The man brought in for attempted second degree murder was Dedrick Ghoram, according to the U.S. marshals. That warrant was issued by the Baton Rouge Police Department.

DOJ_NMG_0027347

Sweep Nabs 'Worst Of The Worst' (STPPP)

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, April 28, 2006

The long arm of the law rounded up 110 Minnesota fugitives — several wanted for violent sex crimes — over the past week, federal authorities announced Thursday in Minneapolis.

The roundup was part of a 27-state effort by the U.S. Marshals Service to capture fugitives. The dragnet was focused on sex offenders, who made up more than 1,100 of the 9,037 fugitives taken into custody nationwide.

Al Garber, U.S. Marshal for the District of Minnesota coordinated the Minnesota apprehensions. In all, officers from 18 law enforcement agencies searched for fugitives in the Twin Cities, Duluth and Rochester from April 17 through Sunday.

The operation carried the name "Operation Falcon II" — it's the second year the initiative has been undertaken — and was aimed at fugitives labeled by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales as "the worst of the worst."

In Minnesota, that included offenders wanted for a variety of crimes, including sexual assault and drug trafficking. The federal emphasis was on nabbing sexual predators and convicted sex offenders who had failed to properly register their whereabouts.

The dragnet concentrated on states in the western U.S. A subsequent weeklong roundup will target states east of the Mississippi.

National crime sweep nets 110 fugitives in Minnesota (MINNST)

By Gregg Aamot

Minneapolis Star Tribune, April 28, 2006

More than 100 fugitives, including sex offenders and gang members, were captured this month in Minnesota as part of a national crime sweep, the U.S. attorney announced Thursday.

The arrests were part of "Operation Falcon II," an initiative involving federal, state and local law enforcement agencies. The 110 people snared in Minnesota were "the worst of the worst criminals," U.S. Attorney Rachel Paulose said.

Nationwide, more than 9,000 people were captured in a sweep of states west of the Mississippi River between April 17 and April 23. The U.S. Marshals Service led the dragnet, which coincided with National Victims Rights Week.

Of the arrests, more than 1,100 were wanted for violent sex crimes.

In Minnesota, all but about 20 of the fugitives were captured in the Twin Cities area, officials said. Officers from 18 agencies across the state helped the U.S. Marshals Service in the arrests.

At a news conference at the federal courthouse, officials displayed several weapons confiscated in the sweep, including a gun and a device U.S. Marshal Al Garber called a "knuckle-knife." The fugitives caught in Minnesota included a man who had raped an 8-year-old boy, a gang member dragged from a crawl space and a career criminal with a record dating to 1967, Garber said.

"The goal was to make our neighborhoods safer, and by taking 110 people off the street, we did that" to a large measure, he said.

Officials said such intense dragnets are significant because agencies don't always have the money or manpower needed to join forces in coordinated efforts. Whether such sweeps would happen every year was the decision of U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Palouse said.

A search for fugitives in the eastern half of the United States was also planned, though officials wouldn't say when.

Hundreds Of Californians Among More Than 9,000 In Fugitive Roundup (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON - Hundreds of California residents are among 9,037 fugitives arrested nationally in a weeklong roundup that focused on sex offenders, top law enforcement officials said Thursday.

The arrests were made as part of "Operation Falcon II," a 27-state dragnet led by the U.S. Marshals Service and timed to coincide with National Victims Rights Week.

More than 1,100 of the fugitives nationally were wanted in connection with violent sex crimes, a group that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has made a priority in his 15 months at the Justice Department. The operation "targeted the worst of the worst," Gonzales said at a news conference at the Justice Department.

Among the 256 apprehended in the inland region that stretches from Bakersfield to the Oregon border was a murder suspect from Mexico living in Modesto who will be deported, said Antonio Amador, marshal for that district.

Four of the 256 were homicide suspects, 30 were suspected of sex crimes, 108 were wanted on drug charges and 49 for allegedly committing other violent crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0027348

"As law enforcement knows, fugitives generally have criminal records and continue to commit crimes," Amador said at a Sacramento news conference. "In fact, 95 percent of those arrested had (previous) criminal records."

Authorities in Los Angeles, Orange, Riverside, and San Bernardino counties rounded up 262 fugitives, including two wanted on murder charges, 81 on drug charges, 59 on violent sex charges and 11 for allegedly failing to register as sex offenders.

Among the 262 was William Wisham, who authorities said failed to register as a sex offender when he moved to a motel in Victorville. Investigators found letters to children, notes explaining why he enjoys sex with children, child pornography, candy and methamphetamines, Marshal Adam Torres said in a statement.

Police are working to locate children listed in Wisham's diary-style notes.

In the San Francisco Bay area, 146 fugitives were apprehended, including 23 charged with sex offenses and 44 with narcotics violations.

In San Diego and Imperial counties, 194 fugitives were caught, including five charged with murder, 124 with narcotics violations, six with violent sex offenses and five with failing to register as sex offenders.

Primo Montes was arrested April 18 in Escondido, 10 years to the day after he and another man allegedly raped and molested a 14-year-old girl. Montes fled to Mexico before trial, but investigators staked out his pregnant wife's home in Escondido after receiving a tip that he might visit.

In southern Nevada, 35 of the 100 people arrested were wanted on sex charges or for allegedly failing to register as sex offenders. A local task force also arrested two individuals wanted on murder charges, 39 on drug charges, 13 on assault charges and seven wanted on weapons charges.

Nationwide during the week of April 17-23, federal, state and local authorities arrested 1,102 people wanted for violent sex crimes or for failing to register as a sex offender after a prior conviction for sexual assault.

It was the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement operation, the department said. The arrests were made mainly in states west of the Mississippi River.

The Marshals Service spent $531,000 on the weeklong exercise, most of it to pay overtime to local and state police, said David Dimmitt, chief deputy U.S. Marshal. More than 2,100 officers from 786 federal, state and local law enforcement agencies took part.

Last year's sweep netted more than 10,000 fugitives, 10 times the average in a week, but just 1 percent of the 1 million fugitives in the FBI's national database. Marshals Director John Clark said there are a "few million fugitives" in the United States, most of them wanted on state and local charges.

Marshals arrested 35,500 federal fugitives for all the government budget year that ended Sept. 30. They worked with state and local authorities to nab another 44,000 people, according to the Marshals' Web site.

ON THE NET

U.S. Marshals Service: http://www.usmarshals.gov/

Justice Department: http://www.usdoj.gov

Operation Falcon puts thousands behind bars Police sting operation conducted nationwide and locally (WHOI)

By Brock Spencer

WHOI-TV Creve Coeur, IL, April 27, 2006

A week long police sting operation netted more than 9,000 arrests nationwide. And, more than a hundred of those arrests were made right here in central Illinois.

It's called "Operation Falcon II" led by the U.S. Marshall Service.

Law enforcement from local, state, and federal departments all worked together during the stings. Arrests included everything from homicide and kidnapping to robbery and burglary.

All of the stings in 27 states were made between April 17 - 23. Peoria County Sheriff Mike McCoy said before this program, it would have been impossible to track down many of these offenders.

"When you have someone like the Marshall's Office and this task force that has jurisdiction to go anywhere, to investigate anywhere, has the ability to call an office up throughout the country, through the world and say hey look we are looking for this guy, we got a report he is in your area. Will you go check it out?" McCoy said.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the focus of this year's "Operation Falcon II" was on sex offenders. The justice department estimates it was the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement operation.

DOJ_NMG_0027349

"Among those arrests were more than 1,100 fugitives wanted for committing felony sex offenses or violent sexual assaults or for failing to register as sex offenders," Gonzales said.

Last year's sweep, just called Operation Falcon, rounded-up around 10,000 fugitives.

Operation Falcon II Targets Sexual Predators (KTEN)

KTEN-TV Ada, OK, April 27, 2006

A historic day for law enforcement nationwide, had a significant impact in Southeastern Oklahoma. Operation Falcon II, led by U.S. Marshals, netted thousands of arrests across the western half of the country. The week-long sting focused on capturing sex predators and wanted fugitives.

Today, U.S. Marshals visited Durant, commending Bryan County officials on their contributions. From April 17 through the 23, law enforcement agencies of all levels participated in operation Falcon II. Determined to bring violent sex criminals to justice, officers in Bryan County united, coming down hard on fugitives.

In 27 states law enforcement raided homes, made traffic stops and even swarmed hotels to clean up thousands of existing warrants. Mirroring the efforts of a year ago when U.S. Marshals conducted Falcon I, teams arrested sex offenders, gang members and other wanted felons. Twenty-five different departments in Eastern, Oklahoma captured over 500 fugitives. Local task forces working with the marshals talked about the operation.

"With law enforcement at the local state and federal levels it is absolutley essential that we all work in one accord and in cooperation with one another, and this operation is a prime example of that," said David Ross, Durant OHP.

"Most of them will tell you that they're just doing their jobs, but just doing their jobs most likely saved or impacted many lives in a positive way that can't be calculated," John Loyd, U.S. Marshals said.

Loyd also said the raids yielded over a hundred guns, thousands in cash and opened doors to even more illegal activity in the area. The highest priority was given to sexual predators and unregistered sex offenders, since these issues top the list of local problems.

The U.S. Marshals say operation Falcon II is the most ambitious endeavor in their 216 year history.

Authorities arrest more than 500 in warrant sweep (Phoenix)

By Liz McMahan

The Muskogee (OK) Phoenix, April 28, 2006

More than 500 people wanted for felonies were arrested in Eastern Oklahoma last week, it was announced Thursday by the U.S. Marshals Service.

The arrests came through the joint efforts of local, county, state and federal officers from throughout the 26-county Eastern District of Oklahoma as part of Operation Falcon II, a nationwide effort to serve outstanding felony warrants.

The number of arrests in the Eastern District was the third highest of any area in the United States where the operation was carried out, said U.S. Marshal John Loyd. Only the Houston and San Antonio areas had a higher number of arrests.

This was the second year the U.S. Marshals Service has conducted the operation. This year's focus was on finding sexual predators.

Of the 506 fugitives arrested in eastern Oklahoma, 35 were wanted for violent sexual offenses, including rape, forcible sodomy and sexual assault, Loyd said. Sixteen of those arrested were wanted on charges of failure to register as sex offenders. One person was arrested on a homicide charge, Loyd said.

The sweep filled the Muskogee and Wagoner County jails. Muskogee County Sheriff Charles Pearson said 100 offenders were booked through his facility the first day.

Wagoner County Sheriff Johnny Cannon said his jail received more than 70 new prisoners from the project. His jail population normally averages 70 or 75 inmates but has been 80 to 85 since the beginning of the operation.

'Worst of worst' among 328 in Houston area arrested in sting (HOU)

By DALE LEZON

Houston Chronicle, April 28, 2006

A Spring man, who is accused of sexually assaulting a boy and whom law enforcement officials consider among the "worst of the worst," was one of more than 300 Houston-area fugitives arrested during a recent crackdown.

The arrests were part of a weeklong blitz by federal and local law enforcement agencies, including the Houston Police Department, dubbed "Operation Falcon II," which targeted suspects accused of violent and sexual crimes.

The roundup ran April 17-23 and covered 27 mostly Western states, as well as Guam and the Northern Marinana Islands, both U.S. territories.

Overall, 9,000 fugitives were picked up, including more than 1,100 wanted for sexual crimes.

In Houston, 328 fugitives were arrested, more than 40 of them wanted for sexual-related offenses, officials said.

"Pretty significant numbers, I think," said Deputy U.S. Marshal Marianne Matus, from her Houston office.

Carlos Bermudez, 30, offered no resistance when he was arrested at his golf-course maintenance job in The Woodlands last Friday, Matus said. She said he lived in Spring.

He had been wanted in Las Vegas since 2004 on 10 counts of sexual assault of a minor and 10 counts of lewdness with a minor.

Federal authorities said he was among 15 of the "worst of the worst" fugitives targeted in the crackdown, according to a news release from the U.S. Marshals Service.

Others arrested include people accused of violent crimes, as well as those who had failed to register as sex offenders.

No one was injured during the arrests, Matus said.

Last year, law enforcement officials arrested 10,000 fugitives during a similar weeklong roundup nationwide.

Nationwide Raid Includes Nearly 150 Valley Arrests (KGBT)

By Ray Pedraza

KGBT-TV Harlingen, TX, April 27, 2006

A nationwide sweep for violent criminals, known as Operation FALCON II, has netted over 9,000 arrests including some here in the Valley.

FALCON, which is a code name for Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally, is being dubbed as one of the biggest round-ups in law enforcement history rounding up criminals in 27 states from Illinois to Missouri.

Included in the 9,000 arrests were 1,100 wanted for violent sexual assaults, many against children.

"This is an important step in ensuring that the culture of law is respected, the judicial process is observed, sentences are meaningful and hardtime is served," said United States Attorney General Alberto Gonzales of the operation.

In the Valley, lawmen raided homes in the twilight hours across all four counties last week ... catching many of the unsuspecting criminals in bed.

An undercover agent says they were pleased with the number of arrests.

"It was a successful operation," said the agent. "Valleywide there were 148 fugitives arrested and 213 warrants were cleared."

The warrants ranged from aggravated assault to homicide but the most warrants cleared here were narcotics, probation and parole violators. Nationally and locally, authorities were hoping to capture more sexual predators.

"We are targeting sexual offenders. Sexual offenders pose a potential danger especially for women and children in the area and we're trying to put them away and bring them to justice," added the agent.

Congress allotted half a million dollars to fund this operation and Gonzales says Falcon III is coming in the next few months. He says it will target violent criminals on the east coast.

The U.S. Marshall's Service in McAllen is already looking forward to another big round up.

"We're going to continue searching for these individuals," said the agent about the accused criminals still at large. "We're not going to stop... we're going to be diligent in our efforts to bring them to justice."

249 Fugitives Arrested In Hawaii As Part Of Nationwide Sweep (KITV)

KITV-TV Honolulu, April 27, 2006

HONOLULU -- Hawaii law enforcement teams rounded up 249 Hawaii fugitives in a weeklong nationwide law enforcement sweep dubbed Operation Falcon II that nabbed more than 9,000 fugitives.

In Hawaii, it involved U.S. marshals, sheriffs, police and federal agents.

This year's operation focused on sexual predators, and one of the nation's Top 15 most wanted was found on Oahu.

From Waikiki to Maui, law enforcement involved in Operation Falcon II combed the islands for a week picking up wanted fugitives. The seven-day sweep included 27 states, Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands.

"What you may see is a reduction in crime; career criminals have been captured. What you may see are safer communities because predators are jailed," U.S. Marshal Dutch Hanohano said.

Herbert Damwijk was wanted for child rape and molestation in Washington state. He was found in Hauula.

"This guy is wanted for raping and molesting two young beautiful, young, innocent 8-year-old girls," Hanohano said.

Damwijk was living on a property that consists of several homes at which individual rooms are rented out.

The Fugitive Task Force arrived early in the morning.

"He was taken by surprise. He came to the door all groggy, and we just downed him right at the door," Deputy Sheriff Chester Kau said.

Many of those who live in the complex are university students. Those who know Damwijk said he never caused problems there.

"Overall, he's a pretty nice guy; kept to himself for the most part. Just a little bit, you know, a little bit weird," neighbor Mark Wood said.

On Maui, authorities arrested Kelepi Mafi. He was wanted in connection with the sexual assault of a 12-year-old girl. Four other sex offenders were captured in Hawaii.

Local Police Round-Up Criminals As Part of Nationwide Sweep (WANE)

WANE-TV Fort Wayne, April 27, 2006

Officers from the Allen County Sheriff's Department and Fort Wayne and New Haven police joined the U-S Marshalls service in scouring local neighbors, handing out warrants and rounding up suspected criminals. Altogether in northern Indiana, officers rounded up more than 46 fugitives on narcotics violations, seven on weapons-related offenses and several others for failing to registered as sex offenders. This local effort was part of a weeklong nationwide sweep called Operation Falcon 2, by U-S Marshalls and local officers in more than 20 states. In all, more than three thousand people were taken-in. John Clark, the director of the U.S. Marshalls Service says, "There is an old phrase, 'you can run but you can't hide' and for many fugitives out there, they think they can hide and they may, but not for long." And, even though this sweep has ended, authorities say area fugitives who managed to escape the net this time shouldn't think they can breathe easy. Dave Murtaugh, the head of the U.S. Marshalls Service Northern Indiana District says, "We're not going to let them rest. Allen County Sheriff's Department and the Fort Wayne Police Department are working diligently to keep the community safe."

U.S. Marshals Nab Thousands Of Wanted Criminals (KCNC)

By Alan Gionet

KCNC-TV Denver, April 28, 2006

Last week the U.S. Marshals Service rounded up 140 fugitives in Colorado as a part of Operation Falcon II, a nationwide effort to catch wanted criminals, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez announced Thursday.

Fifteen of the fugitives arrested between April 17 and 23 were wanted for violent sexual offenses and six were wanted for failing to register as sex offenders, according to the U.S. Marshals Service.

The nationwide operation focused on sexual predators and coincided with "National Crime Victims' Rights Week."

One violent fugitive from Colorado was caught in Baltimore. Mark Hayward was wanted in Douglas County for kidnapping and sexual assaulting a 15-year old girl he met over the internet.

"With the amount of activity that happens on the internet now and the fact that he was corresponding on the internet with her and did occur in other states as well," said Michelle Kivela with Lone Tree police. "It's concerning to us."

Investigators said there was no record of any other sexual offenses on Hayward's criminal record. Hayward said he met the girl on myspace.com.

Others caught in Colorado were wanted for homicide, robbery, narcotics charges and other violent crimes.

Nationwide, more than 9,000 fugitives were arrested and 111 guns were seized.

Operation Falcon II Sweeps Yakima (KAPP)

KAPP-TV Yakima, WA, April 27, 2006

Local law enforcement officers took part in a week-long nationwide warrant round up. Almost 200 fugitives were arrested locally during the roundup. That's double the number of criminals from last year. Sex offenders were the priority and fugitives with gang ties and violent criminals came next. Yakima County Sheriff Ken Irwin says he's pleased with the outcome. He says these fugitives are the worst of the worst.

Although the operation was assisted through federal dollars, they targeted criminals wanted by local authorities. The U.S. Marshals worked in conjunction with the Yakima Police Department, Yakima Tribal Police and the Sheriff's Department.

Among all of the arrests, 26 documented gang members were arrested, officers seized 16 guns, and 9 unregistered sex offenders were found. Officers say they're sending out a clear message to criminals, "You can run, but you can't hide."

Feds arrest 84 in fugitive roundup (KTVA)

KTVA-TV Anchorage, April 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027352

A massive sting operation has netted over nine thousand of the nation's most dangerous criminals and locally, the operation gave Alaska law enforcement a chance to find and arrest our worst criminal offenders.

It is being called the largest sex offender bust in the nation's history and it's Alaska's biggest multi-agency bust ever.

Operation Falcon II, which stands for Federal and Local Cops Organized Nationally, took a pretty big bite out of Alaska's most wanted list.

We had 14 arrests in Fairbanks, 16 arrests on the Kenai Peninsula, 20 arrests in the Mat-Su Valley and 32 arrests in Anchorage," said Randy Johnson, U.S. Marshal, Alaska.

84 fugitives in all, the largest coordinated bust in Alaska in history with crimes ranging from drugs, and probation violations, to more dangerous offenses.

"A violent crime or a sexual predatory type, those are the ones we focused on and we focused on the most violent ones first and worked downward from that towards the lower end of the spectrum," said Marc Otte, Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal, Alaska.

Code named Falcon II, it was a nationwide week-long operation with focus on the west coast netting over nine thousand people, but don't think these U.S. Marshals only work one week out of the year.

"This is an ongoing initiative, Falcon II focused that initiative with a high amount of manpower and some funding, but the Alaska Fugitive Task Force is here, it is working everyday and there is no place for anybody to hide if they're wanted.

Locally, last year Falcon I only nabbed 8 people.

"This was a very successful effort and you can see how much improved it was from last year so congratulations to everyone because all Alaskan citizens are safer."

But Falcon II isn't necessarily done. The cooperation between agencies remains. Alaska sent about 2 dozen leads to the lower 48 and warrants were sent up here as well

And the Last Frontier is often the last resort for the nation's criminals who think they can come and disappear into the Bush but Alaskan authorities say they will be caught.

"We want people to know this is not a place that they can come and hide. We will come and find them. We have a lot of investigative tools at our beck and call and we will come and find them anywhere they are, anywhere in the state," said Marc Otte, Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal, Alaska.

The week long effort brought eighty four people into custody but turns out that other fugitives heard the authorities were looking for them and turned themselves in not to mention the other cases that couldn't be solved within that week. There are about a hundred of them. Authorities say they plan to have them in custody soon.

Those arrests come at a time when the state is toughening up the penalties for people who commit sex crimes.

In fact, the Governor plans to sign a new bill into law this evening that would nearly triple the jail time for sex offenders. Convicted sex offenders would face a minimum of twenty years in prison and 25 if their crime involved a child.

U.S. Marshal Sweep Nets Sex Offenders (KGO)

By Heather Ishimaru

KGO-TV San Francisco, April 27, 2006

Apr. 27 - U.S. marshals invited ABC7 on an exclusive ride-along for some of the Bay Area sweeps targeting sex offenders. It's a report you'll see only on 7.

A week-long series of raids netted only a small fraction of the one million fugitives on the loose, but authorities are claiming success in a roundup called Operation Falcon Two.

In all, police agencies arrested more than 9,000 people in 27 states, 1,100 of them for violent sex crimes and 163 of those arrests were here in the Bay Area.

Chief Dep. Thomas Figmik, U.S. Marshals Service: "Operation Falcon targeted offenders wanted for the worst crimes, such as murder, kidnap, arson, assault, robbery, narcotics and rape. The operation was inspired by the Department of Justice's National Victims Crimes Week, the theme of which was justice isn't served until crime victims are."

When serving arrest warrants and checking on parolees, police rely heavily on the element of surprise.

Last week, during Project Falcon Two, U.S. marshals and local police went after their targets very early in the morning and late at night.

At 1 a.m. in Dublin, the element of surprise was enhanced by the passage of time. It was 24 years since Jack Duffy walked away from a Michigan prison.

The supervising deputy asks if Duffy's wife and son know why they're there.

Deputy: "Does your family know about this?

Jack Duffy: "No."

Deputy: "Ok do you want to say anything or no? Ok we'll leave that option up to you and we won't say anything about it."

Duffy was only one of the one million fugitives in the FBI's national database. The majority are more recent cases, like sex offender Curtis Arnold. As conditions of his parole, he's not allowed to have pornography or knives longer than two inches.

Deputy Robert Tejada, U.S. Marshal Service: "Two knives were found and about 20 pornographic tapes were found in his possession."

Project Falcon often targeted one person in trouble with the law and stumbled on others. The target at this house wasn't home but two women wanted for burglary were.

And there was no target at a Richmond housing project. Police didn't know what they'd find when they went there but they chose the location because it was where a murder took place just four nights ago.

This suspect took off running when he saw officers. They say he dumped an automatic weapon during the chase.

"At least we got the gun off the street."

Not everyone here is happy about the crackdown. Some are.

Angelo King, Richmond resident: "I'm cool. I'm cool with it. You know me myself I'm a grown man and I'm scared to come out myself."

And in rRchmond at least, police say Project Falcon is only one piece of the complex puzzle of keeping the peace.

Lt. Mark Gagan, Richmond police department: "This is one way of dealing with people & that lower percentage of people that are absolutely not going to try to stay out of prison. The people that are using guns and violence to get across their message."

The marshals were given a budget of $540,000 dollars for the entire national operation. Most of that went to officer overtime and fuel costs.

U.S. Attorney Reports 54 Arrests As Part Of Fugitive Roundup (GFH)

The Grand Forks Herald, April 28, 2006

FARGO, N.D. - Fifty-four people are in custody in North Dakota as part of a nationwide roundup of fugitives, U.S. Attorney Drew Wrigley said Thursday.

The arrests were part of "Operation Falcon II," a 27-state dragnet timed to coincide with National Victims Rights Week. Nationally, officials said more than 1,100 people wanted for violent sex crimes were among the 9,037 arrests.

During the week of April 17-23, federal, state and local authorities arrested 1,102 people wanted for violent sex crimes or for failing to register as a sex offender after a prior conviction for sexual assault.

It was the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement operation, the department said. The arrests were made mainly in states west of the Mississippi River, and also in Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands.

"Here in North Dakota, there were 54 arrests made inside of this one week," Wrigley said Thursday. "Last year was very successful with 26 felons arrested. This year, we're to 54."

U.S. Marshal Dave Carpenter said seven of the arrests in North Dakota were people wanted for sex crimes.

Wrigley said the bulk of the arrests were other crimes, including robbery, burglary and fraud. Some were drug-related, he said.

"In addition, 10 other warrants were cleared - what we call administratively - they figured out people were incarcerated somewhere else or for some other reason they were cleared," Wrigley said. "So (it was) a very successful operation for the U.S. Marshal's Service and the other agencies involved."

Arrests were made in Bismarck, Fargo, Jamestown, Mandan, Minot, Wahpeton and other cities in the region, Wrigley said. Two arrests for North Dakota warrants were made in Wyoming and South Dakota, he said.

Timothy Moseley, chief deputy United States Marshal in Cheyenne, Wyo., said authorities arrested one man from North Dakota in Wyoming who was wanted on charges that he had sexually molested children.

The Marshals Service spent $531,000 nationwide on the weeklong exercise, most of it to pay overtime to local and state police, said David Dimmitt, chief deputy U.S. Marshal. More than 2,100 officers from 786 federal, state and local law enforcement agencies took part.

North Dakota got about $8,000 for the roundup, up from about $5,000 last year, Carpenter said.

The state's courts and jails will be busy in coming weeks, Carpenter said.

"It's going to create a bulge in system but I don't think it's anything we can't work through," he said.

Operation Falcon II Puts Dozens of Violent Fugitives Behind Bars in Idaho (KTRV-TV)

By Shannon Patterson

KTRV-TV Boise, April 27, 2006

Boise, ID -- A week-long sting across the nation has put thousands of fugitives behind bars.

In Idaho alone, 74 violent offenders are now in jail.

Operation Falcon II focused on tracking down sexual offenders.

"A sex offender is a very special kind of criminal," said U.S. Marshal Pat McDonald on Thursday. "They stay below the radar. They move around a lot."

Of the 74 people arrested last week in Idaho during Operation Falcon, seven were wanted for violent sexual offenses, five for failing to register as a sex offender. Others were arrested on everything from assault to burglary to driving under the influence, like Darby Campbell, whose rap sheet is lengthy.

"It's 24 feet long, contains 21 arrests," McDonald said as he unrolled the record for reporters. "These are the kind of people that we want to remove from the street."

To track the suspects down, U.S. Marshals partnered with law enforcement agencies across the valley and hit the street, knocking on doors and finding criminals intent on staying hidden.

"We got 14 different sex offenders, re-offenders, we got five unregistered sex offenders. One 2 miles from my house," said Deputy Kevin Platts of the U.S. Marshals Service.

He says that man, Billy Shearin, was renting a room from a family with a three year old girl, and often took neighborhood children to school when their parents were unable to.

"And of course at that point we were able to tell the family," said Platts. "They had no idea that he was an unregistered sex offender, and of course they had a little girl in the house."

Boise Police are now investigating whether Shearin may face additional sex crimes charges.

Investigators say since most of those arrested during Operation Falcon have committed several crimes, it's likely they would have committed more, if not taken into custody.

"So we'll never know what the impact of this is because these people were removed off the streets before they could re-offend," according to Platts.

"We focused on the bad guys, and we were successful enough to get a bunch of 'em," said McDonald.

Operation Falcon goes much further than Idaho's borders. More than 10,000 thousand fugitives were arrested across the country.

Fugitive Roundup Nets 210 Indiana Fugitives (FWNS)

The Fort Wayne News-Sentinel, April 28, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS - A nationwide roundup this month has put 210 central Indiana fugitives in custody, authorities said Thursday.

Operation Falcon II - a joint effort between federal and local law enforcement officials - netted some 9,000 fugitives in 27 states between April 17 and last Sunday.

In Indiana, the dragnet captured at least 11 people who were wanted for violent sexual offenses such as rape, forcible sodomy and sexual assault, according to federal prosecutors.

Four others were wanted on charges for failure to register as sex offenders. Authorities also reported seizing 11 firearms - including two AK-47s - and two pounds of marijuana.

"(This) serves as an excellent example of local, state, and federal law enforcement agencies working together in a united effort to bring fugitives to justice," U.S. Attorney Susan Brooks said.

This month's effort was timed to coincide with National Victims Rights Week.

No other single law enforcement operation had resulted in the capture of as many suspected sex offenders, the Justice Department said.

Former Hamilton County Youth Pastor Arrested for Sexual Misconduct with Minor (WISH-TV)

WISH-TV Indianapolis, April 27, 2006

A former Hamilton County youth pastor has been arrested, charged with sexual misconduct with a minor.

The former youth pastor was arrested on a golf course following a nationwide sweep of fugitives by the U.S. Marshals.

"It's sad that it happened right in my neighborhood," says Sherry Purkey of Cicero, "That bothers me."

For nearly 30 years, Jon Purkey and his family have lived in their 2-story home directly next door to Cicero Weslyan Church. While working in the their yard, the Purkeys can not believe the news. Joshua Kramp, the former youth pastor at the church, is behind bars, accused of molesting a child.

"Shock is my reaction," says Jon Purkey, "I know Josh and Josh is a gentleman, was a gentleman to me and nice to my family."

Investigators say 27-year-old Kramp had a sexual relationship with a 13-year-old girl while at the church.

DOJ_NMG_0027355

After a 4-month investigation called "Operation Falcon II" involving U.S. Marshals, police caught up with Kramp in his homestate of Michigan, while responding to a disturbance call.

"The arrest of Josh Kramp is a great example of why Operation Falcon works," says Captain Kevin Jowett of the Hamilton County Sheriff's Department.

Jon Purkey says although Kramp is behind bars facing numerous charges, his quiet community will recover. "As a community, we'll pull together and hopefully we'll support what's going to take to get him better."

This sweep was not only in Indiana. In 20 other states, more than 9,000 wanted criminals have been arrested. 1100 were wanted for violent sexual assaults, many against children.

Last year's nationwide operation, also named Falcon, rounded up thousands of gang members and drug dealers.

National fugitive roundup includes 21 arrests in Wyoming (BG)

By BEN NEARY

The Billings (MT) Gazette, April 28, 2006

Local police teamed up with the U.S. Marshals Service to arrest 21 fugitives in Wyoming this month as part of a 27-state dragnet.

In the entire sweep, called "Operation Falcon II," law enforcement arrested 9,037 people, mostly in western states. Among those arrested were 1,102 wanted for violent sex crimes or for failure to register as sex offenders.

Timothy Moseley, chief deputy United States Marshal in Cheyenne, said Thursday his agency worked with 17 law enforcement officers from various agencies in Laramie, Natrona and Teton counties on the arrests. The operation lasted from April 17 through last Sunday.

"The complete success of this operation lies solely at the feet of the state and local agencies that participated. Without their help and their manpower, we would not have been nearly as successful as we were," Moseley said.

"We targeted sexual predators, and we managed to arrest two pretty heinous characters," Moseley said. He said teams arrested one man from North Dakota in Wyoming who was wanted on charges that he had sexually molested children, and arrested another man from Colorado in the state wanted on charges of rape and aggravated assault.

Mavis Dezulovich, public affairs specialist with the U.S. Marshal's Service in Arlington, Va., said the agency couldn't release the names of people who were arrested.

"I think the influx of manpower from the state and local agencies is what really makes these operations different," Moseley said. "We hunt for these predators everyday, but we don't always have the assistance and manpower we need to accomplish these goals."

Last year, in the first Operation Falcon, law enforcement in Wyoming arrested 60 people, Moseley said. He said last year's sweep concentrated on violent felons, which meant that there was a larger pool of warrants to choose from.

Dezulovich said this year's operation cleared 21 warrants in Wyoming. She said said the operation cleared two warrants for sexual assault; one sex offender who had failed to register; one assault charge; five burglary/larceny charges; five fraud charges; three narcotics charges; one stolen vehicle charge; one weapons charge; and two other charges.

Arrest made in 2004 rape case (BN9)

Bay News 9 Tampa, April 27, 2006

As part of Operation Falcon II, task force officers with the U.S. Marshal's Office arrested a suspect in a local rape.

Darryl William Floyd, 37, is accused of sexually assaulting his then stepdaughter in April 2004. A doctor determined the then 13-year-old victim had been molested on two different occasions.

Hillsborough County deputies tried to question Floyd, but he fled the Bay area. He was apprehended in Miami on April 20 and is being charged with lewd and lascivious molestation of a minor. He is being held at the Hillsborough County Jail on $15,000 bond.

Operation Falcon II was a 27-state dragnet led by the U.S. Marshal's Service that was timed to coincide with National Victims Rights Week. This year's focus was on sex offenders, a group that U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has made a priority in his 15 months at the Justice Department.

The operation "targeted the worst of the worst," Gonzales said at a news conference at the Justice Department.

During the week of April 17-23, federal, state and local authorities arrested 1,102 people wanted for violent sex crimes or for failing to register as a sex offender after a prior conviction for sexual assault. It was the largest number ever captured in a single law enforcement operation, the department said.

Butler County sheriff tabbed for U.S. marshal's post (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0027356

AP, April 28, 2006

DES MOINES, Iowa Butler County Sheriff Timothy Junker has been appointed to be the next U-S marshal for the Northern District of Iowa.Junker, of Allison, is in his fifth term as sheriff.The nomination by President Bush must be confirmed by the full Senate. Senator Charles Grassley says it was approved unanimously by the Senate Judiciary Committee today.U-S marshals provide protection for federal judges, investigate federal fugitives, transport federal prisoners and protect federal witnesses.

NYC's Gun Lawsuit Evades Congressional Attempt To Kill It (AP)

By David B. Caruso

AP, April 27, 2006

NEW YORK -- For the fourth time, New York City's lawsuit against several gun manufacturers has survived an attempt by Congress to kill it off.

A federal judge in Brooklyn ruled Thursday that the city may have access to gun tracing information gathered by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, even though a recently passed measure expressly forbids such data from being used in civil suits.

U.S. Judge Jack B. Weinstein said the new rule doesn't apply to information already in the city's possession.

The decision is a victory for the city, which intends to rely heavily on weapons tracing information to prove its claim that gun manufacturers create a public nuisance by recklessly distributing firearms.

"The court's ruling that we can use this gun trace data as evidence is great news for every police officer, parent and child that walks our streets and will help our case against irresponsible gun manufacturers," Republican Mayor Michael Bloomberg said in a written statement.

Lawrence Greenwald, an attorney for Beretta U.S.A., said the gun companies were likely to appeal.

Congress has made several attempts to kill off such suits.

In 2004, lawmakers passed a budget rider prohibiting government agencies from using federal funds to disseminate firearm licensing information to the public.

A judge said it didn't apply to New York's lawsuit because it was acting as a private plaintiff in the case, not "the public."

ATF began turning over information, then stopped when Congress passed a new rider in 2005. This one, more finely crafted, said gun tracing data would be "immune from legal process and shall not be the subject of subpoena or other discovery in any civil action."

A court said ATF still had to comply with requests pending when the rider was passed.

Last October, President Bush signed a law requiring that nearly all civil liability suits against the gun industry be immediately dismissed.

Weinstein ruled in December that the law contained exceptions that would allow New York's suit to continue.

Even before that ruling, Congress had passed another revised budget rider. This one barred any ATF tracing data from being used as evidence in a pending suit.

"Nor shall testimony or other evidence be permitted based upon such data," Congress added, for good measure.

In an opinion that turned on two possible grammatical interpretations of the phrase "such data," Weinstein said he believed it applied only to data that would be collected by ATF in the future.

Lawyers for the gun manufacturers argued that it meant that all tracing data should remain secret, except in criminal prosecutions.

"ATF and Congress has taken a position ... that this is essentially law enforcement information, intended for use in law enforcement," Greenwald said. "It is quite another thing to open it up to the whole world in a civil case."

Metro Briefing (NYT)

By DIANE CARDWELL

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

BROOKLYN: CITY CAN USE GUN DATA IN LAWSUITS

A federal judge ruled yesterday that the city could use data about handguns, including sales history, from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives in its lawsuit against several gun manufacturers. Although the city was able to have access to the data in its suit, originally filed in 2000, the gun manufacturers had argued that the lawsuit should be dismissed because of a Congressional appropriations bill amendment that made the data inadmissible. But in his decision, Judge Jack B. Weinstein of Federal District Court wrote that "the proverbial cat is already out of A.T.F.'s bag" and that it made no sense "to distort the terms of a federal budgetary measure in order to wrestle the cat back in."

DOJ_NMG_0027357

A New Gun Argument (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- Have you noticed that Washington politicians have given up on thinking about new solutions to gun violence? New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg has noticed, and he's angry. Good for him.

Bloomberg is a Republican, if hardly a partisan sort, and it may take a Republican to restart a debate that many Democrats have fled after a careful examination of the electoral map -- and years of exhaustion from demagoguery on the issue.

Teaming up with Boston's Democratic mayor, Thomas Menino, Bloomberg brought 13 other big-city mayors together here on Tuesday to call for "national leadership in the war on gun violence."

"If the leadership won't come from Congress or come from the White House, then it has to come from us," said Bloomberg.

The mayors, Menino said, do not want to meddle with the rights of hunters. They are concerned about the trafficking of illegal guns and the powerlessness of individual cities to enforce their own weapons laws because of loopholes in federal rules and because criminals can easily obtain weapons in jurisdictions with looser regulations.

Our dysfunctional political system has become especially dysfunctional on gun violence.

The National Rifle Association regularly says that we don't need new laws and should simply enforce the regulations on the books. But if many of the existing laws are unenforceable, that statement is meaningless.

Opponents of even modest gun regulation win the upper hand rhetorically by invoking two words: freedom and elitism. None of us is really free, the argument goes, unless all of us have essentially unfettered access to weapons, and any new gun laws are seen as leading down a slippery slope to a total ban on gun ownership. Supporters of gun regulations are always cast as metropolitan highbrows lacking in respect for the way of life of law-abiding country folks.

At a structural level, Congress has a deep bias in favor of the rural point of view because the Senate is stacked in favor of rural states. Idaho, Wyoming and Montana have two senators each, and so do California, New York and Illinois.

According to the latest Census Bureau estimates, the six senators from those three rural states represent 2,874,060 people. The six from the three states that include big urban and suburban populations represent 68,150,148 people. By these figures, you might calculate the rough odds against gun regulations at 24 to 1.

Changing the political argument is easier than changing the Senate. Mayors -- joined soon, Menino hopes, by suburban county executives -- are the right people to start the work.

Yes, there is a cultural difference between big cities and rural areas, but it's a difference in how guns are used. Rural people treasure their guns mostly for hunting and recreation, and as collectors. In inner cities, guns -- especially handguns -- are used almost entirely to threaten or kill other human beings.

"There are neighborhoods where if you say 'duck,' people get out of the way because they're worried they'll be shot," Milwaukee Mayor Tom Barrett said in an interview. "But there are other parts of the country where if you say 'duck,' people will grab their rifles to go duck hunting."

We desperately need a new politics of gun regulation in which law-abiding gun owners see the fight for tougher laws not as a form of disrespect for their culture but as an acknowledgment that if our gun rules are an unenforceable hodgepodge, illegal guns will inevitably get into the hands of kids and criminals in the cities and suburbs.

"I'm fighting for freedom, too," said Barrett. "I'm fighting for the freedom of a grandma to sit on her front porch and not get hit when there's a drive-by shooting. I'm fighting for the freedom of kids to play in the park without being caught in a crossfire."

The mayors have to act for another reason: Democrats have lost their nerve on the gun issue. Barrett traces this to the passage of the assault weapons ban in 1994. (Congress let it expire in September 2004.) Many Democrats who supported the ban were defeated in that fall's election.

"So Democrats who might be inclined to do something are now inclined to stay away from the issue," said Barrett, a Democratic member of Congress at the time. "And most Republicans aren't inclined to do anything at all."

Railing against this state of affairs is useless. Better that a savvy group of mayors takes the lead in the difficult struggle to change the underlying politics by reminding Americans that this issue is about saving the lives of innocent kids -- and of grandmas in their rocking chairs.

Major Gun Dealer Arrested (AP)

AP, April 28, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. --One of the state's largest gun dealers has been arrested on numerous federal firearms charges in a case that authorities say shows how guns wind up in the hands of criminals.

DOJ_NMG_0027358

Frank D'Andrea, 61, who ran the Gun Case in Shelton, was arrested last week and released after posting a $200,000 bond, authorities announced Thursday. The store was recently moved to Milford, where it is called Guns & Safes Unlimited.

Federal investigators said that over a two-year period 100 guns seized at crime scenes had passed through D'Andrea's store.

"This investigation has revealed a disturbing lack of control and mismanagement by one of Connecticut's largest gun dealers, and blatant disregard for federal firearms possession and reporting laws," said U.S. Attorney Kevin O'Connor. "This case goes to the heart of how legal guns become illegal guns on the street. Gun store operators are the first line of defense for stopping gun crimes on our streets, and this case will be prosecuted to the fullest extent."

D'Andrea is under court order to come up with a plan to limit his involvement in the business while the case is pending.

"He firmly insists on his innocence," said Lawrence Church, D'Andrea's lawyer.

D'Andrea repeatedly failed to properly conduct required background checks on firearm purchasers; falsely stated on multiple occasions that background checks on customers had been conducted when they had not; unlawfully kept and transferred various firearms off his books; and sold firearms to customers who had said that they were prohibited from buying them because of criminal records or other issues, authorities said.

D'Andrea on 11 occasions failed to report multiple gun sales to the same person, authorities said. He also failed to report hundreds of guns that were lost or stolen, they said.

D'Andrea was charged with mail fraud and obstruction of justice for allegedly shipping a number of firearms that are illegal under Connecticut law out of his store during the ATF audit in order to prevent their discovery.

He allegedly possessed two unregistered "Street Sweepers," an automatic shotgun, and other assault weapons that are illegal under Connecticut law, according to a criminal complaint.

A routine inspection by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco Firearms and Explosives last year began to uncover the violations, authorities said.

"Stopping the illegal flow of firearms continues to be one of our top priorities and today is just another example of how we do that," said ATF Special Agent in Charge Glenn N. Anderson.

Gun dealer arrested for bad record keeping (CP)

By MICHAEL P. MAYKO

The Connecticut Post, April 28, 2006

BRIDGEPORT — One of the state's biggest gun dealers was arrested after federal agents say they uncovered numerous record-keeping violations at his shop, including the sale of three guns to a person charged with a felony.

Frank D'Andrea of Soundview Avenue, Shelton, is free on $200,000 bond but is under orders from U.S. Magistrate Judge Holly B. Fitzsimmons to come up with a plan to run his business with limited involvement while the case is pending. D'Andrea recently moved his D'Andrea's Gun Case from Barnum Avenue in Stratford to Woodmont Road in Milford and renamed it D'Andrea's Guns and Safes Unlimited. The business is still open, Lawrence Church, D'Andrea's lawyer, said Wednesday.

The move came just months after U.S. Attorney Kevin J. O'Connor rented a billboard across the street from D'Andrea's former store in Stratford. The poster read "Buy a gun for a criminal, go to federal prison."

O'Connor said Wednesday that ATF investigators determined that, over a two-year period, 100 guns seized at crime scenes had passed through D'Andrea's store. "Federally licensed gun dealers have a tremendous responsibility to sell weapons appropriately," O'Connor said.

D'Andrea, a lifelong area resident who graduated from Harding High School and is a Marine Corps veteran, has operated a gun store for about 30 years at various sites. While D'Andrea has cooperated with the federal government in several cases over the years, authorities said, he also has been an outspoken critic of restrictive gun laws.

Church said he advised his client not to discuss the case.

"He firmly insists on his innocence," Church said.

The arrest is based on an affidavit filed by Special Agent James Sullivan of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

The 22-page affidavit lists numerous, mostly record-keeping, violations. Sullivan charged that D'Andrea on 11 occasions failed to report multiple gun sales to the same person; on 34 occasions failed to get certification of the 90-day state residency requirement before selling guns to aliens; and on 32 occasions failed to insure that all of the questions on a required ATF transaction form were answered before the gun was transferred.

D'Andrea is charged with disposing of firearms without making entries into his record books; making false statements and representation on required forms; failing to conduct required background checks on purchasers; transferring guns to people who failed to certify they were not prohibited from buying guns; failing to report multiple sales to the same person; failing to report the theft or loss of firearms; and receiving or possessing firearms that are not registered.

DOJ_NMG_0027359

Most of these charges carry a maximum possible sentence of five years in prison.

"The reason we have these record-keeping requirements is to prevent guns from falling into the wrong hands," O'Connor said. D'Andrea also is accused of mail fraud, which carries a possible 20-year term, and obstruction of justice, which carries a five-year term. Both those charges stem from his allegedly transferring guns through a broker to another dealer while the investigation was ongoing.

It is expected that Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Reynolds will take his evidence against D'Andrea to a federal grand jury next month.

The evidence was uncovered during a routine ATF inspection of D'Andrea's record-keeping last spring. That inspection led to an ATF search and seizure at the store and D'Andrea' s home Dec. 12.

Early during their audit of D'Andrea's store, ATF inspectors determined 74 guns in the inventory were missing. Checking firearm records they said they discovered that three of those guns turned up during a crime or were seized during the investigation of a crime. Sullivan said one of the missing guns — a Colt Assault Rifle 15 — previously was found in possession of a Woodbridge man. After police seized the gun from the man, ATF agents traced its serial number and found it still listed as though it was in the possession of D'Andrea's store, Sullivan said, adding the weapon never was reported sold or stolen.

The audit also showed that three guns were sold to an individual who was under arrest in a felony. No one charged with a felony can possess a gun while the case is pending. Federal law prohibits convict felons from possessing a gun.

Sullivan said the inspection determined that on 31 occasions D'Andrea failed to properly record the National Instant Criminal Background Check System and in six instances made false representations regarding the checks on ATF forms.

The inspection also found 73 instances in which D'Andrea failed to record gun sales and 59 instances of incorrectly recording gun sales on his Acquisitions and Dispositions Record.

One of the guns not recorded but found in the store was a Street Sweeper, which street gangs prefer for drive-by shootings, authorities said.

As the inspection proceeded, Sullivan accused D'Andrea of unlawfully disposing of firearms.

A former store employee told ATF inspectors that D'Andrea asked him to ship two Thompson submachine guns and a shotgun by Federal Express to a dealer in Florida, according to Sullivan's affidavit.

Reward offered in Waiakea High School arson (AP)

AP, April 28, 2006

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) and Hawaii Police Department are offering a reward of up to $5,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of anyone involved in the arson of Waiakea High School.

The fire occurred in the early morning hours on April 11, 2006, at the high school, located at 155 W. Kawili Street in Hilo. Police responded at approximately 1:15 a.m. No one was injured in the fire and the property damage is estimated at $1.5 million.

“We take this incident seriously and are committed to pursuing every investigative lead,” said ATF Special Agent in Charge Kelvin N. Crenshaw.

“We urge anyone to call if you have any information that would assist us in apprehending the responsible persons in this case,” said Captain Chad Fukui, commander of the Hawaii Police Department's East Hawaii Criminal Investigations Division.

Two hotline numbers have been established: 1-888-ATF-FIRE and local police at 961-2383. All calls are confidential.

Reefer Medicine (NYT)

By Henry I. Miller

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

Stanford, Calif.

LAST week, the Food and Drug Administration staked out its position on the long-standing controversy over the medical use of marijuana — and made a lot of people smoking mad. The F.D.A. endorsed a multi-agency study that found that "no animal or human data supported the safety or efficacy of marijuana for general medical use." This came as an affront to those who claim that cannabis is an appropriate treatment for ailments from nausea and vomiting to muscle spasticity and intractable pain.

Many news reports and commentaries accused the F.D.A. of contradicting a 1999 report by the Institute of Medicine that recommended further research on marijuana's medical potential. The regulators were denounced as elevating politics over science.

DOJ_NMG_0027360

But the F.D.A. did no such thing. To be sure, its one-page statement was far shorter and less detailed than the institute's book-length report, but its conclusions were essentially the same. The F.D.A. also recently gave the go-ahead for clinical trials of a new drug derived from marijuana — further demonstrating that its position is both sensible and proper.

In their 1999 report, the Institute of Medicine's panel of experts flatly rejected the idea that herbal (usually smoked) cannabis would ever be considered a safe and effective medicine for widespread use. They noted that marijuana appears to be modestly effective in treating the nausea and vomiting induced by chemotherapy and the wasting caused by AIDS — though not as effective as some approved medicines are. But they also said that because smoked marijuana can increase the risk of lung damage, cancer and complications during pregnancy, it is appropriate only for short-term use (less than six months) by acutely suffering patients who have failed to find relief with other therapies and who are under the close supervision of a doctor.

It is not the F.D.A. but the 11 states that have passed laws allowing the use of smoked marijuana for various medical problems that are at odds with the Institute of Medicine's position.

More promising than smoked marijuana, the institute said, is the potential of drugs made with cannabinoids — the bioactive substances found in marijuana. It called for clinical trials of such medicines and the development of safe ways to deliver them.

In January, the F.D.A. approved advanced clinical trials of a marijuana-derived drug called Sativex, which comes in the form of a mouth spray. Sativex has been approved in Canada for the treatment of neuropathic pain associated with multiple sclerosis, and it is available by prescription (though not yet fully licensed) in Spain and Britain. According to GW Pharmaceuticals, the British company that makes the drug, more than 1,500 patients in those three countries are using Sativex to alleviate pain, muscle spasticity and other serious problems.

Federal law requires that before any drug is marketed, it must first be judged safe and effective by qualified experts. And that judgment requires the review of scientific evidence — not anecdotal reports and patient testimonials but hard data from carefully designed animal testing and clinical trials. While far from perfect in practice, this approach goes a long way toward ensuring that patients are protected from exposure to unsafe or ineffective products. Even for terminally ill patients, this commitment to safety and effectiveness is important, because the suffering of a dying patient can be aggravated by an imprudent medical intervention.

Smoked marijuana cannot be subjected to careful, well-controlled trials, because it does not come in a standard, reproducible formula or dose, and cannot meet the accepted standards for drug purity, potency and quality. Different strains of cannabis vary radically in their cannabinoid composition and in the contaminants — fungi, bacteria, pesticides, heavy metals and other substances — they contain. And smoking is not a precise way of delivering any substance to the bloodstream.

Other plant-derived drugs — morphine, codeine and Taxol, to name a few — have made it through the F.D.A.'s review process, and there is no reason drugs made from cannabis should not be required to meet the same standards.

Sativex contains an equal ratio of two cannabinoids: tetrahydrocannabinol, which is psychoactive, and cannabidiol, which is not. Its spray dispenser delivers a precise dose of the drug, which is absorbed through the mucous membranes of the mouth. The composition of the drug and the manner in which it is delivered together ensure that its active ingredients can be medically effective without causing the kind of "high" that many patients view as an undesirable side effect.

THE availability of drugs like Sativex should (but won't) end the rancorous debate over medical marijuana. Even if it did, the issue of whether marijuana should be legalized as a recreational drug would remain.

Meanwhile, F.D.A. officials must ensure that the testing and potential approval of cannabinoid-containing drugs are not hindered by political agendas or other nonscientific considerations, inside or outside the agency. For the benefit of patients in need, this is something about which the F.D.A., the parts of our government waging the "war on drugs" and other interested parties should be able to agree.

Henry I. Miller, a doctorand a fellow at the Hoover Institution, headed the Food and Drug Administration's Office of Biotechnology from 1989 to 1993.

Politics Produces A Cloud Of Smoke (JDN)

Jacksonville Daily News, April 28, 2006

Last week, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, for reasons that are far from clear, chose to enter the debate over medical marijuana with a thoroughly unscientific — one might even say anti-scientific — blanket denial that marijuana has any medical value at all.Specifically, the grandiosely titled “Inter-Agency Advisory Regarding Claims That Smoked Marijuana Is a Medicine” referenced a “past examination” that “concluded that no sound scientific studies supported medical use of marijuana for treatment in the United States, and no animal or human data supported the safety or efficacy of marijuana for general medical use.”

DOJ_NMG_0027361

That is simply not true. As Scientific American magazine noted on its Web site the next day, the statement simply ignores "the existence of a 1999 report by the Institute of Medicine of the National Academy of Sciences, which concluded that marijuana was 'moderately well-suited for particular conditions, such as chemotherapy-induced nausea and vomiting and AIDS wasting.'"

The Institute of Medicine report, which was commissioned by the "drug czar" at the time, Gen. Barry McCaffrey, and included a series of hearings around the country as well as a complete review of the scientific literature worldwide, summarized its conclusions as follows:

"Advances in cannabinoid science of the past 16 years have given rise to a wealth of new opportunities for the development of medically useful cannabinoid-based drugs. The accumulated data suggest a variety of indications, particularly for pain relief, antiemesis and appetite stimulation. For patients such as those with AIDS or who are undergoing chemotherapy, and who suffer simultaneously from severe pain, nausea and appetite loss, cannabinoid drugs might offer broad-spectrum relief not found in any other single medication. The data are weaker for muscle spasticity but moderately promising. The least-promising categories are movement disorders, epilepsy and glaucoma. Animal data are moderately supportive of a potential for cannabinoids in the treatment of movement disorders and might eventually yield stronger encouragement."

The Institute of Medicine report does say that "it does not follow from this that smoking marijuana is good medicine," which is the only sentence Gen. McCaffrey ever quoted.

That statement is followed, however, by noting that "patients who are currently suffering from debilitating conditions unrelieved by legally available drugs, and who might find relief with smoked marijuana, will find little comfort in a promise of a better drug 10 years from now."

Therefore, "Until a nonsmoked rapid-onset cannabinoid drug-delivery system becomes available, we acknowledge that there is no clear alternative for people suffering from chronic conditions that might be relieved by smoking marijuana, such as pain or AIDS wasting."

The FDA statement was not preceded by any new studies or surveys of the literature; it was simply posted on the agency's Web site.

It represents a willful determination to ignore science to buttress the harmful policy of marijuana prohibition.

Drugs Beget Thugs In The Americas (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

"It is an established fact that alcoholism, cocainism, and morphinism are deadly enemies of life, of health, and of the capacity for work and enjoyment; and a utilitarian must therefore consider them as vices. But this is far from demonstrating that the authorities must interpose to suppress these vices by commercial prohibitions, nor is it by any means evident that such intervention on the part of the government is really capable of suppressing them or that, even if this end could be attained, it might not therewith open up a Pandora's box of other dangers, no less mischievous than alcoholism and morphinism."

-- Ludwig von Mises in "Liberalism," 1927

The Mexican state of Campeche, tucked into the curve that forms the Gulf of Mexico in the south, is about as far from either the posh suburbs or the mean urban streets of North America as you can get. Arguably, there are parts of the region that have changed very little since Graham Greene wrote his 1940 novel about a whiskey priest on the run from an anti-clerical zealot in neighboring Tabasco.

Yet as last week's massive drug bust there showed, it is very much part of the international market place. The capture of 5.2 tons of cocaine at the airport in Ciudad del Carmen, flown in from Venezuela, is a reminder that as long as there are consumers who want to ingest illegal substances there will be suppliers. For every shipment that gets stopped you can bet nine others get through. We know this because decades into the war on drugs, prohibited narcotics are still widely available in the U.S.

The more disturbing lesson provided by the Campeche bust is the revelation of the underworld monster that prohibition has created and that is now emerging from the Pandora's box that Mises warned of. A mighty and unflinching organized-crime network is overwhelming Latin American law enforcement.

In the debate about Mexican immigration to the U.S. there has been a lot of legitimate criticism about Mexico's failure to create an economically viable environment for its own people. When exporting human capital is a top priority something in the policy mix is dreadfully wrong and there is no doubt that the Mexican political class has a lot to answer for.

But the drug war also figures in the equation. Nobel economist Douglas North taught us the importance of institutions in development economics. Yet prohibition and the war on drugs are fueling a criminal underworld that handily crushes nascent democratic institutions in countries that we keep expecting to develop. Is it reasonable to blame Mexico for what enormously well-funded organized-crime operations are doing to its political, judicial and law enforcement bodies when we know that Al

DOJ_NMG_0027362

Capone's power during alcohol prohibition accomplished much the same in the U.S.? These are realities of the market, of supply and demand and prices under prohibition that no amount of wishing or moralizing can change.

A serious discussion about U.S. security interests has to begin by acknowledging the great cost of prohibition and the war on drugs to U.S. foreign policy objectives. A U.S. policy that unintentionally empowers brutal organized-crime rings is counterproductive to U.S. hopes for a stable and prosperous Latin America.

The problem is particularly acute for America's southern neighbor. Drug violence is spiraling throughout Mexico and innocents are paying the ultimate price. One target city is Nuevo Laredo where eight months ago Mexican federal authorities arrived to quell unprecedented cartel violence. Today the murder rate is up; the Mexican general who was in charge of restoring order has gone missing; the news media has suffered atrocious assaults, including a grenade attack; and there is concern that the government's anti-drug units have been infiltrated.

Last month four federal intelligence officers were gunned down in the middle of the day near a school. That's about the same time some 600 federal police were sent to the city as reinforcements.

The rest of Mexico is under siege as well. In February the police chief of an upscale district of Monterrey was gunned down. An April 21 report in the Los Angeles Times captured the attitude of the drug lords: "'So that you learn to respect,' read a message scrawled on a red sheet attached to a Guerrero state government building in Acapulco, where passers-by in the early morning hours discovered the heads of former Police Commander Mario Nunez Magana, 35, of the Municipal Preventive Police, and another man, who was not identified."

More than 140 people have been killed in drug violence this year in the states of Guerrero and Michocan. The L.A. Times also reported that the beheadings occurred hours after the state governor "announced a $12 million project to give more firepower to police, who say they often are outgunned by the cartels." Outgunned they were on March 26 in the border city of Matamoros. As reported by Knight-Ridder, three agents with Mexico's Federal Investigations Agency were chased through the city's downtown "where they were attacked by suspects armed with AK-47s and other high-powered weapons."

Two more scary developments are notable. The first is the link between organized crime and political enemies of the U.S. In Colombia the rebel army known as the FARC is now a full-fledged narcotics trafficking operation. Officials believe that Venezuela, headed by the menacing Hugo Chávez, has become a major transit point for drugs. A 2006 State Department narcotics report noted that "rampant corruption at the highest levels of law enforcement and a weak judicial system" have made matters worse in Venezuela. Some in Mexico worry that drug money could play a corrosive role in July's presidential election.

A second, depressing development is the increase in drug consumption in poor countries as those doing the trafficking are paid in kind and push drugs locally to collect their money. A worthless weed has been made all the more dangerous by prohibition which gives it value and provides the incentives to get poor children hooked. Where's the morality in a policy with such pernicious, if unintended, consequences?

The question is not whether dangerous drugs are innocuous. Let's agree they are not. The question is which policy is best to manage the problem. We can't make that calculation until we face honestly all of the costs of prohibition and the suffering of our neighbors.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Issues Coming To A 'big Stop' (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf And Judy Keen

USA Today, April 28, 2006

LOS ANGELES — Masses of illegal immigrants and their supporters around the USA plan to boycott workplaces, stores and schools on Monday, but the move is dividing some pro-immigration activists and business owners.

Organizers of the May Day walkout call it el gran paro — "the big stop" — and "a day without immigrants." Building on huge marches staged in recent weeks, the boycotts and rallies in many cities will demonstrate immigrants' economic importance as Congress debates legislation, says Armando Navarro of the California-based National Alliance for Human Rights.

"It was one thing to march," Navarro says. "Now we're going to hit 'em where it hurts — in the pocketbooks."

The boycott's "size and impact remain to be seen," says Juan Jose Gutierrez of Latino Movement USA. That group's slogan: "No work, no school, no shopping, no commerce."

Gutierrez says he expects "substantial" worker absences, from Georgia poultry-processing plants to West Coast construction sites. David Jones, president of the Arizona Contractors Association, says builders there expect some no-shows and a work slowdown.

DOJ_NMG_0027363

As many as 12 million illegal immigrants are in the USA, and they make up about 5% of the workforce, the Pew Hispanic Center says.

Raul Murillo, director of the Los Angeles chapter of the Hermandad Mexicana immigrant organization, says he's among those acting to oppose a bill passed by the House of Representatives in December that would make illegal immigrants felons. The Senate is still considering an immigration bill.

Businesses with largely immigrant workforces are preparing for Monday in varying ways:

·Cargill, the No. 2 U.S. beef producer and No. 3 pork producer, is closing seven meat-processing plants with 14,000 employees in Iowa, Texas, Kansas, Nebraska, Illinois and Colorado. "We share a lot of the same concerns many of our employees have," spokesman Mark Klein says. "The immigration process is broken, and we need true solutions to it."

·Tyson Foods is discouraging workers from missing shifts, spokesman Gary Mickelson says. "We don't want our team members to jeopardize their good employment records and incomes by taking unauthorized time away from work," he says.

·All Las Vegas casinos are asking workers to stay on the job, sign petitions to lawmakers and attend a downtown "celebration of immigration" at 6 p.m., says Yvette Monet of MGM Mirage.

·The 17 Spanish-language radio stations owned by Clear Channel Communications will broadcast music without comment from disc jockeys. "Words are my life, but sometimes silence makes a bigger point," morning host Alex Lucas says.

Many Hispanic-owned businesses will be closed. Salvador Pedroza Moreno, owner of Economy Roofing in Chicago, says he'll give his seven workers the day off with pay to attend a march. In Tucson, Ricardo Cazares is shutting Alejandro's Tortilla Factory & Bakery, which has 55 workers. "There are sales that I know will be lost, but if we want something, we have to pay a price for it," he says.

Rallies are scheduled in many cities. Jessica Aranda of the March 10 Movement, a Chicago coalition that drew 100,000 to a march last month, says Monday will draw a bigger crowd. "Our community is coming into our own and realizing our own power," she says.

In nine New York City neighborhoods, "human chains" of Hispanic store owners, workers and customers will link hands for about 20 minutes, says Chung-Wha Hong, executive director of the New York Immigration Coalition.

"Some business owners couldn't afford to shut down their businesses all day," she says. "This is an alternative action for people who wanted to join something."

Navarro of the National Alliance for Human Rights says he expects Monday's economic action to get Congress' attention. "Timing is everything in politics, and the timing is with us right now," he says. But others who favor laws that support immigration rights say the walkouts could spark a backlash.

Encouraging children to skip school "just adds fuel to the argument that we don't care about our children's education," says Jose Lagos, a community organizer with Honduran Unity in Miami.

Angelica Salas of the Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights in Los Angeles says her group urges workers to get permission from their bosses before taking the day off. If undocumented workers walk out and get fired, "there's very little that they can do," she says.

Hector Flores, president of the League of United Latin American Citizens, says his 100,000-member organization opposes worker absenteeism and school walkouts, "but we don't want people to consume anything on that day."

Last month, announcements by Spanish-radio disc jockeys helped build crowds at rallies. Now, the top-rated Renan Almendarez Coello (known as El Cucuy, "the boogeyman") opposes walkouts. "We came here to work and not to say 'don't work,' " he said last week.

Cardinal Roger Mahony of Los Angeles, who has said he'd order priests not to obey laws against helping illegal immigrants, is cautious about Monday's boycott and instead is promoting a 4 p.m. rally — after school hours. That event could cut crowds at the boycott organizers' noon rally at City Hall.

"If both events go well, that would be great," says Mike Garcia, president of a Service Employees International Union local in Los Angeles, which is neutral on the boycott. "It shows there are differences in strategies, but everybody's fighting for the same thing."

L.A. Authorities Brace For Huge Immigration Marches (LAT)

By Hector Becerra And Andrew Blankstein

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

Two immigrant rights demonstrations Monday in Los Angeles could each draw a half-million marchers or more, police said Thursday, as officials expressed concern about a major disruption of traffic, commerce and school.

LAPD Assistant Chief George Gascon said the estimates are based on street intelligence and what he described as a well-organized campaign involving radio stations, churches and community groups. Police do not expect trouble, he added.

DOJ_NMG_0027364

Demonstrations are planned for downtown at noon and Mid-Wilshire at 4 p.m. Gascon said the LAPD is gearing up to deal with hundreds of thousands of demonstrators at each.

Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, Cardinal Roger Mahony and others have encouraged protesters to attend the late-afternoon march from MacArthur Park down Wilshire Boulevard to La Brea Avenue, prompting authorities to say that crowd might be the larger of the two.

Officials in Santa Ana, Huntington Park, Oxnard, Riverside, Pomona and San Diego said they expect smaller but boisterous protests.

Police in Chicago, meanwhile, estimated that as many as 500,000 could take to the streets in that city, while Seattle officials and protest organizers said they expect anywhere from 10,000 to 50,000 marchers.

Officials acknowledged that it is difficult to predict the size of any protest crowd, noting that at a march last month, the LAPD had expected far fewer protesters than the estimated 500,000 people who showed up outside Los Angeles City Hall.

But if the LAPD's estimates prove correct, Monday's marches would approach the scope of that event — one of the largest protests in Los Angeles' history. Officials said Monday's demonstrations could prove more disruptive, however, because they will occur on a weekday and they include a call for people to boycott school and work and refrain from shopping.

Some small-business owners say they plan to close down Monday, either to support the marchers or because they think it would be difficult to do business.

State and local school officials urged students to stay in classes, and transportation officials planned street closures and bus route detours.

"We want students to exercise free speech, but not at the expense of their education," said state Supt. of Public Instruction Jack O'Connell. "If students need to protest, they should feel free to do so after school."

The LAPD is coordinating an action plan with the Sheriff's Department, transportation agencies, the school district and other law enforcement. Officials said they also have been in contact with organizers in hopes of minimizing any conflicts and making sure the demonstrations run smoothly.

"We feel very confident at this point about the way the demonstrators have been conducting themselves, and we don't anticipate any problems," Gascon said. "We want to protect the demonstrators' 1st Amendment rights as well as the property rights and the rights of everyone else in the community."

Authorities voiced concern that because the protest falls on May Day, revolutionary groups and anarchists who have given police trouble in the past might join the marchers.

"We are not sure what they will add to the mix," said LAPD Capt. Andy Smith of the Central Division.

The noon march in Los Angeles is scheduled to begin at Olympic Boulevard and Broadway and proceed north toward City Hall. It is organized by the March 25 Coalition, which has called for a boycott of work, school and consumer activity. Leaders say the goal is to demonstrate the vital role of immigrants in the economy.

The second march is scheduled to begin at MacArthur Park and head west on Wilshire Boulevard toward La Brea. Organizers include the Archdiocese of Los Angeles and labor and civic groups. They say they want to give people who cannot take the day off work a way to participate in the fight for immigrant rights, and have urged students not to miss school.

LAPD officials said they have heard about a possible third demonstration being organized for Monday night in downtown, but did not know how big it might be.

It is unclear how businesses will be affected by the protests. Most larger shops and companies appear to be planning regular operations Monday. But local businesses with large numbers of immigrant workers, as well as those owned by immigrants and establishments along protest routes, could face substantial disruptions.

Some restaurants, grocery stores, garment factories, farmers, meat packers, gardeners and truckers say they plan to suspend some or all operations. Households may not get their usual gardening or housecleaning services, while some commercial establishments may not receive expected deliveries. Some workers who plan to demonstrate have already cleared their absences with their employers, while others plan to work from home to avoid traffic problems.

Additionally, some activists have vowed to disrupt work at the Port of Los Angeles, Los Angeles International Airport and elsewhere, though it is unclear uncertain how much support they have.

With the demonstration approaching, Villaraigosa and other officials appealed Thursday for students to stay in school Monday.

"It's very important to keep our kids in school and to make sure they get a good education, including on May 1st," he said, speaking first in English, then Spanish. "After school, they can join in the marches as is their 1st Amendment right."

But some groups rejected such pleas, saying students have a moral duty to protest immigration legislation they feel is wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0027365

"I believe children have more to learn protesting on the streets with their parents, expressing their rights, than in the classrooms," said Nativo Lopez, president of Hermandad Mexicana, which was organizing a demonstration in Santa Ana.

Los Angeles Unified Supt. Roy Romer said there would be no districtwide order to place schools on lockdown, during which students are not allowed to leave classrooms. Instead, principals on each campus will decide how to react if students try to leave campus during the school day.

"Monday, we need to be in school," Romer said at a news conference with O'Connell at Lincoln High School in Lincoln Heights. "We will be able to keep children safer at school, we will be able to continue their education, and after school hours there will be appropriate occasion to express themselves."

In Huntington Park, the scheduled ending point for a smaller demonstration, police said they were expecting many students to miss class. But stopping them would not be a priority, said Assistant Police Chief Cosme Lozano.

"We will have plenty of other things to worry about," he said. "We're not going to make mass truancy detentions a priority, but it will be a tool for us to use if we have to."

In Sacramento, the California Senate in a party-line vote approved a resolution designating Monday as the "Great American Boycott 2006." Democrats argued that protests are a venerable tradition going back to the Boston Tea Party. But Republicans criticized the measure as condoning illegality and encouraging student truancy.

Several Democratic lawmakers said they would be participating in the demonstrations Monday, and leaders decided that neither the Senate or Assembly would conduct business that day.

However, lawmakers can still receive their $138 per diem, a move Republicans called hypocritical, since most immigrants skipping work for protests are not paid.

Illegal Immigrants Skip Work Amid Unfounded Rumors Of Government Roundup (WSJ)

By Miriam Jordan And Paulo Trevisani Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

Thousands of illegal immigrants across the U.S. stayed away from work and school, skipped medical appointments and scrapped purchases this week as rumors spread that authorities are rounding up undocumented residents.

The rising panic is fallout from last week's move by Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to crack down on employers who purposely hire undocumented immigrants. Immigration and Customs Enforcement investigations over the past year resulted in the arrest on April 19 of 1,187 employees and seven current and former managers of IFCO Systems North America. Officials of the company, a supplier of wooden pallets and crates with plants across the country, are charged with conspiring to hire illegal immigrants, including helping them secure fake documents.

After hundreds of no-shows for medical appointments throughout Contra Costa County in northern California, the chief health official yesterday sought to reassure patients by circulating a letter stating that visiting a clinic wouldn't endanger them. In Newark, N.J., teachers reported unusual absenteeism for four consecutive days. At parking lots of home-improvement stores in Florida, such as Home Depot, only a few immigrants sought day-laborer jobs, when normally dozens show up.

The origin of the rumors is unclear. "These reports are baseless," says Virginia Kice, a spokeswoman for ICE. "We don't conduct random raids." The agency has been flooded with calls from Spanish-language media outlets seeking information.

The situation could hamper Monday's planned "National Day of Action," another round of immigration rallies that has been expected to draw millions to the streets of major U.S. cities. Protests calling for immigration reform have drawn huge crowds in the past month as immigrant workers press for legal work status amid a divisive congressional debate.

In the face of the current fear, organizers of Monday's protests are trying to calm potential protestors to ensure another big turnout. "We have been telling the public not to be intimidated," says Juan Carlos Hidalgo, programming director for a top-rated Spanish-language radio station KLEX in Los Angeles.

Peter Dyga, vice-president for government affairs of the Associated Builders and Contractors in Coconut Creek, Fla., says hundreds of construction workers had either walked off the job or just didn't show up this week. "We've never seen anything like this. We are in a sticky situation as an industry," he says.

In Newark, a Brazilian immigrant named Katia who declined to give her last name, has avoided leaving her house since Friday, when she first heard about possible raids. "I am just walking one block to take my daughter to school," she says. "I didn't even take her to karate classes last Monday."

Restaurant and grocery store owners reported a dramatic drop in business in many U.S. cities as illegal immigrants avoided being in public. "I just got off the phone with a mother who was afraid to go to the pharmacy to have her child's prescription for antibiotics filled," says Concepcion James, manager of Bay Point Family Health Center, which caters to low-income families in Bay Point, Calif. Only a handful of parents brought their children yesterday for a free day of eye exams, which normally draws hundreds.

DOJ_NMG_0027366

What has alarmed many immigrants is the specificity of the rumors, although none turned out to be true: In Newark, there was talk that U.S. agents were posted at bridges and roads connecting the city to New York and other towns. In Concord, Calif., a white Bronco parked outside a home-repair shop supposedly carried undercover immigration agents. In Fort Worth, Texas, a call about a rumored immigration sting sent Star-Telegram reporters scrambling Tuesday night to an area near the Fort Worth Stockyards, according to the newspaper's account.

With 12 million illegal immigrants in the country, ICE normally targets those with criminal records who have evaded deportation orders. In terms of employers, the agency typically investigates companies believed to systematically hire undocumented immigrants for commercial gain.

Other recent incidents have added fuel to the fire. In Chinook, Wash., on Tuesday, ICE agents apprehended 16 illegal immigrants at a fish processing plant. On Monday, ICE agents in Miami announced the arrests of 183 undocumented immigrants, including 130 who had evaded deportation orders. Another 53 illegal immigrants were arrested because they were in the area when the arrests took place.

The new workplace enforcement is interpreted by some political analysts as an attempt to placate hard-line Republicans who believe the Bush administration is turning a blind eye to the widespread practice by U.S. businesses of hiring undocumented immigrants. The crackdown also indicates the extent to which the political tussle over immigration could affect several sectors of the economy that rely on immigrant workers. An ICE spokeswoman said the workplace enforcement represents the second phase of a multi-year program to reduce illegal immigration.

Community leaders believe that the political debate over illegal immigration, including a House bill that would make illegal immigrants and those who help them subject to criminal prosecution, has helped stoke panic in immigrant communities.

"Everybody knows someone who knows someone who has been arrested," says Ilton Marques, a butcher at Emporium Supermarket in Newark. "But nobody actually saw anything."

Hispanics Seek Immigration Action (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

See weekday Washington Wire updates at www.washwire.com1.

HISPANICS WANT action on immigration reform.

While other Americans rate curbing budgetary "earmarks" their top single objective for Congress, new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll2 shows a 46% plurality of Hispanics place immigration atop "must do" list. The poll, conducted in English, included an expanded sample of Hispanic respondents. Eight in 10 embrace Senate guest-worker compromise differentiating among illegal immigrants based on residence. Though Republicans blame Democrats for earlier collapse of that deal, two-thirds of Hispanics would hold Bush or his party responsible for inaction. The poll's margin of error is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

White voters favor Republican control of Congress by 45%-39%; Hispanics prefer Democrats, 55%-22%.

HEALTH CARE LOOMS as top election-year concern.

Three in 10 Americans call it a top priority, outpacing those citing job creation, terrorism or Iran's nuclear program. Strong majority applauds Massachusetts Gov. Romney's plan to mandate that individuals buy insurance, though Republicans are less enthusiastic than Democrats and independents.

Bush's party makes modest headway in defending Medicare prescription drug benefit as May 15 enrollment deadline approaches. Senate Republicans brace for May battles over medical malpractice and "association health plan" legislation. NFIB and Realtors back the association bill, but opposition from AARP, American Cancer Society and American Diabetes Association clouds prospects.

MCCAIN WIDENS early lead over Clinton for 2008.

In a prospective presidential matchup, the Arizona Republican leads the New York Democrat, 46%-37%, up from two-percentage edge in November. The fourth-term maverick draws 13% support from Democrats, while Clinton receives just 6% support from Republicans.

But former first lady benefits from a more enthusiastic base, as 41% of Democrats call themselves "optimistic" about another Clinton presidency. Just 28% of Republicans are optimistic about McCain.

Bill Clinton's positive ratings hit 50% for first time since he left the White House; his negative falls to 33%.

MULFORD EMERGES as additional contender to succeed Snow at Treasury. The current U.S. ambassador to India, a Treasury undersecretary for the elder President Bush, has Wall Street credibility as a former top Credit Suisse First Boston official. Another name in the buzz: Commerce Secretary Gutierrez, an ex-Kellogg CEO.

DOJ_NMG_0027367

CONSENSUS: Six in 10 Republicans, Democrats, and independents fault oil companies for gas-price increases. But they split on Bush's culpability; just 9% of Republicans blame the president, while 46% of Democrats and 31% of independents do.

COULD BE WORSE: While only 24% of Americans call the nation "headed in the right direction," that's 10 percentage points more than said so in July 1992 during first President Bush's unsuccessful re-election bid. That campaign was colored by Perot's independent candidacy; today, 45% want a new independent party to compete for the presidency and 29% oppose the idea.

STALLED: FDA again delays release of new manufacturing standards for dietary supplements, frustrating lawmakers and industry who've been waiting for regulation under terms of 1994 law. Just 15% of Americans call themselves optimistic that Bush will do a good job in rest of term, while 35% are pessimistic.

DESPITE IRAQ, Americans don't reject strikes against a nuclear Iran.

By 48%-42%, public says U.S. should join coalition to attack Iran's nuclear capability if Tehran approaches development of a weapon. Support falls to 42%, with 46% opposed, when respondents are asked if the U.S. should act on its own.

Majorities in all regions, races and age groups say U.S. should change directions and scale back objectives in Iraq. But six in 10 conservatives and white evangelical Christians favor remaining "on the current course." Two-thirds of all respondents say resignation of Pentagon chief Rumsfeld would be only "a symbolic gesture" that wouldn't make much difference.

Industry insiders say Dubai Ports World may face cut-rate offers for U.S. assets, could ask Congress to cover losses.

MINOR MEMOS: Amid bickering over ballot security, majorities of blacks and Hispanics back requiring photo ID at voting sites ... Notwithstanding media focus, just 3% rank Duke lacrosse team rape scandal as top concern.

Population Shift Smaller Families In Mexico May Stir U.S. Job Market (WSJ)

By June Kronholz And John Lyons

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

U.S. employers have long counted on men like Elizardo Ramírez, who left his concrete-block home and 12 children in Mexicali, Mexico, to spend most of his working life in California picking tomatoes and lettuce. Two of Mr. Ramírez's sons followed him to low-skilled jobs in the U.S.

But Americans who are convinced the spigot of workers like the Ramírezes will never run dry might want to visit another of the Ramírez children still in Mexicali: Sandra Ramírez de Llanes. Ms. Llanes and her husband, Osvaldo, have just one child. They're saving for 15-year-old Jose Oswaldo to go to college and become an engineer -- in Mexico.

Unusual for their generation, Ms. Llanes and her husband have themselves risen to the middle class, thanks to jobs at a bank. "We've struggled," says Ms. Llanes. "But through it all, it never occurred to us to go to the U.S."

The Llanes family reflects Mexico's past and present -- and, perhaps, illuminates a future that would have important consequences for the U.S. economy. Thanks to a decades-long family-planning campaign, most Mexicans are having far fewer children than was typical a generation ago. When Ms. Llanes was born in 1968, the average Mexican woman had nearly seven children. Today, the figure is just above two, comparable to the U.S.

This sweeping demographic shift has fostered hope that someday Mexico will produce a healthy middle class of people like the Llaneses. Most Mexicans today are far too poor for luxuries the Llaneses enjoy, such as a computer for Jose Oswaldo. But the new, smaller Mexican family may help change that by allowing parents to invest more in their children's education, finally producing the generation that lifts Mexico into the developed world.

Mexico's new demographics could have a big impact on the U.S. Although the flood of Mexicans heading north is whipping up debate in Washington, the crossings may slow in future decades. That could happen simply because smaller families limit the pool of potential migrants. A slowdown would be especially likely if a growing middle class makes more Mexicans comfortable at home and averse to risking a dash across the border.

A reduction in the supply of cheap Mexican labor would be sure to have ripple effects on the U.S. economy. It could raise costs for employers as they searched for immigrant labor from more distant places such as Asia. If, as some contend, the current flood of immigrants is hurting lower-skilled native-born Americans, the easing of the flood might help them.

Currently an estimated 459,000 Mexicans come to the U.S. each year, according to the Pew Hispanic Center in Washington, most of them younger people looking for low-skilled work. That reflects Mexico's demographics: There are millions of Mexicans in their 20s and 30s born to big families that had no means to support education. The median age of Mexico's 107 million people is 25, meaning half are older than that age and half are younger. In the U.S., the median is 36.

But the Population Division of the United Nations predicts that by 2050, the situation will be reversed: Mexico's median age will rise to 42, while the U.S. will rise to 41.

DOJ_NMG_0027368

While an older Mexico with smaller families may be a richer one, that outcome is by no means assured. Robert Pastor, director of the Center for North American Studies at American University in Washington, says the "critical challenge" for Mexicans is "what they will do with the next 20 years."

Mexico's large working-age population means it should have more tax revenue to spend on job training, infrastructure such as power and transportation, and a social-security system. But it could miss the opportunity. Currently taxes are low and many rich people evade them. The public-education system is weak and the poor often inherit the low-wage jobs of their parents.

If an aging Mexico stagnates, the drive to emigrate to the U.S. may grow stronger than ever. And U.S. companies that hope a boom in Mexico's middle class will boost purchases of American goods would be disappointed.

Aging expert Richard Jackson says it's hard to predict whether Mexico will prosper. "Every country that ever got old got rich first," says Mr. Jackson, senior fellow at Washington's Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Ms. Llanes's tale offers some hints of how a brighter future might develop for Mexico. She tells of an impoverished childhood. On one grim day, she says, her mother showed her how to feed the family's littlest children only the cloudy water in which she had boiled the rice for everyone else. Ms. Llanes's father, Mr. Ramírez, had joined the mass migration from rural farmland to big cities by coming to Mexicali, right across the border from California, in the mid-1950s.

As the family grew, Mr. Ramírez, an uneducated day laborer who died in 1997, found it hard to make ends meet. He joined a guest-worker program that brought him to seasonal agriculture jobs in the U.S.

"We hardly got to know him as a father. He had to work so much to support us," Ms. Llanes says. One by one, the Ramírez children dropped out of school to help feed the family.

Ms. Llanes recalls envying a neighbor family with just three children who wore store-bought clothes and went to college. "Seeing how they lived...is what made me decide that I would have a small family," she says. But she remembers how older women wondered whether the family was so small because of fertility problems or marital discord.

Rapid population growth was long seen as both a religious obligation in largely Roman Catholic Mexico and as a goal of public policy. In the early 1970s, demographers began warning that Mexico's population, then around 50 million, could triple to 150 million by 2000.

In a policy U-turn, the government set up family-planning clinics, offered free contraception, set sterilization quotas at clinics and began an advertising campaign that is still widely remembered. "The small family lives better," proclaimed television and radio commercials. In a soap opera called "Accompany Me," popular when Ms. Llanes was growing up, a young woman lived in a cramped tenement with 13 siblings. "You've condemned your children to live in a hell," she screamed at her mother in one episode.

Today, the government still sends the same message. The Mexican Senate recently voted to extend sex education to kindergarten.

The population-control efforts had a huge impact, but not before a flood of Mexicans born in the 1970s, '80s and '90s began moving to the U.S. About 11 million Mexican immigrants now live in the U.S., up from less than a million in 1970, according to the Pew Hispanic Center.

The vast flow has relieved pressure on Mexico from millions of jobless young people and helped keep its population in check. Rodolfo Tuirán, former head of Mexico's National Population Council, says Mexico would have another 16 million people today if it hadn't been for the migrants and the children they had in the U.S. instead of Mexico.

Two of Ms. Llanes's brothers joined the movement north. Alvaro Ramírez is a farm hand in El Centro, Calif., and Bartolo Ramírez works at a gas station in Calexico, Calif., just over the border from Mexicali.

Ms. Llanes decided on another path. After finishing junior high school, she enrolled in a one-year secretarial course because "it would have been selfish for me to go on to high school," she says.

At age 17, she began work at a Mexicali bank where she met her future husband. Osvaldo Llanes also had moved from the countryside and concluded that high school would be a luxury. Instead, he took a brief accounting course, joined the bank as a clerk and at age 43, now runs four branches of Banamex, a unit of U.S. giant Citigroup Inc.

On their $26,000 yearly income, the Llaneses live in a three-bedroom home in one of the new U.S.-style housing developments that have sprung up for the thousands of young, middle-class families in the increasingly prosperous north. They own a second house as an investment.

Young Jose Oswaldo talks of studying engineering in college and, to make sure that happens, his parents are putting $40 a month in his college fund. That kind of investment in children's education could bode well for Mexico and over the long term reduce the incentive to emigrate to the U.S.

In the shorter term, however, economic development may fuel immigration by giving would-be migrants the cash to cross the border. The Pew Hispanic Center says many Mexicans move to the U.S. not because they are jobless but because they want a better job than the one they have. Its polls show that 49% of Mexican adults would move to the U.S. if they could.

DOJ_NMG_0027369

The Mexican government's most optimistic forecast still puts migration at almost 400,000 a year for the next 25 years -- and more than 500,000 if things go badly with the Mexican economy. In part that's because inland farming states that send the most workers to the U.S. are likely to be the last to share in any new prosperity.

Mexico's economy has long had trouble creating the kind of opportunities that Mr. and Ms. Llanes enjoyed. The Mexican government said recently that its economy created no new private-sector jobs in the first four years of President Fox's six-year term, even though more than a million new workers enter the labor force yearly.

In another few decades Mexico will have the same kind of aging society as developed nations do today, but it is ill-prepared for it. The pension system for state workers faces a shortfall. Private employers are required to contribute to a pension system but about half the work force is working off the books. These people have little chance of a comfortable pension.

If Mexico doesn't build a nationwide pension system, "coming to the U.S. is your social security," says Steve Camarota, a demographer at the Center for Immigration Studies, a Washington research group that advocates less immigration.

Mr. Pastor of American University agrees. "We're going to have an unending wave" of illegal immigrants, he says, unless governments make adjustments -- not only in Mexico but also in other sluggish and aging Latin American countries. The median age in Brazil will rise to 39 in 2050 from 27 today, the U.N. predicts.

Mrs. Llanes is determined that Jose Oswaldo stay in his home country. "I want to prepare my son well enough so he can find opportunities in Mexico," she says.

An Anthem's Discordant Notes (WP)

By David Montgomery

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

Oh say can you see -- a la luz de la aurora?

The national anthem that once endured the radical transformation administered by Jimi Hendrix's fuzzed and frantic Stratocaster now faces an artistic dare at least as extreme: translation into Spanish.

The new take is scheduled to hit the airwaves today. It's called "Nuestro Himno" -- "Our Anthem" -- and it was recorded over the past week by Latin pop stars including Ivy Queen, Gloria Trevi, Carlos Ponce, Tito "El Bambino," Olga Tañon and the group Aventura. Joining and singing in Spanish is Haitian American artist Wyclef Jean.

The different voices contribute lines the way 1985's "We Are the World" was put together by an ensemble of stars. The national anthem's familiar melody and structure are preserved, while the rhythms and instrumentation come straight out of Latin pop.

Can "The Star-Spangled Banner," and the republic for which it stands, survive? Outrage over what's being called "The Illegal Alien Anthem" is already building in the blogosphere and among conservative commentators.

Timed to debut the week Congress returned to debate immigration reform, with the country riven by the issue, "Nuestro Himno" is intended to be an anthem of solidarity for the movement that has drawn hundreds of thousands of people to march peacefully for immigrant rights in Washington and cities across the country, says Adam Kidron, president of Urban Box Office, the New York-based entertainment company that launched the project.

"It's the one thing everybody has in common, the aspiration to have a relationship with the United States . . . and also to express gratitude and patriotism to the United States for providing the opportunity," says Kidron.

The song was being prepared for e-mailing as MP3 packages to scores of Latino radio stations and other media last night, and Kidron was calling for stations to play the song simultaneously at 7 Eastern time this evening.

However, the same advance buzz that drew singers to scramble for inclusion in the recording sessions this week in New York, Miami, Texas, Mexico, Puerto Rico and the Dominican Republic has also spurred critics who say rendering the song in Spanish is a rejection of assimilation into the United States.

Even some movement supporters are puzzled by the use of Spanish.

"Even our Spanish media are saying, 'Why are we doing this, what are you trying to do?' " said Pedro Biaggi, the morning host with El Zol (99.1 FM), the most popular Hispanic radio station in the Washington area. "It's not for us to be going around singing the national anthem in Spanish. . . . We don't want to impose, we don't own the place. . . . We want to be accepted."

Still, Biaggi says he will play "Nuestro Himno" this morning if the song reaches the station in time. But he will talk about the language issue on the air and solicit listeners' views. He says he accepts the producers' explanation that the purpose is to spread the values of the anthem to a wider audience. He adds he will also play a version of "The Star-Spangled Banner" in English -- as he aired the Whitney Houston version earlier this week, when the controversy was beginning to brew.

In the Spanish version, the translation of the first stanza is relatively faithful to the spirit of the original, though Kidron says the producers wanted to avoid references to bombs and rockets. Instead, there is "fierce combat." The translation of the more obscure second stanza is almost a rewrite, with phrases such as "we are equal, we are brothers."

DOJ_NMG_0027370

An alternate version to be released next month includes a rap in English that never occurred to Francis Scott Key:

Let's not start a war

With all these hard workers

They can't help where they were born

"Nuestro Himno" is as fraught with controversial cultural messages as the psychedelic "Banner" Hendrix delivered at the height of the Vietnam War.

Pressed on what he was trying to say with his Woodstock performance in 1969, Hendrix replied (according to biographer Charles Cross), "We're all Americans. . . . It was like 'Go America!' . . . We play it the way the air is in America today."

Now the national anthem is being remade again according to the way the air is in America, and the people behind "Nuestro Himno" say the message once more is: We're all Americans. It will be the lead track on an album about the immigrant experience called "Somos Americanos," due for release May 16. One dollar from each sale will go to immigrant rights groups, including the National Capital Immigration Coalition, which organized the march on the Mall on April 10.

But critics including columnist Michelle Malkin, who coined "The Illegal Alien Anthem" nickname, say the rendition crosses a line that Hendrix never stepped over with his instrumental version. Transforming the musical idiom of "The Star-Spangled Banner" is one thing, argue the skeptics, but translating the words sends the opposite message: We are not Americans.

"I'm really appalled. . . . We are not a bilingual nation," said George Taplin, director of the Virginia Chapter of the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, part of a national countermovement that emphasizes border control and tougher enforcement, and objects to public funding for day-laborer sites. "When people are talking about becoming a part of this country, they should assimilate to the norm that's already here," Taplin said. "What we're talking about here is a sovereign nation with our ideals and our national identity, and that [anthem] is one of the icons of our nation's identity. I believe it should be in English as it was penned."

Yet, even in English, 61 percent of adults don't know all the words, a recent Harris poll found.

Appealing to such symbols of national identity to plug into their profound potency is how new movements compete for space within that identity. During the rally on the Mall, the immigrants and their supporters also waved thousands of American flags and recited the Pledge of Allegiance. But they didn't translate the pledge into Spanish. They said it in English.

Juan Carlos Ruiz, the general coordinator of the National Capital Immigration Coalition, said there's not a contradiction. The pledge was printed phonetically for Spanish speakers, and many reciting the sounds may not have understood the meaning. Putting the anthem in Spanish is a way to relay the meaning to people who haven't learned English yet, Ruiz said.

"It's part of the process to learn English," not a rejection of English, he said.

While critics sketch a nightmare scenario of a Canada-like land with an anthem sung in two languages, immigrant rights advocates say they agree learning English is essential. Studies of immigrant families suggest the process is inevitable: Eighty-two percent to 90 percent of the children of immigrants prefer English.

"The first step to understanding something is to understand it in the language you understand, and then you can understand it in another language," said Leo Chavez, director of Chicano/Latino Studies at the University of California at Irvine. "What this song represents at this moment is a communal shout, that the dream of America, which is represented by the song, is their dream, too."

Since its origins as the melody to an English drinking song called "To Anacreon in Heaven," circa 1780, "The Star-Spangled Banner" has had a long, strange trip. Key wrote the poem after watching the bombardment of Fort McHenry in 1814. It became the national anthem in 1931.

At least 389 versions have been recorded, according to Allmusic.com, a quick reference used by musicologists to get a sense of what's on the market. Now that Hendrix's "Banner" has mellowed into classic rock, it's hard to imagine that once some considered it disrespectful. The other recordings embrace a vast musical universe: from Duke Ellington to Dolly Parton to Tiny Tim. But musicologists cannot name another foreign-language version.

"America is a pluralistic society, but the anthem is a way that we can express our unity. If that's done in a different language, that doesn't seem to me personally to be a bad thing," said Michael Blakeslee, deputy executive director of the National Association for Music Education, which is leading a National Anthem Project to highlight the song and the school bands that play it in every style, from mariachi to steel drum.

"I assume the intent is one of making a statement about 'we are a part of this nation,' and those are wonderful sentiments and a noble intent," said Dan Sheehy, director of Smithsonian Folkways Recordings.

Benigno "Benny" Layton wonders. He's the leader of Los Hermanos Layton, a band of conjunto- and Tejano-style musicians in Elsa, Tex., 22 miles from Mexico. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, he recorded a traditional conjunto version of "The Star-Spangled Banner." It was instrumental.

DOJ_NMG_0027371

"I'm a second-generation American," Layton said. "I love my country, and I love my [Mexican musical] heritage, and I try to keep it alive. But some things are sacred that you don't do. And translating the national anthem is one of them."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Committee Blames Bush For Slow Response To Katrina (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

Knight Ridder, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - In a scorching account of government failure, a bipartisan Senate committee on Thursday blamed the botched response to Hurricane Katrina on a failure of leadership that stretched from the White House to the mayor's office in New Orleans.

Although the report's call for disbanding the Federal Emergency Management Agency has garnered the most attention, the assessment also scolds President Bush, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco, New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin and a host of other officials for failing to anticipate the devastation or provide adequate help to victims.

The bipartisan report by the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee concluded that Bush "could have done more" to mobilize federal resources. It says the initial White House response "was halting and inadequate."

Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, the panel's top Democrat, was even more critical of the president. Lieberman, a centrist whose bid for re-election next fall is being challenged by a liberal rival in the Democratic primary, asserted his conclusions in a solo chapter at the end of the full report.

"Despite the clear warnings before landfall that Katrina would be catastrophic, the president and the White House staff were not sufficiently engaged and failed to initiate a sufficiently strong and proactive response," Lieberman wrote. "After the hurricane, the White House continued to demonstrate a lack of understanding of the magnitude of the catastrophe."

He also accused the Bush administration of stonewalling the panel's investigation. The Senate committee interviewed 325 witnesses and reviewed more than 838,000 pages of government documents in attempting to determine what went wrong.

"In too many cases, we faced agencies and departments that saw our efforts as a nuisance," Lieberman said. "And the worst offender was the entity that should have stood above the fray and worked hardest with the committee to uncover the government's failings in Katrina: the White House."

The report hints at similar frustrations by noting that the committee "has been unable to conclude" why the president waited five days after landfall to order troops to the stricken region. The hurricane and flooding killed more than 1,500 people and left thousands more homeless in Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama.

White House officials defended their response and Bush's role in overseeing it. Fran Townsend, the president's homeland security adviser, noted that the committee praised Bush's pre-storm warnings and his decision to declare a disaster before the storm hit.

"It was the president and his staff that brought all the resources of the federal government to bear," Townsend told reporters who were traveling with Bush on Thursday to storm-damaged areas in Louisiana and Mississippi. "Can we do better? Absolutely. Will we do better? Absolutely."

Although the committee's findings generally echo other assessments of the Katrina response, Lieberman's report provides new details about what was going on behind the scenes at the White House as officials grappled with one of the most destructive natural disasters in history.

Citing testimony from former FEMA director Michael Brown, Lieberman concluded that Bush didn't realize the impact of the storm until a day and a half after landfall, when Brown told the president that up to 90 percent of New Orleans residents had been forced from their homes.

"My God, you mean it is that bad?" Brown recalled Bush saying.

In a video teleconference Aug. 27, two days before landfall, Brown warned Bush's advisers to prepare for a catastrophe. The aides were with the president at his Texas ranch, but Bush didn't participate in the call.

"I've got to tell you my gut hurts on this one. It hurts. I've got cramps. So we need to take this one very, very seriously," Brown said, according to a transcript of the teleconference.

Lieberman said Deputy White House Chief of Staff Joe Hagin, the top White House official at the session, didn't question Brown about his dire forecast and offered a "perplexingly optimistic" response. Hagin told Brown that "it sounds like the planning, as usual, is in good shape."

The report faults virtually every official who played a major role in the response. Among the complaints:

-Nagin "wasted time in waiting to order a mandatory evacuation."

DOJ_NMG_0027372

-Blanco "submitted an inadequate and erroneous request for assistance to the president and generally failed to ask the federal government for sufficient assistance before the storm."

-Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "failed to effectively lead the federal response" and "should have been more engaged in preparations."

-Brown, who has since resigned, "was insubordinate, unqualified and counterproductive."

The Senate committee concluded that leadership failures after the storm were particularly harmful because officials had failed to prepare for a catastrophic storm despite repeated warnings.

"The results were a tragic loss of life and human suffering on a massive scale," the committee concluded.

To read the full Senate report, go to: http://hsgac.senate.gov/index.cfm?Fuseaction=Links.Katrina

White House Aide Rejects Proposal To Scrap FEMA (WT)

By Joseph Curl

Washington Times, April 28, 2006

The White House yesterday rejected calls from Congress to dismantle the Federal Emergency Management Agency, blamed for bureaucratic bungling after Hurricane Katrina ravaged the Gulf Coast last year.

"As we're headed to this hurricane season, now is not really time to really look at moving organizational boxes," Frances F. Townsend, homeland security adviser to President Bush, told reporters aboard Air Force One en route to New Orleans.

A Senate panel yesterday recommended that FEMA be replaced by a new agency that would be better able to respond to major disasters. While Ms. Townsend rejected scrapping the federal emergency agency, she agreed that some restructuring could help.

"Yes, there's a better way to organize it. ... We look forward to working with the committee," she said. "I think we all share the same common goal and that is having a strong, capable FEMA that is better able to serve the American people when they're in greatest need."

The president, making his 11th trip to the Gulf Coast yesterday, said his administration is working to ensure that there is not a repeat of the devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina.

"We pray that there is no hurricane this coming year, but we're working together to make sure the response will be as efficient as possible," Mr. Bush said.

Democrats seized on the Senate panel's report, hoping to position themselves in the November congressional elections.

"This report confirms in stark terms what the people of Louisiana have known for many months," said Sen. Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana. "The handling of Hurricane Katrina by the Department of Homeland Security and FEMA was an organizational nightmare of immense proportions and that tragic administrative bumbling caused untold hardship for the people of Louisiana."

Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, blamed Mr. Bush for the extent of devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina, which left more than 1,500 people dead.

"The White House shares responsibility for the inadequate prelandfall preparations," he said. "The president did not leave his Texas ranch to return to Washington until two days after landfall, and only then convened his Cabinet as well as a White House task force to oversee federal response efforts."

But the president said he has learned from Hurricane Katrina and the federal government is ready for the coming hurricane season.

"One of the things that we're working on is to make sure that we've learned the lessons from Katrina -- we've learned lessons at the federal level and state level and the local level. And we're now working closely together in preparation of the upcoming hurricane season," Mr. Bush said.

"All of us in positions of responsibility appreciate those who are working to help us understand how to do our jobs better. And we pray there is no hurricane this coming year, but we are working together to make sure that if there is one the response will be as efficient as possible," he said.

Congress, White House Divided Over Rebuilding FEMA (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

Washington Post, April 28, 2006

The Federal Emergency Management Agency and Department of Homeland Security are not adequately prepared for the hurricane season that begins in 34 days, the White House and Senate leaders said yesterday as a critical Senate investigation into the response to Hurricane Katrina sparked a sharp congressional debate over whether to abolish and rebuild FEMA.

DOJ_NMG_0027373

Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said FEMA "has become a symbol of a bumbling bureaucracy" that must be dismantled, and merely "tweaking the organizational chart" will not solve failures exposed by the hurricane.

"Are we prepared enough? We're not, and we're still operating with a flawed system" heading into the June 1 start of the storm season, Collins said.

She and ranking member Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) released 86 recommendations from the panel's forthcoming report, "Hurricane Katrina: A Nation Still Unprepared."

The eight-month, bipartisan investigation's central finding is that FEMA should be replaced by a new National Preparedness and Response Authority. Its head would report to the secretary of Homeland Security but serve as the president's top adviser for national emergency matters, akin to the military role played by the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The new agency would recombine disaster preparedness and response activities, reclaim power over billions of dollars of state and local grants, gain responsibility for securing critical infrastructure, and restore an emphasis on natural, as well as terrorist, threats. Those functions and approaches were dispersed or downgraded by the Bush administration as FEMA was merged into DHS.

The White House yesterday rejected the Senate committee plan but said that storm preparations are not yet complete.

"As we're headed into this hurricane season, now is not the time to really look at moving organizational boxes," said Frances Fragos Townsend, homeland security adviser to President Bush, who accompanied him to the Gulf Coast to see recovery operations. "We are far better prepared today than we were this time last year, and we'll be even better prepared by June 1."

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, speaking at George Mason University, endorsed several Senate findings, but opposed making FEMA an independent agency and said renaming it would be like "slapping a fresh coat of paint on."

"I'm held accountable. I want to make sure as a consequence that I have full command and control over my department," he said.

Several members of Congress and outside experts praised the report, however, or said it did not go far enough. Wherever FEMA goes, they said, it is critical to strengthen its leadership, budget, regional commands, ties to states and cities, and core functions. Any reorganization would be FEMA's third in four years.

House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Peter T. King (R-N.Y.), ranking member Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) and others introduced a bill yesterday that would alter FEMA but not dismantle it.

But Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.), a member of Collins's committee, said FEMA should be restored to independent Cabinet-level status. House panels are preparing related bills as the House plans a week of action on Katrina issues May 22.

The timing is driven by hurricane season and this fall's elections, as Congress races to act with or without the White House.

"Leadership is aware this is all coming to a head. They'd prefer to be on the same sheet of music as DHS, of course," said a House Republican official who requested anonymity because he is not allowed to speak for members. "But they're also aware that if legislation to take FEMA out [of DHS] was sent to the floor tomorrow, it would get 400 votes."

"I don't believe re-creating a broken wheel within DHS moves us closer to realizing" Katrina's lessons, Rep. William Shuster (R-Pa.) said.

David Heyman, director of the homeland security program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, called the report one of the most comprehensive reviews of national preparedness since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. "If we implement just half of the recommendations from the report, we will be twice as prepared as we are today," he said.

Divisions Arise On Whether FEMA Requires A Tear-Down (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Congress and the White House are headed toward a collision over one of the big questions left unresolved in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina — whether to beef up the nation's key disaster response agency within the Department of Homeland Security or to create a politically independent agency to handle national emergencies.

Just weeks before the 2006 hurricane season officially begins June 1, a Senate committee on Thursday called for the Federal Emergency Management Agency to be dismantled and reconstituted as a new, stronger agency within Homeland Security.

Many House members, meanwhile, are pushing to restore FEMA to its pre-2003 status as an independent agency, this time with Cabinet rank and additional funding muscle.

And as President Bush made his 11th visit to the Gulf Coast since the storm hit Aug. 29, the White House urged a strengthening — but no reshuffling — of current operations.

DOJ_NMG_0027374

"Now is not the time to really look at moving organizational boxes," said Frances F. Townsend, the president's domestic security advisor, who traveled with Bush to Louisiana and Mississippi on Thursday.

The disagreement is a direct echo of the debate that erupted after the Sept. 11 attacks, when the White House initially resisted congressional efforts to reorganize all domestic security and disaster preparedness agencies under one roof. The White House eventually agreed to the creation of the Department of Homeland Security, which united 22 separate programs, employing more than 170,000 people, in March 2003.

This time, the debate takes place in an election year, when politicians facing the voters are under pressure not just to write reports about what went wrong but to take action to fix the problems. Adding to the unpredictability is the deep divide within both political parties over the best course of action.

There is one significant point of agreement: FEMA botched the federal response to Katrina, which killed more than 1,300 people along the Gulf Coast and left hundreds of thousands homeless. So far, the federal tab for relief and reconstruction costs has reached $100 billion.

"FEMA is discredited, demoralized and dysfunctional," said Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), whose Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee issued its recommendations Thursday. "It is beyond repair. Just tweaking the organizational chart will not solve the problem."

Collins, the panel's chairwoman, and its ranking Democrat, Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, are proposing that FEMA's functions be absorbed into a new agency, the National Preparedness and Response Authority, which would remain under the secretary of Homeland Security but have broad jurisdiction and direct access to the president during crises.

"This will be a dramatically different agency from FEMA," Colins said.

But Collins and Lieberman, who plan to start drafting legislation next week, face an uphill battle in the Senate, where Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) shares the White House view that this no time for a reorganization.

"We're very leery, headed into hurricane season, of rewriting the entire FEMA operation," said a Frist spokesman who asked not to be identified when discussing party issues. "As the storms come ashore, FEMA personnel would be diverting time to testify on a rewrite."

Many in the House, including Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.), chairman of the House Select Committee on Katrina that issued its report in February, favor making FEMA a separate agency, with Cabinet rank.

"Re-branding FEMA doesn't fix the problem, it just puts a new acronym on it," said David Marin, the select committee's director and a Davis spokesman.

Defenders of the Senate proposal say it is being mischaracterized. The new agency's "leaders would have to have emergency management experience, which would put an end to the Bush administration's penchant for rewarding political types with important security jobs," said a Senate staffer who asked not to be identified when discussing the issue.

And a bipartisan group of congressmen — including Peter King (R-N.Y.) and Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), the chairman and the top Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee, respectively — on Thursday endorsed legislation, along the lines of the Senate recommendation, to keep an enhanced FEMA within Homeland Security to ensure that it has all the resources of the larger department, such the Coast Guard and the operations center.

"FEMA must be equipped with the proper resources, communications and leadership to handle a worst-case scenario," King said.

But many House Republicans are divided on the issue. The House is planning to devote the last week in May to Katrina-related issues — and Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) is inclined to support the White House approach of strengthening FEMA without changing its operational status within Homeland Security, said one House aide who requested anonymity when discussing the leadership's strategy.

But Hastert also knows, said the aide, that members on the House side "are very sensitive to the need to be seen as doing something — not just putting out reports" and that the proposal to restore FEMA as a separate agency is vastly popular. "If it came to the floor today it would get 400 votes," the aide said.

In the Senate, many Democrats — including Frank R. Lautenberg of New Jersey and Daniel K. Akaka of Hawaii, who were on the panel that issued the report Thursday — also want FEMA to stand alone, disagreeing with the Collins-Lieberman approach of taking it apart and putting it back together within Homeland Security.

"Unless FEMA has a direct line to the president, the people of Hawaii and the nation are at risk," Akaka said in a statement. "FEMA must be restored as an independent agency."

And in the White House, Bush is still trying to recapture his credibility, which crumbled during the disaster. Lieberman singled out the president for being "surprisingly detached" until two days after Katrina hit, when the White House began to marshal the full resources of the federal government.

DOJ_NMG_0027375

"President Bush won our admiration and gratitude for the way he took charge in responding to the attacks against America of Sept. 11," said Lieberman. "In the case of Hurricane Katrina, he failed to provide that same presidential leadership when it was needed, and America suffered."

During his visit to the Gulf Coast on Thursday, Bush put on gloves and a carpenter's apron in New Orleans' devastated 9th Ward and grabbed a hammer to pound a few nails for a Habitat for Humanity project to build 280 housing units.

"What we need to do is take recommendations and make sure, as hurricane season approaches, that FEMA and all branches are ready to respond," he told Brian Williams of "NBC Nightly News." "I know my job is to work with relevant agencies and get them ready."

The Senate committee plans to issue its full 800-page report, "Hurricane Katrina: A Nation Still Unprepared," on Tuesday.

Delayed Katrina Response "was A Failure By Leaders" (FT)

By Edward Alden

Financial Times, April 28, 2006

The poor response to Hurricane Katrina was "a failure of leadership at all levels of government" that requires an overhaul of the country's disaster response capabilities, the Senate committee investigating the disaster said on Thursday.

The Senate homeland security committee, whose leaders were instrumental in the creation of the Department of Homeland Security following the September 11 terrorist attacks, called for the dismantling of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the disaster response agency created in 1979, which was folded into the new DHS in 2003.

"FEMA is discredited, demoralised and dysfunctional," said Susan Collins, the Maine Republican who led the investigation. "It is beyond repair."

Katrina, which struck New Orleans and the Mississippi gulf coast last August, was the most destructive natural disaster in US history, leaving 1,500 people dead and stranding tens of thousands. The belated federal response undermined President George W. Bush's reputation as a strong leader in a crisis, starting a slide in his popularity.

The committee's report could trigger another effort to overhaul the homeland security department, which has been struggling to integrate 22 different agencies and 185,000 employees. The committee acknowledged that the department, created largely owing to pressure from the Senate after similar recriminations following the terrorist attacks, had failed in its first real test.

The report found fault in the response by local, state and federal governments, and said the country should have been far better prepared for the disaster.

But the committee laid particular blame on Michael Brown, the former FEMA director who has said he was a made a scapegoat for the government's inadequacies. Mr Bush's praise of Mr Brown in the days after the hurricane – the president told him "you're doing a heck of a job, Brownie" during a trip to the region – became a symbol of cronyism over competence that has dogged Mr Bush since.

Ms Collins accused Mr Brown of "blatant insubordination" during the crisis, and the committee's report said he was "unqualified and counterproductive".

"It was clear that he was disengaged from the onset of Katrina. He failed to communicate absolutely vital information about the condition of the levees in New Orleans," she said.

The report calls for a new National Preparedness and Response Authority that would be a new independent agency within the DHS. Its head would directly advise the president on emergency management, much like the chairman of the joint chiefs of staff directly advises the president on military issues.

The White House response to the report was muted. "As we're headed to this hurricane season, now is not really the time to really look at moving organisational boxes," said Fran Townsend, homeland security adviser to Mr Bush.

The report is only mildly critical of Mr Bush. It says that while his initial response was "halting and inadequate, in part due to poor situational awareness", ultimately he "brought the full resources of the federal government to bear".

Fixing FEMA (USAT)

By James Lee Witt

USA Today (editorial), April 28, 2006

USA TODAY's editorial "New hurricane season looms, with FEMA still in shambles" effectively shined a light on the problems we still face as a nation with the continuing upset at the Federal Emergency Management Agency (April 17).

Even with the release of the Senate's report on Hurricane Katrina, the American public is not being well served by its government with the recommendations. It is time for Congress and the administration to do what is right and pull FEMA out of the Department of Homeland Security — as Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., and other lawmakers suggest. FEMA and DHS should each stand alone. One agency can't effectively serve two disparate functions.

DOJ_NMG_0027376

Though it's true that both agencies respond to catastrophes in a similar manner, their approaches are intrinsically different, especially before a natural or man-made disaster.

FEMA's job is to provide leadership and support to reduce the loss of life and property through a comprehensive, risk-based, all-hazards program of mitigation, preparedness, response and recovery. In the 1990s, FEMA was an effective, highly respected, stand-alone agency with its director serving on the presidential Cabinet.

DHS' job includes dealing with national security, border patrol, interior enforcement and intelligence sharing. These aspects absorb the majority of DHS' focus — and funding. In years to come, do we want the department to be diverted from its mission of protecting the nation from terrorism from June 1 to Nov. 30, when we are in the middle of hurricane season?

While the Senate recommendations do acknowledge that FEMA must be mended, we don't have the luxury of trying another experimental restructuring of the department. We arrived at this crisis as a result of FEMA losing its position as an independent agency. The first key to fixing FEMA is for Congress to return it to its pre-2001 incarnation. When a successful structure once existed, it makes sense to return to the system that worked.

Let's give FEMA Director David Paulison an independent agency, a system and the support he needs to be a success. And let's give our citizens the confidence that they're being well served.

James Lee Witt
Former director of FEMA, 1993-2001
Washington

The Crony Fairy (NYT)

By Paul Krugman
New York Times, April 28, 2006

The U.S. government is being stalked by an invisible bandit, the Crony Fairy, who visits key agencies by dead of night, snatches away qualified people and replaces them with unqualified political appointees. There's no way to catch or stop the Crony Fairy, so our only hope is to change the agencies' names. That way she might get confused, and leave our government able to function.

That, at least, is how I interpret the report on responses to Hurricane Katrina that was just released by the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs.

The report points out that the Federal Emergency Management Agency "had been operating at a more than 15 percent staff-vacancy rate for over a year before Katrina struck" — that means many of the people who knew what they were doing had left. And it adds that "FEMA's senior political appointees ... had little or no prior relevant emergency-management experience."

But the report says nothing about what caused the qualified people to leave and who appointed unqualified people to take their place. There's no hint that, say, President Bush might have had any role. So those political appointees must have been installed by the Crony Fairy.

Rather than trying to fix FEMA, the report calls for replacing it with a new organization, the National Preparedness and Response Agency. As far as I can tell, the new agency would have exactly the same responsibilities as FEMA. But "senior N.P.R.A. officials would be selected from the ranks of professionals with experience in crisis management." I guess it's impossible to select qualified people to run FEMA; if you try, the Crony Fairy will spirit them away and replace them with Michael Brown. But she might not know her way to N.P.R.A.

O.K., enough sarcasm. Let's talk about the history of FEMA.

In the early 1990's, FEMA's reputation was as bad as it is today. It was a dumping ground for political cronies, headed by a man whose only apparent qualification for the job was that he was a close friend of the first President Bush's chief of staff. FEMA's response to Hurricane Andrew in 1992 perfectly foreshadowed Katrina: the agency took three days to arrive on the scene, and when it did, it proved utterly incompetent.

Many people thought that FEMA was a lost cause. But Bill Clinton proved them wrong. He appointed qualified people to lead the agency and gave them leeway to hire other qualified people, and within a year FEMA's morale and performance had soared. For the rest of the Clinton years, FEMA was among the most highly regarded agencies in the federal government.

What happened to that reputation? The answer, of course, is that the second President Bush returned to his father's practices. Once again, FEMA became a dumping ground for cronies, and many of the good people who had come in during the Clinton years left. It took only a few years to transform one of the best agencies in the U.S. government into what Senator Susan Collins calls "a shambles and beyond repair."

In other words, the Crony Fairy is named George W. Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0027377

So what's the point of creating a new agency to replace FEMA? The history of FEMA and other agencies during the Clinton years shows that a president who is serious about governing can rebuild effective government without renaming the boxes on the organizational chart.

On the other hand, the history of the Bush administration, from the botched reconstruction of Iraq to the botched start-up of the prescription drug program, shows that a president who isn't serious about governing, who prizes loyalty and personal connections over competence, can quickly reduce the government of the world's most powerful nation to third-world levels of ineffectiveness.

And bear in mind that Mr. Bush's pattern of cronyism didn't change after Katrina. For example, he appointed Julie Myers, the inexperienced niece of Gen. Richard Myers, to head Immigration and Customs Enforcement — an agency that, like FEMA, is supposed to protect us against terrorism as well as other threats. Even at the C.I.A., the administration seems more interested in purging Democrats than in improving the quality of intelligence.

So let's skip the name change for FEMA, O.K.? The United States will regain effective government if and when it gets a president who cares more about serving the nation than about rewarding his friends and scoring political points. That's at least a thousand days away. Meanwhile, don't count on FEMA, or on any other government agency, to do its job.

Bush Set To Approve Takeover Of 9 Military Plants By Dubai (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 27 — President Bush is expected on Friday to announce his approval of a deal under which a Dubai-owned company would take control of nine plants in the United States that manufacture parts for American military vehicles and aircraft, say two administration officials familiar with the terms of the deal.

The officials, who were granted anonymity so they could speak freely about something the president had not yet announced, said that the final details had not yet been set and that Mr. Bush might put conditions on the transaction to keep military technology in the United States.

But his action is almost certain to attract scrutiny in Congress, because of the political furor that erupted over the administration's approval of a deal earlier this spring that would have given another Dubai-owned company, Dubai Ports World, leases to operate several American port terminals through its acquisition of a British company, the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company.

Dubai Ports agreed to drop the port deal after it became clear that Republicans were abandoning Mr. Bush and opposing the takeover.

In this case, the plants in question are owned by Doncasters Group Ltd., a British company that is being purchased for $1.2 billion from the Royal Bank of Scotland Group by Dubai International Capital, which is owned by the United Arab Emirate government.

Because the plants make turbine blades for tanks and aircraft, the deal was reviewed by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, which sent it on to Mr. Bush himself for a decision, a step used only when the potential security risks or political considerations are particularly acute.

Administration officials alerted Congress that the deal would go through the committee's review process in an effort to head off the kind of public debate that surrounded the ports deal.

Opponents of the ports transactions argued that the terrorists involved in the Sept. 11 attacks had filtered money through the United Arab Emirates, where Dubai is the major shipping center. Mr. Bush argued that blocking the deal would have sent the wrong message to a friendly Arab state. His support, however, was not enough to quell the political furor.

One official who was briefed on the Doncasters transaction said there would be provisions in the agreement protecting American military secrets. But it was unclear whether that would satisfy Congressional objections. With nine Doncasters plants in Georgia and Connecticut making parts for American military contractors, the prospect of a takeover by the Dubai company has already caused nervousness among some lawmakers.

Representative John Barrow, Democrat of Georgia, likened the Doncasters deal to "outsourcing" part of the nation's industrial-military complex.

But Representative Peter T. King, Republican of New York, the chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security and one of the foremost critics of the ports deal, said on Thursday that he would not necessarily have a problem this time around, in large part because the White House had given the deal a thorough review.

"It's a significant improvement over what happened before," Mr. King said. "It's been much more thorough, much more detailed."

DOJ_NMG_0027378

A senior Republican Congressional aide who was granted anonymity because he was not authorized to talk about the matter, said he did not believe the president's approval of the deal would cause quite the same stir as the ports deal.

GOP Urges $100 Rebate To Ease Pain At The Pump (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

Republican leaders yesterday proposed giving drivers a $100 tax rebate in the face of record-high gas prices, one element of a broad plan that includes oil exploration in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Republicans promised swift tax relief and tax incentives to promote the use of hybrid cars at a press conference held hours after Exxon Mobil posted profit figures of $8.4 billion for the first quarter of 2006 -- a record for any company in the first three months of the year and a 7 percent increase over last year's first-quarter profits, which also were a record.

"We are going to be able to say to the hard-hit users of automobiles in our country that we are going to ease their burden ... by giving them $100 rebate to help offset the very steep gas prices," said Sen. Pete V. Domenici, New Mexico Republican and chairman of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee.

Meanwhile yesterday, President Bush called for Congress to give him the power to require tighter fuel-efficiency standards for passenger cars, a call echoed by Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta.

"I encourage them to give me that authority," Mr. Bush said in a trip to Mississippi. "It's authority that I use for light trucks. And I intend to use it wisely if Congress would give me that authority."

In a letter to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Mr. Mineta formally asked for legislation that would allow the Corporate Average Fuel Economy standard for cars, now set at 27.5 miles per gallon for each manufacturer, to be raised through an administrative process.

Democrats, who mostly oppose drilling in the Arctic, quickly dismissed the Republican congressional package as the "same old, same old," and said pump prices topping $3 per gallon will be the last straw and cost Republicans their congressional majority.

The Republicans were responding to mounting political pressure from voters who are spending an average of $44 each time they fill a 15-gallon tank.

"What the American consumer is saying is: 'filling up your gas tank shouldn't empty your wallet,' " said Sen. John Thune, South Dakota Republican.

The national average price of a gallon of gas was $2.93 yesterday and hit as high as $3.16 in Manhattan, according to AAA.

"High gas prices are going to be the final nail in the GOP coffin this election year," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer of New York, who heads the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

"Every time drivers fill their cars up, they get a stark reminder how this Republican Congress takes a 'see no evil, hear no evil' approach to the oil industry as gas prices set new records," Mr. Schumer said. "It's time for the American consumer to have a Congress that works hand in hand with them and not with the oil executives."

Much of yesterday was consumed with dueling press conferences at which each party blamed the other for pump prices.

Republicans said Democrats have long obstructed an obvious solution -- exploring for oil in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR) in Alaska.

"I cannot understand what coherent political philosophy cuts its own country off from oil," said Sen. Jim Talent, Missouri Republican. "It is time to open up the Arctic."

Sen. Lisa Murkowski, Alaska Republican, said exploring ANWR is the country's best opportunity for a long-term source of oil.

"There is nothing unpredictable about a supply of oil on the north coastal plain that could potentially supply a million barrels of oil per day for 30 years," she said.

Last year, ANWR exploration was stripped from a defense spending bill because of a lack of support. President Clinton vetoed ANWR in his first term, and most Democrats have long opposed it.

Mr. Schumer said that if Democrats win back Congress, they will cut the country's dependence on foreign oil in half by 2020 and start a "massive" project to develop alternative energy sources.

He also criticized the energy bill passed last year as "helping big oil" and noted that gas prices were $2.22 per gallon when it was signed in June.

"That energy bill was corporate welfare in its worst example," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0027379

Mr. Emanuel said the energy industry spent $86 million to lobby for the energy bill, which included $14.5 billion in subsidies for oil companies.

The Democrats also dismissed the ANWR element of the Republican plan, saying the majority party was "playing politics."

"They've offered you status quo policies that do not change the course of how we achieve energy independence," Mr. Emanuel said.

Other notable elements in the eight-point Republican plan are the inclusion of nearly $3 billion to research biofuels and ways to make better-performing hybrid cars, an idea first suggested by Mr. Bush. The plan also would give administration officials the authority to prosecute price gougers.

Mr. Frist said he wants the whole plan attached to the supplemental spending bill for a quick vote.

Republicans Promise To Ease Petrol Price Burden (FT)

By Holly Yeager And Edward Alden

Financial Times, April 28, 2006

Republican leaders in Congress on Thursday sought to respond to growing national anger over the rising price of petrol, promising a series of measures they hope will bring down prices and prevent the situation from causing further political damage.

“Americans are unfairly being asked to empty their wallets at the gas pump,” said Bill Frist, majority leader in the Senate, who on Thursday led a group of Republicans in offering a package of eight proposals, including a $100 (€80.46, £56) “gas tax holiday rebate cheque”, intended to ease the burden higher fuel costs have imposed on consumers.

Mr Frist acknowledged that the measures would have a limited impact, but with the Republicans trailing badly in the polls, Congress and the White House are under pressure to respond.

Democrats, who have been campaigning on the price issue in congressional races that are starting to heat up in advance of the November mid-term elections, immediately denounced the plan as a sop to “Big Oil”, saying it would do nothing to conserve energy or limit the record profits being earned by the oil companies.

Both parties have scrambled to offer legislative fixes to the high prices, but those backed by Mr Frist, and another set backed by Republican leaders in the House of Representatives, are the most likely to move forward.

Mr Frist’s package would repeal some tax incentives for oil companies, while expanding others to promote the use of hybrid vehicles and increase refinery capacity. It would also urge the Bush administration to suspend deposits into the Strategic Petroleum Reserve for six months, to increase the supply available to consumers. President George W. Bush said this week he would temporarily halt the deposits.

House and Senate leaders both returned to a long-running debate over the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR), arguing that opening the area to oil exploration was critical to reducing US dependence on foreign oil.

“We haven’t done what we need to do in this country to increase our supply,” said Lisa Murkowski, Republican senator from Alaska.

Democrats – and some moderate Republicans – have traditionally opposed the proposal on environmental grounds, and were able to block it again last year. But in the current climate, there are signs that both parties may be ready to think about energy demands in new ways.

Pete Domenici, chairman of the Senate energy committee, said he would support a proposal from Democrats to suspend the 18.4-cents-a-gallon federal tax on gasoline for 60 days, if Democrats supported the move to open ANWR. The fees collected from oil companies who explore there could be used to offset the loss in tax revenues, he said.

Bush To Seek Overhaul Of Cars' Fuel-Economy Levels (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka, Russell Gold And Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

Responding to public anger over gasoline prices, the White House and Senate Republican leaders backed new measures to shift the burden to car makers and oil companies.

Both President Bush and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist yesterday urged Congress to pave the way for higher passenger-car fuel-economy standards. White House spokesman Scott McClellan said a rise would "save jobs, save lives and save fuel." Mr. Bush said during a visit to a Mississippi gasoline station that he would ask Congress for clearer authority to raise the levels, and Mr. Frist, as part of a new energy bill, offered to give it. Detroit has long resisted higher economy standards -- but the administration said it would support higher levels only if it could restructure the overall program, which could wind up helping domestic auto makers.

DOJ_NMG_0027380

The Senate energy bill also proposes a tax-accounting change that oil companies said could cost them billions of dollars and curb tax incentives for oil exploration granted just last year. Some of that revenue would be turned over to consumers in the form of a $100 tax rebate, to be mailed by Aug. 30, on this year's federal income taxes.

The industry-bashing in recent days from normally pro-business, antiregulation Republicans in response to surging pump prices has been striking. But the Senate bill also includes some carrots for energy producers, including new tax incentives for increasing oil-refining capacity. And the plan would open up a supposedly oil-rich area along the coast of Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge for oil exploration, although similar attempts in the past have proved controversial and have been stripped out of bills.

"I think this is a bold bill that does everything possible to increase our supply and ease the burden on consumers," said Sen. Pete Domenici, (R., N.M.), chairman of the Senate Energy Committee.

Even if the bill passes the Senate, it's unclear how far it would get in the more conservative House.

The Senate bill reflects the intensifying election-year posturing against oil companies in many ways. It proposes a federal law that, for the first time, would define "price gouging," and allows the Federal Trade Commission and the Justice Department to prosecute companies and dealers found to have manipulated prices beyond market limits. The provision, modeled after state antigouging laws, would first require the president to issue an emergency proclamation claiming that "an abnormal market disruption" had occurred in a given area before federal cases could be brought.

One particularly contentious measure in the package would require companies to move away from so-called last-in, first-out accounting practices. The move, set for future tax years, would require oil companies, for example, to account for profits by assuming the oldest barrel in their inventory is the first one sold. It could expose billions of dollars more to federal taxes in times when prices are rapidly rising, as they have been in recent weeks.

"This would be extremely punitive," said Robert Slaughter, president of the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association. "It would have the same impact as a windfall-profits tax."

While the proposed accounting change is part of an energy bill and the rhetoric is focused on oil companies, it would, as proposed, affect all industries and sparked an outcry from other sectors, including retailers.

Since 1990, fuel-efficiency standards for passenger cars have been stuck at a fleet average of 27.5 miles per gallon, as auto makers have opposed any increases -- under the current formulas. But the administration yesterday said it would oppose simply increasing the Corporate Average Fuel Economy, or CAFE, standards that passenger cars must achieve. Rather, the administration wants to overhaul the program in its entirety, much as it did this year for light trucks.

"The administration would oppose any increase in passenger-car CAFE standards without corresponding reform," Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta said in a letter yesterday to Sen. Frist. "It is imperative that CAFE standards be set through an administrative process based on sound science and data."

GOP Offers Consumer Fuel-Relief Package (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

It includes a $100 rebate, but its Arctic drilling component will probably doom it. Democrats' proposals are expected to fare no better.

WASHINGTON — Fearing public ire over rising gasoline prices, Republicans on Thursday unveiled a series of proposals aimed at giving consumers some relief, including a $100 rebate.

Democrats derided the GOP plan, and its political chances appeared weak.

The Democrats said that although the package incorporated some ideas they already had introduced, it contained a provision that almost assuredly would torpedo its passage: opening the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas drilling, a measure that repeatedly has stalled in Congress.

"Joining a rebate for consumers with [the drilling proposal] is not, I believe, a sincere effort," said Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.).

Emotion over fuel costs ran high on Capitol Hill, illustrated by a five-hour filibuster staged by Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.). He refused to leave the Senate floor in an effort — ultimately unsuccessful — to press for a vote on forcing oil companies to pay more to the government for the right to drill for oil on public land. Some of that drilling is exempt from payments.

"Government subsidies may be needed when the price is low, when we have to simulate production," Wyden said. But such relief is uncalled for "at a time when prices are soaring to record-high levels."

By the end of the day, the two parties essentially played to a draw — neither the rebate idea nor Democratic proposals, which include a moratorium on federal gasoline taxes, appeared to have much chance of becoming law.

DOJ_NMG_0027381

But the theatrics made clear that each party wanted to demonstrate its sensitivity to rising prices — and wanted to direct public anger toward the opposing camp.

At an outdoor news conference with the Capitol dome as a backdrop, Republicans blamed the price surge on Democrats, who they said had blocked measures to increase oil production, such as drilling in the Arctic.

"Those who stand up and criticize … and suggest that somehow or another that the blame [for gasoline costs] is upon those of us who had been pushing for increased supply of energy in this country, I think they need to look in the mirror," said Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), chairman of a GOP task force that drew up the party's proposals. "Democrats are the ones who have simply blocked every attempt for us to build transmission networks — whether it's electric transmission networks, or whether it's oil and gas networks, or whether it's energy generating, or whether it's oil and gas production."

Democrats blamed the high prices on Republicans, who they accused of being too cozy with large oil companies and too eager to pass out tax breaks to them. They dismissed the rebate as a meaningless gesture, arguing it would wind up in oil company coffers because consumers would use it to buy gasoline.

"It is disappointing that neither skyrocketing gas prices nor obscene oil company profits can break the bond between Bush Republicans and Big Oil," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

The back-and-forth in Washington came as the world's largest publicly traded oil company, Exxon Mobil, reported first-quarter profits of $8.4 billion, up 7% from the first three months of 2005.

The increase fell short of Wall Street expectations. But the report accelerated the criticism of oil companies from politicians.

"Quarter after quarter, oil companies post unheard-of profits at the expense of farms, businesses and family budgets," said Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.).

"We need to figure out what's behind these prices and work together to put stronger consumer protections on the books."

The high gasoline prices — above $3 a gallon in some regions of the country — result from a confluence of forces that have constricted supply. Experts say few measures under discussion on Capitol Hill would have much effect.

"Unfortunately, there's nothing, really, that can be done that's going to affect energy prices or gasoline prices in the very short run," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke told lawmakers at a hearing Thursday.

But with elections coming in November, lawmakers appeared undeterred.

"There is no silver bullet," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). "There is nothing, nothing we can do that can compensate for the fact that today we're 60% dependent on foreign sources of oil. But we can put forth a bold agenda."

Under the Republican plan, a $100 rebate would be sent to taxpayers making less than $125,000 a year.

Stabenow has proposed a $500 rebate, which she said would cover the average cost of higher gas prices for most families.

The GOP package also called for:

· A summer suspension of the 18.4-cent-per-gallon federal retail gasoline tax, to be paid for by ending some oil industry tax breaks. Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.) previously proposed a 60-day gas-tax holiday.

· New authority for the Federal Trade Commission to investigate possible price gouging. Democrats accused Republicans of undermining their own proposal, however, by limiting the measure to retail pricing and excluding wholesale distributors from scrutiny.

· Increased incentives for the development and purchase of hybrid vehicles.

· New authority for the Department of Transportation to increase fuel efficiency standards for automobiles.

Many Republicans, including President Bush, previously had opposed raising those fuel efficiency requirements, known as CAFE standards. But on Thursday, Bush endorsed the idea.

At a gas station in Biloxi, Miss., Bush said he would "use it wisely if Congress would give me that authority."

Bush earlier this week announced steps that underscored his concern about gasoline prices, including a suspension of government oil purchases to refill the Strategic Petroleum Reserve. But, as with the various congressional proposals, experts said the White House moves would have little impact on the rising fuel costs.

During his mini-filibuster, Wyden said existing royalty-payment breaks for oil companies had cost the federal government at least $20 billion in lost revenue.

"Oil companies are supposed to pay royalties to the federal government when they extract oil from federal lands. But in order to stimulate production of oil in our country, the federal government, over the last decade, has been discounting these royalty fees," Wyden said. "So, on top of the oil companies' record profits, record tax breaks and record prices consumers are paying at the pump, there are now record amounts of royalty relief granted to the oil companies as well."

Wyden's position earned quick support from at least one Republican, Sen. Jon Kyl of Arizona. He offered to cosponsor Wyden's measure, which would suspend the subsidies whenever the price of oil topped $55 a barrel.

DOJ_NMG_0027382

Still, votes on this and other proposals could be stymied by Senate rules. They have been offered as amendments to an emergency spending bill for the military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan and for post-Hurricane Katrina relief efforts. Parliamentary procedures for the legislation may block action on the energy-related measures.

Times staff writer Elizabeth Douglass in Los Angeles contributed to this report.

G.O.P. Senators Hurry To Quell Furor Over Gas (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON, April 27 — Senate Republicans tried on Thursday to get the upper hand in the escalating political battle over high gasoline prices by proposing a $100 rebate for taxpayers and by suggesting that they might increase taxes on oil-industry profits.

The Republican proposal also called for opening the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil production, a provision sure to draw opposition from many Democrats and even some Republicans.

"The American consumer is the one that needs the break today, and we need to be taking steps to make sure that they aren't emptying their wallet every time they fill their tank," said Senator John Thune, Republican of South Dakota, as the leadership unveiled its legislative response to an issue quickly taking over the Congressional agenda.

The Republican plan includes a provision that could levy a significant tax on oil company profits, a provision that President Bush promised to veto when a version appeared in a Senate bill last year. The proposal came on a day when Exxon Mobil reported a 7 percent gain in its first-quarter earnings. [Page C3.]

Greeting surprised customers at a BP service station in Biloxi, Miss., on Thursday, Mr. Bush compared rising gasoline prices to a new tax. In brief remarks there, confronting an issue that is adding to his political woes, he endorsed one aspect of the Senate proposal by encouraging Congress to give him the same authority to set standards for gasoline mileage of cars as he has over light trucks, sport utility vehicles, pickups and minivans.

The president also promised to curb price gouging, increase refinery capacity and support alternative fuels.

"One of the things we've got to do is make these trucks run on ethanol and batteries that won't require gasoline," he said. "That's what the future is going to be."

Democrats quickly dismissed the new Republican approach as a backdoor effort to overcome deep-seated opposition to drilling in the Arctic refuge.

"Americans are struggling to pay the rising cost of gas," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, "and they are not interested in handouts to help oil companies make more money by letting them drill in wildlife refuges."

Democrats pressed their own ideas, including a proposal by Senator Robert Menendez, Democrat of New Jersey, for a 60-day suspension on the 18.4-cent-per-gallon federal tax on gasoline and 24-cent diesel tax.

"It is direct relief at the pump," Mr. Menendez said.

Some Republicans, including Mr. Thune, have also endorsed a suspension of those taxes.

Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon, tied up the Senate for almost five hours on Thursday in an effort to force a vote on his proposal to prohibit oil companies from escaping federal royalties for drilling on public lands when oil prices exceeded $55 per barrel. (Prices recently rose above $75 a barrel.) But Republicans blocked that effort.

"You cannot get a vote up or down in the United States Senate on a rip-off of taxpayer money," Mr. Wyden said.

The exchanges in the Senate and elsewhere on Capitol Hill illustrated both the political dangers and potential opportunities presented by the rise in gasoline prices and the accompanying consumer discomfort.

"This gas price issue is huge," said Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine.

Democrats say they believe that the public unhappiness will play into their efforts to regain control of the House and Senate this fall as they try to convince voters of the close ties between Republicans and oil companies and remind voters of industry-friendly legislation advocated by Republicans.

"High gas prices are going to be the final nail in the G.O.P.'s coffin this election year," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

But Republicans say they believe that their new proposal, which is promoted as an eight-point plan and which was announced at a news conference attended by several senators facing re-election this year, could strike a public chord, particularly with its promise of a $100 check to millions of taxpayers.

It is unclear when the Senate might move forward on the issue or how the Bush administration and the House, where Republicans and Democrats have their own ideas circulating, will respond.

But a chief aide to Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, said the midterm elections would be a catalyst for Congressional action.

DOJ_NMG_0027383

"The political will is there," said Eric Ueland, chief of staff to Mr. Frist. "The need is very real. And the urge to help constituents directly and quickly is omnipresent."

The price tag for the Republican package had not been calculated, but aides said it would cost less than $20 billion. The proposed rebate was patterned after a refund sent to taxpayers early in Mr. Bush's first term as a down payment on an initial set of tax cuts.

The $100 payment would not be tied to gasoline consumption but would be sent to taxpayers at the end of the summer, going to single-filing taxpayers with adjusted gross incomes below $145,950, and to couples earning less than $218,950. The Finance Committee estimated that at least 100 million taxpayers would qualify.

Republican authors of the plan said opening the Arctic refuge to drilling was essential because it could provide federal revenue to pay for the initiative as well as increase domestic oil production.

"We need to open up the reserve of oil and gas that we have in this country," said Senator Jim Talent of Missouri, one of the Republicans up for re-election. "With all due respect, I cannot understand what coherent political philosophy cuts its own country off from oil."

The Republican package would also ease environmental regulations and provide other incentives to add to oil refinery capacity, outlaw unjustifiable price increases and increase tax breaks for owners of hybrid vehicles.

In a proposal expected to draw significant opposition from the oil industry and perhaps the business community at large, the Republican plan would repeal a method of accounting for inventories, known as last in first out, or LIFO. The method, which is used in many industries, gives oil companies a chance to avoid some large capital gains taxes through its accounting of sales from inventory.

The Senate had previously considered a similar provision that would have prohibited major oil companies from using the LIFO method for one year. It was expected to raise about $5 billion, but it generated a storm of opposition from oil companies and Mr. Bush threatened to veto the bill unless lawmakers rejected it.

The new proposal would prevent all companies from using the LIFO method, not just oil companies, and the prohibition would be permanent, instead of limited to one year.

On the fuel-economy issue, federal transportation officials say they need new authority to set higher standards for cars. as they did for trucks last month. The Senate bill would give them that ability.

But any change in federal standards for mileage would be a long-term fix since automakers are required to have 18 months' notice of any change and creating the new rule would involve a process that would take months in itself.

At the White House, a spokeswoman said the administration would consider the Congressional proposals but would make no commitments.

"We are taking all options into account that seek to relieve what is certainly the burden of high gasoline prices on American consumers," said the spokeswoman, Dana Perino.

Ms. Perino said the president remained focused on solving the fundamental problem of supply and demand "so that we can end a vicious cycle."

Lawmakers were grappling for other ways to contend immediately with gasoline prices and oil industry profits. On Thursday, the Senate Judiciary Committee quickly passed legislation that would make it a violation of antitrust laws to manipulate oil supplies to drive up prices.

In the House, Republicans, voting largely along party lines, rejected a symbolic effort by Democrats to urge House tax negotiators to support the Senate on rolling back tax breaks for oil companies.

Republicans Sag In New Poll (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

Rising gas prices have intensified discontent with Washington and handed Congress a frightening midterm election backdrop: a deeply pessimistic electorate, despite a robust economy.

A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll underscores a striking gap between Americans' mood and the nation's economic performance. Fully 77% call themselves uneasy about the state of the economy rather than confident, even as data showed new-home sales and factory orders remain strong. Economists expect a similar message tomorrow when the government reports on first-quarter growth.

Public unease partly reflects fallout from the prolonged and unpopular Iraq war. But it also shows the impact of pump prices topping $3 a gallon in many places, passing Iraq to become the nation's highest-priority issue. The upshot: Two-thirds of Americans say the nation is "off on the wrong track," President Bush's approval rating has fallen to 36% and Congress fares even worse at 22% approval.

DOJ_NMG_0027384

"There's almost nothing that the public is satisfied with," says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who conducts the Journal/NBC poll with Republican counterpart Bill McInturff. "What they're telling you is, they want change on every front."

That is a worrisome sign for Republicans, who are seeking to defend their House and Senate majorities with little more than six months remaining before Election Day. Continuing a trend that has persisted for a year, Democrats lead -- beyond the poll's 3.1 percentage point margin of error -- in public preference for which party should control Congress. The survey of 1,005 adults was conducted April 21-24.

And in the run-up to November, Democrats also enjoy an edge in intensity; by 11 percentage points, their partisans are more likely to express high interest in the midterm campaigns. The biggest bright spot for Republicans is that Democrats have made no progress improving their national image, an indication that they aren't yet positioned to take advantage of their opportunity for far-reaching November gains.

Public unhappiness with government is strongly at odds with bullishness on Wall Street, as new data underscored the economy's current strength. The Commerce Department yesterday reported sales of new single-family homes rose 13.8% in March, the largest increase in 13 years.

Orders for big-ticket manufactured goods rose 6.1% in March, the largest increase in nearly a year. Indeed, that data fueled bond-market worries the economy is so strong that the Fed will be reluctant to stop lifting short-term interest rates after May, when the central bank is expected to bump rates up a notch.

Public unhappiness also represents a powerful source of frustration for Republicans, who want Mr. Bush and Congress to get more credit for the economy. Doing just that is a top priority of new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten and congressional Republican leaders, who are aiming to take a first step by accelerating House-Senate negotiations on tax-cut legislation that would extend the current 15% rates on capital gains and dividends.

Yet worries about gasoline prices, offshoring of jobs, rising health-care costs and precarious private pension plans are creating anxiety even among workers who do have jobs. Moreover, the fruits of the economy's recent strength aren't evenly shared: Workers at the bottom and the middle are benefiting less than those at the top.

Richard Curtin, who oversees the University of Michigan's consumer-confidence surveys, says the gap between views of the economy among those who make more than $50,000 and those who make less is wider than it has ever been in the university's polling. Especially for those with moderate incomes, says Mr. Hart, the Journal/NBC pollster, gas prices "are the real numbers that people are living with."

That helps explain why just 19% of Americans say the strong employment picture, rising stock prices and low inflation rate leave them feeling confident about the nation's economic health. Four times that many respondents said that gas prices, rising interest rates and the federal budget deficit have them feeling uneasy.

The poll also explains why oil companies suddenly find themselves in the cross hairs of political debates over potential price-gouging and even windfall-profits taxes. In the wake of record oil-industry profits, some 60% of Americans find oil companies responsible for rising gas prices -- far outpacing the proportion who blame oil-producing nations, President Bush or Congress.

Yet the toll on Mr. Bush is reflected in his 36% approval rating, the lowest he has ever received in the Journal/NBC survey, and the 35% positive mark on handling the economy. Amid continued violence in Iraq and a looming confrontation with Iran over its nuclear ambitions, Americans disapprove of Mr. Bush's handling of foreign policy by roughly 2 to 1.

Approval of the job Congress is doing has plummeted to 22%, from 33% just last month. That's worse than the marks a Democratic-controlled Congress received at a similar point in 1994, the year Newt Gingrich led Republicans back to power on Capitol Hill.

In particular, Americans who don't approve of Congress blame their sour mood on partisan contention and gridlock in Washington. Some 44% call themselves "tired of Republicans and Democrats fighting each other"; 36% say "nothing seems to get done" on important issues. A further 34% cite corruption among lawmakers. Among all Americans, a 39% plurality say the single most important thing for Congress to accomplish this year is curtailing budgetary "earmarks" benefiting only certain constituents.

Ranking just behind ending "earmarks" is congressional action on immigration overhaul, the top priority of 32%. By 61%-35%, Americans say illegal immigrants within the U.S. should be allowed to stay rather than be deported so long as they pay taxes and pass security checks. By 68%-28%, they express support for a potential Senate compromise that would allow for different treatment of those who have been in the U.S. at least five years, those here for two to five years, and those in the U.S. for less than two years.

Americans take dim views of both parties, giving Democrats a positive rating of just 33% and Republicans 35%. But they have different expectations for the minority and for the party that controls Congress and the White House. If no progress is made on key issues, the Journal/NBC poll shows, 51% would blame either Mr. Bush or congressional Republicans, compared with 16% who would blame congressional Democrats. One in four voters would blame all parties.

DOJ_NMG_0027385

Profits, Prices Spur Oil Outrage (WP)

By Steven Mufson And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

Exxon Mobil Corp. reported $8.4 billion in first-quarter profit yesterday, as members of Congress outraged over high gasoline prices hastened to propose measures that would boost taxes on oil firms, open new areas to drilling and provide rebates to taxpayers but would not necessarily alter prices at the pumps.

The earnings outstripped the oil giant's profit in the first quarter of last year. Given current oil market conditions, analysts said, that puts Exxon Mobil on track to break the $36 billion record profit it made last year.

Meanwhile, President Bush sought to show that he was responding to calls for action in the face of rising gasoline prices. While visiting a gasoline station in Biloxi, Miss., Bush renewed his call for Congress to give him the authority to "raise" mileage standards for all passenger cars. White House officials said later, however, that they didn't know when or how the president would use that authority.

Congress has the authority to approve changes in mileage standards for passenger cars, and the executive branch can set them for light trucks without approval from Congress. But neither Congress nor the administration has shown much interest in raising passenger car standards, which were set in the 1970s and haven't changed since 1985. In March, the Bush administration said it would raise average fuel economy standards by 1.9 miles a gallon for sport-utility vehicles, pickups and vans for models in 2008 through 2011, a long-awaited move that environmentalists said was too modest.

In Congress, anger over gasoline prices brought action in the Senate to a screeching halt yesterday, with Democrats interrupting debate over an emergency military spending bill to protest a key oil company subsidy. In a highly unusual move, Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) waged a solo filibuster on the Senate floor in an attempt to force a vote on a provision that would halt support for what Wyden said was about $35 billion for oil and gas companies. "This is the big one, folks, in terms of energy subsidies," Wyden said during the five-hour standoff. "This is the one where there is no logical case . . . when oil is $70 per barrel."

Various committees and individual lawmakers scrambled to offer relief to consumers, punish suppliers and promote favorite energy-related provisions, most of them offering little or no immediate relief at the gas station pumps.

Senate GOP leaders rolled out a fat package of energy measures, including a $100 rebate to most taxpayers, and reaffirmed authority for state and federal officials to fight price gouging. The proposal also would allow drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska; Democrats called the controversial idea a deal-killer for the rest of the package.

Democrats unveiled their own ideas, including various windfall-profit rebates, a temporary suspension of the federal gas tax and alternative energy investments.

For all the criticism from Congress, Exxon Mobil's earnings fell slightly short of analysts' expectations, and company shares fell 68 cents to close at $62.42 a share.

In an attempt to simultaneously impress investors and calm politicians, Exxon Mobil spokesman Ken Cohen stressed that compared with the year-earlier quarter, the company had increased its worldwide oil and gas production by 5 percent, boosted capital spending by 41 percent and paid worldwide taxes that amounted to a 46 percent rate.

But analysts, while impressed by the production numbers, noted that much of the increase in capital spending came from sharply rising costs for oil services and that the high tax rates were a result of high crude oil prices. In many countries, sliding-scale tax rates rise as prices do; Norway taxes some portion of output at rates as high as 70 percent, and Libya's effective tax rates can go as high as 90 percent, analysts said.

Exxon also said it spent $5 billion buying back its own shares, more than the $4.1 billion spent on exploration and production. The company said it expected to spend $6 billion repurchasing its own shares in each of the remaining quarters this year.

Wall Street analysts discounted the likelihood of congressional action against oil companies. "As someone in the industry for more than 25 years, I've seen it before," said Fadel Gheit, an oil company analyst at Oppenheimer & Co. "Penalizing oil companies does not lower prices at the pump. If we have a windfall profits tax, it will just create another moneybag for the government. It will not increase oil production by one barrel. It will not lower gasoline prices by one cent or alter our dependence on OPEC countries."

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke also cautioned Congress on the various proposals being floated. In response to a question at a hearing of the Joint Economic Committee, Bernanke said, "Unfortunately, after many years of not really doing as much as we should on the energy front, this situation has arisen. And I don't see any way to make a marked impact on it in the very short run."

DOJ_NMG_0027386

Bernanke said a windfall profits tax would reduce incentives for companies. "What we need to do," he said, "is think about whether there are actions we can take that over at least a number of years will put us on a more secure footing."

And he added, "I would like to let the market system work as much as possible to generate new supplies, both of oil but also of alternatives, and for the prices, painful as they may be, to help generate more conservation and alternative uses of energy on the demand side."

While many of the proposals in Congress are familiar, costly and unlikely to be enacted, bipartisan political pressure for action could result in tougher scrutiny and possible sanctions against the oil industry -- until recently one of the closest allies of the Bush administration and the Republican-led Congress

The Senate Finance Committee, for instance, requested federal income tax returns for the past five years from the 15 largest oil and gas companies, based on sales, in what could amount to a congressional audit. "We're seeing record profits and significant executive compensation in the oil and gas industry," said Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa). "I want to make sure the oil companies aren't taking a speed pass by the tax man."

The Senate Judiciary Committee unanimously voted to allow the Justice Department to prosecute countries that belong to the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries for price fixing in violation of U.S. antitrust laws. "What you have today is an oligopoly, effectively, and I think it's a disaster for the American people," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), a member of the panel.

Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said GOP leaders had assured him they were eager to push the legislation to the floor, pointing out the political pressure -- including a series of Democratic news conferences held in recent days at Capitol area gas stations.

ExxonMobil's Quarterly Profit: $8.4 Billion (USAT)

By James R. Healey And Matt Krantz

USA Today, April 28, 2006

ExxonMobil, the biggest publicly traded oil company, said Thursday its first-quarter profit jumped 6.9% from a year ago, to $8.4 billion.

That was a first-quarter record for Exxon, and the fourth-best first quarter ever reported by a company in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index. While short of Wall Street forecasts, it triggered fresh outrage elsewhere as ExxonMobil became the lightning rod for fury over high gasoline prices.

“While ExxonMobil executives are popping champagne and celebrating their record profits, American families are popping antacids under the strain of soaring gas prices,” said Sen. Robert Menendez, D-N.J., in a remark typical of the howls. Other reaction:

·The Bush administration, criticized by environmentalists for not raising fuel-economy standards, asked Congress for authority to boost mileage requirements in cars for the first time since the mid-1980s. Even on a fast track, it would be two years from Congress' go-ahead before cars covered by new standards hit showrooms.

·Senate Republicans proposed a measure that would give taxpayers $100 checks to offset high fuel prices and suspend the 18.4-cent-per-gallon fuel tax until Sept. 30.

Checks would go to individuals with taxable income of up to $125,000 and couples with taxable income up to $150,000.

Calling $100 a “token gesture,” Sen. Debbie Stabenow, D-Mich., proposed $500, which she said is how much more an average family will spend on energy this year.

·Consumer advocates sharpened their rhetoric. Americans must “choose between filling their tanks and paying their bills, and ExxonMobil is laughing all the way to the bank,” said Anna Aurilio of the U.S. Public Interest Research Group, reflecting the general tone.

The average price of gasoline in the USA is $2.927 per gallon, up 0.6 cents overnight and 69.8 cents more than a year ago, travel club AAA reported Thursday. The price has been edging closer to the peak $3.057 reported by AAA Sept. 5 after hurricane damage to energy operations in the Gulf of Mexico.

Most of Exxon's first-quarter earnings were from oil and natural gas, not from selling gasoline.

And Exxon's profit margins are below-average compared with others that have triggered no outcry. Exxon's first-quarter profit margin was 9.4%, meaning it kept 9.4 cents of every $1 in revenue. Microsoft kept 27.3 cents of every $1 in revenue in its most recent quarter; General Electric, 11.4 cents and McDonald's, 12.3 cents. In fact, Exxon is below the 11-cent average of Standard & Poor's 500 companies, says analyst Howard Silverblatt.

DOJ_NMG_0027387

The furor is likely to continue. Reuters Estimates predicts ExxonMobil's operating profit, which excludes one-time items, will rise 2.9% this year to a record $35 billion.

Market Fuel Prices Drop (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

Oil and gasoline prices took another tumble in New York trading yesterday on signs of increasing supplies and slackening demand in the United States and China, adding to an 18-cent drop in wholesale gas prices that likely will produce relief at the pump in the days ahead.

Since peaking above $75 last week, the price of premium crude oil has fallen to just under $71 yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange, while gas for delivery in May has plummeted to $2.07 a gallon after touching a high of $2.25.

Pump prices have flattened out at $2.92 nationwide for regular unleaded, 50 percent higher than they were in February but not yet reflecting the declines in the futures and wholesale markets.

The biggest factors causing price drops have been signs that demand for gas is running about 1 percentage point behind last year's level -- most likely in response to the rapid run-up in pump prices since last month -- even as refineries are racing to take advantage of high prices and increase scarce supplies of summer fuels.

"At the end of the day, the best cure for high prices is high prices," said David Hackett, president of Stillwater Associates LLC, an energy-consulting company, noting that consumers are angry about high prices and apparently are beginning to balk at paying them.

U.S. Energy Department figures show that demand for fuel at gas stations over the past month was running 44,000 barrels below last year's levels, while supplies rose by 231,000 barrels. Refineries gearing up for the summer driving season operated at 88.2 percent of capacity last week, up 2 percent from the week before.

Also easing pressure on fuel prices yesterday was a move by China to raise interest rates to slow down its torrid 10 percent annual growth rate. China is the second-largest consumer of oil behind the U.S.

The U.S. Federal Reserve also has been raising interest rates to cool demand and head off a bout of inflation that it fears could be sparked by high energy prices. Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke testified yesterday that high gas prices pose "risks" for economic growth as well as inflation. When gas prices topped $3 last fall, they helped to deflate U.S. economic growth to a sluggish rate of 1.6 percent.

Mr. Bernanke said he expects this spring's jump in gas prices to shave "a few tenths" of a percent off economic growth in the spring quarter but not endanger the economy overall. He says he sees little respite from chronically high energy prices in the next few years, as supplies are barely growing fast enough to keep up with demand for fuel worldwide.

Mr. Bernanke said a so-called "windfall profit tax" on oil companies gaining popularity on Capitol Hill would not result in an increase in supplies.

"Unfortunately nothing can be done to affect oil or gasoline prices in the short term," he said. Conservation and initiatives to find alternative sources of energy were needed to put downward pressure on oil and gas prices in the long run, he said.

While this week has seen a softening of fuel prices, other events lie ahead that could reverse the declining trend and drive oil and gas prices back up to record levels -- including the nuclear standoff with Iran, the upcoming hurricane season and the peak summer driving season between Memorial Day and Labor Day.

Most economists agree with Mr. Bernanke that fuel markets for the most part have been responding to thin supplies and robust demand, notwithstanding accusations in Washington that oil companies are engaging in conspiracies, profiteering and price gouging.

Walter Lukken, a member of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, which regulates the energy futures markets, testified before Congress yesterday that the commission thinks the markets "accurately reflect" tight world energy supplies and a pickup in growth and demand this year.

"The evidence we have seen indicates that futures markets for crude oil and unleaded gasoline and other energy products have been properly performing," he told the House Agriculture Committee.

Blaming the markets for high prices is "like blaming a thermometer when it's hot outside," he said. The commission is devoting nearly three-quarters of its surveillance resources to energy issues and has a dozen open investigations involving energy, he said.

Commission investigations have led to charges against 27 companies and 23 persons, as well as civil penalties totaling nearly $300 million since December 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0027388

"We have seen no evidence to date to suggest that the recent price rises in gasoline futures being traded on our markets are attributable to" rule breaking, said James Newsome, a former commission chairman and current chief executive officer of the New York Mercantile Exchange.

A 'Commitment' Goes Only So Far (WP)

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

The Republican House leadership, hopping aboard the new anti-oil-addiction campaign, staged a fine media event yesterday at a BP gas station at Ninth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue SE that featured a hydrogen-powered car.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (Ill.), along with other top House Republicans, was photographed in and around the snappy blue General Motors HydroGen 3 van.

The event followed one by Senate Democrats on Wednesday, who rode in their gas guzzlers to an Exxon station a block from their offices to blame Republicans for high fuel prices.

Hastert, who appeared to have walked to the station, left in the very fuel-efficient vehicle, apparently headed for his office. But he went only a block or so before he got out and stepped into his pre-positioned gas-guzzling armored SUV to take him back to his office. Alert photographers, suspecting a ploy, had followed the speaker and captured the bait-and-switch.

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean , showing why he deserves a raise, explained that Hastert "wanted to ride the van" -- really he did -- "to show his commitment to new energy-efficient vehicles."

The problem, Bonjean said, was that Hastert's security detail wouldn't have it. Way too dangerous. Perhaps the security folks thought the vehicle was related to the ill-fated Hindenburg?

In any event, "the security officials demanded that he ride in the much more secure armored SUV," Bonjean said.

Okay. But next time they gin up one of these events, could he at least do more than just drive around the corner?Good News Comes in Waves

Let's face it, the media continue to emphasize the bad news out of Iraq and absolutely refuse to highlight the important good news coming out of there of late.

Fortunately, the Republican National Committee puts out a weekly "Iraq Facts" page on its Web site that focuses on all the good news out of Iraq. This week's "Other Good News" section tells us: "Baghdad is to get its first water park and wave machine -- thanks to a Scottish company" called Murphy's Waves.

The RNC cites a report on the Web site of Scotland's Glasgow Daily Record a couple of weeks ago, quoting Murphy's international sales manager, Jim Stuart , who says he's "delighted to be involved in this project and it shows that rebuilding in Iraq really is happening."

The wave-machine pool project has been in the works for a couple of years, he said, when someone from a company called Baghdad Pools called and said he wanted to build a "fun pool for the city."

What better way to cope with the coming brutally hot summer in Baghdad with temps hitting 120 degrees? In the prewar days you might have had air conditioning, but electricity is still not up to prewar levels -- even to WWII levels.

So why not ride the great waves?Are You Expendable?

The State Department, anxious to fill openings in Iraq, recently sent out a cable detailing job opportunities for spouses and other family members in Baghdad. Some -- office managers, housing coordinators, cashiers and such -- appear fairly safe, since they are in the Green Zone.

But then there is "Expendable Supply Manager."

The job doesn't appear to pay much, and it sounds as though they aren't going to care enough to provide any security for you.

Congress Gone Wild (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

Let's hope the folks who make those cable-TV videos of loopy college kids vamping on spring break are headed for Capitol Hill. The Members aren't yet taking their shirts off in response to higher gasoline taxes, but give them time. They're certainly pulling enough other stunts to laugh at.

Take the Senate Republican proposal for a $100 rebate, unveiled yesterday but destined for the pandering hall of fame. "As we see skyrocketing gas prices around the country, it is time for this Congress to act," declared South Dakota's John Thune on the Senate floor. And so the Members shall, bravely marching off to battle higher prices by writing every taxpayer (below a certain income level) a one-time check worth about two tanks of gas if you're driving an SUV.

The gesture calls to mind other great moments in feckless legislating, such as Jimmy Carter's "$50 rebate," offered in 1977 to spur the economy. As one wag noted at the time, this was about as useful as scattering money from airplanes. Adjusting for inflation, the GOP's $100 version is worth a lot less now than $50 in 1977 -- and Republicans should expect it to do about as much for their political standing as it did for Jimmy Carter's.

DOJ_NMG_0027389

But wait, there's more. Mr. Thune also disclosed that Congress will attempt to waive the 18.4-cent-a-gallon federal gasoline tax -- but only through September 30, when presumably the summer driving and political panic seasons will have passed. Lest you think any of this will add to the deficit, the GOP will pay for it by suspending "a number of tax credits and royalty waivers received by oil corporations."

Now, we don't think oil companies need tax incentives or subsidies to drill for oil at $70 a barrel, or for that matter at $25. What they need is the permission to drill where oil and gas can be found. And one reason for today's high prices is that Congress has systematically ruled out huge parcels of American land, on- and off-shore, for energy exploration. However, now that prices are high, Congress is reacting to the problem it helped cause by temporarily rescinding whatever paltry incentives it offered companies to explore for oil in the fewer places where they are allowed to drill.

As for suspending the gas tax, one way to reduce gas prices is by lowering the demand for gasoline, and the fastest way to do that is by letting the price system work. Liberals in particular want gas taxes to be high (to reduce carbon emissions, for example), except when gas prices are high. In other words, the goal of all of these temporary policy changes isn't really to change anyone's behavior in the long run. The point is merely to redistribute money from the oil companies to voters, er, consumers in an election year. We trust that the voters, being smarter than politicians, will treat all this with the snickering it deserves.

Oh, and let's not forget the contribution made yesterday by Senator Arlen Specter's Judiciary Committee. By bipartisan voice vote, the Committee created a new federal and state task force to investigate information-sharing among oil companies. As a grandstanding bonus, it would also allow lawsuits against OPEC for controlling output and fixing oil prices. Even the Members know that cars will run on nuclear power before suits against OPEC succeed in U.S. courts.

And the idea that oil companies are colluding to raise prices has been contradicted by countless Federal Trade Commission studies. Oil exploration is a capital-intensive business that requires huge economies of scale and long time horizons. From the time a potential drilling site is spotted to the day any oil gets to the pump can take a decade. Bigger companies can afford to take bigger risks. So busting up oil companies would almost certainly lead to less oil exploration and production, and thus higher oil and gas prices.

But forgive us for talking about actual substance. Like college kids on spring break, Congress is letting it all hang out in a political bender of a kind we haven't seen in years. This is what happens when a President is at 36% job approval, and there is no Beltway chaperone. And to think there are still six long months until Election Day.

Pander At The Pump (NYT)

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

The battle to see which political party can out-pander the other on the subject of gasoline prices is embarrassing. If American consumers are having sticker shock at the pumps, it's because of a series of policy failures that stretch back decades. The last thing the country needs now is another irresponsible quick fix.

Senate Republicans have proposed to assuage the pain of high gas prices by sending many taxpayers $100 apiece — enough for about two tanks of gas. Meanwhile, a cadre of Senate Democrats is carrying on about a temporary suspension of the federal gas tax, which is 18.4 cents per gallon, the same level it was in 1993. At best, the suspension would temporarily reduce prices a fraction, causing car owners to drive a little more. That rise in demand would send prices back up again.

Lawmakers from both houses and parties are calling for investigations into any price gouging or other rip-offs by oil companies and filling stations. It's perfectly all right to look into these things, but no one imagines that the result will be much more than a series of photo-ops.

Suspending environmental safeguards — as President Bush proposed in his energy speech earlier this week — might send prices down a bit, at the price of dirtier air. It's appalling that a generation after the first oil shock, in 1973, politicians are still reacting with such hysteria.

The main problem is not environmental regulations or even rapacious oil companies. It certainly isn't the fact that the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge has been kept off limits for drilling. Americans' outsized demand for oil and gasoline pushes up prices, and now that the economies of huge countries like China and India have taken off, there will continue to be more competition for the world's available oil. There are policy solutions for the problem of excess demand, chief among them higher fuel economy standards. But more than five years into the Bush administration, there has been only a minuscule increase in mileage standards for S.U.V.'s and no increase for cars.

The oil companies' mind-boggling profits have produced calls for a windfall profits tax. It would not be too difficult to set up a system that would capture a percentage of the companies' extraordinary profits, and the money could be used for long-term solutions, like research into alternate fuels and mass transit. That would be fair. Oil companies are indeed profiting from events that have little to do with their efforts. If some of those profits were taxed and flowed into the public treasury, the money could go toward public purposes.

DOJ_NMG_0027390

But critics who say such a tax discourages investment in exploration and drilling have a point. Though they invariably overstate their case, their opposition would make a windfall tax a heavy lift politically, thereby draining effort from other, more direct, solutions, like better mileage standards and ultimately — the hardest sell of all — a bolstered federal gas tax to encourage conservation.

It's important during this debate not to discount the genuine pain being felt by the poor and middle-class families who must drive long distances just to get to work and school. But their problem is more than gasoline prices. It's their vulnerability to the price increases, which results from stagnating wages and a lack of savings. If the Bush administration had devoted as much political capital in the past five years to wage and job growth initiatives as it has to cutting taxes for the wealthy, these struggling families would be better able to weather higher prices at the pump.

Congress's frantic gestures this week are, at bottom, an attempt to divert attention from its past failures to act, and its resulting inability to shield Americans from the burden of high prices at the pump. But the pain of high gas prices will only get worse unless Congress changes its priorities, now.

Gas Pump Geopolitics (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

In recent days critics have accused President Bush and his new chief of staff of doing nothing more than shuffling around the deck chairs on the Titanic, as they shift, hire and fire senior White House officials while the president's popularity continues to plummet. Personally, I think that is a totally unfair charge — unfair to the captain of the Titanic.

After all, he knew where he was going. His lookouts just couldn't see the iceberg spar lurking beneath the surface in their path until it was too late. This administration, and its captain, have been staring the iceberg right in the face for years — it's called dependence on foreign crude oil. It has been totally visible, for miles and miles. And yet the Bush team has just kept sailing right into it, refusing to ask the American people to do anything hard to put America on a different energy course.

What is this iceberg staring us in the face? It is the fact that energy, broadly defined, has become the most important geostrategic and geoeconomic challenge of our time — much as the Soviet Union was during the cold war — for four reasons:

First, we are financing both sides in the war on terrorism: financing the U.S. military with our tax dollars, and Islamist radicals and states with our energy purchases.

Second, continued dependence on fossil fuels is going to bring on climate change so much faster in an age when millions of new consumers in India and China are driving cars and buying homes. And that's why renewable fuels and energy-efficient cars, buildings and appliances are going to be the biggest growth industry of the 21st century. The tougher the energy-efficiency standards we impose on our own companies, the more likely it is that they will dominate this new industry.

Third, because of the steady climb in oil prices, the seemingly unstoppable wave of free markets and free peoples that we thought was unleashed by the fall of the Berlin Wall is now being stymied by a counterwave of petro-authoritarian states — like Iran, Venezuela, Russia, Nigeria and Sudan — which now have more petro-dollars than ever to do the worst things for the longest time. They will poison the post-cold-war world unless we bring down the price of crude.

Fourth, we will never plant the seeds of democracy in Iraq and the wider Arab world if we don't also bring down the price of oil. These Arab oil regimes will not change unless they have to, and as long as oil prices are soaring they won't have to. Iraq will become just another Arab state that taps oil wells instead of developing its people.

The beginning of leadership for the president is to tell the American people the truth: This is not your parents' energy crisis. The price of oil is not soaring just because of greedy oil companies. It is soaring because of structural changes in the global energy market that could have vast consequences for America and the world if we do not respond in a comprehensive manner.

Toward that end, we need a tax on gasoline at the pump that will keep prices around $4 a gallon (still roughly $1 less than most Europeans pay), or we need a tax on vehicles that will make gas guzzlers prohibitively costly and hybrids and smaller cars enormously attractive. The sooner and the more we take the price of gasoline up — and keep it there — the sooner we can bring it down forever. If we want to make wind, solar and biomass more competitive, gasoline has to cost more, not less.

The president can start by pushing the bipartisan Fuel Choices for American Security Act, now wending its way through Congress. This bill would mandate that every car sold in America would not just have seat belts, but would also be flex-fuel capable so it could run on ethanol, methanol or gasoline. It would also pave the way for the rapid commercialization of plug-in hybrid vehicles, which would combine electricity and gasoline to get 100 miles out of every gallon of gasoline consumed.

DOJ_NMG_0027391

Finally, the bill would offer Detroit loan guarantees for transforming its fleets in this direction. "We're going to have to bail out Detroit anyway, so let's at least get some public benefit," the energy expert Anne Korin said.

Yes, the president has wasted so much time, but if he finally rises to this challenge, Democrats — who should have taken the lead on this issue a long time ago — have got to work with him. If the Democrats shirk this energy challenge, as the Republicans have, I'm certain there is going to be a third party in the 2008 election. It is going to be called the Geo-Green Party, and it is going to win a lot of centrist voters. The next Ross Perot will be green.

Say It With Me: Supply And Demand (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

If you thought the Dubai port deal marked a record high in Washington cynicism, think again. Nothing can match the spectacle of politicians scrambling for cover during a spike in gasoline prices. And this time the panderfest has gone all the way to the Oval Office. President Bush has joined the braying congressional hordes by ordering the Energy and Justice departments and the Federal Trade Commission to launch an investigation into possible gasoline price fixing.

What a disgrace.

Precisely 10 years ago (April 29, 1996) as gas prices reached a shocking $1.27 a gallon, President Bill Clinton ordered his Energy and Justice departments to launch investigations to find out why. In my column that week, I offered a wild guess as to why: "supply is down and demand is up." I offered Energy Secretary Hazel O'Leary and Attorney General Janet Reno a $100 bet (I roll high on sure things) that their million-dollar probes would do nothing more than confirm my hunch.

No takers. Even Cabinet secretaries don't throw away C-notes. Sure enough, months later these perfectly pointless investigations discounted charges of price gouging and attributed the price hike to . . . increased demand and decreased supply.

Today, every time an Iranian mullah opens his mouth about nukes, the risk premium for Persian Gulf supply interruptions jumps again. Crude oil prices alone account for about $1.70 of what you pay for a gallon at the pump. So 10 years later, I'll wager again. Here's what the Bush search for price gougers and profiteers will find:

· Demand is up. China has come from nowhere to pass Japan as the number No. 2 oil consumer in the world. China and India -- between them home to eight times the U.S. population -- are industrializing and gobbling huge amounts of energy.

American demand is up because we've lived in a fool's paradise since the mid-1980s. Until then, beginning with the oil shocks in 1973, Americans had changed appliances and cars and habits and achieved astonishing energy conservation. Energy use per dollar of gross domestic product was cut by 30 percent in little over a decade. Oil prices collapsed to about $10 a barrel.

Then amnesia set in, mile-per-gallon ratings disappeared from TV ads and we became "a country of a million Walter Mittys driving 75 mph in their gas-guzzling Bushwhack-Safari sport-utility roadsters with a moose head on the hood, a country whose crude oil production has dropped 32 percent in the last 25 years but which will not drill for oil in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge for fear of disturbing the mating habits of caribou."

I wrote that during the '96 witch hunt for price gougers. Nothing has changed. Except that since then, U.S. crude oil production has dropped an additional 12.3 percent. Which brings us to:

· Supply is down. Start with supply disruptions in Nigeria, decreased production in Iraq, and the continuing loss of 5 percent of our national refining capacity because of damage from hurricanes Katrina and Rita. Add to that the mischief of idiotic new regulations. Last year's energy bill mandates arbitrary increases in blended ethanol use that so exceed current ethanol production that it is causing gasoline shortages and therefore huge price spikes.

Why don't we import the missing ethanol? Brazil makes a ton of it, and very cheaply. Answer: the Iowa caucuses. Iowa grows corn and chooses presidents. So we have a ridiculously high 54-cent ethanol tariff and ethanol shortages.

Another regulation requires specific ("boutique") gasoline blends for different cities depending on their air quality. Nice idea. But it introduces debilitating rigidities into the gasoline supply system. If Los Angeles runs short, you cannot just move supply in from Denver. You get shortages and more price spikes.

And don't get me started on the missing supply of might-have-been American crude. Arctic and outer continental shelf oil that the politicians kill year after year would have provided us by now with a critical and totally secure supply cushion in times of tight markets.

In March 2000, the price of gas hit $1.80 per gallon. Scandalized congressional Republicans shamelessly pushed for repeal of Clinton's whopping 4.3-cent gas tax increase. Now that the president is a Republican, what do you think Senate Democrats are proposing? A 60-day suspension of the federal gas tax. It would cost $6 billion and counteract the only good thing that comes with high gas prices -- the incentive to conserve.

George Shultz once said, "Nothing ever gets settled in this town." But even Shultz, who has seen everything, must marvel at the perfect regularity, the utter predictability, of the bottomless cynicism of Washington in the grip of gasoline fever.

DOJ_NMG_0027392

Tax The Windfall (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

In, I guess, the early 1990s, when I worked for CNN, I found myself one evening at a Washington reception, chatting with an oil company executive and one from a defense contractor. The oilman said, "How's business?" How's business! Delighted and emboldened by the discovery that businessmen actually say this to one another, I arched a conspiratorial eyebrow and said, "Well, we could use another war."

The defense contractor said, "So could we."

The oilman said, "So could we -- as long as it's in the Middle East."

I was joking, and I'm pretty sure the other two were as well. Corporate executives are human beings (except for Ken Lay). They profit from war, but that doesn't mean they want it. Well, maybe a few of them have mixed feelings about that. But until I see hard evidence, I am not going to believe that American business executives would induce the government to start a war, even if they had the power to do so.

These days even President Bush is dissing the oil companies. He doesn't accuse them of starting the Iraq war, of course, but he does now favor looking into other possible misdeeds, such as antitrust violations. For Republican Sen. Arlen Specter and a chorus of Democrats, oil company misdeeds are enough to justify a tax on their "excess profits."

This hunt for a smoking gun misses the point. Taxes are not a form of punishment. And you don't need to find wrongdoing to justify a special tax on their profits. You only need a pocket calculator -- to figure out how much they owe.

The math is rough, but it's not complicated. About a third of the oil consumed in the United States comes from wells in the United States. That's about 150 million barrels a month. The oil industry refers to this as "production," but a more accurate term would be "extraction." Nature produced the oil and charges nothing for it.

Oil is oil, no matter where it comes from, so the price of those 150 million barrels will go up and down with the price of the 300 million or so barrels we import every month. A year ago, that price was about $46 a barrel. Now it's over $70 a barrel. The cost of extracting those 150 million American barrels depends a lot on how you figure and varies well by well. But we can make a few reasonable simplifying assumptions. First, no one was forced to pump oil at gunpoint a year ago. So, however you figure, in April 2005 it must have been possible to extract 150 million barrels of oil from American ground for less than $46 a barrel, including a reasonable profit.

Costs change: Wells have to be pumped harder, or they run dry. Gradually, we are running out of oil and need to import more and more. But these changes are nothing like the fluctuations in the price that oil can be sold for. If 150 million barrels could be extracted a year ago for $46 a barrel, it shouldn't cost much more than that to extract another 150 million barrels in 2006.

Let's round a bit and say that American oil extractors are getting an extra $25 a barrel. For 150 million barrels a month, that's $45 billion a year. And that's just for the oil that's extracted. The oil that remains in the ground also is about $25 a barrel more valuable. Other energy resources, used and unused, are more valuable by a similar amount.

To get this windfall, the oil companies didn't have to conspire with the Bush administration to start a war in Iraq. They didn't have to conspire among themselves to raise prices at the pump. If you own oil anywhere in the world, you didn't have to do a damn thing. Just close your eyes, make a wish, open them and -- surprise -- you're getting an extra $25 a barrel.

Ordinarily, and wisely, the U.S. government doesn't try to guess what is or is not a reasonable profit, and it doesn't try to tax away profit that is unreasonable. As a general principle, the government tries to tax all business profits at a rate that will produce enough revenue to help cover the cost of government without unduly destroying the incentive to produce. Under Republican administrations, the government usually goes further and gives business a bunch of absurd tax breaks. The oil industry has been a special pet over the years.

Ordinarily, we shouldn't want the government to decide when profits become "excess." But the case of huge profits from the run-up in oil prices is different, for two reasons. First, it is unusually clear that these profits have nothing to do with productivity. Diverting them to the Treasury would have no effect on the incentive to extract more oil from American ground. Second, some or all of these profits are directly related to a situation that is imposing huge sacrifices -- financial and otherwise -- on others: that is, the Iraq war.

Because of the war, the government is adding hundreds of billions to the burden of debt that all taxpayers, including other businesses, will have to pay off. Because of the war, American soldiers by the hundreds, and Iraqis by the thousands, are paying the ultimate tax of death by government policy. And because of the war, American oil companies are raking in extra billions in profits.

DOJ_NMG_0027393

The oil companies, like other big corporations, are mostly owned by ordinary citizens, either directly or through mutual and retirement funds. Presumably some of them support the war and others don't. Do any of these shareholders, pro-war or antiwar, want to pocket $45 billion (or whatever number you choose) from a war that is costing others so much?

Eating Our Greens (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

That was no impostor, that was the actual George W. Bush the other day, wagging his finger at the good people who run the oil bidness and pledging to hold them accountable, or at least pretend to. Pushing alternative fuels? Investigating windfall profits? Is the president unwell?

No, he's fine. His fixes for high gasoline prices also include loosening some of those bothersome clean air regulations and, as usual, a call for drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. He's just scared, and I don't blame him. With gas prices soaring over $3 a gallon, it's time for some serious panic.

One of the unwritten stanzas of the American creed is that a tank of gas, whenever an American needs one, is a birthright. The gauge gets low, you pull into the service station, you pump your gas, you're back on the road. Gas isn't a purchase you're supposed to have to weigh against other things you need.

Gasoline isn't fuel, it's freedom -- and when freedom is priced like a luxury item, Americans tend to turn on incumbent politicians with a snarl.

It's true that gas is still cheaper here than in the rest of the industrialized world, although the gap is shrinking. It's also true, in my view, that the world would be better off (though it would put Americans in a really foul mood) if the price went a good deal higher, perhaps through a big hike in the federal gasoline tax. That would raise much-needed revenue, since Bush is the most profligate spender since Louis XIV, and also discourage people from driving so much, which would cut carbon emissions and push back the day when palm trees take root at Kennebunkport.

So, yes, we should all eat our peas. But here's what I want to know: What are the implications of gas prices of $3 and higher for our collective relationship with our alter egos, our suits of armor, our advertisements for ourselves, our dreams made tangible, our autobiographies written in steel, glass, rubber and plastic: our automobiles?

That Americans are in love with their cars is a cliche, but often cliches are true. In other countries people have a much more sensible view of automotive hardware. In London, for example, a city where petrol costs an arm and a leg and the streets are barely wide enough for a Victorian hansom, people tend to drive small cars. If all Londoners were replaced by Americans tomorrow, I suspect one of our first projects would be to widen the streets so that two Hummers could pass without slowing down.

I'm not being judgmental here. I don't own a Hummer, but neither do I own a Prius or one of the other little gas-electric hybrids that sip fuel by the demitasse rather than the gallon. (Volvo XC wagon, if you must know.) My conscience tells me I ought to own a hybrid, and I applaud those who do -- economists say this guilt makes no sense, since whatever gas I didn't consume would be used by others in Seattle, Shanghai or Seoul, but that strikes me as shortsighted economist-think that ignores the future of the planet.

I could plead the excuse of being tall, but I've actually sat in a Prius, and it was pretty comfortable. The truth is, I have trouble with the idea of puttering around in an oversize golf cart with skinny little tires, grandmotherly acceleration and an aura that's all virtue, no vroom.

And what about that one snowy day every year -- well, most years anyway -- when I really need that four-wheel drive? What would I do then?

If humans were perfectly rational beings, life would be boring. Different societies have different subjects about which their views are, basically, insane. One of America's defining insanities is the automobile. Look around as you drive in to work tomorrow. Why is that woman driving alone in an SUV as roomy as some Tokyo apartments? Why is that guy driving a Porsche that'll do 150 when he'll never have the nerve to push it past 90, even on a clear stretch of interstate with no county mounties in sight?

But the economists are right about one thing: Irrationality can make a valiant stand against price, but ultimately it succumbs. At $3 a gallon and more, fewer people will buy SUVs. At some higher figure -- maybe much higher, but that seems to be where we're headed -- we'll all downsize into Prius Nation.

But could I have fatter tires on mine? And four-wheel drive? You know, for when it snows.

Bush In New Orleans As Senators Release Report (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

DOJ_NMG_0027394

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, April 27 — Facing renewed criticism of his administration's response to Hurricane Katrina, President Bush came to this storm-ravaged city on Thursday promising to make federal rebuilding efforts "as efficient as possible" while signaling that his administration was listening to its critics.

"All of us in positions of responsibility appreciate those who are working to help us to understand how to do our jobs better," Mr. Bush said on a visit to the heavily damaged Lower Ninth Ward.

Mr. Bush's trip was planned to highlight the progress of rebuilding efforts on the Gulf Coast and, this being National Volunteer Week, the role volunteers have played in them. But it came on a day that a panel of senators, in a bipartisan report, called the Federal Emergency Management Agency the living "symbol of a bumbling bureaucracy."

Speaking to reporters aboard Air Force One en route here, Frances Fragos Townsend, Mr. Bush's domestic security adviser, said that with hurricane season approaching, "now is not the time to really look at moving organizational boxes."

At the home of Ethel Williams, whose bungalow is one of many being restored with help from Operation Helping Hand of Catholic Charities, Mr. Bush praised progress toward recovery here.

The White House seemed to get the sort of image it was seeking, that of the president with his arm around Ms. Williams. With Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco and Mayor C. Ray Nagin, both Democrats, standing nearby, she told him, "I'm proud that you're here, Mr. President, and I won't ever forget you." Mr. Bush said she had promised to have him over one day for a home-cooked meal.

The naming of the Fox News commentator Tony Snow as White House press secretary this week seemed to have created new tension on Thursday with reporters who cover the president.

On Air Force One, the outgoing press secretary, Scott McClellan, was questioned about why the televisions on the plane and in the White House were so often tuned to Fox News Channel, with one questioner asking if there was a general White House edict requiring it.

Mr. McClellan said there was no such edict. After a few minutes he returned to say of the television channel, "They're going to be changing it, at your all's request, to the channel that you requested, which is CNN — from the press corps."

In New Orleans, Bush Urges Volunteerism (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, April 27 -- President Bush on Thursday wrapped his arm around a symbol of the devastation and hope of this ravaged city: Ethel Williams, one of the thousands of people who lost almost everything to Hurricane Katrina.

Making his 11th trip here since the deadly storm and floods, this time to the obliterated Ninth Ward, Bush came here on National Volunteer Day to implore more Americans to help Williams and others like her. His motorcade wound through the deserted, storm-damaged streets that offered stark reminders of the work that lies ahead: shuttered houses, littered lawns, lifeless roads.

But Williams, who fled briefly to Texas after the storm, is back here on Pauline Street, watching Catholic Charities volunteers gut her modest one-story bungalow and prepare to rebuild it. Bush placed his left arm around Williams's shoulder, surrounded himself with local Democratic politicians and praised the volunteers.

"If you are interested in helping the victims of Katrina, interested in helping them get back on their feet, come on down here," Bush said. Williams thanked the president and offered to cook him dinner when her restoration project is complete.

Back in Washington, Congress was again undercutting Bush's political restoration effort. As Bush was taking off for his morning flight here, Republicans and Democrats were arguing that the Bush administration's emergency-response agency is a disaster and should be overhauled. They cited the government's slow response to Katrina as evidence that the Federal Emergency Management Agency should be abolished and replaced with a new, more effective organization.

At the same time, lawmakers haggled over how much to spend to rebuild New Orleans and other cities damaged by last year's storm. Government spending is expected to top $100 billion this year, which some lawmakers from outside the region consider too high.

Two days before this visit, the White House budget office asked Congress for another $2.2 billion in emergency funding to help repair and fortify the levees.

Frances Fragos Townsend, the president's homeland security adviser, told reporters on Air Force One that with the hurricane season coming, the government should focus on preparation, not reorganization. The Atlantic hurricane season begins June 1.

Bush spent the entire day in New Orleans and on Mississippi's Gulf Coast, promising additional assistance and a better response next time disaster strikes. But volunteerism was his message of the day.

DOJ_NMG_0027395

After leaving Williams's house, Bush toured a Habitat for Humanity project a few blocks away, where he put on a carpenter's apron and gloves, grabbed a hammer and pounded a few nails. The volunteers were turning a vacant lot bigger than a football field into an 81-unit housing complex. In Mississippi, Bush stopped at a tent city to visit with 120 people helping remove debris and build houses through a group called the Hands on Network.

Bush Visits To Call Attention To Work Yet To Be Done (NOTP)

By James Varney

New Orleans Times-Picayune, April 28, 2006

President Bush paid another visit Thursday to storm-mauled New Orleans, talking with residents, pounding nails at a reconstruction site in the 9th Ward, and once again calling on Congress to approve his request of additional money for housing and levee reconstruction in the state.

Bush also used the occassion, his 10th south Louisiana visit since Hurricane Katrina, to highlight New Orleans' sputtering recovery and to urge more volunteers to come to the wounded city. Indeed, volunteerism was a theme of a trip that began with him presenting the President's Volunteer Service Medal to Tris Coffin, 87, of River Ridge, under a wing of Air Force One.

Soon after, following a tour of a gutted house in the 2000 block of Pauline Street, Bush and the home's owner, Ethel Williams, a 72-year-old woman who evacuated to Texas, came to the curb and briefly addressed a flock of reporters.

"The leaders down here tell me they could use 2,500 more volunteers," Bush said, his left arm draped over Williams' frail shoulders. "Well, if you're interested in helping the victims of Katrina, if you want to help them get back on their feet, then come on down to New Orleans."

Bush noted there was no shortage of work to be done, and, with Catholic Charities banners undulating on Williams' porch, he pointed to the work done in the 9th Ward by volunteers from all over the United States.

"It's a chance to give something back to your country, too," he said.

As Bush spoke, he was flanked by Mayor Ray Nagin, Gov. Kathleen Blanco and U.S. Rep. William Jefferson (D-New Orleans).

Bush said he was "calling on Congress" to keep his proposals for $4.2 billion in Community Development Block Grants and $2.2 billion for levee repairs "intact for Louisiana."

The money is part of a bill enfolding hurricane relief and war money for Iraq and Afghanistan. But rancor over the bill has risen and Bush is threatening the first veto of his tenure in the White House if what he regards as ancillary spending isn't stripped from the final version. Jefferson said he was confident that, at the end of the day, both amounts would pass congress.

Nagin and Blanco were on the tarmac when Bush, Jefferson and a handful of other dignitaries, including Bush's hurricane czar, Donald Powell, touched down on Air Force One at 11:13 a.m. Bush gave Blanco a kiss and spoke with her and her husband, Coach, then shuffled to his left and shook hands vigorously with Nagin. The two men talked animatedly for perhaps 30 seconds, at times grabbing each other by the shoulders.

The same clutch of politicians then flew on Marine One to a Port of New Orleans container yard near the former Desire housing development, and took a motorcade into the 9th Ward.

After his brief remarks outside Williams' house, one reporter tried to ask if the president had any reaction to this week's finding by a senate panel that an underfunded and dysfunctional Federal Emergency Management Agency was beyond repair and should be scrapped. Bush simply turned away.

Throughout the trip, Bush and Nagin gave every indication of enjoying a genuine friendship, a relationship both men have claimed is real but which Nagin acknowledged was a surprising development. The mayor famously railed against what he considered the tardy federal response to New Orleans' desperate hour of need after Katrina struck, and when he first met Bush on the tarmac of Louis Armstrong International Airport, four days after the storm, Nagin's bearing reflected his anger. That mood has dissipated over frequent meetings since, however, and both men now claim their relationship is a solid one, with Nagin once saying Bush told him he respected the mayor's honesty in Katrina's aftermath.

After visting Williams' house, the politicians zipped just two blocks away to a Habitat for Humanity rebuilding site on North Roman Street called Musician's Village. There Bush, Blanco, Nagin and Jefferson strapped on tool belts and hoisted triangular roof beam sections up to laborers scampering across the wooden skeletons of new houses. The four then went inside the framework, began to shake hands and chat with individual volunteers, and then Nagin and Bush climbed on step ladders and started hammering home nails handed up to them by Blanco and Jefferson.

Nagin, in particular, attacked the job with zest, and sweat began to gleam on his shaved head. Bush watched him for a moment, bemused, and then told the mayor to take it easy.

"I'm getting some aggression out," Nagin replied, adding cryptically there were, "a lot of people he'd like to hit with a hammer."

DOJ_NMG_0027396

As reporters and cameramen swarmed beneath the two, they continued to banter.

“A southpaw, eh?” Bush said. “So you’re a lefty?”

“Oh, yeah,” Nagin replied, “I’m lefty about everything.”

“You write lefty?” the president asked.

“Oh, yeah,” Nagin said, laughing.

Bush insisted, however, that his visit was not all for light conversation. He said his talks with Nagin and Blanco were centered on reconstruction funding and on lines of communication, a topic that also dominated discussions last week the local leaders had with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff.

“I’ve had a good meeting with the mayor and the governor,” Bush said. “We’re all trying to learn the lessons of Katrina, especially with another hurricane season approaching.”

Bush Sees Progress On Gulf Coast Visit (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

BILOXI, Miss. -- Long after Hurricane Katrina savaged the Gulf Coast, progress on the ground may be catching up to President Bush's upbeat bulletins about rebuilding the region.

Mr. Bush made his 11th trip to the area yesterday. He found that after a start that by nearly every measure was scattershot and halting, federal and state efforts, fortified by some $85 billion from Congress, are beginning to show progress. Cleanup and reconstruction in the region are moving ahead, especially with the basics: removing debris, providing temporary housing and rebuilding the area's demolished infrastructure.

In January, the president was criticized for saying he could see "dramatic" improvement in the region as heaps of trash clogged the streets just outside the Bay St. Louis, Miss., school where he was speaking. But yesterday, on a visit to encourage volunteers to pitch in on the massive reconstruction, his comments seemed better rooted to the situation on the ground.

Mr. Bush's tour included initiatives in two neighborhoods in New Orleans, and a base camp for volunteers supporting relief, recovery and rebuilding in the city of Biloxi and surrounding communities.

"There's lots of progress," he said. "There's still a lot to be done."

The numbers tell the tale.

Katrina left 100 million tons of debris across Louisiana and Mississippi, destroyed homes and businesses and displaced tens of thousands of people. Evacuees slowly are making their way back to damaged communities. New building permits are up sharply. Officials say that debris removal is nearing 90% completion in Mississippi and 70% in Louisiana. Although temporary housing remains a problem in New Orleans, the Federal Emergency Management Agency has placed 11,000 trailers in the city. And the Small Business Administration, after a fitful start in handing out aid, now has approved loans totaling $8 billion.

To be sure, problems remain. Nearly $20 billion in administration-backed spending to upgrade the New Orleans flood-protection system and provide rebuilding help remains bottled up in Congress; temporary housing efforts are still bogged down by bickering between FEMA and New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin; and some of Mr. Bush's aid proposals for the region -- primarily his "Go Zone" package of tax-free bonds and special depreciation allowances for companies that operate in Louisiana and Mississippi -- remain largely untapped and bogged down by technical problems, experts say.

"We've found that a lot of it is somewhat impractical," said Fred Chevalier, a bond attorney for the New Orleans law firm of Jones Walker. He estimates that only a fraction of the nearly $8 billion in allowances permitted under the program has been tapped, and that the program will remain unattractive to businesses unless the White House backs a series of technical modifications to it.

Donald Powell, Mr. Bush's envoy to the region, is more optimistic. In January, he cited the goal of picking up trash as a measure of progress in the region. These days, he has moved on to other aspects of the recovery, such as ironing out the kinks in the Go Zone programs, which he cited as "a No. 1 issue."

"There are days when I feel good and days when I don't feel very good," Mr. Powell said. He added that the final $20 billion being sought by the Bush administration to help the region should be enough to complete the job.

Meanwhile, two looming uncertainties could affect the reconstruction effort down the road.

One is the fate of FEMA, the agency that received much of the blame for the federal government's initial clumsy response to the disaster. FEMA continues to be the key conduit for much of the recovery's support efforts. Yesterday, a Senate investigative panel said FEMA is flawed beyond repair and should be dismantled in favor of a more streamlined, focused disaster agency. If that happens, the new FEMA may be more responsive and better financed, boosting reconstruction efforts. But the transition to a new authority could be disruptive in the near term.

DOJ_NMG_0027397

The coming mayoral runoff in New Orleans also is a factor. The campaign has distracted efforts to create a cohesive plan for redeveloping the city, which the next mayor must carry through.

The late-May election pits Mr. Nagin, who has been both lambasted and praised for his performance in office during the crisis, against Mitch Landrieu, Louisiana's lieutenant governor who is widely perceived as the more liberal of the two. He is the brother of Sen. Mary Landrieu (D., La.), one of President Bush's harshest critics on the federal disaster response.

Both men are Democrats, but people close to the White House say Mr. Bush likes Mr. Nagin and certainly prefers him to anyone from the Landrieu family. So, while Mr. Bush's visit to the city was officially billed as a tribute to volunteerism, they said it was also designed to bolster Mr. Nagin's political prospects with the city's white conservative establishment, where support for Mr. Nagin has flagged.

At a site where Habitat for Humanity is building 81 new homes, Mr. Bush donned work gloves and a tool pouch to help raise roof frames onto one house. Mr. Bush and Mr. Nagin traded jokes about the campaign as they pounded nails into the frame. "I got a few people I'd like to hit," the mayor said.

Bush Visits Storm-Ravaged Gulf Coast (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, April 27, 2006

Surrounded by evidence of the incomplete recovery from Hurricane Katrina, President Bush on Thursday tried to calm fears across the Gulf Coast that another monster storm could be lurking in the upcoming hurricane season.

"If there is one, the response will be as effective as possible," said Bush, whose administration has been faulted for a flawed response to Katrina that exacerbated the hurricane's destruction.

Sensitive to voters' anger over soaring gasoline prices, Bush also said he wants Congress to give the Transportation Department the power to increase auto fuel economy standards — an idea proposed in an energy plan by Senate Republicans. The department already has such authority over pickup trucks, SUVs and vans.

Later Thursday, Transportation Secretary Norman Y. Mineta wrote a letter to House and Senate leaders of both parties urging "prompt action" on the president's request. Mineta wrote it was "imperative that (fuel-economy) standards be set through an administrative process based on sound science and data."

The 2006 hurricane season begins June 1, and the president said his administration is working with local officials to make sure communications are clearer and supplies are effectively positioned in advance.

Don Powell, Bush's liaison to hurricane relief efforts, said the restoration of New Orleans' levees to their pre-Katrina condition is expected to be completed by June 1.

Bush's comments, on his 11th visit to the Gulf Coast since Katrina struck in August, came as a seven-month Senate inquiry indicated the United States still was woefully unprepared for a storm of that scope. The Senate review followed a House investigation that was similarly critical of Bush and other top federal officials, and milder White House conclusions that blamed the Homeland Security Department for most of the breakdowns.

"We are far better prepared today than we were this time last year," said Frances Fragos Townsend, Bush's homeland security adviser. "And we will be far better prepared by June 1."

The president said, "All of us in positions of responsibility appreciate those who are helping us to understand how to do our jobs better."

Bush's trip to still-devastated Louisiana and Mississippi was intended to encourage volunteers to pitch in on the massive reconstruction effort.

In New Orleans, the president stopped at a modest bungalow being restored by volunteers in the Ninth Ward, one of the city's majority-black neighborhoods that endured the storm's brunt and remain largely uninhabitable.

The street was piled high in places with trash. Yards were overgrown with weeds. White government trailers that are the main housing for the displaced sat in many front yards.

With less half of the New Orleans pre-storm population back, few residents were evident. The president's motorcade parked in front of one of the city's many shuttered schools.

Ethel Williams, the owner of the single-story green and white duplex, thanked those who are gutting her house so she can return to her home from Texas, where she fled during the storm.

"I'm proud that you're here, Mr. President, and I won't ever forget you," she said, her arm around Bush's waist. The high-water mark from Katrina's flooding was visible behind her, about one-third of the way up her home's single story.

Bush said, "If you're interested in helping the victims of Katrina, interested in helping them get back on their feet, come on down here."

DOJ_NMG_0027398

From Williams' home, Bush went to a nearby large vacant lot where Habitat for Humanity is building 81 new homes, several feet off the ground for protection against future floods, for New Orleans musicians.

Bush, wearing casual blue pants and checked shirt, put on work gloves and a carpenter's apron as he wandered around the construction site and chatted with workers. The president, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco and New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin helped raise roof frames onto one house.

Bush and Nagin traded jokes as they pounded nails into the frame. "I got a few people I'd like to hit," quipped Nagin, who faces a runoff election next month against a fellow Democrat, Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu, in his bid for another term.

Later, in Biloxi, Miss., the president visited a base camp that houses and deploys volunteers to projects around the community from a Methodist church.

He sat around a table nodding approvingly at volunteers who had come from all over the country, and checked their organic farming and pet-rescue efforts. Bush posed for pictures with several dozen people who have been living in a church balcony and a tent city outside.

"Character-building," commented Bush.

Katrina was one of the worst natural disasters in U.S. history, killing more than 1,300 people, leaving hundreds of thousands of homeless and causing tens of billions of dollars in damage. The government's lagging help for disaster victims has contributed to a persistent second-term slump for Bush.

House Lobbying Bill Narrowly Advances (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams

AP2, April 27, 2006

A Republican-backed lobbying overhaul bill narrowly survived Thursday, averting what would have been a stunning blow to the party's drive to repair the scandal-tarnished reputation of Congress before the fall elections.

The 216-207 House vote to advance debate on the bill came after GOP leaders spent hours urging their own members not to abandon them on the legislation. The turning point came when they persuaded Republican members of the Appropriations Committee to go along with measures in the bill to limit earmarks, or special interest projects.

In the end 12 Republicans, mostly lawmakers who thought the bill was too weak, voted against it. Democrats were unanimous in opposition.

Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., the main sponsor of the bill, said the bill would add new transparency to lawmaker-lobbyist relations. "What we are doing here today is another indication of our strong commitment to the issue of reform."

Rep. Christopher Shays (news, bio, voting record) of Connecticut, one of the Republicans voting against the resolution, disagreed. "We're losing our moral authority to lead this place," said Shays, who like Democrats, objected to procedures that barred them from offering amendments they said would have strengthened a weak bill.

The rejected amendments included imposing a ban on gifts from lobbyists, creating a new office to oversee ethics violations in the House, and making retiring lawmakers wait longer before becoming lobbyists.

Majority Leader John Boehner said the House would return to the bill next Tuesday. "Changing anything here in Washington is almost impossible," the Ohio Republican said. "The status quo is a powerful force."

The debate Thursday followed months of negotiations to craft a lobbying overhaul bill in the wake of the scandals generated by disgraced former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the bribery conviction of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif.

The most prominent issue during the day was earmarks, the pet projects that find their way into larger bills, often at the urging of lobbyists. Republican fiscal conservatives demanded greater disclosure of earmark sponsors, while members of the Appropriations Committee objected that the new disclosure rules applied only to appropriation bills, not policy and tax bills.

Earlier this month GOP leaders were unable to deliver on a $2.8 trillion budget blueprint because of a similar struggle between conservatives and the Appropriations Committee over budget reforms.

"After months of scandal and years of deficit spending, we have come to a moment of truth," said Rep. Mike Spence, R-Ind., a leader of the conservatives. "We will show today who in this body is committed to reform and who is not."

"This is the acid test today," said Rep. Jeff Flake (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., a leading opponent of earmarks.

Republican Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo., said it wasn't until five minutes before the vote that he learned that Appropriations Committee leaders would go along with a leadership promise to extend the earmark provisions to all committees when the House and Senate negotiate a final version of the bill.

GOP leaders brought the lobbying bill to the floor Thursday morning but then abruptly pulled it because of the earmarks dispute. They resumed debate four hours later after a two-hour closed-door meeting with the party rank-and-file.

DOJ_NMG_0027399

"Virtually everyone seems to be unhappy with some aspect of this," Dreier said Wednesday. He has overseen the lobbying issue since last January when the House, reacting to the Abramoff scandal, took the initial step of banning members-turned-lobbyists from the House floor and gym.

As Republican leaders huddled to try to salvage the bill, Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., criticized their efforts.

"This is a bill they thought they could get away with," Pelosi told a press conference.

"It's a ruse, and I think they thought it was worth a try. But people are seeing through it, and their members are hearing from the public."

The House bill requires lobbyists to file quarterly reports on their activities, up from the current twice-a-year reports; suspends all privately funded travel through the end of the year; requires appropriations bills to list earmarks; and takes away the retirement benefits of lawmakers convicted of corruption-related crimes.

The Senate bill, passed last month on a 90-8 vote, goes further in banning gifts and meals from lobbyists. It also requires that lobbyists report on grass-roots lobbying involving the use of phone calls and ads to encourage the public to contact their lawmakers, and extends to two years, up from the current one, the waiting period before a former lawmaker can take a job lobbying Congress.

___

The House bill is H.R. 4975.

___

On the Net:

Congress: http://thomas.loc.gov/

House Advances Ethics Measure By Slim Margin (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Lobbying overhaul and ethics legislation narrowly advanced in the House after a day of turmoil that dramatized the continued Republican divisions over how to respond to the wave of scandals threatening the party's power.

Twelve Republicans, including the former chairman of the House Ethics Committee, opposed the leadership on a pivotal 216-207 procedural vote. Dozens more had threatened to jump ship until Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.) interceded to quell a rebellion by members of the House Appropriations Committee.

"The speaker is the speaker; you only have one speaker at a time," said Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis (R., Calif.).

By holding the party together, Mr. Hastert avoided what would have been a huge defeat, killing both lobbying overhaul and any chance of a budget resolution this spring. But when debate resumes next week, critics say the shortcomings of the Republican package will also become more apparent -- as well as the restrictive terms of debate.

As adopted last night, the rule would effectively bar many amendments sought by public-interest groups pushing for stronger changes. These would include a ban on members taking below-cost flights on corporate aircraft and the creation of an independent professional office of public integrity to complement the troubled Ethics Committee structure.

"There are some good things in the bill, but it doesn't go far enough," said Rep. Joel Hefley (R., Colo.), the former chairman of the ethics panel. "We're losing our moral authority to lead this place," said Rep. Christopher Shays (R., Conn.). "When I was elected 10 years ago ... I really believed we would be allowed to have debates. And every year I see less and less of it."

The fight with Appropriations Committee Republicans dealt primarily with a set of proposed procedures intended to discourage the practice of members slipping "earmarks" into spending bills, designating funds for home-state projects or special interests.

The conviction of former Rep. Randall "Duke" Cunningham (R., Calif.) centered on bribes he had received in return for helping to write earmarks into appropriations bills for favored defense contractors. Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who pleaded guilty to three felonies in January and is cooperating with prosecutors in a congressional corruption probe, helped to orchestrate some earmarks for his clients.

The proposed rules changes would demand more transparency when appropriations bills come to the House, and a special point of order is created to allow members to challenge any earmark that is added in final House-Senate negotiations -- without having been voted on first by either chamber.

Mr. Lewis and other Appropriations Republicans said they were prepared to accept the changes, but wanted the rules applied equally to other committees that approve earmarks in their bills.

Mr. Lewis has a long record of earmarks and close ties to defense lobbyists, but he has tried to reduce the number of earmarks in House bills, and many on the committee felt the panel was being singled out.

DOJ_NMG_0027400

At a morning meeting, Majority Leader John Boehner (R., Ohio) sought to resolve the issue by promising that the final bill -- after talks with the Senate -- would be comprehensive. But his assurance wasn't enough, forcing Mr. Hastert to put the House in recess for most of the day as Republicans caucused.

"It's been a full day of personalities," the speaker said.

"I honestly didn't know what we were fighting about," said one top leadership aide. But fight they did -- members and staff alike -- quite openly.

"We're doing to ourselves what the Democrats did to themselves," said a House Republican, and the turmoil contributed to the delay again of an agreement on tax legislation.

One of the last major issues to be settled is what offsetting revenue raisers can be approved to bring down the bill's net cost within the prescribed $70 billion total for five years. "They're pretty close in their parameters," said Mr. Hastert, and he and tax writers remained confident they can reach a settlement next week.

Ethics Bill Clears The House In Tight Vote (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

The House narrowly cleared the way yesterday to vote on an overhaul of congressional lobbying rules after hours of contentious, closed-door meetings yielded a Republican agreement to broaden measures to rein in home-district pet projects and other narrow special-interest amendments.

The 216 to 207 vote followed a tumultuous day in which the measure had to be set aside for five hours while Republicans met in emergency session to revive the faltering legislation. Up to the moment a vote was held last evening, House Republican leaders feared an embarrassing defeat.

But a last-minute deal between House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and rebellious Republicans on the House Appropriations Committee salvaged the legislation, which is now scheduled for a vote Tuesday.

Hastert promised appropriators that they would not alone be targeted by a provision that requires narrowly tailored "earmarks" be identified by the names of their sponsors and be subject to a special type of vote that could remove them. The leadership pledged to broaden the earmark provision in later negotiations with the Senate so that it will apply to all sorts of legislation, from transportation to taxation.

Appropriators were incensed that the pending ethics bill would apply the strict new rules only to their 11 annual spending bills, which fund the federal government. Had the provision been in place last year, they complained, it would not have blocked the so-called Bridge to Nowhere in Alaska, which helped spawn Congress's anti-earmarks drive in the first place. That much-criticized project was part of an authorization bill drafted by the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, not an appropriations bill.

Even with the eleventh-hour backing of the GOP appropriators, the measure that passed yesterday, called a rule, almost failed. The vote had to be held open longer than usual before it garnered a majority. A solid phalanx of Democrats and 12 Republicans, including House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (Wis.) and fellow party members pushing for stronger measures, cast votes against the legislation.

The bill would require lobbyists to file quarterly instead of semiannual disclosures, and to include in those reports the donations they give to federal candidates and political action committees. Lobbyists would also have to make public the value of any gift that they give to lawmakers or congressional aides. In addition, appropriations bills would have to list any earmarks that they contain, as well as the sponsors of those projects. Ethics training would become mandatory for House employees under the legislation.

The measure was slated to come to a vote at noon but was abruptly yanked from the House floor after a brief debate. Aides confirmed that it was clear then that the rule did not have enough support to pass, largely because of the appropriators' defection. Earlier in the morning, House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) had met privately with GOP appropriators and learned about their firm objection to being singled out in the ethics bill.

By 12:15, Republican leaders convened an emergency, members-only conference in one of the Capitol's largest and most ornate rooms, the House Ways and Means Committee chamber in the Longworth House Office Building.

In contrast to the regal surroundings, participants said the meeting was loud and pointed. Several appropriators frankly expressed their opposition; other lawmakers said the defeat of the measure would be a black eye for Republicans who are trying with the bill to distance themselves from former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, whose guilty plea in January prompted the reform effort.

Still others, such as Rep. Christopher Shays (Conn.) said the bill was less than a window dressing and should be rejected. Later, to reporters, he called the bill "pathetic." On the House floor, he added: "We're losing our moral authority to lead this place."

DOJ_NMG_0027401

But it was not until a later, 45-minute meeting in the Capitol among the appropriators -- including former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) -- Hastert and Boehner that the accord was struck to save the ethics bill.

House GOP Saves 'Pork' Reform Bill (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

Republican leaders in the House reached a last-minute deal yesterday to save a bill that includes the most significant reform in recent history to the process by which billions of dollars in federal "pork" are doled out each year in political favors.

The reforms -- part of a much larger bill aimed at curtailing the influence of lobbyists on Congress -- would require greater disclosure about special projects inserted into spending bills by lawmakers, also known as earmarks or pork. Most significantly, the legislation would require members of Congress to attach their names to their proposed earmarks, which sometimes are inserted secretly and anonymously.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner said Republicans are committed to fixing the problems that led to abuses such as the bribery scandal involving former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican who was sentenced to eight years in prison.

"This really does allow us to make some real reforms," the Ohio Republican said. "Changing anything here in Washington is almost impossible. The status quo is a powerful force."

Yesterday's largely party-line 216-207 vote was on a procedural motion that paves the way for a final vote on the bill in the House next week.

For much of yesterday, however, the legislation appeared to be doomed.

Shortly after the vote, one Democrat hurriedly issued a press release with a subject line: "GOP Lobby Bill Dies in the U.S. House."

Yesterday morning, Republican leaders brought the bill to the floor for debate. But they quickly shut down floor discussion and pulled the bill because of strong opposition from Republican members of the influential Appropriations Committee, which is responsible for approving all spending by the federal government. Leading that opposition was Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis, California Republican.

Throughout the day, Republicans huddled in closed meetings, searching for a deal that would win the handful of votes needed from the Republican appropriators to pass the bill. Only as the vote began on the House floor did word begin to leak out that a deal had been reached to save House Republican leadership from an embarrassing defeat on high-profile legislation.

Afterward, House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, Missouri Republican, said, "In the eight years I've been whip and chief deputy whip, I was never less certain five minutes before we started the vote."

Democrats, who were unanimous in their opposition, derided the bill.

"Tragically, the party of Abraham Lincoln has become the party of Abramoff," Rep. Lloyd Doggett, Texas Democrat, said in reference to casino lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who recently pleaded guilty in a federal corruption case.

"With all of your special interest wining and dining, what a Grand Old Party it is," Mr. Doggett said on the floor before the vote. "But it is a grand party for everyone but the taxpayers, who have to pick up the tab."

Before the vote, House Rules Chairman David Dreier, California Republican, said Republicans wanted "to ensure that the tragic problem of corruption that we have witnessed will never happen again."

He went on to say, "The Republican Party is the party of reform."

When Mr. Dreier was done, Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat and ranking member of the Appropriations Committee, responded: "I want to congratulate the gentleman from California for giving that speech with a straight face."

House Republicans Manage To Delay Vote On Ethics Reform Legislation (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, April 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - House Republican leaders on Thursday narrowly defused a revolt within their ranks that would have killed lobby and ethics legislation, but then delayed a final vote on the package until next week.

The legislation still faces broad, if not unanimous, opposition from Democrats and a handful of Republican moderates who say the legislation falls far short of what Congress needs to remove the stain of scandal rising from recent criminal convictions for influence-peddling.

The legislative package, which will be voted on Tuesday, restricts some congressional travel, requires more frequent public disclosure of lobbying activity and forces public identification of sponsors of special-interest "earmarks" inserted into spending bills.

DOJ_NMG_0027402

The measure's defeat would have been an embarrassing setback for House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio. Both vowed to tackle ethics and lobbying legislation in the wake of guilty pleas for corruption by disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff and former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif.

Allegations of influence-peddling also have spilled into Democratic ranks. Rep. Alan Mollohan, D-W.Va., had to step down recently as the top Democrat on the House ethics committee after publicity stirred controversy over spending provisions that he'd inserted into legislation benefiting his friends and business associates.

House Republican appropriators, the lawmakers who draft spending bills, had threatened to vote against the legislation because they objected to its restrictions on "earmarks," the special spending items that members of Congress routinely insert into appropriations bills to benefit constituents. The appropriators said it wasn't fair to restrict such items only in appropriations bills and not in tax or policy legislation.

The appropriators, led by their chairman, Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., eventually relented after Hastert and Boehner promised to apply earmark restrictions to all forms of legislation when the final bill gets reconciled with a Senate version passed in March.

Following the GOP leaders' pledge, the House voted 216-207, largely along partisan lines, to accept the rule governing debate on the bill, indicating likely passage.

"The leader and the speaker gave their word to our members," Lewis said. "We can't ask for any more than that from our speaker. Comprehensive earmark reform is fundamental to our being able to go forward positively and effectively."

Still, many Republican advocates of changing the earmark system were suspicious of the appropriators' motives.

Many House conservatives are suspicious "that the desire to expand earmark reform is actually a desire to kill earmark reform," said Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind.

The House legislation would ban all privately funded travel by members or their staffs until Dec. 15, six weeks after the November elections. It also would prevent lobbyists from accompanying lawmakers on corporate jets.

Lobbyists would have to file quarterly lobbying disclosure reports. They also would have to reveal previous employment in the legislative and executive branches of government.

The controversial earmark provision would require the appropriations committee to include a list of earmarks in spending bills and to identify any member whose earmark appears in the bill. Any House-Senate negotiated spending bill that adds earmarks also would be subject to parliamentary challenge.

House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California called the bill "an embarrassingly trivial response to the culture of corruption that has thrived under this Republican Congress."

The Senate version contains tougher restrictions on lobbying and ethics. Unlike the House bill, it bans all gifts and meals from lobbyists and extends from one to two years the period that former members have to wait before they can lobby Congress. In addition, the Senate's restrictions on earmarks apply to tax and policy legislation as well as to spending bills.

Lobbying Bill Quite Different From 1st Draft (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — Just three months ago, House Speaker Dennis Hastert went before TV cameras to say he was “deeply disturbed” by the money-and-influence scandal that was sweeping the capital. His top remedies: to ban gifts from lobbyists to members of Congress, and to prohibit “fact-finding” trips paid for by private interests.

To get it done, he appointed his Rules Committee chairman, Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif. The House of Representatives, Dreier said, needed to be bold and avoid “the tranquilizing drug of gradualism.”

On Thursday, the House set the bill up for final passage next week. It bears little resemblance to Hastert's early prescription. Lobbyists would still be able to buy gifts for lawmakers, as long as they are worth $50 or less. Instead of banning privately financed trips, they would be suspended until the ethics committee could come up with new rules to govern them.

No Democrat voted to move ahead. Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., called the measure “a ruse.”

She added, “It is an embarrassingly trivial response to the culture of corruption that has thrived under the Republican Congress.”

Dreier said no one is happy about the bill, but he defends it as a step forward: “It makes it harder to abuse the rules, and easier to enforce them.”

So what happened? What looked like a straightforward response to the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal was complicated by competing pressures among House Republicans and from interest groups. “That was the wisdom of the House,” was how Hastert explained it on Thursday.

Abramoff courted lawmakers with free meals, trips and campaign contributions. He pleaded guilty Jan. 3 to corruption charges, and is cooperating with prosecutors while he awaits sentencing in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0027403

On Jan. 28, Dreier began circulating a draft bill that included a ban on privately financed travel; a $20 limit on gifts from lobbyists, and a ban on sports and entertainment tickets. Dreier's draft called for lobbyists to say who they were raising money for and to detail the parties they sponsor for them, such as lavish soirees at national political conventions.

The first sign of change came five days later when Rep. John Boehner of Ohio was elected House majority leader by his fellow Republicans. He had derided Hastert's proposed travel ban as "childish" and dismissed calls for an end to lobbyist-paid lunches.

Boehner made no apologies for his close ties to lobbyists, even boasting that his relationship with them was "frankly, a very good one." He called for greater disclosure of lobbyist-lawmaker ties, rather than new rules to ban certain behavior.

Boehner did push for curbs on "earmarks," pet projects inserted in spending bills, often at the last minute. Abramoff had called the House Appropriations Committee "the favor factory" because it could reward lobbyists with earmarks.

But objections remained. House moderates such as Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., an author of campaign-finance restrictions enacted in 2002, pushed for stricter rules. Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., protested singling out his panel for scrutiny.

Five House committees weighed in. The Judiciary Committee added requirements that lobbyists disclose the names of the lawmakers and staff they try to influence.

That went too far for some of the panel's Republicans, such as Rep. Steve King of Iowa, who said it would be unwieldy. "The best you can do is follow the money. You can't follow the people," he said.

King said Hastert's push for stricter rules on lobbying was an effort to protect rank-and-file members from any voter backlash to the lobbying scandal. But King said his congressional district, in western Iowa, "surely has forgotten about all of this."

Conservative groups allied with Republicans started to complain. The Family Research Council, Focus on the Family and the National Right to Life Committee wrote to Hastert, Boehner, Dreier and Majority Whip Roy Blunt, R-Mo. They said the provision on detailing lobbying contacts "would impose severely onerous record-keeping requirements for organizations such as our own."

Paul Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, also pressed to not name lobbying targets, and praised Boehner and Dreier for "stepping back and saying, 'Maybe we need to slow down a little bit.' " He added, "Cooler heads prevailed."

To satisfy Lewis and his committee, Hastert huddled Thursday with the 37 Republicans on the first floor of the Capitol. He promised them they wouldn't be singled out. Hastert pledged that any final lobbying agreement with the Senate would require that all earmarks — including those in tax and policy legislation — be labeled with the name of their sponsor. "We can't ask for more than that," Lewis said.

Government watchdog groups protested. Common Cause President Chellie Pingree said it was as if Congress had forgotten the Abramoff scandal.

"We will be back to business as usual, if not worse," Pingree said. "Lobbyists could continue to organize fundraising events, go on trips with members of Congress, give gifts, and provide discounts on chartered jets." Current rules allow lawmakers to fly on corporate jets for the cost of a first-class ticket — far less than such flights are worth.

Shays lashed out at his party's House leaders as "clueless about the need for reform."

He added, "Republicans are losing our moral authority to lead this place, and I can't say much more about the Democrats. It's a race to the bottom."

GOP Barely Keeps House Ethics Bill On Track (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON — House Republican leaders overcame a rift within party ranks Thursday to clear the way for passage of legislation to tighten ethics and lobbying rules, a key to the GOP effort to repair Congress' image before the November elections.

The bill narrowly cleared a procedural hurdle, but only after Republican leaders scrambled to bring together their rank and file to avoid an embarrassing setback on one of their priorities. It showed just how much the leaders had to work to unite the once lock-step GOP team, and underscored the difficulty that lay ahead in trying to change the way lawmakers and lobbyists go about their jobs.

The vote was 216 to 207, with no Democrats in favor. Twelve Republicans and one independent also voted no. The California delegation split along party lines, with Rep. Juanita Millender-McDonald (D-Carson) not voting.

A final vote is expected next week. The House legislation will then have to be reconciled with a Senate bill approved 90 to 8 late last month.

The issue has come to the fore amid public opinion polls showing widespread dissatisfaction with Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0027404

"It's our only chance to maintain the majority, it really is," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.).

Democrats, government watchdog groups and a handful of Republicans have assailed the bill as weak, saying it would do little to change the way business is conducted on Capitol Hill, which has been rocked by a spate of ethics scandals.

The bill would put a moratorium on privately funded congressional travel, deny congressional pensions to lawmakers convicted of abusing the public trust and require a public accounting of projects tucked into spending bills, often at the behest of lobbyists.

Unlike the Senate bill, the House measure would not prohibit lobbyists from buying gifts or meals for lawmakers or extend the period former lawmakers must wait after leaving Capitol Hill before lobbying their onetime colleagues. It would require lobbyists to disclose the meals they buy for lawmakers and staffers, but they would not be forced to disclose their contacts with lawmakers or their role in arranging fundraisers.

"We need bold reform — and regretfully, this bill does not do it," Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) said.

"A ruse — that's what this is," House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) added, signaling that Democrats planned to continue to highlight ethics as a campaign issue this year.

The renewed call for ethics and lobbying reform comes in the wake of guilty pleas to political corruption by former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe) and disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, money-laundering charges that forced former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) from his leadership post, and an investigation of influence-peddling in Washington. Some Democrats have also come under scrutiny for alleged ethics lapses.

House Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R-San Dimas), the House GOP's point man on drafting ethics rules, called the bill a "vast improvement over the status quo."

"If everybody is unhappy with a piece of legislation, it's probably a pretty good bill," Dreier said, quoting former House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski, an Illinois Democrat who served time for mail fraud in the mid-1990s.

Earlier in the day, the legislation appeared in jeopardy because of a bitter dispute within the GOP over proposed rules aimed at reining in projects slipped into spending bills, frequently at lobbyists' requests.

House conservatives upset with the explosion of "pork-barrel" spending succeeded in including language that would require projects, as well as the projects' congressional sponsors, to be identified in spending bills and would give lawmakers a new opportunity to challenge funding requests added to spending bills late in the legislative process.

But the proposed change was resisted by House Appropriations Committee members, who have the power to earmark money for lawmakers' pet projects.

The panel's chairman, Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands), and many of its members signaled that they would withhold their support unless the rule change applied to all bills. Without that, they said, Congress could encounter the same kind of public outcry it got last year when the $223-million "bridge to nowhere" — connecting the town of Ketchikan, Alaska, to an island with an airport and about 50 inhabitants — was included in a highway bill.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) picked up the votes of Lewis and others after pledging to ensure that no House-Senate compromise bill would come before the House for final approval unless it included "comprehensive earmark reform" applying to all bills.

"Changing anything here in Washington is almost impossible," Boehner said after the vote.

Scalia Floats And Breyer Rocks For A Day In Court (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

On Jan. 22, 1973, the Supreme Court of the United States decided Roe v. Wade, creating the right to an abortion. This column is not about abortion. It is about the Supreme Court.

The preceding two sentences would strike some as a contradiction. As proved by the nomination hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee for John Roberts and Samuel Alito, the Supreme Court resides now in the political mind as all about the right to an abortion, with the rest of the world mere footnotes.

This week offered the last oral arguments in the Court's current term, and on Monday I went to see and hear what the nine Justices do when they are not thinking about abortion. Like a New Yorker who has never been to the Statue of Liberty and a Washingtonian who's never visited the White House, I've managed a career in political journalism without attending an oral argument before the Supreme Court. In a perfect world, all Americans would. Sen. Arlen Specter is proposing to make the Court's corner of the world perfect, but more (well, a little) on him later.

Attending the Supreme Court may be better than going to church insofar as you can't attend the Court in your gym clothes. The Court's hearing chamber may be the last best place to experience authentic decorum anywhere in America. Cell phones? They even forbid reading material. As the moment to begin arrives, a clerk instructs, "Remain absolutely silent." The best yet: "If you find yourself falling asleep, you are free to leave the courtroom." A somnolent 7-year-old in front of me was admonished twice.

DOJ_NMG_0027405

The Court is not wholly immune from the compulsions of popular culture. When they entered the chamber, one felt in the presence of celebrities. They sit beneath a large suspended clock, with Roman numerals. Its sweeping second hand is visible to the attorneys who have 30 minutes to make their case. As the 10 a.m. start approached, the room fell from murmurs to whispers to still silence.

The Court heard oral arguments for two cases. The first, anyone could understand; the second, no one could understand. Both held the audience rapt.

The question before the Court in Brigham City v. Stuart was whether police in Utah, responding to complaints about a loud party in a house at 3 a.m., and arriving on the sidewalk to see a kitchen fight among four apparently intoxicated individuals, were wrong to enter the house without getting a warrant. Utah's courts ruled against the police.

Before a word of argument, Justice Scalia, his seniority placing him next to Chief Justice Roberts, had rocked backward, his face suffused with skepticism. To his left, Justice Souter had fixed the attorneys with a stiff, slightly scary New Hampshire stare. Justice Breyer, at one end of the bench, appeared grandly bored (he is not, as Michael P. Studebaker, Mr. Stuart's attorney, will learn). Justice Thomas famously asks no questions at oral argument, but he and Justice Breyer appear to be bench buddies, rocking back to smile and chat each other up over some point of shared amusement.

Brigham City is a case designed to amuse, insofar as Mr. Stuart's attorney is arguing that the police should have telephoned a judge for a warrant even as a fistfight was under way. The Fourth Amendment issue is that the states have varying and conflicting standards in such instances.

There is much discussion of warrants, knocks and noise levels.

Justice Souter: "Why knock if it's obviously a futile gesture, if no one will hear?"

Justice Scalia: "Why is the trial court obsessed with knocking?"

Justice Breyer: "The Constitution says 'reasonable.' A policeman isn't a lawyer. . . . A warrant would take half an hour. There would be more drinking, more violence. What's wrong?"

Mr. Studebaker: "It still requires a warrant."

Justice Breyer, appearing to side with the police, and with emphasis: "I'm saying it's not. It's reasonable." Justice Scalia has now sunk so low in his chair that only the top half of his face is visible to the gallery. He looks like he's floating in a Jacuzzi. Justice Stevens brings down the house with the morning's best probable-cause line: "The adults were intoxicated? That's a serious crime in Utah!"

Chief Justice Roberts, peering over his reading glasses, ends it: "The case is submitted."

Kircher v. Putnam Funds Trust is from another planet. A class-action securities case raising issues of federal and state jurisdiction (of material interest to the mutual-fund industry), it is impossibly abstruse. Yet the colloquy between the Justices and the two competing lawyers fixates the audience. It is an 11-piece orchestra playing a complex legal concerto, and at the end the impulse is to applaud.

Later, the Justices will discuss the cases in a book-lined conference room around a rectangular table. Each Justice has three stacked pads of paper -- small, medium and large. Clerks never sit in. There is no record of the conversation. Unlike the sprawling office edifices of Congress in the nearby streets, the Court occupies one square building. On a tour of its nooks and crannies, one encounters virtually no one. The Court's work is done by nine Justices and some 37 clerks, plus a legal team to help choose among 10,000 submitted cases.

Agreed: The issues that rage around the Court over constitutional interpretation are worth fighting over. But in an op-ed piece this week, Judiciary Chairman Specter raged that the public deserved to have the Court's "power" televised. He is wrong. TV of its nature would surely diminish the Court. Anyone who wishes may listen to past oral arguments at www.oyez.org/oyez/frontpage1. That includes, quite eerie to hear, Roe v. Wade.

Institutions matter. The Congress is approaching dysfunction. Perhaps the country can survive that. The American presidency has morphed beyond human scale. But to enter the Supreme Court and encounter the place, the people and its essential purpose is to feel carbon-dated to 1789. Though often maddening, its majesty remains intact.

Reining In Justice Scalia (NYT)

By Adam Cohen

The New York Times, April 26, 2006

"You know what I say to those people? That's Sicilian."

—Justice Antonin Scalia

Justice Antonin Scalia has gone too far — and he keeps on doing it.

DOJ_NMG_0027406

He made national headlines recently for making a gesture that may or may not be obscene. If it wasn't obscene, it was certainly coarse and undignified.

He recently called those who disagree with his unconventional views of the Constitution "idiots."

His public statements often make him sound more like a political partisan than a judge. He is particularly bad on the subject of Bush v. Gore, the decision that put President Bush in the White House, a low point in the Supreme Court's history that Justice Scalia should not be pulling down any lower.

Worst of all, Justice Scalia refuses to abide by the basic principles of recusal, the law that forbids judges from hearing cases in which they are not impartial, or will not be viewed as impartial. A few weeks ago, he took part in a case involving the rights of detainees after making inflammatory statements that seriously called his fairness into question.

Justice Scalia is certainly hurting his own reputation. After one of his ethical lapses involving Vice President Dick Cheney, Jay Leno joked on "The Tonight Show" about an "embarrassing moment" when Mr. Cheney visited the White House — "Security made him empty his pockets and out fell Justice Antonin Scalia!"

More important, Justice Scalia's actions are damaging the reputation and moral authority of the Supreme Court. Not since Abe Fortas and William O. Douglas stirred up controversy in the 1960's and 70's has there been a justice whose personal conduct has done as much to diminish the court's reputation.

The rate of Justice Scalia's disturbing words and deeds is increasing — now, it seems, he can be counted on to embarrass the court publicly roughly every few weeks. There is debate among court-watchers about why this is happening. But whatever the reason, Justice Scalia needs to be reined in.

If he will not police himself, his colleagues and Congress should do it, to protect the dignity of the court, and to ensure that the parties before him get a fair hearing.

I. Injudicious Public Statements

There is a long tradition of Supreme Court justices speaking at law schools, and in other public forums. In general, this is a good thing. The American people should be able to see their justices up close, and learn their views about the law, and the justices should get out of the monastic world of the court and interact with real people.

It is critical, though, that the justices uphold the court's integrity and independence. Alone among his Supreme Court colleagues, Justice Scalia seems indifferent to this basic point.

His most recent major blow-up occurred in a Boston church. After he was asked about the impact of his religion on his judicial decisions, Justice Scalia placed his fingertips under his chin and flicked them outward. The Boston Herald reported that the gesture was obscene. Justice Scalia wrote a letter to the editor insisting that it was merely an Italian way of indicating, roughly, "I could not care less."

Whether the gesture was obscene is subject to debate. The Philadelphia Inquirer surveyed residents of South Philly, and found opinion divided. Some Italian-Americans said the gesture simply meant "fuggeddaboutit," while others said it was vulgar. Sonny D'Angelo of D'Angelo Brothers butcher shop told the paper that he was brought up to regard it as obscene, adding that "My father would go berserk if I used that gesture."

The photographer who took a now-famous picture of the gesture, Peter Smith, a Boston University assistant photojournalism professor, said that when Justice Scalia made the gesture he also uttered an obscenity in Italian.

In February, speaking to a meeting of the conservative Federalist Society, Justice Scalia dismissed those who believe that the Constitution is a living document that evolves over time. "You would have to be an idiot to believe that," he said. Among the people who are "idiots" by Justice Scalia's formulation: the vast majority of constitutional law professors, and most of his colleagues on the Supreme Court, who continually reaffirm their belief in a living Constitution.

In a speech at the University of Fribourg in Switzerland on March 8, Justice Scalia was even more off-base. On the subject of whether detainees captured in war should be given a jury trial in civil court, he said "Give me a break," even though closely related questions were at issue in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which was headed to the Supreme Court in a matter of weeks.

The loose cannon keeps on firing. On April 12, during a visit to the University of Connecticut, Justice Scalia said of his decision not to recuse himself from a case involving Vice President Dick Cheney, which he participated in after going on a hunting trip with Mr. Cheney, "I think the proudest thing I have done on the bench is not allow myself to be chased off that case." Justice Scalia's decision was widely criticized by commentators, lawyers, and law professors, including some of the nation's leading experts on judicial ethics. It is bizarre that he would call it his proudest accomplishment on the bench.

II. Refusing to Recuse

Justice Scalia has refused to follow the law on recusals, participating in cases where his impartiality has been seriously called into doubt.

The law of recusal is clear. Supreme Court Justices are bound by a federal statute The Supreme Court has emphasized that the law should be read broadly to avoid "even the appearance of impropriety."

DOJ_NMG_0027407

Justice Scalia failed to do this in two important, and highly political, cases.

The first was a lawsuit by the Sierra Club and Judicial Watch against Vice President Dick Cheney, seeking to learn the identity of members of a secret energy task force he met with early in President Bush's first term. Critics of the administration have long suspected that those meetings were a forum for oil companies, and other powerful corporations, to shape the administration's energy policies. The court decided the case in June, 2004, in the middle of President Bush and Mr. Cheney's re-election campaign.

Shortly before it was argued, Justice Scalia went on a small hunting trip with Mr. Cheney, who was an old friend. The two men flew down to Louisiana together on Air Force Two, and hunted together.

The Sierra Club filed a motion asking Justice Scalia to recuse himself from Mr. Cheney's case. Justice Scalia, refused and then voted in Mr. Cheney's favor.

When he decided not to remove himself from the case, Justice Scalia wrote a 21-page memorandum setting out his position. It is thoroughly unconvincing, as Hofstra Law School professor Monroe Freedman, who is one of the nation's leading legal ethics experts, explained in "Duck-Blind Justice: Justice Scalia's Memorandum in the Cheney Case," in the Georgetown Journal of Legal Ethics.

The memo is filled with specious arguments. Justice Scalia acknowledged that friendship between a judge and a party to a lawsuit can be grounds for recusal. But he argued that this was mainly true when the party is sued in his personal capacity. In a case where a friend is sued in his official capacity, according to Justice Scalia, a judge only needs to recuse himself when the party's "reputation and integrity" are at stake. In the case before him, Justice Scalia wrote, Mr. Cheney was being sued in his capacity as chair of the Energy Group, in what was a "'run-of-the-mill' dispute about an administrative decision."

The argument is hard to take seriously. The energy task force lawsuit was anything but run-of-the-mill. Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney's political opponents were using the task force as a political weapon in the 2004 election, and if Mr. Cheney had been forced to reveal who had attended meetings, it might well have produced information that would have shown up in political attack ads. Justice Scalia seemed to be suggesting that if Mr. Cheney, an extremely wealthy man, were being personally sued for a small amount of money, he would have recused himself, but that this suit was so much less important to Mr. Cheney that recusal was unnecessary. That makes no sense at all. It is hard to believe Justice Scalia could have convinced a judge to accept his argument, but fortunately for him, he only had to persuade himself.

Justice Scalia's memo has other serious flaws. He accepted a free ride for himself and two family members on Air Force Two from Mr. Cheney right before hearing the case. Taking things of value from one of the parties to a case is the most basic conflict for a judge. But Justice Scalia dismissed objections with the most clichéd defense of bribe-takers — that it was absurd to think he could be "bought so cheap." In fact, the value of three luxury plane rides is not insubstantial at all compared to the salary of a Supreme Court Justice.

Professor Freedman noted in his article that 8 of the 10 largest-circulation newspapers (including this one) ran editorials calling for Justice Scalia's recusal, as did 20 of the top 30, and none argued against it. "Unless we are to believe that all these editorialists are unreasonable people," Professor Freedman wrote, "the conclusion is inescapable that a reasonable person might question Scalia's impartiality in the case." A few weeks ago, Justice Scalia again participated in a case in which many reasonable people questioned his impartiality — because of his own comments. In his University of Fribourg appearance, he was quoted saying that "War is war, and it has never been the case that when you captured a combatant you have to give them a jury trial in your civil courts." As Tony Mauro, a veteran Supreme Court reporter, has pointed out, that seemed to directly prejudge a case he was to hear a few weeks later, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, in which an alleged Al Qaeda member captured in Afghanistan was challenging the use of military tribunals to try detainees held in Guantanamo.

Justice Scalia made things worse by saying, in the same discussion, "I had a son on that battlefield, and they were shooting at my son." The strong suggestion was that he was connecting the question of what rights detainees have to the danger posed to his son Matthew, who was an Army captain in Iraq. A group of retired generals and admirals who filed a friend-of-the-court brief on behalf of Mr. Hamdan asked Justice Scalia to recuse himself. He refused. At oral argument, according to Mr. Mauro's account, Justice Scalia at times "appeared to take over [the government's] ... argument," doing battle with the justices who appeared most sympathetic to Mr. Hamdan.

Justice Scalia clearly does not like the recusal law as it exists in the statute books—and he seems intent on replacing it with a more forgiving standard of his own creation. At his University of Connecticut appearance, when he was asked about the Cheney case, he replied, "For Pete's sake, if you can't trust your Supreme Court justice more than that, get a life." But Justice Scalia, who is so critical of liberal judges for making up legal standards, has made up his own standard here. If he had fairly applied the one in the statute, he would have removed himself from the case.

III. Justice Scalia, Political Partisan

DOJ_NMG_0027408

Justice Scalia speaks, frequently, as an undisguised right-wing ideologue. In his University of Fribourg appearance, he was quoted saying, about President Clinton's false statements in the Monica Lewinsky matter, "we really don't like our presidents fooling around in the Oval Office." The questioner was asking about the dishonesty of American presidents, but Justice Scalia sounded like a right-wing talk show host in his response. He was certainly not giving a legal answer to the question, since the articles of impeachment against President Clinton were for perjury and obstruction of justice, not sex in the White House.

His comments about Bush v. Gore have also been strikingly political in tone, which is particularly unfortunate given the black mark the case has already made on the court's reputation. In the same Fribourg appearance, again according to the Washington Post, Justice Scalia said on the subject of Bush v. Gore, that if all of the votes that Democrats had wanted counted were indeed counted, "They would have lost anyway." The important point is that no one will ever know who would have won if all of the votes had been counted, and the Supreme Court ordered the vote counting stopped. He was also quoted as saying, "Oh God. Get over it," as if there were a statute of limitations for raising questions about the legitimacy of Supreme Court rulings.

In the Supreme Court, the case broke down sharply along partisan lines, with the five conservative justices voting for George W. Bush, and the four liberals dissenting. But Justice Scalia rejected charges that the court had approached the case in political terms while at the same time stating, outrageously, that the Florida Supreme Court judges had been politically motivated when they ordered that more votes be counted. The Supreme Court's prestige was sorely tested in Bush v. Gore, when it had to resolve a deeply divisive dispute over who had rightfully been elected president. The reason the court's decision was accepted, though — by an electorate that had cast 500,000 more of its votes for Mr. Gore than Mr. Bush — is that it was regarded as a legal decision, not a political one. Justice Scalia's discussion of the case undermines the public's faith in the decision, and the court.

IV. Why Is He Doing This?

There is no way to know why Justice Scalia has been acting in a way that has been so injurious to his own reputation, and the reputation of the court.

It may simply be a product of his booming self-confidence, in his intellectual ability and his moral vision. He may simply be speaking his mind because he feels he can.

Some court-watchers have conjectured that Justice Scalia may have been motivated by a deep desire to be appointed Chief Justice. He may have curried favor with Vice President Cheney before the election in the hope that it would help him to be nominated. And Justice Scalia may be speaking out now because he feels that, with a new Chief Justice, John G. Roberts, who is much younger than he is, he has nothing left to lose.

Justice Scalia, for his part, has been quoted saying that he has been on something of a public relations kick. "My kids have been working on me to get out and do more public appearances," he told a reporter from the New York Daily News last year. "They think it makes it harder to demonize you — and I agree." He may want to reassess his strategy.

In the end, why he is doing it doesn't matter that much. Getting him to stop matters a lot.

V. What Is to Be Done?

If Justice Scalia keeps making outrageous statements, and violating recusal law, at his current pace, it will do serious damage to the Supreme Court.

The simplest solution would be for Justice Scalia to begin policing himself. Unfortunately, he seems convinced that he is above reproach, despite all of the reproach he has received.

The next obvious place to look for corrective action is Justice Scalia's colleagues on the court. The Supreme Court has always jealously guarded its prerogatives when it comes to setting its own rules — Justice Anthony Kennedy recently told Congress that the Supreme Court, not Congress, should decide if its proceedings are televised. But with that assertion of authority comes responsibility.

Chief Justice Roberts, and perhaps other members of the court, should persuade Justice Scalia to give up his unseemly public utterances, and to recuse himself from cases when the law indicates that he should.

If Justice Scalia keeps flouting basic recusal principles, the court should consider changing its rules. Currently, justices are the only federal judges who are allowed to decide on their own whether to recuse themselves. There is an inherent illogic in allowing a judge to be the final word on his own impartiality — if they are so biased that they cannot hear a case, they may well be too biased to decide if they are too biased. But it is a system that works only if justices do their utmost to be fair to the arguments for recusal.

The court could decide to allow the justices as a whole, or an alternating panel of three justices, to rule on recusal motions aimed at their colleagues. Such an approach would have its own problems — conceivably, justices in one ideological camp could vote to recuse their ideological opposites to affect the outcome of a case. But if individual justices abuse their right to decide their own motions, such a change would be an improvement.

DOJ_NMG_0027409

Finally, Congress should be doing more. Respected members from both parties should speak out when Justice Scalia makes outrageous comments, and make it clear that better is expected of him.

They should also reconsider the rules of recusal. Congress could amend the federal recusal statute to require that the whole Supreme Court, or a panel of justices, rule on recusal motions. Short of amending the law, some pointed criticism from members of Congress, particularly on the Republican side of the aisle, could encourage Justice Scalia to do better in ruling on his own recusal motions.

More than any modern justice, Justice Scalia seems intent on presenting himself to the world as an outspoken champion of conservative values. But conservatives are people who believe in respecting and preserving existing institutions. There is nothing conservative about diminishing a great institution like the Supreme Court by making inflammatory and partisan off-the-bench statements and ignoring the rules of ethical judging.

OTHER NEWS:

Whistleblower alleging Red Cross let tainted blood be released sees bulk of lawsuit dismissed (AP)

By DONNA DE LA CRUZ

AP, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A whistleblower who claims the American Red Cross failed to immediately alert regulators when more than 600 pints of contaminated blood were released in New Jersey saw the bulk of her lawsuit dismissed Thursday in federal court.

Michelle Hoyte also claims the agency fired her for complaining to her managers about the tainted blood. That part of her lawsuit is still intact, but the Red Cross has filed a motion to have that final portion dismissed as well.

After the brief hearing, in which a judge dismissed the False Claims Act portion of her lawsuit, Hoyte said she remained worried that the Justice Department and the Food and Drug Administration are not doing enough to make sure the Red Cross's blood supply is carefully monitored. Blood banking has become the Red Cross's biggest moneymaker, bringing in $2.14 billion in revenue in the last fiscal year.

"There's supposed to be an internal system for people to report incidents like this," Hoyte said. "But the employees are afraid to do so for fear of being dismissed."

At the hearing, John R. Fleder, attorney for the Red Cross, said the organization and the FDA are actively monitoring the blood supply.

"It's top priority is the safety, security and availability of the nation's blood supply," Fleder said of the Red Cross.

According to her lawsuit, Hoyte supervised a February 2004 audit of the Red Cross's Penn-Jersey blood collection facility in Philadelphia. The auditors discovered that 607 pints of blood were not collected properly and were exposed to air, violating agency procedures. Officials suspended the worker who collected the blood but Hoyte alleges they did not immediately alert regulators, or recall the blood.

The lawsuit says that it is still not known whether the blood that was released caused any infections or illnesses, or exactly what hospitals, blood banks or other facilities received the pints.

Hoyte complained to her managers about the blood and also went to the FDA, where she used to work. The FDA investigated her claim last year and found that 539 of the 607 units had been exposed to air.

In spite of the FDA's findings, Hoyte's attorney, Vincent McKnight, said the Red Cross has not been fined.

Hoyte included the Justice Department as a plaintiff in her case, but the government sought Thursday to have her False Claims Act motion dismissed, saying the government has investigated the case and the FDA has taken action. The Red Cross supported the motion, and U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman granted it.

The False Claims Act is designed to stop fraud in government procurement contracts. Many whistleblower lawsuits are filed under this law.

McKnight said he and Hoyte are discussing whether to appeal Thursday's ruling, but would continue the lawsuit suing the Red Cross for wrongful termination. Hoyte, who suffers from multiple sclerosis, said she does not have another job.

Iran Vows To Defy U.N. On Nuclear Program (NYT)

By By William J. Broad And Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027410

Iran vowed yesterday to defy any United Nations Security Council resolution on its nuclear activities on the eve of a major report by atomic inspectors on the status of its nuclear program.

Javad Zarif, the Iranian ambassador to the United Nations, told reporters in New York that Iran would consider illegitimate any Council resolution calling on Iran to stop uranium enrichment that invoked the so-called Chapter 7 clause, which could open the door to penalties and possibly to military action.

The United States has been pressing for such a resolution. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that the Security Council had no choice but to rebuke Iran and that negotiations had apparently broken down between International Atomic Energy Agency monitors and Iranian envoys.

Today, the agency will deliver to the Security Council a report expected to be highly critical of Iran's compliance with demands that it stop enriching uranium.

The Council is expected to meet, probably next week, to debate what, if any, punitive action to take against Iran.

"If the Security Council decides to take decisions that are not within its competence, Iran is not obliged to obey them," Mr. Zarif said, speaking to reporters at the residence of the Iranian Mission to the United Nations in Manhattan.

He said the matter should properly be handled by the atomic energy agency, not the United Nations.

He also sought to portray Iran's defiant stance as nothing more than a logical response to American threats against Iran.

"We're not upping the ante," he said. "We're simply responding to others upping the ante."

Ms. Rice, speaking in Bulgaria at a conference of envoys from NATO and the European Union, said, "What is clear is that it is highly unlikely that Iran is going to accede to the demands of the international community."

She added, "In order to be credible, the Security Council of course has to act."

Chapter 7 of the United Nations Charter deals with "threats to the peace, breaches of peace, and acts of aggression," and its application in this case would make Iranian compliance binding under international law.

As a signatory of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, Iran has the right to enrich uranium, but the United States and its European allies have argued that Iran's concealment of nuclear activities in the past means it has forfeited that right.

In January, Iran restarted its effort to make atomic fuel after negotiations with Britain, France and Germany over the fate of its atomic program broke down, and a month ago the Council voted unanimously to give Iran 30 days to show it had stopped enriching uranium.

Yesterday in Vienna, Iranian officials delivered a confidential letter to the agency that emphasized its determination to press on with its nuclear program, defying calls from other nations to freeze its activities, according to a European official who had seen the document.

The letter was a response to the agency's demand for more cooperation from Iran to investigate suspicions that Iran has been researching ways to produce warheads or delivery systems for weapons. Iran has denied such activities. The letter reflected a hardening of Iran's position and asked other nations to make concessions to Iran, the official said.

A senior Iranian official confirmed the delivery of the letter, which he said would probably be made public today.

Although the United States is pushing for tough measures, it is far from clear whether Russia would drop its opposition to a Chapter 7 resolution at the Security Council.

Past opposition by Russia, China and others has forced the United States to back down from its demand for such a resolution, but now American and European diplomats hope that a new critical finding by the International Atomic Energy Agency will increase support for the action it wants.

Iran insists that its activities are for peaceful purposes only, and its leaders have kept up a barrage of criticism of the United States, Europe and others who suspect it of concealing a nuclear weapons program. In the past several days, Iranian officials have threatened to strike at American military targets if the United States attacks Iran. The officials have also offered to share nuclear technology with other nations, including Sudan.

Last week, Iran informed the monitoring agency that it would provide only the minimal level of cooperation legally required under its safeguards agreement with the agency as a signatory to the nonproliferation treaty.

That decision made it much harder for the agency's nuclear inspectors to visit sites in Iran and led Dr. Mohamed ElBaradei, the agency's director general, to cancel a trip to Iran by his senior inspectors.

Meanwhile, European diplomats said Iran was expanding its efforts to enrich uranium on an industrial scale with centrifuges — tall, thin machines whose rotors spin extraordinarily fast to concentrate uranium's rare form, uranium 235, which can fuel nuclear reactors or atom bombs.

Diplomats familiar with what Iran has told atomic inspectors in recent days said the country had started work on second and third "cascades" of 164 centrifuges, preparing to match the first already in operation at its enrichment facility in Natanz.

DOJ_NMG_0027411

David Albright, an expert on the Iranian centrifuge program and president of the Institute for Science and International Security, a private research group in Washington, said the Iranian expansion made technical sense but did not necessarily bespeak a major advance.

"I don't think the first cascade is running all that well," he said. "So that's an incentive to build more to learn how to get them working more efficiently. They might need to do many experiments."

Ahmadinejad Defiant Ahead Of Key Nuclear Report (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

NEW YORK -- Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed yesterday not to abandon the country's nuclear program, challenging the United Nations one day before the U.N. nuclear agency is to issue a key report on Iran's efforts to refine uranium into nuclear fuel.

"We want nuclear technology for peace and progress of nations, and if some believe that they can prevent us with psychological warfare and resolutions, they are mistaken," he told a rally in northern Iran.

Uranium can be processed into fuel for an nuclear reactor or to make atomic bombs.

"We have obtained the technology for producing nuclear fuel. ... No one can take it away from our nation," Mr. Ahmadinejad said.

The U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) is to report today on compliance with a U.N. Security Council resolution calling on Iran to stop enriching uranium.

The Bush administration, which has been laying the groundwork for a tougher Security Council resolution demanding that Iran give up its fuel-enrichment activities, said the council's credibility is at stake.

"What is clear is that it is highly unlikely that Iran is going to accede to the demands of the international community," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in Bulgaria yesterday, at a conference of envoys from NATO and the European Union.

"In order to be credible, the Security Council of course has to act," Miss Rice said.

U.S. diplomats say they will renew efforts in the Security Council to secure a legally binding resolution demanding that Iran curtail enrichment activities.

Such a resolution could boost the IAEA recommendations to the force of international law and pave the way for military or economic measures.

Britain and France, who with Germany have been negotiating with Iran over the nuclear program for nearly three years, are supportive.

But Russia and China, which like Britain, France and the United States have veto powers in the Security Council, are reluctant to approve a legally binding resolution.

An exiled opposition group said Iran was working at secret military sites to develop a better type of centrifuge than the "P-1" machines at its Natanz enrichment plant, which would allow it to make fuel for an atomic bomb faster than current estimates.

The Paris-based National Council of Resistance of Iran, which has reported accurately on hidden Iranian nuclear sites in the past but whose claims could not be verified, said Iran was researching "P-2" centrifuges in secret areas of Natanz and a site near Tehran.

In New York, meanwhile, Iran's ambassador to the United Nations, Javad Zarif, said Tehran had offered a comprehensive package designed to allay fears about its nuclear production.

Rice Urges U.N. To Rebuke Iran For Nuclear Program (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

SOFIA, Bulgaria, April 27 – Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said today that the latest talks between United Nations monitors and Iranian envoys had apparently failed to break the impasse over Iran's nuclear activities and that the United Nations Security Council had no choice but to rebuke Iran.

"What is clear is that it is highly unlikely that Iran is going to accede to the demands of the international community," Ms. Rice said at the opening of a conference of envoys from NATO and the European Union. She added that "in order to be credible the Security Council of course has to act."

The United Nations' credibility is at stake, Ms. Rice said, and "it cannot have its word and its will completely ignored by a member state."

DOJ_NMG_0027412

Despite her tough words, it was far from clear whether Russia would drop its opposition to a resolution at the Security Council that would implicitly threaten sanctions. The United States wants a resolution criticizing Iran under Chapter 7 of the United Nations charter, a provision that implies that sanctions are possible if it is flouted.

Past opposition by Russia, China and others has forced the United States to back down from its demand for such a resolution, but now American and European diplomats hope that a new critical finding by the International Atomic Energy Agency will bolster support for the action it wants.

Such a report is expected Friday by the agency in Vienna. Iranian officials have been meeting with agency officials in the last few days, but they do not appear to have changed the situation, diplomats at the agency said.

Iran insists that its activities are for peaceful purposes only, and its leaders have kept up a steady volley of criticism of the United States, Europe and others suspecting it of having a weapons program, even while Iranian envoys have met with international atomic agency inspectors this week.

Ms. Rice arrived in Bulgaria Thursday afternoon after conferring with Iraqi leaders in Baghdad along with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. The occasion was a session of more than 30 envoys representing countries in both NATO, which is a military alliance, and the European Union, a political and economic body.

Though the issue of Iran was not on the formal agenda, it loomed over most other matters because of the escalating threats and Iran's defiance. Many in Europe are worried that the United States plans to carry out a military strike against Iran as it did against Iraq.

A Bulgarian journalist, citing the news that the United States and Bulgaria plan to sign a basing agreement on Friday allowing American forces to use military centers in this country, asked Ms. Rice if the agreement would require Bulgarian permission for any American troop deployment from such a base.

He did not mention Iran, but Ms. Rice felt compelled to assuage Bulgarian feelings by saying that the United States was still concentrating on getting a diplomatic or political solution to the Iran confrontation and did not contemplate military action. Any such action, she said, would be done in cooperation with Bulgaria, she said.

In a speech northwest of Tehran today, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was defiant, saying his country would not give up its right to pursue its nuclear activities, even if sanctions or other punitive measures are imposed.

"We want nuclear technology for peace and progress of nations and if some believe that they can prevent us with psychological warfare and resolutions, they are mistaken," Mr Ahmadinejad said in a speech in northwest Iran that was reported on the ISNA news agency.

"Our people have mastered the nuclear technology and no one can take it away from them," the president added.

Iran's supreme religious leader vowed Wednesday that Iran would retaliate "twofold" if it were attacked by the United States over its refusal to comply with demands regarding its nuclear activities.

"Iranian people and the Islamic regime will not invade any country, but the Americans should know that if they invade Iran, their interests around the world would be harmed," the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, told workers gathered ahead of May Day, the international workers' holiday.' "Iran will respond twofold to any attack."

Russia And China Warn UN Not To Antagonise Iran (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, April 28, 2006

Russia and China on Thursday warned against escalating the dispute over Iran's nuclear programme. The call came on the eve of an eagerly awaited report on whether the country has met United Nations demands.

The US and the European Union believe Friday's report by Mohamed El Baradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, will set the stage for a UN Security Council resolution, since there is little chance that Tehran will meet the council's demand for "full and sustained suspension" of uranium enrichment, which can produce weapons-grade material.

But on Thursday Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, warned against too great an intervention by the Security Council – a path Moscow feels could lead to confrontation.

"We think that the IAEA must continue to play a key role and it must not shrug off its responsibilities to resolve such questions and shift them on to the UN Security Council," he said at a summit with Angela Merkel, German chancellor.

European officials argue that, far from sidelining the IAEA, any action by the council would seek to bolster its authority.

The Chinese government also called for restraint. Moscow and Beijing, which have growing energy and economic links with Iran, fear that a UN resolution might be used to justify military action at a later stage.

The US has stepped up efforts to assuage such concerns. "Forcible change of the Iranian regime is not the objective of American policy," Philip Zelikow, a top adviser to US secretary of state Condoleezza Rice, told the Financial Times.

DOJ_NMG_0027413

"Right now, we haven't completed implementing a diplomatic strategy. That diplomatic strategy involves underscoring to the Iranian regime the costs of its behaviour."

US and EU diplomats hope to win Security Council backing for a resolution on Iran by mid-June. Such a resolution would not involve sanctions but would probably set out a new deadline for Iran to halt nuclear enrichment.

Mr ElBaradei has been pushing Iran for a "technical break" in uranium enrichment to allow negotiations over the nuclear programme to resume.

U.S. Looks To Turn Up Heat On Iran Nukes, But Question Is How (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, April 28, 2006

The Bush administration plans to increase pressure on Iran after today's United Nations-imposed deadline for the country to halt its uranium-enrichment program.

The diplomatic offensive could lead to limited sanctions, but there is little international consensus now for stronger measures.

The first step would be a binding resolution from the U.N. Security Council demanding that Iran end uranium enrichment, which the United States says is part of an effort to build a nuclear bomb. U.S. officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, say they will seek such a resolution next month.

Mohammed ElBaradei, the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, is to provide a report today to the Security Council that documents Iran's escalation of the uranium-enrichment program.

Iran has shown no sign of backing down. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Thursday that since Iran "has acquired nuclear fuel production technology … nobody can take it back." Iran claimed two weeks ago to have enriched uranium, a fuel that can be used for power plants or bombs. Iran says its intentions are peaceful.

There is little consensus about how to deal with Iran beyond the initial resolution. Russia and China, both of which hold veto power on the Security Council, have not yet said whether they would back even limited sanctions against Iran. "It's still too early to run ahead and say what decision we might take together," Russian President Vladimir Putin said Thursday.

Rice, in Bulgaria for a meeting with NATO foreign ministers, sidestepped questions about what Russia and China would do. "In order to be credible, the Security Council has to act," she said.

Britain, France and Germany have said they would support measures that targeted Iranian leaders.

For example, the United States and European nations might ask the Security Council to impose a ban on travel by top Iranian officials and to freeze their overseas bank accounts, said Nicholas Burns, the top U.S. diplomat dealing with the issue.

The United States might also work outside the United Nations and attempt to craft a coalition of countries to restrict arms sales and other trade and investment in Iran if the initial steps don't work. "If the Security Council cannot act over a reasonable period of time, then there will be an opportunity for groups of countries to organize themselves for the purpose of isolating the Iranians diplomatically and economically," Burns said.

The Bush administration and its European allies have ruled out broad economic restrictions that could hurt ordinary Iranians. Rice and Burns have drawn a contrast with the punishment meted out to Iraq after it invaded Kuwait in 1990. Those sanctions, which initially blocked Iraqi oil exports, were devastating to most Iraqis but left the regime of Saddam Hussein intact.

Burns said last week that U.N. diplomacy would unfold over several months. He said he expects Iran to be "the leading issue to be discussed" when the leaders of top industrialized democracies plus Russia meet in July.

The rising price of oil is complicating U.S. efforts to pressure Iran, said Cliff Kupchan, an Iran and Russia expert at the Eurasia Group, a political consulting firm based in New York.

Iran produces 4 million barrels of oil a day, about 5% of the world's total, Kupchan said. Europe and China fear that pressure on Iran will lead to higher energy prices, he said. Those fears would make them reluctant to support sanctions, he said.

"The Iranians are holding a very strong hand at the moment," Kupchan said.

Rice Calls On U.N. To Get Tough On Iran (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, April 28, 2006

SOFIA, Bulgaria — On the eve of a United Nations deadline for Iran to halt uranium enrichment, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Thursday called for diplomatic action against Tehran, warning that the U.N. Security Council cannot permit the regime to "simply ignore its will and its word."

Rice, appearing at a NATO meeting, said Iran probably would ignore a deadline set for today by the United Nations watchdog agency for a halt to enrichment. When the International Atomic Energy Agency reports this failure, she said, the council must ask itself whether it will remain credible if it allows Iran to "simply flout the will of the international community" without penalty.

DOJ_NMG_0027414

As the most important world security institution, the Security Council "cannot have its will and its word simply ignored by a member state," she declared.

Iran says it is seeking the ability to enrich uranium to supply its civilian power plants. The Bush administration believes Iran wants to develop nuclear weapons, and it has been trying to build international pressure on the regime as the deadline has approached.

The United States, Britain and France would like a U.N. resolution that would make compliance to the U.N. demands compulsory and could open the way for sanctions.

But countries such as Russia and China have appeared unwilling to accept tougher language, or sanctions against Iran, and top Iranian officials have defiantly declared all week that they will not comply.

Rice sought to enlist more support this week as she met with leaders in Greece and Turkey and, on Thursday, with top officials from the 26-member North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Though the alliance has taken no position on the issue, Rice discussed Iran's nuclear ambitions with officials of other NATO member nations over dinner.

But there have been signs all week that many countries are not fully convinced, and some fear that if diplomacy fails, the Bush administration will turn to military action, as it did three years ago in the case of Iraq.

Earlier in the week, Greek and Turkish officials told Rice that they were worried that the U.S. would be asking for use of their territory or other help in military action against Tehran. On Thursday, Rice sought to allay similar concerns that the Bush administration might cite a just-completed defense accord with Bulgaria to justify using military bases here for an attack on Iran.

"Let me go right to the heart of this question, because I know this is on people's minds," Rice said at a news conference. Although President Bush "doesn't take any of his options off the table," she said, referring to military action, "we are committed to a diplomatic course" to bring enough pressure on Iran to compel it to give up its nuclear weapons ambitions.

The agreement with Bulgaria, which is to be signed today, will allow the U.S. military to have as many as 2,500 troops at a time on Bulgarian soil. On Thursday, a Bulgarian national party called Attack organized a rally against the deal, drawing several thousand protesters in Sofia, the capital.

The demonstrators waved banners that read, "Condi, ask the Bulgarian people," and "U.S. bases war." Rice's visits in Athens and Ankara, Turkey's capital, also drew protesters.

Meanwhile, an Iranian exile group claimed that Tehran was working at secret military sites to develop a type of centrifuge machine that would enable it to make fuel for an atom bomb faster than current estimates.

The National Council of Resistance of Iran, which has reported accurately on hidden Iranian nuclear sites in the past, told Reuters news service that Tehran was researching "P-2" centrifuges in secret areas of its Natanz enrichment plant and the Ab-Ali site near Tehran. The group, which is on a U.S. list of terrorist groups, said both areas were linked to Iran's Defense Ministry. Tehran says its nuclear program is only for generating electricity and has no links to the military.

Germany Suggests U.S-Iran Nuclear Talks (AP)

By Paul Ames, Associated Press Writer

AP, April 28, 2006

Germany's foreign minister suggested Thursday that the United States and Iran could hold direct discussions on the Islamic republic's nuclear standoff with the West if Tehran agrees to talk to Washington about the chaos in Iraq.

The United States, which has no diplomatic relations with Iran, said in March that it was ready to talk to Tehran about calming the unrest in Iraq. Iranian and U.S. officials have insisted the talks will deal only with Iraq, and President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad this week questioned even the need for those discussions.

"If there are talks with Iran anyway on the situation in Iraq, then nobody would understand if the current central issue in world politics would not come up," German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, told reporters on the sidelines of a NATO meeting.

Steinmeier has suggested direct talks before, but the U.S. has not favored taking up the nuclear issue directly with Tehran, preferring to work through the United Nations.

European negotiations with Iran, led by Germany, France and Britain, have failed to persuade Iran to stop enriching uranium — which can be used to fuel peaceful reactors or make bombs — and meet other international demands.

The Iran question was not on the official agenda of the NATO foreign ministers' meeting, but, on the eve of a U.N. deadline for Tehran to halt enrichment, it was to be discussed at an informal dinner bringing together NATO and European Union nations.

"We have to do everything we can to stop the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction," said NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said before the meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0027415

The United States, France and Britain say if Iran does not meet Friday's U.N. Security Council deadline, they will seek to make the demand to halt enrichment compulsory — despite opposition from Russia and China, the other two veto-wielding council members. The three Western nations also have warned that noncompliance could lead to sanctions, but other allies are wary.

Steinmeier said he still hoped for a negotiated solution, but insisted Iran "must dissolve the suspicion that it uses its civil nuclear program for the development of weapons."

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov is due to join the NATO talks Friday, ahead of a scheduled presentation to the Security Council by Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, on Iran's compliance with its demands.

The opening session of the NATO meeting Thursday focused on bids by Ukraine, Georgia, Albania, Croatia and Macedonia to join the alliance. De Hoop Scheffer has said a final decision was unlikely before 2008.

Further expansion of the Western alliance in the former Soviet bloc would face opposition, which has complained that the entry of Ukraine and Georgia would be "highly painful" for Moscow, and could call international arms agreements into question and provoke a reorganization of Russia's armed forces.

Several thousand Bulgarians, meanwhile, joined an ultranationalist demonstration close to the NATO meeting against an agreement Rice is due to sign Friday with Bulgaria. It grants U.S. troops access to use military facilities in the country. The deal is part of a strategy of shifting troops to based in Europe farther east and will deploy up to 2,500 U.S. troops to Bulgaria.

Thursday's meeting also discussed proposals for NATO to develop closer ties with other democracies including Australia, Japan, New Zealand and South Korea to coordinate political positions and peacekeeping operations.

On Friday, Rice is expected to push NATO allies for more robust support for African peacekeepers struggling to end political and ethnic strife in Sudan's Darfur region. Ministers will also discuss the expanding NATO mission in Afghanistan, which is moving into the country's volatile southern region in the face of mounting attacks blamed on remnants of the ousted Taliban regime.

Rice Says U.N. Must Act On Iran Nuke Plan (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, April 28, 2006

Iran seems determined to defy international demands to control its disputed nuclear program, so it is time for the U.N. Security Council to act, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday.

"Is the Security Council going to be credible?" Rice asked after meetings with NATO foreign ministers.

Tehran faces a Friday deadline from the Security Council to stop enriching uranium, a process that can lead either to nuclear power for electricity or to development of weapons. "It's pretty clear Iran is not going to meet those requirements," Rice said. "When that happens the international community, represented by the Security Council, is going to have a choice."

Quick action by the council to impose economic or punitive sanctions seems remote because of splits among its members. The United States is pressing for a strong response and Rice wants such steps to remain an option.

The United States and European allies accuse Iran of hiding ambitions to build a bomb behind a legitimate energy program. Iran denies it but says it must retain control of sensitive nuclear technology, including uranium enrichment.

The United States has long sought the Security Council review now under way, but the powerful U.N. body is divided over what to do next.

Russia and China, both veto-wielding permanent members of the Security Council, oppose sanctions against Iran. The United States, France and Britain say if Tehran does not meet the deadline, they will make the enrichment demand and other conditions compulsory.

"In order to be credible the Security Council has to act," Rice told reporters at the NATO session. "The Security Council is the primary and most important institution for the maintenance of peace and stability and security and it cannot have its word and its will simply ignored by a member state."

U.S. diplomats are gauging support in Europe for another course: A network of independent sanctions and restrictions, such as a travel ban on Iranian leaders, that might persuade the clerical leadership to back down.

Many European countries have already indicated a willingness to take such measures on their own, such as asset seizures and potential export bans.

The U.S. already has a near total ban on economic and diplomatic contact with Iran, but European nations and Russia maintain broad ties. Russia is a major commercial partner of Tehran, including exporting its oil.

Earlier Thursday, Russian President Vladimir Putin said the Security Council should not assume responsibility for the Iranian nuclear issue.

DOJ_NMG_0027416

"It's still too early to run ahead and say what decision we might take together," he said. "The main thing is ... that whatever decision is taken is a consensus decision."

Rice was making the case for continued pressure as part of two days of meetings with European colleagues that followed her unannounced trip to Iraq this week. In Baghdad, Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld endorsed newly selected Iraqi leaders who the United States hopes can regain traction against a violent insurgency and spreading sectarian killings.

Rice tried to reassure Europeans that the United States is not planning military action against Iran.

"I have been talking with my colleagues around the world about the diplomatic agenda regarding Iran," Rice said. "The president of the United States doesn't take any of his options off the table but we are committed to a diplomatic course" that should succeed "with enough unity and with enough strength and enough common purpose."

Iran Gets First North Korean-Made Missiles (AP)

By Aron Heller

AP, April 27, 2006

Iran has received its first batch of North Korean-made surface-to-surface missiles that put European countries within firing range, Israel's military intelligence chief said in an interview published Thursday.

The BM-25 missiles have a range of 1,550 miles and are capable of carrying nuclear warheads, the Haaretz daily reported.

The report came as U.N. members consider slapping sanctions on Iran for refusing to halt its uranium enrichment. The United States, Israel and other Western countries say Iran is trying to get nuclear arms, but the Islamic regime says its atomic program is for civilian purposes only.

The U.N. Security Council has given Iran until Friday to stop enriching uranium, a necessary step for developing nuclear weapons. Should Iran refuse to comply, which it has indicated it will do, the Security Council is likely to consider taking punitive measures.

Israeli security officials confirmed the Haaretz report. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak to the media.

Military intelligence chief Maj. Gen. Amos Yadlin, who spoke to Haaretz, has warned of the new Iranian missiles in several recent interviews to the media. Iran already has missiles capable of reaching Israel, but the BM-25s are a significant upgrade over its existing top-of-the-line missiles — the Shihab-4 and Shihab-3.

Those missiles spurred Israel to develop its Arrow-2 anti-ballistic missile system, which is can intercept the Iranian missiles.

Israeli concerns have been heightened in recent months by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's calls to wipe Israel "off the map."

Iran has also tested several long-range missiles in recent weeks, including a "top secret" missile capable of being fired from helicopters and jet fighters, Iranian state-run television reported.

Iran also tested the Fajr-3, a missile it said can avoid radar and hit several targets simultaneously using multiple warheads. Iran also tested what it calls two new torpedoes.

U.S. intelligence officials have said that Iran is at an advanced stage of developing a missile that can carry a nuclear warhead. The United States has informed the International Atomic Energy Agency of the details of the Iranian missile program.

On Tuesday, an Israeli satellite meant to spy on Iran's nuclear program was launched by Russia. The satellite is designed to spot images on the ground as small as 27 1/2 inches, an Israeli defense official said.

Israel Raises Profile In Iran Fray (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, April 28, 2006

JERUSALEM - Amid the soaring rhetoric over Western efforts to curb Iran's nuclear program, Israel has been moving into a more proactive position in the campaign to contain Tehran.

This week, Israel launched a satellite to spy on Iran, and its leaders have called on the international community to stop that country from acquiring nuclear weapons. It also accused Tehran of backing Palestinian terrorists.

And as concern here grows over Iran's defiant nuclear drive, one of Israel's leading newspapers reported Thursday that Iran has purchased ground-to-ground missiles from North Korea, extending its range for delivering warheads.

"The Israelis are making a statement that Israel has its own ways and means of defending itself," says Meir Javedanfar, an Iranian-born Middle East analyst based in Tel Aviv.

Given the charged atmosphere in the region, many have questioned whether Israel, which maintains its own unofficial nuclear program, would make some kind of "preemptive strike" on Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0027417

In 1981, Israel struck the nuclear reactor Iraq was developing, known as Osirak. Though criticized at the time, Israeli officials say they were later thanked for neutralizing Iraq's nuclear capabilities.

Today, however, the Middle East is quite different, say analysts and officials here, and Iran's pursuit to enrich uranium, which it says is for peaceful purposes, is seen as an international issue, not a local one.

Somewhat akin to years of crisis over Iraq's weapons program, Israel has been encouraged to take a backseat in the standoff with Iran. In 1991, Israel complied with US requests not to respond to Iraqi missile attacks. Through quieter channels, however, Israel has long been making the case against an armed Iran.

But, analysts say, recent changes in the region have led to a more vocal Israel, from US frustration with Iran's meddling in Iraq to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's inflammatory statements - he calls for Israel to be destroyed and denies the Holocaust occurred.

"The Israeli government before the elections was taking a more moderate line. It was an uncertain period: Ariel Sharon was sick, elections were looming," says Mr. Javenanfar, the director of Meepas, a political analysis company. "[Prime Minister Ehud] Olmert feels more secure now and feels that the international community is standing by Israel. This wasn't so much the case during the intifada, but it's changing, particularly since Iran was given a 30-day period to stop uranium enrichment and they say they won't."

Those 30 days end Friday, the deadline for the International Atomic Energy Agency to submit its report on Iran to the UN Security Council. The report is expected to be highly critical of Iran for refusing the council's request to freeze uranium enrichment.

While Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev says Israel has no interest in a one-on-one confrontation with Iran, he says, "We do have clear concerns. We are supporting united, international efforts on this issue."

The launch of the Eros-B spy satellite by Israel Aircraft Industries on Tuesday, Mr. Regev says, is a part of a long-term intelligence effort that is not tied to recent tension. And some of the official statements made about Iran during the course of the week were issued as part of Holocaust Remembrance Day. It is a day when Israelis reflect on their survival, and this year conversations often turned to Ahmadinejad's threats from the east.

"I call on the Western world to not stand silently in the face of the nations that are trying to acquire nuclear weapons and [who] preach the destruction of the State of Israel," Israeli President Moshe Katsav said in his annual address at the country's main Holocaust museum and memorial, Yad Vashem.

On the same day, Israel's outgoing defense minister, Shaul Mofaz, said that Iran had given close to $10 million to "terror groups" operating in the Palestinian territories since the start of the year. He also suggested that more should be done to encourage the demise of the current regime.

"The Iranian people need to know that the regime's efforts to lead global terror will negatively affect them," Mr. Mofaz said at the opening of the Center for Iranian studies at Tel Aviv University. "More can be done from outside Iran to raise the Iranian people's awareness that the current regime will bring destruction on them." Both Mofaz and Katsav are Iranian-born Israelis.

Thursday's report in the newspaper Haaretz, which said that Iran had acquired a ground-to-ground missile with a range of about 1,560 miles was viewed here as fresh proof that Iran's atomic program is not simply aimed at creating nuclear energy for civilian uses.

"The problem is Tehran is not just a nuclear power, but that they're working on delivery systems," says Regev, of the Foreign Ministry. "With the parallel track on their delivery systems, we can see that their program is not benign."

Gary Sick, an expert on Iranian affairs at Columbia University School of International and Public Affairs, says that both the Iranians and Israelis have made statements recently that have turned up the heat to uncomfortable levels.

He aruges that the West's pursuit of a military option can only make things worse. "If there were a strike of some sort against Iran, it would certainly drive them underground, make them become more secretive, and they would drop out of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Iran will say, 'We weren't planning a bomb before, but now we have no choice,' " Dr. Sick says.

"What I do worry about in this whole process," he adds, "is that there will be some unexplained incident that happens deliberately or not deliberately, that will be perceived wrongly by one side or the other - that's how WWI got started."

Pakistan Official: No Force Against Iran (AP-)

By Barry Schweid

AP, April 27, 2006

Pakistan notified the Bush administration on Thursday it would not support the use of force to halt Iran's nuclear programs.

"We are against any resort to force," Foreign Secretary Riaz Khan said after a meeting with Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns.

"We want this issue resolved diplomatically," Khan said.

DOJ_NMG_0027418

Pakistan is a close ally of the United States in trying to counter terror and in promoting postwar stability in Afghanistan.

It is also a neighbor of Iran. "We want friendly relations with Iran. Pakistan has had a long-standing relationship with Iran," Khan said. "We wish them well, and all of our neighbors."

The U.S.-Pakistan meeting was designed to strengthen ties between the two countries in the wake of a U.S. decision to provide India with nuclear technology.

Burns said the Bush administration has good relations with both countries.

Responding at a joint news conference to Khan's statements on Iran, Burns said, "We have not given up hope there can be a diplomatic solution."

The Bush administration accuses Iran of trying to develop nuclear weapons. While President Bush has emphasized his preference for a diplomatic solution, he has also said the military option has not been taken off the table.

Meanwhile, Burns announced that Congress would be informed shortly that the United States intends to proceed with the sale of F-16 fighter jets to Pakistan. Congressional approval is required.

Khan said he did not know how many planes Pakistan would purchase. But he said due to strained resources following a devastating earthquake last year, Pakistan had scaled down its request and that used planes would be substituted for some of the new ones.

India, which depends on aging Russian planes for its air force, has expressed disappointment with the long-brewing weapons sale to Pakistan.

The two nuclear-armed neighbor countries have been rivals for decades, and have fought three wars since their independence from Britain in 1947.

Iran's Latest (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, April 28, 2006

A funny thing happened on the way to the Iranian bomb: The more alarming the mullahs' behavior, the more nonchalant the rest of the world seems to be about it. But one development may give even the most adamant pooh-poohers pause.

Just this month, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad announced that Iran had enriched uranium to reactor-grade levels in a 164-centrifuge cascade, a major technical achievement that puts Iran within hopping distance of an actual bomb. Mr. Ahmadinejad followed this up by announcing that Iran was working on an advanced centrifuge of Pakistani design, the possession of which Iran had previously denied to inspectors of the International Atomic Energy Agency. These centrifuges are capable of enriching uranium at four times the rate of Iran's declared centrifuges.

Next, Iran rebuffed IAEA requests to inspect the new centrifuges, a violation of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty to which Iran is a signatory. Iran then threatened to withdraw from the NPT altogether if the United Nations imposed sanctions for its violations thereof. The U.N. Security Council has imposed a deadline of today for Iran to stop enriching uranium.

Tehran states flatly that it will ignore it. Israeli intelligence also reports this week that Iran has purchased an upgraded version of the Soviet SS-6 ballistic missile from North Korea, which is capable of carrying a nuclear payload and has a range of about 1,600 miles, putting parts of Europe well within range. The threat seems all the more pressing following warnings Wednesday by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's Supreme Leader, that Iran would attack U.S. interests "in every possible part of the world" if the U.S. launches air strikes against Iran's nuclear sites.

And the international community's response? Russia and China, both veto-wielding members of the Security Council, are adamantly opposed to U.N. sanctions on Iran. Their view is mainly shared by Richard Lugar, Chairman of the Senate Foreign Committee, who thinks President Bush "ought to cool this one" by negotiating directly with Tehran.

In Europe, British Foreign Minister Jack Straw has reportedly told Cabinet colleagues that it would be "illegal" for Britain to participate in any prospective military action against Iran. German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier agrees: "We will not stop Iran with war," he recently told the news weekly Der Spiegel.

Which brings us to Iran's latest. On Tuesday, the Associated Press reported that Mr. Khamenei offered to share the nuclear genie with the government of Sudan. "The Islamic Republic of Iran is prepared to transfer the experience, knowledge and technology of its scientists," Mr. Khamenei told visiting Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir. Mr. Bashir, whose government abets the massacre of Darfuris, says Sudan could use a nuclear reactor to generate electricity. Uh huh.

How so many apparently thoughtful people can face the idea of an Iranian bomb with relative equanimity remains a mystery to us. Whether they are as "cool" with the idea of fissile material in Mr. Bashir's hands is another matter. Whatever the case, they should consider that acquiescing to a bomb for Iran may also mean agreeing to one for many more of the world's worst actors.

NATO To Intensify Its Role In Sudan's Darfur Region (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0027419

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

SOFIA, Bulgaria -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday that NATO leaders have agreed to take on a more "robust" role in Sudan's Darfur region and urged other international bodies to prepare the way.

NATO diplomats said that earlier disagreements among the allies over involvement in Darfur had been resolved, but impediments remained, such as the Sudanese government's objection to a U.N. peacekeeping mission.

"Everybody recognizes that the [African Union] mission, while it has been successful thus far, is not robust enough to deal with the continued violence in Darfur and, particularly, problems that are emerging in western Darfur given the situation and problems on the border with Chad," Miss Rice said.

In Washington, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said, "An unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security and foreign policy of the United States is posed by the persistence of violence in Sudan's Darfur region, particularly against civilians."

Miss Rice, speaking to reporters after a meeting of the 26 NATO foreign ministers in Sofia, the Bulgarian capital, said that "NATO is ready to work" with the United Nations and the African Union (AU) "to try to bring about that more robust mission."

"There are certain kinds of support that are needed by [the AU] mission and that will be needed by the U.N. mission, and I would hope that everyone would put aside whatever constraints there are, so that we can respond to what is a really quite difficult humanitarian and security situation in Darfur," she said.

NATO currently provides limited assistance for the AU with transportation of troops, but U.S. officials said the alliance could help with logistics, communications, intelligence and other areas, while stopping short of intervening on the ground.

A senior U.S. official said that NATO would be "enabling collaborative efforts" of other international players and cannot do much before they make the first steps.

"We have to be able to get into Sudan," the official said, alluding to Sudan's refusal to let U.N. peacekeepers in.

Hedi Annabi, U.N. assistant secretary-general for peacekeeping, said yesterday that, even though Sudan is not in favor of a U.N. takeover from the AU, it is willing to discuss how the world organization could help if a peace deal is reached to end the conflict.

The 7,000 AU troops in Darfur are poorly equipped and have not been able to stop the violence that has taken hundreds of thousands of lives and forced more than 2 million to leave their homes.

The AU Peace and Security Council has agreed in principle to hand over peacekeeping to the United Nations after its mandate ends Sept. 30, but the full union must give final approval.

On Tuesday, the U.N. Security Council adopted a resolution imposing sanctions on individuals deemed at least partly responsible for the Darfur crisis.

Sudan has supported Janjaweed militias, which are massacring innocents in response to a revolt by two militias in its western region.

As part of the resolution's implementation, President Bush yesterday issued an executive order freezing the assets of such individuals.

"These sanctions are aimed at those responsible for heinous actions being committed in Darfur," Mr. McClellan said.

"The United States will continue to work with its international partners to provide humanitarian assistance, support human rights and bring peace to Darfur."

The crisis has forced Chad to seal its border with Darfur, which is threatening food deliveries to 400,000 displaced people.

Rebels' Arms Made In China (WT)

By Daniel Pepper

The Washington Times, April 28, 2006

ALONG THE CHAD-SUDAN BORDER -- Many of the weapons used by Chadian rebels who nearly overthrew the government this month -- from the ubiquitous Kalashnikov rifles and rocket-propelled grenades to more advanced artillery pieces mounted on Toyota Land Cruisers -- come from China, probably indirectly through Sudan.

Chadian President Idriss Deby and international relief groups were quick to accuse Sudan of promoting the attack two weeks ago on the capital, N'Djamena, by about 350 rebels, who fought to within a few miles of the city before being turned back. But China's insatiable appetite for oil to feed its economic growth gave Beijing an interest in the outcome as well.

The Chadian rebels' weapons, viewed by a reporter during a rare visit to their bases along the 800-mile Chad-Sudan border, were traced to Chinese state-owned arms manufacturers, with the aid of an arms-monitoring-group based in Manchester, England, that used a sampling of serial numbers on the munitions.

DOJ_NMG_0027420

"Chinese firms from the People's Republic [of China] have been providing a range of large and small arms to African armed forces regardless of their persistent grave human rights violations, especially to countries with oil deposits, such as Sudan, or valuable natural resources, such as Liberia," said Brian Wood, the head of arms research at Amnesty International. "Rebel groups in Africa have also received Chinese arms, for example, in Angola and" the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

According to the Chinese government's regulations governing arms exports, any sales to foreign countries must "not upset regional or global peace, security and stability" and "must be for the legitimate self-defense of the recipient country." The acquisition of these weapons by the Chadian rebels contravenes both criteria.

An official at China's arms-control department referred all questions to a spokesman who did not return phone calls.

China is one of the largest suppliers of arms to Sudan, Africa's largest country, which has tense relations with Chad. And China is heavily invested in Sudan's oil sector, with more than 10,000 workers and $3 billion spent on its oil sector since 1999.

Relations between Chad and Sudan have been soured in part by the Chadian president's provision since 2003 of arms, ammunition and safe passage through Chad for the Sudan Liberation Army and other rebels fighting in Sudan's Darfur region. The Sudanese government appears to be retaliating by providing similar aid to the Chadian rebels.

Chad, besides being last on Transparency International's 2005 corruption index, is Africa's newest petro-state, with proven recoverable oil reserves estimated at about 1 billion barrels. But China, whose thirst for oil has made it a presence in Sudan and other African oil states, so far lacks a foothold in Chad. Chad maintains diplomatic relations with the Republic of China, or Taiwan, which Beijing considers part of China.

It does have a relationship, however, with the leader of the Chadian rebels, Muhammad Nour, who worked as a consultant to various Chinese oil companies exploring business opportunities in West Africa in the 1990s, and maintains close relations with his former clients, whom he will not identify. Mr. Nour's brother, a close adviser, recently returned from a three-week trip to China, which he said was "for health purposes."

In an interview at his military encampment set along a dry riverbed near the border, Mr. Nour rejected the notion that his fighting force had any direct relationship with China.

"There is no relationship between us and the Chinese state. But they are being prudent," the rebel leader said.

Joshua Eisenman, a fellow in Asia studies at the American Foreign Policy Council, said China could be driven by its rivalry with Taiwan for friendly votes at the United Nations and other international organizations.

"China will encourage and seize any homegrown opportunity to further isolate Taiwan in Africa," he said. "I doubt Beijing would seek to topple a government just to undermine Taiwan; but if a Taiwan-friendly African government falls, it's icing on the cake for Beijing."

Conflict Stirs Up Confusion On Border Of Chad, Sudan (WP)

By Emily Wax

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

KOUKOU ANGARANA, Chad -- In this desolate, sand-blown desert region of Chad near the Sudanese border, civilians are caught in a conflict so confusing that they -- and even the combatants -- have trouble telling who is fighting whom.

Or exactly why.

Chadian government troops are posted at key points along the border to halt what they say is a revolt by rebels based in Sudan. The soldiers wear red armbands to set them apart from the rebels, who wear similar uniforms and have an equally aggressive driving style, roaring through villages in pickup trucks, leaving behind clouds of billowing dust.

The insurgents, who are fighting to topple Chadian President Idriss Deby, represent at least 12 groups united under several coalitions. To make matters even more dizzying, some of them are Deby's estranged relatives, including a set of twin nephews.

Chad blames the Sudanese, saying they back the insurrection, an allegation that Sudan denies. An African Union investigation found this week that many of the captured attackers who invaded the capital April 13 had Sudanese and Central African Republic identification and said they were conscripted to fight by Sudan, which Sudan denies.

Sudan blames the Chadians, saying they support a different group of rebels in the Darfur region of western Sudan, some of whom have offices and villas in Chad's capital, N'Djamena.

And Chadians tend to blame France, Chad's former colonial power, which they accuse of being involved in the violence by backing the president.

Here in the inhospitable, rugged and lunar-like terrain of eastern Chad, where refugees huddle under thorn trees, two things are certain: The chaos in Darfur has extended deep into Chad, and a rapidly increasing number of civilians continue to suffer in one of Africa's most complex crises.

DOJ_NMG_0027421

Across Africa, conflicts tend to spill across national borders and destabilize entire regions. Fighting in the central African country of Congo, for example, has flared off and on for about a decade, at times drawing in more than a dozen rebel groups backed by several neighboring countries.

Rebels in northern Uganda have been backed by Sudan as payback for Uganda's support of rebels in southern Sudan who were fighting the Sudanese government. The war in the 1990s in Sierra Leone spread into Liberia and Ivory Coast.

"For me, Darfur has become like West Africa and eastern Congo, where the war is exported and the region is inflamed and flowing over borders," said Olivier Bercault, a researcher with Human Rights Watch who was visiting N'Djamena this week. "It's just very sad for the civilians caught up in it all."

About two weeks ago, rebels drove across the vast desert toward N'Djamena. A French warplane fired warning shots at the rebels on April 13 as they marched into the city, where government troops thwarted the coup attempt. By the end of the day, more than 350 people were dead.

In Koukou Angarana, about 50 miles from the Sudanese border, witnesses said the rebels briefly stopped in the trading town on their way to the capital, killing one police officer and injuring two others. The rebels kidnapped 12 police officers and forestry service workers, local leaders said, and demanded satellite phones from U.N. workers.

The raid stunned the townspeople, who in recent months have been attacked by what they believed were Janjaweed, or militiamen backed by the Sudanese government.

"Were these rebels Chadians? Were they Janjaweed?" said Ibrahum Abdul Majaid, who witnessed the violence. "Maybe they were hired by the Sudanese government."

"There was also a Libyan, perhaps just a mercenary," added Philomena Santoro, who works for INTERSOS, an Italian humanitarian group that provides water and food to the refugee camps in the area. "Then again, maybe some of them were just bandits. We have a lot of that here in the lawless border, too."

The violence in Darfur has displaced more than 2 million civilians and forced nearly 250,000 into Chad. Tens of thousands of people have died in the conflict.

While the Bush administration labeled the atrocities in Darfur a genocide nearly two years ago, no solution has been found to stem the violence, an example of the world's inability to solve such crises, experts and human rights activists said.

The United States has proposed sending several hundred NATO advisers to support an African Union peacekeeping mission in Darfur. Sudan has rejected the idea as a Western invasion of a Muslim country, and some leaders have likened the scenario to the situation in Iraq. On Sunday, Osama bin Laden called for an Islamic holy war in Sudan, saying fighters should rise up against a Western peacekeeping force that would be sent to Darfur to protect African Muslims against government-backed Arab and Muslim fighters.

The U.S. ambassador to Chad, Marc M. Wall, visited this border town Wednesday to reassure the population of the U.S. commitment to protecting them and to deciphering the situation. Chadian military officials told Wall that some of the rebels who drove through the town last week wore Sudanese government uniforms and did not speak French, as Chadians do.

"Information of aid, indirect or direct, by Sudan is troubling to us," Wall told a group of local leaders, adding that the situation was "fragile and dangerous."

Many Chadians helped shelter Sudanese refugees, but the violence has pushed about 60,000 Chadians off their farms.

The devastation and suffering were in full view for Wall as he walked through the sand past a long row of thorn trees where Chadian women and children were living in the open air. Teapots hung from branches, and sweaty infants with blank stares sat in the sand in the hot sun.

"We are so confused. Who is rebel? Who is Janjaweed?" said Halima Mohamed, 25, a displaced Chadian, who was cradling a relative's baby under a tree with other women forced from their village five miles from the Sudanese border. "It's all mixed. Sudan's troubles have come here. We don't know when it will end. I don't feel safe."

Humanitarian workers from the Office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees said some of the Chadians want to live in the refugee camps. But because they are displaced people in their own country, they cannot be classified as refugees.

"If it wasn't totally out of control before, it certainly is now," Matthew Conway, a UNHCR spokesman, said as he looked at a group of Chadians living under trees. "There are many who have been seriously attacked. There is also a very poor population who may come in and want even a bowl or a plastic mat or bucket to help improve their lives."

Meanwhile, the Sudanese refugees, whose villages were burned when the Darfur conflict began, wonder where they can go next.

"What are we going to do now?" asked Fatih Younis Haroon, 39, a former clerk who fled Darfur two years ago with his five children.

While the civilians languish in misery, the war has entered the digital revolution. Rebels prefer a text message 15 minutes before arranging a satellite phone interview, and their plans are posted on a Web site in French.

DOJ_NMG_0027422

The rebel commanders issue orders from satellite phones in Sudan, while the high-ranking leaders dash off daily e-mails from hideaways in Paris. One of Deby's nephews, Tom Erdimi, who had a falling out with the president last year, organizes a separate rebel movement from his house in Texas.

Chadian human rights groups say Deby is using the rebel attack to distract attention from serious domestic issues of corruption and desperate poverty. In an interview at his campaign headquarters, the president said the word "rebel" should not be used to characterize his opponents.

"Sudan mercenaries are what they are," he said. "There is not a rebellion in Chad. This is an invasion by Sudan."

Deby, who is seeking to extend his 16-year rule in elections May 3, said Chad was not experiencing any internal problems and denied any disputes within his family. "Sudan wants to export its fundamentalism and genocide to Chad and the whole of central Africa," he said.

Rebel leaders acknowledge that they are operating from Darfur. Some of the rebels arrested after their coup attempt told African Union investigators Sunday that one of the main Chadian rebel leaders, Mahamat Nour, an ex-army captain, was recruiting young boys from refugee camps in Darfur and fighters from Central African Republic.

"The Sudanese do not disturb us," Albissaty Saleh Allazam, a spokesman for an umbrella rebel group, wrote in an e-mail. "Because Sudan lost assurance in Deby who created part of the conflict of Darfur. In a word, Sudan chose neutrality. If neutrality means support, so, Sudan backed us."

The villagers along the border worry that the rebels, the Janjaweed, bandits or mercenaries will attack again, but they say their village has always been vulnerable to such violence. Koukou Angarana, translated loosely, means, "Your grandmother is telling you to watch out, take care." The border between Sudan and Chad, they say, is a very dangerous place.

Blowback In Africa (NYT)

By Raffi Khatchadourian

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

EVER since Chad gained independence 46 years ago, it has been a world-class model of political dysfunction. In the 1970's, Chad's president, François Tombalbaye, compelled civil servants to renounce Western customs, undergo a tribal initiation rite known as yondo and profess belief in a nationalist creed he called Chaditude. He was executed in 1975. In the 1980's, a rebel leader named Hissène Habré led an army to the presidential palace and seized power. He became known as the "African Pinochet" and murderously pursued opponents for nearly a decade.

In 1990, Mr. Habré was chased out by an armed faction led by Chad's current president, Idriss Déby. Now Mr. Déby is facing his own rebellion.

Americans might dismiss this numbing cycle of coups as esoteric history belonging to a troubled and distant country. They shouldn't. The C.I.A. armed Mr. Habré for years, and since 2003, the United States military has been training and equipping Mr. Déby's army, making his fight to stay in office our fight, too.

Last year, Chad took part in a vast, international military exercise organized by the United States — the largest exercise of its kind in Africa since World War II, according to the Defense Department. This summer, American forces will continue to advise Chadian soldiers, and Congress is expected to allocate $500 million for a five-year program to train and equip several Saharan armies — including Mr. Déby's.

The military hopes these initiatives will help contain the threat of terrorism by bringing order to the Great Desert and its borderlands. For centuries, the Sahara has been a lawless realm, and with millions of Muslims living across the region in isolated communities, counterterrorism officials fear that Islamic militants may seek sanctuary there.

But dispensing military aid to Chad now — with Mr. Déby fighting hundreds of rebels backed by Sudan — seems reckless. It puts American military equipment and expertise in the hands of a desperate dictator. Worse still, it risks pouring additional fuel into the human furnace of Darfur, and it may well come to impede the careful diplomatic work required to solve that crisis.

So far, American officials have made much of Sudanese assistance to the rebels, framing the recent conflict in Chad as an outgrowth of the tragedy in Darfur. There is some truth to this. But the violence in Chad also has its own political narrative. During his 16 years in power, Mr. Déby has ruled Chad brutally. His security forces have committed torture, rapes, summary executions and mass killings.

Mr. Déby is a member of the Zaghawa — a northern tribe making up roughly 5 percent of Chad's population — and last year the State Department described his regime as a Zaghawa oligarchy shielded by a security and intelligence apparatus that violates human rights with impunity. In 2004, Mr. Déby altered Chad's Constitution to grant himself another term in office. Elections are scheduled for next Wednesday. There is little likelihood they will be fair.

DOJ_NMG_0027423

Only one compelling argument exists for giving Chad military aid, and it follows from the logic of lesser evils. Many of the refugees fleeing Darfur are Zaghawa, and Mr. Déby has taken them in. If his regime collapses, tens of thousands of people will once again be at the mercy of Sudan's janjaweed marauders, and the genocide may spread.

This argument, though, is complicated by another unsettling development. In recent months, scores of Chadian soldiers have defected to the rebel militias. If the defections continue, they raise the horrific possibility that American military equipment and expertise could end up going to men aligned with the janjaweed. In that case, our military assistance to Chad, far from containing political anarchy, would only add to it.

Opposition Leader In Belarus Jailed Over Rally Against President (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

New York Times, April 28, 2006

MOSCOW, April 27 — The authorities in Belarus arrested the country's main opposition leader on Thursday and swiftly sentenced him to 15 days behind bars, accusing him of participating in an unauthorized rally the day before against President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko.

The arrest of the opposition leader, Aleksandr Milinkevich, who challenged Mr. Lukashenko in the presidential election last month, intensified a crackdown on political opponents in the wake of unusually strong public protests against a vote denounced as a fraud. Mr. Milinkevich, 57, a former physics professor, had been warned many times but until now had not been imprisoned.

Another opposition politician, Vintsuk Vyachorka of the Belarussian National Front, was arrested Wednesday after thousands rallied on the 20th anniversary of the accident at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant, which sent radioactive waste across Belarus. The date has in recent years been marked in Belarus by protests against Mr. Lukashenko's authoritarian rule.

Two other political leaders, Sergei Kalyakin of the Communist Party and Aleksandr I. Bukhvostov of the Labor Party, were arrested Thursday in what appeared to be a sweep against Mr. Lukashenko's critics.

The European Union and the United States have sharply criticized the postelection arrests. Each has imposed travel restrictions on Mr. Lukashenko and on 30 other officials in retaliation for what Western officials called electoral fraud and subsequent repressive measures against the opposition.

In Sofia, Bulgaria's capital, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice assailed the arrest of Mr. Milinkevich as "reprehensible," saying that "the United States roundly condemns this act and sincerely hopes that the Belarus government accepts the will of the international community that it act in accordance with accepted international principles in the treatment of political opposition."

The NATO secretary general, Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, condemned the arrest as antidemocratic on behalf of the NATO and European Union envoys meeting in Sofia. He called on the government of Belarus to release Mr. Milinkevich immediately "and to refrain from these kinds of actions."

"I think the Euro-Atlantic community cannot accept these kinds of things in the heart of Europe," he said.

A senior State Department official said in a telephone interview that the United States and the European Union were preparing additional punitive measures, including financial penalties against Mr. Lukashenko and others. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of department protocol, called the latest wave of arrests "a last gasp effort to maintain control over things."

But Andrei Sannikov, a leader of the human rights organization Charter 97, said the arrests underscored Mr. Lukashenko's defiance.

"He's challenging Europe," Mr. Sannikov said via telephone from Minsk. "He's saying you can make whatever statements you want, and he will do whatever he wants."

Mr. Milinkevich finished the election a distant second, with 6 percent of the vote, compared with 82 percent for Mr. Lukashenko, according to the government's announced results, which have met skepticism at home and abroad. The election prompted protests, centered on an encampment on October Square, which the police broke up five days later.

Melee In Cairo Reveals Stress In Government (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, April 28, 2006

CAIRO, April 27 — Thousands of riot police officers sealed off access to the High Court on Thursday, beating and arresting protesters who had turned out to support two judges facing a disciplinary panel because they had accused the government of election fraud.

The huge show of force, appearing larger even than what was deployed in the Sinai after four bombings there this week, seemed to signal that President Hosni Mubarak's government had reached a breaking point over shows of dissent.

DOJ_NMG_0027424

The focus was a relatively small demonstration over the treatment of the two judges and in support of more than 80 others who had been staging a sit-in for more than a week at the stately old Judges Club to demand an independent judiciary.

The persistent demands by the group, who represent thousands of judges across the country, has united a wide swath of political opposition and has sparked new life in a reform movement that had withered after the presidential election in September.

Since then the government has increasingly retrenched from a position of generally allowing more political freedom.

By Thursday, after days of dealing with the attacks in the Sinai and low-intensity clashes between the police and protesters in Cairo, the government seemed overwhelmed.

Around 8 a.m., massive green troop carriers rumbled into the center of the city and deployed more than 3,000 troops, a number that swelled to about 10,000 by midday, according to witnesses and videotapes.

The army of riot officers pressed in with long wooden poles and body-length shields to seal off the judges from a relatively small group of supporters on the street. Eyewitnesses said at least 50 demonstrators were arrested, though there was no way to verify that.

The police also arrested a journalist for the television network Al Jazeera who had reported — incorrectly — that an insurgent attack on the police had spread into the previously calm delta region, a report that instantly caused a tumult in the capital.

The network retracted the report, but the government held the newsman, saying he was guilty of "spreading confusion."

The demonstrators had gathered especially to support Mahmoud Mekky and Hesham Bastawisi, the two judges brought before the disciplinary panel because they had accused the government and other judges of forgery in connection with the last parliamentary elections. Their case was postponed for two weeks while the panel considered several defense motions.

The authorities also lifted the judicial immunity of seven judges who had complained about fraud in past elections, paving the way for those judges to be questioned by the police.

"I am so happy that they are doing this to us, because it proved that they are the ones that people want to try, not us," Judge Bastawisi said Thursday after his appearance in court. "It is not us that are going to court, but it is the ruling regime, and they already got the verdict from the people."

In a Labor Day speech on Thursday to workers gathered in a conference hall in Cairo, President Mubarak portrayed the dispute with the judges as an intramural matter, not involving the government.

"I tell the judges who make up Egypt's proud judiciary that you are the guardian of justice and protector of the law," he said. "I hope you reach among yourselves a just conclusion that preserves the high interest of the homeland and improves what we are already seeking: an independent judiciary, as well as your prestigious status in our hearts."

But the president's words did little to soften the government's treatment of the protesters.

"It is an indicator the system is breaking down," said Rajia Amran, a lawyer who turned out Thursday to support the judges and described their cause as "the last bastion of freedom in this country."

"They are panicking; they are in the dark and don't know what to do."

Youssef Rashwan, a technician in an iron and steel factory, said he came out "to support the judges in their honorable stance."

"Look how the regime treats the civil peaceful opposition," he said. "No wonder that people blow themselves up. There is no way to go because the security treats all opposition the same way, just oppression."

There are 9,000 judges in Egypt, and an estimated 7,000 have joined forces to press the government for a new law that, they argue, will allow them to be independent.

Those leading the fight, including some of Egypt's most senior jurists, have been pressing the government since 1991 to ensure that judges are free from government pressure.

They say the minister of justice, who is appointed by President Mubarak, can threaten, intimidate and punish those who challenge the will of the government — an accusation that government officials deny.

But the tension reached a new level about a year ago when the judges began demanding that they have the sole right to monitor elections. They complain that even though judges watch polling sites, government appointees tally votes.

"It is enough that for the past 52 years, we have been carrying the liability of rigging the elections in this country," Zakariya Ahmed Abdel Aziz, chairman of the Judges Club, said at a meeting in August.

Ghada Shahbandar, leader of an electoral monitoring group, said: "We can not aspire to have reform without an independent judiciary. It is the first and most important block in the reform process."

After the parliamentary elections ended in December, a group of judges leveled accusations of forgery and fraud, and for that they were chosen for discipline and investigation. The move was approved by senior members of a judicial panel at the recommendation of the minister of justice, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0027425

Mahmoud al-Khudeiry, head of the Judges Club in Alexandria, was one of the seven who had his judicial immunity lifted and is now facing the prospect of police interrogation.

He has served on the bench for 43 years and said he had not seen such antagonism between the bench and the executive since the 1960's, when Nasser staged what is known as the Judges' Massacre by firing jurists who did not bend to his pressure.

"We don't know how it will end or where it will end," Mr. Khudeiry said Monday, as he greeted supporters who came to the Judges Club. "All we know is, we insist on our demands and we persist in our way until we achieve our demands."

Mubarak Vs. A Dissenting Judiciary (WP)

By Daniel Williams

The Washington Post, April 28, 2006

CAIRO, April 27 -- Thousands of police surrounded the stately square building on Abdel Khaleq Tharwat Street downtown Thursday, while up on the balcony a group of bespectacled judges stood in protest, cellphones trilling in their hands.

The place was the Judges Club, a palatial gathering spot for jurists that is outfitted with giant chandeliers and gilt-framed mirrors. This week, it was the scene of sit-ins against the 25-year rule of President Hosni Mubarak.

The police sealed off the Judges Club as well as the High Court building where two magistrates are being prosecuted for denouncing fraud in a series of elections last year. The show of force was impressive: The number of black-clad, helmeted officers on the street was far larger than during a series of small anti-Mubarak demonstrations last year. Several demonstrators who dared brave the massive cordon were hustled into detention.

Abdel Khaleq Tharwat Street is the latest battleground in the government's campaign against pro-democracy dissidents. The targets this time are judges who are battling to free the bench from what they say is Mubarak's control.

For the judges, Exhibit A of government interference and harassment is the case of the two magistrates, Hesham Bastawisi and Mahmoud Mekky.

The two men appeared at a hearing Thursday in which they faced disciplinary charges of insulting the judiciary for saying that fellow judges, handpicked by the government to monitor the elections, failed to stop or even denounce vote-rigging. They had set up an independent committee to observe the elections and take complaints.

The court session Thursday was brief, and the magistrates were ordered to appear again May 11. They face being removed from the judiciary.

"The government wants to block the independence of the judiciary," said Nasser Amin, a human rights activist who promotes judicial reform. "Judges are speaking out against arbitrary laws and repression of individuals, and so the authorities feel they must stop them."

Many Egyptians regard judges as a potential counterbalance to the near-absolute presidential powers in Egypt, Amin said.

On Wednesday evening, police broke up a demonstration that had gone on for nine days across from the Judges Club. They hauled off protesters who were chanting, "God grant the judges strength to resist" and "Down with Hosni Mubarak."

At one point, a one-legged man on crutches charged the police, yelling, "Away with the tyrant!" He lost his grip on the crutches but nonetheless twirled around and around shouting epithets.

Since the parliamentary elections last year that Mubarak's party won handily, his government has taken the offensive against some of its harshest critics and political rivals.

Though under pressure from the United States to democratize, the government imprisoned Ayman Nour, the distant second-place finisher in the presidential vote last year, on charges of falsifying official documents. Two journalists have been jailed for "defaming" government officials. On Thursday, a reporter from al-Jazeera television who was working in Dahab, the scene of bombings Monday that killed at least 18 civilians, was detained for broadcasting "false information likely to harm the country's reputation."

The government has renewed roundups of members of the Muslim Brotherhood, a formally banned Islamic group that has become the only large, well-organized political opposition in Egypt. Mubarak postponed municipal elections for two years, a move that opposition activists said was designed to head off Brotherhood candidacies.

The president also has hinted that he would extend emergency laws in place since 1981 that curb free speech and political activities.

Judges resisted government requests to supervise the recent elections, as required by law. Dissenting magistrates, asserting that the eventual observers were handpicked and biased, issued a report that was publicized on pan-Arab television.

"We're insisting that the elections were flawed. The government can't stand that because people will believe us and not them," said Bastawisi, a 29-year court veteran and currently an appeals court judge.

DOJ_NMG_0027426

This was not the first time Bastawisi has participated in an electoral protest. In 1985, he and other judges condemned fraud, without effect. Last year, he said, some judges were complicit in the fraud -- statements of the sort that have landed him in court. "I don't care," he said in an interview. "At this point, cooperating with the state is a crime."

Bastawisi noted that the parliamentary elections featured police blockades of polling stations and that 11 people who tried to break through the cordons were killed. "The people responsible for this should be put on trial. Instead, we are attacked."

DOJ_NMG_0027427

Letter, Douglas (CIV)

From: Letter, Douglas (CIV)
Sent: Friday, April 28, 2006 3:15 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Out of Office AutoReply: Omar

Douglas Letter is away from the office on travel; he will return on the morning of Monday, May 1, 2006. He should be able to retrieve email and voicemail messages while he is away. If you need immediate assistance with a matter, please contact Michael Singer (202 514 5432) of the Civil Division Appellate Staff. Thank you.

DorosinJL@state.gov

From: DorosinJL@state.gov
Sent: Friday, April 28, 2006 3:16 PM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: Out of Office AutoReply: Omar

Friday, April 28: I am out of the office today For immediate assistance, please call e-mail the L/PM collective or call (202) 647-7838.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent: Friday, April 28, 2006 7:09 PM
To: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject: DOJ Daily News Wrap

PUBLIC AFFAIRS DAILY NEWS WRAP
April 28, 2006

Contact: Brian Roehrkasse, Deputy Director, Office of Public Affairs (202) 514-2007

TOMORROW'S EXPECTED NEWS STORIES:

Moussaoui Trial
Jurors in the death penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui adjourned on Friday without reaching a verdict and will return on Monday to deliberate in the only U.S. case related to the Sept. 11 attacks. The jury of nine men and three women has been deliberating for about 21 hours since Monday afternoon. Earlier on Friday, one juror was admonished by U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema for looking up the word "aggravating" in the dictionary, but the judge said it would not impact deliberations.

The Government's Filing in Hepting, et al. v. AT&T
Today (April 28), the government filed a Statement of Interest in Hepting, et al. v. AT&T, Civil Action No. 06-672 (N.D. Cal.) (VRW), advising the Court that the United States intends to (1) assert a claim of the military and state secrets privilege, and (2) move to intervene in the action to seek dismissal of the case. The state secrets assertion and motion to dismiss will be made in subsequent filings in the next few weeks.

Talking Points:

- The plaintiffs in Hepting allege that AT&T has assisted the National Security Agency with various alleged surveillance activities. The fact that the United States is going to assert the state secrets privilege should not be construed as a confirmation or denial of any of plaintiffs' allegations, either about AT&T or the alleged activities. Rather, when allegations are made about purported classified government activities or relationships, regardless of whether those allegations are accurate, the existence or non-existence of the activity or relationship is potentially a state secret. Therefore, the assertion of the state secrets privilege, as a general matter, does not mean that any particular allegation is true but is a reflection of the subject matter at issue.

General Background on the State Secrets Privilege

- The state secrets privilege is well-established in federal law. It has been recognized by U.S. courts as far back as the 19th century, and allows the Executive Branch to safeguard vital information regarding the nation's security or diplomatic relations. The modern-day description of the privilege was set forth over 50 years ago by the Supreme Court in United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1 (1953). The privilege has been asserted many times to protect our nation's secrets from disclosure. It is an absolute privilege that renders the information unavailable in litigation and may, depending on the circumstances, require dismissal of the case.

The Process

- An agency head (e.g., Director of the CIA) determines whether the disclosure of certain information in the course of litigation would cause harm to the nation's national security.

- If the agency head determines that disclosure of the information would cause such harm, the Justice Department reviews the proposed state secrets privilege claim and determines whether its assertion is appropriate in the litigation. If the Justice Department determines that it is appropriate, the government asserts the privilege and, depending on the circumstances, potentially moves to dismiss the case as a result of the assertion. Given the nature of the information at issue, it is often necessary for the government to support its state secrets assertion to a court in a classified, ex parte, in camera filing.

- The judge handling the matter determines whether the privilege was properly invoked. If the privilege was properly invoked, the information subject to the privilege is protected from disclosure and precluded from use in the case. The judge then determines the consequences of that preclusion, including whether the case should be dismissed because it cannot proceed without the information at issue.

Section 215 Report
DOJ sent to Congress an annual report containing the number of USA PATRIOT Act Section 215 applications for business records for 2005 (155), and the number of National Security Letters requested for 2005 (3,501 different U.S. persons totaling 9,254 NSLs).

Native American Smuggling Story (FBI)
Kelli Arena, CNN, advised that she has been told that DHS and FBI are looking into information about two individuals who were smuggled across the Canadian border by unidentified American Indians. She was told that two individuals described as Arabic looking were heard making comments about traveling to Alexandria, Va., to commit some type of attack at the Moussaoui trial.

Talking Points:

- Without confirming anything specific, NPO advised that we receive this type of threat info frequently. Many times it is from sources which we cannot immediately assess the reliability. However, they are all taken seriously and out of an abundance of caution, shared with our law enforcement partners.

Egyptian Man Pleads Guilty to Alien Smuggling Charges (Criminal)
Egyptian Man Pleads Guilty to Alien Smuggling Charges: An Egyptian man has pleaded guilty to smuggling nearly 100 individuals from Middle Eastern countries into the United States. Ashraf Ahmed Abdallah Bashar, 37, entered his guilty plea today in federal court before U.S. Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson. Abdallah admitted to leading a human smuggling ring that brought 100 or more persons into the United States from April 2001 through January 2002.

Talking Points:

- The majority of individuals secreted into the United States by Abdallah Bashar have been identified and placed into removal proceedings.

- Many of the individuals secreted into the United States by Abdallah Bashar have been deported and some are still pending deportation.

- There is nothing to indicate or suggest that any of the individuals smuggled into the country were terrorist suspect or connected to any terrorist organizations.

Judge denies David Safavian's Motion to Dismiss Indictment
U.S. District Judge Paul L. Friedman today dismissed defendant David Safavian's motion to dismiss a 5 count indictment brought by the Public Integrity and Fraud Sections of the Criminal Division.

Textron, Inc. (Tax)
Today, the United States filed an action against Textron, Inc. and its subsidiaries in the United States District Court for the District of Rhode Island. The United States seeks an order enforcing an IRS summons calling for the production of Textron's tax accrual workpapers and related testimony, in support of the IRS examination of Textron's tax liabilities for the year 2001.

Talking Points:

- In general, tax accrual workpapers are documents created by a corporation and its independent auditors to explain the amount of the corporation=s deferred tax assets or deferred tax liabilities.

- This is the first action to enforce a summons for tax accrual workpapers since IRS Announcement 2002-63, 2002-2 C.B. 72.

MONDAY'S EXPECTED EVENTS/RELEASES:

8:00 P.M. EDT Solicitor General Paul Clement will give the keynote address at the Third Circuit Judicial Conference Dinner.
Marquis Ballroom
Nemacolin Woodlands Resort
Farmington, Pennsylvania

OPEN PRESS

Press inquiries regarding logistics should be directed to Theresa Burnett of the Third Circuit Judicial Conference at 267-299 4203.

Sami Al-Arian is scheduled to be sentenced Monday, April 3, 9:45 am at US District Court in the Middle District of Florida (Tampa). Al-Arian pleaded guilty earlier this month to conspiring to contribute goods, funds and services to the Palestinian Islamic Jihad, in violation of US law. Al-Arian will be deported after his sentence is served.

Next week is Public Service Recognition Week. DEA will have equipment and personnel on the National mall.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent: Monday, May 01, 2006 8:53 AM
To: USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Attachments: SUNDAY SHOW TRANSCRIPTS 4.30.doc

Attached, please find the Sunday morning talk show transcripts from March 30, 2006.

SUNDAY SHOW TRANSCRIPTS
4/30/06

NBC – MEET THE PRESS

MR. TIM RUSSERT: Our issues this Sunday: This is a special edition. Why are gasoline prices going up and up and up? And what must America do to ensure we have the energy supply we need? With us, for the full hour, the secretary of energy, Samuel Bodman; the president and CEO of the American Petroleum Institute, Red Cavaney; the host of CNBC's "Mad Money," Jim Cramer; the assistant Democratic leader, Senator Dick Durbin of Illinois; and the author of "The Prize: The Epic Quest for Oil, Money and Power, NBC energy analyst Daniel Yergin.

And in our MEET THE PRESS MINUTE: 29 years ago, the head of the Standard Oil Company was here talking about huge oil profits.

(Videotape, April 24, 1977):

MR. JOHN SWEARINGEN (Chairman of the Board Standard Oil of Indiana): Oh, yes. They have gone up and I think if you'll read the papers this morning, you'll find that the profits of other companies have gone up, too.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: Welcome, all. A lot to talk about this morning.

And let's start, we've been talking to folks all across the country about their concerns, and this is what we found out in our NBC/Wall Street Journal poll. Which concerns—causes you most concern? $3 per gallon gasoline, 45 percent of Americans say that is their number one concern; more than a nuclear Iran, 33; illegal immigration, 26; civil disorder in Iraq, 23. Gas is on people's minds. Who do you blame? Who's responsible for the high gas prices? Oil companies, say 37 percent of Americans; 22 percent say oil-producing nations; 15 say George Bush; consumers blame themselves, 8 percent; federal regulations, 6 percent; U.S. Congress, 4 percent; automobile manufacturers, 2 percent.

Secretary of energy, why has gasoline gone up at the pump 60 cents in a month?

MR. SAMUEL BODMAN: First, oil prices have gone up, Tim. And that's been a, a situation that we've been dealing with over the last, basically, year and a half. The suppliers have lost control of the market and, therefore, demand is, is—exceeds supply, and it's a real issue?

MR. RUSSERT: Why? Why? How have they lost control of the market? Why, why has oil gone up?

MR. BODMAN: The oil has gone up because the suppliers are unable to make the kind of demand to make the flows equal to the demand. So we've got demand coming from China, from India, from the United States. All of this is good because the economies are strong. And so we're getting people out of poverty, we're getting people that are, that are working and doing—and living better. But the demand is also causing the kind of price spike that we've had. That's one thing. The second piece is that we have a number of factors. We're shifting from winter to summer, gasoline grades, we're shifting from MTBE to ethanol, which has got some dislocations that have caused some, some—I have to believe, have caused some price spikes. We're moving to ultra low-sulphur diesel fuels. All of that is adding to the situation that we now have. I expect the latter to settle down over the next month or two, but, clearly, we're going to have a number of years, two or three years, before suppliers are going to be in a position to meet the demands of those who are consuming this product.

MR. RUSSERT: But a lot of these demands have been ongoing. Are the oil companies exploiting this situation?

MR. BODMAN: The president has, has instructed the Justice Department to undertake an investigation of that. We see no evidence of it, but this is one of those situations where, I guess I would call it trust, but verify and that's what the Justice Department is engaged in.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Durbin, in your mind, why has gasoline gone up 60 cents per gallon in one month?

SEN. DICK DURBIN (D-IL): I think there are two things, and one that you alluded to in your second question, profit taking by the oil companies. Last year, $110 billion in profit by the oil companies. ExxonMobil leading the pack. That translates into $1,000 for every household in America paid for profits by these oil companies. Four hundred-million-dollar retirement gift for Lee Raymond, the CEO of ExxonMobil. That is part of the problem. And I think it has to be focused on. Secondly, though, we've had a failure in our nation's energy policy. Since President Bush was elected to office, the price of gasoline has virtually doubled. After he signed the Energy Bill last year, home heating cost in the Northeast and Midwest went up dramatically. We saw this coming with MTBE. We knew that there would be a transition over as the MTBE producers were not protected from liability by Tom DeLay's amendment. All of these things were predictable, and yet we didn't prepare ourselves for them. We don't have a sound energy policy and we definitely need one.

MR. RUSSERT: But you voted for more ethanol to be blended into gasoline.

Aren't you partly responsible for what we're seeing?

SEN. DURBIN: I'd vote for it again because that's home grown and that means that domestically we can start to provide for ourselves as Brazil has done so successfully, I'm sure we'll mention on this program. But let's be very honest about this. When we put up the Maria Cantwell Amendment on the floor in the Energy Bill and said America should reduce its dependence on foreign oil by 40 percent over the next 20 years, it was opposed by this administration. Opposed because they said that would force higher CAFE standards, higher fuel economy for cars and trucks. That has to be part of the solution in America. And now the president recently has said he wants to revisit that issue. But that has to be part of any sound energy policy.

MR. RUSSERT: Jim Cramer, you were on the "Imus in the Morning" radio program this week, last week, and said this, and let me share it with our viewers:

"They ought to investigate the Energy Department because they switched over to ethanol without any plan whatsoever to be able to mix ethanol into gasoline. I mean really. I would have the Justice Department call the Energy Department to say, 'We're investigating you.'" What is that about?

MR. JIM CRAMER: I have to tell you, I was shocked. Everyone knew at the distribution, remember, you have to go refining to distribution center, that is very difficult to mix ethanol with, with ordinary gasoline. Ethanol is not ready—we're not ready to have ethanol in this country. And yet we acted as if, "Hey, listen, it'll be no problem whatsoever." I think that 50 to 60 cents of the increase is because we had a bottleneck that should've been, should've been perceived and should've been dealt with well ahead. I think the Energy Department should've known that. I think the Energy Department should have warned us that this was going to happen.

MR. RUSSERT: Mr. Secretary, did you drop the ball?

MR. BODMAN: No. We didn't drop the ball. Listen, first of all, ethanol is easily blended with gasoline. Ethanol—we used four...

MR. CRAMER: That's not true.

MR. BODMAN: We used four billion gallons of ethanol last year in, in our country. It's expanding in its availability by 40 percent this year. So we have a supply of ethanol that I believe will be commensurate with the demands. What we have is a difficulty in, in the transportation, the movement of ethanol throughout our country. Most of it is made in Senator Durbin's home, home state and surrounding areas in the Midwest, and the issue therefore is we need to get ethanol to areas where we need reformulated gasoline which is what ethanol is used for and that is the East Coast, that is the major metropolitan areas in Texas as well as the West Coast. And we've got to have ways of transporting the material there.

MR. RUSSERT: But you knew you were going to have those transportation needs.

Why didn't we prepare for them? Why didn't we plan for them?

MR. BODMAN: I think we have planned for them. This is not something that the Energy Department does. This is a, this is a program that the—those who are in the business of manufacturing ethanol and supplying it, we are reliant upon the private sector to do that. And in my judgment, they've done pretty well.

MR. RUSSERT: Daniel Yergin, you've written about this issue extensively. "The Prize: The Epic Quest for Oil, Money and Power." Why are we witnessing what we are seeing at gas pumps all across the country, 60 cents in one month, and outrage by consumers?

DR. DANIEL YERGIN: Right. Tim, partly what we've—it's the reasons we've heard. But the thing people forget is we're not an island here. We import 60 percent of our oil and in addition to the growth in China and India, we are seeing a slow-motion energy shock spreading across the world, a sort of disruption. All you have to do is look at the front page and look at Iraq, Nigeria, Venezuela and a supply that has not yet come back from the hurricanes and we're missing over two million barrels a day in a very tight market. And now, on top of everything else is a ratcheting up of tension over Iran, which is having a big influence in this oil market.

MR. RUSSERT: Mr. Cavaney, do you believe the Iraq war has affected oil prices?

MR. RED CAVANEY: I think it has. One of the things our companies do is we make sure that we don't put our employees in harm's way. So, as a result of some of the disturbances that are going on there, the technical expertise that can be brought to bear to assist the Iraqis in trying to increase the production from their fields and from their refineries just isn't happening to the extent it should. I'm quite confident, though—they are very resourceful people—that, as, as soon as you can stabilize the civil situation in Iraq, they're going to be able to significantly ramp up their production, but it'll take years and a lot of investment.

MR. RUSSERT: Mr. Secretary, Paul Wolfowitz, the assistant secretary of defense, had said the Iraqi reconstruction would be paid for by oil money, and here we have just heard the head of the American Petroleum Institute saying one of the reasons for the high prices here in this country is because of the war in Iraq.

MR. BODMAN: I think Mr. Cavaney's right. We've had—obviously, the security situation in Iraq has been more difficult than that which had been anticipated in the beginning, and, clearly, it needs to be dealt with. I'm comfortable that we will see, as the Iraqi security forces gradually take control of the situation, that we will see improvements there. But there's no doubt that Mr. Cavaney's right.

MR. RUSSERT: It is interesting reading what politicians are saying on this subject. Here are two conservative Republicans, the speaker of the House, Dennis Hastert, and the majority leader of the U.S. Senate, Bill Frist, in a letter to President Bush. "Dear Mr. President, we respectfully request that you direct the Attorney General and the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission to investigate any potential collusion, price-fixing or gouging in the sale or distribution of gasoline."

Mr. Cavaney, what do you think of that letter?

MR. CAVANEY: Well, first of all, let me explain that that's one of the typical ways that a politician can react to concerns about this. But over the last several decades, our industry has been investigated over 30 times by federal and state agencies, and every single one of those investigations came out with the same conclusion: We did not participate in anti-competitive behavior, we did not have any collusion, and we were exonerated. I expect any subsequent look and investigation is going to determine the same thing.

MR. RUSSERT: But let's look at some of the things that, that Senator Durbin talked about, specifically with Exxon. And here, I'll put it on the screen for our viewers and for everyone else to see. "ExxonMobil Corp., the world's largest oil company, reported Thursday the fifth highest quarterly profit for any public company in history, posting gains from higher oil prices that were likely to stroke the furor over outsized oil company earnings. ... In January, Exxon posted the highest quarterly profits of any public company in history: $10.71 billion for the fourth quarter of 2005 and $36.13 billion for the full year." That's a lot of profit.

MR. CAVANEY: Well, it is, but not for the size of the company. Something has happened, that Dan alluded to. A couple of decades ago, the global oil market changed significantly where the principal competition out there now is national oil companies owned by foreign governments. That required U.S. investor-owned oil and gas companies to significantly scale up in order to compete with them directly. Those companies have. If you take the percent of profit that they made on top of their sales, what you'll find is we typically come in pretty close to the all-industry average. Last year, we earned 8.5 cents per dollar, the all-industry average for all of the economy was 7.7 cents, so it's right about in the band.

MR. RUSSERT: I think what troubled a lot of people is that, two years ago, a bill was passed to give incentives, tax breaks to the oil companies, to invest. And this is what the Connecticut Post reported, "ExxonMobil Corporation invested only $10 million last year on direct research on alternative energy while reaping a record $36 billion in profits. Meanwhile, it handed its retiring chief executive officer a nearly half-billion-dollar parachute. ... The New York Times reported that recently retired Exxon Mobil CEO Lee Raymond received a $400 million compensation package in his final year." Making that much money, getting taxpayer-funded subsidies, in effect, tax breaks, why wouldn't Exxon invest more in alternative fuel exploration?

MR. CAVANEY: Well, I can't speak to a specific company, but I can tell you what the industry's record did. Over the last five years, U.S. oil and gas companies have invested $98 billion in new technologies, including alternatives and renewables, and that represents 73 percent of the total U.S. investment, which includes all the federal government's money and every other business sector. We are investing in the future. We are tied to the consumer, and our job is to provide them the fuels they need regardless of whatever that fuel is.

MR. RUSSERT: But there seems to be an attitude. This was in the Boston Herald, from one of the largest oil refineries in the country, Valero, and it says here: "Valero [Energy] CEO Bill Klesse boasted this week that 'tighter supplies' of gasoline had helped produce 'outstanding (profit) margins.' And, he said, 'the outlook for the rest of the year is even better.'"

MR. CAVANEY: Again, I can't comment for an individual company. But what I can say, the industry itself doesn't feel that these kind of levels are sustainable, and they're good, because what happens is you have demand destruction. People who rely on these fuels to run their businesses, to heat their homes and all, they, they are going to end up sending jobs elsewhere. So we think what we need to do is, as a nation, we should look at a policy framework to make sure that our broad policies are consistent with the world that we operate in today, which is very, very different than 20, 30 years ago, when the last time we really looked at the whole broad policy and made some major changes.

MR. RUSSERT: Mr. Secretary, if, if demand is up but supply is down, why are the profits so high?

MR. BODMAN: For that reason.

MR. RUSSERT: No, think about that.

MR. BODMAN: You know?

MR. RUSSERT: Play it out.

MR. BODMAN: Demand is up.

MR. RUSSERT: Correct.

MR. BODMAN: Right?

MR. RUSSERT: Right.

MR. BODMAN: So you've got more demand, you're going to force price up.

You've got, you've got limited supply, and you're going to have...

MR. RUSSERT: But that's a decision by the oil companies.

MR. BODMAN: No, it is not. That is a decision—those are—oil is traded every minute of every day, and it's traded basically 24-by-seven. And it's, it is determined in marketplaces in New York and London and Tokyo, all over the world. That's the, the—the oil companies do not determine the price of oil; the producers determine the price of oil.

MR. RUSSERT: They determine, they determine, help determine the price at the pump. And if the, if their profits are going up, they have made a decision to add on the cost at the pump at such a level to guarantee higher profits.

MR. BODMAN: That's—look, the, the president has made, has made a, a—has given instruction to the Justice Department to investigate exactly that. And so that's what is ongoing. That's the question you asked Mr. Cavaney, and we are—we will see whether, in fact, that is the case.

MR. RUSSERT: Jim Cramer, you are renowned capitalist. What do you think of all this?

MR. CRAMER: Valero was able to buy its largest competitor; the government looked the other way. Valero is running its refineries, though, 105 percent of the time. They're 'round the clock. We have 100--we have 140 refineries in this country; we had 350 refineries 20 years ago. We have a huge refinery problem, and you can't build them. And it's not a federal government issue. It's a local government issue because no one wants a refinery next to them.

MR. RUSSERT: So what we have is lack of refining capability...

MR. CRAMER: Right.

MR. RUSSERT: ...an increased worldwide demand, ethanol being added and blended in...

MR. CRAMER: Without preparation.

MR. RUSSERT: ...and do you believe the oil companies have been adding on a little bit extra profit?

MR. CRAMER: I, I think if they could drill they would drill. If they could refine more, they would. These are companies that are run for the shareholders, but they're run to be able to produce as much oil as we can possibly use. They want to do that. Lee Raymond, he, he generated $67 billion in profits for his shareholders. I think that that's a reasonable return, $144,000 a day. Katie Couric makes $85,000 a day. What value has she created vs. 67 billion by Lee Raymond?

MR. RUSSERT: Well, to the "Today" show and to the millions of viewers?

DR. YERGIN: Greenlighted to our morning...

MR. RUSSERT: You leave Katie alone. At least till the end of May.

MR. CRAMER: She plays for another team now, so...

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Durbin?

SEN. DURBIN: Am I the only one of your guests here that think that profit taking is a problem? I mean, I understand the basic laws of supply and demand. I understand that if the input costs have gone up, it's going to reduce your, your profitability. But here we have the most enormous profits in the history of the United States of America in business. The equivalent of $1,000 per household in America for profits. All of the market factors you described may suggest that the product is going to be more expensive to sell, but they don't forgive what I think is an outrageous profit taking by this industry.

And let me also say to Mr. Cavaney, to suggest that these are average, average profits—they're the largest profits in the history of American business. And to suggest that Mr. Lee Raymond's retirement gift is an average gift of $400 million for his service to the company? That's $3 for every household in America that they paid for Mr. Raymond's going-away gift.

MR. RUSSERT: Do you have any evidence of collusion or gouging?

SEN. DURBIN: Here's the problem we run into. Look, let me go back to an earlier point. For the past several decades, as we've just heard here from Mr. Cramer, there's been a consolidation of this industry. There are now five majors. They have swallowed up all of the competition, and they're the five big players. The Department of Justice antitrust division has watched as thousands of these mergers have taken place, with hardly a whimper. And now we have a situation where they are in control. Competition has lessened in terms of our own domestic oil industry, our own domestic energy. And I think that is a fact, too.

Is there collusion? Not until we have an aggressive investigation. And I might also add that when we suggested—the Democrats suggested in Congress making price gouging a federal crime, it was opposed by the Republicans. We think that this has to be taken very seriously if consumers are going to be protected.

MR. RUSSERT: Mr. Yergin:

DR. YERGIN: I think I'm in the "yes, but" role here. We're back in this island of what we have to look at is what's happening in the rest of the world. The American oil companies only produce—they produce less than 10 percent of the total world oil. That most of it is produced by state-owned companies. So what happens in terms of future supplies has a lot to do with what President Chavez of Venezuela decides to do in terms of investment.

And when we look at refining, refining went down because we had a lot of these tea kettle refineries that were created for—under a system of price controls. But I was looking at the numbers yesterday. The refining capacity, which is what really counts, not the number of refineries, is up about 15 percent in the last 12 years. So it's as though we've built eight or nine new refineries but they're not at greenfield, they're on existing sites because that's the only place you can do it.

MR. RUSSERT: Another Republican suggestion, this one from Arlen Specter, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and I'll read it for everyone here on the screen. "Republican Senator Arlen Specter said the U.S. Congress should consider taxing the 'Windfall profits' reaped by oil companies as a result of surging crude oil prices.

Specter, and other lawmakers are responding to what they say is rising voter anger over gasoline prices."

Mr. Secretary, should the government have a windfall profits tax on the oil companies and target that money for exploration of alternative fuels?

MR. BODMAN: First of all, this administration is doing everything that it can do to deal with both short and long-term issues related to the energy situation. That's point one. Point two: There are certain things we know that don't work and windfall profits tax is one of them. That was tried 30 years ago, it did not work. It resulted in reduced production. We have—you know, we have prima facie evidence of that. And to me, that proposal does not hold water.

MR. RUSSERT: What do you think?

MR. CRAMER: It doesn't create any more oil, it just doesn't. Nor does the $100 rebate create more oil, nor does a hydrogen program we've spent to create more oil. We're a carbon-based economy, Tim. We got to create more oil.

MR. CAVANEY: The last time was tried that windfall profits tax we lost $1.6 billion barrels which was then had to be imported and almost one-third of the total work force of the industry left.

DR. YERGIN: I'd like to see the focus on investment. When you look at what's required, something like $17 trillion of investment around the world for energy in the next 25 years, that's where I think the money needs to go.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Durbin:

SEN. DURBIN: I guess I'm the only one at the table to disagree. Let's get down to the basics here. The Bush administration has asked for tax breaks, $2 billion in the last Energy Bill, and protecting existing subsidies for oil companies, which are at this point in time experiencing the largest profit in their history. They are engorged with profit and when Senator Wyden goes to the floor and says, "Isn't it time that we reduced the subsidy to the oil companies who are drilling on federal lands," it's opposed by the Republicans and the administration. I mean, the bottom line is this: If you do not tax these corporations at this level they will continue to run up the profits to sky heavens.

I don't know where it ends. And they're saying as much, this year maybe better than last. And it means that consumers will continue to be victimized unless they feel that ultimately they're going to have to pay some of this money back. I'd like to see it come back. Rebates directly to consumers who've paid the price for this, but also investment. Investment in promoting energy independence and promoting new sustainable, renewable technologies. Businesses creating new jobs and good-paying opportunities for America with new technologies. And, Tim, we've done it before. Between 1975 and 1985 we got serious. We dramatically increased CAFE standards, we reduced our dependence on foreign oil by 30 percent over that 10-year period of time and our economy expanded at the same time. That's when California took off and became a national leader in terms of their cars and their, their conservation of energy. We need the same kind of leadership in America. We need a new direction. The direction we've been going in for an energy policy is disastrous.

MR. RUSSERT: I'll give you a chance to respond.

MR. BODMAN: The senator's too smart to believe what he just said, if I may say. The—this, this president has led in terms of getting an Energy Bill passed, which was a year ago, has made a proposal and has now demanded an investigation. We're working on—have asked the Congress for the, the permission from Congress for the Transportation Department to undertake a look at the CAFE standard. We asked for that in 2002. There was no...

MR. RUSSERT: That's miles per gallon. Miles per gallon. Sorry.

MR. BODMAN: No—yes. Miles per gallon. What are called CAFE standards. We're also working on increasing supply, or at least have asked to. The president has suspended the, the reintroduction of oil into the strategic reserve and has asked for ANWR.

MR. RUSSERT: Yeah, but stop, let me ask you about that.

MR. BODMAN: Yes.

MR. RUSSERT: Because after Katrina we drove down on that strategic petroleum reserve fund.

MR. BODMAN: Right.

MR. RUSSERT: And we've been repaying it. Putting it back in there.

MR. BODMAN: Right.

MR. RUSSERT: Putting it all back in there in case there's a crisis. I remember back in 2000 when it was Al Gore vs. George Bush running for president of the United States.

MR. BODMAN: Right.

MR. RUSSERT: And Al Gore recommended that Bill Clinton draw out of the strategic petroleum reserve.

MR. BODMAN: Right.

MR. RUSSERT: And this is what candidate Bush had to say about it back then.

Let's watch.

(Videotape, September 21, 2000):

PRES. GEORGE W. BUSH: Today, my opponent, in response to public outcry, proposed that our nation tap into the strategic petroleum reserve. That's bad public policy. The strategic reserve is an insurance policy meant for a sudden disruption of our energy supply or for war. Strategic reserves should not be used as an attempt to drive down oil prices right before an election. It should not be used for short-term political gain at the cost of long-term national security.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: Isn't that exactly what the president is now doing?

MR. BODMAN: Tim, this, this president has been very consistent in his, in his application and management of the strategic reserve. We have not used the reserve for interruptions in supply.

We have been asked by the Democrats when oil was $60 a barrel to remove oil from the reserve and put it into the marketplace in order to drive prices down. We declined to do that. Now we have oil at $75 a barrel. You know that the, the movement of prices is a function of the, the supply and demand as we've already talked about and it is not something that is, I think, going to be meaningfully affected by whatever happens to the strategic reserve. He has taken the position at this point in time to suspend the, the repurchase until the fall after we get through the driving season. So I, you know, it's a, it's a modest effort, it is a symbolic effort, but it is something that I think may help.

MR. RUSSERT: In all honesty, it's a political effort before the midterm elections.

MR. BODMAN: I think it's not. I wouldn't call it a political effort. I would say that it's an effort to, to affect the, the supply of gas, of oil in the, in the system and to, and to make a contribution to the reduction of price.

MR. RUSSERT: But his standard was a crisis or a war. We don't confront any of those at this moment in terms of the oil supply. This was a reserve in times of real crisis. And we've stopped putting oil into it in order to affect the market price during the driving season. You just said that.

MR. BODMAN: Tim, Tim, the, the—we're here today. I would say that there's evidence, there's, there's apparently some evidence that we have a crisis. There is a lot of concern about this. And so the president is looking at everything, every tool at his disposal to put to work on it. And so, you know, I'm not embarrassed by that and I think it's the right thing to do.

MR. RUSSERT: You think that the president's action is consistent with his campaign pledge in 2000?

MR. BODMAN: I think that that was 10 years ago or nine years ago, whenever it was, and it was some, it was—times are different and the situation has changed. Fundamentally, this reserve, the strategic reserve, has not been used for the purposes other than trying to deal with disruption. And so we have been very conservative in the use of it and I think that stands this country in very good stead.

MR. RUSSERT: But you said we are in a crisis.

MR. BODMAN: I believe that there is—there are those who would call it that.

MR. RUSSERT: Would you call...

MR. BODMAN: The fact, the fact that we are here today.

MR. RUSSERT: Do, do you call it a crisis?

MR. BODMAN: I would call it that, yes. I think that there is great concern. You, you started out, you started out with the suggestion that it's the number one issue on the minds of the American public. It's something this president takes very seriously. It's something the entire administration takes very seriously. And, you know, we're doing everything we know how to do to deal with it that works. Not the things that we know for a fact do not work.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Durbin, the Democrats, Al Gore urged Bill Clinton to tap that reserve. Democrats have, and the secretary's right, urged the president to tap into it. Now that he is withholding some oil and trying to hold prices down, Democrats are criticizing him for doing just that.

SEN. DURBIN: The reserve's almost full. The amount that's going to be withheld is going to have no measurable impact on price in the market. I think those of us who've looked at the reserve in the past have also looked at the, the impact of these oil prices. I'm from the state of Illinois. We're proud to have Chicago's hometown airline, United. They just went through bankruptcy. And if you ask the CEO, Mr. Tilton, what was the major driving factor, he said it was the price of fuel. Price of fuel drove them to lay off thousands of people, to force others to take massive wage cuts, to cut back on the retirement benefits of thousands of people as well. It's impacting agriculture, it's impacting taxi cab drivers. You name it. Average families feel it. And now what we're saying is, "Mr. President, last August you signed your Energy Bill. Your Energy Bill didn't serve America well." We need a new direction."

We can't do more of the same. We have to step out and look at this problem anew. And to hear, as some said earlier, we are a carbon-based economy, it's true. But let's be honest, there's an environmental impact here as well. As I mentioned to you earlier, Al Gore was—made a presentation yesterday about the impact of global warming as we burn all this fuel. We should be moving toward more conservation, more fuel economy, more efficiency, ways to fuel our economy that won't destroy this Earth in future generations.

MR. RUSSERT: We're going to take a quick break and come back and talk about consumers. We have to look in the mirror and find out what are we doing, and where do we go in the future to become energy independent in the United States of America. We'll be right back.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: More of our special edition of MEET THE PRESS, gasoline prices, after this station break.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: And we're back. Daniel Yergin, let me quote again from you. "Every president who has problems with energy learns that there is not a lot you can do in the short term. The system is overstressed ... and the truth is most of the solutions are medium-term or long-term. What counts in the short-term is demand, he said, noting that prices retreated when consumption dropped amid the price surge that followed last year's hurricanes. For immediate effects, Yergin said, it's really not what the administration does - what really matters is what consumers do."

DR. YERGIN: Well, first thing, of course, it's very painful for an awful lot of people, but they respond, they change how they drive, who they drive with, they switch to mass transit, and lo and behold, you start to see the demand coming down, and that takes some of the pressure off price. And we're in a situation as we look to the summer is if we don't have anymore disruptions, if we don't have problems with Iran get out of hand, we could actually see gasoline prices lower. But there's a lot of risk in the market, so you asked a very good question about "What happens if the prices go higher?"

MR. RUSSERT: Tom Friedman suggests and hopes that oil will go to $100 a barrel, because he thinks only then...

DR. YERGIN: He's not running for office is he?

MR. RUSSERT: But he thinks only then will American consumers and political leadership and, and industry leadership get the message and say, "You know what? We have to do something different. We have to get off oil and change our behavior and change our habits."

DR. YERGIN: Well, it seems to me that we're already seeing that change. I think there's an embrace of conservation efficiency across the board in a way that there hasn't been for a number of years. And certainly the movement towards renewables, alternative, diversifying the gasoline pool, I think we are at a turning point as it is now.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me go back to the State of the Union Address, this is President Bush, January 31, 2006. Let's watch.

(Videotape, January 31, 2006):

PRES. BUSH: Keeping America competitive requires affordable energy, and here we have a serious problem, America is addicted to oil.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: Mr. Cavaney, you agree with that?

MR. CAVANEY: We're addicted to oil, if you want to use that term, because hydrocarbons, which is oil, coal, natural gas, have a lot of energy content, the most energy content per volume, about 30 percent more than, let's say, alcohol, which is what ethanol is. But the industry is working very hard, we worked together with the agricultural interests to come to—with a historic pact in the year 2001 to go to Congress to put together a program that would gradually incorporate alternative fuels, like biodiesel and ethanol, and we're well along the path to the 2005, 2006, 2007, each year it's going to be a bit more, and by 2012 we'll have at least 7.5 billion gallons of ethanol alone included in our national gasoline pool.

MR. RUSSERT: Mr. Cramer, if these gasoline prices keep going up, what's it going to do to our economy? The airline costs, the pizza deliverer, the cab driver, everybody—the consumer is going to be affected in a very negative way.

MR. CRAMER: Should be. But the consumer's shockingly resilient. Yesterday, Wal-Mart, 100 million shoppers in America go there every single week, 6.8 percent increase in comparable store sales over last year. Remarkable. The highest that Wal-Mart has had in many years. It shows me that the consumer, and that's the month of April, consumer is not being impacted as much as you would think.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me show you something from The New York Times about Brazil. And this is quite striking and I think a lot of the country will be surprised by this, and I'll put it on the screen. "With Big Boosts From Sugar Cane, Brazil Is Satisfying Its Fuel Needs. [Brazil] expects to become energy self-sufficient this year, meeting its growing demand for fuel by increasing production from petroleum and ethanol. Already the use of ethanol, derived in Brazil from sugar cane, is so widespread that some gas stations have two sets of pumps, marked A for alcohol, G for gas. ... Today, less than three years after the technology was introduced, more than 70 percent of the automobiles sold in Brazil ... have flex fuel engines [that run on both ethanol and gasoline] which have entered the marketplace generally without price increases." Here's Brazil, South America, automobiles, flex fuel at the same costs people can buy gasoline-fueled automobiles, and they're using sugar cane grown in Brazil...

MR. BODMAN: Right.

MR. RUSSERT: ...to fuel the cars. How can Brazil do it and not us?

MR. BODMAN: Brazil is a good model. I—the—all I can—that's all—you know, that's all I can say, Tim, Brazil is a good model. And that's exactly what we're trying to do. That's why their—the increase in use of corn for, for generation of ethanol, that's why the president has increased by 50 percent the amount of research that is being done out in our Colorado laboratory, so that we can create ethanol using cellulose, using more...

MR. RUSSERT: How much is he spending—how much are we spending?

MR. BODMAN: We're spending $150 million.

MR. RUSSERT: That's it?

MR. BODMAN: We will be spending—but that's what we need—that's what we need.

MR. RUSSERT: There's a company in Idaho that wants to use wheat chaff for cellulosic ethanol...

MR. BODMAN: Right.

MR. RUSSERT: ...and they're being told they can't get any federal money.

MR. BODMAN: I don't know about the name of it, but the—I can't—you know, I can't deal with that. I can't...

MR. RUSSERT: Is that enough money to spend on something that should be, in, in many people's minds, the equivalent of a Manhattan Project? Let's get off oil? Is $150 million enough to do that?

MR. BODMAN: I think that the, the—there is a tendency in this town, Tim, to equate volume of money with progress. This is a 50 percent increase in what we're doing. We've done very good work in the laboratory and we're expecting to be able to look at other feed stocks. This is the idea of producing ethanol using something other than food, a food material, either sugar cane or corn, something that's cheaper, and wood chips or, or switch grass or other kinds of materials like that. And we think that we're going to be in, in a good position. The, the, the whole question about pace and speed—this is a research project. This is something that takes time. It is not something that is going to be a function of how much money is spent.

MR. RUSSERT: But if Brazil has done it and done...

MR. BODMAN: Yes.

MR. RUSSERT: ...it relatively quickly...

MR. BODMAN: Yes.

MR. RUSSERT: ...why can't we do it quickly?

MR. BODMAN: Brazil manufactures ethanol using sugar cane. Our sugar is much more expensive than sugar cane in Brazil and now you're getting into agricultural policy related to the Ag bill, and it's a different matter.

MR. RUSSERT: So how long before you think that we will be off of oil and onto ethanol?

MR. BODMAN: Well, we will be in a position over the next three or four years, I believe—and again this is a function of research. It takes time to, to, to figure this out, but where we will have designed the enzymes and we will be in a position that we can then start the conversion. You first have to determine what the enzymes are before you can then start to expand and build these plants all over America. And it's going to be something that would not just be in the Midwest, but would be in the East Coast and the West Coast where these grasses are, are available.

MR. RUSSERT: Daniel Yergin, can this country do what Brazil did and convert itself from...

DR. YERGIN: Well, it took Brazil 30 years to do it. It took three years to convert the cars, but 30 years to do it and Brazil's gasoline consumption is about 3 percent of ours. We have to remember the scale. I think that we will see more ethanol in, in our fuel thing. The key thing, the holy grail, the breakthrough is can you take this waste product and turn it in to fuel? And I look around and not only government spending, but see a lot of private venture capital money trying to unlock the key to that mystery.

MR. RUSSERT: Mr. Cramer, do you believe that the United States can convert from oil to ethanol and other byproducts?

MR. CRAMER: Well, I would tell you that why don't we start by waving the 50 cent tax we put on the Brazilian ethanol to protect our own people? Why don't we do that now instead of giving 100 bucks back. Make all these noises. Why don't we just stop the tax?

MR. RUSSERT: So import Brazilian ethanol?

MR. CRAMER: Well, it's only because the government refuses to waive the import...

MR. RUSSERT: Senator, can you go along with that? It's going to hurt your farmers?

SEN. DURBIN: I'll tell you why we won't do it, the same reason Brazil didn't do it. They had to build their indigenous domestic industry and so they didn't allow ethanol to come in from other countries. We are now building our indigenous ethanol industry. All over Illinois, all over the United States.

MR. CRAMER: But in the interim why not just waive it?

SEN. DURBIN: In the mean...

MR. CRAMER: Why not make it cheaper for America?

SEN. DURBIN: At this point in time, I tell you there is a boom now and opportunities for these ethanol production facilities. I want to see that happen. You know why? Because in downstate, small town America, that I represent as well, these are the best job opportunities they can find. These are business opportunities in communities that have otherwise almost given up. They have a chance now. And if you're going to allow us to become, allow this import of fuel from Brazil we may find ourselves as dependent on foreign ethanol as we are today on foreign oil.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator, in order to continue this drive you're concerned about global warming, you're concerned about oil and carbon gases and things, would you be willing to expand nuclear power in the U.S.?

SEN. DURBIN: I have trouble with that because I—we still have not resolved what we're going to do with the waste from these nuclear power plants. I just went to Braidwood Nuclear Facility outside of Chicago. Still serious problems with environmental issues that threaten the village of Godley, Illinois, directly in the, in the shadow of this plant.

MR. RUSSERT: So you would take oil and coal over nuclear?

SEN. DURBIN: Well, at this point, I think that we have to see other alternatives. There are sustainable and renewable sources as well. You know, I drive a hybrid car at home. My wife and I, we bought a Ford Escape hybrid. I think it's a move in the right direction. We need to promote more hybrid vehicles, more electrical-powered vehicles. We need to move away from this carbon consumption that could endanger this planet we live on. I think it's sustainable and renewable fuels. Also looking for more efficient ways to use the vehicles we have today.

MR. RUSSERT: Do you think you will one day head up the American Ethanol Institute?

MR. CAVANEY: Well, we look forward to using more biofuels, more ethanol, but we have to also square with some of the facts. There's a huge amount of use of oil and natural gas in order to make ethanol. So ethanol doesn't come to you free from nothing. So we have to use about 80 percent to as much of 95 percent of the energy just to get a gallon of ethanol. It has a proper place, but the big breakthrough is going to come when cellulitic ethanol comes. And the difference between the two: you need one set of enzymes—if your raw material is just sugar cane you need one set if it's just ethanol. But if you're going to use everything: yard debris, wood chips and all of these, you need a very complex mixture. But that is where the real breakthrough opportunity may well be, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: And the oil companies are willing to convert to that kind of fuel?

MR. CAVANEY: We, we have already started to incorporate—four billion gallons are already being used right today as we speak, and we're going to continue to be able to use more. We're in the process of serving the consumer, and what we've always done is try and find the lowest affordable price. And if ethanol can be competitive, we're going to use more of it. This past year, ethanol was more expensive than gasoline almost every single month.

MR. RUSSERT: Daniel Yergin, based on all your study and research, what do you believe has to be done in the next decade in the United States of America regarding energy, and what do you think will be done?

DR. YERGIN: I think we need a broad range. It's technology, it's research and development, a very broad range, very intensive to do it. I think we see a lot more momentum now to, to have it happen. And despite the differences we hear here, around this table, there's actually a lot of consensus on what the elements are. So I think that the...

MR. RUSSERT: What are the elements?

DR. YERGIN: Well, the elements are A: a lot more efficiency, and that means automobiles, transportation. And how do you get there? It's either regulation or tax or price, but some way it's going to happen. And then I think it's a kind of continuing to diversify what goes into the gas tanks, what we use for energy, and I think as you look around the world, and you see the problems around the world, and the, the risks above the ground, you see a sense of urgency about that.

MR. RUSSERT: Do you believe we become, can become energy independent in a decade?

DR. YERGIN: No, I don't think so. I think that we've gone from importing a third of our oil in the 1970s to importing 60 percent, but we're going to be importing more natural gas. So I don't think energy independence—I mean, it's a, it's a, it's a motivator, but I don't think it really describes our situation. The question is how do we manage the fact that we're part of this global market in energy?

MR. BODMAN: But the first step, if I may say, is to take the pressure off that market. And that's what ethanol will do, even in more modest quantities. It will start to take the pressure off oil markets. That's where the issue is.

MR. RUSSERT: But if you look at the world in which we live, and where the United States gets its oil, we've already talked about it, the Iraq war, limiting production from Iraq; the situation with Iran; in Venezuela, Mr. Chavez not particularly fond of the United States.

MR. BODMAN: Right.

MR. RUSSERT: Saudi Arabia could topple tonight and we wouldn't be surprised. We could wake up tomorrow, and oil could be 100, $150 a barrel with the right set of circumstances, all working against our national interest. And what would that do to our economy and way of life?

MR. BODMAN: It would be, it would be a real problem. It would be a very time to—it would be a very bad time to be the secretary of energy, I can tell you, I can tell you that. As, you know, as Dan has...

MR. RUSSERT: Do you worry about this?

MR. BODMAN: Of course we worry about it. Of course we worry about it, all the time. That's what I, that's what I do, that's my job is to worry about it. And, you know, as, as, as Dan said, I think that, that the issues are trying to focus on the renewable problems, trying to focus on issues that, that we can deal with in a reasonable period of time. But this is not—this has been a problem that has taken three decades to be created, and it's going to take a number of years—this is a huge industry, the scale...

MR. RUSSERT: Realistically, Mr. Secretary...

MR. BODMAN: Yes.

MR. RUSSERT: ...how long before we could be energy independent?

MR. BODMAN: I think that the president's instruction to us is by 2025, in 19 years, that we would have five million gallons a day of renewable energy, of ethanol in the marketplace to give—to, to square that with you, that's about, that's about 25 percent of what we use today, probably 20 percent of what we will use at that time.

MR. RUSSERT: Doable?

SEN. DURBIN: It's doable, I think. To reach a point of 40 percent reduction over 20 years, which was the Democratic position on the Energy Bill is doable. It means making a commitment to doing some things we're not doing, promoting energy independence and energy technology development that is environmentally responsible.

But it also means two other elements we shouldn't overlook: punishing profiteering. All the market forces not withstanding, if the oil companies still insist on these outrageous profits, the consumers will lose and the American economy will lose.

MR. RUSSERT: To be continued. Thank you all.

We'll be right back with our MEET THE PRESS MINUTE from three decades ago, talking about high oil prices with an oil company executive. Right here on MEET THE PRESS.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: And we are back. Nearly three decades ago, MEET THE PRESS was focusing on, you guessed it, the energy crisis, big oil and profit margins.

(Videotape, April 24, 1977):

MR. ROBERT NOVAK (Chicago Sun Times): You have led into what I think is the, is the great philosophical point confronting the oil industry and that is you have painted perfectly the importance of increasing production as a matter of national security and national interests. Since we're talking about sacrifice and everybody is being called upon to sacrifice, is it possible for the oil industry to sacrifice some of its huge profits and dig a little more oil even though there may not be the incentives that perhaps you want from the government?

MR. SWEARINGEN: in the first place, I don't agree with your figures about huge profits. I think you are parroting here the kind of things that you hear from the left wing element of this country.

MR. NOVAK: But they've gone up since OPEC, haven't they?

MR. SWEARINGEN: Oh, yes, they have gone up and I think if you'll read the papers this morning you will find that the profits of other companies have gone up, too, and this is largely as a result of the depreciation of our money here in this country and not as a result of any major price increase.

MR. ROBERT BAZELL (NBC News): Mr. Swearingen, you said a little while ago that only the left wing elements could say that the oil companies were making huge profits. And I think that many people would find that remark rather incredible. One only has to look at Wall Street figures to see the kinds of profits you're making. Isn't it true that most of your big profits are in production and that a lot of—that in refining and retailing sort of brings that down, but that you do make extraordinary profits in production?

MR. SWEARINGEN: No. I disagree with your numbers or your analysis of the numbers. I'll have to repeat, again, that the absolute aggregate numbers are reported on a worldwide basis and must be related to the capital employed in the business which you have chosen to ignore. The second thing is the profit in the production end of the business is larger on a basis of the capital invested than the profits in the refining and marketing part of the business. This is due largely to the intensely competitive nature of gasoline marketing which any automobile driver can see as he drives down the street.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: And our viewers should know we did invite the representatives of the major oil companies, Shell, Chevron, BP, ExxonMobil, Sunoco and ConocoPhillips to be with us today. They declined. We hope they will join us in the future.

How about that populist reporter, Bob Novak? We'll be right back.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: A reminder of two great resources on msnbc.com. Sign, sign up for our weekly MEET THE PRESS newsletter. Each letter—each Friday you can find out who'll be meeting the press on Sunday delivered free via e-mail right here on your computer. Subscribe, our Web site: mtp.msnbc.com. Also, NBC's ground-breaking political blog, First Read, has expanded its coverage and is now updated with breaking news and analysis throughout the day. Check it out, firstread.msnbc.com.

That's all for today. We'll be back next week. If it's Sunday, it's MEET THE PRESS.

ABC – THIS WEEK

STEPHANOPOULOS: This week, Washington goes wild on gas prices. And the White House gets tough on Iran.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: The Iranian government's intransigence is not acceptable.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: We'll tackle those issues with our headliner, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Then, is big oil to blame for the pain at the pump? That debate with the oil industry's top lobbyist, former Senator Bennett Johnston, and one of its chief critics, Senator Charles Schumer.

George Will, Fareed Zakaria, Claire Shipman and Jay Carney of Time magazine debate the week's politics in our roundtable.

Plus, George Clooney, reporting on genocide.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CLOONEY: They've poisoned the wells in every town they go into. They don't want the land; they just want to cleanse everyone.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: And a special presidential Sunday Funnies.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: Ladies and gentlemen, I'm feeling chipper tonight. I survived the White House shake-up.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Good morning, everyone. We begin today with the secretary of State, just back from another whirlwind tour. If it's Sunday, it must be Washington.

RICE: It must be Washington, finally.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let's begin with Iran.

Since the IAEA, International Atomic Energy Agency, filed their report on Friday against Iran's nuclear program, they've made two moves over the weekend, at least two announcements.

One spokesperson said they're willing to accept spot inspections of their facilities. Another said they're willing to talk about this proposal that the Russians have put on the table about having enrichment of uranium take place in Russia, not Iran.
Are these substantive proposals or stalling tactics?

RICE: Well, we have heard from Iran -- every time they get close to a Security Council decision, there is some effort to say, oh, no, we really were in fact interested in that proposal that we rejected just a few weeks ago; or no, now, the IAEA can come.

They've had plenty of time to cooperate...

STEPHANOPOULOS: So they're playing games?

RICE: I think they're playing games. But obviously, if they're not playing games, they should come clean; they should stop the enrichment, suspend the enrichment.

They should answer the list of demands that were in the IAEA Board of Governors' resolution and in the presidential statement of the Security Council.

And then they can get back to negotiations. So the path for Iran is very clear. And the path by which they could get civil nuclear energy is also very clear.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Meanwhile, the United States is going to start on the path toward sanctions in the U.N. Security Council this week, start talking to the allies.

Former Secretary of State Colin Powell was in London this morning, talking about that. And he said there's very limited sanctions that are really possible right now. And he went on to say this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

COLIN POWELL, FMR. SECRETARY OF STATE: The Iranians have looked at this very carefully. And they have examined their situation and they've decided to go forward, even in the face of potential sanctions, which suggests to me that they have pretty much decided that they can accept whatever sanctions are coming their way.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Is he right?

RICE: Well, we'll see because I do know, also, that the Iranians are doing everything that they can to get this out of the Security Council.

One of the things that they said is, let's put this back on the IAEA; this really doesn't belong in the Security Council; which suggests to me that they are indeed somewhat concerned that the Security Council might move to the kinds of measures that could further isolate Iran.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Russia and China still aren't there. RICE: Well, we're going to take this one step at a time. The undersecretary for political affairs, Nick Burns, will be traveling this week to talk with the political directors about how we move forward.

We can't just go back and have another presidential statement. So it's likely that we will try to move to a Chapter 7 resolution, which is a resolution in the U.N. that compels behavior from a member state.

At that point, we can then look to see what measures might be taken. But the international community's credibility is at stake here. And we have a choice, too. We can either mean what we say when we say that Iran must comply or we can continue to allow Iran to defy.

STEPHANOPOULOS: In that interview, Secretary Powell also said that, before the Iraq war, he advised the president and his military advisers to put more troops on the ground.

When you were in Britain a couple weeks ago, you were speaking figuratively, but you said we've made a thousand mistakes before. Was that one of them, not following Secretary Powell's advice?

RICE: The president listened to the advice of his advisers and ultimately, he listened to the advice of his commanders, the people who actually had to execute the war plan. And he listened to them several times.

When the war plan was put together, it was put together, also, with consideration of what would happen after Saddam Hussein was actually overthrown.

And General Tommy Franks, of course, through Secretary Rumsfeld, made a proposal to the president for the right number of troops for the plan. And that's what he followed.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You were in Iraq this week with Secretary Rumsfeld. And there is talk now of troop reductions, troop withdrawals.

After you left, the Iraqi national security adviser, Mowaffak al- Rubaie actually laid out a conditional timetable for withdrawal. I want to show you what he said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MOWAFFAK AL-RUBAIE, IRAQI NATIONAL SECURITY ADVISER: By the end of this year, the number of multinational forces or coalition forces probably will be less than 100,000.

By the end of next year, the overwhelming majority of the coalition would have left the country. And probably by the middle of 2008 there will be no foreign soldier in the country.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: No foreign soldiers in 2008. I know you've said and the president has said that any withdrawals are going to be based on security conditions, but how realistic is that timetable?

RICE: Well, we talked with the Iraqi leadership during this recent trip last week, and they want to be able to take responsibility for their own security, and we want them to be able to take responsibility. They recognize, though, that their security forces are not quite ready. Their security forces are...

STEPHANOPOULOS: So that's a little too optimistic.

RICE: Well, I don't know if it's optimistic. Let's get their security forces ready. Let's see what they're capable of doing. They are taking more territory themselves. They are taking on more responsibility, for instance, for the highway between the airport and the international zone, which they've done in some ways better than we did. They've been able to secure it better than we did.

So we will take this a step at a time. The president has made very clear that he's going to listen to his commanders for what troop levels are needed. We're going to train Iraqi security forces as rapidly as possible. And most importantly, we're going to continue to put this in a political context in which the Iraqi government drains support for insurgency by the fact that they are indeed a national unity government. And those elements together should allow more responsibility to Iraqis and less responsibility to coalition forces over the next several months.

STEPHANOPOULOS: What's going to trigger, though, the first reductions, this next plan of 30 or 40,000 troops? What's it going to take? Will simply forming a government be enough?

RICE: Oh, I think forming a government is an important step, but we also have to look at the security situation on the ground. Now, we're doing different kinds of things than we were doing earlier in this conflict. The training of security forces is one of the most important things that our forces are doing on the ground.

We are still doing some as we would call it kinetic or active military operations against the terrorists as we did just the last couple of days in Ramadi. But more and more, Iraqis are taking a lot more responsibility for patrols, taking a lot more responsibility for security in places like Baghdad.

When I actually had to travel the road during my previous trip to Iraq because of weather, you notice that there are Iraqi forces, Iraqi soldiers along those roads, and so I think that everybody wants to make sure that what we're doing is matching the forces to the conditions and to the demands on the ground.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let's talk about the situation in Darfur, the Sudan. You and the president described it as a genocide. The U.N. reported this week there have been 200,000 more refugees just in the last couple of months. Rallies all across the United States today to focus more attention on this issue ,and there's a deadline for the peace talks.

I know that you and the entire government have been frustrated for some time that you haven't been able to get an agreement on a peacekeeping force. The Sudanese government hasn't agreed to that. Is it time to take more forceful action?

RICE: Well, we are taking forceful action in really pressing the case now that U.N. Forces, a U.N. blue-hatted mission is going to have to be put together which could then support -- be supported by NATO, which might be willing -- will be willing, I think, to give logistical support and intelligence support, and perhaps mobility support. Everybody understands we're not talking about western forces on the ground. The political dynamic, I think, would not allow that.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But those forces still require the acceptance of the Sudanese government. They have been stalling. At what point does the United States, does the international community say, we don't care if they're going to accept it anymore. We have to go in and stop the genocide?

RICE: Well, we are going to continue to press the Sudanese government, and we're continuing to not just talk to them, but of course we're taking some actions against those in the Sudanese government who are responsible for this. Just last week...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Only four individuals, though.

RICE: Well, but it's four individuals who now know that their role in this terrible crisis is being noted by the international community, and if necessary, we will do more. We also do need more support, frankly, from other members of the international community, from China, from Russia, which abstained on this resolution. And I was at NATO on Thursday and Friday. We had talk about getting more support from the African Union, which has said that they want to see a U.N. force.

I might just also note that I've been discussing on the phone this morning with people who have been following the Abuja talks. And there's some progress being made in the Abuja talks. Obviously...

STEPHANOPOULOS: So, will they extend the deadline?

RICE: Well, obviously a peace agreement would be a very important step forward in getting this done. I don't know if they will extend, but there clearly has been some progress, and the United States has been one of the most active states in doing this.

But, George, let me just say, the president has passion about this issue. You can see it when he talks about it. We cannot be in a situation in which we don't react to this.

And the United States has been at the lead in humanitarian relief. We've been at the lead in pushing for -- with Kofi Annan, for a U.N. force. We've been at the lead at trying to get NATO to be responsive to what the AU may need, and we've been in the lead in helping the existing AU forces on the ground. We will continue to be very active in our diplomacy in Abuja, and very active in our diplomacy with the international community.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Finally, while you were overseas, the issue of gas prices...

RICE: Yes.

STEPHANOPOULOS: ... exploded here at home this week, and several senators say that part of the reason for the high prices is that the oil-producing nations in OPEC are basically an illegal cartel, and they've asked the president to take action against those nations through the World Trade Organization. Are you for that?

RICE: Well, what we're for is getting and keeping production up. And the countries that are oil producers have pretty good incentive at this point to produce...

STEPHANOPOULOS: The high prices.

RICE: ... given high prices. And they also have an incentive recognizing that if there is a slowdown in the international economy, that there will be less need eventually for oil.

But we have both a long-term problem and a short-term problem. The short-term problem we are seeing -- we're seeing at the gas pump. The president outlined some measures to try to deal with that. He's obviously attentive to whether or not there is any manipulation or gouging through processes that are available to examine that, but he also has talked about the long-term needs.

We need to reduce our reliance on oil. We need to diversify the basis of our energy economy. We need to deal with the long-term problems of technologies that may get us out of this trap.

But I can tell you that if anything has surprised me as secretary of state, it is the degree to which the kind of search for hydrocarbons is distorting international politics. That means that the quicker we get about the business of reducing our reliance on oil, the better we're going to be.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Madam Secretary, thank you very much.

RICE: Thank you.

STEPHANOPOULOS: That debate on big oil is next. And later, George Clooney.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CLOONEY: There's an awful lot of killing going on, and that's not me saying that; that's not some radical lefty saying the Sudanese government is killing people.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN CORNYN (R), TEXAS: Congress can do a lot of things, but we can't repeal the laws of supply and demand, and without additional supply, we know with more demand prices will continue to go up.

U.S. SENATOR RICHARD DURBIN (D), ILLINOIS: The oil companies blame everybody -- Katrina and Rita, and OPEC. Oh, they've got all kinds of explanations. But the bottom line is, their profits are going through the roof. What they're doing is crippling the economy.

STEPHANOPOULOS: That was the debate in the Senate this week. Now we have our own debate here in the studio.

I am joined by one of the chief lobbyists for the oil industry, former senator, Bennett Johnston of Louisiana; also Democratic Senator Chuck Schumer of New York, one of the chief critics of the oil industry.

You heard Senator Durbin there. He said the oil industry is crippling the economy.

JOHNSTON: Well, that's not so. The economy is very strong. But, look, oil profits are very high.

But it is the iron law of supply and demand. And supply is very much down now because you've got Katrina, Rita; you've got Iraq. Iraq costs us 900,000 barrels a day.

Altogether, we're down in supply by 2,100,000 barrels a day, while at the same time, China and India are taking off with huge demand.

It's supply and demand, and believe me, it will go down. It always does. And the price will go down.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Senator Schumer?

SCHUMER: Well, some of it is supply and demand, but some of it are problems in that we're not doing what we should be doing.

First, you have, internationally, OPEC. That's a cartel. That's not supply and demand.

STEPHANOPOULOS: It sounded to me like Secretary Rice said the administration is not going to be taking any action in the World Trade Organization...

SCHUMER: Which they should. I supported the bill. It was a bipartisan bill to try and take action.

Second, here at home, you used to have 20 or 25 oil companies, George. And there was some real competition.

Now we have five vertically integrated oil companies, vertically integrated meaning from the well to the pump. They don't compete. And so while supply and demand pushes the price up some, they exacerbate the situation.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me pick up on that because, Senator Johnston, the GAO, the government's General Accounting Office, has looked at this issue of concentration and found that these mergers have led, on the margins, to higher prices.

JOHNSTON: I think that is not correct. They have improved each one of these mergers.

Look, the biggest oil company in America, Exxon, has only three percent of the world's crude. It's a very slight amount.

The main driver of higher oil prices -- higher gasoline prices is crude oil. And crude oil is going up because of competition, because -- look, we are -- remember when China tried to get UNOCAL. There's great competition out there for that last barrel of oil.

And by the way, the thing that is driving so much of the price of crude oil and, in turn, gasoline today is Iran.

And Chuck, I hope you'll do your part to keep us from rattling the saber on Iran because that's the thing that's really...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Keep us from rattling the saber?

JOHNSTON: We're rattling the saber on Iran. And it's -- you know, it jacks up that price of crude oil.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, what do we do if they're going to build a nuclear weapon?

JOHNSTON: Well, bombing Iran, believe me, is not the solution.

I mean, it would -- at least Hezbollah and the Strait of Hormuz -- we'd see gasoline prices above $5 or $6; crude oil above $100 if we bomb Iran.

SCHUMER: Yes, the bottom line here is: What's good for Exxon Mobil is not necessarily good for America. And that's what this administration has done.

Here's what we need, George. We need of bunch of things be done which this administration doesn't want to do. Number one is conservation. We have the worst conservation program in the world.

China, a country that doesn't even believe in the environment, has much better gas mileage standards than we do.

Then we need a Manhattan Project to become independent of fossil fuels and particularly imported oil. We have to drop our exports in half in 10 years and we can do it.

But what happens is, because this administration believes what's good for Exxon Mobil is good for America, they simply do what the oil companies want. The oil companies are happy with high prices and record profits.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But neither of those proposals are going to do anything in the short term.

Some of your colleagues have also talked about a windfall profits tax. And I want to show you what the Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said about that this week.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BEN BERNANKE, FEDERAL RESERVE CHAIRMAN: Profits taxes have the adverse effect of removing one of the major incentives of our market system. If people think that their profits are going to be taxed away, that reduces their incentive to engage in certain activities.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: That sounds like common sense.

SCHUMER: Well, look, the oil companies are paying the same as it was at $40 a barrel as it is at $75 and they're making more profits.

But to me, the real problem is structure. We have to look at restructuring the oil companies. There used to be, even 15 years ago, 20 oil companies.

When you have 20, you'll get one, two, three who will decide to compete on price.

In other words, increase customers by reducing price. When you only have five -- and we never should have let Exxon Mobil merge, Chevron Texaco merge -- they never compete on price. So I have asked the GAO, and I believe we ought to look at restructuring. We ought to examine whether we should do a little good old-fashioned trust-busting.

Because as long as you have these five companies that are in cahoots with Exxon on one end and in cahoots with the government in Washington on the other end, you're never going to free your dependence on oil.

JOHNSTON: Well, look, we tried the windfall profits tax. I voted for it. It was a terrible mistake. After a few years we came back on a bipartisan basis, rushed in to repeal it because it reduced domestic production by 6 percent, reduced -- increased imports by 16 percent. It would be madness. Now, the reason you allow companies to get bigger and they are very -- I was going to say very small. They're small compared to Saudi Aramco...

STEPHANOPOULOS: They're not small.

SCHUMER: They are not small.

JOHNSTON: But they're not big compared to Saudi Aramco and the national oil companies in the world, and they have to go out and compete against those companies to drill down in 12,000 feet of water to drill under the sea bed for 20 or 30,000 feet. I mean, it's hugely expensive. It takes a big company. You can't...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But they've also been getting a lot of help from the government. I mean, the oil companies getting a lot of help from the governme nt including some royalty relief for domestic drilling. I want to end -- The New York Times has looked into this. I want to show you what they wrote last month. It said, 1/8O 3/8il companies stand to gain a minimum of $7 billion and as much as $28 billion over the next five years under an obscure provision in last year's giant energy bill that allows companies to avoid paying royalties on oil and gas produced in the Gulf of Mexico.

When this was first conceived, oil was at about $18 a barrel. Now you're at $72 a barrel. Why should oil companies be getting royalty relief when oil is at $72 a barrel?

JOHNSTON: Well, they shouldn't, and that was a glitch. Actually by the Clinton Department of Energy. STEPHANOPOULOS: And then reaffirmed last year in the energy bill.

JOHNSTON: Right, and it should not be -- it ought to be phased out, as was the intent...

STEPHANOPOULOS: The oil industry is going to say it should be phased out?

JOHNSTON: Some of the big companies are not collecting it because they say that that was the intent, and I can tell you that was the intent because originally in 1995 it was my bill, and we wanted to phase it out in the-- I think it was $38 a barrel.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But Kerr-McGee is suing to get even more. They're suing to get $28 billion.

JOHNSTON: Well, they're not one of the big ones, by the way.

SCHUMER: You know, the bottom line is this, George. First, the oil companies have such power. Right now on the floor, we're trying to get rid of these royalties. And many senators, mostly from the other side of the aisle, are opposing it. But we can have a common- sense compromise, and this is in the long run, and this is a national imperative.

The Democrats say conserve, reduce demand. The Republicans say increase supply. Why are the two contradictory? I will propose to my Republican colleagues that we can probably find Democratic votes to drill in the east Gulf. We now drill in the west Gulf, will has most of our oil and gas. The east Gulf is second. Drill there.

In exchange, help us move those mileage standards up to 40 miles a gallon. If we can have that kind of compromise, we won't have this problem five years from now. But right now the administration and others simply take the bidding of big oil, and we don't get anything done.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Will the oil industry support that kind of a compromise?

JOHNSTON: Well, look, first of all, big oil to my knowledge is not opposing cafe standards. I mean, that's, that's Detroit. Chuck, I...

SCHUMER: But the administration opposes it, and most of the Republicans oppose it.

JOHNSTON: Well, they may, but I think you're right. I think there's a big compromise out there. I think you need energy efficiency. I think you need conservation, and you need to drill.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, on that note of agreement, I'm going to end this. We don't get that all that often. Thank you both very much. The roundtable is next with George Will, Fareed Zakaria, Jay Carney and Claire Shipman. And later President Bush stars in the Sunday Funnies.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: I'm absolutely delighted to be here. As is Laura.

GEORGE W. BUSH IMPERSONATOR: She is hot.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Our voice this week, George Clooney.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

(voice over): The Oscar winner for playing a CIA agent in Syriana is in Washington today to headline the Save Darfur rally.

Just days after returning from a real-life secret mission, Clooney and his television anchor dad smuggled cameras into the Darfur refugee camps, reporting on the 21st century's first genocide.

CLOONEY: The news is that, two years after we've said genocide, that it's still going on and it's increasing and that, somewhere in there, we can all talk about this and make speeches and say this is horrible and we have to do something, but every day we don't do something and every day that this goes on, thousands of people are dying and dying horrific deaths.

Samantha Power wrote a piece where she met with a woman who was running as they were coming into camp and they -- she was holding two of her kids and her son following her and they shot her son in the back, who was six, and she ran up in the hills with her two daughters and they came back and they had stuffed the well full of parts of all of the citizens of this little village, including her son.

They poison the wells in every town they go into. They don't want the land. They just want to cleanse everyone. The unfortunate truth of it is it's not somehow sexy enough news.

And it's hard; it's hard to look at. And after a while people don't want to see it. And there's a lot of, I think, wear and tear on people seeing a lot of tragedy.

But while we don't pay attention to it and sort of shut our eyes, there's an awful lot of killing going on, an awful lot of rape going on. Here's the thing: we always see this now.

We have tragedy fatigue on television every day, 20 kids killed in Iraq or, you know, there's always disaster -- Pakistan, Afghanistan; there's always horrible disaster -- Nepal now.

But this is genocide. And if everybody just got up right now out of their chair and picked up a phone and called their Congressman or called the number that registered with the president, it makes a difference. It always has.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

STEPHANOPOULOS: For more George Clooney, check out our Voices Plus feature at thisweek.abcnews.com.

FOX – NEWS SUNDAY

WALLACE: I'm Chris Wallace. Former Secretary of State Powell speaks out about the Iraq war, next on Fox News Sunday .

With his poll ratings at an all-time low, President Bush faces tough challenges, from surging gas prices to stalled immigration reform. We'll talk with the man the president has asked to help save his second term, new White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten, in his first interview and a Sunday exclusive.

Also, we'll dig into the week's political news and look back at the first decade of Fox News Sunday with our regulars, Brit Hume, Mara Liasson, Bill Kristol and Juan Williams. And our Power Player of the Week. There was only one possible choice. All right now on the 10th anniversary of Fox News Sunday .

And good morning again from Fox News in Washington. Let's get a quick check of the latest headlines. Former Secretary of State Colin Powell said today that before the Iraq war, he urged Defense Secretary Rumsfeld and General Tommy Franks to use more troops.

In a British television interview, Powell said the Pentagon did not correctly anticipate what would happen after Baghdad fell.

And in Iran, a foreign ministry spokesman says his country would not take any sanctions from the U.N. lying down. The official said Iran would not give up its nuclear program.

Well, last night here in Washington at the White House correspondents' dinner, President Bush spoke about recent personnel changes in his administration.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Ladies and gentlemen, I'm feeling chipper tonight. I survived the White House shake-up.

(LAUGHTER)

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Joining us now for his first interview since taking on his new assignment, the architect of that shake-up, Josh Bolten, the new White House chief of staff.

Mr. Bolten, thanks for coming in and welcome to Fox News Sunday .

BOLTEN: Thank you, Chris. WALLACE: You have made a number of changes in your first two weeks on the job. We'll get into the specifics later. But looking at the big picture, what are you trying to accomplish? What are you trying to change in the way this White House does business?

BOLTEN: What the change says, Chris, is simply that there's a new person in charge. I told the president that when he asked me to do this job that you can't trade up from Andy Card. He's one of the finest, most decent, honorable and effective public servants that this country has ever known.

But what the change does provide is an opportunity for the White House to step back, refresh, re-energize at a time when we're 5.5 years into an administration, normally a slow point, a low point, in many administrations, and a chance for us to get our mojo back, to go back more on the offensive and to get people within the White House to look at our operations, re-energize them for the next six months up through the election, the next 1,000 days through the end of this president's term.

WALLACE: Are there some things, as you've looked at this, either in terms of operations or in terms of policy, that you want to change?

BOLTEN: Yes, there are things that we want to change I've talked with the president about. We do want to have a more open environment to the press and to the public. We've already had that under way for a while.

You've seen the president out more in more casual settings, more free-flowing. He's very good in those settings, and we've taken advice from a lot of folks that we ought to put the president out more in ways that the American people can see what he's really like.

WALLACE: I want to show you the three latest polls on presidential approval. Take a look at them here. All three have Mr. Bush in the 30s, at all-time lows for his presidency, with disapproval up around 60 percent.

There's a new phrase here in Washington which I'm sure you have heard, the Bolten bounce, the idea that somehow you're going to be able to achieve a rebound in the polls for the president.

But given the deep concerns that the public has about Iraq, where in the month of April it was the highest death toll for Americans in the last five months, the concern they have about energy prices and other real issues, how much can a White House chief of staff do to improve the president's standing in the polls?

BOLTEN: Oh, I don't think very much. I mean, I don't give much credence to the Bolten bounce stuff. What my job is is to bring the best possible policies to the president, the best possible operations within the White House, and then let the president and the policies take care of themselves.

It's not about me. It's about me giving the president the most effective operation he can have.
WALLACE: Well, you know, you talked about what basically was packaging, getting him out more, being friendlier to the press corps. What about policy?

I mean, in the end, isn't that what people are concerned about, policies, whether it's on energy or immigration or Iraq? Isn't that what you have to change?

BOLTEN: I don't think we need to change, but we do need to refresh and re-energize.

WALLACE: What does that mean, sir?

BOLTEN: Well, it means, for example, that when we get an issue like immigration, which is one of the toughest issues on the agenda today, that we are thinking actively and we're taking the president out in a leadership role on one of the toughest issues of the day.

WALLACE: Let me ask you -- we'll get to immigration in a moment, but I want to ask you about one of the top issues, certainly, in voters' concerns around the country right now, and that's energy.

On Friday, the president came out and talked about how strong the economy continues to be, the 4.8 percent growth in the first quarter of this year. But there's a cloud on the horizon, and the new fed chairman, Bernanke, talked about it this week. Let's take a look.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BEN BERNANKE, FED CHAIRMAN: The nominal price of crude oil has risen to new highs and gasoline prices are also up sharply. Rising energy prices pose a risk to both economic activity and inflation.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: How concerned is the president that high energy prices could cause a downturn in the economy?

BOLTEN: Oh, very concerned about the high energy prices, but one of the remarkable things about this economy has been how resilient it's been to the many shocks we've had during the president's tenure.

Remember, we came in with a recession on the doorstep, had the attacks of 9/11, corporate scandals, the war on terror, the worst natural disaster in this country's history -- by far the most expensive -- and now, on top of that, energy prices that are probably about three times as high as when the president came into office.

And through all of that, we've had a very resilient economy. That's a remarkable thing, for the economy to be as strong as it is today given the shocks and challenges we've had.

I credit to a large extent the economic policies of this president, especially the tax cuts, but we need to be cautious about it going forward, especially with these high energy prices. We need to make sure that we retain a competitive environment, and that means in particular a low tax environment for this economy.

WALLACE: But specifically on energy prices, because they've never been this high -- they're now up over $3 most places around the country and might go higher -- could a continuation of those kinds of prices threaten the economy?

BOLTEN: They haven't so far. And we need to do everything possible to make sure that they don't.

WALLACE: The president came out with a plan this week to deal with high gas prices, and I want to ask you about part of it, halting deposits to the strategic petroleum reserve this summer. I want to go back and show you what the president said about the strategic reserve back during the 2004 campaign. Let's watch.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: We will not play politics with the strategic petroleum reserve. That petroleum reserve is in place in case of major disruptions of energy.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Question, isn't the president now playing politics with the strategic reserve?

BOLTEN: No, no. All that we're doing with the strategic reserve right now is we're deferring some deposits that were planned to be made in the summer. We were planning to end the deposits in any event this fall, so we're just at a time when we've got especially critical crimps on supply going into the summer driving season.

We just decided to defer the deposits into the -- the policies that the president set back then are the ones that still stand.

WALLACE: But halting deposits to the reserve would add 10 million barrels of oil to the U.S. supply. That's half of what Americans consume in a single day. I mean, isn't that basically, in terms of dealing with this problem, meaningless?

BOLTEN: Oh, it's a modest step, and I think when the president announced it, he said it was a small step. What we've got to realize here, Chris, is that this is a very large problem. It's built up over many years -- decades, in fact. It's not going to be solved in the short run by some silver bullet.

There are a lot of policies that need to be put in place over the long run to wean ourselves from our dependence on foreign oil. That's the only thing that's going to make a difference in the long run.

WALLACE: In that sense, if everything the president called for this week went through, how much would it lower the price of a gallon of gas at the gas pump this summer?

BOLTEN: Oh, I have no idea, but I expect the effects would be relatively modest. The point of...
WALLACE: Pennies, correct?

BOLTEN: I don't know what the price -- what the exact price would be. But the point is that there are some steps we can take in the short run, like dealing with the strategic petroleum reserve, like loosening up on regulations about the fuel mix that needs to be used in particular localities.

But what the president was also talking about this past week and what he's been talking about for some time are longer term measures to increase supply and reduce demand in this country.

Now, some of the things can have some effect in the short run -- greater encouragement for hybrid vehicles. But others are going to take a long time to have effect, like taking advantage of the supply we have here, shifting over to more alternative fuels.

All of those policies need to come together because we need to leave behind a legacy in which this country is headed toward weaning itself from its dependence on foreign oil. We've been going in the wrong direction for years, for decades. We have deepened our addiction to foreign oil. The president is determined to set that back on the right path.

WALLACE: Let me ask you about one other specific point. The president asked this week for authority to be able to raise the fuel economy standards for all cars, not just light trucks and SUVs.

Do you have a plan in place, if you were given that authority, as to how much you would like to raise the fuel efficiency of cars?

BOLTEN: The process itself would take some time for the secretary of transportation to work out. But we have a plan to proceed to arrive at the right kind of number.

Remember, it's not just raising the corporate average fuel economy. The system needs a reform so that it's based more on the size and weight of vehicles so that we get the efficiencies without sacrificing safety in our cars.

WALLACE: Let's talk about some of the changes that you have made. The choice of Tony Snow as the new press secretary -- you mentioned at the very beginning that one of the things you want to do is improve relations with the press. Why is that important?

BOLTEN: Well, it's very important because the way that we communicate, that the White House itself communicates, with the press is the way that the American people see us.

The most important thing in particular on the president's agenda right now is the effective prosecution of the war in terror in Afghanistan, in Iraq, around the world. If we're not communicating effectively about the importance of that task and the way in which we're carrying it out, we're not going to sustain the support of the American people. And without the support of the American people, this very difficult task can't be sustained. The president said before that we will win this war on terror. The only way we can lose it is if we lose our will at home.

We need to be sure in particular on that subject that we are sustaining public support for the policies that I believe very strongly are exactly on the right course.

WALLACE: Very briefly, it sounds counterintuitive, but some people suggest that a way to improve relations with the press would be to end the televising of the press briefings and all the posturing by members of the White House press corps, and I say that as somebody who used to be a member of the White House press corps. Any thought of doing that?

BOLTEN: I'm sure, Chris, you never postured in the way that some people are talking about. It's worth considering. I think that will be a -- Tony Snow's first test to see what kind of power player he really is and whether he's able to establish the right kind of relationship with the press that we need going forward.

WALLACE: You say worth considering. Would that be something that you think would improve relations with the press or hurt them?

BOLTEN: My guess is in the short run it would hurt them. The judgment would be, as we do in all things, is look at the long run and see whether it's helpful in the long run. I'm going to leave that judgment to Tony Snow to make a recommendation in concert with your colleagues in the White House press corps.

WALLACE: Taking the policy portfolio from Karl rove, a lot of people read that as a signal that you are the new sheriff in town.

BOLTEN: I'm the new chief of staff, and what that means is a new management style. But with respect to Karl, he remains a very important voice in our policy process. He's not only a brilliant political mind, he's one of the most brilliant policy minds as well that we have, I believe, in this country today.

And what I've done in the restructuring in White House responsibilities is passed off the day-to-day management of the policy process to my deputy, in whom I have the greatest confidence,

Joel Kaplan, and freeing up Karl to focus more on bigger strategic issues. It's a refocusing of portfolios, but it's not a removal of voices in the policy process.

WALLACE: So he hasn't had his wings clipped.

BOLTEN: Oh, no, not at all. He's a terrific person. He's a dear friend. And he has the absolute confidence of the president and everybody else in the White House.

I think this restructuring that we're going through will, in fact, enhance his ability to serve the president. WALLACE: And how much does it weigh -- we saw him, of course, testifying for the fifth time before a grand jury this week. How much does that legal uncertainty weigh on this White House?

BOLTEN: Well, obviously, I can't comment at all on the case. But what I can tell you is that Karl Rove is as engaged as I've ever seen him in his work. He's always cheerful, optimistic and energetic. He gets more done in an hour than most people get done in a day. And I don't think anybody else in the White House feels weighed down by it at all.

WALLACE: We have to take a break here. But when we come back, I want to ask you about the possibility of more personnel changes. I want to ask you about other issues, especially immigration, and about your working relationship with your boss, the president.

And we'll be right back with more of our exclusive interview with the new White House chief of staff in a moment.

WALLACE: And we're back now with White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten.

Before we move to other issues, I want to ask you a little bit more about personnel. When Secretary Rumsfeld was under fire recently, the president said that he had decided what's best is for Rumsfeld to stay at the Pentagon.

Does he feel the same way about Treasury Secretary Snow?

BOLTEN: The president has full confidence in Secretary Rumsfeld, Secretary Snow, all the members of his cabinet.

WALLACE: Are there any plans at all to replace John Snow in the treasury?

BOLTEN: Well, we all serve at the pleasure of the president, including me. Maybe, as chief of staff, especially me. But the president's got full confidence in Secretary Snow. He's been doing a great job, as he has full confidence in all the members of the cabinet.

WALLACE: I mean, you can put all the rumors to rest right here. Are you shopping that job out? Are you talking to people about replacing him? Is that right or wrong?

BOLTEN: We're all serving at the pleasure of the president, and the president has full confidence in every member of his cabinet, including John Snow.

WALLACE: Is the shake-up basically over, and do you regard it as a shake-up?

BOLTEN: At the White House?

WALLACE: Yes.

BOLTEN: Yes, I regard it as a change. I mean, when you bring in a new chief of staff, you get some change. You get change in management style. We have a couple of more posts to fill. But we've got really good people. And I'm proud of everybody that I've been working with for several years. I'm proud of all the folks we have.

I'm hopeful that the change means an opportunity for everybody within the White House to look at their operations and gear themselves up for a very tough several months ahead. But I think we've got a good team in place, and I think we can serve the president well.

WALLACE: One of the hot-button issues that you've got to deal with now is immigration reform. Does the president worry that the immigrant boycott that is scheduled for tomorrow plus this whole development involving the Spanish Star-Spangled Banner -- does he worry that that could create a backlash and make it even harder to pass sensible immigration reform?

BOLTEN: I don't know what effect those particular events are likely to have, but in fact, the president does want to try to bring this very difficult issue to some kind of consensus. He said that to a bipartisan, and very bipartisan, group of senators in a meeting last week.

It's a very emotional issue. There are ways to solve the enormous illegal immigration problem that we have in this country, but I think only if we tone down the very emotional rhetoric on both sides of it and come to some consensus position in the middle.

WALLACE: How active, and I mean not just in having a meeting, but getting into the legislative details, does the president plan to be in getting immigration reform passed by Congress?

And specifically, does he support the concept in the leading Senate bill, the idea that illegals that have been here longer, say five years, should get an easier, quicker path to citizenship than illegals who have been here a shorter period of time?

BOLTEN: Well, the president was deeply engaged even this past week when he met with the members. They were talking details. I won't try to negotiate on television about what the specifics might be.

But the president does believe in a temporary worker program that makes it possible for a willing foreign worker to be matched up with a willing American employer for jobs that Americans are typically not available to do. We need to do that on a basis that gives comfort to everybody concerned.

We need to make sure that the people who come in, for example, would -- into this program, if they've been here illegally, would, for example, pay a fine, pay back taxes, learn English, follow our laws, and then get in the back of the line for possible citizenship, if that's what they want to pursue, because the one thing the president doesn't want to do in this process is disadvantage the people who have been playing by the rules and are in line to try to come in here legally.

WALLACE: There's a report that your top priority on taxes is to extend the rate cuts for capital gains and stock dividends. True?

BOLTEN: It's a high priority, yes, it is. And it's been a very important element of the strong economic recovery we have in place right now. I mentioned all the shocks that our system has been through in the last 5.5 years. And yet we've still got an economy that this past quarter, as you mentioned at the top, Chris, is growing at 4.8 percent. That's terrific growth for any economy, much less one that's been through what we've been through.

So the capital gains cuts, the dividend cuts, are important. But also important are the rates in individual income taxes that the president put in place in 2001 and 2003. They've been an important part of our recovery as well.

WALLACE: What about the analysis that more than half, 53 percent, of the benefits from rate cuts and stock dividends and capital gains go to households making more than $1 million a year?

BOLTEN: You know, there's been a lot of criticism of the president's tax cuts as benefiting the rich. The truth is that the tax cuts that the president put in place in 2001, 2003, with the strong support of members of Congress -- those changes have made the tax code more progressive rather than less.

Let me give you one data point, and that is that the top 10 percent of income earners in this country, and that's people making, I think, about more than $130,000 a year -- the top 10 percent in the absence of the president's tax cuts would be paying about 64 percent of our total federal income tax take.

After the president's tax cut, that same group is paying 66 percent of the total federal income tax take. The tax code under this president has become more progressive, and we have the top 10 percent of income earners paying two-thirds of the federal income tax.

Now, it seems to me that that's a system that cannot be accused of being unfair to -- or skewed toward the wealthy. And it's also a system that's produced a lot of growth in this country and ought to be sustained.

WALLACE: Let's talk about your working relationship with your boss. There's some speculation in Washington that the president has misgivings about taking on a strong chief of staff.

And I want to play two statements that he's made since you took over, the first about Don Rumsfeld, the second about Tony Snow. Here they are.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: I'm the decider. And I decide what is best.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: My job is to make decisions. And his job is to help explain those decisions to the press corps and the American people.

(END VIDEO CLIP) WALLACE: How free a hand has the president given you?

BOLTEN: Well, first of all, I agree with him completely. He is the decider.

WALLACE: That's smart.

BOLTEN: Yeah. But no matter who the president is, you want the president to be the decider. Nobody elected me or Tony Snow or anybody else. The people elected George W. Bush to be president, and he knows his role, he understands his role, and he makes the decisions that are presidential decisions.

He's given me a very free hand to organize and run the White House staff. That's what I'm doing with the changes that I've made so far. And he knows that that's not the kind of stuff a president ought to be messing with.

He needs to work on the big policy issues of the day and make sure that he has the staff in place, including me, that can support him best in doing that.

WALLACE: The talk, and it's mostly from outsiders, is this president is stubborn, that he doesn't like to hear criticism. Are you prepared to deliver the bad news he may not want to hear?

BOLTEN: I am. And I think that's one of the benefits of going to a chief of staff who's been in his operation for a while, somebody in whom he's got -- with whom he has some experience and confidence.

So I do feel comfortable going in and telling the president bad news sometimes. And let me emphasize, the president welcomes internal disagreement. He prizes the people -- in my experience, he prizes the people who come in and tell him stuff that's different from what everybody else has been telling him or that's different from where he's headed.

He doesn't necessarily change his mind, but there's no penalty internally for disagreeing with the group or with the president. But I say internally, because he's very much a CEO, and when he makes a decision, then everybody within the White House should salute and get in line, at least publicly, with that decision.

We have our disagreements internally. They're vigorous, but they're civil, and they're, I think, well-policy-based.

WALLACE: Does the president have a nickname for you?

BOLTEN: He does. The repeatable one is Yosh.

WALLACE: What's that mean?

BOLTEN: I think it's just a corruption of Josh. I'm not exactly sure where it came from.

WALLACE: And is there an unrepeatable one? BOLTEN: Yes, there are several unrepeatable ones.

WALLACE: Will you tell me about them during the commercial?

BOLTEN: Yes, during the break.

WALLACE: OK. Finally, let's talk a little bit about Josh Bolten, because the fact is this is the first opportunity a lot of people have had to get to see you. I understand one of the biggest problems you've got with your new job are the early hours.

BOLTEN: Yes. I'm not a morning person. I used to just barely make it to the senior staff meeting every morning at 7:30.

WALLACE: Andy Card got in at about 5:30.

BOLTEN: Andy Card got in often earlier than that, so I'm told. I was actually never there to see it.

WALLACE: So what time are you getting in?

BOLTEN: I'm getting in a little after 6:00 a.m. because my boss gets to the office at about 6:45. He's been up for a while, but he typically comes to the Oval Office at 6:45, and it's important for the chief of staff to be there to greet him and to talk over the business of the day.

But, Chris, as part of our outreach and openness to the press, I'm here with you this early on a Sunday morning. I've probably never seen this early on a Sunday morning before.

WALLACE: But you tell us you do TiVo the show.

BOLTEN: I do TiVo Fox News Sunday , but I've never seen this early before except maybe from the other end.

WALLACE: Now, is it true that you used to date Bo Derek?

BOLTEN: We are friends from the 2000 campaign where she was a good supporter of the president. She...

WALLACE: Here we have a picture of the two of you. You look like more than good friends, Mr. Bolten.

BOLTEN: Yes. You know, the president once said that when he'd seen a photo like that or had heard about it, the president commented that between the two of us, we're a perfect 15.

But Bo Derek remains a good supporter, a good friend to the president. She's been very articulate on a number of important issues. And we're glad to have that kind of support.

WALLACE: Listen, at our age, I think being rated a five by the president is probably a compliment.

BOLTEN: I'll take it. WALLACE: Mr. Bolten, we want to thank you so much for coming in for your first interview. Please come back, sir.

BOLTEN: Thank you.

WALLACE: Coming up, our gang of Sunday regulars on the week that was in Washington, from gas prices to more changes at the White House. Our panel will tackle all of it after this quick break.

FRIST: A plan that would give taxpayers a $100 gas tax holiday rebate check to help ease the pain that they're feeling at that pump.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SCHUMER: Get tough on big oil. President refuses to do that.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was just a sample of official Washington running for political cover on the issue of high gas prices.

And it's time now for our Sunday regulars, Brit Hume, Washington managing editor of Fox News, and Fox News contributors Mara Liasson of National Public Radio, Bill Kristol of The Weekly Standard, and Juan Williams, also from National Public Radio.

Well, it was quite the week in Washington on gas prices. First of all, you had trouble even getting into a gas station because so many politicians were holding so many press conferences by the gas pumps. And then when you did, you heard all kinds of ideas.

I have to say my favorite was the Bill Frist idea of a $100 gas tax holiday rebate check for every American. I figured out that was going to cost us about $10 billion, so you could fill your gas tank up twice.

Brit, did any of it make any sense?

HUME: No, not a bit of it. The idea of getting tough on big oil is at least as silly as the $100 rebate. We did some research and found that since 1979, there have been official investigations of oil companies, and gasoline prices and so on 11 times.

And you'll not be surprised to learn, Chris, that they all found essentially the same thing, that market forces and other external factors, and not collusion or corruption or monopolistic behavior among the oil companies, was responsible. It's just not there to be found, but it sounds good in an election year, just like a $100 tax rebate gas check sounds.

WALLACE: (inaudible) doesn't it? HUME: Well, it's just laughable.

WALLACE: Is this just pandering, pure and simple, Mara?

LIASSON: The only thing better than that -- the vast majority of it is pandering, pure and simple, although my best part of those press conferences is when they got in their big SUVs to drive the one block back to the Capitol.

Look, most of it is pandering, and Brit was quoting someone this week who says there's nothing -- the only thing worse than partisan demagoguery is bipartisan demagoguery.

HUME: Thomas Sowell.

LIASSON: Thomas Sowell.

But look, there were amidst all this -- and by the way, we should point out the president joined right in. I mean, he had a bunch of ideas just like that. And he wanted also to get tough on the oil companies and to find out if there was price gouging, even though they've been investigated numerous times.

But in the midst of all of this, there were a few glimmers of long-term solutions, like the president wants to take a look at CAFE standards, something that has been blocked regularly in congress by mostly Republicans, but some Democrats from the Midwest, from auto states. That would do something in the long term. In the short term, there really are no solutions.

WALLACE: I was going to ask you about that, Bill. Is there anything in the short term that politicians could do to really affect the price of gas this summer and, if not, would it be political suicide just to admit it -- hey, folks, there's nothing we can do?

KRISTOL: I think the price of gas will actually come down slightly, because inventories are very high.

WALLACE: But nothing that the politicians are doing.

KRISTOL: There's not much they can do over the short term, obviously. Look, if the price of the underlying commodity triples, or almost quadruples, which is the case with crude oil, the price of the retail product at the pump, which is gasoline for cars, is going to go up a lot. It hasn't gone up as much as the underlying price of crude oil. So that's going to happen. And long term, there are all kinds of things that could happen.

Bill Clinton vetoed when the Republican Congress passed in 1995 permission to drill in ANWR to get more oil from American soil. That was vetoed by Bill Clinton. He said well, that won't address the problem for the next five years or 10 years. If he had not vetoed that, we would now have more domestic oil coming online.

But all the energy solutions are long term. I think the politicians will get credit by telling the American people the truth -- short term, there's not much we can do.

WILLIAMS: Well, I'm glad to hear you saying that you know inventories are high this week, and so that you understand that there's no reason for the prices to keep going up except some kind of gouging or exploitation here by oil companies. I mean, I'm glad to hear you finally turn around this, because supply and demand -- I mean, there are certain basic rules that we should obey in the country.

But if you look at the profits this week, profits are soaring through the roof -- 50 percent rise in profits for these oil companies.

KRISTOL: What were Exxon Mobil's profits up?

WILLIAMS: I think Exxon Mobil...

KRISTOL: Seven percent. What were their sales up? Eight percent. Is that price gouging, sales up 8 percent, profits up 7 percent?

WILLIAMS: Yes. It seems to me there's no basis at this point for explaining this except that there's some corruption, and the corruption comes from people who are speculating and pushing prices up unnecessarily and, I think, hurting the economy and, by the way, hurting President Bush. That's why I think he's in such trouble.

WALLACE: I'm surprised to hear this week -- and you know, one of the good things that does come out of this is -- and I must say, it was on Special Report -- you actually learned some facts. And one of the facts, apparently, is that the return on investment in the gas industry, the oil industry, these big companies, is no higher than the industrial average.

HUME: And it has not been a great place to invest your money over time. And there's been a -- because of the run-up in petroleum prices, companies that had reserves of crude oil have made a lot of money on those things, because the demand is up, and the supply, while it has increased, has not kept pace.

And so you get more profit out of that, and that's the way that works. And you know, to argue that somehow this is collusion is -- we don't need to go there.

WALLACE: All right. Well, let's not go there.

Mara, let's turn to another subject, another event this week. The president and Josh Bolten made some more changes at the White House. Anything that you see or that you heard today that says they're jump-starting this administration?

LIASSON: Possibly. I think that changing the way that the communications operation works there could change things for President Bush. If more news is made in the briefing, if -- although I think the relationship between the press and the press spokesman is overrated. I don't know if it really matters how good that relationship is.

But I think to have a more aggressive, forward-leaning spokesperson, have more than one possibly, might help the administration. But the policies aren't going to change, and right now I think the president's low approval ratings are being driven by Iraq, by gas prices, by things that no new press secretary or chief of staff really can change.

WALLACE: Bill?

KRISTOL: Well, look. This insular, closed bad-at-communicating White House got itself reelected in 2004 and increased -- won an off- year election in 2002, when the economy was much less good, incidentally.

It's about the war on terror, not just the war in Iraq, but the global war on terror and the sense, not unjustified, that we have had setbacks in the last six months to nine months.

A year ago, even though Iraq was difficult, it looked like we were making progress more broadly in the Middle East and that we really had the forces of radical Islamic jihadism on the run. They've had a bit of a comeback.

Iran, I think, is a huge problem. Hamas' victory in Palestine -- and then, of course, the difficulty in Iraq. If we win the war on terror, Bush will be fine, and he should focus entirely -- he should let Tony -- Josh Bolten can restructure the White House staff, and Tony Snow will do a much better job in the briefings.

What the president should focus on is winning the broad war on terror, which includes, obviously, winning in Iraq.

WILLIAMS: I think part of it is that not only getting the message out, but the idea that the message gets in. And I think people haven't been convinced that the president hears and understands everything.

I mean, I think, for example, the conversation that we're having on gas prices I think is largely that the president and the Republican Congress have gotten the message that the American people are outraged over the rise in gas prices.

On Iraq, I think people for the first time have a sense -- and the president has, I think, exhibited this in the changing way that he goes about talking to the American people when he goes out. He's getting away from these very closed events that are prescribed in terms of who's Allowed in to ask questions.

But the idea is that he hears the American people are dissatisfied with this policy, so the way he goes about making a decision, which has tended to be very insular, and then simply repeating it time and again to everybody -- that has to change, and hopefully that's what Tony Snow will do by coming in and saying here's what actually took place, here's how a decision was made.

And then hopefully, as Josh Bolten told Chris earlier, the rationale will appeal to the American people.

WALLACE: I want to hit on one other piece of news this week, Brit. Karl Rove testified for the fifth time before a grand jury in the CIA leak case. Any sense whether that's good or bad for Rove?

HUME: Well, I think not much has changed. He is not yet a target of the investigation. It seems to me probably unlikely that he will become one.

What I understand from sources about this particular round of testimony is that it grew out of the so-called Viveca Novak chain of events. She, of course, was aware that he, Rove, had had a conversation with Matt Cooper of Time, where she then worked, and Rove hadn't remembered it, said he hadn't had such a conversation.

WALLACE: In his first testimony...

HUME: In his first testimony.

WALLACE: ... in front of the grand jury he didn't mention it.

HUME: And she said to Rove's lawyer, who is a personal friend of hers, at a lunch -- she said you know, he thinks he doesn't have a Cooper problem, but he may have a Cooper problem.

That is what triggered the research by Rove and his lawyer of the presidential -- the White House records that turned up the e-mail which affirmed to Rove that while he didn't have any memory of it that he had had this conversation with Cooper, and they took that to the grand jury.

And as I understood it, at the end of this whole sequence of questions about that, there was a question from the prosecutor, something to the effect of so, when you first said you hadn't had any conversations with Cooper, you were not trying to deceive the government or the grand jury, whoever. And the answer was something like no, I certainly was not trying to -- I just didn't remember it.

And the final remark was something like well, I think we're done here. And he turns to the grand jury and says any questions, and the grand jury at that moment had no questions, and that was the end of the testimony.

Now, you never know what a prosecutor is going to do, but if it were I walking out of the grand jury after that, I'd have felt reasonably comforted, as he seemed to, by the way.

WALLACE: Well, the thing is, it's four hours. It was a long visit. And I think it's caused concern, and I think it also -- combined with what's going on in the Libby case, there's concern that the president, the vice president, everybody -- the whole thing just continues to snowball.

WALLACE: Okay. We need to take a break here. But coming up, we're going to talk about the past decade in politics on this 10th anniversary of Fox News Sunday . Stay tuned.
(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: On this day in 1789, the first presidential inauguration took place. George Washington, the leader of American forces in the Revolution, took the oath of office in New York City.

Stay tuned for more from our panel and our Power Player of the Week.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SNOW: Welcome to the beginning of something new, a Sunday show that lets you do the talking.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: And with those words on April 28, 1996, Tony Snow launched Fox News Sunday . Of course, since then, we've done a lot more talking than you have. And we're going to continue that now with Brit, Mara, Bill and Juan.

Well, we have a special anniversary show on Fox News Channel tonight, and we'll tell you all about it in just a moment. But as we put together the history of the show, it was fascinating, because it's really the history of the past decade in American government and politics.

Brit, what strikes you about the last 10 years in this town?

HUME: This has been an amazing time, just the turbulence of it. I mean, think of what has happened since that show began. We have had the impeachment of a president in the midst of a scandal which I think any of us, if somebody outlined the scandal to us ahead of time -- you know, president in Oval Office, intern, sex...

WALLACE: Yes, we know.

HUME: ... would say that's the end of that guy. Instead, the guy's now being voted president of the world, and although he was impeached, he came out of it about as gloriously as anybody could possibly imagine.

In addition to that, we had the extraordinary election in 2000, the unprecedented near tie, the recount, which dragged on for what, nearly 40 days. And then we had the terrorist attack in 2001, an amazing development. You know, who would have imagined that? I mean, I suppose you can imagine it, but whoever thought it was going to happen?

And then two wars, another close election, and the thing goes on. These are amazing times. This show's been there for all of it.

LIASSON: Yes, there's been nothing placid about the history of Fox News Sunday or at least the 10 years that it's spanned. I mean, when you also just think about just the stuff we're covering now, I mean, in 1996, the Republican revolution was in its, you could say, infancy, two years into power, at least in the House.

And now those big dreams of Karl Rove, which seemed very realistic after 2000 and 2004 of making a permanent Republican majority -- now you see a White House and a party that's pretty much struggling for survival in the next midterm.

So the reversals of fortunes have been extraordinary and I think pretty unpredictable.

WALLACE: Bill, as we were working on the show and looking back over the events of the year, it seems like there was this one -- tough to say, because it came out of the tragedy of 9/11, but there seemed to be this one oasis of bipartisanship and national unity for a year, 1.5 years, after 9/11. But other than that, from '96 to 2006, it just seems to have gotten meaner and more polarized.

KRISTOL: Well, and social scientists studied this, and the parties are more different from each other than they used to be. They've sorted themselves out into a liberal and conservative party. There's red America, blue America. The country is more polarized.

And for me, the event of the last 10 years, obviously, is 9/11. We were at peace, and subsequently we've been at war. And now we are being tested as to whether we are serious enough and capable enough and committed enough to fight a global war against jihadist Islam and against the dictatorships that sort of back them up, which include China and now Russia.

So the notion that history was ending, liberal democracy was triumphant, everything is going to settle down to business and an easy life -- not so. We're back in the same kind of struggle between liberal democracy and its enemies that we were in for the 20th century and for much of the 19th century, and that's the big development.

WALLACE: Juan, are you struck by how much 9/11 and the war changed this town or how little it changed this town?

WILLIAMS: Well, I think it's -- I'm struck in some sense by how little it changed, because I thought that 9/11 was a real opportunity for the country to come together.

In fact, one of the big complaints about President Bush is that all of the sort of emotional capital that he had to -- you know, people wanting to help, wanting to contribute, wasn't taken advantage of, and the country has continued down this path to increased partisanship.

I think, you know, Brit gave you a pretty good list of what's happened over these last 10 years, but what strikes me in a sense is also the people stories that we've been here for. I think of everything from Hurricane Katrina to tsunami as events that, again, changed the way -- you know, and brought out, I think, the best in the American people, the sense of willingness to respond in a moment of crisis. And part of that, I think, is -- you know, we've seen it in the headlines over that 10-year period. The arguments we've seen with an aging society over things like the cost of prescription drugs, Medicare, and the current argument that we have over immigration, the kind of changing racial picture in the country and the impact that's had on our politics as well.

WALLACE: Juan, you are the senior member of this august panel. You were on the second show in May of 1997. And I think we actually have a picture of you that we can put up there. You haven't -- well, actually, you have aged a little.

WILLIAMS: A little more gray, Chris.

WALLACE: But is there a favorite moment or an indelible moment that stands out for you?

WILLIAMS: Well, obviously, we were here the Sunday actually when the news magazines were breaking the impeachment story. And I think lots of people really were first told that story here on Fox News Sunday in some ways.

And then secondly, 9/11 -- 9/11, no question -- the shock, the idea that you know, family members, friends of mine had died -- it was an emotionally draining time.

WALLACE: Mara, you came next, also in 1996, the first year. What moment stands out for you?

LIASSON: Well, I think the -- clearly, impeachment and 9/11 are the big moments. Oh, my goodness. Ah, a lot of hair.

HUME: Big hair.

LIASSON: I'm glad I got rid of that.

HUME: It looked good to me. LIASSON: Help, help.

WALLACE: I think you look better.

LIASSON: Take that picture off. Thank you.

Obviously, impeachment and 9/11 were the biggest. And one, when you think about it, were about things that were so inconsequential, I mean, the events themselves, and the others so consequential. But look, the show has been great fun.

And I'd like to say just in recent times one of the best parts of the morning is sitting back and watching the Power Player.

WALLACE: Well, thank you. Thank you, which we will do in a moment. We have about two minutes left, so you guys are going to have to share it.

Brit, you started in January of '97. What stands out for you in the almost 10 years you've been on the show?

HUME: Well, on this program, what stands out for me is that when I came to this show, we had -- although people like Juan -- look at that, would you? Geez. I'm not sure it was better then. Tough choice.

People like Juan and Mara had made occasional appearances on the show. I thought they were exactly the kind of people we needed, journalists all, and we instituted kind of a policy that the panel should be working journalists, you know.

And I think that's been -- the reason being that journalists, for better or for worse, will tell you what they really think, and I think you'll agree, Chris, that particularly with the addition of Bill, who's been so valuable, this is a group of people who will tell you -- we'll tell you what we really think.

WALLACE: Yes, you guys don't hide it.

Bill, you were the new kid. You started in 2000. You've got 30 seconds. What stands out for you in the six years you've been on the show?

KRISTOL: The first time I did the show was two days before election day in 2000. I said that I thought Gore was closing and that it would be (inaudible) election. I think that was a good prediction, and I'm going to rest with that one good prediction and forget about all the ones that were wrong.

WALLACE: Oh, but I also remember -- and we've got about 15 seconds left -- Iowa in 2004. You were the only person at this table to say...

KRISTOL: Thank you, Chris. That was nice of you.

WALLACE: ... (inaudible) is going to win.

WILLIAMS: You have a lot of winning predictions.

KRISTOL: Two in five years, that's good.

WALLACE: And of course, you helped force Harriet Miers out, but we won't talk about that.

Thank you all very much. See you next week.

Up next, our Power Player of the Week.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: It was a daunting challenge coming up with a Power Player for our 10th anniversary, but the more we thought about it, the more obvious our choice became. And recent events only made it easier to choose our Power Player of the Week.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE) SNOW: There's enough of a ham in me that thinks you know, it wouldn't be so bad to be up on the podium.

WALLACE: We talked with Tony Snow several days ago, before he decided whether to take the job of White House press secretary. But he was clearly interested.

SNOW: There's some real challenges out there, so the idea of being in a White House when important decisions are being made and also trying to communicate what a president is going to do to respond to those is important.

WALLACE: Our focus, though, wasn't on Tony's new job but his old one.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SNOW: Good morning. I'm Tony Snow.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: The first host of Fox News Sunday . At the start, Tony broadcast from historic homes around Washington, for a good reason.

SNOW: There wasn't a studio. There wasn't bupkus.

WALLACE: Over the years, Tony built the show around a central vision.

SNOW: Explain America to Washington and Washington to America. That's kind of what you do. It's nice to humanize the figures who are right at the center of American politics, and at the same time I think it's important to be the advocate for the people listening.

WALLACE: Over the seven-plus years, is there one show, one Sunday that stands out?

SNOW: Right after September 11th.

WALLACE: House Speaker Hastert and democratic leader Gephardt made their first joint appearance ever. At least for a day, there was no partisan sniping.

You choked up at the end.

SNOW: Yes, of course I did. A solitary candle, a flag, a tear. These are the tokens of our renewal.

For a moment there, we got a glimpse of what we could lose. At the end I got choked up by saying we're not going to lose. And I get choked up even thinking about it now.

WALLACE: In late 2003, after more than seven years, Tony decided to leave Fox News Sunday and launch his own radio program.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SNOW: Oregon Steve, thank you so much. You are next.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: He says he loved a looser format of three hours a day.

SNOW: If I decide to gas on for an extra three minutes, I can do it. You try that on Fox News Sunday , you're going to have people coming out with clubs.

WALLACE: One of the questions I get asked more often is how's Tony. So how are you?
SNOW: Tony's fine, I think.

WALLACE: Early last year, he was diagnosed with colon cancer. After aggressive treatment, he's cancer-free. And his reaction is characteristically positive.

SNOW: I've got to tell you, Chris, I feel last year was the best year of my life. I got the love and support of a lot of people.

And it's almost like September 11th. You get a glimpse of the things you might lose, and you get a glimpse of the things you love, and you start counting your blessings. And there's nothing like it. I wouldn't change it for the world.

WALLACE: This week, Tony took on a new challenge. I asked him about the media world of endless news cycles he's stepping into.

SNOW: It's a wild, wild West out there. It's very exciting. I don't know if it's good or bad, but we're there whether we like it or not.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WALLACE: Tony starts work at the White House on Monday, and we wish our friend and colleague the very best.

Now a special program note. Please join us tonight at 10:00 p.m. Eastern on Fox News Channel for Fox News Sunday10 , a look back at key interviews and moments from our first decade, including behind the scenes with our panel, 10:00 p.m. Eastern on Fox News Channel.

That's it for now. Have a great week, and we'll see you next Fox News Sunday .

CBS – FACE THE NATION

BOB SCHIEFFER, host: Today on FACE THE NATION: Condoleezza Rice on Iraq and Iran and a debate on what to do about gas prices.

Secretary of State Rice is just back from a surprise visit to Iraq where American casualties this month are the highest since November and insurgent attacks on Iraqis have, according the State Department, skyrocketed. Can that spell progress, as the administration argues? We'll ask her.

Then we'll talk about something else that has skyrocketed, the price of gas, and we'll get two opinions on that: Alaska's Republican Senator Lisa Murkowski and Washington's Democratic Senator Maria Cantwell.

Then I'll have a final word on where the boys are these days and where they are is behind the girls and we're seeing the result of that. But first, Secretary of State Rice on FACE THE NATION.

Announcer: FACE THE NATION with CBS News chief Washington correspondent Bob Schieffer. And now from CBS News in Washington, Bob Schieffer.

BOB SCHIEFFER, host:

And good morning again. The secretary joins us in the studio this morning. She is just back from Iraq, and I want to ask you about the situation on the ground there in a minute.

But first, I want to ask you about this: We have heard these rumors for years and now former Secretary of State Colin Powell put it on the record this morning, he said flatly he had recommended that a much larger force be sent to Iraq in order to keep the peace and he says that that recommendation was rejected. Let me just ask you flatly, you were there. Is that the way you heard it?

Dr. CONDOLEEZZA RICE (Secretary of State): Well, the president received advice from all of his advisors. Ultimately, any advice went through the secretary of defense and through the commanders on the ground. They put together the war plan. They determined the numbers that would--it would take to execute the war plan and indeed to execute the immediate post-war phase. And so the president listened to that advice and that was determined of him.

SCHIEFFER: But was that the secretary's recommendation?

Dr. RICE: I--I--I really, Bob, don't remember the specific circumstance that Secretary Powell was referring to, but I do know that if there were questions about troop levels, they were, of course, raised. The plan was put together. The president was able to ask the joint chiefs of staff directly whether or not they thought that the plan was executable and whether or not the resources were there. I was in that meeting when he asked the joint chiefs of staff and indeed, they said yes, and that was the plan that was put forward and executed.

SCHIEFFER: Well, in retrospect it looks as if Secretary Powell was correct.

Dr. RICE: The number of troops on the ground was there to execute the plan. Now, we are in a phase now where we see that the number of foreign forces is not really the issue. The number of coalition forces is not really the issue. The issue is what can Iraqis contribute to their own security and during my conversations with Iraqi leaders, they are very anxious to take more responsibility, but they recognize that their security forces need to be trained and ready to go. They're taking more and more responsibility and that's the phase that we find ourselves in now.

SCHIEFFER: Well, I guess the point of my question was that clearly we did not have enough people in the beginning to keep the peace because I mean, if you look at what's happening there.

Dr. RICE: Well, I--I--but if you look at what happened in the immediate aftermath of the war, the Iraqi Army in effect kind of disintegrated. Secondarily, there was systematic looting that obviously had been planned, really, where it was not really the number of forces on the ground, it was the--the systematic looting that took place. As I've said many times, Bob, there will be time to go back and look at those days of the war and after the war to examine what went right and what went wrong. But the goal and the, the purpose now is to make certain that we take advantage of what is now a very good movement forward on the political front to tell this Iraqi government.

SCHIEFFER: Right, and I don't want to just keep talking about the past here, but I, I think we have to know that is was the United States that disbanded the Iraqi Army. But let me, let me just go on to what's happening now.

Dr. RICE: Bob, let me just say one thing now. The order to disband, yes, came from the coalition provisional authority. But, in fact, the Army had melted into--into nothing and again, we can all go back. We--I'm quite certain that there are many things that could've been done better. I'm quite certain that there are things in retrospect we would do differently. But that's the nature of any big complicated operation. Anybody who goes back and reads the history of any operation in the past will tell you that there are things that went wrong and things that went right. And we'll go back and see what those were at another time.

SCHIEFFER: Let's talk about now. American casualties this month are the highest since November. Your State Department just released a report last week that said that the number of attacks on Iraqis has skyrocketed. But you continue to say that we're making progress there. Where do you see these signs in light of what we're seeing happening everyday?

Dr. RICE: Well, the progress is, of course, on the political front. And you defeat an insurgency through politics, not just through military force. And yes, this is a very difficult set of circumstances. It was always going to be hard once a dictator of Saddam Hussein's reach and brutality was overthrown to get a stable foundation for a democratic Iraq. But the Iraqis have gone out, they've voted three times, they now have a permanent government. They now have a permanent government that as one of them said to me, `The Iraqi people have had enough,' he said, `And we've got to bring ourselves together in a national unity government, appoint ministers who are nonsectarian and who are competent and get this country moving in--permanently in the right direction.' That's the sign of progress. I know what people see on their screens every day. I see it, too. But I also know that the violence is accompanied by a political process in which the Iraqis have met every deadline. They've met every test and in which they, themselves are moving forward.

SCHIEFFER: Let's shift to Iran quickly. Their oil minister said today that he doesn't think the United Nations is going to impose sanctions because he says it will just drive up the price of oil even more and the United States wouldn't want that. Well, there is something in what he says. The sanctions probably would drive up the price of oil.

Dr. RICE: Well, it...

SCHIEFFER: But what will we do? Are we going to push for sanctions?

Dr. RICE: Well, it depends on what kind of sanctions ultimately are levied against Iran. First of all, we're going to press for a Chapter 7 resolution, which would take the presidential statement that was passed a month ago and would now make it compelling--a compellence on Iran to do that. I don't think that--you know, we're going to take it one step at a time, no one is talking about going to oil and gas sanctions. This is an Iran that does not want to be isolated from the international community. The international community has a number of steps that it can take through financial measures that it can take, through asset freezes.

SCHIEFFER: Well...

Dr. RICE: But when--you know, when the Iranians say things like, `We don't care if there are sanctions,' then I ask myself, then why are they working so hard to stay out of the Security Council? Why are they suddenly saying they're interested in the Russian proposal? Why are they suddenly saying, `Oh, by the way, yes, we will allow snap inspections'? Why are they suddenly saying, `Well, let's get this back into the IAEA'?

SCHIEFFER: Well...

Dr. RICE: It really doesn't sound like a regime that is simply unaware of what might happen to them.

SCHIEFFER: So you still hold out hope that the--that we can do something short of warfare that would stop them from enriching uranium and moving toward building a nuclear weapon, if that's what they choose to do?

Dr. RICE: Oh, I absolutely believe that we have a lot of diplomatic arrows in our quiver at the Security Council and also like-minded states that might be able and willing to look at additional measures if the Security Council does not move quickly enough.

SCHIEFFER: Well, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Richard Lugar, Republican, says we ought to talk to them face-to-face. Would we ever consider that?

Dr. RICE: Well, we--first of all, we do talk to the Iranians about limited issues. We've talked to them in Afghanistan, we've...

SCHIEFFER: What about this?

Dr. RICE: On--on this, I think the Iranians know what they need to do. The United States has been very clear in public, in private, in every way conceivable that we back completely the options that have been given to the Iranians for a civil nuclear program, whether it's the EU proposal or the Russian proposal.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let me just ask you, when you bring up Russia, shouldn't we be getting more support on this from the Russians and from the Chinese? Why do we have such a hard time convincing them that we ought to take strong action?

Dr. RICE: Well, the Russians and the Chinese did vote--well, the Russians did, the Chinese abstained, to refer this to the Security Council. There is a presidential statement that was unanimous in the Security Council. But, yes, I do think that as we go forward, the international community is going to face a choice just as Iran faces a choice. Are we going to be credible in what we have been saying about the need for Iranian compliance? Are we going to continue to allow the will of the international community to be defied? That is a choice. And my own view, and I think the view of the Europeans and of others, is that the credibility of the Security Council is extremely important not just to this case but to the broader search for peace and security. And so when we go back after the 30 days having just expired, no one can contemplate just another presidential statement, we need to get to a Chapter 7 resolution.

SCHIEFFER: Let me ask you also about the issue where foreign policy and domestic policy converge, and that is the issue of immigration. And now, all of a sudden, a lot of people on the right are saying this whole issue of "The Star-Spangled Banner" being sung in Spanish is a bad thing. You're not just a diplomat, you are also a musician; where do you come down on that?

Dr. RICE: Well, I've heard "The Star-Spangled Banner" sung in any number of ways and--in any number of ways. I think--I think what's really being expressed here is that our immigration policies really need both to be humane and to defend our laws and defend our borders and to recognize that when people want to come here, they want to come here because they're seeking a better way of life. Now, the president is a former border state governor, and he clearly believes that a comprehensive approach to immigration where we recognize the economic goal--role that these people play, but yet keep a firm hold on border security, keep a firm hold on the fact that people have to be legal is extremely important.

SCHIEFFER: So--so what language the national anthem is sung in is not a problem for you?

Dr. RICE: From my point of view, people expressing themselves as wanting to be Americans is a good thing. But we have laws about how they do that, how they become Americans. And I sincerely hope that we can come to an immigration policy that is comprehensive and that befits the fact that this is, after all, a country of immigrants.

SCHIEFFER: I think you kind of dodged that question.

Dr. RICE: Well, we hope--Bob...

SCHIEFFER: I mean, does it make any difference or not?

Dr. RICE: What, what, what language the national anthem is...

SCHIEFFER: What language it's sung in?

Dr. RICE: ...is sung in? I've heard the national anthem done in rap versions, country versions, classical versions. The individualization of the American national anthem is quite under way. I think what we need to focus on is an immigration policy that is comprehensive, and that recognizes our laws and recognizes our humanity.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Thank you very much, Madame Secretary.

Dr. RICE: Thank you very much.

SCHIEFFER: Hope to see you again sometime.

DR. RICE: OK. Thank you.

SCHIEFFER: Back with more news in just a moment.

BOB SCHIEFFER, host:

And from the controversy over what language to sing the "Star-Spangled Banner" in, we turn now to something serious: gas prices. Here to talk about it, Senator Maria Cantwell of Washington, a Democrat, and Senator Lisa Murkowski of Alaska, a Republican.

Senator Murkowski, I hear a lot of finger-pointing, I hear a lot of people talking about how awful all this is. I'm not sure I've heard anybody come up with a realistic solution, or a realistic thing can be--that can be done about these rising gasoline prices. And there's no question it's the thing that's on everybody's mind these days. What can we do about it?

Senator LISA MURKOWSKI (Republican, Alaska; member, Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee): Well, there is a lot of, of finger-pointing and blaming that's going on right now. I look at this as we are here because we've had a failed energy policy in this country for decades. That's where we are right now. Let's do something about it.

And we, we've got to, we've got to recognize that what we're faced with are the laws of supply and demand. And your Congress is not going to be able to repeal the laws of supply and demand. We've got to work on the demand side, through, through conservation, through efficiencies. We've got to also look to the supply side. That's something that we haven't done a good job in this country.

So whether it's utilizing the new technology to get us towards the renewables, the alternatives, or whether it is increased domestic supply, which, of course, is the issue coming out of Alaska, that's a side of it that we have got to focus on.

SCHIEFFER: So you're talking about drilling in the ANWR?

Sen. MURKOWSKI: I'm talking about sensible exploration and drilling in the coastal plains. We've got an opportunity up there for perhaps the largest find in North America that we have seen. We've got an opportunity up there for a million barrels a day coming into this country. A million barrels a day is, is what we saw...

SCHIEFFER: OK.

Sen. MURKOWSKI: ...when Katrina and Rita took us off line.

SCHIEFFER: So what you're talking about is getting serious about a long-term policy.

Sen. MURKOWSKI: Absolutely. Absolutely.

SCHIEFFER: Are you saying there's really not much that can be done in the short term?

Sen. MURKOWSKI: In the short term, there are things that we can do immediately, whether it's the--making sure that your tires are inflated, or, or car pooling, or the, the, the efficiency and the conservation things that we all should be doing as Americans. But we have to recognize that there's so many different pieces to this. Supply is one side of it, and we can't forget that component.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Well, let's see what Senator Cantwell has to say about it. Do you agree with that?

Senator MARIA CANTWELL (Democrat, Washington; member, Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee): Well, I agree with my colleague, Senator Murkowski, on some issues, that we need a much more aggressive energy policy than we have today. But if you want to look at what's happening to the American consumer, they're getting gouged at the price pump right now, and so if you look at what's happened to the airline industry where they've had people who've lost their jobs and lost their pensions, if you look at the American farmer who basically, you know, has to pay more for a gallon of gas than they get for a bushel of wheat, you know, it's a big problem for the American economy. So...

SCHIEFFER: So what can we do about it?

Sen. CANTWELL: Well, first and foremost, we have to get aggressive about making sure that price-gouging is addressed with the new federal statute that says that it's illegal to gouge consumers on the high price at the pump. And we also have to have more transparency in the energy markets. We have all this speculation, Bob, about the price and what's going to happen in the future, and you have loopholes that have existed that were created really by Enron for online trading. So you basically trade a commodity like corn or wheat or something like that it's on an exchange. There are rules. But oil has certain loopholes and we ought to close that.

SCHIEFFER: Well, where--where's the price gouging coming? Is it at the pump, is it at the middleman, is it at the producer? Where is it coming?

Sen. CANTWELL: Well, we want to make sure that there is a strong law on the books that looks at the wholesale price of gasoline, because we have a question about whether gasoline is being exported out of the country for a cheaper price just to drive up the cost here in the United States. And there's been some evidence of that. So what we want to do is have a strong law in place to protect consumers today and to make sure that we're giving that the attention.

Then secondly, the most important thing to do, is to get off of this overdependence on oil and--foreign oil. Now the president says that in his State of the Union but we have to get serious about it. And getting an alternative fuel market going in the United States and getting some true competition will do a lot more than anything on the supply side that can be--than can happen now.

SCHIEFFER: Well, what about Senator Murkowski's point, we ought to start drilling up in the, the Arctic reserves up there? Will that make a difference?

Sen. CANTWELL: Well, I--you know, one penny is what somebody thinks that that would reduce in 10 years the cost of gasoline. So the experts--the--the bottom line is, is that we are set on the world price of oil. That is that the United States cannot drill our way out of the fact that what we pay at the pump today is impacted by these countries like Iraq, Iran, Saudi Arabia. And so we don't want a future where we're 50 or 60 percent dependent on foreign oil, and if God only gave the United States 3 percent of the world's oil reserves, we're kind of stuck on being impacted by those countries and their--those policies.

But, if the United States could get aggressive, and this is the time we should do this, America should be proud and excited about it, being energy leaders instead of being laggards in these new energy technologies.

SCHIEFFER: Back to you, Senator Murkowski.

Sen. MURKOWSKI: Well, yes, we need to be doing all this. Senator Cantwell and I are not so diametrically opposed, except when it comes to the new domestic supply. This is where we've got to look realistically at it and say, `What can we do?' Because the, the, the demand side of it is very real and it's not just coming from this nation. Look at what's happening in--in China. Look at what is happening in India. We've got to recognize that the competition for the resource that we demand is huge. So what are we going to do about it that we can control. It's domestic supply, and this is the one thing that we have failed to do aggressively in any energy plan is to focus on the domestic supply. Domestic energy is going to be energy security and national security.

SCHIEFFER: OK, Senator:

Sen. CANTWELL: I just, I just think that, that domestic supply is about plant-based ethanol, it's about biodiesel, it's about something that the United States can be world leaders in, and the sooner we get at that task, the more secure this economy will be. And Brazil is a great example of a country that went from being 70 percent dependent on foreign oil to now being energy independent and they did it by running cars on this ethanol product. And the great story there is that they're mostly United States GM cars they're running down in this country on an ethanol product. So let's get about passing a serious energy bill that in...

SCHIEFFER: All right.

Sen. CANTWELL: ...gets that market going.

SCHIEFFER: Let me ask both of you, and I'll ask you very short answers here. There are a couple of things that people are talking about.

Senator Cantwell, would rolling back the gas tax make any difference?

Sen. CANTWELL: Well, I think what you need to be concerned about there is that if these prices keep going up $3, $4, $5 a gallon that isn't going to be a solution.

SCHIEFFER: Senator Murkowski:

Sen. MURKOWSKI: I don't think it's a long-term solution for us, and that's where we need to be focused.

SCHIEFFER: But would it help this summer?

Sen. MURKOWSKI: It might help this summer.

SCHIEFFER: OK, what about the windfall profits tax?

Sen. MURKOWSKI: Windfall profits, I think we saw the impact to this country the last time we did it under Jimmy Carter. It didn't work then. It's a policy that hasn't improved with age.

SCHIEFFER: Senator Cantwell:

Sen. CANTWELL: Get--you know what we need to do is the royalties that are given. These guys get billions of dollars, the oil industry gets billions of dollars of tax breaks, and they don't even pay on the royalties that they're supposed to pay on. The federal government might be out $80 billion, so let's get those...

SCHIEFFER: How about this idea of giving everybody $100 rebate?

Sen. CANTWELL: Well, if you look at what they've been paying for the last several years it would be about $700 that the American consumer has had to pay because of these high prices, so let's stop that.

SCHIEFFER: What about that?

Sen. CANTWELL: I don't think it's a real answer. It's a temporary band-aid. I don't think that it's, again, the long range solution.

SCHIEFFER: Do either of you believe that gas prices are going down this summer?

Sen. CANTWELL: No.

SCHIEFFER: No.

Sen. MURKOWSKI: I believe that we better pass a bill that gives the president and the--gives the administration the ability to chase these price gouging activities. Because we have to protect the consumer.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Well, thank you very much.

Sen. CANTWELL: Thank you.

SCHIEFFER: A lot of information in a short time. Thanks to both of you, Senators.

Sen. CANTWELL: Appreciate it.

Sen. MURKOWSKI: Thank you.

SCHIEFFER: We'll be back with a final word in just a minute.

CNN – LATE EDITION

WOLF BLITZER, HOST: It's 11 a.m. in Washington, 8 a.m. in Los Angeles, 6:30 p.m. in Tehran and 7 p.m. in Baghdad. Wherever you're watching from around the world, thanks very much for joining us for "late Edition." We'll get to my interview with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in just a moment. First, though, let's get a quick check of what's in the news right now with CNN's Fredricka Whitfield at the CNN Center. Fred?

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: For Iraq's new government and prime minister designate, a double-dose show of support from the United States this past week with visits from both the Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Just a short while ago, I spoke with Secretary Rice about her trip, the next steps for Iraq and lots more.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Madam Secretary, thanks very much for joining us. Welcome back to "Late Edition.

CONDOLEEZZA RICE, SECRETARY OF STATE: Pleasure to be with you, Wolf.

BLITZER: Welcome back from your overseas trip. The secretary of state, the former secretary of state, your predecessor, Colin Powell, has made some news, suggesting that he thought the U.S. should have gone into Iraq with a much larger force. Listen to what the secretary -- the former secretary said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

COLIN POWELL, FORMER SECRETARY OF STATE: And the president's military advisers felt that the size of the force was adequate. They may still feel that, years later. Some of us don't. I don't. And I have said that. But at the time the president was listening to those who were supposed to be providing him military advice.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Now, you were the national security adviser during those days. Did Colin Powell, the retired former chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, make the case that there should be a more robust U.S. military invasion? RICE: I just want to underscore what Secretary Powell said, which is that the president has military advisers who looked at the war plans, who decided that they had a certain number of troops that were needed to execute the war plan. The president listened to his advisers. He listened to those who execute -- who were to execute the war plan, and he made the decision on that basis.

I do remember that the president had a meeting with the joint chiefs of staff in which he asked, are we adequately resourced to execute this plan? And they said yes. That's the way it works. The president listens to the military advisers who gave him those numbers.

BLITZER: But can you confirm that Colin Powell dissented from that opinion?

RICE: I don't remember specifically what Secretary Powell may be referring to, but I'm quite certain that there were lots of discussions about how best to fulfill the mission when we went into Iraq. And I have no doubt that all of this was taken into consideration. But that when it came down to it, the president listens to his military advisers who were to execute the plan.

BLITZER: General Tommy Franks, who was then the overall commander...

RICE: That's right.

BLITZER: And the other commanders, General John Abizaid, General Casey, they all said that the troop level was fine?

RICE: Yes. I think General Casey was not -- was not yet in that chain, but General Franks was, of course, the commander on the ground. And there was also a session with the joint chiefs of staff. The president listened to the chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, who is his principal military adviser, and, of course, the secretary of defense.

And I do remember that the question was asked: Do we have what we need to execute this plan? Do we have everything that we need? The president asked that time and time again, and he was told yes.

BLITZER: Clearly, that plan was fine for getting rid of Saddam Hussein. But with hindsight, it clearly was not fine for the post- invasion, for the occupation, if you will, that there weren't enough troops to get that job done. Would you acknowledge that that was a mistake?

RICE: Well, the stability operations after Saddam Hussein were also considered as a part of this plan. And those troop numbers were also set by military commanders. I've said many times, Wolf, we will go back at some point in time, and I'm sure others will, too. Examine what we might have done differently, what might have been better. That's the way big operations are.

But there would have also been potentially a lot of problems with a very, very big footprint of coalition forces at the time of the liberation of Iraq. And so our goal now, our -- every day now, is to get up and to make certain that we're doing what we need to do to move this process forward, to help the Iraqis secure themselves. What is very clear now is that the goal is to train Iraqi security forces so that they can take up these responsibilities.

BLITZER: You caused a stir at the end of March when you said these words in England. Listen to what you said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICE: I know we've made tactical errors, thousands of them, I'm sure. This could have gone that way, or that could have gone that way. But when you look back in history, what will be judged is, did you make the right strategic decisions?

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: That was on March 31. A few days later, on April 4, Donald Rumsfeld, the defense secretary, said this: "I don't know what she was talking about, to be perfectly honest. If you had a static situation and you made a mistake in how you addressed the static situation, that would be one thing. What you have here is not a static situation. You have a dynamic situation with an enemy that thinks, uses their brain, constantly adjusts. And therefore, commanders have to constantly make tactical adjustments."

I know you later clarified that to say you were speaking not necessarily literally but symbolically. But there were plenty of military personnel, officers, who thought you were belittling them by talking about tactical mistakes while acknowledging -- while not acknowledging a major strategic mistake in the size of the force.

RICE: Well, first of all, nothing could be further from the truth. I have enormous...

BLITZER: You've heard their criticism?

RICE: I've heard that. And perhaps it's the use of the word "tactical." But people should remember that tactical doesn't necessarily mean military. You can make tactical political mistakes, as well. Not just tactical military mistakes.

And so the point that I was making -- and by the way, I also say that I've done this a thousand times. And I also don't mean that I've done it a thousand times. This was a figure of speech. To acknowledge that, of course, there are things that could have gone better.

BLITZER: Like what? Like what? What were some of the tactical mistakes?

RICE: I -- if you listened to that whole -- not just the clip that you played but the rest of that, the point was that when we go back and look, we will be able to determine what we could have done better and what might have been done well. Because what we know -- I'm enough of an historian to know that things at the time seemed like they were brilliant decisions later on turn out to have been mistakes. And things that at the time looked like they were mistakes turn out to have been the right decision. And so the whole point of that comment was that when I'm back at Stanford and when we have time to have the -- the perch of history to look at what happened, we'll know how this might have gone better.

But what we do know is that, in overthrowing Saddam Hussein, we've given the Iraqi people an opportunity for a different kind of life, for a different kind of Iraq. That gives the entire Middle East an opportunity for a different kind of Middle East, and that was the right decision.

BLITZER: I want to fast-forward to what's happening right now in Iraq, but do you ever wake up over these past three years and say to yourself, I wish we would have done it differently, I wish we would have maybe prevented going in, used the sanctions, used the weapons inspectors? Now that you know there were no weapons of mass destruction.

RICE: Well, I simply don't believe that Saddam Hussein was ever going to come clean with the international community. I don't think we were ever going to resolve the dozens -- the 16 resolutions that the Security Council had put before him.

You know, Wolf, at the time, you had a certain set of facts, which was that Saddam Hussein had been asked repeatedly about his weapons of mass destruction programs. I remember Hans Blix saying that mustard gas is not marmalade; you're supposed to have known what you did with it. And Saddam Hussein wouldn't tell anyone what he had done with these weapons of mass destruction.

We were still in a state of suspended war with him, in which we were trying to fly no-fly zones -- our pilots were -- in order to keep him from threatening his neighbors and threatening his own people. He was shooting at our aircraft.

Now, people in hindsight now...

BLITZER: Let me...

RICE: People in hindsight, now, create a world that simply wasn't there...

BLITZER: But in hindsight, you now know a lot that you didn't know then...

RICE: But Wolf, you don't -- you don't make decisions in hindsight. You make them at the time.

BLITZER: Do you regret the decisions you made?

RICE: Absolutely not. I think that the overthrow of Saddam Hussein was the right thing, for a whole variety of reasons, not just the fact that he'd used weapons of mass destruction before, not just the fact that he was manipulating the sanctions -- by the way, making the sanctions very hard on his own people -- but essentially, manipulating the oil-for-food program to the point that it was having no effect on the regime.

Not to mention that he continued to be a threat in the region; not to mention that he supported terrorists in the region.

It was absolutely the right decision to finally deal with this threat in the midst of the world's most volatile region. And now we have an opportunity to see this volatile region change. And that is something that not only do I not regret; I'm very glad we did it.

BLITZER: Here's what the Iraqi national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, said on Friday. "We have a road map, a condition- based agreement where by the end of this year, the number of coalition forces probably will be less than 100,000.

By the end of next year, the overwhelming majority of coalition forces would have left the country, and probably by middle of 2008, there will be no foreign soldiers in the country." Right now, about 130,000 U.S. troops are in Iraq. Is this about right, what he says?

RICE: Well, we will see. We are going to work with the new Iraqi government to assess the capabilities of their forces. There is no doubt that their forces are taking on more and more responsibility.

You know, when I was in Iraq not this last time, but the time before that, I had to take the road, because of the bad weather. The road between the airport and the international zone had always been notorious. It's been a lot better since Iraqi forces took over the securing of that road.

They have taken over a number of important pieces of real estate that were cleared of terrorists, and now they are holding them and securing them. So there's no doubt that their forces are getting better; there's no doubt that we are doing fewer of the kind of large- scale operations, though from time to time we do, and there is no doubt that as they get better, we are going to be able to do less.

But we really do want it to be based on conditions on the ground; so do the Iraqis. If there is anything that they recognize, it's that they are not quite ready for these tasks, but they want to take that responsibility, and we should want them to take it.

BLITZER: You had a chance to meet with the new prime minister- designate, Nouri al-Maliki.

Here's what the Los Angeles Times wrote about him on Thursday. "Al-Maliki's own political coalition is supported by two Shiite militias, the Iranian-trained Badr Brigade, and radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's al-Mehdi army. Even the country's U.S.-friendly Kurdish president appears unwilling to lay down arms. On Sunday, Jalal Talabani, speaking to reporters in Erbil, defended the 70,000-strong Kurdish Peshmerga militia as a regulated force."

Do you see anything right now that in the short term, anybody in Iraq is going to do anything to dismantle these private militias?

RICE: Well, I heard the prime minister-designate say that the -- they have to dismantle militias, they have to make certain that there's only the possibility of the use of force on behalf of the government. There has to be one gun...

BLITZER: You heard him say that to you?

RICE: Well, I heard him say it publicly. As a matter of fact, he said it the day before I arrived, and he also talked about it privately.

BLITZER: Do you believe him?

RICE: Well, the Ayatollah Sistani has said that the disbanding of militias is an important element.

Wolf, we always say this can't be done. I remember in Afghanistan, nobody was going to be able to dismantle militias either in Afghanistan; there are always going to be warlords who would hang on to their militias.

And indeed, what you're saying in Afghanistan is a successful demobilization and reintegration of forces there. I believe you're going to see the same thing in Iraq.

I'm not suggesting that it is going to be easy, but people understand that you need security forces that belong to the state, and there are two parts to that. One will be dismantling militias, but the other piece of it will be having a strong set of security institutions in which people have confidence, that they can actually secure the country.

BLITZER: He apparently, the new designated prime minister, has the backing of Muqtada al-Sadr, this young Shiite cleric, a radical, who hates the United States.

He has an interview in the new issue out today of Newsweek magazine, in which he says this: "The occupation was the creator of all problems. There is only an incomplete sovereignty in Iraq, which means that the occupation is the decision-maker. Any attack is their responsibility. The U.S. ambassador and Rumsfeld have ignited the sectarian crisis here.

Muqtada al-Sadr was once wanted by the U.S. as one of the most wanted terrorists in Iraq, but now he's in a coalition, in effect, with this new designated government. How do you feel about that?

RICE: You're going to have lots of voices, and the last time I was here on your program or some other program, people were telling me, well, Muqtada al-Sadr is the one who's backing Jaafari. But the truth is that perhaps people understand that this is really a political process that's taking hold, and that the way to deal with politics in Iraq is through support for a national unity government.

Now, it's going to be up to Iraqis to deal with their past, to deal with the issues of reconciliation, to deal with the issues of people who have committed crimes against the Iraqi government or against the Iraqi people, but you have...

BLITZER: Let me interrupt you for a second now. Muqtada al- Sadr. He's claimed responsibility for killing Americans and other coalition forces. Do you want this new Iraqi government to arrest him?

RICE: I want the Iraqi government, the new national unity government, to get its feet on the ground and to begin to deal with the multiple problems that it has, and to begin to deal with those on behalf of the Iraqi people.

And we are going to take this one step at a time. Let's just remember that just a few weeks ago, the -- everybody said, well, they'll never get a government of national unity; they'll never be able to find a prime minister-designate that actually Kurds and Sunni and Shia and others will all support -- well, they've done that.

If we've done anything consistently, it is to consistently underestimate the capability of the Iraqis to make this political process move forward. And I would suggest that for once, let's help them to get this government in place and to start to address their problems. They will have many opportunities to address their issues of reconciliation, and they'll have many opportunities to address the security situation.

BLITZER: I want to move on to Iran, but when all is said and done, should Muqtada al-Sadr be arrested?

RICE: You know that our view is that everyone ultimately has to be brought to justice for any crimes that have been committed. But this is now going to take place in the context of an Iraqi effort at reconciliation.

What we are going to focus on right now is to make the -- help make the Iraqi government capable of dealing with the many problems that it has.

And I am just going to repeat again, Wolf, every time there has been a milestone in Iraq, people have been surprised that the Iraqis have been able to meet it.

They continue to meet them; they continue to meet these milestones under the most difficult circumstances. They now have a permanent government that is going to be able to deal with both the present and with the past. We are going to support them in those efforts.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Coming up: part two of my interview with the secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice. I'll ask her about the unfolding crisis in the Darfur region of Sudan.

Does the Bush administration still believe genocide is taking place?

Plus; the nuclear showdown with Iran. Is that country undermining the war on terror? We'll get insight from a former CIA director and a former head of Israel's Mossad intelligence service.

And later: from actor to activist. George Clooney joins me for a special interview on his recent visit to Africa. "Late Edition" continues right after this.

BLITZER: Our web question of the week asks this: Would you consider buying a gasoline-electric hybrid car? Vote now. Go to cnn.com/lateedition. We'll have the results at the end of the program. Straight ahead, is it time for the U.S. and other countries to intervene in the tragedy in Sudan? We'll ask the Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. You're watching "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. I spoke with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice just a short while ago. Here's part two of our interview.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Iran, it's a hot issue, a very important issue. The new Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert, says this weekend in an interview with the German newspaper Bild, he says, "Ahmadinejad," Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the president of Iran, "talks today like Hitler before he seized power. We are dealing with a psychopath of the worst kind. God forbid that this man ever gets his hands on nuclear weapons." Do you agree with the prime minister of Israel?

RICE: Well, and everyone agrees that Iran can't have nuclear weapons, and of course their president makes it ever more evident that they can't have nuclear weapons, with the things that he says and the things that he does. But the Iranian regime is going to certainly deepen its own isolation, not just by the things that the president says, but by the defiance of this regime to the will of the international community. The international community is completely of one mind, that no one wants, needs or really can tolerate a nuclear- armed Iran in the midst of the world's most volatile region. That is the consistent view.

BLITZER: Is Ahmadinejad a psychopath?

RICE: I have no idea. You know, I haven't ever seen the man or talked to him. I just know that nobody speaks in polite company in that way, and that he represents the Iranian regime very badly, and that in fact every time he says something along those lines, he reminds people why this regime that is isolated from its own -- that has isolated itself from the international community and that is indeed run by an unelected few, in terms of the Iranian people themselves, why it would be very bad for the Iran -- for Iran to acquire nuclear weapons.

BLITZER: Now, you've authorized your ambassador in Baghdad to have direct talks with Iranian officials on Iraq. Have those talks started yet?

RICE: No. We felt strongly that we wanted to allow the government formation process to go forward. I'm quite sure that when it makes sense to open -- or to use that channel, we will. We've done it in Afghanistan. Zal Khalilzad, the now ambassador to Iraq, in fact did have those discussions in Afghanistan, when he was ambassador to Afghanistan. Ron Neumann, his successor in Afghanistan, has had discussions with the Iranians. When it's appropriate and when need be, I'm sure we'll do it.

BLITZER: What about direct U.S.-Iranian talks on its nuclear program?

RICE: The Iranians know what they need to do on the nuclear issue. The United States has made no secret of the fact that we back completely what the Europeans are doing, the offers that they've made to the Iranians about civil nuclear power. We've made it very clear that we back the Russian proposal for a joint venture with the Iranians. So they know what we think.

BLITZER: So the answer is?

RICE: Wolf, we have many ways of communicating with the Iranians. We have channels that we have used. We have people who know our views who talk with the Iranians. I don't think that the absence of communication is the problem here. What we are doing, though, is we're following this diplomatic course, and we are assessing at every step what we can do to make the diplomatic course more effective.

BLITZER: There's a rally today here in Washington to save Darfur, a horrible situation unfolding in Sudan. Is it still the position of the Bush administration that the Sudanese government, through its militia, the Janjaweed, are engaged in genocide against black Africans?

RICE: We have not changed our view. And the president is very passionate about what is going on in Darfur. I've been there myself. The deputy secretary has been there four or five times. We are getting a little progress at the Abuja talks between the rebels and the government, and we hope that that progress continues.

But the United States has been in the lead on providing humanitarian assistance. The United States has been in the lead on pressing the case in the security council for the use of -- first getting the possibility to use sanctions, and then using sanctions against individuals members of the government.

The United States has been in the lead in working with NATO to provide an offer of logistical and planning support, first to the AU forces, which we are doing -- we are helping there -- but also, when there is a U.N. blue-hatted force, and there really must be a more robust security force, we stand ready to support that force. And so, the United States has been by far the most active and the most forward-leaning of the countries.

We need more help from the international community. We need more help from China and Russia, which I think need to look at what is going on there and ask what more they can do, and we, frankly, need to make sure that the African Union acts expeditiously to take advantage of the help that is being offered by the United Nations and by NATO.

BLITZER: We are out of time, but I'll end it on this note, a happier note. Time magazine, our sister publication in the new issue out today says that Condoleezza Rice is, quote, "master of the universe." You're on their list of the 100 most influential people in the world. Did you know that?

RICE: No, I didn't know that, but gee, that's very nice. I don't really feel like the master of the universe, though.

BLITZER: You are master of the universe according to Time magazine. Madam Secretary, thanks for coming in.

RICE: Thank you very much. Great to be with you, Wolf.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And coming up, al Qaida's second in command emerges with a new message. How much of a threat is the terror group right now? We'll get special insight from a former CIA director, James Woolsey, and a former head of Israel's Mossad intelligence service, Efraim Halevy. But up next, a quick check of what's in the news right now, including the latest on tomorrow's so-called "Great American Boycott." Stay with "Late Edition." We'll be right back.

(NEWSBREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: The biggest challenge we face is winning the war on terror and to protect the American people. And we'll continue to keep on the offense, to keep the terrorists off balance.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: President Bush earlier this week on al Qaida, keeping it on the defensive in Iraq and elsewhere if possible. Joining us now with special insight into the war on terror and more, two intelligence experts. In New York, the former director of Israel's intelligence service, the Mossad, Efraim Halevy. He's the author of a new book, "Man in the Shadows: Inside the Middle East Crisis with the Man Who Led the Mossad." And here in Washington, the former CIA Director James Woolsey. Gentlemen, welcome back to "Late Edition." Let me start with James Woolsey. The ranking Democrat on the House intelligence committee, Representative Jane Harman of California, said this this week. She was quoted by the Christian Science Monitor as saying, "We still don't have a handle on al Qaida. Our intelligence reorganization is in a slow startup. And the CIA is in free fall." Does the U.S. intelligence community, Jim Woolsey, have a good sense right now on what Al Qaida is up to?

JAMES WOOLSEY, FORMER DIRECTOR, CIA: First thing I'd say is that Jane Harman has a better idea than I do because I've been out for several years. And I take her criticisms quite seriously. I think it has taken some time to get geared up. This new organizational structure can work, but it's largely a matter of getting the right people in place and the responsibilities assigned. And I think there probably is some rather poor morale out at the CIA.

It may not be irremediable. Porter Goss is an able individual and he may be able to make things work. But I think it's a troubled situation now is the way I'd say it.

BLITZER: Efraim Halevy, you've spent your life studying terrorism, studying threats toward Israel. I've heard intelligence experts say directly to me the more the U.S. intelligence community and other western and Israeli intelligence services learn about al Qaida, the more they realize they don't know. Is that a fair assessment?

EFRAIM HALEVY, FORMER DIRECTOR, MOSSAD: I don't think it's a fair assessment. I think the more time goes on the more -- we learn more and more. But this is a long haul. Let's not forget that this began in 1998, when two American embassies were attacked in Africa. We are now eight years from then, and I think it's still a long time to go before this threat will be set aside.

BLITZER: Are you satisfied, though, Mr. Halevy, that the U.S. And other intelligence services know what they should know as far as threats from al Qaida right now?

HALEVY: I'm not sure that they know all that they should know. I think they know as much as they can know at the moment, and I have no doubt whatsoever that they're making every efforts, and it's a very strenuous effort, to get as much knowledge and as much intelligence as possible.

BLITZER: In the past week, Jim Woolsey, we heard audio and videotapes from three al Qaida leaders: Osama bin Laden, Ayman al Zawahiri, and Abu Musab al Zarqawi, the leader of al Qaida in Iraq. Listen to this little excerpt of what bin Laden said, and this warning. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

OSAMA BIN LADEN (THROUGH TRANSLATOR): Any war is the joint responsibility of the people and the government. While war continues, people renew their allegiance to their rulers and politicians and continue to send their sons to our countries to fight us. They continue their financial and moral support while our countries are burned, our homes are bombed and our people are killed.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: The reference to a joint responsibility for civilians, the people and their government, that seemed, according to many analysts, to be a justification for going after civilian targets along the lines of 9/11 once again. Is it your assessment that al Qaida still has that capability to commit another 9/11 or even worse?

WOOLSEY: They certainly have the will and the ideology, and they may have some of the capability. I think we damaged them badly, particularly in Afghanistan. But they continue to work to maintain cadres in the west. And it's not just them. It's also the Iranians working through groups like Hezbollah. We have problems, and I think we will be fighting this war on terror -- I prefer the term "long war" -- against Islamist ideology for, I believe, decades.

BLITZER: What do you make of the fact that we heard in the past week from all three of these al Qaida leaders?

WOOLSEY: It's a troubling pulling together of events because when things like that have happened in the past sometimes we've seen terrorist attacks follow. So it could be that they are trying to get geared up to have something happen in the West. It's possible.

BLITZER: What do you think, Efraim Halevy?

HALEVY: I think that there are two possible interpretations for this appearance over the last week.

One is the interpretation that Jim has just now given, and it's certainly a plausible one. There's another possibility, and that is that the Al Qaida and the Islamic international terrorists are hard pressed and they feel that they find it necessary at this particular point in time to demonstrate to their supporters that they're still around.

Two possibilities -- and I cannot rule out one or the other.

BLITZER: The Israeli defense minister, the outgoing Israeli defense minister, Mr. Halevy, Shaul Mofaz, was quoted this week as saying this about Iran: "Of all the threats we face, Iran is the biggest. The world must not wait...Since Hitler we have not faced such a threat."

Do you agree with Mr. Mofaz?

HALEVY: We've been seized with this threat for a decade and a half now. We identified this threat in the early '90s, and we've been dealing with it for the last 15 to 16 years.

And I believe it is a very deadly threat. I think it's one of the most deadly threats we have ever faced. And I believe that, ultimately, we will be able to face it and overcome it.

BLITZER: Should Israel undertake, if necessary, unilateral action against Iran's nuclear program, along the lines of what Israel did to the Iraqi nuclear program back in 1981 at Osirak, when Israeli warplanes bombed it?

HALEVY: I think that every threat has its own particular circumstances. I think circumstances have changed. And I don't think there will necessarily be a repeat performance of what happened then.

There are other means and other ways of dealing with this threat should it become imminent. And I'm sure that we'll be able to take care of it should this be necessary.

BLITZER: Do you want to add, Jim Woolsey, to that?

WOOLSEY: I think that...

BLITZER: I guess the bottom line question is: Is there a military option that is viable against Iran's nuclear program?

WOOLSEY: I think viable but extraordinarily difficult. I agree with John McCain that it's the worst option except for letting Iran have a nuclear weapon because Ahmadinejad and the people around him are genocidal fanatics.

And they represent, in a sense, a, kind of, a revolution within the Iranian revolution that is even more fanatical than Khomeini and those who went before since 1979.

So we have a very serious problem. We may have to face a choice of that sort.

BLITZER: The International Atomic Energy Agency came out with its report on Friday. It said this among other things: "After more than three years of agency efforts to seek clarity about all aspects of Iran's nuclear program, the existing gaps in knowledge continue to be a matter of concern."

Jim Woolsey, how good is U.S. intelligence now, based on what you know, which is from public sources, presumably, although I'm sure you get access to classified information given your background as a former CIA director.

Based on what you know, does the U.S. have a good handle on what Iran is up to?

WOOLSEY: Somewhat good. It is, unfortunately, very easy to dig deep underground these days with commercially available tunneling equipment.

Iran is a very secretive society. Some of what we know we've only known for the last couple of years, as the result of dissident groups telling us.

So the idea that we would have a very detailed handle on anywhere and everywhere they have nuclear material that they're working on to enrich uranium and the like -- I think that's wrong.

But that we do have some handle on what they're doing is certainly correct.

BLITZER: Does Israel have a good sense, Efraim Halevy, of what Iran is up to right now?

HALEVY: I think Israel has a plausible sense of what Iran is up to. I'm not sure that we know everything that has to be known. But I think, as I said before, we must assume that, if we've been seized with this problem for a decade and a half, people were not sitting on their hands.

BLITZER: What's your assessment? How much longer until Iran actually has a nuclear bomb?

HALEVY: Honestly, I don't know. And it depends on what it means to have a bomb: to have one device or to have an arsenal of devices which becomes a strategic threat.

These are two different terms. And I think people are confusing these terms. But I would say there's still a little time. There's still a window of opportunity. There's still a little time left in order to resolve this problem in a proper way.

And my sense is that the Iranians, in the last 48 hours, are beginning to feel the pressure. And maybe some of the reactions that we have been receiving over the last 48 hours are indicative of the fact that pressure does have an effect.

BLITZER: We're going to take a break. But Jim Woolsey, do you agree?

WOOLSEY: I hope Efraim's right. I'm afraid both China and Russia, for different reasons, China because of oil, Russia because of sales of weapons and nuclear reactors, are going to be very hard to bring along to put real pressure on the Iranians to do what they need to do, which is give up their enrichment program.

BLITZER: All right, gentlemen. We're going to take a quick break. We're going to continue this conversation on tracking terror, our conversation with the former CIA director Jim Woolsey and the former Mossad director Efraim Halevy.

That's coming up right after this short break.

BLITZER: Welcome back. We're assessing where things stand in the war on terror and more with the former CIA director, James Woolsey and the former director of Israel's intelligence service, the Mossad, Efraim Halevy.

Mr. Halevy, as you know, on April 17, there was a terror attack in Tel Aviv. It was followed by a statement from the Palestinian authority, the government of the new prime minister, Ismail Haniyeh, who said this, among other things, in justifying that attack.

He said: "The reason behind this cycle is the continuation of the occupation and by the continued Israeli assaults against our Palestinian people. We say that ending this cycle and achieving stability, security and calm in this region is dependent on ending the occupation and the achievement of our people of their full rights."

Is there a possibility that this democratically elected Palestinian government will change and accept Israel so that the peace process, presumably, could get back on track? Is that at all possible?

HALEVY: Let me begin by saying I think this was a very serious statement because, whereas, up to that time, Hamas was not the government of the Palestinian Authority and made statements of a wild nature and this did not necessarily obligate the government of the Palestinian authority.

Now Hamas is there and this is a government statement. And for the government of the Palestinian Authority to make such a statement was a very, very serious matter.

Having said that, I'd like to make the following comments. I believe that Hamas are still in the throes of trying to get a coherent policy on board.

They were surprised to have won the election. And they are now having to contemplate possible isolation if they continue with their present policies.

And I believe that, since their agenda is not just an external agenda but also an internal agenda, the agenda of improving the quality of life among the Palestinians, the agenda of having a clean government, that is what brought them into power.

They must realize that if they continue along this path with their external policies, they will never be able to implement any of their domestic agenda. This is their problem, and I think they've not reached the final stage of settling which way they're going to go.

BLITZER: Jim Woolsey, what do you sense? Is there a possibility that this Hamas government, this Palestinian Authority, will in fact change its attitude toward Israel and resume the peace process?

WOOLSEY: I think a very slim one. It's not zero. But you know, a leopard may change its spots. But Hamas is a leopard. And it's a totalitarian Islamist organization that wants to destroy Israel. When they talk about ending the occupation, they mean of Tel Aviv, et cetera. So they still, as has been the case for a long time, want to destroy the Israeli state, and -- just as Ahmadinejad does. I hope it changes. It's not absolutely impossible.

BLITZER: We're almost out of time, but one question. I know that U.S.-Israeli intelligence cooperation over many, many years has been very, very strong. But there was one major problem that developed about 20 years ago. An American naval intelligence analyst, Jonathan Pollard, was arrested spying for Israel. It caused a serious strain in U.S.-Israeli intelligence coordination. He's been in jail for about 20 years. Is that enough, or should he be let go? WOOLSEY: I think that the fact that Israel is a close friend and ally of the United States and the fact that he's been in prison for 20 years perhaps makes it time to reassess this. The problem is that what he stole was extremely important and extremely sensitive. And I think -- I was opposed to reconsidering when I was in office some ten- plus years ago. After 20 years, that's a long sentence in most of the world. Israel's a friend. I think we ought to look at it.

BLITZER: Did he cause extreme damage to the U.S. intelligence service?

WOOLSEY: He certainly stole extremely important material. What happened to it after that is something that's very hard to talk about.

BLITZER: What do you think, Efraim Halevy, on the whole Pollard case?

HALEVY: Well, I don't want to delve into the past, but I would like to associate myself with the sentiment that Jim has just now expressed. I think a long time has passed now. I believe that if you compare the sentence to the sentence of others who were found guilty of crimes of this nature in the United States, this was an exceptionally harsh sentence and it was even harsher than the plea bargain that had been worked out at the time when he was brought to trial.

So I think that this period of time is such that one should look into it again. And I would hope that those who have to look into it will look into it and will find it in their hearts and in their minds to reach a better resolution.

BLITZER: Efraim Halevy is the author of "Man in the Shadows." It's a new book on his experiences as the director of the Mossad. Jim Woolsey is the former director of the CIA. Thanks to both of you for joining us.

And still to come, senators Trent Lott and Barbara Boxer, as well as George Clooney. Also coming up, in case you missed it, "Late Edition's" Sunday morning talk show roundup. And don't forget our web question of the week: Would you consider buying a gasoline-electric hybrid car? You can cast your vote. Go to cnn.com/lateedition. We'll take a quick break. But first this.

BLITZER: There's much more ahead on "Late Edition," including the gas problems here in the United States. What should the U.S. government do to help consumers? We'll talk with senators Trent Lott and Barbara Boxer. Plus, George Clooney's cause. My special conversation with the actor about why he wants the world to intervene in the tragedy in Sudan.

And a reminder that tomorrow CNN will have reporters in several American cities covering what's being called "the Great American Boycott." Organizers say it'll show how vital immigrants are to the United States. Our extensive coverage begins tomorrow morning 6 a.m. eastern. "Late Edition" continues right at the top of the hour.

BLITZER: Welcome back. We'll talk to Senators Trent Lott and Barbara Boxer in just a moment. First, though, let's get a quick check of what's in the news right now with CNN's Fredricka Whitfield at the CNN headquarters in Atlanta. Fred?

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Thanks very much, Fred.

Joining us here in Washington to talk about energy, immigration, Iraq, and lots more are Two guests: Republican Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi; he's a member of the Select Intelligence Committee; and Democratic Senator Barbara Boxer of California. She's a member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Senators, good to have both of you back here on "Late Edition."

Let's talk about the high gas prices here in the United States right now. Today the energy secretary, Samuel Bodman acknowledged and said flatly there is a crisis involving this issue. Listen to what he said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SAMUEL BODMAN, SECRETARY OF ENERGY: We're here today. I would say that there is apparently some evidence that we have a crisis. There's a lot of concern about this.

And so the president is looking at every tool at his disposal to put to work on it. And so I'm not embarrassed by that. And I think it's the right thing to do.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Barbara Boxer, a lot of people in California, in your home state, suffering right now from $3, $3.50 a gallon gasoline, record highs here in the United States.

Is this Bush administration on top of the problem?

SEN. BARBARA BOXER (D), CALIFORNIA: Well, all you have to do is look at Mr. Bodman's body language and what he said: We think we have a crisis; I'm not embarrassed. What is that?

He should be out there saying, these are the things we have to do right now.

BLITZER: Well, the president did deliver a very detailed speech on this past week.

BOXER: Well, you asked us to react to Mr. Bodman, if I might do that. He's our leader on energy policy. I didn't see in him, you know, this kind of leader that's saying, these are six things we have to do; we're going to look at these oil companies; if they've been gouging, which the president said, if were gouging, he'll take action.

And four days later, he said no evidence. We have an FTC investigation going on. We want to give -- many of us in the Senate -- the agencies the ability to go after these folks who we think are manipulating supply.

BLITZER: Do you have evidence they are gouging?

BOXER: We believe they are manipulating supply. I could tell you a story in my home state where Shell oil tried to shut down a refinery that was their refinery. They said there were no buyers.

We said, well, it sounds to me like you're trying to manipulate the supply. And they said, oh no. It turned out there were buyers. The attorney general of our state got involved.

I think it's trouble. You had 20 oil companies at one time; you have five. Why don't we look at, maybe, we need to inject some competition into the mix here.

BLITZER: Here's what the president, Senator Lott, said on Friday on this issue. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: I have no evidence that there is any ripoff taking place. But it's the role of the Federal Trade Commission to assure me that my inclination and instincts is right.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: As you know, a lot of Americans think there is a ripoff taking place. And their worst fears are that the oil companies are conspiring to make a lot of profits, which they are making.

SEN. TRENT LOTT (R), MISSISSIPPI: Let me first talk a little bit about what's going on here. This is something that has been coming for 30 years or more. We have known that our dependence on foreign oil was growing.

We were here in the '70s -- remember that? Remember the gas lines? And we haven't really addressed this sufficiently. That's point number one.

BLITZER: U.S. dependence on foreign energy sources has increased over these 30 years.

LOTT: Right. It has increased. And we've known that. And we have not been prepared to do enough about it.

So, number one, this is a problem that has been coming for a long time.

Number two, there is blame to go around all over the place. The Congress has not done enough. That administration has not done enough -- the administrations, by the way.

And the American people -- we want cheap gasoline prices. We want cheap energy prices. We want to drive the biggest tractor, biggest truck possible and, by the way, we don't want nuclear plants; we don't want hydro plants; we don't want refineries. We haven't built a new refinery in America in 20 years.

That's part of the problem. There is enough supply, even though a lot of it is foreign. We don't have the capability to transmit it and refine it.

So I just want to put it in perspective. I do think that we've got to look and make sure there is no gouging going on. We've got to look at the legality of what's going on.

I think there is manipulation. Perhaps it is the traders that are artificially driving up the prices out of anticipation of what might happen in Iran. I think we need to be careful about that.

But when you look at the profits of the gas companies -- the oil companies; let me point that out -- and you look at a lot of things they have been doing and then you look at gasoline prices, it is hard to choke that down. And I have a hard time with that.

My suggestion to the oil companies right now is, hey, there is not a direct correlation between the price of a barrel of oil and the gas at the pump. You don't automatically raise your prices.

BLITZER: Let me ask you what I asked Senator Specter, Republican Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, on this program last week: if he thought it was time for a windfall profit tax on major oil companies. And he thought it was time to consider that. Do you?

LOTT: This may come as a shock to you, but I'm going keep my options open. If the oil companies don't stop escalating the gasoline prices, it is going to force the people to demand that the Congress do something more and the Congress is going to have to do more.

Now, having said that, the president has been taking actions in several areas. He has requested authority from us for them to look at the CAFE standards or the gas mileage from the Congress. We would have to do that. And we do have some proposals on both sides of the aisle.

BLITZER: Well, do you think it's time for a windfall profit on the big oil companies?

BOXER: I am on the Dorgan bill to do just that. When you see the former head of Exxon getting a $400 million retirement package -- I mean, think about it. There ought to be a windfall profits tax on him.

I mean, this thing is out of control. And the people are furious about it. They're not dumb. The American people are smart. We are all willing to sacrifice -- Katrina, yes. And of all people, my friend Trent knows that I care very much about helping him rebuild Mississippi. Yes, there were these dislocations; yes, we have foreign relations issues that are making the price of oil go up, but if that was the case, we wouldn't see profits jump.

In other words, we would see the costs of this escalation go to the price of oil, gas at the pump but then the profits would be stable.

But when they have these kind of profits, I think Trent is absolutely right and it's music to my ears. Maybe we can get together here. And if jawboning doesn't do the trick, just tell them, we've got to disgorge some of these profits.

BLITZER: One Republican proposal in the Senate this week was to give the American taxpayer a $100 rebate to help a little bit.

That's a couple tankfuls, if you will, if you're paying $50 a tank that a lot of Americans are right now but also linking that to opening up exploration in Alaska, the Alaskan Natural Wildlife Refuge.

Why are you smiling?

BOXER: Well, I'm smiling because the Alaska Wildlife Refuge, for those of us who think it's a bad idea -- not enough oil there; you destroy a magnificent area.

It keeps coming back like a bad dream. Now it's coming back -- we'll pay off Americans with 100 bucks. I don't think the American people want to go there.

There are many places off the Gulf Coast, many places that we could drill. There's much we can do with energy efficiency cars, hybrid cars, all the rest of it. We don't have to do that.

And the last point I'd make is my friend Debbie Stabenow of Michigan, senator, has a bill for a $500 rebate to everyone, and it would come from going back and taking away the tax breaks, $5 billion strong, that we just gave to big oil, big energy companies in the last energy bill. I like that one better.

BLITZER: Do you like that?

LOTT: I think we should look at doing that. And in the Republican leadership proposal that came out last week, that was included. I don't think much about the $100 rebate. I do think we should open ANWR. You know, people saying, oh, we've got to be less dependent on foreign oil.

How are we going to do that? Are we just going to conserve ourselves into, you know, an energy policy? No, we're going to have to produce more domestic oil, natural gas. We're going to have to build pipelines, liquefied natural gas plants.

We need the whole package, including nuclear plants. And I do think we should have drilled in ANWR. If we'd have done it 10 years ago, when President Clinton vetoed the bill, that oil product would be coming in, and gas products would be coming in through our pipelines in the United States now.

I want the whole package. I want to conserve. I want alternative fuels. Hybrid automobiles, sure, let's do that.

BLITZER: There's a lot of things. You are among those who think that the U.S. should cooperate now with Cuba to drill for oil off the Cuban coast in international waters not far from Florida itself. There's apparently a lot of oil under the water there.

LOTT: I'm for seeing where we can find oil anywhere it may exist until we can transition to alternatives in the future. If we can find a way to get it in the Gulf or get it close to Cuba, I think we ought to look at that. Look, we bring it in from Venezuela, Nigeria, Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Iran, Russia's becoming. Why wouldn't we try to get it closer to home?

BLITZER: Is that a good idea to work with Cuba on this?

BOXER: I'd work with any country where we have decent relations. Now, with Cuba, I've always been for opening up trade relations. I don't understand how we can deal with China and not with Cuba. I'm for looking at that. But let me say this. Right now, this minute, the president could issue an executive order to say that all of the cars in the federal fleet when we buy cars, 58,000 cars a year, have to be fuel-efficient.

We don't need to give authority to do that. They're doing it all over the country in various states and cities. And this will create a market for the fuel-efficient cars, some of which today get over 50 miles to the gallon.

BLITZER: This is a problem that clearly there's no short-term solution, but both of you seem to agree on a lot more than apparently you disagree, with the exception of Alaska. Is that a fair assessment?

LOTT: I'm just for drilling for oil and natural gas where it is domestically so that we're not dependent on foreign oil as we move into other alternatives in the future.

BLITZER; There are refineries in the Gulf coast. What about in California? Would you like to see new refineries built off the coast of California?

BOXER: Well, we just fought to keep a refinery from closing. This whole refinery issue is really intriguing because...

BLITZER: How about new ones?

BOXER: If they met environmental standards, not a problem. But we don't want to have more cancer deaths, more asthma and the rest of it. So it's got to be done right. And there's no reason why it can't be done right. And I don't believe you can drill your way out of this. I think Trent is right when he says it's a combination of things that we have to do. They have to be done in an environmentally sensitive way or people do get sick, and I have to tell you in my own state, where we have so many cases of asthma and lung cancer and the rest, we have to be careful.

But we can do this right. We can do it carefully. And we don't have to wait forever to do it. As I said, tomorrow the president could say, fuel-efficient cars all over America, taxpayers spent -- they're going to be spent on those cars. You'll see a lot more cars coming to the market that will give us more choices.

LOTT: And the president did do a couple things last week. They won't have a huge impact, but they're the right thing to do. Temporarily waiving these boutique or these different blends of gasolines in 26 different states. He did stop, you know, putting oil into the strategic petroleum oil reserve. And I think you're going to see him looking at more things to do. And of course, you mentioned the passenger car cafe standards.

BLITZER: All right...

BOXER: And by the way, he could also release some oil from the reserve, and that would have a downward pressure on wages. Other presidents have done that. We've been asking him to do that for years. It's time.

LOTT: Let me add one thing, one bit of jawboning. We should do that, too. The message to the oil companies is, hold down your price of gasoline and it better start sliding back the other way. If they don't control it, and if they continue to have prices go up, profits go up and salaries go up, Congress will do something that might not have the beneficial long-term effect.

BLITZER: Senators, stand by, because we're going to continue this conversation. Lots more with the senators when we return. We'll also talk about immigration and Iraq's future. A new government in place. Can a timetable be set for a U.S. troop withdrawal? Senators Lott and Boxer standing by to weigh in.

Then, he's a man on a very serious mission right now. The actor George Clooney talks about his recent trip to Sudan, what he wants done to end the crisis in that war-torn nation. Stay with us.

BLITZER: There is still time for you to weigh in on our web question of the week: Would you consider buying a gasoline-electric hybrid car? Straight ahead, more with senators Trent Lott and Barbara Boxer. We'll get their perspective on immigration reform, the rallies tomorrow, the new Iraqi government, the future of that nation. All that coming up. You're watching "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. We're continuing our conversation with Republican Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi and Democratic Senator Barbara Boxer of California. Huge rallies expected, especially in California, and elsewhere around the country tomorrow calling for immigration reform, in effect suggesting that these 10 to 12 million illegal immigrants should be allowed a path toward citizenship, if not amnesty. Are you in favor of amnesty for these illegal immigrants, Senator Boxer?

BOXER: I don't think anyone in the Senate is. I mean, what we're talking about is getting folks out of the shadows and on a path to legality. And then getting them in line behind others that came before. But not punishing them and putting them in jail as the House bill would do. The House bill would even, you know, arrest anyone who helps an illegal. So, it's a very rough, tough bill.

And what we're trying to do in the Senate in a bipartisan way is to try to find a solution here where we say, yes, we're going to stop the illegal immigration at the border by strengthening the border patrol, something I've supported for a very long time.

Making sure that we stop that at the border, but then deal with the folks who are here. And beyond that, my own belief is we ought to go to the ag industry, the agriculture industry and pass an ag jobs bill, which is a Craig-Kennedy bill, another bipartisan bill, to set up a very fair guest worker program.

BLITZER: The president wants a guest-worker program that eventually, under the right circumstances, could lead to citizenship for these illegal immigrants. And it looks like there is movement, at least in the Senate, towards a compromise that would basically go along with what the president wants, although there are major differences with the House of Representatives. What do you think?

LOTT: I do think we need immigration reform. We've tried twice in recent years in the mid-'80s and mid-'90s. We didn't do it right either time. We need to get it right this time. We do clearly need border security. It's got to be broad. It's got to be technical. We're not going to build a 2,000-mile fence. But in certain areas, if that can be done, we need to use modern technology. We've got unmanned aerial vehicles that we can use, all kinds of things.

I personally think we should have a clearly defined temporary- worker program that provides a, you know, solution to the needs of the United States so it gives them some protections but also with some requirements as to when they go back to their country and how they move toward citizenship. The sticky part is, what do you do with 11 or 12 million that are already here? Amnesty, no. Just to give them, OK, you can be a citizen. You know, don't worry about it. It's difficult.

Now, there is a compromise in the Senate. I do think we need to act. It may not be the final product but I do -- this is a big important issue. This is what the United States should be doing. We should be having a debate and amendments and votes, and produce a product. I do think that these big demonstrations are counterproductive, and they hurt with a guy like me, who is trying to look at this in a way that is responsible. We don't have that many illegal aliens or immigrants in my state, so I'm trying to the right solution. To encourage people not to go to work or children not to go to school is counterproductive. I don't think it's -- and if they're there waving foreign flags, I take offense to that.

BLITZER: Let's move on to some other issues quickly. I want to get through them. FEMA, the future of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Republican Senator Susan Collins made this statement this week about FEMA. Listen to what she said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. SUSAN COLLINS (R), MAINE: FEMA is discredited, demoralized and dysfunctional. It is beyond repair. Just tweaking the organizational chart will not solve the problem. FEMA has become a symbol of a bumbling bureaucracy in which the American people have completely lost faith.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Senator Boxer, do you agree with her?

BOXER: I really appreciate the effort that Sue Collins and Joe Lieberman have put into this whole issue of looking at FEMA. I agree in terms of their reaction to Hurricane Katrina, everything she said was true. But I also have lived through so many disasters in my state. Trent and I were talking about this before we came on the air.

And we had several earthquakes and so on. And at times they operated magnificently.

BLITZER: FEMA.

BOXER: Yes. And let me tell you, that was when James Lee Witt was the head of FEMA, and he imbued that agency with such great morale, and they were just the most helpful people, and actually, James Lee Witt was kind of a rock star when he came into my state. People loved him because of his leadership. So here's the thing that I believe. I think we made the mistake when FEMA was put into the homeland security reorganization.

I personally voted against that. So did my colleague from California, Senator Feinstein. We believe FEMA deserves to be at the table as a separate independent agency. And (inaudible) working now with my colleagues, Senator Lott and Senator Clinton and others in a bipartisan way, to take FEMA out of Homeland Security and put it back as an independent agency with a seat at the table.

BLITZER: I want you to weigh in it, but I also want you to weigh in, Senator Lott, on some criticism you took this week on this $700 million proposal to move some railroad tracks in your home state of Mississippi, putting that in this emergency supplemental appropriations money going for Katrina relief, going for the war in Iraq and Afghanistan, the war on terror overall.

$700 million in an emergency supplemental that supposedly was designed to help the gambling industry in Mississippi. I want to you respond to the criticism you took.

LOTT: There are so many inaccuracies there, I hardly know where to begin. So, but I'm going to begin with the first part of your question, and that is FEMA. Because this is very personal, current and emotional...

BLITZER: You lost a house in Katrina.

LOTT: Well, yeah, but it's not about my house. It is about the preparation at FEMA and their reaction after the disaster. Let me be quick to add there are a lot of good people there that are just as frustrated as we are. But Susan Collins, I have a great deal of respect for. She and Joe Lieberman have done a good job at homeland security and government affairs. I think I owe her an opportunity to sit down, as I'm going to do Monday, and go over with her what she plans.

But I think we made a mistake in putting FEMA in homeland security. I think it became a backwater there. I think it was ignored, underfunded, undermanned and, you know, did not have a strong leadership. So I do agree. And I have introduced a bill and been joined by Barbara Boxer, Hillary Clinton is my lead co-sponsor, to move FEMA back out of homeland security, make it an independent agency reportable directly to the president of the United States.

I saw the secretary of homeland security the other day. He says I want to make sure that command and control stays under my jurisdiction. Why? When you have a disaster, you need a general in charge. He shouldn't be down there handing out bottles of water. He should be up here making decisions and moving organizations and supporters, talking directly to the president.

BLITZER: We're almost out of time, but what about the railroad?

LOTT: Well, first of all, it has nothing to do with casinos. In fact, truth be known, they probably prefer to keep it where it is. We were told, don't look at everything putting it back just like it was or leaving it like it was. People are killed. Over 100 people have been killed on that line. It is a major problem in evacuation. It's a major problem in our economic future.

It makes sense to move it north, off of right on the water. We're trying to get Highway 90 and the railroad track moved further north so we don't have repeated incidents where the federal government has to come in and pay for the repairs. It is the right thing to do.

And by the way, it is hurricane-related. It was the number one thing that our commission, which was a broad-based commission, said if you could do something to change the impact of disasters in the future in this area, move this track off of the water.

BLITZER: We had hoped to get through a lot of other subjects. Unfortunately, we're out of time. Senator Lott, Senator Boxer, always good to have both of you here on "Late Edition." Thanks to both of you for joining us.

Still ahead, he's adding his star power to a very serious cause. My conversation with the actor-activist George Clooney about the crisis in Sudan. But up next, we'll get a quick check of what's in the news right now, including tomorrow's planned immigration boycott here in the United States. Stay with "Late Edition."

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. He's one of holiday's most popular stars, but now the Academy Award-winning actor George Clooney is using his celebrity status to focus the world's attention on the Darfur region of Sudan in Eastern Africa.

I spoke with Clooney earlier this week. We were joined by the Pulitzer Prize-winning author, Samantha Power.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Samantha Power, George Clooney, thanks very much for joining us.

GEORGE CLOONEY, ACTOR/DIRECTOR: Thank you.

BLITZER: Welcome back.

Why did you go?

CLOONEY: Well, it first started, I was reading Nick Kristof's articles in the "New York Times." And he had just come back.

BLITZER: He's the Pulitzer Prize winning columnist.

CLOONEY: I'm sitting next to another Pulitzer Prize winner. And I had read Samantha's articles and her book and felt like it was probably a good time to cash in whatever celebrity credit card you get from having a good year on bringing some attention.

BLITZER: So what do you want? What do you hope to achieve? What's the single most important thing you want to achieve from your journey out to Africa?

CLOONEY: The single most important thing I want to achieve is to try and help make sure that it gets on the air, that people see it, that people are talking about genocide, which they're not, in general, and not just in this country, in the whole world.

But if I show up places, sometimes cameras follow. And that's a good thing because then we can have these conversations and help, perhaps, the administration and the U.N. and all the people who actually want to do something about this but they don't have the political capital. BLITZER: You mentioned what Nicholas Kristof wrote. He wrote this, and it seems to sum up the world's attitude, especially Americans' attitude toward what's happening in Darfur: "Mr. Bush is paralyzed for the same reasons as his predecessors [when faced with genocide.] There is no great public outcry. There are no neat solutions. We already have our hands full and it all seems rather distant and hopeless."

I think that sort of conveys what's going on right now in this country, as far as the horror of what's happening in Sudan.

CLOONEY: But it's interesting how quickly things aren't hopeless when people, a group of people, American citizens, European citizens, suddenly stand up and say OK, wait a minute. Let's take a look at this. This is the first time that I know of that someone's talked about genocide while it's going on.

Well, there's an opportunity there for the people to stand up and say OK, now let's make this simpler by saying we're going to make it -- we're going to make this important enough that it'll make it -- could make it easier for the administration to do something.

BLITZER: Give us the numbers, Samantha -- you're an expert -- on what's happening in Sudan and Darfur. Give us the numbers of the horror.

What's involved right now?

SAMANTHA POWER, AUTHOR: Well, it's been called a slow-motion genocide, but that, I think, underplays what's actually happening. About 400,000 people have died so far. Two or three million people have been displaced -- two million we know about because they're holed up in camps.

Well, they're called camps. They're basically in these wide fields dependent on handouts when they come, when aide workers are actually able to brave the Janjaweed patrols that surround the camps. And those people remain incredibly vulnerable.

But the attacks are even continuing. Just three or four days ago, the Sudanese government again launched Antonov and helicopter gunship attacks at another village.

There have been 80,000 people displaced just in the last two months alone. So that number of three million, which is just almost plucked from the sky because we can't access the people who are in need -- we know one thing, and that is that it's increasing.

We all know that the Sudanese government has become more and more obstructive, that they're expelling aide groups, not allowing even senior U.N. and U.S. officials into the camps.

And, of course, we all know from the 20th century what happens when a government that is intent on committing genocide also knows that people aren't watching. It does it really with abandon and it counts on impunity. BLITZER: And complicating this, George, in recent days, Osama bin Laden has now weighed in and said that the Muslims in Sudan have to stand up to the United Nations, the West, the United States, if they come in to try to intervene.

What do you make of that?

CLOONEY: Well, again, none of this is very simple.

On the other hand, I think that that should point to exactly what it is we're talking about, which is Bashir met with the Iranians two days ago and talked about getting nuclear technology from the Iranians. He is being defended by Osama bin Laden.

BLITZER: This is the leader of Sudan?

CLOONEY: The leader of Sudan. So clearly, when they say to us we're not really bombing people and we're really a bunch of good guys over here, perhaps when you see who they're teaming up with, maybe that tells you something about what the Sudanese government is actually -- what the Khartoum government is actually doing.

BLITZER: Let me read to you another quote from Nicholas Kristof: "Part of the problem is that President Bush hasn't made it a top priority. But at least he is now showing signs of stirring. And, in fact, he's done more than most other world leaders and more than many Democrats. Our failure in Darfur is utterly bipartisan."

Do you agree with him on that?

CLOONEY: I think it is. I think that we are a country that is always slow to act. We always have been, on almost everything, but especially on situations like this.

Rwanda is a perfect example. The Balkans are a good example. But once we get our mind to it, we do it pretty well. We have failed, you know -- it's political savvy to say hey, we're all doing a little bit of something and it's good that we're moving in the right direction. We're not doing enough.

BLITZER: What do you want President Bush to do?

CLOONEY: Well, there's -- immediately we want to try and get security. That's the first thing, security for...

BLITZER: Send in U.S. troops?

CLOONEY: No.

BLITZER: Do you want to send in the Marines?

CLOONEY: No.

BLITZER: What do you want to see happen -- militarily get involved? CLOONEY: I think -- I think through NATO, if we can get a bridging force through NATO while we put together something in the U.N., I think that's our best bet.

I don't think that that -- I don't think anyone wants that to be or thinks that's going to be American troops. It means that we who -- America, who usually is very good at coordinating these things, can be the leader in coordinating these things.

BLITZER: Because the African forces have been pretty much useless, right?

POWER: Well, look, I mean, I wouldn't want their job. There are 7,000 of them spread out, you know, in an area the size of France.

BLITZER: They really haven't gotten the job done, though.

POWER: They haven't gotten the job -- but there's not, I mean, if you had 7,000 of the best trained, you know, U.S. Rangers in Darfur, they would not be able to do the protection job. It's simply not doable.

BLITZER: How many troops do you think are needed?

POWER: Well, what's needed for perfect protection is -- is to blanket the country. But what would mark -- constitute a colossal improvement would be to triple the size of the force, make it 21,000 in places where the A.U. is present.

Even though they don't have the mandate, they don't have the right guns, they don't have the mobility, they haven't been given these things from Western countries and they don't have them organically, they have made a difference. People feel safer. Women can -- in places where they can get African Union escorts, they can leave the camps and go and pick up firewood in order to heat the food that their families depend on in order to live.

In places where those A.U. troops are not present, they're doomed. The Janjaweed are patrolling around the camps. They can't actually get past the perimeter. So they basically have to make a Sophie's choice between feeding their families or getting raped.

BLITZER: So when it comes to this issue, George, you and the president and the Bush administration are pretty much on the same page?

CLOONEY: I think so. I think that -- and I think that most of the world, especially most of the country, is on the same page, if they are reading the book. And unfortunately that book isn't getting read very often right now or loud enough. And so my job is to try and bring attention to that.

BLITZER: When it comes to Iraq, you and the president are not on the same page?

CLOONEY: No. But that's not what we're here to discuss. BLITZER: Well, you...

CLOONEY: You know, I mean I agree. But, you know, I also would suggest that Senator Brownback and Senator Obama, who are the two leading the way in the Senate, don't agree on very many things either. But they certainly agree on this.

And I think that there's -- there's no two sides to this issue, Wolf. I mean there really are no two sides to it. There is simply one side. There's no two sides to the idea of rape.

BLITZER: How do you explain -- how do you explain that 60 years after the Holocaust, after Rwanda and Burundi and what happened in the Balkans, that this kind of thing can go on in this day and age?

CLOONEY: Because we've -- and it happens a lot with us. We've spent a lot of our political capital in other places, and probably Iraq would be one of them. We certainly have not the greatest relationship with the U.N. So there's a lot of other elements that are playing.

China has not been very forthcoming with sanctions against -- against the Sudanese government and they're getting a free reign because they're getting oil by themselves without competing with America right now.

It's a tough, tough situation to solve. But if we get -- if we're able to just protect some of these people and then start a diplomatic -- start some diplomatic measures, we have a chance.

BLITZER: I remember when I went with President Clinton in, I think it was '96, to Rwanda and Burundi and he saw what was happening. He says the biggest regret he had was he was in the Oval Office, he was getting the reports of the slaughter of the Rwandans and he didn't do anything about it. And he just let it pass. And it's hard to believe that that kind of thing is happening again.

You wanted to weigh into that?

POWER: Well, I would -- I'd love to, just on that question, because President Bush actually, when he first got into office, just before 9/11, he read a memo that was actually a summary of how the Clinton administration had allowed the genocide in Rwanda, because he was confused himself. Wait, we let a million people die? That's a little weird.

And he wrote in the margins of this memo, "Not on my watch." You know, I don't want this happening on my watch. It was sort of the 21st century version of never again. And the reality is the Bush administration has done more than any other country on the Earth and the kind of domestic movement we have in this country that we've never seen before, basically with the American people learning and applying the lesson of Rwanda, where governments are only learning it in the abstract.

We only have that movement in this country. And the Bush administration has been well out in front of the rest of the international community. And yet history is not going to remember that the United States was in first place in terms of denouncing it and in terms of funding protection forces.

All they're actually going to remember is, yet again, a million people died under the watch of an American president.

BLITZER: It was '98 we went to Rwanda, as I recall.

Let me give you a couple of quotes that you made in recent weeks. And I just -- we're almost out of time. I want you to have a chance to respond.

The "Sunday Times of London" quoted you in December as saying: "The Democrats were scared on Iraq and the truth is they backed themselves into a corner. They didn't have the political resolve to tough it out and now they are paying the price."

What do you mean by that?

CLOONEY: Well, I think that, you know, there was a time when -- when the issue was you're either with us or with the enemy, as we were going into the war. I think that there were a great many Democrats that didn't truly believe that all of that, the ideas that we were tied to al Qaeda -- that -- not we were tied to al Qaeda, but that Hussein was tied to al Qaeda or that -- that they had anything to do with 9/11.

I think there were a lot of Democrats that didn't buy into that, but they didn't -- many of them didn't stand up. And I think that it cost them in the elections.

BLITZER: You said this about the junior senator from New York, Hillary Clinton. You characterized her as: "the most polarizing figure in American politics."

CLOONEY: Yes, but I didn't -- that wasn't -- believe it or not, that wasn't an insult. Someone was asking me, you know, can she win? And I said I think that she absolutely can win.

She is polarizing. People in one side of the country are, you know, adamant against her and people on the other side are, you know -- and you know this better than anyone; you've seen this for a while. There are very strong feelings on either side for Hillary Clinton.

You know, I'm a Democrat. I like her. But she is certainly polarizing.

BLITZER: Thanks for your good work. Thanks for making the trip. Hopefully, it will result in something tangible.

I'm tempted to say to both of you, good night and good luck, but I'm sure a lot of people say that to you.

Samantha Power, thanks very much.

George Clooney, thanks to you.

CLOONEY: Thanks, Wolf.

(END VIDEO TAPE)

And coming up, in case you missed it, "Late Edition'" Sunday morning talk show roundup: what the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States had to report today. Stay with us.

BLITZER: And now, in case you missed it, let's check some of the highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States.

On NBC's "Meet the Press", ABC's "This Week" and CBS's "Face the Nation," the topic was gas prices: why they have reached record highs, what to do about them and the responsibility of the big oil companies.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SAMUEL BODMAN, ENERGY SECRETARY: You've got more demand and you're going to force the price up. You got limited supply and you're going to have have...

TIM RUSSERT, HOST, MEET THE PRESS: But that's a decision by the oil companies.

BODMAN: No, it is not. Oil is traded every minute of every day. And it's traded, basically, 24 by 7. And it's determined in marketplaces in New York and London and Tokyo, all over the world.

That's the -- the oil companies do not determine the price of oil.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR CHARLES SCHUMER (D-NY): What's good for ExxonMobil is not necessarily good for America, and that's what this administration has done. Here's what we need, George. We need a bunch of things be done, which this administration doesn't want to do. Number one is conservation. We have the worst conservation program in the world. China, a country that doesn't even believe in the environment, has much better gas mileage standards than we do.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR MARIA CANTWELL, (D-WA): God only gave the United States three percent of the world's oil reserves. We're kind of stuck on being impacted by those countries and those policies. But if the United States could get aggressive, and this is the time we should do this. America should be proud and excited about being energy leaders instead of being laggards in these new energy technologies.

U.S. SEN. LISA MURKOWSKI (R-AK): Senator Cantwell and I are not so diametrically opposed, except when it comes to the new domestic supply. This is where we've got to look realistically at it and say, what can we do? Because the demand side of it is very real. And it's not just coming from this nation. Look at what's happening in China. Look at what is happening in India. We've got to recognize that the competition for the resource that we demand is huge.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: On Fox News Sunday, President Bush's new chief of staff, Josh Bolten, discussed the recent shakeup in the White House staff.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JOSH BOLTEN, WHITE HOUSE CHIEF OF STAFF: What the change does provide is an opportunity for the White House to step back, refresh, re-energize at a time when we're five and a half years into an administration, normally a slow point, a low point in many administrations. A chance for us to get our mojo back, to go back more on the offensive.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Highlights from some of the other Sunday morning talk shows here on "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk. Up next, the results of our web question of the week: Would you consider buying a gasoline-electric hybrid car? And also coming up at the top of the hour for our North American viewers, CNN reporters are "On the Story," including correspondent Aneesh Raman with a firsthand look at life inside Iran. All that, lots more on "On the Story." But first, this.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Kimberly Oliver, what's her story? Already a star in the eyes of her students and fellow teachers, the 29-year-old kindergarten teacher is in the national spotlight as the 2006 Teacher of the Year. Oliver, who teaches at Broad Acres Elementary School in Silver Spring, Maryland, was presented the award by President Bush. In a classroom where 80 percent of the students speak a language other than English and 90 percent live in poverty, Oliver is being praised for boosting test scores, involving parents, and getting students engaged.

She'll spend next year traveling the country promoting the importance of education and instructing other teachers on her keys to success.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Our "Late Edition" web question asks: Would you consider buying a gasoline-electric hybrid car? Here's how you voted: 82 percent of you said yes, 18 percent said no. Remember, though, this is not a scientific poll. And that's your "Late Edition" for Sunday, April 30. Please be sure to join us again next Sunday and every Sunday at 11 a.m. eastern for the last word on Sunday talk. I'm also in "The Situation Room" Monday through Friday 4 to 6 p.m. eastern, back again at 7 p.m. eastern.

And don't forget CNN's extensive coverage tomorrow of the so- called "Great American Boycott." CNN's coverage begins 6 a.m. eastern. Until then, thanks very much for joining us.

From: Ames, Andrew
Sent: Monday, May 01, 2006 10:50 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Ames, Andrew; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Branda, Joyce (CIV); Brett Gerry; Brody, Stephen (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Figley, Paul (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jennifer Brosnahan; Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John; Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Riley, Sharon (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 5/1/06 Civil Division News

Feds want spying suit thrown out; Group seeks judgment against AT&T

Feds Drop Bomb on EFF Lawsuit

U.S.: FBI sought info without court OK

When Litigation Goes Too Far (Editorial)

Civil trial wraps up in Edgewater fraud

Justice tells Craig law change needed to help Idaho downwinders

COAST GUARD ALLOWS RELIGIOUS HEADGEAR

Appeals court blasts immigration judge for abusive manner

U.S. Gov. TO release docs on NYU spying

AP

Sat, Apr. 29, 2006

Feds want spying suit thrown out; Group seeks judgment against AT&T

By DAVID KRAVETS
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO - The Justice Department said Friday it was moving to dismiss a federal lawsuit challenging the Bush administration's secretive domestic wiretapping program.

The lawsuit, brought by the San Francisco-based Internet privacy group, Electronic Frontier Foundation, does not include the government but names AT&T Inc., which the group accuses of colluding with the National Security Agency to make communications on AT&T networks available to the spy agency without warrants.

The government, in a filing late Friday, said the lawsuit threatens to expose government and military secrets and therefore should be tossed. The administration said its bid to intervene in the case should not be viewed as a concession that the allegations are true.

DOJ_NMG_0027530

"The fact that the United States will assert the state secrets privilege should not be construed as a confirmation or denial of any of the plaintiffs' allegations, either about AT&T or the alleged surveillance activities," the administration wrote in its court filing.

As part of its case, the Electronic Frontier Foundation said it obtained documents from a former AT&T technician showing that the NSA is capable of monitoring all communications on AT&T's network, and those documents are under seal.

Next month, U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker will hold a hearing on whether they should be divulged publicly.

President Bush confirmed in December that the NSA has been conducting the surveillance when calls and e-mails, in which at least one party is outside the United States, are thought to involve al-Qaida terrorists.

In congressional hearings earlier this month, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales suggested the president could order the NSA to listen in on purely domestic calls without first obtaining a warrant from a secret court established nearly 30 years ago to consider such issues.

Gonzales said the administration, assuming the conversation related to al-Qaida, would have to determine if the surveillance was crucial to the nation's fight against terrorism, as authorized by Congress after Sept. 11, 2001.

The lawsuit, alleging AT&T violated U.S. law and the privacy of its customers, seeks to stop the surveillance program. The suit is based in large part on the former technician's documents, which the technician said detail secret NSA spying rooms and electronic surveillance equipment in AT&T facilities.

"We believe AT&T violated the law by providing the communications of its clients to the government without warrants, which is prohibited by federal law," said Kurt Opsahl, an EFF attorney.

The San Antonio-based telecommunications giant said it follows all applicable laws.

The case is Hepting v. AT&T Inc., 06-0672.

END

Wired News

Feds Drop Bomb on EFF Lawsuit

Friday, 28 April 2006

The federal government intends to invoke the rarely used "State Secrets Privilege" -- the legal equivalent of a nuclear bomb -- in the Electronic Frontier Foundation's class action lawsuit against AT&T that alleges the telecom collaborated with the government's secret spying on American citizens.

The State Secrets Privilege is a vestige from English common law that lets the executive branch step into a civil lawsuit and have it dismissed if the case might reveal information that puts national security at risk.

Today's assertion severely darkens the prospects of the EFF's lawsuit, which the organization had hoped would shine light on the extent of the Bush Administration's admitted warrantless spying on Americans.

The government is not admitting, however, that AT&T aided the National Security Agency in spying on American's phone calls and internet communications.

"[T]he fact that the United States will assert the state secrets privilege should not be construed as a confirmation or denial of any of Plaintiffs¿ allegations, either about AT&T or the alleged surveillance activities," the filing reads. "When allegations are made about purported classified government activities or relationships, regardless of whether those allegations are accurate, the existence or non-existence of the activity or relationship is potentially a state secret."

The Justice Department has not formally invoked the privilege yet.

Today's notice was intended to inform Northern California US District Court Judge Vaughn Walker that the government was intending to assert the privilege in order to seek dismissal of the case.

The complete paperwork justifying the government's decision will be filed by May 12.

END

Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0027531

U.S.: FBI sought info without court OK

By Mark Sherman

Friday, April 28, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The FBI secretly sought information last year on 3,501 U.S. citizens and legal residents from their banks and credit card, telephone and Internet companies without a court's approval, the Justice Department said Friday.

It was the first time the Bush administration has publicly disclosed how often it uses the administrative subpoena known as a National Security Letter, which allows the executive branch of government to obtain records about people in terrorism and espionage investigations without a judge's approval or a grand jury subpoena.

Friday's disclosure was mandated as part of the renewal of the Patriot Act, the administration's sweeping anti-terror law.

The FBI delivered a total of 9,254 NSLs relating to 3,501 people in 2005, according to a report submitted late Friday to Democratic and Republican leaders in the House and Senate. In some cases, the bureau demanded information about one person from several companies.

The numbers from previous years remain classified, officials said.

The department also reported it received a secret court's approval for 155 warrants to examine business records last year under a Patriot Act provision that includes library records. However, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has said the department has never used the provision to ask for library records.

The number was a significant jump over past use of the warrant for business records. A year ago, Gonzales told Congress there had been 35 warrants approved between November 2003 and April 2005.

The spike is expected to be temporary, however, because the Patriot Act renewal that President Bush signed in March made it easier for authorities to obtain subscriber information on telephone numbers captured through certain wiretaps.

The Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, the same panel that signs off on applications for business records warrants, also approved 2,072 special warrants last year for secret wiretaps and searches of suspected terrorists and spies. The record number is more than twice as many as were issued in 2000, the last full year before the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

The FBI security letters have been the subject of legal battles in two federal courts because, until the Patriot Act changes, recipients were barred from telling anyone about them.

Ann Beeson, the associate legal counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union, said the report to Congress "confirms our fear all along that National Security Letters are being used to get the records of thousands of innocent Americans without court approval."

The number disclosed Friday excludes requests for subscriber information, an exception written into the law. It was unclear how many FBI letters were not counted for that reason.

END

New York Sun

When Litigation Goes Too Far (Editorial)

By Harold Furchtgott-Roth

May 1, 2006
The Electronic Frontier Foundation filed a class action suit against AT&T early this year for allowing the National Security Agency to engage in surveillance activities initiated after the September 11, 2001, attacks using AT&T's network. Now the American government has asked a San Francisco federal district court judge, Vaughn Walker, to dismiss the case because of national security concerns. These concerns are legitimate.

EFF is a nonprofit organization committed to preserving and advancing consumer "digital rights." Its board of directors includes many technologists and leading lawyers in the country such as Lawrence Lessig of Stanford University Law School and Pamela Samuelson of University of California at Berkeley Law School. EFF also has an advisory board with nearly a dozen eminent academics and practitioners in the new field of the law of digital rights.

Given the legal orientation of the leadership of EFF, it is not surprising that the organization is actively engaged in litigation. EFF's Web site prominently displays legal issues and cases, including those with EFF as a party. EFF claims that it, "on behalf of a nationwide class of AT&T customers, is suing to stop this illegal conduct and hold AT&T responsible for its illegal collaboration in the government's domestic spying program, which has violated the law and damaged the fundamental freedoms of the American public."

Whether the NSA's surveillance activities were lawful or not is a subject of wide dispute. It is being addressed within the administration, in Congress, in the courts, and in public and private conversations around the country. But if EFF has a legitimate concern, it should be with governmental activities, not the "collaboration" of private parties responding to governmental requests based on national security.

For decades, telecommunications carriers in America have made their facilities available to government officials with authorized national security and law enforcement requests. When the NSA contacts a telecommunications carrier with a request, it is presumptively legal and authorized. AT&T or any other carrier would have little basis to distinguish and challenge the legitimacy of the requests from national security or law enforcement agencies.

Yet EFF would have had AT&T conduct such a legal challenge to the NSA. This is an unrealistic view of the operations of a telecommunications company. Requests from law enforcement and national security agencies to telecommunications carriers are unusual events and handled with the utmost confidentiality and secrecy. Although there have been occasional instances of disputes between carriers and law enforcement officials about the liability of carriers for transmission of pirated material, there are few, if any, instances of disputes about national security requests.

No one should want to see private parties, even those as large and influential as AT&T, to be in a position to veto governmental decisions about national security. We may never know - and we should never have to know - how many requests AT&T or other carriers receive from governmental agencies for assistance with law enforcement and national security matters. We do know that AT&T and other carriers have not sabotaged those efforts by refusing to cooperate by challenging them in court. If any of those governmental decisions should prove unlawful, the courts should address those issues with the government as a party to the dispute, not in disputes among private parties.

Judge Walker has a great dilemma. He has a class action suit brought against a private party that should have been brought against the federal government. He has the federal government asserting both "military and state secrets privilege" that, if exposed in court, would be harmful to governmental interests.

America is engaged in a war against terrorists who use all available means to undermine the rule of law and the cooperation that private parties give their governments, particularly our own. If EFF prevails in court against AT&T, no private party would dare help the government on any law enforcement or national security request without first going to court. Our national security and law enforcement would be greatly diminished. Abu Musab Al-Zarqawi and other terrorists would no doubt cheer, now being free of much American surveillance. In targeting AT&T in this case in the name of promoting digital rights, EFF is inadvertently undermining those very rights and much more.

END

Chicago Tribune

April 30, 2006

Civil trial wraps up in Edgewater fraud

Ex-manager Rogan awaits judge's ruling

By Bruce Japsen
Tribune staff reporter

While four doctors and a vice president went to prison in a health-care fraud investigation that led to the shuttering of Edgewater Medical Center, one-time owner Peter Rogan faced no criminal charges and remained out of the public eye for more than five years.

His obscurity changed three weeks ago when a federal civil trial began, accusing the Valparaiso, Ind., man of engineering an elaborate kickback scheme that paid doctors and others to admit patients for unnecessary care from the mid-1990s through 2002. The suit seeks $18 million in damages.

Five who worked at the hospital pleaded guilty for their roles in luring homeless people, the elderly and other patients into the North Side hospital at 5700 N. Ashland Ave. for medical care they did not need.

But Rogan, who was the top manager at the facility, never faced criminal charges in the cases that led to Edgewater's demise.

He has refused to take any of the blame for the collapse of a hospital that critics say has cost taxpayers more than $18 million and a French bank more than $50 million. The hospital is in bankruptcy proceedings.

"[The case is] the beginning of a long-overdue day of reckoning for Mr. Rogan," U.S. Justice Department attorney Laurie Oberembt said in closing arguments last week. "Time and time again, he negotiated kickback deals. Mr. Rogan was the decision-maker."

Rogan, through his attorneys, would not agree to an interview. But his attorneys deny the government's allegations and expect a favorable ruling by U.S. District Judge John Darrah, who presided over the three-week trial that ended Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Chicago. Darrah's ruling could come early this summer based on a schedule of post-trial submissions he set, but he offered no specific date.

This case is the first of what are expected to be several civil lawsuits against Rogan. Another major case, filed by French bank Dexia Credit Local, has not been set for trial.

Rogan, 60, quietly turned around Edgewater Medical Center in the early 1990s and, along the way, made himself millions on various deals tied to owning, selling and then maintaining a paid management role with the facility.

A one-time health-care consultant at the former Ernst & Whinney, later Ernst & Young, Rogan bought Edgewater in 1989 for $1 million plus assumption of nearly $10 million in debt and liabilities. Edgewater's board wanted to get out from beneath the hospital's troubles and sold it to Rogan, who ran it as his own for-profit hospital for six years.

In 1994, Rogan sold the hospital to California-based, not-for-profit Permian Health Care Inc. for $35 million. Of that, public records show, Rogan got $31 million. In court, his lawyers say he got more than $10 million.

Rogan and his lawyers don't deny he made a lot of money. In fact, because he made so much money, the lawyers said he had no reason to be involved with a fraud scheme at the facility.

But throughout the trial, government lawyers allege Rogan approved bribes and kickbacks to doctors.

Rogan places blame elsewhere

The money was outlined in four- and five-figure contracts for a variety of services, including payments to doctors for training residents and running community programs where the government alleges Rogan didn't care if work was performed. The payments, they said, were bribes to win more admissions to keep Edgewater churning out profits.

Rogan denied that and shifted blame to Roger Ehmen, who is serving a sentence in federal prison for his role in the fraud and whom Rogan described as a "rogue" employee.

"[Rogan] didn't need to get involved in a scheme like this," said one of Rogan's attorneys, Neil Holmen, of Chicago law firm Winston & Strawn. "He had made his money."

Government attorneys tried to show that Rogan hid millions in areas of the world known for offshore tax advantages. In one example, court testimony showed Rogan directed $5 million through one of his many shell companies to set up trusts for his three children in the tiny Central American nation of Belize. Rogan, however, denied in court he was involved in setting up the trusts.

Money that Rogan directed to several off-shore tax shelters is expected to emerge again later this year in Dexia's case against him, sources close to the matter say. That case is expected to center on Rogan not telling the bank about fraudulent activity and mismanagement that would have caused bank officials to reconsider backing Edgewater.

The enigma of Rogan's riches is about as uncanny as Edgewater's turnaround in the mid-1990s.

Rogan defied industry experts by making Edgewater profitable while serving a patient base insured by fixed payments from government programs, particularly a decade ago when the federal government dramatically slowed Medicare payments to hospitals.

Holmen said his client was aware of the federal anti-kickback laws from his more than two decades of experience as a health-care consultant and hospital executive.

"He was smart," Holmen said. "What sense does it make that he would enter into this scheme?"

Government: Greed ruled

But government attorneys said Rogan approved of business dealings that encouraged doctors and hospital staff to submit false claims in an effort to boost hospital profits.

Government lawyers also discounted the notion that he would not have been involved in the fraud because he had already made his money. They allege Rogan couldn't make enough money, saying he continued on as part of a paid management arrangement at the hospital and controlled nearby hospital property even after selling the hospital out of "greed."

Oberembt, in her closing statements for the government last week, said, "He wanted the hospital to be successful because it made him successful."

END

AP

April 29, 2006

Justice tells Craig law change needed to help Idaho downwinders

By CHRISTOPHER SMITH

Associated Press Writer

BOISE, Idaho_The U.S. Department of Justice has told Sen. Larry Craig that without changes in federal law, there's nothing the agency can do to extend federal compensation to Idaho cancer victims who blame nuclear-bomb fallout during Cold War-era testing for their illness.

Craig inserted language into the Justice\l "I" Department's\l "I" fiscal 2006 spending bill last June directing the agency to find ways to expand eligibility for fallout victims. Currently, eligibility in the program created by the Radiation\l "I" Exposure Compensation Act (RECA) is limited to 22 counties in Utah, Arizona and Nevada.

Craig and fellow Idaho Republican Sen. Mike Crapo want the entire state of Idaho declared eligible. Fallout pattern studies have shown portions of Idaho received higher doses of radioactive particles spread by aboveground testing of nuclear weapons at the Nevada Test Site in the 1950s than some areas that are covered by the law.

In April 2005, the National Academies of Science recommended the federal government consider fallout-related cancer claims from people across the United States, rather than just those in the 22 counties.

But the report also said cancer victims should have to show a scientific link between the fallout and their illness to receive compensation, a connection researchers say would be very difficult to prove.

Craig's language in the spending bill asked the Justice Department _ which administers the compensation program _ to recommend ways to incorporate the academies' findings into the existing program. But the response delivered to Craig this week said the agency can't make any changes until Congress amends the law.

Craig's office said the senator was not surprised by the conclusion and planned to use the Justice\l "I" Department\l "I" report to spur the Senate Judiciary Committee to begin a lengthy overhaul of the RECA program. He also plans to cite the document in pressing for legislation he and Crapo have sponsored that would immediately add Idaho to the list of eligible areas.

"The value of the report is we can now take that to the judiciary committee and show them why we need this legislation and to get them moving forward on RECA reform," Dan Whiting, Craig's press secretary, said Friday.

But advocates for Idaho downwinders, as those who lived in areas where wind carried radiation\l "I" are called, complained that the year that passed waiting for a federal study that confirmed the obvious is just part of a pattern of neglect by the federal government.

"They are studying it to death and will keep on studying until there's none of us left to complain anymore," said Preston Truman of Downwinders, a grassroots group lobbying for expanded eligibility. "If Craig and the Idaho delegation were serious about getting greater RECA eligibility, they would attach a rider to every bill adding Idaho, Montana, the rest of Utah and Mohave County in Arizona to the program."

The Craig-Crapo bill to include Idaho was introduced in the Senate in May 2005 and has not had a hearing nor attracted any co-sponsors.

Another bill, sponsored by Crapo, would add Idaho and Montana. It was introduced in December in the Senate, has attracted Craig and Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., as co-sponsors but is stuck in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

In a statement to constituents posted to his Senate Web site this week, Craig said he was working with the Justice Department on the academies' report and planned to share the findings with the Senate panel, of which he is a member.

"I want you to know that I will continue to be actively engaged in the debate surrounding this issue as it moves through the Senate, and that I am fully committed to ensuring Idahoans affected by nuclear weapons testing are eligible for compensation under a fair, science-based RECA program," Craig said.

END

AP

April 29, 2006

COAST GUARD ALLOWS RELIGIOUS HEADGEAR

Associated Press

The U.S. Coast Guard has abandoned a rule requiring anyone seeking a merchant marine license to submit photographs showing no religious head coverings, civil rights lawyers said Wednesday.

The lawyers, from the New York Civil Liberties Union, sued the Coast Guard in federal court in Manhattan on March 28 on behalf of Khalid Hakim, a devout Muslim who has served in the merchant marine while working for private shipping companies since 1973. Workers like Hakim are not members of the military but are required to obtain licenses to work on commercial ships that transport cargo in U.S. waters.

Before Sept\l "I". 11\l "I", 2001, Hakim regularly received licenses after submitting photographs in which he wore his religious knitted hat, called a kufi, the lawsuit\l "I" said. After Sept\l "I". 11\l "I", though, the Coast Guard said he would have to remove it to get a license, it added.

END

AP

April 29, 2006

Appeals court blasts immigration judge for abusive manner

By MARYCLAIRE DALE

Associated Press Writer

PHILADELPHIA_An immigration\l "I" judge\l "I" prejudged cases and bullied asylum-seekers, denying them their right to fair hearings, a federal appeals panel said in rulings issued Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0027536

In one case, Judge Donald V. Ferlise of Philadelphia cowed petitioner Abou Cham of Gambia into a state of confusion with comments _ some about Cham's command of English _ the appeals court found "abusive."

Ferlise then dismissed evidence that Cham's relatives were jailed or attacked after his uncle was ousted as the country's president.

"Judge Ferlise continually abused an increasingly distraught petitioner, rendering him unable to coherently respond to Judge Ferlise's questions," wrote Judge Maryanne Trump Barry of 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. "The belligerence of the questioning and the tension in the courtroom fairly leap off the pages of the record."

Ferlise ranked as among the 10 toughest asylum judges in the country in a 2000 study published by The San Jose Mercury News. Ferlise granted 74 of 715 asylum requests between 1995 and 1999, the newspaper reported.

Ferlise did not immediately return a telephone message left Friday at his Philadelphia office. A home listing for him could not be located.

In 1996, Ferlise denied asylum _ and was later reversed _ in what became a precedent-setting case over the issue of female circumcision.

In the second case handed down Friday, Ferlise had refused to accept that the petitioner's father was dead, although Seemab Fatima Shah offered newspaper photographs that showed the bloodied body in the aftermath of sectarian violence in Pakistan.

Lawyers for the U.S. Bureau of Immigration Appeals conceded that the father was dead but Ferlise called the asylum petition "nothing but a fraud that is being perpetrated upon this Court."

Ferlise exhibited an "apparent zeal to deny relief" to Shah, wrote Barry, who in footnotes referenced two other rulings in which the 3rd Circuit has admonished Ferlise for his demeanor.

All four petitioners were granted new hearings with a different judge.

Joseph C. Hohenstein, an attorney whose firm was involved in the four Ferlise appeals, said petitioners are re-traumatized when they appear before the judge.

"Right or wrong about whether asylum should be granted, the important thing is a respect for the process and a respect for the person," Hohenstein, who represents Cham, said Friday.

"Where he seems to have problems is with asylum claims, where he thinks people are using the system," Hohenstein said. "In many other situations, Judge Ferlise is a wonderful judge ... (who) recognizes people's humanity."

Barry, in a ruling earlier this month, sharply criticized U.S. immigration laws that she said forced the "knee-jerk" removal of "decent men and women." The comments came in a case in which the panel denied asylum for a former member of the paramilitary Irish National Liberation Army convicted in the 1981 wounding of a British police officer.

END

New York Blade

U.S. Gov. TO release docs on NYU spying

By Kerry Eleveld

Monday, May 1, 2006

During the next three weeks, government records will be released detailing surveillance efforts on campus organizations that oppose the military's "Don't ask, don't tell" policy and the Solomon Amendment, a law that allows the federal government to deny grants to colleges that restrict on-campus military recruiting.

A Washington, D.C., judge issued a court order on April 19 to the Department of Defense, Department of Justice and the Defense Intelligence Agency in response to a February lawsuit filed by the Servicemembers Legal Defense Network (SLDN), which provides legal assistance to gay and lesbian military personnel.

The fact that the Department of Defense (DOD) was monitoring pro-LGBT organizations first came to light last December when Lisa Myers of NBC revealed Pentagon "Talon" reports citing certain campus groups as potential terrorist threats. New York University's OUTlaw, a group of LGBT law students at NYU, was one of those groups.

"We were really surprised—actually, I think shocked," said OUTlaw co-chair Rebecca Fisher, of finding out they had been followed by the DOD. Fisher, a second-year law student, has been a member of the group for two years and said they host activities such as student dinners and bar nights, bringing in guest speakers who have litigated major gay rights cases, and sometimes protesting government policies such as Don't ask, don't tell, which they believe discriminates against gays and lesbians.

Outlaw has about 100 members on their listserv, and Fisher said their events generally draw anywhere from 20 to 40 people. "We are probably one of the more innocuous groups out there—I mean, we're law students so nothing that we do approaches illegality, much less terrorism," she said.

The Talon reports, part of the Pentagon's post-September 11 counter-terrorism efforts, are based on information gathered from civilians and military personnel about suspicious activity. The DOD admitted in a letter to the Senate Armed Services Committee that it had "inappropriately" collected information on protesters. To date, the DOD has released several documents and is in the process of searching for more.

"It will be really interesting to see what they said and how the information was obtained—whether or not the information was obtained legally," Fisher said of the forthcoming documents.

Getting intelligence

Originally, SLDN and about 13 other LGBT organizations filed several Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) requests in early January to get more information about who was being spied on and why. Steve Ralls, director of communication for SLDN, said the law suit itself was a last resort. "We were finding that we were being stonewalled by many government agencies, so we took the additional step of filing the court case to effectively force the government to comply with the FOIA," Ralls said.

Among other things, SLDN provides legal assistance to active-duty military personnel who are in the process of being discharged for being gay. "We have very special concerns," Ralls said. "If the Pentagon is monitoring the LGBT community and if they're specifically monitoring SLDN, we want to be sure the privacy and confidentiality of our clients is not compromised."

According to a three-stage timeline set by the court order, the Defense Intelligence Agency was supposed to release its surveillance documentation by last Thursday, April 27; the Department of Defense is to do so by Thursday, May 4; and the Department of Justice is to do the same by Thursday, May 11.

Getting government documents released has a significance all its own. "These days, any time you win a FOIA suit it's cause for wild celebration," said Charles Davis, executive director of the National Freedom of Information Coalition at University of Missouri's School of Journalism.

The Bush Administration has been notoriously tightlipped about all government activity following September 11. Then Attorney General John Ashcroft issued an October 12 memo stating: "When you carefully consider FOIA requests and decide to withhold records, in whole or in part, you can be assured that the Department of Justice will defend your decisions…"

By way of example at one government agency, Davis cites statistics from student Andrew Eder's Master's thesis on FOIA activity. While President Clinton was still in office in 1999, the FBI granted in full 1,436 out of 24,207 requests, just 6 percent. But in 2005, the FBI granted in full 69 out of 11,155 requests, or about 0.5 percent.

"It's amazing that it took a track that was as fast as it was," said Davis of the SLDN suit, adding that these suits often take months if not years to reach resolution. To Davis, it says one of two things. "Here you saw an issue that was of such magnitude, and I would imagine of such egregious closure in contravention of FOIA, that the courts were acting as quickly as they possibly could," he said, or, "You might have a judge that was eager to take the case—it's impossible to know."

So far, so bad

The Talon reports released to date by the DOD confirm domestic surveillance of protests at New York University, the University of California at Berkeley and the University of California at Santa Cruz. New York University Law School Dean Richard Revesz issued an April 21 statement calling the reports "distressing" because they showed disrespect for the role that universities play in providing an atmosphere for critical thought and examination of social issues. He added, "The reports are disappointing because they reveal a remarkable misallocation of our nation's resources."

DOJ_NMG_0027538

While both Fisher and Dean Revesz point out that OUTlaw's activities are constitutionally protected, the DOD reports speculate on the meaning of the group's name before a scheduled protest. "Specifically, the term 'OUTlaws' is a backhanded way of saying it's all right to commit possible violence and serve as vigilantes during the symposium. Therefore, it is possible that physical harm or vandalism could occur at this event," said one report dated February 3, 2005.

Fisher said that most of her peers find the report's speculation to be bizarre and sort of outlandish. "Can't you just do a Google search," she joked. The group has continued with its regular activities—not because they know the spying has been discontinued. "It's really because we aren't involved in anything illegal," she said.

Ralls of SLDN is concerned that so far, the press coverage has missed the point. "There has been a lot of debate in the media and on the Sunday talk shows about the legality of what has happened," he said. "But I think the core issue here that should really alarm most Americans is the fact that citizens who are going about their everyday lives—who are taking advantage of their constitutional rights to free speech and to free expression—are being labeled by our own government as suspicious or possibly involved in terrorist activity."

Ralls, Fisher and Dean Revesz have all said they are waiting to review the new documentation before determining whether subsequent steps might be taken.

END

DOJ_NMG_0027539

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.22635-000001

Image not available for this document, ID: 0.7.10316.22635-000002

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, May 2, 2006 8:16 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Tuesday, May 02, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060502.pdf; agnb060502.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, MAY 2, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Judge Harshly Criticizes Al-Arian, Imposes Prison Sentence....4
Umer Hayat Released On Bail 4
Lawyer For Former Detroit Terror Suspect Seeks Dismissal Of New Charges 4

Patriot Act:

FBI Issued NSLs For Information On More Than 3,500 In US Last Year 4

Homeland Response:

Jurors See Surveillance Tape Of NYC Subway Bomb Plotting 5
DHS, FBI To Lease Freedom Tower Offices....5
Taylor Reportedly Ready To Allow Funding For Flight 93 Memorial....5
Qatar To Announce $60 Million In Katrina Grants 6

War News:

Bush Says Iraq Mission Has Reached Turning Point....6
Iraqi Oil Production Still Below Pre-War Levels 7
Murtha Will Not Sign Discharge Petition On Withdrawal 7
Biden Suggests Partitioning Iraq Into Three Semi-Autonomous Regions 8
Sunni Army Recruits Angered By Postings Disrupt Graduation Ceremony 8
Soldiers' Guidelines Modified To Reduce Confrontations With Iraqi Civilians 8
US Troops In Ramadi Routinely Battle Insurgents "Several Times A Day." 8
Sadr Cultivates Support By Supplying Social Services 9
Shiite Women Outside Green Zone Protest Continued Violence 9
Al-Arabiya Shows Video Of Former Iraqi PM's Body Being Abused....9
Relatively Stable Babil Province Seen As Model For Iraq 9
Reluctance To Utilize Full Force By US Military Noted....9

Corporate Scandals:

Lay Contends Banks Forced Most Of His Enron Stock Sales ..9
Potential Quattrone Retrial Will Have New Judge....10
Comverse Executives Quit As Options Probe Escalates 11
Former Qwest CEO Nacchio Continues Bid To Have Charges Dropped 11

Criminal Law:

Common Cause Seeks DOJ Probe Of Katherine Harris....11
Corruption Trial Of Former Alabama Governor Begins....11
Plea Deal Implicates Milberg Weiss Partners 12
Secret Service To Release Records Of Abramoff's White House Visits 12
Prosecutors Decry Leaks In Pellicano Case....12
FBI Monitoring Chicago-Based Gang's Contacts With US Soldiers....13
Gotti Lawyer Says FBI Intimidating Witnesses 13
Connecticut Fraud Investigator Reassigned Over Rowland-Era Perks 13
Defense To Begin Case Today In Philadelphia Bribery Trial 13
Prosecution Begins Closing Arguments At Nevada Bribery Trial 14
Prosecution Rests Case At Virginia Corruption Trial....14
SCOTUS Rules States May Not Bar Evidence In Criminal Trials 14
Kansas Attorney Pleads Guilty To Embezzling From Church.14
Former Morris Brown President Pleads Guilty To Embezzling Federal Funds....15
Jury Selection Begins In Maryland Trial Of Convicted DC Sniper....15
Prosecutor In Duke Rape Probe Faces Election....16

Civil Law:

Government Says Delta Overcharged For Flights 16

Civil Rights:

Chicago Schools Comes To Agreement With DOJ to End Federal Oversight 16
Judge Ends Federal Control Of Louisiana Juvenile Prisons .. 17
Federal Agents Arrest 66 In Human Trafficking Raids 17
Florida Man Charged With Hate Crime In Attack On NFL Player 17
North Las Vegas On Track For ADA Compliance 17
Judge Allows EEOC Racial Bias Suit Against Movie Studio To Proceed 17
Jury Considers Civil Hate-Crime Suit 18
Kristof Says Morning-After Pill Should Be Available Over The Counter 18
NYTimes Says Census Bureau Should Count Inmates In Their Home Communities 18

Antitrust:

Stevens Bill Could Slow Phone Company Efforts To Enter Cable TV Business 18
Google Expresses Concerns About Microsoft Browser 18
RIM Faces Another Patent Suit Over Blackberry 19
NYTimes Backs Efforts To Pass "Net-Neutrality" Bill 19
WSJournal Says Twombly Case Could Spark Wave Of Litigation 19

Environment:

White House To Release Bird Flu Response Plan 20

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Critics Say FBI Struggling To Assume Top Counter-Terrorism Role 20
Pete Rose Jr. Sentenced For Distributing GBL 20
Four Sentenced In Illinois Meth Case 21
Medicinal Use Of Marijuana Disputed 21
Limbaugh Signs Deal In Prescription Fraud Case 21
Man Accused Of Importing, Distributing Steroids Pleads Guilty 22
State, Federal Investigation Continues Into Arizona Church Arson 22

Immigration:

Immigration Reform Rallies, Boycott Attract Hundreds Of Thousands 22

Congress-Administration:

Democrats Blast Bush For More Than 750 Signing Statements 26
Medicare Prescription Drug Benefit Projected To Cost 20% Less 26
Trustees Say Medicare, Social Security Finances Are Worsening 27
Bush Urges Congress To Take Steps Toward Slowing Medical Spending 28
Frist Retreats From Plan To Raise Oil Company Taxes 28
Frist Proposal May Sidestep Lawsuit Over Deficit Reduction Act 30
Senate Republicans Seek To Reclaim Issue Of Fiscal Discipline 30
Opponents Of GOP Lobbying Reform Bill Pessimistic 31
OPM Launches Effort To Lure Applicants To Federal Workforce 32
Pelosi Wants Ethics Investigation Of Prostitution Allegations . 32
Bush Job Approval At 34% In USA Today/Gallup Poll 32
Boehner's Office Holds Weekly Meetings With Vulnerable Republicans 32
"Gang Of 14's" Deal On Judicial Nominees Seen As Win For Bush 33

Other News:

New Reports Continue To Show Strong Economy 33
Supreme Court Rules In Favor Of Anna Nicole Smith 33
Child Advocacy Group Sues Video Firms Over Child-Learning Claims 34
Quality Of Life Issues Increasingly Important To Young Attorneys 34
DeLay Spent Over $400,000 On Legal Defense In First Quarter Of 2006 34
Giuliani Campaigns For GOP Candidates In Iowa 35
Romney Plans Speech To Address His Religious Beliefs 35
Clark Eyeing Another Presidential Bid 35
Kerrey Sends Fundraising E-Mail For Kerry 35
Feith To Join Georgetown University Faculty 35
Negotiator Says Iran Won't Suspend Nuclear Enrichment Program 35
Olmert Taps Livni For Number Two Post 36
Despite Support For US, Pakistan Doesn't Get Textile Deal .. 36
Kashmir Killings Said To Target Peace Talks 37
Zoellick Heads To Abuja In Effort To Salvage Darfur Talks ... 37
Bolivian President Nationalizes Gas Industry 37
Poll Shows Conservative Now Leading Mexican Presidential Race 38
Taylor's Arrest Said To Continue Positive Trend 38
CO2 Emissions Market Takes Hit Following EU Report 38
US, Japan Urge China To Disclose Details Of Arms Build-Up 38

DOJ_NMG_0027544

Grassley Claims ONDCP Figures On Colombian Drug Production Are Inconsistent 39
Al Risala Said To Represent New Generation Of Islamic Television 39
Sufism, Formerly Banned, Said To Be Resurgent In Saudi Arabia 39
In Break With Tradition, Turkish Government Appoints Female Preachers 39
Blair Seeks To Avert Disaster For Labour In Thursday's Elections 39
France's Le Pen Will Seek Presidency Again 39
Dutch Immigration Requirements Include Language Test, Tolerance Film 39
Hyperinflation In Zimbabwe Adds To Desperation 39
Prime Minister Celebrates Referendum On Montenegrin Independence From Serbs 40
Russians Seen As Suspicious Of West's Human Rights Rhetoric 40

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 40

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 41

DOJ_NMG_0027545

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Harshly Criticizes Al-Arian, Imposes Prison Sentence. In a story distributed widely by Knight Ridder, the Orlando Sentinel (5/2, Gutierrez, 265K) reports, "Branding him a 'master manipulator,' a federal judge on Monday sentenced…Sami Al-Arian to 57 months in prison for aiding members of a terrorist group. The prison term dashed Al-Arian's hope that he would be given time served and be released to immigration authorities for immediate deportation." US District Judge James Moody said to Al-Arian during the sentencing, "When it came to blowing up children and women on buses, did you leap into action? No. … On the contrary, you laughed when you heard about the attacks." His "unexpected strong words and sentence…stung" Al-Arian's "family and supporters while they vindicated federal prosecutors." The AP (5/2, Stacy) adds, "Dismissing defense contentions that money raised by Al-Arian and his co-defendants went to support Palestinian charities, Moody said: 'Your only connection to widows and orphans was that you create them.' … U.S. Attorney Paul Perez claimed victory, saying the pursuit of Al-Arian allowed federal agents to identify and disrupt a terrorist cell operating in this country. The plea vindicated the prosecution, which some had criticized as being political and an attack on free speech, he said." The Tampa Tribune (5/2, Silvestrini) notes, "Before being sentenced, Al-Arian said he takes full responsibility for his actions and praised the jury for their courage."

The New York Times (5/2, Steinhauer, 1.19M) calls the sentence was "a surprise move" and adds that "the jury verdict, which embarrassed prosecutors who had devoted considerable resources to the case, underscored the complexities of obtaining convictions under the USA Patriot Act and other recent laws that criminalized aiding organizations that the United States has deemed to be based on terror. For example, in the 30 previous efforts to convict a defendant of conspiring to contribute money to a terrorist organization — one of the charges against Mr. Al-Arian — 28 were dismissed, according to the Terrorism Research Center at the University of Arkansas." Additionally, The Washington Post (5/2, A7, 744K) reports a truncated version of the AP story in "Nation In Brief," and The New York Sun (5/2, Gerstein) reports on the sentencing under the headline "Judge Stuns Al-Arian With Maximum Time."

WPost Says DOJ Should Not Claim Victory With Al-Arian Deal. The Washington Post (5/2, A20, 744K) editorializes that DOJ "described the deal as if it were a big win in the war on terrorism." However "the government has settled this case on terms under which Mr. al-Arian will go free in less than two years. It's not clear whether the government charged Mr. al-Arian too aggressively or simply put on a bad performance at trial. In either event it ill becomes the government to claim victory."

Umer Hayat Released On Bail. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (5/2, Thompson) reports "ice cream vendor" Umer Hayat was released Monday on $390,000 bail. He "will be confined to his home…and was fitted with an electronic monitoring device." The AP notes that Hayat "was charged with two counts of lying to the FBI about his son's attendance at the training camp, but his case ended in a mistrial last week after the jury said it was deadlocked. Prosecutors must decide by Friday if they will seek a new trial."

Lawyer For Former Detroit Terror Suspect Seeks Dismissal Of New Charges. The Detroit News (5/1, Egan) reported, "Lawyers for Karim Koubriti, the Detroit man whose terrorism-related conviction was tossed out as a result of alleged wrongdoing by former federal prosecutor Richard Convertino, say in light of the alleged misconduct the charge against him should be dropped." However, "the government argues there is no evidence of misconduct related to Koubriti's most recent indictment, which was brought…by different prosecutors after Convertino was removed from the case. … Koubriti is accused of submitting phony claims for lost wages and other expenses after he was a passenger in a car driven by one of his co-defendants."

PATRIOT ACT:

FBI Issued NSLs For Information On More Than 3,500 In US Last Year. As reported by AP and the Los Angeles Times yesterday, the Washington Post (5/2, A4, Eggen, 744K) reports, "The FBI sought personal information on thousands of Americans last year from banks, Internet service providers and other companies without having to seek approval from a court, according to new data released by the Justice Department," which "disclosed that the FBI had issued more than 9,200 'national security letters,'…seeking detailed information about more than 3,500 U.S. citizens or legal residents in 2005." The Post notes, "The new statistics provide the latest measure of the government's rapidly expanding anti-terrorism activities, which include a wide range of secret warrants and powers aimed at monitoring suspicious behavior and preventing attacks." The ACLU's Caroline Fredrickson said of DOJ report, "The idea that this kind of power resides in the hands of so many people at the FBI with no court oversight is very troubling."

DOJ_NMG_0027546

DOJ Reports 18% Rise In FISA Warrant Approvals In 2005. USA Today (5/2, 7A, 2.31M) reports FISA terror investigation wiretaps "increased 18% last year, the Justice Department said Monday. There were 2,072 FISA warrants in 2005, up from 1,754 a year earlier. The warrants are separate from a program under which President Bush authorized the National Security Agency to monitor, without warrants, international calls and e-mails of people in the USA when one party to the conversation may be linked to terrorists." ACLU lawyer Jesselyn McCurdy "said she was concerned that judges are "becoming a rubber stamp."

NYTimes Editor Defends Decision To Publish NSA Eavesdropping Story. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (5/2, 2.11M), Bill Keller, Executive Editor of the New York Times, writes, "Most American newspapers, including yours and mine, try hard to separate the curiosity-driven world of reporters and editors from the ideology-driven world of editorial writers and columnists. … In the case of the eavesdropping story, President Bush and other figures in his administration were given abundant opportunities to explain why they felt our information should not be published. We considered the evidence presented to us, agonized over it, delayed publication because of it. In the end, their case did not stand up to the evidence our reporters amassed, and we judged that the responsible course was to publish what we knew and let readers assess it themselves."

State, Local Police Also Conducting Domestic Surveillance Operations. U.S. News and World Report (5/8, Kaplan) reports in its cover story, "U.S. News has identified nearly a dozen cases in which city and county police, in the name of homeland security, have surveilled or harassed animal-rights and antiwar protesters, union activists, and even library patrons surfing the Web. Unlike with Washington's warrantless domestic surveillance program, little attention has been focused on the role of state and local authorities in the war on terrorism. A U.S. News inquiry found that federal officials have funneled hundreds of millions of dollars into once discredited state and local police intelligence operations." US News adds, "In dozens of interviews, officials across the nation have stressed that the enhanced intelligence work is vital to the nation's security, but even its biggest boosters worry about a lack of training and standards."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Jurors See Surveillance Tape Of NYC Subway Bomb Plotting. The New York Times (5/2, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports the testimony of a "paid police informer who is the central witness at the trial of a Pakistani immigrant charged with plotting to blow up the Herald Square subway station" is "shedding light on what seem to be new police tactics to uncover terrorist plots before they come to fruition. While a federal judge gave the police expanded powers in 2003, critics have nonetheless raised objections to the use of informers in places of worship, political events and other gatherings." The Times notes most of the informers testimony concerned conversations he overheard in NYC area mosques.

DHS, FBI To Lease Freedom Tower Offices. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Frangos, 2.11M) reports, "the rebuilt World Trade Center's signature Freedom Tower is also likely to be a government citadel housing federal law-enforcement groups among other government agencies -- possibly enhancing its profile as a terrorist target." The Journal notes that among prospective tenants are the Department of Homeland Security's Customs and Border Protection, and Immigration and Customs Enforcement; as well as the Secret Service and the FBI.

Taylor Reportedly Ready To Allow Funding For Flight 93 Memorial. Roll Call (5/2, Ben Pershing) reports that "in the face of pressure from his fellow House Republicans," Rep. Charles Taylor "is expected to insert federal funding for a memorial to the passengers and crew of Flight 93 into the fiscal 2007 Interior spending bill this week."

DOJ_NMG_0027547

Roll Call notes Taylor "has been under siege since The Washington Post first reported that the chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on Interior was refusing to provide federal dollars to help purchase land for the construction of the memorial."

Qatar To Announce $60 Million In Katrina Grants. The New York Times (5/2, Strom, 1.19M) reports, "The nation of Qatar plans to announce today roughly $60 million in grants to benefit the victims of Hurricane Katrina, including $17.5 million to Xavier University of Louisiana." The nation's US ambassador, Nasser Bin Hamad M. al-Khalifa, "said the remainder of the $100 million his country had pledged would be assigned in the coming months. … To identify projects Qatar might want to support, the ambassador and his representatives talked to relief organizations, educators, members of Congress and other experts, and some embassy staff members traveled to the region."

Dionne Says FEMA Needs Liberation From DHS, "Competent" Managers. E.J. Dionne Jr., in his column for the Washington Post (5/2, A21, 744K) writes that Sens. Susan Collins and Joseph Lieberman, who have released the results of a Senate investigation of the response to Hurricane Katrina that calls for FEMA to be dismantled and rebuilt, "are creative public servants." Dionne continues that FEMA "would work better if the administration takes their 86 ideas for reform seriously," but "there is something maddening about the Washington tendency to go for complicated, bureaucratic fixes for what are essentially human failures. These can often be remedied by taking an agency's mission seriously and appointing good people to carry it out." Dionne asks, "Why not just liberate it from DHS, as Sens. Trent Lott, Barbara Boxer, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Rep. Tom Davis have suggested, and make sure that competent people run FEMA?"

WAR NEWS:

Bush Says Iraq Mission Has Reached Turning Point. President Bush's remarks on the anniversary of his "Mission Accomplished" speech were not heavily covered by the media. For example, all three networks noted it, though none afforded it much prominence. NBC and ABC both waited until well into their broadcasts to air their reports, each less than a minute in length, carrying them ninth and sixth in their lineups respectively. CBS' coverage of the event was more comprehensive, but also left out of the top stories of the day.

Bush delivered his remarks in a White House appearance with Secretary of State Rice and Defense Secretary Rumsfeld, recently returned from a visit to Iraq. All three networks, as well as much of the print coverage, described the president's message as generally optimistic though less so that three years ago. Most reports noted his remarks that the mission had reached a "turning point," in reference to the establishment of the new Iraqi government. The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 6, 2:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Today marks the third anniversary of what many thought at the time was one of the cleverest photo-ops ever. Even opponents of the Iraq invasion were impressed when the President flew onto an aircraft carrier decked out in a dashing flight suit and then spoke beneath a banner that said 'mission accomplished.' But it turned out not to be. … After meeting with his Secretaries of State and Defense, the best the President could say was things are finally looking up." Bush was shown saying, "We believe this is a turning point for the Iraqi citizens and it's a new chapter in our partnership."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/1, Blitzer) noted Bush "never said mission accomplished" in his remarks yesterday," while ABC World News Tonight (5/1, story 6, :40, Vargas, 8.78M) reported Bush "said Iraq faces challenges. But he hailed the formation of a new Iraqi government as a turning point." Bush was shown saying, "Obviously, there's some difficult days ahead because there's terrorists there that are willing to take innocent life, in order to stop the progress of democracy. But this government is more determined than ever to succeed. And we believe we've got partners to help the Iraqi people realize their dreams."

Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (5/1, story 9, 0:40, Williams, 9.87M) also noted yesterday marked "the third anniversary of…Bush's so-called 'mission accomplished' speech aboard the aircraft carrier USS Abraham Lincoln. On that day he declared, 'The tyrant has fallen and Iraq is free.'" Yesterday, "the message was less upbeat, with the President pronouncing Iraq's new unity government 'more determined than ever to succeed.'" The President "acknowledged there will be more tough days ahead. By the way, the US death toll in the war is nearing 2,400."

The AP (5/2, Loven) reports Bush "declared another turning point had arrived with the establishment of a permanent government in Baghdad." Bush said the new Iraqi leaders "need to know that we stand with them.'" According to the AP, Bush "walked a fine line between celebrating achievements and warning of more sacrifices to come." Though Bush "was careful not to declare overall victory and warned of difficult work ahead, the speech was congratulatory in tone and aimed at marking a pivot from invasion to reconstruction."

DOJ_NMG_0027548

The Washington Times (5/2, Curl, 90K) notes Bush also "warned there will be 'tough days ahead' in Iraq, as Democrats pointed out that the president uttered nearly the same words three years ago to the day." Bush said Rumsfeld and Rice "talked with the new Iraqi leaders about the need to 'establish control over the militias and other unauthorized armed groups and enforce the rule of law.'"

84% Say Iraq Mission "Has Not Been Accomplished." CNN's The Situation Room (5/1, Blitzer) reports, "Tonight, our new poll shows the vast majority of Americans, 84 percent, say the mission in Iraq has not been accomplished. Will it eventually be accomplished? Americans clearly divided on that question. Forty-nine percent say yes, 44 percent say no in this CNN poll conducted by Opinion Research Corporation."

Only 30% Approve Of Bush Handling Of Iraq. The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 6, 2:10, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "Three years ago when the President appeared on the deck of the USS Lincoln, 74% of those polled approved of the way the President was handling Iraq. But contrast that with the latest CBS News poll -- just 30% now approve of the way the President is handling Iraq. That's 44%, Bob, in three years."

Rice, Rumsfeld Iraq Trip Called "High-Stakes Gamble." U.S. News and World Report (5/8, Whitelaw) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld "staged an unusual joint surprise visit to the Iraqi capital last week. … The promise of a national unity government has been something of a political lifeline for the Bush administration in its search for some way to declare victory in Iraq and begin withdrawing significant numbers of U.S. troops. Rice and Rumsfeld are clearly hoping that [Nouri al-Maliki's] appointment [as prime minister] will mark a turning point in a conflict that has dragged down President Bush's poll numbers to the lowest point in his tenure. But Maliki faces a herculean set of challenges in trying to keep this shattered, divided nation from slipping deeper into chaos." The Rice-Rumsfeld mission "was a high-stakes gamble for the Bush administration, which has already been accused of playing a heavy-handed role in Iraqi politics."

Reid Calls Attention To US Soldiers Killed In Iraq. The AP (5/2, Loven) notes congressional Democrats' leaders used the anniversary to criticize Bush. Senate minority leader Harry Reid "stood on the Senate floor in front of a picture of Bush with…the phrase 'Mission Accomplished' and read the names of the 16 troops from his home state of Nevada who had been killed. Reid called it…'a public relations stunt gone horribly wrong.'"

The Washington Times (5/2, Curl, 90K) reports Reid "accused the president of manipulating prewar intelligence and said U.S. intervention in Iraq to disarm Saddam Hussein has increased terrorism around the world."

Kennedy Reiterates Vote Against Iraq War Was His Best Senate Vote Ever. Sen. Edward Kennedy, on MSNBC's Hardball (5/1, Matthews), said, "The best vote I cast in the United States Senate was for not going to the war. This was the wrong war at the wrong time. … We had Osama bin Laden on the run and suddenly this administration deflected that and went to war in Iraq."

Iraqi Oil Production Still Below Pre-War Levels. The Washington Times (5/2, Scarborough, 90K) reports Iraqi insurgents have "come up with new ways to pierce Iraq's vital oil industry, keeping the daily flow below prewar levels despite an emerging protection force and a reduced number of attacks. New numbers this week from the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction (SIGIR) show oil production at 2.18 million barrels per day, 400,000 below 2003 prewar levels." The Times notes the Bush administration "once projected that Iraq would be rebuilt principally from Iraqi oil revenues, but that prediction has fallen by the wayside."

Iraq Reconstruction IG Reports Mixed Results. ABC World News Tonight (5/1, story 7, :25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The inspector general monitoring the rebuilding of Iraq has presented a mixed picture of the $21 billion US effort. 5,100 schools have been repaired. And more Iraqis have drinking water, sewerage treatment and cell phones than before the war. But oil production is below pre-war levels. And while repairs to the railway stations are nearly complete, just 4% of the trains are running because it is too dangerous."

Murtha Will Not Sign Discharge Petition On Withdrawal. The Hill (5/2, Tiron) reports Rep. John

DOJ_NMG_0027549

Murtha "has never signed a discharge petition in his 32 years in Congress, and he refuses to bend, even if signing one means attracting more attention to the debate on the war in Iraq." Last year Rep. Neil Abercrombie "filed a motion to discharge the House Rules Committee from considering a resolution sponsored by Abercrombie and 67 other members that would require President Bush to develop and implement a plan for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq." Murtha "said he does not think it is appropriate to sign a discharge petition and disregard the committee process."

Biden Suggests Partitioning Iraq Into Three Semi-Autonomous Regions. The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports Sen. Joseph R. Biden "suggested the creation of separate, autonomous regions for Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds to counter continuing ethnic and religious violence." Biden's proposal "would give each of the major ethnic and religious groups in Iraq broad authority to run local affairs. The central government in Baghdad would be given limited, but specific, responsibilities for border defense, foreign policy, oil production and revenues." The Times notes the White House "quickly denounced the idea."

The Washington Times (5/2, Bellantoni, 90K) reports Biden "promoted the idea as a 'third way that can bring our troops home, protect our fundamental security interests and preserve Iraq as a unified country' in a speech to the World Affairs Council of Philadelphia and in an opinion piece published in yesterday's New York Times. 'The choice I'm proposing can give all of us...realistic hope that our sacrifices in Iraq were not in vain,' he said."

Iraqis Seen As Already Partitioning Country. The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 6, 2:10, Pizzey, 7.66M) reported the Iraqi people "may well think a corner has been turned, Bob, but not quite the corner the President is talking about. People here are very much looking to protect themselves, they're not thinking in terms of nation right now." The "idea of partition" suggested by Biden is "actually more of a statement of what's actually happening here on the ground. We're finding that people are fleeing neighborhoods where they're in the minority and, in fact, you're getting people coalescing along ethnic lines and they're looking not to the state for protection but ethnically-based militias. That's partition any way you cut it."

Sunni Army Recruits Angered By Postings Disrupt Graduation Ceremony. The Washington Post (5/2, A13, Hernandez, 744K) reports the "graduation of nearly 1,000 new Iraqi army soldiers in restive Anbar province took a disorderly turn Sunday when dozens of the men declared that they would refuse to serve outside their home areas, according to U.S. and Iraqi military authorities." The Post continues, "The 978 soldiers, most of them Sunni Muslims, had just finished nearly five weeks of military training and were parading before a review stand" when "some soldiers started tearing their clothes off to demonstrate their rage." According to the Post, video of the incident "aired on the al-Jazeera and al-Arabiya television networks throughout Monday gave the impression of a near-riot."

The New York Times (5/2, Oppel, Hassan, 1.19M) reports Lt. Col. Michael Negard, a spokesman for the American military, "called the episode an isolated incident and said the Iraqi troops had soon calmed down and marched off to eat at the chow hall. He said he did not know whether soldiers were later disciplined." Negard added that the soldiers "were never promised that they would serve in their hometowns."

Soldiers' Guidelines Modified To Reduce Confrontations With Iraqi Civilians. The New York Times (5/2, Shanker, 1.19M) reports the US military is "taking steps intended to lessen the chance for violent confrontations between…troops and innocent Iraqis during…daily routines." According to the Times, "The changes reflect deep worries that the conduct of American soldiers continues to alienate many Iraqis." Examples of new policies include "substituting…gentler warnings for the firing of warning shots" and "using strobe lights to make sure" Iraqis can see US checkpoints. The Times goes on to note some unit commanders "say the guidelines may make it harder to protect their troops." An anonymous "field-grade officer" is quoted as saying, "The restrained approach, as it is manifesting itself on the ground, is beginning to significantly handcuff our soldiers."

US Troops In Ramadi Routinely Battle Insurgents "Several Times A Day." The AP (5/2, Pitman) reports that Ramadi is "the most dangerous city in Iraq for U.S. forces…with militants and American troops exchanging fire several times a day — at least." The AP goes on to describe the routine of soldiers occupying "the Ramadi Inn," which has "panoramic views" of "an urban wasteland crawling with insurgents." The troops "say the militants are…casing their positions…looking from afar through binoculars and video cameras. … Troops sit with binoculars 24 hours a day. They brace for attacks, watch for guerrillas and keep an eye out for battles."

DOJ_NMG_0027550

Sadr Cultivates Support By Supplying Social Services. Knight Ridder (5/2, Youssef) reports Muqtada al-Sadr "is working behind the scenes to maintain his armed militant wing and portray it as a social movement, a step that would make him one of Iraq's most powerful figures if it succeeds, U.S. officials and Iraqi politicians say." Knight Ridder adds that US and Iraqi officials contend al-Sadr is trying to recreate the model of Hezbollah, which "began largely as an armed group," but "eventually became a powerful political force with a large social-service component." Sadr's "shift is a symptom of a growing rift" within the Shiite United Iraqi Alliance, that "pits al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia against members of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq."

Shiite Women Outside Green Zone Protest Continued Violence. USA Today/AP (5/2) reports approximately 200 Shiites, "many of them women in full-length black abayas, rallied Monday outside the Green Zone to demand that U.S. and Iraqi forces do more to stop attacks on Iraqis." The AP notes, "Such demonstrations are rare in Baghdad because of fears large groups might attract suicide bombers."

Al-Arabiya Shows Video Of Former Iraqi PM's Body Being Abused. The Washington Post (5/2, A13, Hernandez, Al-Izzi, 744K) reports the body of Muhammad Hamza al-Zubaydi, a former prime minister of Iraq "was kicked and insulted after U.S. forces transferred it into Iraqi custody, according to a video of the incident that aired on al-Arabiya television on Monday evening." Zubayd "was set to face charges in the special tribunal trying Hussein on war crimes charges, but in December he "died of natural causes while in U.S. custody."

Relatively Stable Babil Province Seen As Model For Iraq. In an op-ed for the New York Times (5/2, 1.19M) Bartle Breese Bull, the foreign editor of Prospect magazine, writes that Babil "could well turn out to be the country's crucial province. … If Iraq still exists five years from now…then Babil will have been a major reason for the success. What Iraqis care about above all else these days is security, and Babil — apart from the so-called Death Triangle around the towns of Latifiya, Mahmudiya and Yusufiya in the Sunni north — is a safe place."

Reluctance To Utilize Full Force By US Military Noted. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (5/2, 2.11M) the Hoover Institution's Shelby Steele writes, "There is something rather odd in the way America has come to fight its wars since World War II. For one thing, it is now unimaginable that we would use anything approaching the full measure of our military power (the nuclear option aside) in the wars we fight. … Despite our vast power, we are only slogging along -- if admirably -- in Iraq," but "no one -- including, very likely, the insurgents themselves -- believes that America lacks the raw power to defeat this insurgency if it wants to."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Lay Contends Banks Forced Most Of His Enron Stock Sales. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, McWilliams, Emshwiller) reports, "In an effort to repair damage done to his credibility, former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay and his attorney challenged a government claim that his son had shown a lack of faith in the company's stock by selling it 'short' in expectation of a decline." The Journal continues, "The effort came in the fifth day of Mr. Lay's testimony in the conspiracy and fraud trial of him and his co-defendant, former Enron President Jeffrey Skilling. Yesterday afternoon, prosecutor John Hueston continued to hammer away at Mr. Lay for his actions in the months prior to Enron's December 2001 collapse." The Journal adds, "Last week, Mr. Hueston had seemed to score a point when he surprised Mr. Lay with evidence that the former executive's son, Mark, had in March 2001 bet against, or shorted, Enron stock. Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling have both asserted professional short sellers attacked Enron's stock, contributing to the collapse. … While Mark Lay's trading records show several short sales, the elder Mr. Lay's attorney, George Secrest, focused on other parts of those records indicating that Enron stock had been moved into the brokerage account later the same day. Mr. Secrest and his client agreed that Mark Lay put in a sale order that apparently got listed as a short sale. … Yesterday morning, Mr. Hueston pushed to add new items to a list of purported misstatements by Mr. Lay. He noted Mr. Lay had repeatedly claimed that he was 'forced' in 2001 to sell $70 million of Enron stock back to the company to pay off pressing margin calls on private loans. The prosecutor also noted that Mr. Lay had previously testified he tried to hold on to as many Enron shares as possible because he believed they were undervalued."

DOJ_NMG_0027551

USA Today (5/2, Farrell) reports, "Under questioning from prosecutor John Hueston, Lay acknowledged that some stock sales, which did not have to be immediately disclosed to the investing public, were used to fund his lifestyle. But Lay maintained that after he regained the CEO title in August 2001, when his co-defendant and former CEO Jeff Skilling resigned, he sold Enron stock only because he had no other liquid assets." USA adds, "Prosecutors displayed documents showing that even while Lay was buying $4 million in Enron stock at that time, he was unloading more than $20 million worth of stock through a line-of-credit program at Enron that did not require immediate public disclosure of the sales. … Lay sold his Enron stock to pay down personal debt even though he had access to about $19 million in cash and other stocks that could be sold quickly. In addition to his stocks, Lay also owned a $10 million luxury apartment in Houston and $20 million in other real estate holdings, mostly his three homes in Aspen, Colo."

The Washington Post (5/2, D1, Johnson) reports that "as Lay, 64, prepares to exit the witness stand in his fraud trial Tuesday, the central question is whether his appearance did more harm than good. … . On Monday, with the government using his personal finances against him to sometimes brutal effect, Lay tried to fend off accusations that he chose to quietly sell more than $70 million in stock back to Enron, rather than liquidate real estate and other investments as the company spiraled downward." The Post notes that Hueston "painted Lay as a man so addicted to an extravagant lifestyle, and so centered on his personal needs, that he 'maxed out' his corporate line of credit a day before Enron's ill-fated merger with rival Dynegy cratered. Five days later, in December 2001, the company filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection, and thousands of employees lost their jobs and retirement savings. … For his part, Lay insisted that he always believed Enron's stock price would swing back upward and that, as banks began to call in nearly $100 million in personal debts in 2001, he was 'hoping and praying that each and every time would be the last time' he would be forced to sell stock." The Post adds, "In one of the biggest surprises of the 14-week-old trial, Lay never appeared entirely comfortable in five days on the witness stand, particularly for a man who once moved easily among world leaders, corporate titans and religious figures. His lead attorney, Michael W. Ramsey, left the case midstream with heart trouble, requiring the defense to regroup. For the first couple of days of his testimony last week, Lay struggled to find the right tone. … Instead, he sometimes seemed far more aggrieved by his treatment by the government than grief-stricken over the plight of Enron workers and investors who lost billions of dollars because of Enron's demise."

The AP (5/2, Hays) reports that Lay "again flashed his temper to prosecutor John Hueston, comparing Hueston's second-guessing of his decisions during Enron's downward spiral to carving up a corpse." The AP adds, "Lay was confronted with e-mails and survey responses from October 2001 in which employees raised questions about accounting 'trickery' and Enron's business ethics. .. One veteran Enron employee said, 'I've lost all respect for Enron senior management' and suggested it was criminal for Enron executives to exercise stock options when they knew accounting tricks were being used to manipulate earnings. … At the time, about six weeks before Enron sought bankruptcy protection, its stock price was falling fast, and The Wall Street Journal was raising questions about unusual business partnerships created by Enron Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow. … When prosecutor John Hueston asked Lay why he did not question Fastow directly, Lay responded that 'I was getting information from all sides' and said other senior officers thought the Journal and others were on a 'witch hunt' against Fastow."

Potential Quattrone Retrial Will Have New Judge. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Davies, Smith) reports, "A new judge has been assigned to oversee the possible retrial of former star investment banker Frank Quattrone, whose 2004 conviction on obstruction-of-justice charges was overturned in March1." The Journal continues, "U.S. District Judge George Daniels will replace Judge Lewis Kaplan, who was assigned to the case last week but recused himself because he worked at Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison LLP, the law firm overseeing Mr. Quattrone's defense. Judge Kaplan had been given the case after the appeals-court panel overturned the verdict, citing errors by the case's original trial judge, Richard Owen." The Journal adds, "Prosecutors haven't announced whether they plan to seek a retrial. They confirmed last week that two new prosecutors -- William Johnson and Raymond Lohier -- have been assigned to the case. Mr. Johnson and former assistant U.S. Attorney David Anders won an accounting-fraud conviction against former WorldCom CEO Bernard Ebbers. Mr. Anders, who prosecuted the last trial against Mr. Quattrone, is now an attorney at Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz. Mr. Lohier won a securities-fraud conviction earlier this year against Richard Adelson, the former Chief Executive of Impath Inc."

DOJ_NMG_0027552

Comverse Executives Quit As Options Probe Escalates. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Bandler, Forelle) reports, "The chief executive and two other officials of Comverse Technology Inc. resigned as a board probe of possible backdating of stock-options grants gathered steam at the company." The Journal notes, "The departures, effective immediately, include Kobi Alexander, chairman, CEO and a founder of the New York telecommunications-software company; Chief Financial Officer David Kreinberg; and Senior General Counsel William Sorin. … Separately, the board of another company facing options scrutiny, medical-insurance giant UnitedHealth Group Inc., approved a new set of management-compensation guidelines, including the establishment of a fixed date each year for granting options to existing employees." The Journal adds, "The moves come as the Securities and Exchange Commission is engaged in a wide-ranging examination of options practices. The SEC is investigating whether grants were backdated or granted ahead of favorable news to give recipients a better chance of profiting from exercising the options."

Former Qwest CEO Nacchio Continues Bid To Have Charges Dropped. The Wall Street Journal (5/2) reports, "In a series of legal filings yesterday, attorneys for Joseph Nacchio continued their bid to have criminal insider-trading charges against the former Qwest Communications International Inc. chief executive dismissed." The Journal continues, "In filings in U.S. District Court here, Mr. Nacchio's attorney Herbert Stern argued that prosecutors didn't make it clear that to commit a crime, Mr. Nacchio must have based his decision to sell Qwest stock on insider information. Mr. Nacchio says he didn't act on the basis of insider information. The distinction between selling while in possession of inside information and selling on the basis of inside information has been debated between the two sides. … No trial date has been set."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Common Cause Seeks DOJ Probe Of Katherine Harris. The AP (5/2) reports, "A congressional watchdog group asked the Justice Department on Monday to investigate whether Rep. Katherine Harris, R-Fla., attempted to obtain a $10 million appropriation for a defense contractor in return for his financial support." The AP continues, "Common Cause filed a complaint with the Justice Department, citing information provided by contractor Mitchell Wade, as part of a plea agreement in the bribery case of convicted former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, R-Calif. … Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said the department does not comment on, or confirm, criminal investigations."

The Orlando Sentinel (5/2) reports, "Common Cause wants to know whether Harris broke the law when she and Mitchell Wade met at an exclusive Georgetown restaurant in early 2005. At that dinner -- which cost Wade up to $2,800 -- Wade offered to hold a fundraiser for Harris and sought her help obtaining $10 million in federal money." The Sentinel continues, "Common Cause's director of ethics campaigns said there is sufficient evidence to suggest Harris submitted the appropriations request in exchange for Wade's fundraising support. … 'There's certainly the appearance of a quid pro quo,' said Mike Surrusco. 'We absolutely think this complaint has merit.'" The Sentinel adds, "Harris spokesman Chris Ingram would not comment on the complaint Sunday, saying he had not yet seen it. He suggested Common Cause was politically motivated, saying that 'different liberal interest groups' were trying to undermine Harris' U.S. Senate campaign against Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson."

The Tampa Tribune (5/2, Epstein) reports, "The Justice Department has kept the scope of its investigation of the defense contractor, MZM Inc., under wraps, though it has already netted a California congressman for accepting favors and bribes in exchange for earmarks."

Corruption Trial Of Former Alabama Governor Begins. The AP (5/2, Johnson) reports, "The corruption trial of former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman opened Monday with prosecutors accusing him of scheming with his chief of staff to obtain bribes for state help, including assistance allegedly sought by then-HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy." The AP continues, "Siegelman's lawyer countered that the federal case was built on the lies of unbelievable witnesses who have pleaded guilty in the case and are hoping for lenient sentences. … 'The government is going to have to call a bunch of liars, a bunch of con artists, a bunch of thieves,' said attorney Vince Kilborn." The AP adds, "The opening statements showed the trial of Siegelman, Scrushy and two former members of Siegelman's administration may hinge largely on the testimony of two former government insiders - Nick Bailey, once a close aide to Siegelman, and Lanny Young, a lobbyist and landfill developer with clout in the Siegelman administration. … Both have pleaded guilty and won't be sentenced until after the trial, which is going on as Siegelman, a Democrat, campaigns for another term as governor."

DOJ_NMG_0027553

The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Bauerlein) reports, "In opening arguments at the trial of Messrs. Scrushy, Siegelman and two other defendants, Louis V. Franklin Sr., criminal-division chief of the U.S. attorney's office (in Montgomery, AL), said Mr. Scrushy helped fuel the Birmingham, Ala., company's growth by exchanging money for political favors. … 'Fob James didn't win, folks,' Mr. Franklin said, referring to the incumbent Republican governor whom Mr. Siegelman, a Democrat, defeated in 1998. Mr. Scrushy had backed Gov. James, so he 'had to scramble,' Mr. Franklin added. Prosecutors allege Mr. Scrushy made two hidden payments to then-Gov. Siegelman in 1999 and 2000 to get a spot on a state regulatory panel that oversees HealthSouth." The Journal adds, "Defense lawyer Fred D. Gray, known for his work on landmark civil-rights cases, told jurors that Mr. Scrushy hadn't done anything illegal and was a good citizen and humanitarian whose actions are 'typical of the people I've represented for the last 50 years in this court, including Rosa Parks and Martin Luther King Jr.'"

Plea Deal Implicates Milberg Weiss Partners. The California Recorder (5/2, Scheck) reports, "It took six years and a detour through Beverly Hills, but on Friday, federal prosecutors in Los Angeles finally got their first guilty plea in the long-running investigation of the class action plaintiffs firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman. … And it looks to be a significant one: in saying that he and his family took nearly $2.5 million in illegal kickbacks from Milberg Weiss in exchange for serving as lead plaintiffs in several class actions, Howard Vogel fingered four partners at the New York firm and agreed to cooperate in the ongoing investigation." The Recorder adds, "Vogel and Milberg -- referred to as 'the New York Law Firm' – 'had an established pattern and practice that the New York Law Firm would secretly pay defendant Vogel a percentage of the attorneys' fees that the New York Law Firm obtained in class actions and shareholder derivative actions,' prosecutors alleged in a document charging Vogel with a single count of making false statements in federal court. … Plea documents also allege that a high-profile Denver criminal defense attorney and a small New York real estate firm passed Vogel payments from Milberg in cases stretching from 1991 to 2005."

Secret Service To Release Records Of Abramoff's White House Visits. The AP (5/2, Locy) reports the Secret Service "has agreed to turn over White House visitor logs that will show how often convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff met with Bush administration officials — and with whom he met." US District Judge John Garrett Penn "last Tuesday approved an agreement between the Secret Service and Judicial Watch, a public interest group, that requires the agency to produce records of Abramoff's visits from Jan. 1, 2001, to the present." Administration officials "have refused to say how many times Abramoff, who raised at least $100,000 for President Bush's re-election, has been to the White House. Bush has said he doesn't know Abramoff."

Prosecutors Decry Leaks In Pellicano Case. The AP (5/2, Deutsch) reports, "Troubled by leaks to the media, a federal prosecutor said Monday he would delay filing grand jury transcripts and other crucial documents in the case of an indicted Hollywood private eye because he fears the material will 'end up on the front page.' … Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Saunders also confirmed during the federal court hearing that the U.S. Justice Department had launched an investigation to determine who leaked confidential FBI reports to The New York Times." The AP continues, "The wiretapping case against private detective Anthony Pellicano and other defendants has drawn in a growing list of celebrities, and with them increasing media attention. … The confidential information began showing up two weeks ago in the Times, which cited FBI interviews with top Hollywood power brokers. … 'We have no confidence that these will not end up on the front page of the newspaper,' Saunders told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer on Monday in saying he would delay other filings." The AP notes, "A number of lawyers attended the hearing to say neither they nor their clients were responsible for the leaks. Some said they had not even seen the files before the material began appearing in print. … 'Let me say unequivocally this did not come from the Pellicano camp or on the directive of Mr. Pellicano,' said attorney Steve Gruel, who represents Pellicano. 'I did not have these materials when they started appearing in the paper.' … The judge said she was not convinced there had been a violation of her protective order limiting access to the information to prosecutors, investigators, defense attorneys and their clients." The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Blankstein, 958K) adds, "Federal authorities, in the meantime, delayed plans to unseal three of six searches conducted by FBI agents at Pellicano's Sunset Boulevard offices and one of the private investigator's storage lockers. Attorney Carmen Trutanich asked Fischer to keep search warrant affidavits sealed on behalf of two clients he described in court only as 'John Does.' Law enforcement sources who asked not to be named…said Trutanich is representing John Rottger and actor Steven Seagal."

DOJ_NMG_0027554

NYTimes Corrects Source In Pellicano Story. The New York Times (5/2, 1.19M) reports in "Corrections" that the story yesterday "about the friendship between Ron Meyer, president of Universal Studios, and Anthony Pellicano…referred imprecisely to the sources on which the article was based. It was based on government evidence, including written summaries of interviews by F.B.I. agents with witnesses in the case, not on interviews with F.B.I. agents."

FBI Monitoring Chicago-Based Gang's Contacts With US Soldiers. The Chicago Tribune (5/2, Sheehan, 643K) reports, "The FBI has assigned an agent to monitor any connections between U.S. soldiers and a Chicago-based gang alliance, federal agents said. Of particular concern are reports that the Folk Nation…is placing young members in the military in an effort to gather information about weapons and tactics, said FBI Special Agent Andrea Simmons, who is based in El Paso, Texas. 'Our understanding is that they find members without a criminal history so that they can join, and once they get out, they will have a new set of skills that they can apply to criminal enterprises,' Simmons said." Army CIC spokesman Christopher Grey "acknowledged that there are gang members in the military, but he said their presence has not become a problem."

Gotti Lawyer Says FBI Intimidating Witnesses. The New York Post (5/2, Cornell, 624K) reports, "Lawyers for John 'Junior' Gotti say the FBI is delivering an unusual verbal message along with its subpoenas for a sweeping grand-jury probe of the Gambinos -- subjects are told, 'You can thank Gotti . . . for this.' … The feds have suggested Gotti, his younger brother Peter and others could be hit with new charges, including money laundering, tax fraud and perjury." But defense lawyer Charles Carnesi "claims the supposed verbal message from the FBI is further proof the feds are misusing the grand-jury process in an effort to intimidate witnesses and spark 'raging publicity.'"

Connecticut Fraud Investigator Reassigned Over Rowland-Era Perks. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (5/2, Apuzzo) reports, "Connecticut's governor stripped a top fraud investigator of her duties Monday after The Associated Press reported that she had testified to receiving many of the same gifts that toppled former Gov. John G. Rowland's administration. Kristine Ragaglia, head of the Medicaid fraud unit, was reassigned to administrative duties at Gov. M. Jodi Rell's order, pending an investigation." The AP adds, "In sealed grand jury transcripts, FBI reports and personal diaries examined by the AP, Ragaglia detailed how she took the same expensive hotel getaways, lavish dinners and limousine rides that were used to bribe the officials in Rowland's administration."

Defense To Begin Case Today In Philadelphia Bribery Trial. The Philadelphia Inquirer (5/2, Schaffer, 423K) reports, "The father-and-son duo accused of bribing Philadelphia City Councilman Rick Mariano are expected to begin presenting their defense this morning by calling a series of witnesses that will include labor leader and potential mayoral candidate John J. Dougherty. Dougherty will likely be asked about a $6,000 loan he made to Mariano, who was convicted on March 18 of bribery, fraud and conspiracy. Dougherty told a grand jury last fall that the money was intended to help the councilman repay the defendants, Erie Steel owners Louis and Philip Chartock." The Philadelphia Daily News (5/2, Brennan) notes that Dougherty, "Mariano's one-time political patron, told the FBI he gave Mariano $6,000 to repay an Erie Steel loan but later learned no payment was made."

DOJ_NMG_0027555

Prosecution Begins Closing Arguments At Nevada Bribery Trial. The AP (5/2, Ritter) reports, "Closing arguments began Monday in the federal corruption trial of two former Clark County commissioners who could face prison if a jury finds them guilty of accepting bribes from a former striptease club owner. 'Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey were two corrupt public officials,' prosecutor Daniel Schiess declared." He "quickly acknowledged credibility problems surrounding the prosecution's star witness, former strip club owner Michael Galardi," saying that "FBI wiretaps…revealed the real truth behind what he called a scheme to defraud Clark County residents of honest government." KLAS-TV Las Vegas (5/1, Allen) adds, "Prosecutors let loose on Kincaid-Chauncey using her own words against her. Kincaid-Chauncey acknowledges two payments from Galardi; money she solicited for family members," but "Schiess told the jury…'Mary Kincaid-Chauncey received more than the two payments she has talked about.' Schiess played an FBI wiretap from June 2001 where Lance Malone speaks to his former county commission assistant -- the topic: Kincaid-Chauncey."

Prosecution Rests Case At Virginia Corruption Trial. The Lynchburg News & Advance (5/2, Reilly) reports that at former Lynchburg Mayor Carl Hutcherson's corruption trial yesterday, prosecutors argued that he "was the brains behind a now-defunct church charity they say he used as his personal ATM. But defense attorneys tried to convince a jury the city's top political figure was simply a bumbling businessman who mistakenly relied on another to look after the charity's affairs." The News & Advance notes, "After jurors listened to a taped phone conversation between Hutcherson" and Rev. Jerry Falwell "about the $32,500 donation, FBI Special Agent Christian Pettyjohn testified about his role as lead investigator and said that Hutcherson told him that Falwell Jr. donated the money to Hutcherson's charity and knew that Hutcherson planned to use it to pay back some of his back taxes. Both sides used Pettyjohn to point out passages in Falwell Jr.'s phone conversation that favored their side." The AP (5/2, Lindsey) adds that consultant Davida Wingfield "testified Monday that she falsified minutes documenting a loan to…Hutcherson," and "two women associated with the charity said they were unaware of the loan. The three testified as the prosecution wrapped up its case." The AP also notes Pettyjohn's testimony about the Falwell phone call.

SCOTUS Rules States May Not Bar Evidence In Criminal Trials. The Legal Times (5/2, Mauro) reports, "In his maiden opinion for the Supreme Court, new Justice Samuel Alito Jr. said on Monday that states may not prevent criminal defendants from introducing evidence at trial that another person committed the crime." The Times continues, "The unanimous, pro-defendant decision in Holmes v. South Carolina was an unusual debut for Alito, a former U.S. Attorney not known for ruling in favor of the defense when he was a judge on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Alito joined the high court Jan. 31, replacing Sandra Day O'Connor. … But Alito said that South Carolina had gone too far in barring evidence of third-party guilt in cases in which the prosecution has presented forensic evidence that strongly supports a guilty verdict for the defendant. … 'By evaluating the strength of only one party's evidence, no logical conclusion can be reached regarding the strength of contrary evidence offered by the other side to rebut or cast doubt,' Alito wrote."

The New York Times (5/2, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports that the Supreme Court has unanimously ordered a new trial for an inmate on South Carolina's death row, saying state courts improperly excluded evidence indicating that another man might have committed the crime. Writing his first opinion for the High Court, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., "said the rule of evidence applied by the South Carolina courts was irrational and arbitrary and served to deprive the defendant, Bobbie Lee Holmes, of a 'meaningful opportunity to present a complete defense.'"

Kansas Attorney Pleads Guilty To Embezzling From Church. Kansas City Business Journal (5/1) reports, "A former Overland Park attorney faces as much as 10 years in prison after pleading guilty Monday to embezzling nearly $300,000 from a Kansas City church. Keith Koenigsdorf was disbarred in both Kansas and Missouri last year after he admitted he had stolen the money from Central United Methodist Church." US Attorney Bradley Schlozman said in a yesterday that "Koenigsdorf waived his right to a grand jury and pleaded guilty…to a charge of interstate transportation of stolen property." The Business Journal notes, "The case was…investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation." KMCI-TV Kansas City, MO (5/1) adds, "Koenigsdorf stole the funds, Schlozman explained, by taking blank checks which already bore a signature from an authorized signatory, adding his own signature, making the check payable to himself, and then depositing the check into his law firm's operating account." KMCI also notes that the FBI investigated the case.

DOJ_NMG_0027556

Former Morris Brown President Pleads Guilty To Embezzling Federal Funds. The Washington Post (5/2, Romano) reports, "The former president of Morris Brown College, a historic black school in Atlanta, pleaded guilty yesterday to embezzling millions of dollars in federal funds from the government and students, the climax of a financial debacle that caused the school to lose its accreditation. Delores Cross, 69, who led the school from November 1998 until February 2002, pleaded in federal court in Atlanta to one court of illegally obtaining student loans, allowing her to avoid a trial and more than two dozen other counts she was confronting." The illegally obtained student loans and Pell grants "to pay bills at the strapped school. Ultimately the students found themselves responsible for loans they never requested." The college "is still in a tenuous situation" with its enrollment having fallen from over 2,000 to 66. It is also "fighting lawsuits brought by former students, and other suits stemming from the financial woes."

Jury Selection Begins In Maryland Trial Of Convicted DC Sniper. The Baltimore Sun (5/2, Siegel) reports, "The difficulty of finding jurors in Montgomery County who had not decided that convicted sniper John Allen Muhammad was responsible for the county's six sniper killings in 2002 became immediately apparent Monday as the presiding judge questioned the first batch of 300 potential jurors." The Sun continues, "During initial questioning -- which was disrupted by a profanity-laced outburst from a victim's relative -- nearly all of the first 25 potential jurors said they believed he committed six murders in the county, and many were aware that he had been convicted of a sniper killing in Virginia. … They pointed to the heavy media coverage of the shootings, their children being forced to stay inside at school and their personal fears at the time. One referred to the images he saw of Muhammad in prison garb from the first trial in Virginia." The Sun adds, "The trial's first day illustrated the difficulty posed by a defendant who seeks to represent himself, particularly when the suspect has no legal training and is charged in a high-profile crime. … Muhammad, 45, had bitterly criticized his court-appointed attorneys in previous cases and has chosen to represent himself in this case, something he did briefly in his Virginia trial."

The Washington Post (5/2, B1, Rich, Londoño) reports, "A remarkable number of potential jurors in a Montgomery County courtroom yesterday had what seemed to be a legitimate reason to be excused from that most dreaded of civic responsibilities. … 'I think he's guilty, sir,' said one, referred to in court as juror 34, under questioning by Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan." The Post continues, "In a back room, where they were gathered, the talk was said to be still more blunt. Several jury candidates agreed that the trial was a waste of time and that the defendant could be convicted 'in 20 minutes,' according to another, who reported the conversation to Ryan. … And so it went as jury selection began in the Maryland trial of John Allen Muhammad, charged in six sniper slayings in Montgomery. Most of the potential jurors questioned yesterday told Ryan that they hold Muhammad, already convicted and sentenced to die in Virginia, responsible for the random shootings in October 2002. Many said the shootings had touched them personally." The Post notes, "Not more than a handful of the 60 or so people questioned by Ryan said they had formed no opinion as to Muhammad's guilt. A larger number, however, said that if selected to serve they could set aside their views and base their decisions on the evidence presented in court. … By the end of the day, Ryan had picked 21 for a pool of eligible jurors, a group that is expected to be whittled down under more intensive questioning late this week."

The Washington Times (5/2, Ward) reports, "Muhammad expressed displeasure to the judge about being presumed guilty and seemed unable to grasp that preconceived notions could be put aside in order to base a judgment only on facts and evidence presented in court. … 'It's one thing to have heard about it. It's another thing to already have made your mind up,' Muhammad said. … A Virginia Beach jury in 2003 found Muhammad guilty of murder in the death of Dean Harold Meyers at a Manassas service station and using an accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo, now 21, in the crime. That jury sentenced Muhammad to death. Malvo was given life without parole by a Chesapeake jury for a different killing two months after Muhammad's sentencing."

DOJ_NMG_0027557

Prosecutor In Duke Rape Probe Faces Election. USA Today (5/2, Dorell) reports, "The alleged rape of a stripper by members of the Duke lacrosse team has put the spotlight on a North Carolina county prosecutor who is pushing his biggest case ever while trying to win an election." USA continues, "Mike Nifong (NY-fong) is described as a tough-but-fair prosecutor by several people who have worked cases with him. Yet detractors say he has pushed ethical limits on what to say publicly about the rape case and has used the issue for political gain." USA adds, "The alleged attack has roiled the community. It pits white university athletes who their lawyers say are being railroaded against a black community that is demanding justice for the accuser. At the center of it all is Nifong. … That election is being held today. Nifong, 55, is running in the Democratic primary for Durham County district attorney against Freda Black, a former prosecutor, and Keith Bishop, a Durham lawyer. No Republicans are seeking the office."

Students' Attorneys Seek Prosecutor's Ouster. The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Fausset) reports, "Attorneys for a Duke University student arrested on suspicion of raping an exotic dancer demanded Monday that Dist. Atty. Mike Nifong be taken off the case, alleging in court documents that the Durham, N.C., prosecutor ignored key evidence 'in his zeal to make national headlines and win a hotly contested primary.' … But Nifong's supporters argued that the motion seemed motivated as much by politics as by law, coming on the eve of Nifong's bid for election to a post he was appointed to last year." The Times continues, "The allegations were contained in a motion filed Monday on behalf of Reade William Seligmann, one of two Duke lacrosse team members indicted April 17 on charges of rape and kidnapping. Nifong said he was hoping to indict a third team member for participating in the alleged March 14 attack. … The case has also become the central issue in Nifong's effort to keep his job as Durham County's top prosecutor. Today he faces off in an election with two contenders who, like the players' attorneys, have criticized Nifong for his bold statements early in the investigation. Some of those statements, critics say, seemed to unfairly implicate Duke lacrosse players before any indictments were handed down by a grand jury. … Monday's motion — filed by attorneys J. Kirk Osborn of Chapel Hill and Ernest L. Conner Jr. of Greenville — introduced a new and unsparing tone to the criticism. The motion calls the case a 'shakedown' and asserts that Nifong has been willing to 'prostitute the truth' in the case to get elected. … The defense attorneys called for the appointment of an independent prosecutor. They also alleged that Nifong violated the North Carolina State Bar's Rules of Professional Conduct by potentially prejudicing the jury pool, among other things."

CIVIL LAW:

Government Says Delta Overcharged For Flights. In documents filed Friday with the US Bankruptcy Court in Manhattan, where Delta Air Lines has sued to force the federal government to pay almost $19 million for flights provided to military personnel, the federal government says it overpaid Delta more than $26 million for tickets and accused the airline of overcharging it an additional $240,000 for tickets purchased over the past three years. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, 2.11M) reports that the government has "asked a judge to throw out Delta's lawsuit, saying it has the right to deduct past overcharges and overpayments from current obligations to Delta. A Delta spokesman in Atlanta didn't respond to a request for comment.'

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Chicago Schools Comes To Agreement With DOJ to End Federal Oversight. The Chicago Tribune (5/2, Olszewski, Mendell) reports, "With the historic legal battle to integrate America's big-city schools being abandoned across the nation, the Chicago schools and the federal government have reached a tentative agreement that would release the district from 26 years of federal oversight on desegregation efforts by the 2007-08 school year." The settlement was filed jointly Monday in U.S. District Court where it awaits approval by U.S. District Judge Charles P. Kocoras. It "effectively allows the school system to decide on its own, without federal intervention, how much money and resources to devote toward integrating its schools." That "represents a retreat by the Justice Department from its more aggressive stance toward the district on equity issues in recent years." The Chicago school district is less than 9 percent white and has spent "at least $2.5 billion on desegregation" since 1980. Yet, "most of the city's black and Latino children still attend class in racially isolated schools that mirror the city's segregated housing patterns." School officials said that "they are committed to integration."

DOJ_NMG_0027558

Judge Ends Federal Control Of Louisiana Juvenile Prisons. The AP (5/2) reports, "Louisiana's juvenile prisons, once a byword for beatings and chaotic brawls, are on the road to reform and no longer need oversight from the federal courts, a federal district judge ruled Monday." The AP continues, "The U.S. Justice Department sued the state in 1998, saying conditions inside the lockups were unconstitutional. Judge James Brady's dismissal of the suit Monday came after Justice Department experts determined that reform efforts have made the lockups safer and better at rehabilitating the teen prisoners they house. … 'I don't say this lightly: Louisiana has emerged as a model for juvenile justice systems in this country,' said Judy Preston, deputy chief of special litigation and the department's expert on youth prison systems." The AP notes, "True reform efforts started in the 2003 Legislature with a commitment to shifting punishment of delinquent youth from imprisonment to less harsh settings like group homes and to closing the youth prison at Tallulah, which was pointed to as an example of brutality. Experts say the move to less prisonlike settings improves the chances of rehabilitation. … The Justice Department filed the lawsuit with the Louisiana Juvenile Justice Project, a nonprofit activist group that has long been critical of the prisons. David Utter, the group's director, called Brady's ruling 'a great first step,' but said complete reform is a distant goal."

Federal Agents Arrest 66 In Human Trafficking Raids. The Washington Times/AP (5/2, Parry) reports, "Federal agents yesterday rounded up 66 persons in a series of raids that officials said smashed a suspected human-trafficking ring that smuggled Mexicans into the United States and may have forced the women to work as prostitutes in the Washington area." The AP continues, "Officers with the U.S. Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) raided 15 locations in Union City, West New York and New York City early yesterday after New Jersey State Police pulled over two vehicles containing at least 10 women who worked in brothels in Maryland, Virginia and the District, said Kyle Hutchins, special agent in charge of the bureau's Newark office." The AP adds, "The operation was at least the fourth major alien-smuggling ring operating in New Jersey in recent years. Prosecutions involving Russian strippers forced to work in go-go bars, and young Honduran women forced to work as hostesses in Union City bars are ongoing in federal court."

Florida Man Charged With Hate Crime In Attack On NFL Player. The South-Florida Sun-Sentinel (5/2, Marvez, Naanes) reports, "Dolphins defensive end/outside linebacker Jason Taylor suffered a minor stab wound Sunday night in a road-rage incident, according to Davie police. Redmond Charles Burns of Davie was arrested on three charges, including aggravated battery/hate crime, after allegedly assaulting Taylor." The Sun-Sentinel notes, "In December 2003, Taylor was identified by the FBI as being one of six active or retired professional athletes to receive a hate letter threatening him with physical harm for being married to a white woman."

North Las Vegas On Track For ADA Compliance. The Las Vegas Sun (5/2, Wargo) reports, "Seven months after North Las Vegas reached a tentative agreement with the Justice Department over violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act, the city is putting its money where its mouth is." The Sun continues, "North Las Vegas plans to award a contract Wednesday to spend nearly $350,000 for wheelchair-accessible ramps, sidewalks and other safety improvements for the disabled at more than 133 locations around schools and older sections of the city." The Sun adds, "The contract is part of the city's plan to spend more than $600,000 this year and similar amounts during its next two budgets to comply with the 1990 federal law requiring local governments to improve the disabled's access to government programs and access on government property. … In September, North Las Vegas reached an agreement with the Justice Department over the city's long-standing violations of the federal law. The agreement helped the city avoid potential fines of up to $55,000 for a first violation and $110,000 for subsequent violations. … Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland said North Las Vegas is on schedule to correct the violations. City officials said North Las Vegas already has spent thousands of dollars to fix dozens of violations." The Sun notes, "North Las Vegas came under fire from the Justice Department after a January 2004 federal review of 75 percent of the city's parks and facilities found 182 ADA violations."

Judge Allows EEOC Racial Bias Suit Against Movie Studio To Proceed. The AP (5/2) reports, "The first racial discrimination case brought by the government against a movie studio can proceed to trial, a federal judge ruled." The AP continues, "The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission sued Universal Pictures in 2003, claiming that a first assistant director on the film "2 Fast 2 Furious" was fired because he was black. … The studio has denied the allegation and asked the court to dismiss the case. … But late Wednesday, U.S. District Judge Gary Allen Feess ruled that the commission's lawsuit contained sufficient evidence to allow a jury to decide the case." The AP adds, "The lawsuit was filed on behalf of Frank Davis, 47, who worked on the film under director John Singleton, who is also black. The lawsuit claims Davis was fired without cause even after Singleton objected. … 'Singleton adamantly asserts that Davis was performing satisfactorily and that Singleton would have terminated Davis had he not performed,' Feess wrote in his decision. … 'These facts, among many others, raise a genuine issue for trial regarding the true motive for Davis' termination and could support an inference that he was terminated because of race,' the judge wrote."

DOJ_NMG_0027559

Jury Considers Civil Hate-Crime Suit. The Chicago Tribune (5/2, O'Connor) reports, "In an unemotional voice, Deona Williams recounted Monday how she cried hysterically and begged for her life as three skinheads cornered her one summer night in 2002, shouted racial epithets and held a knife to her throat. … The testimony came at a federal trial at which the only issue for the all-woman jury to decide is how much in monetary damages should be awarded to Deona, now 17, and her family. A judge already has found the three white defendants legally liable for their actions." The Tribune continues, "Two of the defendants, Harley Hermes and Michael Canlas, portrayed themselves in court Monday as changed young men who regretted their conduct. … The third defendant, Shaun Derifield, didn't show up for the trial." The Tribune adds, "All three were convicted of criminal offenses for the hate crime and served time. … The lawsuit appears to be more of a symbolic battle for the family because none of the three defendants apparently has any significant assets or income. Hermes said he owns only a truck with 100,000 miles on it. At the time the suit was filed in 2004, a lawyer for the family said the litigation was intended to deter other hate crimes."

Kristof Says Morning-After Pill Should Be Available Over The Counter. Nicholas Kristof writes in the New York Times (5/2, 1.19M), "The best way to reduce the number of abortions, in turn, would be to reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies. … So it should be a no-brainer that we increase access to contraception, and in particular make the 'morning after' pill available over the counter. That would be the single simplest step to reduce the U.S. abortion rate, while also helping hundreds of thousands of women avert unwanted pregnancies." Kristof adds, "It's time for President Bush to end his policies that encourage abortions."

NYTimes Says Census Bureau Should Count Inmates In Their Home Communities. An editorial in the New York Times (5/2, 1.19M) says, "Demographers and voting rights advocates are rightly pressuring the Census Bureau to begin counting the nation's 1.4 million prison inmates at their home communities -- and not as 'residents' of the prisons, the current practice. Counting the inmates at prison inflates the prison community's population and political influence, while draining political clout from the communities where inmates actually live. … The bureau should get busy on a system for counting inmates where they live as opposed to where they do time."

ANTITRUST:

Stevens Bill Could Slow Phone Company Efforts To Enter Cable TV Business. Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens yesterday offered sweeping telecom legislation which has thrown a snag into phone companies' efforts to get into the cable television business, the Wall Street Journal (5/2, Schatz, 2.11M). According to the Journal, Stevens' legislation does not include "the Bell companies' top wish: the ability to bypass local governments when offering pay-television service." The Journal adds, "Reaction from the Bells to Mr. Stevens's effort was lukewarm. … Mr. Stevens's decision to introduce a telecom-rewrite bill may make it more difficult for the Bells to get changes to the law this year to help them enter the cable business faster."

Google Expresses Concerns About Microsoft Browser. The AP (5/2, Linn) reports, "Google Inc. is hoping to pressure Microsoft Corp. into changing a new Internet Explorer browser feature that could direct more people to Microsoft's online search engine instead of Google's far more popular offering." The AP continues, "Google has informally complained to U.S. and European antitrust regulators about what it says are biased settings on Microsoft's latest Web browser, marking the latest spat between two companies whose business models are increasingly bumping up against one another. … Mountain View, Calif.-based Google regards Microsoft as the biggest threat to its continued success, and Microsoft has conceded that Goggle is a formidable competitor as well. … The next version of Internet Explorer, available now in test form, includes a box in the corner that lets people perform an Internet search without going to a separate Web page, much like what's available from Google's downloadable 'toolbar.'"

DOJ_NMG_0027560

Bloomberg (5/2, Thaw) reports, "Google raised the concern as part of a European Commission investigation into Vista, the next version of Microsoft's Windows operating system, Steve Langdon, a spokesman for Mountain View, California-based Google, said today in an interview. … 'In those discussions, we have expressed our concerns that Microsoft's approach to setting search defaults in IE 7.0 benefits Microsoft while taking away choice from users,' Langdon said." Bloomberg adds, "Microsoft is 'fully committed' to supporting search-engine options in Internet explorer and will ensure users can easily choose from a very long list, Microsoft spokeswoman Stacy Drake McCredy said in an e-mailed statement."

The San Jose Mercury News (5/2, Ackerman) reports, "The dispute illustrates how the importance of the browser has diminished in the wake of the epic anti-trust battles involving Microsoft and the rest of the tech industry. Now, the focus is on search technology, which matches advertising with search results. … Still, Google's protest puzzled some observers, who noted that the objectionable feature was nearly identical to the search box of FireFox, an open-source browser with 10 to 13 percent of the U.S. market."

RIM Faces Another Patent Suit Over Blackberry. The Financial Times (5/2, Taylor) reports, "Research in Motion, maker of the popular BlackBerry family of wireless e-mail devices, faces a new legal threat after Visto, a US-based wireless e-mail technology company, filed a new patent infringement suit against the Canadian group." The Times continues, "The move follows Visto's victory in another long-running patent infringment suit against rival Seven Networks, and comes just weeks after Rim paid more than $612m to settle a patent case with Washington-based NTP, a patent holding firm that also holds a small stake in Visto."

The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Weinberg) reports, "RIM, which two months ago agreed to pay NTP Inc. $612.5 million to settled a separate patent dispute, denied infringing Visto's patents and said in a statement that it will now consider asserting its own claims against Visto. RIM, of Waterloo, Ontario, said it doesn't expect customers of its popular BlackBerry wireless-email device to be impacted by Visto's complaint. … The suit by Visto, filed in U.S. federal court in the Eastern District of Texas, comes after a federal jury in the same district Friday decided in favor of the Redwood Shores, Calif., software maker in yet another patent dispute. In that case, the jury found closely held software maker Seven Networks Inc. had infringed three Visto patents and awarded it $3.6 million. Visto said the court is expected to hold a hearing concerning an injunction against Seven Networks that would prohibit further use of the infringing system." The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Weinberg) also reports on the suit.

NYTimes Backs Efforts To Pass "Net-Neutrality" Bill. An editorial in the New York Times (5/2, 1.19M) says, "One of the Internet's great strengths is that a single blogger or a small political group can inexpensively create a Web page that is just as accessible to the world as Microsoft's home page. But this democratic Internet would be in danger if the companies that deliver Internet service changed the rules so that Web sites that pay them money would be easily accessible, while little-guy sites would be harder to access, and slower to navigate." The Times adds, "The House Energy and Commerce Committee defeated a good Net-neutrality amendment last week. … In the Senate, Olympia Snowe, a Maine Republican, and Byron Dorgan, a North Dakota Democrat, are drafting a strong Net-neutrality bill that would prohibit broadband providers from creating a two-tiered Internet. Senators who care about the Internet and Internet users should get behind it."

WSJournal Says Twombly Case Could Spark Wave Of Litigation. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (5/2, 2.11M) says, "In 2003, William Twombly sued all the Bells on behalf of all the Bells' customers" alleging that the Bells have conspired to stay out of each other's territory and have kept the price of phone service artificially high for a decade. In Twombly, "the Second Circuit essentially ruled that if competitors act in parallel, all a plaintiff has to do is say, 'Conspiracy!' to open discovery and start searching for evidence in the files of an entire industry. … That Twombly lowered the bar dramatically for plaintiffs and trial lawyers alleging business conspiracies has not been lost on those lawyers, either. Since the decision was handed down in October, dozens of legal filings have already cited it as a reason for letting this or that case proceed. If the Supreme Court allows Twombly to stand unchallenged, unsupported charges of antitrust conspiracy could well prove to be the next great wave of the litigation tsunami."

DOJ_NMG_0027561

ENVIRONMENT:

White House To Release Bird Flu Response Plan. A draft of the Bush administration pandemic flu plan obtained by the AP (5/2, Pickler) suggests that "employers should have plans to keep workers at least three feet apart, colleges should consider which dormitories could be used to quarantine the sick, and flight crews should have surgical masks to put on coughing travelers." The Bush administration forecasts "massive disruptions" if a bird flu pandemic arises in the United States, and a response plan scheduled to be released at the White House Wednesday "warns employers that as much as 40 percent of the work force could be off the job and says every segment of society must prepare."

US Businesses Seen As Unprepared For Bird Flu. On the front page of its Business section, the Washington Post (5/2, D1, Brown) reports, "More than half of US companies think there will be a global flu epidemic in the next two years," and two-thirds of those think it will "seriously disrupt their operations as well as foment social unrest." At the same time, two-thirds "also say they aren't prepared." Meanwhile, former HHS secretary Tommy Thompson, who is now working as a private consultant, estimates that only one in five US companies "are in good position in terms of being able to react—and even those are going to have to restructure and improve their plans."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Critics Say FBI Struggling To Assume Top Counter-Terrorism Role. Under the headline "Intelligence Mission Troubles FBI," The Baltimore Sun (5/2, Gorman, 296K) reports that "the FBI is having trouble asserting itself as the country's pre-eminent domestic intelligence agency, according to intelligence specialists and congressional critics." Even with the "new National Security Branch, the bureau 'is a long way from doing what it needs to do to stay on top of the war on terror,' Republican Sen. Charles E. Grassley of Iowa said in an interview yesterday. … 'They need leadership…and they need people who are going to stick around for a while,' Grassley said, referring to the recently announced resignation of Gary Bald." The Sun notes, "FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III is expected to face questions about his efforts to remake the law enforcement agency into an intelligence organization when he testifies today before a Senate panel that includes Grassley. Responding to criticism of their efforts, FBI officials say they have made significant progress in charting a new course for the FBI, and that their classified plan is on the verge of being implemented. … Bald's deputy, Philip Mudd, said he expected to implement plans that Bald has drawn up for the National Security Branch. 'I'm not going anywhere,' Mudd said." Bald, in an interview with The Sun, noted "that he had doubled the number of agents and analysts assigned to intelligence and counter-terrorism at the FBI." The Canton Repository (5/2) runs The Sun story under the headline "Critics Train Sights On Laggard FBI."

Pete Rose Jr. Sentenced For Distributing GBL. The AP (5/2) reports Pete Rose Jr., the son of baseball's career hits leader, "was sentenced Monday to one month in prison and five months of home detention for distributing a steroid alternative to his minor league teammates. … Rose pleaded guilty Nov. 7 to distributing the steroid alternative GBL, a drug he used as a sleep aid, to some of his teammates with the Chattanooga Lookouts. … The Drug Enforcement Administration has said Rose's arrest was part of a larger investigation into a major GBL trafficking organization." News outlets made more than 50 references to Rose's sentencing. MSNBC, ESPN, Forbes, the San Francisco Chronicle, San Diego Union Tribune, Miami Herald, Houston Chronicle, and San Jose Mercury News published in newspapers and/or posted on Web sites the AP story.

Cable TV Coverage. CNN (5/1, 9:00 p.m.) reported, "Pete Rose Junior is going to prison for a month. He was sentenced for distributing a drug used as a steroid alternative to his minor league teammates."

ESPN (5/1, 7:00 p.m.) reported, "Pete Rose Jr. gets a month in prison for distributing a steroid alternative to a teammate in the minor leagues."

DOJ_NMG_0027562

Local TV Coverage. WCPO-TV, Cincinnati (5/1, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Pete Rose Junior has been sentenced to a month in jail on a drug charge. Last fall, Rose admitted to drug enforcement agents that he sold GBL to his teammates while he played for the minor league Chattanooga Lookouts. Agents say Rose told them his teammates would take the drug to unwind after games. After Rose gets out of jail, he will be on house arrest for 5 months."

WSMV-TV, Nashville, Tennessee (5/1, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "The son of baseball legend Pete Rose Senior left federal court today obviously relieved. Pete Rose Junior was arrested for distributing GBL, though he was never accused of profiting from the sale of it. The junior Rose is playing for the Chattanooga or was playing for the Chattanooga Lookouts at the time of his arrest in may 2002. The judge today went along with the prosecution's request for leniency. … Prosecutors talked a lot about Pete Rose Junior's cooperation during the investigation and all that seemed to go a long way in the end with the judge."

Four Sentenced In Illinois Meth Case. The Carmi (IL) Times (5/2) reports on the sentences of four people for their role in a large meth making and distribution conspiracy centered in White, Gallatin and Saline counties. The Times reports officials said the convictions and sentences "resulted from a long-term and on-going investigation into the manufacture of methamphetamine in southeastern Illinois by the Southern Illinois Drug Task Force and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. … The investigation (which began in 2001) has resulted in the federal indictment of 65 people in related cases who were responsible for the manufacture or attempted manufacture of the equivalent of over 600,000 grams of methamphetamine."

Medicinal Use Of Marijuana Disputed. In a Boston Globe (5/2) story titled, "Breast Cancer Has Made Me a Criminal" Lynda Gorov writes, "I had read enough, and written some, about the medicinal uses of marijuana to believe it might keep me from suffering. … Maybe someone who hasn't been there can't understand my willingness to break the law. Sure, a number of states, including mine, have legalized the medicinal use of marijuana. But the Drug Enforcement Administration refuses to go along. It sees me as a criminal."

Eugene, Oregon's Register-Guard (5/1) editorializes, "The FDA should change its name to the Politically Approved Food and Drug Administration - PAFDA. It's a longer acronym, but it rolls off the tongue nicely and people would appreciate its greater honesty. The agency's other option is to stop embarrassing its dedicated doctors and scientists with utterly unscientific announcements such as the recent bulletin that smoked marijuana has no medicinal value."

In the Asbury (NJ) Park Press (5/2) Terrence P. Farley, Ocean County assistant prosecutor and director of the county Narcotics Strike Force, writes, "I have spent years reviewing research on so-called "medical marijuana." I can state, as a result of that research, that "medical marijuana" and "Compassionate Use" acts are a hoax. … the U.S. Supreme Court just last year ruled that marijuana is not 'medicine.' … John Walters…noted, 'Smoking illegal drugs may make some people 'feel better.' However, civilized societies and modern-day medical practices differentiate between inebriation and the safe, supervised delivery of proven medicine by legitimate doctors.'"

Limbaugh Signs Deal In Prescription Fraud Case. The AP (5/2) reports Rush Limbaugh "declared victory Monday after signing a deal with prosecutors that will dismiss a prescription fraud charge in 18 months if he complies with the terms. Under the deal, Limbaugh cannot own a gun, must submit to random drug tests and has to continue treatment for his acknowledged addiction to painkillers. But he did not have to admit guilt, and he continued to proclaim his innocence on his radio show."

Network TV Coverage. ABC's Good Morning America (5/1, 7:00 a.m.) reported, "Rush Limbaugh had good reason to smile for his mug shot because today his three-year ordeal with drug charges finally comes to an end when he signs a deal that leaves him with no [criminal] record. He agreed to be booked on a single felony charge -- prescription drug fraud. That charge will be dropped if he continues drug treatment for 18 months. Limbaugh also agreed to pay $30,000 for the public cost of the investigation. This all began in 2003, when it was reported that the popular conservative radio host was abusing [prescription] drugs in his Palm Beach home."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN's The Situation Room (5/1, 4:00 p.m.) reported, "Rush Limbaugh says his settlement with Florida prosecutors shows that the case is over and that he's not guilty. The talk show host reportedly will undergo random drug tests as part of the agreement. He's been taking drug tests for the last couple of years. He pled not guilty Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0027563

[The charge] will be dismissed if Limbaugh passes the drug test and completes a treatment program."

Man Accused Of Importing, Distributing Steroids Pleads Guilty. The AP (5/1) reports a man "has pleaded guilty to importing and distributing thousands of anabolic steroid pills. Authorities say Kevin Thompson…pleaded guilty to a variety of charges accusing him of using New Hampshire grocery stores to wire money to foreign countries such as Poland, Greece and China in order to illegally buy steroids."

State, Federal Investigation Continues Into Arizona Church Arson. The Arizona Republic (5/2, Clancy) reports, "A fire that caused $200,000 damage at Mission Bell United Methodist Church in northwest Phoenix was the city's thirteenth church fire, the tenth set on purpose, since Jan. 1." Calling it "an ugly, ugly crime," Phoenix Fire Department Assistant Chief Bob Khan "said investigators continued to work Monday at Mission Bell…which shares its building with a Jewish congregation, Temple Gan Elohim. Besides Phoenix fire and police, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the FBI were involved, he said."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Reform Rallies, Boycott Attract Hundreds Of Thousands. USA Today (5/2, Keen, Kasindorf, 2.31M) reports this morning, "Supporters of immigrant rights boycotted businesses and schools or attended rallies in more than 40 states Monday, closing businesses from Providence to San Diego and drawing protesters to rallies from Anchorage to Atlanta. … Hundreds of thousands of people marched in Los Angeles and Chicago. Supporters in New York City formed human chains on sidewalks to protest a bill passed by the House of Representatives that would make illegal immigration a felony. Thousands more filled Manhattan's Union Square." In Los Angeles, "the wholesale produce market and garment factories closed, ports were quiet, and traffic eased. Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa estimated up to 400,000 people participated in two marches. The Los Angeles Unified School District, which is 73% Hispanic, said 27% of middle- and high-school students were absent."

The boycott and demonstrations across the nation are receiving extensive, and largely sympathetic coverage on TV and print media. The AP (5/2, Flaccus) describes the "mostly Hispanic immigrants" as "flexing their economic muscle," and says that "from Los Angeles to Chicago, Houston to New Orleans, the 'Day Without Immigrants' attracted widespread participation despite divisions among activists over whether a boycott would send the right message to Washington lawmakers considering sweeping immigration reform." The New York Times (5/2, Archibold, 1.19M) says the protesters, "a mix of illegal immigrants and legal residents and citizens, were mostly Latino, but in contrast to similar demonstrations in the past two months, large numbers of people of other ethnicities joined or endorsed many of the events."

Typical of the very positive coverage of the protests is the Los Angeles Times, which this morning runs several stories on yesterday's actions. On of the Los Angeles Times reports (5/2, Muskal, Williams) states, "Across the country, hundreds of thousands of Latino immigrants and their supporters took to the streets to demonstrate that they are a political and economic presence that can't be ignored." Another Los Angeles Times piece (5/2, Streitfeld), titled "Throngs Show Their Potent Role in Economy," says "immigrant workers powerfully asserted their importance Monday." While the "Day Without Immigrants" won't hurt the economy "in the long run, analysts said," its "economic message…was emphatic and unmistakable." The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Watanabe, Gaouette, 958K) also analyzes the political impact of the boycott, asking, "Now what? As immigrants and their supporters boycotted work and school, refrained from consumer spending and marched in cities across the nation, the urgent question they face is how to translate the passion of the streets into lasting political gains."

Across the media spectrum, the protests are generally being described as a success. While most media reports refer to "hundreds of thousands" attending the rallies, CNN's The Situation Room (5/1, Blitzer) at one point estimated the number of participants in the "millions." The boycott, said CNN, was "an attempt to try to prove that immigrants are a driving force behind the US economy." Along the lines of much of the coverage of the boycott, CNN also said that "in Washington, officials are trying to gauge the economic impact of this so-called day without immigrants. They're also keeping close watch at the politics that play in all of this as well." CNN (Bash) added "Republican supporters like Senator Mel Martinez are most concerned the boycott will put off some GOP colleagues he's trying hard to convince and with good reason."

DOJ_NMG_0027564

The story was heavily covered by the network news last night, filling a total of just under 27 minutes of broadcast time. The newscasts covered a range of subjects, from on location reports by correspondents in the field to general overviews of the importance of immigrants to the US economy. ABC World News Tonight (5/1, lead story, 1:40, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Altogether, close to 1 million people took to the streets in more than 30 cities. And that number could still rise. It was the newest wave of protests against legislation that would increase the penalties for being in the US, illegally." ABC World News Tonight (5/1, story 4, 2:35, Weir, 8.78M) later added, "While industry can adjust to a short, preplanned boycott, this day shows how vital 7.5 million undocumented workers are to the national economy. They comprise 24% of all farm workers, 17% of those who clean, 14% of those who build." Jess Passel, Pew Hispanic Center: "It's hard to envision how these industries will keep going if 15% to 25% of the workers just disappeared." Similarly, NBC Nightly News (5/1, story 6, 2:05, Teague, 9.87M) said, "This much is certain -- millions of immigrants flexed their muscle today. At ports in Southern California, 90% of the truckers needed to move cargo didn't show up."

NBC Nightly News (5/1, lead story, 6:20, Williams, 9.87M) took a more negative approach to the possible political effects of the boycott, saying, "Even supporters of immigrant rights are weighing whether these protests could provoke a backlash." Jaime Contreras, National Capital Immigration Coalition: "We think the American people are generous people and they will understand that this is one of the ways that people can express their rights under the Constitution, to express discontent with something that's happening in Congress." In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (5/1, 2.11M) addresses the issue, saying "advocates of a guest worker program for illegal immigrants expressed confidence" that Monday's boycott "wouldn't make passage of comprehensive reform legislation more difficult. 'Not much' of a backlash from conservatives, predicted one senior White House official. Another Bush adviser credited some large employers with minimizing conflict by giving workers the day off."

The CBS Evening News (5/1, lead story, 3:20, Pitts, 7.66M) reported that unlike "last month's wave of demonstrations, politicians didn't simply take notice, today many showed up. I've talked to people across the country who say how dare people who broke the law by entering the United States now plead with the Senate and the Congress to do something about that?" Sen. Barak Obama, Illinois: "Well, the problem is that we've been engaging in hypocrisy in this country. We don't mind these folks mowing our lawns or looking after our children or serving us at restaurants as long as they don't actually ask for any rights in return." Pitts: "Construction sites in California virtually empty, skeleton crews in Virginia, restaurants across the country closed so workers could join demonstrations. Yet it's the farming industry that likely suffered the most."

The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Muskal, 958K) reports the protests were "in response to efforts by Congress to overhaul immigration policy for the first time in two decades." But they have "become something more, a cry from the normally hidden undocumented community for a way to socially and economically come into the sunlight." The Washington Times (5/2, Richardson, Seper, 90K) offered a less sympathetic view of the protesters, saying they "boycotted their own jobs and stayed away from what they saw as 'gringo' businesses." The protesters "waved US, and Mexican and other Latin American flags as they flooded streets in New York and Los Angeles."

The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Jordan, Kronholz, Brat, 2.11M) was among the few media outlets offering a mixed assessment of the protests' success. The Journal says "attendance at midday rallies across the country was a mixed bag. Hundreds of thousands turned out in places like Chicago to support legal work status for illegal immigrants, but in Texas, Atlanta and other places, turnout was more modest." That "was partly a result of calls within the pro-immigrant community to keep workers and their kids in place until events later in the day." But "it was also due to fear that recently swept through some immigrant communities in the wake of a government crackdown on employers who intentionally hire undocumented workers." The Washington Post (5/2, C1, Montgomery, 744K) addresses that issue as well, and says "the problem is, a guy has to make a living. And if you happen to be a Salvadoran with a green card; with a mortgage, a wife and three kids in Lanham; and two janitorial jobs in D.C. that keep you busy 14 hours a day, you might not have the leverage with the boss to boycott work in a demonstration of how important immigrants are to the US economy." A second Wall Street Journal story (5/2, Newman, Jordan), however, says "sentiment among Hispanics was mixed on yesterday's no-work day. Some 34% of Hispanics said the protest would help the cause of immigrants, but 43% said it would hurt their cause," according to a Pew Poll.

DOJ_NMG_0027565

The Washington Post (5/2, A1, Fears, Williams, 744K) reports "the action may have been stronger had the coalition of grass-roots organizations that advises immigrants not been deeply conflicted over whether to endorse a boycott. Some supported the effort to demonstrate immigrant power, but others discouraged it, saying it was premature because Congress has not taken action since the first demonstrations, and because the strike might induce a backlash by those born in the United States."

A number of newspaper stories today tries to measure the protests' impact on the economy. The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Sanchez, 958K) reports "the normally bustling downtown Los Angeles produce and garment districts were virtually shut down today, and truck traffic at the ports was down sharply after many employees protesting the nation's immigration policy's did not show up for work." The Financial Times (5/2, Alden, Johnson, Yeager, Parkes) reports "the biggest effects" of the boycott "appeared to be on restaurants, construction projects and small retail businesses, though hotels and casinos reported little disruption."

The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Ip, 2.11M) seeks to analyze the current immigration debate from a historical perspective. It reports, "Surging immigration unsettles workers and prompts calls to stop the flow. Congress ponders higher tariffs to protect struggling industries. National-security fears heighten anxiety about foreigners. A growing gap between the rich and the middle class fuels angst about globalization. It sounds like today, but it could also be the 1920s. … It could also describe the 1980s. With factory layoffs blamed on imports and public cries to limit illegal immigration, Ronald Reagan struck compromises . His administration persuaded Japan to agree to "voluntary" export restraints, coordinated a drop in the value of the dollar and toughened immigration enforcement while granting amnesty to some. The US kept its doors open to goods, capital and people -- and its economy prospered."

The New York Times (5/2, O'Donnell, 1.19M) recounts yesterday's events from the perspective of a "corner grocery on Coney Island Avenue in Ditmas Park, Brooklyn." Along "the unusually quiet commercial strip, dozens of Hispanics and Pakistanis joined hands to form a human chain." Meanwhile, the Washington Post (5/2, A9, Brulliard, 744K) profiles Salvadoran shopkeeper Gerardo Sanchez, whose Columbia Heights store "was locked and the sign that normally blinks O-P-E-N in its window was dark" yesterday.

64% Disapprove Of Bush On Immigration; 69% Say Anthem Should Be Sung In English. USA Today (5/2, Nichols, 2.31M) reports, "More than two out of three Americans say the national anthem should be sung only in English, according to a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll." The poll, taken Friday through Sunday, "found that 69% believe it is only appropriate for the anthem to be sung in English, while 29% say it is OK to sing it in Spanish." In addition, "nearly two-thirds -- 64% -- disapproved of Bush's immigration policy; 26% approved."

Rice Claimed As Supporter Of Spanish-Language US Anthem. The AP (5/1, Jelinek) reports, "Promoters of singing" the national anthem "in Spanish are pointing to comments by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice -- and her department's Web site -- as ammunition for their side of the argument." Rice is quoted saying on CBS' Face the Nation Sunday (4/20), "I've heard the national anthem done in rap versions, country versions, classical versions. The individualization of the American national anthem is quite under way." The AP adds, "The State Department site for some time has offered translations of the U.S. Constitution, pledge of allegiance and other documents in French, Arabic and other foreign languages to help people understand America better. This is what promoters say they had in mind with the Spanish anthem recording, which has drawn criticism from Internet bloggers."

Congressional Hispanic Caucus Split On Boycott. Roll Call (5/2, Kornacki) reports, "The 'National Day of Action,' organized to draw attention to the role of undocumented workers in the US economy, provoked diverse reactions from the 22 Democratic members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. On the supportive end, Rep. Raúl Grijalva (Ariz.), who hails from an immigrant-rich section of Tucson, closed his Capitol Hill office for much of the day as a show of solidarity." Others, though, "treaded more gingerly, fearful that mass walkouts from work and school might set their cause back and embolden supporters of the immigration bill that cleared the House in December, which would declare all undocumented workers felons." Roll Call adds, "The varied opinions within the CHC were apparent in a statement released in the run-up to the Day of Action by Rep. Grace Napolitano (Calif.), the group's chairwoman." Napolitano "urged workers not to take 'unnecessary steps that would cause them to put their jobs, families or education at risk,' without explicitly endorsing or opposing the marches and rallies that were planned."

DOJ_NMG_0027566

House GOP Lawmakers Push ICE To Prosecute Businesses Shut Down By Boycott. The Washington Times (5/2, Hurt, 90K) reports, "House Republicans called on US Immigration and Customs Enforcement to prosecute businesses shut down yesterday by their illegal alien employees who took the day off to participate in protests of immigration legislation." GOP Reps. Jack Kingston and Marsha Blackburn, in a letter to ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers, "noted 'the multiple reports in the news media today regarding companies which have been forced to halt operations because large numbers of their employees appear to be in the United States illegally and are participating in the protest rallies.' 'ICE has an obligation to use this public information to enforce immigration laws,' they wrote. 'We respectfully request that you look into this matter and report back to us on your findings.'"

Democratic Ads Use Bush, McCain To Attack Kyl On Immigration. The Hill (5/2, Barr) reports that U.S. Senate candidate Jim Pederson (D) is running two ads in which he uses President Bush and Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) to take aim at Arizona Sen. Jon Kyl (R). The Hill notes, "One ad shows Bush with Kyl and says, 'Even President Bush calls Kyl's immigration plan for massive deportation unrealistic.' Bush supports a guest-worker program, which Kyl opposes. The second ad quotes McCain saying Kyl's plan 'borders on fantasy.' McCain and Kyl were on opposite sides of the Senate battle on immigration reform last month."

In Mexico, Some Boycott US Goods For A Day. USA Today (5/2, Harman, 2.31M) reports from Mexico City that "Mexicans staged boycotts of US goods and stores in a show of solidarity with migrants in the USA who cut school and stopped work to call for immigration reform." The Washington Times (5/2, Stevenson, 90K) also reports the story under the headline "Mexicans Boycott US over Migrants."

Some In US Marched Against Illegal Immigration. The New York Times (5/2, Davey, 1.19M) reports, "Around the edges of the immigration demonstrations that filled cities like this one on Monday, there were some who went to disagree. … Compared with the hundreds of thousands who marched urging Congress to consider legal status for some of the 11 million illegal immigrants in this country, far fewer went to speak for the other side." But "advocates for tighter border security and increased enforcement of immigration laws said that their quieter voices were actually more representative of the views of Americans as a whole."

NYTimes Derides "Worst Among Our Citizens And Politicians" Who Are Blocking Reform. The New York Times (5/2, 1.19M) editorializes, "Warnings of a crippling immigrant boycott did not come true yesterday. The economy survived. But what may not survive -- we hope -- is people's willful misunderstanding of the nature of the immigrant-rights movement. The worst among our citizens and politicians are eager to depict illegal immigrants as criminals, potential terrorists and alien invaders." But "what we saw yesterday, in huge, peaceful rallies in Los Angeles, Las Vegas, Chicago, Denver, New York, Atlanta and other cities, were regular people: the same types of assimilation-minded moms, dads and children we wistfully romanticize on holidays devoted to, say, St. Patrick and Columbus." Lawmakers "who have stymied comprehensive immigration reform with stalemated name-calling and cold electoral calculation should listen up. A silent, shadow population is speaking with one voice. The message, aimed at Washington but something the whole country should hear, is clear: We are America. We want to join you."

LATimes Says Protests Have Been Successful. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (5/2, 958K) describes Monday's immigration reform march as "yet another passionate and upbeat street party." The paper says it "shared the concern of those who felt a labor walkout might come across as economic blackmail, but the tenor of the day was overwhelmingly positive." The Times continues, "The scale and tenor of the demonstrations have had the salutary and corrective benefit of marginalizing those who conflate Latino immigration with crime, a lack of patriotism, a security threat or any other ill under the sun. Six months ago, opponents of reform drove the political debate. No more." The Times goes on to say, "The singular triumph of this spring's protests is that they have indelibly attached a human face to a debate dominated by dehumanizing words such as 'illegals' and 'aliens.'"

Williams Says DHS Working To Respond To Immigration Concerns. Jim Williams, director of the Homeland Security Department's US-VISIT program office, in an op-ed in USA Today (5/2, 2.31M) writes that DHS "is implementing a comprehensive border security strategy to shut down vulnerabilities in our immigration and border management system and aggressively enforce our immigration laws." Williams continues that the US has "built a more effective and reliable system for welcoming legitimate travelers to our country while protecting privacy and meeting our critical security goals. … The challenges we face at our borders were years in the making, but the transformation of our immigration and border management system is well underway."

DOJ_NMG_0027567

USA Today Says US-VISIT Unable To Handle Visa Overstays. USA Today (5/2, 2.31M) editorializes that while the stereotypical illegal immigrant is "a Spanish-speaking worker who sneaked across the porous Mexican border in search of a job," at least 3.8 million illegals in the US "came from all over the world, stayed longer than their visas or entry documents allowed, and melted into society," just as "four of the 19 Sept. 11 hijackers did, according to a 2004 report by Congress' Government Accountability Office." USA Today states that to find and deport all of the "overstays" in the US, "the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) would need three things: an effective system to track all foreign entrants, another to track those who leave, and enough agents and judicial manpower to go after those who remain illegally. It has none of those." Meanwhile, US-VISIT, touted by former DHS undersecretary Asa Hutchinson as a way "to know who is overstaying their visa," has not delivered "because of how DHS has chosen to run it."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Blast Bush For More Than 750 Signing Statements. The Boston Globe (5/2, Savage, 484K) reports that three leading Democratic Senators, Minority Leader Harry Reid, Patrick Leahy and Edward Kennedy yesterday blasted President Bush "for having claimed he has the authority to defy more than 750 statutes enacted since he took office, saying that the president's legal theories are wrong and that he must obey the law." Reid said in a statement, "'It is not for George W. Bush to disregard the Constitution and decide that he is above the law." Leahy "accused Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney of attempting to concentrate ever more government power in their own hands." Kennedy "also said that the Bush administration, abetted by 'a compliant Republican Congress,' was undermining the checks and balances that 'guard against abuses of power by any single branch of government.'" The Democrats "were reacting to a report in Sunday's Boston Globe detailing the scope of Bush's assertions that he can ignore laws that conflict with his interpretation of the Constitution."

Medicare Prescription Drug Benefit Projected To Cost 20% Less. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Lueck, 2.11M) reports Medicare's "prescription-drug benefit will cost the government about 20% less during the next decade than was projected a year ago, but largely for reasons outside the government's control." The Medicare actuaries said "most of the reduction will result from lower-than-expected growth in the nation's per capita drug spending." The actuaries "said fewer people than expected are signing up for the new coverage. Since last year, Medicare actuaries have lowered estimates for enrollment by May 15 -- this year's deadline for signing up -- from about 37 million to 31.4 million, a move that fueled calls in Congress to give people more time to sign up." Last year, Medicare's actuaries "estimated the benefit would cost a total of $997 billion over 10 years, not including savings to Medicaid. Now that estimate is $788 billion. Another reason for the reduction: The private insurers selling the new, government-subsidized coverage achieved discounts on medications sooner than the actuaries had expected."

Flake Says Republicans Should Not Be Proud Of Medicare Drug Benefit. The Washington Times (5/2, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column that Rep. Jeff Flake is "upset that the House Republican leadership continues to encourage GOP members 'to boast' about the new Medicare prescription-drug entitlement. Because of the new entitlement, '30 million people are more dependent on the federal government than they were a year ago, and future generations will have to foot the bill,' he says. 'That is something that no party professing to believe in limited government should be proud of.'"

Democrats Still Hope To Exploit Discontent With Drug Benefit. The Hill (5/2, Young) reports, "Despite a recent stream of apparently good news about the Medicare prescription-drug benefit, congressional Democrats are counting on their criticisms to translate into political gains in the midterm elections." Sen. Debbie Stabenow recently said, "I don't know of any Democrat who thinks this is working the way it should. You betcha this is going to be an issue [in November.]" The Hill adds Democrats have "described the drug benefit as a disaster and said senior citizens would be too confused to choose the right plan. But that strategy could prove risky. The Medicare figures show that nearly all beneficiaries now have some form of drug coverage, and recent polls suggest that seniors who have joined a drug plan are satisfied with their coverage." Many congressional Republicans "shied away from the program and criticized the Bush administration's handling of its implementation this year. But Republicans are changing their tune. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) has become an enthusiastic cheerleader, as his office has taken to launching almost daily statements praising it." But in "spite of the apparent shift of political momentum amid improving public opinion, Democrats see the drug program as a ticking time bomb of discontent among senior citizens."

DOJ_NMG_0027568

Trustees Say Medicare, Social Security Finances Are Worsening. The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Alonso-Zaldivar, Havemann, 958K) reports, "The financial condition of Medicare is growing progressively worse and its problems will soon eclipse those of Social Security, the trustees of the government's two biggest programs said today." But the "warning — for all its urgency — appeared unlikely to spur major action during an election year." Social Security expenses "were projected to overtake income after 2017, as last year, and to deplete the program's financial cushion in 2040, one year earlier than estimated a year ago. Unless changes are made, Social Security will then be able to pay only 74% of promised benefits." But Medicare is "a more serious matter. The soaring cost of healthcare has the program on the edge of bankruptcy." The "huge Medicare fund for inpatient hospital care will not be able to cover the full amount of billings beginning in 2018, two years earlier than estimated last year."

The story was covered in brief by ABC and CBS last night, while NBC did not mention the entitlement programs' financing. ABC World News Tonight (5/1, story 8, :25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Another government report calculates that the day when the Social Security and Medicare programs run out of money is growing closer." The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 5, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "We got a new reminder today that the Social Security and Medicare programs need to be fixed."

USA Today (5/2, 2.31M) reports the trustees, "who include the head of the Social Security Administration and three members of President Bush's Cabinet, gave a sober assessment of the health of the two programs in advance of the looming retirements of 78 million baby boomers."

The Washington Times (5/2, Fagan, 90K) reports Administration officials "said the bleak outlook is all the more reason for Congress to significantly reform both programs." President Bush's "efforts to change Social Security stalled in Congress last year, with even some Republicans hesitant to support his plan to create personal accounts. And Medicare spending is unlikely to be cut by Congress this election year, as Mr. Bush has suggested."

The New York Times (5/2, Pear, 1.19M) reports, "Lawmakers said they would never allow the trust funds to run dry. But the insolvency dates are a vivid way of showing that the programs are unsustainable. To keep them solvent, Congress would need to trim benefits, raise taxes or take some combination of such steps." Speaking at the American Hospital Association, President Bush said, "The systems are going broke." The Times adds, "Almost every element of the programs reflects a political judgment, but Mr. Bush said, 'It's time to set aside politics and restructure Social Security and Medicare for generations to come.'" Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "said the reports showed that 'despite White House scare tactics, Social Security remains sound for decades to come.'"

The AP (5/2, Crutsinger) reports Treasury Secretary John Snow, "the chairman of the trustees group, said the new report depicted 'a looming fiscal crisis as the baby boom generation moves into retirement' and he urged Congress to move forward." But Democrats "charged that the administration was using the trustees reports to try to create an air of crisis to make radical changes to the two benefit programs." Rep. Pete Stark said, "There is no crisis. There remains plenty of time to mend rather than end Medicare."

The Washington Post (5/2, A3, Goldstein, 744K) reports, "In releasing the report, the trustees -- including three of Bush's Cabinet secretaries -- slightly altered the message accompanying the forecast the past few years, when the administration sought to use the predictions as leverage to persuade a reluctant Congress to embrace the president's goal of letting Americans divert some of their payroll taxes into personal retirement accounts. That emphasis prompted Democrats and other critics to chastise the administration for dwelling on Social Security while Medicare's problems were more acute."

Knight Ridder (5/2, Pugh) reports the Medicare Hospital Insurance trust fund, "which pays primarily for inpatient care and is funded through a 2.9 percent payroll tax, is already operating at a deficit and is projected to hit a new low in 2012.

DOJ_NMG_0027569

By then, total Medicare spending will exceed program funding by 45 percent, the report found." If that "projected funding gap is not closed by next year's report, the projected shortfall would be considered a 'funding warning,' triggering a requirement that the president must offer a legislative remedy to Congress that must be considered on an expedited basis." The report "also found funding problems with Social Security, the nation's largest entitlement program. Without changes, tax revenues for Social Security are expected to fall below program costs in 2017, the same estimate as last year's report."

Bush "Reforms" Said To Have Hurt Medicare Solvency. The Washington Post (5/2, Milbank, 744K) reports an "hour after Bush finished his speech" at the American Hospital Association, where he touted his Medicare Modernization Act of 2003, "Treasury Secretary John W. Snow kicked off a news conference announcing the latest on Medicare's financial standing. The "modernized," cost-effective program is forecast to go belly-up in 2018 -- two years earlier than previously forecast. Somebody stop us before we reform again.

Bush Urges Congress To Take Steps Toward Slowing Medical Spending. The AP (5/2) reports President Bush "said Monday health care costs are rising at an unacceptably fast pace and he called on Congress to enact White House proposals to tame medical expenses." Speaking to the American Hospital Association, Bush said "private health insurance premiums have risen 73 percent in the last five years, forcing some businesses to drop health coverage for their employees and prompting others to raise co-payments and premiums." Bush said, "This is unacceptable for this country to have health care costs rising as fast as they are. If we want to be the leader of the world, we must do something about it. And my administration is determined to do something about it."

WSJournal Says Romney Healthcare Plan Becoming Employer Mandate. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "Only two weeks ago Massachusetts passed an experiment in compulsory, subsidized health insurance, and already it's turning into an employer mandate and a vehicle for increasing the role of government." Last week "the Democrat-controlled Massachusetts legislature began moving in just that direction, overriding all of the line-item vetoes that Republican Governor Mitt Romney had cast in an effort to give the state's new insurance law a market-oriented veneer." If Governor Romney "thinks care for the uninsured is expensive now, wait until Massachusetts taxpayers see how much his government-heavy 'solution' costs."

Frist Retreats From Plan To Raise Oil Company Taxes. The AP (5/2, Hebert) reports, "Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, under pressure from business leaders, retreated Monday from a plan that would have used a tax increase on oil companies and other businesses to fund a $100 gasoline rebate for millions of motorists." Frist "had proposed an accounting change that would have required oil companies to pay more taxes on their inventory of crude as a way to pay the one-time rebate which GOP leaders rolled out last week as they scrambled to find ways to ease public anger over soaring gasoline prices." In a statement, Frist "said he will still push the rebate, but abandoned the accounting change and said the Senate Finance Committee planned a hearing on the issue in the near future."

The New York Times (5/2, Hulse, 1.19M) calls Frist's move "another sign of their struggle to come up with an acceptable political and legislative answer to high gasoline prices." His "retreat" came "after a torrent of objections from business leaders and their advocates, who typically view Republicans in Congress as allies." The decision "eliminates a chief source of revenue to pay for the rebate checks to be mailed to an estimated 100 million taxpayers." The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Meckler, 2.11M) reports Amy Call, a spokeswoman for Frist, "said the $100 rebates would cost $15 billion. Now senators will 'look for other options' to make up the lost revenue, Ms. Call said, adding that they also might simply move the bill without any additions, meaning the increased spending will add to the deficit." The reversal "demonstrates how politically difficult it can be to raise taxes, even at a time when high gasoline prices have made highly profitable oil companies unpopular."

NYTimes Calls $100 Gas Rebate Proposal "Desperate Political Pandering." An editorial in the New York Times (5/2) says, "The public derision of Republicans' idea for a $100 gasoline rebate has focused on the desperate political pandering embodied in the proposal. … With the nation already deeply in debt -- and with Congress angling this week to cut taxes for affluent investors by more than $20 billion -- lawmakers would need to borrow $10 billion to make the rebates happen. Since more than 80 percent of the immense borrowing of the Bush years has been from foreigners, it's safe to assume that most of the rebates would be courtesy of foreign lenders, of which China has been one of the most willing. It's the circle of crude: China's competition for the world's oil is pushing up prices. Congress piles on more debt to calm angry consumers with a rebate. The increased debt is a prescription for a weaker dollar, which in turn would make imports, including oil, even more expensive."

DOJ_NMG_0027570

McClellan Says US Energy Situation In "Crisis." CNN's The Situation Room (5/1, Henry) reported, "A second senior Bush official has now used the word crisis to describe the nation's energy problem, the White House appearing to try to prepare consumers for the worse. Today, it was White House spokesman Scott McClellan, who was pressed on the fact that, yesterday, Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman used the word crisis, and added that, in fact, it may take up to three years for gas prices to come back down substantially. Asked if the President agrees with his energy secretary, McClellan danced a little bit. He added a caveat, but he used the word crisis."

85% Believe Government Could Do Something About Oil Prices If It Tried. U.S. News and World Report (5/8, Lavelle) reports that leaders of both parties last week "took turns pledging to dispatch the IRS to slap around the oil companies -- take away tax breaks, hit them with a windfall-profits tax, and even haul them in for a good audit." While there is "nothing the federal government can do in the short term about a global imbalance in oil supply and demand, the nuclear ambitions of an oil-rich Iran, and a shortage of US gasoline refining capacity," pollster Daniel Yankelovich has found that "85 percent of Americans believe the government could do something about oil prices if it tried."

Ten States To Sue Federal Government To Force Higher SUV Mileage Regulations. The New York Times (5/2, Hakim, 1.19M) reports, "Ten states, including California and New York, plan to file suit this week to force the Bush administration to toughen mileage regulations for sport utility vehicles and other trucks." The suit, which the states are to announce today, "contends that the administration did not do a rigorous enough analysis of the environmental benefits of fuel economy regulations, as required by law, before issuing new rules for S.U.V.'s, pickup trucks and minivans last month." The suit will also "claim that the government did not consider the impact of gasoline consumption on climate change when devising the new rules." California "will be lead plaintiff in the suit, which also includes Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New Mexico, Oregon, Rhode Island and Vermont, as well as New York City and the District of Columbia."

Rising Gasoline Prices Could Strain Non-Aggression Pact Between Oil, Auto Industries. The Hill (5/2, Snyder) reports in its "Business and Lobbying" column, "The high price of gasoline and the growing call for congressional action are undermining the gentleman's agreement under which the oil and auto lobbies do not attack each other. Tyson Slocum, an energy specialist at Public Citizen, said the two lobbies have benefited from a 'non-aggression pact.' But as pressure mounts on Capitol Hill against the oil industry, which has been reporting huge profits, the truce may be ending, Slocum said. … Sources in both the oil and auto camps say there is no split yet. But several lobbyists acknowledged that tensions appear to be rising in a political environment where even some Republicans, long oil-industry allies, are calling for what the industry considers to be punitive measures."

State Attempts To Prove Price Gouging Prove Difficult. USA Today (5/2, Healey, Krantz, 2.31M) reports that "it is hard" for state "authorities to prove consumers are being ripped off even in times of extraordinary price increases. Attorneys general in at least nine states, responding to outrage by their residents, are investigating whether current high gasoline prices are a result of wrongdoing by the petroleum industry, according to the National Association of Attorneys General." Some states "have made price-gouging cases. Florida sued individual gas stations for overcharging after Katrina. But Florida, unlike Arizona, has an anti-gouging law. It is in effect only when a state of emergency is declared. Florida was a hurricane target, making an emergency declaration logical."

Higher Gasoline Prices Hurting Government Budgets. NBC Nightly News (5/1, story 10, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "With gas hovering at around $3 a gallon, it can't help must have an effect on the nation as a whole from the ground up. That includes city budgets." NBC (Costello) added, "It's happening nationwide, skyrocketing fuel prices putting the squeeze on city, state, and county budgets. Next week, the US Conference of Mayors will hold an urgent energy summit in Chicago. Long Beach Mayor Beverly O'Neill is the conference president." Mayor Beverly O'Neill, Long Beach, California: "It's just eating our budgets alive, and we have to have an entirely new direction to facing our budgets, not just yearly but probably month-to-month."

DOJ_NMG_0027571

Higher Gas Prices Yet To Significantly Change Driver Behavior. Although gas prices continue to rise, the increased costs for consumers have yet to register in their behavior. ABC World News Tonight (5/1, story 10, 2:05, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "A gallon of gas now costs, on average, $2.92. That's up 50 cents over last week, and 31% higher than a year ago." ABC (Pinto) added, "Gasoline is still cheaper than it was during the when the prices soared in the early '80s. Adjusted for inflation, prices then would be nearly 50 cents a gallon higher than they are now. Economists say it will take steeper price hikes to really change drivers' behavior." Michelle Michot Foss, Center for Energy Economics, University of Texas: "You'd have to have a price per gallon that would really make a difference, in terms of how you chose to spend your budget, than what we have now. I would say north of $5 for sure."

The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 4, 3:40, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "We are now paying, by the way, 37 cents a gallon more for gas than we were just a month ago." However, says USA Today (5/2, Healey, 2.31M), "prices have stopped their spring-loaded daily leaps," even if "it's too soon to say the worst is over. The numbers on the pump have declined slightly three consecutive days, to a nationwide average $2.919 a gallon Monday, according to travel club AAA. It's the first time that's happened since late March." But "the March respite totaled just 0.8 of a cent over three days and turned out to be only a hiccup before prices zipped higher." AAA "warns that might happen again."

Woolsey Says Buying Less Foreign Oil Will Make US More Secure. The Pittsburgh Tribune Review (5/2, Cato) reports during a visit to Pittsburgh Monday, former CIA Director R. James Woolsey said that a terrorist attack on Saudi Arabian oil refineries could drive crude oil prices above $150 a barrel and keep them there for more than a year. Woolsey said most Americans "don't want to think about where some of the money goes when they buy gasoline -- to groups that threaten the U.S. … And it's not just terrorists, but established Middle Eastern regimes that restrict women's rights, have poor education systems and fail to invest in their societies. … One way to beat that -- and hit Islamic extremists in the pocketbook -- is for Americans to start using renewable fuel, Woolsey said. That includes ethanol and biofuels as alternatives to gas and diesel. … Buying less foreign oil will make the United States more secure, Woolsey said, by providing less money to Middle Eastern groups -- particularly radical Islamists."

Frist Proposal May Sidestep Lawsuit Over Deficit Reduction Act. Roll Call (5/2, Yachnin) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "is considering legislative options to end an ongoing a dispute over Medicare payments to a group of Tennessee hospitals, in the process potentially shelving what could be the first test of the 2005 budget reconciliation act's constitutionality." A Frist aide said, "Frist is working with [Finance] Chairman [Chuck] Grassley [R-Iowa] to explore legislative options." Roll Call adds the 2004 lawsuit of Cookeville Regional Medical Center v. Thompson "centers on a disagreement over how certain Medicare payments should be calculated." While "at least four other challenges to the law's constitutionality have been filed in federal court — including a lawsuit filed Friday by 11 senior House Democrats — the Cookeville case could produce the first ruling on the law's validity because it is already under way."

Senate Republicans Seek To Reclaim Issue Of Fiscal Discipline. Roll Call (5/2, Billings) reports, "Feeling increasing heat from their base for living too high on the hog, Republican Senators are putting in place an election-year strategy to try to reclaim the fiscal discipline brand that helped the GOP win and maintain its majority for more than a decade." Republican Conference sources "say that the leadership plans to make federal spending a major piece of its 2006 campaign. Those sources say there is a widespread acknowledgement that a wake-up call on spending is overdue and that the party must start pushing forth initiatives and a message to show voters it is serious about getting the federal government in the black." GOP Senators and aides "said that to make their case, the majority will spend the coming months holding numerous press events on federal spending, the budget and earmarks. Republicans also plan to push for Senate passage of a line-item veto and possibly revisit the issue of a two-year appropriations process." With "fiscal discipline squarely on the GOP must-do list, several Republican Congressional sources also said that the Senate is already sending signals to the House Republican leadership that, except for Defense and Homeland Security, consideration of the fiscal 2007 appropriations bills likely will be pushed off until after the November elections."

DOJ_NMG_0027572

The Christian Science Monitor (5/2, Chaddock, 61K) reports Congress "is on track for its boldest step yet" at cutting back earmarks because Republicans "are increasingly anxious about this fall's elections, and, with gas prices soaring, the public is paying attention to waste and corruption in Washington." In the House, "still reeling from the scandals involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and ex-Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, Republican leaders are pushing for the disclosure of the names of members who propose earmarks and are seeking a process to remove them." In the Senate, "the fight is over reining in spending. In a political move only used once before in the US Senate, freshman Sen. Tom Coburn (R) of Oklahoma is forcing his colleagues this week to vote on individual pork projects attached to a $106.5 billion emergency defense bill."

Coburn Unlikely To Get Votes On Challenges To Earmarks In Spending Bill. Roll Call (5/2, Stanton) reports in its "Roadmap" column, "The Senate will wrap up its short-lived debate over the growing use of supplemental appropriations bills as a vehicle for pork-barrel spending midweek, as the chamber is expected to approve a fiscal 2006 supplemental package by Wednesday that includes most of the nearly $14 billion in controversial earmarks that touched the fight last week. … Frist filed cloture on the bill last Thursday, essentially limiting reformers' opportunities to whittle away at the bill's price tag by forcing a series of politically embarrassing votes on 17 controversial earmarks challenged by Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.). Although at press time Republicans were still working out the details of which amendments to the bill would be considered, a GOP leadership aide indicated that Coburn would not get a floor vote on all of his amendments."

WSJournal Praises Boehner Win On Budget Changes. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "In the eternal battle against Congressional pork-barrel, we'll take even modest victories wherever we can find them. Following a bruising 12-round, behind-the-scenes prize fight last week between new House Majority Leader John Boehner and Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis, Mr. Boehner won on a technical knockout." Boehner "and fellow House GOP leaders wanted to attach budget changes to an otherwise useless lobbying-reform bill." Lewis "threatened to bring the whole lobbying bill down on the House floor with the help of most of his 36 fellow GOP appropriators, including a threat to bar money for projects in the districts of Members who dared support the bill. But Mr. Lewis backed down at the last moment, lest he and his big-spending mates be blamed for another embarrassing Republican defeat."

Lewis, House Appropriators Challenging GOP Leadership. The Washington Post (5/2, A4, Weisman, 744K) reports that as House Republicans' "unity frays in a difficult election year, House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) and his expansive 66-member panel are challenging the GOP leadership and Republican conservatives." In April, Lewis "and his committee nearly derailed high-profile legislation, first forcing GOP leaders to pull their 2007 budget blueprint from House debate and then bringing consideration of a major lobbying and ethics bill to a halt Thursday. Only after House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) pleaded, saying that his reputation was at stake, did committee members allow the lobbying bill to proceed to a vote, now scheduled for tomorrow."

"Budget-Cutting Proposal" Would Cut Funds For Indian Medical Clinics. The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Verhovek, 958K) reports that "in a budget-cutting proposal that has set off protests and indignation among Indians from Los Angeles to New York and several smaller cities in between, the Bush administration has proposed eliminating funds for" clinics which served about 106,000 Indians last year. Thirty-four such clinics across the nation are intended to serve about "70% of American Indians who live in urban areas, not on a tribal reservation." The Times adds, "Under the plan, Native Americans in urban areas would use the already overburdened municipal clinics, hospitals and other health services that most Americans use -- and that many Indians say have no concept of their traditional forms of care and healing, which are often used in tandem with modern healthcare." If the Congress adopts the proposed cuts, "at least half of the 34 clinics would face sudden closure, while the rest would have to curtail services, said Greg Fine of the National Council of Urban Indian Health, a nonprofit alliance in Washington."

Opponents Of GOP Lobbying Reform Bill Pessimistic. The Hill (5/2, Hearn, Schor) reports opponents "of the House GOP leadership's upcoming lobbying and ethics reform bill were pessimistic yesterday that they could defeat it, noting that increased support among Democrats would likely offset any erosion of enthusiasm in the Republican ranks." GOP leaders "narrowly won a vote last week on a closed rule to bring the reform measure to the floor. The outcome of that vote signified that GOP leaders would face a tough, but not hopeless, battle to muster the votes to pass the lobbying reform measure itself this week."

DOJ_NMG_0027573

OPM Launches Effort To Lure Applicants To Federal Workforce. The Office of Personnel Management has announced a media campaign aimed at luring talented applicants to the federal workforce. The Washington Post (5/2, A19, Goldfarb, Lee, 744K) reports that the campaign comes "at the same time that a new study says the government needs to do a more effective job of recruiting college students for federal jobs. Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management, said the agency will begin airing four 30-second television ads featuring federal employees touting the work they do and encouraging viewers to explore job opportunities at http://www.usajobs.gov/." The Washington Post also reports on the OPM campaign in its "Federal Diary" column this morning.

Pelosi Wants Ethics Investigation Of Prostitution Allegations. Roll Call (5/2, Bresnahan) reports House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "called for an ethics committee investigation into whether two defense contractors supplied now-imprisoned former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) and other lawmakers with prostitutes, free hotel rooms and limousine rides." Pelosi urged Speaker Dennis Hastert to "join her in introducing a bipartisan resolution that directs the ethics panel to look into the allegations, notwithstanding an ongoing criminal probe by the Justice Department into Cunningham's activities. Traditionally, the ethics committee has avoided becoming involved in any matter in which DOJ has already begun a criminal investigation."

CIA Confirms Foggo Attended Poker Games. The CIA has confirmed that its third-ranking official, Executive Director Kyle "Dusty" Foggo attended poker games in Washington hotel hospitality suites which are the focus of a federal criminal investigation. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Paltrow, 2.11M) reports, "A CIA spokeswoman said Mr. Foggo strongly denies anything improper occurred while he was present during the games, held at times in the Watergate and Westin Grand hotels in Washington. As reported, federal prosecutors in San Diego and Federal Bureau of Investigation agents have evidence the suites were paid for by Poway, Calif., defense contractor Brent Wilkes, an unindicted co-conspirator in the bribery case involving former California congressman Randall 'Duke' Cunningham. .. Prosecutors are looking into whether Mr. Wilkes and contractor Mitchell Wade, who has pleaded guilty to bribing Mr. Cunningham, had supplied prostitutes and the suites' use to Mr. Cunningham and possibly other members of Congress from the 1990s until 2005."

Bush Job Approval At 34% In USA Today/Gallup Poll. USA Today (5/2, Jackson, 2.31M) reports the latest USA Today/Gallup poll shows, "Six months before Republicans try to hold on to control of Congress in the fall elections, a new poll shows President Bush has slid to the lowest approval rating of his presidency, and a majority of voters say they'll vote for Democrats in November." The poll, conducted over April 28-30 "found Bush's approval rating at 34%, two points under his previous low. He also received the lowest ratings of his presidency on his handling of the economy, energy and foreign affairs. He tied his previous low on Iraq: 32%." The poll "showed Democrats leading 54%-39% among registered voters who were asked which party they would prefer in a congressional race."

In CBS Poll, 71% Say US Moving In Wrong Direction. The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 3, 0:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "A CBS News poll out tonight shows that 71% of those polled now believe America is heading in the wrong direction. That is the highest number since CBS News first asked that question nearly 25 years ago. The President gets low marks on handling immigration and especially on rising gas prices. Only 17% approve of his handling of that one."

Boehner's Office Holds Weekly Meetings With Vulnerable Republicans. House Majority Leader John Boehner's office has been holding weekly meetings with aides of potentially vulnerable house Republicans out of what The Hill (5/2, O'Connor) calls "concern about retaining the majority in November." The sessions "are part of a larger outreach effort by the majority leader to improve communications with every member of the Republican Conference. The weekly gatherings are an opportunity for the leader's staff to walk the rank-and-file staffers through the upcoming agenda and hear from the offices about the political climate in some of the party's most competitive districts. … Some of the members involved include Republican Reps. Steve Chabot (Ohio), Mike Fitzpatrick (Pa.), Jim Gerlach (Pa.), Bob Ney (Ohio), Dave Reichert (Wash.), Clay Shaw (Fla.) and Heather Wilson

DOJ_NMG_0027574

(N.M.). Each of those members' districts is among the party's most competitive, according to a chart compiled by The Cook Political Report."

"Gang Of 14's" Deal On Judicial Nominees Seen As Win For Bush. Cesar Conda, former assistant for domestic policy to Vice President Cheney, a senior fellow at FreedomWorks and a principal of Navigators LLC, writes in Roll Call (5/2) that while the compromise forged between President Bush and the so-called "Gang of 14" lawmakers on judicial nominees was "roundly and universally criticized," it "turns out the Republican Senators of the 'Gang of 14' were mostly right — at least so far." The Gang's Republicans "were attacked from the right for their supposed betrayal of the party and of the people. The compromise was viewed, in their minds, as a capitulation — a surrender of Republicans' ability to force an up-or-down vote on all judicial nominees. … But since the agreement went into effect, seven of Bush's previously blocked nominees — some of whom were waiting for more than four years to get a vote in the Senate — are now judges in the United States Courts of Appeal."

OTHER NEWS:

New Reports Continue To Show Strong Economy. Under the headline "Economy's Hot Streak Continues," the Wall Street Journal (5/2, Whitehouse, 2.11M) reports, "The first significant piece of economic data for April reinforced the widening view that the US economy entered the second quarter with a good deal of momentum. But a whiff of inflation fueled concern that the Federal Reserve will be forced to step harder on the brakes." The Institute for Supply Management, "a purchasing managers' trade group, said yesterday that its index of manufacturing activity came in at 57.3 for April, higher than expected and up from 55.2 in March. Any level above 50 suggests that the manufacturing sector is growing. A reading in the mid-50s is strong for an economy already in its fifth year of expansion." Separately, "two reports from the Commerce Department showed US consumers going strong in March. Personal consumption rose 0.6%, and a jump in home improvements helped boost construction spending by 0.9%. Both numbers were higher than economists' expectations for the month." The New York Times (5/2, Bajaj, 1.19M) runs a similar report under the headline "Construction And Consumer Spending Rise," and says "personal spending and income increased more than economists had projected and inflation rose modestly in the month."

US Dollar Down. The Washington Post (5/2, D1, Blustein, 744K) reports, "The US dollar is having a sinking spell -- which is good news for US manufacturers and bad news for American tourists traveling abroad. Spurring the greenback's slide are recent statements by top economic policymakers, notably declarations about the need to reduce global trade imbalances." The dollar "has suffered sharp losses against other currencies the past two weeks, and yesterday it hit a fresh, seven-month low against the Japanese yen. Although it rallied yesterday afternoon against the euro, it fell to an 11-month low against the European currency earlier in the day and is down nearly 6 percent against the euro since late February."

Stock Markets Finish Down. NBC Nightly News (5/1, story 12, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street here in New York, the Dow lost nearly 24 points [to close at 11,343.29]. The Nasdaq was down nearly 18 [to close at 2,304.79]." The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Browning, 2.11M) says the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.41%, or 5.42 points, to 1305.19, "up 4.6% this year."

USA Today (5/2, Shell, 2.31M) reports the stock market "was on the verge of posting a five-year high Monday but ended in the red after a late-afternoon report on CNBC left the door open for more interest rate increases by the Federal Reserve." Last week, stocks rallied after Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke "suggested in his prepared remarks Thursday to Congress that the Fed was nearing the end of its nearly two-year-long interest rate-raising campaign and might pause after raising rates for the 16th-consecutive time at its May 10 meeting." But "a report on the business channel aired Monday noted that Bernanke said over the weekend that financial markets had misinterpreted the Fed's language last week and that Fed policy remained 'flexible.'" He also "reiterated that the Fed rate decisions would be determined by economic data." The Washington Post (5/2, D3, Henderson, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Investors Misunderstood Bernanke Testimony, CNBC Anchor Says."

Supreme Court Rules In Favor Of Anna Nicole Smith. The Supreme Court yesterday unanimously decided Anna Nicole Smith could pursue her claim against the estate of her late husband, J. Howard Marshall.

DOJ_NMG_0027575

The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 9, 2:00, Andrews, 7.66M) reported, "Smith just won a unanimous decision from the Supreme Court and kept alive a claim to $88 million from her late husband's estate." Smith "claimed that her husband wanted to give her half his estate, close to a half billion dollars, but that his son, E. Pierce Marshall, blocked the deal." What Smith "has actually won is the right to press her claim again in Federal court, where Pierce Marshall has vowed a fight which she and her lawyers can 'take to the bank.'"

NBC Nightly News (5/1, story 11, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This doesn't mean she gets the money she wanted. It means she gets to keep fighting for it in Federal court. The fight is against her late husband's son. It is a family battle that will likely go on for years."

The New York Times (5/2, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "In an opinion by Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, the court ruled unanimously that the dispute between Ms. Smith and her late husband's son E. Pierce Marshall was properly one for the federal courts." The AP (5/2, Holland) also reports on the ruling.

Child Advocacy Group Sues Video Firms Over Child-Learning Claims. The Washington Post (5/2, D3, Mayer) reports, "A child-advocacy group whose mission is to limit marketing aimed at children yesterday asked the federal government to bar two major baby-video companies from promoting their products as educational and beneficial to child development." The Post continues, "The Campaign for a Commercial-Free Childhood filed a complaint with the Federal Trade Commission, saying Baby Einstein Co. and Brainy Baby Co. should not be able to say their products inspire 'logical thinking,' foster 'the development of your toddler's speech and language skills,' or give 'your child a jumpstart on learning.'" The Post adds, "The group said the claims are deceptive, since there is no proof that these increasingly popular videos are beneficial and educational. In fact, it said, 'research shows that television viewing is potentially harmful for infants and toddlers,' because it could adversely affect cognitive development if it replaces creative play and interaction with a child's parents and surroundings. … The CCFC's complaint comes at a time when the baby-video market is booming, with more than $1 billion in sales so far in videos aimed at children 2 and younger. Baby Einstein, owned by Walt Disney Co., has the largest share of the market, and sales last year reached $200 million."

Quality Of Life Issues Increasingly Important To Young Attorneys. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Jones) reports, "At most big law firms, the partner-associate compact goes something like this: The partners give the associates big salaries, meals on the client, cars home at night, fancy offices, secretaries and a prestigious name on their résumés. The associates give their complete professional devotion and availability -- every hour of the day, every day of the year. … That compact has gone unspoken, and largely unquestioned, until recently." The Journal continues, "More and more associates at law firms across the U.S. are second guessing whether they want to sign over their lives to their jobs. Some are working fewer hours. Some are losing interest in making partner. And they are leaving big law firms in droves. … Two decades ago, few segments of the work force routinely put in longer hours than young law-firm associates, who toiled day and night to please partner-masters and climb the firms' ranks. But many today 'are more interested in going to their children's soccer games' than they are in staying in the office late in the hopes of getting extra work done or making a good impression, says Joseph Altonji, a consultant with Hildebrandt International, a law-firm consultancy in Chicago."

DeLay Spent Over $400,000 On Legal Defense In First Quarter Of 2006. New Filings show that Rep. Tom DeLay spent more than $400,000 in the first quarter of this year on legal fees and expenses connected to raising money for his legal defense fund. Roll Call (5/2, Kane) reports that DeLay's legal defense fund 'burned through $312,000 in expenses in the first quarter of the year, paying out fees to four different law firms representing the former House Majority Leader on two different legal fronts." In addition, DeLay paid $110,000 out of his campaign committee to a firm in January. Roll Call adds, "Aides to DeLay said no final decision had been made with regard to how the lawmaker will finance his mounting legal bills once he retires from the House, which is expected to happen sometime in June. But the simplest course would be to continue to raise money through a privatized version of the Tom DeLay Legal Expense Trust and raise unlimited donations without having to publicly report who the donors are."

DOJ_NMG_0027576

Giuliani Campaigns For GOP Candidates In Iowa. Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani was in Iowa Monday to raise funds for Republican congressional candidate Jeff Lamberti and Rep. Jim Nussle, who is running for governor. The AP (5/2, Glover) reports that Giuliani, who is considering a 2008 presidential bid said the GOP "must increasingly be 'a big party' that accepts divergent views. Giuliani said that broad-brush themes, like limited government, ought to define the Republican Party -- not hot-button social issues like abortion and gay rights."

The New York Times (5/2, Healy, 1.19M) reports that Giuliani said he was "seriously exploring whether he has 'a chance' of winning the presidency in 2008, as he visited politically important Iowa and huddled with state advisers, donors to President Bush and other prominent Republicans." The Times notes that while Giuliani was in Iowa to campaign for GOP candidates, "his behavior and remarks came close to politicking for himself."

Romney Plans Speech To Address His Religious Beliefs. U.S. News and World Report (5/8, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column, "About two months before the heated 1960 election, John F. Kennedy tried to put to rest the whole debate over his Catholicism to beat Richard Nixon. … Now, 46 years later, Massachusetts has coughed up another presidential hopeful who belongs to what some see as a weird religion--the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints." The candidate, Republican Gov. Mitt Romney "says he'll give a similar address, in which he will pledge allegiance to the Constitution, not the Mormon church. It will be a simple approach: Explain the religion, maybe touch on the banned practice of polygamy, then ask voters to judge him on his years in business, as head of the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City, and as the Bay State's governor."

Clark Eyeing Another Presidential Bid. U.S. News and World Report (5/8, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that 2004 hopeful Wes Clark "is mulling a second presidential bid."

Kerrey Sends Fundraising E-Mail For Kerry. The Washington Times (5/2, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "In an e-mail solicitation sent yesterday, former Sen. Bob Kerrey, Nebraska Democrat, appeals for contributions to the presidential campaign of Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat. In his e-mail, Mr. Kerrey of Nebraska praises Mr. Kerry of Massachusetts for his 'profound courage' in condemning the Vietnam War during testimony to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1971. … Appealing for contributions to the 2004 presidential loser, the ex-senator from Nebraska calls attention to an April 22 speech Mr. Kerry of Massachusetts gave at Boston's Faneuil Hall: 'John made it clear that those who disagree with President Bush's course in Iraq have a right and an obligation to challenge a president who they believe is wrong, a policy they believe is wrong, and a war in Iraq they believe weakens our nation.'"

Feith To Join Georgetown University Faculty. Former Pentagon policy chief Doug Feith, who was an architect of the Bush Administration's war on terror, is joining the faculty of Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service. The AP (5/2) reports, "In an announcement Monday, the university said Feith will teach a course on the Bush administration's strategy for the war on terror and also will conduct seminars as a visiting professor and distinguished practitioner in national security policy. He will start this fall."

Negotiator Says Iran Won't Suspend Nuclear Enrichment Program. The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 7, 3:00, Palmer, 7.66M) interviewed Dr. Ali Larijani, "the head of Iran's National Security Council and the chief negotiator on nuclear issues." Larijani said "now that Iran has succeeded in enriching uranium, there is no going back." Dr. Ali Larijani (voice of translator): "So this is a whole new ballgame, and this requires a new solution. We cannot insist with the solutions of the past." Palmer: "A worried UN ordered Iran to suspend its enrichment program by last Friday, but Iran refused, saying at the very least it will keep a small-scale experimental program." Iran has "just set conditions that it knows Washington will not accept. When the Security Council members meet in Paris tomorrow, they'll have a lot to talk about as the really tough negotiations are about to begin."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (5/2, Hoge, 1.19M) reports Iran "asked the United Nations on Monday to take a stand against American threats that it said included possible nuclear strikes on its territory and that were 'in total contempt of international law.' In a letter to Secretary General Kofi Annan, Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the United Nations, pointed to recent comments by President Bush and" Secretary Rice "on ways to halt Iran's nuclear program and to news reports of Pentagon planning for possible nuclear attacks on nuclear facilities in Iran." The AP (5/2, Lederer) notes that "in a brief statement responding to the letter," Ambassador Bolton "said 'if Iran wants to be treated differently, then Iran should stop pursuing nuclear weapons and give up terrorism.'"

DOJ_NMG_0027577

As Permanent Members Huddle, Top Iranian Negotiator Asks For Talks. The AP (5/2, Karimi) reported top negotiator Ali Larijani "said Tehran was 'ready for any kind of negotiation to achieve our rights,' renewing a call for further talks on the Islamic republic's atomic program." Larijani "also called again for Iran's dispute with the international community to be returned to the UN nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency, headed by Mohamed ElBaradei. 'Let's allow Mr. ElBaradei to do his job based on the international conventions,' Larijani" said publicly. The CBS Evening News (5/1, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported its interview with Larijani, and concludes, "Iran has just set conditions that it knows Washington will not accept. When the Security Council members meet in Paris tomorrow, they'll have a lot to talk about as the really tough negotiations are about to begin."

Bush Calls Putin To Discuss Iran Nuclear Standoff. The AP (5/2) reports President Bush "called Russian President Vladimir Putin on Monday to discuss the standoff over Iran's nuclear program, days before the issue goes before the UN Security Council. ... 'The two leaders stressed the importance of preventing Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons, especially in the United Nations Security Council,' White House press secretary Scott McClellan said. 'And they committed to remaining in close contact on this important priority.'" The AP reports a Kremlin statement that "the two sides 'discussed interaction on urgent international problems, including the Iranian nuclear issue, on which numerous consultations at various levels'" in the near future.

WPost Urges US To Pursue UN Resolution. The Washington Post (5/2, A20, 744K) editorializes, "The Bush administration's pursuit of a resolution at the United Nations is…a necessary step -- in part because of what it may reveal about the international coalition it has tried to build against Iran. A debate on a legally binding resolution should set the United States and its European allies more firmly on a course toward adopting specific sanctions against Iran." It "should also force China and Russia to decide whether they wish to be partners of the West in addressing such threats to global security."

Olmert Taps Livni For Number Two Post. The AP (5/1) reported Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's cabinet selections. Tzipi Livni will become vice premier and foreign minister, making her "the second most powerful politician" in Israel. "The defense portfolio went to Amir Peretz, head of the moderate Labor Party, the junior partner in Olmert's coalition. The posting is considered controversial since Peretz is widely perceived as strong on social issues but inexperienced in military matters. Labor also received six other ministerial appointments, including education, infrastructure, agriculture and tourism." Shimon Peres will take over developing the Negev and the Galilee and will become deputy prime minister, subordinate to Livni. Shaul Mofaz, outgoing defense minister, will be "demoted" to minister for transportation. The Financial Times (5/2, Devi) keys on the Finance Ministry pick, saying Avraham Hirchson will hold the key job "in a new government that is expected to maintain free market budgetary and fiscal policies."

A Frustrated Wolfensohn Resigns As Mideast Gaza Economic Coordinator. AFP (5/1) reported, "Former World Bank president James Wolfensohn formally stepped down as economic coordinator for Gaza, saying the rise of a Hamas-led Palestinian government made his job untenable." Appearing with Secretary Rice, "Wolfensohn announced his expected resignation after a year as envoy of the Middle East quartet." Having "frequently complained of being 'disenfranchised' in his Gaza role and threatened to quit, [Wolfensohn] left with a warning that the West should not consider trying to starve the Hamas-led Palestinians into submission."

Despite Support For US, Pakistan Doesn't Get Textile Deal. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, A6, Shah, 2.11M) reports, "Pakistan, an early ally in America's war on terrorism, hoped its close relations with Washington would also strengthen commercial ties between the two countries. But Islamabad is learning that not all alliances are created equal." While President Bush "congratulated" Pakistan on its economic policies recently, "Pakistani officials had hoped for a textile-trade pact, but Mr. Bush didn't offer one." Bush "referred to a bilateral investment treaty, although details of the pact -- which was proposed in 2004 -- are still being worked out. … Mr. Bush also pushed creating a trade zone along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border to stimulate business in that violent region." The Journal notes that even that "program's scope is narrower than trade preferences sought by Pakistan, underscoring the Bush administration's limits on granting trade favors, even to an ally who backed the campaign against terrorism after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks."

DOJ_NMG_0027578

Kashmir Killings Said To Target Peace Talks. The New York Times (5/2, Sengupta, 1.19M) reports, "Thirty-five Hindus were killed in recent days in two separate incidents in the Indian-administered portion of the disputed Kashmir province, the police said. The killings were believed to be the handiwork of Islamist militants just days before a scheduled meeting between the Indian prime minister and Kashmiri separatists." The Times comments, "Even by the standards of blood-soaked Kashmir, it was a particularly grisly pair of incidents -- and the deadliest violence since peace talks began more than two years ago between India and Pakistan, neighbors and rivals on the question of Kashmir. The attacks are worrisome because they appear intended to fuel Hindu-Muslim tensions." The Times says their "impact is likely to be felt during the talks" that begin Wednesday. The Financial Times (5/2, Johnson) adds, "India suffered the single worst incident of communal violence in Jammu & Kashmir in three years on Monday," and notes Prime Minister Singh "condemned the killings, which appeared timed to disrupt" the Kashmir talks.

Zoellick Heads To Abuja In Effort To Salvage Darfur Talks. Coming in the wake of rallies on the National Mall and elsewhere in the United States on Sunday designed to draw attention to the Darfur crisis, the New York Times (5/2, Brinkley, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports, "The Bush administration on Monday dispatched" Deputy Secretary Zoellick "to Nigeria, where he plans to plunge directly into the negotiations over a treaty to end the carnage in the Darfur region of Sudan, which stalled again on Monday." After mediators extended the talks for 48 hours on Sunday night, "on Monday morning, Vice President Ali Osman Taha of Sudan, the senior representative of his government at the talks, abruptly left Abuja and returned to Sudan's capital, Khartoum, complaining that the rebel leaders had been intransigent, officials said." Reportedly "frustrated by the state of affairs, Salim Ahmed Salim, the lead mediator, called Mr. Zoellick on Monday morning and asked him to come to Abuja immediately." He will arrive in Abuja this morning. In its coverage, the AP (5/2, Schweid) quotes Secretary Rice as saying, "As long as the parties are talking, there's always a chance for an agreement. ... It takes time. ... We need to shake the trees a little bit, shake the bureaucracy a little bit and say to people: 'It's not acceptable to wait any longer for at least the planning for a robust security force.'"

The Financial Times (5/2, England) takes a more pessimistic view, reporting, "The prospects of a deal looked bleak, with the rebels insisting amendments had to be made to a draft agreement put forward by the AU last week." The Times goes on to report lead mediator Salim "said it had been 'frustrating' to deal with the rebels, and urged all the groups to agree to a deal. 'I can tell you that this war in Darfur has shaken Africa to its core. ... The eyes of Africa and the wider international community are fixed on us here.'"

Bolivian President Nationalizes Gas Industry. The Washington Post (5/2, A1, Reel, Mufson, 744K) reports, "Bolivian President Evo Morales seized control of the country's natural gas industry Monday, sending soldiers to occupy fields that he contends private companies have plundered for years. Morales said that unless foreign energy firms agreed to give Bolivia's state oil company oversight of production and a majority of their revenue generated in Bolivia, the government would evict them from the fields. 'The time has come, the awaited day, a historic day in which Bolivia retakes absolute control of our natural resources,' Morales said during a televised speech from a gas field near the country's southern border. 'The looting by foreign companies has ended.'" The Post notes that although "Morales' announcement was expected...his deployment of troops to gas fields was a strong statement in a region where governments are moving to block outside influence, particularly from the United States, and exert more control over the energy industry."

The New York Times (5/2, Prada, 1.19M) reports Morales "gave foreign companies 180 days to renegotiate existing contracts with the government, or leave the country. 'The time has come, the awaited day, a historic day in which Bolivia retakes absolute control of our natural resources,' Mr. Morales declared." The Los Angeles Times (5/2, McDonnell, 958K) notes Morales, "wearing a helmet of the state energy firm, chose May 1, International Day of the Workers and a national holiday here, to unveil his nationalization plan." On Monday evening, Morales "addressed a roaring crowd in La Paz, the Andean capital where he has strong support, especially among the poor and working classes tired of a lack of social progress in South America's poorest nation."

DOJ_NMG_0027579

The Financial Times (5/2, Weitzman) notes, "The intervention will heighten investors' concerns about the investment climate in the energy sector generally, and Mr. Morales' willingness to pursue a leftwing agenda in particular. ... Francisco Blanch, head of commodities at Merrill Lynch in London, said: 'This is another step into the recent tide towards greater state control of commodities resources, as we have seen previously in Russia and Venezuela.'" The Washington Times (5/2, Zuazo, 90K) runs a similar report.

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (5/2, Luhnow, De Córdoba, 2.11M) cites David Mares, a Latin American energy expert at UC San Diego, as saying, "Chávez and Morales are both playing a game of chicken with foreign oil companies. ... In a period with high profits of oil companies, this is giving both of them a sense that the companies will really bend over backward to keep access to these places, and that this is the time to renegotiate the contracts."

Poll Shows Conservative Now Leading Mexican Presidential Race. The Christian Science Monitor (5/2, Harman, 61K) reports that "now Felipe de Jesús Calderón Hinojosa is the man to beat in Mexico's July 2 elections. The young, at 43, lawyer and economist was far behind when the campaign season took off last fall. To begin with, President Vicente Fox, barred constitutionally from running for a second term, backed a different candidate to lead his center-right National Action Party (PAN). More critically, there was the seemingly unstoppable rise of populist Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the candidate for the Democratic Revolution Party (PRD), who is as charismatic and dynamic as Calderón is ho-hum." But "that was then." A recent poll in the "local Reforma newspaper…showed Calderón with 38 percent support, with López Obrador slipping to second place -- at 35 percent -- for the first time in over a year. Roberto Madrazo, candidate of the Revolutionary Institutional party (PRI) that ruled Mexico for 71 years before Fox came into office in 2000, was in third place with 23 percent." Other "snap polls have confirmed the trend of Calderón's rise."

Taylor's Arrest Said To Continue Positive Trend. In a 1,200-word piece on continent-wide efforts to improve the rule of law, the Washington Post (5/2, A16, Timberg, 744K) says the arrest of former Liberian strongman Charles Taylor "was the latest in a series of tentative steps toward holding political leaders in Africa accountable for alleged crimes including corruption, rape and genocide. After decades in which senior government officials were largely beyond the reach of national and international law, prosecutors recently have pursued Taylor for war crimes committed in Sierra Leone, a U.N.-backed tribunal has tried former leaders in the 1994 Rwandan genocide, and international investigators have been invited into four other African countries." The Post says even "national courts have also become increasingly aggressive. In Zambia, former president Frederick Chiluba is battling corruption allegations, as are several top officials in Nigeria, Kenya and Malawi."

CO2 Emissions Market Takes Hit Following EU Report. The Washington Times/AFP (5/2, Ingham) reports that as European countries discovered that they were polluting far less than they thought, the fledgling market for carbon dioxide (CO2) emissions is taking a hit. Under the Emissions Trading System (ETS) of the European Union, "11,500 firms that are big users of fossil fuels must meet target levels for CO2 emissions or else pay a penalty of $50 per metric ton for 2006 and 2007 -- a punishment that will rise to $125 per ton in 2008. Companies that have used less than their quota can sell their surplus on the ETS to companies that have used more than their quota, thus providing a financial carrot to companies to exceed the requirements. … On Wednesday, the price fell to $29.45, and on Thursday, the price fell to $20.75. On Friday, it closed at $16.60 ahead of the May 1 holiday." This after authorities in five of the 25 EU countries, France, the Netherlands, the Czech Republic, Estonia and Belgium's Wallonia region, "reported that their CO2 pollution last year was less than their quota levels, whereas Spain said it had exceeded its quota, but by less than expected."

US, Japan Urge China To Disclose Details Of Arms Build-Up. The Washington Times (5/2, Gertz, 90K) reports Defense Secretary Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Rice and "their Japanese counterparts" urged China "to explain its secret military buildup." A joint statement "called for 'greater transparency on the modernization of military capabilities in the region,' in what U.S. defense officials said was reference to a Chinese arms buildup that is prompting worries for both governments." The Times goes on to report that the officials also "urged North Korea to return expeditiously to the talks without preconditions, to dismantle its nuclear programs in a complete, verifiable and irreversible manner, and to cease all illicit and proliferation activities."

DOJ_NMG_0027580

Grassley Claims ONDCP Figures On Colombian Drug Production Are Inconsistent. The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Kraul, 958K) reports Sen. Charles E. Grassley "has raised questions about the statistics offered by the Bush administration to show progress in fighting drugs in Colombia, as Congress prepares to debate hundreds of millions of dollars in additional aid to the strife-torn nation. Writing to the White House's Office of National Drug Control Policy…Grassley asked for an explanation of apparent inconsistencies between positive numbers released last fall and figures released last month that indicated ground was being lost."

Al Risala Said To Represent New Generation Of Islamic Television. The Christian Science Monitor (5/2, Lindsey, 61K) reports on Al Risala – "the Message" -- a new Islamic satellite channel originating out of Dubai, has "splashy graphics and state-of-the-art sets. The channel does air some traditional religious programming, but many of the shows have nothing overtly religious about them. … In the audience, young men and women sit next to each other, and some of the women are unveiled."

Sufism, Formerly Banned, Said To Be Resurgent In Saudi Arabia. The Washington Post (4/2, A13, Ambah, 744K) reports that although it was until recently banned in Saudi Arabia, "a new atmosphere of increased religious tolerance has spurred a resurgence of Sufism and brought the once-underground Sufis and their rituals out in the open."

In Break With Tradition, Turkish Government Appoints Female Preachers. The Washington Times (5/2, Birch, 90K) reports that last year Turkey's directorate of religious affairs appointed "200 state-paid 'vaizes,' or female preachers, whose very existence breaks with centuries of Muslim tradition. Women acted informally as preachers in the early days of Islam, but they never before have been recognized officially as such."

Blair Seeks To Avert Disaster For Labour In Thursday's Elections. The Financial Times (5/2, Blitz) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair "will launch on Tuesday a desperate bid to avert a serious setback for his Labour party in this Thursday's local elections, seeking to draw a line under a week of disastrous news stories for the British government. … Labour said ministers would be making more than a hundred visits to local election contests across England in the next 48 hours."

France's Le Pen Will Seek Presidency Again. The New York Times (5/2, Smith, 1.19M) reports the National Front's Jean-Marie Le Pen became the first politician "to make a formal announcement that he plans to run" for the French president in 2007. The Times adds, "Speaking to thousands of supporters at his traditional May Day rally in central Paris, Mr. Le Pen, 77, predicted that he would make it into a runoff election next year just as he did against Jacques Chirac in 2002."

Unrest Seen As Benefiting Sarkozy. The New York Times/International Herald Tribune (5/2, Vincour) reports French Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy is "the only politician in France whose ambitions have been solidified by the country's dreadful months of underclass riots and no-to-change demonstrations. Some days, but not all, he has never looked closer to becoming president in 2007."

New Holocaust Museum Will Focus On Vichy Government. The Washington Post (5/2, C1, Trescott, 744K) reports, "A memorial marking the role of France's Vichy government in shipping Jews and others to Nazi death camps will be created at Rivesaltes, an internment facility near France's border with Spain, representatives of the French government and the US Holocaust Memorial Museum, which will assist in the effort, announced yesterday in Washington."

Dutch Immigration Requirements Include Language Test, Tolerance Film. NBC Nightly News (5/1, story 8, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "If you want to move to the Netherlands, you have to first watch a film about how permissive Dutch society is and then if it's not your cup of tea, you're not welcome." The government film is "compulsory viewing as part of a tough new entrance test for would-be immigrants, the idea is to make them familiar with every aspect of Dutch society. There's 'another hurdle -- they must learn to speak Dutch before entering Holland."

Hyperinflation In Zimbabwe Adds To Desperation. The New York Times (5/2, Wines, 1.19M) reports that hyperinflation in Zimbabwe "is roaring toward

DOJ_NMG_0027581

1,000 percent a year, a rate usually seen only in war zones. Zimbabwe has been tormented this entire decade by both deep recession and high inflation, but in recent months the economy seems to have abandoned whatever moorings it had left. The national budget for 2006 has already been largely spent. Government services have started to crumble."

Prime Minister Celebrates Referendum On Montenegrin Independence From Serbs. In an op-ed for the Financial Times (5/2) Milo Djukanovic, prime Minister of Montenegro, writes, "The bloody collapse of Yugoslavia shamed Europe. … There is, however, one positive story from those dreadful years. It involves my own small but fiercely proud multi-ethnic country, Montenegro, which was wiped off the map by the Allies after the first world war and forced to become part of the kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, which was renamed Yugoslavia." Djukanovic adds, "We Montenegrins, who hope to reclaim our national sovereignty and independence in a referendum this month and then accelerate accession talks with the European Union, have more recent reasons to be proud."

Russians Seen As Suspicious Of West's Human Rights Rhetoric. In his column for the Washington Post (5/2, A21, 744K) the Carnegie Moscow Center's Masha Lipman writes that "in today's Russia, the West -- and especially the United States -- is increasingly regarded as an adversary whose values are not shared by Russians. For example, Western human rights views were challenged last month by participants in a 'World Council of the Russian People' held under the auspices of the Russian Orthodox Church."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Marchers Fill L.A.'s Streets."
"At One With Dual Devotion."
"Next: Converting The Energy Of Protest To Political Clout."
"Throngs Show Their Potent Role In Economy."
'When I See This, I See Strength.'"

USA Today:
"Sour News For GOP In Poll."
"New Antipsychotic Drugs Carry Risks For Children."

New York Times:
"Immigrants Take To U.S. Streets In Show Of Strength."
"Republicans Drop A Tax Plan After Business Leaders Protest."
"Zimbabwe's Prices Rise 900%, Turning Staples Into Luxuries."
"Ideals Collide As Vatican Rethinks Condom Ban."
"Pensions In Peril Over Exemptions Tied To Churches."
"In Nebraska Senate Challenge, Pork Is Portrayed As Bad Politics."

Washington Post:
"National Boycott For Illegal Workers."
"Lerner Expected To Get Nationals."
"Blink And They're Still There."
"Bolivian President Seizes Gas Industry."
"New Gallaudet President Met With Protest."
"Urban Pest Will Soon Be Out For Blood."

Washington Times:
"Thousands Join Boycott."
"Biden Pitches Division Of Iraq."
"Turkey's 'Vaizes' Expedite Reform."
"Surprising Double Vision."
"Bolivia Seeks Control Of Gas Production."
"Pollution Reports Hurt CO2 Emissions Market."

Detroit Free Press:
"Immigrants' Message: Justice For All."
"The Bitter End."
"Cup Thrower Gets Jail, Call AA Decree 'Crap.'"
"NWA Pay Showdowns Loom."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Guilty Plea Closes Morris Brown Case."
"Social Security Forecast Worsens."
"Latinos Boycott."
"Teen Pregnancies In Georgia Down Sharply Since '94."
"Racist Classic 'Birth Of A Nation' Makes Rare TV Slot."

Houston Chronicle:
"Senate Passes Perry Tax Plan."
"Lay Defends Lavish Habits And Big Cash Withdrawals."
"Boycott Felt Here, Elsewhere."
"Bolivian Military Seizes Oil, Gas Fields."
"Pipe Attack Victim Is 'Still In Bad Shape,' His Brother Says."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Immigrant Boycott-LA; Boycott-New York; Boycott-Chicago; Boycott-Economic Impact; Texas Boycott Participant; Bush-Iraq; Iraq Reconstruction; Social Security,

DOJ_NMG_0027582

Medicare Funding; Nutritional Supplements; Gas Prices; Empire State Building; Frequent Flier Programs; WWII Attack Survivor.

CBS: Immigrant Boycott; Boycott-Dodge City; Bush-Approval Ratings; Gas Prices-Senior Citizens; Social Security, Medicare Funding; Bush-Iraq; Iranian Nukes-Larijani Interview; Armored Marathon Runner; SCOTUS-Anna Nicole Smith; Empire State Building.

NBC: Immigrant Boycott; Boycott-Denver; Boycott-Chicago; Boycott-LA; Boycott-New York; Boycott-Financial Impact; Boycott-Political Impact; Netherlands-Immigration Test; Bush-Iraq; Gas Prices-Local Budgets; SCOTUS-Anna Nicole Smith; Stock Markets; New York Boycott Participant.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: Immigration Boycott; Duke Rape Case; Bird Flu.

CBS: Immigration Boycott; Gas Prices; Duke Rape Case; AARP-Retirement Savings; Richards Hospitalized.

NPR: Immigration Boycott; Judicial Watch-Abramoff White House Visits; Bolivia-Natural Gas Fields Nationalized; Wall Street; Fed.-Interest Rates; Zoellick-Sudan.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Participates in a roundtable at a Celebrate Teacher Appreciation Week event, with Education Secretary Spellings, Columbus, Ohio; speaks at a Deborah Pryce for Congress luncheon, Hyatt Regency Columbus; participates in a Medicare prescription drug signup event, Fort Smith, Ark.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION AND FORESTRY _ Full Committee. Hearing on commodity price support programs in the Farm Security and Rural Investment Act of 2002. Floyd Gaibler, deputy undersecretary of Agriculture; Stanley Fletcher, University of Georgia; Armond Morris, Georgia Peanut Commission; Jimbo Grissom, Western Peanut Growers Association, Seminole, Texas; Evans Plowden, American Peanut Shellers Association, Albany, Ga.; Gary Rasor, American Peanut Products Manufacturers Inc. Location: Room 216, Hart.

9:30 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on line-tem recission authority. Austin Smythe, OMB; Acting CBO Director Donald Marron; Charles Cooper, Cooper and Kirk; Louis Fisher, Library of Congress. Location: Room 608, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Oversight hearing of the FBI. FBI Director Robert Mueller, DOG Inspector General Glenn Fine, Linda Calbom, GAO, John Gannon, BAE Systems Information Technology. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation, votes on pending nominations and approval of the report on the government's preparations and response to Hurricane Katrina. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Personnel Subcommittee. CLOSED. Markup portions of the FY07 defefnse authorization bill. Location: Room 222, Russell.

2:30 p.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Science and Space Subcommittee. Hearing on the NSF budget. Director Arden Bemet, Jr., NSB Chairman Warren Washington, Alan Leshner of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and Jerome Odom of the University of South Carolina. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

3:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Readiness and Management Support Subcommittee. CLOSED. Markup portions of the defense authorization bill. Location: Room 232A, Russell.

4 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Confirmation hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

5:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Emerging Threats and Capabilities Subcommittee. CLOSED. Markup portions of the defense authorization bill. Location: Room 222, Russell.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 12:30 p.m. Meets for morning business, and at 2 p.m. for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (14 bills): 1) H.R. 5107 - Earl D. Hutto Post Office Building Designation Act: 2) H.R. 4811 - John Paul Hammerschmidt Post Office Building Designation Act: 3) H.R. 4674 - Governor John Anderson, Jr. Post Office Building Designation Act: 4) H.R. 4995 - Ronald Bucca Post Office Designation Act: 5) H.R. 4101 - Lieutenant Michael P. Murphy Post Office Building Designation Act; 6) H.R. 3351 - Native American Technical Corrections Act of 2006; 7) H.R. 2720 - Salt Cedar and Russian Olive Control Demonstration Act: 8) H.R. 3929 - Dana Point Desalination Project Authorization Act: 9) H.R. 3418 - Central Texas Water Recycling Act of 2005: 10) H.Res. 697 - Congratulating the people and Government of Italy, the Torino Olympic Organizing Committee, the International Olympic Committee, the United States Olympic Committee, the 2006 United States Olympic Team, and all international athletes upon the successful completion of the 2006 Olympic Winter Games in Turin, Italy: 11) H.Con.Res. 392 - Recognizing the 58th anniversary of the independence of the State of Israel; 12) H.Con.Res. 90 - Conveying the sympathy of Congress to the families of the young women murdered in the State of Chihuahua, Mexico, and encouraging increased United States involvement in bringing an end to these crimes; 13) H.Res. 658 - Supporting the goals and ideals of World Water Day; 14) H.R. 4943 - Prevention of Fraudulent Access to Phone Records Act.

DOJ_NMG_0027583

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ National Security, Emerging Threats and International Relations Subcommittee. Hearing on UN sanctions after the Oil for Food program. UN Amb. John Bolton; Joseph Christoff, GAO; Carne Ross, Independent Diplomat; George Lopez, University of Notre Dame. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

2:30 p.m. EDUCATION AND THE WORKFORCE _ Select Education Subcommittee. Hearing on the Seniors' Independence Act. Assistant HHS Secretary Josefina Carbonell; Deputy Assistant Labort Secretary Mason Bishop. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

5 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Prevention of Nuclear and Biological Attack Subcommittee. Closed. Meeting on the 2005 Defense Science Board study on reducing vulnerabilities to weapons of mass destruction. Location: Room H2-176, Ford.

5 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Meeting to consider rules for floor debate. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

Other: PRESIDENT TABARE VAZQUEZ OF URUGUAY _ Highlights: 10 a.m. Meets with the president of the World Bank. 4:30 p.m. Meets with Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez.

HOSPITALS _ Annual meeting of the American Hospital Association. Highlights: 9 a.m. Plenary session with Reps. Nancy Pelosi and Peter King. 9 a.m. U.S. Chamber of Commerce President Thomas Donohue. 12:30 p.m. Luncheon speaker: Karen Davis, President, Commonwealth Fund. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW.

AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS _ The American Jewish Committee (AJC) kicks off its centennial year celebrations with its 100th annual meeting. The week-long meeting's agenda, with dozens of sessions on topics as diverse as immigration, Iran, anti-Semitism, energy independence and Zionism, highlights the breadth of AJC's global activism over its century of leadership. 1 p.m. Panel on ``The Quest for Energy Independence," with Sens. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., and Norman Coleman, R-Minn.; and James Connaughton, Chairman, White House Council on Environmental Quality. Capital Hilton. Location: Primary location is the Capital Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW. Other locations as noted.

COUNCIL OF THE AMERICAS _ The Council of the Americas holds its 36th Washington Conference on the Americas, ``Creating Jobs, Building Hope: The Hemispheric Growth Agenda in a Changing World." Highlights:

9 a.m. - 5 p.m. All day session, with President Tabar Vazquez of Uruguay; Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Francisco Gil Daz, Minister of Finance and Public Credit, Mexico; Martn Redrado, President, Central Bank of Argentina; Dilma Vana Rousseff, Presidential Chief of Staff, Brazil; Paul Wolfowitz, President, The World Bank; Luis Alberto Moreno, President, Inter-American Development Bank; Thomas Shannon, Assistant Secretary of State; Marc Lautenbach, General Manager, IBM Americas. Henderson Conference Room, State Department.

MOUSSAOUI _ 8:30 a.m. - 4 p.m. Jury deliberations continue in the penalty phase of U.S. v. Zacarias Moussaoui. Lunch recess 12:15 pm - 1 pm. Location: Albert V. Bryan U.S. Courthouse, 401 Courthouse Square, Alexandria, Va.

ESTATE TAX _ 8 a.m. Meeting of family business owners to discuss permanent repeal of the estate tax, with Sens. Bill Frist and Jon Kyl, Rep. Kenneth Hulshoff, Seattle Times Publisher Frank Blethen, others. Location: National Press Club.

IRAQ-VIRTUAL LIBRARY _ 8:30 a.m. Sun Microsystems, Inc., holds a news briefing on its Iraqi Virtual Science Library (IVSL). The lead American Association for the Advancement of Science fellows on the project (including Dr. D.J. Patil, Professor of Science at the University of Maryland, College Park) and representatives from the U.S. Department of State, Sun Microsystems and engineering publishers to discuss how the IVSL project has helped to greatly diminish the effects of 30 years of neglect to the Iraqi university library system. Location: Eaton Room, Henley Park Hotel, 926 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0027584

TELECOM FORUM _ 8:30 a.m. National Journal's Technology Daily holds a forum on the state of telecom policy, with keynote address by Rep. Fred Upton. Panel discussion with Tim McKone of ATT, Kerry Knott of Comcast, Doron Gorshein of The America Channel, and Chris Vein of the San Francisco Department of Telecommunications and information Services. Location: Phoenix Hotel, 520 N. Capitol St.

MUSLIMS-FORUM _ 8:30 a.m. - 10 a.m. The Gallup Organization hosts a forum to focus on findings from its study on the views and aspirations of over one (b) billion Muslims worldwide, including Iran, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Egypt. Participants include Prof. John Esposito of Georgetown University; Dalia Moahed, executive director of Gallup's Muslim studies; and Richard Burkholder, director of Gallup's international public opinion polling. Location: 901 F St., NW.

CHINA SUMMIT _ 8:30 a.m. - 1 p.m. The Hudson Institute, in conjunction with the Institute of Chinese Law & Religion, hosts the ``Freedom in China Summit 2006." Location: Hudson Institute, sixth floor, 1015 15th St. NW.

US-SAUDI ARABIA _ 9 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a discussion with Energy Secretary Bodman and Saudi Petroleum Minister Ali Al-Naimi. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

PRESS FREEDOM _ 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty hosts a briefing on the 2006 Freedom House ``Freedom of the Press" Survey on the state of press freedom in countries of the former Soviet Union. Participants include Robert Orttung of American University, Daniel Kimmage of Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, and Christopher Walker of Freedom House. Location: 1201 Connecticut Ave., N.W., 4th floor, Conference Room A.

MEDICARE RX _ 9 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. The American Enterprise Institute (AEI) hosts a discussion, ``Has the Drug Benefit Added to Medicare's Financing Woes?" Participants are: Richard Foster, Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services; John Palmer, Syracuse University; Tom Saving, Texas A&M University; Douglas Holtz-Eakin, Council on Foreign Relations. Moderator is Joseph Antos, AEI. Keynote Address by Mark McClellan, Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. Location: Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th Floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

NATURAL GAS _ 9:15 a.m. The Natural Gas Supply Association and the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers hold a media briefing on trends and post-hurricane conditions affecting the North American natural gas market. Location: Canada Room, Canadian Embassy, 501 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

US YOUTH _ 10 a.m. The National Geographic Society releases a Roper Survey showing U.S. youth poorly prepared for global future. Location: Grosvenor Auditorium, NGS, 1600 M St. NW.

DEMONSTRATION-VIGIL _ 11 a.m. Members of The Christian Defense Coalition, others, hold a prayer vigil and demonstration in support of Wenyi Wang, who was arrested at the welcoming ceremony at the White House for Chinese President Hu Jintao. Location: In front of the White House. Lafayette Park.

PARALYSIS RALLY _ 11 a.m. Disability rights and caregivers rally to focus on the Christopher Reeve Paralysis Act (CRPA). Susan Sarandon, actress, and Sens. Clinton, Harkin, and Langevin participate. Location: Upper Senate Park.

DEMOCRATS-ENERGY _ 11:30 a.m. Democrat leaders hold a news conference to release a a joint House and Senate Democratic report on Bush Administration energy policies and to call for a commitment to making America energy independent. With Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid (D-NV); House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-CA); Senator Chuck Schumer (D-NY); Congressman James E. Clyburn (D-SC); Senator Maria Cantwell (D-WA); Congressman Bart Stupak (D-MI). Location: Senate Swamp Site (intersection of Delaware and Constitution Avenues).

CONSUMERS-DEBT COLLECTORS _ 12 p.m. Public Citizen holds a telephone briefing to discuss the tactics of debt collectors masquerading as law enforcement officers. Notes: Callin number: 800-377-8846; passcode: 36707396.

HEALTH INSURANCE-TAXES _ 12 p.m. The Urban Institute holds a panel discussion on health insurance tax incentives, with Katherine Baicker, member, White House Council of Economic Advisers; Leonard Burman, Urban Institute; Robert Helms, American Enterprise Institute, and Len Nichols, director, Health Policy Program, New America Foundation. Contacts: n/a, 202-261-5709

CUSTOMS-AUDITS _ 12 p.m. - 1:30 p.m. Discussion on importer self-assessments, focused assessments, and quick-response audits with Cindy Covell, director of audits at U.S. Customs and Border Protection. Location: 1301 K St., N.W. (West Tower, 12th floor).

DOJ_NMG_0027585

HOYER _ 12:30 p.m. House Democratic Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-306, Capitol.

BOEHNER _ 1 p.m. House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

VOTING RIGHTS _ 3:45 p.m. Bipartisan House and Senate news conference to announce support for legislation to reauthorize the Voting Rights Act for an additional 25 years. With House Speaker Dennis R-IL; Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-TN; Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-NV; House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-CA; and others. Location: East steps of the House wing of the Capitol (facing U.S. Supreme Court)

LOBBYING REFORM _ 4:30 p.m. Reps. Martin Meehan and Christopher Shays hold a news conference in opposition to the lobbying reform bill. Location: Cannon Terrace.

ENDANGERED SPECIES _ 7:30 p.m. Screening of a film ``Hoot'' to mark the Endangered Species Act, with Sens. Hillary Clinton, Blanche Lincoln, Bill Nelson, Lincoln Chafee, and Rep. John Dingell, others. Location: AMC Loews Uptown Theatre, 3246 Connecticut Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, MAY 2, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Judge Harshly Criticizes Al-Arian, Imposes Prison Sentence 3
Umer Hayat Released On Bail 3
Lawyer For Former Detroit Terror Suspect Seeks Dismissal Of New Charges 3

Patriot Act:
FBI Issued NSLs For Information On More Than 3,500 In US Last Year 3

Homeland Response:
Jurors See Surveillance Tape Of NYC Subway Bomb Plotting 4
DHS, FBI To Lease Freedom Tower Offices 4
Taylor Reportedly Ready To Allow Funding For Flight 93 Memorial 4
Qatar To Announce $60 Million In Katrina Grants 4

War News:
Bush Says Iraq Mission Has Reached Turning Point 5
Iraqi Oil Production Still Below Pre-War Levels 6
Murtha Will Not Sign Discharge Petition On Withdrawal 6
Biden Suggests Partitioning Iraq Into Three Semi-Autonomous Regions 6
Sunni Army Recruits Angered By Postings Disrupt Graduation Ceremony 6
Soldiers' Guidelines Modified To Reduce Confrontations With Iraqi Civilians 7
US Troops In Ramadi Routinely Battle Insurgents "Several Times A Day." 7
Sadr Cultivates Support By Supplying Social Services 7
Shiite Women Outside Green Zone Protest Continued Violence 7
Al-Arabiya Shows Video Of Former Iraqi PM's Body Being Abused 7
Relatively Stable Babil Province Seen As Model For Iraq 7
Reluctance To Utilize Full Force By US Military Noted 7

Corporate Scandals:
Lay Contends Banks Forced Most Of His Enron Stock Sales 8
Potential Quattrone Retrial Will Have New Judge 9
Comverse Executives Quit As Options Probe Escalates 9
Former Qwest CEO Nacchio Continues Bid To Have Charges Dropped 9

Criminal Law:
Common Cause Seeks DOJ Probe Of Katherine Harris 9
Corruption Trial Of Former Alabama Governor Begins 10
Plea Deal Implicates Milberg Weiss Partners 10
Secret Service To Release Records Of Abramoff's White House Visits 10
Prosecutors Decry Leaks In Pellicano Case 10
FBI Monitoring Chicago-Based Gang's Contacts With US Soldiers 11
Gotti Lawyer Says FBI Intimidating Witnesses 11
Connecticut Fraud Investigator Reassigned Over Rowland-Era Perks 11
Defense To Begin Case Today In Philadelphia Bribery Trial 11
Prosecution Begins Closing Arguments At Nevada Bribery Trial 11
Prosecution Rests Case At Virginia Corruption Trial 12
SCOTUS Rules States May Not Bar Evidence In Criminal Trials 12
Kansas Attorney Pleads Guilty To Embezzling From Church 12
Former Morris Brown President Pleads Guilty To Embezzling Federal Funds 12
Jury Selection Begins In Maryland Trial Of Convicted DC Sniper 12
Prosecutor In Duke Rape Probe Faces Election 13

Civil Law:
Government Says Delta Overcharged For Flights 14

Civil Rights:
Chicago Schools Comes To Agreement With DOJ to End Federal Oversight 14
Judge Ends Federal Control Of Louisiana Juvenile Prisons 14
Federal Agents Arrest 66 In Human Trafficking Raids 14
Florida Man Charged With Hate Crime In Attack On NFL Player 14
North Las Vegas On Track For ADA Compliance 15
Judge Allows EEOC Racial Bias Suit Against Movie Studio To Proceed 15
Jury Considers Civil Hate-Crime Suit 15
Kristof Says Morning-After Pill Should Be Available Over The Counter 15
NYTimes Says Census Bureau Should Count Inmates In Their Home Communities 15

Antitrust:
Stevens Bill Could Slow Phone Company Efforts To Enter Cable TV Business 16

Google Expresses Concerns About Microsoft Browser 16
RIM Faces Another Patent Suit Over Blackberry 16
NYTimes Backs Efforts To Pass "Net-Neutrality" Bill 16
WSJournal Says Twombly Case Could Spark Wave Of Litigation17

Environment:

White House To Release Bird Flu Response Plan..... 17

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Critics Say FBI Struggling To Assume Top Counter-Terrorism Role..... 17
Pete Rose Jr. Sentenced For Distributing GBL 17
Four Sentenced In Illinois Meth Case 18
Medicinal Use Of Marijuana Disputed..... 18
Limbaugh Signs Deal In Prescription Fraud Case..... 18
Man Accused Of Importing, Distributing Steroids Pleads Guilty.. 18
State, Federal Investigation Continues Into Arizona Church Arson..... 19

Immigration:

Immigration Reform Rallies, Boycott Attract Hundreds Of Thousands 19

Congress-Administration:

Democrats Blast Bush For More Than 750 Signing Statements. 22
Medicare Prescription Drug Benefit Projected To Cost 20% Less22
Trustees Say Medicare, Social Security Finances Are Worsening..... 23
Bush Urges Congress To Take Steps Toward Slowing Medical Spending..... 24
Frist Retreats From Plan To Raise Oil Company Taxes 24
Frist Proposal May Sidestep Lawsuit Over Deficit Reduction Act26
Senate Republicans Seek To Reclaim Issue Of Fiscal Discipline26
Opponents Of GOP Lobbying Reform Bill Pessimistic..... 27
OPM Launches Effort To Lure Applicants To Federal Workforce 27
Pelosi Wants Ethics Investigation Of Prostitution Allegations 27
Bush Job Approval At 34% In USA Today/Gallup Poll 28
Boehner's Office Holds Weekly Meetings With Vulnerable Republicans 28
"Gang Of 14's" Deal On Judicial Nominees Seen As Win For Bush 28

Other News:

New Reports Continue To Show Strong Economy 28
Supreme Court Rules In Favor Of Anna Nicole Smith 29
Child Advocacy Group Sues Video Firms Over Child-Learning Claims 29
Quality Of Life Issues Increasingly Important To Young Attorneys..... 29
DeLay Spent Over $400,000 On Legal Defense In First Quarter Of 2006 30
Giuliani Campaigns For GOP Candidates In Iowa 30
Romney Plans Speech To Address His Religious Beliefs..... 30
Clark Eyeing Another Presidential Bid 30
Kerrey Sends Fundraising E-Mail For Kerry 30
Feith To Join Georgetown University Faculty 30
Negotiator Says Iran Won't Suspend Nuclear Enrichment Program 30
Olmert Taps Livni For Number Two Post 31
Despite Support For US, Pakistan Doesn't Get Textile Deal..... 31
Kashmir Killings Said To Target Peace Talks..... 32
Zoellick Heads To Abuja In Effort To Salvage Darfur Talks 32
Bolivian President Nationalizes Gas Industry 32
Poll Shows Conservative Now Leading Mexican Presidential Race..... 33
Taylor's Arrest Said To Continue Positive Trend..... 33
CO2 Emissions Market Takes Hit Following EU Report 33
US, Japan Urge China To Disclose Details Of Arms Build-Up.... 33
Grassley Claims ONDCP Figures On Colombian Drug Production Are Inconsistent..... 33
Al Risala Said To Represent New Generation Of Islamic Television..... 33
Sufism, Formerly Banned, Said To Be Resurgent In Saudi Arabia..... 34
In Break With Tradition, Turkish Government Appoints Female Preachers..... 34
Blair Seeks To Avert Disaster For Labour In Thursday's Elections 34
France's Le Pen Will Seek Presidency Again..... 34
Dutch Immigration Requirements Include Language Test, Tolerance Film 34
Hyperinflation In Zimbabwe Adds To Desperation 34
Prime Minister Celebrates Referendum On Montenegrin Independence From Serbs 34
Russians Seen As Suspicious Of West's Human Rights Rhetoric34

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 34

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 35

DOJ_NMG_0027588

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Harshly Criticizes Al-Arian, Imposes Prison Sentence. In a story distributed widely by Knight Ridder, the Orlando Sentinel (5/2, Gutierrez, 265K) reports, "Branding him a 'master manipulator,' a federal judge on Monday sentenced…Sami Al-Arian to 57 months in prison for aiding members of a terrorist group. The prison term dashed Al-Arian's hope that he would be given time served and be released to immigration authorities for immediate deportation." US District Judge James Moody said to Al-Arian during the sentencing, "When it came to blowing up children and women on buses, did you leap into action? No. … On the contrary, you laughed when you heard about the attacks." His "unexpected strong words and sentence…stung" Al-Arian's "family and supporters while they vindicated federal prosecutors." The AP (5/2, Stacy) adds, "Dismissing defense contentions that money raised by Al-Arian and his co-defendants went to support Palestinian charities, Moody said: 'Your only connection to widows and orphans was that you create them.' … U.S. Attorney Paul Perez claimed victory, saying the pursuit of Al-Arian allowed federal agents to identify and disrupt a terrorist cell operating in this country. The plea vindicated the prosecution, which some had criticized as being political and an attack on free speech, he said." The Tampa Tribune (5/2, Silvestrini) notes, "Before being sentenced, Al-Arian said he takes full responsibility for his actions and praised the jury for their courage."

The New York Times (5/2, Steinhauer, 1.19M) calls the sentence was "a surprise move" and adds that "the jury verdict, which embarrassed prosecutors who had devoted considerable resources to the case, underscored the complexities of obtaining convictions under the USA Patriot Act and other recent laws that criminalized aiding organizations that the United States has deemed to be based on terror. For example, in the 30 previous efforts to convict a defendant of conspiring to contribute money to a terrorist organization — one of the charges against Mr. Al-Arian — 28 were dismissed, according to the Terrorism Research Center at the University of Arkansas." Additionally, The Washington Post (5/2, A7, 744K) reports a truncated version of the AP story in "Nation In Brief," and The New York Sun (5/2, Gerstein) reports on the sentencing under the headline "Judge Stuns Al-Arian With Maximum Time."

WPost Says DOJ Should Not Claim Victory With Al-Arian Deal. The Washington Post (5/2, A20, 744K) editorializes that DOJ "described the deal as if it were a big win in the war on terrorism." However "the government has settled this case on terms under which Mr. al-Arian will go free in less than two years. It's not clear whether the government charged Mr. al-Arian too aggressively or simply put on a bad performance at trial. In either event it ill becomes the government to claim victory."

Umer Hayat Released On Bail. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (5/2, Thompson) reports "ice cream vendor" Umer Hayat was released Monday on $390,000 bail. He "will be confined to his home…and was fitted with an electronic monitoring device." The AP notes that Hayat "was charged with two counts of lying to the FBI about his son's attendance at the training camp, but his case ended in a mistrial last week after the jury said it was deadlocked. Prosecutors must decide by Friday if they will seek a new trial."

Lawyer For Former Detroit Terror Suspect Seeks Dismissal Of New Charges. The Detroit News (5/1, Egan) reported, "Lawyers for Karim Koubriti, the Detroit man whose terrorism-related conviction was tossed out as a result of alleged wrongdoing by former federal prosecutor Richard Convertino, say in light of the alleged misconduct the charge against him should be dropped." However, "the government argues there is no evidence of misconduct related to Koubriti's most recent indictment, which was brought…by different prosecutors after Convertino was removed from the case. … Koubriti is accused of submitting phony claims for lost wages and other expenses after he was a passenger in a car driven by one of his co-defendants."

PATRIOT ACT:

FBI Issued NSLs For Information On More Than 3,500 In US Last Year. As reported by AP and the Los Angeles Times yesterday, the Washington Post (5/2, A4, Eggen, 744K) reports, "The FBI sought personal information on thousands of Americans last year from banks, Internet service providers and other companies without having to seek approval from a court, according to new data released by the Justice Department," which "disclosed that the FBI had issued more than 9,200 'national security letters,'…seeking detailed information about more than 3,500 U.S. citizens or legal residents in 2005." The Post notes, "The new statistics provide the latest measure of the government's rapidly expanding anti-terrorism activities, which include a wide range of secret warrants and powers aimed at monitoring suspicious behavior and preventing attacks." The ACLU's Caroline Fredrickson said of DOJ report, "The idea that this kind of power resides in the hands of so many people at the FBI with no court oversight is very troubling."

DOJ_NMG_0027589

DOJ Reports 18% Rise In FISA Warrant Approvals In 2005. USA Today (5/2, 7A, 2.31M) reports FISA terror investigation wiretaps "increased 18% last year, the Justice Department said Monday. There were 2,072 FISA warrants in 2005, up from 1,754 a year earlier. The warrants are separate from a program under which President Bush authorized the National Security Agency to monitor, without warrants, international calls and e-mails of people in the USA when one party to the conversation may be linked to terrorists." ACLU lawyer Jesselyn McCurdy "said she was concerned that judges are "becoming a rubber stamp."

NYTimes Editor Defends Decision To Publish NSA Eavesdropping Story. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (5/2, 2.11M), Bill Keller, Executive Editor of the New York Times, writes, "Most American newspapers, including yours and mine, try hard to separate the curiosity-driven world of reporters and editors from the ideology-driven world of editorial writers and columnists. … In the case of the eavesdropping story, President Bush and other figures in his administration were given abundant opportunities to explain why they felt our information should not be published. We considered the evidence presented to us, agonized over it, delayed publication because of it. In the end, their case did not stand up to the evidence our reporters amassed, and we judged that the responsible course was to publish what we knew and let readers assess it themselves."

State, Local Police Also Conducting Domestic Surveillance Operations. U.S. News and World Report (5/8, Kaplan) reports in its cover story, "U.S. News has identified nearly a dozen cases in which city and county police, in the name of homeland security, have surveilled or harassed animal-rights and antiwar protesters, union activists, and even library patrons surfing the Web. Unlike with Washington's warrantless domestic surveillance program, little attention has been focused on the role of state and local authorities in the war on terrorism. A U.S. News inquiry found that federal officials have funneled hundreds of millions of dollars into once discredited state and local police intelligence operations." US News adds, "In dozens of interviews, officials across the nation have stressed that the enhanced intelligence work is vital to the nation's security, but even its biggest boosters worry about a lack of training and standards."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Jurors See Surveillance Tape Of NYC Subway Bomb Plotting. The New York Times (5/2, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports the testimony of a "paid police informer who is the central witness at the trial of a Pakistani immigrant charged with plotting to blow up the Herald Square subway station" is "shedding light on what seem to be new police tactics to uncover terrorist plots before they come to fruition. While a federal judge gave the police expanded powers in 2003, critics have nonetheless raised objections to the use of informers in places of worship, political events and other gatherings." The Times notes most of the informers testimony concerned conversations he overheard in NYC area mosques.

DHS, FBI To Lease Freedom Tower Offices. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Frangos, 2.11M) reports, "the rebuilt World Trade Center's signature Freedom Tower is also likely to be a government citadel housing federal law-enforcement groups among other government agencies -- possibly enhancing its profile as a terrorist target." The Journal notes that among prospective tenants are the Department of Homeland Security's Customs and Border Protection, and Immigration and Customs Enforcement; as well as the Secret Service and the FBI.

Taylor Reportedly Ready To Allow Funding For Flight 93 Memorial. Roll Call (5/2, Ben Pershing) reports that "in the face of pressure from his fellow House Republicans," Rep. Charles Taylor "is expected to insert federal funding for a memorial to the passengers and crew of Flight 93 into the fiscal 2007 Interior spending bill this week." Roll Call notes Taylor "has been under siege since The Washington Post first reported that the chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on Interior was refusing to provide federal dollars to help purchase land for the construction of the memorial."

Qatar To Announce $60 Million In Katrina Grants. The New York Times (5/2, Strom, 1.19M) reports, "The nation of Qatar plans to announce today roughly $60 million in grants to benefit the victims of Hurricane Katrina, including $17.5 million to Xavier University of Louisiana." The nation's US ambassador, Nasser Bin Hamad M. al-Khalifa, "said the remainder of the $100 million his country had pledged would be assigned in the coming months. … To identify projects Qatar might want to support, the ambassador and his representatives talked to relief organizations, educators, members of Congress and other experts, and some embassy staff members traveled to the region."

Dionne Says FEMA Needs Liberation From DHS, "Competent" Managers. E.J. Dionne Jr., in his column for the Washington Post (5/2, A21, 744K) writes that Sens. Susan Collins and Joseph Lieberman, who have released the results of a Senate investigation of the response to Hurricane Katrina that calls for FEMA to be dismantled and rebuilt, "are creative public servants." Dionne continues that FEMA "would work better if the administration takes their 86 ideas for reform seriously," but "there is something maddening about the Washington tendency to go for complicated, bureaucratic fixes for what are essentially human failures. These can often be remedied by taking an agency's mission seriously and appointing good people to carry it out." Dionne asks, "Why not just liberate it from DHS, as Sens. Trent Lott, Barbara Boxer, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Rep. Tom Davis have suggested, and make sure that competent people run FEMA?"

DOJ_NMG_0027590

WAR NEWS:

Bush Says Iraq Mission Has Reached Turning Point. President Bush's remarks on the anniversary of his "Mission Accomplished" speech were not heavily covered by the media. For example, all three networks noted it, though none afforded it much prominence. NBC and ABC both waited until well into their broadcasts to air their reports, each less than a minute in length, carrying them ninth and sixth in their lineups respectively. CBS' coverage of the event was more comprehensive, but also left out of the top stories of the day.

Bush delivered his remarks in a White House appearance with Secretary of State Rice and Defense Secretary Rumsfeld, recently returned from a visit to Iraq. All three networks, as well as much of the print coverage, described the president's message as generally optimistic though less so that three years ago. Most reports noted his remarks that the mission had reached a "turning point," in reference to the establishment of the new Iraqi government. The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 6, 2:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Today marks the third anniversary of what many thought at the time was one of the cleverest photo-ops ever. Even opponents of the Iraq invasion were impressed when the President flew onto an aircraft carrier decked out in a dashing flight suit and then spoke beneath a banner that said 'mission accomplished.' But it turned out not to be. … After meeting with his Secretaries of State and Defense, the best the President could say was things are finally looking up." Bush was shown saying, "We believe this is a turning point for the Iraqi citizens and it's a new chapter in our partnership."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/1, Blitzer) noted Bush "never said mission accomplished" in his remarks yesterday," while ABC World News Tonight (5/1, story 6, :40, Vargas, 8.78M) reported Bush "said Iraq faces challenges. But he hailed the formation of a new Iraqi government as a turning point." Bush was shown saying, "Obviously, there's some difficult days ahead because there's terrorists there that are willing to take innocent life, in order to stop the progress of democracy. But this government is more determined than ever to succeed. And we believe we've got partners to help the Iraqi people realize their dreams."

Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (5/1, story 9, 0:40, Williams, 9.87M) also noted yesterday marked "the third anniversary of…Bush's so-called 'mission accomplished' speech aboard the aircraft carrier USS Abraham Lincoln. On that day he declared, 'The tyrant has fallen and Iraq is free.'" Yesterday, "the message was less upbeat, with the President pronouncing Iraq's new unity government 'more determined than ever to succeed.'" The President "acknowledged there will be more tough days ahead. By the way, the US death toll in the war is nearing 2,400."

The AP (5/2, Loven) reports Bush "declared another turning point had arrived with the establishment of a permanent government in Baghdad." Bush said the new Iraqi leaders "need to know that we stand with them.'" According to the AP, Bush "walked a fine line between celebrating achievements and warning of more sacrifices to come." Though Bush "was careful not to declare overall victory and warned of difficult work ahead, the speech was congratulatory in tone and aimed at marking a pivot from invasion to reconstruction."

The Washington Times (5/2, Curl, 90K) notes Bush also "warned there will be 'tough days ahead' in Iraq, as Democrats pointed out that the president uttered nearly the same words three years ago to the day." Bush said Rumsfeld and Rice "talked with the new Iraqi leaders about the need to 'establish control over the militias and other unauthorized armed groups and enforce the rule of law.'"

84% Say Iraq Mission "Has Not Been Accomplished." CNN's The Situation Room (5/1, Blitzer) reports, "Tonight, our new poll shows the vast majority of Americans, 84 percent, say the mission in Iraq has not been accomplished. Will it eventually be accomplished? Americans clearly divided on that question. Forty-nine percent say yes, 44 percent say no in this CNN poll conducted by Opinion Research Corporation."

Only 30% Approve Of Bush Handling Of Iraq. The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 6, 2:10, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "Three years ago when the President appeared on the deck of the USS Lincoln, 74% of those polled approved of the way the President was handling Iraq. But contrast that with the latest CBS News poll -- just 30% now approve of the way the President is handling Iraq. That's 44%, Bob, in three years."

Rice, Rumsfeld Iraq Trip Called "High-Stakes Gamble." U.S. News and World Report (5/8, Whitelaw) reports that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld "staged an unusual joint surprise visit to the Iraqi capital last week. … The promise of a national unity government has been something of a political lifeline for the Bush administration in its search for some way to declare victory in Iraq and begin withdrawing significant numbers of U.S. troops. Rice and Rumsfeld are clearly hoping that [Nouri al-Maliki's] appointment [as prime minister] will mark a turning point in a conflict that has dragged down President Bush's poll numbers to the lowest point in his tenure. But Maliki faces a herculean set of challenges in trying to keep this shattered, divided nation from slipping deeper into chaos." The Rice-Rumsfeld mission "was a high-stakes gamble for the Bush administration, which has already been accused of playing a heavy-handed role in Iraqi politics."

DOJ_NMG_0027591

Reid Calls Attention To US Soldiers Killed In Iraq. The AP (5/2, Loven) notes congressional Democrats' leaders used the anniversary to criticize Bush. Senate minority leader Harry Reid "stood on the Senate floor in front of a picture of Bush with…the phrase 'Mission Accomplished' and read the names of the 16 troops from his home state of Nevada who had been killed. Reid called it…'a public relations stunt gone horribly wrong.'"

The Washington Times (5/2, Curl, 90K) reports Reid "accused the president of manipulating prewar intelligence and said U.S. intervention in Iraq to disarm Saddam Hussein has increased terrorism around the world."

Kennedy Reiterates Vote Against Iraq War Was His Best Senate Vote Ever. Sen. Edward Kennedy, on MSNBC's Hardball (5/1, Matthews), said, "The best vote I cast in the United States Senate was for not going to the war. This was the wrong war at the wrong time. … We had Osama bin Laden on the run and suddenly this administration deflected that and went to war in Iraq."

Iraqi Oil Production Still Below Pre-War Levels. The Washington Times (5/2, Scarborough, 90K) reports Iraqi insurgents have "come up with new ways to pierce Iraq's vital oil industry, keeping the daily flow below prewar levels despite an emerging protection force and a reduced number of attacks. New numbers this week from the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction (SIGIR) show oil production at 2.18 million barrels per day, 400,000 below 2003 prewar levels." The Times notes the Bush administration "once projected that Iraq would be rebuilt principally from Iraqi oil revenues, but that prediction has fallen by the wayside."

Iraq Reconstruction IG Reports Mixed Results. ABC World News Tonight (5/1, story 7, :25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The inspector general monitoring the rebuilding of Iraq has presented a mixed picture of the $21 billion US effort. 5,100 schools have been repaired. And more Iraqis have drinking water, sewerage treatment and cell phones than before the war. But oil production is below pre-war levels. And while repairs to the railway stations are nearly complete, just 4% of the trains are running because it is too dangerous."

Murtha Will Not Sign Discharge Petition On Withdrawal. The Hill (5/2, Tiron) reports Rep. John Murtha "has never signed a discharge petition in his 32 years in Congress, and he refuses to bend, even if signing one means attracting more attention to the debate on the war in Iraq." Last year Rep. Neil Abercrombie "filed a motion to discharge the House Rules Committee from considering a resolution sponsored by Abercrombie and 67 other members that would require President Bush to develop and implement a plan for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq." Murtha "said he does not think it is appropriate to sign a discharge petition and disregard the committee process."

Biden Suggests Partitioning Iraq Into Three Semi-Autonomous Regions. The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports Sen. Joseph R. Biden "suggested the creation of separate, autonomous regions for Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds to counter continuing ethnic and religious violence." Biden's proposal "would give each of the major ethnic and religious groups in Iraq broad authority to run local affairs. The central government in Baghdad would be given limited, but specific, responsibilities for border defense, foreign policy, oil production and revenues." The Times notes the White House "quickly denounced the idea."

The Washington Times (5/2, Bellantoni, 90K) reports Biden "promoted the idea as a 'third way that can bring our troops home, protect our fundamental security interests and preserve Iraq as a unified country' in a speech to the World Affairs Council of Philadelphia and in an opinion piece published in yesterday's New York Times. 'The choice I'm proposing can give all of us...realistic hope that our sacrifices in Iraq were not in vain,' he said."

Iraqis Seen As Already Partitioning Country. The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 6, 2:10, Pizzey, 7.66M) reported the Iraqi people "may well think a corner has been turned, Bob, but not quite the corner the President is talking about. People here are very much looking to protect themselves, they're not thinking in terms of nation right now." The "idea of partition" suggested by Biden is "actually more of a statement of what's actually happening here on the ground. We're finding that people are fleeing neighborhoods where they're in the minority and, in fact, you're getting people coalescing along ethnic lines and they're looking not to the state for protection but ethnically-based militias. That's partition any way you cut it."

Sunni Army Recruits Angered By Postings Disrupt Graduation Ceremony. The Washington Post (5/2, A13, Hernandez, 744K) reports the "graduation of nearly 1,000 new Iraqi army soldiers in restive Anbar province took a disorderly turn Sunday when dozens of the men declared that they would refuse to serve outside their home areas, according to U.S. and Iraqi military authorities." The

DOJ_NMG_0027592

Post continues, "The 978 soldiers, most of them Sunni Muslims, had just finished nearly five weeks of military training and were parading before a review stand" when "some soldiers started tearing their clothes off to demonstrate their rage." According to the Post, video of the incident "aired on the al-Jazeera and al-Arabiya television networks throughout Monday gave the impression of a near-riot."

The New York Times (5/2, Oppel, Hassan, 1.19M) reports Lt. Col. Michael Negard, a spokesman for the American military, "called the episode an isolated incident and said the Iraqi troops had soon calmed down and marched off to eat at the chow hall. He said he did not know whether soldiers were later disciplined." Negard added that the soldiers "were never promised that they would serve in their hometowns."

Soldiers' Guidelines Modified To Reduce Confrontations With Iraqi Civilians. The New York Times (5/2, Shanker, 1.19M) reports the US military is "taking steps intended to lessen the chance for violent confrontations between…troops and innocent Iraqis during…daily routines." According to the Times, "The changes reflect deep worries that the conduct of American soldiers continues to alienate many Iraqis." Examples of new policies include "substituting…gentler warnings for the firing of warning shots" and "using strobe lights to make sure" Iraqis can see US checkpoints. The Times goes on to note some unit commanders "say the guidelines may make it harder to protect their troops." An anonymous "field-grade officer" is quoted as saying, "The restrained approach, as it is manifesting itself on the ground, is beginning to significantly handcuff our soldiers."

US Troops In Ramadi Routinely Battle Insurgents "Several Times A Day." The AP (5/2, Pitman) reports that Ramadi is "the most dangerous city in Iraq for U.S. forces…with militants and American troops exchanging fire several times a day — at least." The AP goes on to describe the routine of soldiers occupying "the Ramadi Inn," which has "panoramic views" of "an urban wasteland crawling with insurgents." The troops "say the militants are…casing their positions…looking from afar through binoculars and video cameras. … Troops sit with binoculars 24 hours a day. They brace for attacks, watch for guerrillas and keep an eye out for battles."

Sadr Cultivates Support By Supplying Social Services. Knight Ridder (5/2, Youssef) reports Muqtada al-Sadr "is working behind the scenes to maintain his armed militant wing and portray it as a social movement, a step that would make him one of Iraq's most powerful figures if it succeeds, U.S. officials and Iraqi politicians say." Knight Ridder adds that US and Iraqi officials contend al-Sadr is trying to recreate the model of Hezbollah, which "began largely as an armed group," but "eventually became a powerful political force with a large social-service component." Sadr's "shift is a symptom of a growing rift" within the Shiite United Iraqi Alliance, that "pits al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia against members of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq."

Shiite Women Outside Green Zone Protest Continued Violence. USA Today/AP (5/2) reports approximately 200 Shiites, "many of them women in full-length black abayas, rallied Monday outside the Green Zone to demand that U.S. and Iraqi forces do more to stop attacks on Iraqis." The AP notes, "Such demonstrations are rare in Baghdad because of fears large groups might attract suicide bombers."

Al-Arabiya Shows Video Of Former Iraqi PM's Body Being Abused. The Washington Post (5/2, A13, Hernandez, Al-Izzi, 744K) reports the body of Muhammad Hamza al-Zubaydi, a former prime minister of Iraq "was kicked and insulted after U.S. forces transferred it into Iraqi custody, according to a video of the incident that aired on al-Arabiya television on Monday evening." Zubayd "was set to face charges in the special tribunal trying Hussein on war crimes charges, but in December he "died of natural causes while in U.S. custody."

Relatively Stable Babil Province Seen As Model For Iraq. In an op-ed for the New York Times (5/2, 1.19M) Bartle Breese Bull, the foreign editor of Prospect magazine, writes that Babil "could well turn out to be the country's crucial province. … If Iraq still exists five years from now…then Babil will have been a major reason for the success. What Iraqis care about above all else these days is security, and Babil — apart from the so-called Death Triangle around the towns of Latifiya, Mahmudiya and Yusufiya in the Sunni north — is a safe place."

Reluctance To Utilize Full Force By US Military Noted. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (5/2, 2.11M) the Hoover Institution's Shelby Steele writes, "There is something rather odd in the way America has come to fight its wars since World War II. For one thing, it is now unimaginable that we would use anything approaching the full measure of our military power (the nuclear option aside) in the wars we fight. … Despite our vast power, we are only slogging along -- if admirably -- in Iraq," but "no one -- including, very likely, the insurgents themselves -- believes that America lacks the raw power to defeat this insurgency if it wants to."

DOJ_NMG_0027593

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Lay Contends Banks Forced Most Of His Enron Stock Sales. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, McWilliams, Emshwiller) reports, "In an effort to repair damage done to his credibility, former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay and his attorney challenged a government claim that his son had shown a lack of faith in the company's stock by selling it 'short' in expectation of a decline." The Journal continues, "The effort came in the fifth day of Mr. Lay's testimony in the conspiracy and fraud trial of him and his co-defendant, former Enron President Jeffrey Skilling. Yesterday afternoon, prosecutor John Hueston continued to hammer away at Mr. Lay for his actions in the months prior to Enron's December 2001 collapse." The Journal adds, "Last week, Mr. Hueston had seemed to score a point when he surprised Mr. Lay with evidence that the former executive's son, Mark, had in March 2001 bet against, or shorted, Enron stock. Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling have both asserted professional short sellers attacked Enron's stock, contributing to the collapse. … While Mark Lay's trading records show several short sales, the elder Mr. Lay's attorney, George Secrest, focused on other parts of those records indicating that Enron stock had been moved into the brokerage account later the same day. Mr. Secrest and his client agreed that Mark Lay put in a sale order that apparently got listed as a short sale. … Yesterday morning, Mr. Hueston pushed to add new items to a list of purported misstatements by Mr. Lay. He noted Mr. Lay had repeatedly claimed that he was 'forced' in 2001 to sell $70 million of Enron stock back to the company to pay off pressing margin calls on private loans. The prosecutor also noted that Mr. Lay had previously testified he tried to hold on to as many Enron shares as possible because he believed they were undervalued."

USA Today (5/2, Farrell) reports, "Under questioning from prosecutor John Hueston, Lay acknowledged that some stock sales, which did not have to be immediately disclosed to the investing public, were used to fund his lifestyle. But Lay maintained that after he regained the CEO title in August 2001, when his co-defendant and former CEO Jeff Skilling resigned, he sold Enron stock only because he had no other liquid assets." USA adds, "Prosecutors displayed documents showing that even while Lay was buying $4 million in Enron stock at that time, he was unloading more than $20 million worth of stock through a line-of-credit program at Enron that did not require immediate public disclosure of the sales. … Lay sold his Enron stock to pay down personal debt even though he had access to about $19 million in cash and other stocks that could be sold quickly. In addition to his stocks, Lay also owned a $10 million luxury apartment in Houston and $20 million in other real estate holdings, mostly his three homes in Aspen, Colo."

The Washington Post (5/2, D1, Johnson) reports that "as Lay, 64, prepares to exit the witness stand in his fraud trial Tuesday, the central question is whether his appearance did more harm than good. … . On Monday, with the government using his personal finances against him to sometimes brutal effect, Lay tried to fend off accusations that he chose to quietly sell more than $70 million in stock back to Enron, rather than liquidate real estate and other investments as the company spiraled downward." The Post notes that Hueston "painted Lay as a man so addicted to an extravagant lifestyle, and so centered on his personal needs, that he 'maxed out' his corporate line of credit a day before Enron's ill-fated merger with rival Dynegy cratered. Five days later, in December 2001, the company filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection, and thousands of employees lost their jobs and retirement savings. … For his part, Lay insisted that he always believed Enron's stock price would swing back upward and that, as banks began to call in nearly $100 million in personal debts in 2001, he was 'hoping and praying that each and every time would be the last time' he would be forced to sell stock." The Post adds, "In one of the biggest surprises of the 14-week-old trial, Lay never appeared entirely comfortable in five days on the witness stand, particularly for a man who once moved easily among world leaders, corporate titans and religious figures. His lead attorney, Michael W. Ramsey, left the case midstream with heart trouble, requiring the defense to regroup. For the first couple of days of his testimony last week, Lay struggled to find the right tone. … Instead, he sometimes seemed far more aggrieved by his treatment by the government than grief-stricken over the plight of Enron workers and investors who lost billions of dollars because of Enron's demise."

The AP (5/2, Hays) reports that Lay "again flashed his temper to prosecutor John Hueston, comparing Hueston's second-guessing of his decisions during Enron's downward spiral to carving up a corpse." The AP adds, "Lay was confronted with e-mails and survey responses from October 2001 in which employees raised questions about accounting 'trickery' and Enron's business ethics. .. One veteran Enron employee said, 'I've lost all respect for Enron senior management' and suggested it was criminal for Enron executives to exercise stock options when they knew accounting tricks were being used to manipulate earnings. … At the time, about six weeks before Enron sought bankruptcy protection, its stock price was falling fast, and The Wall Street Journal was raising questions about unusual business partnerships created by Enron Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow. … When prosecutor John Hueston asked Lay why he did not question Fastow directly, Lay responded that 'I was getting information from all sides' and said other senior officers thought the Journal and others were on a 'witch hunt' against Fastow."

DOJ_NMG_0027594

Potential Quattrone Retrial Will Have New Judge. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Davies, Smith) reports, "A new judge has been assigned to oversee the possible retrial of former star investment banker Frank Quattrone, whose 2004 conviction on obstruction-of-justice charges was overturned in March1." The Journal continues, "U.S. District Judge George Daniels will replace Judge Lewis Kaplan, who was assigned to the case last week but recused himself because he worked at Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison LLP, the law firm overseeing Mr. Quattrone's defense. Judge Kaplan had been given the case after the appeals-court panel overturned the verdict, citing errors by the case's original trial judge, Richard Owen." The Journal adds, "Prosecutors haven't announced whether they plan to seek a retrial. They confirmed last week that two new prosecutors -- William Johnson and Raymond Lohier -- have been assigned to the case. Mr. Johnson and former assistant U.S. Attorney David Anders won an accounting-fraud conviction against former WorldCom CEO Bernard Ebbers. Mr. Anders, who prosecuted the last trial against Mr. Quattrone, is now an attorney at Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz. Mr. Lohier won a securities-fraud conviction earlier this year against Richard Adelson, the former Chief Executive of Impath Inc."

Comverse Executives Quit As Options Probe Escalates. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Bandler, Forelle) reports, "The chief executive and two other officials of Comverse Technology Inc. resigned as a board probe of possible backdating of stock-options grants gathered steam at the company." The Journal notes, "The departures, effective immediately, include Kobi Alexander, chairman, CEO and a founder of the New York telecommunications-software company; Chief Financial Officer David Kreinberg; and Senior General Counsel William Sorin. … Separately, the board of another company facing options scrutiny, medical-insurance giant UnitedHealth Group Inc., approved a new set of management-compensation guidelines, including the establishment of a fixed date each year for granting options to existing employees." The Journal adds, "The moves come as the Securities and Exchange Commission is engaged in a wide-ranging examination of options practices. The SEC is investigating whether grants were backdated or granted ahead of favorable news to give recipients a better chance of profiting from exercising the options."

Former Qwest CEO Nacchio Continues Bid To Have Charges Dropped. The Wall Street Journal (5/2) reports, "In a series of legal filings yesterday, attorneys for Joseph Nacchio continued their bid to have criminal insider-trading charges against the former Qwest Communications International Inc. chief executive dismissed." The Journal continues, "In filings in U.S. District Court here, Mr. Nacchio's attorney Herbert Stern argued that prosecutors didn't make it clear that to commit a crime, Mr. Nacchio must have based his decision to sell Qwest stock on insider information. Mr. Nacchio says he didn't act on the basis of insider information. The distinction between selling while in possession of inside information and selling on the basis of inside information has been debated between the two sides. … No trial date has been set."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Common Cause Seeks DOJ Probe Of Katherine Harris. The AP (5/2) reports, "A congressional watchdog group asked the Justice Department on Monday to investigate whether Rep. Katherine Harris, R-Fla., attempted to obtain a $10 million appropriation for a defense contractor in return for his financial support." The AP continues, "Common Cause filed a complaint with the Justice Department, citing information provided by contractor Mitchell Wade, as part of a plea agreement in the bribery case of convicted former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, R-Calif. … Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said the department does not comment on, or confirm, criminal investigations."

The Orlando Sentinel (5/2) reports, "Common Cause wants to know whether Harris broke the law when she and Mitchell Wade met at an exclusive Georgetown restaurant in early 2005. At that dinner -- which cost Wade up to $2,800 -- Wade offered to hold a fundraiser for Harris and sought her help obtaining $10 million in federal money." The Sentinel continues, "Common Cause's director of ethics campaigns said there is sufficient evidence to suggest Harris submitted the appropriations request in exchange for Wade's fundraising support. … 'There's certainly the appearance of a quid pro quo,' said Mike Surrusco. 'We absolutely think this complaint has merit.'" The Sentinel adds, "Harris spokesman Chris Ingram would not comment on the complaint Sunday, saying he had not yet seen it. He suggested Common Cause was politically motivated, saying that 'different liberal interest groups' were trying to undermine Harris' U.S. Senate campaign against Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson."

The Tampa Tribune (5/2, Epstein) reports, "The Justice Department has kept the scope of its investigation of the defense contractor, MZM Inc., under wraps, though it has already netted a California congressman for accepting favors and bribes in exchange for earmarks."

DOJ_NMG_0027595

Corruption Trial Of Former Alabama Governor Begins. The AP (5/2, Johnson) reports, "The corruption trial of former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman opened Monday with prosecutors accusing him of scheming with his chief of staff to obtain bribes for state help, including assistance allegedly sought by then-HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy." The AP continues, "Siegelman's lawyer countered that the federal case was built on the lies of unbelievable witnesses who have pleaded guilty in the case and are hoping for lenient sentences. … 'The government is going to have to call a bunch of liars, a bunch of con artists, a bunch of thieves,' said attorney Vince Kilborn." The AP adds, "The opening statements showed the trial of Siegelman, Scrushy and two former members of Siegelman's administration may hinge largely on the testimony of two former government insiders - Nick Bailey, once a close aide to Siegelman, and Lanny Young, a lobbyist and landfill developer with clout in the Siegelman administration. … Both have pleaded guilty and won't be sentenced until after the trial, which is going on as Siegelman, a Democrat, campaigns for another term as governor."

The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Bauerlein) reports, "In opening arguments at the trial of Messrs. Scrushy, Siegelman and two other defendants, Louis V. Franklin Sr., criminal-division chief of the U.S. attorney's office (in Montgomery, AL), said Mr. Scrushy helped fuel the Birmingham, Ala., company's growth by exchanging money for political favors. … 'Fob James didn't win, folks,' Mr. Franklin said, referring to the incumbent Republican governor whom Mr. Siegelman, a Democrat, defeated in 1998. Mr. Scrushy had backed Gov. James, so he 'had to scramble,' Mr. Franklin added. Prosecutors allege Mr. Scrushy made two hidden payments to then-Gov. Siegelman in 1999 and 2000 to get a spot on a state regulatory panel that oversees HealthSouth." The Journal adds, "Defense lawyer Fred D. Gray, known for his work on landmark civil-rights cases, told jurors that Mr. Scrushy hadn't done anything illegal and was a good citizen and humanitarian whose actions are 'typical of the people I've represented for the last 50 years in this court, including Rosa Parks and Martin Luther King Jr.'"

Plea Deal Implicates Milberg Weiss Partners. The California Recorder (5/2, Scheck) reports, "It took six years and a detour through Beverly Hills, but on Friday, federal prosecutors in Los Angeles finally got their first guilty plea in the long-running investigation of the class action plaintiffs firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman. … And it looks to be a significant one: in saying that he and his family took nearly $2.5 million in illegal kickbacks from Milberg Weiss in exchange for serving as lead plaintiffs in several class actions, Howard Vogel fingered four partners at the New York firm and agreed to cooperate in the ongoing investigation." The Recorder adds, "Vogel and Milberg -- referred to as 'the New York Law Firm' – 'had an established pattern and practice that the New York Law Firm would secretly pay defendant Vogel a percentage of the attorneys' fees that the New York Law Firm obtained in class actions and shareholder derivative actions,' prosecutors alleged in a document charging Vogel with a single count of making false statements in federal court. … Plea documents also allege that a high-profile Denver criminal defense attorney and a small New York real estate firm passed Vogel payments from Milberg in cases stretching from 1991 to 2005."

Secret Service To Release Records Of Abramoff's White House Visits. The AP (5/2, Locy) reports the Secret Service "has agreed to turn over White House visitor logs that will show how often convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff met with Bush administration officials — and with whom he met." US District Judge John Garrett Penn "last Tuesday approved an agreement between the Secret Service and Judicial Watch, a public interest group, that requires the agency to produce records of Abramoff's visits from Jan. 1, 2001, to the present." Administration officials "have refused to say how many times Abramoff, who raised at least $100,000 for President Bush's re-election, has been to the White House. Bush has said he doesn't know Abramoff."

Prosecutors Decry Leaks In Pellicano Case. The AP (5/2, Deutsch) reports, "Troubled by leaks to the media, a federal prosecutor said Monday he would delay filing grand jury transcripts and other crucial documents in the case of an indicted Hollywood private eye because he fears the material will 'end up on the front page.' … Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Saunders also confirmed during the federal court hearing that the U.S. Justice Department had launched an investigation to determine who leaked confidential FBI reports to The New York Times." The AP continues, "The wiretapping case against private detective Anthony Pellicano and other defendants has drawn in a growing list of celebrities, and with them increasing media attention. … The confidential information began showing up two weeks ago in the Times, which cited FBI interviews with top Hollywood power brokers. … 'We have no confidence that these will not end up on the front page of the newspaper,' Saunders told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer on Monday in saying he would delay other filings." The AP notes, "A number of lawyers attended the hearing to say neither they nor their clients were responsible for the leaks. Some said they had not even seen the files before the material began appearing in print. … 'Let me say unequivocally this did not come from the Pellicano camp or on the directive of Mr. Pellicano,' said attorney Steve Gruel, who represents Pellicano. 'I did not have these materials when they started appearing in the paper.' … The judge said she was not convinced there had been a violation of her protective order limiting access to the information to prosecutors, investigators, defense attorneys and their clients." The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Blankstein, 958K) adds, "Federal authorities, in the meantime, delayed plans to unseal three of six searches conducted by FBI agents at Pellicano's Sunset Boulevard offices and one of the private investigator's storage lockers. Attorney Carmen Trutanich asked Fischer to keep search warrant affidavits sealed on behalf of two clients he described in court only as 'John Does.' Law enforcement sources who asked not to be named…said Trutanich is representing John Rottger and actor Steven Seagal."

DOJ_NMG_0027596

NYTimes Corrects Source In Pellicano Story. The New York Times (5/2, 1.19M) reports in "Corrections" that the story yesterday "about the friendship between Ron Meyer, president of Universal Studios, and Anthony Pellicano…referred imprecisely to the sources on which the article was based. It was based on government evidence, including written summaries of interviews by F.B.I. agents with witnesses in the case, not on interviews with F.B.I. agents."

FBI Monitoring Chicago-Based Gang's Contacts With US Soldiers. The Chicago Tribune (5/2, Sheehan, 643K) reports, "The FBI has assigned an agent to monitor any connections between U.S. soldiers and a Chicago-based gang alliance, federal agents said. Of particular concern are reports that the Folk Nation…is placing young members in the military in an effort to gather information about weapons and tactics, said FBI Special Agent Andrea Simmons, who is based in El Paso, Texas. 'Our understanding is that they find members without a criminal history so that they can join, and once they get out, they will have a new set of skills that they can apply to criminal enterprises,' Simmons said." Army CIC spokesman Christopher Grey "acknowledged that there are gang members in the military, but he said their presence has not become a problem."

Gotti Lawyer Says FBI Intimidating Witnesses. The New York Post (5/2, Cornell, 624K) reports, "Lawyers for John 'Junior' Gotti say the FBI is delivering an unusual verbal message along with its subpoenas for a sweeping grand-jury probe of the Gambinos -- subjects are told, 'You can thank Gotti . . . for this.' … The feds have suggested Gotti, his younger brother Peter and others could be hit with new charges, including money laundering, tax fraud and perjury." But defense lawyer Charles Carnesi "claims the supposed verbal message from the FBI is further proof the feds are misusing the grand-jury process in an effort to intimidate witnesses and spark 'raging publicity.'"

Connecticut Fraud Investigator Reassigned Over Rowland-Era Perks. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (5/2, Apuzzo) reports, "Connecticut's governor stripped a top fraud investigator of her duties Monday after The Associated Press reported that she had testified to receiving many of the same gifts that toppled former Gov. John G. Rowland's administration. Kristine Ragaglia, head of the Medicaid fraud unit, was reassigned to administrative duties at Gov. M. Jodi Rell's order, pending an investigation." The AP adds, "In sealed grand jury transcripts, FBI reports and personal diaries examined by the AP, Ragaglia detailed how she took the same expensive hotel getaways, lavish dinners and limousine rides that were used to bribe the officials in Rowland's administration."

Defense To Begin Case Today In Philadelphia Bribery Trial. The Philadelphia Inquirer (5/2, Schaffer, 423K) reports, "The father-and-son duo accused of bribing Philadelphia City Councilman Rick Mariano are expected to begin presenting their defense this morning by calling a series of witnesses that will include labor leader and potential mayoral candidate John J. Dougherty. Dougherty will likely be asked about a $6,000 loan he made to Mariano, who was convicted on March 18 of bribery, fraud and conspiracy. Dougherty told a grand jury last fall that the money was intended to help the councilman repay the defendants, Erie Steel owners Louis and Philip Chartock." The Philadelphia Daily News (5/2, Brennan) notes that Dougherty, "Mariano's one-time political patron, told the FBI he gave Mariano $6,000 to repay an Erie Steel loan but later learned no payment was made."

Prosecution Begins Closing Arguments At Nevada Bribery Trial. The AP (5/2, Ritter) reports, "Closing arguments began Monday in the federal corruption trial of two former Clark County commissioners who could face prison if a jury finds them guilty of accepting bribes from a former striptease club owner. 'Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey were two corrupt public officials,' prosecutor Daniel Schiess declared." He "quickly acknowledged credibility problems surrounding the prosecution's star witness, former strip club owner Michael Galardi," saying that "FBI wiretaps…revealed the real truth behind what he called a scheme to defraud Clark County residents of honest government." KLAS-TV Las Vegas (5/1, Allen) adds, "Prosecutors let loose on Kincaid-Chauncey using her own words against her. Kincaid-Chauncey acknowledges two payments from Galardi; money she solicited for family members," but "Schiess told the jury…'Mary Kincaid-Chauncey received more than the two payments she has talked about.' Schiess played an FBI wiretap from June 2001 where Lance Malone speaks to his former county commission assistant -- the topic: Kincaid-Chauncey."

DOJ_NMG_0027597

Prosecution Rests Case At Virginia Corruption Trial. The Lynchburg News & Advance (5/2, Reilly) reports that at former Lynchburg Mayor Carl Hutcherson's corruption trial yesterday, prosecutors argued that he "was the brains behind a now-defunct church charity they say he used as his personal ATM. But defense attorneys tried to convince a jury the city's top political figure was simply a bumbling businessman who mistakenly relied on another to look after the charity's affairs." The News & Advance notes, "After jurors listened to a taped phone conversation between Hutcherson" and Rev. Jerry Falwell "about the $32,500 donation, FBI Special Agent Christian Pettyjohn testified about his role as lead investigator and said that Hutcherson told him that Falwell Jr. donated the money to Hutcherson's charity and knew that Hutcherson planned to use it to pay back some of his back taxes. Both sides used Pettyjohn to point out passages in Falwell Jr.'s phone conversation that favored their side." The AP (5/2, Lindsey) adds that consultant Davida Wingfield "testified Monday that she falsified minutes documenting a loan to…Hutcherson," and "two women associated with the charity said they were unaware of the loan. The three testified as the prosecution wrapped up its case." The AP also notes Pettyjohn's testimony about the Falwell phone call.

SCOTUS Rules States May Not Bar Evidence In Criminal Trials. The Legal Times (5/2, Mauro) reports, "In his maiden opinion for the Supreme Court, new Justice Samuel Alito Jr. said on Monday that states may not prevent criminal defendants from introducing evidence at trial that another person committed the crime." The Times continues, "The unanimous, pro-defendant decision in Holmes v. South Carolina was an unusual debut for Alito, a former U.S. Attorney not known for ruling in favor of the defense when he was a judge on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Alito joined the high court Jan. 31, replacing Sandra Day O'Connor. … But Alito said that South Carolina had gone too far in barring evidence of third-party guilt in cases in which the prosecution has presented forensic evidence that strongly supports a guilty verdict for the defendant. … 'By evaluating the strength of only one party's evidence, no logical conclusion can be reached regarding the strength of contrary evidence offered by the other side to rebut or cast doubt,' Alito wrote."

The New York Times (5/2, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports that the Supreme Court has unanimously ordered a new trial for an inmate on South Carolina's death row, saying state courts improperly excluded evidence indicating that another man might have committed the crime. Writing his first opinion for the High Court, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., "said the rule of evidence applied by the South Carolina courts was irrational and arbitrary and served to deprive the defendant, Bobbie Lee Holmes, of a 'meaningful opportunity to present a complete defense.'"

Kansas Attorney Pleads Guilty To Embezzling From Church. Kansas City Business Journal (5/1) reports, "A former Overland Park attorney faces as much as 10 years in prison after pleading guilty Monday to embezzling nearly $300,000 from a Kansas City church. Keith Koenigsdorf was disbarred in both Kansas and Missouri last year after he admitted he had stolen the money from Central United Methodist Church." US Attorney Bradley Schlozman said in a yesterday that "Koenigsdorf waived his right to a grand jury and pleaded guilty…to a charge of interstate transportation of stolen property." The Business Journal notes, "The case was…investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation." KMCI-TV Kansas City, MO (5/1) adds, "Koenigsdorf stole the funds, Schlozman explained, by taking blank checks which already bore a signature from an authorized signatory, adding his own signature, making the check payable to himself, and then depositing the check into his law firm's operating account." KMCI also notes that the FBI investigated the case.

Former Morris Brown President Pleads Guilty To Embezzling Federal Funds. The Washington Post (5/2, Romano) reports, "The former president of Morris Brown College, a historic black school in Atlanta, pleaded guilty yesterday to embezzling millions of dollars in federal funds from the government and students, the climax of a financial debacle that caused the school to lose its accreditation. Delores Cross, 69, who led the school from November 1998 until February 2002, pleaded in federal court in Atlanta to one court of illegally obtaining student loans, allowing her to avoid a trial and more than two dozen other counts she was confronting." The illegally obtained student loans and Pell grants "to pay bills at the strapped school. Ultimately the students found themselves responsible for loans they never requested." The college "is still in a tenuous situation" with its enrollment having fallen from over 2,000 to 66. It is also "fighting lawsuits brought by former students, and other suits stemming from the financial woes."

Jury Selection Begins In Maryland Trial Of Convicted DC Sniper. The Baltimore Sun (5/2, Siegel) reports, "The difficulty of finding jurors in Montgomery County who had not decided that convicted sniper John Allen Muhammad was responsible for the county's six sniper killings in 2002 became immediately apparent Monday as the presiding judge questioned the first batch of 300 potential jurors." The Sun continues, "During initial questioning -- which was disrupted by a profanity-laced outburst from a victim's relative -- nearly all of the first 25 potential jurors said they believed he committed six murders in the county, and many were aware that he had been convicted of a sniper killing in Virginia. … They pointed to the heavy media coverage of the shootings, their children being forced to stay inside at school and their personal fears at the time. One referred to the images he saw of Muhammad in prison garb from the first trial in Virginia." The Sun adds, "The trial's first day illustrated the difficulty posed by a defendant who seeks to represent himself, particularly when the suspect has no legal training and is charged in a high-profile crime. … Muhammad, 45, had bitterly criticized his court-appointed attorneys in previous cases and has chosen to represent himself in this case, something he did briefly in his Virginia trial."

DOJ_NMG_0027598

The Washington Post (5/2, B1, Rich, Londoño) reports, "A remarkable number of potential jurors in a Montgomery County courtroom yesterday had what seemed to be a legitimate reason to be excused from that most dreaded of civic responsibilities. … 'I think he's guilty, sir,' said one, referred to in court as juror 34, under questioning by Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan." The Post continues, "In a back room, where they were gathered, the talk was said to be still more blunt. Several jury candidates agreed that the trial was a waste of time and that the defendant could be convicted 'in 20 minutes,' according to another, who reported the conversation to Ryan. … And so it went as jury selection began in the Maryland trial of John Allen Muhammad, charged in six sniper slayings in Montgomery. Most of the potential jurors questioned yesterday told Ryan that they hold Muhammad, already convicted and sentenced to die in Virginia, responsible for the random shootings in October 2002. Many said the shootings had touched them personally." The Post notes, "Not more than a handful of the 60 or so people questioned by Ryan said they had formed no opinion as to Muhammad's guilt. A larger number, however, said that if selected to serve they could set aside their views and base their decisions on the evidence presented in court. … By the end of the day, Ryan had picked 21 for a pool of eligible jurors, a group that is expected to be whittled down under more intensive questioning late this week."

The Washington Times (5/2, Ward) reports, "Muhammad expressed displeasure to the judge about being presumed guilty and seemed unable to grasp that preconceived notions could be put aside in order to base a judgment only on facts and evidence presented in court. … 'It's one thing to have heard about it. It's another thing to already have made your mind up,' Muhammad said. … A Virginia Beach jury in 2003 found Muhammad guilty of murder in the death of Dean Harold Meyers at a Manassas service station and using an accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo, now 21, in the crime. That jury sentenced Muhammad to death. Malvo was given life without parole by a Chesapeake jury for a different killing two months after Muhammad's sentencing."

Prosecutor In Duke Rape Probe Faces Election.

USA Today (5/2, Dorell) reports, "The alleged rape of a stripper by members of the Duke lacrosse team has put the spotlight on a North Carolina county prosecutor who is pushing his biggest case ever while trying to win an election." USA continues, "Mike Nifong (NY-fong) is described as a tough-but-fair prosecutor by several people who have worked cases with him. Yet detractors say he has pushed ethical limits on what to say publicly about the rape case and has used the issue for political gain." USA adds, "The alleged attack has roiled the community. It pits white university athletes who their lawyers say are being railroaded against a black community that is demanding justice for the accuser. At the center of it all is Nifong. … That election is being held today. Nifong, 55, is running in the Democratic primary for Durham County district attorney against Freda Black, a former prosecutor, and Keith Bishop, a Durham lawyer. No Republicans are seeking the office."

Students' Attorneys Seek Prosecutor's Ouster. The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Fausset) reports, "Attorneys for a Duke University student arrested on suspicion of raping an exotic dancer demanded Monday that Dist. Atty. Mike Nifong be taken off the case, alleging in court documents that the Durham, N.C., prosecutor ignored key evidence 'in his zeal to make national headlines and win a hotly contested primary.' … But Nifong's supporters argued that the motion seemed motivated as much by politics as by law, coming on the eve of Nifong's bid for election to a post he was appointed to last year." The Times continues, "The allegations were contained in a motion filed Monday on behalf of Reade William Seligmann, one of two Duke lacrosse team members indicted April 17 on charges of rape and kidnapping. Nifong said he was hoping to indict a third team member for participating in the alleged March 14 attack. … The case has also become the central issue in Nifong's effort to keep his job as Durham County's top prosecutor. Today he faces off in an election with two contenders who, like the players' attorneys, have criticized Nifong for his bold statements early in the investigation. Some of those statements, critics say, seemed to unfairly implicate Duke lacrosse players before any indictments were handed down by a grand jury. … Monday's motion — filed by attorneys J. Kirk Osborn of Chapel Hill and Ernest L. Conner Jr. of Greenville — introduced a new and unsparing tone to the criticism. The motion calls the case a 'shakedown' and asserts that Nifong has been willing to 'prostitute the truth' in the case to get elected. … The defense attorneys called for the appointment of an independent prosecutor. They also alleged that Nifong violated the North Carolina State Bar's Rules of Professional Conduct by potentially prejudicing the jury pool, among other things."

DOJ_NMG_0027599

CIVIL LAW:

Government Says Delta Overcharged For Flights. In documents filed Friday with the US Bankruptcy Court in Manhattan, where Delta Air Lines has sued to force the federal government to pay almost $19 million for flights provided to military personnel, the federal government says it overpaid Delta more than $26 million for tickets and accused the airline of overcharging it an additional $240,000 for tickets purchased over the past three years. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, 2.11M) reports that the government has "asked a judge to throw out Delta's lawsuit, saying it has the right to deduct past overcharges and overpayments from current obligations to Delta. A Delta spokesman in Atlanta didn't respond to a request for comment.'

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Chicago Schools Comes To Agreement With DOJ to End Federal Oversight. The Chicago Tribune (5/2, Olszewski, Mendell) reports, "With the historic legal battle to integrate America's big-city schools being abandoned across the nation, the Chicago schools and the federal government have reached a tentative agreement that would release the district from 26 years of federal oversight on desegregation efforts by the 2007-08 school year." The settlement was filed jointly Monday in U.S. District Court where it awaits approval by U.S. District Judge Charles P. Kocoras. It "effectively allows the school system to decide on its own, without federal intervention, how much money and resources to devote toward integrating its schools." That "represents a retreat by the Justice Department from its more aggressive stance toward the district on equity issues in recent years." The Chicago school district is less than 9 percent white and has spent "at least $2.5 billion on desegregation" since 1980. Yet, "most of the city's black and Latino children still attend class in racially isolated schools that mirror the city's segregated housing patterns." School officials said that "they are committed to integration."

Judge Ends Federal Control Of Louisiana Juvenile Prisons. The AP (5/2) reports, "Louisiana's juvenile prisons, once a byword for beatings and chaotic brawls, are on the road to reform and no longer need oversight from the federal courts, a federal district judge ruled Monday." The AP continues, "The U.S. Justice Department sued the state in 1998, saying conditions inside the lockups were unconstitutional. Judge James Brady's dismissal of the suit Monday came after Justice Department experts determined that reform efforts have made the lockups safer and better at rehabilitating the teen prisoners they house. … 'I don't say this lightly: Louisiana has emerged as a model for juvenile justice systems in this country,' said Judy Preston, deputy chief of special litigation and the department's expert on youth prison systems." The AP notes, "True reform efforts started in the 2003 Legislature with a commitment to shifting punishment of delinquent youth from imprisonment to less harsh settings like group homes and to closing the youth prison at Tallulah, which was pointed to as an example of brutality. Experts say the move to less prisonlike settings improves the chances of rehabilitation. … The Justice Department filed the lawsuit with the Louisiana Juvenile Justice Project, a nonprofit activist group that has long been critical of the prisons. David Utter, the group's director, called Brady's ruling 'a great first step,' but said complete reform is a distant goal."

Federal Agents Arrest 66 In Human Trafficking Raids. The Washington Times/AP (5/2, Parry) reports, "Federal agents yesterday rounded up 66 persons in a series of raids that officials said smashed a suspected human-trafficking ring that smuggled Mexicans into the United States and may have forced the women to work as prostitutes in the Washington area." The AP continues, "Officers with the U.S. Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) raided 15 locations in Union City, West New York and New York City early yesterday after New Jersey State Police pulled over two vehicles containing at least 10 women who worked in brothels in Maryland, Virginia and the District, said Kyle Hutchins, special agent in charge of the bureau's Newark office." The AP adds, "The operation was at least the fourth major alien-smuggling ring operating in New Jersey in recent years. Prosecutions involving Russian strippers forced to work in go-go bars, and young Honduran women forced to work as hostesses in Union City bars are ongoing in federal court."

Florida Man Charged With Hate Crime In Attack On NFL Player. The South-Florida Sun-Sentinel (5/2, Marvez, Naanes) reports, "Dolphins defensive end/outside linebacker Jason Taylor suffered a minor stab wound Sunday night in a road-rage incident, according to Davie police. Redmond Charles Burns of Davie was arrested on three charges, including aggravated battery/hate crime, after allegedly assaulting Taylor." The Sun-Sentinel notes, "In December 2003, Taylor was identified by the FBI as being one of six active or retired professional athletes to receive a hate letter threatening him with physical harm for being married to a white woman."

DOJ_NMG_0027600

North Las Vegas On Track For ADA Compliance. The Las Vegas Sun (5/2, Wargo) reports, "Seven months after North Las Vegas reached a tentative agreement with the Justice Department over violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act, the city is putting its money where its mouth is." The Sun continues, "North Las Vegas plans to award a contract Wednesday to spend nearly $350,000 for wheelchair-accessible ramps, sidewalks and other safety improvements for the disabled at more than 133 locations around schools and older sections of the city." The Sun adds, "The contract is part of the city's plan to spend more than $600,000 this year and similar amounts during its next two budgets to comply with the 1990 federal law requiring local governments to improve the disabled's access to government programs and access on government property. … In September, North Las Vegas reached an agreement with the Justice Department over the city's long-standing violations of the federal law. The agreement helped the city avoid potential fines of up to $55,000 for a first violation and $110,000 for subsequent violations. … Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland said North Las Vegas is on schedule to correct the violations. City officials said North Las Vegas already has spent thousands of dollars to fix dozens of violations." The Sun notes, "North Las Vegas came under fire from the Justice Department after a January 2004 federal review of 75 percent of the city's parks and facilities found 182 ADA violations."

Judge Allows EEOC Racial Bias Suit Against Movie Studio To Proceed. The AP (5/2) reports, "The first racial discrimination case brought by the government against a movie studio can proceed to trial, a federal judge ruled." The AP continues, "The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission sued Universal Pictures in 2003, claiming that a first assistant director on the film "2 Fast 2 Furious" was fired because he was black. … The studio has denied the allegation and asked the court to dismiss the case. … But late Wednesday, U.S. District Judge Gary Allen Feess ruled that the commission's lawsuit contained sufficient evidence to allow a jury to decide the case." The AP adds, "The lawsuit was filed on behalf of Frank Davis, 47, who worked on the film under director John Singleton, who is also black. The lawsuit claims Davis was fired without cause even after Singleton objected. … 'Singleton adamantly asserts that Davis was performing satisfactorily and that Singleton would have terminated Davis had he not performed,' Feess wrote in his decision. … 'These facts, among many others, raise a genuine issue for trial regarding the true motive for Davis' termination and could support an inference that he was terminated because of race,' the judge wrote."

Jury Considers Civil Hate-Crime Suit. The Chicago Tribune (5/2, O'Connor) reports, "In an unemotional voice, Deona Williams recounted Monday how she cried hysterically and begged for her life as three skinheads cornered her one summer night in 2002, shouted racial epithets and held a knife to her throat. … The testimony came at a federal trial at which the only issue for the all-woman jury to decide is how much in monetary damages should be awarded to Deona, now 17, and her family. A judge already has found the three white defendants legally liable for their actions." The Tribune continues, "Two of the defendants, Harley Hermes and Michael Canlas, portrayed themselves in court Monday as changed young men who regretted their conduct. … The third defendant, Shaun Derifield, didn't show up for the trial." The Tribune adds, "All three were convicted of criminal offenses for the hate crime and served time. … The lawsuit appears to be more of a symbolic battle for the family because none of the three defendants apparently has any significant assets or income. Hermes said he owns only a truck with 100,000 miles on it. At the time the suit was filed in 2004, a lawyer for the family said the litigation was intended to deter other hate crimes."

Kristof Says Morning-After Pill Should Be Available Over The Counter. Nicholas Kristof writes in the New York Times (5/2, 1.19M), "The best way to reduce the number of abortions, in turn, would be to reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies. … So it should be a no-brainer that we increase access to contraception, and in particular make the 'morning after' pill available over the counter. That would be the single simplest step to reduce the U.S. abortion rate, while also helping hundreds of thousands of women avert unwanted pregnancies." Kristof adds, "It's time for President Bush to end his policies that encourage abortions."

NYTimes Says Census Bureau Should Count Inmates In Their Home Communities. An editorial in the New York Times (5/2, 1.19M) says, "Demographers and voting rights advocates are rightly pressuring the Census Bureau to begin counting the nation's 1.4 million prison inmates at their home communities -- and not as 'residents' of the prisons, the current practice. Counting the inmates at prison inflates the prison community's population and political influence, while draining political clout from the communities where inmates actually live. … The bureau should get busy on a system for counting inmates where they live as opposed to where they do time."

DOJ_NMG_0027601

ANTITRUST:

Stevens Bill Could Slow Phone Company Efforts To Enter Cable TV Business. Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens yesterday offered sweeping telecom legislation which has thrown a snag into phone companies' efforts to get into the cable television business, the Wall Street Journal (5/2, Schatz, 2.11M). According to the Journal, Stevens' legislation does not include "the Bell companies' top wish: the ability to bypass local governments when offering pay-television service." The Journal adds, "Reaction from the Bells to Mr. Stevens's effort was lukewarm. … Mr. Stevens's decision to introduce a telecom-rewrite bill may make it more difficult for the Bells to get changes to the law this year to help them enter the cable business faster."

Google Expresses Concerns About Microsoft Browser. The AP (5/2, Linn) reports, "Google Inc. is hoping to pressure Microsoft Corp. into changing a new Internet Explorer browser feature that could direct more people to Microsoft's online search engine instead of Google's far more popular offering." The AP continues, "Google has informally complained to U.S. and European antitrust regulators about what it says are biased settings on Microsoft's latest Web browser, marking the latest spat between two companies whose business models are increasingly bumping up against one another. … Mountain View, Calif.-based Google regards Microsoft as the biggest threat to its continued success, and Microsoft has conceded that Goggle is a formidable competitor as well. … The next version of Internet Explorer, available now in test form, includes a box in the corner that lets people perform an Internet search without going to a separate Web page, much like what's available from Google's downloadable 'toolbar.'"

Bloomberg (5/2, Thaw) reports, "Google raised the concern as part of a European Commission investigation into Vista, the next version of Microsoft's Windows operating system, Steve Langdon, a spokesman for Mountain View, California-based Google, said today in an interview. … 'In those discussions, we have expressed our concerns that Microsoft's approach to setting search defaults in IE 7.0 benefits Microsoft while taking away choice from users,' Langdon said." Bloomberg adds, "Microsoft is 'fully committed' to supporting search-engine options in Internet explorer and will ensure users can easily choose from a very long list, Microsoft spokeswoman Stacy Drake McCredy said in an e-mailed statement."

The San Jose Mercury News (5/2, Ackerman) reports, "The dispute illustrates how the importance of the browser has diminished in the wake of the epic anti-trust battles involving Microsoft and the rest of the tech industry. Now, the focus is on search technology, which matches advertising with search results. … Still, Google's protest puzzled some observers, who noted that the objectionable feature was nearly identical to the search box of FireFox, an open-source browser with 10 to 13 percent of the U.S. market."

RIM Faces Another Patent Suit Over Blackberry. The Financial Times (5/2, Taylor) reports, "Research in Motion, maker of the popular BlackBerry family of wireless e-mail devices, faces a new legal threat after Visto, a US-based wireless e-mail technology company, filed a new patent infringement suit against the Canadian group." The Times continues, "The move follows Visto's victory in another long-running patent infringment suit against rival Seven Networks, and comes just weeks after Rim paid more than $612m to settle a patent case with Washington-based NTP, a patent holding firm that also holds a small stake in Visto."

The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Weinberg) reports, "RIM, which two months ago agreed to pay NTP Inc. $612.5 million to settled a separate patent dispute, denied infringing Visto's patents and said in a statement that it will now consider asserting its own claims against Visto. RIM, of Waterloo, Ontario, said it doesn't expect customers of its popular BlackBerry wireless-email device to be impacted by Visto's complaint. … The suit by Visto, filed in U.S. federal court in the Eastern District of Texas, comes after a federal jury in the same district Friday decided in favor of the Redwood Shores, Calif., software maker in yet another patent dispute. In that case, the jury found closely held software maker Seven Networks Inc. had infringed three Visto patents and awarded it $3.6 million. Visto said the court is expected to hold a hearing concerning an injunction against Seven Networks that would prohibit further use of the infringing system." The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Weinberg) also reports on the suit.

NYTimes Backs Efforts To Pass "Net-Neutrality" Bill. An editorial in the New York Times (5/2, 1.19M) says, "One of the Internet's great strengths is that a single blogger or a small political group can inexpensively create a Web page that is just as accessible to the world as Microsoft's home page. But this democratic Internet would be in danger if the companies that deliver Internet service changed the rules so that Web sites that pay them money would be easily accessible, while little-guy sites would be harder to access, and slower to navigate." The Times adds, "The House Energy and Commerce Committee defeated a good Net-neutrality amendment last week. … In the Senate, Olympia Snowe, a Maine Republican, and Byron Dorgan, a North Dakota Democrat, are drafting a strong Net-neutrality bill that would prohibit broadband providers from creating a two-tiered Internet. Senators who care about the Internet and Internet users should get behind it."

DOJ_NMG_0027602

WSJournal Says Twombly Case Could Spark Wave Of Litigation. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (5/2, 2.11M) says, "In 2003, William Twombly sued all the Bells on behalf of all the Bells' customers" alleging that the Bells have conspired to stay out of each other's territory and have kept the price of phone service artificially high for a decade. In Twombly, "the Second Circuit essentially ruled that if competitors act in parallel, all a plaintiff has to do is say, 'Conspiracy!' to open discovery and start searching for evidence in the files of an entire industry. … That Twombly lowered the bar dramatically for plaintiffs and trial lawyers alleging business conspiracies has not been lost on those lawyers, either. Since the decision was handed down in October, dozens of legal filings have already cited it as a reason for letting this or that case proceed. If the Supreme Court allows Twombly to stand unchallenged, unsupported charges of antitrust conspiracy could well prove to be the next great wave of the litigation tsunami."

ENVIRONMENT:

White House To Release Bird Flu Response Plan. A draft of the Bush administration pandemic flu plan obtained by the AP (5/2, Pickler) suggests that "employers should have plans to keep workers at least three feet apart, colleges should consider which dormitories could be used to quarantine the sick, and flight crews should have surgical masks to put on coughing travelers." The Bush administration forecasts "massive disruptions" if a bird flu pandemic arises in the United States, and a response plan scheduled to be released at the White House Wednesday "warns employers that as much as 40 percent of the work force could be off the job and says every segment of society must prepare."

US Businesses Seen As Unprepared For Bird Flu. On the front page of its Business section, the Washington Post (5/2, D1, Brown) reports, "More than half of US companies think there will be a global flu epidemic in the next two years," and two-thirds of those think it will "seriously disrupt their operations as well as foment social unrest." At the same time, two-thirds "also say they aren't prepared." Meanwhile, former HHS secretary Tommy Thompson, who is now working as a private consultant, estimates that only one in five US companies "are in good position in terms of being able to react—and even those are going to have to restructure and improve their plans."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Critics Say FBI Struggling To Assume Top Counter-Terrorism Role. Under the headline "Intelligence Mission Troubles FBI," The Baltimore Sun (5/2, Gorman, 296K) reports that "the FBI is having trouble asserting itself as the country's pre-eminent domestic intelligence agency, according to intelligence specialists and congressional critics." Even with the "new National Security Branch, the bureau 'is a long way from doing what it needs to do to stay on top of the war on terror,' Republican Sen. Charles E. Grassley of Iowa said in an interview yesterday. … 'They need leadership…and they need people who are going to stick around for a while,' Grassley said, referring to the recently announced resignation of Gary Bald." The Sun notes, "FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III is expected to face questions about his efforts to remake the law enforcement agency into an intelligence organization when he testifies today before a Senate panel that includes Grassley. Responding to criticism of their efforts, FBI officials say they have made significant progress in charting a new course for the FBI, and that their classified plan is on the verge of being implemented. … Bald's deputy, Philip Mudd, said he expected to implement plans that Bald has drawn up for the National Security Branch. 'I'm not going anywhere,' Mudd said." Bald, in an interview with The Sun, noted "that he had doubled the number of agents and analysts assigned to intelligence and counter-terrorism at the FBI." The Canton Repository (5/2) runs The Sun story under the headline "Critics Train Sights On Laggard FBI."

Pete Rose Jr. Sentenced For Distributing GBL. The AP (5/2) reports Pete Rose Jr., the son of baseball's career hits leader, "was sentenced Monday to one month in prison and five months of home detention for distributing a steroid alternative to his minor league teammates. … Rose pleaded guilty Nov. 7 to distributing the steroid alternative GBL, a drug he used as a sleep aid, to some of his teammates with the Chattanooga Lookouts. … The Drug Enforcement Administration has said Rose's arrest was part of a larger investigation into a major GBL trafficking organization." News outlets made more than 50 references to Rose's sentencing. MSNBC, ESPN, Forbes, the San Francisco Chronicle, San Diego Union Tribune, Miami Herald, Houston Chronicle, and San Jose Mercury News published in newspapers and/or posted on Web sites the AP story.

Cable TV Coverage. CNN (5/1, 9:00 p.m.) reported, "Pete Rose Junior is going to prison for a month. He was sentenced for distributing a drug used as a steroid alternative to his minor league teammates."

DOJ_NMG_0027603

ESPN (5/1, 7:00 p.m.) reported, "Pete Rose Jr. gets a month in prison for distributing a steroid alternative to a teammate in the minor leagues."

Local TV Coverage. WCPO-TV, Cincinnati (5/1, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Pete Rose Junior has been sentenced to a month in jail on a drug charge. Last fall, Rose admitted to drug enforcement agents that he sold GBL to his teammates while he played for the minor league Chattanooga Lookouts. Agents say Rose told them his teammates would take the drug to unwind after games. After Rose gets out of jail, he will be on house arrest for 5 months."

WSMV-TV, Nashville, Tennessee (5/1, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "The son of baseball legend Pete Rose Senior left federal court today obviously relieved. Pete Rose Junior was arrested for distributing GBL, though he was never accused of profiting from the sale of it. The junior Rose is playing for the Chattanooga or was playing for the Chattanooga Lookouts at the time of his arrest in may 2002. The judge today went along with the prosecution's request for leniency. … Prosecutors talked a lot about Pete Rose Junior's cooperation during the investigation and all that seemed to go a long way in the end with the judge."

Four Sentenced In Illinois Meth Case. The Carmi (IL) Times (5/2) reports on the sentences of four people for their role in a large meth making and distribution conspiracy centered in White, Gallatin and Saline counties. The Times reports officials said the convictions and sentences "resulted from a long-term and on-going investigation into the manufacture of methamphetamine in southeastern Illinois by the Southern Illinois Drug Task Force and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. … The investigation (which began in 2001) has resulted in the federal indictment of 65 people in related cases who were responsible for the manufacture or attempted manufacture of the equivalent of over 600,000 grams of methamphetamine."

Medicinal Use Of Marijuana Disputed. In a Boston Globe (5/2) story titled, "Breast Cancer Has Made Me a Criminal" Lynda Gorov writes, "I had read enough, and written some, about the medicinal uses of marijuana to believe it might keep me from suffering. … Maybe someone who hasn't been there can't understand my willingness to break the law. Sure, a number of states, including mine, have legalized the medicinal use of marijuana. But the Drug Enforcement Administration refuses to go along. It sees me as a criminal."

Eugene, Oregon's Register-Guard (5/1) editorializes, "The FDA should change its name to the Politically Approved Food and Drug Administration - PAFDA. It's a longer acronym, but it rolls off the tongue nicely and people would appreciate its greater honesty. The agency's other option is to stop embarrassing its dedicated doctors and scientists with utterly unscientific announcements such as the recent bulletin that smoked marijuana has no medicinal value."

In the Asbury (NJ) Park Press (5/2) Terrence P. Farley, Ocean County assistant prosecutor and director of the county Narcotics Strike Force, writes, "I have spent years reviewing research on so-called "medical marijuana." I can state, as a result of that research, that "medical marijuana" and "Compassionate Use" acts are a hoax. … the U.S. Supreme Court just last year ruled that marijuana is not 'medicine.' … John Walters…noted, 'Smoking illegal drugs may make some people 'feel better.' However, civilized societies and modern-day medical practices differentiate between inebriation and the safe, supervised delivery of proven medicine by legitimate doctors.'"

Limbaugh Signs Deal In Prescription Fraud Case. The AP (5/2) reports Rush Limbaugh "declared victory Monday after signing a deal with prosecutors that will dismiss a prescription fraud charge in 18 months if he complies with the terms. Under the deal, Limbaugh cannot own a gun, must submit to random drug tests and has to continue treatment for his acknowledged addiction to painkillers. But he did not have to admit guilt, and he continued to proclaim his innocence on his radio show."

Network TV Coverage. ABC's Good Morning America (5/1, 7:00 a.m.) reported, "Rush Limbaugh had good reason to smile for his mug shot because today his three-year ordeal with drug charges finally comes to an end when he signs a deal that leaves him with no [criminal] record. He agreed to be booked on a single felony charge -- prescription drug fraud. That charge will be dropped if he continues drug treatment for 18 months. Limbaugh also agreed to pay $30,000 for the public cost of the investigation. This all began in 2003, when it was reported that the popular conservative radio host was abusing [prescription] drugs in his Palm Beach home."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN's The Situation Room (5/1, 4:00 p.m.) reported, "Rush Limbaugh says his settlement with Florida prosecutors shows that the case is over and that he's not guilty. The talk show host reportedly will undergo random drug tests as part of the agreement. He's been taking drug tests for the last couple of years. He pled not guilty Friday. [The charge] will be dismissed if Limbaugh passes the drug test and completes a treatment program."

Man Accused Of Importing, Distributing Steroids Pleads Guilty. The AP (5/1) reports a man "has pleaded guilty to importing and distributing thousands of anabolic steroid pills. Authorities say Kevin Thompson…pleaded guilty to a variety of charges accusing him of using New Hampshire grocery stores to wire money to foreign countries such as Poland, Greece and China in order to illegally buy steroids."

DOJ_NMG_0027604

State, Federal Investigation Continues Into Arizona Church Arson. The Arizona Republic (5/2, Clancy) reports, "A fire that caused $200,000 damage at Mission Bell United Methodist Church in northwest Phoenix was the city's thirteenth church fire, the tenth set on purpose, since Jan. 1." Calling it "an ugly, ugly crime," Phoenix Fire Department Assistant Chief Bob Khan "said investigators continued to work Monday at Mission Bell…which shares its building with a Jewish congregation, Temple Gan Elohim. Besides Phoenix fire and police, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the FBI were involved, he said."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Reform Rallies, Boycott Attract Hundreds Of Thousands. USA Today (5/2, Keen, Kasindorf, 2.31M) reports this morning, "Supporters of immigrant rights boycotted businesses and schools or attended rallies in more than 40 states Monday, closing businesses from Providence to San Diego and drawing protesters to rallies from Anchorage to Atlanta. … Hundreds of thousands of people marched in Los Angeles and Chicago. Supporters in New York City formed human chains on sidewalks to protest a bill passed by the House of Representatives that would make illegal immigration a felony. Thousands more filled Manhattan's Union Square." In Los Angeles, "the wholesale produce market and garment factories closed, ports were quiet, and traffic eased. Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa estimated up to 400,000 people participated in two marches. The Los Angeles Unified School District, which is 73% Hispanic, said 27% of middle- and high-school students were absent."

The boycott and demonstrations across the nation are receiving extensive, and largely sympathetic coverage on TV and print media. The AP (5/2, Flaccus) describes the "mostly Hispanic immigrants" as "flexing their economic muscle," and says that "from Los Angeles to Chicago, Houston to New Orleans, the 'Day Without Immigrants' attracted widespread participation despite divisions among activists over whether a boycott would send the right message to Washington lawmakers considering sweeping immigration reform." The New York Times (5/2, Archibold, 1.19M) says the protesters, "a mix of illegal immigrants and legal residents and citizens, were mostly Latino, but in contrast to similar demonstrations in the past two months, large numbers of people of other ethnicities joined or endorsed many of the events."

Typical of the very positive coverage of the protests is the Los Angeles Times, which this morning runs several stories on yesterday's actions. On of the Los Angeles Times reports (5/2, Muskal, Williams) states, "Across the country, hundreds of thousands of Latino immigrants and their supporters took to the streets to demonstrate that they are a political and economic presence that can't be ignored." Another Los Angeles Times piece (5/2, Streitfeld), titled "Throngs Show Their Potent Role in Economy," says "immigrant workers powerfully asserted their importance Monday." While the "Day Without Immigrants" won't hurt the economy "in the long run, analysts said," its "economic message…was emphatic and unmistakable." The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Watanabe, Gaouette, 958K) also analyzes the political impact of the boycott, asking, "Now what? As immigrants and their supporters boycotted work and school, refrained from consumer spending and marched in cities across the nation, the urgent question they face is how to translate the passion of the streets into lasting political gains."

Across the media spectrum, the protests are generally being described as a success. While most media reports refer to "hundreds of thousands" attending the rallies, CNN's The Situation Room (5/1, Blitzer) at one point estimated the number of participants in the "millions." The boycott, said CNN, was "an attempt to try to prove that immigrants are a driving force behind the US economy." Along the lines of much of the coverage of the boycott, CNN also said that "in Washington, officials are trying to gauge the economic impact of this so-called day without immigrants. They're also keeping close watch at the politics that play in all of this as well." CNN (Bash) added "Republican supporters like Senator Mel Martinez are most concerned the boycott will put off some GOP colleagues he's trying hard to convince and with good reason."

The story was heavily covered by the network news last night, filling a total of just under 27 minutes of broadcast time. The newscasts covered a range of subjects, from on location reports by correspondents in the field to general overviews of the importance of immigrants to the US economy. ABC World News Tonight (5/1, lead story, 1:40, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Altogether, close to 1 million people took to the streets in more than 30 cities. And that number could still rise. It was the newest wave of protests against legislation that would increase the penalties for being in the US, illegally." ABC World News Tonight (5/1, story 4, 2:35, Weir, 8.78M) later added, "While industry can adjust to a short, preplanned boycott, this day shows how vital 7.5 million undocumented workers are to the national economy. They comprise 24% of all farm workers, 17% of those who clean, 14% of those who build." Jess Passel, Pew Hispanic Center: "It's hard to envision how these industries will keep going if 15% to 25% of the workers just disappeared." Similarly, NBC Nightly News (5/1, story 6, 2:05, Teague, 9.87M) said, "This much is certain -- millions of immigrants flexed their muscle today. At ports in Southern California, 90% of the truckers needed to move cargo didn't show up."

DOJ_NMG_0027605

NBC Nightly News (5/1, lead story, 6:20, Williams, 9.87M) took a more negative approach to the possible political effects of the boycott, saying, "Even supporters of immigrant rights are weighing whether these protests could provoke a backlash." Jaime Contreras, National Capital Immigration Coalition: "We think the American people are generous people and they will understand that this is one of the ways that people can express their rights under the Constitution, to express discontent with something that's happening in Congress." In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (5/1, 2.11M) addresses the issue, saying "advocates of a guest worker program for illegal immigrants expressed confidence" that Monday's boycott "wouldn't make passage of comprehensive reform legislation more difficult. 'Not much' of a backlash from conservatives, predicted one senior White House official. Another Bush adviser credited some large employers with minimizing conflict by giving workers the day off."

The CBS Evening News (5/1, lead story, 3:20, Pitts, 7.66M) reported that unlike "last month's wave of demonstrations, politicians didn't simply take notice, today many showed up. I've talked to people across the country who say how dare people who broke the law by entering the United States now plead with the Senate and the Congress to do something about that?" Sen. Barak Obama, Illinois: "Well, the problem is that we've been engaging in hypocrisy in this country. We don't mind these folks mowing our lawns or looking after our children or serving us at restaurants as long as they don't actually ask for any rights in return." Pitts: "Construction sites in California virtually empty, skeleton crews in Virginia, restaurants across the country closed so workers could join demonstrations. Yet it's the farming industry that likely suffered the most."

The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Muskal, 958K) reports the protests were "in response to efforts by Congress to overhaul immigration policy for the first time in two decades." But they have "become something more, a cry from the normally hidden undocumented community for a way to socially and economically come into the sunlight." The Washington Times (5/2, Richardson, Seper, 90K) offered a less sympathetic view of the protesters, saying they "boycotted their own jobs and stayed away from what they saw as 'gringo' businesses." The protesters "waved US, and Mexican and other Latin American flags as they flooded streets in New York and Los Angeles."

The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Jordan, Kronholz, Brat, 2.11M) was among the few media outlets offering a mixed assessment of the protests' success. The Journal says "attendance at midday rallies across the country was a mixed bag. Hundreds of thousands turned out in places like Chicago to support legal work status for illegal immigrants, but in Texas, Atlanta and other places, turnout was more modest." That "was partly a result of calls within the pro-immigrant community to keep workers and their kids in place until events later in the day." But "it was also due to fear that recently swept through some immigrant communities in the wake of a government crackdown on employers who intentionally hire undocumented workers." The Washington Post (5/2, C1, Montgomery, 744K) addresses that issue as well, and says "the problem is, a guy has to make a living. And if you happen to be a Salvadoran with a green card; with a mortgage, a wife and three kids in Lanham; and two janitorial jobs in D.C. that keep you busy 14 hours a day, you might not have the leverage with the boss to boycott work in a demonstration of how important immigrants are to the US economy." A second Wall Street Journal story (5/2, Newman, Jordan), however, says "sentiment among Hispanics was mixed on yesterday's no-work day. Some 34% of Hispanics said the protest would help the cause of immigrants, but 43% said it would hurt their cause," according to a Pew Poll.

The Washington Post (5/2, A1, Fears, Williams, 744K) reports "the action may have been stronger had the coalition of grass-roots organizations that advises immigrants not been deeply conflicted over whether to endorse a boycott. Some supported the effort to demonstrate immigrant power, but others discouraged it, saying it was premature because Congress has not taken action since the first demonstrations, and because the strike might induce a backlash by those born in the United States."

A number of newspaper stories today tries to measure the protests' impact on the economy. The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Sanchez, 958K) reports "the normally bustling downtown Los Angeles produce and garment districts were virtually shut down today, and truck traffic at the ports was down sharply after many employees protesting the nation's immigration policy's did not show up for work." The Financial Times (5/2, Alden, Johnson, Yeager, Parkes) reports "the biggest effects" of the boycott "appeared to be on restaurants, construction projects and small retail businesses, though hotels and casinos reported little disruption."

The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Ip, 2.11M) seeks to analyze the current immigration debate from a historical perspective. It reports, "Surging immigration unsettles workers and prompts calls to stop the flow. Congress ponders higher tariffs to protect struggling industries. National-security fears heighten anxiety about foreigners. A growing gap between the rich and the middle class fuels angst about globalization. It sounds like today, but it could also be the 1920s. … It could also describe the 1980s. With factory layoffs blamed on imports and public cries to limit illegal immigration, Ronald Reagan struck compromises . His administration persuaded Japan to agree to "voluntary" export restraints, coordinated a drop in the value of the dollar and toughened immigration enforcement while granting amnesty to some. The US kept its doors open to goods, capital and people -- and its economy prospered."

DOJ_NMG_0027606

The New York Times (5/2, O'Donnell, 1.19M) recounts yesterday's events from the perspective of a "corner grocery on Coney Island Avenue in Ditmas Park, Brooklyn." Along "the unusually quiet commercial strip, dozens of Hispanics and Pakistanis joined hands to form a human chain." Meanwhile, the Washington Post (5/2, A9, Brulliard, 744K) profiles Salvadoran shopkeeper Gerardo Sanchez, whose Columbia Heights store "was locked and the sign that normally blinks O-P-E-N in its window was dark" yesterday.

64% Disapprove Of Bush On Immigration; 69% Say Anthem Should Be Sung In English. USA Today (5/2, Nichols, 2.31M) reports, "More than two out of three Americans say the national anthem should be sung only in English, according to a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll." The poll, taken Friday through Sunday, "found that 69% believe it is only appropriate for the anthem to be sung in English, while 29% say it is OK to sing it in Spanish." In addition, "nearly two-thirds -- 64% -- disapproved of Bush's immigration policy; 26% approved."

Rice Claimed As Supporter Of Spanish-Language US Anthem. The AP (5/1, Jelinek) reports, "Promoters of singing" the national anthem "in Spanish are pointing to comments by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice -- and her department's Web site -- as ammunition for their side of the argument." Rice is quoted saying on CBS' Face the Nation Sunday (4/20), "I've heard the national anthem done in rap versions, country versions, classical versions. The individualization of the American national anthem is quite under way." The AP adds, "The State Department site for some time has offered translations of the U.S. Constitution, pledge of allegiance and other documents in French, Arabic and other foreign languages to help people understand America better. This is what promoters say they had in mind with the Spanish anthem recording, which has drawn criticism from Internet bloggers."

Congressional Hispanic Caucus Split On Boycott. Roll Call (5/2, Kornacki) reports, "The 'National Day of Action,' organized to draw attention to the role of undocumented workers in the US economy, provoked diverse reactions from the 22 Democratic members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. On the supportive end, Rep. Raúl Grijalva (Ariz.), who hails from an immigrant-rich section of Tucson, closed his Capitol Hill office for much of the day as a show of solidarity." Others, though, "treaded more gingerly, fearful that mass walkouts from work and school might set their cause back and embolden supporters of the immigration bill that cleared the House in December, which would declare all undocumented workers felons." Roll Call adds, "The varied opinions within the CHC were apparent in a statement released in the run-up to the Day of Action by Rep. Grace Napolitano (Calif.), the group's chairwoman." Napolitano "urged workers not to take 'unnecessary steps that would cause them to put their jobs, families or education at risk,' without explicitly endorsing or opposing the marches and rallies that were planned."

House GOP Lawmakers Push ICE To Prosecute Businesses Shut Down By Boycott. The Washington Times (5/2, Hurt, 90K) reports, "House Republicans called on US Immigration and Customs Enforcement to prosecute businesses shut down yesterday by their illegal alien employees who took the day off to participate in protests of immigration legislation." GOP Reps. Jack Kingston and Marsha Blackburn, in a letter to ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers, "noted 'the multiple reports in the news media today regarding companies which have been forced to halt operations because large numbers of their employees appear to be in the United States illegally and are participating in the protest rallies.' 'ICE has an obligation to use this public information to enforce immigration laws,' they wrote. 'We respectfully request that you look into this matter and report back to us on your findings.'"

Democratic Ads Use Bush, McCain To Attack Kyl On Immigration. The Hill (5/2, Barr) reports that U.S. Senate candidate Jim Pederson (D) is running two ads in which he uses President Bush and Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) to take aim at Arizona Sen. Jon Kyl (R). The Hill notes, "One ad shows Bush with Kyl and says, 'Even President Bush calls Kyl's immigration plan for massive deportation unrealistic.' Bush supports a guest-worker program, which Kyl opposes. The second ad quotes McCain saying Kyl's plan 'borders on fantasy.' McCain and Kyl were on opposite sides of the Senate battle on immigration reform last month."

In Mexico, Some Boycott US Goods For A Day. USA Today (5/2, Harman, 2.31M) reports from Mexico City that "Mexicans staged boycotts of US goods and stores in a show of solidarity with migrants in the USA who cut school and stopped work to call for immigration reform." The Washington Times (5/2, Stevenson, 90K) also reports the story under the headline "Mexicans Boycott US over Migrants."

Some In US Marched Against Illegal Immigration. The New York Times (5/2, Davey, 1.19M) reports, "Around the edges of the immigration demonstrations that filled cities like this one on Monday, there were some who went to disagree. … Compared with the hundreds of thousands who marched urging Congress to consider legal status for some of the 11 million illegal immigrants in this country, far fewer went to speak for the other side." But "advocates for tighter border security and increased enforcement of immigration laws said that their quieter voices were actually more representative of the views of Americans as a whole."

NYTimes Derides "Worst Among Our Citizens And Politicians" Who Are Blocking Reform. The New York

DOJ_NMG_0027607

Times (5/2, 1.19M) editorializes, "Warnings of a crippling immigrant boycott did not come true yesterday. The economy survived. But what may not survive -- we hope -- is people's willful misunderstanding of the nature of the immigrant-rights movement. The worst among our citizens and politicians are eager to depict illegal immigrants as criminals, potential terrorists and alien invaders." But "what we saw yesterday, in huge, peaceful rallies in Los Angeles, Las Vegas, Chicago, Denver, New York, Atlanta and other cities, were regular people: the same types of assimilation-minded moms, dads and children we wistfully romanticize on holidays devoted to, say, St. Patrick and Columbus." Lawmakers "who have stymied comprehensive immigration reform with stalemated name-calling and cold electoral calculation should listen up. A silent, shadow population is speaking with one voice. The message, aimed at Washington but something the whole country should hear, is clear: We are America. We want to join you."

LATimes Says Protests Have Been Successful. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (5/2, 958K) describes Monday's immigration reform march as "yet another passionate and upbeat street party." The paper says it "shared the concern of those who felt a labor walkout might come across as economic blackmail, but the tenor of the day was overwhelmingly positive." The Times continues, "The scale and tenor of the demonstrations have had the salutary and corrective benefit of marginalizing those who conflate Latino immigration with crime, a lack of patriotism, a security threat or any other ill under the sun. Six months ago, opponents of reform drove the political debate. No more." The Times goes on to say, "The singular triumph of this spring's protests is that they have indelibly attached a human face to a debate dominated by dehumanizing words such as 'illegals' and 'aliens.'"

Williams Says DHS Working To Respond To Immigration Concerns. Jim Williams, director of the Homeland Security Department's US-VISIT program office, in an op-ed in USA Today (5/2, 2.31M) writes that DHS "is implementing a comprehensive border security strategy to shut down vulnerabilities in our immigration and border management system and aggressively enforce our immigration laws." Williams continues that the US has "built a more effective and reliable system for welcoming legitimate travelers to our country while protecting privacy and meeting our critical security goals. … The challenges we face at our borders were years in the making, but the transformation of our immigration and border management system is well underway."

USA Today Says US-VISIT Unable To Handle Visa Overstays. USA Today (5/2, 2.31M) editorializes that while the stereotypical illegal immigrant is "a Spanish-speaking worker who sneaked across the porous Mexican border in search of a job," at least 3.8 million illegals in the US "came from all over the world, stayed longer than their visas or entry documents allowed, and melted into society," just as "four of the 19 Sept. 11 hijackers did, according to a 2004 report by Congress' Government Accountability Office." USA Today states that to find and deport all of the "overstays" in the US, "the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) would need three things: an effective system to track all foreign entrants, another to track those who leave, and enough agents and judicial manpower to go after those who remain illegally. It has none of those." Meanwhile, US-VISIT, touted by former DHS undersecretary Asa Hutchinson as a way "to know who is overstaying their visa," has not delivered "because of how DHS has chosen to run it."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Blast Bush For More Than 750 Signing Statements. The Boston Globe (5/2, Savage, 484K) reports that three leading Democratic Senators, Minority Leader Harry Reid, Patrick Leahy and Edward Kennedy yesterday blasted President Bush "for having claimed he has the authority to defy more than 750 statutes enacted since he took office, saying that the president's legal theories are wrong and that he must obey the law." Reid said in a statement, "'It is not for George W. Bush to disregard the Constitution and decide that he is above the law." Leahy "accused Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney of attempting to concentrate ever more government power in their own hands." Kennedy "also said that the Bush administration, abetted by 'a compliant Republican Congress,' was undermining the checks and balances that 'guard against abuses of power by any single branch of government.'" The Democrats "were reacting to a report in Sunday's Boston Globe detailing the scope of Bush's assertions that he can ignore laws that conflict with his interpretation of the Constitution."

Medicare Prescription Drug Benefit Projected To Cost 20% Less. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Lueck, 2.11M) reports Medicare's "prescription-drug benefit will cost the government about 20% less during the next decade than was projected a year ago, but largely for reasons outside the government's control." The Medicare actuaries said "most of the reduction will result from lower-than-expected growth in the nation's per capita drug spending." The actuaries "said fewer people than expected are signing up for the new coverage. Since last year, Medicare actuaries have lowered estimates for enrollment by May 15 -- this year's deadline for signing up -- from about 37 million to 31.4 million, a move that fueled calls in Congress to give people more time to sign up." Last year, Medicare's actuaries "estimated the benefit would cost a total of $997 billion over 10 years, not including savings to Medicaid. Now that estimate is $788 billion. Another reason for the reduction: The private insurers selling the new, government-subsidized coverage achieved discounts on medications sooner than the actuaries had expected."

DOJ_NMG_0027608

Flake Says Republicans Should Not Be Proud Of Medicare Drug Benefit. The Washington Times (5/2, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column that Rep. Jeff Flake is "upset that the House Republican leadership continues to encourage GOP members 'to boast' about the new Medicare prescription-drug entitlement. Because of the new entitlement, '30 million people are more dependent on the federal government than they were a year ago, and future generations will have to foot the bill,' he says. 'That is something that no party professing to believe in limited government should be proud of.'"

Democrats Still Hope To Exploit Discontent With Drug Benefit. The Hill (5/2, Young) reports, "Despite a recent stream of apparently good news about the Medicare prescription-drug benefit, congressional Democrats are counting on their criticisms to translate into political gains in the midterm elections." Sen. Debbie Stabenow recently said, "I don't know of any Democrat who thinks this is working the way it should. You betcha this is going to be an issue [in November.]" The Hill adds Democrats have "described the drug benefit as a disaster and said senior citizens would be too confused to choose the right plan. But that strategy could prove risky. The Medicare figures show that nearly all beneficiaries now have some form of drug coverage, and recent polls suggest that seniors who have joined a drug plan are satisfied with their coverage." Many congressional Republicans "shied away from the program and criticized the Bush administration's handling of its implementation this year. But Republicans are changing their tune. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) has become an enthusiastic cheerleader, as his office has taken to launching almost daily statements praising it." But in "spite of the apparent shift of political momentum amid improving public opinion, Democrats see the drug program as a ticking time bomb of discontent among senior citizens."

Trustees Say Medicare, Social Security Finances Are Worsening. The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Alonso-Zaldivar, Havemann, 958K) reports, "The financial condition of Medicare is growing progressively worse and its problems will soon eclipse those of Social Security, the trustees of the government's two biggest programs said today." But the "warning — for all its urgency — appeared unlikely to spur major action during an election year." Social Security expenses "were projected to overtake income after 2017, as last year, and to deplete the program's financial cushion in 2040, one year earlier than estimated a year ago. Unless changes are made, Social Security will then be able to pay only 74% of promised benefits." But Medicare is "a more serious matter. The soaring cost of healthcare has the program on the edge of bankruptcy." The "huge Medicare fund for inpatient hospital care will not be able to cover the full amount of billings beginning in 2018, two years earlier than estimated last year."

The story was covered in brief by ABC and CBS last night, while NBC did not mention the entitlement programs' financing. ABC World News Tonight (5/1, story 8, :25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Another government report calculates that the day when the Social Security and Medicare programs run out of money is growing closer." The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 5, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "We got a new reminder today that the Social Security and Medicare programs need to be fixed."

USA Today (5/2, 2.31M) reports the trustees, "who include the head of the Social Security Administration and three members of President Bush's Cabinet, gave a sober assessment of the health of the two programs in advance of the looming retirements of 78 million baby boomers."

The Washington Times (5/2, Fagan, 90K) reports Administration officials "said the bleak outlook is all the more reason for Congress to significantly reform both programs." President Bush's "efforts to change Social Security stalled in Congress last year, with even some Republicans hesitant to support his plan to create personal accounts. And Medicare spending is unlikely to be cut by Congress this election year, as Mr. Bush has suggested."

The New York Times (5/2, Pear, 1.19M) reports, "Lawmakers said they would never allow the trust funds to run dry. But the insolvency dates are a vivid way of showing that the programs are unsustainable. To keep them solvent, Congress would need to trim benefits, raise taxes or take some combination of such steps." Speaking at the American Hospital Association, President Bush said, "The systems are going broke." The Times adds, "Almost every element of the programs reflects a political judgment, but Mr. Bush said, 'It's time to set aside politics and restructure Social Security and Medicare for generations to come.'" Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "said the reports showed that 'despite White House scare tactics, Social Security remains sound for decades to come.'"

The AP (5/2, Crutsinger) reports Treasury Secretary John Snow, "the chairman of the trustees group, said the new report depicted 'a looming fiscal crisis as the baby boom generation moves into retirement' and he urged Congress to move forward." But Democrats "charged that the administration was using the trustees reports to try to create an air of crisis to make radical changes to the two benefit programs." Rep. Pete Stark said, "There is no crisis. There remains plenty of time to mend rather than end Medicare."

The Washington Post (5/2, A3, Goldstein, 744K) reports, "In releasing the report, the trustees -- including three of Bush's Cabinet secretaries -- slightly altered the message accompanying the forecast the past few years, when the administration sought to use the predictions as leverage to persuade a reluctant Congress to embrace the president's goal of letting Americans divert some of their payroll taxes into personal retirement accounts. That emphasis prompted Democrats and other critics to chastise the administration for dwelling on Social Security while Medicare's problems were more acute."

DOJ_NMG_0027609

Knight Ridder (5/2, Pugh) reports the Medicare Hospital Insurance trust fund, "which pays primarily for inpatient care and is funded through a 2.9 percent payroll tax, is already operating at a deficit and is projected to hit a new low in 2012. By then, total Medicare spending will exceed program funding by 45 percent, the report found." If that "projected funding gap is not closed by next year's report, the projected shortfall would be considered a 'funding warning,' triggering a requirement that the president must offer a legislative remedy to Congress that must be considered on an expedited basis." The report "also found funding problems with Social Security, the nation's largest entitlement program. Without changes, tax revenues for Social Security are expected to fall below program costs in 2017, the same estimate as last year's report."

Bush "Reforms" Said To Have Hurt Medicare Solvency. The Washington Post (5/2, Milbank, 744K) reports an "hour after Bush finished his speech" at the American Hospital Association, where he touted his Medicare Modernization Act of 2003, "Treasury Secretary John W. Snow kicked off a news conference announcing the latest on Medicare's financial standing. The "modernized," cost-effective program is forecast to go belly-up in 2018 -- two years earlier than previously forecast. Somebody stop us before we reform again.

Bush Urges Congress To Take Steps Toward Slowing Medical Spending. The AP (5/2) reports President Bush "said Monday health care costs are rising at an unacceptably fast pace and he called on Congress to enact White House proposals to tame medical expenses." Speaking to the American Hospital Association, Bush said "private health insurance premiums have risen 73 percent in the last five years, forcing some businesses to drop health coverage for their employees and prompting others to raise co-payments and premiums." Bush said, "This is unacceptable for this country to have health care costs rising as fast as they are. If we want to be the leader of the world, we must do something about it. And my administration is determined to do something about it."

WSJournal Says Romney Healthcare Plan Becoming Employer Mandate. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "Only two weeks ago Massachusetts passed an experiment in compulsory, subsidized health insurance, and already it's turning into an employer mandate and a vehicle for increasing the role of government." Last week "the Democrat-controlled Massachusetts legislature began moving in just that direction, overriding all of the line-item vetoes that Republican Governor Mitt Romney had cast in an effort to give the state's new insurance law a market-oriented veneer." If Governor Romney "thinks care for the uninsured is expensive now, wait until Massachusetts taxpayers see how much his government-heavy 'solution' costs."

Frist Retreats From Plan To Raise Oil Company Taxes. The AP (5/2, Hebert) reports, "Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, under pressure from business leaders, retreated Monday from a plan that would have used a tax increase on oil companies and other businesses to fund a $100 gasoline rebate for millions of motorists." Frist "had proposed an accounting change that would have required oil companies to pay more taxes on their inventory of crude as a way to pay the one-time rebate which GOP leaders rolled out last week as they scrambled to find ways to ease public anger over soaring gasoline prices." In a statement, Frist "said he will still push the rebate, but abandoned the accounting change and said the Senate Finance Committee planned a hearing on the issue in the near future."

The New York Times (5/2, Hulse, 1.19M) calls Frist's move "another sign of their struggle to come up with an acceptable political and legislative answer to high gasoline prices." His "retreat" came "after a torrent of objections from business leaders and their advocates, who typically view Republicans in Congress as allies." The decision "eliminates a chief source of revenue to pay for the rebate checks to be mailed to an estimated 100 million taxpayers." The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Meckler, 2.11M) reports Amy Call, a spokeswoman for Frist, "said the $100 rebates would cost $15 billion. Now senators will 'look for other options' to make up the lost revenue, Ms. Call said, adding that they also might simply move the bill without any additions, meaning the increased spending will add to the deficit." The reversal "demonstrates how politically difficult it can be to raise taxes, even at a time when high gasoline prices have made highly profitable oil companies unpopular."

NYTimes Calls $100 Gas Rebate Proposal "Desperate Political Pandering." An editorial in the New York Times (5/2) says, "The public derision of Republicans' idea for a $100 gasoline rebate has focused on the desperate political pandering embodied in the proposal. … With the nation already deeply in debt -- and with Congress angling this week to cut taxes for affluent investors by more than $20 billion -- lawmakers would need to borrow $10 billion to make the rebates happen. Since more than 80 percent of the immense borrowing of the Bush years has been from foreigners, it's safe to assume that most of the rebates would be courtesy of foreign lenders, of which China has been one of the most willing. It's the circle of crude: China's competition for the world's oil is pushing up prices. Congress piles on more debt to calm angry consumers with a rebate. The increased debt is a prescription for a weaker dollar, which in turn would make imports, including oil, even more expensive."

DOJ_NMG_0027610

McClellan Says US Energy Situation In "Crisis." CNN's The Situation Room (5/1, Henry) reported, "A second senior Bush official has now used the word crisis to describe the nation's energy problem, the White House appearing to try to prepare consumers for the worse. Today, it was White House spokesman Scott McClellan, who was pressed on the fact that, yesterday, Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman used the word crisis, and added that, in fact, it may take up to three years for gas prices to come back down substantially. Asked if the President agrees with his energy secretary, McClellan danced a little bit. He added a caveat, but he used the word crisis."

85% Believe Government Could Do Something About Oil Prices If It Tried. U.S. News and World Report (5/8, Lavelle) reports that leaders of both parties last week "took turns pledging to dispatch the IRS to slap around the oil companies -- take away tax breaks, hit them with a windfall-profits tax, and even haul them in for a good audit." While there is "nothing the federal government can do in the short term about a global imbalance in oil supply and demand, the nuclear ambitions of an oil-rich Iran, and a shortage of US gasoline refining capacity," pollster Daniel Yankelovich has found that "85 percent of Americans believe the government could do something about oil prices if it tried."

Ten States To Sue Federal Government To Force Higher SUV Mileage Regulations. The New York Times (5/2, Hakim, 1.19M) reports, "Ten states, including California and New York, plan to file suit this week to force the Bush administration to toughen mileage regulations for sport utility vehicles and other trucks." The suit, which the states are to announce today, "contends that the administration did not do a rigorous enough analysis of the environmental benefits of fuel economy regulations, as required by law, before issuing new rules for S.U.V.'s, pickup trucks and minivans last month." The suit will also "claim that the government did not consider the impact of gasoline consumption on climate change when devising the new rules." California "will be lead plaintiff in the suit, which also includes Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New Mexico, Oregon, Rhode Island and Vermont, as well as New York City and the District of Columbia."

Rising Gasoline Prices Could Strain Non-Aggression Pact Between Oil, Auto Industries. The Hill (5/2, Snyder) reports in its "Business and Lobbying" column, "The high price of gasoline and the growing call for congressional action are undermining the gentleman's agreement under which the oil and auto lobbies do not attack each other. Tyson Slocum, an energy specialist at Public Citizen, said the two lobbies have benefited from a 'non-aggression pact.' But as pressure mounts on Capitol Hill against the oil industry, which has been reporting huge profits, the truce may be ending, Slocum said. … Sources in both the oil and auto camps say there is no split yet. But several lobbyists acknowledged that tensions appear to be rising in a political environment where even some Republicans, long oil-industry allies, are calling for what the industry considers to be punitive measures."

State Attempts To Prove Price Gouging Prove Difficult. USA Today (5/2, Healey, Krantz, 2.31M) reports that "it is hard" for state "authorities to prove consumers are being ripped off even in times of extraordinary price increases. Attorneys general in at least nine states, responding to outrage by their residents, are investigating whether current high gasoline prices are a result of wrongdoing by the petroleum industry, according to the National Association of Attorneys General." Some states "have made price-gouging cases. Florida sued individual gas stations for overcharging after Katrina. But Florida, unlike Arizona, has an anti-gouging law. It is in effect only when a state of emergency is declared. Florida was a hurricane target, making an emergency declaration logical."

Higher Gasoline Prices Hurting Government Budgets. NBC Nightly News (5/1, story 10, 1:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "With gas hovering at around $3 a gallon, it can't help must have an effect on the nation as a whole from the ground up. That includes city budgets." NBC (Costello) added, "It's happening nationwide, skyrocketing fuel prices putting the squeeze on city, state, and county budgets. Next week, the US Conference of Mayors will hold an urgent energy summit in Chicago. Long Beach Mayor Beverly O'Neill is the conference president." Mayor Beverly O'Neill, Long Beach, California: "It's just eating our budgets alive, and we have to have an entirely new direction to facing our budgets, not just yearly but probably month-to-month."

Higher Gas Prices Yet To Significantly Change Driver Behavior. Although gas prices continue to rise, the increased costs for consumers have yet to register in their behavior. ABC World News Tonight (5/1, story 10, 2:05, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "A gallon of gas now costs, on average, $2.92. That's up 50 cents over last week, and 31% higher than a year ago." ABC (Pinto) added, "Gasoline is still cheaper than it was during the when the prices soared in the early '80s. Adjusted for inflation, prices then would be nearly 50 cents a gallon higher than they are now. Economists say it will take steeper price hikes to really change drivers' behavior." Michelle Michot Foss, Center for Energy Economics, University of Texas: "You'd have to have a price per gallon that would really make a difference, in terms of how you chose to spend your budget, than what we have now. I would say north of $5 for sure."

DOJ_NMG_0027611

The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 4, 3:40, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "We are now paying, by the way, 37 cents a gallon more for gas than we were just a month ago." However, says USA Today (5/2, Healey, 2.31M), "prices have stopped their spring-loaded daily leaps," even if "it's too soon to say the worst is over. The numbers on the pump have declined slightly three consecutive days, to a nationwide average $2.919 a gallon Monday, according to travel club AAA. It's the first time that's happened since late March." But "the March respite totaled just 0.8 of a cent over three days and turned out to be only a hiccup before prices zipped higher." AAA "warns that might happen again."

Woolsey Says Buying Less Foreign Oil Will Make US More Secure. The Pittsburgh Tribune Review (5/2, Cato) reports during a visit to Pittsburgh Monday, former CIA Director R. James Woolsey said that a terrorist attack on Saudi Arabian oil refineries could drive crude oil prices above $150 a barrel and keep them there for more than a year. Woolsey said most Americans "don't want to think about where some of the money goes when they buy gasoline -- to groups that threaten the U.S. … And it's not just terrorists, but established Middle Eastern regimes that restrict women's rights, have poor education systems and fail to invest in their societies. … One way to beat that -- and hit Islamic extremists in the pocketbook -- is for Americans to start using renewable fuel, Woolsey said. That includes ethanol and biofuels as alternatives to gas and diesel. … Buying less foreign oil will make the United States more secure, Woolsey said, by providing less money to Middle Eastern groups -- particularly radical Islamists."

Frist Proposal May Sidestep Lawsuit Over Deficit Reduction Act. Roll Call (5/2, Yachnin) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "is considering legislative options to end an ongoing a dispute over Medicare payments to a group of Tennessee hospitals, in the process potentially shelving what could be the first test of the 2005 budget reconciliation act's constitutionality." A Frist aide said, "Frist is working with [Finance] Chairman [Chuck] Grassley [R-Iowa] to explore legislative options." Roll Call adds the 2004 lawsuit of Cookeville Regional Medical Center v. Thompson "centers on a disagreement over how certain Medicare payments should be calculated." While "at least four other challenges to the law's constitutionality have been filed in federal court — including a lawsuit filed Friday by 11 senior House Democrats — the Cookeville case could produce the first ruling on the law's validity because it is already under way."

Senate Republicans Seek To Reclaim Issue Of Fiscal Discipline. Roll Call (5/2, Billings) reports, "Feeling increasing heat from their base for living too high on the hog, Republican Senators are putting in place an election-year strategy to try to reclaim the fiscal discipline brand that helped the GOP win and maintain its majority for more than a decade." Republican Conference sources "say that the leadership plans to make federal spending a major piece of its 2006 campaign. Those sources say there is a widespread acknowledgement that a wake-up call on spending is overdue and that the party must start pushing forth initiatives and a message to show voters it is serious about getting the federal government in the black." GOP Senators and aides "said that to make their case, the majority will spend the coming months holding numerous press events on federal spending, the budget and earmarks. Republicans also plan to push for Senate passage of a line-item veto and possibly revisit the issue of a two-year appropriations process." With "fiscal discipline squarely on the GOP must-do list, several Republican Congressional sources also said that the Senate is already sending signals to the House Republican leadership that, except for Defense and Homeland Security, consideration of the fiscal 2007 appropriations bills likely will be pushed off until after the November elections."

The Christian Science Monitor (5/2, Chaddock, 61K) reports Congress "is on track for its boldest step yet" at cutting back earmarks because Republicans "are increasingly anxious about this fall's elections, and, with gas prices soaring, the public is paying attention to waste and corruption in Washington." In the House, "still reeling from the scandals involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and ex-Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, Republican leaders are pushing for the disclosure of the names of members who propose earmarks and are seeking a process to remove them." In the Senate, "the fight is over reining in spending. In a political move only used once before in the US Senate, freshman Sen. Tom Coburn (R) of Oklahoma is forcing his colleagues this week to vote on individual pork projects attached to a $106.5 billion emergency defense bill."

Coburn Unlikely To Get Votes On Challenges To Earmarks In Spending Bill. Roll Call (5/2, Stanton) reports in its "Roadmap" column, "The Senate will wrap up its short-lived debate over the growing use of supplemental appropriations bills as a vehicle for pork-barrel spending midweek, as the chamber is expected to approve a fiscal 2006 supplemental package by Wednesday that includes most of the nearly $14 billion in controversial earmarks that touched the fight last week. … Frist filed cloture on the bill last Thursday, essentially limiting reformers' opportunities to whittle away at the bill's price tag by forcing a series of politically embarrassing votes on 17 controversial earmarks challenged by Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.). Although at press time Republicans were still working out the details of which amendments to the bill would be considered, a GOP leadership aide indicated that Coburn would not get a floor vote on all of his amendments."

DOJ_NMG_0027612

WSJournal Praises Boehner Win On Budget Changes. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "In the eternal battle against Congressional pork-barrel, we'll take even modest victories wherever we can find them. Following a bruising 12-round, behind-the-scenes prize fight last week between new House Majority Leader John Boehner and Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis, Mr. Boehner won on a technical knockout." Boehner "and fellow House GOP leaders wanted to attach budget changes to an otherwise useless lobbying-reform bill." Lewis "threatened to bring the whole lobbying bill down on the House floor with the help of most of his 36 fellow GOP appropriators, including a threat to bar money for projects in the districts of Members who dared support the bill. But Mr. Lewis backed down at the last moment, lest he and his big-spending mates be blamed for another embarrassing Republican defeat."

Lewis, House Appropriators Challenging GOP Leadership. The Washington Post (5/2, A4, Weisman, 744K) reports that as House Republicans' "unity frays in a difficult election year, House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) and his expansive 66-member panel are challenging the GOP leadership and Republican conservatives." In April, Lewis "and his committee nearly derailed high-profile legislation, first forcing GOP leaders to pull their 2007 budget blueprint from House debate and then bringing consideration of a major lobbying and ethics bill to a halt Thursday. Only after House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) pleaded, saying that his reputation was at stake, did committee members allow the lobbying bill to proceed to a vote, now scheduled for tomorrow."

"Budget-Cutting Proposal" Would Cut Funds For Indian Medical Clinics. The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Verhovek, 958K) reports that "in a budget-cutting proposal that has set off protests and indignation among Indians from Los Angeles to New York and several smaller cities in between, the Bush administration has proposed eliminating funds for" clinics which served about 106,000 Indians last year. Thirty-four such clinics across the nation are intended to serve about "70% of American Indians who live in urban areas, not on a tribal reservation." The Times adds, "Under the plan, Native Americans in urban areas would use the already overburdened municipal clinics, hospitals and other health services that most Americans use -- and that many Indians say have no concept of their traditional forms of care and healing, which are often used in tandem with modern healthcare." If the Congress adopts the proposed cuts, "at least half of the 34 clinics would face sudden closure, while the rest would have to curtail services, said Greg Fine of the National Council of Urban Indian Health, a nonprofit alliance in Washington."

Opponents Of GOP Lobbying Reform Bill Pessimistic. The Hill (5/2, Hearn, Schor) reports opponents "of the House GOP leadership's upcoming lobbying and ethics reform bill were pessimistic yesterday that they could defeat it, noting that increased support among Democrats would likely offset any erosion of enthusiasm in the Republican ranks." GOP leaders "narrowly won a vote last week on a closed rule to bring the reform measure to the floor. The outcome of that vote signified that GOP leaders would face a tough, but not hopeless, battle to muster the votes to pass the lobbying reform measure itself this week."

OPM Launches Effort To Lure Applicants To Federal Workforce. The Office of Personnel Management has announced a media campaign aimed at luring talented applicants to the federal workforce. The Washington Post (5/2, A19, Goldfarb, Lee, 744K) reports that the campaign comes "at the same time that a new study says the government needs to do a more effective job of recruiting college students for federal jobs. Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management, said the agency will begin airing four 30-second television ads featuring federal employees touting the work they do and encouraging viewers to explore job opportunities at http://www.usajobs.gov/." The Washington Post also reports on the OPM campaign in its "Federal Diary" column this morning.

Pelosi Wants Ethics Investigation Of Prostitution Allegations. Roll Call (5/2, Bresnahan) reports House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "called for an ethics committee investigation into whether two defense contractors supplied now-imprisoned former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) and other lawmakers with prostitutes, free hotel rooms and limousine rides." Pelosi urged Speaker Dennis Hastert to "join her in introducing a bipartisan resolution that directs the ethics panel to look into the allegations, notwithstanding an ongoing criminal probe by the Justice Department into Cunningham's activities. Traditionally, the ethics committee has avoided becoming involved in any matter in which DOJ has already begun a criminal investigation."

CIA Confirms Foggo Attended Poker Games. The CIA has confirmed that its third-ranking official, Executive Director Kyle "Dusty" Foggo attended poker games in Washington hotel hospitality suites which are the focus of a federal criminal investigation. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Paltrow, 2.11M) reports, "A CIA spokeswoman said Mr. Foggo strongly denies anything improper occurred while he was present during the games, held at times in the Watergate and Westin Grand hotels in Washington. As reported, federal prosecutors in San Diego and Federal Bureau of Investigation agents have evidence the suites were paid for by Poway, Calif., defense contractor Brent Wilkes, an unindicted co-conspirator in the bribery case involving former California congressman Randall 'Duke' Cunningham. .. Prosecutors are looking into whether Mr. Wilkes and contractor Mitchell Wade, who has pleaded guilty to bribing Mr. Cunningham, had supplied prostitutes and the suites' use to Mr. Cunningham and possibly other members of Congress from the 1990s until 2005."

DOJ_NMG_0027613

Bush Job Approval At 34% In USA Today/Gallup Poll. USA Today (5/2, Jackson, 2.31M) reports the latest USA Today/Gallup poll shows, "Six months before Republicans try to hold on to control of Congress in the fall elections, a new poll shows President Bush has slid to the lowest approval rating of his presidency, and a majority of voters say they'll vote for Democrats in November." The poll, conducted over April 28-30 "found Bush's approval rating at 34%, two points under his previous low. He also received the lowest ratings of his presidency on his handling of the economy, energy and foreign affairs. He tied his previous low on Iraq: 32%." The poll "showed Democrats leading 54%-39% among registered voters who were asked which party they would prefer in a congressional race."

In CBS Poll, 71% Say US Moving In Wrong Direction. The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 3, 0:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "A CBS News poll out tonight shows that 71% of those polled now believe America is heading in the wrong direction. That is the highest number since CBS News first asked that question nearly 25 years ago. The President gets low marks on handling immigration and especially on rising gas prices. Only 17% approve of his handling of that one."

Boehner's Office Holds Weekly Meetings With Vulnerable Republicans. House Majority Leader John Boehner's office has been holding weekly meetings with aides of potentially vulnerable house Republicans out of what The Hill (5/2, O'Connor) calls "concern about retaining the majority in November." The sessions "are part of a larger outreach effort by the majority leader to improve communications with every member of the Republican Conference. The weekly gatherings are an opportunity for the leader's staff to walk the rank-and-file staffers through the upcoming agenda and hear from the offices about the political climate in some of the party's most competitive districts. … Some of the members involved include Republican Reps. Steve Chabot (Ohio), Mike Fitzpatrick (Pa.), Jim Gerlach (Pa.), Bob Ney (Ohio), Dave Reichert (Wash.), Clay Shaw (Fla.) and Heather Wilson (N.M.). Each of those members' districts is among the party's most competitive, according to a chart compiled by The Cook Political Report."

"Gang Of 14's" Deal On Judicial Nominees Seen As Win For Bush. Cesar Conda, former assistant for domestic policy to Vice President Cheney, a senior fellow at FreedomWorks and a principal of Navigators LLC, writes in Roll Call (5/2) that while the compromise forged between President Bush and the so-called "Gang of 14" lawmakers on judicial nominees was "roundly and universally criticized," it "turns out the Republican Senators of the 'Gang of 14' were mostly right — at least so far." The Gang's Republicans "were attacked from the right for their supposed betrayal of the party and of the people. The compromise was viewed, in their minds, as a capitulation — a surrender of Republicans' ability to force an up-or-down vote on all judicial nominees. … But since the agreement went into effect, seven of Bush's previously blocked nominees — some of whom were waiting for more than four years to get a vote in the Senate — are now judges in the United States Courts of Appeal."

OTHER NEWS:

New Reports Continue To Show Strong Economy. Under the headline "Economy's Hot Streak Continues," the Wall Street Journal (5/2, Whitehouse, 2.11M) reports, "The first significant piece of economic data for April reinforced the widening view that the US economy entered the second quarter with a good deal of momentum. But a whiff of inflation fueled concern that the Federal Reserve will be forced to step harder on the brakes." The Institute for Supply Management, "a purchasing managers' trade group, said yesterday that its index of manufacturing activity came in at 57.3 for April, higher than expected and up from 55.2 in March. Any level above 50 suggests that the manufacturing sector is growing. A reading in the mid-50s is strong for an economy already in its fifth year of expansion." Separately, "two reports from the Commerce Department showed US consumers going strong in March. Personal consumption rose 0.6%, and a jump in home improvements helped boost construction spending by 0.9%. Both numbers were higher than economists' expectations for the month." The New York Times (5/2, Bajaj, 1.19M) runs a similar report under the headline "Construction And Consumer Spending Rise," and says "personal spending and income increased more than economists had projected and inflation rose modestly in the month."

US Dollar Down. The Washington Post (5/2, D1, Blustein, 744K) reports, "The US dollar is having a sinking spell -- which is good news for US manufacturers and bad news for American tourists traveling abroad. Spurring the greenback's slide are recent statements by top economic policymakers, notably declarations about the need to reduce global trade imbalances." The dollar "has suffered sharp losses against other currencies the past two weeks, and yesterday it hit a fresh, seven-month low against the Japanese yen. Although it rallied yesterday afternoon against the euro, it fell to an 11-month low against the European currency earlier in the day and is down nearly 6 percent against the euro since late February."

DOJ_NMG_0027614

Stock Markets Finish Down. NBC Nightly News (5/1, story 12, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street here in New York, the Dow lost nearly 24 points [to close at 11,343.29]. The Nasdaq was down nearly 18 [to close at 2,304.79]." The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Browning, 2.11M) says the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.41%, or 5.42 points, to 1305.19, "up 4.6% this year."

USA Today (5/2, Shell, 2.31M) reports the stock market "was on the verge of posting a five-year high Monday but ended in the red after a late-afternoon report on CNBC left the door open for more interest rate increases by the Federal Reserve." Last week, stocks rallied after Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke "suggested in his prepared remarks Thursday to Congress that the Fed was nearing the end of its nearly two-year-long interest rate-raising campaign and might pause after raising rates for the 16th-consecutive time at its May 10 meeting." But "a report on the business channel aired Monday noted that Bernanke said over the weekend that financial markets had misinterpreted the Fed's language last week and that Fed policy remained 'flexible.'" He also "reiterated that the Fed rate decisions would be determined by economic data." The Washington Post (5/2, D3, Henderson, 744K) runs a similar story under the headline "Investors Misunderstood Bernanke Testimony, CNBC Anchor Says."

Supreme Court Rules In Favor Of Anna Nicole Smith. The Supreme Court yesterday unanimously decided Anna Nicole Smith could pursue her claim against the estate of her late husband, J. Howard Marshall.

The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 9, 2:00, Andrews, 7.66M) reported, "Smith just won a unanimous decision from the Supreme Court and kept alive a claim to $88 million from her late husband's estate." Smith "claimed that her husband wanted to give her half his estate, close to a half billion dollars, but that his son, E. Pierce Marshall, blocked the deal." What Smith "has actually won is the right to press her claim again in Federal court, where Pierce Marshall has vowed a fight which she and her lawyers can 'take to the bank.'"

NBC Nightly News (5/1, story 11, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This doesn't mean she gets the money she wanted. It means she gets to keep fighting for it in Federal court. The fight is against her late husband's son. It is a family battle that will likely go on for years."

The New York Times (5/2, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "In an opinion by Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, the court ruled unanimously that the dispute between Ms. Smith and her late husband's son E. Pierce Marshall was properly one for the federal courts." The AP (5/2, Holland) also reports on the ruling.

Child Advocacy Group Sues Video Firms Over Child-Learning Claims. The Washington Post (5/2, D3, Mayer) reports, "A child-advocacy group whose mission is to limit marketing aimed at children yesterday asked the federal government to bar two major baby-video companies from promoting their products as educational and beneficial to child development." The Post continues, "The Campaign for a Commercial-Free Childhood filed a complaint with the Federal Trade Commission, saying Baby Einstein Co. and Brainy Baby Co. should not be able to say their products inspire 'logical thinking,' foster 'the development of your toddler's speech and language skills,' or give 'your child a jumpstart on learning.'" The Post adds, "The group said the claims are deceptive, since there is no proof that these increasingly popular videos are beneficial and educational. In fact, it said, 'research shows that television viewing is potentially harmful for infants and toddlers,' because it could adversely affect cognitive development if it replaces creative play and interaction with a child's parents and surroundings. … The CCFC's complaint comes at a time when the baby-video market is booming, with more than $1 billion in sales so far in videos aimed at children 2 and younger. Baby Einstein, owned by Walt Disney Co., has the largest share of the market, and sales last year reached $200 million."

Quality Of Life Issues Increasingly Important To Young Attorneys. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, Jones) reports, "At most big law firms, the partner-associate compact goes something like this: The partners give the associates big salaries, meals on the client, cars home at night, fancy offices, secretaries and a prestigious name on their résumés. The associates give their complete professional devotion and availability -- every hour of the day, every day of the year. … That compact has gone unspoken, and largely unquestioned, until recently." The Journal continues, "More and more associates at law firms across the U.S. are second guessing whether they want to sign over their lives to their jobs. Some are working fewer hours. Some are losing interest in making partner. And they are leaving big law firms in droves. … Two decades ago, few segments of the work force routinely put in longer hours than young law-firm associates, who toiled day and night to please partner-masters and climb the firms' ranks. But many today 'are more interested in going to their children's soccer games' than they are in staying in the office late in the hopes of getting extra work done or making a good impression, says Joseph Altonji, a consultant with Hildebrandt International, a law-firm consultancy in Chicago."

DOJ_NMG_0027615

DeLay Spent Over $400,000 On Legal Defense In First Quarter Of 2006. New Filings show that Rep. Tom DeLay spent more than $400,000 in the first quarter of this year on legal fees and expenses connected to raising money for his legal defense fund. Roll Call (5/2, Kane) reports that DeLay's legal defense fund 'burned through $312,000 in expenses in the first quarter of the year, paying out fees to four different law firms representing the former House Majority Leader on two different legal fronts." In addition, DeLay paid $110,000 out of his campaign committee to a firm in January. Roll Call adds, "Aides to DeLay said no final decision had been made with regard to how the lawmaker will finance his mounting legal bills once he retires from the House, which is expected to happen sometime in June. But the simplest course would be to continue to raise money through a privatized version of the Tom DeLay Legal Expense Trust and raise unlimited donations without having to publicly report who the donors are."

Giuliani Campaigns For GOP Candidates In Iowa. Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani was in Iowa Monday to raise funds for Republican congressional candidate Jeff Lamberti and Rep. Jim Nussle, who is running for governor. The AP (5/2, Glover) reports that Giuliani, who is considering a 2008 presidential bid said the GOP "must increasingly be 'a big party' that accepts divergent views. Giuliani said that broad-brush themes, like limited government, ought to define the Republican Party -- not hot-button social issues like abortion and gay rights."

The New York Times (5/2, Healy, 1.19M) reports that Giuliani said he was "seriously exploring whether he has 'a chance' of winning the presidency in 2008, as he visited politically important Iowa and huddled with state advisers, donors to President Bush and other prominent Republicans." The Times notes that while Giuliani was in Iowa to campaign for GOP candidates, "his behavior and remarks came close to politicking for himself."

Romney Plans Speech To Address His Religious Beliefs. U.S. News and World Report (5/8, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column, "About two months before the heated 1960 election, John F. Kennedy tried to put to rest the whole debate over his Catholicism to beat Richard Nixon. … Now, 46 years later, Massachusetts has coughed up another presidential hopeful who belongs to what some see as a weird religion--the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints." The candidate, Republican Gov. Mitt Romney "says he'll give a similar address, in which he will pledge allegiance to the Constitution, not the Mormon church. It will be a simple approach: Explain the religion, maybe touch on the banned practice of polygamy, then ask voters to judge him on his years in business, as head of the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City, and as the Bay State's governor."

Clark Eyeing Another Presidential Bid. U.S. News and World Report (5/8, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that 2004 hopeful Wes Clark "is mulling a second presidential bid."

Kerrey Sends Fundraising E-Mail For Kerry. The Washington Times (5/2, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "In an e-mail solicitation sent yesterday, former Sen. Bob Kerrey, Nebraska Democrat, appeals for contributions to the presidential campaign of Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat. In his e-mail, Mr. Kerrey of Nebraska praises Mr. Kerry of Massachusetts for his 'profound courage' in condemning the Vietnam War during testimony to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1971. … Appealing for contributions to the 2004 presidential loser, the ex-senator from Nebraska calls attention to an April 22 speech Mr. Kerry of Massachusetts gave at Boston's Faneuil Hall: 'John made it clear that those who disagree with President Bush's course in Iraq have a right and an obligation to challenge a president who they believe is wrong, a policy they believe is wrong, and a war in Iraq they believe weakens our nation.'"

Feith To Join Georgetown University Faculty. Former Pentagon policy chief Doug Feith, who was an architect of the Bush Administration's war on terror, is joining the faculty of Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service. The AP (5/2) reports, "In an announcement Monday, the university said Feith will teach a course on the Bush administration's strategy for the war on terror and also will conduct seminars as a visiting professor and distinguished practitioner in national security policy. He will start this fall."

Negotiator Says Iran Won't Suspend Nuclear Enrichment Program. The CBS Evening News (5/1, story 7, 3:00, Palmer, 7.66M) interviewed Dr. Ali Larijani, "the head of Iran's National Security Council and the chief negotiator on nuclear issues." Larijani said "now that Iran has succeeded in enriching uranium, there is no going back." Dr. Ali Larijani (voice of translator): "So this is a whole new ballgame, and this requires a new solution. We cannot insist with the solutions of the past." Palmer: "A worried UN ordered Iran to suspend its enrichment program by last Friday, but Iran refused, saying at the very least it will keep a small-scale experimental program." Iran has "just set conditions that it knows Washington will not accept. When the Security Council members meet in Paris tomorrow, they'll have a lot to talk about as the really tough negotiations are about to begin."

DOJ_NMG_0027616

Meanwhile, the New York Times (5/2, Hoge, 1.19M) reports Iran "asked the United Nations on Monday to take a stand against American threats that it said included possible nuclear strikes on its territory and that were 'in total contempt of international law.' In a letter to Secretary General Kofi Annan, Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the United Nations, pointed to recent comments by President Bush and" Secretary Rice "on ways to halt Iran's nuclear program and to news reports of Pentagon planning for possible nuclear attacks on nuclear facilities in Iran." The AP (5/2, Lederer) notes that "in a brief statement responding to the letter," Ambassador Bolton "said 'if Iran wants to be treated differently, then Iran should stop pursuing nuclear weapons and give up terrorism.'"

As Permanent Members Huddle, Top Iranian Negotiator Asks For Talks. The AP (5/2, Karimi) reported top negotiator Ali Larijani "said Tehran was 'ready for any kind of negotiation to achieve our rights,' renewing a call for further talks on the Islamic republic's atomic program." Larijani "also called again for Iran's dispute with the international community to be returned to the UN nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency, headed by Mohamed ElBaradei. 'Let's allow Mr. ElBaradei to do his job based on the international conventions,' Larijani" said publicly. The CBS Evening News (5/1, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported its interview with Larijani, and concludes, "Iran has just set conditions that it knows Washington will not accept. When the Security Council members meet in Paris tomorrow, they'll have a lot to talk about as the really tough negotiations are about to begin."

Bush Calls Putin To Discuss Iran Nuclear Standoff. The AP (5/2) reports President Bush "called Russian President Vladimir Putin on Monday to discuss the standoff over Iran's nuclear program, days before the issue goes before the UN Security Council. ... 'The two leaders stressed the importance of preventing Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons, especially in the United Nations Security Council,' White House press secretary Scott McClellan said. 'And they committed to remaining in close contact on this important priority.'" The AP reports a Kremlin statement that "the two sides 'discussed interaction on urgent international problems, including the Iranian nuclear issue, on which numerous consultations at various levels'" in the near future.

WPost Urges US To Pursue UN Resolution. The Washington Post (5/2, A20, 744K) editorializes, "The Bush administration's pursuit of a resolution at the United Nations is…a necessary step -- in part because of what it may reveal about the international coalition it has tried to build against Iran. A debate on a legally binding resolution should set the United States and its European allies more firmly on a course toward adopting specific sanctions against Iran." It "should also force China and Russia to decide whether they wish to be partners of the West in addressing such threats to global security."

Olmert Taps Livni For Number Two Post. The AP (5/1) reported Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's cabinet selections. Tzipi Livni will become vice premier and foreign minister, making her "the second most powerful politician" in Israel. "The defense portfolio went to Amir Peretz, head of the moderate Labor Party, the junior partner in Olmert's coalition. The posting is considered controversial since Peretz is widely perceived as strong on social issues but inexperienced in military matters. Labor also received six other ministerial appointments, including education, infrastructure, agriculture and tourism." Shimon Peres will take over developing the Negev and the Galilee and will become deputy prime minister, subordinate to Livni. Shaul Mofaz, outgoing defense minister, will be "demoted" to minister for transportation. The Financial Times (5/2, Devi) keys on the Finance Ministry pick, saying Avraham Hirchson will hold the key job "in a new government that is expected to maintain free market budgetary and fiscal policies."

A Frustrated Wolfensohn Resigns As Mideast Gaza Economic Coordinator. AFP (5/1) reported, "Former World Bank president James Wolfensohn formally stepped down as economic coordinator for Gaza, saying the rise of a Hamas-led Palestinian government made his job untenable." Appearing with Secretary Rice, "Wolfensohn announced his expected resignation after a year as envoy of the Middle East quartet." Having "frequently complained of being 'disenfranchised' in his Gaza role and threatened to quit, [Wolfensohn] left with a warning that the West should not consider trying to starve the Hamas-led Palestinians into submission."

Despite Support For US, Pakistan Doesn't Get Textile Deal. The Wall Street Journal (5/2, A6, Shah, 2.11M) reports, "Pakistan, an early ally in America's war on terrorism, hoped its close relations with Washington would also strengthen commercial ties between the two countries. But Islamabad is learning that not all alliances are created equal." While President Bush "congratulated" Pakistan on its economic policies recently, "Pakistani officials had hoped for a textile-trade pact, but Mr. Bush didn't offer one." Bush "referred to a bilateral investment treaty, although details of the pact -- which was proposed in 2004 -- are still being worked out. … Mr. Bush also pushed creating a trade zone along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border to stimulate business in that violent region." The Journal notes that even that "program's scope is narrower than trade preferences sought by Pakistan, underscoring the Bush administration's limits on granting trade favors, even to an ally who backed the campaign against terrorism after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks."

DOJ_NMG_0027617

Kashmir Killings Said To Target Peace Talks. The New York Times (5/2, Sengupta, 1.19M) reports, "Thirty-five Hindus were killed in recent days in two separate incidents in the Indian-administered portion of the disputed Kashmir province, the police said. The killings were believed to be the handiwork of Islamist militants just days before a scheduled meeting between the Indian prime minister and Kashmiri separatists." The Times comments, "Even by the standards of blood-soaked Kashmir, it was a particularly grisly pair of incidents -- and the deadliest violence since peace talks began more than two years ago between India and Pakistan, neighbors and rivals on the question of Kashmir. The attacks are worrisome because they appear intended to fuel Hindu-Muslim tensions." The Times says their "impact is likely to be felt during the talks" that begin Wednesday. The Financial Times (5/2, Johnson) adds, "India suffered the single worst incident of communal violence in Jammu & Kashmir in three years on Monday," and notes Prime Minister Singh "condemned the killings, which appeared timed to disrupt" the Kashmir talks.

Zoellick Heads To Abuja In Effort To Salvage Darfur Talks. Coming in the wake of rallies on the National Mall and elsewhere in the United States on Sunday designed to draw attention to the Darfur crisis, the New York Times (5/2, Brinkley, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports, "The Bush administration on Monday dispatched" Deputy Secretary Zoellick "to Nigeria, where he plans to plunge directly into the negotiations over a treaty to end the carnage in the Darfur region of Sudan, which stalled again on Monday." After mediators extended the talks for 48 hours on Sunday night, "on Monday morning, Vice President Ali Osman Taha of Sudan, the senior representative of his government at the talks, abruptly left Abuja and returned to Sudan's capital, Khartoum, complaining that the rebel leaders had been intransigent, officials said." Reportedly "frustrated by the state of affairs, Salim Ahmed Salim, the lead mediator, called Mr. Zoellick on Monday morning and asked him to come to Abuja immediately." He will arrive in Abuja this morning. In its coverage, the AP (5/2, Schweid) quotes Secretary Rice as saying, "As long as the parties are talking, there's always a chance for an agreement. ... It takes time. ... We need to shake the trees a little bit, shake the bureaucracy a little bit and say to people: 'It's not acceptable to wait any longer for at least the planning for a robust security force.'"

The Financial Times (5/2, England) takes a more pessimistic view, reporting, "The prospects of a deal looked bleak, with the rebels insisting amendments had to be made to a draft agreement put forward by the AU last week." The Times goes on to report lead mediator Salim "said it had been 'frustrating' to deal with the rebels, and urged all the groups to agree to a deal. 'I can tell you that this war in Darfur has shaken Africa to its core. ... The eyes of Africa and the wider international community are fixed on us here.'"

Bolivian President Nationalizes Gas Industry. The Washington Post (5/2, A1, Reel, Mufson, 744K) reports, "Bolivian President Evo Morales seized control of the country's natural gas industry Monday, sending soldiers to occupy fields that he contends private companies have plundered for years. Morales said that unless foreign energy firms agreed to give Bolivia's state oil company oversight of production and a majority of their revenue generated in Bolivia, the government would evict them from the fields. 'The time has come, the awaited day, a historic day in which Bolivia retakes absolute control of our natural resources,' Morales said during a televised speech from a gas field near the country's southern border. 'The looting by foreign companies has ended.'" The Post notes that although "Morales' announcement was expected...his deployment of troops to gas fields was a strong statement in a region where governments are moving to block outside influence, particularly from the United States, and exert more control over the energy industry."

The New York Times (5/2, Prada, 1.19M) reports Morales "gave foreign companies 180 days to renegotiate existing contracts with the government, or leave the country. 'The time has come, the awaited day, a historic day in which Bolivia retakes absolute control of our natural resources,' Mr. Morales declared." The Los Angeles Times (5/2, McDonnell, 958K) notes Morales, "wearing a helmet of the state energy firm, chose May 1, International Day of the Workers and a national holiday here, to unveil his nationalization plan." On Monday evening, Morales "addressed a roaring crowd in La Paz, the Andean capital where he has strong support, especially among the poor and working classes tired of a lack of social progress in South America's poorest nation."

The Financial Times (5/2, Weitzman) notes, "The intervention will heighten investors' concerns about the investment climate in the energy sector generally, and Mr. Morales' willingness to pursue a leftwing agenda in particular. ... Francisco Blanch, head of commodities at Merrill Lynch in London, said: 'This is another step into the recent tide towards greater state control of commodities resources, as we have seen previously in Russia and Venezuela.'" The Washington Times (5/2, Zuazo, 90K) runs a similar report.

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (5/2, Luhnow, De Córdoba, 2.11M) cites David Mares, a Latin American energy expert at UC San Diego, as saying, "Chávez and Morales are both playing a game of chicken with foreign oil companies. ...

DOJ_NMG_0027618

In a period with high profits of oil companies, this is giving both of them a sense that the companies will really bend over backward to keep access to these places, and that this is the time to renegotiate the contracts."

Poll Shows Conservative Now Leading Mexican Presidential Race. The Christian Science Monitor (5/2, Harman, 61K) reports that "now Felipe de Jesús Calderón Hinojosa is the man to beat in Mexico's July 2 elections. The young, at 43, lawyer and economist was far behind when the campaign season took off last fall. To begin with, President Vicente Fox, barred constitutionally from running for a second term, backed a different candidate to lead his center-right National Action Party (PAN). More critically, there was the seemingly unstoppable rise of populist Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the candidate for the Democratic Revolution Party (PRD), who is as charismatic and dynamic as Calderón is ho-hum." But "that was then." A recent poll in the "local Reforma newspaper…showed Calderón with 38 percent support, with López Obrador slipping to second place -- at 35 percent -- for the first time in over a year. Roberto Madrazo, candidate of the Revolutionary Institutional party (PRI) that ruled Mexico for 71 years before Fox came into office in 2000, was in third place with 23 percent." Other "snap polls have confirmed the trend of Calderón's rise."

Taylor's Arrest Said To Continue Positive Trend. In a 1,200-word piece on continent-wide efforts to improve the rule of law, the Washington Post (5/2, A16, Timberg, 744K) says the arrest of former Liberian strongman Charles Taylor "was the latest in a series of tentative steps toward holding political leaders in Africa accountable for alleged crimes including corruption, rape and genocide. After decades in which senior government officials were largely beyond the reach of national and international law, prosecutors recently have pursued Taylor for war crimes committed in Sierra Leone, a U.N.-backed tribunal has tried former leaders in the 1994 Rwandan genocide, and international investigators have been invited into four other African countries." The Post says even "national courts have also become increasingly aggressive. In Zambia, former president Frederick Chiluba is battling corruption allegations, as are several top officials in Nigeria, Kenya and Malawi."

CO2 Emissions Market Takes Hit Following EU Report. The Washington Times/AFP (5/2, Ingham) reports that as European countries discovered that they were polluting far less than they thought, the fledgling market for carbon dioxide (CO2) emissions is taking a hit. Under the Emissions Trading System (ETS) of the European Union, "11,500 firms that are big users of fossil fuels must meet target levels for CO2 emissions or else pay a penalty of $50 per metric ton for 2006 and 2007 -- a punishment that will rise to $125 per ton in 2008. Companies that have used less than their quota can sell their surplus on the ETS to companies that have used more than their quota, thus providing a financial carrot to companies to exceed the requirements. … On Wednesday, the price fell to $29.45, and on Thursday, the price fell to $20.75. On Friday, it closed at $16.60 ahead of the May 1 holiday." This after authorities in five of the 25 EU countries, France, the Netherlands, the Czech Republic, Estonia and Belgium's Wallonia region, "reported that their CO2 pollution last year was less than their quota levels, whereas Spain said it had exceeded its quota, but by less than expected."

US, Japan Urge China To Disclose Details Of Arms Build-Up. The Washington Times (5/2, Gertz, 90K) reports Defense Secretary Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Rice and "their Japanese counterparts" urged China "to explain its secret military buildup." A joint statement "called for 'greater transparency on the modernization of military capabilities in the region,' in what U.S. defense officials said was reference to a Chinese arms buildup that is prompting worries for both governments." The Times goes on to report that the officials also "urged North Korea to return expeditiously to the talks without preconditions, to dismantle its nuclear programs in a complete, verifiable and irreversible manner, and to cease all illicit and proliferation activities."

Grassley Claims ONDCP Figures On Colombian Drug Production Are Inconsistent. The Los Angeles Times (5/2, Kraul, 958K) reports Sen. Charles E. Grassley "has raised questions about the statistics offered by the Bush administration to show progress in fighting drugs in Colombia, as Congress prepares to debate hundreds of millions of dollars in additional aid to the strife-torn nation. Writing to the White House's Office of National Drug Control Policy…Grassley asked for an explanation of apparent inconsistencies between positive numbers released last fall and figures released last month that indicated ground was being lost."

Al Risala Said To Represent New Generation Of Islamic Television. The Christian Science Monitor (5/2, Lindsey, 61K) reports on Al Risala – "the Message" -- a new Islamic satellite channel originating out of Dubai, has "splashy graphics and state-of-the-art sets. The channel does air some traditional religious programming, but many of the shows have nothing overtly religious about them. … In the audience, young men and women sit next to each other, and some of the women are unveiled."

DOJ_NMG_0027619

Sufism, Formerly Banned, Said To Be Resurgent In Saudi Arabia. The Washington Post (4/2, A13, Ambah, 744K) reports that although it was until recently banned in Saudi Arabia, "a new atmosphere of increased religious tolerance has spurred a resurgence of Sufism and brought the once-underground Sufis and their rituals out in the open."

In Break With Tradition, Turkish Government Appoints Female Preachers. The Washington Times (5/2, Birch, 90K) reports that last year Turkey's directorate of religious affairs appointed "200 state-paid 'vaizes,' or female preachers, whose very existence breaks with centuries of Muslim tradition. Women acted informally as preachers in the early days of Islam, but they never before have been recognized officially as such."

Blair Seeks To Avert Disaster For Labour In Thursday's Elections. The Financial Times (5/2, Blitz) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair "will launch on Tuesday a desperate bid to avert a serious setback for his Labour party in this Thursday's local elections, seeking to draw a line under a week of disastrous news stories for the British government. … Labour said ministers would be making more than a hundred visits to local election contests across England in the next 48 hours."

France's Le Pen Will Seek Presidency Again. The New York Times (5/2, Smith, 1.19M) reports the National Front's Jean-Marie Le Pen became the first politician "to make a formal announcement that he plans to run" for the French president in 2007. The Times adds, "Speaking to thousands of supporters at his traditional May Day rally in central Paris, Mr. Le Pen, 77, predicted that he would make it into a runoff election next year just as he did against Jacques Chirac in 2002."

Unrest Seen As Benefiting Sarkozy. The New York Times/International Herald Tribune (5/2, Vincour) reports French Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy is "the only politician in France whose ambitions have been solidified by the country's dreadful months of underclass riots and no-to-change demonstrations. Some days, but not all, he has never looked closer to becoming president in 2007."

New Holocaust Museum Will Focus On Vichy Government. The Washington Post (5/2, C1, Trescott, 744K) reports, "A memorial marking the role of France's Vichy government in shipping Jews and others to Nazi death camps will be created at Rivesaltes, an internment facility near France's border with Spain, representatives of the French government and the US Holocaust Memorial Museum, which will assist in the effort, announced yesterday in Washington."

Dutch Immigration Requirements Include Language Test, Tolerance Film. NBC Nightly News (5/1, story 8, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "If you want to move to the Netherlands, you have to first watch a film about how permissive Dutch society is and then if it's not your cup of tea, you're not welcome." The government film is "compulsory viewing as part of a tough new entrance test for would-be immigrants, the idea is to make them familiar with every aspect of Dutch society. There's 'another hurdle -- they must learn to speak Dutch before entering Holland."

Hyperinflation In Zimbabwe Adds To Desperation. The New York Times (5/2, Wines, 1.19M) reports that hyperinflation in Zimbabwe "is roaring toward 1,000 percent a year, a rate usually seen only in war zones. Zimbabwe has been tormented this entire decade by both deep recession and high inflation, but in recent months the economy seems to have abandoned whatever moorings it had left. The national budget for 2006 has already been largely spent. Government services have started to crumble."

Prime Minister Celebrates Referendum On Montenegrin Independence From Serbs. In an op-ed for the Financial Times (5/2) Milo Djukanovic, prime Minister of Montenegro, writes, "The bloody collapse of Yugoslavia shamed Europe. … There is, however, one positive story from those dreadful years. It involves my own small but fiercely proud multi-ethnic country, Montenegro, which was wiped off the map by the Allies after the first world war and forced to become part of the kingdom of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, which was renamed Yugoslavia." Djukanovic adds, "We Montenegrins, who hope to reclaim our national sovereignty and independence in a referendum this month and then accelerate accession talks with the European Union, have more recent reasons to be proud."

Russians Seen As Suspicious Of West's Human Rights Rhetoric. In his column for the Washington Post (5/2, A21, 744K) the Carnegie Moscow Center's Masha Lipman writes that "in today's Russia, the West -- and especially the United States -- is increasingly regarded as an adversary whose values are not shared by Russians. For example, Western human rights views were challenged last month by participants in a 'World Council of the Russian People' held under the auspices of the Russian Orthodox Church."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

DOJ_NMG_0027620

Los Angeles Times:
"Marchers Fill L.A.'s Streets."
"At One With Dual Devotion."
"Next: Converting The Energy Of Protest To Political Clout."
"Throngs Show Their Potent Role In Economy."
'When I See This, I See Strength.'"

USA Today:
"Sour News For GOP In Poll."
"New Antipsychotic Drugs Carry Risks For Children."

New York Times:
"Immigrants Take To U.S. Streets In Show Of Strength."
"Republicans Drop A Tax Plan After Business Leaders Protest."
"Zimbabwe's Prices Rise 900%, Turning Staples Into Luxuries."
"Ideals Collide As Vatican Rethinks Condom Ban."
"Pensions In Peril Over Exemptions Tied To Churches."
"In Nebraska Senate Challenge, Pork Is Portrayed As Bad Politics."

Washington Post:
"National Boycott For Illegal Workers."
"Lerner Expected To Get Nationals."
"Blink And They're Still There."
"Bolivian President Seizes Gas Industry."
"New Gallaudet President Met With Protest."
"Urban Pest Will Soon Be Out For Blood."

Washington Times:
"Thousands Join Boycott."
"Biden Pitches Division Of Iraq."
"Turkey's 'Vaizes' Expedite Reform."
"Surprising Double Vision."
"Bolivia Seeks Control Of Gas Production."
"Pollution Reports Hurt CO2 Emissions Market."

Detroit Free Press:
"Immigrants' Message: Justice For All."
"The Bitter End."
"Cup Thrower Gets Jail, Call AA Decree 'Crap.'"
"NWA Pay Showdowns Loom."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Guilty Plea Closes Morris Brown Case."
"Social Security Forecast Worsens."
"Latinos Boycott."
"Teen Pregnancies In Georgia Down Sharply Since '94."
"Racist Classic 'Birth Of A Nation' Makes Rare TV Slot."

Houston Chronicle:
"Senate Passes Perry Tax Plan."
"Lay Defends Lavish Habits And Big Cash Withdrawals."
"Boycott Felt Here, Elsewhere."
"Bolivian Military Seizes Oil, Gas Fields."
"Pipe Attack Victim Is 'Still In Bad Shape,' His Brother Says."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Immigrant Boycott-LA; Boycott-New York; Boycott-Chicago; Boycott-Economic Impact; Texas Boycott Participant; Bush-Iraq; Iraq Reconstruction; Social Security, Medicare Funding; Nutritional Supplements; Gas Prices; Empire State Building; Frequent Flier Programs; WWII Attack Survivor.
CBS: Immigrant Boycott; Boycott-Dodge City; Bush-Approval Ratings; Gas Prices-Senior Citizens; Social Security, Medicare Funding; Bush-Iraq; Iranian Nukes-Larijani Interview; Armored Marathon Runner; SCOTUS-Anna Nicole Smith; Empire State Building.
NBC: Immigrant Boycott; Boycott-Denver; Boycott-Chicago; Boycott-LA; Boycott-New York; Boycott-Financial Impact; Boycott-Political Impact; Netherlands-Immigration Test; Bush-Iraq; Gas Prices-Local Budgets; SCOTUS-Anna Nicole Smith; Stock Markets; New York Boycott Participant.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Immigration Boycott; Duke Rape Case; Bird Flu.
CBS: Immigration Boycott; Gas Prices; Duke Rape Case; AARP-Retirement Savings; Richards Hospitalized.
NPR: Immigration Boycott; Judicial Watch-Abramoff White House Visits; Bolivia-Natural Gas Fields Nationalized; Wall Street; Fed.-Interest Rates; Zoellick-Sudan.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Participates in a roundtable at a Celebrate Teacher Appreciation Week event, with Education Secretary Spellings, Columbus, Ohio; speaks at a Deborah Pryce for Congress luncheon, Hyatt Regency Columbus; participates in a Medicare prescription drug signup event, Fort Smith, Ark.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION AND FORESTRY _ Full Committee. Hearing on commodity price support programs in the Farm Security and Rural Investment Act of 2002. Floyd Gaibler, deputy undersecretary of Agriculture; Stanley Fletcher, University of Georgia; Armond Morris, Georgia Peanut Commission; Jimbo Grissom, Western Peanut Growers Association, Seminole, Texas; Evans Plowden, American Peanut Shellers Association, Albany, Ga.; Gary Rasor, American Peanut Products Manufacturers Inc. Location: Room 216, Hart.

9:30 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on line-tem recission authority. Austin Smythe, OMB; Acting CBO Director Donald Marron; Charles Cooper, Cooper and Kirk;

DOJ_NMG_0027621

Louis Fisher, Library of Congress. Location: Room 608, Dirksen.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Oversight hearing of the FBI. FBI Director Robert Mueller, DOG Inspector General Glenn Fine, Linda Calbom, GAO, John Gannon, BAE Systems Information Technology. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation, votes on pending nominations and approval of the report on the government's preparations and response to Hurricane Katrina. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Personnel Subcommittee. CLOSED. Markup portions of the FY07 defefnse authorization bill. Location: Room 222, Russell.

2:30 p.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Science and Space Subcommittee. Hearing on the NSF budget. Director Arden Bemet, Jr., NSB Chairman Warren Washington, Alan Leshner of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and Jerome Odom of the University of South Carolina. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

3:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Readiness and Management Support Subcommittee. CLOSED. Markup portions of the defense authorization bill. Location: Room 232A, Russell.

4 p.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Confirmation hearing on pending nominations. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

5:30 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Emerging Threats and Capabilities Subcommittee. CLOSED. Markup portions of the defense authorization bill. Location: Room 222, Russell.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 12:30 p.m. Meets for morning business, and at 2 p.m. for legislative business. Highlights: Suspensions (14 bills): 1) H.R. 5107 - Earl D. Hutto Post Office Building Designation Act: 2) H.R. 4811 - John Paul Hammerschmidt Post Office Building Designation Act: 3) H.R. 4674 - Governor John Anderson, Jr. Post Office Building Designation Act: 4) H.R. 4995 - Ronald Bucca Post Office Designation Act: 5) H.R. 4101 - Lieutenant Michael P. Murphy Post Office Building Designation Act; 6) H.R. 3351 - Native American Technical Corrections Act of 2006; 7) H.R. 2720 - Salt Cedar and Russian Olive Control Demonstration Act: 8) H.R. 3929 - Dana Point Desalination Project Authorization Act: 9) H.R. 3418 - Central Texas Water Recycling Act of 2005: 10) H.Res. 697 - Congratulating the people and Government of Italy, the Torino Olympic Organizing Committee, the International Olympic Committee, the United States Olympic Committee, the 2006 United States Olympic Team, and all international athletes upon the successful completion of the 2006 Olympic Winter Games in Turin, Italy: 11) H.Con.Res. 392 - Recognizing the 58th anniversary of the independence of the State of Israel; 12) H.Con.Res. 90 - Conveying the sympathy of Congress to the families of the young women murdered in the State of Chihuahua, Mexico, and encouraging increased United States involvement in bringing an end to these crimes; 13) H.Res. 658 - Supporting the goals and ideals of World Water Day; 14) H.R. 4943 - Prevention of Fraudulent Access to Phone Records Act.

10 a.m. GOVERNMENT REFORM _ National Security, Emerging Threats and International Relations Subcommittee. Hearing on UN sanctions after the Oil for Food program. UN Amb. John Bolton; Joseph Christoff, GAO; Carne Ross, Independent Diplomat; George Lopez, University of Notre Dame. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

2:30 p.m. EDUCATION AND THE WORKFORCE _ Select Education Subcommittee. Hearing on the Seniors' Independence Act. Assistant HHS Secretary Josefina Carbonell; Deputy Assistant Labort Secretary Mason Bishop. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

5 p.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Prevention of Nuclear and Biological Attack Subcommittee. Closed. Meeting on the 2005 Defense Science Board study on reducing vulnerabilities to weapons of mass destruction. Location: Room H2-176, Ford.

5 p.m. RULES _ Full Committee. Meeting to consider rules for floor debate. Location: Room H-313, Capitol.

Other: PRESIDENT TABARE VAZQUEZ OF URUGUAY _ Highlights: 10 a.m. Meets with the president of the World Bank. 4:30 p.m. Meets with Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez.

HOSPITALS _ Annual meeting of the American Hospital Association. Highlights: 9 a.m. Plenary session with Reps. Nancy Pelosi and Peter King. 9 a.m. U.S. Chamber of Commerce President Thomas Donohue. 12:30 p.m. Luncheon speaker: Karen Davis, President, Commonwealth Fund. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW.

AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS _ The American Jewish Committee (AJC) kicks off its centennial year celebrations with its 100th annual meeting. The week-long meeting's agenda, with dozens of sessions on topics as diverse as immigration, Iran, anti-Semitism, energy independence and Zionism, highlights the breadth of AJC's global activism over its century of leadership. 1 p.m. Panel on ``The Quest for Energy Independence," with Sens. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., and Norman Coleman, R-Minn.; and James Connaughton, Chairman, White House Council on Environmental Quality. Capital Hilton. Location: Primary location is the Capital Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW. Other locations as noted.

COUNCIL OF THE AMERICAS _ The Council of the Americas holds its 36th Washington Conference on the

DOJ_NMG_0027622

Americas, ``Creating Jobs, Building Hope: The Hemispheric Growth Agenda in a Changing World." Highlights:

9 a.m. - 5 p.m. All day session, with President Tabar Vazquez of Uruguay; Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Francisco Gil Daz, Minister of Finance and Public Credit, Mexico; Martn Redrado, President, Central Bank of Argentina; Dilma Vana Rousseff, Presidential Chief of Staff, Brazil; Paul Wolfowitz, President, The World Bank; Luis Alberto Moreno, President, Inter-American Development Bank; Thomas Shannon, Assistant Secretary of State; Marc Lautenbach, General Manager, IBM Americas. Henderson Conference Room, State Department.

MOUSSAOUI _ 8:30 a.m. - 4 p.m. Jury deliberations continue in the penalty phase of U.S. v. Zacarias Moussaoui. Lunch recess 12:15 pm - 1 pm. Location: Albert V. Bryan U.S. Courthouse, 401 Courthouse Square, Alexandria, Va.

ESTATE TAX _ 8 a.m. Meeting of family business owners to discuss permanent repeal of the estate tax, with Sens. Bill Frist and Jon Kyl, Rep. Kenneth Hulshoff, Seattle Times Publisher Frank Blethen, others. Location: National Press Club.

IRAQ-VIRTUAL LIBRARY _ 8:30 a.m. Sun Microsystems, Inc., holds a news briefing on its Iraqi Virtual Science Library (IVSL). The lead American Association for the Advancement of Science fellows on the project (including Dr. D.J. Patil, Professor of Science at the University of Maryland, College Park) and representatives from the U.S. Department of State, Sun Microsystems and engineering publishers to discuss how the IVSL project has helped to greatly diminish the effects of 30 years of neglect to the Iraqi university library system. Location: Eaton Room, Henley Park Hotel, 926 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

TELECOM FORUM _ 8:30 a.m. National Journal's Technology Daily holds a forum on the state of telecom policy, with keynote address by Rep. Fred Upton. Panel discussion with Tim McKone of ATT, Kerry Knott of Comcast, Doron Gorshein of The America Channel, and Chris Vein of the San Francisco Department of Telecommunications and information Services. Location: Phoenix Hotel, 520 N. Capitol St.

MUSLIMS-FORUM _ 8:30 a.m. - 10 a.m. The Gallup Organization hosts a forum to focus on findings from its study on the views and aspirations of over one (b) billion Muslims worldwide, including Iran, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and Egypt. Participants include Prof. John Esposito of Georgetown University; Dalia Moahed, executive director of Gallup's Muslim studies; and Richard Burkholder, director of Gallup's international public opinion polling. Location: 901 F St., NW.

CHINA SUMMIT _ 8:30 a.m. - 1 p.m. The Hudson Institute, in conjunction with the Institute of Chinese Law & Religion, hosts the ``Freedom in China Summit 2006." Location: Hudson Institute, sixth floor, 1015 15th St. NW.

US-SAUDI ARABIA _ 9 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a discussion with Energy Secretary Bodman and Saudi Petroleum Minister Ali Al-Naimi. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

PRESS FREEDOM _ 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty hosts a briefing on the 2006 Freedom House ``Freedom of the Press" Survey on the state of press freedom in countries of the former Soviet Union. Participants include Robert Orttung of American University, Daniel Kimmage of Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, and Christopher Walker of Freedom House. Location: 1201 Connecticut Ave., N.W., 4th floor, Conference Room A.

MEDICARE RX _ 9 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. The American Enterprise Institute (AEI) hosts a discussion, ``Has the Drug Benefit Added to Medicare's Financing Woes?" Participants are: Richard Foster, Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services; John Palmer, Syracuse University; Tom Saving, Texas A&M University; Douglas Holtz-Eakin, Council on Foreign Relations. Moderator is Joseph Antos, AEI. Keynote Address by Mark McClellan, Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. Location: Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th Floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

NATURAL GAS _ 9:15 a.m. The Natural Gas Supply Association and the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers hold a media briefing on trends and post-hurricane conditions affecting the North American natural gas market. Location: Canada Room, Canadian Embassy, 501 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

US YOUTH _ 10 a.m. The National Geographic Society releases a Roper Survey showing U.S. youth poorly prepared for global future. Location: Grosvenor Auditorium, NGS, 1600 M St. NW.

DEMONSTRATION-VIGIL _ 11 a.m. Members of The Christian Defense Coalition, others, hold a prayer vigil and demonstration in support of Wenyi Wang, who was arrested at the welcoming ceremony at the White House for Chinese President Hu Jintao. Location: In front of the White House. Lafayette Park.

PARALYSIS RALLY _ 11 a.m. Disability rights and caregivers rally to focus on the Christopher Reeve Paralysis Act (CRPA). Susan Sarandon, actress, and Sens. Clinton, Harkin, and Langevin participate. Location: Upper Senate Park.

DEMOCRATS-ENERGY _ 11:30 a.m. Democrat leaders hold a news conference to release a a joint House and Senate Democratic report on Bush Administration energy policies and to call for a commitment to making America energy independent. With Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid (D-NV); House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-CA); Senator Chuck Schumer (D-NY); Congressman James E. Clyburn (D-SC); Senator Maria Cantwell (D-WA); Congressman Bart Stupak (D-MI). Location: Senate Swamp Site (intersection of Delaware and Constitution Avenues).

DOJ_NMG_0027623

CONSUMERS-DEBT COLLECTORS _ 12 p.m. Public Citizen holds a telephone briefing to discuss the tactics of debt collectors masquerading as law enforcement officers. Notes: Callin number: 800-377-8846; passcode: 36707396.

HEALTH INSURANCE-TAXES _ 12 p.m. The Urban Institute holds a panel discussion on health insurance tax incentives, with Katherine Baicker, member, White House Council of Economic Advisers; Leonard Burman, Urban Institute; Robert Helms, American Enterprise Institute, and Len Nichols, director, Health Policy Program, New America Foundation. Contacts: n/a, 202-261-5709

CUSTOMS-AUDITS _ 12 p.m. - 1:30 p.m. Discussion on importer self-assessments, focused assessments, and quick-response audits with Cindy Covell, director of audits at U.S. Customs and Border Protection. Location: 1301 K St., N.W. (West Tower, 12th floor).

HOYER _ 12:30 p.m. House Democratic Whip Rep. Steny Hoyer holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-306, Capitol.

BOEHNER _ 1 p.m. House Majority Leader Rep. John Boehner holds a pen and pad only briefing. Location: Room H-107, Capitol.

VOTING RIGHTS _ 3:45 p.m. Bipartisan House and Senate news conference to announce support for legislation to reauthorize the Voting Rights Act for an additional 25 years. With House Speaker Dennis R-IL; Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-TN; Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-NV; House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-CA; and others. Location: East steps of the House wing of the Capitol (facing U.S. Supreme Court)

LOBBYING REFORM _ 4:30 p.m. Reps. Martin Meehan and Christopher Shays hold a news conference in opposition to the lobbying reform bill. Location: Cannon Terrace.

ENDANGERED SPECIES _ 7:30 p.m. Screening of a film ``Hoot'' to mark the Endangered Species Act, with Sens. Hillary Clinton, Blanche Lincoln, Bill Nelson, Lincoln Chafee, and Rep. John Dingell, others. Location: AMC Loews Uptown Theatre, 3246 Connecticut Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, May 02, 2006 8:17 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Tuesday, May 02, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060502.pdf; dojclips060502.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, MAY 2, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Al-Arian Gets 18 Months More In Terror Case (ORS) 5
Al-Arian Sentenced To More Prison Before He Can Be Deported (AP).....6
Al-Arian To Serve Prison Time (TAMPTRIB).....7
19 Months More In Prison For Professor In Terror Case (NYT).....7
Terror Defendant Faces Prison And Deportation (WP).....9
A Judge Stuns Al-Arian With Maximum Time (NYSUN).....9
A Plea Deal In Florida (WP).....10
Father Charged In U.S. Terror Probe Freed (AP).....11
Lawyer: Drop Terror Case Charge (DEN).....11

Patriot Act:

FBI Sought Information On 3,501 People Last Year Using Powerful Investigative Tool (BOS/AP).....12
Data Show How Patriot Act Used (LAT).....12
FBI Sought Data On Thousands In '05 (WP).....13
Court-approved Wiretaps Rose In '05 (USAT).....14
Student Scholarships For Studying Abroad (WSJ).....15
Spies Among Us (USNEWS).....15

Homeland Response:

Informer In Bomb Plot Trial Tells Of His Visits To Mosques (NYT).....20
Who Might Fill Freedom Tower? First Of All, Feds (WSJ).....21
Taylor Relents On Flight 93 Funds (RC).....23
Qatar Grants Millions In Aid To New Orleans (NYT).....23
How To Save FEMA (wp).....25

War News:

Years Later, 'Mission Accomplished' Closer (AP-Y2).....25
More 'Tough Days' In Iraq, Bush Warns (WT).....27
Talking Up The New Guy (USNEWS).....27
Report: Iraq Oil Production Remains Below Prewar Level (WT).....29
Murtha Won't Sign Petition On Troop-withdrawal Measure (HILL).....29
Biden Offers Alternative Plan For Iraq (LAT).....30
Biden Pitches Division Of Iraq (WT).....32
Iraqis Begin Duty With Refusal (WP).....33
Iraqi Recruits Reportedly Balk At Postings Away From Home (NYT).....34
U.S. Changes Guidelines For Troops To Lessen Everyday Tensions With Iraqi Civilians (NYT).....35
U.S. Snipers Protect Strategic Ramadi Road (AP).....37
Shiite Cleric Seen Trying To Broaden His Base Of Support (KRT).....38
200 Shiites Push For Better Security Throughout Iraq (USAT/AP).....40
Video Shows Mistreatment Of Hussein Official's Body (WP)..40
Calm At The Center Of The Storm (NYT).....41
White Guilt And The Western Past (WSJ).....42

Corporate Scandals:

Lay Defends Family's Role In Selling Shares (WSJ).....45
Lay Contends Banks 'forced' Majority Of His Stock Sales (USAT).....46
Attitude, Finances May Have Hurt Lay (WP).....46
Prosecutor: Lay Ignored Accounting Worries (FINDLAW/AP).48
Quattrone Case Gets A New Retrial Judge (WSJ).....49
Comverse CEO Quits As Options Probe Heats Up (WSJ).....50
Nacchio's Attorneys Continue Bid To Have Charges Dropped (WSJ).....51

Criminal Law:

Common Cause Seeks Justice Probe Of Harris (AP).....51
Common Cause Asks Feds To Investigate Harris (ORS).....52
Activist Group Seeks Katherine Harris Investigation (TAMPTRIB).....53
Graft Trial Opens For Ex-Ala. Governor (AP).....54
Opening Arguments Made In Scrushy Bribery Trial (WSJ).....54

Plea Deal Points To Milberg Partners (LAW) 55
Records Of Abramoff's White House Visits (AP) 57
Lawyers Look Into Leaks In Wiretap Case (AP) 57
Delay Planned In Turning Over Evidence (LAT) 58
Corrections (NYT) 59
Gang Presence In U.S. Military Investigated (CHIT) 60
'BLAME IT ON GOTTI' SUBPOENAS (NYPOST) 61
AP: Conn. Governor Reassigns Official (AP) 61
Defense To Open In Trial Of Pair Tied To Mariano (PHI) 63
Defense's Claim That Rick Stole (PHI) 63
Closings Begin In Bribery Trial Of Former Clark County Lawmakers (AP) 64
G-Sting: Prosecutors Let Loose On Kincaid-Chauncey (KLAS-TV) 65
Church Workers Not Told About Money (LYN&A) 66
Prosecution Winds Up Case In Lynchburg Mayor's Trial (DPHR/AP) 68
Alito Pens First Opinion As A Supreme Court Justice (LAW) .. 69
In Death Row Case, Justices Order Retrial Over Evidence (NYT) 70
Ex-OP Lawyer Pleads Guilty To Embezzlement (KCBIZ) 71
Church Treasurer Pleads Guilty To Embezzling $297,000 (KMCI-TV) 72
College's Ex-President Pleads Guilty To Fraud (WP) 72
Views Of Jury Pool Trouble Sniper (BSUN) 73
Suspect's Notoriety Shrinks Jury Pool (WP) 75
Sniper Case Jury Selection Begins (WT) 76
Duke Case Prosecutor's Media Whirl Raises Eyebrows (USAT) 77
Duke Student's Lawyers Want D.A. Off Case (LAT) 78

Civil Law:

U.S. Says It Overpaid Delta For Tickets (WSJ) 80

Civil Rights:

Chicago Schools Reach Desegregation Agreement (CHIT) . 80
Ruling Ends 8-year Federal Control Of La. Juvenile Prisons (AP) 82
Raids Net 66 Linked To Human Trafficking (WT/AP) 83
Jason Taylor's Stabbing Incident Being Charged As Hate Crime (FLSUNSEN) 84
NLV On Track For Meeting ADA Rules (LVS) 84
First EEOC Racial Bias Suit Against Movie Studio Can Proceed (AP) 85
Jury Considers Hate-crime Award (CHIT) 86
Beyond Chastity Belts (NYT) 87
Phantom Constituents Behind Bars (NYT) 88

Antitrust:

Phone Firms' Bid To Ease Cable Push Hits Senate Snag (WSJ) 88
Google Concerned About Microsoft Browser (AP) 89
Google Expresses Concerns Over New Microsoft Browser (Update1) (BLOOM) 90
Google Expresses Concerns Over Microsoft's Internet Explorer (MERCN) 90
BlackBerry Maker RIM Faces New Lawsuit (FT) 92
New Patent Fight Looms For RIM Over BlackBerry (WSJ) 92
New Patent Fight Looms For RIM Over BlackBerry (WSJ) 93
Keeping A Democratic Web (NYT) 93
Calling All Plaintiffs (WSJ) 94

Environment:

Government Drafts Pandemic Flu Plan (AP) 95
Business Plan For A Pandemic? (WP) 96

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Intelligence Mission Troubles FBI (BSUN) 98
Critics Train Sights On Laggard FBI (BSU) 100
Rose Jr. Sentenced For Drug Distribution (AP) 101
Watts, Three Other Area People Sent (CTI) 101
Breast Cancer Has Made Me A Criminal (BOS) 102
The Politics Of Pot (RGU) 103
Studies Belie Claims Of Medical Marijuana As Safe Option To Pain (APP) 104
Limbaugh Cuts Deal In Prescription Case (AP) 105
Man Pleads Guilty To Importing, Distributing Steroids (AP) . 106
Church Fire Called 'ugly, Ugly Crime' (AZREP) 106

Immigration:

From Coast To Coast, Immigrants Say 'We Need To Be Heard' (USAT) 107
Immigrants Walk Off The Job In Boycott (AP-Y2) 108
Immigrants Take To U.S. Streets In Show Of Strength (NYT) 110
Immigrants Take Economic Impact To The Streets (LAT) .. 112
Throngs Show Their Potent Role In Economy (LAT) 114
After Marches, Finding The Way Forward (LAT) 116
Washington Wire (WSJ) 117
Immigration Dissent Sweeps L.A. And The Nation (LAT) 119
Thousands Join Boycott (WT) 121
'The Pot Is Boiling' (WSJ) 123
At Immigrant Rally, Divided They Stand (WP) 125
Different Paths To Same Goal (WSJ) 127
Today's Protests Shutter L.A.'s Produce And Garment Districts (LAT) 128
Migrants' Walk-outs Hit Business Across US (FT) 130

DOJ_NMG_0027627

Crossroads Trade And Immigration Battles Of The Past Offer Lesson For U.S. (WSJ) 130
Thousands Turn Out, But Support Is Mixed Among City's Immigrants (NYT) 133
Salvadoran Shopkeeper Sacrifices To Achieve (WP) 134
Most Turn Deaf Ear To Spanish U.S. Anthem (USAT) 136
Proponents Of Spanish Anthem Point To Rice (AP) 136
CHC Members Split On Boycotts (RC) 137
Republicans Set Sights On Aliens' Employers (WT) 138
Pederson Ad Cites Bush To Criticize Kyl (HILL) 139
In Mexico, Residents Boycott U.S. Goods In Show Of Solidarity (USAT) 139
Mexicans Boycott U.S. Over Migrants (WT/AP) 140
Producing Smaller Numbers, But Laying Claim To Majority (NYT) 141
They Are America (NYT) 141
Primero De Mayo (LAT) 142
DHS Official: 'We're Building A Better System' (USAT) 143
Think All Illegal Immigrants Are Sneaking In? Think Again. (USAT) 143

Congress-Administration:

3 Democrats Slam President Over Defying Statutes (BOS) . 144
Medicare's Cost Of Drug Benefit Will Be Lower Than Expected (WSJ) 145
Inside The Beltway (WT) 146
Wind Shifts On Medicare Drug Benefit (HILL) 147
Medicare In Poor Financial Health, Trustees Say (LAT) 149
Social Security, Medicare Given Less Time (USAT) 150
Social Security, Medicare Depletion Dates Get Earlier (WT) 150
Finances Of Social Security And Medicare Deteriorate (NYT) 151
Social Security, Medicare Trust Funds Sink (AP-Y2) 152
Medicare Will Go Broke By 2018, Trustees Report (WP) 153
Medicare's Fiscal Future Getting Worse, Report Says (KRT) 154
Serving Up Social Security And Medicare, Without The Fixings (WP) 156
Bush Says Health Care Costs Unacceptable (AP-Y2) 157
Mitt's Non-Miracle (WSJ) 157
Senate GOP Backs Off From Oil Tax Increase (AP) 158
Republicans Drop A Tax Plan After Businesses Protest (NYT) 159
Frist To Withdraw Oil-Tax Increase From Energy Bill (WSJ) 160
The Circle Of Crude (NYT) 161
Pumped Up (USNEWS) 162
10 States, In Challenge To U.S., Plan Suit To Force Better Mileage Rules For S.U.V.'s (NYT) 163
Gas-price Surge Strains Oil-auto Pact (HILL) 164
States Find It Tough To Prove Gas Prices Illegal (USAT) 166
Fuel Costs Ease But Could Climb Higher (USAT) 166
Ex-CIA Chief: Oil Key To U.S. Security (PTR) 167
Frist Could Offer Bill To Resolve DRA Lawsuit (RC) 168
GOP To Focus On Spending (RC) 169
Bold Bid To Cut 'Pork' In Congress (CSM) 171
Anti-Spending Senators Skeptical Of Frist Plan (RC) 172
Hog-Tied (WSJ) 173
Appropriations Chair Not Afraid To Stand Apart From House GOP (WP) 173
Budget-Cutting Endangers Indian Clinics (LAT) 175
Opponents See GOP Win (HILL) 176
Civil Service Steps Up Recruitment (WP) 177
Objective: Replace Retirees (WP) 179
Pelosi Urges Hastert To Probe Alleged Prostitution (RC) 180
CIA Confirms Official Attended Poker Games (WSJ) 181
Sour News For GOP In Poll (USAT) 181
Talks Held With At-risk Republicans (HILL) 182
The 'Gang Of 14' Compromise Was A Victory For The GOP (RC) 183

Other News:

Economy's Hot Streak Continues (WSJ) 184
Construction And Consumer Spending Rise (NYT) 185
Dollar Declines On Trade Deficit (WP) 186
Stocks Fall On Report Fed Chief Meant Rate Increases May Pause, Not End (WSJ) 187
Fears Of Rate Hikes Take Wind Out Of Sails (USAT) 188
Investors Misunderstood Bernanke Testimony, CNBC Anchor Says (WP) 189
Former Playmate Wins Procedural Round In Fight Over Estate (NYT) 190
Former Stripper Anna Nicole Smith Scores Supreme Court Victory (FINDLAW/AP) 190
Group Sues Video Firms On Tot-Learning Claims (WP) 191
Law-Firm Life Doesn't Suit Some Associates Long Hours For Big Perks Is A Tough Case To Argue; Rebuttal On 'Lifestyle'? (WSJ) 192
DeLay Bills Top $400K In 2006 (RC) 193
Giuliani Says GOP Open To Diverse Views (AP-Y2) 195
Giuliani Displays A Candidate's Mettle In Iowa (NYT) 195
Washington Whispers (USNEWS) 197
Ex-Pentagon Official To Teach At Georgetown (AP-Y2) 198
Iran Urges United Nations To Oppose American 'Threats' (NYT) 198
Iran Urges U.N. Action Against U.S. (AP) 199

DOJ_NMG_0027628

Iran Nuclear Negotiator Calls For Talks (AP) 200
Putin, Bush Discuss Iran Nuclear Dispute (AP).....201
Back To The Security Council (WP) 201
Tzipi Livni Named Vice Premier In Israel (AP).....202
Israel's Finance Minister Named (FT).....202
Wolfensohn Steps Down As Gaza Envoy (AFP).....202
Pakistan Gets Praise, But No U.S. Trade Deal (WSJ) 203
Militants Kill 35 Hindus Days Before Talks On Kashmir (NYT) 205
Kashmir Killings Cast Shadow On India Peace Talks (FT) .205
U.S. Diplomat Heads To Nigeria To Try To Unsnarl Darfur Talks (NYT).....206
U.S. Sends Diplomat For Darfur Talks (AP).....207
Extended Deadline Fails To Lift Hopes Of Deal On Darfur (FT).....208
Bolivian President Seizes Gas Industry (WP) 209
Bolivian Nationalizes The Oil And Gas Sector (NYT).....210
Bolivian Leader Nationalizes Fuel Industry (LAT) 211
Bolivia Set To Seize Foreign-run Gas Fields (FT) 213
Bolivia Seeks Control Of Gas Production (WT/AP) 213
Bolivia Seizes Natural-Gas Fields In A Show Of Energy Nationalism (WSJ) 214
A Conservative Takes The Lead In Mexico Race (CSM) 216
Impunity On Trial In Africa (WP).....217
Pollution Reports Hurt CO2 Emissions Market (WT/AFP) 219
U.S., Japan Ask China For Military Transparency (WT).....220
GOP Senator Questions White House Data On Coca Growth In Colombia (LAT).....221
The New Muslim TV: Media-savvy, Modern, And Moderate (CSM) 222
In Saudi Arabia, A Resurgence Of Sufism (WP).....224
Turkey's 'Vaizes' Expedite Reform (WT) 226
Blair Fights To Rescue Labour At Polls (FT) 227
Sensing Opportunity, Rightist Seeks The French Presidency Again (NYT).....228
French Reformer Finds Comfort In Fuzziness (NYT) 229
France To Shine A Light On Its Notorious Camp (WP) 230
Zimbabwe's Prices Rise 900%, Turning Staples Into Luxuries (NYT).....231
Why Montenegro Is No One's Junior Partner (FT) 233
Fear Of The West In Russia (WP).....234

DOJ_NMG_0027629

TERRORISM NEWS:

Al-Arian Gets 18 Months More In Terror Case (ORS)

By Pedro Ruz Gutierrez, OrlandoSentinel.com Staff

The Orlando Sentinel, May 2, 2006

Tampa -- Branding him a "master manipulator," a federal judge on Monday sentenced controversial Palestinian professor Sami Al-Arian to 57 months in prison for aiding members of a terrorist group.

The prison term dashed Al-Arian's hope that he would be given time served and be released to immigration authorities for immediate deportation. Credited for the 38 1/2 months he already has served in pre-trial detention, Al-Arian likely be in prison until November 2007.

U.S. District Judge James Moody Jr. gave Al-Arian the maximum allowed under sentencing guidelines, which called for between 46 and 57 months in prison. Moody's unexpected strong words and sentence for the fired University of South Florida professor stung his family and supporters while they vindicated federal prosecutors.

Moody described Al-Arian, 48, as a master of deceit who has lied repeatedly to cover up his ties to a group that has killed more than 100 people -- including two U.S. citizens -- in Israel and the Palestinian territories.

Moody, who had listened earlier to Al-Arian's praise of the U.S. constitution and American society, said a six-month trial that ended in December had exposed him as a "leader" active in the Palestinian Islamic Jihad who tried to mask his actions as charity work.

"I find it interesting that you praise our country in public, and yet in private you refer to this country as the Great Satan," Moody said in reference to the professor's fiery speeches denouncing Israel and the United States in the late 1980s and early 1990s. "You are a master manipulator."

Describing his behind-the-scenes efforts to manage the Islamic Jihad's board of directors and appease its Iranian backers in the early 1990s, Moody said Al-Arian had no problem helping target innocents.

"When it came to blowing up children and women on buses, did you leap into action?" Moody said. "No. You lifted not one finger. On the contrary, you laughed when you heard about the attacks."

Al-Arian signed a plea agreement last month with prosecutors in which he admitted assisting members of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad -- including his deported brother-in-law Mazen Al-Najjar -- in violation of U.S. laws that banned contact with the group after 1995.

The Kuwait-born professor declared himself guilty of one count of conspiracy to make or receive contributions of funds, goods or services to or for the benefit of the group.

In a mixed verdict seen as victory by Al-Arian and defeat by prosecutors, jurors acquitted him on eight charges while they were hung on nine others. The most serious terrorism-related counts could have sent Al-Arian to prison for life. Two other men of Palestinian descent were acquitted as well; a third is also negotiating a plea.

Moody's harsh words stunned a courtroom packed with about 75 people, including federal prosecutors, agents, defense attorneys, family, friends and reporters. Another 30 spectators followed the 30-minute sentencing through a live video feed in a conference room.

"I think the judge got it," said U.S. Attorney Paul Perez outside the courthouse. In an unusual move, Perez addressed Moody in court while three lead prosecutors watched. "I find that anyone who is a master manipulator is a dangerous human being."

Linda Moreno, Al-Arian's attorney, avoided criticizing Moody and instead addressed his sentence. "We disagree with it. We asked for time served," she said. "Dr. Al-Arian accepts this sentence and is looking forward to the next chapter of his life."

Ahmed Bedier, a Florida-based spokesman for the Council on American Islamic Relations, faulted the judge for making a "political speech" and lecturing Al-Arian. "He was being biased and unfair in the comments that he made," Bedier said.

DOJ_NMG_0027630

Earlier in court, Moody noted that while his son and daughters attended the country's finest universities -- Georgetown University, the University of Chicago and Columbia University -- Al-Arian helped a group send other children on suicide missions.

"Not your children. You exhort others to send their children," the judge said. "Your only connection to widows and orphans is that you create them."

The judge used a 1995 double suicide bombing in Israel, which Al-Arian praised at the time, to illustrate Al-Arian's duplicity.

"Anyone with even the slightest bit of human compassion would be sickened. Not you. You saw it as an opportunity to solicit more money to carry out more bombings," Moody said in reference to a letter Al-Arian drafted after that attack.

Relatives, including his adult son and daughters, sat in shock as Moody lashed out at their father. His wife Nahla Al-Arian left the courtroom in tears.

"Everyone saw how magnanimous my husband was," Nahla Al-Arian said later. "The judge gave a political statement. It has nothing to do with the truth."

Moody's sentence will prolong the family's long-awaited reunification and delay the expected expulsion to the Middle East. Al-Arian, wearing his signature glasses, an olive two piece-suit, a yellow shirt and a beige tie, earlier had addressed Moody not knowing the judge would seize his words to chastise him.

"I'm indeed grateful for the opportunities afforded to the son of stateless Palestinian refugees," he said. "During these many years, I have tried to uphold the great values of my faith and culture and the honored ideals and principles of this society."

Pedro Ruz Gutierrez can be reached at pruz@orlandosentinel.com or 407-420-5620.

Al-Arian Sentenced To More Prison Before He Can Be Deported (AP)

By Mitch Stacy

AP, May 2, 2006

TAMPA, Fla. - Calling Sami Al-Arian a liar and "master manipulator," a federal judge on Monday ordered the former university professor to spend about another year and a half in prison before he is deported in his terrorism conspiracy case.

Al-Arian, 48, was sentenced to four years and nine months, but he will get credit for the more than three years and two months he has already served while being held before and after his trial. His lawyer, Linda Moreno, asked the judge to release him now for deportation under the terms of a plea agreement.

Instead, U.S. District Judge James S. Moody delivered some harsh words for the former University of South Florida computer engineering professor. Moody said he believed Al-Arian was "an active leader" in the Palestinian Islamic Jihad who raised money for suicide bombings in Israel and the Palestinian territories, and lied about his involvement.

Dismissing defense contentions that money raised by Al-Arian and his co-defendants went to support Palestinian charities, Moody said: "Your only connection to widows and orphans was that you create them."

Before the judge spoke, Al-Arian told the court that he takes responsibility for what he did and said he was grateful for the opportunities afforded him in the United States.

"As I leave, I harbor no bitterness or resentment," he said.

He signed a plea agreement April 14 in which he admitted providing support to members of the PIJ, a State Department-designated terrorist group responsible for hundreds of deaths. He took the deal despite a jury failing to convict him of any of the 17 charges against him after a six-month trial last year.

After the sentencing, Moreno declined to comment on Moody's sharp statement but noted that the jury declined to convict Al-Arian. Jurors had said the government failed to directly link Al-Arian his co-defendants to any acts of violence.

"(Federal prosecutors) essentially pulled the trigger and shot every bullet - and they missed Dr. Al-Arian," Moreno said. Taking the plea agreement instead of enduring a second trial, she said, was the best thing for Al-Arian and his family.

"The judge made a political statement," said Al-Arian's wife, Nahla.

Moody also blasted Al-Arian for celebrating deadly bombings by the PIJ and then using them to raise money for more bombings, which he and associates appeared to do in wiretapped phone calls introduced as evidence in the trial.

"Your children attend the finest universities in this county, while you raise money to blow up the children of others," Moody said.

DOJ_NMG_0027631

Moody gave Al-Arian the maximum prison sentence allowed under the plea agreement. Moreno said U.S. Bureau of Prisons guidelines will determine how much time he will have to serve, and the government has agreed to expedite deportation proceedings when he gets out.

It is not clear where Al-Arian will be sent then. Born in Kuwait to Palestinian refugee parents, he was reared mostly in Egypt before coming to the United States 30 years ago. He has been jailed since his arrest in February 2003.

U.S. Attorney Paul Perez claimed victory, saying the pursuit of Al-Arian allowed federal agents to identify and disrupt a terrorist cell operating in this country. The plea vindicated the prosecution, which some had criticized as being political and an attack on free speech, he said.

"There's no doubt in my mind he was a member of the PIJ," Perez said. "There's no doubt in my mind he provided support to members of the PIJ. There's no doubt in my mind that he was, as the judge said, a master manipulator."

As part of the plea agreement, Al-Arian admitted to being associated with the PIJ from the late 1980s and providing "services" for the group, which included filing for immigration benefits for key members of the PIJ, hiding the identities of those men and lying about his involvement.

Al-Arian's attorneys argued during his trial that although he and his co-defendants were vocal advocates in the United States for the Palestinian cause, the government had no proof that they planned or knew about specific acts of violence. They said the money they raised was for legitimate charities.

Al-Arian was acquitted in December of eight of the 17 federal charges against him while the jury deadlocked on the rest.

Two of his co-defendants were acquitted of all charges. The other, Hatem Naji Fariz, was acquitted on 25 counts while the jury deadlocked on eight others. The case against him on the remaining counts is pending.

The failure to convict Al-Arian was a stinging rebuke for the federal government. His case was once hailed by authorities as a triumph of the anti-terrorism Patriot Act, which allowed secret wiretaps and other information gathered by intelligence agents to be used in criminal prosecutions.

Al-Arian To Serve Prison Time (TAMPTRIB)

By Elaine Silvestrini

Tampa Tribune, May 2, 2006

TAMPA - Calling Sami Al-Arian a “master manipulator,” U.S. District Court Judge James Moody ignored the government’s recommendation for a light sentence and handed down the maximum penalty - a 57-month term to former USF professor.

Before being sentenced, Al-Arian said he takes full responsibility for his actions and praised the jury for their courage.

Al-Arian, 48, was sentenced to four years and nine months, but he will get credit for the three years and three months he has already served while being held before and after his trial. His lawyer, Linda Moreno, asked the judge to release her client now, but the judge refused and called Al-Arian “a master manipulator.”

Al-Arian signed a plea agreement April 14 in which he admitted providing support to members of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad, a State Department-designated terrorist group responsible for hundreds of deaths in Israel and the Palestinian territories.

The former University of South Florida computer engineering professor took the plea deal despite a jury failing to convict him of any of the 17 charges against him after a six-month trial last year. His family said he took the deal to get out of jail and end their suffering.

It was not immediately clear where Al-Arian will be sent. Born in Kuwait to Palestinian refugee parents, he was reared mostly in Egypt before coming to the United States 30 years ago. He has been jailed since his arrest in February 2003.

Information from The Associated Press was used in this report.

19 Months More In Prison For Professor In Terror Case (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

TAMPA, Fla., May 1 — Although the United States government lost most of its case last year against Sami Al-Arian, the former computer science professor it once identified as the linchpin in a terrorist organization, a federal judge sentenced him on Monday to an additional 19 months in prison before he is deported.

The case against Mr. Al-Arian, a Palestinian born in Kuwait, stemmed from a decade-long investigation that resulted in a 2003 indictment, charging him with being the leader of a domestic cell of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad, a group that claims responsibility for terrorist acts. He has remained in jail since his indictment.

Mr. Al-Arian, who had been under surveillance by American intelligence officials since 1991, was accused of raising money for suicide bombings in and around Israel.

The six-month trial, a centerpiece of the Bush administration's antiterrorism efforts that attracted the intense interest of legal experts, ended in December when the anonymous jury acquitted Mr. Al-Arian of 8 of the 17 federal charges against him, deadlocking on the rest.

Rather than face a retrial, the two sides agreed last month to a plea bargain in which Mr. Al-Arian pleaded guilty to a lesser charge of aiding members of the militant Palestinian group and agreed to be deported.

But any hope Mr. Al-Arian might have had of being deported quickly evaporated on Monday in the courtroom of Judge James S. Moody Jr. of Federal District Court. In a surprise move, Judge Moody sentenced Mr. Al-Arian to the maximum allowed under the sentencing guidelines, more than even the prosecution requested, and chided him for acts even the jury had rejected as Mr. Al-Arian's. The government had asked for the low end of the guidelines.

The judge continued to upbraid Mr. Al-Arian, whom he called a "master manipulator" for his connections to the Palestinian group, leading Mr. Al-Arian's wife to leave in tears.

Describing horrific bombings in Israel, Judge Moody said: "Anyone with even the slightest bit of human compassion would be sickened. Not you. You saw it as an opportunity to solicit more money to carry out more bombings."

He added, "The only connection to widows and orphans is that you create them."

Paul Perez, the United States attorney for the Middle District of Florida, called Mr. Al-Arian a "dangerous human being" and said he had no regrets about the way the case was prosecuted.

Mr. Perez's court appearance on Monday was his first in the case in four years. He painted the outcome as a victory for the government because it "identified and dismantled a cell that Al-Arian helped establish."

Nonetheless, the jury verdict, which embarrassed prosecutors who had devoted considerable resources to the case, underscored the complexities of obtaining convictions under the USA Patriot Act and other recent laws that criminalized aiding organizations that the United States has deemed to be based on terror.

For example, in the 30 previous efforts to convict a defendant of conspiring to contribute money to a terrorist organization — one of the charges against Mr. Al-Arian — 28 were dismissed, according to the Terrorism Research Center at the University of Arkansas.

"This case almost reached the level of seditious conspiracy," Brent Smith, director of the center, said. "And historically, we have been very unsuccessful at trying those cases."

Indeed the outcome of the case against Mr. Al-Arian did little to resolve the conflicting portraits of his life. His supporters described Mr. Al-Arian, 48, as a political scapegoat who merely aided women and children who had been harmed in the Middle East. They said he was a thoughtful advocate for Palestinians who were unaware of or unwilling to accept the violent acts of organizations he assumed were simply providing aid to countrymen.

Former Attorney General John Ashcroft and local officials described Mr. Al-Arian as a supporter of terror whose motives and beliefs were elucidated through his own words and deeds. Prosecutors said he helped finance activities like a suicide bombing at an Israeli bus stop in 1995 that killed 19 people.

In brief remarks before the court, Mr. Al-Arian painted himself on Monday as a patriot who was pleased to have raised five children in the United States, and grateful to its legal system.

"This process affirmed my belief in the true meaning of the democratic society," he said, as his wife, dabbing her eyes, looked on from the courtroom.

After the sentencing, Mr. Al-Arian's supporters, who had lined up for a space in the courtroom, denounced the judge's action. They included clergy members from Christian and Muslim groups, family members and advocates for Islamic causes.

DOJ_NMG_0027633

"I have been visiting with Sami Al-Arian every week in the jail for the last 14 months," said the Rev. Warren Clark, the pastor of the First United Church of Tampa. "I will tell you that the Sami Al-Arian that I know is very different from the Sami Al-Arian the judge described."

It is unclear what country will agree to take Mr. Al-Arian when he is deported. He was reared in Egypt, but has spent the last 30 years in the United States.

Terror Defendant Faces Prison And Deportation (WP)

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

TAMPA -- A judge sentenced former professor Sami al-Arian on Monday to 18 more months in prison before he will be deported in his terrorism conspiracy case, calling him "an active leader" in a Palestinian terrorist group.

Al-Arian, 48, was sentenced to four years and nine months, but he will get credit for the three years and three months already served.

Lawyer Linda Moreno asked the judge to release her client now, but the judge refused and called al-Arian "a master manipulator."

After a jury did not convict him in April, al-Arian signed a plea agreement in which he admitted to providing support to members of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad. The State Department-designated terrorist group is responsible for hundreds of deaths in Israel and the Palestinian territories.Moussaoui Jurors Resume Deliberations

Jurors in the death penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui will return to the federal courthouse in Alexandria on Tuesday to consider whether the Sept. 11, 2001, conspirator should be executed or sentenced to life in prison.

The 12-member jury has deliberated for about 28 hours over 4 1/2 days without reaching a verdict. Jurors asked the judge no questions Monday and left the courthouse at 4 p.m.

Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with al-Qaeda in the Sept. 11 attacks. He is the only person convicted in the United States on charges stemming from the attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon.

* * *

· Routine testing at a live-bird market in Camden County, N.J., turned up a strain of avian influenza that appears to be harmless to humans, a state official said. The precise virus, which did not kill any of the birds, is still being identified, but tests indicate it is not H5N1, the strain that has infected fowl in other countries and killed humans.

· CAPE CANAVERAL -- Eileen Collins, the unflappable astronaut who was the first woman to pilot and command a space shuttle, is leaving NASA. Having flown in space four times, Collins, 49, said, "It's time for me to step aside and give the young guys a chance to fly."

· SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico -- Puerto Rico's financial crisis forced almost 100,000 people out of work after political leaders failed to reach an agreement on how to keep the government running. Hundreds of public schools were closed, and angry teachers and other workers protested. During one march, rocks were thrown at police.

· HOUSTON -- A Honduran woman who ran a human smuggling operation in which 19 illegal immigrants died inside a sweltering truck three years ago asked for forgiveness before a judge sentenced her to 17 years in prison. Karla Chavez Joya, 28, wept and expressed remorse, saying through an interpreter, "If I could give my life to recover the lives of those people, I would do it."

· HOUSTON -- A Hispanic youth who authorities said was viciously attacked and sodomized by two white teenagers shouting ethnic slurs also suffered cigarette burns on his back and numerous other injuries, prosecutors said.

· HARTFORD, Conn. -- Connecticut Gov. M. Jodi Rell stripped a top fraud investigator of her duties after learning the official, a former assistant district attorney, had testified she had received many of the same gifts that toppled former governor John G. Rowland's administration. Kristine Ragaglia, head of the Medicaid fraud unit, was reassigned to administrative duties.

-- Staff writer Jerry Markon and news services

A Judge Stuns Al-Arian With Maximum Time (NYSUN)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, May 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027634

A federal judge yesterday lambasted a former Florida college professor, Sami Al-Arian, as a liar and "master manipulator," before sentencing him to nearly five years in prison for providing support to a Middle Eastern terrorist group, Palestinian Islamic Jihad.

Under a plea deal finalized last month, Al-Arian, 48, agreed to admit guilt and accept a possible sentence of 46 to 57 months and eventual deportation from America. Prosecutors agreed to join defense attorneys in recommending a sentence at the low end of the range, but the judge, James Moody Jr., ignored those suggestions and imposed the maximum sentence allowed by the plea bargain.

Al-Arian has been in custody since he was accused of being the leader of Palestinian Islamic Jihad in America and arrested in February 2003. A six-month trial overseen by Judge Moody last year resulted in Al-Arian's acquittal on eight charges against him and a hung jury on nine others. In a blow to the prosecution, none of the four defendants tried was convicted on any count and two of Al-Arian's co-defendants were acquitted outright.

The former University of South Florida professor's family and allies had hoped his guilty plea would lead to his speedy release and deportation, but the sentence imposed yesterday, when reduced by time served and other credits, means Al-Arian is likely to spend at least another year in jail before being handed over to immigration authorities.

At a court hearing yesterday morning, Judge Moody coupled the tough sentence with a stinging verbal rebuke of Al-Arian. The judge scoffed at many of the explanations and defenses Al-Arian has offered since news reports emerged in the mid-1990s alleging that the computer science professor and his Islamic studies think tank had ties to terrorism.

"You are a master manipulator. You looked your neighbors in the eyes and said you had nothing to do with Palestinian Islamic Jihad. This trial exposed that as a lie," Judge Moody said. "The evidence was clear in the this case that you were a leader of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad."

When evidence emerged at the trial of Al-Arian's contacts with leaders of the terror group, his attorneys argued that he was involved solely in the group's nonviolent wing and that his fund-raising activities were charitable in nature.

A Plea Deal In Florida (WP)

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

AT THE SENTENCING yesterday of Sami al-Arian following his recently released plea deal with federal prosecutors, U.S. District Judge James S. Moody Jr. called the former computer engineering professor a "master manipulator" who was "an active leader" of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad while living in Florida. His sentence? The maximum the law permits: a year and a half more in prison.

To hear Mr. al-Arian's family and supporters describe the plea agreement, you might think the defendant been exonerated. "This agreement in no way diminishes . . . the victory achieved in court," a group called the Tampa Bay Coalition for Justice and Peace announced, referring to Mr. al-Arian's acquittal last year on eight of 17 terrorism-related charges against him. "We welcome this resolution following an ordeal that kept Dr. Al-Arian from his family for over three years." By contrast, the Justice Department described the deal as if it were a big win in the war on terrorism. "This conviction is the result of years of exhaustive investigative and prosecutorial work," proclaimed U.S. Attorney Paul I. Perez in Florida.

In fact, both claims are bunk. Mr. al-Arian admitted to one conspiracy charge and accepted deportation while the government dropped the other charges remaining against him. Mr. al-Arian has now conceded what he had long denied: that he aided -- even helped manage -- a reprehensible terrorist organization. As Judge Moody put it yesterday, "You lifted not one finger" to stop suicide bombings. "To the contrary, you laughed when you heard of the bombings."

Here is some of what Mr. al-Arian admits: Throughout the late 1980s and early '90s, while a professor at the University of South Florida, he "was associated with several organizations, including the Palestinian Islamic Jihad," and knew that a co-worker at his university-based think tank, Ramadan Abdullah Shallah, was associated with it, too. After President Bill Clinton in 1995 prohibited material support for Islamic Jihad, Mr. al-Arian "performed services" for it anyway. He helped people associated with the group navigate the immigration system and move money around. And when Mr. Shallah left the think tank and became secretary general of the group following Israel's assassination of his predecessor, Mr. al-Arian "falsely stated that Mr. Shallah was not involved in any political activities while at [the think tank] and that Shallah had been engaged in only scholarly work." In other words, Mr. al-Arian has admitted to knowingly assisting and covering for the head of a notorious terrorist organization.

DOJ_NMG_0027635

Yet despite what the judge called "clear" evidence, the government has settled this case on terms under which Mr. al-Arian will go free in less than two years. It's not clear whether the government charged Mr. al-Arian too aggressively or simply put on a bad performance at trial. In either event it ill becomes the government to claim victory. Concerning Mr. al-Arian, a sometime rallying point for advocates of free speech and academic freedom, the verdict is in: He is not only a terrorist supporter but a liar, too.

Father Charged In U.S. Terror Probe Freed (AP)

By Don Thompson

AP, May 2, 2006

SACRAMENTO, Calif. - A man whose son was convicted of supporting terrorism by attending an al-Qaida camp in Pakistan was released Monday after nearly a year in federal custody.

Umer Hayat, a 48-year-old ice cream vendor, had been held since he and his son, Hamid, were arrested last June.

Umer Hayat was charged with two counts of lying to the FBI about his son's attendance at the training camp, but his case ended in a mistrial last week after the jury said it was deadlocked.

Prosecutors must decide by Friday if they will seek a new trial.

Last week, a U.S. District Court judge lowered Umer Hayat's bail from $1.2 million to $390,000, paving the way for his release.

He stood silent by attorney's side and made no comments after his release Monday. Attorney Johnny Griffin III said Hayat had learned that his father died over the weekend.

"It's a bittersweet moment right now," Griffin said. "His father tried to hang on."

Umer Hayat will be confined to his home in the Central Valley agricultural town of Lodi and was fitted with an electronic monitoring device.

A separate jury last week convicted Hamid Hayat, 23, of one count of providing material support to terrorists and three counts of lying to the FBI.

He faces a minimum of 30 years in prison when he is sentenced July 14. His attorney, Wazhma Mojaddidi, said she would seek a new trial.

Both men had given videotaped confessions to FBI agents that were played to jurors. Defense lawyers said their clients gave the confessions after they were worn down by hours of questioning and were merely responding to leading questions by FBI agents.

Lawyer: Drop Terror Case Charge (DEN)

Detroit News, May 2, 2006

Alleged prosecutorial misconduct enough to bar a second trial of Detroiter, attorney says.

Lawyers for Karim Koubriti, the Detroit man whose terrorism-related conviction was tossed out as a result of alleged wrongdoing by former federal prosecutor Richard Convertino, say in light of the alleged misconduct the charge against him should be dropped.

Koubriti's lawyers are to make that argument, among others, at a hearing today before U.S. District Judge Gerald Rosen.

The U.S. Attorney's Office is prosecuting Koubriti, 27, on a charge of conspiracy to commit mail fraud.

"The court should find that the egregious misconduct by the government in the first trial should have resulted in a mistrial and that retrial is barred," Koubriti lawyer Richard Helfrick of the Federal Defender Office argued in pleadings filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit.

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that when a mistrial results from prosecutorial misconduct, the case may not be retried. Helfrick concedes there was no mistrial in Koubriti's case, but argues there should have been.

"Simply because the egregiousness of the misconduct was not recognized by the court until after the return of the jury's verdict is not a reason to allow retrial in light of the misconduct presented," he said in court pleadings.

DOJ_NMG_0027636

The government indicted Convertino on March 29, accusing the former assistant U.S. attorney of lying to a jury and a federal judge in prosecuting Koubriti and three co-defendants. Koubriti's 2003, conviction for conspiring to provide support to terrorism was thrown out on Sept. 2, 2004.

In its response to the pleadings, the government argues there is no evidence of misconduct related to Koubriti's most recent indictment, which was brought on Dec. 15, 2004, by different prosecutors after Convertino was removed from the case.

Koubriti's lawyers also argue the latest indictment amounts to illegal double jeopardy -- trying someone twice for the same crime.

Koubriti is accused of submitting phony claims for lost wages and other expenses after he was a passenger in a car driven by one of his co-defendants who was involved in an accident in July 2001. In an earlier indictment, the government alleged proceeds from the false insurance claims were to be used to support "jihad."

The government argues there can be no double jeopardy because the two conspiracy charges require the government to prove different things.

Koubriti, a Moroccan citizen who was arrested six days after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, is working two jobs and "trying to get on with his life," Helfrick said.

You can reach Paul Egan at (313) 222-2069 or pegan@ detnews.com.

PATRIOT ACT:

FBI Sought Information On 3,501 People Last Year Using Powerful Investigative Tool (BOS/AP)

By Mark Sherman, Associated Press Writer

The Boston Globe, May 1, 2006

WASHINGTON --The FBI secretly sought information last year on 3,501 U.S. citizens and legal residents from their banks and credit card, telephone and Internet companies without a court's approval, the Justice Department said Friday.

It was the first time the Bush administration has publicly disclosed how often it uses the administrative subpoena known as a national security letter, which allows the executive branch of government to obtain records about people in terrorism and espionage investigations without court approval.

Friday's disclosure was mandated as part of the renewal of the Patriot Act, the administration's sweeping anti-terror law.

The FBI delivered a total of 9,254 NSLs relating to 3,501 people in 2005, according to a report submitted late Friday to Democratic and Republican leaders in the House and Senate. In some cases, the bureau demanded information about one person from several companies.

The department also reported it received a secret court's approval for 155 warrants to examine business records last year, under a Patriot Act provision that includes library records. However, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has said the department has never used the provision to ask for library records.

The number was a significant jump over past use of the warrant for business records. A year ago, Gonzales told Congress there had been 35 warrants approved between November 2003 and April 2005.

Data Show How Patriot Act Used (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, April 29, 2006

The Justice Department for the first time reports on 9,254 FBI subpoenas for monitoring citizens. Some surveillance in the U.S. has been rising.

WASHINGTON — The FBI issued thousands of subpoenas to banks, phone companies and Internet providers last year, aggressively using a power enhanced under the Patriot Act to monitor the activities of U.S. citizens, Justice Department data released late Friday showed.

The report given to members of Congress was the first to detail the government's use of a controversial form of administrative subpoena that has drawn fire because it can be issued by investigators without court oversight.

The Justice Department report also disclosed that its use of electronic surveillance and search warrants in national security investigations jumped 15% in 2005.

The data show that U.S. authorities are in some cases escalating their use of anti-terrorism statutes.

Civil liberties groups said they found the new information worrisome. They said it raised concerns about whether investigators were being sensitive to the rights of citizens caught in terrorism-related probes.

The report includes the first look at the use of what are known as national security letters, which let the FBI obtain phone logs, Internet traffic records, and bank and credit information about individuals without a court order.

The Bush administration had fought the release of the information on grounds that it could imperil national security. But Congress ordered the release when it reauthorized portions of the Patriot Act this year.

According to the new report, the FBI issued 9,254 national security letters in 2005, covering 3,501 U.S. citizens and legal foreign residents.

The Justice Department said the data did not include what probably were thousands of additional letters issued to obtain more limited information about some individuals — such as a home address — or letters that were issued about targets who were in the U.S. illegally.

The number of such letters previously had been provided to members of Congress on a classified basis. Data from other years aren't available, although some experts said the number probably had increased substantially.

"Now we can see why the administration was so eager to hide the number," said Lisa Graves, a senior legislative counsel with the American Civil Liberties Union in Washington.

The original Patriot Act, enacted weeks after the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, made it easier for the FBI to issue the letters, and for the first time permitted agents based outside Washington to issue the letters.

"These used to be fairly difficult to obtain, and now the authorities have been delegated very widely," said Michael Woods, former head of the FBI national-security law unit. "I think [the report] primarily shows that they are a lot easier to get."

The Justice Department report also included an annual update on the number of warrants that the department had obtained through the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, a secret federal court for intelligence and terrorism investigations.

Applications for electronic surveillance and physical search warrants — which almost always are approved by the court — rose to 2,074 in 2005, compared with 1,758 in 2004. Last year's total was more than double the number sought in 2000.

That court is the tribunal that the Bush administration has been bypassing in a warrantless domestic surveillance program since shortly after Sept. 11.

James Dempsey, policy director of the nonprofit Center for Democracy and Technology in Washington, said the increased use of the secret court belied the government's contention that it needed to go outside the court to get the information it needed.

Dempsey said he was surprised the number of warrants issued by that court had continued to grow substantially "when the war on terrorism has reached a sort of steady state."

FBI Sought Data On Thousands In '05 (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

The FBI sought personal information on thousands of Americans last year from banks, Internet service providers and other companies without having to seek approval from a court, according to new data released by the Justice Department.

In a report to the top leaders of both parties in the House, the department disclosed that the FBI had issued more than 9,200 "national security letters," or NSLs, seeking detailed information about more than 3,500 U.S. citizens or legal residents in 2005.

The report, released late Friday, represents the first official count of NSL use. It was required under legislation that extended the USA Patriot Act anti-terrorism law.

DOJ_NMG_0027638

The count does not include other such letters that are issued by the FBI to obtain more limited subscriber information from companies, such as a person's name, address or other identifying data, according to the report. Sources have said that would include thousands of additional letters and may be the largest category of NSLs issued. The Washington Post reported in November that the FBI now issues more than 30,000 NSLs each year, including subscriber requests.

The Justice Department report also outlined a continued increase in the use of secret warrants under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA. The secret court that oversees the law approved a record 2,072 orders for clandestine searches or surveillance in 2005 -- an 18 percent increase from the year before.

The new statistics provide the latest measure of the government's rapidly expanding anti-terrorism activities, which include a wide range of secret warrants and powers aimed at monitoring suspicious behavior and preventing attacks.

Many of the tactics have come under criticism from civil liberties groups as intrusive and lacking in proper oversight. National security letters, for example, are a form of administrative subpoena that can be issued by scores of FBI managers around the country.

"This tells us why they didn't want to tell us in the past how many of these they were actually using," said Caroline Fredrickson, Washington legislative director for the American Civil Liberties Union. "The idea that this kind of power resides in the hands of so many people at the FBI with no court oversight is very troubling."

The government previously has declined to reveal how many NSLs have been issued by the FBI and criticized the Post report as inaccurate. A Justice Department official said yesterday that the department would not comment on how many more NSLs have been issued for subscriber data only.

At the FISA court, the number of warrants for clandestine searches and surveillance has more than doubled in the past five years, according to government figures. The court -- which historically has refused only a handful of warrant applications -- did not reject any of the government's requests last year, although two cases were withdrawn by Justice before a ruling was issued, the report said.

The Justice official said part of the increase in 2005 can be attributed to an expansion of the office that submits FISA cases.

The FBI also used a controversial section of the Patriot Act to obtain business-related records 155 times in 2005. But most of that activity was the result of temporary technical problems with an earlier statute, and the number is expected to fall dramatically this year, according to the report to Congress.

Court-approved Wiretaps Rose In '05 (USAT)

USA Today, May 2, 2006

Terrorism-related wiretaps conducted under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act increased 18% last year, the Justice Department said Monday. There were 2,072 FISA warrants in 2005, up from 1,754 a year earlier.

The warrants are separate from a program under which President Bush authorized the National Security Agency to monitor, without a court warrant, international calls and e-mails of people inside the USA when one party may be linked to terrorists. Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., and other critics say the NSA program could violate the 1978 FISA law as well as constitutional protections against unreasonable searches.

The Justice Department said that the FISA court in 2005 approved 155 warrants granting federal authorities access to business records under the USA Patriot Act, and that federal investigators also obtained secret national security letters to gather information on 3,501 people.

In criminal investigations not involving terrorism suspects, state and federal courts approved 1,773 criminal investigation wiretaps in 2005, a 4% increase over the previous year, the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts reported. State applications grew 17% to 1,148. Federal wiretaps dropped 14% but would have increased if the figures included earlier investigations that lasted into 2006, the Justice Department said.

Jesselyn McCurdy, a lawyer with the American Civil Liberties Union, said she was concerned that judges are “becoming a rubber stamp.” Nationwide, only one application was denied. Nine out of every 10 wiretaps were for portable devices such as cellphones, and eight out of 10 were in drug investigations.

DOJ_NMG_0027639

President Bush urged Congress to enact his proposals that he said would increase quality and hold down the cost of health care. He told 2,000 members of the American Hospital Association that U.S. health care is "the best in the world" and he wants to keep it that way.

Among his proposals: create 400 more community health centers, expand health savings accounts, encourage doctors and hospitals to post prices up front, limit medical malpractice suits and modernize record-keeping with high technology. The House of Representatives has passed some of the proposals; the Senate has yet to act.

Shortly after Bush spoke, the Democratic National Committee said in a statement that Bush's plans are driven by special interests and do little to curb health costs or increase the number of insured Americans. — Richard Benedetto

The Secret Service will release White House visitor logs that show how often convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff met with Bush administration officials and with whom he met.

Last week, U.S. District Judge John Garrett Penn approved an agreement between the Secret Service and Judicial Watch, a public interest group, that requires the agency to produce records of Abramoff's visits by May 10.

Judicial Watch sued in February under the Freedom of Information Act. Bush has said he doesn't know Abramoff, who raised at least $100,000 for the president's re-election. Administration officials wouldn't say how many times Abramoff was at the White House. He pleaded guilty in January to federal charges related to his ties with members of Congress and the administration. Abramoff represented Indian tribes in their dealings with politicians.

Student Scholarships For Studying Abroad (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

Your article "Colleges Impose Restrictions on Study-Abroad Programs" (April 12, Personal Journal) missed the big picture. You suggest higher education in the U.S. is discouraging students from studying abroad. But such programs are growing by almost 10% each year. There is a huge push by many universities to make that happen.

At the University of Georgia, students who receive Hope Scholarship funds from the state may apply those funds to study-abroad programs. The university plans to have a development officer who will focus on generating scholarships for study abroad, particularly minority, rural and first-generation undergraduates. Like many large universities, UGA has an institution-wide goal to send 25% of our students abroad annually by 2010.

At the University of Denver, the Cherrington Global Scholars Program allows students to study in more than 150 programs abroad. The program ensures all eligible undergraduates can study abroad at no additional cost to being on campus. The University of Tennessee has committed $150,000 annually to sustain and develop programs with a goal of increasing the number of students studying abroad by 150% by 2010, and to integrate study abroad opportunities into graduation requirements in all units.

Congressional leaders and the president appointed a commission last year to recommend how to dramatically increase the numbers. It recommends that one million students annually study abroad in 10 years, with the goal of having such programs be a normal part of college and not something special for a few. The report also recommends federal scholarship money based on need to reinforce the drive on many campuses.

Michael F. Adams
President
University of Georgia
Athens, Ga.

Spies Among Us (USNEWS)

By David E. Kaplan

U.S. News and World Report, May 2, 2006

In the Atlanta suburbs of DeKalb County, local officials wasted no time after the 9/11 attacks. The second-most-populous county in Georgia, the area is home to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the FBI's regional headquarters, and other potential terrorist targets. Within weeks of the attacks, officials there boasted that they had set up the nation's first local department of homeland security. Dozens of other communities followed, and, like them, DeKalb County put in for--and got--a series of generous federal counterterrorism grants. The county received nearly $12 million from Washington, using it to set up, among other things, a police intelligence unit.

DOJ_NMG_0027640

The outfit stumbled in 2002, when two of its agents were assigned to follow around the county executive. Their job: to determine whether he was being tailed--not by al Qaeda but by a district attorney investigator looking into alleged misspending. A year later, one of its plainclothes agents was seen photographing a handful of vegan activists handing out antimeat leaflets in front of a HoneyBaked Ham store. Police arrested two of the vegans and demanded that they turn over notes, on which they'd written the license-plate number of an undercover car, according to the American Civil Liberties Union, which is now suing the county. An Atlanta Journal-Constitution editorial neatly summed up the incident: "So now we know: Glazed hams are safe in DeKalb County."

Glazed hams aren't the only items that America's local cops are protecting from dubious threats. U.S. News has identified nearly a dozen cases in which city and county police, in the name of homeland security, have surveilled or harassed animal-rights and antiwar protesters, union activists, and even library patrons surfing the Web. Unlike with Washington's warrantless domestic surveillance program, little attention has been focused on the role of state and local authorities in the war on terrorism. A U.S.News inquiry found that federal officials have funneled hundreds of millions of dollars into once discredited state and local police intelligence operations. Millions more have gone into building up regional law enforcement databases to unprecedented levels. In dozens of interviews, officials across the nation have stressed that the enhanced intelligence work is vital to the nation's security, but even its biggest boosters worry about a lack of training and standards. "This is going to be the challenge," says Los Angeles Police Chief William Bratton, "to ensure that while getting bin Laden we don't transgress over the law. We've been burned so badly in the past--we can't do that again."

Rap sheets. Chief Bratton is referring to the infamous city "Red Squads" that targeted civil rights and antiwar groups in the 1960s and 1970s (Page 48). Veteran police officers say no one in law enforcement wants a return to the bad old days of domestic spying. But civil liberties watchdogs warn that with so many cops looking for terrorists, real and imagined, abuses may be inevitable. "The restrictions on police spying are being removed," says attorney Richard Gutman, who led a 1974 class action lawsuit against the Chicago police that obtained hundreds of thousands of pages of intelligence files. "And I don't think you can rely on the police to regulate themselves."

Good or bad, intelligence gathering by local police departments is back. Interviews with police officers, homeland security officials, and privacy experts reveal a transformation among state and local law enforcement.

Among the changes:

Since 9/11, the U.S. Departments of Justice and Homeland Security have poured over a half-billion dollars into building up local and state police intelligence operations. The funding has helped create more than 100 police intelligence units reaching into nearly every state.

To qualify for federal homeland security grants, states were told to assemble lists of "potential threat elements"--individuals or groups suspected of possible terrorist activity. In response, state authorities have come up with thousands of loosely defined targets, ranging from genuine terrorists to biker gangs and environmentalists.

Guidelines for protecting privacy and civil liberties have lagged far behind the federal money. After four years of doling out homeland security grants to police departments, federal officials released guidelines for the conduct of local intelligence operations only last year; the standards are voluntary and are being implemented slowly.

The resurgence of police intelligence operations is being accompanied by a revolution in law enforcement computing. Rap sheets, intelligence reports, and public records are rapidly being pooled into huge, networked computer databases. Much of this is a boon to crime fighting, but privacy advocates say the systems are wide open to abuse.

Behind the windfall in federal funding is broad agreement in Washington on two areas: first, that local cops are America's front line of defense against terrorism; and second, that the law enforcement and intelligence communities must do a far better job of sharing information with state and local police. As a report by the International Association of Chiefs of Police stressed: "All terrorism is local." Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh was arrested by a state trooper after a traffic stop. And last year, local police in Torrance, Calif., thwarted what the FBI says could have been America's worst incident since 9/11--planned attacks on military sites and synagogues in and around Los Angeles by homegrown jihadists.

DOJ_NMG_0027641

The numbers tell the story: There are over 700,000 local, state, and tribal police officers in the United States, compared with only 12,000 FBI agents. But getting the right information to all those eyes and ears hasn't gone especially well. The government's failure at "connecting the dots," as the 9/11 commission put it, was key to the success of al Qaeda's fateful hijackings in 2001. Three of the hijackers, including ringleader Mohamed Atta, were pulled over in traffic stops before the attacks, yet local cops had no inkling they might be on terrorist watch lists. A National Criminal Intelligence Sharing Plan, released by the Justice Department in 2003, found no shortage of problems in sharing information among local law enforcement: a lack of trust and communication; lack of funding for a national intelligence network; lack of database connectivity; a shortage of intelligence analysts, software, and training; and a lack of standards and policies.

The flood of post-9/11 funding and attention, however, has started making a difference, officials say. Indeed, it has catalyzed reforms already underway in state and local law enforcement, giving a boost to what reformers call intelligence-led policing--a kind of 21st-century crime fighting driven by computer databases, intelligence gathering, and analysis. "This is a new paradigm, a new philosophy of policing," says the LAPD's Bratton, who previously served as chief of the New York Police Department. In that job, Bratton says, he spent 5 percent of his time on counterterrorism; today, in Los Angeles, he spends 50 percent. The key to counterterrorism work, Bratton adds, is intelligence.

The change is "huge, absolutely huge," says Michigan State University's David Carter, the author of Law Enforcement Intelligence. "Intelligence used to be a dirty word. But it's a more thoughtful process now." During the 1980s and 1990s, intelligence units were largely confined to large police departments targeting drug smugglers and organized crime, but the national plan now being pushed by Washington calls for every law enforcement agency to develop some intelligence capability. Experts estimate that well over 100 police departments, from big-city operations to small county sheriffs'offices, have now established intelligence units of one kind or another. Hundreds of local detectives are also working with federal agents on FBI-run Joint Terrorism Task Forces, which have nearly tripled from 34 before 9/11 to 100 today. And over 6,000 state and local cops now have federal security clearances, allowing them to see classified intelligence reports.

"The front line." Some police departments have grown as sophisticated as those of the feds. The LAPD has some 80 cops working counterterrorism, while other big units now exist in Atlanta, Chicago, and Las Vegas. Then there's the NYPD, which is in a class by itself--with a thousand officers assigned to homeland security. The Big Apple's intelligence chief is a former head of CIA covert operations; its counterterrorism chief is an ex-State Department counterterrorism coordinator. The NYPD has officers based in a half-dozen countries, and its counterterrorism agents visit some 200 businesses a week to check on suspicious activity.

Many of the nation's new intelligence units are dubbed "fusion centers." Run by state or local law enforcement, these regional hubs pool information from multiple jurisdictions. From a mere handful before 9/11, fusion centers now exist in 31 states, with a dozen more to follow. Some focus exclusively on terrorism; others track all manner of criminal activity. Federal officials hope to eventually see 70 fusion centers nationwide, providing a coast-to-coast intelligence blanket. This vision was noted by President Bush in a 2003 speech: "All across our country we'll be able to tie our terrorist information to local information banks so that the front line of defeating terror becomes activated and real, and those are the local law enforcement officials."

Intelligence centers are among the hottest trends in law enforcement. Last year, Massachusetts opened its Commonwealth Fusion Center, which boasts 18 analysts and 23 field-intelligence officers. The state of California is spending $15 million on a string of four centers this year, and north Texas and New Jersey are each setting up six. The best, officials say, are focused broadly and are improving their ability to counter sophisticated crimes that include not only terrorism but fraud, racketeering, and computer hacking. The federal Department of Homeland Security, which has bankrolled start-ups of many of the centers, has big plans for the emerging network. Jack Tomarchio, the agency's new deputy director of intelligence, told a law enforcement conference in March of plans to embed up to three DHS agents and intelligence analysts at every site. "The states want a very close synergistic relationship with the feds," he explained to U.S. News. "Nobody wants to play by the old rules. The old rules basically gave us 9/11."

"Reasonable suspicion." The problem, skeptics say, is that no one is quite sure what the new rules are. "Hardly anyone knows what a fusion center should do," says Paul Wormeli of the Integrated Justice Information Systems Institute, a Justice Department-backed training and technology center. "Some states have responded by putting 10 state troopers in a room to look at databases. That's a ridiculous approach." Another law enforcement veteran, deeply involved with the fusion centers, expressed similar frustration. "The money has been moved without guidance or structure, technical assistance, or training," says the official, who is not authorized to speak publicly. There are now guidelines, he adds, "but they're not binding on anyone." In the past year, the Justice Department has issued standards for local police on fusion centers and privacy issues, but they are only advisory. Most federal funding for the centers now comes from the Department of Homeland Security, but DHS also requires no intelligence standards from its grantees.

DOJ_NMG_0027642

At the state level, regulations on police spying vary widely, but a general rule of thumb comes from the Justice Department's internal guidelines that forbid intelligence gathering on individuals unless there is a "reasonable suspicion" of criminal activity. Since the reforms of the 1970s, the FBI says its agents have followed this standard; Justice Department regulations require local police who receive federal funding to do the same in maintaining any intelligence files. But there is considerable leeway at the local level, and since 2001, judges have watered down police spying limits in Chicago and New York. The federal regs, moreover, have not stopped a parade of questionable cases.

Suspicion of spying is so rife among antiwar activists, who have loudly protested White House policy on Iraq, that some begin meetings by welcoming undercover cops who might be present. "People know and believe their activities are being monitored," says Leslie Cagan, national coordinator of United for Peace and Justice, the country's largest antiwar coalition. There is some evidence to back this up. Documents and videotapes obtained from lawsuits against the NYPD reveal that its undercover officers have joined antiwar and even bicycle-rider rallies. In at least one case, an apparent undercover officer incited a crowd by faking his arrest. In Fresno, Calif., activists learned in 2003 that their group, Peace Fresno, had been infiltrated by a local sheriff's deputy--piecing it together after the man died in a car crash and his obituary appeared in the paper.

The California Anti-Terrorism Information Center, a $7 million fusion center run by the state Department of Justice, also ran into trouble in 2003 when it warned of potential violence at an antiwar protest at the port of Oakland. Mike Van Winkle, then a spokesman for the center, explained his concern to the Oakland Tribune: "You can make an easy kind of a link that, if you have a protest group protesting a war where the cause that's being fought against is international terrorism, you might have terrorism at that protest. You can almost argue that a protest against [the war] is a terrorist act." Officials quickly distanced themselves from the statement. The center's staff had confused political protest with terrorism, announced California's attorney general, who oversees the office.

"Absurd" threats. But this expansive view of homeland security has at times also extended to union activists and even library Web surfers. In February 2006 near Washington, D.C., two Montgomery County, Md., homeland security agents walked into a suburban Bethesda library and forcefully warned patrons that viewing Internet pornography was illegal. (It is not.) A county official later called the incident "regrettable" and said those officers had been reassigned. Similarly, in 2004, two plainclothes Contra Costa County sheriff's deputies monitored a protest by striking Safeway workers in nearby San Francisco, identifying themselves to union leaders as homeland security agents.

Further blurring the lines over what constitutes "homeland security" has been a push by Washington for states to identify possible terrorists. In 2003, the Department of Homeland Security began requiring states to draft strategic plans that included figures on how many "potential threat elements" existed in their backyards. The definition of suspected terrorists was fairly loose--PTEs were groups or individuals who might use force or violence "to intimidate or coerce" for a goal "possibly political or social in nature." In response, some states came up with alarming numbers. Most of the reports are not available publicly, but U.S. News obtained nine state homeland security plans and found that local officials have identified thousands of "potential" terrorists. There are striking disparities, as well. South Carolina, for example, found 68 PTEs, but neighboring North Carolina uncovered 506. Vermont and New Hampshire found none at all. Most impressive was Texas, where in 2004 investigators identified 2,052 potential threat elements. One top veteran of the FBI's counterterrorism force calls the Texas number "absurd." Included among the threats cited by the states, sources say, are biker gangs, militia groups, and "save the whales" environmentalists.

"The PTE methodology was flawed," says a federal intelligence official familiar with the process, "and it's no longer being used." Nonetheless, these "threat elements" have, in some cases, become the basis for intelligence gathering by local and state police. Concern over the process prompted the ACLU in New Jersey to sue the state, demanding that eight towns turn over documents on PTEs identified by local police.

DOJ_NMG_0027643

Another source of alarm for civil liberties watchdogs is the explosion in police computing power. Spurred by a 2004 White House directive ordering better information sharing, the Justice Department has poured tens of millions of dollars into expanding and tying together law enforcement databases and networks. In many respects, the changes are long overdue, yanking police into the 21st century and letting them use the tools that bankers, private investigators, and journalists routinely employ. From TV shows like 24 and CSI, Americans are accustomed to scenes of police accessing the most arcane data with a few keyboard clicks. The reality couldn't be more different. Law enforcement was slow to get on the technology bandwagon, and its information systems have developed into a patchwork of networks and databases that cannot talk to one another--even within the same county. Rap sheets, prison records, and court files are often all on different systems. This means that days or even weeks can pass before court-issued warrants show up on police wanted lists--leaving criminals out on the streets.

States and cities began linking up their systems in the 1990s, but since 9/11 their progress has been dramatic. At least 38 states are working on some 200 projects tying together their criminal justice records. Concerned over disjointed police networks around its key bases, the Navy's Criminal Investigative Service is funding projects in Norfolk, Va., and four other port cities, creating huge "data warehouses" stocked with crime files from dozens of law enforcement agencies. The FBI is also running pilot database centers in the St. Louis and Seattle areas in which the bureau makes its case files available to police. To local cops who have long complained about the FBI's lack of sharing, the development is downright revolutionary. "It made people nervous as hell, including me," says the FBI's Thomas Bush, who oversaw the initial program and now runs the FBI's Criminal Justice Information Services Division. "The technical aspect is easy, but you need to have the trust of the community and the security to safeguard the system."

The benefits of all this are undeniable. Armed with the latest information, police will be better able to catch crooks and spot criminal trends. But in this digital age, with so much data available about individual Americans, the lines between what is acceptable investigation and what is intrusive spying can quickly grow unclear. Consider the case of Matrix. Backed by $12 million in federal funds, at its peak in 2004 the Matrix system tapped into law enforcement agencies from a dozen states. Using "data mining" technology, its search engine ripped through billions of public records and matched them with police files, creating instant dossiers. In the days after 9/11, Matrix researchers searched out individuals with what they called "high terrorist factor" scores, providing federal and state authorities a list of 120,000 "suspects."

Law enforcement officials loved the system and made nearly 2 million queries to it. But what alarmed privacy advocates was the mixing of public data with police files, profiling techniques that smacked of fishing expeditions, and the fact that all these sensitive data were housed in a private corporation. Hounded by bad publicity and concerned that Matrix might be breaking privacy laws, states began pulling out of the system. Then, early last year, the Justice Department quietly cut off funding.

Matrix no longer exists, but similar projects are underway across the country, including one run by the California Department of Justice. Having learned from Matrix's mistakes, users are employing what tech specialists call "distributed computing." Instead of creating a single, vast database, they rapidly access information from sites in different states, often with a single query. The effect is essentially the same. "If people knew what we were looking at, they'd throw a fit," says a database trainer at one prominent police department.

Hacker's discovery. Another concern is the quality--and security--of all that information. In Minnesota, the state-run Multiple Jurisdiction Network Organization ran into controversy after linking together nearly 200 law enforcement agencies and over 8 million records. State Rep. Mary Liz Holberg, a Republican who oversees privacy issues, found much to be alarmed about when a local hacker contacted her after breaking into the system. The hacker had yanked out files on Holberg herself, showing she was classified as a "suspect" based on a neighbor's old complaint about where she parked her car. "We had a real mess in Minnesota," Holberg later wrote. "There was no effective policy for individuals to review the data in the system, let alone correct inaccuracies." In late 2003, state officials shut down the system amid concerns that it violated privacy laws in its handling of records on juvenile offenders and gun permits.

Such problems threaten to grow as law enforcement expands its reach with increased intelligence and computing power. The key to avoiding trouble, say experts, is ensuring that concerns over privacy and civil liberties are dealt with head-on. In a recent advisory aimed at police intelligence units, the Department of Justice stressed that success in safeguarding civil liberties "depends on appointing a high-level member of your agency to champion the initiative." But that message apparently hasn't gotten through, judging from the response at a conference sponsored by the Justice Department a few weeks back on information sharing. Among the crowd of some 200 local and state officials were intelligence officers, database managers, and chiefs of police. When a speaker asked who in the audience was working with privacy officials, not a single hand went up.

DOJ_NMG_0027644

As Washington doles out millions of dollars for police intelligence, its reliance on voluntary guidelines may backfire, warn critics, who worry that abuses could wreck the important work that needs to be done. "We're still diddling around," says police technology expert Wormeli. "We're not setting clear policy on what we put in our databases. Should a patrol officer in Tallahassee be able to look at my credit report? Most people would say, 'Hell, no.'" Current regulations on criminal intelligence, he adds, were written before the computer age. "They were great in their day, but they need to be updated and expanded."

Civil liberties watchdogs like attorney Gutman, meanwhile, want to know how efforts to stop al Qaeda have ended up targeting animal rights advocates, labor leaders, and antiwar protesters. "You've got all this money and all this equipment--you're going to find someone to use it on," he warns. "If there aren't any external checks, there's going to be an inevitable drift toward abuses." But boosters of intelligence-led policing say that today's cops are too smart to repeat mistakes of the old Red Squads. "We're trying to develop policies to build trust and relationships, not spy," says Illinois State Police Deputy Director Kenneth Bouche. "We've learned a better way to do it." Perhaps. But for now, at least, the jury on this case is still out.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Informer In Bomb Plot Trial Tells Of His Visits To Mosques (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

The paid police informer who is the central witness at the trial of a Pakistani immigrant charged with plotting to blow up the Herald Square subway station testified yesterday that he collected a wide range of information on his visits to two city mosques, from the tenor of the sermons to how many people attended the services.

The informer, Osama Eldawoody, 50, secretly recorded roughly two dozen conversations about the plot with the immigrant, Shahawar Matin Siraj, in the summer of 2004 — many of them incriminating. He was questioned by Mr. Siraj's lawyer about the information he provided to the police on his frequent visits to mosques in Brooklyn and Staten Island. The visits occurred over roughly 13 months in 2003 and 2004, both before and after the informer met Mr. Siraj.

Regardless of the outcome of the trial for Mr. Siraj, 23, who faces up to 20 years in prison if convicted, Mr. Eldawoody's testimony is shedding light on what seem to be new police tactics to uncover terrorist plots before they come to fruition. While a federal judge gave the police expanded powers in 2003, critics have nonetheless raised objections to the use of informers in places of worship, political events and other gatherings.

Mr. Eldawoody had earlier testified that he had been told to keep "his eyes and ears open for any radical thing," but many of the details that came out during questioning seemed mundane: How many people attended a service. How long it lasted. The name of the imam who spoke.

A frequent phrase in the reports he made to the police was, "the service was religious in nature."

What he reported sometimes seemed like small talk among worshipers. For example, pressed by one of Mr. Siraj's lawyers to explain what one report, about a man who discussed opening a new mosque on Staten Island, had to do with radicals, Mr. Eldawoody replied, "He doesn't have to be bad or good — I report it — he doesn't have to be a terrorist to report it. I report what happens and what I saw and what I heard."

Earlier in the day, prosecutors concluded their questioning of Mr. Eldawoody by playing a 45-minute videotape for jurors showing Mr. Siraj agreeing to guide a bomber into the subway station and to point out where he should plant backpack bombs. But he said he did not want to place the bombs himself, stressing he wanted to cause only economic damage. He also said he had to ask his mother first.

"I will work with those brothers, that's it," he said. "As a planner or whatever. But to putting there? I'm not sure."

DOJ_NMG_0027645

Although Mr. Siraj was captured on the recordings talking about his plan to blow up the subway station, his lawyers contend that the young man, who came to New York from Karachi, Pakistan, in 1999 with his parents, was duped by the informer, who was motivated by the nearly $100,000 paid to him by the Police Department over about three years.

Yesterday, one of Mr. Siraj's lawyers, Martin R. Stolar, appeared to be trying to highlight the Police Department's tactics as he cross-examined Mr. Eldawoody for several hours, questioning him on his recollections about the information he gave to the intelligence division detective who was his handler, including details about his visits to the al-Noor mosque on Staten Island and the Islamic Society of Bay Ridge in Brooklyn.

Using reports filed by the detective, which were piled roughly two inches high on a table beside him, Mr. Stolar asked the witness about his registration as a paid informer in July 2003 and questioned him about each mosque visit. Sometimes there were several visits in one day.

Mr. Stolar questioned him about the documents filed by the detective, Stephen Andrews — which reflected information Mr. Eldawoody had provided, by telephone or in person — asking if he recalled making the reports.

At one point, Mr. Stolar asked about a report indicating that he had told the detective that the imam of the Staten Island mosque was looking for a new house in New Jersey. Mr. Eldawoody said that he did not recall giving that information.

At another, the lawyer asked about a report suggesting Mr. Eldawoody had suspicions about a man named Maher, who was looking for foreclosure properties to buy. Mr. Eldawoody said he did not remember that.

And he asked about Mr. Eldawoody's reasons for reporting another conversation: "How did the fact that somebody wanted to open a new mosque on Staten Island relate to the mission that you thought you were doing, which was looking for violent jihad or radical talk?"

Under questioning by prosecutors last week, Mr. Eldawoody, a nuclear engineer who became a naturalized citizen after coming to America in 1986, said he began working as an informer to protect his new country.

Mr. Stolar, who has suggested that Mr. Eldawoody's motive was financial, asked the witness if he was spying in the mosque.

"I don't see it that way — that I was spying," he said. "If there is anything wrong that would hurt the United States, I would be the one to defend the country."

Mr. Stolar has said he intends to put the Police Department's tactics on trial, and at the beginning of his cross-examination, which he said would last several days, he suggested that he would focus closely on Mr. Eldawoody's actions and how the department supervised him.

At one point, he questioned the witness about a report that indicated that he had written down the license plate numbers of worshipers at a mosque.

"I was asked to do that," Mr. Eldawoody replied.

"Who asked you?" Mr. Stolar said.

"The detective," he said.

"He told you to go out and write down the license plates of people who attended services?" the lawyer asked.

"Yes," Mr. Eldawoody replied.

Who Might Fill Freedom Tower? First Of All, Feds (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

NEW YORK -- Meant to be a shining beacon of liberty and commerce, the rebuilt World Trade Center's signature Freedom Tower is also likely to be a government citadel housing federal law-enforcement groups among other government agencies -- possibly enhancing its profile as a terrorist target.

Among the prospective tenants are the U.S. Customs and Border Protection and Immigration and Customs Enforcement, now both within the Department of Homeland Security, as well as the Secret Service and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

The question of who will work in the heavily symbolic skyscraper -- planned at 1,776 feet high -- has dogged rebuilding officials since the days after 9/11. Private businesses scoffed at locating in a tall, high-profile building on the site of two terrorist attacks. New York City's government and the building's owner, the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, say they won't take space in Freedom Tower, opting instead for less-visible buildings on the Ground Zero site.

Last year, architects had to completely redesign the tower to protect against possible truck bombs. The changes include a 20-story square concrete base that critics have likened to a bunker.

Filling the $2.1 billion Freedom Tower is the first stage of a larger challenge: attracting businesses back downtown and to the other four planned office skyscrapers, including the already built, and mostly empty, 7 World Trade Center. Complicating matters, if federal or state tenants don't sign on in the next few months, the rebuilding plan struck last week between developer Larry Silverstein and several government players could unravel.

An estimated 25% of the commercial office space at Ground Zero -- and at least 38% of the Freedom Tower -- will be filled by government tenants, echoing the government bailout of the first trade center. But persuading government employees to work there may prove challenging. Some 750 customs and immigration workers fled from 6 World Trade before it was destroyed when the north Twin Tower collapsed.

"It's frightening," a Customs border-protection worker said in an interview yesterday. The worker, employed by the agency at the former trade-center site, refused to give her name for fear of retribution from supervisors. "When I heard about the Freedom Tower, I just stood still, I couldn't feel," she said. "They're going to have to take me like this" -- she motioned with both arms -- "and move me."

Leah Yoon, a Customs and Border Protection spokeswoman, says, "Our mission is more important than ever, and to be able to do that from a location that symbolizes so much tragedy for our country is in many ways an opportunity for us to rise above the ashes."

While the government tenants would create something of a critical mass, urban planners warn they also could drive away private businesses that for cultural and prestige reasons don't like to cohabit with government agencies.

"The FBI isn't who a big law firm wants to be next to," says John K. McIlwain, senior resident fellow at the Urban Land Institute, an industry research group. For one thing, he explains, the type of "bottom-end" lobby and other economies that budget-conscious government tenants demand differ from the more luxurious touches preferred by the private sector. FBI spokeswoman Christine Monaco declined to comment.

More broadly, Mr. McIlwain says there is "no perceptible office demand" for the planned 8.8 million square feet of office space, most of which will hit the market at about the same time in 2012. When government is being counted on for a quarter of that space, he says, "you know you have a problem. That's not the kind of tenants you want" to attract private businesses.

Conversely, some government agencies don't like to mix with the private sector. "There are federal agencies that won't go in with certain kinds of tenants," says Eileen Long-Chelales, regional director of the General Services Administration, the agency that procures space on behalf of the federal government. "There are some operations that are very private in nature, and they don't want the world knowing where they there."

Some see echoes of the first World Trade Center, which was finished in 1973. "After they built the first trade center, and the place was empty, they went to government to fill it up," says Bettina Damiani, director of Good Jobs New York, a group that fights subsidies to business. She adds: "We haven't progressed."

Even with government tenants, the original World Trade Center was partly empty for years, creating a glut of space and depressing the office market. Some said it would never fill. But by the late 1990s, it reached full capacity, and the Port Authority was able lease the complex for 99 years to Mr. Silverstein for $3.2 billion.

Last week, after lengthy negotiations, Mr. Silverstein and a web of government players agreed in principal on a tentative rebuilding plan at Ground Zero whose provisions include relieving the developer of the Freedom Tower, leaving the Port Authority in charge.

But crucial to going forward is getting federal tenants into the tower, which is by no means a done deal. Indeed, New Jersey agreed to go along with the Freedom Tower takeover only after New York Gov. George E. Pataki promised to lure federal agencies as a hedge against the building being a financial drain to the authority. Gov. Pataki has until September, when the final rebuilding pact is due to be signed. If he can't land a government tenant, the New Jersey half of the Port Authority says it will cancel the Freedom Tower.

DOJ_NMG_0027647

"We are confident government and private-sector firms will go into the Freedom Tower," says John McCarthy, Port Authority spokesman.

For the task of getting the federal government to take space in the Freedom Tower, Gov. Pataki has turned to his chief of staff, John Cahill, who has an inside advantage: His former deputy is the GSA's Ms. Long-Chelales.

"Now that there is a deal [with] Silverstein...it makes our conversation more fruitful," Ms. Long-Chelales says.

But hurdles remain. Congress needs to approve any leases that involve more than one million square feet. Also, the tower will need to meet federal civilian and law-enforcement standards, including parking spaces for federal agents.

Ms. Long-Chelales wouldn't comment directly about how employees might feel about moving into the Freedom Tower. "I would not even want to get into the emotions," she says. "It's five years later, and memories of Sept. 11 are still in the minds and hearts of those who witnessed and were a part of that day."

Taylor Relents On Flight 93 Funds (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, May 2, 2006

Reversing course in the face of pressure from his fellow House Republicans, Rep. Charles Taylor (N.C.) is expected to insert federal funding for a memorial to the passengers and crew of Flight 93 into the fiscal 2007 Interior spending bill this week.

Taylor has been under siege since The Washington Post first reported that the chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee on Interior was refusing to provide federal dollars to help purchase land for the construction of the memorial in Somerset County, Pa., to mark the sacrifice of the passengers who helped bring down the Sept. 11, 2001, flight before it could destroy the Capitol or the White House.

Taylor's office did not respond to a request for comment, and the Appropriations Committee also declined to discuss the issue. But two GOP sources said that the North Carolina lawmaker had dropped his opposition and would now include money for the memorial in Thursday's markup of the Interior bill.

The full details of that measure were not available Monday, but Taylor is expected to include — at the very least — the $5 million the Bush administration has requested for the fiscal 2007 bill to buy land for the memorial.

Taylor had argued that he is uncomfortable with the federal government gobbling up more private land when it is already the nation's biggest landowner. He also expressed wariness of having taxpayers pay for a memorial whose ultimate price tag is unclear.

But with a movie about Flight 93 in wide release and with GOP leaders unhappy about any suggestion that the party is unsympathetic to the cause, Taylor's fellow Republicans encouraged him to change his mind.

In an interview with the Winston-Salem Journal last week, Taylor said, "I support a memorial in Pennsylvania" but added, "What I am saying to you is, first, we have to have a price, and second, we need an idea of who is providing what."

Rep. Bill Shuster (R-Pa.), whose 9th district includes the proposed memorial site, wrote a letter to Taylor last week asking for the money "on behalf of the family members who we represent and the American people who support the ideals of the national memorial."

Shuster spokesman Tory Mazzola said Monday that he had not heard whether Taylor would put the requested money in the Interior bill, but he added, "We're still hopeful that it will be included."

Though Democrats — including Taylor's challenger this fall, former football player Heath Shuler — have already scored points trumpeting Taylor's initial stance, the decision to fund the land purchase for the memorial deprives Democrats on the Appropriations panel of the opportunity to insert the money themselves via an amendment at the subcommittee or full-committee level.

George Behan, spokesman for Interior subcommittee ranking member Norm Dicks (D-Wash.), said Monday that his boss had not yet formulated a plan to get the Flight 93 money into the bill because he assumed that Republicans would push Taylor into doing so himself before Thursday's hearing.

"We were assuming the issue would be resolved by then," Behan said.

Qatar Grants Millions In Aid To New Orleans (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

The nation of Qatar plans to announce today roughly $60 million in grants to benefit the victims of Hurricane Katrina, including $17.5 million to Xavier University of Louisiana, the only historically black Catholic university in the United States.

Other beneficiaries are Tulane University, Children's Hospital in New Orleans, Habitat for Humanity, Louisiana State University and the March of Dimes.

Nasser Bin Hamad M. al-Khalifa, Qatar's ambassador to the United States, said the remainder of the $100 million his country had pledged would be assigned in the coming months.

"Hurricane Katrina was so devastating that everyone in Qatar and the rest of the world felt a responsibility to really act," Mr. Khalifa said. More than 50 countries donated money, expertise and materials, according to a tally by Foreign Policy, a magazine published by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Qatar was one of several Persian Gulf nations to donate tens of millions of dollars. Saudi Arabia, for instance, gave more than $100 million, and the United Arab Emirates pledged $100 million.

Poor nations also donated. Less than a year after the Indian Ocean tsunami engulfed it, Sri Lanka gave $25,000 to the American Red Cross. Bangladesh gave $1 million, Cyprus $50,000, Ghana $15,000 and the Dominican Republic $50,000.

European countries tended to offer expertise, supplies and equipment instead of money. Denmark, for example, donated blankets, water purification units and first aid kits.

Many donor countries funneled their gifts through the State Department or other government agencies. The Federal Emergency Management Agency, for instance, used $66 million of foreign assistance to underwrite Katrina Aid Today, a consortium of nine religion-based and secular relief organizations led by the United Methodist Committee on Relief that is using the money to offer case management services to 100,000 families for two years.

The Department of Education now controls $60 million donated by foreign governments that it said it would disburse to organizations to rebuild classrooms and libraries, buy books and maybe even pay teachers' salaries.

"We want to give the money where it will have the greatest impact so the foreign governments can see how their funds are being used," said Valerie Smith, an Education Department spokeswoman.

Countries also gave money to the American Red Cross and to the Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund, the charity set up by former Presidents George Bush and Bill Clinton.

Qatar elected to distribute its money directly, rather than rely on an intermediary.

Ambassador Khalifa said the country wanted to insure transparency and accountability.

"Our past experience is that while you can give to any organization or to a government," he said, "you have no control over the money and then you discover the people most affected have not benefited."

To identify projects Qatar might want to support, the ambassador and his representatives talked to relief organizations, educators, members of Congress and other experts, and some embassy staff members traveled to the region.

Mr. Khalifa also drafted former Secretary of State James A. Baker; Laura D'Andrea Tyson, dean of the business school at the University of California, Berkeley, and a former economic adviser to President Clinton; Lee Raymond, former chief executive of the Exxon Mobil Corporation; and John J. DeGioia, the president of Georgetown University, to serve as an advisory board.

Qatar is giving Xavier, which is in New Orleans, $12.5 million to add 60,000 square feet to its College of Pharmacy so it can increase enrollment. The gift has additional benefits, the ambassador said, because it will provide construction jobs and because students from the university work in community clinics.

Xavier will also get $5 million for scholarships for students affected by the disaster.

"It's going to allow us to help those students to finish their educations," said Norman C. Francis, Xavier's president. "That's important because Xavier is the No. 1 producer of African-American graduates in the natural sciences, and those students then go on to get admitted to medical school."

Tulane will receive $10 million to help undergraduate students from Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama who were affected by Hurricane Katrina, as well as students from those states entering the university next fall.

DOJ_NMG_0027649

"The money will follow those students all the way through to graduation," said Scott S. Cowen, the university's president. "We anticipate over four years it will support roughly 300 students."

Qatar's $5.3 million gift was the biggest Children's Hospital has ever received, said Steve Worley, its president. The hospital will use $5 million to establish the Qatar Cares Fund, which it will use to underwrite medical care for needy children whose families were affected by the hurricane. The remaining $351,000 will go toward restoring the two of the hospital's five primary care clinics that were left standing after the storm.

"It's hard to know how to express our gratitude," Mr. Worley said.

How To Save FEMA (wp)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post (editorial), May 2, 2006

So let's see: After the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, we created a Department of Homeland Security, known as DHS, which was supposed to make us safer. The Federal Emergency Management Agency, which everyone refers to as FEMA, was folded into the spanking new department. Then FEMA failed abysmally during Hurricane Katrina.

Now Sens. Susan Collins and Joe Lieberman are arguing that FEMA, an agency that worked splendidly under President Bill Clinton, should be dismantled and reborn within DHS as the National Preparedness and Response Authority. Thus FEMA would become NPRA, which no doubt would be pronounced by newscasters as "Napra." Does saying "Napra" instead of "Fema" make you feel better?

Never mind that moving the once-successful FEMA into DHS may have been partly responsible for the downgrading of FEMA's mission. DHS had to worry about terrorism, so how could it take hurricanes seriously? And never mind that if POTUS, i.e., the president of the United States, had appointed good and smart managers to run FEMA, the agency would have done what it was supposed to do, as it did in the 1990s, according to no less an authority than then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush.

Collins, a Maine Republican who chairs the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, and Lieberman of Connecticut, the committee's ranking Democrat, are creative public servants. Whether renamed or not, the agency would work better if the administration takes their 86 ideas for reform seriously -- especially their section emphasizing the need for "capable and qualified leadership."

Yet there is something maddening about the Washington tendency to go for complicated, bureaucratic fixes for what are essentially human failures. These can often be remedied by taking an agency's mission seriously and appointing good people to carry it out.

"FEMA," Collins said last week, "has become a symbol of a bumbling bureaucracy in which the American people have completely lost faith." But if FEMA is such a bumbling bureaucracy, why did it work so well in the 1990s? It's perfectly clear from the appointments Bill Clinton made that he took FEMA's work far more seriously than did President Bush. That explains the agency's decline better than any analysis of bureaucratic flow charts.

If there is a bureaucratic question here, should we ask whether creating a Department of Homeland Security and tossing FEMA inside it has made us safer? At the risk of sounding like a crotchety conservative, I've always wondered about the conventional wisdom that adding a Secretary of X or a Secretary of Y automatically gets problem X or problem Y taken more seriously.

Doesn't the logic of the story suggest moving back to a time when FEMA worked? Why not just liberate it from DHS, as Sens. Trent Lott, Barbara Boxer, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Rep. Tom Davis have suggested, and make sure that competent people run FEMA? An independent agency run responsibly beats innovative acronyms almost every time.

WAR NEWS:

Years Later, 'Mission Accomplished' Closer (AP-Y2)

By Jennifer Loven

AP2, May 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027650

Three years after delivering his "mission accomplished" speech on Iraq, President Bush on Monday declared another turning point had arrived with the establishment of a permanent government in Baghdad.

"We believe we've got partners to help the Iraqi people realize their dreams," Bush said of the recent emergence of new Iraqi leadership. "They need to know that we stand with them."

The president's May 1, 2003, appearance on the USS Abraham Lincoln is one of his most indelible war-related images.

Clad in a flight suit, he emerged dramatically from a Navy jet that screamed in for a landing on the carrier's deck. Under a giant "Mission Accomplished" banner, Bush announced that "major combat operations in Iraq have ended."

Though he was careful not to declare overall victory and warned of difficult work ahead, the speech was congratulatory in tone and aimed at marking a pivot from invasion to reconstruction.

"In the battle of Iraq, the United States and our allies have prevailed," Bush said then. "The battle of Iraq is one victory in a war on terror that began on Sept. 11, 2001, and still goes on. ... We do not know the day of final victory, but we have seen the turning of the tide."

U.S. troops were trading fire with Iraqis almost daily, basic services were in a shambles and neither ousted leader Saddam Hussein nor weapons of mass destruction had been located. But the day seemed brilliantly staged. Detractors dreaded what they thought was inevitable — seeing the images of Bush jubilantly greeting homeward-bound sailors resurface in the president's 2004 re-election campaign and reinforce his wartime popularity.

It didn't turn out that way.

Violence in Iraq continued instead of ebbed. In the six weeks from the start of the invasion to Bush's speech, 139 U.S. soldiers had died. In the three years since, as of Sunday, there have been another 2,258 U.S. military deaths in Iraq — an average of 63 each month.

There have been three democratic elections with voter participation increasing each time. But it took four months of infighting to produce a slate of government leaders — expected to be finalized this month — representing all of Iraq's major ethnic and political factions in a fragile unity. Also, reliable electrical power is scarce, petty corruption is rampant and the government's Interior ministry is blamed for harboring death squads that are helping to drive sectarian violence.

In a frank assessment, the No. 2 U.S. intelligence official, Gen. Michael Hayden, said last week that the war in Iraq currently inspires jihadists, but their failure there would weaken the movement globally. The U.S., he said, must not forget the importance of Iraq.

"The conflict there and — more importantly — how it is routinely portrayed in Islamic media continues to cultivate supporters for the global jihadist movement," Hayden told an audience in Texas during a little-noticed speech.

Amid the difficulties, Bush's overall approval rating has fallen to a new low.

Democrats cited the anniversary in criticizing the president.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (news, bio, voting record), D-Ill., chairman of House Democrats' campaign arm, issued a reminder of some of the administration's main prewar predictions that proved false: that Iraqi oil production would finance the reconstruction, that American troops would be greeted as liberators, that weapons of mass destruction would be found, and that a war that is now heading toward a $300 billion-plus price tag wouldn't cost even a third of that.

Democratic leader Harry Reid stood on the Senate floor in front of a picture of Bush with the date May 1, 2003, and the phrase "Mission Accomplished" and read the names of the 16 troops from his home state of Nevada who had been killed.

Reid called it an "unfortunate anniversary" that marked "a public relations stunt gone horribly wrong."

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said some Democrats are choosing to ignore the importance of the unity government's establishment. "There's an effort simply to distract attention away from the real progress that is being made," he said.

In Bush's appearance outside the Oval Office with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, the president walked a fine line between celebrating achievements and warning of more sacrifices to come.

With U.S. officials hoping the government's existence will drain the insurgency and pave the way for an eventual drawdown of U.S. troop levels, Bush sent Rice and Rumsfeld to Baghdad last week to help boost the Iraqi leaders. The president said his top foreign policy officials reported back that the Iraqis understand the job ahead and are capable of fulfilling it — through what he warned will be more tough days because terrorists have caused "such turmoil and havoc."

DOJ_NMG_0027651

"We believe this is a turning point for the Iraqi citizens and it's a new chapter in our partnership," Bush said. "This government is more determined than ever to succeed. "

More 'Tough Days' In Iraq, Bush Warns (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, May 2, 2006

President Bush yesterday warned there will be "tough days ahead" in Iraq, as Democrats pointed out that the president uttered nearly the same words three years ago to the day, when he landed on an aircraft carrier with a banner declaring, "Mission Accomplished."

Appearing in the White House Rose Garden with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who have returned from a surprise trip to Baghdad, the president said a unity government established last week in Iraq "is more determined than ever to succeed."

"That's really important for the American people to know, that we've got partners in this effort who are dedicated to a unified Iraq and dedicated to putting a government together that is one that will represent all the Iraqi people," Mr. Bush said.

Democrats jumped at the opportunity to exploit the anniversary of Mr. Bush's appearance on the USS Lincoln, where he declared that "major combat operations in Iraq have ended" and that "the United States and our allies have prevailed."

Reporters were deluged with e-mails citing the president's three-year-old declaration, all bearing the same talking points.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, took to the floor and said "2,200 Americans have lost their lives" since Mr. Bush rendered his judgment of "mission accomplished." Mr. Reid accused the president of manipulating prewar intelligence and said U.S. intervention in Iraq to disarm Saddam Hussein has increased terrorism around the world.

The Democratic National Committee piled on.

"The administration owes the American people, including our brave troops and their families, more than a [public relations] strategy," DNC spokeswoman Karen Finney said.

The White House said Democrats were trying to "distract attention away from the real progress that is being made."

"It's unfortunate those Democrats refuse to recognize that a new unity government has just recently been formed, which really lays the foundation for more progress moving forward," Bush spokesman Scott McClellan said.

A former senior administration official noted that although Mr. Bush appeared in front of the "Mission Accomplished" banner and praised the military's quick victory, the president also said that "we have difficult work to do in Iraq."

"The Democrats know President Bush said there was still much hard work left in Iraq, and they are simply using this to bash him," the official said.

With his secretaries of defense and state at his side, Mr. Bush yesterday expressed optimism that the new Iraqi government will be moving the nation toward its own security.

"We believe this is a turning point for the Iraqi citizens and it's a new chapter in our partnership," he said after an Oval Office meeting with his two secretaries. "This new government is going to represent a new start for the Iraqi people. It's a government that understands they've got serious challenges ahead of them."

The president said Mr. Rumsfeld and Miss Rice talked with the new Iraqi leaders about the need to "establish control over the militias and other unauthorized armed groups and enforce the rule of law."

Talking Up The New Guy (USNEWS)

By Kevin Whitelaw

U.S. News and World Report, May 2, 2006

BAGHDAD--It was, at least briefly, one of those hopeful moments that have been all too rare in Iraq. Over a relaxed supper of local fish and Arab salads, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was getting to know the top leaders of Iraq's next government. She was seated next to Tariq al-Hashimi, the Sunni politician set to become one of the nation's two vice presidents. Hashimi, like his other colleagues, was brimming with optimism for Iraq's first government under its new Constitution. "I think," he told Rice, "we're about to open a new chapter in Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0027652

But the next morning, it was just another page in a sadly familiar story: Hashimi's sister was gunned down in a drive-by shooting as she left her Baghdad home. (Only two weeks earlier, his brother had also been killed.) Somehow, progress in Iraq always seems to bring its own, often immediate, backlash. Each previous government transition has provoked a spike in violence, as insurgents try to make the new regime seem weak and ineffectual. So with the designation of a new choice for prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, which broke a four-month stalemate, Iraq is bracing for another surge in attacks.

Herculean challenges. In a dramatic attempt to jump-start Maliki's efforts to form a new government, Rice and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld staged an unusual joint surprise visit to the Iraqi capital last week. Their reception was mixed, but the trip is a sign of just how much Washington has riding on Maliki. The promise of a national unity government has been something of a political lifeline for the Bush administration in its search for some way to declare victory in Iraq and begin withdrawing significant numbers of U.S. troops. Rice and Rumsfeld are clearly hoping that Maliki's appointment will mark a turning point in a conflict that has dragged down President Bush's poll numbers to the lowest point in his tenure. But Maliki faces a herculean set of challenges in trying to keep this shattered, divided nation from slipping deeper into chaos.

For a start, Maliki announced that he intends to select his cabinet and launch his government as early as this week, although in Iraq, negotiations always seem to stretch out to the last possible minute, and deals are never certain until they are complete. So the Rice-Rumsfeld mission was a high-stakes gamble for the Bush administration, which has already been accused of playing a heavy-handed role in Iraqi politics. Rice had been in Baghdad only three weeks earlier to push politicians to find an alternative candidate to interim Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari. This latest trip could end up complicating the delicate balancing act Maliki has to perform when parceling out ministry posts to the various parties. Indeed, as soon as they departed, Shiite firebrand cleric Moqtada al-Sadr condemned the visit as a "shocking intervention in Iraqi affairs." Rice and Rumsfeld also risked playing into the hands of Jordanian terrorist Abu Musab Zarqawi, who only one day earlier had released a rare videotape blasting the Iraqi government as a U.S. puppet.

Trust matters. Still, Rice and Rumsfeld emerged from their meetings enthusiastic about Iraq's next leaders. Maliki "understood his role and the role of the new government to really demonstrate that it's a government of national unity in which all Iraqis could trust," Rice said. Privately, Maliki assured them that his first priority would be to address what he called the "mistrust" between Iraqis from different elements of society, a key U.S. concern in the wake of the recent surge in sectarian violence.

Maliki is, for the most part, an unknown quantity. Rice had never met him before, although he is a longtime opposition figure and most recently headed the security committee in Iraq's parliament. He is reputed to be a hard-liner and belongs to the same Shiite religious party as his predecessor Jafari, whom U.S. officials have criticized sharply. So far, though, Maliki appears to stack up rather favorably. He is blunt and decisive, in contrast to the more inscrutable Jafari. Also, unlike Jafari, he does not bring with him a tight, secretive cadre of aides who tend to shut out other voices. Indeed, Maliki has so few confidants that U.S. diplomats lent him a few U.S. advisers for his transition team.

One of the biggest U.S. concerns about Jafari had been his unwillingness--or inability--to dismantle the various armed militias belonging to different political actors, both inside and outside the security forces. Those militias are thought responsible for some of the bodies, often showing evidence of torture, that turn up daily around the capital. So far, Maliki's public and private statements on this have been encouraging. "Weapons should be in the hands of the state only," he told an Iraqi satellite channel last week. "The carriage of weapons by others means the beginning of trouble that might lead us" to civil war."

Maliki, however, has never held an executive management role, which makes it difficult to predict his ability to seize the reins of power. When his government takes office, it will inherit all the weaknesses of its predecessors--a crumbling infrastructure, largely unreliable security forces, and a feeble bureaucracy hampered further by rampant corruption. He will also assume power after an extended political vacuum that the Bush administration has blamed for exacerbating sectarian tensions.

In fact, Washington has attributed so many recent problems to the lack of a government that it has inadvertently raised expectations for Maliki that could prove to be unattainable. "I just hope that people understand and keep those expectations in check because it does take some time for any government, let alone one that is governing permanently for the first time, to get hold of the reins and to start making a difference in people's lives," says Rice.

DOJ_NMG_0027653

Maliki told Rumsfeld and Rice that he understands that one of his first tests will be Baghdad's stifling summer heat, which will start building in the coming weeks. Electricity production nationally remains below prewar levels even as demand continues to mushroom. Parts of Iraq have seen gains. "The reliability and predictability and delivery of electricity outside Baghdad has improved since the war," says Daniel Speckhard, who runs the U.S. Iraq Reconstruction Management Office.

But inside the capital, supplies are still erratic, and residents are getting only between four and eight hours of power a day. Insurgents continue to sabotage power lines with alarming success. U.S. officials admit that significant boosts in output will take several years, but they believe that Maliki can at least improve the predictability of the power supply in Baghdad. Says Speckhard, "People will be watching closely to see how the government does on this."

Report: Iraq Oil Production Remains Below Prewar Level (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, May 2, 2006

Insurgents have come up with new ways to pierce Iraq's vital oil industry, keeping the daily flow below prewar levels despite an emerging protection force and a reduced number of attacks.

New numbers this week from the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction (SIGIR) show oil production at 2.18 million barrels per day, 400,000 below 2003 prewar levels.

The World Bank estimates that just to stay at the current level, Iraq will need to invest at least $1 billion in additional revenue each year. The Iraqis want to achieve a 2.3 million-barrel-per-day rate.

The Bush administration once projected that Iraq would be rebuilt principally from Iraqi oil revenues, but that prediction has fallen by the wayside. U.S. taxpayers have funded more than $30 billion in reconstruction costs, plus tens of billions of dollars for military operations.

"Attacks on oil infrastructure remain a serous problem, despite attempts to bolster infrastructure security forces," said the quarterly report by IG Stuart W. Bowen Jr.

He said a program to train the Oil Protection Force to guard 4,340 miles of pipeline and 340 installations proved "largely unsuccessful." The Bush administration is now drafting a new defense strategy. The force was supposed to number over 14,000 troops, but today is at 3,400. Some units have been infiltrated by insurgents who provide critical information for plotting attacks.

"Although the number of infrastructure attacks has recently decreased, the complexity of the attacks has increased," the IG report said.

"Insurgents have become more proficient at targeting critical infrastructure nodes, as well as intimidating personnel who deliver essential services."

The report gave an example of how insurgents are hindering Iraq's primary source of income as it tries to build a new democratic nation. On Feb. 1, the enemy attacked a new desulphurization plant in Kirkuk. The Ministry of Oil then reverted to an older plant, which can only produce half of the new plant's 1 million barrels per day.

Mr. Bowen said the industry is plagued not only by sabotage, but also by its dilapidated state during Saddam Hussein's rule, by corruption and by uncertainties over what laws govern production.

Bush reconstruction officials say Mr. Bowen should not use the 2.58 million barrels as the benchmark production rate before the war. They say Saddam ramped up production in 2002 and '03 as war neared.

The officials, who asked not to be named, said it would be more accurate to use an average number from production in the late 1990s and 2000s, which would show a lower daily flow and make today's number appear more impressive.

Murtha Won't Sign Petition On Troop-withdrawal Measure (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, May 2, 2006

Rep. John Murtha, the powerful Democratic defense appropriator from Pennsylvania, has never signed a discharge petition in his 32 years in Congress, and he refuses to bend, even if signing one means attracting more attention to the debate on the war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0027654

Murtha, the hawkish Vietnam veteran who voted for the war in Iraq, sent shockwaves by going public with his harsh criticism of the war last November, calling for the immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops.

Murtha's views attracted widespread attention in the media, but his stance polarized his own party and emboldened the House GOP to introduce a resolution calling for immediate troop withdrawal. Viewed as a political stunt in part meant to humiliate Democrats, the resolution sponsored by Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, attracted only three Democratic votes.

In early December, Rep. Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii) filed a motion to discharge the House Rules Committee from considering a resolution sponsored by Abercrombie and 67 other members that would require President Bush to develop and implement a plan for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq.

A discharge petition requires 218 signatures, a majority of the House's 435 members, to bring the bill out of a committee and start debate on the House floor.

As of Thursday, Abercrombie's discharge petition had gathered 106 signatures, including Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.); Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.), ranking member of the International Relations Committee; and Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), ranking member of the Armed Services Committee.

But Murtha's name is not alongside the other Democratic leaders.

In an interview, Murtha said he does not think it is appropriate to sign a discharge petition and disregard the committee process. He was also quick to point out that discharge petitions generally are not successful.

To get a majority, the petition needs some GOP signatures. Four Republicans have lent their names: Reps. Ron Paul (R-Texas), Walter Jones (R-N.C.), Wayne Gilchrest (R-Md.) and Jim Leach (R-Iowa).

A congressional source said it is hard to get the signatures of centrist Democrats who do not want immediate withdrawal from Iraq but feel that change is needed in approaching the war. "Skelton is a great win in that respect," the source said.

Murtha said there have been no repercussions for his outspoken criticism.

"Every place I go, I get a standing ovation," he said. "The people are distressed about the direction this country is going, distressed about the arrogance of the administration."

Abercrombie, the sponsor of the discharge petition, said that he would be delighted to have Murtha's signature but that he understands why Murtha refuses to sign.

"I am not pushing it," Abercrombie told The Hill.

He said there is a confluence of events taking place, including the retired generals calling for Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's resignation.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) last week told his colleagues that he plans to have a lengthy debate on the war in Iraq, in a dramatic change of course.

"If [the Republicans] end up offering something similar and commit to doing it, [some lawmakers] could declare victory on the petition," a congressional source said. "If it is another stunt, people know the difference. If it is a good-faith effort, then the majority ends up doing the petition's will."

Meanwhile, Murtha said he believes that the war in Iraq has taken the United States away from focusing on the war on terrorism.

"I am trying to figure out a way to divert our attention to real terrorism," he said.

He said that war appropriations cannot be cut as long as troops are still fighting in Iraq. But once they are out of Iraq, or their numbers are significantly reduced, the money could go toward rail and port security, Murtha added.

"One month of war spending would secure our ports," he added.

Biden Offers Alternative Plan For Iraq (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, May 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027655

WASHINGTON — Three years after President Bush declared beneath a "mission accomplished" banner that major combat had ended in Iraq, a leading Senate Democrat on Monday suggested the creation of separate, autonomous regions for Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds to counter continuing ethnic and religious violence.

The White House quickly denounced the idea. Bush said in a White House appearance that Iraq faced "more tough days ahead," but had reached "a turning point" with its new, full-term government.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, the senior Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, presented his plan as an alternative to the options of a rapid withdrawal or a continuing war.

The "third way" Biden proposed would give each of the major ethnic and religious groups in Iraq broad authority to run local affairs.

The central government in Baghdad would be given limited, but specific, responsibilities for border defense, foreign policy, oil production and revenues.

The plan draws on ideas used to ease the bloody conflict among Muslims, Serbs and Croats in Bosnia-Herzegovina in the 1990s.

Regional governments — run by Kurds in the north; Sunni Muslims in the central region, excluding Baghdad; and Shiite Muslims in the south — "would be responsible for administering their own regions," the senator said. Baghdad, according to Biden's strategy, would be a federal zone.

Such a course would represent a sharp detour from Bush administration policy. The president and the rest of the U.S. foreign policy hierarchy have persistently pressured Iraqi leaders to establish a unified government and to resist pressures that the Bush administration fears could splinter the country and bring further instability that insurgents could exploit.

The White House's speedy rejection of the idea suggested that the plan would face steep odds. But it reflected a new effort to position Democrats between those calling for an immediate pullout from Iraq and the president's policy, which polls show is increasingly unpopular and threatens to become a factor in the November midterm elections.

Bush met with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, who visited Baghdad together last week for the first top-level meetings with newly chosen government leaders.

"It's a new chapter in our partnership," the president said at a photo session in the Rose Garden that followed the Oval Office meeting. "This government is more determined than ever to succeed, and we believe we've got partners to help the Iraqi people realize their dreams."

The White House portrayed Biden's plan as one of partition. The senator rejected that description.

White House Press Secretary Scott McClellan said Iraqis would not support an arrangement leading to a weak central government.

Biden presented the plan in a speech to the World Affairs Council in Philadelphia and, in summary, in an essay co-written for the op-ed page of the New York Times with Leslie H. Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations. Biden's office provided a transcript of his World Affairs Council remarks.

The senator's communications director, Norm Kurz, said Biden had presented the plan to other Democrats. "It is all evolving right now," he said.

In his speech to the World Affairs Council, a nonprofit, nonpartisan organization that presents lectures and discussions on foreign policy issues, Biden said each of the major ethnic and religious groups in Iraq would find a reason to support his proposal.

The senator said that Sunnis, dominant when Saddam Hussein ruled, were beginning to recognize that they would not regain power and feared a centralized government run by the majority Shiites.

The Shiites, he said, "know that they can dominate the government, but they can't defeat a Sunni insurrection."

He said the Kurds wanted to consolidate their autonomy in the north.

Biden also said that U.S. aid should be tied to protecting minority and women's rights, and that Bush should press other Persian Gulf states reaping windfall oil profits to make good on past promises of aid to Iraq and to offer new assistance.

In addition, he said Bush should order military commanders to prepare a plan for the withdrawal of nearly all of the 138,000 U.S. troops from Iraq by 2008, or sooner if it could be achieved "without precipitating a meltdown."

DOJ_NMG_0027656

Biden said he would deploy perhaps 20,000 U.S. troops in or near Iraq to strike at insurgents, train Iraqi security forces and protect the country from its neighbors.

In Iraq, meanwhile, a meeting of the country's most senior Shiite Muslim cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, and Turkmen leaders from the northern city of Kirkuk offered a renewed demonstration of the simmering divisions among Iraqis.

Yalmaz Najar, leading the Turkmen group, said after the conference that Sistani had promised to defend the rights of Shiite Turkmens fighting with Kurds for political control of oil-rich Kirkuk.

Biden Pitches Division Of Iraq (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, May 2, 2006

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., the ranking Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, yesterday called for dividing Iraq into three separate regions held together by a loose central government, thus clearing the way for withdrawing most U.S. troops by 2008.

"It recognizes this new, central reality in Iraq [that] a rising tide of sectarian violence is the biggest threat to Iraq's future and to America's interests," the Delaware Democrat said. "It is premised on the proposition that the only way to hold Iraq together, and to create the conditions for our troops to responsibly withdraw, is to give Shi'ites, Sunnis and Kurds room to breathe in their own regions."

Mr. Biden, who has said he is considering a 2008 presidential campaign, promoted the idea as a "third way that can bring our troops home, protect our fundamental security interests and preserve Iraq as a unified country" in a speech to the World Affairs Council of Philadelphia and in an opinion piece published in yesterday's New York Times.

"The choice I'm proposing can give all of us ... realistic hope that our sacrifices in Iraq were not in vain," he said.

Sunnis, who ran the country during Saddam Hussein's dictatorship, historically have adamantly opposed splitting the nation.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan called the proposal a non-starter yesterday, saying President Bush and the Iraqis are committed to a "federal, democratic, pluralist and unified Iraq in which there is full respect for political and human rights."

"A partition government with regional security forces and a weak central government ... is something that no Iraqi leader has proposed and that the Iraqi people have not supported," he said.

But in his speech, Mr. Biden noted that Iraq has had three years of unity governments and "sectarian violence has escalated."

Staffers for Democratic leaders Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California and Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada had no immediate comment on Mr. Biden's proposal. Instead, their bosses criticized Mr. Bush on the third anniversary of his declaration that major military operations were over in Iraq.

"Since President Bush rendered his judgment of 'mission accomplished,' more than 2,200 Americans have lost their lives, about 20,000 have been wounded, many hundreds of billions of taxpayer dollars have been expended, and now, Iraq is engaged in a civil war, the degree of which is unknown," Mr. Reid said on the Senate floor. "Three years later, with fighting and violence continuing across Iraq, we know that declaration was woefully premature."

Mr. Biden, whose New York Times piece was co-authored with Leslie H. Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations, defended their plan as consistent with Iraq's constitution and new government and used Bosnia as a supporting example. Allowing Muslims, Croats and Serbs to maintain separate armies "kept the country whole," and Bosnians have lived in relative peace since, he said.

The Biden plan would deem the Shi'ite, Sunni and Kurdish regions each responsible for their own laws, security and administration. A weaker central government would be created to police the borders and to run foreign affairs and oil revenues.

It would increase U.S. aid to Iraq on the condition the rights of women and minorities are protected, would withdraw all but a small force of U.S. troops by 2008 and would rely on the international community to help protect the country's borders to avoid a regional war. The plan also would guarantee Sunnis 20 percent of the country's oil revenue, but Iraq analysts worry it would leave Sunnis without any control of the country's oil production.

DOJ_NMG_0027657

Analysts said splitting the nation along ethnic and sectarian lines would mean massive relocations of people and enormous upheaval in Iraq's major cities where all three groups reside.

Anthony Cordesman, a counterterrorism specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said a breakup would allow extremist groups with links to al Qaeda to increase their dominance over Sunni insurgents and push Iran to exploit the power vacuum left if the U.S. pulls out.

"The U.S. has made serious mistakes in Iraq, and Iraq may well divide on its own. A strategy of dividing Iraq, however, is virtually certain to make things worse, not better, and confront the U.S. with massive new problems in an area with some 60 percent of the world's proven oil reserves," he said.

Phebe Marr of the United States Institute of Peace said the cost of a breakup for Iraq is "likely to be much higher than gradually trying to move Iraqis toward compromise."

Iraqis Begin Duty With Refusal (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, May 1 -- The graduation of nearly 1,000 new Iraqi army soldiers in restive Anbar province took a disorderly turn Sunday when dozens of the men declared that they would refuse to serve outside their home areas, according to U.S. and Iraqi military authorities.

The graduation ceremony at Camp Habbaniyah, a base about 45 miles west of Baghdad, had been going well. The 978 soldiers, most of them Sunni Muslims, had just finished nearly five weeks of military training and were parading before a review stand to the sounds of martial music. They took an oath of service while U.S. and Iraqi officials delivered speeches hailing the event as an important step toward the formation of a national army.

Then some soldiers started tearing their clothes off to demonstrate their rage.

The protest was triggered by an announcement that the new soldiers, all residents of Anbar province -- widely considered the heartland of Iraq's Sunni Arab insurgent movement -- would be required to serve outside their home towns and outside the province as well.

Recruiting Sunnis into the army has been a key goal of U.S. policies to rebuild the Iraqi armed forces. Sunday's ceremony for the first group out of a total of 5,000 men recruited from Anbar represented major progress in that effort. But army commanders worry that if the men serve in their own home towns, they could be co-opted by insurgents.

While the fracas fell well short of outright mutiny -- there were no reported injuries, and the soldiers ate a meal in an orderly manner later that day -- a video clip of the graduation aired on the al-Jazeera and al-Arabiya television networks throughout Monday gave the impression of a near-riot.

The clip showed what appeared to be dozens of angry, shouting troops ripping off their uniforms and throwing them in the air or on the ground. Others shook their fists in the direction of the camera, as Iraqi officers, waving their arms, attempted to stop the tumult. In the background, most soldiers simply milled around, looking confused about what was taking place.

U.S. military authorities, who issued a statement on Sunday night that made no mention of the incident, gave a more subdued account of what happened.

"It was actually a very small number of graduates," said Lt. Col. Michael Negard, spokesman for the Multi-National Security Transition Command-Iraq, which oversees the training of the Iraqi army and police forces. "It was a momentary but very brief display of displeasure. It was never out of control. It was over as quick as it started."

The incident appears to echo an event in April 2004 when a battalion of the Iraqi army was ordered to deploy to Fallujah to help U.S. Marines fighting there. The troops refused. During the following weeks, more than 15,000 other Iraqi soldiers and police officers deserted, forcing the training effort essentially to start over with new practices designed to increase the retention of recruits.

DOJ_NMG_0027658

Army graduation ceremonies have often been troubled. In late 2003, according to Kalev Sepp, a retired Special Forces officer who has advised U.S. commanders in Iraq, U.S. trainers of one Iraqi unit so distrusted their students that they carried loaded pistols at a graduation ceremony in case of mutiny.

Iraqi soldiers and local authorities said the problem that surfaced in Sunday's ceremony has not yet been solved. A mediator, Brig. Salah Khalil al-Ani, said the soldiers were angry because they believed they would be assigned to serve in their province and home towns according to an agreement worked out by tribal and religious leaders in Anbar with Defense Ministry officers.

Local leaders in Anbar have long demanded that soldiers recruited from the province also serve there. They have accused the country's predominantly Shiite army of committing abuses against the Sunnis living there, and say this is why so many of the province's residents have supported the insurgents .

"We had volunteered to serve our cities and communities, particularly our families in Ramadi and Fallujah, who have been mistreated by the present soldiers of the Iraqi army, who come in large part from Shiite areas," said one of the recruits, Ahmad Mahmoud Azzawi. "If they disperse us to Shiite and Kurdish areas, we will not go. Frankly, we would much rather go back to our land, to plant and reap our produce, than to serve others."

But Negard said the soldiers knew what they were getting into when they enlisted. "They're recruited for national service, and they know this," he said. "They're prepared from the beginning to serve where the needs of the Iraqi army go."

"Diversity is good for the force," he said. "The bottom line is, when they're under fire and they're training, there are no signs of sectarianism."

Mohammad Abdulla Alawin, a recruit from Ramadi, said he wouldn't serve anywhere else; sectarian violence was one of his biggest worries. "We are afraid of the Shiite death squads which are found inside the Iraqi army, and who might kill us if we serve outside our province."

The governor of Anbar, Mamoun Sami Rasheed, told reporters that he tried to make the recruits understand that serving in the army is a great honor, regardless of where the service might be, because it is a service for the whole country. He urged them to obey their officers and follow discipline in order to serve as an example for others.

But it isn't yet clear which way the opinion of the soldiers will swing. Another volunteer, Falah Hussein, said the soldiers' officers have met with them and asked for four days to try to work things out.

"If there is no solution, we are going home," he said.

Iraqi Recruits Reportedly Balk At Postings Away From Home (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr. And Khalid W. Hassan

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, May 1 — Hundreds of Iraqi soldiers recruited from volatile Anbar Province in the west unleashed a rowdy and angry protest during their army graduation ceremony on Sunday, an episode replayed frequently Monday on Arab satellite television.

After learning during the ceremony that they would be stationed away from their hometowns, the soldiers reacted with fury, with dozens stripping off their new uniform shirts. The new soldiers said they had been promised that they would serve only in their hometowns.

"When we enlisted we were told the men from Falluja would go to Falluja, the men from Husayba would go to Husayba, and the men from Qaim would go to Qaim," one new soldier said, in coverage of the event broadcast by Al Arabiya network. All are cities in Anbar.

The soldiers are shown squatting or sitting on a parade ground and listening to a speech by an Iraqi military commander. Then the commander says: "There is no such agreement, we are military," a reference to the soldiers' belief that they would be required to serve only in their hometowns.

As Iraqi officers try to quiet muttering in the crowd, the Iraqi commander, who is not identified, provokes the soldiers with a statement considered an insult by many Arabs: "If you like it, you are welcome. If you don't, the gate is large enough for a camel to pass through."

DOJ_NMG_0027659

The soldiers rise in unison, with many angrily shaking their fists, shouting, waving their arms or throwing parts of their uniforms to the ground. Then, some protesters seem to wander into the background, while the television shows soldiers closer to the cameras who continue to shout and gesture.

A spokesman for the American military, which is overseeing training of the Iraqi Army, called the episode an isolated incident and said the Iraqi troops had soon calmed down and marched off to eat at the chow hall. He said he did not know whether soldiers were later disciplined.

The protest was "a relatively short, brief display of dissatisfaction" that "flickered out as soon as it flared up," said the spokesman, Lt. Col. Michael Negard.

"We have not seen this in the past," he said. The recruits were never promised that they would serve in their hometowns, he added. "They know they have an obligation to go where the army sends them," he said.

The linchpin of American success in Iraq — and eventual American withdrawal — is the performance of the Iraqi security forces, and whether they can mature into a skilled force loyal not to sectarian leaders but to a unified Iraqi government.

A major area of concern has been the Sunni Arabs, who are needed to help pacify insurgent strongholds in Anbar Province. The insurgency is dominated by Sunni Arabs, many of whom used to serve in the army under Saddam Hussein.

American commanders are eager to deploy battalions of fresh Sunni Arab troops in Anbar, and also to combat the notion that the new army is dominated by Kurds and Shiites. Some Sunni troops insist on serving close to home, in part so patrols near their families and hometowns are conducted by Sunni troops.

The ceremony, which took place at Camp Habbaniya, between Falluja and Ramadi, followed a five-week training course. In all, 978 soldiers graduated during the ceremony, according to a military press release that did not mention the protest.

In northern Iraq, Iranian artillery shelled the mountainous eastern fringes of Iraqi Kurdistan in the second day of attacks against land populated by Kurdish rebels, forcing some families to flee, according to reports from Kurdish officials.

On Sunday the Iraqi Ministry of Defense had accused Iran of lobbing mortars into the area and sending Iranian troops across the border to attack fighters affiliated with the separatist rebel group, the Kurdistan Worker's Party, or PKK, which favors an independent Kurdistan.

On Monday an official Iranian news agency denied as "unfounded and artificial" assertions that any troops had entered Iraqi Kurdistan. But the statement did not deny that shelling had taken place, and it warned that Iranian border guards "are on maximum alert to confront any provocation by terrorist groups."

The PKK rebels, who live along the border of Iraqi Kurdistan near both Iran and Turkey, are bitter enemies of both countries, which have their own populations of Kurds and seek to defeat any efforts toward an independent Kurdish nation. The State Department classifies the PKK as a "foreign terrorist organization," citing attacks in Turkey and other bloodshed, and says as many as 3,500 PKK members live in northern Iraq.

The Web site of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, the political party that controls the eastern portion of Iraqi Kurdistan, quoted a PKK official as saying that dozen of families had to flee the shelling Sunday night and Monday morning, and that there were some casualties. An American military spokesman in Baghdad said Monday he could not confirm the reports.

U.S. Changes Guidelines For Troops To Lessen Everyday Tensions With Iraqi Civilians (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 1 — American commanders in Iraq are taking steps intended to lessen the chance for violent confrontations between their troops and innocent Iraqis during the daily routines of operating checkpoints and running convoys, senior military officers said.

The changes reflect deep worries that the conduct of American soldiers continues to alienate many Iraqis, despite three years of efforts by the American military to promote greater awareness among the troops of how their actions are perceived.

The changes are meant to avoid confrontations that escalate into the use of force, for example by substituting signs or other gentler warnings for the firing of warning shots, or using strobe lights to make sure civilian drivers approaching checkpoints can see the Americans clearly.

DOJ_NMG_0027660

Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, commander of day-to-day military operations in Iraq, took the unusual step of forwarding to his two-star Army and Marine Corps commanders recent articles in the British press that condemned American forces for what were described as unnecessary levels of rough behavior.

"I don't think it hurts us at all to take a look at it, and ask some tough questions about how we're perceived and how we act as soldiers here in Iraq," General Chiarelli said in a recent telephone interview from his headquarters near Baghdad. "It falls in line with what I'm trying to do in urging a higher level of understanding and cultural sensitivity."

There is no doubt that in the three years since the invasion, American forces have alienated Iraqis in large numbers, ranging from the catastrophic events at Abu Ghraib prison, where Iraqi detainees were abused by their American jailers, to more minor yet daily insults, when some soldiers have used unnecessarily rough techniques at checkpoints, in raids and during searches.

Some unit commanders in the field say the guidelines may make it harder to protect their troops. Some even warn that the emphasis might result in hesitancy among their soldiers when there is a real threat, and hinder their ability to carry the fight to the insurgency.

General Chiarelli said the measures will lower the number of incidents in which American soldiers resort to the use of force, while not increasing the risk to American troops. Working with Iraqi security officials, "We have defined the reaction that soldiers should take, and together we have defined what an escalation-of-force incident is," he said. "These are guidelines to think about in the use of force."

In a significant part of the effort, commanders across Iraq are working with intelligence officers to identify telltale indicators of suicide bombers and other attackers, to give soldiers on patrol a set of guidelines to interpret more effectively the threat presented by an unknown group of Iraqis. For security reasons, officers asked that those identifying signatures not be published.

The techniques also include issuing strobe lights to troops operating checkpoints so they can flash piercing, bright beams at cars that approach too rapidly — rather than firing warning shots. In many cases, Iraqi drivers may not be trying to run through the American checkpoints, but cannot see the soldiers on unlit roads at night, officials said.

The techniques are being used in some of the most violence-plagued parts of the country.

"We do use several different methods to communicate our intentions and to issue instructions to folks as we interact with them on the highways and streets in and around Falluja," said Lt. Nathan J. Braden, a Marine spokesman, in an e-mail message from Iraq.

"Our marines are equipped with a myriad of nonkinetic tools, such as signs in Arabic, flags, spotlights, horns, flares, sirens," Lieutenant Braden wrote.

The Army's Fourth Infantry Division, responsible for a region of cities and rural areas in central Iraq the size of West Virginia, including Baghdad, uses large, hand-held paddles to signal the road movements of its armored vehicles, Humvees and trucks.

American military convoys have been a constant irritant to Iraqi drivers.

"They have 'Stop' and 'Slow' written in Arabic and English, and we hand them up to the gunner in the turret to wave at Iraqi drivers along our route to indicate our movements," said Staff Sgt. Jeffrey Barker, who patrols southern Baghdad.

Lt. Col. Jonathan B. Withington, spokesman for the division, which arrived in Iraq in January, said large convoys also include a translator, loudspeakers and strobe lights. "We go through a deliberate convoy planning process, and speed is always a factor," Colonel Withington said in a telephone interview. "Our leaders drill down on this all the time. We have to be cognizant of how we carry ourselves here."

Some of these techniques were already being used in Iraq, but their use is being refined and accelerated in this sensitive time as Iraq struggles to establish a permanent government.

Commanders in the field, whose units interact directly with Iraqis, acknowledge the need to not offend the local population — but some say the new guidelines make their task far more difficult, especially against an adversary that shows no similar concern about reducing civilian casualties.

"Cultural sensitivity and trying not to alienate the neutral Iraqis is obviously one of the keys to the strategy here," said one field-grade officer in Iraq, who was granted anonymity to discuss the issue more freely. "However, we are fighting a brutal, ruthless gang of terrorists, who exploit any possible advantage beyond all human decency or morals."

DOJ_NMG_0027661

The officer cautioned, "The restrained approach, as it is manifesting itself on the ground, is beginning to significantly handcuff our soldiers and leaders." He expressed concerns that "this undoubtedly is producing hesitancy" on the part of some soldiers and some unit leaders.

General Chiarelli said these measures were guidelines and did not replace formal "rules of engagement" that define when soldiers may and may not resort to deadly firepower to protect themselves from danger.

"What we are asking people to do is think through and talk through with soldiers the 'shoot-no shoot' scenarios, and ask, 'When should you apply deadly force?' " said General Chiarelli, who in January took over the Multinational Corps-Iraq and became the second-highest-ranking American combat commander in the country. "We want to give the soldier the opportunity to make the best decision possible."

General Chiarelli is known for his emphasis on missions beyond combat, such as creating jobs and providing city services, in securing and stabilizing the country, a view he developed during a previous tour serving more than a year in Iraq as commander of the First Cavalry Division.

"We risk the chance of creating an insurgent, of creating somebody who gets so disgusted with the quote-unquote 'occupiers' that they get off the fence and go to the wrong side," General Chiarelli said. "That has probably happened in many instances."

U.S. Snipers Protect Strategic Ramadi Road (AP)

By Todd Pitman

AP, May 1, 2006

On the roof of a ruined hotel-turned-observation post nicknamed "the Ramadi Inn," two U.S. snipers listen to Johnny Cash's "Ring of Fire" on an iPod and watch a firefight through holes knocked out of a penthouse wall.

Marines at another sandbagged outpost up the road are firing grenades at insurgents, sending clouds of smoke rising above a hazy midday skyline of rusting water towers, minarets and an exquisite blue-domed mosque.

"It's a never-ending war," says one of the snipers, 22-year-old Spc. Jarrod York of Mansfield, Pa., as explosions boom in the distance.

Ramadi, populated by Sunni Arabs 70 miles west of Baghdad, is the most dangerous city in Iraq for U.S. forces. Commanders say there are more insurgent attacks here than anywhere else in the country, with militants and American troops exchanging fire several times a day — at least.

American troops seized "the Ramadi Inn," known officially as OP Hotel, in 2004 to protect a road through the heart of the city. Two years later, they are using the building and others like it to secure Route Michigan, a key supply road for U.S. forces.

This four-story structure is one of the tallest in town, offering panoramic views over an urban wasteland crawling with insurgents. The troops say the militants are also watching them — casing their positions in vehicles, peeking around corners, looking from afar through binoculars and video cameras.

It's difficult to imagine the hotel ever had a place in Ramadi's hospitality industry. Rocket blasts have pummeled the building, a truck bomb nearly destroyed it and human hands have stripped it bare of furnishings.

The rooms on one dusty, darkened floor have been converted into sandbagged machine-gun nests manned by U.S. and Iraqi forces.

With boxes of ammunition and spent bullet casings at their feet, troops sit with binoculars 24 hours a day. They brace for attacks, watch for guerrillas and keep an eye out for battles — muzzle-flashes, explosions, plumes of smoke.

"We watch for anything that's not normal. But nothing's normal around this place," said Spc. Joe Sommer, 20, of Lawrenceville, Ga., his belt-fed machine-gun poking out a hallway window.

Past dreary halls draped with camouflage nets, soldiers sleep in cot-crammed quarters with no electricity, running water, phones or Internet.

Iraqi forces arrived a couple weeks ago and sleep on their own floor. A few promptly installed a satellite on the roof so they could watch TV in their rooms.

DOJ_NMG_0027662

Every window has been sealed with leaking sandbags. Troops joke the weight of the bags may bring down the building. Scrawled on one wall: "Ramadi Inn, aka OP Sandbag."

Only a few rooms have generator-driven fluorescent lights: the command center and a kitchen stacked with military rations. A few rays of sunlight stream in during the day, but the darkness "makes you feel like you're living in a cave," said Army Lt. Nicholas Goshen, 24, of Cleveland.

Ringed by trash, blast walls and razor wire, the hotel's crumbling brown balconies and boarded windows are covered by chicken-wire fencing that hangs from the roof to help deflect shoulder-fired grenades.

Exchanges of fire have wasted most surrounding buildings and forced nearby residents to flee.

"It's sad, but this hotel is critical to keeping Route Michigan open," Goshen said, looking at vacant, bullet-sprayed shops across the street.

The snipers are stationed in a small enclosed room called the penthouse, which is on the roof.

Sgt. 1st Class Britt Ruble, platoon commander for Charlie Company of the Army's 1st Battalion, 506th Infantry Regiment, said snipers had "taken out quite a few people digging in alleys" — planting roadside bombs — in the past year.

Ruble said rocket-propelled grenades struck the hotel at least 10 times in recent months, one of which hit the wall above Spc. Richard Cruz, 27, of Los Angeles.

"It knocked him back off his gun, but he got right back up and kept shooting," Ruble said.

Soldiers said bullets flew through the windows during that gunbattle in March, ricocheting off walls. One round hit an American soldier in the ankle; a medic found the 7.62 mm slug in his boot.

After that, "we took the sandbags all the way to the ceiling, doubled 'em, made 'em so we can actually fight from 'em," Ruble said.

Black marks and chips on the walls and ceilings bear testament to such stories, but soldiers say it is quieter here now than it had been — and quieter than other Marine-manned outposts along Michigan that are attacked daily.

When not on guard duty, troops read, play hand-held video games or write letters. On Sunday, a few watched "The Greatest Wrestling Stars of the 80s" on a laptop. Hot meals arrive in plastic containers once a day. Sometimes breakfast and even ice cream are thrown in.

But luxury it is not.

On some walls the words "never forgotten" are written beside the names of fallen soldiers.

Goshen said he tries to call his girlfriend before going on a four-day stint at the hotel. This time, coming off another mission, he had no time.

"She knows I'm guarding a hotel, but she probably thinks it's a nice hotel and I live in a room. She doesn't understand," he said. "My family would probably get a little scared if they saw what this place looks like."

Shiite Cleric Seen Trying To Broaden His Base Of Support (KRT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

Knight Ridder, May 1, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr is working behind the scenes to maintain his armed militant wing and portray it as a social movement, a step that would make him one of Iraq's most powerful figures if it succeeds, U.S. officials and Iraqi politicians say.

American officials think that al-Sadr, who already controls the largest bloc of votes in the National Assembly, is modeling himself after Lebanon's Hezbollah, the Iranian-backed Shiite Muslim movement born during that country's civil war in the 1980s. Although it began largely as an armed group, it eventually became a powerful political force with a large social-service component.

Some U.S. and Iraq officials think that al-Sadr's shift is a symptom of a growing rift within the powerful Shiite United Iraqi Alliance, which has dominated Iraq's two parliamentary elections. That split pits al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia against members of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq to be the voice of all Iraqi Shiites.

"It's a struggle for power," said Adnan Pachachi, a secularist and member of parliament.

DOJ_NMG_0027663

A successful move by al-Sadr would be a major transformation for the 30-something scion of a clan of revered Shiite religious figures. Once derided as ill educated and undisciplined, al-Sadr has been on the verge of defeat twice at the hands of the American military and once was charged by an Iraqi court with murdering two prominent Shiite clerics.

But he's maintained his role in Iraq, joining the United Iraqi Alliance while maintaining his Mahdi Army, which controls Sadr City, Baghdad's largest Shiite neighborhood, named for al-Sadr's father.

Now al-Sadr is working to expand his influence, building regional offices in major Shiite communities to help widows, workers, children and the sick with services the Iraqi government can't yet provide, such as health care and potable water.

Al-Sadr also is insisting in talks to form a new government that his followers, who hold 32 of the assembly's 275 seats, lead key service ministries such as education and health.

At the same time, U.S. officials think al-Sadr is trying to better organize and train the Mahdi Army, expanding his reach by placing fighters in Shiite communities beyond Sadr City.

"I think he is now trying to work a parallel program and make (the Mahdi Army) more professional while also developing these organizations throughout the districts that ensure religious outreach, education, social advantage and opportunity," said a top U.S. intelligence official who agreed to speak only if granted anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the subject. "All the things that the government doesn't fill in, he will."

Sheik Yousif al-Nasseri, an al-Sadr supporter and the head of al-Shaheedin, an al-Sadr-oriented research center, embraced the comparison between al-Sadr's movement and Lebanon's Hezbollah, particularly if it means that the populace sees al-Sadr as representing the people.

"If this is their vision, that we resemble Hezbollah, then God willing we are going to be stronger than Hezbollah and move the people and the nation," al-Nasseri said.

Hezbollah began as a militant group that opposed the Israeli presence in southern Lebanon, but it began to provide services such as clinics and clean water with the help of financial backing from Iran. In the most recent Lebanese elections, Hezbollah won 23 of the 128 seats in the Lebanese Parliament, and it holds two ministerial posts.

The State Department lists Hezbollah as among the Middle East's "active extremist and terrorist groups."

American officials also take a dim view of al-Sadr, whom they hold chiefly responsible for attacks on Sunni Muslim mosques after the Feb. 22 bombing of the Askariya shrine, a Shiite holy site, in the mostly Sunni city of Samarra. In the aftermath of those attacks, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said militias were a greater threat to Iraq than the country's Sunni insurgency.

Al-Sadr publicly says his Mahdi Army isn't a militia but an unorganized group of street fighters who take up arms only when needed. "There is no party organization, no salaries paid out, no bases and they use only their personal weapons," Sadr said at a rare news conference last week.

Officials say al-Sadr's effort to establish the Mahdi Army as a provider of essential services also highlights his disagreement with other key members of the United Iraqi Alliance, particularly the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq. Al-Sadr views the Supreme Council's militia, the Badr Organization, as too close to Iran, which gave shelter to many Supreme Council leaders during Saddam Hussein's rule.

Al-Sadr also rejects calls for allowing Iraqi regions a great deal of autonomy, which is known here as federalism. The Supreme Council supports the idea.

U.S. officials think al-Sadr is trying to broaden his base of support so that he can challenge the Supreme Council for prominence.

Not everyone thinks he'll be successful. They note that in contrast to Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasralla, who's considered one of the most charismatic figures in the Middle East, al-Sadr often appears awkward and indecisive in his public appearances.

In addition, they argue, he can't win over the majority of Shiites, particularly since most are loyal first to Iraq's No. 1 Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani.

"He is trying, but I don't think he can," said Saad al-Janabi, a former Sunni negotiator who joined the National Assembly as a secularist. "There is no one voice of the Shiites."

DOJ_NMG_0027664

Pachachi noted Hezbollah's close ties to Iran, an important element in its survival and something that al-Sadr could be lacking.

But they agree that there's a vacuum for someone to fill, because the government remains weak and residents are frustrated by the religious and ethnic discord and the lack of services.

"In a strange way, he has emerged as a nationalist leader," said James Denselow, an Iraq specialist at the London-based Chatham House, an international research center. "Whether he can do it or not is something else."

200 Shiites Push For Better Security Throughout Iraq (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, May 2, 2006

BAGHDAD — About 200 Shiites, many of them women in full-length black abayas, rallied Monday outside the Green Zone to demand that U.S. and Iraqi forces do more to stop attacks on Iraqis.

Some protesters waved large banners with slogans demanding better care for families displaced by sectarian violence.

Two Iraqi men — a soldier and a civilian — emerged from the Green Zone, home of the U.S. Embassy and the Iraqi government, to meet with the protesters and take notes about their demands.

Such demonstrations are rare in Baghdad because of fears large groups might attract suicide bombers.

In the latest violence, four people were killed Monday when a bomb exploded in a market in Madain, a mostly Shiite town 14 miles southeast of Baghdad, police told the Associated Press. Two people were wounded.

At least 15 bullet-riddled bodies were found in the capital, the Interior Ministry said. The victims were men; all were handcuffed and blindfolded, the ministry said.

In addition, two people were killed Monday in drive-by shootings in Diyala province northeast of Baghdad, police told the AP.

In other news:

•In northern Iraq, Iranian forces shelled a border area used by Iranian Kurdish rebels, forcing some families to flee but causing no casualties. Mustafa Qader, a member of the political bureau of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan Party, said the shelling began at about 9 a.m. Sunday and continued until 5:30 a.m. Monday.

•An Arab television station aired videotape Monday of what it said was the dead body of a prime minister under Saddam Hussein, showing Iraqi men kicking and stepping on the head of the corpse.

Al-Arabiya said the body in the videotape was that of Mohammed Hamza al-Zubaidi. The individual appeared dead and men wearing boots were kicking the head.

The U.S. military reported on Dec. 5 that al-Zubaidi, 67, had died of heart failure three days earlier in a U.S. military hospital. Two days before the death announcement that carried al-Zubaidi's name, the military had said an unnamed 67-year-old Iraqi died at the 344th Corps Support Hospital.

Al-Arabiya quoted a U.S. Army spokesman as saying al-Zubaidi's body had been turned over to the appropriate Iraqi government ministry after an autopsy.

Video Shows Mistreatment Of Hussein Official's Body (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez And Saad Al-izzi

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

BAGHDAD, May 1 -- The dead body of one of Saddam Hussein's top lieutenants was kicked and insulted after U.S. forces transferred it into Iraqi custody, according to a video of the incident that aired on al-Arabiya television on Monday evening.

The brief, grainy video appears to show the pale, lifeless face of Muhammad Hamza al-Zubaydi, a former prime minister of Iraq, with an unidentified man's shoe upon it. "Step over his mouth, step over it," another man says. A man kicks the face. Apart from the obvious indignity of being kicked, being touched by the bottom of a shoe is a grave insult in Arab culture.

Zubaydi was captured on April 20, 2003, as the "queen of spades" in the pack of cards of fugitives distributed by U.S.-led forces early in the war. The new government says he was instrumental in Hussein's brutal suppression of a Shiite uprising in 1991 after Iraq's defeat in the Persian Gulf War.

DOJ_NMG_0027665

A video from that period depicted Zubaydi, a Shiite, kicking and abusing Shiites captured by the Iraqi army.

He was set to face charges in the special tribunal trying Hussein on war crimes charges. But in December, U.S. officials announced that Zubaydi had died of natural causes while in U.S. custody. He was 67.

U.S. authorities transferred his body to the Iraqi Ministry of Health for an autopsy. It was there that he received the blows, according to the al-Arabiya report.

Ali Ghalib, the deputy interior minister, said the country's police force had nothing to do with the incident. He promised an investigation.

"This act took place away from the eyes of the police," Ghalib said in an interview broadcast on al-Arabiya. "We do not have any security or administrative supervision over the department of forensic medicine, and it is an open place for any Iraqi citizen to enter. So for those who were harmed by the crimes of this man during his time, this came as a personal, individual reaction."

Calm At The Center Of The Storm (NYT)

By Bartle Breese Bull

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

Hilla, Iraq

HERE in the hometown of Iraq's prime minister-designate, Nuri al-Maliki, people are understandably excited. And not just because a local boy has done well. Rather, they hope Mr. Maliki's ascension is a sign that Iraq as a whole may emulate their province's remarkable success in combating Iraq's two main security threats: Sunni Arab terrorism and the infiltration of Shiite militias into the state security forces.

Hilla is the capital of Babil Province, 900 square miles just south of Baghdad that could well turn out to be the country's crucial province. Babil's population of 1.6 million, like that of Arab Iraq in general, is mostly Shiite with a Sunni minority. The province borders not only the capital but also the Sunni heartland, Anbar Province, to the west and the Shiite holy places Najaf and Karbala to the south. In the east, Babil's neighboring provinces stretch to Iran and feel its influence heavily.

Babil's date palm plantations, flat alluvial landscape and almost infinitely divided lattice of irrigation canals give the place a timeless and emblematic feeling. It was home to Babylon — and the Tower of Babel. Thus it was here that Iraq gave the world the "confusion of languages": what should be the blessing of diversity, now cast as the curse of identity politics.

If everything goes to pieces in Iraq, we will not hear much more about Babil. In that case it will be Anbar, Basra, Kirkuk, Sadr City and the Green Zone in Baghdad that will symbolize pessimism and disaster. But if things go well, or at least better — if Iraq still exists five years from now, and continues to be more free than all of its neighbors except Turkey and less of a threat to them than it used to be — then Babil will have been a major reason for the success.

What Iraqis care about above all else these days is security, and Babil — apart from the so-called Death Triangle around the towns of Latifiya, Mahmudiya and Yusufiya in the Sunni north — is a safe place. In the December national elections, voter turnout in Babil was nearly 70 percent without a single serious incident of violence.

During the Shiite festival of Ashura this year, marked by 10 days of pilgrimage to Najaf and Karbala, some half a million pilgrims walked and drove through the province without reports of a single insurgent attack. Of the 81 civil reconstruction projects undertaken in Babil outside the Death Triangle in the last year — most related to water and electricity — not one has been attacked by Sunni insurgents or Shiite militias, according to the executive officer of the American troops here, the First Squadron of the 10th Cavalry. He told me that his troops had experienced only eight cases of hostile contact, and not a single casualty, since arriving in December. (They are vacating the base now and will not be replaced.)

Order here is not of the same magnitude as that in the Kurdish north, where 15 years of freedom have allowed the development of a highly efficient police state. Nor is it the false quiet of the south, where the allied forces' ceding of the streets to Shiites militias has masked a situation in which Basra is more frightening to liberal Iraqis and to foreigners than is Baghdad. Order in Babil is real order, not gangster order.

What really makes Babil special is that it is a largely Shiite province in which the Shiite militias — the Mahdi Army and the Badr Brigades — have almost no foothold. But they are trying. All Iraq's police answer to the Interior Ministry, which is held by the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the main Iranian organ in the country. And the interior minister, Bayan Jabr, has repeatedly tried to replace Babil's independent-minded provincial police chief, Gen. Qais Hamza al-Maamony. Under heavy pressure from the Americans, however, the minister agreed in January to a moratorium on the replacement of senior police officers until after the formation of the new government.

DOJ_NMG_0027666

Nonetheless, according to American officials in the province, General Maamony was recently forced to accept 700 candidates recommended by the ministry — that is, by the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution — for the incoming class of the provincial police academy. The police chief, I'm told, plans to spread these recruits as thinly as possible around the province upon their graduation to lessen their impact on the force.

General Maamony and his 8,000 men — especially the provincial SWAT teams, which supply the muscle that the relatively poorly trained and lightly armed regular police often cannot or will not provide — are understandably unpopular with the council and its military wing, the Badr Brigades. And they are equally feared by the Mahdi Army of the rebel Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr. A member of one local SWAT team often wears a baseball hat with "Mahdi Militia Killer" inscribed on it.

One Iraqi-American living here told me that he saw an operation in which the SWAT team drove up to a Mahdi checkpoint in civilian cars and clothes one night last year and killed 38 of the militiamen. While this number may be an exaggeration, unquestionably the local police forces are taking on the militias.

Of course, the Shiite militias are not the only danger. Up in the Sunni north, the province's police commandos mount 40-man daylight patrols in support of the overwhelmed local police officers, bouncing down rural byways, swerving around holes in the main roads created by homemade bombs, pointing out to me the places where in recent weeks they have fought in gun battles that often lasted several hours.

AT night they conduct more focused missions, often in the company of American Special Forces operatives, to apprehend suspected insurgents. One Special Forces commander told me he had worked with local policemen in just about every hot spot around the world since 1980, and that the Iraqi commandos in Babil are "the best any of us have ever seen."

They are also worried, as are their colleagues among the regular police. When the current moratorium on firing nonpartisan police officials expires with the formation of the new government (Mr. Maliki has about three weeks to finish that task), a momentous drama will break out inside the Interior Ministry in Baghdad. If the ministry stays in the hands of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution, then the people of Babil might find their streets and markets patrolled by men with greater allegiance to the council than to the legitimate Iraqi government and the country's best interests.

Should this happen, the assault commander of the provincial police commandos told me, he and his men might have to retire together to a rural compound where they would be out of jobs and out of uniform, but they could try to keep one another safe.

Can the new government prevent this success story at the heart of Arab Iraq from becoming yet another stronghold of theocrats, thugs and meddling neighbors? Handicapping Iraqi politics is a fool's game, of course, but if anyone can, it might well be Mr. Maliki. While he spent some years of his exile in Iran, he was the leader of the pro-Arab, rather than the pro-Iranian, wing of his party, Dawa. He has a strongly Shiite identity, yet his acceptance in his new post by Kurdish and Sunni politicians has been on surprisingly warm terms.

Undoubtedly, Mr. Maliki is less of an Iranian stooge and a far more forceful character than his predecessor, Ibrahim al-Jaafari. He also has solid anti-insurgent credentials. As chairman of the Parliament's national security committee, he was the architect of the popular new law that, among other things, attacks the economic basis of domestic insurgent support by going after the property and wealth of those convicted of abetting terrorists.

The key for the incoming government will be to apply this law vigorously in the knowledge that nonsectarian and nonpartisan control of local security forces is the key to domestic order and, ultimately, reconstruction.

Babil shows that such a thing is possible. But if this province is to continue to provide an island of relative order in the heart of Arab Iraq, people like General Maamony need to keep their jobs. For now, in the blast-walled compounds of the Hilla police forces and commandos, the real sense of siege is not from the insurgents and militias they fight almost every day, but from the politicians in Baghdad.

White Guilt And The Western Past (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0027667

By Shelby Steele

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

There is something rather odd in the way America has come to fight its wars since World War II.

For one thing, it is now unimaginable that we would use anything approaching the full measure of our military power (the nuclear option aside) in the wars we fight. And this seems only reasonable given the relative weakness of our Third World enemies in Vietnam and in the Middle East. But the fact is that we lost in Vietnam, and today, despite our vast power, we are only slogging along -- if admirably -- in Iraq against a hit-and-run insurgency that cannot stop us even as we seem unable to stop it. Yet no one -- including, very likely, the insurgents themselves -- believes that America lacks the raw power to defeat this insurgency if it wants to. So clearly it is America that determines the scale of this war. It is America, in fact, that fights so as to make a little room for an insurgency.

Certainly since Vietnam, America has increasingly practiced a policy of minimalism and restraint in war. And now this unacknowledged policy, which always makes a space for the enemy, has us in another long and rather passionless war against a weak enemy. * * *

Why this new minimalism in war?

It began, I believe, in a late-20th-century event that transformed the world more profoundly than the collapse of communism: the world-wide collapse of white supremacy as a source of moral authority, political legitimacy and even sovereignty. This idea had organized the entire world, divided up its resources, imposed the nation-state system across the globe, and delivered the majority of the world's population into servitude and oppression. After World War II, revolutions across the globe, from India to Algeria and from Indonesia to the American civil rights revolution, defeated the authority inherent in white supremacy, if not the idea itself. And this defeat exacted a price: the West was left stigmatized by its sins. Today, the white West -- like Germany after the Nazi defeat -- lives in a kind of secular penitence in which the slightest echo of past sins brings down withering condemnation. There is now a cloud over white skin where there once was unquestioned authority.

I call this white guilt not because it is a guilt of conscience but because people stigmatized with moral crimes -- here racism and imperialism -- lack moral authority and so act guiltily whether they feel guilt or not.

They struggle, above all else, to dissociate themselves from the past sins they are stigmatized with. When they behave in ways that invoke the memory of those sins, they must labor to prove that they have not relapsed into their group's former sinfulness. So when America -- the greatest embodiment of Western power -- goes to war in Third World Iraq, it must also labor to dissociate that action from the great Western sin of imperialism. Thus, in Iraq we are in two wars, one against an insurgency and another against the past -- two fronts, two victories to win, one military, the other a victory of dissociation.

The collapse of white supremacy -- and the resulting white guilt -- introduced a new mechanism of power into the world: stigmatization with the evil of the Western past. And this stigmatization is power because it affects the terms of legitimacy for Western nations and for their actions in the world. In Iraq, America is fighting as much for the legitimacy of its war effort as for victory in war. In fact, legitimacy may be the more important goal. If a military victory makes us look like an imperialist nation bent on occupying and raping the resources of a poor brown nation, then victory would mean less because it would have no legitimacy. Europe would scorn. Conversely, if America suffered a military loss in Iraq but in so doing dispelled the imperialist stigma, the loss would be seen as a necessary sacrifice made to restore our nation's legitimacy. Europe's halls of internationalism would suddenly open to us.

Because dissociation from the racist and imperialist stigma is so tied to legitimacy in this age of white guilt, America's act of going to war can have legitimacy only if it seems to be an act of social work -- something that uplifts and transforms the poor brown nation (thus dissociating us from the white exploitations of old). So our war effort in Iraq is shrouded in a new language of social work in which democracy is cast as an instrument of social transformation bringing new institutions, new relations between men and women, new ideas of individual autonomy, new and more open forms of education, new ways of overcoming poverty -- war as the Great Society.

This does not mean that President Bush is insincere in his desire to bring democracy to Iraq, nor is it to say that democracy won't ultimately be socially transformative in Iraq. It's just that today the United States cannot go to war in the Third World simply to defeat a dangerous enemy.

DOJ_NMG_0027668

White guilt makes our Third World enemies into colored victims, people whose problems -- even the tyrannies they live under -- were created by the historical disruptions and injustices of the white West. We must "understand" and pity our enemy even as we fight him. And, though Islamic extremism is one of the most pernicious forms of evil opportunism that has ever existed, we have felt compelled to fight it with an almost managerial minimalism that shows us to be beyond the passions of war -- and thus well dissociated from the avariciousness of the white supremacist past.

Anti-Americanism, whether in Europe or on the American left, works by the mechanism of white guilt. It stigmatizes America with all the imperialistic and racist ugliness of the white Western past so that America becomes a kind of straw man, a construct of Western sin. (The Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo prisons were the focus of such stigmatization campaigns.) Once the stigma is in place, one need only be anti-American in order to be "good," in order to have an automatic moral legitimacy and power in relation to America. (People as seemingly desperate as President Jacques Chirac and the Rev. Al Sharpton are devoted pursuers of the moral high ground to be had in anti-Americanism.) This formula is the most dependable source of power for today's international left. Virtue and power by mere anti-Americanism. And it is all the more appealing since, unlike real virtues, it requires no sacrifice or effort -- only outrage at every slight echo of the imperialist past.

Today words like "power" and "victory" are so stigmatized with Western sin that, in many quarters, it is politically incorrect even to utter them. For the West, "might" can never be right. And victory, when won by the West against a Third World enemy, is always oppression. But, in reality, military victory is also the victory of one idea and the defeat of another. Only American victory in Iraq defeats the idea of Islamic extremism. But in today's atmosphere of Western contrition, it is impolitic to say so. * * *

America and the broader West are now going through a rather tender era, a time when Western societies have very little defense against the moral accusations that come from their own left wings and from those vast stretches of nonwhite humanity that were once so disregarded.

Europeans are utterly confounded by the swelling Muslim populations in their midst. America has run from its own mounting immigration problem for decades, and even today, after finally taking up the issue, our government seems entirely flummoxed. White guilt is a vacuum of moral authority visited on the present by the shames of the past. In the abstract it seems a slight thing, almost irrelevant, an unconvincing proposition. Yet a society as enormously powerful as America lacks the authority to ask its most brilliant, wealthy and superbly educated minority students to compete freely for college admission with poor whites who lack all these things. Just can't do it.

Whether the problem is race relations, education, immigration or war, white guilt imposes so much minimalism and restraint that our worst problems tend to linger and deepen. Our leaders work within a double bind. If they do what is truly necessary to solve a problem -- win a war, fix immigration -- they lose legitimacy.

To maintain their legitimacy, they practice the minimalism that makes problems linger. What but minimalism is left when you are running from stigmatization as a "unilateralist cowboy"? And where is the will to truly regulate the southern border when those who ask for this are slimed as bigots? This is how white guilt defines what is possible in America. You go at a problem until you meet stigmatization, then you retreat into minimalism.

Possibly white guilt's worst effect is that it does not permit whites -- and nonwhites -- to appreciate something extraordinary: the fact that whites in America, and even elsewhere in the West, have achieved a truly remarkable moral transformation. One is forbidden to speak thus, but it is simply true. There are no serious advocates of white supremacy in America today, because whites see this idea as morally repugnant. If there is still the odd white bigot out there surviving past his time, there are millions of whites who only feel goodwill toward minorities.

This is a fact that must be integrated into our public life -- absorbed as new history -- so that America can once again feel the moral authority to seriously tackle its most profound problems. Then, if we decide to go to war, it can be with enough ferocity to win.

Mr. Steele, a research fellow at the Hoover Institution at Stanford University, is author, most recently, of "White Guilt: How Blacks and Whites Together Destroyed the Promise of the Civil Rights Era," published this week by HarperCollins.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ_NMG_0027669

Lay Defends Family's Role In Selling Shares (WSJ)

By Gary McWilliams And John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

HOUSTON -- In an effort to repair damage done to his credibility, former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay1 and his attorney challenged a government claim that his son had shown a lack of faith in the company's stock by selling it "short" in expectation of a decline.

The effort came in the fifth day of Mr. Lay's testimony in the conspiracy and fraud trial of him and his co-defendant, former Enron President Jeffrey Skilling2. Yesterday afternoon, prosecutor John Hueston3 continued to hammer away at Mr. Lay for his actions in the months prior to Enron's December 2001 collapse.

Last week, Mr. Hueston had seemed to score a point when he surprised Mr. Lay with evidence that the former executive's son, Mark, had in March 2001 bet against, or shorted, Enron stock. Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling have both asserted professional short sellers attacked Enron's stock, contributing to the collapse.

While Mark Lay's trading records show several short sales, the elder Mr. Lay's attorney, George Secrest, focused on other parts of those records indicating that Enron stock had been moved into the brokerage account later the same day. Mr. Secrest and his client agreed that Mark Lay put in a sale order that apparently got listed as a short sale.

Yesterday morning, Mr. Hueston pushed to add new items to a list of purported misstatements by Mr. Lay. He noted Mr. Lay had repeatedly claimed that he was "forced" in 2001 to sell $70 million of Enron stock back to the company to pay off pressing margin calls on private loans. The prosecutor also noted that Mr. Lay had previously testified he tried to hold on to as many Enron shares as possible because he believed they were undervalued.

Mr. Hueston proceeded to demonstrate, at length, that Mr. Lay had millions of dollars of other assets and credit lines to meet those margin calls, but instead kept selling Enron stock back. The prosecutor also argued that Mr. Lay and his family continued to live lavishly in 2001, maintaining several vacation homes and taking expensive trips. During a May 2001 vacation to Spain, Mr. Lay's wife bought $20,000 in antiques and the same month he made a $588,000 investment in a real-estate fund.

In late July 2001, Mr. Hueston said, Mr. Lay received a $483,000 bank margin call and sold $4 million of stock back to Enron. Mr. Hueston showed he could have tapped about $13 million in other, non-Enron securities to meet the call. Mr. Lay said while there were other assets he could have tapped, "the line of credit was the best way or easiest way for me to do it."

The repeated stock sales back to Enron showed "you put your own troubles ahead of Enron employees," Mr. Hueston said.

In September 2001, Mr. Lay told Enron employees the stock-price drop had made Enron shares "an incredible bargain" and later told employees he was a net buyer of stock, though he was a net seller when his stock sales to the company were included.

Mr. Lay said that many factors went into his personal financial activities, which were largely handled by advisers. As for his personal spending, he acknowledged that "we lived a very expensive lifestyle. It's the type of lifestyle that's very difficult to turn on and off like a spigot." But Mr. Lay continued to argue under repeated challenges that he did his best to minimize his Enron stock sales.

After several tough days on the witness stand last week, Mr. Lay appeared to be more comfortable testifying yesterday. His responses to the questions were crisper and more direct, unlike last week when he appeared defensive.

Mr. Hueston last week hit Mr. Lay particularly hard on the fact that he didn't publicly report in 2001 the tens of millions of dollars of stock sales back to the company. Yesterday, Mr. Lay and his attorney, Mr. Secrest reiterated that under federal rules he was required to report his stock sales back to the company only once a year -- as opposed to any stock sales into the public markets, which had to be reported monthly.

Early in the day, Mr. Hueston hit at a series of what he described as misleading statements by Mr. Lay in the fall of 2001 and contrasted them with warnings the chairman had received from employees in the same time period. The warnings dealt with the company's "aggressive" accounting practices, controversial investment partnerships, and troubles at its retail energy unit. Mr. Lay repeatedly assured employees and investors that Enron was financially strong and its accounting practices were proper. "You never shared even a hint" of the concerns with them, said the prosecutor.

DOJ_NMG_0027670

Mr. Lay countered that "aggressive accounting was a catchphrase" for concerns about Enron's dealings with outside partnerships run by the chief financial officer at the time, Andrew Fastow4. He has repeatedly said Enron handled those dealings properly.

Mr. Lay was also asked about his alleged 2001 comment to company colleagues that The Wall Street Journal had a "hate on" for Enron in connection with a series of articles looking at Mr. Fastow and his partnership operation. "I might have used that term," Mr. Lay acknowledged, adding that the Journal was "trying to paint a very negative image of Enron." (As previously reported, the Journal said it stands by the accuracy of its coverage.)

Mr. Lay is back on the stand today.

Lay Contends Banks 'forced' Majority Of His Stock Sales (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, May 2, 2006

HOUSTON — Former Enron CEO Ken Lay sold tens of millions of dollars of Enron stock in 2001 to finance a lavish lifestyle that included a chartered boat for his wife's birthday and holidays on the French Riviera and in Mexico, a prosecutor said in court here Monday morning.

In November 2001, when Enron was suffocating from a cash shortage and two weeks before it filed for bankruptcy court protection, Lay canceled Enron's Christmas party, then drew down the final $1 million that was available to him through a company credit line.

Despite the revelations in his trial on charges of criminal conspiracy here, Lay insisted that the vast majority of his stock sales in 2001, which totaled $70 million, were "forced" by banks making margin calls on loans that were secured by Enron stock. Those margin calls were precipitated by Enron's sinking stock price throughout much of 2001.

Under questioning from prosecutor John Hueston, Lay acknowledged that some stock sales, which did not have to be immediately disclosed to the investing public, were used to fund his lifestyle. But Lay maintained that after he regained the CEO title in August 2001, when his co-defendant and former CEO Jeff Skilling resigned, he sold Enron stock only because he had no other liquid assets.

The government has accused Lay, 64, and Skilling, 52, of conspiring to hide the true state of Enron's financial condition from the investing public from 1999 to 2001. In particular, Lay is accused of making bullish statements about Enron to investors and employees in the fall of 2001. In September of that year, for example, Lay told employees that Enron's stock was undervalued and that he had recently bought stock.

Prosecutors displayed documents showing that even while Lay was buying $4 million in Enron stock at that time, he was unloading more than $20 million worth of stock through a line-of-credit program at Enron that did not require immediate public disclosure of the sales.

Lay sold his Enron stock to pay down personal debt even though he had access to about $19 million in cash and other stocks that could be sold quickly. In addition to his stocks, Lay also owned a $10 million luxury apartment in Houston and $20 million in other real estate holdings, mostly his three homes in Aspen, Colo.

In his opening statement in January, Mike Ramsey, Lay's lead attorney, said his client never sold a share of Enron stock in 2001 that he wasn't forced to sell. Ramsey said the case would "rise or fall" on that fact.

Challenging that assertion, Hueston presented evidence that Lay could have tapped other sources to pay debt.

"I always thought Enron stock was undervalued," Lay said in an attempt to explain his sales. But Hueston mocked him, saying, "Day after day you were denoting your optimism by choosing to sell Enron stock."

Attitude, Finances May Have Hurt Lay (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

HOUSTON, May 1 -- When trouble befell Enron Corp. in the fall of 2001, a pollster advised the energy company to "take advantage" of its "most powerful weapon," genial chief executive Kenneth L. Lay.

DOJ_NMG_0027671

But as Lay, 64, prepares to exit the witness stand in his fraud trial Tuesday, the central question is whether his appearance did more harm than good.

On Monday, with the government using his personal finances against him to sometimes brutal effect, Lay tried to fend off accusations that he chose to quietly sell more than $70 million in stock back to Enron, rather than liquidate real estate and other investments as the company spiraled downward.

Assistant U.S. Attorney John C. Hueston painted Lay as a man so addicted to an extravagant lifestyle, and so centered on his personal needs, that he "maxed out" his corporate line of credit a day before Enron's ill-fated merger with rival Dynegy cratered. Five days later, in December 2001, the company filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection, and thousands of employees lost their jobs and retirement savings.

For his part, Lay insisted that he always believed Enron's stock price would swing back upward and that, as banks began to call in nearly $100 million in personal debts in 2001, he was "hoping and praying that each and every time would be the last time" he would be forced to sell stock.

In one of the biggest surprises of the 14-week-old trial, Lay never appeared entirely comfortable in five days on the witness stand, particularly for a man who once moved easily among world leaders, corporate titans and religious figures. His lead attorney, Michael W. Ramsey, left the case midstream with heart trouble, requiring the defense to regroup. For the first couple of days of his testimony last week, Lay struggled to find the right tone.

Instead, he sometimes seemed far more aggrieved by his treatment by the government than grief-stricken over the plight of Enron workers and investors who lost billions of dollars because of Enron's demise.

"There may have been very few people in history who have been more investigated than I have and my family," Lay said last week, enumerating at least six federal agencies that have probed his finances. "Who knows how many people, how many resources, how many dollars?"

Last week, he reacted irritably to a question from his own attorney about Joanne Cortez, a former Enron employee who told the jury she cried after learning about Lay's stock sales.

"I didn't know her before, but she of course did testify in this trial, and I suppose that's the reason we're having to respond to all these matters," he said testily.

Lay repeatedly accused prosecutors of misleading the jury, taking his statements out of context and spending hours on issues that do not form the basis of six criminal charges that could send him to prison for more than a decade if he is convicted. Chief among them, Lay said, were his financial dealings.

Monday afternoon, a few jurors watched his wife, Linda, as Lay forcefully argued that she had made an appropriate decision to sell 500,000 shares of Enron stock held by their family foundation the morning of Nov. 28, 2001. Prosecutors claim the sale came hours before the death of the Dynegy merger was publicly acknowledged. No one has been charged with wrongdoing in the transaction, Lay testified.

If jurors' attention wandered last week as prosecutors explored the role Lay played in Enron's accounting decisions, they focused intently Monday when Hueston displayed the trappings of Lay's lifestyle, including a $20,000 antiques bill, a $193,000 voyage on a yacht named Amnesia and millions of dollars in real estate holdings.

A young female alternate juror, who has rested her head in her hand for days, snapped to attention and took notes as the prosecutor argued that Lay could have unloaded a $10 million Aspen, Colo., home rather than his Enron shares. A buyer paid cash for the property two days after it went on the market in January 2002, Hueston said. "Cash," the juror mouthed.

"We were living the American dream," Lay said. "It was a very expensive lifestyle, a lifestyle that's difficult to turn on and off like a spigot."

But Lay's temper, which he unleashed on the prosecutor last week, remained under control Monday. And his humor, which had struggled to find an audience last week, hit the mark several times. When Lay pointed out that he paid far more to celebrate his wife's birthday than his own, family members laughed and several jurors cracked smiles.

Under a second round of questioning from defense lawyer George "Mac" Secrest on Monday afternoon, Lay also provided an alternate and less damaging explanation for stock sales by his son Mark in March 2001. Lay told jurors that his son's broker had made a decision to sell Enron shares short, that is to make a sale betting that the stock price would fall, as a result of a misunderstanding with his son. Prosecutors had used Mark Lay's trades last week to mock the defense argument that short selling had contributed to the market panic that killed Enron.

DOJ_NMG_0027672

The prosecutor repeatedly accused Lay of shirking responsibility for financial decisions and securities filings at the same time he earned $220 million in Enron's final years. Lay, who once thanked his lawyer for "correcting" him Monday after an uneasy rapport last week, unyieldingly argued that he had relied on subordinates as a "delegator" and a "decentralized" leader.

"The corpse is on the gurney now Mr. Hueston, and you're carving it up any way you want to carve it up," Lay testified. "I didn't have that luxury when I was right in the middle of battle."

Prosecutor: Lay Ignored Accounting Worries (FINDLAW/AP)

By Kristen Hays, Ap Business Writer

AP, May 2, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay ignored employees' concerns about accounting integrity in the weeks before the company collapsed in 2001, a prosecutor sought to show Monday.

On the third day of cross-examination in his federal fraud and conspiracy trial, Lay again flashed his temper to prosecutor John Hueston, comparing Hueston's second-guessing of his decisions during Enron's downward spiral to carving up a corpse.

Lay was confronted with e-mails and survey responses from October 2001 in which employees raised questions about accounting "trickery" and Enron's business ethics.

One veteran Enron employee said, "I've lost all respect for Enron senior management" and suggested it was criminal for Enron executives to exercise stock options when they knew accounting tricks were being used to manipulate earnings.

At the time, about six weeks before Enron sought bankruptcy protection, its stock price was falling fast, and The Wall Street Journal was raising questions about unusual business partnerships created by Enron Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow.

When prosecutor John Hueston asked Lay why he did not question Fastow directly, Lay responded that "I was getting information from all sides" and said other senior officers thought the Journal and others were on a "witch hunt" against Fastow.

Lay bristled as he told Hueston repeatedly that it was easy in hindsight to second-guess his decisions.

"The corpse is on the gurney now, Mr. Hueston, and you're carving it up any way you want to carve it up," Lay said. "I didn't have that luxury when I was right in the middle of battle."

Hueston also questioned Lay about positive remarks he has made about Drexel Burnham Lambert Inc., the junk bond-dealing Wall Street firm that went bankrupt in 1990 after pleading guilty to illegal securities trading.

Lay said Drexel had made significant contributions in financial innovation and said that "failure is not equated with criminal activity, or does not need to be equated with criminal activity."

"They had a run on the bank back in the 1980s based on a number of events that occurred," Lay testified. He has used the "run-on-the-bank" phrase to describe Enron's collapse, blaming short-sellers, Fastow and bad press, among other factors.

Lay returned to the witness stand in the 14th week of the government's premier trial to emerge from its sprawling investigation of what led to Enron's spectacular collapse in December 2001.

The ex-chairman's performance during four days of testimony last week was in stark contrast to that of his co-defendant, former Enron Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling. Lay, a generally affable man, was openly combative with Hueston, the prosecutor who secured the indictment against him. Skilling, known to be more temperamental, kept his anger largely in check, despite a few flare-ups during his 7 1/2 days on the stand.

Sam Buell, a former prosecutor with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force who is a visiting professor at the University of Texas School of Law, said Hueston should wrap up his cross-examination fairly quickly Monday.

"To the extent Lay thought he could get this jury to the point where they wouldn't take the government's case seriously after his testimony, that's not happening," Buell said. "I would think at this point, the key for the government is to make the one or two critical additional points left to be made and sit down. A too-long cross can turn this back into Lay's favor."

Lay and Skilling are accused of repeatedly lying to portray Enron as healthy when the government alleges they knew the company's purported success stemmed from accounting tricks that hid debt and inflated profits.

DOJ_NMG_0027673

The two men counter that no fraud occurred at Enron other than a few executives who stole money through secret scams behind their backs. They attribute Enron's descent into bankruptcy protection to a combination of bad publicity and lost market confidence.

Last week lawyers on both sides told U.S. District Judge Sim Lake that they expect testimony to wrap up by May 11, followed by closing arguments on May 15. The defense teams expect to rest their case this week, and then the government aims to call a string of rebuttal witnesses the following week.

Skilling faces 28 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors, while Lay faces six counts of fraud and conspiracy.

Lay also faces a separate trial on bank fraud charges unrelated to any of the issues in the current trial. That case will be tried before Lake without a jury during deliberations of the conspiracy case.

Quattrone Case Gets A New Retrial Judge (WSJ)

By Paul Davies And Randall Smith

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

NEW YORK -- A new judge has been assigned to oversee the possible retrial of former star investment banker Frank Quattrone, whose 2004 conviction on obstruction-of-justice charges was overturned in March1.

U.S. District Judge George Daniels will replace Judge Lewis Kaplan, who was assigned to the case last week but recused himself because he worked at Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison LLP, the law firm overseeing Mr. Quattrone's defense. Judge Kaplan had been given the case after the appeals-court panel overturned the verdict, citing errors by the case's original trial judge, Richard Owen.

Judge Daniels spent three years as a New York state criminal court judge and five years as a state Supreme Court justice before former President Clinton nominated him to the federal bench in August 1999. He was a legal aid attorney for two years, spent three years as counsel to former Mayor David Dinkins and six years as an assistant U.S. Attorney in Brooklyn. Judge Daniels graduated from Yale and received his law degree from the University of California, Berkley, Boalt Hall School of Law.

"He runs an orderly courtroom, and is a very fair judge and very pleasant," said Thomas Curran, a defense attorney at Ganfer & Shore LLP in New York, who was an assistant district attorney and tried a criminal assault case before Judge Daniels. "He's stoic on the bench. He lets lawyers try the case but doesn't let lawyers run the show." Mr. Curran also said Judge Daniels hands out "tough" sentences.

Judge Daniels couldn't be reached for comment.

Judge Daniels recently dismissed a federal lawsuit brought by the Securities and Exchange Commission that accused Siebel Systems Inc. of improperly providing material information to a group of institutional investors. It was a setback in the SEC's effort to prevent selective disclosure of financial information through a rule known as Regulation Fair Disclosure. Judge Daniels said the agency was applying the rule in an "overly aggressive manner."

"He's a good experienced judge who I think will call the shots as he sees them with no attempt to tilt the table one way or the other," said Mark Zauderer, an attorney at Flemming Zulack Williamson Zauderer LLP in New York.

Prosecutors haven't announced whether they plan to seek a retrial. They confirmed last week that two new prosecutors -- William Johnson and Raymond Lohier -- have been assigned to the case. Mr. Johnson and former assistant U.S. Attorney David Anders won an accounting-fraud conviction against former WorldCom CEO Bernard Ebbers. Mr. Anders, who prosecuted the last trial against Mr. Quattrone, is now an attorney at Wachtell, Lipton, Rosen & Katz. Mr. Lohier won a securities-fraud conviction earlier this year against Richard Adelson, the former Chief Executive of Impath Inc.

Mr. Quattrone, former head of technology-industry investment banking at Credit Suisse Group's then-named Credit Suisse First Boston, has made changes to his legal team, giving the lead to Mark Pomerantz and Ted Wells of Paul Weiss, the law firm that led his successful appeal.

Mr. Quattrone was charged with obstructing investigations into initial public offerings of stock for sending an email to members of his group endorsing a colleague's earlier message urging recipients to "clean up" their files in compliance with the CSFB document-retention policy. Mr. Quattrone sent his note shortly after he was told about a grand-jury investigation into how his firm handled IPOs. After his first trial ended in a hung jury in October 2003, Mr. Quattrone was convicted in May 2004. The appeals-court panel that overturned the verdict ruled that Judge Owen made errors in his jury instructions and other areas.

DOJ_NMG_0027674

Comverse CEO Quits As Options Probe Heats Up (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

The chief executive and two other officials of Comverse Technology Inc. resigned as a board probe of possible backdating of stock-options grants gathered steam at the company.

The departures, effective immediately, include Kobi Alexander, chairman, CEO and a founder of the New York telecommunications-software company; Chief Financial Officer David Kreinberg; and Senior General Counsel William Sorin.

Separately, the board of another company facing options scrutiny, medical-insurance giant UnitedHealth Group Inc., approved a new set of management-compensation guidelines, including the establishment of a fixed date each year for granting options to existing employees.

The moves come as the Securities and Exchange Commission is engaged in a wide-ranging examination of options practices. The SEC is investigating whether grants were backdated or granted ahead of favorable news to give recipients a better chance of profiting from exercising the options.

Options give their holders the right to buy shares at a fixed, or exercise, price. Holders can profit by buying shares at the exercise price and selling them when the stock-market price exceeds it, pocketing the difference.

From 1995 through Jan. 31, 2005, Comverse's Mr. Alexander realized $135 million in gains from exercising options, according to SEC filings. At the end of that period, he had an additional $50 million in unrealized gains.

Mr. Alexander signed an agreement that calls for a freeze of any option exercises for six months following his resignation. He would then have a short window of time to exercise. Under the terms of some of the company's options plans, an option holder would normally be permitted to exercise options immediately after resigning for a 90-day period. The agreement also gives the company time to complete its inquiry. Under terms of the pact, both parties reserve the right to make further "claims or defenses" related to stock options.

Mr. Alexander will serve as an adviser to the company for six months at an annual salary of $25,000. He won't receive any additional option grants, and none of his earlier option or restricted-stock grants will vest. Messrs. Kreinberg and Sorin signed similar agreements, though Mr. Sorin won't be paid.

Mr. Alexander received eight grants between 1994 and 2001, usually ahead of sharp gains in his company's share price and sometimes at or near the bottom of steep declines. His grant dated July 15, 1996, carried an exercise price of $7.9167, adjusted for stock splits. It was priced at the end of a day that the stock fell 13%; the next day it recovered nearly all of its steep one-day loss. Another grant, dated Oct. 22, 2001, was on the date with the second-lowest closing price of the year.

The likelihood of the eight-grant pattern occurring if the option dates were chosen at random is around one in six billion, according to a mathematical analysis presented in a Wall Street Journal article in March. Comverse was one of six companies profiled in the article, which raised questions about whether stock-option grants had been backdated. Five of the six companies, including UnitedHealth, have since said they are conducting internal probes on the matter, with two disclosing that they have been contacted by the SEC.

The shake-up at Comverse comes two weeks after the company said it would restate more than five years of financial results because the option-grant dates used in its accounting "differed" from the actual grant date. The company also has indicated it could face delisting from the Nasdaq Stock Market because of its inability to file financial statements on time.

Independent director Raz Alon was named interim CEO, and independent director Ron Hiram was appointed nonexecutive chairman. Avi Aronovitz, Comverse's treasurer and vice president of finance, has been installed as interim finance chief.

Messrs. Alexander and Kreinberg couldn't be reached for comment. Mr. Sorin declined to comment. John Friedman, a board member, referred a call to a company spokesman.

Mr. Alexander's share holdings in Comverse are small compared with his options holdings. As of April 15, 2005, he held about 297,000 shares of Comverse stock, according to the company's most recent proxy statement.

DOJ_NMG_0027675

UnitedHealth CEO William McGuire yesterday addressed a gathering of the Society of American Business Editors and Writers in Minneapolis, where he declined to answer questions about possible options backdating at his company. Dr. McGuire, who at the end of last year held $1.6 billion of unrealized, exerciseable gains from stock options, said any comments by him could prejudice an investigation of the matter by a committee of UnitedHealth's outside directors.

Yesterday, UnitedHealth, of Minnetonka, Minn., said its board adopted a slew of compensation and governance changes, including a 40% pay cut for its directors and a regular schedule for employee option grants.

The company said it also capped benefits under a supplemental retirement plan for executive officers. Along with Dr. McGuire, No. 2 executive Stephen Hemsley would cease receiving stock and option awards. The men also wouldn't receive company-paid health insurance after their retirements. And "certain executive officers," the company said, would no longer get perks such as life-insurance premiums and free personal use of the company jets. Dr. McGuire, who previously indicated some of the moves were coming, vowed again yesterday to make public the results of the board's options probe.

The policy changes come as UnitedHealth faces resistance from shareholders over the hefty levels of compensation paid to Dr. McGuire and other top executives. The California Public Employees' Retirement System, which holds 6.7 million UnitedHealth shares, said yesterday that it is withholding its votes from four directors standing for re-election, including Dr. McGuire and members of the compensation committee.

Nacchio's Attorneys Continue Bid To Have Charges Dropped (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal Staff Reporter

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

DENVER -- In a series of legal filings yesterday, attorneys for Joseph Nacchio continued their bid to have criminal insider-trading charges against the former Qwest Communications International Inc. chief executive dismissed.

In filings in U.S. District Court here, Mr. Nacchio's attorney Herbert Stern argued that prosecutors didn't make it clear that to commit a crime, Mr. Nacchio must have based his decision to sell Qwest stock on insider information. Mr. Nacchio says he didn't act on the basis of insider information. The distinction between selling while in possession of inside information and selling on the basis of inside information has been debated between the two sides.

No trial date has been set.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Common Cause Seeks Justice Probe Of Harris (AP)

AP, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON May 1, 2006 (AP)— A congressional watchdog group asked the Justice Department on Monday to investigate whether Rep. Katherine Harris, R-Fla., attempted to obtain a $10 million appropriation for a defense contractor in return for his financial support.

Common Cause filed a complaint with the Justice Department, citing information provided by contractor Mitchell Wade, as part of a plea agreement in the bribery case of convicted former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif.

Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said the department does not comment on, or confirm, criminal investigations.

Harris is a two-term House member who is running for the Senate. However, she is best known as the state official who certified President Bush's 537-vote win in Florida in the disputed 2000 presidential election.

Wade, former president of MZM Inc., admitted making $32,000 in illegal contributions to Harris' 2004 campaign for the House.

Harris said she did not knowingly do anything illegal and said she would donate the money to charity.

Wade said that he and a "Representative B" later identified as Harris had dinner in Washington in early 2005. The contractor said they discussed the possibility of Wade's company hosting a fundraiser for the lawmaker and the possibility of Harris obtaining funding for a Navy counterintelligence program in her district.

DOJ_NMG_0027676

The Common Cause complaint said that after the dinner, Harris sent a letter to the chairman and ranking member of a House subcommittee requesting funding for the counterintelligence program.

Harris' office said in a news release that the request was for $10 million.

Federal law prohibits public officials from corruptly seeking or receiving anything of value in return for being influenced in the performance of any official act.

Harris is trying to unseat Sen. Bill Nelson, but statewide polls show her trailing the Florida Democrat by double digits. National Republicans have openly criticized her campaign and have tried to court other GOP candidates to challenge Harris in the primary. The filing deadline for the primary is May 12.

Common Cause Asks Feds To Investigate Harris (ORS)

Jim Stratton Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, May 2, 2006

The watchdog wants to know whether the Senate candidate violated bribery laws.

A well-known government-watchdog group will ask the Justice Department today to investigate U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris' dealings with a now disgraced defense contractor accused of bribery.

Common Cause wants to know whether Harris broke the law when she and Mitchell Wade met at an exclusive Georgetown restaurant in early 2005. At that dinner -- which cost Wade up to $2,800 -- Wade offered to hold a fundraiser for Harris and sought her help obtaining $10 million in federal money.

Common Cause's director of ethics campaigns said there is sufficient evidence to suggest Harris submitted the appropriations request in exchange for Wade's fundraising support.

"There's certainly the appearance of a quid pro quo," said Mike Surrusco. "We absolutely think this complaint has merit."

Harris spokesman Chris Ingram would not comment on the complaint Sunday, saying he had not yet seen it. He suggested Common Cause was politically motivated, saying that "different liberal interest groups" were trying to undermine Harris' U.S. Senate campaign against Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson.

The complaint centers on Harris' ties to Wade and the dinner he and Harris shared last year.

Two weeks ago, the Sentinel reported that dinner cost up to $2,800 and that despite Harris' earlier statements, Wade had paid the entire bill.

The dinner took place at Citronelle, one of the most exclusive restaurants in Washington, D.C., in early 2005. Harris and Wade discussed organizing a fundraiser for Harris, and Wade -- whose company gave Harris $50,000 in campaign contributions in 2004 -- asked her to support his request for $10 million to establish a counterintelligence facility in Sarasota.

A few weeks later, Harris sent that request to a House appropriations subcommittee.

"Bribery takes two," said Surrusco. "We know Mitchell Wade has been guilty of bribery. The question is, 'Is Katherine Harris guilty?' "

Harris has said she supported Wade's project only because she "thought it would bring new jobs to Sarasota." She said she "never requested funding . . . in exchange for any contributions . . ."

Wade is the former CEO of MZM Inc., a defunct defense company that in recent years obtained more than $150 million in government contracts.

In February, he pleaded guilty to bribing U.S. Rep. Duke Cunningham, R-Calif., and funneling about $32,000 in illegal campaign contributions to Harris in 2004.

The Justice Department has said Wade did not tell Harris the contributions, which she has since donated to charity, were illegal.

Though Harris had long maintained she paid her share of the Citronelle bill, the Longboat Key Republican acknowledged to the Sentinel recently that was not true. She said she thought her campaign had "reimbursed" for her meal but later learned that had not happened.

After being questioned by the Sentinel, Harris gave $100 to a Jacksonville ministry saying it would "more than adequately compensate for the cost of my beverage and appetizers."

DOJ_NMG_0027677

House ethics rules prohibit members from accepting gifts or meals worth $50 or more.

Harris has sought to distance herself from Wade since the Cunningham scandal broke last summer.

In July, she said she wasn't sure why Wade and his company had contributed so generously to her 2004 campaign. She told The Tampa Tribune she knew little of Wade's Sarasota project and had done nothing to support it.

That was three months after she had asked the defense appropriations committee to give Wade's project $10 million in federal money.

Common Cause is one of Washington, D.C.'s oldest government-watchdog groups. Founded in 1970 by John Gardner -- a Republican who served as Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare under President Johnson -- the group focuses on issues such as campaign-finance reform, government ethics, government spending and voting-system reforms.

During its history, it has investigated the conduct of both Republicans and Democrats, including former House speakers Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., and Jim Wright, D-Texas.

Surrusco said the group has not filed a complaint with the Justice Department "in many years." More typically, it will appeal to congressional ethics committees.

Justice Department spokesman Channing Phillips said Sunday that the investigation into Wade's conduct was continuing. He would not say whether Harris was part of the probe.

"We're looking into all his activities," Phillips said. "The investigation is wide open."

Jim Stratton can be reached at jstratton@orlandosentinel.com or 407-420-5379.

Activist Group Seeks Katherine Harris Investigation (TAMPTRIB)

By Keith Epstein

Tampa Tribune, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON – The nonpartisan activist group Common Cause is asking the Justice Department to investigate whether U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris' request of a $10 million earmark for a defense contractor in exchange for personal favors and campaign contributions violated the law.

"We're filing the complaint today," Common Cause spokesperson Mary Boyle confirmed this morning.

The Justice Department has kept the scope of its investigation of the defense contractor, MZM Inc., under wraps, though it has already netted a California congressman for accepting favors and bribes in exchange for earmarks.

Common Cause is well-known for its activism for open government and accountability in Congress. Although nonpartisan, the group has on occasion been accused of having a liberal bias.

Seeking an earmark does not necessarily imply illegality. One reason for the growth of lobbyists in Washington is the increasing number of opportunities by members of Congress to secure federal dollars, though fine-print "earmarks" in legislation, for private interests and pet causes.

The Common Cause complaint centers on a dinner at an exclusive Georgetown restaurant in 2005 at which the defense contractor, Mitchell Wade, offered to hold a fundraiser for Harris' U.S. Senate campaign and picked up the $2,800 tab.

Wade admitted bribing former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California, who helped him obtain earmarks giving his company government business.

Wade wanted Harris, too, to seek a $10 million earmark in congressional spending legislation. That spring, Harris asked that the money be included in spending legislation.

The project was, however, never funded. Harris has said she made the request to bring jobs to her district, where MZM would have opened a new facility.

Harris has for weeks declined to address many questions surrounding her relationship with Wade and MZM, including two dinners they had, except for her assertion, in remarks to the Orlando Sentinel last month, which she had thought her campaign had reimbursed Wade for the 2005 dinner.

Former Harris campaign strategist Ed Rollins said he, too, had had concerns about the dinner when joining her campaign last year and learning of the large tab for the dinner.

Rollins said it was at that time he urged Harris to hire a lawyer, Ben Ginsburg.

DOJ_NMG_0027678

Harris has denied any wrongdoing.

Graft Trial Opens For Ex-Ala. Governor (AP)

By Bob Johnson, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, May 2, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala. -- The corruption trial of former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman opened Monday with prosecutors accusing him of scheming with his chief of staff to obtain bribes for state help, including assistance allegedly sought by then-HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy.

Siegelman's lawyer countered that the federal case was built on the lies of unbelievable witnesses who have pleaded guilty in the case and are hoping for lenient sentences.

"The government is going to have to call a bunch of liars, a bunch of con artists, a bunch of thieves," said attorney Vince Kilborn.

The opening statements showed the trial of Siegelman, Scrushy and two former members of Siegelman's administration may hinge largely on the testimony of two former government insiders - Nick Bailey, once a close aide to Siegelman, and Lanny Young, a lobbyist and landfill developer with clout in the Siegelman administration.

Both have pleaded guilty and won't be sentenced until after the trial, which is going on as Siegelman, a Democrat, campaigns for another term as governor.

Chief federal prosecutor Louis Franklin spelled out the government's wide-ranging bribery and conspiracy case, which includes racketeering and obstruction of justice charges against Siegelman and former chief of staff Paul Hamrick, counts of bribery and mail fraud against Scrushy, and charges of wire and mail fraud against former state transportation director Mack Roberts.

The government intends to prove Siegelman traded state contracts, appointments and favors from his office for cash, gifts and campaign contributions - including $500,000 arranged by Scrushy for Siegelman's campaign to create a state lottery, Franklin said.

"Don Siegelman took the executive branch of state government and he turned it into an unlawful enterprise," the prosecutor told the jury.

Franklin said Scrushy, after backing Siegelman's opponent in the 1998 race won by Siegelman, had to scramble to get into the new governor's good graces so he could stay on a state board that oversees hospital development.

"He had to bribe our governor," Franklin said.

Siegelman's attorney insisted Siegelman did nothing wrong.

The government's witnesses are trying "to save their own skin by coming in and telling you things that are not true," he said.

Attorneys for Hamrick and Roberts said their clients had nothing to do with any scheme or conspiracy with Siegelman.

Siegelman, governor from 1999 to 2003, has said the charges were filed to hurt his election campaign. Polls show he is in a close race with his chief opponent for the Democratic nomination, Lt. Gov. Lucy Baxley.

In May 2004, a separate federal grand jury in north Alabama indicted Siegelman and Hamrick on charges of conspiring to rig bids on state Medicaid contracts while Siegelman was governor. That case ended when a federal judge ruled there was insufficient evidence to support the main charge.

Scrushy, who drew national attention when HealthSouth was accused of accounting fraud, was acquitted by a federal jury in June 2005 of criminal charges connected to the company medical services chain, which he founded.

On Monday, the judge in Siegelman's case allowed Scrushy to add a prominent black lawyer to his defense team - Fred Gray, who represented Rosa Parks in 1955 when she challenged Montgomery's segregation by refusing to give up her bus seat to a white man. During Scrushy's HealthSouth trial, black ministers had been visibly supportive of Scrushy, who is white.

Prosecutors accused Scrushy's attorneys of hiring Gray to influence black jurors. The jury, including alternates, has nine blacks and nine whites. The judge instructed Gray to limit his remarks to the facts.

Opening Arguments Made In Scrushy Bribery Trial (WSJ)

By Valerie Bauerlein

DOJ_NMG_0027679

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

MONTGOMERY, Ala. -- A federal prosecutor accused Richard M. Scrushy of funneling $500,000 to former Alabama Gov. Don Siegelman because the HealthSouth Corp. founder needed to make up for supporting a rival politician.

In opening arguments at the trial of Messrs. Scrushy, Siegelman and two other defendants, Louis V. Franklin Sr., criminal-division chief of the U.S. attorney's office here, said Mr. Scrushy helped fuel the Birmingham, Ala., company's growth by exchanging money for political favors.

"Fob James didn't win, folks," Mr. Franklin said, referring to the incumbent Republican governor whom Mr. Siegelman, a Democrat, defeated in 1998. Mr. Scrushy had backed Gov. James, so he "had to scramble," Mr. Franklin added. Prosecutors allege Mr. Scrushy made two hidden payments to then-Gov. Siegelman in 1999 and 2000 to get a spot on a state regulatory panel that oversees HealthSouth.

Defense lawyer Fred D. Gray, known for his work on landmark civil-rights cases, told jurors that Mr. Scrushy hadn't done anything illegal and was a good citizen and humanitarian whose actions are "typical of the people I've represented for the last 50 years in this court, including Rosa Parks and Martin Luther King Jr."

Vincent F. Kilborn III, a lawyer for Mr. Siegelman, who lost a re-election race in 2002 and is campaigning for governor, said his client met with Mr. Scrushy shortly after the 1998 election to patch up their differences. Mr. Kilborn told the jury his client never used the power of his office for financial gain.

Among more than 120 people crowded in the courtroom was Mr. Scrushy's wife, Leslie, who sat in the front row. Mr. Scrushy was ousted from HealthSouth shortly after a $2.7 billion accounting fraud was exposed at the company in 2003. More than 15 other former HealthSouth executives have pleaded guilty.

Mr. Scrushy, who was acquitted on accounting-fraud charges last year, faces seven counts of bribery, conspiracy and mail fraud. The other defendants face a total of 27 criminal charges.

Before the trial began, U.S. District Judge Mark E. Fuller asked the jury of seven African-Americans and five whites if any of them had previous dealings with Mr. Gray, who joined Mr. Scrushy's defense team last week. All of the jurors indicated they didn't know the lawyer. Mr. Franklin, the lead prosecutor, strongly objected when Mr. Gray referred to Ms. Parks and Dr. King, saying their names are being used as part of a racially motivated strategy to sway the jury.

Plea Deal Points To Milberg Partners (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, May 2, 2006

It took six years and a detour through Beverly Hills, but on Friday, federal prosecutors in Los Angeles finally got their first guilty plea in the long-running investigation of the class action plaintiffs firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman.

And it looks to be a significant one: in saying that he and his family took nearly $2.5 million in illegal kickbacks from Milberg Weiss in exchange for serving as lead plaintiffs in several class actions, Howard Vogel fingered four partners at the New York firm and agreed to cooperate in the ongoing investigation.

Vogel and Milberg -- referred to as "the New York Law Firm" -- "had an established pattern and practice that the New York Law Firm would secretly pay defendant Vogel a percentage of the attorneys' fees that the New York Law Firm obtained in class actions and shareholder derivative actions," prosecutors alleged in a document charging Vogel with a single count of making false statements in federal court.

Plea documents also allege that a high-profile Denver criminal defense attorney and a small New York real estate firm passed Vogel payments from Milberg in cases stretching from 1991 to 2005.

While no lawyers are named in the indictment, sources familiar with the case said the three Milberg partners with whom Vogel says he dealt are David Bershad, Steven Schulman and Robert Sugarman.

Bershad and Schulman have been in the sights of L.A. federal prosecutors for several months, and lawyers close to the case said the main sticking point in their indictment has been prosecutors' delay in deciding whether to indict their firm as well.

Sugarman, who left Milberg in 1999, has been cooperating with prosecutors for some time, Edward Hayes, Schulman's former lawyer, said last month. Hayes said Friday that he is no longer representing Schulman, and Schulman's current lawyer,

New Jersey-based Herbert Stern, did not respond to a phone call by press time. Sugarman couldn't be reached by press time, and Andrew Lawler, a lawyer for Bershad, did not return calls seeking comment.

The plea papers allege that in 1991, Vogel approached the firm hoping to file a securities class action, and to share in the profits if it was successful. Sugarman -- referred to as "Partner E" -- "confirmed that Vogel would be paid," the papers allege.

But "it was explained to Vogel that since he was a plaintiff, a possible conflict of interest arose from his receipt of payment from the New York Law Firm," the documents allege. So Sugarman and Bershad -- identified as "Partner C" -- told him "that he needed to find a lawyer through whom the New York Law Firm would pay Vogel. Partner C and Partner E explained that this was an established practice of the New York Law Firm."

It would be illegal for a client to accept such fees because lead plaintiffs must represent other class members, and are required to sign papers saying their interests are in line with the rest of the class. Vogel's plea relates to such a document.

The lawyer Vogel found -- identified in the indictment as "Intermediary A" -- was Gary Lozow, said lawyers familiar with the case. Lozow is a well-known Denver lawyer who has recently represented a former Qwest Communications executive who pleaded guilty to wire fraud, in addition to the family of Dylan Klebold, one of two teenagers who killed 13 people in the 1999 Columbine High School shootings. Reached last month, Lozow would not comment on the Milberg case.

Nor would Lawrence Drath, a partner at Holm & Drath, a small New York real estate firm identified as "Intermediary B" in court papers, beyond saying that he is representing his firm in the case. The government alleged that Holm & Drath accepted a single payment of about $44,000 from Milberg in 1997 and passed it on to Vogel, a Florida real estate developer.

In another case, against Mercie Corp. in 1996, prosecutors allege Sugarman "handed Vogel an envelope constituting Vogel's share of the attorneys' fees. Partner E explained that the amount of cash being paid to Vogel was less than Vogel's usual 14 percent share of attorneys' fees because Vogel was being paid in cash, Vogel would not have to report the cash on his tax returns, and there were other plaintiffs in Mercer with respect to whom the New York Law Firm had financial obligations."

The issue of Vogel's percentage came up again in 2003, the papers allege, when Lozow went to New York to discuss the matter with Partner A. Sources close to the case say Partner A is Melvyn Weiss, Milberg's lead partner.

Weiss' attorney, Benjamin Brafman, didn't return a phone call late Friday. But Weiss does not appear to be facing imminent indictment, and the Vogel plea papers say only that he discussed a fee to be paid to Lozow.

In 2003, the papers allege, Vogel wanted to negotiate payment in a case where his stepson was lead plaintiff. Schulman, the documents allege, "instructed Vogel to have an intermediary lawyer contact another partner." That partner -- Partner A -- is Weiss, said sources close to the case. He "refused to engage in substantive discussions with Vogel Intermediary A" -- Lozow -- "over the phone, but instead insisted on meeting with Vogel Intermediary A in person in New York." Lozow allegedly met with Weiss that November, and Weiss "reaffirmed that the New York Law Firm would pay Vogel a percentage of its attorneys' fees" in two cases.

The scheme outlined in the Vogel plea is not new; in fact, it first came up in 2000 when a Beverly Hills eye doctor named Steven Cooperman, facing a lengthy prison sentence for insurance fraud, told prosecutors that as a former Milberg lead plaintiff, he accepted kickbacks from the firm paid via his personal attorney.

The information provided by Cooperman and his circle is too old to be of much use to prosecutors, say sources familiar with the investigation. And Cooperman's testimony is looked at with particular skepticism because his history as a fraudster won't go over well with a jury.

Cooperman's allegations spawned a lengthy probe into some of the less savory elements of tony Brentwood and Beverly Hills, a circle of millionaires with a tenuous hold on their wealth who served repeatedly as lead plaintiffs.

They include Cooperman, the pop psychologist Melvyn Kinder -- who has immunity from prosecution -- and Ron Fischman, a doctor who was O.J. Simpson's next-door neighbor and an oft-mentioned figure in the civil litigation surrounding the death of Simpson's wife. Fischman's lawyer, Ronald Nessim, did not return calls by press time.

Another Milberg client, Seymour Lazar, was indicted last year with his attorney, Paul Selzer, on similar charges. Lazar and Selzer have so far refused to cooperate, and are slated for trial this fall.

DOJ_NMG_0027681

Lawyers close to the case expect indictments of Bershad, Schulman and likely the Milberg Weiss firm to follow in coming weeks. But William Lerach -- the star partner who split away to start his own firm, Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins -- seems to be outside the prosecutors' sights for the foreseeable future, they said.

Records Of Abramoff's White House Visits (AP)

By Toni Locy

The Associated Press, May 1, 2006

The Secret Service has agreed to turn over White House visitor logs that will show how often convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff met with Bush administration officials — and with whom he met.

U.S. District Judge John Garrett Penn last Tuesday approved an agreement between the Secret Service and Judicial Watch, a public interest group, that requires the agency to produce records of Abramoff's visits from Jan. 1, 2001, to the present.

Judicial Watch filed suit in February after the Secret Service failed to respond to its request under the federal Freedom of Information Act.

Abramoff, who represented Indian tribes in their dealings with Washington politicians, once was one of the city's most successful lobbyists.

He pleaded guilty in January in Washington to federal charges stemming from an investigation into his ties with members of Congress and the Bush administration. He also pleaded guilty to fraud charges in Miami concerning a multimillion-dollar purchase of SunCruz Casinos gambling fleet in 2000.

Administration officials have refused to say how many times Abramoff, who raised at least $100,000 for President Bush's re-election, has been to the White House. Bush has said he doesn't know Abramoff.

Chris Farrell, Judicial Watch's director of investigations, said, "The documents will speak loud and clear on what Abramoff was doing in and out of the White House."

The visitor logs are to be delivered to Judicial Watch by May 10.

Bush's spokesman has said Abramoff attended "a few staff-level meetings" at the White House, as well as Hanukkah receptions in 2001 and 2002.

The president has said he does not know Abramoff personally. When a photo of Bush with Abramoff surfaced earlier this year, the president said he has his picture taken with "a lot of people." In the 2001 photo, Bush is shaking hands with a leader of an Indian tribe. Abramoff is in the background.

A few days after Bush made the remarks about the photo, Abramoff expressed surprise in e-mails to a magazine editor about the president's faulty memory. Abramoff told the Washingtonian magazine that he had met with Bush nearly a dozen times and that Bush knew him well enough to joke with him.

Three former business associates of Abramoff also told The Associated Press that Abramoff often mentioned White House adviser Karl Rove when talking about his influence inside the White House.

Abramoff was a $100,000 fundraiser for Bush and lobbying records obtained by the AP show his lobbying team logged nearly 200 meetings with the administration during its first 10 months in office on behalf of one of his clients, the Northern Mariana Islands.

The contacts between Abramoff's team and the administration included meetings with Attorney General John Ashcroft and policy advisers to Vice President Dick Cheney, the AP reported last year.

Lawyers Look Into Leaks In Wiretap Case (AP)

By Linda Deutsch, AP Special Correspondent

AP, May 2, 2006

LOS ANGELES (AP) - Troubled by leaks to the media, a federal prosecutor said Monday he would delay filing grand jury transcripts and other crucial documents in the case of an indicted Hollywood private eye because he fears the material will "end up on the front page."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Saunders also confirmed during the federal court hearing that the U.S. Justice Department had launched an investigation to determine who leaked confidential FBI reports to The New York Times.

The wiretapping case against private detective Anthony Pellicano and other defendants has drawn in a growing list of celebrities, and with them increasing media attention.

The confidential information began showing up two weeks ago in the Times, which cited FBI interviews with top Hollywood power brokers.

"We have no confidence that these will not end up on the front page of the newspaper," Saunders told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer on Monday in saying he would delay other filings.

A number of lawyers attended the hearing to say neither they nor their clients were responsible for the leaks. Some said they had not even seen the files before the material began appearing in print.

"Let me say unequivocally this did not come from the Pellicano camp or on the directive of Mr. Pellicano," said attorney Steve Gruel, who represents Pellicano. "I did not have these materials when they started appearing in the paper."

The judge said she was not convinced there had been a violation of her protective order limiting access to the information to prosecutors, investigators, defense attorneys and their clients.

She advised lawyers to file written motions if they want her to act on the leaks issue.

Pellicano is suspected of being the kingpin of a ring that used threats and blackmail while digging up dirt to help celebrity and other clients in legal disputes.

"Die Hard" director John McTiernan pleaded guilty in April to making false statements to an FBI agent. Former Hollywood Records president Robert Pfeifer admitted hiring Pellicano to wiretap the phone of his former girlfriend.

At Monday's hearing, attorney Terree Bowers, who represents defendant Terry Christensen, a longtime attorney for MGM mogul Kirk Kerkorian, complained about the government's plan to delay filing information.

Many of Pellicano's tapes have yet to be turned over to the defense, Bowers said.

The U.S. Justice Department probe of the leaks was requested by attorney Terry W. Bird, whose clients include divorce lawyer Dennis M. Wasser, another of Kerkorian's lawyers. Wasser has not been charged with a crime, but authorities have named him as a person of interest in the case.

Gruel complained that by cutting off the filing of government documents, Saunders was trying to blame defense attorneys for the leaks. He asked the judge to order the government not to go forward with its leak investigation until motions are filed in court.

"I don't have the power to tell the Justice Department what it can and can't do," the judge said.

She scheduled another hearing for May 22.

Delay Planned In Turning Over Evidence (LAT)

By Andrew Blankstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, May 2, 2006

A federal attorney says he fears the information about the Pellicano wiretap case would be leaked to the media if given to defense lawyers.

A federal prosecutor said Monday that he would delay release to defense attorneys of additional evidence in the wiretapping case against Hollywood private eye Anthony Pellicano because he was concerned the information would be leaked to the media.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Daniel Saunders told U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer of his plans at a status conference days after the Justice Department launched an investigation into who provided the New York Times with reports from the FBI.

Citing the possibility that materials would "end up on the front page of the newspaper," Saunders said he planned to withhold grand jury testimony and other privileged materials from lawyers representing Pellicano and six other defendants.

They were indicted in February on charges of conspiring to wiretap, blackmail and intimidate dozens of celebrities and business executives on behalf of clients, many of whom were attorneys looking for information that would give an advantage in civil and criminal litigation.

Several defense attorneys, including Pellicano's lawyer Steven Gruel, denied responsibility for the leaks. Gruel said his client, who is being housed at the downtown Metropolitan Detention Center, had not received any of 10,000 pages of discovery in the case or compact discs containing recorded conservations, other audio files and documents.

"This did not come from the Pellicano camp, nor Pellicano," Gruel said. "He didn't have the stuff" that has been leaked.

From the bench, Fischer said prosecutors were under no particular timetable for turning over grand jury testimony and other evidence, including prior statements by witnesses.

Fischer said she would consider acting only on written requests to look into any violations of her protective order in which both sides agreed not to divulge materials related to the government's investigation.

Attorney Terree Bowers, who is representing indicted lawyer Terry Christenson, said counsel for various defendants agreed to a protective order only because of a quid pro quo in which the government agreed to hand over grand jury materials in discovery.

Christensen was indicted on charges of hiring Pellicano to conduct illegal wiretaps of the ex-wife of billionaire investor Kirk Kerkorian. Christensen was representing Kerkorian in a child-custody case.

Bowers also complained that "a whole universe of potential discovery" would not quickly be turned over to defense teams under Saunders' plan. Bowers said he and other defense attorneys needed as much time as possible to study the evidence, particularly because there are still audio files seized from Pellicano's office that have not been decoded and may be hard to authenticate or are possibly damaged.

Federal authorities, in the meantime, delayed plans to unseal three of six searches conducted by FBI agents at Pellicano's Sunset Boulevard offices and one of the private investigator's storage lockers. Attorney Carmen Trutanich asked Fischer to keep search warrant affidavits sealed on behalf of two clients he described in court only as "John Does."

Law enforcement sources who asked not to be named, citing the ongoing investigation, said Trutanich is representing John Rottger and actor Steven Seagal.

The Pellicano probe began in 2002 after the investigator allegedly hired a former convict to put a dead fish and a note that said "Stop" on the windshield of then-Los Angeles Times reporter Anita Busch. The FBI believed that Pellicano had hired Alexander Proctor to scare Busch off a story about Seagal's problems with organized crime. But the FBI has since found no convincing evidence that Seagal was involved.

Trutanich, who did not explain his request, did not return repeated calls for comment.

Corrections (NYT)

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

A front-page article last Tuesday about seating options that airlines are considering to accommodate more passengers in economy class referred incorrectly to the concept of carrying passengers standing up with harnesses holding them in position. During preparation of the article, The Times's questions to one aircraft manufacturer, Airbus, were imprecise. The company now says that while it researched that idea in 2003, it has since abandoned it. The article also misstated the capacity of the Airbus A380 superjumbo jet. The airliner can accommodate 853 passengers in regular seats; standing-room positions would not be needed. (Go to Article)

•

Because of an editing error, an article in Business Day on Monday about the friendship between Ron Meyer, president of Universal Studios, and Anthony Pellicano, the private detective accused of wiretapping and conspiracy, referred imprecisely to the sources on which the article was based. It was based on government evidence, including written summaries of interviews by F.B.I. agents with witnesses in the case, not on interviews with F.B.I. agents. (Go to Article)

For the Record

The On Education column on Wednesday, about problems in the college admissions process, misstated the number of private academic counselors who belong to the Independent Educational Consultants Association. It is 500; 3,500 is the number of private educational consultants nationwide. (Go to Article)

•

An obituary on Friday about Alexander Trowbridge, a former secretary of Commerce, referred incorrectly to the president he served in the 1980's as a member of the National Commission on Social Security. It was Ronald Reagan, not Richard M. Nixon. (Go to Article)

•

A front-page article on Saturday about a proposal for a fourth airport to serve the New York City area misidentified the location of a Metro-North Railroad line that comes within several miles of Stewart International Airport in New Windsor, N.Y., which is being considered for expansion. It is Orange County, not Rockland. (Go to Article)

•

A picture caption on Friday with an article about Quashay Everett, a 15-year-old Queens girl whose body was found near Kennedy Airport in March, referred incorrectly to the person reflected in a television screen at her home. The image was of Jermaine Everett, Quashay's brother — not her foster sister. A note with the article omitted the name of a contributing reporter. He was Janon Fisher. (Go to Article)

•

An article on April 22 about student efforts to improve Cornell University's image referred imprecisely to the administration of the university's College of Agriculture and Life Sciences. Like three other colleges on campus, it is overseen by both Cornell and the State University of New York, not just by the state. (Go to Article)

•

A picture caption in Business Day on Friday with an article about the Enron trial misidentified the woman with Kenneth L. Lay as he left court. She was his daughter, Robyn, not his publicist, Kelly Kimberly. (Go to Article)

•

A note in The Arts yesterday directing readers to an online Critic's Notebook article about the New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival misstated the timetable for the event. The subject was the conclusion of the first weekend; the festival itself ends on Sunday. (An updated version of the article appears today, on Page B5.) (Go to Article)

•

The Times welcomes comments and suggestions, or complaints about errors that warrant correction. Messages on news coverage can be e-mailed to nytnews@nytimes.com or left toll-free at 1-888-NYT-NEWS (1-888-698-6397). Comments on editorials may be e-mailed to letters@nytimes.com or faxed to (212) 556-3622.

Readers dissatisfied with a response or concerned about the paper's journalistic integrity may reach the public editor, Byron Calame, at public@nytimes.com or (212) 556-7652.

For newspaper delivery questions: 1-800-NYTIMES (1-800-698-4637).

Gang Presence In U.S. Military Investigated (CHIT)

By Charles Sheehan

Chicago Tribune, May 2, 2006

Tribune staff reporter -- The FBI has assigned an agent to monitor any connections between U.S. soldiers and a Chicago-based gang alliance, federal agents said.

Of particular concern are reports that the Folk Nation, consisting of more than a dozen gangs in the Chicago area, is placing young members in the military in an effort to gather information about weapons and tactics, said FBI Special Agent Andrea Simmons, who is based in El Paso, Texas.

"Our understanding is that they find members without a criminal history so that they can join, and once they get out, they will have a new set of skills that they can apply to criminal enterprises," Simmons said. "This could be a concern for any law enforcement agency that has to deal with gangs on a daily basis."

Chicago gang symbols can be found amid other graffiti, mostly in latrines on U.S. military bases such as Camp Fallujah in Iraq's Anbar Province.

Yet military investigators say the soldiers who left those symbols had no gang affiliation and little knowledge of how gangs operate.

"In nearly every one of the cases that we have looked into, it is a young man or woman who thought that the symbol looked cool," said Christopher Grey, spokesman for the Army's Criminal Investigation Command. "We have found some people even get gang tattoos not really knowing what they are, or at least that they have not had any gang affiliation the past."

Still, Army investigators have opened 10 cases in the last year in which evidence of gang activity was found, he said.

Some of those cases have since been closed, but no further details were released by the military.

"We're looking at a million-plus people in the Army," he said. "Any suggestion that this is rampant, we just don't see that."

Grey acknowledged that there are gang members in the military, but he said their presence has not become a problem.

The FBI, however, has two agents looking into gang affiliations in Texas in anticipation of a major realignment of military bases that is about to shift as many as 20,000 soldiers to Ft. Bliss near El Paso, Simmons said.

One of those agents has been assigned to look at affiliations with Folk Nation, she said.

Police departments around Ft. Hood, near Austin, about 600 miles away, have reported some gang-related incidents, and the FBI will monitor whether there is an increase in such crimes near Ft. Bliss over the next two years, Simmons said.

A number of soldiers transferred to Ft. Bliss are expected to come from Ft. Hood, Simmons said.

Military recruiters are trained to spot gang tattoos and affiliated clothing, said Maj. Nathan Banks, stationed at the Pentagon.

Membership in a gang does not automatically exclude individuals from the military, he said.

"There are people who want to become soldiers because they want something better," he said. "That's a fact, and people do join gangs, but they also leave that behind in some instances to serve."

csheehan@tribune.com

'BLAME IT ON GOTTI' SUBPOENAS (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, May 2, 2006

Lawyers for John "Junior" Gotti say the FBI is delivering an unusual verbal message along with its subpoenas for a sweeping grand-jury probe of the Gambinos - subjects are told, "You can thank Gotti . . . for this."

In a letter to Manhattan federal Judge Shira Scheindlin, defense lawyer Charles Carnesi complains that numerous subpoena targets have told him they received the same message from FBI agents, words to the effect of: "You can thank Gotti and Carnesi for this."

The feds have suggested Gotti, his younger brother Peter and others could be hit with new charges, including money laundering, tax fraud and perjury.

But Carnesi claims the supposed verbal message from the FBI is further proof the feds are misusing the grand-jury process in an effort to intimidate witnesses and spark "raging publicity."

Gotti, 42, is facing his third trial on racketeering charges after two previous juries failed to agree on a verdict.

AP: Conn. Governor Reassigns Official (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, The Associated Press

AP, May 2, 2006

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — Connecticut's governor stripped a top fraud investigator of her duties Monday after The Associated Press reported that she had testified to receiving many of the same gifts that toppled former Gov. John G. Rowland's administration.

Kristine Ragaglia, head of the Medicaid fraud unit, was reassigned to administrative duties at Gov. M. Jodi Rell's order, pending an investigation, Department of Social Services spokesman Matthew Barrett said. As a classified employee, she can't immediately be fired.

Ragaglia testified in 2004 before a grand jury investigating corruption in the Rowland administration.

In sealed grand jury transcripts, FBI reports and personal diaries examined by the AP, Ragaglia detailed how she took the same expensive hotel getaways, lavish dinners and limousine rides that were used to bribe the officials in Rowland's administration.

DOJ_NMG_0027686

She testified that she took the luxuries while head of the state Department of Children and Families and helped steer a $57 million detention center contract to a developer who had provided gifts to Rowland.

Prosecutors agreed not to use her testimony against her, a deal that allowed her to keep her $104,000-a-year job, though she faces a civil case brought by the state attorney general.

"The fact that she is heading up a fraud unit, having defrauded the state, I see no humor in that," said Rell, who has been criticized by Democrats for keeping on too many Rowland-hired staff members while campaigning for clean government.

Ragaglia, a 44-year-old former assistant attorney general, ran the child protection agency from 1997 until 2003, when she left amid the FBI's burgeoning investigation. After a brief second stint at the attorney general's office, she was hired by the state's Department of Social Services as head of the fraud unit.

In documents reviewed by the AP, Ragaglia testified that she sometimes wrote letters or placed phone calls to push a project along. Other times, she said, she just looked the other way.

Asked about the documents Sunday night, Ragaglia said she didn't know that developer William Tomasso, who has since pleaded guilty to corruption charges, was paying for her lavish trips. She noted that her cooperation helped send corrupt officials to prison.

"I did my part to make it right," she told the AP.

Ragaglia's admissions have never been made public because all those charged in the case avoided trials by striking plea deals.

Rowland pleaded guilty in late 2004 to one corruption count and served 10 months; he is now on four months of home confinement. Tomasso and Peter Ellef, Rowland's top aide, pleaded guilty to corruption and fraud charges, and were sentenced to 2 1/2 years in prison.

Ragaglia wrote in her diary in 1998 that Ellef introduced her to Tomasso and outlined plans to replace an antiquated juvenile detention center with the Connecticut Juvenile Training School, a project touted as Ragaglia's greatest hope for success.

Rowland hailed it as a key step toward reforming an agency that was under federal oversight and reeling from a series of child deaths in state custody.

His administration steered the construction contract to Tomasso, who secretly paid for repairs at Rowland's summer cottage and his vacations to Florida.

Ellef and his deputy, Lawrence Alibozek, directed the effort. But the reform school came under Ragaglia's agency.

Ragaglia's diaries paint a conflicting portrait: She enjoyed being near Rowland's inner circle but she also worried that her reputation would be ruined and cited Tomasso's "disconcerting" ties to the governor's office. She was excited that her agency — and Connecticut's children — could benefit from his work.

"It was pretty clear to me that I am a pawn in this whole thing — I guess I shouldn't care as long as I get what I want," Ragaglia wrote in late 1998, saying she cared most about getting a new reform school.

According to Ragaglia's testimony, she began receiving perks while she pushed for the deal. She told investigators she joined Ellef, Alibozek and Tomasso for expensive dinners, limousine rides and vacations. Prosecutors describe the trips as bribes Tomasso gave the Rowland administration to land the juvenile center contract.

Ragaglia told investigators that she never knew who paid for the trips but assumed it was Alibozek, with whom she had a yearlong affair.

In the grand jury room, a prosecutor asked Ragaglia directly whether she thought the contract was being steered.

"That was my belief," Ragaglia replied.

Tomasso officially landed the training school contract in April 1999 when a state public works panel, which included Ragaglia, gave him the job.

The next day, Ellef, Alibozek and Ragaglia slipped away for a night in New York at the Waldorf Astoria, according to the grand jury testimony and the FBI documents. The bill topped $2,700, which prosecutors say was paid for with Tomasso's money.

By 2002, the Rowland administration's dealings had drawn the attention of the FBI. Ragaglia agreed to cooperate and Alibozek resigned, pleaded guilty to a corruption charge and become a key FBI witness. He is awaiting sentencing.

DOJ_NMG_0027687

The Juvenile Training School, meanwhile, never lived up to its promise. Rell announced plans last year to shut it down by 2008, saying it was too much like a prison and wasn't rehabilitating the children.

Defense To Open In Trial Of Pair Tied To Mariano (PHI)

By Michael Currie Schaffer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, May 2, 2006

The father-and-son duo accused of bribing Philadelphia City Councilman Rick Mariano are expected to begin presenting their defense this morning by calling a series of witnesses that will include labor leader and potential mayoral candidate John J. Dougherty.

Dougherty will likely be asked about a $6,000 loan he made to Mariano, who was convicted on March 18 of bribery, fraud and conspiracy.

Dougherty told a grand jury last fall that the money was intended to help the councilman repay the defendants, Erie Steel owners Louis and Philip Chartock. Likewise, the defense has said an initial $5,873 payment of Mariano's credit-card bill in 2002 was a loan rather than a bribe.

The question of whether or not it was a loan also hung in the air yesterday at U.S. District Court, as prosecutors presented a succession of witnesses, and voluminous quantities of paperwork, designed to show it was not.

Thomas J. Rapak, an accountant working for Erie since 2003, said the money had been mischaracterized as a business expense in tax forms filed before his arrival. He said he adjusted the filings this spring.

Steve Hyman, a retired Philadelphia prosecutor, said Louis Chartock had first drawn his attention to the payment as city prosecutors were preparing a case against former Erie bookkeeper Maggie Greer, accused of embezzling more than $40,000 from the firm. Hyman said Chartock had told him Greer would try to make hay out of the payments to deflect from her own woes, although Chartock told him the money had been repaid. Greer ultimately confessed to a single misdemeanor charge and was sentenced to probation.

Mitchell Chartock, a son of Louis Chartock and younger brother of Philip Chartock, testified that he overheard a loud exchange between his father and brother in which Philip Chartock demanded to know why a receipt had been made. Prosecutors have cast doubt on the accuracy of a document purporting to prove that the money had been paid back.

Also yesterday, two defense witnesses testified early because of scheduling conflicts. A Disney employee testified that Greer had been on a cruise on the Disney Magic on a day prosecutors say she helped her bosses bribe Mariano.

And a US Airways employee confirmed that Philip Chartock was in Ohio at the time.

Defense attorneys have suggested that, other than the initial loan, the rest of the $23,000 that went from Erie to Mariano was stolen by Greer and the councilman - something Mariano's attorney has denied.

Dougherty's spokesman, Frank Keel, said he had no idea why the electricians' union leader had been called. He said Dougherty had never met the Chartocks.

Yesterday was also Mariano's final day as an official member of City Council. He resigned last week, effective at the close of business yesterday. He will be sentenced in July and could face six to 10 years in prison.

Defense's Claim That Rick Stole (PHI)

By Chris Brennan

The Philadelphia Inquirer, May 2, 2006

Prosecutors yesterday attacked the claims made by two businessmen accused of bribing former City Councilman Rick Mariano that Mariano actually stole much of the money.

Louis Chartock and his son, Philip, are charged with giving Mariano $23,455 in exchange for his help on issues their company had with the city.

The U.S. Attorney's Office called Steve Hyman, a former assistant district attorney in Philadelphia, who prosecuted a former bookkeeper at Erie Steel Co. for embezzlement.

Hyman said Erie Steel owner Philip Chartock repeatedly insisted that Margaret "Maggie" Greer be prosecuted even though she had threatened to "ruin his life" if the case went forward.

Hyman said Chartock had told him Greer was trying to exploit a $5,873 loan he made in 2002 to Mariano as a "personal favor."

But Hyman said the Chartocks never mentioned two other checks for a combined $17,582.

Defense attorneys for both men now claim Mariano stole those two checks with Greer's help.

Greer cut a deal last year to have 95 felonies reduced to a single misdemeanor with a sentence of one year of probation in return for her testimony against Mariano and the Chartocks.

Prosecutors also called Thomas Rapak, Erie Steel's accountant, who said Philip Chartock told him recently to file amended 2002 tax returns for the company, listing all three checks as loans to Mariano.

Two of the checks had been filed as expenses for freight or sales.

"He just claimed that they were put in the wrong place," Rapak said.

Elizabeth Ainslie, Philip Chartock's attorney, plans to call John Dougherty, the electricians union chief, as a defense witness today.

Dougherty, Mariano's one-time political patron, told the FBI he gave Mariano $6,000 to repay an Erie Steel loan but later learned no payment was made.

Ainslie and Bobby Simone, attorney for Louis Chartock, yesterday said they did not know if their clients would testify.

"I never know until the last minute," Simone said. "And the last people I tell are reporters."

Closings Begin In Bribery Trial Of Former Clark County Lawmakers (AP)

By Ken Ritter, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, May 2, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - Closing arguments began Monday in the federal corruption trial of two former Clark County commissioners who could face prison if a jury finds them guilty of accepting bribes from a former striptease club owner.

"Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey were two corrupt public officials," prosecutor Daniel Schiess declared as he began summarizing wiretaps, videotapes, documents and testimony that he said proved the two former commissioners sold their votes for cash, campaign contributions and sex.

Schiess characterized Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey as savvy politicians who, following their indictments in May 2003, tailored their testimony and told "partial truths" to defend themselves.

The prosecutor quickly acknowleged credibility problems surrounding the prosecution's star witness, former strip club owner Michael Galardi, who pleaded guilty to bribing officials and testified in return for a promise of leniency in sentencing.

Schiess said FBI wiretaps recorded from 1999 to 2003 revealed the real truth behind what he called a scheme to defraud Clark County residents of honest government.

"Tape recordings, witness testimonies, stand in this courtroom. They are not erased by the credibility of Mr. Galardi," Schiess told the U.S. District Court jury. "When a case is born in hell, you're not going to find heavenly messengers as witnesses."

Defense lawyers for Herrera, a young former star in Democratic politics who lost a bid for Congress in 2002, and Kincaid-Chauncey, a grandmotherly flower shop owner and political veteran, maintain that Galardi lied when he testified he provided cash and sexual favors to Herrera and cash and family favors to Kincaid-Chauncey.

Herrera, 32, and Kincaid-Chauncey, 67, have each pleaded not guilty to conspiracy, wire fraud and extortion under color of official right charges that could get them 45 years in prison if convicted on all counts.

Herrera testified he received sex from Galardi employees, and said he received a $10,000 check as a campaign contribution. But he denied ever receiving cash bribes.

Kincaid-Chauncey acknowledged asking Galardi twice for money - once to help send her grandson to a competition ski racing school, and another time to help her son pay campaign costs for his unsuccessful bid for a North Las Vegas City Council seat. She also helped set up a strip club outing at a Galardi club for her son, an Air Force captain.

Schiess called Kincaid-Chauncey "subtle," "smart" and "wiley" in admitting to the FBI that she accepted Galardi money for the benefit of her relatives. But the prosecutor said Kincaid-Chauncey failed to account for at least three other times he said she took money.

The prosecutor summoned images from six weeks of sometimes lurid testimony about Herrera accepting lap dances, sexual favors and money after becoming, at age 25, the youngest person ever elected to the county commission in 1998.

"Ladies and gentlemen, as you sit here today, is there any doubt (Herrera) ... used his office to satisfy his own greed, to satisfy his own lust, to satisfy his own wants and wishes?" Schiess asked the jury.

Lawyers for Kincaid-Chauncey and Herrera could begin their closing arguments Tuesday. The case could go to the jury on Wednesday.

Another former commissioner, Erin Kenny, pleaded guilty in the case and testified for the prosecution in return for a promise of leniency at sentencing. But the 45-year-old mother of five denied Galardi's claim that she provided oral sex to him six times while she was on the commission.

Galardi claimed on the witness stand that he spent hundreds of thousands of dollars bribing judges, lawyers, police, political figures and public officials, besides the $200,000 he claimed he paid Herrera, and the $85,000 he said he paid Kincaid-Chauncey. None of those other officials has been charged.

Galardi said much of the money was funneled through former Clark County Commissioner Lance Malone, who Galardi hired as his lobbyist after Malone lost a bid for re-election.

The government contends that in return, the commissioners voted to further Galardi's goals - including opening a $15 million, 20,000-square-foot strip palace he built just off the Las Vegas Strip, expanding laws allowing close contact between dancers and patrons, and limiting competition.

Galardi pleaded guilty and Malone was convicted in a related case in San Diego on extortion, wire fraud conspiracy and wire fraud charges after he was found guilty of delivering cash to San Diego City Council members on behalf of Galardi.

Malone remains free while appealing his conviction and a three-year prison sentence in the San Diego case, which also resulted in the conviction of two city council members. Malone did not testify in the Las Vegas trial. He will be tried separately in August.

The jury in Las Vegas learned Monday of Malone's conviction, but it has not heard that the federal judge who heard the San Diego case last year expressed doubts about Galardi's credibility and granted a new trial to one of the convicted council members.

G-Sting: Prosecutors Let Loose On Kincaid-Chauncey (KLAS-TV)

KLAS-TV, May 2, 2006

The defense wrapped up their case and closing arguments began Monday in the political corruption trial of two former Clark County Commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey. They are both accused of accepting bribes from former strip club owner Mike Galardi in exchange for favorable votes on his clubs.

Prosecutors let loose on Kincaid-Chauncey using her own words against her. Kincaid-Chauncey acknowledges two payments from Galardi; money she solicited for family members. She says she got the first payment in October 2001.

In closing arguments, federal prosecutor Daniel Schiess told the jury, quote, "Mary Kincaid-Chauncey received more than the two payments she has talked about."

Schiess played an FBI wiretap from June 2001 where Lance Malone speaks to his former county commission assistant -- the topic: Kincaid-Chauncey.

FBI wiretap of Lance Malone: "I was able to get her some money for her son. I got her son like five grand and I got her five grand."

Prosecutor Schiess told the jury Malone would have no reason to lie to his former assistant about this. Schiess believes this is one of two Galardi payments Kincaid-Chauncey tried to conceal. The other, he says, occurred in August 2001 when she had lunch with Lance Malone. Following that lunch, Kincaid-Chauncey called Galardi on Malone's phone with the FBI listening in.

FBI wiretap of Mary Kincaid-Chauncey: "Hi Mike. It's Mary. Lance said you were in San Diego. Sorry I missed having lunch with you, but maybe when you get back we can go have some lunch or do something, just as long as it's a diet lunch. Anyway, thanks for all your help. I really appreciate it. Talk to you later. Bye."

When Kincaid-Chauncey testified about this wiretap she said she didn't know what she was thanking Galardi for.

Prosecutors showed a cash deposit slip from the day of that lunch -- $3,800 into the account of Kincaid-Chauncey's son, Mark. He testified last week that he doesn't remember that deposit.

After court Monday, Kincaid-Chauncey appeared flustered and did not speak with reporters. Her attorney Richard Wright was upset as well.

Wright said, "Sounded like a filibuster to me. If he can keep talking, I can't get up."

Prosecutors began discussing Dario Herrera late in the day saying Mike Galardi paid him off with lap dances and sexual favors because that was the currency of Herrera's corruption.

Both Herrera and Kincaid-Chauncey could face 45 years in prison if convicted on all counts.

Closing arguments continue Tuesday. The jury could get the case later this week.

George Federal Courthouse -- May 1 -- 1:20 p.m.

The defense in the G-Sting political corruption trial rested its case this morning. Before doing so, Dario Herrera's attorney, Jerry Bernstein read an agreement between all parties involved to the jury.

It informs the jury that in November of last year, Lance Malone was convicted in San Diego of bribing city councilmen there. Defense attorneys hope this hurts Malone's credibility in the eyes of the jury.

Following that, Judge Larry Hicks read the indictment against Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey outlining how each face charges of conspiracy, wire fraud and extortion. Hicks then read to the jury a set of 42 rules they are to follow once deliberations begin.

At 11:07 this morning, federal prosecutor Daniel Schiess began his closing statements. He told the jury, quote, "Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey were two corrupt public officials. You know the evidence shows beyond a reasonable doubt they sold their public office."

Schiess also worked to overcome credibility issues involving Mile Galardi's testimony. Schiess argued, quote, "When a case is born in hell, you're not going to find heavenly messengers as witnesses."

Schiess then began reestablishing the prosecution's case against Mary Kincaid-Chauncey. Kincaid-Chauncey says she received two payments from Galardi -- the first in October of 2001. Schiess played a wiretap from late June of 2001 where Galardi tells Lance Malone they should give her $5,000; quote, "again."

Schiess told the jury they could infer that by late June of 2001, Kincaid-Chauncey had already received money from Galardi. Schiess told the jury, quote, "If the evidence shows she received more payments then those two, she was lying to you."

Schiess continues his closing statements at this afternoon.

George Federal Courthouse -- May 1 -- 12 p.m.

Within the last hour, federal prosecutors in the G-Sting political corruption trial began presenting their closing arguments. Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Schiess reminded the jury of numerous contacts between former Clark County Commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid- Chauncey and former strip club owner Mike Galardi.

Schiess told the jury, quote, "Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey were two corrupt public officials. You know the evidence shows beyond a reasonable doubt they sold their public office."

Before closing arguments began, defense attorneys rested their case but not before providing the jury with one final piece of evidence.

George Federal Courthouse -- May 1 -- 9:05 a.m.

The defense rested its case in the G-Sting political corruption trial this morning. Judge Larry Hicks will now begin presenting jury instructions to the jurors. Closing arguments are expected to begin in 90 minutes with the prosecution going first.

Email reporter Brian Allen at ballen@klastv.com

Church Workers Not Told About Money (LYN&A)

By Conor Reilly

Lynchburg News & Advance, May 2, 2006

ROANOKE - Federal prosecutors spent day four of Carl Hutcherson's trial trying to establish that the Lynchburg mayor was the brains behind a now-defunct church charity they say he used as his personal ATM.

But defense attorneys tried to convince a jury the city's top political figure was simply a bumbling businessman who mistakenly relied on another to look after the charity's affairs.

The government rested its case against the Lynchburg mayor, pastor and businessman Monday. Charges allege Hutcherson stole from Social Security recipients, raided a church group he directed and then lied to cover it up.

During a brief hearing without the jury present, prosecutor William Gould rejected the defense's notion that Hutcherson was just a "feckless buffoon" in the hands of a consultant.

The bulk of the testimony came from that consultant, Davida Wingfield. It was her job to set up Trinity New Life Community Development Corporation, a group affiliated with the church where Hutcherson is pastor.

Wingfield testified that, though she had made the applications on behalf of the CDC, all the information for those documents came from Hutcherson.

After the Bank of the James raised questions about an "odd" $32,500 transaction from the Jerry Falwell Ministries that wound up in the mayor's account, Wingfield said Hutcherson asked her "two or three times" to draw up fake documents to support what he told bank officials.

Wingfield said she felt it was "wrong" to draft minutes for a meeting she knew never took place, and said she was hesitant to provide the "board minutes" because she wasn't sure they were accurate.

However, she went ahead and prepared the minutes anyway, she said. "I believed what Carl told me."

Defense attorneys pointed out that prosecutors granted Wingfield immunity just a few months before Hutcherson was indicted. That means she can't be charged, though she forged signatures on key nonprofit applications and created fake documents, according to testimony.

John Fishwick, one of Hutcherson's attorneys, spent cross-examination showing Wingfield was the "expert" in the nonprofit world and that the mayor had to rely on her advice.

Wingfield said she was being compensated by the CDC to take care of all grant applications and making sure the organization got its nonprofit status, which were documents she said Hutcherson "barely glanced at"

The jury then heard from two church volunteers involved with the fledgling Trinity New Life CDC. One no longer attends Hutcherson's church because she hasn't been "comfortable" since the criminal investigation began.

Cheryl Glass, who once served on Hutcherson's church board, testified that she was never told about the $32,500 loan from the Falwell ministries to the CDC.

Though quoted in the fake meeting minutes saying Hutcherson could use that gift for himself as long as he paid it back, Glass said there was no meeting and she never spoke those words.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant asked what the CDC's board would have done if Hutcherson had left the money in the proper account.

"We would have used the money to make the dream come alive across the street," Glass said, referring to a rundown house the CDC was hoping to turn into a community center.

After jurors listened to a taped phone conversation between Hutcherson and Falwell Jr. about the $32,500 donation, FBI Special Agent Christian Pettyjohn testified about his role as lead investigator and said that Hutcherson told him that Falwell Jr. donated the money to Hutcherson's charity and knew that Hutcherson planned to use it to pay back some of his back taxes.

Both sides used Pettyjohn to point out passages in Falwell Jr.'s phone conversation that favored their side.

Prosecutors tried to show that Falwell Jr. intended the money to be a donation to Hutcherson's charity, pointing out when Falwell Jr. said, "And if the ministry (Trinity New Life) decides to loan you the money, I don't see anything wrong with that," and "If the charity decides to loan you the money, it's between you and them."

Defense attorneys tried to show that Falwell Jr. knew that Hutcherson planned to use the money to pay off his back taxes.

"Make sure Davida Wingfield books that as a loan to you from that corporation (Trinity New Life). That's what I thought we were going to do," Falwell Jr. said twice during the conversation.

One day before his re-election bid, prosecutors called City Councilman Bert Dodson to testify regarding a $5,000 loan to Hutcherson he made in 2004 to help his fellow councilman's struggling funeral home business.

He said he had loaned thousands to the mayor several times over the past few years, and that Hutcherson still owes him around $2,000.

Prosecutors documented that Hutcherson paid back Dodson with a portion of the Falwell donation, which was supposed to help the CDC.

The government also documented that $26,500 of the Falwell gift went to pay a portion of Hutcherson's IRS debt.

After the government rested its case, defense attorneys asked the judge to dismiss the indictment. Defense lawyer John Lichtenstein told the judge the government failed to prove that Hutcherson committed any crimes.

Prosecutors downplayed the defense's request, saying the evidence against the mayor remains strong. The judge agreed, overruled the motion, and the trial will continue today.

Defense attorneys are expected to call their first witness today. It's unclear who may testify, but City Attorney Walter Erwin confirmed he was subpoenaed by Hutcherson's lawyers.

Closing arguments could also come as early as today.

Staff writer Dionne Waugh contributed to this story.

Prosecution Winds Up Case In Lynchburg Mayor's Trial (DPHR/AP)

By Sue Lindsey, Associated Press Writer

Daily Press, May 2, 2006

ROANOKE, Va. -- A consultant who helped set up a church charity testified Monday that she falsified minutes documenting a loan to the church's pastor, Lynchburg Mayor Carl B. Hutcherson Jr. Two women associated with the charity said they were unaware of the loan.

The three testified as the prosecution wrapped up its case in the U.S. District Court trial for Hutcherson, 62. He is charged with taking more than $30,000 given to the church's charity by the Rev. Jerry Falwell and his son to pay his funeral home's back taxes and stealing from two Social Security recipients.

After the prosecution rested, Judge James Turk took under advisement a defense motion to dismiss an obstruction of justice count against Hutcherson, but denied its motion to dismiss the other six counts of fraud and lying to federal and bank officials.

Davida Wingfield testified that at Hutcherson's request she fabricated minutes for the board of Trinity New Life Development Corp. The minutes included her actions on behalf of organizing the charity, she said, but also documented the charity's loan to Hutcherson.

Under questioning from Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Bondurant, Wingfield said she hesitated to write the minutes because she didn't know whether any board meetings had actually occurred.

Asked why she did it, Wingfield answered, "I guess because he's a trusted friend."

Cheryl Glass, the charity's volunteer executive director, testified that the minutes contained quotes from her about the loan that she never said. Wingfield, who has immunity from prosecution, admitted making them up.

Both Glass and Serena Gardner said that had they known about the $32,500 gift from the Falwells, they would have wanted to use the money to fix up the dilapidated church parsonage for the charity's use.

Glass testified that Hutcherson told her he expected a friend to give him money and that he was going to use those funds "to bless the church" and the charity.

Defense attorney John Lichtenstein pointed out that Hutcherson returned the money plus interest to Trinity New Life within a year of the loan in September of 2004.

Glass said she'd never seen two checks written to the funeral home that had her signature on them as well as Hutcherson's. Checks written on the charity's account required two signatures, and Glass testified that both she and Hutcherson had signed some blank checks because they had trouble coordinating their schedules.

Gardner, who said Glass asked her to serve on the charity's board, said Hutcherson told her in January of 2005 that he was in trouble but that "Jerry (Falwell) Jr. said it was OK." She said he told her "some moneys were funneled through one account to another."

DOJ_NMG_0027693

"I told him we would not have authorized that," she said.

FBI agent Christian Pettyjohn testified that he and Bondurant asked Hutcherson to make a phone call to Jerry Falwell Jr. about the loan that was recorded covertly "because we were concerned about public corruption."

Defense attorneys had played the recording when the trial began last Wednesday, but it was repeated by the prosecution Monday. In it, Falwell said he didn't see anything wrong with the loan.

John Fishwick, another of Hutcherson's attorneys, said he expected the defense to complete its case Tuesday.

Alito Pens First Opinion As A Supreme Court Justice (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, May 2, 2006

In his maiden opinion for the Supreme Court, new Justice Samuel Alito Jr. said on Monday that states may not prevent criminal defendants from introducing evidence at trial that another person committed the crime.

The unanimous, pro-defendant decision in Holmes v. South Carolina was an unusual debut for Alito, a former U.S. Attorney not known for ruling in favor of the defense when he was a judge on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Alito joined the high court Jan. 31, replacing Sandra Day O'Connor.

But Alito said that South Carolina had gone too far in barring evidence of third-party guilt in cases in which the prosecution has presented forensic evidence that strongly supports a guilty verdict for the defendant.

"By evaluating the strength of only one party's evidence, no logical conclusion can be reached regarding the strength of contrary evidence offered by the other side to rebut or cast doubt," Alito wrote.

Also on Monday, the Court ruled in the high-profile case of Marshall v. Marshall that Vickie Lynn Marshall, better known as the model Anna Nicole Smith, could resume her battle for part of her late husband's estate in federal court. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, writing for a unanimous Court, said the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals had interpreted the "probate exception" to federal court jurisdiction too broadly. Though probate is mainly a state matter, Ginsburg said that Smith's claim of tortious interference with a gift could be pursued in federal court.

In the South Carolina criminal case, Bobby Lee Holmes was convicted in the 1989 murder of an 89-year-old woman based on evidence that Holmes' palm print, DNA, and fibers from his clothing were found at the crime scene. Lawyers for Holmes said the evidence had been contaminated, and they also claimed that another man had committed the crime.

But the trial court excluded all evidence suggesting third-party guilt. South Carolina, like many states, has a rule that allows judges to exclude such evidence when it is speculative or remote and might confuse or prejudice the jury.

Alito explicitly said those rules of evidence were not at issue in the Holmes case. Rather, Alito said the South Carolina Supreme Court had "radically changed and extended the rule" by stating in two cases that if the prosecution's forensic evidence was strong enough, then the defense evidence of third-party guilt is to be excluded automatically.

Alito said that South Carolina's exclusive focus on the strength of the prosecution's evidence, without any assessment of the probative value of the defense evidence, violates the Constitution's guarantee of a "meaningful opportunity to present a complete defense." Barry Scheck, a former president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, called Monday's decision a "profoundly significant ruling."

Scheck, co-director of the Innocence Project, said the decision will help future defendants challenge forensic evidence. "The mere fact that forensic evidence helped secure a conviction can't prevent people from trying to prove their innocence," he said. "Today's ruling is a strong signal that the Supreme Court is taking the right of defendants to prove their innocence very seriously and is taking a critical look at forensic evidence."

A member of Holmes' legal team, Edward Lazarus of Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld, said the case "hit the Court at a very opportune spot." It was a case in which actual innocence was claimed, coming from a state whose handling of capital cases has troubled the Court in the past. One sign South Carolina was in trouble came during oral argument in February, when conservative Justice Clarence Thomas asked a question -- almost unheard of for him -- and it was hostile to the state.

DOJ_NMG_0027694

Holmes was represented by Akin Gump as well as by Cornell Law School professor John Blume, director of the school's death penalty project. Calls seeking comment from the office of South Carolina Attorney General Henry McMaster were not returned.

Alito's maiden opinion for the Court fit the tradition that new justices are usually given cases in which the Court is unanimous. But it was also notable for the fact that it featured only one footnote, an asterisk, as did Chief Justice John Roberts Jr.'s first ruling, last December.

Seton Hall Law School professor Charles Sullivan, author of a tongue-in-cheek 2005 Georgetown Law Journal article on the use of asterisked footnotes, laughed when he heard that Alito had used one. As with Roberts' footnote, Sullivan said it was likely that Alito used an asterisk rather than a number because "some people think it odd if you use a 'one' and there is no 'two.'"

Alito used to teach at Seton Hall, but Sullivan said the two never discussed footnotes. "If there is any subtext about today's development, it is that the new justices are going to be chary about using footnotes," no matter which variety.

In Death Row Case, Justices Order Retrial Over Evidence (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 1 — With the first opinion by Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., the Supreme Court ordered a new trial on Monday for an inmate on South Carolina's death row because the state courts improperly excluded evidence showing that another man might have committed the crime. The decision was unanimous.

Justice Alito said the rule of evidence applied by the South Carolina courts was irrational and arbitrary and served to deprive the defendant, Bobbie Lee Holmes, of a "meaningful opportunity to present a complete defense."

The rule in question, which is used by a small minority of states, says that when the state has presented strong forensic evidence of the defendant's guilt, like DNA analysis or a fingerprint, the defense can be prevented from offering the jury contradictory evidence that points to the guilt of another person.

Justice Alito noted that the South Carolina courts applied the rule even when the defense evidence, "if viewed independently, would have great probative value," as it might have had in the case at hand.

Justice Alito, the newest member of the court and a former federal prosecutor, said that "the true strength of the prosecution's proof cannot be assessed without considering challenges to the reliability of the prosecution's evidence."

He added, "The point is that by evaluating the strength of only one party's evidence, no logical conclusion can be reached regarding the strength of contrary evidence offered by the other side to rebut or cast doubt."

The South Carolina rule was arbitrary and irrational in failing to heed this point, he said.

Although the unanimous 11-page opinion made the conclusion seem rather obvious, that was not necessarily how the case appeared as it reached the court. A coalition of 18 states, led by Attorney General Phill Kline of Kansas, filed a brief on South Carolina's behalf to argue that the issue was one of federalism, urging the court to grant the states "substantial latitude and respect" for their various approaches to their criminal justice systems.

Steffen N. Johnson, the lawyer for the state coalition, told the justices when the case was argued on Feb. 22 that nine states had similar rules.

On the defendant's side, the case, Holmes v. South Carolina, No. 04-1327, drew interest from the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and from a group of 40 professors of evidence law, who told the court in their brief that the South Carolina rule was "a judicial usurpation of the jury's constitutional authority to decide guilt or innocence in criminal prosecutions." The professors' brief said "the fundamental issue in this case is the right to trial by jury."

The court has in recent years been paying renewed attention to the Sixth Amendment right to trial by jury, overturning, for example, sentencing systems that allow judges to make the central factual findings that in the court's view should be left to juries.

In his opinion on Monday, however, Justice Alito did not analyze the case as presenting a question under the Sixth Amendment or any other specific constitutional provision. His emphasis on what he called the irrationality and illogic of the South Carolina rule brought the opinion closer to a generalized due process analysis.

DOJ_NMG_0027695

No matter what route the court took, its opinion was greeted with approval by defense lawyers. Barry C. Scheck, co-director of the Innocence Project at the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law at Yeshiva University, which filed a brief for Mr. Holmes, said the decision was "a strong signal that the Supreme Court is taking the right of defendants to prove their innocence very seriously and is taking a critical look at forensic evidence."

Mr. Scheck said that while DNA evidence had led to many exonerations of criminal defendants, it was "still subject to erroneous interpretation or application, and the defense has a right to challenge that in court."

In this case, Mr. Holmes was convicted of murdering an 86-year-old woman, Mary Stewart, who was robbed, beaten and raped by someone who entered her home. Mr. Holmes was connected to the scene through a palm print, fiber analysis and DNA evidence. He argued that the forensic evidence was unreliable because it had been contaminated and that the police were trying to frame him.

At a pretrial hearing, his lawyers presented witnesses to support his argument that another man was Ms. Stewart's attacker. But the trial court refused, under the South Carolina rule, to allow this evidence to be introduced at trial.

Justice Alito said that while states were free to exclude defense evidence that "has only a very weak logical connection to the central issues," the type of evidence at issue in this case did not come under that description.

"Just because the prosecution's evidence, if credited, would provide strong support for a guilty verdict," he said, "it does not follow that evidence of third-party guilt has only a weak logical connection to the central issues in the case."

In other action on Monday, the court granted review in a death penalty case from California. The case, Ornaski v. Belmontes, No. 05-493, filed by Bill Lockyer, the state attorney general, is an appeal from a ruling by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit that found inadequate a jury instruction on how to consider mitigating evidence about a defendant's background and character.

Ex-OP Lawyer Pleads Guilty To Embezzlement (KCBIZ)

Kansas City Business Journal, May 2, 2006

A former Overland Park attorney faces as much as 10 years in prison after pleading guilty Monday to embezzling nearly $300,000 from a Kansas City church.

Keith Koenigsdorf was disbarred in both Kansas and Missouri last year after he admitted he had stolen the money from Central United Methodist Church, 5144 Oak St., court records show.

» Get the latest business news on the go! Brought to you by Cingular

Koenigsdorf, 50, pleaded guilty to taking about $297,000 from the church where he served as treasurer, Bradley Schlozman, U.S. attorney for the Western District of Missouri, said in a release. Koenigsdorf used the money to pay for personal and business expenses, Schlozman said.

Koenigsdorf waived his right to a grand jury and pleaded guilty before U.S. District Judge Fernando Gaitan to a charge of interstate transportation of stolen property, Schlozman said.

According to Schlozman, Koenigsdorf admitted that he had started embezzling money from the church in November 1999. Koenigsdorf, who also was a member of the church's board of trustees, was an authorized signatory on church checks, Schlozman said. Central United Methodist's policy required the trustees to approve all payments and each check to have two authorized signatures.

Koenigsdorf stole the money by taking blank checks that already bore a signature from an authorized signatory, adding his own signature and making the check payable to himself, and then depositing the checks into his law firm's operating account at Bank of America in Overland Park, Schlozman said.

Beginning in late February 2003, Central United Methodist stopped providing blank checks already signed by an authorized signatory, so Koenigsdorf began forging a second signature, Schlozman said.

The embezzlement was discovered at some point after July 20, 2004, Schlozman said. Koenigsdorf wrote about 90 checks drawn on Central United Methodist's bank account, Schlozman said.

Schlozman said the funds transfer from the church's bank in Kansas City, Mo., to Koenigsdorf's account in Overland Park resulted in the charge of interstate transportation of stolen property.

DOJ_NMG_0027696

The case was prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Green and investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

A sentencing hearing is pending.

Koenigsdorf campaigned for Overland Park City Council in 1999 but was defeated by Kris Kobach. Koenigsdorf's father, Richard Koenigsdorf, was a Jackson County Circuit judge in the 1960s.

Church Treasurer Pleads Guilty To Embezzling $297,000 (KMCI-TV)

KMCI-TV, May 2, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. – The former treasurer of Central United Methodist Church pleaded guilty in federal court today to stealing $297,000 from the church.

Bradley J. Schlozman, United States Attorney for the Western District of Missouri, announced that Keith B. Koenigsdorf, 50, of Overland Park, Kan., waived his right to a grand jury and pleaded guilty before U.S. District Judge Fernando J. Gaitan this morning to an information that charges him with interstate transportation of stolen property.

Koenigsdorf admitted that, beginning in November 1999, he began embezzling money from Central United Methodist Church, 5144 Oak Street in Kansas City. Koenigsdorf, an attorney, served as the treasurer and a member of the board of trustees of the church and was an authorized signatory on church checks. Central United Methodist's policy required all expense payments to be approved by the board of trustees, with two authorized signatures on each church check.

Koenigsdorf stole the funds, Schlozman explained, by taking blank checks which already bore a signature from an authorized signatory, adding his own signature, making the check payable to himself, and then depositing the check into his law firm's operating account at Bank of America in Overland Park. Koenigsdorf used these funds to pay for personal and business expenses.

Beginning in late February 2003, Koenigsdorf began forging the signature of the second authorized signatory on church checks used to embezzle funds, because Central United Methodist stopped providing blank checks already signed by an authorized signatory. Koenigsdorf would forge the signature of a second authorized signatory, make the check payable to himself, and deposit the check into his law firm's bank account.

Koenigsdorf's embezzlement was discovered at some point after July 20, 2004. Koenigsdorf wrote approximately 90 checks drawn on Central United Methodist's bank account, Schlozman said, resulting in a total loss of approximately $297,000 in church funds.

Central United Methodist has its bank account at a Bank of America branch in Kansas City, Mo., Schlozman explained that, because Koenigsdorf deposited the church check into the account of his law firm, a sole proprietorship, at a Bank of America branch in Overland Park, the transfer of funds constituted the interstate transportation of stolen property.

Under federal statutes, Koenigsdorf could be subject to a sentence of up to 10 years in federal prison without parole, plus a fine up to $250,000 and an order of restitution. A sentencing hearing will be scheduled after the completion of a presentence investigation by the United States Probation Office.

This case is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney D. Michael Green. It was investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

College's Ex-President Pleads Guilty To Fraud (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

The former president of Morris Brown College, a historic black school in Atlanta, pleaded guilty yesterday to embezzling millions of dollars in federal funds from the government and students, the climax of a financial debacle that caused the school to lose its accreditation.

Delores Cross, 69, who led the school from November 1998 until February 2002, pleaded in federal court in Atlanta to one court of illegally obtaining student loans, allowing her to avoid a trial and more than two dozen other counts she was confronting.

"I will always regret what happened, and I apologize to the students, the faculty and the staff of Morris Brown College," Cross said in a statement through her lawyer.

According to the 2004 indictment, $3.4 million in federally insured student loans and Pell grants were fraudulently obtained in the names of ineligible students -- some who never attended the college, some who were enrolled part time and others who had already left. It was never alleged that Cross personally benefited from the scheme, but that the money was used to pay bills at the strapped school. Ultimately the students found themselves responsible for loans they never requested.

"The Morris Brown College family is elated that this sad chapter in the college's history has come to closure," said Getchel L. Caldwell, vice president for institutional advancement at the school. "We are looking forward to building a new foundation."

Parvesh Singh, a former director of financial aid at the college, pleaded guilty last week to one count of theft of federal funds, admitting to fraudulently securing more than $92,000 in government loans for students whom he was aware were not attending the school. As part of his deal, Singh, 64, was committed to testify against Cross.

Had Cross gone to trial on the single count, she could have faced up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Prosecutors are asking for up to 16 months in jail.

Under the agreement, she will pay $11,000 in restitution.

"Dr. Cross is relieved . . . this ordeal is over," said her lawyer Drew Findling, reading a prepared statement. "She hopes that ending the prosecution will assist Morris Brown in regaining its accreditation."

The 125-year-old college, which counts civil rights leader Hosea Williams and Pulitzer Prize-winning author James A. McPherson among its alumni, is still in a tenuous situation. It has gone from a robust campus of 2,000-plus students to an enrollment of 66 this year, with nine instructors. Students are no longer eligible for financial aid. Recently a group of students filed a lawsuit asking a judge to remove the board of trustees for breaching its fiduciary duty.

Prosecutors say that the mismanagement that devastated the school also hurt the credit ratings of students who only found out about the loans years later when they tried to obtain credit. The school is also fighting lawsuits brought by former students, and other suits stemming from the financial woes.

Caldwell said the school intends to reapply for accreditation -- which requires the institution to have a balanced budget for three years -- in 2009. It has $25 million in long-term debt.

He said both the alumni association and the African Methodist Episcopal Church, which founded the school in 1881, have promised to help the school rebound.

"We will have 107 students in the fall," Caldwell said. "That's how many students were enrolled when the school was founded. We're definitely going to make it."

Views Of Jury Pool Trouble Sniper (BSUN)

By Andrea Siegel, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, May 2, 2006

As his trial begins, Muhammad finds many say he killed six people in Md.

ROCKVILLE -- The difficulty of finding jurors in Montgomery County who had not decided that convicted sniper John Allen Muhammad was responsible for the county's six sniper killings in 2002 became immediately apparent Monday as the presiding judge questioned the first batch of 300 potential jurors.

During initial questioning -- which was disrupted by a profanity-laced outburst from a victim's relative -- nearly all of the first 25 potential jurors said they believed he committed six murders in the county, and many were aware that he had been convicted of a sniper killing in Virginia.

They pointed to the heavy media coverage of the shootings, their children being forced to stay inside at school and their personal fears at the time. One referred to the images he saw of Muhammad in prison garb from the first trial in Virginia.

"It happened right around my old job, right around my house," said Quinn McCreary, 24, who lived across from one of the shooting scenes in Silver Spring. "It was right in my face."

McCreary was excused by Montgomery County Circuit Judge James L. Ryan.

The trial's first day illustrated the difficulty posed by a defendant who seeks to represent himself, particularly when the suspect has no legal training and is charged in a high-profile crime.

DOJ_NMG_0027698

Muhammad, 45, had bitterly criticized his court-appointed attorneys in previous cases and has chosen to represent himself in this case, something he did briefly in his Virginia trial.

Monday, he sat at the defense table, staring at each possible juror who were called for individual questioning. The potential jurors had filled out a form of 32 questions, asking their opinion of the case, whether they thought they could still be fair and whether they had experience with guns such as the Bushmaster rifle used in the murders.

Minds 'made up'

As more people said they believed he was guilty, Muhammad grew more agitated. He objected to most, and at midafternoon, he told the judge he would object to all potential jurors who said they couldn't be fair to him.

"These people are saying their minds are already made up," he complained.

Outside the courthouse, A. Jai Bonner, one of Muhammad's appointed standby lawyers, said: "This court has no business trying this case. It should have been moved a long time ago."

On Friday, Ryan rebuffed Muhammad's request to move the trial, saying that three days before the trial's start was too late to ask. The public defenders Muhammad fired had not sought a new location for the trial.

Muhammad faces six counts of murder in Montgomery County in the October 2002 shooting rampage that claimed 10 lives in the Washington, D.C., area, injured three others and placed millions of people in fear that they could be next in the sniper's sights.

Already on Virginia's death row for a sniper killing, Muhammad could be sentenced to multiple life terms without parole if convicted in Maryland. Lee Boyd Malvo, 21, convicted as Muhammad's accomplice in two Virginia sniper shootings, is serving life prison terms there.

Jury selection began about 10 a.m. with more than 300 people called in. The final panel will consist of 12 jurors and four alternates.

'I hope you rot'

Within the first hour as more pretrial motions were being argued, a cousin of one of Muhammad's six alleged victims in Montgomery County was ejected from the courtroom after screaming obscenities at the suspect.

"I hope you rot in hell," hollered Christopher Roberts, wearing a bright red T-shirt that said, "Why?" Roberts said he was as a cousin of bus driver Conrad E. Johnson, the final sniper victim.

Deputies escorted the man from the courthouse and told him not to return. Outside the courthouse, he said what he wanted to tell Muhammad: "Don't be antagonizing these families."

He said he thought Muhammad should admit to the crimes.

"You see what I was telling you -- that is why we have so much security," Ryan told Muhammad as Roberts was removed. "It's not just for everybody else. It's for you, too."

Replied Muhammad: 'That's America, your honor -- freedom of speech."

Emotions ran high among some potential jurors.

One sniper shooting "was at a gas station that I use, the Shell. That's where I went when I was in high school," one weeping young woman said. "I feel that there is nothing anybody can say that will change my mind."

Excused from consideration, she still shook. "I didn't look at him. I couldn't look at him at all," she said as she ran toward the elevator.

Said another woman during questioning, "It's a very emotional case, especially for people living in this area. I have small children in Montgomery County public schools."

Legal experts said the challenge of impaneling an impartial jury for so notorious a case is difficult, but not impossible.

Michael Greenberger, a law professor who is director of the Center for Health and Homeland Security at the University of Maryland, said: "There will ultimately be prospective jurors who were possibly intimidated at the time but are still able to put those feelings aside."

Finding jurors willing to take a fresh look at the case could take a while, Greenberger said.

Two previous sniper trials were moved from Northern Virginia to the Hampton Roads area because of pretrial publicity.

Greenberger said the question of an unbiased jury could "ultimately be a basis of appeal that he couldn't get a fair trial."

DOJ_NMG_0027699

Byron Warnken, a law professor at the University of Baltimore School of Law, said: "The practical reality is for people who lived in this area, for people who know that he was convicted in Virginia, is it will be very difficult to find people who say, 'I'm not considering any of that.'"

But just because a juror knows about the case doesn't mean he or she can't hear the trial. "What you have to be able to do is state under oath that whatever experience you had will not inform your decision," he said.

Ryan tried to impress that point upon the 55 people questioned Monday, and the standby lawyers later expressed unhappiness with what they called Ryan's effort to "rehabilitate the potential jurors."

Still, only 21 passed the first cut and were told to return Thursday, the tentative date for picking jurors. More of the first 300 called for this trial will be questioned Tuesday and, if necessary, tomorrow.

Until Monday, Muhammad was appearing in court in a green jail jumpsuit. Monday, he wore a dark suit; a French-cuffed, blue-and-white shirt and a pale blue tie from the closets of the two standby lawyers who are men.

A simmering defense issue promises to resurface Tuesday. As of Monday, Ryan had allowed Muhammad to subpoena 28 in-state witnesses of the 178 on his handwritten list.

Muhammad wants to put his Virginia prosecutors and numerous other out-of-state witnesses on the stand, but Ryan turned him down again Monday because Muhammad had not filed the appropriate paperwork with the clerk's office.

His standby lawyers said Muhammad raised solid issues Monday. They also said he did not appear to be mentally ill, a point in dispute.

Ryan rebuffed an attempt by the Montgomery County public defender's office, which used to represent Muhammad, to submit a letter from Annapolis psychiatrist David Williamson suggesting that Muhammad was bipolar and not competent to stand trial. It was the second such diagnosis of Muhammad. The judge said it was inappropriate for the public defender to send it.

andrea.siegel@baltsun.com

Reporter Annie Linskey and the Associated Press contributed to this article.

Suspect's Notoriety Shrinks Jury Pool (WP)

By Eric Rich And Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

A remarkable number of potential jurors in a Montgomery County courtroom yesterday had what seemed to be a legitimate reason to be excused from that most dreaded of civic responsibilities.

"I think he's guilty, sir," said one, referred to in court as juror 34, under questioning by Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan.

In a back room, where they were gathered, the talk was said to be still more blunt. Several jury candidates agreed that the trial was a waste of time and that the defendant could be convicted "in 20 minutes," according to another, who reported the conversation to Ryan.

And so it went as jury selection began in the Maryland trial of John Allen Muhammad, charged in six sniper slayings in Montgomery. Most of the potential jurors questioned yesterday told Ryan that they hold Muhammad, already convicted and sentenced to die in Virginia, responsible for the random shootings in October 2002. Many said the shootings had touched them personally.

Not more than a handful of the 60 or so people questioned by Ryan said they had formed no opinion as to Muhammad's guilt. A larger number, however, said that if selected to serve they could set aside their views and base their decisions on the evidence presented in court.

By the end of the day, Ryan had picked 21 for a pool of eligible jurors, a group that is expected to be whittled down under more intensive questioning late this week.

The judge's decision to allow many of those candidates to remain in the jury pool drew protests from Muhammad, 45, whose previous motion to have the trial moved to another jurisdiction was denied. Muhammad, who is defending himself, told Ryan that he doubted that opinions held over years could be so easily set aside.

"He walked through the door with a preconceived notion," Muhammad said of one juror, "and you spoke a couple words and all the sudden -- Shazam! -- his mind's not made up anymore."

Muhammad's alleged accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo, 21, also has been convicted in Virginia and will face trial later this year in Montgomery.

One of the day's more dramatic turns occurred before jury selection began, when a man dressed in a bright red T-shirt with "WHY?" on the front lashed out at Muhammad after a discussion about the witnesses the defense hoped to call.

"I hope you rot in hell!" shouted Christopher Roberts, who said he was a relative of Conrad Johnson, a 35-year-old bus driver killed Oct. 22, 2002.

Deputies quickly grabbed Roberts by the arms and escorted him from the courtroom. "He killed my cousin, man," he told the deputies.

"You see what I was telling you," Ryan said to Muhammad as Roberts was ushered away. "That is why we have so much security. It's not just for everybody else; it's for you, too."

Muhammad replied, "That's America, your honor, freedom of speech."

Muhammad also dismissed a psychiatrist's report that his former public defenders, whom he has fired, provided to the court Friday. The report said Muhammad probably is bipolar and should be evaluated to determine his competency to stand trial.

"I read it last night," Muhammad said. "My position was I put it in the trash."

Many of the potential jurors recalled the anxiety that gripped them during those tense days, when the sniper shootings caused them to fear for their own or their children's lives. One sobbed as she described the terror that has kept her from lingering at a neighborhood gas station in Kensington since Oct. 3, 2002.

"There's nothing anyone can say that would change my opinion," said that woman, who was excused from service.

Seeing Muhammad summoned a variety of emotions, those who were excused later said.

"From what I knew and saw and heard and what he did, you'd think he'd look like a monster," said Quinn McCreary, 24, a store manager.

Amanda Abeya, 19, of Rockville said: "I hated it. I didn't even look at him."

And Margie Topps, 54, of Kensington said: "I did notice he was staring. I felt those eyes on me."

Sniper Case Jury Selection Begins (WT)

By Jon Ward, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, May 2, 2006

Jury selection in the second trial of convicted sniper John Allen Muhammad began yesterday with a difficult search for impartial minds, punctuated by a courtroom gallery outburst from one of the victim's relatives.

Muhammad, 45, is charged with six killings in Montgomery County, which were part of a three-week shooting spree in 2002 that killed 10, wounded three and caused fear throughout the region.

Montgomery County Circuit Court Judge James L. Ryan called more than 300 potential jurors and walked them through 32 yes or no questions primarily related to their ability to serve and judge impartially.

He then interviewed about 60 potential jurors individually, pressing most of them about their answers. Most potential jurors said they already thought Muhammad was guilty.

"It really made me angry at the time, and I don't think I could be impartial because of the fear inflicted on children and adults," said the first potential juror, a mother of small children. She was dismissed.

Muhammad expressed displeasure to the judge about being presumed guilty and seemed unable to grasp that preconceived notions could be put aside in order to base a judgment only on facts and evidence presented in court.

"It's one thing to have heard about it. It's another thing to already have made your mind up," Muhammad said.

A Virginia Beach jury in 2003 found Muhammad guilty of murder in the death of Dean Harold Meyers at a Manassas service station and using an accomplice, Lee Boyd Malvo, now 21, in the crime. That jury sentenced Muhammad to death. Malvo was given life without parole by a Chesapeake jury for a different killing two months after Muhammad's sentencing.

Authorities say they brought Muhammad to Maryland on the off chance something goes wrong on appeal in Virginia and to deliver justice to the families of victims at the epicenter of the shooting spree.

DOJ_NMG_0027701

Early in yesterday's proceeding, before potential jurors came into the courtroom and after a brief motions hearing, a man wearing a red T-shirt that said "Why?" stood and began yelling at Muhammad.

"I hope you rot in hell," Christopher Roberts shouted at Muhammad, who looked up briefly from his table and then back down and continued writing on a piece of paper.

Mr. Roberts, who said he was a cousin of Conrad E. Johnson, a bus driver who was the final victim in the sniper rampage, then began to hurl obscenities at Muhammad.

Sheriff's deputies forcibly removed Mr. Roberts from the courthouse, and Judge Ryan reassured Muhammad that the tight security was for his benefit.

"That's America, your honor. Freedom of speech," Muhammad said.

Outside, Mr. Roberts said Muhammad's choice to represent himself in this case is "insulting" to relatives of the shooting victims.

"It's not fair," Mr. Roberts said. "Be honest with yourself and say, 'I did a crime.' "

About 20 potential jurors were selected yesterday, and 49 must be chosen before a round of strikes narrows the pool to a jury of 12 with four alternates.

Muhammad will have 22 strikes, and the prosecution will have 11.

Opening statements are tentatively scheduled to begin Thursday. The trial is supposed to last about six weeks.

Muhammad's standby counsel, J. Wyndal Gordon, asked Judge Ryan for more leeway in helping Muhammad with jury selection.

"We're not taking over his case," Mr. Gordon said.

Judge Ryan said he would read the case that Mr. Gordon cited in support of his point, but Muhammad's reliance on his standby attorneys drew the ire of prosecutor Katherine Winfree, the county's assistant state's attorney.

Ms. Winfree also grew agitated when she saw the number of witnesses Muhammad wants to call in his defense. Muhammad submitted a list of about 150 names he wants called as witnesses, his attorneys said.

Judge Ryan initially told Muhammad that he could not subpoena out-of-state witnesses, because it was too late to do so. But the judge later read the witnesses' names to the jury pool.

Duke Case Prosecutor's Media Whirl Raises Eyebrows (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, May 2, 2006

DURHAM, N.C. — The alleged rape of a stripper by members of the Duke lacrosse team has put the spotlight on a North Carolina county prosecutor who is pushing his biggest case ever while trying to win an election.

Mike Nifong (NY-fong) is described as a tough-but-fair prosecutor by several people who have worked cases with him. Yet detractors say he has pushed ethical limits on what to say publicly about the rape case and has used the issue for political gain.

The alleged attack has roiled the community. It pits white university athletes who their lawyers say are being railroaded against a black community that is demanding justice for the accuser. At the center of it all is Nifong.

“I've never seen him do one so public like this one,” said Edward Sarvis Sr., a retired Durham police captain who has seen Nifong try a lot of cases over the years.

Sarvis said Nifong has always been a subdued, behind-the-scenes kind of prosecutor. However, in this case, Nifong has been more open, Sarvis said.

“It makes me think it's because of the upcoming election,” he said.

That election is being held today. Nifong, 55, is running in the Democratic primary for Durham County district attorney against Freda Black, a former prosecutor, and Keith Bishop, a Durham lawyer. No Republicans are seeking the office.

Nifong's campaign coordinator, Jackie Brown, says the campaign is based on experience, not politics.

“His job as a district attorney is to run the district attorney's office and to prosecute cases,” he says.

Brad Dixon, spokesman for Freda Black, says Black sees the job as more than “just a prosecutor.”

“She wants to bring community groups together to solve the community's problems,” Dixon says.

Keith Bishop says he is running because "we have a record of poor prosecution in Durham. Durham has become a revolving door for crime."

Nifong became the county's acting district attorney last year when North Carolina Gov. Mike Easley appointed him to replace Jim Hardin, who left the post to became a Superior Court judge.

Nifong has been working for the Durham County District Attorney's office since he graduated from law school in 1978. Over the next two decades, he tried scores of cases, including rapes and murders.

James "Butch" Williams, a defense lawyer representing one of the lacrosse team captains, called Nifong a "hard-nosed prosecutor," who is prepared, organized and fair-minded. But he can also be "testy," Williams said.

Williams described a drug case he tried against Nifong where Williams put his hand on Nifong's shoulder while making a point to the jury. When it was Nifong's turn, he used Williams to illustrate how police conduct a pat-down search.

"Because I did it to him, he decided to do it to me," Williams said. "He can be aggressive that way."

Lawrence Campbell, head of the Durham public defender's office, last month described Nifong's courtroom demeanor as ranging from low key to "vicious."

"He will slice you up as a witness. He takes particular delight in it," said Campbell, who has tried many cases against Nifong. "If he's pursuing this case, it's a case that he believes he can win."

Even so, some have wondered whether the heat of a political campaign has influenced a man who has never run for office.

Early on, Nifong gave at least 50 interviews to the media in which he insisted that the victim's injuries were consistent with a sexual assault. Before a grand jury had heard the allegations Nifong publicly said he believed the woman and appealed for the lacrosse players to say what happened.

Two teammates, Collin Finnerty, 19, and Reade Seligmann, 20, were indicted April 17 on charges of first-degree rape and kidnapping.

Nifong publicly discussed some of his views on the evidence, particularly the lack of DNA evidence.

"It would probably be fair to share that Mike should have been a little more circumspect with some of the comments he made early on," said Tom Lock, the district attorney for three North Carolina counties.

Lock said Nifong discussed the case with some colleagues during an early April meeting in Florida of the North Carolina Conference of District Attorneys.

Lock said Nifong "certainly seemed on top of the case," though he was also "a little surprised by the massive publicity."

Lock said Nifong's relative silence of late on the case is "probably" related to the advice he got from his fellow prosecutors.

Joseph Cheshire, a lawyer for some of the lacrosse players, said the case is hurting Durham.

"I think that it is a false accusation that has been made for some reason against these boys. And I think it has been used to hurt their lives forever and to tear this community apart," he said.

Black, a former assistant district attorney and Nifong opponent, said Nifong gave so many interviews "before all the facts are in" that he jeopardized the outcome. She said his statements stirred up the community and may have violated state ethics rules.

But Campbell said people in Durham wanted to know the case was being treated like any other, and there was a perception that members of the lacrosse team were getting special treatment.

Nifong, Campbell said, "felt compelled to respond so his constituents, and the public, would know how he felt, right or wrong."

And if he feels he is right, he will not be dissuaded, Williams said.

Williams said he and Nifong had a quiet talk away from the public attention not too long ago.

"He told me personally outside the courtroom that he thinks something happened," Williams said. "That's the kind of prosecutor he is. Once he gets that in his mind, he's hard to budge."

Duke Student's Lawyers Want D.A. Off Case (LAT)

By Richard Fausset, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, May 2, 2006

They say Mike Nifong, up for election today, has put politics ahead of the evidence in the alleged rape of a dancer.

Attorneys for a Duke University student arrested on suspicion of raping an exotic dancer demanded Monday that Dist. Atty. Mike Nifong be taken off the case, alleging in court documents that the Durham, N.C., prosecutor ignored key evidence "in his zeal to make national headlines and win a hotly contested primary."

But Nifong's supporters argued that the motion seemed motivated as much by politics as by law, coming on the eve of Nifong's bid for election to a post he was appointed to last year.

"It's just outrageous and unfortunate that things have been spun this way," said Sharon Thompson, a Durham civil attorney. "There may have been a few missteps, but Mike is not the kind of person where his whole motivation is to benefit his campaign."

The allegations were contained in a motion filed Monday on behalf of Reade William Seligmann, one of two Duke lacrosse team members indicted April 17 on charges of rape and kidnapping. Nifong said he was hoping to indict a third team member for participating in the alleged March 14 attack.

The case has also become the central issue in Nifong's effort to keep his job as Durham County's top prosecutor. Today he faces off in an election with two contenders who, like the players' attorneys, have criticized Nifong for his bold statements early in the investigation. Some of those statements, critics say, seemed to unfairly implicate Duke lacrosse players before any indictments were handed down by a grand jury.

Monday's motion — filed by attorneys J. Kirk Osborn of Chapel Hill and Ernest L. Conner Jr. of Greenville — introduced a new and unsparing tone to the criticism. The motion calls the case a "shakedown" and asserts that Nifong has been willing to "prostitute the truth" in the case to get elected.

The defense attorneys called for the appointment of an independent prosecutor. They also alleged that Nifong violated the North Carolina State Bar's Rules of Professional Conduct by potentially prejudicing the jury pool, among other things. (A spokeswoman for the state bar would not comment Monday on such complaints, saying they could only be considered if a formal complaint were filed.)

A separate motion — one of several filed Monday — asks the court to suppress the accuser's identification of the two suspects, arguing that the photo lineup that Nifong and police put her through was flawed.

It also alleges that the accuser has "serious credibility problems." The motion makes reference to a 1996 rape allegation the accuser made, which police did not pursue for reasons that are unclear. It also alleges that the accuser stated that her husband threatened to kill her in 1998, but failed to appear at a hearing to prove her allegations, ending the investigation.

Durham police were unable to verify that allegation Monday evening.

Nifong would not return calls for comment, and it is unclear what chance the motions have of succeeding in court. A more immediate question, however, was how the filing would affect his political fortunes.

For weeks, other critics have suggested that Nifong, a white candidate, was pursuing the Duke case to make political gains in a county that is about 38% African American. The accuser, a 27-year-old college student, is black, whereas all but one of the Duke lacrosse members are white.

But a number of Durham lawyers — prosecutors and defense attorneys — have scoffed at the idea that Nifong would play politics with such a serious matter.

Brian Aus, a Durham defense attorney, noted that Nifong shied away from politics for most of his 25-plus years in the district attorney's office. Last year, however, the top district attorney post opened up, and North Carolina Gov. Michael F. Easley, a Democrat, appointed Nifong, who by that time had tried more than 300 felony cases.

For the first time, Nifong has had to campaign to keep his job.

"But he is not a political figure," Aus said. "He's stayed in the past away from politics. The only reason I can see that he's politically involved these days is because the governor appointed him to the job, and now he wants to keep it. But I don't believe there was any political idea regarding these indictments."

Over the years, Nifong earned a reputation among many Durham criminal attorneys as a tough prosecutor, but also a fair one: Aus said Nifong often gave the defense access to files beyond those he was required to turn over under North Carolina discovery laws.

DOJ_NMG_0027704

Indeed, Nifong counts a number of the dozen or so lawyers on the Duke defense team among his friends and supporters: One of them, Bill Thomas II, gave $1,000 to Nifong's reelection campaign in January, records show. Another, James D. "Butch" Williams, endorses him on Nifong's campaign website.

While some of the players' attorneys criticized Nifong's specific actions in the Duke case in recent weeks, they continued to vouch for his fitness for public office. But Nifong's refusal to meet with some of them and hear exculpatory evidence has been a source of frustration.

Nifong's opponents, both of whom are private attorneys, present potential problems for him. Keith Bishop has no prosecutorial experience, but he is black, and was recently endorsed by an influential African American political group, the Durham Committee on the Affairs of Black People. Freda Black is a former prosecutor who won a conviction in the murder trial of novelist Michael Peterson in 2003.

Black has raised more money than Nifong — about $45,000 to his $32,000, according to campaign finance records. (Bishop's records were not on file with the State Board of Elections.)

Today's election is a Democratic primary; no Republicans are running. If no candidate gets more than 40% of the votes, the top two vote-getters will go to a May 30 runoff. A new district attorney would take office Jan. 1.

In that scenario, Nifong could continue to pursue the case for months, but a successor might take the case to trial. Neither of Nifong's challengers has said whether they would drop or pursue the case if elected — but Nifong's supporters said they were sure defense lawyers would be happier trying the case against a different district attorney.

CIVIL LAW:

U.S. Says It Overpaid Delta For Tickets (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal Staff Reporter

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

The U.S. government said it overpaid Delta Air Lines more than $26 million for tickets used by military personnel and accused the airline of overcharging it an additional $240,000 for tickets bought in the past three years.

The disclosures were made Friday in documents filed with the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Manhattan, where Delta has sued to force the government to pay nearly $19 million for flights provided mainly to U.S. Army personnel. The government, in response, asked a judge to throw out Delta's lawsuit, saying it has the right to deduct past overcharges and overpayments from current obligations to Delta.

A Delta spokesman in Atlanta didn't respond to a request for comment. Its quarrel with the government stems from a probe by the Government Accountability Office, which found that military personnel misused a fly-now-pay-later system operated by the Department of Defense. Delta, which has been in bankruptcy reorganization since September, has said it's transporting military personnel at a cost of $117,000 a day without indication that it will ever receive anything in return.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Chicago Schools Reach Desegregation Agreement (CHIT)

By Lori Olszewski And David Mendell, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, May 2, 2006

With the historic legal battle to integrate America's big-city schools being abandoned across the nation, the Chicago schools and the federal government have reached a tentative agreement that would release the district from 26 years of federal oversight on desegregation efforts by the 2007-08 school year.

The settlement, filed jointly Monday in U.S. District Court, effectively allows the school system to decide on its own, without federal intervention, how much money and resources to devote toward integrating its schools. School officials maintain that desegregation will remain a primary objective.

DOJ_NMG_0027705

Under the agreement, the admission process for Chicago's magnet and selective enrollment schools will remain for at least two more school years.

The tentative pact represents a retreat by the Justice Department from its more aggressive stance toward the district on equity issues in recent years, although it does keep Chicago under its scrutiny one year longer than school officials wanted.

As recently as five months ago, Justice Department attorneys opposed Chicago's bid to be released from court oversight at the end of this school year, citing a long list of transgressions. But the trend nationally has been to release districts from longstanding court orders, after the Supreme Court ruled in 1991 that districts have to desegregate only "to the extent practicable."

"This decree like most around the country is on its last legs," said Harvey Grossman, legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Illinois.

With the student body less than 9 percent white, Chicago school leaders have argued that it is nearly impossible to integrate the entire system. In fact, officials made the same arguments in 1980, when nearly 20 percent of Chicago school students were white. Today, the dearth of white students in urban districts is a contributing factor in why so many desegregation lawsuits are being abandoned.

African-American students, who represented 61 percent of the district in 1980, still are the largest group at almost 50 percent. The percentage of Latinos has doubled, from 19 percent to 38 percent.

The latest agreement still requires the approval of U.S. District Judge Charles P. Kocoras, who has scheduled a hearing on it for 9:30 a.m. Thursday. Kocoras had planned two weeks of public hearings on the case to begin May 15. Those hearings, which would be averted under the settlement, were expected to spotlight the district's long and controversial history of how it has handled integration and the allocation of its resources.

Although the school district has spent at least $2.5 billion on desegregation in the last 26 years, most of the city's black and Latino children still attend class in racially isolated schools that mirror the city's segregated housing patterns.

What little integration there is occurs in the city's magnet schools, where admission is determined by a racially weighted lottery, and in other special schools that screen for academic qualifications while also considering race and ethnicity. These remain some of the most desirable schools because they tend to have higher test scores and extra programs.

School officials said they are committed to integration, even without the federal government monitoring those efforts through the courts.

"Our goal is to maintain the diversity we have achieved and to expand that if we can," said Patrick Rocks, chief legal counsel for the school system.

Schools chief Arne Duncan promised that the system will continue to provide extra academic support in racially isolated schools and will preserve its integrated magnet and selective enrollment schools.

"This is core to my values and how I was raised," said Duncan, who attended the private, racially integrated University of Chicago Laboratory Schools in Hyde Park.

"We can spend hundreds of thousands dollars less on lawyers and put it in the schools. Money that went to legal fees will be spent on the students."

Duncan estimated the case has cost more than $1 million in the last four years.

Being under court supervision did provide Chicago with some protection from possible lawsuits, attorneys said. Some parents in other districts have challenged race-based admissions criteria.

For that reason, Duncan said the schools will undertake an extensive review of its magnet and selective enrollment admissions policies and may propose a new system after the case ends. It would not be effective until the 2008-09 school year at the earliest, Rocks said.

Rocks said he cannot guarantee that racial weights will stay in the new admissions policy but said recent court decisions have upheld racial considerations if there is a compelling educational reason.

Race-neutral considerations, such as family income and education levels, are not always sufficient to increase diversity, Rocks said.

DOJ_NMG_0027706

The agreement filed Monday replaces one approved in March 2004 that also was supposed to lead to the end of federal oversight. That agreement was the first change in the district's desegregation plan since it negotiated a 1980 settlement. The Justice Department had sued Chicago to force it to integrate, and the voluntary settlement avoided a lengthy legal battle. Chicago never admitted segregating its schools.

The 2004 decree had a host of more stringent reporting requirements that caused friction between Justice Department lawyers and the school district.

"We were very quickly, after that decree was entered, fighting over details," Rocks said. "I think it just proved to be unworkable."

The Justice Department declined to comment Monday on the new agreement.

Alonzo Rivas, an attorney with the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, who has watched the case, said he wonders if Chicago will keep up its commitment to diversity once no outside body is watching over it.

For example, the district failed to offer any African-American or Latino children the opportunity to transfer into largely white schools in the 2004-05 school year before the court ordered it to do so.

Others in the community also have expressed concern about whether the district spends equally on its neighborhood schools and on magnet and special schools.

"I am not sure one more year is enough time to answer all this," Rivas said.

lolszewski@tribune.com

dmendell@tribune.com

Ruling Ends 8-year Federal Control Of La. Juvenile Prisons (AP)

AP, May 2, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La. -- Louisiana's juvenile prisons, once a byword for beatings and chaotic brawls, are on the road to reform and no longer need oversight from the federal courts, a federal district judge ruled Monday.

The U.S. Justice Department sued the state in 1998, saying conditions inside the lockups were unconstitutional. Judge James Brady's dismissal of the suit Monday came after Justice Department experts determined that reform efforts have made the lockups safer and better at rehabilitating the teen prisoners they house.

"I don't say this lightly: Louisiana has emerged as a model for juvenile justice systems in this country," said Judy Preston, deputy chief of special litigation and the department's expert on youth prison systems.

True reform efforts started in the 2003 Legislature with a commitment to shifting punishment of delinquent youth from imprisonment to less harsh settings like group homes and to closing the youth prison at Tallulah, which was pointed to as an example of brutality. Experts say the move to less prisonlike settings improves the chances of rehabilitation.

When she took office in 2004, Gov. Kathleen Blanco, who backed the reform efforts, ordered the creation of a new state agency, within the Department of Corrections, to deal with youthful offenders. The corrections department had previously been responsible for juveniles, housing and punishing them in a way similar to its treatment of adult convicts.

Brady's ruling will have little practical effect on how the state's three youth prisons operate, but Blanco hailed it as proof that her reforms are succeeding. Blanco said the state's old juvenile justice system was so full of violence and fear that inmates left them more dangerous and more likely to commit crimes. They are now more humane, she said, with programs for education, mental health and substance abuse problems, preparing the prisoners for a return to the outside world.

"Louisiana is not throwing its children away," Blanco said at a news conference outside the courthouse.

The Justice Department filed the lawsuit with the Louisiana Juvenile Justice Project, a nonprofit activist group that has long been critical of the prisons. David Utter, the group's director, called Brady's ruling "a great first step," but said complete reform is a distant goal.

"We still have a lot of work to do," Utter said.

Simon Gonsoulin, chief of the state's juvenile justice system, said his agency plans to have reforms complete by 2008, with all of its prisoners living in small groups of about a dozen inside homelike buildings, instead of cellblocks. His agency has a budget of $140 million in Blanco's proposed 2006-2007 budget, up from $136 million this year.

DOJ_NMG_0027707

At the Jetson prison, near Baton Rouge, the average dorm population is 15 youths, down from 36 before the reforms began, Gonsoulin said.

Raids Net 66 Linked To Human Trafficking (WT/AP)

By Wayne Parry, Associated Press

The Washington Times, May 2, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. -- Federal agents yesterday rounded up 66 persons in a series of raids that officials said smashed a suspected human-trafficking ring that smuggled Mexicans into the United States and may have forced the women to work as prostitutes in the Washington area.

Officers with the U.S. Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) raided 15 locations in Union City, West New York and New York City early yesterday after New Jersey State Police pulled over two vehicles containing at least 10 women who worked in brothels in Maryland, Virginia and the District, said Kyle Hutchins, special agent in charge of the bureau's Newark office.

"How many were doing it willingly, we don't know," he said. "We believe some of them had been trafficked."

Agents were trying to interview as many of the women as possible yesterday afternoon, a process Mr. Hutchins said would be time-consuming.

The operation was at least the fourth major alien-smuggling ring operating in New Jersey in recent years. Prosecutions involving Russian strippers forced to work in go-go bars, and young Honduran women forced to work as hostesses in Union City bars are ongoing in federal court.

Mr. Hutchins said authorities were trying to determine whether the latest suspected ring was connected to either of the previous smuggling rings.

None of the prostitution involving the Mexican women took place in New Jersey, authorities said. Rather, when their weekly or monthly shifts in Washington-area brothels was finished, the women would be transported to northern New Jersey and New York by van, Mr. Hutchins said.

Thirty-six women and 30 men were taken into custody. All but two were being held on immigration charges for being in the United States illegally, Mr. Hutchins said.

Two brothers, Jose Luis Notario Guzman, 50, and Jose Ignacio Notario Guzman, 46, were held yesterday without bail. The older brother is in the country legally; his younger brother is not, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

Jose Luis Notario Guzman faces three charges: conspiracy to harbor illegal aliens, operating an unlicensed money-transfer business and bulk cash smuggling.

His brother was charged with operating an unlicensed money-transfer business.

The older brother owned the safe house in Union City where the women were kept after being taken by van from the Washington area, according to the federal complaint.

It said authorities began investigating after they noticed vehicles with out-of-state plates dropping women at his apartment on Sunday nights and Monday mornings.

Authorities traced the license plates and determined they had been used to transport prostitutes to and from brothels in New York City, Maryland and other areas, the complaint said.

Immigration officials also said Jose Luis Notario Guzman regularly transported money, including proceeds of prostitution, from Newark to Mexico City by using couriers.

The younger brother operates a bodega in West New York, where authorities said he stored and sold large amounts of condoms and illegal abortion-inducing drugs made in Mexico that were used in the prostitution operation.

An informant told authorities that he witnessed Jose Ignacio Notario Guzman remove the items from a drop ceiling in the store, the complaint said.

The public defender for Jose Luis Notario Guzman, Esther Salas, declined to comment after a court hearing in which the brothers were told of the charges.

DOJ_NMG_0027708

The public defender for Jose Ignacio Notario Guzman, Paul Condon, said his client is not guilty of the money-transfer charge.

The arrests came the same day that illegal aliens and their supporters gathered around the nation to protest, boycotting work, school and shopping to show their importance to the country.

Jason Taylor's Stabbing Incident Being Charged As Hate Crime (FLSUNSEN)

By Alex Marvez And Marlene Naanes, Sun-sentinel.com

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, May 2, 2006

Dolphins defensive end/outside linebacker Jason Taylor suffered a minor stab wound Sunday night in a road-rage incident, according to Davie police.

Redmond Charles Burns of Davie was arrested on three charges, including aggravated battery/hate crime, after allegedly assaulting Taylor.

"My wife and I were the victims of an unfortunate incident last night but we are both fine," Taylor said Monday in a statement released by his charity foundation. "I truly appreciate everyone's concern."

Seth Levit, who is the Jason Taylor Foundation spokesman, said the cut Taylor suffered on his left forearm was so minor that he wasn't even wearing a bandage while playing in a golf tournament in Tampa on Monday morning to benefit the charity foundation of Tampa Bay Buccaneers linebacker Derrick Brooks.

According to a Davie police report, Taylor and his wife Katina were driving south on Flamingo Road when he noticed a red pickup truck coming toward his car as it backed up eastbound across State Road 84's westbound lanes. Taylor honked at the truck and the two vehicles avoided a crash.

Taylor was then driving behind the truck, which was traveling at 10 miles per hour, when he tried to pass on the left. As Taylor passed, the truck intentionally swerved toward him, causing his car to run off the road.

The truck and Taylor's car stopped at Southwest 130th Avenue and Eighth Street. The report states an unidentified passenger in the truck then got out and banged on Taylor's car trunk.

Burns, who was driving the truck, also emerged and used racial obscenities and threatened to kill Taylor. The 5-11, 168-pound Burns then retrieved an unknown metal object from his truck and tried to stab the 6-6, 255-pound Taylor, the report said.

As he backed away from Burns, Taylor was cut on his left forearm.

Taylor drove after the truck, calling 911 in the process, after it fled but lost site of the vehicle inside a trailer park. Taylor later identified Burns from a photo lineup, leading to his apprehension at a trailer in the 13200 block of SW 7th Place.

During the arrest, Burns kicked and punched an officer and later kicked at a window in a police car until being pepper-sprayed by officers, the report said.

Besides the battery charge, the 24-year-old Burns also was arrested for resisting with and without violence. The truck passenger was not charged.

Taylor declined further comment on the incident.

In December 2003, Taylor was identified by the FBI as being one of six active or retired professional athletes to receive a hate letter threatening him with physical harm for being married to a white woman. Katina Taylor is the sister of Dolphins middle linebacker Zach Thomas.

An FBI spokesman said similar letters were sent to prominent black politicians, entertainers and business leaders in a two-year span.

Taylor, 31, is set to enter his 10th season with the Dolphins as one of the NFL's top defensive players. Taylor began his charity foundation in July 2004 with the focus on helping children in need with improved health care, education and quality of life.

NLV On Track For Meeting ADA Rules (LVS)

By Brian Wargo, Las Vegas Sun

Las Vegas Sun, May 2, 2006

Thousands to be spent on fixing dozens of violations

Seven months after North Las Vegas reached a tentative agreement with the Justice Department over violations of the Americans with Disabilities Act, the city is putting its money where its mouth is.

North Las Vegas plans to award a contract Wednesday to spend nearly $350,000 for wheelchair-accessible ramps, sidewalks and other safety improvements for the disabled at more than 133 locations around schools and older sections of the city.

The contract is part of the city's plan to spend more than $600,000 this year and similar amounts during its next two budgets to comply with the 1990 federal law requiring local governments to improve the disabled's access to government programs and access on government property.

In September, North Las Vegas reached an agreement with the Justice Department over the city's long-standing violations of the federal law. The agreement helped the city avoid potential fines of up to $55,000 for a first violation and $110,000 for subsequent violations.

"We are well on our way to compliance," said City Manager Gregory Rose. "Beyond that, it is the right thing to do. We want to ensure all of our citizens, regardless whether they have a handicap, have access."

Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland said North Las Vegas is on schedule to correct the violations. City officials said North Las Vegas already has spent thousands of dollars to fix dozens of violations.

North Las Vegas came under fire from the Justice Department after a January 2004 federal review of 75 percent of the city's parks and facilities found 182 ADA violations.

The violations included the absence of accessible drinking fountains, a need for restroom improvements and a need to alter sidewalks where street lights or signage hindered the mobility of wheelchair users.

Under the ADA, since 1992, when streets are constructed or resurfaced, cities have been required to reconfigure sidewalks and curbs to accommodate wheelchairs.

Rose said the $2 million that the city has budgeted for the improvements is the minimum amount needed to meet ADA requirements, but the city plans to surpass that amount.

"The improvements are way overdue," said North Las Vegas Councilman William Robinson. "We are taking a proactive role to meet their mandate."

A year ago two hearing-impaired people sued in federal court, saying North Las Vegas violated their civil rights. They said police failed to provide a sign language interpreter or to communicate in writing following their arrests on two unrelated traffic cases in 2003 and 2004.

Since the lawsuit was filed, the city moved to comply with a Justice Department request by hiring sign language interpreters. Brian Wargo can be reached at 259-4011 or at wargo@lasvegassun.com.

First EEOC Racial Bias Suit Against Movie Studio Can Proceed (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, May 2, 2006

The first racial discrimination case brought by the government against a movie studio can proceed to trial, a federal judge ruled.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission sued Universal Pictures in 2003, claiming that a first assistant director on the film "2 Fast 2 Furious" was fired because he was black.

The studio has denied the allegation and asked the court to dismiss the case.

But late Wednesday, U.S. District Judge Gary Allen Feess ruled that the commission's lawsuit contained sufficient evidence to allow a jury to decide the case.

The lawsuit was filed on behalf of Frank Davis, 47, who worked on the film under director John Singleton, who is also black. The lawsuit claims Davis was fired without cause even after Singleton objected.

"Singleton adamantly asserts that Davis was performing satisfactorily and that Singleton would have terminated Davis had he not performed," Feess wrote in his decision.

DOJ_NMG_0027710

"These facts, among many others, raise a genuine issue for trial regarding the true motive for Davis' termination and could support an inference that he was terminated because of race," the judge wrote.

Universal said witnesses have testified that Davis was replaced solely for his inadequate performance as first assistant director.

"For '2 Fast 2 Furious,' Universal Pictures assembled one of the most diverse casts and crews ever and did not and would not single out any individual for replacement because of his race," Universal spokeswoman Cindy Gardner said.

The trial is set to begin June 27.

The commission had been looking for an opportunity to investigate hiring practices in the entertainment industry, said Anna Park, lead attorney for the Los Angeles office of the EEOC.

"We would hear complaints all the time. But it has taken until now for someone to finally come forward. People were too afraid," she said.

Davis had been working as an assistant director since 1992 and was hired by Singleton to work on "2 Fast 2 Furious," the commission complaint said.

Singleton, who had worked with Davis on a previous film, said in the complaint that he thought Davis was "discharged because of his race."

Universal said Davis could not handle his duties on a complicated, big-budget film that contained many action sequences and stunts.

The commission is asking for damages of as much as $8 million, including back pay and punitive damages. The commission also wants federal monitoring of the studio's hiring practices.

Jury Considers Hate-crime Award (CHIT)

By Matt O'Connor

Chicago Tribune, May 2, 2006

In an unemotional voice, Deona Williams recounted Monday how she cried hysterically and begged for her life as three skinheads cornered her one summer night in 2002, shouted racial epithets and held a knife to her throat.

"I was so scared," said Deona, an African-American who was 14 and about to start high school when the assault took place in Fox Lake. "I was thinking either they're going to kill me or try to rape me."

The testimony came at a federal trial at which the only issue for the all-woman jury to decide is how much in monetary damages should be awarded to Deona, now 17, and her family. A judge already has found the three white defendants legally liable for their actions.

Two of the defendants, Harley Hermes and Michael Canlas, portrayed themselves in court Monday as changed young men who regretted their conduct. "I've grown up a lot since this incident," Canlas, who has no lawyer, said in a brief opening statement.

The third defendant, Shaun Derifield, didn't show up for the trial.

All three were convicted of criminal offenses for the hate crime and served time.

The lawsuit appears to be more of a symbolic battle for the family because none of the three defendants apparently has any significant assets or income. Hermes said he owns only a truck with 100,000 miles on it. At the time the suit was filed in 2004, a lawyer for the family said the litigation was intended to deter other hate crimes.

Testimony concluded in one day in U.S. District Judge Samuel Der-Yeghiayan's courtroom. Closing arguments are set for Tuesday morning.

Among those to testify were Deona's parents, Phyllis Williams and Jimmy Gilmore, who spoke how the assault changed the personalities of their three youngest children, caused them to be overprotective parents and turned their dream house into a nightmare.

Deona and her twin brothers, Tywon and Juwon, then 15, were walking home from a high school football game when the three defendants chased after them, screaming epithets and death threats. Derifield and Canlas brandished knives.

DOJ_NMG_0027711

The brothers escaped, but Deona was cornered. As Derifield held a knife to her throat, law enforcement authorities said he warned: "Remember our faces, [racial epithet]. This is our town and you better get out before we kill you!"

In testifying Monday, Hermes acknowledged he was nervous at the time that Derifield might cut Deona with the knife, yet in a statement to the court just 2½ months ago, he flatly denied seeing a knife held to her throat.

Phyllis Williams said the ordeal devastated her and her three youngest children. Deona gained 75 to 100 pounds within 1½ years of the assault and her grades dropped. Tywon, who had been energetic and athletic, quit playing sports, rebelled against authority figures and became argumentative and angry, his mother said. Juwon, who had always been quiet, withdrew even further, she said.

Phyllis Williams said she became quick to blame racism for everyday slights and grew fearful out in public whether the defendants might be present.

"I don't know if they're in the store with me or if they're going to do this again," she said in a voice choked with emotion.

Hermes and his grandmother, Kittye Hermes of Glenview, both testified about how his childhood was chaotic because both his natural mother and stepmother were drug addicts. He was kicked out of his home when he was 12, he said.

Hermes' lawyer, Beau Greiman, told jurors that Hermes wasn't trying to make excuses for his role in the attack but wanted to give a complete picture of his life "to understand he's not a monster."

"There's reasons why he ended up where he ended up on Aug. 30, 2002," Greiman said.

Beyond Chastity Belts (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

Abortion may be the single most polarizing issue in America today, but there's one thing Democrats and Republicans mostly agree on: it would be better if Americans had fewer abortions.

The best way to reduce the number of abortions, in turn, would be to reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies. Every year, Americans have three million unplanned pregnancies, leading to 1.3 million abortions.

So it should be a no-brainer that we increase access to contraception, and in particular make the "morning after" pill available over the counter. That would be the single simplest step to reduce the U.S. abortion rate, while also helping hundreds of thousands of women avert unwanted pregnancies.

Plan B, the emergency contraceptive, normally prevents pregnancy when taken within 72 hours of unprotected sex — although it is most effective when taken within 24 hours. It is now available in most of the U.S. only by prescription, but the American Medical Association and the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists have both endorsed it for over-the-counter use.

President Bush's Food and Drug Administration has blocked that, apparently fearing that better contraception will encourage promiscuity. But unless the libidophobes in the administration mandate chastity belts, their opposition to Plan B amounts to a pro-abortion policy.

One study, now a bit dated, found that if emergency contraceptives were widely available in the U.S., there would be 800,000 fewer abortions each year. And even though they are generally available only by prescription, emergency contraceptives averted 51,000 abortions in 2000, according to the Guttmacher Institute.

That's one of the paradoxes in the abortion debate: The White House frequently backs precisely the policies that cause America to have one of the highest abortion rates in the West. Compared with other countries, the U.S. lags in sex education and in availability of contraception — financing for contraception under the Title X program has declined 59 percent in constant dollars since 1980 — so we have higher unintended pregnancy rates and abortion rates.

Germany, the Netherlands and Belgium have abortion rates only one-third of America's, and France's is half of America's. France has made a particular push for emergency contraception to lower its abortion rate by making free morning-after pills available to French teenagers, without informing the parents. Nurses in French junior high and high schools are authorized to hand out emergency contraception pills.

DOJ_NMG_0027712

That broad availability is the global pattern. While American women cannot normally obtain emergency contraception without a prescription (by which time the optimal 24-hour window has often passed), it is available without a prescription in much of the rest of the world, from Albania to Tunisia, from Belgium to Britain.

One thought that paralyzes the Bush administration is that American teenage girls might get easy access to emergency contraception and turn into shameless hussies. But contraception generally doesn't cause sex, any more than umbrellas cause rain.

The reality is that almost two-thirds of American girls have lost their virginity by the time they turn 18 — and one-quarter use no contraception their first time. Some 800,000 American teenagers become pregnant each year, 80 percent of the time unintentionally.

So we may wince at the thought of a 15-year-old girl obtaining Plan B after unprotected sex. But why does the White House prefer to imagine her pregnant?

Indeed, Plan B may be more important for teenagers than for adults, because adults are more likely to rely on a regular contraceptive. Teenagers wing it.

Granted, making contraceptives available — all kinds, not just Plan B — presents a mixed message. We encourage young people to abstain from sex, and then provide condoms in case they don't listen. But that's because we understand human nature: We also tell drivers not to speed, but provide air bags in case they do.

The administration's philosophy seems to be that the best way to discourage risky behavior is to take away the safety net. Hmmm. I suppose that if we replaced air bags with sharpened spikes on dashboards, people might drive more carefully — but it still doesn't seem like a great idea.

So let's give American women the same rights that they would have if they were Albanians or Tunisians, and make Plan B available over the counter. It's time for President Bush to end his policies that encourage abortions.

Phantom Constituents Behind Bars (NYT)

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

Demographers and voting rights advocates are rightly pressuring the Census Bureau to begin counting the nation's 1.4 million prison inmates at their home communities — and not as "residents" of the prisons, the current practice. Counting the inmates at prison inflates the prison community's population and political influence, while draining political clout from the communities where inmates actually live.

Most Americans aren't aware that prisoners are counted as part of the population in the electoral district where they serve time — even though they often live hundreds of miles away and are barred from voting in all but two states. But recent evidence shows that voters in nonprison communities become outraged when they learn that nonvoting prison populations in adjacent districts are being leveraged against them. When made aware of the scheme, voters typically demand that the inmates be dropped from the district count so as not to skew local legislative authority. But state legislatures inevitably include inmates in the count when drawing state legislative districts, which shifts political power from the places were inmates actually live to the prison districts.

The Census Bureau balked and raised unconvincing excuses recently when Congress asked it to consider a system that would count inmates at home instead of at prison. But the prison census controversy is a potentially explosive issue whose time has clearly come.

The bureau should get busy on a system for counting inmates where they live as opposed to where they do time.

ANTITRUST:

Phone Firms' Bid To Ease Cable Push Hits Senate Snag (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027713

WASHINGTON -- Phone companies' bid for help in getting into the cable-television business faster hit a snag yesterday, when a key Senate lawmaker introduced sweeping telecom legislation that would do many things -- except establish a national video franchise.

Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens (R., Alaska) offered long-awaited legislation without including the Bell companies' top wish: the ability to bypass local governments when offering pay-television service.

Reaction from the Bells to Mr. Stevens's effort was lukewarm. The committee's top Democrat, Hawaii Sen. Daniel Inouye, released a statement saying he agreed to sign on to the legislation, but noting that his "co-sponsorship ... is not a demonstration of support for the bill itself."

Mr. Stevens's decision to introduce a telecom-rewrite bill may make it more difficult for the Bells to get changes to the law this year to help them enter the cable business faster. In the House, lawmakers have been receptive to the Bells' pleas, and a bill dealing with the cable issue could reach a full vote in a few weeks. Differences between the two bills -- and the short legislative year -- could doom the prospects for telecom overhaul this year.

Unlike the House bill, the legislation doesn't establish a national video franchise, although it would set a 30-day deadline for local governments to decide on an application by a phone or cable company to offer local video service.

It is far-reaching in other areas, setting rules that would open unused television-broadcast spectrum for unlicensed wireless gadgets, bar cable companies from entering into exclusive deals to show sports events, and allow cities and counties to offer high-speed Internet access.

The bill places the issue of "net neutrality," or concerns that phone and cable companies will discriminate against some Internet sites or limit how consumers use the Internet, with the Federal Communications Commission.

The bill's introduction kicks off the Senate debate about telecom issues, although it is unclear how far the effort will get. Two hearings will be set during the next few weeks to discuss the bill, according to a committee aide, and a markup could come after the Memorial Day recess.

Google Concerned About Microsoft Browser (AP)

By Allison Linn, Ap Business Writer

AP, May 2, 2006

SEATTLE -- Google Inc. is hoping to pressure Microsoft Corp. into changing a new Internet Explorer browser feature that could direct more people to Microsoft's online search engine instead of Google's far more popular offering.

Google has informally complained to U.S. and European antitrust regulators about what it says are biased settings on Microsoft's latest Web browser, marking the latest spat between two companies whose business models are increasingly bumping up against one another.

Mountain View, Calif.-based Google regards Microsoft as the biggest threat to its continued success, and Microsoft has conceded that Goggle is a formidable competitor as well.

The next version of Internet Explorer, available now in test form, includes a box in the corner that lets people perform an Internet search without going to a separate Web page, much like what's available from Google's downloadable "toolbar."

Users who download IE 7 will be assigned a search engine preference based on the AutoSearch function from the previous version of IE, which is likely to be MSN Search. Google says it's concerned that Microsoft's own search engine is getting favored treatment, and said research it has sponsored shows that it's difficult to change the settings in the new browser to a rival search engine.

"The market favors open choice for search, and companies should compete for users based on their quality of search services," Marissa Mayer, Google's vice president of search products and user experience, said Monday.

Gary Schare, director of product management for Internet Explorer, said Redmond-based Microsoft's goal is to let users choose the search engine they want. He also said Microsoft's feedback has shown that it's not difficult to change to a different search engine.

"MSN has a certain amount of (market) share. This is not designed to change this," Schare said. "This is designed to essentially keep the status quo."

DOJ_NMG_0027714

Internet Explorer's main competitors, Firefox and Opera, both include similar boxes with the default search engine set to Google, although users can change to another provider.

Google said it has talked about the browser feature with the U.S. Department of Justice and European Union regulators, although it has not filed any formal complaints.

Microsoft fought a long-running antitrust case with the Justice Department, and is awaiting a ruling on its appeal of an EU antitrust ruling against it. In both cases, competitors claimed that the company was using the dominance of its Windows operating system to wield influence over other markets, squelching competition. IE 7 will ship with the next version of Microsoft's Windows operating system, and also will be available for free download.

Analyst Rob Enderle said he thinks Google's complaints signal that the company is getting more aggressive in its competition against Microsoft, although he doesn't think the search box poses any serious threat to Google's business.

He added that Google's move was interesting in that, while Microsoft dominates the computer operating system market, Google is the dominant search engine provider. Nielsen/Net Ratings reported that Google had 49 percent of the U.S. search market share in March, compared with nearly 11 percent for Microsoft's MSN Search.

"Once you start raising unfairness questions, and you're the dominant player, then it would be very easy for somebody to use those arguments against you," Enderle said.

*__

AP Business Writer Michael Liedtke in San Francisco contributed to this report.

Google Expresses Concerns Over New Microsoft Browser (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Jonathan Thaw

Bloomberg, May 2, 2006

May 1 (Bloomberg) -- Google Inc., the most-used Internet search engine, expressed concerns to the European Commission over Microsoft Corp.'s new Internet browser, which directs Web surfers to Microsoft's search site.

Google raised the concern as part of a European Commission investigation into Vista, the next version of Microsoft's Windows operating system, Steve Langdon, a spokesman for Mountain View, California-based Google, said today in an interview.

``In those discussions, we have expressed our concerns that Microsoft's approach to setting search defaults in IE 7.0 benefits Microsoft while taking away choice from users," Langdon said.

Microsoft is ``fully committed" to supporting search-engine options in Internet explorer and will ensure users can easily choose from a very long list, Microsoft spokeswoman Stacy Drake McCredy said in an e-mailed statement.

The tussle highlights Google's concern that Redmond, Washington-based Microsoft may be able to gain Internet traffic by directing people to its own search engine. Microsoft handled 11 percent of U.S. searches in March, compared with Google's 49 percent, according to market research Nielsen//NetRatings.

Shares of Google fell $19.04, or 4.6 percent, to $398.90 at 4 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. They have fallen 3.8 percent this year. Microsoft shares rose 14 cents to $24.29 and have fallen 7.1 percent this year.

Google brought up the concerns over Internet Explorer with the U.S. Justice Department and European Commission, the New York Times reported today.

Google Expresses Concerns Over Microsoft's Internet Explorer (MERCN)

By Elise Ackerman

The San Jose Mercury News, May 2, 2006

Google accused Microsoft of not playing fair in its quest for a bigger share of the $10 billion online advertising market on Monday and revealed that it has shared its concerns with antitrust regulators in the United States and Europe.

Google's gripe: An upcoming release of Microsoft's Internet Explorer Web browser will contain a search box that in some cases defaults to the MSN search engine.

As a result, Microsoft might be able to persuade more people to use its search technology and potentially win a larger share of the extremely lucrative market for Internet advertising.

Someone who wants to use Google to find information on the Internet would be forced to choose the Mountain View-based company from a list of almost two dozen other search providers.

``Our biggest concern is for the users," said Marissa Mayer, vice president search products and user experience, in a written statement prepared for reporters. ``The market favors open choice for search, and companies should compete for users based on the quality of their search services."

The dispute illustrates how the importance of the browser has diminished in the wake of the epic anti-trust battles involving Microsoft and the rest of the tech industry. Now, the focus is on search technology, which matches advertising with search results.

Still, Google's protest puzzled some observers, who noted that the objectionable feature was nearly identical to the search box of FireFox, an open-source browser with 10 to 13 percent of the U.S. market.

Last week, Google took the unusual step of promoting the FireFox browser, which defaults to Google's search engine, on its home page. People who use FireFox who want a search powered by MSN have to choose it from a list that includes rival search engines, as well as Wikipedia's online encyclopedia and Merriam Webster's online dictionary.

Gary Schare, the Microsoft executive overseeing marketing for the new browser, Internet Explorer 7, said in an interview that Microsoft had consulted with search engines around the world and received ``universal positive feedback" -- except for Google.

Schare also noted that the new browser is built to default to whatever search engine a person is currently using, whether it is Google or Ask.com. People who download the new browser, which is now available for testing, might not even realize that the controversial default exists, he said.

In addition, people who buy personal computers preloaded with Microsoft's software, will also not necessarily encounter the MSN default when they click the small search box built into the top of their browser. That is because computer manufacturers are free to set the default to any search engine they choose in accordance with deals they have struck with companies like Google and Yahoo.

In February, Dell confirmed it was trying out a partnership with Google to bundle Google's toolbar and desktop search software on its machines.

Keith Hylton, professor at the Boston University School of Law, said such deals showed ``there's a lot of room for competition here."

But Ralph Palumbo, a Seattle attorney who has sued Microsoft twice for anticompetitive practices, said default settings ``are tremendously important" and that Google was right to raise concerns before Microsoft's new browser is released.

In October 2005, Microsoft agreed to pay RealNetworks $761 million in response to allegations that Microsoft had used its monopoly power to keep computer makers from installing RealNetwork's media player.

In 2001, a federal appeals court ruled that Microsoft had abused its monopoly over operating-system software. Since then, Microsoft has paid hundreds of millions of dollars to companies and individuals who claimed they were hurt by its business practices.

And the legal battles continue. Last week, Microsoft's lawyers appeared in front of the European Union's highest court to challenge a 2004 antitrust ruling by the European Commission that included a record $613 million fine.

``Microsoft is vulnerable because of bad behavior," said Joe Wilcox, an analyst with Jupiter Research.

However, in the dispute over search defaults, both Google and Microsoft appear to be vying for any advantage they can get over the other.

While Microsoft remains the undisputed leader in operating system and browser software, its MSN search engine lags both Google and Yahoo, handling only 11 percent of U.S. searches in March, compared to Yahoo's 22 percent and Google's 49 percent, according to Nielsen//NetRatings.

Yet Google Chief Executive Eric Schmidt has said repeatedly that he views Microsoft as Google's main foe. If Microsoft could increase its share of searches, it has the ability to deliver advertising to an audience that is segmented not only by geography but by age.

DOJ_NMG_0027716

Samir Patel, president of SearchForce, a San Mateo company that runs Internet advertising campaigns also said customers are finding ads delivered along with search results powered by Microsoft's newest search technology are significantly more profitable, as more shoppers who click on them buy products.

Last week, Amazon.com, the world's largest online retailer, quietly switched from using Google's search technology to Microsoft's.

BlackBerry Maker RIM Faces New Lawsuit (FT)

By Paul Taylor

Financial Times, May 2, 2006

Research in Motion, maker of the popular BlackBerry family of wireless e-mail devices, faces a new legal threat after Visto, a US-based wireless e-mail technology company, filed a new patent infringement suit against the Canadian group.

The move follows Visto's victory in another long-running patent infringment suit against rival Seven Networks, and comes just weeks after Rim paid more than $612m to settle a patent case with Washington-based NTP, a patent holding firm that also holds a small stake in Visto.

"Based on Visto's sweeping victory in court against Seven Networks on Friday, Rim must understand that there is no place in the mobile e-mail space for this sort of behavior," said Brian Bogosian, Visto's chief executive. "Under the law, which protects consumers from products that contain infringing technology, Rim should not be able to sell the BlackBerry system."

Rim did not immediately comment on the new suit which could lead to further uncertainly in the fast expanding market for corporate wireless "push" e-mail services – a market that Rim and the BlackBerry helped define. It is also likely to fuel further demands for a revision of US patent law and overhaul of the patent and trademark system.

Visto previosly filed a separate patent infringement suits against several other wireless e-mail technology companies - including Microsoft - but said on Monday that it has no plans to file a suit against Intellisynch, another wireless e-mail technology vendor now owned by Nokia.

On Friday a Texas jury found that Seven had willfully infringed on three separate Visto wireless e-mail patents and awarded Visto about $3.6m in damages. Visto had originally asserted nearly 200 claims from six patents, and sought more than $12m in damages while seeking to have the patents reevaluated and upheld by the US Patent and Trademark Office.

Seven said it was, "clearly disappointed" with the verdict, but added that it was "grateful for the limited nature of the damages and looks forward to the next phase of the litigation and the outcome of the [US Patent and Trademark Office] re-examination proceedings."

So far one of the patents in question has been upheld as valid, while another has been rejected.

"While this is the first step in a long process, our primary objective is to protect the interests of our customers and their ability to continue to use Seven's innovative real-time mobile e-mail solution," said Harvey Anderson, general counsel for Seven. "We believe minor alterations of the software will avoid the claims in the future, with no disruption to our customers or the user experience."

Seven counter sued Visto in August claiming that Visto had infringed two of its mobile e-mail patents. That trial is set for June 2007.

Both companies have developed technology that enables mobile users to retrieve their e-mail from belind a coprorate security "firewall" – technology that is used by wirelss carriers including Cingular to enable their customers to receive wireless e-mails on a wide range of smartphone devices.

New Patent Fight Looms For RIM Over BlackBerry (WSJ)

By Stuart Weinberg

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

Closely held Visto Corp., a maker of wireless-email software, sued BlackBerry maker Research in Motion Ltd., claiming RIM infringed four of its patents.

DOJ_NMG_0027717

RIM, which two months ago agreed to pay NTP Inc. $612.5 million to settled a separate patent dispute, denied infringing Visto's patents and said in a statement that it will now consider asserting its own claims against Visto. RIM, of Waterloo, Ontario, said it doesn't expect customers of its popular BlackBerry wireless-email device to be impacted by Visto's complaint.

RIM's shares fell $3.60, or 4.7%, to $73.03 in 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading yesterday.

The suit by Visto, filed in U.S. federal court in the Eastern District of Texas, comes after a federal jury in the same district Friday decided in favor of the Redwood Shores, Calif., software maker in yet another patent dispute. In that case, the jury found closely held software maker Seven Networks Inc. had infringed three Visto patents and awarded it $3.6 million. Visto said the court is expected to hold a hearing concerning an injunction against Seven Networks that would prohibit further use of the infringing system.

Seven Networks, of Redwood City, Calif., said in a statement Friday that it was "disappointed with the verdict" but that the damages were lower than Visto had sought. In a statement yesterday, Seven Networks indicated that it is developing a workaround to avoid any infringement of Visto's patents.

Regarding its suit against RIM, Visto Chief Executive Brian Bogosian said the "breadth and depth" of Visto's patents would make it difficult for RIM to modify its email-delivery system to work around them. Before deciding to settle with NTP, RIM said it had developed a workaround to bypass NTP's patents.

Visto also has several other pending infringement actions, including one against Microsoft Corp. Microsoft has declined to comment on the case.

New Patent Fight Looms For RIM Over BlackBerry (WSJ)

By Stuart Weinberg

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

Closely held Visto Corp., a maker of wireless-email software, sued BlackBerry maker Research in Motion Ltd., claiming RIM infringed four of its patents.

RIM, which two months ago agreed to pay NTP Inc. $612.5 million to settled a separate patent dispute, denied infringing Visto's patents and said in a statement that it will now consider asserting its own claims against Visto. RIM, of Waterloo, Ontario, said it doesn't expect customers of its popular BlackBerry wireless-email device to be impacted by Visto's complaint.

RIM's shares fell $3.60, or 4.7%, to $73.03 in 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading yesterday.

The suit by Visto, filed in U.S. federal court in the Eastern District of Texas, comes after a federal jury in the same district Friday decided in favor of the Redwood Shores, Calif., software maker in yet another patent dispute. In that case, the jury found closely held software maker Seven Networks Inc. had infringed three Visto patents and awarded it $3.6 million. Visto said the court is expected to hold a hearing concerning an injunction against Seven Networks that would prohibit further use of the infringing system.

Seven Networks, of Redwood City, Calif., said in a statement Friday that it was "disappointed with the verdict" but that the damages were lower than Visto had sought. In a statement yesterday, Seven Networks indicated that it is developing a workaround to avoid any infringement of Visto's patents.

Regarding its suit against RIM, Visto Chief Executive Brian Bogosian said the "breadth and depth" of Visto's patents would make it difficult for RIM to modify its email-delivery system to work around them. Before deciding to settle with NTP, RIM said it had developed a workaround to bypass NTP's patents.

Visto also has several other pending infringement actions, including one against Microsoft Corp. Microsoft has declined to comment on the case.

Keeping A Democratic Web (NYT)

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

"Net neutrality" is a concept that is still unfamiliar to most Americans, but it keeps the Internet democratic. Cable and telephone companies that provide Internet service are talking about creating a two-tiered Internet, in which Web sites that pay them large fees would get priority over everything else. Opponents of these plans are supporting Net-neutrality legislation, which would require all Web sites to be treated equally. Net neutrality recently suffered a setback in the House, but there is growing hope that the Senate will take up the cause.

DOJ_NMG_0027718

One of the Internet's great strengths is that a single blogger or a small political group can inexpensively create a Web page that is just as accessible to the world as Microsoft's home page. But this democratic Internet would be in danger if the companies that deliver Internet service changed the rules so that Web sites that pay them money would be easily accessible, while little-guy sites would be harder to access, and slower to navigate. Providers could also block access to sites they do not like.

That would be a financial windfall for Internet service providers, but a disaster for users, who could find their Web browsing influenced by whichever sites paid their service provider the most money. There is a growing movement of Internet users who are pushing for legislation to make this kind of discrimination impossible. It has attracted supporters ranging from MoveOn.org to the Gun Owners of America. Grass-roots political groups like these are rightly concerned that their online speech could be curtailed if Internet service providers were allowed to pick and choose among Web sites.

The House Energy and Commerce Committee defeated a good Net-neutrality amendment last week. But the amendment got more votes than many people expected, suggesting that support for Net neutrality is beginning to take hold in Congress. In the Senate, Olympia Snowe, a Maine Republican, and Byron Dorgan, a North Dakota Democrat, are drafting a strong Net-neutrality bill that would prohibit broadband providers from creating a two-tiered Internet. Senators who care about the Internet and Internet users should get behind it.

Calling All Plaintiffs (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

Hey, did you hear? The Twombly case may go all the way to the Supreme Court. What's that? You haven't heard about Twombly? Maybe someone should have told you by now, since if you have a phone, you're probably one of the plaintiffs. And if the dial tone you hear is provided by one of the Baby Bells, your phone company is one of the defendants.

But believe us, this is one case you don't want to win. In 2003, William Twombly sued all the Bells on behalf of all the Bells' customers. His allegation is that since 1996, when Congress (sort of) deregulated the telecom industry, the Bells have conspired to stay out of each other's territory instead of competing and so have kept the price of phone service artificially high for a decade. His evidence for the conspiracy? Well, he doesn't really have any, other than that the Bells have not, in fact, chosen to break into each others' territory in the decade since Congress gave them the green light to do so.

But no matter. Just let the case proceed to the discovery phase and Mr. Twombly and his lawyers are sure to uncover something unseemly sounding in the phone companies' files. And even if they didn't, the cost in time and money of complying with discovery demands in a case this broad might well compel the phone companies to settle and make the suit go away.

You might think a fishing expedition this extreme would never make it that far, and you'd almost be right. The trial judge, Gerard Lynch, threw the case out on its ear. But Mr. Twombly, et al. (that's everyone else in the country), appealed, and the Second Circuit has reinstated the case. The appeals court ruled, in short, that it was enough for Mr. Twombly to have alleged a conspiracy that could plausibly exist, since if it did exist his case could have merit. The Supreme Court is currently weighing whether to hear an appeal of the Second Circuit's ruling.

The case has caught the attention of the business community, even if most of the 100 million-odd plaintiffs haven't been paying it much mind. Firms engage in "parallel" activity the way the Bells do all the time, as former Federal Trade Commission Chairman Timothy Muris pointed out in an amicus brief filed on behalf of Visa and MasterCard. Credit cards, he noted, are the same size and shape. They all have that same magnetic strip on the back, located in the same place. This type of "parallel" action is not only legal, but sensible -- and beneficial.

The examples could be multiplied. These days, we hesitate to mention the phenomenon of gas station prices often moving up and down in parallel. If the Twombly decision is not struck down by the Supreme Court, we can expect that lawsuit to follow directly -- the American Petroleum Institute has already filed a brief in the case pointing this out. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers and the pharmaceutical industry have also all filed briefs out of fear that they may be the next targets of Twombly-like litigation.

DOJ_NMG_0027719

In Twombly, the Second Circuit essentially ruled that if competitors act in parallel, all a plaintiff has to do is say, "Conspiracy!" to open discovery and start searching for evidence in the files of an entire industry. It's true that the plaintiffs offered some fig-leaf suggestions about why it might be in the phone companies' interest to conspire, but you can always spin that sort of tale if you don't need evidence to support it. Most of the motives for conspiring in the first place also happen to look like reasonable business decisions without the existence of a conspiracy.

That Twombly lowered the bar dramatically for plaintiffs and trial lawyers alleging business conspiracies has not been lost on those lawyers, either. Since the decision was handed down in October, dozens of legal filings have already cited it as a reason for letting this or that case proceed. If the Supreme Court allows Twombly to stand unchallenged, unsupported charges of antitrust conspiracy could well prove to be the next great wave of the litigation tsunami.

The Second Circuit panel admitted as much in its decision, writing, "the overall result" of its ruling "may well be a burden on the courts and a deleterious effect on the manner in which and efficiency with which business is conducted." But the court reinstated the case anyway, saying that the problem was one for the Supreme Court to address. Here's hoping it does.

ENVIRONMENT:

Government Drafts Pandemic Flu Plan (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, May 2, 2006

Employers should have plans to keep workers at least three feet apart, colleges should consider which dormitories could be used to quarantine the sick, and flight crews should have surgical masks to put on coughing travelers under a draft of the government's pandemic flu plan obtained by The Associated Press.

The Bush administration forecasts massive disruptions if bird flu or some other super-strain of influenza arises in the United States. A response plan scheduled to be released at the White House on Wednesday warns employers that as much as 40 percent of the work force could be off the job and says every segment of society must prepare.

"The collective response of 300 million Americans will significantly influence the shape of the pandemic and its medical, social and economic outcomes," says an undated 228-page draft version of the report that had not been finalized. "Institutions in danger of becoming overwhelmed will rely on the voluntarism and sense of civic and humanitarian duty of ordinary Americans."

An outbreak could lead to a variety of restrictions on movement in and around the country, including limiting the number of international flights and quarantining exposed travelers. But the government does not foresee closing U.S. borders to fight the spread of flu, in part because it would only slow the pandemic's spread by a few weeks and because it would have such significant consequences for the economy and foreign affairs.

It's impossible to predict when the next pandemic will strike, or how great its toll might be. But concern is rising that the Asian bird flu, called the H5N1 strain, might lead to one if it eventually starts spreading easily from person to person.

So far, H5N1 has struck more than 200 people since 2003, killing about half of them. Virtually all the victims caught it from close contact with infected poultry or droppings.

The government is preparing for a worst-case scenario of up to 2 million deaths in the United States.

With no border restrictions, pandemic influenza would arrive in the United States within two months of an outbreak abroad, the document estimates. But models of influenza's spread suggest that sealing the U.S. border would not only be impractical — 1.1 million people cross the nation's 317 official ports of entry daily — but it would only delay the inevitable by a few weeks, it says.

Ship and plane captains already are required to report certain on-board illnesses upon arrival, but crews would be trained to take such steps as putting a surgical mask on a traveler who is coughing.

The new document calls mandatory quarantine a last resort, and urges planners to consider, for example, that closing a community would sever it from the delivery of groceries and other essential goods.

The report aims to energize the private sector, noting that 85 percent of the systems that are vital to society, such as food production, medicine and financial services, are privately run.

DOJ_NMG_0027720

Not only would sick workers stay home, but so would anyone who was caring for ill family members, under quarantine because of possible exposure to the flu or taking care of children when schools shut down. The same could go for anyone who simply feels safer at home.

Included in the report's advice:

_Employers should have workers remain at least three feet apart or otherwise limit face-to-face contact to limit the flu's spread, including by working from home or substituting teleconferences for office meetings.

_Colleges should consider whether dormitories could be used to house or quarantine the sick, and establish mandatory sick-leave policies for anyone exposed to the flu.

The report envisions possible breakdowns in public order and says governors might deploy National Guard troops or request federal troops to maintain order. The military also could be activated to enforce travel restrictions and deliver vaccines and medicines, the report says.

Last fall, President Bush announced a $7.1 billion strategy to fight the next flu pandemic, focusing largely on public health preparations, including plans to stockpile enough bird flu vaccine for 20 million people and anti-flu drugs for 81 million. So far, the stockpile contains enough vaccine for 4 million people and medication for 5 million.

This new report is Step 2, outlining how every branch of government would have to work with federal health officials to try to contain a pandemic and minimize its damage to the economy and society. By early next month, government agencies are to release the specific steps they plan.

The report attempts to settle any turf battle within the administration, saying the Health and Human Services Department would lead the government's interagency response effort and the Homeland Security Department would have a secondary role to assist with the health response and non-medical support.

Business Plan For A Pandemic? (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

More than half of U.S. companies think there will be a global flu epidemic in the next two years. Two-thirds think it will seriously disrupt their operations as well as foment social unrest. But two-thirds also say they aren't prepared. One-third of executives surveyed say nobody in their organization has been appointed to plan for a pandemic; another one-quarter couldn't or wouldn't answer the question.

"Corporations are looking at this like deer at headlights," said Tommy G. Thompson, who spent much of his last two years as secretary of health and human services sounding the pandemic alarm and is now doing the same as a private consultant. "They are very skittish. They don't know which way to go. They are hoping the car is not going to hit them."

Pandemic influenza is the latest imponderable facing U.S. business, a form of unwanted globalization that threatens the life and health of even the smallest companies in the most literal way.

Several surveys show that a small but growing number of corporations is convinced -- as many epidemiologists have been for a while -- that a global flu outbreak is inevitable. The uncertainty about whether it will be the H5N1 strain of bird flu, which has spread from Asia into Europe, or some other strain is not stopping them from getting ready.

But how ready they are -- and the readiness of the business world as a whole -- is difficult to assess. The government does not require companies to have pandemic response plans, customers don't demand them, and many boards of directors doubt they are necessary.

Thompson, who heads the Deloitte Center for Health Solutions in Washington, estimates that only one in five U.S. companies "are in good position in terms of being able to react -- and even those are going to have to restructure and improve their plans."

In the past year, federal agencies, public health organizations and consulting firms have begun to provide guidance to businesses. One of the larger consultants is Singapore-based International SOS, which provides advice, clinical services and medical evacuations to about 1,000 large corporations and organizations.

DOJ_NMG_0027721

In the past eight months, about 220 of its clients have sought help planning for a pandemic. For $5,000 a year, a company can get a 130-page guide, a weekly e-mail newsletter and a monthly Web-based seminar to provide updated epidemiological data and advice. At the high end, some corporations with unusual vulnerabilities, often because they have factories in Asia, are spending up to $40,000 a month for customized planning, said Tim Daniel, an International SOS executive.

"We are now seeing some organizations put together long-term budgets for pandemic planning -- line items for two or three years -- in seven figures per year," he said.

Current models, based on seasonal influenza and the three 20th-century flu pandemics, suggest that a new and highly contagious virus strain would spread across the United States in about five weeks. It would affect communities for six to eight weeks before receding. There would probably be at least two waves, separated by months.

At least a third of the population is likely to become ill in each wave, with peak absenteeism somewhat higher, about 40 percent of the workforce. Depending on the strain's virulence, 900,000 to 10 million people might be hospitalized, and 200,000 to 2 million might die.

Given this scenario, the consultants say, companies should expect that a pandemic will kill some employees, temporarily cripple workforces, sow confusion and fear, and force people to make harrowing decisions between allegiances to work or family. It would make communication difficult, threaten supply chains, and probably interrupt production of goods and delivery of services.

Manufacturing is especially vulnerable, said Michael T. Osterholm, an epidemiologist and former adviser to the Department of Health and Human Services. Factories increasingly rely on parts made in numerous places, which are then shipped, often from overseas, and assembled into finished products.

In February, the University of Minnesota's Center for Infectious Disease Research and Policy, which Osterholm heads, sponsored a pandemic-preparedness conference for businesses. More than 200 companies sent representatives. Osterholm goes into metaphor overdrive when describing what he told them.

"This is a global blizzard of potentially 12 to 18 months' duration," he said. "This is the grain of sand that is going to bring the huge gear of the just-in-time economy to a stop."

Chelsea C. White III, the chairman of industrial and systems engineering at the Georgia Institute of Technology, agreed, saying many companies have supply chains that are "fragile and subject to ungraceful degradations." One of his favorite examples is Toyota. In 1997, fire damaged a factory that made brake parts, stopping production. Within 12 hours, every one of Toyota's Japanese plants had to stop or slow the assembly of cars, White said.

There may be lessons from history that today's companies find useful. But the teacher isn't the 1918 Spanish flu, which killed an estimated 50 million. It's SARS.

Severe acute respiratory syndrome emerged in China in November 2002. By the following July it had spread to at least 28 countries, infected 8,437 people and killed 813, including nearly 350 in China and 300 in Hong Kong.

Canada had only about 40 SARS deaths. But the outbreak caused a 14-week emergency in Toronto, where 30,000 people were quarantined at home or in hospitals. The city lost nine conventions and 12,000 jobs, and the economy lost $1 billion and took two years to fully recover. Yet in public health terms, the city's response was a nearly unqualified success, and globally SARS was a bullet dodged.

A year ago, the CDC Foundation in Atlanta held a two-day meeting with two dozen Toronto business leaders to talk about SARS. To encourage candor, the meeting was not recorded. But the 13-page report that came out of it, while stripped of company-specific anecdotes, is full of observations about work during a time of plague:

Business becomes a co-leader with government in the public health response to an epidemic. Fear is worse than disease, so communication is key. Password-protected Web sites are a good way to communicate with employees. Companies are better than government or medical institutions at rotating fresh people onto crisis-management teams. Fear of lost wages is the single biggest concern when workers are asked to home-quarantine, so companies should have clear policies in advance.

Thinking about operational decisions -- not buying drugs and equipment -- is the most important thing, the experts said.

DOJ_NMG_0027722

Who can work at home? Who needs IT upgrades in advance to make that possible? Who needs to come in? What lines of production or service can be shut down without jeopardizing the entire enterprise? Who are the fourth and fifth understudies, not just the first and second, for key positions?

Nevertheless, some firms are laying in supplies, too. Roche, the pharmaceutical company, reports that more than 50 firms have contacted it about building stockpiles of its antiviral drug Tamiflu (oseltamivir).

"About two dozen have placed orders ranging from a few hundred to hundreds of thousands of treatment courses," said Terence J. Hurley, a Roche spokesman.

Some companies hold dry runs.

The international research and engineering firm SAIC Inc., which has 16,000 employees in the Washington area, periodically "surges the system" to simulate pandemic conditions, said Bowman Olds, the company's emergency operations center manager.

On a Saturday two months ago, SAIC tested its telecommuting capability with a unit that operates in Northern Virginia, Hawaii and several foreign countries to see whether everyone could work outside the office with all necessary functions, programs and communications. Several software problems arose.

"Now we have to go through those and find out how to make them work," Olds said.

Eric Grant, a spokesman for The Washington Post, said the company "is prepared to continue production of the newspaper under various emergency conditions" and "is reviewing its plans regarding how they would apply in the event of a flu outbreak."

The companies that feel most vulnerable are those with large "footprints" in Asia, and they are the most likely to have started planning for a pandemic.

Shure Inc., a privately held firm with factories in Illinois and Mexico that make microphones, earphones and other audio equipment, opened a plant with 150 workers outside Shanghai last July. In September, it began planning for a pandemic.

Its plant managers are learning about flu and how to limit its spread. Each factory now has a five-week supply of protective gloves and masks. Company executives are identifying the product mix they feel must be kept on the market at all cost. The Chinese division has formed a relationship with two private hospitals.

"We are pretty much guaranteed access for our people even if it is a very, very serious situation," said Richard S. Burgess, Shure's vice president for human resources.

Corning Inc. is also deep into flu planning.

The venerable glassmaker from upstate New York makes its money primarily from display technology -- basically glass screens -- made in Asia. Its response to SARS was "organized confusion," recalled James Schuppert, a physician and the company's medical director. "We responded the best way we could. But it was not around a strategy that we could refer to and that already had buy-in from senior management."

Corning's pandemic plan is now long and detailed. It requires plant managers to meet face to face at least once a year with a local public health official. This is especially important in Asia, Schuppert believes, and the company recently audited work sites to make sure it was being done.

"Taking the health officer out to lunch -- that wasn't a practice we used to engage in," he said with a laugh.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Intelligence Mission Troubles FBI (BSUN)

By Siobhan Gorman, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, May 2, 2006

Critics say National Security Branch lacks leadership and urgency

WASHINGTON -- More than four years after the Sept. 11 attacks, the FBI is having trouble asserting itself as the country's pre-eminent domestic intelligence agency, according to intelligence specialists and congressional critics.

Even after revamping its intelligence and anti-terrorism operations last year into a new National Security Branch, the bureau "is a long way from doing what it needs to do to stay on top of the war on terror," Republican Sen. Charles E. Grassley of Iowa said in an interview yesterday.

Among the problems that have slowed the FBI's efforts to transform itself: dizzying turnover in its senior leadership ranks and what some intelligence experts describe as a lack of urgency about its new mission.

"They need leadership, obviously, and they need people who are going to stick around for a while," Grassley said, referring to the recently announced resignation of Gary Bald, who heads the National Security Branch. "I hope they'll fill the position with somebody who will bring real direction to it."

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III is expected to face questions about his efforts to remake the law enforcement agency into an intelligence organization when he testifies today before a Senate panel that includes Grassley.

Responding to criticism of their efforts, FBI officials say they have made significant progress in charting a new course for the FBI, and that their classified plan is on the verge of being implemented. Training for analysts and agents is being updated to meet the demands of the fight against terrorism and technology programs are being upgraded and adapted, they said.

The FBI created its domestic-intelligence branch, on orders from the White House, in response to recommendations from a presidential commission that said the FBI still faced significant hurdles in developing its domestic intelligence capability and was resistant to change.

But according to a former intelligence official familiar with deliberations inside the administration, Justice Department and FBI officials waged a fierce, though ultimately unsuccessful, effort to block creation of the new division, which reports to the new national spy chief, John D. Negroponte, as well as to the FBI director.

Turnover in the new office is a major concern, critics say, because it could stall plans for change and create confusion about the direction of the agency among agents and analysts in the field.

Former 9/11 Commissioner Tim Roemer, noting that three al-Qaida devotees, including Osama bin Laden, issued tapes last week recommitting themselves to attacks against Americans, said turnover at top levels of the FBI intelligence operation is likely to harm "our ability to find al-Qaida or terrorists when they come into the country."

The latest to go is Bald, the first director of the FBI's counter-terrorism operation, who is leaving his post after less than a year on the job

In his first interview since his departure was announced last week, Bald said his decision was made "in the best interest of my family." He is expected to become the head of security for a cruise-ship line, according to several former intelligence and FBI officials, but Bald refused to discuss his future plans.

Bald's deputy, Philip Mudd, said he expected to implement plans that Bald has drawn up for the National Security Branch. "I'm not going anywhere," Mudd said.

Bald, a former special agent in charge of the FBI office in Baltimore, took over as the first head of the National Security Branch last summer. His job: to build a new division that would merge the FBI's two-year-old intelligence operation into more established FBI counterterrorism and counter-intelligence offices.

Mudd said he has been touring the FBI's field offices to help agents learn how to fill intelligence gaps. But some intelligence veterans say that instead of using intelligence to assess long-range domestic threats, such as terrorism, the FBI is continuing its traditional practice of using intelligence in a secondary role to support investigations of cases.

John Rollins, who worked at the FBI before focusing on homeland security intelligence at the White House and the Homeland Security department, said the pace of change within the FBI has slowed since the creation of the National Security Branch.

An earlier effort to create an intelligence division, which began in 2003 under a National Security Agency veteran, Maureen Baginski, built up considerable momentum even though she had three factors working against her - agency culture, the fact that she was not from the FBI, and that she was female - Rollins said.

"I don't think intelligence has nearly the visibility within the bureau as it did when Mo Baginski was there," he said. "Nobody is saying, 'Here is our plan and here is where we want to go.' There's continued frustration and confusion at the state and local level and the private sector level."

DOJ_NMG_0027724

He said the FBI and the Department of Homeland Security continue to fight over which agency should be responsible for pulling in intelligence from local officials. Homeland Security got so frustrated that it was not getting what it needed that it began dispatching its own people to key cities like New York and Los Angeles-a move the department took without consulting with the FBI, Rollins said.

Other intelligence experts also worry that intelligence analysts remain second-class citizens within the FBI, where gun-toting agents have long held higher status.

According to one government official familiar with the FBI's reform efforts, the intelligence division "has been sidelined. People are looking to leave."

Bald countered that part of his challenge in explaining his "blueprint" for the National Security Branch publicly is that the details are almost entirely classified. The goal, he said, is to get FBI agents and analysts focused on filling intelligence gaps, regardless of how they relate to different criminal investigations.

Bald added that he had doubled the number of agents and analysts assigned to intelligence and counter-terrorism at the FBI. There are now 5,000 agents and 2,000 intelligence analysts in the domestic security branch.

"If this does not succeed, then I failed in what I built," he said

siobhan.gorman@baltsun.com

Critics Train Sights On Laggard FBI (BSU)

By Siobhan Gorman, The Baltimore Sun

Baltimore Sun, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- More than four years after Sept. 11, the FBI is having trouble asserting itself as the United States' pre-eminent domestic intelligence agency, according to intelligence specialists and congressional critics.

Even after revamping its intelligence and terrorism operations last year into a new National Security Branch, the bureau "is a long way from doing what it needs to do to stay on top of the war on terror," Republican Sen. Charles Grassley of Iowa said in an interview Monday.

Among the problems that have slowed the FBI's efforts to transform itself: dizzying turnover in its senior leadership ranks and what some intelligence experts describe as a lack of urgency about its new mission.

"They need leadership, obviously, and they need people who are going to stick around for awhile," Grassley said, referring to the recently announced resignation of Gary Bald, who heads the National Security Branch. "I hope they'll fill the position with somebody who will bring real direction to it."

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III is expected to face questions about his efforts to remake the law agency into an intelligence organization when he testifies Tuesday before a Senate panel that includes Grassley.

Responding to criticism of their efforts, FBI officials say they have made significant progress in charting a new course for the FBI, and that their classified plan is on the verge of being implemented. Training for analysts and agents is being updated to meet the demands of the fight against terrorism and technology programs are being upgraded and adapted, they said.

The FBI created its domestic-intelligence branch, on orders from the White House, in response to recommendations from a presidential commission that said the FBI still faced significant hurdles in developing its domestic intelligence capability and was resistant to change.

But according to a former intelligence official familiar with deliberations inside the administration, Justice Department and FBI officials waged a fierce, though ultimately unsuccessful, effort to block creation of the new division, which reports to the new national spy chief, John D. Negroponte, as well as to the FBI director.

Turnover in the new office is a major concern, critics say, because it could stall plans for change and create confusion about the direction of the agency among agents and analysts in the field.

Former 9/11 Commissioner Tim Roemer, noting that three al-Qaida devotees, including Osama bin Laden, issued tapes last week recommitting themselves to attacks against Americans, said turnover at top levels of the FBI intelligence operation is likely to harm "our ability to find al-Qaida or terrorists when they come into the country."

DOJ_NMG_0027725

The latest to go is Bald, the first director of the FBI's counter-terrorism operation, who is leaving his post after less than a year on the job

In his first interview since his departure was announced last week, Bald said his decision was made "in the best interest of my family." He is expected to become the head of security for a cruise-ship line, according to several former intelligence and FBI officials, but Bald refused to discuss his future plans.

Bald's deputy, Philip Mudd, said he expected to implement plans that Bald has drawn up for the National Security Branch. "I'm not going anywhere," Mudd said.

Mudd said he has been touring the FBI's field offices to help agents learn how to fill intelligence gaps. But some intelligence veterans say that instead of using intelligence to assess long-range domestic threats, such as terrorism, the FBI is continuing its traditional practice of using intelligence in a secondary role to support investigations of cases.

John Rollins, who worked at the FBI before focusing on homeland security intelligence at the White House and the Homeland Security department, said the pace of change within the FBI has slowed since the creation of the National Security Branch.

Other intelligence experts also worry that intelligence analysts remain second-class citizens within the FBI, where gun-toting agents have long held higher status.

According to one government official familiar with the FBI's reform efforts, the intelligence division "has been sidelined. People are looking to leave."

Rose Jr. Sentenced For Drug Distribution (AP)

AP, May 2, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) -- Pete Rose Jr., the son of baseball's career hits leader, was sentenced Monday to one month in prison and five months of home detention for distributing a steroid alternative to his minor league teammates.

Rose faced up to two years in prison and a $1 million fine. Federal judge Robert Echols waived a fine for Rose.

"I made a mistake and hurt a lot of people," Rose said outside the courthouse after the sentencing. "The judge is great. He was very generous and I can't thank him enough. He doesn't have to worry about me doing anything like this again," Rose said.

Rose's attorney, Jeffrey Brodey, said his client will start his monthlong sentence June 5. Brodey said he will request that Rose be incarcerated in Cincinnati, where he lives with his pregnant wife and child.

The 36-year-old Rose pleaded guilty Nov. 7 to distributing the steroid alternative GBL, a drug he used as a sleep aid, to some of his teammates with the Chattanooga Lookouts. Rose played for the Double-A affiliate of the Cincinnati Reds in 1997, 2001 and 2002.

The Drug Enforcement Administration has said Rose's arrest was part of a larger investigation into a major GBL trafficking organization. He surrendered to authorities shortly before he entered his guilty plea.

The indictment said Rose admitted he received GBL from a person in Tennessee while playing for Chattanooga. He also said he supplied half the players on that team with the drug. Rose said his teammates would take GBL to relax after games.

Rose played most of his career in the minor leagues, but made it to the majors for 11 games with the Reds in 1997, going 2-for-14. Last season, he played for the Long Island Ducks of the independent Atlantic League.

Pete Rose Sr. holds the major league record of 4,256 hits. He agreed to a lifetime ban from baseball in 1989 following an investigation that he bet on games; after 14 years of denying it, he admitted in his autobiography that he bet on Reds games while managing them in the late 1980s.

He also served a five-month sentence in federal prison in 1990-91 for failing to report income from signing autographs, memorabilia sales and gambling.

GBL, or gamma butyrolactone, is sold under the counter at retailers and gyms with claims to build muscle, improve physical performance, enhance sex, reduce stress and induce sleep. When taken orally, GBL is converted to the "date-rape" drug GHB, or gamma hydroxybutyrate.

Watts, Three Other Area People Sent (CTI)

Carmi Times, May 1, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027726

Randy G. Massey, Acting United States Attorney for the Southern District of Illinois, announced Friday the recent sentencings in U.S. District Court in Benton of four defendants in their roles in a large methamphetamine manufacturing and distribution conspiracy centered in White, Gallatin and Saline counties.

Those sentenced were Tony W. Watts, 53, Carmi; Christopher W. Williams, 30, Harrisburg; Sean L. Logsdon, 36, Equality; and Eugenia K. Horton, 41, Shawneetown.

These convictions and sentences resulted from a long-term and on-going investigation into the manufacture of methamphetamine in southeastern Illinois by the Southern Illinois Drug Task Force and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said Massey.

Watts and Logsdon were sentenced April 18 to 20 years imprisonment each, a fine of $200, a special assessment of $100 and a term of 10 years supervised release to follow their incarceration.

Williams was sentenced April 26 to 20 years imprisonment, a fine of $250, a special assessment of $100 and a term of 10 years supervised release to follow his incarceration. Horton was sentenced April 19 to a term of 121 months imprisonment, a fine of $200, a special assessment of $100 and a term of five years supervised release to follow her incarceration.

Thus far, said Massey, the investigation (which began in 2001) has resulted in the federal indictment of 65 people in related cases who were responsible for the manufacture or attempted manufacture of the equivalent of over 600,000 grams of methamphetamine.

Under federal law, parole has been abolished and defendants are required to serve at least 85 percent of their sentences.

In addition to the 65 defendants who have been indicted federally, over 50 additional defendants have been prosecuted in related cases in state court by the state's attorneys in White, Gallatin and Saline counties, said Massey.

And since the investigation and prosecutions began, law enforcement agencies in the three counties have seen at least an 80 percent drop in the number of methamphetamine labs found in those counties, he added.

The Iron Chef investigation is part of an Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force (OCDETF) operation and is currently being led by the Carmi office of the Southern Illinois Drug Task Force, with the assistance of the Illinois State Police, the sheriff's departments and state's attorneys' offices of the counties of White, Gallatin and Saline, the police departments of Carmi, Shawneetown, Harrisburg, Eldorado and Galatia, the Multi-Agency Drug Enforcement Unit of the Saline County Sheriff's Department and the Posey County, Ind. Narcotics Task Force. The OCDETF program targets large drug-trafficking organization.

The case is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney James M. Cutchin of Carmi.

Breast Cancer Has Made Me A Criminal (BOS)

The Boston Globe, May 2, 2006

LOS ANGELES

AT 9 O'CLOCK on the night of my first round of chemotherapy, exactly six hours after I left the oncologist's office wondering what all the fuss was about, my stomach tumbled into my knees, my knees refused to work altogether, and I crumpled to the floor in a clammy, shivering heap.

I lay there until dawn, at one point vomiting on myself, at another crying that I'd rather die of cancer than undergo chemo again. I was hot. I was cold. My shoulders wouldn't stop shaking. My legs wouldn't move at all. Huge hallucinations rolled over me.

In the morning I was stunned to realize I was still alive. But there was my 2 1/2-year-old daughter, poking me with her toe, wondering whether we could dance. I made my way to the stereo and made myself a vow: I'd do whatever necessary to avoid having her find me on the ground again.

First call was to the doctor, who promised to fine-tune my protocol and adjust my pre-chemo meds. The second was to a friend I thought might have a marijuana connection. I had read enough, and written some, about the medicinal uses of marijuana to believe it might keep me from suffering so in three weeks, when I was scheduled for my second poison drip. Not to mention that months of treatment loomed.

DOJ_NMG_0027727

A day or two later, a manila envelope with nothing but my initials on it was delivered to me, free of charge. I stuck the gift deep in the freezer without even opening it. I didn't need to then. But I needed the option. For one of the few times since I had been diagnosed with Stage 1 breast cancer, I felt a sense of control.

Maybe someone who hasn't been there can't understand my willingness to break the law. Sure, a number of states, including mine, have legalized the medicinal use of marijuana. But the Drug Enforcement Administration refuses to go along. It sees me as a criminal. Then again, none of the Supreme Court justices who ruled that medical marijuana users could be arrested despite those state laws stopped by to see how skinny I'd gotten or to retrieve me from a bookstore when I wasn't able to walk another step without retching.

That was left to D., one of my more conservative friends. She was the one who had warned me: Do not get high, or you'll be sorry. She was not, however, telling me to forgo marijuana. The forbidden leaf had, after all, seen her through her own chemotherapy. Now my own unfortunate turn was at hand, and she was encouraging me to smoke until the nausea passed but to stop smoking before any paranoia set in.

"Trust me," she said dryly, "cancer and thinking too much are not a good mix."

And now the Food and Drug Administration has said cancer and cannabis don't mix at all. The federal agency recently announced that "no sound scientific studies" support the medicinal use of marijuana, a finding contrary to a 1999 review by scientists from the Institute of Medicine. That highly regarded panel confirmed what many sick people already knew: Marijuana makes the nausea bearable during chemotherapy and can keep AIDS patients without appetites from wasting away. Proponents of its use called the FDA ruling political, as opposed to scientific or, say, humane.

Within weeks of starting chemo, I was down a dozen pounds, not so much queasy as unable to eat. Of course, since I live in Los Angeles this was considered by some a perk. "You're so teeny," women would tell me. "Yeah, well, I have cancer," I'd reply, running a hand through my shockingly good synthetic wig. "Oh, sorry, but . . . you're so teeny."

My oncologist, however, wasn't as thrilled about my size, especially with my cell counts so dangerously low that any cut and every sneeze put me at risk. Alone with her in the examination room, the scar from my lumpectomy still raised and raw to her touch, I asked about marijuana use in cases like mine. The doctor didn't scoff. She did say I needed to stop losing weight despite having eliminated dairy, sugar, and alcohol from my diet in a cancer-fighting frenzy.

So I dug into the freezer for the manila envelope. I undid the clasp and removed a fat bud of seriously stinky marijuana. I remember standing in the kitchen thinking, I have to save the life of my daughter's mother, and whose business is that but mine?

The Politics Of Pot (RGU)

Register-Guard, May 1, 2006

The FDA should change its name to the Politically Approved Food and Drug Administration - PAFDA. It's a longer acronym, but it rolls off the tongue nicely and people would appreciate its greater honesty.

The agency's other option is to stop embarrassing its dedicated doctors and scientists with utterly unscientific announcements such as the recent bulletin that smoked marijuana has no medicinal value.

Since no FDA expert panel or newly published research provided the basis for the pronouncement, it's safe to assume the sloppy one-page statement was the handiwork of Bush administration political appointees. The statement is devoid of any data to support its dishonest conclusion, but it does have one thing going for it: It's a masterpiece of circular logic.

Marijuana is a dangerous drug, according to the FDA, because it is listed in Schedule I of the Controlled Substances Act, where only the most dangerous drugs are listed. (Wait, there's more.) The FDA has been disinclined since the "reefer madness" days of federal pot policy to authorize any studies of marijuana's potential as medicine. That gives the FDA continuing cover to maintain that "no sound scientific studies support medical use of marijuana for treatment in the United States."

Here the FDA is fibbing, because it knows full well that in 1999, the Institute of Medicine, the medical arm of the National Academy of Sciences, examined the question of medical marijuana use in considerable depth and published a 288-page report of its findings.

Among other conclusions, the report said, "For patients such as those with AIDS or who are undergoing chemotherapy, and who suffer simultaneously from severe pain, nausea, and appetite loss, cannabinoid drugs might offer broad-spectrum relief not found in any other single medication." Furthermore, the active ingredient in marijuana has long been known to reduce the intraocular pressure associated with glaucoma.

DOJ_NMG_0027728

Medical marijuana has earned the endorsement of The New England Journal of Medicine, the American Academy of Family Physicians and numerous oncologists. The anecdotal evidence of 10,000 Oregonians who've been prescribed medical marijuana by more than 2,000 licensed Oregon physicians adds to the mountain of data supporting the medicinal value of pot.

The IOM report urged further research, but very little has been done in the seven years since its findings were published. The federal government controls the only legal supply of marijuana available for research, and the administration isn't much interested in providing scientists with the means to debunk its absolutist position on pot.

The FDA is partly right about one thing: Lighting marijuana on fire and inhaling its smoke into the lungs is a crude and toxic delivery system. Smoking is a nonstarter as a way to wider acceptance of marijuana as medicine.

More research is needed into development of safe alternatives to smoking, such as Sativex, a cannabis extract that is administered by means of a spray into the mouth. It has won preliminary approval in Canada for relief of symptoms of multiple sclerosis and for treatment of severe neuropathic pain.

It's tragic to witness the FDA's credibility implosion at the hands of an administration that places politics ahead of impartial science. Combined with its disgraceful refusal to allow women nonprescription access to emergency contraception, the FDA's latest stumble into the politics of pot as medicine would be laughable, if it weren't so sad.

Studies Belie Claims Of Medical Marijuana As Safe Option To Pain (APP)

By TERRENCE P. FARLEY

Asbury (NJ) Park Press, May 2, 2006

I have been involved in drug prevention, education and enforcement on the county, state and national levels for about 19 years. I have spent years reviewing research on so-called "medical marijuana." I can state, as a result of that research, that "medical marijuana" and "Compassionate Use" acts are a hoax.

Ken Wolski said in his April 27 commentary that his group, The Coalition for Medical Marijuana-New Jersey, has as a mission "to bring about safe and legal access to marijuana for New Jersey patients." While I assume this is in part the truth, the real truth is that his group's ultimate goal, as is the case with all organizations supported by George Soros' Drug Policy Alliance, is to legalize marijuana and eventually all drugs.

The mission itself is flawed. The coalition wants to bring about safe and legal access to marijuana. There is no safe access. In our society, we do not approve drugs on mere conjecture or a popular vote. We have an extensive testing program overseen by the Food and Drug Administration. Just recently, the FDA concluded that "no sound scientific studies supported medical use of marijuana for treatment in the United States, and no animal or human data supported the safety or efficacy of marijuana for general medical use. There are alternative FDA-approved medications in existence of treatment of many of the proposed uses of smoked marijuana. Therefore, the FDA has not approved smoked marijuana for any condition or disease indication."

Also, the U.S. Supreme Court just last year ruled that marijuana is not "medicine" and the federal government could arrest anyone using marijuana, even for medical purposes and even in the states that have legalized its use.

John Walters, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, noted, "Smoking illegal drugs may make some people "feel better.' However, civilized societies and modern-day medical practices differentiate between inebriation and the safe, supervised delivery of proven medicine by legitimate doctors."

Rep. Mark Souder, R-Ind., chairman of the House subcommittee on criminal justice, drug policy and human resources, aptly noted, "smoked marijuana has never been approved for medical use by the FDA. For several years, the FDA allowed a limited number of seriously ill patients to use smoked marijuana. The program was terminated in 1992 when the Public Health Service stated there was no scientific evidence that the drug was assisting patients, and issued a warning that using smoked marijuana as a form of medical therapy may actually be harmful to some patients."

Perhaps that is because various studies have shown that smoked marijuana is equivalent to smoking tobacco in that it leads to the same (or even worse) health conditions, that it can cause premature cancer, addiction, coordination and perception impairment, a number of mental disorders including depression, hostility and increased aggressiveness; general apathy, memory loss, reproductive disabilities and impairment of the immune system.

DOJ_NMG_0027729

In California, Jeff Stone, a Riverside County supervisor (freeholder) and registered pharmacist, who wants to overturn that state's medical marijuana law, bases his position on the fact that many of the claims of marijuana's benefits are already addressed by better and easier-to-use FDA-approved medications. He has also expressed concerns about the increased availability of today's much more potent marijuana.

New Jersey's congressmen have addressed this topic.

Rep. Christopher H. Smith, R-N.J., recently pointed out his opposition to "medical marijuana" based on studies published in The New England Journal of Medicine and Science magazine that question the use of marijuana for those suffering from cancer, AIDS or other diseases. He also spoke of the Institute of Medicine report, often misquoted by marijuana advocates, that actually stated, "in no way do we wish to suggest that patients should, under any circumstances, medicate themselves with marijuana . . . there is no future in smoked marijuana as medicine."

Rep. H. James Saxton, R-N.J., recently noted that "there have been over 10,000 documented studies that confirm the harmful physical and psychological effects of the use of marijuana. The federal government over the past 20 years, through both Republican and Democratic administrations, has determined that marijuana has no redeeming medical or recreational value and is in fact harmful to one's health."

Saxton noted that the American Medical Association, National Cancer Institute, National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, American Cancer Society and, most importantly, the National Multiple Sclerosis Society have all rejected the use of marijuana for positive medical treatment.

Terrence P. Farley is first Ocean County assistant prosecutor and director of the county Narcotics Strike Force. He is spokesman for the New Jersey Narcotics Enforcement Officers Association and New Jersey Narcotics Task Force Commanders Association.

Limbaugh Cuts Deal In Prescription Case (AP)

AP, May 2, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. (AP) -- Rush Limbaugh declared victory Monday after signing a deal with prosecutors that will dismiss a prescription fraud charge in 18 months if he complies with the terms.

Under the deal, Limbaugh cannot own a gun, must submit to random drug tests and has to continue treatment for his acknowledged addiction to painkillers. But he did not have to admit guilt, and he continued to proclaim his innocence on his radio show.

"From my point of view, the end result will be as if I had gone to court and won, but the matter is concluded much sooner," the 55-year-old conservative commentator told his listeners. "I have spent thousands of hours and millions of dollars with lawyers over the past 27 months fighting this at every stage."

He pleaded not guilty Friday to seeking a prescription from a physician in 2003 without revealing that he had received medications from another practitioner within 30 days. The charge carries a maximum sentence of five years in prison.

The deal also requires Limbaugh to be available to a court officer for any questioning throughout the 18-month period. The Palm Beach County state attorney's office may revoke or modify the deal if he violates the terms.

Limbaugh's attorney, Roy Black, said his client has been undergoing scheduled and random drug tests as part of a voluntary treatment program and has passed them all.

Before his own problems became public, Limbaugh had decried drug use and abuse, often making the case that drug crimes deserve punishment.

Prosecutors launched their investigation in 2003 after Limbaugh's housekeeper alleged he abused OxyContin and other painkillers. He entered a five-week rehabilitation program that year and publicly blamed his addiction on back pain.

Limbaugh had blasted the investigation as a "fishing" expedition and repeatedly maintained he was innocent.

DOJ_NMG_0027730

Prosecutors accused him of illegally deceiving multiple doctors to receive overlapping prescriptions, a practice known as doctor shopping. After seizing his medical records, authorities learned Limbaugh received up to 2,000 painkillers, prescribed by four doctors in six months.

The charge against Limbaugh alleged that he illegally obtained about 40 pills, said Mike Edmondson, a state attorney's spokesman. He would not elaborate or explain why prosecutors scaled back the case.

Man Pleads Guilty To Importing, Distributing Steroids (AP)

AP, May 1, 2006

CONCORD, N.H. --A man has pleaded guilty to importing and distributing thousands of anabolic steroid pills.

Authorities say Kevin Thompson, 30, of Manchester, pleaded guilty to a variety of charges accusing him of using New Hampshire grocery stores to wire money to foreign countries such as Poland, Greece and China in order to illegally buy steroids.

Officials say 29,000 steroid pills as well as 680 vials of various human growth hormones were found at his home. He is to be sentenced on Aug. 31.

Church Fire Called 'ugly, Ugly Crime' (AZREP)

By Michael Clancy

Arizona Republic, May 2, 2006

A fire that caused $200,000 damage at Mission Bell United Methodist Church in northwest Phoenix was the city's thirteenth church fire, the tenth set on purpose, since Jan. 1 .

"I have not seen this kind of spike in church fires in 10 years, since the mid-90s," said Bob Khan, assistant chief with the Phoenix Fire Department. "This is an ugly, ugly crime. The churches, like schools, are the heart of their neighborhoods."

Khan said investigators continued to work Monday at Mission Bell, 4645 W. Bell Road, which shares its building with a Jewish congregation, Temple Gan Elohim. Besides Phoenix fire and police, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the FBI were involved, he said.

advertisement

Khan said investigators know a brick was thrown through a window, and investigators are studying whether any type of fuel was used. "We are still looking at the physical evidence," Khan said.

Joan Klein, office manager for the church, said she, pastor Todd Rogers and others spent the day talking to insurance investigators, police and fire officials and each other. High on the list of subjects: where to hold church services while repairs are under way.

Klein said the church administrative council, a group of members, would meet Wednesday to assign responsibilities.

Bill Straus, who heads the local office of the Anti-Defamation League, said the fire concerned him for two reasons.

One is that a Jewish congregation uses the facility. Last June, the church was damaged by anti-Semitic graffiti, including swastikas. "It is so important to report all incidents," Straus said, because it can help police conduct their investigation. The temple had completed its Saturday evening worship just hours before the fire was reported.

Second, Straus said, "we have had so many church attacks this year."

Khan confirmed that numbers of church fires are up, as are arson-caused blazes.

In recent years, the previous high was seven fires in 2004, four of them set on purpose, Khan said.

"At this point you have to ask what is going on," Khan said. "We need to stir up a hornets' nest and take a second look" at all church arsons.

Khan said church arsons often are "crimes of convenience." Churches, like schools, often have people around after hours, and they generally are not completely locked off from the public. In addition, few employ overnight security guards.

Nationally, churches report an estimated 1,300 fires a year. About 325 of them are arson, according to the U.S. Fire Administration.

Insurance Information Institute statistics show the proportion of arson fires among all church fires has declined from one in three in the '80s to one in four through the 1990s. Since 2000, only one of eight church fires nationally was caused by vandalism, with most of the fires starting through carelessness, old mechanical systems or accidents.

The current Phoenix rate has officials concerned about how to solve the crimes. One thing that is know is that three of four church fires are started by young men, including a high number of teens.

"They can be strategic, as in hate crimes or crimes to cover up other crimes, or they can be mere delinquency," Khan said. "But there is no such thing as a friendly arson fire."

Nor is there such as thing as an easy recovery.

A Seventh-Day Adventist church that burned in February still is waiting for building inspectors, insurance investigators and others to complete their work before rebuilding can begin.

Pastor Claudio M. Martin of North Valley Spanish Church said he hoped to get the go-ahead "in the next few weeks."

Betty Mathis, executive director of the Wesley Community Center in south Phoenix, said the Methodist-based nonprofit just has begun to rebuild after a January fire at that facility damaged its health center.

Mathis was front and center in helping Mission Bell pastor Rogers, office manager Klein and others begin their recovery.

"We are there to help," she said. "We've been in situations like this a lot."

Cliff Wright, music director at the church, said an outdoor service Sunday morning drew close to 300 people.

"It was a pretty positive service," he said. "I think a lot of people were moved."

He said he told the congregation, which calls itself "a church without walls," that it could now live up to its motto.

Temple Gan Elohim had good news of its own. Congregation members joined on the lawn on Mission Bell Sunday afternoon and agreed to hire Lisa Tzur as their new rabbi.

The church is collecting donations through an account established at United Methodist Federal Credit Union, 1550 E. Meadowbrook Ave., Phoenix, Arizona 85014.

IMMIGRATION:

From Coast To Coast, Immigrants Say 'We Need To Be Heard' (USAT)

By Judy Keen And Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, May 2, 2006

Supporters of immigrant rights boycotted businesses and schools or attended rallies in more than 40 states Monday, closing businesses from Providence to San Diego and drawing protesters to rallies from Anchorage to Atlanta.

The protests, called "A Day Without Immigrants" or el gran paro — "the big stop" — were meant to disrupt commerce and highlight the U.S. economy's reliance on immigrant workers.

Hundreds of thousands of people marched in Los Angeles and Chicago. Supporters in New York City formed human chains on sidewalks to protest a bill passed by the House of Representatives that would make illegal immigration a felony. Thousands more filled Manhattan's Union Square.

Debate in Congress over changes in immigration law has "woken up a sleeping giant," said Raul Garcia, 38, who joined a Chicago crowd estimated by police at 400,000. "We can make a difference."

In Los Angeles, the wholesale produce market and garment factories closed, ports were quiet, and traffic eased. Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa estimated up to 400,000 people participated in two marches. The Los Angeles Unified School District, which is 73% Hispanic, said 27% of middle- and high-school students were absent.

Some companies closed in anticipation of worker absences. Perdue Farms closed eight of its 14 chicken processing plants, Goya Foods halted deliveries, and Tyson Foods shut 12 of 100 plants. But casinos in Las Vegas stayed open. Julie Craven of Hormel Foods said the company's 22 plants were open and had fewer absences than on a typical Monday.

Some supporters of immigrant rights, including Cardinal Roger Mahony of Los Angeles, were cautious about endorsing boycotts. Organizers in Chicago promoted the march instead. Sen. Mel Martinez, R-Fla., who came to the USA as a Cuban refugee, called boycotts counterproductive. "This is an issue that isn't going to get fixed on the streets," he said. Scott McClellan, President Bush's spokesman, said Bush "is not a fan of boycotts."

Most gatherings were festive and peaceful. In Denver, where about 75,000 attended a rally, Mayor John Hickenlooper said the gathering "wasn't about anger or about hate."

DOJ_NMG_0027732

There were some counterdemonstrations. About 200 people — some with signs that read "What part of illegal don't you understand?" — were in Centennial Park in Fort Myers, Fla. In Denver, about 50 people gathered to object to illegal immigration. Annette Palmer, 49, said she lost her telemarketing job last summer because she couldn't speak Spanish and refused to take lessons. "I can't even get a job now at McDonald's because they want bilingual," she said.

In Los Angeles, accountant Melrose Larry Green, 55, waved a handwritten sign reading, "Get in line." He said immigrants cost the USA "millions of dollars." Noel Breen, 49, general manager of a Radisson Hotel in Whittier, Calif., disagreed. "These people work their butts off," he said. "Without them, the hospitality industry in this country would be out of business."

Harry Holzer, a professor of public policy at Georgetown University in Washington, said many studies show immigrant labor has little impact on U.S.-born workers with at least a high school education, but that immigrant workers help keep down the cost of food, housing, child care and other services.

"The costs and the benefits to the overall U.S. economy are not large," but legal immigrants and their children contribute more to the economy over the long term than they take from it, he said.

The impact of the protests was felt in communities of every size:

• About 4,500 people participated in a rally in Atlanta. The crowd was much smaller than the estimated 30,000-40,000 who attended a march April 10. Armado Topete, 45, lost about $2,000 by closing his bridal shop in Norcross, Ga., for the day. Topete, a U.S. citizen, said it was important to speak out for other immigrants. "We pay taxes," he said. "We do everything for this country. We want respect."

• About half the 1,600 hourly workers at Tanimura & Antle, a large vegetable grower in Salinas, Calif., took the day off. "We sat down with everybody and talked to them and supported them in what they wanted to do," said Ken Silveira, company president.

Manuel Cunha, president of the Nisei Farm League, which represents 1,000 growers in California's Central Valley, said some could be hurt. "One day will not destroy a business," he said. "But one day could hurt a business because of trying to pick up lost time."

• Hundreds of students at White Plains (N.Y.) High School walked out after their first class and marched to the courthouse. "It's the right thing to do," said Nayal Howard, 18.

• At Elementary School 96 in Indianapolis, where more than half the students are Hispanic, about a quarter of students were absent. Students at George Washington Community School there wore white T-shirts, the unofficial uniform of the protesters.

• David Watkins of Merrifield Garden Center in Merrifield, Va., had five landscaping crews at work instead of the usual 60. "The ultimate impact of not having that labor force was tremendous," he said. "If it lasted any length of time, we'd be in trouble."

• In Bonita Springs, Fla., some immigrant laborers gathered as usual, hoping for work. "If we don't work, we don't eat," said Rodriguez Lopez, 44.

• In Storm Lake, Iowa, some Tyson Foods workers complained about the plant's closure. "Mexicans were in the hall shouting, 'Yeah, we did it!' But I'll be out $130 because of it. Why am I losing money?" said Robin Book, 49.

• In Phoenix, protesters gathered at Home Depot and Wal-Mart stores to form human chains. Trinidad Monge, 52, said she closed her beauty shop to "help people get their papers to work legally."

Gilberto Villasenor of V and V Supremo Foods in Chicago gave his 200 workers the day off with pay. "We need to be heard," he said.

Immigrants Walk Off The Job In Boycott (AP-Y2)

By Gillian Flaccus

AP2, May 1, 2006

Hundreds of thousands of mostly Hispanic immigrants skipped work and took to the streets Monday, flexing their economic muscle in a nationwide boycott that succeeded in slowing or shutting many farms, factories, markets and restaurants.

From Los Angeles to Chicago, Houston to New Orleans, the "Day Without Immigrants" attracted widespread participation despite divisions among activists over whether a boycott would send the right message to Washington lawmakers considering sweeping immigration reform.

DOJ_NMG_0027733

"We are the backbone of what America is, legal or illegal, it doesn't matter," said Melanie Lugo, who with her husband and their third-grade daughter joined a rally of some 75,000 in Denver. "We butter each other's bread. They need us as much as we need them."

Police estimated 400,000 people marched through Chicago's business district. In Los Angeles, there was no announced count, but one law enforcement official put it at about 300,000. Tens of thousands more marched in New York, along with about 15,000 in Houston and 30,000 more across Florida. Smaller rallies in cities from Pennsylvania and Connecticut to Arizona and South Dakota attracted hundreds not thousands.

In Los Angeles, protesters wearing white and waving U.S. flags sang the national anthem in English as traditional Mexican dancers wove through the crowd. In Chicago, illegal immigrants from Ireland and Poland marched alongside Hispanics as office workers on lunch breaks clapped. In Phoenix, protesters formed a human chain in front of Wal-Mart and Home Depot stores. A protest in Tijuana, Mexico, blocked vehicle traffic heading to San Diego at the world's busiest border crossing.

Many carried signs in Spanish that translated to "We are America" and "Today we march, tomorrow we vote." Others waved Mexican flags or wore hats and scarves from their native countries. Some chanted "USA" while others shouted slogans, such as "Si se puede!" Spanish for "Yes, it can be done!" Others were more irreverent, wearing T-shirts that read "I'm illegal. So what?"

The White House reacted coolly.

"The president is not a fan of boycotts," said press secretary Scott McClellan. "People have the right to peacefully express their views, but the president wants to see comprehensive reform pass the Congress so that he can sign it into law."

The boycott was organized by immigrant activists angered by federal legislation that would criminalize illegal immigrants and fortify the U.S-Mexico border. Its goal was to raise awareness about immigrants' economic power.

Industries that rely on immigrant workers were clearly affected, though the impact was not uniform.

Tyson Foods Inc., the world's largest meat producer, shuttered about a dozen of its more than 100 plants and saw "higher-than-usual absenteeism" at others. Most of the closures were in states such as Iowa and Nebraska. Eight of 14 Perdue Farms chicken plants also closed for the day.

Goya Foods, which bills itself as the nation's largest Hispanic-owned food chain, suspended delivery everywhere except Florida, saying it wanted to express solidarity with immigrants who are its primary customers.

None of the 175 seasonal laborers who normally work Mike Collins' 500 acres of Vidalia onion fields in southeastern Georgia showed up.

"We need to be going wide open this time of year to get these onions out of the field," he said. "We've got orders to fill. Losing a day in this part of the season causes a tremendous amount of problems."

It was the same story in Indiana, where the owner of a landscaping business said he was at a loss. About 25 Hispanic workers — 90 percent of the field work force — never reported Monday to Salsbery Brothers Landscaping.

"We're basically shut down in our busiest month of the year," said owner Jeff Salsbery. "It's going to cost me thousands of dollars."

In the Los Angeles area, restaurants and markets were dark and truckers avoided the nation's largest shipping port. About one in three small businesses was closed downtown, including the cluttered produce market and fashion district.

The construction and nursery industries were among the hardest hit by the work stoppage in Florida.

Bill Spann, executive vice president of the Associated General Contractors of Greater Florida said more than half the workers at construction sites in Miami-Dade County did not show up Monday.

"If I lose my job, it's worth it," said Jose Cruz, an immigrant from El Salvador who protested with several thousand others in the rural Florida city of Homestead rather than work his construction job. "It's worth losing several jobs to get my papers."

But the effect was minimal in some places. On Manhattan's busy 14th Street, only a few shops were closed, including a Spanish-language bookstore and a tiny Latin American restaurant.

The impact on some school systems was significant. In the sprawling Los Angeles Unified School District, which is 73 percent Hispanic, about 72,000 middle and high school students were absent — roughly one in every four.

In San Francisco, Benita Olmedo pulled her 11-year-old daughter and 7-year-old son from school.

DOJ_NMG_0027734

"I want my children to know their mother is not a criminal," said Olmedo, a nanny who came here illegally in 1986 from Mexico. "I want them to be as strong I am. This shows our strength."

Truck traffic at the twin ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach — the nation's largest port complex — was off 90 percent, said spokeswoman Theresa Adams Lopez.

Some of the rallies drew small numbers of counter-protesters, including one in Pensacola, Fla.

"You should send all of the 13 million aliens home, then you take all of the welfare recipients who are taking a free check and make them do those jobs," said Jack Culberson, a retired Army colonel who attended the Pensacola rally. "It's as simple as that."

Jesse Hernandez, who owns a Birmingham, Ala., company that supplies Hispanic laborers to companies around the Southeast, shut down his four-person office in solidarity with the demonstrations.

"Unfortunately," he said, "human nature is that you don't really know what you have until you don't have it."

Immigrants Take To U.S. Streets In Show Of Strength (NYT)

By Randal C. Archibold

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

LOS ANGELES, May 1 — Hundreds of thousands of immigrants and their supporters skipped work, school and shopping on Monday and marched in dozens of cities from coast to coast.

The demonstrations did not bring the nation to a halt as planned by some organizers, though they did cause some disruptions and conveyed in peaceful but sometimes boisterous ways the resolve of those who favor loosening the country's laws on immigration.

Originally billed as a nationwide economic boycott under the banner "Day Without an Immigrant," the day evolved into a sweeping round of protests intended to influence the debate in Congress over granting legal status to all or most of the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants in the country.

The protesters, a mix of illegal immigrants and legal residents and citizens, were mostly Latino, but in contrast to similar demonstrations in the past two months, large numbers of people of other ethnicities joined or endorsed many of the events. In some cases, the rallies took on a broader tone of social action, as gay rights advocates, opponents of the war in Iraq and others without a direct stake in the immigration debate took to the streets.

"I think it's only fair that I speak up for those who can't speak for themselves," said Aimee Hernandez, 28, one of an estimated 400,000 people who turned out in Chicago, the site of one of the largest demonstrations. "I think we're just too many that you can't just send them back. How are you going to ignore these people?"

But among those who favor stricter controls on illegal immigration, the protests hardly impressed.

"When the rule of law is dictated by a mob of illegal aliens taking to the streets, especially under a foreign flag, then that means the nation is not governed by a rule of law — it is a mobocracy," Jim Gilchrist, a founder of the Minutemen Project, a volunteer group that patrols the United States-Mexico border, said in an interview.

While the boycott, an idea born several months ago among a small group of grass-roots immigration advocates here, may not have shut down the country, it was strongly felt in a variety of places, particularly those with large Latino populations.

Stores and restaurants in Los Angeles, Chicago and New York closed because workers did not show up or as a display of solidarity with demonstrators. In Los Angeles, the police estimated that more than half a million people attended two demonstrations in and near downtown. School districts in several cities reported a decline in attendance; at Benito Juarez High School in Pilsen, a predominantly Latino neighborhood in Chicago, only 17 percent of the students showed up, even though administrators and some protest organizers had urged students to stay in school.

Lettuce, tomatoes and grapes went unpicked in fields in California and Arizona, which contribute more than half the nation's produce, as scores of growers let workers take the day off. Truckers who move 70 percent of the goods in ports in Los Angeles and Long Beach, Calif., did not work.

Meatpacking companies, including Tyson Foods and Cargill, closed plants in the Midwest and the West employing more than 20,000 people, while the flower and produce markets in downtown Los Angeles stood largely and eerily empty.

DOJ_NMG_0027735

Israel Banuelos, 23, and more than 50 of his colleagues skipped work, with the grudging acceptance of his employer, an industrial paint plant in Hollister, Calif.

"We were supposed to work," Mr. Banuelos said, "but we wanted to close down the company. Our boss didn't like it money-wise."

The economic impact of the day's events was hard to gauge, though economists expected a one-day stoppage to have little long-term effect. In large swaths of the country, life went on with no noticeable difference. But protesters in numerous cities, many clad in white and waving mostly American flags in response to complaints that earlier rallies featured too many Latin American ones, declared victory as chanting throngs shut down streets.

Most of the demonstrators' ire was directed at a bill passed by the House that would increase security at the border while making it a felony for an illegal immigrant to be in the country or to aid one. The marchers generally favored a plan in the Senate, for which President Bush has shown signs of support, that would include more protection at the border but offer many illegal workers a path to citizenship.

Still, the divide among advocates over the value and effectiveness of a boycott resulted in some cities, including Los Angeles and San Diego, playing host to two sizable demonstrations, one organized by boycotters and the other by people neutral or opposed to it.

That split played out across the country. While many business owners warned employees about taking the day off, many others also sought to negotiate time off or other ways to register workers' sentiments.

Las Vegas casinos reported few disruptions, partly because many of their owners announced their support for workers at a news conference last week. On Monday, more than 40 casinos set up tables in employee lunchrooms for workers to sign pro-immigration petitions.

Leaders of Local 226 of the Culinary Workers Union also urged members to go to work. The union is Las Vegas's largest hospitality union, representing 50,000 workers, of which 40 percent are Hispanic.

Smaller businesses in Las Vegas, where tens of thousands of demonstrators gathered on the Strip, also took a hit. Javier Barajas said he closed his family's four Mexican restaurants in Las Vegas because members of his staff warned him they would not show up, costing him more than $60,000 in revenue.

"I cannot fire anybody over this, but I would have liked to see some other way to express themselves," said Mr. Barajas, who was once an illegal immigrant from central Mexico but became a United States citizen. "It's the small businesses that are hurt by this."

For many immigrants, however, it was just another workday.

At a Home Depot in Hollywood, day laborers as always crowded parking lot entrances, hoping for work. At a car wash in the Echo Park neighborhood of Los Angeles, employees buzzed, with workers vacuuming, buffing and drying cars. People lined up at markets, though some reported slower business.

"I was thinking about not buying things, but then I needed to buy stuff," said Alex Sanchez, 28, a construction worker buying an avocado, chilies and beer.

The boycott grew from an idea hatched by a small band of grass-roots advocates in Los Angeles, inspired by the farmworker movement of the 1960's led by Cesar Chavez and Bert Corona. Through the Internet and mass media catering to immigrants, they developed and tapped a network of union organizers, immigrant rights groups and others to spread the word and plan events tied to the boycott, timed to coincide with International Workers' Day.

The Los Angeles organizers said some 70 cities held boycott activities.

The day spawned all manner of supportive actions here. A department store chain offered space for lawyers to give legal advice to immigrants; in Hollywood, the comedian Paul Rodriguez appeared at the comedy club the Laugh Factory to promote a daylong health care fair for immigrant workers.

In Chicago, there was solidarity in diversity, as Latinos were joined by immigrants of Polish, Irish, Asian and African descent. Jerry Jablonski, 30, said he had moved to Chicago from Poland six years ago, flying to Mexico and then crossing the border. He now works a construction job.

"Poland is my old country," Mr. Jablonski said. "This is my new country. I can make everything happen here."

DOJ_NMG_0027736

Immigrants Take Economic Impact To The Streets (LAT)

By Michael Muskal And Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, May 2, 2006

Across the country, hundreds of thousands of Latino immigrants and their supporters took to the streets to demonstrate that they are a political and economic presence that can't be ignored.

Marches in Los Angeles and Chicago, demonstrations in New York and boycotts that forced closures of Midwest and Southern meat-packing plants marked a day when immigration rights activists again called for a new policy, the first in two decades.

The earliest marches began this morning in Florida, quickly followed by protests in New Orleans and Denver, where tens of thousands marched to the state Capitol.

In Chicago, the site of violence in 1886 that turned May 1 into an international labor holiday celebrating the right of legal protest, as many as 300,000 were reportedly marching toward the city's civic center. Smaller rallies were planned in more than 50 other cities nationwide.

Ernest Calderon, 38, came to the Chicago rally with a sign listing the names of his heroes: Abraham Lincoln, John F. Kennedy and Pancho Villa.

"Our heroes understood that they had to fight for freedom and democracy, and we are here doing the same," Calderon, a concrete worker who came from Mexico and gained his citizenship more than a decade ago, told the Associated Press. "We are here for the same reasons."

Washington has been debating its first major revision of immigration policy in two decades. There is bipartisan support for toughening border security, but the key issues of how to deal with the estimated 11 million to 12 million undocumented workers in the United States and a guest worker plan has opened fissures in both parties.

The issue has also created unusual political alliances. Major industries, including parts of agriculture, apparel and tourism, have joined with labor unions and human rights activists to support changes. Conservatives in both the Democrat and Republican parties have opposed guest-worker programs and paths for citizenship for those illegally in the United States, insisting that border security had a higher priority.

President Bush supports a guest-worker program and has praised a Senate approach, backed by top Republicans and Democrats. The House has passed a harsher plan that among other provisions would make it a felony to be an illegal immigrant or to assist them.

Most economist said there would be little long-term impact from the boycotts — but there were visible signs of dislocation.

Some major U.S. companies, dependent on Latino immigrant labor, announced that they would be closed for the day. Tyson Foods, the world's largest meat producer, shut nine U.S. beef plants and four pork plants. Cargill, the second-largest meatpacker, also closed some plants. Six of 14 Perdue Farms plants were closed.

Gallo Wines in Sonoma, Calif., gave its 150 workers the day off. Restaurants across the country were forced to close or to limit their hours.

The sharp social divisions on the immigration issue were also felt in non-Latino communities where immigrants had faced the same issues.

In Miami, Fla., Stanislav Fridman said he got from the Soviet Ukraine to South Florida the legal way, with a visa and enough hustle to propel his extended Russian family into the good life.

But the 43-year-old taxi fleet manager said he doesn't begrudge those who cut legal corners or climb fences in pursuit of their own share of the American dream.

Today's events provoked emotional solidarity with undocumented immigrants but not to an extent that would come out of his pocket.

"It's not an easy life here. It's real hard work and immigrants know that the best," he said. "We all understand each other, but we're not united. Everyone is out for himself."

DOJ_NMG_0027737

A burly, jovial man with a wife in real estate and two sons thriving in the upscale Sunny Isles Beach public school system, Fridman, who has been a U.S. citizen since 1984, socializes and identifies with the Russian community, less so with the ethnically and politically factionalized Latinos.

He waves off as hypocrisy the contentions of anti-immigrant conservatives that others don't have the right to seek opportunities in his adopted nation.

"This is an immigrant country. Only Native Americans come from here. Everybody else's parents came from someplace else," he said, taking both hands off the steering wheel to gesture in all directions. "Even the rednecks in Texas -- their relatives came from somewhere else!"

Despite large crowds that thronged through downtown Denver, it was mostly business as usual at the Denver International Airport, with restaurants, newsstands and shops fully staffed.

Several immigrants said they had contemplated taking the day off to rally, but decided that earning their paycheck was more important than making a political statement. Others said they were doubtful the protest would have any practical effect.

Delia Rivera's employer, the Cantina Grill restaurant chain, offered workers the day off and even provided transportation to the rally in downtown Denver. But Rivera chose to put on her white uniform, slick her hair into a ponytail and assemble taco salads for her regular eight-hour shift.

"I think it will cause more problems. I think it will bring more racism," said Rivera, 19, who emigrated from Mexico when she was a toddler. "I worry that you'll be walking down the street and someone will see you as Hispanic and get mad that you're here."

At a large immigration rally at Houston's Memorial Park, Latinos waved American and Mexican flags, shouted chants, listened to mariachi music as police on horseback watched from the sidelines.

Standing under the shade of a tree, Wilfred Navarro, a 77 year old retired Houston police officer, attended the rally with four generations of his family, including his daughters, grandchildren and great grandchildren.

"Immigrants work hard and contribute to society. It should not be so hard for them to become citizens," said the Texas native whose grandfather was the first in his family to cross into Texas from Mexico. "We sympathize what they are going through. They should have the same privileges as other Americans."

The boycott made a mixed impact in Phoenix, where some restaurants and supermarkets were closed, but many immigrants were still working. Across the street from one pro-immigrant rally, several Latino workers clambered on the roof of a shopping center, finishing new store buildings.

Benjamin Ruiz, 32, said that after work he'll refrain from shopping and will join in a candlelight vigil planned for tonight, but he could not get the day off.

"There's a lot of pressure for us to be here," said. Ruiz, an electrician. "I'll make my impact felt at home."

Larger crowds gathered at two Home Depots, where several hundred people shielded themselves from the searing desert sun with umbrellas, waved American flags and chanted "Si se puede!" (Yes we can) and "Aqui estamos! Y no nos vamos!" (We're here and we're not leaving.)

Jose Cruz said that most of his fellow employees at a company that installs shower doors were given the day off.

"He supports all of us," Cruz, 34, said of his boss, who is Anglo. "He wants all of us out here supporting other Latinos."

In Seattle, officials were preparing for thousands of protesters to take part in a late afternoon march in the downtown area. But there was hardly any other visible signs of protest in Seattle.

Pete Kosin, 31, a Ukrainian immigrant who works on office interiors for a construction company, said he never considered taking the day off despite his uncertain future in the United States. The Seattle resident said his visa is going to expire soon and he is not sure what he will do.

"I understand why people are marching. It's frustrating — immigrants are invisible in this country," said Kosin as he smoked a cigarette near a downtown office building. "But I have no backup — I lose my job, or get in trouble at some protest, I'm done. I can't afford it."

In the opposite corner of the country, immigration protests and rallies in Miami were notable for the absence of the area's two largest immigrant groups: Cubans and Haitians.

DOJ_NMG_0027738

The small shows of defiance — at least in comparison with the massive marches in other immigrant-rich cities — testify to the disproportionate political power wielded by conservative Cubans and the disinterest among hard-working Haitians to lose time and money in a symbolic gesture.

Just back from a cross-country trip to Los Angeles , trucker Sergio Diaz was virtually a lone Cuban voice among the 1,000 or so demonstrators gathered in the Orange Bowl parking lot for what was billed as Miami's main event.

"I think Cubans do support the whole Hispanic community, but the reason you don't see so many here is because we have our law and we have been living here legally," Diaz, 46, said of the U.S. government's "Wet-Foot, Dry-Foot" policy for Cuban migrants. Those who make it to U.S. shores are generally allowed to stay and apply for residency, while those intercepted at sea are repatriated to Cuba or a third country.

Haitians, who cut a significantly lower profile in Florida politics despite having roughly equal numbers to the Cubans, share interest in the plight of undocumented immigrants but insisted that it was more important to put food on the table.

"In the last few days my car has been disabled. I need to make some money," said Haitian-born cabdriver Joseph Louis.

Throngs Show Their Potent Role In Economy (LAT)

By David Streitfeld

The Los Angeles Times, May 2, 2006

Immigrant workers powerfully asserted their importance Monday, making clear they are vital to California's economy. Without us, they declared, industries would tremble, jobs go undone and prices rise.

Dolls from China, DVD players from Japan and shirts from Malaysia piled up at the ports. Lettuce wasn't picked in Blythe and strawberries languished in Oxnard. On one block of L.A.'s Koreatown, only two out of nine businesses were open. The garment district was nearly deserted.

By itself, the "Day Without Immigrants" won't hurt the economy in the long run, analysts said. Shoppers will quickly go back to shopping and workers to working.

The economic message, however, was emphatic and unmistakable.

"This was a reality check," said Economic Roundtable President Daniel Flaming. "You can't wish away these workers. They are rooted in the community. Not everyone realized that before."

Flaming and others have extensively studied the role played by recent arrivals, both legal and illegal. The protests provided vivid evidence that the bulk of the country's estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants don't just cut lawns and wash dishes in restaurants.

This is an unusual protest movement. There's little precedent in American history for a simultaneous combination of consumer boycotts, demonstrations and work stoppages. And there's none for a labor rights struggle that is cheered on by many employers.

"I don't remember hearing a single major business group complaining about today's actions," said Stephen Levy, director of the Center for Continuing Study of the California Economy.

Employers haven't suddenly grown more compassionate. In this era of low unemployment, they are eager to have sources of cheap labor. And they fear the sanctions that would accompany a serious crackdown on illegal hiring.

Beyond this, Levy said, there is a sense that everyone is complicit. "I've hired a housekeeper or a gardener or a baby-sitter where I certainly didn't check their papers," he said. "There's an acknowledgment here that we're all involved."

The industries hit the hardest Monday were agriculture, long the domain of immigrants, and, somewhat surprisingly, the ports.

At the nation's largest seaport complex, the ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach, as few as 10% of the truckers showed up to haul freight.

"It's eerie, looking out at the Vincent Thomas Bridge with no trucks on it. It just looks kind of flat and lonely," said Teresa Adams Lopez, a spokeswoman for the Port of Los Angeles.

The 110, 710 and 47 freeways — the latter includes the Vincent Thomas Bridge — had only a few of the rigs that are normally so thick that motorists sometimes miss their exits because the trucks obscure the signs.

DOJ_NMG_0027739

The work stoppage was quickly seized upon by union organizers, who hoped to redirect it into traditional labor activism. Organizers with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters made their case in several locations while in Wilmington's Banning Park, an independent movement to form a Los Angeles Port Truckers Assn. was gathering signatures. So far, every effort to organize most of the 10,000 drivers who work the ports has failed.

One driver who stayed away, 24-year-old George Fernandez of Los Angeles, said he supported the immigration rights movement. But he added that the drivers, who clear as little as $20,000 annually after their overhead, were also hoping for "some sort of relief from all the costs, like for fuel, and the low pay and the working conditions."

The effect in the fields was even more significant.

"No one is packing today," said strawberry grower Hector Gutierrez, managing partner of Otilio Farms in Oxnard. "This will put us behind, and we might have to throw some overripe fruit away."

Operations at Bart Fisher's 10,000-acre ranch in Blythe came to a halt as his 120 workers disappeared for the day. "We don't even have a tractor operating," said Fisher, who grows hay, lettuce, broccoli, melons and cotton.

On some farms it was a normal Monday. Tulare dairyman Rob Fletcher was relieved when his milkers, all immigrants, showed up to work his 700 cows.

Overall, however, it was apparently the biggest agricultural work stoppage on record in the state. The 1973 grape strike in the Coachella and San Joaquin valleys and 1970's Salinas Valley vegetable strike had been the largest.

"But both of them only involved targeted crops and didn't come close to the numbers of farm workers participating today," said Marc Grossman, a spokesman for the United Farm Workers union. The state's year-round farm workforce numbers about 225,000, according to the California Farm Bureau Federation.

It wasn't just the size of the farm worker protest that was eye-opening but the unusual harmony between growers and workers.

In Greenfield, south of Salinas, the frontage roads along U.S. 101 were lined with idled tractors, trailers and harvesters in a show of solidarity.

"The harvest companies are giving their workers the opportunity to bring out the equipment and make a statement," Greenfield Mayor John Huerta said.

It was a shift in attitude that Huerta — the son of a Mexican employed in the bracero guest worker program in the 1940s who went on to become a United Farm Workers organizer — found "amazing."

Across the nation, the protests touched many industries but hurt only a few. Major meat producers, including Tyson Foods Inc., Perdue Farms Inc., Cargill Inc. and Swift & Co., closed or cut back work at dozens of plants. Another industry that depends heavily on Latino labor, construction, also took a hit.

The protests were telegraphed far in advance, which intentionally muted their effect. Michael Niemira of the International Council of Shopping Centers said he didn't expect the demonstrations or boycott to have significant economic repercussions.

But he added, "From the political side, it made a statement."

A small, informal survey conducted by the California Assn. of Employers found that very few businesses shut down or operated with skeleton crews. The vast majority of the 88 firms surveyed operated normally.

"When you know it's a one-day thing, as an employer you say, 'We're going to survive it, and we're going to run our business as usual,' " said Kim Parker, executive vice president of the trade group.

In some parts of Los Angeles, however, the fallout was far greater. Some shopkeepers opened and then quickly gave up. "There's no business," said Sueli Shin, manager of Pelicana Fashion, a wholesaler of party dresses in the garment district. She had locked the door by 10:15 a.m.

Much of Koreatown was shuttered. One factor was the neighborhood's large Latino population. But some business owners, noting their proximity to the march route on Wilshire Boulevard, expressed fears that the demonstrations might get out of hand.

On a normal day, Ham Hung restaurant serves lunch to 200 people. On Monday, there were only 70 customers. Many "stayed away because of news reports that warned people not to drive around downtown," said assistant manager Calvin Zhin.

He noted that he lives in the San Fernando Valley and made it to work in record time. "Great day for driving, horrible day for business," Zhin said.

DOJ_NMG_0027740

After Marches, Finding The Way Forward (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe And Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, May 2, 2006

They've staged marches, rallies and boycotts.

They've brought hundreds of thousands of people into the streets.

They've thrust themselves into the headlines and broadcasts of the nation's major media.

Now what?

As immigrants and their supporters boycotted work and school, refrained from consumer spending and marched in cities across the nation, the urgent question they face is how to translate the passion of the streets into lasting political gains.

Immigrant rights organizers said Monday's marches marked the last major street demonstrations they plan until September, when they hope to draw 1 million protesters to Washington D.C.

Until then, they will shift their energy into making a difference at the polls through registering voters, helping legal immigrants become citizens and getting out the vote in June primary elections around the nation.

"We understand that marching is not a solution but that we need to organize in a strategic way," said Hilda Delgado of Local 1877 of the Service Employees International Union in Los Angeles.

Organizers have their work cut out for them. According to the Pew Hispanic Center, only 39% of the nation's 41 million Latinos are eligible to vote_compared to 76% for whites and 65% for blacks. Among 16 million eligible Latino voters, fewer than half actually voted in the 2004 general election.

As a result, said the Pew center director Roberto Suro, Latinos will need to convince the broader public that legislation expanding guest worker programs and offering undocumented immigrants a chance to legalize is good for the nation.

That message, however, will be fought by immigration control advocates, who say the past two months of marches and rallies have energized their forces and drawn new recruits to their cause of cracking down on illegal immigration.

Since the March 25 Los Angeles march startled the nation by drawing 500,000 people into the streets, the Phoenix-based Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, which monitors the nation's borders, has significantly increased its volunteers, fundraising and Web site traffic, said spokeswoman Connie Hair.

She said 400 new volunteers joined the group in the first week after the march, compared to a normal flow of about 135. An Internet appeal for support to begin building private fences on private land along the U.S.-Mexican border has raised $150,000 in a week. The group's Web traffic has quadrupled to 36,000 hits per day, she said.

"(The marches) have focused the American people's attention on people marching in the streets and waving Mexican flags...who may not be grateful for the taxpayer-subsidized benefits they're getting and who are jumping in line ahead of those who are doing it legally," Hair said. "There is a quiet rage building."

In Washington, where the Senate may resume debate on an immigration bill as early as next week, a few congressional officials said the demonstrations served to keep the issue on the agenda. But most lawmakers warned that the rallies could polarize the public, make it harder for Congress to negotiate the thorny issue and create a backlash against immigrants — on the Hill and off.

"To get thoughtful legislation passed is going to be harder the more emotions get inflamed on either side of the debate," said Rep. Mary Bono, R-Palm Springs. "It's overwhelmingly polarizing people and the majority of my constituents are upset about [the boycott]."

Conservative Republicans who backed the House legislation dismissed suggestions that the demonstrations would move them to soften their legislative stance, or that members had any regret about passing a bill that has sparked such opposition.

"Opponents of the bill have demagogued it and misled people; that's been their strategy," said Jeff Lungren, a spokesman for the House bill's main author, Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.).

On Monday, Republicans on both sides were voicing their unhappiness with the demonstrations. "On the basis of what I've heard in public meetings, these demonstrations are making people less and less inclined to support them," said Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas), a member of the House's Immigration Reform Caucus, which promotes an enforcement-only approach. Smith and Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), who heads the caucus, cited polls that show similar results.

DOJ_NMG_0027741

A Rasmussen poll released last week showed that 26% of Americans hold a favorable opinion of immigration demonstrations, while 56% do not.

Immigrant rights advocates are well aware that they need to transform the marchers into voters for lasting gains. On Monday, many marchers in downtown Los Angeles held signs in Spanish, "Today we march, tomorrow we vote."

Such influential figures as Spanish-language radio DJ Eduardo "El Piolin" Sotelo urged crowds to become U.S. citizens_a suggestion greeted with a roar of approval.

One immigrant who may do just that is Juan Almendares, a 31-year-old Garden Grove legal resident who runs a gardening firm with his brother.

The brothers took the day off because "it's the right thing to do. We have to be heard," Almendares said.

"I never thought I would say it or even think it, but this whole thing makes me want to vote in this country and I'm seriously thinking of becoming a U.S. citizen now," he said.

"We can't just protest because it's like we are protesting to ourselves. Who is listening? Look around. There is no one here except Mexicans like us."

Washington Wire (WSJ)

By Various Writers

Wall Street Journal, May 1, 2006

May 1, 2006, 8:22 pm

Emergency Room Emergency

Emergency patients are receiving less attention because of physician shortages and are more likely to be admitted without a bed for four hours or more, according to a new report by the American College of Emergency Physicians.

“Emergency medicine is in a state of emergency itself and patients are suffering,” said Dr. Frederick Blum, ACEP’s president.

In 2004, patients received inadequate on-call care according to two-thirds of emergency department directors. Last year, three-fourths directors surveyed from 1,327 hospital emergency departments now say service is inadequate. Nearly half of the directors surveyed in the 2005 report said one to five patients per day were admitted without beds.

The report seeks to measure the impact of 2003 regulation changes to the Emergency Medical Treatment and Labor Act that allow specialists to stretch their services at more than one hospital. – Shearon Roberts

May 1, 2006, 6:16 pm

Probable Cause

NBC Sports executive Dick Ebersol plans to attend a hearing Tuesday examining what caused a 2004 jet crash that killed his 14-year-old son, Teddy, and two others. At Tuesday’s meeting, the National Transportation Safety Board will consider a preliminary report by investigators and vote on the probable cause.

At issue in the crash of the twin-engine Canadair jet is whether ice on the wings contributed to the accident. There were conflicting reports as to whether ice was present, and the plane took off without deicing. The crash seriously injured Dick Ebersol and his 21-year-old son, Charlie, who dragged his father out of the fiery wreckage.

Mr. Ebersol’s attorney, Robert Clifford, said his client will review the board’s findings before deciding whether to file suit against anybody involved.

Also killed in the crash were pilot Luis Alberto Polanco-Espiallat, 50, and flight attendant Warren Richardson III, 36. – Laura Meckler

May 1, 2006, 3:14 pm

Cautious Optimism

Hours into the Great American Boycott, advocates of a guest worker program for illegal immigrants expressed confidence that Monday’s event wouldn’t make passage of comprehensive reform legislation more difficult. “Not much” of a backlash from conservatives, predicted one senior White House official. Another Bush adviser credited some large employers with minimizing conflict by giving workers the day off. An aide to Democrat Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, co-sponsor of a comprehensive

DOJ_NMG_0027742

Senate bill along with Republican John McCain of Arizona, said their effort will get a boost from the boycott — because it keeps the issue in the spotlight at a time when rising gas prices threaten to elbow everything else off Washington's political agenda. –John Harwood

May 1, 2006, 3:01 pm

Falling Behind in the Obesity Battle

Despite mounting concern over childhood obesity, most states have failed to implement federal physical-education recommendations, according to a report to be released Tuesday afternoon.

The "Shape of the Nation" report — from the National Association for Sport and Physical Education and the American Heart Association — is expected to say that most states are not following PE advice from the U.S. Surgeon General and the Centers of Disease Control and Prevention. Both recommend that schools require daily PE for all K-12 students.

The new report updates a 2001 version that showed that 27 states allowed students to substitute other classes for PE. Some school districts exempt athletes and marching band members. The 2001 report said most high school students took PE classes for only one of their four years.

A sedentary lifestyle contributes to obesity, a risk factor for heart disease and stroke. In the past 30 years, the obesity rate has more than tripled for children ages 6 to 11 and more than doubled for those in the 2 to 5 and 12 to 19 age groups, according to a 2004 report by the Institute of Medicine, part of the National Academy of Sciences. About nine million American children over six years old are considered obese.

The American Academy of Pediatrics, in a statement issued today, is asking pediatricians to record children's activity levels and recommend that parents prevent children under 2 from watching TV and to allow those older than 2 no more than two hours of TV every day. –Jane Zhang

May 1, 2006, 12:34 pm

Those Wild and Crazy Swiss

The Swiss embassy announced a five-hour Sudoku contest for May 13, starting at 10 a.m. Sudoku — a mind-bending logic exercise that is the equivalent of a crossword puzzle for the numerate — is usually played alone. But the embassy promises players they can "test [their]patience and strategy against like-minded players." Grand prize is a coffee machine.

Switzerland's connection to a puzzle that was first popularized in Japan and uses a Japanese name? The embassy says a Sudoku puzzle is a Latin square, which in turn is an arrangement of numbers in which no column or row contains the same number twice. Swiss mathematician Leonhard Euler (1707-1783) was the first person to show how to mathematically construct Latin squares, the embassy says. –June Kronholz

May 1, 2006, 10:00 am

Medicare Report Draws Fire

The latest report on the financial health of Medicare and Social Security is drawing fire before it's even released. Lawmakers criticize President Bush for reappointing the programs' two public trustees, John Palmer and Thomas Saving, during a congressional recess. In letters sent last week to the president and the trustees, the lawmakers say the two men should not sign this year's report, due out later today.

The public trustees are supposed to provide greater accountability to the annual release of the Social Security and Medicare trustees reports. But Bush delayed in nominating the public trustees for more than seven months, and then re-submitted the names of Drs. Palmer and Saving, though they had already served the traditional single term. During that lapse, "any role they may have played in the development of this year's report…is unofficial and inappropriate," wrote Rep. Pete Stark of California and Rep. Sander Levin of Michigan, the ranking Democrats on House subcommittees that oversee Medicare and Social Security respectively.

Sens. Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) and Max Baucus (D., Mont.) joined the fray. They say in a letter to the public trustees that it was wrong for them to have worked as "paid consultants" to the Treasury Department, and therefore be involved in the process of compiling the 2006 trustees' report, before being reappointed by Bush earlier this month. "The last minute appointment of paid administration consultants threatens our system of checks and balances and the position of public trustee." –Sarah Lueck

DOJ_NMG_0027743

Immigration Dissent Sweeps L.A. And The Nation (LAT)

By Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, May 2, 2006

Hundreds of thousands of undocumented workers and their supporters demonstrated today in Los Angeles and flexed their political and economic muscles in support of an overhaul of national immigration policy.

About 250,000 people attended the early demonstration in front of City Hall and a crowd estimated at more than 400,000 worked its way from MacArthur Park to La Brea Avenue in the afternoon. Tens of thousands more demonstrated across the region and hundreds of thousands took to the streets from coast to coast.

At 7:40 p.m., with the words "Go in peace, God bless America" echoing from the stage at La Brea and Wilshire, the afternoon march officially ended. A huge crows remained, but many began drifting away, as they had been for a couple hours.

It was hard to get an exact number of those protesting because many who attended the early rally also moved to the later one. But the final number was likely to approach or surpass the record rally on March 25 when half a million people protested federal efforts to make enforcement tougher on undocumented immigrants.

Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa estimated nearly a million people demonstrated throughout the day. "We come to work, we come for a better life, we come to participate for the American dream," he told the marchers on Wilshire at La Brea this evening.

The local protests, part of a national day of demonstration, was in response to efforts by Congress to overhaul immigration policy for the first time in two decades. But it has become something more, a cry from the normally hidden undocumented community for a way to socially and economically come into the sunlight.

"If we didn't come, who will build the houses?" asked Jose Abrego, 40, from Acapulco, one of the thousands in MacArthur Park. "We're not flowers. We're not asking to be treated delicately. We just want respect."

Abrego said he came in July to do construction work so he could save money to build his own house back home, where he earned about $100 a week driving trucks. Here he earns about $400 a week.

"We are asking the rich of the United States to respect us," he said.

It was a day of jubilation for demonstrators across the city. Those congregating in front of City Hall had marched blocks through downtown, where seldom anyone is seen walking. It was the second major demonstration to rock the city in less than two months as festive protesters paraded to the Latin rhythms. Across the street from their destination, they heard the blaring of Neil Diamond's "America," which has become an immigrant musical cry.

"I am part of this," said Ofelia Luna, 42, now a U.S. citizen after holding a green card for nearly two decades. "I want my voice to be heard."

The biggest cheers seemed to come around 1:40 p.m. when the popular disc jockey, Eddy "El Piolin" Sotelo spoke.

"We have the same heart, we believe in the same God," he told the crowd.

Rev. Lewis Logan II, pastor at Bethel AME Church in South L.A., also praised the crowd:

"A power more powerful than Katrina has been unleashed here in Los Angeles."

Speaking from a raised platform at the side of City Hall, he got his biggest cheers when he said, "What are we here for?"

The crowd responded: "To triumph, to succeed."

Many waved their U.S. flags, bought from vendors for $2 along the route.

In the nearby bastions of municipal power, officials monitored the situation on the streets.

"All is well," Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, who had urged students to stay in school and away from the earlier demonstration, told reporters at a later briefing. "This march — protest, as it's developed, has been very peaceful as we suspected from the beginning."

The mayor's teenage son had planned to join the protests after school with his father's approval.

Villaraigosa did not speak at the downtown rally, but said he might at the later demonstration, depending on his schedule. He was to fly to Dallas at 7 p.m. to lobby NFL owners for a professional football team in Los Angeles.

"I'm mayor for all the people," Villaraigosa said. "But without question, I'm also someone who is a proud American, [and] also proud of where my family came from. I've never been shy about the fact that these people out here want to be a part of the American dream. I support them. I don't necessarily have to make every single demonstration to manifest that support."

DOJ_NMG_0027744

The crowd overflowed City Hall Plaza and filled the green areas that serve as a buffer for the official buildings. Dressed in white for peace, people waved American flags as they roared what they hope would be a demand heard across the nation in Washington.

Many then went home, but others headed to MacArthur Park for the second march down Wilshire Boulevard to La Brea Avenue. There, too, the mood was festive at they chanted and blew horns.

"This is America," said Juan Medina, 54, from Guatemala, as the crowds filed through the park, a sea of white shirts and waving flags. He said he spent the day painting houses because, "I need to work."

He stood with a group of construction workers from Mexico, Guatemala, El Salvador — hesitant at first, then growing animated with the crowd, feeling their strength in the numbers.

"When the Mayflower came from England, they were people looking for freedom and to follow God. Now these people are rich and powerful. They need to go back to having a big, good heart, to following God," Medina said.

The scene was similar to the earlier rally when many of the demonstrators appeared in white shirts and jeans. They also wore their disparate backgrounds like identity badges: Men from the Mexican countryside wore straw hats and handlebar mustaches, while Los Angeles-bred boys strutted in sunglasses and baggy pants. Politically active women wore T-shirts with pictures of the Mexican revolutionary hero Emiliano Zapata, while many teenagers came in bare-midriff tops and tight pants.

The demonstrators also came in Central American guayabera shirts and soccer shirts, they wore tattoos and they wrapped giant American flags around their shoulders like Mexican shawls.

They were smiling, walking with a bounce in their step. One held a sign that said, "All Gringos Are Immigrants."

Many said they had not come to previous demonstrations and felt they had missed something. They said they planned to join the afternoon march, as well.

Candido Henriquez, 42, held a sign that said: "We are not criminals. Why do they treat us like animals? We are workers and we deserve respect."

Demonstrations took place across the Southland.

In one of the earliest marches of the day, as many as 10,000 people stepped off from Santa Rosa de Lima Church in Maywood, coursing down Atlantic Boulevard in southeast L.A. County.

As the march moved, its ranks swelled with others from communities such as Huntington Park, Arlington and Bell Gardens. These are the communities where the Mexican American dream has unfolded, the step up for immigrants who have earned a degree of economic stability.

The mood was jubilant, and the symbol of choice was an American flag. Marchers also carried signs, proclaiming "Hoy Marchamos, Manana Votamos."(Today We March; Tomorrow We Vote.)

They chanted "Si su puede," and "Aqui estamos y no nos vamos," "We're here and we're not leaving."

Other demonstrations were planned in Pasadena, Pomona, Santa Ana, Fullerton, Riverside, San Diego, Oxnard, Huntington Park, Long Beach and San Bernardino.

Today's protests represent an evolution of ideas since an estimated 500,000 people rallied on March 25 in front of Los Angeles City Hall to protest the stricter plan that passed the House of Representatives last year. That bill would make being an undocumented worker and those who helped them a felony.

Relying on the Latino media, especially radio personalities, and high-tech communications, the rally caught the Anglo establishment flat-footed.

In the following days, schools, particularly in Southern California, were forced to close as students repeatedly walked out to support immigration rights.

Hilda Ramirez, a spokeswoman for LAUSD, said no major walkouts had been reported early this morning, but that the absentee rate was at 27% -- nearly three times that of the same day last year when only 10% of students did not attend classes.

The second major protest was April 10, when at least hundreds of thousands of people peacefully rallied across the country for broader immigrant rights. Organizers put the number in the millions across the country, but the Los Angeles protest was on the order of thousands.

DOJ_NMG_0027745

Organizers were hoping for a major turnout today for demonstrations that were based on the idea of making the Latino presence felt politically, but also economically by boycotting businesses. It was being organized by dozens of groups under the slogan of Un Dia Sin Inmigrantes — A Day Without Immigrants.

A hand-scrawled sign on the Pasadena Freeway last week warned motorists in Spanish: "No work, no school, no buying, no selling." As far away as Mexico, activists echoed the boycott call, urging people to forgo U.S. companies and even to skip American fast food outlets.

It was difficult to tell what impact the boycotts were having, but there were some signs.

At the Los Angeles Wholesale Produce Market and the Los Angeles-Long Beach port complex, business was below normal.

There were also scattered reports of closed restaurants and shops. Virtually all of the stores were closed along Whittier and Cesar Chavez, two main boulevards of heavily Latino neighborhoods in East Los Angeles.

At Nico's Market, near the Ramona Gardens housing projects in Boyle Heights, a sign in Spanish announced, "This Monday, May 1, we close the store to support the immigrants."

The immediate impact was borne by small businesses and low-paid workers.

Ana Miriam Garcia, 52, said her boss decided to close for the day -- and to dock them a day's pay.

"If I don't work, I don't eat," said Garcia, a Salvadoran immigrant who became a citizen after the 1986 amnesty. Garcia said she earns minimum wage at a sewing factory and said she suffers when she can't work, even for one day.

"What can I do?" she said.

Still, the long-term impact was expected to be minimal. Except for meals, purchases given up today can be made up tomorrow. Many businesses, including service and manufacturing industries, had employees work through the weekend to get ahead so that today's closings would not be disastrous.

Today's boycotts also politically split the Latino community.

Those calling for the boycotts tended to be from non-traditional groups, while leaders of established institutions urged students to stay in class and were neutral at best about whether workers should take the day off for the morning protest.

That division was clearly illustrated in Southern California.

Mayor Villaraigosa, the first Latino in more than 130 years to have the city's top job, and Cardinal Roger M. Mahony on Sunday repeated their pleas that students not take part in the day's activities until after school. Villaraigosa also warned motorists to prepare for gridlock in the affected areas.

Demonstrators today again wore white as a gesture of peace and waved U.S. flags in the hopes of decreasing any backlash. Organizers have urged protesters to avoid carrying Mexican flags or singing the national anthem in any language other than English. A Spanish version of the anthem, released last week, sparked complaints, including from President Bush.

Over the weekend, some groups, which call for tougher enforcement against illegal immigrants, held their own demonstrations along the U.S.-Mexican border and promised more protests. About 200 volunteers organized by the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps of California worked on a 6-foot barbed-wire fence along a quarter-mile stretch of rugged terrain near the U.S.-Mexico border about 50 miles east of San Diego.

The U.S. government has also vowed to crack down on employers who hire illegal immigrants. And there have been well-publicized raids by immigration authorities, rounding up hundreds of immigrants with criminal backgrounds in Florida and the Midwest.

Still, most polls show that Americans favor changes in immigration policy by better than a ratio of 2 to 1 and that Californians are even more supportive. Americans tell pollsters that they would like to see a guest worker program and some sort of plan that would lead to citizenship for those in the United States.

Thousands Join Boycott (WT)

By Valerie Richardson And Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, May 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027746

Hundreds of thousands of people boycotted their own jobs and stayed away from what they saw as "gringo" businesses yesterday.

Many instead took to the streets in major cities to demonstrate the political and economic power of immigrants and illegal aliens.

Protesters -- most of whom were Hispanic -- waved U.S., and Mexican and other Latin American flags as they flooded streets in New York and Los Angeles. An estimated 400,000 marched in Chicago, 75,000 took part in Denver, and thousands showed up for rallies in other cities. The largest demonstrations were in Los Angeles, where police estimated that two major marches drew more than 650,000 people.

Both police and organizers said more than a million people marched nationwide yesterday, with some estimates topping 1.5 million.

The protesters sought to influence the current immigration debate, by both supporting efforts to legalize the estimated 12 million illegal aliens and opposing the bill that passed the House of Representatives in December that would make illegal presence a felony and would crack down on employers who hire illegal aliens.

Speaking earlier in the day, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said he couldn't predict the rallies' effect on the policy debate, but the president's position on the walkouts was clear.

"The president is not a fan of boycotts," Mr. McClellan said. "People have the right to peacefully express their views, but the president wants to see comprehensive reform pass the Congress so that he can sign it into law."

Unlike last month's marches in protest of the House immigration-enforcement bill, which drew support from a broad spectrum of politicians, lawmakers yesterday urged schoolchildren to attend class and workers to go to their jobs.

Last month's marches may also have hurt the protesters' cause. Some polls showed Americans were less sympathetic to immigrants' demands in the wake of those marches, and many people complained publicly about the proliferation of non-American flags at the events.

"We're not criminals," Belem Orozco, an illegal alien who attended the rally in Denver, said in Spanish as her 9-year-old son, David, translated. "We're people who work. We want to help the United States."

Mrs. Orozco, who has lived in Denver for 13 years, didn't have to call in sick -- her employer Cintas, a uniform supplier, gave its employees the day off, she said.

In Phoenix, where about 3,000 people turned out for protests at various locations, Angel Lopez, an illegal alien, said she is not a criminal and has worked as a hotel housekeeper every day since arriving three years ago.

"I did not understand why members of Congress think I'm a criminal and want to deport me and think nothing of employers that hired me," she said. "Shouldn't they be penalized, too?"

Miss Lopez said none of the illegals she knows here fear being arrested while on the job. She also said she has a 9-month-old son who was born in Phoenix, making him a U.S. citizen.

"When you send me home because I'm a criminal, will you deport him, too?" she said.

The total effect of the economic boycott was not clear yesterday. Some firms closed their doors, and no major disturbances were reported.

In Dallas, several supermarkets -- including nine owned by Malone's Food Stores -- closed. General manager Rick Gomez said the move was a gesture of support. The company's work force is more than 45 percent Hispanic and upward of 90 percent of its business is from the Hispanic community.

The most immediate effect was in some schools in heavily Hispanic areas, which reported high absentee rates. About 72,000 middle- and high-school students stayed home from school in Los Angeles, and one Denver high school reported an absentee rate of 98 percent.

Late in the afternoon, hundreds of people gathered on Pennsylvania Avenue near the White House fence for a rally. Of the dozens of flags they waved at the presidential residence, about half were American and the rest were from Latin America, including Brazilian, Mexican, Dominican and Honduran.

They shouted slogans and sometimes began chanting "U-S-A," although that chant often morphed into "si se puede," a common protest rally cry which translates roughly from Spanish as "Yes, we can."

DOJ_NMG_0027747

Dallas television station KXAS conducted an online poll yesterday of whether employers should be allowed to fire workers who missed work to attend the rallies and found overwhelming support for employers. As of 7 p.m., 68 percent, or more than 38,000 votes, of responses to the unscientific, self-selecting survey, said it was OK to fire workers, while 13 percent said it was legally OK but morally wrong. Just 18 percent said they should keep their jobs.

For yesterday's boycott, the protesters chose May Day, traditionally a worldwide socialist holiday, with workers marching in recognition of workers' rights.

Opponents organized against the protests, although on a much smaller scale. Some Hispanics announced the formation of a group called You Don't Speak for Me, meant to highlight Hispanics who want more border enforcement and oppose legalization of illegal aliens.

"Millions of Hispanic-Americans -- including many who have gone through the immigration process the right way -- are offended by the demands being made by people who have broken our nation's laws," said Pete Nunez, former assistant Treasury Department secretary, at a press conference organized by the Federation for American Immigration Reform.

In Denver, Defend Colorado Now, an anti-illegal immigration group, held a counterrally, and Ron Niemala spent his day off holding anti-illegal immigration signs and tangling with demonstrators.

"You're invading our country, buddy," he told one young Hispanic man.

"This country isn't yours," the man retorted. "We were here first."

Marchers numbered in the tens of thousands in New York, Atlanta and Oakland, Calif., with about 15,000 more in Houston and 50,000 in San Jose, Calif.

In Los Angeles, marchers chanted, "Today, we march, tomorrow, we vote, and if they deport us, we will jump over the border fence." Whole neighborhoods in the nation's second-largest city and its port were virtually shut down, though the usually congested Southern California freeways were largely empty.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents yesterday raided 15 locations in New York and New Jersey to smash a "human-trafficking ring" that smuggled Mexicans into the country and may have forced women to work as prostitutes.

ICE conducted the raids early Monday after New Jersey State Police pulled over two vehicles carrying at least 10 women who had been working in brothels in Virginia, Maryland and Washington. Agents arrested 36 women and 30 men.

'The Pot Is Boiling' (WSJ)

By Miriam Jordan, June Kronholz And Ilan Brat

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

Hundreds of thousands of immigrants walked off the job and into the streets to call for immigration reform as part of a so-called National Day of Action. But while the protests severely disrupted industries that rely on immigrant labor, the impact was damped by advance planning at businesses where it was clear there would be a one-day worker shortage.

Absenteeism was high in industries such as construction, agriculture and meatpacking, and some restaurants reported early closures, staff depletions and other problems. Perdue Farms Inc., the Salisbury, Md., poultry processor, closed six poultry plants for the rallies yesterday. Likewise, meatpacking giant Tyson Foods Inc., Springdale, Ark., closed six of its nine beef processing plants and four of its six pork processing plants.

But attendance at midday rallies across the country was a mixed bag. Hundreds of thousands turned out in places like Chicago to support legal work status for illegal immigrants, but in Texas, Atlanta and other places, turnout was more modest. That was partly a result of calls within the pro-immigrant community to keep workers and their kids in place until events later in the day. But it was also due to fear that recently swept through some immigrant communities in the wake of a government crackdown on employers who intentionally hire undocumented workers. Some immigrants were also rattled by reports of protesters being fired after skipping work for similar rallies last month.

Overall, the effect was mostly symbolic. "This isn't a big economic event," said Nigel Gault, U.S. economist at Global Insight, a nonpartisan forecasting and consulting group in Waltham, Mass. "Economically, it would be a huge event if suddenly 12 million [immigrants] were gone" permanently.

DOJ_NMG_0027748

Frank Sharry, director of the National Immigration Forum, a coalition of business, union and advocate groups that favor immigration overhaul, stopped short of predicting the marches would press noncommitted legislators to back a bill now before the Senate that would give legal status to most illegal immigrants. Nevertheless, "the pot is boiling -- immigrants are marching in the streets, the public is demanding a solution," he said.

Likewise, Randy Johnson, vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, predicted the rallies will "show decision makers we've got a major issue that Congress needs to address." But the chance of the demonstrations irking voters is possible, he added. "If everyone's waving foreign flags and singing the National Anthem in Spanish, it's going to have a negative effect," he said.

Opponents of the Senate bill predict that the protests will create a backlash that could kill immigration overhaul. "By the end of today, any possibility of a bill reaching the president's desk will be dead," said Mark Krikorian, director of the Center for Immigration Studies, a Washington policy group that favors more-restrictive immigration policies.

Similar protests were held last month, catching employers somewhat off-guard. This time, most immigrant-dependent industries were better prepared. In some of those industries, employers are anxious to see changes that would protect their access to immigrant workers. For example, tens of thousands of meatpacking workers attended the rallies in part because their employers closed many plants yesterday. Industry analysts figure that the meatpacking industry slaughtered less than half of the number of cattle and hogs yesterday that it usually kills on a Monday.

Pilgrim's Pride Corp., the country's second-largest poultry processor, decided to halt operations at some of its 34 plants, although most remained up and running, said spokesman Ray Atkinson. About 50% of the Pittsburg, Texas, company's employees are Hispanic, Mr. Atkinson said.

Fashion concern American Apparel Inc. shuttered its factory and executive offices in downtown Los Angeles. "We didn't want our workers to have to decide between allegiance to the corporation or this immigrant cause," said Dov Charney, the company's 37-year-old founder, when reached in the midst of a throng of demonstrators in central Los Angeles. Mr. Charney said about 3,000 workers at his company have a Latino background. Shrugging off any notion of a negative financial impact, Mr. Charney said, "I can't imagine this hurts me in the long term."

Truckers avoided the large shipping port complex of Long Beach, Calif., and Los Angeles, and tens of thousands of students skipped school in the Los Angeles area.

McDonald's Corp., the nation's largest restaurant chain by revenue, said that at some locations it shut outlets except for their drive-throughs, reduced operating hours and employed fewer crew members to accommodate workers participating in rallies, spokesman William Whitman said in a statement.

In the landscaping industry, nine out of 10 workers took the day off, especially in warehouse and distribution centers, according to the American Nursery and Landscape Association. About 70% of more than 500,000 workers in the sector are believed to be undocumented.

Construction, the largest employer of illegal workers, suffered some disruptions. "Most of our members are giving workers flex-time, but the majority seem to be working," said Paul Lopez at the National Association of Homebuilders.

Agriculture was especially affected in Florida and California. With the harvest under way, lettuce fields in Salinas Valley, Calif. were practically void of workers. Several lettuce packers in the area closed their plants for the day as workers joined protests.

Law firms have been advising their clients that the immigrant labor boycott is protected by the National Labor Relations Act, even though it isn't specifically a union action. Morgan, Lewis & Bockius, a Philadelphia-based law firm, on April 27 issued a client alert that recommended employers not impose restrictions or penalties on workers' absence for the rallies -- which employers don't impose on other types of absences.

At the rallies, which were orderly in most places regardless of the size, immigrant workers largely heeded calls to carry American flags -- as opposed to flags from their home countries -- and expressed pride in what they generate for U.S. business.

At a march through downtown Chicago, Miguel Salguero, 37, held a sign that read, "I pay taxes. Does that make me a criminal?" Mr. Salguero said he pays taxes using an Individual Taxpayer Identification Number issued by the Internal Revenue Service. He said he used the same number to get a bank loan and mortgage on his house in a Chicago suburb. Though he works jobs in two area restaurants, he is not in the country legally. "I have my whole life here," he said. "We're here and we're not leaving."

DOJ_NMG_0027749

While Mexico's immigrant labor force expressed itself loudly across the U.S., it was largely business as usual for Mexican companies in the U.S. Dispensing some $5 billion in annual payrolls in its operations north of the border, Mexican companies employ nearly 150,000 workers in the U.S., of whom very few appeared to join public demonstrations yesterday.

"Today's boycott had no material impact on our company's operations or on attendance," said David Margulies, a spokesman for Bimbo Bakeries USA, the U.S. unit of Grupo Bimbo SA, Latin America's largest baked-goods manufacturer. Fort Worth, Texas-based Bimbo, with about 7,500 U.S. employees, is the principal supplier of such popular brands as OroWheat Bread, Thomas's English Muffins and Entenmann's pastries to the U.S. west of Chicago.

At Immigrant Rally, Divided They Stand (WP)

By David Montgomery

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

The problem is, a guy has to make a living. And if you happen to be a Salvadoran with a green card; with a mortgage, a wife and three kids in Lanham; and two janitorial jobs in D.C. that keep you busy 14 hours a day, you might not have the leverage with the boss to boycott work in a demonstration of how important immigrants are to the U.S. economy.

And so there yesterday in sun-dappled Meridian Hill Park was Milton Bonilla, 38, leaning against a tree in his white work uniform listening to the speakers rage against certain lawmakers and celebrate the People United. He was a typical un-boycotter. He had worked hard for the word "Supervisor" stitched on his breast, and he could not afford to give it up.

He was headed to work for the night shift at 5:30 p.m. But he still felt urgently drawn to the demonstration, which was called "a day without immigrants."

"It's important to show support for the people without documents," Bonilla said. "We're here because we want better treatment in this country. We came to work. We are not criminals."

For some the notion summoned visions of Bethesda matrons cutting their own grass and taking care of their own kids; K Street lawyers and lobbyists pushing mops and taking out the trash at their offices; bureaucrats having to serve themselves Navy bean soup, meatloaf, blackened sole and soggy broccoli in the cafeteria line -- that would teach them a lesson, was the idea.

But the work boycott sent an odd, ambiguous message, others thought. When immigrants list the personal attributes they are proudest of, "hardworking" is at or near the top of every list. And now they were going to show their value to society by not working?

Most members of the main immigrant organizing coalition in the Washington area were against the boycott. So were some of the local movement's most important motivators -- radio disc jockeys. They said now was not the time to get too radical, while there is still a chance that the Senate will produce an immigration bill that would provide a path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants.

Still, other local organizers urged the boycott, saying now was the time to flex some muscle.

Both factions picked Meridian Hill for an afternoon rally, and more than 1,000 boycotters and un-boycotters assembled in the leafy splendor of perfect park weather.

You could spot differences in the two crowds. The un-boycotters were more likely to have on work uniforms or work boots with fresh dust. They came and left at odd times, going to punch in, or just punching out, in the middle of chants that sounded better in Spanish ("Bush, listen, we are committed to the struggle!") or a song in English ("Amazing Grace").

The boycotters were more likely to be young, holding disposable jobs they might easily replace in a fast-food nation. Also more likely to be wearing the red and black of revolution.

Eber Garcia, 25, said his boss in a roofing company told him if he didn't show up for work yesterday, he would think about firing him. Garcia said he could live with that.

"Say you work in a restaurant and I work in construction," he said. "I lose my job and you lose your job [for joining the boycott]. I can go to your restaurant and you can go to my construction. They need us. We are not afraid."

DOJ_NMG_0027750

Garcia is as hard a worker as any, and he says he knows stuff about roofing that his boss depends on. He says he earns about $1,000 in a good week and sends $800 of it back to his mother and two sisters in Mexico. Yesterday cost him about $140 in lost wages.

"If I have to do this I'm going to do this to catch their attention," Garcia said.

To boycott or not to boycott? So much riding on the answer in individual lives, such high stakes for a movement groping for its voice and next steps.

But there in the park, with the guitars and the flags and the children in strollers, at a time and a place when the tactical rift could have betrayed weakness and the spectacle of protesters protesting the protest, the leaders showed some savvy. They pretended there were no differences of opinion. They shared one stage, one sound system near the statue of Joan of Arc, and they didn't talk about whether to boycott or not to boycott. It was too late for that anyway. They kept saying over and over how united they were.

"All organizations present are united for legalization" of those without papers, shouted a typical speaker. "We demand real comprehensive reform legislation that recognizes the contributions of" -- here it comes -- "hardworking immigrants."

Did Cesar Chavez have to fake a united front during the five-year grape boycott he launched with the United Farm Workers in 1965? In any case, it was an effective tactic. In the end, growers agreed to let the union bargain for the workers, and they got higher wages, health care and retirement benefits.

The dissonant thing about Chavez as an inspiration for the current movement, however, is that he didn't care much for undocumented workers. He considered them "strikebreakers." He came to Washington in 1979 to accuse immigration authorities of letting such workers avoid the law in order to defeat the union.

Chavez himself may have been inspired by the Montgomery, Ala., bus boycott in 1955-56, sparked after Rosa Parks was arrested for refusing to give up her seat. The boycott brought the bus companies to the brink of bankruptcy and proved the mettle of the civil rights movement. But it took the Supreme Court to finally desegregate the buses.

Still, the bus boycott made a 26-year-old preacher named Martin Luther King Jr. a national figure, and set a tide in motion -- a taste of what possibilities were in the air in the park yesterday.

Yesterday's rally also drew energy from fiction. People in the crowd were passing out fliers about the 2004 mockumentary "A Day Without a Mexican" -- as if we could have forgotten. The premise of the movie is that suddenly all the Latinos disappear from California -- all the nannies, groundskeepers, street sweepers, car mechanics. The state can't function and goes crazy.

Which is also what happens in a fictional Southern town in the 1965 play "Day of Absence" by Douglas Turner Ward. All the black people suddenly disappear. The playwright later said he had been in Montgomery during the bus boycott, and he had been inspired by what happens when invisible people make themselves visible by, paradoxically, disappearing. Not riding the bus, not going to work.

Some of the boycotters were like Juan Arreaga, 30, who came from Mexico 10 years ago, lives in Manassas and owns a remodeling business. He gave all 40 of his workers the day off. Nobody was going to get fired for this "boycott." It wasn't a radical, personally risky act. Nor was it for Carlos Rosales, a self-employed financial analyst in Hyattsville, who boycotted himself.

Joanna Salguero and Jacqueline Ortiz are cashiers at a fast-food restaurant in Centreville. They boycotted. But they got permission from their boss.

If your boss says it's okay, or if you are the boss, is that a boycott? Do you have to risk getting fired for the act to acquire moral gravitas?

No, said the organizers. The point was just to show how many productive Latinos there are. Permission or no, there they were, there in the park, standing up to be counted.

Carlos M. Bermudez, chef with a food-service company in the District, boycotted -- but he went to work Sunday to cook all of yesterday's food ahead of time. In other words, he found a way to work and boycott.

The un-boycotters, for their part, looked for ways to show workplace solidarity. Germain Gutierrez, 27, from Beltsville by way of El Salvador, got to the park a little late. He had reported to the D.C. body shop where he works. But his boss let him leave after he put in four hours.

DOJ_NMG_0027751

Think of all the cars coming in after a weekend of wrecks. Think of all the minivans of the Bethesda matrons, and the BMWs of the K Street lawyers.

Different Paths To Same Goal (WSJ)

By Barry Newman And Miriam Jordan

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

Hundreds of thousands of immigrants and their supporters snarled the streets of Los Angeles twice yesterday in support of a common goal separated by diametrically opposed tactics. One protest, at midday, sought to have illegal immigrants miss work and school to drive home how integral they are to American life; the other, in the late afternoon, sought to minimize disruptions for fear of arousing more opposition to their cause.

The dueling demonstrations were evidence that, even as the pro-immigrant movement swells, there isn't unanimity about tactics -- and it could take years to advance its goal of legalizing the status of millions of undocumented immigrants. Immigration rallies in major U.S. cities like Los Angeles and Chicago have drawn crowds of up to 500,000 during the past six weeks as a huge show of short-term popular opposition to a get-tough bill passed in the House in December. Now, some groups and individuals have to a degree tempered the call for activism, fearing that too much disruption to U.S. businesses that rely on immigrants could create a political backlash that would actually undermine their efforts and raise doubts about hasty compromises under debate in Washington.

And while the coalition has so far been deep and wide, encompassing many nationalities, not all groups are in sync with the Hispanics who form the overwhelming majority of undocumented immigrants. In New York's Chinatown yesterday, for example, a demonstration intended to rally shoppers and shopkeepers was a dud. Fewer than 100 Asian members of Unite Here, the union of textile, hotel and restaurant workers, set off along East Broadway against an indifferent tide of delivery men pushing handcarts and pedestrians on cellphones. "We need to form a human chain," said a woman leading the march, but nobody did.

There are even divisions among Hispanics, as immigrants from Mexico and elsewhere who have attained legal status in the U.S. do not always want to open the door to others who might follow. In a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll1, for instance, those surveyed were asked whether they would favor building a fence all along the border between Mexico and California. While 60% of Hispanics opposed that idea, a third of the Hispanics surveyed said they backed it.

Similarly, sentiment among Hispanics was mixed on yesterday's no-work day. Some 34% of Hispanics said the protest would help the cause of immigrants, but 43% said it would hurt their cause.

Of course, many protest movements -- including the civil-rights and anti-Vietnam War activists in the 1960s -- have overcome such fissures to get across broad, effective support that translates into government action. "I don't think there are two camps," said Pablo Alvarado, director of the National Day Laborer Organization, which backed a work stoppage yesterday. "What I see is one big camp with different tactics. The goal is the same: legalization for the undocumented. Some believe that by demonstrating we have economic power we can help persuade America. That is good, and we have to do it. This type of radical action has to take place."

But Mr. Alvarado added: "At same time I know that many Americans don't like these kind of actions. ... For them, we need to do other type of things. One of ways to achieve legalization is by winning hearts and minds of Americans."

There is disagreement on the streets about how to accomplish that, however. Typically, when asked, Latino workers say they are in favor of mobilization. But many say they think it sends the wrong message to miss school and work.

"Some people are taking it too far," said Blanca Alvarenga, a 20-year-old daughter of El Salvadoran immigrants who came here illegally and now have green cards. "We shouldn't pull kids out of school or be missing work," said Ms. Alvarenga, a saleswoman at a Payless Shoe Source in Los Angeles.

Vicky Cruz, a college student born in the U.S. who works at a Baskin Robbins ice-cream shop in Los Angeles and has undocumented relatives from El Salvador here, said: "We came here to go to work and go to school." Plus, "I have bills to pay."

The divide among immigration protesters is not just about the style of dissent, however. The broad movement initially coalesced around opposition to the House immigration bill passed last year, which opened no avenue to citizenship for undocumented immigrants and made a felony out of both being in the U.S. illegally and helping an undocumented worker. The compromise produced by the Senate Judiciary Committee at the end of March, days after a massive march in Los Angeles, was cheered as a victory by most pro-immigrant lobbyists.

DOJ_NMG_0027752

But now a faction of immigrant supporters who have checked the fine print in the 614-page committee compromise are going public with serious misgivings. While the compromise bill does offer eventual citizenship to millions, it also creates concern that millions could be found ineligible to apply. In particular, questions are surfacing about a provision that disqualifies workers who supply false information -- including fake Social Security numbers -- on the federal form employers must submit for all new hires.

While the tough House bill and another Senate bill backed by Republican Majority Leader Bill Frist both make past document fraud punishable by deportation, the softer Senate Judiciary Committee compromise would only penalize fraud exposed after the bill became law. But it leaves vague whether immigrants who keep working past the day of the law's passage would also face deportation. If they obtained their jobs earlier with false papers, they could fall into a trap.

"We can't be fooled into believing there's a breakthrough when proposed measures actually make undocumented immigrants ineligible," said Eun Sook Lee, director of the National Korean American Service and Education Consortium in Los Angeles. "The numbers impacted would be in the millions. You can't do backdoor delegalization while you're proposing legalization."

By yesterday, though, the subtleties of the political debate largely hadn't filtered down to the streets, leading some activists to ask if the demonstrators are sending a useful and unified message. "It's a little hard to be sure what people are opposing or supporting," said Paul Igasaki, who heads an immigration and civil-rights "working group" speaking out against provisions "that would erode basic rights for everyone in America."

Even groups promoting the compromise -- including the National Immigration Forum -- want to cut out new enforcement tools in it that would, among other things, add the names of immigration violators to the national crime database, require criminal checks on U.S. citizens sponsoring relatives for green cards, and mandate deportation for legal immigrants convicted three times for drunken driving.

But others say it's time to slow the whole legislative process down and wait for something much better.

"There's a big gap between what advocates in D.C. are negotiating and what [immigrant] communities are really demanding," said Arnoldo Garcia of the National Network for Immigrant and Refugee Rights in Oakland, Calif. "It'll take a lot more time before we get changes that make people happy -- so we can have one of those photo ops like the one of Martin Luther King standing behind Lyndon Baines Johnson."

Mr. Garcia was thinking of a famous picture of President Johnson signing the Civil Rights Act of 1964 -- taken nine years after Rosa Parks sat down in the front of a bus in Montgomery, Ala.

Today's Protests Shutter L.A.'s Produce And Garment Districts (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, May 2, 2006

The normally bustling downtown Los Angeles produce and garment districts were virtually shut down today, and truck traffic at the ports was down sharply after many employees protesting the nation's immigration policy's did not show up for work.

The dearth of activity in the produce and garment districts, both heavily dependent on immigrant labor, was so far the most dramatic sign of the impact of today's organized immigration protests on local commerce. Only sporadic business closures and staffing shortages reported across the remainder of Southern California.

The Los Angeles Wholesale Produce Market — which provides fresh food to restaurants, grocery store chains and countless mom and pop outlets — was unusually quiet at 2:30 am when the sprawling complex is normally a din of shouting workers and rumbling trucks The nearby 7th Street Market, the region's second-largest wholesale food market, never even bothered to open.

DOJ_NMG_0027753

"This is not a normal day," said Robert Barrios as he viewed the sedate concrete loading docks at the Los Angeles Wholesale Produce Market. "This time of the day, you usually have trucks pulling in, pulling out. People yelling, "Hey, let's go! Get out of the way!"

A few hours later, visitors to the nearby downtown garment district were greeted by block after block of shuttered storefronts and garment factories. Many businesses had decided to close after workers informed them of their plans not to show up today, according to business owners.

Pelicana Fashion on Maple Street was one of the few businesses that tried to open today but manager Sueli Shin decided to close up shop before 11 am.

"Only one of my six workers showed up," Shin said as she was preparing to close the shop.

The labor boycott also apparently made itself felt at Southland hospitals, where more than twice as many nurses, aides and housekeepers failed to show up as usual for the 7 a.m. shift, said Jim Lott, a spokesman for the Hospital Assn. of Southern California.

"Usually we see 3 to 5% absenteeism on a Monday, and we're running 8 to 12%," Lott said.

Hospitals called in temporary workers and consolidated patients, but absenteeism returned to normal levels during the afternoon shift. "So far the shortages haven't been so severe that they've had to stop anything," Lott said.

Truckers who honored the immigration boycott hobbled shipping operations throughout the ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach, the fifth-largest harbor complex in the world. Traffic on the roads that cut through the ports as well as on the Long Beach Freeway was noticeably lighter as truck activity was down by as much as 80%, according to marine terminal operators.

At the APL Global Gateway South terminal at the Port of Los Angeles, spokesman Mike Zampa said that about 40 trucks an hour were moving through the terminal's gates this morning, compared to 175 an hour during the same time last week.

Terminal managers and port officials said, however, the immigration boycott has not affected the unloading of ships or railroad operations in the port. They also said the impact will be shortlived because the backlogs of cargo will be cleared in the days ahead, and some companies that anticipated the boycott moved and picked up cargo over the weekend.

"It's been pretty quiet," McCorkle said. "But a one-day event isn't going to have a big impact. We expect we will be able to move some cargo tonight."

Some port truck drivers who chose not to work gathered for a noon rally that drew about 200 people to Banning Park in Wilmington. There, supporters wearing white waved the U.S. and Mexican flags at drivers passing on Pacific Coast Highway. Roughly half the drivers honked in response.

Independent trucker Lucio Vasquez, 38, of Wilmington said he came to the United States from Mexico City illegally in 1981 to find work. Although he is now a citizen, he chose to join the boycott to show solidarity with illegal immigrants. "A long time ago, I was in the same situation," Vasquez said.

At Hannam Chain Market World, one of the oldest Korean supermarkets in Koreatown, about 60 non-Korean employees, mostly Latino, didn't show up for work today. And those who did were planning to leave at noon.

But manager B.J. Kim was hoping to keep his store, at Olympic and Vermont, open all day with the help of his Korean workers, who did show up.

"You have to pass the day," said Kim, who planned to do little more than staff the cashiers, forgoing stocking the shelves and other nonessential work. The store's sound system was tuned to Korean radio to keep abreast of the day's events.

One of Hannam's Latino workers who did report for his regular shift was bagger Michael Carranza, 39, a long-time employee and immigrant from Guatemala

"I've been here for 11 years and being here helped me raise a family," said Carranza, who is undocumented but said he is in the process of getting papers. "So I volunteered to come here this morning."

In the San Fernando Valley, it was a shortage of shoppers and not necessarily workers that prompted 11 businesses to close at the Panorama Mall by late morning.

"I've never seen it like this," said Edward Ourishian, who was planning to close his shop, Prime Time, a watch and jewelry stand, by noon. "There is nobody here. Usually it's crowded here. Ninety-five percent of the shoppers are Hispanic. But, look, now you see only white faces."

DOJ_NMG_0027754

In the same mall, employees at the Wal-Mart outnumbered the shoppers, while a branch of La Curacao, a department store that caters to newly arrived immigrants, was closed for shopping but open to offer free legal advice.

"We're taking a big hit but it's worth it," said manager Jose Cruz, whose store normally would serve up to 3,000 customers on a Monday.

The nearly 700 Carl's Jr. fast food restaurants in California were open for business today but about half a dozen outlets in the Los Angeles area had to close their dining rooms and limit service to drive-thrus because of a lack of workers, said spokeswoman Anne Hallock.

"They have signs on the windows saying they have limited service," Hallock said.

Migrants' Walk-outs Hit Business Across US (FT)

By Edward Alden, Jenny Johnson, Holly Yeager , And Christopher Parkes

Financial Times, May 2, 2006

US farms, restaurants, meat processing companies and other businesses were hit by walkouts on Monday as hundred of thousands of immigrants across the country rallied to underscore their importance to the economy and to protest against legislation that would target illegal migrants.

In Los Angeles, where the the protest march stretched out for more than mile and was growing late on Monday, local reports said that only 10 per cent of the truckers serving the Port of Los Angeles turned up. The union representing California farmworkers said tens of thousands had joined marches and rallies, leaving many fields empty for a day.

Florida fruit and vegetable growers similarly reported that about half of farm workers did not show up on Monday. In the Midwest, the top US meat processors, including Tyson Foods, Cargill and Swift, shut their operations for the day. And the country's largest Hispanic-owned food company, Goya Foods, suspended deliveries throughout the US in support of the boycott.

The work stoppages and the demonstrations – which included huge marches in Los Angeles, Chicago, New York and Philadelphia – marked the latest and biggest in an escalating series of protests.

Sonia Umanzor, a nurse who marched in Washington, DC, said she had pulled her daughter out of school and had received permission from her employer to skip work and join in the day-long boycott. She said: "A lot of people start to see us as criminals and don't trust us. And we are the ones working hard in the worst jobs."

The demonstrators are objecting to legislation passed by the US House of Representatives that would criminalise illegal immigration and drastically increase barriers and police enforcement along the US border with Mexico. The US Senate is divided over more liberal legislation that would toughen enforcement but allow many of the country's nearly 12m undocumented immigrants to remain legally.

Most companies appeared to have planned in advance to avoid serious disruptions. Mary Price Burk, a partner with Baker & Hostetler in Denver, said that none of her business clients had reported any problems in spite of large demonstrations there. "People are working with it, and it's not having a substantial negative effect," she said.

The biggest effects appeared to be on restaurants, construction projects and small retail businesses, though hotels and casinos reported little disruption.

At the Old Ebbitt Grill, a popular Washington restaurant just a block from the White House, the take-out shop was offering a sharply scaled-back menu on Monday and most of the staff were absent. The usually cramped short-order kitchen was quiet. "Everyone who asked for the day off got the day off," said a manager who was filling in.

Crossroads Trade And Immigration Battles Of The Past Offer Lesson For U.S. (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

Surging immigration unsettles workers and prompts calls to stop the flow. Congress ponders higher tariffs to protect struggling industries. National-security fears heighten anxiety about foreigners. A growing gap between the rich and the middle class fuels angst about globalization.

DOJ_NMG_0027755

It sounds like today, but it could also be the 1920s. After a backlash against immigration and a "Red Scare," the U.S. sharply limited the inflow of immigrants for years. The Smoot-Hawley Tariff, conceived to protect farmers, then helped trigger a trade war that deepened the Great Depression.

It could also describe the 1980s. With factory layoffs blamed on imports and public cries to limit illegal immigration, Ronald Reagan struck compromises. His administration persuaded Japan to agree to "voluntary" export restraints, coordinated a drop in the value of the dollar and toughened immigration enforcement while granting amnesty to some. The U.S. kept its doors open to goods, capital and people -- and its economy prospered.

As America faces similar pressures today, what are the lessons? Buffeted by similar political and economic tensions, these two periods had different outcomes, largely due to how political leaders responded. These days, leaders know better the dangers of closed borders than their 1920s predecessors, and a return to that degree of isolationism seems unlikely. But they also lack the political assets of their 1980s counterparts, and that could make it hard to resist calls to restrict or even reverse America's traditional openness to foreign goods, services and people.

"The potential for an explosion in protectionist sentiment is greater now than it was" in the 1980s, says William Brock, who was Reagan's U.S. Trade Representative after representing Tennessee in Congress for 15 years. "This is the least constructive atmosphere in my 40 or 50 years in and out of government. People want to find someone to blame for almost everything."

Romano Mazzoli, a former Democratic congressman from Louisville, Ky., who co-sponsored immigration legislation in the 1980s, worries that a failure to deal with illegal immigration could hurt the legal kind. "I like to think we've come so far since the 1920s that we could never repeat" that era's racially motivated immigrant quotas, says Mr. Mazzoli, whose father emigrated from Italy in 1914. But, he adds, "The guy whose job is on the line...may not have an economics degree from Harvard. What he does have is the vote. And people like him can make troublesome noises on Election Day."

American ambivalence about trade and immigration is nothing new even when the economy is doing well. While globalization -- the increased movement of goods, capital and people across borders -- may benefit society as a whole, it tends to harm specific groups. Cheap imports, for instance, are good for consumers but threaten U.S. companies making rival products. And those harmed, whether farmers in the 1920s, auto workers in the 1980s or small manufacturers today, can be vocal.

The 1920s backlash followed decades of heavy immigration from Eastern and Southern Europe, which labor leaders and others believed threatened the wages of native-born Americans. The 1980s backlash came after the emergence of large, intractable trade deficits, in particular with Japan, which were blamed for turning the industrial Midwest into the Rust Belt.

Today, immigration rates are back to levels not seen consistently since the early 1920s, fueling an increasingly divisive debate highlighted by demonstrations across the U.S. yesterday campaigning against the possibility of new restrictions on immigration. At the same time, imports now command their largest share of U.S. gross domestic product in two centuries, according to Douglas Irwin, an economist specializing in trade history at Dartmouth College. Cross-border merger deals are sparking fears that overseas companies, some state-owned, could control vital U.S. assets.

President George W. Bush has shown both protectionist and pro-globalization streaks. He raised steel tariffs and tightened restrictions on Chinese textile imports. But he also opposes broader tariffs on China, unsuccessfully defended a proposed acquisition of some U.S. port operations by a Dubai-based company and is lobbying for a guest-worker program, the details of which he has left vague. Yet his lack of popularity, political capital and bipartisan support makes it harder to prevail in Congress, or even with his own party.

Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley, an Iowa Republican, supported the 1986 immigration reform but opposes Mr. Bush's guest-worker program. In 1986, "I was told amnesty along with employer sanctions would solve our problems, and...it just led to an 11-million-person problem," he says in an interview. "I've been burned once and am not going to be burned twice."

The 1920s: Perils of Protection

The period from 1871 to 1914 is sometimes considered globalization's golden age. With the United Kingdom leading the way, international trade and finance flourished. As the U.S. became an exporter of manufactured goods, it warmed to free trade. Before becoming president, William McKinley was a leading protectionist in Congress. But by 1901, as president, he began to espouse the benefits of reciprocated free trade, most notably in the speech he gave in Buffalo the day before he was fatally shot.

DOJ_NMG_0027756

Woodrow Wilson reduced tariffs in 1913. But World War I ended the era of globalization. Britain lost economic leadership. The gold standard was abandoned. Republicans, then the party of protection, took back Congress in 1919 and the White House in 1921. Determined to keep the U.S. free of foreign entanglements, they refused to join the League of Nations and after a deep recession, raised tariffs sharply in 1922.

The rest of the 1920s were prosperous for the U.S. and for the rich in particular. But farmers struggled. Many took on debt to expand when prices were high; foreclosures soared after the war when prices collapsed. Herbert Hoover campaigned in 1928 for "limited tariff relief" for farmers. In the subsequent Republican landslide all sorts of industries demanded protection and Congress gave it. A year and a half later, Congress passed the Smoot-Hawley Tariff of 1930, which raised 890 tariffs.

Legislators wanted to protect favored industries and largely ignored the ramifications of their actions, says Mr. Irwin. "The inadequately protected potato is a nationwide issue," intoned Rep. Carroll Beedy, a Maine Republican. Willis C. Hawley, a Republican from Oregon and a co-sponsor of the tariff bill, said the law did not "exclude foreign products from our markets, but does propose that such products shall not come into this country to the detriment of the American producers and wage earners."

Over 50 countries sent letters to the U.S. government to protest, Mr. Irwin says. Smoot-Hawley helped bring a new government to power in Canada that retaliated against the U.S. All this contributed to a collapse in global trade and exacerbated the Great Depression, although historians differ as to the extent.

"Congressional trade policy is very heavy-handed, doesn't take into account all the interests at stake and can lead to an incredible foreign backlash that can be very difficult to unwind or defuse," says Mr. Irwin.

The 1920s also saw a reaction against immigration. The annual arrival of about a million immigrants from 1905 to 1914 aroused resentment among native-born workers and resistance from labor unions that felt the competition depressed wages. The reaction was drenched with racism. "Russian Jews, Hungarians, Greeks and Italians were viewed as inferior to earlier stock immigrants: the Irish, English, Scandinavians and Germans," says Daniel Tichenor, a political scientist at Rutgers University.

As Mr. Tichenor wrote in his 2002 book "Dividing Lines: The Politics of Immigration Control in America," Congress passed its first immigration quotas after being galvanized by a 1920 State Department warning of a wave of "filthy" and "unassimilable" Jews fleeing European persecution. Just as terrorism adds fuel to the issue today, the 1920 "Red Scare" sowed worries that such immigrants carried "Bolshevik revolution, anarchy and other forms of political radicalism," Mr. Tichenor wrote.

The first attempt to reduce immigration, a literacy test, was vetoed by Wilson in 1915, but Congress overrode him in 1917. Shortly after Warren Harding took office in 1921, Congress passed the Quota Act, dramatically cutting inflows. In 1924, it dictated that immigrant inflows should reflect the ethnic makeup of the U.S.

The consequences were profound. Many Jews fleeing Nazi Germany could not enter the U.S. As it happens, fears that immigrants wouldn't assimilate proved unfounded, Mr. Tichenor says. "Over the next decades they assimilated culturally, politically, economically, educationally just fine."

The 1980s: Benefits of Compromise

After World War II, the U.S. abandoned its isolationist stance and helped create the United Nations, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and the International Monetary Fund. In the two decades that followed, a wealthy and open U.S. facilitated a new era of globalization.

But as economic growth slowed in the 1970s, the U.S. saw its competitive edge slip. Congress rewrote trade laws allowing industries to more easily obtain protection from overseas competition. When Reagan took office in 1981, there were many proposals in Congress to slash the flow of imported cars from Japan, recalls Mr. Brock, the former trade representative.

Reagan "at his core, really detested any government intervention in the marketplace," Mr. Brock says. He recalls telling his Japanese counterparts that although Reagan would be challenged by Congress, "no restraints would pass over his veto." To maintain good relations with the U.S., the Japanese agreed in 1981 to limit exports of automobiles to the U.S. to just below their 1980 levels for three years. Similar agreements were reached covering motorcycles, semiconductors and machine tools.

Mr. Brock says Reagan was popular enough to veto any trade bill he didn't like. That contrasts with Congress's willingness to defy Mr. Bush's veto threat when it moved to block the recent ports deal.

At the same time, U.S. manufacturers complained that the strong U.S. dollar and weak Japanese yen gave Japanese companies an unfair advantage. In 1985, to fend off protectionist sentiment from Congress, Reagan's influential Treasury

DOJ_NMG_0027757

Secretary James Baker coordinated an international effort to drive the dollar down, principally through massive selling of dollars by world central banks. That eventually helped narrow the trade deficit by making imports more expensive and exports cheaper.

Gary Hufbauer, a trade expert at the Institute for International Economics, a Washington, D.C., think tank, says Reagan "opportunistically allowed protection, to deal with congressional pressures at the moment." Free trade made little progress but it didn't suffer lasting setbacks either.

A similar dynamic occurred with immigration. By the 1980s, Mexico's stagnant economy and growing population led between three and six million Mexicans to seek a new life in the U.S., albeit an illegal one. That sparked a growing clamor to crack down. In 1981, Mr. Mazzoli and Wyoming Republican Senator Alan Simpson introduced a bill that would punish employers for hiring illegal immigrants, require Americans to show an identification card to get a job and put some illegal immigrants on the path to citizenship.

Pro-immigration critics of the bill compared the ID card to "dog tags" or "bar codes" while anti-immigration critics said it would reward lawbreakers and displace Americans from their jobs. Mr. Mazzoli says it passed because of broad, bipartisan support: The bill was rooted in the recommendations of a Carter-era bipartisan commission, sponsored by a Republican senator and a Democratic congressman, and signed by Reagan. Ultimately, about three million illegal immigrants took advantage of the amnesty, and immigration -- both legal and illegal -- rose over the next two decades.

Today: At the Crossroads

These compromises allowed globalization to advance but did not remove some underlying irritants. Income inequality has continued to widen. Domestic auto makers have lost more market share to foreign brands. The trade deficit has ballooned to new records. The number of illegal immigrants has soared. Gordon Hanson, an economist at the University of California at San Diego, says the 1986 law may have unintentionally "legitimized" the hiring of illegal immigrants because it didn't require that companies ensure the authenticity of their employees' documentation.

President Bush has emphasized the dangers of turning away from the world. "What I hope you don't see is a nation that loses its nerve and becomes isolationist and protectionist," Mr. Bush told an audience in Irvine, Calif., last week, defending his proposed guest-worker program. "What I hope you don't see is a nation that loses its confidence in the capacity to trade with countries like China."

Yet progress on opening borders has been difficult under Mr. Bush. The U.S. has signed an array of bilateral and regional trade deals but hopes are fading for a broader world-trade pact before Mr. Bush's negotiating authority expires in mid-2007. Congress is now drafting tighter restrictions on foreign investment in the U.S., and the fate of Mr. Bush's proposed guest-worker program is uncertain.

Although some of these setbacks are beyond his control, Mr. Bush's lack of personal popularity and bipartisan support has hampered his ability to promote pro-globalization policies. Rep. Sander Levin, a Michigan Democrat who has supported trade deals in the past, has opposed many negotiated by Mr. Bush. Unlike Reagan or Bill Clinton, he says, the president hasn't accommodated Democrats' concerns, such as worker protection in trade pacts.

Federal Reserve chairman Ben Bernanke, a scholar of the Great Depression, recently warned Congress that growing inequality threatens the U.S.'s commitment to open markets. "Our society is based on opportunity, it's based on flexibility in labor markets and product markets, it's based in open and fair trade," he told lawmakers. "And all of those things are at risk if a growing portion of the population feels they're not sharing in the benefits from those changes."

Thousands Turn Out, But Support Is Mixed Among City's Immigrants (NYT)

By Michelle O'Donnell

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

At his corner grocery on Coney Island Avenue in Ditmas Park, Brooklyn, Tariq Asheik minded the store alone yesterday morning, having given his two Mexican employees the day off to join rallies in support of immigrant rights.

"I love immigrants," said Mr. Asheik, who is from Pakistan. "Everyone's an immigrant here."

Along the unusually quiet commercial strip, dozens of Hispanics and Pakistanis joined hands to form a human chain.

DOJ_NMG_0027758

But up the street at his sign store, David Lanzman said he had no plans to close his business, despite the shuttering of other stores nearby in gestures of support.

"Who's going to secure the store?" said Mr. Lanzman, a Romanian who immigrated to the United States more than 30 years ago. "Maybe I lose $1,000 or $2,000."

Across the New York region, thousands of people took part in demonstrations and an economic boycott called for by some immigration leaders and labor unions, culminating in a demonstration last evening by tens of thousands of people in Union Square in Manhattan. But despite the large turnout of Hispanics, there was far from uniform support for the rallies among all immigrant groups.

The divide was visible in New York City, where immigrants from different countries live side by side. In Ditmas Park, the door to La Nueva Union, a Mexican bakery, was locked, while a nearby film developing shop, owned by a Pakistani man, remained open.

Denise Rodriguez, a Mexican immigrant who works as a maid, said she stayed home from work and kept her two young sons home from school yesterday to attend a rally. Education officials said attendance in city schools yesterday was down about 6 percent.

In the Sunset Park neighborhood of Brooklyn, which is home to large numbers of Hispanics and Asians, about 3,000 people, mostly Hispanic, turned out for a midday rally, although Asian-owned businesses largely remained open. That was to be expected, said Artemio Guerra, a rally organizer, who said legislation pending before Congress that would overhaul immigration law was a "racial attack on Hispanics."

Some of the store closings and rallies took place at 12:16 p.m., a time chosen as a symbolic protest against the passage of the bill by the House of Representatives on Dec. 16 last year.

One of the most visible demonstrators in Sunset Park was Sylvia Garcia, an immigrant from Mexico, who held a large hand-lettered sign reading, "I lost my job to be here today." Ms. Garcia, 32, said she was dismissed from her job as a cashier at Cafe O in Midtown Manhattan, along with five co-workers, after attending the rally without being given the day off, an account confirmed by Patrick Lee, the manager.

"They came last minute without a heads up," Mr. Lee, an immigrant from Korea, said yesterday as he worked a long day as cashier. "I understand their situation, but I don't understand why she didn't give me a heads up."

In Jackson Heights, Queens, an area with a large Central and South American population, thousands of people poured onto 37th Avenue, waving flags and holding signs adorned with a red apple reading, "I love immigrant New York!"

In Albany, the State Assembly, controlled by Democrats, stopped business for the day to show support for the national rallies. Shortly after the session was called to order around 3 p.m., about two dozen Assembly members turned and walked out in silence. The Assembly adjourned several minutes later, without acting on any legislation.

On Long Island, where the most visible pools of immigrant labor are the outdoor sites where Hispanic men and women gather to wait for daily work, the boycott appeared more uniform.

Along Willis Avenue in Roslyn, where a line of hundreds of Hispanic men awaiting work usually stretches for nearly a mile, there was no one yesterday, said the Rev. Allan B. Ramirez, an advocate for immigrants.

"It looked like the streets were abandoned," Mr. Ramirez said.

Salvadoran Shopkeeper Sacrifices To Achieve (WP)

By Karin Brulliard

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

On any other Monday afternoon, Gerardo Sanchez would have been at his Columbia Heights photo studio snapping family portraits, selling Mexican DVDs, maybe ordering supplies by phone.

Yesterday, the shop's door was locked and the sign that normally blinks O-P-E-N in its window was dark. Sanchez was in Hyattsville, kneeling on his wet driveway, hosing off a hubcap of his minivan.

DOJ_NMG_0027759

"See you there?" Sanchez, 32, called in Spanish to a neighbor. The neighbor nodded; there was no need to explain where. Like Sanchez, he would head to a rally in the District and add his voice to a call for immigration reform. To show his support, Sanchez had not only shuttered his store. He planned a day without spending a dime.

Until the Good Humor truck rolled up the street, that is, drawing Sanchez's 3-year-old daughter, Tirza, like a magnet. A few minutes later, Sanchez had purchased ice cream for Tirza, two neighbor children and his wife.

"It is for the children! I forgot because of the children," he said in an eruption of laughter. Then, reconsidering, he put up his hands in a who-me ? gesture. "I did not buy anything. I gave a gift."

Like many immigrants who participated in yesterday's boycott and strike, Sanchez did it with a few calculated risks. His three school-age daughters went to class because he had not told school officials they would stay home, and he knows there are rules. Much of his work is arranged over his cellphone, and because he is the boss, he would not imperil his job -- something he was not sure he was willing to do.

Still, Sanchez, a Salvadoran with a temporary work permit, said he did not think twice about closing his shop, though he knew he would lose money. He predicted he would lose $400 to $500 from walk-ins -- people like the girl who arrived Sunday afternoon, celebrating her sweet-15 in a sparkling tiara and taffeta hoop skirt that she squeezed through the shop's front door.

"I think people have to sacrifice something to achieve something," he said. The something Sanchez wants: legal status for illegal immigrants and residency for those with work permits like the one he has, which does not permit him to leave the country. Hope for a law that could grant that wish has inspired in Sanchez a previously dormant political interest. He also closed his store April 10 to attend a rally on the Mall.

Sanchez said he knew many activists discouraged the boycott, but he was unconcerned. Part of him suspected a "political game" in which members of Congress unsympathetic to immigrants influenced the organizers. Mostly he thought that the immigrant community wanted the boycott. Besides, he figured, why wait when you do not know what tomorrow will bring?

"When a human being has decided, he has decided," Sanchez said.

For Sanchez, the morning passed much as it would on a typical day off: He slept late and watched the news. After washing the van, he took a shower, spritzed on cologne and picked up his girls at school a few blocks away.

Back home, Sanchez and his daughters -- ages 5, 7 and 9 -- paged through a book club pamphlet. He boasts that his daughters know the U.S. national anthem but not its Salvadoran counterpart.

In 1999, Sanchez flew to the United States with a professional visa in his passport to cover the Cherry Blossom Festival for a television station in El Salvador, where he worked as a photographer, journalist and cameraman. He says he did not intend to stay. But he did, picking up freelance photo jobs here and there. In 2000, he started doing weddings and other events.

Last year, he bought a brick duplex for $272,000. Four months ago, he opened his shop in a low-ceilinged basement with orange walls. He put speakers on the sidewalk and blasted Latin music to draw in clients. Sanchez is demure about his store's profits, preferring to say it "maintains itself."

Even with that dream realized, Sanchez knows his situation is tenuous. His work permit does not allow him to apply for a green card, and his wife and children are here illegally. Yesterday, he leaned back on his plaid sofa and looked at his daughters, who raced wildly around the living room.

"My dream is that they study" in a university, he said. And that they learn three languages, and maybe study overseas.

That last point is at the heart of Sanchez's feelings about legalization: He believes it is only fair that people should be able to come and go from a country, especially if they are hardworking and responsible.

Sanchez speaks these thoughts like a preacher. He peppers intense monologues with sudden whispers for emphasis and is given to parables and metaphors. A dove lives in a beautiful tree surrounded by bars, he recounted. "What is it? It is still a jail," Sanchez said, hissing the second sentence. Set the dove free, he continued, and it will return to nurture the tree.

In mid-afternoon, he got into his Toyota and headed for the rally alone. Taking his daughters somewhere police are present would make him nervous, he said. But Sanchez was eager. The anticipation had been mounting all day.

As he crossed a street toward Malcolm X Park, Sanchez gripped a stack of fliers given to him that morning by day-labor organizers in Langley Park. The fliers tell day laborers how to avoid getting stiffed, but Sanchez handed them out indiscriminately, offering a " Como esta ?" to each taker.

DOJ_NMG_0027760

"I would like to be like a leader of the community -- no matter your race, no matter your color," he said, entering the park. Making his way to the stage, Sanchez shook hands with photographer friends and paused to sign a petition supporting voting rights for legal immigrants in the District. The rally was lovely, he decided.

And he decided something else: He would risk his job for this after all, if it came to that.

"I would do it," he said, squinting under the sun. "To help others. I know tomorrow I can find another job."

A few minutes later, Sanchez squeezed under the scaffolding near the front of the stage, next to a man holding a giant U.S. flag and a small Salvadoran one. He raised his hands above his head and clapped.

Most Turn Deaf Ear To Spanish U.S. Anthem (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — More than two out of three Americans say the national anthem should be sung only in English, according to a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll.

The finding comes after the release last week of a Spanish-language version of the anthem called Nuestro Himno or Our Anthem.

The poll, taken Friday through Sunday, found that 69% believe it is only appropriate for the anthem to be sung in English, while 29% say it is OK to sing it in Spanish. The poll's margin of error is +/-3 percentage points.

The new recording of the national anthem is part of an album called Somos Americanos (We Are Americans), set for release May 16. Part of the CD's $10 price will go to pro-immigration organizations.

Producer Adam Kidron has said he wanted the new recording of the anthem to honor America's immigrants. However, the release has generated strong opposition, including from President Bush, who was asked about it last week and said, “People who want to be a citizen of this country ought to learn English, and they ought to learn to sing the national anthem in English.”

Poll respondents largely agreed with Bush on the anthem, but they were not in sync with his policies on immigration.

Nearly two-thirds — 64% — disapproved of Bush's immigration policy; 26% approved. Bush wants tougher border enforcement, an expanded “guest worker” program and a way, yet to be specified, to allow illegal immigrants already in the USA to become citizens.

Proponents Of Spanish Anthem Point To Rice (AP)

By Pauline Jelinek, Associated Press Writer

AP, May 2, 2006

President Bush wants people to sing the national anthem in English only. Promoters of singing it in Spanish are pointing to comments by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice — and her department's Web site — as ammunition for their side of the argument.

There are four Spanish versions on USINFO.State.gov, a multi-language Web site.

"I've heard the national anthem done in rap versions, country versions, classical versions," Rice said Sunday on CBS's "Face the Nation." "The individualization of the American national anthem is quite under way."

The State Department site for some time has offered translations of the U.S. Constitution, pledge of allegiance and other documents in French, Arabic and other foreign languages to help people understand America better.

This is what promoters say they had in mind with the Spanish anthem recording, which has drawn criticism from Internet bloggers.

Weighing in on Bush's side of the argument was Sen. Lamar Alexander (news, bio, voting record), R-Tenn., who introduced a resolution affirming that the song, pledge allegiance to the flag and other "statements of national unity" should be done in English.

When 'Nuestro Himno,' a Spanish version of the anthem, debuted last week, Bush said "people who want to be a citizen of this country ought to learn English and they ought to learn to sing the national anthem in English."

DOJ_NMG_0027761

After Bush rejected the idea, British music producer Adam Kidron said, "We instead view `Nuestro Himno' as a song that affords those immigrants that have not yet learned the English language the opportunity to fully understand the character of 'The Star-Spangled Banner,' the American flag and the ideals of freedom that they represent."

CHC Members Split On Boycotts (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, May 2, 2006

The "National Day of Action," organized to draw attention to the role of undocumented workers in the U.S economy, provoked diverse reactions from the 22 Democratic members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus.

On the supportive end, Rep. Raúl Grijalva (Ariz.), who hails from an immigrant-rich section of Tucson, closed his Capitol Hill office for much of the day as a show of solidarity. Others, though, treaded more gingerly, fearful that mass walkouts from work and school might set their cause back and embolden supporters of the immigration bill that cleared the House in December, which would declare all undocumented workers felons.

"Although I understand how outraged many Latinos feel, I fear that a nationwide boycott will do more harm than good," said Rep. Charlie Gonzalez (Texas).

The varied opinions within the CHC were apparent in a statement released in the run-up to the Day of Action by Rep. Grace Napolitano (Calif.), the group's chairwoman. Napolitano urged workers not to take "unnecessary steps that would cause them to put their jobs, families or education at risk," without explicitly endorsing or opposing the marches and rallies that were planned.

If there was consensus within the CHC, it was that parents should not pull their children from school for the day.

In the Bronx, hometown Rep. José Serrano was one of about 3,000 demonstrators who gathered Monday morning on a heavily commercial stretch of Fordham Road, near the Bronx Zoo and Fordham University.

"We formed a human chain in front of those businesses to make the point that the businesses in that area could not function — and indeed, some of them may not be functioning today — without immigrant workers," reported Serrano, who was also slated to appear at a late afternoon rally in downtown Manhattan.

In many cities, rallies were scheduled for later in the day, to allow participants to first put in a full or near-full day at work or school. But unlike some fellow CHC members, Serrano said he hoped most immigrants would leave their jobs for the day, and noted that many employers had actually cooperated in encouraging workers to take part.

"In general, I don't think it's a bad thing for immigrants to say, 'I'm going to show you for a couple of hours — a couple of hours — what I mean, and what we mean, to this country,'" Serrano said.

Three-thousand miles west of the Bronx, the largest single rally in the country took place in Los Angeles on Monday afternoon. Southern California is home to about a quarter of the CHC's membership, but it seemed none of them were planning to attend.

"I'm in a tough district," said Rep. Loretta Sanchez, who first won her Orange County seat in a nail-biter against then-Rep. Robert Dornan in 1996. "I don't get elected because I go out in the streets and march. I get elected because I go door-to-door. ... If I went out and marched all day, I wouldn't get any votes."

Sanchez, who spent Monday in Washington, D.C., expressed doubt that the demonstrations will advance the immigration debate at all.

"Obviously, I support free speech, as long as people are peaceful," she said. "But I would prefer if they went door-to-door and registered voters to vote. I'm a much more constructive person."

Rep. Hilda Solis, whose district is dominated by the suburbs east of Los Angeles, also seemed attuned to the potential public relations damage if the intent of demonstrators is misconstrued.

"For those that choose to participate in rallies, I encourage them to wear white as a sign of peace and unity and to wave American flags with great pride," she said.

Rep. Linda Sanchez, the sister of Loretta, taped a video message for Los Angeles schoolchildren last month urging them to stay in class on Monday and was focused on making sure Monday's events "are not counterproductive for anyone," according to her chief of staff, Michael Torra.

DOJ_NMG_0027762

Rep. Xavier Becerra, who represents part of Los Angeles, also passed up the rally in his hometown, but only because of a scheduling conflict.

"The fact that he's not taking part in any of the rallies today in no way means he's not fully engaged in the immigration debate," said his spokesman, Steve Haro.

The office of Rep. Lucille Roybal-Allard, another Angeleno and the first Mexican-American woman to serve in the House, refused to comment on her plans for the day.

Some of the CHC's strongest Day of Action proponents were more visible than others.

Rep. Luis Gutierrez (Ill.) helped organize a midday march from Union Park to Grant Park in Chicago, while Serrano spent some of the afternoon working through more than a dozen interview requests from newspapers and radio shows. He said he'd developed a strategy to rebut some of the more aggressive and conservative radio hosts he deals with.

"I ask them, 'Can you put your hand on the Bible and swear to me right now that none of your ancestors came to this country illegally?' And all I get is silence."

By 11 a.m. Monday, calls to Grijalva's office in the Longworth Building went immediately to an answering machine, and a mid-afternoon visit found the door shut and locked.

"I think closing in the afternoon was supposed to be in solidarity with what was going on, but it was open in the morning and all of our district offices are open," said Grijalva's press secretary, Natalie Luna, who spent the day working from Tucson. Her boss, she said, had no plans to participate in any rallies and was planning to spend Monday afternoon at his D.C. home.

Republicans Set Sights On Aliens' Employers (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, May 2, 2006

House Republicans called on U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement to prosecute businesses shut down yesterday by their illegal alien employees who took the day off to participate in protests of immigration legislation.

"Too often, we presume that fault lies with the illegal migrant worker, but we need to recognize that the employer broke the law by hiring the illegal alien," wrote Republican Reps. Jack Kingston of Georgia and Marsha Blackburn of Tennessee. "We believe the federal government has an obligation to enforce the nation's immigration laws and must actively investigate any and all instances where it is apparent industries have knowingly and willingly hired those who entered this country illegally."

In a letter to ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers, Mr. Kingston and Mrs. Blackburn noted "the multiple reports in the news media today regarding companies which have been forced to halt operations because large numbers of their employees appear to be in the United States illegally and are participating in the protest rallies."

"ICE has an obligation to use this public information to enforce immigration laws," they wrote. "We respectfully request that you look into this matter and report back to us on your findings."

Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican, meanwhile, observed that the "Day Without Immigrants" would have been a "boon" for taxpayers if they could have taken the day off from paying all the costs associated with the illegal alien community.

"The activist protesters are trying to confuse the American public by lumping legal immigrants with illegal aliens," Mr. Tancredo said. "A day without legal immigrants would be a day without almost all Americans. A day without illegal aliens, on the other hand, would be a boon to the American taxpayer."

He said the government pays out more than $10 billion annually in health care, education and incarceration costs for illegal aliens. He also said the government may be forgoing as much as $35 billion in lost tax revenue to the underground labor market.

"Americans don't respond well to illegal aliens who demand amnesty. As I've said before, that doesn't play well in Peoria," Mr. Tancredo said. "Every time illegal aliens and their supporters take to the streets, it drives home the point to most Americans that illegal immigration is a problem in their hometowns, and that we urgently need to get control of our borders."

In the Senate, Republicans introduced a resolution affirming that statements of "national unity" such as the national anthem should be recited or sung in English.

DOJ_NMG_0027763

Sen. Lamar Alexander, Tennessee Republican and author of the resolution, said the protesters' message gets "lost in translation" when the "Star-Spangled Banner" is rewritten in Spanish.

"Ours is a diverse nation, but diversity is not our greatest accomplishment," he said. "Jerusalem is diverse. The Balkans are diverse. Iraq is diverse. What makes America unique is that we have taken all that magnificent diversity and turned it into one nation."

Pederson Ad Cites Bush To Criticize Kyl (HILL)

By Andrew Barr

The Hill, May 2, 2006

Two ads from Arizona Democratic Senate candidate Jim Pederson use President Bush and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) to criticize Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) on immigration reform.

One ad shows Bush with Kyl and says, "Even President Bush calls Kyl's immigration plan for massive deportation unrealistic." Bush supports a guest-worker program, which Kyl opposes. The second ad quotes McCain saying Kyl's plan "borders on fantasy." McCain and Kyl were on opposite sides of the Senate battle on immigration reform last month.

In both ads, the quotes are followed by Pederson holding up a document titled the "Pederson Immigration Plan" and saying, "My plan is not amnesty; it's realistic, and a long-term solution."

Kyl's campaign manager, Jake Logan, responded, "No one we know of is calling for massive deportation, and certainly nothing in the Kyl bill calls for massive deportation." The Kyl bill would require "mandatory departure" for any illegal immigrants applying for guest-worker status.

"I am disappointed that my name is being used in an attack ad in this U.S. Senate race," McCain said of the ad. "I continue to strongly support Jon Kyl and am proud to serve as his campaign chairman."

A recent poll conducted by Arizona State University shows that the race is tightening, with Kyl up 11 percentage points over Pederson, 42-31, and 27 percent undecided. Three months ago, Kyl was up 22 points.

In Mexico, Residents Boycott U.S. Goods In Show Of Solidarity (USAT)

By Danna Harman

USA Today, May 2, 2006

MEXICO CITY — The fast checkout line was closed at the Wal-Mart in the capital's Coyoacan district on Monday because there was not much of a line. Only about a dozen shoppers were in the produce section. No one was in the home-appliances department.

Mexicans staged boycotts of U.S. goods and stores in a show of solidarity with migrants in the USA who cut school and stopped work to call for immigration reform. The Pew Hispanic Center estimates that more than half of the illegal immigrants in the USA are Mexican.

In Mexico, thousands participated in the protests. But because May Day is a public holiday here, it was difficult to assess the boycott's economic impact, according to the American Chamber of Commerce of Mexico, which represents more than 2,000 U.S. and other foreign companies.

Groups including the Coalition for the Political Rights of Mexicans Abroad and the Mexican Association of Electricians urged members to boycott U.S. franchises such as McDonald's and Dunkin' Donuts. Thousands of Mexicans joined solidarity marches.

Raine Cortez Robles, 53, had intended to buy school supplies for her two daughters at an Office Depot on Insurgentes Boulevard in southern Mexico City, but she decided against it. "Just because I need a ruler and a pencil sharpener, I should let down my brothers and sisters? No!" she said.

Many Mexicans, however, did not seem to know about the boycott. Or, if they were aware of it, they chose to take advantage of the May Day public holiday to shop.

"I was born in Arizona, where my parents used to live illegally," said Mirsa Arellano, 47. She was buying soft drinks and hamburger at the Coyoacan-area Wal-Mart. "My son is there now, so I know about the hardships. But how is boycotting these stores really going to help? It might even backfire."

DOJ_NMG_0027764

In a radio address Sunday, Mexican President Vicente Fox suggested that protesters avoid any "element of provocation that could promote xenophobia or opposition to immigration reform."

Felipe Caldern, the presidential candidate from Fox's National Action Party seemed conflicted about the protests and boycott. "I feel the temptation to show solidarity with the movement," he said in an interview Saturday.

Activists from populist presidential candidate Andrés Manuel Lpez Obrador's Democratic Revolution Party handed out fliers in support of the boycott.

The American Chamber of Commerce, which charts U.S.-Mexican business ties, says its members are responsible for $100 billion in investment here. Larry Rubin the group's president, noted that more than 40% of Mexico's workforce is employe d by U.S. companies. Walmex, the Mexican subsidiary of Wal-Mart, is the biggest private employer with 140,000 workers. Rubin said the boycott is "not a good way for Mexicans to pay back our support. It's like shooting oneself in the foot."

At the Starbucks in San Angel, a southern Mexico City neighborhood, Marina Elizalde, 23, studied for her medical school exams. "I forgot," she said, when asked about the boycott. "But now that I know, I am going to … walk out immediately — after I finish my mocha."

Mexicans Boycott U.S. Over Migrants (WT/AP)

By Mark Stevenson, Associated Press

The Washington Times, May 2, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Thousands of Mexicans took to the streets yesterday to support illegal aliens in the United States and celebrated what they called "A Day Without Gringos" by shunning U.S.-owned supermarkets, fast-food restaurants and American goods.

Measuring the boycott's effect proved difficult, however, because business is normally reduced to a fraction of normal volume on Mexico's May Day holiday.

Some Mexicans vowed not to buy from or patronize any businesses related to the United States, while others said they found it difficult to avoid doing so.

Customers streamed into some branches of Wal-Mart, McDonald's and Burger King in the Mexican capital despite the boycott, which coincided with a call for aliens in the United States to skip work, school and shopping.

Juan Ortiz, a 28-year-old salesman who left a Wal-Mart in downtown Mexico City pushing a cart load of food and bathroom goods, said he supported legalizing aliens in the United States, but didn't think it was practical to boycott U.S. goods.

"You have to buy what is least expensive here, and I have to buy things for my family," he said.

Celestino Garcia, a 32-year-old sandwich seller outside the Wal-Mart, said he was seeing the same number of shoppers yesterday as on any other day.

It also appeared to be business as usual at a McDonald's franchise in a working-class neighborhood near Mexico City's international airport.

But Marina Serna, deputy manager for a downtown Burger King, said she thought the boycott was having an effect: The restaurant had only one customer in its first 90 minutes yesterday, even though it is owned by Mexican franchise holders.

Sergio Segura, 42, a member of an Aztec Indian dance group, stood outside of a McDonald's waiting for some friends, but said he did not plan to eat there.

"Sure, Mexicans buy the franchises, but part of the earnings go to the markets on Wall Street. I'm not eating here today or tomorrow."

Pointing across the street to a vast market replete with tacos, tortillas and sandwiches, Mr. Segura said, "For what it costs for three hamburgers from McDonald's, you can buy for the whole family and eat well at the market."

But as he leaned against his Ford minivan, Mr. Segura acknowledged the difficulty of avoiding all U.S. products. "Here in Mexico, there is no way to buy Mexican" cars, he said.

Although federal officials tried to distance themselves from the events, at least a half-dozen state governors in Mexico endorsed the boycott of U.S. companies, and thousands of unionized workers -- who traditionally hold labor rallies on May 1 -- dedicated yesterday's marches to the cause.

DOJ_NMG_0027765

Some of the demonstrators who gathered in the huge downtown plaza known as the Zocalo carried banners with slogans that read "Unrestricted Support for Migrants."

Producing Smaller Numbers, But Laying Claim To Majority (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

CHICAGO, May 1 — Around the edges of the immigration demonstrations that filled cities like this one on Monday, there were some who went to disagree.

In Las Vegas, Jackie Pinjuv, 68, and another woman waded into the immigration demonstration and offered their own sign: "Illegals, Go Home. Your Rights Are There." An angry crowd surrounded the women at one point with objections, but Ms. Pinjuv said her views were unchanged.

"I believe that these people are hurting our country and they need to go back," she said.

In Denver, a group gathered near the larger march to voice support for a proposed constitutional amendment barring illegal immigrants in the state from getting some social services.

And here, Rick Biesada, a founder of the Chicago Minuteman Project, which opposes illegal immigration, said four supporters of his group's philosophy tried to attend events but were turned away.

"We were telling our people that you should 'shop till you drop' today as a way to counter this whole boycott thing," Mr. Biesada said. "We have nothing against immigration; it's illegal immigration that has to stop."

Compared with the hundreds of thousands who marched urging Congress to consider legal status for some of the 11 million illegal immigrants in this country, far fewer went to speak for the other side.

But advocates for tighter border security and increased enforcement of immigration laws said that their quieter voices were actually more representative of the views of Americans as a whole.

"I think the majority of Americans are very, very upset," said Fred Elbel, the co-chairman of Defend Colorado Now, an organization pressing for the amendment to bar illegal immigrants from receiving some social services. "The illegals are organized by a massive, well-funded campaign with a tremendous amount of organization out there. There's no equivalent organization to get Americans out to protest and say: 'Enforce our laws.' "

Around the country, conservative radio and television talk show hosts often spoke of the demonstrations. Even their choices of words ("illegal alien" and "amnesty") often clashed with those used by organizers at the demonstrations ("immigrant" and "reform").

In Cicero, Ill., Susan Masek said she drove past the protest in that suburb of Chicago with a sign on her car window saying "No Amnesty" and "Illegal is Illegal." A group of demonstrators surrounded her car, Ms. Masek said, and a few started jumping on its front end. After a tense confrontation, she said she left at the request of the police.

"I was shaking like a devil, and I was upset," Ms. Masek said later. "They made me feel like, 'What are you doing here? You're causing trouble.' "

Dave Gorak, the executive director of the Midwest Coalition to Reduce Immigration, said the demonstrations did not represent another group of people losing out to illegal immigrants: millions of "underemployed Americans, who would love to have a fulltime job."

"What this is about is disrespect and contempt for the law," Mr. Gorak said. "These people are laughing in the faces of everybody who came to this country playing by the rules. They are laughing at everybody who has fought and died for this country. For them to stand up and say, 'You owe us something,' is just wrong."

In Houston, Leslie Wetzel, a director of U.S. Border Watch, was one of two anti-immigration protesters outside the office of Senator John Cornyn, a Republican. She carried signs that said, "Remember the Alamo" and "Come and Take It."

In response, Ms. Wetzel said, advocates for immigrants pushed bullhorns in her face and tried otherwise to intimidate her.

"They should all be put on a bus and deported," she said. "If you're illegal, you're out of here. Period. It's not a racist thing. It's a question of law and order. Either we're a nation of law, or we're going to be a nation of anarchy."

They Are America (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0027766

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

Warnings of a crippling immigrant boycott did not come true yesterday. The economy survived. But what may not survive — we hope — is people's willful misunderstanding of the nature of the immigrant-rights movement.

The worst among our citizens and politicians are eager to depict illegal immigrants as criminals, potential terrorists and alien invaders. But what we saw yesterday, in huge, peaceful rallies in Los Angeles, Las Vegas, Chicago, Denver, New York, Atlanta and other cities, were regular people: the same types of assimilation-minded moms, dads and children we wistfully romanticize on holidays devoted to, say, St. Patrick and Columbus.

If these extraordinarily positive events were a protest of anything, it was the idea of the immigrant as temporary and unwelcome guest worker. The marches flew in the face of theories that undocumented workers want nothing but to labor unnoticed and separate from the nation that employs them to make its meals, trim its hedges and slaughter its beef.

These immigrants, weary of silent servitude, are speaking up and asking for something simple: a chance to work to become citizens, with all the obligations and opportunities that go with it.

Our lawmakers, to their discredit, have erected barriers within barriers, created legal hurdles and bureaucratic hoops, and dangled the opportunity for lowly guest-worker status without the citizenship to go with it. It is an invitation to create a society with a permanent underclass deprived of any ladder to something better. It is a path to creating a different, and lower, vision of our country and ourselves.

It is not only the border-obsessed Minutemen who should be shamed by yesterday's joyous outpouring. Lawmakers who have stymied comprehensive immigration reform with stalemated name-calling and cold electoral calculation should listen up. A silent, shadow population is speaking with one voice. The message, aimed at Washington but something the whole country should hear, is clear: We are America. We want to join you.

It's a simple message. It should be sinking in by now.

Primero De Mayo (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, May 2, 2006

IT'S HARD OUT THERE FOR AN anti-illegal immigration activist. Just when you think the long-awaited middle-class "backlash" against the immigrant rights movement will kick in, the hundreds of thousands of peaceful and mostly joyous protesters refuse to live down to your low expectations.

Instead of being dominated by aggressive anarchists bent on "reconquista" and violent confrontation, even Monday's first march — the one frowned upon by Cardinal Roger M. Mahony, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and other members of the pro-reform establishment — was yet another passionate and upbeat street party.

We don't believe students should skip school, and we shared the concern of those who felt a labor walkout might come across as economic blackmail, but the tenor of the day was overwhelmingly positive. Sure, there were a handful of Che Guevara flags sprinkled in the sea of Old Glories, and some protesters tried their best to interest passersby in an upcoming conference on socialism. But those messages were overwhelmed by 40-piece mariachi bands, infectious drum corps and beaming 4-year-old girls sitting on their daddies' shoulders and waving U.S. flags.

L.A.'s invisible workforce emerged not in a spirit of anger or defiance but with pride and exuberance. It was all so, well, American.

The scale and tenor of the demonstrations have had the salutary and corrective benefit of marginalizing those who conflate Latino immigration with crime, a lack of patriotism, a security threat or any other ill under the sun. Six months ago, opponents of reform drove the political debate. No more.

None of this makes immigration policy easier to concoct. When the world's leading economy shares a 2,000-mile border with a poor country, it's a challenge. Even though the United States benefits from immigration as a whole, cities and counties on the front lines can groan under the strain. From the deportation of felons to in-state tuition for undocumented students, the legal to-and-fro of 12 million humans illegally residing in the U.S. presents serious policy issues about which good people can and do disagree.

DOJ_NMG_0027767

But when this issue has reared its head in the past, too often debate was driven by an irrational fear and dislike of The Other, leading to policies that represented the darker angels of Americans' nature. The singular triumph of this spring's protests is that they have indelibly attached a human face to a debate dominated by dehumanizing words such as "illegals" and "aliens." And that face brings a message resonant across 230 years: "We want to be one of you."

DHS Official: 'We're Building A Better System' (USAT)

By Jim Williams

USA Today, May 2, 2006

On Sept. 11, 2001, our nation lacked the necessary tools to identify and stop those who used fraudulent documents to illegally enter the country. We also know that government agencies enforcing immigration laws did not always coordinate or share information, which made it even easier for visitors to overstay their visas.

Today, the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) is implementing a comprehensive border security strategy to shut down vulnerabilities in our immigration and border management system and aggressively enforce our immigration laws.

We are building the capacity to confirm that individuals seeking to enter our country are who they claim they are, do not pose a security risk and leave when required. We are improving our ability to give federal partners the information they need to make sound, timely decisions. And we've built a more effective and reliable system for welcoming legitimate travelers to our country while protecting privacy and meeting our critical security goals.

US-VISIT, for example, has installed biometric entry capabilities at our ports of entry, making it nearly impossible for terrorists and criminals to enter the country using fraudulent documents. With this new tool, we have denied entry to thousands of criminals and immigration violators and tens of thousands more who have applied for visas.

US-VISIT complements the department's strong enforcement measures at the border and inside our country. By coupling these efforts with a proposed temporary worker program, we would make it more difficult for illegal immigrants to evade the law and would dramatically reduce incentives for visa overstays. We would take pressure off the border by creating a legal channel for temporary workers and free up law enforcement to focus on the greatest threats to our security — terrorists, drug dealers and other dangerous criminals.

The challenges we face at our borders were years in the making, but the transformation of our immigration and border management system is well underway.

Jim Williams is director of the Homeland Security Department's US-VISIT program office.

Think All Illegal Immigrants Are Sneaking In? Think Again. (USAT)

USA Today, May 2, 2006

Place in your mind the image of an illegal immigrant and chances are you'll think of a Spanish-speaking worker who sneaked across the porous Mexican border in search of a job. That is the stereotype — and it was the dominant image caught by TV cameras Monday as hundreds of thousands of protesters from Boston to Los Angeles took to the streets for the "Day Without Immigrants" rallies.

But an accurate portrait of the illegal immigrant population is surprisingly different — so much so that it exposes some proposed responses as off-target, particularly those aimed at border security.

Here's a fact you don't hear much about: Between a third and a half of the nation's illegal immigrants — at least 3.8 million people — entered the USA legally. That's right. They didn't slip across the border in the dead of night. They came from all over the world, stayed longer than their visas or entry documents allowed, and melted into society. There's little to stop them, despite millions spent on a post-9/11 program supposedly aimed at those who "overstay."

That's what four of the 19 Sept. 11 hijackers did, according to a 2004 report by Congress' Government Accountability Office. Ringleader Mohamed Atta, who came legally on a visitor's visa, stayed longer than he was supposed to, left and was allowed back in the USA, despite having illegally overstayed.

Record-keeping on who stays and goes has been so haphazard for decades that the government can't even say how many "overstays" there are, let alone figure out how to find and deport them. To do those jobs, the Department of Homeland Security

DOJ_NMG_0027768

(DHS) would need three things: an effective system to track all foreign entrants, another to track those who leave, and enough agents and judicial manpower to go after those who remain illegally.

It has none of those.

But DHS isn't solely to blame. Until 9/11, Congress was as schizophrenic about tracking foreigners who overstayed their visas as it is about nearly every other aspect of immigration.

More than two years after the terror attacks, the government started an automated entry-exit system called US-VISIT. Then-DHS undersecretary Asa Hutchinson promised that "we will be able to know who is overstaying their visa." But US-VISIT can't deliver because of how DHS has chosen to run it:

• The program covers a small percentage of foreign visitors. It exempts the vast majority of Canadians, as well as Mexicans who enter for short-term stays, even though an estimated 80% of illegal immigrants are from Mexico and other Latin American nations. People from Canada and Mexico accounted for nearly 156 million border crossings in 2002, the latest data available.

• The exit system, the key to detecting overstays, is running at only a dozen airports, three seaports and none of the nation's 154 land ports of entry. Where it exists, there's nothing to prevent visitors from ignoring it.

While the program has denied entry to about 1,100 criminals and other violators, it has done little to prevent or detect overstays.

Fixes for the nation's out-of-control immigration problem aren't easy in any case, but they'll prove useless as long as those who write the laws respond solely to stereotypes. A fence in the backyard isn't the solution if as many as half of the illegal immigrants are walking in through the front door.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

3 Democrats Slam President Over Defying Statutes (BOS)

By Charlie Savage

The Boston Globe, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Three leading Democratic senators blasted President Bush yesterday for having claimed he has the authority to defy more than 750 statutes enacted since he took office, saying that the president's legal theories are wrong and that he must obey the law.

"We're a government of laws, not men," Senate minority leader Harry Reid, Democrat of Nevada, said in a statement. "It is not for George W. Bush to disregard the Constitution and decide that he is above the law."

Senator Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the ranking Democrat on the Judiciary Committee, accused Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney of attempting to concentrate ever more government power in their own hands.

"The Bush-Cheney administration has cultivated an insidious brand of unilateralism that regularly crosses into an arrogance of power," Leahy said in a statement. "The scope of the administration's assertions of power is stunning, and it is chilling."

Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, also said that the Bush administration, abetted by "a compliant Republican Congress," was undermining the checks and balances that "guard against abuses of power by any single branch of government."

The opposition lawmakers were reacting to a report in Sunday's Boston Globe detailing the scope of Bush's assertions that he can ignore laws that conflict with his interpretation of the Constitution.

Bush is the first president since Thomas Jefferson to stay so long in office without vetoing a bill -- an act that gives the public notice that he has rejected a provision and gives Congress a chance to override his judgment. Instead, Bush has signed into law every bill that reached his desk, often in public ceremonies in which he praises the legislation and its sponsors.

Then, after the ceremony, Bush has quietly appended "signing statements" to more than one out of every 10 bills he has signed, laying out his legal interpretation for government officials to follow when implementing the new laws. The statements, which until recently attracted little attention in Congress or in the media, are filed without fanfare in the federal record.

DOJ_NMG_0027769

In many cases, Bush has said he can ignore acts of Congress that seek to regulate the military and spy agencies, asserting the Constitution grants him that power as commander in chief. For example, he has claimed the power to waive a torture ban, provisions for oversight in the Patriot Act, limits on domestic wiretapping, and numerous regulations for the military.

Other statutes Bush has asserted that he can ignore have little to do with national security. They include some types of affirmative-action provisions, "whistle-blower" protections for nuclear regulatory officials, and safeguards against political interference in federally funded research.

The White House has declined to answer questions about Bush's legal claims in his signing statements. "We follow the practice that has been followed by previous administrations," spokeswoman Dana Perino said yesterday.

But legal scholars say Bush's assertions have gone far beyond that of any previous president in US history. Bush has applied his signing statements to more than 750 new statutes. His numbers are by far a record for any US president, scholars say.

Many scholars also contend that Bush is usurping some of the lawmaking powers of the Congress and Constitution-interpreting powers of the courts.

But, Leahy said, because Bush's fellow Republicans control Congress, Democrats have no power to call hearings on Bush's attempt to "pick and choose which laws he deems appropriate to follow."

"Just as disturbing as the president's use of press releases to announce which laws he will follow is the abject failure of the Republican-controlled Congress to act as a check against this executive power grab," Leahy said. "Until Republican leaders let Congress fulfill its oversight role, this White House will have no incentive to stop this abuse of power."

Medicare's Cost Of Drug Benefit Will Be Lower Than Expected (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Medicare's prescription-drug benefit will cost the government about 20% less during the next decade than was projected a year ago, but largely for reasons outside the government's control.

Most of the reduction will result from lower-than-expected growth in the nation's per capita drug spending, Medicare's actuaries said in their latest projections, which came as part of the annual release of data on the financial health of Medicare and Social Security from the trustees of the programs.

The actuaries said fewer people than expected are signing up for the new coverage. Since last year, Medicare actuaries have lowered estimates for enrollment by May 15 -- this year's deadline for signing up -- from about 37 million to 31.4 million, a move that fueled calls in Congress to give people more time to sign up.

The latest cost projection for the drug benefit is "substantially lower" than projected last year, the trustees report said. Last year, Medicare's actuaries estimated the benefit would cost a total of $997 billion over 10 years, not including savings to Medicaid. Now that estimate is $788 billion. Another reason for the reduction: The private insurers selling the new, government-subsidized coverage achieved discounts on medications sooner than the actuaries had expected. That offset a 4% increase in what the government thought it would spend on Medicare beneficiaries with costly drug bills.

"The outlook for Medicare [drug coverage] is much better," said Mark McClellan, administrator of the federal agency that runs the program. He credited the competition for customers between private insurers that resulted in lower than expected premiums for drug coverage this year. On enrollment, he and Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt said they are hitting their own goals to have 28 to 30 million Medicare beneficiaries getting drug coverage.

The reduced cost of the drug benefit was a bit of good news accompanying continued warnings about financial trends that are unsustainable in Medicare and Social Security. The reports showed that Medicare's hospital insurance trust fund will be depleted in 2018, two years earlier than forecast last year. Social Security will begin running a deficit in 2017, the same as projected last year, and its accounting trust fund will be exhausted in 2040, one year earlier than projected. (Read the report.4)

Several of the six trustees, including the secretaries of Treasury and Health and Human Services, said fundamental changes are needed to rein in the costs of the programs. Treasury Secretary John Snow warned of a "looming fiscal crisis" if changes aren't made before Baby Boomers retire. "The message of this report is urgency," Mr. Leavitt said.

DOJ_NMG_0027770

But in the near term, little is expected to change. President Bush, in his budget proposal for next year, recommended trimming spending on Medicare provider-payments and raising premiums for higher income beneficiaries. But Congress isn't enthusiastic about tackling the issue with mid-term elections approaching. Mr. Bush also recommended the formation of an entitlement commission to examine Medicare and Social Security, after his attempt to add private accounts to the federal retirement stalled last year.

Still, months after it was suggested, the commission hasn't yet been formed. Mr. Snow said it's "being worked hard," but conversations about who should be on the panel continue between prospective members, the White House and Congress.

The Medicare report held two other important developments. Under a requirement passed with the Medicare drug benefit, legislative action is supposed to occur if Medicare's trustees predict that, within the first seven years of their annual 75-year projections, general revenues fund more than 45% of total Medicare spending for two years in a row. Yesterday's report said that threshold would be reached in 2012. That means the trigger for action would occur in 2007 if projections hold. President Bush would be required to propose legislative changes, and Congress would have to give them fast-track consideration

Also, Medicare beneficiaries will see a big jump in the premiums they pay for physician and other outpatient care, under the portion of the program known as Part B. Medicare officials said yesterday that premiums would increase next year by 11%, to $98.20 a month from $88.50, partly because of a surge in the volume and intensity of Part B services and a decision by Congress to override a reduction in physician payment that was scheduled to occur this year.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, May 2, 2006

Dinner's on me

"Whenever I'm at a restaurant and spot somebody in a military uniform, I pick up their check to show them my appreciation for what they're doing for my country."

-- Former Los Angeles Dodgers Manager Tommy Lasorda, in a conversation about the war in Iraq with this columnist on Sunday.

Fish tales and tarts

"You cannot possibly imagine how thoroughly crushed I was this morning when I read your article regarding the fish caught by chef David Guas," angler Charlie Loveless of Baltimore writes to Inside the Beltway about the popular DC Coast chef.

"Prior to his [50-pound] catch, I believe that I was the current record holder this year with the rockfish I caught May 19 out of Chesapeake Beach. My fish weighed in at 48.5 pounds and was 493/4[inches] long.

"I don't mind so much that my fish didn't hold up for this year's record, but to lose to a pastry chef out of Washington, D.C. ... was just too much for me to handle this morning. I'm not sure I'll be able to recover this year. By the way, he doesn't play golf, too, does he?"

Physical proof

The villagers are referred to by a leading scientist in Washington as the "first refugees of global warming."

Igor Krupnik, an anthropologist with the Smithsonian Institution's National Museum of Natural History, has conducted more than 30 years of field work in Arctic communities on the human and cultural aspects of climate change.

In the latest issue of Smithsonian magazine, he calls attention to "refugees" from the Alaskan village of Shismaref, until the mid-1970s encased and well-protected by 20 to 30 miles of land ice that in the height of winter now only reaches 6 to 7 miles.

"We tend to describe climate change in terms that are abstract -- a one-degree rise in temperatures, an increase in greenhouse gasses -- but when waves wash away a village, that's concrete and very emotional," Mr. Krupnik says.

Tabard, for two

What's the No. 1 hotel in Washington?

According to the "Guide to the Capital's Wild Side" contained in the latest issue of Men's Journal, "There's more than just power lunches inside the Beltway. Little known by most locals, the 40-room Tabard Inn in Dupont Circle is hands down the best hotel in D.C."

DOJ_NMG_0027771

This just in

The Paradigm Clock, set into motion by the Paradigm Research Group (PRG) to track the proximity to a formal announcement by the U.S. government confirming an extraterrestrial presence engaging the human race, has been reset to 11:59:45 -- 15 seconds to midnight.

Such an announcement is formally referred to as "disclosure" and supposedly would mark the end of a 59-year truth embargo imposed by federal authorities. Midnight on the Paradigm Clock is disclosure.

According to PRG Executive Director Stephen Bassett, "Due to extraordinary circumstances primarily pertaining but not limited to the United States, a window of opportunity has opened for a disclosure event to take place. This window should last through the November election and may remain open or possibly close depending upon the outcome of the election."

Mr. Bassett didn't mention what the "extraordinary circumstances" were; however, if you're as suspicious of your neighbor as this columnist, you might keep your distance until such time as Uncle Sam comes clean.

The previous setting for the Paradigm Clock was 11:58:45, on March 8, 2004.

King-size legend

"Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. was a Republican" -- or so state T-shirts (white and "urban black" in all sizes), buttons and mousepads being peddled by the National Black Republican Association, headquartered along Pennsylvania Avenue.

Hillary care

Yet another House Republican critical of his own party leaders is Rep. Jeff Flake of Arizona, upset that the House Republican leadership continues to encourage GOP members "to boast" about the new Medicare prescription-drug entitlement.

Because of the new entitlement, "30 million people are more dependent on the federal government than they were a year ago, and future generations will have to foot the bill," he says. "That is something that no party professing to believe in limited government should be proud of."

Wind Shifts On Medicare Drug Benefit (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, May 2, 2006

Despite a recent stream of apparently good news about the Medicare prescription-drug benefit, congressional Democrats are counting on their criticisms to translate into political gains in the midterm elections.

“I don’t know of any Democrat who thinks this is working the way it should,” Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich) said recently. “You betcha this is going to be an issue” in November.

Democrats have described the drug benefit as a disaster and said senior citizens would be too confused to choose the right plan.

But that strategy could prove risky. The Medicare figures show that nearly all beneficiaries now have some form of drug coverage, and recent polls suggest that seniors who have joined a drug plan are satisfied with their coverage.

Republicans have taken note, and attitudes toward Medicare Part D seem to be shifting. Many congressional Republicans shied away from the program and criticized the Bush administration’s handling of its implementation this year. But Republicans are changing their tune. House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) has become an enthusiastic cheerleader, as his office has taken to launching almost daily statements praising it.

After ignoring Democratic requests all year, the House Ways and Means Committee will have its first hearing on the program when the Health Subcommittee meets tomorrow. Subcommittee Chairman Nancy Johnson (R-Conn.) has been a favorite target of Democratic attacks over the drug benefit and has endured months of hammering from her Democratic opponent, state Sen. Chris Murphy.

The administration has taken steps in recent weeks to disarm some Democratic criticisms. Insurance companies will not be permitted to stop paying for drugs they covered at the time a beneficiary bought a plan, even if they drop the drug for future customers. Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calf.) responded to the policy by saying, “Better late than never.”

The administration also said people eligible for a special low-income subsidy would have more time to qualify, though they will still have to sign up for a drug plan by the May 15 deadline.

DOJ_NMG_0027772

Since the program launched Jan. 1, Democratic lawmakers and candidates have consistently decried it as confusing and have accused the GOP of selling out to the pharmaceutical and health-insurance industries.

Congressional Democrats are showing more unity than in 2003, when the bill passed with crucial Democratic votes.

Last week, four Democratic senators who voted for the bill introduced legislation to change it. Leading them was Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), who was one of only two Democratic senators who helped create the program, along with then-Sen. John Breaux (D-La.).

Democrats have focused this year on extending the time beneficiaries have to choose a drug plan. Left-leaning groups such as the Campaign for America's Future and Americans United have joined with Democratic lawmakers to push for a deadline extension. Medicare beneficiaries who wait until after the deadline face a permanent surcharge on their premiums that increases every month.

In spite of the apparent shift of political momentum amid improving public opinion, Democrats see the drug program as a ticking time bomb of discontent among senior citizens.

"They haven't hit the 'doughnut hole' yet. … Let's do the poll then," Stark said.

Beneficiaries will have to pay 100 percent of their drug expenses during a coverage gap between $2,250 and $5,100 that is known as the "doughnut hole." Before spending hits the lower limit, enrollees pay only 25 percent of costs after meeting a $250 deductible. Above $5,100, the plan pays 95 percent.

Democrats say that once seniors hit the "doughnut hole" their feelings will sour. Analysts expect that most people at risk to hit the coverage gap will do so shortly before the elections. Some with high drug costs already have.

"It's not about telling people whether it's working or not. They will know," Stabenow said.

At present, most beneficiaries seem pleased, according to opinion polls. A Washington Post-ABC News survey last month showed 65 percent of people are satisfied with their drug plans. An AARP poll concluded that 78 percent are satisfied. Industry-sponsored surveys made similar findings.

Democrats downplay the surveys and the rising enrollment. "You have [almost] a trillion dollars out there. Some people are going to benefit," said Rep. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio), who is challenging Sen. Mike DeWine (R) in November.

Critics say that, though they have not done surveys that contradict the other polls, they see anger brewing. "We're only hearing anecdotally" that people are unhappy, said Diane Archer, special counsel to the Medicare Rights Center, but her organization has received a lot of complaints.

The Post-ABC poll showed support for the Democrats' short-term goal: 71 percent of seniors believe the deadline should be extended.

At least 19 House Republicans sponsored or co-sponsored bills to extend the deadline. In the Senate, DeWine and Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) joined with Democrats to press for a vote on the issue.

The Bush administration flatly rejects lifting the deadline. Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said more time would not make a difference.

"If they were not prepared to sign up before, there's no indication" beneficiaries would enroll after May 15, he said.

Leavitt predicted the administration would get almost everybody in a plan. "If we keep at the same pace … we have a shot at being able to [sign up] 90 percent" of the 42.5 million people who receive Medicare benefits, which would amount to 38.3 million people.

According to the administration, 35.8 million Medicare beneficiaries had drug coverage as of April 18, leaving the administration 2.8 million people short of Leavitt's projection with less than two weeks to go. About 6 million have not signed up.

Thirty million people are getting coverage as part of the new benefit, of which 8.1 million voluntarily enrolled in one of the new drug plans. An additional 5.8 million people have so-called "creditable coverage" from other sources. Ten million of the newly enrolled did not have drug coverage last year.

Leavitt said that people who are not covered are split about evenly between the low-income category and those who have no or very little drug expenses and believe they do not need coverage. He said the administration would target its 11th-hour outreach to those groups.

DOJ_NMG_0027773

Medicare In Poor Financial Health, Trustees Say (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar And Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — The financial condition of Medicare is growing progressively worse and its problems will eventually eclipse those of Social Security, the trustees of the government's two biggest social programs reported Monday.

But the warning, for all its urgency, appeared unlikely to spur major action on such a sensitive issue in an election year. Far from cutting back, Congress and the president have expanded Medicare with the creation of the prescription drug benefit.

"There is no crisis," Rep. Pete Stark (D-Fremont), the senior Democrat on the House health subcommittee, said in a sharp response to the report. "Much as President Bush manipulated intelligence to justify an unnecessary war in Iraq, his administration is using these projections to rationalize dismantling Medicare."

Social Security and Medicare help virtually every American family, and the trustees' report provides an annual accounting of the programs' long-term financial health. By law, four of the six trustees are senior officials of the administration in office and two are independent experts chosen to represent the public.

Compared to Medicare, Social Security faces a rosy future.

This year's report projects that the massive Social Security trust fund will be able to pay full retirement and disability benefits for another 34 years. That will change in 2040. Unless benefits are reduced, taxes are increased or additional funds are allocated from some other source, Social Security will run out of reserves and will only be able to cover 74% of promised benefits. The 2040 date is one year closer than the trustees had projected in 2005.

If Congress chose to plug the Social Security gap solely by raising more revenue, it would have to jack up Social Security's share of the payroll tax — now 12.4%, shared equally by employers and workers — by an immediate 2.02 percentage points. If it chose to close the gap by cutting benefits, it would have to slash them by 13.3% below current levels.

Medicare faces a more serious problem. Its "financial difficulties come sooner — and are much more severe — than those confronting Social Security," the report said.

The huge Medicare trust fund that pays for inpatient care will only be able to cover 80% of estimated billings in 2018, and its condition will deteriorate dramatically after that. The 2018 date is two years closer than the trustees had projected in 2005.

Medicare has been in financial straits before. As recently as 1997, the Medicare fund that covers hospital bills had only four years of solvency left. But this time the financial challenge is made much greater by the approaching retirement of 78 million baby boomers.

"The message of this report is urgency," said Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt. "I do not want to stand here another year with just another bad report and another year of inaction. It's time to act."

Leavitt and Treasury Secretary John W. Snow urged Congress to adopt the president's budget proposals for $36 billion in Medicare cuts over the next five years, along with automatic spending reductions of 0.4% a year if the program's costs exceed specified levels.

Bush has also called for the creation of a bipartisan commission on entitlement programs to study the pension and healthcare burdens of an aging society and make recommendations.

Although Congress may go along with the idea of a commission, there is little enthusiasm among lawmakers for more cuts.

"At some point, Congress is going to have to get down to the difficult business of restraining the cost growth of these programs," said Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), chairman of the Finance Committee, which oversees Social Security and Medicare. But he stopped short of promising action soon.

Medicare's funding is extraordinarily complex. Financing is cobbled together from payroll taxes; premiums and cost-sharing paid by beneficiaries; and the government's general fund. The various funding streams serve different purposes.

In 2003, Congress approved a requirement that could start the discussion on Medicare's future. It provided that the president must propose changes — and Congress must consider them — if two consecutive trustees' reports project that Medicare would draw 45% or more of its financing from the general fund in the near term. The first such warning — for 2012 — was issued in this year's report.

DOJ_NMG_0027774

"That could give the president a good rationale for having a major Medicare reform proposal in next year's budget," said health economist Marilyn Moon, a former trustee. But she went on to call the requirement an indicator of "a very phony crisis."

Part of the dilemma for Bush and the Republican-led Congress is that they have significantly increased Medicare benefits in recent years, tapping into general revenue to do so.

For example, spending per beneficiary is expected to grow by nearly 33% this year, largely as a result of the new prescription benefit.

Social Security, Medicare Given Less Time (USAT)

By From Staff And Wire Reports

USA Today, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — Medicare's trust fund will be exhausted in 12 years, and Social Security's trust fund will be depleted in 34 years, trustees for the programs said Monday in their annual report on the government's two largest benefit programs.

The new report moved up slightly the dates when the trust funds will be exhausted — to 2018 for Medicare from 2020 in last year's report, and to 2040 for Social Security from 2041. If nothing changes by then, the programs could still pay partial benefits with each year's payroll tax revenue.

The trustees, who include the head of the Social Security Administration and three members of President Bush's Cabinet, gave a sober assessment of the health of the two programs in advance of the looming retirements of 78 million baby boomers.

"We do not believe the currently projected long-run growth rates of Social Security or Medicare are sustainable under current financing arrangements," the trustees said in this year's report.

The trustees' report sends an annual signal that two of the nation's most politically sensitive benefit programs are in serious financial trouble — but the reports have rarely provoked major action.

Bush's efforts last year to overhaul Social Security went nowhere in Congress. Even members of his own party refused to support the benefit cuts that would have accompanied new individual accounts for younger workers.

While the programs' reserves are expected to last another one to three decades, both programs will face financing issues much sooner, when the benefits exceed the payroll taxes that fund them.

For Medicare, that occurred temporarily in 2004 before a revenue adjustment erased the deficit for 2005. But the trustees projected that Medicare benefits will exceed revenues this year and thereafter. In 2017, Social Security will begin paying out more in benefits than it takes in, the trustees projected.

The trust funds contain no actual cash, just government IOUs. To pay beneficiaries once the cost of benefits exceeds tax collections, the government must raise the deficit, raise taxes or cut other spending.

Social Security, Medicare Depletion Dates Get Earlier (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, May 2, 2006

Social Security's trust fund will run out of money in 2040, one year earlier than expected, and Medicare's trust fund will be depleted in 2018, two years earlier than expected, trustees for the programs said in their annual report yesterday.

Administration officials said the bleak outlook is all the more reason for Congress to significantly reform both programs.

"We do not believe the currently-projected long-run growth rates of Social Security or Medicare are sustainable under current financing arrangements," wrote the six trustees, who include the Social Security Administration commissioner and three Cabinet members. "The sooner that solutions are adopted, the more varied and gradual they can be."

President Bush's efforts to change Social Security stalled in Congress last year, with even some Republicans hesitant to support his plan to create personal accounts. And Medicare spending is unlikely to be cut by Congress this election year, as Mr. Bush has suggested.

The long-term outlook for both programs worsened slightly in the past year. Last year's report projected that the Social Security Trust Fund would last until 2041 and Medicare's hospital insurance trust fund would run out in 2020.

As in past years, trustees said Medicare's situation is more dire. Costs exceeded income for the hospital insurance program in 2004, and it's expected to go into the black briefly before it once again pays out more than it receives. The trust fund depletes in 2018, when the government will be able to cover only 80 percent of the costs. Medicare's outpatient coverage and drug-benefit programs are expected to cost more and require increasingly more federal revenue to pay for them.

DOJ_NMG_0027775

Social Security will pay out more than it takes in 2017, the same as last year's projection.

"The Social Security problem remains with us," warned Treasury Secretary John W. Snow, a trustee. Medicare, he said, faces "even greater and far-reaching challenges."

Moreover, under the Medicare drug-benefit law, the numbers triggered an initial warning to Congress. If next year's numbers do the same, an official warning will be issued and the president will have to submit Medicare reform legislation to Congress.

Democrats and liberal groups said the Bush administration's policies have clearly hurt Medicare, because the trustees estimated in 2001 that Medicare's trust fund would be depleted by 2029, more than a decade after the new estimate.

But trustees said the new Medicare drug program, known as Part D, is working well. "Premiums for Part D are sharply lower than projected," said Mr. Snow, calling the new program "a success."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said the new 2018 estimate "is a direct result of the mismanagement of the economy, excessive subsidies to HMOs and the failure to constrain medical costs."

The trustees said the 2018 date was created by higher-than-expected costs in 2005 and higher utilization rates estimated for the hospital insurance.

But conservatives complained that the administration's new Medicare prescription-drug benefit is a big part of the fiscal problem.

Rep. Jeff Flake, an Arizona Republican who voted against the drug program, called for it to be scaled back. And John C. Goodman, president of the National Center for Policy Analysis and an administration health care adviser, noted the "unfunded liability" for Social Security -- or the promised future benefits that government currently cannot pay -- is projected to be $13.4 trillion, up from the $11 trillion projected in last year's report. But the new drug program's unfunded liability is projected to be $16.2 trillion.

"We've made our fiscal situation much worse," Mr. Goodman said, noting however that Democrats would have made the drug benefit even costlier.

Finances Of Social Security And Medicare Deteriorate (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 1 — The financial condition of Medicare and Social Security deteriorated in the last year, the Bush administration reported Monday, and it warned again that the programs were unsustainable in their current form.

Medicare's hospital insurance trust fund, a widely watched gauge of the program's solvency, will run out of money in 2018, two years earlier than projected in last year's report, the trustees said.

And the Social Security trust fund will be exhausted in 2040, one year earlier than projected last year, the trustees said. At that point, in 2040, Social Security tax collections would be adequate to pay only 74 percent of scheduled benefits.

Lawmakers said they would never allow the trust funds to run dry. But the insolvency dates are a vivid way of showing that the programs are unsustainable. To keep them solvent, Congress would need to trim benefits, raise taxes or take some combination of such steps.

"The systems are going broke," President Bush said Monday in a speech to the American Hospital Association.

Almost every element of the programs reflects a political judgment, but Mr. Bush said, "It's time to set aside politics and restructure Social Security and Medicare for generations to come."

Republicans and Democrats seized on the reports to renew the political battle over Social Security and Medicare, with an eye to Congressional elections this fall.

The Senate Democratic leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, said the reports showed that "despite White House scare tactics, Social Security remains sound for decades to come." Senator Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, said the administration had worsened Medicare's problems by promoting managed-care plans, which he said often "cost more than traditional Medicare."

DOJ_NMG_0027776

The administration urged Congress to approve the president's proposals to slow the growth of Medicare by curbing payments to hospitals. Under current law, the trustees said, doctors already face a cut of 4.7 percent or more in Medicare fees in each of the next nine years.

The trustees' reports are authoritative documents prepared by career civil servants, mainly actuaries, and are full of data used as a basis for policy making and political debate.

In the report on Medicare, the Bush administration reduced its estimates of the number of people who would sign up for the new prescription drug benefit.

The trustees now predict that 31.4 million people will have signed up for the drug benefit by the end of the initial enrollment period in two weeks, and that monthly enrollment for 2006 will average 29.2 million, down from an estimate of 39 million published in last year's report.

Likewise, the administration now predicts enrollment of 34 million for 2007, down from an estimate of 39.8 million in last year's report.

Treasury Secretary John W. Snow said Medicare's financial problems were more severe than those of Social Security because of "steady large increases in underlying health care costs."

The new report estimates that the basic Medicare premium — what a beneficiary pays for coverage of doctors' services and other outpatient care — will be higher than predicted last year. The premium has increased more than 50 percent in the last three years, to $88.50 a month, from $58.70 in 2003, and the Bush administration predicts that it will rise to $98.20 next year.

By contrast, in last year's report, the administration predicted that the basic 2007 premium would be $87.70.

But the average premiums for drug coverage are lower than expected: $32.20 this year and $35.86 in 2007. The comparable figures in last year's report were $37.37 and $41.22.

The administration lowered its estimate of the cost of the drug benefit for the period from 2006 to 2014. The administration now puts the cost at $872 billion, down from $1.1 trillion last year. (The figures do not reflect premiums paid by beneficiaries or compulsory payments by states to help defray the costs.)

In a joint statement, the public trustees of the two programs, John L. Palmer and Thomas R. Saving, said the projected costs of the drug benefit were "significantly lower than those in the 2005 report due to recent slower growth in overall prescription drug spending and lower enrollment in stand-alone prescription drug plans than was expected a year ago."

Still, the administration said, the cost of the drug benefit will grow an average of 11.5 percent a year in the next decade, more than twice as fast as the economy.

Social Security, Medicare Trust Funds Sink (AP-Y2)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP2, May 1, 2006

The trustees for the government's two biggest benefit programs said Monday that the trust fund for Social Security will be depleted in 2040, a year earlier than expected, while Medicare will exhaust its trust fund just 12 years from now.

The annual report showed deterioration in the financial condition of both programs although the problems in Medicare were depicted as far more serious because of the skyrocketing costs for health care.

A year ago, the depletion of the Social Security trust fund had been projected to occur in 2041, one year later than the current estimate, and the Medicare hospital insurance fund had been forecast to last until 2020, two years longer than the current estimate.

The trustees, who include the head of the Social Security Administration and three members of President Bush's Cabinet, painted a sober assessment of the health of the two programs in advance of the looming retirements of 78 million baby boomers.

They stated that the projected long-term growth rates for both Social Security and Medicare are not "sustainable under current financing arrangements."

The trust funds contain the equivalent of government IOUs. To raise the actual cash to meet obligations, the government must borrow more money from the public by issuing marketable Treasury securities, raise taxes or cut spending in other programs.

DOJ_NMG_0027777

Bush tried last year to overhaul Social Security with the introduction of private investment accounts for younger workers but the idea went nowhere in Congress. Democrats attacked the Bush program as a hidden effort to cut future benefits.

In this year's State of the Union address, Bush asked Congress to create a bipartisan commission to study entitlement reform. But even this modest proposal has not generated much interest, in part because lawmakers do not want to address entitlement reforms in a congressional election year.

Treasury Secretary John Snow, the chairman of the trustees group, said the new report depicted "a looming fiscal crisis as the baby boom generation moves into retirement" and he urged Congress to move forward.

"The serious concerns raised by the trustees' reports demand the attention of America's policy-makers and the public," Snow said.

But Democrats charged that the administration was using the trustees reports to try to create an air of crisis to make radical changes to the two benefit programs.

"There is no crisis," said Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif. "There remains plenty of time to mend rather than end Medicare."

While the depletion of the reserves built up over past years is projected to occur in just 12 years for Medicare and 34 years for Social Security, both programs will face financing issues much sooner at the point that the amount paid out each year exceeds the amount the government collects to fund them.

For Medicare, that occurred for the year of 2004. However, the program is projected to be in the black again this year before crossing over to paying out more than it takes in permanently in 2006 and the years following that.

For Social Security, the point at which the program will pay out more in benefits than it takes in will occur in 2017, the trustees projected, the same as in last year's report.

The one-year faster depletion of trust funds in the case of Social Security occurred because the government estimated a slightly lower average of 2.9 percent rather than 3 percent for the inflation-adjusted return for the trust fund's government bonds.

For Medicare, the faster exhaustion of the trust fund occurred because of rising prices for hospital care and greater utilization by sick people of the program.

The trustees estimated that in 2040 when the Social Security trust fund is depleted, it will be able to pay 74 percent of benefits from the taxes imposed on current workers.

The trustees estimated that the monthly Part B premium that Medicare beneficiaries must pay to cover insurance for doctor visits will have to rise by around 11 percent next year to $98.20 after an increase this year of 12 percent.

Sens. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and Debbie Stabenow, D-Mich., said in a statement that the projected increase for next year, if it comes about, would mark the fourth double-digit advance in Medicare premiums.

They said they would introduce legislation to cap future increases to the amount the Consumer Price Index rises in a given year. Last year, consumer prices rose 3.4 percent.

The trustees report reduced the estimate for the cost of the new drug prescription benefit in Medicare, which went into effect this year, by around 20 percent, attributing part of this reduction to the fact that people are signing up for less costly drug plans.

Democratic critics said the funding shortfalls for Social Security and Medicare should be viewed in the context of Bush's drive to make the tax cuts of his first term permanent.

Sen. Jack Reed (news, bio, voting record), D-R.I., said that if Congress approved Bush's request to make his tax cuts permanent and enacted a permanent fix for the alternative minimum tax, which was designed to tax the wealthy but is falling on more middle-class tax payers, that would represent a cumulative revenue shortfall equal to 2 percent of the total economy over a 75-year period.

That is three times the shortfall estimated by the trustees for Social Security over the same period, Reed said.

___

Social Security: http://www.socialsecurity.gov

Medicare: http://www.cms.hhs.gov

Medicare Will Go Broke By 2018, Trustees Report (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0027778

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

The financial troubles daunting the Medicare system have deepened during the past year, according to a government forecast that says the federal fund that pays for hospital care for older Americans will become unable to cover all its bills a dozen years from now.

The annual report, issued yesterday by the trustees who monitor the fiscal health of the Medicare and Social Security programs, said the trust fund for the health insurance system for the elderly will run out of money in 2018 -- two years sooner than predicted a year ago and 12 years sooner than had been anticipated when President Bush first took office.

The problem, the report says, has accelerated largely because hospital costs last year were greater than expected.

The forecast also said that Social Security's financial condition has weakened, although its problems are not as great or urgent. It said the retirement system will have enough cash to pay the benefits it owes retirees, disabled workers and workers' survivors until 2040 -- one year less than expected in the 2005 forecast.

In releasing the report, the trustees -- including three of Bush's Cabinet secretaries -- slightly altered the message accompanying the forecast the past few years, when the administration sought to use the predictions as leverage to persuade a reluctant Congress to embrace the president's goal of letting Americans divert some of their payroll taxes into personal retirement accounts. That emphasis prompted Democrats and other critics to chastise the administration for dwelling on Social Security while Medicare's problems were more acute.

Yesterday, the president's aides -- and Bush himself -- drew attention equally to the frailty of the two largest benefits programs that form the twin pillars of the government's assistance to the elderly. The solution, they said, is for Congress to approve changes Bush already has proposed.

Treasury Secretary John W. Snow, one of the trustees, said the programs "form the basis of a looming fiscal crisis for our nation as the baby-boom generation moves into retirement."

"The systems are going broke," Bush said in a health-care speech earlier in the day. "And now is the time to do something about it."

Administration officials portrayed the report as containing some bright news, because spending on the new Medicare prescription drug benefits -- paid for from general revenue, not the same trust fund as covers hospital bills -- appears less than expected. Several of Bush's aides said costs will be lower because drug companies are charging less than predicted for medicine. However, two independent trustees had a different explanation: Fewer Medicare patients are signing up for the drug benefits than anticipated last year.

Administration officials did not emphasize yesterday the idea of private retirement accounts, a plan that is relatively inert on Capitol Hill. Instead, they focused on proposals Bush made early this year -- to create a federal commission on the plight of entitlement programs and to slow Medicare spending by $36 billion during the next five years. Neither has drawn much enthusiasm among lawmakers.

And yesterday's report -- released a month after its due date -- did not produce any surge of momentum. The chairman and the top Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee are griping that the White House has diminished the role of independent experts in preparing the trustees' report, by failing to appoint replacements for the public trustees, economists Thomas R. Saving and John L. Palmer, when their terms expired a year ago.

Instead, the White House renominated them last November and, after lawmakers complained that they preferred to rotate outside trustees, installed them without Senate confirmation as "recess appointments" while Congress took Easter vacation. Saving and Palmer said yesterday they had served as unpaid consultants in preparing the report until they were reappointed.

White House spokesman Ken Lisiaus said that Saving and Palmer were reappointed because they "are true experts in economics" and that the position of public trustee, created in 1984, is too recent "to establish any sort of long-held precedent" that they must serve only one term.

Medicare's Fiscal Future Getting Worse, Report Says (KRT)

By Tony Pugh

DOJ_NMG_0027779

Knight Ridder, May 1, 2006

WASHINGTON - Medicare's long-term financial woes deepened over the last year as the program's main funding source for hospital care is projected to go broke in 2018 - two years sooner than predicted last year, according to an annual report by the program's trustees.

The Medicare Hospital Insurance trust fund, which pays primarily for inpatient care and is funded through a 2.9 percent payroll tax, is already operating at a deficit and is projected to hit a new low in 2012. By then, total Medicare spending will exceed program funding by 45 percent, the report found.

If that projected funding gap is not closed by next year's report, the projected shortfall would be considered a "funding warning," triggering a requirement that the president must offer a legislative remedy to Congress that must be considered on an expedited basis.

Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt used the report to urge Congress to adopt President Bush's plan to cut Medicare spending. Bush's plan would reduce Medicare's spending growth by $36 billion between 2007 and 2011, mainly by trimming annual inflation updates in payments to doctors and hospitals. Medicare would grow at 7.7 percent a year under the Bush plan compared with the current growth rate of 8.1 percent.

"The message of this report is urgency," said Leavitt. "I do not want to stand here another year with just another bad report and another year of inaction. It's time to act."

The report also found funding problems with Social Security, the nation's largest entitlement program. Without changes, tax revenues for Social Security are expected to fall below program costs in 2017, the same estimate as last year's report. The program will no longer be able to pay benefits at promised levels in 2040, one year earlier than predicted last year.

While the two popular but costly programs face a daunting economic future, the trustees and most experts agree that Medicare's problems are much more severe, imminent and harder to fix.

Today there are about four taxpaying workers for each of the estimated 43 million elderly and disabled Medicare beneficiaries. By 2075, that ratio will be about two-to-one. That's an insufficient tax base to take care of the nation's retirees, whose numbers will grow dramatically as nearly 80 million baby boomers born before 1964 begin to retire in the coming decades.

While Congress can raise taxes or cut benefits to meet Medicare's growing obligations, neither provides a long-term fix because program spending is largely at the mercy of rising health care costs. And Americans have resisted previous efforts, notably during the Clinton administration, to curb costs by limiting access.

With no change to the system, Medicare would eat up 25 percent of all federal income tax revenues by 2021 - more than triple its funding requirements in 2005.

"At present there are no clear indications of when, or even how, the past trend (of rising health costs) might abate. If it does not soon, then the serious fiscal problem discussed above will become dire," wrote trustees John L. Palmer and Thomas R. Saving.

Despite the bad news, the trustees found that Medicare's projected spending for the new drug benefit will drop significantly due to lower than expected enrollments in the drug plans and a slowdown in overall prescription drug spending.

In a speech to the American Hospital Association on Monday, President Bush said the government has an obligation to provide care for the nation's poor and elderly, "And I intend to keep that obligation," he said.

The president also has called for a bipartisan commission to study possible fixes for all federal entitlement programs, including Medicare and Social Security.

On Capitol Hill, Democrats and Republicans took away distinctly different messages from the trustees' report. Republicans warned that the findings portrayed a retirement system in crisis; Democrats noted that the threat of insolvency was still years away.

"The dire situation that the Medicare trustees warn will be reached in 2012 is an ill-disguised scare tactic to force cuts in a program that millions of Americans depend on," said Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., one of Congress' health care experts.

Senator Jim DeMint, R-S.C., said Democrats have ignored signs of trouble and have failed to offer remedies.

"This report is another wakeup call that Medicare and Social Security are in critical condition," said DeMint. "Democrats who stick their heads in the sand and applaud their own obstruction are putting the retirement security of millions of Americans in jeopardy."

To read the entire report go to: http://www.ssa.gov/OACT/TR/TR06/

Serving Up Social Security And Medicare, Without The Fixings (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

"The job of a president," George W. Bush used to say almost daily during the 2004 campaign, "is to confront problems, not to pass them on to future presidents and future generations."

Astute observers may have noticed he's been saying that a bit less frequently these days. Yesterday showed why.

The president was over at the Washington Hilton, speaking to the American Hospital Association about his Medicare Modernization Act of 2003. "When I came into office I found a Medicare program that was outdated," he announced. Seeing this "not very cost-effective" program, he continued, "I decided to do something about it. And I worked with the Congress, and we passed critical legislation that modernizes Medicare."

An hour after Bush finished his speech, Treasury Secretary John W. Snow kicked off a news conference announcing the latest on Medicare's financial standing. The "modernized," cost-effective program is forecast to go belly-up in 2018 -- two years earlier than previously forecast.

Somebody stop us before we reform again.

Snow also announced that Social Security -- reform of which the Bush administration abandoned last year -- will become insolvent in 2040, a year earlier than previously projected.

The Treasury secretary warned of "a looming financial crisis for our nation."

Medicare and Social Security trustee Thomas Saving chimed in, "Either government is going to have to be a lot smaller, or these programs are going to have to be dramatically changed."

Bush himself, while talking about the success of his addition of prescription-drug coverage to Medicare, acknowledged that both programs are, as he put it, "going broke." He added, "It's time to set aside politics and restructure Social Security and Medicare for generations to come."

Then again, what's the hurry?

In his State of the Union address, the president called for a bipartisan commission to study Medicare and Social Security. Lawmakers immediately recognized that as a punt. Now it seems the punt is being followed by a delay-of-game penalty. More than three months after Bush proposed the commission, there is no commission and no commissioners; he has mentioned the idea only twice since January.

"Well," Snow ad-libbed yesterday when asked about the commission, "it's being worked hard." Asked to elaborate, he said, "there's outreach by the White House."

Congress Daily's Keith Koffler wasn't satisfied. "It's been three months -- why haven't you been able to get a commission together?" he pressed.

"I think it's important to get this done right," Snow ventured.

Treasury spokesman Sean Kevelighan didn't like the direction this was taking. "One more question," he called out.

Accepting the Republican presidential nomination in 2000, Bush chided Bill Clinton: "So much promise, to no great purpose." By contrast, Bush vowed to put Medicare on "firm financial ground" and said of Social Security, "I intend to fix it." Six years later, the president is floating some of the bite-size policies he once criticized Clinton for doing.

The jumbo TV screen in the Hilton ballroom before Bush entered proclaimed this "Cover the Uninsured Week" and pointed out that "Today, 45 million Americans have no health insurance."

Bush opened with a bold vow: "a comprehensive health care strategy that will make health care more affordable and available for all our citizens." Then he outlined a five-point program: medical malpractice reform, pooled insurance for small businesses, tax-free health savings accounts, better medical information technology and more "transparency" in medical pricing.

DOJ_NMG_0027781

The hospital administrators liked all the ideas, particularly the malpractice bit, which prompted an enthusiastic ovation. But they didn't see Bush's proposals (a plan to have doctors display their fees just as restaurants post menus) as all that comprehensive. "It will help, but it won't solve the problem," said Thomas Nickels, the hospitals' top lobbyist, after the speech. "Not to be critical, but we need to look at this as one element of a broad package."

Broad package? At the moment, the administration and Congress can't even agree on who should be a trustee of Social Security and Medicare. The chairman and the ranking Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee wrote to Bush last week calling for the resignation of the two public trustees he recently reappointed. At yesterday's news conference at the Treasury Department, one of the trustees devoted his remarks entirely to rebutting the two senators.

Snow and his administration colleagues, for their part, sought to celebrate the prescription drug plan. "A success," pronounced Snow, in front of a money-green backdrop. "Enrollment has so far exceeded the expectations the administration put forward earlier this year."

That line fell apart when the first questioner pointed out that the trustees had, in fact, found lower enrollment in the drug plan "than was expected a year ago." Enrollment had exceeded expectations because the administration had lowered the expectations.

But not to worry: Even with yesterday's bad news, we still have a dozen years before Medicare collapses.

Bush Says Health Care Costs Unacceptable (AP-Y2)

AP2, May 1, 2006

President Bush said Monday health care costs are rising at an unacceptably fast pace and he called on Congress to enact White House proposals to tame medical expenses.

Private health insurance premiums have risen 73 percent in the last five years, forcing some businesses to drop health coverage for their employees and prompting others to raise co-payments and premiums, the president said in a speech to the American Hospital Association.

"This is unacceptable for this country to have health care costs rising as fast as they are," Bush said. "If we want to be the leader of the world, we must do something about it. And my administration is determined to do something about it."

The primary element in Bush's plan calls for expanding health savings accounts — an idea that congressional Republicans rebuffed earlier this year. These accounts let people who have high-deductible health insurance policies save money, tax-free, for their future health care expenses.

"People here in Washington need to do commonsense things to address the rising costs of health care," the president said.

Mitt's Non-Miracle (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

Well, that didn't take long. Only two weeks ago Massachusetts passed an experiment in compulsory, subsidized health insurance, and already it's turning into an employer mandate and a vehicle for increasing the role of government.

Last week the Democrat-controlled Massachusetts legislature began moving in just that direction, overriding all of the line-item vetoes that Republican Governor Mitt Romney had cast in an effort to give the state's new insurance law a market-oriented veneer. Various Medicaid expansions were restored, as, more importantly, was a $295-per-employee annual penalty on employers who don't provide health insurance.

That $295 may not sound like much, but it's sure to grow over time. And in any case the real employer penalty in the bill is a draconian provision that puts employers on the hook for the major medical bills of employees they don't insure. This might as well be considered an employer mandate, since it means just one case of cancer for an uncovered employee would be enough to wipe out a small business.

Meanwhile, Governor Romney recently offered what sounded like a response to some of our editorial criticisms at an appearance before the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in Washington. "The key factor that some of my libertarian friends forget is that today everybody who doesn't have health insurance is getting free coverage from the government," he said. He also repeated his claim that treating such free riders adds significantly to the cost of private insurance for those who do have it, thus justifying his compulsory scheme.

DOJ_NMG_0027782

Nice try, Governor. But there's actual data out there on the cost of "free care" for the uninsured, and the numbers suggest it should rank fairly low among policy makers' concerns. A 2003 study by Jack Hadley and John Holahan in the policy journal Health Affairs estimated that in 2001 the nationwide cost of such uncompensated treatment was $34.5 billion, or 2.8% of all health spending.

That's not nothing, but neither has it been the major cost driver for private insurance that the Governor claims it is. The real cost drivers are two regulations -- guaranteed issue and community rating -- that unreasonably restrict the freedom of insurers to offer and price coverage, and which his new law explicitly preserves in his state. If Governor Romney thinks care for the uninsured is expensive now, wait until Massachusetts taxpayers see how much his government-heavy "solution" costs.

Senate GOP Backs Off From Oil Tax Increase (AP)

By H. Josef Hebert

The Associated Press, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, under pressure from business leaders, retreated Monday from a plan that would have used a tax increase on oil companies and other businesses to fund a $100 gasoline rebate for millions of motorists.

Frist, the Tennessee Republican, had proposed an accounting change that would have required oil companies to pay more taxes on their inventory of crude as a way to pay the one-time rebate which GOP leaders rolled out last week as they scrambled to find ways to ease public anger over soaring gasoline prices.

In a statement, Frist said he will still push the rebate, but abandoned the accounting change and said the Senate Finance Committee planned a hearing on the issue in the near future.

Frist gave no indication how the rebate, estimated to cost about $10 billion, will be paid for, although he said he still planned to "find a way to bring our proposals to the Senate floor for a vote."

The rebate proposal, meanwhile, seemed to have little appeal among motorists who would benefit.

Aids to several Republican senators, including some who support the proposal, said Monday they have received generally negative feedback from the public in telephone calls and e-mails.

"There are some who say this is a Band-Aid and they want a real solution. .... There are people who say, `Do you think I can be satisfied so easily,'" said Don Steward, an aide to Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas. He said almost all of the comments received about the rebate - which Cornyn has characterized as "a theatrical response" - have been negative.

Another Senate staffer, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the senator was among those who have been pushing the GOP energy package, said voters know that with gas costing more than $3 a gallon the rebate likely will pay for only a couple of tanks of gas.

"It's probably one fill-up for a Sequoia," added the aide, referring to the Toyota SUV that gets 15 miles to the gallon in city driving.

But Frist said the rebate "will help people who are emptying their wallets at the pump. ... We've got to help those who are feeling pain ... as quickly as possible." Single taxpayers earning up to $145,950 and married couples earning up to $218,950 would get the rebate in August under the Frist proposal.

The Energy Department reported Monday that the average cost of regular grade gasoline nationwide had increased to $2.92 a gallon with many parts of the country showing prices at more than $3 a gallon.

The tax accounting change involving inventories was the most substantial tax hit Congress has been seriously considering in response to the huge oil industry profits at the time of soaring costs at the pump. The change, applying only to five of the largest oil companies, had been approved by the Senate, but faced strong opposition in the House.

Oil companies waged an intense lobbying effort to block the change.

Rex Tillerson, chairman of Exxon Mobil Corp., at an energy conference Monday, called it "nothing more than a backdoor windfall profits tax" and a "very dangerous and very poorly thought out step to take." The change was estimated to increase taxes for the five major oil companies by $4.3 billion over five years.

DOJ_NMG_0027783

Frist would have expanded the tax to other industries, which prompted a chorus of protests, prompting his retreat from the proposal. The National Association of Manufacturers and Wal-Mart Stores Inc., among others, made known their strong opposition to the inventory taxing change.

Senate Republicans said the rebate is an attempt to counter the Democrats' push for a suspension of the 18.4 cent a gallon gasoline tax for 60 days.

A gasoline tax "holiday" has been proposed by Sen. Bob Menendez, D-N.J., and embraced by the Democratic leadership as a short-term response to counter the sudden run-up of gas prices.

While one GOP senator, John Thune of South Dakota, introduced his own tax holiday bill, most Republicans oppose the idea.

They argue there's no assurance the tax break - which is collected from refiners - will be passed on to consumers at the pump. If the lost revenue from a tax suspension - estimated at $6 billion - is made up by imposing additional taxes on oil companies, as Democrats envision, there's incentive for companies not to pass the savings on to retailers, said critics of the plan.

Republicans Drop A Tax Plan After Businesses Protest (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 1 — Senate Republicans on Monday hurriedly abandoned a broad tax proposal opposed by the oil industry and business leaders, another sign of their struggle to come up with an acceptable political and legislative answer to high gasoline prices.

Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, said he had decided to jettison the provision, which would have generated billions of dollars by changing the way businesses treat inventories for tax purposes. Instead, he said the Senate Finance Committee would hold hearings on the plan "later this year, so the pluses and minuses of the provision can become well known."

The retreat came after a torrent of objections from business leaders and their advocates, who typically view Republicans in Congress as allies. They said they had been blindsided by the inclusion of the proposal as a central element of the Republican leadership's energy package late last week.

The centerpiece of the leadership proposal, a $100 rebate check to compensate taxpayers for higher gasoline prices, continued to receive a rough reception. Members of the public have telephoned and written to ridicule the idea, and even Republican lawmakers are finding fault.

"Political anxiety in an election year is to blame for a lot of the bad bills Congress passes," said Representative Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona, who on Monday called the rebate a "knee-jerk populist idea" that voters would see through.

Democrats are trying to rally voters against Republicans, pointing to the rising fuel costs as evidence of how consumers were hurt by the opposition's ties to the oil industry.

The Republican energy package was assembled quickly last week after lawmakers returned from a recess punctuated by public complaints about the rapidly rising gas costs . Senate officials acknowledged privately that they were paying a price for rolling out the proposal before having time to vet it fully.

Besides the tax provision and the rebate, the measure includes new protections against price gouging, incentives to expand domestic oil refinery capacity, support for new energy initiatives and tax incentives for buying hybrid vehicles.

Outside Congress, experts have said the government has few realistic options that would quickly reduce gas prices. And as lawmakers struggle to gain political advantage on the issue, they must juggle the often competing goals of curbing prices, increasing production and tamping down populist anger about oil industry profits.

Major trade groups quickly and vociferously registered their disdain for the tax provision, saying the plan amounted to a hefty new tax not only on the oil industry, but also on many manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers that rely on large inventories as well.

DOJ_NMG_0027784

"This just came out of the blue," said Dorothy Coleman, vice president of tax and domestic economic policy at the National Association of Manufacturers. "Before you make a change in longstanding tax policy — I am talking 70 years or so — you don't just up and do it in an energy bill."

At the National Retail Federation, Rochelle Bernstein, vice president and tax counsel, said lobbyists there immediately raised a red flag with lawmakers and aides. "Our concern was did they understand what they were doing, did they know this was a proposal that could have wide-ranging implications?" Ms. Bernstein said.

One leadership aide who did not want to be identified as discussing internal deliberations said the decision was made to drop the provision rather than have the energy proposals caught up in a secondary tax fight. It remained unclear how quickly the leadership might move to bring its plan to the floor but it appeared unlikely to be added to the emergency spending bill the Senate is considering this week.

Though the Senate previously approved a more narrowly defined proposal to require the accounting change for major oil companies, the plan announced last week would have extended to all business sectors. It would have represented a major shift in policy for Congressional Republicans, who have wrapped their economic approach around tax cuts rather than increases.

The decision to drop it eliminates a chief source of revenue to pay for the rebate checks to be mailed to an estimated 100 million taxpayers. After the tax plan was dropped, Mr. Frist said money to pay for the rebate program could be generated by opening the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas drilling, another element of the plan. But the drilling initiative, previously rebuffed in Congress several times, faces serious opposition of its own and the revenues would not be realized for years.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, called the decision to drop the tax proposal "just another example of the Bush Republicans' inability to break their ties to big oil."

There were no estimates of how much money the change would have produced, though it had been projected at more than $11 billion in the past. The proposal in a separate tax bill to bar the accounting practice known as last in, first out for the oil companies was estimated to raise about $4.3 billion from them alone. That idea is still part of the continuing tax negotiations. But whether it will be in the final measure is unclear, and President Bush has threatened to veto it.

Business advocates said taxes could have been driven up significantly by ending the practice that allows companies to record sales from inventory at the higher, current cost of acquiring or producing the goods rather than a potentially lower original price.

Some panicked executives told their Washington representatives the increase could be from $30 million to $60 million for their individual companies alone.

"When this deal first surfaced late Thursday, the business community was just shocked," said Bruce Josten, at the United States Chamber of Commerce. "Instantly, if not rather simultaneously, people started making calls to the Senate leadership, to the staff of the Senate Finance Committee. It was the wholesalers, the manufacturers, the mass retailers."

Jade West, senior vice president at the National Association of Wholesaler-Distributors, said she learned about the full reach of Mr. Frist's proposal at midafternoon on Thursday and did not believe the report at first.

When Ms. West polled some of the association's largest members, all of whom juggle large inventories, their response was frantic. One called the proposal "dumb and irrational," she said. By Friday, the wholesalers had mobilized an e-mail campaign that resulted in about 350 letters to the Senate by Monday morning.

The Retail Industry Leaders Association, a trade group representing about 400 businesses including Wal-Mart and Target, began rallying their big-box store members first thing Friday.

"It was just surprising that they didn't see the writing on the wall, they didn't see the opposition that this provision would face," said Shannon Campagna, the organization's vice president for government affairs. "They didn't have their ear to the ground."

Frist To Withdraw Oil-Tax Increase From Energy Bill (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Senate Republicans backtracked on their proposal for a multibillion-dollar tax increase on oil and other companies, saying they would drop it from their fast-moving energy legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0027785

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said he plans to remove the accounting tax change from the gasoline-price relief package that was proposed just last week and that may reach the Senate floor as early as next week.

The Republican-backed proposal would give most taxpayers $100 rebate checks meant to compensate for surging gas prices. The package would also allow drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, pay for research into alternative fuels and authorize the Bush administration to overhaul fuel-economy standards for passenger cars, among other initiatives meant to increase supply and decrease demand for oil.

The tax provision, called the "last in, first out" accounting method and known by the acronym LIFO, has helped oil companies as well as retailers and manufacturers cut their tax liability. Mr. Frist (R., Tenn.) and other party leaders proposed eliminating it as a way to help pay for the rebate checks. It would have raised about $10 billion, Senate aides said, though it wasn't clear over how many years.

But the proposal came under immediate fire from retailers and manufacturers who said they've come to rely on this accounting method. Mr. Frist said he conferred with Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley (R., Iowa) and decided to drop it from the bill. Instead, Mr. Frist said, the matter would be considered "later this year" in the Finance Committee, "so the pluses and minuses of the provision can become well-known." Jill Gerber, a spokeswoman for Mr. Grassley, said the decision kills the provision "for now but not for good."

Amy Call, a spokeswoman for Mr. Frist, said the $100 rebates would cost $15 billion. Now senators will "look for other options" to make up the lost revenue, Ms. Call said, adding that they also might simply move the bill without any additions, meaning the increased spending will add to the deficit.

The reversal demonstrates how politically difficult it can be to raise taxes, even at a time when high gasoline prices have made highly profitable oil companies unpopular.

The last in, first out accounting method is typically used when prices are rising rapidly, as is the case for oil companies today. It allows companies selling goods from inventory that were purchased at a lower price to account for them as if they were selling the same goods bought more recently at a higher price. By doing that, taxable profits are lower, because the difference between how much they paid for something and how much they sold it for shrinks.

A similar provision was included in a Senate tax bill late last year, but it was focused only on large oil companies. It, too, was dropped from the package amid opposition. Last year's provision would have raised about $4.3 billion over five years.

The Circle Of Crude (NYT)

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

The public derision of Republicans' idea for a $100 gasoline rebate has focused on the desperate political pandering embodied in the proposal. But there's another view that makes it seem even worse. Consider the China angle.

With the nation already deeply in debt — and with Congress angling this week to cut taxes for affluent investors by more than $20 billion — lawmakers would need to borrow $10 billion to make the rebates happen. Since more than 80 percent of the immense borrowing of the Bush years has been from foreigners, it's safe to assume that most of the rebates would be courtesy of foreign lenders, of which China has been one of the most willing.

It's the circle of crude: China's competition for the world's oil is pushing up prices. Congress piles on more debt to calm angry consumers with a rebate. The increased debt is a prescription for a weaker dollar, which in turn would make imports, including oil, even more expensive.

The United States' huge — and growing — foreign indebtedness and its refusal to curb its appetite for oil risk eroding its position in the world, at precisely the moment when it needs to use its leverage as the world's dominant power to manage the extraordinary repercussions that will come with China's growth. Energy prices and the effect on global warming are only the beginning. China's demand for other natural resources poses new dangers as well, as The Times's report last week on China's planned leveling of the Indonesian tropical forests attests.

The United States can't, and shouldn't, try to curb China's economic progress, or the appetite of Chinese consumers for the good things in life. But dealing with the effects will require strong and savvy diplomacy. President Bush blew the chance to make that point — to Americans and the Chinese — during the recent visit of China's president, Hu Jintao. Then last week, as Bill Frist, the Senate majority leader, was dreaming up his $100 rebate plan, President Hu moved on to Africa. He exchanged warm hugs with Nigeria's president, Olusegun Obasanjo, and signed a deal to buy a big share of a major oil field in Nigeria. A few days later, in Kenya, he banged happily on a traditional drum at the welcoming ceremony, and then proceeded to sign a deal that will allow China to explore for oil off the coast of Kenya.

DOJ_NMG_0027786

The United States' outsized needs for the same resources that China covets, plus its need to borrow from China and other countries, diminish its influence with countries whose importance goes beyond that of their oil wells. Nigeria, the United States' fifth-largest oil supplier, is also important to American counterterrorism efforts, especially in the strategically important Gulf of Guinea. Kenya is also important in the fight against terror because its location on the Horn of Africa has made it both a training ground and a way station for terrorists.

Both countries are rife with corruption that the United States has been trying to help mitigate, in hopes of more stable economic relations and of a safer, more humane world. But America's laudable goals are, at best, wishful thinking — at worst, propaganda — unless the United States develops energy and fiscal policies that will allow it the maneuverability it needs to balance China's deepening ties not only with places like Nigeria and Kenya, but also with Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Indonesia, Myanmar and so on, as global competition continues unabated. Unfortunately, as of now, the level of America's response to this new challenge has been embodied in that pathetic recipe: borrow money from the Chinese central bank, and use it to give every voter $100 to buy more gas.

Pumped Up (USNEWS)

By Marianne Lavelle

U.S. News and World Report, May 2, 2006

Desperate to show that they feel the citizenry's pain at the gas pump, politicians battled last week to don the mantle of Robin Hood. Leaders of both parties took turns pledging to dispatch the IRS to slap around the oil companies--take away tax breaks, hit them with a windfall-profits tax, and even haul them in for a good audit. Democrats proposed a summer holiday from the federal gasoline tax while Republicans favored simply mailing out $100 rebate checks.

Certainly no one expects a handout from Uncle Sam to turn back the clock on rising gas prices, which topped $3 a gallon in many places last week. But it wouldn't even go far as a feel-good measure, with the typical two-car family on track to spend at least $1,260 more to drive this year than it did five years ago. Subtracting the 18.4-cent federal tax from the pump price would only put prices back to where they were two weeks ago. Still, alarm bells were ringing all over Washington, with average gas prices up 30 percent from a year ago and nearing the all-time high after Hurricane Katrina.

No excuses. "This is not something that is disconnected from the voters, or obscure to them, or something that tangentially affects them," says GOP pollster Tony Fabrizio. "This is something they pay every week or several times a week."

Pity the poor politicians. There's nothing the federal government can do in the short term about a global imbalance in oil supply and demand, the nuclear ambitions of an oil-rich Iran, and a shortage of U.S. gasoline refining capacity. "It's like the weather," says Texas oilman T. Boone Pickens. "There's a lot said about it, but there's not anything you can do about it. There's nothin' the government can do." But poll-watchers know that average American voters aren't interested in excuses. In a survey that bodes ill for any incumbent, pollster Daniel Yankelovich found that 85 percent of Americans believe the government could do something about oil prices if it tried. Yankelovich wrote in Foreign Affairs that energy has become a classic "tipping point" issue, where an overwhelming majority is concerned, with unease intense and a widespread belief that government could be doing far more.

In suburban Philadelphia, Democrat Lois Murphy has been working the voters right at the gas stations in her bid to unseat vulnerable GOP Rep. Jim Gerlach. "It was really quite educational," she says. "People were spending $75 to fill up their trucks. People were very angry, very frustrated, very concerned. People volunteered that they were looking for a change in Congress." Gerlach, for his part, was calling for tough scrutiny of the oil industry, a suspension of the federal gas tax, and "serious measures" in short order. "Congress needs to make it a front-burner issue," he says. Murphy noted, however, that her opponent has taken campaign funds from the oil and gas industry--putting her finger on a sore spot for the entire Republican Party. The Center for Responsive Politics found that Big Oil contributions are more lopsided this year than ever before in 16 years of tracking, with 84 percent of industry dollars flowing to the GOP.

DOJ_NMG_0027787

Spin city. "It's a dreadful nightmare for the Republicans," says Democratic strategist Bill Carrick, who points out that the issue has particular resonance because both President Bush and Vice President Cheney are former oilmen. Democratic memos circulating last week made liberal mention of the task force of energy industry officials that met with Cheney early in the administration, the records of which have been jealously guarded through several lawsuits. "You can spin a lot of conspiracy theories out of that," says Ross Baker, political scientist at Rutgers University.

For his part, President Bush did his best to trade his image as a Texas wildcatter for one as a New Age alternative-fuels booster. He appeared at an ethanol industry meeting to back wider use of the corn alcohol fuel, proposed a modest rollback in tax breaks for the industry, and suspended government purchases of oil for the Strategic Petroleum Reserve. The latter move was one Bush rejected two years ago when recommended by his 2004 opponent, Democratic Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts. But now, Bush says, "every little bit helps."

Likewise taking a page out of the Democrats' playbook, Bush and the top Republican leaders on the Hill, House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, all called for tough scrutiny of any potential price gouging by the oil industry. The pledge of vigilance came as four large oil companies reported combined quarterly earnings of more than $21 billion, a 6 percent increase from last year. The companies took out full-page newspaper ads urging Americans to view their profits as a windfall for millions of retirement funds and for the nation's energy future.

Cornering Democrats. Republicans also returned to old favorite themes, such as the need to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil exploration. Senate Republicans linked their $100 rebate proposal to a planned vote on Alaska drilling this week, hoping to corner Democrats into both voting against taxpayer relief and displaying their steadfast opposition to energy exploration there. Of course, it was moderate Republicans in the last Congress who put the kibosh on further drilling in environmentally sensitive areas.

GOP senators from New England also joined with Democrats last year to block oil refiners from gaining protection from lawsuits for cleanup of the clean-air additive MTBE, particularly in the Northeast. Refiners, as a result, are abruptly halting MTBE use this summer--contributing to high prices because of the changeover's logistics.

With the threat that the summer driving season and hurricanes could push prices even higher, the political peril going into the pivotal November election is great. "I don't think anyone actually believes they can vote for someone who can lower their gas prices," says GOP pollster Fabrizio. "But this is a point of frustration that feeds into the 'throw the bums out' mentality."

10 States, In Challenge To U.S., Plan Suit To Force Better Mileage Rules For S.U.V.'s (NYT)

By Danny Hakim

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

ALBANY, May 1 — Ten states, including California and New York, plan to file suit this week to force the Bush administration to toughen mileage regulations for sport utility vehicles and other trucks.

The suit, which the states are to announce on Tuesday, contends that the administration did not do a rigorous enough analysis of the environmental benefits of fuel economy regulations, as required by law, before issuing new rules for S.U.V.'s, pickup trucks and minivans last month. The suit will also claim that the government did not consider the impact of gasoline consumption on climate change when devising the new rules.

While the states have initiated a number of suits over Washington's environmental policies, the new suit is the first to take aim at federal fuel economy regulations. With gasoline reaching $3 a gallon in many parts of the country, there has been a broad outcry for action but little consensus on what to do.

Senate Republicans have proposed a $100 rebate to help taxpayers pay gas bills, a proposal that has been met with criticism even from the right, while President Bush has asked for Congressional authority to revise mileage regulations for passenger cars. He already has the authority to do so for S.U.V.'s and other trucks.

California will be lead plaintiff in the suit, which also includes Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New Mexico, Oregon, Rhode Island and Vermont, as well as New York City and the District of Columbia. Many of the same states have teamed up in other environmental suits against the administration, though with mixed success; a recent suit against the Environmental Protection Agency over power plant emissions was dismissed.

DOJ_NMG_0027788

"It's disappointing when you see power exercised to benefit the auto industry rather than consumers or environmental challenges," said Bill Lockyer, the attorney general of California, discussing the Bush administration's fuel economy rules.

The attorney general of Massachusetts, Thomas F. Reilly, said in a statement, "At a time when we are all facing a gas crisis, the Bush administration is pushing for fuel economy standards that appear to be authored by the oil and auto industries."

Rae Tyson, a spokesman for the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, said he could not comment on the suit because he had not seen it. But Mr. Tyson defended the regulations and said, "There's no question the analysis was rigorous."

Several top Democrats, and also some Republicans, including Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, have called for tougher mileage requirements for S.U.V.'s, which must meet less stringent fuel economy guidelines because they are classified in the same category as light trucks, instead of with passenger cars.

Late last year, the Bush administration unveiled the first broad overhaul of mileage regulations for S.U.V.'s, pickup trucks and minivans since the rules were created in the 1970's. While new cars must average 27.5 miles a gallon, light trucks, including S.U.V.'s, must average 21.6 miles a gallon in 2006 models.

The administration's new system would take the single truck category and break it up into a number of smaller categories with varying requirements. Government officials predict that overall truck fuel economy will rise to 24 miles a gallon by 2011, though it will depend on the sales mix among S.U.V.'s and other trucks.

Automakers have said the new regulations are tough enough.

Jennifer Moore, a spokeswoman for the Ford Motor Company, referred to a previous company statement that commended the traffic safety agency for creating a new regulatory system that would "pose significant challenges" but also be "more equitable to every automaker."

An overdependence on sales of large S.U.V.'s like Hummers, Chevrolet Suburbans and Ford Explorers is seen as among the reasons General Motors and Ford, the last two American-owned automakers, are suffering steep losses and closing plants.

Environmentalists say the Bush administration's new truck fuel economy system will not do enough to curb oil consumption and adds uncertainty to a complex system already characterized by loopholes.

In setting the standards, the administration "looked high gas prices, oil addiction and global warming squarely in the eye and blinked," said Daniel Becker, the director of the global warming program at the Sierra Club.

The administration is, however, closing one loophole, an exemption that has left the largest S.U.V.'s, including the Hummer H2, outside the regulatory system.

But the administration's rules are considerably less daunting than new California global warming emissions regulations that would force steeper fuel economy increases on vehicles sold there. New York is planning to pass similar air-quality rules. The industry is challenging the state rules in court, and the administration has strongly opposed the movement by states to regulate global warming emissions.

Mr. Tyson, of the traffic safety agency, said many other factors were considered in addition to the price of gas, including "the ability of industry to be able to meet the standard."

"You can't propose something that's not technically feasible for them to achieve," he added.

Gas-price Surge Strains Oil-auto Pact (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, May 2, 2006

The high price of gasoline and the growing call for congressional action are undermining the gentleman's agreement under which the oil and auto lobbies do not attack each other.

Tyson Slocum, an energy specialist at Public Citizen, said the two lobbies have benefited from a "non-aggression pact." But as pressure mounts on Capitol Hill against the oil industry, which has been reporting huge profits, the truce may be ending, Slocum said.

DOJ_NMG_0027789

"The oil industry is feeling lots of pressure," Slocum said. "They are not used to this. They want to break the détente," to shift some of that pressure to the auto industry.

Sources in both the oil and auto camps say there is no split yet. But several lobbyists acknowledged that tensions appear to be rising in a political environment where even some Republicans, long oil-industry allies, are calling for what the industry considers to be punitive measures.

One oil lobbyist said he and his colleagues have discussed more aggressively challenging the auto industry, which for years has fought increases in gasoline-mileage standards, known as corporate average fuel economy, or CAFE. In particular, some oil lobbyists say Detroit has pushed too hard for the development of alternative fuels, such as ethanol.

"The pile-on factor is pretty enormous at this point," the oil lobbyist said.

Dozens of bills have been introduced in recent weeks as gasoline prices have risen and angry motorists demand their members to act.

What makes oil lobbyists especially red in the face when discussing the auto industry is the recent embrace of E85, a fuel type that is 85 percent ethanol, which is made primarily from corn.

"If the oil industry learns that the autos are using political pressure to force E85 on the industry as a branded fuel with no liability, then, yes, we very much think it is fair play to raise CAFE standards," said Don Duncan, a lobbyist for ConocoPhillips.

Duncan said the two industries cooperate on the development of new fuels but the oil industry believes in general that E85 is not ready for widespread use. He said there is evidence that E85 can corrode a car's catalytic converters, for example. A gallon of E85 is also less efficient — it produces less energy — than a gallon of gasoline, he said.

Michelle Kautz, a spokeswoman for the National Ethanol Vehicle Coalition, said that there are no corrosion issues when E85 is used in a compatible car. Coalition members include ethanol producers and vehicle makers, according to its website.

She said the oil industry has not done enough to build the infrastructure necessary for the 6 million E85-compatible vehicles now on the road. Only 681 stations sell E85, Kautz said.

Duncan said he has heard that some auto lobbyists have urged the White House and Energy Department to put pressure on oil companies to build more infrastructure, namely gas stations, that offer alternative fuels. But overall, he said, he doesn't believe that auto executives are taking a position in opposition to his industry.

To the extent that there is a feud, oil lobbyists point to a blog entry posted by the vice president of communications for DaimlerChrysler's American division as the starting point. According to a story in The Wall Street Journal, the entry criticized oil companies for not doing enough to reduce the cost of gasoline.

An auto-industry source said oil companies fired the first shot, however, when ExxonMobil ran advertisements in newspapers that some saw as suggesting the auto industry was too reliant on large, gas guzzling sport utility vehicles.

The source said the oil industry has not developed the infrastructure to support alternative fuels, although executives say publicly that they support their development.

"It would be helpful if oil companies could identify what exactly they are doing on alternative fuels," the source said.

Oil-industry officials say they spend millions of dollars to develop new energy sources.

If tensions are rising in Washington, several lobbyists stressed that war hasn't been declared.

"The two big goliaths can tend toward canceling each other out and forcing [members of Congress] into having to take tough votes," one oil lobbyist said. "Because both sectors require a degree of cooperation in making each other's products commercially viable, there is no joy taken by either side in having to go to war."

The story is one of increasingly divergent fortunes.

Indicative of oil companies' good fortune recently, ExxonMobil reported $36 billion in profits last year, a record for an American company. In contrast, the U.S. auto industry is losing money and laying off workers.

One advantage domestic carmakers say they have is in the development of so-called "flex-fuel" vehicles that run on oil or ethanol or other alternative fuels, such as E85.

President Bush, meanwhile, has asked Congress to allow him to raise standards for fuel economy. That gives environmentalists and consumer advocates that have challenged both the auto and oil lobbies hope — as does rumors of frayed relations between the two.

DOJ_NMG_0027790

States Find It Tough To Prove Gas Prices Illegal (USAT)

By James R. Healey And Matt Krantz

USA Today, May 2, 2006

Arizona's comprehensive investigation into that state's high fuel prices after Hurricane Katrina concludes that while there was "profiteering" at all levels of the oil industry, nothing illegal took place.

Washington's attorney general's office said in a report last week that its more recent investigation of today's high prices "has not found any evidence so far of illegal activity among gasoline retailers or producers in Washington."

Together, the two reports show that it is hard for authorities to prove consumers are being ripped off even in times of extraordinary price increases.

Attorneys general in at least nine states, responding to outrage by their residents, are investigating whether current high gasoline prices are a result of wrongdoing by the petroleum industry, according to the National Association of Attorneys General.

Arizona's statewide average price is $3.022, still nearly 11 cents less than the record $3.131 shortly after Katrina, according to travel club AAA's daily survey.

Washington's average $3.011 Monday set a record for that state.

The attorney general in California, where the statewide average hit a record $3.251 a gallon Monday, says he will subpoena documents from the state's 21 refineries, including those operated by major oil companies ChevronTexaco, ExxonMobil and ConocoPhillips.

The attorney general's office said state data for 2006 show that crude oil prices have risen 14%, but the difference between what oil companies pay for crude oil and prices at the pump has soared 130%.

Gasoline is made from crude oil, which accounts for roughly 55% of the pump price for gasoline, the U.S. government says.

And Washington Attorney General Rob McKenna, in a statement about his investigation, said, "Gas prices are influenced by the basic laws of supply and demand."

Energy-industry veterans wonder if such probes are misleading.

California's own Energy Commission, for instance, acknowledges in an explanation of fuel prices on its website: "Rumors and charges of collusion among the oil companies have been raised for decades with nothing ever proven."

Charles Swanson, director of Ernst & Young's Energy Center, says, "Politicians can posture all they want, but there's nothing they can do to help."

Some states have made price-gouging cases. Florida sued individual gas stations for overcharging after Katrina.

But Florida, unlike Arizona, has an anti-gouging law. It is in effect only when a state of emergency is declared. Florida was a hurricane target, making an emergency declaration logical.

Arizona's report, unveiled last week, says, "Profit margins realized by every segment of the oil industry were two or three times their normal margins."

But the state has no law making that illegal, underscoring, the report says, the need for a federal price-gouging law.

The Federal Trade Commission is expected to deliver a report by May 22 that will say whether the agency found any price manipulation after Katrina.

Fuel Costs Ease But Could Climb Higher (USAT)

By James R. Healey

USA Today, May 2, 2006

Gasoline prices have stopped their spring-loaded daily leaps, but it's too soon to say the worst is over.

The numbers on the pump have declined slightly three consecutive days, to a nationwide average $2.919 a gallon Monday, according to travel club AAA. It's the first time that's happened since late March. But the March respite totaled just 0.8 of a cent over three days and turned out to be only a hiccup before prices zipped higher.

AAA warns that might happen again. "A few days of slight declines does not make a trend," spokesman Geoff Sundstrom cautions. "We may continue to see higher prices between now and Memorial Day."

That's the beginning of the warm-weather driving season, when gasoline consumption rises as Americans take more vacations and weekend trips.

A weekly report by the U.S. Energy Information Administration showed a U.S. average Monday identical to AAA's — $2.919 — up just 0.5 of a cent from a week ago. That's a big slowdown after four weeks of prices jumping an average 10.4 cents a gallon per week.

On one hand, it should be no surprise that prices are easing. U.S. gasoline supplies are ample. U.S. demand is a little soft. Refineries are mostly through with their routine maintenance and are cranking out generous amounts of gasoline.

But prices aren't down as far as they should be under those circumstances, energy veterans say. That's partly because petroleum products have become an investment instead of traders' best guess about the value of crude oil, gasoline and heating oil the next few months.

"Money is flowing into direct or indirect purchases of oil futures as an inflation hedge. That flow sends futures higher, fueling more inflation, and then fueling more money into futures positions as an inflation hedge," says Tom Kloza, senior analyst at the Oil Price Information Service. Oil rose $1.82 to settle at $73.70 Monday.

Still, "We can put to rest some of the hyperbole — $3.50 average for gasoline, or $4-plus," he says.

Keeping upward pressure on prices:

• Hostility toward the U.S. in oil-producers Iran and Venezuela implies shortages at any minute.

• Indelible memories of disruptions caused by hurricanes in the Gulf of Mexico last year keep petroleum traders jumpy about supplies. That makes them willing to pay more for oil and for the gasoline made from it.

"We're heading into the peak demand season and the potential for refinery outages" from hurricanes, cautions Thomas Bentz, senior energy analyst at BNP Paribas, a big investment bank.

The U.S. Minerals Management Service in its latest report, April 19, said that 22.3% of Gulf oil output still hadn't restarted after hurricane damage last year. The MMS plans to update that number Wednesday.

Ex-CIA Chief: Oil Key To U.S. Security (PTR)

By Jason Cato

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, May 2, 2006

Think gas prices are bad now?

Imagine another terrorist attack -- especially one on Saudi Arabian oil refineries, former CIA Director R. James Woolsey said Monday during a visit to Pittsburgh.

If terrorists took out the sulfur-cleaning towers in northeastern Saudi Arabia, as described in the beginning of Robert Baer's book, "Sleeping With the Devil," crude oil prices could easily top $150 a barrel and stay there for more than a year, Woolsey said.

A barrel of oil sold for about $73 yesterday, with gas prices in the United States hovering around $3 a gallon.

Most Americans don't want to think about paying double that.

They also don't want to think about where some of the money goes when they buy gasoline -- to groups that threaten the U.S., Woolsey said. And it's not just terrorists, but established Middle Eastern regimes that restrict women's rights, have poor education systems and fail to invest in their societies.

"If you want to see who's paying for all that, next time you pull in to fill up, turn the rearview mirror a little bit so you can look at yourself for a minute as you get out with your credit card," Woolsey said during a meeting with reporters and editors of the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review.

One way to beat that -- and hit Islamic extremists in the pocketbook -- is for Americans to start using renewable fuel, Woolsey said. That includes ethanol and biofuels as alternatives to gas and diesel.

In the U.S., ethanol is mostly made from corn and biodiesel from vegetable oil. Both are mixed with gasoline or diesel.

Neither is widely produced or used now, but could be in coming years -- in part because of skyrocketing gas costs.

"We're a few years off, but it's on the horizon," said Greg Boulos, of Steel City Biofuels, who sees alternative fuels as a way to bolster local economies while also curbing U.S. dependency on foreign oil. "At this point, though, alternative fuels are more expensive than gas."

DOJ_NMG_0027792

That will change.

By 2020, the National Commission on Energy Policy says it will cost less than 80 cents a gallon to produce cellulosic ethanol.

In addition to alternative fuels, Woolsey also advocates fuel-efficient vehicles and technological advances to build cars and trucks out of lighter carbon composites -- all in an effort to use less oil.

Buying less foreign oil will make the United States more secure, Woolsey said, by providing less money to Middle Eastern groups -- particularly radical Islamists.

Continued dependency on foreign oil could pose problems if future Middle Eastern regimes are not as cooperative, such as Osama bin Laden's assertion that he would cut Saudi oil production if he were in charge. It's possible other countries also could restrict the flow of oil to the U.S., Woolsey said.

That's the tactic Woolsey said he would use against Iran, which is shrugging off international concerns about its nuclear ambitions.

Iran produces about 4 million barrels of oil a day, most of which it exports. The country imports nearly all of its refined petroleum products -- such as gasoline and diesel fuel -- from Europe and India.

"And I think the thing that would bring the Iranian government and economy to its knees, quite quickly, would not be a cut-off of their exports of unrefined petroleum (but to ban) their imports of refined petroleum products," Woolsey said.

Short of sweeping technological and fuel changes, lawmakers in Washington, D.C., have become focused on more short-term answers to high gasoline prices.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said President Bush should drill oil companies until "outrageous profits are returned to working Americans" and have the Federal Trade Commission report on price-fixing and gouging.

"They ought to be working seven days a week to make sure that we know exactly who is price-gouging," Kennedy said. "Congress also needs to pass an excess profits tax that will return revenue to working families -- this is not the time for greed."

The U.S. oil industry has been peppered with bad press in recent weeks for posting huge first-quarter profits.

Bush has resisted any call for a windfall profits tax.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., has called for more homegrown oil.

"Consumers are feeling pain at the pump, and Republicans are moving aggressively to address their concerns," he said. "We must reduce our dependence on foreign oil by increasing domestic exploration, improving our energy infrastructure and continuing to encourage conservation."

Frist also supports giving taxpayers a gas refund check.

Woolsey said that isn't enough. The country's gas woes need long-range solutions, he said.

"Rather than mailing everyone $100, we ought to do something to fix it," Woolsey said.

Frist Could Offer Bill To Resolve DRA Lawsuit (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, May 2, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) is considering legislative options to end an ongoing a dispute over Medicare payments to a group of Tennessee hospitals, in the process potentially shelving what could be the first test of the 2005 budget reconciliation act's constitutionality.

"Frist is working with [Finance] Chairman [Chuck] Grassley [R-Iowa] to explore legislative options," said a Frist aide, adding Monday afternoon that a proposal was not "imminent."

"This is a complex change legislatively," the aide said.

According to documents filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, the lawsuit, Cookeville Regional Medical Center v. Thompson, centers on a disagreement over how certain Medicare payments should be calculated.

In late January, a federal judge found in favor of the hospitals, which had filed the suit in 2004, and awarded the institutions an increase in payments worth up to $100 million.

DOJ_NMG_0027793

But less than two weeks later, the Health and Human Services Department and its Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services filed a motion to overturn that decision, citing a provision in the Deficit Reduction Act signed into law that month.

The appeal raised the ire of Tennessee's 11 Members, who criticized the move in a March 10 letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and HHS Secretary Michael Leavitt.

In that letter, the lawmakers, including Frist, asserted the provision cited in the appeal was drafted at the recommendation of the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services to clarify the policy that sparked the original dispute.

In the meantime, however, attorneys for the hospitals have responded to the appeal, asserting that not only is the law inapplicable to the case, but also that the DRA fails to meet constitutional standards.

In court documents, the hospitals' attorneys note that although both chambers voted in favor of the act in December 2005, a technical error inserted by a Senate clerk resulted in the House and Senate approving different bills.

Because the House did not approve the exact version signed by President Bush, the response states, the act fails to meet the Constitution's bicameral clause.

(The mistake impacts the duration of Medicare payments for medical equipment, including hospital beds and wheelchairs.)

While at least four other challenges to the law's constitutionality have been filed in federal court — including a lawsuit filed Friday by 11 senior House Democrats — the Cookeville case could produce the first ruling on the law's validity because it is already under way.

According to court documents, Justice Department attorneys are slated to file a response in the case Wednesday. Although initially required to file April 7, the department received two extensions from the court.

It remains unclear exactly how Congressional legislation could impact progress in the case. A spokesman with the Justice Department's Civil Division declined to comment.

GOP To Focus On Spending (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, May 2, 2006

Feeling increasing heat from their base for living too high on the hog, Republican Senators are putting in place an election-year strategy to try to reclaim the fiscal discipline brand that helped the GOP win and maintain its majority for more than a decade.

Sources within the Republican Conference say that the leadership plans to make federal spending a major piece of its 2006 campaign. Those sources say there is a widespread acknowledgement that a wake-up call on spending is overdue and that the party must start pushing forth initiatives and a message to show voters it is serious about getting the federal government in the black.

"People are pissed off about high gas prices, a potential immigration snafu — there are a cluster of problems," said a Republican leadership aide. "It's something that's a big issue for the base, and they are very annoyed."

"After border security, it's probably the second most important issue right now," another GOP staffer said. "People are fed up."

GOP Senators and aides said that to make their case, the majority will spend the coming months holding numerous press events on federal spending, the budget and earmarks. Republicans also plan to push for Senate passage of a line-item veto and possibly revisit the issue of a two-year appropriations process.

With fiscal discipline squarely on the GOP must-do list, several Republican Congressional sources also said that the Senate is already sending signals to the House Republican leadership that, except for Defense and Homeland Security, consideration of the fiscal 2007 appropriations bills likely will be pushed off until after the November elections.

The reason, several GOP aides said, is that the other spending bills would only fracture the GOP and provide Democrats with ammunition to use in a hotly contested campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0027794

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a potential 2008 presidential hopeful and a leading proponent of earmark reform, said the GOP must act now to put its money where its mouth is on reining in federal spending. He said if Republicans fail to do that, it will hurt them at the ballot box.

"I think it's vital" to victory in 2006, McCain said. "Our base is committed to the concept of fiscal discipline and has been alienated. It's not that they are going to vote Democrat, but they may stay home."

McCain cited a recent NBC-Wall Street Journal poll that showed that 39 percent of respondents said banning earmarks was the most important job for Congress to finish before it adjourns for the Memorial Day recess. That was the highest level of support among the proposals offered, beating out immigration reform at 32 percent and extending President Bush's tax cuts at 10 percent.

The first outward sign of the new GOP offensive came last week when Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) won a sought-after veto threat from Bush over the cost of the pending supplemental appropriations for Iraq and Hurricane Katrina. Frist tried to reinforce the message of GOP fiscal responsibility by following up the veto warning with a letter signed by 34 of his GOP colleagues backing the president.

Republicans then tried once more to press their anti-excessive spending campaign when, in an extremely rare if not unprecedented vote, Senators eliminated a $15 million earmark in the supplemental for a seafood-promotion program for Gulf Coast fishing interests.

"There's a lot of pressure up here to spend more, and not as much pressure to spend less," said Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.). "It's important for Republicans to talk about fiscal discipline not only in an election year, but every year."

A Republican Senate aide said that the recent GOP fiscal strategy has "been percolating" for several weeks, beginning in February after Bush presented his fiscal 2007 budget proposal to Congress. Republican Senators — led by Frist, Jon Kyl (Ariz.) and Rick Santorum (Pa.) — are continuing to discuss how best to press their case through November.

"Talks are literally going on as we speak as to what our initiatives will be come early summer and early fall," this staffer said.

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), a leading fiscal conservative, said that Republicans have been, and will continue to be, more vocal on spending, not only because it is an important issue for voters but also because the GOP must get its fiscal house in order. He said that natural disasters and other catastrophes aside, Republicans have gone too far in pushing pet programs that aren't essential.

"People are disappointed in Republican governance" on fiscal issues, and the party must regain their trust, Brownback said. While he doesn't believe Democrats have much credibility on that issue, Republicans cannot take anything for granted.

Asked whether Republicans will be victorious come Election Day, Brownback said: "Yes, if we reclaim the topic; no, if we don't listen. It's important we do something."

The Democrats have spent the better part of two cycles trying to convince the electorate that their party would be better stewards of taxpayer dollars than the Republicans, often citing the zeroing-out of the federal budget, which occurred on then-President Bill Clinton's watch.

Voters, they say, are tired of Republican policies they say favor the rich and strap the middle class.

"They are a day late and a dollar short — no pun intended," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.). "They've had five and a half years to govern this country. It's time for a change."

Manley said Republicans "find themselves between a rock and a hard place" in trying to negotiate fiscal discipline in a party divided by "moderates who support modest increases in spending and the fiscal conservatives who want to slash spending programs to the bone."

To remain unified on the subject, Republicans say they may have to focus Members' attention to the polling results and the looming election to drive home their case. It also doesn't hurt, they say, to have fiscal conservatives such as McCain and Brownback keeping the Conference on focus.

Some Republican hardliners blame those moderates and their own appropriators, who are charged with determining fiscal spending priorities, for letting spending get out of hand in recent years. They also allege it is appropriators who have gotten too gluttonous with "pork barrel" projects and earmarks — one of the very issues they hope to address this year.

DOJ_NMG_0027795

But one GOP appropriations aide countered that “the blame is being misplaced,” arguing that the current House and Senate Republican chairmen “are as committed to fiscal restraint as any ever have been.”

“The growth in federal spending over the past decade can be blamed chiefly on entitlement programs and other mandatory spending that the Appropriations committees have no control over,” the staffer said.

Republicans widely acknowledge that the party lost focus on hard-line budgeting in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and that has only increased since the war in Iraq began and Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast. Those unexpected and costly endeavors necessarily put a pinch on fiscal restraint, they say — but now it’s time to come back to reality.

“We’re right on time to do something now, because no one is really paying attention yet,” said one Republican aide. “There’s still time between now and August to re-brand ourselves as the party of fiscal responsibility.”

Bold Bid To Cut 'Pork' In Congress (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON - If Congress gets into funding local projects, there will be no end to it, and it might be "productive of evil."

So warned President James Monroe in 1822. Since then, members of Congress have siphoned off billions in federal tax dollars for their own projects, or, some say, "pork." Previous bids to limit or end this practice of earmarks have proven as doable as nudging a spring chick back into its egg.

But this week, Congress is on track for its boldest step yet. The reason? Republicans are increasingly anxious about this fall's elections, and, with gas prices soaring, the public is paying attention to waste and corruption in Washington.

Higher gas prices are "making the public more conscious of waste and corruption," says Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University in New Brunswick, N.J.

Americans in a recent poll said that ending earmarks should be the No. 1 priority for Congress this session, according to an NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll released last week. Thirty-nine percent said that members should be prohibited from "directing federal funds to specific projects benefiting only certain constituents."

In the House, still reeling from the scandals involving former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and ex-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, Republican leaders are pushing for the disclosure of the names of members who propose earmarks and are seeking a process to remove them. Standoff over spending

It's an issue that roils those on spending committees, who nearly derailed the GOP lobby reform bill over the issue of earmark reform. Under pressure from House leaders, the appropriators caved, on condition that earmark reform be extended to taxwriting committees as well.

"It's our only chance to maintain the majority. It really is," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R) of Arizona, a lead sponsor of earmark reform, after the vote.

In the Senate, the fight is over reining in spending. In a political move only used once before in the US Senate, freshman Sen. Tom Coburn (R) of Oklahoma is forcing his colleagues this week to vote on individual pork projects attached to a $106.5 billion emergency defense bill.

He lost the first round, barely. His effort to drop the so-called railroad to nowhere, a $700 million project to relocate a recently repaired railway line away from the Gulf Coast, was heading toward success. But Sen. Trent Lott (R) of Mississippi, one of the project's chief promoters, armed himself with charts and photos of the Gulf Coast and made a last-minute, personal appeal to GOP moderates and saved the railroad funding, 49-48.

But, in a move that stunned the chamber, Senator Coburn won his next bid to remove a $15 million earmark for a Gulf seafood ad campaign. "I guess Senator Coburn is the new Miss Congeniality," said Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, a reference to the heat one takes from peers for opposing pork projects. "I hope we can pry some more pork out of it," he added. Every zero counts

This week, the Oklahoma freshman is going after 17 other earmarks, amounting to $2,680,145,000. (Unlike most other senators, Coburn doesn't round big numbers: Every zero counts.) These include $100,000 for a drivers' license facility in Georgia,

DOJ_NMG_0027796

$500 million to cover business disruption expenses for Northrop Grumman, and $20 million for a study of shrimp and reef fishery profitability.

"Hurricane Katrina should not be an excuse for corporate welfare," Coburn wrote to his colleagues last week.

Until the 1900s, earmarks were rarely used on Capitol Hill. In 1987, President Reagan vetoed a highway bill because it had targeted funds for member demonstration projects. In 1988, the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) issued a report showing all unauthorized projects, or member earmarks, in that year's appropriations bills.

"Lawmakers told OMB that if they ever did it again, they would cut their budget," says Tom Schatz, president of Citizens Against Government Waste, which has published a list of earmarks since 1991.

Other budget-cutting groups hail a new mood on Capitol Hill. "Pigs are going to start flying," says Ed Frank, a spokesman for the Ending Earmarks Express, a project of the conservative Americans for Prosperity Foundation. "The voice of the taxpayers is finally being heard in Congress."

Still, the Senate version of lobby reform falls short of the House proposal. It provides a process to eliminate earmarks that were added late in the legislative process, but does not require lawmakers to disclose their sponsorship of earmarks.

Anti-Spending Senators Skeptical Of Frist Plan (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, May 2, 2006

The Senate will wrap up its short-lived debate over the growing use of supplemental appropriations bills as a vehicle for pork-barrel spending midweek, as the chamber is expected to approve a fiscal 2006 supplemental package by Wednesday that includes most of the nearly $14 billion in controversial earmarks that touched the fight last week.

With appropriators angered and bruised from a week of harsh attacks from conservatives and the White House, the decision by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) to limit debate on the bill will test the ability of GOP leaders and the White House to impose their will on the chamber's notoriously territorial appropriators.

Frist filed cloture on the bill last Thursday, essentially limiting reformers' opportunities to whittle away at the bill's price tag by forcing a series of politically embarrassing votes on 17 controversial earmarks challenged by Sen. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.).

Although at press time Republicans were still working out the details of which amendments to the bill would be considered, a GOP leadership aide indicated that Coburn would not get a floor vote on all of his amendments.

While Coburn and Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) and John Ensign (R-Nev.) had hoped to spend several days debating and voting on a list of 19 earmarks, only two of the provisions made it to a floor vote. Coburn and other reformers had argued both privately and publicly that the best way to cut the bill's price tag was during Senate floor consideration of the bill, since members of the House and Senate Appropriations committees would likely protect the extra spending.

But leadership aides indicated that Frist was comfortable approving the committee-passed bill largely intact, arguing that in addition to a White House veto threat and opposition from Senate leaders, Senate conference negotiators would face resistance from the House leadership as well, since they passed a bill that essentially reflected President Bush's original request.

But reformers reject that argument as foolish at best and, at worst, an indication that, in McCain's words, someone "has been smoking something stronger than I ever inhaled."

In fact, even in the best of times, imposing leadership's will on appropriators has proved to be a difficult task, often requiring the full attention of Frist, Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) to keep spending bills within the leadership's designated limits.

But with House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) still solidifying control of the GOP Conference and Frist straining to control a fractured Senate, that task will prove significantly more difficult, particularly since the earmarks are written in such a way as to appeal to a broad swath of lawmakers. Appropriators in the House have also been emboldened by their recent successful stare-down with leadership over the budget and their near-win on lobbying reform, which the House will finally take up this week.

Finishing the supplemental this week clears the decks in the Senate for the chamber to take up the tax reconciliation conference report, which has itself become a target for its own brand of earmarks and financial breaks for the energy industry, among other interests.

DOJ_NMG_0027797

Meanwhile, this week's expected approval of the ethics overhaul in the House sets up the bill's next major hurdle, as Senate Democrats maneuver to defeat a provision targeting 527 groups that House Republicans reinserted into their version of the measure. If that provision survives the House-Senate conference, Senate Democrats could filibuster the conference report, or the bill itself, using as cover the argument that the bill is too light on reform.

The chamber will also tackle a pair of hastily scheduled energy bills — one sponsored by Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.) that would strengthen laws against price gouging, and another by Energy and Commerce Chairman Joe Barton (R-Texas) and Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.) that is designed to increase oil refining capacity.

Rounding out the week, the House will take up a bipartisan port security bill authored by California Reps. Dan Lungren (R) and Jane Harman (D).

Hog-Tied (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

In the eternal battle against Congressional pork-barrel, we'll take even modest victories wherever we can find them. Following a bruising 12-round, behind-the-scenes prize fight last week between new House Majority Leader John Boehner and Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis, Mr. Boehner won on a technical knockout.

Heeding fiscal conservatives for a change, Mr. Boehner and fellow House GOP leaders wanted to attach budget changes to an otherwise useless lobbying-reform bill. These columns recently memorialized Mr. Lewis as the "Minority Maker" for his opposition to spending controls.

And sure enough, Mr. Lewis threatened to bring the whole lobbying bill down on the House floor with the help of most of his 36 fellow GOP appropriators, including a threat to bar money for projects in the districts of Members who dared support the bill. But Mr. Lewis backed down at the last moment, lest he and his big-spending mates be blamed for another embarrassing Republican defeat.

The House proceeded to vote 216-207 for budget rule changes that for the first time in many years limit the power of the College of Cardinals who run Appropriations to pass out tax dollars. The changes include reforms that should help repel some of the worst spending abuses, in particular the proliferation of Member-supported earmarks -- 2,600 in the 2006 Defense Appropriations bill alone and 6,371 in last year's highway bill -- that have been such a GOP embarrassment, such as Alaska's famous "Bridge to Nowhere."

Jeff Flake of Arizona, a lead sponsor of the earmark reform, says a major goal is transparency. From now on Members of Congress will have to put their John Hancocks next to the slabs of bacon they slip into big spending bills. Another reform will force up or down votes in the House on line-item pork projects if they are added during conference negotiations. The Nielsen ratings for CSPAN are going to explode. OK, maybe not, but it's a start.

Speaking of votes on pork, there was a related victory last week against white-elephant projects in the Senate. Republican Tom Coburn of Oklahoma forced a series of floor votes on parochial projects in Iraq supplemental spending that is already $14 billion above President Bush's request. Alas, a $700 million Mississippi railroad project survived by one vote. But Mr. Coburn did prevail on a vote to strip $15 million in subsidies to the seafood industry. Mississippi Senator Trent Lott said he's getting "damn tired" of Mr. Coburn and his fellow troublemakers, so they must be doing something right.

That $15 million is nickel-and-dime stuff by Washington standards -- about what Congress spends every 12 minutes. Still, you've got to crawl before you walk. And it sure is refreshing to see the Appropriators, so famous for bullying the Congressional leadership, lose a couple for a change. Taxpayers can only hope there are more such votes to come.

Appropriations Chair Not Afraid To Stand Apart From House GOP (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

As House Republicans' unity frays in a difficult election year, House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Calif.) and his expansive 66-member panel are challenging the GOP leadership and Republican conservatives.

Twice last month, Lewis and his committee nearly derailed high-profile legislation, first forcing GOP leaders to pull their 2007 budget blueprint from House debate and then bringing consideration of a major lobbying and ethics bill to a halt Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0027798

Only after House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) pleaded, saying that his reputation was at stake, did committee members allow the lobbying bill to proceed to a vote, now scheduled for tomorrow.

Those actions are underscoring a political truism often uttered by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.): Congress has three political parties -- Republicans, Democrats and appropriators. Traditionally, the appropriations committees in both chambers of Congress have operated with bipartisan comity and an independent streak. GOP leaders tried to rein them in after the Republican takeover in 1994, but Lewis in recent weeks has emerged as a force, reasserting his panel's independence.

"We are getting more authoritative," said Rep. Mike Simpson (R-Idaho), an Appropriations Committee member who behind closed doors spoke vociferously against the lobbying bill, which he thought unfairly singled out the panel. "We are standing up for our turf."

Lewis, elected to the House in 1978, once used his background as a lifeguard to save former House speaker Jim Wright (D-Tex.) as he flailed off the shores of Hawaii. And the insurance salesman-turned-California pol has been reaching out to the other party ever since, so much so that in 1992, conservatives allied with then-Rep. Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) derailed Lewis's rise through the House leadership. That left him to build his power through the Appropriations Committee.

Lewis assumed the committee chairmanship in 2005 with the Republican leadership's blessing, after a brutal competition with two other Appropriations subcommittee chairmen, Reps. Harold Rogers (R-Ky.) and Ralph Regula (R-Ohio). But if GOP leaders expected a more docile committee, they have been taken by surprise -- so much so that some House conservatives have been calling for Lewis to be replaced.

Lewis's leadership first came into focus early last month, when he balked at a 2007 budget plan that would have restricted his committee's ability to pass emergency spending bills in response to natural disasters by limiting annual emergency bills and funding them through a designated rainy-day fund. That budget plan remains in limbo.

But the issue of the committee's conduct came to a head last week when the panel refused to accept provisions in the lobbying bill to restrict the number of earmarks -- narrowly tailored measures to fund home-district projects. Appropriators have guarded their earmarking prerogative for years, generously funding their own districts while doling out favors to House members off the committee.

Under the lobbying bill, such measures and their sponsors would have to be clearly delineated in legislation. Opponents would be granted new power to strip such earmarks from legislation, even if it meant bringing down an entire bill deemed excessively larded with pet projects.

Appropriators first said that the provisions were unnecessary and would tie the House in knots, handing Democrats a cudgel to hit Republicans with. Then they said that if earmarks are to be targeted in the 11 annual appropriations bills that fund the government, it should be done in tax measures and "authorization" bills, such as last year's huge highway bill that funded Alaska's "Bridge to Nowhere."

Conservatives, such as Rep. Mike Pence (Ind.), said that Lewis had no real desire to spread earmark reform. By applying earmark limits to the bills of the Ways and Means and Transportation committees, they said, Lewis hoped those committees' chairmen, Reps. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) and Don Young (R-Alaska), would join the effort to scuttle the earmark measures.

Most panel members denied that charge, but Simpson conceded the point to a degree.

"Are there people who still don't like what's happening in terms of earmark reform? Yeah," he said. "And some probably did think Don Young and Bill Thomas would say, 'No, no, no, no,' and kill it altogether."

But most committee members, including Lewis, really thought that spreading the earmark limits was a matter of fairness, Simpson said. In fact, several members who are also on the House leadership's team of vote counters said they were prepared to give up their spots on the "whip" team to vote against the leadership.

"I had the decision, 'Am I a member of the leadership as a whip, or am I an appropriator?' " said Rep. Kay Granger (R-Tex.), who ultimately backed Lewis. "Well, I'm both, and I worked hard to get on the committee."

To panel members, what happened last week was a clear triumph for Lewis. During a closed meeting Thursday afternoon, Hastert and House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) assured members that no final lobbying bill would reach the floor unless its restrictions on earmarking applied to all committees. Boehner said, "There will be no bill, there will be no bill, there will be no bill."

DOJ_NMG_0027799

Then Hastert made his appeal, according to GOP aides who were present. He wants his legacy to be a unified, effective Republican conference. The popular speaker is expected to retire in 2008, and Hastert said he needed members' help to preserve his reputation.

Rep. Rodney Alexander (La.), who was elected in 2002 as a Democrat and switched parties two years later, said he believes in Republican principles and does not want to see his party break apart. One member asked Hastert if it is true that momentum is building to unseat Lewis from his chairmanship. Hastert assured the group that Lewis is safe. The committee then moved to back the speaker.

"This was a spontaneous, grass-roots reaction of the entire committee to demand full-scale earmark reform to apply to all committees," said Rep. John A. Culberson (R-Tex.). "And we won."

Budget-Cutting Endangers Indian Clinics (LAT)

By Sam Howe Verhovek

The Los Angeles Times, May 2, 2006

HELENA, Mont. — Karen Jester went to a local emergency room several years ago with complications from diabetes. When the doctor asked what the trouble was, she began by saying she had heard her late grandfather talking to her that day.

"They thought I was crazy, of course," recalled Jester, 46, an Assiniboine Indian. "They said: 'We think you're depressed. Here are some pills.' "

Jester recalled the incident as a cultural clash: To her, it was natural to invoke the spirit of an elder in describing her condition. It is just the sort of thing she feels comfortable expressing at the Leo Pocha Clinic, a federally financed Indian health clinic, where Jester comes regularly to manage her illness.

The clinic is one of five such facilities in Montana and 34 across the nation intended to serve about 70% of American Indians who live in urban areas, not on a tribal reservation.

But in a budget-cutting proposal that has set off protests and indignation among Indians from Los Angeles to New York and several smaller cities in between, the Bush administration has proposed eliminating funds for these clinics, which served about 106,000 Indians last year.

Under the plan, Native Americans in urban areas would use the already overburdened municipal clinics, hospitals and other health services that most Americans use — and that many Indians say have no concept of their traditional forms of care and healing, which are often used in tandem with modern healthcare.

Alternatively, under the plan, urban Indians could go to federally funded clinics on the reservation of the tribe to which they are registered. For many Indians, some of whom left those reservations because of crushing poverty and a lack of jobs, the latter option smacks of insult.

"They're basically saying, 'Go back to the Rez,' " said Donald L. Clayborn, executive director of the Helena Indian Alliance, which runs the clinic here. "There is an absolute sense of frustration over that message. They are trying to balance the budget on the backs of some of the poorest people in the nation."

Federal budget officials deny that is the case, arguing that the $33-million subsidy for the inner-city clinics provides an unnecessary duplication of services.

"Unlike Indian people living in isolated rural areas," President Bush's budget proposal says, "urban Indians can receive healthcare through a wide variety of federal, state and local providers."

If the cuts are adopted by Congress, at least half of the 34 clinics would face sudden closure, while the rest would have to curtail services, said Greg Fine of the National Council of Urban Indian Health, a nonprofit alliance in Washington.

Eight of the targeted clinics are in California, including United American Indian Involvement in downtown Los Angeles, near Good Samaritan Hospital; the San Diego American Indian Health Center; and American Indian Health & Services Corp. in Santa Barbara.

"In our clinic, we do have that real sense of being in an Indian environment," said David Rambeau, executive director of L.A.'s United American Indian Involvement, which has served about 15,000 Indians with medical problems over the last decade and receives about $800,000 in annual federal subsidies.

DOJ_NMG_0027800

"If a person is diabetic, we not only give them pills, we deal with their emotional part, we deal with the spiritual part," said Rambeau, a Paiute Indian. "That is definitely part of our program; that is what would be lost if Indian-oriented clinics have to close."

Here in Helena, the state capital, the Pocha Clinic clearly has more than just a medical function: It is something of a community center built around a clinic, with a food pantry, an after-school program for children to learn about Indian heritage, and meetings for Indians dealing with substance abuse. Indian quilts, buffalo hides and other decorations line the hallways in the small building along Last Chance Gulch, a downtown thoroughfare whose name dates to Helena's 19th century mining history.

"When you're Native American, it's honestly not that easy to express yourself, especially in a crowded place like a hospital," said Julie Gardipee-Chriske, 49, a Chippewa Cree Indian who deals with chronic pain from diabetes and persistent swelling, welts and cracking in her legs.

"If I lose this place, I'm someone that will probably die," said Gardipee-Chriske, a former tribal liaison with the U.S. Forest Service, explaining that she wouldn't go to an emergency room unless she felt horribly sick or someone took her there by force.

Jester, the Assiniboine Indian, left her reservation and took a seven-hour bus ride to Helena when she was 15 and pregnant. She was desperate to find work and a more hopeful place to raise her son, Jester said.

She found work as a cook and a home health aide, but still felt she was living as "a stranger in a strange land." Here at the clinic, she said, she has not only regained some of her health but has found a way to reconnect with her Indian identity.

"It would be insanity to close a place such as this," Jester said. "It would be like taking a knife to the Indian community."

Directors at the four other clinics in Montana — in Butte, Billings, Missoula and Great Falls — said they worried that their patients would be swallowed up or ignored by the non-Indian health system.

Indians suffer disproportionately from diabetes, obesity, tuberculosis and alcoholism, said Marjorie Bear Don't Walk, executive director of the Indian Health Board, which operates the clinic in Billings.

"A lot of our work is targeted at preventing these very problems," Bear Don't Walk said. "We have helped a lot of people, but these are the very people we worry about now, the kind of people who could disappear into the system, or perhaps maybe never even make it into the system at all."

Opponents See GOP Win (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn And Elana Schor

The Hill, May 2, 2006

Opponents of the House GOP leadership's upcoming lobbying and ethics reform bill were pessimistic yesterday that they could defeat it, noting that increased support among Democrats would likely offset any erosion of enthusiasm in the Republican ranks.

Republican leaders narrowly won a vote last week on a closed rule to bring the reform measure to the floor. The outcome of that vote signified that GOP leaders would face a tough, but not hopeless, battle to muster the votes to pass the lobbying reform measure itself this week.

Some Democrats are expected to break ranks tomorrow to vote for the bill itself, especially if they face competitive reelection races.

"Some members just want to take this issue off the table," a Democratic aide said. "They don't want to have to explain that they voted against this bill because they wanted a stronger bill."

Fewer than 10 Democrats are expected to cross over tomorrow, but it could be enough to eke out a victory.

A spokeswoman for House Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), who has been aggressively whipping against the bill, said Democrats would be "overwhelmingly unified" on the vote.

Meanwhile, on the Republican side, support is in flux. The 12 members who voted against the rule last week could change their votes, while others who voted for the rule may now indicate their disapproval.

Many Republicans voted against the rule to protest the idea of having a closed rule, which limits debate and amendments, on a reform measure.

DOJ_NMG_0027801

"While the bill has many positive reforms, members should have an opportunity to offer additional amendments. Congress needs to have a full and open debate on meaningful reforms," Rep. Steve Chabot (R-Ohio) said in a statement.

A Chabot spokesman said the congressman was still undecided on the bill itself.

A spokesman for Rep. Mark Green (R-Wis.), who also voted against the rule on the grounds that it didn't allow additional amendments, was similarly undecided.

"It's going to depend on what's in there," the spokesman said.

A reform advocate at watchdog group Public Citizen, which has called the bill a sham and urged members to vote against it, was disappointed that some Republicans would vote against the rule and then leave open the possibility of backing the measure itself.

"It seems like 12 might be the upper limit," said Public Citizen's Craig Holman. "We only got 12 on the rule, and that was seen as the easier vote for us because some members saw it as undemocratic."

The group issued a scathing statement yesterday calling the bill a "mockery of the lobbying-reform drive."

Some Republicans, such as Reps. Walter Jones (N.C.) and Joel Hefley (Colo.), were likely to stick with their no votes.

"I think we should have a full debate allowing amendments on the floor in open rules," Jones said. "I don't think this bill goes nearly as far as it should to win back the public trust."

Attendance is likely to play a key role in tomorrow's vote. Ten members were absent for the rule vote last week.

Rep. Solomon Ortiz (D-Texas), who missed the vote to visit an ill family member in Texas, is undecided, according to his spokeswoman, Cathy Travis. "He is still deliberating."

Rep. Ron Paul (R-Texas), a second absentee, is similarly undecided, said his spokesman, Jeff Deist.

A spokeswoman for Rep. Earl Blumenauer (D-Ore.), another absentee, said her boss would stick with his party and vote no tomorrow.

Meanwhile, Rep. Lane Evans (D-Ill.) has been ill and will miss tomorrow's vote.

Rep. Chaka Fattah (D-Pa.) had "an official leave of absence" last week and plans to oppose the bill this week, his spokesman said.

Outside the Beltway, Rep. Heather Wilson (R-N.M.) is taking heat from Democratic challenger Patsy Madrid, the state attorney general, for voting in favor of the rule Thursday after publicly calling for stronger ethics enforcement in the legislation.

In March, Wilson signed on to a proposal by Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.) for an independent Office of Public Integrity to police lawmakers and lobbyists for ethics violations. Wilson, Shays and Rep. Marty Meehan (D-Mass.) unsuccessfully pushed for a floor vote on the public-integrity plan as an amendment to Republican leaders' lobbying overhaul, but Wilson ultimately voted for the rule on the reform bill even as Shays and other GOP centrists cast a protest vote against it.

Madrid's campaign has hammered Wilson on ethics issues, prompting the fifth-term incumbent to return $10,000 of the $47,000 she received from the PAC of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas). Madrid's communications director, Heather Brewer, seized on Wilson's vote for the rule as an abdication of her support for the public-integrity office.

"She stood with Chris Shays and got media attention here for doing that. At the end of the day, where's the accountability?" Brewer said. "She makes a big splash over issues she thinks are going to resonate with voters and then doesn't follow up."

Wilson's office did not return a request for comment on whether her vote in favor of the rule on the lobbying bill signaled her support for the overall package, which is scheduled for a floor vote tomorrow.

In a statement released March 30, Wilson said: "The House reform bill must include the creation of a third-party ethics council," reiterating her support for the Office of Public Integrity.

Civil Service Steps Up Recruitment (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb And Christopher Lee

Washington Post, May 2, 2006

Civil service leaders announced a media campaign yesterday to lure talented applicants to the federal workforce at the same time that a new study says the government needs to do a more effective job of recruiting college students for federal jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0027802

Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management, said the agency will begin airing four 30-second television ads featuring federal employees touting the work they do and encouraging viewers to explore job opportunities at http://www.usajobs.gov/ . The ads come as the federal government faces an unprecedented wave of retirements among the baby-boom generation, with about 60 percent of the government's 1.8 million workers eligible to retire over the next 10 years.

"We often call it the retirement tsunami," Springer said. "We've got to get ready for it."

However, the new study by the nonprofit Partnership for Public Service, scheduled for release today, shows that federal officials have often failed to reach out to a group of people who might be expected to fill the jobs of departing civil servants: university students.

The partnership, whose mission is to entice talented people to consider federal careers, found that university students -- as measured by the responses of juniors, seniors and engineering graduate students at six universities -- say they lack the knowledge of federal jobs and internships necessary to map out career decisions.

Specifically, 54 percent of students said they did not feel knowledgeable about federal opportunities, compared with 13 percent who said they were very or extremely knowledgeable. Forty-two percent of students said they were very interested in federal jobs, slightly less than the percentage who said they were interested in private-sector spots.

Students said their biggest concern about taking a job in government was too much bureaucracy.

The OPM ads and the report come as the difficulty of maintaining a skilled federal workforce is building. The problem is especially critical at the uppermost levels of career bureaucrats, with 90 percent of Senior Executive Service members eligible to retire in the next decade.

Max Stier, president of the partnership, said the next generation of federal workers will think differently about their career paths than the generation that is about to retire.

"The generation that's leaving" believed in a system in which "they came into government for lifetime employment," Stier said. "The model no longer works today. This is a problem the government has never had to address before."

Springer acknowledged the new demands yesterday, saying the government must offer more flexible work arrangements. "We can't just bank on employees today in the 21st century that want to come work in a bricks-and-mortar building and stay there for 20, 30 or 40 years," she said. "It's not going to happen."

The partnership's report urges the government to create substantive relationships with colleges and universities, pool resources of agencies to recruit for certain careers, stress the public-service component of government work and tailor recruitment with as much face-to-face effort as possible.

Springer also said OPM and other agencies must redouble their efforts to simplify the red-tape-laden federal hiring process, which is notorious for leaving job applicants in the dark for months. And OPM is encouraging workers who could retire over the next few years to stick around longer, perhaps through new part-time arrangements.

An area of acute concern is workers with technical skills. The Defense Department needs to hire 6,000 engineers annually, while various agencies need 2,000 information technology experts, according to the partnership. About 12,500 new air traffic controllers will be needed over the next 10 years. At the same time, scientific proficiency in U.S. schools is not keeping pace with that in foreign schools.

"The numbers are dramatic," said Doris Hausser, an OPM senior policy adviser. "The university systems of foreign competitors are generating engineers and scientists at a much higher rate than we are. That's not to say we don't have good engineering schools, but what needs to happen is for federal agencies to establish good working relationships with the departments at some of these schools."

The partnership's report said engineering students tend to be less interested in federal jobs than others, with only a quarter having actually sought information about them.

The report reflects the views of 3,200 students who responded to a survey sent to about 31,000 students at Clark Atlanta University, George Washington University, Louisiana State, Ohio State, Stanford and the University of New Mexico. At Ohio State, only language and engineering students were surveyed.

Ohio State engineering seniors Andrew Bramnik and Erica Nollen chose different paths to employment, illustrating some of the challenges and successes of federal recruitment.

DOJ_NMG_0027803

Bramnik, 22, an electrical engineer, stopped at the booth of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission at a job fair last fall and talked to a representative for about 20 minutes. He was then invited to an interview in Illinois and visited a training room simulating a nuclear power station.

Soon after, though he was still talking to several companies about lucrative positions, he accepted a post in the commission's nuclear material safety branch. "I have friends who have accepted employment with other companies who will be starting in more entry-level, low-level positions," he said. "I get the feeling that going to work for the NRC is going to give me an opportunity to learn and progress a lot, while studying and being trained."

And, Bramnik said, "I've always known I wanted to do something with my engineering background that could provide a benefit to society."

Nollen, 22, a mechanical engineer, considered a job with the Puget Sound Naval Shipyard in Washington state but elected instead to be a consultant for McKinsey & Co., which offered her several thousand dollars more in salary. After an interview on campus about the shipyard position, she flew to Puget Sound for a tour. Officials there explained that though the pay was less than what the private sector offered, other benefits, such as a 40-hour workweek or guaranteed overtime, would make up for that gap.

Yet Nollen said she was worried that officials didn't put much effort into tailoring a position to her interests in strategic management. McKinsey, she said, conducted a demanding series of interviews that probed her career interests clearly.

"It wasn't necessarily that I didn't want to work for the government," Nollen said. "I don't know how they got a good read on me being a fit or not. It was just such a short screening process. You want to make sure you're getting the right people in the job."

Objective: Replace Retirees (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

The government will soon need recruits to help it ride out a coming wave of retirements. At the same time, it wants to hang on to its experienced hands for as long as possible.

That was the message yesterday from Linda M. Springer , director of the Office of Personnel Management, as she announced the launch of a television advertising campaign to showcase important and interesting jobs in the civil service.

"We aren't as well known as we probably ought to be," Springer said. "We're not really good in the civilian workforce side of making known these great [employment] opportunities."

The armed forces have long run TV ads to boost military recruiting, and the OPM's effort is a first for the agency, which oversees government-wide personnel policies and benefits.

About 60 percent of the 1.8 million civil service employees will be eligible to retire in the next 10 years and 40 percent of them will leave, based on the government's past experience with retirements, Springer said. She noted that 90 percent of federal executives will be eligible to retire in the next decade.

"We are not being overly dramatic here," Springer said. "It is a big number, and we've got to do something to get ready for it."

As the baby-boom generation departs, Springer has asked agencies to work with the OPM on ways to speed up their hiring and to offer alternatives to the traditional 20- and 30-year careers that have been the mainstay of the federal workforce.

The next generation of workers may be drawn to jobs that allow people to come and go from government and offer flexible working hours and chances to telecommute, she said.

The OPM's inaugural TV ad campaign features four federal employees -- Elizabeth N. Mazzae , a human factors engineer with the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration; Maxine M. Brown , a branch chief who manages software development and maintenance for the National Weather Service's environmental prediction centers; Walter W. Douglas , the South Carolina state conservationist at the Agriculture Department's Natural Resource Conservation Service; and Earl H. Stockdale , chief counsel at the Army Corps of Engineers.

They appear in 30-second spots showing them on the job and reminding viewers that people in public service make a difference in the lives of citizens. The ads will start airing in the Flint and Saginaw region of Michigan and in the Greenville-

DOJ_NMG_0027804

Spartanburg area of South Carolina next week. Much of the work on the advertising campaign was done in-house at the OPM, and officials estimated the total cost for the initial effort at about $184,000.

In addition to making the point that the government needs to ramp up its recruiting efforts, Springer also made a pitch to would-be retirees to stay on the job as long as possible.

She noted that many federal retirees start a second career, either to maintain their lifestyle or to avoid boredom, and she urged them to think about remaining in the federal service to help their agencies cope with the generational transition that is coming.

The president's fiscal 2007 budget, she said, would offer employees a way to move in steps toward retirement. The proposal would permit employees covered by the Civil Service Retirement System to work part time in the latter stages of their careers without facing a reduction in their pensions, as current law requires. The proposed change requires the approval of Congress.

Although OPM's ad campaign will focus on the government as an employer, some agencies have run targeted ad campaigns to boost hiring. Last year, for example, the FBI launched its first national TV ads to attract potential employees.

The government's hiring challenges go beyond ad campaigns, however. Many job applicants complain about the red tape in federal hiring and lack of feedback from agencies on where their applications stand. Requirements for security clearances also slow hiring.

Finding job applicants with advanced degrees and specialized skills also is a challenge for many agencies. Yesterday, for example, the nonprofit Partnership for Public Service sponsored a Capitol Hill forum, featuring Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), on efforts to recruit and retain persons who can speak Arabic, Chinese, Hindi, Korean, Farsi and other languages where there are shortages of talent.

Pelosi Urges Hastert To Probe Alleged Prostitution (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, May 2, 2006

In a move sure to increase the already high level of partisan tensions over alleged corruption in Congress, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) on Monday called for an ethics committee investigation into whether two defense contractors supplied now-imprisoned former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.) and other lawmakers with prostitutes, free hotel rooms and limousine rides.

Citing media reports, Pelosi wrote to Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) to urge the House's top Republican to join her in introducing a bipartisan resolution that directs the ethics panel to look into the allegations, notwithstanding an ongoing criminal probe by the Justice Department into Cunningham's activities. Traditionally, the ethics committee has avoided becoming involved in any matter in which DOJ has already begun a criminal investigation.

"Mr. Speaker, these disclosures, along with other indictments and allegations of unethical behavior, demand strong action by congressional leaders to uphold the integrity of the House," Pelosi wrote in her letter to Hastert. "Since these new charges uniquely affect the House of Representatives, I believe that, regardless of what action may be taken in the [Justice Department] criminal investigation, the House must act."

The issue of prostitutes and other illegal gratuities being provided to lawmakers beyond Cunningham was first raised by the San Diego Union-Tribune last year, and The Wall Street Journal added more details in an article last week.

According to the Journal, Mitchell Wade, a California defense contractor who in February pleaded guilty to paying hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes to Cunningham, has told federal investigators that Cunningham would call him and ask him to procure prostitutes. Another defense contractor implicated in the Cunningham scandal, Brent Wilkes, allegedly provided hotel rooms for Cunningham and other lawmakers, as well as finding a limousine company that allegedly had "relationships" with Washington, D.C.-area "escort services."

The limousine company in question, Shirlington Limousine & Transportation Inc., won a $21.2 million contract with the Department of Homeland Security last year to provide "shuttle services and executive transportation support" to the agency.

Wilkes has not been charged with any wrongdoing, and his lawyer insists Wilkes has done nothing illegal or improper.

DOJ_NMG_0027805

Democrats, however, are using the stories to open a new front with the GOP leadership over the "culture of corruption" that they say has been brought to Capitol Hill and the White House by the GOP.

"Please join me in drafting and bringing to the floor this week a bipartisan resolution directing the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct to determine whether other Members of the House participated in unethical or illegal conduct related to the Cunningham conviction," Pelosi wrote.

Ron Bonjean, Hastert's spokesman, said that House leaders from both parties should not dictate to the ethics committee what it should investigate.

Bonjean also criticized Pelosi for having to replace Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.) as the ranking member on the ethics panel after the FBI began looking into his financial dealings with a handful of nonprofit groups he created or controls.

"The ethics committee should decide this, not the Minority Leader who just removed her top Democrat from the panel due to allegedly corrupt behavior," Bonjean said.

CIA Confirms Official Attended Poker Games (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

The Central Intelligence Agency confirmed its third-ranking official, Executive Director Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, attended poker games in Washington, D.C., hotel hospitality suites, the use of which is the focus of a federal criminal investigation.

A CIA spokeswoman said Mr. Foggo strongly denies anything improper occurred while he was present during the games, held at times in the Watergate and Westin Grand hotels in Washington.

As reported, federal prosecutors in San Diego and Federal Bureau of Investigation agents have evidence the suites were paid for by Poway, Calif., defense contractor Brent Wilkes, an unindicted co-conspirator in the bribery case involving former California congressman Randall "Duke" Cunningham.

Mr. Foggo's longstanding friendship with Mr. Wilkes has been known for months, after it was detailed in the San Diego Union Tribune and other news outlets. The CIA hadn't commented until now on Mr. Foggo's socializing with Mr. Wilkes.

Prosecutors are looking into whether Mr. Wilkes and contractor Mitchell Wade, who has pleaded guilty to bribing Mr. Cunningham, had supplied prostitutes and the suites' use to Mr. Cunningham and possibly other members of Congress from the 1990s until 2005. The CIA in March confirmed that its inspector general is investigating the relationship between Messrs. Foggo and Wilkes, to see whether Mr. Foggo may have played any improper role in the awarding of CIA contracts to Mr. Wilkes's companies. A 27-year CIA veteran, Mr. Foggo became the agency's executive director in 2004. His duties have included overseeing the letting of CIA contracts. The two have been close friends since junior high school.

The CIA has said that the inspector general's inquiry was a routine response to public allegations of improprieties involving contracts and that launching the investigation didn't imply evidence of wrongdoing. CIA spokeswoman Jennifer Millerwise Dyck said "Mr. Foggo maintains that government contracts for which he was responsible were properly awarded and administered. If he attended occasional card games with friends over the years, Mr. Foggo insists they were that and nothing more." She said Mr. Foggo says he never witnessed any prostitutes at the games and that any allegation to the contrary would be "false, outrageous and irresponsible."

Mr. Wilkes' lawyer has denied his client had any involvement in hiring prostitutes.

Sour News For GOP In Poll (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON — Six months before Republicans try to hold on to control of Congress in the fall elections, a new poll shows President Bush has slid to the lowest approval rating of his presidency, and a majority of voters say they'll vote for Democrats in November.

A USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Friday through Sunday found Bush's approval rating at 34%, two points under his previous low. He also received the lowest ratings of his presidency on his handling of the economy, energy and foreign affairs. He tied his previous low on Iraq: 32%.

DOJ_NMG_0027806

The poll showed Democrats leading 54%-39% among registered voters who were asked which party they would prefer in a congressional race.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said the president is not focused on polls but "on achieving results for the American people."

A spokesman for the House Republicans' campaign committee, Carl Forti, said unhappiness with Bush doesn't doom the GOP's 29-seat House majority because "President Bush is not on the ballot."

Forti also noted that the poll showed 59% of respondents said their own representative deserves to be re-elected. However, poll data show that's the lowest percentage since 1994, when Republicans won control of Congress from the Democrats.

Sarah Feinberg, a spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said voters are linking Bush's problems to his GOP colleagues: "The American people want change."

Since 1950, there have been six times when presidents had Gallup approval ratings below 50% in the spring as their party sought to keep control of Congress. The president's party lost House seats in all six years, ranging from five in 1968 to 54 in 1994.

A 15-seat switch in November would give the Democrats a majority in the House. A six-seat switch would give Democrats control of the Senate.

The poll comes as the Iraq war and a sharp increase in gasoline prices have contributed to public uneasiness.

Bush has repeatedly said he does not pay attention to opinion polls. At a fundraiser last week for Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., he said he wants congressional colleagues "who don't listen to polls and focus groups but stand strong for what they think we're doing right."

Talks Held With At-risk Republicans (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, May 2, 2006

Demonstrating concern about retaining the majority in November, the office of House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) is holding weekly meetings with a handful of staffers of potentially vulnerable Republicans.

The sessions are part of a larger outreach effort by the majority leader to improve communications with every member of the Republican Conference.

The weekly gatherings are an opportunity for the leader's staff to walk the rank-and-file staffers through the upcoming agenda and hear from the offices about the political climate in some of the party's most competitive districts. The member input provides insights and intelligence from campaigns across the country that leaders can use to influence their legislative agenda and strategy during a bitter election year.

Former Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) used his regular meetings with the committee chairmen for the same purpose. Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) and his chief deputy whip, Rep. Eric Cantor (R-Va.), rely on their whip network to gauge support for bills and hold "listening sessions" with small groups of Republicans in preparation for many of the toughest votes.

The meetings with the staffs of vulnerable members occur once a week when the House is in session, Boehner spokesman Kevin Madden said, and staff from 12 offices usually attend.

Some of the members involved include Republican Reps. Steve Chabot (Ohio), Mike Fitzpatrick (Pa.), Jim Gerlach (Pa.), Bob Ney (Ohio), Dave Reichert (Wash.), Clay Shaw (Fla.) and Heather Wilson (N.M.). Each of those members' districts is among the party's most competitive, according to a chart compiled by The Cook Political Report.

Greg Maurer, who directs member services for the majority leader, organized the meetings soon after Boehner assumed the title of leader. The hour-long sessions are equal parts briefing and discussion about the agenda and overall communications strategy for the week.

Jo-Marie St. Martin, Boehner's general counsel, begins most meetings by walking staffers through the floor schedule for the coming week. Then Maurer turns it over to Madden, who briefs the assembled chiefs of staff and press aides about the national communications strategy.

The rank-and-file staffers then tell Boehner's team how particular issues, such as the Medicare prescription-drug benefit or lobbying reform, are playing in their bosses' districts.

DOJ_NMG_0027807

"It's tremendous help," said Eric Eikenberg, Shaw's chief of staff. "It gives us an opportunity to raise questions and have a direct dialogue."

With the elections approaching, many of these members are also encouraging leaders to move on key pieces of legislation so that they can tout those accomplishments back home.

"Gas prices and job creation are the two most important issues in [Ohio's 18th Congressional District]," Ney spokesman Brian Walsh wrote yesterday while accompanying Ney on a tour of his eastern Ohio district. "And it's clear that [Republican leaders] are listening to the Members and their constituents" by bringing energy initiatives to the floor later this week.

Likewise, Madden said, the meetings give Boehner's staff a good sampling of what local media outlets have been saying about the controversial Medicare prescription-drug benefit in the months leading up to the May 15 sign-up deadline.

With limited days remaining on the legislative calendar and an increasingly difficult political dynamic in the House itself, Republican leaders must be more selective in the bills they choose to bring to the floor. They are still struggling to pass lobbying reform, which is expected to be back on the floor tomorrow, and were forced to pull the budget early last month when it was clear they lacked the votes necessary to pass it.

"We make every effort to work with key staff in these offices to sync up our legislative and communications offices so they have the very best access and the very best information about what issues the conference is working on and how we can help them message with constituents back home," Madden said of the outreach effort with Republican incumbents in difficult districts.

Boehner's office also holds similar meetings with the staffs of freshman members to encourage communications.

Some members and staff have grumbled about the heavy itinerary of meetings, but most are happy to share more face time with the leader and his staff.

Boehner's staff would still like to take another stab at passing the annual budget, and meetings like these with vulnerable members will give Boehner's office insight into whether or not that's a realistic goal.

Shaw, who faces Democratic state Sen. Ron Klein, would like to see the House pass its budget bill this year, despite the political sensitivities of the vote.

"It's the roadmap," Shaw said, adding that the budget is the only mechanism Congress employs to build consensus on the annual spending requests that come out of each committee. "I could drive to Fort Lauderdale without a map, but it's easier if I have one."

In this difficult election year, leaders must account for the fragile political terrain on every vote and message campaign.

"There is an atmosphere out there that doesn't favor incumbents," Shaw said. "Boehner has really opened communications."

The 'Gang Of 14' Compromise Was A Victory For The GOP (RC)

By Cesar Conda

Roll Call, May 2, 2006

Last spring, 14 Senators — seven Republicans and seven Democrats — forged a compromise on President Bush's judicial nominees that conservatives roundly and universally criticized. Yet almost one year later, it turns out the Republican Senators of the "Gang of 14" were mostly right — at least so far.

Under the pact, the Republicans agreed not to support a Senate rule change to prohibit filibusters on judicial nominees, a maneuver known among Republicans as the "constitutional option" and among Democrats as the "nuclear option." The Democrats, meanwhile, agreed to end their filibusters against Bush's judicial nominees, including Supreme Court nominees, except in "extraordinary circumstances."

The gang's Republicans — Mike DeWine of Ohio, Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe of Maine, John Warner of Virginia, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, John McCain of Arizona and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island — were attacked from the right for their supposed betrayal of the party and of the people. The compromise was viewed, in their minds, as a capitulation — a surrender of Republicans' ability to force an up-or-down vote on all judicial nominees.

Perhaps because he is a staunch pro-life champion, DeWine took the brunt of the conservatives' wrath. For instance, the Family Research Council ran radio ads in Ohio urging voters to tell DeWine that "they were not happy with his backroom deal."

DOJ_NMG_0027808

Phil Burress, a Cincinnati-based conservative activist, said that the Senator "basically stabbed pro-life people in the back by joining the Gang of 14."

At that time, I, too, had reservations about the agreement because I thought the Democrats would broadly define the term "extraordinary circumstances" to justify continued filibusters of the president's judicial nominees, including nominees to the Supreme Court.

But since the agreement went into effect, seven of Bush's previously blocked nominees — some of whom were waiting for more than four years to get a vote in the Senate — are now judges in the United States Courts of Appeal. Those who criticized DeWine should know that three judges have taken their seats in the 6th Circuit covering Ohio. These judges are now interpreting law and shaping the legal landscape in the country's second highest courts. Their effect will be felt for years to come.

And, of course, the Republicans were able to confirm Chief Justice of the United States John Roberts and Associate Justice Samuel Alito. Not too bad for a group that allegedly ceded control of the nomination process to the Democrats and liberal interest groups.

While conservative columnist Charles Krauthammer bemoaned that the seven judges would not be approved by the Senate, they were. He complained that the agreement of the Gang of 14 would never "go nuclear." But DeWine, for example, repeatedly admonished the Democrats during the Alito nomination that he would do exactly that. And, his cautionary remarks worked: The Democrats did not mount a filibuster against Alito.

The deal worked exactly as designed and ensured that the Republicans were able to fill the two most important judicial openings that have existed during the Bush presidency. That is an unprecedented victory — not just for conservatives and Republicans, but for our entire nation as well.

Senate Republicans must do more to get conservative appellate judges confirmed. Because of four and a half years of opposition from Michigan Democratic Sens. Carl Levin and Debbie Stabenow, Michigan Judge Henry Saad recently withdrew his nomination to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit. Senate Republicans should have pushed for an up-or-down vote on Saad's nomination, thereby forcing Stabenow, who is up for re-election in November, to either support Saad or explain to her significant Arab-American constituency why she opposed an outstanding jurist who would have been the first Arab-American judge on the 6th Circuit.

Highly qualified nominees, such as U.S. District Judge Terrence Boyle, White House staff secretary Brett Kavanaugh, Department of Defense General Counsel William Haynes and Mississippi lawyer Michael Wallace, continue to languish in the Senate for no legitimate reason.

For the Gang of 14 compromise to be a success, the group's Republican members should press their leadership and their Democratic gang members to confirm Boyle, Kavanaugh, Haynes, Wallace and other Bush nominees this year. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) recently announced his intention to bring Kavanaugh's 3-year-old nomination to the Senate floor sometime this month. For Bush, a renewed fight over conservative judges against the likes of Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) just might be the cure to the Republican Party's current political doldrums.

Cesar Conda, former assistant for domestic policy to Vice President Cheney, is a senior fellow at FreedomWorks and a principal of Navigators LLC.

OTHER NEWS:

Economy's Hot Streak Continues (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

The first significant piece of economic data for April reinforced the widening view that the U.S. economy entered the second quarter with a good deal of momentum. But a whiff of inflation fueled concern that the Federal Reserve will be forced to step harder on the brakes.

DOJ_NMG_0027809

The Institute for Supply Management, a purchasing managers' trade group, said yesterday that its index of manufacturing activity came in at 57.3 for April, higher than expected and up from 55.2 in March. Any level above 50 suggests that the manufacturing sector is growing. A reading in the mid-50s is strong for an economy already in its fifth year of expansion.

"It's an impressive number," said Peter Kretzmer, senior economist at Bank of America in New York. "With businesses feeling good and starting to hire, that adds to personal income and is likely to keep consumer spending going, even if other elements are slowing it down."

A drop in the new-orders component of the ISM index, however, suggests that April's number might be more an echo of a strong first quarter than a sign of things to come. "We'll have to see how well that translates into future growth," said Norbert Ore, who oversees the index and serves as procurement director at Georgia-Pacific Corp.

Separately, two reports from the Commerce Department showed U.S. consumers going strong in March. Personal consumption rose 0.6%, and a jump in home improvements helped boost construction spending by 0.9%. Both numbers were higher than economists' expectations for the month.

Economists said that after adjusting for inflation, personal spending was on a trajectory to rise at an annualized rate of about 3% in the second quarter, compared with 5.5% in the first quarter. That is consistent with expectations that the economy's rate of growth will slow in the current quarter, as higher gasoline prices and a cooling housing market make consumers feel poorer.

Personal income rose 0.8% in March, double the rate economists expected. A $40 billion annualized jump in payments under Medicare prescription-drug benefits accounted for most of the increase, but wages and salaries also rose at a healthy 0.4% rate, indicating that consumers are benefiting from a stronger job market. People kept spending beyond their immediate means: Expenditures exceeded disposable income by $32.5 billion, or 0.3%.

The Commerce Department also reported a larger-than-expected increase in its index of consumer-goods prices -- a number that Fed officials watch closely for signs of inflationary pressures. The "core" index, which excludes food and fuel, rose 0.3% in March and 2% for the 12 months ending in March, at the top of the 1% to 2% range that the Fed considers acceptable.

The inflation number led more investors to bet that the Fed will take its short-term interest-rate target a notch higher, to 5.25%, at its June policy-making meeting, after an expected increase to 5% from 4.75% at its May 10 meeting. In early afternoon trading, the futures market put the probability of a June increase at about one-in-three, compared with odds of about one-in-four last week.

In statements to Congress last week, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke suggested that the Fed might take a break in June from two years of consistent rate increases, but the new inflation data will "make the case for a pause at the June meeting a little difficult," said John Ryding, chief U.S. economist at Bear Stearns in New York.

Until recently, U.S. manufacturers' good fortunes hadn't translated much into jobs and gains in household income, as companies found ways to produce more with the same workers and equipment. But recent robust jobs data suggest that they are getting to the point where they need to boost capacity to keep growing -- a factor that could mitigate any slowdown in consumer spending. In March, companies added 211,000 jobs to nonfarm payrolls. The government will release April jobs data Friday.

"We try to do lean manufacturing, but there's a point where you're bumping up against capacity and you're going to need to add more people," said Tony Raimondo Jr., president of Behlen Country, a division of Behlen Mfg. Co., of Columbus, Neb. He said Behlen Country, which makes ranch equipment such as horse stalls and dog kennels, is already hiring at one plant in Oregon.

Construction And Consumer Spending Rise (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

Strong demand for homes, cars and other big-ticket goods kept the economy moving at a brisk pace in March, according to reports released today.

The Commerce Department said personal spending and income increased more than economists had projected and inflation rose modestly in the month. Another government report showed construction spending jumped 0.9 percent, with most of the gains coming from home building. And a closely-watched report on the sentiments of manufacturers showed that managers were more optimistic about the economy in April than March.

DOJ_NMG_0027810

Bonds traded down after the reports were released as investors bet that the strong economic momentum and hints of inflation would force the Federal Reserve to increase short-term interest rates twice more before stopping their nearly two-year campaign to raise rates. At midday, the yield on the 10-year Treasury note, which moves in the opposite direction of the price, was 5.126 percent, up from 5.053 percent late Friday. Stocks were up mixed.

Personal spending increased by 0.6 percent in March after rising 0.2 percent in February and 0.9 percent in January. The biggest jump was seen in services, up 0.7 percent, and durable goods, up 0.5 percent. Economists had expected spending to rise by 0.4 percent, according to a survey by Bloomberg News.

Personal incomes jumped 0.8 percent, with about half the increase coming from the federal government's new Medicare prescription drug plan. Incomes increased 0.3 percent in February and 0.7 percent in January, and analysts had expected an increase of 0.4 percent in March. Wages, salaries and other forms of compensation increased by 0.5 percent.

Prices for personal spending on items other than food and energy rose at an annualized rate of 2 percent, up from 1.8 percent in February and at the high end of the range that Fed officials consider healthy. Inflation including food and energy was at 2.9 percent, unchanged from February.

In deciding whether it should raise short-term rates, now at 4.75 percent, again at its meetings on May 10 and June 29, the Fed will have to weigh the pickup in prices and strong signs of growth against signs that the economy may start to lose some of its current vigor because of higher gasoline prices, now about $3 a gallon in many parts of the country, and rising interest rates for mortgages and home equity loans.

Ben S. Bernanke, the chairman of the Federal Reserve, told a Congressional committee last week that the Fed may hold up rate increases to give policy makers more time to evaluate the competing signals from different statistics.

Another reason to pause and take stock is that the economy has not fully registered the impact of the 15 rate increases since June 2004 or of the rising oil and gasoline prices yet, said Gregory Miller, chief economist at Suntrust Banks in Atlanta. "Policy takes time to resonate through the economy," he said.

The Institute of Supply Management said today that its index of manufacturing managers rose to 57.3 from 55. A reading greater than 50 indicates managers are generally optimistic about their businesses' prospects for growth.

Dollar Declines On Trade Deficit (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

The U.S. dollar is having a sinking spell -- which is good news for U.S. manufacturers and bad news for American tourists traveling abroad. Spurring the greenback's slide are recent statements by top economic policymakers, notably declarations about the need to reduce global trade imbalances.

The dollar has suffered sharp losses against other currencies the past two weeks, and yesterday it hit a fresh, seven-month low against the Japanese yen. Although it rallied yesterday afternoon against the euro, it fell to an 11-month low against the European currency earlier in the day and is down nearly 6 percent against the euro since late February.

Some of the strongest gains against the U.S. currency have come from the Canadian dollar. The "loonie" rose to 89.82 cents late yesterday afternoon -- it was around 85 U.S. cents at the beginning of last month -- and at one point yesterday, it touched 89.97 U.S. cents, the highest since 1978.

Like previous swoons in the U.S. dollar, the latest one has come during renewed attention to the U.S. trade deficit, which swelled to $723.6 billion last year and was the focus of discussion at high-level international meetings last month.

The currency shift means that Americans must shell out more dollars for foreign goods while foreigners can buy U.S.-made goods for fewer yen, euros and pounds. That is why U.S. travelers overseas will see their hotel bills and restaurant meals rise in dollar terms and why U.S. exporters are hoping that if the dollar continues its decline, they will get more orders from abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0027811

"This could be a trigger to start a slide down," said Franklin J. Vargo, vice president for international economic affairs at the National Association of Manufacturers. "I don't envision a collapse. But everyone's waiting to see -- will these steps start a trend? We certainly hope they do."

The dollar's recent move is a reversal of its pattern during much of last year, when rising interest rates made investments in U.S. Treasury bonds and other securities more attractive and drew investors into the U.S. currency. Although interest rates in the United States have continued to head upward, many traders expect rising rates on securities elsewhere -- especially Japan and Europe -- to narrow the gap. That is especially true since last week's comments by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, which were interpreted by financial markets as suggesting that the U.S. central bank would stop raising rates at least temporarily.

Also fueling the dollar's descent were pronouncements last month by officials of the Group of Seven major industrial nations indicating deepening concern about the U.S. trade deficit and the corresponding surpluses in Asia and oil-exporting nations. The trade gap has long been a source of worry for many economists because as Americans buy massive amounts of goods from abroad, the dollars they pay are piling up in the hands of foreign investors, who could eventually lose confidence in the U.S. economy and dump their holdings in a panic.

At the spring meetings of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, the G-7 declared their recognition that shrinking the trade gap will require action by many countries, and they created a stir in markets by prodding Asian nations in particular to let their currencies rise. "In emerging Asia, particularly China, greater flexibility in exchange rates is critical to allow necessary appreciations," the G-7 communique said.

In addition to exhorting China to end its system of pegging its currency to the dollar, that statement suggested that the dollar should decline against currencies such as the South Korean won and Indonesian rupiah, and that Asian governments should refrain from their frequent practice of intervening in currency markets. Asian officials have often sought to keep their currencies cheap to give their exporters an extra competitive edge.

"There's a perception in the market -- a correct perception, I think -- that the [trade gap] is at such a high level that it's been moved to the front burner in U.S. policy," said Steven Englander, chief currency strategist for the Americas at Barclays Capital Inc. in New York. And the policies needed to shrink the imbalance, he added, "mean a substantially weaker dollar."

It is unclear, however, whether Asian countries will abide by the G-7 prescriptions. The steep rise in the Korean won prompted Kim Sung Jin, Korea's deputy finance minister, to warn, "the won's gain is too fast," adding, "We will take appropriate measures if necessary." Some traders have said they think the government may be resuming its previous policy of purchasing massive amounts of dollars to keep the won from moving upward.

Stocks Fall On Report Fed Chief Meant Rate Increases May Pause, Not End (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

After spending most of the day in positive territory, stocks suddenly slumped after a late-day television report that Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke isn't as dovish on interest rates as investors had believed.

CNBC anchor Maria Bartiromo reported that she had seen Mr. Bernanke at the White House Correspondents Dinner during the weekend, and that he said investors misinterpreted his congressional testimony Thursday as a signal that the Fed is almost done raising rates. Ms. Bartiromo said Mr. Bernanke told her that the Fed is trying to be "flexible" in its response to economic data, and that it might pause in its rate increases and then raise rates again later. A Federal Reserve representative declined to comment.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average, which was showing a gain of about 49 points when Ms. Bartiromo spoke, finished down 23.85 points, or 0.21%, at 11343.29. The Dow still is up 5.8% this year, and is less than 400 points below its January 2000 record finish of 11722.98.

Bond prices, already down, fell further on the report, pushing the yield of the 10-year Treasury note to a four-year high.

"If he really did say the market misinterpreted his comments last Thursday, you have to expect the Fed to be more aggressive" in raising interest rates in the future, said Jay Suskind, director of trading at brokerage firm Ryan Beck in Florham Park, N.J. Higher rates make life more expensive for businesses and consumers, which can be bad for stocks.

DOJ_NMG_0027812

Thursday, Mr. Bernanke told Congress the Fed could take a break from rate increases at some future meeting, in order to analyze data. That was widely taken as a signal that, after one further increase in its target for short-term rates at its next policy meeting, May 10, the Fed could stop its long-running rate-increase campaign in June. Now investors fear Mr. Bernanke is sending the message that he could raise rates more. They also worry that they were wrong in thinking that his comments would be easy to understand.

"His whole thing was that he was going to try to be more visible and transparent than Greenspan was, and less opaque," Mr. Suskind said.

Earlier in the day, with interest-rate increases seemingly not a worry, investors had applauded Wal-Mart Stores' report of robust April sales, as well as a series of strong economic reports on manufacturing growth, construction spending and consumer spending. They had been shrugging off a surge in crude-oil futures, which finished the day up $1.82 at $73.70 a barrel. Now they worry that a strong economy could provoke more rate increases.

Gold finished the day at a 25-year high, up $5.70 at $657.50 a troy ounce.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.41%, or 5.42 points, to 1305.19, up 4.6% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index declined 0.77%, or 17.78 points, to 2304.79, ahead 4.5% for 2006.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.63%, or 1.43 points, to a record 226.73.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.41 billion shares, as 1,467 stocks rose and 1,823 fell.

Bond prices declined2. The 10-year Treasury note fell 18/32, or $5.625 for each $1,000 invested. The 30-year bond was down 28/32 to yield 5.230%.

The dollar was mixed3. Late in New York, the currency traded at 113.25 yen, down from 113.86, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2591 from $1.2616.

Fears Of Rate Hikes Take Wind Out Of Sails (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, May 2, 2006

NEW YORK — The broad U.S. stock market was on the verge of posting a five-year high Monday but ended in the red after a late-afternoon report on CNBC left the door open for more interest rate increases by the Federal Reserve.

Last week, stocks rallied after Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke suggested in his prepared remarks Thursday to Congress that the Fed was nearing the end of its nearly two-year-long interest rate-raising campaign and might pause after raising rates for the 16th-consecutive time at its May 10 meeting.

But a report on the business channel aired Monday noted that Bernanke said over the weekend that financial markets had misinterpreted the Fed's language last week and that Fed policy remained “flexible.” He also reiterated that the Fed rate decisions would be determined by economic data.

Investors interpreted Bernanke's comments as a signal the Fed may not pause after all, sparking fears that the target for short-term rates, at 4.75%, could top the hoped-for stopping point of 5%. “Everybody is again trying to second guess what the Fed is going to do,” says Joe Williams, portfolio manager at Commerce Trust. “The assumption is when they stop, the market will do well. But we are at a very delicate time.”

It's a delicate time because despite sky-high oil prices and 15 rate increases since June 2004, the economy keeps chugging along. That was confirmed Monday with a report showing U.S. manufacturing boomed more than expected in April, a record high jump in construction spending in March, as well as bigger-than-expected increases in personal income and consumption.

Those reports again fueled fears of increased inflation. The Dow, which had been comfortably in the black, closed down 23.85 points, or 0.2%, to 11,343.29. The Standard & Poor's 500, which had hit a five-year high intraday, fell 5.42 points, 0.4%, to 1305.19. The Nasdaq composite also took it on the chin, sliding 17.78 points, or 0.8%, to 2304.79.

DOJ_NMG_0027813

The price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note also fell, pushing the yield, which moves in the opposite direction, to 5.14%, a four-year high.

David Sowerby, money manager at Loomis Sayles, says Bernanke's comments did not necessarily rule out the Fed pausing after raising rates at its May 10 meeting. Sowerby says he will be closely watching what the Fed does and says that day.

Investors Misunderstood Bernanke Testimony, CNBC Anchor Says (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

Stock prices fell yesterday after CNBC, the financial news cable television network, reported that Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said investors would be wrong to think the central bank has finished raising interest rates.

Bernanke had told Congress on Thursday that the Fed might pause in its series of interest rate increases, even if high oil prices and strong economic growth threaten to push inflation higher.

Stocks rallied then as investors concluded the Fed is likely to rest after raising its benchmark short-term interest rate just once more in May, for a 16th consecutive hike.

"Ben Bernanke . . . told me over the weekend the media and the markets got it wrong last week in speculating the Fed is done raising interest rates," CNBC anchor Maria Bartiromo said at about 3:15 p.m. during her afternoon program. "I asked him whether the markets got it right after his congressional testimony, and he said, flatly, no."

Stock prices dropped sharply after Bartiromo's description of a conversation she said she held with the new Fed chairman at the White House Correspondents' Association Dinner on Saturday night. The Dow Jones industrial average closed at 11,343.29, down 23.85 points, or 0.2 percent, as investors reconsidered the possibility of several more Fed rate hikes. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index lost 5.42 points, or 0.4 percent, to close at 1305.19. The Nasdaq composite index fell 17.78, or 0.8 percent, to 2304.79.

Bernanke and the Fed declined to comment on Bartiromo's report. He has not spoken for publication to any other reporters since becoming Fed chairman Feb. 1.

Bernanke did not say Thursday when the Fed might pause or how high it will move short-term interest rates before it stops tightening credit. He said the Fed will be closely monitoring whether the economy slows and whether inflationary pressures ebb as forecast in coming months.

The Fed chairman on Saturday said he was "trying to basically create some flexibility for the Federal Reserve, saying the Fed may pause, but the data will really dictate whether more rate hikes will occur at future meetings," Bartiromo said.

Inflation picked up in March, as consumer incomes and spending rose strongly, the Commerce Department reported yesterday. Consumer prices rose 0.4 percent in March, after edging up just 0.1 percent in February, according to the department's personal consumption expenditure index.

The Fed's preferred gauge, the core PCE index, which excludes food and energy prices, rose 0.3 percent in March, the fastest monthly gain since October. Core inflation was up 2 percent from March of last year, the upper limit of Bernanke's preferred range.Movers

Wal-Mart jumped 90 cents, to $45.93, after the discount retailer said its sales at stores open at least a year grew 6.8 percent in April, better than the 4 percent to 6 percent it had predicted.

Boeing rose 41 cents, to $83.86. It agreed to buy aircraft parts and services supplier Aviall.

Aviall surged $9.26, to $46.96.

Level 3 Communications rose 32 cents, to $5.772. It is acquiring regional telecommunications company TelCove.

Aramark soared $5.79, to $33.90. A group of investors offered almost $5.8 billion to acquire the food-service provider.

Tyson Foods added 11 cents, to $14.71. The world's largest meat processor said it fell to a $127 million loss last quarter, hurt by an oversupply of meat and charges from closing plants.Indexes

New York Stock Exchange composite index fell 9.68, to 8461.75.

American Stock Exchange index rose 7.60, to 2015.43.

Russell 2000 index of smaller-company stocks fell 3.12, to 761.42.Volume

DOJ_NMG_0027814

NYSE: 2.48 billion shares, down from 2.54 billion on Friday. Decliners outnumbered advancers 5 to 4.

Nasdaq: 2.13 billion shares, down from 2.56 billion. Decliners outnumbered advancers 5 to 3.Commodities

Crude oil for June delivery: $73.70, up $1.82.

Gold for current delivery: $657.50 a troy ounce, up from $651.80 on Friday.

Former Playmate Wins Procedural Round In Fight Over Estate (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 1 — The Supreme Court on Monday gave the onetime Playboy Playmate Anna Nicole Smith a new day in federal court to try to prove that her late husband, 63 years her senior, intended to leave her a substantial share of his billion-dollar estate. The two had been married 14 months at the time of his death, at age 90.

In an opinion by Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, the court ruled unanimously that the dispute between Ms. Smith and her late husband's son E. Pierce Marshall was properly one for the federal courts.

The Supreme Court addressed itself only to the question of jurisdiction, leaving many issues open for consideration in the lower federal courts. Unless the two sides settle, which seems unlikely after 10 years of bitter litigation, the outcome ensured that the case would go on, perhaps for years longer.

That was undoubtedly good news to the many people who, while perhaps lacking deep interest in the "probate exception to federal jurisdiction" that is the actual issue in the case, appeared fascinated by Ms. Smith's trajectory from a Houston strip club to the Supreme Court. While calm prevailed in court when the case was argued in February, several people were knocked down in the scrum of photographers outside when Ms. Smith and her entourage passed by.

Although purely procedural, the decision in Marshall v. Marshall, No. 04-1544, was a victory for Ms. Smith, whose legal name is Vickie Lynn Marshall. It overturned a ruling by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, in San Francisco, which threw out an $88 million judgment in Ms. Smith's favor issued by the Federal District Court in Los Angeles.

The appeals court ruled that because the dispute was ultimately related to the disposition of an estate, the federal courts lacked jurisdiction over it under a longstanding judicial doctrine known as the probate exception to federal jurisdiction. Under this ruling, the case belonged in the exclusive jurisdiction of the Texas Probate Court, where E. Pierce Marshall prevailed three years ago in his effort to prove that his father, J. Howard Marshall II, who died in 1995, had left Ms. Smith nothing beyond the gifts he gave her during his lifetime.

In her opinion on Monday, Justice Ginsburg said that to come within the probate exception, and therefore to fall outside the federal courts' jurisdiction, a dispute had to directly involve the probate or annulment of a will, the administration of an estate or the disposition of property in a state probate court's custody.

Because the dispute ranged far beyond those narrow categories, Justice Ginsburg said, their case fell "far outside" the exception and the Ninth Circuit had been wrong to interpret the probate exception as expansively as it did.

The federal government had entered the case on Ms. Smith's behalf to argue to the justices that the probate exception should be applied narrowly, if at all. While, on the surface, the government's intervention may have seemed improbable, Solicitor General Paul D. Clement explained in his brief that the government often went to federal court to assert tax-related claims against an estate and needed to preserve its ability to do so.

The case began in federal court as a bankruptcy filing by Ms. Smith. In the course of the bankruptcy proceedings, she claimed that E. Pierce Marshall had wrongfully interfered with her right to share in her husband's estate. The bankruptcy court awarded her nearly $500 million, which the district court reduced substantially.

In a statement issued from Dallas, Mr. Marshall said he would continue to fight Ms. Smith's "false claims and libelous accusations" and would argue to the Ninth Circuit that the district court's judgment in her favor should be overturned.

Ms. Smith's lawyer, Kent Richland, said in a statement, "We are confident that the Ninth Circuit will have no problem in ruling in our favor on the issues that remain."

Former Stripper Anna Nicole Smith Scores Supreme Court Victory (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gina Holland, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0027815

AP, May 2, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Supreme Court ruled Monday that one-time stripper and Playboy magazine Playmate Anna Nicole Smith could pursue part of her late husband's oil fortune.

Justices gave new legal impetus to Smith's bid to collect millions of dollars from the estate of J. Howard Marshall II. Her late husband's estate has been estimated at as much as $1.6 billion (â,¬1.2 billion).

Smith has been embroiled in a long running cross-country court fight with Marshall's youngest son, E. Pierce Marshall. The court's decision, which was unanimous, means that it will not end anytime soon.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, writing for the court, said Smith should have a fresh chance to pursue claims in federal court.

Smith's case had brought unusual drama to the normally sedate high court.

Dressed in all black, the former stripper wept in the courtroom in late February as justices discussed Marshall and whether he had intended to provide for her in death. When she arrived at the court, several photographers were knocked to the ground in a scuffle to photograph her.

She was a 26-year-old topless dancer when she married Marshall, then 89, in 1994. He died the following year, setting off an intense family fight.

At issue in the legal battle was competing court jurisdiction. A Texas court held a five-month trial before deciding that Smith was entitled to nothing from Marshall's estate. Smith brought a separate claim in federal court in California.

Justices said Monday that the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in California was wrong in ruling that federal courts could not handle Smith's case.

Ginsburg noted, however, that there are several pending issues that could still keep Smith from collecting any money.

So far, Smith has received nothing from Marshall's estate, although before his death Marshall showered Smith with $6.6 million (â,¬5.2 million) in gifts that included two homes, expensive jewelry and clothes. She contends that he also promised her half his estate.

Group Sues Video Firms On Tot-Learning Claims (WP)

By Caroline E. Mayer

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

A child-advocacy group whose mission is to limit marketing aimed at children yesterday asked the federal government to bar two major baby-video companies from promoting their products as educational and beneficial to child development.

The Campaign for a Commercial-Free Childhood filed a complaint with the Federal Trade Commission, saying Baby Einstein Co. and Brainy Baby Co. should not be able to say their products inspire "logical thinking," foster "the development of your toddler's speech and language skills," or give "your child a jumpstart on learning."

The group said the claims are deceptive, since there is no proof that these increasingly popular videos are beneficial and educational. In fact, it said, "research shows that television viewing is potentially harmful for infants and toddlers," because it could adversely affect cognitive development if it replaces creative play and interaction with a child's parents and surroundings.

Dennis Fedoruk, the founder and president of Brainy Baby, said the company does not make any educational claims and "does not promise parents their children will be Harvard graduates." He said, "There is enough research to show that early education is valid and does work. We're simply providing another tool in the early-educational library," along with books and toys.

Baby Einstein had no comment.

The CCFC's complaint comes at a time when the baby-video market is booming, with more than $1 billion in sales so far in videos aimed at children 2 and younger. Baby Einstein, owned by Walt Disney Co., has the largest share of the market, and sales last year reached $200 million.

The growth of this relatively new business -- Brainy Baby was started in 1995, Baby Einstein in 1997 -- comes despite the American Academy of Pediatrics recommendation that children younger than 2 be discouraged from watching television. The academy, in a policy statement issued in 1999, said: "Although certain television programs may be promoted to this age group, research on early brain development shows that babies and toddlers have a critical need for direct interactions with parents and other significant care givers . . . for healthy brain growth and the development of appropriate social, emotional, and cognitive skills."

DOJ_NMG_0027816

The academy has been sharply criticized for that recommendation. Baby Einstein, for example, said the academy failed to differentiate between traditional broadcast television and videos, which can be more carefully selected by parents.

But the academy's chair of the communications committee, which deals with the impact of media on children's health, said yesterday that the group stands by its recommendation. Video for infants and toddlers "is a great uncontrolled experiment on the nation's under-2-year-old set," said Donald Shifrin, a Seattle pediatrician, in a telephone interview. "It is based on marketing, not research. . . . The Academy would like to reassure parents that children have been doing fine for thousands of years" without baby videos.

The CCFC has asked the FTC to make the video companies clearly and conspicuously disclose the academy's recommendations on their advertising and packaging. The FTC had no comment on the complaint.

Although there are several other companies that produce videos for young children, the CCFC is seeking action against only two firms because they are the largest and most popular. "We hope that this will set a precedent" and apply to all baby-video companies, said Susan Linn, a Harvard psychologist and one of CCFC's founders.

The complaint said the companies' very names suggest their products are educational and beneficial. So do their slogans, according to the complaint -- "Great minds start little" for Baby Einstein and "A little genius in the Making" for Brainy Baby. Fedoruk said Brainy Baby was in the process of changing the motto to "learning for a lifetime."

"These companies are exploiting parents' natural tendency to want what's best for their children, and their deceptive marketing may be putting babies at risk," said Alvin F. Poussaint, head of the Boston-based Judge Baker Children's Center, which serves as the headquarters for CCFC.

Law-Firm Life Doesn't Suit Some Associates Long Hours For Big Perks Is A Tough Case To Argue; Rebuttal On 'Lifestyle'? (WSJ)

By Ashby Jones

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

At most big law firms, the partner-associate compact goes something like this: The partners give the associates big salaries, meals on the client, cars home at night, fancy offices, secretaries and a prestigious name on their résumés. The associates give their complete professional devotion and availability -- every hour of the day, every day of the year.

That compact has gone unspoken, and largely unquestioned, until recently.

More and more associates at law firms across the U.S. are second guessing whether they want to sign over their lives to their jobs. Some are working fewer hours. Some are losing interest in making partner. And they are leaving big law firms in droves: "The rate of associate attrition we're seeing today at big firms is the highest level we've ever seen," says Paula A. Patton, chief executive of the NALP Foundation, a nonprofit group in Overland Park, Kan., that examines law-firm hiring trends and practices.

For partners, it's a quizzical and unwelcome development. Last fall, Cesar L. Alvarez, president of Greenberg Traurig, was interviewing a student at an Ivy League law school. The interview was just beginning when the student asked Mr. Alvarez to tell him what the "lifestyle would be like" at the firm.

The student didn't get a "call-back" interview. "I told him that if he's going to work at a large law firm, that mind-set isn't going to get you very far," recalls Mr. Alvarez, who is based in the firm's Miami office. In his opinion, the question reflected the attitude of more and more young lawyers. "A generation ago, nobody would have asked that question, even if they'd thought of it. But there is a difference in people coming out of law school now."

Two decades ago, few segments of the work force routinely put in longer hours than young law-firm associates, who toiled day and night to please partner-masters and climb the firms' ranks. But many today "are more interested in going to their children's soccer games" than they are in staying in the office late in the hopes of getting extra work done or making a good impression, says Joseph Altonji, a consultant with Hildebrandt International, a law-firm consultancy in Chicago.

DOJ_NMG_0027817

Ellie Schilling, a former bankruptcy associate at New York's Kaye Scholer, left the firm in March as a third-year associate after deciding that the pathway to partnership "is so long and arduous, that it just didn't seem worth it." She and her husband, also a young lawyer, plan to depart for Europe this month to pursue a business plan they began dreaming up after they realized life at a big law firm wasn't for them. "We figured there had to be another way to go, a way with less pressure, less stress, fewer hours," says Ms. Schilling. "We feel like we had to give something else a shot."

Why the change in attitude? It's partly due to the explosive growth experienced by the largest firms over the past two decades. That growth has increased demand for more worker bees at the bottom of the law-firm pyramid, without an equivalent spike in demand for new partners, experts say. The result: It's harder than ever to make partner at the biggest firms, leaving associates less incentive to churn the grindstone early on.

Partners are working harder than ever as well, taking a little of the luster off partnership's holy-grail mystique. Claude Millman, a litigation partner at Proskauer Rose in New York, says he gets questions from associates about his lifestyle fairly frequently. And what he tells them isn't always what they want to hear: "I try to be honest with them," he says. "The pressure to be available to your clients only increases as your career moves along."

Generational factors are also at work. More than in any previous generation, say experts, today's associates were raised in the lap of affluence. Many have safety nets to fall back on. And many are jaded about what big law firms have to offer. Michael Boone, a co-founder of Haynes & Boone, a large general-practice firm based in Dallas, says that the current crop of associates often aren't satisfied with working hard and making money. "They want to feel like they're contributing to the greater good," he says.

According to an NALP Foundation study unveiled last year that looked at law firms for the three years from 2002 through 2004, nearly 60% of all entry-level associates at firms with more than 500 lawyers had left their firms by the end of their fourth years. For firms of all sizes, it was 62%, a record since NALP began tracking it nearly 10 years ago.

Some law-firm executives fear that uncommitted associates are failing to put out the top-quality work that's expected of them. "There's a perception among managing partners that the short-termers are less focused on crossing T's and dotting I's," says Dan DiPietro, head of the law-firm lending practice at Citibank, a unit of Citigroup Inc., in New York. "They're perceived as putting a burden on quality control."

Associate productivity and billing are additional issues. Greenberg Traurig's Mr. Alvarez, for instance, says he is hearing about a decline in hours worked at big firms, a drop attributable not only to the youngest associates, but also to baby boomers, many of whom are nearing retirement age and winding down their practices. "It's a double whammy effect," says Mr. Alvarez. "People in my generation don't need to work 2,500 hours [a year] anymore, and at the same time, the new generation is concerned with its lifestyle. It's creating a downward trend at firms."

Some associates appreciate the benefits of big law-firm life. Moe Keshavarzi, a second-year associate at Sheppard, Mullin, Richter & Hampton in Los Angeles, says associates are "very concerned with lifestyle," but he thinks the hours matter less than the amount of responsibility associates have. "The more responsibility you're given, the more you're going to want to work hard."

Several years ago, Greenberg Traurig changed its recruiting strategy to focus on finding associates who were better geared for law-firm life, ones with leadership qualities and work experience prior to law school.

Washington firm Dickstein Shapiro Morin & Oshinsky, which in 2005 finished first in the American Lawyer magazine's associate satisfaction survey, has for several years had a well-publicized part-time policy that lets its lawyers work four days a week. And it has put a renewed emphasis on training its lawyers, says Michael Nannes, the firm's managing partner.

Proskauer's Mr. Millman agrees with that philosophy. "We have to recognize that not everyone is going to want to spend his or her life at a law firm," he says. "But that doesn't mean you can't be wonderful associate and get a lot out of your time while you're here."

DeLay Bills Top $400K In 2006 (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, May 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027818

Rep. Tom DeLay's (R-Texas) legal defense fund burned through $312,000 in expenses in the first quarter of the year, paying out fees to four different law firms representing the former House Majority Leader on two different legal fronts.

When combined with the $110,000 DeLay paid out of his campaign committee to a firm in January, the new filings show he spent more than $400,000 in the first three months of the year on legal fees and expenses connected to raising money for the defense fund.

DeLay, who is facing a trial on campaign finance charges in Texas and under scrutiny by a Justice Department task force probing the affairs of ex-lobbyist Jack Abramoff, has now shelled out $1.3 million in legal fees in less than two years, according to filings with the Federal Election Commission and the House ethics committee.

Aides to DeLay said no final decision had been made with regard to how the lawmaker will finance his mounting legal bills once he retires from the House, which is expected to happen sometime in June. But the simplest course would be to continue to raise money through a privatized version of the Tom DeLay Legal Expense Trust and raise unlimited donations without having to publicly report who the donors are.

DeLay could also choose to pay future attorneys' fees with the leftover campaign cash from his re-election committee, which had almost $1.5 million in cash on hand as of March 31.

"No decision's been made yet whether to close it down or keep it open," said Brent Perry, a Houston-based lawyer who is in charge of the legal defense fund.

The fund raised $314,000 in the first quarter and went through almost that exact amount, doling out $312,000 — $280,000 to the four firms handling the various aspects of DeLay's legal defense and another $32,000 in costs associated with raising money for and maintaining the fund.

Perry said there are currently no efforts under way aimed at raising more money for the fund, which has historically not maintained much of a cash balance and instead has doled out payments to firms as soon as money comes into the fund.

Even though he is out of leadership, DeLay continued to be as popular as ever among his colleagues, who funneled more than $104,000 into his defense account, roughly one-third of all the money he raised so far this year. Faced with $5,000 annual limits in donations to defense funds, Rep. Pete Sessions (R-Texas) managed to give $10,000 to DeLay, giving $5,000 from his leadership political action committee and $5,000 from his re-election campaign committee.

DeLay also took in $5,000 from Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.), a close ally who also recently hired his own attorney to handle questions connected to his relationship with Abramoff. Former Rep. Joe McDade (R-Pa.) — who was himself indicted by federal prosecutors on corruption charges in the early 1990s but eventually defeated the allegations at trial and retired in 1998 — gave $2,000 to the defense fund.

With his trial in Texas pending, DeLay has also had to contend with increasingly large bills to firms dealing with the Abramoff matter, which has already drawn guilty pleas from the lobbyist and two former aides to DeLay. Out of the roughly $400,000 in legal bills paid out from January through March, McGuire Woods received $150,000 for the work of Richard Cullen, who has been DeLay's lead lawyer on Abramoff questions.

In addition, another $125,000 went to Bracewell & Giuliani, which has done work on both the Texas case and the Abramoff probe. Dick DeGuerin, the lead attorney battling the money laundering accusations in Texas, received $110,000 in February from the fund.

DeLay is just one of four lawmakers to have defense funds that are actively raising money to pay legal bills to handle courtroom dealings.

Rep. Jim McDermott (D-Wash.), who has been in a decade-long civil legal fight with House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), raised $12,000 in the first quarter. Most of that came from two $5,000 donations, one from the Teamsters and another from a wealthy Seattle donor.

McDermott paid out $10,328 in legal fees to the firm Kirkland and Ellis. McDermott's legal bills are likely to continue to mount because last month the House ethics committee voted to approve the formation of an investigative subcommittee to examine whether the lawmaker should be punished for leaking an illegally recorded mobile-phone conversation between Boehner and other GOP leaders in 1996.

DOJ_NMG_0027819

Two other Members have defense funds related to Justice Department investigations — Reps. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) and William Jefferson (D-La.) — but their financial reports had not been turned in early enough Monday for the Legislative Resources Center to process them.

Aides to Ney, who is expected to prevail in a GOP primary in his district today, said that he raised about $40,000 for his legal trust but hadn't yet focused much on raising cash to fight potential charges in the Abramoff investigation.

Giuliani Says GOP Open To Diverse Views (AP-Y2)

By Mike Glover

AP2, May 1, 2006

Raising money for local Republicans even as he ponders his own political future, former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani said Monday that Republicans must increasingly be "a big party" that accepts divergent views.

Giuliani said that broad-brush themes, like limited government, ought to define the Republican Party — not hot-button social issues like abortion and gay rights.

"The major thing that we organize around as Republicans is government that puts more reliance on people than government," Giuliani said. "They (Democrats) tend to think of government solutions as most of the answers."

Giuliani was in Iowa to raise money for Jeff Lamberti, a Republican candidate for Congress, and Rep. Jim Nussle (news, bio, voting record), who is running unopposed for the Republican nomination for governor.

Giuliani was also clear he's considering his own future ambitions.

"I am interested in public service again," he said. "My effort this year will be to help Republicans get elected and, quite honestly, a part of it also is saying to myself 'Does it look like I have a chance in 2008?'"

Some strategists believe Giuliani will face significant hurdles in Republican politics because he supports abortion rights and favors tough gun control laws, views that contrast those held by many core Republican voters.

Giuliani is working hard to counter that notion by helping other Republicans get elected, while reaching out to conservatives to ease their concerns.

"I've got a lot of places to go and a lot of people to talk to and a long process to go through to see if it makes sense for me to run for president in 2008," Giuliani said.

Iowa Republican Chairman Ray Hoffman, of Sioux City, declined to handicap Giuliani's outlook in a state where the conservative wing of the party is dominant.

"I hope to really be able to talk to him at some point and say where do you stand on gun control, where do stand on this, where do you stand on that," Hoffman said. "I haven't done that yet."

Meeting with reporters, Giuliani took an immigration stance likely to cause heartburn with GOP conservatives — arguing for a pragmatic approach that both toughens border security but also sets up a mechanism for illegal aliens to earn citizenship.

"If you try to deal with it through either extreme, I think you would make a terrible mistake," Giuliani said. "If you were to pass a law making everybody who is here, allegedly, illegally a criminal with a penalty of five years in jail, we would become a much more insecure country. You drive them farther underground, you push them more toward criminal activity."

Giuliani's swing through Iowa was lucrative. He raised $40,000 for Lamberti's bid to oust Democratic Rep. Leonard Boswell (news, bio, voting record), and later raised $25,000 for Nussle.

Giuliani Displays A Candidate's Mettle In Iowa (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

DAVENPORT, Iowa, May 1 — Former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani said on Monday that he was seriously exploring whether he has "a chance" of winning the presidency in 2008, as he visited politically important Iowa and huddled with state advisers, donors to President Bush and other prominent Republicans.

While Mr. Giuliani was officially in Iowa to attend two Republican fund-raisers, his behavior and remarks came close to politicking for himself. He ruminated openly about running, disclosed he was not sure what he would do if his friend John McCain also ran, and argued that if Republicans are to be a majority party, they need to accept politicians like himself who support abortion rights, gay rights and gun control.

DOJ_NMG_0027820

"I've got a lot of places to go and a lot of people to talk to and a long process of figuring out whether it makes sense to run for president in 2008," Mr. Giuliani said before speaking at a daytime fund-raiser in Des Moines for a Republican congressional candidate. "I don't know the answer to that yet."

He added: "My effort this year will be to help Republicans get elected, and then, quite honestly, as part of it, saying to myself, does it look like I have a chance in 2008? And make that decision after the 2006 election."

At a fund-raiser in Davenport on Monday night, Mr. Giuliani offered a stout defense of President Bush's leadership, arguing that the economy was growing and that Mr. Bush would go down in history as "a great president."

"I don't know what we're all so upset about," he said, referring to concerns about the economy and rising costs, such as gas prices.

At another point he called the war in Afghanistan "successful," noting that the Taliban had been ousted from power and that elections had been held. Later, when pressed, he acknowledged that a primary American goal — the capture of Osama bin Laden — had not been achieved.

"It would be better if bin Laden were captured," Mr. Giuliani said, "but it's better that he's on the run."

In response to another question, Mr. Giuliani disclosed that he was not sure if his own presidential plans would be swayed if Senator McCain of Arizona also ran in 2008, as many expect.

"John is a good friend and someone I have tremendous admiration for, and he's a hero of mine, so I haven't really thought about how I would approach that," Mr. Giuliani said.

And Mr. Giuliani weighed in on the new film "United 93," about one of the hijacked planes on Sept. 11, saying that he saw the film on Saturday and found it "very difficult to watch."

"I thought it was a valuable contribution to explaining the heroism of those people who I believed saved the Capitol, and gave up their lives to do that," he said. "I think it's something that people should see in order to remind themselves of what's going on. When we say the war on terror, there's a reason for it."

At an early news conference in Des Moines, where he spoke briefly at a private fund-raiser, Mr. Giuliani said he did not think his moderate views on social issues would hurt his chances in the presidential sweepstakes in places that are less liberal than New York City.

"The party's a big party, and I fit in to the party real well over the last 10, 15 years," he said.

For the most part, Mr. Giuliani said, his views were in the mainstream with the party faithful in Iowa and nationally, noting that he favored lower taxes, free trade, smaller government and a strong military.

"We then have a party that has disagreements on issues that have to do with religion and what you call social issues," he said. "But it's a party that has room for Arnold Schwarzenegger and me, and a party that has room for people who have different views on that. The more we grow like that, the more of a chance we're going to have to be a majority party."

Mr. Giuliani also acknowledged that his personal popularity — burnished by his leadership of New York City during and after the Sept. 11 terror attack — did not guarantee that Iowa voters would support him in the January 2008 caucuses.

"I do understand that there is a difference between popularity, and then, you know, does that convert itself into somebody voting for you in a caucus, primary, an election," he said.

Still, he noted, "It's always nicer when people cheer for you than when they boo you."

Mr. Giuliani was cheerful as he faced reporters from Iowa, New York and Washington after the fund-raiser, and he rather politely parried questions about his plans for 2008. As news cameras rolled, he showed a local touch, noting Iowa's problems with methamphetamine — a concern of Iowa caucusgoers in 2004 — and joked that there was more balance between Republicans and Democrats in Iowa than in New York.

Mr. Giuliani also endorsed "appropriate levels" of federal subsidies for farmers and aligned himself with government support for ethanol, an alternative fuel made from corn that is a prized issue in Iowa.

DOJ_NMG_0027821

Before the fund-raiser, Mr. Giuliani met with several Iowa Republican leaders who were players in past presidential caucuses — among them David M. Roederer, the state chairman of the Bush-Cheney campaign in 2004, and Terry E. Branstad, a four-term governor who left office in 1999.

Mr. Giuliani was a host at a cocktail party in New York on Sunday night for Governor Schwarzenegger of California, and he helped raise money last month for Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania.

Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, May 2, 2006

Church and State: A Cue From JFK

About two months before the heated 1960 election, John F. Kennedy tried to put to rest the whole debate over his Catholicism to beat Richard Nixon. It was in Houston on September 12 when he famously hit the issue head-on: "No public official either requests or accepts instructions on public policy from the pope." Now, 46 years later, Massachusetts has coughed up another presidential hopeful who belongs to what some see as a weird religion--the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. And the candidate, Republican Gov. Mitt Romney, plans to copy, almost exactly, JFK's winning approach.

Romney says he'll give a similar address, in which he will pledge allegiance to the Constitution, not the Mormon church. It will be a simple approach: Explain the religion, maybe touch on the banned practice of polygamy, then ask voters to judge him on his years in business, as head of the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City, and as the Bay State's governor. All things being equal, he says, some voters will reject a Mormon. But "all things are not equal," an aide tells us, "and the most important consideration for Republicans is fielding a candidate who can beat Hillary Clinton." Mormonism has its limits, though. Asked if he'd consider former Utah Gov. Michael Leavitt, now health and human services secretary, as a running mate, Romney says: "Two Mormons? I don't think that'll work."

Another From '04 With an Eye on '08

First John Edwards, then Sen. John Kerry, and now 2004 hopeful Wes Clark is mulling a second presidential bid. Helping Democrats in the midterm elections is "the first step," he says. The next is the 2008 presidential election. And allies have been told to ready their boots and parkas for another trip to New Hampshire, home of the first primary.

Maybe 2008 Is the Third-Party Charm

GOP political guru Frank Luntz thinks 2008 could be the year for a third-party success, but only if the presidential candidate is a big name. The ideal guy: New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, who isn't interested. Why Mike? Luntz says he's frugal with the city budget, socially liberal, and rich enough to buy the advertising it takes to win the election. Two others: Sen. John McCain and former Secretary of State Colin Powell.

Exporting Capital 'D' Democracy

Arab nations upset with President Bush's war on terrorism finally heard something they liked from Washington last month. The problem: It was former Democratic Party boss Terry McAuliffe, not a Bush administration official, delivering the news. Over 21 days, McAuliffe was on a speech-a-thon in nine nations, including Kuwait, Egypt, Dubai, Qatar, and Abu Dhabi, where he commiserated about concerns that the United States wasn't ready for a drawn-out war in Iraq. "They wanted to know where we were going," he tells us. "I told them we're headed back to the Democratic Party," he says, promising them that a Dem would win in 2008 and fix the problems in the war on terrorism.

Arkansas Royalty: Huckabee or Times

Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, a likely 2008 GOP presidential hopeful, has never been a fan of the Arkansas Times. And why should he be? "We have been very critical of him," says Editor Max Brantley. But now it's payback time. Brantley says the guv has stopped E-mailing releases and schedules to the popular tabloid. "A guy who has a hard time with a throwaway mag," says Brantley, "will have a heck of a time in the national spotlight. He ain't royalty." Right back at you, says Huckabee. "We don't have to hand-deliver information with a bow tie on it," he says. "That's special treatment." Anyway, most of the info is on his state website. "I guess he is too lazy to access it," says the guv. It won't end with name-calling--Brantley's considering suing.

Grudging Praise for a Russian Thorn

DOJ_NMG_0027822

The Iran nuclear showdown returns this week to the United Nations Security Council, and that means we'll be hearing more from Russia's foreign minister, Sergey Lavrov. He has been leading the opposition--with China--to U.S. efforts to get tough on Iran's nuke program, bedeviling American diplomats who privately admire his diplo-smarts. "Lavrov is brilliant," allows one U.S. official.

ABC News Tries a 'Smooth' Approach

We used to hear New York-based ABC Radio hostess Daria Albinger on satellite radio. So when she popped up on a Washington radio station delivering local news, we called to say "hi," only to find out that she never moved. Instead, she's part of a new gig by ABC News to reach FM listeners who prefer tunes to talk. "We've got AM covered," says ABC's Andrew Kalb. "We want to find new FM listeners." An ABC study found that a short minute of hard and lifestyle news works well on FM. "ABC FM News" works this way: Via the Internet, Albinger from New York uploads to the stations a minute of local, national, and sports news. Her conversational broadcast sounds as if she's in their newsroom, though no local news staff is needed. Two Washington stations, Smooth Jazz 105.9 and Mix 107.3, get it now, but Kalb hopes to add many more.

The Questioner Behind the Decider

Pay attention to new CNN White House Correspondent Ed Henry. President Bush does. After just three weeks on the beat, the TV newbie--Henry recently celebrated two years in the biz--asked the question that resulted in the latest Bushism: "I'm the decider." And he's the reporter who pressed Robert Novak about publishing ex-CIA spy Valerie Plame's name, prompting the columnist to storm off the live-TV set and eventually quit CNN. Other reporters say they haven't seen such a fast start since CNN's Wolf Blitzer arrived to cover former President Bill Clinton. Still, we hear that Henry hasn't been on the beat long enough to earn a presidential nickname yet, though "decider" wouldn't be a bad start for Dubya.

Ex-Pentagon Official To Teach At Georgetown (AP-Y2)

AP2, May 1, 2006

Douglas J. Feith, the former Pentagon policy chief who was an architect of the administration's war on terrorism, is joining the faculty of Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service.

In an announcement Monday, the university said Feith will teach a course on the Bush administration's strategy for the war on terror and also will conduct seminars as a visiting professor and distinguished practitioner in national security policy. He will start this fall.

"I think it'll be enjoyable and useful to teach Georgetown students about the administration's national security policies and policy making," Feith said in an interview. "I may be able to shed some light on little-understood topics that have generated enormous heat in the public debate."

Feith himself has been a target of heat from some Democrats in Congress who accuse him of having misled Congress about Iraq's prewar links to al-Qaida. Last November the Pentagon's inspector general's office said it had begun an investigation into allegations that an office run by Feith engaged in illegal or inappropriate intelligence activities before the war. Feith has called those allegations groundless.

Feith was the under secretary of defense for policy from July 2001 to August 2005. Since leaving the Pentagon he has been a visiting fellow at the Hoover Institute at Stanford University while writing his memoirs and working on a counterterrorism strategy project at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government.

In announcing the hiring of Feith, Robert L. Gallucci, dean of Georgetown's School of Foreign Service, said, "He brings a combination of legal, foreign and defense policymaking experience that I am confident will enrich campus discussions on a wide range of critical international issues of the day."

Feith also served in the Pentagon and at the White House during the Reagan administration. He holds a law degree from Georgetown and a bachelor's degree from Harvard.

___

On the Net:

Georgetown University: http://www.georgetown.edu

Iran Urges United Nations To Oppose American 'Threats' (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0027823

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, May 1 — Iran asked the United Nations on Monday to take a stand against American threats that it said included possible nuclear strikes on its territory and that were "in total contempt of international law."

In a letter to Secretary General Kofi Annan, Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the United Nations, pointed to recent comments by President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on ways to halt Iran's nuclear program and to news reports of Pentagon planning for possible nuclear attacks on nuclear facilities in Iran.

"Such dangerous statements, particularly those of the United States president, widely considered in political and media circles as a tacit confirmation of the shocking news on the administration's possible contemplation of nuclear strikes against certain targets in Iran, defiantly articulate the United States' policies and intentions on the resort to nuclear weapons," Mr. Zarif wrote in the letter. He made no mention of any specific news reports, referring only to "recent news in U.S. newspapers."

He said the comments by the United States were "matters of extreme gravity that require an urgent, concerted and resolute response on the part of the United Nations, and particularly the Security Council."

Mr. Zarif also faulted the United Nations for remaining silent on "these illegal and inexcusable threats" and said the lack of action had "emboldened senior United States officials to go further and even consider the use of nuclear weapons as 'an option on the table.' "

American officials have said they are pursuing a diplomatic solution to the dispute over Iran's nuclear program, but they have repeatedly said that all options, including military ones, are being considered. Iran says its nuclear program is only for producing energy, but the United States and its European allies contend that Iran is preparing to build weapons.

Mr. Bush, asked at the White House on April 18 if the United States was considering military action against Iran, said, "All options are on the table."

Two days later, Ms. Rice echoed the president in a speech to the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations. In his letter, Mr. Jarif made specific mention of both comments.

Stéphane Dujarric, Mr. Annan's spokesman, said that the letter from Mr. Zarif had been received but that there would be no immediate comment.

Last month, the Security Council adopted a nonbinding statement that urged Iran to stop enriching uranium and asked the International Atomic Energy Agency to report on Iran's compliance by the end of April.

That report, issued Friday, said that Iran had failed to comply and that it had drastically curtailed its cooperation with the agency's inspectors as it sped forward with nuclear enrichment.

The United States, Britain and France are preparing a resolution to be circulated to Security Council members this week. The resolution would require Iran to stop nuclear enrichment under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, which makes compliance mandatory under international law and holds out the possibility of economic penalties and military action.

China and Russia are expected to object to any measure that imposes sanctions on Iran, and weeks of negotiations are anticipated.

Iran Urges U.N. Action Against U.S. (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, May 2, 2006

Iran denounced the United States on Monday for contemplating possible nuclear strikes against Iranian targets and urged the United Nations to take urgent action against what it called a dangerous violation of international law.

In a letter to U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan obtained by The Associated Press, Iran's U.N. Ambassador Javad Zarif called President Bush's refusal to rule out a U.S. nuclear strike on Iran and a similar follow-up statement by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "illegal and insolent threats."

Bush was asked on April 18 whether U.S. options regarding Iran "include the possibility of a nuclear strike" if Tehran refuses to halt uranium enrichment. "All options are on the table," the president replied, but he stressed that the United States will continue to focus on diplomacy.

DOJ_NMG_0027824

Iran insists it is legally entitled under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty to enrich uranium to provide fuel for civilian power plants but the United States suspects its real aim is to produce nuclear weapons, a view backed by Britain and France.

Zarif said the use of "false pretexts" by senior U.S. officials "to make public and illegal threats of resort to force against the Islamic Republic of Iran is continuing unabated in total contempt of international law and fundamental principles of the United Nations Charter."

The "U.S. aggressive policy" of contemplating the possible use of nuclear weapons also violates the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and other U.S. multilateral agreements, he said.

Zarif's letter made no mention of recent threats by Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to wipe Israel "off the map."

Instead, the Iranian ambassador honed in on statements from U.S. officials, especially from Bush, which he said "defiantly articulate the United States policies and intentions on the resort to nuclear weapons."

Zarif said past U.N. failures to respond "to these illegal and inexcusable threats have emboldened senior United States officials to go further and even consider the use of nuclear weapons as an `option on the table.'"

In a brief statement responding to the letter, U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said "if Iran wants to be treated differently, then Iran should stop pursuing nuclear weapons and give up terrorism."

The secretary-general had no immediate comment on the letter, said Marie Okabe, a U.N. spokeswoman.

After lengthy negotiations, the U.N. Security Council adopted a statement a month ago demanding that Iran stop enriching uranium. A new report Friday from the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog, confirmed what the world already knew: Iran has refused to stop enriching uranium.

The United States, Britain and France immediately announced plans to introduce a new Security Council resolution this week which would make Iran's compliance with their demands mandatory. To intensify pressure, they want the resolution under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter which means it can be enforced through sanctions or military action.

China and Russia, the two other council members with veto power, oppose sanctions and military action and want the Iran nuclear issue resolved diplomatically, with the IAEA taking the lead, not the Security Council.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, reiterated Monday that Tehran was "ready for any kind of negotiation to achieve our rights" and again called for Iran's dispute with the international community to be returned to the IAEA, rather than taken up by the Security Council.

He spoke on the eve of a meeting in Paris of political directors from the six countries that have been trying to find a diplomatic solution to the standoff — Britain, France, Germany, the United States, Russia and China.

Iran Nuclear Negotiator Calls For Talks (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, May 1, 2006

Iran's top nuclear negotiator Monday said Tehran was "ready for any kind of negotiation to achieve our rights," renewing a call for further talks on the Islamic republic's atomic program.

As officials from the five permanent U.N. Security Council members gathered in Paris to discuss strategy, Ali Larijani also called again for Iran's dispute with the international community to be returned to the U.N. nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency, headed by Mohamed ElBaradei.

"Let's allow Mr. ElBaradei to do his job based on the international conventions," Larijani told group of students in Tehran University, the official Iranian news agency reported.

Diplomats representing the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China, which hold Security Council vetoes, meet in Paris on Tuesday with Germany to discuss ElBaradei's report to the council that Iran was in violation of the council's demand that Tehran stop enriching uranium, a process that can produce fuel for a nuclear reactor or fissile material for a bomb.

The report opened the way for the council to take punitive measures against Iran, but immediate action was not seen as likely because Russia and China now are opposed to international sanctions against Tehran at this point.

Iran contends it has a right to enrich uranium as long as it does not attempt to use it for nuclear weapons. Its opponents contend Iran ceded that right by conducting secret nuclear research and development.

DOJ_NMG_0027825

Earlier Monday, government spokesman Gholam-Hossein Elham told reporters Tehran had earmarked $242.5 million for the completion of the Bushehr reactor in southwest Iran.

Larijani said Bushehr would go on stream in 2007. Iran had expected the plant, which was built with Russian help, to be in operation by the end of this year.

Putin, Bush Discuss Iran Nuclear Dispute (AP)

AP, May 2, 2006

President Bush called Russian President Vladimir Putin on Monday to discuss the standoff over Iran's nuclear program, days before the issue goes before the U.N. Security Council.

The council is expected this week to begin debating new steps aimed at persuading Iran to comply with international demands to halt its uranium enrichment activities. The United States and Russia are on opposite sides of that debate, with Washington and its European allies pushing for possible penalties.

"The two leaders stressed the importance of preventing Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons, especially in the United Nations Security Council," White House press secretary Scott McClellan said. "And they committed to remaining in close contact on this important priority."

A Kremlin statement said the two sides "discussed interaction on urgent international problems, including the Iranian nuclear issue, on which numerous consultations at various levels are to be held in the coming days."

The U.N. nuclear agency issued a report Friday confirming that Tehran refused to comply with a Security Council demand that it halt enrichment by that day.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday the United States would seek a U.N. resolution requiring Iran to comply. She mentioned a resolution under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter, which can be enforced through penalties or military action.

Veto-wielding Security Council members Russia and China oppose that idea.

The United States and other nations believe Tehran's nuclear activities are aimed at creating nuclear weapons, although Iran insists its program is peaceful and aimed only at producing power.

Moscow has close ties to Iran and is building the nation's first nuclear power plant. But the Kremlin has been frustrated by Tehran's defiance of international pressure and refusal to accept a Russian proposal aimed at easing tension by moving Iran's uranium enrichment to Russia.

On Monday, the Iranian government allocated about $243 million to finish the plant in Bushehr in the southwest, spokesman Gholam-Hossein Elham said. Also, workers demonstrated in front of the former U.S. Embassy to support the disputed program.

Top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani said Monday that Bushehr would go on line in 2007. Iran had expected the plant, which was built with Russian help, to be in operation by Dec. 31.

"I think the plant will begin to operate a year later," Larijani was quoted as saying by the official Islamic Republic News Agency.

It was the first time a top Iranian official mentioned another possible delay.

Back To The Security Council (WP)

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

THE UNITED STATES will begin a long, difficult and possibly unsuccessful campaign this week to persuade the U.N. Security Council to order an end to Iran's nuclear program -- even though Iran's president has already said the regime does "not give a damn about such resolutions." While the diplomacy drags on, Iran's race for a bomb will continue: The International Atomic Energy Agency reported Friday that Tehran's work on enriching uranium was accelerating even as it continued to stonewall inspectors' attempts to learn about still more troubling parts of its program. The Bush administration's pursuit of a resolution at the United Nations is nonetheless a necessary step -- in part because of what it may reveal about the international coalition it has tried to build against Iran.

A debate on a legally binding resolution should set the United States and its European allies more firmly on a course toward adopting specific sanctions against Iran. It should also force China and Russia to decide whether they wish to be partners of the West in addressing such threats to global security. Russian President Vladimir Putin has skillfully exploited the growing crisis with Iran, cooperating with the West just enough to forestall a response to his increasingly belligerent policies in other parts of the world, while also reaping the benefit of rising oil prices -- and retaining the option of selling advanced weapons to Tehran. By the time of this summer's Group of Eight summit in St. Petersburg, Mr. Putin should be obliged either to stand with the democratic governments he will host in supporting Security Council action or to demonstrate that he does not belong in their company. China, too, will show whether it is interested in taking up the role of global "stakeholder" urged on it by the Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0027826

Russian and Chinese diplomats say their resistance to sanctions stems from concern that they will lead to more defiance by Iran, military action by the United States, or both. The same worries prompt the growing chorus of calls in Europe and in Washington for the Bush administration to offer the mullahs a "strategic dialogue." If there is to be a diplomatic solution to the Iranian nuclear threat, some such negotiations will eventually be needed. But the United States has already spent most of the past year supporting negotiations with Iran by Britain, France, Germany and Russia; their offers were crudely rejected. Iran's leaders evidently have concluded that they need not respond to offers of carrots because the coalition they face is incapable of producing a stick. The United States and its allies must now prove that thinking wrong -- ideally within the Security Council, but if necessary outside of it.

Tzipi Livni Named Vice Premier In Israel (AP)

AP, May 2, 2006

Interim Prime Minister Ehud Olmert announced his Cabinet appointments Monday, naming Tzipi Livni, a rising star in Israeli politics, as vice premier and foreign minister.

Livni is a senior member of Olmert's Kadima Party and had served as acting foreign minister in recent months. Monday's appointment makes Livni the second most powerful politician in Israel.

The defense portfolio went to Amir Peretz, head of the moderate Labor Party, the junior partner in Olmert's coalition. The posting is considered controversial since Peretz is widely perceived as strong on social issues but inexperienced in military matters. Labor also received six other ministerial appointments, including education, infrastructure, agriculture and tourism.

Israel's elder statesman, Shimon Peres, who switched from Labor to Kadima last year, was given a minor portfolio — minister in charge of developing the Negev and the Galilee. He was also named deputy prime minister, a title less senior than Livni's rank of vice premier.

Outgoing Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz was appointed transportation minister, a significant demotion from his current job.

Kadima's Meir Sheetrit was another of those disappointed. He was considered a leading candidate for the prestigious finance ministry but was appointed housing minister instead. Sheetrit's snubbing apparently clears the way for current Tourism Minister Abraham Hirchson, an Olmert confidante, to lead the finance ministry.

Israel's Finance Minister Named (FT)

By Sharmila Devi

Financial Times, May 2, 2006

Avraham Hirchson, a close friend of Ehud Olmert, acting Israeli prime minister, was named finance minister yesterday in a new government that is expected to maintain free market budgetary and fiscal policies.

Mr Olmert's new coalition - his Kadima party, Labour, the ultra-Orthodox Shas and Pensioners party - was expected to be sworn in on Thursday in the Knesset. The government will control at least 67 seats in the 120-seat Knesset, fewer than Mr Olmert had sought.

Other key appointments include Tzipi Livni as foreign minister and vice-premier and Labour's Amir Peretz as defence minister. Mr Peretz, a former trades union leader, replaces the hardline Shaul Mofaz, who becomes transport minister. Sharmila Devi, Jerusalem

What next for Hamas and the Palestinian funding crisis?

Wolfensohn Steps Down As Gaza Envoy (AFP)

AFP, May 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027827

Former World Bank president James Wolfensohn formally stepped down as economic coordinator for Gaza, saying the rise of a Hamas-led Palestinian government made his job untenable.

At a news conference with US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Wolfensohn announced his expected resignation after a year as envoy of the Middle East "quartet": the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia.

Wolfensohn, 72, told reporters he had made "quite a lot of progress" in promoting economic development of Gaza after the Israelis withdrew in September of last year.

But he said that given the militant Hamas' accession to power after its surprise win in January's Palestinian elections, "the political events are such that I think the issues are above my pay grade."

"With the government of Hamas having taken over with the Palestinians, it's a very difficult movement to be able to try and negotiate any independent type of arrangements," Wolfensohn said.

The United States considers Hamas a terrorist group and refuses to help it until it recognizes Israel, renounces violence and agrees to respect agreements struck by the previous Palestinian government.

Wolfensohn, who had frequently complained of being "disenfranchised" in his Gaza role and threatened to quit, left with a warning that the West should not consider trying to starve the Hamas-led Palestinians into submission.

"I don't think anyone in the quartet believes that to be the policy -- although, sometimes, it is made to appear that that is what it is," he said. "I think that's a losing gambit."

Wolfensohn had initially intended to leave the job in December but bowed to a US request that he stay on until the end of April to allow the Palestinian and Israeli elections to play out.

While agreeing it was time for Wolfensohn to step down, Rice signaled he might be called back for another stint and said, "I hope he will keep his uniform not very far from the door."

"While conditions currently are very complicated in the Palestinian-Israeli issue, we all hope and all look forward to and are going to continue to work for movement toward the (peace) road map," she said.

Hamas has rejected the road map, drafted by the quartet and aimed at creation of an independent Palestinian state living alongside Israel.

Rice, who was to host a quartet meeting in New York next week, said there were no immediate plans to replace Wolfensohn but did not rule out a move in the future.

"What we need to do is to try, over the next period of time, to get the political conditions right so that we can move forward," she said.

"Nobody wants to be in a situation in which the prospects for the two-state solution, to which we are all devoted, do not seem immediately before us."

The chief US diplomat deflected a question on whether the West was creating a crisis in the Palestinian territories by cutting off aid badly needed to pay salaries and provide services.

She said the priority was to deal with Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel's right to exist: "We've simply got to get through that. It can't be business as usual."

France has proposed creating a special World Bank account to pay the salaries of the 160,000 Palestinian civil servants directly without going through the Hamas hierarchy.

Rice's spokesman Sean McCormack declined to comment on the idea but suggested the salaries of Palestinian government workers did not fit into the US pledge to maintain humanitarian aid.

"The reason why they might not get paid is because they have a Hamas-led government that advocates the use of terror," McCormack said. "It's not because of the international community or their behaviors."

Pakistan Gets Praise, But No U.S. Trade Deal (WSJ)

By Shahid Shah

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Pakistan, an early ally in America's war on terrorism, hoped its close relations with Washington would also strengthen commercial ties between the two countries. But Islamabad is learning that not all alliances are created equal.

DOJ_NMG_0027828

On a tour of South Asia earlier this year, President Bush went to Pakistan and congratulated President Pervez Musharraf on his economic policies, which have spurred growth in the country's gross domestic product and its stock markets. The visit followed Mr. Bush's stop in neighboring rival India, where the two countries sealed a range of trade deals, including a landmark agreement on nuclear power.

Pakistani officials had hoped for a textile-trade pact, but Mr. Bush didn't offer one. Textiles comprise about 60% of Pakistan's economy, and officials there are working to expand sales to America. But opposition from U.S. companies has frustrated these hopes somewhat.

During Mr. Bush's visit to Pakistan, he referred to a bilateral investment treaty, although details of the pact -- which was proposed in 2004 -- are still being worked out. On textiles, "there is no concrete development yet," said Ashraf Hayat, Pakistan's trade minister here.

Mr. Bush also pushed creating a trade zone along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border to stimulate business in that violent region. Products from the zone would be exported duty-free to the U.S., boosting local textile producers and possibly sparking expansion in other industries. Even so, the program's scope is narrower than trade preferences sought by Pakistan, underscoring the Bush administration's limits on granting trade favors, even to an ally who backed the campaign against terrorism after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

Making Pakistan's quest tougher is a political climate in which many Capitol Hill lawmakers are loath to offer special benefits to trading partners. With the U.S. trade deficit at an all-time high, unease is spreading in Congress with the tightening integration of the global economy.

U.S. textile producers, who have lost tens of thousands of jobs to foreign competition, have proved effective against trade liberalization. Last year, the industry helped lead a coalition that nearly derailed a trade pact with Central America, a major piece of the Bush agenda.

Though a world-wide textile-quota system expired last year, Pakistan is pushing to get American tariffs suspended or lowered. U.S. tariffs on Pakistani goods, which average 10.4%, vary across hundreds of products, with some facing levies of nearly 30% and others none at all. The White House hasn't responded, in part because Congress must approve changes in tariff rates.

The U.S. is Pakistan's largest textile market, buying $3.01 billion in apparel, textile products, cotton, yarn and fabric, and floor coverings last year. Cutting tariffs could boost these numbers, as well as the Pakistani economy. But the end of the quota system has lifted U.S. textile imports from a host of nations by 6.4% to $95.57 billion last year, alarming already-struggling U.S. textile makers.

"We have lost half a million jobs during the past six years, as we see enormous U.S. access to textile-producing countries," said Auggie Tantillo, executive director of the American Trade Action Committee, which represents textile producers. "Naturally, we are concerned about this and little bit resistant too."

Mindful of this resistance, Pakistan has sought joint ventures with textile companies in North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia and Alabama as an alternative way to boost exports. Islamabad has suggested strategic alliances, marketing partnerships and technical-collaboration accords with Pakistani firms but has yet to get a response from U.S. companies.

Textiles are Pakistan's largest industrial sector, employing about 15 million people and accounting for 8.5% of total gross domestic product. Opening the U.S. market further could create as many as 200,000 more jobs, officials say.

The benefits offered by the prospective investment treaty are less clear. Proposed in September 2004, it "can play an important role in strengthening Pakistan's economy, so as to create new opportunities for exporters and investors in both economies and assist in meeting the economic conditions to counter terrorism," said then-U.S. Trade Representative Robert Zoellick.

The U.S has such pacts with 39 countries, providing protection for U.S. investors doing business there without a free-trade agreement. They also encourage adoption of market-oriented domestic policies that treat private investment in an open, transparent and nondiscriminatory way.

Details are being negotiated, said Mr. Hayat, the Pakistani trade minister, adding, "We are very close to the treaty."

DOJ_NMG_0027829

In 2004, U.S. foreign direct investment in Pakistan was $991 million, up from $790 million in 2003. Still, the country's authoritarian government, as well as fears of corruption and violence, have curbed investment over the past five years, experts say.

Meanwhile, U.S textile makers aim to capitalize on U.S.-Pakistan ties to expand their sales. American textile exports -- mainly raw cotton, cotton fiber cloth, finished textile supplies, apparel, household goods and sports apparel -- face tariffs of 15% to 25% from Pakistan.

"Pakistan must give something to get something," says Cass Johnson, president of the National Council of Textile Organizations, an industry advocacy group.

Militants Kill 35 Hindus Days Before Talks On Kashmir (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

NEW DELHI, May 1 — Thirty-five Hindus were killed in recent days in two separate incidents in the Indian-administered portion of the disputed Kashmir province, the police said. The killings were believed to be the handiwork of Islamist militants just days before a scheduled meeting between the Indian prime minister and Kashmiri separatists.

In one incident, gunmen stormed a village in the Doda district, dragged Hindu villagers from their homes and shot 22 of them dead. In another, in the neighboring Udhampur district, suspected militants kidnapped 13 villagers from a remote mountainous spot. Four of their bodies were found lying in the woods late Sunday, while the rest were discovered Monday, the police said.

Even by the standards of blood-soaked Kashmir, it was a particularly grisly pair of incidents — and the deadliest violence since peace talks began more than two years ago between India and Pakistan, neighbors and rivals on the question of Kashmir. The attacks are worrisome because they appear intended to fuel Hindu-Muslim tensions.

Their impact is likely to be felt during the talks about Kashmir's future, scheduled to begin Wednesday between the Indian prime minister, Manmohan Singh, and a coalition of Kashmiri separatist leaders known as the All Parties Hurriyat Conference.

Mr. Singh and the leaders of Hurriyat were swift to condemn the fresh violence. But that does not mean that the negotiations will yield quick results. The last time the prime minister announced a roundtable on Kashmir, in February, Hurriyat leaders did not show up. Along with the Pakistani government, they have stepped up their criticism of the Indian government, contending that it is dragging its feet on a resolution to the Kashmir dispute.

"People of Kashmir have rejected and rebuffed terrorists repeatedly," Mr. Singh said in a statement on Monday.

Killings of Hindu and Sikh villagers became a routine form of terrorism some years ago, when relations between India and Pakistan were at a low ebb. The most infamous of the massacres was in March 2000, on the eve of President Clinton's state visit to India, when 37 Sikhs were killed in the village of Chattisinghpora.

Peace talks between India and Pakistan have, even by the Indian government's assessment, radically reduced violence in Indian Kashmir. But the killings, for which India blames both Pakistani security forces and militants, have hardly stopped.

The coming months are crucial for the peace efforts. It is usually in the summer, after the snows have melted on the rugged mountains of Kashmir, that Indians accuse Pakistan-backed insurgents of crossing over to the Indian side of the de facto border and stirring up trouble.

Only if Indians see that infiltration and violence are down are they likely to agree to any deals on Kashmir, including pulling back troops from the Siachen Glacier, one of the costliest and deadliest missions for the armies of both countries.

Kashmir Killings Cast Shadow On India Peace Talks (FT)

By Jo Johnson In New Delhi

Financial Times, May 2, 2006

India suffered the single worst incident of communal violence in Jammu & Kashmir in three years on Monday when suspected Islamic militants gunned down 22 people in a pre-dawn massacre of Hindu villagers.

Manmohan Singh, India's prime minister, condemned the killings, which appeared timed to disrupt his meetings on Tuesday with Mirwaiz Umar Farooq, a moderate leader from the All Party Hurriyat Conference, an alliance of separatist groups.

DOJ_NMG_0027830

The weekend death toll in Kashmir totalled at least 35. Nine Hindu herdsmen were found shot dead yesterday in Udhampur after a further four had been killed on Sunday.

Mr Singh is due to chair a second round table – part of the central government's efforts to resolve the Kashmir issue – later this month. The first was held in New Delhi on February 25.

India and Pakistan agreed a ceasefire along Line of Control (LoC) in November 2003 and began peace talks in 2004. They have restored diplomatic, travel and sports links, but made little progress with what Islamabad refers to as the "core issue of Kashmir".

In a sign of determination to press ahead with peace talks, the Indian Ministry of Foreign Affairs said a seven-member delegation from Pakistan would arrive in New Delhi on Tuesday for two days of talks on confidence-building measures across the LoC in Jammu & Kashmir.

Indian diplomats say militant infiltration from Pakistan-controlled Kashmir across the LoC is the main "trust issue" that is preventing progress in the two-and-a-half-year-old peace process.

One injured man told Sahara News television channel over the telephone that armed militants had pulled people out of their homes, lined them up and opened fire. No group has yet claimed responsibility.

"They took one man from each house. The others they told to go inside. They said they would set us free later. After going some distance, they started beating us up and then opened fire," the witness said.

The killings in the remote Doda district took place hours after the slaughter of four Hindu shepherds near the town of Udhampur on Sunday. Hindus comprise slightly more than 40 per cent of Indian-administered Jammu & Kashmir's 11m population.

"By singling out Hindus for such a major massacre, they are sending a message to the entire Indian nation that this exercise [peace process] undertaken by the government is futile," deputy chief minister Muzaffar Baig said.

The deaths have aroused fears of a new wave of minority killings in the disputed state. At least 45,000 people have been killed during the 16-year insurgency against Indian rule in Kashmir. Thousands of Hindus have fled the state.

The de facto border area, high in the Himalayas, is one of the most militarised in the world. Some of those fighting Indian rule want full independence, while others would like to merge with Pakistan.

India accuses Pakistan of arming and training the guerrillas.

Pakistan, which denies aiding infiltration by militants, says the revolt is indigenous and it only gives moral and diplomatic support to what it calls Kashmiri "freedom fighters".

Ghulam Nabi Azad, chief minister of Jammu & Kashmir, said: "We will not allow them to succeed in their designs, we would rather give a big push to the peace process. I want to make it clear once and for all that we will not bow to any pressure from terrorists."

U.S. Diplomat Heads To Nigeria To Try To Unsnarl Darfur Talks (NYT)

By Joel Brinkley And Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 1 — The Bush administration on Monday dispatched Robert B. Zoellick, the deputy secretary of state, to Nigeria, where he plans to plunge directly into the negotiations over a treaty to end the carnage in the Darfur region of Sudan, which stalled again on Monday.

Mediators extended the talks for 48 hours after the Sudanese government and Darfur rebel groups, meeting in Abuja, Nigeria, failed to reach full agreement by the deadline on Sunday night. Then on Monday morning, Vice President Ali Osman Taha of Sudan, the senior representative of his government at the talks, abruptly left Abuja and returned to Sudan's capital, Khartoum, complaining that the rebel leaders had been intransigent, officials said.

The Sudanese government offered on Sunday to accept the terms of the proposed agreement, but two of the three principal Darfur rebel groups refused. On Monday, the third and most important rebel group also expressed strong reservations.

Among the provisions of the proposed agreement are several that call on the rebels and government militias to disarm in a carefully choreographed sequence. But each side holds deep distrust for the other.

DOJ_NMG_0027831

Sudanese officials said Monday that if the peace talks failed, the blame would fall squarely on the rebels, for refusing what the government claims is a fair deal. But the State Department urged Mr. Taha to return to Abuja, saying in a statement that the negotiations had come "down to a few difficult issues."

Abduljabbar Dosa, chief negotiator of the largest and most important rebel faction of the Sudanese Liberation Movement, reacted angrily to Mr. Taha's decision to leave.

"The departure of Ali Osman Taha at this time, it gives a wrong sign," Mr. Dosa said.

Frustrated by the state of affairs, Salim Ahmed Salim, the lead mediator, called Mr. Zoellick on Monday morning and asked him to come to Abuja immediately. Mr. Zoellick has been deeply engaged in the Darfur issue since he took office last year, and knows nearly everyone involved in the talks. He agreed and left Monday afternoon and will arrive in Abuja Tuesday morning, in time to play a role in the final day of negotiations.

In Abuja, negotiators for the rebel movements sounded defiant and upbeat, firmly rejecting the plan as presented yet leaving open the possibility of a deal.

Ahmed Tugod Lissan, chief negotiator for one of the rebel groups, the Justice and Equality Movement, said of the agreement: "It left out critical areas as far as power sharing and the status of Darfur region. But I am optimistic something could be achieved within the next 24 hours."

Mr. Dosa called the deal unacceptable because it did not include compensation for those driven off their land.

In Khartoum, Jamal Ibrahim, a spokesman for the Sudanese government, said: "We have been committed to the deadline on the 30th of April. But now the problem is that the rebel movements are not accepting to sit and sign."

A senior Sudanese diplomat who has been following the talks closely said the government might have erred in so quickly accepting the deal, because it gave the impression that it was far more favorable to the government than to the rebels.

"It complicated the matter further, because the rebels saw the quick acceptance as a trick for them," said the diplomat, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak openly on the matter.

More than 200,000 people have died and two million more have been driven from their homes since the conflict began in February 2003. The Abuja peace talks have limped along for almost two years.

But in early April, the African Union, with the support of the United Nations, said the talks would end if no agreement was reached by April 30. As a result, both the government and Darfur rebel groups sent senior representatives to Abuja last week.

Part of the difficulty of persuading the rebels to accept the deal, said John Prendergast, a former senior Africa specialist for the United States government, is that the rebels are afraid of giving away "the one card they have, which is military pressure, before being certain of movement implementing the peace deal."

U.S. Sends Diplomat For Darfur Talks (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, May 1, 2006

Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick was dispatched to Africa on Monday to push for a peace agreement to end political and ethnic conflict in the Darfur region of Sudan.

Zoellick's trip was announced after the first day of a two-day extended deadline for a settlement ended without a pact. Sudan's government has said it will accept the accord, but rebel groups are still pressing additional demands.

"As long as the parties are talking, there's always a chance for an agreement," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said. But she declined to predict the outcome.

At a news conference, Rice said President Bush felt "very strongly and very passionately" about both the need for an agreement and getting a robust and largely African security force in to protect the people of Darfur.

"It takes time," she said, "We need to shake the trees a little bit, shake the bureaucracy a little bit and say to people: 'It's not acceptable to wait any longer for at least the planning for a robust security force.'"

Disarming militias and integrating them into an armed force are among a handful of matters that must be resolved before completion of a historic deal. Sunday's deadline was extended at U.S. request.

DOJ_NMG_0027832

"We are down to a few difficult issues," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in announcing Zoellick's mission to the talks supervised by the African Union in Abuja, Nigeria. "Nothing is done until everything is done," he said shortly before Zoellick's plane took off.

By some estimates, at least 200,000 people have been killed and 2 million driven from their homes since 2003 in the western Sudan province. After a slow start, the world's attention has focused on the conflict between a rebel insurgency and tribal militias linked to an Arab-dominated Khartoum government.

U.S. efforts to end the warfare in Darfur accelerated in the spring of 2004, when the 10th anniversary of the genocide in Rwanda helped focus attention on it. The United States has pledged or provided $1.7 billion to help Sudan, much of which is for Darfur.

Thousands of people, some clutching signs that read, "Never Again," rallied Sunday in Washington and several of the speakers urged President Bush to take stronger action to end the suffering amid what the administration has determined was genocide.

"You need the participation and public good will of all states who have an interest in seeing that this humanitarian situation, that this tragedy is corrected," McCormack said.

Zoellick is "results-oriented" and prepared to meet with whomever can help get the agreement over the goal line, McCormack said.

The deputy secretary will be there "into the undetermined future," McCormack said.

Besides Zoellick's trip, the U.S. has been working with officials of NATO, which Washington wants to provide more logistical and training support for African Union peacekeepers.

Efforts are also under way to provide a possible United Nations force to aid African Union troops, a move the Sudanese government has said it would support if a peace treaty is signed.

In the Sudanese capital, the country's chief negotiator, Majzoub Khalifa, said the rebels' reluctance to sign the agreement was "regrettable," but that the government would begin immediately abiding by the agreement.

The African Union must decide what to do if the talks fail, Khalifa said.

Extended Deadline Fails To Lift Hopes Of Deal On Darfur (FT)

By Andrew England In Nairobi

Financial Times, May 2, 2006

The African Union yesterday extended a deadline for the Sudanese government and rebels fighting in Darfur to accept a peace accord by two days, in a last ditch attempt to convince the insurgents to reach an agreement.

But the prospects of a deal looked bleak, with the rebels insisting amendments had to be made to a draft agreement put forward by the AU last week.

The AU, which has led more than two years of tortuous negotiations between the belligerents, had given the warring parties until the end of Sunday to sign the accord. That was extended until midnight tonight to allow the parties to "engage amongst themselves", said Salim Ahmed Salim, chief AU mediator at the talks in Abuja, the Nigerian capital.

The government said on Sunday it accepted the draft deal, but one of the rebel groups said it wanted fundamental changes to the accord. Factions of the main group also failed to sign because of objections to power-sharing and security arrangements listed in the agreement.

Mr Salim said it had been "frustrating" to deal with the rebels, and urged all the groups to agree to a deal.

"I can tell you that this war in Darfur has shaken Africa to its core . . . The eyes of Africa and the wider international community are fixed on us here," he said. "The consequence of not signing this agreement will be a drastic and negative impact on the people of Darfur, whose suffering and death will continue for no reason."

The violence in Darfur erupted in 2003 when rebel groups took up arms seeking a greater share of power and national wealth for their marginalised region. Since then, violence has killed tens of thousands of people and made over 2m homeless.

The US has accused the government and pro-government Arab militia of genocide, and on Sunday thousands of Americans demonstrated to urge Washington to do more to end the conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0027833

The accord is seen as critical to the planned transfer of the AU peacekeeping mission in Darfur to the UN.

Bolivian President Seizes Gas Industry (WP)

By Monte Reel And Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, May 2, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela, May 1 -- Bolivian President Evo Morales seized control of the country's natural gas industry Monday, sending soldiers to occupy fields that he contends private companies have plundered for years.

Morales said that unless foreign energy firms agreed to give Bolivia's state oil company oversight of production and a majority of their revenue generated in Bolivia, the government would evict them from the fields.

"The time has come, the awaited day, a historic day in which Bolivia retakes absolute control of our natural resources," Morales said during a televised speech from a gas field near the country's southern border. "The looting by foreign companies has ended."

Morales's announcement was expected, but his deployment of troops to gas fields was a strong statement in a region where governments are moving to block outside influence, particularly from the United States, and exert more control over the energy industry. Venezuela recently voided drilling contracts with private companies at 32 oil fields, demanding new contracts that give the state oil company a 60 percent stake. Ecuador is finalizing a law that could limit excessive profits by foreign crude producers.

The developments in Bolivia were not expected to affect the U.S. energy market. Even in Bolivia, analysts played down the importance of the troop deployment, but they acknowledged the message Morales was trying to send.

"I think it was a symbolic move to send the military to the oil fields to show that Bolivians are now in charge of taking care of their own property," said Gonzalo Chavez, a political analyst with the Catholic University in La Paz, the Bolivian capital. "It's an extremely popular move. There's a lot of nationalism in the country right now, and this is something that a lot of people are going to like."

During his victorious electoral campaign last year, Morales promised that he would force energy companies to give at least 50 percent of their revenue to the government's state energy company. The plan announced Monday called for a substantially higher percentage -- 82 percent -- to be surrendered by any company producing more than 100 million cubic feet of natural gas daily. He said that all companies have six months to agree to the terms or be kicked out of the country.

Bolivia boasts South America's second-largest reserves of natural gas, behind Venezuela. The country does not play a major role in international energy markets, but its natural gas exports are important to some of its neighbors.

About 25 international energy firms operate in Bolivia. Brazil's Petrobras and Spain's Repsol YPF have the largest operations in the country, and Exxon Mobil Corp. of the United States maintains a smaller presence.

Morales has conceded that Bolivia needs the help of those foreign companies to get reserves out of the ground, and he has said his nationalization plan is not designed to cut those companies completely out of the sector.

Bob Davis, an Exxon spokesman, said Monday that the company was "monitoring the situation" in Bolivia. He said that earlier concerns prompted Exxon to submit a letter to an international arbitration board saying that the company was contemplating a request for arbitration.

Oil industry officials have been increasingly concerned about the investment climate in Bolivia. According to news reports, Bolivia's attorney general, Pedro Gareca, opened criminal cases in mid-March against three former Bolivian presidents and eight former energy ministers for alleged wrongdoing in drawing up and signing contracts with foreign oil companies.

Morales's government has held bilateral talks with energy firms in recent weeks, but negotiations sputtered. Petrobras, after announcing additional investments of $5 billion shortly after Morales's inauguration in January, rescinded the plan in March because of uncertainty over the government's policies. Tensions also flared with Repsol YPF after the government accused its executives of smuggling oil out of the country.

Monday's announcement coincided with May Day workers' celebrations throughout the country. Morales had been under political pressure to announce the plan, which his backers consider a key to the success of his administration. He has said he plans to use increased state revenue from the takeover to fund social programs in South America's poorest country.

DOJ_NMG_0027834

A longtime leader of Bolivia's coca growers union, Morales was elected in December after leading protests railing against foreign corporations and the management of the country's gas resources, which are mostly located in the Santa Cruz province in the southeastern corner of Bolivia. He spent the weekend in Cuba with ideological ally Hugo Chavez, the Venezuelan leader who has helped lead a regional shift away from the privatization of South American industries and toward more state control.

Even though it recently reached oil independence, Brazil is the country that leans most heavily on Bolivia for natural gas. In the 1990s, the Brazilian government reinforced the country's hydroelectric power grid with plants fueled by natural gas, and many of Brazil's automobiles run on natural gas. About half of Brazil's natural gas needs -- 520 million cubic feet daily -- are supplied by Bolivia via a 2,000-mile pipeline financed mostly by Petrobras. In 2003, Petrobras discovered gas deposits within Brazil that some experts say could significantly ease demand, but tapping that gas could prove costly and difficult.

Bolivian Nationalizes The Oil And Gas Sector (NYT)

By Paulo Prada

The New York Times, May 2, 2006

RIO DE JANEIRO, May 1 — President Evo Morales of Bolivia ordered the military to occupy energy fields around the country on Monday as he placed Bolivia's oil and gas reserves under state control.

Surrounded by soldiers at an oil field operated by the Brazilian energy giant Petróleo Brasileiro, or Petrobras, Mr. Morales ordered foreign producers to relinquish control of all fields and channel future sales of hydrocarbons through the state-owned energy company.

He gave foreign companies 180 days to renegotiate existing contracts with the government, or leave the country.

"The time has come, the awaited day, a historic day in which Bolivia retakes absolute control of our natural resources," Mr. Morales declared, according to The Associated Press. "The looting by the foreign companies has ended."

The decree is the latest step by Latin America governments from Venezuela to Ecuador to assert greater control over the energy sector, moves that have sent shivers through foreign producers.

Motivated by nationalist politics and soaring oil and gas prices, governments have seized an opportunity to gain higher revenues while parlaying their control over future energy supplies into greater political leverage, both at home and abroad.

"Governments in the region see energy as a commodity they can use to push populist agendas," said Adriano Pires, director of the Brazilian Center for Infrastructure Studies, an energy consultancy in Rio de Janeiro.

"From a political point of view, it's a powerful issue to manipulate, but from an industrial point of view, it can do real harm."

Mr. Morales's decree, in effect to nationalize Bolivia's energy industry, which includes the second-biggest gas reserves in Latin America after Venezuela, quickly added to the nervousness of foreign producers.

They said they would proceed with caution until the government clarified under what conditions it plans to renegotiate contracts.

"We're worried," said Begoña Elices, director of external relations in Madrid at Repsol YPF S.A., the Spanish oil company, the second biggest investor in Bolivia's gas sector. "There will be a lot of fine print to consider."

Petrobras, the biggest investor, with over $1 billion invested in Bolivia, criticized the government's "unilateral attitude" and said it would take whatever steps necessary to "protect the rights of the company" and guarantee Brazil's supply of gas, half of which comes from Bolivia.

The importance of Bolivian gas to Brazil — the largest market in the region — prompted concern even from President Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, a leftist and former union leader who publicly hailed Mr. Morales's rise to power.

Mr. da Silva is to meet with José Gabrielli de Azevedo, chief executive at Petrobras, on Tuesday, along with senior officials from Brazil's Ministry of Mines and Energy.

The Bolivian announcement fulfilled a campaign pledge that helped Mr. Morales rise to power last December. It was foreshadowed last year when Bolivia approved a major increase in the royalties paid by foreign producers for the right to operate in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0027835

In April, President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela, a mentor to Mr. Morales, seized two oil fields operated by the Total group, of France, and Ente Nazionale Idrocarburi, of Italy, because they were unwilling to give more control of their operations to Petróleos de Venezuela, the state-run energy giant.

But Mr. Morales's step on Monday was the most assertive yet, and many industry observers feared such moves would scare away investors and jeopardize the region's economies.

"This isn't like Saudi Arabia, which over the years has developed a know-how to dominate the industry independently," said Gal Luft, co-director of the Institute for the Analysis of Global Security, a consultancy in Washington that studies energy issues.

"When you cause problems for foreign investors, you cause problems for those who know how to create and develop the industry."

Bolivian Leader Nationalizes Fuel Industry (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, May 2, 2006

Morales threatens to throw out foreign firms that don't agree to sell most assets to the state. It's unclear where the money will come from.

SANTA CRUZ, Bolivia — President Evo Morales, who won a landslide election victory in December vowing an end to foreign "looting" of the country's natural resources, nationalized Bolivia's crucial natural gas and oil industry Monday, the latest indication of Latin America's leftward drift.

Morales ordered soldiers to secure Bolivia's natural gas fields and installations, the media here reported, and he threatened to throw out foreign companies unless they agreed to new contracts within six months giving the state control of energy production.

"The time has come, the awaited day, a historic day in which Bolivia retakes absolute control of its natural resources," Morales declared in a speech from the San Alberto petroleum field in the country's south.

Negotiations are to begin immediately with affected firms, mostly from Europe and other South American countries. Experts said the move should not affect U.S. energy prices because the United States is not a major consumer of Bolivian natural gas or oil.

Morales is closely allied with Cuba's Fidel Castro and Venezuela's Hugo Chavez, both outspoken critics of U.S. policy. The Bolivian leader signed the nationalization decree after returning from a trip to Havana, where he was warmly welcomed by Castro and Chavez.

The trio proposed a new trade bloc to counter what they called U.S. domination in the region.

Left-leaning governments are also in charge in Brazil, Argentina, Chile and Uruguay, but all are on better terms with Washington than Morales and his allies — and role models — in Havana and Caracas.

Elsewhere in Latin America, left-wing nationalist and Chavez admirer Ollanta Humala, a former army officer, is in a runoff election for Peru's presidency, and leftist Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador is making a strong bid for the presidency of Mexico.

In Bolivia, Morales, wearing a helmet of the state energy firm, chose May 1, International Day of the Workers and a national holiday here, to unveil his nationalization plan.

There was little overt reaction on the streets of this bustling eastern Bolivian city, a stronghold of anti-Morales sentiment where a civic shutdown is planned this week to protest Morales' governance.

On Monday evening, Morales addressed a roaring crowd in La Paz, the Andean administrative capital where he has strong support, especially among the poor and working class tired of the lack of social progress in South America's most impoverished nation.

Television here aired footage of soldiers and police standing guard outside some gas installations, along with images of gas stations with banners proclaiming the sites had been nationalized.

Thousands gathered to celebrate the president's move in La Paz's central Plaza Murillo, where Morales addressed an enthusiastic crowd and folk singers chanted nationalist anthems.

DOJ_NMG_0027836

The government's plan appeared to be less of an outright takeover of foreign assets than a mandatory sale of most assets to the government energy concern. Morales had said he would not take the expropriation route and has indicated a willingness to allow some foreign companies to remain as minority shareholders under his new terms.

Bolivia has the continent's second-largest natural gas reserves, after Venezuela, but most of its capacity remains untapped because of a lack of infrastructure and investment. Much of its gas is sold to neighboring Brazil and Argentina.

Petroleum production is less significant.

U.S. energy firms including Exxon Mobil, which holds a partial stake in a currently non-producing field, have relatively small interests here. But European and South American companies — including Brazil's Petrobras, the Spanish-Argentine Repsol, Britain's BG Group and France's Total — have significant holdings.

Morales indicated that some major producers would be able to retain 18% of their production, but he did not name which firms would qualify.

The move could presage friction with neighboring nations as well as European investors.

In Madrid, the Associated Press reported, Spain's Foreign Ministry expressed "deep concern" about the decree to nationalize the hydrocarbons sector, which includes significant Spanish investment.

"The government hopes … there is authentic negotiation and dialogue between the government and the different companies in which each other's interests are respected," the ministry said in a statement.

Morales and his aides depicted the move as a bold stroke for a man who rose in 10 years from a regional representative of growers of coca leaf — the raw ingredient in cocaine — to the first Indian president of a nation that is largely of Indian and mixed-race origin.

Morales has been waging an escalating war of words with Washington, which is worried about his vow to decriminalize the cultivation of coca and his friendships with Castro and Chavez. Morales has accused Washington of working to undermine his government, a charge denied by U.S. officials.

It remained unclear where Bolivia would secure the funds to purchase the private assets for its state energy concern, Yacimientos Petroliferos Fiscales Bolivianos, and how much the government would be willing to pay — market value or a price dictated by the Bolivian government.

"The big question is where the money is going to come from, and who will set the prices," said Eduardo Gamarra, a Bolivia expert at Florida International University in Miami.

International companies say they have invested about $3.5 billion in the Bolivian energy sector since the mid-1990s, when the formerly state-run industry was privatized in a move Morales harshly criticized during his election campaign. Investors worry they won't be able to recoup the massive amounts of money they plowed into Bolivia's gas fields, pipelines and other infrastructure since the government shed what was viewed by many as an inefficient and plodding state monopoly a decade ago. YPFB, the state entity, has since become largely administrative in nature, and a major unknown is how it will perform as a dominant force in the dynamic energy sector.

In recent years, two Bolivian presidents have been chased from office in large part because of protests by those who believed that gas and other natural resources were being siphoned off by foreign concerns and wealthy Bolivian allies. Morales' allies had called for a quick nationalization of gas and oil reserves.

Morales' election had already sent shock waves through the international investment community, and Monday's announcement seemed likely to make foreign companies hesitate even more to pump money into Bolivia.

"I think foreign investors will read this is in the correct way: Your investment is not safe in Bolivia," Gamarra said. "That's problematic for a country that needs investment."

But Morales and his supporters have argued that a new way of doing business is needed because foreign companies have plundered the national resources for decades without reducing a poverty rate that tops 60%.

"They have robbed us of our national patrimony," Morales said during his campaign. "We cannot continue to allow our most precious resources in the hands of foreign companies."

Morales won 54% of the vote in December's presidential election and assumed office in mid-January with a pledge to return resources to the people, rewrite the constitution and restore rights to Bolivia's long-repressed Indian population.

DOJ_NMG_0027837

His popularity has declined in recent months, polls show, but he still enjoys more than 60% support after 100 days in office, much of it in La Paz, the altiplano that is the Indian heartland, and the coca-growing regions.

Andrés D'Alessandro of The Times' Buenos Aires Bureau and special correspondent Óscar Ordóñez Arteaga in La Paz contributed to this report.

Bolivia Set To Seize Foreign-run Gas Fields (FT)

By Hal Weitzman In Lima

Financial Times, May 2, 2006

Bolivia ordered its military to seize natural gas fields controlled by foreign investors as the 100-day-old government of Evo Morales signalled it was putting into effect a campaign pledge to nationalise the sector.

Bolivia's gas industry is dominated by international energy companies, including Brazil's Petrobras, Repsol of Spain, Total of France, and BG and BP of the UK, and the decree is the latest sign of a hardening approach to foreign investors since Mr Morales' election.

"We want to ask [the armed forces] that, starting now, they occupy all the energy fields in Bolivia along with battalions of engineers," Mr Morales said after signing an official nationalisation decree in a ceremony at a gas field in south-eastern Bolivia operated by Petrobras.

The document stated that "the state recovers ownership, possession, and total and absolute control of these resources". Bolivia has the second-biggest reserves of natural gas in Latin America.

The intervention will heighten investors' concerns about the investment climate in the energy sector generally, and Mr Morales' willingness to pursue a leftwing agenda in particular. The Bolivian leader was in Havana on Saturday to sign a trade deal with Hugo Chávez, the Venezuelan leader, and Fidel Castro, the Cuban president.

Francisco Blanch, head of commodities at Merrill Lynch in London, said: "This is another step into the recent tide towards greater state control of commodities resources, as we have seen previously in Russia and Venezuela. States are taking a larger amount of the cake and that translates into higher oil and gas prices. This is extremely negative news for the oil and gas worldwide investment climate."

Álvaro García, Bolivia's vice-president, said officials from YPFB, the state energy company, and the military had begun to take control of 53 installations. YPFB and the state, he added, would assume responsibility for production, sales and pricing.

Congress last year passed a law that obliges foreign energy companies to hand over 50 per cent of their revenues in taxes and royalities. But Mr Garcia indicated that at the two largest gas fields, San Alberto and Sabalo, the split would now be 82-18 in the state's favour.

Significantly, both fields are operated by Petrobras and its subsidiaries. Petrobas, the biggest investor in Bolivian sector, is state-owned. Brazil's president Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva has good relations with Mr Morales. "Petrobas is the key to how the negotiations will play out for all the foreign companies in the sector," said one industry insider.

Foreign companies affected by Mr Morales' move, which together have invested about $3.5bn in the country in the past decade, said they needed time to study the presidential decree.

Last month Mr Morales expelled EBX, a Brazilian steelmaker, for allegedly breaking environmental law. Repsol's chief executives were imprisoned in March on oil-smuggling charges.

There has been growing concern in the US about the influence of Mr Chávez on Mr Morales. Washington is thought to be as worried about what it perceives as the Morales administration's weak commitment to democracy and close relations with Venezuela as it is about the slowing pace of coca eradication.

Mr Morales, Bolivia's first elected indigenous president, enjoys an approval rating of 80 per cent.

Bolivia Seeks Control Of Gas Production (WT/AP)

By Alvaro Zuazo, Associated Press

The Washington Times, May 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027838

LA PAZ, Bolivia -- President Evo Morales ordered soldiers to immediately occupy Bolivia's natural gas fields yesterday and threatened to evict foreign companies unless they sign new contracts within six months giving Bolivia majority control over the entire chain of production.

Mr. Morales said soldiers and engineers with Bolivia's state-owned oil company would be sent to installations operated by foreign petroleum companies.

"The time has come, the awaited day, a historic day in which Bolivia retakes absolute control of our natural resources," Mr. Morales said in a speech from the San Alberto petroleum field in southern Bolivia to decree what he called a nationalization of the natural gas industry. The field has been operated by Brazil's Petroleo Brasileiro SA, also called Petrobras, in association with the Spanish-Argentine Repsol YPF SA and France's Total SA.

Bolivia has South America's second largest natural gas reserves after Venezuela, and all foreign companies must turn over most production control to Bolivia's cash-strapped state-owned oil company, Yacimientos Petroliferos Fiscales Bolivianos (YPFB), Mr. Morales said.

Multinational companies that produced 100 million cubic feet of natural gas daily last year in Bolivia will be able to retain only 18 percent of their production, with the rest being given to YPFB, he said. Mr. Morales did not name the companies.

Mr. Morales has acknowledged that nationalization will not mean a complete state takeover, because Bolivia lacks the ability to tap all its natural gas on its own.

Last week, Mr. Morales told Brazil's Valor Economico newspaper that Bolivia would have to "set up a new battalion, a new army of oil and gas specialists to exert the property right" for a complete state takeover of petroleum production.

Other major petroleum companies doing business in Bolivia, besides Petroleo Brasileiro and Repsol, include Britain's BG Group PLC and BP PLC and U.S.-based Exxon Mobil Corp.

A Repsol spokesman said the company could not respond because it had not received official word of the announcement. Petrobras officials did not immediately return messages seeking comment yesterday, a national holiday in Brazil.

Mr. Morales said the government would begin negotiations immediately with the companies to make sure they are willing to comply, but said they could be stripped of their rights to operate in Bolivia if they don't sign new contracts within the six-month deadline.

In the past, YPFB produced Bolivia's natural gas, but it was reduced to an administrative role in the mid-1990s after the country's gas exploration and production business was privatized. Analysts have warned that the company is incapable of becoming a producer again without a massive infusion of cash.

Mr. Morales, a strident leftist, won a presidential election late last year after saying the country's natural resources had been "looted" by foreign companies and must be nationalized so that Bolivians could benefit from the profits that were being sent overseas.

Mr. Morales chose May 1, International Day of the Workers, to announce the nationalization plan. He wore a YPFB helmet as he gave his speech. Afterward, a soldier unfurled a Bolivian flag from atop the natural gas installation.

Mr. Morales also said the state would retake control of Bolivian hydrocarbon companies that were partially privatized in the 1990s, with the state taking a majority stake.

With the nationalization announcement, Mr. Morales is following the path of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, his populist political mentor, said Pietro Pitts, editor in chief for the Venezuela-based LatinPetroleum.com.

Mr. Chavez has also made moves to exert greater control over his country's vast petroleum reserves. Most foreign companies have decided to keep producing in Venezuela, though some announced they would abandon some production.

"You can call Bolivia Venezuela Part II because it seems like [Mr. Morales] is going to try to do the same thing that Chavez is doing," said Mr. Pitts, namely giving the state majority control in its fossil fuel wealth.

Bolivia Seizes Natural-Gas Fields In A Show Of Energy Nationalism (WSJ)

By David Luhnow And José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, May 2, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0027839

Emboldened by Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's moves against private oil companies, Bolivia nationalized its natural-gas industry, ordering foreign companies to give up control of fields and accept much tougher operating terms within six months or leave the country.

In a dramatic sign of how high energy prices have sparked a resurgence of nationalism from Caracas to Moscow, Bolivian President Evo Morales yesterday announced the nationalization at the country's biggest natural-gas field, San Alberto, and then ordered army troops to take control of it and the country's other fields, operated mainly by Brazil's state-run Petróleo Brasileiro SA, or Petrobras, and Spain's Repsol YPF SA. To date, foreign investment in Bolivia's energy sector totals about $3.5 billion.

"The time has come, the awaited day, a historic day on which Bolivia retakes absolute control of our natural resources," said Mr. Morales. The former coca grower won a landslide victory in December elections partly on a promise to nationalize the gas industry, seen by many poor here as the country's ticket to prosperity.

Mr. Morales's move mimics recent measures against Big Oil by Mr. Chávez, a close ally of the Bolivian politician who has seized on high energy prices in recent years to rewrite the rules of Venezuela's oil industry. Mr. Chávez has forced major oil companies to accept a minority stake in fields they previously owned and put more money in Venezuelan coffers through higher taxes and royalties.

"Chávez and Morales are both playing a game of chicken with foreign oil companies," said David Mares, a professor of political science at the University of California at San Diego who studies the regional oil industry. "In a period with high profits of oil companies, this is giving both of them a sense that the companies will really bend over backward to keep access to these places, and that this is the time to renegotiate the contracts."

It remains to be seen whether the moves by Messrs. Chávez and Morales, who signed a free-trade accord over the weekend with Cuba's Fidel Castro, will lead to a broader regional backlash against foreign oil companies and further complicate the global energy market. "Obviously there are concerns" about a ripple effect, "but we don't know what the future impact is going to be," said Bob Davis, an Exxon Mobil Corp. spokesman.

In Peru, presidential candidate Ollanta Humala has called for nationalizing the country's mining and natural-gas industries, spooking foreign investors. Mr. Humala won a first round of voting last month and faces a tough run-off against former President Alan Garcia, who vows to continue to welcome private investment. Ecuador last month passed a law designed to cut into windfall profits of foreign crude producers, among them U.S.-based Occidental Petroleum Corp., by giving the government 50% of oil-company profits whenever the international oil market exceeds the prices established in existing contracts.

