information bearing adversely on Rehnquist's morals or professional integrity; however ..." The next third of the page is blacked out, under the disclosure law's exception for matters of national security.

``It would be nice to know what is still classified, three decades later," Charns said.

Rehnquist FBI File Sheds New Light On Drug Dependence, Confirmation Battles (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 4, 2007

The late Chief Justice William Rehnquist's Senate confirmation battles in 1971 and 1986 were more intense and political than previously known, according to a newly released FBI file that also offers dramatic new details about Rehnquist's 1981 hospitalization and dependence on a painkiller.

The FBI file on Rehnquist, released last week under the Freedom of Information Act, reveals that in 1971, as Rehnquist's confirmation hearings for associate justice approached, the Nixon Justice Department asked the FBI to run a criminal background check on at least two potential witnesses who were expected to testify against Rehnquist. Then-FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover approved the request.

In July 1986, when President Ronald Reagan nominated Rehnquist to be chief justice, the Justice Department asked the FBI to interview witnesses who were preparing to testify that Rehnquist had intimidated minority voters as a Republican Party official in Arizona in the early 1960s. According to a memo in the Rehnquist file, an unnamed FBI official cautioned that the department "should be sensitive to the possibility that Democrats could charge the Republicans of misusing the FBI and intimidating the Democrats' witnesses." But then-Assistant Attorney General John Bolton -- who more recently served as ambassador to the United Nations -- signed off on the request and said he would "accept responsibility should concerns be raised about the role of the FBI." It is unclear whether the FBI ever interviewed the witnesses.

Also in 1986, the FBI conducted an intensive investigation into Rehnquist's dependence on Placidyl, a strong painkiller that he had taken since the early 1970s for insomnia and back pain. Rehnquist's bout with drug dependence had been made public in 1981, when he was hospitalized for his back pain and suffered withdrawal symptoms when he stopped taking the drug.

The FBI's 1986 report on Rehnquist's drug dependence was not released at the time of his confirmation, though some Democratic senators wanted it made public. But it is in Rehnquist's now-public file, and it contains new details about his behavior during his weeklong hospital stay in December 1981. One physician whose name is blocked out told the FBI that Rehnquist expressed "bizarre ideas and outrageous thoughts. He imagined, for example, that there was a CIA plot against him."

The doctor said Rehnquist "had also gone to the lobby in his pajamas in order to try to escape." The doctor said Rehnquist's delirium was consistent with him suddenly stopping his apparent daily dose of 1400 milligrams of the drug -- nearly three times higher than the 500-milligram maximum recommended by physicians. The doctor said, "Any physician who prescribed it was practicing very bad medicine, bordering on malpractice."

A GROWING DEPENDENCY

These and other nuggets of information are contained in the 1,561 pages of Rehnquist's file, which the FBI released to researchers and others including Legal Times last week in response to Freedom of Information Act requests filed after he died in September 2005. The Privacy Act bars public disclosure of such files during a person's lifetime. But that protection falls away after death, and it has become common for researchers to seek the files after a famous person dies as a window into the FBI's practices.

Alexander Charns, a Durham, N.C., lawyer who also received the Rehnquist file last week, says it gives evidence "showing how the FBI and DOJ were out to discredit opponents of Rehnquist." Charns, who wrote a 1992 book on the relationship between the FBI and the high court, says that aspect of the Rehnquist file "besmirched the fine legwork of the agents on the street" who aggressively investigated Rehnquist's drug dependence and the allegations of Arizona voter intimidation.

University of Cambridge professor David Garrow, who has written extensively on the mental and physical health of Supreme Court justices through history, did not receive the Rehnquist file. But when told of the new information about Rehnquist's drug dependence, Garrow said it again raised questions about "the long-term effect on Rehnquist of taking so much of so powerful a drug for so long."

The file reveals that a primary focus of the 1986 investigation -- launched at the request of the Senate Judiciary Committee -- was identifying all the doctors who prescribed Placidyl to Rehnquist. A July 26, 1986, memo sent by then-FBI Director William Webster to the Washington, D.C., field office advised agents that some physicians already interviewed indicated Rehnquist had been taking Placidyl since before 1972 -- earlier than had been previously disclosed. Agents were told that if, during their investigation, they considered contacting Rehnquist himself, "concurrence must be obtained" first from headquarters. The FBI report ultimately concluded that Rehnquist was already taking Placidyl in 1970, when he was given a physical at a government facility. By the 1980s the drug had fallen out of favor because of its potency and side effects, and even in the 1970s it was recommended only for short-term use.

Though his name was blacked out, Dr. Freeman Cary, then the attending physician of the Capitol -- whose services are also available to Supreme Court justices -- told agents that he began prescribing Placidyl to Rehnquist in 1972 for insomnia and continued to do so until the 1981 episode. For six or seven months before Rehnquist's hospitalization in 1981, Cary indicated, Rehnquist was re-filling three-month prescriptions for Placidyl every month -- suggesting he was taking close to 1,500 milligrams daily instead of 500.

When Rehnquist went into George Washington University Hospital in December 1981, he was seeking relief for his back but, according to some of the physicians interviewed, also knew he had a drug problem. Rehnquist's episode with delusions came when doctors ended his Placidyl. Doctors then resumed his high dosage so as to wean him off the drug slowly, reducing gradually until he stopped taking the drug altogether in February 1982. At that point, doctors said Rehnquist was cured of his dependence.

When he was hospitalized in 1981, journalists who cover the Court recalled, Rehnquist had been having some difficulty speaking from the bench and slurred his words for several weeks. But there were no indications at the time that Rehnquist's ability to function as a justice was otherwise impaired. All of the physicians interviewed by the FBI in 1986 said his previous drug dependence did not disqualify him from being elevated to the position of chief justice.

DOJ_NMG_0112326

LEAVING NOTHING TO CHANCE

The 1986 investigation also included extensive interviews conducted to clarify Rehnquist's role as a Republican poll watcher in Arizona in the early 1960s. Witnesses had widely varying recollections, and the FBI did not offer the Senate a clear conclusion. It did suggest that at one point, when Rehnquist was explaining voter qualifications to fellow Republicans at a Phoenix polling place, some voters who overheard the conversation left, apparently discouraged.

Some of the 1971 memos make clear that, after the failure of two of its previous nominations to the Supreme Court --- Clement Haynsworth and G. Harrold Carswell -- the Nixon administration was leaving nothing to chance as Rehnquist's confirmation hearing approached.

An October 1971 memo from Alex Rosen to Clyde Tolson, two of Hoover's top aides, reported that then-Deputy Attorney General Richard Kleindienst had called "to have a criminal background check made" on two Phoenix residents -- their names are blocked out -- who were expected to give testimony that was critical of Rehnquist. At the bottom of the memo is a handwritten "ok" that was the characteristic mark of Hoover himself, according to Charns, the Durham lawyer.

A memo the next day reporting the results of the inquiry is heavily redacted, which could mean that the Phoenix office found some negative information on the two potential witnesses that was redacted to protect their privacy.

The FBI's interviews of other opponents of Rehnquist in 1971 became a matter of public controversy. The Washington Post reported on Oct. 29, 1971, that FBI agents had interviewed potential witnesses in five cities to find out, among other things, whether they would testify against Rehnquist and what they might say. Harvard Law School professor Laurence Tribe was visited by FBI agents three times, the story indicated. Hoover, always sensitive about negative publicity, was apparently upset about the Post article. Next to the clipping of the article, Hoover wrote, "Why do we ask if the person plans to fight the confirmation?"

This produced a flurry of memos between field offices and headquarters, but another aide to Hoover concluded that "none of the persons mentioned in the Washington Post article did pose any such questions as suggested in the news article."

A later letter to Attorney General John Mitchell, from a Harvard University official whose name is obscured, protested that anyone receiving such visits by the FBI would understandably find the visits "seriously intimidating." Mitchell forwarded the letter to Kleindienst, who asked Hoover what happened. In a Dec. 14 letter, Hoover assured Kleindienst that Tribe was only asked if he planned to study Rehnquist's record in the same way that he had studied the record of a previous potential nominee. "At no time was [Tribe] asked what he planned to do with any study he had made or might make," Hoover wrote. "He was never asked for any personal background information ... or the nature of his motivations."

Kleindienst then wrote to the Harvard official, "I have been assured and I am convinced" that Tribe had not been asked improper questions, and "any assumption that interviews were conducted with a view toward 'intimidation' is completely unjustified."

Even as the FBI was investigating Rehnquist's background, the bureau's legendary director was congratulating him on his nomination. In an Oct. 22, 1971, letter, Hoover told Rehnquist his nomination was "welcomed by all of us in law enforcement, as we know your judicial opinions will be in the best interest of all Americans."

During the 1971 investigation, some sources were not consulted by the FBI. An agent in the FBI office in Milwaukee, near where Rehnquist grew up, told headquarters that "because of the extreme ultra-liberal policies of the Milwaukee Journal and the Milwaukee Sentinel ... no inquiry [is] being conducted at these two newspapers." The level of detail is humorous at times. In the 1969 background check that preceded his nomination as assistant attorney general, Rehnquist acknowledged he might have been arrested in 1942.

Then a Kenyon College freshman, Rehnquist said, he went to Kent State University to visit a friend one weekend. Because of some miscommunication, the friend had left town, leaving Rehnquist with nowhere to stay. He said he "had no money with which to obtain a hotel room. I therefore lay down on the courthouse lawn at Ravenna, a neighboring town, to spend the night," Rehnquist told the FBI. "A policeman came along, told me that sleeping on the courthouse lawn was not allowed, that he would arrange for me to sleep in jail. This he did, and I believe, though I am not certain, that I was charged with vagrancy." Rehnquist added he was released the next morning and no further action was taken.

FBI No Longer Seeks Leaked Documents (MACT)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The Macon Telegraph, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON - The family of investigative reporter Jack Anderson is expressing relief that the government is no longer seeking to recover government documents that had been leaked to the late columnist during his long career.

DOJ_NMG_0112327

According to Anderson's biographer, George Washington University journalism professor Mark Feldstein, he and family members had told the FBI there was no classified material in the hundreds of boxes holding Anderson's files.

The documents, which officials said might have contained classified information, were among the late columnist's confidential papers. They touched off a dispute between the FBI and the journalist's family and biographer.

"It was dusty old stuff that I couldn't imagine would be relevant to a criminal probe," Feldstein said.

The revelation that the government was backing off came in a letter dated Nov. 30, from Acting Associate Attorney General James H. Clinger, which was posted Wednesday on the Web site of the Federation of American Scientists.

Clinger's letter was addressed to outgoing Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa. It did not explain why the FBI had dropped the probe, and a Republican aide to the committee said Wednesday that was also unclear to lawmakers.

In response to questions posed by the committee, Clinger wrote: "The FBI met with the Anderson family in an effort to review the files with their consent. At this time, the FBI is not seeking to reclaim any documents."

An FBI spokesman declined to comment Wednesday evening.

"We've been holding our breath, wondering if they were going to come after us further," Feldstein said. "I'm relieved to hear they have backed away from what I think was a pretty egregious overreach, to be going after papers of a dead reporter for classified documents from decades ago."

Anderson died at age 83 in December 2005, after a career in which he broke several big scandals and earned a place on former President Nixon's "enemies list." Authorities on several occasions tried to find the source of leaked information that became a staple of his syndicated column.

Not long after his funeral, FBI agents called Anderson's widow to say they wanted to search his papers.

At the time, the FBI confirmed it wanted to remove any classified materials from Anderson's archives, located at George Washington University, before they are made available to the public. An FBI spokesman said then that the bureau had determined that some of Anderson's papers contained classified information about sources and methods used by U.S. intelligence agencies.

Anderson's son and his biographer said they were questioned by agents who expressed interest in documents that would aid the government's case against two former lobbyists for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee who have been charged with disclosing classified information.

Sentence Cut For Cooperating Son In Cocaine Cartel Case (ORS/AP)

By Associated Press

The Orlando Sentinel, January 4, 2007

MIAMI -- A Colombian man was rewarded with a nearly 17-year prison sentence reduction for helping prosecutors find billions of dollars in drug-tainted assets in the Cali cocaine cartel case against his kingpin father and uncle, court records show.

William Rodriguez Abadia, 41, now has just more than four years to serve on his own drug trafficking conviction after U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno last month approved chopping his initial prison term from nearly 22 years.

While reduced sentences are not uncommon for cooperating defendants, a cut of this magnitude is rare. But Rodriguez Abadia's lawyer, Humberto Dominguez, said Wednesday the decision reflects the extraordinary assistance his client rendered in one of the federal government's biggest drug cases ever.

"It's sort of unprecedented," Dominguez said. "If you go this far, you get these types of rewards. This type of case should set the standard."

But Rodriguez Abadia knows that he, his wife and two young daughters can never return to Colombia, where cooperation with prosecutors is not acceptable in the violent cocaine underworld, Dominguez said. "They would be killed and they know it, in a heartbeat," he said.

Rodriguez Abadia is the son of Miguel Rodriguez Orejuela and nephew of Gilberto Rodriguez Orejuela, who pleaded guilty in September to U.S. drug charges and are each serving 30-year prison sentences. The two brothers built the Cali cartel into the world's biggest cocaine supplier, once responsible for 80 percent of the cocaine smuggled into the United States.

The brothers made a deal with prosecutors to forfeit $2.1 billion in global assets. But they also won concessions for 28 family members in Colombia, guaranteeing that six will not be prosecuted and allowing all to win release from U.S. Treasury Department restrictions that had frozen their assets and imposed other financial shackles.

Rodriguez Abadia was played a key role in the kingpins' guilty pleas and the other agreements. He spent months with prosecutors going over the worldwide financial holdings of the family and providing details of the inner workings of the trafficking cartel itself. Most important, he agreed to testify against his father and uncle, but never had to because of the guilty pleas.

Rodriguez Abadia was a fugitive from U.S. justice from 2003 until early 2006, when he surrendered to U.S. authorities in Panama.

DOJ_NMG_0112328

Marc Seitles, the Miami attorney for the Colombian family members, said none of the others agreed to cooperate.

"Nonetheless, they understand William's decision to cooperate and support it. They understand the position he was in, facing charges in the United States," Seitles said.

Prosecutors in the office of U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta declined comment Wednesday. But in court papers, prosecutor Matthew Axelrod had recommended a sentence reduction of 13 years.

"The United States believes that the defendant has provided substantial assistance in the prosecution of others," Axelrod wrote.

Moreno went with the higher 17-year reduction after a hearing on Dec. 21. Rodriguez Abadia had pleaded guilty in March to conspiracy to import cocaine.

Miguel and Gilberto are currently serving their prison sentences at separate high-security facilities in Pennsylvania even though prosecutors recommended they be housed together at the Coleman prison near Orlando, according to Bureau of Prisons records. Rodriguez Abadia is serving his time in a Miami-area facility.

Dominguez said it's possible that after serving prison time Rodriguez Abadia and his family will enter the federal witness protection program, which would give them new identities, employment and a place to live at government expense.

"He may not need to. Things change in time. If things are hot, he will. If they are not, he won't," the attorney said.

Bank Fights Forfeiture Order On West Buildings (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), January 4, 2007

Though $1.2M loan would be paid, SunTrust seeks to retain rights to properties

A big chunk of Market Square could be on the auction block within months - if a bank's bid to battle a final order of forfeiture in the case of entrepreneur turned pot peddler Scott West doesn't interfere with the deal.

It looked uncomplicated for the Internal Revenue Service Criminal Investigation Division, the agency tasked with selling the Market Square buildings renovated with drug money, just a few weeks ago.

The U.S. Attorney's Office had filed a final order of forfeiture on the more than a half-dozen properties being seized as a result of West's ties to his brother's drug business.

In that order, the government agreed to pay off all claims filed against the properties, including a hefty note of more than $1.2 million that SunTrust Bank said was owed on a loan issued to West and his wife.

A bit of ink from a federal judge, and the buildings, which currently house businesses such as the popular Preservation Pub, would go up for sale to the highest bidder.

SunTrust is balking, however, filing late last week a motion in U.S. District Court asking federal Judge Thomas Phillips to set aside the forfeiture order and hold a hearing on its claim.

In short, the bank contends it should not have to give up its rights to Market Square buildings used as collateral on the loan "until such time as the entire debt secured is fully paid off according to its terms," attorney R. Louis Crossley Jr. wrote on behalf of the bank.

Crossley contends that the bank's claim is "superior to all other claimants and the United States." It is the federal government that should play second fiddle, allowing the bank to sell the property under the terms of the mortgage signed off on by the Wests, Crossley wrote.

The U.S. Attorney's Office has not had time yet to file a response. U.S. Attorney Russ Dedrick has repeatedly said his office has tried to act quickly in its handling of the case to maximize the value of the Market Square properties when the buildings go on the auction block.

It has only been six months since federal agents, including those with the IRS' criminal investigation division and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, raided properties owned by West and his wife as part of a probe into a decade-long drug distribution network headed up by West's brother.

Federal prosecutors Hugh Ward and David Jennings soon secured guilty pleas from West, in which he admitted funneling more than $2.5 million in drug money into his Market Square properties. His wife, brother and sister-in-law also pleaded guilty.

As part of those pleas, the quartet agreed to give up any interest they or other relatives had in the properties. That paved the way for the final forfeiture order.

To further speed up the process, the U.S. Attorney's Office did not contest the claims filed against the properties and agreed not only to pay those note holders, but also to fork out interest and attorneys fees.

The final order proposes the following figures be paid from a sale of the properties:

Knoxville's Industrial Development Board would rack up $4,511 in attorneys fees for its handling of lease agreements that had given West substantial tax breaks on four Market Square lots.

Cardinal Enterprises Inc., operated by Metro Pulse owner Brian Conley, would be paid more than $111,000 and interest at a rate of $22.86 for every day the firm is left holding its note until the properties are sold.

Jason M. Crippen and Rob Gratigny, listed as trustees, would receive more than $54,000 as well as a daily interest payment of $13.44.

SunTrust Bank would rack up more than $1.4 million as well as a daily interest rate of $205.52.

Clayton Bank would be paid more than $115,000 plus accrued interest at a daily rate of $27.85.

Massachusetts businessman Fikret Gencay would receive more than $400,000 plus daily interest payments of $32.07.

There are several other properties that will wind up on the auction block as a result of the West case, including properties in Hawaii owned by Mike West. An order on those properties has not yet been filed, however.

Jamie Satterfield may be reached at 865-342-6308.

Prosecutor Wants Prison Term For Tyson (AP)

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

PHOENIX (AP) -- Former heavyweight champ Mike Tyson was charged Wednesday with drug possession and driving under the influence of drugs, and the Maricopa County prosecutor says he wants to send him to prison.

"He has run out of second chances, at least in my book," attorney Andrew Thomas said in a news conference.

Tyson, 40, was charged with two felonies for drug possession and two misdemeanor counts of driving under the influence of drugs. If convicted of all four charges, he could be sentenced to between 2 1/4 and 7 1/2 years.

The charges stem from his arrest Friday in Scottsdale, where Tyson was pulled over after leaving a nightclub. An officer found bags of cocaine in his back pocket and another in a package of cigarettes in his car, according to court records.

Tyson's criminal attorney, Thomas Marlow, didn't return phone calls Wednesday from The Associated Press.

Tyson's arrest was the latest in a string of run-ins with the law, dating more than a decade.

In 1992, Tyson was convicted of rape in Indiana. Six years later, the former boxing champ pleaded no contest to misdemeanor assault charges in Maryland.

Thomas said Tyson's record makes him eligible for prison time instead of Arizona's drug treatment programs for nonviolent offenders.

"I don't take any pleasure out of doing this," Thomas said. "A week ago, my kids and I were watching Rocky Balboa in the movie theater, and we saw Mike Tyson make a cameo appearance in the movie, and now here we are and he's looking at going back to prison."

Tyson became the youngest heavyweight champion in history in 1986, when at 20 he knocked out Trevor Berbick. Four years later he was knocked out by James "Buster" Douglas. By 1997, Tyson's career hit its low point when he bit Evander Holyfield's ear during a fight.

Tyson recently got back in the ring for a series of four-round exhibitions. When announcing the world tour, Tyson told reporters he was deep in debt and wondered if people would still pay to watch him fight.

On Friday, Tyson was released without bond after a brief court appearance. He didn't make any comment to reporters, except to offer a greeting.

Thomas said Tyson should be back in court for a preliminary hearing within the next two weeks.

The car Tyson was driving was spotted weaving and nearly struck a police SUV after he ran a stop sign early Friday, according to a police probable cause statement filed in court. During the stop, police said they saw him trying to wipe a white powder off the console of his car.

No alcohol was detected in his system. But Thomas said Tyson failed a sobriety test and officers searching his vehicle found three bags that later tested positive for cocaine.

The officer who made the arrest wrote in his report that Tyson "admitted to using today and stated he is an addict and has a problem."

Tyson is required to submit to drug and alcohol testing and is prohibited from drinking or taking any nonprescription drugs while the case is pending.

County Files Criminal Drug Charges Against Mike Tyson (AR)

By Jahna Berry, The Arizona Republic

The Arizona Republic, January 4, 2007

Boxing legend Mike Tyson's bout with cocaine addiction could land him in prison for more than seven years if he's convicted on criminal charges filed Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0112330

The Maricopa County Attorney's Office filed a direct complaint that accused the Paradise Valley resident of felony drug possession as well as felony possession of drug paraphernalia and two misdemeanor counts of driving under the influence.

Tyson was arrested in Scottsdale on Friday morning after a police officer saw Tyson's black BMW driving erratically, according to court documents.

The officer found cocaine in Tyson's car, and the boxer disclosed that he was addicted to cocaine, court papers say.

On Wednesday, County Attorney Andrew Thomas stressed that Tyson won't get special treatment but acknowledged Tyson's lingering star power a few minutes later.

"I don't take any pleasure out of doing this," Thomas said. "A week ago, my kids and I were watching Rocky Balboa and we saw Mike Tyson make a cameo appearance in the movie. Now, here we are, and he's looking at going back to prison."

In a 2005 interview with The Arizona Republic, Tyson said he had mellowed over the years. But his previous run-ins with the law could haunt the boxer in court.

Because Tyson has convictions for violent crimes, he's not eligible for an Arizona program that could have allowed the boxer to avoid prison time for a first or second non-violent drug offense.

Tyson, 40, was convicted of rape in Indiana in 1992 and pleaded no contest to misdemeanor assault charges in Maryland in 1998.

Mexico Pres Encourages Soldiers Conducting Anti-Drug Ops (AP)

AP, January 3, 2007

MEXICO CITY (AP)--President Felipe Calderon on Wednesday paid a visit to federal police and soldiers in the central Mexican state of Michoacan, pledging to expand his ambitious anti-drug offensive across a nation hit hard by violence.

Donning a green army cap and jacket for a breakfast with 200 agents at a military base in the city of Apatzingan, Calderon reiterated his campaign promise to build "a Mexico in which peace, liberty, order and respect for the law prevail."

"You've shown that joint, coordinated action of the forces of order produces good results for society," Calderon said. "We are dedicated to recovering security ... in every region of Mexico that is threatened by organized crime."

Calderon launched his offensive shortly after taking office on Dec. 1, sending some 7,000 federal troops and police to his home state of Michoacan. On Tuesday he upped the ante, announcing the deployment of 3,300 more agents to the crime-plagued border city of Tijuana.

Drug gangs are blamed for more than 2,000 murders nationwide in 2006 and have left a particularly bloody trail in Michoacan and Tijuana, which lies just across the border from San Diego in Baja California state.

Authorities say rival gangs have been warring in Michoacan over marijuana plantations and smuggling routes. More than 300 people were slain last year in Tijuana, which has become a major smuggling route for cocaine and methamphetamine entering the U.S.

Troops in Michoacan have arrested more than 50 people so far, including several suspected cartel leaders, and seized large quantities of gold, bulletproof vests, military equipment and shirts with police logos.

But opposition politicians and residents have expressed doubt that Calderon's highly publicized campaign will have much of an impact.

His predecessor, Vicente Fox, also sent thousand of agents to fight drug trafficking, arresting several alleged top kingpins during his six-year term. But those actions appeared to spark more violence, as other traffickers battled to take over the smuggling routes of those killed or detained.

Soldiers, Police Pour Into Tijuana To Fight Drug Gangs (AP)

AP, January 4, 2007

TIJUANA, Mexico (AP)--Soldiers and federal police poured into the violent border city of Tijuana Wednesday, manning checkpoints and inspecting local police stations as part of President Felipe Calderon's latest offensive against powerful drug gangs.

Backed by helicopters, planes and boats, the force descending on the city across the border from San Diego, California will eventually consist of 3,300 troops, Mexico's government has said. It was not clear exactly how many had entered Tijuana by Wednesday night.

Soldiers went into at least two local police stations and checked the documents and weapons of hundreds of officers.

Federal investigators allege there is a corrupt network of police in the city supporting traffickers who smuggle tons of cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana over the busy border crossing into the United States. There were no immediate reports of arrests by the soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0112331

Tijuana Mayor Jorge Hank Rhon has welcomed the troops but some residents complained about the military checkpoints in the city.

Dubbed "Operation Tijuana," the mobilization is the second major military offensive against drug gangs by Calderon, who took office on Dec. 1 promising to crack down on organized crime.

Last month, he sent 7,000 troops to his native state of Michoacan in western Mexico, which has been plagued by execution-style killings and beheadings as rival gangs fight over marijuana plantations and smuggling routes.

Calderon made his first visit to these troops at a base in the Michoacan city of Apatzingan on Wednesday, donning a green army cap and jacket for a breakfast with 200 agents.

"This is not an easy task nor will it be fast," Calderon said. "It will take a long time, imply using enormous resources and even unfortunately the loss of human lives."

But, he added, "if we continue working as we have been until now, our cities and our land will not remain in the hands of criminals."

Drug gangs are blamed for more than 2,000 murders nationwide in 2006 and have left a particularly bloody trail in Michoacan and Tijuana, where more than 300 people were slain last year.

The gangs have taken to decapitating their victims and leaving their heads in front of government buildings, dumping them on public beaches and even rolling them onto a nightclub dance floor.

Troops in Michoacan have arrested more than 50 people so far, including several suspected cartel leaders, and seized large quantities of gold, bulletproof vests, military equipment and shirts with police logos.

But opposition politicians and residents have expressed doubt that Calderon's highly publicized campaign will have much of an impact.

His predecessor, Vicente Fox, also sent thousand of agents to fight drug trafficking, arresting several alleged top kingpins during his six-year term. But those actions appeared to spark more violence, as other traffickers battled to take over the smuggling routes of those killed or detained.

Calderon told the soldiers their efforts were not in vain.

"You've shown that joint, coordinated action of the forces of order produces good results for society," Calderon said at the base. "We are dedicated to recovering security ... in every region of Mexico that is threatened by organized crime."

Mexican President's Anti-drug Offensive Heads For Tijuana (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez And Richard Marosi, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

More than 3,000 troops and police are sent to stop cartel bloodshed.

MEXICO CITY — Mexican President Felipe Calderon on Tuesday opened the second front in his campaign against drug violence, sending 3,300 soldiers, sailors and federal police to the troubled border city of Tijuana.

Tijuana and surrounding communities are a key battleground in the drug cartels' fight to control smuggling routes to the United States. Their bloody rivalries left more than 2,000 people dead in Mexico last year.

Operation Tijuana comes three weeks after Calderon sent troops to his home state of Michoacan, on the Pacific Coast, where federal authorities destroyed 600 acres of marijuana crops and seized more than 6 tons of harvested pot.

Corruption and incompetence among local and state police prompted Calderon, who took office Dec. 1, to promise federal forces to combat Mexico's drug violence. His top security officials said that every state eventually would get relief.

Tijuana and the state of Baja California have suffered increasing numbers of kidnappings and killings of drug traffickers, police officers, business owners and bystanders.

In 2006, nearly two dozen law enforcement officials were killed, including three police officers from Rosarito Beach who were beheaded.

"We won't let any state be hostage to drug trafficking or organized crime," Interior Secretary Francisco Ramirez Acuña said at a news conference Tuesday.

Tijuana's drug trade has long been controlled by the Arellano Felix cartel, once one of the country's most powerful drug-trafficking organizations. The cartel's leadership has been weakened by killings and arrests in recent years, but authorities say the organization and its rivals pose the main threat to peace in Tijuana.

The August capture of the cartel's alleged leader, Francisco Javier Arellano Felix, worsened the violence, as rivals fought to tear off a share of the business.

Recent bloodshed has been notable for its brutality and increasingly professional execution. The Rosarito Beach officers, for example, were abducted by a paramilitary force.

DOJ_NMG_0112332

Federal authorities said they would give a weekly count of arrests and drug seizures in Tijuana, as well as a tally of homicides, kidnappings and thefts. Drug cartels are thought to be behind a spree of kidnap-for-ransom schemes targeting businessmen and professionals.

Mexican authorities said troops would remain in Michoacan, a key transport state for cocaine, the country's most lucrative export drug.

sam.enriquez@latimes.com

richard.marosi@latimes.com

Enriquez reported from Mexico City and Marosi from Tijuana. Carlos Martínez and Cecilia Sánchez in The Times' Mexico City Bureau contributed to this report.

Man Attempts To Run Over Two Deputy U.S. Marshals (AP)

AP, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON - Two Deputy U.S. Marshals were unharmed after a man attempted to strike them with his vehicle in Southeast D.C. Wednesday.

The deputies were preparing to serve a court order eviction at a home on 4th Street, when they say a suspect tried to run them over with his car. Shots were fired at the vehicle, but the suspect was able to drive away.

Dave Turner, a spokesman for U.S. Marshals, says the vehicle was later located several blocks away with evidence of blood in the car.

Officials learned a male was at Greater SE Hospital seeking medical attention for gunshot wounds. He was placed in custody of D.C. Police, and was taken to another hospital for treatment.

There were no injuries to U.S. Marshals.

(Copyright 2007 by WTOP Radio. All Rights Reserved.)

WASHINGTON - Two Deputy U.S. Marshals were unharmed after a man attempted to strike them with his vehicle in Southeast D.C. Wednesday.

The deputies were preparing to serve a court order eviction at a home on 4th Street, when they say a suspect tried to run them over with his car. Shots were fired at the vehicle, but the suspect was able to drive away.

Dave Turner, a spokesman for U.S. Marshals, says the vehicle was later located several blocks away with evidence of blood in the car.

.

Jailed Olympian To Return To Canada On Custody Dispute Charges (AP)

By Alex Dominguez

AP, January 4, 2007

BALTIMORE - Jailed Olympic gold-medalist Myriam Bedard will be transferred to Canadian custody within 36 hours, a U.S. prosecutor told a federal judge Wednesday.

Bedard, dressed in a black jacket with her hair tied behind her head, did not speak during the short hearing, but smiled tightly and raised her eyebrows as she looked at her attorneys while leaving the courtroom.

Bedard's attorney, Kevin McCants, said after the hearing that his client was disappointed the judge did not free her on bail.

"She just said `thanks for trying,'" McCants said.

"It's just one more day, one more day, but every hour in jail is a tough hour."

McCants said the judge was just being cautious, but outside the courthouse Bedard's Quebec attorney, John T. Pepper Jr., was critical of Canadian authorities.

Pepper asked how it could "take 36 hours for a plane to take off from Quebec City and fly to Washington and fly her back. If the plane left at seven this morning she'd be in Quebec City and could have appeared this afternoon on the charges."

Pepper said Canadian authorities were not acting as quickly in extraditing Bedard as they have with less well-known defendants in the past.

Bedard, 37, was arrested Dec. 22 in Maryland and was being held on a warrant as an international fugitive for allegedly violating a child custody order by bringing her 12-year-old daughter to the United States. U.S. marshals found her and the girl, Maude, at a hotel in Columbia, a suburb located between Baltimore and Washington, D.C.

U.S. Magistrate Judge James K. Bredar, who has been impatient with the pace of extradition proceedings, postponed a decision on McCants' bail request after learning the two governments planned to transfer the Olympian. McCants asked that federal marshals escort her to an airport Wednesday so that she could fly home and surrender to Canadian authorities.

The Quebec native had been in the custody of U.S. marshals at the Howard County Detention Center since the arrest. Her daughter is back in Canada.

On Friday, U.S. Magistrate Judge James K. Bredar said he could not grant Bedard bail because of a U.S. extradition treaty with Canada which limits bail to "extraordinary circumstances." Bedard has waived extradition and is being held pending transfer to Canada.

Bedard faces up to 10 years for child abduction, but McCants contends she did not break the law.

Earlier, McCants said Bedard's ex-husband, Jean Paquet, acted prematurely in filing the complaint.

"He thought he wasn't going to get his week" of custody during the Christmas holiday, the attorney said.

Quebec City police obtained an arrest warrant against Bedard on Dec. 8 after Paquet alleged she had taken their daughter away from Quebec City without his permission, violating a child custody order. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police contacted the U.S. Marshals Service and the Capital Area Regional Fugitive Task Force on Dec. 15 to help find Bedard.

Bedard won two gold medals in the biathlon competition at the Olympic Games in Lillehammer, Norway, in 1994. She had been traveling in the United States with her current common-law spouse, Nima Mazhari. Mazhari has had his own share of legal problems. He was charged in 2005 with theft and possession of about 20 stolen paintings worth $100,000.

IMMIGRATION:

Social Security For Illegal Aliens (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

An agreement the Bush administration reached with Mexico on Social Security benefits would allow illegal aliens granted amnesty in the future to claim credit for the time they worked illegally.

The deal was reached in 2004 but never released publicly because it hasn't been submitted to Congress. The TREA Senior Citizens League, a Social Security advocacy group, recently obtained the document through a Freedom of Information Act, and said it confirms the group's worst fears.

The document is a jumble of definitions and legal language, but a spokesman for the group said what's important is what's not in the text: It does nothing to prevent undocumented aliens who later get legal status from receiving benefits for the time they worked illegally. And that comes as the Social Security system's finances are about to be put under greater strain by the retirement of baby boomers.

"If you open up the trust fund to people who have been working in the country illegally for many years, that bankruptcy date can only come sooner," spokesman Brad Phillips said. "People on the other side of this, people who have been arguing that of course illegal aliens can't get their hands on Social Security benefits, now can't make that argument easily anymore."

But Mark Lassiter, a spokesman for the Social Security Administration, said the agreement doesn't change U.S. law. The law states that those who do not have authorization to work will not get benefits under a totalization agreement.

"To get Social Security benefits, you do have to be legally in the United States. This agreement does not address in any way immigration, immigration laws or override current law," he said, adding that a 2004 law, the Social Security Protection Act, prevents illegal aliens from getting benefits.

But the seniors group said the 2004 law also states that if those aliens later get legal status -- through an amnesty or some sort of legalization plan such as the one President Bush and the Senate tried to enact last year -- they would be able to collect the benefits based on their time as illegal workers.

The deal has not taken effect because Mr. Bush has not signed it or submitted it to Congress. Once he does, Congress would have 60 days to vote against it or it automatically would become law.

Congress has never defeated any of the 21 other totalization agreements the United States has reached. Most of those have been with European nations, with the financial effects known to be smaller.

Some lawmakers say Mr. Bush has not submitted the agreement because it would get caught up in the debate over Social Security's poor fiscal health, which could doom the measure.

Totalization agreements end double taxation, so workers have to pay only into one country's system, and allow a worker who didn't have enough credits in any one country to qualify for benefits to pool his or her credits. In the United States, it takes 10 years, or 40 quarters, to qualify.

Mr. Lassiter said that's not to say Mexican workers who spent less time, such as the six quarters minimum needed to pool credits, would get benefits equal to someone who had worked his or her full life here.

DOJ_NMG_0112334

As for the document's status, he said the Social Security Administration hasn't submitted it to the State Department because officials are still waiting for the Mexican government to help reach a side agreement on how to treat illegal aliens. The United States sent a diplomatic note trying to clarify the situation but has not heard back from the Mexican government, he said.

"At this point, there's no action that is planned or that will be taken until that process goes through," Mr. Lassiter said.

Rafael Laveaga, a spokesman for the Mexican Embassy in Washington, said the agreement has to be ratified by the Mexican Congress as well, but beyond that he had no details to offer.

The issue has been contentious for several years.

A 2003 report by the General Accounting Office, Congress' investigative branch, said the agreement with Mexico was shoddy work that didn't investigate the reliability of Mexico's data, or take into account the millions of illegal aliens who would become eligible.

The GAO also disputed the Social Security Administration's estimate that the agreement would cost $105 million a year for the first five years, saying the costs could be much higher given the uncertainty of who could benefit.

Immigrants A Driving Force Behind Start-Ups, Study Says (WP)

By Krissah Williams

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

About 25 percent of the technology and engineering companies launched in the past decade had at least one foreign-born founder, according to a study released yesterday that throws new information into the debate over foreign workers who arrive in the United States on specialty visas.

The report, based on telephone surveys with 2,054 companies and projections by researchers at the University of California at Berkeley and at Duke University, found that immigrants -- mostly from India and China -- helped start hundreds of companies with estimated sales of nearly $50 billion. It was written by a former technology executive who was an immigrant himself.

Technology-industry lobbyists have already cited the study in a push to persuade Congress to increase the annual allotment of H-1B visas, which allow U.S. companies to sponsor temporary workers in specialty occupations, such as computer programming and systems analysis. The companies say they cannot find enough Americans to fill jobs; other proponents contend that globalization requires U.S. companies to import talented workers.

"This research shows that immigrants have become a significant driving force in the creation of new businesses and intellectual property in the U.S. -- and that their contributions have increased over the past decade," wrote Vivek Wadhwa, the study's author, who immigrated from India with his family as a young man.

Another study will be released next month by the Center for Immigration Studies, which supports low levels of immigration. That report says most specialty visa holders come to the United States to do low-level professional jobs for relatively low pay.

Wadhwa's study looked at founders of engineering and technology companies started from 1995 to 2005, and analyzed the World Intellectual Property Organization Patent Cooperation Treaty database. About 25 percent of international patents filed in the United States in 2006 were submitted by immigrants.

Scott McNealy, chairman and co-founder of Sun Microsystems, is among the advocates for an expanded visa program, writing editorials, calling members of Congress and supporting political action committees.

McNealy noted that immigrants Vinod Kosla of India and Andy Bechtelsheim of Germany co-founded Sun. The company "created tens of thousands of jobs that have generated billions of dollars in exports and has created thousands of patents and intellectual-property positions," McNealy said. "Why would you have any arbitrary number on smart people?"

Last year, the industry raised the issue in the national debate over immigration reform, but Congress ended its session without acting on the Securing Knowledge, Innovation and Leadership Act. The bill would increase the annual quota on the H-1B visas to 115,000 from 65,000, eliminate green-card caps for some advanced-degree holders and streamline the processing of employment-based green cards. Tech lobbyists want to revive it.

"We are working on that new piece of legislation that will hopefully be a great fix for a lot of our companies," said Andrea Hoffman, vice president of government and political affairs for TechNet, an industry lobby backed by hundreds of technology companies, including Apple Computer, Microsoft and Google.

Those who favor low levels of immigration and oppose expanding the specialty-worker programs contend that foreigners accept lower pay and depress wages.

Jessica M. Vaughan, an analyst at the Center for Immigration Studies, said an increase in the cap would amount to "a subsidy for business because it allows them to bring cheaper labor from overseas."

It is unknown how many of the immigrants who founded technology companies had H-1B visas.

DOJ_NMG_0112335

At least two Northern Virginia tech companies were founded by former H-1B holders. Sudhakar V. Shenoy, founder and chief executive of Reston-based Information Management Consultants, immigrated to the United States in 1970 after graduating from the Indian Institutes of Technology -- known informally as the "MIT of India" -- and attending graduate school in Connecticut. In 1974, he was offered an H-1B visa, and a manufacturing company sponsored his green card in 1977. Four years later, he founded IMC, which has 350 employees in Reston and 125 in Pune, India.

Peter Harrison came from Britain on the specialty visa and later became chief executive of GlobalLogic (formerly Induslogic), a Vienna-based software development company founded in 2000 by two men from India, who were also H-1B holders.

The company has grown rapidly and employs 1,600 people in the United States, India and Ukraine. Only a few dozen of them have H-1B visas.

"They are very, very hard to come by," Harrison said. "We are always at a challenge to recruit people."

Immigrant Processors Fall Behind (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

As the White House and Congress prepare to overhaul the nation's immigration laws, U.S. officials have concluded that they lack the technology and resources to handle the millions of applications for legal residency that could result from the changes and that several efforts to modernize computers have gone astray.

Immigration officials have said for years that it is critical to update an antiquated, paper-based application process before the government grants a new path to citizenship for as many as 12 million illegal immigrants living in the United States or creates a temporary-worker program, as senators and the Bush administration propose.

But in recent months, U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) officials have determined that the troubled, $2-billion-a-year agency is unable to effectively manage its existing work, much less a flood of new applications.

A report released Dec. 20 by Homeland Security Inspector General Richard L. Skinner cited a long list of setbacks and concurred with internal USCIS reviews that the bureau "lacks the processing capacity, systems integration and project management resources needed to manage a potential increase in workloads."

A project to replace the nationwide computer network has been halted because the agency lacks $72 million to complete it. A staff reorganization was frozen because of deficiencies "that hinder day-to-day IT operations," according to the report.

USCIS is in the midst of its third major modernization effort in three years, leaving some employees confused over whether such efforts were completed or were ever begun, the report said.

Many legal immigrants already face years-long waits when they apply for green cards, often a first step toward obtaining citizenship.Another 100,000 names submitted to the FBI for background checks have been on hold for a year or more. Congressional auditors recently reported that 14 immigration offices had lost track of 111,000 files as of July.

The inspector's report noted that the agency shelved pilot programs to streamline one type of business-sponsored visa application in October and electronic processing of immigration benefits in March because of cost, timing and contracting challenges. "USCIS may be losing momentum and user confidence," the report said.

USCIS spokesman Chris Bentley said the agency had no comment beyond a written response to the report by Deputy Director Jonathan Scharfen.

"We acknowledge that we still have a great deal to do," Scharfen wrote, adding that re-engineering USCIS processes "remains a high priority." He noted that the agency has drafted new strategic and acquisition plans and hired a contractor to help.

The agency announced in September that it had cut its backlog of applications by 70 percent after a five-year, $560 million effort provided more personnel. In August, USCIS awarded a five-year, $150 million contract to convert 55 million files into electronic form.

Private analysts said that the report revealed a broken immigration system and that by funding USCIS through user fees, Congress hobbles its ability to pay upfront for expansions or upgrades.

"Congress needs to step up and provide the funding to ensure that USCIS is able to build a functioning infrastructure, regardless of the fate of immigration reform," said Crystal Williams, deputy director of programs for the American Immigration Lawyers Association.

Congress withheld $47 million from USCIS this year pending approval of a final technology overhaul plan by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and Congress's audit arm, the Government Accountability Office. A USCIS contractor reported the plan would cost $400 million to $1.4 billion, depending on what the agency decides it needs.

Agency Paralyzed By Old Technology (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

The agency that processes requests from foreigners to live in the U.S. and become citizens is crippled by antiquated technology, and its modernization efforts have largely stalled because of poor planning and management failures.

The Department of Homeland Security inspector general reviewed information-technology modernization efforts at U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (CIS) in a report issued last month.

"Because of repeated changes in focus and direction, [the agency] has tended to duplicate previous modernization initiatives and has not demonstrated the ability to execute its planned strategy," the report said.

For instance, because information-technology staff and assets were not centralized under the control of the agency's chief information officer, staff in field offices "continue to develop non-standard systems that may not integrate with the enterprise-wide infrastructure." As a result, some offices could not be upgraded to Windows XP, because locally developed software programs were not compatible with the new system, investigators found.

They added that work to transfer management of the staff and assets to the chief information officer had stalled. They also noted that neither risk-management nor security plans were in place for the modernization process, meaning that security professionals have not made a serious assessment of vulnerabilities that the proposed changes might create.

Michael Maxwell, the former head of the agency's office of security and investigations, who sought whistleblower protection after revealing security problems at the agency to Congress, told United Press International that he had been "concerned that foreign agencies might be able to hack into our computer systems."

"Because the system wasn't modernized, it was vulnerable," he said. "We know that the Departments of Defense and Commerce were penetrated last year [by suspected Chinese military hackers]. Who's to say that [CIS] isn't on that list?"

Mr. Maxwell said hackers would be able to obtain immigration benefits for foreign agents or even terrorists if they could penetrate and manipulate the agency's systems.

The inspector general's report paints a picture of repeated, overlapping efforts to develop a modernization strategy but says that the agency often failed to implement its own plans.

If Congress enacts any immigration-reform legislation, the agency will face two huge tasks: It will be responsible for administering the "path to earned citizenship" -- derided by opponents as an amnesty -- for undocumented workers who want to regularize their status; and will have to handle any new verification process the law mandates to get employers to check the immigration status of workers they hire.

TAX:

Deferred Charge Against KPMG Is Dismissed In Tax-Shelter Case (WSJ)

By David Reilly And Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

A federal judge agreed to dismiss a deferred criminal charge against KPMG LLP, bringing to a close one chapter surrounding the sale of improper tax shelters that cost the U.S. government billions of dollars in lost revenue, brought the accounting giant to the brink of extinction and led to an overhaul of guidelines for federal prosecutors targeting corporate wrongdoing.

The criminal charge against KPMG was contained in a deferred-prosecution agreement the firm entered with the government in August 2005.

That agreement precluded a possible criminal indictment of the firm related to the sale of tax shelters, a move that could have led to KPMG's collapse, but required it to admit to a charge of conspiring to defraud the U.S. government and Internal Revenue Service. Investors and regulators feared the collapse of yet another accounting firm could have led to turmoil in global financial markets.

Still, the government contended those tax shelters were a sham designed to create paper losses for wealthy individuals to avoid paying billions of dollars in tax. By signing the deferred-prosecution agreement, KPMG admitted the shelters were flawed after steadfastly defending them.

Under the deferred-prosecution agreement, KPMG was required to pay a $456 million fine, submit to outside monitoring and shed some of its tax businesses. The government said it would dismiss the deferred charge after Dec. 31, 2006, if KPMG was in compliance with the agreement.

DOJ_NMG_0112337

In a statement yesterday, KPMG Chairman Timothy Flynn said: "We regret the past activities that led to this charge," adding KPMG is focused on maintaining its ethics and compliance programs, which it believes will enable it to serve its clients with "the highest degree of professionalism."

KPMG escaped the indictment, but the government criminally charged 17 former executives of the firm, along with two others from outside firms, with fraud and tax evasion related to the sale of the tax shelters. One former KPMG executive has pleaded guilty and the remaining defendants have pleaded not guilty. The criminal trial is scheduled to begin Sept. 17.

U.S. District Judge Loretta Preska agreed to a request by the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York, Michael Garcia, to dismiss the charge against KPMG, despite a last-minute attempt by the firm's former deputy chairman to block such a move. Jeffrey Stein, the firm's former No. 2 executive and one of those facing criminal charges, asked Judge Preska for permission to oppose the dismissal of the deferred charge against KPMG and to be heard at a hearing on the matter.

In a legal filing, Mr. Stein claimed KPMG's refusal to pay his legal fees related to the criminal charges against him amounted to obstruction of justice and the firm shouldn't have been released from the deferred-prosecution agreement.

A spokeswoman for KPMG declined to comment on Mr. Stein's legal filing. Mr. Garcia said a federal monitor will remain in place until September 2008 to ensure KPMG abides by the terms of the deferred-prosecution agreement. "The charges against KPMG may be reinstituted if it is determined that KPMG has violated any provision of the [agreement]," Mr. Garcia said in a statement.

KPMG, Mr. Stein and the other former firm executives facing criminal charges are locked in a battle over the payment of legal fees. The federal judge overseeing the criminal case, Lewis Kaplan, ruled in June that the government violated the defendants' constitutional rights by pressuring KPMG to cut off payment of legal fees.

The ruling has delayed the criminal case while the Second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals considers a civil claim by the former employees requesting KPMG to pay their legal fees. KPMG has said the fee dispute should be heard by an arbitration panel as set out in the firm's partnership agreement and not by the judge overseeing the criminal case.

Prosecutors End Tax-shelter Case Against KPMG, Dropping Charge After Settlement (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, January 4, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-Prosecutors have officially dropped a criminal conspiracy charge against KPMG LLP in a fraudulent tax-shelter case after the accounting firm fulfilled the terms of its nonprosecution agreement with the U.S. government.

In an order issued Tuesday and made public Wednesday, U.S. District Judge Loretta A. Preska signed off on a request by prosecutors to dismiss a one-count criminal information against the firm.

In August 2005, KPMG agreed to pay $456 million as part of a deferred prosecution agreement with the government in which it admitted to fraudulent conduct in the design and marketing of certain tax shelters. The agreement ran through December 2006.

By complying with the terms of that agreement, the firm avoids prosecution.

In a statement, U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia said prosecutors sought dismissal of the charge pursuant to the terms of the deferred prosecution agreement and based on the report and recommendation of the firm's outside monitor.

"The charges against KPMG may be reinstituted if it is determined that KPMG has violated any provision of the DPA," Garcia said. "The monitorship, which has been comprehensive and effective, will continue until September 2008, and may be extended if KPMG violates the DPA during the period of the monitorship."

The deferred prosecution agreement allowed KPMG to avoid the fate of auditing firm Arthur Andersen LLP, which collapsed following a criminal indictment against it as part of the government's probe into Enron Corp. A 2002 felony conviction against Andersen in the matter was overturned in 2005.

"Today's dismissal of the charge reflects our commitment to full and continuing compliance with the agreement we made with the government in August 2005," Timothy P. Flynn, KPMG chairman and chief executive, said in a statement. "We regret the past activities that led to these charges. The 20,000 people of KPMG today are focused on maintaining ethics and compliance programs that will serve as a role model for the profession and enable us to serve our clients with the highest degree of professionalism."

Criminal charges are still pending against 16 former KPMG executives and two others who have been accused of participating in a scheme that allowed wealthy people to avoid paying billions of dollars in taxes to the Internal Revenue Service. That case is tentatively set for trial in September 2007.

The criminal case against the former executives has been on hold while the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals considers a civil dispute over whether KPMG should pay legal fees for the one-time executives.

DOJ_NMG_0112338

In June, Judge Lewis A. Kaplan, who is presiding in the criminal case against the one-time KPMG executives, found that prosecutors violated the constitutional rights of those former executives by putting undue pressure on the firm not to advance them defense costs. The former executives have since filed a civil complaint against KPMG seeking advancement of defense costs.

Chad Bray is a Dow Jones Newswires correspondent.

Charge Against KPMG Dropped (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

Firm Cooperated Over Tax Shelters, Prosecutors Say

A federal judge dismissed a criminal conspiracy charge yesterday against the accounting firm KPMG after prosecutors said it had complied with an August 2005 deal that helped it avoid a possible death sentence.

U.S. District Judge Loretta A. Preska's action puts KPMG a step further from a scandal over the sale and marketing of abusive tax shelters that once threatened to put the firm out of business. A 2002 obstruction-of-justice indictment of accounting rival Arthur Andersen hastened that firm's demise and reduced competition in the audit industry, raising the stakes in the KPMG case.

In August 2005, after frenzied negotiations, KPMG eventually reached a deal with the U.S. attorney's office in the Southern District of New York, opening its operations to scrutiny by former Securities and Exchange Commission leader Richard C. Breeden and agreeing to pay the government $456 million to settle.

KPMG, the nation's fourth-largest accounting firm, still must submit to special oversight until September 2008, a term that could be extended if KPMG violates the terms of the deal, Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia said in a statement.

"We regret the past activities that led to these charges," KPMG Chairman Timothy P. Flynn said in a statement. "The 20,000 people of KPMG today are focused on maintaining ethics and compliance programs that will serve as a role model for the profession."

Under Flynn and Executive Vice Chairman Sven Erik Holmes, the firm has cleaned house, imposing what it calls permanent changes in its tax operations and putting fresh leaders in charge of its key service units. KPMG also developed a new compliance and ethics program with the help of District-based law firm Williams & Connolly, where Holmes, a former federal judge, once worked as a partner.

Preska agreed to drop the conspiracy count despite protest from Jeffrey Stein, KPMG's former deputy chairman who was indicted in 2005 alongside more than a dozen other partners for their role in peddling tax shelters to help wealthy clients avoid or reduce tax payments. Stein's lawyer argued that KPMG had reneged on an agreement to pay his legal fees. The scheme cost the United States more than $2.5 billion in evaded taxes, according to Justice Department officials, who called it the largest tax prosecution ever.

Defense lawyers for the former partners say they followed laws then on the books and asserted that they were the victims of intense government pressure, an argument that has received support from U.S. District Judge Lewis A. Kaplan. He is overseeing the case against the former partners.

Last year, Kaplan ruled that the government had violated the former KPMG officials' constitutional rights by forcing the firm to stop paying attorneys' fees. An appeals court has yet to rule on that issue. The trial of the individual KPMG partners has been postponed, pending resolution of the fee appeal.

The case has touched off a debate in the business and legal communities over government tactics to combat fraud. In part because of the fallout from the KPMG prosecution, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty last month rolled out changes to guidelines that prosecutors use when deciding whether to indict corporations.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Pushes Balanced Budget On Democrats (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, January 4, 2007

President Bush on Wednesday challenged Democrats taking over Congress to join him in balancing the budget within five years and urged them to cut thousands of pet projects from future spending bills.

DOJ_NMG_0112339

Top Democrats reacted cautiously — or not at all — to Bush's plan, which assumes Congress will renew tax rate cuts passed in 2001 and maintain tax cuts on investments, inheritances and many other items.

"We welcome the president's newfound commitment to a balanced budget, but his comments make us wary," said incoming House Budget committee Chairman John Spratt, D-S.C. "They suggest that his budget will still embody the policies that led to the largest deficits in history."

Democrats have attacked Bush's tax agenda as being tilted in favor of upper-income taxpayers and say at least some of the cuts need to be rolled back to be able to reach a broader agreement on the budget.

But White House and lawmakers such as Spratt say there is at least a chance for Bush and his longtime Democratic rivals to come together on the budget. For starters, upcoming projections of tax revenues will show continued improvement, which could make it easier to bring the budget to balance by 2012, Bush's target year.

"We face a spending problem, not a revenue problem," said White House Budget chief Rob Portman. "We're not undertaxed right now."

Neither House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., nor incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., responded to Bush's remarks.

Meanwhile, House Democrats are poised to pass some modest reforms to the much-maligned practice of "earmarking" home district projects in spending bills — but will fall short of several steps proposed by Bush on Wednesday.

The Democratic reforms will extend a GOP-passed rule requiring the names of lawmakers sponsoring earmarks to be listed in reports accompanying spending bills, and Democrats have announced a one-year moratorium on lawmaker's pet projects as they clean up $463 billion worth of unfinished spending bills for the current 2007 budget year.

Bush went further, saying Democrats should adopt earmark reforms requiring "full disclosure of the sponsors, the costs, the recipients and the justifications for every earmark" and that after the current moratorium, the cost of earmarks should be cut in half from 2006 levels of more than $16 billion.

And in a victory for deficit hawks, Democrats will reimpose a rule requiring tax cuts or new spending on benefit programs such as Medicare to be accompanied by revenue increases or tax cuts elsewhere in the budget. The rule could be easily waived, however.

While the initial work of the Democratic Congress will focus on ethics reform and a variety of Democratic priorities such as raising the minimum wage, a flurry of difficult but must-do budget work looms, including:

· A $100 billion-plus request to fund military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, to be submitted along with Bush's Feb. 5 budget. While Democrats promise greater scrutiny of Bush's request, it's expected to pass largely as submitted since lawmakers are loath to interfere with money to protect overseas troops.

· A massive $463 billion or so catchall spending bill wrapping together nine unfinished appropriations for the budget year that began Oct. 1. They would fund the budgets for every Cabinet agency and in many cases will be frozen at last year's levels, though difficult work remains in figuring out which accounts — such as veterans medical programs — should receive increases to avoid shortfalls and layoffs of federal workers.

· A congressional budget measure setting targets for tax revenues, spending on so-called entitlements such as Social Security and Medicare and caps on the annual appropriations bills. If Bush and his Democratic rivals in fact make a good-faith effort to work together to balance the budget, this measure would serve as a blueprint for compromise.

That still seems like a long shot, given the rancorous history between Bush and Democrats, who say the president has to show flexibility on taxes if they are going to take on tough issues such as spiraling Medicare and Social Security costs.

"Everything has to be on the table and he's got to be serious about compromise," said incoming Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad, D-N.D.

"We would expect (Bush) to do some ... kind of ante to get the game going," Spratt said.

Bush Signals Budget Accord (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

President Bush promised yesterday to produce a plan to balance the federal budget in five years and challenged lawmakers to slash their special pet projects in half next year, embracing priorities of the new Democratic leadership that will assume control of Congress today.

Appearing in the Rose Garden with his Cabinet, Bush said he has been encouraged by meetings with Democrats and thinks they can reach common ground on spending issues that have bitterly divided them for six years. He said that the budget proposal he will make Feb. 5 will erase the deficit by 2012, and he called on Congress "to end the dead-of-the-night" process in which earmarks are slipped into spending bills.

DOJ_NMG_0112340

The president's announcements were greeted by Democrats as "me-tooism," as one senior leadership aide put it, that closely tracked goals outlined by the new majority. The incoming House and Senate budget committee chairmen have set 2012 as a target for balancing the budget, and the incoming House and Senate appropriations chairmen have decided to freeze earmarks this year and introduce further restrictions on such spending items, which are often called pork.

In trying to adopt such ambitions as his own, Bush hopes to regain the initiative after his party lost Congress in November and to counter his reputation as a president who took a budget surplus and turned it into record deficits, analysts said. Bush has never proposed a balanced budget since it went into deficit, never vetoed a spending bill when Republicans controlled Congress and offered little sustained objection to earmarks until the issue gained political traction last year.

But now for the first time since he took office, both parties have set a mutual target for eliminating the deficit -- an implicit agreement that raises the profile of the issue and may create a political imperative that prods the two sides to find ways to meet the goal or be held accountable for failing.

"We've all been entrusted with public office at a momentous time in our nation's history," Bush said. "And together we have important things to do. It's time to set aside politics and focus on the future."

Rob Portman, director of the White House Office of Management and Budget, made a point of calling Democratic leaders Tuesday night to preview the president's remarks. In an interview yesterday, he said the shared target was a powerful signal of progress.

"It makes a huge difference," he said. "It's good news for the taxpayers that you have both parties working toward the same goal."

They remain far apart, however, on how to get there, with Bush insisting yesterday that his tax cuts be made permanent and Democrats laying the groundwork for reversing some of those for the wealthiest taxpayers. Democrats responded to Bush's comments with deep skepticism. "It's real hard to look at the man's record and take him seriously on these issues," Kent Conrad (N.D.), the incoming Senate Budget Committee chairman, said in an interview. "He's got a lot to prove. Talk is cheap."

Bruce Reed, president of the Democratic Leadership Council and an aide to President Bill Clinton, said Bush must abandon some red-line positions to reach genuine agreement with Congress. "For Bush to announce that he shares Democrats' willingness to cut the deficit by 2012 doesn't mean a heck of a lot if he's ruling out any of the ways that Democrats want to get there," Reed said.

The dialogue on the eve of a new Democratic Congress felt reminiscent of 1995, when Clinton and new House Speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) jousted over balancing the budget. Gingrich and his Republicans vowed to eliminate the deficit in seven years; Clinton initially resisted, then announced his own 10-year balanced-budget plan. It took until 1997 for them to settle on a five-year balanced budget.

The deficit disappeared sooner than that, and when Clinton left office the nation had its first surplus in three decades. But fiscal fortunes took a turn under Bush as he ushered in huge tax cuts, an early recession took its toll and the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, prompted a wave of new spending on the military and homeland defense.

After the deficit spiraled to a record $413 billion in 2004, Bush promised to cut it in half within five years. Using as a starting point a higher projection that the deficit never reached, Bush achieved his goal last year when the deficit fell to $248 billion on the strength of better-than-expected revenue. Bush credits his tax cuts with spurring the economy and in turn producing more tax receipts.

But the government has spent more than $500 billion so far on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and counterterrorism operations elsewhere, and Bush plans to submit a new supplemental spending request at the same time he announces his regular budget next month, possibly near $100 billion.

Portman said that although war costs are appropriated separately, they will be counted in terms of balancing the budget by 2012. He offered no details about how Bush will accomplish that, other than saying that no tax increases will be included. Bush's past two budgets have frozen or even reduced non-security discretionary spending.

"It's going to require spending discipline," Portman said. "We've done a better job the last couple years."

Bush took aim at congressional perks as part of his message of fiscal discipline, praising Democrats for imposing a one-year moratorium on earmarks, proposing that they cut them in half next year and suggesting that the process be more transparent.

"One important message we all should take from the elections is that people want to end the secretive process by which Washington insiders are able to get billions of dollars directed to projects," he said. He also called again for a line-item veto.

Democrats plan to introduce legislation requiring lawmakers to attach their names to earmarks and to certify that such spending items would not financially benefit them or their spouses. "Given the track record of this administration, the last person in the universe who should lecture the Congress on fiscal responsibility is George Bush," said incoming House Appropriations Committee Chairman David R. Obey (D-Wis.).

DOJ_NMG_0112341

Brian M. Riedl, an analyst at the Heritage Foundation, said the discussion of earmarks and a 2012 balanced budget will mean little unless Bush and Democrats tackle entitlements. With the cost of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid on the rise, Riedl said he projects the annual deficit will grow to $750 billion in 10 years. "The reduced deficit of the last two years looks more like a short-term blip than a long-term trend," he said.

Bush Resolves To Slash Deficit By 2012 (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush, boasting that it took only two years to cut in half the record budget deficit from early in his tenure, said today that he will propose next month wiping out the other half by 2012 — a goal that could tie the hands of the Democrats as they take control of Congress.

Bush said he could accomplish his goal and still win the war on terrorism by making permanent the tax cuts of his first term that are set to expire after 2010. The cuts, he said, must be concentrated in the giant government benefit programs — Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid — that constitute more than 40% of federal spending.

Bush also called on the new Congress that will begin work Thursday — with Democrats in control of both the House and the Senate for the first time in Bush's presidency — to cut by half Congress' growing use of "earmarks" to provide funds for pet projects in lawmakers' home states and districts.

Bush's proposal to balance the budget in five years could make it difficult for the Democrats to use their newfound majority to enact their program. House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco has included only one spending item — beefed-up college student loans — in her agenda for the first 100 hours of the new Congress, but other Democrats are likely to advance their own plans.

Rep. John Spratt (D-S.C.), who will chair the House Budget Committee, said he was "wary" of Bush's plan to balance the budget by 2012. How, he wondered, can Bush balance the budget while the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq have cost upwards of $100 billion a year? And he asked about how to provide relief from the alternative minimum tax, which was designed to hit only the rich but would ensnare growing numbers of middle-income taxpayers — at a cost to them of more than $60 billion a year.

Bush, reading a statement in the Rose Garden after meeting with his Cabinet, said, "It's time to set aside politics and focus on the future."

"The Congress has changed," Bush said. "Our obligations to the country haven't changed.

"Together," he said, referring to the Democrats, "we have important things to do."

But congressional Democrats said they had not been consulted about Bush's proposal to balance the budget.

Bush, in his statement, said the budget that he will submit to Congress next month "will address the most urgent needs of our nation — in particular, the need to protect ourselves from radicals and terrorists; the need to win the war on terror; the need to maintain a strong national defense; and the need to keep this economy growing by making tax relief permanent."

Bush said Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid needed reform to ensure that the programs would survive "without bankrupting the country" when today's young people need them.

Turning to Congress' tendency to provide funding for pet projects back home, Bush said, "Earmarks often divert precious funds from vital priorities, like national defense, and each year they cost the taxpayers billions of dollars."

Bush proposed full disclosure of the sponsors, costs, recipients and justifications of all earmarks. Pelosi has included earmark reform in her agenda for the first 100 hours of the new Congress.

Bush Warns Democrats On Stalemate (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

President Bush yesterday reasserted his role in domestic policy as the spender in chief and ultimate legislative backstop, urging Democrats to cut pork-barrel spending in half and telling them they will take the blame for stalemate if they send him bills he has to veto.

His warning came the day before Democrats take control of Congress, where they already have taken the first steps to consolidate their power and push through their own lobbying and ethics changes, new budget rules and an increase in the minimum wage.

In both a published column and in a statement he made after his first Cabinet meeting of the year, the president tried to get out ahead of Democrats by setting spending goals and promising cooperation -- to a point.

"If the Congress chooses to pass bills that are simply political statements, they will have chosen stalemate. If a different approach is taken, the next two years can be fruitful ones for our nation," Mr. Bush said in the Wall Street Journal column.

DOJ_NMG_0112342

And in his Rose Garden remarks he vowed to introduce a budget next month that will eliminate the deficit by 2012, and challenged Congress to follow "one important message" voters sent in last year's elections by ending secret earmarks, or pork-barrel spending.

But he already has run afoul of Democratic leaders in the House, who said the president is making an executive branch power play and argued he doesn't have credibility on spending issues.

"Given the track record of this administration, the last person in the universe who should lecture the Congress on fiscal responsibility is George Bush," said Rep. David R. Obey, the Wisconsin Democrat who will become chairman of the House Appropriations Committee.

Mr. Bush has increased the annual federal budget by $800 billion, from $1.86 trillion in 2001 to $2.65 trillion in 2006, and has rung up deficits every year from 2002 to 2006.

Incoming House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer said Mr. Bush actually wants to eliminate earmarks altogether, and said that and the president's desire for a line-item veto are part of Mr. Bush's push to control the power of Congress.

"This administration has taken unto itself increasing executive authority, and we believe that the Congress has failed in its responsibility to exercise its duties under the Constitution," the Maryland Democrat said.

But Mr. Hoyer also said Mr. Bush is "right in concept" when he warned against trying to pass bills Democrats know won't be signed by the president.

Although both the House and Senate will be under Democrats' control, House Democrats have pushed their agenda the furthest, aided by rules that give the majority party in that chamber nearly unfettered power.

Two of the measures they have vowed to pass in the first 100 hours of legislative business run counter to Mr. Bush's stated positions, and one -- to expand federal funding for stem-cell research -- drew the first veto of Mr. Bush's administration when it passed last year.

The other measure, to raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, has Mr. Bush's support but only if it is coupled with tax or regulatory breaks for businesses to offset the costs. House Democrats are insisting on passing a "clean" bill that doesn't include those offsets.

And Mr. Bush is running into problems even among some Republicans.

Yesterday Rep. Michael N. Castle of Delaware, who is a leading voice among more liberal Republican lawmakers, said Mr. Bush must present a "realistic" budget that provides enough for education and health care spending as well as for defense.

He also said future tax cuts must be offset by spending cuts elsewhere in the budget.

"A one-sided equation does not get us back into the black," Mr. Castle said.

As Mr. Bush was asking to work with Democrats, the White House sent its strongest message since the election that the president stands by his push for private savings accounts as part of Social Security -- anathema to most Democrats -- and that he opposes tax increases to help finance the system.

"The president has made it clear he doesn't want tax increases and he wants savings accounts," White House press secretary Tony Snow said, though he said Mr. Bush will listen to any proposal for reforming entitlement spending.

Mr. Snow's statement came after reports in December that administration officials had signaled the president would consider some form of tax increases to pay for a Social Security overhaul.

Meanwhile, Mr. Bush yesterday laid out a set of requirements he wants to see for future earmark spending. He called for Democrats to adopt rules requiring disclosure of every earmark's sponsor, its cost, who the recipients are, and why the spending is justified.

He also told Democrats to "cut the number and cost of earmarks next year by at least half."

Mr. Bush did not say what those target numbers should be, and earmarks are often in the eye of the beholder.

Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican, citing a Congressional Research Service report, said fiscal 2006 spending bills contained 12,852 earmarks with a value of more than $67 billion. But Citizens Against Government Waste put the 2006 figures at 9,963 projects and $29 billion.

Bush's 'zero Deficit' Pledge Challenged (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

Prominent Democratic economists on Wednesday challenged President George W. Bush's pledge to present a budget next month that would cut the federal government deficit to zero by 2012 while making tax cuts permanent.

Jason Furman, director of the centrist Hamilton Project, said: "There will be a lot left out and I would bet it relies on deep, unspecified and improbable cuts in future discretionary spending."

DOJ_NMG_0112343

He challenged Mr Bush to state specifically which programmes would bear the cost of spending cuts in all the years to 2012.

Jim Horney, a senior fellow at the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, said the White House budget would not deal with the need to pay for a fix to the alternative minimum tax (AMT), which is catching a growing number of middle-class families. And he warned that it would not make adequate allowance for uncertain future costs in fighting the "war on terror".

The sceptical response follows the president's commitment in an article in the Wall Street Journal on Wednesday to set out a plan to "balance the federal budget by 2012 while funding our priorities and making the tax cuts permanent".

A White House spokesman told the FT on Wednesday "it is an achievable goal" and pointed out that the Bush administration had achieved its previous promise of halving the deficit by 2008 a year early.

The year 2012 is an obvious medium-term target for balancing the budget, because it already shows the narrowest deficit on current forecasts: $54bn according to projections by the non-partisan Congressional Budget Office.

However, the CBO estimates that the deficit in 2012 would be $284bn higher if the Bush tax cuts are made permanent, even before allowing for any higher debt interest payments.

Economists on both sides of the political divide, and people close to the administration, expect the Bush proposal will bridge this gap by:

·Proposing real-terms cuts for much of non-security related discretionary spending.

·Budgeting for a gradual reduction in spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, compared with the CBO baseline.

·Assuming slightly slower growth in spending on Medicare, which has come in lower than expected over the past year.

·Upgrading revenue forecasts in the light of the surprisingly high growth in tax receipts over the past two years.

In addition, there is unlikely to be any provision for fixing the AMT in the later years.

The White House spokesman refused to comment on any specifics, but said Mr Bush believed it would be possible to support his policy priorities with "limited growth in new spending" by redirecting resources from other programmes.

He said the president continued to view defence spending as his "number one priority" and something "that should receive the fullest funding".

A former budget official said only the detail of the president's budget proposal would show whether he was serious about cutting the deficit.

This would require putting forward policies that could be passed by a Democratic Congress in the remaining two years of the administration, rather than relying on deficit reduction under his successor as president.

Bush Faces Hurdles Delivering On His Balanced-Budget Vow (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's pledge to balance the budget by 2012 will be easier to project on paper than to actually achieve.

White House budget chief Rob Portman says Mr. Bush, who declared the balanced budget goal in a Wall Street Journal op-ed piece and a Rose Garden speech yesterday, plans to show how he will achieve his goal in the fiscal 2008 budget request next month. Balancing the budget won't come from tax increases but from tax receipts fueled by a growing economy and restrained government spending, Mr. Portman says.

But getting to a balanced budget by 2012 will require some big assumptions. Among them, the president's budget is unlikely to reflect the full cost of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and the cost of preventing the Alternative Minimum Tax from affecting more middle-class Americans.

"What we're very likely to see is a budget that's very unrealistic," said James Horney, senior fellow at the Center on Budget Policies and Priorities, a liberal think tank. "It's not going to be hard for him to put together a budget that on paper shows a balanced budget, but it is going to include a lot of unlikely assumptions."

Mr. Bush inherited a surplus, and on his watch -- because of an economic downturn, tax cuts and spending on homeland security and the war -- the deficit widened to a peak of $412.7 billion in 2004. Since then, it has come down to $248 billion in fiscal 2006 and is projected at $339 billion for 2007.

Mr. Bush credited his tax cuts with spurring the growth that has helped trim the shortfall. The most recent White House forecast, issued in July, projected a $127 billion gap for 2011, the latest year for which it made projections. The Congressional Budget Office estimates the U.S. will run a $158 billion deficit in 2012, assuming Mr. Bush's tax cuts are made permanent.

Mr. Portman said growth has been stronger than expected and the White House is now projecting annual revenue growth of 6% to 7%, up from its July prediction of 2.4% growth in 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0112344

Mr. Bush urged lawmakers to "keep this economy growing" by making his tax cuts permanent and also called on them to restrain "wasteful" spending.

His comments sparked skepticism on Capitol Hill, with the incoming House Budget Committee chairman questioning how the Bush budget will reach its balanced budget goal. "There are some major questions raised and unanswered about what's included and what's not included," Rep. John Spratt, (D., S.C.) said. "For example, what does the budget assume with respect to the outyear costs of the war in Iraq and Afghanistan?"

The White House has largely financed the costs of Iraq and Afghanistan outside the normal budget process, through "emergency" supplemental spending bills approved by Congress. While the White House recently began including one- or two-year cost estimates for the war, those amounts have been far less than what has been requested and approved.

At the same time, the White House hasn't included the cost of fixing the AMT -- estimated to cost $100 billion a year -- in its long-term projections. The AMT was designed to prevent upper-income earners from avoiding paying taxes altogether. But it was never indexed for inflation and has come to affect many middle-class families.

Mr. Portman said no decision has been made about whether to include AMT overhaul in the budget projections, but that the administration has long assumed any fix will be "budget neutral" and won't drive up the deficit.

Brian Riedl, a budget expert with the conservative Heritage Foundation think tank, said the White House will need to show some progress in taming costs. "Those growth rates must be reduced in order to balance the budget any time soon," he said.

What The Congress Can Do For America (WSJ)

By George W. Bush

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

Tomorrow, members of the 110th Congress will take their oaths of office here in Washington. I will have the privilege of working with them for the next two years -- one quarter of my presidency, plenty of time to accomplish important things for the American people.

Together, we have a chance to serve the American people by solving the complex problems that many don't expect us to tackle, let alone solve, in the partisan environment of today's Washington. To do that, however, we can't play politics as usual. Democrats will control the House and Senate, and therefore we share the responsibility for what we achieve.

In the days and weeks since the November elections, I have been encouraged by the productive meetings I've had with many of the new leaders in Congress from both parties. I am hopeful we can find common ground without compromising our principles.

I believe we share many of the same goals for the people we serve -- and with good will and hard effort, we can find practical ways to advance the American Dream and keep our nation safe.

My principles are no secret. I have campaigned on them in my races for governor and in two presidential contests, and I have worked hard during my presidency to translate these principles into sound policy.

I believe that when America is willing to use her influence abroad, the American people are safer and the world is more secure. I believe that wealth does not come from government. It comes from the hard work of America's workers, entrepreneurs and small businesses. I believe government closest to the people is more responsive and accountable. I believe government plays an important role in helping those who can't help themselves. Yet we must always remember that when people are hurting, they need a caring person, not a government bureaucracy.

These are all common-sense principles, and they provide the basis for how I will approach governing with the new Congress. We've proved it can be done: When our nation was attacked, Republicans and Democrats came together to pass the Patriot Act and reform our intelligence agencies. When our economy was struggling, we worked together to pass tax relief that has helped our economy grow, create jobs, and raise the standard of living for the American people. When we saw that our public schools were failing our children, we came together to pass the No Child Left Behind Act, insisting on high standards, accountability and better options for parents.

The outcome of the elections has changed the balance of power in Congress, yet the priorities for keeping our country safe and prosperous go beyond party labels.

Our priorities begin with defeating the terrorists who killed thousands of innocent Americans on September 11, 2001 -- and who are working hard to attack us again. These terrorists are part of a broader extremist movement that is now doing everything it can to defeat us in Iraq.

In the days ahead, I will be addressing our nation about a new strategy to help the Iraqi people gain control of the security situation and hasten the day when the Iraqi government gains full control over its affairs. Ultimately, Iraqis must resolve the most pressing issues facing them. We can't do it for them.

DOJ_NMG_0112345

But we can help Iraq defeat the extremists inside and outside of Iraq -- and we can help provide the necessary breathing space for this young government to meet its responsibilities. If democracy fails and the extremists prevail in Iraq, America's enemies will be stronger, more lethal, and emboldened by our defeat. Leaders in both parties understand the stakes in this struggle. We now have the opportunity to build a bipartisan consensus to fight and win the war.

America's priorities also include keeping our economy strong. The elections have not reversed the laws of economics. It is a fact that economies do best when you reward hard work by allowing people to keep more of what they have earned. And we have seen that businesses can expand and hire more workers when they have more money to invest -- and since August 2003, America's employers have added more than seven million new jobs.

It is also a fact that our tax cuts have fueled robust economic growth and record revenues. Because revenues have grown and we've done a better job of holding the line on domestic spending, we met our goal of cutting the deficit in half three years ahead of schedule. By continuing these policies, we can balance the federal budget by 2012 while funding our priorities and making the tax cuts permanent. In early February, I will submit a budget that does exactly that. The bottom line is tax relief and spending restraint are good for the American worker, good for the American taxpayer, and good for the federal budget. Now is not the time to raise taxes on the American people.

By balancing the budget through pro-growth economic policies and spending restraint, we are better positioned to tackle the longer term fiscal challenge facing our country: reforming entitlements -- Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid -- so future generations can benefit from these vital programs without bankrupting our country.

One important message I took away from the election is that people want to end the secretive process by which Washington insiders are able to slip into legislation billions of dollars of pork-barrel projects that have never been reviewed or voted on by Congress. I'm glad Senator Robert Byrd and Congressman Dave Obey -- the Democrats who will lead the appropriations process in the new Congress -- heard that message, too, and have indicated they will refrain from including additional earmarks in the continuing resolution for this fiscal year.

But we can and should do more. It's time Congress give the president a line-item veto. And today I will announce my own proposal to end this dead-of-the-night process and substantially cut the earmarks passed each year.

The strength of our economy also requires us to address some of the biggest issues facing the American people -- greater energy security, comprehensive immigration reform, and affordable health care. While progress has been made in each of these areas, we must do more. I look forward to working with Congress on these difficult issues. * * *

Our Founders believed in the wisdom of the American people to choose their leaders and provided for the concept of divided and effective government. The majority party in Congress gets to pass the bills it wants. The minority party, especially where the margins are close, has a strong say in the form bills take. And the Constitution leaves it to the president to use his judgment whether they should be signed into law.

That gives us a clear challenge and an opportunity. If the Congress chooses to pass bills that are simply political statements, they will have chosen stalemate. If a different approach is taken, the next two years can be fruitful ones for our nation. We can show the American people that Republicans and Democrats can come together to find ways to help make America a more secure, prosperous and hopeful society. And we will show our enemies that the open debate they believe is a fatal weakness is the great strength that has allowed democracies to flourish and succeed.

To the new members of the 110th Congress, I offer my welcome -- and my congratulations. The American people have entrusted us with public office at a momentous time for our nation. Let them say of these next two years: We used our time well.

The Democrats' Cautious Tiptoe Around The President's Tax Cuts (NYT)

By EDMUND L. ANDREWS

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 — President Bush is all but daring Democratic leaders to attack his signature tax cuts as they take over Congress. But Democrats, perhaps to his frustration, are having none of it.

Skip to next paragraph

President Bush's Op-Ed (wsj.com) In an opening salvo on Wednesday, Mr. Bush proclaimed that he would present a budget next month that manages to project a balanced budget by 2012 while permanently extending more than $1 trillion in tax cuts.

"It is also a fact that our tax cuts have fueled robust economic growth and record revenues," Mr. Bush wrote in an op-ed article for The Wall Street Journal. "We met our goal of cutting the deficit in half three years ahead of schedule."

The implicit message, which Republican lawmakers reinforced later, was that their tax cuts were popular with voters, that Republicans had proven the economic benefits of tax cuts and that Democrats would court disaster if they even hinted at rolling them back or repealing them.

DOJ_NMG_0112346

But even as Democratic leaders continue to accuse Mr. Bush of having a reckless fiscal policy, they have refused to discuss dismantling his tax cuts or even to engage in a debate with him about the best way to stimulate economic growth.

"It's always the same old tired line with them — 'Tax and spend, tax and spend, tax and spend,' " said Senator Kent Conrad, the North Dakota Democrat who is chairman of the Senate Budget Committee. "We're not going there."

At least not now. Democratic leaders say they see no need to revisit Mr. Bush's tax cuts for several years because they are not set to expire until the end of 2010. And they contend that the government could increase revenues as much as $100 billion a year simply by closing the "tax gap," taxes that are owed but not paid.

When asked about their tax plans, as they have been again and again since Nov. 7, Democratic leaders insist they want to preserve many of the middle-class tax cuts like the child tax credit and a reduction in the so-called "marriage penalty" for two-income households.

The Democrats' coyness is less than candid. Although it is true that Mr. Bush's tax cuts have four more years of life, it is also true that Congress faces serious fiscal headaches that cannot be postponed for even a full year.

One of those challenges is the Iraq war. The conflict is likely to cost far more than $100 billion this year, even if the United States began reducing troop levels.

So far, Mr. Bush has kept war spending out of the regular budget request that he sends to Congress each February, instead seeking the money on an expedited as-needed basis.

Democrats say, however, that they will not accede to such requests, as their Republican predecessors did, because they sidestep the process by which Congress normally debates spending priorities.

Perhaps the bigger and more enduring problem is the alternative minimum tax, a tax that was originally intended for the richest households but that has been not adjusted for inflation and is rapidly engulfing tens of millions of middle-class families every year.

To prevent the alternative tax from becoming a de facto tax increase, Congress has been passing temporary fixes for the last several years. Those fixes now cost more than $50 billion a year, and the cost is expected to climb sharply for the rest of the decade.

Repealing the alternative minimum tax, a goal shared by Democrats and Republicans, would reduce government revenues by about $1 trillion over the next 10 years and would be a huge drain on the Treasury that nobody in either party has figured out how to finance.

Democrats, meanwhile, have a wish list of their own. House Democrats plan to reduce interest rates on student loans by half as part of their plan to pass measures that they have long favored in the first 100 legislative hours.

Democrats also want to funnel more money to develop alternative energy sources, domestic security and the Children's Health Insurance Program.

House Democrats plan to reintroduce tough new "pay-go" budget rules as early as this Friday. Under "pay-go," which governed spending measures in the 1990s but expired in 2002, new entitlement programs or new tax cuts have to be matched by comparable spending cuts or tax increases.

Politicians in both parties may be feeling a temporary reprieve from fiscal pressures because the budget deficit has indeed declined sharply in the last two years.

Largely because of big back-to-back increases in tax revenue for the last two years, the deficit shrank to $248 billion in 2006 from a peak of $412 billion in 2004

Newsview: Bush Fights To Stay Relevant (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, January 4, 2007

Weakened by election losses and hemmed in by time, President Bush is using what he's got left — a bully pulpit, a veto threat and a sudden interest in working with Democrats.

With two years to go in his presidency, Bush likes to talk about a sprint to the finish. One goal of that race is to remain relevant, and he tried to demonstrate Wednesday that no one should count him out.

"The Congress has changed. Our obligations to the country haven't changed," Bush said from the Rose Garden, backed by his Cabinet. On the eve of a new Democratic Congress, Bush's intended image for the cameras was clear: My team is ready to act.

He challenged lawmakers to control spending — targeting their own pet projects as never before. Then he touted other familiar priorities: making tax cuts permanent, defeating terrorists, reforming behemoths such as Social Security.

No slowdown here.

To assert his voice, Bush went so far as to spell out an entire agenda for Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0112347

It came in the form of an op-ed column in The Wall Street Journal on Wednesday, just before Democrats assumed power on Capitol Hill. The headline: "What the Congress can do for America."

"He wants to regain the initiative and put them on the defensive," said Norman Ornstein, an analyst at the American Enterprise Institute who specializes in the presidency and Congress.

"He wants to create a sense in the country that he still has a substantial role to play in setting priorities, and that he's on his toes moving forward, not on his heels moving back."

The president has a lot of forces working against him.

For the first time in 12 years, Democrats control both chambers in Congress. The war in Iraq marches toward its fourth anniversary as Bush looks for a fresh solution. And history shows lame-duck presidents lose relevance.

"There's a reason why you don't read any books about the last two years of a two-term president," said Paul Light, a public policy professor and presidential historian at New York University. "The last years are focused almost entirely on the upcoming election. By the last year, he's almost completely irrelevant. It's gloomy, but it's realistic."

Presidents Reagan, Clinton and Eisenhower all faced the same problem, Light said. But at least they had residual influence because their vice presidents wanted the top job, which is not the case this time.

Bush has taken the defeat in the last election and reframed it.

It's now a chance to get things done with Democrats.

"We now have the opportunity to build a bipartisan consensus to fight and win the war," Bush said. Democrats say they welcome his new approach, then point out there was nothing stopping him before.

"We certainly want to work with the president," said Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, the Senate Democrats' campaign chief. "We hope that when the president says compromise, it means more than do it my way, which is what he's meant in the past."

The comment underscores the Washington theme these days — healthy doses of both hope and skepticism.

Bush and the Democratic leaders see genuine opportunities to work together on issues people care about: the minimum wage, energy alternatives, education, immigration and health care. If they do, both sides can benefit.

The honeymoon isn't over yet. Bush invited Democratic and Republican leaders of Congress and their spouses to share some good cheer in the Yellow Oval Room of the White House residence Wednesday night.

Yet Bush has also issued a warning to Democrats: Don't send me bills that amount to political statements, or they will end in stalemate. Bush has used his veto power only one time, on stem cell research, when Republicans ran Congress.

Accomplishing his agenda will require Bush to give up some ground on key issues, Ornstein said.

"Frankly, much of this is still up to the president," he said. "How much does his legacy matter, to the point where he wants to take on a portion of his base? If he doesn't do that, how much will he be able to get done?"

There have been big bipartisan successes for this White House. But the ones typically mentioned by Bush, including the Patriot Act and the No Child Left Behind education law, happened early in his first term and later became divisive.

Scott Lilly, a longtime Democratic leadership aide in Congress, said he's deeply skeptical that Bush has gone bipartisan.

"This is much more about tactical advantage than it is a sincere effort to reach out to people," said Lilly, now a senior fellow at the liberal Center for American Progress. "He's trying to set the dialogue of the debate so that when there isn't cooperation, he can point the finger at Congress and say, 'I tried to do these things, but they wouldn't work with me.'"

For now, Bush has a big month ahead.

He plans to unveil a new strategy in Iraq, probably next week, followed by his annual State of the Union speech and his budget proposal. He is still the commander in chief, still the leader with the biggest microphone and the power of veto.

"He's got some weapons," Ornstein said. "I wouldn't count him out quite yet."

Iraq May Quash 'bipartisan' Congress (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

America's 110th Congress begins on Thursday, ushering in what both the new Democratic majority and President George W. Bush have promised will be a new era of bipartisanship.

But few believe the rhetoric of bipartisan co-operation will survive Mr Bush's announcement of a "new way forward in Iraq", which is expected within 10 days.

In spite of the electorate's repudiation of Mr Bush's Iraq strategy at midterm elections in November, the White House looks set to announce a "surge" of up to 30,000 new troops in a move that would also go against the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which published its report last month.

DOJ_NMG_0112348

Democratic leaders, in-cluding Nancy Pelosi, who will be sworn in on Thursday as America's first female speaker of the House of Representatives, and Harry Reid, the Senate leader, have ruled out supporting an increase in US forces in Iraq – as have a growing number of Republicans. Almost all Democrats and some Republicans favour a reduction in the existing 140,000 troop level.

But Mr Bush has made clear he does not feel bound by the results of the recent elections on his Iraq policy. In a statement yesterday, he promised to work with the new Congress but said: "The Congress has changed; our obligations to the country haven't changed."

Few believe Mr Bush is prepared to compromise on his most basic principles, which includes "victory" in Iraq, an extension of the controversial tax cuts that were pushed through in his first term, and opposition to the funding of stem cell research. The Democrats have promised contrary action on all three.

"Mr Bush talks the talk of bipartisanship but then he doesn't actually change his positions," says Thomas Mann, congressional scholar at the Brookings Institution. "His idea of bipartisanship is for members of both parties to support him."

For their part, the Democratic leaders are under fire for plans to bypass the normal deliberative committee process by going straight to a House floor vote to push through their six main election promises. "The Democrats are missing a golden tactical opportunity to prove they can work with Republicans," said Alice Rivlin, the first head of the Congressional Budget Office.

Ms Pelosi's pledges, to be passed within the first 100 legislative hours (in an echo of the Republican party's 100-day "contract with America" agenda in early 1995), include halving interest rates on student loans, raising the minimum wage, abolishing tax breaks for oil companies, reducing prescription drug prices and providing federal funding for stem cell research. Most of Ms Pelosi's 100-hour agenda is symbolic.

But Mr Bush, who has vetoed only one piece of legislation in six years, will almost certainly wield his pen for a second time over any moves to support stem cell research.

Mr Bush and Ms Pelosi do see eye to eye on the need to clean up the "culture of corruption" in Congress, which electoral analysts say was the second most important factor motivating people to vote last November.

On Thursday, Mr Bush called on Congress to halve within a year the number of "earmarks", or pork-barrel clauses, inserted into broader legislation.

"People want to end the secretive process by which Washington insiders are able to get billions of dollars directed to projects that have never been reviewed or voted on by Congress," he said.

On Thursday Ms Pelosi is expected to announce a number of ethics reforms, including banning lawmakers from travelling in corporate jets, prohibiting gifts from lobby firms, establishing an independent ethics commission and forcing lawmakers to disclose the earmarks they sponsor.

White House officials are relatively confident about working with Democrats to reform US immigration, restructure social security and promote alternative energy fuels. But much of this could be rendered academic by the brewing storm over Iraq, which took another nasty turn last weekend when the 3,000th US soldier died, bringing to 25,000 the number of Americans killed or injured in Iraq.

If Mr Bush next week increases US troop exposure to the growing violence in Iraq without convincing Americans they are on the road to "victory", promises of bipartisan co-operation are likely to go up in smoke.

Rather than heralding a new era of partnership between the White House and Capitol Hill, the politics of the coming weeks and months are likely to pivot on one question, says Bruce Riedel, a former national security official: "Who lost Iraq?"

Bush Reaches Out, But Keeps One Hand On The Wheel (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 — In an article published on a friendly op-ed page, and from the regal confines of the White House, President Bush greeted the incoming Democratic leadership of Congress on Wednesday with a message of bipartisanship.

But he also sent another message: I'm still the guy with the big plane, the big office (the oval one) and the presidential seal.

With the op-ed, in The Wall Street Journal, and in the Rose Garden appearance, Mr. Bush sought to set the governing agenda one day before Democrats were officially to take control of Congress and alter the balance of power that has favored Mr. Bush's party for nearly his entire presidency.

In doing so, Mr. Bush mixed calls for unity in governing with a series of red flags on his signature issues.

Tax increases? Forget it.

"The elections have not reversed the laws of economics," Mr. Bush wrote in The Journal. "It is a fact that economies do best when you reward hard work by allowing people to keep more of what they have earned."

DOJ_NMG_0112349

The war in Iraq? "We now have the opportunity to build a bipartisan consensus to fight and win the war," he wrote. In other words, we're staying.

That new Democratic majority? It isn't really so big.

"The minority party, especially where the margins are close," Mr. Bush wrote, "has a strong say in the form bills take." And the president, he added — lest anyone forget — has the constitutional authority "to use his judgment whether they should be signed into law."

Several Democrats said Mr. Bush's words on Wednesday had raised questions about what kind of president would show up when they get down to the business of governing side by side.

Some Democrats may have hoped it would be the George W. Bush who contritely acknowledged a "thumpin' " for his party the day after the elections in November. But the evidence suggests it is more likely to be the man who all but ignored the disputed circumstances of his election in 2000, governed from then as if he had an expansive mandate and who — even as he has employed soothing tones in speaking to and about Democrats for the last two months — has gradually but firmly reasserted himself on both foreign and domestic policy.

"I think what the op-ed showed was the fundamental division within the White House and probably within the president's head whether to stick to the old issues and just talk bipartisanship versus really doing it," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, the new vice chairman of the Democratic caucus in the Senate, in an interview.

The first few weeks of January are traditionally when the White House carefully rolls out new or repackaged policy initiatives before the president's State of the Union address, a period when he can set the agenda. But for the first time since early 2002, when Democrats controlled the Senate, Mr. Bush has to share power and the national microphone. He also has to show that he has a domestic agenda at a time when his presidency is largely consumed by Iraq.

Both sides were making some effort on Wednesday to play nice. White House officials noted that the president had highlighted several areas in which he has shown a willingness to work more closely with Democrats, like on a new minimum wage and a new immigration law.

And the White House arranged for a plane to bring the incoming Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, and Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, back to Washington from Gerald R. Ford's funeral in Grand Rapids, Mich., in time for a reception with Mr. Bush and the other Congressional leaders.

In a memorandum that Mr. Reid issued Wednesday to fellow Democrats, he wrote, "I'm encouraged that President Bush said today that he wants to work in bipartisanship."

But, he added, "I hope he means it." And in defining his own approach to bipartisanship, Mr. Reid went on to praise Senator Gordon H. Smith, Republican of Oregon, saying Mr. Smith's commentary last month on the administration's war policy — in which Mr. Smith said it "may even be criminal" — had "signaled a sea change over how Congress will address the Iraq war."

Mr. Reid promised to work with Republicans to "bring oversight and accountability to the Bush administration's conduct of the war and ensure a new policy that meets conditions on the ground" but also "allows our troops to come home."

Democrats were moving quickly to hold the administration accountable, in their view, for its mistakes, promising to hold as many as a dozen oversight hearings on the war alone in the next few weeks.

In interviews, White House officials did not hesitate to acknowledge that they were taking advantage of the last day before the Democrats take control to assert some presidential power.

Nor did they dispute Democrats' suspicions that the White House placed Mr. Bush's opinion piece in The Journal to reassure a target audience of nervous fiscal conservatives — and the financial markets — that he remained philosophically opposed to any tax increases.

But administration officials disputed Democratic assertions that the president was trying to upstage them before their big day.

"It's an appropriate time to say where we are on these things and to again reiterate the president's view that we can work together to find common ground," said Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman. "It also doesn't mean that a Democrat-controlled Congress passes whatever they want and we sign it — that's not bipartisanship."

But it was clear that as both sides spoke about bipartisanship, they were defining it on different terms.

Mr. Fratto acknowledged as much, saying, "We'll have to see as we go forward over the next six months, in particular, if everyone has the same understanding of what bipartisanship means."

Bush Seeks Cooperation 'Without Compromising Principles' (USAT)

By Douglas Stanglin

USA Today, January 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112350

On the eve of the Democratic takeover of Congress, President Bush is laying out his legislative agenda for the new year and calling on Congress and the White House to seek common ground "without compromising our principles."

"It's time to set aside politics and focus on the future," Bush said in remarks in the Rose Garden after meeting with his cabinet.

Bush, in his comments and in a column in The Wall Street Journal today, said he has been encouraged by the "productive meetings" he has held with news leaders in Congress from both parties.

ON DEADLINE: Read and comment on Bush's column | Video

"If the Congress chooses to pass bills that are simply political statements, they will have chosen stalemate," he said. "If a different approach is taken, the next two years can be fruitful ones for our nation."

"I am hopeful we can find common ground without compromising our principles," he wrote.

Among the items that Bush said are high on his priority list are: reforming entitlement programs like Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid; making tax cuts permanent, curbing "earmarks," or pork-barrel projects that have not been reviewed or voted on by Congress; and passing a line-item veto to allow presidents to veto individual budget items.

Bush said he'll submit a five-year budget proposal that will balance the federal budget by 2012. He also said the two sides should come together on greater energy security, immigration reform and affordable health care.

When the 100th Congress convenes at noon Thursday, Democrats will hold a 233-202 edge in the House and will control the Senate by 51-49.

Nancy Pelosi, of California, will be sworn in on Thursday as the nation's first female speaker of the House and Sen. Harry Reid, of Nevada, will be selected as Majority Leader.

Bush said the change in leadership as a result of the November midterm elections offers Congress and the White House alike a challenge and an opportunity to find agreements acceptable to both sides.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said Democrats ran in the midterm election on a message of compromise, and want to work with Bush.

"We hope that when the president says compromise, it means more than 'do it my way,' which is what he's meant in the past," Schumer said.

He said fiscal restraint is one area where the executive and legislative branches of government can work together.

On Iraq, an area that is sure to prove contentious between the White House and Congress, Bush called for a "bipartisan consensus to fight and win the war."

He noted that he will be addressing the nation in the days ahead on a new strategy on Iraq, but offered little preview except to say the United States can help Iraq "defeat the extremists" inside and outside of Iraq to give the new political leadership breathing space.

"Ultimately, Iraqis must resolve the most pressing issues facing them," Bush wrote. "We can't do it for them."

The president's list of priorities did not include two of the top items on the Democrats' list — a higher minimum wage and federal funding of embryonic stem cell research.

These are expected to be passed in the first 100 hours of business after the 110th Congress officially convenes at noon Thursday.

A boost to the $5.15-an-hour federal minimum wage would be the first since 1997. Democratic leaders have proposed raising it in stages to $7.25 an hour. President Bush has said he supports the idea, along with help for small businesses.

A new Associated Press-AOL News poll on legislative priorities found broad support for raising minimum wage and passing a stem cell bill, as well as an overwhelming majority in favor of making it easier for people to buy prescription drugs from other countries.

The AP said its poll showed 80% of survey respondents favor the increase in the minimum wage, while 69% of adults favor the government taking steps to make it easier for people to buy prescription drugs from other countries, where some medicines cost significantly less than in the U.S.

Some 56% of adults support easing restrictions on using federal money to pay for research on embryonic stem cells, the AP reported. Supporters say such research could lead to treatments for everything from Parkinson's disease to spinal cord injuries.

Bush and other opponents say the embryos from which the cells are extracted are human lives that should not be destroyed in the name of science.

Bush Tells Congress What He'd Like (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman And Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, January 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112351

WASHINGTON -- As President Bush used a Rose Garden moment Wednesday to offer up a menu of spending cuts, the newly empowered Democrats in Congress were poised to swiftly pass their own priorities, none of them on the president's wish list.

On the eve of the start of the 110th Congress, Bush outlined his legislative priorities—highlighted by calls to trim Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid and balance the federal budget in five years—that underscored the clear contrast with the agenda of Democrats who will control Capitol Hill for the first time in Bush's presidency.

Bush promised to deliver a new budget that will hold back spending and set clear budget priorities.

"It will address the most urgent needs of our nation—in particular, the need to protect ourselves from radicals and terrorists, the needs to win the war on terror, the need to maintain a strong national defense, and the need to keep this economy growing by making tax relief permanent," Bush said as members of his Cabinet stood behind him.

And in the Wall Street Journal, Bush wrote of his desire to work in a bipartisan manner, something he has avoided for much of his presidency. After members of the new Congress take their oaths of office, "I will have the privilege of working with them for the next two years—one-quarter of my presidency, plenty of time to accomplish important things for the American people," he wrote.

But the newly elected members of Congress will be sworn in Thursday with swift plans for consideration of legislation that is decidedly not in sync with the president.

In the House, lawmakers plan to vote Tuesday to enact the recommendations of the Sept. 11 Commission. On Wednesday, they will vote to raise the minimum wage. On Thursday, Jan. 11, they will consider expanding federally funded embryonic stem cell research. And on Friday, Jan. 12, the House plans to vote on legislation allowing the federal government to negotiate for lower prescription drug prices for senior citizens participating in Medicare.

Democrats said they appreciated Bush's attempt at calling for a bipartisan working relationship, even if his proposals don't mesh with their own.

"I think he's right in concept," said the incoming House majority leader, Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.). "The American public are hopeful, almost pleading, that the president and the House and the Senate sit down together and address the serious problems confronting our country. They want solutions, not politics. Hopefully we'll give them that."

New Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) predicted in a memo to Senate Democrats that the 110th Congress will be guided by bipartisan cooperation.

"I'm encouraged that President Bush said today that he wants to work in bipartisanship, and I hope he means it. We share many of America's priorities, and have committed to taking up business, lobbying and ethics reform that improves the earmarking process as our first order of business," Reid said, referring to lawmakers' practice of tacking pork-barrel spending items onto legislation on other topics.

Meanwhile, House Republicans have launched a public relations campaign complaining that the Democrats are not treating them fairly in the minority even though they do not officially become the minority party until noon Thursday.

"We are disappointed that at this point in the game, half of the Congress has been cut out of the process," said Rep. Adam Putnam (R-Fla.), chairman of the House Republican Conference.

Republicans say the new Democratic leaders won't let them offer amendments to the first half dozen bills to reach the House floor and have cut them out of the decision-making about how the bills are being drafted.

Hoyer, however, said Democrats made a commitment to the public during the 2006 elections to pass certain bills without change during the first 100 legislative hours.

"We view the first hundred hours as a mandate from the American people," Hoyer said. "We said if you elect us, this is what we will do."

Before any legislation is passed, lawmakers in the House and Senate will be sworn in Thursday, marking a historic shift in the balance of power in Washington. Republicans will lose control of the House after 12 years in power while the first woman speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, takes office.

Republicans will also lose the upper hand in the Senate, where they have held the majority for the last four years. But Democrats have a tenuous grip on the majority with just 51 total votes. And one of those votes belongs to Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.), who is still hospitalized following brain surgery.

In the House, Democrats plan to immediately offer a new set of rules to ban gifts and travel from lobbyists, end privately funded flights on corporate jets and institute pay-as-you-go requirements to cover the cost of new spending initiatives. The rules also call for the end of the two-day work week, a fixture of the last Congress.

Americans Question Whether Congress Will Be Able To Pass Laws, Survey Shows (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112352

As the new Congress is sworn in this week, fewer Americans think Democrats, Republicans and President Bush will be able to work together to pass legislation in the next two years, according to a Harris Interactive poll.

Nearly half of Americans (47%) believe the results of the congressional elections were a good thing for the U.S., according to the online survey, while 19% say the outcome was bad and 35% aren't sure.

At the same time, 43% say having a president and a majority in Congress belonging to different parties is an advantage for the U.S., while 24% say it is worse for the country and 32% aren't sure.

When asked what will be the most likely outcome in Washington this year, 25% said they think Democrats and Republicans in Congress are likely to be able to work out compromise legislation, a third said Democrats will pass legislation, but the president will veto it, and 18% said Democrats and the president are most likely to compromise to pass legislation.

Among the series of issues that might be on the agenda of the new Congress, just over three-quarters of those polled said they would back a minimum wage increase from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour, compared with 17% who oppose the increase; 69% back legislation to speed up the removal of troops from Iraq vs. 23% who oppose.

See full results of the poll: "In January, the new Congress, which was elected in November, will be sworn into office. How much would you support or oppose the following items that might be on the agenda of the new Congress?"

Base: All Adults

NOTE: Percentages may not add exactly to 100 due to rounding. * * * "In the beginning of January, the new Congress, which was elected in November will be sworn into office. How much would you support or oppose the following items that might be on the agenda of the new Congress?"

SUMMARY OF SUPPORT RESPONSES

Base: All Adults * * * "Thinking about the recent congressional elections, do you believe that the outcome is a good thing or bad thing for the United States?"

Base: All Adults

NOTE: Percentages may not add exactly to 100 due to rounding. * * * "Which of these is more likely to occur in Washington, DC in the next two years?"

Base: All Adults

NOTE: Percentages may not add exactly to 100 due to rounding. * * * "Not thinking of this time or any particular president, do you think it is better or worse for the country to have a president and a majority in Congress belonging to different parties?"

Base: All Adults

NOTE: Percentages may not add exactly to 100 due to rounding.

Methodology:

Harris Interactive conducted this online survey in the U.S., Dec. 12-18, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 2,309 adults. Figures for age, gender, race/ethnicity, education, income and region were weighted where necessary to align with population proportions. Propensity score weighting was also used to adjust for respondents' propensity to be online. In theory, with probability samples of this size, one can say with 95% certainty that the overall results have a sampling error of +/- 2 percentage points of what they would be if the entire U.S. adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. This online sample is not a probability sample.

<hr/>About Harris Interactive

Harris Interactive is a world-wide market research and consulting firm, best known for The Harris Poll and its use of the Internet to conduct scientifically accurate market research. For more information, see www.harrisinteractive.com1. To become a participant in The Harris Poll Online and join future online surveys, see www.harrispollonline.com2.

Bush To Seek Renewal Of Education Law (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, January 4, 2007

President Bush plans to meet with lawmakers next week to jump-start talks over the renewal of the No Child Left Behind education law, a Democratic congressional aide said Wednesday.

The top Democrats and Republicans on the House and Senate committees that deal with education issues planned to attend the White House meeting Monday, said the aide on the condition of anonymity because the White House had not announced the session.

Monday is also the day the Bush administration is commemorating the fifth anniversary of the what is widely considered the most significant federal education law in decades.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, in an interview with The Associated Press on Wednesday, said she was "optimistic about the ability to make progress this year" on renewing the law for five more years.

DOJ_NMG_0112353

The law aims to ensure that all children can read and do math at grade level by 2014, a goal that has placed unprecedented demands on schools. They have been required to increase testing, raise teacher quality and pay more attention on the achievements of minority children.

Poor schools that get federal aid but do not make enough progress must provide tutoring, offer public school choice to students or initiate other reforms such as overhauling their staffs.

Spellings said renewing the law is something upon which Bush and Democrats, who won control of Congress in November, agree.

"It's on everybody's list of things where we might forge agreement as we have done before," she said.

Spellings said there were a few "bright-line principles" that the administration would not agree to alter under a rewrite of the law. Among them is the requirement that all students are proficient in reading and math by 2014 — a goal many observers call unrealistic.

Spellings said the administration was open to debating how progress should be measured. Critics, including the teachers' unions, have said the current law does not give enough credit to schools that make significant strides in student achievement but fall short of reaching an annual target.

Democrats also say Republicans have not spent the money needed to fully fund the law. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., who are to lead the committees overseeing education, say the administration has provided about $50 billion less than originally called for by Congress.

Republicans say it is common for legislation to be funded at less than the full level Congress authorizes.

Spellings declined to preview the amount Bush would seek when he releases his annual budget in February. She did indicate an interest in getting more money to teachers who work in schools that have difficulty attracting people.

Bush sought $500 million from Congress for that purpose last year and got about $100 million.

"Our best teachers, or are most experienced teachers, are in places with our least challenged learners," Spellings said.

Spellings also reaffirmed the administration's view that the law, which focuses on early and middle grades, should be expanded in high schools.

'No Child' Law On Track, Spellings Says (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said yesterday that she welcomed proposals to "perfect and tweak" the No Child Left Behind law as Congress prepares for what could become a divisive debate on renewal of the landmark education initiative.

But in an interview five days before the act's fifth anniversary, Spellings said its implementation was on track. She rejected calls for a major rewrite of the law, including some proposals advanced yesterday by a coalition of about 100 groups with a stake in education.

"We've made more progress in the last five years than the previous 28 years," Spellings said. "Can the law be improved? Should we build on what we've done and all of that sort of thing? You bet. But I don't hear people saying: 'You know what? We really don't need to have education for all students.' "

Her remarks come as various groups begin to weigh in on the law and what they believe works and what does not. The No Child Left Behind law is scheduled to be reauthorized by Congress, but it is uncertain when lawmakers will act.

The Forum on Educational Accountability -- a coalition that includes education, religious, civil rights and disability rights groups -- said yesterday that the law overemphasizes standardized tests and arbitrary academic targets. The coalition also criticized penalties the law imposes on schools that fail to meet standards.

"We don't have to throw out the whole law and make a big political battle," said Reginald M Felton, a senior lobbyist for the National School Boards Association, a member of the coalition. "But we need to change from the punitive, 'gotcha!' kind of approach to actual support for progress."

The coalition includes the National Parent Teacher Association, the NAACP and the National Education Association, a teachers union. The coalition has called for more federal education funding to help schools meet the law's mandates.

Spellings said the past five years have laid the foundation for the law's key goal of ensuring that every child can read and write at grade level by 2014. Under the law, states must test all students in reading and math from grades 3 to 8 and once in high school. Schools that fail to make adequate progress face a range of penalties.

The Bush administration has granted some states flexibility in how they carry out the law. For example, North Carolina and Tennessee are experimenting with a way to rate schools that emphasizes the year-to-year academic growth of students rather than how scores compare with fixed benchmarks.

DOJ_NMG_0112354

"Have we learned something as we've made public policy for the last five years that we ought to act on going forward? Absolutely," Spellings said. "And I've done some of those things."

She added, "Those are some of the areas that ought to be discussed in the context of reauthorization."

The law, which passed Congress in 2001 with overwhelming bipartisan support, was signed by President Bush on Jan. 8, 2002.

Yesterday, Spellings lauded the incoming education committee chairmen, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), as "stalwarts" who have "stayed very true to the core principles of this law."

Gates Picks Intelligence Undersecretary (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates has chosen a career military intelligence officer, retired Lt. Gen. James R. Clapper Jr., to be undersecretary of defense for intelligence, according to administration officials.

Clapper, who retired in June after five years as director of the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency (NGA), ran the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) during the 1990s, and handled Air Force intelligence during the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

A senior intelligence official yesterday confirmed that Gates had chosen Clapper but added: "The White House has the final say." On Capitol Hill, a spokesperson for Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), incoming chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, said the staff had unofficially been told of Clapper as Gates's choice, but added that "nothing official has been sent to the senator." Maj. Patrick Ryder, a Defense Department spokesman, said that he could not confirm Clapper's choice, saying: "This is a presidential decision, which will come from the White House."

There was no comment late yesterday from the White House. Clapper did not return a call seeking comment.

Clapper would replace Stephen A. Cambone, who was the first person to hold the undersecretary for intelligence position, which was created by then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in 2003 to coordinate the wide-ranging defense intelligence activities. While the director of national intelligence is the president's top intelligence advisor, the defense undersecretary coordinates the largest components of the intelligence community and almost 80 percent of the roughly $42 billion national intelligence budget.

Cambone was a close and longtime associate of Rumsfeld, but Clapper sometimes took positions opposite the secretary, such as in 2004 when he supported putting the NGA under the new director of national intelligence rather than within the Defense Department.

Staff writer Dafna Linzer contributed to this report.

Bush, Democrats Joust Over Earmarks (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — Eager to set themselves apart from a Republican-led Congress tarnished by scandal, Democrats outlined a plan Wednesday to end the secrecy around earmarks inserted in legislation to funnel public money to favored interests.

"We're going to stamp out corruption, and the proof is in the package," Rep. Louise M. Slaughter (D-N.Y.) said as she outlined reform measures that Democrats would put to a vote today and Friday.

But in a sign of how much the election has pushed reform to the top of the agenda, President Bush strode before cameras Wednesday to highlight his overhaul ideas even before the Democrats unveiled theirs.

"We need to do more," said the president, who read a brief statement in the Rose Garden that called on the new Democratic Congress to halve the number and cost of earmarks.

The jousting between the two ends of Pennsylvania Avenue raised the prospect of a tussle over who could claim the mantle of reform, and bolstered reformers' hopes that calls for change to the secretive earmarking process might no longer by ignored on Capitol Hill.

Under Republican congressional leadership, the amount of federal funds earmarked has nearly tripled since 1994, reaching $67.1 billion in fiscal 2006, according to the Congressional Research Service.

The new rules House Democrats plan to adopt would mandate disclosure of the authors of earmarks and more complete explanations of what the earmarks will fund — measures reformers have demanded for years.

House Democrats also plan to pass new bans on gifts and meals from lobbyists, and a prohibition on the use of corporate jets by House members.

DOJ_NMG_0112355

Senate Democrats will soon draw up their own rules, but a spokesman for incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) would not discuss them.

The House reform package — which is among a list of initiatives Democrats promised to enact in their first days in power — comes after Republicans lost control of Congress amid ethics scandals that led to the resignations of four GOP House members since September 2005.

It drew praise from a number of reform advocates, including Fred Wertheimer, president of the watchdog group Democracy 21. Wertheimer called the ethics package "important progress in changing the way business is done in Congress."

But the plan neither settled the debate over earmarking nor allowed Democrats to claim control of the reform agenda without a challenge.

Though House Democratic leaders are seeking to dramatically increase transparency in the earmarking process, they would not mandate that information about who inserts an earmark be posted in a place the public can easily access it, such as the Internet.

"I want more," said Steve Ellis, vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense, a nonpartisan watchdog that tracks congressional spending.

Democrats also do not plan to make it easier to remove earmarks when legislation comes to the full House for a vote.

Earmarks are often included in the conference reports that are drawn up by senior lawmakers from the House and Senate to settle differences between versions of legislation passed by the two chambers. These reports cannot be amended on the floor.

Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), who has been complaining about earmarking for years, said he was particularly disappointed that lawmakers like him would often be unable to offer amendments that would strip out objectionable earmarks.

"I would have liked to see a requirement that earmarks be in the legislative text rather than in a conference committee report," Flake said. "When they are in a conference committee report, it's far more likely that they will end up in the middle in the night."

Democrats nonetheless were quick to label the expected adoption as historic.

"This is the most significant package that has ever passed the Congress," noted Rep. Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), a longtime reform advocate.

But if Democrats were able to outmaneuver Republicans on ethics in the fall congressional campaign, they now could face a second showdown with the White House.

Bush has only occasionally criticized the proliferation of earmarking. And since taking office, he has never vetoed an appropriations bill, even as the number of earmarks in the spending measures more than doubled to about 13,000.

On Wednesday morning, however, the president made earmarks the focus of his public remarks as he outlined areas where he said he could work with the new Congress.

"People want to end the secretive process by which Washington insiders are able to get billions of dollars directed to projects, many of them pork-barrel projects that have never been reviewed or voted on by the Congress," Bush said just a few hours before Democrats announced their plans.

Casting himself as the reformer, Bush called on Congress to stop putting earmarks in conference reports and to disclose even more information about why earmarks are being sought.

And he reiterated calls he has made in the past for a version of the line-item veto, which Bush has said would help restrain spending by allowing him to strip out wasteful earmarks.

That suggestion was immediately rejected by incoming House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who gave a hint of how the battle over reform may turn into a showdown over congressional authority.

"The president would like to say to the United States: Only the president can add investments in communities, so Congress has to come hat in hand to the president," Hoyer said. "That would substantially skew the relationship and undermine the independence of the Congress of the United States."

GOP Earmark Epiphany (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

Could it be possible that one benefit of this new era of divided government in Washington is spending restraint? We'll believe it when we see it, but one good portent was President Bush's op-ed yesterday in these pages.

Mr. Bush stressed spending control, and yesterday he also offered his own proposal for Congress to restrain its "earmarking" of tens of thousands of pork-barrel projects each year. The White House wants Members to disclose the sponsor, the cost, the beneficiary and the justification for each such earmark -- in a move that echoes what such House GOP reformers as Jeff Flake of Arizona were trying to pass last year. John Boehner, the new House minority leader, quickly seconded this motion.

DOJ_NMG_0112356

Our only caveat is: What took them so long? Mr. Bush never did say much about earmarks when the GOP was in charge and the likes of Jerry Lewis, Roy Blunt, Don Young and Dave Hobson were setting earmark records. Perhaps now that they're in the minority, Republicans can reclaim some of their fiscal virtue -- though the voters will be forgiven if they put such promises on probation given the GOP's recent past.

Competition between the parties doesn't always produce spending control or smaller government -- witness the late 1990s, when Bill Clinton gave the GOP higher defense outlays in return for more domestic spending. But at least in the early days of Democratic control, both parties are at least trying to sound like fiscal conservatives. Who knows? Maybe we'll even see a few vetoes.

Pelosi Walks Tightrope Enforcing Rules (WP)

By Michael Grunwald And Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

On June 15, beneath the crystal chandeliers and Corinthian pilasters of the Cannon Caucus Room, House Democrats had to decide how they really felt about the "culture of corruption." After months of expressing outrage over Republican scandals, what would they do about the $90,000 the FBI had found in the freezer of one of their own?

To House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the answer was obvious: Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) had to give up his coveted spot on the Ways and Means Committee. But at the closed-door caucus meeting, several black Democrats complained that Pelosi was not their emperor or queen, while Jefferson implored his colleagues to keep him on Ways and Means for the sake of Hurricane Katrina's victims. No one spoke up for Pelosi -- except Pelosi.

She began by praising Jefferson's wife and five daughters: Jamila, Jalila, Jelani, Nailah and Akilah. But she quickly made it clear that Jefferson's legal problems had become her political problem: "I am not an emperor or a queen. But neither am I a fool."

Pelosi explained that Democrats should be the party of ethics, that appearances count, that dealing forcefully with Jefferson's scandal would help everyone else in the room. "You didn't elect me emperor or queen," she said. "You elected me leader."

The Democrats overwhelmingly voted Jefferson off the committee. And in November, Americans voted Democrats into the majority, citing corruption as one of the issues that soured them on the GOP.

Today, after becoming the first Democratic speaker in 12 years and the first female speaker in the history of the House, Pelosi will offer a comprehensive package of ethics reforms, a down payment on her pledge to run "the most ethical Congress ever."

But it is not yet clear whether Jefferson's ouster heralded a new era of honesty and accountability, or just a one-off political calculation inspired by the 2006 campaign. After the midterm elections, Pelosi ignored the ethical cloud around Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) to support his bid to be majority leader, and she nearly chose Rep. Alcee L. Hastings (D-Fla.) to chair the intelligence committee even though the House once impeached him when he was a federal judge. And, in December, when Jefferson faced a fight for his political life in a runoff against state Rep. Karen R. Carter, an African American Democrat with none of his ethical baggage, Pelosi refused to get involved.

Today, Jefferson will take his seat in Pelosi's House. His inconvenient presence will be a constant reminder of the fine line the new speaker will have to walk between rhetoric and reality, between the cross-cutting demands of her caucus and the demands of the public.

"Pelosi wouldn't even take my calls," Carter said. "None of the Democrats in Washington would take my calls. They all said they wanted to get rid of corruption, but I guess it wasn't their top priority."

Pelosi and Jefferson declined to comment for this story. But Brendan Daly, Pelosi's spokesman, said his boss will be as outspoken about ethics while in power as she was while in the minority.

"If there's something that needs to be addressed, we'll address it," he said. "The politics are not the reason."'Culture of Corruption'

In 1994, Republicans seized control of the House as the party of reform, pledging in their "Contract With America" to "restore accountability to Congress." By 2006, that pledge was a punch line. House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) and his K Street Project had turned the corporate lobbying community into a virtual subsidiary of the GOP. Republican leaders routinely moved bills stuffed with earmarks and special-interest giveaways late at night, without giving members a chance to read them. A huge scandal was swirling around Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and investigators were swarming around DeLay, Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) and Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio).

Many House Democrats were genuinely outraged by what they regarded as misrule by the GOP. But Pelosi and her top political adviser, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), also saw that the Republican "culture of corruption" could be a winning issue.

DOJ_NMG_0112357

In 2005, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), led by Emanuel, unveiled a "House of Scandal" Web site, and Emanuel co-wrote a "Special Interest Lobbying and Ethics Accountability Act." Pelosi, who used to serve on the House ethics committee, later introduced an "Honest Leadership and Open Government Act." Their focus groups suggested that simple anti-corruption campaigns would not work, but that voters would respond to messages that tied Republican coziness with special interests such as the petroleum and pharmaceutical industries and to quality-of-life issues such as gas and drug prices.

"The point was that Republicans had sold the country to the highest bidder," Emanuel said.

But the Democrats had a few problems of their own, such as Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (W.Va.), the ranking Democrat on the ethics committee. Mollohan had fought Republican efforts to completely defang the already weakened committee, but a conservative nonprofit group revealed that he had become rich while serving in Congress, often through real estate deals with beneficiaries of his earmarks.

Pelosi liked Mollohan, and she thought that he was being targeted by House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.) and other Republicans as payback. But the story of Mollohan's millions did not go away, and within days, she asked him to leave the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, as the House ethics panel is formally known. She wanted to draw a clear distinction between Democrats and Republicans, who had given DeLay and Ney standing ovations long after their ethical problems became clear.

Mollohan grudgingly agreed to step aside. "There was no alternative," recalled Murtha, a close friend of Mollohan's and Pelosi's.

But Pelosi never pressured Mollohan to give up his seat on the House Appropriations Committee. "She would have talked to me if she was even considering it," Murtha said.

Pelosi faced a trickier dilemma with Jefferson, whose former aide had implicated him in a bribery scheme. For months, Pelosi took no action, saying the legal system should run its course. Jefferson was allowed to brief House Democrats about Katrina at a caucus meeting, and he held a campaign fundraiser at Democratic headquarters.

A Harvard Law School graduate who had picked cotton as a boy, Jefferson was Louisiana's first African American representative since Reconstruction. And Pelosi was wary of antagonizing the Congressional Black Caucus, one of her party's most influential factions.

But on May 20, 2006, at 7:15 p.m., federal agents raided Jefferson's office on Capitol Hill, the first time that had ever happened to a sitting congressman. And the FBI affidavit justifying the raid revealed the inconvenient $90,000 in the freezer, along with transcripts of a taped conversation that appeared to capture Jefferson soliciting a bribe.

Pelosi quickly realized that late-night jokes about "Dollar Bill" and his cold cash were muddying her message about GOP corruption. She joined with Hastert in condemning the raid as an executive-branch intrusion on congressional prerogatives, but she also met privately with Jefferson and asked him to leave Ways and Means.

He refused, saying his lawyers were not letting him tell his side of the story. But she insisted that he must step down, just as a police officer would be suspended during an official investigation. When he balked, she sent a formal letter requesting his resignation from Ways and Means, "in the interest of upholding the high ethical standard of the House Democratic Caucus."

Jefferson replied that Pelosi's request was "perplexing and unreasonable," noting that his legal problems had nothing to do with Ways and Means. He wrote that it was also "discriminatory" because no other House member under federal investigation has been asked to leave a "substantive, legislative committee," an obvious reference to Mollohan and the appropriations panel.

Jefferson's allies took up his cause. Rep. Melvin Watt (D-N.C.), a Yale Law School graduate who heads the Black Caucus, told Pelosi at the June meeting that her decisions on ethical issues would be totally arbitrary without a "bright line standard." Pelosi said her standard was common sense, noting: "Anybody with $90,000 in their freezer, you have a problem at that point."

That was not good enough for Watt. "Okay, how much cash in the freezer does it take?" he asked in an interview. "The problem is not that there's a double standard. The problem is there's no standard."

In early June, after Republicans retained Cunningham's seat in a special election, some pundits declared the corruption issue a political loser. But Pelosi saw that the GOP had been forced to spend heavily to defend a conservative district. She had faith in the corruption issue, as long as voters could see that the two parties were not equally corrupt. That meant distancing Democrats from "Dollar Bill." "We wanted our members to be able to say: 'We deal with this kind of thing, and they don't,' " one leadership aide recalled.

At the Democrats' June 15 meeting, Reps. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick (Mich.), Jesse L. Jackson Jr. (Ill.) and Watt all spoke on Jefferson's behalf before Pelosi took the floor. Pelosi said that she did not want to force this decision on the caucus, but that Jefferson, unlike "other people" -- another reference to Mollohan -- had refused to step down. "We're about high ethical standards," she said.

When she was done, one of Jefferson's supporters demanded a secret ballot. "I would have it no other way," Pelosi replied.

DOJ_NMG_0112358

The Democrats then followed their leader.

Pelosi is a San Francisco liberal, and some critics expect her to steer her caucus to the far left. But her allies say the Jefferson affair shows that she cares less about ideology than unity. "It was a real defining moment for her leadership," said Rep. Mike Thompson (D-Calif.).'Incumbent-Protection'

During the Democratic landslide on Nov. 7, more voters told exit pollsters that corruption was "extremely important" to their vote, rather than terrorism, the economy or the war in Iraq. Emanuel counted eight races in which charges of personal misconduct had cost incumbents their seats. That did not bode well for Jefferson, who had limped into a runoff with Carter, a young state legislator from a prominent Democratic family in New Orleans.

Carter ran on corruption, arguing that Jefferson had become a pariah in Washington. Louisiana Democrats endorsed her, and she hoped that the national party might as well. She knew the DCCC did not usually help challengers against Democratic incumbents, but she figured incumbents were not usually caught with $90,000 in their freezers.

So she called Pelosi. Several times. "Her people told me, 'She's very busy, Karen. Call back after the leadership elections," Carter recalled. So she did. Several times.

The result: "She's very busy, Karen."

Carter eventually got through to Pelosi's chief of staff, John Lawrence, but she never heard from Pelosi. She also made several calls to Emanuel but only heard back from his political director, Sean Sweeney.

"You know, this isn't my first rodeo. I understand they had a sitting congressman who hadn't been indicted," Carter said. "But they had run around the country saying they were going to end the 'culture of corruption.' I thought they might, at least, return my calls."

In fact, Democratic leaders never really considered helping Carter. "We're an incumbent-protection organization," said Sarah Feinberg, DCCC spokeswoman. The leaders privately rooted for Carter to unseat their most notorious albatross, but they did not want to alienate the Black Caucus or scare every Democratic incumbent with a potential primary opponent.

"Obviously, having Jefferson around complicates our message," said one leadership aide. "But taking him on would have created so many more problems." DCCC officials also thought that helping Carter would make her look like the candidate of Washington, and of whites.

But Carter was eager for the help. It would have bolstered her message that Jefferson was a Hill pariah, and would have undercut Jefferson's message that he was a victim of a GOP plot.

In the end, although she was supported by several prominent Louisiana political figures such as former senator John Breaux (D), Carter did not receive a single endorsement from incumbent House members.

Meanwhile, the Black Caucus -- as well as individual legislators such as incoming House Majority Whip James E. Clyburn (D-S.C.) -- poured money into Jefferson's campaign. Watt taped a radio ad for him, and Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee (D-Tex.) campaigned for him. Their calculations were simple. "Jefferson, over time, has supported me, and I've supported him," Clyburn explained.

Ultimately, Jefferson won handily enough that even Carter does not blame her defeat on national Democrats. But she does wonder about their commitment to reform.

"I kept saying: 'This is the culture of corruption, and you can help stop it,' " Carter said. "They chose to ignore me. If the leadership had made a clear statement that this kind of behavior was unacceptable, maybe they wouldn't have to deal with him anymore."

Pelosi has kept Jefferson off the Ways and Means Committee in the 110th Congress. She did grant him a spot on the Small Business Committee, but even clean-government advocates said that she has done all that could be expected.

The advocates are less impressed by her handling of Mollohan, who will lead the House Appropriations subcommittee that funds the FBI while its agents investigate him. Pelosi also raised eyebrows with her support for Murtha, whose candidacy for majority leader was doomed by ethical controversies from the 1980s. And after she backed off her plan to woo the Black Caucus by giving the intelligence committee to Hastings, who had lost his judgeship over bribery allegations, she reached out to the Hispanic caucus by turning to Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Tex.), who was also embroiled in his own ethical controversy over funding for a border-security firm.

Ultimately, Pelosi thinks she will be judged by the record of the Democratic majority, and by the ethics overhaul it will begin today. Members would be barred from accepting -- from lobbyists or their clients -- gifts, meals, flights on corporate jets or trips that last longer than a day. They would also have to disclose all of their earmarks, and to certify that the provisions will not benefit them personally. The goal is to end K Street's reign over Capitol Hill -- or, as Clyburn puts it, to "cut the umbilical cord between lobbyists and legislation."

"She takes ethics really seriously," said George Crawford, a former Pelosi aide who is now a lobbyist. "She's not just going to bow to the politics of the moment."

DOJ_NMG_0112359

But it is true that Pelosi's $90,000-in-the-freezer standard is not a real standard at all. She has handled Jefferson, Mollohan, Murtha and Hastings on a case-by-case basis, evaluating the seriousness of the allegations, as well as the potential fallout inside and outside the caucus. She is now the leader of the House, but she is still the leader of House Democrats.

"In the end, she's going to do what she thinks is in the best interests of the caucus," Crawford said.

House Democrats Prepare To Tighten Lobbyist Rules (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

In their first act as the House majority, Democrats today will introduce a package of rule changes to ban gifts and trips from lobbyists, restrict privately funded junkets and begin to sever the cozy relations between lobbyists and lawmakers that scandalized the last Congress.

But a number of loopholes in the proposal have led ethics watchdogs to warn Democrats that their work will be far from done, even if the new rules are secured today. Under the changes, lobbying groups would be able to finance lawmakers' travel as long as those funds were channeled through a nonprofit foundation. And almost all banned perks would still be permitted if given in the context of a campaign fundraiser.

As if to underscore the need for rule changes, the House ethics committee found yesterday that Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.) took part in a 2003 junket to Scotland financed by lobbyist Jack Abramoff that violated House rules. The panel decided against censuring Feeney after he agreed to reimburse the government the trip's $5,643 cost.

The details of the ethics package were greeted warmly by watchdog groups, which have been pushing for a strong response to the influence-peddling scandals that erupted last year. Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, called it a "strong package." Joan Claybrook, president of Public Citizen, hailed it as "a meaningful step forward."

But the same groups said Congress must establish an independent ethics watchdog to enforce the new rules, especially in light of actions such as yesterday's ruling on Feeney's trip. The ethics committee also decided yesterday not to punish anyone for not deterring the behavior of former congressman Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

Under the rule changes, "the importance of creating a new, stronger enforcement entity such as an Office of Public Integrity becomes even greater. Effective enforcement is the linchpin to this entire process," said Meredith McGehee, policy director of the Campaign Legal Center.

The changes would prohibit House members or employees from knowingly accepting gifts or travel from a registered lobbyist, foreign agent or lobbyist's client. Lawmakers could no longer fly on corporate jets. In addition, congressional travel financed by outside groups would have to be preapproved by the ethics committee and immediately disclosed to the public.

The rule changes would also combat many of the strong-arm tactics that Republicans used to leave House Democrats virtually irrelevant when the GOP was in control. Votes could no longer be held open indefinitely while leaders twist arms to win the outcome they want. Lawmakers in both parties would have to be notified before final legislative negotiations begin between the House and Senate. Those negotiations would largely have to be held in public, and once they were complete, changes could not be slipped into legislative agreements in the dead of night.

Another slate of changes is to be voted on tomorrow to rein in swollen budget deficits. Parliamentary rules approved in 1974 to block Senate filibusters on bills that raise taxes or cut entitlement spending could no longer be used to cut taxes and increase the deficit, as Republicans did several times. Under the new rules, any law that cuts taxes or increases spending would have to be offset by tax increases or spending cuts.

Special-interest or home-district pet projects -- known as earmarks -- would have to be claimed by their sponsors, who would have to spell out who benefits. That measure would apply not only to spending bills but also to tax measures and policy legislation, which in recent years have been larded with narrowly targeted provisions.

"My one-word reaction to these earmark transparency [changes] compared to previous efforts: better," said Steve Ellis, vice president of Taxpayers for Common Sense.

The changes, especially the ban on lobbyist-funded meals and gifts, left some Washington businesses grumbling.

"If members of Congress are changing their votes because they are influenced by our [food], then this country is in a lot of trouble," said Patricia Beggiato, special events coordinator at Sesto Senso restaurant. "I guess lobbyists will just have to take each other out for lunch and dinner."

Matt Williams, spokesman for Washington Sports and Entertainment, which owns the Wizards basketball team, said: "This ban will certainly negatively affect the business we do with one of the major industries in our region -- the federal government."

Others said they are not concerned. "We don't believe it will have any effect," a Washington Redskins spokesman said.

Many lobbying groups would still be able to take lawmakers on junkets through their nonprofit foundation affiliates, despite the travel ban.

DOJ_NMG_0112360

Lobbyists and their clients would continue to fete lawmakers at restaurants, sporting events and faraway resorts as long as those events are part of campaign fundraisers. Campaign finance laws, which are distinct from House rules, permit outsiders to provide all manner of benefits to lawmakers as long as those benefits are accompanied by checks written to the lawmakers' reelection coffers.

"We would be able to take people out to lunch, but only if we give them a check while we do it," said Paul A. Miller, immediate past president of the American League of Lobbyists. "That looks more corrupting than what we have under the current system."

In another exception, lawmakers would be allowed to attend receptions and other "widely attended events" paid for by interest groups and lobbyists, according to Kenneth Gross, an ethics expert at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP.

Ethics Overhaul Tops The Agenda In New Congress (NYT)

By Carl Hulse and David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 — On the brink of regaining power after 12 years, House Democrats said Wednesday that they would move immediately to try to sever ties between lawmakers and lobbyists who figured into scandals that helped Democrats win control of Congress.

Democrats, who campaigned relentlessly last year on the theme of a Republican culture of corruption, introduced the proposed ethics rules as part of a week of choreography designed to deliver the message that they did not intend to do business as usual in Washington. In some cases, like restrictions on the use of corporate jets, the rules on gifts and travel by lobbyists go further than what Democrats had pledged earlier.

Another part of the Democrats' package called for detailed disclosure of pet projects or special-interest tax benefits that individual lawmakers insert into major bills. On Wednesday, President Bush jumped into the debate on such spending projects, called earmarks, urging that their number and cost be cut in half this year, a proposal that Democrats immediately rejected.

The ethics issue continued to reverberate Wednesday, officially the last day of Republican control. Two House Republicans, Representative Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania and Tom Feeney of Florida, agreed to pay for trips that the ethics committee determined had been improperly paid for by outside interests.

Mr. Feeney's case involved a $5,640 trip to Scotland originally paid for by Jack Abramoff, the now-imprisoned lobbyist who was at the center of the Congressional corruption scandals. Mr. Weldon, who was defeated for re-election, will pay $23,000 for an undisclosed trip.

The rules changes would also take aim at the so-called K Street Project, the effort associated with the hardball tactics of the former Republican leader Tom DeLay, to pressure trade groups and lobbying firms to hire Republicans or face the legislative consequences. The proposal would prohibit lawmakers and staff members from trying to exert partisan influence on hiring decisions.

"I think this package is more than a good-faith effort," said Meredith McGehee, policy director of the Campaign Legal Center, an ethics group. Referring to the incoming House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, Ms. McGehee said, "If these rule changes are any indication, she is serious."

But the ethics rules do not address the most valuable gifts that come from lobbyists and others interested in legislation: campaign donations. And the Democratic Party's fund-raising machine — revved up by the advantages of being in the majority — continued apace this week with individual members inviting lobbyists and other contributors to a host of events.

On Thursday night, Mrs. Pelosi is having a $1,000-a-head fund-raiser with performances by Tony Bennett, Carole King, Wyclef Jean and the surviving members of the Grateful Dead. "Ms. Pelosi is a huge Dead fan," her spokeswoman said.

Senator Richard J. Durbin was among those who stopped by a reception Wednesday evening for a fellow Illinois Democrat, Representative Melissa Bean, who won a close and expensive re-election race in November. The reception, at Johnny's Half Shell, a restaurant on Capitol Hill popular with lobbyists and lawmakers, drew lobbyists from both parties.

As they prepared for the pomp and festivities that will mark the Capitol Hill power switch, Democrats got a taste of the potential difficulties of governing with thin majorities in the House and Senate as well as a Republican White House and a presidential election two years off.

While Democrats sought to introduce their ethics legislation at a news conference, the antiwar activist Cindy Sheehan and others interrupted with chants of "Troops home now; de-escalate, investigate." The scene vividly illustrated the pressure that Democrats will face from the left wing of their party to challenge President Bush more aggressively on Iraq. Ms. Sheehan and other antiwar advocates felt they contributed to the Democrats' takeover of Congress.

At the same time, Republicans made clear they intend to hold Democrats accountable for their pledge to allow more minority party participation in legislation. They assailed Democrats' plans to push through major legislation right away without allowing Republican alternatives. Though the Republicans severely limited Democrats' input when they were in charge, they rejected accusations that they were hypocritical.

DOJ_NMG_0112361

"The important point here is that the American people were promised a new way of doing business in the United States Congress," said Representative Adam H. Putnam of Florida, chairman of the House Republican Conference.

Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the new majority leader, said Republicans would get their chance after Democrats disposed of legislation on national security, minimum wage, prescription drug costs, stem cell research, student loan costs and energy.

"We said to the American people, 'If you elect us, if you put us in charge, this is what we are going to do and we are going to do it in the first 100 hours,' " Mr. Hoyer told reporters.

Democrats were dogged by technical difficulties when a changeover in House Web sites delayed the formal posting of their ethics proposal.

The Senate will convene Thursday as well, with Democrats and Republicans meeting first in an unofficial closed-door session in the old Senate chambers to try to find some common ground. Aides said the Senate was going to take up its own ethics package next week, allowing a week or more of floor debate to shape legislation.

Besides the rules barring lawmakers from accepting gifts, meals or trips from lobbyists or the organizations that employ them, the House Democratic plan would also require preapproval from the Ethics Committee for any trips paid for by other outside groups aside from educational institutions.

On the subject of corporate jets, Democrats had previously discussed raising the rate at which lawmakers reimburse corporations or other sponsors for flights, but still allowing use of the jets. But the rules proposed Wednesday would bar lawmakers from any use of corporate jets.

Previous Democratic and Republican proposals about shedding light on earmarks, the pet projects lawmakers insert into major spending bills, left large loopholes, particularly in regard to military contracts.

In contrast, the new rules appear to apply to all spending earmarks as well as tax or tariff provisions that benefit fewer than 10 companies or people. They would also require disclosure of such items in each bill as well as the individual sponsors.

The rules would further require each House member requesting an earmark or limited tax provision to certify that he or she would not profit from the provision.

Democratic leaders also said that in February they would take up potential new restrictions on members of Congress and staff members becoming lobbyists, and that in March they would consider creating an outside panel to enforce the ethics rules — a step that lawmakers of both parties have resisted.

President Bush called for the Democrats to adopt even more drastic restrictions on earmarks, a perennial bane to executive branch officials who resent Congressional meddling in their budgets.

"One important message we all should take from the elections is that people want to end the secretive process by which Washington insiders are able to get billions of dollars directed to projects, many of them pork barrel projects that have never been reviewed or voted on by the Congress," Mr. Bush said. He called on Democrats to require "full disclosure" of "the costs, the recipients, and the justifications for every earmark" as well as sponsors.

For New Congress, A Long 'To Do' List (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON

Sweeping back into power in both the House and Senate, Democrats Thursday launch a 100-hour legislative blitz to signal new management on Capitol Hill.

Early action will come mainly from the House of Representatives, where a 31-seat margin gives Democrats - led by Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the nation's first female speaker - more room to maneuver than in the Senate, where Democrats have just a two-seat margin.

Most items on House Democrats' early-action agenda had been rejected by the previous 109th Congress, when Republicans ruled. Among them are pocketbook issues that, Democratic leaders say, will directly impact the lives of Americans: a higher minimum wage, lower interest rates on student loans, and a provision to empower the government to negotiate lower prescription-drug prices for seniors.

Other measures slated for the fast track, which are popular among voters and have support from at least some Republican lawmakers, include more federal funding for stem-cell research, reduced subsidies for big oil companies, and implementation of more recommendations of the 9/11 Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0112362

At the same time, Democrats feel pressure - from their own caucus as well as from outside groups - to take up the tough issues that won them their majority, such as finding an exit strategy for the war in Iraq. That begins first in the Senate, where Democrats plan to begin hearings next week on the Iraq war, in anticipation of President Bush's expected announcement of a "new way forward" in Iraq.

The blitz on the House side begins Thursday with rule changes to break with the lobbyist scandals of the 109th Congress and ensure a more open government. Incoming Speaker Pelosi says the new ethics rules will change the GOP "auction house" back to the people's House, and give some rights to the minority.

Democrats campaigned to end the "culture of corruption" in Washington.

The House reform package would ban gifts and meals from lobbyists and the organizations that employ them, require pre-approval from the ethics committee for travel paid for by outside groups, prohibit the official use of corporate jets, require full disclosure of all earmarks, and consider creating an outside group to enforce ethics laws.

It also guarantees certain rights to the minority party, including adequate notice of meetings and time to review legislation.

But even before the final details on the new ethics rules were released, Republicans charged that they had been left out of the process - and hadn't seen a draft of proposed rules changes until a day before the vote.

"The idea that these are issues that have been around for a long time and that they don't need debate, that doesn't pass muster," said minority whip Roy Blunt (R) of Missouri at a press briefing Wednesday.

Other members concur. "You either believe in minority rights or you don't," says Jo Maney, a spokeswoman for Rep. David Dreier (R) of California, the outgoing chairman of the Rules Committee.

"When Republicans took control of the House in 1995 after 42 years, they pledged to restore minority rights by ending proxy voting and guaranteeing Democrats a vote on their own alternative bills. But with their slim majorities, Republicans often ruled out Democratic amendments on bills and held 15-minute votes open until GOP leaders could change the outcome on the floor.

In the new Congress, Republicans say they have no guarantee of a vote for their version of legislation.

Senate Democrats, meanwhile, also plan to lead off with lobby and ethics reform this week, but will take more time for debate.

In the last Congress, the Senate passed a version of lobby reform by a 98 to 8 vote, but never reconciled its differences with the House over a final version of the bill. The Senate bill banned all gifts and meals from lobbyists and required lawmakers to wait two years before accepting lobby jobs after leaving Congress.

"The Senate passed a bill last year that will be the starter," says Jim Manley, a spokesman for incoming majority leader Harry Reid.

On the day before Congress officially convened, President Bush who will be working with a Democratic Congress for the first time in his tenure, called on lawmakers to make fiscal restraint a priority. He also asked Congress for the line-item veto, which would permit him to cut specific spending from legislation without vetoing the entire bill. He asked lawmakers to cut back on earmarks, or pet projects, and extend tax cuts. Bush said he will present Congress with a budget proposal next month that would balance the federal budget by 2012.

House Democrats already plan to make fiscal restraint a centerpiece of their agenda. They will vote to require pay-as-you-go budget rules as part of their "honest leadership, open government" rules package.

The Democratic caucus includes a record 44 members of the Blue Dog coalition of fiscal conservatives, who are expected to weigh in against unfunded new spending by freer-spending Democrats.

"We know that these moderates make the difference between being in the majority and being in the minority, and they will be given deference," said Rep. John Spratt (D) of South Carolina, incoming chairman of the House Budget Committee, in an interview on C-SPAN Wednesday. He has led House opposition to soaring budget deficits in the Bush years.

First Act For Dems Is Ethics Cleanup (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democrats take control of the House today for the first time in a dozen years and plan as their first act to tackle a problem that helped them oust the Republicans in November: potential corruption involving lobbyists.

The changes range from a total ban on gifts and meals from lobbyists to greater restrictions on lawmakers' travel.

Efforts to cut down on the special projects that lawmakers add, often secretly, to spending bills, face a tougher battle. President Bush on Wednesday called for Congress to reduce the number and cost of those projects, known as earmarks, by half in the next year.

"Earmarks often divert precious funds from vital priorities like national defense," Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0112363

The ethics changes proposed by House Democrats would not limit earmarks. Instead, they would require lawmakers to disclose the special projects and declare in writing whether they or their spouses have financial stakes in the projects. Tax breaks that benefit 10 or fewer people also would be disclosed.

Incoming Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., predicted there would be fewer earmarks in the Democratic Congress because of new rules. But he said Congress should retain the power to funnel money to specific projects. "Every president would like to say to Congress, 'Only the president can add (projects),' " Hoyer said. "That would substantially skew the relationship and undermine the independence of the U.S. Congress."

Spending watchdog David Williams of Citizens Against Government Waste said the new transparency is a good step. But "Democrats are still politicians and … the main way to get elected is to get pork," he said. For his part, Bush had "ample opportunity" to offer ways to clamp down on earmarks during his presidency but failed to do so, Williams said.

The number of earmarks and their price tag has grown dramatically in recent years. Williams' group reports that the pork-barrel spending has nearly tripled in the last decade to $29 billion in 2006.

Incoming Democratic leaders said the rules changes are designed to clean up a Congress buffeted by corruption charges that have led to investigations of several lawmakers and jail terms for former Republican congressman Duke Cunningham of California and former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

"We're bringing back a Congress we can be proud of," said Rep. Louise Slaughter, D-N.Y., who will lead the panel that oversees rules for House members.

Other House Democratic changes would:

·Ban gifts and meals from lobbyists. Current rules set a $100 limit on gifts and meals from the same person in one year.

·Trips organized and paid for by lobbyists also would be limited. Lawmakers still could travel at expense of colleges and foundations that want to influence public policy, but the travel would have to be approved beforehand by the House ethics panel.

·Bar congressional travel on corporate jets.

Democratic leaders have decided to delay until March a decision on whether to create an outside body to investigate and help enforce ethics violations.

Democrats Promise Action On Ethics, Iraq (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 4, 2007

Congressional Democrats stepped hungrily to the brink of power on Wednesday, promising immediate action to limit the influence of lobbyists and constant prodding of the Bush administration to bring U.S. troops home from Iraq.

President Bush pushed back against the political opposition as he contemplated divided government for his final two years in the White House. He said he would soon propose a five-year plan to balance the budget, and he challenged Democrats to avoid passing "bills that are simply political" statements.

"There is nothing political about finding a policy to end the war in Iraq, raising the minimum wage, achieving energy independence or helping kids afford college," shot back Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, due to become majority leader at the stroke of noon on Thursday. "In fact, politics has prevented progress on these issues for too many years."

Even as they prepared to take control of Congress, Democrats received a brusque reminder that they face pressure from the political left as well as resistance from Republicans.

At one point during the day, Rep. Rahm Emanuel, a member of the Democratic leadership, was addressing reporters when he was loudly interrupted by Cindy Sheehan and other anti-war activists. "De-escalate, investigate, troops home now!" they shouted, while he smiled gamely.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, in line to become the nation's first female House speaker, spent much of her day at ceremonial events. She attended a Catholic Mass in remembrance of the children of Darfur and Katrina, then a tea in her honor.

That left it to her lieutenants to outline plans for the Democrats' initial stretch in the majority.

Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the incoming majority leader, said the first six bills and a series of stiffer ethics rules would be passed within two weeks.

The first step, he said, would take place by early evening on Thursday, and consist of several measures crafted in response to the scandals that weakened Republicans in last fall's elections.

In addition to expanding restrictions on privately financed trips enjoyed by lawmakers, House Democrats said they will prohibit travel on corporate jets and require greater disclosure of earmarks, the pet projects inserted into legislation at the behest of individual lawmakers.

The rules do not prohibit lawmakers from taking trips financed by foundations that seek to influence public opinion. Those trips will require pre-approval from the ethics committee.

DOJ_NMG_0112364

Current rules ban congressional travel paid for by lobbyists or foreign governments, and violations of the existing restrictions played heavily in the scandal involving Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Democrats appeared to backtrack from their campaign-season pledge in at least one area. They were sharply critical last year of Republicans for keeping a roll call vote open for hours so leaders could find enough votes to pass Medicare legislation. But rather than ban the practice, the proposed new rule declares that a vote "shall not be held open for the sole purpose of reversing the outcome."

Two months after the voters ordered a change in congressional control, Democrats and Republicans in the House and Senate, as well as Bush, pledged to work in a bipartisan spirit.

"Democrats are committed to working with Republicans to get results," Reid wrote in a memo distributed to the party's rank-and-file. He said an unprecedented all-senators meeting set for Thursday morning would "allow us to start off on the right foot, as colleagues instead of adversaries."

Those promises could scarcely obscure the political jockeying under way.

After long pledging a new era of civility and openness in the House, Democrats said they would not allow Republicans the chance to amend any of the first half-dozen bills to be brought to a vote during the first 100 hours of the new Congress. The measures relate to the minimum wage, stem cell research, energy, student loans and recommendations by the commission that investigated the terrorist attacks of 2001.

"We view the first 100 hours as essentially a mandate from the American people," Hoyer told reporters, explaining the decision to safeguard those measures from Republican attack.

Republicans were quick to complain — after spending years ignoring Democratic complaints along the same lines. Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif., sent Democrats a letter saying they were violating promises Pelosi had made to allow a "fair debate consisting of a full amendment process that grants the minority the right to offer its alternatives, including a substitute."

More broadly, Republican leaders lined up to support Bush's call for a balanced budget by 2012 while protecting tax cuts passed while they held power.

"In February, the president will submit a budget to Congress that will grow the economy by making tax cuts for working families permanent, and I support those efforts," said Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the incoming Republican leader.

Bush said at the White House that his proposal "will restrain spending while setting priorities. It will address the most urgent needs of our nation, in particular the need to protect ourselves from radicals and terrorists, the need to win the war on terror, the need to maintain a strong national defense and the need to keep this economy growing by making tax relief permanent."

"We welcome the president's newfound commitment to a balanced budget, but his comments make us wary," said Rep. John Spratt of South Carolina, the incoming Democratic chairman of the House Budget Committee. "We will simply have to scrutinize the president's budget when it comes next month to see if the rhetoric matches reality."

New Congress, Leftover Challenge (NYT)

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

The nation should welcome the ambitious agenda being offered today by the new Congress's Democratic majority, from raising the minimum wage to advancing stem cell research to restoring oversight of the executive branch. But the real test for the 110th Congress will be its willingness to clean up its own act by adopting forceful and credible ethics reform. That is what the Democratic leadership promised voters. Any hesitation will be rightly seen as a cynical re-endorsement of the Capitol's lobbyist-enabling, corruption-steeped business as usual.

Congress's ethics rules have been rife with loopholes and wrist-slapping punishments that grease rather than police the quid pro quo world of Washington. Fixing some of these problems requires nothing more than a majority vote on the House or Senate rules.

House Democrats appear ready to start with a firm, and long needed, ban on gifts, entertainment and junket travel — including low-cost V.I.P. rides on corporate jets — arranged by lobbyists or their clients. The ban should cover staffers as well, and the Senate should match it. Even that will require wary monitoring, particularly of a provision that would allow members preapproved day trips for speeches, with travel paid by non-lobbying groups.

Both houses should also bar Congressional alumni and other lobbyists from the debating floors and other Capitol inner sanctums. And members of Congress with other ambitions should be blocked from slyly negotiating lucrative private jobs while they're still on the public's payroll and sworn to defend the public's interest. There should be early disclosure of all job feelers.

The back-scratching closeness of politicians seeking campaign donations and deep-pocket interests seeking favors is a capital disgrace. Part of the solution is to douse their dealings with sunshine through prompt and detailed filing disclosures. And there should be full disclosure of the cornucopia of "earmarks" — costly favors inserted without debate or any requirement to disclose authorship in mammoth spending bills. Earmark authors and beneficiaries should be unmasked in time to be mocked by taxpayers.

DOJ_NMG_0112365

Broader reforms will require longer legislative debate, not just a rule change. Paramount is the need to create an independent office for ethics enforcement to end the clubbiness that more often than not covers up or excuses abuses. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has ordered a bipartisan study of this vital proposal by March. We expect this overdue step to receive the forceful support of Ms. Pelosi and Harry Reid, the Senate majority leader. The voters are watching, and lawmakers dare not slip away from the promise to clean up their act.

A Chance To Change The Game (WP)

By Barack Obama

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

This past Election Day, the American people sent a clear message to Washington: Clean up your act.

After a year in which too many scandals revealed the influence special interests wield over Washington, it's no surprise that so many incumbents were defeated and that polls said "corruption" was the grievance cited most frequently by the voters.

It would be a mistake, however, to conclude that this message was intended for only one party or politician. The votes hadn't even been counted in November before we heard reports that corporations were already recruiting lobbyists with Democratic connections to carry their water in the next Congress.

That's why it's not enough to just change the players. We have to change the game.

Americans put their faith in Democrats because they want us to restore their faith in government -- and that means more than window dressing when it comes to ethics reform.

Last year, I was hopeful that scandals would finally shame Congress into meaningful ethics legislation. But after the headlines faded, so did the enthusiasm for reform. In the end, I found myself voting against the final ethics bill because it was too weak and unresponsive to the obvious need for comprehensive reform.

This time around, we must do more.

We must stop any and all practices that would lead a reasonable person to believe that a public servant has become indebted to a lobbyist. That means a full ban on gifts and meals. It means no free travel or subsidized travel on private jets. And it means closing the revolving door to ensure that Capitol Hill service -- whether as a member of Congress or as a staffer -- isn't all about lining up a high-paying lobbying job. We should no longer tolerate a House committee chairman shepherding the Medicare prescription drug bill through Congress at the same time he's negotiating for a job as the pharmaceutical industry's top lobbyist.

But real reform also means real enforcement. We need to finally take the politics and the partisanship out of ethics investigations. Whether or not the House ethics committee has been covering for its colleagues, the secrecy with which its members have operated has led people to question why legislators who are serving jail time were not caught and stopped by the committee in the first place. It's led people to wonder why Congress cannot seem to police itself.

I have long proposed a nonpartisan, independent ethics commission that would act as the American people's public watchdog over Congress. The commission would be staffed with former judges and former members of Congress from both parties, and it would allow any citizen to report possible ethics violations by lawmakers, staff members or lobbyists. Once a potential violation is reported, the commission would have the authority to conduct investigations, issue subpoenas, gather records, call witnesses, and provide a report to the Justice Department or the House and Senate ethics committees that -- unlike current ethics committee reports -- is available for all citizens to read.

This would improve the current process in two ways. First, it would take politics out of the fact-finding phase of ethics investigations. Second, it would exert greater public pressure on Congress to punish wrongdoing quickly and severely. Others have proposed similar good ideas on enforcement, and I am open to all options. We must restore the American people's confidence in the ethics process by ensuring that political self-interest can no longer prevent politicians from enforcing ethics rules.

The truth is, we cannot change the way Washington works unless we first change the way Congress works. On Nov. 7, voters gave Democrats the chance to do this. But if we miss this opportunity to clean up our act and restore this country's faith in government, the American people might not give us another one.

The writer is a Democratic senator from Illinois.

An Ethics Down Payment (WP)

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

THE ETHICS package unveiled by House Democrats yesterday represents a significant down payment on the promise to end the "culture of corruption." It would prohibit lawmakers and staff members from accepting gifts -- meals, entertainment and the like -- from lobbyists and organizations that employ lobbyists. It would prohibit lawmakers from taking cut-rate corporate jet flights for official or campaign travel, ending one of the most delicious perks of congressional leadership. It would dramatically curtail free trips.

DOJ_NMG_0112366

Travel paid for by lobbyists or organizations that lobby would be prohibited in most instances; of such travel, only trips subsidized by universities or lasting a single day (with an overnight stay) would be permitted. We would have preferred an outright ban on such travel, as Democrats originally promised. Still, this formulation would eliminate the most abusive travel-as-free-vacation. Similarly, the proposal seeks to limit the potential for abusing travel paid for by nonprofit entities by requiring advance approval from the ethics committee, limiting lobbyists' involvement in such trips and preventing funds from other sources from being earmarked to pay for the travel (as with the golfing junkets arranged by lobbyist Jack Abramoff).

We would have liked to see more. For example, while ending gifts from lobbyists, the rules don't crack down on their ability to host glitzy convention parties to "honor" lawmakers. It makes little sense to bar a free lunch but permit a lavish party. In addition, spouses of lawmakers and staff members would remain free to tag along on trips, all expenses paid. There's no justification for permitting this freebie.

The key to the effectiveness of all these rules changes will be in their implementation, which is the challenge awaiting Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). One issue is how diligent the ethics committee will be in screening travel requests. Another is how ethics enforcement will be strengthened. Ms. Pelosi has said she will name a panel to look into creating some kind of independent ethics arm; one such model is discussed on the opposite page today by Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.). As the lackluster performance of the ethics committee over the past several years has shown, some such change is critical. Ethics rules that are not vigorously overseen and enforced are not worth the Congressional Record they're printed in.

The Democrats' Agenda (USAT)

USA Today, January 4, 2007

The most brazen failure of the previous Congress was its arrogant refusal to take its ethics lapses as seriously as voters did. Somehow, the spectacle of lawmakers being indicted and sent to prison failed to move GOP leaders to crack down on a seamy world in which lobbyists routinely shower members with meals, gifts and trips.

Now Democrats promise the discipline Republicans never got around to. Rules they unveiled late Wednesday, and plan to adopt today, include bans on lobbyist gifts and meals and most privately funded travel, with modest and seemingly legitimate exceptions.

In a major change, members would no longer be able to hitch rides on corporate jets, a beloved but outrageous perk that has afforded members elite level travel and given lobbyists priceless access.

This is a step forward, but if it is the only step it will not be enough. Money rules in Washington because even the most ethical candidates need wads of it to get elected and those of lesser principle are easily seduced by lobbyists' solicitations. Public financing of campaigns would have greater impact and is an idea that should be pursued later on.

Eye On The Clock, House Democrats Put Their Focus On '100 Hours' (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

It sure sounds like a race against time. Democrats have given themselves a mere 100 hours to break the bonds between lobbyist and lawmaker, boost homeland security, raise the minimum wage, fund stem cell research, lower prescription drug prices, slash student loan interest rates and free the country from its dependence on international oil.

A hundred hours to pass at least eight significant pieces of legislation and rule changes -- 4.17 days! Heck, Republicans had all year to pass 11 routine spending bills and managed only two. But, hey, who's really counting?

"We think we'll do it in less than a hundred hours," boasted incoming House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) in a fit of bravado yesterday. "But," he added, "it all depends on how you're counting a hundred hours."

To begin with, if you're a House Democrat, you don't start the clock running today, when the 110th Congress is sworn in and voting begins, or even tomorrow, when a package of measures reaches the floor to rein in fiscal profligacy. You fire the starting gun on Tuesday, six days into the 110th Congress. Now that's a head start.

Then you count only legislative hours, that is, the hours that the House is actually in session and voting. Forget the weekends, the night hours, Martin Luther King Day on Jan. 15, or, for that matter, the next day, when votes don't start until well after sundown.

If all goes according to plan, the House will get through its hundred-hour agenda in 15 days, or 360 hours, by standard definition. Today, the House will take up an ethics package. Tomorrow, new budget controls. On Tuesday, the House will enact most of the security recommendations of the bipartisan commission that examined the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. On Wednesday, the minimum wage goes up. On Thursday, it's federal funding for stem cell research, and on Friday, Democrats intend to give the government the authority to negotiate drug prices for Medicare. On Jan. 17, interest rates for student borrowers will be slashed, and on Jan. 18, tax breaks for Big Oil will go by the wayside, making room for alternative energy research.

DOJ_NMG_0112367

That may not be 100 hours, but let's not be too literal about these things. After all, the Bible tells us that Abraham died at 175; his wife, Sarah, gave birth to Isaac at the matronly age of 90; and Noah made it to age 950. Talk about a drain on the Social Security system.

Majority Playing The Name Game (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, January 4, 2007

A Democratic majority may mean a new direction on big issues such as the Iraq war, immigration and trade. But before addressing such profound matters, Democrats will make a few decidedly more superficial changes to distinguish the 110th Congress from the 109th, when Republicans ran things.

Democrats, organizing their new majority this week, plan to tweak the names of several committees and subcommittees, in addition to altering the lobbying and congressional travel rules that are also part of the initial rules package.

What's in a name? Some changes seem to reflect a personal preference rather than indicate sweeping policy changes. The Committee on International Relations, for example, will once again be called the Committee on Foreign Affairs. New chairman Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) wanted the change in order to preserve the "traditions and history" of the committee, which for most of its life has gone by the Foreign Affairs title, said committee spokeswoman Lynne Weil.

But a new label can be more than mere wordplay, potentially signaling a change in the political priorities, responsibilities or emphases of a committee and its members.

The most salient change may be to the Committee of Government Reform, which will add the word "oversight" to its title. Democrats have accused House Republicans of going easy on the Bush administration. The "oversight" addition not only returns the committee name to its moniker under the last Democratic majority, but no doubt indicates the committee will serve as one of the more active investigative arms of Congress (see related story).

The Armed Services Committee keeps its name, but the Tactical Air and Land Forces subcommittee drops "tactical" to become the Air and Land Forces subcommittee.

Perhaps more substantive, the committee is adding an oversight and investigation subcommittee, which Republicans ditched when they took over.

Name changes typically accompany a shift in control of Congress, although committee names have been adopted after a change in chairmanship, or to reflect shifts in jurisdiction.

Republicans changed the name of the Education and Labor Committee to Education and the Workforce, even though Republicans were responsible for creating the Education and Labor Committee in the first place.

Jehu Baker, an Illinois Republican, introduced a resolution to create the committee in 1867, declaring that "in view of the greater liberty and larger recognition of manhood which have followed the suppression of the rebellion, it is eminently fitting that the Government should be placed, if possible, in a better relation to the working people of the country," according to the National Archives website.

In years since, labor became a key Democratic ally, a fact underscored by the return to the old name under new chairman George Miller (D-Calif.).

In addition, the House Resources Committee will forthwith be known as the House Natural Resources Committee. The Science Committee will become the House Science and Technology Committee.

The Constitution does not mention committees, giving the House and Senate the authority to write their own procedural rules. Standing committees and their powers are defined in the rules adopted by each body.

One committee name with staying power has been the House Ways and Means Committee, the oldest standing committee in Congress. A select committee in the first Congress, Ways and Means earned permanent status in 1802. (The phrase "ways and means" is even older, used in the English Parliament and in colonial and state legislatures before Congress was established.)

As the only standing committee at that time, Ways and Means originally had broad authority, which included not only the power to raise revenue but also the power to spend it.

The Appropriations Committee wasn't established until after the Civil War, according to the National Archives. "It is utterly impossible in the present condition of our finances that our committee can do all this labor," an Ohio Democrat, Rep. Samuel Cox, said, according to the National Archives.

DOJ_NMG_0112368

In 1946, Congress adopted broad changes to the committee structure. The act reduced the number of standing committees by consolidating jurisdictions, while also increasing the number of subcommittees, according to the Encyclopedia of Congress.

Rep. Frank Opens Door To Business (WSJ)

By Greg Ip And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Businesses wondering how to deal with the Democrats taking charge in Congress today have a blunt offer from a top lawmaker in the majority: Support our priorities and we'll support yours.

The "grand bargain" laid out by Rep. Barney Frank represents a road map to how Democrats may strike deals to aid unionization, expand health-care coverage and find common ground on other issues, while giving businesses concessions on immigration, trade and investment.

In practice, it may be difficult for Mr. Frank either to deliver his party's side of the deal or find a partner with whom to bargain. Still, the Massachusetts Democrat's remarks may represent a guiding philosophy to how Capitol Hill's new majority will try to use popular unease over growing income inequality, flat wages and soaring executive pay as fuel for legislative priorities. Many Democrats exploited those concerns in winning November's midterm elections. (See related article.1)

"There are two outcomes possible," Mr. Frank said yesterday in a speech at the National Press Club. "Either people will join with us in solving the health-care problem, getting a humane immigration policy, good rules that welcome responsible foreign investment, going forward with trade with reasonable...environmental and labor standards, allowing people to join a union, and we will then be able to go forward in a pro-growth way, engage with the rest of the world, implement productivity-enhancing technology."

Alternatively, he said, conservatives can "continue...union busting" and leave a growing number of people without health care. "Then people should not be surprised when there is no renewal of trading authority, if you have resistance to sensible immigration policy. That's the choice that has to be made."

Mr. Frank takes over as chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, giving him formal sway over key business concerns ranging from regulation of mortgage companies Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac and executive pay, but not big issues such as trade, taxes and health care. That means his influence may be as much philosophical as practical.

His influence "is more as a thinker than someone who has a big stick," says Andy Laperriere, a policy analyst for the brokerage firm ISI Group Inc. "In terms of who Democrats look to for someone who thinks about important economic issues, Frank is influential."

But, Mr. Laperriere said, "It's not clear how such a grand bargain can be agreed to on the business-community side. Exactly who is the business community? Thousands of major companies and hundreds of trade associations." Furthermore, he noted that some things business might agree to are anathema to Republicans.

Still, lobbyist Vin Weber said, "I would give more credence to this coming from Barney Frank than just about anybody else." Mr. Weber, a former Republican congressman from Minnesota who served with Mr. Frank, said he has credibility with liberal Democrats, "which is where the rub would come in terms of striking any kind of accommodation with the business community."

Some of Mr. Frank's proposals are largely symbolic: He plans hearings over the next two years on the causes, consequences and responses to increased inequality and weak wage growth. He also warned Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke against blaming higher wages for inflation.

More specifically, Mr. Frank wants to pass a bill allowing unions to organize workplaces when a majority of employees sign cards indicating their interest in a union. That would strip employers of the ability to call in federal regulators to oversee a secret ballot. The bill will speed unionization efforts and is a huge priority for labor groups, but it falls outside Mr. Frank's authority.

He has signaled a willingness to support renewing the president's authority to negotiate trade deals and then submit them to Congress for only an up-or-down vote, which expires this summer, but he wants those deals to contain environmental and worker protections. Trade deals, however, are under the jurisdiction of the Ways and Means Committee, headed by New York Rep. Charles Rangel.

In a telephone interview, Mr. Frank acknowledged his limitations. "What I'm trying to do is create a political climate where this sort of thing would be possible," he said.

Where his committee does have oversight, Mr. Frank said he is taking a cooperative approach. Mr. Frank said he would once again work with Donald Evans, former Commerce Secretary under President Bush and the current head of the Financial Services Forum, to pass rules governing the Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States. (The House passed legislation last year but it stalled in the Senate.) That committee has begun more tightly screening foreign purchases of U.S. companies after an uproar derailed a Dubai-based company's takeover of some U.S. ports.

DOJ_NMG_0112369

Mr. Frank plans to reintroduce a bill tightening regulation of Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac that died last year over administration demands that the companies limit the size of their mortgage portfolios. Mr. Frank said he also favors authorizing the Federal Housing Administration to insure pricier, and presumably safer, mortgages in higher-cost markets as a way to offset defaults by lower-income borrowers. He also will aim, as he did last year, to significantly curtail the ability of nonfinancial companies to own banks with federal deposit insurance in the event the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. doesn't do it.

Even if Mr. Frank is unable to shepherd many of his initiatives into law, he is still in a position to ensure that business priorities continue to stay bottled up in a divided congress. That, he suggested, should motivate business groups to compromise.

Democrats Hope To Take From Oil, Give To Green Energy (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 4, 2007

House Democrats are crafting an energy package that would roll back billions of dollars worth of oil drilling incentives, raise billions more by boosting federal royalties paid by oil and gas companies for offshore production, and plow the money into new tax breaks for renewable energy sources, congressional sources said yesterday.

Eager to paint themselves as different from the Bush administration and the past Republican majority, Democratic leaders are targeting a manufacturing tax cut in 2004 that they say gave unneeded incentives to the oil industry, Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland said in a briefing yesterday. Hoyer said Democrats are also planning to force oil companies to pay royalties on deepwater Gulf of Mexico tracts leased in 1998 and 1999; the Interior Department has said that the leases inadvertently failed to include provisions for royalty payments once oil prices rose above certain thresholds.

The repeal of the 2004 tax cuts for the oil and gas industry would generate nearly $5 billion, Democratic lawmakers said, quoting estimates by the Joint Committee on Taxation. The royalty payments would yield between $9 billion and $11 billion, Hoyer said.

But energy industry and congressional sources said that the details of the package remain in flux, in part because of disagreements among Democrats over how the revenue would be used and whether to also roll back oil and gas industry incentives in the Energy Policy Act of 2005, which was supported by many Democrats.

Democratic leaders said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi would introduce the energy package on Jan. 18, toward the end of the "100 hours" of legislative initiatives.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel and House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell want to be able to hold hearings before some of the key details of such a package are set. As a result, Pelosi will probably introduce the revenue-raising components first and set aside the money in a "fund" to be divvied up later.

Renewable energy lobbyists said that would set off a feeding frenzy among boosters of hydropower, nuclear, biofuel, geothermal and solar energy. Solar producers, for example, have a proposal to expand and extend tax credits for residential solar installations for eight years, which would cost $400 million.

"The Democrats are appropriately shifting money from the 20th-century technologies to the 21st-century industries," said Rhone Resch, president of the Solar Energy Industries Association. "If we want to see solar, wind and biofuels, we have to make that investment today."

Figuring out how to distribute incentives for renewable energy could be controversial. Some Democratic House members want to exclude nuclear power. Some renewable-energy advocates fear that Congress will scramble to provide too many incentives for corn-based ethanol production.

Pelosi's staff has asked the Congressional Budget Office to estimate revenue from several proposals, most based on ones introduced last year by Democratic lawmakers, including Reps. Maurice D. Hinchey (N.Y.), Edward J. Markey (Mass.), Jim McDermott (Wash.) and Brian Higgins (N.Y.).

McDermott's would alter the 2004 tax cut, which was adopted as a way to stimulate job growth by effectively trimming tax rates for a broad range of U.S. manufacturers, agriculture and extractive industries. Mark Kibbe, senior tax analyst for the American Petroleum Institute, said that when fully phased in by 2009 the provision would trim the corporate tax rate from 35 percent to 32 percent. McDermott's bill would eliminate the break for the oil and gas industry.

"From the perspective of our industry, it helped make U.S. oil and gas exploration projects or refining projects more cost-competitive with those abroad," Kibbe said.

The most likely change in the Energy Policy Act of 2005 would be the repeal of a clause that allowed oil companies to deduct geological and geophysical exploration costs instead of treating them as capital expenditures to be amortized over a longer period of time, said congressional aides and environmental lobbyists. This change would generate less than $1 billion in revenue over 10 years, they estimated.

DOJ_NMG_0112370

A variety of proposals would target the question of royalties on the 1998 and 1999 Gulf of Mexico leases. (The Justice Department is investigating possible relationships between Interior Department officials and oil companies that received the leases, said two sources briefed on the investigations last month.)

Five companies representing about a quarter of the leases in dispute agreed last month to insert price thresholds for future royalty payments, but another four dozen firms have not agreed to change the terms of those leases.

"There are a lot of issues with that, such as the sanctity of contracts," said API's Kibbe. "The API doesn't think it's a bad idea to renegotiate contracts, as long as both parties think it's a good idea. "

But Democratic and many Republican lawmakers are adamant on the issue. Markey and Hinchey would bar companies that refuse to renegotiate those leases from getting any future leases on federal lands or in federal waters. Pelosi's office has even discussed a proposal made last year by then-GOP congressman Richard W. Pombo, who wanted to impose a $9-a-barrel "conservation fee" on oil produced in federal waters by companies that refused to renegotiate the 1998 and '99 leases.

"It deprives the American people of the production they own," Hinchey said. "If they think it's too expensive, we should leave it there."

Many House Democrats also want to prod oil companies into making back payments on the disputed leases. Those back payments could amount to $900 million to $2 billion, according to the General Accounting Office.

Environmental groups were happy. "The oil and gas bill is a clear departure from the previous Congress's infatuation with oil and gas handouts," said Erich Pica of Friends of the Earth.

Dems To Push Part D; Opponents' Lobbies Ready For Medicare Battle (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, January 4, 2007

Although the House Democratic leadership plans to move swiftly to pass legislation requiring direct federal negotiation of prescription drug prices under Medicare, opponents of the policy expect the battle to continue in the coming months.

By taking immediate action on the Medicare Part D prescription-drug benefit as part of her "100 hours" agenda soon after the 110th Congress convenes today, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) will make it nearly impossible for drug makers, health-insurance companies and lobbies to stop the bill from passing.

Because the Democratic leadership also intends to skip the committee process and limit the Republican minority's ability to amend such early bills on the House floor, interest groups that want to obstruct additional federal involvement in Part D are looking forward.

Under the proposal, expected to hit the House floor as early as next week, the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) would be required to negotiate with drug manufacturers on the prices they charge Medicare for their products, although the legislation would be short on specifics, according to reports.

Many Democratic candidates, as part of a nationwide strategy, made bulk negotiation of drug prices under Medicare a recurrent theme of their campaigns. Republicans and their allies in the healthcare sector countered by pointing to the high levels of satisfaction with Part D that beneficiaries have reported to independent pollsters.

Under current law, HHS is expressly forbidden to participate in or influence negotiations between the private companies that administer Part D on behalf of the government.

The administration and congressional Republicans generally regard negotiations as tantamount to federal price-setting, a view shared by anxious drug makers.

President Bush and HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt have repeatedly rejected negotiations, arguing that the private health insurers and pharmacy benefit managers that administer Part D plans are doing a better job lowering prices than the government could.

In the past, the Congressional Budget Office has backed up these assertions, although other analyses, such as one issued in October by the Democratic staff of the House Government Reform Committee, conclude that the Department of Veterans Affairs and other federal agencies pay less for many commonly used medicines than Part D plans do.

Healthcare businesses that stand to lose from Democratic action on Part D, led by the pharmaceutical sector, responded to the Democrats' electoral victory in November by signing on additional Democratic lobbyists and preparing to play defense on the new majority's attempts to make changes to Part D.

The efforts are not expected to bear fruit during the early weeks of the 110th Congress, but lobbies are anticipating attempts by congressional Democrats to propose a larger role for HHS in the negotiation of drug prices.

Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.), who chairs the Ways and Means Committee's Health Subcommittee, has pledged his support for the narrow bill headed for the floor, but also has suggested that additional legislation on drug pricing should be considered under Medicare.

DOJ_NMG_0112371

According to members of the health-insurance industry, the debate over Part D will last longer than 100 hours.

"Our function will be to continue to show that our plans are providing value" by offering affordable drug coverage to Medicare beneficiaries and bringing down the price of medicines, a spokesman for America's Health Insurance Plans, Mohit Ghose, said. "We're open to making improvements [to Part D] provided that we're not undermining the successes that we've already achieved."

Affected healthcare lobbies also are looking forward to the Senate's consideration of the issue. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) joined Pelosi in promising during the campaign that Congress would pass legislation establishing federal negotiations of drug prices.

Such legislation faces less certain prospects in the more closely divided upper chamber. Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.), who was one of only two Democrats who helped draft the bill that created Part D, has not endorsed the leadership's plan.

Although Baucus has issued strong criticisms of the Bush administration's handling of the drug benefit, he does not share the view of many other Democrats that its structure is fundamentally flawed.

Moreover, Baucus has opposed legislation to establish HHS negotiation of drug prices. Twice last year, Baucus and Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) voted against such bills.

Business Mobilizes To Defend Turf (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon And John J. Fialka

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

The industries that expect to take the biggest hits from the new Democratic Congress are scrambling their marketing, public-relations and advertising forces to shore up their defenses.

Eager to demonstrate a sharp contrast with Republicans who dominated Capitol Hill for 12 years, new Democratic leaders are vowing to raise the federal minimum wage; reduce oil-company subsidies; give the government bargaining authority in purchasing Medicare prescription drugs; shrink student-loan fees; and impose mandatory controls on emissions of carbon dioxide and other so-called greenhouse gases that contribute to climate change.

LOBBYING PUSH

· The News: Businesses plan campaigns to burnish their image as Democrats take control in Congress.

· What's at Stake: Billions of dollars in subsidies and other breaks for oil companies, prescription-drug makers, student-loan firms and small businesses.

· What's Next: House will pass several measures soon, but some may stall in the Senate.

The worried industries and their trade groups are responding by hiring new lobbying talent, planning mass-market ad campaigns and, in some cases, focusing on getting goodies attached to legislation that they would rather see killed but know they can't stop.

The petroleum industry, for example, is preparing an ad campaign that seeks to justify oil companies' huge size -- and profits. The drug industry is weighing a mass-media counterattack of its own, emphasizing the good performance of the Medicare prescription-drug program. Student-loan titan Sallie Mae is rallying grass-roots support from college administrators. Small-business representatives are talking up tax breaks to offset what appears to be an inevitable increase in the minimum wage.

Many businesses "are gearing up to respond" both to unfriendly legislation and to the prospect of congressional investigations, says George Crawford, a former top aide to new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi. Now with the law firm of King & Spalding in Washington, he has attracted some big new clients in recent months, including Exxon Mobil Corp. and drug maker Amgen Inc.

Many businesses may find it challenging to win new allies among congressional Democrats. The petroleum industry, for example, was demonized as "Big Oil" by Democrats last summer as gasoline prices soared. Now, it faces vows by Ms. Pelosi to move quickly to roll back oil-company subsidies and use the money to establish a fund for wind, solar and other alternative-energy sources.

Democrats are targeting breaks that include tax incentives for geologic research to find oil and favorable royalty deals for domestic oil production. While details remain in flux, some environmentalists estimate the changes would cost the industry $15 billion to $20 billion in the next decade.

In response, the American Petroleum Institute will wage an image-improvement campaign on television and in newspapers to show why Big Oil needs to be big. "We're now in a global market, whether people like it or not," says Red Cavaney, the group's president. The industry contends that private companies hold only about 6% of the world's oil reserves, and that to get access to more oil, companies need to form partnerships with government-owned oil companies, which sit on about 80% of proven reserves. To do that, Mr. Cavaney says, companies must show they have the capital and expensive oil-finding technology to produce the oil.

DOJ_NMG_0112372

Other energy interests are focused on highlighting the costs of climate-change proposals. The National Mining Association, which represents coal-mining companies and mining-equipment makers, recently met with about 20 staffers from the congressional energy committees to show off new tools the industry hopes lawmakers will use in writing legislation. One is a new computer model that, according to the association, calculates the cost of climate-change proposals. For example, a mandatory cap on coal emissions will produce higher electricity prices and job losses at companies that may have to shut down or move overseas because of rising energy costs, according to Luke Popovich, spokesman for the association.

The utilities lobby, lead by the Edison Electric Institute, will deal with emissions controls by emphasizing its efforts to promote energy efficiency and suggesting ways the government could help the industry get new technology that reduces pollution.

Drug companies and labor-intensive businesses such as retailers and restaurants also stand to lose out in the Democratic agenda. House Democrats have promised to pass an increase in the minimum wage to $7.25 from the current $5.15. They also have vowed to give the government the authority to bargain with pharmaceutical companies over Medicare drug prices. That was barred in a Republican-written law passed three years ago.

Already, critics of a minimum-wage increase, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, retailers and small-business groups, are sensing defeat and focusing on securing the best deal they can in whatever legislation passes. "We're working with the administration and members of both sides to minimize the damage," with offsets such as tax breaks and regulatory relief, says John Gay, senior vice president for government affairs at the National Restaurant Association.

Mr. Gay says he realized the political world had changed when Kentucky Sen. Mitch McConnell, the new Senate Republican leader, said after the November elections that he wanted to reach a deal with the Democrats on the minimum wage. And just before the holiday break, President Bush said in the strongest terms yet that he supports a $2.10 increase in the minimum wage, if it is paired with more help for the small businesses that will be disproportionately affected.

Small-business advocates such as the National Federation of Independent Business want any minimum-wage bill to increase the amount of new equipment their members can write off completely for tax purposes in the first year (as opposed to depreciating over a number of years). Restaurateurs are pressing for a broadening of another tax incentive involving the accelerated depreciation of additions and renovations. And some business interests are pushing for a three-year, rather than two-year, phase-in of any increase in the minimum wage.

House Democrats hope they can win a minimum-wage boost without the concessions. "Give us a clean vote on our issue, and [don't] tie us to other things that muddy the water," says Rep. Dennis Moore of Kansas. But industry lobbyists say Democratic leaders acknowledge privately that a deal with industry is likely to be necessary to get the measure through the closely divided Senate, where 60 votes are required to pass almost anything.

In contrast to those opposing the minimum-wage issue, the outlook for drug companies is brighter. While a proposal to allow the government to bargain with drug makers over Medicare drug prices is likely to pass the House, it could face a tougher time in the Senate. The drug industry will argue that the prescription-drug benefit has worked better than expected, is popular with seniors, and that Congress shouldn't tamper with its fundamental features.

"Messing with it and damaging it would not be a smart thing to do, and we are going to encourage Congress to think about that," says Billy Tauzin, a former Louisiana congressman who heads the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the drug makers' trade group. He hinted that the industry is preparing a big ad campaign -- just in case.

If Congress heads toward passing "anything like price controls, we obviously have a big job to do," he says. "If Congress is reasonable and works with us to improve the program, it's a different matter."

The 100 Hours Rush (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

Congratulations to Speaker Nancy Pelosi and her fellow Democrats, who begin their new control of Congress today. They also deserve full marks for paying attention while in the minority, because it's clear Democrats learned a few things from Tom DeLay -- to wit, how to rush through legislation without any minority participation or public debate.

House Democrats plan to pass a pile of legislation in their first 100 hours, bringing the measures quickly to the floor without committee hearings. These are issues they campaigned on last year and that do well in polls at first blush, such as a higher minimum wage, price controls on prescription drugs and "ethics reform." The rush is supposed to show Democratic resolve to get things done, but it's enough to make us wonder if they're afraid that some of their ideas won't hold up under scrutiny.

Take an increase in the federal minimum wage -- to $7.25 an hour in 2009 from $5.15. This was a big hit with Big Labor, and even President Bush has endorsed it in principle. Still, there are negative consequences when the government increases labor costs, and they deserve to be aired, not muffled. No serious economist disputes that a higher wage floor will reduce employment. The debate is only over how many people will lose their jobs. Minorities, low-skilled workers and small businesses get hit hardest, and if a wage hike does less harm this time it will be because in the current tight labor market most employers are already paying above the minimum.

DOJ_NMG_0112373

The need for scrutiny is even more compelling on price controls for Medicare prescription drugs. Under the Medicare Part D benefit that took effect last year, private companies negotiate prices. Democrats want to allow the government to deal directly with drug companies. They argue that this would lead to lower prices for medicines, but the more likely outcome is fewer drug choices and price controls.

Democrats point to the Department of Veteran Affairs as a model, but we doubt seniors will like that story when they learn about it. The government already negotiates drug prices directly with the VA. But as Robert Goldberg wrote last month in the Weekly Standard, "Far from negotiating prices, the VA imposes them. Federal law requires companies to sell to the VA at 24% below wholesale price. If they won't, they are banned from selling medicines to Medicaid, Medicare and the public health service."

The VA has created a list of approved drugs for its patients. Companies that don't pay the VA price don't make the list, and a slew of drugs fall into that category. They include Azilect and Tysabri, two of the newest therapies for Parkinson's and multiple sclerosis, respectively. That's what happens when keeping prices down takes priority over getting the best available medicines to patients. Both drugs are available through Medicare Part D, by the way. Maybe Congress ought to debate this.

On ethics reform, Democrats are offering a hodge-podge of good, bad and ridiculous. The good includes earmark reform, if they are really serious in reducing the number and increasing the transparency of the spending process (see below). The ridiculous is a mandate for ethics training for all House employees, which makes us wonder who they're hiring in the first place.

As for the bad, most of the rest of these "reforms" are about controlling the lobbyists, not the Members, which gets it exactly backward. Putting restrictions on the right of citizens to petition government is a strange way of handling ethically challenged politicians. If a Member can be bought with a free lunch or skybox ticket from a lobbyist, he shouldn't be in Congress anyway. And even as they're forgoing lunch, the Members will still be telling corporate lobbyists they'd better ante up that PAC money, or else.

Most slippery is the attempt by Democrats to disguise so-called "pay as you go" budgeting, or paygo, as ethics reform. This is supposed to be a mechanism for reducing the deficit, but in practice it keeps the spending spigots open and makes tax cuts next to impossible. Under paygo, tax cuts must be offset by less spending, but existing entitlement programs that grow automatically every year are exempt from the rules. Under paygo rules, the Bush tax cuts that expire in 2010 have no chance of being extended -- as Democrats well know.

The country spoke loud and clear on behalf of Democrats last November, but we doubt this means it voted for everything on the party's partisan wish list. Attempting to shove these measures through the House without allowing votes on amendments or alternatives isn't the way a confident majority behaves. We guess this is why the Founders created the Senate.

GOP Will Push For 'Alternatives' (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

House Republican leaders yesterday said they will develop an agenda as the new Democrat-led Congress proceeds and decried plans to pass a series of measures immediately with little input from the minority.

"We think we need to have an opportunity to offer alternatives," said Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, who will be the minority whip when the 110th Congress convenes today.

Mr. Blunt, incoming Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio and several other Republican leaders said Democrats promised voters "a new way of doing business" on Capitol Hill.

"The important point here is that the American people were promised ... a fresh start," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam of Florida, the chairman of the House Republican Conference. "This is a missed opportunity to really change the way the House does business."

The spokeswoman for House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said Republicans will have more opportunities "to put forward their proposals and have their ideas considered than Democrats ever did under Republican majorities."

In the first 100 hours, Democrats will pass measures that "weren't given a fair hearing in previous Congresses," Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said.

Boehner spokesman Kevin Smith said Republicans did not shut out Democrats after taking leadership in 1995.

DOJ_NMG_0112374

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, the Maryland Democrat who will be sworn in as majority leader today, said that his party regained control of the House by promising six specific actions "immediately."

"We view the first 100 hours essentially as a mandate from the American people," Mr. Hoyer said. "We told everybody: If you elect us, this is what we're going to do immediately."

Democrats propose to enact recommendations from the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States, increase the minimum wage, expand federal funding of embryonic-stem-cell research, negotiate for lower prescription drug prices, cut student loan interest rates and reduce government subsidies for oil companies.

Those measures also will have to pass the Senate, and if they don't, Mr. Hoyer said, "the American people will make a judgment on that."

Mrs. Pelosi will present a rules package today that includes a series of ethics provisions that will ban gifts to and trips for congressmen funded by lobbyists.

The rules package is traditionally the first measure passed each Congress.

Republicans complained yesterday that Mrs. Pelosi shared the rules package with them less than 24 hours before the vote.

The first 100 hours is understood to mean the first 100 hours of legislative activity. Even though Congress will convene today, the Democrats are not scheduled to complete the last of their six measures until Jan. 18 or 19.

Hoyer Defends Democrats' Plan To Block Republican Amendments (BLM)

By Laura Litvan And Nicholas Johnston

Bloomberg, January 4, 2007

Jan. 3 (Bloomberg) -- The voters' decision last November to give Democrats control of Congress justifies party leaders in blocking Republicans from amending a wave of bills that will move through the House this month, said incoming House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer.

Hoyer, a Maryland Democrat, said his party campaigned on a ``100-hour" agenda that includes raising the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour from $5.15 and should be able to move that measure through the chamber without interference. Democrats will later make good on a separate campaign promise to allow the minority party more opportunity to amend bills on the House floor or in committee.

``We view the first 100 hours as essentially a mandate from the American people," Hoyer told reporters.

His comments come amid a controversy that began Dec. 14 when House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat, said for the first time that Republicans wouldn't get a chance to offer amendments to those initial bills. House Republican leaders have protested the move, and some key committee chairmen yesterday sent letters to Democrats complaining that they are being locked out of the process.

Democrats take control of the House and Senate at noon tomorrow after elections that left their party with 51 of the Senate's 100 seats and 233 of the House's 435 seats.

When Republicans were in the majority, they routinely blocked Democrats from amending bills and angered Democrats by often moving legislation to the floor without adequate time for lawmakers to review the contents.

Republican leaders today said Democrats weren't following campaign promises to run the House more openly.

`Totally Inconsistent'

``It's totally inconsistent with what we have been promised," David Drier of California, the senior Republican on the House Rules Committee, told reporters.

Republicans ``have not seen one line" of any proposed legislation, and committees won't be able to debate any of the bills that will be passed in the first weeks of the session, said incoming Minority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri. When Republicans took control of the House in 1995, Blunt said all of their election-year agenda was first passed by committees.

``The American people were promised a new way of doing business," said Adam Putnam, a Floridian who is chairman of the Republican Conference. ``We are disappointed that, at this point in the game, half of the Congress has been cut out of the process."

In The House, Suddenly Righteous Republicans (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

Thirty-one-year-old Rep. Patrick McHenry (R-N.C.) is not a large man, standing perhaps 5 feet 3 inches tall in thick soles. But he packed a whole lot of chutzpah when he walked into the House TV gallery yesterday to demand that the new Democratic majority give the new Republican minority all the rights that Republicans had denied Democrats for years.

DOJ_NMG_0112375

"The bill we offer today, the minority bill of rights, is crafted based on the exact text that then-Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi submitted in 2004 to then-Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert," declared McHenry, with 10 Republican colleagues arrayed around him. "We're submitting this minority bill of rights, which will ensure that all sides are protected, that fairness and openness is in fact granted by the new majority."

Omitted from McHenry's plea for fairness was the fact that the GOP had ignored Pelosi's 2004 request -- while routinely engaging in the procedural maneuvers that her plan would have corrected. Was the gentleman from North Carolina asking Democrats to do as he says, not as he did?

"Look, I'm a junior member," young McHenry protested. "I'm not beholden to what former congresses did."

Anne Kornblut of the New York Times asked McHenry if his complaint might come across as whining.

"I'm not whining," he whined.

Even before officially relinquishing majority status today when the 110th Congress convenes, Republicans were protesting the Democrats' heavy-handed leadership. But Republicans expecting Democrats to rule the House with an iron fist are likely to be pleasantly surprised: The incoming majority was having enough trouble keeping its own supporters in line.

House Democratic leaders were giving their first news conference of the year when the session in the Cannon building was hijacked by Cindy Sheehan and other antiwar demonstrators, some wearing tie-dyed apparel and pins comparing President Bush to Adolf Hitler. Just after Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) vowed, "We're gonna cut the interest rate in half for student loans," hecklers began to chant "De-escalate! Investigate! Troops home now!"

"That is exactly what we're talking about," Emanuel said, trying to appease the protesters. But the hecklers kept chanting, and he fled.

The Democratic leaders in retreat, Sheehan seized the microphone. "We put them back in power," she said of the Democrats. Passing out fliers calling for defunding the Iraq war, Sheehan shouted: "These are our demands. And they're not requests -- they're demands."

If yesterday was any indication, the 110th Congress will be highly entertaining, if not terribly productive. So far, it's hard to tell which will be a larger impediment to Democratic leaders: the McHenrys or the Sheehans.

The day began when House Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) led fellow House GOP leaders to a news conference in a Capitol basement hall. At 32, he is a year older than McHenry, and several inches taller, but no less outraged by Democrats' refusal to bestow on Republicans the rights that Republicans refused to bestow on Democrats.

"We are disappointed," protested Putnam, whose fair skin was covered with a layer of makeup.

"We're clearly disappointed," seconded Roy Blunt (Mo.).

"I'm disappointed, as are some others," added Kay Granger (Tex.).

"I am very disappointed," concurred David Dreier (Calif.).

It fell to CNN's Dana Bash to point out the awkward truth. "You can play back, almost verbatim, Democrats . . . saying almost exactly what you all just said," she said. "So is there a little bit of hypocrisy in you saying that you want minority rights?"

"This is a missed opportunity to really change the way that the House does business," Putnam offered, citing Democrats' campaign promises for "a new way of doing business."

"What stopped you from taking that opportunity when you were still in the majority?" inquired Rick Klein of the Boston Globe.

"Well, I'll let Chairman Dreier speak to that," Putnam ventured.

Republicans must have known they'd have some explaining to do, because they scheduled back-to-back news conferences on their minority rights. As soon as Putnam's session ended, Granger took the elevator up three flights and joined McHenry and his cohort in the TV gallery.

Granger had not updated her talking points. "It's very disappointing," she said.

Further disappointment came when the first questioner elicited the confession that none of the lawmakers had previously sympathized with Pelosi's plea for minority rights. McHenry unfurled excuses: "We were not in Congress. . . . I didn't have the opportunity. . . . She did not put it in legislative form."

It had all the makings of a PR debacle. Fortunately for McHenry, the Democrats were otherwise engaged. An hour after fleeing the microphone because of Sheehan's heckling, Emanuel and other Democratic leaders returned for another attempt to talk about ethics and the minimum wage.

"Rahm, would you answer Cindy Sheehan, though?"

"An hour or so ago you had to stop your remarks because [of] Cindy Sheehan."

"What are Democrats going to do about the war in Iraq?"

For the new majority, it must have been, well, disappointing.

DOJ_NMG_0112376

Lessons From The GOP (WT)

By Robert Walker

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

Governing is hard. Governing is particularly hard in the legislative process when promises include explicit deadlines, a commitment to specific legislative proposals and an agreement to respect minority rights.

Just like the Democrats now taking control of the House of Representatives, Republicans in 1995 had promised a legislative process fraught with difficulty. And we immediately encountered the same problems that the Democratic leadership is now facing — concerns about the ability to meet the promised schedule, arguments about the details of the legislation and the potential for missteps if the minority really was given the right to debate, amend, modify or defeat the bills being offered.

In 2007 it remains to be seen if Democrats will be as successful at living up to their promises of minority rights as Republicans were a decade ago. In the earliest days of Republican control of the House our assurances of openness and protection of minority rights were implemented. We provided the minority with additional resources to do their job and eliminated many of the elements of committee fiefdoms that had previously existed. Seventy-five percent of the bills that encompassed the Republican action plan, the Contract with America, were considered under completely open rules or rules that limited only debate time but not the ability to offer amendments.

That Republican commitment to openness and minority participation came at some cost. Among the earliest bills we brought to the House floor was one to eliminate unfunded mandates, the practice of the federal government imposing costs on state and local governments. The bill took two weeks to complete with more than four dozen amendments offered of which 19 were adopted. It was an experience that led the Republican leadership to restrict time on subsequent bills because we had promised to enact our whole agenda in 100 days. But even though time restrictions were adopted, the vast majority of bills were open to unrestricted amendment.

The extension of minority rights that we championed was enacted on the opening day of the 104th Congress. Among the reforms passed was an accurate congressional record, the elimination of proxy voting in committees and an allocation of one-third of the staff at committees to the minority. The purpose behind the changes grew from our experience in the minority where substantial changes in the Congressional Record altered the meaning of floor debate and thereby distorted the proceedings; votes in committee where the tally of those present gave a victory to the minority only to have that victory reversed when the chairman used proxy votes of those not present to enforce his view; and situations where the majority staff so significantly outnumbered the minority staff as to make legislation competition impossible.

In addition, within the Republican Party rules another major reform limited the ability of the majority to establish legislative fiefdoms where committee chairs exercised power in arbitrary ways. The party rules established a three term limit on committee chairmen assuring regular, orderly transfers of power.

Unfortunately, as the pressures of legislating grew, the Republicans in the House lost some of their zeal for openness and minority participation. Rules became more closed meaning that amendments were restricted or completely eliminated. And the result of the loss of openness was a loss of civility and comity in the House.

Some important things were kept — committee chairman term limits, elimination of ghost (proxy) votes, sufficient minority staffing and an accurate record of proceedings. But the restrictions on procedure more and more shut the Democrats out of offering their alternatives within the legislative process. And that situation led to calls for reform by the Democrats, calls that became a part of their 2006 political campaign and contributed to their victory.

How well will the Democrats do in keeping the campaign promises? The rules package offered on opening day in the 110th Congress contains special rules for enactment of their 100-hour legislative plan. Those special rules allow for no minority participation. The bills will not be considered in committee (unlike the 1995 Republican process that brought all the Contract bills through the appropriate committees) and no amendments will be permitted. The only action granted to the minority will be a motion to recommit the bill to a committee from which it never emerged. In addition, the Democrats have not imposed term limits on their committee chairmen, meaning at least one of the reforms of a decade ago has been abandoned.

Hopefully these initial steps are not harbingers of what is to come but are merely an indication of a party trying to govern and finding that governing is hard. But legislating by fiat is destructive. It destroys legislative quality. It destroys civility. And it destroys the debate on issues to which all American are entitled.

Republicans should have remained true to the principle of openness, full debate and minority participation. Democrats, we can hope, learned that lesson.

Former Rep. Robert Walker, who served as part of the House leadership under Speaker Newt Gingrich, is chairman of Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates.

DOJ_NMG_0112377

Political Gadfly Cindy Sheehan Disrupts Democrats' Policy Meet (AFP)

AFP, January 4, 2007

Antiwar activist Cindy Sheehan and about a dozen other peace protesters demonstrated at the House of Representatives to urge Democrats to aggressively investigate the war in Iraq.

"De-escalate! Investigate! Troops home now!" Sheehan and the other protesters chanted at Democratic leaders in the House Cannon Office Building, who had assembled for a press conference on their agenda as they prepare to take power Thursday.

Democrats, who take control of Congress Thursday for the first time in 12 years, have vowed to hold President George W. Bush's administration accountable for its handling of the Iraq war.

Protest organizer David Swanson told AFP said they wanted to underscore their displeasure that Democrats, in the view of peace activists, are not aggressively holding the Bush administration accountable for missteps in Iraq.

"We were there to lobby. We wanted to tell them that 'we in the peace movement won this war for you, and we have the impression that you're turning your back on us from day one,'" he said.

"We want Democrats to turn off the money and investigate the crimes," Swanson said.

"Pelosi (incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi) has said cutting off the money is off the table and impeachment is off the table. This is not what we elected her to do."

Sheehan, whose son Casey was killed in Iraq in April 2004, rose to national prominence that same summer when she camped outside of President George W. Bush's Texas ranch to demonstrate her opposition to the US-led war.

She has remained a constant gadfly on the Iraq issue, with antiwar protests, a book, letter writing campaigns, and various civil disobedience actions.

Cindy Sheehan Disrupts Democrats Talk On Ethics (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, January 4, 2007

The war in Iraq and congressional scandals, twin forces that helped Democrats recapture the House and Senate, collided yesterday when antiwar protesters' shouting forced House Democratic leaders to cut short a press conference hyping their proposed reforms.

House Democratic leaders had gathered in the Cannon Caucus room to discuss wide-ranging and symbolic changes to the House rules, including a complete gift ban and new restrictions on travel, earmarks and legislative procedures when activists, including Cindy Sheehan, drove lawmakers from the microphones.

If the rules are adopted after the full House votes on them today, lawmakers' ability to accept junkets from lobbyists will be curtailed, they will have to attach their names to earmarks and spending and tax deductions, credits, exclusions or preferences directed to 10 or fewer beneficiaries will be banned. The proposals also include measures to give the ethics committee power to pre-approve privately funded trips and require lawmakers to report more quickly the costs of the trips.

But when Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) stepped up to pronounce that Democrats fundamentally would "change the relationship between lawmakers and legislators," Sheehan and her allies started shouting, "De-escalate, investigate, bring our troops home now!"

Emanuel's aides said he was willing to talk to Sheehan and her cohorts, but he and Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), Majority Whip James Clyburn (D-S.C.) and incoming Rules Committee Chairman Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.) headed inside the Cannon Caucus room when it appeared the shouting would not stop.

"They are not including the peace movement's voice," Sheehan said, adding that she would have talked to Emanuel and the other leaders had she noticed them waiting to listen. After the leaders huddled inside the closed-door meeting, the shouting stopped and the protesters left.

Most rank-and-file Democrats missed the commotion because they had retired inside their first meeting since recapturing the majority. But many lawmakers, including freshman Reps.-elect Chris Carney (D-Pa.) and Joe Sestak (D-Pa.), said this was the first time they had been able to see a draft of the ethics reforms. They, and the rest of the caucus, will have 24 hours to review the rules changes.

Despite the short review period, which complies with one of the rules changes giving lawmakers 24 hours to review legislation before it is considered at the subcommittee level and on the House floor, Democrats whipping the proposed changes had run into little resistance, said House Democratic sources.

DOJ_NMG_0112378

"They talked about it enough during the campaign. It'll make some people uncomfortable and make lives a little more difficult," a Democratic lobbyist with close ties to leadership said. "But they got a message from voters and this is something they have to do. They'd rather be in the majority."

But some lawmakers raised concerns about whether they would be able to attend events in their district when House Democratic staffers briefed them in regional conference calls last month. For example, if a union held a barbeque could a lawmaker accept their food or if he visited a plant could he eat with the employees? The staffers did not have answers to the questions, said Democratic sources familiar with the calls.

Democracy21 and Public Citizen, government watchdog groups, favorably greeted the proposed rules changes.

Still, the rules contain some loopholes. Lawmakers would be allowed to accept trips paid for by universities so they can speak at graduation ceremonies and junkets sponsored by other non-profit groups, such as the Faith and Politics Institute, which has flown lawmakers to South Africa to educate them on civil rights issues.

In addition, Democrats decided to address more complex issues later. They did not propose creating an independent ethics agency. While top Democrats are predisposed to such an agency, Hoyer and others are concerned about problems that the independent counsels have encountered since 1980, said a senior Democratic spokesman. A bipartisan panel will convene later this year to consider a plan.

There is no provision to strip lawmakers of their pensions if they are convicted of a crime while serving in office. It is unclear if such a provision will be considered later this year, Democratic aides said.

Moreover, some lobbyists voiced concerns that the culture of Washington is so ingrained that lawmakers and staffers would find ways to circumvent the measures. For example, to get around the gift ban, lobbyists might start paying for meals under the guise of a campaign event, and businesses could create non-profit foundations to organize fact-finding trips.

The Democrats also renamed committees, granted power to the newly named Oversight and Government Reform Committee to depose witnesses and banned lawmakers-turned-lobbyists and their spouses from using the House gym.

Meanwhile, Pelosi has moved to cement her authority by placing staffers in key Democratic offices. Her spokeswoman, Jennifer Crider, will become the communications director for newly appointed Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) and Carrie James, a press aide to Pelosi who worked for Rep.-elect Patrick Murphy's (D-Pa.) campaign, will become the deputy communications director for the Democratic Caucus.

And on Friday evening, freshman Democratic and Republican lawmakers leave for Williamsburg, Va., to attend a conference sponsored by the Congressional Research Service.

Cindy Sheehan Routs The Democrats (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

Cindy Sheehan, the "peace activist" who famously besieged President Bush at Prairie Chapel Ranch, yesterday routed the leaders of the new House Democratic majority from their press conference where they attempted to present their legislative agenda.

Chants of "de-escalate, investigate, troops home now," drowned out the new majority leaders, including Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the chairman of the Democratic House Caucus.

The flustered lawmakers retreated to a room behind closed doors, and surrendered the field to Mrs. Sheehan, whose son, an Army soldier, was killed in Iraq in 2004.

With her quarry in full retreat, she scolded Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi for abandoning the war issue in the agenda for the first 100 hours of the 110th Congress, which convenes today. The agenda focuses on other promises from last year's campaigns, including raising the minimum wage, stricter ethics rules and cutting student loan interest rates.

"Speaker Pelosi and the Democratic leadership can no longer tell us what is on the table," Mrs. Sheehan said. "We are the ones that put them in power and they are not including the peace movement. ... It needs to be at least included in the discussion."

She demanded the elimination of funding for the war, an investigation and impeachment of President Bush for what she called "lies" to justify the war.

Mrs. Sheehan was leading about 75 others lobbying congressional offices when they happened upon the press conference. The Democrats were there to present new ethics proposals as part of the 100-hour agenda with which they plan to begin the House majority today.

"Iraq is a high priority for Democrats," said Pelosi spokeswoman Jennifer Crider, and a legislative agenda was not the place to address the war issue.

DOJ_NMG_0112379

She said the call last year from Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, for troop withdrawal "changed the course of the debate [and] sent a signal that Democrats will stand up and hold the administration accountable."

Mrs. Pelosi did not attend the press conference.

After the interruption by the Sheehan-led activists, Mr. Emanuel and other top Democrats returned to the microphone and, in response to reporters' questions, addressed some of Mrs. Sheehan's demands.

"Well, we're going to do the one thing that's been missing ... and that's oversight," Mr. Emanuel said. "We have had a policy where the Congress -- from resources to strategy -- has abdicated its responsibility of overseeing an administration's foreign policy in that area. And the American people, both in blood, treasure, and prestige, is now paying the price for a Congress that abdicated its responsibility."

Mr. Emanuel promised hearings on the war that would answer the types of questions Mrs. Sheehan and the voters are asking.

"That is the most important thing to do, because when you have questions asked, you do not get a Congress that just rubber-stamps the policy," he said. "Now you see the consequence of a rubber-stamp policy, which is what we have in Iraq."

After the press conference, Mrs. Sheehan told reporters that Democrats had abandoned the party's grass-roots anti-war supporters as soon as the election was over.

"I'm disappointed to see that they are talking about giving the president more money for the war," she said. "I'm disappointed to hear that impeachment is off the table. We are here to let them know that we are setting the table now."

Most analysts credited the Iraq war issue with fueling anti-Republican sentiment that propelled Democrats to a congressional majority for the first time in 12 years.

Where Up Is Still Down, But The Rest Is Changing (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich and Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 — There were comparisons to “Alice in Wonderland,” “Star Trek,” “The Twilight Zone,” and all manner of clichés to convey the strangeness engulfing Washington this week as the Democrats prepared to assume control of Congress after 12 years in the minority wilderness. But nothing distilled the new aura of things like this conceit: Steny Hoyer, Rock Star.

“Here he comes, here he comes,” a member of the press throng effervesced when Mr. Hoyer of Maryland, the incoming House majority leader, strode into the room as if he owned the place. Which, in effect, he does — at least the larger, plusher office he is inheriting, which used to belong to Tom DeLay, Mr. Hoyer was compelled to point out. (Not that anyone’s keeping track.)

Mr. Hoyer surveyed the conference room and held his arms slightly apart, as if to frame the unusual site before him: a crush of 60 or so reporters, camera operators, TV types and assorted security people, staff members and hangers-on to befit the status of an emerging fuss magnet.

The fussers were present for Mr. Hoyer’s “pen and pad” briefing, and in considerably greater numbers than during his days in the minority.

“We’re going to reserve some seats for those who came to these pen and pads when I was irrelevant,” Mr. Hoyer said, a line he had deployed before, but which served the recurring purpose of marking the juxtaposition of fortunes that are on full display in the up-is-down realm of Capitol Hill. “There are some who think I’m still irrelevant,” he added, not proffering guesses.

Mr. Hoyer wore a shiny white dress shirt, a red power tie and an occasional look of stunned confusion. To his right, movers passed the window, carrying lamps and tables. Mr. Hoyer was hard to decipher at times, speaking in the mumble of someone accustomed to smaller audiences.

‘It’s Not Whining’

Not so the Republicans convened upstairs.

Waving his hands and stomping his feet, Representative Patrick T. McHenry of North Carolina acted out on Wednesday what the rest of the Republican caucus must have felt.

“It is so hypocritical, just on its face,” Mr. McHenry fumed.

His complaint: That Democrats, on the verge of taking control of Congress, were planning to run the place their way, driving the legislative agenda themselves without input from the Republican minority.

Wasn’t that, someone asked, how the Republicans had run Congress for more than a decade?

“We didn’t campaign on this openness,” Mr. McHenry argued, denying that he and his colleagues were just being sore losers. “It’s not whining,” he said. “It’s a matter of calling them out on their rhetoric.”

DOJ_NMG_0112380

Democrats had not even taken over yet. But Republicans, suddenly facing a minimum two-year sentence out of power, coalesced on their first day back around a message of kvetching.

They held up reports that Democrats would conduct their first 100 hours without allowing amendments from Republicans. They held press conferences to deplore the new regime, citing letters from Mrs. Pelosi from when she was in the minority, requesting a piece of the legislative action.

"There are lots of messages that came across in this November election, and one of the messages was change in doing things differently," said Representative Kay Granger, Republican of Texas.

Watch for Falling Marble

Across town, Representative Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut presided over an afternoon tea that brought together Democratic women for what she described as "our understated way of saying we've arrived."

But as with much of the week's festivities, there was nothing understated about whom the celebration was for: a giant photograph of the incoming speaker, Nancy Pelosi, was on a screen at the front of the room, alongside one of Ann Richards, the first woman to be governor of Texas, who died in September.

When Mrs. Pelosi takes the gavel, Ms. DeLauro said, "The sound you hear will be the glass ceiling in this country, and the marble ceiling in this institution, shattering."

Drop the Pacifier and Smile

"Who is that guy?" a staffer asked, pointing to a big-shotty looking man with a small entourage in the Cannon office building. Must be a new member, he concluded.

Nope, it was Paul Pelosi, the new speaker's husband, leading members of the first family of Congress to get ID card photographs.

This included Paul Michael Vos, the 6-week-old grandson of the speaker and Mr. Pelosi and the son of the filmmaker Alexandra Pelosi, whose HBO documentary "Journeys with George" chronicled George W. Bush's first presidential campaign.

Paul's birth nearly conflicted with Grandma Pelosi's last-minute campaign plans, but he had the good sense not to go off message and showed up after Election Day.

And yes, newborns require photo ID's on Capitol Hill. His father, Michiel Vos, dutifully carried his son into the room marked "ID services." Fifteen minutes later, he emerged crying (the baby, not the father), but with a shiny new photo ID clipped to his adorable onesie.

Hello, but First, This Protest

Down the hallway, Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois was starting to address another news media mob that had waited for him to emerge from a meeting of the House Democratic Caucus. Mr. Emanuel wished everyone a happy new year, apologized for being late and was promptly drowned out by a group of antiwar protesters, led by the ubiquitous Cindy Sheehan.

"De-escalate, investigate," the group chanted. "Troops home now."

Mr. Emanuel and Mr. Hoyer consulted briefly and decided to leave their podium and return later.

"Looks like we're taking a little break," Mr. Hoyer said as he and Mr. Emmanuel rushed away.

Ms. Sheehan was happy to take over the microphone, not to mention the lingering throng of reporters.

She called for a greater role for the peace movement in the Democratic majority, which she said was ignoring the people who put them in power —the peace movement. She called for an end to financing the war.

"And these are not requests," said Ms. Sheehan, whose son Casey was killed in Iraq. "These are demands."

The Democrats eventually returned, and Ms. Sheehan vowed to stay around all week.

"It looks like business as usual, and that's why we're here," Ms. Sheehan said in a brief interview. "We want business as unusual."

Pelosi Becomes First Female Speaker, Preparing To Confront Bush (BLOOM)

By Laura Litvan

Bloomberg, January 4, 2007

Jan. 4 (Bloomberg) -- Nancy Pelosi, making history today as the first female speaker of the House, is taking office with two goals: becoming an effective counterweight to President George W. Bush, and proving that a woman can thrive at the summit of U.S. political power.

Pelosi's attacks on Bush as minority leader are credited by many Democrats with helping them win control of Congress for the first time since 1992. As speaker, she'll be dealing with a narrow majority and a president with veto power, making decisions about when to work with Bush and when to confront him.

While women have served as Supreme Court justices, lawmakers and in senior Cabinet roles, none has ever led her party in political combat at this level. Her success at retiring the notion that women aren't qualified to manage the responsibilities of top leadership may affect others' aspirations, including New York Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's possible bid for the White House in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0112381

``As people see Nancy Pelosi on the national stage, setting the agenda and leading the people's House, it helps to set the stage for Senator Clinton in her run for president, and indeed for other women who may want to run for Senate or run for governor," said Ellen Moran, executive director of EMILY's List, which raises political funds for Democratic women.

Second in Line

In an interview three days before the Nov. 7 elections, Pelosi, 66, said her ascension to the speakership would show that women ``can breathe in that rarified atmosphere." No woman has been as close to the presidency itself: The California congresswoman will be second in line, behind only Vice President Dick Cheney.

Over the past five years, Pelosi emerged as one of the top congressional critics of the war in Iraq. In 2002, she broke with then-Minority Leader Richard Gephardt of Missouri and led a bloc of Democrats who voted against the resolution authorizing the war. She was also one of the first members of Congress to question Bush's assertion that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction, a claim that was used to justify the March 2003 invasion and that later proved inaccurate.

Pelosi will have her first opportunity to spar with Bush over Iraq in February when the White House submits a request for more money for the war. Pelosi has warned that Democrats will attach conditions to the approval of further funds.

Unity and Discipline

Pelosi, who was largely able to maintain House Democrats' unity and discipline when they were in the minority, may have a tougher job now that they are in power. Members have already defied her by rejecting Representative John Murtha of Pennsylvania, her choice for the No. 2 job of majority leader, in favor of Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the current No. 2.

At the same time, she will face the task of trying to push her agenda through a still closely divided House. Democrats will hold 233 seats in the new House, Republicans 202. Things are even tighter in the Senate, where Democrats hold only 51 of the 100 seats -- and one Democrat, Tim Johnson of South Dakota, remains hospitalized after brain surgery.

Bush, 60, vowed yesterday to cooperate with the Democrats - - even as he warned that he would oppose tax increases. ``Congress has changed," he said in remarks at the White House after a meeting with his Cabinet. ``Our obligations to the country haven't changed."

House Republicans say Pelosi is already backsliding on promises to allow more open debate to the House floor. She indicated last month that she won't let Republicans try to amend key parts of Democrats' agenda, including legislation to raise the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, curbing subsidies for oil and gas companies and reducing student-loan interest rates.

A Political Family

The new speaker is hardly a stranger to rough-and-tumble politics. Her father, Thomas D'Alesandro, was mayor of Baltimore and a congressman; a brother also served as Baltimore mayor.

Pelosi, who represents San Francisco, wasn't elected to Congress until 1987, when she was 47 and the youngest of her five children was in high school. She eventually rose to become the top Democrat on the intelligence committee and the appropriations subcommittee on foreign operations.

In 2001, she defeated Hoyer to become Democratic whip. She became minority leader -- the first woman to lead a party in Congress -- after Gephardt stepped down late the next year.

Her elevation to speaker comes during a year when record numbers of women will hold seats in Congress -- 16 in the Senate and 71 in the House. Moran said the Washington-based EMILY's List group sees an opportunity to raise record levels of cash in 2008 after raising $45 million in 2006.

Susan MacManus, a political science professor at the University of South Florida in Tampa, said the significance of Pelosi's new role goes beyond issues of partisanship, showing that women can make decisions on the weightiest issues of government.

Even though two of the last three secretaries of state are women, ``quietly, people are thinking maybe women can't handle the stresses of war and international negotiations," MacManus said. ``Pelosi is going to be right there in the middle of military and foreign policy. Her dealings on these issues are absolutely essential to the success of other women."

Pelosi's Political Rise Is Breakthrough (AP)

By Stephen Ohlemacher

AP, January 4, 2007

It shouldn't be surprising that it took more than 200 years for Congress to select a female speaker of the House. The United States isn't exactly at the forefront when it comes to women in politics.

Women make up a larger share of the national legislature in 79 other countries, including China, Cuba, North Korea and Vietnam, according to the Inter-Parliamentary Union, an association of national legislatures. The U.S. even trails a couple of fledgling democracies: Afghanistan and Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0112382

"When my colleagues elect me as speaker on Jan. 4, we will not just break through a glass ceiling, we will break through a marble ceiling," said Rep. Nancy Pelosi, who is set to lead the House when the Democrats take over Thursday. "In more than 200 years of history, there was an established pecking order — and I cut in line."

At a tea to honor Pelosi and the late former Texas governor Ann Richards on Wednesday, Pelosi said her ascension hadn't come easily. "We have waited more than 200 years for this time to come. But we did not just wait, we worked," she said.

And she alluded to one of the reasons women have been slow to climb the political ladder, saying federal policy has never recognized women's need for child care. "This Congress is going to be about children," she said.

There were 22 women in the House when Pelosi was first elected to her California district in 1987. There will be a record 71 female representatives when she takes over as speaker, giving women 16 percent of the seats.

"The biggest obstacle women candidates face is not about gender, it's about the lack of opportunity," said Ellen R. Malcolm, president of EMILY's List, which helps Democratic women who favor abortion rights get elected to public office. "Ninety-eight percent of incumbents who run for re-election are re-elected in most years. ... The bottom line is there are very few opportunities."

Once women decide to run for office, they are just as successful as men, according to experts who study the issue. However, women are much less likely to run.

One big reason is child care. Women are much more likely than men to be responsible for child care, and that doesn't always fit into the usually chaotic schedule of a member of Congress.

"All these women, even if they are extremely qualified, they are still so much involved in their family life they couldn't even consider running for office," said Richard Fox, professor of political science at Union College in New York.

Fox did an extensive survey of women in professions that produce many lawmakers: education, business and the law. He worked on the study with Jennifer Lawless, an assistant political science professor at Brown University who ran for Congress this year, losing the Democratic primary in Rhode Island to incumbent Rep. James Langevin.

Among their conclusions:

_Women are less likely than men to be asked to run for office by party leaders and other officials.

_When women are asked to run, they are just as likely as men to do it.

_Women are more likely than men to think they are unqualified to serve, even when they have the same qualifications as male candidates.

"A man can wake up one morning, look in the mirror and say, 'By God, I would be the best state legislator that Nebraska has ever seen,'" said Debbie Walsh, director of the Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University. "Men don't need to be asked."

Rep. Jeanette Rankin, R-Mont., was the first woman elected to Congress, in 1916, four years before the 19th Amendment gave women the right to vote (women could already vote in Montana).

Before 1970, more than 40 percent of the women in Congress gained office by succeeding their dead husbands. Since then, fewer than 10 percent have followed their husbands, according to data collected by Dennis Simon, a political science professor at Southern Methodist University.

The number of women in Congress has grown slowly, with the biggest jump coming in 1992, the "Year of the Woman," when it nearly doubled, to 54.

Pelosi, 66, grew up in politics as the daughter and sister of Baltimore mayors. But she waited until her youngest daughter was in high school before she ran for Congress, a path followed by many women.

Women are, on average, older than men when they are first elected to Congress, giving them less time to rise in leadership, which is based largely on seniority.

Lena Saradnik was elected in November to the Arizona State Legislature for the first time at age 59. She said it would have been tough to run for political office while her daughter, now 30, was still young.

Saradnik, a Democrat from Tucson, said she could see herself joining Pelosi in Congress some day, but she's realistic about her prospects.

"If I were younger, I would probably say, absolutely," Saradnik said.

Saradnik said she decided to run for office after being approached by a local Democratic official. She was helped by a training program called Emerge America, which teaches public speaking, fundraising and media skills to female Democrats. Republicans have a similar programs called the Excellence in Public Service Series.

Marya Stark, executive director of Emerge America, predicted that more women will be inspired to run for office with Pelosi serving as speaker and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., being a potential candidate for president.

Pelosi embraces her role as the first female speaker, but she wants to be judged by the same standards as the 51 men who came before her.

DOJ_NMG_0112383

"I have always asked my colleagues to judge me by the quality of my leadership and the results we achieve together, not as the first woman," Pelosi said.

But, she added: "Becoming the first woman speaker will send a message to young girls and women across the country that anything is possible for them, that women can achieve power, wield power and breathe the air at that altitude. As the first woman speaker of the House, I will work to make certain that I will not be the last."

___

On the Net:

Center for American Women and Politics: http://www.cawp.rutgers.edu/

Inter-Parliamentary Union: http://www.ipu.org/wmn-e/classif.htm

Pelosi Shows She's The Head Of Her Party (LAT)

By Faye Fiore And Tina Daunt

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — Most Americans still don't know who Nancy Pelosi is, and this was her last chance to script an introduction before Congress convenes today and she becomes the first female speaker of the House.

So on Wednesday, Pelosi kicked off a three-day celebration of her ascension packed with more product placement than an infomercial.

The cannoli at the reception after the morning Mass were from the bakery on the street in Baltimore's Little Italy where she grew up. The white lilies on the altar were her favorite flower. The chapel belonged to Trinity University, the Roman Catholic women's college she graduated from in 1962.

Pelosi sat in the front row surrounded by five of her grandchildren. The sixth sounded off midservice and had to be walked around by his mother, reminding everyone that his grandmother ditched Washington seven weeks ago to sit at his crib side.

"We've waited over 200 years for this time," Pelosi said at an afternoon tea turned power rally. "America's working women, women working at home, whatever they choose to do, they have a friend in the Capitol of the United States."

Five hundred women wore Rosie the Riveter buttons with Pelosi's face superimposed, with pearl earrings, above the slogan: "A woman's place is in the House ... as Speaker."

It was her first full day on the national stage, and she used it to tell the country who she is, where she came from and where she plans to go — the little Italian American girl from a political household who later raised five children before running for the House and making history as the nation's highest-ranking elected woman in 217 years of government.

Unfurling a roadmap

The installation of a new speaker is the closest Congress comes to a presidential inauguration. Some critics accused her of putting on a "Nancy Fest," but supporters said the events were as much political roadmap as biography.

"This is fitting," said Democratic strategist Donna Brazile. "She's not just tracing her steps, we're learning the path she intends to take us on."

The morning Mass at Trinity University was dedicated to the children of Darfur and Hurricane Katrina, the afternoon tea to the late Texas Gov. Ann Richards and other female political luminaries whom Pelosi says she "stood on the shoulders of" to get where she is. An interfaith Mass this morning is dedicated to the armed forces.

But it wasn't all selfless tribute.

Pelosi is the House Democrats' most prolific fundraiser, and supporters will pay $1,000 a seat and political action committees $15,000 to hear Carole King, Wyclef Jean and Tony "I Left My Heart in San Francisco" Bennett perform at tonight's celebration concert at the National Building Museum in downtown Washington.

Democrats were in the mood to celebrate, and Pelosi planned to give them plenty of opportunity: a dinner at the Italian Embassy on Wednesday and a party Friday in Baltimore, during which the block she grew up on is to be renamed Via Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi.

Plenty of California's top Democrats flew in — Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom, recently defeated gubernatorial candidate Phil Angelides and former California Senate leader John Burton.

Democrats dismissed criticism that it was over the top.

"We've eaten so much crow over the last 12 years I have no problem with popping the champagne, if only to remind us we've worked hard but now it's time for us to work for the American people," Brazile said.

But when it comes to Pelosi, there isn't much consensus in Washington. She will have to find common cause not only with Republicans but within her diverse caucus of conservative Blue Dogs and old-style liberals. With a 16-vote majority, she must hold the Democrats together on the contentious issues of war, Medicare overhaul and oil profit rollbacks while battling GOP rivals intent on sinking her in the next two years.

DOJ_NMG_0112384

Already, there were signs of what's to come.

House Republicans grumbled that Pelosi planned to shut them out of the "First 100 Hours" agenda by refusing to allow hearings or amendments (which is what the GOP frequently did to Democrats, but Pelosi promised not to be like them).

Pelosi protesters

Outside the church, a tiny band of antiabortion protesters chanted, "Speaker Pelosi, Catholics don't kill children." And former U.S. Rep. Robert K. Dornan, an Orange County Republican known for his outbursts, sneaked into the invitation-only service and emerged to brand his former House colleague "the most arrogant pro-abortion person in Congress."

But those were blips on the celebration screen.

An energy seemed to build around her throughout the day. The Mellon Auditorium, where finger sandwiches and petits fours were set out for 500, roared at times with approval for the most powerful woman in Washington, who at one point stood on the stage and flexed her biceps.

"Know your power," Pelosi said, recalling advice the late Rep. Lindy Boggs gave her, adding: "And we took it."

Her personal touch

Every event had personal or political significance that bore her stamp. A famous micromanager, Pelosi approved details down to the music for the Mass, which her eldest daughter had played over the phone before Christmas so her mother could review.

It included an African American spiritual, "Plenty Good Room," with lyrics that seemed to foreshadow the ethics package Pelosi has made the first order of House business today: "I would not be a sinner ... I would not be a liar ... I would not be a cheater."

One of Pelosi's campaign promises was to take the House gavel away from special interests and pass it to "the hands of America's children." And the theme of children was prominent Wednesday.

Banners with images of the young victims of Katrina and Darfur were displayed on the chapel walls. Father Robert F. Drinan, a Jesuit priest and former member of Congress, opened the homily saying, "Congress is 16% women and for the first time ever, the speaker is a mother. Today we are re-pledging our lives to the children."

Though the events were clearly designed to send a message, the day also had an insular feel. Television coverage focused on President Ford's burial, and what media interest there was in Pelosi was almost rebuffed by her office. Several events were closed to the press.

The media were held on the sidewalk outside the Trinity chapel, zoom lenses aimed at the steps almost a football field away, only to have Pelosi slip out a side door.

Pelosi Ready To Make History As New Speaker (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

A new Congress convenes today with a narrow Democratic majority lording over a despondent Republican minority.

While the full weight of Republicans' powerlessness sinks in after 12 years of control, Democrats are celebrating the historic election today of the first female speaker of the House.

"We have waited over 200 years for this time to come," Mrs. Pelosi said on the eve of her selection as speaker, a position that makes her second in line to the presidency after Vice President Dick Cheney.

"We will not just break through a glass ceiling, we will break through a marble ceiling," she said. "In more than 200 years of history, there was an established pecking order -- and I cut in line."

After calling herself "the most powerful woman in America," Mrs. Pelosi flexed her right muscle like a weight lifter to much applause at an event yesterday titled a "women's tea."

"All right, let's hear it for the power," she screamed as the jubilant applause continued.

When Mrs. Pelosi tried leaving the podium, Rep. Rosa DeLauro, Connecticut Democrat, asked her to stay.

"There is so much love and warmth that's in this room today and that's because of the new speaker," Mrs. DeLauro said. "And that tells you about what the future is all about in the House of Representatives."

Yesterday's event was part of three days of festivities to mark the historic moment. Later, Mrs. Pelosi and special guests dined at the Italian Embassy.

Today will be the official vote by her colleagues installing her as speaker, followed by a "swearing-in celebration concert" in the Great Hall of the National Building Museum.

Tomorrow will feature an "open house for the People's House," a nod to Democrats' professed commitment to the common man. For the rest of the day, Mrs. Pelosi will celebrate her roots with a visit to a statue of her late father, former Baltimore Mayor Thomas D'Alesandro, and later the dedication of a Baltimore street to Mrs. Pelosi.

DOJ_NMG_0112385

But wary of accusations of arrogance, Democrats have included other, less celebratory events. Those include a Mass yesterday at Trinity University in remembrance of "the children of Darfur and Katrina and a prayer service this morning at St. Peter's Catholic Church to honor the troops."

Out of the gate, Democrats are pushing through their "Six of '06" agenda that they say is a mandate after the November elections.

In less than two weeks -- during the first 100 hours of official action -- they vow to pass legislation implementing the September 11 panel recommendations, increasing the minimum wage, expanding stem-cell research, allowing the government to negotiate prices for prescription drugs, cutting interest rates on student loans and ending subsidies for oil companies while expanding renewable energy exploration.

"Next week, the clock will start ticking on the 100 hours agenda," said incoming Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat. "Democrats ran on this agenda and were elected on this agenda. We promised the American people swift passage of these bills and we fully intend to make good on that promise."

In particular, he pointed out the Democratic Party's determination to move toward energy independence with cleaner fuels.

"I don't mean that we will not use any energy from any other sources but that we will not be dependent upon foreign states for our economic well-being, our military security and well-being, as well as frankly energy independence, meaning that we need to become environmentally sensitive in our use of energy as the 60 degree weather today points out," he said. "I live 80 feet from a river, and in January, I have 60 degree weather and I am convinced that 20 years from now, my house is going to be under the river, not on the river. So I am very concerned about that, and we are as a party."

Also among the first items of their agenda will be raising the minimum wage by $2.10 over the next two years.

"With the minimum wage frozen at $5.15 per hour for the past nine years and four months, it is extremely difficult for minimum-wage earners to meet their basic needs, and yet millions of Americans are forced to live in these conditions," Mr. Hoyer said. "Americans who work hard to earn an honest living should not be relegated to poverty."

Not part of Democrats' early agenda, however, is anything to do with the war in Iraq, which many credit for giving them control of both chambers of Congress.

A press conference yesterday was crashed by anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan -- usually a thorn in the sides of pro-war Republicans -- who demanded that the new Democratic majority take immediate steps to end the war.

Shortly after, Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat, promised to make sure "that the people's voices are heard in the people's house," Mrs. Sheehan and others stormed the press conference, chanting anti-war slogans.

Pelosi's Coming-Out Party (TIME)

By Ana Marie Cox

Time, January 4, 2007

It just so happens that incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi will be launching her career as Democratic House leader the same week that the District hosted memorial service for Gerald Ford. That small twist of fate points up one of the capitol's cardinal rules: in Washington, you never run out of chances to make a first impression.

After all, the Gerald Ford being honored this week is not the same man who tried to jolly America out of economic doldrums with "whip inflation now" buttons. He's also not the same person who came into the White House to begin with. Ford served as President for two and half years; he served in the House for 24 years. He arrived in 1949 as a surprise winner in his G.O.P. primary, who got to Congress largely because of his tenacious campaigning and charm. He was known as a congenial back-slapper and talented maneuverer among the House's often-vicious rivalries. When Nixon tapped him for the White House, the Vice Presidency came at the cost of giving up what Ford told colleagues was his true dream: Speaker of the House.

As Nancy Pelosi knows, that is the more powerful position — at least, it traditionally has been. The speaker's power comes not from public pomp or grand acts of statesmanship, but from hundreds of small ones, usually far beneath the radar of the general public. When Americans notice who the Speaker of the House is, it's usually because they've done something wrong — unless, like Tip O'Neill, they've been in office longer than any of the Presidents they served. Newt Gingrich's notoriety was a rare exception — and his steep fall from grace a cautionary example.

So who can begrudge Pelosi her four-day "coronation," as right-wing wags have dubbed it? The events themselves are hardly ostentatious: there's a mass, a tea, and prayer service. The most raucous thing on the schedule is a concert by Tony Bennett. Add a tote bag and it'd be a PBS telethon. Indeed, the demographic-pleasing tenor of the events reeks of a self-conscious desire to highlight all soft-focus interest groups that come with the Pelosi package: Italian, female, Catholic, grandmother. With so many facets illuminated, perhaps Pelosi's people are hoping no one notices what's been left out: the only nod to Pelosi's actual home district and voting record may well be Bennett's theme song, "I Left My Heart in San Francisco."

DOJ_NMG_0112386

Ford's minor claim on a presidential legacy came about in part because the skilled House gamesman was not prepared to manage expectations once he was elevated into the presidency. Observers assumed that he would tack hard to the side of openness and sunlight to escape Nixon's shadow. But he wound up relying on a coterie of insiders — Nixon's own shadows — from Henry Kissinger to the young Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld, who had no less zeal for the imperial presidency than their predecessors under Nixon.

Pelosi's first challenge is similar to Ford's, and may provide the same kind of disappointment: To succeed, she needs to provide a solid counterpoint to the corruption and arrogance that doomed the G.O.P. Yet the Democrats' "100-hour agenda" already entails suspending the gauzy promise of bipartisan civility that moderate Democrats ran on. Rather, the Democrats will use House rules to prohibit opposition measures — the exact sort of "tyranny of the majority" that the former minority party has been railing against for years. Whatever the stage set (tea or Mass), the week ahead will likely be less a coronation for Pelosi than a long, behind-the-scenes horse-trading auction.

And yet this could be the good news. As the first female Speaker and a San Francisco liberal, Pelosi can use this moment in the spotlight to define herself as anything but a bleeding heart. Pelosi's brazen decision to have her "People's Open House" be invitation-only could paint her as cynical or, with the right spin, as simply a savvy realist. A successful reintroduction for Pelosi should combine the warm fuzzy of a northern California family woman with the bare-knuckle skills of a backroom pol: the iron grandma.

If Pelosi can pull it off, perhaps there's hope for another prominent female politician, whose White House ambitions have been dogged by an apparently immutable public image: Hillary Clinton. The last event of Pelosi's swearing-in celebrations is the renaming of the 200 block of Albemarle St., in Baltimore, as Via Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi. President Street is only a block away.

A Snit In First Class (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

I have a dream, my friends. I have a dream that we are approaching the day when a ranch-owning millionaire Republican like George Bush will make peace with a vineyard-owning millionaire Democrat like Nancy Pelosi.

I have a dream that Pelosi, who was chauffeured to school as a child and who, with her investor husband, owns minority shares in the Auberge du Soleil resort hotel and the CordeValle Golf Club, will look over her famous strand of South Sea Tahitian pearls and forge bonds of understanding with the zillionaire corporate barons in the opposing party.

Furthermore, I dream of a great harmonic convergence among the obscenely rich — between Randian hedge fund managers on the right and helipad environmentalists on the left. I dream that the big-money people who seem to dominate our politics will put aside their partisan fury and discover the class solidarity that Karl Marx always said they shared, and their newfound civility will trickle down to the rest of us. I dream that Berkeley will make peace with Buckhead, Streisand with DeVos, Huffington with O'Reilly.

I have my dreams, but of course, I am realistic too, for I am aware that at present there is no peace among the secluded island villas. I look out across the second homes of America and its surrounding tropical regions and I see polarization among the Kate Spade devotees and bitterness among the Rolexes. And I know that both Bush and Pelosi are part of an upper-income whirlwind of strife.

Some people believe that Pelosi is an airhead, but that is wrong. Some people believe she is a radical San Francisco liberal, but that, too, is wrong. The main fact to know about Pelosi is that she is a creature of the modern fund-raising system. Some politicians rise because they run political machines. Some rise because they are great communicators. Pelosi has risen because she is a master of the thousand-dollar-a-plate fundraising circuit.

Living amid a web of investors, venture capitalists and West Coast technology tycoons, she raised heroic amounts of money for the Democratic Party before she ever thought of running for anything herself. In 1984, she was the state party chairwoman. In 1986, she was the national fund-raising chairwoman for the Senate Democrats.

Since coming to the House, she has discovered what many a savvy pol has discovered — that the fastest way to ascend in Congress is to raise a lot of money and give it to your peers.

She paid her dues selecting party favors, arranging seating charts (after that, legislation is easy), and laying thick dollops of obsequiousness on cranky old moguls and their helmet hair spa-spouses. She has done what all political fund-raisers do: tell rich people things they already believe, demonize the other side, motivate the giving with Manichaean tales of good versus evil.

It is no wonder The Los Angeles Times calls her a "rabid Democrat" or that Time magazine calls her "hyperpartisan." It is not a surprise, as The Washington Post reported this week, that despite campaign promises about changing the tone in Washington, Pelosi has decided to exclude Republicans from the first burst of legislation — to forbid them to offer amendments or alternatives.

DOJ_NMG_0112387

She is part of the clash of the rival elites, with the dollars from Brookline battling dollars from Dallas, causing upper-class strife that even diminutive dogs, vibrant velvets and petite salades can't fully soothe.

It pains me to see plutocrats fight, because it sets such a poor example for those of us in the lower orders who fly commercial. It pains me even more because politicians from the rival blueblood clans go to embarrassing lengths to try to prove they are most authentically connected with working Americans.

Think of John Kerry visiting a Wendy's or Bill Frist impersonating a Bible thumper. This week, witness Pelosi going on her all-about-me inauguration tour, which is designed to rebrand her as a regular Catholic grandma from Baltimore. Members of the middle classes never have to mount campaign swings to prove how regular they are, but these upper-bracket types can't help themselves, and they always lay it on too thick.

So I harbor my dreams of reconciliation, but in the meantime, why oh why can't we have a decent overclass in this country — a group of highly attractive dimwits who spread bland but worthy stability over our political scene. Why oh why do we have to have this endless canapé war — the people of the vineyard against the people of the ranch.

Next Article in Opinion (5 of 12) »

Passed Over By Pelosi, Harman Doesn't Get Even. She Gets Mad. (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

Catfight aftermath:Rep. Jane Harmanis still quite irked that House Speaker-designeeNancy Pelosinixed her for chairman of the House intelligence committee -- and she's not exactly being stoic about it.

Friends and colleagues say Harman has openly complained that she was cut loose by her fellow California Democrat and one-time friend, Pelosi, who picked insteadSilvestreReyes(D-Tex.), a former Border Patrol agent. A Harvard Law graduate with a gold-plated political rÃ©sumÃ©, Harman was the ranking Democrat on the intelligence committee and first in line for the chairmanship.

She has lamented that Congress has lost its luster for her and that she is hoping for a job in a Democratic administration, according to a friend. "She's obsessed," the source said. "It's been hard for her not to take it personally, but it's over."

In 2003, Pelosi handpicked Harman to become the ranking Democrat on the panel, a post that Pelosi had occupied. But Pelosi made it known last year that Harman was out if Democrats took back the House. Pelosi and other liberal Democrats believed that Harman, a moderate, failed to challenge the administration's alleged abuses of intelligence. Harman was stunned by the news and launched an overtly aggressive campaign to win the chairmanship, which only served to strengthen Pelosi's resolve. A former House member who knows both women well said Harman "really needs to grow up" and "she's not simply entitled to a chairmanship."

Harman's office issued a statement saying the flap is "something in the past tense" and that the congresswoman is "looking forward to continuing to have a strong voice on national security issues" through her other committees.

As for Pelosi . . . she has clearly moved on.A Complex Greeting

Nothing is ever simple when it comes toJohn Kerry.

The senator from Massachusetts and his wife,Teresa Heinz Kerry, sent out 75,000 Christmas cards with pictures of trees at each season. The Kerrys gushed over their "gratitude for the beauty of these trees and the life they represent."

But it didn't end there.

The card came in an odd-looking envelope, one of those with a return-mail flap and instructions to send it to . . . well, to a recycling company, so "it can be made into new carpet tile."

Carpet tile?

We want a "world without waste . . . where every product either returns safely to the soil or becomes a new product."

So the card instructs: "1. Remove this panel and insert it along with the card into the envelope. 2. Expose adhesive strip and fold the flap over to seal the envelope. 3. Drop this mailer into any U.S. mailbox."

Who else would send a Christmas card with a to-do list?Food for Thought

Call it the McDonald's clause. Underpaid Hill aides who have long relied on journalists' expense accounts for pricey meals and fine wines better start thinking fast food.

The proposed ethics package, crafted by Democrats and first up on the House calendar, bans legislators and staffers from receiving gifts and meals not only from lobbyists but also from the organizations that employ them.

So, to spell it out: Any news organization that employs a lobbyist -- and there are many, including The Washington Post -- no longer will be able to court congressional sources over an expensive steak, or even cheap fries.

DOJ_NMG_0112388

The new ban and how to interpret it has caused much confusion on the Hill. There is a long list of "common sense" exemptions, which would suggest that Hill folks will need to carry a laminated copy of the bill with them at all times.The Elephant in the Room

As the new Democratic Senate gets sworn in today, the big question is whether Sen.Tim Johnson's serious medical condition will affect the party's fragile majority.

His office made it clear yesterday that the South Dakota Democrat's recovery from a brain hemorrhage will be slow and that he will not be voting anytime soon. He spent his 60th birthday last week in the intensive-care unit of George Washington University Hospital, where he has been in critical condition since emergency brain surgery Dec. 13.

He has not spoken since the surgery, said a spokesman, and he remains on a ventilator at night. Johnson is up for reelection in two years, but until then no authority can remove him from office.

"One vote really shouldn't matter if senators keep their pledge and work in a bipartisan manner," saidJim Manley, spokesman for incoming Senate Majority LeaderHarry Reid(Nev.).

Julianne Fisher, a spokesman for Johnson, said his staff has sought guidance fromSen. Joseph Biden(D-Del.), who was out for seven months in 1988 after surgery for two brain aneurysms.

Biden's office offered this first piece of advice to Johnson's staff: Stop sending out mail in the senator's name.November Surprise

George McGovern, the liberal 1972 Democratic presidential nominee, dropped a little bombshell to Larry King the other night: He voted Republican in 1976, for Gerald Ford.

McGovern said he finally told his wife, Eleanor, that Thanksgiving. Her reply: "So did I."

House Panel To Review 3 Challenges To Elections Of GOP Lawmakers (USAT)

By Ana Radelat

USA Today, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — When Rep. Jim McCrery takes the congressional oath of office Thursday, he'll be one of three Republican lawmakers whose elections to the House are still in dispute because of challenges filed by candidates they defeated.

All three elections may be scrutinized by the House Administration Committee, but in the meantime, McCrery and the other two House members will be allowed to serve.

Their challengers stand only a slim chance of victory.

More than 100 election challenges have been filed by losing candidates since 1933, but nearly all have been dismissed by the House.

"I am confident that this challenge will be dismissed, as similar challenges to other members of Congress have been in the past," McCrery said Wednesday.

Democrat Patti Cox filed a challenge with the House last month that says McCrery violated the qualification clause of the Constitution.

That clause requires a House member to be at least 25 years old, a citizen of the United States for at least seven years and, when elected, "an inhabitant of the state in which he shall be chosen."

McCrery sold his house in Shreveport in 2004 and moved his family to McLean, Va., across the Potomac River from Washington.

Cox says McCrery hasn't had a residence in Louisiana since then. But McCrery says he's had places to stay in Shreveport since his move.

"I was born in Shreveport, and have been a resident of Louisiana my entire life, except for three years in elementary school," McCrery said. "I own property in Caddo Parish and pay both property and income taxes in Louisiana. I vote in Louisiana, and have always kept a residence in Shreveport while serving in Congress."

The other lawmakers facing election-related challenges are Florida Republicans Tom Feeney and Vern Buchanan. Feeney's election is being contested by Democrat Clint Curtis, and Buchanan is being challenged by Christine Jennings.

An echo of Florida's problems in the 2000 presidential election, those challenges focus on the integrity of touch-screen voting machines used in the Nov. 7 elections.

George Shevlin, staff director for the Democrats who will take control of the House Administration Committee in the 110th Congress, said it's likely the panel will set up a three-member task force to review each complaint.

After the investigations, which could take months, the House would vote to accept or reject the panel's recommendation to keep or unseat a member.

Cox also has fought McCrery's re-election in state and federal courts in Louisiana. She said she knows she has little chance of success, but the fight "is consuming me."

DOJ_NMG_0112389

She said what she wants McCrery to provide is simple — some evidence that he has lived in Louisiana recently.

"If he's a resident of Louisiana, he's in and that's that," Cox said.

McCrery, who is about to begin serving his 11th term, is preparing a response to the challenge, said spokesman Michael Steel.

An electoral complaint based on residency hasn't been upheld since 1824, when John Bailey, elected from Massachusetts to the 18th Congress, was unseated after House colleagues determined he was living in Washington instead of Massachusetts on Election Day.

The 110th Congress will seat 233 Democrats and 202 Republicans in the House. Those numbers could change, of course, if any of the election challenges are upheld.

Most challenges, including the two from Florida, are filed after a bitter, close election.

But McCrery was re-elected with about 57% of the vote and Cox received 13%. Two other candidates received the rest.

A Democratic Trade Agenda (WSJ)

By Max Baucus

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

Forty-five years ago, President Kennedy challenged America to confront competitive challenges in Europe and Asia with a new, expansive trade policy. In response, Congress passed a landmark bill creating the forerunner of the U.S. Trade Representative and trade adjustment assistance for workers hurt by international trade. Today we face another crossroads.

At a time when our country's competitive strength depends increasingly on an aggressive trade policy, Americans are far less willing to embrace one. Many equate trade and globalization with ballooning deficits, stagnating wages and layoffs. Meanwhile, even as China and India have continued their economic reawakening, America has lacked the leadership to tackle the associated challenges through trade. U.S. policy has lurched frantically from one trade agreement to the next, eking out just enough votes to push each one through Congress.

Some think that the new Democratic congressional majority will be bad for trade policy. While it is true that some candidates criticized trade in their campaigns, I believe that the new Congress will have both the desire and opportunity to renew U.S. trade policy, with a unifying purpose that Americans can understand and support. Through trade, we must bolster the nation's innovative economy in an increasingly global marketplace. At the same time, we must tackle with equal vigor the negative domestic consequences of globalization, from trade deficits to job losses.

Congress should begin by renewing the administration's fast-track negotiating authority for trade agreements. The current grant expires in June, and trading partners will not negotiate trade agreements with us unless Congress gives the president the ability to bring these agreements to fruition. The success of America's ranches and farms, as well as the success of businesses big and small, requires that the president have this ability. Exports account for 10% of GDP; our $62.4 billion in agriculture exports alone generated an additional $92 billion in additional economic activity last year. My home state of Montana exports fully 60% of the wheat grown there.

Fast-track authority should be improved as it is renewed, with better trade enforcement capability and better environmental and labor provisions. By making those changes, we can protect American interests, project America's values, and help to create consumer classes capable of purchasing more U.S.-made goods. And as we address expiring fast-track authority, we must take on -- head-on -- globalization's downsides, especially worker displacement and the unsustainable trade deficit.

The trade deficit requires action on several fronts, which include beefing up U.S. export promotion programs and dedicating more time and resources to trade enforcement. We must also recognize that the trade deficit has causes closer to home, especially Americans' negative savings rate.

When it comes to helping workers, we must make the Trade Adjustment Assistance (TAA) program, which expires in September, more reflective of today's innovative economy.

TAA is our commitment that America will provide wage and health benefits while trade-displaced workers retool, retrain, and find better jobs. And a renewed TAA must do what today's program does not. TAA must be available to the eight out of 10 American workers who make their money in services professions; and it must apply to all workers displaced by trade, not just those affected by free-trade agreements. In fact, we should seriously examine the idea of expanding TAA into "GAA" -- Globalization Adjustment Assistance that would offer benefits not only to workers displaced by trade, but to those displaced by all aspects of globalization.

In addition to these new priorities, we must refocus current trade efforts. The Doha round is of obvious importance, but the world's economies do not appear ready to make the hard choices necessary to bring the round to an ambitious conclusion. Doha may yet progress in time, as the Uruguay round did after 1990. But until then, America should move forward on commercially significant initiatives with our largest trading partners. We should lay the foundations for a future free-trade agreement with the European Union and Japan by concluding a first ever free-trade agreement in services. We should stitch our current patchwork quilt of free-trade agreements into a seamless, coherent network that we can later open to other countries. Even more immediately, we must enforce China's trade and investment commitments. Doing that will help to boost the U.S. gross domestic product by $86.5 billion over the next three years.

DOJ_NMG_0112390

President Kennedy's free-trade challenge helped to cement the nation's role as a global economic leader, and engaging with the world has helped Americans prosper at home. Twelve million American jobs depend on trade today -- and the right trade policy improvements will create more jobs and better opportunities for American workers and businesses in the future.

Mr. Baucus is a Democratic senator from Montana and the incoming chairman of the Finance Committee.

The Chairman's Turf (WP)

By David Montgomery

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

EL PASO Silvestre Reyes is straight out of Border Country, that place of lawmen and bandits, pluck and luck.

Grows up on a cotton farm along the Rio Grande, oldest of 10, struggling with English as a kid. Helicopter gunner in Vietnam, some college, marries his high school sweetheart (honeymoon at the Mesa Motel), lands a solid government job -- Border Patrol. He works like hell for 26 years, gets shot at by Mexican train robbers, rises from agent to bridge inspector to chief for West Texas and Arizona.

"Outdoor work," he calls it, for someone with "a flair for a little danger" -- but unexpected work for the boy who used to warn undocumented farm workers when la migra came around.

Next, a grateful citizenry sends its tough but soft-spoken lawman to Congress, reelects him five times, the first Latino to represent his 80 percent Hispanic district.

Reyes is, in short, that most cherished of political properties, the real guy, a man of the people, not just someone who pretends to be.

"He is a Real Life 101 politician. He's been there," says Cindy Ramos-Davidson, chief executive of the El Paso Hispanic Chamber of Commerce. "He can talk with the best of the best and the lowest of the lowest. There are a lot of people in elected office who have never had Real Life 101. It's wondering where the next paycheck is coming from, it's balancing family life and work life. It's helped him stay human, for lack of a better word. "

Now, though, he stands at a perilous political intersection. Today he becomes the new chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, assigned to ride herd on 16 spy agencies with an estimated collective budget of $42 billion.

In Washington's power corridors you can hear the whispers. Isn't this one of those jobs that demand intellectual firepower? (Never mind those other whispers, as old as the republic, that not a few in Congress, even some of the stars, are, actually, well, dopes.)

All that Real Life stuff is swell. But the new outlaws are more lethal and formidable than ever. Is an instinct for the Common Man what the nation requires to ensure the global war on terror is successful -- and constitutional?

Can credential-crazy Washington countenance an intelligence chief with a two-year community college degree? Not to mention that ambush from Congressional Quarterly, where Reyes blew the question of whether al-Qaeda is Sunni or Shiite.

It's a big challenge for a lawman from a dusty border town.

"The border is a tough area to work," Reyes says one morning, standing down here in that dust at the edge of two countries. "Sometimes there are no rules. The big rule is 'Survive.' "A Sound of a Horn

His grandfather once rode with Mexican revolutionary Pancho Villa -- carried a rifle, wore bandoleers and a big sombrero, the full rebel regalia -- then fled to this valley to farm. His father dropped out of the sixth grade to work these fields. Up into this life came young Silvestre, named after his grandfather.

He didn't need much English to be the lookout.

"There was a kind of early-warning system whenever the Border Patrol was working the valley," Reyes recalls, gazing across the land at Mexico. "My job was to be at the entrance to our farm. We had a truck that had this big air horn. Whenever I saw the migra coming, I would blow three blasts on the horn. All the workers would scatter and hide.

"Of course the Border Patrol knew what was going on. They'd come up and ask me what I was doing.

"Just playing on the horn. "

A deadpan twinkle gleams out of Reyes's round face.

So his first job was in intelligence. Eight years old and already he was a little bit cagey and shrewd, this boy in Border Country.

DOJ_NMG_0112391

Later, he tamed the wild El Paso-Juarez line, revolutionized border security for all of America, climbed from the edge of this desert to become the first Latino to chair such a key congressional committee. He'll soon find out if frontier wiles can tame the bureaucratic badlands of "black" budgets and shadow kingdoms. Already he's been outsmarted once.

The gotcha pop quiz, the ritual Washington hazing once you've achieved real power and better guard it in hostile territory: Reyes was doing all right until the al-Qaeda question.

"Predominantly -- probably Shiite," he said to Congressional Quarterly.

Guess again, congressman! Ah, yes, that ineluctable rite of passage, a rookie pooh-bah's baptismal gaffe. Over to you, Jay Leno: "Apparently the term 'intelligence committee' is just a suggestion."

Reyes tried to brush it off, tried to explain -- it was late in the day; he knew the answer but misspoke; and heck: "I got through all the hard ones, I talked about the 12th Imam!"

Finally he stopped spinning and did something much more typical for someone who never intended to be a politician. He conceded his blunder.

"When you screw up," he says, "you admit it, then you move on."Accidental Career

Ask about Reyes, 62, around El Paso and Capitol Hill, and you keep hearing those cliched themes: He's a nice guy, he's "human," and "what you see is what you get."

You hear it enough about Reyes -- universally known as "Silver" since his school days, even by his wife of 38 years, Carolina -- that you wonder if he might be too nice to be intelligence chairman, not Machiavellian enough. To do a good job in Washington, backs must be stabbed.

He doesn't have the plotting ambition of the career pol. He wound up as intelligence chairman almost by accident, when Speaker Nancy Pelosi passed over two candidates ahead of him -- she didn't get along with one, didn't like the ethics cloud over the other. Reyes was in his garage building shelves to store Christmas decorations when she called to anoint him.

He landed in Congress in the first place only when, as the popular local Border Patrol chief, he reluctantly yielded to entreaties from El Paso business types to run.

"He has always started at the bottom," Carolina Reyes says. "He never said, 'I'm going to become chief.' He never said, 'I'm going to be a politician.' . . . He does his job, and comes up with good ideas, and gets promoted."

Yet here he is, astride the juncture of several key fault lines in American culture: a Latino Democrat, when his party is trying to solidify itself as the party for minorities; a veteran with a law enforcement background, when his party is trying to bolster its bona fides on national security; a congressional player on national security policy at a time of war; a former border guard who can shore up the Democrats' enforcement flank in the immigration debate.

That career with the Border Patrol was born only after he had taken every federal agency entrance exam he could think of, and the Border Patrol was the first to call.

He went from having been a lookout to being one of the lookers. For a few years, he worked one of the bridges between El Paso and Juarez.

Lean out the booth window, peer into the car: "Citizenship? What are you bringing from Mexico?" He learned how to read people fast. What were they leaving? What did they want? This is how intelligence works in the field.

Sometimes he practices a little craft on his colleagues. Behind the almost always deadpan face -- it is the jowly, deceptive deadpan of comedian Jonathan Winters, just before a deadly punch line -- is the winking soul of a connoisseur of pranks. Many have failed to recognize the twinkle until it's too late. They tell Silver Reyes stories, fondly, even as they plot paybacks.

"I get accused of all these weird things," Reyes protests.

Once, someone passed on to an aide of Vice President Gore the happy news that Rep. Solomon Ortiz (D-Tex.), a bachelor for decades, had just married someone with a made-up-sounding name like Ramona Corona. This happened at the vice president's residence, during a reception for the Hispanic Caucus. So Gore publicly congratulated Ortiz on his nuptials to Ramona Corona. Suddenly the dean of the caucus, who had been enjoying the company of two pretty young things seated on either side of him, had a lot of explaining to do.

"I knew real quick it came from Silver," says Ortiz, still single.

There was the time in 2003 when Reyes and Rep. Eliot Engel (D-N.Y.) were part of a delegation to North Korea whose representatives insisted on beginning each session with rote denunciations of the United States. Bored, Engel was slipping his shoes on and off beneath the table. Finally he tried to put them on, and they weren't there! He blindly probed the floor in all directions with his stocking feet while the North Koreans droned on.

"When the tirade ended, and the meeting ended, I got up, and I saw my shoes all the way on the other side of Silver," Engel says.

Just playing on the horn.

DOJ_NMG_0112392

A prankster is a student of human nature. A little part of him remains detached, on the lookout for weakness, absurdity, vanity. Good qualities, perhaps, for questioning spy chiefs. And an even more startling one:

"He doesn't think he knows everything," says Engel. "He's willing to listen and willing to learn."

"He asks tough questions," says Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.), who just lost his reelection bid. "He won't be pushed around."

A final lesson from Real Life 101: He quit college to go to work, not realizing it would expose him to the draft. He went almost directly to boot camp, then to war. During an enemy rocket attack, he lost the hearing in his right ear.

Years later, in Congress, confronted with President Bush's eagerness to take on Iraq, Reyes recalled his direct experience with the unpredictable hell of war. He considered the intelligence he was privy to as a committee member. And on the Iraq war resolution, he voted no.

A lot of folks now say he passed that yes-or-no quiz with flying colors.Law of Absolutes

A border implies a binary logic of either or, one or the other, but Border Country teaches that nothing is that simple. No matter how far away he goes, Reyes carries within him this rich interior and exterior landscape -- paradoxical, organic, alive -- that shaped him.

From an overlook where the purple mountains cut triangles against the blue sky, El Paso and Ciudad Juarez look like a single city, with a combined population of 2.1 million, sprawling across the valley. But down on the ground, the picture sharpens, the border draws its distinctions -- riverbed, chain-link fence, markers in the lonely scrubland insisting vainly on who is who and where is where.

The billboards on both sides are in Spanish, but Juarez feels different. The streets meander, filled to bursting, traffic surging to el Norte . El Paso is a community with a bit of a chip on its shoulder. Eighty percent Hispanic, it feels isolated from the rest of Texas in a different time zone, disparaged by Anglo America, misunderstood by Washington, burdened yet bonded with Mexico.

One recent morning, Reyes stood in the dust of the frontier at the end of the infamous "black bridge," the old rail trestle where a friend and fellow agent was hit over the head and killed, where hundreds of would-be immigrants would mass on the Mexican side and sprint across in "banzai runs," overwhelming the Border Patrol.

"To appreciate the peace and tranquility that is here now, you've got to imagine what it was like," he says.

It was chaos.

When the river was dry, the Mexicans walked over. When the river flowed, entrepreneurs set up ferry services; peddlers sold Cokes and snacks. There were crazy hot-pursuit chases on downtown streets, through back yards, even across the campus of a high school on the border.

Enough! decided the first Latino sector chief in Border Patrol history. One Sunday morning in 1993, El Paso and Juarez awoke to find the border sealed by 400 agents spread along 20 miles.

At first there was an uproar. Protesters threw rocks, closed bridges, burned effigies. Merchants fretted about lost sales. The Catholic Church pleaded for mercy. The Mexican government complained to the State Department. Even Border Patrol brass in Washington gave Reyes a hard time.

On just whose side was this grandson of one of Pancho Villa's riders?

"This is the ex-Border Patrol agent who made a career of deporting his people," says El Paso immigration lawyer Carlos Spector.

Reyes made one concession: He changed the name of his crackdown from Operation Blockade to the more politically correct Operation Hold the Line. He was ready to outlast a political siege of weeks. "I knew the system pretty well, I could identify overtime money that I needed to get through the first four to six weeks," he recalls with relish, and he had squirreled it away in anticipation. Daily illegal crossings plummeted from up to 10,000 to a few hundred. Reyes was summoned to the Oval Office, where, standing humbly in his pressed green uniform like a Boy Scout with an easel and a wooden pointer, he briefed President Clinton and Attorney General Janet Reno.

"He literally changed the culture of the Border Patrol through his own initiative," says David Aguilar, the current national chief of the Border Patrol. "He is very innovative, very aggressive, very focused."

The Border Patrol adopted the maverick chief's innovation nationwide -- and Reyes became a hero to the tough-on-illegal-immigrants crowd, the Minuteman types.

His own view is not so simple. He felt -- feels -- compassion for border crossers, understands their yearning and risk-taking. He was once their lookout.

"You see the misery coming across the border," he says. "You recognize that they're not criminals, that these are people that are down and out because of economic circumstances. . . . The only difference between you and them is fate."

Haunted by the misery, he used to startle his wife, coming in unexpectedly from his midnight shift. He would start pulling clothes out of his closet to give to border crossers he had detained. "He would also come home for lunch during the day,"

DOJ_NMG_0112393

Carolina Reyes says, "and I would say, 'But you took your lunch,' and he would say, 'We gave our lunches to the people that we found. They were starving.' "

Then he would deport them. Dash those dreams, not unlike the dreams of his grandfather. "You took an oath to enforce the law, you're carrying a badge and a gun," Reyes says. "The way you honor that commitment is by treating them with dignity and respect."

His perspective on the immigration debate is formed by the messy reality on the ground in Border Country. He calls the 700-mile border fence law signed by President Bush "ridiculous, ludicrous and stupid." He supports a path to citizenship for undocumented workers.

"People talk about illegal immigration and they cite statistics," he says. "You're handling not statistics, but people, family units."

Still: The 12 million undocumented immigrants in the United States are "a shadow world where people who want to hurt us can operate," he says. "The only way we are going to reduce that shadow world is to have a legalization program. I think it's a part of the national security strategy."

A quarter-century in the field of Border Country yields Reyes this intelligence: Misery can lead to desperation, and desperation sometimes turns peace into chaos.Invisible Borders

On a recent night in December, all of El Paso society has converged at the downtown art museum to salute Reyes -- 1,000 people from politics, business, the military, education, charity, bursting with local pride. They blame the "sharks" in Washington for the public shaming of the pop quiz.

Reyes gets up to speak, and the microphone begins to squeal. "It's already the CIA doing this," he cracks. Then he chokes up. The audience is equally emotional. He is the local boy, he has made good. "Que viva Silvestre!" they shout, and they send him off to cross one more frontier, migrating from a mid-bench seat in the political minority into the leadership.

The borders in Washington are no less dicey for being invisible. They define fiefdoms -- Congress, the White House, the media, the intelligence agencies -- and are subject to rogue incursions and political banditry.

"One of the first things we're going to have to do is reclaim our turf," reflects the chairman. "We have ceded and abdicated our role as a co-equal branch of government."

Today, he goes on the lookout again. On border patrol.

Staff researcher Rena Kirsch contributed to this report.

Johnson Improving; Will Still Need Months Of Rehabilitation (AL)

By Faith Bremner

Argus Leader, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON – New test results show Sen. Tim Johnson, who has needed a ventilator to breathe and prolonged doses of medication to prevent swelling on his brain, has improved but will need several months of rehabilitation and physical therapy to continue his recovery from surgery.

An angiogram Wednesday at George Washington University Hospital confirmed that surgeons had successfully corrected the tangle of arteries and veins that caused debilitating stroke-like symptoms and bleeding in Johnson's brain. The procedure involves injecting dye into an artery to light up the blood vessels.

But Johnson, 60, remains in critical condition three weeks after emergency brain surgery Dec. 13 and his long-term outlook is not clear, Dr. Vivek Deshmukh, head of Johnson's surgical team, said Wednesday.

Deshmukh said the senator had developed fluid in his lungs, an effect of the initial bleeding, which is why Johnson has been on a ventilator. Johnson also had been sedated for about two weeks to rest and minimize swelling on his brain.

That was a relatively long stretch – often patients are sedated for only a few days – that doctors say indicates the senator's condition is severe, his symptoms difficult to shake, and the risk of long-term damage that could affect his ability to move and talk still significant.

Johnson was rushed to the hospital after becoming disoriented on a call with reporters and had surgery hours later.

Johnson's doctors have said that when he arrived at the hospital, he was feeling weakness on his right side. Based on that, doctors have said the tangle of vessels probably was on the left side of Johnson's brain. Damage in that area can cause permanent speech problems and areas of paralysis on the right side of a patient's body.

Dr. Keith Siller, medical director of the Comprehensive Stroke Care Center at New York University Medical Center, who is not involved in Johnson's care, said the big question, now, is how much damage Johnson's brain suffered in the initial bleed.

"The surgery does not erase the stroke that has taken place," he said.

Dr. Sean Grady, chairman of the Department of Neurosurgery at the University of Pennsylvania, said it probably will be days to weeks before doctors can judge whether Johnson will be able to speak, because the ventilator tube has obstructed his vocal cords.

The key neurological milestone will come in about three months, when doctors assess how much his brain has recovered from the injury. Typically, Grady said, recovery takes six to 12 months.

Deshmukh said in a statement that Johnson's "overall medical condition has improved steadily" since the surgery and that the senator is approaching "the next phase" of his recovery: physical therapy.

Johnson has been removed from sedation and now needs ventilator assistance only at night.

Deshmukh said the two-term Democrat's breathing is stronger and he "continues to be responsive to both his family and physicians – following commands, squeezing his wife's hand and understanding speech."

Johnson's wife, Barbara, said Wednesday that "Tim has had some challenging days since surgery, but step by step, he's been making great progress.

"We know there is a long road in front of us," she added, "but Tim's determination will make all the difference and he'll be back at work as soon as he can be."

The tangle of blood vessels that caused Johnson's illness is called arteriovenous malformation. Doctors say people are typically born with it and only suffer severe problems if the tangled vessels grow too large and burst, causing bleeding in the brain, as in Johnson's case.

According to the National Library of Medicine, about 300,000 Americans have the condition, but only about 36,000 show symptoms. Of those who suffer ruptures, about 10 percent die.

Sen. Johnson Angiogram Good News (RCJA)

By Bill Harlan

Rapid City Journal Johnson's Angiogram, January 4, 2007

An angiogram Wednesday morning showed no sign of the blood-vessel defect that felled Sen. Tim Johnson three weeks ago, and a neurosurgeon says the senator is being weaned off the ventilator that has helped him breath since his emergency brain surgery.

"His breathing has steadily improved and now he only requires ventilator assistance at night," Dr. Vivek Deshmukh said in a written statement released by Johnson's office.

The ventilator was necessary because fluid had developed in Johnson's lungs as a result of a leaking "arteriovenous malformation," or "AVM."

Doctors describe AVMs as tangles of blood vessels that are often present from birth. AVMs can go undetected for decades. But they also can leak, causing an "intracranial hemorrhage" that results in stroke-like symptoms.

Johnson's symptoms were first noticed when he had difficulty speaking during a conference call with reporters Dec. 13. He also had weakness on the right side of his body.

Johnson was sedated for more than two weeks after the surgery, but Julianne Fisher, a spokesman for the senator, said doctors had discontinued the sedation.

The senator's wife, Barb Johnson, said Wednesday that the family was pleased with the angiogram results.

"Tim has had some challenging days since surgery, but step by step, he's been making great progress," she said in a written statement. "We know there is a long road in front of us, but Tim's determination will make all the difference, and he'll be back at work as soon as he can be."

Deshmukh said Johnson has continued to respond to his family and to doctors. He has been following commands and squeezing his wife's hand.

Johnson also understands speech, Fisher said, but he has not spoken. The ventilator -- a mechanical device that aids breathing through an incision in the neck and a tube down the throat -- prevents him from talking, Fisher said. Doctors hope to take Johnson off the ventilator within a week, she said. Then they'll test his speech.

Fisher said Johnson's condition has steadily improved in the past three weeks but that his recovery is expected to take "several months." Treatment will include physical therapy.

Johnson remains in intensive care at George Washington University Hospital. He's still listed in critical condition, Fisher said, because he's in intensive care and because he's still using the ventilator.

Johnson's illness could have significant political consequences because Democrats hold a 51-49 majority in the upcoming Senate. Republican Gov. Mike Rounds would appoint a replacement if Johnson resigned or died, and Vice President Dick Cheney would cast tie-breaking votes in a 50-50 Senate.

However, there is precedent for senators keeping their seats while they are incapacitated, even for long periods of time.

Contact Bill Harlan at 394-8424 or at bill.harlan@rapidcityjournal.com

Johnson Recovery Expected To Require Several Months (USAT)

By Jeff Martin

USA Today, January 4, 2007

Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., has been on a ventilator to help with his breathing after he developed fluid in his lungs, a doctor said today, but medical experts see his test today as a positive sign for his recovery.

Johnson underwent an angiogram this morning at George Washington University Hospital, according to a statement.

"Today's angiogram revealed no evidence of residual arteriovenous malformation," said neurosurgeon Vivek Deshmukh said of the condition that caused bleeding in Johnson's brain.

The senator's recovery, which will involve physical therapy and rehabilitation, is expected to take several months, Johnson's office said in a statement.

Johnson "continues to be responsive to both his family and physicians— following commands, squeezing his wife's hand, and understanding speech."

Johnson underwent surgery Dec. 13 in Washington for a condition known as arteriovenous malformation. At the time, his condition put Democrats' control of the Senate in doubt. Losing the South Dakota senator could have split the chamber evenly between Democrats and Republicans, which would effectively put the chamber in GOP control, since Vice President Cheney has the power to break ties.

Though doctors had placed him on a ventilator, "his breathing has steadily improved and now he only requires ventilator assistance at night," Deshmukh said.

"My family and I are so pleased with today's angiogram results, and I want thank everyone for their constant prayers and support," the senator's wife, Barb Johnson, said in a statement.

"Tim has had some challenging days since surgery, but step by step, he's been making great progress. We know there is a long road in front of us, but Tim's determination will make all the difference and he'll be back at work as soon as he can be. We ask that everyone keep us in their prayers," she said.

Senator's Recovery Could Take Months (NYT)

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

Senator Tim Johnson's recovery from a brain hemorrhage is expected to take several months, the senator's office said. A test showed that Mr. Johnson, a South Dakota Democrat, no longer had the tangle of arteries and veins in his brain that caused bleeding last month, resulting in emergency surgery. He has been in critical condition since Dec. 13. While the statement said Mr. Johnson's overall medical condition had steadily improved, it also said he faced several months of physical therapy and rehabilitation. Dr. Vivek Deshmukh, who leads Mr. Johnson's surgical team, said in a statement that the senator "continues to be responsive to both his family and physicians — following commands, squeezing his wife's hand and understanding speech." The senator's illness raised questions about his party's keeping its one-vote majority in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0112396

Reps. Agree To Pay Back Travel Costs (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, January 4, 2007

Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.) and former Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) have agreed to repay the costs for two separate, privately funded overseas trips, which received new scrutiny as the scandal involving disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff unfolded.

One day before members are sworn in and a new Congress begins, the House ethics committee quietly released two succinct findings, concluding that the attendance by several members of Weldon's family on an undisclosed trip violated House gift rules, and that a trip Feeney took to Scotland in August 2003 with Abramoff also did not comply with House gift rules.

The panel notified Weldon that he must pay "certain expenses of the trip, which exceeded $23,000" to the trip's donors, and noted that Weldon, through counsel, had agreed to make the payments and notify the committee when he has done so.

"We intend to monitor his efforts to repay the expense and to make further public statements if necessary or appropriate," the panel reported in a written statement from Chairman Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and ranking member Howard Berman (D-Calif.)

The committee reported that Feeney contacted it in March 2005 after media reports alleged that Abramoff had paid for the golfing trip to Scotland's renowned St. Andrews course and that the trip was substantially recreational in nature. House rules bar lobbyists from paying for members' travel, and purely recreational junkets. As required, Feeney had reported the trip, noting in his disclosure that expenses related to it totaled $5,643.

After Feeney voluntarily provided "additional information" about the trip, the members of the panel concluded that it "did not comply with House rules," the one-paragraph release said, adding that Feeney has agreed to pay the cost of the trip to the U.S. Treasury.

"Once we found out that there was some discrepancy, we wanted to do something to make it right," said Feeney Chief of Staff Jason Roe, adding that his boss agrees with the committee's conclusions "100 percent."

The ethics committee did not disclose the details of the Weldon trip in question, noting only that it occurred in January 2003. According to PoliticalMoneyLine, the only trip Weldon took that month was to Russia on the 25th to "speak on topic (sic) of U.S. Russian energy cooperation at the opening event of a Russian energy company."

The FBI is investigating whether Weldon used his influence to help secure lobbying and consulting contracts for his daughter. In particular, the agents were looking into whether Weldon's work between 2002 and 2004 to help two Russian companies and two Serbian brothers connected to former Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic, according to The Washington Post.

In their three-paragraph finding, the committee yesterday said Weldon had contacted the panel prior to taking the trip to seek guidance on whether the trip complied with gift rule provisions allowing a member to accept travel and other benefits resulting from outside activities unrelated to official duties. The panel said at the time its counsel advised Weldon through his staff that he could not "rely on that provision of the gift rule." He then sought a gift rule waiver, but withdrew the request prior to a written response.

The committee reported that Weldon, through his counsel, maintained that he and the trip's sponsor believed that the trip was unrelated to his official duties and, therefore, not subject to gift-rule limitations. The panel, however, disagreed. It concluded that the trip was indeed "officially-connected," and because of that, and the fact that several members of Weldon's family had accompanied him, violated House gift rules. At the time, gift rules allowed only a spouse or child to accompany members on privately sponsored trips.

The committee also noted that it had made these conclusions and called on Weldon to pay the trip's donors in the "middle of this year." News of the FBI probe broke in the middle of a tough campaign that Weldon lost.

Gary Ruskin, who runs the Congressional Accountability Project, was not surprised that the panel waited until the last day of the 109th Congress to release the findings.

"You have to expect the worst from this ethics committee," Ruskin said. "It is unusually harsh for the toothless House ethics committee, which wouldn't even slap Attila the Hun on the wrist."

Even though Feeney voluntarily contacted the panel, Ruskin said the requirement that he pay back the cost of the trip wouldn't act as a deterrent for others because there was no censure or any other kind of punishment.

The Feeney finding also raises new questions about other members and staff who were on the Scotland trip, as well as other foreign travel that has come under FBI scrutiny in the Abramoff-related investigations.

Roe brushed off suggestions that Feeney was singled out by the ethics panel after voluntarily contacting it.

DOJ_NMG_0112397

"I'm not going to pass judgment on other people's situations," Roe said. "I work for Tom Feeney and we are primarily concerned about Tom Feeney and his reputation."

The ethics committee on Dec. 29 quietly issued findings on Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) in the wake of allegations that members of his staff were compelled to carry out campaign-related work or personal work for the congressman. Conyers acknowledged what he characterized as a "lack of clarity" in his communications with staff members regarding their official duties and responsibilities, and accepted responsibility for his actions, according to the panel's statement.

Litmus Test For Pro-Life Democrats (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

Near the top of the new Democratic congressional majority's agenda is passage of stem cell research legislation vetoed last year by President Bush, a measure that will answer a major question. There is no doubt the new bill will pass both houses of Congress. What remains in doubt are the votes to be cast by newly elected Democrats who campaigned as pro-life advocates, particularly Pennsylvania Sen.-elect Bob Casey Jr.

Outside the boundaries of his state, Casey is best known as the son of the Democrat most revered in the pro-life movement: the late Gov. Robert Casey. Denied the podium at the 1992 Democratic National Convention because of his antiabortion views, the elder Casey planned a serious independent campaign for president before being stopped by poor health. But will the son, less ardent a pro-lifer than the father, vote against the embryonic stem cell research bill as he promised during the campaign? Will seven self-described pro-life Democrats newly elected to the House do the same?

Casey's vote may determine whether Bush's second veto is overridden by the Senate. A veto would probably be sustained in the House, with or without help from the seven Democrats. But apart from the stem cell bill, what's at stake is whether pro-lifers have a place in today's Democratic Party. Certainly, that small fraction will be under intense pressure from party leaders.

Casey won a nationally spotlighted contest, defeating the eminent Republican conservative Sen. Rick Santorum. He cut into Santorum's conservative base by winning 36 percent of the state's hard pro-life vote.

The only recorded statement by Casey on stem cell research came in an interview on the Catholic Web site IgnatiusInsight.com on July 29, 2005: "I am and I have always been pro-life. I support the current federal policy on embryonic stem cell research and would oppose the Castle bill to expand federal support of embryonic stem cell research."

That referred to the bill sponsored by Republican Rep. Mike Castle of Delaware that died in 2006 when the House sustained Bush's veto. But a new version is likely to be considered in the Senate, where a supporter -- then-Majority Leader Bill Frist -- conceded in a private session last year that the Castle bill was flawed and needed to be rewritten.

So would Casey oppose any legislation that authorizes federally financed stem cell research on "leftover" embryos from in-vitro fertilization clinics, as the Castle bill did? Casey the younger plays his cards close to his vest, and my efforts to get a commitment one way or another from the new senator or an aide were unavailing.

This is the arithmetic in the Senate, where a vetoed bill would go first: It would take 33 senators to sustain a Bush veto, if ailing Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson (S.D.) were unable to vote. Of the 36 Republicans who voted against the Castle bill, five were defeated for reelection: Santorum, George Allen in Virginia, Conrad Burns in Montana, Mike DeWine in Ohio and James Talent in Missouri. Nebraska Sen. Ben Nelson was the only Senate Democrat who voted no last year, and that means one more Democrat would be needed this year. Casey's vote could be central.

The House sustained last year's veto by a 50-vote margin, and 13 of those members were defeated in November. So even if there are Republican defections, the burden will not fall on seven avowedly pro-life Democrats newly elected to the House: Heath Shuler (N.C.), Charlie Wilson (Ohio), Joe Donnelly (Ind.), Brad Ellsworth (Ind.), Baron Hill (Ind.), Jason Altmire (Pa.) and Chris Carney (Pa.).

But with incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi putting this legislation on her "100 hours" list, these pro-life House Democrats nevertheless will be under intense pressure, as will Nelson; Sen.-elect Jon Tester, the pro-lifer who defeated Burns in Montana; and Bobby Casey.

Casey was embraced by pro-choice Democrats -- led by Sen. Chuck Schumer (N.Y.), chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, and Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell -- as the best bet against Santorum. But they may not have bargained on Casey opposing them on the central party issue of stem cell research. The question of how much of a pro-lifer Casey is or can be in the 21st-century Democratic Party may be answered soon.

DOJ_NMG_0112398

OTHER NEWS:

Inflation Remains Chief Concern For Fed Members (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — Inflation is the Federal Reserve's top concern, despite indications the economy may be slowing more than expected, according to minutes of a Dec. 12 meeting released Wednesday.

"Several members judged … the downside risks to economic growth in the near term had increased a little and become a bit more broadly based than previously thought," the minutes said.

"Nonetheless, all members agreed that the risk that inflation would fail to moderate as desired remained the predominant concern," according to the minutes of the policymaking Federal Open Market Committee.

The Fed voted in December to hold rates steady at 5.25%, while adding in a statement that additional rate increases were possible.

The minutes, which term the economy "probably a touch softer" than expected, also show that one member of the committee wanted the December statement changed to include the possibility of a rate cut as well as an increase.

But the emphasis was on inflation, with the minutes saying "price pressures were not viewed as convincingly on a downward trend."

Policymakers' next meeting is Jan. 30-31.

The minutes put a damper on stock and bond markets, which have been pricing in rate cuts based on slower economic activity. The Dow Jones industrial average closed at 12,474.52, up 11.37 after hitting an all-time high of 12,580.35 earlier in the day.

Stephen Stanley of Greenwich Capital Markets noted that the inflation picture has improved since the Fed meeting, but that recent data also show economic growth a bit better.

"The Fed remains firmly on hold, nowhere near a tightening or an ease (and quite possibly even further away from a move in either direction)," Stanley told clients.

The Fed raised its target for short-term interest rates from mid-2004 to mid-2006 to blunt inflation. Rates have been at 5.25% since June. Core inflation, which excludes food and energy prices, is at a 2.6% annual pace, above the Fed's informal, preferred 1%-2% range.

Recent data have been mixed. U.S. construction spending fell 0.2% in November, bogged down by the eighth monthly decline in housing. That was partly offset by strong non-residential construction.

Also Wednesday, the private Institute for Supply Management said manufacturing activity rose a bit in December as new orders and production improved. The index moved from 49.5 to 51.4. A reading under 50 signifies contraction.

Data is just one Fed concern. The new, Democrat-controlled Congress will be watching the Fed closely.

Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., incoming chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, said Wednesday he was concerned the Fed would use recent improvement in wages as a reason to raise rates. Rising wages help workers, but can breed inflation.

"I'm afraid … you'll have people in the Fed saying, 'Geez, wages are going up, we better raise interest rates,' " Frank said, noting wages have been stagnant in recent years. "If corporate profits go up, it's a good thing. If wages go up, it's (viewed as) a bad thing."

Fed Worry Tests Rosy Outlook (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Some Federal Reserve officials may be beginning to share the bond market's pessimism about the outlook for economic growth, a summary of the Fed's Dec. 12 policy meeting shows.

But those reservations aren't widespread, and a subsequent rebound in some recent economic indicators may have alleviated the anxiety at the Fed and lessened the odds that interest-rate cuts, which bond-market investors expect, will materialize.

A stock-market rally ended abruptly yesterday with stocks taking a sharp downward turn when the minutes were released at 2 p.m. as the market's recent optimism apparently was shaken by hints that some at the Fed have doubts about the economy. Stocks later rebounded, although they didn't recover all the lost ground (See related story.6)

DOJ_NMG_0112399

At the December meeting, Fed officials said their "outlook for economic growth and inflation...changed relatively little" from the late-October meeting. While the economy "was probably a touch softer than had been expected" then, policy makers still expected it to grow at a bit below its long-term trend over the coming year.

At that meeting, the Fed left its short-term interest-rate target at 5.25% and said afterward that inflation was its principal concern and that any decision on raising rates would depend on incoming data. The language suggested that the Fed, at least in mid-December, saw its next decision as whether to raise rates or leave them alone.

The minutes suggest Fed officials see monetary policy on hold for some months. "Nearly all members felt that maintaining the current target for now was most likely to foster moderate economic growth and a gradual ebbing of core inflation from its elevated levels."

But the summary said that "several" of the Fed's 11 voting policy makers thought the "subdued tone" of some recent economic indicators "meant that the downside risks to economic growth in the near term had increased a little and become a bit more broadly based than previously thought." One of those, whom the minutes didn't name, argued the statement released after the meeting should say rates could be either raised or lowered depending on the evolution of growth and inflation. If the Fed does adopt such a "neutral" statement in coming months, it would likely be seen as a prelude to cutting rates, which markets have expected for months despite Fed officials' rhetoric to the contrary.

ECONOMIC FORECASTING SURVEY

7

See complete coverage of The Wall Street Journal's economic forecasting survey, including interactive graphics with full results, an archive of prior surveys and downloadable data. Surveys conducted 10 times each year. Go to WSJ.com/Economists8

Some of the concerns officials had about growth at the December meeting may have been mollified by recent data. Yesterday's data showed strength in nonresidential construction, a reflection of business capital spending. And an upturn in a purchasing managers' survey for December may have eased concerns of Fed officials who, at the December meeting, called manufacturing a source of "downside risk."

Also, in December, Fed officials said they didn't see signs that inflation was "convincingly on a downward trend," but subsequent data has added to the evidence that it might be.

The minutes were released yesterday, a day later than the usual three-week lag because of the day of mourning for President Gerald Ford.

Fed Remains Focused On Risks To Inflation (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

The new Democrat Congress will take a tougher approach to supervising the Federal Reserve than its Republican predecessor, Barney Frank, the incoming chairman of the House financial services committee, signalled on Wednesday.

His remarks came as the Fed released minutes from its December 12 policy meeting showing it was largely unmoved by signs of economic weakness in the final months of 2006 and remained defiantly focused on the risks to inflation. The minutes, coupled with a stronger-than-expected survey of manufacturing, sent equities lower, while bond yields fell slightly.

In a speech to the National Press Club, Mr Frank said “there are people who think the Fed should be above democracy”.

He added: “We can debate the most fundamental questions in human existence, but God forbid anybody in elected office should talk about whether or not we need a 25 basis-point increase from the Fed.”

Mr Frank said interest rates were a matter of “public policy” and suggested the Democrat Congress would be both more hands-on and less deferential in its scrutiny of the Fed than the outgoing Republican Congress.

His remarks may trouble Fed policymakers, who will not want interest rate decisions to be politicised. They could also make some Fed officials additionally cautious about raising the issue of a numerical inflation objective, for fear that this could trigger a broader debate about what the Fed should target.

However, Fed insiders do not expect Mr Frank or his party to be hostile to the central bank.

Ben Bernanke, chairman of the Fed, recognises the importance of the Fed being seen to be accountable to Congress, and has invested considerable time meeting senior elected officials, including Mr Frank. If he does decide to push ahead with an inflation objective, he will try to explain why he sees this as consistent with the Fed’s existing Congressional mandate.

Nonetheless, an increase in political scrutiny would come at an awkward time, with the Fed at odds with the bond market over the prospects for the US economy. Wednesday’s minutes show the Fed policymakers meeting on December 12 viewed near-term weakness as primarily the result of short-term factors that would not significantly effect the forecasts on which it bases its policy decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0112400

Indeed, “the outlook for economic growth and inflation was thought to have changed relatively little since the previous meeting” in late October. All the policymakers also “agreed that the risk that inflation would fail to moderate as desired remained the predominant concern”.

Fed officials did not ignore the weaker data entirely. Several policymakers judged that “the downside risks to economic growth in the near term had increased a little”.

And for the first time in recent months, one committee member suggested the Fed explicitly refer to the possibility that it might have to cut rates if growth weakened further.

However, the tone of the minutes suggests the Fed still does not buy the market’s view that the economy faces sustained weakness that will demand interest rate cuts. Wednesday’s data appeared to support that view.

The Institute for Supply Management said its index of manufacturing activity climbed into positive territory in December.

The index rose to 51.4 last month after its worst reading in five years in the previous month, when it fell below the 50 mark – indicating a contraction.

Additional reporting by Anuj Gangahar in New York and Eoin Callan in Washington

Fed Reveals Concern Over Housing Slump (WP/AP)

By Jeannine Aversa And Tim Paradis

The Washington Post/AP, January 4, 2007

Heightened concern about a harsher-than-expected housing slump was a key factor in the Federal Reserve's decision to hold interest rates steady at its policymaking meeting last month.

Minutes of the Fed's deliberations, released yesterday, show that policymakers expressed worry over the real estate bust while they repeated that their aim was to make sure inflation continues to recede.

The bleak assessment of the housing market unnerved investors who were betting that the sector's problems would not spill over into other sectors of the economy. Release of the minutes sapped strength from the market on a day that had seen triple-digit gains and a new trading high for the Dow Jones industrials. The Dow ended the day up 11.37, or 0.09 percent, at 12,474.52.

"The concern is that the Fed was seeing something at their last meeting that suggested potentially more pronounced weakness than we had all been anticipating in the economy," said Drew Matus, senior economist at Lehman Brothers.

The Fed left its benchmark short-term interest rate unchanged at 5.25 percent last month, its fourth straight meeting without changing the rate. But the Fed also left the door open to a rate increase, if needed, to thwart inflation.

However, one Fed member, who was not identified in the minutes, said the central bank should have held out the possibility of a rate cut. That member thought the Fed's statement last month "should emphasize that policy could be adjusted in either direction, depending on the evolution of the outlook for inflation and economic growth."

The Fed's statement after the meeting, however, did not speculate about a rate cut. Rather, policymakers stuck to previous language about the possibility of a rate increase, something most economists think is not likely to happen.

Many economists say the Fed will hold rates steady at its next meeting, Jan. 30-31, and further into the new year. The next rate move, many analysts and investors say, will probably be a rate cut later in 2007.

At their December meeting, Fed policymakers said economic growth had slowed in 2006, partly reflecting a "substantial cooling" of the housing market. That description went beyond the Fed's previous assessment in late October and suggested that a sharper slump in housing could be taking place.

The policymakers suggested that the economy was in for sluggish growth because of the housing slump and that people needed to stay alert for signs that weakness in housing could infect the rest of the economy.

The minutes noted that growth in business investment had slowed and manufacturing had cooled, in part reflecting the struggling automotive industry. Consumer spending -- the lifeblood of the economy -- seemed to be holding up fairly well, yet there were risks that could change.

"Considerable uncertainty regarding the ultimate extent of the housing market correction meant that spillovers to consumption could become more evident, especially if house prices were to decline significantly," the minutes said.

Meanwhile, policymakers also made clear that they wanted to see "core" inflation, which excludes food and energy prices, move lower. They stuck to their forecast that this was likely to occur in the months ahead.

That said, "all members agreed that the risk that inflation would fail to moderate as desired remained the predominant concern," according to the minutes.

Fed's Ideal Rate Of Growth Could Be Slower In The Future (WSJ)

By David Wessel

DOJ_NMG_0112401

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

It is easy to cast this as an academic, number-clogged debate. In fact, it is an instance where what the Fed thinks matters to all of us, not just bond traders. The Fed's estimate for trend growth determines whether officials will let the economy expand at, say, 3% on average, or just 2.75%. The difference sounds small, but adds up over time. An extra one-quarter percentage point in annual growth would mean $130 billion more goods and services for Americans to share by 2026.

An economy's speed limit is largely defined by two factors: how rapidly the number of workers increases and their "productivity," or how much each of them produces.

The Fed doesn't disclose its precise projection for the safe speed limit. A public summary of Fed officials' October meeting noted that "the staff...had again reduced its projection for potential...growth." The comment followed a research paper that argued that something significant is happening to the U.S. labor force: Growth is slowing, and the phenomenon isn't temporary. The aging of the big baby-boom generation is bringing it to the brink of retirement, and the proportion of women who work seems to have peaked.

Nothing is certain here. Improved health and longevity or skimpier pensions may keep baby boomers working longer. Technology may reduce employers' demand for labor. Immigration could increase. Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke, in a speech in November, said: "Some slowing in the growth of the labor force...seems likely over the next few years at least." Fed board member Susan Bies has noted that a 0.2-percentage-point slowdown in labor-force growth means it takes fewer new jobs to keep the nation's unemployment rate steady -- 110,000 jobs a month, instead of 140,000 a month.

Productivity is particularly tough to forecast. After a remarkable spurt that survived the bursting of the tech-stock bubble, the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, and the energy-price increases exacerbated by war in the Middle East, there are some signs that productivity growth may be slowing a bit from the pace of the early 2000s.

Former Fed Chairman Alan Greenspan made the call of his career when he saw, before nearly anyone else, that productivity was taking off in the mid-1990s. His successor hasn't, yet, joined the productivity pessimists. "I remain optimistic," Mr. Bernanke said in November, "that the recent favorable [productivity] trends will continue." He pointed to the continued decline in the price of computer power and said that was spurring on biotechnology and other new industries, while increasing the efficiency of old ones.

The just-released minutes of the Fed's December meeting record concern that the underlying pace of productivity growth "could be weaker than currently thought."

Bank of America economists Mickey Levy and Peter Kretzmer point out in a recent research note that even if marked down a bit, the potential growth rate of the U.S. economy remains higher than that of nearly any other industrialized country -- roughly 3% for the U.S. by today's consensus, versus 2% or 2.25% for continental Europe and 1.75% for Japan.

That means the overall U.S. economy will be even bigger relative to Europe and Japan 20 years hence than it is now. It doesn't mean Europeans and Japanese will be miserable: With a slower-growing population, it takes less growth to deliver rising living standards to each person. (A country with a population increasing 10% a year has to have economic growth of 10% a year just to break even.)

The Fed can't turn the dials on population growth or on productivity. All it can do is try to gauge trends accurately. Continued strong productivity growth will lead the Fed to tolerate faster economic growth. That puts the onus on the rest of the society -- business, unions, workers, regulators, legislators, schools -- to work at doing what is possible to maintain healthy productivity growth, the secret to prosperity for our children and grandchildren.

US Markets Surrender To Inflation Fears (FT)

By Michael Mackenzie And Anuj Gangahar

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

US stocks surrendered a firm start to the new trading year on Wednesday after the Federal Reserve signalled there was little chance of an interest rate cut until core inflation moderates.

Stock investors returned from a four-day break amid lower oil prices and evidence of better-than-expected holiday retail sales. The bullish mood continued after a manufacturing survey proved to be stronger than expected and price pressures fell, reducing inflation fears.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average set a new intra-day record high of 12,580.35 during morning trade, while technology shares boosted the Nasdaq Composite.

Stocks then pared some of their gains ahead of the Fed's December meeting minutes being released. The Fed then released minutes from its December 12 policy meeting showing it was largely unmoved by signs of economic weakness in the final months of 2006 and remained defiantly focused on the risks to inflation.

DOJ_NMG_0112402

Selling erupted at policy makers' concerns over core inflation. "The market was set up for a bout of profit taking this week, it just required a catalyst," said Marc Pado, chief market strategist at Cantor Fitzgerald.

He expects choppy trading will continue until next week and then the focus will shift to fourth-quarter earnings results.

At the close, the S&P 500 fell 0.1 per cent, or 1.53 points, to 1,416.77. Industrials was the best performing main group in the index while the energy sector led losses.

The Nasdaq Composite, led the leading averages, rising 1.6 per cent at one stage before it settled 0.3 per cent, or 7.87 points, firmer at 2,413.87. The Dow closed 0.1 per cent, or 11.37 points, higher at 12,474.52.

Earlier in the day US stocks and bonds had staged a powerful surge as investors responded to news of a stronger than expected holiday shopping season, fresh economic data on employment and a decline in oil prices.

A decline in oil prices added to the strong sentiment that drove the Dow Jones industrials to a triple-digit or 0.9 per cent advance and a new trading high of 12,580.35 before midday in New York. Crude oil fell to less than $60 a barrel as the mild weather in the northeast US curbed heating demand.

Investors appeared to shrug off a weak employment report from a division of payroll company Automatic Data Processing that unnerved the bond market briefly early in the day.

Bonds rose in response to the ADP report, with the yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note falling to 4.69 percent from 4.71 percent late on Friday. Analysts said the report might improve the chances for an interest rate cut in the early part of the year.

With markets closed on Tuesday to mark the funeral of President Ford, Wednesday marked the end of the longest hiatus on Wall Street since the aftermath of the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks.

Stocks Give Up Early Gains (WSJ)

By Worth Civils

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

The New Year's celebration on Wall Street was short-lived, as stocks gave up big gains that had taken the Dow Jones Industrial Average to a new intraday high Wednesday, the first trading day of the year after a four-day break.

Traders weighed mixed economic data and the minutes from the latest meeting of Federal Reserve policy makers. A key manufacturing report was stronger than expected, allaying fears of a recession, but a weak forecast of monthly payrolls data to be released Friday surprised and unnerved some investors.

The Fed minutes showed1 policy makers were more worried about an economic slowdown, but were also still on the lookout for inflation pressures, indicating they could keep rates unchanged for a while. "My sense is that the minutes amplified the…growing perception that [the Fed] is not cutting rates anytime soon," said Peter Hooper, chief economist at Deutsche Bank Securities.

The combination of slowing growth and a still-hawkish Fed was not welcomed by stock investors, many of whom had expected a cut in interest rates early this year. Helped in part by stock gains in foreign markets on Tuesday, the Dow industrials were up more than 100 points earlier in the session, reaching a new intraday high of 12580.35 on the back of Wal-Mart Stores and Home Depot. But the gains slowly eroded in afternoon trading, with most of the losses coming after the Fed minutes were released at 2 p.m. EST.

The Dow, which fell more than 50 points into the red at one point, finished the day up just 11.37 points at 12474.52. The biggest decliner was General Motors, off 4.1% amid disappointing auto sales last month. Exxon Mobil lost 3.3% as crude-oil prices sank $2.73, or 4.5%, to $58.32 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Other averages also turned negative after broad gains earlier in the session, with the S&P 500-stock index off 1.67 to 1416.63 for the day. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index, which had been up as much as 1.5% earlier, finished ahead 7.87 at 2423.16, helped by a 1.6% gain in Dell shares and a 1.5% rise by Cisco Systems.

Some observers were skeptical of the Fed-induced selloff. "I don't understand what the reaction was to the minutes -- they were not that different than before," said David Wyss, chief economist at Standard & Poor's. "I think to some extent, the minutes were more of an excuse than a reason," Mr. Wyss said. He thinks some of pullback can be attributed to tax-related selling. "There is a tendency to rebalance [portfolios] after the first of the year," he said.

The volatile action Wednesday could also reflect still holiday-thin trading desks, as the stock market is open only three days this week after a four-day break, the longest since the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. The market was closed Monday for New Year's Day and Tuesday in honor of former President Gerald R. Ford, who died last week.

THE YEAR IN MARKETS

· 2006 Market Scorecard2

· The Year in Private Equity3

DOJ_NMG_0112403

· MarketBeat: 2006 Revisited4
· 2007 Outlook: Hoping for Goldilocks5
MARKET WRAP
European Shares Hover Around Six-Year Highs6
Asian Shares Close Mixed7
Dow Drops on Last Day of 20068

In economic data, the Institute of Supply Management's manufacturing survey for December beat expectations9, coming in at 51.4. It fell last month below the 50 mark, indicating contraction in the sector, for the first time since early 2003. The slowdown in another closely watched sector of the economy, housing, hit construction spending, which the Commerce Department said fell 0.2% in November, following declines in previous months.

Earlier, Automatic Data Processing estimated that private, non-farm payrolls shrank by 40,000 jobs in December, the first negative reading on job growth in more than three years. Several economists lowered their own forecasts after the ADP figure, even though it has proved unreliable in the past. The consensus estimate for December's report is for total payroll growth of 115,000 jobs.

Monthly auto sales reports10 mostly disappointed investors, as well. Ford Motor and GM both reported a 13% drop in U.S. sales last month. Chrysler said its December sales rose less than 1% amid a new customer-incentive plan. In addition to GM's slide, shares of Ford were flat, while the American-traded shares of DaimlerChrysler were ahead 1%.

Home Depot got a 2.3% boost after it announced that Bob Nardelli will leave11 his position as chairman, president and CEO. Frank Blake, the retailer's current vice chairman of the board and executive vice president, succeeds Mr. Nardelli, effective immediately. Wal-Mart was up 3% after the giant retailer said December same-store sales were expected to be up 1.6% over year-earlier levels, well above the company's previous estimate of a 1% gain.

In major market action:

Stocks rose12. On the New York Stock Exchange, 1,815 stocks advanced and 1,610 declined on volume of 2.07 billion shares.

Bonds were up.13The 10-year Treasury note added 6/32, or $1.88 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.66, and the 30-year bond gained 12/32, yielding 4.77%.

The dollar advanced.14The euro traded at $1.3161 from $1.3279 late Tuesday, and the dollar was at 119.39 yen from 118.81 yen.

Markets Finish Mixed As Fed Hints At Nagging Concern With Inflation (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

Stocks surged early yesterday, the first trading day of 2007, but fell sharply after minutes from a Federal Reserve meeting indicated that inflation remained the chief concern of policy makers even as they started to worry about a weakening economy. Markets closed mixed for the day.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index closed down slightly, at 1,416.63, after being up 0.8 percent. The Nasdaq composite index surged 1.6 percent early, but reversed course in the afternoon, falling 0.9 percent; it closed up 7.87 points, or 0.33 percent, at 2,423.16.

The Dow Jones industrial average also seesawed to a modest gain of 11.37 points, closing at 12,474.52. Bonds were up slightly and the dollar rose against the euro and yen.

Like markets in Europe and Asia, American stock markets, which were closed Tuesday in observance of the day of mourning for President Gerald R. Ford, began the year on an upbeat note. Investors were encouraged by Wal-Mart's posting of sales that were stronger than expected, and by a report showing an increase in manufacturing activity last month.

But the rally started to sag in early afternoon and collapsed shortly after the Fed released the minutes of its Dec. 12 meeting. Energy stocks were among the biggest losers as crude oil futures fell by $2.73, to $58.32 a barrel, the first time they have closed below $60 since November.

The Fed, as it has done repeatedly in recent months, indicated in its minutes that while inflation had moderated, the central bank's policy makers were worried that it remained too high and that they might need to raise short-term interest rates. The minutes noted, however, that one unnamed member of the policy-making committee wanted the Fed to acknowledge that it could also cut rates to reinvigorate the economy.

"It was a blunt reminder to the stock market that the Fed's going to err on the side of avoiding inflation," said Ethan S. Harris, chief United States economist at Lehman Brothers.

DOJ_NMG_0112404

Stocks climbed steadily in the last six months of 2006, partly on the expectation that the Fed, which last raised interest rates in June, to 5.25 percent, would start cutting rates in the first half of 2007. But some economists and market specialists have suggested that that view was inconsistent with investors' optimism that the economy and corporate profits would hold up well in the coming year.

"There is a sense in the stock market that you can have your cake and eat it too, that you can have good growth and rate cuts from the Fed," Mr. Harris said.

The bond and futures markets, by contrast, have become a little less hopeful in recent weeks about interest rate cuts, and are now priced with the expectation that the Fed's first rate cut will come in late June. Yields on the 10-year Treasury note, which move in the opposite direction of the price, have risen to 4.66 percent, from a low of 4.02 percent at the start of December. Bond prices and yields were little changed in yesterday's trading after the Fed's announcement.

"The bond market got the reaction to the Fed minutes right," said Joseph Biondo, a senior portfolio manager at Biondo Investment Advisors, "and the stock market didn't."

Still, market specialists said the stocks' late-afternoon recovery suggested that investors were not as moved by the Fed as it first seemed. Also, the energy sector was responsible for much of the decline in stock prices — the S.& P. Energy index fell 3.7 percent for the day. Analysts said warmer-than-expected temperatures on the East Coast helped drive down prices for crude oil and other commodities.

Another concern for the markets is the possibility that profit growth will slow. Companies will start reporting results for the fourth quarter later this month and, for the first time in four and a half years, profits may not post double-digit gains, said Sam Stovall, chief investment strategist for S.& P.'s Equity Research Service. He said he expected stocks to register a gain in 2007, but that the markets might first experience a correction typically seen late in an economic expansion.

US Manufacturing Pulls Back From Brink Of Recession (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

The US manufacturing sector bounced back from the brink of recession last month as factory activity rose in December after a slump.

The Institute for Supply Management said on Wednesday that that its index of manufacturing activity climbed into positive territory, rising to 51.4 last month after its first negative reading in five years.

A reading below 50 indicates contraction, one above 50 signals expansion.

The rise in the index was greater than economists expected and signals that factories are continuing to expand in spite of recent weakness in a number of key sectors. Computer and auto makers reported a pick up in demand, while chemicals manufacturers experienced a slowdown.

Manufacturers remain upbeat about the year ahead and are looking to overseas demand to offset a slowdown in domestic orders.

Jeoff Hall, an economist at Thomson Financial, said: "The manufacturing recession will be shallow and not tip the wider economy into recession. Given the high level of export orders, we were surprised to see such a rapid deterioration in business conditions recently."

Investors responded positively to the benign economic data, propelling US stocks higher on the opening trading day of the year. The Dow Jones Industrial Average touched a new intra-day record high of 12,566.57.

However, there was continued weakness in residential construction activity as spending fell, according to a separate report, but the decline was less than expected.

Why Manufacturing Shows Resilience (WSJ)

By Timothy Aeppel

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

U.S. manufacturing is showing surprising resilience in the face of a sharp slump in autos and housing, and in the coming year it is expected to expand roughly in line with the overall economy.

A closely watched manufacturing index turned positive in December, reversing a decline the month before that had sparked gloom about the outlook for the sector. New orders and production both edged up last month, while pricing pressures eased.

IN SUMMARY

· The News: A new report points to unexpected vitality in factory sector.

DOJ_NMG_0112405

· The Background: After a prolonged boom, many manufacturers got stuck with excess inventories as the economy slowed in recent months.

· The Bottom Line: No manufacturing recession, but growth in the sector will fall into line with slower growth of the larger economy.

Norbert Ore, an economist at the Institute for Supply Management, which released the report yesterday, said some manufacturers are suffering -- including makers of housing-related products from bricks and backhoes to rugs and refrigerators. "But there are also pockets of strength," he said, such as oil exploration and aerospace.

Manufacturing is just one part of the nation's economy that has been sending mixed signals lately. Another report released yesterday suggests the U.S. job market may have shed workers in December. Private employment fell a seasonally adjusted 40,000 last month, according to a report by Automatic Data Processing, the payroll-processing company, and Macroeconomic Advisers, an economic-forecasting firm. The government releases its monthly jobs report tomorrow.

Separately, the U.S. Commerce Department said yesterday that total construction spending fell 0.2% in November to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $1.184 trillion. That report also offered a mixed picture, with residential construction down 1.6% from the previous month, the eighth consecutive monthly decline, while nonresidential construction of hotels and office buildings rose 1.2%.

Manufacturing is coming off a boom that prompted producers to expand. Factory construction rose 20% last year and, in many cases, manufacturers ended up with bloated warehouses as economic growth cooled in recent months. While the economy expanded an estimated 3.3% last year, manufacturing output surged 4.8%.

That is likely to change. "What you're going to see, going forward, is a manufacturing sector that, instead of growing a lot faster than the overall economy, will be growing more in line with the economy," said David Huether, chief economist at the National Association of Manufacturers. Forecasters expect the U.S. economy to expand about 2.3% this year.

The Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI, an Arlington, Va., policy and research group, is predicting a "pronounced slowing" in manufacturing growth this year. For instance, household-appliance production is expected to decline 5% and output of heavy-duty trucks to fall 23%. Surging demand for cellular phones and digital televisions is set to push up semiconductor shipments 10% this year and shipments of airplane parts 9%.

Machinery production has been one of the bright spots for manufacturing during the past two years and, overall, is expected to remain robust. But Daniel Meckstroth, one of the group's economists, noted that output of construction machinery is expected to slide 1% in 2007, as a result of the housing slump, while output of oil and gas machinery is expected to grow 11% and industrial machinery 8%.

One nagging problem is inventories. As long as producers are stuck with excess goods, they will be focused on curbing output in line with demand. The latest ISM report showed customer inventories stood at 50.5% in December, the third straight month above 50%, which indicates that inventories are too high. Inventories of autos are particularly large.

Van Jolissaint, chief economist of auto maker DaimlerChrysler AG, said he thinks most of the big production cuts already have been made in his sector and that conditions should improve by the second half of the year, particularly if employment and income gains don't falter.

As the year progresses, he added, the housing sector should bottom out, too. "I'm actually pretty optimistic, not from the auto point of view, but from the point of view of the overall economy in 2007," Mr. Jolissaint said.

Many U.S. manufacturers are counting on exports to soften the blow of slower growth at home. Nordson Corp., a Westlake, Ohio, maker of machines used to spread adhesives on assembly lines, sells two-thirds of its machines outside the U.S. and says surging exports have more than offset the drop in sales at home. The company expects strong overseas growth to continue this year.Some sectors face an uncertain future. "We saw the contraction in housing hit us fairly rapidly this last fall," said Fletcher Steele, president of Pine Hall Brick Co. in Winston-Salem, N.C. Sales at the closely held company plunged 30% in November from a year earlier and were down 20% in December, he said.

Pine Hall, which sells more than 80% of its bricks to homebuilders, has idled half of the eight kilns in its four factories in North Carolina and Georgia. The company normally builds inventories during the slow winter months, but this year Mr. Steele isn't sure how much inventory building he will do.

The recent decline in commodity prices has been a double-edged sword for manufacturers. Less costly commodities, which translate into lower raw-materials costs, are a welcome break for factories after several years of hefty increases; yesterday, sharp declines in metals prices pummeled mining stocks, sending Freeport McMoRan Copper & Gold Inc. plunging $5.24, or 9.4%, to $50.49 as of 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Many manufacturers, however, built up supplies of metals and other commodities when prices were high, anticipating further price increases. Those companies now are stuck with pricey stockpiles and are unlikely to feel any immediate relief from lower raw-materials prices.

DOJ_NMG_0112406

Another uncertainty dogging manufacturers is the value of the dollar. Ronald DeFeo, chief executive of Terex Corp., a Westport, Conn., maker of mining and construction machinery, says he worries the dollar's value could continue to fall relative to other major countries. While the weaker dollar benefits his big factory in Redmond, Wash., which makes aerial platforms that are exported world-wide, it hurts his crane and other equipment operations in Europe.

Small Employers Struggle To Fill Jobs (USAT)

By Jim Hopkins

USA Today, January 4, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — Small employers ramping up hiring plans to levels not seen in two years face a labor shortage that's forcing many to increase wages and benefits.

The pinch is tightest in 26 states with below-average jobless rates, new Labor Department data and private surveys show. More than half those states are especially dependent on small employers, those with fewer than 500 workers.

Nationwide, the share of small firms planning to hire through early 2007 rose to 19% in November from 16% the month before, say surveys by the National Federation of Independent Business trade group. November's share was the highest since November 2004.

In New Hampshire, Jody Rodgers plans to hire up to 20 workers as she expands her 55-employee pet boarding and grooming chain, The Barking Dog. She offers "great benefits," including health insurance, bonuses and paid vacations.

Still, Rodgers struggles to find qualified applicants amid a tight labor supply. "It's not pretty out there," she says.

New Hampshire is one of the 26 states. Its jobless rate rose slightly to 3.5% in November. But it remains well below the 4.5% U.S. average.

Small-business advisers say many of the USA's 5.7 million small employers must consider raising wages and adding benefits such as flexible working hours to better compete with big corporations.

"This position that you have traditionally paid $12 an hour for, you're going to need to now pay $14 to $15 an hour," says Sandra Dickerson, CEO of Your People Professionals, a recruiter and employment manager in Santa Maria, Calif.

The National Federation of Independent Business says wages already are headed higher. In November's survey of 451 companies, 20% planned to raise wages, up from 18% the month before.

"More owners are paying more, trying to keep workers and to get workers," says Bill Dunkelberg, the 600,000-member trade group's chief economist.

Small employers that don't want to raise wages can try other carrots that don't require spending more right away, says Tim Doherty, CEO of Doherty Employer Services in Minneapolis. Non-cash incentives include letting employees work from home one day a week or giving more personal time off.

Those are options small companies can offer to be more competitive with corporate giants that have less-flexible workplace policies. "They don't need to be bound by large-company constraints," Doherty says.

A Mostly Winning Economy (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

ECONOMIC PROSPERITY prompts presidents to exaggerate their influence, while privation causes them to lament their impotence. So it was hardly surprising to hear President Bush emerge from his first Cabinet meeting of 2007 on Wednesday talking about "the need to keep this economy growing by making tax relief permanent." Bush's fondness for his first-term tax cuts, most of which are to expire in 2010, is well known. But if he and Congress want to keep the economy growing, they should shore up its foundation.

The economy enters the new year riding a couple of winning streaks. The U.S. gross domestic product has been growing for a record 20 consecutive quarters, and blue-chip companies in the Standard & Poor's 500 have racked up 18 straight quarters of 10% or greater increases in profits. Those streaks began before the Bush tax cuts took full effect, though they have been abetted by the twin stimuli of the tax cuts and large increases in federal spending. "Making tax relief permanent" makes for a good political sound bite, but it hardly amounts to economic policy.

Nevertheless, there's some grumbling about the prospects for 2007, particularly for those outside the executive suite. The deflation of the housing bubble continues, taking a toll on the residential construction industry and putting a damper on consumer spending. The long decline of the U.S. industrial sector, most evident in the auto industry, continues as well.

Yet the economy may be able to dodge those bullets. Housing sales crept upward at the end of the year. Moreover, with the decline in homebuilding, the price of materials has fallen, helping other construction sectors. At the same time, low interest rates, reduced energy prices and strength in other parts of the economy have led most forecasters to predict continued GDP growth in 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0112407

Boosting the industrial sector is a harder task. Some Democrats on Capitol Hill, along with some liberal think tanks and advocacy groups, have raised the specter of protectionist trade policies and new rules to limit offshoring. When combined with higher barriers to immigration, they say, these policies would also help narrow the gap between the wealthiest Americans and everybody else. Such steps would be misguided, particularly at a time when the tightening labor market has finally started to drive up real wages.

In the long term, the best ways to improve wages are to create more highly skilled workers and provide a larger market for their talents. House Democratic leaders already have acknowledged this; when they unveiled their economic strategy in November 2005, one of the first three planks called for training more scientists and engineers and extending high-speed Internet access throughout the country.

In times of relative prosperity, Washington has the luxury of focusing more on the long term. Congressional Democrats should use this moment to promote policies that help more Americans share in the nation's economic growth, not to advocate for a return to a less globalized, more protectionist era. Bush, for his part, should be looking for ways to minimize the effect of the tax code on the economy, not embellishing its effect.

Gerald Ford Is Laid To Rest In Michigan (AP)

By Kathy Barks Hoffman

AP, January 4, 2007

Gerald R. Ford was laid to rest on the grounds of his presidential museum Wednesday after eight days of mourning and remembrance that spanned the country, from the California desert to the nation's capital and back to Ford's boyhood home.

The sunset burial capped the official mourning for the 38th president, from services in California, to ceremonies at the nation's capital, and a 17-hour viewing Tuesday night and Wednesday at the museum in his hometown.

At a graveside service that included a 21-gun salute and a 21-aircraft flyover, Vice President Dick Cheney presented former first lady Betty Ford with the American flag that was draped over her husband's casket.

Earlier at the Ford family's longtime church, Ford was remembered as a man not afraid to laugh, make tough decisions or listen to the advice of his independent wife in eulogies delivered during a funeral at the church the couple attended for six decades.

An honor guard carried the casket inside Grace Episcopal Church, where Ford's defense secretary, Donald Rumsfeld, and Ford's successor, Jimmy Carter, recalled his public service.

His widow, Betty, wiped away tears as she sat with the couple's four children and more than 300 dignitaries and family friends, including Vice President Dick Cheney and golfing legend Jack Nicklaus.

"He was one of us," Rumsfeld said, "And that made him special and needed in a dark and dangerous hour for our nation."

Rumsfeld, who recently left his post as President Bush's defense secretary, remembered Ford as a courageous and steady leader who healed the nation after Watergate.

Rumsfeld said the Navy is considering naming a new aircraft carrier after Ford, a Navy veteran. A decision is expected later this month.

"How fitting it would be that the name Gerald R. Ford will patrol the high seas for decades to come in defense of the nation he loved so much," he said.

Carter described the close personal friendship he and Ford developed over the years.

"I relished his sound advice," Carter said as his wife, Rosalynn, cried. "I want to thank my predecessor for all he did to heal our land."

Thousands of flag-waving mourners lined the roads under sunny skies as the motorcade bearing Ford's casket traveled between his presidential museum in downtown Grand Rapids to the church, before returning to the museum.

The viewing had to be extended Wednesday until nearly noon so everyone in line could pay their respects. Some 57,000 mourners waited hours to file past the flag-draped casket during the night. Some stopped and made silent prayers.

"We're here to honor him," said Philip Bareham of Lansing, who was the last person to view the casket and whose parents were among Ford's earliest supporters and political allies. "We just love this family. They are so down to earth."

Ford represented Grand Rapids in Congress for 25 years. His family had belonged to Grace Episcopal Church since the early 1940s.

Richard Norton Smith, an author, presidential historian and former director of Ford's museum and library, reminded mourners how important Ford's hometown was to him.

"Grand Rapids returned his affection many times over," which was "unforgettably demonstrated by the tens of thousands who stood in line for hours outside the museum, braving the cold to assure that his last night was anything but lonely," Smith said.

DOJ_NMG_0112408

Draped over the back of one pew at the funeral was a blue blanket with the letter "M" emblazoned on it, symbolizing Ford's alma mater, the University of Michigan, where he played football for national championship teams in 1932 and 1933.

Many of the mourners at the museum and lining the roads during his funeral procession on Wednesday wore Michigan hats and sweat shirts in his honor.

Ford, who became president after Richard Nixon resigned, died Dec. 26 at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif. He was 93.

Pride, Grief Flow As Ford Laid To Rest In Hometown (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, January 4, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. — Gerald Rudolph Ford was buried on a hillside at his presidential museum Wednesday after a poignant send-off from his hometown and tributes from a protégé and a former rival.

The final moments of a week-long commemoration of the 38th president's life were marked by a 21-gun salute, a bugler sounding tapsand a flyover of 21 military jets in the "missing man" formation, with one jet veering off from the others.

Betty Ford sat at the gravesite as the U.S. Army Chorus sang Goin' Home. Her daughter, Susan Ford Bales, put an arm around her mother to comfort her.

As Eternal Father, Strong to Save was played and the sun neared the horizon, Vice President Cheney presented the U.S. flag that had covered Ford's casket to the former first lady. She kissed the folded flag.

Ford died Dec. 26 at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif. He was 93.

The funeral, which Ford helped plan, prompted tears and laughter from family, friends and politicians. Mrs. Ford dabbed her eyes with a handkerchief as the casket was carried down the aisle of Grace Episcopal Church in East Grand Rapids.

She smiled, though, when Donald Rumsfeld, who served as her husband's Defense secretary and White House chief of staff, began his eulogy. He described the former president as "one of us." Sniffing back tears, he said Ford was "special and needed in a dark and dangerous hour for our nation" after President Nixon's resignation in the wake of the Watergate scandal.

Neighbors and friends

Jimmy Carter, who beat Ford in the 1976 presidential election, began and ended his eulogy with the first sentence of his inaugural address. "For myself and for our nation, I want to thank my predecessor for all he has done to heal our land," Carter said, his voice breaking, after describing the "intense personal friendship" he and Ford shared after their White House years.

Betty Ford, 88, sat with her daughter and sons Michael, Jack and Steven. Michael and Steven Ford gave readings, and three of the Fords' grandchildren read prayers at the funeral, which ended about an hour behind schedule.

In the other front pew were Cheney and his wife, Lynne; Carter and his wife, Rosalynn; and Rumsfeld and his wife, Joyce. Nearby, a blue stadium blanket was draped over a pew to honor Bo Schembechler, the former football coach at Ford's alma mater, the University of Michigan. Schembechler died in November. Ford's passion for another sport was represented, too: Golfer Jack Nicklaus was an honorary pallbearer.

Ford lived in California for his last 30 years, and services for him were held in Palm Desert, Calif., and in Washington, D.C. But the farewell in this city of 164,000 was different. There was a heartfelt outpouring of pride and grief from people who consider themselves his neighbors and friends.

Thousands of people lined the streets and bridges between the church and the museum. Some wept or waved flags as the black hearse with presidential seals on its doors moved slowly past.

The skies were clear with a steady breeze, but temperatures were in the 40s.

Military officials said about 57,000 people filed past Ford's casket during 18 hours of public viewing in the museum. Ryan Sharpe, 25, a computer software technician, was born after Ford's presidency, but he came to represent family members who couldn't be here.

"He was a simple man, somebody you might want to have a beer with," Sharpe said. "I just wanted to say, 'Rest in peace, Mr. President.' "

Antoinette Tomaszewski, a floral designer in her 50s, said a prayer as she walked by the casket. "You could feel a quieting come over you," she said. "All we can do is pray for him now." The visit was important to her because Ford's signature is on the naturalization papers of her father, an immigrant from Kiev, Ukraine, she said.

"You could hear a pin drop," said Bill Kleinhans, 59, who helps inventors market their products. "You feel a sadness at the loss of such a great man, but the good part is that his life story is now being told — things like his personal integrity."

'I'm from Grand Rapids'

Ford loved his hometown. His mother brought him here from Omaha when he was just 2 weeks old. He was a football star at South High School, which is now the Gerald R. Ford Job Corps Center. He worked in a paint store and at a hamburger stand.

DOJ_NMG_0112409

He came back after attending Yale Law School to open a law practice and later represented Grand Rapids in Congress for a quarter-century. In August 1947, mutual friends introduced him to a local woman, Betty Bloomer Warren. They were married for 58 years.

"The proudest boast I can make is that I'm from Grand Rapids," Ford said in May 2000 after the airport here was renamed for him. "About 86 years ago, the people of Grand Rapids took me in for the first time," he said. "Their hearts, their support have never faded. What I've accomplished in this life, I owe to Grand Rapids."

In his eulogy, Richard Norton Smith, former director of the Gerald R. Ford Museum and Library, recalled Ford recently saying, "When I wake up at night and can't sleep, I remember Grand Rapids."

Because tens of thousands of people lined up through a cold night to say goodbye, Smith said, "His last night was anything but lonely."

Ford Buried At Presidential Museum In Michigan (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. (AP) -- Gerald R. Ford was laid to rest on the grounds of his presidential museum yesterday during a ceremony watched by thousands who lined streets and bridges to catch a glimpse of history.

The sunset burial capped the official mourning for the 38th president, from services in California to ceremonies in the nation's capital to a 17-hour viewing Tuesday night and yesterday at the museum in his hometown.

At a graveside service that included a 21-gun salute and a 21-aircraft flyover, Vice President Dick Cheney presented former first lady Betty Ford with the American flag that was draped over her husband's casket.

At the funeral, former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld -- who held the same position in Mr. Ford's administration -- announced that the Navy will name its next aircraft carrier USS Gerald R. Ford.

The Navy had not planned to make the announcement so quickly, but Pentagon officials later confirmed what Mr. Rumsfeld said during his eulogy at the funeral.

"How fitting it would be that the name Gerald R. Ford will patrol the high seas for decades to come in defense of the nation he loved so much," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

In eulogies delivered during a funeral at the church that Mr. and Mrs. Ford attended for six decades, the former president was remembered as a man not afraid to laugh, make tough decisions or listen to the advice of his independent wife.

An honor guard carried the casket inside Grace Episcopal Church. Both Mr. Rumsfeld and Mr. Ford's successor, Jimmy Carter, recalled his public service.

Mrs. Ford wiped away tears as she sat with the couple's four children and more than 300 dignitaries and family friends.

"He was one of us," Mr. Rumsfeld said. "And that made him special and needed in a dark and dangerous hour for our nation."

Mr. Rumsfeld, who recently left his post as President Bush's defense secretary, remembered Mr. Ford as a courageous and steady leader who healed the nation after Watergate.

Mr. Carter described the close personal friendship that he and Mr. Ford developed over the years.

"I relished his sound advice," Mr. Carter said. "I want to thank my predecessor for all he did to heal our land."

Thousands of flag-waving mourners lined the roads under sunny skies as the motorcade bearing Mr. Ford's casket traveled between his presidential museum in downtown Grand Rapids to the church, before returning to the museum.

The viewing had to be extended yesterday until nearly noon so everyone in line could pay their respects. About 57,000 mourners waited hours to file past the flag-draped casket during the night. Some stopped and made silent prayers.

"We're here to honor him," said Philip Bareham of Lansing, who was the last person to view the casket and whose parents were among Mr. Ford's earliest supporters and political allies. "We just love this family. They are so down-to-earth."

Mr. Ford represented Grand Rapids in Congress for 25 years and became president after Richard M. Nixon resigned. He died Dec. 26 at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif., at age 93.

Ford Is Buried After Thousands In Hometown Pay Respects (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich., Jan. 3 — Gerald R. Ford was buried on Wednesday on a grassy hill beside the rushing waters of the Grand River as the sun set, a final farewell in a week of remembrances for the nation's 38th president.

Though Mr. Ford had lived elsewhere for decades, Grand Rapids made it clear that it still considered this his true home and that it still considered him one of its most beloved, famous — and yet ordinary — men.

DOJ_NMG_0112410

In a city of 195,000 residents, some 57,000 waited since Tuesday evening in a line that wound through two miles of downtown to walk silently past Mr. Ford's coffin inside his presidential museum, steps from where he would be buried.

In temperatures that dipped into the low 30s, some people cheerfully waited six hours, deep into the night and morning, for a minute or two beside the former president, who died on Dec. 26 at age 93.

"We needed to be here — this is how we feel about him here," Mary Castro said shortly before 3 a.m. Wednesday, still waiting to reach the museum after four hours in line. A family, carrying a 2-year-old in blankets beside her, nodded.

"He was an everyday, down-to-earth guy, so accessible, not one of these politicians nowadays who needs all sorts of bodyguards," said Ms. Castro, 62, of suburban Comstock Park. "And he understood the importance of forgiveness."

If the nation remembered Mr. Ford for his sudden arrival as president in 1974 in the midst of turmoil over the Watergate scandal and for his decision to pardon President Richard M. Nixon, Grand Rapids's memory was utterly different. Here, he was the boy who grew up on these streets, who played football for South High School, who became an Eagle Scout and who this region sent to the House of Representatives from 1949 until the 1970s.

He had taken the time to speak to elementary school government classes, to write birthday cards, to present crowns to homecoming queens. He was, some said, a perfect reflection of what people here are about.

"He was one of us," said Dwayne Hiljer, 69 and a retired salesman who drove three hours from his home near Detroit. "I've been around for presidents since Roosevelt, and this is the only one that was always totally honest with you."

Even after Mr. Ford's body was driven away from the museum — the lines cut short when time ran out — Grand Rapids followed him. Residents lined the streets, Boy Scouts in uniforms (and no coats) saluting, as his hearse and motorcade led the way to a final funeral service. The city gathered again along the bridges and the roofs of downtown buildings at dusk when the burial service began.

Mr. Ford was actually born in Omaha, but moved here as an infant with his mother. He had lived, at various times, in eight homes in the area.

During the funeral at Grace Episcopal Church, gleaming with stained glass, in East Grand Rapids, mourners remembered his modest roots and modest approach.

"There's an old saying in Washington that every member of the United States Congress looks in the mirror and sees a future president," Donald H. Rumsfeld, who served as defense secretary and chief of staff to Mr. Ford, said in a eulogy. "Well, Jerry Ford was different. I suspect that when he looked in the mirror even after he became president, he saw a citizen and a public servant."

The Fords had been longtime members of the church. Mr. Ford married his wife, Betty, at the parish's earlier building in 1948. Their first three children were baptized there. The funerals for Mr. Ford's mother and stepfather were held there.

The service on Wednesday, before 400 people, was more intimate, more personal than some earlier events.

Mr. Ford's grandchildren read prayers. Honorary pallbearers included a list of community leaders and friends from Grand Rapids, as well as Jack Nicklaus, the golfer; Mary Sue Coleman, the University of Michigan president; and Pepi Gramshammer, the skier. A University of Michigan blanket, yellow and blue, was left on a pew in honor of Bo Schembechler, the longtime Michigan football coach whom Mr. Ford had chosen to be an honorary pallbearer but who died late last year. Mr. Ford played for Michigan in the 1930s.

Richard Norton Smith, who used to be the director of the Ford museum and presidential library, described a man who knew how to laugh at himself and to get along despite divisiveness and partisanship.

"No one ever called Gerald Ford an imperial president," Mr. Smith said. "Perhaps that was because no figure in memory was so immune to Washington's besetting disease of self-importance."

Mr. Ford, a longtime member of Congress, succeeded Vice President Spiro T. Agnew and then Mr. Nixon after both men left office because of scandals.

Former President Jimmy Carter, who defeated Mr. Ford in 1976 but later became his close friend, said the precise words he used in his own inauguration — 30 years ago — remained the most appropriate tribute he could make to Mr. Ford, whose decision to pardon Mr. Nixon had drawn angry critics as well as supporters, who said he had helped spare the country more turmoil.

"For myself and for our nation, I want to thank my predecessor," Mr. Carter said on Wednesday, pausing to gather his emotions, "for all he did to heal our land."

As dusk fell on a cold, clear afternoon, Mr. Ford's family, emotional and holding on to one another, gathered for the burial outside the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum, near the grass beside the Grand River. The Army chorus somberly sang "Goin' Home." The Rev. Dr. Robert G. Certain said a prayer. Canons sent a cloud of thick smoke and loud echoes across a silent downtown. F-15s zipped loudly past in formation, traveling north along the river's edge.

DOJ_NMG_0112411

Vice President Dick Cheney handed the flag — the carefully folded flag from Mr. Ford's coffin — to Mrs. Ford, who nodded and clutched it briefly to her face.

Ford Laid To Rest In Michigan (CHIT)

By Tim Jones

Chicago Tribune, January 4, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. -- The hometown that nurtured, voted for and never forgot Gerald R. Ford laid him to rest Wednesday after a simple but heartfelt funeral and an extraordinary display of public affection.

This was the final homecoming for the nation's 38th president, who on a day of brilliant sunshine and cold temperatures was hailed as a citizen, public servant and, as a young congressman, a most unusual Washington politician—one who did not see a future president whenever he looked in the mirror.

"He put us on the right path when the way ahead was uncertain," said an emotional Donald Rumsfeld, who sniffled every few seconds as he struggled through his 12-minute eulogy. Rumsfeld, the former Defense Secretary, served in the Ford administration.

Wednesday's ceremonies marked the official end of national mourning that started in California, moved to Washington and concluded in the western Michigan city where Ford grew up, practiced law and later represented in Congress. This stop, lasting a little more than 24 hours, packed an emotional wallop.

While the 80-minute funeral at Grace Episcopal Church was dominated by personal friends and dignitaries, including Vice President Dick Cheney, former President Jimmy Carter, golf legend Jack Nicklaus and Rumsfeld, the goodbye was led by tens of thousands of Grand Rapids and Michigan residents who lined the streets and filed through the Gerald R. Ford Museum to pay their respects.

Ford helped plan his own funeral and wanted it to be an unpretentious reflection of his life. For all of the careful orchestration, there was no anticipating the throng of people who started showing up before Ford's casket arrived Tuesday afternoon.

About 57,000 people, many of whom waited outside for up to eight hours in freezing overnight temperatures, walked through the museum during the 17 hours that Ford's body lay in state. The lines never stopped until authorities cut them off late Wednesday morning, about two hours before the start of the funeral.

"His last night was anything but lonely," Richard Norton Smith, presidential historian and former director of the Ford Museum, in downtown Grand Rapids, said in his eulogy.

Crowds of people, including a little girl with long red hair holding a small American flag as she leaned over a security fence, stood along city streets as the motorcade slowly drove the 6 miles between the museum and the church, and then back. The drapes in the hearse were open, allowing those gathered to catch a glimpse of the flag-draped casket.

People who had had never met or seen Ford showed up hours in advance, bundling their young children in blankets and effectively camping out along the funeral route.

At Grace Episcopal, 88-year-old former First Lady Betty Ford, always accompanied by her daughter and three sons, dabbed at her eyes with a handkerchief as Rumsfeld, Carter and Smith eulogized the former president, often poignantly. Ford was a president who was not afraid to laugh at himself, Smith said.

For all of the solemnity of the event, the 93-year-old Ford's return to the city he left more than 50 years ago was not a regal affair. It was more Truman-esque in tone, in keeping with the plainspoken tendencies of Ford, who represented this area in Congress for 25 years before assuming the vice presidency in 1973. He became president the next year.

Ford, like former President Harry Truman when he died, has enjoyed a rehabilitation of his reputation. In the weeklong series of funerals and remembrances, Ford's controversial pardon of former President Richard Nixon in 1974, which probably cost him his bid for election two years later, is now praised as a nation-healing gesture.

"He was better at statesmanship than salesmanship," Smith observed, underscoring a recurring theme heard on the streets in Grand Rapids and even echoed in the funeral service—that national politics has taken a turn for the worse.

Carter, a Democrat who defeated Ford in 1976, recalled the "intense personal friendship" he and his wife Rosalynn shared with the Fords.

"I want to thank my predecessor for all he did to heal our land," Carter said in his eulogy, as his wife Rosalynn cried. That was also the first remark Carter made in his inaugural address in 1977.

Carter said that when the two couples traveled together, he always regretted reaching their destination because it meant the end of the time they would enjoy each other.

As the sun began to set, a gravesite service outside the museum featured a Marine Corps choir, a 21-gun salute and a thundering 21-aircraft flyover that shook windows in the downtown area.

DOJ_NMG_0112412

After the flag that draped Ford's casket was removed and folded, Cheney, a former chief of staff for Ford, presented it to Betty Ford. She gently hugged it.

Ford's Body Is Laid To Rest In Hometown (LAT)

By P.j. Huffstutter

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH. — Gerald Rudolph Ford was laid to rest on the grounds of his presidential museum along the grassy shore of the Grand River on Wednesday after an intimate service attuned to close friends and family.

As the sun set over his hometown, the ceremonies ended nearly a week of mourning for the earnest Midwestern congressman who became an unelected president — and the man who steadied the nation in the wake of the Watergate scandal and the Vietnam War.

Ford died Dec. 26 at age 93 at his home in Rancho Mirage.

A presidential jet delivered his body home to Michigan on Tuesday, where in an 18-hour period an estimated 57,000 people came to view his casket and pay their final respects.

Wednesday began and ended with crisp temperatures and crystal blue skies. Mourners lined the streets, filled alleys and crowded onto bridges to see the hearse and military motorcade as it traveled the six-mile route to Grace Episcopal Church for a final private service.

In front of the church, the crowd stood 20 people deep. No one spoke. No one jostled for space or a better view as the hearse pulled up. Some saluted as the motorcade pulled to a stop.

Only the sound of American flags snapping in the wind could be heard as a military honor guard carried the casket up the curved driveway and into the two-story brick church.

"I waited eight hours to see his casket," said Joe Hogan, 56, a truck driver from Allendale. "I came to the church to say a final goodbye. He was our man. He was Michigan's president.

"It's only fitting that he's home with us now."

Inside the church, former President Carter, Vice President Dick Cheney and recently resigned Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who was Ford's chief of staff and later his Defense secretary, joined other dignitaries, friends and family members.

Widow Betty Ford, who looked frail and spent, swayed slightly as the casket moved down the aisle. Her sons discreetly put their arms around her as their father's body was placed in front of a simple wooden altar and an ornate deep-blue stained glass window.

Throughout the nearly two-hour service, formal tributes gave way to moments of personal sorrow and warm humor.

Speaking to those gathered in the 350-seat church, to which the family has belonged since the 1940s, Carter remembered a deal he had struck long ago with Ford: Whoever died first would deliver the other's eulogy.

Carter began and ended his tribute to his close friend and former political rival by quoting his 1977 inauguration speech: "For myself, and for our nation, I want to thank my predecessor for all that he has done to heal our land."

Richard Norton Smith, former director of the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Library & Museum, recounted a meeting he had at the family home seven years ago to discuss the former president's funeral plans. After a review of the events to come, Smith said, Ford was called out of the room to take a phone call.

"A few minutes later, he returned with a grin on his face and a question on his lips," Smith said. " 'Well,' he asked in a booming voice, 'Have you got me resurrected yet?' I told him I was afraid that was somewhat outside the purview of the Military District of Washington."

The crowd burst into laughter. Betty Ford giggled so hard, she bent over and her face brightened for a moment.

Rumsfeld recalled the many hurdles Ford faced when he pardoned former President Nixon.

"Because Gerald Ford was there to restore the strength of the presidency, to rebuild our defenses and to demonstrate firmness and clarity, America could again, in Lincoln's words, stand as 'the last best hope of Earth,' " Rumsfeld said, his voice cracking. "He reminded Americans of who they were, and he put us on the right path when the way ahead was, at best, uncertain."

As the hearse slowly drove back to the museum, the motorcade passed a wooden sign that had been covered in red, white and blue ribbons: "Welcome to East Grand Rapids. Home of Gerald R. Ford. 38th President of the United States."

The day's journey ended at the museum — a center Ford helped design down to the smallest detail.

At a graveside service that included a 21-gun salute, cannon smoke wafted across the river as the rumbling shots shook nearby buildings. After a 21-aircraft flyover roared across a sunset sky, Cheney presented Betty Ford with the American flag that had been draped over her husband's casket.

Tears pooling in her eyes, she gently kissed the flag and clutched it to her chest.

DOJ_NMG_0112413

A Final Return Home (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich., Jan. 3 -- Gerald R. Ford's family and closest friends laid the former president to rest beside a fast-flowing river in the heart of a city that adored him. During the last stretch of a somber week of benedictions, an admirer praised him as a courageous leader "who never confused moderation with weakness nor compromise with surrender."

A once bright winter sun melted into twilight as Ford's widow, Betty, received from Vice President Cheney the American flag that had adorned the coffin of the 38th president. Ford's death Dec. 26 at age 93 ended an odyssey that carried him from a humble start in the Midwest to a heartfelt national farewell.

Former president Jimmy Carter, who defeated Ford in 1976 and later became a friend, began and ended his benediction the way he began his inaugural address. Now white-haired, his voice breaking, Carter repeated: "For myself and for our nation, I want to thank my predecessor for all he did to heal our land."

The memorial service, held at Grace Episcopal Church, where Gerald and Betty Ford were married in 1948, brought together a lifetime of friends and acquaintances from the highly placed to the less than mighty.

Among the eulogists was former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who recalled the calamity of President Richard M. Nixon's resignation, which thrust Ford into the Oval Office on Aug. 9, 1974. It was a time when "the pressures were enormous . . . and the American people were holding their breath, wondering what would happen next."

When Ford reassured the country, Rumsfeld said, "his special magic" was that few doubted his word.

Historian Richard Norton Smith, who often visited Ford, described him to mourners as "utterly without pretense." He recalled that in the last chapter of his life, the former president told him, "When I wake up at night and can't sleep, I think of Grand Rapids."

The city returned the favor Tuesday and Wednesday. Tens of thousands of residents lined the streets to glimpse his passing hearse or stood for hours in the windy cold to view his coffin.

It seemed every third mourner had a personal story to share. Often, it was about a good deed that Ford had done, or a recollection that suggested a simpler, more civil time when the people felt closer to those in power.

Eagle Scout Jason Beaton, 18, related that his grandmother used to double-date with Ford. Linda Komejan, 52, said Ford interceded to get a driver's license for her mentally handicapped uncle, allowing him to get to work.

Retired teacher Marian Krupiczewicz, 59, recalled going to Ford's Capitol Hill office in the 1960s as a teenager and sitting in his chair: "There'd even be papers on his desk. It was different then."

"I remember as a kid going out to East Grand Rapids, riding my bike out there, because the president was coming to town," said William Dekker, 46. "Thirty years later, it's the same thing."

Handmade signs declared, "Welcome Home, Mr. President."

As the Episcopal service of thanksgiving began, many of the 31 men and women named honorary pallbearers took their seats, among them Cheney and golfer Jack Nicklaus. A maize-and-blue University of Michigan football blanket marked the pew that former coach Bo Schembechler, who died in November, would have occupied.

Son Michael Ford read the 23rd Psalm and son Steven read in a quavering voice from Paul's Letter to the Romans. Rumsfeld, who served as Ford's White House chief of staff, recalled that Ford never lowered himself to the partisanship that often marked Washington dealings.

"He reminded Americans of who they were and he put us on the right path when the way ahead was at best uncertain," Rumsfeld said, recalling Ford's 895-day presidency. "It is commonly said that Ford healed the nation, and he did."

After the church service, the cortege made its way back across town to the gravesite beside the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum. A military band played "Ruffles and Flourishes" for the final time, followed by a medley of patriotic songs, among them "The Star-Spangled Banner" and "God Bless America."

The family followed the pallbearers and the coffin, Betty Ford helped from a wheelchair by Steven Ford and her military escort. As artillery fired a 21-gun salute and 21 military jets staged a precision flyover, the coffin lay beneath an inscription chosen by the Fords: "Lives committed to God, country and love."

Ford's Legacy: A Call For Unity In Congress (BSH)

By Kathleen Gray And Marisol Bello

Biloxi Sun Herald, January 4, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. - In recent years, former President Gerald R. Ford often lamented that partisanship was tearing apart the fabric of Congress and loyalty to special interests was displacing public duty.

DOJ_NMG_0112414

"It was very disturbing to him," said Martin Allen Jr., a friend from Grand Rapids and chairman emeritus of the Gerald R. Ford Foundation. "As minority leader he always tried to craft a consensus."

The foundation now hopes to use Ford's record of bipartisanship as an example for future politicians.

"We want to study his legacy and show people interested in running for office that there's another way," Allen said Tuesday night.

The foundation sponsored a conference in Washington last year to examine how Ford did his job and now hopes to make it an annual event, promoting a legacy dedicated to Ford's strong sense of patriotism before partisanship.

As a Republican president, Ford didn't always get along with Democrats, vetoing 66 bills in his two years in office. Democrats mustered the votes to override 12 of the vetoes. But both the Democrat-controlled House and Senate overwhelmingly confirmed Ford's appointment as vice president (the combined vote was 479-38).

In the mourning since Ford's death, historians, Democrats and Republicans have all remarked on Ford's ability to work with both parties.

Friends recalled that Ford shared staffers with John F. Kennedy when they were congressmen and that Ford was close to Thomas (Tip) O'Neill, a powerful Boston Democrat in the House.

"He loved that part of it," Allen said of working with the other party. "You don't find very much of that anymore."

In his eulogy Wednesday, former President Jimmy Carter spoke fondly of the friendship he forged with Ford after the two battled for the presidency in 1976.

"I relished his strong advice. He reluctantly departed from his party to give me support on some of my most difficult challenges," Carter said, adding that the one call that he, Anwar Sadat and Menachem Begin made together after crafting a Middle East peace accord was to Ford.

"Our mutual respect blossomed into a valued personal friendship," Carter said.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said after Ford's death that a fitting tribute to his memory would be a return to civility in Washington.

The thousands of people who stood hours in line for a momentary glimpse of his casket were a testament to the public's hunger to see a return to the collegiality that marked the Congress of Ford's generation, Allen said.

"We have more politicians than statesmen and we need a statesman more than ever," said Philip Bareham, 46, of Lansing, Mich. "Today, it's like a boxing match."

Sarah Parker-Hermuth, 30, of Grand Rapids said the country could use a politician like Ford again, but she wondered whether such a candidate would survive today. "He would not adhere to the same campaign tactics," she said.

That was a lesson that Ford taught Allen.

"He told me once to go back to the museum and look at all the commercials from the 1976 campaign," Allen said, referring to the Gerald R. Ford Museum in Grand Rapids. "There were no personal attacks."

Former Rep. Joe Schwarz of Battle Creek, Mich., a moderate Republican who was targeted by conservative groups in his failed bid for re-election last year, said the Ford foundation's goals are honorable and a welcome initiative. But he said he doubts change will come quickly.

When he reached across the aisle in the past two years to develop working relationships with Democrats, Schwarz said he lost points with the GOP.

"In the House, the conservatives really stick together. They have their own agenda and pursue that agenda above all else," Schwarz said. "Gerald Ford didn't look at ideas as Republican or Democrat. He took each idea ... on its merits."

Norman Ornstein, co-author of "The Broken Branch," which examined Congress, said he's "wildly enthusiastic" about the foundation's initiative and hopes to help.

"What we've had in the past few years is generally corrosive, tribal politics," he said. "Putting some resources and prestige of the foundation into socializing and educating politicians into the cost of continuing to behave this way would be wonderful."

Navy To Name Aircraft Carrier After Ford (AP)

AP, January 4, 2007

The Navy will name its next aircraft carrier USS Gerald R. Ford in honor of the president who was buried Wednesday in his home town of Grand Rapids, Mich., officials said.

The Navy had not planned to make the announcement yet, but Donald H. Rumsfeld, the former defense secretary who served in the Ford administration, divulged the news during his eulogy at the funeral.

"How fitting it would be that the name Gerald R. Ford will patrol the high seas for decades to come in defense of the nation he loved so much," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0112415

Later at the Pentagon the Navy confirmed that it would make an official announcement "in a few weeks." It said it was still working on details of the ceremony with members of the Ford family.

Ford served in the Navy during World War II.

Ford To City: OK (WSJ)

By Felix G. Rohatyn

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

NEW YORK -- The year 1975 was a difficult one for the city. A new mayor, Abe Beame, and a new governor, Hugh Carey, were elected as the economy was faltering due to a recession, an Arab oil boycott, the war in Vietnam and inflation. At the national level, Watergate and the Nixon resignation suddenly elevated Gerald Ford to the presidency.

But a crisis had been building up here for some time. The city's financial condition was deeply concerning, running a significant deficit as a result of an exodus of private sector jobs and an influx of new municipal employees. Politically New York was always a Democratic city, a union city, with a strong Republican business community and little contact between the two. Morale was bad, the city was dirty, crime was up and the economy was weak.

In April, New York and its lead underwriter, the Bankers Trust Company, was preparing its spring financing when I took a call from a broker offering to sell short-term city notes. "It is a bargain," he said, "9.5% interest, triple tax free, backed by the city's credit. How can you say no?" The terms reflected desperation more than a bargain. Sure enough, soon thereafter, Bankers Trust refused to proceed with the offering to underwrite the city's financing on the grounds that there was "insufficient assurance of repayment." Almost without anyone noticing, the markets had closed on New York.

Year after year, and with the support of the state, the city spent more than it took in. It had the choice of raising taxes, cutting spending or borrowing. Naturally the politicians chose to borrow and, in addition, characterized tens of millions of expenses as capital investments. The result was to constantly reduce the city's ability to make capital improvements while, simultaneously, increasing the debt by $1 billion annually. While the mayor had just agreed to a major pay increase for the municipal work force, no one really knew the level of the city's deficit.

By the beginning of May we had little over a month to avoid a default -- the next debt maturity of $1 billion would occur on June 18. At that point, Gov. Carey, brilliant and courageous, stepped into the picture. Since the state did not have the wherewithal to bail out the city, he and Mayor Beame turned to Washington and to President Ford for an emergency loan. Ford was a man of decency and common sense. He was also in the middle of the presidential campaign of 1976, which pushed him further to the right. His most important advisers and cabinet members were ideological conservatives, led by Treasury Secretary Bill Simon. New York was viewed as the liberal capital of the U.S. and any thought of "bailing out" the city unleashed strong opposition in Congress. Secretary Simon rejected our request and suggested we return with a plan. His idea of a plan included large increases in sales taxes and transit fares, tuition at City University and significant cutback in labor costs and benefits, conditions no Democratic governor could accept.

Gov. Carey appointed a bipartisan committee of business leaders to review the impact of a New York bankruptcy. The committee unanimously recommended against it because of its unfathomable risks and we turned to a structure which became the Municipal Assistance Corporation. The MAC was a financing mechanism, which could sell its own bonds backed by the New York sales tax and which might give the city time to bring its budget into balance. The banks and labor leadership joined in the recommendation and on June 18 the state legislature voted to create MAC. Gov. Carey immediately christened it "Big MAC" and the underwriters began selling its bonds.

Unfortunately, Mayor Beame, who had obtained significant concessions from labor in our prior negotiations, gave them all back as soon as MAC was established; the result was a collapse in the price of MAC bonds, a market loss of $100 million after the public offering and a closing of the public market for MAC bonds, as well as for city bonds. By now we knew we had to take authority for the city's finances away from the mayor if we had any hope of avoiding bankruptcy. We could only rely on the governor and, ultimately, we knew we would need federal assistance.

We created the Emergency Financial Control Board, chaired by the governor, to control the budget. With the EFCB in control of the budget and the MAC in control of the financing, the state effectively controlled the city. The unions went along even though they were kept outside these structures because they knew this was the city's only chance. They committed to investing part of their pension funds in MAC bonds while the banks extended their existing loans.

During the summer we floated a few bond issues but we knew we only had limited capabilities and that we would run out of capacity before Christmas. By the beginning of November things looked bleaker and bleaker.

In Washington we testified in front of congressional committees, facing the opposition of the president, although that opposition seemed to soften somewhat due to the weakness of the securities and the foreign exchange markets facing a New York bankruptcy. And then, on Oct. 29, Ford gave his famous "drop dead" speech. He never spoke those words; but he indicated that he would veto any legislation proposing a financial bailout -- and the meaning was quite similar. The Daily News engraved them in stone.

DOJ_NMG_0112416

At the first Western Economic Summit in France, with Ford in attendance, Fed Chairman Arthur Burns asked French President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing and German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt their opinion of the potential economic impact of a New York bankruptcy. They were direct in their answer: "It would be a catastrophe. It would cause a global dollar crisis."

Ford deserves great credit for his willingness to change his mind. On his return to Washington, he signed legislation providing credit to the city; this unlocked other pieces of the package: from the banks, the pension funds and insurance companies. It saved New York but it did not save his presidency. Jimmy Carter was elected in 1976.

In 1980 the city balanced its budget; in 1981 it re-entered the securities markets and repaid the government guarantees. Since those dark days the city's recovery was uninterrupted, except for 9/11. New York's present economic boom is ample proof that those who opposed bankruptcy were right, and that in a crisis, bipartisanship and business-labor cooperation will go a long way. One of Ford's greatest achievements may have been that he knew when he had pushed New York City to the limit and that, contrary to some of his colleagues, he also knew when to stop.

Mr. Rohatyn was chairman of New York's Municipal Assistance Corporation from 1975-1993.

While The Nation Mourned, Their Trip Continued (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

A day after the death of former president Gerald R. Ford, Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) embarked on what could be called his first official activity as the incoming Senate majority leader.

But it had nothing to do with Ford's funeral. Instead, Reid boarded a government plane bound for six days in South America, accompanied by wife Landra and five other Democratic and Republican senators and their spouses Dec. 27. Their mission: improved relations -- and New Year's in Machu Picchu.

The "Machu Men," as they were dubbed, included Reid and Sens. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), Kent Conrad (D-N.D.), Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) and Robert F. Bennett (R-Utah).

Highlighting their trip: three hours of presidential meetings and two days touring the Incan ruins in Peru.

The senators did not change course after Ford's death, figuring they would insult leaders in a region none too happy with the United States to begin with, according to a Reid aide.

"This was a critical trip," said Reid spokesman James Manley. The group was seeking "cooperation on several fronts, including trade," as shown in official meetings -- and shopping at handicrafts bazaars.

They reported first to the U.S. embassy in Bolivia, for briefings -- a crafts exhibit, lunch and bipartisan gift-giving. Reid received a replica of the hand-knit sweater President Evo Morales wore on the campaign trail. Bennett got a "multicolored, pretty silly-looking hat," according to someone who saw it.

At the presidential palace, the senators had a "long, intense conversation," with Morales, Reid told reporters afterwards.

Dec. 29, it was on to Ecuador, for nearly an hour with President-elect Rafael Correa, known for his colorful neckties and epithets. The senators agreed to support extended trade benefits for Ecuador, despite Correa's vow to kill the lease on an air base used by the United States to hunt coke smugglers.

"We respect the sovereignty of Ecuador," Reid said, before the group left to see indigenous villages, their leaders and handicrafts.

Next came New Year's Eve, and two official holidays, meaning "not paid for with government money." The group dined in Cuzco and left early on New Year's Day for sightseeing in Machu Picchu.

Tuesday, as official Washington mourned Ford, the group clocked an hour with Peruvian President Alan Garcia, then flew home. Reid and Durbin, seeking a last chance to express their grief, then scored a government jet to Michigan for Ford's burial yesterday.

The senators and their spouses, Manley pointed out, were "the most high-powered, largest delegation to visit this region in many years."

After their visit, however, Morales announced that from now on, American tourists will need visas.

In Meetings With Allies, Clinton Hones '08 Strategy (NYT)

By PATRICK HEALY And ADAM NAGOURNEY

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

The topic was the Democratic sweep in New Hampshire in November, and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton couldn't get enough of it.

DOJ_NMG_0112417

Skip to next paragraph Dining in Washington recently with three allies from New Hampshire, which has the first-in-the-nation primary, Mrs. Clinton was by turns probing and absorbing and, a participant said, clearly informed. How did the Democrats manage to unseat the state's two Republican members of Congress? What were the key issues? And who were the new players to have emerged there in the 10 years since she last visited — and since her husband, Bill Clinton, used a strong second-place finish in the New Hampshire primary to vault his way to the Democratic nomination and the White House 15 years ago?

"She's always been a student of government and of how you get there," said Patricia McMahon, one of the dinner guests, a former Clinton White House aide who is now a state representative.

This meeting was one of a series of nearly nonstop political consultations that Mrs. Clinton has engaged in — over dinner and drinks, at private offices and at her home in Washington — since Election Day, in what her advisers say are preparations for a probable announcement that she is taking the first steps into the presidential campaign.

Mrs. Clinton, the New York Democrat, was described by participants as leaving little doubt that she plans to run, without saying so directly. Depending on her audience, she appears to be either seeking information to use in campaign strategy, pressing potential supporters to hold tight and wait for her to announce, or gauging how certain issues — in particular, her initial vote for the war in Iraq — might play.

The sessions are the subject of much discussion in Democratic circles, and they seem designed in part to counter any impression that Mrs. Clinton is surrounded by an insular circle of longtime advisers and friends who are detached from many of the grassroots Democrats who have grown in influence since the last time a Clinton ran for president.

According to participants, Mrs. Clinton has pressed to find out everything from whether former Vice President Al Gore will run again (he is inclined not to, people tell her) to how much support remains for Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the party's 2004 candidate, among Democratic leaders (anemic, she has heard).

Mrs. Clinton told Democrats that she viewed her two strongest potential Democratic opponents as Senator Barack Obama of Illinois and John Edwards, the former senator from North Carolina. They said that she viewed Mr. Obama as her biggest obstacle to the nomination, but that she believed the threat of his candidacy will diminish as voters learn how inexperienced he is in government and foreign affairs.

Without mentioning Mr. Obama by name, Mrs. Clinton and her camp are already asserting that experience will be a key attribute for any successful candidate during difficult times — an argument that her team will no doubt make in a more aggressive way against Mr. Obama if they both jump into the race.

Mrs. Clinton is holding her discussions at a time of tremendous fluidity in presidential politics. The emergence of Mr. Obama, the Democratic takeover of Congress, the continued deterioration in Iraq, and the decisions by Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana and former Governor Mark Warner of Virginia not to run all have made her consultations more important and the situation she faces more complex.

According to participants, it is clear that Mrs. Clinton is far along in plotting a campaign, and she is honing strategy at the same time that she is making overtures to people in states that heavily influence the presidential nominating process. New Hampshire is expected to hold the first primary in January 2008, after caucuses in Iowa and Nevada.

Mrs. Clinton has gone to great lengths to try to keep these meetings private. She and her aides have strongly asked Democrats not to report what has taken place there, from what she says to what she eats and where (she had the lamb at Ruth's Chris, the Dover sole at the Four Seasons). Many people who discussed the meetings did so on the condition of anonymity, and some of her advisers pointedly refused to talk, including Paul Begala, the Democratic consultant who worked as a senior adviser to Mr. Clinton in the 1992 race and is close to Mrs. Clinton.

"As I tell the boys: N.H.D.: Not. Happening. Dude," Mr. Begala wrote in an e-mail, the boys a reference to his sons.

Still, several Democrats were willing to share what they described as long discussions about politics and policy with a former first lady who wants to be president.

Senator Clinton told one New Hampshire Democrat that if all things were equal, she would prefer to delay the formal start of her campaign until later this year and focus instead on notching accomplishments as a prominent member of the new Democratic majority in the Senate. At several meetings, Mrs. Clinton has wondered, with obvious exasperation, why her husband was able to delay making his presidential announcement in 1991 until October, while she is under increasing pressure to make hers earlier in the year, participants said.

"I recommended that she didn't need to jump in early, that I would like to see some progress in the Senate, and she said she felt the same way," said the Democrat, William Shaheen, who was a senior New Hampshire aide to Mr. Gore in 2000 and Mr. Kerry in 2004.

Skip to next paragraph Some of her aides said that while she is likely to announce within the next few weeks that she is creating a presidential exploratory committee, a step that would allow her to start raising money, a formal announcement might take longer. And some of the advice she has heard has been to wait.

DOJ_NMG_0112418

"Senator Clinton was clear that she'd like to focus on the Senate, but sometimes events come into it, other people start beating the drum quicker, and you can lose key people if you wait," Mr. Shaheen said.

Jeanne Shaheen, a former New Hampshire governor and Mr. Shaheen's wife, said that Mrs. Clinton had consulted her as well, and that she had asked "all the right kinds of questions."

"She clearly is thinking about what to do and not taking anything for granted," said Mrs. Shaheen, who is now the director of the Institute of Politics at Harvard. "She has a special relationship with the people in New Hampshire, from her years in the White House, and I think she was trying to get a sense of what a campaign would be like if she decides to run."

Mrs. Clinton has talked, both in person or by telephone, to influential Democrats in New Hampshire, Iowa, South Carolina and Nevada, the states that will begin the nomination process with caucuses and primaries a year from now. She has pressed Democrats to find out what campaign staff her prospective opponents like Mr. Edwards have assembled in states like Iowa. And she asked precisely where she should go in places like Iowa and New Hampshire if she, as expected, does a round of trips there after forming a presidential exploratory committee.

No detail has been too minor for Mrs. Clinton. She has asked Democrats from New Hampshire and Iowa about the concerns in certain regions and counties of their states, dwelling on energy issues, health care, education and the war in Iraq. She has asked about the influence of independent voters (they make up the biggest voting bloc in New Hampshire and can vote in the Democratic primary there). Mrs. Clinton has less experience with presidential politics in Iowa than in New Hampshire because in 1992, when her husband ran, Senator Tom Harkin of Iowa was also seeking the presidential nomination, so the rest of the candidates steered clear of that state's race.

Mrs. Clinton has not been to Iowa since the 2004 election.

The senator spent the week between Christmas and New Year's Day on vacation with her husband in the Caribbean, but her associates said Tuesday that she would return this week to working through her long call list with Democrats around the country and holding private lunches and dinners in Washington and New York.

The New Hampshire Democratic Party has invited Senator Clinton to be a keynote speaker at a major fund-raiser this winter, and officials there say they expect her to attend and are waiting to hear about a date. They say it could be anytime from late January through March.

Some New Hampshire Democrats expressed concern that Mrs. Clinton's first dinner with political players from their state, on Dec. 9, was limited to three Democrats who were active in her husband's campaigns in the 1990s and not a broader group that reflected the vanguard of state party politics today.

Terie Norelli, who became speaker of the New Hampshire House in December and the first Democratic speaker in 70 years, said she had not heard from Mrs. Clinton. "It'll only be tricky for her if she stops with those people," Ms. Norelli said. "Democratic politics has certainly changed since the 1990s, if you look at how many Democrats have been elected to the House, and the two new Democrats going to Congress. It would be wise for any candidate to move on and reach out to many of the new activists that we have."

Giuliani Leak: Attention Turns To Florida (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

Mischief in presidential politics in Florida?

The mystery thus far: Advisers to Rudolph W. Giuliani say that someone stole an aide's luggage during a political trip last fall, found a 140-page strategy notebook inside and photocopied it, then returned the luggage in some manner and gave the goods to a Giuliani opponent.

The contents of the notebook ended up splashed across The Daily News in New York on Tuesday. Not to be outdone, The New York Post reported yesterday that political operatives believed that the theft happened on a campaign trip through Florida.

While it does not prove anything per se, a spokeswoman for the governor of Florida, Charlie Crist, a Republican, confirmed yesterday that luggage from the Giuliani entourage was indeed missing during a campaign trip last fall.

"They were traveling with us, and we did find a piece of luggage, and we just worked as quickly as possible to get it back to the owner," said Erin Isaac, the spokeswoman.

Ms. Isaac said she had no information about allegations by Mr. Giuliani's office that someone, somewhere, stole and photocopied the notebook; she added that the governor's office was not conducting an inquiry into those allegations.

She said that the piece of luggage was left on a Crist plane "during the chaos of the campaign," and that nothing fishy happened with the bag when it was in their custody.

"No copies were made. The bag was found and held until we were able to return it to the owner," Ms. Isaac said.

DOJ_NMG_0112419

She said that Mr. Crist's campaign switched planes all the time last fall, and that she did not have specifics about the plane, luggage or trip involving the Giuliani contingent.

Sunny Mindel, a spokeswoman for Mr. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, issued a statement yesterday that underscored one certainty in this mystery: Mr. Giuliani, as a possible Republican candidate for president, cannot afford to alienate the Republican who is set to lead Florida through the 2008 balloting.

"We have no question that whatever happened had nothing to do with Governor Crist or his staff," said the statement from Anthony Carbonetti, a senior political adviser to Mr. Giuliani. "The mayor has the highest regard for Governor Crist."

Romney Takes Step Toward An '08 Run (NYT)

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 3 — On his last full day as governor of Massachusetts, Mitt Romney created a presidential exploratory committee Wednesday, the first formal step in a likely run for the 2008 Republican nomination.

Kate Phillips and The Times's politics staff report on the latest political news from around the nation.

More Politics News"After talking to my family, I have decided to take this initial step of forming an exploratory committee in order to raise the resources and build the campaign organization required to pursue the highest office in our country," Mr. Romney said in a statement issued in Boston.

By filing papers here, Mr. Romney became the latest in a parade of prospects who have formed such committees, a step that permits them to raise and spend money specifically on exploratory efforts.

Romney Submits Paperwork For 2008 Bid (AP)

By Glen Johnson

AP, January 4, 2007

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney took the initial step in a 2008 presidential bid, another hopeful in a crowded Republican field headlined by the party's more familiar names of John McCain and Rudy Giuliani.

The governor filed papers to create an exploratory committee just an hour before he left the Statehouse for the final time on Wednesday, concluding his one and only term in elective office. Democrat Deval Patrick will succeed Romney on Thursday.

"After talking to my family, I have decided to take this initial step of forming an exploratory committee in order to raise the resources and build the campaign organization required to pursue the highest office in our country," Romney said in a statement.

If elected, Romney would become the first Mormon president. The 59-year-old former venture capitalist is the son of former Michigan Gov. George Romney, who waged a short-lived campaign for the Republican nomination in 1968.

In opinion polls, McCain, the Arizona senator and 2000 candidate, and former New York Mayor Giuliani often share the top spot while Romney, best known for his work on the 2002 Winter Olympics, registers in single digits. But the governor has taken similar steps in pursuing the presidency, hiring staff and establishing a fundraising base a full year before the first primary votes are cast.

"Given his pedigree," said Richard Bond, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee and declared backer of McCain, "he is a serious candidate."

Other Republican candidates include Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback and former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson, who have established exploratory committees. California Rep. Duncan Hunter and former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore have said they intend to follow suit. Others said to be mulling a bid include Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, New York Gov. George Pataki, Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel, and former Oklahoma Gov. Frank Keating.

In recent weeks, Romney has faced questions about his conservative credentials on issues such as gay rights and abortion. Romney challenged Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy in 1994, and in a letter he promised a gay Republican group he would be a stronger advocate for gays than his rival.

Romney ran as a moderate during his gubernatorial campaign. Despite saying he personally opposed abortion, he not only pledged to leave the state's abortion laws intact, but noted his mother, Lenore, ran for U.S. Senate in Michigan in 1970 as a supporter of abortion rights.

He now stresses his opposition to abortion in speeches across the country.

In 2002, Romney's supporters also handed out fliers with well wishes from him and his running mate at Boston's annual Gay Pride Parade. And he was endorsed by the Log Cabin Republicans, a group of gay party activists.

Nonetheless, Romney has insisted his opposition to gay marriage has been unflinching. He has lambasted the Supreme Judicial Court for its November 2003 decision making Massachusetts the first state to legalize gay marriage.

DOJ_NMG_0112420

"While Mitt Romney says he's not a multiple-choice candidate, his record shows that he has routinely changed his position on everything from abortion to taxes, making it difficult to know where he stands," said Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Stacie Paxton.

Willard Mitt Romney received his B.A. in 1971 from Brigham Young University, where he was class valedictorian, and then went on to simultaneously earn degrees from Harvard Business and Law schools, graduating cum laude from law school and in the top 5 percent of his business school class.

The Michigan native remained in Boston, where he helped found a multibillion-dollar venture capital firm, Bain Capital, and amassed a multimillion-dollar fortune funding such companies as Staples, the office-supply giant.

His only major failure was an unsuccessful campaign in 1994 against Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass. Romney rebounded politically in 2002, when he won the governor's office.

Romney sought and won the chairmanship of the Republican Governors Association, which allowed him to spend the 2006 midterm elections traveling the country and dispensing cash to his party's gubernatorial candidates.

He raised a record $20 million and was especially generous with RGA money in early presidential states like Iowa, Florida and his native Michigan.

Romney Takes 1st Step For Presidential Bid (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — Leaving one political office with his eyes on another, Mitt Romney took the first formal step Wednesday into the race for the Republican presidential nomination on his last full day as governor of Massachusetts.

While not yet declaring his candidacy, Romney filed papers with the Federal Election Commission setting up a presidential exploratory committee, a step that allows him to raise and spend money in the initial pursuit of the party's 2008 nomination.

The one-term governor is positioning himself as a conservative alternative to Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. McCain and Giuliani formed exploratory committees late last year.

Romney has established support teams in some of the small states that have played an important role in selecting presidential nominees, going head-to-head with McCain in the early effort to line up effective organizations in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

"He has been extremely aggressive," said Tobe Berkovitz, a longtime political consultant who is now associate dean at Boston University's school of communications. "He's gotten himself in position to break into the top tier."

Romney, who ran unsuccessfully for the Senate against Sen. Edward M. Kennedy in 1994, is already facing accusations that he has shifted positions on several social issues, such as gay rights. He opposes same-sex marriage after having sought to position himself in the 1994 campaign as a stronger supporter of "full equality for America's gay and lesbian citizens" than Kennedy.

The Democratic National Committee on Wednesday challenged Romney over his past statements on abortion. In 1994, the Democrats contend, Romney said: "I believe that abortion should be safe and legal." Last February, Romney said, according to the Democrats: "I've never used either title, pro-life or pro-choice, in the past. I said I don't favor abortion."

In October, he said: "I call myself firmly pro-life."

His position on such hot-button social issues, Berkovitz said, "could be his Achilles' heel with Republican activists."

Romney's communications director, Kevin Madden, said: "If the DNC is after us, we must be doing something right."

Romney, 59, would be the first president to be a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter--day Saints, if elected.

In a Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll in June, 37% of those surveyed said they did not think they could vote for a Mormon for the presidency — a challenge Romney's father, Gov. George Romney of Michigan, faced in 1968 when he ran for the Republican presidential nomination.

Ron Kaufman, a longtime political advisor to the family of President Bush and a member of the Republican National Committee from Massachusetts who is assisting Romney, said religion would not matter to voters in 2008.

"People are going to want someone who is a moral, ethical person," he said, adding that Romney "governed a very, very blue state as a conservative."

Romney plans to hold a daylong fundraising effort on Monday, summoning supporters to phone banks at Boston's waterfront convention center.

Announcing the formation of the campaign exploration organization, he told reporters in Boston: "I have a feeling we are going to be pretty busy. We have filed exploratory papers today. So, the process is moving forward on that front."

Governor Romney Will Form Presidential Exploratory Committee (BLOOM)

By Heidi Przybyla
Bloomberg, January 4, 2007

Jan. 3 (Bloomberg) -- Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney will take his first formal step toward a presidential run later today by filing papers to form an exploratory committee, a senior aide said.

The registration with the Federal Election Commission will allow the Republican governor to raise and spend money for a likely presidential campaign, the aide said, requesting anonymity because Romney hasn't yet made an official announcement about the exploratory committee. Romney leaves office tomorrow after deciding not to seek a second term.

In the past year Romney, 59, has moved closer to the front of the Republican field, aided by a signature health care bill in Massachusetts and the withdrawal of two high-profile rivals from contention for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, outgoing Senators George Allen of Virginia and Bill Frist of Tennessee.

Romney plans to make an official announcement about his presidential campaign later this year. For now he'll focus on traveling the country raising money and gauging support for his likely run, according to the aide. Polls show he trails both Senator John McCain and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, both of whom have formed exploratory committees.

A Dec. 11-14 Gallup poll found McCain and Giuliani are tied for first place, each with 28 percent of the vote. Romney comes in fifth, with four percent, behind Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

Romney is a former chairman of Boston-based management- consulting firm Bain & Co. He also oversaw the 2002 Salt Lake City Winter Olympics Games before running for governor. He lost a 1994 campaign to unseat Democratic Senator Edward Kennedy.

Romney Files For '08 Campaign (DN)

By Gordon Trowbridge
Detroit News, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, the son of a Michigan governor, kicked off his 2008 presidential campaign Wednesday, filing documents with the Federal Election Commission that allow his fledgling campaign to make and spend money.

The filing is an all-but-final declaration of a run by Romney, who as the son of Gov. George Romney grew up in Bloomfield Hills before moving on to financial and political success in Massachusetts. He becomes the closest thing to a favorite-son presidential candidate for Michigan since his father's unsuccessful 1968 bid for the GOP nomination.

Romney has made regular trips to Michigan in the past year, campaigning for state Republicans and building political connections. He has signed up big Michigan names such as state Attorney General Mike Cox and Oakland County Executive Brooks Patterson, as well as a number of big donors to President Bush in the state. There was even talk for much of last year that he would base his presidential campaign in Oakland County.

But in Michigan and across the country, he faces a substantial obstacle: Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

"Last time around, McCain was very popular in Michigan," said Philip Abbot, a political scientist at Wayne State University, who noted McCain's victory in Michigan's 2000 presidential primary. Since then, McCain has built his own formidable Michigan operation.

Former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani also has spent plenty of time campaigning for GOP candidates in the state.

Romney Forms Presidential Committee, Focuses On Fundraising (WP)

By Dan Balz
The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

Outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a successful businessman from a prominent Michigan Republican family, joined the 2008 sweepstakes yesterday, formally establishing a presidential committee and turning his attention to the substantial fundraising and organizational demands of a national campaign.

On a day he participated in a ritualistic walk from the statehouse that symbolically marked the end of his single term as governor of one of the most liberal states in the union, Romney set his sights on winning his party's presidential nomination against such nationally known opponents as Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

Romney's filing, delayed for a day out of respect for the national day of mourning for former president Gerald R. Ford, set up what is called a presidential exploratory committee, but the time for exploring ended for Romney some time ago. Along with McCain, Romney has been aggressively building a national network for months, particularly in Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Michigan -- all states with early caucuses or primaries next year.

DOJ_NMG_0112422

With a new headquarters open for business in Boston, Romney plans to move into full-scale campaign activity immediately. He will speak to a group of Southern conservatives this weekend in Georgia and will host a major fundraising event in Boston Monday. A formal announcement of his candidacy will come later, aides said.

Romney trails far behind McCain and Giuliani in national polls, which at this stage often reflect the best name recognition. Republican strategists see the little-known Romney as a potentially formidable candidate whose stage presence, discipline and communications skills will help offset his limited experience as an elected official.

Romney, 59, is the son of the late George Romney, who was governor of Michigan from 1963 to 1969 and who unsuccessfully sought the Republican presidential nomination in 1968. Mitt Romney is a graduate of Harvard Law School and Harvard Business School and served as chief executive of Bain & Co. Inc., a management consulting firm, and later founded Bain Capital, a venture capital firm.

In 1999, Romney was called in to salvage the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City after the organizing committee's scandals and financial problems threatened the Games' success. He turned around the operation, eliminated a huge deficit and helped to stage what were ultimately highly successful Games.

His first try in politics ended in failure. He ran for the Senate in 1994 against a Massachusetts icon, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D), losing by 17 percentage points but establishing himself as an effective campaigner.

The echoes of that race could affect his bid for the Republican nomination in 2008. He said then that he would be a more effective advocate for gay rights than Kennedy was, and he defended Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion, while declaring himself personally opposed to abortion.

Romney has since said that his views on abortion have changed dramatically -- he now favors overturning Roe-- and he has become a leading opponent of same-sex marriage. Critics say he has shifted positions to make himself more acceptable to social and religious conservatives. His advisers say that his conversion on abortion is genuine and that, although he is vocal on the issue of same-sex marriage, he still opposes discrimination against gays.

Romney is a Mormon and has played leadership roles in his church. His religion could provide an obstacle to his success in GOP primaries and caucuses, given reservations about the Mormon church among many evangelicals. Recent polling by The Washington Post and ABC News showed that one in three Americans said they are less likely to support a Mormon presidential candidate.

Romney Exits With Pomp, Ambition (BOS)

By Andrea Estes And Scott Helman

The Boston Globe, January 4, 2007

Governor Mitt Romney took the ceremonial "lone walk" out of the State House and into the 2008 presidential race yesterday, concluding his final day as governor by filing papers to set up an exploratory committee for a campaign for president.

The one-term governor turned over symbolic gifts to incoming governor Deval Patrick, then joined his wife, Ann, on a red-carpeted walk down the 31 State House steps, where about 200 supporters cheered and cannons fired a 19-gun salute.

As Romney was wrapping up his State House duties, his campaign operatives were filing papers with the Federal Election Commission, allowing Romney to start raising money for his White House campaign. They set up a committee and launched a new website, www.MittRomney.com.

The filing begins a march toward next year's primaries, joining a Republican field that includes Senator John McCain of Arizona and former mayor Rudy Giuliani of New York City.

Today, Romney is to address the media from his new presidential campaign headquarters in the North End. He is not expected to join Patrick at his inauguration.

Romney this weekend is to head to Georgia for a gathering of southern conservatives, and on Monday hold a major fund-raiser for his presidential campaign at the South Boston convention center.

Though the first presidential primary is more than a year away, a major test of Romney's viability will be how much money he can raise. Because there are federal contribution limits of $2,100 per person, Romney can no longer rely on a relatively small group of large contributors. His challenge now is to raise small donations from many contributors, and his fund-raisers have already been busy courting Republican players to help him do that.

Through his Commonwealth Political Action Committee, which he set up in 2004 to support Republican candidates around the country, Romney raised $8.8 million by November.

Romney's departure from the State House, which took about 25 minutes, came one day earlier than the end of his four-year term of office. If he had left the building today, as has been the tradition, he would have been forced to walk through crowds of Patrick supporters gathered for the new governor's unusual outdoor inauguration. By staging the lone walk a day early, the governor commanded the spotlight, following a schedule that had been scripted down to the second.

DOJ_NMG_0112423

Romney, who yesterday called being governor "a great job," turned over the symbols of office to Patrick at around 5 p.m. inside the governor's office. As photographers snapped pictures, Romney described the gifts -- a pewter key to the governor's office door; a Bible left by Governor Benjamin Butler when he left office in 1884, a gavel and a copy of the Massachusetts General Laws inscribed by each governor with a note to his or her successor.

Romney read aloud his inscription to Patrick. "Transmitted to Governor Patrick and the People of Massachusetts," said Romney. "To serve another person is an honor. To serve a great people has been a great honor. To help another person is rewarding. To help many thousands of people has been immeasurably rewarding. Each of those who has served and helped others these last four years, has spent them self in a great work, and so leaves a far richer person. May God continue to bless the people of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts."

"Thank you so much," Patrick said. "Thank you for your service."

The two men left the office -- Romney to begin his walk out of the State House and Patrick to attend an inaugural event in Worcester.

After walking out of the governor's office, Romney made a series of stops, greeting people who he said symbolized achievements of his administration. He met with the family of Melanie Powell of Marshfield, who was killed by a drunk driver, and in whose memory the state's drunken driving bill was enacted in 2005. He also met with a family that lost their home in Hurricane Katrina, two families who couldn't afford medical care before the state's new healthcare law was passed, and with members of the National Guard. He also greeted a group of students who received new scholarships to state colleges because of their high MCAS scores.

He also shook hands with Lieutenant Governor Kerry Healey, who was defeated by Patrick in the November election.

Several minutes ahead of schedule, Romney and his wife emerged from the center doors of the State House. They paused halfway down the steps, bathed in light, for the cannon salute. When they reached the street, they shook hands with supporters who lined both sides of Beacon Street. The crowd applauded; supporters took photos of the couple with their cellphones.

One of the first to say goodbye was Kris Mineau, president of the Massachusetts Family Institute, who stood at the front of the crowd. He has worked closely with Romney on a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage intended for the 2008 ballot.

Two hecklers followed Romney through Boston Common to a waiting car, one of them shouting "You're a hateful man." A supporter tried to drown the hecklers out, shouting, "There's our next president."

Though technically still governor until Patrick is sworn in today, Romney completed his final work day yesterday. After swearing in the Legislature, Romney signed a few dozen bills, including one that allows racetracks to continue simulcasting and another that overhauls rules for teenage drivers. He failed to sign a bill increasing the pay of the Boston Licensing Board, but OK'd a 4.8 percent payraise for state lawmakers over two years.

Though he just took the first formal step toward a presidential run, Romney has made it clear for the past two years that he was seriously considering getting into the race. His frequent out-of-state travel and jokes about Massachusetts' liberal reputation has irked some political leaders, both Democrats and Republicans, who have accused him of ignoring the job he was elected to do in 2002.

"I think once voters in other states understand what happened under Mitt Romney's leadership in Massachusetts, they will recoil from the notion that he should lead the country," said Philip Johnston, chairman of the state Democratic Party.

Yesterday's paperwork was filed by Benjamin Ginsberg, a prominent Republican lawyer, who will serve as Romney's national counsel. Romney has spent months signing up political talent in preparation for his run.

On Monday, Romney is to host a fund-raiser at the Boston Convention & Exhibition Center in South Boston. Supporters and activists working for Romney around the country are to gather to raise money and begin to plot out a campaign strategy. The event is to run from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. A call center is to be set up for the day, where volunteers will raise money.

Mitt's Maximum Exposure: '08 Contender Makes Most Of Exit (BOSH)

By Casey Ross

Boston Herald, January 4, 2007

Gov. Mitt Romney last night turned the traditional "long walk" out of the State House into a tightly scripted tribute to himself and his administration, crafted with an eye to the 2008 race for president he officially entered yesterday.

Stopping along the way to talk to groups of well-wishers selected to represent his administration's achievements, Romney left the State House at about 5 p.m. and entered a crowded presidential field where he faces tough competition, questions about his Mormonism and inevitable attacks on his record in Massachusetts.

Romney's self-celebratory walk-off drew hoots from political adversaries.

DOJ_NMG_0112424

"What's going to follow him (on the presidential trail) is a litany of broken promises," Democratic strategist Mary Anne Marsh said. "He was supposed to be traveling the country and bringing us jobs. Instead, he was traveling the country and making jokes about Massachusetts."

Kevin Madden, spokesman for Romney's campaign, shot back, "Any time the Democrats are attacking Gov. Romney, it shows two things: First, they're terrified of his prospective candidacy; and second . . . you must be doing something right."

About an hour before Romney left the State House, he filed paperwork establishing an exploratory committee that allows him to raise money for his 2008 presidential bid.

Romney, who was out of state much of the last year, also signed several bills into law yesterday, including a teen safe-driving bill. But he failed to take action on several others that now must start over in the Legislature.

Among the unsigned bills were proposals to expand patient confidentiality protection and increase salaries for the Boston Licensing Commission.

An aide said Romney did not have enough time to scrutinize the bills piled on his desk by the Legislature. "There simply was not enough time left in the session to adequately review each and every piece of legislation," Romney spokesman Eric Fehrnstrom said.

During a brief ceremony with Gov.-elect Deval Patrick, Romney said he was honored to have served as governor. He then handed over the symbols of office to Patrick, including a set of the General Laws that bears a personal inscription from each governor.

Romney's inscription to Patrick reads, in part: "To serve another person is an honor, to serve a great people has been a great honor . . . Each of those who has served and helped others these last four years, has spent themself in a great work, and so leaves a far richer person."

Romney's red-carpeted exit ended unceremoniously, with a heckler holding a sign reading "Go to hell, Mitt!" The heckler yelled, "You're filthy scum!" as the governor ducked into a waiting car with his wife.

Romney campaign officials said he'll start building his exploratory committee today in his new North End office. Romney yesterday launched a campaign Web site - www.MittRomney.com - immediately after he filed paperwork with the Federal Election Commission. [continue]

Gov. Seeks To Guarantee Health Insurance For All Calif. Kids (LAT)

By Jordan Rau

The Los Angeles Times, January 4, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger will propose that all Californian children, including those of undocumented immigrants, be guaranteed medical insurance as part of the health-care overhaul he intends to unveil next week, according to officials familiar with the plan.

If enacted by the Legislature, his proposal would affect about 763,000 children who currently lack insurance. While the administration has not revealed details of how it would pay for such a program, officials estimate that extending insurance to all children could cost the state as much as $400 million a year.

That would be a small piece of Schwarzenegger's stated goal: to ensure medical coverage for all of the 6.5 million Californians who now have none. Experts say that could cost upward of $10 billion a year.If successful, the governor's effort to cover all children would be a substantial political feat. Only a handful of other states guarantee coverage for all those under 18. Schwarzenegger himself vetoed a measure to cover all children in 2005, complaining that lawmakers offered no way to pay for it.

California's Republican legislators, who blocked a more modest effort to extend health care coverage last year, are sure to rebel against a plan that includes children of illegal immigrants.

Schwarzenegger is scheduled to announce his full health plan Monday. His office is still finalizing many parts of that package, but aides have made clear that it will be an ambitious effort to restrain health care costs and reduce the state's uninsured population.

All sectors of the health care industry, including hospitals, insurers, doctors, patients, businesses and government, would pay some of the costs under Schwarzenegger's plan. People familiar with the proposal say it includes new requirements for businesses to cover employees, though the details were unclear. The more cost employers and workers shouldered, the less the state would have to spend.

In addition, a number of measures favored by some aides, such as limiting the profits of insurers, remain undecided.

"There is no final health plan," said Adam Mendelsohn, Schwarzenegger's communications director. "As has been the case from the start, all ideas are on the table and the final touches are being applied. The administration is not confirming the inclusion of any one piece."

DOJ_NMG_0112425

But several independent sources said Schwarzenegger has committed to the framework of the children's insurance portion. Administration officials have privately told people outside government that they intend to guarantee medical coverage for children of families earning up to 300 percent of the poverty level, or $60,000 a year for a family of four. Those families have 90 percent of the children without insurance, but the cutoff is not yet set in stone.

Schwarzenegger's proposal goes further than one put forward last month by Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata, D-Oakland, which excluded illegal immigrants. Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez, D-Los Angeles, incorporated children of undocumented residents into his plan, which was also announced in December.

"A lot of us are really looking to (Schwarzenegger) for leadership," said Wendy Lazarus, founder of the Children's Partnership, a nonpartisan child advocacy group based in Santa Monica and Washington, D.C. "Assuming he is going to tell us that he is going to cover all kids, this is great news for California's kids."

About 90 percent of California's children already have insurance, either through their parents' coverage or through state Medi-Cal programs that help the impoverished. For years, advocates have been pressing lawmakers to finish the job, arguing that the electorate would be particularly sympathetic to the plight of children.

"It's the low-hanging fruit of the health-care reform debate," said Dr. Bob Ross, president of the California Endowment, a private foundation in Los Angeles created to push for expanded access to health care.

"Kids are relatively cheaper to cover" than adults, he said. "From a public health standpoint, it's smarter to cover all children regardless of immigration. You just don't want unimmunized kids surfing around in the population."

Such arguments have yet to win the day in Sacramento. Last year, Schwarzenegger backed a budget plan that would have helped fund local children's initiatives. Republican lawmakers blocked the proposal, because it would have included coverage for children of illegal immigrants.

"We believe Californians do not want to reward illegal behavior," said the Assembly Republican leader, Mike Villines of Clovis. "There are so many here (legally) who are hurting and trying to make ends meet, we've got to focus on them first."

The GOP is a minority in both houses of the Legislature, but most proposals involving state spending require a two-thirds vote, giving Republicans the power to stop them. However, it is possible that Schwarzenegger's plan could be molded to need a simple majority vote, like the last major piece of health care legislation to become law.

That measure, a 2003 mandate that most employers provide insurance for their workers, was repealed by the voters the following year.

Schwarzenegger has previously taken incremental steps to expand existing programs aimed at children's health, including the addition of $80 million to the state budget last year.

Martha Escutia, a former Democratic state senator from Whittier who pressed for coverage of all children including those of illegal immigrants, said Schwarzenegger told her in 2004 that he agreed with her.

"I said very bluntly that there was no way we could distinguish between children based on legal status," she recalled Wednesday. "And the governor agreed. He said, 'Children are children.' I remember him saying that very clearly."

Sixty-nine percent of Californian children without health insurance in 2005 were eligible for existing programs but were not enrolled, according to the UCLA Center for Health Policy Research. That was due to a variety of factors, including inadequate funds in some country programs to cover all those who qualified, and some of the bureaucratic requirements for entering state programs.

Many parents, for instance, are required to prove that their earnings are low enough to qualify their children.

There is disagreement about how many of the uninsured children are from undocumented families. A 2003 UCLA survey said that 33 percent were not citizens, but that does not mean they were in the country illegally. Ross, of the California Endowment, said the number was below 15 percent.

Most of the other states that already guarantee coverage for all children do it through state-paid programs for those from poor families, and by allowing better-off families to cover their children by paying a portion of the costs for the same programs.

Typically, the more a family earns, the more it pays. Connecticut, Illinois, Maine, Maryland, New Hampshire, New Jersey and Vermont all have such programs.

Lazarus, of the Children's Partnership, said that while California would not be the first to cover all children, it has fewer employers providing insurance and more illegal immigrants than other states, making coverage more challenging.

"For California to step up at this time when states and Congress are really focused on health care reform means that California could have a really significant leadership role across the nation," she said.

Online Database Opens A Window For Parents To Compare Schools (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, January 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112426

Want to know how early your son's second-grade teacher has to arrive at school each morning? Whether she hands in lesson plans each week?

Whether she's allowed to spank your son?

A website by the National Council on Teacher Quality (www.nctq.org/cb), scheduled to launch today, promises to shine a light on teachers' working conditions. It gathers the minutiae of union collective-bargaining agreements and state policies for the nation's 50 largest school districts into a consumer-friendly database that allows anyone to compare districts. Together, the 50 districts educate 8 million children — about one in six public school children in the USA — and employ nearly half a million teachers.

The council, a Washington-based research group, hopes to expand the database by year's end to include the top 100 districts.

Director Kate Walsh says the site will help parents, policymakers, journalists and others understand how teacher contracts work by giving them access to largely unfiltered information about teachers' workdays, salaries, benefits and more.

"None of us benefits from having our heads in the sand," she says.

Want to find out how many days teachers in Duval County, Fla., work without students in the building? It comes out to 18. In New York City, it's 5.5. In Albuquerque, zero.

Teachers unions say the data could be misinterpreted — unions often agree to contract provisions to comply with local or state regulations, or contracts are hard to compare for other reasons, says Edward McElroy, president of the American Federation of Teachers.

"It is important for the public to realize that labor relations are far more complex than what this database captures," McElroy says. "This is just one layer of a three-dimensional onion."

Bill Raabe, director of collective bargaining and member advocacy for the National Education Association, the USA's largest teachers union, says he's concerned that users could draw "erroneous conclusions" from what they read — for instance, if a contract is silent on class size, it doesn't mean that the union didn't address it. The issue could simply be dealt with by state law.

"The contract is really just a piece of the picture," he says.

In the end, the new database could aid teachers in a few districts during their next round of contract talks: What better way to show they're getting a raw deal, comparatively speaking?

"It's a whole field that's largely unexplored," Walsh says.

The contracts are public documents, but they're not always accessible, says Andrew Rotherham, co-editor of the 2006 book Collective Bargaining in Education.

He says he was "stunned" at the lack of information available in most districts. Walsh's database, he adds, "moves you past the sort of anecdotes" that typically frame teacher issues.

"This transparency is good for everyone."

The Right Minimum Wage (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

A federal minimum wage is an idea whose time came in 1938, when public confidence in markets was at a nadir and the federal government's confidence in itself was at an apogee. This, in spite of the fact that with 19 percent unemployment and the economy contracting by 6.2 percent in 1938, the New Deal's frenetic attempts had failed to end, and perhaps had prolonged, the Depression.

Today, raising the federal minimum wage is a bad idea whose time has come, for two reasons, the first of which is that some Democrats have an evidently incurable disease -- New Deal Nostalgia. Witness Nancy Pelosi's "100 hours" agenda, a genuflection to FDR's 100 Days. Perhaps this nostalgia resonates with the 5 percent of Americans who remember the 1930s.

Second, President Bush has endorsed raising the hourly minimum from $5.15 to $7.25 by the spring of 2009. The Democratic Congress will favor that, and he may reason that vetoing this minor episode of moral grandstanding would not be worth the predictable uproar -- Washington uproar often is inversely proportional to the importance of the occasion for it. Besides, there would be something disproportionate about the president vetoing this feel-good bit of legislative fluff after not vetoing the absurdly expensive 2002 farm bill, or the 2005 highway bill larded with 6,371 earmarks or the anti-constitutional McCain-Feingold speech-rationing bill.

Democrats consider the minimum-wage increase a signature issue. So, consider what it says about them:

Most of the working poor earn more than the minimum wage, and most of the 0.6 percent (479,000 in 2005) of America's wage workers earning the minimum wage are not poor. Only one in five workers earning the federal minimum lives in families with earnings below the poverty line. Sixty percent work part time, and their average household income is well over $40,000. (The average and median household incomes are $63,344 and $46,326, respectively.)

DOJ_NMG_0112427

Forty percent of American workers are salaried. Of the 75.6 million paid by the hour, 1.9 million earn the federal minimum or less, and of these, more than half are under 25 and more than a quarter are between ages 16 and 19. Many are students or other part-time workers. Sixty percent of those earning the federal minimum or less work in restaurants and bars and earn tips -- often untaxed, perhaps -- in addition to wages. Two-thirds of those earning the federal minimum today will, a year from now, have been promoted and be earning 10 percent more. Raising the minimum wage predictably makes work more attractive relative to school for some teenagers and raises the dropout rate. Two scholars report that in states that allow people to leave school before 18, a 10 percent increase in the state minimum wage caused teenage school enrollment to drop 2 percent.

The federal minimum wage has not been raised since 1997, so 29 states with 70 percent of the nation's workforce have set minimum wages between $6.15 and $7.93 an hour. Because aging liberals, clinging to the moral clarities of their youth, also have Sixties Nostalgia, they are suspicious of states' rights. But regarding minimum wages, many have become Brandeisians, invoking Justice Louis Brandeis's thought about states being laboratories of democracy.

But wait. Ronald Blackwell, the AFL-CIO's chief economist, tells the New York Times that state minimum-wage differences entice companies to shift jobs to lower-wage states. So: States' rights are bad, after all, at least concerning -- let's use liberalism's highest encomium -- diversity of economic policies.

The problem is that demand for almost everything is elastic: When the price of something goes up, demand for it goes down. Obviously were the minimum wage to jump to, say, $15 an hour, that would cause significant unemployment among persons just reaching for the bottom rung of the ladder of upward mobility. But suppose those scholars are correct who say that when the minimum wage is low and is increased slowly -- proposed legislation would take it to $7.25 in three steps -- the negative impact on employment is negligible. Still, because there are large differences among states' costs of living and the nature of their economies, Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) sensibly suggests that each state be allowed to set a lower minimum.

But the minimum wage should be the same everywhere: $0. Labor is a commodity; governments make messes when they decree commodities' prices. Washington, which has its hands full delivering the mail and defending the shores, should let the market do well what Washington does poorly. But that is a good idea whose time will never come again.

U.S. Patrols Somalia For Terrorist Watch (AP)

By George Gedda

AP, January 4, 2007

U.S. Navy vessels are deployed off the coast of Somalia to make sure al-Qaida or allied jihadists don't escape the country by sea now that the once-dominant Islamist forces there are in retreat, the State Department said Wednesday.

Of particular concern is the fate of three al-Qaida militants who were believed by U.S. officials to be under the protection of the Islamic Courts Union in Mogadishu until Ethiopian forces drove the Courts from power in recent days.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the missions off the coast are being carried out by a U.S. task force based in the Horn of Africa,

The al-Qaida militants are believed to have had a role in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, and in the 2002 bombing of a hotel in Kenya.

Kenya sent extra troops to its border with Somalia on Wednesday to keep Islamic militants from entering the country

McCormack said the administration is planning to provide food to Somalia, adding that U.S. officials will take part in a donors conference soon to determine further needs and how they can be met.

Also planned is a meeting of U.S., European and African countries, along with international institutions on Friday in Kenya for a discussion of humanitarian and security issues.

McCormack said the United States continues to support the creation of an all-Africa force to help out the transitional government as it seeks to consolidate its authority in Mogadishu. Until the Islamic Courts were forced out, the government had been confined to the western town of Baidoa, unable to assert its authority nationwide despite U.N. and United States backing.

The U.S. efforts on the humanitarian and peacekeeping fronts are part of an overall international initiative "to move Somalia out of the category of a failed state," McCormack said.

The spokesman stopped short of an outright endorsement of the Ethiopian attack but said it was apparent that the Islamic Courts had fallen under the control "of those that had links to al-Qaida and other terrorist groups."

These groups, he said, "quite clearly were interested in imposing draconian types of interpretations" of Islamic law on Somalia in contravention of the polices of the transitional government.

Before Ethiopian troops launched their offensive last week, "we certainly would have hoped that there could have been a negotiated, political dialogue," McCormack said.

DOJ_NMG_0112428

"But it became apparent over time, and certainly very apparent in the recent weeks, that that wasn't going to happen and that the Islamic Courts were intent upon trying to seize control over all of Somalia through use of arms," he said.

US Seeks Return To Mogadishu (FT)

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

The US is seeking to re-establish a presence in Mogadishu, capital of Somalia, after an absence of 12 years following the ousting of Islamist forces this week by Ethiopian-backed Somali allies.

Jendayi Frazer, assistant secretary of state, hopes to include Mogadishu in a tour that began on Wednesday with the aim of shoring up Somalia's transitional government with multinational African forces and US humanitarian aid.

A US official confirmed that if the visit went ahead, Ms Frazer would be the most senior US official to set foot in Somalia since before the 1993 battle against a Mogadishu warlord that cost the lives of 19 American servicemen in one day and precipitated the US withdrawal in 1994.

The Bush administration tacitly supported Ethiopia's intervention last month but now fears Meles Zenawi, the prime minister, will pull out his forces before Somalia is stabilised. Ms Frazer is expected to meet Mr Meles and Yoweri Museveni, the Ugandan president, in Addis Ababa, and co-host an international meeting on Somalia in Nairobi tomorrow.

The US sees Uganda playing a key role in an African stabilisation force in Somalia. So far only Uganda and Nigeria have indicated willingness to participate.

Ms Frazer last month accused the Islamic Courts Union, which had seized power in Mogadishu from US-backed warlords in June, of being under the control of "East Africa al-Qaeda cells".

US warships are patrolling the Somali coast to prevent the escape of al-Qaeda suspects.

A Kenyan official said refugees were being allowed across the border under tight security but the frontier was otherwise closed. Somali and Ethiopian troops pursued Islamist fighters in the south of the country.

A visible US presence in Mogadishu would represent at least a symbolically important moment of progress for the Bush administration in a widening region of conflict and proxy wars that have involved Somalia, Ethiopia, Eritrea, parts of Sudan, and the Central African Republic.

But there are concerns in the administration and among its critics that the US will be seen in the Muslim world to be waging another proxy war against Islamist adversaries.

Officials at a European Union meeting in Brussels urged Somalia's transitional government to negotiate with opposition forces to pave the way for a peacekeeping force. John Sawers, a UK official, said: "It is important we create the conditions whereby Ethiopia can withdraw." But he said it was unlikely a pull-out would be possible within the two weeks suggested by Mr Meles.

Reporting by Guy Dinmore in Washington, Andrew England in Cairo, Andrew Bounds in Brussels and Mark Turner at the United Nations

Kenya Closes Border But Denies Turning Back Refugees (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

BAIDOA, Somalia, Jan. 3 — Kenyan officials announced Wednesday that they were closing their northern border because of the conflict in Somalia, but denied that they had turned back hundreds of refugees.

For the past few days, Ethiopian-led forces have been hunting down the remnants of Somalia's once powerful Islamist movement, pushing fighters steadily south toward the Kenyan border. Ethiopian officials have said the Islamist fighters are headed to a remote jungle outpost called Ras Kamboni, which terrorism suspects have used before as a hide-out.

It now seems that Somalia's problems have sucked in yet another country, and with the final throes of the conflict on their doorstep, Kenyan officials said they had no choice but to act.

"We needed to close the border so we could closely vet all refugees," said Alfred N. Mutua, a spokesman for the Kenyan government.

But Mr. Mutua denied news reports and accusations from United Nations officials that Kenyan border guards had deported 600 Somalis seeking asylum, saying that the closing applied only to cross-border trade and nonrefugee traffic, to prevent the Islamists from slipping into the country.

United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees António Guterres told Agence France-Presse on Wednesday that Kenya "has a humanitarian obligation to allow civilians at risk to seek asylum on its territory."

DOJ_NMG_0112429

Mr. Mutua said that 10 foreign Islamist fighters were caught Monday trying to cross the border in a throng of refugees. The fighters were carrying briefcases packed with cash. Kenyan officials said they probably had been financiers of Somalia's Islamist movement, which was routed last week by Ethiopian soldiers supporting Somalia's transitional government.

As hundreds of Somalis continue to line up at the border each day, hoping for asylum, Kenya has buttressed its patrols with extra troops and helicopters. Residents on the Kenyan side of the border have reported skirmishes in Kenya, but Mr. Mutua said that was not the case.

"We're just trying to make sure none of the problems from Somalia spill across the border, and so far none has," he said.

In Mogadishu, Somalia's battle-scarred capital, several weapons were collected Wednesday in the transitional government's drive to disarm one of the most heavily armed citizenries in the world. On Monday, Ali Mohammed Gedi, the transitional prime minister, issued one of his first edicts, demanding that Somali warlords and gunmen turn in their military-grade weapons by Thursday. If they did not, he said, homes would be searched.

Elders from one of Mogadishu's more powerful subclans turned over a pickup truck equipped with an antiaircraft gun and 20 young fighters. Transitional government officials said the weapons and men would be folded into Somalia's new national army.

Meanwhile, Islamist leaders continued to insist that they had not been defeated.

"I cannot say where we are, but we are in Somalia and we are not afraid anymore," Abdulrahim Ali Modei, the Islamists' spokesman, said Wednesday in a telephone call to a Somali radio station.

Iran's President Promises More Nuclear Fuel And A Celebration (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

TEHRAN, Jan. 3 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad warned Wednesday that Iran would not back down from its nuclear ambitions and said his country would soon start producing nuclear fuel on an industrial scale.

"Iran has the fuel cycle, and very soon we will push the button on nuclear fuel production for industrial uses," Mr. Ahmadinejad said in a speech in the southern city of Ghotvand in Khuzestan Province, according to the ISNA news agency.

The United Nations Security Council passed a resolution late last month banning the trade of goods and technology that could benefit Iran's uranium enrichment, reprocessing and ballistic missile systems. Enriched uranium can be used for making nuclear weapons or as fuel for nuclear plants.

The resolution gave Iran a two-month deadline to suspend its enrichment program, but Iran says that it has the right to enrich uranium as a member of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

"The Iranian people will not retreat one iota from their rights," Mr. Ahmadinejad vowed Wednesday, adding that Iran would celebrate its nuclear achievements in February, on the 28th anniversary of the victory of the Iranian revolution of 1979.

"The Iranian people have made their decision to continue this path wisely and will not pay attention to empty cries of the materialists and the bullying of the decadent powers," he said.

Other senior officials have also warned that Iran would not surrender in the face of pressure.

Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, an influential cleric and head of the Expediency Council, warned last week that pressing Iran could have consequences.

"This is a very dangerous resolution," he said during Friday Prayer at Tehran University. "They are creating problems for themselves and the region," he said, adding that "many will suffer from the smoke of this fire."

One former nuclear negotiator for Iran, Hossein Moussavian, warned the nation's current negotiators on Wednesday that ignoring the resolution and calling it illegal would not help. He said the resolution could have severe consequences for Iran, ISNA reported. "We can say inside the country that this resolution is illegal, but we have to have a correct understanding of the international community's considerations," he was quoted as saying.

Iran To Launch Production Of Industrial Nuclear Fuel (AFP)

By Farhad Pouladi

AFP, January 4, 2007

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has vowed Iran will step up its atomic programme despite UN sanctions, predicting Tehran would soon "push the button" to produce nuclear fuel for industrial uses.

"Iran has the fuel cycle and very soon we will push the button on nuclear fuel production for industrial uses," said Ahmadinejad in a speech in Ghotvand, in western Khuzestan province, according to the IRNA news agency on Wednesday.

"The Iranian people have taken their decision and will in no way pay attention to empty cries of the materialists and the bullying of the decadent powers."

DOJ_NMG_0112430

Iran has already announced it has enriched uranium to levels of around five percent. Producing nuclear fuel that could theoretically be used in a power station would be another important step in mastering the nuclear fuel cycle.

Ahmadinejad's latest comments come in defiance of a UN Security Council resolution at the end of last year which imposed sanctions against Tehran for its failure to suspend uranium enrichment.

Western powers want Iran to suspend enrichment, a process that they fear could be used to make nuclear weapons. Iran insists its atomic programme is entirely peaceful and it has every right to the full nuclear fuel cycle.

Iranian officials have already predicted Iran would be able to make a major announcement on its nuclear programme during the 28th anniversary celebrations of the Islamic revolution in February.

"The Iranian people will not retreat one iota from their rights and the revolutionary celebration will be a celebration that proves Iran's nuclear rights," Ahmadinejad said.

"The Iranian people are insisting on their position and want nothing more than their rights. The bullying powers should know that whatever fuss they make they have to surrender to the Iranian people's will."

He did not go into details on the scale of the fuel production, but producing nuclear fuel for an atomic power station would involve the continuous running of centrifuges to produce enriched uranium of high quality and quantity.

Iran has also said it wants to install 3,000 uranium enriching centrifuges at its enrichment plant in Natanz, central Iran, by March but it is unclear which stage these plans have reached.

In October, Iran only had two cascades of 164 centrifuges in Natanz declared to the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) so the plan to install 3,000 centrifuges would take its enrichment to a new level.

Russia is building Iran's first nuclear power station in the southern city of Bushehr, a much delayed project which is due to be opened in September 2007. Moscow plans on delivering fuel for the plant in March.

However, Iran has also insisted it has every right to produce its own nuclear fuel on Iranian soil in defiance of international calls for the work to be carried outside the Islamic republic.

Iranian Official Urges New Nuclear Talks (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr And Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

Hossein Mousavian, a former Iranian nuclear negotiator close to the influential former president Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, called on Wednesday for renewed diplomacy with the west to break the crisis over Iran's nuclear programme.

He also implied that Iran had no choice but to accept last month's United Nations Security Council resolution, which imposed sanctions and set a two-month deadline for Tehran to suspend almost all its nuclear activities. But he said Tehran should also continue to bargain over its "rights" to a nuclear fuel cycle.

Mr Mousavian's frank briefing reflected growing concern among pragmatists in Tehran at the direction of the international situation.

President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad has favoured defiance over the nuclear issue and has dismissed the UN resolution as "invalid". The state-run Islamic Republic News Agency on Tuesday quoted him as saying that the country would soon start producing nuclear fuel on an industrial scale and "defend its interests powerfully".

But Mr Mousavian said the UN resolution was "very tricky" and could lead to further sanctions in addition to the measures already agreed against individual Iranians and companies involved in the atomic programme.

"It is easy to get into [the attention of] the Security Council but very difficult to get out," he said.

"The Security Council is the highest authority on international peace and stability, and there is no other authority to which we can appeal."

The remarks suggest that Iran's pragmatists and reformists are taking a more active role in shaping Iran's policy after the poor showing in last month's elections by allies of Mr Ahmadi-Nejad.

In spite of Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's comments on the UN resolution, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei – Iran's supreme leader who has a pre-eminent say in Iran's leadership group – has not as yet spoken in public on Tehran's response.

"Any comment by the leader would be the final word from Iran – and I think he is studying the case as the policymakers discuss how we can make a breakthrough," said a leading Iranian journalist.

Mr Mousavian was centrally involved in Tehran's nuclear negotiations with the European Union between 2003 and 2005, before he and several colleagues were removed after Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's 2005 election win.

He is deputy head of the Centre for Strategic Research, a state body that briefs Iran's leaders and which is associated Mr Rafsanjani.

Iran's pragmatists and reformists polled better than expected three weeks ago in elections for municipal councils and for the Experts Assembly, a clerical body that supervises Ayatollah Khamenei.

DOJ_NMG_0112431

Olmert, Mubarak Seek Restart Peace Talks (AP)

By Steve Weizman

AP, January 4, 2007

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak will search for ways to restart Mideast peace talks and free a captured Israeli soldier when they meet Thursday, although Israeli officials said they did not expect a breakthrough on the prisoner issue.

The Red Sea summit comes amid international calls for Israel and the Palestinians to negotiate an end their dispute, in the interest of stabilizing the Middle East in general and Iraq in particular.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit said Friday the summit will explore ways to revive peace talks, stalled since the outbreak of the current Palestinian uprising in September 2000.

Militants linked to the Islamic Hamas seized Cpl. Gilad Shalit in June, and a Hamas official on Sunday claimed progress toward an agreement for his release, in exchange for Israel freeing some of the 9,100 Palestinians in its prisons.

A Palestinian prisoner release would bolster the domestic standing of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and aid his efforts to build a more pragmatic coalition with the governing Hamas. Israel, meanwhile, says freeing the soldier is key to reviving peace talks with the Palestinians.

Egypt has been mediating efforts to end the standoff since Shalit was captured, and it brokered a shaky Nov. 26 truce with Hamas.

The Israelis and Palestinians each hope for some movement on the prisoner issue but warn that no deal has been struck.

"Gilad Shalit is not going to be freed tomorrow, there is not going to be a dramatic announcement," Olmert spokeswoman Miri Eisin told The Associated Press on Wednesday. "It will be discussed, but unfortunately we're not at that point yet."

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat, who is close to Abbas, agreed.

"To speak of an agreement, at this stage, is premature," he said.

Olmert and Mubarak last met on June 4, 2006, also in Sharm el-Sheik. Mubarak hosted Abbas in the Red Sea town on Dec. 27, when the Palestinian president proposed closed-door talks with Israel on some of the thorniest issues dividing them, including the status of Jerusalem and Palestinian refugees.

Israeli and Egyptian officials said Olmert and Mubarak will discuss Abbas' coalition-building efforts, bilateral Israel-Egyptian ties and the prospect of joint economic projects at the hour-long summit Thursday evening, and the dinner that will follow. There will also be talk on the broader Middle East, including Iran's nuclear ambitions.

A bipartisan U.S. panel on Iraq headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III has said progress on the Israeli-Palestinian dispute could help ease tensions in Iraq and British Prime Minister Tony Blair says a resolution to the conflict is key to Middle East stability. Israel disputes that conclusion.

Olmert met Abbas last month in the first Israeli-Palestinian summit since June 2005, when then-Prime Minister Ariel Sharon met the Palestinian leader.

A state-run Egyptian newspaper Wednesday quoted Mubarak spokesman Suleiman Awad as saying that Olmert's meeting with Mubarak would be followed at an unspecified date by another Olmert-Abbas meeting, in Sharm el-Sheik.

5 In Gaza Killed In Fatah-Hamas Clashes (NYT/AP)

Associated Press

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

GAZA, Jan. 3 — Five Palestinians were killed Wednesday in a resurgence of factional violence in the Gaza Strip, leading to fears that an already fragile truce between the rival Hamas and Fatah factions would completely collapse.

The latest fighting came two days after Fatah and Hamas militants carried out a series of kidnappings and engaged in gun battles, in violation of a mid-December truce between the groups, which are vying to control the Palestinian government.

Rival gunmen poured into the streets of the northern Gaza town of Beit Lahiya on Wednesday after a 25-year-old militant from Fatah, the faction led by the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, was shot and killed. A woman was shot in the head and killed in the ensuing gun battle, and 12 other people suffered moderate wounds, hospital and security officials said.

Later in the afternoon, gunmen ambushed Fatah-allied Palestinian security officers in the southern Gaza town of Khan Yunis, blasting their police car with bullets and a rocket-propelled grenade, and killing two of the officers, witnesses said. A third officer later died of his wounds.

The security officers were trying to take another officer to a hospital after he was wounded in an earlier clash, Fatah officials said in a statement. The officers had stormed a house where they believed that a kidnapped colleague was being held, it said.

DOJ_NMG_0112432

Fatah officials blamed Hamas militiamen for the attack, while Hamas said Fatah militants had initiated the incident.

After nightfall, three smaller militant groups brought Hamas and Fatah officials in together in Khan Yunis and forged an accord to remove gunmen from the streets and release kidnapped activists, according to a statement released after the meeting. But it is unclear if that will lead to a truce in the rest of the territory.

Also on Wednesday, the news agency Agence France-Presse demanded the immediate release of one of its photographers, who had been abducted at gunpoint in Gaza City on Monday. In a statement, the agency said there had been no word on the fate of the photographer, Jaime Rázuri, 50, a Peruvian.

”Despite assurances from Palestinian officials that they are doing everything possible to help with the search, we are deeply concerned over Jaime’s health and safety,” the statement said.

In the past most journalists and other foreigners kidnapped in the Gaza Strip have been released unharmed after a few hours. An exception was the abduction last summer of two Fox News journalists, who were held for two weeks but then finally released.

Talks between Fatah and Hamas on forming a national unity government broke down in November, fueling an increase in violence. Mr. Abbas has since threatened to call an early election, which Hamas said it would boycott, calling it a coup attempt. Mr. Abbas wants to resume peace talks with Israel.

Fatah led the Palestinian government since its establishment in 1994, but Hamas won legislative elections last January and formed a government in March.

Late Monday, clashes in the Jabaliya refugee camp near Gaza City broke a weeklong lull in fighting between the groups. In the last few weeks, 17 people have been killed in the internal fighting, leading to fears of civil war.

Aides to the Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya of Hamas, said Wednesday that he planned to cut short a tour of Arab countries to return to Gaza. He was scheduled to travel later this week to Jordan, which has offered to be the host of a meeting between Mr. Haniya and Mr. Abbas in an effort to defuse the tensions between their factions.

Mr. Haniya and Mr. Abbas have agreed in principle to such a meeting, but no date has been announced.

5 Palestinians Killed In Gaza Strip (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 4, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 3 -- Renewed factional fighting Wednesday between the rival Hamas and Fatah movements in the Gaza Strip killed five Palestinians, including a 22-year-old woman. More than 10 others were wounded.

The deaths were the first in two weeks as a result of partisan violence, which has spiked periodically over the past year during times of political tension. The fighting brought angry recriminations from leaders of both parties, indicating an end to the short period of calm in Gaza as talks to resolve the political stalemate remain stalled.

In the most brazen act, gunmen opened fire on a car and killed three men belonging to a security service loyal to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, a leader of the secular Fatah party that lost parliamentary elections to Hamas almost a year ago. Fatah leaders blamed Hamas, a radical Islamic movement that does not recognize Israel, for the ambush in the Gaza city of Khan Younis.

A gunman from the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, Fatah's armed wing, was fatally shot north of Gaza City. The woman, Mona Salha, died after being wounded with about a dozen others caught in a Hamas-Fatah skirmish in the same area.

After failing to form a power-sharing government with Hamas acceptable to international donors, who provide nearly half the Palestinian government's annual budget, Abbas announced last month that he intends to call early elections, including for his own office. But he has yet to set a date for the vote, which Hamas officials have called an illegal attempt to overturn their election victory.

Also in Gaza on Wednesday, colleagues of a kidnapped Peruvian photographer with Agence France-Presse warned that his life is in danger unless he receives heart medication soon. Jaime Razuri, 50, was taken Monday by armed men outside the agency's Gaza offices. The agency's office manager, Sakher Abu El-Awn, told [a news agency] that Razuri is suffering from a heart disease that requires regular medication.

"We believe his life is at serious risk, and we urge his captors to release him immediately," Abu El-Awn told the agency.

In another development, an Israeli woman sentenced to three years in prison for aiding a Palestinian group that Israel considers a terrorist organization was released Wednesday after serving 26 months of her term.

Tali Fahima pleaded guilty in December 2005 to having contacts with a foreign agent, passing information to the enemy and violating the law prohibiting Israelis from entering areas controlled by the Palestinian Authority. The charges stemmed from her association with Zakaria Zubeidi, leader of the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades in Jenin, whom she said she would protect as a "human shield."

DOJ_NMG_0112433

Fahima spent 13 months in jail without being charged -- a status known as administrative detention -- before pleading guilty. That time was counted toward her sentence. Her term was to expire in November, but she was released early for good behavior.

How Kim Jong Il Controls A Nation (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, January 4, 2007

SEOUL, SOUTH KOREA

As Kim Jong Il continues to elude efforts to constrain his nuclear program, a grudging regard for the North Korean leader's tactical skills is rising.

Mr. Kim was once thought to be over his head as a leader. But 12 years after the death of his father, Kim Il Sung, the son is showing brilliance as a dictator. Some experts say that Kim, in his own way, may be shrewder than the father who built the nation.

"Kim was in many ways dealt a weaker hand than his father, but he has played it better," says Brian Myers, a North Korea specialist at Dongseo University in Busan, South Korea.

Certainly, Kim has become a skillful player on the world stage. He retains firm hold of the most totalitarian state on earth. His nation has survived an epic famine. Kim has astutely nullified a dawning realization among his people that the world beyond North Korea's borders is a better place. He's even created a new image for himself at home - not as a towering patriarch - but as a figure of sympathy, a beleaguered, America-taunted leader who eats soldier's gruel and deserves care by the masses. He's played a smart propaganda game in South Korea, where some elites admire him as a nationalist torchbearer for "true Korean-ness," and for outwitting the great powers.

Now, Kim has tested a nuclear weapon - the eighth nation to publicly do so - and has developed a ballistic missile program.

"Why shouldn't Kim be seen as extraordinary?" asks Alexander Mansourov of the Asia Pacific Center for Security Studies in Honolulu. "He's poked his finger in the eye of the US hegemon. He's tested missiles and nukes. At home he's more popular than ever."

Abroad, Kim is seen as enigmatic, reclusive - part fox, part oddball. He's reported to hold all-night parties that serve as loyalty tests. He chain-smokes, loves Ferraris, goes gaga over gourmet food, has 30 homes, wears 12-centimeter high (4.7 inch) platform shoes, kidnaps the occasional South Korean actress, and is crazy about karaoke, James Bond films, and the Internet.

Yet that image, though partly true, is itself propaganda, say former Pyongyang diplomats, high-level defectors, and Korea experts. They say the real Kim is a bit unsure, frightened of China and the US, and may suffer from a learning disability. Kim's sister-in-law told a diplomat that Kim is "often timid." His father may not have offered him much respect. Not a TV personality

Bradley Martin, author of "Under the Loving Care of the Fatherly Leader: North Korea and the Kim Dynasty," says Kim may suffer from stage fright. Surprisingly for a state leader, especially a "godhead," Kim's voice has been heard only once by the nation, for a total of nine words. "Glory to the heroic soldiers of the People's Army," he said in 1992 at an obscure rally at a military base. Invitations to one state reception noted that one may speak to Kim, but that Kim would "not speak in reply," a Eastern European diplomat remembers. Kim has never appeared live on TV. Even in the period of mourning after the death of his father, the "Great Leader" - when posters stated mystically that "Kim Jong Il is now Kim Il Sung" - there was no fireside chat by Kim junior to his people.

Yet Kim reportedly micromanages the entire country. His state is a hermetically sealed cult that allows no debate; even top generals and their extended families undergo loyalty tests. A half-dozen concentration camps hold 200,000 inmates, a dozen intelligence units spy on the people and each other. North Korea has the world's fifth-largest army.

"Everything goes up to Kim, and everything comes down from him. There isn't a whole lot of lateral motion in the North," says Stephen Bradner, a civilian expert in Seoul and longtime adviser to the US military. "We often ask the wrong question. The question is not what North Korea needs, but what Kim Jong Il wants."

"I used to think Kim was irrational and unrealistic," says Lee Jong Heon, who has just published a structural analysis of the North at Chung-Ang University in Seoul. "But when you study his moves, he has kept a grip on the people, and he now heads one of eight nuclear nations. He's been highly rational from his standpoint." But a busy populist

One side of Kim only now emerging is how closely he stays in touch with the people. The Dear Leader is on the road, working the crowds, a great deal. Studies of Korean media show Kim averages about 150 local visits a year. He may not make live televised speeches, but he's at a school, a factory, a farm, a military base - every three days. (He shows up at a military unit once a week.) This suggests a populist streak.

DOJ_NMG_0112434

"When someone you worship comes to your factory, it's a personal connection. We tend to overlook this simple fact," says Mr. Mansourov, who has tracked Kim's appearances. "Kim knows the local leaders, the opinion makers, the local cadres. He's not in a fishbowl. He may be a dictator, but he's also a populist."

Kim also appears today to be intensifying his ethnic nationalist message: Korea is different, special, unique, pure - and must remain so. The message has more affinity with Imperial-era race-based fascism in Japan, than to the Stalinism he's often depicted as emulating, argues Mr. Myers.

"The North may not have plasma TVs and shiny cars, but it has people with character and virtue, that's Kim's message," says Myers. "South Korea is physically and spiritually polluted, misogynistic, occupied by the US, [has been] sold down the river, [and] lets its young people grow soft. The real Korean spirit is being held in trust in the North - that message appeals."

There's another fact often overlooked, say North watchers: Kim is getting older. There may be a new urgency to resolve the nuclear question, to seal his dynasty.

Kim was born "Uri" or George, in Khabarovsk lower Siberia in 1942 or '43 (the date is disputed), in a medicine supply house of the Soviet 88th Reconnaissance Brigade, according to South Korean scholar Suh Dae Sook. Kim Il Sung's guerrilla brigade had been bloodied in Manchuria by the Japanese, and he escaped to Russia with his wife. Young Kim was cared for by Korean and Russian servants. This early mix of foreign contact continued later in Pyongyang, so Kim never entirely imbibed Korean habits, where "sameness" is prized. He was early an individualist - adopting different hair-styles, dress, shoes, and behavior.

That "difference" has helped set Kim apart. Now he has nuclear capability. Yet the depths of Kim's pride, how he views his place in history, or how he would react in a threatening crisis, is not clear. In the former Soviet Union and China, and presumably in India and Pakistan, nuclear weapons are held by "mediating structures" of party and military decisionmaking committees. But Kim alone controls the dreaded button in the North.

It is unknown if Kim might ever find it "rational" to use his weapons, say experts. For example, might Kim behave like a jilted husband or postal worker who shoots his family or co-workers, then turns the gun on himself? Mostly, it is felt that Kim wants to avoid the fate that befell dictators such as Nicolae Ceausescu of Romania, who was overthrown and killed.

"If we aren't careful, Kim could see using his weapons as rational," argues Mr. Lee.

Army lore in North Korea, in fact, has Kim telling his generals that if " 'we are ever losing in a war, I will destroy the world if I can. I will not go down quietly,' " Mr. Martin points out. Opportunities lost?

Despite Kim's adroit nuclear card playing, Asia watchers say any appraisal must weighed against what Kim might have done with his rule. Fifteen years ago, as the Soviet Union was collapsing, there was genuine hope in Asia that Kim might be a new kind of leader. He might open up the economy, tone down the cult worship, act more like former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev. Kim could have created special economic zones as China did. Yet Kim has systematically quashed his own reforms, including those of a brilliant technocrat, Kim Dal Hyon, former deputy prime minister of the economy who experimented with the free market in the Tumen River project.

In one sense, Kim is prisoner to his own fantastic ideology of isolation. To allow outside influences into the regime could snap the spell of his own Oz-like deification, experts say.

"North Korea actually has everything," says Krzysztof Darewicz, a Polish journalist based in Pyongyang during the 1990s. "There's a wealth of valuable minerals, uranium and gold. It is smack-dab in the crossroads of Asia's current economic rise; trade and wealth surround the North. But what has it become? Nothing.

"Kim inherited a nuclear card with no idea what to do next," he adds.

"Kim is one hell of a tactician, but what is his strategy and where will it lead?" asks Martin. "What about his people?" Kim Facts

North Korea's "Dear Leader" Kim Jong Il ...

· Was born in Siberia in 1942 or 43.

· Is 5-foot, 3-inches tall and wears 12-centimeter (4.7 inch) high platform shoes.

· Has only been heard by North Koreans once, in 1992, in a national broadcast. He said: "Glory to the heroic soldiers of the People's Army."

· Has never appeared speaking live on TV in North Korea.

· Has the world's fifth-largest army.

· Gives his top generals loyalty tests.

· Averages about 150 visits per year to schools, military bases, factories.

The Shenyang Six (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112435

Ban Ki Moon got off to a good start at the United Nations this week when he declined to criticize the execution of Saddam Hussein. Here's another way the new Secretary General could outshine his predecessor: Demand that Beijing live up to its international obligations to let the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees help the tens of thousands of North Korean refugees hiding in northeast China.

As a fellow Korean, Mr. Ban has special moral authority to address this little-known humanitarian crisis. A good place to start would be by making a public plea on behalf of six refugees who tried, but failed, to obtain sanctuary in the U.S. consulate in Shenyang, China, last month. The six are in jail in Shenyang, awaiting deportation under China's policy regarding the North Korean refugees it tracks down.

China's treatment of the North Koreans violates the International Convention Regarding the Status of Refugees, to which it is a party and which bars "refoulement," or the repatriation of refugees to places where their lives or freedom would be in jeopardy. North Koreans who are sent home by Beijing face execution or a term in one of Kim Jong Il's prison camps, which can amount to a death sentence.

The six refugees in jail in Shenyang include two orphan boys, ages 16 and 17; a 22-year-old woman; and three women in their 40s. One of the older women is the mother of a 19-year-old who made it to safety in the U.S. consulate last year and is awaiting resettlement in the U.S. along with two orphan boys -- if China lets them leave. One of the women has relatives in Hawaii; another has family in South Korea.

The six were captured just before Christmas along with two Americans who had been sheltering them in safe houses in another city and were accompanying them to the consulate. Their rescuers -- young women who don't want their names used -- belong to Liberty in North Korea, or LINK, a U.S. non-profit dedicated to helping the refugees. LINK's director, Adrian Hong, was also arrested -- pulled out of his hotel room in Beijing and taken to a prison cell in Shenyang. The three rescuers were deported this week.

That's progress of sorts. Steve Kim, a Huntington, New York, businessman who provided funds to house and care for refugees, was tried, convicted and has been in jail in China since September 2003. Phillip Buck, a pastor from Seattle, was released in August after serving 15 months in prison for helping North Koreans.

Beyond the six jailed refugees is the larger tragedy of the tens of thousands of North Koreans in northeast China and the thousands more who may flee if famine hits North Korea this winter, as expected. The humane solution would be to allow the UNHCR to set up processing centers in China for the refugees, who could then be transferred to transit camps in neighboring countries before being resettled elsewhere.

South Korea's constitution requires it to accept escapees from the North, and North Korean asylum seekers are welcome in the U.S. under 2004 legislation. In one of his last acts as Senate Majority Leader, Bill Frist introduced a bill that would authorize $10 billion for the relief and relocation of North Korean refugees. That's a good idea that other Senators could adopt.

Meanwhile, the six refugees incarcerated in Shenyang await a decision from Beijing. As he was being escorted from jail this week, Mr. Hong says he passed the cell where several of the North Koreans were being held. "There is nothing like looking in the eyes of someone who thinks they are going to die," he says. "They all had that look -- like there was no hope."

Mexican U.N. Insider Gets Manager's Post (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, January 4, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 3 — Ban Ki-moon, on his second day as secretary general, appointed a high-level United Nations insider, Alicia Bárcena Ibarra, to the top management post, a signal that he does not plan aggressive reforms in the much-criticized bureaucracy.

Ms. Bárcena, 54, is a career diplomat from Mexico who served for most of last year as the chief of staff for Kofi Annan, Mr. Ban's predecessor. Before that, since July 2003, Ms. Bárcena had been the deputy executive secretary of the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean, a United Nations development agency based in Chile.

United Nations diplomats pointed out that Ms. Bárcena, although a well-regarded diplomat, had little of the front-line administrative experience needed to run the unwieldy United Nations system, which employs 16,500 people worldwide.

Her appointment marked the first time since 1992 that her position, under secretary general for management, has not been held by an American. In years past, the United States government has battled for the position, but this time Washington is lobbying instead for the top policy-making job, under secretary general for political affairs.

Several diplomats said the choice of Ms. Bárcena cast doubt on statements Mr. Ban made on Tuesday, when he said in a meeting with United Nations staff members that he wanted to overhaul "the working culture" of the organization.

"It's a missed opportunity in terms of having a clean break from the Kofi Annan era," said one Security Council diplomat. "It would have made sense if she had immense financial and management experience. But to the contrary, she doesn't."

DOJ_NMG_0112436

But the announcement cited Ms. Bárcena's broad knowledge of the sprawling United Nations organization. She has also worked closely with Mr. Ban during the transition from Mr. Annan's leadership, and Mr. Ban has said he will appoint more women to senior positions.

"He has set his agenda, and I am sure that Ms. Bárcena agrees with that agenda," said Michèle Montas, Mr. Ban's spokeswoman.

The management post had been filled since June 2005 by Christopher B. Burnham, a former Marine Corps reserve colonel and investment banker. Under his tenure, the United Nations adopted new protections for whistleblowers, formed an ethics office, updated its financial disclosure policies and reorganized the procurement department, which has been the target of several criminal fraud indictments. Mr. Burnham stepped down in November.

In the meeting Tuesday with Mr. Ban, Stephen Kisambira, the president of the staff members' union, said the United Nations needed "a fundamental change in the mindset of senior management" from a current approach that he said was based on "dominance, disregard and fear."

Mr. Ban also appointed Sir John Holmes, the British ambassador to France, as under secretary general for humanitarian affairs and coordinator of emergency relief.

Britain Free From WWII Payments (WT)

By Al Webb

The Washington Times, January 4, 2007

LONDON -- More than six decades after the fact, Britain has finally paid back the billions of dollars it had borrowed from the United States and Canada to help pay for rebuilding the country after World War II.

At the click of a few computer keys in London on the last business day of 2006, $83.25 million was sent electronically winging to Washington and $22.7 million to Ottawa, to free Britain from annual installments it occasionally has struggled to pay.

The original loan of $4.34 billion -- the equivalent of $27 billion in today's money -- was negotiated by a London team headed by economic mastermind John Maynard Keynes in 1945 to stave off the bankruptcy that posed a serious threat to Britain in the wake of the war's wreckage.

The Canadian share of the loan was $1.2 billion.

The loan was paid off in 50 installments, the last of which leaves Britain free of that debt for the first time since a devastated Nazi Germany surrendered to Allied forces more than 61 years ago.

British Economic Secretary Ed Balls hailed the dispatch of that last payment on Dec. 29, telling journalists, "We finally honor our commitments to the U.S. and Canada for the support they gave us 60 years ago."

"It was vital support which helped Britain defeat Nazi Germany and secure peace and prosperity in the postwar period," Mr. Balls said.

In fact, it was much more than that. World War II had left Britain an economic mess -- a "financial Dunkirk," as Mr. Keynes put it -- and with the abrupt termination in September 1945 of the lend-lease arrangement that had it afloat through the hostilities, the country was on the verge of collapse.

Under the Lend-Lease Act of 1941, signed by President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Washington sent war supplies to allies. Britain received most of that assistance -- $31.4 billion out of the total $50.1 billion. Other major countries that benefited from the Lend-Lease Act were the Soviet Union ($11.3 billion), France ($3.2 billion) and China ($1.6 billion).

No payment was required for supplies sent under the program. The allies' compensation came in the form of services, rent and use of air bases.

However, Washington suddenly terminated the lend-lease shipments on Sept. 2, 1945, with goods still in transit, forcing Britain to negotiate new loans from the United States and Canada for reconstruction.

The large consignment of goods in transit or already in Britain were sold to Britain for about 10 cents on the dollar under the new 50-year loan agreement.

Mr. Keynes and his team won during their negotiations with the U.S. government what amounted to an economic lifeline that allowed Britain to pay for food, fuel and other essentials, while coping with massive bills for arms and munitions left over from the war as it began rebuilding its shattered economy.

"The Americans gave us an excellent deal in two senses," Tim Leunig, an economics history lecturer at the London School of Economics, told the Scotsman newspaper -- the 2 percent rate of interest on the loan, and the fact that the United States even agreed to such a loan.

"First of all," Mr. Leunig said, "2 percent has always been a very low rate of interest. Second, to lend to someone in wartime is very risky."

For his part, Mr. Keynes at the time was less than pleased, particularly about the 2 percent interest on the debt. He accused the United States of behaving badly, suggesting that Washington should write off the loan as a gift, or at least make it interest-free.

Still, it was viewed in economic circles as a bargain, which meant that by the time the last installment cleared the books, the original loan of $4.34 billion had totaled barely $7.1 billion including interest -- little more than small change to today's global economies and the multibillionaires they steadily churn out.

Even so, the repayment road has not always been an easy one for Britain. The installment payments that started in 1950 were deferred six times -- in 1956, 1957, 1964, 1965, 1968 and 1976 -- because of various economic crises, pressures on official reserves and adverse international exchange rates.

So that last payment was, in fact, six years late. Never mind, said a British Treasury spokesman, the important point is, "Britain always repays her debts."

Well, not quite. Britain borrowed money from the United States during World War I, but has never repaid the debt -- although they blame the Americans.

President Hoover declared a moratorium on World War I debts during the Great Depression and global financial crisis, and it was never rescinded.

'Extraordinary' Fall In German Jobless (FT)

By Bertrand Benoit In Berlin

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

Unemployment in Germany recorded another steep monthly drop in December, underscoring the robustness of the year-old rebound under way in Europe's largest economy.

Seasonally adjusted figures released by the Federal Labour Agency on Wednesday put the number of jobseekers in Germany at 4.1m, down 108,000 on the month, a far bigger drop than economists had anticipated after a 86,000 fall in November.

The "extraordinary fall in unemployment", as described by the Agency, put the unemployment rate in the country at 9.8 per cent.

"These figures are considerably better than expected and underpin the view that the recovery in Germany has become self-sustaining," Elga Bartsch, economist at Morgan Stanley, said.

The data, following very upbeat business sentiment surveys at the end of December, will buttress the view shared by a majority of economists that the strong German recovery will last well into 2007 despite a three-point rise in value-added tax, the biggest tax increase in post-war history, this month.

The closely followed Ifo business sentiment index surged to a 16-year high last month after notching up the fastest growth last year since the start of the decade. The German economy is expected to have grown by 2.5 per cent in 2006, exceeding French growth for the first time since 1994.

"The positive development in unemployment is mainly down to the cyclical rebound in job creation," the Labour Agency wrote in its monthly report.

However, economists said several factors, including mild weather in December and new benefits available to unoccupied construction workers as of December 1st, might have flattered the unemployment figures somewhat.

In November, the latest month for which employment data was available, the Agency recorded 46,000 job creations, bringing the total number of positions created in the past year close to half a million.

The main question for economists regarding the fate of the German recovery this year hinges on consumers' reaction to the VAT increase and the magnitude and duration of the expected lull in growth this hefty tax increase could cause.

Anecdotal evidence of robust retail sales over the holiday season, and the positive sentiment evidenced in the retail sub-section of December's Ifo index, suggest consumption picked up at the end of 2006.

However, private spending remains low and some forecasters fear consumers might have brought forward big-ticket purchases in anticipation to the VAT rise, pointing to a possible drop in spending in the first quarter even though the tax increase may take longer to find its way into higher retail prices.

Ritual Sacrifice? Not On My Street, Some Belgians Say (WSJ)

By Mary Jacoby

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

BRUSSELS -- At a slaughterhouse here last week, Mohamed Mimoun wrestled a sheep between his legs and took a number. He gasped: It was a two-hour wait to sacrifice his animal for Eid al-Adha, an important Islamic religious festival.

DOJ_NMG_0112438

"I should have done this at home, like everyone else," he moaned.

That would have saved Mr. Mimoun a long wait in drenching rain, but it would have been against the law. Killing an animal at home to eat it is legal in Belgium. But a 1988 law expressly forbids the ritual slaughter of animals at home.

Living cheek by jowl in Brussels with the many bureaucrats who run the European Union, Muslims in the city turned an estimated 25,000 sheep toward Mecca this year and cut their throats to celebrate the story of Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his son to God. Eid al-Adha commemorates God's reprieve which allowed Abraham to kill a ram instead of his son. While some, like Mr. Mimoun, head to official slaughterhouses, many Muslims, fearing long waits, kill their sheep illegally in their backyards and basements instead.

Whether at a slaughterhouse or at home, the practice raises the ire of animal-rights activists. For years, they have held anguished protests against the manner in which the sheep are slaughtered, arguing that the sheep should be stunned first to lessen their pain. "It's not normal to have thousands of sheep slaughtered like this in the middle of a major European city," says Ann De Greef, a Belgian animal-rights campaigner.

On his way to the slaughterhouse, Mr. Mimoun was fined by a policewoman for transporting a live sheep in the closed trunk of his Toyota. By law, it should have been in the back seat.

"She told me I needed to have a seat belt on the sheep," Mr. Mimoun said. The policewoman later said she was joking about the seat belt.

Brussels' Muslim population has grown to more than 15% of the city's one million inhabitants, and what began two decades ago as a debate over animal welfare and hygiene has been transformed into a test of political might. The result is a stalemate.

"We have the right to practice our religion," says Coskun Beyazgül, head of the Muslim Executive Office, a state-sponsored Islamic authority.

While Muslim authorities in France sanction the use of electronic stunning methods, Muslim authorities in Belgium forbid it. For the sacrifice to be completed in accordance with Islam, says Mr. Beyazgül, the lamb must die from a loss of blood while its head is turned toward Mecca in Saudi Arabia, birthplace of the Prophet Muhammad. Stunning the animals before slitting their throats, he says, could lead to the animal dying prematurely, against Islamic principles.

Mr. Beyazgül is also against making donations of money to charity in lieu of sacrificing a live animal, as many Muslims do in the U.S. and other countries. He adds that Muslims here ignore the home-slaughtering ban because Belgian authorities aren't willing to invest in enough capacity at legal slaughtering facilities.

While similar conflicts play out across Europe, the tensions are particularly acute in Brussels, Europe's political capital. Unlike France and other nations with large Muslim minorities, Muslims in Belgium aren't concentrated in ghettos outside major cities; they often live side-by-side with EU officials and other professionals in gentrifying urban neighborhoods.

One man got his lamb home last year on a leash. "It looked like his pet," says Pierre-Yves Lambert, a local political commentator and social worker. "But everyone knew where it was going."

To ease the strain on slaughterhouses, city leaders have suggested the Muslim community spread out the sacrifice over the three days of the festival, which ended this year on Jan. 1. Nothing doing, says Mr. Beyazgül. "Everyone wants to kill their sheep in the morning of the first day," he says. "They want to eat their sheep for lunch."

The rush to slaughter so many sheep within hours led to catastrophe during last year's festival. A temporary slaughterhouse became overwhelmed with long lines and malfunctioning water and drainage systems. In a hurry to get home, some celebrants began slaughtering sheep on top of live sheep as large pools of blood formed.

In response, Belgian politician Jean-Marie Dedecker last year introduced a bill that would have required Muslims to stun the sheep before killing them. Muslims protested, and the bill died.

Mr. Dedecker, who hails from Belgium's Dutch-speaking North, blames Laurette Onkelinx, Belgium's Justice Minister and a French-speaking Socialist, for its defeat. "Most of the Muslims speak French and vote for the Socialists, and Ms. Onkelinx needs their votes to stay in office," he says.

Representatives of Ms. Onkelinx did not return phone calls.

Ms. De Greef and her group, Global Action in the Interest of Animals, scored a win in 2003, when they successfully sued to stop municipal authorities from placing collection bins on city streets for animals' remains. Providing such bins is tantamount to sanctioning illegal home sacrifice, she says.

"The Muslims portray this as an attack on their religion," says Ms. De Greef. "But we think the law is for everybody."

Still, authorities in several towns outside Brussels continued to provide waste bins for last week's festival, drawing protests from Ms. De Greef's group. More than 100,000 sheep were sacrificed in Belgium this year for the religious festival, Mr. Beyazgül said.

But for Muslims like 48-year-old Mr. Mimoun, who want to slaughter their sheep in legal facilities, the annual festival can be costly.

DOJ_NMG_0112439

Mr. Mimoun paid a farmer $230 for his sheep. Then he paid $60 to have a certified Muslim sacrificateur perform the ritual killing for him at the slaughter facility. And he'll have to pay a fine -- the amount of which will be determined by a judge -- for transporting the animal in the trunk of his car.

But Mr. Mimoun, who moved to Belgium from Morocco when he was 4 years old, said it was worth it. "I am a Belgian. This is Europe. I respect the law," he said.

Besides, he added: "I don't like blood."

Spanish PM Pays Price After Bomb Derails Eta Peace Talks (FT)

By Mark Mulligan And Victoria Burnett

Financial Times, January 4, 2007

It was a buoyant José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero who last Friday delivered an unerringly upbeat review of the Spanish government's achievements in 2006.

As well as presiding over a roaring economy and laying the legislative foundation for a healthier, more tolerant Spain, the prime minister had sown the seeds of a peace process that could end 40 years of violence by Eta, the Basque separatist group.

Mr Zapatero ventured that Spain would be even "better off in a year's time than it was at the end of 2006". Less than 24 hours after uttering those words, Mr Zapatero was forced to eat them. A powerful car bomb at Madrid's Barajas airport that killed two people made a mockery of his optimism as it derailed the peace process on which he had staked much of his political credibility.

"This is a huge setback for the prime minister," said Antonio Camuñas, the head of Global Strategies, the Madrid-based lobbying group. "By making the peace process his personal project – there were no teams, no delegation – there was always the risk that a failure would be a personal failure."

The suspension of the Eta process marks the first big defeat for a leader who has managed, through formidable charm, shrewdness and unshakeable conviction, to steer his country leftwards since winning a surprise victory in the March 2004 election, two days after devastating bomb attacks on the Madrid commuter rail network. It underlines the limitations of a determined optimist who, political insiders complain, fails to take counsel or heed political alarm bells.

"Mr Zapatero has dominated his own party much like Tony Blair has dominated the [British] Labour party," said David Mathieson from Fride, a left-leaning Madrid think-tank. "When thing are going well for him, it reflects well on the government; when he stumbles, the whole government wobbles."

The setback over Eta talks had exposed a fundamental flaw in the power base built by Mr Zapatero since election victory, said Mr Camuñas. By alienating moderates within his own socialist party, and securing parliamentary support by ceding to the, at times, radical demands of Spain's regionalist parties, he had driven the opposition Popular party further to the right.

Mr Zapatero must now scramble to regain momentum before next year's general election, analysts say. The Eta talks dominated the agenda in Spain in recent months – to the chagrin of Mr Zapatero's aides – leaving little space to highlight the success of the government's more grassroots policies.

On Friday, Mr Zapatero pointed to tax cuts, market reforms and unprecedented spending on research and development and education. His government has clamped down on smoking in public, drink-driving, domestic violence and pushed through a law to help those caring for the elderly and disabled.

However, critics claim that on the international stage, Mr Zapatero has failed to win Spain a voice commensurate with its growing economic stature.

He has failed to back up ambitious, yet vague, foreign policy proposals with action. Despite promoting a Middle East initiative, the prime minister has not visited the region. He has stopped Spanish troops in Afghanistan from moving to the region where fighting is fiercest.

Allies, however, point to his deft management of issues close to Spanish hearts. Mr Zapatero was quick to withdraw troops from Iraq following his election. He defied sceptics when he won continued European Union development funds for the next five years and has secured promises of greater assistance dealing with the flood of African immigrants who use Spain as a backdoor into Europe.

Foreign policy also does not traditionally rank high on the electorate's agenda. "Foreign policy is never a vote winner – it can be a vote loser," says Charles Powell, history professor at the San Pablo CEU university in Madrid.

In an attempt to regain political ground at home, the government this week was planning a series of social policy initiatives "that Spaniards really care about", said a Socialist party official.

In an apparent effort to bury the hatchet with the opposition Popular party, the government next week will seek a new, multi-party anti-terrorism pact.

However, officials admitted the chances of reviving peace talks during Mr Zapatero's term in office were virtually nil.

DOJ_NMG_0112440

A World Free Of Nuclear Weapons (WSJ)

By George P. Shultz, William J. Perry, Henry A. Kissinger And Sam Nunn

The Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

Nuclear weapons today present tremendous dangers, but also an historic opportunity. U.S. leadership will be required to take the world to the next stage -- to a solid consensus for reversing reliance on nuclear weapons globally as a vital contribution to preventing their proliferation into potentially dangerous hands, and ultimately ending them as a threat to the world.

Nuclear weapons were essential to maintaining international security during the Cold War because they were a means of deterrence. The end of the Cold War made the doctrine of mutual Soviet-American deterrence obsolete. Deterrence continues to be a relevant consideration for many states with regard to threats from other states. But reliance on nuclear weapons for this purpose is becoming increasingly hazardous and decreasingly effective.

North Korea's recent nuclear test and Iran's refusal to stop its program to enrich uranium -- potentially to weapons grade -- highlight the fact that the world is now on the precipice of a new and dangerous nuclear era. Most alarmingly, the likelihood that non-state terrorists will get their hands on nuclear weaponry is increasing. In today's war waged on world order by terrorists, nuclear weapons are the ultimate means of mass devastation. And non-state terrorist groups with nuclear weapons are conceptually outside the bounds of a deterrent strategy and present difficult new security challenges.

Apart from the terrorist threat, unless urgent new actions are taken, the U.S. soon will be compelled to enter a new nuclear era that will be more precarious, psychologically disorienting, and economically even more costly than was Cold War deterrence. It is far from certain that we can successfully replicate the old Soviet-American "mutually assured destruction" with an increasing number of potential nuclear enemies world-wide without dramatically increasing the risk that nuclear weapons will be used. New nuclear states do not have the benefit of years of step-by-step safeguards put in effect during the Cold War to prevent nuclear accidents, misjudgments or unauthorized launches. The United States and the Soviet Union learned from mistakes that were less than fatal. Both countries were diligent to ensure that no nuclear weapon was used during the Cold War by design or by accident. Will new nuclear nations and the world be as fortunate in the next 50 years as we were during the Cold War? * * *

Leaders addressed this issue in earlier times. In his "Atoms for Peace" address to the United Nations in 1953, Dwight D. Eisenhower pledged America's "determination to help solve the fearful atomic dilemma -- to devote its entire heart and mind to find the way by which the miraculous inventiveness of man shall not be dedicated to his death, but consecrated to his life." John F. Kennedy, seeking to break the logjam on nuclear disarmament, said, "The world was not meant to be a prison in which man awaits his execution."

Rajiv Gandhi, addressing the U.N. General Assembly on June 9, 1988, appealed, "Nuclear war will not mean the death of a hundred million people. Or even a thousand million. It will mean the extinction of four thousand million: the end of life as we know it on our planet earth. We come to the United Nations to seek your support. We seek your support to put a stop to this madness."

Ronald Reagan called for the abolishment of "all nuclear weapons," which he considered to be "totally irrational, totally inhumane, good for nothing but killing, possibly destructive of life on earth and civilization." Mikhail Gorbachev shared this vision, which had also been expressed by previous American presidents.

Although Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev failed at Reykjavik to achieve the goal of an agreement to get rid of all nuclear weapons, they did succeed in turning the arms race on its head. They initiated steps leading to significant reductions in deployed long- and intermediate-range nuclear forces, including the elimination of an entire class of threatening missiles.

What will it take to rekindle the vision shared by Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev? Can a world-wide consensus be forged that defines a series of practical steps leading to major reductions in the nuclear danger? There is an urgent need to address the challenge posed by these two questions.

The Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) envisioned the end of all nuclear weapons. It provides (a) that states that did not possess nuclear weapons as of 1967 agree not to obtain them, and (b) that states that do possess them agree to divest themselves of these weapons over time. Every president of both parties since Richard Nixon has reaffirmed these treaty obligations, but non-nuclear weapon states have grown increasingly skeptical of the sincerity of the nuclear powers.

Strong non-proliferation efforts are under way. The Cooperative Threat Reduction program, the Global Threat Reduction Initiative, the Proliferation Security Initiative and the Additional Protocols are innovative approaches that provide powerful new tools for detecting activities that violate the NPT and endanger world security. They deserve full implementation. The negotiations on proliferation of nuclear weapons by North Korea and Iran, involving all the permanent members of the Security Council plus Germany and Japan, are crucially important. They must be energetically pursued.

But by themselves, none of these steps are adequate to the danger. Reagan and General Secretary Gorbachev aspired to accomplish more at their meeting in Reykjavik 20 years ago -- the elimination of nuclear weapons altogether. Their vision shocked experts in the doctrine of nuclear deterrence, but galvanized the hopes of people around the world. The leaders of the two countries with the largest arsenals of nuclear weapons discussed the abolition of their most powerful weapons. * * *

DOJ_NMG_0112441

What should be done? Can the promise of the NPT and the possibilities envisioned at Reykjavik be brought to fruition? We believe that a major effort should be launched by the United States to produce a positive answer through concrete stages.

First and foremost is intensive work with leaders of the countries in possession of nuclear weapons to turn the goal of a world without nuclear weapons into a joint enterprise. Such a joint enterprise, by involving changes in the disposition of the states possessing nuclear weapons, would lend additional weight to efforts already under way to avoid the emergence of a nuclear-armed North Korea and Iran.

The program on which agreements should be sought would constitute a series of agreed and urgent steps that would lay the groundwork for a world free of the nuclear threat. Steps would include:

· Changing the Cold War posture of deployed nuclear weapons to increase warning time and thereby reduce the danger of an accidental or unauthorized use of a nuclear weapon.

· Continuing to reduce substantially the size of nuclear forces in all states that possess them.

· Eliminating short-range nuclear weapons designed to be forward-deployed.

· Initiating a bipartisan process with the Senate, including understandings to increase confidence and provide for periodic review, to achieve ratification of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty, taking advantage of recent technical advances, and working to secure ratification by other key states.

· Providing the highest possible standards of security for all stocks of weapons, weapons-usable plutonium, and highly enriched uranium everywhere in the world.

· Getting control of the uranium enrichment process, combined with the guarantee that uranium for nuclear power reactors could be obtained at a reasonable price, first from the Nuclear Suppliers Group and then from the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) or other controlled international reserves. It will also be necessary to deal with proliferation issues presented by spent fuel from reactors producing electricity.

· Halting the production of fissile material for weapons globally; phasing out the use of highly enriched uranium in civil commerce and removing weapons-usable uranium from research facilities around the world and rendering the materials safe.

· Redoubling our efforts to resolve regional confrontations and conflicts that give rise to new nuclear powers.

Achieving the goal of a world free of nuclear weapons will also require effective measures to impede or counter any nuclear-related conduct that is potentially threatening to the security of any state or peoples.

Reassertion of the vision of a world free of nuclear weapons and practical measures toward achieving that goal would be, and would be perceived as, a bold initiative consistent with America's moral heritage. The effort could have a profoundly positive impact on the security of future generations. Without the bold vision, the actions will not be perceived as fair or urgent. Without the actions, the vision will not be perceived as realistic or possible.

We endorse setting the goal of a world free of nuclear weapons and working energetically on the actions required to achieve that goal, beginning with the measures outlined above.

Mr. Shultz, a distinguished fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford, was secretary of state from 1982 to 1989. Mr. Perry was secretary of defense from 1994 to 1997. Mr. Kissinger, chairman of Kissinger Associates, was secretary of state from 1973 to 1977. Mr. Nunn is former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

A conference organized by Mr. Shultz and Sidney D. Drell was held at Hoover to reconsider the vision that Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev brought to Reykjavik. In addition to Messrs. Shultz and Drell, the following participants also endorse the view in this statement: Martin Anderson, Steve Andreasen, Michael Armacost, William Crowe, James Goodby, Thomas Graham Jr., Thomas Henriksen, David Holloway, Max Kampelman, Jack Matlock, John McLaughlin, Don Oberdorfer, Rozanne Ridgway, Henry Rowen, Roald Sagdeev and Abraham Sofaer.

Energy From Another Backyard (WSJ)

By Norval Scott

Wall Street Journal, January 4, 2007

Saint John, New Brunswick

The oil and natural-gas industry is increasingly looking to Canada as a home for big energy projects Americans don't want in their backyards.

A patch of coniferous forest near here, on Canada's Atlantic coastline, represents both the promise and the challenges of that approach. The land, owned by closely held Canadian energy company Irving Oil, is earmarked for the possible construction of a 300,000-barrel-a-day crude-oil refinery that would cost $5 billion to $7 billion -- the first new refinery in the U.S. or Canada in more than 25 years. Irving hopes a refinery, if it chooses to build one, would be operational by 2013.

DOJ_NMG_0112442

The challenges include drawing international partners and a skilled work force to the sparsely populated area, as well as convincing locals that the changes are for the better.

The refinery development is the cornerstone of a concerted regional attempt to construct a huge "energy hub" in New Brunswick, supplying the markets of Boston and New York with gasoline, natural gas and eventually petrochemicals and related products. That would increase U.S. energy reliance on Canada, which already supplies 16% of its imported oil and oil products and about 85% of its imported natural gas.

The effort is the latest sign of increased interest just outside U.S. borders, in part to supply the U.S. market. Two liquefied-natural-gas where gas shipped from overseas in transportable liquid form will be processed for consumer use -- are planned for British Columbia.

Mexico also has drawn interest. In August, an LNG terminal on the country's east coast owned by Royal Dutch Shell PLC of the U.K., Total SA of France and Mitsui & Co. of Japan accepted its first delivery. Others are planned for Mexico's west coast, intended to supply some gas to Southern California. But Mexico's energy infrastructure is less-developed and the nation faces its own supply concerns.

Confronting 'Nimby'

The rise in U.S. energy demand shows no signs of easing, despite higher prices as supplies world-wide become harder to find. The country also has been slow to invest in the infrastructure necessary to bring extra imports to consumers, due in part to concerns about the cyclical nature of the energy business. Also hurting matters is the widespread not-in-my-backyard attitude -- "Nimby" for short -- toward new industrial investment, which has notably delayed development of LNG terminals in the U.S.

Saint John, which is conveniently close to the U.S. Northeast, has both a natural deepwater port that could accommodate more shipping and a large amount of unused land suited for industrial development.

Irving Oil, which already has a 300,000-barrel-a-day refinery at Saint John that exports petroleum products to the U.S., also is building an LNG terminal there in conjunction with Spanish energy company Repsol YPF SA, with plans to import about one billion cubic feet of natural gas a day to meet U.S. demand.

Irving is in talks with potential partners and is gauging local support for the possible new refinery, with an eye to applying for a refining permit early this year. Local officials hope that will contribute to the economic regeneration needed by Saint John, a city hard hit by the decline of both the shipbuilding industry and Atlantic cod stocks. The campaign of New Brunswick's recently elected premier, Shawn Graham, focused on making the province a leader in energy generation.

"Canada has been a reliable supplier of energy to the U.S., and that's something we'd like to expand," said Irving Oil President Kenneth Irving, grandson of the company founder. "As long as we keep getting [local] encouragement, we're going to try our best to make this a reality."

The company says it is negotiating with potential oil-supplying partners, though it won't disclose names. To attract a partner, Irving is touting the potential refinery as a processor of heavier grades of crude oil, which are tougher to refine and which oil producers can find harder to sell in world markets.

Irving and local supporters hope to win locals and attract skilled labor, which has left the region in recent years due to a lack of work and the oil-sands boom in faraway Alberta. Last month, regional advocacy group Atlantic Canada published a brochure in Alberta's major cities, seeking to draw workers back to Eastern Canada by illustrating the region's affordable living and laid-back lifestyle.

The Irving family owns many local businesses, in fields from construction and shipbuilding to forestry and newspapers. The family's local dominance has led some locals to question whether the regional government is holding Irving Oil to full account. In 2005, the New Brunswick legislature capped property taxes on the LNG terminal at 500,000 Canadian dollars (US$430,000) a year for 25 years. Opponents of the deal say that's about a tenth of what U.S.-based Anadarko Petroleum Corp. will pay in taxes on the similarly-sized, though less expensive, Bear Head LNG terminal in Nova Scotia.

Power Play

"Irving Oil has so much power in Saint John and New Brunswick that people are afraid to stand up to them," said Leland Thomas, a founding member of the group Friends of Rockwood Park, which opposes the route chosen for the pipeline to the LNG plant. "They're not paying full value for what they're getting."

City officials claim the property tax cap was vital to ensure the LNG terminal was built in Saint John. At the time, Mayor Norm McFarlane said the decision "would rest well for the next 50 years here."

Some locals still see the terminal as a safety hazard, with a terrorist attack on LNG facilities a particular concern. "We're taking all the risk, and yet all the supplies are going to the U.S.," said Carol Brown, a Saint John restaurateur who refuses to refuel her car at Irving Oil stations.

Irving Oil says it's had a largely positive response from the local community. The company believes its policy of consulting with locals about the project at an early stage -- before applying for any permits have been made -- will enable it to convince them of its merits. "The information we've had so far has been very encouraging," said Mr. Irving. "We believe this project has the right balance of aligning commercial interests along with those of the community."

DOJ_NMG_0112443

DOJ_NMG_0112444

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, January 5, 2007 8:02 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	FW: Department of Justice News Clips for Friday, January 05, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070105.pdf; dojclips070105.doc

This morning's Department of Justice News Clips is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNews' express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, JANUARY 5, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

W Pushes Envelope On U.S. Spying (NYDN) 5
Bush Administration Defends Emergency Mail Inspection (USAT) 5
White House Denies Switch In Mail Policy (NYT) 6
Bush Warned About Mail-Opening Authority (WP) 7
Bush: Mail Subject To Warrantless Searches (CBS) 8
A Terror Detainee Longs For Court (NYT) 9
Defense Rests After Hearing From Torture Expert At Hamas Trial In U.S. (AP) 13
Grocer Pleads Guilty To Misleading Federal Agents (NSDY/AP) 14

Homeland Response:

Court To Consider Conflicting Portraits Of Would-be Subway Bomber (AP) 14
Ill. Man Indicted In Hand Grenade Case (AP) 15
Federal Grand Jury Indicts Shareef (RRS) 15
Democrats Set Homeland Security Changes (AP) 15
4 Cities Cut, 4 Added For Terror Grants (AP) 16
Inside The Ring (WT) 17

War News:

Bush Will Seek Aid, Jobs Funds To Bolster Iraq (WSJ) 19
Bush Talks To Al-Maliki, Set To Reveal New Iraq Strategy (WT) 20
Bush Making Changes In His Iraq Team (WP) 21
Why America Should Operate From Iraq's Borders (FT) 23
The Hanging: Beyond Travesty (WP) 24
Dynamic Ideas For Iraq (WSJ) 25
New Congress Leery Of Bush's Iraq Plans (LAT) 26
McCain Reaffirms Support For US Troop 'Surge' In Iraq (AFP) 28
Short-Circuiting The Surge (WP) 28
Jubilant Democrats Assume Control On Capitol Hill (NYT) 29
House Dems Lead Quick Action On Ethics Pelosi Assumes Speaker's Post Amid Pledges Of Bipartisanship (AJC) 31
New Congress, Old Fights; Choosing Teams For 2008 (WSJ) 32
War Foes Set Sights On New Majority (WT) 33
White House Postponing Loss Of Iraq, Biden Says (WP) 34
Shays Says More Troops In Iraq Is A 'Huge Mistake' (HARTC) 34
Bush Shaking Up Team Responsible For Carrying Out Iraq Strategies (USAT/AP) 35
Bush To Make Changes In Key National Security Jobs (MCT) 36
Bush To Name A New General To Oversee Iraq (NYT) 37
Bush To Reveal New Commanders, War Strategy Next Week (LAT) 39
Concern As Spy Chief Quits To Join Rice (FT) 40
Bush Is Expected To Shift U.S. Ambassador In Iraq To U.N. (NYT) 41
Negroponte Moves To Job Considered Crucial At State Dept. (WP) 43
Negroponte To State? You Heard It Here First. (WP) 44
Speculation Surrounds Choice By Spy Chief To Take Step Back (NYT) 45
Negroponte Shift Is Ruffling Feathers (LAT) 47
Negroponte To Shift To No. 2 Diplomat (WT) 48
Bush To Nominate Khalilzad For U.N. Job (AP) 49
Mr. Negroponte's Newest Job (NYT) 50
A Small Change (LAT) 51
Bush To Name Retired Admiral As Top Spy (AP) 51
Pentagon Link To Spy Chief Pick Arouses Concern (WSJ) 53
Nominee Played Big Role In Outsourcing Intelligence (USAT) 54
John Michael McConnell, A Member Of The Club (NYT) 55
Bush Says Hussein 'Was Given Justice' (LAT) 56

Lawmakers Criticize Video Of Hussein's Final Minutes (NYT) 56
2 Guards Arrested For Hussein Video, Official Says (WP) 57
U.S.-Iraqi Forces Launch Assault On Sunni Haven (LAT) 58
Bombs Kill 13 In Baghdad After Brief Lull In Violence (USAT/AP) 59
Deadly Blasts In Baghdad Leave Gruesome Traces (NYT) 60
13 Killed In Baghdad Bombings (WT/AP) 61
Arrested Iranians 'Were Trying To Influence Iraqi Government': BBC (AFP) 62
Denying The Facts, Finding The Truth (NYT) 63
If Iraq Fragments, What's Plan B? (CSM) 64
A Mother Fights For A Soldier Who Said No To War (WP) 66
Theft Probe Leads To N.Va. Storage Site (WP) 68
Taliban Leader Promises More Afghan War (NYT) 69
Taliban Leader's Powerful Vanishing Act (LAT) 70
Pakistan Premier Wants Afghan Refugees To Return Home (NYT) 72
Medical Teams Saving More Troops (WT) 72
The Battle Of Iraq's Wounded (LAT) 73

DOJ:

J.Lo Honored By People En Espanol (AP) 74
Hopi Recommended For US Attorney Post (AZREP) 75
Low-profile Demeanor In A High-profile Job (MDGAZ) 76

Corporate Scandals:

Prosecutors End Case In Long AOL Fraud Trial (WP) 78
Gadflies Get Respect, And Not Just At Home Depot (NYT) 79
Nardelli's 'Severance' (WSJ) 81
One Bad Apple (WP) 82

Criminal Law:

Prosecutors Cite More Favors By Lawmaker (WP) 82
Ex Mass. House Speaker Indicted (AP) 83
Finneran Faces Loss Of State Pension (BOS) 84
Get Out Of Jail - But Not For Free: Finneran Deal May KO Job, Pension, Law Career (BOSH) 85
Former State Official Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison (AP) 85
Ad Man Sentenced For Pay-to-play (PHI) 86
Exec In Pay-to-play Scam Gets Probation (PHI) 87
Judge Rejects Herrera Delay (LVRJ) 88
Convicted Commissioner In Las Vegas Can't Delay Prison Date (AP) 88
Kopp Jurors Questioned On Abortion (NSDY/AP) 88
Nab 23 In Mortgage Con (NYDN) 89
FEDS NAB BROKERS IN FRAUD SCHEME (NYPOST) 89
Feds: We Have Scammers Behind Millions In Fraudulent Loans (WNBC) 90
Former Benton County Defense Lawyer Enters Plea In Bribery Case (AP) 90
Ex-health Care Company President Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud (AP) 91
Former Jackson County Executive Charged In Mortgage Fraud Case (AP) 91
U.S. Death Sentences Drop To 30-year Low (AP) 92
Rethinking The Death Penalty (NYT) 93
No Whitey After All These Years (BOSH) 93
Hunt For Whitey Bulger Still Targeting Hub Kin (BOS) 93
Embezzlement Is Found In Catholic Dioceses (NYT) 95
Remain Silent? Some In Custody Spell It All Out (NYT) 97

Civil Law:

Fat Chance (WP) 99
Diet Pill Sellers Fined $25M (USAT) 100
Eli Lilly Settles More Zyprexa Lawsuits (WP/AP) 100

Civil Rights:

U.S. Justice Department Won't Investigate Portsmouth Jail Death (VAPILOT) 101
Dismissal Of Boys Town Suit Eyed (WT) 101

Antitrust:

Auto Paint Antitrust Suit Nets $105 Million (LAW) 102
Visa, MasterCard Settle With Government (WSJ) 103
Brussels Raises Heat On Energy Companies (FT) 103
S Korea Watchdog Probes Qualcomm (FT) 104
South Korea Regulator Probes Qualcomm (AP) 105
Issues Of Power, Prestige Doom Law Firm Merger (WSJ) 105
2 Law Firms Call Off Plans For A Merger (NYT) 107
LSE Holder Raises Its Stake (WSJ) 108

Environment:

Parks Agency Leaves Controversial Book On Shelf (NYT) 109
A Revitalized Chesapeake May Be Decades Away (WP) 110

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Rehnquist Drug Dependency Detailed (AP) 111
Sedative Withdrawal Made Rehnquist Delusional In '81 (WP) 113
Torture Case Defendant Loses 1st Legal Fight (SPT) 114
Five Men Indicted On Drug Charges (BSUN) 115
Feds Will Help County Go After Gang Members (PALMBEACHP) 116
Colombia Extradites 2 Police Officers (AP) 116
Colombia Extradites Policemen To U.S. (WT) 117

DOJ_NMG_0112447

Colombia Extradites Two Police Officers To US On Drug Smuggling Charges (VOA) 117

Immigration:

Wisconsin Man, 81, Ordered Deported; Was SS Guard (AP) 118

Tax:

Suit Says Couple Cost U.S. Treasury Millions (JSO) 118

Congress-Administration:

Democrats Take Control Of Congress (AP) 119
Democrats Elect First Female Speaker, Pass Lobbying Reforms (MCT) 120
Nancy Pelosi Basks In Historic Day (AP) 122
Civility, Synergy Top Order In Senate (WT) 123
Reid Takes Center Stage, But He's Hardly The Star Of The Show (WP) 124
Smiles, Backslaps, Even A Civility Meeting: For A Day, At Least, Bipartisanship Reigns (NYT) 126
Jubilant Democrats Take The Wheel On Capitol Hill (LAT) 127
Democrats Take Control Of Congress (CHIT) 128
Speaker Pelosi's Ethics (WSJ) 129
Republicans Take Back-to-Basics Tack (WP) 131
Bush Practices A Reach Across The Aisle (LAT) 132
Democrats To 'issue Toughest Ethics Reform' (FT) 134
Senate Feels Heat As House Cranks Up Ethics Overhaul (NYT) 135
Democrats Take Control On Hill (WP) 136
Pelosi Sets Aggressive Pace (WSJ) 138
For Democrats, A Choice: Forward Or Reverse? (NYT) 139
After The 100 Hours, A War Awaits (WP) 140
Tax Cuts And The Minimum Wage (NYT) 141
House Warming (WP) 142
Women Bask In New Speaker's Shining Moment (WP) 143
Congress Reopens Under New Management (USAT) 145
Joyful Democrats Salute Speaker Pelosi (WT) 146
Forgive The Cynicism, But This Is Change? (WP) 147
In New Senate, The 'Candy Desk' Gets A Kiss-Off (WSJ) 148
Miers Resigns As White House Counsel (AP) 149
Miers Steps Down As White House Gears Up For Battle (WP) 150
Miers Steps Down As White House Counsel (NYT) 152
The Reliable Source (WP) 152
First, Do Less Harm (NYT) 153
Medicare Drug Plan's 2nd Year Less Bumpy (USAT) 154
First Muslim Lawmaker Takes Oath With Quran (USAT) 155
Ellison Uses Thomas Jefferson's Quran (AP) 156
1st Muslim Elected To Congress Takes Office (MCT) 156
Jefferson's Koran Used In Ceremony (WT) 157
Administrator Is Dismissed From Nuclear Security Post (NYT) 158
After Breaches, Head Of U.S. Nuclear Program Is Ousted (WP) 159
Nuclear Weapons Administrator Ousted (LAT) 159
Nuclear Agency Head Dismissed For Lapses (AP) 160
Agencies Bid Farewell To Retiring "Elders" (WP) 162
Good Times Or Good Governance (WP) 163
Lagging Judicial Pay (NYT) 164
Tax As You Go (WSJ) 165

Other News:

Warm Weather Weighs On Price Of Oil (USAT) 166
Energy, Mining Firms Take Hit (WSJ) 166
The First Energy President (NYT) 167
Rise In Ethanol Raises Concerns About Corn As A Food (NYT) 168
New Prospect For US: Glut Of Ethanol Plants (CSM) 169
Data Indicate Growth Softened During December (WSJ) 171
Holiday Sales Look Happier Than Expected (USAT) 171
Holiday-Sales Figures Leave Big Gaps (WSJ) 172
Markets Finish Higher Despite Unease (USAT/AP) 174
Rates On 30-Year Mortgages Unchanged (AP) 174
Pending Sales Of Existing Homes In U.S. Fell 0.5% (Update1) (BLOOM) 175
Court Weighs Parental Rights Of Sperm Donors (USAT) 176
First Black Governor Of Mass. Sworn In (AP) 177
Massachusetts Swears In A Black Democrat As Governor (NYT) 178
Four Stars Lead Early GOP Race (CSM) 179
Inside Politics (WT) 181
The Anti-Clinton (TIME) 182
Bill Clinton Turns Heads In The Senate (MACT) 183
Challengers Join Hands To Unseat Texas Speaker (WT) 184
Virginia's Moment Of Clarity (WP) 185
Rice Announces $16M In Aid For Somalia (AP) 185
Troops Fight Militiamen In The South (WP/AP) 186
US Helps Contain Somalia's Islamist Forces (FT) 186
U.S. Ships Hunt For Al Qaeda Off Somalia (WT/LDT) 187
Somali Government Seeks To Tighten Its Grip Amid Chaos (NYT) 188
Somalis Adapt Warily, Pragmatically To New Order In Capital (WP) 189
Somalia's Chance (WP) 190
Pentagon To Train A Sharper Eye On Africa (CSM) 191
No Breakthrough After Israel-Egypt Talks (AP) 192

DOJ_NMG_0112448

Israeli Raid Overshadows Olmert's Talks With Mubarak (NYT) 193
Israeli Arrest Raid In West Bank Kills 4 Palestinians (WP) 195
10 Palestinians Killed In Raid, Clashes (AP) 196
Treasury Steps Up Pressure On Syria (AP) 197
Bush Looking At Global Warming Ideas (AP) 198
Bush Makes Light Of Earlier Gaffe (AP) 199
New Mexico Governor Heads To Sudan On Diplomatic Mission (AP) 199
Police Uncover Explosives In Spain's Basque Region (WP/AP) 199

DOJ_NMG_0112449

TERRORISM NEWS:

W Pushes Envelope On U.S. Spying (NYDN)

By James Gordon Meek

New York Daily News, January 4, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush has quietly claimed sweeping new powers to open Americans' mail without a judge's warrant, the Daily News has learned.

The President asserted his new authority when he signed a postal reform bill into law on Dec. 20. Bush then issued a "signing statement" that declared his right to open people's mail under emergency conditions.

That claim is contrary to existing law and contradicted the bill he had just signed, say experts who have reviewed it.

Bush's move came during the winter congressional recess and a year after his secret domestic electronic eavesdropping program was first revealed. It caught Capitol Hill by surprise.

"Despite the President's statement that he may be able to circumvent a basic privacy protection, the new postal law continues to prohibit the government from snooping into people's mail without a warrant," said Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), the incoming House Government Reform Committee chairman, who co-sponsored the bill.

Experts said the new powers could be easily abused and used to vacuum up large amounts of mail.

"The [Bush] signing statement claims authority to open domestic mail without a warrant, and that would be new and quite alarming," said Kate Martin, director of the Center for National Security Studies in Washington.

"The danger is they're reading Americans' mail," she said.

"You have to be concerned," agreed a career senior U.S. official who reviewed the legal underpinnings of Bush's claim. "It takes Executive Branch authority beyond anything we've ever known."

A top Senate Intelligence Committee aide promised, "It's something we're going to look into."

Most of the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act deals with mundane reform measures. But it also explicitly reinforced protections of first-class mail from searches without a court's approval.

Yet in his statement Bush said he will "construe" an exception, "which provides for opening of an item of a class of mail otherwise sealed against inspection in a manner consistent ... with the need to conduct searches in exigent circumstances."

Bush cited as examples the need to "protect human life and safety against hazardous materials and the need for physical searches specifically authorized by law for foreign intelligence collection."

White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore denied Bush was claiming any new authority.

"In certain circumstances - such as with the proverbial 'ticking bomb' - the Constitution does not require warrants for reasonable searches," she said.

Bush, however, cited "exigent circumstances" which could refer to an imminent danger or a longstanding state of emergency.

Critics point out the administration could quickly get a warrant from a criminal court or a Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court judge to search targeted mail, and the Postal Service could block delivery in the meantime.

But the Bush White House appears to be taking no chances on a judge saying no while a terror attack is looming, national security experts agreed.

Martin said that Bush is "using the same legal reasoning to justify warrantless opening of domestic mail" as he did with warrantless eavesdropping.

Bush Administration Defends Emergency Mail Inspection (USAT)

By Mimi Hall And David Jackson

USA Today, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112450

WASHINGTON — The White House on Thursday defended a policy allowing the government to open mail without a warrant, despite criticism that the crime-fighting tactic might lead to privacy breaches.

Bush administration and Postal Service officials said citizens' mail remains constitutionally protected from unreasonable search and seizure. But White House spokesman Tony Snow said the United States needs to have the power to inspect mail in emergencies.

The mail controversy erupted Wednesday after a report in the New York Daily News that President Bush on Dec. 20 attached a so-called signing statement to a new postal law. The statement grants the government the authority during emergencies to bypass a law forbidding mail to be opened without a warrant.

Snow said Bush was simply reiterating authority the government already has under the law.

U.S. Postal Service spokesman Thomas Day concurred. "The president is not exerting any new authority," he said.

Snow did not say what emergency circumstances might warrant inspections of the mail.

Brian Walsh, a lawyer at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said the authority likely would only be used in extreme cases, such as if police learned a bomb or an envelope containing anthrax or another biohazard was in the mail.

If the government didn't have the authority for prompt inspections, the mail — particularly overnight delivery — could become "a courier service for drug dealers or terrorists," Walsh said.

Privacy rights advocates expressed concern that the administration could loosely define emergency situations to include looking at mail sent by or delivered to people who might wrongly be included on the government's terrorist watch lists.

The American Civil Liberties Union said such "deliberate ambiguity" was troublesome.

It "raises a red flag because of President Bush's history of asserting broad powers to spy on Americans," ACLU Director Anthony Romero said.

Others accused Bush of making an end-run around the Constitution and Congress.

"This opens the door into the government prying into private communications," said Jonathan Hafetz, a lawyer with the Brennan Center for Justice. "It's something we associate with a totalitarian or police state."

In Congress, where Democrats took control of both houses Thursday for the first time in 12 years, some lawmakers expressed unease about the practice.

"Every American wants foolproof protection against terrorism," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said. "But history has shown it can and should be done within the confines of the Constitution. This last-minute, irregular and unauthorized reinterpretation of a duly passed law is the exact type of maneuver that voters so resoundingly rejected in November."

White House Denies Switch In Mail Policy (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — The White House said Thursday that President Bush was not claiming any new executive authority last month when he issued a statement suggesting that postal inspectors could open mail without a warrant in emergency circumstances.

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said the statement Mr. Bush issued in signing postal legislation was merely a restatement of existing law allowing mail to be opened without a warrant in “exigent circumstances” to protect public safety.

“All this is saying is that there are provisions at law for, in exigent circumstances, for such inspections,” Mr. Snow said. “It has been thus. This is not a change in the law. This is not new.”

The questions arose after The New York Daily News published an article Thursday drawing attention to the Dec. 20 signing statement and legal questions surrounding it. The front page featured a photo of Mr. Bush alongside the banner headline: “I’ve got mail! And it’s yours!”

Federal law, in keeping with the constitutional prohibition on unreasonable searches, generally prohibits the government from opening first-class mail without a warrant. But a 1996 postal provision allows postal inspectors to open mail without a warrant in narrow circumstances if there is credible evidence that a package contains a bomb or other dangerous material.

DOJ_NMG_0112451

Mr. Bush has drawn intense scrutiny and criticism from Democrats and groups like the American Bar Association for issuing signing statements reserving the right to disregard more than 800 selected provisions of measures he signed into law , often on the grounds that they represented an unconstitutional infringement on executive authority.

In signing the postal legislation last month, Mr. Bush said that its restrictions on the opening of mail should be construed "in a manner consistent, to the maximum extent permissible, with the need to conduct searches in exigent circumstances, such as to protect human life and safety against hazardous materials, and the need for physical searches specifically authorized by law for foreign intelligence collection."

Mr. Snow said Mr. Bush had not claimed any "sweeping new powers" through the statement, as The Daily News article asserted, and the Postal Service issued a statement Thursday echoing that assessment.

"As has been the longstanding practice, first-class mail is protected from unreasonable search and seizure when in postal custody," said Thomas Day, a senior vice president for the Postal Service. "Nothing in the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act changes this protection. The president is not exerting any new authority."

Critics were not so certain.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, called Mr. Bush's signing statement a "last-minute, irregular and unauthorized reinterpretation of a duly passed law" protecting the privacy of mail users. The American Civil Liberties Union said it would press to find out how often mailings had been opened without a warrant.

Bush Warned About Mail-Opening Authority (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

President Bush signed a little-noticed statement last month asserting the authority to open U.S. mail without judicial warrants in emergencies or foreign intelligence cases, prompting warnings yesterday from Democrats and privacy advocates that the administration is attempting to circumvent legal restrictions on its powers.

A "signing statement" attached to a postal reform bill on Dec. 20 says the Bush administration "shall construe" a section of that law to allow the opening of sealed mail to protect life, guard against hazardous materials or conduct "physical searches specifically authorized by law for foreign intelligence collection."

White House and U.S. Postal Service officials said the statement was not intended to expand the powers of the executive branch but merely to clarify existing ones for extreme cases.

"This is not a change in law, this is not new, it is not . . . a sweeping new power by the president," spokesman Tony Snow told reporters. "It is, in fact, merely a statement of present law and present authorities granted to the president of the United States."

But some civil liberties and national-security law experts said the statement's language is unduly vague and appears to go beyond long-recognized limits on the ability of the government to open letters and other U.S. mail without approval from a judge.

Kate Martin, director of the Center for National Security Studies in Washington, said the government has long been able to legally open mail believed to contain a bomb or other imminent threat. But authorities are generally required to seek a warrant from a criminal or special intelligence court in other cases, Martin and other experts said.

"The administration is playing games about warrants," Martin said. "If they are not claiming new powers, then why did they need to issue a signing statement?"

Administration critics said they were particularly confused because the relevant portion of the postal reform legislation -- which prohibits opening mail without warrants in most circumstances -- remains unchanged.

A White House official, who was not authorized to speak on the record, said the signing statement, first revealed by the New York Daily News, was intended only to make clear that the new law would not limit the ability of the president or attorney general to open mail under emergency provisions of the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which governs spying in the United States. That law allows authorities to conduct searches and surveillance without warrants in emergency situations, although they must apply for a warrant later.

DOJ_NMG_0112452

"The point was that because Congress was passing this anew, the concern was that there would be some confusion," the official said. "The law that's been around since 1978 still allows you to conduct warrantless physical searches under some circumstances, and nothing changes that authority."

The debate over the signing statement comes after disclosures over the past year that Bush authorized a program that allows the National Security Agency to monitor telephone and e-mail communications between the United States and other countrieswithout court oversight. The administration has strongly defended the legality of the NSA spying program, arguing that Congress authorized it as part of the war on al-Qaeda and, even if it had not, that the president has the power to order such surveillance.

In addition to searching for a bomb or other hazardous device, postal officials are legally allowed to open letters that cannot be delivered as addressed, but only to find a correct destination for the parcel. The FBI and other law enforcement agencies are also allowed to obtain authority from postal inspectors to track mail without opening it.

The latest statement caused a small ruckus on Capitol Hill yesterday just as Democrats were taking control of Congress. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, called the statement a "last-minute, irregular and unauthorized reinterpretation of a duly passed law."

Sharp limits have been placed on the government's power to open mail since the 1970s, when a congressional committee investigating abuses found that, for three decades, the CIA and FBI had illegally opened hundreds of thousands of pieces of U.S. mail. Among the targets were "large numbers of American dissidents, including those who challenged the condition of racial minorities and those who opposed the war in Vietnam," according to a report by the Senate panel, known as the Church committee. Also surveilled was "the mail of Senators, Congressmen, journalists, businessmen, and even a Presidential candidate," the report said.

During his tenure, Bush has made plentiful use of signing statements, which are issued along with a president's signature on legislation. Although previous presidents used them as guidance for the executive branch, Bush has offered revised interpretations of laws on constitutional or national security grounds in some of his statements.

Bush: Mail Subject To Warrantless Searches (CBS)

CBS News, January 5, 2007

Presidential Signing Statement Claims Feds Can Open Mail In Certain Circumstances

(CBS/AP) President George W. Bush has created more controversy over his domestic intelligence gathering policies with a previously unnoticed "Signing Statement" attached to a postal reform bill which claims federal officials can open U.S. mail without a warrant.

The law as passed by the House and Senate requires government agents to get warrants to open first-class letters.

But the presidential statement, signed on December 20, added that sealed mail can be searched in "exigent circumstances, such as to protect human life and safety against hazardous materials, and the need for physical searches specifically authorized by law for foreign intelligence."

The White House said the president is not claiming any new authority and that the statement does not change the scope of current law.

Spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore told CBS News White House correspondent Mark Knoller, "The signing statement merely recognizes a legal proposition that is totally uncontroversial: that in certain circumstances – such as with the proverbial 'ticking bomb' – the Constitution does not require warrants for reasonable searches."

But CBS News legal analyst Andrew Cohen questioned why the president felt it necessary to attach the language to the bill if nothing has changed.

"I don't think the White House would have included this language into a signing statement unless the feds were either already searching mail without a warrant or planning to do so," Cohen said. "And if the legal right to do so were as clear as the White House now says it's hard to believe that there was a need to remind everyone of the fact in a bill about the postal service."

DOJ_NMG_0112453

"The signing statement raises serious questions whether he is authorizing opening of mail contrary to the Constitution and to laws enacted by Congress," said Ann Beeson, an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union. "What is the purpose of the signing statement if it isn't that?"

She said the group is planning to file request for information on how this exception will be used and also asking whether it has already been used to open mail.

Postal Vice President Tom Day said Thursday: "As has been the long-standing practice, first class mail is protected from unreasonable search and seizure when in postal custody. Nothing in the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act changes this protection. The president is not exerting any new authority."

However, Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., criticized Bush's action.

"Every American wants foolproof protection against terrorism. But history has shown it can and should be done within the confines of the Constitution. This last-minute, irregular and unauthorized reinterpretation of a duly passed law is the exact type of maneuver that voters so resoundingly rejected in November," Schumer said.

The White House first came under scrutiny for its domestic surveillance policies in December 2005 when the New York Times revealed a National Security Agency program which eavesdropped on phone calls without warrants to do so.

Mr. Bush claimed the NSA program is needed in the war on terrorism; opponents say it oversteps constitutional boundaries on free speech, privacy and executive powers.

In October, a federal appeals court allowed the domestic spying program to continue after a lower court had ordered it stopped.

President Bush has also come under fire from legal experts for creating or expanding presidential powers in bill signing statements. In July, an American Bar Association task force said that the president was violating the Constitution by doing so.

"If left unchecked, the president's practice does grave harm to the separation of powers doctrine, and the system of checks and balances that have sustained our democracy for more than two centuries," ABA president Michael Greco said at the time.

Bush has issued at least 750 signing statements during his presidency, more than all other presidents combined, according to the ABA.

Typically, presidents have used signing statements for such purposes as instructing executive agencies how to carry out new laws.

Bush's statements often reserve the right to revise, interpret or disregard laws on national security and constitutional grounds.

Both the warrantless searches and the president's use of signing statement's could be challenged by the newly convened Democratic congress.

"With Democrats now in control of Congress, don't be surprised if we see an investigation into these sorts of uses of signing statements and of the White House's legal authority to undertake searches like this without a warrant or other court order," Cohen said.

A Terror Detainee Longs For Court (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

Ali al-Marri, whom the government calls a sleeper agent for Al Qaeda and who is the only person on the American mainland still held as an enemy combatant, spends his days in a small cell in solitary confinement at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C. When he is in an ironic mood, his lawyers say, he calls the cell his villa.

Mr. Marri waits there for word from his wife, two sons and three daughters, whom he last saw in 2001, just before his arrest in Peoria, Ill., where he was studying computer science at Bradley University.

Letters arrive, but they are late and have words and sentences blacked out. A note his wife sent to him 10 months ago landed recently. It began with a standard Muslim invocation, but a word was missing. Mr. Marri is pretty sure it was “Allah.”

DOJ_NMG_0112454

But mostly Mr. Marri waits for word from a federal appeals court, which will soon rule on one of the most urgent questions in American law, one his case presents in stark form: May the government indefinitely detain a foreigner living legally in the United States, without charges and without access to the courts?

Mr. Marri, who is 41 and a citizen of Qatar, wants the right to challenge President Bush's assertion that he is a terrorist and "a grave danger to the national security of the United States."

The Bush administration says the courts cannot second-guess the president when he decides that someone is an enemy combatant, at least when noncitizens are involved. Detaining combatants is a military rather than a criminal matter, the administration says, adding that its purpose is not to punish the prisoner but to stop him from returning to the battlefield.

The implications of that position are startling, according to a brief filed last month in Mr. Marri's case by some 30 constitutional scholars. "The government's interpretation would be vastly threatening to the liberty of more than 20 million noncitizens residing in the United States," the brief said, "exposing them to the risk of irremediable indefinite detention on the basis of unfounded rumors, mistaken identity, the desperation of other detainees subject to coercive interrogation, and the deliberate lies of actual terrorists."

Kathleen M. Blomquist, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, disputed that contention.

"Of all the terrorists currently in the custody of the United States military, al-Marri is the only one who was captured in the United States," Ms. Blomquist said, adding that the notion that millions of people are at risk is "unfounded and absurd."

Mr. Bush's determination that Mr. Marri is an enemy combatant, she said, was based on substantial evidence, including "his association with Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, mastermind of the 9/11 attacks, and files found on his computer concerning chemical weapons of mass destruction."

Mr. Marri maintains his innocence, his lawyers say. But they have refused to offer point-by-point rebuttals of the government's detailed assertions, calling instead for prosecutors to offer evidence to back them up in court.

"In a civilized society and under American law and tradition," said Jonathan Hafetz, a lawyer for Mr. Marri with the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law, "the government has the obligation to prove its case."

One of Mr. Marri's brothers, Mohammed Marri, in a telephone interview from Qatar, rejected the charge that Mr. Marri is a terrorist. "For sure it's not true," he said.

A third brother, Jarallah, is at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, held as an enemy combatant based on accusations that he had visited a Qaeda camp. "This is not a proper way to treat other people from other countries," Mohammed Marri said of his brothers and other detainees. "If they are guilty, let them prove it in court."

An Exclusive Club

The Charleston brig can hold 288 military prisoners and 6 enemy combatants, but there have never been more than 3 in the exclusive enemy combatant club. Two of them are now gone.

One of them, Yaser Hamdi, was freed and sent to Saudi Arabia after the United States Supreme Court allowed him to challenge his detention in 2004. Jose Padilla was transferred to the criminal justice system last year just as the Supreme Court was considering whether to review his case. That leaves only Mr. Marri.

Mr. Hamdi and Mr. Padilla are American citizens, but Mr. Marri is not. They were seized abroad or on their way back to the United States, while Mr. Marri was living what seemed to be an ordinary life, in Peoria, a city often caricatured as the nation's most ordinary, with a family and a minivan.

The government contends in a partly declassified declaration from a senior defense intelligence official, Jeffrey N. Rapp, and in a recent book by former Attorney General John Ashcroft, that Mr. Marri was a Qaeda sleeper agent sent to the United States to commit mass murder and disrupt the banking system.

The assertions have not been tested in court, and human rights groups say they are based on unreliable evidence "There is substantial reason to believe," lawyers for two of the groups wrote in a brief in November, "that the allegations of the Rapp declaration are derived from the torture of two men interrogated at Guantánamo Bay and other detention sites: Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and Mustafa Ahmed al-Hawsawi."

The government says that Mr. Hawsawi was one of the financiers of the Sept. 11 attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0112455

Mr. Rapp's declaration cites the personal views of Mr. Mohammed, who is often referred to as K.S.M. "K.S.M. considered al-Marri an ideal sleeper agent," Mr. Rapp wrote.

Kept in Isolation

Mr. Marri was kept in isolation at the brig and, according to his court filings, subjected to tough interrogation. Interrogators threatened to send him to Egypt or Saudi Arabia, according to a lawsuit filed on his behalf in 2005, "where, they told him, he would be tortured and sodomized and where his wife would be raped in front on him."

"By winter '05," Andrew J. Savage, who also represents Mr. Marri, said in a recent interview, "I genuinely thought he was losing his mind. He told me in this sort of indirect way that he might not be able to hold on, that his mind was playing tricks on him."

Mr. Padilla's lawyers have said that their client's time in the brig was so grueling that he is not fit to stand trial. But while Mr. Padilla was passive, Mr. Marri pushed back. He put wet toilet paper on the video camera, for instance. The brig responded by taking away his mattress, Koran and hygienic products, including his toilet paper.

"There is almost nothing to distract him from his torment," his lawyers wrote in the lawsuit, "and he therefore becomes preoccupied with his pain and the degradation he suffers."

Perhaps as a consequence of the lawsuit, conditions have improved.

When Mr. Marri's lawyers were first allowed to see him in October 2004, after the decision in Mr. Hamdi's case, Mr. Marri was behind a transparent barrier and bound in leg-irons and handcuffs that were linked to a belly-chain and fastened to the floor. Officials from the Defense Intelligence Agency and the brig were present, and the conversation was videotaped.

On a recent visit, Mr. Savage said, he met his client in a visiting lounge. Mr. Marri, who was not restrained, was wearing stylish bifocals rather than institutional prison glasses. He was also wearing a watch, which makes it easier for him to know when to pray.

Mr. Savage brought hummus and pita bread. "We sat down, we broke bread, and we had a three-and-a-half hour conversation, unmonitored," Mr. Savage said.

Mr. Marri is now allowed to watch television in the evening, but not the news. He reads newspapers and magazines, but they are edited. "Brig staff remove all materials associated with the war on terror from them," Cmdr. Stephanie L. Wright, the brig's commanding officer, said in court filing in July.

Sometimes that makes for a thin newspaper. "All I get is sports and obits," Mr. Marri has complained, Mr. Savage said. He is critical of the former, saying there is not enough soccer coverage.

The Defense Department has allowed journalists and others to tour the Guantánamo facility, where Mr. Marri's brother Jarallah and 400 other men are being held. All of the Guantánamo prisoners are foreigners who were seized abroad. The government has not asserted that the brothers were working together.

The Defense Department refused a recent request to inspect the Charleston brig. A spokesman, Cmdr. J. D. Gordon, cited "operational security concerns surrounding the detention of an alleged al Qaeda-linked operative in the U.S. mainland," a reference to Mr. Marri. Commander Gordon added that "it has always been our policy to treat all detainees humanely."

Return to the United States

Mr. Marri spent eight years in the United States as a young man, graduating from Bradley with an undergraduate degree in business administration in 1991. When he returned to the United States 10 years later, he brought his family.

In his declaration, Mr. Rapp noted that Mr. Marri's profile "differed significantly from that of the Sept. 11, 2001, hijackers." Those differences, Mr. Rapp said, made Mr. Marri all the more attractive to Al Qaeda.

The years between Mr. Marri's two stints at Bradley are a mystery. The government says he trained at a Qaeda camp in Afghanistan for about a year and a half between 1996 and 1998, specializing in poisons. The government also says that Mr. Marri visited the United States briefly in 2000, which Mr. Marri has denied.

In the summer of 2001, Mr. Rapp wrote, Mr. Mohammed introduced Mr. Marri to Osama bin Laden. Mr. Marri "offered to be an Al Qaeda martyr," Mr. Rapp wrote.

"Al Qaeda instructed al-Marri that it was imperative that he arrive in the United States prior to Sept. 11, 2001, and that if al-Marri could not do so, that he should cancel all his plans and go to Pakistan," Mr. Rapp wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0112456

The Marris arrived in Peoria on Sept. 10, 2001.

Mr. Marri soon came to the attention of the F.B.I., which first interviewed him less than a month later. In December, agents searched his laptop, finding "research consistent with the tradecraft and teachings associated with Al Qaeda," Mr. Rapp wrote. Mr. Marri was arrested on Dec. 12, 2001, and held as a material witness at the request of prosecutors in New York. He was indicted two months later on charges of credit card fraud. In January 2003, the government added charges of lying to federal agents and financial institutions, and identity theft. Mr. Marri pleaded not guilty. His family has since returned to the Middle East.

For a year and a half, the government pursued a conventional criminal case. Mr. Ashcroft, in his book "Never Again," which was published in October, wrote that Mr. Marri "rejected numerous offers to improve his lot" by cooperating with investigators. "He insisted," Mr. Ashcroft wrote, "on becoming a 'hard case.' "

In June 2003, as the case was nearing trial, the government abruptly changed course, taking Mr. Marri out of the criminal system and moving him into indefinite military detention. That means, Mr. Ashcroft later wrote, that Mr. Marri can be held "at least until the war against Al Qaeda was over."

In its rush to move Mr. Marri, the government short-circuited its criminal case. On hearing that a federal judge in Peoria would allow Mr. Marri's lawyers to file papers opposing the transfer as long as the criminal case was alive, the government agreed to dismiss the criminal charges with prejudice, meaning they cannot be refiled.

The decision, however, would not prevent the government from charging Mr. Marri with other crimes outlined in Mr. Rapp's declaration.

The declaration has served the purpose for which it was designed. In August, it persuaded Henry F. Floyd, a federal judge in Spartanburg, S.C., to deny a habeas corpus petition challenging Mr. Marri's detention. Saying that Mr. Marri had "offered nothing more than a general denial" of the assertions in the declaration, Judge Floyd dismissed the petition.

Neither side was happy with the ruling. Mr. Marri has appealed to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in Richmond, saying that the president does not have the power to detain him as an enemy combatant.

A foreigner living legally in the United States, his lawyers say, is not the same as a soldier captured on a battlefield. Even if the president does have the power, they say, he should be required to support his assertions with evidence.

The government argues that Judge Floyd gave Mr. Marri too full a hearing. It cited the recent Military Commissions Act, which says that the courts have no jurisdiction to hear challenges from any alien "who has been determined by the United States to have been properly detained as an enemy combatant."

The case will be heard Feb. 1

The government offered Mr. Marri a sort of consolation prize should the appeals court dismiss his case. It said he could try to persuade a combatant status review tribunal, convened by the Defense Department, that he was not an enemy combatant. That would apparently be the first such proceeding on the mainland; all of the others known to have been conducted were at Guantánamo Bay.

A Different View

In a brief filed in November, eight former Justice Department officials, including Janet Reno, the attorney general in the Clinton administration, said that taking Mr. Marri out of the criminal system as his case approached trial "has given to the appearance of manipulation of the judicial process." The brief listed several criminal statutes available to prosecute people accused of terrorism along with many successful prosecutions under them.

"The criminal justice system has proven that it can make the cases," Ms. Reno said in an interview. "For the president to be able to designate someone as an enemy combatant, without process and without regulation, just doesn't make any sense and isn't necessary."

Ms. Blomquist, the Justice Department spokeswoman, said, "While we respect the views of former law enforcement officials, the United States cannot afford to retreat to a pre-September 11 mind-set that treats terrorism solely as a domestic law enforcement problem."

Mr. Marri shared a fantasy with one of his lawyers not long ago. "I'd love to be taken back to Saudi Arabia and they would beat the" — here, he swore — "out of me for six months," Mr. Marri said, according to Mr. Savage. "It would be brutal, but it would be finite."

DOJ_NMG_0112457

Defense Rests After Hearing From Torture Expert At Hamas Trial In U.S. (AP)

By Mike Robinson, Ap Legal Affairs Writer

AP, January 5, 2007

(AP) - CHICAGO-Attorneys for one of two men accused of furnishing thousands of dollars (euros) and fresh recruits to a Palestinian terrorist network rested their case Thursday following testimony from an expert on torture.

Closing arguments were set for Monday at the racketeering trial of former Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah, 53, and Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, a former assistant professor of business at Washington's Howard University.

Federal prosecutors say the two men were members of the Palestinian militant group Hamas and helped to bankroll a wave of terror that included bombings, kidnappings and murder aimed at toppling the Israeli government.

"Ladies and gentlemen, we are done with the evidentiary portion of this case," U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve, who has presided over the 10-week trial, told the jurors before sending them home for the weekend.

Attorney William Moffitt, who represents Ashqar, rested his case weeks ago. Salah attorney Michael E. Deutsch rested Thursday following testimony from a psychiatrist and torture expert, Dr. Metin Basoglu.

Basoglu, an authority on the psychological mechanisms created by torture, testified over a live video feed from Istanbul where he lives.

Basoglu said a slipped disc in his back kept him from traveling.

Salah's attorneys are hoping Basoglu's testimony will reinforce Salah's claim that after his January 1993 arrest he was tortured by Israel's Shin Bet security agents into making incriminating statements.

Israeli police confiscated $97,000 in cash in his East Jerusalem hotel room, money they say was earmarked to pay for guns and bombs for Hamas.

The soft-spoken Salah, who grew up in a squalid West Bank refugee camp and later became a U.S. citizen, says the money was for Muslim charities.

He served almost five years in Israeli prisons before he returned to the U.S., where he immediately came under intense scrutiny by the FBI.

Basoglu, a specialist in psychiatry at Istanbul University and a senior lecturer at the University of London, said torture causes acute stress by making victims feel they have lost control of their situation.

He said the anxiety torture victims suffer during interrogation by the military or the police can become so intense as to be unbearable.

"Any one of us would comply in that situation," he said.

The trial began with opening statements in October. The prosecution's initial witnesses were two Shin Bet agents who interrogated Salah in 1993.

They testified under aliases in a courtroom cleared of spectators to protect them against possible reprisals by Hamas. But reporters were allowed to hear their testimony on closed-circuit TV in another room.

Both men denied Salah ever was tortured. Salah did not take the stand but his attorneys say he was put in a freezing cell with no blanket, forced to wear a foul-smelling hood and otherwise mistreated for weeks.

Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller testified that she witnessed part of Salah's 54-day interrogation at a high-security prison in Ramallah. She said he seemed to be in good spirits. Salah attorneys say Miller saw only a small fraction of what went on and was easily fooled.

Prosecution witnesses testified that when agents searched Ashqar's home they found Hamas records and literature and that he took part in a Philadelphia meeting at which the group's organizers mapped strategy.

His attorneys maintain that he merely was exercising his right to free speech and that nothing he did violated the law.

There is a third defendant in the case - Mousa Mohammad Abu Marzouk - allegedly a high-ranking member of the Hamas command now believed to be living in Damascus and classified as a fugitive.

A crowded courtroom was expected for closing arguments Monday. The case has drawn wide interest since August 2004 when then Attorney General John Ashcroft unveiled the indictment at a news conference, saying the three operated "a U.S.-based terrorist recruiting and financing cell."

DOJ_NMG_0112458

Grocer Pleads Guilty To Misleading Federal Agents (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, January 5, 2007

ROCHESTER, N.Y. (AP) _ A Rochester grocer pleaded guilty Thursday to misleading FBI agents about his brother's intentions to leave the U.S. for Israel and become a suicide bomber.

Mohamed Subeh, 43, admitted in U.S. District Court that he deceived federal agents when he denied seeing a letter from his brother that indicated he wanted to become a suicide bomber. Prosecutors said Subeh destroyed the letter, but not before investigators had the opportunity to photocopy it and have it translated.

Subeh, a naturalized U.S. citizen, on April 4 will face a sentence ranging from probation to six months in prison.

Subeh's brother, Ismail Dorgham, 24, was stopped in 2003 at the Greater Rochester International Airport when he used cash to purchase a one-way ticket to Jordan and had no luggage in tow.

While he was questioned, an FBI counterterrorism agent found the note to Subeh _ written in Arabic _ in Dorham's possesion. The FBI translated a copy of the document a week later and concluded that Dorgham intended to become a suicide bomber on behalf of a terrorist organization.

Dorgham is currently married and living with his wife and his 2 {-year-old son in Bethlehem, Subeh's lawyer, John Parrinello said.

___

Information from: Rochester Democrat and Chronicle, http://www.democratandchronicle.com

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Court To Consider Conflicting Portraits Of Would-be Subway Bomber (AP)

By Tom Hays, The Associated Press

AP, January 5, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) — Shahawar Matin Siraj was either a naive stooge lured into a phony bomb plot or a homegrown terrorist determined to inflict misery on New Yorkers as revenge for wartime abuses of Iraqis.

The conflicting portraits of Siraj — convicted on conspiracy charges in a scheme to blow up one of the city's busiest subway stations — were painted in court papers recently filed in advance of his sentencing on Monday in federal court in Brooklyn.

Defense attorneys have sought to convince a judge that their client's sentence should not exceed 10 years since the attack never came close to being carried out.

Siraj, a 21-year-old high school dropout at the time of his arrest, "is not a dangerous psychopath, but more of a confused and misguided youngster," the defense team argued in its papers.

Prosecutors countered that the Pakistani immigrant deserves at least 30 years — and possibly life — behind bars as the "driving force" behind a "workable terrorist plot" to set off explosives at the subway station of Herald Square, a dense shopping district that includes Macy's flagship department store.

"The offense was the brainchild and handiwork of the defendant," the government's papers said.

On Thursday, U.S. District Judge Nina Gershon denied a defense motion for a new trial, saying in a written ruling that "the evidence as to the defendant's guilt was overwhelming."

Siraj and another man suspected in the plot, James Elshafay, were arrested on the eve of the 2004 Republican National Convention carrying crude diagrams of Herald square. Elshafay immediately agreed to cooperate with the government.

Authorities said Siraj had no affiliation with known terrorist organizations. Instead, he was a relative loner whose anti-American rants caught the attention of a police informant, Osama Eldawoody, and an undercover officer.

Eldawoody, a naturalized U.S. citizen from Egypt, had been assigned by the NYPD to identify and track Islamic extremists in Muslim neighborhoods after Sept. 11. He and the undercover officer emerged last year at Siraj's trial as the government's star witnesses.

DOJ_NMG_0112459

While wearing a wire and assuming the role of an accomplice, Eldawoody assured Siraj that any plan he concocted would have the backing of a fictitious faction called The Brotherhood. On tape, Siraj was recorded musing about possibly destroying the Verrazano-Narrows and three other bridges serving Staten Island or killing Microsoft founder Bill Gates before settling on Herald Square as a target.

Testifying in his own defense, Siraj said he never had a violent thought before he fell under the spell of the 50-year-old Eldawoody. He said the older man became a mentor and instructed him that there was a fatwa, or religious edict, permitting the killing of U.S. soldiers and law enforcement agents.

Eldawoody had himself talked about "blowing up the buildings and blowing up the Wall Street places," the defendant said. He admitted taking steps to attack the subway station, but only after the informant inflamed him by showing him photos of prisoners being abused at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

According to the recent defense filings, he has since expressed his regret.

"I feel really, really bad and apologize to everybody," he told a psychologist. "I was just foolish, just angry."

Ill. Man Indicted In Hand Grenade Case (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

CHICAGO - A man accused of plotting to use hand grenades in an attack on holiday shoppers was indicted Thursday on charges of attempting to use weapons of mass destruction.

Derrick Shareef, 22, was arrested Dec. 6 by an FBI-led anti-terrorism task force following a sting operation in which an undercover informant secretly tape-recorded his plans.

Shareef was arrested when he met an undercover agent to trade a pair of stereo speakers for four hand grenades and a handgun to use at the CherryVale shopping mall in Rockford, about 90 miles northwest of Chicago, federal prosecutors said.

Shareef is being held in the government's Metropolitan Correctional Center pending a court hearing. No date has been set.

Defense attorney Michael B. Mann, who was appointed to represent Shareef at his initial court appearance in December, was unavailable for comment. A message left on his office voicemail was not immediately returned.

Prosecutors have said they were convinced Shareef had operated alone and there had been no imminent danger to the public.

Federal Grand Jury Indicts Shareef (RRS)

Rockford Register Star, January 5, 2007

ROCKFORD — A federal grand jury on Thursday formally indicted Derrick Shareef with attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction and attempting to destroy real and personal property by use of explosives.

“The complaint is one way to charge a suspect, but that has to be followed up by an indictment within 30 days,” said Kim Nerheim, a spokeswoman with the U.S. attorney’s office in Chicago, where the grand jury revealed the indictment.

“That’s what this was and that’s why it is so similar to the complaint,” Nerheim said.

Shareef, 22, allegedly wanted to use grenades in an attack on patrons of CherryVale Mall to wage jihad against people in the United States.

He was arrested Dec. 6 after he exchanged some stereo speakers for some nonfunctioning grenades and a firearm.

Shareef remains in federal custody in Chicago awaiting his arraignment, a date that has not been set.

Democrats Set Homeland Security Changes (AP)

By Leslie Miller

AP, January 5, 2007

Hours after taking control of Congress, House Democrats disclosed a plan they said would strengthen homeland security after five years of complaining that Republicans weren't doing enough.

Democrats say their legislation bill would implement the unfinished 9/11 Commission recommendations that fall under the Homeland Security Committee's jurisdiction.

The bill would require private companies to prepare for terrorism and the government would have to inspect cargo on passenger planes and shipping containers leaving the largest ports. Airport screeners would be given whistle-blower protection, money would be set aside to develop technology for detecting explosives at checkpoints and an appeals process would be established for airline passengers mistaken for terrorists on watch lists.

Democrats have said the Republican-controlled Congress didn't implement the commission's 41 recommendations aimed at improving safety after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

The commission itself met a year ago to hand out failing grades to the government, giving an "F," for example, to improving airline passenger screening and homeland security spending for cities considered most at risk of attack.

The bill will be debated and voted on Tuesday — without going through the committee process — as part of the Democrats' "100 hours" plan to quickly accomplish their priorities.

Republicans objected to the speed with which the Democrats are moving.

New York Rep. Peter King, ranking Republican on the Homeland Security Committee, sent a letter Tuesday to committee chairman and lead sponsor of the bill, Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss. In it, King said that bypassing the committee would contradict an "open, full and fair debate" promised by incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.

"Homeland security is far too important an issue to play politics with, and any new homeland security measure should be given the review and oversight it deserves," King wrote.

The "9/11 Commission" bill isn't filed yet. According to a draft, it would tackle a knotty problem: spending homeland security funds on cities most at risk of terrorist attack.

Currently, the grant formula gives each state .75 percent of the total pot of money before its risk is assessed. The bill would reduce that to .25 percent, except states with large international borders would start off with .45 percent.

Homeland Security analysts have said there are no remaining proposals that can easily be enacted into law because they are politically difficult.

For example, the commission recommended that oversight of Homeland Security be given to a single committee. The Homeland Security Department said it reported to 86 committees and subcommittees and gave more than 4,000 briefings in 2005-06. But soon after House Democrats unveiled the 9/11 bill, they announced that the Transportation Committee would share jurisdiction over two Homeland Security agencies: the Coast Guard and Federal Emergency Management Agency.

One problem for congressional Democrats in fulfilling their promise is that some of the commission's recommendations to change foreign policy — such as supporting Pakistan and reforming Saudi Arabia — don't fall under the purview of Congress. Those aren't addressed in the bill.

4 Cities Cut, 4 Added For Terror Grants (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, January 5, 2007

Four U.S. cities will get a fresh infusion of federal anti-terror grant money, and four others will be cut off from such grants, under a new government list of urban areas considered at serious risk of attacks and eligible to share $747 million.

The list obtained Thursday by The Associated Press shows the four newly eligible cities are El Paso, Texas; Norfolk, Va.; Providence, R.I.; and Tucson, Ariz.

The cities that were cut from the list of 45 metropolitan areas are Toledo, Ohio; Baton Rouge, La.; Louisville, Ky.; and Omaha, Neb.

The Homeland Security Department has come under intense scrutiny for its decisions in the Urban Area Security Initiative, or UASI, which is the only pool of federal money designed to go to localities based solely on their risk of terror attacks.

Officials in New York and several other major cities were furious last year when the agency announced major cuts to their funding while sending millions of dollars to places like Omaha and Louisville, which are generally considered to face less risk of terrorism.

DOJ_NMG_0112461

The agency may officially announce the decision as early as Friday, though the designations do not yet come with fixed dollar amounts. Those are expected later this year, most likely in May, after the government has reviewed the cities' grant applications.

Under the program, DHS awards money not just to an individual city, but to the entire metropolitan area.

This year, DHS chose to lump together New York City and northern New Jersey into a single area. Last year, the agency kept them separate, giving money directly to Jersey City and Newark.

While the agency did cut four cities from the list, it spared several others that were warned in 2006 that they might be cut off. Those spared cities were Las Vegas, Nev., Buffalo, N.Y., Oklahoma City, Okla.; Tampa, Fla.; San Diego, Calif.; Sacramento, Calif.; and Phoenix, Ariz.

The UASI list also does not include a smaller, separate pot of grant money to protect urban infrastructure, like public transit systems. An announcement on that money is expected next week.

The actual UASI payments vary widely from place to place, and even year to year. In the 2005 budget year, for example, Los Angeles received $65 million, while Jacksonville, Fla. got $6.9 million.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks cities like New York and Washington have received the lion's share of the UASI money, but city officials protested furiously last May when funding for each was cut by 40 percent.

The program was launched after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, and has since been the focus of yearly wrangling between the Bush administration and some in Congress who want a larger share of federal largesse to be distributed based solely on risk.

Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said Thursday he was concerned New York might be put at a disadvantage by having to split its share of funding with northern New Jersey.

"This could spell trouble. If they give out one pot of money to two areas, we cannot let that translate into fewer dollars," said Schumer.

The new Democratic majority in Congress, sworn in Thursday, has pledged to revise grant spending to distribute billions of federal anti-terror grants based on risk. The House is expected to take up such legislation next week as part of a package based on the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission.

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz And Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

Prime target

The difficulty of trying to rebuild Iraq as insurgents try to destroy it was hammered home by an incident in November.

The U.S. operates Camp Loyalty, a forward operating base near Baghdad, and stores building material there. In this case, they were husbanding a huge amount of electrical wiring and components to help turn the lights on in Sadr City, the capital's Shi'ite slum.

Then, insurgent mortar rounds hit the base storage yard. Everyone took cover. When the barrage ended, most of the supplies disappeared in flames.

"Media there never covers the fact that Iraqi bad guys are blowing up Iraq's own reconstruction," said a military official. "Congress is told subliminally by others that reconstructors are all crooks or political incompetents."

CIA on China threat

CIA Director Michael V. Hayden spoke to CIA employees yesterday for a town-hall-style meeting where he revealed the agency's new "Strategic Intent" report and outlined some of the reforms taken. They include setting up a new operations center with representatives from the collection, analysis and technical services branches.

The report lists the long war on terrorism, arms proliferation and the rise of China and India as part of the current "unstable and dangerous " strategic environment.

One initiative: the creation of a CIA associate deputy director for counterintelligence that supporters hope will give the agency something it badly needs in the current environment of aggressive foreign intelligence activities. "Counterintelligence is too critical an issue not to have a senior member of our leadership team committed to it 24/7," Gen. Hayden said in announcing the post.

DOJ_NMG_0112462

Counterintelligence at CIA has been a backwater support function since the ouster of master counterspy James Jesus Angleton in the 1970s. Mr. Angleton oversaw an aggressive independent counterintelligence branch that conducted several mole hunts that upset veteran spies.

The CIA still has not fully recovered from the decadeslong betrayal of CIA officer Aldrich Ames, who gave Russia the names and identities of virtually all the CIA's recruited agents working against the Soviet Union. Ames was caught in 1993.

Other reforms outlined by Gen. Hayden include a "revitalized" covert action review group that will direct semi-secret CIA-sponsored activities ranging from political operations to paramilitary forces.

The CIA also has a new External Advisory Board that includes former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Richard B. Myers, former Deputy Defense Secretary John Hamre and former Hewlett-Packard Chief Executive Officer Carly Fiorina.

Test run

The intelligence community would just as well forget the flawed 2002 National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iraq and work on making sure such a mistaken analysis does not happen again.

One new look is Intellipedia, a classified form of the Wikipedia, the Internet encyclopedia where people can use the "wiki" software to add information on a given subject.

Intellipedia debuted in April on the government's top-secret network. Today, there are more than 28,000 Web pages, over 13 million "hits" and 3,600 registered users.

The Office of the Director of National Intelligence is experimenting with that concept, via Intellipedia, to see if intelligence analysts collectively can produce an accurate NIE on various subjects. Another aim is to get rid of the "stovepipes" — the metaphor for analysts not sharing information with other analysts in different fields but similar subjects.

"With all edits being attributable in Intellipedia, it actually kind of allows our officers to be much more collegial with one another, and it builds a community, which is what we're trying to do," Sean Dennehy, a CIA analyst, said at a recent round-table discussion.

Intellipedia will be a communal site for all types of intelligence articles, which can be edited by other analysts, while keeping the assessment's historical thread. You can have analysts from U.S. Pacific Command, the CIA and a satellite reconnaissance office talking to one another at the same time on the same topic via Intellipedia.

The DNI is also doing an experimental NIE, the intelligence community's crown jewel produced by the National Intelligence Council. The initial Intellipedia NIE will be on the troubled African nation of Nigeria. Intellipedia will be the recipient of analysts assessments on that country for use by the council to write the NIE.

Changing Air Force

Gen. T. Michael Moseley, Air Force chief of staff, has made the war on terror his top service priority, followed by caring for airmen and their families, and buying new combat aircraft and space assets.

A recent message from headquarters shows how the Air Force is changing. Last fall, the Air Force dropped its first small-diameter bomb, the GBU-39/B, from an F-15E Strike Eagle supporting troops in Iraq. The 250-pound bomb allows jet fighters to carry a larger bombs-to-targets ratio, meaning a pilot can hit multiple suspected terror safe houses and reduce collateral damage.

The Air Force this summer also helped the Army by sending "several hundred" airmen to ground combat training before deploying to Iraq or Afghanistan. The Army is stressed by frequent war deployments. President Bush announced in December that he will ask Congress to increase the number of soldiers by an unspecified number. The military even has come up with a name for airmen changing their traditional missions. It's called "in-lieu-of."

The war on terror is also putting an unprecedented demand on the Predator, an unmanned aerial vehicle that can spy on the enemy and unleash deadly Hellfire missiles. The Air Force message called it "one of the most sought-after weapons by combatant commanders."

DOJ_NMG_0112463

WAR NEWS:

Bush Will Seek Aid, Jobs Funds To Bolster Iraq (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration's new strategy for Iraq, which the president is set to announce next week, will include a big boost in spending to fund reconstruction, economic growth and job creation, as part of a broader effort to help embattled Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

People familiar with the matter say that Mr. Bush will detail his request for billions of dollars in new aid for Iraq next week in an eagerly awaited speech on his strategy to contain sectarian violence there and clear the way for an eventual U.S. military withdrawal. In his speech, Mr. Bush will also call for the deployment of as many as 20,000 additional American combat troops to Iraq as part of a controversial "surge" designed to stabilize Baghdad and other violent regions of the country.

The administration's emerging Iraq strategy, which it is calling "The New Way Forward," will also include an effort to funnel U.S. money to moderate Iraqi political parties as a means of building a centrist political coalition to support Mr. Maliki, according to people familiar with the matter.

The proposals are part of what is shaping up as an effort by Mr. Bush to retool his Iraq strategy across all fronts. The measures are certain to prove controversial and could set the administration on a collision course with the new Democratic-controlled Congress, which was formally sworn in yesterday3.

Other pieces of that strategy began falling into place yesterday, as the president made additional changes in his national-security team. Those changes will leave a significantly different cast of diplomatic and military policy makers in charge of implementing the new strategy.

Administration officials said Mr. Bush is likely to nominate Navy Adm. William Fallon to replace Gen. John Abizaid as the head of the U.S. military's Central Command, which is responsible for leading the war efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan. Mr. Bush will also tag Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to replace Gen. George Casey as the top American military commander in Iraq.

In addition, White House officials said that Mr. Bush plans to nominate Zalmay Khalilzad, now U.S. ambassador to Iraq, as the next American ambassador to the United Nations.

• The News: The new Bush strategy on Iraq will include more money as well as troops, to boost reconstruction.

• What's at Stake: The plan calls for spending billions of dollars beyond the sum already provided in economic assistance.

• What's Next: The plan, to be unveiled next week, could set Bush on a collision course with congressional Democrats.

The changes come just weeks after Mr. Bush ousted former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, the policy maker most closely identified with the old Iraq strategy, which the administration acknowledges has failed.

Most Democrats have already expressed opposition to the idea of temporarily boosting the number of U.S. combat personnel in Iraq, and have instead coalesced around a proposal to begin withdrawing American military forces from Iraq later this spring.

Democratic leaders have ruled out trying to stymie the administration by barring funding for the additional forces, however. The new aid request for Iraq could emerge as a bigger flash point with Congress than the troop surge, in part because Democrats may view the proposed aid as an investment in an Iraqi government about which they have developed doubts.

The new Iraq money would come on top of the more than $20.9 billion that has already been spent on large-scale, U.S.-funded reconstruction projects in the country that have largely failed to restore the country's electricity output, water supply or sewage capabilities to prewar levels. The costly effort to rebuild Iraq's war-shattered infrastructure has been mired in controversy from the very beginning because most of the money went to large American contractors like Bechtel Group Inc., rather than smaller Iraqi firms.

A range of U.S. government audits later found evidence that the administration had seriously mismanaged the rebuilding effort, allowing billions of dollars to be misspent or lost to outright fraud and corruption.

DOJ_NMG_0112464

The new aid would be different, because it would be meant to go largely to Iraqis and Iraqi companies, rather than to large American contractors, officials said.

Still, Democrats have promised stringent oversight of funds spent on Iraq, and they will now have extensive influence over how much money is allocated and how it is spent. Democrats are also deeply skeptical about Mr. Maliki's intentions and capabilities, and are likely to resist any White House effort to funnel more money to him and his allies.

Expanded White House support for Mr. Maliki could also run counter to some recommendations made in a recent report by the Iraq Study Group, the panel of outside experts Congress formed to suggest changes in Iraq policy. The panel urged Mr. Bush to condition future American military and economic support on the Shiite-led Iraqi government's making the tough political compromises needed to restart Iraq's stalled political process by drawing in the country's Sunni minority. Mr. Maliki has to date failed to take such steps, and the rushed and chaotic execution of deposed Iraqi ruler Saddam Hussein, a Sunni, last weekend ratcheted Iraq's sectarian tensions even higher.

Administration officials say they are still putting the finishing touches on the economic aspects of the new Iraq strategy, but say the broad contours have largely been decided upon. One official involved in devising the new Iraq strategy said the administration hopes that the expanded job-creation and economic-development programs would make it harder for militias and insurgent groups in Iraq to recruit jobless young men.

The State Department section of the administration's fiscal year 2008 budget will ask lawmakers to appropriate $1.46 billion in aid for the Iraqi government, according to people familiar with the matter. These people said the request includes $335 million in security-related aid, $373 million in funding designed to help spur economic growth and $239 million for education and job creation. The largest share of the new money, $486 million, would go toward Iraqi political parties, human-rights groups and other players in the country's nascent democratic system.

The administration will request additional Iraq-related money in a supplemental spending bill that will be presented to lawmakers along with the standard budget.

The supplemental spending bill will ask for a "significant increase" in the money allocated to the so-called Commander's Emergency Response Program, which gives military officers in Iraq money they can use on small-scale reconstruction and job-creation projects that they hope will help stabilize the areas they patrol, according to a senior Pentagon official.

A second senior official said the increase could double the current size of the program from $720 million this past year to more than $1 billion in 2007.

Bush Talks To Al-Maliki, Set To Reveal New Iraq Strategy (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

President Bush, who will announce a new strategy for the Iraq war next week, spoke with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki for nearly two hours yesterday, and said last night that he had been trying to determine whether Mr. al-Maliki "has the will necessary to do the hard work to protect his people."

"I told him, I said that you show the will, we will help you," Mr. Bush said in a brief White House press conference with German Chancellor Angela Merkel. "I believe Prime Minister Maliki has the will necessary to make the tough decisions. That's one of the things I learned today."

Mr. Bush said he was "in the process of making up my final decision as to what to recommend" on a way forward in Iraq, where more than 3,000 U.S. troops have died since the war began in March 2003.

"I'll be ready to outline a strategy that will help the Iraqis achieve the objective of a country that can govern, sustain and defend itself sometime next week," Mr. Bush said. "I've still got consultations to go through. Whatever decision I make, though, will be all aimed at achieving our objectives."

Mrs. Merkel, who will wield extraordinary clout among European leaders as she is simultaneously president of the European Union and host of the Group of Eight summit, said she will urge her neighbors to support efforts to stabilize Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0112465

"Allow me to say although Germany is not militarily present in Iraq, we have every interest in seeing Iraq taking a turn for a more peaceful development where people no longer need to be in fear of their lives, and that politically we shall do everything we can in order to give support to such a positive development," she said through a translator.

Mr. Bush next week is expected to order a "surge" -- a short-term increase of U.S. troops -- in Iraq, and the White House said yesterday that the president and Mr. al-Maliki agreed on the need to call in enough military to quell the sectarian violence that has spiraled out of control.

The two leaders spoke by secure video conference, with about half of the conversation limited to the president and prime minister and their translators, press secretary Tony Snow said.

The top generals in the Army and the Marine Corps have said recently that any increase of troops needs to be coupled with a well-defined strategy to secure and stabilize Iraq. Mr. Bush said yesterday that is precisely what he will demand.

"One thing is for certain: I will want to make sure that the mission is clear and specific and can be accomplished," he said.

Mr. Bush also said he wished the execution of Saddam Hussein "had gone in a more dignified way," but noted that the deposed Iraqi dictator "was given justice; the thousands of people he killed were not."

Shortly after Saddam was hanged last week, a video appeared on the Internet showing him being taunted before his execution. The video has sparked a firestorm across the Middle East and in Washington, where reporters have questioned the White House daily about it.

"One thing is for certain: A horrific chapter in Iraqi history has been closed. And now we're talking about a more hopeful chapter for the Iraqi people," Mr. Bush said.

The president, who met for more than an hour with Mrs. Merkel and discussed matters such as global trade, the genocide in Darfur, the environment, Lebanon, Iran and the war in Afghanistan, praised the German chancellor for her support of a strong U.N. Security Council resolution to punish Iran for continuing its uranium-enrichment program.

"It was an important message to send Iran that the free world wants there to be a peaceful future, and we don't see a peaceful future with the Iranians developing a nuclear weapon," he said.

The short press conference in the Cross Hall of the White House ended on a humorous note. After shaking hands with the German leader, Mr. Bush smiled impishly and said, "No back rubs," a reference to criticism he received when he briefly massaged her shoulders last year at a G-8 meeting in St. Petersburg. The chancellor smiled, and the two headed off to dinner.

Bush Making Changes In His Iraq Team (WP)

By Robin Wright And Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

President Bush is overhauling his top diplomatic and military team in Iraq, as the White House scrambles to complete its new war policy package in time for the president to unveil it in a speech to the nation next week, officials said.

But the White House is struggling to overcome deep differences among advisers over both the deployment of additional U.S. troops and whether the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki can deliver long-delayed political and military actions, according to officials familiar with the debate.

With significant policy details left to be worked out this weekend, the administration is nonetheless moving ahead on several personnel changes. It is set to announce that Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who gained fame for his early success in training Iraqi troops and securing a volatile city in northern Iraq, will replace Gen. George W. Casey Jr. as commander of the multinational forces in Iraq, officials say.

The administration also intends to nominate Navy Adm. William J. Fallon to head the Central Command, replacing Gen. John P. Abizaid as the top U.S. military commander for the Middle East. Some military officials consider Fallon an unusual choice, because he is a naval officer in charge of the Pacific Command with limited experience in the Middle East and would be in charge of two ground wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

On the diplomatic side, the White House will appoint veteran U.S. diplomat Ryan C. Crocker, the current envoy to Pakistan, who began his career in the 1970s in Iraq, as the new ambassador to Baghdad. The controversial current ambassador to Iraq,

DOJ_NMG_0112466

Zalmay Khalilzad, will be nominated to become the top U.S. envoy at the United Nations, replacing John R. Bolton, U.S. officials say.

The president is tentatively set to speak on Wednesday about his new plan for Iraq, with Maliki due to unveil his own new security plan a day or two before. Bush spoke for almost two hours with Maliki yesterday by videoconference, half of which was just the two of them and translators.

Maliki pledged to Bush that he will announce the deployment of three additional Iraqi army brigades to help secure Baghdad, U.S. officials said. The Iraq commitment would be in the neighborhood of some 4,500 troops, according to their brigade strengths.

After a meeting with German Chancellor Angela Merkel yesterday, Bush told reporters he had a good conversation with Maliki. "One thing I was looking for was . . . to determine whether or not he has the will necessary to do the hard work to protect his people," Bush said.

On deploying new U.S. troops in Iraq, Bush pledged to make sure that the mission is "clear and specific and can be accomplished."

But deep divisions remain between the White House on one side and the Joint Chiefs and congressional leaders on the other about whether a surge of up to 20,000 troops will turn around the deteriorating situation, according to U.S. officials.

The U.S. military is increasingly resigned to the probability that Bush will deploy a relatively small number of additional troops -- between one and five brigades -- in part because he has few other dramatic options available to signal U.S. determination in Iraq, officials said. But the Joint Chiefs have not given up making the case that the potential dangers outweigh the benefits for several reasons, officials said.

There are already signs that a limited U.S. escalation, even when complemented by new political and economic steps, may not satisfy either supporters or critics of a surge. Pentagon officials and military experts say far more troops are needed to make a real difference, but the United States would have to remobilize reserves, extend current tours of duty and accelerate planned deployments just to come up with 20,000 troops, U.S. officials say. And such a surge would strap the military for other potential crises, they add.

After more than a month of interagency discussions chaired by deputy national security adviser J.D. Crouch II, deep differences also remain among administration officials over the fundamental question of whether Iraq's Shiites can pull together a moderate political center.

Washington needs Baghdad to provide military manpower to confront the illegal Shiite militias that are fueling sectarian violence and to take political steps to accommodate Sunni grievances, notably in promised but long-delayed amendments to the new constitution.

But the crude execution of Saddam Hussein and the Iraqi government's insistence that two top officials of the Iranian Revolutionary Guards, who were captured in a U.S. military raid, had to be handed back to Tehran have fueled U.S. concern that the government is under the partial control of Shiite militias and Iran. Though the White House has officially endorsed Maliki, U.S. officials are divided about whether the prime minister will really deliver, particularly badly needed Iraqi troops.

Last summer, Iraq failed to provide promised troops in Operation Together Forward, the highly publicized effort to secure Baghdad. Maliki pledged six battalions but provided only two -- and has not delivered the remainder, according to U.S. officials. Iraqi troops are essential to hold areas of the city after they are cleared of insurgents and other threats. The joint operation has instead resulted in escalating violence and increased U.S. and Iraqi deaths.

Some Iraqi units ordered to the capital suffered serious attrition or simply refused to go, which also happened in earlier joint U.S.-Iraqi operations. The AWOL rates among Iraqi units have averaged 5 to 8 percent but can rise to more than 50 percent when units are directed to deploy outside their normal areas of operation, according to a recent Pentagon report.

There is currently no military judicial system in the Iraqi army, and Iraqi commanders do not have the legal leverage to compel their soldiers into combat, according to the Pentagon. U.S. military commanders have long expressed frustration over the Iraqi military's failure to provide sufficient troops.

After yesterday's videoconference, White House spokesman Tony Snow said the president did not press Maliki to crack down on Shiite militias because Maliki brought it up himself. "The prime minister stressed his determination to go after anybody responsible for violence," Snow said. "That would include not only insurgent groups and Saddam loyalists, but also militias within Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0112467

Bush also spoke for the first time yesterday about Hussein's execution, saying he wished the proceedings had unfolded in a "more dignified way."

But he said Hussein was given justice. "My personal reaction is that Saddam Hussein was given a trial that he was unwilling to give the thousands of people he killed," Bush said. "He was given a fair trial, something he was unwilling to give thousands of Iraqi citizens who he brutalized."

The White House declined to comment yesterday on its personnel moves, but a senior administration official said the changes are a precursor to revamping policy. "It is appropriate to have the people in place as soon as possible to implement the new policy," said the official, who declined to be identified because the president has not made his announcement.

Bush is expected to announce today that Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte will return to the State Department as deputy to Condoleezza Rice, and retired Navy Adm. John M. McConnell will take the top U.S. intelligence job, U.S. officials say. McConnell directed the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996 under President Bill Clinton.

As part of his congressional consultations before next week's speech, Bush has invited a group of lawmakers to talk today about Iraq, including moderate Democratic Sens. Ben Nelson (Neb.) and Blanche Lincoln (Ark.). He will meet with more lawmakers on Monday.

Staff writers Glenn Kessler, Ann Scott Tyson and Peter Baker contributed to this report.

Why America Should Operate From Iraq's Borders (FT)

By Dov Zakheim

Financial Times, January 5, 2007

As the US administration has made very clear, the report of the Iraq Study Group will in no way represent the final word on American strategy in Iraq. The White House accepts that there has to be a change in approach. But its underlying premises - that Iraq's sectarian strife is not a civil war and that the keys to a stable Iraq are a stable Baghdad and Anbar province - are the same as before. These assumptions need to be revisited, fast.

As government has followed government in Baghdad, the promise of strength has been succeeded by the reality of weakness, incompetence and corruption. Meanwhile, too many Americans are being maimed or dying in a war that seems to have no end and no clear path to victory. It is not enough for government officials to mourn the dead or to hand out medals and personalised coins to the wounded. We must give our forces a fighting chance to succeed in their mission. This is not the case at present.

There is no doubt that Iraq is enmeshed in a bitter civil war. The US has had minimal impact on the course of that war. Iraqi casualties continue to mount, as do the number of Iraqis who have decided to kill their fellow citizens. Americans are caught in the crossfire. They cannot stop the sectarian forces that are determined to kill one another. The US could not do so in Lebanon during the 1980s and cannot do so today in Iraq.

It is equally clear that democracy, as it is understood in the west in general and in Washington in particular, is nowhere in sight in Iraq. It is hardly the highest priority for most Iraqis. What they want is stability. So do their neighbours throughout the region.

Continuing to rely on the Iraqi government to provide stability throughout the country is doomed. But pulling out of Iraq would further undermine stability in the region as a whole. Thus the US objective should be framed in terms of the wider region: stopping Iraq from launching attacks against its neighbours, preventing any invasion by Turkey in the north and barring Iranian domination in the south.

The first step is recognising that primary responsibility for pacifying Baghdad, where we are having minimal success and suffering the most casualties, lies with the Iraqi army and police. Efforts to train the Iraqis to cope with the civil war that has ravaged their capital must be stepped up. But why train them while they are in harm's way? Only when they are truly ready for combat should they be deployed to Baghdad or other violent areas.

Then the US must reposition its forces to foster regional stability and minimise casualties. Up to two brigades should be devoted to Kurdistan and a roughly equal number to the far west of Anbar province.

DOJ_NMG_0112468

The forces in Kurdistan would help forestall a Kurdish declaration of independence that would prompt a Turkish invasion. The troops in western Iraq would help prevent both terrorist infiltration into Jordan and serious incursions from Syria. They would also indicate to Damascus that it should not misinterpret a readiness to talk as a concession.

The Pentagon should also move a division-sized force to the south, with a significant presence on the border with Iran. Tehran must understand that the US will not tolerate its domination of Iraq's south. Nor, as with Syria, would Washington's willingness to talk mean a readiness to appease.

Finally, US allies must be pressed to take the lead in establishing a network of provincial reconstruction teams similar to those that have met with some success in Afghanistan.

No doubt some will see this as the US giving up on democracy and being content to stand by as Iraqis kill each other. Yet clearly democracy in Iraq must await the end of the civil war. The quicker the Iraqis can be trained and equipped, the quicker the warring parties will exhaust themselves. It took 14 years in Lebanon; it is still notcompletely over in the Balkans. Peace will not come any time soon in Iraq, but the war need not last as long as a decade if there is a viable Iraqi army in place.

We should not "cut and run". Nevertheless, by assigning the lead for military operations in Baghdad where it properly belongs, with the Iraqi forces, the US can refocus. With a total force that would probably not exceed 75,000 troops, buttressed by perhaps 15,000 troops in the southern Gulf, the Pentagon could ease pressure on the active forces and reserves. At the same time, US forces could give better training to more Iraqi soldiers and police - in relative safety.

By operating from Iraq's borders American forces would be well placed to prevent the establishment of terrorist training camps anywhere in Iraq, including Anbar province. In addition, it ensures that US forces have a realisable mission. They may be unable to bring stability to all of Iraq, but they can certainly bring a degree of stability to the region. The US can thus reassert its leading role in a peaceful Middle East.

The strategic shift would bring relief to our overstretched and over-deployed military. It would reduce combat losses. Above all, it would give the military a mission that they can achieve. This way we can finally bring to an end a bitter domestic debate over Iraq policy that has so undermined public faith in the judgment and wisdom of their leaders on both sides of the political aisle.

The writer was US under-secretary of defence (comptroller) from 2001 to 2004

The Hanging: Beyond Travesty (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Of the 6 billion people on this Earth, not one killed more people than Saddam Hussein. And not just killed but tortured and mutilated -- doing so often with his own hands and for pleasure. It is quite a distinction to be the preeminent monster on the planet. If the death penalty was ever deserved, no one was more richly deserving than Saddam Hussein.

For the Iraqi government to have botched both his trial and execution, therefore, and turned monster into victim, is not just a tragedy but a crime -- against the new Iraq that Americans are dying for and against justice itself.

In late 2005, I wrote about the incompetence of the Hussein trial and how it was an opportunity missed. Instead of exposing, elucidating and irrefutably making the case for the crimes of the accused -- as was done at Nuremberg and the Eichmann trial -- the Iraqi government lost control and inadvertently turned it into a stage for Hussein. The trial managed to repair the image of the man the world had last seen as a bedraggled nobody pulled cowering from a filthy hole. Now coiffed and cleaned, he acted the imperious president of Iraq, drowning out the testimony of his victims in coverage seen around the world.

That was bad enough. Then came the execution, a rushed, botched, unholy mess that exposed the hopelessly sectarian nature of the Maliki government.

Consider the timing. It was carried out on a religious holiday. We would not ordinarily care about this, except for the fact that it was in contravention of Iraqi law. It was done on the first day of Eid al-Adha as celebrated by Sunnis. The Shiite Eid began the next day, which tells you in whose name the execution was performed.

It was also carried out extra-constitutionally. The constitution requires a death sentence to have the signature of the president and two vice presidents, each representing one of the three major ethnic groups in the country (Sunni, Shiite and Kurd). That provision is meant to prevent sectarian killings. The president did not sign. Nouri al-Maliki contrived some work-around.

DOJ_NMG_0112469

True, Hussein's hanging was just and, in principle, nonsectarian. But the next hanging might not be. Breaking precedent completely undermines the death penalty provision, opening the way to future revenge and otherwise lawless hangings.

Moreover, Maliki's rush to execute short-circuited the judicial process that was at the time considering Hussein's crimes against the Kurds. He was hanged for the killing of 148 men and boys in the Shiite village of Dujail. This was a perfectly good starting point -- a specific incident as a prelude to an inquiry into the larger canvas of his crimes. The trial for his genocidal campaign against the Kurds was just beginning.

That larger canvas will never be painted. The starting point became the endpoint. The only charge for which Hussein was executed was that 1982 killing of Shiites -- interestingly, his response to a failed assassination attempt by Maliki's Dawa Party.

Maliki ultimately got his revenge, completing Dawa's mission a quarter-century later. However, Saddam Hussein will now never be tried for the Kurdish genocide, the decimation of the Marsh Arabs, the multiple war crimes and all the rest.

Finally, there was the motley crew -- handpicked by the government -- that constituted the hanging party. They turned what was an act of national justice into a scene of sectarian vengeance. The world has now seen the smuggled video of the shouting and taunting that turned Saddam Hussein into the most dignified figure in the room -- another remarkable achievement in burnishing the image of the most evil man of his time.

Worse was the content of the taunts: "Moqtada, Moqtada," the name of the radical and murderous Shiite extremist whose goons were obviously in the chamber. The world saw Hussein falling through the trapdoor, executed not in the name of a new and democratic Iraq but in the name of Moqtada al-Sadr, whose death squads have learned much from Hussein.

The whole sorry affair illustrates not just incompetence but also the ingrained intolerance and sectarianism of the Maliki government. It stands for Shiite unity and Shiite dominance above all else.

We should not be surging American troops in defense of such a government. This governing coalition -- Maliki's Dawa, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim's Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq and Sadr's Mahdi Army -- seems intent on crushing the Sunnis at all costs. Maliki should be made to know that if he insists on having this sectarian war, he can well have it without us.

Dynamic Ideas For Iraq (WSJ)

By Dan Senor And Roman Martinez

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

The president is on the cusp of making the most important decision of his second term: increasing our troop presence in Baghdad and Anbar in an effort to stave off Iraqi civil war. A troop surge into Baghdad will not solve problems overnight. But by helping to establish security, more troops can weaken the insurgency, which is the first step to addressing most of Iraq's other problems, including the growth of Shiite militias. Here are things for the president to consider as he moves forward:

No more half measures. With a possible troop increase gaining steam, some military officers at the Pentagon and in Baghdad are advocating only a temporary and minor increase of forces which they view as a reasonable compromise from their minimalist position. But 10,000-15,000 more troops would be insufficient to stabilize Baghdad and at the same time maintain a strong presence in Anbar, where the insurgency is likely to spill over if chased out of the capital. Such an approach would replicate the failures of "Operations Together Forward I and II" in 2006, when troop increases of 7,000 and 3,500 were unable to bring down the violence.

In light of the deteriorating situation in Iraq -- and the president's anemic poll ratings -- this may be his last opportunity to shift his Iraq policy for good. This means erring on the side of more troops, not fewer -- even if it is politically painful in the short run. If the president decides to add more troops, he will not score points at home for deciding on a smaller increase. Any size surge will be controversial. So he should go for a number that maximizes chances for success.

A new military strategy calls for military leaders who "own" the change. Donald Rumsfeld has been cast as the architect of our current military strategy -- focused on training Iraqi soldiers and minimizing the U.S. footprint. But outgoing Central Command Chief John Abizaid and Iraq Commanding Gen. George Casey have also been firm backers of Mr. Rumsfeld's approach.

A fresh plan centered around a surge in troops will require military leaders who are as invested in the new strategy as Gens. Abizaid and Casey are behind the current approach. Gen. Jack Keane, a former vice chief of the U.S. Army, has been an instrumental advocate for a substantial surge. He is well-respected among the Pentagon brass, rank-and-file troops and civilian policy makers. The president should call him out of retirement and appoint him to head Central Command, as Gen. Abizaid's successor. He should also send Lt. Gen. David Petraeus -- a two-tour Iraq veteran who just finished crafting a new counterinsurgency doctrine for U.S. forces -- back to Baghdad to replace Gen. Casey, who is set to rotate out of Iraq in the coming months.

DOJ_NMG_0112470

Economic aid must be matched by dramatic distribution reform. The administration is considering proposals by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and field commanders to pair a troop increase with a funding surge for new Iraq jobs programs. But this only makes sense if there are vast changes in how the new programs are managed by the U.S. and Iraqi bureaucracies.

The funds appropriated by our government barely affect the lives of average Iraqis. This is because large-scale U.S. reconstruction programs continue to be subject to Federal Acquisition Regulations applicable in peacetime. This means that major government contracts for Iraq are subjected, in advance, to the slow and cumbersome "Request For Proposal" process. An even larger cause of the bottleneck is that the Iraqi government lacks the manpower, infrastructure and decisiveness in its ministries to disperse funds effectively. So of those funds appropriated to the Iraqi government, only a small percentage ever moves from the government to the Iraqi people.

To make a "New Deal"-style jobs program work in Iraq, the president should propose that Congress streamline the acquisition process to allow for rapid project approval, following the model of the enormously successful Commander's Emergency Response Program. He should also appoint a respected retired military leader or business executive with expertise in logistics management to oversee distribution of aid on the ground. Anything related to funding and contracting for Iraq is understandably a sensitive issue, especially given the new Democratic majority's focus on oversight. So the president should ask the Democratic congressional leadership to propose a candidate for this position of "counterinsurgency economic czar."

Continue to support democracy and constitutionalism. As the situation has grown worse, some have called for abandoning the goal of democracy. If giving up on democracy could magically solve Iraq's other problems, it might be worth considering. But dropping support for democracy would be radically destabilizing. Shiite and Kurdish leaders would fear a move to disenfranchise their communities and restore a Sunni strongman to power. Instead, the president should continue to seek political solutions -- alongside a new security strategy -- via existing political and constitutional structures. This is an area where he deserves enormous credit: His commitment to democracy has been admirably steadfast.

Become the briefer in chief. When announcing the troop surge, the president should also announce that he will come before the American people every four weeks with a prime-time update on the war. The goal should be to emulate FDR's wartime fireside chats, when Americans were told to be ready with their atlases so they could follow along. Each month, President Bush could provide Americans a live update -- perhaps alongside his commanders, with maps, statistics, etc. -- charting progress from the previous four weeks and outlining metrics for the next month.

This would be a dramatic change in the president's public management of the war, to be sure. But the hands-off, "trust-my-generals" style is not working. Rightly or wrongly, too many citizens believe the president does not own his military campaign. Now is the time to change the dynamic.

Messrs. Senor and Martinez served as foreign-policy advisers to the Bush administration, based in Baghdad from April 2003 through June 2004.

New Congress Leery Of Bush's Iraq Plans (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — As President Bush prepares a major new initiative for Iraq, he confronts a wary and distrustful new Congress eager for solutions but unconvinced the administration can chart a successful exit from the war.

The new Democratic majorities in the House and Senate are reluctant to assume responsibility for the war, leaving unclear Congress' willingness to block any troop escalation or to compel Bush to change strategy.

As lawmakers convened Thursday, the misgivings highlighted how difficult it will be for the president to achieve anything close to consensus as he plots a new course in Iraq.

Democrats and Republicans voiced deep reservations about any plan that would send more troops to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0112471

They also complained about how little they knew of the president's plans, warning that the lack of information further impeded congressional support.

"The president will need strong friends," said Indiana Sen. Richard G. Lugar, the senior Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee. Complaining that he had heard nothing from Bush, he added: "There need to be some informed persons if there is to be support for the president's proposal…. You need people on the takeoff if they are going to be there on the landing."

Next week, Bush is expected to unveil a new Iraq plan that would feature at least a temporary increase in troop levels in an effort to control sectarian violence.

Troop increases have been endorsed by a few lawmakers, including Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.).

But such a proposal is certain to be fiercely opposed by most Democrats.

For months, the party's leaders have been calling for the president to embrace various scenarios that would start the withdrawal of troops. On Thursday, they reiterated their views.

"The president's new plan must ensure the Iraqis take responsibility for their own future," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said on the chamber's floor as he assumed his new post.

The plan also "must remove our troops from a dangerous civil war," he said.

Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), new chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said he would reintroduce a resolution calling for a phased withdrawal of troops starting this year unless Bush sets a timetable for removing them from Iraq.

A similar move sponsored by Levin and Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) failed last year.

Levin — who is one of five Democratic committee leaders in the Senate and House who plan hearings this month that are expected to spotlight criticisms of the administration's handling of the war — said Thursday that any temporary increase in troops must include conditions on the Iraqi government.

"You could condition a surge [in troops] on the Iraqis actually meeting political milestones" that signify a functioning government, Levin said.

Perhaps most ominously for Bush, it is not just Democrats who are expressing concern about what he may announce.

Many Republicans, who until recently have overwhelmingly backed his foreign policy, fretted that the administration's plans to significantly reduce sectarian violence in Iraq remained unclear.

"We need to know what the mission is and what it will take to do the mission," said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, a Texas Republican close to the president.

A few months ago, Hutchison called for more troops in Iraq; on Thursday, she said she was unsure that would be the wisest course.

"This is a hard call right now," said Hutchison, who added that she had not had any conversations with the White House about Bush's announcement.

Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.) said any troop increase would have to be accompanied by a political plan to advance reconciliation between Shiites and Sunnis.

If the new strategy "is going to be well-received by both Republicans and Democrats, there has to be substance and objectives" that advance that goal, he said.

Some Republicans appear unwilling to accept troop increases under any conditions.

"Baghdad needs reconciliation between Shiites and Sunnis. It doesn't need more Americans in the cross hairs," said Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota, who recently visited Iraq and who is to seek reelection in 2008.

Five to 10 GOP senators are wavering in their support for any White House initiative to boost troop levels, said an aide to a senior Republican lawmaker. The aide requested anonymity when discussing the opinions of the senators.

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), who also is up for reelection next year, said that on a recent trip to Iraq, an American general told her confidentially that a jobs program for Iraqis would be more effective in reducing violence than an increase in U.S. troop levels.

The White House has begun to reach out to some lawmakers, including Coleman and Sununu; they said they had been invited to the White House today.

DOJ_NMG_0112472

Other lawmakers have similar meetings scheduled Monday, said Senate Assistant Minority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.).

"We're going to have some more consultation," Lott said, declining to discuss any details.

Iowa Republican Sen. Charles E. Grassley, who said he had not heard anything from the White House yet, said Bush needed to reach out to build support for a revised policy.

"It will be foolhardy for the president to come up with a new plan and not involve Congress," Grassley said.

McCain Reaffirms Support For US Troop 'Surge' In Iraq (AFP)

AFP, January 5, 2007

US Senator John McCain reaffirmed his support for the deployment of thousands of additional US troops in Iraq, a proposal expected to figure in President George W. Bush's upcoming reassessment of US strategy there.

"When I raise my hand and vote to send young men and women, American men and women into harm's way and fight a war, I am committing to accomplishing the mission," McCain, an early frontrunner for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, told MSNBC.

He said the fight against Islamic extremism must be joined with renewed fervor.

"The consequences of failure are chaos and disaster. And these people ... want to destroy the United States of America," McCain said.

His remarks came as Bush prepares to announce a shakeup of US Iraq policy, which reportedly could include sending tens of thousands of additional troops to supplement 140,000-strong US force already there.

But a troop surge has found little support in Congress, with McCain one of only very few voices speaking up in favor of such a policy.

McCain takes over this week as the top Republican in the Democrat-led Senate Armed Services Committee. The Democrats took control of the Senate and House of Representatives Thursday following their November elections triumph.

McCain said he believes US soldiers there are equally committed to the goal of fighting on in Iraq.

"I just recently visited them, including some who have been involuntarily extended," said McCain. "The morale is good. They understand what the mission is and they know what they need to do."

"I am convinced that if we leave and lose this conflict, the conflict will spread in the region, there will be chaos, and we will be sending in men and women into harm's way both in the region and other parts of the world," the former Navy pilot and former Vietnam prisoner of war told MSNBC.

"I've said for more than three years, it's long, hard, tough," McCain said.

"It's going to be very, very difficult. And we have to understand that. But we also have understand the sequences of failure."

Short-Circuiting The Surge (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

The shift in power heralded by the Democrats' assumption of control in the House and Senate yesterday could lead quickly to a direct confrontation with President Bush if he chooses, as many expect, to "surge" additional troops into Iraq.

The surge, which opponents look upon as a soothing label for an outright escalation of an unpopular war, is seen by most Democrats and some Republicans as a rebuke to the majority whose November ballots signaled a negative verdict on the Iraq war.

They also argue that the surge cannot work because it proposes a military solution to what is primarily a political problem: the increasingly deadly confrontation between Iraq's Sunni and Shiite communities. The violent reaction to the taunting of Saddam Hussein by Shiite executioners underscored the futility of expecting additional U.S. troops to repair the damage done by three years of flawed policies.

But Democrats will barely have time to celebrate their new congressional authority before confronting a hard fact of the American constitutional system: If Bush wants to continue or expand the Iraq war, Congress has precious few tools available to stop the commander in chief.

DOJ_NMG_0112473

As a result, Democrats are quietly but urgently seeking ways of pressuring the president to change course, including the possibility of having Congress reconsider its original authorization of force, passed in October 2002.

Even Bush's critics doubt that the broadest measure, cutting off funds for the president's policies, could be effective or has the votes to pass. Yet Bush's opponents will be emboldened if he embarks on a surge, especially if it is not linked to what Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), the new chairman of the Armed Services Committee, calls "milestones" for political reconciliation that the Iraqi government will have to reach. Levin, whose views are shared by many Democrats, also insists that any surge should be part of an "overall plan of troop reduction" that would begin "within four to six months."

Given the limited options, Sen. Joe Biden (D-Del.), the Foreign Relations Committee chairman, has suggested to his colleagues that the strongest response to the surge would be a congressional resolution explicitly opposing the step.

Whereas cutting off funds is a "hollow threat," Biden said in an interview this week, a congressional resolution could have a powerful effect if it drew support from the significant number of Republican senators who are increasingly alienated from Bush's policies. Biden, who expects to offer his proposal at a meeting of Democratic senators today, argued that an anti-surge resolution might not bind the president but would exert considerable pressure on him to reconsider his approach.

More intriguing, Biden is studying whether Congress might reconsider the original Iraq war resolution, now as out of date as the administration's prewar claims. The resolution includes references to a "significant chemical and biological weapons capability" that Iraq didn't have and repeated condemnations of "the current Iraqi regime," i.e., the Saddam Hussein regime that fell long ago. In effect, the resolution authorizes a war on an enemy who no longer exists and for purposes that are no longer relevant.

Biden candidly acknowledges that it is difficult to find precedent for reconsidering a war resolution. But his idea is not as far-fetched as it might seem, as legal scholars -- including Michael J. Glennon on this page last month -- have noted that the war being fought on behalf of the Maliki government bears little resemblance to the war Congress authorized. Yet his idea of revisiting the authority granted Bush could be a forceful way for Congress to reassert itself and encourage a full-scale debate on the future of American policy in Iraq and in Afghanistan.

Biden, along with many others in both parties, is alarmed that the intense focus on Iraq is distracting attention from a disaster in the making in Afghanistan, with the resurgence of the Taliban. "If we're surging troops anywhere, it should be in Afghanistan," Biden said. Adding troops there would give the United States "the moral high ground" in its quest for more forces from NATO allies.

For his part, Levin believes that an anti-surge resolution has a reasonable chance of passing the Senate. He is also considering pressing for a resolution that he and Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) have crafted that calls for benchmarks and a withdrawal plan.

Bush's critics are careful to say they still hope he will abandon the surge idea, which Levin sees as a desperate "Hail Mary" pass. Yes, Bush has the power to order a surge. But if he insists on doing so in the face of widespread skepticism, a president proudly famous for relying on his gut will discover that he faces a Congress that does not regard his instincts as a reliable guide to the defense of American interests.

Jubilant Democrats Assume Control On Capitol Hill (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — In a day of transition and pageantry, exultant Democrats on Thursday took control of both houses of Congress for the first time in a dozen years and elected the first woman to be speaker of the House.

Representative Nancy Pelosi of California took the speaker's gavel at 2:08 p.m. from Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader, whom she defeated by a vote of 233 to 202, the 31-seat margin of the new Democratic majority. The floor and the packed galleries erupted in cheers when the vote was announced.

Even Republicans grudgingly acknowledged the unprecedented nature of the day on which a woman ascended to power on Capitol Hill by rising as one to applaud her.

DOJ_NMG_0112474

"This is an historic moment," Mrs. Pelosi said in her first remarks as speaker of the 110th Congress. "It's an historic moment for the Congress. It's an historic moment for the women of America. It is a moment for which we have waited for over 200 years."

Earlier in the day, on the other side of the Capitol dome, Senator Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, became majority leader, a result of his party's one-seat victory margin in the November elections.

Both Senator Reid and Speaker Pelosi promised a new era of cooperation after years of partisan passion and gridlock. "Guided by the spirit of bipartisanship," Mr. Reid said, "Democrats are ready to take this country in a new direction."

The House opened the session by passing, by a large bipartisan margin, new ethics rules. [Page A13.]

But there were signs, too, of division among Democrats over how hard to push to undo the fruits of years of Republican rule. Many Democrats say those years moved the nation too far right, but others argue that the big tax cuts and regulatory relaxations are part of the permanent legislative framework that should be accepted. [News analysis, Page A12.]

In her remarks, Mrs. Pelosi delivered the obligatory promise of partnership with Republicans. But she immediately added a blunt warning to Mr. Bush on the war in Iraq.

"The American people rejected an open-ended obligation to a war without end," she said, bringing Democrats to their feet.

She signaled to Mr. Bush that any plan to increase the American military presence in Iraq would meet stiff opposition in the new Congress.

"It is the responsibility of the president to articulate a new plan for Iraq that makes it clear to the Iraqis that they must defend their own streets and their own security," she said, "a plan that promotes stability in the region and a plan that allows us to responsibly redeploy our troops."

Mrs. Pelosi's triumphal 20-minute remarks were frequently interrupted by applause, much like a presidential State of the Union address, which is delivered annually from the same rostrum in the House chamber. Cheering her on from the gallery were members of her family, dozens of California supporters and celebrities including Tony Bennett, Carole King and Richard Gere.

Mr. Boehner sat glum and unmoving in his seat for much of the hour it took to record the vote that put Mrs. Pelosi in the speaker's chair. The former speaker, J. Dennis Hastert, now just a Republican member of Congress from Illinois, stood hunched and hulking by the back rail of the chamber.

Mrs. Pelosi sat on the House floor with several of her grandchildren as her Democratic colleagues rose to record their votes, many adding footnotes. Representative Loretta Sanchez, Democrat of California, said she voted "for the empowerment of all women in the world." Seventy-one women will be in the House, a record.

The jubilant Democratic takeover of the House was an echo of the Republican "revolution" of 1994 in which Republicans took control of the House after 40 uninterrupted years of Democratic dominance.

In the Senate, Vice President Dick Cheney, in his constitutional role as president of the chamber, swore in the members, including 10 new senators, only one a Republican, Bob Corker of Tennessee. A beaming Bill Clinton, accompanied by his daughter, Chelsea, and his mother-in-law, Dorothy Rodham, looked from the gallery as Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York took the oath at the outset of her second term, perhaps dreaming of another oath-taking that might be two years hence.

The first order of business for the new Democratic-led House was passage of a measure to limit gifts to lawmakers from lobbyists and to restrict subsidized flights on private aircraft. The bill is part of a larger package of ethics changes that Democrats are pushing as part of a promise to voters to end what they called a "culture of corruption" in Congress that led to several indictments and resignations of members last year.

Next week, the Democrats plan a 100-hour blitz to raise the minimum wage, lift restrictions on federal financing of embryonic stem cell research and allow the government to negotiate price cuts with pharmaceutical companies for the Medicare prescription drug program, among other matters. By the time they have clocked the 100 hours of legislative debate, House Democrats also plan to have passed bills to cut interest rates on student loans and roll back subsidies for oil and gas producers, seeking to make a statement of priorities, pressure the Senate to act and put an active agenda before the country before Mr. Bush's State of the Union address on Jan. 23.

DOJ_NMG_0112475

In an early sign of bipartisanship, Senators Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, and Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, introduced a bill to repeal the individual alternative minimum tax, which is imposing an increasingly heavy burden on middle-income taxpayers.

But before much real business was conducted, Democratic lawmakers adjourned for a round of festivities to celebrate their victories and to lubricate their donors in what resembled nothing so much as a scaled-down presidential inaugural.

Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, who engineered the election of 42 new Democrats to the House as leader of the party's Congressional campaign committee, threw a huge reception at Johnny's Half Shell across the street from the Capitol. Mrs. Pelosi was the host of a gala at the National Building Museum at which Mr. Bennett and Ms. King were scheduled to perform.

Senator Claire McCaskill, the newly elected Democrat from Missouri and one of 16 women in the Senate, seemed a bit in awe after taking the oath of office on Thursday afternoon.

"Anybody who would go through that and not feel overwhelmed with the enormity of the institution and the men and women who have served there would have to be in a coma," Ms. McCaskill said in the lobby outside the Senate chamber. "I'm sure there will be tough times ahead, but it's thrilling to be part of one of this country's enduring institutions."

House Dems Lead Quick Action On Ethics Pelosi Assumes Speaker's Post Amid Pledges Of Bipartisanship (AJC)

By Julia Malone

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 5, 2007

Washington — The 110th Congress opened Thursday with a burst of ceremony, quick action on ethics reform and the historic election of California Rep. Nancy Pelosi as the first female Speaker of the House.

Democrats took majority control of both houses for the first time in a dozen years with promises of bipartisan cooperation, despite deep divisions over the war in Iraq and a looming 2008 presidential race that has already begun to heat up.

Foreshadowing a possible clash with the Bush administration, Pelosi said the American people in the last election "rejected an open-ended obligation to a war without end."

She called on President Bush to "articulate a new plan" on Iraq when he addresses the nation on the subject as early as next week.

However, she stopped short of outlining a Democratic position on the war.

On the Senate side, where the Democratic margin is a mere 51-49 and where the pace is much slower, new Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada was even less specific.

"Iraq is an issue that we all need to work on, and we will work on that," he said as he emerged from a closed-door bipartisan meeting for the entire Senate membership.

He and Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), the new minority leader, said they would work across party lines.

By contrast, the new Democratic management of the House was rushing forward on a series of other measures, beginning with dealing with what Pelosi and her party have dubbed the "culture of corruption" that led to lobbying and bribery scandals.

"Let us join together in the first 100 hours to make this Congress the most honest and open in history," Pelosi told the House.

She quickly dispensed with a lingering dispute by allowing the seating of Vern Buchanan, a Republican, to represent the Florida 13th district at least until a legal challenge by Democrat Christine Jennings is resolved over the vote count in that close election.

Then the House leadership speedily guided the first of two major sets of rules changes into passage by a vote of 430-1. Rep. Dan Burton (R-Ind.) cast the sole negative vote.

Among the ethics reforms approved Thursday:

• Members of the House will be barred from accepting gifts from lobbyists.

• Members won't be allowed to accept reimbursement for travel when the trips are arranged by lobbyists or when lobbyists go along (unless the trip involves a college or university).

DOJ_NMG_0112476

• Lawmakers won't be able to accept offers from corporations to fly on their private airplanes.

• The House ethics committee will be charged to set guidelines to determine whether a proposed trip sponsored by any outside group is relevant to a member's official duties.

The House, which begins a new five-day legislating week instead of the previous practice of voting chiefly Tuesday through Thursday, is set to approve additional rules today.

These include regulations requiring that members publicly disclose any "earmarked" spending or other benefit they obtain through legislation for their home state or district.

The House is also expected to pass a "paygo" measure that forbids passage of new spending unless the House first agrees to cuts elsewhere or a revenue increase.

Other rules set for adoption are aimed at promoting "civility" in the House and keeping procedures open to public disclosure.

However, the rules drew protests from the Republican minority, as members complained they had not been allowed to offer competing proposals for priorities that Pelosi and the Democrats have set for the first 100 hours of the legislative session.

All of the measures have been slated for action in the next two weeks, without the customary committee hearings and with only limited floor debate. However, unlike the House rules changes, the rest of the legislation would require Senate approval and a presidential signature. Some measures would almost certainly be headed for a presidential veto.

New Congress, Old Fights; Choosing Teams For 2008 (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

DEMOCRATS FACE conflicting pressures on potential Iraq troop "surge."

With Bush preparing to unveil new strategy, Democratic leaders re-affirm commitment not to block troop funding. But Moveon.org plans protest outside speech today by Sens. McCain and Lieberman backing a surge, underscoring ire of Democratic base.

Senate Democrats plan to grill Rice and Gates as part of more than a dozen hearings to mobilize public opposition over next three weeks. Republicans brace for additional defections, while McCain cautions that 20,000 more soldiers might not be enough.

"There are still people around [Bush] who think things aren't that bad," McCain frets.

HEALTH ISSUES may spark first big clash between Bush and new Congress.

The House votes next week on lifting federal stem-cell research limits, but proponents lack two-thirds needed to override another Bush veto. Senate backers claim the votes to do so, and most Republican 2008 presidential candidates back expanded research. "The ball is in [Bush's] court," says a spokesman for Democratic Senate leader Reid.

Administration aides and pharmaceutical lobbyists say Bush would veto as "price controls" the House Democratic plan to require government negotiations with drug makers for lower Medicare costs. But the Senate may water down the legislation by merely permitting negotiations.

EDWARDS REACHES for feminists' backing while Clinton and Obama ponder options.

Abortion-rights activist Kate Michelman is expected to endorse the former North Carolina senator, who seeks fast new year's start. Aides expect Clinton to signal her candidacy this month, but she says, "I'm not making any decisions yet" as new Congress opens.

Some Democratic operatives question dearth of black campaign professionals on her team as Obama becomes top potential rival.

A Clinton strategist notes that the senator's aide, Patti Solis Doyle, would be the first Hispanic campaign manager ever, and that her staff will "absolutely reflect the diversity of our party."

Obama, back from Hawaii vacation, makes no commitments on candidacy to those interviewing for staff jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0112477

CONSUMER GROUPS PREPARE to assail rumored Bush candidate to head Consumer Product Safety Commission, National Association of Manufacturers lobbyist Michael Baroody. "It's sort of astonishing that the administration would pick someone from a regulated industry," says Rachel Weintraub of the Consumer Federation of America. The agency will lose its ability to make rules or levy fines on Jan. 14 unless chairman's vacancy is filled.

PRESSURE TACTIC: The recent arrest of Iranian diplomats in Baghdad, allegedly for ties to militants, was part of Pentagon strategy to ratchet up efforts to curb Tehran's growing influence inside Iraq. "I think you can expect more" in the months ahead, said one official.

NOT SO FAST: FEC admonishes Nascar driver Kirk Shelmerdine for putting Bush-Cheney decal on his car during 2004 campaign. While declining to fine Shelmerdine, the election-watchdog agency said the bumper sticker amounted to an independent expenditure that should have been reported to the FEC.

UPSIDE DOWN? Republican Sen. Sessions of Alabama may find better luck under Democratic control with his bill to reduce the sentencing disparity between crack and powder cocaine. Democratic backers want to eliminate the disparity altogether, arguing it discriminates against black defendants. But they face law-enforcement resistance, leaving Sessions's proposal as a potential compromise.

DINGELL ALARMS FCC Democrats, too.

Back as chairman of House Energy and Commerce panel after 12 years, the Michigan Democrat has blasted the Republican-controlled communications panel. But his statement of "significant concerns" about ATT-BellSouth merger rankled Democratic commissioners. The agency's two Democratic board members had won concessions from AT&T to approve the deal. A Dingell aide said he wasn't referring to the Democrats' actions.

FCC officials brace for frequent Hill trips for oversight hearings.

MINOR MEMOS: More than a decade after President Clinton said "The era of big government is over," liberal activist Bob Borosage proclaims, "The conservative era is over"....In release to members and reporters, new House Majority Leader Hoyer prints Democrats' first-day agenda in typeface called "Comic."

War Foes Set Sights On New Majority (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

As Democrats reveled in their new majority yesterday, anti-war activists complained of cowardice on the Iraq war and pledged that they won't let Democrats cave to President Bush.

Cindy Sheehan, who opposes the war in Iraq, told more than 100 activists who rallied across the street from the Capitol that Democrats are behaving like Republicans and soon will be held to account.

"We're not going to give them a free pass and they found that out yesterday," Mrs. Sheehan said. On Wednesday, Mrs. Sheehan led a group of about 75 protesters who chased top Democrats out of their own press conference with chants of "de-escalate, investigate, troops home now."

Activists yesterday pledged to keep pressuring Democrats to stop funding the military campaign, force a withdrawal of troops, and investigate and impeach Mr. Bush for what they called "lies" that led to the war. They complained that Democrats continue to vote for war funding and have not put impeachment on their legislative agenda.

"They need a backbone transplant," Ray McGovern, a retired CIA analyst, told the crowd.

Elaine Brower, whose organization sponsored the protest, said House Democrats "need to add to those first 100 hours what we are demanding today."

Democrats plan to hold oversight hearings on the war, but activist David Swanson said that doesn't go far enough.

"Prodding Bush is like teaching calculus to a pig," he said. "They are telling us that impeachment is off the table. They are doing for Bush what Ford did for Nixon: They are pardoning."

The rally was sponsored by World Can't Wait/Drive Out the Bush Regime. The group displayed banners calling Mr. Bush a "torturer," "war criminal" and "murderer."

DOJ_NMG_0112478

About 30 hooded protesters in orange jumpsuits argued that the government is sanctioning torture at U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Mr. Swanson said the congressional leadership needs to be more aggressive, but it is up to war opponents to take action on impeachment.

"We are going to remove Bush and Cheney from office whether Democrats want it or not," he said.

Mrs. Sheehan, who gained national prominence as a war opponent after her son died while serving in Iraq, told the crowd that her "biggest fear" is that her allies will relax now that Democrats are in charge of Congress.

"They've proven to us that we can't relax," she said.

White House Postponing Loss Of Iraq, Biden Says (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said yesterday that he believes top officials in the Bush administration have privately concluded they have lost Iraq and are simply trying to postpone disaster so the next president will "be the guy landing helicopters inside the Green Zone, taking people off the roof," in a chaotic withdrawal reminiscent of Vietnam.

"I have reached the tentative conclusion that a significant portion of this administration, maybe even including the vice president, believes Iraq is lost," Biden said. "They have no answer to deal with how badly they have screwed it up. I am not being facetious now. Therefore, the best thing to do is keep it from totally collapsing on your watch and hand it off to the next guy -- literally, not figuratively."

Biden gave the comments in an interview as he outlined an ambitious agenda for the committee, including holding four weeks of hearings focused on every aspect of U.S. policy in Iraq. The hearings will call top political, economic and intelligence experts; foreign diplomats; and former and current senior U.S. officials to examine the situation in Iraq and possible plans for dealing with it. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will probably testify next Thursday to defend the president's new plan, but at least eight other plans will be examined over several sessions of the committee.

Other witnesses invited for at least 10 days of hearings include former national security advisers and secretaries of state, including Brent Scowcroft, Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger, Zbigniew Brzezinski, Henry A. Kissinger, Madeleine K. Albright and George P. Shultz.

Biden expressed opposition to the president's plan for a "surge" of additional U.S. troops and said he has grave doubts about whether the Iraqi government has the will or the capacity to help implement a new approach. He said he hopes to use the hearings to "illuminate the alternatives available to this president" and to provide a platform for influencing Americans, especially Republican lawmakers.

"There is nothing a United States Senate can do to stop a president from conducting his war," Biden said. "The only thing that is going to change the president's mind, if he continues on a course that is counterproductive, is having his party walk away from his position."

Biden said that Vice President Cheney and former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld "are really smart guys who made a very, very, very, very bad bet, and it blew up in their faces. Now, what do they do with it? I think they have concluded they can't fix it, so how do you keep it stitched together without it completely unraveling?"

Shays Says More Troops In Iraq Is A 'Huge Mistake' (HARTC)

By Brian Lockhart

The Hartford Courant, January 5, 2007

U.S. Rep. Christopher Shays said yesterday it would be a "huge mistake" to send more American troops to Iraq if that country's government "doesn't do the heavy lifting it has to do."

Shays, R-Bridgeport, was in Hartford for the inauguration of Gov. M. Jodi Rell and swearing-in of members of the General Assembly. He returns to Washington today to begin his 10th term after fending off a second challenge from former Westport First Selectwoman Diane Farrell in November.

DOJ_NMG_0112479

He was the only Republican congressman re-elected in Connecticut and New England.

"You're representing all of New England now," a visitor to the Capitol said upon recognizing Shays.

The 4th District congressman said the next two years will be pivotal for America's policies in Iraq.

"We went in on a bipartisan basis and we need to find a way to leave on a bipartisan basis," Shays said.

The Iraq Study Group's report, released a month ago, was a good start, he said.

The bipartisan group "nailed it pretty solidly," Shays said.

The report said the United States must not make an open-ended commitment to keep large numbers of American troops in Iraq but warned against a rapid reduction. U.S. combat brigades not needed for force protection could be withdrawn by the first quarter of 2008, it said.

President Bush is considering sending tens of thousands more troops to Iraq, where 140,000 are currently stationed.

Though a longtime proponent of the Iraq invasion, Shays said in the final days of his re-election campaign that there should be a timeline for troop withdrawal. After his 15th visit to Iraq last month, Shays said the country is in chaos and reiterated the need for a timeline.

"Saying we're not going to leave until the job is done is an invitation to Iraqis to let us do the job," Shays said at the time.

U.S. Sens. Christopher Dodd and Joseph Lieberman, both D-Conn., took separate trips to the Middle East last month.

Dodd said sending more troops would create additional targets for Iraq's warring factions. Lieberman wrote an opinion piece for the Washington Post - "Why We Need More Troops in Iraq."

Dodd also visited Syria, saying he supports the Iraq Study Group's conclusion that the United States must begin talks with that country.

Lieberman has said turning to Syria for help would be akin to asking an arsonist to help put out a fire.

Dodd and Lieberman also attended Rell's inauguration yesterday.

Shays yesterday would not comment on the senators' observations.

"That's what they believe," Shays said. "Ultimately the president determines foreign policy."

Shays said he asked the White House and State Department if he could visit Syria last month and was advised not to put it on his itinerary.

"I'm sorry they asked me not to," he said, because it is "crazy" not to engage Iraq's neighbors.

He said he supports the Iraq Study Group's proposals to set conditions for transferring more responsibilities from America to Iraq and for mending the rifts between the Sunnis and the Shiite-led government.

Despite his concerns about the war in Iraq, Shays praised last week's execution of toppled dictator Saddam Hussein.

Had Saddam lived, he would have grasped victory from defeat, just as he bolstered his image after the Gulf War, Shays said.

"If he had survived, given all he did, it was a message that he was more powerful than life," Shays said.

Bush Shaking Up Team Responsible For Carrying Out Iraq Strategies (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush is shaking up the team responsible for carrying out his military and diplomatic strategies in Iraq as he prepares to outline a new direction for the war that has raged for nearly four years.

Bush will replace Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, and Gen. George Casey, the chief general in Iraq, in the coming weeks, according to media reports Thursday. A revamping of the administration's national security team was already underway.

Bush wants to replace Abizaid with Adm. William Fallon, the top U.S. commander in the Pacific, and Casey's replacement will be Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who headed the effort to train Iraqi security forces, the reports citing administration officials said.

Giving Fallon and Petraeus the top military posts in the Middle East would help Bush to assert that he is taking a fresh approach in the region and help pave the way for him to turn policy there in a new direction. Both Abizaid and Casey have expressed reservations about the potential effectiveness of boosting troop strength in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0112480

Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Defense appropriations subcommittee, told The Associated Press on Thursday that he understands Bush wants to appoint Fallon to head the U.S. Central Command, a position responsible for directing the wars in both Iraq and Afghanistan.

"He's highly knowledgeable and well-educated and respected," Inouye said of Fallon. "I would think that his nomination, if the president is to submit it, would go flying through."

In a news conference Thursday, Bush said that he would go before the nation next week with his long-anticipated speech about the next steps in Iraq. The war was a major factor in the Republicans' loss of Congress and Bush's slide in the polls. More than 3,000 members of the U.S. military have lost their lives in the war.

"I'll be ready to outline a strategy that will help the Iraqis achieve the objective of a country that can govern, sustain and defend itself sometime next week," the president said. "I've still got consultations to go through." Some members of Congress have been invited to the White House on Friday for discussions about Iraq.

Considering more troops to deal with the rising violence in Baghdad, Bush said, "One thing is for certain: I will want to make sure the mission is clear and specific and can be accomplished." Senior generals have cautioned against sending additional troops unless their role is defined.

Abizaid and Casey have at times sounded skeptical about increasing the size of the U.S. force in Iraq.

In November, Abizaid told the Senate Armed Services Committee that boosting the roughly 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq by 20,000 would have a temporary impact, but he warned that the military's ability to maintain in increase of that size "is simply not something that we have right now."

Casey told reporters in Iraq last month that he is "not necessarily opposed to the idea" of sending in more troops, but said any increase would have to "help us progress to our strategic objectives."

Along with changes in policy in Iraq, Bush is rearranging his national security team. Retired Vice Adm. Mike McConnell, a veteran of more than 25 years in the intelligence field, will be named Friday to succeed John Negroponte as national intelligence director, officials said.

In addition, Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, will be nominated to become the U.S. envoy to the United Nations, according to a senior Bush administration official. He is likely to be replaced in Baghdad by Ryan Crocker, a veteran American diplomat now U.S. envoy to Pakistan.

Bush's new plan for Iraq is expected to contain economic, political and diplomatic components.

Given the need to reduce high unemployment and draw Iraqis away from Shiite militias and the Sunni insurgency, the president is considering loans to businesses. He is looking at getting Iraqis into short-term jobs by proposing a significant increase in the discretionary funds that military commanders can use for reconstruction projects.

Questions about what the president's plan will mean for the U.S. military presence in Iraq have gotten the most attention.

One option presented to Bush calls for an initial infusion of 8,000 to 9,000 troops, mainly to reinforce Baghdad. The option involves sending two additional Army brigades, or roughly 7,000 soldiers, to Baghdad, and two Marine battalions, totaling about 1,500 troops, to western Anbar Province, the center of the Sunni Arab insurgency.

Sen. Ben Nelson, a member of the Armed Services Committee, was one of those asked to Friday's meeting at the White House. Nelson, D-Neb., said he planned to urge the president to resist sending more troops without setting firm conditions.

Bush and Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki spoke on a secure video hookup for nearly two hours Thursday. He appeared later in the day with German Chancellor Angela Merkel and recounted some of his discussions with al-Maliki.

The president said he talked with the prime minister about the final moments of Saddam's life, when he was taunted before being hanged. An unauthorized video showed images of Saddam's dangling body. The White House has been reluctant to criticize the proceedings, which have been condemned by some world leaders as deplorable.

"My personal reaction is that Saddam Hussein was given a trial that he was unwilling to give the thousands of people he killed," Bush said. "I wish, obviously, that the proceedings had gone on in a more dignified way."

Bush To Make Changes In Key National Security Jobs (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Warren P. Strobel

DOJ_NMG_0112481

McClatchy Newspapers, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush is preparing to shake up his national security team and bring new faces to the United Nations, the military, the State Department and the U.S. embassy in Iraq, administration officials said Thursday.

In one high-profile shift, Adm. William Fallon, the head of the U.S. Pacific Command, would be nominated to succeed Army Gen. John Abizaid as the commander of the U.S. Central Command. Abizaid, who's been skeptical about the wisdom of sending more troops to Iraq, is scheduled to retire in March.

Bush is also expected to name a replacement for Army Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, and to appoint the American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, to be the U.S. representative at the United Nations. Khalilzad's likely replacement in Baghdad is Ryan Crocker, a veteran Mideast expert who's now the U.S. ambassador to Pakistan.

At the same time, Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte, the nation's top intelligence official and Khalilzad's predecessor as ambassador to Iraq, is in line to be named deputy secretary of state on Friday.

Administration officials discussed the changes on the condition of anonymity because White House policy prohibits discussing personnel moves before they're announced. Some of the contemplated changes could be derailed by last-minute developments.

The overhaul of Bush's military, intelligence and diplomatic team comes as the president is putting the finishing touches on a new strategy for Iraq. He's expected to announce his latest Iraq plan next week.

The president spoke briefly about his emerging Iraq plan after meeting with German Chancellor Angela Merkel early Thursday evening.

"My thinking is taking shape," Bush said. "I've still got consultations to go through."

The personnel shuffle is in keeping with Bush's desire for a fresh start in Iraq, but it doesn't appear to signal a major shift in policy. All the potential appointees are Bush loyalists who've supported the president's Iraq policy.

Fallon would be the first naval officer to head the Central Command, which oversees all U.S. military operations in South and Central Asia, the Middle East and North Africa. In the Pacific Command, Fallon helped develop a strategy to combat terrorist groups in the Philippines and Indonesia that relied as much on diplomacy and working with local allies as it did on military force.

Khalilzad, a highly regarded diplomat, became a top prospect for the U.N. job when former Ambassador John Bolton resigned in December. Bolton had been appointed to the post when Congress was in recess, and he stepped down when it became clear that he couldn't win Senate confirmation.

Khalilzad, the Bush administration's highest-ranking Muslim, reportedly has been eager to leave Baghdad for months. He's known as a consummate back-room deal maker, having played key roles in helping form the first post-Taliban government in Afghanistan and trying to reconcile Sunni Muslim, Shiite and Kurdish politicians in Iraq.

But his efforts to reach out to Iraq's Sunnis, who launched an insurgency after the fall of the late President Saddam Hussein, made Khalilzad some enemies in Washington, particularly in Vice President Dick Cheney's office, a State Department official said.

Negroponte interrupted his diplomatic career in April 2005 to become the nation's first Director of National Intelligence, a job created in response to the 2001 terrorist attacks.

He's expected to play a major role in helping Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice with Iraq policy and efforts to revive Arab-Israeli peace negotiations.

"He's a diplomat's diplomat," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, without confirming the personnel shift. "She has a very good working relationship with him, and he is also somebody who has the confidence of the president."

Retired Navy Vice Admiral Mike McConnell, currently a top executive at the Booz Allen Hamilton consulting firm, is Bush's choice to replace Negroponte in the intelligence job. McConnell formerly headed the National Security Agency.

Bush To Name A New General To Oversee Iraq (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon And Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112482

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — President Bush has decided to name Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus as the top American military commander in Iraq, part of a broad revamping of the military team that will carry out the administration's new Iraq strategy, administration officials said Thursday.

In addition to the promotion of General Petraeus, who will replace Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the choice to succeed Gen. John P. Abizaid as the head of the Central Command is expected to be Adm. William J. Fallon, who is the top American military officer in the Pacific, officials said.

The changes are being made as the White House is considering an option to increase American combat power in Baghdad by five brigades as well as adding two battalions of reinforcements to the volatile province of Anbar in western Iraq.

Mr. Bush, who said Thursday that he would present details of his overall strategy for Iraq next week, and several top aides held a video teleconference on Thursday, speaking with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq and his top deputies about plans to add forces in the capital and other matters. The session lasted roughly an hour and 45 minutes.

"I said that 'You show the will, we will help you,' " Mr. Bush told reporters.

Echoing the comments of both military and political advisers in recent weeks, he added, "One thing is for certain: I will want to make sure that the mission is clear and specific and can be accomplished."

Senior administration officials said that the choice of General Petraeus was part of a broader effort to change almost all of the top American officials in Iraq as Mr. Bush changes his strategy there.

"The idea is to put the whole new team in at roughly the same time, and send some clear messages that we are trying a new approach," a senior administration official said Thursday.

In addition to the military changes, Mr. Bush intends to appoint the ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, as the new United States ambassador to the United Nations, a senior administration official said Thursday.

"It was clearly time to move the players around on the field," said the senior official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because Mr. Bush had yet to announce the changes. "This helps the president to make the case that this is a fresh start."

Admiral Fallon would be the first Navy officer to serve as the senior officer of the Central Command, which is managing simultaneous ground wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Admiral Fallon is regarded within the military as one of its stronger regional combat commanders, and his possible appointment also reflects a greater emphasis on countering Iranian power, a mission that relies heavily on naval forces and combat airpower to project American influence in the Persian Gulf.

General Petraeus, who is now the head of the Army's Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., helped oversee the drafting of the military's comprehensive new manual on counterinsurgency. He has served two previous tours in Iraq, and some former officers say he sees the need for additional troops in Baghdad.

He will replace General Casey, whose plan for troop reductions in Iraq faltered last year in the face of escalating sectarian strife and who initially expressed public wariness about any short-term increase in troops in Iraq, a move that is now a leading option under consideration by the White House.

The departures of both General Casey and General Abizaid were expected, though in General Casey's case it appears to have been moved up several months from the originally anticipated shift in spring or summer. General Abizaid's tour had already been extended for a full year beyond the typical two-year stint, and he has announced that he will retire soon.

The troop increase option under discussion would focus on improving security in Baghdad. Under this approach, two Army combat brigades would be sent to the capital during the first phase of the operation. A combat brigade generally consists of about 3,500 soldiers. At the same time, a third brigade would be positioned in Kuwait as a reserve, and two more brigades would be on call in the United States.

The expectation is that these three brigades would eventually be sent to Baghdad as well, though the president would have the option to limit the reinforcements. Part of the increase could be achieved by holding some units past their currently scheduled return home.

Scaling up by five brigades would more than double the number of American combat troops involved in security operations in the Iraqi capital. The emphasis on Baghdad reflects the view that stability in the capital is a precondition for any broader effort to bring calm to the whole country. It is also a recognition that the administration sees sectarian violence as a greater threat to Iraq's stability than the Sunni Arab insurgency.

DOJ_NMG_0112483

While Baghdad is the principal focus, the option also provides for sending two battalions of reinforcements to Anbar, where overstretched Marine and Army forces have been battling Sunni Arab insurgents. A basic battalion generally consists of 1,200 troops.

One issue under discussion is how to mesh the emerging American strategy with the Iraqis' capabilities. Bush administration officials say they want the increase in American troops to be paralleled by a considerable rise in the number of functional Iraqi troops. But the Iraqis failed in the summer to send all the reinforcements that had been requested, and some Iraqi security forces, particularly the police, have been infiltrated by militias.

Another point of contention is that some senior aides to Mr. Maliki have been notably unenthusiastic about an increase in American troops in Baghdad. During his meeting with Mr. Bush in Jordan in November, Mr. Maliki presented a plan that would shift most Americans to the periphery of Baghdad so they could concentrate on fighting Sunni insurgents while the Shiite-dominated Iraqi government asserted more control over the capital. That has left some American officials wondering whether the Maliki government was making a legitimate bid to exercise sovereignty or is committed to a sectarian Shiite agenda.

Bush administration officials believe that their new Iraqi strategy must involve political steps toward reconciliation and reconstruction programs to produce jobs.

In their teleconference, Mr. Bush and Mr. Maliki discussed the Iraqi government's efforts at political reconciliation and the Iraqi prime minister's vows to rein in militias, the pace of which American officials have found painfully slow. Discussing the execution of Saddam Hussein, Mr. Bush said the Maliki government was right to investigate the circumstances surrounding the hanging.

General Petraeus participated in the initial invasion of Iraq as the commander of the 101st Airborne Division. The division fought its way toward Baghdad and was later sent to Mosul in northern Iraq, where the general focused on political and economic reconstruction efforts.

"We are in a race to win over the people," read a sign in his Mosul headquarters. "What have you and your element done today to contribute to victory?"

General Petraeus did a second tour in Iraq in which he oversaw the efforts to train the Iraqi Army. At his current post at Fort Leavenworth, he has been involved in the push to change the United States Army's training and education to emphasize counterinsurgency operations.

Jack Keane, the retired Army general who served as vice chief of the Army, called General Petraeus an "imaginative commander who is experienced and knows how to deal with irregular warfare," as the Army refers to insurgencies.

The Iraq commander post is considered a four-star general's command, a promotion that would add a star to General Petraeus's shoulder.

Officials also said Admiral Fallon received a persuasive recommendation from the Joint Chiefs as one of the military's stronger commanders of a geographic theater, with his current command including the challenges of North Korea and China.

In that capacity, he also took the unusual and punitive move in December of canceling a large, annual field exercise with the Philippines over a local judge's failure to honor the bilateral treaty governing protections for American military personnel. The judge refused to honor the agreement's rule that American military personnel remain in American custody pending final appeal of all criminal proceedings against them, and ordered a marine convicted of rape held in a local jail even though the case was on appeal.

Bush To Reveal New Commanders, War Strategy Next Week (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush intends to name two new military commanders to oversee the war and help establish a new direction in Iraq as part of his shift in strategy to be announced next week, according to a defense official.

Navy Adm. William J. Fallon, currently the commander of all U.S. forces in east Asia and the Pacific, will be nominated as the new head of U.S. Central Command, the military headquarters responsible for operations in the Middle East, replacing retiring Army Gen. John P. Abizaid.

DOJ_NMG_0112484

And Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, a veteran of two tours in Iraq, will become the new four-star commander in Iraq, replacing Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr. Both would have to be confirmed by the Democratic-controlled Senate for their new posts.

The changes would be among the first major steps in Bush's overhaul of his Iraq policy. They were first reported Thursday night by ABC News and confirmed by the defense official who requested not to be named since the announcement is pending.

Although both Abizaid and Casey were expected to leave their posts early this year, Bush's decision to name their successors at about the same time he unveils his revised strategy is a signal of how thoroughly he intends break from past policies, which he recently conceded are failing.

The choice of Petraeus in particular could have wide-ranging significance. Although his selection does not come as a surprise, Petraeus is closely associated with the push for a more complex counterinsurgency campaign, which would move U.S. soldiers out of their large bases and into smaller outposts in troubled neighborhoods.

Advocates of such a plan argue that it is the only way to gain the confidence of Iraqi civilians and protect them from attacks. Abizaid and Casey have resisted such moves, arguing a more visible U.S. presence would inflame locals and prevent Iraqi forces from shouldering the security burden.

Petraeus has risen quickly through the ranks after earning praise for commanding the 101st Airborne Division during the Iraq invasion.

"Dave Petraeus may be the most talented person I ever met," retired Army Gen. Barry McCafferey said in a recent interview. "He's got phenomenal intellectual gifts."

Petraeus currently oversees most of the Army's leading military colleges, where he supervised work on the new Army and Marine Corps counterinsurgency manual, issued last month. The manual advocated multiple manpower-intensive tactics that would break sharply from many of Casey's views for a lighter U.S. footprint in Iraq.

Bush's selection of Fallon would be more unexpected. Fallon, whose nickname is "Fox," would become the first Naval officer to take command of the Middle East headquarters since its creation in 1983. Because most threats in the region have been land-based, the command, known colloquially as Centcom, has alternated between Army and Marine generals.

Fallon has been viewed as somewhat out of step with Bush administration policy in Asia. He has advocated closer military relationships with China and downplayed the threat posed by North Korea's missile program. In contrast, former Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld repeatedly raised concerns about the North Korean missile program and the lack of transparency of China's military buildup while he was in office.

Despite Fallon's differences with Rumsfeld, the former fighter pilot and Vietnam veteran is highly regarded within the Pentagon for his willingness to speak his mind and for his openness to subordinates. If he takes the reins of Centcom in March, when Abizaid is expected to retire, he will have served as head of Pacific Command for only a year.

Fallon was not Bush's first choice to head the Pacific Command when he was nominated in January 2005. The White House had originally nominated Air Force Gen. Gregory S. Martin for the command, but was forced to withdraw the selection when Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., objected to his ties to an Air Force officer involved in a procurement scandal.

The selection of a Naval officer to head Centcom could signal the Pentagon's interest in devoting more attention to countries in the region other than Iraq.

Pentagon officials have repeatedly raised concerns about the smuggling of weapons and personnel by terrorist groups on the region's seas, while any military move against Iran would likely rely heavily on ship-based missiles and fighter aircraft.

Concern As Spy Chief Quits To Join Rice (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 5, 2007

John Negroponte's abrupt shift from being the first US director of national intelligence to number two at the State Department reflects continued troubles in the intelligence community and a further concentration of power around Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state.

DOJ_NMG_0112485

Analysts see the return of the career diplomat to the State Department as part of a broader and somewhat confused reshuffle of the Bush administration that began with the sacking of Donald Rumsfeld as defence secretary and has Iraq and the wider Middle East as its focus.

Mr Negroponte's expected replacement by a retired admiral, Mike McConnell, would also mean that key intelligence posts would all be filled by active or former military personnel – an issue of concern to civilians in the community.

Officials said President George W. Bush would announce the changes on Friday, possibly including his nomination of Zalmay Khalilzad, ambassador to Baghdad, as the new US envoy to the UN.

There was also speculation on Thursday night that Ryan Crocker, US ambassador to Pakistan, would replace Mr Khalilzad in Baghdad, and that David Petraeus would replace George Casey, the senior US general in Iraq. Gen Petraeus's appointment would be taken as a signal that the US military could change course in Iraq to emphasise a "hearts and minds" approach, designed to isolate the insurgents and reduce support for sectarian groups.

According to leaks put out by [a news agency] and ABC on Thursday night, Mr Bush is also expected to replace John Abizaid with Admiral William Fallon as head of central command, which oversees the Iraq and Afghanistan wars.

With a week to go before Mr Bush is expected to announce his "new way forward in Iraq", the president spoke on Thursday for nearly two hours by video conference with Nouri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister.

Less than two years ago, Mr Negroponte was elevated to co-ordinate all 16 distinct spy agencies following the 9/11 commission probe into the intelligence failures surrounding al-Qaeda's attacks. However, former intelligence officials say that the overhaul only succeeded in creating another layer of bureaucracy with inadequate powers.

Paul Pillar, a former senior CIA analyst who has accused the Bush administration of ignoring the agency's findings before invading Iraq, said Mr Negroponte had been unfairly criticised by some in Congress and that he did not have enough control over the defence department's intelligence operations.

Reuel Gerecht, a former CIA officer and a critic of the agency, called the creation of the director of national intelligence (DNI) a "lame idea".

"It has only made an overstaffed intelligence establishment even fatter," he said.

Another former CIA operative who asked not to be named said Mr Negroponte had never wanted the job and had clashed with Mr Rumsfeld, who controlled more than 80 per cent of the intelligence budget. "Negroponte gave in," he said.

Tensions between the DNI and the Pentagon may ease with the replacement of Mr Rumsfeld by Robert Gates, a former CIA director who has said he wants to yield important Pentagon intelligence activities.

Mr Gates is expected to appoint Lt-Gen James Clapper, who had fallen out of favour with Mr Rumsfeld, as his top intelligence official.

Former intelligence officials said Mr Negroponte was tired of bureaucratic turf wars and wanted to return to his diplomatic career.

Mr McConnell, a former head of the National Security Agency, is tipped to leave his consulting job to replace Mr Negroponte.

Members of Congress expressed dismay at Mr Negroponte's early departure, concerned at the apparent disarray at the top of the intelligence apparatus.

Mr Negroponte, who was the first post-occupation ambassador to Iraq, brings his experience to the State Department at a time when Ms Rice is focused on shoring up Iraq's government while building alliances among Arab allies to contain Iran and moderate the Palestinian leadership.

At a press conference, Tony Snow, White House spokesman, rolled his eyes at a suggestion that Ms Rice, perhaps the closest in the cabinet to the president and now no longer challenged by Mr Rumsfeld, was set to move on.

Additional reporting by Edward Luce in Washington

Bush Is Expected To Shift U.S. Ambassador In Iraq To U.N. (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112486

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — President Bush intends to name Zalmay Khalilzad, the Afghan-born diplomat who has been ambassador to Iraq for the past 21 months, to be the new envoy to the United Nations, part of a diplomatic shakeup as Mr. Bush prepares to announce a new strategy for the war.

A senior administration official, who had been briefed on the decision but had to discuss it anonymously because the change had not been formally announced, confirmed Thursday that the president had decided to nominate Mr. Khalilzad to the United Nations post.

The official said Mr. Bush intended to name Ryan C. Crocker, the ambassador to Pakistan, to replace Mr. Khalilzad in Baghdad.

If confirmed by the Senate, the appointments would put seasoned, respected diplomats into two of the State Department's most challenging posts. Mr. Khalilzad would replace John R. Bolton, who served temporarily as United Nations ambassador but resigned late last year after concluding he could not win Senate confirmation.

Mr. Bush's decision to transfer Mr. Khalilzad, among the most visible Americans working in Iraq, would effectively accomplish two goals for the administration. As a Sunni Muslim, Mr. Khalilzad has been perceived by some Iraqi Shiites as not sympathetic enough to their views; removing him from Baghdad would help Mr. Bush make a fresh start there. And Mr. Khalilzad had told colleagues that he was ready to leave.

The change also would give the United States the strong voice it needs at the United Nations, particularly after the storm surrounding Mr. Bolton.

The senior administration official said the White House believed that Mr. Khalilzad, as a Muslim who had extensive experience overseas including a stint as ambassador to his native Afghanistan, would bring an important understanding of the Muslim world to his work at the United Nations.

Daniel P. Serwer, the executive director of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which recently issued a report recommending a new strategy for Iraq, said a Khalilzad nomination would send a message "that we are taking the U.N. seriously and sending somebody who has real weight with this administration, and who has served in our toughest post."

But Leon E. Panetta, a former chief of staff to President Bill Clinton who was one of five Democrats on the study group, said he feared removing Mr. Khalilzad from Baghdad would leave "a vacuum" there at a critical time.

"The problem we've had in Iraq is that the people who finally get to understand how that country works suddenly leave," Mr. Panetta said. "He's probably a pretty good appointment for the U.N., but you do have to be nervous about who is going to speak for us in Iraq."

But some in the administration have suggested that perhaps Mr. Khalilzad has been too prominent a figure in Iraq.

In a classified memorandum written Nov. 8 after visiting Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki in Baghdad, President Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, said that the president might urge Mr. Khalilzad, who goes by the nickname Zal, to take a lower profile as one way to buttress the Maliki government.

Under the heading "What we can do to help Maliki," Mr. Hadley ticked off a list of suggestions, among them: "Encourage Zal to move into the background and let Maliki take more credit for positive developments. (We want Maliki to exert his authority — and demonstrate to Iraqis that he is a strong leader — by taking action against extremists, not by pushing back on the United States and the Coalition.)"

Unlike the other changes to Mr. Bush's foreign policy team in the last 24 hours, which caught much of Washington off guard, the moves involving Mr. Khalilzad and Mr. Crocker have been the subject of speculation here for weeks, since Mr. Bolton resigned on Dec. 5.

By that time Mr. Khalilzad had already told colleagues that he was ready to for a change of assignment. ABC News first reported the decision about Mr. Khalilzad on its Web site on Thursday afternoon.

Educated in Beirut and the United States (he holds a doctorate from the University of Chicago), the blunt-spoken Mr. Khalilzad, 55, has been a prominent figure in American foreign policy circles since the Reagan administration, when he advised the State Department on the Iran-Iraq war and the Soviet war in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0112487

He later joined the administration of the first President Bush, where he earned a reputation as a hawk who called for the ouster of Saddam Hussein, advice that administration did not take. More recently, senior administration officials say, he was considered for the No. 2 State Department job that John D. Negroponte is expected to take.

Mr. Crocker, 57, has been a Foreign Service officer since 1971 and is among the State Department's most respected voices in the Middle East. He has been ambassador to Pakistan since 2004, and has served as ambassador to Syria, Kuwait and Lebanon.

Negroponte Moves To Job Considered Crucial At State Dept. (WP)

By Karen Deyoung And Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

John D. Negroponte's departure as the nation's first director of national intelligence comes as the two-year-old office and the broad, post-Sept. 11 reorganization that created it have yet to reach the goal of uniting the intelligence community under a single leader.

But Negroponte's move to become Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's deputy, and his replacement by retired Navy Adm. John M. McConnell, had little to do with any assessment of Negroponte's tenure or with the unfinished state of intelligence integration, a range of senior administration officials said.

Instead, it stemmed directly from the urgent need to fill a State Department job, vacant since early last summer, that was seen as crucial to implementing the new Iraq policy that President Bush plans to announce next week.

Negroponte will take charge of State's Iraq account as the administration begins a sharply uphill effort to turn around a failing war and persuade the new Democratic Congress to follow its lead. A career diplomat who served as Bush's ambassador at the United Nations and in Baghdad before becoming intelligence chief in April 2005, Negroponte will also have primary responsibility for policy toward China and Northeast Asia, especially the North Korean nuclear issue. Rice will focus on Iran, the Israeli-Palestinian peace process and other issues.

"This is a key job, a really important job," said one State Department official, who noted that other senior vacancies remain. "We've had a thin bench."

Rice broached the subject with Negroponte last summer, but the White House refused to consider his departure until a replacement had been arranged, one official said. As with several others who agreed to discuss the matter, he requested anonymity before the nominations, which must be confirmed by the Senate, are announced today.

By fall, several candidates for the intelligence position, including Gen. John P. Abizaid, head of the military's Central Command, had turned it down. Others considered as Rice's deputy -- among them NATO military chief Gen. James L. Jones -- were similarly uninterested. The White House decided to postpone consideration of the issue until after the November midterm elections.

McConnell had already turned down an offer to become Negroponte's intelligence deputy -- a job vacated last spring when Gen. Michael V. Hayden became CIA director. It was only over the Christmas holidays, when Bush and Vice President Cheney appealed to McConnell to leave his private-sector position as senior vice president of the consulting firm Booz Allen Hamilton to take the lead intelligence job, that a deal was struck. Bush telephoned Negroponte, on vacation in Florida, to revive Rice's request.

Word of Negroponte's replacement was met with some concern on Capitol Hill yesterday. Senate intelligence committee Chairman John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.) said he was "troubled by the timing" and that the committee was neither consulted nor apprised of the moves before they became public on Wednesday.

He praised Negroponte for building the director of national intelligence (DNI) office "from scratch," but said the creation of a truly integrated intelligence community needs to move faster.

Susan Collins (R-Maine), who as chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee shepherded the reform bill in 2004, said she is disappointed that Negroponte is leaving. She called it "a critical time in establishing the authority of the DNI, and he was making progress."

DOJ_NMG_0112488

Former House intelligence committee chairman Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.) said he is troubled that virtually all of the nation's senior intelligence positions will now be filled by military officers: McConnell, Hayden at the CIA, retired Vice Adm. John Scott Redd at the National Counterterrorism Center and retired Lt. Gen. James R. Clapper Jr., who has reportedly been chosen by Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates as undersecretary for intelligence.

"This is nothing against these people as individuals," Hoekstra said. But "when we crafted the intelligence reform bill, we put protections in there to make sure the military was represented. . . . We should have put language in there that protected civilian oversight. The administration clearly has a bias, almost a criterion, that to be in the intelligence community, you better have a military background. That's not what I envisioned, and I don't believe that's healthy."

Others pointed out that Hayden, who formerly served as Negroponte's DNI deputy, and Clapper, who retired in June after five years as director of the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency (NGA), had argued with former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld over the growth of Pentagon control over intelligence. Along with McConnell, the head of the National Security Agency during the Clinton administration, the three are recognized as military men who, in the past, have responded well to the needs of the president and civilian policymakers.

The still-vacant job of deputy DNI is likely to be filled with a civilian. One candidate is Thomas Fingar, one of Negroponte's first appointments as deputy director of national intelligence for analysis and now chairman of the National Intelligence Council.

As DNI, Negroponte has focused on building common information-sharing and tradecraft training rather than day-to-day analysis or operations, said John E. McLaughlin, the former deputy CIA director. Negroponte has been criticized by Congress for being too diplomatic with the intelligence community's 16 agencies, some of whose members have resisted relinquishing traditional roles and perquisites in the name of integration.

But McLaughlin said Negroponte had "exercised his own authority" in pushing through a fiscal 2008 budget request that wrested money from more powerful elements of the community -- particularly the Pentagon.

At the CIA, Hayden has reflected his own close association with Negroponte even as he has tried to boost low morale. In a speech to agency employees yesterday, Hayden released the agency's five-year "Strategic Intent," subtitled "One Agency, One Community."

Its emphasis, said former senior CIA official Paul Pillar, was on "the strongly felt need for greater coordination across different organizations," while "quelling any thought that this is an agency that is in a state of transition to something much less than it once was."

Negroponte To State? You Heard It Here First. (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte's selection as deputy secretary of state was not, despite his public demurrals, shocking news.

Loop Fans may recall that on Nov. 15, not long after we first heard the deal was struck -- the delay apparently was finding a replacement for Negroponte -- we noted that he "was said to be unhappy" as DNI and "itching to move to a diplomatic post," maybe something like "deputy secretary of state."

The reasons, we wrote, were obvious: "The diplo world is home, because he has served as ambassador to Honduras, Iraq, the Philippines and the United Nations. Also, being deputy to Secretary Condoleezza Rice wouldn't be so bad, because at heart she's a sharing person."

We hear she's thinking of handing him such fine portfolios as Northeast Asia -- where he can deal with the Chicoms and the lunatic North Koreans -- and Iraq. That's two-thirds of the Axis of Evil (A of E) all for himself.

Of course, in a C-SPAN interview aired Dec. 3, Negroponte, when asked about his plans, said, "In my own mind at least, I visualize staying . . . through the end of the administration." And he reiterated that in a Dec. 14 chat with Washington Post reporters and editors.

DOJ_NMG_0112489

But Negroponte is a guy who clearly can't hold a job. This would be his fourth since joining the administration just over five years ago. And the chatter has already begun that he may not be in this one too long before he moves up one level.The Lowest of the High: Former Veep

John Nance Garner famously said being vice president wasn't worth "a warm bucket of spit." (Apparently he didn't say "spit," but reporters cleaned up the language.) Well, imagine what being a former vice president is worth.

And there they were, the three living former veeps who never made it to the Oval Office, lingering after Gerald R. Ford's funeral at Washington National Cathedral. Former presidents Carter, Bush and Clinton and their wives had all been escorted out to their limousines and motorcades.

But Walter F. Mondale, Dan Quayle and Al Gore were left to cool their heels in a long line that didn't seem to move for 20 or 30 minutes, our colleague Peter Baker reports. Quayle was first to break under the pressure. Alone and unbothered by others, he broke out of the line, moved around the chairs and crept around the line to the front to try to see why it wasn't moving. Mondale and Gore showed a little more patience -- they and stood and waited behind a hundred or so people who have never been one heartbeat away from the presidency. They fidgeted and tried to make small talk.

Eventually they, too, couldn't take it and, with their wives, bolted out of line in search of an exit through which they could actually leave the building. (No truth to the speculation that the line wasn't moving because Bill Clinton planted himself outside the door to shake hands with everyone leaving.)Who Might KBR Intend to Fund?

'Twas the day after Christmas and Halliburton subsidiary KBR, the U.S. military's largest contractor in Iraq, was filing its forms with the Federal Election Commission to set up its new political action committee, KBRPAC.

So why was the company, which just agreed to pay the government $8 million to settle allegations of overbilling for work in the Balkans and which has a number of False Claims Act and congressional investigations pending, setting up its very own PAC? Most likely because it's spinning off from parent Halliburton and needs its own operation. Or it could be because of two words: Henry Waxman.Osama's Not Dead; He's Resting

And now, the Monty Python Dead Parrot Award for 2006. It's always best to wait till the very end of the year before declaring the winner of this prestigious spinmeister award -- given in honor of the iconic scene in which Michael Palin, as a pet-shop owner, insists that the obviously dead parrot he just sold John Cleese's character is merely napping.

And, sure enough, the winning entry came in on Dec. 28, when CNN's Ed Henry interviewed White House homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend.

Henry pressed her to admit that the administration's failure to kill or capture Osama bin Laden in the past five years was, well, a failure. She wouldn't.

"Well, I'm not sure," Townsend said. "It's a success that hasn't occurred yet. I don't know that I view that as a failure."Britain, Finally in the Black

A happy new year to the Brits, who began 2007 debt-free for the first time since World War II. The British, according to wire services, transferred $84 million to the U.S. Treasury, the final installment in repayment of a $4.34 billion loan made in 1945 so they could stave off bankruptcy after having spent almost all their resources fighting Nazi Germany.

The loan, the equivalent of $232 billion in today's money, according to Bloomberg News, was double the size of Britain's economy at the time.Castro's Down but Not Out

Meanwhile, Cuban dictator Fidel Castro sent a New Year's Eve message to the media to mark his 48 years in power. "Regarding my recovery," he said in the note read on state television, "I have always warned that it could be a prolonged process, but it is far from being a lost battle."

Castro, according to the Associated Press, "said he was still 'in the loop' when it came to matters of state."

Speculation Surrounds Choice By Spy Chief To Take Step Back (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — From the start, John D. Negroponte felt miscast as the nation's first director of national intelligence, a diplomat who never seemed comfortable in spook's clothing, colleagues and friends of his said.

DOJ_NMG_0112490

Even at age 67, Mr. Negroponte longed to be back in the thick of policymaking, they said. But he knew it was the one role he was barred from playing as long as he remained the nation's top intelligence chief, whose role is to step into the Oval Office each morning as a neutral, impartial adviser on the threats lurking around the globe.

It was because of this, officials said, that he agreed to do something generally unheard of in a city obsessed with the bureaucratic totem pole: trade a cabinet-level job for a subcabinet post as deputy secretary of state, a job that essentially requires him to handle tasks that Condoleezza Rice would rather not deal with.

Mr. Negroponte leaves his office at Bolling Air Force Base after only 19 months and with mixed reviews. The base is the home of a new intelligence bureaucracy created to solve the problems laid bare after the Sept. 11 attacks, but Mr. Negroponte barely had time to get it running. All over Washington on Thursday, there were questions about whether Mr. Negroponte was there long enough to lay the foundations of real change and whether his transfer suggested that the Bush administration was less committed than it claimed to be to an intelligence overhaul that President Bush had billed as the most significant restructuring of American spy agencies in half a century.

Senior administration officials said it was Mr. Bush who personally asked Mr. Negroponte to take on the diplomatic post sometime last month. It was the second time in two years that Mr. Bush had turned to Mr. Negroponte to fill a critical job: Mr. Negroponte became the director of national intelligence only after several other candidates had turned down the job. This time around, Ms. Rice had requested over the summer that Mr. Negroponte become her deputy. But the decision languished for months as the White House sought an adequate replacement for the spy chief, and as Mr. Negroponte vacillated between remaining at the helm of an intelligence community that numbered roughly 100,000 people and a return to the State Department, in the shadow of the administration's most visible international figure.

Senior administration officials said that Ms. Rice wanted Mr. Negroponte to focus on China and North Korea, which have been among his focuses in the intelligence post, and on Iraq, a country he knows particularly well.

Mr. Negroponte has also served as ambassador to the United Nations, Mexico, the Philippines and Honduras, in a Foreign Service career that spanned more than three decades. A senior administration official who was involved in discussions about his nomination said that Ms. Rice regarded him as a foreign policy moderate who could help fill the big voids left by the departure of Robert B. Zoellick, who stepped down as deputy secretary last summer, and Philip D. Zelikow, who left the job of State Department counselor last month.

Ms. Rice would continue to play a central role in Iraq policy, the official said, but she has also made it clear that she wants to devote more time to a broader diplomatic initiative aimed at Middle East peace.

Mr. Bush is expected to nominate Mike McConnell, a retired vice admiral and former chief of the National Security Agency, to be Mr. Negroponte's successor.

John E. McLaughlin, a former director of central intelligence who is a friend of Mr. Negroponte, said that he managed to make the transition from career Foreign Service officer to the intelligence arena with little difficulty, but that Mr. Negroponte was now returning to the world where he felt most at ease.

Mr. McLaughlin said he believed that Mr. Negroponte's familiarity with the latest intelligence from Iraq would help to bring a "realistic" view of the situation there as the administration works to develop a new strategy.

But other intelligence experts expressed concern about what Mr. Negroponte's departure might mean to the office he helped to establish. "My major concern about this appointment is not about the State Department, but what happens at the D.N.I. office," said Lee H. Hamilton, who served as co-chairman of both the 9/11 commission and the Iraq Study Group. "The future of that office and the concept of intelligence-sharing is on the line."

Top Congressional officials responded angrily to the news of Mr. Negroponte's departure.

"I think he walked off the job, and I don't like it," said Senator John D. Rockefeller IV of West Virginia, the new chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee.

Just as Mr. Negroponte is leaving his post, his office is finishing a major National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq's chances of surviving as a unified, independent country — a review that was commissioned only after a Congressional request over the summer, on a problem that Mr. Negroponte will have to help manage in his new post.

DOJ_NMG_0112491

"He came into it after just a year in Iraq, and someone without a strong background in intelligence, and I think he is leaving awfully early, given the importance of getting this right," said Robert Hutchings, the senior diplomat in residence at the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs at Princeton, who once headed the National Intelligence Council.

"I think it is quite irresponsible," he said.

Mr. Hutchings said the departure would compound "three or four years of nonstop turmoil" within American intelligence agencies.

Bush administration officials noted several successes during Mr. Negroponte's tenure, most significant the creation and progress of the National Counterterrorism Center. Terrorism experts have credited the center with fusing information from across the intelligence community to understand better the global terrorism threat.

But as he assembled a staff of more than 1,500 people, he was criticized for simply adding another layer to a bureaucracy he was assigned to streamline. But some intelligence experts said that the criticism was unfair, and that the real blame rested with Congress for passing convoluted legislation that made bureaucratic bloat at the director of national intelligence office inevitable. Some critics say that the job of spy czar was never necessary to begin with. Some of those whom the White House first approached to take the job nearly two years ago — including Robert M. Gates, the newly installed secretary of defense — were deeply skeptical about whether that structure would work.

The White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said that President Bush was "very impressed" with the job Mr. Negroponte had done.

One of the greatest difficulties of Mr. Negroponte's position has been trying to wrest control over multibillion dollar spy satellites and other gadgetry from the Pentagon, which historically had been in charge of 80 percent of the nation's intelligence budget.

One of the top priorities of the former defense secretary, Donald H. Rumsfeld, was to expand the Pentagon's role in intelligence gathering, and some members of Congress say that Mr. Negroponte was not aggressive enough in bringing the Pentagon's intelligence budget more under his control.

Some intelligence experts believe that Mr. Gates is likely to be less territorial than Mr. Rumsfeld was about the Pentagon's intelligence functions, and may even be eager to cede some of the Pentagon's authority to the new intelligence chief. Others said that the job of corralling 16 sometimes dysfunctional intelligence agencies is an often thankless task, and one where it is difficult to have a noticeable impact. Mr. Negroponte is said by associates to have grown particularly weary of clashes with members of Congress.

"I think it's pretty telling that both Bob Gates and John Negroponte prefer jobs trying to bail us out of Iraq to the job of trying to fix U.S. intelligence," said Amy Zegart, a professor at the University of California at Los Angeles and an expert in intelligence overhaul.

Negroponte Shift Is Ruffling Feathers (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — The abrupt departure of John D. Negroponte as the nation's spy chief prompted angry responses from Capitol Hill and triggered new debate Thursday over whether a position created to fix the nation's intelligence problems is itself fundamentally flawed.

President Bush is expected to announce today that Negroponte will become the top deputy at the State Department. Bush also is set to nominate retired Navy Vice Adm. J. Michael McConnell to be the next director of national intelligence.

The shuffle comes 18 months into Negroponte's tenure at the job. And though he has received mixed reviews for his reform efforts, lawmakers and senior intelligence officials said the switch was a significant setback for the office, which oversees the 16 U.S. intelligence agencies, including the CIA.

"I'm very concerned that taking out the top guy at a critical juncture is going to cause some backsliding," said Rep. Jane Harman of Venice, who was the senior Democrat on the Intelligence Committee when Congress passed the legislation creating the post of director of national intelligence. "It's a very steep learning curve. And any new person will have to play catch-up."

Negroponte's departure is the second major exit from the office of the directorate in a matter of months. His top deputy, Air Force Gen. Michael V. Hayden, left in the spring to become CIA director. When Negroponte and Hayden were nominated for the intelligence posts in 2005, they were described as a team whose skills and expertise were indispensable to the success of establishing the new agency and enacting sweeping intelligence changes passed in 2004 by Congress.

"I'm disappointed that both he and Hayden have left," said Lee H. Hamilton, a member of the Sept. 11 commission, which designated the creation of a intelligence director one of its principal recommendations.

"I think we are beginning to see better sharing of information in the intelligence community, and I also think it's a work in progress and an awful lot needs to be done," Hamilton said. "It is therefore a little unsettling to me that your two top leaders move out of the DNI office within a matter of months." The deputy job held by Hayden remains unfilled.

In another of a series of moves among top foreign policy posts, officials said Bush was likely to nominate Zalmay Khalilzad, U.S. ambassador to Iraq, as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations. Khalilzad would replace John R. Bolton, who resigned last month after serving 16 months as a Bush appointee but not winning Senate confirmation to remain in the job.

The U.N. move could be logical for Khalilzad, who has been ambassador to Iraq since June 2005. Bush is expected to announce a new plan for Iraq. Khalilzad has faced increasing tension with the Shiite leadership of the government, which has sometimes complained that he has gone too far in pushing for the interests of the country's Sunni minority.

Negroponte's departure as national intelligence director has been rumored for weeks, and officials close to him have said that the career diplomat is eager to return to the State Department, particularly in such a senior role. Negroponte is expected to play a leading role in revamping the State Department's Iraq policy by putting more pressure on the fledgling government there and enlisting more help from regional allies.

Intelligence veterans said it was clear that Negroponte had been chafing under the limitations of his position as intelligence chief. Though the job was created to coordinate the activities of the nation's spy agencies and improve communication among them, it lacks complete authority over those agencies' operations, personnel and budgets.

"He's in charge of everything and in charge of nothing," said Richard J. Kerr, a former CIA deputy director. "He has a whole bunch of independent organizations he's trying to get to work together — a lot by persuasion and some by coercion."

Kerr said that was partly why others, including new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, had previously spurned the position.

Negroponte was credited with improving the flow of information among spy agencies, and with winning several budget showdowns with the Pentagon over spending on spy satellites and other classified programs.

New Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.) said Negroponte was essentially walking out on an unfinished job. "I am deeply troubled by the timing of this announcement and the void of leadership at the top of our intelligence community," said Rockefeller, who announced hearings this month focusing partly on intelligence reform.

Negroponte was criticized by members of the Sept. 11 commission, among others, for creating a new intelligence bureaucracy, with about 1,500 employees in the national intelligence office.

The Bush administration's plan to replace Negroponte with a retired naval officer prompted concern among some lawmakers that the intelligence community would be dominated by the military. McConnell was the military's top intelligence officer during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, and subsequently became National Security Agency director.

The top jobs at the CIA and NSA, as well as other agencies, are held by military officers.

"If it's McConnell [for director of national intelligence], it's one more uniform," Rep. Harman said, adding that it raised "at least a question mark about the military takeover of our intelligence organizations."

Kerr, the former CIA deputy director, voiced similar concerns, saying that civilian leadership of intelligence organizations was particularly important now because of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. "The military can get themselves so committed to the mission that their objectivity at times can be less than it should be," he said.

Negroponte To Shift To No. 2 Diplomat (WT)

By Bill Gertz And David R. Sands

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112493

In a day of shake-ups for the Bush administration yesterday, President Bush lost his chief counsel and signaled he will shift the top intelligence official to become the No. 2 diplomat at the State Department, and will tap a former admiral to take his place as head of the intelligence community.

Meanwhile, several press reports say Mr. Bush has decided to move the U.S. ambassador to Iraq to become the ambassador to the United Nations, and has chosen a new military leader to lead U.S. forces in the war on terrorism.

The changes come as he is working on a new strategy for Iraq, which Mr. Bush said he will announce next week.

Mr. Bush today will tap John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence (DNI), to become Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's deputy, and will nominate retired Navy Vice Adm. Mike McConnell to fill his intelligence post, according to a senior administration official.

"What you've got are two guys of undisputed quality," the official told reporters.

Both positions require Senate confirmation, and the official predicted easy confirmation. Mr. Negroponte was confirmed 98-2 by the Senate for the intelligence post in 2005, and the official said Adm. McConnell will impress senators when he meets them.

But senators said they were disappointed Mr. Negroponte was leaving the position he has held since it was created just two years ago, saying he has made strides but there is a lot more work to be done.

Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, West Virginia Democrat and chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, said the vacancy is all the more troubling because the intelligence deputy's slot has been vacant since May. He said he will try to make sure a replacement is confirmed before Mr. Negroponte departs for the diplomatic post.

Officials said the move to the State Department would suit Mr. Negroponte, a career Foreign Service officer.

At the State Department, spokesman Sean McCormack described Mr. Negroponte as a "diplomat's diplomat" with all the qualifications required to fill the department's second-most-powerful post.

His appointment would fill the vacancy created when former Deputy Secretary Robert B. Zoellick left in July for a job on Wall Street.

Adm. McConnell would bring intelligence experience to the DNI post, having headed the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996.

He is a well-regarded career military intelligence specialist but also someone who is not expected to initiate or oversee major reforms, current and former intelligence officials said.

"If you give him a problem, he can fix it," said one former senior intelligence official who supports Adm. McConnell. "But he's not going to make major reforms that are needed."

Mr. Negroponte was the first DNI under reforms that grew out of the September 11 intelligence failures, and critics of the new office say it created a new layer of bureaucracy in an overly bureaucratic intelligence system.

Meanwhile, both [a] news agency and ABC News reported that Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, will be nominated as the next ambassador to the United Nations, and ABC reported Mr. Bush has chosen Adm. William J. Fallon to replace Gen. John Abizaid as the head of U.S. Central Command, which is in charge of U.S. military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In the change that hits closest to Mr. Bush, Harriet E. Miers, the White House's chief counsel who conservatives blocked from becoming a Supreme Court justice in 2005, announced she is resigning her position in the administration.

Miss Miers, 61, had followed Mr. Bush from Texas, where she was his personal lawyer and counsel to his campaign, to the White House. There, she was staff secretary and deputy chief of staff before becoming chief counsel two years ago.

"She's been here for six years. It's hard duty," White House press secretary Tony Snow said in announcing her departure, which is effective Jan. 31.

Bush To Nominate Khalilzad For U.N. Job (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112494

Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, will be nominated by President Bush to become the U.S. envoy to the United Nations, a senior administration official said Thursday.

Khalilzad, who is Afghan born, has served also as ambassador to Afghanistan. He is likely to be replaced in Baghdad by Ryan Crocker, a veteran American diplomat, said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to make an announcement for the White House.

Khalilzad would replace John Bolton, whose appointment to the U.N. job expired recently.

The changes come as Bush is expected to announce a new U.S. policy in the Iraq war next week.

He is also shuffling other pieces of his national security team. He is preparing to announce that John Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, will become the No. 2 official at the State Department and will be replaced by retired Vice Adm. Michael McConnell.

The appointments must approved by the Senate.

Bush was unable to drive Bolton's confirmation through the Senate, which under Republican control approved Khalilzad for his current job. Bolton's style is more acerbic than Khalilzad's.

Khalilzad, an unusually outspoken diplomat known as a protege of Vice President Dick Cheney, would take the U.N. seat at a time when the world body is in the spotlight in confrontations with Iran, North Korea and in the Middle East.

Khalilzad's move from Iraq to the U.N. has been rumored for months, along with the expectation that Crocker, now ambassador to Pakistan, would succeed him in Baghdad. ABC News first reported Thursday that Bush had made the decision.

The U.S. official said some minor details still must be worked out on Crocker, but they are considered manageable.

Crocker was a senior U.S. representative in Baghdad for several months in 2003, shortly after the U.S. invasion that toppled President Saddam Hussein.

A White House favorite whom Bush calls by his nickname, "Zal," Khalilzad has worked in two other Republican administrations, those of Ronald Reagan and Bush's father, George H.W. Bush.

The highest-ranked Muslim to serve in the Bush administration, Khalilzad headed the Bush-Cheney transition team for the Defense Department in 2000 and served as a counselor to former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Mr. Negroponte's Newest Job (NYT)

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

The No. 2 job in the State Department is technically a step down from John Negroponte's present post of director of national intelligence. But the reported return to the foreign policy fold of this former ambassador to Baghdad, and, before that, to the United Nations, has a certain logic to it.

The diplomacy-challenged Bush administration could surely use the help. We hope that Mr. Negroponte can provide Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice with the intellectual and bureaucratic reinforcement she so desperately needs to help guide the administration to a wiser course on Iraq.

Mr. Negroponte certainly has experience. In a 40-plus year career — including an early stint as a political officer in Vietnam — he has also served as ambassador to Honduras (during Ronald Reagan's contra war), Mexico and the Philippines. He is known as a canny, and sometimes ruthless, bureaucratic player. What he doesn't have, unfortunately, is much of a reputation for challenging the unwise policy presumptions of his bosses.

In his 10 months in Baghdad from mid-2004 to mid-2005, Mr. Negroponte undoubtedly saw the yawning gap between Iraq's grim reality and the delusional claims of success issuing from Washington. While President Bush and other top officials trumpeted effective military training programs, a flowering Iraqi democracy and an insurgency ever on its last legs, anyone on the ground had to see paper Iraqi battalions, the rise of sectarian militias and ever-expanding chaos.

If Mr. Negroponte made a serious effort to jolt his bosses back to the real world, there is no public record of it. That will have to change if he is to have any chance of improving things. Before confirming him, the Senate should make sure he understands that asking hard and unwelcome questions is an essential part of the job.

DOJ_NMG_0112495

Mr. Negroponte's switch will mean another wrenching shift in the top ranks of America's deeply troubled intelligence agencies. One of the main problems that the national intelligence director's job was created to solve was the destructive rivalries between intelligence agencies run by the Defense Department and their civilian counterparts.

That infighting reached a crescendo during the reign of Donald Rumsfeld at the Pentagon. Mr. Rumsfeld's replacement, Robert Gates, a former director of central intelligence, will have the credibility — and we hope the will — to calm those rivalries and improve interagency coordination. Even then, Mr. Bush must quickly find a credible replacement for Mr. Negroponte, preferably one who is willing to jolt his bosses with the truth. This administration's record of failures in Iraq is matched only by its failures on intelligence.

A Small Change (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

NEVER MIND THE new faces on Capitol Hill, where Congress has changed hands for the first time in 12 years. The real action is at the White House, in Foggy Bottom and across the river at the Pentagon, where the Bush administration's game of musical chairs seems to be over for now. For all the new jobs, however, there are precious few new faces, and anyone expecting new policies is bound to be disappointed.

It has been a busy few weeks. Today, President Bush is expected to name John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, as deputy secretary of State. Replacing Negroponte will be retired Vice Adm. J. Michael McConnell, a 25-year intelligence veteran. Meanwhile, over at the Pentagon, Robert M. Gates has just started using his new "Secretary of Defense" stationery. Gates is a former director of the CIA, where the current chief, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, was Negroponte's deputy until May.

What does it all mean? First, lest anyone doubted it, Vice President Dick Cheney remains a force to be reckoned with. There is no reason to believe these changes in personnel presage a major change in policy, which by all accounts Cheney opposes. In each case, the administration has turned to trusted men who pass muster with Cheney.

Which is not to say they are unqualified. Negroponte, 67, should be a superb replacement for Robert B. Zoellick, who left for Goldman Sachs in July. On paper, Negroponte's move — from being the nation's top spy to being Rice's No. 2 — is a demotion. He reportedly had turned the deputy's job down once before, and accepted it this time only after being asked by the president.

His acceptance of the job may be more a reflection of the problems of his previous position than the promise of his new one. The director of national intelligence, a position created by Congress after 9/11 to oversee the nation's 16 spy agencies, has responsibility but very little authority — almost three-quarters of the nation's intelligence budget is controlled by the Pentagon. If the administration wants the director of national intelligence to have any influence, it might want to consider giving him more power.

The more interesting question, however, is why Bush, acting through Cheney (or is it the other way around?), wanted Negroponte at State. Word inside and outside the State Department for months has been that Rice has been unable to fill top jobs because her choices have either declined to sign up for a stint likely to be best remembered for the debacle in Iraq or have been vetoed as too liberal by the White House.

Negroponte, who has served as ambassador to Iraq and the United Nations, reportedly was the only person acceptable to both Rice and Cheney. That he already had a job was apparently just another detail to be worked out by the apparatchiks in the White House — and the Old Executive Office Building.

Bush To Name Retired Admiral As Top Spy (AP)

By Katherine Shrader, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 5, 2007

President Bush has chosen a 25-year intelligence veteran, retired Vice Adm. Mike McConnell, to be the country's second national intelligence director as he reshapes national security strategy with two years left in his presidency.

The current director, career diplomat John Negroponte, will move into the long-vacant job as top deputy to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

DOJ_NMG_0112496

The nominations were expected to be announced Friday by Bush, said a senior administration official who spoke on condition of anonymity because the decision was not yet public.

The moves come as the White House considers a new direction in Iraq, where a quick invasion has devolved into a bloody civil conflict.

Part of the revised course appears to be an overhaul of Bush's intelligence and national security team. In addition to Negroponte's shift, Defense Secretary Robert Gates took over the Pentagon last month and is expected to bring in retired Lt. Gen. James Clapper as his undersecretary for intelligence.

Bush will nominate the current ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, to be the U.S. envoy to the United Nations, said another senior administration official, who also spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to make an announcement for the White House.

Bush said Thursday he will make a speech next week announcing his decisions about how to move ahead in the nearly four-year-old war.

The administration denied Negroponte's move was a demotion. The senior administration official said Bush reached out to Negroponte to fill the opening for deputy secretary of state, vacant since July. Bush also talked with McConnell about becoming intelligence chief, who oversees and coordinates the 16 U.S. spy agencies.

McConnell spent more than a quarter-century as an intelligence operations and security officer. He caught the attention of then-Defense Secretary Dick Cheney and then-Joint Chiefs Chairman Colin Powell during the first Persian Gulf War. McConnell regularly briefed them as an intelligence officer for the chairman of the Joint Chiefs and is known as someone who can distill complicated information into coherent presentations, said Matthew Aid, a historian who studies the National Security Agency.

McConnell was tapped to lead U.S. eavesdropping efforts as director of the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996. Aid suggested McConnell's record there was mixed. McConnell allowed Congress and the White House to cut NSA money after the Cold War, when Aid said the government should have ramped up for challenges posed by cell phones, the Internet and fiber optic cable.

Yet on McConnell's watch, the agency became central to providing intelligence on the war in Bosnia, shipments of weapons-grade technology to Iraq and other tough issues of that era.

McConnell left the government and has worked for Booz Allen Hamilton, a government contractor and consulting firm, for about a decade.

Negroponte has been a diplomat in spy's clothing since he became the nation's first intelligence chief in April 2005. He is more comfortable in ambassadorial circles than the cloak-and-dagger world.

As Rice's deputy, he no longer would have first chair for a major government department or oversight of a $40 billion budget. But associates said the job of creating a new organization from scratch has had plenty of frustrations, from securing office space to planning foreign travel.

Negroponte also may hold out hope that Rice will leave before the end of the Bush administration in early 2009, giving him a chance to retire as secretary of state. Deputy Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger got such a promotion in late 1992, when Bush's father asked chief diplomat James A. Baker III to head his unsuccessful re-election campaign.

Negroponte has been at the center of the current president's Iraq strategy. He was the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations when Secretary of State Powell made his now-infamous, error-filled presentation in arguing for the invasion of Iraq. Negroponte became the U.S. ambassador to Iraq in June 2004 and was there for the January 2005 elections that Sunni Muslims boycotted.

Soon after, the White House asked him to take the intelligence job after others said no because Congress did not give the position enough power: Congress created the position in response to the recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission.

Some doubted the wisdom of creating such a post, worried it would only further weigh down the bureaucracy. Negroponte leaves as the success or failure of that endeavor remains an open question.

Observers say Negroponte considered his role as intelligence briefer of the president to be a leading aspect of his job, and he left details of managerial overhaul to his deputies.

McConnell, who initiated an internal overhaul of the structures at the NSA, is likely to get more into those details.

DOJ_NMG_0112497

U.S. Circuit Court Judge Richard Posner, who has written a book evaluating intelligence reform, said the national intelligence director should not be expected to be the president's expert on issues from Iran to North Korea. "You need one person to be the manager. That is what I think McConnell has a good background for," he said.

Senate Intelligence Chairman Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va., whose panel must approve McConnell's nomination, said he was troubled by the timing of Negroponte's departure because it leaves a void while his organization is in its infancy. He noted that Negroponte has been operating with only an acting deputy since Gen. Michael Hayden left in May to become CIA director.

Rockefeller and the committee's top Republican, Sen. Kit Bond of Missouri, said an intelligence chief must be in place before Negroponte leaves. "A premature departure creates an unneeded vacuum within the DNI office at a critical time," Bond said.

Pentagon Link To Spy Chief Pick Arouses Concern (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon And Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The nomination of a retired Navy admiral as the nation's chief spymaster stirred concerns about the expanding control of current and retired Pentagon officials over the U.S. intelligence community.

President Bush is expected to announce today the nomination of J. Michael McConnell as director of national intelligence, succeeding John Negroponte, who is moving to the No. 2 spot at the State Department. The White House also will nominate Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, as United Nations ambassador, buttressing President Bush's foreign-policy team ahead of an expected change in Iraq-war strategy. The nominees will have to be confirmed by the Senate.

Adm. McConnell's nomination will place current and retired military officials in charge of all of Washington's principal spy branches, including the Central Intelligence Agency, the National Security Agency and the Defense Intelligence Agency. The Pentagon controls 80% of the government's estimated $42 billion intelligence budget. Additionally, the U.S.'s overseas operations against al Qaeda and other international terrorist groups have resulted in the creation of the Defense Department's own intelligence czar and the deployment of military-intelligence assets in a number of global theaters.

WASHINGTON WIRE

1

See the expanded online version of Washington Wire2. The Journal's Washington bureau updates the Wire during the day -- every weekday -- with analysis, news and buzz from inside and outside the Beltway.

Striking a Balance

Adm. McConnell's greatest challenge as director of national intelligence, say members of the intelligence community, will be to try to claim control of these Pentagon intelligence assets while striking a balance between the development of tactical and strategic intelligence.

Legislators and retired spies worry Adm. McConnell's career as a military-intelligence official could hold him hostage to the Pentagon's culture and mission. Among the lessons from the Iraq war, these officials say, was that the Bush administration underappreciated the strategic impact of removing Saddam Hussein and how countries like Iran and Syria might benefit.

"With so many military guys involved, you run the risk of the intelligence agencies giving the consumers what they want to hear," said Larry Johnson, who served as a senior counterterrorism official at both the State Department and CIA. "The result could be a focus on supporting wars, rather than longer-term analysis."

Adm. McConnell, 63 years old, serves as a senior vice president at Booz Allen Hamilton Inc., focusing on the consulting firm's Pentagon accounts. A call to his office for comment wasn't returned.

Adm. McConnell served as the NSA's director from 1992 to 1996 and worked as the chief intelligence adviser to then-Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Colin Powell during the first Gulf War. While picked to head the country's main eavesdropping agency by President Bush, Adm. McConnell was well-liked within the Clinton administration, say those he worked with, and isn't seen as a partisan player.

A Coordinated Effort

DOJ_NMG_0112498

Mr. Negroponte's nearly two-year tenure as the first DNI was marked by a workmanlike approach toward integrating the U.S.'s 16 intelligence agencies under one command, say officials who worked with him. A chief task was to improve information sharing among these disparate agencies, particularly the CIA and Federal Bureau of Investigation. His office also pushed to develop more-nuanced and better-integrated intelligence assessments.

The success of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks is widely attributed to the U.S. government's failure to connect the dots among various pieces of intelligence. An independent commission studying the Iraq war also criticized American spy agencies for tailoring intelligence assessments to underpin already-developed policy objectives.

In trying to streamline the intelligence-development process, Mr. Negroponte created a "Magnificent Seven" grouping of agencies that now form the heart of America's spy work. Members said they have detected better coordination among agencies as a result.

Nominee Played Big Role In Outsourcing Intelligence (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Richard Willing

USA Today, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — J. Michael "Mike" McConnell, in line to become the nation's top intelligence official, has been a leading figure in outsourcing U.S intelligence operations to private industry, records and interviews show.

McConnell, a retired Navy vice admiral, led the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996 before joining Booz Allen Hamilton Inc., a consulting firm based in McLean, Va.

White House officials confirmed McConnell's appointment to replace National Intelligence Director John Negroponte but declined to be identified by name because the nomination has not been formally announced.

McConnell's nomination and confirmation by the Senate would come amid two current trends in intelligence gathering: the emphasis on technology, and the heightened role of private contractors in analyzing data and preparing reports that once might have been written by government intelligence officers.

"The mission has expanded, the money is there, and there just aren't enough (intelligence officers) to do the job without outside help," says Stephen Marrin, a former CIA analyst who teaches intelligence studies at Mercyhurst College in Erie, Pa.

It is unclear how many private contractors are employed by the CIA and other intelligence agencies. Budgets and hiring figures are classified.

Last year, Negroponte started an audit of the number of private contractors used by all 16 intelligence agencies. That count was started because of concerns about how outsourcing affected intelligence, and it is continuing, says Chad Kolton, a spokesman for the Office of the Director of National Intelligence.

The CIA also began a study last September to determine whether contractors were hurting the agency's work by luring away CIA officers with higher salaries. The CIA did not return a call Thursday seeking an update on that study.

Booz Allen is a "huge" supplier of intelligence contracting, Kolton said. Contract details are classified.

Ralph Shrader, Booz Allen Hamilton's chairman and CEO, says McConnell's experience as NSA director and a private contractor make him a good choice. McConnell "will work very hard to do the right thing," Shrader says.

"He's someone who can solicit lots of opinions, collect them all up, and produce something that takes the needs of the entire country into consideration," Shrader says. "He's very hands-on."

Booz Allen has received at least $50 million in Pentagon contracts since November 2005, records show. Some involve remnants of the Pentagon's "Total Information Awareness" program. Congress killed the program in 2003 amid concerns it would invade the privacy of ordinary Americans.

The $63 million contract signed with Booz Allen in 2002 called for the firm to develop a single system to collect and search through huge databases of government, personal and business records for signs of terrorist activities. McConnell signed that contract on Booz Allen's behalf.

Work on that contract has continued, according to federal contracting records, which show the Pentagon paid Booz Allen about $2 million under that contract during 2006, most recently on Sept. 26.

DOJ_NMG_0112499

Spokesmen for the White House, Pentagon, Booz Allen and Negroponte's office all have declined to comment on the contract.

Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, says he will question McConnell about the program and intelligence contracting.

"It's a critical concern," says Wyden, who led the efforts to kill TIA in 2002.

John Michael McConnell, A Member Of The Club (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — In choosing Mike McConnell to be director of national intelligence, President Bush is turning again to a steady intelligence professional who first achieved prominence during his father's administration.

Like Gen. Michael V. Hayden, the Central Intelligence Agency director, Mr. McConnell, 63, a retired vice admiral, has served as director of the National Security Agency, the eavesdropping giant. Like Robert M. Gates, the new defense secretary and former C.I.A. director, Mr. McConnell first operated in the highest circles of government in the tumultuous time that included the Persian Gulf war of 1991 and the fall of the Soviet Union.

"It's a gathering of the clan," said retired Adm. Bobby R. Inman, himself a former director of the National Security Agency and an early promoter of Mr. McConnell's intelligence career. "You're getting strong professionals in all these top jobs. They'll set out to solve problems, and they won't be motivated by turf or politics."

William P. Crowell, who worked as Mr. McConnell's deputy at the N.S.A., called him a "consummate professional" who managed the agency with great care at a difficult time of severe post-cold-war budget cuts. Ronald D. Lee, who worked as the security agency's general counsel under Mr. McConnell, called him "an exceptionally gifted leader who was completely devoted to the rule of law and the Constitution."

But W. Patrick Lang, a former Defense Intelligence Agency official who has been highly critical of the Bush administration, took a more skeptical view. He called Mr. McConnell, who made his career in naval intelligence, "competent but compliant" and expressed concern that he might not stand up to policy makers, particularly on highly charged issues like Iran's nuclear program.

For the last 10 years, Mr. McConnell, a courtly, soft-spoken South Carolina native, has been out of government, working for Booz Allen Hamilton, the consulting company. But much of his work has been for government agencies on intelligence and information security, and he has often written and spoken about the organization and future of spying.

Colleagues say he was first approached several months ago about the possibility of replacing General Hayden as deputy to John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence. He turned down that job and was eventually invited to succeed Mr. Negroponte in the top job.

Mr. McConnell first came to public attention as the top intelligence officer to Gen. Colin L. Powell, then chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, during the 1991 war. He conducted daily briefings not only for General Powell but for the defense secretary, Dick Cheney, now the vice president. He had contact with Mr. Gates, Mr. Hayden and Condoleezza Rice, now secretary of state, all of whom worked on the National Security Council in the administration of Mr. Bush's father.

"He was measured, methodical and detailed," Bill Smullen, then an aide to General Powell, said of Mr. McConnell's war briefings. "Secretary Cheney saw Mike McConnell in action on a daily basis."

Mr. McConnell became a familiar figure on television during the gulf war, explaining troop movements and airstrikes. But on becoming director of the security agency in 1992 he retreated behind its traditional curtain of secrecy.

Matthew M. Aid, a historian of the agency, said that during his four-year tenure, the agency's monitoring did not keep up with the revolutionary technological changes in communications, including the Internet, cellphones and fiber-optic cable. But he said Mr. McConnell had been handicapped by a steadily declining budget and work force.

"He begged and borrowed and took money from research and development to pay for operations," achieving considerable success in tracking the warring parties during the war in Bosnia, Mr. Aid said.

DOJ_NMG_0112500

John Michael McConnell was born on July 26, 1943, in Greenville, S.C., where his father worked in the shipping business and his mother in the garment industry. He graduated from Furman University and was commissioned as a line officer of the Navy in 1967. He served a tour in Vietnam and then became an intelligence officer.

He is married to Terry McConnell, a homemaker, and has two children and two stepchildren, all grown.

Former colleagues invariably remark on his quiet and courteous manner and say he rarely shows a temper. On Thursday some wondered whether that was the right temperament for a job created to force 16 competing and sometimes feuding agencies to cooperate and share information.

But Mark M. Lowenthal, who served as staff director for the House Intelligence Committee when Mr. McConnell ran the National Security Agency, said he was not concerned about that.

"His quiet manner and his lovely South Carolina accent belie it, but I have no doubt he can be forceful when necessary," Mr. Lowenthal said. He noted that Mr. McConnell had thrived at Booz Allen. "You don't do that by being shy and retiring," he said.

Bush Says Hussein 'Was Given Justice' (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Thursday that he would have preferred that the execution of Saddam Hussein had been conducted in a more "dignified" manner, but said the deposed dictator met the fate he deserved.

"He was given justice. The thousands of people he killed were not," the president said during a session with reporters after he met with Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany.

His remarks on the hanging were the first he had made in public since Hussein was executed Saturday in Baghdad amid taunting shouts in which an observer called out the name of a militant Shiite Muslim cleric.

Soon after the execution, a video of Hussein's death, recorded on a camera phone, was posted on a number of websites.

The scene and the video have caused discomfort among Bush aides. They have tried to focus attention on the brutality of Hussein's regime, rather than on the circumstances surrounding his execution.

Public outcry about the hanging has been pronounced in Europe. Merkel, at Bush's side in the entry area of the White House State Floor, did not address the issue.

Bush said he had spoken about it earlier in the day with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, during a nearly two-hour videoconference.

Maliki told him that Iraq was investigating the execution, the president said. U.S. officials reportedly tried to persuade Iraqi officials to delay the hanging, rather than proceed with it on the first day of Sunni Muslims' observance of Eid al-Adha, the holiday marking the end of the annual pilgrimage to Mecca.

Bush said Hussein's hanging closed "a horrific chapter" in Iraq's history, adding, "We expect there to be a full investigation of what took place" in the death chamber.

The president also gave Maliki a renewed vote of confidence at a time when officials have begun to question whether he is, as Bush has said, the right person for the job.

Lawmakers Criticize Video Of Hussein's Final Minutes (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Helene Cooper

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — The execution of Saddam Hussein was initially hailed as an example of democratic justice being served in Iraq, but leading members of Congress said Thursday that the conduct surrounding the hanging could undermine United States strategy in Iraq and complicate efforts to help the new Iraqi government succeed.

The White House has declined to criticize the execution, portions of which were shown online in a bootlegged video. Several Republican senators who have been among President Bush's biggest supporters in the Iraq war said they were troubled by the video and fearful of the reverberations it could provoke.

"It's a very bad thing, it's harmful, and I'm sorry that it happened," said Senator John McCain, an Arizona Republican who has been a White House ally on its Iraq policy. "Obviously, it unnecessarily inflames the emotions of the Sunnis."

DOJ_NMG_0112501

While the White House says that Mr. Bush has not seen the video — recorded without authorization with a cellphone camera — several members of Congress said that they had seen it. More important, they said, the rest of the world had, too.

As Mr. Bush inches closer to presenting his revised Iraq plan, Republican and Democratic lawmakers expressed dismay at the scene surrounding the final minutes of Mr. Hussein's life. They said it was another sign of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki's inability to deal with the sectarian divide in Iraq.

"It is a very unfortunate episode, and they are still trying to sort out accountability," said Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia. "The key to success in Iraq — whatever success we are able to achieve — is reconciliation, and this certainly was not a helpful chapter in that."

Whether the execution ultimately has political repercussions beyond Iraq and here in the United States remains an open question. But as senators prepared to be called to the White House as early as Friday for briefings about the president's Iraq plan, the video emerged as a new complication.

In the video, Mr. Hussein was shown standing with the noose around his neck at dawn last Saturday in Baghdad, facing a barrage of mockery and derision from unseen tormentors. The images showed Mr. Hussein amid shouts of "Go to hell!" and "Moktada! Moktada! Moktada!" in reference to a radical Shiite cleric, Moktada al-Sadr.

Speaking at the White House after a meeting with Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany on Thursday, Mr. Bush said he had wished the execution had "been done in a more dignified way." He said he appreciated that Mr. Maliki was investigating the way the execution was handled, but that he did not dwell on it during their video conference on Thursday. Mr. Bush said Mr. Hussein had received a fair trial, the likes of which his enemies had not. "He was given justice; the thousands of people he killed were not," Mr. Bush said.

Senator Susan M. Collins, a Maine Republican, said she was troubled by the swiftness of the execution, adding that "taunting someone who is about to be executed is just blatantly unacceptable." The images contained in the video would almost certainly inflame sectarian tensions throughout the region, she said.

"I have no grief for Saddam Hussein, but it makes it more difficult for Iraqi leaders to forge the political solution that I think is necessary to quell the violence," Ms. Collins said. "It threatens the very existence of the nation and thousands of Americans and Iraqi lives to have Saddam mocked before his execution."

It was unclear whether the newly ascendant Democrats in Congress planned to make an issue of the handling of the execution. It is not likely to be a part of promised Senate hearings on President Bush's Iraq policy, according to aides in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

At the State Department, the official response has been that the execution, while imperfect, is in the past and that people should move on. But aides to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice continued to bemoan what one official called "the idea that of all the people in that room, Saddam Hussein was the one who looked like he had the most dignity."

Senator Richard G. Lugar, an Indiana Republican, said the circumstances surrounding the execution were "another factor that makes life more difficult for the Iraqi government as well as for our hopes for that government and stability." But the video, he said, "is by no means the most difficult issue we are facing in Iraq."

2 Guards Arrested For Hussein Video, Official Says (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 4 -- Two guards were reportedly arrested Thursday for recording former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein's execution with a video cellphone.

"Two Justice Ministry guards have been arrested. Other guards have identified them as having filmed the hanging," an aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Sami al-Askari, told [a] news agency.

The government, apparently seeking to douse the sectarian tensions that worsened following Hussein's disorderly hanging, said Wednesday it had detained a security guard, but it was not clear whether the detentions reported by Askari were in addition to the earlier arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0112502

"The investigation is ongoing, and we have identified those who flouted the rules," Interior Minister Jawad al-Bolani told reporters. "Even for a dictator like Saddam, the law must be obeyed."

Meanwhile, 14 people were killed when two car bombs exploded in quick succession about 10 a.m. Thursday outside a governmental heating oil facility and gas station in the Mansour neighborhood of Baghdad.

The explosions at the Abu Jaafar station also injured 18 others, as residents lined up to buy heating oil, said 1st Lt. Amar Yasin of the Mansour police. Mortada Jassim, a security guard at the site, said several of the nearby cars, laden with oil, also burned.

"These cars became car bombs themselves," Jassim said. Guards at the site said they believed they were attacked because the facility is frequented by Shiites.

The U.S. military said Thursday that a patrol in western Baghdad was attacked by small-arms fire, killing one U.S. soldier. The soldier's name was not released until his family could be notified.

U.S.-Iraqi Forces Launch Assault On Sunni Haven (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

.

AL SHAMS, IRAQ — About 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops launched a major offensive at dawn Thursday in Diyala province, an increasingly violent zone east of Baghdad that has become a haven and training ground for Sunni Arab insurgents.

The target of the strike is an isolated landscape of farms and irrigation canals riddled with weapons caches, safe houses and training ranges, U.S. military officials said.

The insurgents, however, appeared to be well prepared for the slow-moving assault. Smoke signals and flares arced into the sky as a column of tanks and Humvees from the 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, pressed into an insurgents' redoubt. U.S. military officials said spotters used those techniques to warn guerrillas in the area that the U.S. and Iraqi forces were approaching.

Insurgents also had dug deep trenches into the roadways and sabotaged canal bridges to slow the troops' advance. U.S. commanders said they suspected that the obstacles were designed to divert approaching vehicles toward roadside bombs.

Four hours into the operation, an explosion ripped through the front end of a U.S. Humvee but failed to penetrate the cabin. The U.S. soldiers inside were not injured, but the wreckage blocked the road for two hours as troops salvaged the vehicle and searched for additional explosives hidden along the road.

U.S. commanders viewed the operation as an opportunity to test the 400 soldiers of Iraq's 5th Army Division.

Nonetheless, commanders kept details of the operation from their Iraqi counterparts until hours before it began, out of fear that information would leak to insurgents, said Col. David W. Sutherland, commander of the 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team, which assumed control of Diyala in October. Sutherland said he suspected that information from Iraqi soldiers compromised counterinsurgency operations in November and December.

Some Iraqi soldiers chafed at the secrecy around the operation, which was launched from a checkpoint south of Baqubah.

"They do not trust us," said one Iraqi soldier who identified himself as 1st Lt. Ali.

The rendezvous was a chaotic scene, with dozens of armored vehicles jammed into a checkpoint. U.S. officers shouted commands in English in an attempt to make them fall in line. Several Iraqi vehicles started off in the wrong direction.

"No, this way, this way!" shouted a U.S. soldier.

By the time the joint force swept into six villages to conduct searches, there were no military-age men to be seen.

Diyala has become a sectarian killing ground, with the number of attacks on civilians more than doubling since February. A resource-rich province with a population divided among Iraq's major ethnic and religious groups, Diyala is home to at least 50,000 former officers of the Iraqi military and has become a staging ground for Sunni Arab insurgent attacks in Baqubah, the provincial capital, and Baghdad.

U.S. military commanders acknowledged that it was difficult to root out insurgents spread over such a broad swath of sparsely populated farmland, but said they hoped to keep the insurgents off balance by disrupting training and operations.

DOJ_NMG_0112503

"We will never kill or capture them all, and even if we do, there are plenty more who will take their place," Lt. Col. Andrew Poppas said. "Our success, in my view, will be based on continued presence, denying this place as a safe haven."

Despite the temporary confusion and trust issues, the Iraqi soldiers appeared eager to work with their American partners. Some sang celebratory songs in unison as they grabbed their gear and assembled near their Humvees.

Operations in the insurgent badlands of southeast Diyala are still a novelty for Iraqi troops, said an Iraqi soldier, and they relished a chance to strike back at gunmen who pepper the southernmost Diyala army outpost so often that it has been named "The Death Station."

"They are all terrorists there," said a Shiite Muslim soldier from Basra, who declined to otherwise identify himself.

Insurgent leaders are well organized and have relatively deep public support. Abu Musab Zarqawi, leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, was killed by U.S. forces last year in western Diyala, and his group retains a strong presence in the province. Ansar al Sunna, another insurgent group, also is active. But the most well-established groups, such as the Council and the 1920 Revolutionary Army, are composed of ex-Iraqi soldiers, U.S. officials said.

Two hours after joining the Iraqi soldiers, the convoy rumbled toward Diyala's southeastern hinterlands. As they progressed, reports crackled over the radio of four more explosions, which disabled U.S. vehicles but did not injure any troops. Two more bombs were found before they were detonated.

Helicopters spotted small groups of armed men using the network of irrigation canals that crisscross the region to bypass U.S. and Iraqi ground troops. U.S. officials said they killed nine suspected insurgents and detained about nine others.

But large swaths of the region appeared to have been abandoned by military-age males. During a sweep of one hamlet, convoy commander Capt. Stephen Dobbins found only several women and children and a couple of teenage shepherds.

Dobbins asked a woman with a child on her lap where all the men had gone. To work, she said.

A search of the village turned up $1,500, passports with foreign stamps on them, cellphones and two AK-47 rifles, the military said.

"Then why did I see men running away from here?" Dobbins said.

"Those men were from another village," the woman said.

Meanwhile, 89 people were reported killed Thursday in Iraq's continuing violence.

The dead included 13 people who were killed by two car bombs that exploded at a Baghdad gas station, a U.S. soldier killed by small-arms fire in west Baghdad and a Karbala council member shot to death along a southern highway. Police also found 47 bodies in Baghdad.

Bombs Kill 13 In Baghdad After Brief Lull In Violence (USAT/AP)

USA Today, January 5, 2007

BAGHDAD — Twin car bombings killed 13 people Thursday in an upscale Baghdad neighborhood, and Iraq prepared to execute two of Saddam Hussein's co-defendants despite an appeal from the United Nations.

The explosions went off one after the other at 10:30 a.m. in the Mansour neighborhood, setting fire to a gas station and incinerating at least a half-dozen cars. At least 25 people were wounded, police said.

Firefighters sprayed water on the wreckage as soldiers and civilians staggered around in a daze. Blood pooled among scattered containers for propane and kerosene, near where tea cups lay toppled on a blanket spread over wood crates.

Mansour is a primarily Sunni neighborhood in western Baghdad. During Saddam's regime, it was home to the most elite Iraqi families; many international embassies remain there, though shuttered.

U.S. Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said this week there had been a "downturn" in violence during the four-day Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha, which began last weekend. Thursday was the first day after Eid for both Sunnis and Shiites. Caldwell acknowledged the possibility that violence could surge again.

Police said 47 tortured bodies were found dumped across Baghdad on Thursday, up from 27 a day earlier. An American soldier was killed by small-arms fire in western Baghdad, the military said.

Iraqi officials said Thursday they planned to execute two of Saddam's co-defendants in the coming days. The former Iraqi dictator was hanged Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0112504

U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights Louise Arbour appealed to Iraq not to execute Barzan Ibrahim, Saddam's half brother and former intelligence chief, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, former head of the Revolutionary Court. Saddam and the two men were sentenced to death for the killing of 148 Shiites in the 1980s.

"Nobody can stop the carrying out of court verdicts," Sami al-Askari, an adviser to the prime minister, told the BBC's Arabic service. "The court's statute does not allow even the president of the republic or the prime minister to commute sentences, let alone grant a pardon. Therefore, no pressure can stop the executions."

In Washington, lawyers for al-Bandar filed a new request for the U.S. Supreme Court to block his transfer from U.S. to Iraqi custody.

In the southern city of Basra on Thursday, more than 1,500 people demonstrated to express approval of Saddam's execution. The peaceful rally began at the offices of the Dawa Party and ended at the provincial governor's building. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who pushed for a speedy execution of Saddam, is a leader of the party.

Deadly Blasts In Baghdad Leave Gruesome Traces (NYT)

By Marc Santora And Johan Spanner

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 4 — The foot was balanced on a shopping bag after being scooped up off the dirty street by a man in a track suit. There was no person to go with the limb. Nearby a charred body was still smoldering, smoke coming off the black corpse 45 minutes after the attack.

For 50 yards, the dead were scattered about, some in pieces, some whole but badly burned.

This violence on Thursday involved two bombs timed to go off one after another in the formerly upscale neighborhood of Mansour, which continues to be ripped apart by sectarian violence. Thirteen people were killed and 22 wounded, just a small fraction of the civilians killed across the country this week.

The first device went off at 10:15 a.m., probably a roadside bomb set on a timer, officials said.

The attack was apparently aimed at a gasoline station. Cars were lined up around the block waiting for fuel, and dozens of people, grasping large plastic jugs, hoped to buy heating fuel.

Just moments after the first explosion, a second, larger, car bomb detonated.

The neighborhood has traditionally been a mixed Sunni and Shiite one. Although the Abu Jaffar gas station, where the attack was centered, is in what is considered a Sunni area, the method of the attack — multiple bombs timed to explode in succession — is usually thought of as a trademark of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, a Sunni insurgent group.

An hour after the explosion, there was still a strong stench of burning gasoline and fire. The road was slick with sludge from the water used to douse the fire. Blood pooled in areas. Scores of armed men were running about, including members of the Iraqi Army and the police. Some of those with machine guns had no uniforms at all.

Shots rang out, mostly in warning. Neighbors gathered outside, oddly calm and seemingly accustomed to such carnage.

A tanker truck filled with fuel was parked near the station, having escaped the blast.

Not surprisingly, residents living near the area blamed everyone from the government to the Americans to terrorists for what had happened.

“We are just innocent people,” said Nafia Abdul Jabbar. “The people killed were poor, in need of kerosene that they cannot afford to buy on the black market because the price is 10 times more than it is at the station.”

Elsewhere, a mortar attack was directed at the Shiite neighborhood of Huriya, wounding three people, officials said.

Clashes on the outskirts of the Sunni neighborhood of Ghazaliya left two people dead and 25 people wounded, Iraqi officials said. A grenade attack in the Amin neighborhood killed five people.

Across the city on Thursday, officials said, 47 bodies were found mutilated — 4 of them with their heads cut off.

An interview with the family of a man recently mutilated and killed, a prominent sheik considered to be the prince of the Tamim tribes, gives a glimpse into the complicated underworld that is, in part, responsible for the trucks full of bodies collected around this city every day.

DOJ_NMG_0112505

The man, Sheik Hamid Mohammed al-Suhail, 75, was found Wednesday in the Shuala neighborhood of Baghdad, a Shiite redoubt, by members of his tribe, which is mixed Shiite and Sunni, who were searching for him. He disappeared last Sunday, and his mutilated body was found wrapped in a blanket, covered in blood. The search party recognized his body by the distinctive way the beard was trimmed.

He had been an outspoken critic of the sectarian fighting and participated in a recent conference in Cairo on national reconciliation.

The kidnappers, whom his relatives hinted they knew but would describe only as "militiamen" for fear of reprisal, initially called his family asking for $100,000, said a nephew, Sheik Ali Sammi al-Suhail.

The family told the kidnappers they did not have the money, the nephew said.

"The body was mutilated in a brutal way," he said. "They used a drill on him and perhaps other tools."

One hand and one leg were almost completely severed.

The nephew said he had been told by people who said they witnessed the killing that after his uncle was tortured, his body was thrown from a two-story building. He survived the fall but was brutalized further before finally being killed.

Another prominent Iraqi figure, Sheik Akram al-Zubeidi, was killed Thursday in Karbala, a Shiite holy city where there has been little sectarian strife. Sheik Zubeidi was assassinated when he was stopped at a fake checkpoint, a local hospital official said.

Three other people in the car with him were also killed by the gunmen, whose motive was unclear.

There was continued fallout Thursday from the execution of Saddam Hussein, as Sunnis, from Kashmir to Libya, used his death as a rallying point.

The Libyan government announced that it would erect a statue of him to stand next to one of Libya's own national heroes, news agencies reported.

At least nine people were hurt in the Indian-controlled part of Kashmir when the police fired rubber-coated bullets to break up a large group of people protesting the execution, [a news agency] reported.

Two Iraqi officials involved in the investigation of the distribution of a graphic video of the hanging said Thursday that a second guard was being held for questioning. Officials announced the arrest of the first guard on Wednesday.

There is increasing pressure, including from the White House, on the Iraqi government to proceed with caution in carrying out the execution of Mr. Hussein's two co-defendants, Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, Mr. Hussein's half brother, and Awad al-Bandar, a former judge.

Despite the international reaction directed at the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, Mr. Maliki's popularity among Shiites in southern Iraq seems to have increased.

In Basra, Iraq's second largest city, hundreds of demonstrators representing Islamist parties rallied in the streets, praising Mr. Maliki and setting photos of Mr. Hussein on fire.

13 Killed In Baghdad Bombings (WT/AP)

By Lauren Frayer

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Twin car bombs killed 13 persons yesterday in an upscale Baghdad neighborhood after a lull in violence, and Iraq prepared to execute two of Saddam Hussein's co-defendants, despite an inquiry into an unruly scene in the former dictator's execution chamber.

The explosions went off one after another at 10:30 a.m. in the Mansour neighborhood, setting fire to a gas station and incinerating at least a half-dozen cars. In addition to the dead, police said at least 25 persons were wounded.

Firefighters sprayed water on the wreckage as soldiers and civilians staggered around in a daze.

"What do they want from us? What do they want from us?" one Iraqi soldier asked, referring to those behind the blasts. Blood pooled among scattered containers for propane and kerosene, near where tea cups lay toppled on a blanket spread over wood crates.

DOJ_NMG_0112506

Mansour is a primarily Sunni neighborhood in western Baghdad. During Saddam's regime, it was home to the most elite Iraqi families.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell said this week there had been a "downturn" in violence during the four-day Muslim holiday Eid al-Adha, which began last weekend. Gen. Caldwell acknowledged that violence could surge again.

Police said 47 tortured bodies were found dumped across Baghdad yesterday, in addition to the 27 a day earlier. A U.S. soldier was killed by small-arms fire in western Baghdad, the military said.

Despite the row over Saddam's hanging and a call for restraint from the United Nations, Iraqi officials said yesterday that they planned to execute two of the executed dictator's co-defendants in the coming days.

"Nobody can stop the carrying out of court verdicts," Sami al-Askari, an adviser to the prime minister, told the British Broadcasting Corp.'s Arabic service.

"The court's statute does not allow even the president of the republic or the prime minister to commute sentences, let alone grant a pardon. Therefore, no pressure can stop the executions."

U.N. High Commissioner for Human Rights Louise Arbour appealed to Iraq not to execute Barzan Ibrahim, Saddam's half-brother and former intelligence chief, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, former head of the Revolutionary Court. Saddam and the two men were sentenced to death for the killing of more than 140 Shi'ites.

In Washington, attorneys for al-Bandar filed another request for the U.S. Supreme Court, this time to Justice John Paul Stevens, to block his transfer to Iraqi custody. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. turned down an identical request on Wednesday.

Meanwhile, Iraq's interior minister said whoever recorded Saddam's hanging on a cell-phone camera would be punished, and Mr. al-Askari said two Justice Ministry guards were being questioned.

"The investigation committee is interrogating the men. If it is found that any official was involved, he will face legal measures," he said.

The grainy video shows Saddam being taunted in his final moments Saturday with shouts of "Go to hell" and "Muqtada, Muqtada" -- a reference to radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Prosecutor Munqith al-Faroon, one of 14 official witnesses to the hanging, told Iraqi state television that he did not think there was "any legal abuse, only moral violations."

Arrested Iranians 'Were Trying To Influence Iraqi Government': BBC (AFP)

AFP, January 5, 2007

Five Iranians detained by US forces in Baghdad last month were senior intelligence officers engaged in a covert political mission to influence the Iraqi government, the BBC said.

"There were five senior officers in various intelligence organisations... It was a very significant meeting... These people have been collared, relatively speaking, up to no good," one unnamed British official told the broadcaster.

US forces detained 10 people on December 21 on suspicion of weapons smuggling after finding what they said were documents, maps, photographs and videos in a raid at pro-Iranian Shiite leader Abdul Aziz al-Hakim's compound.

Military commanders said the 10, two of whom were Iranian, were linked to "illegal activities," including potential attacks on coalition forces.

Three Iranian diplomats were detained in a vehicle in Baghdad the previous day but later released.

The BBC's flagship political programme Newsnight cited British authorities in Iraq as saying that while the arrests produced highly important intelligence information, there was no "smoking gun" about weapons supplies or attacks.

Instead, the Iranians were there to hold high-level meetings with representatives of several Iraqi Shiite factions that have come to prominence since the fall of president Saddam Hussein in 2003.

"There was discussion of whether the Maliki government would succeed, who should be in which ministerial jobs... It was a very significant meeting," one official said.

"The fact of who some of the Iranians were is very significant."

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said later he had invited the two Iranians detained at Hakim's compound to Iraq as part of an agreement between Baghdad and Tehran to improve security.

DOJ_NMG_0112507

His office said he was "unhappy" with the arrests, increasing tensions between Washington and Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's Shiite-led government in Baghdad, which is pursuing closer ties with Iran.

The two Iranians were released last Friday. Shiite-dominated Iran -- which the coalition claims orchestrates attacks on its forces in Iraq -- said the arrests were an embarrassment for the United States.

The BBC said US sensitivity to the matter comes from discovering evidence that Iran is trying to turn the situation in Iraq to its advantage, to the extent of trying to influence the make-up of the Baghdad government.

Washington is now urging Baghdad to declare the Iranians arrested as personae non grata and ban them from returning to Iraq, it added.

The New York Times last week quoted White House officials as saying two of the men were "senior military officials" with links to an Iranian Revolutionary Guard unit that trains Lebanon's Shiite Hezbollah guerrilla movement.

The White House said it would wait for the results of an investigation before characterising the Iranians' activities, but suggested it confirmed Iranian "meddling" in Iraqi affairs.

Hakim, a member of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI) which is part of Maliki's ruling coalition, met US President George W. Bush in the White House earlier in December.

Denying The Facts, Finding The Truth (NYT)

By Slavoj Zizek

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

London

ONE of the pop heroes of the Iraq war was undoubtedly Muhammad Said al-Sahhaf, the unfortunate Iraqi information minister who, in his daily press conferences during the invasion, heroically denied even the most evident facts and stuck to the Iraqi line. Even with American tanks only a few hundred yards from his office, he continued to claim that the televised shots of tanks on the Baghdad streets were just Hollywood special effects.

In his very performance as an excessive caricature, Mr. Sahhaf thereby revealed the hidden truth of the “normal” reporting: there were no refined spins in his comments, just a plain denial. There was something refreshingly liberating about his interventions, which displayed a striving to be liberated from the hold of facts and thus of the need to spin away their unpleasant aspects: his stance was, “Whom do you believe, your eyes or my words?”

Furthermore, sometimes, he even struck a strange truth — when confronted with claims that Americans were in control of parts of Baghdad, he snapped back: “They are not in control of anything — they don’t even control themselves!”

What, exactly, do they not control? Back in 1979, in her essay “Dictatorship and Double Standards,” published in Commentary, Jeane J. Kirkpatrick elaborated the distinction between “authoritarian” and “totalitarian” regimes. This concept served as the justification of the American policy of collaborating with right-wing dictators while treating Communist regimes much more harshly: authoritarian dictators are pragmatic rulers who care about their power and wealth and are indifferent toward ideological issues, even if they pay lip service to some big cause; in contrast, totalitarian leaders are selfless fanatics who believe in their ideology and are ready to put everything at stake for their ideals.

Her point was that, while one can deal with authoritarian rulers who react rationally and predictably to material and military threats, totalitarian leaders are much more dangerous and have to be directly confronted.

The irony is that this distinction encapsulates perfectly what went wrong with the United States occupation of Iraq: Saddam Hussein was a corrupt authoritarian dictator striving to keep his hold on power and guided by brutal pragmatic considerations (which led him to collaborate with the United States in the 1980s). The ultimate proof of his regime’s secular nature is the fact that in the Iraqi elections of October 2002 — in which Saddam Hussein got a 100 percent endorsement, and thus overdid the best Stalinist results of 99.95 percent — the campaign song played again and again on all the state media was Whitney Houston’s “I Will Always Love You.”

One outcome of the American invasion is that it has generated a much more uncompromising “fundamentalist” politico-ideological constellation in Iraq. This has led to a predominance of the pro-Iranian political forces there — the intervention basically delivered Iraq to Iranian influence. One can imagine how, if President Bush were to be court-martialed by a Stalinist judge, he would be instantly condemned as an "Iranian agent." The violent outbursts of the recent Bush politics are thus not exercises in power, but rather exercises in panic.

DOJ_NMG_0112508

Recall the old story about the factory worker suspected of stealing: every evening, when he was leaving work, the wheelbarrow he rolled in front of him was carefully inspected, but the guards could not find anything, it was always empty. Finally, they got the point: what the worker was stealing were the wheelbarrows themselves.

This is the trick being attempted by those who claim today, "But the world is nonetheless better off without Saddam!" They forget to factor into the account the effects of the very military intervention against him. Yes, the world is better without Saddam Hussein — but is it better if we include into the overall picture the ideological and political effects of this very occupation?

The United States as a global policeman — why not? The post-cold-war situation effectively called for some global power to fill the void. The problem resides elsewhere: recall the common perception of the United States as a new Roman Empire. The problem with today's America is not that it is a new global empire, but that it is not one. That is, while pretending to be an empire, it continues to act like a nation-state, ruthlessly pursuing its interests. It is as if the guiding vision of recent American politics is a weird reversal of the well-known motto of the ecologists — act globally, think locally.

After 9/11, the United States was given the opportunity to realize what kind of world it was part of. It might have used the opportunity — but it did not, instead opting to reassert its traditional ideological commitments: out with the responsibility and guilt with respect to the impoverished third world — we are the victims now!

Apropos of the Hague tribunal, the British writer Timothy Garton Ash pathetically claimed: "No Führer or Duce, no Pinochet, Amin or Pol Pot, should ever again feel themselves protected from the reach of international law by the palace gates of sovereignty." One should simply take note of what is missing in this series of names which, apart from the standard couple of Hitler and Mussolini, contains three third world dictators: where is at least one name from the major powers who might sleep a bit uneasily?

Or, closer to the standard list of the bad guys, why was there little talk of delivering Saddam Hussein or, say, Manuel Noriega to The Hague? Why was the only trial against Mr. Noriega for drug trafficking, rather than for his murderous abuses as a dictator? Was it because he would have disclosed his past ties with the C.I.A.?

In a similar way, Saddam Hussein's regime was an abominable authoritarian state, guilty of many crimes, mostly toward its own people. However, one should note the strange but key fact that, when the United States representatives and the Iraqi prosecutors were enumerating his evil deeds, they systematically omitted what was undoubtedly his greatest crime in terms of human suffering and of violating international justice: his invasion of Iran. Why? Because the United States and the majority of foreign states were actively helping Iraq in this aggression.

And now the United States is continuing, through other means, this greatest crime of Saddam Hussein: his never-ending attempt to topple the Iranian government. This is the price you have to pay when the struggle against the enemies is the struggle against the evil ghosts in your own closet: you don't even control yourself.

If Iraq Fragments, What's Plan B? (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON

As President Bush readies a new strategy for Iraq, some experts in Washington are looking beyond the question of US troop levels to what might happen if worst-case scenarios come true. Call it Plan B: How the United States might handle Iraq's partition.

It may still be possible to hold Iraq together, many of these critics believe. A surge in American military strength might help. But the hour is late - and a lack of contingency planning on the part of US officials may be one reason the situation has become so dire.

"If I was working for George Bush, I would want somebody to be thinking hard about this, sort of preparing the groundwork," says Michael O'Hanlon, a senior fellow in foreign-policy studies at the Brookings Institution in Washington.

The US might need actively to aid Iraqis in relocating to parts of the country where they feel safer, says Mr. O'Hanlon. This sort of resettlement assistance wouldn't be unprecedented, he notes. The US did it in Bosnia.

DOJ_NMG_0112509

Such a policy would perhaps preempt the violent Balkans-style ethnic cleansing that is already occurring in Iraq, O'Hanlon says. Sectarian strife is displacing 100,000 Iraqis a month.

"One-third to one-quarter of the ethnic cleansing that might occur [in Iraq] has occurred," says O'Hanlon.

Of course, to many US officials such a policy would be anathema. Mr. Bush has long insisted that a unified, democratic Iraq is one of his goals - not an Iraq separated into sectarian regions.

It has been widely reported that the new "way forward" Bush is expected to announce next week will include a substantial surge in US forces, designed to bring stability to violence-torn parts of the country.

Such an increase might allow reconstruction aid to begin to have a real effect in Baghdad and elsewhere, improving the daily life of Iraqis and strengthening the shaky central government, according to an influential report on the subject co-authored by Frederick Kagan, a military historian at American Enterprise Institute in Washington.

"Victory in Iraq is still possible at an acceptable level of effort," says a summary of the AEI study.

But events in Iraq now may be running at a speed that outpaces the US ability to respond. Bush has mulled over his options for weeks, while sectarian violence rises and the political partition of the country continues apace, says Vali Nasr, an adjunct senior fellow for Middle East studies at the Council on Foreign Relations.

The attempt to form a unity government has completely failed, says Mr. Nasr. Absent viable political plans, power is determined by the violence of militia in the street.

"The carnival of Saddam's execution is handwriting on the wall about how deeply divided this society is," he says.

Will the country's political divide be followed by a physical one? Possibly. Sen. Joseph Biden (D) of Delaware, incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has long advocated establishing Iraq as a loose federation, consisting of Sunni, Shiite, and Kurdish regions, and a Baghdad that belongs to all.

Other experts, including Leslie Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations, have been increasingly vocal in calling for the US to help Iraqis resettle in areas of safety.

"We've got to provide them the means, the protection, and the funds to set up a new life," said Mr. Gelb in a recent National Public Radio interview. "We owe them that."

Resettled refugees might, in the end, blame America for their plight. The US could be accused of abetting ethnic cleansing. All plausible, says O'Hanlon of Brookings - but the problem is, the ethnic cleansing is happening anyway. The question, therefore, is really a humanitarian one: How to save lives?

In a recent piece titled "A Bosnia Option for Iraq," published in the journal American Interest and co-authored with Edward Joseph, a visiting scholar at Johns Hopkins University, O'Hanlon proposes a "soft partition" of Iraq.

The war in Bosnia ended only after 200,000 civilians died and half the country's population had fled their homes, says the article. Ethnic relocation may be distasteful, but with Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads now attacking even hospitals and schools, what is the alternative?

"If US and Iraqi forces cannot protect civilians, there is little moral dilemma about facilitating their movement to safer areas," says the article.

The Iraqi government would have to offer housing and jobs for those resettled, as well as protection while moving, according to the article. Government property commissions could help Sunnis and Shiites swap homes.

The key to making the relocation work might be a division of oil money. It should be split a number of ways, the article says, with individuals, provinces, and the overall government receiving allocations.

"The Bosnia option has a much higher chance of success than anything resembling current strategy ... although I can still see the case for one last big push [with more US troops]," says O'Hanlon.

Other experts say that a surge in troops will serve a purpose only if tied to a comprehensive approach of bringing stability and security to Iraq.

The problem now is not just troop levels or stability in Baghdad, says Anthony Cordesman, a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, in a new study.

"The 'threat' from the insurgency and militias is only part of the problem," writes Mr. Cordesman. "Iraq's central government is weak and the nation is steadily dividing into sectarian and ethnically controlled areas."

DOJ_NMG_0112510

Thus any new military effort should be accompanied by a further push to create incentives for peaceful coexistence, according to Cordesman - or peaceful separation where there is not a credible alternative. The US should "provide aid to relocation when this is the only option," writes the CSIS scholar.

A Mother Fights For A Soldier Who Said No To War (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Carolyn Ho is a mother on a mission.

She came to Washington in mid-December to build support for her son, Army 1st Lt. Ehren Watada, the first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq.

Barring some kind of miracle, he will be court-martialed on Feb. 5 at Fort Lewis, about 45 miles south of Seattle. If convicted, he could be sent to military prison for six years. There's going to be a pretrial hearing today.

Like many Americans, she believed she could come to the capital city and change the world. Or at least her small part of it.

She was acting purely on instinct, wanting to do everything in a mother's power to protect her son. "I'm here to get what I can," said Ho, who is from Honolulu. Dark hair pulled back. Dark eyes that moisten when she speaks of her son. Soft voice. "I'm going to put it out there."

At the very least, she hoped for some kind of letter of support before today's hearing. Late yesterday afternoon, a letter arrived. After a lot of worry and work.

Lobbying Congress is no day at the spa.

During her Capitol Hill quest, she was accompanied by several seasoned lobbyists, but they let her do the talking. She moved along the halls, sitting down with staffers in the offices of Sens. Patty Murray (D-Wash.) and Daniel Akaka (D-Hawaii) and aides from the offices of Reps. Lynn Woolsey (D-Calif.), John Conyers (D-Mich.) and Maxine Waters (D-Calif.).

In closed-door meetings, Ho told the same story. She sees her efforts as part of a larger, multifaceted wave that is challenging the Bush administration from every angle. At the same time the president is advocating an increase in the number of soldiers in Iraq, there is on the home front an increase in the number of vocal opponents of the war. "I believe my son is part of this movement," Ho said.

Phoebe Jones of Global Women's Strike, an international antiwar network that supports Ho and Watada, was at Ho's side on Capitol Hill. "The work of mothers is protecting life, beginning with their children," Jones explained. "And that is really the opposite of the obscenity of war."

On the Hill, Ho handed out information packets. She passed around photos of Watada, who is taller, fuller of face than his mother, but shares her smile.

Her son "based his decision on facts," she said. He studied the war in Iraq and decided it was illegal. He tried to resign and leave the service with dignity, but the Army wouldn't let him. He asked to be shipped to Afghanistan; his request was denied. He was offered a noncombat position in Iraq; he said no thanks.

Because the United States entered the war based on false premises, Ho said, the war is illegal. It is thus her son's constitutional duty to disobey orders.

So she asked that members of Congress get involved. She said that ideally she would prefer that the military accept her son's resignation and dismiss all charges against him. "He shouldn't be in a military prison," she said. His voice "will be totally squelched."

She asked, "Just who is the criminal here? The one who is refusing to participate in war crimes?"

From the Army's standpoint, the case is simple. Tens of thousands of soldiers have passed through Fort Lewis on their way to the war and have not asked for special treatment, said Army spokesman Joe Piek. Watada, 28, signed on for military service in 2003 with full knowledge that he might have to fight an unpopular war, Piek said. "This is a case about a soldier who refused orders to deploy to Iraq. . . . That is the bottom line."

DOJ_NMG_0112511

Watada has been charged with one count of "missing movement," which means he did not board one of the planes that were taking his 3rd Brigade to Kuwait on June 22. In Kuwait the brigade's 4,000 soldiers received their equipment and their marching orders.

He also is charged with "conduct unbecoming an officer," for subsequent statements he made. For now he is assigned to a special troops battalion and has been doing everyday soldierly duties while awaiting his court appearance.

Piek said, "He joined the Army and swore an oath, and that includes following the orders of the officers appointed over him. His unit was placed in a stop-loss category, which meant that everybody currently in that unit would deploy. You don't get to pick and choose, especially if you are a junior officer, which places you get to go to."

To Watada's attorney, Eric Seitz, the situation is more complicated. "The United States talks out of both sides of its mouth," he said. "We've prosecuted soldiers in other countries for following orders to commit war crimes. But God forbid you should use that refusal as a defense in this country."

The Watada defense: Questioning the war publicly is not "conduct unbecoming" but an exercise of freedom of speech. And he had the right to miss movement because he was refusing to participate in what he deems an illicit enterprise.

To Carolyn Ho, congressional staffers were polite and receptive. She came at an inopportune time, she was told several times. Congress had adjourned for the holidays and there was not much time before the court-martial.

There were flashes of hope: Along the way, someone suggested that a "sign-on letter" sent by members of Congress to the secretary of the Army might be a way to galvanize support for Watada. Or a "dear colleague" letter that would alert others in Congress to Watada's situation. One staffer brought up the idea of a "private resolution," an arcane move in which Congress passes a bill that affects one person. "Those are possibilities," Ho said. But as the day wore on, fatigue showed on her face.

She left with little more than encouragement and good wishes. A high school counselor, Ho had been on leave since the end of September. She had to get back to work.

She is divorced. Her ex-husband, Bob Watada, has also been out drumming up support, speaking to churches and civic organizations around the country. She spent October and November on the West Coast and much of December on the East. At one event she shared a podium with Cindy Sheehan, who refers to the moms-against-bombs instinct as "matriotism."

Ho went back to Hawaii for Christmas, but is in the Seattle area this week for the hearing.

On the phone from Fort Lewis, Ehren Watada explained how he decided while still in college -- in the aftermath of 9/11 -- that he wanted to serve his country in the military. He walked into a recruitment office in Honolulu and said he wanted to go to officer candidate school. He failed the physical because of childhood asthma. "I was heartbroken," he said. "I paid out of pocket for a breathing test to prove I had no breathing problems. I passed the test with flying colors and was eventually accepted at the end of March 2003."

Though Watada's father did not serve in the military, several uncles were in World War II. One of his uncles was killed in Korea. Another relative was in Vietnam. "There is a history of service in our family," he said.

When he signed up, "I didn't know the things I know today. I believed the military and the government when they told me that Iraq posed an imminent threat."

Watada said it took him a couple of years to realize that the United States should not be in Iraq. He submitted his resignation in January 2006. "The commanders of my unit were not too happy about it," he said. They were surprised, he said, because until that point he had received positive evaluations.

"I can't stop the war," said Watada. "But if Americans believe the war is wrong, they should be doing everything they can to stop it."

His mother is doing what she can. "People are stepping gingerly," she said yesterday about legislative action. "There's a wait-and-see approach."

She was in Tacoma, Wash., yesterday for a press conference when she received a personal letter from Rep. Maxine Waters. Ho read an excerpt over the phone:

"The issue that [1st Lt. Ehren Watada] has raised deserves to be publicly debated and considered. And I will use my platform as a member of Congress and chair of the 'Out of Iraq' caucus to highlight the failed policies of this administration and stimulate discussion. . . . Your son has shown great integrity and dignity in his objection to the war in Iraq, and I commend you for working so hard on his behalf."

DOJ_NMG_0112512

Ho sighed and said she found the letter to be "disappointing."

But it was something.

Theft Probe Leads To N.Va. Storage Site (WP)

By Theresa Vargas

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

An investigative trail littered with gold-colored AK-47s, documents labeled "CLASSIFIED" and pistols purported to have been given as gifts to Saddam Hussein led federal investigators here: a Manassas storage center.

Atlantic Self Storage, nestled between Interstate 66 and Route 234, sits across from a Super 8 Motel and is little more than rows of rust-colored garage doors leading to individual units. But according to court documents filed recently in Prince William County, one of the storage units may hold clues for a federal investigation spanning the country.

In a 10-page affidavit for a search warrant, a special agent with the Naval Criminal Investigative Service details how about 100 U.S. government and Iraqi weapons, along with secret documents, may have been stolen and ended up in storage units in California and Manassas.

A Marine gunnery sergeant who once lived in Fairfax County and rented storage units in both locations was placed in pretrial confinement at Camp Pendleton because, the agent wrote, "reasonable grounds exist that he poses a serious threat to the national security of the Unites States."

The gunnery sergeant, Gary Maziarz, is charged with larceny of computer and camera equipment, larceny of weaponry and possession of steroids, according to officials at Camp Pendleton, north of San Diego. He is scheduled for an Article 32 investigation, similar to arraignment, Jan. 17.

Maziarz's attorney, David Brahms, said that his client maintains his innocence and that the affidavit should be seen for what it is: "What it is, is an attempt by law enforcement to convince a judicial official that there is sufficient evidence for a search, but it is not evidence of guilt."

NCIS officials said they could not talk about the case because the investigation remains open.

Maziarz had worked in an intelligence center in Fallujah, Iraq, from February to May 2006, according to the documents. He was also assigned to a program administered by the National Security Agency and had access to information classified as the " 'Top Secret' level and higher," the papers said.

NSA officials did not respond to a request for comment.

This is what is known from the affidavit, filed in Prince William Circuit Court:

On Oct. 27, a colonel at Camp Pendleton reported as missing a large quantity of U.S. Government trophy weapons acquired during the conflict in Iraq.

An internal investigation cast suspicion on Maziarz, and he consented to a search of a storage facility he rented in Carlsbad, Calif., according to the documents.

That's when investigators reportedly found the weapons: gold-colored Russian Dragunov sniper rifles, gold-colored and nickel-plated AK-47s, four Iraqi swords, radios with Arabic writing, foreign helmets and Iraqi plaques. More than a hundred items are listed.

Authorities then searched another unit and an apartment Maziarz rented in Carlsbad. In his apartment, they found steroids and three commemorative Colt 1911 .45-caliber pistols "reputed to have been presented to Saddam Hussein," the agent wrote. In the storage units, they found more foreign weapons, digital cameras, computers and suspicious documents, according to the affidavit.

"Of note, two folders containing approximately 250 pages of material marked 'SECRET' were also discovered in one of the storage units," the agent wrote.

When investigators reviewed the material, they found that most concerned a 2004 "surveillance report of a suspected terrorist by a United States Government Agency."

DOJ_NMG_0112513

"In order to avoid declassification of this document, I am intentionally avoiding any further description," the special agent writes, but he adds that these documents are believed "to be genuine and appropriately classified."

The investigation might have ended in California, but agents reviewing paperwork found a 2000 rental agreement between Maziarz and the Manassas storage center, according to the documents. A map was also found that showed an arrow pointing to unit 228 -- a 10-by-15-foot box that costs $164 a month to rent. It is where two agents showed up Nov. 7.

"I believe that Maziarz is using the Manassas storage unit to hold papers and equipment stolen from the USMC in the Northern Virginia area, just as he used the Carlsbad, CA unit," the special agent wrote, adding that the activity may stretch back as far as five years.

In April 2005, a second lock was put on the Manassas unit at the request of Maziarz, according to the documents.

"He asked me to put on another lock and send him the key," the manager, Ernie Jennison, said recently, standing in front of the barbed wire fence that surrounds the facility.

Jennison said the agents came several times and left a list inside the unit of what they took.

According to the search warrant, agents removed 43 items, including foreign and domestic military gear. They also collected objects that would require further scrutiny, including 74 floppy disks and a locked black briefcase.

Taliban Leader Promises More Afghan War (NYT)

By Ismail Khan And Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Jan. 4 — In what appears to be the first exchange with a journalist since going into hiding five years ago, the Taliban leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar, said that he had not seen Al Qaeda's chief, Osama bin Laden, in five years and that he would never negotiate with the United States-backed government of Hamid Karzai in Afghanistan. He also threatened to continue the war until foreign troops withdraw from Afghanistan.

The statements were made in written response to questions sent by e-mail to the Taliban spokesman, Muhammad Hanif, who often speaks to journalists by telephone from an undisclosed location. Mr. Hanif said that Mullah Omar had written the replies himself and that a courier had returned the answers on a USB computer drive.

Though it was impossible to verify those claims, the statements, if authentic, would be Mullah Omar's first exchange with a journalist since he was driven from power in 2001 by the American-led invasion of Afghanistan. The fugitive Taliban leader, who claims to be at large in Afghanistan, is widely thought to have taken up sanctuary in Pakistan.

Since fleeing his last stronghold in the southern city of Kandahar in December 2001, Mullah Omar said that he had not seen or tried to contact Mr. bin Laden, and that although his movement did not have a specific alliance with Al Qaeda, they were fighting for the same goals.

"I have neither seen him nor have made any effort to do so, but I pray for his health and safety," he said of Mr. bin Laden. "We have never felt the need for a permanent relationship in the present circumstances. But they have set jihad as their goal, whereas we have set the expulsion of American troops from Afghanistan as our target. This is the common goal of all the Muslims."

Asked about the suicide bombers who have carried out over 100 attacks in Afghanistan in the last year, he said they were acting on religious orders from the Taliban. "The mujahedeen do not take any action without a fatwa," he said, meaning an Islamic edict. "They seek fatwas before they take any action in their self-defense."

He denied receiving any outside assistance, and dismissed as Western propaganda that Pakistan was providing assistance and a safe haven to his movement. "We have not received any assistance so far, nor can anybody prove that," he said. "The leadership, resistance and shura are all based here in Afghanistan."

He dismissed Mr. Karzai's effort to convene a grand assembly between Afghan and Pakistani elders and leading representatives to try to forge peace between the nations as a conspiracy by American intelligence agencies. "Only those people who have sold out to foreign forces will participate," he said. "Our participation is absolutely out of question."

"First of all, foreign troops should leave Afghanistan and then the institutions they have created should be dismantled," he said. "Unless that happens, the war will heat up further. It will not decrease."

"The people themselves have risen up to fight the Americans," the statement continued. "Nobody can tolerate this kind of subjugation and sacrilege of their culture and religion. It would be humiliating for anybody to think that the nation does not want to evict American forces. No nation can accept the dictates of a handful of dollar-greedy and treacherous people."

In his replies, he showed himself unrepentant for his refusal to give up Mr. bin Laden to the United States after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and for blowing up the giant Buddhas of Bamiyan in March 2001.

"Our stand to grant refuge to Osama bin Laden was based on principles," he said. "If there were people who were opposed to us giving refuge to him, they should have done so with logic and reason, and not using bullying or threats," he said. The council of clerics, which was the highest authority of the Taliban government, asked Mr. bin Laden to leave, but never had any intention to force him out, he said. "The clerics had declared jihad against the United States in total opposition to his surrender to the Americans," he said.

Asked if the Buddhas' destruction was a mistake in retrospect, he said: "Shariah is Shariah. There is no distinction on whether a certain thing is difficult or easy. A certain number of Muslims have been influenced by other civilizations, and that's why they seem to find Islamic injunctions too difficult." Shariah is the legal code of Islam based on the Koran.

He repeated the same justification that his government had used previously for its harsh strictures that closed girls' schools and forbade women to work, namely that his government was still fighting a war and could not do everything at once.

"Girls' schools were either too few or were nonexistent before we took over," he said. "We were preparing a strategy for girls' education in accordance with the Shariah."

He blamed the anti-Taliban forces of the Northern Alliance and international sanctions for preventing his government from achieving its aims.

"We could have formed a real government had we achieved full and total control over the whole country, and we did manage to run the government in an organized manner with the blessing of Shariah and divine laws," he said. "But if there were problems, those were largely because of the conspiracies of the infidels and foreign enemies, for instance, the impositions of sanctions on Taliban, organizing anti-Taliban forces and preparing them to fight the mujahedeen."

Taliban Leader's Powerful Vanishing Act (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

KUCHLAK, PAKISTAN — Where's Mullah Omar?

It has been more than five years since the Taliban's supreme leader, a onetime village cleric, vanished into the trackless terrain outside his fallen Afghan stronghold, Kandahar. And his likeliest source of sanctuary is thought to be the belt of rugged tribal territory straddling the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, where the law of no nation prevails.

In Kuchlak, a dusty desert crossroads in the southwestern Pakistani province of Baluchistan, Mullah Mohammed Omar still is referred to by the title he assumed in 1996, when he and his puritanical Islamist movement seized power in Afghanistan: Amir al-Muminin, or Commander of the Faithful.

Omar's feat of eluding a long manhunt by the Americans and their allies, even with a $10-million bounty on his head, is celebrated here as proof of his mystical powers.

"With all their sophisticated satellites that can see a single needle from high in the sky, they cannot find him," said Fazil Mohammad Baraich, a district amir, or chieftain. "It is no surprise that God almighty protects him, and this increases our faith."

Rumors of Omar sightings abound, and are repeated by locals with an air of satisfied certainty.

"I, myself, have heard on good authority that he is living in a camp" in the military enclave outside Quetta, said Mohammed Ashiq, head of a merchants association in that provincial capital.

"And," Ashiq said, leaning forward conspiratorially, "I hear that he has gotten fat. Very fat."

During the Taliban's rule, it was Omar who ordered such stringent measures as the banishment of women from schools and public life, and the destruction of one of Afghanistan's greatest cultural treasures, the giant Buddha statues at Bamian.

He outlawed simple pleasures such as music and kite flying, even as he decreed, disastrously for his country, that the Taliban would provide aid and shelter to Osama bin Laden, who likewise has remained at large.

DOJ_NMG_0112515

A Taliban presence

In tribal communities such as Kuchlak, sympathy for the toppled militia is defiantly undiminished. Many townspeople are of the same Pashtun clan as Omar, who by most accounts has never flown in an airplane and has rarely strayed from his homeland.

The cult-like devotion to Omar in the mosques and makeshift classrooms of the tribal territories helps ensure a steady supply of Taliban fighters. The militia's white flags flutter over Kuchlak's small, desolate graveyard, where the names of slain fighters are scratched into bare rock.

Little boys trudge through the town's rutted streets, bearing bags of bread donated to the town's many madrasas, or Islamic religious schools. On Kuchlak's edge, single tracks, equally suitable for wandering goats or militants on motorbikes, fade into a horizon the color of khaki, the Pashto word for dusty.

Across the border in Afghanistan, allied military commanders say they are putting increasing pressure on the Taliban leadership, most notably with a precision airstrike on Dec. 19 on a lonely road in Helmand province that killed Mullah Akhtar Mohammed Osmani, a senior deputy to Omar.

Tracking Omar "is certainly a priority, and this kind of success shows we have the potential to reach those at his level," said Maj. Dominic Whyte, a spokesman for North Atlantic Treaty Organization forces.

But if Omar has taken shelter in Pakistan, he may be out of the reach of coalition guns. An airstrike in October on a madrasa in the Pakistani tribal region of Bajur, which left dozens dead, triggered a heavy anti-American and anti-government backlash.

For that reason, a strike on a madrasa or village thought to be harboring Omar would be politically explosive unless American forces were absolutely certain that he, or a similarly high-profile target, was present.

Kuchlak, 10 miles north of Quetta, is a convenient way station for anyone looking to move surreptitiously in and out of the tribal belt.

One road out of town leads north to the Afghan border and continues to Kandahar. Another, with only a single police checkpoint in more than 100 miles, leads northeast to the tribal area of Waziristan, where Pakistani authorities have struck controversial truces with tribal elders that prevent troops from pursuing militants.

Because of Omar's longtime aversion to being photographed — a policy he was said to have adopted on religious grounds — few in the border hinterlands would be in a position to positively identify him. His missing right eye was his most recognizable characteristic, but allied military reports say he may have been fitted with a glass eye.

In any event, many observers believe that betrayal from within Omar's tribal milieu would be unthinkable. For one thing, it would violate the rigid Pashtun code of behavior, which places a premium on clan honor and the unquestioning protection of guests. For another, any traitor probably would pay with his life, and with the lives of his family.

Political questions

Omar's role in the Taliban leadership, whether as figurehead or active military commander, is widely debated among analysts.

Last week, before the beginning of the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha, Western news agencies received a statement from a purported spokesman for Omar, in which the Taliban leader boasted that his fighters would drive foreign troops out of Afghanistan.

The possibility that Omar has been sheltered in Pakistan raises thorny political questions for President Pervez Musharraf. Pakistan became a crucial U.S. ally after the Sept. 11 attacks, but the motives and loyalties of its government are under increasing Western scrutiny.

The Taliban movement, in its early days, was nurtured by Pakistan's intelligence service, and some observers doubt that Omar could have survived this long without its continued help. But others say no hard-and-fast proof has emerged that Omar is hiding on the Pakistani side of the border.

"He could be in Afghanistan, or he could be in Pakistan," said Rahimullah Yusufzai, a longtime Taliban watcher based in the Pakistani frontier city of Peshawar.

DOJ_NMG_0112516

To admirers, the near-completeness of Omar's vanishing act after fleeing his gaudily appointed compound outside Kandahar in late 2001 is a triumphant rebuttal of the allies' characterizations of him as a simpleton.

"If that is the case," said Baraich, the amir, "then why has he been able to hide so well, and for so long?"

Pakistan Premier Wants Afghan Refugees To Return Home (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Jan. 4 — Pakistan's prime minister, Shaukat Aziz, said Thursday that he wanted the three million Afghan refugees still living in Pakistan to go home as one way to end the problem of insurgents using the country as a haven.

It is the first time Pakistan has been so blunt in demanding that the Afghans, to whom it has served as host for more than 20 years since the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, leave.

Mr. Aziz arrived here for talks with the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, in an effort to smooth tensions between the neighbors, but after more than two hours Mr. Karzai acknowledged that relations were only growing worse.

"Unfortunately, the gulf in relations between Afghanistan and Pakistan is getting wider, and it is not getting narrower," Mr. Karzai said after their meeting.

The two leaders emerged with no agreement on the main areas of contention, namely Pakistan's plan to fence and mine the border, and Afghanistan's project to convene two tribal gatherings, or jirgas, of national representatives from both countries, to try to foster peace between the countries.

Shortly before the meeting, Pakistan announced that it was going ahead with a plan to fence and mine the long mountainous border. Afghanistan has repeatedly condemned the project as a diversion from the real problem of terrorism, which it says is being incubated in Pakistan. Pakistan has also dragged its feet on organizing the tribal gatherings, promising only to form a commission to work on the idea.

"The Afghan people want to remove all those obstacles which create the divide in our relations," Mr. Karzai said. "Those obstacles are created by terrorist activities which are hindering Afghanistan's reconstruction and making our schools burn.

"Security will not come to Afghanistan unless together we and Pakistan, with good and friendly relations, become tough in the fight against terrorism," he added. He said he wanted to hold the tribal jirgas so people could speak their minds.

Without offering specifics, Mr. Aziz said the two leaders agreed to work on resettling three million Afghan refugees back in Afghanistan and removing the sanctuary that refugee camps provide to insurgents.

"Refugee camps on our side of the border sometimes are safe havens for elements who are from Afghanistan and take safe haven there after conducting activities," he said.

He also defended Pakistan's plan to fence and mine the border as one way to restrict the movement of people who represent a threat to security. "We believe that selective fencing and mining can help achieve the objective," he said, adding that the fence and mines would not prevent the ordinary crossing of local tribes.

Medical Teams Saving More Troops (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

The killed-in-action rate in the Iraq-Afghanistan wars is half what it was in World War II and a third less than Vietnam and Desert Storm, according to internal Pentagon documents that say battlefield medical teams are doing a better job of stabilizing the wounded and getting them to doctors.

"We have better battlefield medicine," Dr. William Winkenwerder Jr., assistant secretary of defense for health affairs, told The Washington Times yesterday. "We are reviving and resuscitating many, many more of our soldiers who would have died in previous conflicts."

The improvement may be little solace to the families of the American troops who have died or been seriously wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan. The Pentagon, however, says it has put in place a first-rate system for saving life -- and limb.

DOJ_NMG_0112517

The briefing papers show the killed-in-action rate is 12.5 percent for the current wars compared with 25.3 percent for World War II and 18.6 percent for Vietnam/Desert Storm. Dr. Winkenwerder, a trained internist, said the rate is based on the number of combatants who died of wounds before reaching a treatment center. He said the standard has been the same for each war.

Dr. Winkenwerder ticked off a number of improvements. Medics now carry resuscitation gear. Each soldier and Marine, not just medics and Navy hospital corpsmen, are issued tourniquets to stop bleeding.

"We had anecdotal reports of service members who died, unfortunately, because there was no tourniquet available until the medic got there," he said.

Medical teams have also worked on arriving at the scene of injuries, in most cases caused by a roadside improvised explosive device (IED).

"It used to be the 'golden hour,' " he said. "Now we are trying to get down to the 'platinum 15' because what kills so many people is hemorrhage, massive hemorrhage."

New ways of treating the wounded emerged with the creation in 2003 of the Joint Theater Trauma System (JTTS). It involves a constant "lessons learned" data analysis designed to come up with better tactical medicine

Until JTTS, for example, doctors were sometimes missing football-type concussions that occur in troops impacted by an IED.

Dr. Winkenwerder said the "few thousand" medical personnel in Iraq is the smallest in recent wars because many wounded and diseased personnel are flown out of the country to hospitals in Germany and the U.S.

From January 2005 to November, the military evacuated nearly 15,000 troops -- 23 percent for battle injuries, 21 percent for nonbattle injuries and 56 percent for diseases. During that same span, the military treated 80,448 patients in theater.

The briefing charts, which were compiled in December for presentation to retired military analysts, also credit new technologies, such as improved body armor, ballistic eyewear and hearing protection. It cites better-armored Humvee vehicles and better detection of IEDs, which are responsible for 80 percent of the Army's killed in action.

In the run-up to the Iraq invasion, the Pentagon failed to predict or prepare for the deadly insurgency that attacks military troops and civilians daily. Soldiers and Marines early on lacked armored Humvees that could blunt the force of IED blasts. The Army embarked on a crash program to produce armor kits for existing vehicles and to assemble armored Humvees from scratch.

The Pentagon also created a special unit, the Joint Improvised Explosive Device Defeat Organization, and gave it more than $2 billion to find technologies and tactics to find and defuse IEDs.

The internal Pentagon briefing comes as the U.S. military suffered 115 combat deaths in December, the most since November 2004 and the third deadliest month since the March 2003 invasion to oust Saddam Hussein. Total U.S. deaths yesterday stood at 3,005 for Iraq and 357 for Afghanistan.

The number of wounded has reached more than 23,000 in Iraq and Afghanistan. This includes 759 amputees: 497 who lost a leg, arm, hand or foot; and 262 who lost a finger, toe, or part of a hand or foot, the Pentagon says.

The Battle Of Iraq's Wounded (LAT)

By Linda Bilmes

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

THE NEW YEAR brought with it the 3,000th American death in Iraq. But what's equally alarming — and far less well known — is that for every fatality in Iraq, there are 16 injuries. That's an unprecedented casualty level. In the Vietnam and Korean wars, by contrast, there were fewer than three people wounded for each fatality. In World Wars I and II, there were less than two.

That means we now have more than 50,000 wounded Iraq war soldiers. In one sense, this reflects positive change: Better medical care and stronger body armor are enabling many more soldiers to survive injuries that might have led, in earlier generations, to death. But like so much else about this war, the Bush administration failed to foresee what it would mean, failed to plan for the growing tide of veterans who would be in urgent need of medical and disability care. The result is that as the Iraq war approaches its fourth anniversary, the Department of Veterans Affairs is buckling under a growing volume of disability claims and rising demand for medical attention.

DOJ_NMG_0112518

So far, more than 200,000 veterans from Iraq and Afghanistan have been treated at VA medical facilities — three times what the VA projected, according to a Government Accountability Office analysis. More than one-third of them have been diagnosed with mental health conditions, including post-traumatic stress disorder, acute depression and substance abuse. Thousands more have crippling disabilities such as brain or spinal injuries. In each of the last two years, the VA has underestimated the number of veterans who would seek help and the cost of treating them — forcing it to go cap in hand to Congress for billions of dollars in emergency funding.

The VA system has a reputation for high-quality care, but waiting lists to see a doctor at some facilities now run as long as several months. Shortages are particularly acute in mental health care. Dr. Frances Murphy, the VA's deputy undersecretary for health, recently wrote that some VA clinics do not provide mental health or substance abuse care, or if they do, "waiting lists render that care virtually inaccessible."

The VA also runs Vet Centers — 207 walk-in neighborhood help centers that provide counseling to veterans and their families. These popular, low-cost centers have already treated 144,000 new veterans. But they are so understaffed that nearly half are sending veterans who need individual therapy into group sessions or placing them on waiting lists, according to a recent report by the House Veterans' Affairs Committee.

At the same time, wounded veterans trying to obtain disability checks are being tied up in a bureaucratic nightmare. The Veterans Benefits Administration has a backlog of 400,000 pending claims — and rising. Veterans must wait from six months to two years to begin receiving the money that is due to them while the agency plods through paperwork. The staff eventually helps veterans secure 88% of the benefits they ask for — but in the interim, thousands of veterans with disabilities are left to fend for themselves.

The situation is about to go from bad to worse. Of the 1.4 million service members involved in the war effort from the beginning, 900,000 are still deployed on active duty. Once they are discharged, the demands for medical care and counseling will skyrocket, as will the number of benefit claims. The Veterans for America organization projects that VA medical centers may need to treat up to 750,000 more returning Iraq and Afghan war veterans and that half a million veterans may visit the Vet Centers.

And then there is the cost. After the Persian Gulf War in 1991, half of all veterans sought VA medical care, and 44% filed disability claims. Assuming that this pattern is repeated, the lifetime cost of providing disability payments and healthcare to Iraq and Afghan war veterans will likely cost U.S. taxpayers between $300 billion and $600 billion, depending on how long the war lasts.

President Bush is now talking about spending more money on recruiting in order to boost the size of the Army and deploy more troops to Iraq. But what about taking care of those soldiers when they return home? The VA's solution is to hire an additional 1,000 claims adjudicators to cut the backlog.

A better idea would be to stop examining each application and instead automatically accept all disability claims, then audit a sample (like the IRS does for tax filings) to weed out fraud. Or at a minimum, simple claims should be fast-tracked and settled within 60 days. We should also place more counselors and more claims experts in the Vet Centers and harmonize recordkeeping so veterans can move seamlessly from the Army's payroll into VA hospitals and outpatient care.

One of the first votes facing the new Democratic-controlled Congress will be another "supplemental" budget request for $100 billion-plus to keep the war going. The last Congress approved a dozen such requests with barely a peep, afraid of "not supporting our troops." If the new Congress really wants to support our troops, it should start by spending a few more pennies on the ones who have already fought and come home.

DOJ:

J.Lo Honored By People En Espanol (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

NEW YORK - Jennifer Lopez is among the entertainers selected by People en Espanol for its "100 Most Influential Hispanics" issue, which honors those who have made an impact in the Hispanic community.

DOJ_NMG_0112519

Lopez, who graces the cover of the magazine's February issue, on newsstands Friday, says "being an example to others is a big part of my work."

The 38-year-old singer-actress also says she would like to have children someday.

"I come from a strong family, so of course I want to have one," Lopez tells the magazine. "But I do have my own family: my immediate family, my husband and his children. I get to share in all of that. I am very lucky to have that."

Marc Anthony, who didn't make the list, and Lopez were married in 2004. The 37-year-old singer has two sons, 5-year-old Cristian and 3-year-old Ryan, with ex-wife Dayanara Torres, and a 12-year-old daughter, Arianna, from a previous relationship.

"I have tried to calm down the past couple of years since I got married," Lopez says. "I have actually grown as an artist and as a person. I realized that everything I was doing leaned towards my roots ..."

Lopez tops the list of entertainers, which also includes Antonio Banderas, Carlos Santana, Eva Longoria, George Lopez, Gloria Estefan, Ricky Martin, Salma Hayek and Shakira, among others.

The magazine also honors filmmaker Alejandro Gonzalez Inarritu (culture/the arts), Attorney General Alberto Gonzales (politics/public affairs), businessman Carlos Slim Helu (business), MTV President Christina Norman (media), Los Angeles Angels of Anaheim owner Arturo Arte Moreno (sports), sociologist Aida Giachello (science and technology/health) and teacher Bertha Flores (education).

Lopez' screen credits include "Selena," "Maid in Manhattan" and "Monster-in-Law." She has recorded her first Spanish language CD, "Como ama una mujer," which is slated for release this spring.

"When I see all of this, I say to myself: `Wow! I didn't know I had so many things inside,'" she says. "I am happy to have taken the time to appreciate it."

ON THE NET

Jennifer Lopez: http://www.jenniferlopez.com/

People en Espanol: http://www.peopleenespanol.com/pespanol/

Hopi Recommended For US Attorney Post (AZREP)

By Billy House, Republic Washington Bureau

Arizona Republic, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON - A Hopi woman who has served most of her career as a federal prosecutor n Arizona is being recommended to President Bush as a potential nominee to become the next U.S. Attorney for the District of Arizona.

Diane J. Humetewa, 42, who is now the senior litigation counsel and tribal liaison under retiring U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton, was recommended to the White House Thursday by Republican Sens. Jon Kyl and John McCain.

Humetewa could not be reached. A Justice Department spokesman said she would not be immediately commenting.

advertisement

She would be the first Native American U.S. Attorney in Arizona if nominated by Bush and confirmed by the Senate. Officials were researching whether she would also be the nation's first Native American U.S. Attorney.

"I am proud to recommend Diane to serve our country in this noble role. As a native Arizonan, Diane has a sound appreciation for the culture and legal issues unique to the region," said McCain. Humetewa served as a counsel to the U.S. Senate Committee on Indian Affairs from August 1993 to March 1996, when McCain was chairman of the panel.

"Her distinguished career in public service, her experience as a prosecutor, and work on behalf of crime victims make her an ideal nominee for this role," added Kyl.

Humetewa is married and a 1993 graduate of the Arizona State University College of Law. She began her career with the U.S. Attorney's Office as a victim advocate for then-U.S. Attorney Stephen M. McNamee in 1987, and has served no less than six U.S. Attorneys, according to a news release announcing the appointment.

White House officials said they have no timeframe for considering McCain and Kyl's recommendation.

Charlton was appointed U.S. attorney for the District of Arizona on Nov. 12, 2001, by President Bush. He announced last month that he is quitting as U.S. Attorney to enter private legal practice at the end of January. He is to be a partner in the Phoenix-based firm of Gallagher and Kennedy.

"I think Diane Humetewa is an outstanding recommendation. She's proven herself to be a great prosecutor and an individual with a very balanced sense of judgment," said Charlton. "As Tribal Liaison, Diane has developed outstanding relationships with the Native American community and as an early advocate of victim's rights she has ensured that victims of crime are well represented in the federal system."

Rep. John Shadegg, R-Ariz., was among those recommending Humetewa's appointment.

"She is a remarkable and impressive attorney and her record speaks for itself. Her work in the Arizona U.S. Attorney's office for the last decade has distinguished her within the law enforcement community," said Shadegg.

Reach the reporter at billy.house@arizonarepublic.com or 1 (202) 906-8136. Read his blog on Washington politics at dcblog.azcentral.com.

Low-profile Demeanor In A High-profile Job (MDGAZ)

By C. Benjamin Ford, Staff Writer

Maryland Gazette, January 5, 2007

U.S. Attorney Rod Rosenstein's willingness to share credit draws a lot of fans Friday,

BALTIMORE — U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein has the polite manner and looks of a friendly youth pastor.

But county prosecutors across the state describe Rosenstein as nose-to-the-grindstone federal prosecutor who has raised the profile of the office through frequent news conferences and aggressive prosecutions ranging from corporate corruption to gang crimes.

Since his appointment in May 2005, Rosenstein has brought innovative ideas to the office, including bringing the first racketeering charges against members of the street gang MS-13, said Attorney General Douglas F. Gansler (D).

''This U.S. Attorney Rod Rosenstein is one of the best that we've had here in Maryland in recent times," said Gansler, who was Montgomery County's top prosecutor for eight years and an assistant U.S. attorney in Washington, D.C., before that. ''He's a prosecutor's prosecutor."

Federal prosecutors obtained racketeering charges against 22 suspected Mara Salvatrucha members in August 2005 — the first use of the RICO statute for street gangs in Maryland. Under the 1970 Racketeering Influenced and Corrupt Organization statute, members of an organization can be convicted for involvement in all the crimes committed by the group.

Federal prosecutors worked closely with Montgomery's prosecutors in going after members of the violent gang, Gansler said.

Rosenstein ''came to the office weeks after taking over," Gansler said. ''We discussed our mutual concerns and the reality of the gang problem."

When the MS-13 indictments were handed down in August 2005, Rosenstein praised the work and cooperation of the state's attorneys and police departments in Montgomery and Prince George's counties as well as the FBI and other agencies.

Praising colleagues has become a hallmark of Rosenstein's tenure in Baltimore.

''He's very good about spreading out the love," said FBI Special Agent Michelle Crnkovich of the Baltimore field office. ''He has no problem thanking everybody for their contribution, and he lists everybody involved. He's very good about giving credit."

Sharing credit pays off

Rosenstein said he holds news conferences in order to keep the public informed about what is going on and to send a message to would-be criminals about the legal risks they face.

''When a drug dealer who thinks he's going to face a five-year sentence arrives in federal court and learns he faces a possible life sentence, I almost feel sorry for him," Rosenstein said.

Giving credit is also important to the morale of law enforcement officers, who do not make a lot of money and do not always get the recognition they deserve, he said.

Rosenstein was once asked by one of the prosecution supervisors in his office whether it was a good idea to put so much emphasis on the work of others. ''A week afterwards, the supervisor received a letter from a police captain thanking him for his division being mentioned," Rosenstein said.

DOJ_NMG_0112521

While some have speculated Rosenstein, a registered Republican, plans to use his office as a springboard for political office, he laughs at the idea.

''I've never been involved in partisan politics," he said. ''As a teenager, I ran as a judge of elections. That's it. I've prosecuted politicians. I think it's important for prosecutors, particularly of public corruption, that you remain out of partisan politics."

Rosenstein said he respects ''honest politicians" even though he has no interest in joining their ranks. ''It just doesn't interest me."

''Rod Rosenstein is a career prosecutor," Gansler agreed. ''He doesn't have a political agenda. He's not in it for glory. He's trying to do the right thing and anyone who is a career prosecutor knows it's not one guy. It's a team effort."

Eighteen months into his job, Rosenstein, 41, already dreads its end. ''I love this job," he said. ''It's a wonderful opportunity to make a difference."

George W. Bush appointed Rosenstein in May 2005 to replace the controversial Thomas M. DiBiagio, who resigned in January 2005.

At the time, Rosenstein was the principal deputy assistant attorney general in the Justice Department's tax division in Washington. U.S. attorneys serve four-year terms at the will of the president.

''The irony about this job is it's one of the best jobs in law enforcement, but after you serve one term or two terms, it's over," Rosenstein said.

Held in high regard

Unlike his predecessor, Rosenstein has drawn praise from Democrats and Republicans alike. Some accused DiBiagio of launching investigations against Lt. Gov. Kathleen Kennedy Townsend and the Democratic Baltimore City Council for partisan purposes.

''I like what I know of Rod Rosenstein," said Stephen H. Sachs, a Democrat who was U.S. attorney for Maryland from 1967 to 1970 and Maryland attorney general from 1979 to 1986. ''He has a very good reputation as a professional. He comes out of Justice, as you know, and friends of mine in Justice all thought well of him in the tax division."

From 1995 to 1997, Rosenstein worked as an associate independent counsel under Kenneth W. Starr, investigating allegations against President William J. Clinton (D). He left that job in 1997 when U.S. Attorney for Maryland Lynne A. Battaglia, a Clinton appointee, hired Rosenstein as assistant U.S. attorney.

''I thought he was very capable, very intelligent and very able at that time and I've seen nothing to dissuade me from that," said Battaglia, who was appointed to the Maryland Court of Appeals, the state's highest, in January 2001.

Baltimore city State's Attorney Patricia C. Jessamy (D) said Rosenstein has been on target in assisting the city's efforts to crack down on gun crimes.

''We've renewed some initiatives we had that were lagging," she said, citing Project Exile, which prosecutes owners of illegal firearms.

Under Rosenstein, there is more cooperation between city and federal prosecutors, Jessamy said. Federal prosecutors can review a Baltimore case and provide a federal ''letter of intent to prosecute" which gives the city prosecutors leverage to get defendants to plead guilty to avoid facing federal prosecution later, Jessamy said.

''He's doing a fantastic job," said former Frederick County state's attorney Scott L. Rolle (R), who had been considered a leading candidate for the U.S. attorney's opening in 2005. ''We've had a number of dealings with his office and they were very attentive, very eager and willing to help. It's been great and better than it's ever been since I've taken over 12 years ago — no disrespect to the other U.S. attorneys. It's much more of a cooperative spirit."

That cooperation could serve him well when his term expires and he looks for support in his next endeavor.

Rosenstein is interested in becoming a federal judge; several years ago, he applied for an opening.

It is rare for a former U.S. attorney to return to the ranks as an assistant U.S. attorney, he said.

''I've been in government 17 years," said Rosenstein, who became a federal prosecutor after graduating from Harvard University's law school where he was editor of the law review. ''I've never had to worry about where my next paycheck is coming from. It's always been the Department of Justice."

DOJ_NMG_0112522

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Prosecutors End Case In Long AOL Fraud Trial (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Federal prosecutors concluded their accounting-fraud case against two former AOL executives yesterday afternoon, signaling that the long-running trial soon may end after unusual twists including a mistrial for one of the defendants.

The case, which began in an Alexandria federal courtroom in mid-October, is one of the longest criminal trials ever in a jurisdiction that is widely known as "the rocket docket" for its speedy and efficient justice, legal analysts said.

More than three dozen government witnesses testified about complex accounting tricks that hearkened back to early 2001, when the technology boom had turned into a bust. At the time, the Dulles Internet service provider struggled to show revenue and advertising gains by making questionable deals with dot-com business partners in which no revenue changed hands.

"There was an intense focus to get revenue," testified Jason Witt, a manager in AOL's aggressive and freewheeling business affairs unit, which has been disbanded. "It's probably the greatest pressure I've seen since ever."

A number of witnesses recounted how the AOL defendants -- former business affairs executive Kent D. Wakeford and former Netbusiness unit vice president John P. Tuli -- felt squeezed between the expectations of their employer to close more deals and demands from dot-com clients who themselves were struggling to stay afloat.

Witt, for example, said Wakeford told him not to put terms of a deal in writing. He also spoke of a 2002 meeting with Tuli in the AOL parking garage in which they discussed whether regulators had begun to inquire about AOL's dealings with two high-tech business partners. Defense lawyers contend that the accounting treatment on the deals had been vetted by experts in the company and by far-higher-ranking executives.

But the trial perhaps is most notable for the absence of the former AOL officials who led the business-affairs operation, such as David M. Colburn and Eric Keller, whose names came up regularly in testimony and who once had been the focus of government investigation. Time Warner, which absorbed AOL, agreed to pay more than $500 million to settle joint civil and criminal charges two years ago.

Neither Colburn nor Keller was charged with a crime. The five-year statute of limitations against them expired early last year. Prosecutors told U.S. District Judge Walter D. Kelley Jr. with the jury outside the courtroom that the U.S. attorney's office for the Eastern District of Virginia continues to investigate whether Keller misled investigators in sworn testimony to securities regulators. But there have been few, if any, signs of an active criminal investigation. The Securities and Exchange Commission, which has the power to seek the return of bonuses and other compensation, continues to scrutinize a number of former AOL executives.

The courtroom drama eased with the departure more than a month ago of its most colorful presence, Las Vegas entrepreneur Charles E. "Junior" Johnson. Johnson founded PurchasePro.com, a software manufacturing company that prosecutors say made a series of sham deals with AOL in early 2001 in an effort to stave off financial doom.

Johnson, who entertained spectators and courthouse personnel with his lively stories, was removed from the trial in November and a mistrial was declared for reasons that remain secret. Prosecutors say they intend to retry Johnson, who is accused of directing subordinates to destroy e-mail messages and forge accounting documents. That leaves his former employee Christopher J. Benyo as the only PurchasePro representative sitting at a defense table next to the former AOL executives.

Defense lawyers could wrap up their case in the next several days, putting their clients' fate in the hands of a jury that has remained attentive despite the trial's sometimes plodding pace. Earlier this week, five jurors dressed in business attire took notes and pored over documents, although a few panelists' eyes wandered as the morning dragged. So far, none of the three defendants has said he will testify in his own defense. Their lawyers will ask the judge to dismiss the charges against them in arguments today.

DOJ_NMG_0112523

Central to the prosecution case are former PurchasePro executives R. Geoffrey Layne and James S. Sholeff, both of whom pleaded guilty in early 2005 and agreed to testify against their former business associates. Layne and Sholeff said they conspired with Johnson at the Bagel Cafe in Las Vegas in April 2001 to forge documents that allowed the company to reach revenue goals after the financial quarter had ended.

Their accounts over the course of the trial mostly implicated Johnson. They testified that they shredded documents and destroyed computers at his direction, then buried the ashes or raked the pieces into Sholeff's yard. Layne and Sholeff also mentioned conversations with Wakeford and Tuli, who were under heavy pressure to close revenue gaps at AOL.

Defense lawyers for the former AOL executives attacked the veracity of both witnesses and suggested that they misled the jury to get shorter prison terms. Layne is serving a sentence of more than four years. Sholeff has yet to begin serving an already reduced sentence of four months in prison and four months of home detention.

Mark J. Hulkower, a partner at the District's Steptoe & Johnson who represents Tuli, hit Layne with question after question about his history of lying to friends, lawyers, and prosecutors, as well as accepting payments from Junior Johnson to cover large gambling debts.

"There is nothing left of Geoff Layne," Judge Kelley said in a private conference last month at the bench, as he brushed back attempts by Hulkower and Wakeford's lawyer, Henry W. Asbill, to introduce a vulgar e-mail message that would have further assailed the witness's credibility, according to trial transcripts.

As in many business-fraud cases, the outcome may depend upon how indirect and sometimes-murky testimony resonates with the jury. Sholeff, testifying that he had to change the date on yet another contract in early 2001 to ensure that the company could book revenue in the first quarter, said he tried to make a joke to Wakeford at the time. "I said, 'I guess I have to go commit another crime,' " Sholeff said.

How did Wakeford respond? asked prosecutor Charles F. Connolly.

"He kind of laughed," Sholeff said. "It was a nervous kind of laugh."

Gadflies Get Respect, And Not Just At Home Depot (NYT)

By Charles Duhigg

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

For decades, activist shareholders were an entertaining, but largely ignored, Wall Street sideshow. Disgruntled investors would attend annual meetings to harangue executives, criticize strategies — and protest that their complaints were being ignored. One agitator appeared in face paint and a red nose after executives called him a clown.

Today, however, it seems that activists have captured the center ring and are directing the main event.

On Wednesday, shareholder advocates could claim one of their biggest prizes yet when Home Depot announced the resignation of its chairman and chief executive, Robert L. Nardelli, long a target of shareholder ire for his large compensation and the company's flagging stock price.

The main investor who pressed for the overthrow at Home Depot might at first glance seem an unlikely rebel: Ralph V. Whitworth, a lawyer educated at Georgetown and a former campaign worker for President Ronald Reagan who in December announced he had bought about $1 billion of the retailer's stock, or a 1.2 percent stake, through his fund, Relational Investors.

But the rapid success of Mr. Whitworth's campaign against the management and strategy of Home Depot demonstrates how thoroughly activists have moved into Wall Street's inner sanctum. Mr. Whitworth has said he still intended to nominate himself and at least one other candidate to Home Depot's board at its shareholder meeting in the spring.

"There's a lot more respect for investors like me now," said Mr. Whitworth, 51. "I still have to make threats, but now everyone wants to deal with us fast. They realize we've got real power and we're here to stay."

The shake-up at Home Depot may be just a taste of things to come as shareholders and management at a number of companies, including Brink's, the Borders Group and Applebee's International, square off for battle at annual meetings this spring.

As those fights begin, expect few clown noses.

DOJ_NMG_0112524

"Activist shareholders have a power and audience beyond what they've ever enjoyed," said Howard Steinberg, a lawyer who advises corporate boards and deal makers. "They're developing a credible track record, and as a result, more and more managers are forced to engage with them. Activists' time has come."

Since July, activists have pressed successfully to push out chief executives at Pfizer and Sovereign Bank. Institutional investors and mutual funds have set aside hundreds of millions of dollars to invest in underperforming companies with the intention of demanding new board seats or alternative strategies.

Much of that newfound influence is owed to recent legal changes and heightened attention to issues like executive compensation. But it also draws on the fact that many activists have now amassed the wealth, knowledge and networks critical for success.

"For years these guys were seen as politically motivated oddballs or annoying attention seekers," said Nell Minow, editor of the Corporate Library, a research group that rates corporate governance practices. "Now some of those same people control hundreds of millions of dollars and have been around longer than many C.E.O.'s"

Before the 1980s, much shareholder activism was directed by ideological agitators, including unions, religious organizations and populist figures like Ralph Nader, who bought shares in companies as platforms for urging social, environmental or political changes.

The United Shareholders Associations, which Mr. Whitworth helped found in 1986 with the corporate raider Boone Pickens, was one of the first major efforts to organize shareholder activists around profit-minded goals.

Every spring the group would select about 50 companies and begin asking embarrassing questions at shareholder meetings. In 1993, the last year of the group's operation, 25 of 43 of the companies, including I.B.M, reached agreements with Mr. Whitworth.

"The head of General Mills once called me a socialist," Mr. Whitworth said in an interview. "I told him I was the ultimate capitalist. Business people would return my calls for the first time, and it was giving me an entree into a world I otherwise couldn't access."

Foremost among the goals successfully sought by United Shareholders were regulatory changes that made it possible for dissidents to nominate only one or two directors to a board, rather than an entire slate.

By the mid-1990s, corporate raiders realized the rule offered a less expensive way to stage a takeover rather than buying a company outright. When the California Public Employees' Retirement System began looking for a fund that would use activism to increase returns in 1996, Mr. Whitworth and a colleague, David H. Batchelder, founded Relational Investors.

The fund today oversees about $7 billion, all invested in only nine companies that are chosen with an eye toward activist intervention. In most cases, Mr. Whitworth forces his way onto a company's board, either by threatening or staging a proxy fight. Investors say the fund has averaged a return of about 25 percent annually over the last nine years.

Activist shareholders like Relational were further aided by changes in the law. In particular, they say that regulations passed in 2004 requiring money managers and mutual funds to disclose how they vote in proxy elections have forced once-passive managers to become activists.

"There was a sense before that mutual funds in particular just voted with management," said Ann Yerger, executive director of the Council of Institutional Investors. "But post-Enron and Tyco, investors expect money managers to justify their votes now, and to be listening to anyone warning about dangers."

Moreover, money managers and hedge funds are beginning to advertise their activist intentions, bragging that aggressiveness gives them an edge. In November, the noted investor Robert A. Olstein announced formation of an activist fund.

"We want to have an edge," said Eric R. Heyman, co-manager of the new Olstein Strategic Opportunities Fund. "Our skill is approaching companies and persuading management to adopt certain decisions, sometimes aggressively, and that's why people invest with us."

Another important shift is a court ruling last year making it easier for shareholders to challenge directors nominated by companies.

"Shareholders' toolboxes are getting more and more robust every year," said Ms. Minow of the Corporate Library.

DOJ_NMG_0112525

Moreover, as the number of activist investors grows, a vast ad hoc network has formed that makes it more difficult for companies to win a fight. The universe of activist investors has expanded to include hedge funds like Pirate Capital, which is fighting to add its executives to the board of the security company Brink's, and investors like Carl C. Icahn, who failed to gain board seats after a public spat with Time Warner's chief executive, Richard D. Parsons.

When two activist investors, Pershing Square Capital Management and Nelson Peltz, bought large amounts of stock in Wendy's International in 2005, many other like-minded buyers jumped in, according to analysts.

As a result, the board had no choice but to accept activists' suggestions, said James V. Pickett, Wendy's chairman. Ultimately, three representatives of Mr. Peltz's fund joined the board.

"Most of the issues the activists raised at Wendy's were things we were already dealing with," Mr. Pickett said. "They just increased the intensity. But when they own that much of the company, you have to listen to them even if you don't want to."

For Mr. Whitworth, who has grown so wealthy that he once gave a charity $1 million in exchange for Paul McCartney's playing at his wife's 50th birthday party, that kind of access has increased his effectiveness, he says.

After forcing his way onto the board of Mattel, Mr. Whitworth was given a gold-plated Barbie in appreciation by other directors when he left.

But such shifts have also increased his ambitions.

"I was a firebrand; now I've mellowed a lot," he said. "But I'm still young. I look forward to helping a lot more companies become more efficient, whether they like it or not."

Nardelli's 'Severance' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

Few Home Depot shareholders are mourning the departure of Robert Nardelli as CEO this week, and we aren't about to defend his performance. But someone needs to rebut the claim, which is almost as rampant as the Schadenfreude at his fall, that Mr. Nardelli is getting a $210 million "severance" package as a reward for having failed.

"Seeing Red Over A Golden Parachute," declared the Washington Post, in a fairly typical headline. House Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank, who wants to turn executive pay into a Democratic campaign theme, piled on by claiming that "Mr. Nardelli's contribution to raising Home Depot's stock value consists of quitting and receiving hundreds of millions of dollars to do so."

The truth is that nearly all of that $210 million isn't severance at all but was part of Mr. Nardelli's original employment contract. In other words, it was part of the package that the Home Depot board offered to lure him in the first place. Keep in mind that when he was hired in 2000 Mr. Nardelli had been a star at General Electric, one of the three executives competing to succeed Jack Welch as that company's CEO. When he lost out to Jeff Immelt, Mr. Nardelli was a hot executive property in a world that isn't exactly full of them.

At the time, too, Home Depot was considered fortunate to get him. The retailer had been growing fast, and in 2000 its shares were near the stratosphere like just about everyone else's at the top of the bubble. The board wanted a CEO who could keep les bon temps rolling, and so it offered Mr. Nardelli a big chunk of shareholder wealth to take the job. And, by the way, the terms were disclosed in the annual Home Depot proxy.

That contract can't be abrogated now simply because the board has concluded it made a mistake. Of that $210 million figure, more than $180 million is owed to Mr. Nardelli as part of his original job offer. That includes $77 million in unvested deferred stock awards, another $44 million in vested deferred shares, $32 million in retirement benefits and $9 million in earned bonuses. Even a $20 million cash payment upon termination was part of his original contract.

The bulk of what could fairly be called "severance" is $18 million in "miscellaneous benefits" that the company plans to disclose in more detail in its 8-K filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission next week. But even that was negotiated in return for Mr. Nardelli signing a non-compete agreement and a four-year pledge not to solicit Home Depot employees or customers. In other words, this is a fairly standard termination deal to protect the company's competitive interests.

DOJ_NMG_0112526

We recount all this because it illustrates a reality of corporate compensation too often ignored amid the furor over CEO pay: Top executive talent is hard to find, and boards are willing to pay a premium to get it. Their hiring decisions don't always work out -- whose do? -- but they'll pay a lot to reduce that risk.

This may be unpleasant for reporters and other egalitarians to hear, but it's a fact of the marketplace. Public-company CEOs face the harshest scrutiny because their pay packages are disclosed, but some of the largest compensation deals these days are being offered by private-equity recruiters. We doubt Henry Kravis or the Carlyle Group are parting with big chunks of their equity because they don't think their CEO hires are worth it.

Home Depot's flat share price aside, one of Mr. Nardelli's flaws was a tin ear for the new politics of CEO pay. The AFL-CIO thinks it has found a populist issue, and its political allies in Congress and at state pension funds are picking up the envy theme as a prelude to 2008. Mr. Nardelli embarrassed the Home Depot board that hired him by letting himself become a target of this campaign, compounding the error by trying to avoid questions at last year's annual shareholder meeting.

It also didn't help Mr. Nardelli that one of the Home Depot directors who hired him is Ken Langone, who also helped to set Dick Grasso's pay at the New York Stock Exchange. This makes the executive "greed" theme music even more fun to play. We're not sure where this latest populist campaign is headed, but the beginning of wisdom would be for the tub-thumpers to stop confusing "severance" with hiring pay.

One Bad Apple (WP)

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

THE SCANDAL at Apple Computer presents a dilemma with no easy solution. On the one hand, the company has changed its story on its use of manipulated stock options, which boosted executive salaries at the expense of shareholders, and Apple still appears to be bending over backward to protect Steve Jobs, its storied chief executive. On the other hand, if Apple's board were to come clean and oust Mr. Jobs, the shareholders would be punished yet again, since Apple is worth more with him than without him. Or, to put the dilemma a little differently: It doesn't seem right to let an executive float above corporate governance rules, but it seems equally perverse to enforce those rules if doing so would damage the investors for whom such rules exist in the first place.

That said, it would be easier to sympathize with Apple's directors if they described this dilemma honestly. Instead, they have dissembled. In October a special committee of the company's board, chaired by former vice president Al Gore, minimized Mr. Jobs's involvement in the granting of backdated stock options -- ones whose issue date is chosen retrospectively and designed to maximize their value to executives. But last week the company offered a subtly different account, explaining that Mr. Jobs had been personally aware of such grants and may have recommended the choice of dates in some cases. Moreover, Apple also disclosed that Mr. Jobs himself had received a large helping of backdated options. The company's documents stated that this award had occurred at a special board meeting. Apple now says that this meeting did not happen.

Apple argues that Mr. Jobs never benefited from his options grant. It has not disclosed sufficient information to determine whether this is true. The options were later swapped for restricted stock that was apparently worth considerably less -- perhaps this was Mr. Jobs's way of refunding the company. But neither he nor Apple has said as much. So for the moment analysts are left wondering why, even if Mr. Jobs deserves the chance to stay on, he does not explicitly reimburse shareholders.

The grant to Mr. Jobs, and the fictitious board meeting, both date from 2001 -- the year before a wave of corporate scandals drove the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate governance reform through Congress. Like the options backdating scandals at more than 100 other companies, they serve as a reminder of the rule-bending free-for-all that made reform necessary. Half a decade later, some business lobbyists are aiming to roll back Sarbanes-Oxley, and Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. has made comments that could signal the administration's sympathy for that agenda. The stench from Apple shows the danger of a return to the old system.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutors Cite More Favors By Lawmaker (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0112527

By Susan Schmidt

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Federal prosecutors seeking a stiff prison sentence for former Ohio congressman Robert W. Ney have listed previously undisclosed favors that he and his staff provided to clients of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, including two Russian energy executives who have been linked to former House majority leader Tom DeLay.

Ney pleaded guilty in October to conspiracy, admitting that he performed official acts for lobbyists in exchange for campaign contributions, expensive meals, luxury travel and skybox sports tickets. He is to be sentenced Jan. 19.

The Republican congressman and his staff offered to aid Abramoff's clients in the summer of 2003 as Ney prepared for a trip to Russia, according to newly released e-mails attached to a Justice Department filing in federal court late Wednesday. Abramoff's lobbying team got the congressman to intervene with the U.S. Consulate in Moscow to help resolve a passport issue for the daughter of Abramoff client Alexander Koulakovsky, the e-mails show.

Koulakovsky and his business partner, Marina Nevskaya, hired Abramoff to help them arrange meetings with DeLay and to lobby for federal aid to their businesses. The Russian executives helped pay for a trip to Moscow taken by DeLay, his wife and aides in 1997.

A charity sponsored by DeLay received a $1 million check from a London law firm linked to the two. Former charity officials told The Washington Post last year the donation originated with Russian oil and gas executives, and was intended to influence DeLay's vote on an issue affecting the Russian economy.

Ney's chief of staff messaged an Abramoff colleague on July 28, 2003, noting that Ney's former chief of staff, Neil Volz -- who had joined Abramoff's firm -- had told them of the coming trip to Russia. "Anything we can do?" the e-mail asked.

Abramoff's team seized the chance, asking Ney to press consular officials on the passport issue, according to an e-mail that Volz sent to Abramoff. Embassy officials had their own interests in seeing the congressman -- they wanted Ney to meet Mikhail Khodorkovsky, a post-Soviet-era energy tycoon then under pressure from President Vladimir Putin. Ney obliged.

"Bob did not quid pro quo or anything, but decided to become a little more flexible on meeting with Khodorkovsky . . . and they became more flexible on the passport . . . Bob suggested they would have given him the passport ultimately -- no matter what, so he suggested that we just let Alexander and Marina know the consulate gave him the passport because a member of Congress asked for it," wrote Volz, who has also pleaded guilty in the corruption probe.

Ney has acknowledged that shortly after his return from that trip, Volz treated him and a staffer to a stay at a luxury hotel in Lake George, N.Y.

Ex Mass. House Speaker Indicted (AP)

By Denise Lavoie, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 5, 2007

(AP) - BOSTON-A former Massachusetts House speaker accused of lying during his testimony in a voting rights lawsuit plans to plead guilty Friday to obstruction of justice, a person familiar with the agreement said Thursday.

The lawsuit had claimed that a 2001 state law that redrew legislative district boundaries discriminated against minorities in Boston while protecting incumbents, including the now-former House speaker, Thomas Finneran.

Finneran's trial on perjury and obstruction of justice charges had been scheduled to begin Jan. 16.

Under the plea deal, Finneran won't face prison time, and federal prosecutors will drop the three perjury counts, the person familiar with the deal told The Associated Press. He will serve probation, pay a fine and agree not to seek political office for five years.

Finneran, 56, has agreed to admit to some, but not all, of the allegations in the obstruction charge, which accuses him of obstructing justice by lying during the trial and in a deposition, according to the person, who asked not to be identified because the deal has not yet been finalized in court.

During his eight years as speaker, Finneran was considered the state's most powerful lawmaker. Known for his authoritarian style, he was once dubbed "King Tom" for pushing through a rules change that eliminated term limits for House speakers.

DOJ_NMG_0112528

He resigned as speaker in September 2004 and was indicted nine months later on charges that he lied under oath about his role in the state's legislative redistricting. The testimony was before a federal appeals court in 2003 in the voting rights lawsuit brought by a coalition of minority groups.

Separately, Finneran still faces a possible suspension of his law license or disbarment by the state Board of Bar Overseers.

Finneran Faces Loss Of State Pension (BOS)

By Jonathan Saltzman, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 5, 2007

As former House speaker Thomas M. Finneran heads this morning to federal court, where he is expected to plead guilty to obstruction of justice, he faces the almost certain loss of his $30,000-a-year pension because of a decision last year by the state Supreme Judicial Court.

The state's highest court ruled unanimously in March that Boston Juvenile Court Clerk-Magistrate John P. Bulger forfeited his pension when he admitted that he lied to two federal grand juries investigating the disappearance of his brother, fugitive mobster James J. "Whitey" Bulger.

Alden Bianchi, cochairman of a Boston Bar Association committee on pensions, said Finneran's case appears to be a more obvious violation of the Massachusetts law that bars employees from receiving a pension if convicted of a "criminal offense involving violation of the laws applicable to his office or position."

"If you're looking for an example of a clear-cut case, this does seem to be one," said Bianchi, given that Finneran's alleged misdeeds appear to have been directly related to his job.

Legal specialists said Finneran could also face a one-year suspension of his license to practice law.

Once the most powerful Democrat on Beacon Hill, Finneran agreed to plead guilty this morning before US District Judge Richard G. Stearns in exchange for federal prosecutors dropping three perjury charges against him, two sources familiar with the deal told the Globe on Wednesday.

Finneran, who faced 16 to 21 months in prison if convicted on all counts, is expected to serve a term of unsupervised probation and pay a fine to end the protracted legal battle over charges that he misrepresented his role in the creation of a legislative redistricting plan that siphoned voting strength from Boston's blacks and Hispanics.

The case stemmed from his November 2003 testimony in a civil suit brought by the Black Political Caucus and other voting-rights groups that sought to overturn the House's 2001 redistricting plan on grounds it was unfair to minority voters.

Finneran, 56, who has been president of the Massachusetts Biotechnology Council since he left the State House in 2004, also agreed not to seek political office for five years, according to the sources.

Alison Mitchell, spokeswoman for state Treasurer Timothy P. Cahill, who chairs the Retirement Board, said Finneran receives $30,909 a year through his public pension. But she declined to comment about whether he is in danger of losing it until the board reviews the matter, as early as Jan. 25.

The SJC's ruling in the John Bulger case offers him little hope, however.

In that decision, the court said Whitey Bulger's youngest brother violated the "fundamental tenets" of his office when he committed perjury and obstruction of justice even though his lawyers had argued that he acted out of "family loyalty" and his misdeeds were unrelated to his job.

He pleaded guilty in 2003 to two counts of perjury and two counts of obstruction of justice and was sentenced to six months in federal prison. Federal authorities said he falsely testified about contact with his brother, Whitey Bulger.

The SJC concluded that John Bulger's crimes could not be separated from the nature of his work , where duties include administering an oath requiring witnesses to testify truthfully.

Finneran's alleged offenses stemmed directly from his job as House speaker and his testimony in the civil suit on his role in the redistricting plan. A three-judge panel threw out the plan in 2004 and sharply rebuked Finneran in a footnote to the decision, strongly implying that he misled the court when he testified that he had little involvement in the drawing of the district lines. Federal prosecutors charged Finneran in June 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0112529

Bianchi said retired state employees have lost their pensions under the law after being convicted of felonies, so he considered it "very likely" that Finneran will lose his. His prominence will only increase the likelihood, he said, given that "regulators will be under a great deal of pressure with this one not to let it slide."

Daniel C. Crane, the state's former bar counsel, said a lawyer's conviction for a felony or misdemeanor results in an automatic referral to the Board of Bar Overseers. The board then decides what discipline is appropriate, a ruling often appealed to the state Supreme Judicial Court.

Speaking generally, Crane said a conviction for obstruction of justice would probably lead to a suspension for at least a year.

Finneran's defense lawyers, Richard Egbert and Thomas Drechsler, separately declined to comment yesterday.

Get Out Of Jail - But Not For Free: Finneran Deal May KO Job, Pension, Law Career (BOSH)

By Dave Wedge, Boston Herald Chief Enterprise Reporter

Boston Herald, January 5, 2007

Disgraced former House Speaker Tom Finneran's expected guilty plea to obstruction of justice charges today will keep him out of jail but has jeopardized his job, pension and future as an attorney.

Sources told the Herald Finneran will leave his $500,000-a-year post at the Massachusetts Biotechnology Council as a result of his pending felony conviction. It was unclear last night whether Finneran will resign or be forced out of the post.

MBC officials declined comment and Finneran did not return repeated calls. His attorney, Richard Egbert, also declined comment.

Under a deal with federal prosecutors, Finneran will be fined and put on probation but will serve no prison time. Prosecutors will also refer Finneran to the Massachusetts Board of Bar Overseers, which will disbar or suspend him from practicing law, a source said.

A felony conviction also means Finneran would lose his $2,575-a-month state pension, which he earned through 26 years of public service. Under state law, a government employee's pension must be cut off if he is convicted of a felony connected to his job. Finneran's potential conviction stems from misleading testimony he gave in a civil trial over the drawing up of legislative districts in 2001 while he was House speaker.

Sources close to the ex-speaker said his decision to plead guilty was made in part to spare embarrassment, with a parade of as many as 40 lawmakers slated to testify. Many had already received subpoenas, including his top aide Charles Rasmussen, sources said.

Finneran, who is expected to land a plum talk-show host gig, could continue lobbying since there are no state laws barring convicted felons from being registered lobbyists, officials said.

The redistricting lawsuit was filed by voting-rights groups who claimed that legislative districts were being illegally drawn up along racial lines. Avi Green, director of MassVote, which was one of the plaintiffs in the suit, said Finneran's guilty plea "sends a message."

"You can't be above any law and that includes the voting-rights laws, no matter who you are. Even if you're the speaker of the House," Green said. "I hope that the legislators on Beacon Hill will look at what happened here and make sure it never happens again."

Former State Official Sentenced To 30 Months In Prison (AP)

By Jan Dennis

AP, January 5, 2007

PEORIA, Ill. - A former high-ranking Illinois Secretary of State official was sentenced Thursday to 30 months in prison for helping three janitors pocket nearly $200,000 in state pay for work they didn't do.

Cecil Turner, 60, is the former director of the secretary of state's physical services division. He was convicted in September of four federal counts of wire fraud for allegedly helping the janitors hide the six-year scheme, and two counts of lying to investigators.

Turner also was ordered to pay more than $49,000 in restitution to the state for money the janitors pocketed.

Most of the money will come from pension contributions Turner was ordered to turn over to the court. Turner lost his state pension after the conviction, but will be refunded nearly $46,000 that he contributed to his account.

Turner, of Springfield, showed no emotion as the sentence was handed down by U.S. District Judge Joe B. McDade. But in a tearful statement before sentencing, he denied any part in the scheme.

Turner said he worked hard to turn his life around and help his family and community after serving a year in prison 30 years ago in a scheme in which veterans' benefit checks were stolen from the postal service.

"I would never jeopardize all of that, especially under these circumstances ... Your honor, I did not do this. I swear to you I did not do this," Turner said, his voice shaking with emotion.

Turner's sentence was seven months less than the range of 37 to 46 months recommended in a pre-sentence report.

McDade said he trimmed the federal term based on an inch-thick stack of letters he received citing Turner's long history of work for youth, his neighborhood and community.

But McDade said he also needed to send a message to others in state government that corruption won't be tolerated.

"They must be aware that it's wrong, and when they're caught, they're not going to be able to rely on their good works and their white-collar station," McDade said.

Turner, free on bond, was ordered to report to prison by Feb. 7.

U.S. Assistant District Attorney Patrick Chesley said outside court he was disappointed with the lighter sentence, but called it substantial enough to help chip away at corruption in state government.

"This is a message to the public and to our employees that this administration takes unacceptable conduct very seriously, and if you're caught you pay a price," said Dave Druker, spokesman for Secretary of State Jesse White.

Defense attorney Michael Metnick had sought a 24-month prison sentence for Turner, saying he'd led an "exemplary, outstanding life" since he was jailed three decades ago.

"You hope for the best and expect the worst, although this wasn't the worst, obviously," Metnick said outside court.

Federal prosecutors claimed Turner helped the janitors pocket unearned state pay in exchange for special treatment by city trash collectors in his Springfield neighborhood.

Turner received no financial kickbacks, but aided in the scheme because one of the janitors - Dana Dinora - also worked for Springfield's public works department. He allegedly arranged quick pickups of junk ranging from water heaters to a dog house for Turner and his neighbors, prosecutors said.

Defense attorneys maintained Turner was unaware of the payroll scam they allege was orchestrated by Dinora, one of three former janitors who pleaded guilty in the scheme and agreed to cooperate in the case against Turner.

Metnick called Dinora a con man with a long record of abusing time off. Metnick said Dinora manipulated Turner and took advantage of his lack of experience after White appointed Turner to the $98,000-a-year job in 1999.

McDade called Turner "a good man," but said he traded taxpayer dollars and the public trust for "the power and the appearance of power that came from being able to call someone and get something done."

"This is corruption ... I don't care what kind of perfume you put on it," the judge said.

Turner and the janitors were fired after an investigation uncovered the scheme in 2005. Turner was among 20 department heads in the secretary of state's office overseeing maintenance and janitorial services in state offices, including the Capitol.

Dinora, 53, of Springfield, and two other former janitors - David Medvesek, 57, of Springfield, and Steven Boyce, 58, of Chatham - are scheduled to be sentenced Jan. 25 in federal court in Peoria.

Ad Man Sentenced For Pay-to-play (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 5, 2007

The former CEO of an advertising company was sentenced yesterday to 51/2 months in a halfway house for his role in a pay-to-play scheme at Philadelphia International Airport.

Joseph Evans, who was chief executive officer of Sky Sites Inc., a subsidiary of JCDecaux SA, a French-based media company that supplied indoor, backlit advertising displays to airports, will also serve 51/2 months of home detention.

DOJ_NMG_0112531

Evans pleaded guilty to misappropriating company funds to make a political contribution. Three codefendants pleaded guilty to funneling $30,000 in campaign contributions to Mayor Street's 2003 reelection campaign to help secure a contract at Philadelphia International Airport.

In Pennsylvania, corporations are barred from making political contributions.

"In a city where recent events have shown that such subversion is all too common, this is no small matter," prosecutors Joan L. Markman and Joan E. Burnes said in a court filing.

Neither the mayor nor any other public official has been accused of wrongdoing.

The case is part of a continuing FBI investigation into corruption at Philadelphia International Airport and is related to federal authorities' City Hall probe.

In a filing, defense lawyers described Evans as "a fundamentally good and kind man who erred gravely."

"Mr. Evans was motivated solely by a misguided desire to promote Sky Sites and JCDecaux - and did not act for personal gain or profit in any way," wrote the lawyers, David M. Howard and Cheryl A. Krause.

Codefendants Terry Crockett, an architectural consultant, and Eric Selby were sentenced to probation.

Joseph Moderski of Bryn Mawr, a marketing consultant, is to be sentenced in March.

Exec In Pay-to-play Scam Gets Probation (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 5, 2007

In the late 1990s, Joseph Evans was the chief executive of a growing company with advertising contracts at 65 airports in 50 states and a staff of more than 50.

Then, in 2000, he became ensnared in a pay-to-play scheme at Philadelphia International Airport, a "completely misguided attempt" he thought would help his company, he wrote to a federal judge last month.

As CEO of Sky Sites, a unit of the French media giant JC Decaux, Evans approved a sham bonus letter to a consultant to disguise an illegal corporate campaign contribution.

The company then cut a $10,000 check to the consultant, Joseph C. Moderski, who later made a donation to Mayor Street's campaign committee.

Neither Decaux nor Street was charged with any wrongdoing in the case.

Evans, who pleaded guilty to mail fraud last September, was sentenced yesterday by U.S. District Judge James T. Giles to five years' probation on condition that he serve the first 11 months of probation split between time in a community confinement center and his home, tethered to a monitoring device.

He also was fined $10,000, and ordered to repay Decaux $10,000 (which he already has) and perform 100 hours of community service.

Giles said Evans should use the community service to counsel others who might contemplate similar conduct.

"It gives you an opportunity to use the wisdom you've come to learn in a hard way to perpetuate that lesson," Giles said. "There are those who will now learn of your predicament."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Joan Markman and Evans' attorney, Cheryl Krause, said they were satisfied with the sentence. Ron Levine, and attorney for Decaux, declined comment.

Evans, 51, could have been sent to prison for 10 to 16 months under sentencing guidelines.

He lives in Oyster Bay, N.Y., with his wife and children and now runs his own business, training dogs to chase geese off fields, racetracks and other properties.

Evans pleaded guilty to a fraud charge in connection with the fake bonus paid to Moderski. Moderski sought the money from Sky Sites in 2000 so he could donate it to Street's campaign, the feds said.

Moderski pleaded guilty to conspiracy and fraud charges last September and is to be sentenced in March.

Two other businessmen were sentenced to probation last October for their roles in the scheme.

The idea behind the scheme was to curry favor with city officials to extend Sky Sites' advertising contract for terminals A-E at Philly International. The contract was later awarded to Clear Channel.

DOJ_NMG_0112532

Judge Rejects Herrera Delay (LVRJ)

By Lisa Kim Bach, REVIEW-JOURNAL

Las Vegas Review-Journal, January 5, 2007

Ex-commissioner must surrender on Jan. 12

U.S. District Judge Larry Hicks on Wednesday refused a request to push back the surrender date of former Clark County Commissioner Dario Herrera, who in August was convicted of charges stemming from political corruption.

"The grounds argued in support of an extension of Herrera's surrender are founded upon arguments of financial hardship and inconvenience," Hicks wrote in a court order. "Given the severity of the defendants's criminal offenses and a surrender date that was more than abundant to prepare for incarceration, the motion is denied."

Hicks said Herrera is still expected to surrender to federal authorities on or before noon on Jan. 12.

In December, Herrera's counsel asked for a 30-day extension so Herrera could help business associate Jonathan Stern with completion of construction for Loft 5, an $80 million residential project that's had unforeseen delays.

The request was opposed by prosecutors, who stressed that surrender is not a matter of convenience for anyone.

Herrera's felony convictions stem from a 2003 indictment that charged he, along with former Clark County commissioners Mary Kincaid-Chauncey, Erin Kenny and Lance Malone, accepted cash bribes from former strip club owner Michael Galardi.

Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey were convicted in May of wire fraud and extortion.

Malone has entered a guilty plea but has not been sentenced. Kenny and Galardi, who both testified as government witnesses, also have yet to be sentenced.

Convicted Commissioner In Las Vegas Can't Delay Prison Date (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

LAS VEGAS (AP) - A former Clark County Commissioner lost a bid to postpone reporting to federal prison to serve his sentence on political corruption charges.

Dario Herrera, 33, will be expected to surrender to federal authorities before noon Jan. 12 to serve four years and two months in federal prison, U.S. District Judge Larry Hicks said in an order issued Wednesday.

Hicks cited "the severity of the defendants's criminal offenses" and said the 20 weeks he granted between Herrera's sentencing in August and surrender "was more than abundant to prepare for incarceration."

Herrera's lawyers asked the judge last month to push back Herrera's surrender date to Feb. 12, saying Herrera needed to help a business associate complete construction of an $80 million residential project.

A former commission colleague, Mary Kincaid-Chauncey, 68, also is due to surrender Jan. 12 to serve 30 months in prison. Kincaid-Chauncey has not sought to delay her surrender.

The two were convicted in May of conspiracy, fraud and extortion. Two other former commissioners - Lance Malone and Erin Kenny - also face sentencing after pleading guilty to taking cash and campaign contributions from Michael Galardi, the owner of three southern Nevada strip clubs.

Galardi also pleaded guilty and is scheduled for sentencing Monday. Malone is set for sentencing Jan. 16. Kenny is due for sentencing March 6.

Kopp Jurors Questioned On Abortion (NSDY/AP)

By Carolyn Thompson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 5, 2007

BUFFALO, N.Y. -- Jury selection began Thursday in the federal trial of an anti-abortion extremist who shot and killed an abortion provider, on a charge that could keep him behind bars forever.

The roughly 100 people in the jury pool were questioned about their views on abortion and their knowledge of the the 1998 sniper slaying of Dr. Barnett Slepian. They filled out questionnaires that Kopp, who is representing himself, and prosecutors will use to narrow the field.

DOJ_NMG_0112533

James Kopp already is serving a 25-year-to-life state sentence after being convicted of second-degree murder. Federal prosecutors contend that the shooting also violated the 1994 Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act.

Kopp, 52, also is charged with using a firearm during a killing, which carries a maximum sentence of life without parole. The clinic-access count carries a maximum life sentence.

Under his current state conviction, Kopp will be eligible for release when he is in his 70s.

Slepian was shot with a high-powered rifle as he stood in the kitchen of his suburban Amherst home after returning from a memorial service for his father. His wife and their sons were home at the time.

Kopp admitted firing the fatal shot from the woods outside but said he meant only to wound the doctor to stop him from performing any more abortions. He is suspected in four nonfatal shootings of doctors in Rochester and Canada during the decade before Slepian's death.

Authorities hunted 2 1/2 years for Kopp after the shooting, adding him to the FBI's list of the Ten Most Wanted fugitives in June 1999. He was captured in Dinan, France, in March 2001 and convicted two years later on the state charges of second-degree murder.

After parting ways with a number of lawyers, Kopp has been preparing his defense in the federal case from the Niagara County jail. Jury selection was expected to take several days, and opening statements were expected to begin Tuesday.

Since Slepian's shooting, extreme violence against U.S. abortion clinics and providers has steadily waned, according to the National Abortion Federation.

Nab 23 In Mortgage Con (NYDN)

New York Daily News, January 5, 2007

Twenty-three brokers, appraisers and bankers were indicted yesterday in a $3.5 million scheme to dupe banks and other lenders by recruiting "straw" buyers to fill out bogus mortgage and loan applications, Manhattan federal prosecutors said.

Brooklyn brokerages AGA Capital NY, Northside Capital and its successor Lending Universe Corp. earned $4 million in commissions between 2004 and 2006 brokering some 1,000 mortgages and home equity loans valued at $200 million, prosecutors say. The actual losses to banks and other lenders was pegged at $3.5million.

Prosecutors say the defendants identified properties in New York and New Jersey and then purchased them entirely through mortgages or home equity loans.

Money was paid to straw buyers who agreed to fill out phony applications that included misleading information about their income, employment and residence.

Eighteen defendants were arrested yesterday by agents from the FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Four more are expected to surrender today and one is a fugitive.

Thomas Zambito

FEDS NAB BROKERS IN FRAUD SCHEME (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, January 5, 2007

January 5, 2007 -- A ring of Russian mortgage fraudsters brokered $200 million in bogus home loans using phony buyers and identity theft, and pocketed more than $4 million in ill-gotten commissions, prosecutors charged yesterday.

The feds nabbed 18 brokers, appraisers and bank employees on fraud charges for ripping off approximately $3.5 million from banks by doctoring mortgage and home-equity loan applications on at least 1,000 properties around the city, New Jersey and elsewhere.

Operating out of AGA Capital, a Brooklyn mortgage brokerage firm, the ring paid straw buyers to pose as legitimate loan applicants, according to an indictment that charges a total of 23 people, some of whom were not yet in custody yesterday.

AGA Brokers Aleksander "Shorty" Lipkin, Igor "Ryzhiy" Mishelevich, Alex "Lyosha" Gorvits and several others are accused of supervising the scheme to submit fraudulent loan applications from 2004 to 2006.

The brokers pocketed between 2 percent and 4 percent in commissions on each sale - to the tune of more than $4 million, the feds alleged.

DOJ_NMG_0112534

In some cases, the ring "stole the identities of persons who fit a certain financial profile and submitted loan applications on behalf of these persons without their knowledge," court papers said.

Profits were jacked-up by obtaining artificially inflated appraisals that made it seem as though the homes were worth more than their actual sales prices.

The "buyers" then defaulted on their loans, forcing banks and other lending institutions to either foreclose on the properties or re-purchase the homes at rock-bottom prices, according to the indictment.

The ring members pleaded not guilty to bank and wire fraud charges at an arraignment in Manhattan federal court and were released on bail.

Feds: We Have Scammers Behind Millions In Fraudulent Loans (WNBC)

WNBC-TV, January 5, 2007

An alleged ring of mortgage scammers blamed for $200 million dollars in fraudulent home loans in New York and New Jersey was shut down Thursday by federal authorities.

FBI agents and NYPD detectives escorted the suspects to Federal District Court in Lower Manhattan.

Manhattan federal prosecutors charged that twenty-three people -- many of them Russian nationals -- cheated banks and financial institutions of at least $3.5 million in the two-year-old scheme.

By using straw buyers, hiding their own interest in the properties, submitting fake documentation, obtaining inflated appraisals and providing false financial information, the alleged scammers obtained the loans, according to an indictment brought by the United States Attorney of the Southern District of New York. The ring, which included brokers, appraisers and bank employees, allegedly orchestrated more than 1,000 home equity loans and home mortgages, said the U.S. Attorney.

The charges against the suspects include conspiracy to commit bank and wire fraud. Among the defendants are brokers and processors from AGA Capital NY, Inc. (which changed its name to Lending Universe Corporation) and Northside Capital NY, Inc., Brooklyn-based mortgage brokerages.

This case was investigated by the The Eurasian Organized Crime Task Force, a joint effort by FBI agents and NYPD detectives, and the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency.

Former Benton County Defense Lawyer Enters Plea In Bribery Case (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

YAKIMA, Wash. -- A lawyer accused of taking thousands of dollars from a Kennewick youth program has pleaded innocent to federal bribery and conspiracy charges.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Michael Leavitt entered a not guilty plea for Jeff L. Finney, of Benton City, and allowed the former defense lawyer to remain free without bond during an initial court appearance Wednesday.

Finney, 50, is charged with one count of bribery and one count of conspiracy to aid and abet in the theft of at least $20,000. Conviction on each charge carries a sentence of up to 10 years in prison and $250,000 in fines.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Greg Shogren said Finney has cooperated for months with the investigation in the case, which the Tri-City Herald reported involves between $50,000 to $140,000 missing from the city of Kennewick's Home Base youth program.

Finney was a lawyer on contract to Benton County defending people charged in county District Court when he allegedly stole money in 2005 that defendants donated to the youth program in exchange for promises of reduced or dismissed charges.

A yearlong FBI investigation focused on Finney and Tyler M. Morris, 36, a former assistant city prosecutor for Kennewick.

Finney and Morris, of Walla Walla, lost their jobs after the newspaper published stories about the missing money. Morris has yet to appear in federal court on similar federal charges.

The Herald discovered that in some cases criminal charges were dismissed or reduced for defendants, but their cash donations, which had been encouraged by Finney and Morris as a way to resolve the cases, didn't make it to the city's Home Base account.

The stories also prompted the cities of Kennewick, Richland, Pasco and West Richland to cancel their own versions of dollars-for-deals programs.

DOJ_NMG_0112535

Ex-health Care Company President Pleads Guilty To Medicare Fraud (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

DETROIT (AP) — The former owner of a Michigan health care company pleaded guilty to federal charges of stealing nearly $800,000 by fraudulently billing Medicare.

Iftakhar Khan, 59, of Bloomfield Hills and his brother were indicted in 2003. They were charged with mail, wire and health care fraud.

Amjad Khan, of Troy, pleaded guilty in August.

Iftakhar Khan pleaded guilty Thursday before U.S. District Judge Nancy Edmunds. He faces up to 30 months in prison at a sentencing hearing set for May 3, U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said.

He was president of Livonia-based Michigan Rehabilitation and Pain Management. The company closed after the FBI and other agencies raided it in 2000.

Amjad Khan operated Warren-based American Home Health Care, which also closed.

The 2003 indictment accused the brothers of bilking Medicare of at least $2 million from 1995 to 1999. It said they sought reimbursement for their wives, who were falsely listed as company executives.

The brothers also were accused of billing Medicare for employees who were hired to provide gifts to doctors to drum up business.

Former Jackson County Executive Charged In Mortgage Fraud Case (AP)

By David Twiddy

AP, January 5, 2007

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - Former Jackson County Executive Katheryn Shields and her husband were indicted Thursday on federal charges of taking part in a mortgage fraud scheme.

A grand jury charged Shields, 60, and her husband, attorney Philip Cardarella, 59, and nine other people with one count each of conspiracy and 11 counts each of wire fraud.

Federal prosecutors allege that the couple were approached by a group of individuals last fall who offered to sell their home, which was listed at $699,950, for $1.2 million.

The couple was to receive $707,000 of that amount, the remainder being split among other co-defendants and explained to lenders as a "management fee." To get the mortgage approved, the defendants allegedly provided lenders with fraudulent financial information and inflated property appraisals.

Officials said the FBI stopped the transaction from going through.

"This case represents another tragic example of intelligent individuals, including lawyers and prominent elected officials, thumbing their noses at the law in the pursuit of quick and easy cash," U.S. Attorney Bradley Schlozman said during a news conference Thursday evening.

Meeting with reporters after Schlozman's conference, Shields and her husband denied being part of a conspiracy, saying they had simply tried to sell their house, which had been on the market for 18 months.

"There's nothing illegal about selling your home for more than you list for it," said the couple's attorney, Curtis Woods.

The couple said their signatures were forged on a real estate sales contract. Cardarella also said he knew only a few of the other defendants and that Shields knew none of them.

They also claimed there was a political motive behind the indictment. Shields has survived more than three years of fruitless federal investigations into her work as the county's highest elected official, and the indictment came the day before she planned to file to run for Kansas City mayor - a decision she said she will not change.

"I think I've been subjected for the last three-plus years to political terrorism and I will not give in to political terrorism," Shields said.

Schlozman denied a political agenda: "That never entered into it."

Cardarella and Woods said they demanded Thursday morning to testify before the grand jury, but that Schlozman never got back to them. He said he left a phone message but they never got back to him.

DOJ_NMG_0112536

The other defendants include James E. Coleman, 58; Raymond W. Zwego Jr., 58; and James R. Rhoades, 48, all of Kansas City; Larry Barshaw, 56, and Linda M. Thompson-Barshaw, 57, both of Kansas City, Kan.; Monty J. Kinman, 25, of Overland Park, Kan.; Rick A. Peterson, 32, of Lenexa, Kan.; Jeremy Plagman, 29, of Lee's Summit; and Michael Rodd, 52, of Olathe, Kan.

U.S. Death Sentences Drop To 30-year Low (AP)

By Robert Tanner

AP, January 5, 2007

The number of death sentences handed out in the United States dropped in 2006 to the lowest level since capital punishment was reinstated 30 years ago, reflecting what some experts say is a growing fear that the criminal justice system will make a tragic and irreversible mistake.

Executions fell, too, to the fewest in a decade.

"The death penalty is on the defensive," said Richard Dieter, director of the Death Penalty Information Center, a Washington organization that looks at problems with the capital punishment system.

Death sentences fell in 2006 to 114 or fewer, according to an estimate from the group. That is down from 128 in 2005, and even lower than the 137 sentences the year after the U.S. Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty in 1976. It is also down sharply from the high of 317 in 1996.

A total of 53 executions were carried out in 2006, down from 60 in 2005. Executions over the past three decades peaked at 98 in 1999.

Among the many causes given by prosecutors, lawyers and death penalty critics: the passage of more state laws that allow juries to impose life without parole; an overall drop in violent crime; and a reluctance among some authorities to pursue the death penalty because of the high costs of prosecuting a capital case.

But above all, many said, is the possibility of a mistake, made dramatically clear in recent years. Since the death penalty was reinstated, 123 people have been freed from death row after significant questions were raised about their convictions — 14 of them through DNA testing, according to the Death Penalty Information Center.

"The fact is they've gotten a lot of the wrong guys," said Deborah Fleischaker, director of the American Bar Association's Death Penalty Moratorium Implementation Project. "There's no question that has, in the public, created a lot of doubt about how the death penalty is working."

The turn away from the ultimate punishment also reflects a changing sentiment among juries and prosecutors, too, said Arthur Green, a prosecutor in Bessemer, Ala., outside of Birmingham. He said he considers the risk of executing an innocent person in deciding whether to pursue the death penalty.

"That's one reason I don't do it, except in very, very rare circumstances — one, that I'm convinced he or she did it, and number two, it's a horrible crime," Green said. He has sought and won two capital cases since becoming district attorney in 2001.

Thirty-seven of the 38 states that have the death penalty on their books now also allow for life without parole. Texas enacted such a law in 2005. Life-without-parole laws give another option to jurors who fear that the death penalty is the only way to keep a killer from getting out on the streets again.

The death penalty has also received more scrutiny from lawmakers around the country and the courts.

Illinois is in the seventh year of its moratorium on executions, and executions are effectively halted in New York because of a 2004 court ruling.

Also, questions about whether lethal injection is inhumane have put executions on hold in nine states — Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, Ohio and South Dakota.

This week in New Jersey, a special commission recommended that the state become the first to abolish the death penalty legislatively since 1976, citing "increasing evidence that the death penalty is inconsistent with evolving standards of decency."

Backers of capital punishment say support for the death penalty remains strong, despite the drop-off in death sentences.

DOJ_NMG_0112537

"It's a refinement. I don't think it's an abandonment of the death penalty, but a recognition that the death penalty should be reserved for the worst of the worst," said Joshua Marquis, district attorney in Clatsop County, Ore., and a vice president of the National District Attorneys Association.

"From prosecutors, there's a more discriminating attitude about which cases to bring," he said. "Juries have been much more picky about allocating the death penalty and I think that's an appropriate thing to do."

A Gallup poll in May found that two-thirds of Americans 18 and older support the death penalty. But when asked which is the better penalty for murder, roughly half said life without parole and about half said the death penalty.

Rethinking The Death Penalty (NYT)

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

New Jersey could take the lead among states in abolishing the death penalty if it follows the recommendation that a legislative commission made this week. It is the right thing to do, and not just because capital punishment is barbaric and a poor deterrent. It has become increasingly clear as the use of DNA evidence has grown that there is simply too great a risk of making an irreversible mistake.

While we would have used stronger language, we applaud the 13-member panel for having the courage to recommend that New Jersey become the first state to abolish the death penalty since states began reinstating it 35 years ago. The commission included two prosecutors, a police chief, members of the clergy and a man whose daughter was murdered in 2000. Only one member, a former state senator who wrote the death penalty law, dissented.

Although it has nine people on death row, New Jersey has had a moratorium on executions since 2005 and has not put anyone to death since 1963. Nevertheless, the panel's recommendation that the death penalty be replaced with life imprisonment without parole is likely to have significant influence both inside and outside the state. It comes as about 10 of the 38 states with death penalties, including New York, have suspended executions and as recent developments, like DNA exonerations and a botched lethal injection in Florida last month, have created a growing unease about executions.

With Gov. Jon Corzine opposed to the death penalty, and substantial numbers of capital punishment opponents in both houses of the Legislature, there is a reasonable chance the commission's recommendations will become law. That would make New Jersey's criminal justice system more civilized and fair. It could also prod other states to abandon their own use of what Justice Harry Blackmun called the "machinery of death."

No Whitey After All These Years (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, January 5, 2007

With the 12 days of Christmas safely behind us, Boston can pause to reflect on today's 12th anniversary of the disappearance of mobster madman James "Whitey" Bulger.

"The Bulger Task Force . . . continues to dedicate an extraordinary amount of time and effort in the conduct of a worldwide investigation to locate fugitive James Bulger," said Robert Krekorian, executive assistant U.S. attorney.

And what of the alleged sighting of the 77-year-old serial killer in October at a San Diego cineplex screening of "The Departed," starring Jack Nicholson as the questionably fictional head of South Boston's Irish mob?

"We continue to investigate that look-alike lead," Krekorian said, "but at this point in time we have developed no evidence to indicate that it was in fact James Bulger."

The suspected ruthless killer of 19 men and women has officially been on the lam since Jan. 5, 1995, when his arrest became imminent.

Coincidentally, former FBI Boston Special Agent in Charge Kenneth Kaiser will be feted today at the Omni Parker House.

Kaiser, tapped by Washington to serve as assistant director of the FBI's Inspection Division, made finding Bulger "a priority," said Hub office spokeswoman Gail Marcinkiewicz. "He's disappointed that it didn't come to fruition during his tenure here in Boston."

Hunt For Whitey Bulger Still Targeting Hub Kin (BOS)

DOJ_NMG_0112538

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 5, 2007

Decision said near on an indictment

A federal grand jury investigating whether William M. Bulger or his family obstructed efforts to capture his gangster brother, James "Whitey" Bulger , has been extended at least another month, according to two sources familiar with the probe.

Federal prosecutors are nearing a decision on whether there is sufficient evidence to ask the grand jury to indict William Bulger, former president of the Massachusetts Senate and the University of Massachusetts, on perjury or obstruction of justice charges, the sources said.

The investigation is focusing on whether William Bulger, 72, of South Boston, testified truthfully in April 2001 before a federal grand jury that was looking into whether family or friends of the fugitive knew his whereabouts or were helping him evade capture.

The statute of limitations on perjury and obstruction of justice requires that charges be brought within five years, but William Bulger's lawyers agreed to waive the statute to give the grand jury more time to conduct its probe, in hopes that he would be exonerated, sources said. The grand jury has been extended several times since the statute would have expired last April.

Thomas R. Kiley , the lawyer who represents William Bulger, declined to comment yesterday on the investigation. Robert Krekorian, chief of staff for US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan , said, "Obviously we wouldn't confirm nor deny the existence of any grand jury investigation."

William Bulger, who became president of the University of Massachusetts in January 1996, was pressured by Governor Mitt Romney to resign in 2003 after he was publicly grilled about his relationship with his brother by a congressional committee investigating the FBI's mishandling of informants. At the time, Romney said Bulger's answers had often been purposely evasive and that he represented "a cloud" over the university.

Today marks the beginning of Whitey Bulger's 12th year on the run. The longtime FBI informant was warned by his handler, retired FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr., to flee just before his January 1995 federal racketeering indictment. The 77-year-old gangster, one of the FBI's 10 most wanted, is charged with 19 murders. The last confirmed sighting of the fugitive was in London in September 2002, according to the FBI.

William Bulger was subpoenaed to testify before a federal grand jury in Boston on April 5, 2001, and was granted immunity, meaning that none of his statements could be used against him as long as he told the truth.

According to a transcript obtained by the Globe four years ago, he testified that he had spoken with his brother only once since he became a fugitive, during a pre arranged telephone call he received at the Quincy home of a friend in January 1995 and that he felt no obligation to help authorities catch him.

When asked if he knew whether his younger brother, John "Jack" Bulger , had been in contact with their fugitive brother or his girlfriend, Catherine Greig , William Bulger said, "I have no knowledge of that," according to a transcript of the grand jury testimony obtained by the Globe.

"With respect to your office at the Senate and your office at UMass, do you have any reason to believe that any personnel or staff in any office you've working in since January of 1995 has been contacted in any way by your brother or Catherine Greig? " the prosecutor asked.

"Not that I'm aware of," Bulger responded.

The current grand jury investigation is focusing on whether Bulger gave false testimony to the grand jury in 2001 and, in fact, knew about a 1996 call that Whitey Bulger made to the home of a Senate court officer, while John Bulger and William Bulger's son-in-law were present, according to sources.

In a legal battle that went all the way to the US Supreme Court last year, William Bulger's former law partner, Thomas E. Finnerty , was ordered to testify before the current grand jury about whether Bulger was involved in the earlier alleged plot to thwart the investigation into contacts with his brother, according to sources and court documents.

Finnerty allegedly advised a client, Senate court officer Paul I. Dooley, to lie to a federal grand jury in 1998 about a telephone call he received two years earlier from Whitey Bulger, according to sources and court records.

The FBI knew that either Whitey Bulger or Greig had called Dooley's home because investigators had tracked calling cards used by the couple to make dozens of calls to homes and businesses in the Boston area during the summer and fall of 1996.

However, Dooley lied to the grand jury and didn't disclose that three others were present at his South Boston home for the pre-arranged call: John Bulger, then a clerk magistrate at Boston Juvenile Court; William Bulger's son-in-law, Michael J. Hurley, who was and still is an assistant clerk in the Senate, and Whitey Bulger's associate Kevin J. Weeks, according to sources.

The presence of the others at Dooley's house that day remained a secret from the government until three years ago, even though Weeks became a government witness and John Bulger pleaded guilty in April 2003 to obstruction of justice and perjury for denying he had contact with his fugitive brother or knew about a Florida safe deposit box. He spent six months in prison.

Then in 2003, around the same time federal prosecutors subpoenaed William Bulger's children to testify about possible contacts with the fugitive, Finnerty allegedly advised Dooley to go back to the grand jury and recant his earlier false testimony, according to sources and court records.

When prosecutors tried to force Finnerty to testify, he refused, arguing that attorney-client privilege prohibited him from revealing his conversations with Dooley and William Bulger, who was also a client, according to sources and court records.

The US Court of Appeals for the First Circuit found in July 2005 that an unnamed lawyer, identified by sources as Finnerty, lost his attorney-client privilege for involvement in an effort "to facilitate corruption and frustration of the grand jury inquiry."

The Supreme Court refused a petition by unnamed parties, identified by sources as lawyers for William Bulger, letting the appeals court ruling stand.

Finnerty couldn't be reached for comment. John Bulger declined to comment.

When testifying before the congressional committee in June 2003, William Bulger said he hadn't aided his brother since he became a fugitive. He told the court he had no information that could lead to his brother's arrest.

In the past year, the Bulger Fugitive Task Force has chased leads throughout the world, including in Chicago, Ireland, and California. An unconfirmed tip put him in a San Diego movie theater screening "The Departed" this fall .

Embezzlement Is Found In Catholic Dioceses (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein And Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

A survey by researchers at Villanova University has found that 85 percent of Roman Catholic dioceses that responded had discovered embezzlement of church money in the last five years, with 11 percent reporting that more than $500,000 had been stolen.

The Catholic Church has some of the most rigorous financial guidelines of any denomination, specialists in church ethics said, but the survey found that the guidelines were often ignored in parishes. And when no one is looking, the cash that goes into the collection plate does not always get deposited into the church's bank account.

"As a faith-based organization, we place a lot of trust in our folks," said Chuck Zech, a co-author of the study and director of the Center for the Study of Church Management at Villanova.

"We think if you work for a church — you're a volunteer or a priest — the last thing on your mind is to do something dishonest," Mr. Zech said. "But people are people, and there's a lot of temptation there, and with the cash-based aspect of how churches operate, it's pretty easy."

Specialists in church ethics said they believed this was the first study to assess the extent of embezzlement in a denomination.

Officials at the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops said they had seen the study, which was released just before Christmas and was first reported in the National Catholic Reporter, and were considering ways that parishes could tighten their financial controls.

"The Villanova study does not come as a surprise," said Bishop Dennis M. Schnurr, treasurer of the bishops' conference. "This is something that the bishops in this country have been looking at for some time. They are aware of a need to look for mechanisms that can assist parishes in accountability and transparency."

DOJ_NMG_0112540

Mr. Zech and his co-author, Robert West, a professor of accounting at Villanova, did not set out to look for embezzlement. They were conducting a study of internal financial controls in Catholic dioceses and sent a battery of questions to chief financial officers in the nation's 174 Catholic dioceses; 78 responded. Mr. Zech said he was surprised that so many dioceses had detected embezzlement. In 93 percent of those cases, police reports were filed.

He said the survey did not ask who stole the church money. But it did ask who detected the theft, and found that it was most often the parish priest, followed by the bookkeeper, an internal auditor or the parish finance council.

In October alone, three large cases of embezzlement surfaced, including one in Delray Beach, Fla., where two priests spent $8.6 million on trips to Las Vegas, dental work, property taxes and other expenses over four decades.

In the survey, 29 percent of the dioceses reported thefts of less than $50,000.

Most denominations have had cases of embezzlement, sometimes by top officials. In June, the Presbyterian Church U.S.A. fired its second-ranking financial officer, Judy Golliher, after she admitted stealing money that church officials put at more than $132,000.

Many nonprofit organizations that accept cash donations experience theft, and churches are particularly vulnerable, said John C. Knapp, director of the Southern Institute for Business and Professional Ethics, at Georgia State University in Atlanta.

"Churches have a tendency to be in denial about the potential for this conduct in their midst," Mr. Knapp said. "When ethics seminars or ethics codes are proposed in churches, they are often met with resistance from people who say, 'Why in the world would we need this? After all, this is the church.' Whereas in business, people readily recognize that this sort of thing can happen."

The Salvation Army is widely considered exemplary among nonprofits in handling cash collections. The red buckets in which bell ringers collect donations are covered and locked, and all buckets must be returned to a central location, where at least two people count the number and type of bills, coins and checks, said Major George Hood, the charity's national spokesman.

The money must be deposited in the bank within 24 hours, and different people reconcile the initial tallies with bank records, Major Hood said.

In the Catholic Church, parishes and high schools handle many cash transactions, making them vulnerable to theft, the Villanova report notes.

Canon law requires each parish to have a finance council to provide oversight. But Bishop Schnurr, who heads the diocese in Duluth, Minn., said there were no standards for how finance council members were chosen or whether they should have any expertise in accounting or finance.

Only 3 percent of the dioceses said they annually conducted an internal audit of their parishes, and 21 percent said they seldom or never audited parishes, the survey found.

This lack of scrutiny is at the core of the problem, said Francis J. Butler, president of Foundations and Donors Interested in Catholic Activities, a nonprofit organization independent of the church.

"You're taking a lot of risk," Mr. Butler said, "and these days the church cannot afford to take these kinds of risks."

Bishop Schnurr said the study's findings on lack of parish oversight contradicted his experience. But both he and Kenneth W. Korotky, chief financial officer for the bishops' conference, said a committee could soon consider writing guidelines for the composition of parish finance councils and how often dioceses should audit parishes.

But they cautioned that the bishops' conference could not make guidelines mandatory, because each bishop was in charge of administering his own diocese.

Jack B. Siegel, a tax lawyer and expert on nonprofit management who has commented on church fraud on his blog, charitygovernance.com, said he kept a tally of church frauds and was surprised by how many occurred at Catholic churches.

"I got interested because I thought, wait, I've heard a lot about pedophilia, why aren't I hearing about these financial problems," Mr. Siegel said.

He said he was impressed with the guidelines that the bishops' conference and other Catholic organizations have offered.

But he said, "How those standards and guidelines get put into practice is what really matters."

DOJ_NMG_0112541

Remain Silent? Some In Custody Spell It All Out (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

The "Beast of Broadway," as the tabloids call him, a successful actor, has been accused of sexually abusing a 15-year-old girl. But his grade-school teacher would be proud of him in at least one respect: He is a good speller.

That much was clear in the two and-a-half page written statement he gave the police after he was arrested, a statement that recounted a behind-the-scenes theater tour for the girl. He wrote these words voluntarily despite a constitutional right to remain silent that is ingrained not only in criminal law, but also in popular culture. But he was hardly the only person arrested in New York in recent years who opened up once the cuffs went on.

A former Women's Wear Daily writer, accused of disguising himself in a firefighter's costume and sexually assaulting a former colleague on Halloween, kept detectives spellbound with his disquisitions on Chinese menus and book rights.

A homeless man accused of stabbing a tourist as he rode with his girlfriend on the subway found that words weren't enough. Asked to sign his confession, he instead sketched a cartoon version of his crime: a pair of lovers' faces — one happy and one sad — and a stormy black cloud floating over a subway train.

Such statements — and occasional illustrations — by defendants in New York City courts are one element of what prosecutors call the V.D.F., more formally known as the People's Voluntary Disclosure Form. To read them is to experience a kind of poetry of everyday criminal life in New York City.

By turns raw, ugly, poignant, defiant, rarely remorseful and almost always damaging, the statements are a window into the criminal process, part of the common language between detectives and suspects.

"It's kind of like the literature of the criminal defendant," said Gerald L. Shargel, a criminal defense lawyer. "The information contained on the V.D.F. is much more rich and colorful than anything the defense lawyer provides."

Because they can be so revealing, the V.D.F.'s are a bane of defense lawyers' existence, and they often try to suppress them so they cannot be used in court.

More technically, the Voluntary Disclosure Form is a rough, preliminary summary of the evidence, which the prosecution is required to give to the defense. There is space for prosecutors to type out information like the date, place and time of the "occurrence."

And there is space for detectives to provide statements made by defendants at the time of arrest, either as summarized by the police, or in the defendant's own writing.

For many people, the urge to explain, if not to confess, is as urgent as it was for Raskolnikov in "Crime and Punishment."

"My name is Paul Cortez," is the Melvillian first sentence of the V.D.F. statement handwritten by Mr. Cortez, a yoga teacher who is awaiting trial as the suspect in the fatal stabbing of a dancer in her Upper East Side apartment.

What follows is a three-page roller coaster ride of love, sex and betrayal, culminating in an alibi. On the day of the victim's death, Mr. Cortez wrote, "I knew something was wrong, so I called back several times." When she didn't answer, he called clients, watched a football game with a friend, "then read a little and went to bed. The next morning about 10:30 I found out from my mom Catherine was Dead."

The last word, "Dead," is capitalized for emphasis.

Prosecutors love to have defendants volunteer an alibi because it shows what they call "consciousness of guilt."

Stacey Richman, a criminal defense lawyer, summed up her advice to any accused who may feel the urge to chat: "You have a right to remain silent. Exercise that right."

When Peter Braunstein, the former Women's Wear Daily writer, was arrested in Memphis in December 2005, he seemed, in one of many Hamlet-like moments, torn about talking. "I really don't think I should talk to you," Mr. Braunstein began, according to his V.D.F. "I think I should do the whole lawyer thing."

And then he kept talking.

"Everybody talks," said Daniel J. Castleman, chief of investigations for the Manhattan district attorney. "Almost nobody doesn't talk. And the reason for that is that people think they can either talk their way out of it or mitigate the crime. It's human nature."

DOJ_NMG_0112542

Mr. Braunstein, who is in a mental hospital awaiting trial on charges of kidnapping and sexual abuse, seemed to delight in his celebrity. "Defendant referred to book and movie deals using the name of the complainant several times," the V.D.F. says.

He fantasized about ordering Chinese food. "Defendant stated that after seeing news reports, if he went to a Chinese restaurant, he should order something other than beef with extra mustard because that is what the wanted poster says he orders, but if he did that, it would be too obvious, so he would order beef with extra mustard, but he had not eaten Chinese food for a while."

Mr. Braunstein did not sign anything, unlike James Barbour, the actor called the "Beast of Broadway," who once played the Beast in "Beauty and the Beast." Mr. Barbour wrote his statement in block letters, correctly spelled, indented and punctuated it, and signed it with a flourish.

Accused of having a sexual relationship with a 15-year-old girl, he wrote, "She told me that she was 16."

Unfortunately for Mr. Barbour, the age of consent in New York is 17.

"That evening we went to a Broadway show, 'George Gershwin Alone,' " wrote Mr. Barbour, who is free on $10,000 bail. "I introduced her to the star of the show, gave her a backstage tour. The relationship stopped suddenly because I thought it was inappropriate and could get dangerous."

Defendants may try to talk their way out of a charge, but do they succeed?

"Never," said Gerald B. Lefcourt, who has defended clients from the Black Panthers to Harry B. Helmsley. "Which is why if it's up to me, every client I have should know they should never, ever, under any circumstances speak to law enforcement unless I'm there."

What Joseph Weir, accused of groping feet on the subway, lacked in spelling skills, he made up for with an almost Gallic appreciation for women. "I complyment woman, I bow down to them, sometime I kiss there feet and grab legs." Mr. Weir, charged with sex abuse, coercion and other less than gallant acts, is due back in court on Jan. 19.

Alexis Quinlin, a swindler posing as a French photographer, actually wrote his statement in French, perhaps casting doubt on those who would contend that the police put words in the mouths of criminals.

"Je m'appelle Alexis Quinlin," wrote Mr. Quinlin, who was convicted of grand larceny and sentenced to up to seven and a half years in prison, but was not lying about being French. He described how he signed a contract under the assumed name of Jean Baptiste Mondino, which was, he admitted, "une grave erreur."

Robert De Niro's housekeeper, Lucyna Turyk-Wawrynowicz, accused of stealing clothes and jewelry from her wealthy employers, made the mistake of giving the police shopping tips. "Anybody can buy a jacket like this at Century 21," Ms. Turyk-Wawrynowicz said after she was taken into custody in June 2005, according to a transcript typed by the police.

An hour later, she was insulting Mr. De Niro's wife, Grace Hightower, saying, "She is mean."

After about three hours, she announced, "The diamonds are in the bathroom."

After requesting a Starbucks skim latte from the detectives questioning her, she threw in the towel.

"I am evil and guilty, but my husband did nothing," she said. "You can cut my hands and head off, but I can tell you he did nothing wrong." She pleaded guilty to grand larceny and last February was sentenced to up to three years in prison.

Others get right to the point.

"I hate Sammy," Kristina Caban said of the man she was accused of branding with an "R," as if he were a bull, according to the police transcript. "He raped me two years ago." Ms. Caban, charged with assault with intent to disfigure permanently, is due back in court on Jan. 11.

Civil libertarians have called for police interrogations to be videotaped. "We've had reports from clients who say they wrote something, but the police officers were dictating it," said Seymour W. James Jr., the lawyer in charge of the criminal practice at the Legal Aid Society. "They're intimidated by the police after hours of questioning."

Sometimes, it takes very little prompting for a defendant to put her foot in her mouth. In her V.D.F., Andrea Schwartz, whom the tabloids have termed "the Brazilian madam," is quoted telling the police as she was arrested: "I'm not a prostitute. I just hook guys up with girls if they want them."

That did not stop prosecutors from indicting her on prostitution charges last June. She is awaiting trial.

DOJ_NMG_0112543

CIVIL LAW:

Fat Chance (WP)

By Annys Shin

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

The ads for CortiStress said it could reduce your chances of developing Alzheimer's disease. Xenadrine EFX's "thermogenic technology" was supposed to give your metabolism a lift. And TrimSpa said it contained a plant "used by African bushmen for centuries" that could help you lose weight so you could "become all you ever envied."

Those claims are not credible, the Federal Trade Commission concluded, yesterday announcing it will collect about $25 million from the marketers of those popular weight-control pills to settle allegations that they misled consumers.

None of the products was deemed dangerous to a person's health, and the pills will be allowed to remain on store shelves, FTC officials said. The promoters, however, must change their advertising.

The pharmaceutical company Bayer, which was among the FTC's targets, agreed to pay a $3.2 million civil penalty to settle charges that it violated a previous FTC order that required all health claims for its One-a-Day vitamins be "supported by competent and reliable scientific evidence." In national ads, Bayer claimed its One-a-Day WeightSmart contained epigallocatechin gallate (EGCG), a green-tea extract that can help prevent weight gain in women older than 30 who "can gain 10 pounds a decade, due in part to a slowing metabolism."

Those claims were not "substantiated by competent and reliable scientific evidence," the agency said.

The settlement with Bayer "is a wake-up call to any company that wants to push the envelope," FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras said. "Every claim they make they have to have the science to back it up."

Bayer spokeswoman Tricia McKernan said the company never marketed WeightSmart as a weight-loss product and cited three studies supporting the company's claims that EGCG can "enhance metabolism." She said, however, that the company would comply with the agency's orders.

The settlements yesterday were the latest in the FTC's periodic crackdowns on weight-control claims. Since 1990, it has prosecuted more than 100 cases against marketers of flab-busting products, including the promoters of a "tummy-flattening gel" who agreed to pay $3 million last May.

With more than 70 million Americans trying to lose weight and spending $33 billion a year on weight-control products, the market remains lucrative for legitimate operators and hucksters alike. The more than 25,000 dietary supplements on the market are lightly regulated. Their manufacturers are responsible for ensuring that a supplement is safe before it is sold, but they do not need to register their products or get approval. The Food and Drug Administration can take action against unsafe products after the products reach the market. The FTC regulates dietary supplement advertising.

FTC officials said part of the reason consumers fall for phony weight-loss claims is because they see advertisements in major publications like TV Guide, Men's Fitness and People magazine.

"The FTC is asking the media not to run these ads," Majoras said.

Of the settlements the FTC plans to collect, Robert Chinery Jr. and his company, RTC Research and Development, will pay $8 million to $12.8 million for saying Xenadrine EFX was clinically proven to cause rapid and substantial weight loss. Chinery commissioned several studies, but none showed Xenadrine EFX produced substantial weight loss, the FTC said. In fact, one 10-week study showed subjects taking Xenadrine EFX lost fewer pounds than those taking a placebo, the FTC said.

The FTC expects to recover cash and assets worth at least $12 million from Stephen F. Cheng and his company, Window Rock Enterprises, and Gregory Cynaumon and his company, Infinity Advertising, which promoted CortiSlim and CortiStress.

Alexander Goen and several companies associated with him will pay $1.5 million for the marketing of TrimSpa. In addition to TV commercials showing celebrity endorser Anna Nicole Smith romping on a beach, ads for TrimSpa said an ingredient, hoodia gordonii, aided weight loss and described it as a plant used by African bushmen to suppress hunger on long hunting trips. TrimSpa did not admit liability.

DOJ_NMG_0112544

Most of the money the FTC is to collect will go toward consumer redress, with the exception of Bayer's penalty, which goes to the U.S. Treasury.

Diet Pill Sellers Fined $25M (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, January 5, 2007

Marketers of four brands of weight-loss pills can keep selling them — but they can't make unproven claims that people will lose weight taking them, the Federal Trade Commission says.

The marketers agreed to pay $25 million in fines and penalties to settle FTC charges that their advertising claimed their popular diet pills would cause consumers to lose weight or reduce the risk of serious diseases such as cancer. The FTC said Thursday the claims were not supported by scientific evidence.

"You're not going to find weight loss in a bottle of pills," said FTC Chairman Deborah Platt Majoras.

Platt Majoras said the pills, still available on store shelves, are not dangerous to consumers' health.

Nancy Metcalf, senior project editor at Consumers Union, said the group has lobbied for years to strengthen federal oversight of weight-loss supplements.

"We have advised people not to take them," she said.

Bayer was fined $3.2 million to settle FTC charges that its advertisements for One-A-Day WeightSmart pills violated an earlier FTC order that required all health claims for One-A-Day brand vitamins to be supported by sound scientific evidence. Bayer said that its product was marketed as a multivitamin, not a weight-loss pill, and that it settled to avoid the expense of litigation, the Associated Press reported.

Other pills the FTC cited were:

•TrimSpa. The marketers of this pill — Goen Technologies, Nutramerica, TrimSpa and Alexander Szynalski — will pay $1.5 million to settle FTC charges that their weight-loss claims were unsubstantiated. TrimSpa advertisements featured celebrity Anna Nicole Smith, who claimed to have lost 69 pounds using the pills, the FTC said.

•Xenadrine EFX. RTC Research & Development and Robert Chinery Jr., the marketers of this green-tea extract product, falsely claimed it would cause rapid weight loss, the FTC charged. The marketers will pay $8 million to $13 million to settle the case.

•CortiSlim and CortiStress. Stephen Cheng and his company, Window Rock Enterprises, and Gregory Cynaumon and his firm, Infinity Advertising — the marketers of those products — will surrender $12 million in assets.

The marketers claimed CortiSlim would cause rapid weight loss and that CortiStress would reduce the risk of cancer, heart disease and other ailments, the FTC said.

The companies agreed to limit future ad claims. Their ads ran in magazines and newspapers, on television and on the Internet. Consumers who bought CortiSlim and Xenadrine EFX may be eligible for refunds under the FTC's redress program at www.ftc.gov.

Eli Lilly Settles More Zyprexa Lawsuits (WP/AP)

By Rick Callahan

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

INDIANAPOLIS, Jan. 4 -- Drugmaker Eli Lilly said Thursday that it will settle about 18,000 additional lawsuits alleging it did not adequately warn patients that its anti-psychotic medication Zyprexa carries a heightened risk of diabetes.

Lilly did not disclose the amount of the settlement but said in a statement that it would take a fourth-quarter settlement charge that's not expected to exceed $500 million.

In a June 2005 settlement, the Indianapolis company agreed to pay about $700 million to resolve more than 8,000 similar lawsuits involving Zyprexa, its top-selling drug.

Lilly spokeswoman Tarra Ryker said the new settlement covered more plaintiffs for less money because the 18,000 cases were less viable due to a 2003 Zyprexa labeling change, which addressed the drug's possible diabetes risk.

DOJ_NMG_0112545

She said the company plans to go to trial, beginning in April, to defend itself against the 1,200 remaining claims, which she said are not being settled for "various reasons." Lilly declined to elaborate on the specific reasons.

Sales of Zyprexa, which is used to treat schizophrenia and bipolar disorder, accounted for 28 percent of Lilly's $3.86 billion in revenue in the most recent quarter.

Lilly has recently been the subject of New York Times articles that allege the drugmaker played down safety data on Zyprexa. Lilly contends the Times' stories relied on illegally obtained internal documents leaked by a plaintiff lawyer and used selected memos out of context.

Independent pharmaceuticals analyst Hemant Shah of HKS said the new settlement would help Lilly end negative publicity about the drug and allow Zyprexa to recover some of the market share it has lost in the past few years.

"They needed to get this drug off front pages -- get the negative press out of the way -- and one way you do that is settle so you don't have bad news coming out one case at a time," he said.

Most of the lawsuits claimed that before September 2003, the information on Zyprexa labels regarding the risk of hyperglycemia and diabetes was not adequately displayed. Hyperglycemia is a condition in which the blood has elevated sugar levels, typical in diabetics.

Lilly also faces lawsuits filed by the attorneys general of Alaska, Louisiana, Mississippi, New Mexico and West Virginia alleging that it marketed Zyprexa for unapproved uses or hid the risks of weight gain and diabetes, said company spokeswoman Carole Witsken Puls.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

U.S. Justice Department Won't Investigate Portsmouth Jail Death (VAPILOT)

By Jen Mccaffery, The Virginian-pilot

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, January 5, 2007

PORTSMOUTH — Federal authorities have declined to investigate the July death of an inmate in Portsmouth City Jail.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation in Norfolk and the Department of Justice informed city officials in Portsmouth last month that they found insufficient evidence to suggest that federal civil rights laws were violated in connection with Joseph Combs's death.

After six days in the city jail, Combs, 57, died of severe dehydration and acute pneumonia, with bipolar disorder contributing, according to his autopsy.

Portsmouth City Attorney Tim Oksman sent letters to federal authorities in November, requesting a civil rights investigation into his death.

Lamarr Brown , president of the Norfolk-based Organization of African-American Concerns , is speaking for Combs' widow, Granada Combs .

"This is usually the protocol by the FBI in the Hampton Roads area when the death of a black person is concerned," Brown said.

Portsmouth police Capt. Garrett Shelton said he anticipated that police would wrap up their investigation into Combs' death by mid-January.

"There's nothing unusual that has come out of this, from a criminal standpoint," Shelton said.

Police will turn their findings over to Portsmouth Commonwealth's Attorney Earle Mobley and Oksman, as they would in the case of any inmate death, Shelton said.

Reach Jen McCaffery at (757) 446-2627 or jen.mccaffery@pilotonline.com.

Dismissal Of Boys Town Suit Eyed (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112546

D.C. officials want a federal judge to throw out a civil rights complaint filed by the U.S. Justice Department after a jury deadlocked on whether the city discriminated against a group home for disadvantaged youth on Capitol Hill.

The complaint centered on whether D.C. officials broke federal housing laws and discriminated against the nonprofit Father Flanagan's Girls and Boys Home, also known as Boys Town.

The Nebraska-based group sued the District in 2001, saying city officials kept Boys Town from opening a group home on Potomac Avenue Southeast by stonewalling project applications amid community opposition to the plans.

The Justice Department later joined as a plaintiff in the federal lawsuit.

"There was no direct evidence of handicap or racial discrimination against the Boys Town project," attorneys for the District argued in recent court pleadings. Federal officials declined to say yesterday how they plan to proceed.

"We're obviously disappointed the jury didn't return a verdict for the United States," said Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department. "But we continue to think the District of Columbia violated the Fair Housing Act."

John Melingagio, a Boys Town spokesman, said the organization will continue to review the case and that the District's effort to have the case dismissed is "not well-founded."

"We will vigorously resist it," he said. "The bottom line is we're going to continue to advocate for children in the District."

The District sought dismissal of the complaint Dec. 22, and a response from the Justice Department is expected later this month.

A judge granted a mistrial in the case Dec. 8, saying jurors were split on a verdict.

The case began Nov. 27 after years of pretrial motions and depositions by numerous current and former city officials and neighborhood activists.

Among those who testified was Carolyn Graham, a D.C. school board member who previously served as the District's deputy mayor.

In questioning by the government, Miss Graham had testified that she perceived racial undertones to community opposition on Capitol Hill to the Boys Town project.

Attorneys for the District disagreed, noting that the makeup of a group opposing the project, Southeast Citizens for Smart Development, was racially diverse.

D.C. officials also argued that Boys Town ultimately realized a financial gain from the failed project. According to the District, the group sold the property to a developer for a profit of about $8 million after Boys Town decided not to pursue the project.

ANTITRUST:

Auto Paint Antitrust Suit Nets $105 Million (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, January 5, 2007

The final two defendants in a class action antitrust suit against the top manufacturers of automotive refinishing paint have agreed to pay $39 million to settle claims that they participated in a price-fixing conspiracy, bringing the total recovery in the case to more than $105 million.

In a six-page opinion in In re Automotive Refinishing Paint Antitrust Litigation handed down on Dec. 28, Eastern District of Pennsylvania Judge R. Barclay Surrick granted preliminary approval of the two settlements -- $16 million from Sherwin-Williams Co. and $23 million from PPG Industries -- clearing the way for notices to be sent to the class.

In prior settlements, E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. paid $36 million; Akzo Nobel Car Refinishes, a subsidiary of Dutch chemical giant Akzo Nobel NV, paid $18.7 million; and two related German companies, BASF and BASF Coatings, paid $12 million total.

The plaintiffs in the suit are a class of direct purchasers -- mostly auto repair shops -- that claim in the suit that the paint manufacturers conducted secret meetings in Europe in which they agreed to "fix, raise, maintain and stabilize" the prices of refinishing paints.

DOJ_NMG_0112547

The suit alleges that during the 1990s, the price increases for auto refinishing paints continued to rise despite a drop in the prices of crude oil and natural gas -- the principal raw materials used to manufacture refinishing paints.

Dozens of suits were filed in 2001 in the wake of news accounts of the Justice Department's probe focused on Akzo Nobel, which had pleaded guilty in 1997 and was fined $10 million for participating in a separate international conspiracy to fix the price of sodium gluconate, an industrial cleaner.

Two Akzo executives also pleaded guilty, confessing that they had agreed with other manufacturers to "suppress and eliminate competition in the sodium gluconate market from August 1993 to June 1995," according to Justice Department records.

Prosecutors said the two executives and their co-conspirators had set out to fix prices and allocate market share.

When news broke of the Justice Department's probe into possible price-fixing in the market for paint products used in the automotive refinishing industry, Chemical & Engineering News reported that Akzo's annual report stated that it had incurred $26 million in legal and settlement costs in the previous year, and that the company "has set aside $145 million to pay, over the next few years, 'probable costs, fines and civil damages' resulting from its behavior."

Surrick was assigned to hear the case under the federal courts' multi-district litigation program.

Surrick later appointed lawyers from three Philadelphia firms to act as co-lead counsel -- the Law Offices of Bernard R. Gross, Kohn Swift & Graf, and Barrack Rodos & Bacine. He also appointed a plaintiffs' executive committee -- H. Laddie Montague and Merrill G. Davidoff of Berger & Montague; Roberta D. Liebenberg and Donald Perelman of Fine Kaplan & Black; Michael M. Buchman of Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Lerach; and Robert N. Kaplan and Richard J. Kilsheimer of Kaplan Fox & Kilsheimer.

In October 2004, Surrick awarded more than $21.5 million in "interim fees" to the plaintiffs' team from the fund created by the first round of settlements.

In his fee award, Surrick said that allocations of fees to specific firms should be determined by the co-lead counsel "who are most familiar with the work done by each firm and each firm's overall contribution to the litigation."

Rejecting an objection to such an approach, Surrick found that the co-lead counsel "have directed this case from its inception and are best able to assess the weight and merit of each counsel's contribution," and that "leaving the allocation to counsel makes sense from the standpoint of judicial economy."

Visa, MasterCard Settle With Government (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The federal government is set to collect at least $7 million as part of an 11-year-old court battle that pitted retailers against Visa USA Inc. and MasterCard Inc. in a dispute over debit-card fees.

Although plaintiffs in the class-action lawsuit settled the case in 2003, the U.S. submitted a claim only last February. That claim then became the subject of a separate dispute when lawyers representing the plaintiffs contended that the government shouldn't get a piece of the $3 billion settlement fund that had been set up for retailers.

By filing a claim, the government essentially contended that it, like the nation's retailers, had been hurt by Visa and MasterCard rules that required merchants to accept their branded debit cards if they also accepted their credit cards. Government facilities-ranging from military PXs to the souvenir shop at the Smithsonian Institution accept plastic. The government's claim had been submitted by the antitrust division of the Justice Department.

Under the settlement, which was announced late Wednesday, Visa and MasterCard will pay a total of $3.5 million to the government. The settlement fund will contribute $3.7 million. The government may receive additional funds later if there is money left in the settlement fund.

Visa and MasterCard said they were pleased that a settlement had been reached.

Brussels Raises Heat On Energy Companies (FT)

By Tobias Buck In Brussels

Financial Times, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112548

Europe's biggest energy companies face an intensified crackdown by the European Union competition commissioner following an inquiry into the sector that found evidence of collusion and other severe market failings.

In a summary of a 16-month investigation, Neelie Kroes warns she will make "full and combined use" of her powers over mergers, government subsidies and antitrust abuses to tackle the lack of competition in the sector.

Her report, a copy of which has been obtained by the Financial Times, states: "Market concentration has been identified as a major concern for the success of the liberalisation process. The market power of pre-liberalisation monopolies has not yet been eroded."

The final results of Ms Kroes' sector inquiry are expected to be announced next week, along with a broader review of the EU's energy policy that will also look at cutting greenhouse gas emissions and bolstering the security of Europe's energy supplies.

Her assessment will make uncomfortable reading for many of Europe's biggest energy companies, including Eon and RWE of Germany, GdF in France and Eni in Italy. These groups are already the target of Commission antitrust investigations, and have seen their offices raided by Brussels officials at least once during the past seven months.

The report makes clear that they – and other dominant energy groups – are likely to face further pressure from the Brussels regulator in the near future, for example to cede control over gas pipelines and the power grid or to terminate some of their long-term contracts with customers and energy suppliers.

One of the report's most striking findings is the accusation of collusion – or cartel-like activity – among Europe's large energy groups.

"Market partitioning re-mains one of the most serious obstacles to market integration. The fight against collusion between incumbents remains a top priority of antitrust enforcement action," the report says.

The report also warns Europe's energy groups that the Commission will impose tough conditions on any future mergers in the sector "to ensure that the competitive structure...does not further deteriorate". It points out that approval to future deals would likely hinge on commitments to release gas and electricity onto the open market, but warns that Brussels may impose "structural" remedies such as asset disposals.

Ms Kroes ordered the in-depth investigation into the electricity and gas sector shortly after she took over the Brussels competition watchdog in 2004.

She argued at the time that years of liberalisation efforts had clearly failed to deliver tangible benefits to European consumers and businesses.

Though, formally speaking, Ms Kroes is responsible only for analysing the market and proposing solutions based on her powers as competition chief, her report also foreshadows much that will be left to the broader review.

Her report calls for the break-up of integrated energy companies as "the most effective way forward".

S Korea Watchdog Probes Qualcomm (FT)

By Chris Nuttall In San Francisco

Financial Times, January 5, 2007

South Korean antitrust regulators say they have launched a full-scale investigation into the business practices of Qualcomm, the US wireless chipmaker.

Qualcomm has been the subject of complaints from other chipmakers and handset makers in Europe, Japan and Korea, but the move by the Korean Fair TradeCommission represented the first time that formal action had been taken by the authorities.

An FTC official said a task force had been formed since early in December to step up an investigation into allegations that Qualcomm had used its dominant market position to charge excessive royalties.

It had received complaints between April and June last year from Broadcom and Texas Instruments, rival chipmakers in the US, and Korea's Nextreaming and Thin Multimedia.

They had alleged monopolistic practices by Qualcomm in bundling multimedia products into its chipsets and not opening up its programming interface to allow others to build complementary software applications.

DOJ_NMG_0112549

The official said the FTC could co-operate with its counterparts in Europe and Japan, where Broadcom and TI had also filed complaints.

He added that Qualcomm could face fines or have to cut its royalty rates in Korea if it is found to have abused its market dominance.

A Qualcomm spokeswoman at its San Diego headquarters said the company had not been formally notified of any investigation by the FTC and so could not comment.

Qualcomm owns patents and earns royalties on many wireless technologies. It is best known for developing Code Division Multiple Access (CDMA), a standard that has rivalled GSM in mobile phone networks around the world and formed the basis of next-generation networks.

CDMA is the standard in South Korea and manufacturers such as Samsung and LG make CDMA phones. Antitrust regulators raided Qualcomm's offices in Seoul last April, as well as premises of Samsung and LG, as they sought information on the US company's business practices.

The Korean FTC hasbeen active against US companies with the competition watchdog saying it wants to ensure Korean technology companies have a chanceto grow.

It visited the Seoul offices of Intel last February and fined Microsoft in 2005 for abusing its dominant position in the Korean market.

Qualcomm is also involved in a number of lawsuits at home, principally involving patent disputes with its rival Broadcom.

South Korea Regulator Probes Qualcomm (AP)

By Kelly Olsen, The Associated Press

AP, January 5, 2007

SEOUL, South Korea -- South Korea's antitrust regulator said Thursday it has launched a full-scale investigation into alleged unfair market practices by U.S. wireless technology company Qualcomm Inc.

The Fair Trade Commission early last month formed a task force to push forward a probe into allegations that the company used its dominant position in wireless technology to seek excessive royalties, said Shin Yeong-ho, an FTC official.

San Diego, Calif.-based Qualcomm developed and controls most of the key patents for CDMA, or code division multiple access, a rival standard to the dominant cellular standard GSM, or global system for mobile communications.

CDMA is used in the United States and South Korea. Every cell phone in South Korea has a CDMA chip and handset manufacturers have to pay royalty fees to Qualcomm.

The San Diego-based chipmaker earns money by collecting royalties or licensing the CDMA technology to other chipmakers and phone manufacturers.

Between April and June last year, the FTC received complaints about Qualcomm from Broadcom Corp. and Texas Instruments Inc., both of the U.S., and two South Korean companies, claiming Qualcomm abused its market dominance.

Shin said that if Qualcomm is found to have abused its position to block fair competition it can be ordered to take corrective measures, face fines or both.

A Qualcomm spokeswoman, Emily Kilpatrick, said the company would not comment because it had not been notified by Korean authorities.

In April, when Korean authorities began investigating Qualcomm, the company said its business practices were "lawful and pro-competitive."

Qualcomm is embroiled in legal and trade disputes with a number of rivals that contend it extracts excessive royalty payments, a charge the company vigorously denies. Korea has long been one of Qualcomm's strongest markets, accounting for 32 percent of $7.53 billion in revenue for its fiscal year that ended Sept. 24.

Issues Of Power, Prestige Doom Law Firm Merger (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0112550

New York law firm Dewey Ballantine LLP is best known for its deals practice. But this time, it wasn't able to pull off a deal of its own.

Merger plans between Dewey and another major firm, Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP, founded in San Francisco, fell apart yesterday amid concerns over money, power and prestige. At least 11 Dewey partners had left in recent months, some taking business with them.

The merger had been heralded as one of the biggest in years and notable given Dewey's stature and lucrative Wall Street practice.

"No one issue led to our decision, but in the end we will not be doing the merger," said Ralph Baxter Jr., Orrick chairman, who had aggressively pursued the deal.

In recent years, many law firms have merged to add practice depth quickly and to enter new national and international markets. Firms are particularly keen on adding lawyers in New York, the world's most lucrative legal market, thanks to a steady supply of corporate-deal work. If the tie-up had gone forward, other New York firms might have felt pressure to join the merger frenzy that has long gripped firms based in others parts of the country.

The failure of this merger may make it harder for firms outside New York to find partners there. "New York firms tend to think that mergers will only dilute their brands," says Peter Zeughauser, a law firm consultant who wasn't involved in this deal. "The Dewey/Orrick situation will provide them with more evidence that they have a right to be skeptical."

The failed talks come at a cost for both sides, but particularly for Dewey. With about 530 lawyers and nearly 100 years of history, Dewey boasts ties to banks with major presences on Wall Street, including Credit Suisse Group and UBS AG. Recent clients include Walt Disney Co. in its $7.4 billion acquisition of Pixar Animation Studios, as well as HCA Inc., which was acquired by private-equity firms for $21 billion in one of the largest-ever leveraged buyouts.

But Dewey's star had fallen of late, making it receptive to a merger overture from Orrick. While about twice Dewey's size, at about 1,000 lawyers, and with greater global reach, Orrick is seen by some at Dewey as having a less prestigious practice, a key factor in the legal business.

That a merger Dewey felt compelled to make has failed raises questions about how robust it can remain as an independent entity, said Chuck Fanning, head of partner placement at Major, Lindsey & Africa LLC, a national recruiting firm. "Partners may wonder, why should I join now?" he says. Retention may also prove to be an issue.

Morton Pierce, Dewey's chairman and a deal maker himself as head of the firm's mergers-and-acquisitions group, said, "uncertainty is never good for people. They like to know where they stand. We now no longer have uncertainty. We know we are going forward as a stand-alone institution." He added that Dewey just completed its best year ever, increasing its average profit per partner to $1.4 million from $1.2 million, and that it remains strong despite the defection of partners since the merger was in discussion.

The first big setback came when news of the merger talks leaked in September. As the firms' leadership wrangled over questions of management authority and partners' contributions of capital, lawyers bolted from Dewey, taking business that made the deal attractive to Orrick in the first place -- ultimately sapping Orrick's enthusiasm for a tie-up. At least 11 partners left Dewey, including two of its top mergers-and-acquisitions lawyers and leaders of its bankruptcy and energy practices.

In October the executive committees of Dewey and Orrick announced that they had approved the main terms of the merger that would have created one of the largest firms in the country. They announced a new name -- Dewey Orrick LLP -- and a logo that incorporated a green letter "O" that had been used by Orrick. Messrs. Baxter and Pierce traveled to Europe to visit the firms' respective offices and hold Q&A sessions for lawyers.

But the deal proved to face obstacles, both in management conflicts and cultural differences. Questions over power and money became stumbling blocks. Dewey and Orrick had agreed at the outset that Mr. Baxter would serve as the presiding partner of the combined firm. Later, the two sides differed over whether Mr. Baxter would have sole authority over such key matters as the hiring and firing of office and practice-group leaders.

At one point, Mr. Baxter proposed an 11-person management committee, comprised of six Orrick lawyers and five Dewey lawyers, a term that the Dewey side objected to initially, according to two people familiar with the deal. Mr. Baxter believed that

DOJ_NMG_0112551

Orrick was financially stronger than Dewey and thus should be entitled to greater management authority, according to a person familiar with the talks.

The firms also had difficulty squaring their respective balance sheets and figuring out how the partners at each firm would contribute an equal amount of capital. One key sticking point was Dewey's generous unfunded retirement plan, which amounts to about a $90 million obligation, according to two people familiar with the plan.

As Dewey partners headed for the exits in recent weeks, Orrick requested that the remaining Dewey lawyers shoulder more of the burden for the plan -- a source of irritation to Dewey lawyers, according to two people familiar with the deal.

While declining to discuss the specific reasons the merger failed, Mr. Pierce said part of the difficulty was that Dewey never had engaged in merger talks before. Some of his partners, he said, wrestled with the basic question: "Is merger the right way to go?" The veteran deals lawyer said it is easier to merge manufacturing companies, where it is only senior executives negotiating with other senior executives. "At service providers, like law firms, every partner is an owner, so it is much more complicated to get buy-in on a transaction."

As for Orrick, the failed talks represent a blow to Mr. Baxter, who courted Dewey on and off for six years with an eye toward landing the firm's deals practice and a stronger foothold in New York. Failed talks are not new for Orrick. Conversations between Orrick and the New York firm formerly known as Donovan Leisure Newton & Irvine broke down in the late 1990s, though dozens of Donovan Leisure lawyers ultimately joined Orrick.

More recently, talks broke off between Orrick and Cooley Godward LLP of Palo Alto, Calif., which later merged with a New York firm, and with a Washington, D.C., firm formerly known as Swidler Berlin Shereff Friedman LLP that has since merged with another firm.

Orrick has lost few if any partners in response to the merger news. But given Orrick's merger-talk track record, firms now may be leery of dancing with the firm, said Mr. Zeughauser. For Mr. Baxter, he said, "It would have been a huge feather in his cap."

2 Law Firms Call Off Plans For A Merger (NYT)

By Michael J. De La Merced

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

One of the biggest proposed law firm mergers of the last year has been called off, the victim of too many insurmountable issues.

The two firms, Dewey Ballantine and Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe, announced the news yesterday. The two had been in talks since last fall to join their specialties in mergers and acquisitions and debt financing. The new firm would have been one of the nation's largest legal advisers, with 1,500 lawyers based in New York and San Francisco.

Unlike most merger talks, which are conducted in secrecy, the firms announced in October that their top committees had given preliminary approval to the proposal. At every step in the process after that, the firms expressed confidence that the deal would go through.

The two had already decided upon the name Dewey Orrick for the combined firm. Dewey's chairman, Morton A. Pierce, and Orrick's chairman, Ralph H. Baxter Jr., would have served as co-chairmen, with Mr. Baxter taking on the additional title of presiding partner.

Partners were to have voted on the deal last month. But as several obstacles proved intractable, those elections were postponed to this month.

"While both firms tried their best to work through these challenges, we were unable to bring the merger to completion," the two firms said in a statement. "No one issue led us to this point."

Among the most visible distress signals was the departure of 10 partners from Dewey since merger talks began. Most ominous were the exits of three lawyers from Dewey's mergers and acquisitions team, including Michael J. Aiello and Jack S. Bodner, who had been considered protégés of Mr. Pierce.

People familiar with the negotiations said the talks had continued as recently as last weekend.

The chairmen of both firms said in interviews that the decision to part ways was mutual.

DOJ_NMG_0112552

"We reached a point where we decided it was in the best interest of both organizations to go our separate ways," Mr. Pierce said.

Both chairmen said that they would look for future growth opportunities, but that neither was looking for another merger partner right now.

"When you look at how law firms grow, while mergers have great advantages, it's the statistically least likely way to do it," Mr. Baxter said.

Unlike mergers in other sectors, law firm consolidation involves the joining of companies whose main assets are their people. Orrick is acquainted with such situations, having undertaken merger talks with several firms in recent years, including Coudert Brothers in 2005 and Donovan, Leisure, Newton & Irvine in the late 1990s. None of those talks came to fruition, though Orrick subsequently hired lawyers from those firms.

The dilution of brand names, unclear lines of authority and unfunded pensions are among some of the issues that may have played a role in the talks' demise, said Peter Zeughauser, a law firm consultant who did not work on the deal.

Unfunded pensions have long been a concern in the merger of law firms because partners inevitably bristle at taking a pay cut to help new colleagues' retirement plans. Several consultants and lawyers at other firms previously questioned whether Dewey's unfunded pension system would pose problems for the deal.

"It's not at all uncommon for an unfunded retirement plan to be a deal breaker," Mr. Zeughauser said.

A person familiar with the negotiations also pointed to questions over management authority. Though the deal had been labeled a merger of equals, it was clear that Orrick would retain control over crucial matters, the person said.

Both Dewey and Orrick have long histories. Dewey is a storied New York adviser whose name comes from Gov. Thomas E. Dewey. Orrick is one of San Francisco's oldest law firms, founded in 1863.

Both have prominent corporate deal-making and litigation practices. Dewey, a 550-lawyer firm, is known as a specialist in mergers and acquisitions, having advised on major deals like the hospital operator HCA's $33 billion leveraged buyout. And Orrick, with more than 950 lawyers, is considered a leader in debt financing and capital market transactions and restructurings.

Last year proved profitable for the two firms, with both claiming profits of about $1.4 million per equity partner. Dewey earned $408 million in gross revenue and Orrick pulled in $666 million for the 2006 fiscal year, both showing improvement over 2005.

LSE Holder Raises Its Stake (WSJ)

By Alistair Macdonald

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

LONDON -- The second-largest shareholder in London Stock Exchange PLC added to its stake in the company, indicating that some investors still expect Nasdaq Stock Market Inc. to raise its offer for the London market operator, even as LSE's shares have fallen closer to Nasdaq's current offering price.

Heyman Investment Associates, an investment vehicle of U.S. businessman Samuel Heyman, said it had increased its stake in LSE, Europe's largest exchange by the value of stocks traded, to 9.65% from 9.60%.

LSE's share price has drifted down 1.8% during the past three days to close at £12.87 ($25.10) yesterday; it is now just 3.5% higher than Nasdaq's offer of £12.43 a share. Analysts believe that if LSE's share price falls below £12.43, enough hedge funds will sell their shares to Nasdaq to give it the 50% it says it needs to take over the London exchange.

The decline in LSE's share price comes amid light holiday trading volumes, which can exaggerate price movements, and amid broader selling recently in exchange companies around the world.

Nasdaq has been pursuing LSE for months and has amassed nearly 29% of the company. Some investors now fear that if Nasdaq doesn't win control of LSE, it will sell its stake, pushing LSE shares much lower. That possibility has spooked some investors into selling LSE shares in recent trading sessions. A spokesman for LSE declined to comment.

Nasdaq has acknowledged to LSE investors that selling its stake is one of several options it could pursue, some of these shareholders say. Other options would include waiting a year and bidding again for LSE when British takeover rules would allow it to do so, or setting up a rival exchange to the LSE in London. Some of LSE's largest shareholders also are convinced that Nasdaq has the financial firepower to come back with a higher price on its current offer, which LSE has so far rebuffed.

DOJ_NMG_0112553

LSE also is expected to issue a second defense document to back up its view that Nasdaq's offer considerably undervalues its business. This document may include details of partnerships that LSE has talked about with other exchanges. Joint ventures with exchanges in emerging markets may be particularly attractive given LSE's success in attracting listings from developing markets. LSE, for instance, has in the past talked to the Bombay Stock Exchange about partnerships.

ENVIRONMENT:

Parks Agency Leaves Controversial Book On Shelf (NYT)

By Cornelia Dean

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

When complaints emerged in 2004 over the sale of a creationist account of the formation of the Grand Canyon in National Park Service bookstores, Interior Department officials said they would review whether the book should be pulled from the shelves.

But there was no formal review, in part because of differences of opinion among the Park Service's own specialists, said David Barna, a spokesman for the agency, in an interview yesterday.

When officials got together to discuss the book, the geologists and natural resource specialists would say, "Get this book out of here," Mr. Barna said. "But the education and interpretation people would say: 'Wait a minute. If your science is so sound, the fact that there are differences of opinion should not scare you away.' "

In the end, no formal action was taken, and the book remains on sale because, Mr. Barna said in a written statement, "It is not our role to tell people what to believe."

The Park Service issued the statement after an organization of state and federal natural resource managers, Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, or PEER, said it had filed a Freedom of Information Act request concerning the agency's handling of the book, "Grand Canyon: A Different View."

The group received a letter saying a review of records "did not locate any documents responsive to your request," which Mr. Barna confirmed, saying "there's no real record."

Jeff Ruch, executive director of PEER, said the Park Service was advancing a particular religious view by keeping the book on sale, and was also deceiving people about it, by repeatedly saying that it would be reviewed.

"If the question is religious values, they ought at least to be honest about it," Mr. Ruch said.

The book was assembled by Tom Vail, who operates Canyon Ministries, which offers canyon river tours with a creationist bent.

The book maintains that the heavens and the earth were created in six days about 6,000 years ago and that the canyon was formed in a divine flood sent to wipe out "the wickedness of man."

Scientists say that earth is billions of years old and that the canyon has been carved over millions of years by the action of the Colorado River.

In his statement, Mr. Barna notes that Park Service management policies require reliance on "the best scientific evidence available" and, as a result, rangers tell visitors that "the Colorado River basin has developed in the past 40 million years."

But the guidelines also say that material available from concessionaires in national parks should adhere to the standards used to evaluate Park Service materials.

When the book appeared on Park Service store shelves, there were objections from a host of scientists, including the agency's own geologists, who said it "repudiates science."

In the interview, Mr. Barna said a new interpretive center would open at the canyon this summer, offering a more detailed explanation of the canyon's development, told in scientific, not religious, terms. He said this investment in science shows where the agency stands.

But in an interview yesterday, Mr. Ruch said selling the book was one of a number of efforts to promote the views of fundamentalist Christians in the park, "not Buddhists or Muslims or anyone else."

DOJ_NMG_0112554

“This is government establishment of religion in a fairly fundamental way, if you pardon the pun,” Mr. Ruch said.

A Revitalized Chesapeake May Be Decades Away (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

The multibillion-dollar cleanup of the Chesapeake Bay, which government officials had pledged would succeed by 2010, will likely miss that deadline by a wide margin -- and, at the current pace, might drag on for decades more, an Environmental Protection Agency official acknowledged yesterday.

Rich Batiuk, an associate director of the EPA's Chesapeake Bay Program, made that projection at a meeting of the Chesapeake Bay Commission, an advisory group that includes state officials from Maryland, Virginia and Pennsylvania.

His talk was a blunt, and public, admission of something that the EPA had conceded in an agency report last year. A pledge to "save the bay," made six years ago in the so-called Chesapeake 2000 Agreement, is falling drastically short. "If we go at the current rate that we're doing, we're talking about restoring the Chesapeake decades from now, a generation or two," Batiuk said.

The news means a continued struggle for one of this area's most cherished bodies of water, one that Washingtonians turn to for seafood, sailing, recreational fishing and weekend scenery. It is also bad news for such Chesapeake tributaries as the Potomac River, where the pollution and runoff bring mud, algae blooms and dangerous chemicals on the way to the bay.

Batiuk's assessment was not news to many environmentalists, who have said for years that roads and suburbs in the watershed were growing too fast and that cleanup efforts at farms and sewage plants were moving too slowly for the deadline to be met.

Some of them said yesterday that they were heartened that the EPA was admitting the shortfall but wished the acknowledgment had come sooner.

"Duh," said Roy Hoagland, a vice president of the Chesapeake Bay Foundation, after hearing Batiuk's talk in Annapolis. "We've been arguing for at least four years that in order to reach those goals, they need to accelerate implementation [of cleanup efforts]. . . . That is not new information."

Bay cleanup has a history of broken deadlines. In 1987, local and federal officials pledged to clean up the estuary by 2000. The current agreement, written after the first one failed, was signed by the governors of Maryland, Virginia and Pennsylvania, the mayor of Washington and the administrator of the EPA.

The officials pledged to make enormous improvements in everything from low-oxygen "dead zones" to underwater grasses to oyster populations.

In the 6 1/2 years since, Batiuk said, there have been notable successes: The northern bay has seen a huge regrowth of the grasses, which provide oxygen and shelter for aquatic life. Changes at sewage plants around the watershed have reduced their output of nitrogen and phosphorus, two pollutants linked to dead zones downstream.

But the overall picture, Batiuk said, shows a cleanup effort that is far off the pace set out in 2000. Crab populations are still below historic levels. The amount of oxygen, which fish and crabs need to live, is just 29 percent of the goal set for 2010, he said. The bay's native oysters are at just 7 percent.

Even underwater grasses, which are doing slightly better than other indicators, stand at just 42 percent of the level they're supposed to reach by 2010.

"If you draw that line out there," Batiuk said, pointing to the slow upward trend in their population, "you're at about 2040 for the grasses to come back."

One major reason for the shortfall, Batiuk said, was rapid population growth in the bay's watershed, which stretches 64,000 square miles from southern Virginia to Cooperstown, N.Y. An additional 800,000 people moved in between 2000 and 2005, bringing more neighborhoods, more cars, more lawns -- all sources of bay pollutants -- and canceling out improvements, he said.

But environmentalists have also blamed local governments, and the bay program itself, for not being more aggressive.

They have said the past six years have been consumed by research efforts and voluntary pollution-reduction programs, when new laws or stringent enforcement might have accomplished more.

DOJ_NMG_0112555

One advocate of a more confrontational approach was sworn in as Maryland's attorney general Tuesday: Douglas F. Gansler (D), who has pledged an "all-out assault" on bay polluters. The Chesapeake Bay Foundation has also pushed the Maryland legislature to do more in the new session, calling for a "green fund" of up to $50 million a year for pollution-reduction projects.

Batiuk's talk yesterday reflects a serious shift in rhetoric for the EPA's bay program. For years, program officials had maintained that the 2010 goal was still within reach.

But last year, bay program Associate Director Mike Burke said, officials were asked to submit goals for an EPA-wide strategic plan. Employees would be evaluated on their progress toward the goals, Burke said.

If the 2010 deadline is not met, officials said, state governments could be made to compile a "pollution budget" for the bay, listing what is coming downstream now, where it comes from and by how much it needs to be reduced.

In the meantime, a new Chesapeake agreement, with another deadline, could also be worked out.

But the past two decades have soured some people on agreements. Bernie Fowler, a former Maryland state senator who has been an outspoken voice for the Patuxent River and the bay, said he was tired of people making promises that the bay would be fixed soon.

"A lot of those very people have left the planet and haven't seen it done," said Fowler, who is 82. "I don't want that to happen to me."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Rehnquist Drug Dependency Detailed (AP)

By PETE YOST,

AP, January 5, 2007

A physician at the U.S. Capitol prescribed a powerful sleep aid for William Rehnquist for nearly a decade while he was an associate justice of the Supreme Court, according to newly released FBI records.

The records present a picture of a justice with chronic back pain who for many months took three times the recommended dosage of the drug Placidyl and then went into withdrawal in 1981 when he abruptly stopped taking it.

Rehnquist checked himself into George Washington University Hospital, where he tried to escape in his pajamas and imagined that the CIA was plotting against him, the records indicate.

Although Rehnquist's drug dependency was publicly known around the time he was hospitalized in 1981, the release of the FBI records provides new details.

The justice was weaned off Placidyl in early 1982 in a detoxification process that took a month, according to the records. The hospital doctor who treated Rehnquist said the Capitol Hill physician who prescribed Placidyl for Rehnquist was practicing bad medicine, bordering on malpractice. Both doctors' names were deleted from the documents before they were released.

The FBI documents were prepared in 1986 when Rehnquist - who began serving on the court on Jan. 7, 1972 - was nominated for chief justice, years after his problems with the drug had ended. They were released by the agency in response to requests under the Freedom of Information Act. The agency said one of the seven folders of Rehnquist documents could not be found.

A psychiatrist told the FBI that Rehnquist's family in 1981 noted "long-standing slurred speech which seems to coincide with administration of Placidyl," one FBI interview report stated. The psychiatrist also indicated that Rehnquist's chronic back pain led to his heavy use of such substances as Darvon and Tylenol 3, which the psychiatrist said also played a part in Rehnquist's condition.

An attending physician at the U.S. Capitol detailed Rehnquist's problems with Placidyl for the FBI, saying that prior to his seeing the justice in 1972, Rehnquist was prescribed the drug by another doctor for relief from insomnia. The attending physician told the FBI he continued to prescribe Placidyl for the entire 10-year period that he treated Rehnquist.

The physician said that Rehnquist had been prescribed 500 milligrams of Placidyl per evening, but that Rehnquist was actually taking 1,500 milligrams each night. The doctor said this increased consumption may have coincided with Mrs. Rehnquist's illness and treatment for cancer.

Rehnquist had told the physician that he was taking one pill before going to bed and he would take other pills if he awakened during the night.

The physician indicated that he decided to discontinue the drug's use and to try another medication. Rehnquist said the new medication was not strong enough, an FBI interview report stated. The physician said he then prescribed a substitute and then another, at which point Rehnquist went into the hospital.

The hospital doctor who successfully weaned Rehnquist from the drug told the FBI that the toxicity of Placidyl causes blurred vision, slurred speech and difficulty in making physical movements. Once a patient stops taking the drug, the withdrawal symptoms of delirium begin, which is what happened to Rehnquist at the hospital.

The doctor who helped Rehnquist get off the drug said the justice's wife was highly upset and felt that the prescribing physician and the pharmacist who filled the prescription were probably intimidated by such high-ranking officials as Supreme Court justices and senators and probably would have agreed to almost any request.

Copyright 2007 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.

More Politics News
Bush Puts Finishing Touches on Iraq Plan
1 hr ago
2008 Chatter Fills the Halls of Congress
1 hr 6 mins ago
Lawmakers to Debate 'Pay as You Go' Rule
41 mins ago
Bush to Name Retired Admiral As Top Spy
41 mins ago
Nancy Pelosi Basks in Historic Day
41 mins ago
Ex-Dem. Party Boss Blasts Kerry in Book
29 mins ago
Idaho Gov to Pay for Jet Ride to Arizona
Patrick Sworn in As Mass. Governor
10 hrs ago
Local
Nancy Pelosi Basks in Historic Day
Nuclear Agency Head Dismissed for Lapses
Lawmakers to Debate 'Pay as You Go' Rule
Bush Puts Finishing Touches on Iraq Plan
Bush to Name Retired Admiral As Top Spy
2008 Chatter Fills the Halls of Congress
Statement May Allow Gov't to Open Mail
Bush Makes Light of Earlier Gaffe
Bush Looking at Global Warming Ideas
Today's Most Popular
1. Congressman uses Quran once owned by Thomas Jefferson in ceremony
2. School Shooting Suspect Held on $1M Bail

3. Statement May Allow Gov't to Open Mail
4. Yanks, D-Backs Agree on Big Unit Trade
5. Somalis, Ethiopia Battle Islamic Militia
6. Bush to Give Iraq War Plan Next Week
7. Reports: Bush to Replace Top Generals
8. 1870s Dead Horse Photo Sparks Mystery
9. Calf With Two Faces Born at Va. Farm
10. Bush Talks About Iraq, Saddam Execution

local sponsors
This browser does not support inline frames.
Add News to Your Website | RSS | News by Topic | Contact Us | Join Examiner | Copyright | Terms of Use | Privacy Policy
Advertise with Examiner: In Print | Online
National Atlanta Baltimore Boston Chicago Cleveland Dallas Denver Detroit Houston Indianapolis Los Angeles Miami Minneapolis - St. Paul New York Philadelphia Phoenix Pittsburgh Portland San Diego San Francisco San Jose Seattle St. Louis Washington DC

Sedative Withdrawal Made Rehnquist Delusional In '81 (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

The late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist took a powerful sedative during his first decade on the Supreme Court and grew so dependent on it that he became delusional and tried to escape from a hospital in his pajamas when he stopped taking the drug in 1981, according to newly released FBI files.

The files also show that during both of Rehnquist's confirmation battles -- when he was first named to the court by President Richard Nixon in 1971 and when President Ronald Reagan nominated him as chief justice in 1986 -- the Justice Department enlisted the FBI to find out what witnesses lined up by Senate Democrats were prepared to say.

The FBI this week released 1,561 pages from its files on Rehnquist in response to Freedom of Information Act requests filed after his death in September 2005. Privacy laws forbid disclosure of such files during the person's lifetime.

The fact that Rehnquist checked into George Washington University Hospital for a week in late December 1981 to be treated for back pain and dependence on a prescription drug was previously known. Journalists had noted that fall that Rehnquist's speech was sometimes slurred on the bench, and The Washington Post reported on the hospitalization.

But the files reveal dramatic new details about the length and intensity of the addiction. During its routine 1986 investigation of Rehnquist's background, the FBI concluded that Rehnquist began taking the drug Placidyl for insomnia after back surgery in 1971, the year before he joined the court. By 1981, he apparently was taking 1,500 milligrams each night, three times the usual starting dose.

Placidyl, known generically as ethchlorvynol, is a sleep-inducing drug that is not usually prescribed for more than a week at a time. It is not an opiate and is not a painkiller, but it is addictive, and withdrawal can cause hallucinations and temporary memory loss.

Doctors interviewed by the FBI told agents that when the associate justice stopped taking the drug, he suffered paranoid delusions. One doctor said Rehnquist thought he heard voices outside his hospital room plotting against him and had "bizarre ideas and outrageous thoughts," including imagining "a CIA plot against him" and "seeming to see the design patterns on the hospital curtains change configuration."

At one point, a doctor told the investigators, Rehnquist went "to the lobby in his pajamas in order to try to escape." Ultimately, the doctors concluded that the withdrawal symptoms were so severe that they began giving Rehnquist the drug again and slowly lowered the dosage until he quit taking it entirely Feb. 7, 1982.

By 1986, the files show, all the doctors interviewed by the FBI said the former drug dependence should not affect Rehnquist's future work on the court, and it did not become an issue in his confirmation as chief justice.

Alexander Charns, a lawyer in Durham, N.C., who was among the scholars and journalists who received the documents this week, said that in his view, they contain evidence of "the ongoing use of the FBI for political purposes, not only in the sixties and seventies but well into the 1980s."

Because the FBI withheld some documents on national security grounds and because many of the pages it released are heavily edited, "no one can be entirely certain what happened and why" when the FBI conducted its background investigations, Charns said.

But in the files that have come to light, he said, there is a clear partisan tilt. "You don't have Democrats calling up the FBI saying, 'We need to know what the Republican witnesses are going to say about Rehnquist' the way you have Republicans calling up saying, 'We need to know what the Democratic witnesses are going to say,' " Charns said.

FBI spokesman Paul Bresson declined to comment on any documents released by the bureau. "We don't expand beyond what has been released, because that's all the information that's been released pursuant to the law," he said.

However, Bresson denied that the FBI's background investigations for judicial nominees are partisan in any way.

"We are not political; we are apolitical. We're just trying to find the facts," he said. "It's a very rigorous process that involves investigating both people who are going to say very favorable things and people who may not. We don't make suitability judgments. . . . We report the facts to the agency that has requested the background check, in this case the White House."

The files indicate that in 1971, the Nixon administration was deeply concerned about hostile witnesses to Rehnquist's confirmation after the Senate's rejection of two previous Supreme Court nominees, Clement Haynsworth and G. Harrold Carswell.

In an October 1971 memo, an aide to FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover said Deputy Attorney General Richard Kleindienst had telephoned to request a "criminal background check" on two Phoenix residents who were expected to testify against Rehnquist's nomination.

The Post reported at the time that the FBI was stirring controversy by questioning potential witnesses against Rehnquist, including Harvard Law School professor Laurence Tribe. When a Harvard official complained that the interviews were "seriously intimidating," Kleindienst wrote back that the questioning was impartial and that "any assumption that interviews were conducted with a view toward 'intimidation' is completely unjustified."

In 1986, the FBI files show, Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, asked the FBI to interview witnesses who might testify about allegations that Rehnquist had "challenged" blacks waiting in line to vote in Phoenix in 1962. Rehnquist was a legal adviser to the local Republican Party at the time.

Thurmond's request was relayed to the FBI by John R. Bolton, who was then an assistant attorney general and who recently stepped down as ambassador to the United Nations after the Senate did not act on his nomination. Although an FBI official warned that the bureau might be accused of "intimidating the Democrats' witnesses," Bolton approved the request and wrote that he would "accept responsibility should concerns be raised about the role of the FBI."

Bolton said in a telephone interview yesterday that there was no political bias in the investigation, because the request actually came from Senate Democrats.

"The Democrats wanted the FBI to interview these people who had raised questions about what Rehnquist had done," he said. "It was an unusual request. It stretches the whole concept of a background check. But Thurmond and the other Republicans on the committee at the time felt we should go ahead because there wouldn't be anything to it and Rehnquist would go ahead and be confirmed."

And that, Bolton added, is what happened. "The FBI didn't find any evidence that Rehnquist had intimidated voters," he said.

Torture Case Defendant Loses 1st Legal Fight (SPT)

St. Petersburg Times, January 5, 2007

A judge rejects Scott Schweickert's request to throw out statements he made about helping to drug two men who were then raped and killed.

TAMPA - Testifying for the first time since his arrest in a case involving allegations of torture, rape and murder, Scott Schweickert accused authorities Thursday of violating his rights by denying him a lawyer when he was first questioned.

DOJ_NMG_0112559

But a federal prosecutor said Schweickert's story was false, and he had documents and tapes to prove it.

Schweickert, 41, is accused of helping Steven Lorenzo drug two Tampa men who were later raped and killed. His federal trial is scheduled to begin Monday.

U.S. District Judge Steven Merryday conducted a hearing Thursday on whether statements Schweickert made to law enforcement should be thrown out because his constitutional rights were denied.

Schweickert is charged with conspiracy and assisting in a drug-facilitated crime of violence against Michael Wachholtz and Jason Galehouse, both 26. The two men disappeared the same weekend in December 2003.

Wachholtz's decomposed body was found two weeks later. Galehouse has never been found, but blood identified as his was found on Lorenzo's garage floor.

Schweickert said he requested a lawyer after he was served with a subpoena on May 3, 2005, to testify before a grand jury in the Lorenzo case.

But when he arrived in Tampa from his home in Peru, Ill., he said he was informed he wasn't entitled to legal representation.

"They told me I was ineligible for an attorney," said Schweickert, who was dressed in an orange prison jumpsuit. "There's no sense in asking for something you can't have."

Schweickert was questioned for nearly seven hours that day by Tampa police and a Drug Enforcement Administration agent.

Schweickert's lawyer, Pedro Amador, said those statements should be thrown out because they were illegally obtained.

"It all should have stopped after he requested a lawyer," Amador said.

Schweickert also said he was falsely led to believe he would be granted immunity when authorities told him they would try to assist him if he was truthful.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Anthony Porcelli said Schweickert was never given any promises. He also noted Schweickert lied to the grand jury, which would be unnecessary if he felt he had immunity.

Porcelli called DEA agent Scott Albrecht, who testified that Schweickert had been informed of his right to an attorney several times but never requested one. In fact, Schweickert refused an offer to go before a judge to determine whether he qualified for a court-appointed attorney, he said.

Schweickert seemed eager to cooperate, and offered to drive officers around Tampa to show them where Lorenzo had stashed Galehouse's dismembered body. Schweickert also volunteered to draw a crude schematic showing where in Lorenzo's garage Galehouse had been killed, Albrecht said.

After listening to nearly five hours of testimony, Merryday rejected Schweickert's request to throw out the statements.

"The evidence shows that at no time did the defendant request a lawyer," Merryday said.

The hearing continues today with Merryday scheduled to decide whether to allow the prosecution to show pictures and videos found in Lorenzo's house during Schweickert's trial.

Five Men Indicted On Drug Charges (BSUN)

The Baltimore Sun, January 4, 2007

A grand jury in Baltimore indicted five defendants yesterday after federal drug agents seized 23 kilograms of cocaine last month and arrested the men involved in the delivery to Howard County on conspiracy charges.

The defendants -- Alejandero Arango-Lopez, 38, Jesus Luis Sanchez-Cuevas, 30, Julio Grano, 29, of Reidsville, N.C.; Juan Gonzalez, 29, of Guadalajara, Mexico; and Christopher Devan Towns, 41, of Raleigh, N.C. -- remained in jail. No court dates have been set.

According to court documents, a state trooper in North Carolina stopped the tractor-trailer Arango-Lopez was driving Dec. 18 for speeding. The trooper found cocaine in the vehicle, authorities said.

Court documents show that Drug Enforcement Administration agents learned that Sanchez-Cuevas and Arango-Lopez were delivering the cocaine from California to the truck stop at Exit 35 off Interstate 95 in Howard County. Sanchez-Cuevas and Arango-Lopez were to deliver the cocaine to Grano and others and were to be paid $10,000 each for the delivery, documents said.

Federal agents intercepted the delivery and arrested the men. If convicted, the defendants could receive a maximum sentence of life imprisonment and a minimum sentence of 10 years in prison.

[Matthew Dolan]

Feds Will Help County Go After Gang Members (PALMBEACHP)

Palm Beach Post, January 5, 2007

Federal agents will step in to help prosecute local gang members under the nation's racketeering laws, Palm Beach County Sheriff Ric Bradshaw said Thursday.

Members of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and probably the Drug Enforcement Administration will go after those responsible for a surge in murders, Bradshaw said. The nation's racketeering law, stronger than the state statute, allows investigators to charge gang leaders who orchestrate a killing even if they did not pull the trigger.

Palm Beach County's murder rate soared in 2006, with 101 people killed, including 36 in the unincorporated area. The year was the deadliest since 1994.

On New Year's Day, 37 shots were fired from a sport utility vehicle in Riviera Beach, killing 8-month-old Tavares Carter Jr., who was strapped in his car seat. Four adults also were hit as they ran for cover. Two more men were hit in a drive-by shooting on Lantana Road on Wednesday.

Bradshaw revived the county's violent crimes task force a year ago, and hopes that involving federal agents will give local law enforcement even more muscle to dismantle local gangs.

Congress passed the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, or RICO, in the 1970s to crack down on organized crime like the Mafia. But law enforcement agencies have found it a useful way to prosecute gang leaders who trade in illegal drugs and plan murders.

Federal law also helps investigators protect the identities of witnesses. Though Florida law makes all depositions, evidence and information shared between attorneys in a criminal case public record before trial, prosecutors in a federal case can shield their documents. That secrecy can prevent gang leaders from intimidating and silencing witnesses, Bradshaw said.

Federal investigators have used the racketeering law to charge 40 members and associates of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang, and the leader of the Mexican Mafia, who collected a cut of drug sales by Latino street gangs in Orange County, Calif.

Defense attorneys have criticized use of those laws, however, saying that federal agents have used tenuous links and a wide dragnet to win convictions of low-level gang members who were not responsible for violent crimes.

Colombia Extradites 2 Police Officers (AP)

AP, January 5, 2007

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) -- Colombia has extradited to the United States a police officer and a former policeman charged with helping smuggle more than 2 tons of cocaine into the U.S. on cargo flights, U.S. officials said Thursday.

Leonidas Molina Triana, a former major in the Colombia's national police, and Humberto Avila, a patrolman at Bogota's El Dorado airport, were arrested in April as part a joint probe by prosecutors in New York and law enforcement agencies in Colombia, the United States and Mexico.

Four other current and former officers, as well as a commercial airline employee, are expected to be extradited soon, Erin McKenzie-Mulvey, a DEA spokeswoman in New York, told The Associated Press.

Operation "Caso Dorado," or Golden Case, was based on an indictment from a U.S. District Court in New York alleging that Colombia's Norte del Valle cartel -- the country's biggest -- recruited workers at Avianca Airlines and police at Bogota's El Dorado airport to ship cocaine on commercial aircraft.

Authorities said corrupt police officials and Avianca employees falsified paperwork in October 2005 that allowed 901 pounds of cocaine to pass through the airline's cargo facility undetected.

DOJ_NMG_0112561

The drugs were seized by law enforcement authorities in Mexico, allegedly en route to the United States.

Shipments totaling nearly 2 tons were intercepted in Mexico in March and April 2006.

If convicted, the defendants face a minimum of 10 years in prison. The charges carry a maximum life sentence, but the United States has assured Colombia that it will not seek life sentences for defendants extradited from the South American country.

Colombia Extradites Policemen To U.S. (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

Two Colombian police officers have been extradited to the U.S. to face cocaine smuggling charges, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) officials said yesterday.

Leonidas Molina-Triana, a former major in the Colombian National Police (CNP), and Humberto Avila, a police officer, are named in a federal grand jury indictment on charges of conspiring to ship more than $50 million in cocaine through the El Dorado International Airport in Bogota to Mexico en route to the United States.

DEA Special Agent in Charge John P. Gilbride, who heads the agency's New York field office, said Colombia's infamous Norte Valle drug cartel recruited Colombian police officials responsible for airport security and employees of Avianca Airlines to facilitate the smuggling of cocaine to the United States.

"These extraditions are a warning to those individuals who smuggle drugs into the United States that the DEA and the U.S. attorney's office will continue to vigorously investigate your organizations to ensure you are brought to justice," Mr. Gilbride said.

"Leonidas Molina-Triana and Humberto Avila both worked for the Colombian National Police, and both betrayed the trust of the public and airline employees," he said.

The indictment, handed up in U.S. District Court in New York, said that in October 2005, Maj. Molina-Triana, Officer Avila and Avianca Airlines employees permitted more than 800 pounds of cocaine with a street value of $10 million to pass through security at the Avianca Airlines cargo facility at El Dorado airport without detection.

It said Officer Avila, who was assigned to the airport, moved the cocaine through security and guarded the drugs for three days in the Avianca cargo facility. The cocaine was then put on an Avianca flight to Mexico City, where it was seized by Mexican law-enforcement personnel.

The indictment also said that in March and April, the Norte Valle cartel used Maj. Molina-Triana and Officer Avila to smuggle more than 3,500 pounds of cocaine valued at $40 million from Bogota to the United States via Mexico. Those drugs were seized by U.S. authorities.

DEA spokesman Garrison K. Courtney said the extraditions are part of "Operation Caso Dorado," a joint investigation conducted by the U.S. Attorney's Office in New York, the DEA in Bogota and New York, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents, and Colombian and Mexican law-enforcement authorities.

Mr. Courtney said both men have been ordered held pending trial. If convicted, they face life sentences and a mandatory minimum of 10 years' imprisonment, although the U.S. government has assured Colombia that it will not seek life sentences for suspects extradited from Colombia.

The indictment also seeks the forfeiture of $50 million from the two men.

"Today, more than ever, the integrity of the law-enforcement and airline personnel responsible for the safety of airline passengers and cargo is of critical importance," said U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia. "When such officials facilitate the smuggling of contraband destined for the United States, they not only violate our criminal laws but also threaten our national security."

Colombia Extradites Two Police Officers To US On Drug Smuggling Charges (VOA)

Voice of America, January 4, 2007

ColombiaTwo Colombian police officers have been extradited to the United States on charges of helping to smuggle more than $50 million worth of cocaine into the U.S. on cargo flights.

DOJ_NMG_0112562

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Thursday announced the extradition of Leonidas Molina Triana, a former major in Colombia's national police, and Humberto Avila, an active patrolman at Bogota's El Dorado airport.

The indictment alleges that Molina-Triana was one of a number of corrupt officials who helped Colombia's Norte del Valle drug cartel recruit workers at Avianca Airlines, and police at El Dorado airport, to ship cocaine on commercial aircraft.

Authorities say the two men conspired to facilitate cocaine shipments through the airport to Mexico en route to the United States. If convicted, they could face a maximum sentence of life in prison and a mandatory minimum of 10 years in prison.

The United States, however, has assured Colombia it will not seek life sentences for defendants extradited from the South American country.

The DEA says the investigation, known as "Operation Caso Dorado," involved law enforcement authorities from the United States, Colombia and Mexico.

Some information for this report was provided by AP.

IMMIGRATION:

Wisconsin Man, 81, Ordered Deported; Was SS Guard (AP)

Associated Press

AP, January 5, 2007

CHICAGO — An immigration judge ordered the deportation of an 81-year-old Wisconsin man accused of serving as a Nazi concentration camp guard, the Justice Department announced today.

Judge Jennie Giambastiani ordered Wednesday that Josias Kumpf be deported to Germany, Austria or Serbia. The department said Kumpf chose Germany, although it was unclear when he would be deported.

Kumpf's attorney, Peter Rogers of Pittsburgh, said his client would appeal the ruling within 30 days as required.

In July, the federal government asked the judge to deport Kumpf, who was stripped of his U.S. citizenship in 2005 after a federal judge in Milwaukee concluded he had "personally assisted" in the persecution of prisoners.

Kumpf served as an armed SS guard at Sachsenhausen Concentration Camp in Germany, an SS labor camp in Trawniki, Poland, and at construction sites in occupied France, the Justice Department said.

Kumpf was born in what is now Serbia, immigrated to the United States from Austria in 1956, and became a U.S. citizen in 1964. The federal judge in Milwaukee found Kumpf didn't disclose he had been an SS guard because he feared it would disqualify him when he applied for a visa to the United States.

In a 2003 interview, Kumpf said he was taken from his home in Yugoslavia as a 17-year-old and forced to serve as a guard, but he didn't participate in any atrocities.

"We do not believe that 'assistance and persecution' would include a gentleman who was involuntarily inscripted into the army, assigned to the SS and then stationed at places where admittedly terrible things happened. My client never took part in them," Rogers said.

TAX:

Suit Says Couple Cost U.S. Treasury Millions (JSO)

By Erinn Deshinsky, OF THE JOURNAL STAR

Peoria Journal Star (Central Illinois), January 5, 2007

The Reddys of Seneca own two tax services

SENECA - The Justice Department has brought a federal lawsuit against a Seneca couple accused of costing the U.S. Treasury more than $13 million in faulty income tax returns.

The suit, filed Dec. 29 in U.S. District Court in Chicago against Royanne and Neal Reddy, seeks to permanently bar them from preparing federal tax returns for others. Their companies are advertised as specializing in tax service for trucking and construction companies.

The Reddys own Royanne's Tax Service in Marseilles and Royanne and Company in Princeton. The couple has prepared more than 9,000 returns since 2002, according to a Justice Department news release.

The Reddys were not available for comment Thursday. The lawsuit alleges 70 of these returns, which were prepared by the Reddys or their employees, required adjustments and 64 returns contained improper deductions of as much as $30,000. The suit also says the savings from the under-reported returns averaged to about $2,775 per customer.

The Reddys are accused of fraudulently fabricating or inflating business expenses to reduce customers' incomes. They are also accused of fabricating income for some customers so they could receive earned income tax credits.

The suit also claims the couple provided false documents to IRS agents auditing their customers' returns.

The Justice Department said that if it wins the suit, the Reddys must give the government a list of their customers' names, addresses, e-mail addresses, phone numbers and Social Security numbers.

Erinn Deshinsky can be reached at 686-3041 or state@pjstar.com.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Take Control Of Congress (AP)

By David Espo

AP, January 5, 2007

In a day of ceremony and historic change, Rep. Nancy Pelosi became the nation's first female House speaker on Thursday as Democrats eagerly took control of Congress for the final two years of President Bush's term.

"The Democrats are back," rejoiced Pelosi, and she immediately set the rank-and-file to work passing tougher ethics rules.

As is customary, the opening moments of the 110th Congress produced pledges of bipartisanship at both ends of the Capitol. Yet Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid signaled a new political order when they swiftly challenged Bush over the war in Iraq.

"No issue in our country is more important than finding an end to this intractable war," said Reid, D-Nev. "Completing the mission in Iraq is the president's job, and we will do everything in our power to ensure he fulfills it." Bush is expected to announce a revised strategy next week for the war, which has claimed the lives of more than 3,000 members of the U.S. armed forces.

The two houses convened at the stroke of noon, under Democratic control together for the first time since 1994.

That meant a return to power for men long used to wielding it. Liberals such as Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Rep. John Dingell of Michigan are committee chairmen again, for example.

And it brought reduced circumstances to others — no one more so than Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., just a member of the ranks after eight tumultuous years as speaker.

By custom, lawmakers brought their children to opening ceremonies in the House, and Pelosi swept into the chamber accompanied by her grandchildren.

Formality reigned, as always, in the Senate, where Vice President Dick Cheney administered the oath of office to 33 new and newly re-elected senators.

Former President Clinton watched from the gallery as his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, was sworn in for a second term from New York.

In a chance encounter, he dodged questions about her presidential ambitions. "I would like not to talk about it today," he said.

It fell to Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, the new House Republican leader, to hand the gavel — symbol of the speaker's authority — to Pelosi. "Whether you're a Republican, Democrat or an independent, this is a cause for celebration," he said, noting her place in history.

DOJ_NMG_0112564

But he also gave notice to the party she leads, adding, "Republicans will hold the incoming majority accountable for its promises, and its actions."

Across the Capitol, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky took over as leader of minority Republicans, and said it was time to put an end to "a culture of partisanship over principle." He said cooperation was clearly possible on minimum wage and lobbying bills, and he added that he hoped the issues of Social Security and immigration would also yield to compromise.

Reid said he was eager for cooperation, and he arranged for a rare closed-door meeting of all senators before the Senate convened to help set a more cordial tone.

Leader of a slender majority, the Nevadan said, "Some may look at this composition as a recipe for gridlock, but I see it as a unique opportunity. ... We must turn the page on partisanship and usher in a new era of bipartisan progress."

He tempered his optimism when referring to Bush — a man he has previously called a loser. "The president has 22 months left in office. If he wants to accomplish anything, he will have to work with us in Congress to pass bipartisan legislation," he said.

In the two months since the election, both Reid and Pelosi have promised longer hours in Congress, an institution where the five-day work week is a rarity.

While Thursday was set aside for ceremony and celebration in the Senate, the House plunged immediately into work on the agenda that Democrats campaigned on last fall.

Despite Republican procedural protests, Democrats said they had the votes to assure passage of rules changes designed to end what they long called a "culture of corruption."

The changes expand restrictions on privately financed trips enjoyed by lawmakers, prohibit travel on corporate jets and require greater disclosure of earmarks, the pet projects inserted into legislation at the behest of individual lawmakers.

House members would still be allowed to take trips financed by foundations that seek to influence public opinion, but only if the ethics committee approves the travel in advance.

Current rules ban congressional travel paid for by lobbyists or foreign governments, and violations of the existing restrictions played heavily in the scandal involving Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

House Democrats have an ambitious agenda for the next few weeks. They have pledged to pass bills to raise the minimum wage, expand the opportunity for federally funded stem cell research, make Medicare prescription drugs cheaper, reduce the cost of student loans, implement anti-terror measures and reduce tax breaks enjoyed by the oil industry — all before Bush goes to the Capitol on Jan. 23 for his State of the Union address.

The Senate operates on a far slower pace, but Reid has said he will attempt to complete work on the early measures. Legislation to crack down on lobbyists will be the first bill brought to the floor next week.

At least one measure — the stem cell legislation — faces a veto threat. Republicans have also hinted Bush would reject a measure that orders the administration to muscle drug companies into lowering their prices for prescriptions filled under Medicare.

Democrats Elect First Female Speaker, Pass Lobbying Reforms (MCT)

By Margaret Talev And William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON - Democrat Nancy Pelosi of California took the oath of office Thursday as the nation's first female speaker of the House of Representatives, calling it "an historic moment for the Congress and for the women of this country" and "a moment for which we have waited more than 200 years."

As Democrats retook control of the House and Senate after a dozen years out of power, they moved immediately to pass lobbying and ethics reforms in the House and to establish their top 10 legislative goals in the Senate. Republicans in both chambers tried to walk a line between graciousness and pushing to hold Democrats to their pledges to include them as full partners in legislating.

Above all, the opening ceremonies of the 110th Congress were Pelosi's to relish.

DOJ_NMG_0112565

After addressing the Congressional Black Caucus in the morning, the wealthy, 66-year-old liberal from San Francisco arrived in the House chamber around noon with her family in tow. She sat beside House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md., whom only weeks earlier she had failed to displace in favor of her friend, Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa.

Democrats and many Republicans gave her a standing ovation.

Above, the gallery was dotted with celebrities, including actor Richard Gere and singer Tony Bennett.

Former House members with reason to celebrate slipped back onto the floor. They included Pat Schroeder, the Colorado feminist, and John Burton of San Francisco. Burton's late brother Phil and late sister-in-law Sala each previously served in the congressional seat that Pelosi has held since 1987. They cultivated her to replace them.

As members called out their votes for speaker, Pelosi cradled the newest of her six grandchildren, a boy born days after the November election, and tried to manage the other little ones, who were busily swinging a microphone and oblivious to the import of the moment.

Pelosi defeated Republican John Boehner of Ohio on a party-line vote, 233-202. She thanked her husband, Paul, and their five children "for giving me their love, support and the confidence to go from the kitchen to the Congress."

In a well-received speech before handing over the gavel to Pelosi, Boehner, the House Republican leader, praised the election of the first female speaker, saying, "Whether you're a Republican, a Democrat or an independent, today is a cause for celebration."

He called for a respectful debate between the parties, telling Pelosi, "May the best idea win."

He also warned, "If there is one lesson that stands out from our party's time in the majority, it is this: A congressional majority is simply a means to an end. The value of a majority lies not in the chance to wield great power but in the chance to use limited power to do great things. The moment a majority forgets this lesson, it begins writing itself a ticket to minority status."

Pelosi, grinning, waved the gavel, but said, "I accept this gavel in the spirit of partnership, not partisanship."

"By electing me speaker," she told her colleagues, "you have brought us closer to the ideal of equality that is America's heritage and hope. For our daughters and granddaughters, today we have broken the marble ceiling."

Pelosi touched on the Iraq war only briefly, saying Americans had rejected the idea of an open-ended commitment of troops there.

"It is the responsibility of the president to articulate a new plan for Iraq that makes it clear to the Iraqis that they must defend their own streets and their own security, a plan that promotes stability in the region and that allows us to responsibly redeploy American forces," she said.

After the ceremonies, House members moved to begin voting on an ethics package that's meant to correct some of the excesses of the previous Congress, including scandals that led to the prosecutions of at least two congressmen and of lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The House passed the first portion of that package overwhelmingly Thursday night, 430-1, with Rep. Dan Burton, R-Ind., the only opponent. It largely would ban meals, gifts and travel from lobbyists. It also would ban members from taking free rides on corporate jets. A second portion of the package, which would require lawmakers to identify which "earmark" spending projects they request and to curb deficit spending, is to be voted on Friday.

With her ascent, Pelosi, a Roman Catholic whose late father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., served in Congress and as mayor of Baltimore, also becomes the first Italian-American speaker and the first speaker from California.

As the roll call for speaker was counted, Republicans simply called out Boehner's name, but several Democrats expounded on why they were voting for Pelosi: "on behalf of my three daughters" or for "the first woman speaker and a daughter of Italy" or in memory of female leaders such as Harriet Tubman and Rosa Parks.

Some of the more poignant shouts came from members of the Black Caucus, who are looking ahead to a year when African-Americans will hold more positions of power in the House than ever, including Rep. James Clyburn, D-S.C., as majority whip and Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., as chairman of the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee.

Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr., D-Ill., said Pelosi's election was a major step in "the struggle for equality." Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., a civil rights leader in the `60s, called it a "historic day when the eyes of the nation are upon us."

DOJ_NMG_0112566

Thursday's swearing-in ceremony was the peak of a weeklong celebration for Pelosi that included being an honored guest at the Italian Embassy, attending Mass at her alma mater, Trinity University, and praying with soldiers.

After she was sworn in, she headed to a $1,000-per-ticket concert and fundraiser for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, featuring Bennett, famous for "I Left My Heart in San Francisco," and other singers.

On Friday afternoon, she's scheduled to be in Baltimore's Little Italy, where she was raised, to have a street named in her honor.

The Senate's opening was more low-key, but symbolically positive. Before being sworn in, members of both parties held an unofficial joint caucus in the old Senate chamber and came out of the historic room pledging to work in a bipartisan manner.

"I know that you're not accustomed, members of the press, to people getting along, working together, but Senator McConnell and I believe that this is a new day in Washington," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., with Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., smiling by his side.

McConnell said the meeting was "a chance for many of our members to express some of their quiet frustrations that we get past the level of partisanship that we've witnessed in recent years and develop stronger personal relationships as well as work across the party aisle."

After the swearing-in ceremonies, Reid introduced the Democrats' first 10 bills for the 110th Congress. Overhauling Congress' ethics system topped the agenda, followed by raising the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 an hour.

Democrats also plan to introduce bills to change the Medicare prescription-drug program, act on the 9-11 commission's recommendations, fund stem cell research, repair the nation's immigration system, strengthen the military, address rising college tuition, force Congress to tighten budget rules and develop an energy policy.

Nancy Pelosi Basks In Historic Day (AP)

By Erica Werner

AP, January 5, 2007

Surrounded by kids as well as cheering lawmakers, Nancy Pelosi marveled aloud at her long journey "from the kitchen to the Congress."

Six times a grandmother, now second in line to the presidency, Pelosi said her ascension to become the first female House speaker in history was the culmination of 200 years of struggle for women as well as a personal victory.

"We have made history, now let us make progress for the American people," she said.

It was her coming-out to the nation, and Pelosi, 66, sought to introduce herself not only as the San Francisco liberal decried by Republicans, but as Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi, Italian-American Catholic, mother of five and native of gritty Baltimore, where her father was mayor.

She arrived on the House floor Thursday with all six grandchildren in tow, including baby Paul Michael Vos, born to her daughter Alexandra in early November.

"I was raised in a large family that was devoutly Catholic, deeply patriotic, proud of our Italian-American heritage, and staunchly Democratic," Pelosi said. "My parents taught us that public service was a noble calling."

After her election by a vote of 233-202, the chamber's Democratic-Republican breakdown, a beaming Pelosi stood holding her sleeping infant grandson — who did not stir — and shook hands as she accepted congratulations from her fellow House members.

Minutes later, cheers erupted in the chamber as House Republican leader John Boehner handed her the speaker's gavel. Pelosi always has said she wants to be judged by her abilities, not her gender, but she happily acknowledged the importance of her achievement.

"By electing me as speaker you have brought us closer to the ideal of equality that is America's heritage and America's hope," Pelosi said. "This is an historic moment — for the Congress, and for the women of America. It is a moment for which we have waited more than 200 years. Never losing faith, we waited through the many years of struggle to achieve our rights."

"For our daughters and granddaughters, today we have broken the marble ceiling," she said. "For our daughters and our granddaughters now, the sky is the limit."

DOJ_NMG_0112567

Boehner, in handing her the gavel, said: "For more than 200 years, the leaders of our government have been democratically elected. And from their ranks, our elected leaders have always selected a man for the responsibility and honor of serving as speaker of the House. Always, that is, until today."

Onlookers in the packed visitors' galleries included actor Richard Gere and singer Tony Bennett, crooner of "I Left My Heart in San Francisco," along with hometown partisans.

"We look forward to the rest of the country appreciating the real San Francisco values, of diversity and a city of dreamers," said San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom. "You can only exploit the gay community so much. ... They're going to see there's so much more to San Francisco."

Everywhere Pelosi went Thursday supporters marveled at her achievement, especially other women.

Outside the Library of Congress, leaders from the National Organization for Women greeted her with a giant congratulation card. The message: "Way to Go!"

Newly elected Democratic Rep. Jason Altmire of Pennsylvania brought his wife, Kelly, and daughters Natalie, 8, and Grace, 5, to witness Pelosi's swearing-in and pose for photos with her.

"I'll make sure they understand the significance of it," Kelly Altmire said of her daughters. "I don't know if they get it yet, but they will."

Pelosi began her history-making day at a prayer service with her husband, Paul, at St. Peter's Catholic Church near the Capitol. She was met by a small knot of anti-abortion protesters carrying signs reading, "You can't be Catholic and pro-abortion." She walked by without acknowledging them.

Attending the service with her were Boehner and other Republican leaders her party put into the minority in the November election. Also there was new House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer of Maryland, a one-time Pelosi rival elected by House Democrats to be her No. 2 over her protests.

She later attended a ceremonial swearing-in of the Congressional Black Caucus, where the incoming leader of the 43-member group, Rep. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, D-Mich., made clear the pressure the new speaker will face. "She must deliver because black people delivered that we might have this majority," Kilpatrick said.

Thursday evening, Pelosi was being feted at a $1,000-a-head concert hosted by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee at the National Building Museum with performances from Carole King, Bennett, Wyclef Jean and others.

Pelosi attended Mass on Wednesday at Trinity University, where she's an alumna, and dined that night at the Italian Embassy.

Friday begins with an open house event across from the Capitol. Then she heads to Baltimore, where part of the street where she grew up in Little Italy is being dedicated in her honor: Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi Via.

Pelosi was raised there, the daughter of New Deal Maryland Rep. Thomas D'Alesandro, who later became the city's mayor. She didn't run for the House herself until 1987 after marrying Paul Pelosi, a wealthy businessman, moving to San Francisco and raising her children.

In Congress Pelosi displayed the tough politicking of her childhood environment. She wrung loyalties, counted votes and muscled aside Hoyer to become the Democrats' second-in-command, and then Democratic leader in 2002.

Civility, Synergy Top Order In Senate (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 5, 2007

Pledges to forge a new era of civility and bipartisan cooperation in the U.S. Senate abounded yesterday as Democrats took control of the chamber for the first time in 12 years.

"The majority my party holds is slim: 51-49," Majority Leader Harry Reid said in his opening address on the Senate floor. "Some may look at this composition as a recipe for gridlock, but I see it as a unique opportunity -- an opportunity for Democrats and Republicans to debate our differences and seek common ground.

"We must turn the page on partisanship and usher in a new era of bipartisan progress," the Nevada Democrat said.

DOJ_NMG_0112568

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell struck an equally conciliatory tone when he addressed the chamber, promising a spirit of teamwork to "find bold solutions to big problems."

"The challenges ahead will not be met if we do nothing to overcome the partisanship that has come to characterize this body over the past several years," said Mr. McConnell, Kentucky Republican.

"A culture of partisanship over principle represents a grave threat to the Senate's best tradition as a place of constructive cooperation. It undermines the spirit and the purpose of this institution."

He went a step further.

"I stake my party to a pledge: when faced with an urgent issue, we will act; when faced with a problem, we will seek solutions, not mere political advantage," Mr. McConnell said.

Mr. Reid's speech included a list of the majority's first 10 bills, which included the potentially divisive measures of authorizing federal funding of stem-cell research and reworking the Medicare drug benefit.

He also vowed to make ending the Iraq war a top priority, despite a possible confrontation with the White House and Senate Republicans.

"No issue in our country is more important than finding an end to the intractable war," Mr. Reid said.

The Senate leadership teams even made a tangible gesture of cooperation, holding an unprecedented bipartisan caucus yesterday morning in the Old Senate Chamber.

Still, the two parties have been at loggerheads for years, most recently with the Democratic minority filibustering judicial nominations, the elimination of the death tax and confirmation of John R. Bolton as ambassador to the United Nations.

Leaders on both sides of the aisle acknowledge not only that the two-vote margin is forcing them to act more cordially at the outset of the 110th Congress, but also that they must pass legislation fast in these salad days before Washington is overtaken by campaign politics for 2008.

The Democrats' narrow majority also is made tenuous by the slow recovery of Sen. Tim Johnson, a South Dakota Democrat who remains at George Washington University Hospital after a Dec. 13 brain hemorrhage. He still needs a ventilator, and doctors say he may need months to recover.

Mr. Johnson's death or resignation from the Senate likely would result in South Dakota's Republican governor appointing someone from his party to complete the term. Republicans would then control the chamber with a 50-50 split and Vice President Dick Cheney, the president of the Senate, able to cast the tie-breaking vote.

"There is going to be a great effort to work together to pass the major things we agree on," said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, Texas Republican and chairman of the Senate Republican Policy Committee. "If we disagree, disagree agreeably and try to produce results."

She predicted the civility would last long enough to pass ethics reforms, a deficit-reduction plan and tinker with Social Security, the longtime third rail of American politics.

"We ought to be able to find common ground on Social Security," she said. "We are headed for a train wreck."

Mr. Reid's first 10 bills did not include Social Security reform. The minority, however, will be allowed to submit the next 10 bills.

Reid Takes Center Stage, But He's Hardly The Star Of The Show (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

Harry Reid is often called the man from Searchlight, Nevada. Nobody has ever called him the man from Spotlight.

The soft-spoken Democrat became the most powerful figure in the United States Senate yesterday. But the newly minted majority leader was quickly eclipsed -- not just by the ascent of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi but even by Bill Clinton's trip to the men's room.

Minutes before Reid assumed power yesterday, the former president, in the building to see his wife sworn in for a second term, sauntered into the Senate press gallery in search of a urinal. Reporters swarmed, some abandoning their seats in the chamber where they had been waiting for Reid.

DOJ_NMG_0112569

"They told me the closest restroom was in the press gallery," Clinton explained.

Reid was bound to be overshadowed yesterday. Pelosi was the first woman to become speaker in American history. Reid was merely the 20th man to become Senate majority leader since the position was created 87 years ago.

Pretty much everybody regarded the Pelosi ascent as momentous. "Historic event," said the Associated Press. "An historic day," admitted Minority Leader John Boehner (Ohio). "An historic moment," claimed Pelosi herself. Only an article in Reid's home-state Las Vegas Review-Journal called his elevation "historic."

Part of the disparity, however, was less about history than style. Pelosi scheduled four days of parties for her installation -- a festival Republicans dubbed the Pelosi-Palooza -- including an extravaganza featuring Tony Bennett, and a street naming for Pelosi in her native Baltimore.

And Reid? "In Searchlight, we don't have street names," he said.

Reid, a mild-mannered Mormon, consented to not a single party in his honor this week. Instead, he assembled senators from both parties yesterday morning for a private moment of bonding in the Old Senate Chamber. Reid emerged with the minority leader, Kentucky's Mitch McConnell, walking so close together their hands almost touched. "Senator McConnell and I believe this is a new day in Washington," Reid announced.

"I think Harry's got it right," McConnell answered.

After a couple of perfunctory questions, the reporters grew silent. "One more question?" Reid asked. Nobody volunteered.

"When we're not fighting, they're not asking any questions," observed Sen. Chuck Schumer (D-N.Y.).

Over on the House side, lawmakers and spectators gave Pelosi a raucous standing ovation. She waved and blew kisses. On the Senate floor, packed with old-timers including John Glenn and Walter Mondale, Reid entered mostly unnoticed. He shook a few hands, drummed his finger on his desk and hitched up his pants by the belt. Senators, meanwhile, waved up to President Clinton, who was sitting in the second row of the public gallery with his daughter and mother-in-law, greeting a line of fans and talking on a cellphone until he noticed the opening prayer had started.

The attention quickly shifted -- to Robert Byrd. The 89-year-old West Virginia Democrat, beginning his ninth term, wore a red-white-and-blue tie and punctuated the opening prayer with shouts of "Yes!" and "Mmmhmmm!" and "Yes, Lord!" and "Yes, in Jesus's name!" When he was sworn in, he twice cried out "Hallelujah!" and then "Amen!" Minutes later, he was installed as Senate president pro tempore, the majority party's most senior member. "Yeah, man! Yeah, man!" he shouted. "Hallelujah!" "I do, so help me God!" he shouted when the oath was administered. "Yeah, man!"

His colleagues were amused. Sen. Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) at one point pretended to tilt a bottle into his mouth, though it was unclear whether Byrd was the target of that gesture.

Then there was Reid. He bowed over his desk for the prayer. He silently escorted senators for their swearing-in. Then, in his first utterance as majority leader, he spoke the immortal words "Mr. President, I note the absence of a quorum."

When he started his speech, Reid spoke in a barely audible voice, and his colleagues' chatter drowned out his oration. "Please," the presiding officer said with a bang of the gavel, "the majority leader is speaking."

Those who listened to Reid heard a plea for senators to work harder. "Factory workers, shopkeepers in America's malls, schoolteachers, police officers, miners, welders, and businessmen and -women work at least five days a week," he said. "Shouldn't we?"

Evidently not. Just a few minutes into Reid's speech, only 20 senators remained on the floor. Reid's deputy, Dick Durbin (Ill.), typed on his Treo. When Reid started talking about the framers of the Constitution, Clinton left the room -- and most of the remaining spectators followed him.

Outside the chamber, Clinton greeted Sen. Joe Lieberman (Conn.) and a parade of well-wishers. Spying Byrd, the former president wrapped his arms around the voluble senator. "We love you!" he told Byrd, and then he turned to his mother-in-law. "Meet Hillary's mom."

On the Senate floor, Reid was still laying out, in detail, his 10-point legislative agenda. When he yielded the floor after 30 minutes, only three senators remained, and the half-dozen spectators lingering in the public gallery included Reid's wife.

It was no Pelosi-Palooza -- and that didn't seem to bother the Senate majority leader one bit. "Don't worry about Harry Reid," Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) told reporters. "He'll be okay."

DOJ_NMG_0112570

Smiles, Backslaps, Even A Civility Meeting: For A Day, At Least, Bipartisanship Reigns (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 4 — Capitol Hill observed a National Day of Comity on Thursday. Against the sober backdrop of war and as Democrats ascended in both chambers, people of both parties spoke of how committed they were to working together and changing the political tone.

And how many times have we heard that before?

"Almost on an annual basis," said Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, a three-decade veteran of civility vows in the capital. "It's like our New Year's ritual around here."

But maybe this time really will be different. Like 63-degree weather in January (and cherry blossoms out of season), Washington seemed to have flipped on its head, power-wise, karma-wise, at least for a few hours.

There were children and flowers everywhere, and pictures of Vice President Dick Cheney and Senator Edward M. Kennedy mugging together.

And a warm-looking handshake between the only Muslim in Congress, the newly elected Representative Keith Ellison, Democrat of Minnesota, and Representative Virgil H. Goode Jr., a Virginia Republican who had condemned Mr. Ellison's plan to use the Koran at his ceremonial swearing-in. (Mr. Ellison made history in more ways than one at that ceremony Thursday by using a Koran once owned by Thomas Jefferson.)

And dapper old senators saying things like this:

"The place is like a bubbling bottle of Champagne, overflowing with joy and hope and civility," said Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia. And to think, this guy is in the minority now.

O.K., so maybe the venerable Mr. Warner was exaggerating a bit. Or indulging in a smidge of sarcasm. But his words and the big smile with which he delivered them neatly captured the spirit of the day.

The Senate's top leaders, Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, and Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky, convened a bipartisan meeting at 9 a.m. to discuss bipartisanship.

"I'm here for the civility meeting," declared one freshman, Senator Amy Klobuchar, Democrat of Minnesota, as she stepped out of an aide's Honda outside the Capitol. She pretended to fuss with her hair, as if this were the first day of school and she was nervous. An upper classman, Senator Tom Harkin, Democrat of Iowa, sat in an idling Cadillac a few feet away.

Nearly all senators showed up for the civility meeting, which was held in the plush and ornate Old Senate Chamber. They left the doors open for several extra minutes so the photographers could come in to take pictures of the smiles and shoulder squeezes and hugs all around.

After a few minutes, the meeting reverted to the slightly awkward feel of a junior high school mixer, with the boys and girls (or Ds and Rs) repairing to separate sides of the room. There were a few exceptions, as when Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, an independent who caucuses with the Democrats, took a seat next to Senator Johnny Isakson, Republican of Georgia, after working both sides of the chamber.

At the very least, no one was alleged to have acted in an uncivil manner.

"Of course not," reported Senator John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire, shocked — shocked — that anyone could even suggest such a thing.

"People want us to stop acting like kindergarten kids," said Senator Lamar Alexander, Republican of Tennessee.

It was an open question as to how long this era of good feeling would last.

"What time is it?" Senator Claire McCaskill, a newly elected Democrat from Missouri, asked just before noon. "It's still early yet."

Not two minutes later, Senator Jim Bunning was asked a question — shouted a question, actually — about this latest of calls for civility.

"We hear them every year," Mr. Bunning, a second-term Republican from Kentucky, said before storming off, uncivilly.

DOJ_NMG_0112571

But that was the exception Thursday, as was the seemingly unhinged man who had apparently not gotten the comity memo and interrupted a television interview in the Russell Office Building, shouting profanity as he headed out the door with the Capitol police right behind him.

Back on the House side, fresh-faced Representative Patrick Murphy, Democrat of Pennsylvania, was clutching his 6-week-old daughter, Maggie, and talking about how he had choked up when taking the oath a little earlier.

An Army veteran who served in Iraq, Mr. Murphy said his mind had flashed to his time in the service, the oath he took there. And he nearly teared up again as he rubbed the soft cheeks of Maggie, who was sucking on a "Daddy's Little Girl" pacifier.

"It seems pretty collegial here," said Mr. Murphy, basing his assessment on exactly 90 minutes in the House and on his orientation soon after the election, where a fellow newbie gave up his seat so Mr. Murphy's wife, Jennifer, then very pregnant, could sit down.

"He was a Republican," Mr. Murphy recalled. If only he could remember the nice man's name. "I think he might have been from Florida."

Put it down as a baby step on the comity journey.

Jubilant Democrats Take The Wheel On Capitol Hill (LAT)

By Richard Simon And Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democrats took control of both the House and Senate today for the first time in the presidency of Republican George W. Bush — and promptly embraced at least some of the trappings of bipartisanship.

The House made history by electing Rep. Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco as its first female speaker, putting her behind Vice President Dick Cheney in the line of succession to the presidency.

Pelosi received the votes of the 233 Democrats who were elected to the House Nov. 7, defeating the Republican candidate, John Boehner of Ohio, who got the votes of the 202 Republicans.

In a sort of inaugural speech to her fellow House members, Pelosi immediately invoked the spirit of bipartisanship.

"In this House we may be of different parties," she said, "but we serve one country."

She recalled the ability of President Gerald R. Ford, a Republican who died the day after Christmas, to work with both parties when he served as a House member from Michigan for 25 years and the minority leader for eight of them.

Boehner struck a similar note. "We want to work with the incoming majority for the good of our nation that we were all elected to serve," he said in introducing Pelosi. "Republicans and Democrats can disagree without being disagreeable to each other."

In the Senate, meanwhile, Democrat Harry Reid of Nevada was selected majority leader, but it will be by the slimmest of majorities — 51 Democrats to 49 Republicans — that he will lead.

Reid convened a closed meeting, in the chamber where the Senate used to meet, for all 100 senators before the new senators were sworn into office. Ordinarily, each party holds its own closed meeting once a week.

After the meeting, Reid and Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the new leader of Senate Republicans, stood side by side as they spoke to reporters.

"Sen. McConnell and I believe this is a new day in Washington, that our efforts are going to be to work in a bipartisan basis, in an open fashion, to solve the problems of the American people," Reid asserted.

"Harry's got it right," McConnell said. "This opportunity we had in the Old Senate Chamber was a chance for many of our members to express some of their quiet frustrations, that we get past the level of partisanship that we've witnessed in recent years and develop stronger personal relationships, as well as work across the party aisle."

Democratic and Republican senators have traditionally gotten along better than House members, and there were signs of partisan tensions in the House even before Pelosi was elected speaker.

She pressed ahead with her agenda for the House's first 100 legislative hours — over Republican grumbling that she planned House floor votes without the usual committee action first.

DOJ_NMG_0112572

The schedule calls for votes Friday on two rules changes — one banning lobbyists' gifts to House members and the other requiring that legislation that would cut taxes or increase spending be accompanied by provisions to prevent an increase in the deficit. The House can adopt the rules changes without action by the Senate.

Next week, the House will begin voting on legislation that will need Senate consent and Bush's signature, including some highly controversial items. At the head of that list is a bill to expand embryonic stem cell research — the subject of Bush's only veto in his six years in office.

Democrats Take Control Of Congress (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman, Washington Bureau

Chicago Tribune, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In an historic and emotional display of determination and gratitude, Democrats elected the first woman Speaker of the House and took charge of the 110th Congress Thursday, pledging civility but also signaling sharp differences with President Bush over issues like the war in Iraq.

"I accept this gavel in the spirit of partnership, not partisanship," said Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), taking the heavy wooden gavel from John Boehner, the Republican leader from Ohio.

The 2006 elections dramatically altered the balance of power in Washington, diminishing President Bush's ability to influence legislation and providing Democrats with the ability to set the national agenda.

Democrats vowed to scrutinize Bush's Iraq policy which will be announced next week, as well as pass bills raising the minimum wage, expanding federally funded embryonic stem cell research and allowing Medicare to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies about the price of drugs.

After convening, the House immediately adopted new rules Thursday tightening ethics guidelines by banning lobbyists from giving gifts, meals and tickets to members and their staffs. The rules would also prohibit lobbyists from paying for a lawmaker's travel or providing flights on corporate jets. The measure passed 235-195, largely along partisan lines.

Before turning to legislative matters, the House was enveloped in the centuries-old ceremony of choosing a new speaker and swearing in 435 newly elected members. For nearly an hour, lawmakers rose one by one to cast their vote aloud for either Pelosi or Boehner, with Pelosi easily capturing 233 votes and the top post, which is second in the line of succession to the presidency.

"It's an historic moment for the Congress," Pelosi said. "It's an historic moment for the women of America. It is a moment for which we have waited over 200 years. Never losing faith, we waited through the many years of struggle to achieve our rights.

"But women weren't just waiting. Women were working. Never losing faith, we worked to redeem the promise of America, that all men and women are created equal. For our daughters and our granddaughters, today we have broken the marble ceiling. For our daughters and our granddaughters now, the sky is the limit."

Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr. (D-Ill.) invoked Rosa Parks, Harriet Tubman and even Jesus Christ as he added his name to the Pelosi tally. Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), a legend of the civil rights movement, observed that "the eyes of the nation are upon us."

By contrast, Republicans sat quietly as they inexorably slid from power, with former Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) standing grimly at the rear of the chamber in an area normally reserved for lowly backbenchers.

The galleries of both the House and the Senate were packed with family members and celebrities, including former President Bill Clinton, actor Richard Gere and singers Tony Bennett and Carole King, who came to watch the ceremonies.

In the Senate, Republicans and Democrats started their day with a private meeting in the old Senate chamber, where they talked about the need to work together if they hoped to accomplish anything.

"I think it's important to remember that some of the most significant achievements over the last 25 years have been during periods of divided government," said Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), the new Republican leader, striking a hopeful note.

That's in part because of Senate rules, including one that requires members of both parties to join forces to pass legislation because they must meet a threshold of 60 votes for anything that is the least bit controversial.

DOJ_NMG_0112573

"The message wasn't just to the Democrats in the last election, it was to the Republicans as well," said Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), the assistant majority leader. "People do want a change and the old way of doing things is just unacceptable. I think the Republicans understand that if they continue to play to a draw on issue after issue it won't help them in the future."

Still, Democrats won't have much leverage in the Senate. Their caucus numbers just 51, including an independent, and one Democrat, Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota, is still hospitalized following brain surgery.

Legislation will be far easier to pass in the House, where it takes just a simple majority to get anything done. On Friday, the House is expected to pass pay-as-you-go rules requiring Congress to finance all new spending initiatives in an effort to rein in the budget deficit and the growing national debt.

Much of Thursday's events involved ceremony, but many lawmakers seemed overcome by the significance of electing the nation's first woman as speaker of the House, describing it as a new chapter in American history.

Young children in their finest clothes swarmed around their parents and grandparents on the House floor. Pelosi, in particular, sat with her six grandchildren—including an infant grandson—as her colleagues cast their votes for speaker.

To her right sat Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), the new Democratic Caucus chairman, along with his son and two daughters. As he nominated Pelosi for speaker, he described himself as a father of three young children, then turned to give Pelosi a high five.

Even Boehner, the Republican leader, seemed caught up in the history-making moment.

"Today marks an occasion I think the Founding Fathers would view approvingly," said Boehner, just before handing Pelosi the gavel. "My fellow Americans: whether you're a Republican, a Democrat, or an independent, this is a cause for celebration."

For Pelosi, the day was for introducing herself to the nation. That she did, describing herself as the daughter of a Baltimore mayor, the devoutly Catholic offspring of Italian Americans, and the proud mother of five.

Still, Pelosi used the opportunity to stake out the Democrats' approach to policy, not just to celebrate her victory.

"Nowhere were the American people more clear about the need for a new direction than in Iraq," she told the House. "The American people rejected an open-ended obligation to a war without end. "Shortly, President Bush will address the nation on the subject of Iraq. It is the responsibility of the president to articulate a new plan for Iraq that makes it clear to the Iraqis that they must defend their own streets and their own security, a plan that promotes stability in the region, and that allows us to responsibly redeploy American forces."

Despite those pointed and partisan comments, Pelosi reminded lawmakers about the late President Gerald Ford, who served in the House at a time when Republicans and Democrats worked together.

"He healed the country when it needed healing," she said, urging members to work together. "This is another time, another war, and another trial of our American will, imagination, and spirit. Let us honor his memory, not just in eulogy, but in dialogue and trust across the aisle."

jzuckman@tribune.com

Speaker Pelosi's Ethics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 5, 2007

Ethics in politics is not the same as ethics in real life. Ethics in politics is a martial art. The biggest mistake you can make is thinking that the ethics package proposed by new Speaker Nancy Pelosi is mainly about "cleaning up" politics. Maybe. But it's first of all about cleaning the clocks of the Republicans.

The House Republicans got lazy. Jack Abramoff, Tom DeLay, earmarks, Duke Cunningham, Bob Ney. When Nancy Pelosi saw the Republicans had developed a compulsion to flagrantly throw their weight around, she grabbed them by the lapels of their Hickey Freeman suits, hoisted them into the air and slammed them onto the House floor, shrieking "the most corrupt Congress in history!" That's right. In history.

Ms. Pelosi started the long road to earning a black belt in political ethics (again, not to be confused with ethics as taught at, say, Aquinas College) back in 1987 by studying the Master -- Newt Gingrich. That was the year Nancy Pelosi entered the House as a California freshperson. And that was the year Newt Gingrich turned ethics into a weapon against the imperious Democratic

DOJ_NMG_0112574

House Speaker Jim Wright, who left in disgrace two years later. "We currently have the least ethical speaker in the 20th Century," said Grandmaster Gingrich. Nancy noticed.

Aficionados of the sport of political ethics will recall another name from that era, Fernand St Germain, then the Democratic chairman of the House Banking Committee at the time of the infamous Savings and Loan crisis of the 1980s, arguably the greatest source of congressional ethical lapses in, well, history. Enough of the ethical backwash from the S&L mess soiled Democrats that when Bill Clinton won the presidency in 1992, his party actually lost nine seats in the House. After the midterm elections two years later, Newt Gingrich was speaker of the House, with a 54-seat swing from Democrats to Republicans.

You think Nancy Pelosi didn't remember all that when one year ago this week Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty? Meet the first Madam Speaker -- in history.

Exploiting this gain, Speaker Pelosi is breaking a champagne victory bottle over the hull of a new set of House ethics rules. If you stare at these rules awhile, eventually you notice that they are less about the members of Congress than about someone else. They are about the bad people who lead the innocent lambs of Congress astray. They are about "lobbyists" and "private interests" and, not least, "corporate jets," which for the modern member of Congress appear to be the rough equivalent of demon rum.

Let us quickly note for the historical record that ever has it been congressional practice to deflect ethics elsewhere. The famous 1978 Ethics in Government Act, passed after Watergate and a Democratic Congress's war with Richard Nixon over spending power, was also aimed at bad people elsewhere, to wit, the executive branch. After Ronald Reagan took office in 1981, a parade of Independent Counsels authorized by the Ethics Act tortured a long series of executive branch officials, with piling on by shocked, shocked committees of Congress. Ray Donovan, Ed Meese, Ted Olson. All were entrapped by the ethics mores Congress wrote into the law.

The set of ethics rules proposed yesterday by Speaker Pelosi should be called the Condé Nast Traveler Ban. One can never underestimate the willingness of the political class to put a whole career at risk for one chance to fly over to play golf on St. Andrews or fly free with the significant other to investigate trade practices at Machu Picchu. Silly as it sounds, Ms. Pelosi, of sophisticated San Francisco, is probably doing the rubes a favor by weaning them off their addiction to free travel and goodie bags.

Her proposed earmark reform scuffles closer to the heart of the real problem. Earmarks, formerly known as pork, are spending items for a discrete interest which a member inserts into a broader spending bill. They aren't illegal, and in a democracy probably shouldn't be. As with campaign contributions, it doesn't matter to me who gives how much to whom, so long as the particulars are posted in public. Now, presumably, that will be the case with earmarks.

The Democrats successfully made earmarking for "corporate interests" the poster boys for a GOP "culture of corruption," but the fact is that the divisions of Beltway lobbyists seeking earmarks also represent cities, universities, state governments and government contractors. What caused this wretched excess? Our hallowed government.

Except for wars, federal spending as a percentage of GDP -- from 1792 until after World War II -- held below 10%. Then from about 1953 onward, it rose steadily to 20% of GDP. The spending itself runs to nearly $3 trillion dollars. These large numbers -- a veil for uncounted agencies, regulatory bureaucracies and federal rules -- represent what conservatives sometimes call Leviathan.

Liberals tend to think that conservatives "hate" government. That's not quite it. Smaller government is -- was -- a conservative principle for a reason relevant to Speaker Pelosi's ethics quest. The idea is to reduce, not eliminate, the switch-points of potential public corruption. If the parsons of the Beltway had wanted to avoid this ethics problem, they would have resisted helping the U.S. government become so crucially important -- for example, FCC rules -- to every nook and cranny of American life. Too late now.

Back in the late '80s during the days of the Keating Five -- one of the scandals that fell out of the S&L fiasco -- former Sen. William Proxmire said of the implicated senators: "These fellas did what senators have been doing for a long time. There's nothing illegal about it. It's just wrong." This is what Ms. Pelosi's rules are aimed at -- sleaze, the painted ladies of public corruption.

DOJ_NMG_0112575

When Jack Abramoff was wheeling the system for Indian casinos, his right-hand henchman, Michael Scanlon, a former congressional aide to Tom DeLay, squealed in email ecstasy to a colleague, "Wheez gonna be rich!" Well, yeah, that's gross, but it's the same aspiration with which many Washingtonians drift off to sleep each night now against the warmth of their $2.8 trillion Leviathan. What's a piddling $90,000 bucks in the office freezer?

Nancy Pelosi, who believes big government is gloriously good, put the "most corrupt" GOP on its fat fanny. She has made congressional ethics the first act of her historic speakership. What else is there to say? Good luck, Madam Speaker.

Republicans Take Back-to-Basics Tack (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 5, 2007

On a day when House Democrats celebrated their first taste of power in a dozen years, Republicans eschewed news conferences and raucous receptions yesterday and instead quietly conferred among themselves and observed the traditional Opening Day rites with their families and friends.

But GOP leaders signaled that they won't quietly fade into the background, and they pledged to promote innovative policies and stay true to conservative ideals -- a path that they hope will lead to victory in 2008. Although they will challenge Democrats on a broad range of domestic and foreign policy issues, they say they won't resort to guerrilla-style tactics or harsh rhetoric.

"We plan to engage in a rigorous, substantive, policy-oriented debate on the issues facing this country," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam (Fla.), the GOP conference chairman. "We will certainly work together when we can, and have respectful disagreements when we can't."

Chief Deputy Minority Whip Eric Cantor (Va.) declared, "If we legislate and act like Republicans, we will remind the American people that they voted for a conservative government," noting that at least 60 House Democrats won election this fall in districts that backed President Bush in 2004.

Democrats swept to power in November, winning a majority of 233 to 202 seats in the House and a narrow 51 to 49 seats in the Senate.

Republicans struggled earlier this week to adjust to their new minority status, which is unknown territory for newer GOP House members. In a series of interviews, senior Republicans, particularly in the House, warned Democrats against acting unilaterally in passing their agenda -- a leadership style that the GOP itself used for many years.

In the Senate, Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.) and other Republicans vowed to work closely with the new Democratic leadership, beginning with ethics and lobbying reform and an increase in the minimum wage. One of the first bills introduced in the Senate was offered by Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) along with the committee's ranking Republican, Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, to repeal the alternative minimum tax.

Republicans had a mixed legislative record in the past several years and suffered from a series of high-profile corruption scandals that demolished a once-powerful House leadership team, including former majority leader Tom DeLay (Tex.). The Republican-controlled Senate also proved to be a black hole for most substantive bills.

The new minority leadership appeared to acknowledge its shortcomings. "I stake my party to a pledge: When faced with an urgent issue, we will act; when faced with a problem, we will seek solutions, not mere political advantage," McConnell said in a floor speech.

For the most part, Republicans spoke of how they could work together with the new majority. House Minority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio) struck a congenial tone before handing over the gavel to Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

"Whether you are a Democrat or Republican or independent, today is a cause for celebration," Boehner said.

Several Republicans said they hoped the two parties could agree on fiscal issues. Democrats are talking about restoring discipline to government spending, and Bush outlined a plan Wednesday to balance the budget in five years.

"That's an opportunity for bipartisanship," Putnam said.

Republicans who are concerned that the party has veered from its ideological roots after years in the majority say the GOP needs to focus on the conservative ideas that helped it win power more than a decade ago.

DOJ_NMG_0112576

"We were elected to the majority with ideas, and we'll come back to the majority with ideas," said Rep. John Linder (Ga.), a close ally of former House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) and the onetime chairman of the House GOP campaign arm.

But rather than focusing on hot-button issues such as abortion, same-sex marriage and gun rights, most GOP lawmakers said they could win back voters' confidence by espousing fiscal discipline.

"We're going to return to our roots, especially on economic policy, taxes and spending," said Rep. Paul D. Ryan (Wis.). "The era of big-government spending is at an end in the Republican Party."

Although congressional Republicans have deferred to Bush on a host of domestic and foreign policy issues since he took office in 2001, last year's electoral losses may encourage some GOP lawmakers to challenge the president during his last two years in office. Most Republicans marched in lockstep in supporting the president's war policies in Iraq, but with polls showing that the majority of Americans consider the war a big mistake, more Republicans may begin to break ranks.

"There's still some resentment among members at the fact our losses would have been a lot less if they had gotten rid of [Donald H.] Rumsfeld sooner," said Rep. David L. Hobson (R-Ohio), referring to the former defense secretary. "The president has to do some serious work with members of the House on the Republican side. People are going to be more independent now. In the past, they had to be part of the team."

In one sign of how Republicans are working to differentiate themselves from the White House, Rep. Heather A. Wilson (N.M.) -- who narrowly won reelection in November -- plans to deliver a major speech on Iraq today.

"I'm from the old school of national security that believes partisan politics ends at the water's edge," said Wilson, a member of the House intelligence committee. "Some of us who are neither cheerleaders nor bomb throwers need to step up on this one."

Staff writer Shailagh Murray contributed to this report.

Bush Practices A Reach Across The Aisle (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2007

WASHINGTON — A few years ago when President Bush announced plans to dump nuclear waste in Sen. Harry Reid's state, it was a political insult so stinging that the Nevada Democrat responded by calling the nation's commander in chief a "liar."

Now, Reid, the new Senate majority leader, is getting the red carpet treatment. The administration treated Reid to two military plane rides in one week. He was invited to an intimate White House party where Bush politely asked what books he was reading lately.

The contrast is a measure of how deeply ingrained habits of partisan vitriol are being tested -- and may be starting to break down -- as control of Congress changes hands. After Republicans' resounding defeat in the fall elections, Bush and his lieutenants are now paying attention to Democratic power brokers they had all but ignored for years.

The new speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, got a Christmas Day phone call from Bush at home in San Francisco. New committee chairmen are enjoying quality face-time with Cabinet bigwigs. Even potential White House allies from the Democrats' conservative wing had been ignored for the past six years, but they now are being ushered into the Oval Office.Those gestures and other bows to bipartisanship are signs that the swearing in of the new Congress is not just a fresh start for Democrats; it is the end of an era for Bush, who has had the luxury of governing for most of the last six years with his own party in charge of Congress.

Now Bush will have to burnish rusty skills at working across the political aisle. And he is facing partners in government who view him with deep suspicion and have relationships with the White House that range from frigid to nonexistent.

"We hope that when the president says compromise, it means more than 'do it my way,' which is what he's meant in the past," Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., a member of the Democratic leadership, said Wednesday after Bush made a Rose Garden statement calling for an effort to find "common ground."

Bipartisan agreement will surely be hard to find on some of the most difficult issues facing the nation, such as proposals to increase U.S. troop levels in Iraq, to shore up the finances of Social Security or to balance the federal budget.

But on other, narrower issues, such as overhauling immigration law and cracking down on pork barrel spending, Bush and Democrats in Congress may be able to make common cause.

DOJ_NMG_0112577

"It is in the interests of both to try to cut deals where they can -- Bush because he wants to add some accomplishments to his legacy and Democrats because they don't want to be branded obstructionists in the run-up to 2008," said Bruce Buchanan, a political scientist at the University of Texas at Austin.

The White House has been trying to reach out to more Democrats. According to spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore, Bush has hosted at least 10 post-election meetings and receptions for members of Congress, most of them Democrats.

"You'll see even more outreach in the future," she said.

Bush likes to point to his success in dealing with a Democratic-controlled state legislature while he was Texas governor. A key to that success was his alliance with Democratic Lt. Gov. Bob Bullock. But unlike the current lineup of Democratic leaders in Congress, Bullock was a very conservative Democrat who had a close personal relationship with Bush.

Reid is certainly no Bullock. The blunt former boxer didn't stop at calling Bush a liar over his 2002 nuclear waste decision. A few years later, while Bush was abroad, Reid called him a "loser." He apologized to Bush for that comment but never retreated from calling him a liar.

The morning after Democrats won control of Congress, Reid said, he was skeptical when Bush called with congratulations and an offer to work together.

"Mr. President," Reid later said he told Bush, "this is what we talked about two years ago, and we haven't been able to accomplish anything."

Bush seemed to allude to Reid's sharp tongue after meeting with him a few days later. Telling reporters that he and Reid have a lot in common as Westerners, Bush said, "We tend to speak the same language, pretty plain-spoken people, which should bode well for our relationship."

Reid's tone was different recently when he traveled to South America with a congressional delegation. Meeting with leaders of Bolivia and Ecuador who had been fierce critics of Bush, Reid defended the president's policies, according to Reid spokesman Jim Manley.

The White House arranged for Reid and his delegation to fly to and from South America on a military plane. That was not as unusual as the second flight the administration arranged -- for Reid and Assistant Senate Majority Leader Richard J. Durbin, D-Ill., to return from former President Ford's funeral in Michigan by military plane. If Reid and Durbin had taken a commercial flight, they probably would have missed a White House reception Bush hosted for new congressional leaders and their spouses Wednesday evening.

Durbin, a liberal Democrat, has an affable relationship with Bush. They have an annual tradition of wisecracking with each other as they enter the House chamber together for the State of the Union address, Durbin spokesman Joe Shoemaker said. But at a recent meeting at the White House, sparks flew when Bush compared himself to Harry S Truman and Durbin pointedly took issue with the parallel.

Pelosi and Bush have many hatchets to bury, because they traded personal barbs during the 2006 campaign. Pelosi called Bush "incompetent" and "oblivious." Bush sniped at her claim to "love" tax cuts.

"Given her record, she must be a secret admirer," he said in October.

But after the election, Bush insisted that as political pros he and Pelosi would forgive and forget.

"If you hold grudges in this line of work, you're never going to get anything done," he said.

