Within minutes of yesterday's indictment, Milberg launched a Web site, www.milbergweissjustice.com1, where it defends itself against the charges and provides links to news articles that it says highlight the "politicization of the Justice Department." In Los Angeles, U.S. officials said the case was "absolutely not" influenced by politics.

The indictment follows a breakthrough in the long-running case last month, when retired New Jersey mortgage broker Howard Vogel pleaded guilty to taking more than $2.4 million as payments to him and his family for serving as plaintiffs in about 40 suits as recently as 2005. Mr. Vogel or family members were plaintiffs in Milberg shareholder class-action suits against Oxford Health Plans Inc., Valero Energy Corp. and Mercer Corp., among others.

The Vogel guilty plea and yesterday's indictment refer to the role of a "Partner A," which lawyers close to the case have said is Mr. Weiss himself. Neither Mr. Weiss nor his former partner, William Lerach, are named in the indictment, but U.S. officials yesterday said the investigation is continuing. Mr. Lerach was the original focus of the kickback investigation when it began in 1999, those close to the case said. In 2004, Mr. Lerach split from Mr. Weiss to create Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins LLP in San Diego. That firm has emerged as a powerful rival to Milberg Weiss and could benefit if Milberg Weiss is fatally wounded by the criminal indictment.

Taking On Wall Street

The indictment could hurt Milberg's ability to win clients. For years it has been among the nation's most powerful law firms: In 2004 and 2005, Milberg settled an estimated 90 securities class actions, winning more than $1.5 billion in settlements, according to Institutional Shareholder Services Inc. Among its many pending cases is a massive class action alleging that Wall Street banks conspired with technology companies to artificially inflate stock prices in public offerings in the late 1990s and 2000. The suit has so far netted $1.4 billion in proposed settlements. Milberg is also pursuing KPMG LLP and the law firm Sidley Austin Brown & Wood LLP in connection with the sale of allegedly fraudulent tax shelters.

A Milberg spokeswoman said that the firm "will continue to vigorously represent its clients in the hundreds of courts across the country in which it continues to have cases." But legal experts raised doubts yesterday that the firm, with criminal charges hanging over it, can continue to win new clients and land the lucrative lead-counsel position in class-action cases.

"Courts now have to wonder about [Milberg's] ability to give full attention to a class-action client's interest," said James Cox, a securities-law professor at Duke University Law School. "The firm's energies are weakened, and, perhaps, so is its resolve."

Joseph Weiss, co-lead counsel with Milberg in a case against Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia Inc., says the firm should be disqualified from the matter at once. "The credibility of attorneys is only as good as their reputations," he says. "Even if proven to be innocent, they would be coming into court and representing clients with this taint hanging over them."

If Milberg is forced to step down in a class action, judges will have to decide whether the firm should be paid for work it has already performed. In a case against Deutsche Telekom AG last year that was settled for about $120 million, fees have not yet been paid. New York attorney Stanley Bernstein, one of the lead counsels in the matter, says Milberg should receive its full share of the fee award.

"When a lawyer is disqualified, courts have been willing to award fees based on the reasonable value of the services preformed," said W. Bradley Wendel, an ethics professor at Cornell University Law School. The issue becomes cloudier, say experts, if Milberg is disqualified in a case that is still in its early stages.

Far more clear, say lawyers, is that Milberg will find it nearly impossible to win future assignments. The competition for lead-counsel -- the firm that controls a class action and earns the most fees -- has grown increasingly intense, lawyers say, and rival firms are certain to try to use the indictment to their strategic advantage. "Some plaintiffs firms will be pulling out their long knives," said class-action lawyer Howard Sirota.

Earlier this year, Bernstein Liebhard argued that Lerach Coughlin was unfit to serve as lead counsel in a securities-fraud suit against Dana Corp. because the Lerach firm had been an early focus of the federal probe that enveloped Milberg. The judge in the Dana suit ultimately decided neither Bernstein nor Lerach should serve as lead counsel.

Whatever happens to Milberg, lawyers said the indictment will have little impact beyond the firm's walls. Before Mr. Lerach's departure in 2004, Milberg Weiss dominated the securities class-action field, accounting for more than half of the class settlements in some years, according to industry experts. "There was a time that Milberg was the 800-pound gorilla," said securities defense lawyer Michael Torpey. "But that kind of dominance dissipated when Milberg split up."

Milberg is still one of the nation's more prolific firms, filing at least 75 class actions last year, including suits against General Motors Corp. and Blockbuster Inc. Milberg also netted $637 million in securities class-action settlements for its clients in 2005 -- fourth highest among plaintiffs firms, according to Institutional Shareholder Services. Still, say lawyers, there are plenty of firms that are now capable of filling any Milberg void. "There are a lot of well- bankrolled class-action firms," says Prof. Cox of Duke. "The indictment will not affect the volume of securities litigation."

US Indictment For Big Law Firm In Class Actions (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

New York Times, May 19, 2006

The nation's leading class-action securities law firm, Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, and two of its partners were charged yesterday with making more than $11 million in secret payments to three individuals who served as plaintiffs in more than 150 lawsuits.

The indictment is the first instance of a law firm with national reach facing criminal charges, and it could prove to be a fatal blow for the firm. The lawsuits cited in the indictment spanned two decades, occurring as recently as 2005, and generated some $216 million in legal fees for the firm.

Its lucrative business made Milberg Weiss a target for political critics who saw the firm as a symbol of a national litigation industry that had gone out of control. These critics said that many of the firm's lawsuits against corporations were frivolous, raising the cost of doing business.

The critics contended that investors, for the most part, saw only pennies on the dollar from any recoveries won by the firm. In the 1990's, Congress raised the legal hurdle for such lawsuits in large part in response to Milberg Weiss. Even so, the firm continued to thrive.

"There's never been a firm of their prominence that has been indicted," said Ralph C. Ferrara, a former general counsel with the Securities and Exchange Commission who is now a lawyer with the law firm of LeBoeuf, Lamb, Greene & MacRae. "This is a regrettable and remarkable thing."

In the 20-count indictment by a federal grand jury in Los Angeles yesterday, Milberg Weiss and two of its prominent partners, David J. Bershad and Steven G. Schulman, are accused of racketeering conspiracy, mail fraud, money laundering conspiracy and obstruction of justice.

The prosecutors are asking for the return of the fees earned by the firm and those named in the indictment. In addition, there is the possibility of prison for the two partners — up to 20 years for racketeering conspiracy, for example.

To disguise some of the secret payments to plaintiffs, which prosecutors referred to as kickbacks, the law firm moved cash through casinos and kept money in a credenza in Mr. Bershad's office, the indictment said.

"This case is about protecting the integrity of the justice system in America," said Debra Wong Yang, the United States attorney in Los Angeles. The firm and lawyers for Mr. Bershad, 66, and Mr. Schulman, 54, said they would fight the charges.

Feared and loathed inside boardrooms across the country, Milberg Weiss made hay out of the numerous accounting and management scandals that caused stocks to collapse in recent years. Sometimes bullying, sometimes screaming, sometimes speaking very softly, the firm's lawyers coaxed and cajoled what it has estimated to be $45 billion in recoveries from companies.

"The people who are going to be happy about this indictment are the hundreds and hundreds of companies that Milberg Weiss successfully sued and the political demagogues who rail about 'trial lawyers' running up the price of eggs," said William W. Taylor, a lawyer at Zuckerman Spaeder who represents Milberg Weiss.

"You could hear the cheering all the way from Wall Street to Pennsylvania Avenue, and it feeds right into the hands of people who want to prevent victims from being able to get the justice from big companies that they deserve," Mr. Taylor said.

Legal experts said the criminal case could sharply change the landscape of securities class-action litigation as one of its dominant participants struggles to survive. While Milberg Weiss lawyers can still legally represent clients, the indictment is likely to set off a race among competitors to unseat the firm from several high-profile lawsuits.

The indictment could also open the door to the prospect of settlements made decades ago being reopened or of lawsuits against the firm itself by shareholders contending they did not receive enough in a settlement or by a law firm that was jostled out of representing a lead plaintiff.

"Could there be a class-action lawsuit against Milberg over this? It can happen," said George M. Cohen, a law professor with the University of Virginia. Mr. Cohen and others, however, noted that given the firm's partnership structure, the personal assets of the partners would most likely be protected and the firm itself probably does not have much cash.

Shortly after the indictment was announced, the firm denied wrongdoing in a posting on a Web site it started, www.milbergweissjustice.com.

"We will not allow the indictment today to deter us from our watchdog role," one of the firm's co-founders, Melvyn I. Weiss, said in a statement. "We will vigorously defend ourselves and our partners against these charges and we will be vindicated."

Mr. Weiss was not named in the indictment. The man behind the firm's other top name, Lawrence Milberg, died in 1989.

Andrew M. Lawler, a lawyer for Mr. Bershad, said, "David Bershad categorically denies the allegations of the indictment."

Herbert Stern, a lawyer for Mr. Schulman, said his client "will plead not guilty because he is not guilty, and we look forward to his ultimate vindication."

Prosecutors have so far been stymied in efforts to charge the two primary targets of the investigation, Mr. Weiss and his former partner, William S. Lerach. In 2004, Mr. Lerach started his own firm on the West Coast. Both men were told in February that they would not be indicted at this time, although people involved in the talks say they remain targets of prosecutors.

Negotiations to avert an indictment of the firm stalled in recent days. In a last-ditch effort to stave off prosecutors, Mr. Bershad and Mr. Schulman agreed to take leaves of absence. Additionally, the firm said it hired Bart M. Schwartz, a former chief of the criminal division for the United States attorney in Manhattan, to monitor its procedures regarding payment of referral fees.

Companies that have been targets of criminal investigations in recent years, like the accounting firm KPMG and the drug maker Bristol-Myers Squibb, reached deferred-prosecution agreements.

Milberg Weiss, however, refused to sign such an agreement, which would have required it to waive attorney-client privileges. On its Web site, the firm called that condition a "derogation of one of the bedrock principles of American law."

Others said they were disturbed that the entire law firm had been indicted, especially as the Justice Department has been reluctant to take such an action since the 2002 indictment of the accounting firm Arthur Andersen. The firm went out of business, although its conviction was overturned by the Supreme Court.

"I don't understand what the harm was to the members of the class-action lawsuit," said Lawrence W. Fox, a lawyer at Drinker Biddle & Reath and a former chairman of the American Bar Association's ethics committee. "Milberg Weiss itself had every incentive to maximize the recovery as, to some extent, their fee was dependent on that. There was never any incentive for them to settle on the cheap."

Ms. Yang, the United States attorney, said: "We really had a situation where the firm was not accepting responsibility, was not making any substantial changes to the firm itself. We really were in a situation where we had no choice but to indict."

The charges against the firm and the two partners were included in a revised indictment against a retired California lawyer and former Milberg client, Seymour M. Lazar, who was originally charged last summer.

From 1981 through about 2004, Mr. Lazar, 78, or members of his family served as plaintiffs in about 70 lawsuits for Milberg Weiss and got about $2.4 million in "secret and illegal kickback payments," the new indictment said.

According to the charges, the scheme involving Mr. Lazar and two other paid plaintiffs worked like this: Plaintiffs would buy securities anticipating that they would decline in value, hence positioning themselves to be named plaintiffs in the class actions.

After the court in a lawsuit awarded lawyers' fees, the firm and Mr. Bershad and Mr. Schulman gave cash directly to the plaintiffs or to intermediary lawyers.

The firm also falsely accounted for the payments as referral fees or professional fees, the indictment said.

Under New York law, it is illegal for a lawyer to promise or give anything to induce a person to bring a lawsuit or to reward a person for having done so, the indictment said.

Furthermore, the payments created a conflict because the paid plaintiffs had a "greater interest in maximizing the amount of attorneys' fees awarded to Milberg Weiss than in maximizing the net recovery" to others in the class, the indictment said.

One figure named as an unindicted co-conspirator in the indictment is a Beverly Hills ophthalmologist, Dr. Steven G. Cooperman. Dr. Cooperman or members of his family acted as plaintiffs in nearly 70 lawsuits, receiving approximately $6.5 million in payments, the indictment said.

It was testimony by Mr. Cooperman that led to the original investigation six years ago. His value as a potential witness, however, is tempered by the fact that he offered to provide evidence to prosecutors in hopes of receiving a reduced sentence on his conviction of art fraud.

In addition to Mr. Cooperman, another paid plaintiff, Howard J. Vogel, a retired mortgage broker, reached a plea agreement with prosecutors last month. He admitted to accepting $2.5 million in secret payments.

Milberg Weiss Attorneys Indicted For Conspiracy (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, May 19, 2006

Milberg Weiss, one of the most powerful class-action law firms in the US, and two of its top attorneys were indicted on Thursday on charges of conspiracy, money laundering and racketeering, marking the culmination of a six-year investigation into a firm that has secured more than $45bn in settlements for its clients.

At the heart of the charges against the firm - made by the US attorney's office in Los Angeles - are allegations that Milberg and two of its partners, David Bershad and Steven Schulman, bribed clients to get them to agree to act as plaintiffs in their lawsuits. The charges contend that Milberg gave kickbacks to clients from 1981 through 2004, including one former client, Seymour Lazar, who served, along with members of his family, as a plaintiff in about 70 Milberg lawsuits in exchange for $2.4 m.

Milberg Weiss did not return a call for comment.

The ability of Milberg to secure big settlements with a range of companies over the years, including Prudential Insurance, Lucent and Rite-Aid, helped it earn the wrath of legislators in Washington, who passed legislation in the 1990s to help curb class-action suits.

The charges will likely put a spotlight on the firm's founder, Melvyn Weiss, who was one of the first attorneys to use a 1966 Supreme Court ruling that made it easier for individuals to file suit together to bring securities class-action suits.

The 20-count indictment represents a sea change in the Justice Department's handling of white-collar crime and law firms. While the spate of corporate scandals in recent years resulted in numerous indictments of individual executives, and one of the world's biggest auditing firms, Andersen, prosecutors have never sought the criminal prosecution of the firms involved in those cases.

Milberg Weiss will be allowed to continue practising while it moves ahead to fight the charges, but the investigation and speculation about a possible indictment have already raised questions about the company's ability to represent clients.

A report in the Wall Street Journal this week suggested that the decision by federal prosecutors to indict the firm, a move that represents the most extreme action law enforcement can take against a company, stemmed from the firm's refusal after weeks of negotiations to waive attorney-client privilege, or the right to protect communications between corporate lawyers and their clients. Prosecutors also insisted that the firm hand over internal documents.

Milberg Weiss's refusal to meet the government's demands on the issue underscore a wider debate in the legal community about whether the Justice Department's tactics in prosecuting white-collar crime violate the constitutional rights of defendants.

Class-Action Law Firm Indicted In Fraud Case (LAT)

By E. Scott Reckard, Josh Friedman

Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

A New York law firm that has helped investors recover more than $45 billion in corporate fraud cases was indicted Thursday along with two of its partners on criminal charges of paying illegal kickbacks to clients.

The charges of fraud, racketeering and conspiracy, brought by a federal grand jury in Los Angeles, could ruin Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, one of the nation's wealthiest and most powerful law firms.

Legal experts noted that accounting giant Arthur Andersen collapsed after it was indicted in the Enron Corp. scandal. Vowing not to follow that example, Milberg Weiss predicted it would "beat back these charges."

The case also could have broad implications, potentially casting a cloud over class-action lawsuits and giving ammunition to pro-business groups seeking legislation to limit fraud damages and make it harder for shareholders to sue companies.

In a 20-count indictment, prosecutors contended that Milberg Weiss and partners David Bershad and Steven Schulman paid at least $11.3 million over a 25-year period to clients who agreed to act as plaintiffs.

Milberg Weiss often concealed the payments, prosecutors alleged, by paying the plaintiffs in cash or through intermediary law firms. Prosecutors said the "paid plaintiffs" were recruited to buy stocks in anticipation that they would fall in value, positioning themselves and Milberg Weiss to take the lead in securities-fraud cases and collect extra fees.

Paid plaintiffs, including Palm Springs resident Seymour M. Lazar, 78, allegedly recruited friends and family members to serve in similar roles.

"This case is about protecting the integrity of the justice system in America," said Debra Wong Yang, the U.S. attorney in Los Angeles. "Class-action attorneys and named plaintiffs occupy positions of trust in which they assume responsibility to tell the truth and to disclose relevant information to the court. This indictment alleges a wholesale violation of this responsibility."

The alleged kickbacks gave the paid plaintiffs "financial interests that differed from those of the class," Yang said.

Bershad and Schulman denied wrongdoing and said they would fight the charges. Schulman was the lead attorney for shareholders in a trial last year involving the hiring and firing of former Walt Disney Co. President Michael Ovitz.

Milberg Weiss has been the dominant representative of class-action plaintiffs in the U.S. for the last decade, with recoveries that include $600 million for Lucent Corp. shareholders, $460 million for Raytheon Co. investors and more than $4 billion for policyholders of Prudential Insurance Co.

The indictment, resulting from a seven-year investigation, renewed questions about the future of class-action lawsuits that accuse corporations of defrauding shareholders, knowingly marketing dangerous products and other wrongs involving thousands of victims.

Melvyn I. Weiss, a founder of the law firm, said class-action suits brought justice to "victims of corrupt corporations."

But a business lobbyist, Lisa Rickard of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, described the lawsuits as often fraudulent and "simply a way to put legal fees in attorneys' pockets."

Plaintiffs in such class actions legally must have grievances that coincide with all the victims and are supposed to be motivated to serve as representatives of the class. But critics such as Rickard contend that law firms like Milberg Weiss instead engage in "plaintiff shopping" and encourage named plaintiffs to accept settlements designed to enrich them and the lawyers at the expense of the rest of the class and the target company.

The investigation gained momentum in 2001, when Steven G. Cooperman, a former Beverly Hills eye surgeon who had been a plaintiff in about 60 Milberg cases, became a government informant. He faced up to 10 years in federal prison for faking the theft of a Monet and a Picasso from his home, then swindling insurers out of $17.5 million. In return for his help in the Milberg probe, Cooperman wound up serving 21 months.

In April, another Milberg client, retired mortgage broker Howard J. Vogel, agreed to cooperate with prosecutors and plead guilty to a charge related to claims that he took more than $2.4 million in kickbacks.

Palm Springs resident Lazar, who was charged in the case last year, allegedly benefited from $2.4 million in kickbacks, prosecutors say.

Lazar and his relatives, including his wife, mother-in-law, son and daughter, allegedly received kickbacks ranging from $8,000 to $250,000 for their roles as named plaintiffs in a string of suits against such targets as Genentech Inc., United Airlines and W.R. Grace & Co. Many of the payments were transmitted through lawyers in Palm Springs, Los Angeles, Santa Ana, Portland, Ore., and Kansas City, Mo., the indictment alleges.

Schulman, 54, and Bershad, 66, were indicted on multiple felony counts, including mail fraud and conspiracy. They took leaves of absence from the firm this week.

Bershad's attorney, Andrew M. Lawler, said his client "has been instrumental in achieving unprecedented recoveries on behalf of investors wronged by corporate malfeasance" and "categorically denies the allegations of the indictment." Bershad will fight and is confident he will win, Lawler said.

Schulman's attorney, Herbert J. Stern, said his client "will plead not guilty because he is not guilty, and we look forward to his ultimate vindication."

In a statement, Milberg Weiss said it was "particularly incensed that the prosecutors decided to indict the firm itself. The firm has 125 attorneys and another 240 employees who, even according to the government, did not participate in or know anything about the matters at issue. But they will inevitably suffer serious personal and professional harm as a result of the government's actions."

John C. Coffee, a Columbia Law School specialist in securities law, said the indictment could motivate judges to avoid using Milberg Weiss as the lead firm in class actions. Likewise, he said, big public pension funds, which are subject to public scrutiny, may also decide it's best not to be associated with a firm facing criminal charges.

"I think that we will see a replay of the Arthur Andersen experience, with clients backing away from Milberg Weiss," Coffee said. "That's Step 1. Step 2 is when Milberg Weiss is embarrassed, many partners will jump ship. Professionals can move to other firms very easily, and that's what happened with Andersen."

Ironically, Coffee added, a prime beneficiary of Milberg's woes is likely to be the San Diego-based law firm headed by William Lerach. He joined Milberg Weiss in 1976, 11 years after it was founded, and became its most prominent attorney before leaving to found his own firm, Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins, in 2004.

The split appears to have occurred in part because of personal differences but also because prosecutors investigating the kickback case had initially focused on Lerach along with Melvyn Weiss, Coffee said. In February, a source told the Los Angeles Times that prosecutors had told Lerach and Weiss that there was not enough evidence to indict them at that point, although they might face charges if additional evidence emerged.

Lerach and other attorneys at Milberg Weiss, like many plaintiffs' attorneys, have been strong supporters of the Democratic Party, pitted against business groups that frequently side with Republicans.

Jamie Court, president of the Foundation for Taxpayer and Consumer Rights in Santa Monica, characterized the lengthy investigation as "clearly a politically motivated move by the Bush administration."

Yang, the U.S. attorney in Los Angeles, denied that such considerations played a role.

"I can tell you with absolute certainty this was not politically motivated," she said. "If it broke in a different direction, we would have been fine with that too."

Big-time Law Firm Facing Charges (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, May 19, 2006

Federal prosecutors have charged high-profile law firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman and two partners with conspiring to pay $11 million in kickbacks to people who allegedly agreed to serve as paid plaintiffs in lawsuits.

Milberg Weiss, a leading law firm in class-action lawsuits against corporations accused of securities fraud, has long been praised by shareholders and blasted by businesses and conservative politicians.

Not charged in the indictment were Melvyn Weiss, a founder of the New York firm more than 40 years ago, and former partner William Lerach, a flamboyant attorney who has started his own law firm in San Diego called Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins.

The indictment, handed up Thursday by a grand jury in Los Angeles after an investigation of several years, charges the law firm and senior partners David Bershad, 66, and Steven Schulman, 54, with bribery, fraud, perjury and obstructing justice.

The law firm and two men received $216 million in attorneys' fees from 1984 to 2005 from 150 class-action and shareholders' lawsuits that used the paid plaintiffs, the indictment alleges.

To hide the kickbacks, payments were made in cash sometimes obtained from casinos and kept in a safe in Bershad's office, the indictment alleges. Intermediaries were used to deliver the money, and the payments were not recorded in Milberg Weiss' accounting books, the indictment charges.

William Taylor, an attorney at the Zuckerman Spaeder law firm who represents Milberg Weiss, denied the charges, saying that "the firm and its partners are resolute in defending themselves."

Taylor said that recent talks with prosecutors to avoid the indictment fell apart because Milberg Weiss did not want to waive its attorney-client privilege and pay the well over $100 million sought by prosecutors to resolve the case.

The firm, Taylor said, did not want "to turn itself into an agent of the prosecution and accuse its own partners of being criminals."

Benjamin Brafman, an attorney for Weiss, said that Weiss will help his firm and its partners fight the charges "because he believes completely in their innocence."

According to the indictment, the alleged kickbacks were illegal because attorneys cannot "promise or give anything of value to induce a person to bring a lawsuit."

The secret and hidden kickbacks deprived shareholders of the "honest services" of their attorneys, and also obstructed the ability of courts to preside over the cases, the indictment charges.

Among the firm's cases involving paid plaintiffs were those against Lockheed, Valero Energy, British Petroleum, Genentech and Barnesandnoble.com.

Debra Wong Yang, the U.S. Attorney in Los Angeles, said in a statement that attorneys and plaintiffs are trusted to tell the truth and disclose important information to the court. "This indictment alleges a wholesale violation of this responsibility," she said.

Milberg Weiss, Two Partners Indicted Over Payments (BLOOM)

By Sophia Pearson

Bloomberg, May 18, 2006

Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, the law firm that has won more than $45 billion for investors in securities-fraud cases, and two of its partners were charged with participating in a scheme to pay illegal kickbacks to clients.

The New York-based firm, Steven Schulman, 54, and David Bershad, 66, were indicted on multiple felony counts including mail fraud and conspiracy, the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles said today.

``This case is about protecting the integrity of the justice system in America," U.S. Attorney Debra Yang said during a press conference. ``The conduct alleged in the indictment is particularly troubling because it represents a pattern of deception that spans two and a half decades."

The charges, which legal experts say involve the largest U.S. law firm ever indicted, might inhibit Milberg Weiss's ability to represent clients in securities cases. The charges might threaten the firm's management of a group of 309 class actions for shareholders who claim initial public offerings were manipulated by investment banks to inflate market prices. JPMorgan Chase & Co. agreed in April to pay $425 million to settle IPO claims against it, the first bank to do so.

Milberg Weiss, which has 125 lawyers, called the indictment ``unjust, misguided, and misinformed" in a statement.

Attorney-Client Privilege

The indictment came after six months of ``intense negotiations" between Milberg Weiss and government lawyers which couldn't be resolved because the firm refused to waive attorney- client privileges to avoid being charged, Milberg Weiss said. The firm also refused to make unfounded statements against its partners accusing them of crimes, the firm said.

Melvyn Weiss, the lead partner at Milberg Weiss, and William Lerach, Weiss's former partner who now leads a spinoff San Diego firm, Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins, were told in February that prosecutors didn't have plans to charge them in the case.

Today's indictment names three unidentified senior partners at Milberg Weiss who participated in the scheme. The partners, described as Partner A, B, and E, weren't charged.

Lawyers for Bershad and Schulman, who took leaves of absence from the firm earlier this week, denied the charges in e-mailed statements. Both men could be arraigned sometime in June, prosecutors said.

``David Bershad categorically denies the allegations of the indictment," his attorney, Andrew Lawler, said. ``He intends to vigorously fight the charges and is confident he will win."

Herbert Stern, a lawyer for Schulman, said his client will plead not guilty. ``We look forward to his ultimate vindication," Stern said.

`Stable' of Clients

Prosecutors said the firm from 1984 though 2005 paid three clients more than $11 million ``in secret and illegal payments" for cases in which the firm made $216.1 million in fees. The payments were made in cash or checks through intermediary lawyers or other professionals, according to the indictment issued today by a federal grand jury..

``Milberg Weiss had a stable of individuals ready and willing to serve as plaintiffs," said Yang said at the press conference.

Two of the clients, Howard J. Vogel and Steven Cooperman, have reached plea agreements with prosecutors and agreed to cooperate with the investigation. A third, Seymour Lazar, was charged with mail fraud and money laundering last year and refused to assist prosecutors.

`Credenza'

The firm obtained the money in a manner to make the payments difficult to trace, including from casinos, prosecutors said in the indictment. The money was kept in a safe located in a ``credenza in Bershad's office at Milberg Weiss, to which access was strictly limited."

The indictment may give a boost to President George W. Bush and others who favor legislation to limit damages and to make it harder for shareholders to sue companies.

``It's going to give a great deal of ammunition to lobbying groups who've long wanted to close down plaintiffs' class actions," said Columbia University law professor John C. Coffee Jr.

$45 Billion

Since 1999, U.S. prosecutors have been investigating claims that Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Lerach, the biggest firm representing shareholders in securities-fraud cases before it split in two in 2004, illegally paid shareholders to file the suits. At the time of the breakup, the firm had represented clients in half of all securities class actions filed in the past decade, including those against Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc.

Since 1965, Milberg Weiss lawyers, before and after its 2004 split-up, won more than $45 billion in recoveries for its shareholder clients, including large pension funds such as the California Public Employees' Retirement System, according to the Web sites of the two firms.

``We are extremely saddened to learn of these indictments," Lerach Coughlin said in a statement. ``We have the greatest respect for the ability and integrity of Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, its lawyers and the good work they have always done."

Yang said some of the compromised cases include lawsuits against Standard Oil Co. and British Petroleum Co. in the 1980s, Genentech Inc. in the 1990s and Barnesandnoble.com more recently.

Schulman, who has a 15 percent interest in Milberg Weiss, made more than $67 million from the firm's profits between 1991 and 2005, prosecutors said. In 2004, he represented Walt Disney Co. shareholders who sought to hold former Chief Executive Officer Michael Eisner liable for the $140 million severance paid to Michael Ovitz, a former talent agent who served as Disney's No. 2 executive for 15 months.

Bershad owned between 10 percent and 17.7 percent of the firm between 1983 and 2005 and made more than $160.9 million from profits, the indictment said.

Bershad represented Nortel Networks Corp. investors who sued for damages from an accounting fraud. Shareholders will receive about $2.7 billion from the settlement, making it the fourth largest U.S. class-action securities fraud case. Bershad also represented Lucent Technologies Inc. shareholders in securities lawsuits that settled for about $620 million.

The case is: U.S. v. Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP et al, 05-CR-587, U.S. District Court Central District of California (Los Angeles)

US Intensifies Stock-Options Probe (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Jennifer Levitz

Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

In a dramatic widening of the investigations into potential stock-option abuses, federal prosecutors in Manhattan have launched criminal probes of at least five U.S. companies.

Caremark Rx Inc., SafeNet Inc., Affiliated Computer Services Inc. and Vitesse Semiconductor Corp. said yesterday that they had received subpoenas from the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York. Late Wednesday night, giant health insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc. said it also had received a subpoena from the same prosecutor, along with a document request from the Internal Revenue Service.

Caremark, a big pharmacy-benefits manager based in Nashville, Tenn., and SafeNet, a software firm based in Belcamp, Md., said they also received informal inquiries from the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The entry of the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan, considered among the most experienced in prosecuting white-collar crimes, signals a significant ratcheting up of government scrutiny of option-granting practices. The SEC, which has been probing the matter for more than a year, is scrutinizing about 20 companies. A spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office declined to comment.

Stock options, a popular way to pay senior executives, are intended to give managers incentive to improve their company's share price. Generally, each option represents the chance to buy a share of company stock at a certain "strike price" on a future date. Thus, a recipient stands to gain only if the share price rises.

But an analysis of options awards at some companies has shown that executives benefited from extraordinary timing, getting grants dated at times when share prices hit lows. The strike price on options generally is equal to the market price on the day they are granted by a company's board. The lower the strike price, the greater the chance for future profit.

Federal prosecutors and securities regulators are trying to determine whether the effective dates on some of those options were deliberately and improperly changed -- a practice known as backdating -- securing extra pay for executives regardless of the stock's performance. Backdating would undermine the incentive purpose of the option grant and could violate a host of securities laws. It could also create thorny tax and accounting problems for companies.

Separately, Brooks Automation Inc., which had previously announced it will restate about seven years of results due to problems with its options grants, announced the resignation of two directors who received highly favorable stock options in 2000. Brooks said the board members, Amin J. Khoury and Roger D. Emerick, would "renounce" all of their options and restricted stock. The two men weren't available to comment late yesterday.

The resignations bring to 10 the number of executives or directors who have left their companies in recent weeks in the wake of the spiraling options scandal. The options-granting practices of at least one other company, Comverse Technology Inc., are being examined in a separate criminal probe by federal prosecutors in the Eastern District of New York.

A March 18 page-one article in the Wall Street Journal examined options-granting patterns at six companies, including Comverse, ACS and UnitedHealth. The article found a number of highly favorable grants to the top executives of each company, and concluded the odds of the grant pattern having occurred by chance were highly remote.

Lesley Pool, a spokeswoman for ACS, said, "We are fully cooperating with authorities." UnitedHealth and SafeNet also said they are cooperating. A Caremark representative couldn't be reached for comment. Backdating could lead to a number of potential criminal charges, legal experts said, including securities fraud, wire fraud, or even tax-related charges.

"If somebody actually backdated an option grant that could well be like shooting fish in a barrel for prosecutors," said Harvey Pitt, a former chairman of the SEC. "If you were sitting on a jury and somebody told you that the CEO was granted the option on May 18 but he put down the date of April 18, do you think you would have a lot of difficulty concluding that the CEO committed fraud? I don't think so," Mr. Pitt said.

Lynn Turner, a former chief accountant for the SEC, said unlike some complicated revenue-recognition cases brought by federal prosecutors in recent years, backdating would be easy for jurors to grasp. Mr. Turner predicted pressure would mount for boards to fire chief executives who had been involved in backdating. "It is already put in motion that if the CEO is found to have done it, he has to go," Mr. Turner said. He said that if board members are given the choice of deciding whether the CEO takes the hit, or the directors, "it is going to be about a two-second decision."

In recent weeks, CEOs have been forced out at Comverse and Vitesse. Last night, Vitesse said the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York notified it that it is seeking documents dating back to 1999 related to the company's stock-option grants. The Camarillo, Calif.-based company also said it has been notified that the SEC is investigating and requesting documents dating back to 1995 related to the grant of stock options. Vitesse said it plans to cooperate fully with both requests.

At Caremark, the company's chairman and chief executive, Edwin Crawford, was awarded 3.875 million stock options dated March 8, 2000. The options gave him the right to buy shares for 15% more than the stock's closing price that day, which turned out to be tied for the low point of that year. The company said Mr. Crawford agreed to forgo his bonus for four years -- 2000 through 2003 -- in exchange for the large grant.

A company spokesman has said the March 8 grant was made at a scheduled board meeting and came at the time of year when options were typically awarded. Mr. Crawford also has denied receiving any backdated options or grants, saying his options are approved by Caremark's board at regularly scheduled meetings, granted by the date approved and priced at fair market value on the date of the grant. Caremark also said it had received a request from the SEC about its relocation program. Mr. Crawford received $2.9 million from Caremark's program two years ago for the sale of his Birmingham, Ala., home, even though as of earlier this month his house hadn't been put on the market and his wife still lived there.

At Brooks Automation, a semiconductor equipment maker in Chelmsford, Mass., the compensation committee granted 233,000 options to its chief executive, Robert Therrien, with a date of May 31, 2000. Brooks's stock plunged more than 20% that day and surged over 30% the next day.

What was unusual was that Messrs. Khoury and Emerick, the compensation-committee members who oversaw the CEO option grants, also benefited. Although Brooks directors typically got options only in July, that year a special grant was awarded just to these two directors. In a statement, Brooks said Messrs. Khoury and Emerick had resigned voluntarily.

Also yesterday, five public pension funds filed a lawsuit in federal court in Minneapolis, seeking to prevent UnitedHealth's top two executives from exercising about $1.5 billion in options. The suit claims the company unlawfully backdated options to Chief Executive William McGuire, Chief Operating Officer Stephen Hemsley and other executives "to provide the recipients with windfall compensation at the direct expense of UnitedHealth."

UnitedHealth has said it may have to restate three years of results due to a "significant deficiency" in how it administered and accounted for past option grants.

The unusual legal request asks the court to place a "constructive trust" over all option contracts held by Messrs. McGuire and Hemsley. A UnitedHealth spokesman said the company hadn't seen the lawsuit and in any event doesn't comment on pending litigation.

Stock Option Subpoenas Issued (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

New York Times, May 19, 2006

At least four companies said yesterday that they had received federal subpoenas requesting information on their granting of stock options.

The companies are Caremark Rx, a manager of drug benefits; SafeNet, an information security company; Affiliated Computer Services, a processor of student loans; and Vitesse Semiconductor. The four received subpoenas from the United States attorney's office in the Southern District of New York.

All four companies said they were cooperating fully with the requests.

Caremark, based in Nashville, also said in a regulatory filing that it had received a request from the Securities and Exchange Commission for information on stock option grants and a company relocation program as part of an informal inquiry.

SafeNet, of Belcamp, Md., said it had received an informal inquiry from the S.E.C. requesting information on stock option grants to directors and officers, as well as certain accounting policies and practices.

Affiliated Computer, of Dallas, delayed filing a fiscal third-quarter financial report this month as it investigated its accounting. This week, the company said it would have costs of as much as $32 million through June 30, 2005, for options granted since 1994 that had effective dates earlier than when they were granted.

The company is also the focus of an informal S.E.C. inquiry, and some of its top officials are named in shareholder lawsuits claiming that the company violated grant rules.

Vitesse Semiconductor, of Camarillo, Calif., said it was being investigated by the S.E.C. over stock option grants. On Wednesday, the company said it had fired its chief executive and two other executives amid the inquiry.

Federal officials have been examining how companies have granted stock options, sometimes possibly increasing their value by setting their purchase date to coincide with the lowest possible price. UnitedHealth Group said Wednesday that it had received subpoenas from the United States attorney and the Internal Revenue Service over its grants.

Caremark Rx Stock Options Draw Subpoena (AP)

AP, May 18, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. - Pharmacy benefits manager Caremark Rx Inc. said Thursday that is has received a federal grand jury subpoena for records about its stock options.

The company also received what it called an "informal inquiry" from the Securities and Exchange Commission , requesting information about the company's stock options and its relocation program.

With revenues of nearly $33 billion last year, Nashville-based Caremark is Tennessee's largest publicly traded company, providing drug benefit services to more than 2,000 health plan sponsors and their participants throughout the United States.

The Wall Street Journal last week reported that Caremark's chairman, president and chief executive officer, Mac Crawford, took part in the company's relocation program when it moved its headquarters from Birmingham, Ala., to Nashville in 2003.

Crawford was given a $2.9 million "equity advance," but has yet to sell his house in Alabama. A Caremark spokesman told the paper that Crawford's ill wife still lives there and that the home will be sold when renovations on the Crawfords' Nashville home is complete.

Caremark's release mentioned neither Crawford's relocation or stock options in relation to the subpoena from U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York or the SEC letter. Neither the prosecutor's office nor the SEC returned calls from the AP late Thursday.

Caremark also operates a retail pharmacy network with more than 60,000 participating pharmacies, seven mail-service pharmacies and 21 licensed specialty pharmacies for delivery of advanced medications.

Shares of Caremark fell 6 cents to close at $48.89 on the New York Stock Exchange before Caremark's announcement was made, then lost up $1.14, or 2.3 percent, in aftermarket electronic trading.

Government Joins Drug-Pricing Suit Against Abbott (WSJ)

By John Carreyrou

Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

The Justice Department joined a whistleblower lawsuit against Abbott Laboratories Inc. and Hospira Inc., alleging that the companies conspired to inflate Medicare and Medicaid reimbursements on some drugs from 1991 to 2001.

In a civil complaint filed in federal court in Florida, the Justice Department alleged that Abbott, a drug maker based in Abbott Park, Ill., reported prices for its drugs to price publishers, such as the Drug Topics Red Book, that were as much as 1,000% higher than the prices the company charged hospitals and doctors. The drugs were sold by Abbott's Hospital Products Division, which Abbott spun off two years ago as Hospira, which is based in Lake Forest, Ill.

The allegedly inflated prices listed by the Red Book and other price publishers enabled doctors and hospitals to reap big profits by filing Medicare and Medicaid reimbursement claims that were much higher than what they had actually paid, according to the government's complaint. Abbott marketed these so-called spreads as an inducement to buy its drugs -- which were injectable and intravenous medications -- thereby increasing its own sales and profits, according to the complaint.

Abbott denied the allegations and said it would defend itself vigorously. "Abbott has consistently complied with all laws and regulations and properly and lawfully provided all information required by the government," an Abbott spokeswoman said. A spokeswoman for Hospira said the company has consistently complied with pricing laws, and she noted that the timing of the events at issue in the lawsuit predate Hospira's existence.

The government has filed similar lawsuits against other drug makers in recent years. In 2001, Bayer AG of Germany agreed to pay a $14 million fine to settle allegations that it reported inflated prices of drugs for hemophilia and immune disorders. More recently, TAP Pharmaceuticals Products Inc., a joint venture between Abbott and Takeda Chemical Industries Ltd. of Japan, agreed to pay more than $1 billion in civil and criminal penalties while pleading guilty to a charge of conspiring with doctors to bill Medicare and Medicaid for free samples of its prostate-cancer drug, Lupron.

In a media release about the latest case, the Justice Department said Medicare and Medicaid had reimbursed hospitals and doctors more than $175 million for the Abbott drugs in question. Under the False Claims Act, the government said it can recover triple the damages assessed by a jury and $5,500 to $11,000 for each fraudulent reimbursement claim.

The federal probe began after a Florida home-infusion company, Ven-A-Care of the Florida Keys Inc., filed a whistleblower lawsuit against Abbott.

US Targets Abbott Prices (CHIT)

By Bruce Japsen

Chicago Tribune, May 19, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department on Thursday sued Abbott Laboratories, alleging the company overcharged government health insurance programs in excess of $175 million for brand-name and generic drugs for more than a decade dating back to the early 1990s.

The federal government joined a whistleblower's suit that mirrors similar allegations brought against Abbott and dozens of other drugmakers in recent years as part of a legal assault on pharmaceutical industry pricing. Prosecutors in more than 20 states, including Illinois, have brought a series of similar complaints against Abbott and other drugmakers as part of an effort to rein in the soaring costs of prescription drugs.

The U.S. complaint, a civil case, like state civil suits, accuses Abbott of engaging in a "scheme" for more than a decade by bilking the Medicaid program and Medicare participants out of millions of dollars. The companies are accused of intentionally misreporting and inflating the figures used to calculate government reimbursement rates.

In a statement released Thursday by the Justice Department, it said the North Chicago-based pharmaceutical company reported prices that were "more than 10 times the actual sales prices on many of the drugs it manufactures."

The complaint alleges Abbott charged hospitals, pharmacies, nursing homes and other medical-care providers far less for medicines than the prices it had published in industry price guides for those drugs. Those published prices were then used by the government to calculate reimbursement to health-care providers for Medicare and Medicaid programs.

The difference between the published price and the actual price paid by the providers was the "spread," and it was used to give the health-care providers greater reimbursement and therefore an incentive to continue buying Abbott products.

"This complaint marks another step in the government's investigation and prosecution of pharmaceutical manufacturers who submit fraudulent drug pricing information that costs the federal health-care programs and taxpayers millions of dollars," said Assistant Atty. Gen. Peter D. Keisler, of the Justice Department's Civil Division.

In one example cited in the government's complaint, Abbott increased the per-unit price of the intravenous antibiotic vancomycin to $76 by early 2001. Meanwhile, it was "widely available" to purchasers at under $4.

While the government is suing Abbott, the business currently selling the pharmaceuticals mentioned in the suit is Lake Forest-based Hospira Inc., which was spun off by Abbott into a separate company in 2004. Abbott is the defendant in the case and would be liable should there be any settlement.

Abbott said it has no plans to settle.

"This is an Average Wholesale Price lawsuit similar to others filed against our industry," spokeswoman Melissa Brotz said. "Abbott has consistently complied with all laws and regulations—the company has properly and lawfully provided all information required by the government. We have a strong defense and intend to vigorously defend ourselves against these claims."

The allegations in the suit were originally filed under seal in 1995 by home-care pharmacy Ven-A-Care of the Florida Keys Inc. and its principals, who have successfully sued other drugmakers.

"We believe the evidence will show that only after significant exposure through active federal and state investigations did Abbott lower its reported prices, so that they more accurately reflected the prices it knew it was selling its drugs for," said Jim Breen, an attorney for Ven-A-Care and whistleblowers Zachary Bentley and Mark Jones, who were principals at the pharmacy company.

According to a Tribune report in 2001, Abbott dramatically lowered the price of dozens of drugs in the face of pricing probes by state and federal prosecutors. That year, TAP Pharmaceutical Products Inc., an Abbott joint venture, resolved criminal and civil allegations brought by the Justice Department that included publishing inflated prices for a prostate cancer drug.

HealthSouth To Pay $3 Million In U.S. Accounting Fraud Case (NYT)

By Kyle Whitmire

New York Times, May 19, 2006

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., May 18 — The Justice Department announced Thursday that HealthSouth, the chain of outpatient rehabilitation hospitals, would pay $3 million and avoid prosecution over a giant accounting fraud discovered at the company three years ago.

"Prosecution would likely have pushed this company into bankruptcy," Alice H. Martin, United States attorney in Birmingham, said in a statement. "By taking this nonprosecution approach, jobs of thousands have been saved, and the company has an opportunity to rebuild shareholder value."

HealthSouth, which agreed to accept responsibility for crimes committed by its executives, must pay the money to the United States Postal Inspection Service's consumer fraud division, enact more stringent internal controls and commit no other illegal acts for three years. In essence, the company is on probation until 2009, Ms. Martin said.

The decision brings an end to an investigation that began in March 2003, when the investigators raided the company's headquarters. Since then, 15 executives, including 5 chief financial officers, have pleaded guilty or been convicted of participating in the fraud. According to more recent company estimates, the fraud's impact was greater than $4 billion.

Last year, a Birmingham jury acquitted Richard M. Scrushy, the company's founder and former chief executive, of participating in the fraud. In an unrelated case, Mr. Scrushy is currently on trial on federal charges that he bribed a former governor of Alabama, Donald Siegelman.

The Justice Department waited until HealthSouth had made amends with investors through several civil settlements. In the last year, HealthSouth has agreed to pay the Securities and Exchange Commission and other civil litigants more than $500 million in cash and shares. Also, the company has agreed to pay more than $350 million to settle suits for Medicare fraud.

Still, HealthSouth continues to struggle. The civil settlements and new Medicare reimbursement rules have impaired the company's financial performance. In its first-quarter report, filed last week, HealthSouth fell short of analysts' expectations, and the company's net loss widened to $435.1 million. Last week, executives said that HealthSouth was considering changing the company's name and still expected to be relisted on a major stock exchange sometime this summer. It was delisted from the New York Stock Exchange in March 2003.

HealthSouth shares fell 9 cents, to $4.41, in over-the-counter trading yesterday, but regained the 9 cents after closing. The stock has declined more than 8 percent this year.

Jay Grinney, HealthSouth's chief executive, said in a statement yesterday: "On behalf of the 37,000 dedicated HealthSouth employees, I can say that we are delighted as an organization to be getting back to what we do best — providing outstanding rehabilitation, diagnostic and ambulatory surgical care throughout the nation."

HealthSouth Settles Fraud Case (LAT)

Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

HealthSouth Corp. agreed to pay $3 million and serve three years on probation in a deal with the government that spares the company an indictment over the $2.7-billion accounting fraud that almost triggered its collapse.

DOJ_NMG_0028948

U.S. Atty. Alice Martin, who prosecuted 17 HealthSouth executives for their alleged roles in the fraud, including company founder Richard Scrushy, announced terms of the non-prosecution agreement Thursday. Scrushy was acquitted of fraud charges last year after a trial in Birmingham, Ala., where the company is based.

HealthSouth, which acknowledged the fraud as part of the accord, said Wednesday that the government imposed no fine or any other conditions on the company. HealthSouth spokesman Andy Brimmer said Thursday the company doesn't consider the $3-million payment to the government a fine.

The agreement "acknowledges the comprehensive corporate governance and compliance reform which has and is transpiring at HealthSouth, and its continued commitment to cooperate with the Department of Justice through self-disclosure," Martin said. "Prosecution would likely have pushed this company into bankruptcy."

The company settled a fraud case with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission last year for $100 million and another case with investors in March for $445 million.

The $3-million payment called for in the agreement will go to the U.S. Postal Inspection Service's Consumer Fraud Fund.

The company admitted wrongdoing, acknowledging that the Justice Department "has developed evidence during its investigation that HealthSouth, through some of its employees, has violated federal criminal law."

The company said it "accepts responsibility for the conduct of its employees giving rise to any violation in connection with the unlawful practices. HealthSouth does not endorse, ratify or condone criminal conduct."

Shares of HealthSouth declined 9 cents to $4.41. They have fallen 8.2% this year.

Mace Security Could Lose NASDAQ Listing (PHIBIZ)

Philadelphia Business Journal, May 19, 2006

Mace Security International Inc. said Thursday it faces a delisting from the NASDAQ stock exchange. The situation is linked to the company's alleged hiring of undocumented workers at its car washes.

Mace said an independent investigation into its hiring practices that was commissioned by the company's audit committee has delayed the filing of the company's 10-K annual report for 2005 and its 10-Q quarterly report for the period ended March 31.

Mace of Mount Laurel, N.J., said it has received a stay of the delisting. A hearing before the NASDAQ Listing Qualifications Panel regarding the delays of both the 10-K and 10-Q filings is scheduled for May 25.

Mace, which has a goal of selling its car washes to concentrate on the security-products end of its business, said the internal investigation has been completed.

Eduardo Nieves Jr., the company's vice president of marketing and investor relations, said the specific conclusions of the investigation are "right now ... not being disclosed. That information will be disclosed when we file our 10-K and 10-Q."

Nieves did point, however, to a line from the company's press release Thursday that said Mace's audit committee "is satisfied with the comprehensiveness and conclusions" of the inquiry. The release also said "there is no financial statement impact implicated by the company's hiring practices, except for a potential contingent liability."

With the independent investigation complete, the company said it and its independent auditor are working to ready the 10-K and 10-Q but did not know exactly when the reports will be ready.

"We want it to be as soon as possible for obvious reasons," Nieves said.

Mace's hiring practices are being investigated by the U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

Problems With SOX (FT)

Financial Times, May 19, 2006

America's smaller public companies had reason to hope the cost of complying with the Sarbanes-Oxley (Sox) act would this week be lightened. Their hopes were largely belied. Christopher Cox, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, did extend the deadline for small cap businesses to comply with the act's notorious section 404 that requires auditors to certify companies' internal control systems. But he ignored the advice of the SEC's advisory board which last week recommended small businesses be exempt altogether from the requirement.

The SEC compounded this missed opportunity with two oversights: it failed to specify when the reporting holiday for small caps would come to an end; and it forgot to clarify whether foreign companies could use this postponement. These were no minor omissions. Of the many complaints that have been made about Sox, the most persuasive come from small businesses and foreign listings. Certainly America's larger companies also have reasons to gripe about a regime that has drastically raised their regulatory costs. But few dispute that small businesses have been worse affected.

As a result, many US small businesses have reportedly avoided going public altogether, or are conducting initial public offerings on small cap exchanges in foreign markets. Likewise, New York has lost its position as favourite port of call for the secondary listings of foreign companies in favour of London, Hong Kong and other less burdensome jurisdictions. All the signs are that this trend will continue.

But for companies of any size, the SEC's record is not encouraging so far. After Sox was enacted in 2002, the SEC predicted the average cost of compliance for each company would be $91,000. Industry estimates it is closer to $4.4m (£2.3m) and a multiple of that for some of the largest. The SEC also assured the markets section 404 would work seamlessly once it was up and running. But companies are spending inordinate amounts of time furnishing auditors with information that has little bearing on their financial soundness. One even had to disclose how many keys it issued to its janitors - hardly the best place to look for potential Nick Leesons of Barings infamy.

The SEC says it plans to issue new guidelines within a few months. Its most pressing concern must be to address the incentive for the big four accounting firms to pile ever greater disclosure requirements on companies' internal controls. Fear of criminal action suggests the auditors will continue to inflate that burden unless the SEC issues clearer instructions. Meanwhile, jurors will soon pronounce on the fraud charges against Kenneth Lay, the chief executive of Enron, whose bankruptcy in 2001 ultimately culminated in Sox. Whatever the verdict, the trial serves as a timely reminder that the best deterrent of all is the threat of criminal conviction.

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Ethics Panel, Justice Dept. To Run Parallel Probes (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

The House ethics committee plans to quickly begin its probes into the activities of Reps. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) and William J. Jefferson (D-La.) while working with the Justice Department to avoid interference with federal prosecutors' investigations of the same lawmakers, according to people familiar with the panel's efforts.

The committee's surprise decision Wednesday to open inquiries into allegations that the congressmen accepted bribes -- as well as a third, wider-ranging probe -- was meant to tamp down criticism that the panel is dysfunctional and that the House is not policing the ethical lapses of its members, according to the sources.

Yet it was not clear that the committee would have enough time to complete its work before the end of the legislative session this autumn, or that its efforts would not complicate the work of Justice Department prosecutors and investigators.

After 16 months of inactivity and partisan bickering, the ethics committee, formally known as the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, this week created special investigative subcommittees to look separately into the cases of Ney and Jefferson.

Each of the subcommittees has four members, evenly divided between Republicans and Democrats, and has the power to subpoena documents and compel testimony. They are likely to begin work before the House departs for the Memorial Day recess at the end of next week, House sources said.

The Justice Department has traditionally opposed such parallel inquiries by congressional committees for fear that lawmakers might complicate its collection of testimony and information. The Senate's ethics panel, for instance, regularly steps aside when another enforcement agency is looking into the behavior of senators.

But House officials indicated yesterday that they hope the continuing conversations between the Justice Department and the ethics committee will avert conflicts. A spokesman for the department declined to comment.

Stanley Brand, a lawyer and expert on congressional ethics, said that simultaneous inquiries are "impractical" and might put the Justice Department's efforts in jeopardy.

"I can't imagine that they will pursue subpoenas and testimony and get in the way of the Justice Department; that hasn't happened in the past," he said in reference to the ethics subcommittees.

Moreover, he said, an ethics panel's probes are likely to take "months and months" and will not be finished before the end of the year.

The committee has routinely disclosed when it formed subcommittees for scrutinizing possible wrongdoing by specific lawmakers, but its leaders have rarely spoken publicly about preliminary or wider-ranging types of inquiries. Nonetheless, on Wednesday the panel announced that it is looking into the possibility that staffers and lawmakers other than the now-jailed former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) might have been "provided hotel rooms, limousines and other services in exchange for performing official acts."

The choice to go public was a reaction to the ethics committee's moribund condition over the past 16 months, insiders said. During that period, Republicans and Democrats squabbled over how the panel should be run and staffed. New, restrictive committee rules, opposed by Democrats, were at first adopted and then rescinded. The panel did not have a consensus chief counsel until January.

The logjam over starting new investigations was finally broken after Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.) was replaced last month as the committee's ranking Democrat by a respected veteran of the panel, Rep. Howard L. Berman (D-Calif.). Mollohan was forced to step down after his business dealings with recipients of federal funds that he appropriated became the subject of a federal investigation.

Yesterday, Republicans sought to portray Mollohan as the primary cause of the long holdup in new investigations. "Congressman Mollohan was stalling the process for political gain on behalf of the minority leader," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). Democrats did not want a functioning ethics committee, he said, so that they could more easily accuse Republicans of acting improperly with lobbyists.

"There was not even an option for the ethics committee because of the recalcitrance of Mollohan," agreed Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Rules Committee. "I take my hat off to Howard Berman. He is a pro. He knows how to deal in a bipartisan way with a sensitive and tough issue."

Democrats dismissed the attacks on Mollohan as a smoke screen to obscure Republicans' culpability in the ethics committee's shutdown. The GOP had refused to cooperate with Democrats as a way to protect their then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (Tex.), Democrats said.

DeLay is resigning from the House next month under the cloud of a Texas indictment on money laundering charges and of federal investigations into his dealings with convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. DeLay, Ney, Jefferson and Mollohan have all said that they have done nothing wrong.

Lobbying Case To Get Jury Test (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Justice Department's investigation of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal already has produced four guilty pleas. Now, prosecutors are about to find out whether an influence-peddling probe based largely on emails and a network of low-profile Republican aides can pass muster with a jury.

David Safavian, a longtime friend of Mr. Abramoff and a former White House official, is scheduled to go on trial Monday. He is charged with making false statements and obstructing government inquiries about Mr. Abramoff's relationship with him while he served as chief of staff of the General Services Administration, which manages government property.

The trial comes at a critical moment as the focus of the Abramoff investigation appears to be broadening from staff to members of Congress, most notably Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney. While the Safavian trial is narrowly focused on the former government official's actions, a court loss could be a psychological blow to the high-profile inquiry.

"You don't want to lose. You want to keep the momentum going. You have all these guilty pleas. You want a conviction," says Randall Eliason, former chief of the public-corruption and government- fraud section of the U.S. attorney's office in Washington.

The prosecutors' task is complicated by the fact that they aren't planning to call Mr. Abramoff. A one-time Republican lobbying star, Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to trying to bribe members of Congress and admitted to bilking millions of dollars from his clients.

The decision against calling Mr. Abramoff is a double-edged sword, says Miles Ehrlich, a former prosecutor in the Justice Department's public-integrity section and a former chief of white-collar crime in the U.S. attorney's office in San Francisco. His absence "may enhance the prosecution's chances of keeping the focus on what was happening and not what a sleaze ball the cooperating witness is," Mr. Ehrlich says. But, under federal trial rules, the defense can still introduce evidence to discredit Mr. Abramoff, which could raise questions in the jurors' minds. "That's one of the difficulties of trial by email," he added.

The government has received some recent breaks. U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman is expected to grant the government's request to introduce more than 200 email messages, mostly between Messrs. Safavian and Abramoff, in which the two men seamlessly shift from discussing the lobbyist's interest in obtaining government property for his clients, to setting up racquetball dates and trips to Mr. Abramoff's upscale restaurant and skyboxes at sporting events.

Last week, Neil Volz, another Abramoff associate and former chief of staff to Rep. Ney, pleaded guilty to conspiring to corrupt public officials and violating lobbying rules. He is cooperating with investigators and is expected to take the stand against Mr. Safavian.

Mr. Safavian, a Detroit native, became friends with Mr. Abramoff in the 1990s when they worked at the law and lobbying firm of Preston Gates & Ellis. Mr. Safavian later co-founded the firm Janus-Merritt Strategies. The two men still shared many clients, including Indian tribes, Internet gambling companies and the North Mariana Islands.

In 2002, Mr. Safavian took a job as senior adviser and acting deputy chief of staff at the GSA and was soon named chief of staff. Less than two weeks after Mr. Safavian arrived at his government post, Mr. Abramoff sent him an email with the subject line, "I have a GSA question."

Over the next three years, Mr. Abramoff sought help from Mr. Safavian to secure government-owned property for Indian clients, a religious school he had founded and other matters. "I have a need to buy a stretch limo for the restaurant. Are there any coming up on any of the GSA drug-property sales?" Mr. Abramoff once asked Mr. Safavian.

The emails show that Mr. Safavian sometimes edited the work of Mr. Abramoff's team to ensure it covered issues that his own aides might raise. He arranged meetings between Mr. Abramoff's representatives and government officials, forwarded internal government documents and minutes of deliberations to help him develop property proposals, and recommended generating Capitol Hill pressure on his own bureaucracy if things weren't going Mr. Abramoff's way.

Mr. Volz is expected to testify about one alleged Safavian-inspired effort to persuade Rep. Ney to insert language into an election-overhaul bill that would have helped Mr. Abramoff's Indian-tribe clients win control of the Old Post Office building in downtown Washington.

In November 2004, Mr. Safavian moved to the Office of Management and Budget to become the administration's chief procurement-policy officer. He was indicted in October 2005.

The case hinges on what Mr. Safavian told GSA ethics officials and Senate investigators about an expensive golf trip to Scotland arranged by Mr. Abramoff in August 2002. Before departing, Mr. Safavian sought an advisory opinion from the GSA to approve the trip. He described Mr. Abramoff as an old friend and "a lawyer and lobbyist, but one that has no business before GSA (he does all his work on Capitol Hill.)," Mr. Safavian wrote to ethics officers, according to the indictment.

Prosecutors argue Mr. Safavian intentionally misled ethics officials about Mr. Abramoff's interest in doing business with the government in order to obtain clearance to go on the trip. Mr. Safavian faces additional charges of obstruction and false statements based on his exchanges with Senate Committee on Indian Affairs investigators in 2005, during which he repeated his description of Mr. Abramoff as someone who worked mostly on Capitol Hill.

Mr. Safavian's lawyer, Barbara Van Gelder, counters that her client's statement in 2002 was true because Mr. Abramoff didn't have a contract with the GSA. But prosecutors claim a broader definition of doing business with the government.

Ms. Van Gelder faces other hurdles. This week, she told Judge Friedman she was having trouble lining up witnesses who were on the Scotland golf trip, which included Rep. Ney, Mr. Volz and Ralph Reed, now a candidate to be Georgia's lieutenant governor. Lawyers of some attendees have told her their clients might invoke their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination if forced to take the stand, she told the court.

Former Weekly Reader Editor Convicted (STAMADV)

Stamford (CT) Advocate, May 19, 2006

BOSTON - It took a federal jury less than two hours today to convict former Weekly Reader editor Noel Neff on Internet child predator charges.

Neff showed no emotion after the jury returned the guilty verdicts early Thursday afternoon. U.S. District Judge George O'Toole Jr. revoked Neff's bond and marshals led the former children's magazine editor out of the courtroom in handcuffs.

Neff faces a minimum of five year, and up to 60 years, in prison on the charges. He is expected to be sentenced Sept. 14.

The jury found Neff, 47, of Norwalk, guilty on both charges of using the Internet to lure a minor to engage in sexual activity and traveling across state lines to engage in sexual conduct with a minor.

Neff was fired from the Stamford children's publisher after his July 9 arrest in Franklin, Mass., where he allegedly believed he would meet an adolescent named "Chris" he had met online. "Chris" was actually a Boston FBI agent posing as a 14-year-old boy with homosexual feelings.

After Neff initiated contact with "Chris" in April 2005 in an Internet chat room, they began exchanging e-mails and instant messages that were often about sex, according to court testimony this week. In online discussions before July 9, Neff allegedly said he couldn't say he was meeting "Chris" for sex but would let "Chris" make the first move.

When Neff arrived at the specified shopping center in Franklin, instead of meeting "Chris," he was placed under arrest by three FBI agents.

Neff's lawyer argued that his client was not seeking sex from "Chris" and based on evidence presented yesterday, would not have had time to act on the criminal behavior he is charged with.

Neff's lawyer, Francis O'Reilly of Fairfield, said his client never committed a criminal act and was only trying to share his insight as a sexually confused teenager with someone he thought was going through the same experience.

Jefferson Parish Teacher Arrested On Federal Child Porn Charges (AP)

AP, May 18, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- A Jefferson Parish public school teacher was in custody Thursday, booked on charges of possession of child pornography, federal authorities said.

The FBI arrested Russell Counterman, 44, of New Orleans, after getting a tip that he allegedly downloaded files _ while at work _ containing sexually explicit images of children who ranged in age from 4 years old to teenagers, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

During Counterman's initial appearance before U.S. Magistrate Louis Moore Jr., prosecutors asked that Counterman be detained, Letten said. "He's currently in custody, but a detention hearing is scheduled for Monday to determine whether he'll stay there," he said.

Counterman, who taught at the Patrick F. Taylor Science and Technology school, was suspended following his arrest, according to Jefferson Parish public school officials.

Federal agents said Counterman was accused of using a school-issued laptop to download child pornography from the Internet at the school. After agreeing to a search, authorities said some of the alleged material was found in Counterman's classroom in a briefcase as well as in his home.

"It is important to note that the FBI has no information indicating that any child had access to child pornography or that this individual engaged in inappropriate behavior with the school children," said Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazzani.

Letten also said there was no evidence of Counterman having manufactured any of the pictures seized.

The U.S. Attorney's Office said Counterman has taught school in the New Orleans area for 12 years. If indicted and convicted, Counterman faces up to 10 years in jail and a life term of supervised release.

Florida Man Pleads To Internet Sex Solicitation (WTSP)

WTSP-TV, May 18, 2006

An east coast man faces 5 to 30 years in prison on a guilty plea to using a compuuter to entice a minor to meet and have sex, the U.S. Attorney's office said.

Leroy Walter Lasky, Jr., 51, of Port Orange, entered his plea today before U.S. Magistrate Judge Mark A. Pizzo in Tampa Federal Court. Lasky was indicted on March 16th on one count of luring a 15-year-old girl in a computer chat room. He was actually conversing with an undercover officer from the Hillsborough County Sheriff's Office.

"According to court documents, after numerous chats on the internet, Lasky agreed to meet the girl in Tampa for sex," the U.S. Attorney's office said. "On September 22, 2005, the defendant traveled from his home on the east coast of Florida to Tampa where he had arranged to meet the young teen girl."

He was met by officers from the Innocent Images Task Force and taken into custody.

A sentencing date has not been set.

Congress Bribery Probe Could Deepen (BOS)

By Michael Kranish, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, May 19, 2006

Records detail contractor's sway

WASHINGTON -- On March 8, 2004, after a private, chartered flight from Washington, Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham checked into a luxury oceanfront suite at the Delano Hotel, a restored Art Deco jewel on Miami Beach. Prosecutors say the San Diego lawmaker, in town to shop for a yacht, racked up more than $15,000 in bills during the trip, including $848 in meals.

Court records show that Mitchell Wade, an ambitious defense contractor with deep pockets, picked up most of the tab. Prosecutors say the Miami Beach trip was pocket change compared with the more than $1 million in bribes Wade paid to Cunningham, a former fighter pilot and powerful member of the House Appropriations Committee, to steer government defense contracts his way.

But Wade had more money to spread around.

Within days of sending Cunningham to Miami, prosecutors say, Wade gave $32,000 in laundered campaign funds to Representative Katherine Harris, the Florida Republican and Homeland Security Committee member whose help Wade was seeking to create a complex for MZM Inc., his company, in her home state. Documents say Wade also funneled $46,000 into the campaign account of Representative Virgil H. Goode Jr., a Virginia Republican who also sits on the Appropriations Committee.

Wade then discussed getting specific defense appropriations with Harris and Goode or their staffs, according to court documents. Weeks after Wade arranged for most of the contributions to Goode, Wade walked away with a pledge for a $9 million facility in Goode's district with help from Goode's office, the court filings say

Harris and Goode both say they didn't know the contributions had come from straw donors and were illegal. They have not been charged.

Nevertheless, court papers indicate that the investigation that snared Cunningham -- in which the California Republican, now serving a 10-year sentence in federal prison, admitted that he took millions in bribes -- and led Wade to take a plea deal could go much deeper. At least three other federal investigations involving members of Congress are also underway, linked to questions about whether lawmakers traded the power and influence of their offices for hefty campaign contributions and lavish gifts.

"There is some increasing panic among members who worry that there may be e-mails in which they sort of promised to do something that is contemporaneous with campaign contributions," said Thomas Mann of the Brookings Institution.

Previously, Mann said, members of Congress may have believed they were following the rules as long as donations they received were legal. Now, he said, members are concerned that Justice's Office of Public Integrity is looking at possible connections between campaign contributions and official action. The investigations are warranted, Mann added, because "things got really out of hand" with members taking action on behalf of contributors or those provided gifts.

"If the Office of Public Integrity action is a bit strong, sometimes you have got to overreact to stamp out a practice that is truly noxious," he said.

Word about the various investigations has been trickling out in news reports for months. Authorities want to know whether Representative Alan B. Mollohan, a West Virginia Democrat and Appropriations Committee member, used his clout to hand government contracts to nonprofit groups run by his friends; whether disgraced former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff bribed Representative Bob Ney, Republican of Ohio; and whether the House Appropriations Committee chairman, Jerry Lewis of California, also a Republican, improperly awarded contracts sought by a lobbyist who has been linked to Cunningham.

The anxiety level in Congress increased this week after the House Ethics Committee -- long criticized for its reluctance to investigate members -- announced that it was looking into the behavior of Ney and Representative William J. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat who is suspected of receiving bribes.

All of the members under scrutiny have denied wrongdoing.

Perhaps most significant, the Ethics Committee said it will examine the Cunningham case to determine "whether other House members or staff are implicated." The committee said it would check out allegations that members and staff received "hotel rooms, limousines, and other services in exchange for performing official acts"

Though Cunningham and Wade both pleaded guilty, federal officials also want to know whether a second unnamed defense contractor may also have wooed congressmen, other defense contractors, and the CIA's third in command with poker parties, a hospitality suite, and possibly prostitutes.

The totality of these investigations marks one of the Justice Department's most concentrated public corruption efforts in recent history.

In a speech last week in San Diego, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said the bureau has made those cases its top priority. "More than ever, the FBI must be actively engaged in combating public corruption," Mueller said.

Though Cunningham reportedly is not cooperating with investigators, prosecutors last week asked a judge to delay Wade's sentencing because they expect his "cooperation will continue for quite some time."

Cunningham, a decorated Vietnam War veteran, was so aggressive in seeking bribes that he kept track of them on his House stationery, court papers said. One notation says that in exchange for a $16 million defense contract, Cunningham expected to receive $140,000. An additional $1 million on that project would cost the contractor another $50,000 bribe, according to court documents.

In all, Cunningham took in at least $2.4 million since 2000, in part through a $700,000 profit on the sale of his relatively modest California home, a transaction that tipped off investigators, according to court records. Besides cash, contractors bribed Cunningham with top-of-the-line cars, a yacht, and antique furnishings for his new $2.5 million mansion. Wade, prosecutors say, was Cunningham's chief benefactor, even paying $115,000 toward the congressman's capital gains tax.

"Cunningham grew to expect luxury," prosecutors said in court documents. "His coconspirators eagerly plied him with it."

Having won over Cunningham, Wade set his sights on Congress members Harris and Goode, according to court documents.

Wade wanted Harris -- the former Florida secretary of state who had a pivotal role in the disputed 2000 presidential election who is now running for US Senate -- to request an earmarked appropriation allowing MZM to build a Florida facility, the court records say. A few days after paying for Cunningham's Miami Beach trip, Wade gave some of his MZM employees and their spouses $2,000 each, reimbursement for checks they'd write to Harris's 2004 House campaign.

"The employees [then] delivered the checks to Wade, who personally handed them" to Harris, the court documents say.

In early 2005, Wade met Harris for dinner at Washington's posh Citronelle restaurant to discuss a fund-raiser for Harris and whether Harris could get federal money for an MZM facility in her district, according to the Orlando Sentinel. Wade picked up the $2,800 dinner check, a violation of House ethics rules if Harris's portion of the meal was worth more than $50. Harris has said she didn't eat or drink much at the dinner and that she thought her staff had paid for her share.

In a written statement to reporters, Harris acknowledged that she and Wade talked business and that she later requested but couldn't get a $10 million appropriation for the MZM project, which she thought would create local jobs. A spokesman would not say whether Harris was present when Wade handed over the $2,000 checks for her campaign.

Wade also arranged for Goode's reelection campaign to get big checks. Court records say that in March 2005 Wade gave money to his associates, who in turn became what the government calls "straw donors," contributing at least $46,000 of Wade's money to the Virginia Republican. Wade then asked Goode and his staff for federal money to build an MZM facility in Goode's district. In June 2005, Goode's staff "confirmed to Wade that an appropriations bill would include $9 million for the facility and a related program," according to court records.

In an e-mail to the Globe, Goode said he has no problem discussing a federal contract with such a big campaign contributor. Asked what he believed Wade wanted after MZM employees contributed so much money to his campaign, Goode responded, "I'm a strong supporter of 'Buy American' and a promoter of the Fifth District of Virginia in which MZM facilities were located."

Wade's unnamed, unindicted coconspirator, whom news reports identified as Brent Wilkes, a onetime associate of his, also allegedly paid Cunningham more than $600,000 to get defense contracts. Wilkes ran a company called ADCS Inc., which got tens of millions of dollars in contracts to transform the Pentagon's paper documents into computer files; court documents say that Cunningham had a hand in getting ADCS hired.

Wilkes's name surfaced again recently because he reportedly attended poker parties at the Watergate that included members of Congress, defense contractors, and Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, the third-ranking leader at the CIA who resigned last week.

White House Knew Of Payments For Tobin's Defense (NHUL)

By John Distaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, May 19, 2006

The former Chairman of the Republican National Committee remembers telling someone at the White House that he had decided to have the RNC pay the legal defense bills for convicted phone-jamming conspirator James Tobin, but he can't remember who.

Ed Gillespie told the New Hampshire Union Leader yesterday he informed the White House after he decided to authorize payment.

The Washington Post reported on Wednesday that Gillespie told its reporter that he had "informed the White House, without seeking formal approval, before authorizing the payments."

Gillespie told the Union Leader the two accounts were "consistent" because he decided to authorize the payments before telling the White House and actually authorized the payments after telling the White House.

But state Democratic Chairman Kathy Sullivan called what she viewed as a change in Gillespie's account troubling. If the White House was informed by Gillespie before he authorized payments, the White House could have had an opportunity to put a stop to it, and did not, she noted.

Democrats have long been trying to link the phone-jamming operation to the White House. The Senate Majority Project, a Washington-based research group with Democratic ties, has pointed out that court records show Tobin made about two dozen calls to the White House political affairs office on the day before, and the morning of, Election Day 2002.

Current RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman, who headed the White House political affairs operation in 2002, said his former office had nothing to do with the operation.

Telemarketers hired by the state Republican Party on the morning of election day 2002 placed hundreds of hang-up calls to Democratic Party and Manchester firefighters union offices to jam their get-out-the-vote telephone lines, an apparent effort to keep likely Democratic voters from the polls.

The key election that day was between Senate candidates Republican John Sununu, who won, and former Democratic Gov. Jeanne Shaheen.

Tobin was convicted of two telephone harassment charges for putting former New Hampshire GOP executive director Charles McGee in touch with former Republican consultant Allan Raymond, who in turn hired the Idaho-based telemarketer to jam the lines.

Tobin was sentenced on Wednesday to 10 months in prison and two years probation, and fined $10,000. McGee and Raymond have pled guilty to similar charges. McGee has served, and Raymond continues to serve, prison time.

The RNC paid only for Tobin's defense by the Washington law firm of Williams and Connolly.

Gillespie told the Washington Post this week he authorized the payment because Tobin "was accused of doing something in his capacity as an RNC consultant, and we believed him to be innocent."

Williams and Connolly began representing Tobin about the time he was indicted in December 2004. So far, the RNC has paid at least $2.8 million for Tobin's defense. He is appealing the conviction.

Gillespie yesterday told the Union Leader he could not remember who at the White House he informed of his decision to pick up Tobin's legal bills.

"I'm not going to guess," he said. "It was years ago, but as a matter of routine, I would have told somebody over there."

If someone at the White House had expressed displeasure with his decision, Gillespie said, "It was too late. I had made the decision and they were not involved in it."

Sullivan said she was "extremely troubled by the change in story. . .We have former RNC Chairman Gillespie changing his story from one day to the next about who had prior knowledge of the decision to pay Mr. Tobin's legal fees."

Michael Gehrke, executive director of the Senate Majority Project, has said he suspects Karl Rove may have been informed of the payments because "Rove was, and is, the Bush Administration's point person for all things political."

Rove is scheduled to be in the state on June 12 to keynote a fund-raiser for the New Hampshire Republican State Committee.

CDC Staffer Pleads Guilty To Fraudulent Claims (AJC)

By Bill Torpy

Atlanta Journal-Constitution, May 19, 2006

A CDC director pleaded guilty in federal court Thursday to a charge of theft of government funds for padding her travel expense accounts by an estimaated $7,500.

Donna Stroup, 54, was director of the Coordinating Center for Health Promotion for the Atlanta-based Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Prosecutors say Stroup, over a three-year period, submitted dozens of fraudulent claims and altered receipts for expenses not covered by the agency. Often, she wrote off personal expenses as FedEx or copying charges.

One such expense for $106.22 was described as Powerpoint slides, when it was a purchase at Filene's Basement department store.

"It was repeated criminal acts, albeit small, by a high-ranking government official, so we had to charge her," said U.S. Attorney David Nahmias.

In 2004, Stroup was one of the authors of a widely reported study that said obesity was about to overtake smoking as the nation's leading cause of death. The CDC later had to issue a rare correction of the study, saying the numbers were overstated, blaming the error on computer software.

CDC spokesman Tom Skinner would say only that Stroup has submitted her resignation. She will be sentenced in July.

Shooter Languished Between Delusions, Despair (WP)

By Paul Duggan

Washington Post, May 19, 2006

In his lucid moments, Michael W. Kennedy longed to have his mental health back, saying he felt tortured by strange delusions and might kill himself to find peace, say teenagers who were close to him and an adult who has spoken with Kennedy's parents.

They said that when Kennedy, 18, fired more than 70 shots outside a Fairfax County police station last week, mortally wounding two officers, it marked the end of a half-year descent from normalcy to homicidal madness. His decline began suddenly in the fall, they said, with the unexplained onset of chronic severe headaches and bouts of sleeplessness.

One friend, Daniel Sforza, 18, who saw Kennedy late in the summer before going away to college and then hung out with him in the fall on a weekend visit home, said he was stunned by the "drastic" change in his friend's mental condition. "Mike was totally different," Sforza said, recalling the bizarre, disjointed delusions that Kennedy rambled on about in the fall.

"I mean, totally off-the-wall different," Sforza said.

Before then, his friends said, Kennedy, who was killed by police during the attack, seemed healthy and content, a sociable teenager with a quirky, carefree personality. He was a gun enthusiast, they said, but did not fit the profile of a would-be mass murderer. Far from being a brooding loner, they said, he had a wealth of friends at Fairfax's Westfield High School, from which he graduated last spring, and his behavior there never hinted at the trouble to come.

Late last year, as delusions haunted Kennedy more and more, his friends said, he agonized in moments of clarity.

"It seemed like he was two personalities," said a former girlfriend, now 17, who did not want her name published for privacy reasons. She stayed close with Kennedy to the end. "He could be this crazy-talking person. And then he would come back to his normal self and be like, 'I can't live like this! Something's wrong with me!' "Headaches, Insomnia, Ramblings

When his mental problems took hold in the fall, Kennedy, an aspiring graphic artist, was a student at Northern Virginia Community College in Manassas.

"We can't put a finger on any one moment or cataclysmic event that started the downfall," said the adult who has talked regularly with Kennedy's parents since the shootings.

Speaking on condition of anonymity because the attack is being investigated by police, the parents' acquaintance said that Kennedy's headaches and insomnia were aggravated by the delusions. During those spells, which grew more intense and prolonged over the winter, he rambled incoherently about God, Hitler, aliens and a coming apocalyptic battle in which he was destined to play a key role, his friends said.

Through all this talk of an epic struggle for dominion over the Earth, Kennedy's friends said, they never heard him threaten to attack the police or anyone specifically. However, the former girlfriend said, "you knew in the back of your mind that if he honestly thought he was talking to God, then he might do something dangerous."

His parents, Brian and Margaret Kennedy, were distraught over their son's worsening condition and took him to "a number of doctors" for a variety of tests, including at Prince William Hospital, the Woodburn Center for Community Mental Health in Annandale and Potomac Ridge Behavioral Health Center in Rockville, the adult acquaintance said. He said Kennedy was given medication, but he did not know exactly what kind.

Brian Kennedy is a meat manager at a supermarket, and his wife works in an optical store. Within the limits of their health insurance, the acquaintance said, the parents "went everywhere they could" in search of help for their only son.

"From the parents' standpoint, they were never given a diagnosis," he said. "They were never told what was wrong with him. Nobody figured it out."

Several of his close friends, as well as the adult acquaintance, said that when Kennedy's delusions subsided and he could think relatively clearly, he openly anguished over his mental problems, telling people he desperately wanted to be normal. They said he often talked of killing himself as an escape.

"He would tell his parents that he couldn't go on anymore unless he got some help," the acquaintance said. The ex-girlfriend said, "He told me he was going to shoot himself, and then he had some revelation where he decided not to."

Another friend, also a teenage girl, said: "One time he told me he was thinking about hanging himself. But he didn't do it because he thought God wouldn't let him do it, that God would . . . hold him in the air and not let him suffocate."

Instead of committing suicide, Kennedy armed himself May 8 with seven guns, carjacked a minivan, drove into a parking lot reserved for police personnel at the Sully District station in western Fairfax -- a few miles from his Centreville home -- and opened fire with an AK-47-style assault rifle and possibly two other weapons.

Detective Vicky O. Armel, 40, died that day. Officer Michael E. Garbarino, 53, died early Wednesday.

Kennedy's parents, who have not spoken publicly about the attack, left their Centreville townhouse after the shootings and went into seclusion with their other child, a 9-year-old girl. As of yesterday, authorities said, the couple also had not talked with Fairfax police detectives, who have repeatedly sought to interview the Kennedys about their son.

When police searched the unoccupied townhouse after the shootings, they said, they found nine guns strewn about the home. As for why the parents kept firearms, given their son's mental state, their attorney has said in a statement that the guns had been locked in two containers. "The family can only surmise that their son broke into one of the containers" before going to the police station, the statement said.'He Couldn't Figure It Out'

At Westfield High, Kennedy "was always a little eccentric," said the former girlfriend, echoing others. "Not weird in a bad way," she said. "Just weird like in, you know, everybody's trying to find their own individuality."

Kennedy was artistic and a military buff, an offbeat kid who often dressed in camouflage pants and combat boots, knew a great deal about guns and devoted a lot of time to the student literary magazine, Calliope, contributing photos and computer graphics. As a senior, he managed the magazine's twice-yearly "coffeehouse," a fundraiser featuring music and poetry readings. "He was really into that," the ex-girlfriend said.

In the fall, he enrolled in community college as a liberal arts major. The college would not disclose his grades, but Sforza, a student at Virginia Commonwealth University, said Kennedy told him in Internet chats "that he wasn't doing well at all."

And it was easy for Sforza to see why, when he came home from VCU in Richmond one autumn weekend and realized that his friend was losing his grip on reality.

"He really wanted all these thoughts to end," Sforza said. "He wanted to figure out the problems and why he was thinking this way. . . . He couldn't figure it out."

Kennedy, who had a part-time job at a CVS, stopped working near the end of the year and gave up on college. When he talked with friends while in a delusional state, they noticed that his fantasies were becoming more intricate and bizarre. At other times, when he seemed fairly rational, they could tell he was sinking deeper into despair over his problems.

In February, after he shot and wounded his family's dog, Duke, Kennedy told the ex-girlfriend that he had planned to commit suicide but experienced a religious revelation that changed his mind. He said the gun went off accidentally as he was putting it away and Duke, a spaniel, was hit.Psychiatric Centers and Jail Cells

Winter became spring, and his descent accelerated, his friends said. Although medical tests, including a CT scan, found no clear physical abnormalities, Kennedy's parents "are still thinking it was some kind of brain tumor" that caused his erratic behavior, the adult acquaintance said. He said the couple has not seen a report of their son's autopsy.

On April 16, Easter, he said, the parents took Kennedy to Woodburn, an outpatient facility. After being examined and sent home with medication, Kennedy was back at the center two days later. That time, the acquaintance said, Woodburn officials called other psychiatric facilities to find a bed for him and arranged for him to be admitted to Potomac Ridge. "His mother drove him straight there," the acquaintance said.

He stayed at Potomac Ridge for about seven hours April 18 before climbing out a window in the early evening. After carjacking a Toyota by bluffing that he had a gun, he drove from Rockville back to Centreville, to the ex-girlfriend's house.

"He just started going off on one of his weird conversations," she said. It was past 9 p.m. as they stood in her driveway, the Toyota parked at the curb. "He right away told me he stole the car. He said he had gone to some mental hospital and was being treated like an animal, and he couldn't stand being there." She urged him to surrender to police. "I yelled at him a little bit, but I didn't want to get him mad, because I was really afraid."

Kennedy then drove to the home of another friend, Brendan Baker, 18. "When I opened the door, he goes: 'Brendan! It's time! It's time!' " Baker asked, time for what? But he got no clear answer. "He just started talking crazy stuff. . . . Then he said all he wanted to do was die."

Baker said he and two other young people at his home persuaded their troubled friend to turn himself in, and those two teenagers followed Kennedy as he drove to the Sully station.

The experience of being locked up seemed to aggravate Kennedy's mental instability, said his friends and the acquaintance who has spoken with his parents. Besides his brief stay at Potomac Ridge, Kennedy spent about 66 hours in the Fairfax County jail, then a night in a Montgomery County cell after he was extradited there on the carjacking charge, before he was released on bond April 22.

In the final two weeks of his life -- as Kennedy reached out more often to friends on the Web, by phone and in person, at all hours -- he complained bitterly about the treatment he had received behind bars. But it was hard for those listening to discern which stories were true and which were products of his increasingly confused mind.

Brendan Cowan, 21, was among the last to see him. He picked up Kennedy at his home Saturday morning, May 6, and they drove to a Starbucks.

Cowan, a devout Christian, said he asked Kennedy whether he thought Satan was responsible for his visions. Kennedy shrugged, listlessly, and gestured to pedestrians and motorists. "He said that when he looked at all these people, it was like looking at dead people," Cowan said. "He would look into their eyes, and their eyes were just solid white, like they had rolled back into their skulls."

He said Kennedy sounded "really, really saddened by what he saw."

Satan was in his thoughts two days later. Before he gathered up the guns, carjacked a minivan near his home and drove to the Sully station, Kennedy messaged Sforza in his VCU dorm room, and the two chatted for a while on the Web.

"He told me he wanted to get an exorcism," Sforza said. This was about an hour before the 3:52 p.m. shootings. "And I was like, 'Do they even still do exorcisms?' We joked around a little bit. . . . I don't really remember how we ended the conversation. . . . We really didn't say goodbye. It was like we just stopped talking."

Sforza said he went back to his schoolwork, untroubled. The chat had not been much different from many others between him and Kennedy in past months.

"When I would talk to him," Sforza said, "I often felt like he thought he was at war with the world. It was him versus everyone else, because no one else understood what was happening to him."

Law Officer Shot Many Times (MCA)

By Chris Conley

Memphis Commercial Appeal, May 19, 2006

A deputy U.S. marshal was shot numerous times by Memphis police before dying in an exchange of gunfire, a Shelby County Medical Examiner's report revealed Thursday.

Mary Fisher, 46, died Sunday morning after she began shooting at two police officers in the driveway of her Cordova home at 1143 Palmina Cove.

Investigators hadn't determined how many times officers shot at Fisher, but said she fired at least several shots, some apparently after she was wounded.

Officer Patrick Taylor was hit twice in the leg. He and a second officer remain on routine leave with pay while an investigation into the shooting continues. The name of the second officer has not been released.

The circumstances that sparked the shooting remain a mystery, and Shelby County Sheriff's deputies hope toxicology tests will help.

They said, however, that there were no indications from inside Fisher's home that she was on medication, no pill bottles.

"We want to know what happened," said Marshal David Jolley, who is in charge of the West Tennessee office.

Fisher was assigned to the Memphis office in the early 1990s, but in 2001 was promoted to the position of district supervisor and transferred to Texas. She was a lieutenant colonel in the Army Reserves.

Most recently, she had been assigned to the Office of Emergency Management, a unit of Homeland Security.

"She seemed to have it under control. Nobody saw it coming," said Jolley. "She was a very private person."

Those who knew her said she had recently gone through a divorce and custody dispute over a minor daughter.

Sheriff's deputies got a 911 call from Fisher's home about 10 p.m. the night before her death and found some of her co-workers there. They told the deputies that Fisher had been "delusional" and that she had driven off in her white BMW.

Through the night, police searched for her, and put out bulletins to all the surrounding police agencies.

Her co-workers called her repeatedly on her cell phone. She answered the telephone several times, Jolley said, but would not listen to pleas to come home.

She also would not tell her fellow marshals where she was.

"They could not get a fix on her," Jolley said. "She wouldn't tell them anything."

Eight hours later, two Memphis officers working a wreck at Germantown and Macon noticed a white BMW driving erratically. They called other officers, who tried unsuccessfully to pull her over, and followed her into her driveway.

There, she refused to get out of her car. She then leaned out and started firing, prompting a hail of gunfire in response.

The medical examiner's office ruled her death a homicide, indicating only that she died at the hands of another, and that it was not an accident.

Homeland Security Officer Charged With Murder In SoCal Killing (SFC/AP)

San Francisco Chronicle, May 19, 2006

(05-18) 05:06 PDT , (AP) --

SANTA ANA, Calif. — A Department of Homeland Security officer faces a murder charge in connection with a shooting outside his apartment after authorities dismissed a lesser charge as his trial was about to begin.

Douglas William Bates, 44, had been scheduled to go to trial Wednesday on a voluntary manslaughter charge, which carried a possible 11-year sentence.

He now faces a sentence of 40 years to life on a second-degree murder charge with a gun enhancement, authorities said.

"We didn't do it for the penalty but for the facts and the law," said Assistant District Attorney David Brent, who filed the charge.

Bates is accused of firing his gun outside his apartment at 20-year-old Bassim Chmait after a dispute with Chmait and his friends in February of 2005.

Chmait's friends told police that Bates pistol-whipped one of them and shot Chmait when he tried to intervene. Bates claimed that his gun went off when he was beaten by Chmait and his companions.

Bates was not arrested until five months after the incident when prosecutors took his case to a grand jury.

The last minute change did not sit well with Bates' attorney, Mike Cavalluzzi.

"To wait until now makes me question their motives," Cavalluzzi said. "If the district attorney had questions with the grand jury's finding they would've dismissed and refiled back then instead of allowing the case to proceed."

Bates worked at Los Angeles International Airport for the DHS. He was assigned to desk duty after the shooting. He is free on bond and is set to be arraigned May 31.

Judge: No Fast Track For Duke Rape Case (AP)

AP, May 19, 2006

DURHAM, N.C. (AP) -- One of three Duke University lacrosse players charged with rape wants the case resolved in time for the next school year, his attorney said in court Thursday. But the judge warned he will not fast-track the proceedings.

The case "is not going to jump ahead of the line and be handled any differently," Superior Court Judge Ronald L. Stephens said at a hearing for sophomore Reade Seligmann.

After the brief hearing, District Attorney Mike Nifong said that he intends to try all three players together and that he does not expect any trial to begin before next year.

Seligmann, 20, of Essex Fells, N.J., and Collin Finnerty, 19, of Garden City, N.Y., were indicted last month on charges of raping a woman who had been hired to strip at a team party in March. A third player, co-captain David Evans, was indicted on Monday.

"We want a trial as fast as we can," said Seligmann attorney Kirk Osborn. "This young kid wants to go to school in the fall, and he can't until this is resolved."

Seligmann was stoic as he entered the courthouse for his first court appearance, passing in front of TV cameras and photographers. He endured taunts from members of the New Black Panther Party, one of whom yelled, "Justice will be served, rapist!" The defendants are white, and their accuser is black.

The defendant was not asked any questions during the 20-minute hearing in the packed courtroom, and did not speak. Like the other defendants, Seligmann is free on $400,000 bail. The judge refused to lower that amount Thursday.

Seligmann's lawyer had planned to ask the judge for all evidence collected by the prosecution, but before the hearing the district attorney provided the defense with a copy of his entire case file, including 1,278 pages of evidence, two videotapes and a compact disc containing photos.

Evans, the only defendant to speak publicly about the charges, has called the allegations "fantastic lies" and declared that he and the two other athletes are innocent.

Fugitive Financier Hinkley Turns Himself In At Mexican Border (DMR)

Des Moines Register, May 19, 2006

One of Iowa's most-wanted federal fugitives, a suspected millionaire swindler who disappeared nearly two years ago, has surrendered to federal marshals in Laredo, Texas, with only $40, a Mexican calling card and a pack of cigarettes.

Federal authorities say Scott William Hinkley Sr., 57, surrendered to U.S. Marshals at the Mexican border on Sunday.

Hinkley had been missing for nearly two years since he bolted from his Des Moines apartment with 33 months of probation left.

"On behalf of the plaintiffs, I'll be interested in talking with him," said Pete Cannon, a lawyer for investors who lost roughly $5.5 million when Hinkley's Iowa and Missouri Rural Investment companies vaporized in 2000. "We thought we had exhausted the asset trail," Cannon said. "But we'll take the opportunity to talk to him again."

Hinkley, a former Quaker minister turned housing financier, left his Oskaloosa home on a business trip in late June 2000 with a cargo that included boxes of company records and $175,000 in cash. While relatives publicly worried about his fate, Hinkley stayed hidden until he was discovered in October aboard a $1.3 million yacht in the Caribbean, along with a rifle and some diamonds.

Hinkley pleaded guilty in 2001 of money laundering and mail fraud and was sentenced to 3 years and 11 months in federal prison. He was released in March 2004 and had 33 months left on his prole when he vanished from his Des Moines apartment, probably in late June 2004.

U.S. Marshals in Des Moines on Thursday did not return an after-hours telephone calls seeking more information about Hinkley. A news release from Texas said marshals received a tip on May 10 that Hinkley might be in Mexico. While that lead was being investigated, Hinkley "crossed the border" on Sunday and "identified himself to U.S. authorities as a U.S. fugitive," according to the statement.

Federal authorities last year said they had exhausted all leads in the search for Hinkley and presumed that he had was living off some previously hidden money.

Cannon said accountants hired by his firm recovered roughly $3 million but found evidence that most of the rest of the money was burned up in Hinkley's extravagant lifestyle. Hinkley's flight, Cannon said, "certainly leads one to believe there might have been some other assets out there, and we'll certainly take the opportunity to talk with him again."

Former Minister Surrenders On Texas-Mexico Border (AP)

By James Beltran

AP, May 18, 2006

DES MOINES, Iowa - A former Quaker minister convicted of swindling investors out of millions of dollars has been arrested on the Texas-Mexico border after evading authorities for almost two years.

Scott Hinkley served 47 months in prison for stealing an estimated $5.5 million from 330 investors in his Iowa and Missouri Rural Investment companies. He was released in March 2004 but missed an appointment with his parole officer four months later and had not been seen since.

Hinkley, 56, was arrested Sunday after crossing from Mexico into Laredo, Texas, and identifying himself as a U.S. fugitive. He had $40, a Mexican calling card and a pack of cigarettes, according to a U.S. Marshal's statement.

"A lot of people were hoping he would be arrested," said Deputy U.S. Marshal Mike Powell, noting that Hinkley was among Iowa's most wanted fugitives.

"He gave up. There is a lot of different speculation on why he did what he did. ... We had very few leads up until recently."

Marshals received a tip May 10 that Hinkley may have fled to Mexico. Four days later he surrendered at the Bridge of America, according to the U.S. Marshal's statement.

Powell would not say how much time Hinkley had spent in Mexico, but he did say there is speculation Hinkley had used some of the stolen money to support himself. He had hid the $5.5 million in at least 28 bank accounts, and authorities have said they are not sure if they located all the funds.

Hinkley was in federal custody Thursday in Laredo awaiting a transfer to Iowa.

Al Overbaugh, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, said Hinkley's supervisory release may be revoked. A judge will rule on the punishment, though Overbaugh would not speculate on its severity.

"Every case is unique, and certainly his is unique," said Overbaugh. "He has quite a past."

Authorities say Hinkley initially fled in July 2000 as his rural housing businesses were about to collapse. Leaving his wife behind, Hinkley took $175,000 in cash and some diamond jewelry. He was captured three months later aboard a $1.3 million yacht in the Caribbean.

Hinkley pleaded guilty to mail fraud and money laundering and was sentenced to 57 months in prison. He was released about 10 months early in March 2004 after he helped authorities investigate a Johnston stockbroker who was involved in the same scheme.

Lawyers for 330 investors involved in a Mahaska County lawsuit say they recovered more than $3 million of the stolen money by seizing bank accounts and selling assets such as the yacht.

Hinkley was a minister and college fundraiser in Indiana before moving to Iowa in the early 1990s. Until 1994, he was head of fundraising at William Penn University. He later became active in real-estate investment, offering "affordable, rehabilitated housing ... to low- and moderate-income people," according to company literature.

Feds Indict Fugitive Online Betting Operators (TWEB)

By Gregg Keizer

TechWeb, May 18, 2006

The Department of Justice on Wednesday announced a dozen money-laundering charges against the fugitive owners of an online gambling Web site who walked away with a quarter of a billion dollars.

"This indictment underscores the Justice Department's commitment to attacking illegal Internet gambling concerns by using federal anti-money laundering laws," the DoJ said in its statement.

William Scott and Jessica Davis laundered some $250 million raked in by their Internet betting site, which they sold in 2003 to an Australian company, Betcorp.

The pair, who have been on the lam since a separate 1998 criminal indictment in New York, walked off with their site's $250 million in profits. The government has attempted to freeze numerous bank accounts, but has been only partially successful; according to the DoJ, in 2003 it seized some $7 million out of $10 million Scott had in an account in Guernsey, a small island off the coast of France.

Scott and Davis have been charged with 12 counts of conspiracy, money laundering, and failure to disclose foreign financial accounts. The IRS is involved in the investigation because of the latter charge.

Scott, 65, remains in Antigua and Barbuda, a two-island Caribbean country east of Puerto Rico. Scott previously served time in federal prison for convictions on extortion, conspiracy, and racketeering charges.

Although Congress has considered legislation to ban online gambling, it has failed to move a bill. Opponents have argued that laws cannot stop Internet betting, since it can easily jump national borders.

Home Builder Charged In Alleged Fraud (KMBC)

By Jim Flink

KMBC-TV, May 18, 2006

OVERLAND PARK, Kan. -- A Johnson County man who was once the area's largest home builder has been charged in connection with a $25 million fraud scheme, KMBC's Jim Flink reported.

U.S. Attorney Eric Melgren returned an indictment Thursday against F. Jeffrey Miller, 45, of Stanley. Miller operated Miller Enterprises and Star Land Development.

Miller was charged with 60 counts, including conspiracy, bank fraud and money laundering.

The indictment describes Miller as the kingpin of an operation that included loan officers who forged signatures, appraisers who inflated values, realtors and developers -- all allegedly designed to con banks and down-and-out home buyers out of millions of dollars.

"Miller advertised that he could sell homes to buyers with credit problems who had little or no money for a down payment," Melgren said in a news release. "In fact, with the help of willing co-conspirators, he defrauded banks and coerced buyers."

The indictment claims the crimes allegedly occurred from 1997 to the present in Johnson County.

Eight other people have been charged in the case: Todd Earnshaw, 45, Overland Park; Brian Rouse, 36, Overland Park; Paul E. Nicolace, 50, Overland Park; Angela Parenza, 39, Kansas City, Mo.; Elizabeth L. Hessel, 46, Overland Park; James Moser, 62, Overland Park; Steve Middleton, 45, Stilwell; and Lanny Ross, 64, Leawood.

KMBC first reported the alleged scam five years ago when homeowners contacted Channel 9. The buyers were upset about crumbling homes that had cracked foundations, leaky roofs and leaky pipes.

Eventually, both the Kansas and Missouri attorneys general got involved. The buyers' complaints led to this week's federal indictments.

Developer Charged With $25M Fraud Scheme (KCBIZ)

Kansas City Business Journal, May 19, 2006

The U.S. Department of Justice has charged a Kansas City-area builder with organizing a $25 million scheme to boost his business through conspiracy, bank fraud and money laundering.

The developer, F. Jeffrey Miller, 45, of Stanley, was charged in a 60-count indictment detailing crimes that allegedly occurred from 1997 to the present in Johnson County, the Justice Department said in a release Thursday.

According to the indictment, Miller operated Miller Enterprises and Star Land Development, which built and developed houses in the Kansas City area and was the largest building in the area in 1999 and 2000. Miller also started two companies, Associated Capital and Associated Finance, in June 1998 to prepare loan application for potential customers.

In the release, U.S. Attorney Eric Melgren said Miller advertised that he could sell homes to people with credit problems who had little money for a down payment.

"In fact, with the help of willing co-conspirators, he defrauded banks and coerced buyers," Melgren said in the statement.

Miller is charged with one count of conspiracy, 53 counts of bank fraud and five counts of money laundering. Miller also faces one count of criminal forfeiture, in which the government seeks forfeiture of proceeds traceable to the alleged crimes, including $25 million, a residence in Stilwell, Kan., and an airplane.

Among the acts prosecutors allege Miller undertook are:

• Defrauding financial institutions to make loans by using false and fraudulent pretenses and omissions of fact.

• Falsifying loan documents to qualify home buyers for mortgages for which they otherwise wouldn't have qualified.

• Providing home buyers with down payments and closing costs without the lenders' knowledge.

• Increasing the sales prices of houses at closing.

• Selling houses at discount to investors without disclosing it to lenders.

Ex-N.C. Lottery Commissioner Indicted (AP)

By Gary D. Robertson

AP, May 18, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C. - A federal grand jury indicted a former state lottery commissioner on fraud charges Thursday, saying he failed to disclose his work for a leading supplier of scratch-off lottery tickets.

Kevin Geddings was indicted on multiple counts of mail and wire fraud. If found guilty, he could face up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine for each charge, said U.S. Attorney Frank Whitney.

Telephone numbers for Geddings' cell phone and offices in Charlotte and Washington, D.C., were disconnected and he could not be reached for comment Thursday. A call to his home Charlotte was not returned.

He said in a voice mail message to The News & Observer of Raleigh he was "completely innocent" of the charges.

Prosecutors said Scientific Games or a consulting firm it acquired paid Geddings' public relations firm nearly $230,000 from 2001 to 2005, but that Geddings never disclosed his financial ties as required when he filled out a state financial disclosure form.

Geddings resigned from the newly formed commission Nov. 1, just after Scientific Games officials told him they planned to reveal their payments to him and questioned why he hadn't disclosed his work for the company.

"Geddings stated if he had turned over the recent payments from Scientific Games, he would not have been appointed commissioner," the indictment said.

His indictment is the first to come out of a federal grand jury investigating possible violations of the state's lobbying and campaign finance laws. Scientific Games has cooperated with the investigation, Whitney said.

Jury Hands Up Fraud (WINSSJ)

By David Ingram

Winston-Salem Journal, May 19, 2006

A federal grand jury indicted Kevin Geddings, a former N.C. Lottery commissioner, yesterday, charging him with fraud for what investigators said was an attempt to hide $228,796 in payments from Scientific Games Corp., a lottery vendor.

Geddings was a radio-and-marketing executive from Charlotte who was active in Democratic politics when he was appointed to the N.C. Lottery Commission last year. He was one of the panel's original members, after the historic approval of the state's first modern lottery.

The grand jury charged Geddings with five counts of mail fraud and four counts of wire fraud, according to a news release from U.S. Attorney Frank Whitney.

"Geddings ... devised and intended to devise a scheme and artifice to defraud the State of North Carolina and the citizens of North Carolina of their intangible right of his honest service," according to the release, "by failing to disclose his conflict of interest arising from his nearly five-year financial relationship with Scientific Games relating to state lotteries."

The release said that the indictment "is part of an ongoing investigation" by federal and state authorities. It did not elaborate, but several lobbyists and state officials have appeared at the federal courthouse in Raleigh on days when the grand jury was expected to meet.

Grand jurors also issued a subpoena in October to the office of House Speaker Jim Black, D-Mecklenburg, who nominated Geddings to the lottery commission. The subpoena asked for documents related to Geddings and 27 other "relevant parties."

Geddings' indictment is the first that the grand jurors have issued in the investigation.

The Associated Press reported last night that Geddings left a voice-mail message with the Raleigh News & Observer saying that he is "completely innocent" of the charges. Ed Hinson Jr., a Charlotte lawyer who has represented Geddings, could not be reached for comment. Officials with the U.S. Attorney's Office also could not be reached.

Geddings was one of the nine original members of the lottery commission. Although he was appointed by Black, he had previously advised Lt. Gov. Beverly Perdue and the N.C. Senate Democratic Caucus and served as the chief of staff to former Gov. Jim Hodges of South Carolina.

Soon after his appointment in September, Geddings was forced to acknowledge a past business relationship with an executive at Scientific Games, one of the largest lottery operators in the country.

Geddings said he and the executive, Alan Middleton, had worked on several public-relations campaigns together, including one related to seat-belt use in South Carolina before Middleton joined Scientific Games. He said he had also rented office space to Middleton.

Geddings had not noted the relationship on the statement of economic interests required of many state officials. The statements are intended to uncover potential conflicts of interest, and Geddings had to file an amendment.

According to the U.S. Attorney's Office, his relationship with Scientific Games was far more extensive. Investigators say that Geddings worked for the company as far back as February 2001 and received $228,796.18.

They also say that, on Oct. 6, Geddings or one of his employees deposited a $9,500 check from Scientific Games into a bank account belonging to Geddings' advertising company. He mailed his economic-interest statement the next day.

Investigators say that Geddings intentionally hid the payments because he knew that they would disqualify him from serving on the lottery commission.

"(Please) never acknowledge by phone that sci games is a client," Geddings wrote to an assistant on Sept. 26, according to investigators.

No one from Scientific Games returned a call for comment on the indictment yesterday. The news release from Whitney said that the company began cooperating with investigators in October.

In the first disclosure of payments to Geddings, company officials said Nov. 1 that they had paid him and his firm $24,500 in 2005 alone. He resigned from the lottery commission within hours.

In a letter to the N.C. Board of Ethics after Geddings resigned, Hinson, as Geddings' attorney, said that Geddings didn't mention his work for Scientific Games because he explicitly terminated the relationship when he was appointed to the lottery commission.

Hinson said that Geddings "deeply regrets not having made more complete voluntary disclosures, and that is why he resigned."

Julie Robinson, a spokeswoman for Black, reiterated yesterday that Black did not know the extent of Geddings' relationship with Scientific Games before appointing Geddings to the commission.

"Had the speaker known the details and exact timing of his relationship with the lottery company, he would never have appointed him to the new lottery commission," Robinson said in a news release.

LA Police: Two Women Under Arrest In Life Insurance Fraud Case (AP)

By Daisy Nguyen

AP, May 18, 2006

LOS ANGELES - Two women in their 70s were arrested Thursday for investigation of insurance fraud after they collected more than $2 million in benefits from policies issued on the lives of homeless men who were killed in hit-and-run crashes, authorities said.

Police believe the women may have committed the fatal accidents and were befriending other men to set up more insurance policies.

"Anyone would think that even though they're making financial gains for this, that they would leave the actual dirty work to someone else or hire someone," police Detective Dennis Kilcoyne said at a press conference. "We're not so sure about that anymore."

Helen Golay, 75, and Olga Rutterschmidt, 72, allegedly paid for the men to stay in apartments for as long as two years, police said. In exchange, they obtained the victims' signatures and opened more than a dozen life insurance policies that named the women as beneficiaries.

In the November 1999 and June 2005 hit-and-runs, both victims were struck in street alleys in the early morning hours and no witnesses were found, police said. In both cases, Golay and Rutterschmidt came forward claiming to be relatives or fiancees of the men.

"These women were preying and profiting from the most vulnerable victims of our society," said Michael Ingram, a bureau chief with the state Department of Insurance.

Golay and Rutterschmidt, described by authorities as longtime friends, appeared in federal court Thursday and were ordered held without bail. They were each indicted on eight counts of mail fraud for making false insurance claims, said assistant U.S. attorney Jason Gonzalez. Each face up to 160 years in prison if convicted of all counts, he said.

"We're focusing our direction directly at Helen and Olga for the murder aspect of the investigation," Kilcoyne said.

Their arrests came after authorities searched two locations Thursday morning and arrested Rutterschmidt at her home in Hollywood. Golay was arrested at the triplex she owns in Santa Monica, police said. Their assets were frozen, said FBI special agent Herb Brown.

Both women were retired; Golay was in real estate and Rutterschmidt used to own a coffee shop, said police Detective Rosemary Sanchez.

Police traffic investigators discovered the alleged scam when they were looking into a fatal hit-and-run accident last fall. One investigator had mentioned the case of two women who had taken out large life insurance policies on 50-year-old Kenneth McDavid when another investigator recalled working on a similar case in 1999, in which 73-year-old Paul Vados was killed.

When they compared notes, they found the beneficiaries in both cases were Golay and Rutterschmidt, and the victims were homeless men, police said. Investigators say the women filed $3.8 million in claims, but around $2.4 million was paid out before authorities contacted the insurance companies.

A former roommate of McDavid's told investigators Golay approached McDavid at a church and offered to get him off the streets if he would sign an application for a $500,000 life insurance policy, according to court documents. The roommate said Golay paid for McDavid's monthly rent at a Hollywood apartment.

When it became known that McDavid was sharing the apartment with others, the roommate said a woman named "Olga" showed up with an unknown man carrying a revolver, demanding the roommate leave.

Undercover officers who spied on Golay and Rutterschmidt in recent months saw them making contact with other elderly men, possibly to set up more life insurance policies, Kilcoyne said.

"We can't sit by and wait for something else to happen or another body is found in an alley," said Kilcoyne.

Dead Men Walking? Couple Found (CHSUN)

Charlotte (FL) Sun-Herald, May 19, 2006

ENGLEWOOD -- The local couple feared dead have been found in Tennessee -- in the hands of the U.S. marshals.

Bob Carpenter, spokesman for the Charlotte County Sheriff's Office, said Thursday the Englewood couple reported missing and endangered were detained Wednesday night by police near Nashville, Tenn.

Carpenter said Shannon Gordon was arrested Wednesday for violating her probation.

Nathan Myers, 23, meanwhile, was detained by authorities, but later released.

"They're both alive," Carpenter said.

On Tuesday, a family member for Myers filed a missing endangered adult report with the Sheriff's Office. The report said the couple had been missing for about a week, and family members had received anonymous calls saying Gordon had been beaten up and Myers had been killed.

The callers said Myers was beaten to death near Pine and Fourth streets before being buried near a local preschool. Neither one had been heard from since.

"It looked a little strange," Carpenter said.

Carpenter said the Sheriff's Office's "Be On the Lookout" for the couple has been canceled.

Reports Of Shredding Lead To Subpoenas For University (NYT)

By Ronald Smothers

New York Times, May 19, 2006

NEWARK, May 18 — Federal prosecutors subpoenaed a wide range of documents on Thursday from the southern campus of the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey as part of their investigation into allegations of corruption and patronage at the institution, a lawyer for the university said.

The action came one day after F.B.I. agents raided the state university's 366-student Stratford campus to stop the shredding of documents in the office of Warren S. Wallace, the senior associate dean for academic and student affairs at the School of Osteopathic Medicine. University officials in Newark and officials in the office of a federal monitor overseeing the institution were alerted to the shredding by a call to a hot line set up to aid in the inquiry, said John Inglesino, a member of the monitor's staff.

Anna Farneski, a spokeswoman for Bruce C. Vladeck, the university's interim president, said, "We've had an inquiry from the U.S. attorney's office and we've responded as quickly as we can, as always."

Walter Timpone, a lawyer for the university, said the United States attorney's office "followed up today with a catch-all subpoena to see if there was anything that they missed."

Shortly after the call to the hot line but before federal investigators arrived on Wednesday afternoon with subpoenas for documents, Dr. Vladeck's office ordered the shredder in the Stratford office to be unplugged and all documents, shredded or not, to be secured, Mr. Inglesino said.

News of the shredding was first reported on Thursday in The Star-Ledger. The office of Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney in New Jersey, had no comment. Without offering specifics, Mr. Inglesino said investigators for the federal monitor and the United States attorney are looking at Mr. Wallace, the senior associate dean. He said they are also examining the university's hiring of State Senator Wayne R. Bryant of Camden to a $38,220 a year job, and investigating whether the former dean of the osteopathic school, Dr. R. Michael Gallagher, pressured accountants to falsify financial reports and spent thousands of dollars of university money on lavish perks.

Senator Bryant, a Democrat and the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, resigned from his position as a program support coordinator at the university late last year, and Dr. Gallagher stepped down this year. Mr. Bryant has denied any wrongdoing, and Dr. Gallagher has declined to comment.

Mr. Wallace, a Gloucester County freeholder and a commissioner on the Delaware River and Bay Authority, could not be reached for comment. His lawyer, Carl Poplar, did not return calls to his office.

Mr. Inglesino said that the shredding occurred just two days after the federal monitor's own investigators interviewed people at the Stratford campus. He said the entire university staff of 15,000 had been issued a blanket order not to destroy or shred documents. He said his office and Dr. Vladeck's office had been told that the items that being shredded at Mr. Wallace's office were merely faxes of documents whose originals were in the office.

But Mr. Timpone, the university lawyer, said, "With the investigations out there of Bryant and Gallagher, anything being shredded would get noticed."

The university has operated under a federal monitor, Herbert J. Stern, since late last year, when Mr. Christie's office uncovered nearly $5 million in possible Medicaid fraud there.

Tacoma Man Gets Eight-year Sentence For Tax Fraud (PUGBIZ)

Puget Sound (WA) Business Journal, May 19, 2006

David Carroll Stephenson of Tacoma was sentenced to eight years in jail for conspiring to defraud the United States and for not filing income tax returns for three years, officials at the Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service said Thursday.

Stephenson, 50, was also ordered to pay $8.5 million in restitution to the IRS, they added.

According to the government, Stephenson formed and operated "pure equity trusts," where he told his clients to place their money so they could avoid paying income taxes. More than 400 of the trusts were sold by Stephenson and his associate, Michael Joseph Shanahan, for more than $2 million, the government said. Shanahan has pleaded guilty in connection with the case and is scheduled to be sentenced next month, government officials added.

"Mr. Stephenson's sentence should serve as a warning that taxpayers should be wary of tax planning arrangements that claim to drastically reduce or eliminate their tax liability while still allowing them unlimited access to their money. Quite simply, these arrangements are illegal," said John Imhoff Jr., acting IRS chief, criminal investigation, in a statement.

Former Old Mutual Manager Pleads Guilty To Fraud Charges (BALBIZ)

Baltimore Business Journal, May 19, 2006

A former employee of Old Mutual Financial Network in Baltimore has pleaded guilty to charges that she defrauded Old Mutual and banks of more than $850,000.

The U.S. Attorney's Office said Thursday that Bryn D. Phillips, 30, pleaded guilty to one count of bank fraud and one count of mail fraud. In a statement of facts that was part of the plea agreement, Phillips admitted that she obtained more than $700,000 by falsely representing to Wachovia Bank that she had authority to transfer money from Old Mutual bank accounts into accounts that she controlled, prosecutors said.

Prosecutors also said Phillips admitted that she used a company credit card to buy herself more than $150,000 worth of goods, including a $4,000 pink mink jacket, professional basketball tickets and two Louis Vuitton handbags.

Phillips was treasury operations manager at Old Mutual Financial Network -- a Baltimore-based network of life insurance companies -- from May 2002 until January 2005. She used the names and passwords of employees she supervised to make the wire transfers between bank accounts, prosecutors say. Phillips initially submitted reimbursement requests for the company credit card to other Old Mutual employees, later reviewing and authorizing the card payments herself, according to prosecutors.

Phillips was indicted in December on nine counts of bank, mail and wire fraud. She had pleaded not guilty to all charges in January.

Phillips is scheduled to be sentenced in August. She faces a maximum sentence of 30 years in prison, a $1 million fine and 5 years' probation on the bank fraud charge. The mail fraud charge carries a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison, a $250,000 fine and four years of supervised release. Under the plea agreement, she is also liable for forfeiture of the $860,000 that was illegally obtained, prosecutors said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Harry M. Gruber is prosecuting the case, which the FBI and U.S. Postal Inspection Service investigated.

The Old Mutual Financial Network includes Fidelity and Guaranty Life Insurance Company, Americom Life and Annuity Insurance Company and Fidelity and Guaranty Life Insurance Company of New York. It is a subsidiary of London-based financial services company Old Mutual plc.

Taping Of Police Interviews Sought (LAT)

By Peter Y. Hong

Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

A state commission Thursday called for police to tape interrogations of crime suspects in serious felonies and to videotape homicide interrogations. The proposal is meant to prevent wrongful convictions.

Former Atty. Gen. John L. Van de Kamp, chairman of the California Commission on the Fair Administration of Justice, said the proposal could prevent intimidation by interrogators while also protecting police from false misconduct charges.

The panel called on the Legislature to mandate the taping through a new statute. Under the law, if interrogations are not recorded, jurors would be instructed to view confessions with caution.

The commission will hold a public hearing on the proposed law in Los Angeles in June.

Van de Kamp said the cost to police departments of implementing the program could be offset by avoiding lawsuit payouts to wrongfully convicted people. "It only takes a couple of big ones to make this cost-effective," Van de Kamp said.

Los Angeles County Dist. Atty. Steve Cooley expressed initial support for the idea. "In general, memorialization of contacts between a suspect and law enforcement investigators is helpful. A videotape is a step above audiotape in terms of its evidentiary value to prosecutors and, ultimately, to jurors," he said.

Santa Monica defense lawyer William J. Genego, who represented a man wrongly convicted because of a false confession, praised the idea. "It would be an excellent reform that would help everyone in the process: the suspect, police, courts and the public."

The Legislature established the commission to study the administration of justice in California and "determine the extent to which it failed in the past." It has no enforcement powers and is limited to recommending reforms to state and local authorities.

CIVIL LAW:

Povich Lawyer Asks Court To Dismiss Case (AP)

AP, May 18, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — Lawyers for television talk-show host Maury Povich have asked a court to dismiss a $100 million sex harassment lawsuit against him and members of his staff and to compel the producer who filed it to arbitrate the dispute.

Bianca Nardi, 28, of Fort Lee, N.J., complained in a lawsuit filed last month that some of her supervisors at The Maury Povich Show barraged her with sexual remarks and made her watch pornographic movies, wear revealing clothing and expose her body.

Her court papers say she had an unfairly heavy workload because she did tasks that were supposed to be done by another producer, who had an intimate relationship with Povich and often refused to do her own work — without penalty.

Povich, whose show is produced by NBC Universal, is married to veteran television news anchor Connie Chung.

Elisabeth C. Yap, an NBC Universal lawyer, said in an affidavit dated Monday that Nardi's lawyer, Bruce Baron, was told in an April 14 letter that the producer's contract required her to arbitrate any claims arising out of any alleged discrimination or harassment.

Joe Schlosser, a spokesman for NBC Universal, said Thursday: "In response to the plaintiff's (Nardi's) complaint, we have filed a motion to dismiss the case and have asked the court to instead compel the plaintiff to arbitrate her claims as required by her contract."

Baron, Nardi's lawyer, said Thursday he found it "ironic and suspect" that anyone who is innocent of accusations of illegal conduct "would not embrace the opportunity to defend themselves in a court of law as opposed to bobbing and weaving and looking to silence this in some back room."

"My client looks forward to exercising her constitutional right to obtain justice in a court of law," Baron said.

The lawsuit names Povich, NBC Universal Television Inc. and Povich's production company, Mopo, among others, as defendants.

Amazon Patent For Online Orders To Get New Review (WSJ)

By Don Clark

Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

The U.S. Patent and Trademark Office has agreed to re-examine Amazon.com Inc.'s high-profile patent on "one-click" online shopping, after an actor from New Zealand claimed there were possible prior inventions in the field.

An examiner for the agency ruled that the re-examination requested by Peter Calveley had raised a "substantial new question of patentability" affecting Amazon's patent, according to a document outlining the agency's decision.

The "one-click" patent was granted in 1999 to inventors that include Jeff Bezos, Amazon's chief executive officer. It covers ways that Amazon lets customers shop without having to enter their shipping and billing information each time they purchase from the company's Web site.

The Amazon patent is one of the best-known patents on business methods, which have become a hot topic in recent debates over whether the U.S. patent system should be overhauled.

Mr. Calveley's re-examination request, filed in February, includes the citation of a 1998 patent that discusses a "single action" to be used in ordering an item, according to the patent examiner's decision.

Mr. Calveley, whose credits include motion-capture performances used with computer-generated characters in the "Lord of the Rings" movies, has written in his Web log that he decided to challenge the Amazon patent after an unsatisfactory experience with the time it took for the company to ship a book he had ordered. He used the blog to solicit contributions to help pay for the re-examination request.

Patricia Smith, an Amazon spokeswoman, said the company remains confident in the validity of the patent. "We welcome the opportunity to revalidate what we believe is an important innovation in e-commerce," she said.

The patent office's decision to re-examine a patent is the first step in what can be a lengthy process. Indeed, the process of studying other inventions in the field -- known by patent lawyers as "prior art" -- can actually wind up weakening claims that could be raised in any patent-infringement litigation.

"Plainly, there is risk to the patent, but if it survives re-examination, the patent should emerge as stronger," said Alan Fisch, an intellectual-property attorney with law firm Kaye Scholer in Washington, D.C., who isn't a party to the proceeding.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justices Find No Misconduct By Judge (LAT)

By Maura Dolan

DOJ_NMG_0028970

Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — The California Supreme Court on Thursday rejected claims that a judge advised a prosecutor to remove prospective jurors from a death penalty trial because they were Jewish.

The justices found insufficient evidence of misconduct by Alameda County Superior Court Judge Stanley Golde, who died in 1998. A misconduct finding could have led the courts to overturn dozens of death sentences.

The court also discounted claims that the Alameda County district attorney had a policy of barring not only Jews but also African American women from death penalty juries.

A former Alameda County prosecutor had alleged that Golde, who was Jewish, had advised removing Jewish jurors because of their perceived aversion to the death penalty.

The case had stirred wide attention because of the charges of illegal bias in jury selection and because of a study that concluded there was less than a 0.16% chance that prosecutors removed Jewish jurors from capital cases for reasons other than religion in Alameda County between 1977 and 1987.

Lawyers in criminal cases are allowed to remove a limited number of jurors for tactical reasons, but cannot dismiss them because of their race, gender or religion, or for certain other characteristics.

Golde presided over more death penalty trials in his 25 years on the bench than any other judge in Alameda County, although he personally opposed capital punishment. The allegations against Golde arose in an appeal of a man he sentenced to death.

Former Deputy Dist. Atty. John R. Quatman told defense appellate lawyers that Golde gave him some private advice in his chambers during the 1987 capital trial of Fred Harlan Freeman, who was sentenced to death for robbery and murder.

"Judge Golde called me into his chambers and asked rhetorically, 'Quatman, what are you doing?' " Quatman said under oath. "When I asked what the problem was, he said I had not challenged a prospective juror who was Jewish."

Golde "asked me if I was aware that when Adolf Eichmann was apprehended after World War II, there was a major controversy in Israel over whether he should be executed," continued Quatman, who worked in the D.A.'s office for more than two decades and was friendly with Golde. "Judge Golde said no Jew would vote to send a defendant to the gas chamber."

Quatman said he thanked Golde for his advice and "thereafter excused any prospective juror who was Jewish."

"Actually," Quatman said, "Judge Golde was telling me what I already should have known to do. It was standard practice to exclude Jewish jurors in death cases; as it was to exclude African American women from capital juries."

Citing Quatman's remarks, defense lawyers filed a constitutional challenge to obtain a new trial for Freeman.

Faced with the explosive charges, the California Supreme Court asked a trial judge to hear evidence on the claims and report back.

After five days of testimony, Santa Clara Superior Court Judge Kevin Murphy found that Golde did not direct the prosecutor to excuse prospective jurors who were Jewish. Thursday's ruling relied heavily on his report.

"It remains to be explained why Judge Golde would have perceived a need to commit misconduct by advising Quatman how to pick a jury at this very early stage," Justice Marvin R. Baxter wrote for the state Supreme Court.

Baxter also said that Quatman's "character for honesty and integrity was poor."

A former colleague testified that Quatman exaggerated a lot, and if "it didn't serve his purpose, he wouldn't tell the truth." Other lawyers voiced similar concerns, but two testified that Quatman was honest.

Baxter pointed to evidence he said showed that Quatman had a motive for embarrassing his former boss, Alameda County Dist. Atty. Tom Orloff.

The court said Orloff had once disciplined Quatman for making disparaging remarks to a female subordinate and later refused to endorse him when he ran for judge.

"Unfortunately," Baxter wrote, "Quatman's bitterness did not mellow over the years."

Justices Carol Corrigan and Ming Chin, who had been prosecutors in the Alameda County D.A.'s office, did not participate in the ruling.

Quatman left the office in 1998 and now practices law in Montana. He could not be reached for comment, and the attorneys who argued the case also were unavailable Thursday.

Judge Rejects Selective Prosecution Claims; Dixon's Waltz Trial On For May 30 (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, May 19, 2006

U.S. Dist. Court Judge Jon McCalla today rejected former state senator Roscoe Dixon's claims of unfair selective prosecution and refused to delay his upcoming Tennessee Waltz public corruption trial.

In a motion filed last weekend, Dixon argued that eight of the 10 Tennessee Waltz defendants are black, including all three of the state's black senators.

McCalla said federal prosecutors have "broad discretion" to enforce federal laws within boundaries set by the constitution.

He said that Dixon's claim of race-based prosecution in the FBI sting operation is not supported by any evidence that there are non-black individuals who could have been prosecuted for similar offenses but were not.

Dixon is accused of accepting $9,500 in bribes from undercover agents posing as businessmen seeking favorable votes to help their fictitious computer recycling company. His trial is set for May 30.

Judge Rejects Waltz Bias Claim (KNOXNS/AP)

By Woody Baird, Associated Press

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), May 19, 2006

MEMPHIS — A federal judge Thursday rejected a claim that black lawmakers were targeted for prosecution in the Tennessee Waltz investigation.

Judge Jon McCalla rejected a petition to dismiss the bribery and extortion charges against former Sen. Roscoe Dixon, D-Memphis, or to delay his trial set for May 30.

In that petition, Dixon claimed he is the victim of selective prosecution because he is black.

He argued that federal agents pretending to be businessmen looking for legislative favors offered bribes to black lawmakers but not white members of the state Legislature.

That argument, McCalla said, was based on speculation and Dixon "failed to show the existence of any individuals who are not African-American and could have been prosecuted ... but were not."

Dixon also sought more access to government files to search for evidence of racial bias and for a trial delay until October. McCalla rejected those requests, too.

Tennessee Waltz focused on an FBI front company, called E-Cycle Management, that supposedly wanted to buy and resell used government computers. Prosecutors say undercover agents acting as E-Cycle representatives bribed lawmakers and local government officials while pretending to set up business in Tennessee.

Eight of the 10 defendants indicted so far in the investigation are black.

McCalla said Dixon offered no evidence to support his claim that the two white defendants, Sen. Ward Crutchfield, D-Chattanooga, and former Rep. Chris Newton, R-Cleveland, were charged in a "patently transparent attempt" to hide the government's racial bias.

Besides Crutchfield and Dixon, the defendants awaiting trials are Sen. Kathryn Bowers, D-Memphis; former Sen. John Ford, a Memphis Democrat; Shelby County Commissioner Michael Hooks and Calvin Williams, the Shelby commission's former top administrative officer.

Newton pleaded guilty to accepting bribes and is serving a one-year prison sentence. Myers and Charles Love, "bag men" who have pleaded guilty to passing along bribes, await sentencing.

William Cotton, a former county commissioner in Chattanooga, has been convicted of bribery and extortion and sentenced to three years in prison.

Voting Costs Inquiry Opens (AP)

AP, May 18, 2006

Secretary of State Betty Ireland is asking county clerks to submit detailed information about how much voting machine snafus cost them, her chief of staff said Thursday.

The information will be used to seek compensation from Election Systems & Software, the company that supplied new voting machines around West Virginia before the May 9 primary, Ben Beakes said.

"We need to get a true picture of what happened during this election,'' Beakes said. The letter the office was to send out Thursday asks clerks to respond by May 26.

Ireland complained to federal officials the day after the primary about ES&S of Omaha, Neb., blaming the voting machine vendor for "vast delays'' and "broken promises.'' Ireland sent a complaint to the federal Election Assistance Commission, created to help oversee the federal Help America Vote Act, and contacted the U.S. Justice Department.

ES&S has said it plans to discuss ways to improve the process for future elections with Ireland and other election officials.

The Secretary of State's Office also plans one-on-one training with county clerks to address technical issues with electronic touch screen and optical scanner voting systems.

Meanwhile, Wood County Clerk Jamie Six said Ireland's office added to the problems before the primary and ignored requests for help during the canvass.

A few days before the primary, Six said he was frustrated with e-mail directives from Ireland about voting machine tests. The tests Ireland wanted him to conduct on electronic voting machines were pointless and time-consuming, Six said. Other tests he conducted were sufficient.

Six said that when he tried to discuss the issue with Ireland's staff, they said they were not going to argue with him.

"None of the staff, I believe, has ever worked in a real election. That has been real cumbersome for counties to overcome,'' Six said.

He also was upset by what he considered a lack of support from Ireland's office this week when he called with a problem during the county's vote canvass.

Six said he tried to arrange a conference call with county commissioners and the county prosecutor at a certain time, but Ireland's office left a phone message that it could not participate and cited a section of state law the county could refer to for help.

Six said he ended up finding out what he wanted to know from Cabell County, which has been using electronic machines for several years.

"When you need their help, they are not there,'' Six said of Ireland's staff.

However, officials in Preston, Putnam and Upshur counties — all of which had problems before and during the primary — said Thursday their gripe is with ES&S, not Ireland's office.

Beakes said Ireland's staff tried to be responsive to Six, but no one in the office was available at the time Six wanted to have the conference call. The office gave the same law citation to other counties having similar problems and they were satisfied, Beakes said.

As for the pre-election testing, Beakes said the main problems on the day of the primary were with vote tabulation, not with the voting machines themselves. He said that proves the value of the tests Ireland wanted clerks to do.

Mom Won't Be Charged In Mall Flap (COLTRIB)

By Sara Agnew

Columbia (MO) Tribune, May 18, 2006

Charges have been dropped against a Columbia mother who was wrestled to the floor and handcuffed by Columbia police officers trying to contain a disturbance at the Columbia Mall.

The incident was one of several involving Columbia police and black residents described last month to a U.S. Department of Justice official during a meeting of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Columbia attorney David Tyson Smith said his client, Alva Scott, who is black, was simply trying to protect her children and leave the mall when officers prevented her from returning to her children, ages 2 and 8. Scott was eventually arrested and charged with trespassing, assaulting a police officer and resisting arrest.

The charges were dropped Tuesday afternoon in Boone County Circuit Court. Smith said a number of groups rallied behind his client, including members of the NAACP and other community members.

"It's been a very difficult time for Alva," he said, "but I'm proud of the support she has received."

Smith said he hopes attention brought to his client's case would prevent a similar incident in the future.

Assistant Boone County Prosecutor Connie Sullivan said she dismissed the charges because she didn't believe Scott's activity was criminal.

"She was just trying to get her little kids back," she said.

During the NAACP meeting last month, Smith said his client was shopping at the mall with her children when she heard about a disturbance in the Café Court. Worried about her teenage son and his friend, who were in the area, Scott hurried with her 2- and 8-year-olds to the Café Court to retrieve the older boys, Smith said.

When she reached the area, Scott spotted the boys and received permission from a mall security guard to enter and retrieve them, Smith said. But when she started toward the teens, she was stopped by a Columbia police officer, who pushed her toward an exit, Smith said.

But Scott's two younger children were still waiting for her, and she pleaded with the officer to let her go get them, Smith said. That's when the officer threw her to the floor and handcuffed her, Smith said. The teenage son and his friend also were handcuffed.

Smith said he is happy with the outcome for his client and credited the prosecutor's officer for "doing the right thing."

"I just hope it doesn't have to come to this again," he said.

Texans, Others Stall Voting Rights Renewal (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

Dallas Morning News, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON – A revolt by Texas Republicans and other Southern lawmakers is threatening the Voting Rights Act, the landmark civil-rights law enacted to overcome the legacy of poll taxes and literacy tests.

House leaders planned a routine vote this week to extend the LBJ-era law for 25 years, avoiding a potentially ugly eruption of racial politics.

But a Georgia-Texas coalition of conservatives slammed on the brakes, angry over the special regulatory burdens of the act.

Allies from across the South gathered Thursday afternoon to strategize and take stock of their initial victory – cancellation of the planned House vote this week.

For 40 years, Texas and eight other states have had to get permission for any change in election law or procedure, major or minor – from ballot design to precinct boundaries. Justice Department lawyers review proposals to guard against cloaked efforts to discriminate against minorities.

Parts of seven other states are also covered.

Fiercely contested congressional redistricting plans in Texas, Georgia and elsewhere have undergone that evaluation in recent years.

Although Democrats and civil-rights advocates haven't always been pleased with the outcomes, they still view the law as vital.

But opponents of a lengthy extension say the targeted states have made huge leaps since President Johnson signed the law in 1965.

"Why should one state have to live under a federal law when somebody a few miles away is exempt? All or nothing. It's an issue of fairness," said a senior Texas Republican, Rep. Henry Bonilla of San Antonio.

Civil-rights advocates are livid at the delay, and Democrats accuse the Southern Republicans of insensitivity.

"Every election we have lots of intimidation," said Rep. Eddie Bernice Johnson, D-Dallas, arguing that without the current protections, "the intimidation would be even more overt. ... Unfortunately, we still have people who'd rather not have minorities vote."

DOJ_NMG_0028974

Rep. Lynn Westmoreland, a Republican from a mostly white district south of Atlanta, has led the resistance. "What we're seeing is a passionate response to this from the Georgia delegation and a growing insurgency within the Texas delegation as well," said his spokesman, Brian Robinson. "We're going to have big enough numbers to wage quite a battle."

The debate is laden with racial overtones and old wounds.

Republicans don't want to alienate black and Hispanic voters, and critics generally avoid outright demands to repeal the Voting Rights Act.

Instead they have framed the argument as an effort to modernize and take into account years of racial progress.

States that discouraged minority voters in 1964, 1968 or 1972 – with poll taxes, tests of "good character" or literacy – and also experienced low minority turnout have been subjected to federal oversight.

Blacks account for about one-third of Georgia's electorate, and roughly the same proportion of statewide elected officials, including the attorney general and chief justice.

Yet the state remains under supervision because of low minority turnout in the 1964 contest between Barry Goldwater and LBJ.

"We're going to be covered by this bill until 2032 based on who voted for Lyndon Johnson. Seriously," Mr. Robinson said. "Maybe there's a problem you didn't know about in Wisconsin, or Pennsylvania. Let those who have corrected the problems of the past go."

The critics want new evaluation formulas based on more recent elections, which would likely relieve Texas and most of the other states of their preapproval requirements, though a few states, including Nevada and California, could find themselves scrutinized more closely based on recent voting patterns.

President Bush called for renewing the Voting Rights Act in December and reiterated that stance three weeks ago, calling the act "a very important part of the civil-rights legislation. Everybody ought to be encouraged to vote."

House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., said the extension enjoys "broad bipartisan support," citing the 33-1 vote by which it cleared his committee last week. An aide said Thursday that a floor vote is expected soon.

Congress last extended the law in 1982. Mr. Sensenbrenner played a central role in persuading President Reagan to sign it. Last summer, the chairman promised the NAACP that he would secure another 25-year extension, and everything seemed on track two weeks ago when he joined the Democratic and Republican leaders from the House and Senate on the Capitol steps in a show of unity.

Behind the scenes, the revolt was gathering steam.

Texas Republicans, including most of the freshmen, signed on early. They brainstormed the issue at their weekly lunch last week, members said, and again Thursday.

"If it's good enough for a handful of states, it's good enough for the whole country," said freshman Rep. Louie Gohmert, R-Tyler.

Rep. Kenny Marchant, a GOP freshman from Coppell, said Texans don't like being singled out and will fight to change that, though, "I don't think that necessarily means we'll vote against it [renewal of the act] if it isn't that way."

But legal scholars have warned that the Supreme Court could strike down expansion of the law, noting that decades ago, the court gave its OK in part because the law only targeted states with proven records of discrimination.

Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., a lion of the civil-rights movement, called the delay an 11th-hour "attempt to dilute the Voting Rights Act. This act was good in 1965. It's effective. It was signed by President Lyndon Johnson, the man from Texas, and it made America a better place."

The Senate Judiciary Committee hasn't voted on the extension. Mr. Westmoreland's office says a number of Southern senators on the panel support the Georgia congressman's resistance effort.

Texas Republican Sen. John Cornyn, who is on that committee, has no problem with the delay.

"It doesn't expire until 2007. We've got some time to work on it," he said. "There's more than the Voting Rights Act at stake. There's political calculations going on, and I want to try and make sure I understand what that's all about."

He said he also shares concerns about another element of the law, one regarding language assistance. Jurisdictions with high numbers of people whose native language isn't English must print bilingual ballots. Some must also provide translators.

"In order to be an American citizen, you have to learn English. Why would we continue to publish ballots in a language other than English? ... That's a pretty compelling argument," Mr. Cornyn said.

But Rep. Solomon Ortiz, D-Corpus Christi, called the assistance vital given that citizenship requires only basic English proficiency.

"If we want to have these people emerge into our system," he said, "we need to also allow them to understand how our system works and have them understand what they're voting on."

Three Employees Allege Discrimination In DA's Office (JONND)

By Justin Boron

Jonesboro (GA) News-Daily, May 19, 2006

The Clayton County District Attorney's office has been hit with a trio of discrimination claims from current and former employees, at least one of whom has named the top assistant prosecutor in the office, John Turner, for retaliation and discrimination against a minority woman.

The allegations come during the first term of Jewel Scott, the county's first black district attorney. Scott hired Turner, who also is black, when she took office.

Two victims advocates — Andrea Rhymes, who is black, and Rebecca Miller, who is Latino — allege in formal complaints they were retaliated against. Rhymes alleges it was on the basis of race and a disability. Miller alleges it was on the basis of sex and national origin.

Terry Grandison, a former prosecutor who has resigned, acknowledged filing a complaint but wouldn't provide further information because he said the matter was still pending. He was hired by Scott in 2005.

Scott said she didn't see any validity in any of the complaints filed with the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission earlier this year.

"I haven't observed anything that can be construed as discriminatory, but certainly I'd be willing to sit down at the table and mediate," she said, explaining she was limited in what she could discuss about the cases. "I don't want anything I say to prejudice any kind of mediation effort.

"I would expect that they probably would have more to say because they're no longer with the office. But I want to have a fair opportunity to go in and mediate. Anything more that I would say would prejudice that process."

In a complaint filed in March, Rhymes says she was discriminated against because she is black, because she has a child with a disability, and because she opposed unlawful employment practices. Rhymes, a holdover from former District Attorney Bob Keller's administration, said she didn't want to comment because she is still employed at the district attorney's office.

Her complaint explains that she was transferred from her job as the juvenile court victim services coordinator after taking time off in January this year to be with her son during a surgery.

"Upon my return to work on Feb. 10, I was re-assigned to another position in another building and my hours were changed" and she was told by her supervisor Barbara Fernandez that she was moved "because I was never at work, I was attending school and I was not efficient in grant manager nor could she justify me working 40 hours a week."

Miller, a victim's advocate who was fired April 10, accused Fernandez of harassment and abuse, Miller's May 4 complaint shows. She was hired by Scott in June 2005.

The complaint also mentions Deputy Chief Assistant District Attorney John Turner. In an interview, Miller said Turner discriminated against her because she is a minority woman and also in retaliation for protesting what she claims as discriminatory treatment.

"I want the truth exposed, and I want my wrongful termination to be corrected," she said. "I want Ms. Scott to do the right thing."

Miller said Fernandez was condescending, saying things like 'it doesn't take a rocket scientist to do this.' There also is an issue over $750 to $800 worth of transcripts that Miller says her supervisor told her how to order. Miller said Fernandez denied the conversation after she ordered them.

Miller and Rhymes say they notified personnel officials in the county government of their problems.

County Commission Chairman Eldrin Bell said Tuesday he wasn't aware of the claims.

Because of confidentiality regulations, equal employment officials couldn't confirm a complaint was filed or discuss any aspect of any ongoing case.

Speaking generally, Bernice Williams-Kimbrough, the director of the Atlanta district of the EEOC, said claims against local or state government agencies could eventually reach the U.S. Justice Department if they aren't resolved through mediation or if an investigation finds evidence to support the discrimination claim.

ANTITRUST:

Justice Reviews Cape Utilities (SWFL)

By Don Ruane

Southwest Florida News-Press, May 19, 2006

The federal investigation of Cape Coral utilities contracts is being handled by the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department, The News-Press has learned.

The division enforces laws that protect competition in the marketplace.

"Let the chips fall where they fall. If there was a conscious effort to fix prices, that's a problem," Councilman Tim Day said.

The projects in question became controversial among residents. They turned out in large numbers at City Council meetings to protest the $12,000 assessments they received to pay for new water, sewer and irrigation lines. Some tried to stop the projects with a lawsuit.

The FBI is assisting, but the matter is being handled by the division's Atlanta office, said Carol Michalik, spokeswoman for the FBI's regional office in Tampa.

Michalik declined to talk further about the case.

"If a case is being investigated the FBI would not comment on it," she said.

Antitrust Division spokeswoman Gina Talamona said the division does not talk about specific cases. Generally, investigations that lead the division to seek criminal penalties or civil actions are heard in U.S. District Court.

The division also reports such actions on its Internet site.

Antitrust laws address practices that limit competition and can lead to higher prices and inferior products, according to the division's Web site. The Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890 prohibits competitors from fixing prices, rigging bids and other anticompetitive behavior. Violations can lead to a $100 million fine for a corporation and up to 10 years in prison for an individual.

"To my knowledge the city is not under investigation. I have not been contacted by anyone," said Mayor Eric Feichthaler.

The projects involved were managed for the city by Kellogg, Brown & Root and MWH Americas.

KBR has not responded to requests for comment. MWH declined to comment on the situation.

But the city will cooperate fully with any requests from the agencies, the mayor said.

City Council members have said the investigation has something to do with how contractors were selected to work on the Southwest One, Two and Three utilities extension projects. Those projects extended water, sewer and irrigation lines into portions of southwest Cape Coral.

Questions about the projects were raised during an audit approved by the City Council. Mike Kessler of Kessler International is conducting the audit and has refused to comment on it and the investigation. His final report is expected in July.

The city conducts audits of the utilities extension program each year.

"We'll have to see the final audit. If we have any issues we'll get to the bottom of them," said Feichthaler, who was elected in 2005. The projects were completed or in their final stages when he was elected.

"I'm keeping my eye on this and following it very closely," the mayor said.

Day said he hopes the investigation ends quickly.

"If they are here a week from now, still reviewing this, it's very bad," Day said. The situation raises questions about how the city sets up its utilities projects, Day said.

The city hires a construction manager who assumes all risk for problems with the project. The construction manager is responsible for all aspects of the project from design through construction. The city switched to the method after previous utilities projects led to problems that resulted in millions of dollars in legal costs for the city. The city had more of the responsibility for those projects.

"A year ago we were told there are cheaper, more effective ways to do this," Day said. "We need to take a good look at it."

But Feichthaler said he stands behind the construction manager method. He looked at previous projects and concluded the construction-manager method produced better work and a better price for the city and its residents.

"It definitely is the right process," Feichthaler said.

VNU Deal Likely As Activist Holder Concedes Defeat (WSJ)

By Jason Singer

Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

A group of six private-equity firms is likely to win its €7.7 billion ($9.82 billion) takeover bid for Dutch media giant VNU NV as activist shareholder Knight Vinke Asset Management LLC, leader of a revolt against the bid, has thrown in the towel and said it will tender its shares by the Friday deadline.

Knight Vinke Chief Investment Officer Eric Knight said he is ending his campaign to encourage shareholders to reject the private-equity buyout -- a deal announced in March that was recommended by the VNU board -- because many shareholders are supporting the bid, which was recently increased.

He added that shareholders could have achieved a higher price if they continued the fight against the VNU board and the private-equity consortium, which were pushing hard for the deal to be accepted.

"I think we did give them a pretty good run for their money," said Mr. Knight. "But I still believe we've left money on the table. We decided to let this one go in order to go fight the next one."

The battle over VNU, owner of the Nielsen television-ratings service and publisher of magazines such as Billboard and Hollywood Reporter, has been closely watched around the world because it was the first time a big private-equity buyout, agreed to on friendly terms, met opposition from shareholders threatening to reject it and impose their own plan for turning around the firm.

Mr. Knight, who holds a 1.2% stake in VNU, won broad support for his resistance to the deal, arguing existing shareholders could realize far more for their stake by forcing the company to cut costs and shed assets, rather than selling to the private-equity group that would do many of the same things.

Mr. Knight drafted a "Plan B" proposal for restructuring VNU, hired a headhunter to search for a new chief executive and proposed himself to be elected to the board, all of which many shareholders backed.

Earlier this month, the private-equity group, which calls itself Valcon Acquisition BV, raised its offer by 2.6% to €29.50 a share from €28.75 and said it would complete the deal with at least 80% of the shares, down from 95% previously.

The higher price, combined with the difficulty and time that would be needed to implement the Knight Vinke plan, led many shareholders that had been backing Mr. Knight to defect and say they would accept the offer.

Mr. Knight has battled with VNU for nearly a year, beginning with a letter sent to the company in June asking for the bulk of the €2 billion proceeds from sale of its directories business to be returned to shareholders rather than used for an acquisition.

A month later, VNU announced a $7 billion deal to buy U.S. pharmaceutical-data provider IMS Health Inc. Mr. Knight and others strongly opposed the acquisition and eventually forced VNU to abandon it. They then urged the company to consider breaking itself into three units and selling the individual pieces.

The Valcon group approached the company soon after, and VNU put itself up for sale. After months of close inspection of the company's books, the group made a formal bid that the board accepted but encountered shareholder hostility.

Mr. Knight said he earned about a 30% return from his VNU holdings. But he continued to criticize VNU's board for doing "a very poor job of defending shareholders' interests."

VNU's chairman and other members of the company's board have repeatedly said they explored all avenues for achieving the most value for shareholders and the Valcon group's cash bid was higher than any other option.

The Valcon group includes Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., Thomas H. Lee Partners LP, Blackstone Group LP, Carlyle Group, Hellman & Friedman LLC and AlpInvest Partners.

Symantec Sues Microsoft Over Storage Technology (WSJ)

By Riva Richmond

Symantec Corp. sued Microsoft Corp. on Thursday, citing misappropriation of intellectual property and breach of contract.

The suit, which was filed in federal court in Seattle, Wash., involves Symantec's Volume Manager product, software it acquired with its purchase of Veritas Software Corp. Volume Manager allows operating systems to store and manipulate large amounts of data and protect systems from data loss when storage hardware fails.

Symantec alleged that Microsoft, which had licensed the Volume Management technology from Veritas, violated terms of its license agreement by using the technology to develop competing features and products. Microsoft improperly incorporated the technology into its operating system products, including Vista, and then concealed its use of the technology, Symantec said.

Microsoft issued a statement saying it had "worked hard" to try to resolve the issue, but couldn't reach an agreement with Symantec. "We believe the facts will show that Microsoft's actions were proper and are fully consistent with the contract between Veritas and Microsoft," the company said.

Symantec said it seeking "proper" compensation for damages, and wants Microsoft to stop using the technology.

US, Mexico Join Forces In Fight Against Meth Dealers (WT)

By Jerry Seper

Washington Times, May 19, 2006

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday said the United States and Mexico are developing a strategy to attack large methamphetamine trafficking organizations operating on both sides of the border.

Mr. Gonzales, speaking at a National Methamphetamine Chemical Initiative conference in Dallas, said the two countries had reached an agreement for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) and the Mexican government to establish specialized anti-meth enforcement teams.

In Mexico, he said, the teams will focus on investigating and targeting the most-wanted Mexican meth trafficking organizations, while DEA-led efforts on the U.S. side will focus on traffickers and distributors of the highly addictive drug produced in Mexico.

"If we work together, sharing resources and intelligence, the law-enforcement agencies of our two countries can better attack the problem at every stage in the production and distribution chain," Mr. Gonzales said.

"We will work with our Mexican counterparts to trace precursor chemicals destined for our region of the world, uncover and dismantle lab sites fueled by these chemicals and track the meth distribution trail into our country from seller to buyer," he said.

Mr. Gonzales said strong American demand for methamphetamines is fueling its production and that the public needs to be better informed about its dangers. He said the trafficking organizations combine the "sophistication of a contemporary corporation with the brutality of a street gang."

Mr. Gonzales was joined at the conference by Mexican Attorney General Daniel Cabeza de Vaca, DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy and Office of National Drug Control Policy Director John P. Walters.

"Methamphetamine trafficking and the movement of its chemicals are now a global epidemic," Mrs. Tandy said.

DOJ_NMG_0028979

"For the first time in history, the U.S. attorney general and the Mexico attorney general are standing together to announce a real plan to tackle ... meth production.

"For those of us who have been quick to write off any hope of making real headway against drug traffickers in Mexico, today is a new day," she said.

Mr. Gonzales said the meth trafficking and distribution chain into the United States runs through seaports as well as across the land and that the DEA, in a coordinated effort with U.S. Customs and Border Protection, would take measures to detect meth and meth precursor chemicals in cargo arriving at seaports in this country.

He said Mexican authorities will take similar actions in their country.

"There is much effort under way, and plans for more, as it should be. The U.S. and Mexico share common goals. We want to be safe from terrorism, violent crime, gangs and the dangers posed by drugs," he said.

US, Mexico Join Forces To Fight Meth Labs (CNS)

CNSNews.com, May 19, 2006

Homes and other places where methamphetamine labs once operated will be listed on the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's website. The registry will provide owners or renters with notice that a property may be contaminated with toxic substances. That's one of the meth-fighting initiatives outlined Thursday by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. Appearing with the Mexican attorney general at a conference in Dallas, Gonzales stressed the importance of international cooperation in fighting meth production and trafficking.

"Approximately 80 percent of all meth purchases in the U.S. originate from Mexican labs," Gonzales said. "Accordingly, we are refocusing our investigative resources on large meth trafficking organizations. DEA enforcement teams will now concentrate on meth transportation and distribution cells in the U.S. and Mexico."

Gonzales also acknowledged that without strong American demand for meth, there would be no financial incentive for Mexican organizations to continue to produce it. Gonzales said both the U.S. and Mexican governments will establish specialized meth enforcement teams. Between now and the end of this year, the Justice Department will train 1,000 Mexican police in meth lab detection, and it will donate six trucks and trailers for Mexican police to use in dismantling meth labs, which produce toxic waste.

Gonzales Heralds Efforts To Combat Gangs (AP)

AP, May 18, 2006

DALLAS - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales praised federal grants intended to combat gangs, saying it is never too late to help youths.

"You have kids here from a pretty tough neighborhood, I'm told, a lot like the neighborhood I grew up in," Gonzales said at a news conference at a community center in a high-crime neighborhood. "These kids have big dreams and it is never too little too late."

The Dallas-Fort Worth metroplex was awarded $2.5 million in March as part a $15 million pilot program that includes equal grants to Los Angeles; Tampa, Fla.; Cleveland; Milwaukee and other cities deemed to have serious gang problems.

The money will go to prevention, enforcement and rehabilitation of former gang members.

At the conference, U.S. Attorney Richard Roper announced Wednesday's arrest of 19 Crip gang members in Fort Worth on drug and weapons charges. He would not release details of the ongoing operation, but said federal and local authorities have already confiscated hundreds of grams of crack, 15 pounds of marijuana, 40 grams of heroin and $15,000 in cash. More arrests are expected, he said.

Over the past seven years, Dallas has had the highest crime rate among cities its size, according to a U.S. Department of Justice press release Thursday.

"It is not possible to pursue the American Dream if you are a member of a gang," Gonzales said. "We need to know what personal, community and family factors lead a young man or woman to join a gang."

Operation Triggertown Nabs Six Offenders (CHISTNEWS)

Chicago Sun-Times News Group, May 18, 2006

Federal and local authorities on Thursday announced the arrest of six high-ranking gang members and drug traffickers following a six-month investigation dubbed "Operation Triggertown."

The Chicago police's Narcotics and Gang Investigation Section and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives launched the operation in November 2005 and it culminated Wednesday with the arrest of the six offenders, including Rashod "Fatman" Bethany -- a reputed leader of the Killing Crew faction, a fragment of the Gangster Disciple street gang -- who was arrested at a Hazel Crest restaurant, according to a release from Chicago police.

Bethany was charged with federal narcotics offenses, the release said.

Quenten Hawkins, of Lafayette, Ind., was charged with state gun-running violations for allegedly transporting firearms from Indiana to Chicago and providing them to the Gangster Disciples, according to the release. A laser sight was attached to one of the firearms recovered in the investigation, the release said.

Shannon Evans was charged with first-degree murder for allegedly killing Robert Duffy, 33, of the 12000 block of South Parnell, in October 2005. State narcotics charges were pending against Evans, according to the release.

In addition, Charles "TuTu" Golden was charged with state narcotics offenses and unlawful use of a weapon by a felon, while Roosevelt "Jimmy Mac" Adams and Rickey "L'il Rickey" Long were charged with federal narcotics offenses.

During the operation, both agencies conducted undercover buys and police used a variety of electronic and technical devices that assisted the investigation, according to the release.

"Federal law enforcement collaborations at the highest levels with ATF and others are critical when it comes to dismantling sophisticated narcotics and gang operations. Community involvement and information sharing on known offenders from different gangs and their territories also helps the police continue to safeguard communities against violence and future gang conflicts," Chicago Police Supt. Phil Cline said in the release.

The police department's collaboration with ATF will be used as a model for future operations in dismantling narcotics and gang activity, the release added.

Michigan Farm Subject Of Hoffa Search (AP)

By Tom Krisher

AP, May 19, 2006

MILFORD TOWNSHIP, Mich. -- In one of the most intensive searches for Jimmy Hoffa in decades, the FBI summoned archaeologists and anthropologists and brought in heavy equipment to scour a horse farm Thursday for the body of the former Teamsters boss who vanished in 1975.

Daniel Roberts, agent in charge of the Detroit FBI field office, would not disclose what led agents to the farm, but said: "This is probably a fairly credible lead. You can gather that from the number of people out here."

No trace of Hoffa has ever been found, and no one has ever been charged in the case. But investigators have long suspected that he was killed by the mob to keep him from reclaiming the Teamsters presidency after he got out of prison for corruption.

The farm, just outside Detroit, used to be owned by a Teamsters official. And mob figures used to meet at a barn there before Hoffa's disappearance, authorities said.

Investigators began combing the area Wednesday, and the search continued Thursday and included the use of heavy construction equipment. Roberts said it would probably involve the removal of a barn.

Authorities also led cadaver dogs across the property, and the FBI called in anthropologists and archaeologists from Michigan State University.

Roberts said he expects the search to go on for at least a couple of weeks.

Hoffa was last seen on a night he was scheduled to have dinner at a restaurant about 20 miles from the farm. He was supposed to meet with a New Jersey Teamsters boss and a Detroit Mafia captain, both now dead.

Over the years, Hoffa's disappearance spawned endless theories _ that he was entombed in concrete at Giants Stadium in the New Jersey Meadowlands; that he was ground up and thrown to the fishes in a Florida swamp; that he was obliterated in a mob-owned fat-rendering plant that has since burned down.

In 2003, authorities searched beneath a backyard pool a few hours north of Detroit but turned up nothing. The following year, they pulled up the floorboards on a Detroit home and found bloodstains, but the blood was not Hoffa's.

A law enforcement official in Washington said the latest search was based on information developed several years ago and verified more recently.

Among other things, there was a high level of suspicious activity on the farm the day Hoffa vanished, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. A backhoe appeared that day near the barn organized crime members had used for meetings, and that location was never used again, the official said.

The Detroit Free Press, citing people involved with the case who declined to be identified because of the active investigation, reported that the tip that led to the latest search came from Donovan Wells, who was sentenced two years ago to 10 years in federal prison for marijuana smuggling. Wells, 75, is a former associate of Rolland McMaster, a longtime Teamsters official.

At the time of Hoffa's disappearance, the property was owned by McMaster. It is now under different ownership and is called Hidden Dreams Farm.

McMaster's lawyer, Mayer Morganroth, said he doubted the FBI would find anything. "That farm was looked at with a fine-toothed comb in the '70s, when Hoffa was missing," Morganroth said. "There's nothing there."

McMaster was convicted in 1963 of accepting payoffs from a trucking company and, according to a 1976 Detroit Free Press account, served five months in prison.

Reporters were not allowed onto the property, which is surrounded by a white wooden fence just off a dirt road. Images from news helicopters showed about a dozen people, some with shovels, standing by an area of newly turned dirt about 10 feet by 15 feet.

Morganroth said McMaster was in Indiana on union business at the time of Hoffa's disappearance. He said that to his knowledge, McMaster was never a suspect. Morganroth said FBI officials visited McMaster, 93, this week at his home in Fenton, where one of several horse-breeding farms he owns is situated.

"They were just asking about the farm itself _ did he ever get any inkling?" he said.

In 1967, Hoffa was sentenced to 13 years in prison for jury tampering and fraud, but he refused to give up the Teamsters presidency. After he quit the job in 1971, President Nixon pardoned him.

The Hunt For Hoffa Heats Up (FREEP)

By David Ashenfelter And Joe Swickard, Free Press Staff Writers

Detroit Free Press, May 19, 2006

Insiders say they're skeptical

A tip from a 75-year-old federal inmate gave FBI agents what they're calling their latest and best chance yet to crack the 30-year-old mystery of what happened to former Teamsters boss Jimmy Hoffa.

The clue brought engineers, anthropologists, ground-penetrating radar, backhoes and dozens of federal and local law officials to the pastoral and eerily ironic named Hidden Dreams Farm in western Oakland County's Milford Township.

During a news conference at the farm Thursday, Detroit FBI chief Dan Roberts wouldn't detail what brought out 40-50 agents, the largest FBI search in at least two decades. But he said the tip is promising.

"Since I've been here, this is the best lead I've seen come across in the Hoffa investigation," said Roberts, who has been in Detroit two years.

He said the search would take up to two weeks and will involve removing a 30-by-100-foot barn.

Roberts said Thursday's search produced nothing of significance, a familiar refrain for law enforcement officials.

The digging began Wednesday when agents swooped down on the horse farm once owned by Hoffa associate Rolland McMaster, a longtime suspect in Hoffa's disappearance, said people involved with the ongoing case and who declined to be identified because of the active investigation.

The tip that Hoffa was buried on the farm came from Donovan Wells, who was sentenced to 10 years in prison two years ago in a marijuana smuggling scheme involving his Brownstown Township trucking company. Wells, who also was known as Don Wells, is a former associate of McMaster, who was a top Detroit Teamsters official until a reputed falling-out with Hoffa in the late 1960s.

Officials wouldn't say what Wells told the FBI, but said he passed a polygraph test.

During an interview Thursday, McMaster said that account was worthy of a drug-addled imagination.

"That's the poorest reporting I've ever heard," he said. McMaster said he welcomed the search.

One insider said the tip is a long shot because it would have been reckless to hide Hoffa's remains on McMaster's farm.

McMaster bought the property on East Maple Road in Milford Township in 1952 and sold it in a land-contract deal in 1977, according to Oakland County land records.

Now 93 and living on a farm in Fenton, McMaster denied any knowledge of Hoffa's fate. He said an FBI agent came to see him Tuesday and discussed his relations with Hoffa.

He said the agent never mentioned the East Maple property.

Federal agents say they believe that McMaster had a falling-out with Hoffa soon after Hoffa went to prison for racketeering and jury tampering in the late 1960s. McMaster denied that claim.

Both Giacalone and Provenzano are dead.

Hoffa expert Dan Moldea, a Washington, D.C., author who wrote "The Hoffa Wars," said Wells is a key figure in the case.

"He lived with McMaster on his farm in Wixom, was a partner of McMaster's brother-in-law, Stanton Barr, and may know what happened to Hoffa if McMaster was involved in the disappearance," Moldea said.

Both Barr and McMaster were called before a federal grand jury in Detroit after Hoffa vanished. Moldea said he interviewed Wells in 1976 and that Wells denied any knowledge of Hoffa's disappearance.

The FBI says it believes McMaster may know what happened to Hoffa. Wells is locked up at a federal medical center in Lexington, Ky.

Some old Hoffa hands were skeptical of the new tip.

Retired FBI agent John Anthony said the horse farm is a new theory to him, and doubted its value: "Even if they find something, will it be able to lead to a prosecution? The circle of people associated with this is getting smaller all the time.

Hoffa Tip 'Fairly Credible,' FBI Says (WP)

By Allen Lengel

Dozens of FBI agents, joined by archaeologists and anthropologists, spent a second day searching a horse farm near Detroit yesterday for the remains of former Teamsters boss Jimmy Hoffa.

The agents used cadaver dogs, excavating equipment and shovels at Hidden Dreams Farm, a 80-acre spread in Milford Township, in one of the most extensive searches for Hoffa in years. Authorities said they expect to take a barn apart in the coming days as they methodically search the area.

They are working on a tip from a 75-year-old federal inmate who pointed them to the farm, which was owned at the time of Hoffa's disappearance three decades ago by a Teamsters official, authorities said.

"This is probably a fairly credible lead -- you can gather that from the number of people out here," said Daniel Roberts, special agent in charge of the Detroit FBI office, at a news conference outside the property. "We plan to be out here for probably a couple weeks, at least, until we can finish with this entire search and make sure that we've covered everything adequately."

Hoffa disappeared on July 30, 1975, the day he was scheduled to meet organized crime figure Anthony "Tony Jack" Giacalone and New Jersey Teamsters official Anthony Provenzano at the Machus Red Fox, an upscale restaurant, in Bloomfield Township, north of Detroit.

Federal officials believe the mob killed Hoffa to keep him from regaining control of the Teamsters after serving prison time for jury tampering. Giacalone and Provenzano have since died.

Authorities said the latest search for Hoffa is the most intensive in decades. Privately, some expressed skepticism, though they said the information is credible enough to pursue.

Over the years, the FBI has received tips that Hoffa was buried in various spots, including some in Michigan and under the Meadowlands stadium in New Jersey. One FBI theory is that he was disposed of in an incinerator in Hamtramck, Mich.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Donald Scheer signed a warrant in Detroit on Tuesday for a search on the property that was owned at the time of Hoffa's disappearance by Teamsters official and Hoffa friend Rolland McMaster, who is now 93. The current owners have been there for about 10 years, the FBI said.

Law enforcement sources said the federal inmate, scheduled to be released in 2012, was a business associate of McMaster's. The inmate, who once lived on the farm, provided the tip that triggered the search. They said the convicted drug smuggler came across the information secondhand. The sources asked not to be identified because of the sensitivity of some of the information.

McMaster's attorney, Mayer Morganroth, said: "This thing is so blown out of proportion. As far as he's concerned, in '75 after Hoffa's disappearance, they went over that farm with a fine-tooth comb. I think they're going to find nothing."

No Sign Yet Of Hoffa's Body, But Search At Farm Continues (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard And Nick Bunkley

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

DETROIT, May 18 — The Federal Bureau of Investigation, plenty experienced in searching for James R. Hoffa, said a "fairly credible lead" is what led investigators this week to still another potential burial spot: a horse farm aptly named Hidden Dreams.

Using cadaver dogs borrowed from the Detroit police, and aided by students and professors from Michigan State University, F.B.I. agents began a search on Wednesday of the 80-acre farm in Milford Township, Mich., northwest of Detroit, for signs of a crime involving Mr. Hoffa, the former Teamsters president. Daniel D. Roberts, the special agent in charge of the Detroit F.B.I. office, said the search could take weeks.

In fact, the search has taken more than 30 years, and has led investigators to trash dumps, construction sites and homes throughout the region. One theory even held that he was entombed under Giants Stadium at the Meadowlands in New Jersey.

At a news conference on Thursday afternoon on a dirt road at the farm entrance, Mr. Roberts said no trace of Mr. Hoffa had yet been discovered.

Nor would he give details of the search warrant, which was sealed by a federal judge in Detroit.

But, Mr. Roberts said, "This is probably a fairly credible lead" in Mr. Hoffa's disappearance. Mr. Roberts, who has been in his position for the past two years, added that it was "the best lead I've seen come across in the Hoffa investigation."

Numerous such leads in the past have failed to turn up the body of Mr. Hoffa, who disappeared on July 30, 1975, after failing to return for dinner.

The police, who had been contacted by his family, found his 1974 Pontiac the next day in the parking lot of the Machus Red Fox restaurant in Bloomfield Township, Mich., where he was supposed to meet two organized crime figures for lunch. Neither of those men showed up.

DOJ_NMG_0028984

The restaurant is 17 miles east of the Hidden Dreams farm, whose entrance was swarmed Thursday by television crews, reporters and a few onlookers.

Over the past two days, local television stations broadcast video shot from helicopters showing agents digging a rectangular hole with shovels on one side of a barn and using a backhoe to excavate on a dirt driveway on the opposite side.

Agents also were seen walking the perimeter of the farm on Thursday afternoon, testing the firmness of the soil with tools. They briefly dug a small hole near a wooden fence before filling it in.

The latest search is the third in the past two years by the F.B.I. in the Detroit area.

Mr. Roberts acknowledged those efforts, saying, "We do not leave any leads uncovered, obviously."

Or any stones unturned, apparently. He said the F.B.I. might have to move a barn in order to dig for evidence of Mr. Hoffa's remains. But Mr. Roberts said archaeologists and anthropologists from Michigan State had told him they would be able to spot evidence of a crime, even three decades later.

In a region where everyone seems to have a theory about where Mr. Hoffa might be buried, the Milford area, dotted with farms and wetlands, has always been a logical spot.

"Anytime anybody built a road or repaired a road there was a running joke that maybe Hoffa's under there," the Milford police chief, Wayne Walli, said Thursday.

The Hidden Dreams Farm was once owned by a former Teamsters official, Rolland McMaster, who was a protégé of Mr. Hoffa.

Experts who have followed the Teamsters contend Hoffa's relationship with the union turned contentious when he was imprisoned for jury tampering and fraud. He served five years of a 13-year sentence before President Richard M. Nixon pardoned him in 1971.

At the time of his disappearance, Mr. Hoffa was hoping to stage a comeback as union president. Mayer Morganroth, a lawyer for Mr. McMaster, said Thursday that F.B.I. agents had questioned his client recently about Mr. Hoffa's disappearance. He said Mr. McMaster, 93, was saddened by Mr. Hoffa's disappearance, and called the search "ludicrous."

The property has been in the hands of its current owners for the last 10 years, Mr. Roberts said, adding that they have been very cooperative with federal agents. The F.B.I. contacted Mr. Hoffa's daughter, Barbara Hoffa Crancer, a circuit court judge in St. Louis, on Wednesday night, people with direct knowledge of the conversation said Thursday. Judge Crancer did not return a call seeking comment.

Mr. Hoffa's son, James P. Hoffa, the current Teamsters president, had no comment.

FBI Reports Promising Lead Into Hoffa Disappearance (CHIT)

By Tim Jones, Tribune National Correspondent

Chicago Tribune, May 19, 2006

MILFORD TOWNSHIP, Mich. -- After decades of following dead-end tips that led to swimming pools, trash dumps, incinerators and even beneath the floorboards of a Detroit home, the FBI said Thursday it has a promising lead into the disappearance of former Teamster President Jimmy Hoffa, nearly 31 years after the notorious labor boss was last seen.

This search for Hoffa's remains may end like all the others, but if Thursday's remarks by the head of the FBI in Detroit are an indicator, officials will spend weeks turning and carefully examining a lot of dirt at a horse farm.

"Since I've been here ... this is the best lead I've seen come across on the Hoffa investigation," said Special Agent Daniel Roberts, who was careful not to reveal much to a throng of reporters who gathered on a tree-shaded dirt road for new developments in perhaps the most famous disappearance in modern American history.

Roberts said "nothing significant" has been recovered since digging began Wednesday morning on the 85-acre farm about 35 miles northwest of Detroit.

"But the process is just starting," he added.

Roberts said the search will last at least two weeks and will involve archeologists, geologists and anthropologists from Michigan State University, as well as cadaver dogs from the Detroit Police Department.

Architects and structural engineers will be brought in to assist in the possible dismantling of a 30-by-100-foot horse barn, under which evidence may be found.

Roberts would not comment on the contents on a search warrant, which has been sealed in U.S. District Court in Detroit. He did, however, call the lead "fairly credible."

Neighbors in this leafy rural enclave are, for now, basking in the new-found celebrity, although their quiet dirt road has become chaotic for residents like Mark and Lynne Hait. They were out with their two young boys walking their Irish setter even as a local TV reporter prepared to do a live report for the 5 p.m. news.

"It's kind of cool right now, but I'm sure it's gonna get old," Mark Hait said.

Hoffa was last seen a few miles from here in July 1975. He was formally declared dead in 1982, and the mystery of his whereabouts has fueled Web sites, documentaries, movies, books and scads of speculation, much of which re-surfaced since news of the latest dig broke Wednesday.

One report Thursday from an author of a new book on the Hoffa disappearance dismissed this latest lead, saying Hoffa was buried in New Jersey and then removed, disposed of in a car that was crushed and then shipped to Japan.

Others called the search of this farm, which was reported to be a popular meeting place of organized crime figures in the 1970s, a waste of time because nothing was found there 30 years ago.

Still, the FBI, by all appearances, seems determined to exhaust this latest lead. Graduate students schooled in geology will be used to determine whether the earth has been removed and then replaced, Roberts said. If anything is found they will check for a DNA match.

About 40 to 50 investigators and diggers were working at the site Thursday, aided by heavy equipment. And helicopters hovered above, adding a new chapter of local commotion to the long-unsolved mystery surrounding Jimmy Hoffa.

AP, May 19, 2006

In September, a group of Muslim men praying near the main air intake duct at Giants Stadium was detained by suspicious FBI agents.

On Saturday, the federal agency and an Egyptian-American group plan to meet at the stadium in the latest FBI push to recruit Arab-Americans and repair relations strained in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks.

"It's an effort to build bridges with this community," said Les Wiser Jr., special agent in charge of the FBI's Newark bureau, who has made improving ties with New Jersey's Muslim community a priority. "We think it's important for them to get to know us. We're fighting perceptions we think are skewed against us."

The FBI accepted an invitation from the Egyptian American Group, an interdenominational organization that was formed after Sept. 11 when hundreds of New Jersey Muslims, Arab-Americans and south Asians were taken into custody as part of the investigation.

"We were afraid of them, and they were suspicious of us," Suzanne Loutfy, a member of Egyptian American group. "It was thought by many people that the FBI is the enemy. That's the perception we're fighting against."

Part of the event is aimed at interesting young Arab-Americans in law enforcement careers, particularly with the FBI, which needs their help as investigators and translators.

"We think the more they know about us, the more comfortable they will be," Wiser said. "We do need to get more diversity in the ranks."

Loutfy's 18-year-old son will be at the event, along with six or seven of his friends, to hear what the FBI has to say. Kareem Loutfy, a senior at Carteret High School, says he's considering a career with the agency.

"Because of my background, I can easily approach people" in Arab-American communities, he said. "They would feel much more comfortable dealing with me because of who I am, and that would be great for both sides. We need to build more trust with the people who are protecting us."

Since the 2001 attacks, the FBI has made numerous efforts to reach out to Muslims and Arab-Americans in New Jersey. Several months after the attacks, it held a job fair in one of the most prominent mosques in Paterson. While no one there got a job with the FBI, several applicants landed local law enforcement jobs.

The FBI also has invited Muslim community leaders to conduct cultural sensitivity training with agents and civilian employees.

Other law enforcement agencies also are trying to better understand and connect with Muslims. On Thursday, Union County Prosecutor Theodore J. Romankow distributed copies of a new training video his office developed on how officers should interact with Muslims. The tapes will go to each police chief in the county, and nearly 2,000 officers will view them.

"Where there is good communication, there is a better understanding between people no matter what religion and that was the goal here," Romankow said.

The video deals with issues considered normal in Muslim culture, but which may be suspicious to authorities.

For example, a Muslim woman who is home alone will be extremely reluctant on religious grounds to let male police officers into her home, said Ali Jaaber, an imam at an Elizabeth mosque. That is normal, and should not be viewed as suspicious behavior, or an indication that she has anything to hide, he said.

The FBI in New Jersey has several Arabic-speaking employees, but could always use more, a spokesman said. Nationwide, the FBI has increased the number of its employees who speak Arabic by nearly 250 percent, although the agency would not say how many employees that represents.

On Sept. 19, 2005, a small group of Muslims attending a New York Giants-New Orleans Saints game at Giants Stadium was questioned by the FBI after fans saw them bowing down on the ground to pray.

The FBI denied their religion had anything to do with the questioning, noting that the men were in an area not normally frequented by football fans, next to the stadium's main air intake duct. The Muslims were released after about 30 minutes of questioning without being charged.

That controversy led the New Jersey Sports and Exposition Authority to set aside a special room at the stadium for anyone wishing to pray.

Kareem Loutfy said holding Saturday's fence-mending event with the FBI at Giants Stadium was appropriate, if somewhat ironic.

"It's a very good statement, actually, that in light of everything that happened, we're both still willing to move forward," he said.

Officer Details His Work Undercover Amid Muslims (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

New York Times, May 19, 2006

A young police detective testified yesterday at the Herald Square bombing plot trial that he was recruited from the Police Academy 13 months after 9/11 to work deep undercover in the Muslim community to investigate Islamic extremists.

The detective, a Muslim who came to America from Bangladesh when he was 7, testified that he was a 23-year-old college graduate when he was plucked from the academy in October 2002. He took an apartment in Bay Ridge, Brooklyn, where, he testified, his assignment was to be a "walking camera" among Muslims there.

He said he had no contact with the Police Department other than through his handler, to whom he reported by e-mail at first. During two years of living in Bay Ridge, he was involved in "numerous" investigations, he testified, and was at times shadowed by a field team to ensure his safety.

The Police Intelligence Division's program to post detectives overseas has been widely publicized. But this detective's testimony yesterday in federal court in Brooklyn provided the closest look yet at how the division is using undercover investigators to penetrate mosques, bookstores and other places where Muslims gather in the city.

His testimony confirmed what many Muslims have believed since the Sept. 11 attacks: that law enforcement agencies have worked to infiltrate their community during terrorism investigations. It also revealed the extraordinary steps the department took to create a fictitious identity so a Muslim investigator could live for years in an insular neighborhood where people have become highly suspicious of the authorities.

Beyond the detective's testimony, police officials yesterday would not discuss the scope of the program and provided no details about its structure, its guidelines or its successes or failures. The witness was identified only by a pseudonym — Kamil Pasha — to protect continuing investigations.

The detective was the final witness at the four-week trial of Shahawar Matin Siraj, 23, a Pakistani immigrant who is charged with plotting to blow up the Herald Square subway station in 2004. His lawyers have argued that he was entrapped by a paid police informer, a 50-year-old Egyptian-born nuclear engineer who they say was the driving force behind the plot. They have argued that their client was an inept dupe who was not predisposed to commit an act of terrorism until the informer inflamed him.

The undercover detective was called as a witness to rebut the defense arguments that the informer had drawn Mr. Siraj into the plot. He told the jury about statements Mr. Siraj had made long before he met the informer, which prosecutors contend show he had often spoken about violence and terrorism. The detective was not involved in the investigation of Mr. Siraj but came across him during his undercover work.

Much of the detective's testimony focused on Mr. Siraj's statements, but strands of information about the detective and his work were interlaced with his answers. And while prosecutors sought to limit testimony about the detective's background, objecting several times to questions by one of Mr. Siraj's lawyers, Martin R. Stolar, the judge, Nina Gershon, overruled the objections.

The detective testified that he graduated from the John Jay College of Criminal Justice and entered the Police Academy in July 2002. In the middle of October, roughly halfway through his academy training, he left early when he was recruited to join the Intelligence Division, where he was assigned to the Special Services Unit, which runs the undercover program.

Within three weeks, according to his testimony, he made his first appearance at the Islamic Society of Bay Ridge, a mosque on Fifth Avenue in Brooklyn, next door to the Islamic bookstore where Mr. Siraj worked. He testified that he spent time there periodically. Mr. Stolar, while questioning the detective, indicated that his reports showed he had seen Mr. Siraj 72 times over the two years, mostly in the bookstore.

He testified that he started looking for an apartment and a job. At one point Mr. Siraj's uncle was going to help him find work. With a coterie of young men who sometimes frequented the bookstore, he got involved in essentially proselytizing Islam.

He also testified that at one point he had Mr. Siraj over to his apartment. But he said he never wore a secret recording device.

The detective said he was not given any special training to work undercover but was taught about self-defense, weapons, surveillance and undercover safety.

He said, "I was told to act like a civilian — hang out in the neighborhood, gather information."

He said he was told "never to push for information," but instead to "take a back seat" and "observe, be the ears and eyes."

A slight man in a gray suit, a white shirt and a rust-colored patterned tie, the detective said he had never before testified in court. In fact, his youth and, perhaps, naïveté were in evidence at several points in the morning, including when he said he had never heard of suicide bombings before Mr. Siraj raised the subject, one he seemed to discuss often.

Mr. Stolar seemed incredulous. "You had never before heard of suicide bombings taking place in Israel?" he asked.

"I grew up with a very peaceful religion," the detective responded. "All of these comments — radical beliefs — came to me when I took this assignment." He added: "Where in Islam does it say you can blow up a train station?"

Over the course of the day, his poise on the stand grew. Most police officers make their trial debuts in less-charged atmospheres, perhaps in traffic or criminal court. For the witness yesterday, however, as the first Muslim undercover to testify, the stakes were far higher.

In fact, the stakes at the trial are perhaps higher still for the department, as evidenced by the presence for much of the proceedings of the department's highest ranking lawyer, S. Andrew Schaffer, the deputy commissioner for legal matters, and an aide. Also frequently present has been a civilian Intelligence Division analyst and for the last three days, as the possibility of the detective's testimony grew, a lieutenant from the department's press office.

Several questions about the investigation remained yesterday. When the undercover detective began visiting the Bay Ridge mosque in 2002, the Intelligence Division was governed by a 1985 consent decree stemming from a civil lawsuit. The decree limited police surveillance of political activity and religious services.

The guidelines set by the decree, which were loosened in February 2003, required that certain paperwork be filed before such an investigation could be conducted. It was unclear yesterday whether the guidelines were followed.

Cop Testifies About Post 9/11 Undercover (CCT)

By Tom Hays

The Contra Costa Times, May 19, 2006

NEW YORK - A city police officer born in Bangladesh testified Thursday that commanders assigned him straight out of the police academy to go undercover in a Muslim neighborhood as part of their response to the Sept. 11 attacks.

The undercover investigator, who is Muslim, said at a Manhattan subway bomb plot trial in federal court that he was "told to be a member of the community, hang out and get information."

One place he hung out was an Islamic bookstore near a Brooklyn mosque, where he said he heard a Pakistani immigrant charged in the plot openly praise Osama bin Laden while damning the U.S.

During a conversation on the second anniversary of the 2001 destruction of the World Trade Center, Shahawar Matin Siraj "complimented bin Laden," the officer told jurors.

"He said he was a talented brother and a great planner and that he hoped bin Laden planned something big for America," said the officer, who testified under an alias because he is still involved in active investigations.

Siraj, 23, was arrested on the eve of the 2004 Republican National Convention on charges he plotted to blow up a subway station in Herald Square, a dense shopping district that includes Macy's flagship department store. If convicted, he could face up to 20 years in prison.

Defense attorneys have characterized Siraj as a harmless dupe who was entrapped by a crafty older informant in a phony plot that never got off the ground.

The trial is in its fourth week.

No One Charged In Motorist's Death (BRADV)

By Adrian Angelette

Baton Rouge Advocate, May 19, 2006

A grand jury Thursday decided against charging anyone in the death of motorist George Temple II, shot and killed by a civilian Feb. 17 while fighting with a police officer.

Prosecutors presented about 15 witnesses during six hours of testimony before the East Baton Rouge Parish grand jury.

Temple was shot six times during a struggle with Baton Rouge Police Officer Brian Harrison. Authorities have said Harrison pulled over Temple after he cut into a funeral procession on Greenwell Springs Road.

The traffic stop escalated into a fight between Harrison and Temple. Police have said Temple offered a bribe to the police officer, and the struggle began when Harrison attempted to arrest Temple.

During the fight, the 24-year-old Temple was shot six times. One of the bullets came from the officer's gun.

The other five came from the gun of Perry Stephens, who authorities have said came to help the officer. One of Stephens' shots hit Temple in the head, killing him.

After the grand jury returned Thursday, District Attorney Doug Moreau said his office typically has grand juries look at cases in which a death occurred and a police officer was involved.

"We think the grand jury is a good sounding board to consider the evidence, particularly when there is a case of great community interest," he said.

Prosecutor Steve Danielson presented every witness the District Attorney's Office knew about, Moreau said, including Harrison, Stephens and Police Chief Jeff LeDuff.

Moreau also said that on the state level, the case is now closed. However, the U.S. Justice Department is still investigating the case.

Temple's mother, Sharalean, was unhappy that the state grand jury did not indict anyone in her son's death.

"It's unfair, it's unjust, and it's not over," she said.

The Temple family attorney, Nathan Fisher, said he's confident "that the courts will assess responsibility at some point in this matter."

Stephens' attorney, Tommy D'Amico, said he expected his client to be cleared.

"I believe he saved the officer's life. He certainly saved him from suffering great harm," D'Amico said. "It has always been obvious to me that my client is nothing less than a citizen hero because he stepped up to save the officer while others stood and watched."

D'Amico said he is certain Stephens will also be cleared in the federal investigation.

"I'm absolutely positive," he said. "He did what needed to be done."

At a news conference after the grand jury's decision, LeDuff noted that the East Baton Rouge Parish Sheriff's Office, not the Police Department, investigated Temple's death.

Asked whether Harrison could have done something different to circumvent the situation, LeDuff said he will not second-guess the officer.

"I wasn't there," LeDuff said. "It would be unfair for me, you or anybody to put ourselves in a place of a human being."

LeDuff also commended Stephens, who shot Temple with a .45-caliber handgun.

"I want to say thank you to Mr. Stephens," LeDuff said. "It takes a lot of courage to stand up and do what he has done and come to the aid of an officer."

Moreau also said he is aware that there are some people in the community who will not be satisfied with the outcome.

Neither Kwame Asanté, executive director for the local chapter of the NAACP, nor the Rev. Leo Cyrus, a member of the Baton Rouge Area African-American Ministers, were available for comment Thursday.

State Rep. Michael Jackson, D-Baton Rouge, who is president of the East Baton Rouge Parish Black Elected Officials group, also was not available for comment.

Some members of the three groups requested an independent investigation into Temple's death shortly after the shooting.

Temple was black. Harrison and Stephens are white. The grand jury comprised six white people and six black people.

Should DNA Be Collected From All Criminals? (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

Christian Science Monitor, May 19, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. - In most cities and states, vandalism, shoplifting, and loitering are misdemeanors - possibly involving community service, not jail time. But those who commit such low-level crimes in New York State may soon be required to give DNA samples to authorities - just as convicted rapists or murderers do.

If the Legislature passes the proposal, which is currently being debated, New York would be the first state in the nation to require DNA samples for all convicted offenders.

Gov. George Pataki (R), who is asking the Legislature to expand DNA collection, argues that a larger database will help solve more crimes. Supporters add it will help solve future crimes because criminals who start off committing petty crimes sometimes graduate to more serious offenses.

The Empire State's move comes as DNA work in criminal investigations is under closer scrutiny. Complaints are rising about mistakes - some inadvertent, others fraudulent - at DNA labs around the country. Groups that have championed the use of DNA to verify the guilt or innocence of convicts are now campaigning against large-scale expansion of the practice, saying it would overwhelm labs. Others cite concerns about the increasing number of innocent people whose DNA is stored in a databank without their knowledge or approval.

"People have come to appreciate the power of DNA to solve crimes. They now need to respect the care that is required to maximize its potential and avoid its abuse," says Stephen Saloom, policy director for the Innocence Project, which has used DNA testing to free 176 prisoners wrongfully convicted.

Twenty-eight states now collect samples for some misdemeanors, according to DNAResource.com, a website that tracks DNA policies. A week ago, Kansas joined California and five other states in going one step further: taking the DNA samples of some people arrested, but not necessarily charged, with a crime.

"They all tend to be violent felony and burglary arrestees," says Lisa Hurst, a government-affairs consultant with Smith Alling Lane, which represents Applied Biosystems, a maker of DNA testing equipment. Smith Alling Lane also runs DNAResource.com.

New York's proposal, however, would go the furthest, requiring DNA collection for all convicted of misdemeanors. This would add about 80,000 additional DNA profiles per year to the DNA bank, say researchers at the state's Division of Criminal Justice.

It would be well worth the effort, says Chauncey Parker, director of criminal justice for the state. "Whenever we get DNA from a convicted offender, we run it against the 18,000 unsolved crimes, mostly rapes, and we have 2,400 hits so far. When we look at those hits, we find on average when [an arrestee] is convicted, it's [his or her] 12th conviction."

He cites the example of Raymon McGill arrested July 25 for attempted robbery. DNA testing linked Mr. McGill to two earlier murders and a rape, says Mr. Parker. He also notes that McGill had been arrested in 1999 for a misdemeanor.

"Had we required DNA fingerprinting back then, he would have been linked to the rape and the case solved," says Parker.

On Monday, critics of the New York proposal publicly complained that the backlog of cases is already large. Tom Duane (D), the only state senator to vote against the New York measure, worries about the cost of expansion, as well as how to ensure proper training of personnel and storage of the samples. "What good will it do if it's not done right?" he asked.

Such concerns go well beyond New York. In February, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, in their magazine, published an article detailing mistakes that have cropped up at DNA labs around the country. "Many of the mistakes arise from cross-contamination or mislabeling of DNA samples," wrote William Thompson, a professor at the University of California, Irvine.

Thompson's concerns arise just as states and cities are expanding their use of DNA testing. Los Angeles County is preparing to open a new crime lab in 2007. A proposed county budget included funding not only for the lab, but also for prosecutors and public defenders training in DNA technology. Nebraska recently passed a bill to include felony robbery and burglary convictions among those requiring DNA samples. Wisconsin is considering a bill to add some misdemeanor-related sex crimes to its DNA-collection requirements.

But with such expansions come concerns. Mr. Saloom of the Innocence Project objects to law-enforcement agencies holding the DNA of innocent people, especially those who merely cooperated with an investigation. These samples should be destroyed, he says. "The fundamental values of government accountability and personal privacy are at stake," he says.

Some of these arguments resonate with Assemblyman Joseph Lentol (D), chairman of the Assembly Codes Committee, which deals with criminal sanctions. "We are asking [DNA labs] to destroy the DNA of an innocent party," says Mr. Lentol. "This is a privacy issue."

Parker, the director of criminal justice for the state, says cooperating individuals can ask a judge to order their samples to be returned. "The burden is on the police to always demonstrate to a judge that whatever evidence they are collecting, whether it's a DNA fingerprint or a photograph or a handwriting sample, that it has been collected lawfully and that it's being used for a lawful purpose," he says.

In addition, Assemblyman Lentol also worries that private labs will use DNA information for commercial gain. "There is an almost limitless possibility of ID theft," he worries.

That concern is addressed in the pending legislation, Parker says, by increasing the penalty for unlawful use of a DNA sample.

The governor and lawmakers have until the end of the legislative session, June 22, to come to terms on the proposal.

40 States Seek To Limit "Little Cigar" Marketing (WP)

By Kathleen Day

DOJ_NMG_0028991

Forty states have asked the U.S. Treasury Department to bar tobacco companies from marketing products they say are identical to cigarettes as "little cigars," a designation the states say lets the firms evade taxes and target younger consumers.

Attorneys general from the 40 states, including Maryland, want the department's Alcohol and Tobacco Tax and Trade Bureau to reverse decades-old rules that permit products the size, shape and weight of cigarettes, but have brown rather than white wrappers, to be labeled as little cigars.

"If it looks like a cigarette, smokes like a cigarette and is being marketed like a cigarette, then the federal government should classify it as a cigarette," said Bill Roach, spokesman for Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller, co-chairman of the National Association of Attorneys General tobacco committee. The attorneys general also said the "little cigars" appeal to young smokers because they cost less than cigarettes and come with flavorings such as chocolate and raspberry.

The "little cigar" label allows the companies to pay lower federal and state taxes, and to avoid payments and advertising restrictions required for cigarettes under the 1998 master agreement between tobacco companies and all 50 states, according to the petition for rule changes.

The request was filed last month with the backing of 23 states, but the National Association of Attorneys General didn't announce it until yesterday, by which 17 more states had signed on.

Since 1998, the number of little cigars sold in the United States has doubled, to about 4 billion a year, according to the Cigar Association of America, the industry trade and lobby group.

"We think that is no accident," Roach said. "We think these are being marketed in a way to get around the tax and marketing restrictions on cigarettes."

A spokesman for the Tax and Trade Bureau said the agency can write rules so there is a "bright line" drawn between cigarettes and little cigars but that the release of the rules is months away at best. Several tobacco companies and the cigar trade association also have asked the bureau to clarify the definition of the two products, industry and government officials said yesterday. Makers of "little cigars" want to make sure they are not subject to legal attacks that they are really marketing cigarettes.

Both sides agree that there is a legitimate category of cigars known as little cigars and that a clearer line has to be made between those products and cigarettes. They differ, however, on how to do that.

Norman F. Sharp, president of the Cigar Association of America, said the attorneys general are confused on many facts. "Little cigars are not cigarettes and, over the long term, they have never been substitutable for cigarettes," he told New Jersey legislators at a hearing this month. "They represent the cigar industry's attempt to give satisfaction to cigar smokers, not an attempt to attract cigarette smokers."

Representatives of four nonprofit groups -- the American Heart Association, Americans for Nonsmokers Rights, the American Lung Association and the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids -- disagreed. "Many of these 'little cigars' are blatantly aimed at our children," they said in a joint statement in support of the 40 states' filing. "They are cheaper and more affordable to kids than regular cigarettes because they have lower excise tax rates, and they are often sold individually rather than in packs because their classification exempts them from state laws setting minimum pack sizes for cigarettes."

Cigars are harmful, said Matthew Myers of the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids, but they generally are smoked less frequently than cigarettes and their smoke often is not inhaled. The products being marketed as "little cigars" are often smoked frequently and the smoke is inhaled like that from cigarettes, he said.

The little-cigar industry's retail value is about $360 million a year, Sharp said. In contrast, 380 billion cigarettes are sold each year, with retail value of more than $80 billion.

Miller, the Iowa attorney general, said that while the sales of little cigars are low compared with those of cigarettes, their growth rate in recent years, if it continues, could undo the reduction in overall smoking that the 1998 agreement achieved.

FBI: Shooting Was Part Of Sting (CHIT)

By Tom Rybarczyk And Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, May 19, 2006

An FBI-orchestrated weapons buy in a Dolton parking lot went awry late Wednesday, leading to the fatal shooting of an informant who was wearing a wire and being watched by surveillance teams, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0028992

Timothy Forrest, 41, of Dolton was shot in the head at about 9 p.m. Wednesday in his car, which was parked outside a currency exchange at Lincoln Avenue and Sibley Boulevard, officials said.

FBI agents watched as the man meeting Forrest exited his vehicle and got into Forrest's car. They did not suspect anything amiss until the man hurried away and drove off, officials said.

The suspect's name was known to investigators, who captured him more than 10 hours later at a house in Alsip. He was being held for questioning Thursday night, and while FBI officials have identified him, the Tribune is withholding his name because no charges have been filed.

Forrest was married, a longtime Dolton resident and a former Cook County correctional officer. He had been accused of transporting stolen DVDs and that federal case was pending.

FBI Special Agent Tom Simon said every safety precaution was taken as the weapons buy was set up, but events like this happen "once every blue moon."

"During the meeting, the FBI surveillance team had no indication that there were any problems with the meeting until they saw [the suspect] leave the car in a hurry," Simon said.

"The surveillance team immediately went up to the car and saw that Mr. Forrest had been shot. ... It's important to understand that with a meeting like this, there are inherent risks."

FBI spokesman Frank Bochte confirmed that Forrest was wearing a wire but said the gunshots were inaudible to those listening. Veteran agents tried to call Forrest on his cell phone before rushing to the car, he said.

Simon said, "The plan was never to pounce on [the suspect] the second he left the car. The plan was to go up to [Forrest] once the coast was clear."

Forrest died of multiple gunshot wounds, and his death was ruled a homicide, said a Cook County medical examiner's office spokesman.

Dolton police, the FBI and the South Suburban Major Crimes Task Force are investigating, Dolton spokesman Sean Howard said.

"We don't have a motive and once again we are working hand in hand with the FBI," Howard said.

Law enforcement sources said there appeared to be a link between Forrest's shooting and his federal court case.

Simon said the slaying would be prosecuted by the Cook County state's attorney's office, not by federal prosecutors.

FBI officials would not comment on how Forrest became an informant and neither would his defense attorney, Neil Cohen, who represented him on the charges of conspiring to transport stolen DVDs from Memphis to Chicago in July 2004.

According to the federal indictment, Forrest rented a truck from Chicago and drove to Memphis to pick up 14 pallets of stolen DVDs. He initially was charged in Cook County with theft of more than $500,000, but the case was superseded by the federal indictment.

Forrest and two co-defendants then transported the merchandise to Chicago before he was arrested, authorities said. The case was pending, Cohen said.

"He was a very decent guy, a non-violent man," Cohen said. "His wife is shocked and bereaved, and we're awaiting the results of the FBI investigation."

His attorney did not know what Forrest did for a living, but Cook County sheriff's employment records show that he previously worked as a correctional officer at the Cook County jail from 1997 until resigning in September 2004.

Forrest's mother, Rosa Price, said she did not want to talk about her son's involvement with the FBI.

"I loved him with all my heart, soul, mind and body," Price said. "And he is gone. I don't know what else I can tell you."

This is at least the second death of an informant under FBI surveillance in the last three years in the south suburbs. In June 2003, cocaine kingpin Otis Moore shot himself in the mouth outside the Chicago Heights Police Station. The FBI planned to have Moore tape conversations with another drug dealer.

Sentencing Delayed In FBI Sting Drug Case (PROJO)

By Mike Stanton

The Providence Journal, May 19, 2006

PROVIDENCE -- The tortured case of Alan Blamires, the mob associate caught guarding a shipment of cocaine in an undercover FBI sting, encountered another detour yesterday.

Having pleaded guilty to conspiracy, a handcuffed Blamires was led into federal court, expecting to be sentenced for his crime. Since his arrest in January 2005, he has been held without bail at the Wyatt Detention Center in Central Falls.

But some confusion over the value of cooperation that Blamires, 50, of Johnston, has provided the authorities prompted Chief U.S. District Judge Ernest C. Torres, reluctantly, to postpone the sentencing.

This was not the first detour in U.S. v. Blamires. Last summer, a plea deal fell apart after Blamires told Torres that he was "fuzzy and blurry" from medication that he took to control his violent tendencies, and didn't understand the charges against him.

During that court hearing, Blamires also blurted out that he had "pertinent information" regarding lawyer Joseph Bevilacqua, but that prosecutors wouldn't talk to him.

U.S. Attorney Kenneth P. Madden said that he would be happy to talk to Blamires, but only after he pleaded guilty.

Finally, after a competency review and a guilty plea earlier this year, Blamires had his sit-down with Madden, an FBI agent and a Providence police detective.

Madden declined to say after yesterday's hearing what information Blamires provided, or whether it concerned Bevilacqua, the son of the late Rhode Island Supreme Court chief justice. A government motion detailing Blamires' information is sealed.

Bevilacqua is serving an 18-month federal prison term for leaking an undercover FBI videotape to television reporter Jim Taricani in a Providence City Hall corruption case, and has also been a target of an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

Madden told Torres that the information Blamires provided was "historical," and would probably not be of much use to investigators in pursuing future cases.

"There were one or two pieces of information that I hadn't known . . . but given the age of the information, there's nothing to be gained for current use," said Madden.

Nevertheless, Madden said, the government was willing to give Blamires "the benefit of the doubt" and recommend that he be sentenced to less than the mandatory minimum of 120 months, or 10 years. Madden recommended 108 months, while Blamires' lawyer, Richard K. Corley, urged the judge to go lower.

That prompted Torres to question the criteria that he could consider in fashioning a sentence. He asked the lawyers to file memoranda within 10 days.

Blamires is the last of three defendants to be sentenced following guilty pleas to charges related to guarding the cocaine shipment at a Cranston hotel on Jan. 18, 2005.

Matthew L. Guglielmetti Jr., a capo regime in the Patriarca crime family, is serving a 136-month prison term after admitting to his role in recruiting Blamires and Anthony P. Moscarelli to guard 67 kilograms of cocaine that was supposedly passing through Rhode Island. Moscarelli is serving a 96-month sentence.

Guglielmetti was working for an undercover FBI agent who was posing as a drug dealer.

The case grew out of a larger undercover investigation in which an FBI agent posing as a businessman operated a construction business with Guglielmetti as a silent partner, probing alleged corruption in the Rhode Island construction world.

When Guglielmetti, Blamires and Moscarelli were arrested last year, authorities also searched offices of the Laborers' International Union in Providence and a New England Laborers' training fund and its administrator, state Sen. Dominick J. Ruggerio.

No charges have been brought in connection with that phase of the investigation. Asked after yesterday's hearing if authorities will move forward once Blamires is finally sentenced, prosecutor Madden replied, "I can't talk about the Laborers'."

4 Officers Receive National Honors (PROJO)

By Gregory Smith, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, May 19, 2006

Three officers from Providence and one from East Providence are honored for their invesitgation of the Latin Kings gang.

PROVIDENCE -- Three police investigators from Providence and one from East Providence who teamed up in a long-running drug case to apprehend 26 members of the Almighty Latin Kings Nation gang are among the TOP COPS in America.

That is what the National Association of Police Organizations thinks of Lt. Thomas A. Verdi and investigators Robert Colanduono and Robert M. Enright, all of Providence, and investigator Karl R. "Jake" Jacobson of East Providence.

The association, an advocacy group that includes police labor unions and citizens, annually gives out a handful of awards for police work above and beyond the call of duty.

It treated the four police officers and 19 other honorees to a Hollywood-style awards ceremony at the Warner Theatre in Washington, D.C., last weekend.

The highlight of the ceremony, which featured the stars of TV law enforcement shows as master of ceremonies and award presenters, were sometimes dramatic video reenactments of the winners' crimebusting exploits.

"You watched the audience go from tears to cheers," Verdi said, as first the crimes were shown in each of 10 reenacted cases, one of which included the murder of a police officer in another state, and ultimately the arrests.

One of the honorees was a New York City police officer who donated a kidney to a former partner.

Verdi said it was a privilege to be honored, given the caliber of the other winners' achievements.

"It was humbling," he said.

In the real-life police case in Rhode Island dubbed Operation Royal Flush, in which a slew of federal and state law enforcement agencies cooperated in 2003-2004, the Providence police made the largest single seizure of cocaine in department history in 2004: Nearly 23 kilos worth an estimated $575,000, which had been stashed in a minivan.

Operation Royal Flush was heavily dependent on wiretaps of more than 32,000 telephone calls among Latin King gang members. Investigators heard gang members speaking in code, which they partially deciphered.

"It was characterized by a lot of on-the-street surveillance, and we would take turns in the wire room," listening to wiretapped conversations, which could be, at turns, funny, serious and tedious duty, Jacobson said last night.

Taking a break from tailing a criminal suspect in another case, Jacobson said in an interview on his cell phone that it was difficult to penetrate a Hispanic gang such as the Latin Kings because they enrolled members at a young age. It would have been no easy matter to have infiltrated it with a Hispanic undercover officer, he said.

"It takes a lot of money to do a wiretap," said Jacobson, who expressed appreciation for the federal and state support of the probe. He paid tribute to the work of, among others, three members of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration: Special Agents Anthony Cardello and Kathleen Kelleher and intelligence analyst Andrea Metz.

The National Association of Police Organizations said the winners from Providence and East Providence "spent innumerable hours with dedicated precision to ensure the end to a lawless and brutal regime called the Almighty Latin King Nation. . . ."

The investigation took 11 months and dominated the lives of the officers involved.

"During my 18 years [in policing] there have been many terrific moments, but being nominated for this prestigious award culminates my lifelong dream," Colanduono said in a statement. "My wife, Tracey, has ate, drank and slept this case as much, if not more, than I. She is my sounding board and backbone; her sacrifice and unending love made it all worthwhile."

Providence Mayor David N. Cicilline hailed the three Providence officers for "their extraordinary police work" and for removing dangerous drugs from city neighborhoods.

The four officers have been honored previously for the Latin Kings case: The Providence trio received the Chief's Award and Jacobson was given the Exceptional Service Award.

In reconstructing Operation Royal Flush for the video at the ceremony, the producers used surveillance video from the investigation and did on-camera interviews with the investigators at places in Providence that figured into the case.

The master of ceremonies for the awards -- the registered trademark is TOP COPS Award -- was John Walsh, host of the Fox TV show America's Most Wanted, and the award presenter for the four Rhode Islanders was actor Jeremy Ratchford, who portrays a detective on the CBS police drama Cold Case.

Feds Bust Man In New Castle Drug Sales (PPG)

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, May 19, 2006

A man who federal authorities say has been selling large amounts of cocaine for years in New Castle was arrested this week.

Dion Mercer, 37, has been charged with one count of conspiracy to distribute more than 5 kilograms of cocaine and more than 50 grams of crack.

According to a six-page affidavit filed by a Drug Enforcement Administration agent, Mr. Mercer has been selling large quantities of cocaine for four years.

Mr. Mercer was convicted of drug trafficking in federal court in 1997. In that case, he cooperated with officials to receive a reduced sentence. At the time of this week's arrest, he was on federal supervised release as well as state parole from drug charges.

DEA Agent Larry Forletta said in the affidavit that the case is based on interviews he had with at least nine people involved in drug dealing with Mr. Mercer, a controlled crack buy by a confidential informant, a phone trace on his cell phone and surveillance.

"We have attempted to do surveillance on Mercer numerous times," Agent Forletta wrote. "He is very conscious of surveillance and routinely conducts counter-surveillance."

The affidavit outlines one instance on May 2, when Mr. Mercer was meeting with Ricky Pinkins, who'd just been released from prison on a murder charge.

"After the meeting ended, Pinkins was observed traveling at a high rate of speed," wrote Agent Forletta. "We believe Mercer detected our surveillance because after noticing my car near the scene where he was meeting with Pinkins [he had detected my vehicle on a prior surveillance], he began to chase me through the streets of New Castle."

According to Agent Forletta's sources, Mr. Mercer used his mother's home on Raymond Avenue for his business, as well as a wooded area behind the Crestview Garden complex.

Mr. Mercer's cocaine supply came from Detroit, the agent wrote in the affidavit.

Though the U.S. attorney's office said this case is unrelated, in February, officials from the state attorney general's office announced charges against 27 adults and one juvenile in a crack cocaine ring that involved gangs from Detroit moving into New Castle to take over local crack sales.

The U.S. attorney's office wouldn't say whether this is an ongoing investigation or whether more arrests are expected.

Mr. Mercer remains in federal custody pending a preliminary hearing Monday.

Second Hearing On Detroit Drug-Search Case Shows Deep Divisions On Supreme Court (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — It did not take very long during the Supreme Court's final argument of its term on Thursday to see why the court had decided to schedule a second hearing in this less-than-monumental case about a search for illegal drugs in a Detroit home.

The justices were deeply engaged, and deeply split.

It is a logical inference that they were deadlocked at 4 to 4 after the first argument on Jan. 9, and that it is now up to Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who took his seat later that month, to break the tie.

But that is not necessarily the case; any Supreme Court decision is a work in progress until it is issued. "I may have my mind made up, but I'm open to change," Justice Stephen G. Breyer told Timothy A. Baughman, a lawyer from the Wayne County, Mich., prosecutor's office who argued for the state.

Nonetheless, Justice Breyer proceeded to make it clear that he remained unpersuaded by Mr. Baughman's argument that the Michigan Court of Appeals was correct in refusing to exclude from Booker T. Hudson's trial the drugs the police found when they executed a search warrant by bursting into his home without knocking or waiting for him to open the apparently unlocked door.

This means of entry violated the "knock and announce" rule that modern Supreme Court precedents have made part of the current understanding of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of unreasonable search and seizure. There was no dispute that the Detroit officers' action violated the rule. The question for the justices was what consequences should flow from the violation.

"A child of 2," Justice Breyer told the prosecutor, would know that the officers' sudden entry made it more likely that they would find the incriminating evidence. To permit evidence found in these circumstances to be admitted at trial would be "to let a computer virus loose in the Fourth Amendment," he said.

Justice Alito had no questions for Mr. Baughman, but he asked questions of the defendant's lawyer, David A. Moran, that suggested some sympathy for the state's position.

Justice Alito asked Mr. Moran to assume that the police had waited 10 seconds before entering, rather than the 3 or 4 seconds that they actually waited after they announced their presence through the closed door. The Supreme Court's precedents have suggested that 15 to 20 seconds is the appropriate delay. Would excluding the evidence "be in any way proportionate" if the police were only "slightly on the wrong side of the line?" Justice Alito asked.

Perhaps not if it was really that close, as opposed to the "flagrant violation" in this case, Mr. Moran replied. The rule that illegally seized evidence should be excluded was meant to deter the police from violating the Constitution in the first place, he said. "Is there any method of deterrence other than teaching by example?" he asked.

What about telling police officers that they will not be promoted if they violate suspects' rights, Justice Antonin Scalia wanted to know. His suggestion appeared more rhetorical than serious, serving along with a number of his other interjections to make it clear that he was on the state's side in the case, Hudson v. Michigan, No. 04-1360.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. also appeared firmly in the state's camp. He asked Mr. Moran, who is associate dean of Wayne State University Law School in Detroit, what difference it would have made had the police waited 15 or 20 seconds instead of 3 or 4 after announcing their presence.

Mr. Hudson would have left the chair where he was sitting and admitted the officers, Mr. Moran said.

Why make that assumption, the chief justice wanted to know, observing that the police found a loaded gun and crack cocaine at Mr. Hudson's seat. Would Mr. Hudson really have exclaimed, "Oh, it's the police, let's see what they want?" Chief Justice Roberts asked.

Mr. Hudson was found guilty of drug possession and was sentenced to 18 months' probation.

The federal government, entering the case on behalf of the state, argued in a brief filed by the solicitor general's office that "suppression is too high a price to pay for a particular violation when the causal link between the violation and the acquisition of evidence is weak, nonexistent, or irrelevant."

Justice David H. Souter told David B. Salmons, an assistant solicitor general, that "if we accept your argument," the knock-and-announce rule "is a dead letter" because it would so often be difficult to prove that an illegal entry led to discovery of a particular piece of evidence.

Justice Souter, whose sympathy for the defense was clear, said that requiring such a link ignored an important reason for the knock-and-announce rule: "that there is enough respect for a person's privacy to say that the police should not barge in like an invading army."

Privacy Case May Rest On Alito Vote (WP)

By Charles Lane

DOJ_NMG_0028997

The Supreme Court heard a rare mid-May oral argument yesterday, on the authority of police to search private homes without knocking first -- in a major privacy-rights case likely to be decided by the vote of the court's newest member, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

At issue in Hudson v. Michigan , No. 04-1360, is the "knock and announce" rule rooted both in the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution and Anglo-American common law. The rule says that, in normal cases, police with a search warrant must knock and state their purpose, then wait a reasonable period for an answer, before forcing their way in.

Most federal and state courts that considered the question have said courts must exclude evidence seized by police who did not follow the rule. But in recent years, the Michigan Supreme Court has joined the minority that says no such "exclusionary rule" is required.

When the court first heard oral argument on Jan. 9, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was still on the bench. But O'Connor stepped down before the court could issue its opinion.

The court then announced it would hear arguments again. It gave no reason, but since it could have issued a decision if there were still five votes for one side without O'Connor, the most probable explanation is that the court was divided 4 to 4 and needed Alito, a former prosecutor who built a strong pro-police record as a federal appeals judge, to break the tie.

Liberals on the court openly worried that Michigan's approach would carry the day -- effectively gutting the "knock and announce" rule and, potentially, other restrictions on police searches.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer said that if the court rules in Michigan's favor, "we'd let a kind of computer virus loose in the Fourth Amendment. I don't know what the consequences would be."

Michigan courts upheld the 2002 drug possession conviction of Booker T. Hudson Jr., ruling that the officers who burst into his Detroit home three to five seconds after crying "Police! Search Warrant!" would have found crack cocaine in his jeans even if they had knocked and waited.

Under a 1999 Michigan Supreme Court ruling, defendants such as Hudson can prevail if only they show that the police's failure to knock directly caused the discovery of the evidence.

Michigan does not dispute that the officers technically violated the "knock and announce" rule. It argues, rather, that since they had a warrant, their presence in the house was legal even if the way they got inside was not.

Michigan also argues that the "knock and announce" rule can be adequately enforced by private lawsuits for damages against the police, or by internal police discipline -- a position echoed by the Bush administration, which supports Michigan.

But David A. Moran, a lawyer for Hudson -- who is also backed by the American Civil Liberties Union, the libertarian Cato Institute and the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers -- told the court that only the threat of excluding evidence is enough to protect citizens from the shock and embarrassment of a sudden police raid.

"People should have the right to answer the door in a dignified manner," Moran said.

Alito posed few questions, but those that he did ask implied that he sympathized with the state.

He asked Moran what difference it would have made in the case if the officers had waited 10 seconds before going in -- that is, more than the three to five seconds they waited, but fewer than the 15 seconds Moran proposed as a minimum.

For such a small violation, Alito asked, "Why would suppression [of the evidence] be proportional?"

Moran explained that the exclusionary rule was needed for deterrence, but his response did not satisfy Alito.

"You've contradicted your premise," the justice told him.

This contrasted with the tone O'Connor struck during the Jan. 9 argument, in which she suggested to Michigan's lawyer, Timothy A. Baughman, that "if the rule you proposed is adopted, then every police officer in America can follow the same policy. Is there no policy of protecting the homeowner a little bit, and the sanctity of the home from this immediate entry?"

A decision is expected by July.

IMMIGRATION:

More Suspected Illegals Held (CINE)

By Jim Hannah

DOJ_NMG_0028998

Cincinnati Enquirer, May 19, 2006

FORT MITCHELL – U.S. Marshals have detained more suspected illegal aliens as part of an ongoing investigation into the use of laborers in Northern Kentucky's home-building industry.

Five or six suspected undocumented workers were arrested Wednesday afternoon at Fountains at Lakeside Park apartments in the 2500 block of Kirkland Court. (The complex was formally known as Lakeside Village.)

Fort Mitchell police Chief Steve Hensley said his officers found the suspected illegal aliens while helping federal agents serve a search warrant at one of the apartments. Hensley said officers didn't go to the apartment specifically looking for illegal aliens.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials and the U.S. Marshals Service couldn't immediately be reached for comment.

Last week, 76 suspected illegal aliens were arrested as part of the two-year investigation. Two apartment complexes in Boone County have previously been raided along with several construction sites.

The corporate headquarters of the Crestview Hills-based Fischer Homes was also raided by federal agents last week. The builder denied any wrongdoing, but four of its construction site supervisors were charged with harboring illegal aliens.

Some of the suspected illegal aliens arrested last week are scheduled to appear Friday in U.S. District Court in Covington.

Bush Now Favors Some Fencing Along Border (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

YUMA, Ariz., May 18 — President Bush traveled on Thursday to a blistering stretch of scrub land surrounding the nation's busiest Border Patrol station and declared that he supported fencing some but not all of America's 1,950-mile border with Mexico.

"It makes sense to use fencing along the border in key locations in order to do our job," Mr. Bush said in a speech at the headquarters of the Yuma Sector Border Patrol. "We're in the process of making our border the most technologically advanced border in the world."

Mr. Bush has in the past indicated he is opposed to fencing, and White House officials were kept busy on Thursday trying to explain the change in his position. Tony Snow, the new White House press secretary, told reporters on Air Force One that the White House supported a Senate amendment, passed on Wednesday, that would build 370 miles of fence in areas most often used by smugglers and illegal workers.

"We don't think you fence off the entire border," Mr. Snow said. But, he added, "there are places when fences are appropriate."

Earlier on Thursday, Mr. Bush sent a letter to Congress requesting $1.9 billion to pay for putting up to 6,000 more National Guard troops on the border with Mexico. The troops were the main news in his immigration speech on Monday.

The request for money and Mr. Bush's tough words on fencing amounted to his latest effort to win over House conservatives who want an immigration bill focused on strengthening border security instead of a temporary guest worker program favored by the Senate. Mr. Bush likes the Senate plan, which would give most of the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants a chance to become American citizens, but he is trying to meld both approaches into a single bill that he hopes will be the major legislation of his remaining two years as president.

"Our country is a country of laws, and we've got to enforce our laws," Mr. Bush said at the Border Patrol headquarters, where outside temperatures reached 104 degrees. "But we're also a nation of immigrants. And we've got to remember that proud tradition, as well, which has strengthened our country in many ways."

Mr. Bush said that he believed a temporary worker program would reduce the number of people trying to enter the country illegally. Hundreds of Mexicans have died in the heat in recent years trying to enter the country through the Sonoran Desert, between Yuma in the west and Nogales, Ariz., to the east. Since October 2005, the Yuma sector of the Border Patrol, which stretches for some 125 miles along the desert boundary between the United States and Mexico, has reported 17 deaths.

"I understand there are many people on the other side of the border who will do anything to come and work," Mr. Bush said. "And that includes risking their life crossing your desert, or being willing to be stuffed in the back of an 18-wheeler."

The president was met here by Gov. Janet Napolitano of Arizona, and then toured a dirt field a few hundred feet from the border, where there were five watch towers and a fence of corrugated metal about 20 feet high.

After the tour, Mr. Bush gave back-to-back interviews of three to five minutes each to five broadcast and cable networks — CNN, Fox, NBC, ABC, CBS — to press his immigration plan.

Bush Says Border Fencing Makes Sense (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

The AP, May 18, 2006

President Bush peered across this hot, dusty and very busy illegal crossing point on Thursday, hoping to offer conservatives balking at a broad immigration bill firsthand evidence that he's serious about tightening the nation's 2,000-mile border with Mexico.

He said fences would help stop people from sneaking into the United States.

The president showed off a section of the border that is seeing a rising tide of illegal immigrants and other smuggling. The United States is responding with increased manpower — including help from the National Guard — and a newly beefed-up enforcement zone that features two layers of tall fencing, a concrete culvert, floodlights, watch towers and camera surveillance.

"I think it helps to have the president out here, seeing the part of the area of the country that one time was overrun by people coming in here, that's beginning to get settled down because of a strategy that's being employed," Bush said later in a packed room at the Border Patrol's Yuma Sector headquarters about 30 miles away.

"People's work is making a difference," the president said. "But we do not have full control of the border."

Bush wants a sweeping immigration overhaul that combines enhanced border security measures with a guest worker program.

But he faces stiff resistance from conservative Republicans, particularly in the House, who prefer a get-tough approach and largely oppose a Bush-backed guest worker program, which they see as providing amnesty for criminal behavior. House legislation that passed last year would make all illegal immigrants subject to prosecution as felons.

While the president visited the U.S.-Mexico border, the Senate continued a heated debate over broad legislation that largely does what Bush wants. It includes measures to tighten control over the borders, create a guest worker program and offer a path to citizenship for to many of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in the country.

The Senate voted to make English the national language of the United States. Moments later, it voted to say that English was a "common and unifying language."

"The Senate needs to get the bill out," Bush said.

Eager to win over conservative opponents, the president has been talking increasingly tough. On Monday, he proposed deploying up to 6,000 National Guard troops along the international line to support Border Patrol agents until their ranks can be expanded.

On Thursday, he said it makes sense to put up fencing along some parts of the border.

Bush did not declare his support for either of Congress' two competing proposals — one approved by the House that would build 700 miles of fencing and a provision in the Senate bill that would build half that. Instead, he said the decision should be up to the Border Patrol.

"It makes sense to use fencing along the border in key locations in order to do our job," he said,

The president has talked repeatedly about the wisdom of walling the border in urban areas but has also signaled opposition to widespread fencing — which is hotly opposed by his ally, Mexican President Vicente Fox. Bush told Fox News, in one of five television interviews he granted while visiting the border to further press his message: "Whatever works."

Bush also defended those who oppose his immigration proposal against criticism that there is an element of racism to their stance.

"I think it would be too harsh a judgment to say that somebody who doesn't support a comprehensive immigration plan is a racist," the president told CNN. "I don't believe that. I do believe citizens have got legitimate concerns, realizing that parts of this border have been open for anybody who wants to come across."

Bush's motorcade took him to a section of 6.9 miles of fencing that guard this area, the nation's busiest immigrant-smuggling hot spot. The president climbed up to a berm overlooking the 150-foot-wide border enforcement zone, which has recently added a new secondary fence of chain links and razor wire to a 20-foot-tall wall of corrugated metal. Guided by Border Patrol officials and Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, the president also reviewed a line of Border Patrol vehicles and display booths.

He also had a close encounter with the Washington debate, as he was joined on Air Force One by Arizona Republican lawmakers who have taken sharply different positions in the debate. Rep. J.D. Hayworth (news, bio, voting record) advocates doing anything possible to close the nation's porous border, while Republican Reps. Jeff Flake and Jim Kolbe teamed up to sponsor guest worker legislation similar to Bush's proposal.

The president suggested he got an earful from his guests, telling his audience in Yuma that the group is "a good bunch — a little rambunctious at times."

Meanwhile, Lt. Gen. Clyde A. Vaughn, chief of the Army National Guard, said Guard members from hurricane states will not be expected to contribute troops to the border effort until the end of the storm season.

Bush Backs 370-mile Fence Along Border (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, May 19, 2006

YUMA, Ariz. -- The Bush administration announced yesterday it supported the Senate amendment calling for 370 miles of fence along the U.S.-Mexico border, marking the first time it is has endorsed a specific amount of fencing.

But White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters traveling on Air Force One yesterday he would not get into a discussion on whether the Bush administration would also support the fence proposed in last year's House bill, which calls for 698 miles of fence to be built.

Hours later, after touring a section of the border at San Luis, Ariz., President Bush told an audience here at the U.S. Border Patrol station in Yuma that fences make sense -- in some cases.

"We saw some new fencing taking place. It makes sense to use fencing along the border in key locations in order to do our job," Mr. Bush said.

The administration yesterday sent to Congress a $1.9 billion immigration spending request, covering 1,000 of the 6,000 new Border Patrol agents Mr. Bush says will be hired over the next two years, and paying for temporary deployment of the 6,000 National Guard troops the president called for Monday.

He also gave his strongest praise yet of the full proposal now in the Senate, calling it "a good immigration bill." That bill includes a right to citizenship for illegal aliens who have been in the country more than two years, and a future foreign worker program that would also offer a path to citizenship -- something Mr. Bush's own proposal does not do.

Some members of Congress, in looking over the new spending request, said Mr. Bush was late in realizing the need for more border enforcement.

"Let me get this straight: when it comes to border security, the president was against it before he was for it," said Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, reprising a line that haunted Sen. John Kerry during the 2004 presidential campaign.

Mr. Byrd said Mr. Bush had opposed the senator's efforts to boost immigration enforcement spending nine times since 2002, and questioned whether Mr. Bush is now sincere in his commitment.

"If we had spent that money beginning in 2002, we would not be calling on the National Guard today," he said.

The announcements on the Guard and fences also have irked Mexican officials. Foreign Minister Luis Ernesto Derbez yesterday told reporters in Mexico City that his government would send a protest note to the U.S. about both proposals.

"There are 12 million Mexicans on the other side, 12 million people who live every day in anguish about the need for a reform to let them live peacefully," Mr. Derbez said. Later yesterday, the foreign ministers of Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and Costa Rica joined Mr. Derbez in Mexico City to denounce the proposed fences.

For his part yesterday, Mr. Bush spent time inspecting both a section of the international border with Mexico and the communications center at the Border Patrol station before giving a short speech on immigration.

Strikingly, the part of the border the president chose to review does have fencing -- a two-layer fence, with a 20-foot-high corrugated metal fence right on the border line and a secondary chain-link fence with barbed wire strands at the top set 150 feet back. The chain-link fence is just months old, according to Border Patrol agents and residents here.

A road runs between the two fences, and is both patrolled by the Border Patrol and monitored by video so agents can detect illegal crossings.

The president wanted to get a look at both the border and National Guard troops who are already operating in the area doing the same sorts of tasks he wants his 6,000 new troops to do: building roads and laying foundations for high-intensity lights the Border Patrol will use.

But the area he chose also shows how far the government has to go until the border is secure. Illegal alien apprehensions in the Yuma Sector are up 12 percent this fiscal year to date, compared with the same time in fiscal year 2005. So far this year in the Yuma Sector, in addition to the apprehensions, the Border Patrol has rescued 280 persons in distress and found another 17 dead.

The Yuma Border Patrol station regularly records more apprehensions on a daily basis than any other station, said Supervisory Agent Richard T. Hays. He also said criminal smuggling organizations operate from the neighborhood just over the fence from where Mr. Bush stood yesterday.

The area is one of the few along the border here that has fencing. The Yuma Station -- one of three stations in the Yuma Sector -- has just 6.9 miles of fencing in its 65 miles of Mexican border.

Both the administration and the Border Patrol say fencing doesn't make sense everywhere. Instead, Mr. Bush has called for a "virtual fence," saying there is no way to fence off the entire border.

The Senate on Wednesday passed an amendment calling for 370 miles of fence to be built in places where there are many illegal crossings.

"We supported the amendment," Mr. Snow said yesterday -- the first time the administration has backed a specific mile figure.

"I don't think anybody has seriously proposed building a wall across the entire border. What the president has said is he's going to try to have the right and appropriate types of security in the right places," Mr. Snow said.

Asked about the difference between that and the House bill, Mr. Snow said that was getting too far ahead of the process and the Senate must first act to pass its bill.

Still, fencing is so popular that the National Republican Senatorial Committee yesterday sent out press releases criticizing Democrats up for re-election who voted against the fence amendment.

Bush Trip To Border Turns Debate On Immigration Toward Security (WSJ)

By June Kronholz, Sarah Lueck And Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

The Senate reaffirmed the broad outlines of its guest-worker plan, as President Bush toured a stretch of the Arizona border to underline his promises to stanch the flow of illegal immigrants.

In a day otherwise devoted to fine-tuning the Senate's sweeping immigration overhaul, the chamber effectively killed a proposal to prevent guest-workers from eventually becoming U.S. citizens. The 58-to-35 vote was a victory for supporters of the Senate legislation, as they protected one of its central features.

Mr. Bush asked Congress for $1.9 billion to pay for border agents, fencing, detention facilities and monitoring equipment along the border, and gave some details about how National Guard will be used to bolster border security.

His trip to Yuma, Ariz., and the request for emergency border-control funds helped shift at least temporarily the debate from amnesty to border enforcement. Mr. Bush has largely endorsed a Senate bill that would give permanent residence to most of the 12 million illegal immigrants in the country, provoking outrage from many conservative Republicans.

But almost no one disagrees with Mr. Bush that the border needs reinforcing, and the president made a further bow to his conservative base by supporting a Senate call to build a fence along more than 300 miles of the 1,951-mile border.

In remarks to Border Patrol agents and Arizona politicians, Mr. Bush made a clear attempt to address the biggest criticisms of the Senate bill. He emphasized that guest workers would have to return to their home countries when their time in the U.S. came to an end and stressed that allowing some illegal immigrants to become citizens if they met a long list of criteria didn't amount to amnesty. "Amnesty is automatic citizenship," he said, noting that isn't what he supports.

Meanwhile, Mr. Bush rejected one of the core demands of his critics: the forced deportation of the entire illegal immigrant community.

The Yuma trip was intended to illustrate the Border Patrol's progress in turning back would-be illegal immigrants, but it highlighted how tough it is to seal the border. Mr. Bush drove under heavy security to the frontier, where he toured a new stretch of fencing overseen by guard towers. Administration aides noted that units of the Ohio and Pennsylvania Air National Guard helped build access roads and lay the foundation for high-intensity lighting elsewhere along the border.

Meanwhile, the Senate spent the day on a series of fine-tuning amendments that left intact the central features of the immigration bill, including the legalization process and a guest-worker plan that would give visas to 200,000 temporary workers a year.

The day's most emotional debate was over English as the national language. After long debate, senators agreed by a 63-34 vote that people aren't generally entitled to receive information from the government in Spanish. Then it passed a milder Democratic alternative making English the nation's "common and unifying" language.

English-language measures have surfaced often in recent years. The issue is a favorite of cultural conservatives who fear the spread of Spanish and are particularly nervous about the millions of Hispanics who would be offered eventual citizenship under the Senate plan.

By a 50-49 vote, senators decided against limiting the Social Security benefits of illegal immigrants who contribute to the program using fake numbers. They agreed to charge $750 to illegal immigrants applying for citizenship and use the funds to reimburse state and local governments for health-care and education costs.

Senators refined details of possible amnesty and guest-worker programs. They dropped wording that would have allowed immigrants to attest that they had lived and worked in the U.S. long enough to qualify for residency without providing any proof.

They reversed a vote Wednesday that would have prevented guest workers from petitioning for permanent status and would have left that prerogative up to their employers. Yesterday's measure guarantees temporary workers the right to join unions.

President Tours The U.S.- Mexican Border (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

YUMA, Ariz. — Declaring that "we do not have full control of the border," President Bush on Thursday visited an area where arrests — and deaths — of would-be immigrants have risen dramatically, and he urged the Senate to complete work on immigration legislation by the end of the month.

The president spent about an hour inspecting the arid and stark border, marked by a 20-foot-tall corrugated metal structure, an eight-foot chain-link fence topped by razor-sharp concertina wire, powerful lights, watchtowers and video cameras — an ever-growing low- and high-tech arsenal deployed in a sector where the Border Patrol says the most apprehensions have occurred.

Then, speaking to officers at their headquarters about 20 miles north of the border, Bush said that 6,000 National Guard troops were needed to help secure the border while the Border Patrol is beefed up over the next two years because "the need to enforce the border is urgent."

"It's time to get immediate results," Bush said.

The president's daylong journey, three days after he announced the National Guard deployment, was designed to highlight his newly emphasized commitment to the immigration issue.

But he is caught between those — including some governors — who argue that border duty would overtax the National Guard, which has sent many units to Iraq and is also designated to deal with disasters at home, and those who are demanding a more muscular effort along the border. Some critics have also expressed concern that the border is becoming militarized.

"The Guard will operate surveillance and communications systems. They will install fences and vehicle barriers. They're going to help build patrol roads, they will analyze intelligence, they will help spot people. But the Border Patrol will be involved in direct law enforcement," Bush said.

Seeking to draw attention to his call for broad legislation to overhaul the immigration laws, rather than on proposals to just clamp down on illegal border crossings, Bush sat in near-100-degree heat for five consecutive television interviews, with the chain-link fence to his left and a Border Patrol vehicle behind him.

The president flew nearly nine hours round trip, covering about 4,400 miles, for the roughly three-hour visit to the southwest corner of Arizona. He was accompanied by Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, a Democrat who has largely supported his new immigration efforts; David Aguilar, the chief of the Border Patrol, and the patrol's local chief, Ron Colburn.

He spent about 10 minutes in a barren field in the town of San Luis, a few hundred feet from the international border, touring the area in a two-seat dune buggy.

Richard T. Hays, a supervising Border Patrol agent, told White House pool reporters that before the chain-link fence, lights and cameras were installed, 70 to 80 people would cross at a time. The new measures have reduced the incursions, he said, although the region remains the patrol's busiest.

In addition to deploying the National Guard and increasing the Border Patrol by 50% beyond its current level of 12,000, the president favors a guest worker program, which would allow immigrants to enter the country legally for a specific period — thus removing the incentive to sneak across the border.

Under the program, Bush said, workers would be required to pass a criminal background check and would be given tamper-proof identification cards.

He favors giving access to citizenship to those who have lived in the United States for a specified, but as yet unstated, period and have paid taxes and a fine for entering the country illegally.

"This is a rational way to deal with people who are God-fearing, decent people and respect their dignity at the same time," Bush said.

But, he added, "nobody should be given an automatic citizenship — that's called amnesty."

As Bush headed to Yuma Thursday morning, the White House sent to Congress a revision in its $92-billion request for emergency spending, most of it to cover costs associated with the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and the recovery from Hurricane Katrina. Within that amount, it is seeking $1.95 billion to meet the costs of deploying 1,000 new Border Patrol agents, and for fences, lights, and some of the border work of the National Guard.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said the Border Patrol's Yuma sector was "emblematic of what we're talking about in terms of border security."

He told reporters aboard Air Force One: "We've got an area with the fence; we've got Border Patrol there. But also this is an area where National Guardsmen are involved in non-law-enforcement roles."

With increased enforcement along the border in eastern Arizona, there has been a spike in attempts to enter the United States in western Arizona, near Yuma. The 95,000 arrests along the Border Patrol's 125-mile Yuma sector since Oct. 1 represent a 13% increase over the same period a year ago. And deaths in the desert, beyond the fortified zone, were a record 51 in 2005, up from 15 two years earlier.

Anyone crossing the border looking for work would be advised to travel beyond Yuma, a city of nearly 89,000 that has struggled with unemployment for years. A recent improvement has seen the jobless rate drop to 21.8%, from 25.2% in 2002. The biggest employer is the Marine Corps Air Station.

But with a growth rate of 49.7% during the 1990s, it ranked behind only Las Vegas and Naples, Fla., as the fastest-growing metropolitan area in the country.

Bush Takes Border Tour (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, May 19, 2006

YUMA, Ariz. -- Warming up to new congressional plans for additional fencing along the Mexican border, President Bush made a personal inspection of one of the nation's most porous borders on Thursday as part of his stepped up appeal for a more sweeping approach to immigration reform.

"The need to enforce the border is urgent," Bush said in a speech at Border Patrol headquarters here.

"I understand that illegal immigration is a serious problem," said Bush, insisting that the solution must be "comprehensive," including a plan for temporary workers already in the U.S. and new guest workers. "One of our jobs in public office is to fix problems."

With a brief tour of the Border Patrol's Yuma Sector, a 120-mile stretch of desert along the southwestern Arizona border with Mexico where more than 70,000 illegal immigrants were turned back last year, Bush has come to the front line of a debate that has driven a deep wedge within his own party.

As the president presses Congress for reform of the nation's immigration laws, Bush has assumed a potentially perilous political role, with his own public approval ratings already at all-time lows.

Bush is attempting to mediate between the conservative base of the GOP, which has no patience for the president's talk of enabling millions of undocumented immigrants already living in the United States to eventually seek citizenship, and a fast-growing and traditionally Democratic-voting Hispanic population. The president has worked hard to woo Hispanics since his days as Texas governor.

Among the early indicators of Bush's success or failure since carrying his immigration appeal to a national audience with a televised address on Monday: Votes in the Senate this week where conservatives have found more approval for new fencing along the border and tougher sanctions against illegal immigrants than any new support that leaders have mustered for a temporary worker program for undocumented immigrants.

Another indicator: A series of focus groups that Hispanic pollster Sergio Bendixen conducted in Los Angeles this week. Bendixen says the voters he queried are "angry" about Bush's order for National Guard troops along the Mexican border.

"Unfortunately, sometimes when you try to get in the middle of a fight, you get both groups angry with you," Bendixen said. "When it comes to the major players in this debate {ndash} the Hispanic voters on one side, and the native, anti-immigration people on the other side {ndash} he may have hurt himself with both."

Bush is attempting to underscore his bid for conservative support, with the White House signaling on Thursday that it supports a Senate amendment this week to construct about 350 miles of new triple-layer fencing along the border in addition to about 500 miles of vehicle barriers.

"I don't think anybody has seriously proposed building a wall across the entire border," White House press secretary Tony Snow said en route to Arizona. "What the president has said is he's going to try to have the right and appropriate types of security in the right places."

The House, which has approved a border protection-only bill with tough sanctions for illegal immigrants and no provision for the temporary or guest workers that Bush wants, has proposed about 700 miles of fences.

"Whatever works," Bush said in a shirtsleeves interview with Fox News at a border crossing. "It makes sense to use fencing here. It doesn't make sense to use fencing on other parts of the border."

The president, who conducts few interviews, sat for brief border-side talks with each of the television networks covering his trip here. {ndash} a sign of the White House's intentions of making a more direct appeal to Americans.

Among Republicans, in particular, Bush faces a challenge. Republicans are more likely to name immigration as the nation's leading problem (19 percent of those surveyed), according to a May survey of the Pew Research Center. Just 9 percent of independents and 6 percent of Democrats cited immigration first, with many more {ndash} 22 percent of both groups {ndash} citing the war in Iraq.

Yet all the talk of Guardsmen and fencing also has created strains among Hispanic voters, a constituency that Bush has courted heavily, raising his share of the Latino vote from 35 percent in 2000 to 40 percent in winning re-election in 2004.

Hispanics "consider it as almost anti-Hispanic or anti-Mexican," pollster Bendixen says of the National Guard call-up. "They can't see it any other way. They came here to work and take care of their families, and they're asking, 'Why make criminals out of us when all we've done is come here to pick up'" some of the toughest work?

The president came to Yuma, the White House says, because more illegal immigrants have been intercepted along the Arizona border than in any of the other three border states where the National Guard will start rotating forces through three-week tours of duty this summer. Guard forces, already playing a role in communications in Yuma, are to play similar supporting roles elsewhere; the deployment is planned as a "bridge" until the Border Patrol gets the additional agents Bush is seeking.

Bush brought David Aguilar, director of U.S. Customs and Border Protection, for his Yuma sector tour, as well as Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) one of the few conservatives demonstrating an openness to the president's talk of comprehensive reform.

"There's a temptation for politicians to demagogue on immigration reform and, unfortunately, that has soured this debate almost to the point of deadlock," Flake said. "I hope that President Bush's speech… which was rational and serious, will reverse the tone of this debate in Congress and help us pass a comprehensive bill."

Bush Takes Immigration Vision To Ariz. (USAT)

By David Jackson

YUMA, Ariz. — President Bush continued walking a fine line Thursday in the Republican immigration battle, including the line at the U.S.-Mexican border.

Accompanied by Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, a Democrat, Bush toured one of the nation's most porous border areas, where Border Patrol agents apprehended 70,000 illegal entrants last year. He stood a few hundred feet from a 20-foot fence of corrugated metal and inspected new camera, communications and lighting systems.

In remarks at the Border Patrol headquarters, Bush said there is common ground between the two visions of immigration overhaul that have split his party — one that stresses keeping illegal immigrants out, and another that favors making immigrant workers legal temporarily and giving some illegal immigrants a path to citizenship.

Bush favors elements of both. “You cannot secure the border unless you have all elements of a comprehensive plan,” he said.

The Republican-led Senate is debating a bill that does much of what Bush wants. The GOP-led House has passed a bill that focuses on border enforcement.

Bush's trip Thursday was his first since his Monday night address on immigration, when he reached out to GOP immigration hard-liners by proposing tougher border security, including deployment of up to 6,000 National Guard troops.

The flight aboard Air Force One underscored GOP differences. Bush's guests included Rep. J.D. Hayworth, R-Ariz., who wants a law enforcement bill only.

Hayworth said he and Bush have “profound disagreements.”

“I don't believe the House will accede to his wishes on a ‘guest worker' program, despite his recent protestations to the contrary,” Hayworth said.

Bush noted that immigration is “an emotional issue.” That seems especially true in Arizona.

Al Garza, who lives near Tucson, said he voted for Bush twice but would not do so again. The director of a group that works to stop illegal entrants at the border, Garza called Bush's troop proposal “a political ploy.”

“No one seems to be listening to what the citizens want,” Garza said. “It's all what Mexico wants, or what the illegal aliens want.”

Robin Hoover, head of a group that maintains watering stations in the desert where illegal immigrants cross, said a guest-worker program recognizes the need to deal with people already here. He said the Guard deployment is “silly.”

“Putting the soldiers down here is all politics, bad politics,” he said.

Bush, Chertoff Say Plan Will Bolster Border (DMN)

House conservatives unimpressed by visits, Guard deployment

EL PASO – President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff traveled to the U.S.-Mexico border Thursday in a push to convince the public – and conservatives in Congress – that they're serious about beefing up efforts to halt illegal immigration.

ERICH SCHLEGEL/DMN U.S. Border Patrol Agent Juan Garcia on Wednesday guarded illegal immigrants found loaded onto a pickup north of Laredo. The truck was stolen in Houston and modified to smuggle immigrants.

With House conservatives digging their heels in against the administration's plan to pair a guest worker program with tougher enforcement, Mr. Bush headed to a dusty border crossing in Yuma, Ariz., to make his case while his homeland security secretary offered a similar message 550 miles away in El Paso.

The president's plan to dispatch 6,000 National Guards troops to assist the Border Patrol offers a "turbocharged" boost to the strategy of taming illegal immigration with a mix of added manpower, high-tech surveillance and the guest worker program, Mr. Chertoff said in an interview en route to El Paso.

Acknowledging that the solution "is not going to happen overnight," Mr. Chertoff said the National Guard will serve as a bridge until 6,000 new Border Patrol agents can be hired over the next two years and high-tech equipment such as unmanned drones and satellites are deployed.

With Congress insisting on heightened border security, the fate of Mr. Bush's push for a plan that includes a chance at citizenship for illegal immigrants already here could turn on whether enforcement gains are realized in the near term.

"It helps to have the president out here, seeing the part of the area of the country that one time was overrun by people coming in here, that's beginning to get settled down because of a strategy that's being employed," Mr. Bush said, referring to previous administration policies.

Some enforcement hawks in the House remain unmollified by the president's plan to send the National Guard, as well as by his visit to Yuma on Thursday.

"Press conferences without administration action is, as border ranchers say, 'All hat and no cattle,' " said Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican strongly opposed to the citizenship provision.

The Senate continued work Thursday on legislation that mirrors the president's goals far more than a tough, enforcement-only bill that passed the House in December. The Senate bill pairs increased enforcement with a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for most of the nation's 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants.

Touting the National Guard as a "force multiplier" for the 12,300-strong Border Patrol, Mr. Chertoff said border surveillance will be a "big part" of what the Guard will do.

"They are going to be using their eyes and they are going to be using their binoculars and all the high-tech equipment they have to identify groups of migrants that are crossing," he told reporters at Fort Bliss, where he received a classified intelligence briefing and met with Border Patrol officials.

The Guard troops also will build fencing, vehicle barriers, roads and other items as part of the Border Patrol's plan to gain operational control of the border – a goal that Mr. Chertoff said is about two years from being met.

Homeland Security and Defense Department officials still are discussing where to send the first Guard units, which are expected to be dispatched next month.

The White House on Thursday asked Congress to divert $1.9 billion earmarked for border security upgrades as a partial down payment for the Guard deployment and other programs Mr. Bush outlined to the nation Monday.

The money would be used to increase detention capacity by 4,000 beds and to fund 1,000 of the 6,000 Border Patrol agents the administration pledged to add by 2009, bringing the force to more than 18,000.

Chertoff Tells Border Residents Guard Plan Isn't Unusual (AP)

By Alicia A. Caldwell, Associated Press

The AP, May 19, 2006

FORT BLISS, Texas – Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff assured border residents and officials Thursday that National Guard troops set to deploy in their region would function the same way they have for 20 years.

He said President Bush's plan to mobilize up to 6,000 Guard troops along the country's 2,000-mile border with Mexico was "enhancing or scaling up" operations that have long been in place as a backup for U.S. Border Patrol agents.

Chertoff met Thursday with officials from Joint Task Force North, a Department of Defense group that has for years coordinated training and intelligence missions to help the Border Patrol. His visit came on the same day Bush was touting his immigration plan during a trip to Yuma, Ariz., one of the nation's hottest regions and a heavy traffic area for illegal immigrants.

Before speaking with reporters, Chertoff watched a rescue training operation with Border Patrol and other search-and-rescue personnel. He said the rescue operation is an example of the humanitarian side of Border Patrol duties.

"Those who cross our border illegally put themselves at tremendous risk," Chertoff said.

The Bush administration is trying to build support for a comprehensive immigration overhaul that would provide illegal immigrants a path to citizenship while also beefing up border security.

As part of that effort, Chertoff also tried to assure people that federal and military officials were doing their part to avoid a repeat of the fatal 1997 Marine Corps shooting of an 18-year-old goat herder in a remote West Texas hamlet.

Chertoff said there are never any guarantees that something won't go wrong, but "we are taking every step to ensure that we don't have an unfortunate accident."

Esequiel Hernandez was shot while four camouflaged Marines were working an anti-drug mission along the border near Redford, Texas.

Chertoff also told reporters that assignments for the Guard troops haven't been made, but officials hope to begin deployments across the southern border by June.

Chertoff: Border To See Little Change (LCSN)

By Steve Ramirez

The Las Cruces Sun-News, May 19, 2006

FORT BLISS — Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff said Thursday that not much will change with daily security operations along the border with Mexico, even with the addition of 6,000 National Guard troops.

Chertoff visited the Army post in El Paso on Thursday and met with officials of Joint Task Force North, a Department of Defense unit that has conducted training and surveillance operations along the far West Texas and southern New Mexico border for more than five years. Later Thursday, President Bush was in Yuma, Ariz. to lobby for his border security plan.

"Those who cross our border illegally put themselves at tremendous risk," Chertoff said.

Bush's plan is to mobilize Guard troops along the 2,000-mile border with Mexico by June. Chertoff emphasized that the Guard troops would have no law enforcement authority, and would mostly be used for administrative and surveillance duties along the border.

That would enable Border Patrol agents who are assigned those duties to be on the border patrolling for illegal immigrants. There are not enough agents available to adequately patrol the border, and Chertoff said that is flirting with disaster.

"Various carryover Border Patrol agents put their lives at risk," Chertoff said.

On Thursday, Bush submitted a request for $1.948 billion in emergency funding to help secure America's borders. The request includes funding to hire the first 1,000 of 6,000 new border patrol agents that will be deployed along the north and south borders of the United States in the next two years.

That funding would pay for the resources to train new Border Patrol agents and for the temporary deployment of National Guard troops.

Also requested by Bush is $1.172 billion for the Department of Homeland Security. That would include:

$235 million to hire 1,000 new Border Patrol agents

$50 million for additional recruiting and expanded training capacity at the Border Patrol Academy

$25 million to expand the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center in Artesia

$20 million to hire additional administrative staff members to replace agents who now have those duties.

Another $250 million is earmarked for more security infrastructure, including vehicle barriers, lighting, construction of all-weather roads, and more fencing.

DOJ_NMG_0029008

"It is clear that the situation on the border is an emergency," said Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M. "The Senate has already proven it wants to get serious about moving quickly to shore up the border by passing an amendment to spend $1.9 billion on border infrastructure, vehicles, air assets and other equipment."

Senate Votes To Make English The National Language Of The US (KRT)

By Frank James

Knight Ridder, May 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - In a historic move that came as part of its consideration of a comprehensive immigration reform, the Senate Thursday voted to make English the national language of the United States.

The lopsided 63-34 vote came after an impassioned debate in which the word "racist" was used on the Senate floor to describe the effort.

It was the first time in U.S. history that the Senate had passed such legislation. More negotiations on the final bill are expected, but if a "national language" measure cleared both the Senate and House and was signed by President Bush, it could mean a greater emphasis on the federal government providing its services in English.

The vote also appeared to be an important moment of reaction against multiculturalism in the United States.

In recent weeks, massive protests across the United States by supporters of immigrant rights have pointed to America's increasingly polyglot future. But the Senate's action appeared to be a reassertion of the nation's English heritage.

"This is something that is more significant probably to the American people than it is inside this chamber," said Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., who introduced the bill.

He said solid majorities of Americans, including Hispanics according to recent polls, believe English should be the nation's official language.

"So I believe this is something very significant we'll be doing today that people have talked about now for four decades that I know of, and I believe it should be popular," said Inhofe, who speaks fluent Spanish.

Although the immigration bill passed by the House last year doesn't have a similar provision, there is a separate "official English" bill in the House with strong support.

The Senate's action on Thursday raises the prospect that when Senate and House members meet to iron out differences between their immigration bills, the final product will include an "official English" provision.

Inhofe's legislation had originally called for English to be the nation's "official" language. But in order to draw enough support to pass his amendment, he made a subtle change, calling for English to be the "national" language.

To some, this softened the measure slightly, but supporters said it made little difference.

"We don't care. We think it's basically the same thing. It's a `You say potato, I say potahto' kind of thing," said Tim Schultz, director of government relations of U.S. English Inc. The organization describes itself as dedicated to preserving English's unifying role in U.S. life.

"The Senate has never passed an official English bill that has legally operative force," Schultz said. "This bill actually has some legally operative force that says you don't have - unless it's otherwise provided by law - you do not have an entitlement to government services in another language."

The legislation struck the Senate Democratic leader as invidious - if not in motivation, then in result.

"While the intent may not be there, I really believe this amendment is racist," said Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev. "I think it's directed basically at people who speak Spanish."

The bill's supporters rejected that charge.

Specifically, the bill says that "unless otherwise authorized or provided by law, no person has a right, entitlement or claim to have the government of the U.S. or any of its officials or representatives act, communicate, perform or provide services, or provide materials in any language other than English."

The amendment continues, "If any forms are issued by the federal government in a language other that English ... the English language version of the form is the sole authority for all legal purposes."

Opponents of the bill said that under their interpretation, it would be impossible for government officials to conduct a range of activities, from speaking Spanish in government assemblies to putting up warning signs in both English and Spanish.

Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., for example, said drowning deaths on the Potomac River, which flows through the nation's capital, had gone from more than a dozen in 2004 to none last year. The U.S. Park Service credited the dramatic decline, he said, to warning signs in Spanish and English after it noticed that many drowning victims were recent immigrants.

"So is making this political statement in the Inhofe amendment so important that we wouldn't want to provide safety for those using the Potomac River?" Durbin asked. "It was considered to be a sensible, rational thing to do, print the sign in both languages so that people would be warned of the danger."

Inhofe responded that his bill would not prevent such signs from being printed in other languages in addition to English.

Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., a Mexican-American, asked if the amendment wouldn't prevent senators from speaking Spanish on the Senate floor, as happened when Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales' nomination was being debated.

"That is a preposterous question . . . and not really a suitable question for a serious proposal like this," said Sen. Lamar Alexander, R.-Tenn. "We have a common language because we are a land of immigrants. It should be a simple statement that English is our national language."

In addition to making English the national language, the amendment would increase the proficiency requirements that immigrants would have to demonstrate in English and in U.S. history and government.

Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., introduced an alternative amendment that Democrats who opposed Inhofe's bill hoped would draw enough senators from Inhofe's bill to defeat it. Salazar's proposal said the U.S. government "shall preserve and enhance the role of English as the common and unifying language of America."

That amendment passed by a 58-39 vote. Tim Schultz, director of government relations of U.S. English Inc., said it provided senators who voted against the Inhofe amendment with a chance to show they supported English, too, since it would be "political suicide" to appear to not support English-language dominance in the United States.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., took the Inhofe amendment's supporters to task for increasing proficiency requirements but not providing any additional funding for classes in English as a second language (ESL).

"In my hometown of Boston, there are 16,000 adults on the ESL list waiting to learn English," said Kennedy, practically shouting. "It's two to three years. Anything in the Inhofe amendment to help us help those people who want to learn English? Oh, no. No, no, no. There's nothing."

Senate Votes To Make English Official Language (LAT)

By Michael Muskal And Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — English would be declared the "national language" of the United States under a measure approved by the Senate today, a largely symbolic move that supporters said would promote unity and ensure assimilation by immigrants.

The Senate passed two amendments, one Democratic and one Republican. The Democratic version is more specific on protecting translation and bilingual services.

The GOP-backed amendment, which passed 63 to 34, would allow the government to continue to offer publications and services -- such as bilingual ballots -- in languages other than English. It would require all illegal immigrants seeking to legalize their status in the United States to pass English proficiency tests and would offer guidelines to the Department of Homeland Security for a revised citizenship test.

Heated discussions about the measure dominated the Senate's proceedings, as proponents argued that it was needed to unite the country, while opponents insisted that it would leave the nation more divided.

Designating an official language is important to conservatives, who argue that the government should require English proficiency to ensure that the country does not descend into two societies, and that the 11 million to 12 million undocumented workers now in the United States only become citizens if they can speak the language.

Republicans, led by the principal sponsor, Sen. James Inhoffe (R-Okla.), argued that the amendment is needed because a common language is an important step in allowing people to talk to each other.

"It will help unify us as a nation," said Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.).

But the amendment also creates questions of fairness, said Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), citing the possibility of someone who is legally in the United States but has difficulty with English. Currently, interpreters are provided in many official forums, such as courts. And many states, including California, provide official ballots in different languages.

"Are we going too far?" Durbin asked about the amendment. "What of people who are poor with limited language skills? Are we being fair?"

Republicans insisted that the amendment's language wouldn't prevent needed translations services.

"We are having a great debate on what it means to be an American," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.).

Graham also mentioned the need to respond to recent demonstrations where immigrant rights advocates waved Mexican flags.

"The reason I'm voting for this is that I think it tries to unite us," Graham said, adding that nothing in the amendment prevents the use of interpreters in courtrooms for those whose English is not strong enough. "It doesn't disturb the legal situation in this country. If I thought it did, I wouldn't vote for it."

The Democrats' concerns led to their amendment, which passed 58 to 39.

Earlier, the Senate reconsidered an action it had taken Wednesday to bar guest workers from petitioning on their own for legal status. In a 56-43 vote today, the Senate allowed guest workers to act on their own if the government determines no American workers are available for the job being filled.

At this point, most observers expect the Senate to pass a bill that will have something for everyone: tougher security at the borders; a guest worker provision to allow people to enter the United States legally; and a path for citizenship for many of the estimated 12 million undocumented workers in the country.

Conservatives have called the legalization provisions an amnesty, a term hotly denied by Senate sponsors who stress that those illegally in the country would have to pay fines and learn English before becoming citizens.

President Bush opposes amnesty but has said he supports a comprehensive approach like the one being considered in the Senate.

After the Senate passes its version of the immigration bill, a further battle with House conservatives is expected and that outcome remains unclear.

The House has passed a tougher bill that would make being an illegal immigrant a felony. The bill also increases border security, but it does not have any provision for granting citizenship to undocumented workers in the United States.

Senate Endorses English As National Language In A Symbolic Stand (KRT)

By Dave Montgomery

Knight Ridder, May 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - In an impassioned debate laden with symbolism, the Senate voted 63-34 Thursday to declare English the national language as it continued to debate legislation that would put millions of illegal immigrants on track to U.S. citizenship.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., denounced the amendment as racist and joined other opponents in warning that it could undercut long-established civil rights law. The amendment's lead sponsor, Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., bristled at the assertion, saying the proposal would unify the nation's increasingly diverse population and wouldn't dismantle existing legal protections.

The first Senate vote on the issue in more than two decades illuminated the emotional divisions over Congress' efforts to craft legislation to deal with as many as 12 million immigrants who've entered the country illegally in search of better-paying jobs.

The Senate is considering nearly two dozen amendments on a comprehensive plan to grant legal status to many illegal immigrants and create a temporary guest-worker program to help fill what U.S. business leaders say is a chronic labor shortage. A final vote on the measure is expected next week.

Despite the intensity of the arguments on both sides, it was unclear what impact, if any, Inhofe's English-language amendment would have if it becomes law. Senators further confused the situation by accepting a softer alternative declaring

English "the common and unifying language of the United States." The vote on that one, sponsored by Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., was 58-39.

Salazar, one of three Hispanic senators, whose family settled in Colorado before it became a state, asserted that the Inhofe amendment threatened a return "to the dark days of American history" when Hispanic children were punished for speaking Spanish in school, sometimes by having soap thrust in their mouths.

In response, Inhofe said his proposal would put the U.S. government in line with 27 states and 51 countries that declare English the prevailing language. He called Reid's "racist" tag a ridiculous charge and accused opponents of demagoguery.

"This is your last chance to have English as the national language," he told colleagues.

Supporters suggested that the measure will be especially needed as millions of illegal immigrants and future foreign workers get on track for U.S. citizenship.

Senators said both amendments would be part of negotiations with the House of Representatives to reconcile differences in the two chambers' immigration plans. Asked whether the language amendments would have any effect, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., one of the Senate's leading architects on immigration legislation, responded: "Not that I know of."

The bill already requires English proficiency as a condition for illegal immigrants to obtain permanent legal status and citizenship over an 11-year period. At least 215 million of the nearly 300 million U.S. residents speak English, but the diverse population otherwise constitutes a linguistic melting pot, speaking as many as 176 languages. Spanish is the second most common, spoken by 28 million people.

Conservatives, surging with momentum after winning Senate support to erect at least 350 miles of fencing along the Southwest border, continued their attempt to limit the scope of the guest-worker program and legalization provisions that they denounced as "amnesty" for illegal behavior.

By 50-49, the Senate rejected an amendment that that would have prevented immigrants from getting Social Security benefits that they earned when they were here illegally.

Senators also voted 63-34 to approve an amendment by Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, to add fees that would be charged to illegal immigrants after they step forward to begin the legalization process. The fees - $750 for illegal immigrants and $100 for each dependent - will come on top of the $2,000 fines already proposed in the bill.

Cornyn said the fees are designed to reimburse state and local governments for health care and other services provided to illegal immigrants. The assessment could raise up to $7.5 billion, he said.

Senate Votes To Make English National Language (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — The Senate voted on Thursday to designate English as the national language. In a charged debate, Republican backers of the proposal, which was added to the Senate's immigration measure on a 63-to-34 vote, said that it was equivalent to establishing a formal national anthem or motto and that it would simply affirm the pre-eminence of English without overturning laws or rules on bilingualism.

"We're free to say what we want, speak what we want, but it is our national language," said Senator Lamar Alexander, Republican of Tennessee. The amendment was proposed by Senator James M. Inhofe, Republican of Oklahoma.

It is not clear, though, that the measure will be included in any final bill after negotiations with the House. Shortly after the Inhofe amendment was approved, the Senate also approved a weaker, less-binding alternative declaring English the "common and unifying" language of the nation, on a 58-to-39 vote. The question of which version survives would be decided in negotiations with the House.

The second amendment was proposed by Senator Ken Salazar of Colorado, one of several Democrats who said the Inhofe measure was needlessly divisive and would reduce multilingual government programs.

"We are taking a step backward from the progress America has made," Mr. Salazar said.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said the Inhofe amendment was racist.

"Everybody who speaks with an accent knows that they need to learn English just as fast as they can," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0029012

Under the Inhofe proposal, the federal government is directed to "preserve and enhance the role of English as the national language of the United States of America." It does not go as far as proposals to designate English the nation's official language, which would require all government publications and business to be in English.

Instead, it says government services and publications now offered in other languages would be unaffected. But the proposal declares that no one has "a right, entitlement or claim to have the government of the United States or any of its officials or representatives act, communicate, perform or provide services or provide materials in any language other than English."

Critics said they fear the directive could lead government agencies to scale back their bilingual efforts, cause discrimination against people who do not speak English, disrupt emergency operations in communities with populations of immigrants and have other unintended consequences.

Mr. Inhofe, who is proficient in Spanish from his days as a pilot in Mexico, said critics were exaggerating the potential effects of his plan. His plan would also stiffen the language rules for immigrants seeking to qualify for citizenship under the new legislation, requiring them to demonstrate English proficiency and understanding of American history and government rather than simply to enroll in a language class.

President Bush, speaking about immigration on Thursday on a trip to Arizona, reiterated that under his proposal illegal immigrants would have to learn English. "If you learn English, and you're a hard worker, and you have a dream, you have the capacity from going from picking crops to owning the store, or from sweeping office floors to being an office manager," Mr. Bush said.

The House did not include a similar provision on English in the legislation it passed in December, but there is strong support among House Republicans for such a move.

Despite the clash over language, advocates of a broad immigration measure combining border protection with the possibility of citizenship for qualifying illegal immigrants successfully fought off repeated efforts to alter the measure.

In a crucial showdown, the Senate voted, 58 to 35, late Thursday to reject an amendment that authors of the legislation said would gut their bill by prohibiting temporary workers and many illegal immigrants from seeking permanent residency.

The Senate reversed a decision it made on Wednesday about how temporary workers could apply for permanent residency. The Senate initially voted to require that such applications come just from employers. But some senators said they had misgivings that the requirement would give employers too much power over workers. On Thursday, senators voted to give workers the ability to apply for permanent residency on their own if they have been working in the country for at least four years.

The Senate retained a requirement that a green card be granted only if the Labor Department certified a need for workers.

Immigrant groups praised the reversal. But some advocates for immigrants retained grave concerns about the emerging legislation.

Mary Bauer, director of the immigrant justice project at the Southern Poverty Law Center, said immigrants who participated in existing guest worker programs were frequently exploited. She said the programs failed to ensure that employers offered fair pay and housing.

Senate Votes English US National Language (AFP-Y2)

AFP, May 18, 2006

The US Senate voted to make English the national language of the United States as dispute raged over US immigration law reform.

"The government of the United States shall preserve and enhance the role of English as the national language of the USA," said an amendment to immigration legislation introduced by Oklahoma Republican James Inhofe and approved 63-34.

It requires English to be the language of all official paperwork and business, with some exceptions for voter registration, courts and help during disasters.

The House of Representatives is considering similar legislation presented by Iowa Republican Steve King. It already has the backing of 150 representatives.

"I came here at 14 years old and I had to learn English to make my way in America," said Cuban-born Senator Mel Martinez.

DOJ_NMG_0029013

"That doesn't mean that you forget your roots. That's why I insist that my children learn Spanish."

"We all understand that the language of this country is English and to be successful here you have to learn English," he added.

President George W. Bush's immigration reform plan unveiled Monday proposes placing as many as 6,000 National Guard troops along the southern US border to assist border patrol officers, and creating a guest-worker program providing a possible path to citizenship for some of the estimated 11.5 million undocumented migrants, among other proposals.

Inhofe said that 27 of the 50 US states already call English their official language. The Spanish-speaking US territory of Puerto Rico calls English an official language, along with Spanish.

Inhofe also mentioned that several polls over the past 25 years show more than 80 percent of Americans -- and 77 percent of Latinos -- agree that English should be the official language of the United States.

Senate Votes English As 'National Language' (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jim Vandehei

After an emotional debate fraught with symbolism, the Senate yesterday voted to make English the "national language" of the United States, declaring that no one has a right to federal communications or services in a language other than English except for those already guaranteed by law.

The measure, approved 63 to 34, directs the government to "preserve and enhance" the role of English, without altering current laws that require some government documents and services be provided in other languages. Opponents, however, said it could negate executive orders, regulations, civil service guidances and other multilingual ordinances not officially sanctioned by acts of Congress.

That vote, considered a defeat for immigration-rights advocates, was followed last night by an important victory: By 58 to 35, the Senate killed an amendment that would have blocked eventual citizenship for future immigrants who arrive under a temporary work permit. Democrats and Republicans agreed that the amendment would have destroyed the fragile, bipartisan coalition backing the Senate bill.

The Senate action came hours after President Bush, who visited the border town of Yuma, Ariz., asked Congress to approve a $1.95 billion budget request to deploy National Guard troops and 1,000 additional enforcement agents to the U.S.-Mexico border. Bush also endorsed for the first time the construction of 370 miles of southern border fences to cut down on illegal immigration.

The English language vote continued the conservative turn that a major overhaul of the nation's immigration laws has taken since the Senate began debate this week. The comprehensive legislation would strengthen border security, allow illegal immigrants who have been in the country five years or more to remain and eventually become citizens, and create a guest-worker program.

With approval of a triple-layered border fence Wednesday, the capping of the annual number of guest-worker visas at 200,000 and the English-language amendment yesterday, Republicans say the bill is tougher than the original version and comes closer to what is needed to satisfy many conservatives.

But immigrants-rights groups say their support is teetering. "This is devastating," said Raul Gonzalez, legislative director of the National Council of La Raza, after the English-language vote. "For us, this is a tough issue to bring back to the community."

Only nine Senate Democrats voted for the amendment and one Republican, Sen. Pete V. Domenici (N.M.), voted against it. Maryland's two Democratic senators voted against it, and Virginia's two GOP senators voted for it.

The English-language debate has roiled U.S. politics for decades and, in some quarters, has been as controversial and important as an amendment to ban flag burning.

The impact of the language amendment was unclear even after its passage. The wording negating claims to multilingual services appears straightforward. It also sets requirements that immigrants seeking U.S. citizenship know the English language and U.S. history. The amendment would require more thorough testing to demonstrate English-language proficiency and knowledge of U.S. history and elements of U.S. culture such as the Pledge of Allegiance and the National Anthem.

But its author, Sen. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.), made two last-minute changes that some opponents said would reduce its effect significantly. By stipulating that the English-only mandates could not negate existing laws, Inhofe spared current ordinances that allow bilingual education or multilingual ballots. By changing the amendment to label English the "national language" rather than the "official language" of the country, Inhofe may have lessened its symbolic power.

"In my view, we had it watered down enough to make it acceptable," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), one of the chief architects of the immigration bill.

But pro-immigration groups and some Democrats said the amendment would obliterate executive orders issued by President Bill Clinton that mandated multilingual services and communications in a variety of federal agencies, and could undermine court orders, agency regulations, civil service guidances, and state and local ordinances that call for multilingual services.

Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) called the amendment "racist," and Sen. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.) dismissed it as divisive and anti-American.

Further complicating the picture, moments after approving the Inhofe amendment, the Senate voted 58 to 39 to approve a competing amendment by Salazar. It declared English the "common unifying language of the United States," but mandated that nothing in that declaration "shall diminish or expand any existing rights" regarding multilingual services.

Senators said the conflict will have to be worked out in negotiations with the House.

During his appearance in Arizona with Gov. Janet Napolitano (D) in attendance, Bush offered some tough talk. After touring a porous section of the border that has helped turn Yuma into a hotbed for illegal workers, Bush told a group of federal patrol agents that the White House is committed to sending reinforcements soon, and to significantly expanding security and staff over the next several years.

"It's time to get immediate results," Bush said at the Yuma Sector Border Patrol headquarters.

But administration officials made it clear that the $1.95 billion for the president's border initiative should come out of the same money approved by the Senate in its version of an emergency war spending bill.

That angered Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), who had secured that money solely for capital expenditures, such as fences, sensors and watchtowers, not border security operations. But Gregg said he has "been told rather bluntly" some of those expenditures will have to wait.

The White House said the new budget request by Bush would cover the $750 million-plus Guard deployment, new agents, fences and barriers, five helicopters and two new unmanned surveillance aircraft. The money would be offset by delaying other military purchases, according to the White House.

Illegals Granted Social Security (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, May 19, 2006

The Senate voted yesterday to allow illegal aliens to collect Social Security benefits based on past illegal employment -- even if the job was obtained through forged or stolen documents.

"There was a felony they were committing, and now they can't be prosecuted. That sounds like amnesty to me," said Sen. John Ensign, the Nevada Republican who offered the amendment yesterday to strip out those provisions of the immigration reform bill. "It just boggles the mind how people could be against this amendment."

The Ensign amendment was defeated on a 50-49 vote.

"We all know that millions of undocumented immigrants pay Social Security and Medicare taxes for years and sometimes decades while they work to contribute to our economy," said Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican.

"The Ensign amendment would undermine the work of these people by preventing lawfully present immigrant workers from claiming Social Security benefits that they earned before they were authorized to work in our community," he said. "If this amendment were enacted, the nest egg that these immigrants have worked hard for would be taken from them and their families."

Mr. Ensign was among 44 Republicans and five Democrats who voted to block such payouts.

DOJ_NMG_0029015

"It makes no sense to reward millions of illegal immigrants for criminal behavior while our Social Security system is already in crisis," said Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican. "Why in the world would we endorse this criminal activity with federal benefits? The Senate missed a big opportunity to improve this bill, and I doubt American seniors will be pleased with the result."

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, said it would be unfair to deny illegals the benefits.

"We should not steal their funds or empty their Social Security accounts," he said. "That is not fair. It does not reward their hard work or their financial contributions. It violates the trust that underlies the Social Security Trust Fund."

Within hours, the vote had become an issue in this fall's elections, raised by a Republican challenger to Sen. Debbie Stabenow, Michigan Democrat.

"Instead of protecting the retirement security of Americans who are earning an honest living and abiding by the laws of our country, Debbie Stabenow sided with people who are here illegally and abuse our Social Security system," Oakland County, Mich., Sheriff Michael Bouchard said in a press release. "Allowing illegal immigrants to use their illegal work history as credit towards receiving Social Security benefits shows that Debbie Stabenow has forgotten who she is supposed to be working for in the U.S. Senate."

The Senate also yesterday approved an amendment to adopt English as the nation's official language, while reversing course from the day before on protections for U.S. workers who will face new competition from unskilled immigrant labor under the Senate bill. In addition, senators voted last night to kill an amendment that would have specified that the guest-worker program will not provide visas that would provide a path to citizenship.

On Wednesday, senators narrowly approved an amendment to require a foreign worker to have a job lined up in the United States before applying for a green card. The purpose, supporters say, is to ensure that the job market isn't flooded with foreign workers. Also, it prevents foreign workers from coming to the United States only to wind up unemployed and dependent on public assistance.

But yesterday, the Senate essentially gutted that amendment by allowing foreign workers to apply for permanent residency without having a job lined up.

"What that means is that up to 200,000 unskilled workers a year would become eligible for a green card, regardless of economic conditions, regardless of whether that worker has been actually employed for four years, and most importantly, regardless of whether there are unemployed U.S. workers available to fill those jobs," said Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

VERBATIM (WP)

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

After the Bush administration was accused of secretly aiding militias in Somalia, new White House spokesman Tony Snow demonstrated on Wednesday that he had quickly learned the art of saying nothing.

QUESTION: On Somalia, is the United States working with warlords? Does the United States -- does the Bush administration consider the Somalia government to be responsible for specific genocide against African Christians in Darfur?

SNOW: I'm going to be very precise about this, and I will give you -- because this is one of these things where I want to be careful how I parse it. First, the president has said that his primary responsibility as commander in chief is to keep the American people safe. That's a solemn task. The second thing is, you've got instability in Somalia right now, and there is concern about the presence of foreign terrorists, particularly al-Qaeda, within Somalia right now. In an environment of instability, as we've seen in the past, al-Qaeda may take root. And we want to make sure that al-Qaeda does not, in fact, establish a beachhead in Somalia.

Now, the problem we've seen before in ungoverned -- these are problems that we've seen in other ungoverned regions in the past. The terrorists are going to seek to take advantage of the environment and use that kind of chaos in order to put together camps and, therefore, mount operations around the world. The United States -- we will continue to work with regional and international partners wherever we can to crack down on terrorism, and also to try to prevent its rising.

In the long run, the answer to your concerns is an effective, functional government of Somalia, which, obviously, we do not at the moment have. The United States strongly supports the transitional federal institutions in Somalia because they are trying to reestablish a functioning central government within Somalia that can bring the Somali people out of the period of civil conflict. As I said, I am going to be very careful with the way I say it, and I will say no more.

Q: I appreciate that. One more thing on the genocide, though. Does the president --

SNOW: As I said, I'm not going to make any further comment on Somalia.

Q: What are you really saying?

SNOW: Every word will be in the transcript, every single one.

House Sets Budget Blueprint As Resources Bill Gains Passage (WSJ)

By David Rogers

WASHINGTON -- A $26 billion natural-resources bill cleared the House, even as Republicans won approval of their long-delayed budget blueprint for the new fiscal year that begins Oct.1.

The 218-210 budget vote, which followed a late-night debate spilling into early yesterday morning, ended weeks of frustration for party leaders who had twice pulled back in the final hours for fear of losing. Democrats were united in opposition, but just 12 Republicans broke ranks after moderates won promises that at least $7.1 billion would be added back to President Bush's budget for core job-training, health and education programs.

Passage cleared the way for the first of the 2007 spending measures, and the natural-resources bill adopted last night quickly captured the scrappier tone of the annual appropriations debate.

Just hours after the budget vote, prominent conservatives were back on the floor seeking more money, even including a $500,000 amendment to trap alligators in Florida. In a series of skirmishes with timber and oil interests, environmentalists easily prevailed and enjoyed an election-year surge of support from sometimes as many as 67 or 68 Republicans.

In a closely fought 217-203 contest, Florida Republicans led the successful effort to strip out a business-backed provision that would have lifted decades-old restrictions on exploring for natural gas off the U.S. coast.

Rep. Tom DeLay (R., Texas), the soon-departing former majority leader, watched with evident dismay. "Republicans are voting green tonight," he said.

The floor debate came as the White House and leadership stepped up pressure on House and Senate negotiators to reach agreement soon on an emergency-spending bill to pay for military operations in Iraq and hurricane-recovery efforts on the Gulf Coast.

The administration again warned that Mr. Bush will veto the wartime measure if total spending exceeds his initial $92.2 billion request. The president's chief of staff and former budget director, Joshua Bolten, followed up with a trip to the Capitol where he was promised by the leadership that the veto won't be needed -- and that the bill will comply.

But with the Memorial Day recess approaching, the administration has made the task of cost containment harder by adding about $4.1 billion in demands that must be met under the same $92.2 billion cap.

Just yesterday, for example, the White House sent Congress plans to shift more than $1.9 billion from various defense accounts to pay for new border-security initiatives announced by the president Monday night. The package is heavily tilted toward personnel: $756 million to place 6,000 National Guard troops on borders with Mexico and an additional $410 million to help hire 1,000 border-patrol agents. But the result will be to displace port-security initiatives and capital investments in equipment for border agents championed by many in Congress.

Much of the defense saving proposed to pay for the president's plan has already been claimed by lawmakers to pay for other priorities, such as more armor for troops in Iraq. For example, the administration would save $125 million by canceling its planned Navy purchases of inflatable boats and utility helicopters. In fact, the House and Senate have already assumed cuts of at least 80% from the same procurement money.

The same pattern is seen in the jockeying now over aid to Gulf Coast states recovering from hurricanes Katrina and Rita. The White House initially proposed $19.7 billion, then followed up with an additional $2.2 billion request last month for the Corps of Engineers and levee work in New Orleans. But rather than ask for more money to meet these needs, the administration proposed the cost be largely offset by cutting its proposed contributions to a disaster-relief fund within the Department of Homeland Security.

Critics of this approach argue that the White House is simply postponing having to face up to the cost of the Katrina recovery. And it is also an invitation to Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran (R., Miss.) to try to do the same to offset the added education and development money he wants for the Gulf Coast.

House Conservatives See Wins In Budget (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, May 19, 2006

House conservatives say they scored key spending reform victories in the $2.7 trillion budget approved early yesterday, but major changes are needed to achieve the fiscal discipline promised when Republicans took over the chamber more than a decade ago.

"The budget, while not visionary, was an important first step," said Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican and chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC).

"There's a huge way to go," said Rep. Jeb Hensarling, Texas Republican. "It takes time. ... It's like turning a battleship."

The House approved the blueprint for 2007 spending by a vote of 218-210 after weeks of negotiations between conservative and more liberal Republican factions. Twelve Republicans and all 197 House Democrats who voted opposed the bill, as did the one independent member. Four Democrats and one Republican did not vote.

Mr. Pence said conservatives' greatest victory was holding the line on President Bush's $873 billion limit for discretionary spending, despite what Mr. Pence said was "overwhelming pressure" from the more liberal wing to spend more.

"We stood firm; our leadership stood firm," he said.

Conservatives also highlighted "significant" victories secured from leaders during negotiations, including the promise of votes on line-item veto authority, inclusion of earmark reform in a recently passed lobbying reform bill, and a hard-fought provision that would define and limit "emergency" spending, making it more difficult to add pet projects to such legislation. For 2007, the budget sets that emergency level at $6.4 billion.

Mr. Bush praised the move in the House, and Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, called the budget "a major demonstration of Republicans' commitment to return fiscal discipline."

Conservatives said spending was still too high, that cuts to massive entitlement programs were inadequate and that the plan will raise the national debt.

The bill increases discretionary spending for defense and homeland security while holding other discretionary spending flat. It assumes $228 billion in tax relief and culls $6.8 billion in savings from entitlements programs over five years.

"Even though this budget still spends too much," the reform victories represent "a turning point in the battle over spending," Mr. Hensarling said.

He called the emergency spending item a crucial tool. "There is now at least a stoplight on the road to spending," he said.

Mr. Hensarling this week offered an RSC alternative modeled after the budget House Republicans approved in 1995. Called "Contract With America Renewed," it would have balanced the budget in five years, trimmed $358 billion from entitlement programs, capped annual Medicare growth, eliminated 150 federal programs and restructured three federal agencies. It was approved by 94 Republicans and opposed by 134, including 32 RSC members, even though nearly half of them supported the 1995 budget.

"There's been a shift" in the party since 1995, Mr. Pence said, but he was encouraged that House Republican leaders backed the RSC plan this week.

"This was truly an effort to return to the bold and visionary leadership of the '94 revolution," he said.

Democrats, meanwhile, argued that the budget approved by the House shortchanged key social programs to allow more tax cuts for the rich and increase debt.

"The misplaced priorities demonstrated in this budget are astounding," said Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat.

Future Is Cloudy For House G.O.P. Budget Bill (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — House Republicans won their hard-fought budget victory early Thursday morning as the House voted 218 to 210 to approve a $2.7 trillion spending plan. But the victory may be more symbolic than substantive.

Lawmakers doubt the House blueprint will ever be reconciled with a larger Senate budget. But Republican leaders, who cut a last-minute deal with party moderates to seal the budget vote, were determined to force through a plan that held the line on federal spending as a show of fiscal discipline.

"We successfully worked with conservatives, moderates and appropriators alike to come together as a team and pass a responsible budget that controls spending," said Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, who had made the budget vote a priority since assuming his leadership role this year.

Democrats, who voted unanimously against the plan, criticized both its reductions in spending on social programs and its forecast of a $348 billion deficit in 2007. "The tide of red ink rises forever," said Representative Sander M. Levin, Democrat of Michigan. "This policy is unsustainable and morally indefensible."

The key to the budget approval was a leadership promise to Republican centrists that an additional $3.1 billion would be found for health and education programs as Congress moved through its individual spending bills. Democrats said the moderates had agreed in return for a vague pledge of future money, but Representative Michael N. Castle, the Delaware Republican who led the push for the extra money, said he thought the leadership would follow through.

"We are aware it is a promise, but we had a lot of talks about it and they are pretty committed," Mr. Castle said of the leadership.

Though the agreement resulted in Mr. Castle and others deciding to support the budget, 12 Republicans voted against it, including some lawmakers in difficult re-election fights, like Representatives Heather A. Wilson of New Mexico and Jim Gerlach of Pennsylvania.

By establishing an overall spending limit, the House has made it harder for lawmakers to force politically difficult votes by pushing for more money.

Even before the final concessions on health and education spending, the leadership had stripped issues like Medicare cuts, called for by President Bush, from the spending bill.

Panel Approves Gay 'Marriage' Ban (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, May 19, 2006

The Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday approved a constitutional amendment against homosexual "marriage" in a brief but nasty meeting.

"If you want to leave, good riddance," Chairman Arlen Specter told Sen. Russ Feingold, the Wisconsin Democrat who refused to participate because, he said, the meeting was not sufficiently open to the public.

"I've enjoyed your lecture, too. See ya," Mr. Feingold told the Pennsylvania Republican before storming out of the cramped and ornate President's Room just off the Senate floor.

The committee approved the measure on a party-line vote. Mr. Specter said he opposes the amendment but supports sending it out of committee to the Senate floor, where it is expected to be taken up next month.

Majority Leader Bill Frist, the Tennessee Republican who is viewed as a 2008 presidential contender, said he will take up the matter the week of June 5.

Even backers of the amendment say it's not likely to go far this year beyond becoming a hot-button political issue in the November elections. Because the measure seeks to change the Constitution, it must pass both houses of Congress by a two-thirds majority and then be approved by at least 38 states.

But the sponsor of the amendment says it's about more than just election-year politics.

"If we quit bringing it up here and talking about it here, in effect we leave the decision-making process to the judicial side," amendment sponsor Sen. Wayne Allard, Colorado Republican, told reporters after the committee vote.

"Marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman," reads the measure. "Neither this Constitution, nor the constitution of any State, shall be construed to require that marriage or the legal incidents thereof be conferred upon any union other than the union of a man and a woman."

Vermont Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, the committee's top Democrat, said the marriage amendment was a waste of time for a committee that needs to tackle a wide range of other pressing issues -- from judicial nominations to oversight of the National Security Agency's domestic-spying program.

"I didn't realize marriages were so threatened. Nor did my wife of 44 years," Mr. Leahy said.

Mr. Leahy said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, who is Mormon, has expressed support for polygamists in his home state of Utah.

"I never said that," Mr. Hatch replied. "I know some [polygamists] that are very sincere. ... Don't accuse me of wanting to have polygamy."

Senate Panel OKs Gay-marriage Ban (USAT)

USA Today, May 19, 2006

The Senate Judiciary Committee approved a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage after a shouting match between two senators Thursday. It began when Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., declared his opposition to the amendment, his love of the Constitution and his intention to leave the meeting.

The panel voted 10-8 along party lines to send the measure to the full Senate. It says, “Marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman.” Specter said he opposes the measure but wants it debated. A constitutional amendment needs approval by two-thirds of the House and the Senate, and three-fourths of the states.

Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia reminded a Capitol Hill audience that he does not believe the justices should invoke foreign law in their decisions. But then he had a message for Congress on the topic: Don't try to legislate against it.

“I don't think it's any of your business,” said Scalia, the most outspoken justice, after prefacing the remark with a quip: “Part of my charm is that I always tell people things they don't want to hear.”

Scalia said that as much as he abhors the increasing use by other justices of international law in their decisions — to support rulings such as a ban on the death penalty for juveniles and protection for homosexual relations — he does not want Congress to meddle.

“If you tell us not to use foreign law, I suppose you can tell us not to use certain principles of logic,” he said. A pending resolution by Rep. Tom Feeney, R-Fla., with 83 co-sponsors, says judges generally should not rely on foreign rulings or laws. Feeney was not at the luncheon where Scalia spoke. He said later that the resolution does not tell the court how to rule but attempts to admonish the court when it relies on foreign law. — Joan Biskupic

Members of the House Homeland Security oversight subcommittee criticized the Department of Homeland Security for security gaps. Among the issues: Brian Doyle, the department's fourth-ranking spokesman, was charged with sexually preying on a detective posing as a 14-year-old girl in cyberspace; and the department awarded $25 million in limousine contracts to a Virginia-based company whose owner, Christopher Baker, has numerous felony convictions.

“We're talking about people who were driving the highest people in the department around,” said committee Chairman Pete King, R-N.Y.

Dwight Williams, the department's security officer, said Homeland Security might not have had the authority to look at Baker's criminal past. Gregg Prillaman, the department's personnel director, said the department is still feeling growing pains from merging 185,000 employees from 22 agencies in 2003.

Bid To Revive Offshore Gas Drilling Falls Short In House (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029020

WASHINGTON — A new drive to relax the long-standing ban on offshore energy exploration came up short in the House of Representatives on Thursday.

By a 217-203 vote, a bipartisan coalition of coastal-state lawmakers beat back an effort to exempt drilling for natural gas from the congressional moratorium.

But the vote — closer than last year's 262-157 roll call on a similar measure — reflected the heightened political anxiety over high energy prices in this election year.

It is expected to embolden pro-drilling forces to make a more determined push in coming months to try again to relax the moratorium, which currently prohibits oil as well as natural gas drilling offshore in the Atlantic and Pacific oceans as well as in a wide swath of the eastern Gulf of Mexico.

One proposal that might stand a better chance would let states opt out of the moratorium in return for a share of drilling royalties. Another would expand energy exploration in the eastern gulf.

In a statement, the American Gas Assn. said the vote signaled growing support for lifting the moratorium for natural gas exploration on the outer continental shelf. That increasing support will add "tremendous momentum to other legislative efforts to get an [outer continental shelf] bill through the House and Senate," the statement said.

Environmentalists expressed relief, but Sierra Club Executive Director Carl Pope warned, "We must remain vigilant."

Thursday's vote came during consideration of the Interior Department's annual spending bill, which has included a moratorium since the early 1980s. New energy exploration is prohibited except in parts of the Gulf of Mexico and areas off Alaska. A presidential order also prohibits drilling in most coastal waters until 2012.

Farm and manufacturing groups hard hit by high fuel costs joined the energy industry in pushing to relax the drilling ban. Although high gasoline prices have generated attention, natural gas prices have also soared. Winter average natural gas bills for Southern California Gas Co. residential customers were 20% to 25% higher than last winter, according to the company.

Rep. John E. Peterson (R-Pa.), who led the effort to relax the moratorium, argued that natural gas could be explored without risking an oil spill, an assertion that anti-drilling lawmakers disputed.

Peterson also warned that high fuel costs threaten to drive more U.S. companies overseas. "Folks, this is about the economy of America," he said.

Rep. Ralph Regula (R-Ohio) added: "I don't think it's fair to 280 million Americans to deny them access to an asset that belongs to all of them."

Coastal-state lawmakers, including a number of pro-business Republicans, argued that the measure could endanger their states' tourist economies.

"I can assure you that people don't go visit the coast of Florida or the coast of California to watch oil wells," said Rep. Sam Farr (D-Carmel).

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger joined several other coastal-state governors, including Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, in urging their state delegations to oppose weakening the moratorium. In a letter, Schwarzenegger called the state's coastline "an integral part of our culture, our heritage and our economy."

Offshore drilling has been a significant issue in California since a 1969 oil platform blowout off the coast of Santa Barbara caused extensive environmental damage.

In the California delegation, Republicans Mary Bono of Palm Springs, Ken Calvert of Corona, John Campbell of Irvine, David Dreier of San Dimas, Elton Gallegly of Simi Valley and Ed Royce of Fullerton joined all the Democrats in supporting the continued moratorium. With the exception of Rep. Richard W. Pombo of Tracy, who did not vote, all other Republicans were opposed.

Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands), the influential chairman of the House Appropriations Committee who last year favored keeping the moratorium, was among those who changed his vote Thursday. Jim Specht, a Lewis spokesman, said his boss was moved by the increase in energy prices.

"As gas prices have continued to increase, he has become convinced that we must find new sources to fix the long-term problem of increasing supply," Specht said.

Vote In House Seeks To Erase Oil Windfall (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — In an attempt to revoke billions of dollars worth of government incentives to oil and gas producers, the House on Thursday approved a measure that would pressure companies to renegotiate more than 1,000 leases for drilling in the Gulf of Mexico.

The measure, approved 252 to 165 over the objections of many Republican leaders, is intended to prevent companies from avoiding at least $7 billion in payments to the government over the next five years for oil and gas they produce in publicly owned waters.

Scores of Republicans, already under fire from voters about gasoline prices, sided with Democrats on the issue. Eighty-five Republicans voted to attach the provision to the Interior Department's annual spending bill. The measure would require adoption by the Senate, which is less reflexively supportive of the energy industry than the House, and will almost certainly provoke intense opposition from oil and gas producers.

In a raucous debate on the House floor before the vote, Democrats argued that energy companies were shortchanging taxpayers at the same time that soaring prices for crude oil and natural gas had pushed industry profits to record highs.

"Oil companies want to play Uncle Sam for Uncle Sucker," said Representative Edward J. Markey, a Massachusetts Democrat who co-sponsored the amendment with Representative Maurice D. Hinchey, Democrat of New York. "Today, we must put an end to these senseless giveaways."

Republican leaders, who had hoped to avoid a vote on the issue, agreed that companies should not be getting lucrative incentives in times of high prices. But they insisted that the government had no right to reopen valid leases that it signed years ago with offshore drillers.

"These leases were valid legal contracts signed between the government and these companies in good faith," said Representative Mike Simpson, Republican of Idaho. "The Congress and the government should keep their word when they sign a contract."

In a separate defeat for energy companies, the House voted 279 to 141 to reject a provision that would lift a 25-year ban on oil drilling in coastal areas outside the western Gulf of Mexico.

Lawmakers also voted 217 to 203 to continue the prohibition on drilling just for natural gas.

The lopsided vote to rescind royalty incentives, which surprised many of the proposal's own sponsors, came three months after The New York Times disclosed that companies drilling in publicly-owned waters of the Gulf of Mexico were set to escape royalties on about $65 billion worth of oil and gas over the next five years.

The windfall stemmed in large part from a major error in about 1,000 leases that the Clinton administration signed with energy companies in 1998 and 1999.

To encourage drilling and exploration in water thousands of feet deep, the government offered to let companies avoid the standard royalties, usually 12 percent or 16 percent of sales, for large quantities of the oil and gas they produced.

But the incentives, which have been expanded in recent years by the Bush administration and by Congress, were supposed to stop as soon as prices for oil climbed above $34 a barrel and prices for natural gas climbed above $4 per thousand cubic feet.

For reasons that are now being investigated, the Interior Department omitted the restriction in 1,000 leases it signed in 1998 and 1999. In addition, the Bush administration offered extra "royalty relief" to companies that drilled very deep wells in very shallow water.

The lost royalties are just beginning to hit the government's bottom line.

The Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, estimated in March that the royalty incentives could cost the government $20 billion over the next 25 years.

On top of that, at least one oil company, the Kerr-McGee Corporation, has sued the Bush administration in a test case to expand the "royalty relief" far more. If the Kerr-McGee lawsuit is successful, the G.A.O. estimated, the government could lose a total of $80 billion over the next 25 years.

The amendment approved on Thursday would try to force oil companies to revise their contracts and agree to pay full royalties when energy prices climb above the "threshold levels."

To give the government bargaining power, the bill would also prohibit the Interior Department from awarding any new leases to companies that refuse to revisit their leases.

The industry is itself divided on the issue. Some of the big integrated oil and gas companies, like Exxon Mobil, have already declared that they see no need for incentives in today's environment of high prices.

But many smaller producers are determined to retain their incentives and to fight for even more.

"Forcing renegotiations of contracts would be changing the rules in the middle of the game and would raise serious questions about contract law," said Dan Naatz, vice president for federal resources at the Independent Petroleum Association of America, a trade group that represents independent producers. The Bush administration did not take a position on the House measure, though senior officials have repeatedly said they were powerless to change valid contracts.

It is unclear whether the Senate will go along with the provision. But Democratic lawmakers have already been pushing.

Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon, filibustered for five hours last month in an attempt to attach a similar proposal to major spending bill. Senator Diane Feinstein, Democrat of California, has drafted a bill similar to the House measure.

Auto Makers Support Alternative-Fuel Measures (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The chief executives of Detroit's Big Three auto makers made clear to Congress what they want -- and what they think they might get -- from the government: financing for the pumps and other support needed to encourage Americans to use more ethanol and other gasoline alternatives.

In exchange, the leaders of Ford Motor Co., General Motors Corp. and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler division promised to produce millions more vehicles that can run on domestically produced alternatives to petroleum.

The executives, meeting in back-to-back sessions with Republican and Democratic leaders of the House and Senate, didn't push for any particular piece of legislation. Rather, they said there were a lot of good ideas on the table.

"We recognize that there are problems, and we are going to work as partners" with the auto makers, said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.). "Perhaps in the last many years we have not worked together as well as we should have."

Aware that voters want Congress to do something to address high gasoline prices, the auto executives were determined to project a positive attitude aimed at solving the problem. The companies dismissed talk of a government bailout despite GM's and Ford's financial problems. And they focused on their support for alternative fuels, rather than their opposition to higher fuel-economy standards.

"We talked about our companies' commitment to developing and introducing more products with newer technology to help drive energy security here in America," said GM's chairman and chief executive officer, Rick Wagoner.

Because U.S. auto makers sell so many gas-guzzling pickup trucks and sport-utility vehicles, Detroit lags behind its foreign competitors in the overall mileage of its fleet. Demand for profitable but low-mileage SUVs has dropped, and GM and Ford have been hurt as they try to stem big losses in their North American auto operations. Detroit also is far behind Honda Motor Co. and Toyota Motor Corp. in production of hybrid vehicles that run on both electricity and gasoline.

But the domestic companies are ahead in production of "flexible fuel" vehicles that can run on E85, a fuel that is 85% ethanol and 15% gasoline. GM, Ford and Chrysler have produced five million of these cars, which provide the companies with special credits needed to meet federal fuel-economy standards. Because E85 is available at only about 600 of 170,000 U.S. gas stations, few of these vehicles ever run on anything but gasoline. Another problem: Because of water condensation in the pipelines that transport much of the nation's oil and gasoline, ethanol must be shipped by truck or train.

The trio of executives -- Ford Chairman and CEO Bill Ford Jr., Chrysler Chief Executive Tom LaSorda and Mr. Wagoner -- had planned to meet with President Bush yesterday, but that meeting was postponed.

In their Capitol Hill sessions, the auto companies said that for ethanol to make a real impact on cutting U.S. oil consumption, flexible fuels must be available at 20% to 30% of the nation's gas stations. Better availability of ethanol could also help car sales, as domestic auto makers would have a product available for customers concerned about rising gasoline prices. In the past, ethanol has been more expensive than gas, but that equation is changing as gas prices climb.

The trio also endorsed the goal pushed by the Energy Future Coalition -- which includes farmers, environmental groups and others -- for the U.S. to produce 25% of its energy through renewable fuels by 2025.

The CEOs tried to steer clear of discussions about higher fuel-economy standards. The Bush administration has asked Congress for authority to restructure the passenger-car standard, a move that could help Detroit by setting lower standards for larger cars. And auto makers are cautiously optimistic that a Bush-crafted plan would increase overall mileage targets only modestly. But auto makers worry that lawmakers could attach a provision requiring much higher mileage.

Automakers Push Higher Use Of Ethanol (USAT/AP)

USA Today, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Detroit automakers pressed Congress on Thursday to help make ethanol fuels more widely available, saying that would be an immediate step toward lessening U.S. dependence on foreign oil.

CEOs of General Motors, Ford Motor and DaimlerChrysler's Chrysler Group appealed to lawmakers for incentives to increase the number of gas stations offering blends of the corn-based fuel.

"If we want a game changer, and a game changer in very short term and in big numbers, then ethanol is a very good play for this country," said Ford's Bill Ford.

The executives endorsed a plan to have renewable fuels meet 25% of the nation's transportation energy needs by 2025. GM's Rick Wagoner said the automakers want to be leaders "in this historic shift from energy consumption."

Other topics discussed during their day on Capitol Hill included health care, trade and currency manipulation by other countries.

"We really tried to make it clear to them we weren't interested in coming asking for help for the domestic auto industry," Wagoner said. "We were interested in talking about things that would improve the competitiveness of the U.S. economy."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said they had productive discussions on several subjects, including "the importance of energy independence being a long-term goal for this country."

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said lawmakers and auto executives were confident they could work together to "bring back the American automobile industry where we think it should be and they think it should be."

The executives arrived in vehicles powered by ethanol and decorated with images of corn stalks. They said they had produced 5 million vehicles capable of running on ethanol blends and planned to bring an additional 1 million to the market this year.

The obstacle to widespread benefit of flexible-fuel vehicles, which can run on a blend of up to 85% ethanol and 15% gasoline, is finding ethanol pumps. Industry officials estimate that about 685 of the 165,000 fueling stations in the USA offer ethanol blends.

Pump prices top $3 a gallon in many places. President Bush has sought an increase in the availability of ethanol and alternative fuels, more research for hybrid vehicle batteries and elimination of the cap on tax credits for the purchase of hybrids.

The auto executives plan to meet in June with Bush.

The administration also has asked Congress to give it the authority to change mileage rules for passenger cars, a move that could lead to higher requirements.

Wagoner said they did not have extensive talks about fuel economy standards.

Big 3 Leaders Lobby On The Hill (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

Washington Post, May 19, 2006

Leaders of Detroit's Big Three automakers came together on Capitol Hill yesterday in an uncharacteristic display of unity to build support for ethanol fuel and to rally legislators behind the financially strapped industry.

The U.S. automakers have had difficulty getting their message across in Washington in the past year as their profits have sunk and they have come under increasing assault in their home market by rivals from Japan, South Korea and Europe.

In a day-long series of meetings, the auto executives met with House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.); House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.); and Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), a key supporter of the industry. In the Senate, they met with Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and a number of Democratic senators, including Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, and Debbie Stabenow and Carl M. Levin of Michigan.

The automakers had been scheduled to meet with President Bush this week, but he postponed the gathering until June 2. Officials at the auto companies said yesterday that the June 2 meeting has also been postponed.

At the end of the day yesterday, the executives said they would join a coalition of other business and political leaders dedicated to providing 25 percent of U.S. energy needs from renewable sources by 2025.

General Motors Corp. Chairman Rick Wagoner said the nation was undergoing a historic shift in energy consumption, adding that greater use of ethanol was "the best opportunity right now" to reduce the nation's dependence on foreign oil. "We need to pursue all options," he said. Ford Motor Co. Chairman William C. Ford called ethanol a "game-changer" for the industry.

By the end of the year, the three auto companies say, they will have 6 million vehicles on the road capable of using a corn-based fuel called E85. But drivers have virtually no place to get the fuel. Of the 180,000 service stations nationwide, about 600 sell the ethanol blend. The U.S. auto companies have been battered by rising gasoline prices in the past year. Profits at GM, Ford and DaimlerChrysler AG, which owns Chrysler, are heavily dependent on sales of large pickup trucks and sport-utility vehicles.

Ford, Wagoner and Chrysler chief executive Thomas W. LaSorda repeatedly said they did not come to Washington for handouts and said there was no talk in the meetings of a government bailout for the industry. Congressional staff members said the automakers also brought up the need to reform the nation's pension system. Lawmakers expressed some support for the industry. Reid said lawmakers would work with the companies to "bring back the American automobile industry where we think it should be."

Detroit has a big agenda in Washington, and it has long sought a more proactive role for the government. Among the automakers' concerns are the escalating cost of providing health care and pensions for hundreds of thousands of workers and retirees. The companies have also asked for subsidies for research and development and more tax credits to prop up demand for alternative-fuel vehicles.

Japanese automakers now lead in the development of gas-electric hybrid technology. The U.S. companies also have complained that they have limited access to foreign markets and have accused China and Japan of manipulating their currencies for trade advantage.

David E. Cole of the Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor said the automakers were trying to build a consensus message. "Individually, they tend to talk about different things at different times, and that really has not been very helpful," Cole said.

Harley Shaiken, a professor at the University of California at Berkeley, said lawmakers tend to minimize the importance of the Detroit automakers, which still hold 60 percent of the U.S. market.

"It is rather remarkable that this is even necessary," he said of yesterday's meetings. "In the mid-'50s, you would almost have the Congress go to Detroit, versus the Big Three executives come to Washington. There would have been no need to remind anybody about how central the American auto industry was."

Carlos Gutierrez (CSM)

By David T. Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, May 19, 2006

Secretary of Commerce Carlos Gutierrez was Thursday's guest. Here are excerpts from his remarks: On whether recent signs of rising inflation threaten the US economy:

"Everything suggests that we should be able to get through this period without seeing inflation increase to a point where it would become a problem." On speculation he will be named Treasury secretary:

"I love serving the president in the job I am doing and serving the country. I haven't given it much thought." On the importance of immigration reform:

"This is probably the social/domestic issue of our time and unless we tackle it, confront it, solve it in a comprehensive way, we are just going to let the problem get bigger and more complex." On whether anti-immigrant rhetoric from some Republicans will hurt the GOP with Hispanic voters:

"There are a lot of values that attract Latinos and Hispanics to the Republican Party.... The leader of the Republican Party has believed in this issue and has been a staunch proponent of comprehensive reform from the time he was governor of Texas.... [T]he symbol of the Republican Party is President Bush and that is what I believe will attract Latinos and Hispanics to the Republican Party." On whether the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate reform law has worked:

"Overall it has been a positive thing. Where we need to be very vigilant ... is with small business [so we don't put these businesses] at a competitive disadvantage."

Shares Continue Falling On Interest Jitters (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

Wall Street extended its losses yesterday, a day after an inflation scare sent the Dow Jones industrial average on its biggest one-day drop in three years and put the Nasdaq composite index in the red for 2006.

Stocks drifted in a narrow range through most of the session but took a sharp turn lower in the last hour of trading, when a market already nervous about interest rates was unsettled by comments from William Poole, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, who reiterated that the central bank's future rate increases would depend on economic conditions.

Concerns that rising inflation would send rates higher propelled the stock market sharply lower Wednesday, carrying the Dow down 214 points in the process.

Even before Mr. Poole's comments were reported on news services, investors were clearly not in a mood to buy. Data showing a moderating economy had little impact on trading, including an unexpected drop in the Conference Board's index of leading indicators and an upswing in jobless claims.

"This market is just scared right now," said Ryan Larson, an equity trader at Voyageur Asset Management. "People are taking money off the table and no bets are being made because no one knows what to do right now."

The Dow dropped 77.32 points, or 0.69 percent, to 11,128.29. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index lost 8.51 points, or 0.67 percent, to 1,261.81, and the Nasdaq sank 15.48 points, or 0.7 percent, to 2,180.32.

Although yesterday's mild economic data did little for stocks, it brightened the bond market's outlook for interest rates. The yield on the 10-year Treasury note plunged to 5.06 percent, from 5.14 percent on Wednesday. Its price rose 21/32 to 10016/32.

The catalyst for the previous day's frenzied selling was a stronger-than-forecast jump in consumer prices that ignited concerns that the Fed might keep raising interest rates amid signs that record energy costs were beginning to seep into other parts of the economy.

Some analysts say higher interest rates are inevitable given the strength of the global economy, and the market's recent retreat was indicative of investors' overblown expectations that the Fed was nearly done with its rate tightening. The uncertainty now lies in whether the Fed will sacrifice economic growth to impede escalating prices, or risk inflation to aid the economy's expansion.

Mr. Poole, who is not a voting member of the Fed's policy-making Federal Open Market Committee, also noted that it was possible, though not likely, that the Fed would cut rates or move beyond the current level for the benchmark federal funds of 5.25 percent.

"I think investors are trying to figure out how much damage the Fed may need to do to growth for inflation pressures to be arrested," said Stuart Schweitzer, global markets strategist for J. P. Morgan Asset and Wealth Management. "It's possible that the Fed has already done enough, but it's looking increasingly unlikely."

Mr. Larson of Voyageur added that while crude oil was off its record high of $75 a barrel, traders could soon grow fearful about the upcoming hurricane season, after last year's storms battered Gulf Coast refineries. Oil futures reversed course after two days of selling, with a barrel of light crude adding 76 cents, to $69.45, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0029026

The Sears Holdings Corporation said it swung to a profit on improved results at its Kmart and Sears department stores. Sears surged $17.89, to $155.85.

Burger King Holdings rose 50 cents, closing at $17.50 in its trading debut after pricing its initial public offering at $17 a share.

Declining issues overtook advancers late in the day and were ahead by five to three on the New York Stock Exchange, where the volume of 1.77 billion shares lagged the 2.1 billion shares that changed hands Wednesday.

Stocks Extend Their Descent As Bonds Climb (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

After plunging 214.28 points on Wednesday, the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell another 77.32, leaving it down 4.4% since its skid began last Thursday.

Comments from the presidents of two regional Federal Reserve banks helped prolong worries that inflation is worsening despite repeated Fed interest-rate increases, and the uncertainty made investors even less eager to own stocks.

The industrial average fell 0.69% to 11128.29, the lowest finish in a month. It still is up 3.8% this year.

The Nasdaq Composite Index is down 1.1% for 2006, at its lowest point since November. Yesterday it fell 0.71%, or 15.48 points, to 2180.32. Its eight-day losing streak is its longest since 1994.

But bond investors didn't share stock investors' fears. Treasury bonds rose sharply, driving the yield of the 10-year Treasury note down to 5.065%. Some investors appeared to be shifting money to bonds from stocks, seeking bonds' relative safety and trying to take advantage of the recent rise in bond yields, which makes bonds more lucrative.

Stocks initially rose, too, as investors saw signs of a slowing economy, which would hold down inflation. Reports showed a rise in jobless claims last week and a decline in the index of leading indicators -- which includes things such as new orders that presage economic growth.

But Richmond Federal Reserve Bank President Jeffrey Lacker said higher-than-expected recent inflation readings make it "less likely" that the Fed will be able to pause in its interest-rate increases at its next policy meeting, June 28 and 29. St. Louis Fed President William Poole said he couldn't rule out either a rate cut or a bigger-than-normal rate increase at that meeting. He said such extreme moves were unlikely, but his uncertainty seemed to rattle stock investors.

"Once the forces of inflation get into the economy it is hard to wring them out," said Todd Clark, director of stock trading at San Francisco money-management and brokerage firm Nollenberger Capital Partners. Investors fear the Fed might be forced to raise rates so high that it provokes a recession.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.67%, or 8.51 points, to 1261.81, up 1.1% this year.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated1; bond prices gained2. The 10-year Treasury note rose 24/32, or $7.50 for each $1,000 invested. The 30-year bond was up 1 18/32 to yield 5.168%.

The dollar was mixed3. Late in New York, the currency traded at 111.04 yen, up from 110.94, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2821 from $1.2750.

Leading Indicators Reinforce Idea That Growth Is Slowing (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — An important gauge of the nation's future economic activity dipped in April, once again suggesting slower growth in the months ahead.

The Conference Board, a private research group, reported Thursday that its index of leading economic indicators fell by 0.1 percentage point, to 138.9, last month. Economists were predicting a small rise. In March the index climbed by 0.4 percentage point, to 139.

The index predicts economic activity three to six months in the future.

Economists said the decline reinforced the Federal Reserve's forecast that economic growth, which has been brisk, would most likely moderate to a more sustainable pace in the coming months.

In the first quarter of this year, the economy grew at a 4.8 percent pace, the fastest in two and a half years. Analysts expect growth will slow to a pace of 3 percent to 3.5 percent in the second and third quarters.

Lynn Reaser, chief economist at Bank of America Investment Strategies Group, said: "The index is flashing not a recession but a slowing in growth, which is a welcome sign. Unfortunately, we are not seeing an accompanying moderation in inflation yet."

The decline in the index comes as the housing market is slowing, energy prices are high and consumer confidence is sagging. April's index reading was weighed down by, among other things, a drop in building permits, a dip in consumer expectations and a rise in claims for jobless benefits.

The Labor Department said the number of people signing up for jobless benefits rose sharply last week, mainly because of the lingering effects of a partial government shutdown in Puerto Rico, which has now been resolved. New applications filed for unemployment insurance shot up by a seasonally adjusted 42,000, to 367,000, for the week ended May 13. That was the highest level of claims since early in October.

The Federal Reserve raised interest rates last week for the 16th time in two years, an effort to keep inflation from accelerating.

Fed policy makers left future rate decisions open as they grapple with whether the economy is more likely to slow or high energy costs are more likely to ignite price and wage rises. If policy makers think slower growth is the more probable course, then a pause may be favored. If inflation is more likely, another rate increase may be in store.

After the Labor Department reported Wednesday that consumer prices increased by 0.6 percent in April, many economists said the odds were now increasing that the Fed would bump up rates again at its next meeting on June 28 and 29.

Housing Cool-Down Is 'Orderly,' Fed Chief Says (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

Confirming what home buyers suspected and real estate sales figures have indicated for months, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said yesterday that the U.S. housing market was showing clear signs of cooling off.

Bernanke said the slowdown is "moderate" and "orderly" and pointed to the overall strength of the economy.

"We're seeing slowing in sales, slowing in starts. There also seem to be signs that prices are not rising as quickly as they have been for the past few years," Bernanke said in response to questions after a speech in Chicago, Bloomberg News reported.

His comments came as Freddie Mac announced that the average rate on a 30-year, fixed mortgage hit 6.6 percent this week, the highest in almost four years. Rising long-term rates have contributed to the housing industry's slowdown. The Commerce Department this week said construction of new homes fell 7.4 percent in April, to an annualized pace of 1.85 million homes. It was the third straight monthly decline.

Analysts were divided about Bernanke's assessment. Peter Morici, an economist at the University of Maryland's Robert H. Smith School of Business, said Bernanke's comments were "right on."

Morici said he saw the rise in long-term interest rates as healthy, with the economy moving away from its dependence on the housing market and "hyper-consumption" fueled by people taking out loans against their houses. "The housing market is going to come back to earth," he said.

Economist Dean Baker of the Center for Economic Policy and Research expressed concern that rising interest rates were squeezing homeowners who took out interest-only and adjustable-rate mortgages. Even when interest rates were at historically low levels, Baker said, stretched buyers were taking out exotic loans to get into pricey homes.

Baker said a rising inventory of homes in the Washington region could fuel a double-digit price decline if interest rates climb higher. Condo prices could fall by as much as 30 percent, and prices of single-family homes could drop by as much as 15 percent, he said.

Former Fed chairman Alan Greenspan echoed Bernanke's analysis in a speech last night to the Bond Market Association in New York. "The boom is over. We can say that with some confidence," Greenspan said. But, he added, "there is no evidence that prices are going to collapse."

Greenspan predicted that the U.S. market was more likely to follow the path set by housing markets in Australia and Britain, where "prices just flattened out."

The consequences for the broader economy are not yet clear, Greenspan said. But if rising home prices and cheap home equity loans have been fueling consumer spending, as many economists think, "there is going to be some slowing of consumption," he said.

Bernanke did not address whether the Fed would pause in its campaign of raising short-term interest rates. Last week, the central bank raised its benchmark rate for the 16th consecutive time since June 2004 in response to continuing signs of inflationary pressures.

On Wednesday, the Commerce Department reported that April consumer prices rose at the highest rate in three months, leading many analysts to believe that the Fed would continue raising short-term rates. Richmond Fed President Jeffrey M. Lacker said in a speech yesterday in Norfolk that the Fed is less likely to suspend its interest-rate increases in light of higher consumer prices.

The shifting housing market has left sellers and buyers alike uncertain about their next steps.

"On the one hand, you feel like you can sit back and wait. On the other hand, you feel like you don't want to because of the interest rates" said John Booth Babcock, a transportation planner from Arlington who had considered buying but has now decided to wait. "No matter what you think the situation is, there's no comfort level."

Coming Down To Earth (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

Um, wasn't the stock market supposed to bounce back after Wednesday's big drop?

We shouldn't read too much into a couple of days' movements in stock prices. But it seems that investors are suddenly feeling uneasy about the state of the economy. They should be; the puzzle is why they haven't been uneasy all along.

The rise in stock prices that began last fall was essentially based on the belief that the U.S. economy can defy gravity — that both individuals and the nation as a whole can spend more than their income, not on a temporary basis, but more or less indefinitely.

To be fair, for a while the data seemed to confirm that belief. In 2005, the trade deficit passed $700 billion, yet the dollar actually rose against the euro and the yen. Housing prices soared, yet houses kept selling. The price of gasoline neared $3 a gallon, yet consumers kept buying both gas and other items, even though they had to borrow to keep spending (the personal savings rate went negative for the first time since the 1930's).

Over the last few weeks, however, gravity seems to have started reasserting itself.

The dollar began falling about a month ago. So far it's down less than 10 percent against the euro and the yen, but there's a definite sense that foreign governments, in particular, are becoming less willing to keep the dollar strong by buying lots of U.S. debt.

The housing market seems to be weakening rapidly. As late as last October, the National Association of Home Builders/Wells Fargo housing market index, a measure of builders' confidence, was still close to the high point it reached last summer. But on Monday the association announced that the index had fallen to its lowest level since 1995.

Finally, there are preliminary indications that consumers, hard-pressed by high gasoline prices, may be reaching their limit.

The National Retail Federation, reporting on a new survey, warns that "while consumers have seemed resilient in the face of higher energy costs, a tipping point may soon be in sight."

I can't resist pointing out that the Bush administration's response to the squeeze on working families has been, you guessed it, to accuse the news media of biased reporting.

DOJ_NMG_0029029

On May 10 the White House issued a press release titled "Setting the Record Straight: The New York Times Continues to Ignore America's Economic Progress." The release attacked The Times for asserting that paychecks weren't keeping up with fixed costs like medical care and gasoline. The White House declared, "But average hourly earnings have risen 3.8 percent over the past 12 months, their largest increase in nearly five years."

On Wednesday Treasury Secretary John Snow repeated that boast before a House committee. However, Representative Barney Frank was ready. He asked whether the number was adjusted for inflation; after flailing about, Mr. Snow admitted, sheepishly, that it wasn't. In fact, nearly all of the wage increase was negated by higher prices.

Meanwhile, the return of economic gravity poses a definite threat to U.S. economic growth. After all, growth over the past three years was driven mainly by a housing boom and rapid growth in consumer spending. People were able to buy houses, even though housing prices rose much faster than incomes, because foreign purchases of U.S. debt kept interest rates low. People were able to keep spending, even though wages didn't keep up with inflation, because mortgage refinancing let them turn the rising value of their houses into ready cash.

As I summarized it awhile back, we became a nation in which people make a living by selling one another houses, and they pay for the houses with money borrowed from China.

Now that game seems to be coming to an end. We're going to have to find other ways to make a living — in particular, we're going to have to start selling goods and services, not just I.O.U.'s, to the rest of the world, and/or replace imports with domestic production. And adjusting to that new way of making a living will take time.

Will we have that time? Ben Bernanke, the chairman of the Federal Reserve, contends that what's happening in the housing market is "a very orderly and moderate kind of cooling." Maybe he's right. But if he isn't, the stock market drop of the last two days will be remembered as the start of a serious economic slowdown.

Adam Smith Growls (WSJ)

Stocks continued their weeklong plunge yesterday, selling off again at the end of the day on more inflationary fears. The way to understand this washout -- knocking 4.4% off the Dow -- is that Adam Smith is giving the U.S. financial establishment a warning.

We're using our favorite moral philosopher here as a proxy for the ruthless discipline of financial markets. They can be brutal in punishing economic mismanagement, and for several days Mr. Smith has been growling that the Federal Reserve and its easy-money cheerleaders on Wall Street and in Washington need to sober up, or there will be far worse to come. The press is calling this an "inflation scare," but for those who want to know how markets respond once a real inflation settles in, we suggest reading an economic history of the 1970s. It isn't pretty.

The 4.4%-cold shower may even prove to be beneficial if it changes the psychology in elite political and economic circles. For the last year especially, they've been ignoring signs of incipient inflation, first by trusting in Alan Greenspan's assurances, later pointing to low long-bond rates, or any other excuse to avoid facing up to a world awash in dollar liquidity and soaring gold, oil and other commodity prices. (See gold's run nearby.) This is the kind of psychology that often takes hold at this stage of an expansion, with everyone enjoying the good times and desperately afraid the Fed will spoil the fun.

But the lesson of the past 30 years is that the economic pain is far more severe the longer the Fed stays too accommodative and lets pricing pressures build. The consumer price index reading that triggered Wednesday's selloff is a lagging indicator, after all, the kind that tells you inflation is here only after it has already arrived. As Paul Volcker -- the man who finally broke the 1970s inflation -- once noted, the actual inflation data comes in months later but spot commodity prices are a real-time signal. Investors have finally begun to doubt the Fed's happy talk about a "pause" in raising interest rates or that inflationary pressures are "contained."

All of which suggests that Mr. Greenspan's successor as Fed Chairman, Ben Bernanke, is facing a rough passage. He's arrived at a Fed that has clearly made a mistake in letting inflation expectations build and has been very slow to admit it. The only questions now are the magnitude of that mistake and of the resulting financial casualties.

It's worth noting that while stocks fell yesterday, bonds rallied after comments by a couple of Fed officials that inflation may be gathering steam. "I pay a lot of attention to inflation expectations," said St. Louis Fed President William Poole, which makes us wonder what he and his colleagues have been paying attention to the last year.

The sooner Mr. Bernanke shows that he understands the problem, and has the fortitude to do something about it, the fewer casualties there will be. Sooner or later Adam Smith will take over if Mr. Bernanke doesn't.

Bush Plans To Nominate Bank Expert To SEC Panel (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

President Bush will nominate Kathleen L. Casey, a Senate aide and expert on banking and securities law, to the five-member Securities and Exchange Commission, the White House said yesterday.

The announcement came four days after Cynthia A. Glassman said she did not intend to serve a second term as a commissioner and will leave after her term ends June 5. That will open one of the three Republican seats on the commission.

Casey, whose term would extend to June 2011, must be confirmed by the Senate. She is the staff director and counsel for the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee. Earlier, she was chief of staff and legislative director for the committee's current chairman, Sen. Richard C. Shelby (R-Ala.).

The committee must consider the nomination before it can go to the full Senate. In a statement, Shelby said Casey is "eminently qualified to be a commissioner and will have my full support as she moves through the nomination process."

Casey has a bachelor's degree from Pennsylvania State University and a law degree from George Mason University.

A Right Turn Holds Perils For Bush (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

As they watch President Bush's approval ratings tumble, conservative activists are offering a surefire strategy for presidential recovery: Bush should move to the right and "rally his base."

There's one problem with this approach: It could do the president's party far more harm than good, even within its own ranks. The conservative view ignores the roots of the president's difficulties in the disaffection of moderate voters who are more concerned with performance -- or the lack thereof -- than ideology.

The Post-ABC News poll released this week found the president with a 33 percent approval rating and suffering losses in esteem almost everywhere. Conservatives are by no means his biggest problem.

In January 2005 Republicans who described themselves as conservative gave Bush an astonishing 94 percent approval rating. The new Post-ABC survey, conducted May 11 to May 15, put Bush's approval rating among conservative Republicans at 76 percent, down 18 points.

But the poll found that among moderate Republicans, the president's approval rating had declined 31 points, from 88 percent in January 2005 to 57 percent now. Recent surveys by Gallup and the Pew Research Center also point to losses among moderates.

Bush has lost even more ground among moderate independents. The Pew surveys found Bush's approval rating in this group dropping from 48 percent in January 2005 to 22 percent last month.

The middle of the middle is going south on Bush.

This creates a conflict between Bush's immediate political interests and the interests of many Republican candidates on the ballot this November.

Bush's best shot at a quick jolt upward in his approval ratings is among conservatives in his own party, who are already more inclined to support him than anyone else and might come home in response to a presidential tilt rightward. But Rep. Chris Shays, a moderate from Connecticut, noted that many of the House Republicans most endangered in this fall's election -- himself included -- are moderates who would be hurt if his party and his president moved farther right.

"His going to the right to move up from 35 percent is not going to help us out," Shays, speaking for his fellow moderates, said in an interview. "It doesn't help me out for him to appeal to his conservative base."

Shays, who is at the top of Democratic target lists, was reelected with 52 percent of the vote in 2004 and faces the same opponent, Democrat Diane Farrell, this year. Shays is the one being judged this fall, not Bush. "Obviously, he should be true to himself and his principles," Shays said of the president, "but if he is looking for issues, he should be looking for issues that are helpful to those of us who are targets."

On the other hand, many of the House's staunchest conservatives -- such as Mike Pence of Indiana and John Shadegg of Arizona -- want Bush to emphasize conservative themes, including deep domestic spending cuts. But a frustrated Shays notes that conservatives urging the president to appeal to his base represent solidly Republican districts.

"Pence's election isn't in jeopardy," he said. "Shadegg's election isn't in jeopardy."

Rep. Tom Davis of Virginia, one of his party's shrewdest political strategists, keeps a sharp eye on the attitudes of moderate and moderately conservative suburbanites of the sort he represents. Davis sees a potential contradiction between one of the GOP's strategic imperatives -- to fire conservatives up enough to get them to the polls this fall -- and the other imperative of stopping defections among middle-of-the-road voters.

"Harder-core Republicans are disillusioned right now, but they're not going to vote for Democrats and Nancy Pelosi," Davis said in an interview, referring to the House Democratic leader. "It's your softer, more moderate Republicans who are now jumping ship."

Davis never likes to bad-mouth his party's electoral chances, and he notes that the six months between now and Election Day "are an eternity." He worries, though, about issues that could boost turnout in the base but drive away less-ideological voters. "To move right may fix part of the problem," Davis said, "but it could exacerbate the other problem."

Bush prospered in 2004 by turning out the Republican base. But the times are very different in 2006. Machiavelli noted that the successful politician "adapts his mode of proceeding to the qualities of the times" and warned against politicians who "remain obstinate in their modes." In 2006 one could imagine Machiavelli counseling moderation to the Republican Party. You wonder how Machiavellian the Republicans' conservative wing will let the party be.

McCain And The Base Truth (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

All successful politicians must have at least some talent for telling lies about what's in their hearts and convincing people that it is the truth. But Sen. John McCain has a unique genius for telling the truth from his heart and making people believe that he is lying. And these people are his supporters! They admire him as a straight-talking truth-teller, and they forgive him for taking positions on big issues that they find repellent, on the grounds that he doesn't really mean what he says.

"Oh, he has to say that to get the Republican nomination," explain many Democrats with a girlish crush on the charming, funny, intelligent and heroic Republican senator from Arizona, and/or a special loathing of their party's own star, the junior senator from New York. "That" might refer to McCain's strong right-to-life stand on abortion, or his strong support for the war in Iraq, or his recent rapprochement with Jerry Falwell. They admire McCain as a straight shooter among sneaks, a truth-teller amid bull artists. They long, understandably, for some fresh air in the fetid atmosphere of politics. And McCain delivers that.

Even better, he delivers the fresh air without the cloying aroma of piety. Or, rather, he can be pious, but the piety is diluted and made bearable by the knowing wink. He makes jokes at his own expense. That's attractive in a politician, but sometimes it is nothing more than a party trick. McCain goes further: Like Bob Dole, he makes jokes -- mean jokes, in public -- about others. That takes more wit and more guts. McCain is a good kind of cynic: He shares his cynicism with the rest of the class. The cynicism makes the piety bearable, while the piety makes the cynicism acceptable.

Journalists love him, of course. His frankness flatters us, and he flatters us more directly as well. Visiting a big convention of journalists last fall, McCain joined a group that was gambling at the hotel casino until the wee hours. In his speech the next morning, he cleverly nailed his audience and himself by declaring that he was happy to be among "my base."

McCain's "base" (poli-talk for his most loyal supporters) is actually larger than that. In a presidential run, he would have the votes of millions who disagree with him on major issues but like him anyway. His challenge is to get the votes of more people who agree with him. The fact that his base of support is people who disagree with him explains both why so many ideological soul mates dislike him and why they might support him anyway. It's because they think he is their best shot at winning. Thus, if McCain becomes president, it will be the result of a cynical calculation by people who don't like him even though they agree with him, on top of support by people who disagree with him but admire his lack of cynicism.

In his pre-campaign for president, McCain is delivering four university graduation speeches. He gave two already, at Falwell's Liberty University and at Columbia University. His words to these two different audiences are quite similar (a brilliantly McCainian combination of laziness and courage). Read the texts . They are marvelous: witty, self-mocking, above all interesting . When McCain climbs onto an old warhorse like, say, filial obligation, you really do not know where he might take it. It would be wonderful to have a president whose speeches weren't a duty to listen to.

But how many Americans and Iraqis should die so that we can enjoy entertaining presidential speeches? If you support the war, that is a nonsense question. If you don't, it is more pressing. McCain is admirably clear: He supported going to war and he supports continuing it until . . . well, not so clear, but longer than most Democrats would care for. His discussion of the Iraq war in the Liberty University address is a bit of a cop-out. It's mostly about how we all have the duty to express our beliefs and the right to disagree.

This discussion is also a guarded reference to McCain's famous feud with Falwell. In 2000 McCain called Falwell an "evil influence" on the Republican Party. That won McCain a lot of the points he now enjoys among people to his left. He needs some to his right. But if the subject is "evil," it's not good enough simply to say that we all have the right to disagree. And "evil" is not too strong a word for Jerry Falwell. Respectful disagreement may be possible with James Dobson, and "silly" or "senile" might be a more apt description of Pat Robertson. But Falwell is a man who promoted tapes during the Clinton administration accusing the president of murdering political opponents. Sure, he has the right to say whatever he wants. But that is not the key point about Falwell. McCain made the key point six years ago. Today he ducks it.

McCain is like another larger-than-life character in American politics: Colin Powell. Both men are so admirable and so likable that people convince themselves against all evidence that Powell or McCain must agree with them on the big issues. In Powell's case, the theory always was that he was speaking truth to power from within, while telling the necessary public fibs to hold on to the privileged position this service required. With McCain, something more magical is going on. He says plainly that he is for the war, or against abortion choice, and people hear the opposite. It's a gift, I guess.

'Forgotten Hurricane' Haunts La. Survivors (USAT)

By Joyce King

USA Today, May 19, 2006

CAMERON PARISH, La. — Though we're days from a new hurricane season, Hurricane Rita's devastation to the coastal towns of southwest Louisiana is still fresh nearly eight months later. A boat rests on the side of a stretch of road I'm traveling that was once beautiful Holly Beach. Cars, as if launched head first, are embedded upright in the sand.

In Hackberry, men feverishly make repairs to St. Peter the Apostle Church. I stop in Johnson's Bayou, where Rita came barreling ashore. Nearby, the town of Cameron was annihilated: 90% of homes were severely damaged or destroyed. Over and over, I meet people who talk of living through "the forgotten hurricane." Hurricane Katrina still gets most of the news media attention and emergency funding. Many Rita victims are still awaiting federal housing funds to rebuild. Those in Federal Emergency Management Agency trailers are again vulnerable to the next storm, and any hopes of rebuilding the community are quickly fading.

Longtime residents Kirk and Julie Burleigh show me around. "A lot of people aren't coming back. They don't want to go through this again," Kirk says. Before Rita, Cameron Parish had a population of about 9,600. Today, half of the residents have returned.

Julie says neighbors told her they will rebuild someday, but not until after they monitor the new season, which begins June 1. People are frightened. Help is slow to arrive. New codes make rebuilding prohibitive.

Rep. Charles Boustany, R-La., complains that his district is “bleeding” population from a loss of jobs and bottled up funding in Washington. Cameron Parish's economy has relied on oil, fishing and its wildlife refuges. All sustained significant damage. Only some oil-related businesses are operational. Calcasieu Parish, where Lake Charles is located, had more than 50% of its housing damaged or destroyed. The aviation industry suffered a $90 million blow. Unemployment has tripled from 5.3% in 2004 to 16.2% today.

When FEMA announced plans to stop paying for 10,000 evacuees in Lake Charles hotels, the city picked up the tab. In Houston, where some 150,000 Katrina evacuees remain, many have found jobs, housing and a better educational system. Conversely, thousands of Rita survivors believe they're on their own. So they wait. Weather experts predict this period of “above normal activity” might last two more decades, meaning several major hurricanes will hit the USA.

“It's like you're forgotten,” Julie Burleigh says. She and Kirk hear a common question from outsiders, one never far from their mind: Is Cameron ready for another round? Without federal help soon, the question won't carry much meaning. After all, with each passing day, there will likely be fewer people to ask.

New Orleans In A Tempest Over 'Deluge' (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, May 18 -- He gets asked at campaign stops, in candidate forums and televised debates.

What about the book, Mayor?

"Bogus" he replies, or "total distortions." And sometimes he gets mad.

Rarely has a work of history figured so prominently in a mayoral election here or anywhere else. "The Great Deluge," by Tulane University historian Douglas Brinkley, covers a week of the Hurricane Katrina debacle and depicts New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin as too vain, too stunned and too paranoid to have been effective in the city's crisis.

Relying in part on accounts from Nagin's political rivals, the book has been characterized by his supporters as a campaign attack timed to sink his bid for reelection on Saturday. "The Great Deluge" began appearing in bookstores this month.

Brinkley, the author of several best-selling history books, says the book was meant to coincide not with the election but with the June 1 onset of hurricane season.

Brinkley said that nobody was misquoted and that Nagin should blame himself that the book has become such a prominent part of the campaign.

"Nagin denounced the book without reading it," Brinkley said Thursday. "If he had ignored it, I don't think it would have become an issue. People love the food fight -- it was suddenly the Tulane professor from Uptown versus the mayor. It got framed as a square off.

"It only made my sales jack up," Brinkley said. "My publisher is very happy with Mr. Nagin."

On Saturday, voters here will elect Nagin or Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu in a race that many analysts say is too difficult to call because of the displacement of voters. One poll does show Landrieu with a substantial lead.

Many voters say there appear to be few substantial differences in the approaches the two men have outlined for recovery. Both candidates have rejected calls for abandoning some neighborhoods that are considered extremely vulnerable to another inundation. Both have acknowledged that the city's rebuilding will depend in part on federal aid.

The leadership abilities of the candidates have become a central issue instead, and that is one reason Brinkley's account of Nagin has proved to be a sensitive subject.

It is not the first time that Brinkley has found himself -- and one of his books -- in the middle of an election debate. His 2004 book on John F. Kerry's experience in Vietnam, "Tour of Duty," provoked questions about the Democratic senator's time in the war. It was criticized by Republicans for overstating Kerry's record and prompted a rebuttal book, "Unfit for Command."

Brinkley's latest work on Katrina is sweeping and only sparsely mentions Nagin. But when it does, it is often in disparaging terms. When Nagin showers too long aboard Air Force One, Brinkley likens him to a "primping teenager." When Nagin was considering a mandatory evacuation, Brinkley writes that he was "hesitating like a school boy afraid to receive his report card."

Even Nagin's angry radio appearance during the crisis, in which he advised the federal government to "get off your [behinds] and do something" -- remarks that many here found inspiring, given the gravity of the situation -- is described as pure theater because Nagin knew federal troops were on the way.

"It was the perfect, phony, cause-and-effect gambit," Brinkley wrote.

The book says Nagin broke down and cried after the radio interview and that his communications director, Sally Forman, was worried.

"I tried to get him to calm down," she is quoted as saying. "I kept saying, 'It's OK, It's OK.' "

Forman quit the administration earlier this year when her husband, Ron Forman, entered the mayoral race. He finished third in the primary.

Landrieu also figures in the bleak portrait of Nagin. In the book, Landrieu finds Nagin holed at the downtown Hyatt.

"All Nagin would say, staring straight ahead, as if in a trance, was 'We're looking for a command and control structure,' " Brinkley wrote.

Nagin questioned Brinkley's motives.

"I could see the venom coming out of him," Nagin told the New Orleans Times-Picayune, describing Brinkley's appearance on a local television show.

Brinkley defended using some of Nagin's political rivals as sources, saying that they were present for many of the events he was reporting on. He also conducted a 47-minute interview with Nagin as the book was being completed.

Acknowledging that the book had become "kind of a carnival side attraction" to the campaign, Brinkley said he did not know what effect it will have on the election. The book came up in a nationally televised debate between Landrieu and Nagin this week on MSNBC, and is on the cover of the Gambit Weekly newspaper here.

At one bookstore near the university, booksellers said it is a hot item not only of commerce but of conversation, as well.

"My sense is that people who would have been voting for Nagin are reading it and they're on the fence now," said Denise Bonis at Octavia Books, who had read an excerpt in Vanity Fair. "I thought I had a pretty good idea of what happened that week. I was a little surprised."

Nagin Says Win Would Send Racial Message (WT)

By Brian DeBose

The Washington Times, May 19, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- Mayor C. Ray Nagin says a victory in tomorrow's election will send a message on race that "will echo throughout America."

"This election will say in spite of American prejudice, I was able to attract votes from all races and classes and move forward with the process of healing," said Mr. Nagin, who has hinted that whites locally and nationally are working to unseat him from the post, which blacks have held for nearly 30 years.

Mr. Nagin questions the source of "$6 million" that opponent Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu has raised, hinting at an effort to return the city to the "good-old-boy system," and says Hurricane Katrina exposed the soft underbelly of race and class in America.

"I have said this before publicly that if this had been South Beach Miami or Orange County, I'll bet you a dollar that the response would have been different," said Mr. Nagin, who was elected in 2002 with 85 percent of the white vote.

Mr. Landrieu, whose father was the city's last white mayor, says this election provides an opportunity to deal with race and class in a unique way nationally.

He said the tightly contested runoff election will turn on whether "African-Americans [will] vote for white politicians and will whites vote for black ones."

"You can't win anymore with an all-black vote or an all-white vote," Mr. Landrieu said.

Voters here, regardless of whom they support, agree that there are a lot of lessons to be learned about race, class and politics from the aftermath of Katrina.

Morris Reid, Democratic political analyst and former adviser to the Clinton administration, said the real story is whether black New Orleanians will stand up and take advantage of the voting rights that their parents and grandparents fought and, in some cases, died to get.

"These [black] folks were relying on a government and a democracy that they didn't participate in, and when they went to cash the check at the political bank, it was bankrupt because they never deposited any money there," Mr. Reid said, referring to the slow hurricane response by local, state and federal officials.

For Robert Richardson, 52, a construction maintenance worker and resident of the Ninth Ward, a largely black neighborhood crushed by the flooding, Mr. Nagin has become part of the problem and is in bed with the developers.

"There is no national conspiracy; it's a land grab, not a white power grab. It's a shame when things like this come down to race, and I hate to say it, but it looks like Landrieu might be the one who will work with us," Mr. Richardson said.

Jimmie Perry, 57, a former utility systems operator-turned-real estate investor, said he owes his newfound wealth and entrepreneurial spirit to Mr. Nagin.

"He made it possible for us to get loans working with the banks and opening the doors, cleaning up the permits process; you know it used to be that only whites and friends of the mayor knew about the property-tax sales; now we know, and we can go and buy the homes," Mr. Perry said.

"Mitch is a nice guy and I've always supported him, but I think they want Mitch because he will be more accommodating."

Mr. Reid, who said he expects a Landrieu victory, said Mr. Nagin and Mr. Landrieu are exploiting the issue to their political advantage but missing the point.

"All things being the same, if Katrina had never happened, Ray Nagin would not be campaigning for the Ninth Ward, he would be campaigning for the people who voted him in the last time," he said.

Mr. Nagin in 2002 campaigned as a reformer who would clean up the city hall left behind by outgoing Mayor Marc Morial. Mr. Morial, whose father was mayor in the 1980s, was popular with blacks and now heads the National Urban League.

Mr. Landrieu, who is brother to a sitting senator and a state district court judge, is the son of former Mayor Moon Landrieu, who opened the doors of politics to blacks for the first time in 1970.

A Tulane University and WGNO-ABC poll released Tuesday showed Mr. Landrieu with the edge, getting 48 percent, and Mr. Nagin with 38 percent. But the poll has a 4.7 percentage point margin of error because 14 percent of respondents were undecided and it does not include displaced voters.

New Orleans Mayor's Rival Stresses His Political Savvy (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, May 18 — The question for the candidate at a debate last week was simple, spoke to this city's chronic dysfunction and begged a short, sharp answer.

How, he was asked, should New Orleans stamp out patronage in contracts? But the response from Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu came back intricate, replete with pledges to different groups, and capped by a politician's formula: "We've got to have a process in place."

Mr. Landrieu, the son of one of Louisiana's first political families, inherited such careful talk as a birthright. He may well take over the mess that is now New Orleans after the mayoral election Saturday, becoming the man in the spotlight on whom the hopes of thousands of struggling residents here and in hurricane-forced exile will be pinned.

Yet for many, Mr. Landrieu, 45, has been defined more by his family (his sister Mary is a United States senator and his father was mayor) than by his own amiable but mostly unobtrusive presence in government, for 16 years as a state legislator and for the last two as Louisiana's second-ranking official.

He would be the first white mayor of New Orleans since his father, Moon, held the position a generation ago, though some conservative whites here swear they will never vote for a Landrieu, and he cannot succeed Saturday without strong black support.

If Mr. Landrieu wins, he will offer the classic prescriptions for governing that have been his armor in debates with an unpredictable opponent, Mayor C. Ray Nagin. Unlike the mayor, Mr. Landrieu rarely throws away the script.

"Figuring out what the problem is, figuring out what the obstacles are, finding high common ground, getting a plan in place, putting a strategy in place, then actually making it happen," he told a breakfast crowd at a downtown restaurant on Thursday, reciting his plan for a struggling city. It is that promise of competence Mr. Landrieu has used as a battering ram against an incumbent he accuses of incarnating the opposite.

His campaign amounts to a complicated balancing act, in which conservative whites must be drawn in without scaring off the healthy share of black votes he received in the April primary, nearly 24 percent. Only about 30 percent of the white vote went for Mr. Landrieu, though; the remainder went to white candidates mostly more conservative than him, and yard signs for those whites who lost have not, by and large, been replaced by Landrieu signs.

Still, Mr. Landrieu needs the bulk of these white votes — as much as three-quarters of them — and so he does his best to distance himself from the liberal associations that his family name carries. He also frequently counters accusations that he will bring back supporters of a past mayoral regime derided by many whites, that of Marc Morial, now president of the National Urban League, whose administration has been the subject of a continuing federal corruption inquiry.

A significant part of his strategy is to increase turnout among residents who have returned to New Orleans, particularly because Mr. Nagin is likely to get most of the absentee votes of those evacuees who are living elsewhere. To that end, Dana Peterson, Mr. Landrieu's campaign manager, said the campaign was using telephone banks and canvassing every evening.

"We're being really aggressive," Mr. Peterson said. "We're sending out volunteers door-to-door in the nonflooded areas." He said more than 2,000 people had volunteered to help the campaign.

Mr. Landrieu, who enjoys a huge cash advantage over Mr. Nagin, also recently won the endorsement of The Times-Picayune of New Orleans. The newspaper's editorial said his strengths uniting the city across racial lines outweighed his weak private-sector experience and his possible difficulty as a Democrat in dealing with a Republican White House and Congress.

Hoping to deflect the suspicions of conservatives, Mr. Landrieu often says ideology has nothing to do with being a good mayor.

"This job is will you, can you, how are you going to get the garbage picked up?" Mr. Landrieu said Thursday. "You can't, as mayor, ordain that you want something to occur, and then leave." In a recent television commercial, he patrols the fleets of flooded-out cars under the highways here, still not removed after nine months, and proclaims, "Ray Nagin had the power to get this job done and didn't do it."

For nearly half a century, voters here have been putting Landrieus in office, and the name has come to represent an easily recognized basket of political principles: biracial coalitions, moderation on social issues like abortion and ample attention to the problems of the poor. His father's breakthrough tenure at City Hall in the 1970's, when blacks were first brought into decision-making, still defines the terms of governance here. The younger Mr. Landrieu makes no apologies for inheriting that vision, in which running New Orleans becomes an exercise in bringing its disparate factions together.

Those factions are now more separated than ever, with racial undercurrents infusing the politics of rebuilding after Hurricane Katrina. Mr. Nagin has made an explicit pitch for racial solidarity, counting on getting as many black votes as possible with his now-famous promise that New Orleans will once again be a "chocolate city." Mr. Landrieu pointedly offers an opposite vision.

"If you want to think about what the city of New Orleans needs to be, and needs to look like, all you've got to do is go sit in the Lusher schoolyard," Mr. Landrieu began his talk Thursday, referring to one of the few successful public schools here. "The school is diverse, I mean aggressively diverse," he continued. "It's Hispanic, African-American, Vietnamese, white, you have parents that are high socioeconomic, mid, and they are all there together." Repeatedly, Mr. Landrieu emphasizes the equal amounts of white and black votes he received in the April primary.

As a state legislator, he helped reconcile the viewpoints of law enforcement officials and advocacy groups, and then sponsored legislation that led to the closing of the state's most notorious prison for youth.

It is this ability to work within the political system that he is now touting, at a time when his city is thoroughly dependent on help from the outside. "What we need right now is someone who has vast political experience, someone who can communicate to the nation," he said at the debate last week. "Somebody who can bring Republicans and Democrats together, somebody who can really get things done."

RUDY TURNS RIGHT INTO HEART OF DIXIE TO BACK PAL (NYPOST)

By Maggie Haberman, Post Correspondent

The New York Post, May 19, 2006

ATLANTA - Looking to shore up his right flank, Rudy Giuliani embraced former Christian Coalition head Ralph Reed as the man with "the right ideas" at a campaign fund-raiser yesterday in Georgia.

With maverick Sen. John McCain emerging as his main GOP competition for 2008, the socially moderate ex-mayor played up leadership as he boosted Reed in a close primary race for lieutenant governor.

"He's a person that has the right ideas and the right direction and the right goals," Giuliani said as he headlined a luncheon of more than 250 people in a part of the country where many believe he'd face a tough time in a GOP primary.

Later asked by reporters about how his past pro-gay rights, pro-choice stands mesh with Reed's positions, Giuliani said, "We are a broad party. I agree with Ralph on many things."

"There are going to be some things I disagree with him on . . . in Ralph's case I know him, and I think he's going to be a really effective leader," he said.

Asked about his stand on gay marriage, Giuliani - who lived with a gay couple during his divorce - told reporters that marriage should remain between a man and a woman.

"Inviolate, and everything should be done to make sure that's the case," said Giuliani, but he reiterated his support for civil unions.

In The South, Giuliani Stumps For A Friend (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

ATLANTA, May 18 — Former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani glided over his support for gay civil unions and declared heterosexual marriage to be "inviolate" on Thursday as he helped raise money for a former leader of the Christian Coalition, Ralph Reed, who is in a tough fight to become lieutenant governor of Georgia.

For Mr. Giuliani, who is considering a run for the presidency in 2008, the political foray into the South allowed him to pocket a campaign chit from Mr. Reed that could be useful if the former mayor tries to build a national coalition that includes religious-minded Republicans, who are a core part of Mr. Reed's voter base.

Mr. Giuliani was warmly received at a Reed fund-raiser here, though advisers to Mr. Reed noted that most of the donors were politically moderate business people, and that a truer test of Mr. Giuliani's appeal among more conservative Southerners would come in rural counties.

The Giuliani-Reed embrace came five days after another possible Republican candidate in 2008, Senator John McCain of Arizona, appeared alongside the Rev. Jerry Falwell and invoked God several times in a speech at Liberty University, an avowed evangelical institution in Virginia.

Georgia Republicans said on Thursday that Mr. Giuliani's visit had been scheduled weeks ago, though they acknowledged that both he and Mr. McCain were seeking to make inroads to the Southern and religious wings of the party.

Mr. Giuliani did not mention Jesus Christ or his childhood interest in becoming a priest, but instead preached from the bible of fiscal conservatism. Aligning himself closely with the Bush administration, he called for more federal tax cuts as a means of creating jobs and stimulating the economy, and argued that tax cuts would invigorate business and ultimately yield greater total tax receipts, thereby helping to reduce the deficit.

"President Bush understands that, the Republican Congress understands that, Ralph understands that, and the Democrats don't," Mr. Giuliani told the audience of about 250 people. "We can take a big step back, either state by state or nationally. And this election in 2006 is going to determine if we keep seeing our economy grow, or we take a real step backwards."

Introduced by Mr. Reed as "a great conservative," Mr. Giuliani urged Republicans to look toward the political landscape with optimism and to enthusiastically support President Bush, whose approval ratings are low.

"We shouldn't be going to the American people with our heads down," Mr. Giuliani said. "We should be going with our heads up — our policies work."

In a brief news conference afterward with reporters from Atlanta and New York, Mr. Giuliani acknowledged his support for some gay rights while reiterating past comments that "marriage should be between a man and a woman." Gay marriage has been in the news in Georgia this week after a judge struck down, on procedural grounds, a state constitutional amendment banning such unions.

"I believe that marriage should be between a man and a woman, that it should remain that way, it should remain that way inviolate, and everything should be done to make sure that that's the case," Mr. Giuliani said in response to a reporter's question. "But I also believe that you should allow for the protection of legal rights for people who are gay and lesbian."

Mr. Giuliani said it was not unusual for him to support a former leader of the Christian Coalition like Mr. Reed.

"On some of these social issues, we have disagreements that are very, very broad," Mr. Giuliani said. "It's no different than any other candidate — there are things I agree with, things I disagree with — but in Ralph's case, I know him, and I think he's going to be a really effective leader."

Asked if he would seek Mr. Reed's help in a possible run for president, Mr. Giuliani replied, "When you run for president, you ask for everybody's help."

Mr. Reed declined to answer reporters' questions about whether he could support Mr. Giuliani for president, given that they disagree on abortion rights and gay rights, or if he thought the former mayor would make a good president.

"We're really focused on 2006," Mr. Reed said, adding, "I learned a long time ago an 80 percent friend is not a 20 percent enemy."

Mr. Reed is competing for the Republican nomination against a veteran state senator, Casey Cagle, who has piled up endorsements from many legislative leaders and elected Republicans. Both men are campaigning aggressively, with the primary on July 18.

Mr. Reed has drawn fire from opponents for his ties to Jack Abramoff, a onetime Reed mentor and a former Washington lobbyist who has confessed to trying to bribe members of Congress. Mr. Reed has not been accused of any wrongdoing.

Only at the end of his remarks did Mr. Giuliani hint that his social liberalism could either be a blessing or a curse for a Southern candidate such as Mr. Reed. "I'll support your opponent if it helps," Mr. Giuliani said. "Sometimes I don't know which way it cuts, you know."

Democratic Activists Seek To Punish Their Own For Backing Bush (BLOOM)

By Heidi Przybyla

Bloomberg, May 19, 2006

May 19 (Bloomberg) -- Democratic activist groups that mounted an aggressive campaign against President George W. Bush in the 2004 election have a new target: Democrats who support his policies.

A loose network of organizations, ranging from women's groups to Internet bloggers, is pressuring incumbents such as Senator Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut and Representatives Jane Harman of California and Melissa Bean of Illinois, in some cases by backing insurgent candidates in primary elections.

The groups charge that these and other Democrats have been too supportive of Bush on issues like Iraq and trade, and say they're trying to energize voters disillusioned with a party that has failed to draw clear distinctions with Republicans.

With Democrats holding a wide advantage in public-opinion polls six months before the congressional elections, the party must define its identity, said David Sirota, a Democratic activist.

``If Democrats are really about to get into power, now's the time to let them know what they need to be for," said Sirota, who wrote ``Hostile Takeover," a book about political corruption.

The organizations and Web logs that identify themselves as the party's ``progressive" wing include MoveOn.org, a coalition of groups that raised $60 million and enlisted 100,000 volunteers in the 2004 elections; DailyKos, a blog that averages 20 million visitors a month; and Democracy for America, a political action committee with 500 affiliates.

DOJ_NMG_0029039

The issues they're promoting include setting a timetable for withdrawing troops from Iraq, building environmental protections into U.S. trade agreements and cracking down on what they say is price-gouging by oil companies.

Angry Public

And they're tapping into public anger. Polls show that more than half of Americans say the U.S. shouldn't have invaded Iraq, and most think the Bush administration has no clear plan for keeping down energy prices.

Ed Kilgore, vice president for policy of the Democratic Leadership Council -- a Washington-based group that says it represents the party's ``vital center'' -- cautions that the primary challenges risk undermining the Democratic Party just as it may be poised to regain control of Congress.

``At a time when we're desperately trying to take back Congress and win a majority of governorships, I'm not sure it makes a whole lot of sense for Democrats nationally to be wasting money on primary challenges,'' Kilgore said.

Connecticut Challenge

In Connecticut, Lieberman, the Democrats' 2000 vice presidential nominee, is facing a challenge in the August primary from Ned Lamont, a 52-year-old Greenwich businessman stressing his opposition to the Iraq war. A recent poll by Rasmussen Reports, an independent survey company in Ocean Grove, New Jersey, showed about a third of Democratic primary voters backing Lamont, the great-grandson of legendary J.P. Morgan & Co. Chairman Thomas W. Lamont, over Lieberman, 64, a supporter of Bush's war policies.

On May 16, the National Organization for Women announced its endorsement of Lamont, and MoveOn.org said yesterday it will poll its 50,000 Connecticut members in an online ``primary'' on May 25 to determine whether they want to back Lieberman or Lamont.

In California, Harman, 60, a six-term House veteran, has a rare primary challenger in Marcy Winograd, 52, president of Progressive Democrats of Los Angeles. Winograd has criticized Harman's support for the Patriot Act, which expanded law-enforcement authority to fight terrorism, and the Iraq war. Winograd's supporters temporarily blocked the state party's endorsement of Harman, although the incumbent ultimately received the backing for the June primary.

Teamsters and Trade

In Illinois' eighth district, the Teamsters union is withholding support for one-term incumbent Bean, 44, over her support for the Central American Free Trade Agreement.

In Washington state, incumbent Senator Maria Cantwell, 47, faces several challengers in a September primary whose campaigns are fueled by anger over her support for the war. They include Mark Wilson, a former Marine who's running as a Democrat, and Aaron Dixon, a former Black Panther Party leader who is running as a Green Party candidate.

In Texas, Representative Henry Cuellar fought off a challenge from Ciro Rodriguez, an opponent backed by labor and environmental groups who got 41 percent of the vote in the Democratic primary in March.

In Pennsylvania, Senate candidate Bob Casey Jr.'s anti- abortion stance was attacked in television ads. While Casey, the state treasurer, fought off a primary challenge this week from Alan Sandals, his opponent won the support of a number of local officials.

Minnesota, Oregon

Gubernatorial races in Minnesota and Oregon, where Governor Ted Kulongoski faces re-election, have also featured challenges from the left. Kulongoski, 65, came under criticism from environmentalists, health-care advocates and some labor groups before the state's May 16 primary. Former state Treasurer Jim Hill, who opened his campaign by declaring that Kulongoski is ``not a good Democrat,'' got almost a third of the vote despite a late start to his campaign.

The Democratic Leadership Council's Kilgore says it isn't true that the party is failing to provide an alternative to Republican policies. ``It's ludicrous,'' he said. ``There's less doubt right now than there's ever been about the differences.''

Ignoring the rift won't make it disappear, said Tom Matzzie, Washington director for MoveOn.org. ``There's already a gigantic gulf in the party,'' he said.

The activist groups say their strategy is broader than merely challenging Democrats in primaries. They say they also want to pressure party-backed candidates to take definitive positions.

`Stand Up'

DOJ_NMG_0029040

``The other part of this is getting candidates to stand up for what they believe in and not being mealy-mouthed about it," said Jim Dean, president of Democracy for America, a group inspired by former Vermont Governor Howard Dean's presidential run in 2004. Jim Dean, Howard's brother, cited Massachusetts Senator John Kerry's call in October for a phased withdrawal from Iraq and expression of regret over his vote for the war.

Even though progressives will find it difficult to win in the primaries, that's unlikely to deter them, said Mark Rozell, a public policy professor at George Mason University in Arlington, Virginia. ``To pull off some victories here and there will be enough to energize much of the left base," he said.

To Rozell, what's at stake is ``the heart and soul" of the Democratic Party. ``The Republicans had that battle, and the moderates pretty much lost," he said. ``The Democrats now have to confront where the center of the party is."

Wave Of Women Candidates For Hill (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON - It feels like the political version of speed dating: Reporters gather in a room, the candidate is whisked in for a coffee-and-pastry-fueled chat about her campaign, then whisked out to make way for the next candidate, and the next, and the next...

This was the scene last week at the Omni Shoreham Hotel here in Washington, where the political action committee EMILY's List was holding its annual luncheon and trumpeting its "endorsees" - all of them Demo- cratic women who favor abortion rights. The topics of conversation ranged from the Iraq war to immigration to Rahm Emanuel, the head of the House Democrats' campaign committee, but rarely touched on the role of gender in the campaign.

Can it be that having women run for federal office is now so routine that gender barely merits a mention? Perhaps. But at EMILY's List, which boasts its largest crop of candidates in its 21 years, gender is key.

And as the Democratic Party seeks to regain control of Congress - doable with a net shift of just 15 seats - it is counting on these EMILY's List women to play a major role. Of the 24 Republican-held House seats deemed competitive by the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, 11 feature Democratic women, all of them getting help from Emily's List. By comparison, of Cook's 11 competitive Democratic-held House seats, only one features a Republican woman contender.

Voter discontent with Washington is high, and women candidates could be the natural beneficiaries of that "throw the bums out" mentality, say experts on women in politics.

"When people get disgusted with politics and they are looking for change, women embody that change," says Debbie Walsh, director of the Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University. "There's a sense that women are more honest."

Analysts see some comparisons to the 1992 election - the so-called "year of the woman," when female representation in both houses of Congress jumped from 32 to 54 members; most of the new women were Democrats. Today, 81 out of 535 House and Senate seats, or 15 percent, are held by women (52 Democrats and 29 Republicans).

The small number of competitive races this cycle compared with 1992 means the best women can do in 2006 is a "mini" year of the woman. But the issue agendas are similar: worries over the economy, healthcare, education, and scandal. In the 1992 race, the House check-writing scandal and the Clarence Thomas-Anita Hill hearings mobilized women. In 2006, the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal and the Iraq war are salient.

"Women are perceived as outsiders, even women incumbents," says Barbara Palmer, coauthor of a new book "Breaking the Political Glass Ceiling: Women and Congressional Elections."

But, she adds, not all congressional districts are hospitable to women. According to her book, women candidates do best in upscale, urban, and diverse districts, and are least likely to be elected in rural, Southern, and "traditional" districts. The book identifies 135 districts that are "unlikely" to elect women.

Whether 2006 will end up bringing a wave of new women to Congress is too soon to say. "It would be easier for the Democrats if they got their act together," says Kellyanne Conway, a Republican pollster, who suggests that a proactive, positive set of ideas, like the GOP's Contract With America in 1994, would be particularly appealing to women. "Women voters always gravitate toward 'yes,' not 'no.' "

Simply being a woman, however, does not necessarily work to a candidate's advantage, says Carl Forti, spokesman for the House Republican campaign committee. "I think it goes back to the quality of the candidate, period," he says.

New Mexico Attorney General Patricia Madrid, a Democrat who is running for the House, sees being a woman in politics as a double-edged sword. "People make assumptions - they think you can't make decisions," she says. "The upside is that your race gets more attention."

Since Ms. Madrid is facing an incumbent woman - Rep. Heather Wilson - that makes their competitive race more noteworthy. And Ms. Wilson's status as a military veteran (the only woman veteran in Congress), pitted against Madrid's role as the state's chief law-enforcement official, makes for a stereotype-shattering contest.

For now, the biggest race on the political world's radar screen is California's 50th District - the June 6 special election to fill the seat vacated by Rep. Duke Cunningham (R), now in prison for bribery. Under normal circumstances, this heavily Republican district in San Diego would be safe for the Republican candidate, former Rep. Brian Bilbray, but polls show his race against Francine Busby - an EMILY's List endorsee - is close.

This week, a poll for the Busby campaign put her ahead of Mr. Bilbray 47 percent to 40 percent. A poll commissioned by a conservative Republican opponent of the more moderate Bilbray puts Busby ahead 43-37.

Amy Walter, House-watcher for the Cook Political Report, says it's still an uphill climb for Busby, a school board trustee in Cardiff, Calif., who lost to Mr. Cunningham in 2004. But in the current environment, she does not rule out a Busby victory. Neither does the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee: It is spending $1.3 million on advertising in the last weeks of the campaign, after spending only $250,000 in the special-election primary.

"It's a close, volatile race," says Ms. Walter. "If she wins, it will be the shot heard round the world."

Liberal Wrath In Connecticut (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

HARTFORD, May 18 — "George Bush's favorite Democrat," they call him. "Republican Lite," they sneer. But liberals are no longer just venting on Internet blogs and talk radio programs about their centrist nemesis: Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut.

Now, from across the nation, a determined alliance of antiwar activists is working overtime online and on doorsteps to defeat Mr. Lieberman, whose political moderation helped him earn the Democratic nomination for vice president six years ago. Their goal is not only to punish Mr. Lieberman for staunchly supporting the war in Iraq but also to protest what the activists consider the Democratic Party's willingness to accommodate President Bush.

Without a national race to focus on, thousands of activists from other states — encouraged by a host of liberal bloggers — have contributed money and volunteered to help the campaign of Ned Lamont, a cable television executive with little political experience who is trying to unseat Mr. Lieberman in the state's Democratic primary in August.

Although Mr. Lamont's challenge appears to be a long shot, it is roiling some quarters of the Democratic Party, just as the party is trying to regain control of Congress this year. Many Democrats assert that the vigorous challenge to Mr. Lieberman is overshadowing the governor's race and taking money and attention away from three closely contested House races in Connecticut that many strategists consider crucial to the Democrats' majority hopes.

"It's absolute Democratic cannibalism," said John F. Droney, a former Democratic state chairman in Connecticut.

The liberals' campaign is clearly rattling Senator Lieberman, who has not faced a serious primary challenge in his three terms, Democrats say.

He has been cold-calling scores of state party delegates who will meet to endorse a candidate on Friday. He is boasting of union endorsements and interest groups he once took for granted. He has already run commercials and mailed letters to delegates from prominent Democrats like Senators Hillary Clinton and Harry Reid to remind voters of his liberal record on issues like the environment, abortion rights and gay rights.

And while he has continued to defend his Iraq stand, disputing what he calls "caricatures" of his views, he has tried to distance himself from the president. "I'm probably the only person in America to run against George W. Bush twice," Mr. Lieberman, referring to his vice-presidential campaign in 2000 and the Democratic primaries in 2004, told about two dozen people last week at a center for the elderly in Farmington, a Hartford suburb. "Because I don't think he gives us the leadership this country needs."

Yet Mr. Lieberman's critics do not seem to be listening, particularly Mr. Lamont, who has spent more than $370,000 of his own money to challenge the senator.

"Connecticut's a progressive state," Mr. Lamont said at a fund-raiser in the home of a Yale professor in North Haven on Sunday. "You're not going to lose a senator. You're going to gain a Democrat."

A growing cast of prominent activists is backing Mr. Lamont. Markos Moulitsas, who advised the presidential campaign of Howard Dean in 2004 and founded the blog Daily Kos, is appearing in a campaign commercial for Mr. Lamont. James H. Dean, the brother of Howard Dean and the chairman of the grass-roots group his brother formed in 2004, supports Mr. Lamont. Tim Tagaris, recently the Democratic National Committee's Internet outreach coordinator, has become director of Internet operations for the Lamont campaign. Even the state's best-known independent, former Gov. Lowell P. Weicker, has announced his support for Mr. Lamont because of Mr. Lieberman's support of the war.

On Tuesday, the National Organization for Women's political action committee endorsed Mr. Lamont, in part because he said, unlike Senator Lieberman, that he would have supported a filibuster to prevent confirmation hearings for Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court.

Senator Lieberman was also endorsed this week by the Human Rights Campaign, a gay rights group. But some Democrats who have voted for him for years are reconsidering their support. "He won't stand up and fight," Jim Boorsch, a retired lawyer who voted for Mr. Lieberman in his last three races, said at the Sunday fund-raiser.

This weekend, the 1,607 delegates to the state Democratic party convention will nominate a candidate for the Senate, and Mr. Lieberman is expected to win the nomination handily. But Mr. Lamont will get his name on the ballot for the Aug. 8 primary if he wins 15 percent of the delegates, which many party leaders think is likely. "If he gets 25 percent, that will be sending a real message to Lieberman," said Leland Tolo, a West Hartford delegate who said he would back Mr. Lamont.

Mr. Lieberman's supporters note that he is well ahead of Mr. Lamont in polls. At the end of this year's first quarter, the senator had $4.7 million in his campaign account compared with about $375,000 that Mr. Lamont had on hand. The senator has been endorsed by prominent state Democrats and he has long ties with many local party leaders. But those supporters also warn that liberals could turn out in large numbers on Primary Day, making the outcome less than certain.

"Joe, I'm certain, will be fine, but if I were in his shoes I wouldn't be taking chances with an August primary," said Al From, the founder and chief executive of the Democratic Leadership Council, a centrist group of which Senator Lieberman is a past chairman. "Because nobody's paying attention, and you don't know who's going to vote."

Senator Lieberman's attempts to push his party to the center have irritated liberals well before this year. In 2000, when Al Gore named him as his running mate, some Democrats complained that the senator had supported school vouchers, had questioned affirmative action and been too encouraging of free trade. But those concerns pale compared with their passion over his support for the war.

Mr. Lamont, 52, says his frustrations with Mr. Lieberman solidified in the spring of 2005, when the senator voted to allow a federal court to review the case of Terri Schiavo, the brain-damaged Florida woman whose case drove a national debate over right-to-die issues.

Mr. Lamont, a former first selectman in Greenwich whose great-grandfather was a business partner of J. P. Morgan's, also said Representative John P. Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat and a Vietnam veteran, inspired him when he urged the president last November to withdraw troops from Iraq as soon as possible.

But while Mr. Lamont has drawn impassioned support from critics of the war, he does not echo their calls for an immediate withdrawal of all troops. Tom Swan, his campaign manager, said Mr. Lamont supported immediately pulling American troops out of the Sunni Triangle and establishing benchmarks for gradually withdrawing forces from Iraq. He criticized Mr. Lieberman for siding with President Bush in opposing such benchmarks.

Senator Lieberman said in an interview on Friday that his views on the war had been misrepresented "because I happen to have shared the same goals as the president." He said he has repeatedly criticized the administration for being "too unilateral," for not sending enough troops to secure Iraq immediately after the invasion and for not following a State Department plan for reconstruction.

Just 8 percent of Democrats in Connecticut approve of the way President Bush is handling Iraq, according to a poll by Quinnipiac University released this month. The poll showed that 83 percent of Democrats thought going to war was wrong. It also showed Senator Lieberman leading Mr. Lamont, by 65 percent to 19 percent, among registered Democrats.

"A very simple thing happened that changed Democratic politics dramatically, and that was that the war turned bad," Mr. From said, adding of the senator's critics: "There's a group in our party that makes a lot of noise and I don't think they've ever won an election. They're trying to take out one of the great statesmen our party has and that's wrong."

Religious Left Struggles To Find Unifying Message (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

WASHINGTON, May 18 — They had come to All Souls Unitarian Church, 1,200 of them from 39 states, to wrest the mantle of moral authority from conservative Christians, and they were finally planning how to take their message to those in power.

After rousing speeches on Wednesday by liberal religious leaders like Rabbi Michael Lerner of the magazine Tikkun and Sister Joan Chittister, a Benedictine nun, participants in the new Network of Spiritual Progressives split into small groups to prepare for meetings with members of Congress on Thursday.

Yet at a session on ethical behavior, including sexual behavior, the 50 or so activists talked little about what to tell Congress about abortion or same-sex marriage. Instead, the Rev. Ama Zenya of First Congregational Church in Oakland, Calif., urged them to talk to one another about their spiritual values and "to practice fully our authentic being."

Kimberly Crichton, a Washington lawyer and Quaker, grew impatient. "I think we would be more effective if we focused on specific legislation," Ms. Crichton said. "Are we going to discuss specific policies?"

Ms. Zenya replied: "What we envisioned this time is saying we are a religious voice. More relationship-building, consciousness-raising."

The man in the pew in front of Ms. Crichton translated: "The answer is, no."

Since the last presidential election, liberals of various faiths have talked about taking back religion from the conservative Christians who helped bring President Bush and a Republican Congress to power.

Yet liberal believers have so far been unable to approach, even modestly, the success of the religious right and command the attention of Congress.

Turnout at the Spiritual Activism Conference is high, but if the gathering is any indication, the biggest barrier for liberals may be their regard for pluralism: for letting people say what they want, how they want to, and for trying to include everyone's priorities, rather than choosing two or three issues that could inspire a movement.

"We didn't get on the same page with everyone, and it is about getting on the same page," said the Rev. Tony Campolo, an outspoken liberal Baptist minister from Pennsylvania who once served as a spiritual adviser to President Bill Clinton, and attended the conference. "The thing about the left is that they want everybody to feel good."

Initiatives by liberals have been percolating locally and nationally, from state interfaith alliances in Ohio to counter a powerful conservative Christian movement there to national campaigns to reduce poverty led by liberal evangelicals like the Rev. Jim Wallis.

The Democratic Party itself is wrestling with the best way to shake an image of indifference to religion. Most recently, the party's national chairman, Howard Dean, courted evangelicals by appearing on Pat Robertson's television program, "The 700 Club." In the process, Mr. Dean alienated gay and lesbian supporters of the Democratic Party by misstating the party's platform on same-sex marriage.

Religious leaders at the conference here cautioned that it would take years before liberal believers could match the savvy and strength of conservative Christian groups.

But Rabbi Lerner, the editor of Tikkun, the progressive Jewish magazine, and an organizer of the spiritual progressives' network, rejected the approach that Democrats have so far taken to faith, describing it as window-dressing.

He called on the activists at All Souls Church to define progressive faith, rather than have politicians do it. He said research begun years ago showed that Americans were experiencing a deep spiritual crisis but that only conservative Christians had responded to it, with an agenda that he said "backs the ethos of selfishness and materialism in our society."

"They get away with this because the left isn't even in the relevant ballpark," Rabbi Lerner said. When people on the left "hear talk of a spiritual crisis, they think it's some kind of New Age flakery or a code word for homophobia, sexism and racism," he said.

He urged participants to offer a real alternative to the ideas that many conservative Christian groups promulgate. But identifying those alternatives proved to be the hard part for many at the conference.

Mr. Campolo, the Baptist minister, explained to the participants in a seminar that many people on Capitol Hill were religious, and that to reach them and to establish authority, liberals should rely on the Bible.

"You have no right to be a spiritual leader if you haven't read Scripture," he told the group. "People in Congress respect the Book, even if they don't know what it says. If we don't recognize this, we don't know squat."

A young man with long hair and a tunic challenged Mr. Campolo.

"I thought this was a spiritual progressives' conference," he said. "I don't want to play the game of 'the Bible says this or that,' or that we get validation from something other than ourselves. We should be speaking from our hearts."

Carol Gottesman was urged at her group to speak from her heart about her priority, the environment. A 64-year-old nurse from Hubbard, Ohio, and a Conservative Jew, Ms. Gottesman spoke Thursday with her congressman, Tim Ryan, a Democrat. It was one of dozens of meetings the network had set up.

Mr. Ryan, who had read about the network on the Internet, asked Ms. Gottesman if the group was pushing specific policies.

"No, it's more that we want to take caring and generosity and bring it into everything," she said.

Mr. Ryan responded: "Spread love, not hate. Pretty simple. Do you have a little network back home?"

Ms. Gottesman squared her shoulders proudly and said, "I'm it."

Many States Said Not Ready For Bird Flu (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, May 19, 2006

States have a spotty record in preparing for bird flu and it is matter of "not if, but when" the deadly virus reaches the United States, the Homeland Security Department's top doctor said Thursday.

But Dr. Jeffrey Runge said bird flu will not pose a critical threat until the virus can spread consistently between people. Such transmission has occurred only in a few cases overseas.

The department's chief medical officer said state and local governments carry most of burden of preparing for an outbreak. That includes readying emergency medical workers, providing hospital beds and setting up treatment centers outside of immediate disaster areas.

In an interview with the Associated Press, Runge did not identify the states he said have been slow to prepare. States with experience in dealing with hurricanes or terrorist attacks are further along, he added.

"Some states still have the idea that if it makes people sick, it's simply a health event," he said. "And others are much more forward reaching, and understand that they have to prepare for things like civil unrest, or interruption of the supply chain, or the failure of critical infrastructure to keep going, to keep the nation going in the event of some catastrophic event. And those are the ones that we think are the best prepared."

Gov. Mike Huckabee, R-Ark., who leads the National Governors Association, said states have "pretty much been told to prepare to row their own boat" in responding to bird flu.

Federal health officials "were pretty candid with us," Huckabee said in an interview. "The federal government simply does not have the resources themselves to deal with this on a mass level. And if a pandemic does occur, it will overwhelm their resources, just like it will overwhelm ours."

Scientists believe the flu would most likely be carried into the United States by a wild bird migrating from a country that has had an outbreak. "It's not a matter of if, but when we have birds that are infected with an avian virus," Runge said.

He credited agriculture inspectors and poultry producers with adopting tough security standards to prevent visitors from exposing fowl to the virus.

"We have the most secure flocks in the world," Runge said. He recalled hearing from an inspector that "it was tougher to get into a chicken coop than it was to get into our DHS headquarters."

Runge's department is responsible for blocking potentially infected birds and bird products from entering the U.S. at airports, seaports and international borders. Unions representing U.S. Customs and Border Protections officers have complained they have not been trained to identify bird smugglers or to quarantine birds arriving from countries that have had flu outbreaks.

Runge expressed some frustration with the level of training so far. "I wish I could say it had all already been done," he said. "Right now the planning is coordinated, but the education is not as coordinated as we'd like. That having been said, everybody around here's gotten a lot smarter about it."

Scientists Begin Testing For Bird Flu In Alaska (WSJ)

Associated Press, May 19, 2006

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Federal scientists have started testing migratory birds for signs of a dangerous bird flu that could show up on this continent this spring.

The testing of shorebirds began Wednesday on an Anchorage coastal wildlife refuge, said Bruce Woods, spokesman with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service.

It's the first sampling of a summer-long project to swab birds for bird flu throughout the state. Nationwide, the goal is to sample 75,000 to 100,000 wild birds. In Alaska, about $4 million in federal money will be allocated to study about 15,000 birds, Mr. Woods said.

"We had some success in catching some of the target species," he said Thursday.

More than 40 species of waterfowl and shorebirds are considered susceptible to infection by a highly pathogenic H5N1 bird flu virus that's killed more than 100 people, in other parts of the world, mostly in Asia.

Scientists will only test birds in the Anchorage area through early next week. "In this location, it's very brief, birds go through and they're gone," he said.

To screen the birds for the deadly virus, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and Alaska's Fish and Game Department also are setting up more than 50 remote backcountry camps accessible mainly by float planes or boats.

Many birds will be tested and released, while others killed during seasonal hunts will be tested after they have died.

Alaska is an ideal bird flu laboratory because it's at the crossroads of migratory pathways for birds flying between the U.S. and other countries. Some of these birds arrive in Alaska each year from Asia.

WHO Probes Bird Flu Cluster (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia, May 18 -- An international team of health investigators arrived on the Indonesian island of Sumatra on Thursday to determine whether an unusually large cluster of human bird flu cases indicates that the highly lethal virus has mutated into a form easily spread among people.

Laboratory tests conducted for the World Health Organization confirmed this week that five members of one extended family in Kubu Sembilang village had died of bird flu during the first two weeks of May and a sixth had been infected but was recovering. A seventh family member, a 37-year-old woman who had been the first to fall ill, is also suspected of succumbing to the disease but was buried before samples could be taken.

The Sumatran cluster is the world's largest since the disease emerged in East Asia in 2003, although several dozen others have been reported. Any cluster raises the prospect that the virus has undergone genetic change allowing it to spread more readily among people, increasing the likelihood of a global pandemic.

WHO dispatched two investigators from its Jakarta office to northern Sumatra last week, but their initial efforts were stymied by distraught relatives' reluctance to discuss the cases. A second team, which arrived Thursday, included a senior epidemiologist from WHO's headquarters in Geneva and investigators from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta and WHO's regional office in New Delhi.

"We are taking this very seriously," said Sari Setiogi, spokeswoman for WHO's Indonesia office. "The good news is that from our investigation to date, there's no evidence of further spread of the virus beyond the family."

Setiogi said that relatives, neighbors and health-care workers who treated the patients were being monitored and that none had shown influenza-like symptoms.

Influenza specialists have said they suspect human transmission played a role in several other clusters of infection, including instances in Thailand, Vietnam and elsewhere in Indonesia. But the disease has yet to demonstrate it can pass beyond the confines of a family, which would be necessary for bird flu to spark a global epidemic.

The source of the Sumatra outbreak remains unclear. Health officials said that they had heard a report of sick chickens near one of the victims' homes but that tests of poultry and other livestock in the village had failed to identify any infected animals. Agriculture Minister Anton Apriyantono said Thursday, however, that samples taken from chickens, ducks and pigs from the surrounding district had tested positive for exposure to bird flu.

Some Indonesian health officials have speculated that the afflicted family members, who lived near each other in four houses, had contracted the virus either by sharing a feast of infected chicken and pork or from contaminated manure. Health Minister Siti Fadilah Supari minimized the possibility that the virus had spread from one family member to another.

If they had all caught bird flu from the same contaminated source, the victims would have been expected to become sick within the normal incubation period for the disease, which at most is slightly more than one week. But the final victim, a toddler, became ill after that, raising the possibility that the virus was passed between relatives.

Nur Rasyid Lubis, who heads the bird flu prevention team at Adam Malik Hospital in North Sumatra, said five members of the family, including at least two children, were admitted at the same time on May 8 with fever and respiratory problems. X-rays showed symptoms of pneumonia. They all died over the following week.

Lubis reported that all seven victims from the family were related to one another by blood rather than through marriage, reinforcing the suspicions of some influenza specialists that genetic susceptibility could play a role in determining who catches bird flu.

The Sumatra cases and a separate fatal infection confirmed this week in Surabaya, Indonesia's second-largest city, increased the country's death toll from the disease to at least 30. Bird flu has infected more than 216 people worldwide, killing more than half.

Human Transmission Possible In Flu Case (USAT)

USA Today, May 19, 2006

The source of bird flu that killed five members of an Indonesian family isn't known, and human-to-human transmission can't be ruled out, the World Health Organization said on its website. It said this was the largest cluster of closely related cases of the deadly H5N1 strain of the virus reported anywhere. The WHO said the most plausible source was poultry, but “the possibility of limited human-to-human transmission cannot be ruled out.” If that occurred, “it has not been either efficient or sustained,” the WHO said.

There have been 122 deaths in the outbreak that began in early 2003 and 129 since the strain was first discovered in 1997. The virus is easily transmitted among fowl. If it mutates into a form easily passed among humans, it could kill millions of people.

Typhoon Chanchu pummeled southern China, killing at least 21 people and leaving 27 Vietnamese fishermen missing after their boats sank in Chinese waters. Chanchu flooded scores of homes and forced more than 1 million people to evacuate before weakening to a severe tropical storm and moving out to sea today. The storm has killed more than 60 people in Asia, including 37 last weekend in the Philippines, where it destroyed thousands of homes.

About 40,000 people marched in Ankara, Turkey, to support the secular republic a day after a suspected Islamist militant shot five judges, one fatally, to protest a ruling against a teacher who wore an Islamic-style head scarf. Leaders of Turkey's military, which has led three coups and sees itself as a guardian of secularism, lined up by the coffin of Judge Mustafa Yucel Ozbilgin. Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, who heads an Islamic-rooted government, did not attend the funeral. The government had criticized the ruling in February.

Hamas security forces clashed with police loyal to President Mahmoud Abbas after a day of tense standoffs as Palestinian rivals competed for control of Gaza.

Khaled Abu Hilal, spokesman of the Hamas-controlled Interior Ministry, said gunmen fired from a moving car on police, wounding two. Police thought nearby Hamas forces were responsible and fired at them, he said. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the tensions pose a "dangerous situation" and the Palestinian leadership needs "to get control of this."

Chile's Supreme Court freed former Peruvian president Alberto Fujimori on $3,000 bail but said he must remain while he fights extradition on corruption and human rights charges. Fujimori, 67, came to Chile in November from Japan, where he lived after his government collapsed in 2000 in a corruption scandal.

5 Bird Flu Deaths In Indonesia Not Linked To Human Exchange (NYT)

By Peter Gelling

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

YOGYAKARTA, Indonesia, May 18 — World Health Organization officials said Thursday that the five avian flu deaths confirmed this week on Sumatra were probably not a result of human-to-human infection and did not suggest that the virus had mutated into a more deadly form.

Five family members were confirmed dead from the A(H5N1) strain of avian influenza by the World Health Organization on Wednesday, the largest such cluster recorded. A sixth family member died of flulike symptoms but was not tested for the virus.

Clusters like the one in Kubu Sembilang village in northern Sumatra, where the victims lived, worry health officials because they indicate that the virus may have been transmitted between humans. Health officials have long feared that such a mutation could set off a worldwide pandemic capable of killing millions.

Gina Samaan, a field epidemiologist for the World Health Organization in Kubu Sembilang investigating the recent cluster, said that the number of deaths had raised eyebrows but that so far the outbreak was similar to others in Indonesia that were caused by close contact with infected poultry.

"Current evidence doesn't suggest at all that the virus was passed between humans," she said in a telephone interview.

Agriculture Minister Anton Apriyantono said Thursday that a number of chickens, ducks and pigs in the village had tested positive for the virus. He said infected flocks of poultry would be culled immediately.

No new cases were reported beyond the Sumatra cluster, which officials said was encouraging. Investigators are scouring the village to determine why only this family had caught the disease.

Indonesia's death toll has reached 30, second only to Vietnam, which has recorded 42. Indonesia, however, has been recording bird flu deaths at a much higher rate than any other country in recent months.

Local tests indicate that a boy in the remote eastern province of Papua who died recently also had bird flu.

The latest fatalities prompted the Indonesian president, Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, to ask Thursday for additional international financial and technical support to help terminate the spread of the disease.

The government has been hesitant to conduct mass culls, as other Asian countries have done, because it cannot compensate farmers.

Lack of public health education probably accounts for Indonesia's high fatality rate, health officials say. In April, Indonesian bird flu patients reported their symptoms an average of five days after they began, making it hard for doctors to prevent deaths.

"It is an issue of how quickly people report their symptoms," Ms. Samaan said. "But we believe health care awareness is increasing."

In Jakarta, where the majority of the Indonesian deaths have occurred, all major hospitals and even smaller health clinics have plastered bright orange-and-yellow posters on their walls detailing bird flu symptoms and treatments. Booklets have been distributed to far-flung villages throughout the country.

Saving Grace (NYT)

By Lauren F. Winner

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

Durham, N.C.

THE recent Harvard study that found teenagers' virginity pledges to be ineffective should come as a surprise to no one. Several studies had already come to that conclusion. If we are truly to help our teenagers adopt the countercultural sexual ethic of abstinence until marriage, Christians concerned about the rampant premarital sex in our communities need to rethink, rather than simply defend, young people's abstinence pledges.

It is awfully easy for Christians to blame our community's sexual sins on the mores of post-sexual revolution America — to criticize Abercrombie & Fitch catalogs, to natter on about how "Grey's Anatomy" portrays sexual behavior that doesn't square with Christianity.

But perhaps it's more important that we reconsider how we talk about sex in the church. For although the church devotes an immense amount of energy to teaching about sexuality — just go to the Christian inspiration section of your nearest Barnes & Noble and compare the number of books about chastity to books that challenge, say, consumerism — many Christians still "struggle with" (in that euphemistic evangelical phrase) premarital sex, adultery and pornography.

So why is the church's approach to teaching chastity falling short? Consider the popular "True Love Waits" virginity pledge: "Believing that true love waits, I make a commitment to God, myself, my family, my friends, my future mate and my future children to a lifetime of purity including sexual abstinence from this day until the day I enter a biblical marriage relationship."

This pledge and others like it are well meaning but deeply flawed. For starters, there's something disturbing about the assumption that teenagers are passively waiting for their future mates and children, when the New Testament is quite clear that some Christians are called to lifelong celibacy. (Paul, for example, did not have a mate or children, and Dan Brown's fantasies notwithstanding, Jesus's only bride was the church.) Chastity is not merely about passive waiting; it is about actively conforming our bodies to the arc of the Gospel and receiving the Holy Spirit right now.

Pledgers promise to control intense bodily desires simply by exercising their wills. But Christian ethics recognizes that the broken, twisted will can do nothing without rehabilitation by God's grace. Perhaps the centrality of grace is recognized best not in a pledge but in a prayer that names chastity as a gift and beseeches God for the grace to receive it.

The pledges are also cast in highly individualistic terms: I promise that I won't do this or that. As the Methodist bishop William Willimon once wrote: "Decisions are fine. But decisions that are not reinforced and reformed by the community tend to be short-lived."

During our first year of marriage, my husband and I lived in a small apartment inside a church. On Tuesdays, Alcoholics Anonymous and Al-Anon met downstairs. As I got to know some of the regulars, I began to wonder if there wasn't something the church could learn from the 12-step groups in our midst.

After all, what are 12-step groups but communities of people expecting transformation? People show up because they want to change, and they know that making a promise by themselves — I will stop drinking — won't cut it. Alcoholics Anonymous explicitly recognizes that transformation works best when a community comes alongside you and participates in your transformation.

Christians, like 12-step group attendees, are people who are committed to becoming, to use the Apostle Paul's phrase, new creatures. Living sexual lives that comport with the Gospel is one part of that.

Perhaps pledges for chastity need to be made not only by the individual teenager. Perhaps we also need pledges made by the teenager's whole Christian community: we pledge to support you in this difficult, countercultural choice; we pledge that the church is a place where you can lay bare your brokenness and sin, where you don't have to dissemble; we pledge to cheer you on when chastity seems unbearably difficult, and we pledge to speak God's forgiveness to you if you falter. No retooled pledge will guarantee teenagers' chastity, but words of grace and communal commitment are perhaps a firmer basis for sexual ethics than simple assertions that true love waits.

Earmark Loopholes (WSJ)

When the House passed its lobbyist-reform bill last month, we praised the earmark transparency provision as a rare bright spot. Maybe we spoke too soon. Outsiders have now had a chance to inspect the fine print, and if Sarbanes-Oxley were this full of loopholes, few businesses would complain.

Under the House bill, all earmarks inserted into appropriations during the conference committee stage must identify the earmarker -- unless, we now discover, the earmark goes to a federal agency, as nearly half of them do. Another notable earmark exception has been carved out for Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, the mortgage giants that are political honey pots for the Members. As far as we know, the two companies have never received an earmark before -- which raises the question of whether they are about to become a new earmark shelter for the Members to disguise their pork-barrel habits.

Oh, and earmarks directed to state and local governments are also exempt from the requirement under some circumstances. How big a loophole is that? "It could be as big as the appropriators are clever," Representative Jeff Flake (R., Ariz.) told us. "And they're pretty clever." Congressman Flake has been fighting the earmark tide since long before it became a cause celebre, and he's hoping the loopholes can be narrowed when the House and Senate sit down to agree on a common version of the bill.

Perhaps with the House's Appropriator-in-Chief, Californian Jerry Lewis, now under investigation for allegedly steering millions in appropriations to a lobbyist via earmarks, reform will take on added urgency. But GOP leaders should understand that this kind of cynical loophole-writing won't make voters feel any better about them come November.

Medicare Bidding War (WSJ)

Republicans have been touting new polls showing rising popularity for their Medicare drug benefit. But this week's panic in Congress to extend Monday's deadline for penalty-free enrollment is further evidence that the program has been far from the political home run the GOP once hoped.

It seems forever ago now, but back during the heady days and high poll numbers of 2003 Republican leaders were convinced that the new entitlement was a no-lose proposition. Their cheering section at the Washington Times editorial board fantasized aloud that the benefit offered the prospect of a "permanent Republican majority."

How times have changed. At best, the drug benefit will be a political wash this first national election following its implementation, and there is reason for Republicans to worry that come November many seniors will be hitting the dread "doughnut hole" where coverage stops. More ominously, Democrats are making a pledge to "fix" the benefit -- meaning expand it -- their top campaign plank. So while Republicans might have gotten to play Santa for five minutes, they'll spend decades playing Scrooge as Democrats demagogue for more generous coverage.

All of this was predictable, and in fact was predicted by none other than former Clinton Medicare Administrator Nancy-Ann DeParle. In a 2003 Washington Post op-ed, she urged Democrats to support the program: "In signing it, as [President Bush] will surely be forced to do, he will preside over the biggest expansion of government health benefits since the Great Society. . . . The Democrats should fight to improve the bill now -- filling in the doughnut hole would be a good start. But they should also remember that there will be time to repair it, and more political support, once the bill becomes law -- as the history of past programs shows."

Things have developed more or less as Ms. DeParle had hoped. Democrats have indeed been agitating to "improve" the program from day one. And their complaints about the benefit design resonate for a good reason. In any rational insurance policy, coverage increases with increasing costs. The doughnut hole -- where coverage ceases between annual drug costs of $2,250 and $5,100, before kicking in again -- is what you get when politicians try to spread a little cash around regardless of need and at the same time try to control costs.

Another Democratic campaign issue will be pressure for Medicare to "negotiate" lower prices with drug makers. In reality, price "negotiation" is just a euphemism for price controls. "I'm sure that costs will escalate to the point where even Republicans will see the point of letting the secretary [of Health and Human Services] negotiate to hold down prices," says Democratic Representative Pete Stark. "When Medicare was created in 1965, the law prohibited setting fees for hospitals and doctors. And that's what we do now." This could have grave implications for future R&D budgets in the pharmaceutical industry.

Which means that it's not just the GOP that miscalculated in supporting this drug benefit. The bulk of Big Pharma did too, in the shortsighted hope that it would do something to reduce political pressure for things like drug "re-importation" from Canada and Europe. Only last week Pfizer CEO Hank McKinnell tried to sell Journal editors on the idea that the entitlement will actually save money because increased drug usage correlates with lower hospitalization and other costs.

Nice try. Most of the new entitlement simply replaces money that would have been spent by the private sector. The Medicare Trustees calculate that the drug benefit adds more to the government's unfunded liabilities than the entire projected Social Security shortfall. We're sorry to see Pfizer -- which for a corporation has done rare and yeoman work promoting free enterprise -- become a defender of government efficiency.

In sum, the Medicare drug benefit has been a big setback for the causes of fiscal responsibility and market-oriented ideas in health care. Only the health-savings accounts that passed at the same time have a chance of redeeming the market "reform" promise that GOP leaders used to bludgeon the package through the House by a single vote.

The political future as far as the eye can see promises nasty battles over drug price controls, and between Democrats trying to expand the program and Republicans trying to hold the line. As for the short-term politics, obviously no one is talking anymore about a "permanent Republican majority." The question on everyone's lips is whether Republicans will even have a Congressional majority next year.

Hot Money Returns (NYT)

Those lucky investors who have ridden the bull run of the emerging markets in recent years — and those still thinking about getting onboard — should remember one thing. What goes up quickly often goes down quickly as well.

Investors usually move in herds, and right now they are stampeding, cash in hand, toward countries like Russia and India. As Landon Thomas Jr. reported in this paper yesterday, hedge funds, mutual funds and pension funds are embracing the risks and the returns in countries as far-flung as Zambia and the former Soviet republic of Georgia. Speculation may have overtaken smart investment.

In any country or business sector, there is a limit on the number of good investments. The better values are generally snapped up by the best-informed investors, those with knowledge on the ground. But fund managers have a perverse incentive structure during frenzied periods of investment. They are punished more for missing out on the stellar returns during the upswing than they are for losing money in any broad-based downturn that follows. That encourages short-term thinking, which may be all right for traders, but is less effective for the average people managing their retirement funds.

It's little wonder that no one wants to be left behind. According to Morningstar, the investment research firm, diversified emerging markets stock funds returned 56 percent, 24 percent and 32 percent in the last three years, well above what investors would have gotten by sticking to domestic equities, which returned just 7 percent in 2005.

Exotic stocks may keep rising, but they're also likely to remain very volatile. And while they could perform well during a slow decline in the dollar, a steep plunge in the greenback might send investors scrambling for the comfort of old standbys, like opportunities in Western Europe. The wise investors won't lose their heads and weight their portfolios too heavily toward the most exotic funds. The problem with hot money is that it's easy to get burned.

TERRORISM NEWS:

CIA Nominee Defends Eavesdropping Program (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, May 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - Justice Department lawyers had signed off and the president of the United States had issued his orders.

So less than a month after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Air Force Gen. Michael Hayden decided to carry out a covert warrantless eavesdropping program to help thwart future attacks.

"The math was pretty straightforward," Hayden told the Senate Intelligence Committee on Thursday during his confirmation hearing to head the Central Intelligence Agency. "I could not not do this."

Hayden, who headed the National Security Agency when it began the eavesdropping program, defended the Bush administration's effort to wiretap calls between suspected al-Qaida allies and U.S. residents, saying the practice is subject to strict internal reviews to prevent civil rights violations.

Hayden seems assured of Senate confirmation to take over the CIA and would become the agency's third director since the Sept. 11 attacks. The committee will vote next week. President Bush has pressed for a full Senate vote before the Memorial Day recess begins at the end of next week, but that's uncertain.

Even so, Hayden faced tough questions about his credibility, the breadth of the eavesdropping program, the role of the CIA in the treatment of foreign detainees, and the reliability of intelligence on Iran's nuclear program. On key points, Hayden demurred, putting off his answers for the classified, closed-door portion of the hearing.

Indeed, the more than six-hour public session revealed more about the frustrations of lawmakers who'd been kept in the dark about the NSA's activities - some until Wednesday - than it did about Hayden's views.

"The Congress was really never really consulted or informed in a manner that we could truly perform our oversight role as co-equal branches of government, not to mention, I happen to believe, (as) required by law," said Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine.

Hayden promised to keep senators informed about intelligence activities, but he urged lawmakers to stop the "endless picking apart of the archaeology of every past intelligence success or failure."

CIA officers, he said, "deserve not to have every action analyzed, second-guessed and criticized on the front pages of the morning paper."

As for the NSA's eavesdropping activities, Hayden stressed that the program targets al-Qaida communications. In one of the most detailed descriptions that the administration has offered about internal safeguards on the program, Hayden said that NSA officers listen in on calls only after establishing probable cause that the calls involve al-Qaida suspects. He said each targeted call is documented and includes a detailed rationale for linking a phone number with a suspected terrorist.

He said the NSA's inspector general, the agency's internal watchdog, and Department of Justice lawyers routinely examine the targeting documents to make sure the program isn't being abused.

"To the best of my knowledge, the folks out there are batting a thousand," he said. "No one has said that there has been a targeting decision made that wasn't well-founded in a probable cause standard."

He declined to describe the breadth of the program. He also wouldn't confirm a USA Today report last week that the NSA had access to a database of millions of records of phone calls placed in the United States.

After Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., sparred with Hayden over the privacy issues associated with warrantless wiretaps, Levin asked: "Is that the whole program?"

"Senator, I'm not at liberty to talk about that in open session," Hayden replied.

Later, Levin told a reporter: "He's made generally a positive impression on me."

While the revelations of NSA eavesdropping have caused an outcry among civil libertarians and a vigorous debate in Congress, the Senate hearing was a civil encounter. Administration critics sat quietly in the audience, clapping softly at the occasional pointed question from a senator.

Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., encouraged Hayden to develop a new sense of public trust in the intelligence community.

"America has lost confidence in the leadership of this country," Hagel said.

Hayden conceded flaws in the intelligence gathering about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. He faulted the Pentagon's former Office of Special Plans, headed by former Undersecretary of Defense of Policy Douglas Feith, for not adequately filtering intelligence data when reaching conclusions about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq and about links between Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein and al-Qaida.

Displaying a gift for metaphor, Hayden said:

"I've got three great kids, but if you tell me, `Go out and find all the bad things they've done, Hayden,' I can build you a pretty good dossier, and you'd think they were pretty bad people because that was what I was looking for and that's what I'd build up.

"That would be very wrong. That would be inaccurate. That would be misleading."

Asked to compare current assessments about Iran's nuclear capabilities with prewar intelligence about Iraq, Hayden said, "Our data is better ... and our judgments are far more clear."

At another point he noted: "Iran is a difficult problem."

Hayden Says NSA Program Is Legal (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush's nominee to head the CIA defended the administration's warrantless surveillance program Thursday and said media reports about it have had a “corrosive effect” on the nation's intelligence gatherers.

Air Force Gen. Michael Hayden told the Senate Intelligence Committee that the National Security Agency (NSA) eavesdrops without warrants only on the phone calls or e-mails of terrorism suspects. He said officials use a “probable cause” standard that makes it unlikely that ordinary Americans would be targeted.

“The privacy of American citizens is a concern constantly,” said Hayden, who as NSA director designed the surveillance program. “We always balance privacy and security.”

During nearly eight hours of testimony, Hayden said repeatedly that when Bush pushed the NSA to step up its surveillance after the Sept. 11 attacks, he consulted with government lawyers. He said they told him eavesdropping on international communications was legal.

“I could not not do this,” he said.

But Hayden said he was “not here to confirm or deny” last week's report by USA TODAY that the NSA has been secretly collecting the domestic phone call records of tens of millions of Americans. Bush has confirmed the NSA surveillance program but not the call database report.

After Hayden's open testimony, the confirmation hearing went into closed session so he could discuss the phone database issue as well as other sensitive subjects such as detainee interrogations.

Before going into the closed session, Democrats expressed concern over the clandestine programs and what they said was the administration's failure to keep Congress informed. The full Senate and House intelligence committees were briefed for the first time Wednesday.

Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., said he left the briefing “more convinced than ever” that the phone surveillance program is illegal and “the president misled the public.”

Hayden said that in 30 briefing sessions with members of Congress, no one had said that the surveillance program should be stopped or that it broke the law. “I came away with no course corrections,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0029055

Hayden did acknowledge a series of mistakes by the U.S. intelligence community before the invasion of Iraq in 2003 — principally the conclusion that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction. “We just took too much for granted. We didn't challenge our basic assumptions,” he said.

The four-star general opened his testimony by saying that intelligence-gathering had become “the football in American political discourse” and that the “CIA needs to get out of the news — as source or subject.”

A vote by the full Senate on Hayden's nomination to replace Porter Goss could come as early as next week. “It's very likely he'll be confirmed,” said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the committee's senior Democrat.

C.I.A. Choice Says He's Independent Of The Pentagon (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — Gen. Michael V. Hayden sought on Thursday to distance himself from the Pentagon and its role in prewar intelligence on Iraq, in an appearance that put him on track to win swift confirmation as the next director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

In a confirmation hearing before the Senate Intelligence Committee, General Hayden appeared in the pristine blue uniform he has worn for 36 years as an Air Force officer.

But he repeatedly professed his independence from the Defense Department and its leadership, saying he had been "uncomfortable" with the work of a Pentagon intelligence office run by Douglas J. Feith, a former undersecretary of defense, which asserted in the months before the Iraq war that Iraq had established ties with operatives for Al Qaeda in the Middle East.

General Hayden also recounted disagreements with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld about the Pentagon's control over a large part of America's annual intelligence budget. In characterizing one such conversation, he said, "I think it's what diplomats would call that frank and wide-ranging exchange of views."

General Hayden flatly defended as legal the secret domestic eavesdropping program he ran until last year as director of the National Security Agency, and that argument was directly challenged by only a handful of Democratic senators.

But he notably declined to endorse a Bush administration stance that has severely limited the number of senators who could be briefed on the program. "It was not my decision," he said.

The questioning of General Hayden in more than seven hours of public testimony included moments of tension. But, for the most part, Democrats as well as Republicans praised his experience and said he was a good choice to lead an agency that has been buffeted by recriminations over intelligence failures and the stormy service of its current director, Porter J. Goss, who will leave next week.

None of the 15 senators on the committee indicated that they planned to vote against General Hayden's nomination. By day's end, Senator Pat Roberts of Kansas, the Republican chairman of the committee, said he hoped to hold votes in the committee and the full Senate next week that could install General Hayden at the C.I.A. by Memorial Day.

General Hayden's assertions of independence appeared intended to address his critics' concerns that a four-star general running the spy agency might be too beholden to the Pentagon at a time when the military is expanding its foreign intelligence operations.

In his current job, as principal deputy to John D. Negroponte, director of national intelligence, General Hayden is not in the direct military chain of command. Yet his testimony on Wednesday was the first time that a senior general on active duty had criticized the intelligence office run by Mr. Feith, who left the Pentagon last year after overseeing a critical part of the Pentagon's effort to build the case for war against Saddam Hussein.

In stark contrast to Mr. Goss, who in confirmation hearings 19 months ago pledged "tough love" for the embattled agency, General Hayden went out of his way to praise the work of C.I.A. officials and pledged to "reaffirm the C.I.A.'s proud culture of risk-taking and excellence."

General Hayden, who would become the third C.I.A. director in two years, said he was also eager to restore a sense of continuity at the agency, which has been shaken by turnover at its highest levels. He said the possible return of Stephen R. Kappes, a veteran of the agency's clandestine service who is said to be the leading candidate to become General Hayden's deputy, would help in that effort.

"You get a lot more authority when the work force doesn't think it's amateur hour on the top floor," he said. "You get a lot more authority when you've got somebody welded to your hip whom everybody unarguably respects as someone who knows the business."

He said he also believed it was "time to move past what seems to me to be an endless picking apart of the archeology of every past intelligence failure and success," including those related to the Sept. 11 attacks and faulty assessments about prewar intelligence on Iraq. C.I.A officers, he said, "deserve not to have every action analyzed, second-guessed and criticized on the front pages of the morning paper."

The sharpest criticism from senators came during questions about General Hayden's role in the domestic eavesdropping program. General Hayden said the surveillance program broke no laws and had been carefully vetted by National Security Agency lawyers. He said no lawmaker had ever suggested significant changes to the program in more than a dozen classified briefings before it was publicly revealed in December.

"I never left those sessions thinking I had to change anything," he said.

Yet some lawmakers challenged whether General Hayden had been upfront about the highly classified program in public statements and in past visits to Capitol Hill.

One committee Democrat, Senator Ron Wyden of Oregon, questioned whether General Hayden had "simply said one thing and done another, or whether you have just parsed your words like a lawyer to intentionally mislead the public."

Mr. Wyden asked, "What's to say that if you're confirmed to head the C.I.A., we won't go through exactly this kind of drill with you over there?"

"Well, senator," the general replied, "you're going to have to make a judgment on my character."

While several senators expressed concern that the Pentagon was muscling onto the C.I.A.'s territory by expanding its intelligence capabilities, General Hayden denied that there was a turf battle between the military and civilian intelligence operatives.

In fact, General Hayden said on several occasions Thursday that Pentagon intelligence-gathering had helped the C.I.A. break free from the military's constant demands to support troops with tactical intelligence.

In Iraq and Afghanistan, General Hayden said, the C.I.A. had initially "picked up a large burden" in providing direct support to military forces.

"To have D.O.D. step up to those kinds of responsibilities doesn't seem to me to be a bad thing," he said. "And if that frees up C.I.A. activity to go back toward the more traditional C.I.A. realm of strategic intelligence, there's a happy marriage to be made here."

At the same time, General Hayden said it was necessary to "create a bright line" distinguishing the field activities of the Pentagon and the C.I.A., which historically has had broader legal authority to run covert operations overseas.

He said his first priority was to strengthen the C.I.A.'s abilities to collect human intelligence, yet he also said the spy agency needed to remain the government's "center of excellence" for intelligence analysis.

At the same time, he said the C.I.A.'s workforce of analysts, known as the directorate of intelligence, suffered from a lack of seasoned veterans who could coach the younger analysts who had joined the agency since the Sept. 11 attacks.

To illustrate this, General Hayden said that for every 10 analysts at the agency with less than four years of intelligence experience, there was only one with more than 10 years of experience.

"This is the least experienced analytic workforce in the history of the Central Intelligence Agency," he said.

CIA Nominee Says Was Convinced On Legality Of Domestic Spying (CHIT)

By Stephen J. Hedges

Chicago Tribune, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Gen. Michael Hayden, nominated to be the next director of the CIA, told a Senate committee Thursday that he initially doubted the legality of a Bush administration program to expand domestic wiretaps on U.S. citizens after the Sept. 11 attacks, but that White House officials convinced him the program was lawful.

Hayden headed the National Security Agency, which conducts electronic eavesdropping, when the controversial program was proposed to monitor international calls between suspected Al Qaeda operatives and people in the United States. A furor erupted when its existence was revealed in December, with some Democrats and a few Republicans claiming it was illegal.

Hayden told the Senate Intelligence Committee, which is considering his CIA nomination, he at first told then-CIA Director George Tenet that the NSA was doing all that the law allowed on surveillance.

"Director Tenet came back to me and said, 'Is there anything more you can do?'" Hayden said. "And I said, 'Not within my current authorities.' And he invited me to come down and talk to the administration about what more could be done."

After that talk, Hayden said, he was convinced the NSA could go further. Then-Atty. Gen. John Ashcroft provided the NSA with a memo giving a basis for that eavesdropping authority, he said.

Hayden said he did not read the memo, but on Oct. 6, 2001, the NSA launched what the Bush administration has called a terrorist surveillance program. That program—along with the reported NSA collection of millions of domestic phone records from telephone companies for analysis—has complicated Hayden's confirmation. The programs also have raised questions about the influence the administration has exerted over the intelligence agencies, and about who is accountable for their activities.

NSA eavesdropping was just one concern committee members raised with Hayden, who has spent much of his career working in military intelligence. If the committee approves Hayden's nomination, the full Senate would then vote on his confirmation.

The hearing also touched on politicization of intelligence analysis, treatment of CIA terrorism detainees, improved human intelligence sources, press leaks and whether committee members or Congress receive enough briefings on intelligence matters.

None of those issues seemed to entangle Hayden, though he insisted on answering some of the most sensitive questions in a closed session after the public hearing. Hayden enjoys solid support among Republicans and has won initial praise from some Democrats.

During the hearing, Hayden received mostly genteel treatment from committee members. But senators from both parties criticized the administration, and by inference Hayden, for failing to brief the full committee on the domestic eavesdropping initiative until Wednesday. That decision, they suggested, seemed designed to defuse congressional complaints that only a handful of lawmakers had been briefed about the wiretapping.

Hayden found himself acting as the public face of a still-brewing controversy over domestic surveillance approved by the administration. He was repeatedly asked to explain how the terrorism surveillance wiretaps were started, how extensive they are and what the White House had done to ensure that the program did not sweep innocent citizens into its dragnet.

"When I had to make this personal decision in early October 2001," Hayden said, "it was a personal decision. The math was pretty straightforward. I could not not do this."

In adopting the program, the administration and NSA avoided the usual method of obtaining a warrant for such wiretaps from a special court formed under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

Though that court has approved almost all such requests, the White House has argued the NSA needed to move quickly to capture some calls and that the special court process would have delayed the intercepts.

Committee Chairman Sen. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) seemed defensive that he and not the entire committee had been told early on about the surveillance. He answered criticism from Sen. Ron Wyden, (D-Ore.) that Hayden and the administration had failed to keep the full committee informed.

"We as a country weren't part of any effort to set the standards in these programs," Wyden said, "and most of the members of this committee were kept in the dark and weren't part of any informed debate about these programs."

To that Roberts replied: "I would like to make it very clear that I was briefed on all 13 occasions, along with the vice chairman and the leadership of the Congress. You might think we're not independent. I am independent. And I asked very tough questions, and they were answered to my satisfaction by the general [Hayden] and other members of the briefing team."

Wyden, however, noted that Hayden had testified publicly that the privacy of U.S. citizens was being protected when the NSA was conducting the surveillance.

Republican Sen. Olympia Snowe of Maine took up that theme, arguing that Hayden and his intelligence colleagues in the administration could have briefed the committee well before Wednesday.

"I happen to believe that with the programs in question, that the Congress was really, never really consulted or informed in a manner that we could truly perform our oversight role as co-equal branches of government," Snowe said.

The White House contends the program is legal under broad constitutional authority Bush has to protect the nation and that citizens' privacy rights were protected. Hayden, who left the NSA in 2005 to become deputy director of national intelligence, echoed the White House response.

"Are there privacy concerns?" he said. "Of course there are privacy concerns. But I'm fairly, I'm very comfortable with what the agency did and what I did personally to inform those people responsible for oversight."

But he declined to answer specific questions about the wiretapping, telling senators that he would provide extensive answers in the committee's closed-door session.

Hayden also said he would work as CIA director to take the politics out of intelligence analysis and briefings.

"True accountability is not served by inaccurate, harmful or illegal public disclosures," he said. "I will draw a clear line between what we owe the American public by way of openness and what must remain secret in order for us to continue to do our job."

Nominee Says N.S.A. Stayed Within Law On Wiretaps (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — Less than a month after the Sept. 11 attacks, Gen. Michael V. Hayden summoned 80 or 90 staff members to a conference room at the National Security Agency. President Bush had just approved the use of wiretapping on the international calls and e-mail of Americans without warrants, and the general, then leading the spy agency, was setting his troops in motion.

As General Hayden recounted the meeting at his Senate confirmation hearing on Thursday, he explained what the president had authorized and ended his remarks by saying, "We're going to do exactly what he said, and not one photon or one electron more."

"And I think that's what we've done," he told the senators considering his nomination to lead the Central Intelligence Agency.

General Hayden faced sharp questioning from Democrats about whether the eavesdropping operation was legal and whether he had misled Congress and the public about it. But even under attack, he did not stray from the points that he and other administration officials have stressed in defending the operation in recent months. Again and again, he cited the legal and constitutional authority for the program, the safeguards against abuses, and the need for secrecy to ensure its effectiveness.

But while the message was constant, General Hayden sought to put a more human face on the effort, explaining his role and that of his aides in running the surveillance program.

He told, for instance, of meeting with N.S.A. employees after the disclosure of the program in December in The New York Times and seeking to rally them "at the height of the first fur ball about this."

"You know, they're doing their jobs, but it was a difficult time," he told the committee. "But the only emotion they expressed to me was they wanted to be able to continue to do their work. You know, their fear was not for themselves or that they had done anything wrong, but that they wanted to be able to continue to do what it is they had been doing."

He also told of his talks with a handful of agency lawyers about the legality of the program under the president's authority as commander in chief under Article II of the Constitution. "I talked to the N.S.A. lawyers, most of my personal dialogue with them, they were very comfortable with the Article II arguments and the president's inherent authorities," General Hayden said.

At the same time, however, he acknowledged under questioning from Democrats that he did not read the Justice Department's formal opinion laying out the legal rationale for the program. He also said he did not recall any substantive discussion about the Congressional authorization in September 2001 to use all necessary force against Al Qaeda — a resolution that the White House now says helped give it legal authority for the wiretapping operation.

"Our discussion anchored itself on Article II," he said.

He acknowledged that there had been significant discussion within the administration — and between the White House and the security agency — about undertaking the program.

BellSouth Wants Retraction

ATLANTA, May 19 (AP) — The BellSouth Corporation is pressing USA Today to retract assertions that the telecommunications company provided customers' phone records to the National Security Agency.

The Atlanta-based company's chief lawyer, Marc Gary, sent a letter on Thursday to the publisher of USA Today, the Gannett Company's flagship paper, to retract "false and unsubstantiated statements" made in a May 11 article, said a BellSouth spokesman, Jeff Battcher.

A newspaper spokesman, Steve Anderson, said, "We are reviewing it and will be responding."

Hayden Urges CIA Critics To Refrain (WP)

By Dafna Linzer And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

Gen. Michael V. Hayden, President Bush's choice to lead the CIA, strongly defended the administration's policies on domestic surveillance and the treatment of detainees during his confirmation hearing yesterday, and urged senators to suspend debate about CIA failures and give the agency a chance to rebound.

"It's time to move past what seems to me to be an endless picking apart of the archaeology of every past intelligence success or failure," Hayden said. "CIA officers . . . deserve recognition of their efforts, and they also deserve not to have every action analyzed, second-guessed and criticized on the front pages of the morning paper."

Although accountability is important, he said the "CIA needs to get out of the news as source or subject and focus on protecting the American people by acquiring secrets and providing high-quality all-source analysis."

Hayden vowed to remake the CIA into the premier intelligence agency, in part by encouraging officers to take risks and to admit uncertainties even when top officials press for definitive findings. He promised to "speak truth to power," and said that he and the intelligence community had learned the lessons of Iraq.

"While the bulk of the agency's work must, in order to be effective, remain secret, fighting this long war on the terrorists who seek to do us harm requires that the American people and you, their elected representatives, know that the CIA is protecting them effectively and in a way consistent with the core values of our nation," Hayden said.

In more than six hours of testimony before the Senate intelligence committee, Hayden, a four-star Air Force general, offered assurances in some areas, saying he is committed to safeguarding privacy, to working effectively with other intelligence agencies and to improving the CIA's record of accomplishment. He also acknowledged serious disagreements with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Douglas J. Feith, the former No. 3 official in the Pentagon who is considered an architect of the Iraq invasion.

But Hayden deflected specific questions on sensitive subjects, including interrogation methods involving terrorism detainees and the scope of the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping operation, telling senators he would respond only during the closed-door portion of the hearing.

Hayden, 61, designed the administration's eavesdropping program in the immediate days after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, when he ran the National Security Agency. He defended the effort as helpful in the hunt for al-Qaeda though he provided no specific example of the program's success. Under the program, revealed in December, the NSA eavesdropped, without obtaining warrants, on overseas telephone calls by Americans that involved people the government considered terrorism suspects. Earlier this month, USA Today reported that the NSA had obtained phone records of millions of U.S. residents and businesses.

Hayden shed some new light on the program's inception, noting that he was asked by then-CIA Director George J. Tenet to provide a list of NSA's capabilities after the al-Qaeda attacks, even those that Hayden believed would not be permissible under the law. Hayden suggested the scope of the program may go beyond what is publicly known, but he said there was no White House push for eavesdropping on calls in which both parties were in the United States, and that every measure was taken to protect the privacy of Americans whose overseas calls were monitored.

"I understand there are privacy concerns involved in all of this. There's privacy concerns involved in the routine activities of NSA," he said. He said the warrantless eavesdropping was carefully targeted against al-Qaeda suspects.

"No one has said that there has been a targeting decision made that wasn't well-founded in a probable-cause standard," Hayden said.

Some Democrats questioned the claim, noting that thousands of Americans' calls have reportedly been intercepted.

Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) asked Hayden "whether people that were not associated with al-Qaeda have been trapped in this sort of thing," Hayden replied that if someone is targeted and then dropped, it "doesn't mean that the first decision was wrong. It just means this was not a lucrative target for communications intelligence."

Senators questioned the nominee closely and at length on the constitutionality of the program, which some legal scholars have challenged.

Hayden said the White House's legal basis is rooted in the opinion that Article II of the Constitution gives the president expansive authorities in a time of war to conduct domestic surveillance. Hayden said he never personally reviewed the legal opinion that was drawn up in support of the program, but "when they came to me and we discussed its lawfulness, our discussion anchored itself on Article II."

He said the administration did not attempt to rest its case on a congressional war resolution passed in the days after the al-Qaeda attacks, as Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said after the program was disclosed.

Among other subjects, Hayden said the intelligence community "had to win back the trust of the American people" after failing to accurately assess Iraq's weapons programs, and that it was working hard to avoid such mistakes when judging the threat posed by Iran's nuclear program.

He took particular aim at the intelligence-gathering being done at the Pentagon at the time under Feith, who promoted connections between Saddam Hussein and al-Qaeda. "I wasn't comfortable," Hayden said. "And I wasn't aware of a lot of the activity going on, you know, when it was contemporaneous with running up to the war."

But he sidestepped other questions in the public session, declining to embrace or distance himself from the Bush administration's policies on treatment of al-Qaeda suspects. When Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) asked if he thought "individuals may be secretly detained for decades," Hayden said he would be "happy to answer" in the closed session.

He gave the same answer when Feinstein asked if he condoned the interrogation practice of "waterboarding," in which a detainee is made to feel he is on the verge of drowning. Hayden defended the administration's policy of allowing the CIA to treat detainees more harshly than the military may treat prisoners of war, but said civilian agencies such as the CIA were legally obligated to refrain from "cruel, inhuman and degrading" treatment.

The committee's nine Republicans and seven Democrats signaled that Hayden's confirmation by the Senate is likely. Several congratulated him in advance. "You're going to be one of America's best CIA directors," said Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), who has criticized the administration on some intelligence matters.

Last year, Hayden became deputy director for national intelligence, and was nominated to lead the CIA days after Porter J. Goss was forced out of the job earlier this month, ending a turbulent 18-month tenure.

Hayden honored Goss in his opening statement but repeatedly sought to assure the committee, and those inside the agency, that he plans to run the CIA differently.

Hayden, who has often won high marks on the Hill for his detailed briefings, maintained a calm demeanor through the hours of questioning, although he bristled slightly when Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) said, "General, having evaluated your words, I now have a difficult time with your credibility."

"Well, Senator," Hayden said, "you're going to have to make a judgment on my character."

Wyden said Hayden had used speeches and congressional testimony to suggest that the NSA's surveillance techniques are narrowly focused, a claim that he said does not comport with news accounts. "So with all due respect, General, I can't tell now if you've simply said one thing and done another, or whether you have just parsed your words like a lawyer to intentionally mislead the public," Wyden said.

Hayden, citing his Jan. 23 speech at the National Press Club, said: "I chose my words very carefully because I knew that some day I would be having this conversation."

Hayden Defends Wiretapping In Contentious Hearing (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Air Force Gen. Michael V. Hayden vigorously defended the legality of the Bush administration's domestic wiretapping program and declared that the CIA "must be transformed" to stay abreast of terrorist and other threats during an often contentious hearing on his nomination to be the next CIA director.

Hayden spent much of the day fending off questions about his previous job as director of the National Security Agency. The four-star general acknowledged playing a larger than previously understood role in the creation of the controversial domestic eavesdropping program, and repeatedly refused to respond to questions about details of the operation during the public portion of his testimony before the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence.

But Hayden also described ambitious plans for the beleaguered agency he hopes to lead next, saying he intends to push the CIA to be more aggressive in mounting clandestine operations and more rigorous in the assessments it produces to avoid the mistakes that plagued the prewar estimates on Iraq.

In perhaps the clearest signal of a looming shift in course for the troubled agency, Hayden made it clear that he believes the CIA has become too bogged down tracking daily developments in Iraq and other global trouble spots.

Instead, he suggested that the CIA should surrender more of that work to the Pentagon, focus more of its energies on anticipating longer-term threats and trends, and reconcile itself to a diminished role in which it is an important, but not isolated, member of the U.S. intelligence community.

At one point, Hayden likened the CIA to "a top player on a football team -- critical, but part of an integrated whole. Even the top player needs to focus on the scoreboard, not on their individual achievement."

Hayden, 61, currently serves as the deputy director for national intelligence, the principal deputy to the nation's top spymaster, John D. Negroponte, who oversees the activities of all 16 U.S. spy agencies. The general played a behind-the-scenes role in ousting former CIA director Porter J. Goss, who resigned two weeks ago amid criticism that he was too turf-conscious and resistant to reforms.

Lawmakers and Senate aides emerged from Thursday's session saying that Hayden was likely to be confirmed by the Senate as early as next week. Even so, the hearing made it clear that Hayden's standing among some members has been diminished by his involvement in domestic surveillance programs that have been major sources of controversy for the Bush administration in recent months.

Shortly after the Sept. 11 attacks, President Bush authorized the NSA to intercept communications between people in the United States and individuals overseas suspected of having ties to al-Qaida. In doing so, the NSA bypassed the usual requirement that the government obtain permission from a court before placing wiretaps on a U.S. resident. The Bush administration also kept the program hidden from all but a handful of lawmakers until it was exposed in news reports last year.

During one particularly tense exchange Thursday, Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., challenged Hayden to reconcile details that have emerged on the scope of the surveillance operation with previous public comments downplaying its significance or suggesting that the government was not eavesdropping on Americans without court warrants.

"General, I can't tell now if you've simply said one thing and done another, or whether you have just parsed your words like a lawyer to intentionally mislead the public," Wyden said. "What's to say that if you're confirmed to head the CIA, we won't go through exactly this kind of drill with you over there?"

Hayden shot back: "Well, Senator, you're going to have to make a judgment on my character."

Hayden acknowledged that the program raised privacy concerns, but said repeatedly that he believed it was lawful. "I'm very comfortable with what the agency did, what I did," he said.

He resisted pressure to provide more details, saying he would address matters in a closed session with senators scheduled later in the day. He similarly deflected questions about the CIA's interrogation methods and handling of detainees.

But Hayden did provide some new information on the origins of the domestic surveillance program, indicating that he proposed the idea after being prompted by then-CIA director George J. Tenet to consider what else the NSA might do to combat terrorism.

Tenet "invited me to come down and talk to the administration about what more could be done," Hayden said. "There then followed a discussion as to why or how we could make that possible."

He did not elaborate, but disputed reports that Vice President Cheney or other administration officials put pressure on the NSA to be even more aggressive in spying on Americans.

Some lawmakers have questioned whether Hayden's lengthy military career is a liability at a time when the Pentagon is increasingly encroaching on the CIA's traditional turf. Hayden expressed support for the expanding military role in intelligence-gathering, saying that the burden on the CIA has been so taxing that "we welcome additional players on the field."

But he also sought to distance himself from the Pentagon, noting that he and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld had disagreed over reforms that eroded the military's influence over intelligence operations and budgets.

Hayden was also sharply critical of the activities of a controversial intelligence analytic unit set up within the Pentagon by former Undersecretary of Defense for Policy Douglas Feith, a leading advocate for the war in Iraq.

The team Feith assembled helped make the case for war by uncovering supposed links between Saddam Hussein's regime and al-Qaida. Their findings were presented to the CIA and officials at the White House, but have since been discredited.

Feith's team, Hayden said, had set out to prove a case by assembling "every possible ounce of evidence" and ignoring contradictory information. Using that method, he continued, analysts can build a convincing case against even innocent targets.

"I got three great kids, but if you tell me, 'Go out and find all the bad things they've done, Hayden,' I could build you a pretty good dossier," Hayden said. "You'd think they were pretty bad people because that's what I was looking for and that's what I built up. That'd be very wrong, OK? That would be inaccurate. That would be misleading."

Hayden said he was concerned that numerous investigations and public criticism have taken a toll on the agency.

"It is time to move past what seems to me to be an endless picking apart of the 'archaeology' of every past intelligence failure and success," Hayden said. "CIA needs to get out of the news -- as source or subject -- and focus on protecting the American people by acquiring secrets and providing high-quality all-source analysis."

CIA Nominee Hayden Is Grilled About Surveillance Programs (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Under cordial questioning from U.S. senators, President Bush's nominee to head the Central Intelligence Agency, Gen. Michael Hayden, defended White House programs to monitor American telecommunications traffic but stressed he would operate independently from the Pentagon.

The four-star Air Force general declined in his confirmation hearing to publicly address charges that Mr. Bush authorized much broader surveillance activity, carried out by the Defense Department's National Security Agency, to catalog millions of domestic phone calls. But Gen. Hayden, who headed the NSA from 1999 to 2005, said that the NSA's warrantless wiretaps of international calls believed tied to terrorists were legal and had been sufficiently cleared with Congress.

"When I had to make this personal decision in October 2001...the math was pretty straightforward," Gen. Hayden told the 15 members of the Senate Intelligence Committee yesterday. "I could not not do this."

Gen. Hayden's confirmation process comes amid increased attacks by Democratic lawmakers and civil-liberties proponents on the Bush administration's counterterrorism measures, in particular the NSA programs. Both Republicans and Democrats on the Senate Intelligence Committee used much of their allotted time yesterday trying to learn more about reports that the NSA has developed an extensive database of domestic phone calls. (Yesterday, BellSouth Corp. demanded that USA Today retract "the false and unsubstantiated statements" in an article naming the company as having provided domestic calling records to the NSA. See article on page A5.)

On Wednesday, the White House gave classified briefings to both the Senate and House intelligence committees on the NSA's activities. Yesterday, some Democratic lawmakers said they remained concerned about legalities of the programs and their threats to civil liberties. Some accused Gen. Hayden of assisting the White House in trying to cover up the extent of the NSA activities. "I now have a difficult time with your credibility," Sen. Ron Wyden of Oregon told the general.

In a closed-door session with Gen. Hayden yesterday afternoon, Intelligence Committee members were expected to question him more closely on NSA operations. The committee is expected to vote on his nomination next week.

Gen. Hayden used his opening remarks to outline his vision of how to resurrect the CIA's morale after the intelligence failures leading up to the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and the invasion of Iraq. He stressed that as CIA director he would play a leading role in setting higher standards for collecting human intelligence at all 16 U.S. intelligence agencies and would seek to better integrate the agencies. He said another goal is depoliticizing the CIA and getting it off the front pages of U.S. newspapers.

The CIA has been widely criticized in recent years for using inaccurate sources and failing to share information with U.S. law-enforcement agencies. Last year, Congress established a new office, the Director of National Intelligence, to better manage U.S. intelligence agencies. Gen. Hayden helps oversee that office, and many of the senators said they believed Gen. Hayden's experience at the DNI and NSA made him the best choice to head the CIA.

"You have the vision thing right," Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California told the 61-year-old general.

During the hearing, Gen. Hayden emphasized his independence from the Pentagon and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. He portrayed himself as a foil to Mr. Rumsfeld's ambitions and said he would resist any intelligence grab by the Pentagon. He also said that as CIA director he would serve as a coordinator of all U.S. human intelligence gathering and would regulate the Defense Department's clandestine activities. "We're trying to create a bright line" to distinguish the CIA's and Pentagon's overseas activities, Gen. Hayden said. "It gets sometimes merged. That's why we need to manage this."

Currently, the Defense Department controls 80% of the U.S. government's intelligence budget. Gen Hayden's confirmation would place active military officers in charge of all of Washington's principal spy agencies.

BellSouth Calls For A Retraction Of Report It Gave Records To NSA (USAT)

USA Today, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — BellSouth asked USA TODAY on Thursday to “retract the false and unsubstantiated statements” about the company that it contends were in a May 11 story about a database of domestic calling records maintained by the National Security Agency.

In a letter to the newspaper's publisher, Craig Moon, the company noted that the story said BellSouth is “working under contract with the NSA” to provide “phone call records of tens of millions of Americans” that have been incorporated into the database.

“No such proof was offered by your newspaper because no such contracts exist,” stated the letter, portions of which were read by spokesman Jeff Battcher. “You have offered no proof that BellSouth provided massive calling data to the NSA as part of a warrantless program because it simply did not happen.”

Steve Anderson, a USA TODAY spokesman, said “We did receive the letter this afternoon. We are reviewing it, and we will be responding.”

BellSouth and two other companies named in the story, Verizon and AT&T, have since been sued in federal court for $200 billion by plaintiffs alleging violations of privacy, telecommunications law and the Constitution. BellSouth and Verizon have denied providing information to the NSA. AT&T has said it won't comment on national security matters.

USA TODAY first contacted BellSouth more than five weeks ago. On the night before the story was published, the newspaper described the story in detail to BellSouth, and the company did not challenge the newspaper's account. The company's official response at that time: “BellSouth does not provide any confidential customer information to the NSA or any governmental agency without proper legal authority.”

BellSouth first raised questions on Monday. It said, “Based on our review to date, we have confirmed no such contract exists and we have not provided bulk customer calling records to the NSA.”

BellSouth Demands Retraction From USA Today On NSA Article (WSJ)

By Dionne Searcey And Sarah Ellison

The Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

BellSouth Corp. yesterday demanded that USA Today retract "the false and unsubstantiated statements" outlined in an article naming the company as having provided domestic calling records to the National Security Agency.

In a letter to USA Today president and publisher Craig Moon, as well as to the general counsel of the newspaper's parent company, Gannett Co., the phone company asks for an immediate retraction of the article's characterization of BellSouth's relationship to the NSA.

"We did receive a letter this afternoon. We are reviewing it and we will be responding," said Steve Anderson, a spokesman for USA Today.

A BellSouth spokesman, Jeff Battcher, described the letter as quoting phrases from the May 11, USA Today article7, which describes a massive database of domestic calls that BellSouth -- as well as Verizon Communications Inc. and AT&T Inc. -- allegedly provided to the NSA.

When asked about the letter's content, Mr. Battcher said it cites passages from the article alleging that BellSouth is "under contract with the NSA" to provide "phone call records of tens of millions of Americans" that have been incorporated into a database. The letter also notes that USA Today said the alleged actions "raised legal questions," noting that "telecom law assesses hefty fines on phone companies that violate customer privacy by divulging phone records without warrants."

"BellSouth now insists the newspaper retract the false and unsubstantiated statements you've made regarding our company," the letter said, according to Mr. Battcher.

Since the story appeared Verizon has also denied aspects of it. Neither Verizon nor AT&T would comment on BellSouth's action or say whether they were considering similar moves.

Mr. Battcher said the demand for a retraction was in part prompted by the cost BellSouth likely will incur defending against as many as five lawsuits seeking billions of dollars that have been filed against the Atlanta-based company since the article's publication. The company considers the suits without merit, Mr. Battcher said, and plans to hire outside lawyers to defend the company.

On Monday, BellSouth publicly denied turning over bulk calling records to the NSA, saying the agency had never contacted it to provide information about domestic calls. "We would have thought USA Today would have acted responsibly and retracted the statements," Mr. Battcher said.

The company, he said, "has worked hard to earn the trust of our customers and we hope that USA Today will fulfill its responsibilities to its readers and the public at large by immediately correcting the inaccurate reporting that may undermine that trust."

4 Guatanamo Prisoners Attempt Suicide In One Day (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

GUANTANAMO BAY NAVAL BASE, Cuba — Four terrorism suspects at the sprawling prison network here attempted suicide Thursday, and detainees at a camp for the most compliant prisoners attacked guards with improvised weapons when the guards tried to rescue a man attempting to hang himself, a spokesman for the U.S. military-run prison said.

The disturbance at Camp 4, a communal facility housing 175 prisoners, followed three overdose attempts earlier in the day at Camp 1, where about 180 detainees live in metal mesh cages.

Those involved in the disturbance were moved to maximum-security confinement, said Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, public affairs director for the prison and interrogation network.

Neither the identities nor the nationalities of the prisoners were disclosed.

"When the guard force entered the [Camp 4] compound to intervene and save the life of the detainee, some detainees attempted to prevent them from rescuing the detainee by using fans, light fixtures and other items as improvised weapons," Durand said.

"Minimum force was used to quell the disturbance and prevent the suicide."

As many as 10 detainees participated in the incident.

It was unclear why the men sought to take their lives simultaneously or on this specific day.

Several "distinguished visitors" have toured the prison network this week, including a four-star general, an FBI official and several prominent attorneys seeking to represent prisoners in U.S. court challenges, and international media are here to report on war-crimes tribunal proceedings.

"At this point, I have no idea of the motive, no idea of any coordination and no idea of any intended message," Durand said.

Two of the four men who attempted suicide were hospitalized and under observation, he said.

In a statement announcing the first two attempts to overdose on hoarded prescription medication, Durand said that there had been 39 suicide attempts at Guantanamo by 23 detainees since the prison opened in 2002.

"A single detainee accounts for 12 of the 39 attempts," he said, apparently referring to Juma al Dosari, a 31-year-old Bahraini whose lawyer said he tried to kill himself in March by ripping out stitches from a previously self-inflicted wound.

Durand's figures fall far short of the number of previous incidents officials called "self-harm events" and "hanging gestures."

In 2003, there were 350 such attempts, according to the public affairs officer for the military's Southern Command at the time, Army Col. David McWilliams.

In a single week that year, 23 prisoners tried to hang themselves with nooses fashioned from ripped sheets.

DOJ_NMG_0029064

The number of suicide attempts dropped to 110 in 2004, Southern Command reported.

Military authorities haven't disclosed last year's figure.

On Wednesday, the commander of the prison hospital, who declined to be identified beyond his rank as a Navy captain, confirmed that three detainees continue to refuse to eat and are force-fed through a nasal-gastric tube each day.

A mass hunger strike last autumn at one point involved about 130 prisoners until camp medics intervened with force-feedings.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Lawmakers Rip Homeland Security Management (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

The AP, May 18, 2006

Lawmakers railed against security gaps at the Homeland Security Department on Thursday, demanding to know why a man now charged with sex offenses had access to classified information and a convicted felon's limousine company was paid millions of dollars to chauffeur top officials.

Two Homeland Security officials and the associate director of the U.S. Office of Personnel Management who sat through two hours of grilling largely portrayed the department as victim to a few bad employees and constraining contracting rules.

But members of the House Homeland Security oversight subcommittee said the agency has not been vigilant enough.

In the limousine case, Homeland Security awarded $25 million in contracts to the Virginia-based company whose owner, Christopher Baker, has numerous felony convictions. Other clients used the company to chauffeur people to poker parties attended by House members, CIA officials and, allegedly, prostitutes.

"This is not rocket science," said committee Chairman Peter King, R-N.Y., adding, "This involves kickbacks, gambling, prostitution, and we're talking about people who were driving the highest people in the department around."

Dwight M. Williams, the department's chief security officer, said Homeland Security may not have had the authority to look at Baker's criminal past. He said it only checked the backgrounds of drivers who had access to department headquarters and employees.

"We have to decide how far we want to take the security," Williams said. "It's been focused on those with access."

Brian Doyle was the department's fourth-ranking spokesman, and had top-security clearance, when he was arrested last month on 23 felony charges of sexually preying on a detective posing as a 14-year-old girl in explicit Internet conversations. Doyle, 55, has since resigned from the department.

Noting reports that Doyle had downloaded pornography while on a previous job, King questioned whether the issue could have been detected before the former spokesman joined the department, perhaps with lie-detector tests.

He did not get an answer.

Lawmakers also criticized department officials about rampant staff turnover at the third-largest federal agency, leaving some high-level jobs vacant. K. Gregg Prillaman, Homeland Security's chief personnel director, said the department is still feeling growing pains from merging 185,000 employees from 22 disparate agencies in 2003.

"Executives who were charged up, had high energy after 9/11 — they were highly motivated, and they're tired. They've worked very hard," Prillaman said.

DHS Officials Grilled On Vacancies In High-level Jobs (GovExec)

By Jonathan Marino

Government Executive, May 18, 2006

Lingering senior-level job vacancies at Homeland Security Department agencies including the Federal Emergency Management Agency, Transportation Security Administration and two bureaus involved in border control are worrisome, lawmakers told witnesses at a hearing Thursday.

"Recruitment is probably our highest priority right now," K. Gregg Prillaman, DHS' chief human capital officer, told members of the House Homeland Security Subcommittee on Management, Integration and Oversight.

But FEMA has failed to fill senior-level jobs, according to a memorandum the subcommittee released late Thursday. Subcommittee member Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., whose district was hit by Hurricane Katrina, said with just two weeks left before this year's storm season begins, the agency must beef up its ranks.

"When I see only 73 percent of FEMA employees on board, I'm concerned," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0029065

Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Customs and Border Protection and TSA also are listed in the memo as still having senior-level vacancies.

"We have a very real problem in DHS with retention, recruitment and morale," said subcommittee chairman Mike Rogers, R.-Ala. "The number of vacancies is a growing problem."

At the hearing, lawmakers also raised concerns about DHS' ability to conduct thorough security checks of individual contractors. Rep. Bill Pascrell Jr., D-N.J., said Shirlington Limousines, with which the department signed deals only to see the contractor become engulfed in the "Duke" Cunningham scandal, was run by a man "with a 62-page rap sheet" and multiple convictions. Pascrell and other subcommittee members expressed concern about the department's lack of knowledge about this.

The department had conducted background checks of the company's drivers, said Dwight Williams, director of DHS' Office of Security.

This is the second time in recent weeks DHS officials have been grilled by legislators; Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, told DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff in a memo sent in late April that the department must announce how many jobs FEMA still has open. Davis' staff is still processing the results of that request.

DHS officials maintained that the situation will improve.

"My sense is DHS will be better during the next three years than it was in the last three years," Prillaman said.

Homeland Security Turnover Hurts Morale, Officials Testify (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

It's no secret that morale is a problem at the Homeland Security Department, created three years ago in a mega-merger that pulled together 185,000 employees working in more than 220 occupations.

Bush administration officials have tried to play down turf battles and culture clashes as transitional woes that would fade after the rank and file had worked together for five to seven years, but complaints by employees continue and are starting to get to the ears of members of Congress.

Yesterday, two senior department officials acknowledged that turnover in top management jobs there appears to be adversely affecting employee morale.

Answering questions at a House hearing, K. Gregg Prillaman , the department's chief human capital officer, and Dwight M. Williams , the department's chief security officer, suggested that the turnover rate at the top of the department spills downward into the ranks and influences morale.

Williams said senior leaders -- many are political appointees -- burn out because of long hours and then leave, creating gaps in the top management team. He said the department is more stable than it was 18 months ago but added, "We are not there yet."

The creation of the department, to some extent, was a "hostile takeover" and not something employees would have voted for, Prillaman said. Efforts are underway to train line managers how to better deal with employee issues, he said.

Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Ala.), chairman of the House Homeland Security subcommittee on management and oversight, raised the issue of vacant leadership posts at the outset of the hearing. His list included the undersecretary for science and technology, the commissioner for Customs and Border Protection, the chief financial officer, the assistant secretary for cyber security and the chief privacy officer.

The first three positions require Senate confirmation, and the department has nominees in various stages of the appointment process. But some jobs have been vacant for several months, and Rogers said "other key vacancies are expected soon.

"I am concerned this high turnover undermines the department's effectiveness," he said. "It could also very well weaken our efforts to integrate the department's many agencies and further erode employee morale."

Rogers held the hearing at the urging of Rep. Kendrick B. Meek (D-Fla.), who held up a sheaf of letters that he said had been sent him from Homeland Security employees. The employees, he said, think the department is driving away talent and that managers are struggling to motivate employees.

Meek pointed to MaxHR, the department's new performance-based pay system, as a source of anxiety for the employees. He questioned the fairness of new rules for how employees will appeal major disciplinary actions and for how unions negotiate on behalf of employees. Unions have successfully blocked the new rules in federal court, and the issues are before an appeals court.

Prillaman, who joined the department eight months ago, said the agency thinks the new pay and personnel system will improve morale, in part because managers and supervisors must undergo training to improve their skills in communication.

He noted that 8,000 managers have undergone training on MaxHR and that 6,000 more will be trained by the end of this year.

"We are doing what Fortune 500 companies have been doing over the last 15 years," Prillaman said.

But two union presidents, John Gage of the American Federation of Government Employees and Colleen M. Kelley of the National Treasury Employees Union, testified that some department bureaus have created unnecessary friction, such as adopting new rules for shift assignments regardless of an employee's seniority or family considerations.

In addition, Gage said, inconsistent treatment of employees regarding overtime pay and foreign-language proficiency pay "need to be cured right away."

House Will Probe Limo Contract (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, May 19, 2006

Lawmakers say they will hold hearings to probe a Department of Homeland Security transportation contract, which members of Congress from both parties say raises procurement and security concerns.

Department officials have repeatedly defended both the way the contract was awarded and the security procedures under which it is operated. They have launched a counteroffensive on Capitol Hill, visiting with lawmakers in an attempt to assuage concerns.

Despite their efforts, Rep. Mike D. Rogers, Alabama Republican, chairman of the oversight subcommittee of the House Committee on Homeland Security, said yesterday that he wanted to hold a hearing on the contract award -- to Alexandria-based Shirlington Limousine and Transportation.

Aides said later that he hoped the hearing could happen when Congress returns in mid-June from its Memorial Day recess, but that the timing would depend on when they were able to get documentation from the department.

The hearing is the latest in a series of moves that lawmakers have taken since the Shirlington contract came into the spotlight at the end of last month amid press reports that the company was under scrutiny as part of a congressional bribery probe.

The company has been accused of providing limousines that took prostitutes to parties where lawmakers -- including former Rep. Randall "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican now in federal prison after being convicted of corruption -- were being entertained by intelligence and defense contractors. Shirlington's owner, Christopher Baker, reportedly has a lengthy criminal record and a troubled financial history.

Last week, the committee's ranking Democrat, Mississippi Rep. Bennie Thompson, wrote to the department's inspector general, asking about how the contract was awarded.

He expressed concerns that the contract was not bid out properly, that the company might not qualify for the special "set-aside" status under which it was entitled to bid and that the department might not have fulfilled its due-diligence requirements in ascertaining that the company was a responsible contractor.

With a speed that surprised some familiar with the department's often arthritic response to congressional requests, Chief Procurement Officer Elaine Duke met with Mr. Thompson last week and Wednesday provided written answers to the questions he had posed the inspector general.

In the letter, Miss Duke explained that Shirlington first won the contract in April 2004, under the set-aside provisions of a small-business program for "historically underutilized business zones," known as HUBZone.

The program is administered by the Small Business Administration, which ruled that Shirlington qualified.

Fliers Could Keep Their Shoes On If New Airport Scanner Is Approved (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, May 19, 2006

ARLINGTON, Va. — A government lab is testing a “very promising” new machine that would allow airline passengers to keep their shoes on while going through security checkpoints, the nation's aviation security chief said Thursday.

The machine, which detects explosive material on shoes when people stand on a platform, is getting a “highly expedited” review at the lab, said Kip Hawley, head of the Transportation Security Administration (TSA).

“We are looking at this with great interest,” Hawley said. “Anything that speeds up explosive detection through the checkpoint, we want to encourage.”

He wouldn't give a timetable for deploying the machines. They must pass testing in an airport before they are used to screen passengers.

DOJ_NMG_0029067

The ShoeScanner uses technology similar to a medical MRI to detect explosives in 5 to 8 seconds. It shoots radio waves at shoes to agitate molecules and analyze their structure.

Readings are sent to a computer that holds a library of explosives characteristics and makes a rapid comparison.

Removing shoes at checkpoints has been one of the biggest inconveniences for passengers in the wake of the 9/11 terrorist attacks. Passengers have been urged to remove thick-soled shoes at checkpoints since Richard Reid tried to blow up a Paris-to-Miami plane in late 2001 using plastic explosive hidden in his sneakers.

"The question is: Can you operate and deploy (the machine) and have people walk on it without it breaking down?" Hawley said. "It's sensitive electronic equipment."

The TSA has been searching for technology that detects explosives better than the X-ray machines and metal detectors now used at checkpoints.

The ShoeScanner is being developed by GE Security, a General Electric subsidiary that makes the "puffer" portals deployed at dozens of U.S. airports that blow air jets at passengers to detect explosives residue.

The government's Transportation Security Lab in New Jersey also is testing GE's Itemiser, which detects explosives on passengers when they press a finger on an electronic reader.

The ShoeScanner and Itemiser would first be used only in checkpoint lanes reserved for travelers who pass a background check and pay an annual fee to get faster security under a Registered Traveler program starting in June. Airports and private companies will run the voluntary program. The TSA wants them to pay for new detection machines that may let participants keep their shoes or coats on through checkpoints.

Those machines could ultimately be used for ordinary travelers. "That could be the big payoff for the Registered Traveler program," Hawley said.

GE Security is a minority owner of Verified Identity Pass, a Manhattan company with contracts to run Registered Traveler in Orlando, Cincinnati, Indianapolis and San Jose airports.

"Registered Travelers would be far more secure than anybody going through the regular (security) lanes," Verified Identity CEO Steven Brill said. The ShoeScanner "is a better way to test shoes than putting them through an X-ray."

Federal Judge Dismisses Lawsuit By Man Held In Terror Program (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — A federal judge on Thursday dismissed a lawsuit brought by a man who says he was an innocent victim of the United States government's program transferring terrorism suspects secretly to other countries for detention and interrogation.

Judge T. S. Ellis 3d ruled in favor of the Bush administration, which had argued that the "state secrets" privilege provided an absolute bar to the lawsuit against a former C.I.A. director and transportation companies. Judge Ellis said the suit's going forward, even if the government denied the contentions, would risk an exposure of state secrets.

The case involves Khaled el-Masri, a Kuwaiti-born German, who was arrested on Dec. 31, 2003, in Macedonia, where he had gone for a vacation. From there, he was flown to a prison in Kabul, Afghanistan, where he was held for five months before being released. During his incarceration in Kabul, he has said, he was shackled, beaten and injected with drugs.

United States officials have acknowledged the principal elements of Mr. Masri's account, saying intelligence authorities may have confused him with an operative of Al Qaeda with a similar name. The officials also said he was released in May 2004 on the direct orders of Condoleezza Rice, then the national security adviser, after she learned he had been mistakenly identified as a terrorism suspect.

Judge Ellis said Mr. Masri's claim involved the clandestine program of transferring terrorism suspects known as "extraordinary rendition" and "the means and methods the foreign intelligence service of this and other countries used to carry out the program."

Citing an affidavit by Porter J. Goss, who will leave as director of the Central Intelligence Agency next week, Judge Ellis added, "Any admission or denial of these allegations by defendants in this case would reveal the means and methods employed pursuant to this clandestine program and such a revelation would present a grave risk of injury to national security."

Mr. Masri's lawyers from the American Civil Liberties Union had argued that there were no state secrets to protect as his story has been widely reported and officials had even acknowledged the existence of the rendition program. But Judge Ellis said there was an important distinction between "a general admission the program exists and the admission or denial of the specific facts at issue in this case."

Ben Wizner, an A.C.L.U. lawyer for Mr. Masri, said, "The idea that the court must close its eyes and ears to common sense and protect the nation from disclosure of information that the whole world knows is absurd." He said an appeal would be considered.

Judge Ellis said Mr. Masri's interests in having his rights vindicated in court must yield to "the national interest in preserving state secrets." But he noted that if Mr. Masri's account were true, he "suffered injuries as a result of our country's mistake and deserves a remedy." He said only the legislative or executive branches could provide such a remedy, presumably in the form of compensation or apology.

Iraqi Leader Acts To Defuse Shiite Rivalry In Basra (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Saad Sarhan

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

BAGHDAD, May 18 -- President Jalal Talabani convened an emergency meeting Thursday to discuss the southern port of Basra, Iraq's second-largest city and the heart of a growing, lethal power struggle among some of the Shiite Muslim religious parties that lead Iraq's governing coalition.

Violence in the south Thursday included a bombing at the home of Basra's police chief. In Najaf, another major city in the Shiite-dominated region, the head of local militias loyal to the radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr was shot dead by police allied with a rival Shiite party.

Political violence across Iraq killed at least two dozen Iraqis. Four U.S. soldiers and their Iraqi interpreter were killed when their patrol hit a roadside bomb northwest of Baghdad, and the U.S. military reported the death Wednesday of an American sailor in the western province of Anbar.

The deaths brought the number of U.S. fatalities in May to about 50, a pace that threatens to make this month one of the deadliest this year for American forces in Iraq.

In Baghdad, Talabani summoned Iraq's two vice presidents to discuss the situation in Basra, where one of the smaller Shiite groups, the Islamic Virtue Party, has been engaging in increasingly open hostilities against other Shiite religious parties.

Basra, which is under the control of British forces, was long seen as one of the more peaceful areas of Iraq after the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. The homogeneity of its Shiite population spared it from much of the sectarian violence that racked western and central Iraq.

However, the British troops, who are more hands-off than their American counterparts, are increasingly being accused of allowing militias of the governing Shiite religious parties to infiltrate security forces and seize a large measure of control.

Although the killings of foreign and Iraqi journalists in Basra have limited coverage in the city, residents describe political violence that leaves corpses on the streets daily. Iraqi newspapers this week reported Basra residents fleeing to comparative safety abroad or even in Baghdad.

The governor of Basra province, a member of the Islamic Virtue Party, last week demanded the removal of Basra's police chief and local military leader, accusing them of failing to rein in political and sectarian killings. Since then, the unrest has included an attack on a police station; burning of offices of Iraq's most powerful Shiite party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq; and marches Wednesday that drew thousands of participants.

Talabani assigned Vice President Adel Abdul Mahdi, a member of the Supreme Council, to a task force on the Basra crisis. On Thursday, Abdul Mahdi invoked "the responsibility of the political powers to calm down the situation." In a news conference with his fellow vice president, Tariq al-Hashimi, and Talabani, Abdul Mahdi urged leaders in Basra "not to be diverted by political and party interests when handling the issues of the city."

In Najaf, meanwhile, police shot dead Abbas al-Chillabi, commander of the local regiments of the Mahdi Army militia. An official with Sadr's organization, Sahib al-Amiry, said police shot Chillabi in the head at a checkpoint, and he called it a deliberate political killing.

The Najaf police chief, Brig. Gen. Abbas Moadal, called the shooting an accident. Police at the checkpoint had believed they were under attack when a wedding party that apparently included Chillabi approached the checkpoint, firing shots into the air in celebration, the police chief said.

The killing had the potential to heighten tensions between Sadr's followers and those of the Supreme Council, which controls many government and security offices in Najaf. Both the Supreme Council and Sadr command tens of thousands of militia members.

In Baghdad, the same Shiite parties are among those competing with Sunni Arab, Kurdish and secular blocs for seats in Prime Minister-designate Nouri al-Maliki's cabinet. Maliki faces a Monday deadline to name the new government, which U.S. officials say they hope will bring calm and stability.

Also in Baghdad, coaches, athletes and families gathered Thursday at the capital's taekwondo union, consoling one another and waiting for news about 15 martial arts competitors -- including five members of Iraq's national taekwondo team and the only Iraqi to win a medal at an Asian regional competition in April -- who were abducted Monday on the dangerous desert road between Fallujah and Ramadi. The athletes, dressed in track suits and athletic shoes, had been heading to neighboring Jordan for a vacation.

Jamal Abdul Karim, head of the Iraqi Taekwondo Union, said he and other employees of the club each gave a year's salary Thursday to raise the $100,000 ransom demanded by someone claiming to be an intermediary for the captors.

"We've been praying from the bottom of our hearts to get them released," said Aqeel Abdul-Karim, 26, an employee of the club and friend of the kidnapped athletes.

As Death Stalks Iraq, Middle-Class Exodus Begins (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, May 18 — Deaths run like water through the life of the Bahjat family. Four neighbors. A barber. Three grocers. Two men who ran a currency exchange shop.

But when six armed men stormed into their sons' primary school this month, shot a guard dead, and left fliers ordering it to close, Assad Bahjat knew it was time to leave.

"The main thing now is to just get out of Iraq," said Mr. Bahjat, standing in a room heaped with suitcases and bedroom furniture in eastern Baghdad.

In the latest indication of the crushing hardships weighing on the lives of Iraqis, increasing portions of the middle class seem to be doing everything they can to leave the country. In the last 10 months, the state has issued new passports to 1.85 million Iraqis, 7 percent of the population and a quarter of the country's estimated middle class.

The school system offers another clue: Since 2004, the Ministry of Education has issued 39,554 letters permitting parents to take their children's academic records abroad. The number of such letters issued in 2005 was double that in 2004, according to the director of the ministry's examination department. Iraqi officials and international organizations put the number of Iraqis in Jordan at close to a million. Syrian cities also have growing Iraqi populations.

Since the bombing of a shrine in Samarra in February touched off a sectarian rampage, crime and killing have spread further through Iraqi society, paralyzing neighborhoods and smashing families. Now, on the brink of a new, permanent government, Iraqis are expressing the darkest view of their future in three years. "We're like sheep at a slaughter farm," said a businessman, who is arranging a move to Jordan. "We are just waiting for our time." The Samarra bombing produced a new kind of sectarian violence. Gangs of Shiites in Baghdad pulled Sunni Arabs out of houses and mosques and killed them in a spree that prompted retaliatory attacks and displaced 14,500 families in three months, according to the Ministry for Migration.

Most frightening, many middle-class Iraqis say, was how little the government did to stop the violence. That failure boded ominously for the future, leaving them feeling that the government was incapable of protecting them and more darkly, that perhaps it helped in the killing. Shiite-dominated government forces have been accused of carrying out sectarian killings.

"Now I am isolated," said Monkath Abdul Razzaq, a middle-class Sunni Arab, who decided to leave after the bombing. "I have no government. I have no protection from the government. Anyone can come to my house, take me, kill me and throw me in the trash."

Traces of the leaving are sprinkled throughout daily life. Mr. Abdul Razzaq, who will move his family to Syria next month, where he has already rented an apartment, said a fistfight broke out while he waited for five hours in a packed passport office to fill out applications for his two young sons. In Salheyah, a commercial district in central Baghdad, bus companies that specialize in Syria and Jordan say ticket sales have surged.

Karim al-Ani, the owner of one of the firms, Tiger Company, said a busy day last year used to be three buses, but in recent months it comes close to 10. "Before it was more tourists," he said. "Now we are taking everything, even furniture."

The impact can be seen in neighborhoods here. While much of the city bustles during daytime hours, the more war-torn areas, like in the south and in Ameriya, Ghazaliya, and Khadra in the west, are eerily empty at midday. On Mr. Bahjat's block in Dawra, only about 5 houses out of 40 remain occupied. Empty houses in the area are scrawled with the words "Omar Brigade," a Sunni group that kills Shiites.

DOJ_NMG_0029070

Residents have been known to protest, at least on paper. In an act of helpless fury this winter, a large banner hung across a house in Dawra that read, "Do God and Islam agree that I should leave my house to live in a camp with my five children and wife?"

"Shadows," said Eileen Bahjat, Mr. Bahjat's wife, standing with her two sons and describing what is left in the neighborhood. "Shadows and killing."

In Dawra, one of the worst areas in all of Baghdad, public life has ground to a halt. Four teachers have been killed in the past 10 days in Mr. Bahjat's area alone, and the Ahmed al-Waily primary school where the Bahjat boys, ages 12 and 8, studied, may not be able to hold final exams because of the killings. And three teachers from the Batoul secondary school were shot in late April.

Trash is collected only sporadically. On April 3, insurgents shot seven garbage collectors to death near their truck, and their bodies lay in the area for eight hours before the authorities could collect them, said Naeem al-Kaabi, deputy mayor for municipal affairs in Baghdad. In all, 312 trash workers have been killed in Baghdad in the past six months.

"Sunnis, Shiites, Christians," said Mr. Bahjat, a Christian who this month moved his family to New Baghdad, an eastern suburb, to live with a relative, before leaving for Syria. "They just want to empty this place of all people."

"We must start from zero," he said. "Maybe under zero. But there is no other choice. Even with more time, the security will not improve."

It is more than just the killing that has sapped hope for the future. Iraqis have waited for five months for a permanent government, after voting in a national election in December, and though political leaders are on the brink of announcing it, some Iraqis say the amount of haggling it took to form it makes them skeptical that it will be able to solve bigger problems.

Abd al-Kareem al-Mahamedawy, a tribal sheik from Amara in southern Iraq who fought for years against Saddam Hussein, compared the process to "giving birth to a deformed child."

As if to underscore the point, a scene of sorrow unfolded just outside Mr. Mahamedawy's gate, where an extended family gathered, full of nervous movement, and absorbed the news of the strangling death of their 13-year-old boy by kidnappers. A woman brought her hands to her head in the timeworn motion of mourning.

Even with the resolve to leave, many departing Iraqis said they consider the move only temporary and hope to return if Iraq's fractious groups are united and stem the tide of the killings.

Cars and furniture are sold, but those who can afford it, like the Abdul Razzaq family, hang on to their properties. In Khadra in western Baghdad, Nesma Abdul Razzaq, Mr. Abdul Razzaq's wife, has spent the past months carefully wrapping their photographs, vases and furniture in cloth and packing them in boxes. She spoke of the sadness of the empty rooms and the pain of having to build a new life in a strange place.

"I have a rage inside myself," Mrs. Abdul Razzaq said by telephone, as her area, since last autumn, has become unsafe for a Western reporter to visit. "I feel desperate."

"I don't want to leave Iraq. But I have to for the kids. They have seen enough."

In a quiet block in Mansour, a wealthy neighborhood in central Baghdad, where stately, gated homes are lined with pruned hedges, the Kubba family spends most of its time indoors. They have hung onto their lifestyle: three of their children study violin, flute, and ballet in an arts school outside the neighborhood despite encroaching violence.

Last fall, a foul smell led neighbors to the bodies of seven family members in a house several doors down from the Kubbas. They had been robbed. Fehed Kubba, 15, went to buy bread last year and saw a crowd near the bakery that he assumed was watching a backgammon game. When he pushed in to look, he saw a man who had just been shot to death.

But it was the increasingly sectarian nature of the violence, deeply painful to Iraqis who are proud of their intermarried heritage, that tipped the scales as Falah Kubba and his wife, Samira, considered leaving with Fehed, Roula, 13, and Heya, 12.

"The past few months convinced us," said Mr. Kubba, a businessman whose wife is Sunni. "Now they are killing by ID's. The killing around Americans was something different, but the ID's, you can't move around on the streets."

"At the beginning we said, 'Let's wait, maybe it will be better tomorrow,' " Mr. Kubba said.

"Now I know it is time to go."

Inquiry Implies Civilian Deaths In Iraq Topped Initial Report (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — An official military investigation into allegations that American marines killed innocent Iraqis last November has uncovered evidence that the number of dead civilians is higher than the 15 originally reported, Congressional and Defense Department officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0029071

The inquiry, which Pentagon officials said was still weeks from completion, has already raised fundamental questions about the propriety of actions by the troops, one Defense Department official said. But the official said that a characterization this week by a member of Congress that the Iraqis had been killed "in cold blood" was an extreme description of the incident.

In the incident, marines patrolling Haditha, in western Iraq, in November opened fire after being hit by a roadside bomb and coming under small-arms fire from a nearby house, the military says. One marine was reported killed by the bomb.

But details of the incident went unreported until March, when Time magazine said Iraqi human rights advocates had accused the marines of killing civilians and after the military had opened an inquiry and admitted that 15 Iraqi civilians had been killed in the cross-fire.

Another Pentagon official said Thursday that the marines had come under fire but that evidence gathered so far indicated the hostile fire had not come from the house where the civilians were killed. Defense Department officials had to be promised anonymity to discuss the case because of the continuing inquiry.

On Wednesday, Representative John P. Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, talked about the investigation at a news conference on Capitol Hill. "Our troops overreacted because of the pressure on them, and they killed innocent civilians in cold blood," he said. "And that's what the report is going to tell."

He said he had not read the official findings of the inquiry, but had been told about them by officers he identified as commanders.

Mr. Murtha said the number of Iraqi civilians killed was about twice the initial report of 15. Defense Department officials said Thursday that evidence indicated that more than 15 had been killed, but that the inquiry had not confirmed his estimate of double that number.

A leading Congressional critic of the Iraq war, Mr. Murtha served in Vietnam in the Marine Corps and was known as a hawk on military issues before becoming a leader of Democratic Party efforts to withdraw American troops from Iraq.

"Now, you can imagine the impact this is going to have on those troops for the rest of their lives and for the United States in our war and our effort in trying to win the hearts and minds," Mr. Murtha said. "We can't sustain this operation."

A spokesman for Marine forces in the Middle East, Lt. Col. Sean D. Gibson, said Wednesday that he could not comment on the substance of Mr. Murtha's statements because the inquiry was not complete.

New Iraqi Government Prepares To Take Stage (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, May 19, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraqi leaders will announce the makeup of the country's new government this weekend, then turn to the task of running a country increasingly divided along ethnic and religious lines.

After months of wrangling, those leaders say they have come up with a system that will help develop consensus on critical issues.

The new government has established oversight committees in which representatives of Iraq's various groups will debate issues and resolve problems, said Humam Hammoudi, an influential cleric with the United Iraqi Alliance, the religious Shiite alliance that is the largest political bloc in parliament.

A 10-member Security Committee will oversee the Interior and Defense ministries, Hammoudi said. The Interior Ministry, responsible for internal security, has been dogged by allegations that its police abused their power and ran “death squads” that targeted mostly Sunni Arabs. The Security Committee will handle cases of alleged abuse and corruption in those ministries, Hammoudi said.

A separate, 19-member Political Committee for National Security will meet once a month, he said. Its functions: forging agreements on major issues before parliament takes them up, and trying to break deadlocks among lawmakers.

That committee will be made up of the prime minister and his two deputies; the president and his two deputies; nine members of the United Iraqi Alliance; and representatives from Sunni Arab, secular Shiite and Kurdish political groups, Hammoudi said.

“The fate of the national unity government depends on this committee,” Hammoudi said. “All the members will be high-ranking members of the Cabinet and the six main blocs. So, of course, if they reach an agreement (on a course of action), it will happen.”

The United States has encouraged political leaders to form a government that represents all of Iraq's main religious and ethnic groups. The incoming prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, has said most of the Cabinet will be presented to parliament Saturday.

Hussain al-Shahristani, a former nuclear scientist who was jailed under the regime of Saddam Hussein, is expected to be appointed oil minister, Hammoudi said. Bayan Jabar, who was criticized for not reining in militias when he was interior minister, will be nominated as finance minister, he said.

However, al-Maliki may not announce nominees for the Interior and Defense ministries this weekend, Hammoudi said. Political leaders had not reached agreement on those posts Thursday, he said.

Parliamentary elections were held in December. Parties and politicians have argued since then over the makeup of the government.

Kenneth Katzman, an Iraq expert at the Congressional Research Service, was pessimistic about the chances that the new government will be able to get a handle on the militias and ethnic killings.

"The squabbling among major factions that led to the delay in forming a government will not end after the government takes office," he said. "It is highly unlikely that the government will be willing or able to dismantle the militias responsible for sectarian violence, which is getting worse."

But Robert Ford, a political officer at the U.S. Embassy, said the government will have wide support.

"These negotiations have been long and difficult because we have a fundamentally different kind of Iraqi government that is emerging," Ford said. It will be "a much broader government than before, and it has deeper roots throughout Iraq," he said.

Also Thursday:

·Four U.S. soldiers and their Iraqi interpreter were killed by a roadside bomb northwest of Baghdad, the U.S. military said.

·The kidnappers of a diplomat from the United Arab Emirates demanded that the Emirates' embassy in Baghdad be closed. The demand came in a video aired on Arab television, the Associated Press reported.

National Dialogue Added To Cabinet (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, May 19, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Iraqi officials said yesterday that a new government to be announced as early as tomorrow will include a new Ministry of National Dialogue, in an effort to stop the sectarian killings and violence that has spread through most of the country.

But the effort might fall short, because Sunni leaders are not satisfied with the Cabinet lineup cobbled together after months of closed-door negotiations.

"To be honest, I am not very happy. I feel we have not changed much," said Saleh al-Mutlaq, a top Sunni leader. "The government is one based on sectarian, narrow-minded parties. It is not going to solve the security on the street or reduce the corruption."

He said the Sunnis were willing to continue working with Prime Minister-designate Nouri al-Maliki, adding that the Sunnis had been offered three ministries: the environment, women's affairs and national dialogue.

Negotiations over who will take which Cabinet post have been going on since the Dec. 15 national elections, with all the political factions demanding a role.

A member of the ruling Shi'ite majority United Iraqi Alliance said Mr. al-Maliki has tried to form a government of national unity that can rule Iraq effectively for the next four years.

"It is not necessary that all [political] blocs are presented in the government, or it might be a government that is too heavy to move," said Qassim Dawood, whose name has been mentioned as an Interior Ministry candidate.

"Like any compromise, you cannot please everyone," he said.

U.S. officials have been pushing for a government that would balance Iraq's ethnic and religious divisions, saying that is the key to ending the daily bomb attacks against Iraqi civilians and Iraqi and U.S. forces.

Mr. Dawood, who belongs to the same party as Mr. al-Maliki does, dismissed the idea of a Ministry of National Dialogue.

"It's a silly idea," he said. "We have a parliament, with all the blocs representing most of the fragments of Iraqi society, so let them dialogue."

Four U.S. soldiers and an Iraqi interpreter died yesterday when a roadside bomb exploded near their vehicle northwest of Baghdad, the military said.

The military also reported running gunbattles for the seventh straight day between U.S. troops and insurgents in southeastern Ramadi, the capital of the Sunni Anbar province.

Critics of the emerging government said a strongly Shi'ite religious government would not ease the insurgency.

"We were hoping that technocrats and experts would be chosen. It would have been better for the country," said Issam Kadhum al-Rawi, a member of the Sunni Association of Muslim Scholars and the Association of University Lecturers.

"But they chose the wrong people. We wanted experts, not religious people," Mr. al-Rawi said. "I am afraid everything will get worse and worse."

He said there was still no decision on who would lead the powerful Interior and Defense ministries.

Earlier, those close to the government talks had said Mr. al-Maliki would pick a Shi'ite to lead the Interior Ministry and a Sunni to lead the Defense Ministry.

Current Interior Minister Bayan Jabr, who is accused by many of allowing Shi'ite death squads to operate, is expected to move over to the Finance Ministry, Mr. al-Rawi said. But many on the street think Mr. Jabr will continue to hold the reins of the intelligence branch.

Ex-senator Linked To Oil-for-food Claims (FT)

By Claudio Gatti In New York

Financial Times, May 19, 2006

The US Senate is looking into allegations that a former US senator urged Baghdad to give a US company lucrative contracts under the much-criticised United Nations oil-for-food programme.

This is the first time that a leading US lawmaker has been linked to the controversial UN programme, whose shortcomings have been an important element of the Bush administration's critique of the UN.

The investigation involves one of the most vivid figures in US east coast politics, former senator Robert Torricelli, a New Jersey Democrat who was forced to pull out of the 2002 election after being "severely admonished" by the Senate ethics committee for accepting expensive gifts from David Chang, a campaign contributor. Mr Chang, a Korean-American businessman, was found guilty in 2002 of conspiring to violate federal campaign laws and was jailed for 15 months.

Senator Norm Coleman, the Republican chairman of the US Senate permanent sub-committee on investigations, said: "We take these allegations seriously and will continue to investigate in a bipartisan manner allegations of wrongdoing under the oil-for-food programme. We have investigated the illicit conduct of politicians in Russia, France, and the UK. We have a similar interest in preserving the institutional integrity of the US Senate, so we take these allegations regarding former Senator Torricelli seriously and will continue our investigation into them and will refer our findings to the appropriate agencies." The British, French and Russian politicians investigated by the subcommittee deny the allegations.

The allegations are based on Iraqi documents, including diplomatic cables, retrieved after the fall of Saddam Hussein, Iraq's former president. The Financial Times and Il Sole 24 Ore, the Italian business daily, have obtained copies of some of the Iraqi diplomatic cables. A source also described the contents of some of the other Iraqi documents.

The Iraqi documents also involve a former Republican congressman, James Courter, who allegedly met with Iraqi officials on behalf of Bright and Bright, Mr Chang's trading and lobbying company.

According to the documents, Mr Torricelli, nicknamed "the Torch" for his incendiary political style, had a series of meetings in the late 1990s, when he was a congressman, with Nizar Hamdoun, then the Iraqi ambassador to the United Nations. During these meetings, Mr Torricelli allegedly urged the Iraqi authorities to help Mr Chang and Bright and Bright get oil-for-food contracts on good terms.

The first meeting between Mr Torricelli and Mr Hamdoun took place on March 10 1996, when, according to an Iraqi document that has been described to the FT, Mr Torricelli reportedly suggested that he was willing to play an active role in improving US-Iraq communications.

The two talked about Resolution 986, which was going to set the rules of the oil-for-food programme. Mr Torricelli said a number of US companies would be interested in doing business with Baghdad, and specifically mentioned Mr Chang.

According to the same Iraqi document, Mr Torricelli met Mr Hamdoun again two days later. At that meeting, Mr Torricelli said that since their previous conversation he had spoken with Edward Gnehm, the deputy US representative to the UN, who was leading negotiations with Iraq about the oil-for-food programme.

On June 22, according to the same document, Mr Torricelli allegedly met Mr Hamdoun again. Mr Torricelli told him he had heard that the Iraqis might not give US companies any contracts and advised him that this would be a mistake. Mr Torricelli told Mr Hamdoun that he expected to win a US Senate seat in the November election (as he later did), and said that Bright and Bright was important to him and his election campaign and that he hoped that the company would receive contracts from Iraq.

According to the Iraqi document, Bright and Bright initially asked for 60 per cent of Iraq's oil contracts and a discount of $1.50 a barrel. Then on June 11 1996, a Bright and Bright executive wrote to Mr Hamdoun asking for government contracts worth as much as $300m in the first 90 days of the oil-for-food programme. In return, he said Bright and Bright would continue to support the normalisation of relations between the US and Iraq.

In mid-November 1996, according to the Iraqi document, Mr Hamdoun met with Mr Courter, then a former New Jersey Republican congressman, who is described in the Iraqi documents as the president of Bright and Bright. A Dun and Bradstreet entry for Bright and Bright lists Mr Courter as one of its principals. Mr Courter refused to comment. However, a spokesman for the company Mr Courter now runs said he was not an officer of Bright and Bright, but that "he was their [Bright and Bright's] attorney and was representing them in a legal capacity".

According to the Iraqi document, Mr Courter reportedly outlined a possible deal to Mr Hamdoun: if Iraq committed itself to stop all delaying tactics against UN inspections, use peaceful means to deal with the Kurdish people, not seek weapons of mass destruction, join the convention against chemical weapons, steer clear of any neighbouring country's territory and reject terrorism, Bright and Bright would help Baghdad in its efforts to lift UN sanctions.

In return, the Iraqi authorities were to promise to write a letter of intent giving preference to Bright and Bright in the fields of oil, industry, transportation and communications. According to the Iraqi document, Mr Courter told Mr Hamdoun that he had discussed the proposal with US government officials in Washington and had their approval.

Contacted by telephone, Mr Torricelli, who now runs his own business consulting firm and remains a powerful figure in New Jersey politics and a prominent Democratic party fundraiser, admitted meeting Mr Hamdoun "many times", "probably both" in Washington and New York "and in Baghdad". He first denied mentioning Mr Chang or Bright and Bright during his conversations with Mr Hamdoun. When told about the Iraqi documents that suggested there had been discussions, he said he did not remember mentioning them.

Mr Torricelli said he was not concerned about being contradicted by Iraqi diplomatic cables: "Iraqi cables can state almost anything. They have absolutely no credibility." He said Mr Hamdoun was "very well known and respected in the US government" and that, "unlike most Iraqi officials, he had some credibility".

Mr Gnehm, the US diplomat, also confirmed meeting Mr Torricelli and discussing Iraq. Mr Gnehm, who has left the State Department and is a professor at George Washington University, said Mr Torricelli came to the meeting with a "Korean" businessman whose name he did not recall. "I remember being surprised that there was someone else there, and I didn't know then why he was present. As an American diplomat I would be responsive to a congressman and to an American businessman, even a foreign businessman who had plants in the United States, but somebody like him? I didn't have any sense of why he was there. I figured that he and Torricelli had some sort of friendship or relationship."

On the subject of that meeting, Mr Gnehm said: "I think the general discussion was on how one goes about getting contracts in the oil-for-food programme . . . Certainly, one of Torricelli's approaches to me over this period of time was an effort to try to get business for some of the companies in his district."

An April 15 1996 cable from Mr Hamdoun to Tariq Aziz, Iraq's deputy prime minister at the time, if authentic, appears to corroborate these allegations. According to the cable, which has been obtained by the FT, the Iraqi mission to the UN had received a letter from the "American company that had been mentioned to us by Congressman Torricelli". In the letter the US company allegedly indicated its desire to send a delegation to Baghdad to negotiate possible commercial deals. The cable ends with a recommendation to sign an agreement with the company. A subsequent cable from Mr Hamdoun suggests that the "US company" being discussed is Bright and Bright.

During these talks, in August 1996, the Iraqi army seized the Kurdish city of Erbil. The Clinton administration responded by ordering air raids against Iraq. Engaged in a bitter Senate race, Mr Torricelli, together with all New Jersey lawmakers from both parties, backed the move. Ultimately, no concrete deals came of the discussions between Baghdad and Bright and Bright.

Mr Hamdoun died in July 2003. Mr Chang could not be contacted for comment, despite repeated efforts to reach him.

Taliban Stepping Up Attacks In Afghanistan (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

Knight Ridder, May 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - Afghanistan is fast becoming the toughest peacekeeping mission in NATO's 57-year history as the Taliban presses some of its most intensive attacks since the Islamic militia was driven from power in 2001.

More than 100 people, including a U.S. contractor, a Canadian soldier and dozens of insurgents, died in clashes and suicide bombings on Wednesday and Thursday, mostly in the Taliban's birthplace of southern Afghanistan, according to U.S., NATO and Afghan officials.

In one incident, hundreds of insurgents attacked the southern town of Mosa Qala on Wednesday evening, and fighting raged through the night, leaving at least 13 Afghan police and dozens of Taliban dead.

The unrest comes as thousands of British, Canadian and Dutch peacekeepers are deploying into southern Afghanistan, replacing U.S. troops in a major expansion of NATO's International Security Assistance Force.

Until now, ISAF has overseen security in Kabul and reconstruction projects in relatively peaceful central, western and northern regions. But with its move south, NATO, which was created to defend Western Europe from a Soviet invasion, is becoming embroiled in an escalating guerrilla war in the heart of the Muslim world.

"In the Balkans, we never had ground forces that had to deal with insurgent organizations. We had ground forces that had to deal with riots, criminal groups and the occasional war criminal. But NATO has never faced a major insurgency," said Seth Jones of the RAND Corp., a research institute that advises the Pentagon.

The U.S. commander in Afghanistan, Army Gen. Karl Eikenberry, said last week that the Taliban is better trained, armed and organized than in the past and has adopted tactics used in Iraq, including sophisticated improvised explosive devices and suicide bombers.

Some of the violence is related to tribal rivalries and a major Afghan government drive to eradicate the poppy crops that make the country the world's largest producer of opium, from which heroin is made.

Eikenberry said that with NATO's expansion, more than 20,000 U.S. troops concentrating on counterinsurgency efforts in eastern Afghanistan and major strides being made in the training and deployment of Afghan security forces, the Taliban will be contained by year's end.

Despite its resurgence since last year, the Taliban isn't strong enough to overthrow President Hamid Karzai's government. But some U.S. officials and independent experts warn that the Taliban's real aim is to whittle away at the already seriously diminished confidence many Afghans have in their leader and his U.S.-led allies because of persistent violence, crime and corruption and the slow pace of reconstruction.

By targeting ISAF's southern deployment, the Taliban also appears intent on weakening public support in NATO nations for the peacekeeping operation. On Wednesday, only hours after a female Canadian soldier was killed, the Canadian parliament approved an extension of Canada's participation in ISAF until 2009 by only four votes.

"There are huge questions over how NATO will perform and whether countries will sustain this," said Bob Templer of the International Crisis Group, a conflict-prevention organization. "The further we get away from 9-11, the more difficult it is to sell."

"The situation is bad," agreed a U.S. official, who asked not to be further identified because he wasn't authorized to speak publicly. "It's going to be a hot summer. It's going to be bloody."

The bloodshed also has heightened tensions between Afghanistan and Pakistan, the Taliban's one-time chief patron.

Pakistan's continued cooperation is vital to the Bush administration's pursuit of al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden, who's believed to be hiding on the rugged Afghan-Pakistan border, and the global network of violent jihadi groups that he inspires.

The violence "is a test of NATO and a test of the U.S. ability to coordinate in the war on terrorism between two countries that are at odds with each other," said Amin Tarzi, an analyst with U.S.-funded Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty.

As the violence persisted Thursday, Karzai accused Pakistan's military regime of aiding in the Taliban's resurgence by training and arming the insurgents.

"Intelligence agencies of Pakistan have been providing training to militants and send them back to Afghanistan after equipping them," he told tribal elders in Kunar Province, according to the Afghan Islamic Press agency.

Pakistan denies that it's backing the Taliban, pointing to the intense counterinsurgency operations that tens of thousands of its troops have been conducting in tribal areas bordering Afghanistan.

But U.S. officials say that Islamabad could do more, and some experts contend that Islamabad is quietly aiding the Taliban because it's angry at the ties that Karzai and the Bush administration are cultivating with Pakistan's archrival, India.

"There is a huge anxiety in Pakistan with whatever the Indians are doing," said Templer. "There is a view in the Pakistan military that Afghanistan is really their backyard."

India's involvement in Afghanistan includes the construction of a highway in southern Nimroz Province, bordering Pakistan and Iran, by a state-owned Indian construction organization closely tied to the Indian military.

More Than 100 Killed In Fighting In Afghanistan (USAT/AP)

By Noor Khan, The Associated Press

USA Today, May 19, 2006

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan — About 100 people were killed in fighting as Islamic militants clashed with Afghan, U.S. and Canadian forces Wednesday and Thursday.

Close to 90 militants were killed as were at least 15 Afghan police, an American civilian training Afghan forces and the first female Canadian soldier to die in combat.

The fighting was concentrated in the southern provinces of Helmand and Kandahar. The Taliban, an Islamic militia that controlled Afghanistan until its leaders were ousted in 2001, has stepped up attacks in recent months.

DOJ_NMG_0029076

President Hamid Karzai said the violence was coming from the mountainous regions of neighboring Pakistan. The area is populated by ethnic Pashtuns, who make up the majority of the Taliban militants. “In the madrassas (Islamic schools), the mullahs and teachers are saying to their students: ‘Go to Afghanistan for jihad,' ” Karzai said.

Pakistan's Foreign Ministry spokeswoman, Tasnim Aslam, called the allegations “baseless.”

The latest violence started late Wednesday in Musa Qala in Helmand province. About 300-400 militants attacked a police and government headquarters.

Deputy Gov. Amir Mohammed Akhunzaba said the bodies of about 40 Taliban militants were recovered. He said 13 police were killed and six wounded. British military spokesman Capt. Drew Gibson said Afghan police reinforcements forced the militants to flee.

In neighboring Kandahar province, up to 27 Taliban militants were killed during an operation by the U.S.-led coalition Thursday.

Elsewhere in Kandahar, 18 Taliban militants and Canadian Capt. Nichola Goddard died in fighting. Canada's first female soldier to die in combat was killed late Wednesday, said Maj. Scott Lundy, a Canadian military spokesman.

Gen. Zahir Azimi, a spokesman for the Afghan Defense Ministry, said U.S. forces' hand-over of security operations in the south to NATO could be fanning the violence. The transfer is to take place by July. “Maybe the Taliban is trying to show NATO that they are active there, but coalition and NATO forces are both strong,” he said.

Also Thursday, a suicide bomber attacked in Herat, near the Iranian border. The bomb killed Ron Zimmerman, 37, of Connersville, Ind. He was working on a U.S. project to train Afghan police. Other attacks near Kabul killed a civilian and two police officers.

Afghanistan Rocked As 105 Die In Violence (WP)

By Pamela Constable

ASADABAD, Afghanistan, May 18 -- Afghanistan has been rocked over the past two days by some of the deadliest violence since the Taliban was driven from power in late 2001. As many as 105 people were reported killed in four provinces as insurgents torched a district government compound, set off suicide bombs and clashed fiercely with Afghan and foreign troops.

Between 80 and 90 Taliban fighters were killed in Kandahar and Helmand provinces, according to Afghan, U.S. and NATO officials. Two sites in Kandahar were struck by U.S. warplanes, including a long-range B-1 bomber, which U.S. military officials said destroyed a compound that Taliban guerrillas were using to stage an attack.

Among the dead were an American police trainer killed by a car bomb in Herat province, a female Canadian army captain and at least 12 Afghan national policemen, officials said.

Afghanistan experienced several years of relative calm after the pro-Western government took over in Kabul in 2001. But in recent months, the pace and scope of insurgent attacks have been increasing steadily, and now include suicide bombings, a tactic long foreign to Afghanistan. The violence has surged as NATO forces prepare to assume the lead military role in Afghanistan from U.S. troops this summer, a transition that some observers believe the Taliban and other insurgent groups are seeking to test.

President Hamid Karzai, visiting the capital of eastern Konar province under heavy security, angrily denounced the new violence as the work of religious extremists and intelligence services in neighboring Pakistan, saying they had sent young men across the border to stage attacks in the name of holy war.

"In Pakistan they train people to go to Afghanistan, conduct jihad, burn schools and clinics," he told a gathering of provincial elders in a long, emotional speech. "What kind of Islam is this?"

Karzai did not blame Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, calling him a "dear brother" and saying that "terrorism is a fire that will extend to your country, too." But he directly taunted Mohammad Omar, the fugitive Afghan Taliban leader, challenging him to "show yourself" and "come fight with me" instead of hiding.

The president expressed particular anguish over the death of the Canadian soldier, Capt. Nichola Goddard, who died Wednesday in a battle with Taliban attackers in Kandahar. "Our land is being protected by a lady from Canada, when we should be protecting her as a guest," he said.

The police trainer killed by a suicide blast in Herat was serving on a contract from the U.S. State Department's Bureau of International Narcotics and Law Enforcement. A statement from the U.S. Embassy in Kabul did not identify him, but said that several other Americans and Afghans were wounded by the bomb and that U.S. forces fearing another attack later shot dead the Afghan driver of a truck who failed to stop at a checkpoint and drove directly at the Americans.

The escalating violence has led to a deepening rift between Karzai and Musharraf, who are both important U.S. allies in the region. The Afghan government has long asserted that Islamic fighters are being supported and sheltered by groups within Pakistan. In February, Karzai presented Musharraf with a list of alleged armed extremists living in Pakistan.

The Pakistani leader bristled at the accusations and dismissed them as outdated or fabricated. He has asserted repeatedly that he is doing his best to combat terrorism within Pakistan, and he has sent large numbers of soldiers into the desolate tribal areas bordering Afghanistan, where Taliban and al-Qaeda members are widely believed to have taken refuge.

"They talk about people crossing from Pakistan, but we have 78,000 troops and 800 check posts," said Aftab Khan Sherpao, Pakistan's interior minister, in a recent interview. "The militants used to feel safer in the tribal areas because of the culture and the religious bent of mind there, but now we are really exerting pressure and tightening the loop. We get flak from the local people but we have to do it."

U.S. military officials, who work closely with both the Afghan and Pakistani armed forces, say they believe Musharraf shares their concerns about regional terrorism and does not seek to destabilize Afghanistan. But it is not clear, they say, to what extent he can control powerful groups in his country that still support the Taliban or harbor a lingering ambition to dominate Afghanistan.

For those people, Karzai had harsh words Thursday, vowing that Afghanistan "will never become a colony of any country," and excoriating groups that use religion as an excuse to attack their neighbors.

Konar, which stretches alongside the Pakistani tribal region, has come under persistent attacks, including a rocket assault that killed seven children at a school in Asadabad in April. Since March, Afghan and U.S. forces have staged a massive sweep of troubled districts in Operation Mountain Lion.

Karzai, who rarely travels to remote provinces because of security concerns, arrived here from Kabul on one of a formation of U.S. military helicopters.

The president's vehement remarks about Pakistan were repeatedly applauded by provincial leaders, and in welcoming poems and songs young Afghans exhorted him to be tough on "our neighbor enemies."

Questions Karzai received here underlined why it has been difficult to uproot the revived Islamic insurgency even with thousands of foreign troops aiding the new Afghan army and police.

Several local leaders asked the president to help win the freedom of Konar tribal and religious figures held in U.S. military prisons as suspected insurgents. Others pleaded with him to build more Islamic schools in their province, a higher priority for many families than roads or clinics.

In a brief interview after his speech, Karzai said he had not given up on Musharraf and recognized his strategic importance to the U.S.-led anti-terrorist effort. But the Afghan president said he had come under a lot of domestic pressure to get tough with Pakistan.

"People see that nothing has changed and they are very angry," he said. "They want me to stop talking nicely and do something."

Afghanistan Bomb Kills American And Wounds 2 (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, May 18 — An American counternarcotics official was killed and two other Americans were wounded in a suicide bombing on Thursday in western Afghanistan, while heavy fighting between forces suspected of being Taliban insurgents and the Afghan police continued in two southern provinces, officials said.

The violence occurred amid increasing reports of many militants moving around rural areas. The fighting killed 13 police officers and possibly dozens of insurgents, officials said.

"We confirm that a U.S. citizen contractor for the State Department Bureau of International Narcotic and Law Enforcement, working for the police training program in Herat was killed in a vehicle borne I.E.D. attack," said Chris Harris, a spokesman for the United States Embassy, using the initials for improvised explosive device. "Two other Americans were injured; one critically, and one has minor injuries."

Col. Ghulam Sarwar Haidari, the intelligence chief for the provincial police department in Herat, a western town, said the attack was a suicide bombing. He said the bomber, who wore a long beard but was not identifiable, drove his car, packed with explosives, into the Americans' vehicle, which was part of a three-vehicle convoy on the main road leading north from Herat.

Another apparent suicide car bomb attack on Thursday killed the driver and a civilian passing on a motorbike near an American military base in Ghazni Province, south of Kabul, the capital, said Hajji Sher Alam, the provincial governor. Another civilian was injured, he said.

A Canadian military statement on Thursday described fighting in Panjwai, near Kandahar in the south, in which a Canadian soldier was killed Wednesday. The fighting in Panjwai lasted all day and through the night as coalition and Afghan police officers and army forces entered the district against scores of militants who have been moving through the area for weeks, the Canadian statement said. It said 18 fighters suspected of being Taliban members had been killed and 35 others had been captured. Local residents had told Afghan security forces of 15 armed men hiding in a mosque who were among those captured, the statement said.

In a second statement released in Kabul describing the fighting, Maj. Gen. Benjamin C. Freakley, the American operational commander of coalition forces, was quoted as saying, "This well-organized, cooperative engagement was exactly the operation needed to restore security to Panjwai, where extremists have been intimidating and threatening the people."

Heavy fighting also occurred Wednesday in the neighboring Helmand Province, when militants attacked a police post in Musa Qala, a district in the main poppy growing region in the northern part of the province. The police fought the militants off, said a spokesman for the provincial administration, Haji Muhaiuddin Khan.

He said that 50 Taliban fighters had been killed, but conceded the police had found the bodies of only 10 militants. Thirteen police officers were killed and six wounded, and 10 militants were captured, he said.

Medals Given For Valor In Afghan Fighting (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

FORT BRAGG, N.C., May 18 -- Sgt. 1st Class David Lowe and his Special Forces A-team were in their last week in Afghanistan on June 10, 2005, when their base received an urgent call: A small group of 82nd Airborne paratroopers was pinned down in a firefight near the Pakistan border and needed support.

"When you're that close to leaving the country and you've survived the whole time, you kind of stand down a little bit," said Lowe, 26, of Lancaster, Pa., recalling that much of the team's equipment was packed. "But they needed help," he said, "so we went," setting out on a mission that would prove vital and tragic.

Lowe's bravery in the Afghan mountains that sweltering summer day was rewarded Thursday with a Silver Star, which was pinned on by Brig. Gen. John F. Mulholland Jr., the head of the Special Forces Command, as Lowe and 12 fellow soldiers from 1st Battalion, 7th Special Forces Group, were honored at a ceremony here.

As fighting surges in Afghanistan against a reinvigorated Taliban, the stories behind Lowe's medal and others awarded for valor in combat offer vivid glimpses into the intensity of warfare in the country's most contested zones. Increased violence, particularly suicide and improvised bombs, has inflicted a worsening toll of U.S. troop deaths, which now total 234 -- including 10 for 7th Group.

U.S. military commanders acknowledge that the war that began in 2001 with the Special Forces' rapid overthrow of the Taliban government is far from over. They have put off plans to withdraw several thousand U.S. troops -- including conventional and Special Forces -- from Afghanistan this year.

The combat trials faced by Lowe and his comrades suggest the challenge that lies ahead.

It was midafternoon last June when Lowe's team, accompanied by Afghan forces, began climbing a steep mountainside to reach the 82nd Airborne paratroopers fighting off pockets of enemy on all sides.

Lowe's team moved through the brush without talking. The sun cast shadows on the hills, making it difficult to see. Lowe was uphill providing cover ahead of Sgt. 1st Class Victor Cervantes, who walked below through a dry streambed, when fire from a Kalashnikov broke out near Cervantes's position.

Lowe turned and dashed back, catching a glimpse of a camouflage coat and a figure ducking between the trees and rocks. Lowe fired at it with his M-4 and the gunfire stopped. Then he began yelling, "Vic!" "Vic!" trying to find his teammate.

"So anyway, Vic was dead," Lowe recalled, choking up at the memory. But Lowe, the team medic, said he controlled an urge to charge blindly up the hill in revenge.

Instead, according to his medal citation, during a six-hour firefight, Lowe moved deliberately to aid the wounded -- at one point dashing over 150 yards of open ground. He climbed an exposed rock pinnacle to shoot down a fighter who had a teammate pinned down, and helped kill six other attackers, including some who shot at the soldiers as they attempted to carry out Cervantes's body.

"We were a week from going home, and he's putting himself in harm's way -- he's the real hero today," Lowe said of Cervantes, 27, of Stockton, Calif.

Chief Warrant Officer 3 Jason Hope, 39, of Tulsa, also received the Silver Star for his daring leadership during a hastily executed spring 2005 raid on a fortified Taliban camp in Paktika province that killed a senior regional Taliban commander for southeastern Afghanistan.

As soon as they got off the helicopter near the camp, Hope's team came under withering fire from about 20 enemy fighters awaiting with rocket-propelled grenades, AK-47s, and machine guns with armor-piercing bullets. The team fought its way up a ridge overlooking the camp, and then, to reach the stronghold, Hope led a flat-out race across 600 yards of open desert.

Following Hope, Staff Sgt. Charles Maxwell watched as bullets chopped up dust around his feet. "I wasn't going to let him go without me," said Maxwell, 32, who was awarded a Bronze Star for valor.

Prosecutor Not Amused By "Sick...Joke" (ROANT)

By Lindsey Nair

Roanoke Times, May 19, 2006

Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Hogeboom is knowledgeable about a lot of things, but repairing wheelchairs is not one of them.

Nevertheless, he claims in court documents that he recently received calls from six elderly customers of Active Solutions, an Ohio-based medical equipment company, requesting that he service their broken-down motorized wheelchairs.

Hogeboom this week filed a motion seeking a temporary restraining order against Active Solutions and its parent company, CBI Co. LLC. The motion accuses Active Solutions of harassing its customers by referring them to Hogeboom for wheelchair repair requests.

Active Solutions used the customers' plight to "play a sick practical joke by harassing victims and witnesses," the motion states.

Valerie Eastwood, counsel for CBI, declined to comment on the motion except to say she would respond "fairly quickly."

Active Solutions and CBI are under federal investigation for suspected Medicare fraud, but they have not been charged with any crimes.

According to a search warrant affidavit unsealed this month, investigators believe Active Solutions advertised power scooters, then shipped customers much more expensive motorized wheelchairs instead and billed Medicare for the chairs.

As part of the investigation, federal agents in late March seized six vehicles and $1.8 million in assets from Active Solutions.

This week's motion claims that since the affidavit was unsealed, Active Solutions has been telling wheelchair owners that Hogeboom can "explain why the company cannot repair chairs" and address their concerns.

Hogeboom complains in the motion that these referrals were made with no explanation that he is a federal prosecutor, not a repairman, and at the expense of people who need working wheelchairs to live a quality life.

"The referrals were done in a callous disregard for the plight of the elderly and infirm," the motion claims.

Because the customers who were told to contact Hogeboom are potential witnesses or victims in the case, the government is requesting that a judge deem the company's behavior harassment. The motion requests that Active Solutions be ordered to stop referring calls to Hogeboom.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Next Lay Trial, Over Bank-Fraud Charges, Begins (WSJ)

By Gary McWilliams

Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

HOUSTON -- Former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay1's "other" trial -- on charges of violating bank-lending agreements -- began Thursday with his defense attorney insisting Mr. Lay wasn't aware of any violations.

Mr. Lay is charged with bank fraud and misrepresentation for borrowing $75 million from three banks and using the money to acquire Enron stock. The government contends that Mr. Lay used personal loans from Bank of America Corp., Compass Bancshares Inc.'s Compass Bank and J.P. Morgan Chase & Co.'s Chase Bank to acquire Enron stock in violation of loan agreements.

The bank-fraud case is being tried separately from the conspiracy and fraud case against Mr. Lay and former Enron president Jeffrey Skilling2. In that trial, the jury completed its first full day of deliberations (after a partial day on Wednesday) without reaching a verdict. The eight-woman, four-man jury won't meet on Fridays, so it will resume considering the charges against the two former executives Monday morning.

"Mr. Lay had absolutely no motive to do what he's accused of doing here," defense attorney Ken Carroll said of the bank charges. He called the regulation "confusing" and suggested the criminal charges were a stretch. The alleged violations are "a regulatory issue, a civil issue but not a crime," said Mr. Carroll. He said Mr. Lay repaid all the loans.

The bank-fraud charges are being heard without a jury before U.S. District Court Judge Sim Lake3, who also is presiding over the conspiracy and fraud trial of Messrs. Lay and Skilling. Each of the four charges carries an up to 30-year prison sentence. Judge Lake has said he won't issue a decision in the bank-fraud case until the jury in the conspiracy and fraud case returns its verdict.

Prosecutor Robb Adkins accused Mr. Lay of "lying to the banks" to increase his borrowing limit. The loans restricted the amount of money he could borrow to 70% of the value of shares held for collateral if the borrowings were used for nonstock investments, but only 50% of the value of shares if the borrowings were used to buy stock, he said. Mr. Lay, he said, was "not satisfied with a 50% loan, he wanted a...larger loan to buy his stock."

James Shelton, a former Bank of America private banking manager, testified that he several times advised Mr. Lay of the rules restricting the purchase of stock using so-called "nonpurpose" loans backed by shares. He said the bank initially set up two separate $8 million lines of credit, one for nonstock investments and another to allow him to purchase stocks.

The credit line that was set up to purchase stocks shrank over time, while Mr. Lay increased the line used for nonstock investments, said Mr. Adkins. By September 1997, Mr. Shelton said Mr. Lay sought to increase his line of credit for nonstock investments to $30 million and wanted just $750,000 for stock purchases, he said.

Sally Ballard, an assistant to Mr. Lay who handled the documents overseeing his personal investments, testified that she wasn't aware of the differing restrictions on the lines of credit when she prepared requests. She also testified that she used a machine to affix his signature to documents when he was unavailable to sign them.

Under questioning by a prosecutor, she acknowledged writing a note to Mr. Lay that suggested she was familiar with the stock-purchase restriction, called Reg. U. In that 1995 note, she wrote: "I realize we were advised by James [Shelton] that according to Reg. U we cannot use borrowing to pay off these lines. Please advise."

A 2nd Criminal Trial Begins For Former Enron Chief (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

New York Times, May 19, 2006

HOUSTON, May 18 — As a jury spent its first full day deliberating the fates of the former Enron chief executives, Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, a second criminal trial began yesterday, with prosecutors accusing Mr. Lay of repeatedly lying to banks about how he would use $75 million in loans.

Using testimony of a bank loan officer, an investment adviser and a personal assistant who still works for Mr. Lay, prosecutors tried to show that he borrowed millions of dollars and violated federal banking regulations by investing much of the money in stocks after he signed documents saying he would not do so.

He did so "not just a few times, but repeatedly and time and again," the prosecutor, Robb Adkins, said in brief opening arguments.

In an unusual compromise, Judge Simeon T. Lake III broke off these four charges from the main Enron case after Mr. Lay's defense team sought to have the entire case against him separated from Mr. Skilling's. Last year, Mr. Lay waived his right to a jury trial on the bank charges, in part because of the technical nature of banking statutes, meaning the case will be decided by the judge. The charges — one of bank fraud and three of lying to banks — are based on a cache of prosaic loan documents and personal financial records from the early 1990's to 2001. The charges are not related to the fraud and conspiracy charges Mr. Lay faces in the Enron case with his co-defendant, Mr. Skilling.

Judge Lake has indicated that he will not issue his decision until the jury in the other case, which he also presided over, renders a verdict, which is expected to take a week or more.

Defense lawyers for Mr. Lay contended that he did not knowingly violate any laws in how he handled his personal loans from three banks and added that he did not have any reason to do so because he had more than adequate collateral to pay off the loans. "It may be a civil issue; it may be a regulatory issue, but it's not a crime," a lawyer for Mr. Lay, Ken Carroll, said.

Several times during the day, Judge Lake chided lawyers, particularly the defense lawyers, to pick up the pace.

At one point, Mr. Carroll asked a former Bank of America loan officer, James Shelton, about how he dealt with other clients who had loans similar to Mr. Lay's. Judge Lake asked if the defense intended to call other bank clients and Mr. Carroll responded he would call three or four people.

"No, you are not," Judge Lake quickly replied.

The prosecution contends that Mr. Lay started lying to his banks after Mr. Shelton told him in 1993 that banking laws dictated that he could borrow only 50 percent of the value of the stock that he was putting up as collateral if he used the proceeds to buy publicly traded stock.

He later took out two lines of credit from Bank of America — one that allowed him to buy stock and one that did not. The second line of credit allowed him to borrow as much as 70 percent of the value of his collateral.

"Mr. Lay wasn't satisfied with a 50 percent loan, he wanted a larger loan," Mr. Adkins said.

Financial documents displayed by prosecutors yesterday showed that Mr. Lay used millions of dollars from those credit lines to buy stock-based mutual funds and individual stocks like Eli Lilly & Company, on whose board Mr. Lay used to sit.

Mr. Lay's lawyers asserted that he was not fully apprised of the restrictions he faced and that the loan documents were not always clear.

The defense also said that on some bank documents, though they could not say how many, Mr. Lay's signature was rendered by a signature machine because he was out of town. Defense lawyers also tried to show that Mr. Lay's assistants were not aware of the difference between the two sets of loans.

"At any time did Mr. Lay ask you to do something you were uncomfortable doing?" George McCall Secrest Jr., another defense lawyer, asked Sally Ballard, Mr. Lay's assistant.

"Absolutely not," she replied.

Mr. Lay and his lawyers have said and repeated again Thursday, though not in the courtroom before Judge Lake, that the banking law Mr. Lay is accused of violating is an arcane Depression-era statute that has to the best of their knowledge, been used only once against a bank customer, more than a decade ago.

Congress passed the laws, now known as Regulation U, after the stock market crash of 1929 in an effort to make it harder for investors to speculate using borrowed money, said John C. Coffee, a law professor at Columbia University in New York. Also, lawmakers believed that it would be better for the economy and job creation if banks lent more money to farmers and manufacturers rather than investors, he said.

"These are standard parts of any loan agreement that you are not going to unlawfully use the proceeds," Mr. Coffee said. "These are not unknown and esoteric, they are plain-vanilla representations," he said about the statements signed by Mr. Lay in the course of obtaining his loan.

Enron's Ken Lay Goes On Trial On Another Front: Bank Fraud Charges (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, May 19, 2006

HOUSTON — A second trial began here Thursday for former Enron CEO Ken Lay, who stands accused of violating an obscure banking law that forbids using proceeds from certain types of loans to buy publicly traded stock.

The four bank fraud charges, which carry penalties of up to 30 years, were severed from the larger trial in which Lay and another former Enron CEO, Jeff Skilling, are charged with conspiring to hide Enron's financial condition from investors in 2000 and 2001. Jury deliberations in that trial began this week and will continue Monday.

The second trial is being held without a jury before the same judge who managed the Enron fraud case, U.S. District Judge Sim Lake. Unlike the jury trial — a sprawling drama which began in January and featured testimony from 56 witnesses including Lay and Skilling — the bank fraud case is narrow and should end early next week.

Lake has said he won't announce his verdict in the bench trial until jury deliberations have concluded in the larger Enron case.

In his opening statement Thursday, prosecutor Robb Adkins told the judge that Lay repeatedly violated “Regulation U,” a rule put in place following the 1929 stock market crash to protect banks from borrowers who speculate in the stock market. According to the rule, when a borrower uses stock as collateral for a loan, banks are only allowed to lend an amount equal to 50% of the stock's value. Every borrower has to sign a form indicating he or she understands the rule.

The idea, Adkins explained, was to prevent a “daisy chain” effect that crippled many U.S. banks following the '29 crash, when speculators used stock as collateral for loans and then invested the loans in more stock. “The process only works if these forms are filled out truthfully,” Adkins said.

James Shelton, a former Bank of America loan executive, told the court that he explained the limitations of Regulation U to Lay when he approved loans to the former Enron CEO in the 1990s. Asked whether he thought Lay understood the rule when he took out loans, Shelton said he did. “He was a very hands-on, detail-oriented person,” Shelton said.

Lay's attorney, Ken Carroll, suggested that the former Enron CEO was so busy he didn't necessarily micromanage every investment he made.

"If anybody told him he wasn't doing the right thing with these lines (of credit), he would have fixed it," Carroll said. Carroll also pointed out that Lay traveled a lot, and didn't necessarily sign every document that needed his signature. An "auto-pen" was sometimes used at Enron for documents that needed Lay's signature when he wasn't around, Carroll said.

Sally Ballard, who works for Ken Lay and his wife, Linda, in a secretarial capacity, also testified. Ballard admitted that in grand jury testimony several years ago, she confirmed that Lay used proceeds of his bank loans to buy stock. But on the stand Thursday, she said she may have been mistaken during the grand jury proceedings. Thinking it over afterward, she said, she realized a document purporting to confirm Lay's use of bank loans to buy stocks could simply have been an old form that she never revised. She acknowledged that Lay was paying for her legal fees.

Lay's Second Trial Starts As First Jury Deliberates (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

Washington Post, May 19, 2006

HOUSTON, May 18 -- As jurors quietly deliberated conspiracy and false-statements charges against him Thursday, former Enron Corp. chairman Kenneth L. Lay endured the start of a separate trial on bank fraud violations that carry substantial prison time if he is convicted.

Lay, 64, stands accused of four criminal counts for allegedly lying to banks about how he would use multimillion-dollar lines of credit. Prosecutors accused the former corporate titan of falsely telling banks he would not use the loans to buy stock, then turning around and doing just that. Each charge carries a maximum prison term of 30 years.

Lay's alleged conduct violated Federal Reserve rules put in place after the 1929 stock market crash spurred policymakers to restrict how credit is used, prosecutor Robb Adkins argued.

"The process only works if the forms are filled out truthfully," Adkins said, pointing to "dozens and dozens" of instances when Lay signed documents pledging to follow the rules, then allegedly broke his promise.

Former Bank of America executive James Shelton, the relationship manager on Lay's account in the early 1990s, testified that the rules are important because the bank could be held liable if its clients violate the law -- and "I might very well lose my job." Shelton said he met with Lay several times to discuss the rule, known as Regulation U.

Because scores of documents exist, the key question in the case is whether Lay intended to violate the rules, an issue that prosecutors say is clear from his signature alone.

Lay's lawyers, who previously have scoffed at the charges as an overly zealous attempt to target their client, suggested a number of possible defenses, including the argument that his subordinates may have used a machine known as an "autopen" to affix his signature to several of the forms.

But U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III, the ultimate decision maker in the bank case, inquired whether the distinction was a real difference. "Is there a distinction if he knowingly caused an employee to affix his signature electronically?" the judge asked, directing defense lawyers to produce prior court cases to support their assertion.

On cross-examination by Lay attorney Ken Carroll, Shelton said he did not believe Lay had engaged in a scheme to defraud the bank. He added that he had never done an investigation of how Lay was using the loans or developed any suspicions about them at the time.

Defense lawyer George "Mac" Secrest also suggested that Lay, who traveled frequently during his tenure at Enron, was too busy to have paid much attention to the forms. Instead, Secrest said, Lay simply signed where his staffers instructed him to do so. Sally Ballard, an employee of Lay's for 22 years who continues to work for his family part time, readily agreed.

Earlier Thursday, prosecutor John C. Hueston presented a pair of memos Ballard had written to Lay in November 1995 indicating that he was "technically bound by" the bank rules. The judge interjected with his own question, wondering whether the memos were delivered to Lay himself. Yes, Ballard answered.

Lake said he will render a decision on the bank fraud charges sometime after the eight-woman, four-man jury in the broader case decides whether Lay and former Enron chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling are guilty of leading a conspiracy to defraud investors and employees about the energy trader's health. That case is the government's biggest and most heralded in an effort to hold corporate officials accountable for misconduct on their watch.

The jury broke for the day around 4 p.m. central time, after deliberating for six hours without sending a note or other tangible evidence of their progress. Jurors will return to their deliberations Monday, when the bank fraud case also will resume.

No Enron Verdict; Lay Starts 2nd Trial (LAT)

Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

HOUSTON — Jurors in the trial of former Enron Corp. leaders Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling ended a second day of deliberations Thursday without reaching a verdict, meeting behind closed doors as Lay returned to court for a separate trial.

The jury of eight women and four men left the courthouse in downtown Houston for a long weekend, having decided at the beginning of their deliberations that they would not work on Fridays. The panel has so far made no requests of U.S. District Judge Sim Lake.

While Skilling, 52, has remained out of sight since the jurors retired to weigh the evidence, Lay was back in Lake's fourth-floor courtroom for the opening of his second trial, this one centering on charges that he misused personal bank loans.

In the second case, which is being heard by Lake without a jury at Lay's request, prosecutors say the once highflying executive used Enron stock as collateral for $75 million in loans, signing documents required by the bank and federal regulators pledging that he would not use the money to buy more stock.

But Lay, 64, did buy stock with those loans, Assistant U.S. Atty. Rob Adkins said in opening arguments.

"This is the stock he promises the banks he would not purchase," Adkins told Lake in a brief opening statement as the trial began. "Banks take these forms very seriously to protect against [stock] market failure."

Government witness James Shelton, a Bank of America Corp. executive who oversaw the bank's loans to Lay starting in 1993, told the judge that he explained to Lay many times that he was forbidden under federal law from using some of the credit lines to buy stock. Shelton said he also got Lay to sign forms explaining the limitation.

During cross-examination, Lay's attorney, Ken Carroll, suggested that many of the loan documents may have been signed by an automatic signature machine both Lay and his wife, Linda, used, and that Lay's assistants would have used the machine "if somebody sends him a pile of bank documents and had to be signed in order to get a loan done."

When Lake asked Carroll whether there was a distinction to be made if the signatures were made electronically, Carroll responded that although it could be a civil or regulatory matter, "It's not a crime."

Carroll declined to make an opening argument. As he did in the first case, Lay was expected to take the witness stand in his own defense.

Each of the four counts of bank fraud and false statements to banks carry prison terms of as many as 30 years and a fine of $1 million. Those penalties are in addition to the decades in prison Lay could face if convicted in the fraud and conspiracy trial.

In the first case, Lay is charged with six counts of conspiracy and fraud, and Skilling with 28 counts of conspiracy, fraud and insider trading linked to Enron's 2001 collapse.

Lay and Skilling have denied any wrongdoing at the company.

Enron Jurors End 1st Day Of Deliberations (AP)

AP, May 19, 2006

HOUSTON (AP) -- Jurors in the fraud and conspiracy trial of Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay and former Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling finished their first full day of deliberations Thursday in the premiere case to emerge from one of the biggest corporate scandals in U.S. history.

The eight-woman, four-man panel received the case Wednesday and had deliberated for about 9 1/2 hours by day's end Thursday. Deliberations will continue Monday.

"It's nerve-racking," Skilling's lead lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli, said about the wait for a verdict. Skilling's trial was the California civil attorney's first criminal case.

Skilling can wait in his legal team's so-called "war room" in an office building across the street from the federal courthouse in Houston. But Lay went on trial again Thursday on bank fraud charges stemming from his personal banking.

The banking case is being tried without a jury before U.S. District Judge Sim Lake, who presided over the pair's conspiracy case as well.

Lake plans to issue his verdict in the banking case, which is expected to last several days, after jurors in the larger conspiracy case render theirs. The jury aims to deliberate Monday through Thursday and take Fridays off, mirroring the conspiracy trial's schedule.

Next door to Lay's bank fraud trial, the first of three retrials of five former Enron broadband-unit executives was winding down in its third week, with closing arguments expected as early as Friday.

In that case, former unit finance chief Kevin Howard and former in-house accountant Michael Krautz are charged with conspiracy, fraud and falsifying records for allegedly using a sham deal to fake earnings in late 2000. Both testified this week that the deal was legitimate.

Last year's three-month trial ended in a hung jury, and the other three ex-executives are to be retried in separate cases later.

Enron, once a Wall Street favorite, landed in bankruptcy protection in December 2001 amid scrutiny of hidden debt and inflated profits. More than $60 billion in market value, almost $2.1 billion in pension plans and 5,600 jobs disappeared in the failure of the company.

In the conspiracy case, Skilling faces 28 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors, while Lay faces six counts of fraud and conspiracy. If convicted on all counts, Skilling faces a maximum of 275 years in prison. Lay faces a maximum of 45 years.

The government sought to prove through 25 witnesses that both men repeatedly lied about Enron's financial health when they knew accounting trickery and fudged numbers created a glossy illusion of success.

The defense countered through 29 witnesses, including Lay and Skilling, that neither did anything wrong and no fraud occurred at Enron other than that committed by a few executives who ran lucrative side deals behind their backs. The defendants attributed Enron's collapse to bad publicity and lost market confidence.

Out Sick For The Enron Trial, And Rethinking It (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

New York Times, May 19, 2006

HOUSTON, May 18 — It started with what felt like a heart attack.

Just minutes after he had cross-examined Enron's former chief financial officer two months ago, Michael W. Ramsey, the lead lawyer for Kenneth L. Lay, turned to one of Mr. Lay's daughters. "I think I just had a heart attack," he half-jokingly told the daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, looking her in the eye across the defense table.

Mr. Ramsey said he thought the discomfort would subside in an hour. It did not.

Within days Mr. Ramsey was forced into surgery to clear an arterial blockage. For the 66-year-old, who describes himself as a hard-drinking, chain-smoking legal warhorse, it was the beginning of the most challenging personal odyssey of his career and an event that may turn out to play a crucial role in the outcome of Mr. Lay's case.

After further heart complications, Mr. Ramsey missed more than a month of the 56-day trial, including the testimony of Mr. Lay, the former Enron chief executive who had paid Mr. Ramsey $2 million to lead the legal team in his criminal trial.

Despite his belated but powerful return to action on Tuesday, Mr. Ramsey's illness raises questions that probably will never be answered.

Would he have controlled an indignant Mr. Lay on the stand better than George McCall Secrest Jr., the lawyer who ended up questioning Mr. Lay? Should Mr. Lay have sought to delay the trial when his most experienced criminal lawyer was unable to participate?

"This is the major what-if in this case," said Joel M. Androphy, a criminal defense lawyer in Houston. "You can't just replace Ramsey's years of experience in not only defending people but in communicating with jurors."

Mr. Ramsey acknowledged that several lawyers advised him to push Mr. Lay to seek a delay. "Ramsey is the glue that held that defense together," said his good friend, Dick DeGuerin, another prominent Houston defense lawyer. "It was a mistake not to at least ask the judge for a continuance or a mistrial."

Mr. Lay, for his part, said he was "not second-guessing anything." He conceded that his own strained finances contributed to the decision to carry on with the case.

"They were important," Mr. Lay said Wednesday. "But the right decision was to move ahead and to get it done."

Without Mr. Ramsey, Mr. Lay's defense team appeared to drift into disarray. Mr. Ramsey, after all, had been defending the Enron founder since well before he was indicted in 2004. He had been a principal architect of the defense strategy, which he laid out in his opening statement — that Mr. Lay was a victim of government overreaching by prosecutors bent on punishing the top officers for Enron's collapse.

The company was forced into bankruptcy, Mr. Ramsey contended, by a virtual conspiracy of short-sellers and news articles that caused a "classic run on the bank."

Mr. Ramsey's absence mattered in other ways. He had led his team's selection of the jurors with an eye to how they would react to him, not the other lawyers.

"When you take me out of the equation, whoever takes my place may not have that same communication," he said.

And in the end, Mr. Ramsey was not able to help his client when a prosecutor, on cross-examination, confronted Mr. Lay with the provocative statements that Mr. Ramsey had made to reporters outside the courtroom: that short-sellers were "vultures" and Enron's former treasurer, Ben F. Glisan Jr., was a "trained monkey."

Last week, on the last day of testimony, an unsteady, shuffling Mr. Ramsey returned to court against his doctors' advice, after more than a month of surgical procedures and fitful time spent mostly in a hospital bed. Even when he was at the hospital, he said he obsessively followed the trial through daily transcripts, media reports and daily calls to the other defense lawyers.

"Ken Lay is a good friend of mine, somebody I admire," Mr. Ramsey said. "I wanted very much to assist him. I really felt quite helpless in that situation, and helpless is not a condition I like to feel."

Weeks before, after the doctors first made the diagnosis, Mr. Lay had confidently forecast his lawyer's return. "I expect him to return in time to pull out the victory," Mr. Lay told reporters.

And return he did. On Tuesday, Mr. Ramsey anchored a four-lawyer lineup for Mr. Lay, arguing for 12 spirited minutes.

In his characteristic style, part Southern preacher and part angry grandfather, he raised his voice in indignation as he urged the jury to find the courage to reach an "unpopular" verdict of not guilty.

"Reasonable minds disagree on every point at issue in this case," he said in a near-shout. "Every one of them!"

And in a flourish that evoked Patrick Henry's famous revolutionary line, "Give me liberty or give me death!" he added, "When the spear of government starts to touch living flesh, we're proud of our liberty."

Mr. Ramsey lamented the next day that he needed about 50 minutes to really stir the jurors' emotions. But he said he might not have had the stamina — or the credibility with jurors after such a long absence — to argue that long.

Mr. Ramsey's original diagnosis of a blockage in one coronary artery seemed manageable, thanks to advanced treatments that rely on a less-invasive procedure from which patients often return to regular activities in just a few days.

After surgery on Friday, March 24, Mr. Ramsey returned to court the next Monday. But the symptoms soon returned. Further tests revealed a 95 percent blockage in a different artery, which could have led to a stroke, and Mr. Ramsey said he probably was not getting "enough blood to the brain."

His sudden health problems were particularly frustrating because, he said, he had undergone a complete physical and stress test just weeks before the trial began and been given a clean bill of health. He says he eschews drink when a case is on trial. His smoking habit has been harder to tame. "I have smoked three packs of Winstons a day for 50 years," he said.

On Wednesday, about an hour after the Enron case went to the jury, Mr. Ramsey dug into a tenderloin steak at a restaurant near the "war room loft" he rents downtown when he wants to focus on big cases. The doctors, he explained, said that if he would quit smoking they would not fuss at him about what he eats.

In interviews this week, some lawyers raised questions about whether Tuesday's closing argument would be the last hurrah in Mr. Ramsey's 40-year career, one spent exclusively as a criminal defense attorney.

"He has a fabulous talent before a jury," said Jamie Wareham, the global chairman of litigation for Paul, Hastings, Janofsky & Walker. "But would he be the right choice in a lawyer, given his health issues, for an extended trial? He might not be anymore."

Raised in the blue-collar town of Channelview, Tex., outside Houston, Mr. Ramsey rose to prominence defending accused murderers and police officers accused of civil rights violations. After working under the renowned trial lawyer Richard Haynes, who was known as Racehorse, Mr. Ramsey cemented his national reputation in 2003 by helping win the acquittal of a New York real estate heir, Robert A. Durst, after Mr. Durst shot and killed a neighbor, dismembered him and tossed the body parts into Galveston Bay.

While he said he was not considering retirement, Mr. Ramsey said he did plan to slow down. He said he was "seriously thinking about trying a case overseas," possibly at a tribunal in The Hague. "They try cases in a much more civilized fashion over there," he said.

But the timing of his illness — in the midst of what he called the "biggest business case since Teapot Dome" — continues to haunt him. "I will always regret I got sick in the midst of this particular trial," he said. "That is something I will live with the rest of my life."

Who Wins This Case? Lawyers (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

Firms that had once shunned criminal work now see white-collar defense as a potential growth business.

Daniel M. Petrocelli and his Century City law firm probably won't be fully compensated for their work defending Jeffrey K. Skilling, as the former Enron Corp. chief executive appears to have exhausted his defense fund.

But the payoff down the road could be well worth it, even if Skilling is convicted.

The decision to defend Skilling is seen as a business move by Petrocelli and his firm, O'Melveny & Myers, to burnish their reputation and expertise in white-collar criminal defense.

White-shoe firms like O'Melveny that had once shunned criminal work as distasteful have come to see defending alleged corporate wrongdoers as a potential growth business. Enron's collapse, other corporate scandals and passage of the Sarbanes-Oxley law tightening corporate accounting rules have fueled much of this growth.

"Law firms are finding that criminal law practice is lucrative," said Charles Weisselberg of UC Berkeley's Boalt Hall School of Law.

Said Bryant Garth, dean of Southwestern Law School: "Firms are competing really aggressively to get the bet-the-company or bet-your-career cases."

White-collar defense is one element behind booming revenues at law firm giants. Revenues at the seven top-grossing U.S. law firms last year exceeded $1 billion, according to American Lawyer magazine. New York-based Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom headed the list with a record $1.6 billion. O'Melveny ranked 15th with gross revenue of $808 million.

To sustain that cash flow, top-drawer firms fiercely compete for Fortune 100 clients. That competitive pressure means the decision to take on a corporation or executive in trouble may mean weighing a near-term loss of fees against the possibility of future work from that client or other corporations, legal experts say.

After a 3 1/2 -month trial — on top of years of preparation — Skilling probably has blown through the $23 million he set aside for his defense before the government froze about $55 million of his assets. The former Enron executive, charged with 28 counts of conspiracy, fraud and insider trading tied to Enron's collapse, acknowledged in trial testimony that he owed quite a bit more — millions, according to a source in his defense camp.

Even with full payment in doubt, O'Melveny has fielded a deep bench in Houston for Skilling's defense. Petrocelli is one of at least four firm attorneys who have been in the courtroom throughout the trial. They have been backed up by a team of attorneys, jury consultants, experts and support staff laboring on the 25th floor of Bank of America Center in downtown Houston.

Their rabbit warren of offices and cubicles is cluttered with carts stacked high with documents. Whiteboards on the walls are covered with notations, many apparently relating to the fall of Enron.

The criminal defense bar has long included stars such as Thomas A. Mesereau Jr. and the late Johnnie L. Cochran Jr., whose Perry Mason-like courtroom style have made them the first call for celebrities in distress. Mesereau successfully defended singer Michael Jackson in his latest child molestation case, and Cochran became an international celebrity for gaining the acquittal of former football star O.J. Simpson on murder charges.

Until he took on Skilling's defense, Petrocelli did not have much criminal case experience. But he is hardly a stranger to the legal spotlight. His take-no-prisoners courtroom style helped him win a $33.5-million verdict for the family of murder victim Ron Goldman in a wrongful-death suit against Simpson, and last year he prevailed in a decade-long legal battle on behalf of Walt Disney Co. over the merchandising rights to Winnie the Pooh.

Petrocelli, 52, declined to comment for this article, and representatives of O'Melveny declined to discuss the Skilling case.

However, Seth Aronson, managing partner of O'Melveny's Los Angeles office, boasted of the firm's strong roster of former prosecutors. He noted its successful defense of Wen Ho Lee, a Los Alamos National Laboratory scientist accused of stealing nuclear secrets for China in 1999, along with other corporate defendants.

O'Melveny began building its white-collar criminal expertise several years ago, Aronson said, because "clients are facing more shareholder-driven investigations and criminal investigations." That practice continues to "grow significantly year after year," he said.

Other corporate firms are going after this business as well. Brian McCarthy, a partner with Skadden Arps in Los Angeles, said many firms took notice when in 1984 Six Flags Inc. and two of its executives were charged with manslaughter after a fire at its New Jersey theme park. The company was later acquitted of the charges, and charges against the executives were dismissed.

"That case opened people's eyes that there was a need for that practice," McCarthy said.

Enron and other high-profile corporate scandals convinced law firms that such work was here to stay, he said.

According to UC Berkeley's Weisselberg, firms realize that "what begins as an in-house investigation by a corporation or a civil investigation by a regulatory agency might turn into a criminal investigation." Lawyers, particularly former prosecutors, can sometimes keep a small inquiry from mushrooming into an indictment, he said.

For an individual lawyer such as Petrocelli, however, fame is undoubtedly part of the appeal of these cases.

Skilling's trial is "a kind of historical event," observed William Henderson, an Indiana University law professor who studies large firms.

"If you've already made a living," he said, "why not be in the history books?"

Enron Arrogance On Trial (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

JURORS FINALLY BEGAN DELIBERATIONS Wednesday in the nation's latest trial of the century, the criminal case against former Enron executives Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay. Although charged with multiple counts of conspiracy, fraud and insider trading related to the energy company's 2001 collapse, the ex-CEOs were really on trial for arrogance — "extraordinary arrogance," as one prosecutor called it in her closing argument.

Of course, arrogance is not technically a crime, or else half the CEOs in the country (and more than a few of their underlings) would be on trial. But in complicated cases like Enron's, it's what prosecutors often focus on and what that jury may be considering now.

The Enron case has become more than the sum of its criminal-act parts. Because Enron flamed out in such a spectacular way — it was the largest corporate bankruptcy ever when it folded, wiping out about 4,500 jobs and $70 billion of investors' money — it became the poster child for fin de siecle business abuse; its leaders, the faces of corporate greed and dishonesty.

It's hardly surprising that trial watchers have come to treat the long-awaited verdict as a proxy for the cause of business reform writ large. If Skilling and Lay go down with the ship, the thinking goes, it proves that the government really is looking out for the little guy. If the two men walk, big business has fleeced America once again.

But corporate reform's ultimate success doesn't depend on whether Skilling and Lay spend the next 20 years wearing orange jumpsuits. The legacy of Enron-inspired laws like Sarbanes-Oxley is far more important. Given their symbolic importance, however, one might have expected Enron's former executives to attempt to disprove to the jury the prevailing public view that they are, well, extraordinarily arrogant.

Skilling was at times prickly on the stand. The usually affable Lay, expected to perform more smoothly, tried to contact fellow witnesses inappropriately and snarled at his own attorney. Both men insisted doggedly that they were innocent, victims of short-selling investors and meddling reporters. The government? On a witch hunt. The many colleagues who pleaded guilty, expressed remorse and testified against them? Dupes or opportunists.

Now the fates of Skilling and Lay are in the hands of 12 fatigued jurors in Houston. Their charge is to consider only the evidence in the 28 counts of fraud, conspiracy and insider trading against Skilling and the six counts of fraud and conspiracy against Lay. But it's unlikely that they will forget all that they have seen and heard in the last 15 weeks. Nor will the rest of us.

What Fraud? All Was Fine At Enron (NYT)

By Floyd Norris

New York Times, May 19, 2006

IT was not much of a defense. But I was very young and had little time to decide what to say.

I had violated the rules by sneaking ice cream from the freezer. The carton had slipped and split open on the floor, making a mess and a noise that my mother investigated.

"What happened?" she asked.

"Nothing," I replied.

She did not believe me.

That long-forgotten incident came back to me as I read the closing arguments in the Enron trial of the two former chief executives, Kenneth L. Lay and Jeffrey K. Skilling, which went to a federal court jury in Houston this week.

"Enron was a good company," said Daniel M. Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling's lawyer. "There was no fraud there. There was no conspiracy."

In the previous trials of chief executives whose companies imploded in fraud, the defense has always been one of ignorance, that underlings pulled it off behind the boss's back. It is an embarrassing defense, given that it implies the boss got millions for doing a very bad job, but sometimes it has worked.

Instead, Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling went for the "nothing happened" defense, holding that there was nothing really wrong until Enron folded because of a loss of confidence. "When did bankruptcy become a crime?" was the indignant question asked by Bruce W. Collins, a lawyer for Mr. Lay. "The company failed," he said, but "not because of fraud."

That is, in a way, accurate. The fraud hid the losses that stemmed from bad business decisions. The company failed when the fraud was found and the reality exposed.

That is what makes this defense so audacious. By claiming there was nothing really wrong at Enron, Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling seek to preserve both their freedom and their reputations. If the company failed just because of overheated news accounts, then it is those horrible journalists (and their short-seller friends) who deserve the blame.

The witnesses against them were forced to lie, in the defense version, by unscrupulous prosecutors determined to get convictions. Most of those witnesses initially protested their innocence, before making plea deals and going to prison. It was the denials the defense found credible.

But there was some truth to the defense claims that the prosecution was upset about things that other companies also did.

After reviewing evidence that Mr. Lay misled investors about the company's condition, moving one money-loser to a different division where it might not be noticed, Kathryn H. Ruemmler, a prosecutor, explained why that was bad:

"The point is that this is all just smoke and mirrors," she said. "They can make the numbers say whatever they want to say. If they're going to miss, they have an excuse. If they have losses, they'll hide them. That's what Mr. Lay did here."

Mr. Lay was far from the only chief executive who made the numbers sing back then, nor was Enron the only company willing to change reserves after a quarter ended in order to make its numbers. "Why are they trying to criminalize this?" asked Mr. Petrocelli. "We might as well put every C.E.O. in jail."

Enron was different because the lying was so extreme. Many companies before it had been caught fudging profits, but when the truth was told about them there was still a functioning business. Employees kept their jobs. Creditors were paid.

Enron's lies made a company that was hemorrhaging cash look healthy. Some of the accounting maneuvers were legal; others were not. But the reality was very different from what was presented.

Something did happen, and it was shocking. That will be true whether or not the jury convicts the men who made Enron infamous.

Milberg Indicted On Charges Firm Paid Kickbacks (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke, Nathan Koppel, And Peter Sanders

Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

A federal grand jury indicted the nation's best-known class-action law firm, Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, alleging a 20-year conspiracy to funnel kickbacks to plaintiffs in dozens of securities class-action cases.

The indictment, made public in Los Angeles yesterday, could prove fatal to the pioneering plaintiffs firm, long a scourge of big business and a controversial champion of shareholders. In the 40 years since its founding, New York-based Milberg has filed hundreds of securities suits and won billions of dollars for investors, enriching its partners in the process.

The 102-page indictment details cases, reaching back more than two decades, in which partners in the firm allegedly conspired to pay clients who agreed to act as lead plaintiffs. This would give Milberg an edge in the scramble to be named lead law firm in a case by providing the firm with a "ready stable" of plaintiffs, the grand jury alleged.

The firm paid more than $11 million in kickbacks, the indictment charges, often going to great lengths to disguise the payments as referral fees or other legitimate payments. With the exception of expenses and incidentals, it is illegal for the lead plaintiff in a class action to be paid more than other members of a class.

"This case is about protecting the integrity of the justice system," said Debra Wong Yang, the U.S. Attorney in Los Angeles. "Class-action attorneys and plaintiffs occupy positions of trust in which they assume responsibility to tell the truth....This indictment alleges a wholesale violation of this responsibility." Officials said the investigation was continuing and that more indictments could be expected.

Melvyn Weiss, Milberg's co-founder, said in a statement that the firm and its employees are "outraged" at the indictment. "Our firm is the champion of consumers and investors. We provide access to the courts so that the victims of corrupt corporations can achieve justice." He added that over the years, the firm has recovered more than $45 billion for these victims. "We will vigorously defend ourselves and our partners against these charges, and we will be vindicated," he said.

The charges include conspiracy, racketeering, mail fraud, money laundering and filing false tax returns. Mr. Weiss is not named as a defendant. Two of the firm's partners, David Bershad and Steven Schulman, were indicted for allegedly having been directly involved in making secret payments to plaintiffs in dozens of securities class actions filed by Milberg between at least 1991 and 2005. Both men left the firm last week and are expected to oppose the charges in court.

Prosecutors asserted in court filings that Mr. Bershad used cash from a safe in a credenza in his office to pay kickbacks to plaintiffs. Access to the safe "was strictly limited," according to the indictment. Andrew Lawler, Mr. Bershad's attorney, said his client "categorically denies the allegations" and "intends to vigorously fight the charges."

The indictment also offers a glimpse of the huge payouts Milberg partners have enjoyed. Mr. Bershad owns 17% of the firm and his share of its profits from 1983 to 2005 was more than $160 million, the grand jury found. Mr. Schulman's stake was 15% and his profits from 1991 to 2005 were $67 million, according to the indictment.

The indictment came after the collapse of discussions between the firm and the government about a deferred-prosecution agreement that would have avoided criminal charges. Lawyers close to the case said the terms included a court-appointed monitor, an admission of responsibility and a fine of about $40 million. But the government and the firm were unable to agree on the government's demand of a waiver of attorney-client privilege and access to privileged internal records, the lawyers said.

'Impossible Concessions'

In a prepared statement, Milberg asserted that prosecutors "insisted that the firm make unfounded statements accusing its own partners of crimes and otherwise become an agent for the government." It added: "Unfortunately, the prosecutors insisted on indicting the firm unless it made these impossible concessions."

The indictment marks the first time since the indictment and collapse of accounting giant Arthur Andersen LLP in 2002 that the Justice Department has charged a major firm or company with a crime because of the alleged misconduct of individual partners or executives. The Andersen prosecution was heavily criticized, and the Supreme Court overruled the conviction. Thousands of people lost their jobs with the firm's collapse.

The Milberg indictment is expected to bring new scrutiny of the government's tactics in its crackdown on corporate crime, including the increasingly common demand that companies under investigation waive attorney-client privilege and cut off legal-defense funds for partners or executives who have been accused -- not convicted -- of a crime. Rising concern over these tactics has attracted some unlikely conservative allies to Milberg, long a big contributor to the Democratic Party.

Theodore B. Olson, former Bush administration solicitor general and a leading conservative voice, said the message in many corporate-crime investigations is now unmistakable: "Raise the white flag or face capital punishment." Mr. Olson, while not commenting specifically on the Milberg case, said the risk of indicting a business is that "a firm can be effectively destroyed by an indictment, even if it is later found to be not guilty."

The Milberg investigation has been closely watched in corporate boardrooms. Lisa Rickard, a lawyer with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, said yesterday that "plaintiff shopping and kickback schemes have been a persistent problem among some trial lawyers. Fraud and abuse in soliciting plaintiffs has been pervasive in securities, asbestos, silica, and pharmaceutical litigation."

Milberg is expected to argue that the firm's hundreds of employees and thousands of clients shouldn't be penalized for the alleged misconduct of individual partners. It has expanded its legal team as it girds for battle, adding lawyers and consultants including conservative legal scholar Viet Dinh, a former top Justice Department official who served as the Bush administration's voice on legal policy, and Mark Corallo, a former military officer who was a spokesman for the Justice Department until last year.

Within minutes of yesterday's indictment, Milberg launched a Web site, www.milbergweissjustice.com1, where it defends itself against the charges and provides links to news articles that it says highlight the "politicization of the Justice Department." In Los Angeles, U.S. officials said the case was "absolutely not" influenced by politics.

The indictment follows a breakthrough in the long-running case last month, when retired New Jersey mortgage broker Howard Vogel pleaded guilty to taking more than $2.4 million as payments to him and his family for serving as plaintiffs in about 40 suits as recently as 2005. Mr. Vogel or family members were plaintiffs in Milberg shareholder class-action suits against Oxford Health Plans Inc., Valero Energy Corp. and Mercer Corp., among others.

The Vogel guilty plea and yesterday's indictment refer to the role of a "Partner A," which lawyers close to the case have said is Mr. Weiss himself. Neither Mr. Weiss nor his former partner, William Lerach, are named in the indictment, but U.S. officials yesterday said the investigation is continuing. Mr. Lerach was the original focus of the kickback investigation when it began in 1999, those close to the case said. In 2004, Mr. Lerach split from Mr. Weiss to create Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins LLP in San Diego. That firm has emerged as a powerful rival to Milberg Weiss and could benefit if Milberg Weiss is fatally wounded by the criminal indictment.

Taking On Wall Street

The indictment could hurt Milberg's ability to win clients. For years it has been among the nation's most powerful law firms: In 2004 and 2005, Milberg settled an estimated 90 securities class actions, winning more than $1.5 billion in settlements, according to Institutional Shareholder Services Inc. Among its many pending cases is a massive class action alleging that Wall Street banks conspired with technology companies to artificially inflate stock prices in public offerings in the late 1990s and 2000. The suit has so far netted $1.4 billion in proposed settlements. Milberg is also pursuing KPMG LLP and the law firm Sidley Austin Brown & Wood LLP in connection with the sale of allegedly fraudulent tax shelters.

A Milberg spokeswoman said that the firm "will continue to vigorously represent its clients in the hundreds of courts across the country in which it continues to have cases." But legal experts raised doubts yesterday that the firm, with criminal charges hanging over it, can continue to win new clients and land the lucrative lead-counsel position in class-action cases.

"Courts now have to wonder about [Milberg's] ability to give full attention to a class-action client's interest," said James Cox, a securities-law professor at Duke University Law School. "The firm's energies are weakened, and, perhaps, so is its resolve."

Joseph Weiss, co-lead counsel with Milberg in a case against Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia Inc., says the firm should be disqualified from the matter at once. "The credibility of attorneys is only as good as their reputations," he says. "Even if proven to be innocent, they would be coming into court and representing clients with this taint hanging over them."

If Milberg is forced to step down in a class action, judges will have to decide whether the firm should be paid for work it has already performed. In a case against Deutsche Telekom AG last year that was settled for about $120 million, fees have not yet been paid. New York attorney Stanley Bernstein, one of the lead counsels in the matter, says Milberg should receive its full share of the fee award.

"When a lawyer is disqualified, courts have been willing to award fees based on the reasonable value of the services preformed," said W. Bradley Wendel, an ethics professor at Cornell University Law School. The issue becomes cloudier, say experts, if Milberg is disqualified in a case that is still in its early stages.

Far more clear, say lawyers, is that Milberg will find it nearly impossible to win future assignments. The competition for lead-counsel -- the firm that controls a class action and earns the most fees -- has grown increasingly intense, lawyers say, and rival firms are certain to try to use the indictment to their strategic advantage. "Some plaintiffs firms will be pulling out their long knives," said class-action lawyer Howard Sirota.

Earlier this year, Bernstein Liebhard argued that Lerach Coughlin was unfit to serve as lead counsel in a securities-fraud suit against Dana Corp. because the Lerach firm had been an early focus of the federal probe that enveloped Milberg. The judge in the Dana suit ultimately decided neither Bernstein nor Lerach should serve as lead counsel.

Whatever happens to Milberg, lawyers said the indictment will have little impact beyond the firm's walls. Before Mr. Lerach's departure in 2004, Milberg Weiss dominated the securities class-action field, accounting for more than half of the class settlements in some years, according to industry experts. "There was a time that Milberg was the 800-pound gorilla," said securities defense lawyer Michael Torpey. "But that kind of dominance dissipated when Milberg split up."

Milberg is still one of the nation's more prolific firms, filing at least 75 class actions last year, including suits against General Motors Corp. and Blockbuster Inc. Milberg also netted $637 million in securities class-action settlements for its clients in 2005 -- fourth highest among plaintiffs firms, according to Institutional Shareholder Services. Still, say lawyers, there are plenty of firms that are now capable of filling any Milberg void. "There are a lot of well- bankrolled class-action firms," says Prof. Cox of Duke. "The indictment will not affect the volume of securities litigation."

US Indictment For Big Law Firm In Class Actions (NYT)

By Julie Creswell

New York Times, May 19, 2006

The nation's leading class-action securities law firm, Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, and two of its partners were charged yesterday with making more than $11 million in secret payments to three individuals who served as plaintiffs in more than 150 lawsuits.

The indictment is the first instance of a law firm with national reach facing criminal charges, and it could prove to be a fatal blow for the firm. The lawsuits cited in the indictment spanned two decades, occurring as recently as 2005, and generated some $216 million in legal fees for the firm.

Its lucrative business made Milberg Weiss a target for political critics who saw the firm as a symbol of a national litigation industry that had gone out of control. These critics said that many of the firm's lawsuits against corporations were frivolous, raising the cost of doing business.

The critics contended that investors, for the most part, saw only pennies on the dollar from any recoveries won by the firm. In the 1990's, Congress raised the legal hurdle for such lawsuits in large part in response to Milberg Weiss. Even so, the firm continued to thrive.

"There's never been a firm of their prominence that has been indicted," said Ralph C. Ferrara, a former general counsel with the Securities and Exchange Commission who is now a lawyer with the law firm of LeBoeuf, Lamb, Greene & MacRae. "This is a regrettable and remarkable thing."

In the 20-count indictment by a federal grand jury in Los Angeles yesterday, Milberg Weiss and two of its prominent partners, David J. Bershad and Steven G. Schulman, are accused of racketeering conspiracy, mail fraud, money laundering conspiracy and obstruction of justice.

The prosecutors are asking for the return of the fees earned by the firm and those named in the indictment. In addition, there is the possibility of prison for the two partners — up to 20 years for racketeering conspiracy, for example.

To disguise some of the secret payments to plaintiffs, which prosecutors referred to as kickbacks, the law firm moved cash through casinos and kept money in a credenza in Mr. Bershad's office, the indictment said.

"This case is about protecting the integrity of the justice system in America," said Debra Wong Yang, the United States attorney in Los Angeles. The firm and lawyers for Mr. Bershad, 66, and Mr. Schulman, 54, said they would fight the charges.

Feared and loathed inside boardrooms across the country, Milberg Weiss made hay out of the numerous accounting and management scandals that caused stocks to collapse in recent years. Sometimes bullying, sometimes screaming, sometimes speaking very softly, the firm's lawyers coaxed and cajoled what it has estimated to be $45 billion in recoveries from companies.

"The people who are going to be happy about this indictment are the hundreds and hundreds of companies that Milberg Weiss successfully sued and the political demagogues who rail about 'trial lawyers' running up the price of eggs," said William W. Taylor, a lawyer at Zuckerman Spaeder who represents Milberg Weiss.

"You could hear the cheering all the way from Wall Street to Pennsylvania Avenue, and it feeds right into the hands of people who want to prevent victims from being able to get the justice from big companies that they deserve," Mr. Taylor said.

Legal experts said the criminal case could sharply change the landscape of securities class-action litigation as one of its dominant participants struggles to survive. While Milberg Weiss lawyers can still legally represent clients, the indictment is likely to set off a race among competitors to unseat the firm from several high-profile lawsuits.

The indictment could also open the door to the prospect of settlements made decades ago being reopened or of lawsuits against the firm itself by shareholders contending they did not receive enough in a settlement or by a law firm that was jostled out of representing a lead plaintiff.

"Could there be a class-action lawsuit against Milberg over this? It can happen," said George M. Cohen, a law professor with the University of Virginia. Mr. Cohen and others, however, noted that given the firm's partnership structure, the personal assets of the partners would most likely be protected and the firm itself probably does not have much cash.

Shortly after the indictment was announced, the firm denied wrongdoing in a posting on a Web site it started, www.milbergweissjustice.com.

"We will not allow the indictment today to deter us from our watchdog role," one of the firm's co-founders, Melvyn I. Weiss, said in a statement. "We will vigorously defend ourselves and our partners against these charges and we will be vindicated."

Mr. Weiss was not named in the indictment. The man behind the firm's other top name, Lawrence Milberg, died in 1989.

Andrew M. Lawler, a lawyer for Mr. Bershad, said, "David Bershad categorically denies the allegations of the indictment."

Herbert Stern, a lawyer for Mr. Schulman, said his client "will plead not guilty because he is not guilty, and we look forward to his ultimate vindication."

Prosecutors have so far been stymied in efforts to charge the two primary targets of the investigation, Mr. Weiss and his former partner, William S. Lerach. In 2004, Mr. Lerach started his own firm on the West Coast. Both men were told in February that they would not be indicted at this time, although people involved in the talks say they remain targets of prosecutors.

Negotiations to avert an indictment of the firm stalled in recent days. In a last-ditch effort to stave off prosecutors, Mr. Bershad and Mr. Schulman agreed to take leaves of absence. Additionally, the firm said it hired Bart M. Schwartz, a former chief of the criminal division for the United States attorney in Manhattan, to monitor its procedures regarding payment of referral fees.

Companies that have been targets of criminal investigations in recent years, like the accounting firm KPMG and the drug maker Bristol-Myers Squibb, reached deferred-prosecution agreements.

Milberg Weiss, however, refused to sign such an agreement, which would have required it to waive attorney-client privileges. On its Web site, the firm called that condition a "derogation of one of the bedrock principles of American law."

Others said they were disturbed that the entire law firm had been indicted, especially as the Justice Department has been reluctant to take such an action since the 2002 indictment of the accounting firm Arthur Andersen. The firm went out of business, although its conviction was overturned by the Supreme Court.

"I don't understand what the harm was to the members of the class-action lawsuit," said Lawrence W. Fox, a lawyer at Drinker Biddle & Reath and a former chairman of the American Bar Association's ethics committee. "Milberg Weiss itself had every incentive to maximize the recovery as, to some extent, their fee was dependent on that. There was never any incentive for them to settle on the cheap."

Ms. Yang, the United States attorney, said: "We really had a situation where the firm was not accepting responsibility, was not making any substantial changes to the firm itself. We really were in a situation where we had no choice but to indict."

The charges against the firm and the two partners were included in a revised indictment against a retired California lawyer and former Milberg client, Seymour M. Lazar, who was originally charged last summer.

From 1981 through about 2004, Mr. Lazar, 78, or members of his family served as plaintiffs in about 70 lawsuits for Milberg Weiss and got about $2.4 million in "secret and illegal kickback payments," the new indictment said.

According to the charges, the scheme involving Mr. Lazar and two other paid plaintiffs worked like this: Plaintiffs would buy securities anticipating that they would decline in value, hence positioning themselves to be named plaintiffs in the class actions.

After the court in a lawsuit awarded lawyers' fees, the firm and Mr. Bershad and Mr. Schulman gave cash directly to the plaintiffs or to intermediary lawyers.

The firm also falsely accounted for the payments as referral fees or professional fees, the indictment said.

Under New York law, it is illegal for a lawyer to promise or give anything to induce a person to bring a lawsuit or to reward a person for having done so, the indictment said.

Furthermore, the payments created a conflict because the paid plaintiffs had a "greater interest in maximizing the amount of attorneys' fees awarded to Milberg Weiss than in maximizing the net recovery" to others in the class, the indictment said.

One figure named as an unindicted co-conspirator in the indictment is a Beverly Hills ophthalmologist, Dr. Steven G. Cooperman. Dr. Cooperman or members of his family acted as plaintiffs in nearly 70 lawsuits, receiving approximately $6.5 million in payments, the indictment said.

It was testimony by Mr. Cooperman that led to the original investigation six years ago. His value as a potential witness, however, is tempered by the fact that he offered to provide evidence to prosecutors in hopes of receiving a reduced sentence on his conviction of art fraud.

In addition to Mr. Cooperman, another paid plaintiff, Howard J. Vogel, a retired mortgage broker, reached a plea agreement with prosecutors last month. He admitted to accepting $2.5 million in secret payments.

Milberg Weiss Attorneys Indicted For Conspiracy (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, May 19, 2006

Milberg Weiss, one of the most powerful class-action law firms in the US, and two of its top attorneys were indicted on Thursday on charges of conspiracy, money laundering and racketeering, marking the culmination of a six-year investigation into a firm that has secured more than $45bn in settlements for its clients.

At the heart of the charges against the firm - made by the US attorney's office in Los Angeles - are allegations that Milberg and two of its partners, David Bershad and Steven Schulman, bribed clients to get them to agree to act as plaintiffs in their lawsuits. The charges contend that Milberg gave kickbacks to clients from 1981 through 2004, including one former client, Seymour Lazar, who served, along with members of his family, as a plaintiff in about 70 Milberg lawsuits in exchange for $2.4m.

Milberg Weiss did not return a call for comment.

The ability of Milberg to secure big settlements with a range of companies over the years, including Prudential Insurance, Lucent and Rite-Aid, helped it earn the wrath of legislators in Washington, who passed legislation in the 1990s to help curb class-action suits.

The charges will likely put a spotlight on the firm's founder, Melvyn Weiss, who was one of the first attorneys to use a 1966 Supreme Court ruling that made it easier for individuals to file suit together to bring securities class-action suits.

The 20-count indictment represents a sea change in the Justice Department's handling of white-collar crime and law firms. While the spate of corporate scandals in recent years resulted in numerous indictments of individual executives, and one of the world's biggest auditing firms, Andersen, prosecutors have never sought the criminal prosecution of the firms involved in those cases.

Milberg Weiss will be allowed to continue practising while it moves ahead to fight the charges, but the investigation and speculation about a possible indictment have already raised questions about the company's ability to represent clients.

A report in the Wall Street Journal this week suggested that the decision by federal prosecutors to indict the firm, a move that represents the most extreme action law enforcement can take against a company, stemmed from the firm's refusal after weeks of negotiations to waive attorney-client privilege, or the right to protect communications between corporate lawyers and their clients. Prosecutors also insisted that the firm hand over internal documents.

Milberg Weiss's refusal to meet the government's demands on the issue underscore a wider debate in the legal community about whether the Justice Department's tactics in prosecuting white-collar crime violate the constitutional rights of defendants.

Class-Action Law Firm Indicted In Fraud Case (LAT)

By E. Scott Reckard, Josh Friedman

Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

A New York law firm that has helped investors recover more than $45 billion in corporate fraud cases was indicted Thursday along with two of its partners on criminal charges of paying illegal kickbacks to clients.

The charges of fraud, racketeering and conspiracy, brought by a federal grand jury in Los Angeles, could ruin Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, one of the nation's wealthiest and most powerful law firms.

Legal experts noted that accounting giant Arthur Andersen collapsed after it was indicted in the Enron Corp. scandal. Vowing not to follow that example, Milberg Weiss predicted it would "beat back these charges."

The case also could have broad implications, potentially casting a cloud over class-action lawsuits and giving ammunition to pro-business groups seeking legislation to limit fraud damages and make it harder for shareholders to sue companies.

In a 20-count indictment, prosecutors contended that Milberg Weiss and partners David Bershad and Steven Schulman paid at least $11.3 million over a 25-year period to clients who agreed to act as plaintiffs.

Milberg Weiss often concealed the payments, prosecutors alleged, by paying the plaintiffs in cash or through intermediary law firms. Prosecutors said the "paid plaintiffs" were recruited to buy stocks in anticipation that they would fall in value, positioning themselves and Milberg Weiss to take the lead in securities-fraud cases and collect extra fees.

Paid plaintiffs, including Palm Springs resident Seymour M. Lazar, 78, allegedly recruited friends and family members to serve in similar roles.

"This case is about protecting the integrity of the justice system in America," said Debra Wong Yang, the U.S. attorney in Los Angeles. "Class-action attorneys and named plaintiffs occupy positions of trust in which they assume responsibility to tell the truth and to disclose relevant information to the court. This indictment alleges a wholesale violation of this responsibility."

The alleged kickbacks gave the paid plaintiffs "financial interests that differed from those of the class," Yang said.

Bershad and Schulman denied wrongdoing and said they would fight the charges. Schulman was the lead attorney for shareholders in a trial last year involving the hiring and firing of former Walt Disney Co. President Michael Ovitz.

Milberg Weiss has been the dominant representative of class-action plaintiffs in the U.S. for the last decade, with recoveries that include $600 million for Lucent Corp. shareholders, $460 million for Raytheon Co. investors and more than $4 billion for policyholders of Prudential Insurance Co.

The indictment, resulting from a seven-year investigation, renewed questions about the future of class-action lawsuits that accuse corporations of defrauding shareholders, knowingly marketing dangerous products and other wrongs involving thousands of victims.

Melvyn I. Weiss, a founder of the law firm, said class-action suits brought justice to "victims of corrupt corporations."

But a business lobbyist, Lisa Rickard of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, described the lawsuits as often fraudulent and "simply a way to put legal fees in attorneys' pockets."

Plaintiffs in such class actions legally must have grievances that coincide with all the victims and are supposed to be motivated to serve as representatives of the class. But critics such as Rickard contend that law firms like Milberg Weiss instead engage in "plaintiff shopping" and encourage named plaintiffs to accept settlements designed to enrich them and the lawyers at the expense of the rest of the class and the target company.

The investigation gained momentum in 2001, when Steven G. Cooperman, a former Beverly Hills eye surgeon who had been a plaintiff in about 60 Milberg cases, became a government informant. He faced up to 10 years in federal prison for faking the theft of a Monet and a Picasso from his home, then swindling insurers out of $17.5 million. In return for his help in the Milberg probe, Cooperman wound up serving 21 months.

In April, another Milberg client, retired mortgage broker Howard J. Vogel, agreed to cooperate with prosecutors and plead guilty to a charge related to claims that he took more than $2.4 million in kickbacks.

Palm Springs resident Lazar, who was charged in the case last year, allegedly benefited from $2.4 million in kickbacks, prosecutors say.

Lazar and his relatives, including his wife, mother-in-law, son and daughter, allegedly received kickbacks ranging from $8,000 to $250,000 for their roles as named plaintiffs in a string of suits against such targets as Genentech Inc., United Airlines and W.R. Grace & Co. Many of the payments were transmitted through lawyers in Palm Springs, Los Angeles, Santa Ana, Portland, Ore., and Kansas City, Mo., the indictment alleges.

Schulman, 54, and Bershad, 66, were indicted on multiple felony counts, including mail fraud and conspiracy. They took leaves of absence from the firm this week.

Bershad's attorney, Andrew M. Lawler, said his client "has been instrumental in achieving unprecedented recoveries on behalf of investors wronged by corporate malfeasance" and "categorically denies the allegations of the indictment." Bershad will fight and is confident he will win, Lawler said.

Schulman's attorney, Herbert J. Stern, said his client "will plead not guilty because he is not guilty, and we look forward to his ultimate vindication."

In a statement, Milberg Weiss said it was "particularly incensed that the prosecutors decided to indict the firm itself. The firm has 125 attorneys and another 240 employees who, even according to the government, did not participate in or know anything about the matters at issue. But they will inevitably suffer serious personal and professional harm as a result of the government's actions."

John C. Coffee, a Columbia Law School specialist in securities law, said the indictment could motivate judges to avoid using Milberg Weiss as the lead firm in class actions. Likewise, he said, big public pension funds, which are subject to public scrutiny, may also decide it's best not to be associated with a firm facing criminal charges.

"I think that we will see a replay of the Arthur Andersen experience, with clients backing away from Milberg Weiss," Coffee said. "That's Step 1. Step 2 is when Milberg Weiss is embarrassed, many partners will jump ship. Professionals can move to other firms very easily, and that's what happened with Andersen."

Ironically, Coffee added, a prime beneficiary of Milberg's woes is likely to be the San Diego-based law firm headed by William Lerach. He joined Milberg Weiss in 1976, 11 years after it was founded, and became its most prominent attorney before leaving to found his own firm, Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins, in 2004.

The split appears to have occurred in part because of personal differences but also because prosecutors investigating the kickback case had initially focused on Lerach along with Melvyn Weiss, Coffee said. In February, a source told the Los Angeles Times that prosecutors had told Lerach and Weiss that there was not enough evidence to indict them at that point, although they might face charges if additional evidence emerged.

Lerach and other attorneys at Milberg Weiss, like many plaintiffs' attorneys, have been strong supporters of the Democratic Party, pitted against business groups that frequently side with Republicans.

Jamie Court, president of the Foundation for Taxpayer and Consumer Rights in Santa Monica, characterized the lengthy investigation as "clearly a politically motivated move by the Bush administration."

Yang, the U.S. attorney in Los Angeles, denied that such considerations played a role.

"I can tell you with absolute certainty this was not politically motivated," she said. "If it broke in a different direction, we would have been fine with that too."

Big-time Law Firm Facing Charges (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, May 19, 2006

Federal prosecutors have charged high-profile law firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman and two partners with conspiring to pay $11 million in kickbacks to people who allegedly agreed to serve as paid plaintiffs in lawsuits.

Milberg Weiss, a leading law firm in class-action lawsuits against corporations accused of securities fraud, has long been praised by shareholders and blasted by businesses and conservative politicians.

Not charged in the indictment were Melvyn Weiss, a founder of the New York firm more than 40 years ago, and former partner William Lerach, a flamboyant attorney who has started his own law firm in San Diego called Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins.

The indictment, handed up Thursday by a grand jury in Los Angeles after an investigation of several years, charges the law firm and senior partners David Bershad, 66, and Steven Schulman, 54, with bribery, fraud, perjury and obstructing justice.

The law firm and two men received $216 million in attorneys' fees from 1984 to 2005 from 150 class-action and shareholders' lawsuits that used the paid plaintiffs, the indictment alleges.

To hide the kickbacks, payments were made in cash sometimes obtained from casinos and kept in a safe in Bershad's office, the indictment alleges. Intermediaries were used to deliver the money, and the payments were not recorded in Milberg Weiss' accounting books, the indictment charges.

William Taylor, an attorney at the Zuckerman Spaeder law firm who represents Milberg Weiss, denied the charges, saying that “the firm and its partners are resolute in defending themselves.”

Taylor said that recent talks with prosecutors to avoid the indictment fell apart because Milberg Weiss did not want to waive its attorney-client privilege and pay the well over $100 million sought by prosecutors to resolve the case.

The firm, Taylor said, did not want “to turn itself into an agent of the prosecution and accuse its own partners of being criminals.”

Benjamin Brafman, an attorney for Weiss, said that Weiss will help his firm and its partners fight the charges “because he believes completely in their innocence.”

According to the indictment, the alleged kickbacks were illegal because attorneys cannot “promise or give anything of value to induce a person to bring a lawsuit.”

The secret and hidden kickbacks deprived shareholders of the “honest services” of their attorneys, and also obstructed the ability of courts to preside over the cases, the indictment charges.

Among the firm's cases involving paid plaintiffs were those against Lockheed, Valero Energy, British Petroleum, Genentech and Barnesandnoble.com.

Debra Wong Yang, the U.S. Attorney in Los Angeles, said in a statement that attorneys and plaintiffs are trusted to tell the truth and disclose important information to the court. “This indictment alleges a wholesale violation of this responsibility,” she said.

Milberg Weiss, Two Partners Indicted Over Payments (BLOOM)

By Sophia Pearson

Bloomberg, May 18, 2006

Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, the law firm that has won more than $45 billion for investors in securities-fraud cases, and two of its partners were charged with participating in a scheme to pay illegal kickbacks to clients.

The New York-based firm, Steven Schulman, 54, and David Bershad, 66, were indicted on multiple felony counts including mail fraud and conspiracy, the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles said today.

``This case is about protecting the integrity of the justice system in America," U.S. Attorney Debra Yang said during a press conference. ``The conduct alleged in the indictment is particularly troubling because it represents a pattern of deception that spans two and a half decades."

The charges, which legal experts say involve the largest U.S. law firm ever indicted, might inhibit Milberg Weiss's ability to represent clients in securities cases. The charges might threaten the firm's management of a group of 309 class actions for shareholders who claim initial public offerings were manipulated by investment banks to inflate market prices. JPMorgan Chase & Co. agreed in April to pay $425 million to settle IPO claims against it, the first bank to do so.

Milberg Weiss, which has 125 lawyers, called the indictment ``unjust, misguided, and misinformed" in a statement.

Attorney-Client Privilege

The indictment came after six months of ``intense negotiations" between Milberg Weiss and government lawyers which couldn't be resolved because the firm refused to waive attorney- client privileges to avoid being charged, Milberg Weiss said. The firm also refused to make unfounded statements against its partners accusing them of crimes, the firm said.

Melvyn Weiss, the lead partner at Milberg Weiss, and William Lerach, Weiss's former partner who now leads a spinoff San Diego firm, Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins, were told in February that prosecutors didn't have plans to charge them in the case.

Today's indictment names three unidentified senior partners at Milberg Weiss who participated in the scheme. The partners, described as Partner A, B, and E, weren't charged.

Lawyers for Bershad and Schulman, who took leaves of absence from the firm earlier this week, denied the charges in e-mailed statements. Both men could be arraigned sometime in June, prosecutors said.

``David Bershad categorically denies the allegations of the indictment," his attorney, Andrew Lawler, said. ``He intends to vigorously fight the charges and is confident he will win."

Herbert Stern, a lawyer for Schulman, said his client will plead not guilty. ``We look forward to his ultimate vindication," Stern said.

`Stable' of Clients

Prosecutors said the firm from 1984 though 2005 paid three clients more than $11 million ``in secret and illegal payments" for cases in which the firm made $216.1 million in fees. The payments were made in cash or checks through intermediary lawyers or other professionals, according to the indictment issued today by a federal grand jury..

``Milberg Weiss had a stable of individuals ready and willing to serve as plaintiffs," said Yang said at the press conference.

Two of the clients, Howard J. Vogel and Steven Cooperman, have reached plea agreements with prosecutors and agreed to cooperate with the investigation. A third, Seymour Lazar, was charged with mail fraud and money laundering last year and refused to assist prosecutors.

`Credenza'

The firm obtained the money in a manner to make the payments difficult to trace, including from casinos, prosecutors said in the indictment. The money was kept in a safe located in a ``credenza in Bershad's office at Milberg Weiss, to which access was strictly limited."

The indictment may give a boost to President George W. Bush and others who favor legislation to limit damages and to make it harder for shareholders to sue companies.

``It's going to give a great deal of ammunition to lobbying groups who've long wanted to close down plaintiffs' class actions," said Columbia University law professor John C. Coffee Jr.

$45 Billion

Since 1999, U.S. prosecutors have been investigating claims that Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Lerach, the biggest firm representing shareholders in securities-fraud cases before it split in two in 2004, illegally paid shareholders to file the suits. At the time of the breakup, the firm had represented clients in half of all securities class actions filed in the past decade, including those against Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc.

Since 1965, Milberg Weiss lawyers, before and after its 2004 split-up, won more than $45 billion in recoveries for its shareholder clients, including large pension funds such as the California Public Employees' Retirement System, according to the Web sites of the two firms.

``We are extremely saddened to learn of these indictments," Lerach Coughlin said in a statement. ``We have the greatest respect for the ability and integrity of Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, its lawyers and the good work they have always done."

Yang said some of the compromised cases include lawsuits against Standard Oil Co. and British Petroleum Co. in the 1980s, Genentech Inc. in the 1990s and Barnesandnoble.com more recently.

Schulman, who has a 15 percent interest in Milberg Weiss, made more than $67 million from the firm's profits between 1991 and 2005, prosecutors said. In 2004, he represented Walt Disney Co. shareholders who sought to hold former Chief Executive Officer Michael Eisner liable for the $140 million severance paid to Michael Ovitz, a former talent agent who served as Disney's No. 2 executive for 15 months.

Bershad owned between 10 percent and 17.7 percent of the firm between 1983 and 2005 and made more than $160.9 million from profits, the indictment said.

Bershad represented Nortel Networks Corp. investors who sued for damages from an accounting fraud. Shareholders will receive about $2.7 billion from the settlement, making it the fourth largest U.S. class-action securities fraud case. Bershad also represented Lucent Technologies Inc. shareholders in securities lawsuits that settled for about $620 million.

The case is: U.S. v. Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP et al, 05-CR-587, U.S. District Court Central District of California (Los Angeles)

US Intensifies Stock-Options Probe (WSJ)

By James Bandler And Jennifer Levitz

Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

In a dramatic widening of the investigations into potential stock-option abuses, federal prosecutors in Manhattan have launched criminal probes of at least five U.S. companies.

Caremark Rx Inc., SafeNet Inc., Affiliated Computer Services Inc. and Vitesse Semiconductor Corp. said yesterday that they had received subpoenas from the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York. Late Wednesday night, giant health insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc. said it also had received a subpoena from the same prosecutor, along with a document request from the Internal Revenue Service.

Caremark, a big pharmacy-benefits manager based in Nashville, Tenn., and SafeNet, a software firm based in Belcamp, Md., said they also received informal inquiries from the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The entry of the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan, considered among the most experienced in prosecuting white-collar crimes, signals a significant ratcheting up of government scrutiny of option-granting practices. The SEC, which has been probing the matter for more than a year, is scrutinizing about 20 companies. A spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office declined to comment.

Stock options, a popular way to pay senior executives, are intended to give managers incentive to improve their company's share price. Generally, each option represents the chance to buy a share of company stock at a certain "strike price" on a future date. Thus, a recipient stands to gain only if the share price rises.

But an analysis of options awards at some companies has shown that executives benefited from extraordinary timing, getting grants dated at times when share prices hit lows. The strike price on options generally is equal to the market price on the day they are granted by a company's board. The lower the strike price, the greater the chance for future profit.

Federal prosecutors and securities regulators are trying to determine whether the effective dates on some of those options were deliberately and improperly changed -- a practice known as backdating -- securing extra pay for executives regardless of the stock's performance. Backdating would undermine the incentive purpose of the option grant and could violate a host of securities laws. It could also create thorny tax and accounting problems for companies.

Separately, Brooks Automation Inc., which had previously announced it will restate about seven years of results due to problems with its options grants, announced the resignation of two directors who received highly favorable stock options in 2000. Brooks said the board members, Amin J. Khoury and Roger D. Emerick, would "renounce" all of their options and restricted stock. The two men weren't available to comment late yesterday.

The resignations bring to 10 the number of executives or directors who have left their companies in recent weeks in the wake of the spiraling options scandal. The options-granting practices of at least one other company, Comverse Technology Inc., are being examined in a separate criminal probe by federal prosecutors in the Eastern District of New York.

A March 18 page-one article in the Wall Street Journal examined options-granting patterns at six companies, including Comverse, ACS and UnitedHealth. The article found a number of highly favorable grants to the top executives of each company, and concluded the odds of the grant pattern having occurred by chance were highly remote.

Lesley Pool, a spokeswoman for ACS, said, "We are fully cooperating with authorities." UnitedHealth and SafeNet also said they are cooperating. A Caremark representative couldn't be reached for comment. Backdating could lead to a number of potential criminal charges, legal experts said, including securities fraud, wire fraud, or even tax-related charges.

"If somebody actually backdated an option grant that could well be like shooting fish in a barrel for prosecutors," said Harvey Pitt, a former chairman of the SEC. "If you were sitting on a jury and somebody told you that the CEO was granted the option on May 18 but he put down the date of April 18, do you think you would have a lot of difficulty concluding that the CEO committed fraud? I don't think so," Mr. Pitt said.

Lynn Turner, a former chief accountant for the SEC, said unlike some complicated revenue-recognition cases brought by federal prosecutors in recent years, backdating would be easy for jurors to grasp. Mr. Turner predicted pressure would mount for boards to fire chief executives who had been involved in backdating. "It is already put in motion that if the CEO is found to have done it, he has to go," Mr. Turner said. He said that if board members are given the choice of deciding whether the CEO takes the hit, or the directors, "it is going to be about a two-second decision."

In recent weeks, CEOs have been forced out at Comverse and Vitesse. Last night, Vitesse said the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York notified it that it is seeking documents dating back to 1999 related to the company's stock-option grants. The Camarillo, Calif.-based company also said it has been notified that the SEC is investigating and requesting documents dating back to 1995 related to the grant of stock options. Vitesse said it plans to cooperate fully with both requests.

At Caremark, the company's chairman and chief executive, Edwin Crawford, was awarded 3.875 million stock options dated March 8, 2000. The options gave him the right to buy shares for 15% more than the stock's closing price that day, which turned out to be tied for the low point of that year. The company said Mr. Crawford agreed to forgo his bonus for four years -- 2000 through 2003 -- in exchange for the large grant.

A company spokesman has said the March 8 grant was made at a scheduled board meeting and came at the time of year when options were typically awarded. Mr. Crawford also has denied receiving any backdated options or grants, saying his options are approved by Caremark's board at regularly scheduled meetings, granted by the date approved and priced at fair market value on the date of the grant. Caremark also said it had received a request from the SEC about its relocation program. Mr. Crawford received $2.9 million from Caremark's program two years ago for the sale of his Birmingham, Ala., home, even though as of earlier this month his house hadn't been put on the market and his wife still lived there.

At Brooks Automation, a semiconductor equipment maker in Chelmsford, Mass., the compensation committee granted 233,000 options to its chief executive, Robert Therrien, with a date of May 31, 2000. Brooks's stock plunged more than 20% that day and surged over 30% the next day.

What was unusual was that Messrs. Khoury and Emerick, the compensation-committee members who oversaw the CEO option grants, also benefited. Although Brooks directors typically got options only in July, that year a special grant was awarded just to these two directors. In a statement, Brooks said Messrs. Khoury and Emerick had resigned voluntarily.

Also yesterday, five public pension funds filed a lawsuit in federal court in Minneapolis, seeking to prevent UnitedHealth's top two executives from exercising about $1.5 billion in options. The suit claims the company unlawfully backdated options to Chief Executive William McGuire, Chief Operating Officer Stephen Hemsley and other executives "to provide the recipients with windfall compensation at the direct expense of UnitedHealth."

UnitedHealth has said it may have to restate three years of results due to a "significant deficiency" in how it administered and accounted for past option grants.

The unusual legal request asks the court to place a "constructive trust" over all option contracts held by Messrs. McGuire and Hemsley. A UnitedHealth spokesman said the company hadn't seen the lawsuit and in any event doesn't comment on pending litigation.

Stock Option Subpoenas Issued (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

New York Times, May 19, 2006

At least four companies said yesterday that they had received federal subpoenas requesting information on their granting of stock options.

The companies are Caremark Rx, a manager of drug benefits; SafeNet, an information security company; Affiliated Computer Services, a processor of student loans; and Vitesse Semiconductor. The four received subpoenas from the United States attorney's office in the Southern District of New York.

All four companies said they were cooperating fully with the requests.

Caremark, based in Nashville, also said in a regulatory filing that it had received a request from the Securities and Exchange Commission for information on stock option grants and a company relocation program as part of an informal inquiry.

SafeNet, of Belcamp, Md., said it had received an informal inquiry from the S.E.C. requesting information on stock option grants to directors and officers, as well as certain accounting policies and practices.

Affiliated Computer, of Dallas, delayed filing a fiscal third-quarter financial report this month as it investigated its accounting. This week, the company said it would have costs of as much as $32 million through June 30, 2005, for options granted since 1994 that had effective dates earlier than when they were granted.

The company is also the focus of an informal S.E.C. inquiry, and some of its top officials are named in shareholder lawsuits claiming that the company violated grant rules.

Vitesse Semiconductor, of Camarillo, Calif., said it was being investigated by the S.E.C. over stock option grants. On Wednesday, the company said it had fired its chief executive and two other executives amid the inquiry.

Federal officials have been examining how companies have granted stock options, sometimes possibly increasing their value by setting their purchase date to coincide with the lowest possible price. UnitedHealth Group said Wednesday that it had received subpoenas from the United States attorney and the Internal Revenue Service over its grants.

Caremark Rx Stock Options Draw Subpoena (AP)

AP, May 18, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. - Pharmacy benefits manager Caremark Rx Inc. said Thursday that is has received a federal grand jury subpoena for records about its stock options.

The company also received what it called an "informal inquiry" from the Securities and Exchange Commission , requesting information about the company's stock options and its relocation program.

With revenues of nearly $33 billion last year, Nashville-based Caremark is Tennessee's largest publicly traded company, providing drug benefit services to more than 2,000 health plan sponsors and their participants throughout the United States.

The Wall Street Journal last week reported that Caremark's chairman, president and chief executive officer, Mac Crawford, took part in the company's relocation program when it moved its headquarters from Birmingham, Ala., to Nashville in 2003.

Crawford was given a $2.9 million "equity advance," but has yet to sell his house in Alabama. A Caremark spokesman told the paper that Crawford's ill wife still lives there and that the home will be sold when renovations on the Crawfords' Nashville home is complete.

Caremark's release mentioned neither Crawford's relocation or stock options in relation to the subpoena from U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York or the SEC letter. Neither the prosecutor's office nor the SEC returned calls from the AP late Thursday.

Caremark also operates a retail pharmacy network with more than 60,000 participating pharmacies, seven mail-service pharmacies and 21 licensed specialty pharmacies for delivery of advanced medications.

Shares of Caremark fell 6 cents to close at $48.89 on the New York Stock Exchange before Caremark's announcement was made, then lost up $1.14, or 2.3 percent, in aftermarket electronic trading.

Government Joins Drug-Pricing Suit Against Abbott (WSJ)

By John Carreyrou

Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

The Justice Department joined a whistleblower lawsuit against Abbott Laboratories Inc. and Hospira Inc., alleging that the companies conspired to inflate Medicare and Medicaid reimbursements on some drugs from 1991 to 2001.

In a civil complaint filed in federal court in Florida, the Justice Department alleged that Abbott, a drug maker based in Abbott Park, Ill., reported prices for its drugs to price publishers, such as the Drug Topics Red Book, that were as much as 1,000% higher than the prices the company charged hospitals and doctors. The drugs were sold by Abbott's Hospital Products Division, which Abbott spun off two years ago as Hospira, which is based in Lake Forest, Ill.

The allegedly inflated prices listed by the Red Book and other price publishers enabled doctors and hospitals to reap big profits by filing Medicare and Medicaid reimbursement claims that were much higher than what they had actually paid, according to the government's complaint. Abbott marketed these so-called spreads as an inducement to buy its drugs -- which were injectable and intravenous medications -- thereby increasing its own sales and profits, according to the complaint.

Abbott denied the allegations and said it would defend itself vigorously. "Abbott has consistently complied with all laws and regulations and properly and lawfully provided all information required by the government," an Abbott spokeswoman said. A spokeswoman for Hospira said the company has consistently complied with pricing laws, and she noted that the timing of the events at issue in the lawsuit predate Hospira's existence.

The government has filed similar lawsuits against other drug makers in recent years. In 2001, Bayer AG of Germany agreed to pay a $14 million fine to settle allegations that it reported inflated prices of drugs for hemophilia and immune disorders. More recently, TAP Pharmaceuticals Products Inc., a joint venture between Abbott and Takeda Chemical Industries Ltd. of Japan, agreed to pay more than $1 billion in civil and criminal penalties while pleading guilty to a charge of conspiring with doctors to bill Medicare and Medicaid for free samples of its prostate-cancer drug, Lupron.

In a media release about the latest case, the Justice Department said Medicare and Medicaid had reimbursed hospitals and doctors more than $175 million for the Abbott drugs in question. Under the False Claims Act, the government said it can recover triple the damages assessed by a jury and $5,500 to $11,000 for each fraudulent reimbursement claim.

The federal probe began after a Florida home-infusion company, Ven-A-Care of the Florida Keys Inc., filed a whistleblower lawsuit against Abbott.

US Targets Abbott Prices (CHIT)

By Bruce Japsen

Chicago Tribune, May 19, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department on Thursday sued Abbott Laboratories, alleging the company overcharged government health insurance programs in excess of $175 million for brand-name and generic drugs for more than a decade dating back to the early 1990s.

The federal government joined a whistleblower's suit that mirrors similar allegations brought against Abbott and dozens of other drugmakers in recent years as part of a legal assault on pharmaceutical industry pricing. Prosecutors in more than 20 states, including Illinois, have brought a series of similar complaints against Abbott and other drugmakers as part of an effort to rein in the soaring costs of prescription drugs.

The U.S. complaint, a civil case, like state civil suits, accuses Abbott of engaging in a "scheme" for more than a decade by bilking the Medicaid program and Medicare participants out of millions of dollars. The companies are accused of intentionally misreporting and inflating the figures used to calculate government reimbursement rates.

In a statement released Thursday by the Justice Department, it said the North Chicago-based pharmaceutical company reported prices that were "more than 10 times the actual sales prices on many of the drugs it manufactures."

The complaint alleges Abbott charged hospitals, pharmacies, nursing homes and other medical-care providers far less for medicines than the prices it had published in industry price guides for those drugs. Those published prices were then used by the government to calculate reimbursement to health-care providers for Medicare and Medicaid programs.

The difference between the published price and the actual price paid by the providers was the "spread," and it was used to give the health-care providers greater reimbursement and therefore an incentive to continue buying Abbott products.

"This complaint marks another step in the government's investigation and prosecution of pharmaceutical manufacturers who submit fraudulent drug pricing information that costs the federal health-care programs and taxpayers millions of dollars," said Assistant Atty. Gen. Peter D. Keisler, of the Justice Department's Civil Division.

In one example cited in the government's complaint, Abbott increased the per-unit price of the intravenous antibiotic vancomycin to $76 by early 2001. Meanwhile, it was "widely available" to purchasers at under $4.

While the government is suing Abbott, the business currently selling the pharmaceuticals mentioned in the suit is Lake Forest-based Hospira Inc., which was spun off by Abbott into a separate company in 2004. Abbott is the defendant in the case and would be liable should there be any settlement.

Abbott said it has no plans to settle.

"This is an Average Wholesale Price lawsuit similar to others filed against our industry," spokeswoman Melissa Brotz said. "Abbott has consistently complied with all laws and regulations—the company has properly and lawfully provided all information required by the government. We have a strong defense and intend to vigorously defend ourselves against these claims."

The allegations in the suit were originally filed under seal in 1995 by home-care pharmacy Ven-A-Care of the Florida Keys Inc. and its principals, who have successfully sued other drugmakers.

"We believe the evidence will show that only after significant exposure through active federal and state investigations did Abbott lower its reported prices, so that they more accurately reflected the prices it knew it was selling its drugs for," said Jim Breen, an attorney for Ven-A-Care and whistleblowers Zachary Bentley and Mark Jones, who were principals at the pharmacy company.

According to a Tribune report in 2001, Abbott dramatically lowered the price of dozens of drugs in the face of pricing probes by state and federal prosecutors. That year, TAP Pharmaceutical Products Inc., an Abbott joint venture, resolved criminal and civil allegations brought by the Justice Department that included publishing inflated prices for a prostate cancer drug.

HealthSouth To Pay $3 Million In U.S. Accounting Fraud Case (NYT)

By Kyle Whitmire

New York Times, May 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029100

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., May 18 — The Justice Department announced Thursday that HealthSouth, the chain of outpatient rehabilitation hospitals, would pay $3 million and avoid prosecution over a giant accounting fraud discovered at the company three years ago.

"Prosecution would likely have pushed this company into bankruptcy," Alice H. Martin, United States attorney in Birmingham, said in a statement. "By taking this nonprosecution approach, jobs of thousands have been saved, and the company has an opportunity to rebuild shareholder value."

HealthSouth, which agreed to accept responsibility for crimes committed by its executives, must pay the money to the United States Postal Inspection Service's consumer fraud division, enact more stringent internal controls and commit no other illegal acts for three years. In essence, the company is on probation until 2009, Ms. Martin said.

The decision brings an end to an investigation that began in March 2003, when the investigators raided the company's headquarters. Since then, 15 executives, including 5 chief financial officers, have pleaded guilty or been convicted of participating in the fraud. According to more recent company estimates, the fraud's impact was greater than $4 billion.

Last year, a Birmingham jury acquitted Richard M. Scrushy, the company's founder and former chief executive, of participating in the fraud. In an unrelated case, Mr. Scrushy is currently on trial on federal charges that he bribed a former governor of Alabama, Donald Siegelman.

The Justice Department waited until HealthSouth had made amends with investors through several civil settlements. In the last year, HealthSouth has agreed to pay the Securities and Exchange Commission and other civil litigants more than $500 million in cash and shares. Also, the company has agreed to pay more than $350 million to settle suits for Medicare fraud.

Still, HealthSouth continues to struggle. The civil settlements and new Medicare reimbursement rules have impaired the company's financial performance. In its first-quarter report, filed last week, HealthSouth fell short of analysts' expectations, and the company's net loss widened to $435.1 million. Last week, executives said that HealthSouth was considering changing the company's name and still expected to be relisted on a major stock exchange sometime this summer. It was delisted from the New York Stock Exchange in March 2003.

HealthSouth shares fell 9 cents, to $4.41, in over-the-counter trading yesterday, but regained the 9 cents after closing. The stock has declined more than 8 percent this year.

Jay Grinney, HealthSouth's chief executive, said in a statement yesterday: "On behalf of the 37,000 dedicated HealthSouth employees, I can say that we are delighted as an organization to be getting back to what we do best — providing outstanding rehabilitation, diagnostic and ambulatory surgical care throughout the nation."

HealthSouth Settles Fraud Case (LAT)

Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

HealthSouth Corp. agreed to pay $3 million and serve three years on probation in a deal with the government that spares the company an indictment over the $2.7-billion accounting fraud that almost triggered its collapse.

U.S. Atty. Alice Martin, who prosecuted 17 HealthSouth executives for their alleged roles in the fraud, including company founder Richard Scrushy, announced terms of the non-prosecution agreement Thursday. Scrushy was acquitted of fraud charges last year after a trial in Birmingham, Ala., where the company is based.

HealthSouth, which acknowledged the fraud as part of the accord, said Wednesday that the government imposed no fine or any other conditions on the company. HealthSouth spokesman Andy Brimmer said Thursday the company doesn't consider the $3-million payment to the government a fine.

The agreement "acknowledges the comprehensive corporate governance and compliance reform which has and is transpiring at HealthSouth, and its continued commitment to cooperate with the Department of Justice through self-disclosure," Martin said. "Prosecution would likely have pushed this company into bankruptcy."

The company settled a fraud case with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission last year for $100 million and another case with investors in March for $445 million.

The $3-million payment called for in the agreement will go to the U.S. Postal Inspection Service's Consumer Fraud Fund.

The company admitted wrongdoing, acknowledging that the Justice Department "has developed evidence during its investigation that HealthSouth, through some of its employees, has violated federal criminal law."

The company said it "accepts responsibility for the conduct of its employees giving rise to any violation in connection with the unlawful practices. HealthSouth does not endorse, ratify or condone criminal conduct."

Shares of HealthSouth declined 9 cents to $4.41. They have fallen 8.2% this year.

Mace Security Could Lose NASDAQ Listing (PHIBIZ)

Philadelphia Business Journal, May 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029101

Mace Security International Inc. said Thursday it faces a delisting from the NASDAQ stock exchange. The situation is linked to the company's alleged hiring of undocumented workers at its car washes.

Mace said an independent investigation into its hiring practices that was commissioned by the company's audit committee has delayed the filing of the company's 10-K annual report for 2005 and its 10-Q quarterly report for the period ended March 31.

Mace of Mount Laurel, N.J., said it has received a stay of the delisting. A hearing before the NASDAQ Listing Qualifications Panel regarding the delays of both the 10-K and 10-Q filings is scheduled for May 25.

Mace, which has a goal of selling its car washes to concentrate on the security-products end of its business, said the internal investigation has been completed.

Eduardo Nieves Jr., the company's vice president of marketing and investor relations, said the specific conclusions of the investigation are "right now ... not being disclosed. That information will be disclosed when we file our 10-K and 10-Q."

Nieves did point, however, to a line from the company's press release Thursday that said Mace's audit committee "is satisfied with the comprehensiveness and conclusions" of the inquiry. The release also said "there is no financial statement impact implicated by the company's hiring practices, except for a potential contingent liability."

With the independent investigation complete, the company said it and its independent auditor are working to ready the 10-K and 10-Q but did not know exactly when the reports will be ready.

"We want it to be as soon as possible for obvious reasons," Nieves said.

Mace's hiring practices are being investigated by the U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

Problems With SOX (FT)

Financial Times, May 19, 2006

America's smaller public companies had reason to hope the cost of complying with the Sarbanes-Oxley (Sox) act would this week be lightened. Their hopes were largely belied. Christopher Cox, chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, did extend the deadline for small cap businesses to comply with the act's notorious section 404 that requires auditors to certify companies' internal control systems. But he ignored the advice of the SEC's advisory board which last week recommended small businesses be exempt altogether from the requirement.

The SEC compounded this missed opportunity with two oversights: it failed to specify when the reporting holiday for small caps would come to an end; and it forgot to clarify whether foreign companies could use this postponement. These were no minor omissions. Of the many complaints that have been made about Sox, the most persuasive come from small businesses and foreign listings. Certainly America's larger companies also have reasons to gripe about a regime that has drastically raised their regulatory costs. But few dispute that small businesses have been worse affected.

As a result, many US small businesses have reportedly avoided going public altogether, or are conducting initial public offerings on small cap exchanges in foreign markets. Likewise, New York has lost its position as favourite port of call for the secondary listings of foreign companies in favour of London, Hong Kong and other less burdensome jurisdictions. All the signs are that this trend will continue.

But for companies of any size, the SEC's record is not encouraging so far. After Sox was enacted in 2002, the SEC predicted the average cost of compliance for each company would be $91,000. Industry estimates it is closer to $4.4m (£2.3m) and a multiple of that for some of the largest. The SEC also assured the markets section 404 would work seamlessly once it was up and running. But companies are spending inordinate amounts of time furnishing auditors with information that has little bearing on their financial soundness. One even had to disclose how many keys it issued to its janitors - hardly the best place to look for potential Nick Leesons of Barings infamy.

The SEC says it plans to issue new guidelines within a few months. Its most pressing concern must be to address the incentive for the big four accounting firms to pile ever greater disclosure requirements on companies' internal controls. Fear of criminal action suggests the auditors will continue to inflate that burden unless the SEC issues clearer instructions. Meanwhile, jurors will soon pronounce on the fraud charges against Kenneth Lay, the chief executive of Enron, whose bankruptcy in 2001 ultimately culminated in Sox. Whatever the verdict, the trial serves as a timely reminder that the best deterrent of all is the threat of criminal conviction.

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Ethics Panel, Justice Dept. To Run Parallel Probes (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029102

The House ethics committee plans to quickly begin its probes into the activities of Reps. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) and William J. Jefferson (D-La.) while working with the Justice Department to avoid interference with federal prosecutors' investigations of the same lawmakers, according to people familiar with the panel's efforts.

The committee's surprise decision Wednesday to open inquiries into allegations that the congressmen accepted bribes -- as well as a third, wider-ranging probe -- was meant to tamp down criticism that the panel is dysfunctional and that the House is not policing the ethical lapses of its members, according to the sources.

Yet it was not clear that the committee would have enough time to complete its work before the end of the legislative session this autumn, or that its efforts would not complicate the work of Justice Department prosecutors and investigators.

After 16 months of inactivity and partisan bickering, the ethics committee, formally known as the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, this week created special investigative subcommittees to look separately into the cases of Ney and Jefferson.

Each of the subcommittees has four members, evenly divided between Republicans and Democrats, and has the power to subpoena documents and compel testimony. They are likely to begin work before the House departs for the Memorial Day recess at the end of next week, House sources said.

The Justice Department has traditionally opposed such parallel inquiries by congressional committees for fear that lawmakers might complicate its collection of testimony and information. The Senate's ethics panel, for instance, regularly steps aside when another enforcement agency is looking into the behavior of senators.

But House officials indicated yesterday that they hope the continuing conversations between the Justice Department and the ethics committee will avert conflicts. A spokesman for the department declined to comment.

Stanley Brand, a lawyer and expert on congressional ethics, said that simultaneous inquiries are "impractical" and might put the Justice Department's efforts in jeopardy.

"I can't imagine that they will pursue subpoenas and testimony and get in the way of the Justice Department; that hasn't happened in the past," he said in reference to the ethics subcommittees.

Moreover, he said, an ethics panel's probes are likely to take "months and months" and will not be finished before the end of the year.

The committee has routinely disclosed when it formed subcommittees for scrutinizing possible wrongdoing by specific lawmakers, but its leaders have rarely spoken publicly about preliminary or wider-ranging types of inquiries. Nonetheless, on Wednesday the panel announced that it is looking into the possibility that staffers and lawmakers other than the now-jailed former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) might have been "provided hotel rooms, limousines and other services in exchange for performing official acts."

The choice to go public was a reaction to the ethics committee's moribund condition over the past 16 months, insiders said. During that period, Republicans and Democrats squabbled over how the panel should be run and staffed. New, restrictive committee rules, opposed by Democrats, were at first adopted and then rescinded. The panel did not have a consensus chief counsel until January.

The logjam over starting new investigations was finally broken after Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (D-W.Va.) was replaced last month as the committee's ranking Democrat by a respected veteran of the panel, Rep. Howard L. Berman (D-Calif.). Mollohan was forced to step down after his business dealings with recipients of federal funds that he appropriated became the subject of a federal investigation.

Yesterday, Republicans sought to portray Mollohan as the primary cause of the long holdup in new investigations. "Congressman Mollohan was stalling the process for political gain on behalf of the minority leader," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). Democrats did not want a functioning ethics committee, he said, so that they could more easily accuse Republicans of acting improperly with lobbyists.

"There was not even an option for the ethics committee because of the recalcitrance of Mollohan," agreed Rep. David Dreier (R-Calif.), chairman of the House Rules Committee. "I take my hat off to Howard Berman. He is a pro. He knows how to deal in a bipartisan way with a sensitive and tough issue."

Democrats dismissed the attacks on Mollohan as a smoke screen to obscure Republicans' culpability in the ethics committee's shutdown. The GOP had refused to cooperate with Democrats as a way to protect their then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (Tex.), Democrats said.

DeLay is resigning from the House next month under the cloud of a Texas indictment on money laundering charges and of federal investigations into his dealings with convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. DeLay, Ney, Jefferson and Mollohan have all said that they have done nothing wrong.

Lobbying Case To Get Jury Test (WSJ)

By Jeanne Cummings

Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Justice Department's investigation of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal already has produced four guilty pleas. Now, prosecutors are about to find out whether an influence-peddling probe based largely on emails and a network of low-profile Republican aides can pass muster with a jury.

David Safavian, a longtime friend of Mr. Abramoff and a former White House official, is scheduled to go on trial Monday. He is charged with making false statements and obstructing government inquiries about Mr. Abramoff's relationship with him while he served as chief of staff of the General Services Administration, which manages government property.

The trial comes at a critical moment as the focus of the Abramoff investigation appears to be broadening from staff to members of Congress, most notably Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney. While the Safavian trial is narrowly focused on the former government official's actions, a court loss could be a psychological blow to the high-profile inquiry.

"You don't want to lose. You want to keep the momentum going. You have all these guilty pleas. You want a conviction," says Randall Eliason, former chief of the public-corruption and government- fraud section of the U.S. attorney's office in Washington.

The prosecutors' task is complicated by the fact that they aren't planning to call Mr. Abramoff. A one-time Republican lobbying star, Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to trying to bribe members of Congress and admitted to bilking millions of dollars from his clients.

The decision against calling Mr. Abramoff is a double-edged sword, says Miles Ehrlich, a former prosecutor in the Justice Department's public-integrity section and a former chief of white-collar crime in the U.S. attorney's office in San Francisco. His absence "may enhance the prosecution's chances of keeping the focus on what was happening and not what a sleaze ball the cooperating witness is," Mr. Ehrlich says. But, under federal trial rules, the defense can still introduce evidence to discredit Mr. Abramoff, which could raise questions in the jurors' minds. "That's one of the difficulties of trial by email," he added.

The government has received some recent breaks. U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman is expected to grant the government's request to introduce more than 200 email messages, mostly between Messrs. Safavian and Abramoff, in which the two men seamlessly shift from discussing the lobbyist's interest in obtaining government property for his clients, to setting up racquetball dates and trips to Mr. Abramoff's upscale restaurant and skyboxes at sporting events.

Last week, Neil Volz, another Abramoff associate and former chief of staff to Rep. Ney, pleaded guilty to conspiring to corrupt public officials and violating lobbying rules. He is cooperating with investigators and is expected to take the stand against Mr. Safavian.

Mr. Safavian, a Detroit native, became friends with Mr. Abramoff in the 1990s when they worked at the law and lobbying firm of Preston Gates & Ellis. Mr. Safavian later co-founded the firm Janus-Merritt Strategies. The two men still shared many clients, including Indian tribes, Internet gambling companies and the North Mariana Islands.

In 2002, Mr. Safavian took a job as senior adviser and acting deputy chief of staff at the GSA and was soon named chief of staff. Less than two weeks after Mr. Safavian arrived at his government post, Mr. Abramoff sent him an email with the subject line, "I have a GSA question."

Over the next three years, Mr. Abramoff sought help from Mr. Safavian to secure government-owned property for Indian clients, a religious school he had founded and other matters. "I have a need to buy a stretch limo for the restaurant. Are there any coming up on any of the GSA drug-property sales?" Mr. Abramoff once asked Mr. Safavian.

The emails show that Mr. Safavian sometimes edited the work of Mr. Abramoff's team to ensure it covered issues that his own aides might raise. He arranged meetings between Mr. Abramoff's representatives and government officials, forwarded internal government documents and minutes of deliberations to help him develop property proposals, and recommended generating Capitol Hill pressure on his own bureaucracy if things weren't going Mr. Abramoff's way.

Mr. Volz is expected to testify about one alleged Safavian-inspired effort to persuade Rep. Ney to insert language into an election-overhaul bill that would have helped Mr. Abramoff's Indian-tribe clients win control of the Old Post Office building in downtown Washington.

In November 2004, Mr. Safavian moved to the Office of Management and Budget to become the administration's chief procurement-policy officer. He was indicted in October 2005.

The case hinges on what Mr. Safavian told GSA ethics officials and Senate investigators about an expensive golf trip to Scotland arranged by Mr. Abramoff in August 2002. Before departing, Mr. Safavian sought an advisory opinion from the GSA to approve the trip. He described Mr. Abramoff as an old friend and "a lawyer and lobbyist, but one that has no business before GSA (he does all his work on Capitol Hill.)," Mr. Safavian wrote to ethics officers, according to the indictment.

Prosecutors argue Mr. Safavian intentionally misled ethics officials about Mr. Abramoff's interest in doing business with the government in order to obtain clearance to go on the trip. Mr. Safavian faces additional charges of obstruction and false statements based on his exchanges with Senate Committee on Indian Affairs investigators in 2005, during which he repeated his description of Mr. Abramoff as someone who worked mostly on Capitol Hill.

Mr. Safavian's lawyer, Barbara Van Gelder, counters that her client's statement in 2002 was true because Mr. Abramoff didn't have a contract with the GSA. But prosecutors claim a broader definition of doing business with the government.

Ms. Van Gelder faces other hurdles. This week, she told Judge Friedman she was having trouble lining up witnesses who were on the Scotland golf trip, which included Rep. Ney, Mr. Volz and Ralph Reed, now a candidate to be Georgia's lieutenant governor. Lawyers of some attendees have told her their clients might invoke their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination if forced to take the stand, she told the court.

Former Weekly Reader Editor Convicted (STAMADV)

Stamford (CT) Advocate, May 19, 2006

BOSTON - It took a federal jury less than two hours today to convict former Weekly Reader editor Noel Neff on Internet child predator charges.

Neff showed no emotion after the jury returned the guilty verdicts early Thursday afternoon. U.S. District Judge George O'Toole Jr. revoked Neff's bond and marshals led the former children's magazine editor out of the courtroom in handcuffs.

Neff faces a minimum of five year, and up to 60 years, in prison on the charges. He is expected to be sentenced Sept. 14.

The jury found Neff, 47, of Norwalk, guilty on both charges of using the Internet to lure a minor to engage in sexual activity and traveling across state lines to engage in sexual conduct with a minor.

Neff was fired from the Stamford children's publisher after his July 9 arrest in Franklin, Mass., where he allegedly believed he would meet an adolescent named "Chris" he had met online. "Chris" was actually a Boston FBI agent posing as a 14-year-old boy with homosexual feelings.

After Neff initiated contact with "Chris" in April 2005 in an Internet chat room, they began exchanging e-mails and instant messages that were often about sex, according to court testimony this week. In online discussions before July 9, Neff allegedly said he couldn't say he was meeting "Chris" for sex but would let "Chris" make the first move.

When Neff arrived at the specified shopping center in Franklin, instead of meeting "Chris," he was placed under arrest by three FBI agents.

Neff's lawyer argued that his client was not seeking sex from "Chris" and based on evidence presented yesterday, would not have had time to act on the criminal behavior he is charged with.

Neff's lawyer, Francis O'Reilly of Fairfield, said his client never committed a criminal act and was only trying to share his insight as a sexually confused teenager with someone he thought was going through the same experience.

Jefferson Parish Teacher Arrested On Federal Child Porn Charges (AP)

AP, May 18, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- A Jefferson Parish public school teacher was in custody Thursday, booked on charges of possession of child pornography, federal authorities said.

The FBI arrested Russell Counterman, 44, of New Orleans, after getting a tip that he allegedly downloaded files _ while at work _ containing sexually explicit images of children who ranged in age from 4 years old to teenagers, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said.

During Counterman's initial appearance before U.S. Magistrate Louis Moore Jr., prosecutors asked that Counterman be detained, Letten said. "He's currently in custody, but a detention hearing is scheduled for Monday to determine whether he'll stay there," he said.

Counterman, who taught at the Patrick F. Taylor Science and Technology school, was suspended following his arrest, according to Jefferson Parish public school officials.

Federal agents said Counterman was accused of using a school-issued laptop to download child pornography from the Internet at the school. After agreeing to a search, authorities said some of the alleged material was found in Counterman's classroom in a briefcase as well as in his home.

"It is important to note that the FBI has no information indicating that any child had access to child pornography or that this individual engaged in inappropriate behavior with the school children," said Special Agent in Charge Jim Bernazzani.

Letten also said there was no evidence of Counterman having manufactured any of the pictures seized.

The U.S. Attorney's Office said Counterman has taught school in the New Orleans area for 12 years. If indicted and convicted, Counterman faces up to 10 years in jail and a life term of supervised release.

Florida Man Pleads To Internet Sex Solicitation (WTSP)

DOJ_NMG_0029105

WTSP-TV, May 18, 2006

An east coast man faces 5 to 30 years in prison on a guilty plea to using a compuuter to entice a minor to meet and have sex, the U.S. Attorney's office said.

Leroy Walter Lasky, Jr., 51, of Port Orange, entered his plea today before U.S. Magistrate Judge Mark A. Pizzo in Tampa Federal Court. Lasky was indicted on March 16th on one count of luring a 15-year-old girl in a computer chat room. He was actually conversing with an undercover officer from the Hillsborough County Sheriff's Office.

"According to court documents, after numerous chats on the internet, Lasky agreed to meet the girl in Tampa for sex," the U.S. Attorney's office said. "On September 22, 2005, the defendant traveled from his home on the east coast of Florida to Tampa where he had arranged to meet the young teen girl."

He was met by officers from the Innocent Images Task Force and taken into custody.

A sentencing date has not been set.

Congress Bribery Probe Could Deepen (BOS)

By Michael Kranish, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, May 19, 2006

Records detail contractor's sway

WASHINGTON -- On March 8, 2004, after a private, chartered flight from Washington, Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham checked into a luxury oceanfront suite at the Delano Hotel, a restored Art Deco jewel on Miami Beach. Prosecutors say the San Diego lawmaker, in town to shop for a yacht, racked up more than $15,000 in bills during the trip, including $848 in meals.

Court records show that Mitchell Wade, an ambitious defense contractor with deep pockets, picked up most of the tab. Prosecutors say the Miami Beach trip was pocket change compared with the more than $1 million in bribes Wade paid to Cunningham, a former fighter pilot and powerful member of the House Appropriations Committee, to steer government defense contracts his way.

But Wade had more money to spread around.

Within days of sending Cunningham to Miami, prosecutors say, Wade gave $32,000 in laundered campaign funds to Representative Katherine Harris, the Florida Republican and Homeland Security Committee member whose help Wade was seeking to create a complex for MZM Inc., his company, in her home state. Documents say Wade also funneled $46,000 into the campaign account of Representative Virgil H. Goode Jr., a Virginia Republican who also sits on the Appropriations Committee.

Wade then discussed getting specific defense appropriations with Harris and Goode or their staffs, according to court documents. Weeks after Wade arranged for most of the contributions to Goode, Wade walked away with a pledge for a $9 million facility in Goode's district with help from Goode's office, the court filings say

Harris and Goode both say they didn't know the contributions had come from straw donors and were illegal. They have not been charged.

Nevertheless, court papers indicate that the investigation that snared Cunningham -- in which the California Republican, now serving a 10-year sentence in federal prison, admitted that he took millions in bribes -- and led Wade to take a plea deal could go much deeper. At least three other federal investigations involving members of Congress are also underway, linked to questions about whether lawmakers traded the power and influence of their offices for hefty campaign contributions and lavish gifts.

"There is some increasing panic among members who worry that there may be e-mails in which they sort of promised to do something that is contemporaneous with campaign contributions," said Thomas Mann of the Brookings Institution.

Previously, Mann said, members of Congress may have believed they were following the rules as long as donations they received were legal. Now, he said, members are concerned that Justice's Office of Public Integrity is looking at possible connections between campaign contributions and official action. The investigations are warranted, Mann added, because "things got really out of hand" with members taking action on behalf of contributors or those provided gifts.

"If the Office of Public Integrity action is a bit strong, sometimes you have got to overreact to stamp out a practice that is truly noxious," he said.

Word about the various investigations has been trickling out in news reports for months. Authorities want to know whether Representative Alan B. Mollohan, a West Virginia Democrat and Appropriations Committee member, used his clout to hand government contracts to nonprofit groups run by his friends; whether disgraced former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff bribed Representative Bob Ney, Republican of Ohio; and whether the House Appropriations Committee chairman, Jerry Lewis of California, also a Republican, improperly awarded contracts sought by a lobbyist who has been linked to Cunningham.

DOJ_NMG_0029106

The anxiety level in Congress increased this week after the House Ethics Committee -- long criticized for its reluctance to investigate members -- announced that it was looking into the behavior of Ney and Representative William J. Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat who is suspected of receiving bribes.

All of the members under scrutiny have denied wrongdoing.

Perhaps most significant, the Ethics Committee said it will examine the Cunningham case to determine "whether other House members or staff are implicated." The committee said it would check out allegations that members and staff received "hotel rooms, limousines, and other services in exchange for performing official acts"

Though Cunningham and Wade both pleaded guilty, federal officials also want to know whether a second unnamed defense contractor may also have wooed congressmen, other defense contractors, and the CIA's third in command with poker parties, a hospitality suite, and possibly prostitutes.

The totality of these investigations marks one of the Justice Department's most concentrated public corruption efforts in recent history.

In a speech last week in San Diego, FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said the bureau has made those cases its top priority. "More than ever, the FBI must be actively engaged in combating public corruption," Mueller said.

Though Cunningham reportedly is not cooperating with investigators, prosecutors last week asked a judge to delay Wade's sentencing because they expect his "cooperation will continue for quite some time."

Cunningham, a decorated Vietnam War veteran, was so aggressive in seeking bribes that he kept track of them on his House stationery, court papers said. One notation says that in exchange for a $16 million defense contract, Cunningham expected to receive $140,000. An additional $1 million on that project would cost the contractor another $50,000 bribe, according to court documents.

In all, Cunningham took in at least $2.4 million since 2000, in part through a $700,000 profit on the sale of his relatively modest California home, a transaction that tipped off investigators, according to court records. Besides cash, contractors bribed Cunningham with top-of-the-line cars, a yacht, and antique furnishings for his new $2.5 million mansion. Wade, prosecutors say, was Cunningham's chief benefactor, even paying $115,000 toward the congressman's capital gains tax.

"Cunningham grew to expect luxury," prosecutors said in court documents. "His coconspirators eagerly plied him with it."

Having won over Cunningham, Wade set his sights on Congress members Harris and Goode, according to court documents.

Wade wanted Harris -- the former Florida secretary of state who had a pivotal role in the disputed 2000 presidential election who is now running for US Senate -- to request an earmarked appropriation allowing MZM to build a Florida facility, the court records say. A few days after paying for Cunningham's Miami Beach trip, Wade gave some of his MZM employees and their spouses $2,000 each, reimbursement for checks they'd write to Harris's 2004 House campaign.

"The employees [then] delivered the checks to Wade, who personally handed them" to Harris, the court documents say.

In early 2005, Wade met Harris for dinner at Washington's posh Citronelle restaurant to discuss a fund-raiser for Harris and whether Harris could get federal money for an MZM facility in her district, according to the Orlando Sentinel. Wade picked up the $2,800 dinner check, a violation of House ethics rules if Harris's portion of the meal was worth more than $50. Harris has said she didn't eat or drink much at the dinner and that she thought her staff had paid for her share.

In a written statement to reporters, Harris acknowledged that she and Wade talked business and that she later requested but couldn't get a $10 million appropriation for the MZM project, which she thought would create local jobs. A spokesman would not say whether Harris was present when Wade handed over the $2,000 checks for her campaign.

Wade also arranged for Goode's reelection campaign to get big checks. Court records say that in March 2005 Wade gave money to his associates, who in turn became what the government calls "straw donors," contributing at least $46,000 of Wade's money to the Virginia Republican. Wade then asked Goode and his staff for federal money to build an MZM facility in Goode's district. In June 2005, Goode's staff "confirmed to Wade that an appropriations bill would include $9 million for the facility and a related program," according to court records.

In an e-mail to the Globe, Goode said he has no problem discussing a federal contract with such a big campaign contributor. Asked what he believed Wade wanted after MZM employees contributed so much money to his campaign, Goode responded, "I'm a strong supporter of 'Buy American' and a promoter of the Fifth District of Virginia in which MZM facilities were located."

Wade's unnamed, unindicted coconspirator, whom news reports identified as Brent Wilkes, a onetime associate of his, also allegedly paid Cunningham more than $600,000 to get defense contracts. Wilkes ran a company called ADCS Inc., which got tens of millions of dollars in contracts to transform the Pentagon's paper documents into computer files; court documents say that Cunningham had a hand in getting ADCS hired.

Wilkes's name surfaced again recently because he reportedly attended poker parties at the Watergate that included members of Congress, defense contractors, and Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, the third-ranking leader at the CIA who resigned last week.

White House Knew Of Payments For Tobin's Defense (NHUL)

By John Distaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, May 19, 2006

The former Chairman of the Republican National Committee remembers telling someone at the White House that he had decided to have the RNC pay the legal defense bills for convicted phone-jamming conspirator James Tobin, but he can't remember who.

Ed Gillespie told the New Hampshire Union Leader yesterday he informed the White House after he decided to authorize payment.

The Washington Post reported on Wednesday that Gillespie told its reporter that he had "informed the White House, without seeking formal approval, before authorizing the payments."

Gillespie told the Union Leader the two accounts were "consistent" because he decided to authorize the payments before telling the White House and actually authorized the payments after telling the White House.

But state Democratic Chairman Kathy Sullivan called what she viewed as a change in Gillespie's account troubling. If the White House was informed by Gillespie before he authorized payments, the White House could have had an opportunity to put a stop to it, and did not, she noted.

Democrats have long been trying to link the phone-jamming operation to the White House. The Senate Majority Project, a Washington-based research group with Democratic ties, has pointed out that court records show Tobin made about two dozen calls to the White House political affairs office on the day before, and the morning of, Election Day 2002.

Current RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman, who headed the White House political affairs operation in 2002, said his former office had nothing to do with the operation.

Telemarketers hired by the state Republican Party on the morning of election day 2002 placed hundreds of hang-up calls to Democratic Party and Manchester firefighters union offices to jam their get-out-the-vote telephone lines, an apparent effort to keep likely Democratic voters from the polls.

The key election that day was between Senate candidates Republican John Sununu, who won, and former Democratic Gov. Jeanne Shaheen.

Tobin was convicted of two telephone harassment charges for putting former New Hampshire GOP executive director Charles McGee in touch with former Republican consultant Allan Raymond, who in turn hired the Idaho-based telemarketer to jam the lines.

Tobin was sentenced on Wednesday to 10 months in prison and two years probation, and fined $10,000. McGee and Raymond have pled guilty to similar charges. McGee has served, and Raymond continues to serve, prison time.

The RNC paid only for Tobin's defense by the Washington law firm of Williams and Connolly.

Gillespie told the Washington Post this week he authorized the payment because Tobin "was accused of doing something in his capacity as an RNC consultant, and we believed him to be innocent."

Williams and Connolly began representing Tobin about the time he was indicted in December 2004. So far, the RNC has paid at least $2.8 million for Tobin's defense. He is appealing the conviction.

Gillespie yesterday told the Union Leader he could not remember who at the White House he informed of his decision to pick up Tobin's legal bills.

"I'm not going to guess," he said. "It was years ago, but as a matter of routine, I would have told somebody over there."

If someone at the White House had expressed displeasure with his decision, Gillespie said, "It was too late. I had made the decision and they were not involved in it."

Sullivan said she was "extremely troubled by the change in story. . .We have former RNC Chairman Gillespie changing his story from one day to the next about who had prior knowledge of the decision to pay Mr. Tobin's legal fees."

Michael Gehrke, executive director of the Senate Majority Project, has said he suspects Karl Rove may have been informed of the payments because "Rove was, and is, the Bush Administration's point person for all things political."

Rove is scheduled to be in the state on June 12 to keynote a fund-raiser for the New Hampshire Republican State Committee.

CDC Staffer Pleads Guilty To Fraudulent Claims (AJC)

By Bill Torpy

Atlanta Journal-Constitution, May 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029108

A CDC director pleaded guilty in federal court Thursday to a charge of theft of government funds for padding her travel expense accounts by an estimaated $7,500.

Donna Stroup, 54, was director of the Coordinating Center for Health Promotion for the Atlanta-based Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Prosecutors say Stroup, over a three-year period, submitted dozens of fraudulent claims and altered receipts for expenses not covered by the agency. Often, she wrote off personal expenses as FedEx or copying charges.

One such expense for $106.22 was described as Powerpoint slides, when it was a purchase at Filene's Basement department store.

"It was repeated criminal acts, albeit small, by a high-ranking government official, so we had to charge her," said U.S. Attorney David Nahmias.

In 2004, Stroup was one of the authors of a widely reported study that said obesity was about to overtake smoking as the nation's leading cause of death. The CDC later had to issue a rare correction of the study, saying the numbers were overstated, blaming the error on computer software.

CDC spokesman Tom Skinner would say only that Stroup has submitted her resignation. She will be sentenced in July.

Shooter Languished Between Delusions, Despair (WP)

By Paul Duggan

Washington Post, May 19, 2006

In his lucid moments, Michael W. Kennedy longed to have his mental health back, saying he felt tortured by strange delusions and might kill himself to find peace, say teenagers who were close to him and an adult who has spoken with Kennedy's parents.

They said that when Kennedy, 18, fired more than 70 shots outside a Fairfax County police station last week, mortally wounding two officers, it marked the end of a half-year descent from normalcy to homicidal madness. His decline began suddenly in the fall, they said, with the unexplained onset of chronic severe headaches and bouts of sleeplessness.

One friend, Daniel Sforza, 18, who saw Kennedy late in the summer before going away to college and then hung out with him in the fall on a weekend visit home, said he was stunned by the "drastic" change in his friend's mental condition. "Mike was totally different," Sforza said, recalling the bizarre, disjointed delusions that Kennedy rambled on about in the fall.

"I mean, totally off-the-wall different," Sforza said.

Before then, his friends said, Kennedy, who was killed by police during the attack, seemed healthy and content, a sociable teenager with a quirky, carefree personality. He was a gun enthusiast, they said, but did not fit the profile of a would-be mass murderer. Far from being a brooding loner, they said, he had a wealth of friends at Fairfax's Westfield High School, from which he graduated last spring, and his behavior there never hinted at the trouble to come.

Late last year, as delusions haunted Kennedy more and more, his friends said, he agonized in moments of clarity.

"It seemed like he was two personalities," said a former girlfriend, now 17, who did not want her name published for privacy reasons. She stayed close with Kennedy to the end. "He could be this crazy-talking person. And then he would come back to his normal self and be like, 'I can't live like this! Something's wrong with me!' "Headaches, Insomnia, Ramblings

When his mental problems took hold in the fall, Kennedy, an aspiring graphic artist, was a student at Northern Virginia Community College in Manassas.

"We can't put a finger on any one moment or cataclysmic event that started the downfall," said the adult who has talked regularly with Kennedy's parents since the shootings.

Speaking on condition of anonymity because the attack is being investigated by police, the parents' acquaintance said that Kennedy's headaches and insomnia were aggravated by the delusions. During those spells, which grew more intense and prolonged over the winter, he rambled incoherently about God, Hitler, aliens and a coming apocalyptic battle in which he was destined to play a key role, his friends said.

Through all this talk of an epic struggle for dominion over the Earth, Kennedy's friends said, they never heard him threaten to attack the police or anyone specifically. However, the former girlfriend said, "you knew in the back of your mind that if he honestly thought he was talking to God, then he might do something dangerous."

His parents, Brian and Margaret Kennedy, were distraught over their son's worsening condition and took him to "a number of doctors" for a variety of tests, including at Prince William Hospital, the Woodburn Center for Community Mental Health in Annandale and Potomac Ridge Behavioral Health Center in Rockville, the adult acquaintance said. He said Kennedy was given medication, but he did not know exactly what kind.

Brian Kennedy is a meat manager at a supermarket, and his wife works in an optical store. Within the limits of their health insurance, the acquaintance said, the parents "went everywhere they could" in search of help for their only son.

"From the parents' standpoint, they were never given a diagnosis," he said. "They were never told what was wrong with him. Nobody figured it out."

Several of his close friends, as well as the adult acquaintance, said that when Kennedy's delusions subsided and he could think relatively clearly, he openly anguished over his mental problems, telling people he desperately wanted to be normal. They said he often talked of killing himself as an escape.

"He would tell his parents that he couldn't go on anymore unless he got some help," the acquaintance said. The ex-girlfriend said, "He told me he was going to shoot himself, and then he had some revelation where he decided not to."

Another friend, also a teenage girl, said: "One time he told me he was thinking about hanging himself. But he didn't do it because he thought God wouldn't let him do it, that God would . . . hold him in the air and not let him suffocate."

Instead of committing suicide, Kennedy armed himself May 8 with seven guns, carjacked a minivan, drove into a parking lot reserved for police personnel at the Sully District station in western Fairfax -- a few miles from his Centreville home -- and opened fire with an AK-47-style assault rifle and possibly two other weapons.

Detective Vicky O. Armel, 40, died that day. Officer Michael E. Garbarino, 53, died early Wednesday.

Kennedy's parents, who have not spoken publicly about the attack, left their Centreville townhouse after the shootings and went into seclusion with their other child, a 9-year-old girl. As of yesterday, authorities said, the couple also had not talked with Fairfax police detectives, who have repeatedly sought to interview the Kennedys about their son.

When police searched the unoccupied townhouse after the shootings, they said, they found nine guns strewn about the home. As for why the parents kept firearms, given their son's mental state, their attorney has said in a statement that the guns had been locked in two containers. "The family can only surmise that their son broke into one of the containers" before going to the police station, the statement said.'He Couldn't Figure It Out'

At Westfield High, Kennedy "was always a little eccentric," said the former girlfriend, echoing others. "Not weird in a bad way," she said. "Just weird like in, you know, everybody's trying to find their own individuality."

Kennedy was artistic and a military buff, an offbeat kid who often dressed in camouflage pants and combat boots, knew a great deal about guns and devoted a lot of time to the student literary magazine, Calliope, contributing photos and computer graphics. As a senior, he managed the magazine's twice-yearly "coffeehouse," a fundraiser featuring music and poetry readings. "He was really into that," the ex-girlfriend said.

In the fall, he enrolled in community college as a liberal arts major. The college would not disclose his grades, but Sforza, a student at Virginia Commonwealth University, said Kennedy told him in Internet chats "that he wasn't doing well at all."

And it was easy for Sforza to see why, when he came home from VCU in Richmond one autumn weekend and realized that his friend was losing his grip on reality.

"He really wanted all these thoughts to end," Sforza said. "He wanted to figure out the problems and why he was thinking this way. . . . He couldn't figure it out."

Kennedy, who had a part-time job at a CVS, stopped working near the end of the year and gave up on college. When he talked with friends while in a delusional state, they noticed that his fantasies were becoming more intricate and bizarre. At other times, when he seemed fairly rational, they could tell he was sinking deeper into despair over his problems.

In February, after he shot and wounded his family's dog, Duke, Kennedy told the ex-girlfriend that he had planned to commit suicide but experienced a religious revelation that changed his mind. He said the gun went off accidentally as he was putting it away and Duke, a spaniel, was hit.Psychiatric Centers and Jail Cells

Winter became spring, and his descent accelerated, his friends said. Although medical tests, including a CT scan, found no clear physical abnormalities, Kennedy's parents "are still thinking it was some kind of brain tumor" that caused his erratic behavior, the adult acquaintance said. He said the couple has not seen a report of their son's autopsy.

On April 16, Easter, he said, the parents took Kennedy to Woodburn, an outpatient facility. After being examined and sent home with medication, Kennedy was back at the center two days later. That time, the acquaintance said, Woodburn officials called other psychiatric facilities to find a bed for him and arranged for him to be admitted to Potomac Ridge. "His mother drove him straight there," the acquaintance said.

He stayed at Potomac Ridge for about seven hours April 18 before climbing out a window in the early evening. After carjacking a Toyota by bluffing that he had a gun, he drove from Rockville back to Centreville, to the ex-girlfriend's house.

"He just started going off on one of his weird conversations," she said. It was past 9 p.m. as they stood in her driveway, the Toyota parked at the curb. "He right away told me he stole the car. He said he had gone to some mental hospital and was being treated like an animal, and he couldn't stand being there." She urged him to surrender to police. "I yelled at him a little bit, but I didn't want to get him mad, because I was really afraid."

Kennedy then drove to the home of another friend, Brendan Baker, 18. "When I opened the door, he goes: 'Brendan! It's time! It's time!' " Baker asked, time for what? But he got no clear answer. "He just started talking crazy stuff. . . . Then he said all he wanted to do was die."

Baker said he and two other young people at his home persuaded their troubled friend to turn himself in, and those two teenagers followed Kennedy as he drove to the Sully station.

The experience of being locked up seemed to aggravate Kennedy's mental instability, said his friends and the acquaintance who has spoken with his parents. Besides his brief stay at Potomac Ridge, Kennedy spent about 66 hours in the Fairfax County jail, then a night in a Montgomery County cell after he was extradited there on the carjacking charge, before he was released on bond April 22.

In the final two weeks of his life -- as Kennedy reached out more often to friends on the Web, by phone and in person, at all hours -- he complained bitterly about the treatment he had received behind bars. But it was hard for those listening to discern which stories were true and which were products of his increasingly confused mind.

Brendan Cowan, 21, was among the last to see him. He picked up Kennedy at his home Saturday morning, May 6, and they drove to a Starbucks.

Cowan, a devout Christian, said he asked Kennedy whether he thought Satan was responsible for his visions. Kennedy shrugged, listlessly, and gestured to pedestrians and motorists. "He said that when he looked at all these people, it was like looking at dead people," Cowan said. "He would look into their eyes, and their eyes were just solid white, like they had rolled back into their skulls."

He said Kennedy sounded "really, really saddened by what he saw."

Satan was in his thoughts two days later. Before he gathered up the guns, carjacked a minivan near his home and drove to the Sully station, Kennedy messaged Sforza in his VCU dorm room, and the two chatted for a while on the Web.

"He told me he wanted to get an exorcism," Sforza said. This was about an hour before the 3:52 p.m. shootings. "And I was like, 'Do they even still do exorcisms?' We joked around a little bit. . . . I don't really remember how we ended the conversation. . . . We really didn't say goodbye. It was like we just stopped talking."

Sforza said he went back to his schoolwork, untroubled. The chat had not been much different from many others between him and Kennedy in past months.

"When I would talk to him," Sforza said, "I often felt like he thought he was at war with the world. It was him versus everyone else, because no one else understood what was happening to him."

Law Officer Shot Many Times (MCA)

By Chris Conley

Memphis Commercial Appeal, May 19, 2006

A deputy U.S. marshal was shot numerous times by Memphis police before dying in an exchange of gunfire, a Shelby County Medical Examiner's report revealed Thursday.

Mary Fisher, 46, died Sunday morning after she began shooting at two police officers in the driveway of her Cordova home at 1143 Palmina Cove.

Investigators hadn't determined how many times officers shot at Fisher, but said she fired at least several shots, some apparently after she was wounded.

Officer Patrick Taylor was hit twice in the leg. He and a second officer remain on routine leave with pay while an investigation into the shooting continues. The name of the second officer has not been released.

The circumstances that sparked the shooting remain a mystery, and Shelby County Sheriff's deputies hope toxicology tests will help.

They said, however, that there were no indications from inside Fisher's home that she was on medication, no pill bottles.

"We want to know what happened," said Marshal David Jolley, who is in charge of the West Tennessee office.

Fisher was assigned to the Memphis office in the early 1990s, but in 2001 was promoted to the position of district supervisor and transferred to Texas. She was a lieutenant colonel in the Army Reserves.

Most recently, she had been assigned to the Office of Emergency Management, a unit of Homeland Security.

"She seemed to have it under control. Nobody saw it coming," said Jolley. "She was a very private person."

Those who knew her said she had recently gone through a divorce and custody dispute over a minor daughter.

Sheriff's deputies got a 911 call from Fisher's home about 10 p.m. the night before her death and found some of her co-workers there. They told the deputies that Fisher had been "delusional" and that she had driven off in her white BMW.

Through the night, police searched for her, and put out bulletins to all the surrounding police agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0029111

Her co-workers called her repeatedly on her cell phone. She answered the telephone several times, Jolley said, but would not listen to pleas to come home.

She also would not tell her fellow marshals where she was.

"They could not get a fix on her," Jolley said. "She wouldn't tell them anything."

Eight hours later, two Memphis officers working a wreck at Germantown and Macon noticed a white BMW driving erratically. They called other officers, who tried unsuccessfully to pull her over, and followed her into her driveway.

There, she refused to get out of her car. She then leaned out and started firing, prompting a hail of gunfire in response.

The medical examiner's office ruled her death a homicide, indicating only that she died at the hands of another, and that it was not an accident.

Homeland Security Officer Charged With Murder In SoCal Killing (SFC/AP)

San Francisco Chronicle, May 19, 2006

(05-18) 05:06 PDT , (AP) --

SANTA ANA, Calif. — A Department of Homeland Security officer faces a murder charge in connection with a shooting outside his apartment after authorities dismissed a lesser charge as his trial was about to begin.

Douglas William Bates, 44, had been scheduled to go to trial Wednesday on a voluntary manslaughter charge, which carried a possible 11-year sentence.

He now faces a sentence of 40 years to life on a second-degree murder charge with a gun enhancement, authorities said.

"We didn't do it for the penalty but for the facts and the law," said Assistant District Attorney David Brent, who filed the charge.

Bates is accused of firing his gun outside his apartment at 20-year-old Bassim Chmait after a dispute with Chmait and his friends in February of 2005.

Chmait's friends told police that Bates pistol-whipped one of them and shot Chmait when he tried to intervene. Bates claimed that his gun went off when he was beaten by Chmait and his companions.

Bates was not arrested until five months after the incident when prosecutors took his case to a grand jury.

The last minute change did not sit well with Bates' attorney, Mike Cavalluzzi.

"To wait until now makes me question their motives," Cavalluzzi said. "If the district attorney had questions with the grand jury's finding they would've dismissed and refiled back then instead of allowing the case to proceed."

Bates worked at Los Angeles International Airport for the DHS. He was assigned to desk duty after the shooting. He is free on bond and is set to be arraigned May 31.

Judge: No Fast Track For Duke Rape Case (AP)

AP, May 19, 2006

DURHAM, N.C. (AP) -- One of three Duke University lacrosse players charged with rape wants the case resolved in time for the next school year, his attorney said in court Thursday. But the judge warned he will not fast-track the proceedings.

The case "is not going to jump ahead of the line and be handled any differently," Superior Court Judge Ronald L. Stephens said at a hearing for sophomore Reade Seligmann.

After the brief hearing, District Attorney Mike Nifong said that he intends to try all three players together and that he does not expect any trial to begin before next year.

Seligmann, 20, of Essex Fells, N.J., and Collin Finnerty, 19, of Garden City, N.Y., were indicted last month on charges of raping a woman who had been hired to strip at a team party in March. A third player, co-captain David Evans, was indicted on Monday.

"We want a trial as fast as we can," said Seligmann attorney Kirk Osborn. "This young kid wants to go to school in the fall, and he can't until this is resolved."

Seligmann was stoic as he entered the courthouse for his first court appearance, passing in front of TV cameras and photographers. He endured taunts from members of the New Black Panther Party, one of whom yelled, "Justice will be served, rapist!" The defendants are white, and their accuser is black.

The defendant was not asked any questions during the 20-minute hearing in the packed courtroom, and did not speak. Like the other defendants, Seligmann is free on $400,000 bail. The judge refused to lower that amount Thursday.

Seligmann's lawyer had planned to ask the judge for all evidence collected by the prosecution, but before the hearing the district attorney provided the defense with a copy of his entire case file, including 1,278 pages of evidence, two videotapes and a compact disc containing photos.

Evans, the only defendant to speak publicly about the charges, has called the allegations "fantastic lies" and declared that he and the two other athletes are innocent.

Fugitive Financier Hinkley Turns Himself In At Mexican Border (DMR)

Des Moines Register, May 19, 2006

One of Iowa's most-wanted federal fugitives, a suspected millionaire swindler who disappeared nearly two years ago, has surrendered to federal marshals in Laredo, Texas, with only $40, a Mexican calling card and a pack of cigarettes.

Federal authorities say Scott William Hinkley Sr., 57, surrendered to U.S. Marshals at the Mexican border on Sunday.

Hinkley had been missing for nearly two years since he bolted from his Des Moines apartment with 33 months of probation left.

"On behalf of the plaintiffs, I'll be interested in talking with him," said Pete Cannon, a lawyer for investors who lost roughly $5.5 million when Hinkley's Iowa and Missouri Rural Investment companies vaporized in 2000. "We thought we had exhausted the asset trail," Cannon said. "But we'll take the opportunity to talk to him again."

Hinkley, a former Quaker minister turned housing financier, left his Oskaloosa home on a business trip in late June 2000 with a cargo that included boxes of company records and $175,000 in cash. While relatives publicly worried about his fate, Hinkley stayed hidden until he was discovered in October aboard a $1.3 million yacht in the Caribbean, along with a rifle and some diamonds.

Hinkley pleaded guilty in 2001 of money laundering and mail fraud and was sentenced to 3 years and 11 months in federal prison. He was released in March 2004 and had 33 months left on his prole when he vanished from his Des Moines apartment, probably in late June 2004.

U.S. Marshals in Des Moines on Thursday did not return an after-hours telephone calls seeking more information about Hinkley. A news release from Texas said marshals received a tip on May 10 that Hinkley might be in Mexico. While that lead was being investigated, Hinkley "crossed the border" on Sunday and "identified himself to U.S. authorities as a U.S. fugitive," according to the statement.

Federal authorities last year said they had exhausted all leads in the search for Hinkley and presumed that he had was living off some previously hidden money.

Cannon said accountants hired by his firm recovered roughly $3 million but found evidence that most of the rest of the money was burned up in Hinkley's extravagant lifestyle. Hinkley's flight, Cannon said, "certainly leads one to believe there might have been some other assets out there, and we'll certainly take the opportunity to talk with him again."

Former Minister Surrenders On Texas-Mexico Border (AP)

By James Beltran

AP, May 18, 2006

DES MOINES, Iowa - A former Quaker minister convicted of swindling investors out of millions of dollars has been arrested on the Texas-Mexico border after evading authorities for almost two years.

Scott Hinkley served 47 months in prison for stealing an estimated $5.5 million from 330 investors in his Iowa and Missouri Rural Investment companies. He was released in March 2004 but missed an appointment with his parole officer four months later and had not been seen since.

Hinkley, 56, was arrested Sunday after crossing from Mexico into Laredo, Texas, and identifying himself as a U.S. fugitive. He had $40, a Mexican calling card and a pack of cigarettes, according to a U.S. Marshal's statement.

"A lot of people were hoping he would be arrested," said Deputy U.S. Marshal Mike Powell, noting that Hinkley was among Iowa's most wanted fugitives.

"He gave up. There is a lot of different speculation on why he did what he did. ... We had very few leads up until recently."

Marshals received a tip May 10 that Hinkley may have fled to Mexico. Four days later he surrendered at the Bridge of America, according to the U.S. Marshal's statement.

Powell would not say how much time Hinkley had spent in Mexico, but he did say there is speculation Hinkley had used some of the stolen money to support himself. He had hid the $5.5 million in at least 28 bank accounts, and authorities have said they are not sure if they located all the funds.

Hinkley was in federal custody Thursday in Laredo awaiting a transfer to Iowa.

Al Overbaugh, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office, said Hinkley's supervisory release may be revoked. A judge will rule on the punishment, though Overbaugh would not speculate on its severity.

"Every case is unique, and certainly his is unique," said Overbaugh. "He has quite a past."

DOJ_NMG_0029113

Authorities say Hinkley initially fled in July 2000 as his rural housing businesses were about to collapse. Leaving his wife behind, Hinkley took $175,000 in cash and some diamond jewelry. He was captured three months later aboard a $1.3 million yacht in the Caribbean.

Hinkley pleaded guilty to mail fraud and money laundering and was sentenced to 57 months in prison. He was released about 10 months early in March 2004 after he helped authorities investigate a Johnston stockbroker who was involved in the same scheme.

Lawyers for 330 investors involved in a Mahaska County lawsuit say they recovered more than $3 million of the stolen money by seizing bank accounts and selling assets such as the yacht.

Hinkley was a minister and college fundraiser in Indiana before moving to Iowa in the early 1990s. Until 1994, he was head of fundraising at William Penn University. He later became active in real-estate investment, offering "affordable, rehabilitated housing ... to low- and moderate-income people," according to company literature.

Feds Indict Fugitive Online Betting Operators (TWEB)

By Gregg Keizer

TechWeb, May 18, 2006

The Department of Justice on Wednesday announced a dozen money-laundering charges against the fugitive owners of an online gambling Web site who walked away with a quarter of a billion dollars.

"This indictment underscores the Justice Department's commitment to attacking illegal Internet gambling concerns by using federal anti-money laundering laws," the DoJ said in its statement.

William Scott and Jessica Davis laundered some $250 million raked in by their Internet betting site, which they sold in 2003 to an Australian company, Betcorp.

The pair, who have been on the lam since a separate 1998 criminal indictment in New York, walked off with their site's $250 million in profits. The government has attempted to freeze numerous bank accounts, but has been only partially successful; according to the DoJ, in 2003 it seized some $7 million out of $10 million Scott had in an account in Guernsey, a small island off the coast of France.

Scott and Davis have been charged with 12 counts of conspiracy, money laundering, and failure to disclose foreign financial accounts. The IRS is involved in the investigation because of the latter charge.

Scott, 65, remains in Antigua and Barbuda, a two-island Caribbean country east of Puerto Rico. Scott previously served time in federal prison for convictions on extortion, conspiracy, and racketeering charges.

Although Congress has considered legislation to ban online gambling, it has failed to move a bill. Opponents have argued that laws cannot stop Internet betting, since it can easily jump national borders.

Home Builder Charged In Alleged Fraud (KMBC)

By Jim Flink

KMBC-TV, May 18, 2006

OVERLAND PARK, Kan. -- A Johnson County man who was once the area's largest home builder has been charged in connection with a $25 million fraud scheme, KMBC's Jim Flink reported.

U.S. Attorney Eric Melgren returned an indictment Thursday against F. Jeffrey Miller, 45, of Stanley. Miller operated Miller Enterprises and Star Land Development.

Miller was charged with 60 counts, including conspiracy, bank fraud and money laundering.

The indictment describes Miller as the kingpin of an operation that included loan officers who forged signatures, appraisers who inflated values, realtors and developers -- all allegedly designed to con banks and down-and-out home buyers out of millions of dollars.

"Miller advertised that he could sell homes to buyers with credit problems who had little or no money for a down payment," Melgren said in a news release. "In fact, with the help of willing co-conspirators, he defrauded banks and coerced buyers."

The indictment claims the crimes allegedly occurred from 1997 to the present in Johnson County.

Eight other people have been charged in the case: Todd Earnshaw, 45, Overland Park; Brian Rouse, 36, Overland Park; Paul E. Nicolace, 50, Overland Park; Angela Parenza, 39, Kansas City, Mo.; Elizabeth L. Hessel, 46, Overland Park; James Moser, 62, Overland Park; Steve Middleton, 45, Stilwell; and Lanny Ross, 64, Leawood.

KMBC first reported the alleged scam five years ago when homeowners contacted Channel 9. The buyers were upset about crumbling homes that had cracked foundations, leaky roofs and leaky pipes.

Eventually, both the Kansas and Missouri attorneys general got involved. The buyers' complaints led to this week's federal indictments.

Developer Charged With $25M Fraud Scheme (KCBIZ)

Kansas City Business Journal, May 19, 2006

The U.S. Department of Justice has charged a Kansas City-area builder with organizing a $25 million scheme to boost his business through conspiracy, bank fraud and money laundering.

The developer, F. Jeffrey Miller, 45, of Stanley, was charged in a 60-count indictment detailing crimes that allegedly occurred from 1997 to the present in Johnson County, the Justice Department said in a release Thursday.

According to the indictment, Miller operated Miller Enterprises and Star Land Development, which built and developed houses in the Kansas City area and was the largest building in the area in 1999 and 2000. Miller also started two companies, Associated Capital and Associated Finance, in June 1998 to prepare loan application for potential customers.

In the release, U.S. Attorney Eric Melgren said Miller advertised that he could sell homes to people with credit problems who had little money for a down payment.

"In fact, with the help of willing co-conspirators, he defrauded banks and coerced buyers," Melgren said in the statement.

Miller is charged with one count of conspiracy, 53 counts of bank fraud and five counts of money laundering. Miller also faces one count of criminal forfeiture, in which the government seeks forfeiture of proceeds traceable to the alleged crimes, including $25 million, a residence in Stilwell, Kan., and an airplane.

Among the acts prosecutors allege Miller undertook are:

· Defrauding financial institutions to make loans by using false and fraudulent pretenses and omissions of fact.

· Falsifying loan documents to qualify home buyers for mortgages for which they otherwise wouldn't have qualified.

· Providing home buyers with down payments and closing costs without the lenders' knowledge.

· Increasing the sales prices of houses at closing.

· Manipulating home buyers into moving into houses before closing to coerce them into accepting last-minute increases in the sales price at closing to avoid losing their homes.

· Selling houses at discount to investors without disclosing it to lenders.

Ex-N.C. Lottery Commissioner Indicted (AP)

By Gary D. Robertson

AP, May 18, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C. - A federal grand jury indicted a former state lottery commissioner on fraud charges Thursday, saying he failed to disclose his work for a leading supplier of scratch-off lottery tickets.

Kevin Geddings was indicted on multiple counts of mail and wire fraud. If found guilty, he could face up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine for each charge, said U.S. Attorney Frank Whitney.

Telephone numbers for Geddings' cell phone and offices in Charlotte and Washington, D.C., were disconnected and he could not be reached for comment Thursday. A call to his home Charlotte was not returned.

He said in a voice mail message to The News & Observer of Raleigh he was "completely innocent" of the charges.

Prosecutors said Scientific Games or a consulting firm it acquired paid Geddings' public relations firm nearly $230,000 from 2001 to 2005, but that Geddings never disclosed his financial ties as required when he filled out a state financial disclosure form.

Geddings resigned from the newly formed commission Nov. 1, just after Scientific Games officials told him they planned to reveal their payments to him and questioned why he hadn't disclosed his work for the company.

"Geddings stated if he had turned over the recent payments from Scientific Games, he would not have been appointed commissioner," the indictment said.

His indictment is the first to come out of a federal grand jury investigating possible violations of the state's lobbying and campaign finance laws. Scientific Games has cooperated with the investigation, Whitney said.

Jury Hands Up Fraud (WINSSJ)

By David Ingram

Winston-Salem Journal, May 19, 2006

A federal grand jury indicted Kevin Geddings, a former N.C. Lottery commissioner, yesterday, charging him with fraud for what investigators said was an attempt to hide $228,796 in payments from Scientific Games Corp., a lottery vendor.

Geddings was a radio-and-marketing executive from Charlotte who was active in Democratic politics when he was appointed to the N.C. Lottery Commission last year. He was one of the panel's original members, after the historic approval of the state's first modern lottery.

The grand jury charged Geddings with five counts of mail fraud and four counts of wire fraud, according to a news release from U.S. Attorney Frank Whitney.

"Geddings ... devised and intended to devise a scheme and artifice to defraud the State of North Carolina and the citizens of North Carolina of their intangible right of his honest service," according to the release, "by failing to disclose his conflict of interest arising from his nearly five-year financial relationship with Scientific Games relating to state lotteries."

The release said that the indictment "is part of an ongoing investigation" by federal and state authorities. It did not elaborate, but several lobbyists and state officials have appeared at the federal courthouse in Raleigh on days when the grand jury was expected to meet.

Grand jurors also issued a subpoena in October to the office of House Speaker Jim Black, D-Mecklenburg, who nominated Geddings to the lottery commission. The subpoena asked for documents related to Geddings and 27 other "relevant parties."

Geddings' indictment is the first that the grand jurors have issued in the investigation.

The Associated Press reported last night that Geddings left a voice-mail message with the Raleigh News & Observer saying that he is "completely innocent" of the charges. Ed Hinson Jr., a Charlotte lawyer who has represented Geddings, could not be reached for comment. Officials with the U.S. Attorney's Office also could not be reached.

Geddings was one of the nine original members of the lottery commission. Although he was appointed by Black, he had previously advised Lt. Gov. Beverly Perdue and the N.C. Senate Democratic Caucus and served as the chief of staff to former Gov. Jim Hodges of South Carolina.

Soon after his appointment in September, Geddings was forced to acknowledge a past business relationship with an executive at Scientific Games, one of the largest lottery operators in the country.

Geddings said he and the executive, Alan Middleton, had worked on several public-relations campaigns together, including one related to seat-belt use in South Carolina before Middleton joined Scientific Games. He said he had also rented office space to Middleton.

Geddings had not noted the relationship on the statement of economic interests required of many state officials. The statements are intended to uncover potential conflicts of interest, and Geddings had to file an amendment.

According to the U.S. Attorney's Office, his relationship with Scientific Games was far more extensive. Investigators say that Geddings worked for the company as far back as February 2001 and received $228,796.18.

They also say that, on Oct. 6, Geddings or one of his employees deposited a $9,500 check from Scientific Games into a bank account belonging to Geddings' advertising company. He mailed his economic-interest statement the next day.

Investigators say that Geddings intentionally hid the payments because he knew that they would disqualify him from serving on the lottery commission.

"(Please) never acknowledge by phone that sci games is a client," Geddings wrote to an assistant on Sept. 26, according to investigators.

No one from Scientific Games returned a call for comment on the indictment yesterday. The news release from Whitney said that the company began cooperating with investigators in October.

In the first disclosure of payments to Geddings, company officials said Nov. 1 that they had paid him and his firm $24,500 in 2005 alone. He resigned from the lottery commission within hours.

In a letter to the N.C. Board of Ethics after Geddings resigned, Hinson, as Geddings' attorney, said that Geddings didn't mention his work for Scientific Games because he explicitly terminated the relationship when he was appointed to the lottery commission.

Hinson said that Geddings "deeply regrets not having made more complete voluntary disclosures, and that is why he resigned."

Julie Robinson, a spokeswoman for Black, reiterated yesterday that Black did not know the extent of Geddings' relationship with Scientific Games before appointing Geddings to the commission.

"Had the speaker known the details and exact timing of his relationship with the lottery company, he would never have appointed him to the new lottery commission," Robinson said in a news release.

LA Police: Two Women Under Arrest In Life Insurance Fraud Case (AP)

By Daisy Nguyen

AP, May 18, 2006

LOS ANGELES - Two women in their 70s were arrested Thursday for investigation of insurance fraud after they collected more than $2 million in benefits from policies issued on the lives of homeless men who were killed in hit-and-run crashes, authorities said.

Police believe the women may have committed the fatal accidents and were befriending other men to set up more insurance policies.

DOJ_NMG_0029116

"Anyone would think that even though they're making financial gains for this, that they would leave the actual dirty work to someone else or hire someone," police Detective Dennis Kilcoyne said at a press conference. "We're not so sure about that anymore."

Helen Golay, 75, and Olga Rutterschmidt, 72, allegedly paid for the men to stay in apartments for as long as two years, police said. In exchange, they obtained the victims' signatures and opened more than a dozen life insurance policies that named the women as beneficiaries.

In the November 1999 and June 2005 hit-and-runs, both victims were struck in street alleys in the early morning hours and no witnesses were found, police said. In both cases, Golay and Rutterschmidt came forward claiming to be relatives or fiancees of the men.

"These women were preying and profiting from the most vulnerable victims of our society," said Michael Ingram, a bureau chief with the state Department of Insurance.

Golay and Rutterschmidt, described by authorities as longtime friends, appeared in federal court Thursday and were ordered held without bail. They were each indicted on eight counts of mail fraud for making false insurance claims, said assistant U.S. attorney Jason Gonzalez. Each face up to 160 years in prison if convicted of all counts, he said.

"We're focusing our direction directly at Helen and Olga for the murder aspect of the investigation," Kilcoyne said.

Their arrests came after authorities searched two locations Thursday morning and arrested Rutterschmidt at her home in Hollywood. Golay was arrested at the triplex she owns in Santa Monica, police said. Their assets were frozen, said FBI special agent Herb Brown.

Both women were retired; Golay was in real estate and Rutterschmidt used to own a coffee shop, said police Detective Rosemary Sanchez.

Police traffic investigators discovered the alleged scam when they were looking into a fatal hit-and-run accident last fall. One investigator had mentioned the case of two women who had taken out large life insurance policies on 50-year-old Kenneth McDavid when another investigator recalled working on a similar case in 1999, in which 73-year-old Paul Vados was killed.

When they compared notes, they found the beneficiaries in both cases were Golay and Rutterschmidt, and the victims were homeless men, police said. Investigators say the women filed $3.8 million in claims, but around $2.4 million was paid out before authorities contacted the insurance companies.

A former roommate of McDavid's told investigators Golay approached McDavid at a church and offered to get him off the streets if he would sign an application for a $500,000 life insurance policy, according to court documents. The roommate said Golay paid for McDavid's monthly rent at a Hollywood apartment.

When it became known that McDavid was sharing the apartment with others, the roommate said a woman named "Olga" showed up with an unknown man carrying a revolver, demanding the roommate leave.

Undercover officers who spied on Golay and Rutterschmidt in recent months saw them making contact with other elderly men, possibly to set up more life insurance policies, Kilcoyne said.

"We can't sit by and wait for something else to happen or another body is found in an alley," said Kilcoyne.

Dead Men Walking? Couple Found (CHSUN)

Charlotte (FL) Sun-Herald, May 19, 2006

ENGLEWOOD -- The local couple feared dead have been found in Tennessee -- in the hands of the U.S. marshals.

Bob Carpenter, spokesman for the Charlotte County Sheriff's Office, said Thursday the Englewood couple reported missing and endangered were detained Wednesday night by police near Nashville, Tenn.

Carpenter said Shannon Gordon was arrested Wednesday for violating her probation.

Nathan Myers, 23, meanwhile, was detained by authorities, but later released.

"They're both alive," Carpenter said.

On Tuesday, a family member for Myers filed a missing endangered adult report with the Sheriff's Office. The report said the couple had been missing for about a week, and family members had received anonymous calls saying Gordon had been beaten up and Myers had been killed.

The callers said Myers was beaten to death near Pine and Fourth streets before being buried near a local preschool. Neither one had been heard from since.

"It looked a little strange," Carpenter said.

Carpenter said the Sheriff's Office's "Be On the Lookout" for the couple has been canceled.

Reports Of Shredding Lead To Subpoenas For University (NYT)

By Ronald Smothers

DOJ_NMG_0029117

New York Times, May 19, 2006

NEWARK, May 18 — Federal prosecutors subpoenaed a wide range of documents on Thursday from the southern campus of the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey as part of their investigation into allegations of corruption and patronage at the institution, a lawyer for the university said.

The action came one day after F.B.I. agents raided the state university's 366-student Stratford campus to stop the shredding of documents in the office of Warren S. Wallace, the senior associate dean for academic and student affairs at the School of Osteopathic Medicine. University officials in Newark and officials in the office of a federal monitor overseeing the institution were alerted to the shredding by a call to a hot line set up to aid in the inquiry, said John Inglesino, a member of the monitor's staff.

Anna Farneski, a spokeswoman for Bruce C. Vladeck, the university's interim president, said, "We've had an inquiry from the U.S. attorney's office and we've responded as quickly as we can, as always."

Walter Timpone, a lawyer for the university, said the United States attorney's office "followed up today with a catch-all subpoena to see if there was anything that they missed."

Shortly after the call to the hot line but before federal investigators arrived on Wednesday afternoon with subpoenas for documents, Dr. Vladeck's office ordered the shredder in the Stratford office to be unplugged and all documents, shredded or not, to be secured, Mr. Inglesino said.

News of the shredding was first reported on Thursday in The Star-Ledger. The office of Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney in New Jersey, had no comment. Without offering specifics, Mr. Inglesino said investigators for the federal monitor and the United States attorney are looking at Mr. Wallace, the senior associate dean. He said they are also examining the university's hiring of State Senator Wayne R. Bryant of Camden to a $38,220 a year job, and investigating whether the former dean of the osteopathic school, Dr. R. Michael Gallagher, pressured accountants to falsify financial reports and spent thousands of dollars of university money on lavish perks.

Senator Bryant, a Democrat and the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, resigned from his position as a program support coordinator at the university late last year, and Dr. Gallagher stepped down this year. Mr. Bryant has denied any wrongdoing, and Dr. Gallagher has declined to comment.

Mr. Wallace, a Gloucester County freeholder and a commissioner on the Delaware River and Bay Authority, could not be reached for comment. His lawyer, Carl Poplar, did not return calls to his office.

Mr. Inglesino said that the shredding occurred just two days after the federal monitor's own investigators interviewed people at the Stratford campus. He said the entire university staff of 15,000 had been issued a blanket order not to destroy or shred documents. He said his office and Dr. Vladeck's office had been told that the items that being shredded at Mr. Wallace's office were merely faxes of documents whose originals were in the office.

But Mr. Timpone, the university lawyer, said, "With the investigations out there of Bryant and Gallagher, anything being shredded would get noticed."

The university has operated under a federal monitor, Herbert J. Stern, since late last year, when Mr. Christie's office uncovered nearly $5 million in possible Medicaid fraud there.

Tacoma Man Gets Eight-year Sentence For Tax Fraud (PUGBIZ)

Puget Sound (WA) Business Journal, May 19, 2006

David Carroll Stephenson of Tacoma was sentenced to eight years in jail for conspiring to defraud the United States and for not filing income tax returns for three years, officials at the Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service said Thursday.

Stephenson, 50, was also ordered to pay $8.5 million in restitution to the IRS, they added.

According to the government, Stephenson formed and operated "pure equity trusts," where he told his clients to place their money so they could avoid paying income taxes. More than 400 of the trusts were sold by Stephenson and his associate, Michael Joseph Shanahan, for more than $2 million, the government said. Shanahan has pleaded guilty in connection with the case and is scheduled to be sentenced next month, government officials added.

"Mr. Stephenson's sentence should serve as a warning that taxpayers should be wary of tax planning arrangements that claim to drastically reduce or eliminate their tax liability while still allowing them unlimited access to their money. Quite simply, these arrangements are illegal," said John Imhoff Jr., acting IRS chief, criminal investigation, in a statement.

Former Old Mutual Manager Pleads Guilty To Fraud Charges (BALBIZ)

Baltimore Business Journal, May 19, 2006

A former employee of Old Mutual Financial Network in Baltimore has pleaded guilty to charges that she defrauded Old Mutual and banks of more than $850,000.

DOJ_NMG_0029118

The U.S. Attorney's Office said Thursday that Bryn D. Phillips, 30, pleaded guilty to one count of bank fraud and one count of mail fraud. In a statement of facts that was part of the plea agreement, Phillips admitted that she obtained more than $700,000 by falsely representing to Wachovia Bank that she had authority to transfer money from Old Mutual bank accounts into accounts that she controlled, prosecutors said.

Prosecutors also said Phillips admitted that she used a company credit card to buy herself more than $150,000 worth of goods, including a $4,000 pink mink jacket, professional basketball tickets and two Louis Vuitton handbags.

Phillips was treasury operations manager at Old Mutual Financial Network -- a Baltimore-based network of life insurance companies -- from May 2002 until January 2005. She used the names and passwords of employees she supervised to make the wire transfers between bank accounts, prosecutors say. Phillips initially submitted reimbursement requests for the company credit card to other Old Mutual employees, later reviewing and authorizing the card payments herself, according to prosecutors.

Phillips was indicted in December on nine counts of bank, mail and wire fraud. She had pleaded not guilty to all charges in January.

Phillips is scheduled to be sentenced in August. She faces a maximum sentence of 30 years in prison, a $1 million fine and 5 years' probation on the bank fraud charge. The mail fraud charge carries a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison, a $250,000 fine and four years of supervised release. Under the plea agreement, she is also liable for forfeiture of the $860,000 that was illegally obtained, prosecutors said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Harry M. Gruber is prosecuting the case, which the FBI and U.S. Postal Inspection Service investigated.

The Old Mutual Financial Network includes Fidelity and Guaranty Life Insurance Company, Americom Life and Annuity Insurance Company and Fidelity and Guaranty Life Insurance Company of New York. It is a subsidiary of London-based financial services company Old Mutual plc.

Taping Of Police Interviews Sought (LAT)

By Peter Y. Hong

Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

A state commission Thursday called for police to tape interrogations of crime suspects in serious felonies and to videotape homicide interrogations. The proposal is meant to prevent wrongful convictions.

Former Atty. Gen. John L. Van de Kamp, chairman of the California Commission on the Fair Administration of Justice, said the proposal could prevent intimidation by interrogators while also protecting police from false misconduct charges.

The panel called on the Legislature to mandate the taping through a new statute. Under the law, if interrogations are not recorded, jurors would be instructed to view confessions with caution.

The commission will hold a public hearing on the proposed law in Los Angeles in June.

Van de Kamp said the cost to police departments of implementing the program could be offset by avoiding lawsuit payouts to wrongfully convicted people. "It only takes a couple of big ones to make this cost-effective," Van de Kamp said.

Los Angeles County Dist. Atty. Steve Cooley expressed initial support for the idea. "In general, memorialization of contacts between a suspect and law enforcement investigators is helpful. A videotape is a step above audiotape in terms of its evidentiary value to prosecutors and, ultimately, to jurors," he said.

Santa Monica defense lawyer William J. Genego, who represented a man wrongly convicted because of a false confession, praised the idea. "It would be an excellent reform that would help everyone in the process: the suspect, police, courts and the public."

The Legislature established the commission to study the administration of justice in California and "determine the extent to which it failed in the past." It has no enforcement powers and is limited to recommending reforms to state and local authorities.

Povich Lawyer Asks Court To Dismiss Case (AP)

AP, May 18, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — Lawyers for television talk-show host Maury Povich have asked a court to dismiss a $100 million sex harassment lawsuit against him and members of his staff and to compel the producer who filed it to arbitrate the dispute.

Bianca Nardi, 28, of Fort Lee, N.J., complained in a lawsuit filed last month that some of her supervisors at The Maury Povich Show barraged her with sexual remarks and made her watch pornographic movies, wear revealing clothing and expose her body.

DOJ_NMG_0029119

Her court papers say she had an unfairly heavy workload because she did tasks that were supposed to be done by another producer, who had an intimate relationship with Povich and often refused to do her own work — without penalty.

Povich, whose show is produced by NBC Universal, is married to veteran television news anchor Connie Chung.

Elisabeth C. Yap, an NBC Universal lawyer, said in an affidavit dated Monday that Nardi's lawyer, Bruce Baron, was told in an April 14 letter that the producer's contract required her to arbitrate any claims arising out of any alleged discrimination or harassment.

Joe Schlosser, a spokesman for NBC Universal, said Thursday: "In response to the plaintiff's (Nardi's) complaint, we have filed a motion to dismiss the case and have asked the court to instead compel the plaintiff to arbitrate her claims as required by her contract."

Baron, Nardi's lawyer, said Thursday he found it "ironic and suspect" that anyone who is innocent of accusations of illegal conduct "would not embrace the opportunity to defend themselves in a court of law as opposed to bobbing and weaving and looking to silence this in some back room."

"My client looks forward to exercising her constitutional right to obtain justice in a court of law," Baron said.

The lawsuit names Povich, NBC Universal Television Inc. and Povich's production company, Mopo, among others, as defendants.

Amazon Patent For Online Orders To Get New Review (WSJ)

By Don Clark

Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

The U.S. Patent and Trademark Office has agreed to re-examine Amazon.com Inc.'s high-profile patent on "one-click" online shopping, after an actor from New Zealand claimed there were possible prior inventions in the field.

An examiner for the agency ruled that the re-examination requested by Peter Calveley had raised a "substantial new question of patentability" affecting Amazon's patent, according to a document outlining the agency's decision.

The "one-click" patent was granted in 1999 to inventors that include Jeff Bezos, Amazon's chief executive officer. It covers ways that Amazon lets customers shop without having to enter their shipping and billing information each time they purchase from the company's Web site.

The Amazon patent is one of the best-known patents on business methods, which have become a hot topic in recent debates over whether the U.S. patent system should be overhauled.

Mr. Calveley's re-examination request, filed in February, includes the citation of a 1998 patent that discusses a "single action" to be used in ordering an item, according to the patent examiner's decision.

Mr. Calveley, whose credits include motion-capture performances used with computer-generated characters in the "Lord of the Rings" movies, has written in his Web log that he decided to challenge the Amazon patent after an unsatisfactory experience with the time it took for the company to ship a book he had ordered. He used the blog to solicit contributions to help pay for the re-examination request.

Patricia Smith, an Amazon spokeswoman, said the company remains confident in the validity of the patent. "We welcome the opportunity to revalidate what we believe is an important innovation in e-commerce," she said.

The patent office's decision to re-examine a patent is the first step in what can be a lengthy process. Indeed, the process of studying other inventions in the field -- known by patent lawyers as "prior art" -- can actually wind up weakening claims that could be raised in any patent-infringement litigation.

"Plainly, there is risk to the patent, but if it survives re-examination, the patent should emerge as stronger," said Alan Fisch, an intellectual-property attorney with law firm Kaye Scholer in Washington, D.C., who isn't a party to the proceeding.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justices Find No Misconduct By Judge (LAT)

By Maura Dolan

Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — The California Supreme Court on Thursday rejected claims that a judge advised a prosecutor to remove prospective jurors from a death penalty trial because they were Jewish.

The justices found insufficient evidence of misconduct by Alameda County Superior Court Judge Stanley Golde, who died in 1998. A misconduct finding could have led the courts to overturn dozens of death sentences.

DOJ_NMG_0029120

The court also discounted claims that the Alameda County district attorney had a policy of barring not only Jews but also African American women from death penalty juries.

A former Alameda County prosecutor had alleged that Golde, who was Jewish, had advised removing Jewish jurors because of their perceived aversion to the death penalty.

The case had stirred wide attention because of the charges of illegal bias in jury selection and because of a study that concluded there was less than a 0.16% chance that prosecutors removed Jewish jurors from capital cases for reasons other than religion in Alameda County between 1977 and 1987.

Lawyers in criminal cases are allowed to remove a limited number of jurors for tactical reasons, but cannot dismiss them because of their race, gender or religion, or for certain other characteristics.

Golde presided over more death penalty trials in his 25 years on the bench than any other judge in Alameda County, although he personally opposed capital punishment. The allegations against Golde arose in an appeal of a man he sentenced to death.

Former Deputy Dist. Atty. John R. Quatman told defense appellate lawyers that Golde gave him some private advice in his chambers during the 1987 capital trial of Fred Harlan Freeman, who was sentenced to death for robbery and murder.

"Judge Golde called me into his chambers and asked rhetorically, 'Quatman, what are you doing?' " Quatman said under oath. "When I asked what the problem was, he said I had not challenged a prospective juror who was Jewish."

Golde "asked me if I was aware that when Adolf Eichmann was apprehended after World War II, there was a major controversy in Israel over whether he should be executed," continued Quatman, who worked in the D.A.'s office for more than two decades and was friendly with Golde. "Judge Golde said no Jew would vote to send a defendant to the gas chamber."

Quatman said he thanked Golde for his advice and "thereafter excused any prospective juror who was Jewish."

"Actually," Quatman said, "Judge Golde was telling me what I already should have known to do. It was standard practice to exclude Jewish jurors in death cases; as it was to exclude African American women from capital juries."

Citing Quatman's remarks, defense lawyers filed a constitutional challenge to obtain a new trial for Freeman.

Faced with the explosive charges, the California Supreme Court asked a trial judge to hear evidence on the claims and report back.

After five days of testimony, Santa Clara Superior Court Judge Kevin Murphy found that Golde did not direct the prosecutor to excuse prospective jurors who were Jewish. Thursday's ruling relied heavily on his report.

"It remains to be explained why Judge Golde would have perceived a need to commit misconduct by advising Quatman how to pick a jury at this very early stage," Justice Marvin R. Baxter wrote for the state Supreme Court.

Baxter also said that Quatman's "character for honesty and integrity was poor."

A former colleague testified that Quatman exaggerated a lot, and if "it didn't serve his purpose, he wouldn't tell the truth." Other lawyers voiced similar concerns, but two testified that Quatman was honest.

Baxter pointed to evidence he said showed that Quatman had a motive for embarrassing his former boss, Alameda County Dist. Atty. Tom Orloff.

The court said Orloff had once disciplined Quatman for making disparaging remarks to a female subordinate and later refused to endorse him when he ran for judge.

"Unfortunately," Baxter wrote, "Quatman's bitterness did not mellow over the years."

Justices Carol Corrigan and Ming Chin, who had been prosecutors in the Alameda County D.A.'s office, did not participate in the ruling.

Quatman left the office in 1998 and now practices law in Montana. He could not be reached for comment, and the attorneys who argued the case also were unavailable Thursday.

Judge Rejects Selective Prosecution Claims; Dixon's Waltz Trial On For May 30 (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, May 19, 2006

U.S. Dist. Court Judge Jon McCalla today rejected former state senator Roscoe Dixon's claims of unfair selective prosecution and refused to delay his upcoming Tennessee Waltz public corruption trial.

In a motion filed last weekend, Dixon argued that eight of the 10 Tennessee Waltz defendants are black, including all three of the state's black senators.

McCalla said federal prosecutors have "broad discretion" to enforce federal laws within boundaries set by the constitution.

He said that Dixon's claim of race-based prosecution in the FBI sting operation is not supported by any evidence that there are non-black individuals who could have been prosecuted for similar offenses but were not.

DOJ_NMG_0029121

Dixon is accused of accepting $9,500 in bribes from undercover agents posing as businessmen seeking favorable votes to help their fictitious computer recycling company. His trial is set for May 30.

Judge Rejects Waltz Bias Claim (KNOXNS/AP)

By Woody Baird, Associated Press

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), May 19, 2006

MEMPHIS — A federal judge Thursday rejected a claim that black lawmakers were targeted for prosecution in the Tennessee Waltz investigation.

Judge Jon McCalla rejected a petition to dismiss the bribery and extortion charges against former Sen. Roscoe Dixon, D-Memphis, or to delay his trial set for May 30.

In that petition, Dixon claimed he is the victim of selective prosecution because he is black.

He argued that federal agents pretending to be businessmen looking for legislative favors offered bribes to black lawmakers but not white members of the state Legislature.

That argument, McCalla said, was based on speculation and Dixon "failed to show the existence of any individuals who are not African-American and could have been prosecuted ... but were not."

Dixon also sought more access to government files to search for evidence of racial bias and for a trial delay until October. McCalla rejected those requests, too.

Tennessee Waltz focused on an FBI front company, called E-Cycle Management, that supposedly wanted to buy and resell used government computers. Prosecutors say undercover agents acting as E-Cycle representatives bribed lawmakers and local government officials while pretending to set up business in Tennessee.

Eight of the 10 defendants indicted so far in the investigation are black.

McCalla said Dixon offered no evidence to support his claim that the two white defendants, Sen. Ward Crutchfield, D-Chattanooga, and former Rep. Chris Newton, R-Cleveland, were charged in a "patently transparent attempt" to hide the government's racial bias.

Besides Crutchfield and Dixon, the defendants awaiting trials are Sen. Kathryn Bowers, D-Memphis; former Sen. John Ford, a Memphis Democrat; Shelby County Commissioner Michael Hooks and Calvin Williams, the Shelby commission's former top administrative officer.

Newton pleaded guilty to accepting bribes and is serving a one-year prison sentence. Myers and Charles Love, "bag men" who have pleaded guilty to passing along bribes, await sentencing.

William Cotton, a former county commissioner in Chattanooga, has been convicted of bribery and extortion and sentenced to three years in prison.

Voting Costs Inquiry Opens (AP)

AP, May 18, 2006

Secretary of State Betty Ireland is asking county clerks to submit detailed information about how much voting machine snafus cost them, her chief of staff said Thursday.

The information will be used to seek compensation from Election Systems & Software, the company that supplied new voting machines around West Virginia before the May 9 primary, Ben Beakes said.

"We need to get a true picture of what happened during this election,'' Beakes said. The letter the office was to send out Thursday asks clerks to respond by May 26.

Ireland complained to federal officials the day after the primary about ES&S of Omaha, Neb., blaming the voting machine vendor for "vast delays'' and "broken promises.'' Ireland sent a complaint to the federal Election Assistance Commission, created to help oversee the federal Help America Vote Act, and contacted the U.S. Justice Department.

ES&S has said it plans to discuss ways to improve the process for future elections with Ireland and other election officials.

The Secretary of State's Office also plans one-on-one training with county clerks to address technical issues with electronic touch screen and optical scanner voting systems.

Meanwhile, Wood County Clerk Jamie Six said Ireland's office added to the problems before the primary and ignored requests for help during the canvass.

A few days before the primary, Six said he was frustrated with e-mail directives from Ireland about voting machine tests. The tests Ireland wanted him to conduct on electronic voting machines were pointless and time-consuming, Six said. Other tests he conducted were sufficient.

Six said that when he tried to discuss the issue with Ireland's staff, they said they were not going to argue with him.

DOJ_NMG_0029122

"None of the staff, I believe, has ever worked in a real election. That has been real cumbersome for counties to overcome,'' Six said.

He also was upset by what he considered a lack of support from Ireland's office this week when he called with a problem during the county's vote canvass.

Six said he tried to arrange a conference call with county commissioners and the county prosecutor at a certain time, but Ireland's office left a phone message that it could not participate and cited a section of state law the county could refer to for help.

Six said he ended up finding out what he wanted to know from Cabell County, which has been using electronic machines for several years.

"When you need their help, they are not there,'' Six said of Ireland's staff.

However, officials in Preston, Putnam and Upshur counties — all of which had problems before and during the primary — said Thursday their gripe is with ES&S, not Ireland's office.

Beakes said Ireland's staff tried to be responsive to Six, but no one in the office was available at the time Six wanted to have the conference call. The office gave the same law citation to other counties having similar problems and they were satisfied, Beakes said.

As for the pre-election testing, Beakes said the main problems on the day of the primary were with vote tabulation, not with the voting machines themselves. He said that proves the value of the tests Ireland wanted clerks to do.

Mom Won't Be Charged In Mall Flap (COLTRIB)

By Sara Agnew

Columbia (MO) Tribune, May 18, 2006

Charges have been dropped against a Columbia mother who was wrestled to the floor and handcuffed by Columbia police officers trying to contain a disturbance at the Columbia Mall.

The incident was one of several involving Columbia police and black residents described last month to a U.S. Department of Justice official during a meeting of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Columbia attorney David Tyson Smith said his client, Alva Scott, who is black, was simply trying to protect her children and leave the mall when officers prevented her from returning to her children, ages 2 and 8. Scott was eventually arrested and charged with trespassing, assaulting a police officer and resisting arrest.

The charges were dropped Tuesday afternoon in Boone County Circuit Court. Smith said a number of groups rallied behind his client, including members of the NAACP and other community members.

"It's been a very difficult time for Alva," he said, "but I'm proud of the support she has received."

Smith said he hopes attention brought to his client's case would prevent a similar incident in the future.

Assistant Boone County Prosecutor Connie Sullivan said she dismissed the charges because she didn't believe Scott's activity was criminal.

"She was just trying to get her little kids back," she said.

During the NAACP meeting last month, Smith said his client was shopping at the mall with her children when she heard about a disturbance in the Café Court. Worried about her teenage son and his friend, who were in the area, Scott hurried with her 2- and 8-year-olds to the Café Court to retrieve the older boys, Smith said.

When she reached the area, Scott spotted the boys and received permission from a mall security guard to enter and retrieve them, Smith said. But when she started toward the teens, she was stopped by a Columbia police officer, who pushed her toward an exit, Smith said.

But Scott's two younger children were still waiting for her, and she pleaded with the officer to let her go get them, Smith said. That's when the officer threw her to the floor and handcuffed her, Smith said. The teenage son and his friend also were handcuffed.

Smith said he is happy with the outcome for his client and credited the prosecutor's officer for "doing the right thing."

"I just hope it doesn't have to come to this again," he said.

Texans, Others Stall Voting Rights Renewal (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

Dallas Morning News, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON – A revolt by Texas Republicans and other Southern lawmakers is threatening the Voting Rights Act, the landmark civil-rights law enacted to overcome the legacy of poll taxes and literacy tests.

DOJ_NMG_0029123

House leaders planned a routine vote this week to extend the LBJ-era law for 25 years, avoiding a potentially ugly eruption of racial politics.

But a Georgia-Texas coalition of conservatives slammed on the brakes, angry over the special regulatory burdens of the act.

Allies from across the South gathered Thursday afternoon to strategize and take stock of their initial victory – cancellation of the planned House vote this week.

For 40 years, Texas and eight other states have had to get permission for any change in election law or procedure, major or minor – from ballot design to precinct boundaries. Justice Department lawyers review proposals to guard against cloaked efforts to discriminate against minorities.

Parts of seven other states are also covered.

Fiercely contested congressional redistricting plans in Texas, Georgia and elsewhere have undergone that evaluation in recent years.

Although Democrats and civil-rights advocates haven't always been pleased with the outcomes, they still view the law as vital.

But opponents of a lengthy extension say the targeted states have made huge leaps since President Johnson signed the law in 1965.

"Why should one state have to live under a federal law when somebody a few miles away is exempt? All or nothing. It's an issue of fairness," said a senior Texas Republican, Rep. Henry Bonilla of San Antonio.

Civil-rights advocates are livid at the delay, and Democrats accuse the Southern Republicans of insensitivity.

"Every election we have lots of intimidation," said Rep. Eddie Bernice Johnson, D-Dallas, arguing that without the current protections, "the intimidation would be even more overt. ... Unfortunately, we still have people who'd rather not have minorities vote."

Rep. Lynn Westmoreland, a Republican from a mostly white district south of Atlanta, has led the resistance. "What we're seeing is a passionate response to this from the Georgia delegation and a growing insurgency within the Texas delegation as well," said his spokesman, Brian Robinson. "We're going to have big enough numbers to wage quite a battle."

The debate is laden with racial overtones and old wounds.

Republicans don't want to alienate black and Hispanic voters, and critics generally avoid outright demands to repeal the Voting Rights Act.

Instead they have framed the argument as an effort to modernize and take into account years of racial progress.

States that discouraged minority voters in 1964, 1968 or 1972 – with poll taxes, tests of "good character" or literacy – and also experienced low minority turnout have been subjected to federal oversight.

Blacks account for about one-third of Georgia's electorate, and roughly the same proportion of statewide elected officials, including the attorney general and chief justice.

Yet the state remains under supervision because of low minority turnout in the 1964 contest between Barry Goldwater and LBJ.

"We're going to be covered by this bill until 2032 based on who voted for Lyndon Johnson. Seriously," Mr. Robinson said. "Maybe there's a problem you didn't know about in Wisconsin, or Pennsylvania. Let those who have corrected the problems of the past go."

The critics want new evaluation formulas based on more recent elections, which would likely relieve Texas and most of the other states of their preapproval requirements, though a few states, including Nevada and California, could find themselves scrutinized more closely based on recent voting patterns.

President Bush called for renewing the Voting Rights Act in December and reiterated that stance three weeks ago, calling the act "a very important part of the civil-rights legislation. Everybody ought to be encouraged to vote."

House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., said the extension enjoys "broad bipartisan support," citing the 33-1 vote by which it cleared his committee last week. An aide said Thursday that a floor vote is expected soon.

Congress last extended the law in 1982. Mr. Sensenbrenner played a central role in persuading President Reagan to sign it. Last summer, the chairman promised the NAACP that he would secure another 25-year extension, and everything seemed on track two weeks ago when he joined the Democratic and Republican leaders from the House and Senate on the Capitol steps in a show of unity.

Behind the scenes, the revolt was gathering steam.

Texas Republicans, including most of the freshmen, signed on early. They brainstormed the issue at their weekly lunch last week, members said, and again Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0029124

"If it's good enough for a handful of states, it's good enough for the whole country," said freshman Rep. Louie Gohmert, R-Tyler.

Rep. Kenny Marchant, a GOP freshman from Coppell, said Texans don't like being singled out and will fight to change that, though, "I don't think that necessarily means we'll vote against it [renewal of the act] if it isn't that way."

But legal scholars have warned that the Supreme Court could strike down expansion of the law, noting that decades ago, the court gave its OK in part because the law only targeted states with proven records of discrimination.

Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., a lion of the civil-rights movement, called the delay an 11th-hour "attempt to dilute the Voting Rights Act. This act was good in 1965. It's effective. It was signed by President Lyndon Johnson, the man from Texas, and it made America a better place."

The Senate Judiciary Committee hasn't voted on the extension. Mr. Westmoreland's office says a number of Southern senators on the panel support the Georgia congressman's resistance effort.

Texas Republican Sen. John Cornyn, who is on that committee, has no problem with the delay.

"It doesn't expire until 2007. We've got some time to work on it," he said. "There's more than the Voting Rights Act at stake. There's political calculations going on, and I want to try and make sure I understand what that's all about."

He said he also shares concerns about another element of the law, one regarding language assistance. Jurisdictions with high numbers of people whose native language isn't English must print bilingual ballots. Some must also provide translators.

"In order to be an American citizen, you have to learn English. Why would we continue to publish ballots in a language other than English? ... That's a pretty compelling argument," Mr. Cornyn said.

But Rep. Solomon Ortiz, D-Corpus Christi, called the assistance vital given that citizenship requires only basic English proficiency.

"If we want to have these people emerge into our system," he said, "we need to also allow them to understand how our system works and have them understand what they're voting on."

Three Employees Allege Discrimination In DA's Office (JONND)

By Justin Boron

Jonesboro (GA) News-Daily, May 19, 2006

The Clayton County District Attorney's office has been hit with a trio of discrimination claims from current and former employees, at least one of whom has named the top assistant prosecutor in the office, John Turner, for retaliation and discrimination against a minority woman.

The allegations come during the first term of Jewel Scott, the county's first black district attorney. Scott hired Turner, who also is black, when she took office.

Two victims advocates — Andrea Rhymes, who is black, and Rebecca Miller, who is Latino — allege in formal complaints they were retaliated against. Rhymes alleges it was on the basis of race and a disability. Miller alleges it was on the basis of sex and national origin.

Terry Grandison, a former prosecutor who has resigned, acknowledged filing a complaint but wouldn't provide further information because he said the matter was still pending. He was hired by Scott in 2005.

Scott said she didn't see any validity in any of the complaints filed with the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission earlier this year.

"I haven't observed anything that can be construed as discriminatory, but certainly I'd be willing to sit down at the table and mediate," she said, explaining she was limited in what she could discuss about the cases. "I don't want anything I say to prejudice any kind of mediation effort.

"I would expect that they probably would have more to say because they're no longer with the office. But I want to have a fair opportunity to go in and mediate. Anything more that I would say would prejudice that process."

In a complaint filed in March, Rhymes says she was discriminated against because she is black, because she has a child with a disability, and because she opposed unlawful employment practices. Rhymes, a holdover from former District Attorney Bob Keller's administration, said she didn't want to comment because she is still employed at the district attorney's office.

Her complaint explains that she was transferred from her job as the juvenile court victim services coordinator after taking time off in January this year to be with her son during a surgery.

"Upon my return to work on Feb. 10, I was re-assigned to another position in another building and my hours were changed" and she was told by her supervisor Barbara Fernandez that she was moved "because I was never at work, I was attending school and I was not efficient in grant manager nor could she justify me working 40 hours a week."

Miller, a victim's advocate who was fired April 10, accused Fernandez of harassment and abuse, Miller's May 4 complaint shows. She was hired by Scott in June 2005.

The complaint also mentions Deputy Chief Assistant District Attorney John Turner. In an interview, Miller said Turner discriminated against her because she is a minority woman and also in retaliation for protesting what she claims as discriminatory treatment.

"I want the truth exposed, and I want my wrongful termination to be corrected," she said. "I want Ms. Scott to do the right thing."

Miller said Fernandez was condescending, saying things like 'it doesn't take a rocket scientist to do this.' There also is an issue over $750 to $800 worth of transcripts that Miller says her supervisor told her how to order. Miller said Fernandez denied the conversation after she ordered them.

Miller and Rhymes say they notified personnel officials in the county government of their problems.

County Commission Chairman Eldrin Bell said Tuesday he wasn't aware of the claims.

Because of confidentiality regulations, equal employment officials couldn't confirm a complaint was filed or discuss any aspect of any ongoing case.

Speaking generally, Bernice Williams-Kimbrough, the director of the Atlanta district of the EEOC, said claims against local or state government agencies could eventually reach the U.S. Justice Department if they aren't resolved through mediation or if an investigation finds evidence to support the discrimination claim.

Justice Reviews Cape Utilities (SWFL)

By Don Ruane

Southwest Florida News-Press, May 19, 2006

The federal investigation of Cape Coral utilities contracts is being handled by the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department, The News-Press has learned.

The division enforces laws that protect competition in the marketplace.

"Let the chips fall where they fall. If there was a conscious effort to fix prices, that's a problem," Councilman Tim Day said.

The projects in question became controversial among residents. They turned out in large numbers at City Council meetings to protest the $12,000 assessments they received to pay for new water, sewer and irrigation lines. Some tried to stop the projects with a lawsuit.

The FBI is assisting, but the matter is being handled by the division's Atlanta office, said Carol Michalik, spokeswoman for the FBI's regional office in Tampa.

Michalik declined to talk further about the case.

"If a case is being investigated the FBI would not comment on it," she said.

Antitrust Division spokeswoman Gina Talamona said the division does not talk about specific cases. Generally, investigations that lead the division to seek criminal penalties or civil actions are heard in U.S. District Court.

The division also reports such actions on its Internet site.

Antitrust laws address practices that limit competition and can lead to higher prices and inferior products, according to the division's Web site. The Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890 prohibits competitors from fixing prices, rigging bids and other anticompetitive behavior. Violations can lead to a $100 million fine for a corporation and up to 10 years in prison for an individual.

"To my knowledge the city is not under investigation. I have not been contacted by anyone," said Mayor Eric Feichthaler.

The projects involved were managed for the city by Kellogg, Brown & Root and MWH Americas.

KBR has not responded to requests for comment. MWH declined to comment on the situation.

But the city will cooperate fully with any requests from the agencies, the mayor said.

City Council members have said the investigation has something to do with how contractors were selected to work on the Southwest One, Two and Three utilities extension projects. Those projects extended water, sewer and irrigation lines into portions of southwest Cape Coral.

Questions about the projects were raised during an audit approved by the City Council. Mike Kessler of Kessler International is conducting the audit and has refused to comment on it and the investigation. His final report is expected in July.

The city conducts audits of the utilities extension program each year.

"We'll have to see the final audit. If we have any issues we'll get to the bottom of them," said Feichthaler, who was elected in 2005. The projects were completed or in their final stages when he was elected.

"I'm keeping my eye on this and following it very closely," the mayor said.

Day said he hopes the investigation ends quickly.

DOJ_NMG_0029126

"If they are here a week from now, still reviewing this, it's very bad," Day said. The situation raises questions about how the city sets up its utilities projects, Day said.

The city hires a construction manager who assumes all risk for problems with the project. The construction manager is responsible for all aspects of the project from design through construction. The city switched to the method after previous utilities projects led to problems that resulted in millions of dollars in legal costs for the city. The city had more of the responsibility for those projects.

"A year ago we were told there are cheaper, more effective ways to do this," Day said. "We need to take a good look at it."

But Feichthaler said he stands behind the construction manager method. He looked at previous projects and concluded the construction-manager method produced better work and a better price for the city and its residents.

"It definitely is the right process," Feichthaler said.

VNU Deal Likely As Activist Holder Concedes Defeat (WSJ)

By Jason Singer

Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

A group of six private-equity firms is likely to win its €7.7 billion ($9.82 billion) takeover bid for Dutch media giant VNU NV as activist shareholder Knight Vinke Asset Management LLC, leader of a revolt against the bid, has thrown in the towel and said it will tender its shares by the Friday deadline.

Knight Vinke Chief Investment Officer Eric Knight said he is ending his campaign to encourage shareholders to reject the private-equity buyout -- a deal announced in March that was recommended by the VNU board -- because many shareholders are supporting the bid, which was recently increased.

He added that shareholders could have achieved a higher price if they continued the fight against the VNU board and the private-equity consortium, which were pushing hard for the deal to be accepted.

"I think we did give them a pretty good run for their money," said Mr. Knight. "But I still believe we've left money on the table. We decided to let this one go in order to go fight the next one."

The battle over VNU, owner of the Nielsen television-ratings service and publisher of magazines such as Billboard and Hollywood Reporter, has been closely watched around the world because it was the first time a big private-equity buyout, agreed to on friendly terms, met opposition from shareholders threatening to reject it and impose their own plan for turning around the firm.

Mr. Knight, who holds a 1.2% stake in VNU, won broad support for his resistance to the deal, arguing existing shareholders could realize far more for their stake by forcing the company to cut costs and shed assets, rather than selling to the private-equity group that would do many of the same things.

Mr. Knight drafted a "Plan B" proposal for restructuring VNU, hired a headhunter to search for a new chief executive and proposed himself to be elected to the board, all of which many shareholders backed.

Earlier this month, the private-equity group, which calls itself Valcon Acquisition BV, raised its offer by 2.6% to €29.50 a share from €28.75 and said it would complete the deal with at least 80% of the shares, down from 95% previously.

The higher price, combined with the difficulty and time that would be needed to implement the Knight Vinke plan, led many shareholders that had been backing Mr. Knight to defect and say they would accept the offer.

Mr. Knight has battled with VNU for nearly a year, beginning with a letter sent to the company in June asking for the bulk of the €2 billion proceeds from sale of its directories business to be returned to shareholders rather than used for an acquisition.

A month later, VNU announced a $7 billion deal to buy U.S. pharmaceutical-data provider IMS Health Inc. Mr. Knight and others strongly opposed the acquisition and eventually forced VNU to abandon it. They then urged the company to consider breaking itself into three units and selling the individual pieces.

The Valcon group approached the company soon after, and VNU put itself up for sale. After months of close inspection of the company's books, the group made a formal bid that the board accepted but encountered shareholder hostility.

Mr. Knight said he earned about a 30% return from his VNU holdings. But he continued to criticize VNU's board for doing "a very poor job of defending shareholders' interests."

VNU's chairman and other members of the company's board have repeatedly said they explored all avenues for achieving the most value for shareholders and the Valcon group's cash bid was higher than any other option.

The Valcon group includes Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co., Thomas H. Lee Partners LP, Blackstone Group LP, Carlyle Group, Hellman & Friedman LLC and AlpInvest Partners.

Symantec Sues Microsoft Over Storage Technology (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

Symantec Corp. sued Microsoft Corp. on Thursday, citing misappropriation of intellectual property and breach of contract.

The suit, which was filed in federal court in Seattle, Wash., involves Symantec's Volume Manager product, software it acquired with its purchase of Veritas Software Corp. Volume Manager allows operating systems to store and manipulate large amounts of data and protect systems from data loss when storage hardware fails.

Symantec alleged that Microsoft, which had licensed the Volume Management technology from Veritas, violated terms of its license agreement by using the technology to develop competing features and products. Microsoft improperly incorporated the technology into its operating system products, including Vista, and then concealed its use of the technology, Symantec said.

Microsoft issued a statement saying it had "worked hard" to try to resolve the issue, but couldn't reach an agreement with Symantec. "We believe the facts will show that Microsoft's actions were proper and are fully consistent with the contract between Veritas and Microsoft," the company said.

Symantec said it seeking "proper" compensation for damages, and wants Microsoft to stop using the technology.

US, Mexico Join Forces In Fight Against Meth Dealers (WT)

By Jerry Seper

Washington Times, May 19, 2006

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday said the United States and Mexico are developing a strategy to attack large methamphetamine trafficking organizations operating on both sides of the border.

Mr. Gonzales, speaking at a National Methamphetamine Chemical Initiative conference in Dallas, said the two countries had reached an agreement for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) and the Mexican government to establish specialized anti-meth enforcement teams.

In Mexico, he said, the teams will focus on investigating and targeting the most-wanted Mexican meth trafficking organizations, while DEA-led efforts on the U.S. side will focus on traffickers and distributors of the highly addictive drug produced in Mexico.

"If we work together, sharing resources and intelligence, the law-enforcement agencies of our two countries can better attack the problem at every stage in the production and distribution chain," Mr. Gonzales said.

"We will work with our Mexican counterparts to trace precursor chemicals destined for our region of the world, uncover and dismantle lab sites fueled by these chemicals and track the meth distribution trail into our country from seller to buyer," he said.

Mr. Gonzales said strong American demand for methamphetamines is fueling its production and that the public needs to be better informed about its dangers. He said the trafficking organizations combine the "sophistication of a contemporary corporation with the brutality of a street gang."

Mr. Gonzales was joined at the conference by Mexican Attorney General Daniel Cabeza de Vaca, DEA Administrator Karen P. Tandy and Office of National Drug Control Policy Director John P. Walters.

"Methamphetamine trafficking and the movement of its chemicals are now a global epidemic," Mrs. Tandy said.

"For the first time in history, the U.S. attorney general and the Mexico attorney general are standing together to announce a real plan to tackle ... meth production.

"For those of us who have been quick to write off any hope of making real headway against drug traffickers in Mexico, today is a new day," she said.

Mr. Gonzales said the meth trafficking and distribution chain into the United States runs through seaports as well as across the land and that the DEA, in a coordinated effort with U.S. Customs and Border Protection, would take measures to detect meth and meth precursor chemicals in cargo arriving at seaports in this country.

He said Mexican authorities will take similar actions in their country.

"There is much effort under way, and plans for more, as it should be. The U.S. and Mexico share common goals. We want to be safe from terrorism, violent crime, gangs and the dangers posed by drugs," he said.

US, Mexico Join Forces To Fight Meth Labs (CNS)

CNSNews.com, May 19, 2006

Homes and other places where methamphetamine labs once operated will be listed on the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's website. The registry will provide owners or renters with notice that a property may be contaminated with toxic substances. That's one of the meth-fighting initiatives outlined Thursday by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. Appearing with the Mexican attorney general at a conference in Dallas, Gonzales stressed the importance of international cooperation in fighting meth production and trafficking.

"Approximately 80 percent of all meth purchases in the U.S. originate from Mexican labs," Gonzales said. "Accordingly, we are refocusing our investigative resources on large meth trafficking organizations. DEA enforcement teams will now concentrate on meth transportation and distribution cells in the U.S. and Mexico."

Gonzales also acknowledged that without strong American demand for meth, there would be no financial incentive for Mexican organizations to continue to produce it. Gonzales said both the U.S. and Mexican governments will establish specialized meth enforcement teams. Between now and the end of this year, the Justice Department will train 1,000 Mexican police in meth lab detection, and it will donate six trucks and trailers for Mexican police to use in dismantling meth labs, which produce toxic waste.

Gonzales Heralds Efforts To Combat Gangs (AP)

AP, May 18, 2006

DALLAS - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales praised federal grants intended to combat gangs, saying it is never too late to help youths.

"You have kids here from a pretty tough neighborhood, I'm told, a lot like the neighborhood I grew up in," Gonzales said at a news conference at a community center in a high-crime neighborhood. "These kids have big dreams and it is never too little too late."

The Dallas-Fort Worth metroplex was awarded $2.5 million in March as part a $15 million pilot program that includes equal grants to Los Angeles; Tampa, Fla.; Cleveland; Milwaukee and other cities deemed to have serious gang problems.

The money will go to prevention, enforcement and rehabilitation of former gang members.

At the conference, U.S. Attorney Richard Roper announced Wednesday's arrest of 19 Crip gang members in Fort Worth on drug and weapons charges. He would not release details of the ongoing operation, but said federal and local authorities have already confiscated hundreds of grams of crack, 15 pounds of marijuana, 40 grams of heroin and $15,000 in cash. More arrests are expected, he said.

Over the past seven years, Dallas has had the highest crime rate among cities its size, according to a U.S. Department of Justice press release Thursday.

"It is not possible to pursue the American Dream if you are a member of a gang," Gonzales said. "We need to know what personal, community and family factors lead a young man or woman to join a gang."

Operation Triggertown Nabs Six Offenders (CHISTNEWS)

Chicago Sun-Times News Group, May 18, 2006

Federal and local authorities on Thursday announced the arrest of six high-ranking gang members and drug traffickers following a six-month investigation dubbed “Operation Triggertown.”

The Chicago police’s Narcotics and Gang Investigation Section and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives launched the operation in November 2005 and it culminated Wednesday with the arrest of the six offenders, including Rashod “Fatman” Bethany -- a reputed leader of the Killing Crew faction, a fragment of the Gangster Disciple street gang -- who was arrested at a Hazel Crest restaurant, according to a release from Chicago police.

Bethany was charged with federal narcotics offenses, the release said.

Quenten Hawkins, of Lafayette, Ind., was charged with state gun-running violations for allegedly transporting firearms from Indiana to Chicago and providing them to the Gangster Disciples, according to the release. A laser sight was attached to one of the firearms recovered in the investigation, the release said.

Shannon Evans was charged with first-degree murder for allegedly killing Robert Duffy, 33, of the 12000 block of South Parnell, in October 2005. State narcotics charges were pending against Evans, according to the release.

In addition, Charles “TuTu” Golden was charged with state narcotics offenses and unlawful use of a weapon by a felon, while Roosevelt “Jimmy Mac” Adams and Rickey “L’il Rickey” Long were charged with federal narcotics offenses.

During the operation, both agencies conducted undercover buys and police used a variety of electronic and technical devices that assisted the investigation, according to the release.

“Federal law enforcement collaborations at the highest levels with ATF and others are critical when it comes to dismantling sophisticated narcotics and gang operations. Community involvement and information sharing on known offenders from different gangs and their territories also helps the police continue to safeguard communities against violence and future gang conflicts,” Chicago Police Supt. Phil Cline said in the release.

DOJ_NMG_0029129

The police department's collaboration with ATF will be used as a model for future operations in dismantling narcotics and gang activity, the release added.

Michigan Farm Subject Of Hoffa Search (AP)

By Tom Krisher

AP, May 19, 2006

MILFORD TOWNSHIP, Mich. -- In one of the most intensive searches for Jimmy Hoffa in decades, the FBI summoned archaeologists and anthropologists and brought in heavy equipment to scour a horse farm Thursday for the body of the former Teamsters boss who vanished in 1975.

Daniel Roberts, agent in charge of the Detroit FBI field office, would not disclose what led agents to the farm, but said: "This is probably a fairly credible lead. You can gather that from the number of people out here."

No trace of Hoffa has ever been found, and no one has ever been charged in the case. But investigators have long suspected that he was killed by the mob to keep him from reclaiming the Teamsters presidency after he got out of prison for corruption.

The farm, just outside Detroit, used to be owned by a Teamsters official. And mob figures used to meet at a barn there before Hoffa's disappearance, authorities said.

Investigators began combing the area Wednesday, and the search continued Thursday and included the use of heavy construction equipment. Roberts said it would probably involve the removal of a barn.

Authorities also led cadaver dogs across the property, and the FBI called in anthropologists and archaeologists from Michigan State University.

Roberts said he expects the search to go on for at least a couple of weeks.

Hoffa was last seen on a night he was scheduled to have dinner at a restaurant about 20 miles from the farm. He was supposed to meet with a New Jersey Teamsters boss and a Detroit Mafia captain, both now dead.

Over the years, Hoffa's disappearance spawned endless theories _ that he was entombed in concrete at Giants Stadium in the New Jersey Meadowlands; that he was ground up and thrown to the fishes in a Florida swamp; that he was obliterated in a mob-owned fat-rendering plant that has since burned down.

In 2003, authorities searched beneath a backyard pool a few hours north of Detroit but turned up nothing. The following year, they pulled up the floorboards on a Detroit home and found bloodstains, but the blood was not Hoffa's.

A law enforcement official in Washington said the latest search was based on information developed several years ago and verified more recently.

Among other things, there was a high level of suspicious activity on the farm the day Hoffa vanished, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity. A backhoe appeared that day near the barn organized crime members had used for meetings, and that location was never used again, the official said.

The Detroit Free Press, citing people involved with the case who declined to be identified because of the active investigation, reported that the tip that led to the latest search came from Donovan Wells, who was sentenced two years ago to 10 years in federal prison for marijuana smuggling. Wells, 75, is a former associate of Rolland McMaster, a longtime Teamsters official.

At the time of Hoffa's disappearance, the property was owned by McMaster. It is now under different ownership and is called Hidden Dreams Farm.

McMaster's lawyer, Mayer Morganroth, said he doubted the FBI would find anything. "That farm was looked at with a fine-toothed comb in the '70s, when Hoffa was missing," Morganroth said. "There's nothing there."

McMaster was convicted in 1963 of accepting payoffs from a trucking company and, according to a 1976 Detroit Free Press account, served five months in prison.

Reporters were not allowed onto the property, which is surrounded by a white wooden fence just off a dirt road. Images from news helicopters showed about a dozen people, some with shovels, standing by an area of newly turned dirt about 10 feet by 15 feet.

Morganroth said McMaster was in Indiana on union business at the time of Hoffa's disappearance. He said that to his knowledge, McMaster was never a suspect. Morganroth said FBI officials visited McMaster, 93, this week at his home in Fenton, where one of several horse-breeding farms he owns is situated.

"They were just asking about the farm itself _ did he ever get any inkling?" he said.

In 1967, Hoffa was sentenced to 13 years in prison for jury tampering and fraud, but he refused to give up the Teamsters presidency. After he quit the job in 1971, President Nixon pardoned him.

The Hunt For Hoffa Heats Up (FREEP)

By David Ashenfelter And Joe Swickard, Free Press Staff Writers

Detroit Free Press, May 19, 2006

Insiders say they're skeptical

A tip from a 75-year-old federal inmate gave FBI agents what they're calling their latest and best chance yet to crack the 30-year-old mystery of what happened to former Teamsters boss Jimmy Hoffa.

The clue brought engineers, anthropologists, ground-penetrating radar, backhoes and dozens of federal and local law officials to the pastoral and eerily ironic named Hidden Dreams Farm in western Oakland County's Milford Township.

During a news conference at the farm Thursday, Detroit FBI chief Dan Roberts wouldn't detail what brought out 40-50 agents, the largest FBI search in at least two decades. But he said the tip is promising.

"Since I've been here, this is the best lead I've seen come across in the Hoffa investigation," said Roberts, who has been in Detroit two years.

He said the search would take up to two weeks and will involve removing a 30-by-100-foot barn.

Roberts said Thursday's search produced nothing of significance, a familiar refrain for law enforcement officials.

The digging began Wednesday when agents swooped down on the horse farm once owned by Hoffa associate Rolland McMaster, a longtime suspect in Hoffa's disappearance, said people involved with the ongoing case and who declined to be identified because of the active investigation.

The tip that Hoffa was buried on the farm came from Donovan Wells, who was sentenced to 10 years in prison two years ago in a marijuana smuggling scheme involving his Brownstown Township trucking company. Wells, who also was known as Don Wells, is a former associate of McMaster, who was a top Detroit Teamsters official until a reputed falling-out with Hoffa in the late 1960s.

Officials wouldn't say what Wells told the FBI, but said he passed a polygraph test.

During an interview Thursday, McMaster said that account was worthy of a drug-addled imagination.

"That's the poorest reporting I've ever heard," he said. McMaster said he welcomed the search.

One insider said the tip is a long shot because it would have been reckless to hide Hoffa's remains on McMaster's farm.

McMaster bought the property on East Maple Road in Milford Township in 1952 and sold it in a land-contract deal in 1977, according to Oakland County land records.

Now 93 and living on a farm in Fenton, McMaster denied any knowledge of Hoffa's fate. He said an FBI agent came to see him Tuesday and discussed his relations with Hoffa.

He said the agent never mentioned the East Maple property.

Federal agents say they believe that McMaster had a falling-out with Hoffa soon after Hoffa went to prison for racketeering and jury tampering in the late 1960s. McMaster denied that claim.

Hoffa vanished on July 30, 1975, after going to a Bloomfield Township restaurant for a meeting with Detroit Mafia captain Anthony (Tony Jack) Giacalone and Anthony (Tony Pro) Provenzano, a mobbed-up New Jersey Teamsters official.

Both Giacalone and Provenzano are dead.

Hoffa expert Dan Moldea, a Washington, D.C., author who wrote "The Hoffa Wars," said Wells is a key figure in the case.

"He lived with McMaster on his farm in Wixom, was a partner of McMaster's brother-in-law, Stanton Barr, and may know what happened to Hoffa if McMaster was involved in the disappearance," Moldea said.

Both Barr and McMaster were called before a federal grand jury in Detroit after Hoffa vanished. Moldea said he interviewed Wells in 1976 and that Wells denied any knowledge of Hoffa's disappearance.

The FBI says it believes McMaster may know what happened to Hoffa. Wells is locked up at a federal medical center in Lexington, Ky.

Some old Hoffa hands were skeptical of the new tip.

Retired FBI agent John Anthony said the horse farm is a new theory to him, and doubted its value: "Even if they find something, will it be able to lead to a prosecution? The circle of people associated with this is getting smaller all the time.

Hoffa Tip 'Fairly Credible,' FBI Says (WP)

By Allen Lengel

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

Dozens of FBI agents, joined by archaeologists and anthropologists, spent a second day searching a horse farm near Detroit yesterday for the remains of former Teamsters boss Jimmy Hoffa.

The agents used cadaver dogs, excavating equipment and shovels at Hidden Dreams Farm, a 80-acre spread in Milford Township, in one of the most extensive searches for Hoffa in years. Authorities said they expect to take a barn apart in the coming days as they methodically search the area.

They are working on a tip from a 75-year-old federal inmate who pointed them to the farm, which was owned at the time of Hoffa's disappearance three decades ago by a Teamsters official, authorities said.

"This is probably a fairly credible lead -- you can gather that from the number of people out here," said Daniel Roberts, special agent in charge of the Detroit FBI office, at a news conference outside the property. "We plan to be out here for probably a couple weeks, at least, until we can finish with this entire search and make sure that we've covered everything adequately."

Hoffa disappeared on July 30, 1975, the day he was scheduled to meet organized crime figure Anthony "Tony Jack" Giacalone and New Jersey Teamsters official Anthony Provenzano at the Machus Red Fox, an upscale restaurant, in Bloomfield Township, north of Detroit.

Federal officials believe the mob killed Hoffa to keep him from regaining control of the Teamsters after serving prison time for jury tampering. Giacalone and Provenzano have since died.

Authorities said the latest search for Hoffa is the most intensive in decades. Privately, some expressed skepticism, though they said the information is credible enough to pursue.

Over the years, the FBI has received tips that Hoffa was buried in various spots, including some in Michigan and under the Meadowlands stadium in New Jersey. One FBI theory is that he was disposed of in an incinerator in Hamtramck, Mich.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Donald Scheer signed a warrant in Detroit on Tuesday for a search on the property that was owned at the time of Hoffa's disappearance by Teamsters official and Hoffa friend Rolland McMaster, who is now 93. The current owners have been there for about 10 years, the FBI said.

Law enforcement sources said the federal inmate, scheduled to be released in 2012, was a business associate of McMaster's. The inmate, who once lived on the farm, provided the tip that triggered the search. They said the convicted drug smuggler came across the information secondhand. The sources asked not to be identified because of the sensitivity of some of the information.

McMaster's attorney, Mayer Morganroth, said: "This thing is so blown out of proportion. As far as he's concerned, in '75 after Hoffa's disappearance, they went over that farm with a fine-tooth comb. I think they're going to find nothing."

No Sign Yet Of Hoffa's Body, But Search At Farm Continues (NYT)

By Micheline Maynard And Nick Bunkley

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

DETROIT, May 18 — The Federal Bureau of Investigation, plenty experienced in searching for James R. Hoffa, said a "fairly credible lead" is what led investigators this week to still another potential burial spot: a horse farm aptly named Hidden Dreams.

Using cadaver dogs borrowed from the Detroit police, and aided by students and professors from Michigan State University, F.B.I. agents began a search on Wednesday of the 80-acre farm in Milford Township, Mich., northwest of Detroit, for signs of a crime involving Mr. Hoffa, the former Teamsters president. Daniel D. Roberts, the special agent in charge of the Detroit F.B.I. office, said the search could take weeks.

In fact, the search has taken more than 30 years, and has led investigators to trash dumps, construction sites and homes throughout the region. One theory even held that he was entombed under Giants Stadium at the Meadowlands in New Jersey.

At a news conference on Thursday afternoon on a dirt road at the farm entrance, Mr. Roberts said no trace of Mr. Hoffa had yet been discovered.

Nor would he give details of the search warrant, which was sealed by a federal judge in Detroit.

But, Mr. Roberts said, "This is probably a fairly credible lead" in Mr. Hoffa's disappearance. Mr. Roberts, who has been in his position for the past two years, added that it was "the best lead I've seen come across in the Hoffa investigation."

Numerous such leads in the past have failed to turn up the body of Mr. Hoffa, who disappeared on July 30, 1975, after failing to return for dinner.

DOJ_NMG_0029132

The police, who had been contacted by his family, found his 1974 Pontiac the next day in the parking lot of the Machus Red Fox restaurant in Bloomfield Township, Mich., where he was supposed to meet two organized crime figures for lunch. Neither of those men showed up.

The restaurant is 17 miles east of the Hidden Dreams farm, whose entrance was swarmed Thursday by television crews, reporters and a few onlookers.

Over the past two days, local television stations broadcast video shot from helicopters showing agents digging a rectangular hole with shovels on one side of a barn and using a backhoe to excavate on a dirt driveway on the opposite side.

Agents also were seen walking the perimeter of the farm on Thursday afternoon, testing the firmness of the soil with tools. They briefly dug a small hole near a wooden fence before filling it in.

The latest search is the third in the past two years by the F.B.I. in the Detroit area.

Mr. Roberts acknowledged those efforts, saying, "We do not leave any leads uncovered, obviously."

Or any stones unturned, apparently. He said the F.B.I. might have to move a barn in order to dig for evidence of Mr. Hoffa's remains. But Mr. Roberts said archaeologists and anthropologists from Michigan State had told him they would be able to spot evidence of a crime, even three decades later.

In a region where everyone seems to have a theory about where Mr. Hoffa might be buried, the Milford area, dotted with farms and wetlands, has always been a logical spot.

"Anytime anybody built a road or repaired a road there was a running joke that maybe Hoffa's under there," the Milford police chief, Wayne Walli, said Thursday.

The Hidden Dreams Farm was once owned by a former Teamsters official, Rolland McMaster, who was a protégé of Mr. Hoffa.

Experts who have followed the Teamsters contend Hoffa's relationship with the union turned contentious when he was imprisoned for jury tampering and fraud. He served five years of a 13-year sentence before President Richard M. Nixon pardoned him in 1971.

At the time of his disappearance, Mr. Hoffa was hoping to stage a comeback as union president. Mayer Morganroth, a lawyer for Mr. McMaster, said Thursday that F.B.I. agents had questioned his client recently about Mr. Hoffa's disappearance. He said Mr. McMaster, 93, was saddened by Mr. Hoffa's disappearance, and called the search "ludicrous."

The property has been in the hands of its current owners for the last 10 years, Mr. Roberts said, adding that they have been very cooperative with federal agents. The F.B.I. contacted Mr. Hoffa's daughter, Barbara Hoffa Crancer, a circuit court judge in St. Louis, on Wednesday night, people with direct knowledge of the conversation said Thursday. Judge Crancer did not return a call seeking comment.

Mr. Hoffa's son, James P. Hoffa, the current Teamsters president, had no comment.

FBI Reports Promising Lead Into Hoffa Disappearance (CHIT)

By Tim Jones, Tribune National Correspondent

Chicago Tribune, May 19, 2006

MILFORD TOWNSHIP, Mich. -- After decades of following dead-end tips that led to swimming pools, trash dumps, incinerators and even beneath the floorboards of a Detroit home, the FBI said Thursday it has a promising lead into the disappearance of former Teamster President Jimmy Hoffa, nearly 31 years after the notorious labor boss was last seen.

This search for Hoffa's remains may end like all the others, but if Thursday's remarks by the head of the FBI in Detroit are an indicator, officials will spend weeks turning and carefully examining a lot of dirt at a horse farm.

"Since I've been here ... this is the best lead I've seen come across on the Hoffa investigation," said Special Agent Daniel Roberts, who was careful not to reveal much to a throng of reporters who gathered on a tree-shaded dirt road for new developments in perhaps the most famous disappearance in modern American history.

Roberts said "nothing significant" has been recovered since digging began Wednesday morning on the 85-acre farm about 35 miles northwest of Detroit.

"But the process is just starting," he added.

Roberts said the search will last at least two weeks and will involve archeologists, geologists and anthropologists from Michigan State University, as well as cadaver dogs from the Detroit Police Department.

Architects and structural engineers will be brought in to assist in the possible dismantling of a 30-by-100-foot horse barn, under which evidence may be found.

Roberts would not comment on the contents on a search warrant, which has been sealed in U.S. District Court in Detroit. He did, however, call the lead "fairly credible."

DOJ_NMG_0029133

Neighbors in this leafy rural enclave are, for now, basking in the new-found celebrity, although their quiet dirt road has become chaotic for residents like Mark and Lynne Hait. They were out with their two young boys walking their Irish setter even as a local TV reporter prepared to do a live report for the 5 p.m. news.

"It's kind of cool right now, but I'm sure it's gonna get old," Mark Hait said.

Hoffa was last seen a few miles from here in July 1975. He was formally declared dead in 1982, and the mystery of his whereabouts has fueled Web sites, documentaries, movies, books and scads of speculation, much of which re-surfaced since news of the latest dig broke Wednesday.

One report Thursday from an author of a new book on the Hoffa disappearance dismissed this latest lead, saying Hoffa was buried in New Jersey and then removed, disposed of in a car that was crushed and then shipped to Japan.

Others called the search of this farm, which was reported to be a popular meeting place of organized crime figures in the 1970s, a waste of time because nothing was found there 30 years ago.

Still, the FBI, by all appearances, seems determined to exhaust this latest lead. Graduate students schooled in geology will be used to determine whether the earth has been removed and then replaced, Roberts said. If anything is found they will check for a DNA match.

About 40 to 50 investigators and diggers were working at the site Thursday, aided by heavy equipment. And helicopters hovered above, adding a new chapter of local commotion to the long-unsolved mystery surrounding Jimmy Hoffa.

Muslims, FBI Seek To Build Trust Strained By Sept. 11 Attacks (AP)

AP, May 19, 2006

In September, a group of Muslim men praying near the main air intake duct at Giants Stadium was detained by suspicious FBI agents.

On Saturday, the federal agency and an Egyptian-American group plan to meet at the stadium in the latest FBI push to recruit Arab-Americans and repair relations strained in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks.

"It's an effort to build bridges with this community," said Les Wiser Jr., special agent in charge of the FBI's Newark bureau, who has made improving ties with New Jersey's Muslim community a priority. "We think it's important for them to get to know us. We're fighting perceptions we think are skewed against us."

The FBI accepted an invitation from the Egyptian American Group, an interdenominational organization that was formed after Sept. 11 when hundreds of New Jersey Muslims, Arab-Americans and south Asians were taken into custody as part of the investigation.

"We were afraid of them, and they were suspicious of us," Suzanne Loutfy, a member of Egyptian American group. "It was thought by many people that the FBI is the enemy. That's the perception we're fighting against."

Part of the event is aimed at interesting young Arab-Americans in law enforcement careers, particularly with the FBI, which needs their help as investigators and translators.

"We think the more they know about us, the more comfortable they will be," Wiser said. "We do need to get more diversity in the ranks."

Loutfy's 18-year-old son will be at the event, along with six or seven of his friends, to hear what the FBI has to say. Kareem Loutfy, a senior at Carteret High School, says he's considering a career with the agency.

"Because of my background, I can easily approach people" in Arab-American communities, he said. "They would feel much more comfortable dealing with me because of who I am, and that would be great for both sides. We need to build more trust with the people who are protecting us."

Since the 2001 attacks, the FBI has made numerous efforts to reach out to Muslims and Arab-Americans in New Jersey. Several months after the attacks, it held a job fair in one of the most prominent mosques in Paterson. While no one there got a job with the FBI, several applicants landed local law enforcement jobs.

The FBI also has invited Muslim community leaders to conduct cultural sensitivity training with agents and civilian employees.

Other law enforcement agencies also are trying to better understand and connect with Muslims. On Thursday, Union County Prosecutor Theodore J. Romankow distributed copies of a new training video his office developed on how officers should interact with Muslims. The tapes will go to each police chief in the county, and nearly 2,000 officers will view them.

"Where there is good communication, there is a better understanding between people no matter what religion and that was the goal here," Romankow said.

The video deals with issues considered normal in Muslim culture, but which may be suspicious to authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0029134

For example, a Muslim woman who is home alone will be extremely reluctant on religious grounds to let male police officers into her home, said Ali Jaaber, an imam at an Elizabeth mosque. That is normal, and should not be viewed as suspicious behavior, or an indication that she has anything to hide, he said.

The FBI in New Jersey has several Arabic-speaking employees, but could always use more, a spokesman said. Nationwide, the FBI has increased the number of its employees who speak Arabic by nearly 250 percent, although the agency would not say how many employees that represents.

On Sept. 19, 2005, a small group of Muslims attending a New York Giants-New Orleans Saints game at Giants Stadium was questioned by the FBI after fans saw them bowing down on the ground to pray.

The FBI denied their religion had anything to do with the questioning, noting that the men were in an area not normally frequented by football fans, next to the stadium's main air intake duct. The Muslims were released after about 30 minutes of questioning without being charged.

That controversy led the New Jersey Sports and Exposition Authority to set aside a special room at the stadium for anyone wishing to pray.

Kareem Loutfy said holding Saturday's fence-mending event with the FBI at Giants Stadium was appropriate, if somewhat ironic.

"It's a very good statement, actually, that in light of everything that happened, we're both still willing to move forward," he said.

Officer Details His Work Undercover Amid Muslims (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

New York Times, May 19, 2006

A young police detective testified yesterday at the Herald Square bombing plot trial that he was recruited from the Police Academy 13 months after 9/11 to work deep undercover in the Muslim community to investigate Islamic extremists.

The detective, a Muslim who came to America from Bangladesh when he was 7, testified that he was a 23-year-old college graduate when he was plucked from the academy in October 2002. He took an apartment in Bay Ridge, Brooklyn, where, he testified, his assignment was to be a "walking camera" among Muslims there.

He said he had no contact with the Police Department other than through his handler, to whom he reported by e-mail at first. During two years of living in Bay Ridge, he was involved in "numerous" investigations, he testified, and was at times shadowed by a field team to ensure his safety.

The Police Intelligence Division's program to post detectives overseas has been widely publicized. But this detective's testimony yesterday in federal court in Brooklyn provided the closest look yet at how the division is using undercover investigators to penetrate mosques, bookstores and other places where Muslims gather in the city.

His testimony confirmed what many Muslims have believed since the Sept. 11 attacks: that law enforcement agencies have worked to infiltrate their community during terrorism investigations. It also revealed the extraordinary steps the department took to create a fictitious identity so a Muslim investigator could live for years in an insular neighborhood where people have become highly suspicious of the authorities.

Beyond the detective's testimony, police officials yesterday would not discuss the scope of the program and provided no details about its structure, its guidelines or its successes or failures. The witness was identified only by a pseudonym — Kamil Pasha — to protect continuing investigations.

The detective was the final witness at the four-week trial of Shahawar Matin Siraj, 23, a Pakistani immigrant who is charged with plotting to blow up the Herald Square subway station in 2004. His lawyers have argued that he was entrapped by a paid police informer, a 50-year-old Egyptian-born nuclear engineer who they say was the driving force behind the plot. They have argued that their client was an inept dupe who was not predisposed to commit an act of terrorism until the informer inflamed him.

The undercover detective was called as a witness to rebut the defense arguments that the informer had drawn Mr. Siraj into the plot. He told the jury about statements Mr. Siraj had made long before he met the informer, which prosecutors contend show he had often spoken about violence and terrorism. The detective was not involved in the investigation of Mr. Siraj but came across him during his undercover work.

Much of the detective's testimony focused on Mr. Siraj's statements, but strands of information about the detective and his work were interlaced with his answers. And while prosecutors sought to limit testimony about the detective's background, objecting several times to questions by one of Mr. Siraj's lawyers, Martin R. Stolar, the judge, Nina Gershon, overruled the objections.

DOJ_NMG_0029135

The detective testified that he graduated from the John Jay College of Criminal Justice and entered the Police Academy in July 2002. In the middle of October, roughly halfway through his academy training, he left early when he was recruited to join the Intelligence Division, where he was assigned to the Special Services Unit, which runs the undercover program.

Within three weeks, according to his testimony, he made his first appearance at the Islamic Society of Bay Ridge, a mosque on Fifth Avenue in Brooklyn, next door to the Islamic bookstore where Mr. Siraj worked. He testified that he spent time there periodically. Mr. Stolar, while questioning the detective, indicated that his reports showed he had seen Mr. Siraj 72 times over the two years, mostly in the bookstore.

He testified that he started looking for an apartment and a job. At one point Mr. Siraj's uncle was going to help him find work. With a coterie of young men who sometimes frequented the bookstore, he got involved in essentially proselytizing Islam.

He also testified that at one point he had Mr. Siraj over to his apartment. But he said he never wore a secret recording device.

The detective said he was not given any special training to work undercover but was taught about self-defense, weapons, surveillance and undercover safety.

He said, "I was told to act like a civilian — hang out in the neighborhood, gather information."

He said he was told "never to push for information," but instead to "take a back seat" and "observe, be the ears and eyes."

A slight man in a gray suit, a white shirt and a rust-colored patterned tie, the detective said he had never before testified in court. In fact, his youth and, perhaps, naïveté were in evidence at several points in the morning, including when he said he had never heard of suicide bombings before Mr. Siraj raised the subject, one he seemed to discuss often.

Mr. Stolar seemed incredulous. "You had never before heard of suicide bombings taking place in Israel?" he asked.

"I grew up with a very peaceful religion," the detective responded. "All of these comments — radical beliefs — came to me when I took this assignment." He added: "Where in Islam does it say you can blow up a train station?"

Over the course of the day, his poise on the stand grew. Most police officers make their trial debuts in less-charged atmospheres, perhaps in traffic or criminal court. For the witness yesterday, however, as the first Muslim undercover to testify, the stakes were far higher.

In fact, the stakes at the trial are perhaps higher still for the department, as evidenced by the presence for much of the proceedings of the department's highest ranking lawyer, S. Andrew Schaffer, the deputy commissioner for legal matters, and an aide. Also frequently present has been a civilian Intelligence Division analyst and for the last three days, as the possibility of the detective's testimony grew, a lieutenant from the department's press office.

Several questions about the investigation remained yesterday. When the undercover detective began visiting the Bay Ridge mosque in 2002, the Intelligence Division was governed by a 1985 consent decree stemming from a civil lawsuit. The decree limited police surveillance of political activity and religious services.

The guidelines set by the decree, which were loosened in February 2003, required that certain paperwork be filed before such an investigation could be conducted. It was unclear yesterday whether the guidelines were followed.

Cop Testifies About Post 9/11 Undercover (CCT)

By Tom Hays

The Contra Costa Times, May 19, 2006

NEW YORK - A city police officer born in Bangladesh testified Thursday that commanders assigned him straight out of the police academy to go undercover in a Muslim neighborhood as part of their response to the Sept. 11 attacks.

The undercover investigator, who is Muslim, said at a Manhattan subway bomb plot trial in federal court that he was "told to be a member of the community, hang out and get information."

One place he hung out was an Islamic bookstore near a Brooklyn mosque, where he said he heard a Pakistani immigrant charged in the plot openly praise Osama bin Laden while damning the U.S.

During a conversation on the second anniversary of the 2001 destruction of the World Trade Center, Shahawar Matin Siraj "complimented bin Laden," the officer told jurors.

"He said he was a talented brother and a great planner and that he hoped bin Laden planned something big for America," said the officer, who testified under an alias because he is still involved in active investigations.

Siraj, 23, was arrested on the eve of the 2004 Republican National Convention on charges he plotted to blow up a subway station in Herald Square, a dense shopping district that includes Macy's flagship department store. If convicted, he could face up to 20 years in prison.

Defense attorneys have characterized Siraj as a harmless dupe who was entrapped by a crafty older informant in a phony plot that never got off the ground.

The trial is in its fourth week.

No One Charged In Motorist's Death (BRADV)

By Adrian Angelette

Baton Rouge Advocate, May 19, 2006

A grand jury Thursday decided against charging anyone in the death of motorist George Temple II, shot and killed by a civilian Feb. 17 while fighting with a police officer.

Prosecutors presented about 15 witnesses during six hours of testimony before the East Baton Rouge Parish grand jury.

Temple was shot six times during a struggle with Baton Rouge Police Officer Brian Harrison. Authorities have said Harrison pulled over Temple after he cut into a funeral procession on Greenwell Springs Road.

The traffic stop escalated into a fight between Harrison and Temple. Police have said Temple offered a bribe to the police officer, and the struggle began when Harrison attempted to arrest Temple.

During the fight, the 24-year-old Temple was shot six times. One of the bullets came from the officer's gun.

The other five came from the gun of Perry Stephens, who authorities have said came to help the officer. One of Stephens' shots hit Temple in the head, killing him.

After the grand jury returned Thursday, District Attorney Doug Moreau said his office typically has grand juries look at cases in which a death occurred and a police officer was involved.

"We think the grand jury is a good sounding board to consider the evidence, particularly when there is a case of great community interest," he said.

Prosecutor Steve Danielson presented every witness the District Attorney's Office knew about, Moreau said, including Harrison, Stephens and Police Chief Jeff LeDuff.

Moreau also said that on the state level, the case is now closed. However, the U.S. Justice Department is still investigating the case.

Temple's mother, Sharalean, was unhappy that the state grand jury did not indict anyone in her son's death.

"It's unfair, it's unjust, and it's not over," she said.

The Temple family attorney, Nathan Fisher, said he's confident "that the courts will assess responsibility at some point in this matter."

Stephens' attorney, Tommy D'Amico, said he expected his client to be cleared.

"I believe he saved the officer's life. He certainly saved him from suffering great harm," D'Amico said. "It has always been obvious to me that my client is nothing less than a citizen hero because he stepped up to save the officer while others stood and watched."

D'Amico said he is certain Stephens will also be cleared in the federal investigation.

"I'm absolutely positive," he said. "He did what needed to be done."

At a news conference after the grand jury's decision, LeDuff noted that the East Baton Rouge Parish Sheriff's Office, not the Police Department, investigated Temple's death.

Asked whether Harrison could have done something different to circumvent the situation, LeDuff said he will not second-guess the officer.

"I wasn't there," LeDuff said. "It would be unfair for me, you or anybody to put ourselves in a place of a human being."

LeDuff also commended Stephens, who shot Temple with a .45-caliber handgun.

"I want to say thank you to Mr. Stephens," LeDuff said. "It takes a lot of courage to stand up and do what he has done and come to the aid of an officer."

Moreau also said he is aware that there are some people in the community who will not be satisfied with the outcome.

Neither Kwame Asanté, executive director for the local chapter of the NAACP, nor the Rev. Leo Cyrus, a member of the Baton Rouge Area African-American Ministers, were available for comment Thursday.

State Rep. Michael Jackson, D-Baton Rouge, who is president of the East Baton Rouge Parish Black Elected Officials group, also was not available for comment.

Some members of the three groups requested an independent investigation into Temple's death shortly after the shooting.

Temple was black. Harrison and Stephens are white. The grand jury comprised six white people and six black people.

Should DNA Be Collected From All Criminals? (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

Christian Science Monitor, May 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0029137

ALBANY, N.Y. - In most cities and states, vandalism, shoplifting, and loitering are misdemeanors - possibly involving community service, not jail time. But those who commit such low-level crimes in New York State may soon be required to give DNA samples to authorities - just as convicted rapists or murderers do.

If the Legislature passes the proposal, which is currently being debated, New York would be the first state in the nation to require DNA samples for all convicted offenders.

Gov. George Pataki (R), who is asking the Legislature to expand DNA collection, argues that a larger database will help solve more crimes. Supporters add it will help solve future crimes because criminals who start off committing petty crimes sometimes graduate to more serious offenses.

The Empire State's move comes as DNA work in criminal investigations is under closer scrutiny. Complaints are rising about mistakes - some inadvertent, others fraudulent - at DNA labs around the country. Groups that have championed the use of DNA to verify the guilt or innocence of convicts are now campaigning against large-scale expansion of the practice, saying it would overwhelm labs. Others cite concerns about the increasing number of innocent people whose DNA is stored in a databank without their knowledge or approval.

"People have come to appreciate the power of DNA to solve crimes. They now need to respect the care that is required to maximize its potential and avoid its abuse," says Stephen Saloom, policy director for the Innocence Project, which has used DNA testing to free 176 prisoners wrongfully convicted.

Twenty-eight states now collect samples for some misdemeanors, according to DNAResource.com, a website that tracks DNA policies. A week ago, Kansas joined California and five other states in going one step further: taking the DNA samples of some people arrested, but not necessarily charged, with a crime.

"They all tend to be violent felony and burglary arrestees," says Lisa Hurst, a government-affairs consultant with Smith Alling Lane, which represents Applied Biosystems, a maker of DNA testing equipment. Smith Alling Lane also runs DNAResource.com.

New York's proposal, however, would go the furthest, requiring DNA collection for all convicted of misdemeanors. This would add about 80,000 additional DNA profiles per year to the DNA bank, say researchers at the state's Division of Criminal Justice.

It would be well worth the effort, says Chauncey Parker, director of criminal justice for the state. "Whenever we get DNA from a convicted offender, we run it against the 18,000 unsolved crimes, mostly rapes, and we have 2,400 hits so far. When we look at those hits, we find on average when [an arrestee] is convicted, it's [his or her] 12th conviction."

He cites the example of Raymon McGill arrested July 25 for attempted robbery. DNA testing linked Mr. McGill to two earlier murders and a rape, says Mr. Parker. He also notes that McGill had been arrested in 1999 for a misdemeanor.

"Had we required DNA fingerprinting back then, he would have been linked to the rape and the case solved," says Parker.

On Monday, critics of the New York proposal publicly complained that the backlog of cases is already large. Tom Duane (D), the only state senator to vote against the New York measure, worries about the cost of expansion, as well as how to ensure proper training of personnel and storage of the samples. "What good will it do if it's not done right?" he asked.

Such concerns go well beyond New York. In February, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, in their magazine, published an article detailing mistakes that have cropped up at DNA labs around the country. "Many of the mistakes arise from cross-contamination or mislabeling of DNA samples," wrote William Thompson, a professor at the University of California, Irvine.

Thompson's concerns arise just as states and cities are expanding their use of DNA testing. Los Angeles County is preparing to open a new crime lab in 2007. A proposed county budget included funding not only for the lab, but also for prosecutors and public defenders training in DNA technology. Nebraska recently passed a bill to include felony robbery and burglary convictions among those requiring DNA samples. Wisconsin is considering a bill to add some misdemeanor-related sex crimes to its DNA-collection requirements.

But with such expansions come concerns. Mr. Saloom of the Innocence Project objects to law-enforcement agencies holding the DNA of innocent people, especially those who merely cooperated with an investigation. These samples should be destroyed, he says. "The fundamental values of government accountability and personal privacy are at stake," he says.

Some of these arguments resonate with Assemblyman Joseph Lentol (D), chairman of the Assembly Codes Committee, which deals with criminal sanctions. "We are asking [DNA labs] to destroy the DNA of an innocent party," says Mr. Lentol. "This is a privacy issue."

Parker, the director of criminal justice for the state, says cooperating individuals can ask a judge to order their samples to be returned. "The burden is on the police to always demonstrate to a judge that whatever evidence they are collecting, whether it's a DNA fingerprint or a photograph or a handwriting sample, that it has been collected lawfully and that it's being used for a lawful purpose," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0029138

In addition, Assemblyman Lentol also worries that private labs will use DNA information for commercial gain. "There is an almost limitless possibility of ID theft," he worries.

That concern is addressed in the pending legislation, Parker says, by increasing the penalty for unlawful use of a DNA sample.

The governor and lawmakers have until the end of the legislative session, June 22, to come to terms on the proposal.

40 States Seek To Limit "Little Cigar" Marketing (WP)

By Kathleen Day

Washington Post, May 19, 2006

Forty states have asked the U.S. Treasury Department to bar tobacco companies from marketing products they say are identical to cigarettes as "little cigars," a designation the states say lets the firms evade taxes and target younger consumers.

Attorneys general from the 40 states, including Maryland, want the department's Alcohol and Tobacco Tax and Trade Bureau to reverse decades-old rules that permit products the size, shape and weight of cigarettes, but have brown rather than white wrappers, to be labeled as little cigars.

"If it looks like a cigarette, smokes like a cigarette and is being marketed like a cigarette, then the federal government should classify it as a cigarette," said Bill Roach, spokesman for Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller, co-chairman of the National Association of Attorneys General tobacco committee. The attorneys general also said the "little cigars" appeal to young smokers because they cost less than cigarettes and come with flavorings such as chocolate and raspberry.

The "little cigar" label allows the companies to pay lower federal and state taxes, and to avoid payments and advertising restrictions required for cigarettes under the 1998 master agreement between tobacco companies and all 50 states, according to the petition for rule changes.

The request was filed last month with the backing of 23 states, but the National Association of Attorneys General didn't announce it until yesterday, by which 17 more states had signed on.

Since 1998, the number of little cigars sold in the United States has doubled, to about 4 billion a year, according to the Cigar Association of America, the industry trade and lobby group.

"We think that is no accident," Roach said. "We think these are being marketed in a way to get around the tax and marketing restrictions on cigarettes."

A spokesman for the Tax and Trade Bureau said the agency can write rules so there is a "bright line" drawn between cigarettes and little cigars but that the release of the rules is months away at best. Several tobacco companies and the cigar trade association also have asked the bureau to clarify the definition of the two products, industry and government officials said yesterday. Makers of "little cigars" want to make sure they are not subject to legal attacks that they are really marketing cigarettes.

Both sides agree that there is a legitimate category of cigars known as little cigars and that a clearer line has to be made between those products and cigarettes. They differ, however, on how to do that.

Norman F. Sharp, president of the Cigar Association of America, said the attorneys general are confused on many facts. "Little cigars are not cigarettes and, over the long term, they have never been substitutable for cigarettes," he told New Jersey legislators at a hearing this month. "They represent the cigar industry's attempt to give satisfaction to cigar smokers, not an attempt to attract cigarette smokers."

Representatives of four nonprofit groups -- the American Heart Association, Americans for Nonsmokers Rights, the American Lung Association and the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids -- disagreed. "Many of these 'little cigars' are blatantly aimed at our children," they said in a joint statement in support of the 40 states' filing. "They are cheaper and more affordable to kids than regular cigarettes because they have lower excise tax rates, and they are often sold individually rather than in packs because their classification exempts them from state laws setting minimum pack sizes for cigarettes."

Cigars are harmful, said Matthew Myers of the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids, but they generally are smoked less frequently than cigarettes and their smoke often is not inhaled. The products being marketed as "little cigars" are often smoked frequently and the smoke is inhaled like that from cigarettes, he said.

The little-cigar industry's retail value is about $360 million a year, Sharp said. In contrast, 380 billion cigarettes are sold each year, with retail value of more than $80 billion.

Miller, the Iowa attorney general, said that while the sales of little cigars are low compared with those of cigarettes, their growth rate in recent years, if it continues, could undo the reduction in overall smoking that the 1998 agreement achieved.

FBI: Shooting Was Part Of Sting (CHIT)

By Tom Rybarczyk And Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporters

DOJ_NMG_0029139

Chicago Tribune, May 19, 2006

An FBI-orchestrated weapons buy in a Dolton parking lot went awry late Wednesday, leading to the fatal shooting of an informant who was wearing a wire and being watched by surveillance teams, officials said.

Timothy Forrest, 41, of Dolton was shot in the head at about 9 p.m. Wednesday in his car, which was parked outside a currency exchange at Lincoln Avenue and Sibley Boulevard, officials said.

FBI agents watched as the man meeting Forrest exited his vehicle and got into Forrest's car. They did not suspect anything amiss until the man hurried away and drove off, officials said.

The suspect's name was known to investigators, who captured him more than 10 hours later at a house in Alsip. He was being held for questioning Thursday night, and while FBI officials have identified him, the Tribune is withholding his name because no charges have been filed.

Forrest was married, a longtime Dolton resident and a former Cook County correctional officer. He had been accused of transporting stolen DVDs and that federal case was pending.

FBI Special Agent Tom Simon said every safety precaution was taken as the weapons buy was set up, but events like this happen "once every blue moon."

"During the meeting, the FBI surveillance team had no indication that there were any problems with the meeting until they saw [the suspect] leave the car in a hurry," Simon said.

"The surveillance team immediately went up to the car and saw that Mr. Forrest had been shot. ... It's important to understand that with a meeting like this, there are inherent risks."

FBI spokesman Frank Bochte confirmed that Forrest was wearing a wire but said the gunshots were inaudible to those listening. Veteran agents tried to call Forrest on his cell phone before rushing to the car, he said.

Simon said, "The plan was never to pounce on [the suspect] the second he left the car. The plan was to go up to [Forrest] once the coast was clear."

Forrest died of multiple gunshot wounds, and his death was ruled a homicide, said a Cook County medical examiner's office spokesman.

Dolton police, the FBI and the South Suburban Major Crimes Task Force are investigating, Dolton spokesman Sean Howard said.

"We don't have a motive and once again we are working hand in hand with the FBI," Howard said.

Law enforcement sources said there appeared to be a link between Forrest's shooting and his federal court case.

Simon said the slaying would be prosecuted by the Cook County state's attorney's office, not by federal prosecutors.

FBI officials would not comment on how Forrest became an informant and neither would his defense attorney, Neil Cohen, who represented him on the charges of conspiring to transport stolen DVDs from Memphis to Chicago in July 2004.

According to the federal indictment, Forrest rented a truck from Chicago and drove to Memphis to pick up 14 pallets of stolen DVDs. He initially was charged in Cook County with theft of more than $500,000, but the case was superseded by the federal indictment.

Forrest and two co-defendants then transported the merchandise to Chicago before he was arrested, authorities said. The case was pending, Cohen said.

"He was a very decent guy, a non-violent man," Cohen said. "His wife is shocked and bereaved, and we're awaiting the results of the FBI investigation."

His attorney did not know what Forrest did for a living, but Cook County sheriff's employment records show that he previously worked as a correctional officer at the Cook County jail from 1997 until resigning in September 2004.

Forrest's mother, Rosa Price, said she did not want to talk about her son's involvement with the FBI.

"I loved him with all my heart, soul, mind and body," Price said. "And he is gone. I don't know what else I can tell you."

This is at least the second death of an informant under FBI surveillance in the last three years in the south suburbs. In June 2003, cocaine kingpin Otis Moore shot himself in the mouth outside the Chicago Heights Police Station. The FBI planned to have Moore tape conversations with another drug dealer.

Sentencing Delayed In FBI Sting Drug Case (PROJO)

By Mike Stanton

The Providence Journal, May 19, 2006

PROVIDENCE -- The tortured case of Alan Blamires, the mob associate caught guarding a shipment of cocaine in an undercover FBI sting, encountered another detour yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0029140

Having pleaded guilty to conspiracy, a handcuffed Blamires was led into federal court, expecting to be sentenced for his crime. Since his arrest in January 2005, he has been held without bail at the Wyatt Detention Center in Central Falls.

But some confusion over the value of cooperation that Blamires, 50, of Johnston, has provided the authorities prompted Chief U.S. District Judge Ernest C. Torres, reluctantly, to postpone the sentencing.

This was not the first detour in U.S. v. Blamires. Last summer, a plea deal fell apart after Blamires told Torres that he was "fuzzy and blurry" from medication that he took to control his violent tendencies, and didn't understand the charges against him.

During that court hearing, Blamires also blurted out that he had "pertinent information" regarding lawyer Joseph Bevilacqua, but that prosecutors wouldn't talk to him.

U.S. Attorney Kenneth P. Madden said that he would be happy to talk to Blamires, but only after he pleaded guilty.

Finally, after a competency review and a guilty plea earlier this year, Blamires had his sit-down with Madden, an FBI agent and a Providence police detective.

Madden declined to say after yesterday's hearing what information Blamires provided, or whether it concerned Bevilacqua, the son of the late Rhode Island Supreme Court chief justice. A government motion detailing Blamires' information is sealed.

Bevilacqua is serving an 18-month federal prison term for leaking an undercover FBI videotape to television reporter Jim Taricani in a Providence City Hall corruption case, and has also been a target of an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

Madden told Torres that the information Blamires provided was "historical," and would probably not be of much use to investigators in pursuing future cases.

"There were one or two pieces of information that I hadn't known . . . but given the age of the information, there's nothing to be gained for current use," said Madden.

Nevertheless, Madden said, the government was willing to give Blamires "the benefit of the doubt" and recommend that he be sentenced to less than the mandatory minimum of 120 months, or 10 years. Madden recommended 108 months, while Blamires' lawyer, Richard K. Corley, urged the judge to go lower.

That prompted Torres to question the criteria that he could consider in fashioning a sentence. He asked the lawyers to file memoranda within 10 days.

Blamires is the last of three defendants to be sentenced following guilty pleas to charges related to guarding the cocaine shipment at a Cranston hotel on Jan. 18, 2005.

Matthew L. Guglielmetti Jr., a capo regime in the Patriarca crime family, is serving a 136-month prison term after admitting to his role in recruiting Blamires and Anthony P. Moscarelli to guard 67 kilograms of cocaine that was supposedly passing through Rhode Island. Moscarelli is serving a 96-month sentence.

Guglielmetti was working for an undercover FBI agent who was posing as a drug dealer.

The case grew out of a larger undercover investigation in which an FBI agent posing as a businessman operated a construction business with Guglielmetti as a silent partner, probing alleged corruption in the Rhode Island construction world.

When Guglielmetti, Blamires and Moscarelli were arrested last year, authorities also searched offices of the Laborers' International Union in Providence and a New England Laborers' training fund and its administrator, state Sen. Dominick J. Ruggerio.

No charges have been brought in connection with that phase of the investigation. Asked after yesterday's hearing if authorities will move forward once Blamires is finally sentenced, prosecutor Madden replied, "I can't talk about the Laborers'."

4 Officers Receive National Honors (PROJO)

By Gregory Smith, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, May 19, 2006

Three officers from Providence and one from East Providence are honored for their invesitgation of the Latin Kings gang.

PROVIDENCE -- Three police investigators from Providence and one from East Providence who teamed up in a long-running drug case to apprehend 26 members of the Almighty Latin Kings Nation gang are among the TOP COPS in America.

That is what the National Association of Police Organizations thinks of Lt. Thomas A. Verdi and investigators Robert Colanduono and Robert M. Enright, all of Providence, and investigator Karl R. "Jake" Jacobson of East Providence.

The association, an advocacy group that includes police labor unions and citizens, annually gives out a handful of awards for police work above and beyond the call of duty.

It treated the four police officers and 19 other honorees to a Hollywood-style awards ceremony at the Warner Theatre in Washington, D.C., last weekend.

The highlight of the ceremony, which featured the stars of TV law enforcement shows as master of ceremonies and award presenters, were sometimes dramatic video reenactments of the winners' crimebusting exploits.

DOJ_NMG_0029141

"You watched the audience go from tears to cheers," Verdi said, as first the crimes were shown in each of 10 reenacted cases, one of which included the murder of a police officer in another state, and ultimately the arrests.

One of the honorees was a New York City police officer who donated a kidney to a former partner.

Verdi said it was a privilege to be honored, given the caliber of the other winners' achievements.

"It was humbling," he said.

In the real-life police case in Rhode Island dubbed Operation Royal Flush, in which a slew of federal and state law enforcement agencies cooperated in 2003-2004, the Providence police made the largest single seizure of cocaine in department history in 2004: Nearly 23 kilos worth an estimated $575,000, which had been stashed in a minivan.

Operation Royal Flush was heavily dependent on wiretaps of more than 32,000 telephone calls among Latin King gang members. Investigators heard gang members speaking in code, which they partially deciphered.

"It was characterized by a lot of on-the-street surveillance, and we would take turns in the wire room," listening to wiretapped conversations, which could be, at turns, funny, serious and tedious duty, Jacobson said last night.

Taking a break from tailing a criminal suspect in another case, Jacobson said in an interview on his cell phone that it was difficult to penetrate a Hispanic gang such as the Latin Kings because they enrolled members at a young age. It would have been no easy matter to have infiltrated it with a Hispanic undercover officer, he said.

"It takes a lot of money to do a wiretap," said Jacobson, who expressed appreciation for the federal and state support of the probe. He paid tribute to the work of, among others, three members of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration: Special Agents Anthony Cardello and Kathleen Kelleher and intelligence analyst Andrea Metz.

The National Association of Police Organizations said the winners from Providence and East Providence "spent innumerable hours with dedicated precision to ensure the end to a lawless and brutal regime called the Almighty Latin King Nation. . . ."

The investigation took 11 months and dominated the lives of the officers involved.

"During my 18 years [in policing] there have been many terrific moments, but being nominated for this prestigious award culminates my lifelong dream," Colanduono said in a statement. "My wife, Tracey, has ate, drank and slept this case as much, if not more, than I. She is my sounding board and backbone; her sacrifice and unending love made it all worthwhile."

Providence Mayor David N. Cicilline hailed the three Providence officers for "their extraordinary police work" and for removing dangerous drugs from city neighborhoods.

The four officers have been honored previously for the Latin Kings case: The Providence trio received the Chief's Award and Jacobson was given the Exceptional Service Award.

In reconstructing Operation Royal Flush for the video at the ceremony, the producers used surveillance video from the investigation and did on-camera interviews with the investigators at places in Providence that figured into the case.

The master of ceremonies for the awards -- the registered trademark is TOP COPS Award -- was John Walsh, host of the Fox TV show America's Most Wanted, and the award presenter for the four Rhode Islanders was actor Jeremy Ratchford, who portrays a detective on the CBS police drama Cold Case.

A 14-member committee that included Ed Meese, former U.S. attorney general; Stacie Dotson, a forensic identification specialist for the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children; and David Holway, president of the International Brotherhood of Police Officers, selected the winners.

Feds Bust Man In New Castle Drug Sales (PPG)

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, May 19, 2006

A man who federal authorities say has been selling large amounts of cocaine for years in New Castle was arrested this week.

Dion Mercer, 37, has been charged with one count of conspiracy to distribute more than 5 kilograms of cocaine and more than 50 grams of crack.

According to a six-page affidavit filed by a Drug Enforcement Administration agent, Mr. Mercer has been selling large quantities of cocaine for four years.

Mr. Mercer was convicted of drug trafficking in federal court in 1997. In that case, he cooperated with officials to receive a reduced sentence. At the time of this week's arrest, he was on federal supervised release as well as state parole from drug charges.

DEA Agent Larry Forletta said in the affidavit that the case is based on interviews he had with at least nine people involved in drug dealing with Mr. Mercer, a controlled crack buy by a confidential informant, a phone trace on his cell phone and surveillance.

DOJ_NMG_0029142

"We have attempted to do surveillance on Mercer numerous times," Agent Forletta wrote. "He is very conscious of surveillance and routinely conducts counter-surveillance."

The affidavit outlines one instance on May 2, when Mr. Mercer was meeting with Ricky Pinkins, who'd just been released from prison on a murder charge.

"After the meeting ended, Pinkins was observed traveling at a high rate of speed," wrote Agent Forletta. "We believe Mercer detected our surveillance because after noticing my car near the scene where he was meeting with Pinkins [he had detected my vehicle on a prior surveillance], he began to chase me through the streets of New Castle."

According to Agent Forletta's sources, Mr. Mercer used his mother's home on Raymond Avenue for his business, as well as a wooded area behind the Crestview Garden complex.

Mr. Mercer's cocaine supply came from Detroit, the agent wrote in the affidavit.

Though the U.S. attorney's office said this case is unrelated, in February, officials from the state attorney general's office announced charges against 27 adults and one juvenile in a crack cocaine ring that involved gangs from Detroit moving into New Castle to take over local crack sales.

The U.S. attorney's office wouldn't say whether this is an ongoing investigation or whether more arrests are expected.

Mr. Mercer remains in federal custody pending a preliminary hearing Monday.

Second Hearing On Detroit Drug-Search Case Shows Deep Divisions On Supreme Court (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — It did not take very long during the Supreme Court's final argument of its term on Thursday to see why the court had decided to schedule a second hearing in this less-than-monumental case about a search for illegal drugs in a Detroit home.

The justices were deeply engaged, and deeply split.

It is a logical inference that they were deadlocked at 4 to 4 after the first argument on Jan. 9, and that it is now up to Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who took his seat later that month, to break the tie.

But that is not necessarily the case; any Supreme Court decision is a work in progress until it is issued. "I may have my mind made up, but I'm open to change," Justice Stephen G. Breyer told Timothy A. Baughman, a lawyer from the Wayne County, Mich., prosecutor's office who argued for the state.

Nonetheless, Justice Breyer proceeded to make it clear that he remained unpersuaded by Mr. Baughman's argument that the Michigan Court of Appeals was correct in refusing to exclude from Booker T. Hudson's trial the drugs the police found when they executed a search warrant by bursting into his home without knocking or waiting for him to open the apparently unlocked door.

This means of entry violated the "knock and announce" rule that modern Supreme Court precedents have made part of the current understanding of the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of unreasonable search and seizure. There was no dispute that the Detroit officers' action violated the rule. The question for the justices was what consequences should flow from the violation.

"A child of 2," Justice Breyer told the prosecutor, would know that the officers' sudden entry made it more likely that they would find the incriminating evidence. To permit evidence found in these circumstances to be admitted at trial would be "to let a computer virus loose in the Fourth Amendment," he said.

Justice Alito had no questions for Mr. Baughman, but he asked questions of the defendant's lawyer, David A. Moran, that suggested some sympathy for the state's position.

Justice Alito asked Mr. Moran to assume that the police had waited 10 seconds before entering, rather than the 3 or 4 seconds that they actually waited after they announced their presence through the closed door. The Supreme Court's precedents have suggested that 15 to 20 seconds is the appropriate delay. Would excluding the evidence "be in any way proportionate" if the police were only "slightly on the wrong side of the line?" Justice Alito asked.

Perhaps not if it was really that close, as opposed to the "flagrant violation" in this case, Mr. Moran replied. The rule that illegally seized evidence should be excluded was meant to deter the police from violating the Constitution in the first place, he said. "Is there any method of deterrence other than teaching by example?" he asked.

What about telling police officers that they will not be promoted if they violate suspects' rights, Justice Antonin Scalia wanted to know. His suggestion appeared more rhetorical than serious, serving along with a number of his other interjections to make it clear that he was on the state's side in the case, Hudson v. Michigan, No. 04-1360.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. also appeared firmly in the state's camp. He asked Mr. Moran, who is associate dean of Wayne State University Law School in Detroit, what difference it would have made had the police waited 15 or 20 seconds instead of 3 or 4 after announcing their presence.

DOJ_NMG_0029143

Mr. Hudson would have left the chair where he was sitting and admitted the officers, Mr. Moran said.

Why make that assumption, the chief justice wanted to know, observing that the police found a loaded gun and crack cocaine at Mr. Hudson's seat. Would Mr. Hudson really have exclaimed, "Oh, it's the police, let's see what they want?" Chief Justice Roberts asked.

Mr. Hudson was found guilty of drug possession and was sentenced to 18 months' probation.

The federal government, entering the case on behalf of the state, argued in a brief filed by the solicitor general's office that "suppression is too high a price to pay for a particular violation when the causal link between the violation and the acquisition of evidence is weak, nonexistent, or irrelevant."

Justice David H. Souter told David B. Salmons, an assistant solicitor general, that "if we accept your argument," the knock-and-announce rule "is a dead letter" because it would so often be difficult to prove that an illegal entry led to discovery of a particular piece of evidence.

Justice Souter, whose sympathy for the defense was clear, said that requiring such a link ignored an important reason for the knock-and-announce rule: "that there is enough respect for a person's privacy to say that the police should not barge in like an invading army."

Privacy Case May Rest On Alito Vote (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

The Supreme Court heard a rare mid-May oral argument yesterday, on the authority of police to search private homes without knocking first -- in a major privacy-rights case likely to be decided by the vote of the court's newest member, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

At issue in Hudson v. Michigan , No. 04-1360, is the "knock and announce" rule rooted both in the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution and Anglo-American common law. The rule says that, in normal cases, police with a search warrant must knock and state their purpose, then wait a reasonable period for an answer, before forcing their way in.

Most federal and state courts that considered the question have said courts must exclude evidence seized by police who did not follow the rule. But in recent years, the Michigan Supreme Court has joined the minority that says no such "exclusionary rule" is required.

When the court first heard oral argument on Jan. 9, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was still on the bench. But O'Connor stepped down before the court could issue its opinion.

The court then announced it would hear arguments again. It gave no reason, but since it could have issued a decision if there were still five votes for one side without O'Connor, the most probable explanation is that the court was divided 4 to 4 and needed Alito, a former prosecutor who built a strong pro-police record as a federal appeals judge, to break the tie.

Liberals on the court openly worried that Michigan's approach would carry the day -- effectively gutting the "knock and announce" rule and, potentially, other restrictions on police searches.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer said that if the court rules in Michigan's favor, "we'd let a kind of computer virus loose in the Fourth Amendment. I don't know what the consequences would be."

Michigan courts upheld the 2002 drug possession conviction of Booker T. Hudson Jr., ruling that the officers who burst into his Detroit home three to five seconds after crying "Police! Search Warrant!" would have found crack cocaine in his jeans even if they had knocked and waited.

Under a 1999 Michigan Supreme Court ruling, defendants such as Hudson can prevail if only they show that the police's failure to knock directly caused the discovery of the evidence.

Michigan does not dispute that the officers technically violated the "knock and announce" rule. It argues, rather, that since they had a warrant, their presence in the house was legal even if the way they got inside was not.

Michigan also argues that the "knock and announce" rule can be adequately enforced by private lawsuits for damages against the police, or by internal police discipline -- a position echoed by the Bush administration, which supports Michigan.

But David A. Moran, a lawyer for Hudson -- who is also backed by the American Civil Liberties Union, the libertarian Cato Institute and the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers -- told the court that only the threat of excluding evidence is enough to protect citizens from the shock and embarrassment of a sudden police raid.

"People should have the right to answer the door in a dignified manner," Moran said.

Alito posed few questions, but those that he did ask implied that he sympathized with the state.

He asked Moran what difference it would have made in the case if the officers had waited 10 seconds before going in -- that is, more than the three to five seconds they waited, but fewer than the 15 seconds Moran proposed as a minimum.

For such a small violation, Alito asked, "Why would suppression [of the evidence] be proportional?"

DOJ_NMG_0029144

Moran explained that the exclusionary rule was needed for deterrence, but his response did not satisfy Alito.

"You've contradicted your premise," the justice told him.

This contrasted with the tone O'Connor struck during the Jan. 9 argument, in which she suggested to Michigan's lawyer, Timothy A. Baughman, that "if the rule you proposed is adopted, then every police officer in America can follow the same policy. Is there no policy of protecting the homeowner a little bit, and the sanctity of the home from this immediate entry?"

A decision is expected by July.

IMMIGRATION:

More Suspected Illegals Held (CINE)

By Jim Hannah

Cincinnati Enquirer, May 19, 2006

FORT MITCHELL – U.S. Marshals have detained more suspected illegal aliens as part of an ongoing investigation into the use of laborers in Northern Kentucky's home-building industry.

Five or six suspected undocumented workers were arrested Wednesday afternoon at Fountains at Lakeside Park apartments in the 2500 block of Kirkland Court. (The complex was formally known as Lakeside Village.)

Fort Mitchell police Chief Steve Hensley said his officers found the suspected illegal aliens while helping federal agents serve a search warrant at one of the apartments. Hensley said officers didn't go to the apartment specifically looking for illegal aliens.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials and the U.S. Marshals Service couldn't immediately be reached for comment.

Last week, 76 suspected illegal aliens were arrested as part of the two-year investigation. Two apartment complexes in Boone County have previously been raided along with several construction sites.

The corporate headquarters of the Crestview Hills-based Fischer Homes was also raided by federal agents last week. The builder denied any wrongdoing, but four of its construction site supervisors were charged with harboring illegal aliens.

Some of the suspected illegal aliens arrested last week are scheduled to appear Friday in U.S. District Court in Covington.

Bush Now Favors Some Fencing Along Border (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

YUMA, Ariz., May 18 — President Bush traveled on Thursday to a blistering stretch of scrub land surrounding the nation's busiest Border Patrol station and declared that he supported fencing some but not all of America's 1,950-mile border with Mexico.

"It makes sense to use fencing along the border in key locations in order to do our job," Mr. Bush said in a speech at the headquarters of the Yuma Sector Border Patrol. "We're in the process of making our border the most technologically advanced border in the world."

Mr. Bush has in the past indicated he is opposed to fencing, and White House officials were kept busy on Thursday trying to explain the change in his position. Tony Snow, the new White House press secretary, told reporters on Air Force One that the White House supported a Senate amendment, passed on Wednesday, that would build 370 miles of fence in areas most often used by smugglers and illegal workers.

"We don't think you fence off the entire border," Mr. Snow said. But, he added, "there are places when fences are appropriate."

Earlier on Thursday, Mr. Bush sent a letter to Congress requesting $1.9 billion to pay for putting up to 6,000 more National Guard troops on the border with Mexico. The troops were the main news in his immigration speech on Monday.

The request for money and Mr. Bush's tough words on fencing amounted to his latest effort to win over House conservatives who want an immigration bill focused on strengthening border security instead of a temporary guest worker program favored by the Senate. Mr. Bush likes the Senate plan, which would give most of the nation's 11 million illegal immigrants a chance to become American citizens, but he is trying to meld both approaches into a single bill that he hopes will be the major legislation of his remaining two years as president.

"Our country is a country of laws, and we've got to enforce our laws," Mr. Bush said at the Border Patrol headquarters, where outside temperatures reached 104 degrees. "But we're also a nation of immigrants. And we've got to remember that proud tradition, as well, which has strengthened our country in many ways."

Mr. Bush said that he believed a temporary worker program would reduce the number of people trying to enter the country illegally. Hundreds of Mexicans have died in the heat in recent years trying to enter the country through the Sonoran Desert, between Yuma in the west and Nogales, Ariz., to the east. Since October 2005, the Yuma sector of the Border Patrol, which stretches for some 125 miles along the desert boundary between the United States and Mexico, has reported 17 deaths.

"I understand there are many people on the other side of the border who will do anything to come and work," Mr. Bush said. "And that includes risking their life crossing your desert, or being willing to be stuffed in the back of an 18-wheeler."

The president was met here by Gov. Janet Napolitano of Arizona, and then toured a dirt field a few hundred feet from the border, where there were five watch towers and a fence of corrugated metal about 20 feet high.

After the tour, Mr. Bush gave back-to-back interviews of three to five minutes each to five broadcast and cable networks — CNN, Fox, NBC, ABC, CBS — to press his immigration plan.

Bush Says Border Fencing Makes Sense (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

The AP, May 18, 2006

President Bush peered across this hot, dusty and very busy illegal crossing point on Thursday, hoping to offer conservatives balking at a broad immigration bill firsthand evidence that he's serious about tightening the nation's 2,000-mile border with Mexico.

He said fences would help stop people from sneaking into the United States.

The president showed off a section of the border that is seeing a rising tide of illegal immigrants and other smuggling. The United States is responding with increased manpower — including help from the National Guard — and a newly beefed-up enforcement zone that features two layers of tall fencing, a concrete culvert, floodlights, watch towers and camera surveillance.

"I think it helps to have the president out here, seeing the part of the area of the country that one time was overrun by people coming in here, that's beginning to get settled down because of a strategy that's being employed," Bush said later in a packed room at the Border Patrol's Yuma Sector headquarters about 30 miles away.

"People's work is making a difference," the president said. "But we do not have full control of the border."

Bush wants a sweeping immigration overhaul that combines enhanced border security measures with a guest worker program.

But he faces stiff resistance from conservative Republicans, particularly in the House, who prefer a get-tough approach and largely oppose a Bush-backed guest worker program, which they see as providing amnesty for criminal behavior. House legislation that passed last year would make all illegal immigrants subject to prosecution as felons.

While the president visited the U.S.-Mexico border, the Senate continued a heated debate over broad legislation that largely does what Bush wants. It includes measures to tighten control over the borders, create a guest worker program and offer a path to citizenship for to many of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in the country.

The Senate voted to make English the national language of the United States. Moments later, it voted to say that English was a "common and unifying language."

"The Senate needs to get the bill out," Bush said.

Eager to win over conservative opponents, the president has been talking increasingly tough. On Monday, he proposed deploying up to 6,000 National Guard troops along the international line to support Border Patrol agents until their ranks can be expanded.

On Thursday, he said it makes sense to put up fencing along some parts of the border.

Bush did not declare his support for either of Congress' two competing proposals — one approved by the House that would build 700 miles of fencing and a provision in the Senate bill that would build half that. Instead, he said the decision should be up to the Border Patrol.

"It makes sense to use fencing along the border in key locations in order to do our job," he said,

The president has talked repeatedly about the wisdom of walling the border in urban areas but has also signaled opposition to widespread fencing — which is hotly opposed by his ally, Mexican President Vicente Fox. Bush told Fox News, in one of five television interviews he granted while visiting the border to further press his message: "Whatever works."

Bush also defended those who oppose his immigration proposal against criticism that there is an element of racism to their stance.

"I think it would be too harsh a judgment to say that somebody who doesn't support a comprehensive immigration plan is a racist," the president told CNN. "I don't believe that. I do believe citizens have got legitimate concerns, realizing that parts of this border have been open for anybody who wants to come across."

Bush's motorcade took him to a section of 6.9 miles of fencing that guard this area, the nation's busiest immigrant-smuggling hot spot. The president climbed up to a berm overlooking the 150-foot-wide border enforcement zone, which has recently added a new secondary fence of chain links and razor wire to a 20-foot-tall wall of corrugated metal. Guided by Border Patrol officials and Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, the president also reviewed a line of Border Patrol vehicles and display booths.

He also had a close encounter with the Washington debate, as he was joined on Air Force One by Arizona Republican lawmakers who have taken sharply different positions in the debate. Rep. J.D. Hayworth (news, bio, voting record) advocates doing anything possible to close the nation's porous border, while Republican Reps. Jeff Flake and Jim Kolbe teamed up to sponsor guest worker legislation similar to Bush's proposal.

The president suggested he got an earful from his guests, telling his audience in Yuma that the group is "a good bunch — a little rambunctious at times."

Meanwhile, Lt. Gen. Clyde A. Vaughn, chief of the Army National Guard, said Guard members from hurricane states will not be expected to contribute troops to the border effort until the end of the storm season.

Bush Backs 370-mile Fence Along Border (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, May 19, 2006

YUMA, Ariz. -- The Bush administration announced yesterday it supported the Senate amendment calling for 370 miles of fence along the U.S.-Mexico border, marking the first time it is has endorsed a specific amount of fencing.

But White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters traveling on Air Force One yesterday he would not get into a discussion on whether the Bush administration would also support the fence proposed in last year's House bill, which calls for 698 miles of fence to be built.

Hours later, after touring a section of the border at San Luis, Ariz., President Bush told an audience here at the U.S. Border Patrol station in Yuma that fences make sense -- in some cases.

"We saw some new fencing taking place. It makes sense to use fencing along the border in key locations in order to do our job," Mr. Bush said.

The administration yesterday sent to Congress a $1.9 billion immigration spending request, covering 1,000 of the 6,000 new Border Patrol agents Mr. Bush says will be hired over the next two years, and paying for temporary deployment of the 6,000 National Guard troops the president called for Monday.

He also gave his strongest praise yet of the full proposal now in the Senate, calling it "a good immigration bill." That bill includes a right to citizenship for illegal aliens who have been in the country more than two years, and a future foreign worker program that would also offer a path to citizenship -- something Mr. Bush's own proposal does not do.

Some members of Congress, in looking over the new spending request, said Mr. Bush was late in realizing the need for more border enforcement.

"Let me get this straight: when it comes to border security, the president was against it before he was for it," said Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, reprising a line that haunted Sen. John Kerry during the 2004 presidential campaign.

Mr. Byrd said Mr. Bush had opposed the senator's efforts to boost immigration enforcement spending nine times since 2002, and questioned whether Mr. Bush is now sincere in his commitment.

"If we had spent that money beginning in 2002, we would not be calling on the National Guard today," he said.

The announcements on the Guard and fences also have irked Mexican officials. Foreign Minister Luis Ernesto Derbez yesterday told reporters in Mexico City that his government would send a protest note to the U.S. about both proposals.

"There are 12 million Mexicans on the other side, 12 million people who live every day in anguish about the need for a reform to let them live peacefully," Mr. Derbez said. Later yesterday, the foreign ministers of Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and Costa Rica joined Mr. Derbez in Mexico City to denounce the proposed fences.

For his part yesterday, Mr. Bush spent time inspecting both a section of the international border with Mexico and the communications center at the Border Patrol station before giving a short speech on immigration.

Strikingly, the part of the border the president chose to review does have fencing -- a two-layer fence, with a 20-foot-high corrugated metal fence right on the border line and a secondary chain-link fence with barbed wire strands at the top set 150 feet back. The chain-link fence is just months old, according to Border Patrol agents and residents here.

A road runs between the two fences, and is both patrolled by the Border Patrol and monitored by video so agents can detect illegal crossings.

The president wanted to get a look at both the border and National Guard troops who are already operating in the area doing the same sorts of tasks he wants his 6,000 new troops to do: building roads and laying foundations for high-intensity lights the Border Patrol will use.

But the area he chose also shows how far the government has to go until the border is secure. Illegal alien apprehensions in the Yuma Sector are up 12 percent this fiscal year to date, compared with the same time in fiscal year 2005. So far this year in the Yuma Sector, in addition to the apprehensions, the Border Patrol has rescued 280 persons in distress and found another 17 dead.

The Yuma Border Patrol station regularly records more apprehensions on a daily basis than any other station, said Supervisory Agent Richard T. Hays. He also said criminal smuggling organizations operate from the neighborhood just over the fence from where Mr. Bush stood yesterday.

The area is one of the few along the border here that has fencing. The Yuma Station -- one of three stations in the Yuma Sector -- has just 6.9 miles of fencing in its 65 miles of Mexican border.

Both the administration and the Border Patrol say fencing doesn't make sense everywhere. Instead, Mr. Bush has called for a "virtual fence," saying there is no way to fence off the entire border.

The Senate on Wednesday passed an amendment calling for 370 miles of fence to be built in places where there are many illegal crossings.

"We supported the amendment," Mr. Snow said yesterday -- the first time the administration has backed a specific mile figure.

"I don't think anybody has seriously proposed building a wall across the entire border. What the president has said is he's going to try to have the right and appropriate types of security in the right places," Mr. Snow said.

Asked about the difference between that and the House bill, Mr. Snow said that was getting too far ahead of the process and the Senate must first act to pass its bill.

Still, fencing is so popular that the National Republican Senatorial Committee yesterday sent out press releases criticizing Democrats up for re-election who voted against the fence amendment.

Bush Trip To Border Turns Debate On Immigration Toward Security (WSJ)

By June Kronholz, Sarah Lueck And Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

The Senate reaffirmed the broad outlines of its guest-worker plan, as President Bush toured a stretch of the Arizona border to underline his promises to stanch the flow of illegal immigrants.

In a day otherwise devoted to fine-tuning the Senate's sweeping immigration overhaul, the chamber effectively killed a proposal to prevent guest-workers from eventually becoming U.S. citizens. The 58-to-35 vote was a victory for supporters of the Senate legislation, as they protected one of its central features.

Mr. Bush asked Congress for $1.9 billion to pay for border agents, fencing, detention facilities and monitoring equipment along the border, and gave some details about how National Guard will be used to bolster border security.

His trip to Yuma, Ariz., and the request for emergency border-control funds helped shift at least temporarily the debate from amnesty to border enforcement. Mr. Bush has largely endorsed a Senate bill that would give permanent residence to most of the 12 million illegal immigrants in the country, provoking outrage from many conservative Republicans.

But almost no one disagrees with Mr. Bush that the border needs reinforcing, and the president made a further bow to his conservative base by supporting a Senate call to build a fence along more than 300 miles of the 1,951-mile border.

In remarks to Border Patrol agents and Arizona politicians, Mr. Bush made a clear attempt to address the biggest criticisms of the Senate bill. He emphasized that guest workers would have to return to their home countries when their time in the U.S. came to an end and stressed that allowing some illegal immigrants to become citizens if they met a long list of criteria didn't amount to amnesty. "Amnesty is automatic citizenship," he said, noting that isn't what he supports.

Meanwhile, Mr. Bush rejected one of the core demands of his critics: the forced deportation of the entire illegal immigrant community.

The Yuma trip was intended to illustrate the Border Patrol's progress in turning back would-be illegal immigrants, but it highlighted how tough it is to seal the border. Mr. Bush drove under heavy security to the frontier, where he toured a new stretch of fencing overseen by guard towers. Administration aides noted that units of the Ohio and Pennsylvania Air National Guard helped build access roads and lay the foundation for high-intensity lighting elsewhere along the border.

Meanwhile, the Senate spent the day on a series of fine-tuning amendments that left intact the central features of the immigration bill, including the legalization process and a guest-worker plan that would give visas to 200,000 temporary workers a year.

The day's most emotional debate was over English as the national language. After long debate, senators agreed by a 63-34 vote that people aren't generally entitled to receive information from the government in Spanish. Then it passed a milder Democratic alternative making English the nation's "common and unifying" language.

English-language measures have surfaced often in recent years. The issue is a favorite of cultural conservatives who fear the spread of Spanish and are particularly nervous about the millions of Hispanics who would be offered eventual citizenship under the Senate plan.

By a 50-49 vote, senators decided against limiting the Social Security benefits of illegal immigrants who contribute to the program using fake numbers. They agreed to charge $750 to illegal immigrants applying for citizenship and use the funds to reimburse state and local governments for health-care and education costs.

Senators refined details of possible amnesty and guest-worker programs. They dropped wording that would have allowed immigrants to attest that they had lived and worked in the U.S. long enough to qualify for residency without providing any proof.

They reversed a vote Wednesday that would have prevented guest workers from petitioning for permanent status and would have left that prerogative up to their employers. Yesterday's measure guarantees temporary workers the right to join unions.

President Tours The U.S.- Mexican Border (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

YUMA, Ariz. — Declaring that "we do not have full control of the border," President Bush on Thursday visited an area where arrests — and deaths — of would-be immigrants have risen dramatically, and he urged the Senate to complete work on immigration legislation by the end of the month.

The president spent about an hour inspecting the arid and stark border, marked by a 20-foot-tall corrugated metal structure, an eight-foot chain-link fence topped by razor-sharp concertina wire, powerful lights, watchtowers and video cameras — an ever-growing low- and high-tech arsenal deployed in a sector where the Border Patrol says the most apprehensions have occurred.

Then, speaking to officers at their headquarters about 20 miles north of the border, Bush said that 6,000 National Guard troops were needed to help secure the border while the Border Patrol is beefed up over the next two years because "the need to enforce the border is urgent."

"It's time to get immediate results," Bush said.

The president's daylong journey, three days after he announced the National Guard deployment, was designed to highlight his newly emphasized commitment to the immigration issue.

But he is caught between those — including some governors — who argue that border duty would overtax the National Guard, which has sent many units to Iraq and is also designated to deal with disasters at home, and those who are demanding a more muscular effort along the border. Some critics have also expressed concern that the border is becoming militarized.

"The Guard will operate surveillance and communications systems. They will install fences and vehicle barriers. They're going to help build patrol roads, they will analyze intelligence, they will help spot people. But the Border Patrol will be involved in direct law enforcement," Bush said.

Seeking to draw attention to his call for broad legislation to overhaul the immigration laws, rather than on proposals to just clamp down on illegal border crossings, Bush sat in near-100-degree heat for five consecutive television interviews, with the chain-link fence to his left and a Border Patrol vehicle behind him.

The president flew nearly nine hours round trip, covering about 4,400 miles, for the roughly three-hour visit to the southwest corner of Arizona. He was accompanied by Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, a Democrat who has largely supported his new immigration efforts; David Aguilar, the chief of the Border Patrol, and the patrol's local chief, Ron Colburn.

He spent about 10 minutes in a barren field in the town of San Luis, a few hundred feet from the international border, touring the area in a two-seat dune buggy.

Richard T. Hays, a supervising Border Patrol agent, told White House pool reporters that before the chain-link fence, lights and cameras were installed, 70 to 80 people would cross at a time. The new measures have reduced the incursions, he said, although the region remains the patrol's busiest.

In addition to deploying the National Guard and increasing the Border Patrol by 50% beyond its current level of 12,000, the president favors a guest worker program, which would allow immigrants to enter the country legally for a specific period — thus removing the incentive to sneak across the border.

Under the program, Bush said, workers would be required to pass a criminal background check and would be given tamper-proof identification cards.

DOJ_NMG_0029149

He favors giving access to citizenship to those who have lived in the United States for a specified, but as yet unstated, period and have paid taxes and a fine for entering the country illegally.

"This is a rational way to deal with people who are God-fearing, decent people and respect their dignity at the same time," Bush said.

But, he added, "nobody should be given an automatic citizenship — that's called amnesty."

As Bush headed to Yuma Thursday morning, the White House sent to Congress a revision in its $92-billion request for emergency spending, most of it to cover costs associated with the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and the recovery from Hurricane Katrina. Within that amount, it is seeking $1.95 billion to meet the costs of deploying 1,000 new Border Patrol agents, and for fences, lights, and some of the border work of the National Guard.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said the Border Patrol's Yuma sector was "emblematic of what we're talking about in terms of border security."

He told reporters aboard Air Force One: "We've got an area with the fence; we've got Border Patrol there. But also this is an area where National Guardsmen are involved in non-law-enforcement roles."

With increased enforcement along the border in eastern Arizona, there has been a spike in attempts to enter the United States in western Arizona, near Yuma. The 95,000 arrests along the Border Patrol's 125-mile Yuma sector since Oct. 1 represent a 13% increase over the same period a year ago. And deaths in the desert, beyond the fortified zone, were a record 51 in 2005, up from 15 two years earlier.

Anyone crossing the border looking for work would be advised to travel beyond Yuma, a city of nearly 89,000 that has struggled with unemployment for years. A recent improvement has seen the jobless rate drop to 21.8%, from 25.2% in 2002. The biggest employer is the Marine Corps Air Station.

But with a growth rate of 49.7% during the 1990s, it ranked behind only Las Vegas and Naples, Fla., as the fastest-growing metropolitan area in the country.

Bush Takes Border Tour (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, May 19, 2006

YUMA, Ariz. -- Warming up to new congressional plans for additional fencing along the Mexican border, President Bush made a personal inspection of one of the nation's most porous borders on Thursday as part of his stepped up appeal for a more sweeping approach to immigration reform.

"The need to enforce the border is urgent," Bush said in a speech at Border Patrol headquarters here.

"I understand that illegal immigration is a serious problem," said Bush, insisting that the solution must be "comprehensive," including a plan for temporary workers already in the U.S. and new guest workers. "One of our jobs in public office is to fix problems."

With a brief tour of the Border Patrol's Yuma Sector, a 120-mile stretch of desert along the southwestern Arizona border with Mexico where more than 70,000 illegal immigrants were turned back last year, Bush has come to the front line of a debate that has driven a deep wedge within his own party.

As the president presses Congress for reform of the nation's immigration laws, Bush has assumed a potentially perilous political role, with his own public approval ratings already at all-time lows.

Bush is attempting to mediate between the conservative base of the GOP, which has no patience for the president's talk of enabling millions of undocumented immigrants already living in the United States to eventually seek citizenship, and a fast-growing and traditionally Democratic-voting Hispanic population. The president has worked hard to woo Hispanics since his days as Texas governor.

Among the early indicators of Bush's success or failure since carrying his immigration appeal to a national audience with a televised address on Monday: Votes in the Senate this week where conservatives have found more approval for new fencing along the border and tougher sanctions against illegal immigrants than any new support that leaders have mustered for a temporary worker program for undocumented immigrants.

Another indicator: A series of focus groups that Hispanic pollster Sergio Bendixen conducted in Los Angeles this week. Bendixen says the voters he queried are "angry" about Bush's order for National Guard troops along the Mexican border.

"Unfortunately, sometimes when you try to get in the middle of a fight, you get both groups angry with you," Bendixen said. "When it comes to the major players in this debate {ndash} the Hispanic voters on one side, and the native, anti-immigration people on the other side {ndash} he may have hurt himself with both."

Bush is attempting to underscore his bid for conservative support, with the White House signaling on Thursday that it supports a Senate amendment this week to construct about 350 miles of new triple-layer fencing along the border in addition to about 500 miles of vehicle barriers.

"I don't think anybody has seriously proposed building a wall across the entire border," White House press secretary Tony Snow said en route to Arizona. "What the president has said is he's going to try to have the right and appropriate types of security in the right places."

The House, which has approved a border protection-only bill with tough sanctions for illegal immigrants and no provision for the temporary or guest workers that Bush wants, has proposed about 700 miles of fences.

"Whatever works," Bush said in a shirtsleeves interview with Fox News at a border crossing. "It makes sense to use fencing here. It doesn't make sense to use fencing on other parts of the border."

The president, who conducts few interviews, sat for brief border-side talks with each of the television networks covering his trip here. {ndash} a sign of the White House's intentions of making a more direct appeal to Americans.

Among Republicans, in particular, Bush faces a challenge. Republicans are more likely to name immigration as the nation's leading problem (19 percent of those surveyed), according to a May survey of the Pew Research Center. Just 9 percent of independents and 6 percent of Democrats cited immigration first, with many more {ndash} 22 percent of both groups {ndash} citing the war in Iraq.

Yet all the talk of Guardsmen and fencing also has created strains among Hispanic voters, a constituency that Bush has courted heavily, raising his share of the Latino vote from 35 percent in 2000 to 40 percent in winning re-election in 2004.

Hispanics "consider it as almost anti-Hispanic or anti-Mexican," pollster Bendixen says of the National Guard call-up. "They can't see it any other way. They came here to work and take care of their families, and they're asking, 'Why make criminals out of us when all we've done is come here to pick up'" some of the toughest work?

The president came to Yuma, the White House says, because more illegal immigrants have been intercepted along the Arizona border than in any of the other three border states where the National Guard will start rotating forces through three-week tours of duty this summer. Guard forces, already playing a role in communications in Yuma, are to play similar supporting roles elsewhere; the deployment is planned as a "bridge" until the Border Patrol gets the additional agents Bush is seeking.

Bush brought David Aguilar, director of U.S. Customs and Border Protection, for his Yuma sector tour, as well as Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) one of the few conservatives demonstrating an openness to the president's talk of comprehensive reform.

"There's a temptation for politicians to demagogue on immigration reform and, unfortunately, that has soured this debate almost to the point of deadlock," Flake said. "I hope that President Bush's speech… which was rational and serious, will reverse the tone of this debate in Congress and help us pass a comprehensive bill."

Bush Takes Immigration Vision To Ariz. (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, May 19, 2006

YUMA, Ariz. — President Bush continued walking a fine line Thursday in the Republican immigration battle, including the line at the U.S.-Mexican border.

Accompanied by Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, a Democrat, Bush toured one of the nation's most porous border areas, where Border Patrol agents apprehended 70,000 illegal entrants last year. He stood a few hundred feet from a 20-foot fence of corrugated metal and inspected new camera, communications and lighting systems.

In remarks at the Border Patrol headquarters, Bush said there is common ground between the two visions of immigration overhaul that have split his party — one that stresses keeping illegal immigrants out, and another that favors making immigrant workers legal temporarily and giving some illegal immigrants a path to citizenship.

Bush favors elements of both. “You cannot secure the border unless you have all elements of a comprehensive plan,” he said.

The Republican-led Senate is debating a bill that does much of what Bush wants. The GOP-led House has passed a bill that focuses on border enforcement.

Bush's trip Thursday was his first since his Monday night address on immigration, when he reached out to GOP immigration hard-liners by proposing tougher border security, including deployment of up to 6,000 National Guard troops.

The flight aboard Air Force One underscored GOP differences. Bush's guests included Rep. J.D. Hayworth, R-Ariz., who wants a law enforcement bill only.

Hayworth said he and Bush have “profound disagreements.”

“I don't believe the House will accede to his wishes on a ‘guest worker' program, despite his recent protestations to the contrary,” Hayworth said.

DOJ_NMG_0029151

Bush noted that immigration is “an emotional issue.” That seems especially true in Arizona.

Al Garza, who lives near Tucson, said he voted for Bush twice but would not do so again. The director of a group that works to stop illegal entrants at the border, Garza called Bush's troop proposal “a political ploy.”

“No one seems to be listening to what the citizens want,” Garza said. “It's all what Mexico wants, or what the illegal aliens want.”

Robin Hoover, head of a group that maintains watering stations in the desert where illegal immigrants cross, said a guest-worker program recognizes the need to deal with people already here. He said the Guard deployment is “silly.”

“Putting the soldiers down here is all politics, bad politics,” he said.

Bush, Chertoff Say Plan Will Bolster Border (DMN)

By Michelle Mittelstadt, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, May 19, 2006

House conservatives unimpressed by visits, Guard deployment

EL PASO – President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff traveled to the U.S.-Mexico border Thursday in a push to convince the public – and conservatives in Congress – that they're serious about beefing up efforts to halt illegal immigration.

ERICH SCHLEGEL/DMN U.S. Border Patrol Agent Juan Garcia on Wednesday guarded illegal immigrants found loaded onto a pickup north of Laredo. The truck was stolen in Houston and modified to smuggle immigrants.

With House conservatives digging their heels in against the administration's plan to pair a guest worker program with tougher enforcement, Mr. Bush headed to a dusty border crossing in Yuma, Ariz., to make his case while his homeland security secretary offered a similar message 550 miles away in El Paso.

The president's plan to dispatch 6,000 National Guards troops to assist the Border Patrol offers a "turbocharged" boost to the strategy of taming illegal immigration with a mix of added manpower, high-tech surveillance and the guest worker program, Mr. Chertoff said in an interview en route to El Paso.

Acknowledging that the solution "is not going to happen overnight," Mr. Chertoff said the National Guard will serve as a bridge until 6,000 new Border Patrol agents can be hired over the next two years and high-tech equipment such as unmanned drones and satellites are deployed.

With Congress insisting on heightened border security, the fate of Mr. Bush's push for a plan that includes a chance at citizenship for illegal immigrants already here could turn on whether enforcement gains are realized in the near term.

"It helps to have the president out here, seeing the part of the area of the country that one time was overrun by people coming in here, that's beginning to get settled down because of a strategy that's being employed," Mr. Bush said, referring to previous administration policies.

Some enforcement hawks in the House remain unmollified by the president's plan to send the National Guard, as well as by his visit to Yuma on Thursday.

"Press conferences without administration action is, as border ranchers say, 'All hat and no cattle,' " said Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican strongly opposed to the citizenship provision.

The Senate continued work Thursday on legislation that mirrors the president's goals far more than a tough, enforcement-only bill that passed the House in December. The Senate bill pairs increased enforcement with a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for most of the nation's 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants.

Touting the National Guard as a "force multiplier" for the 12,300-strong Border Patrol, Mr. Chertoff said border surveillance will be a "big part" of what the Guard will do.

"They are going to be using their eyes and they are going to be using their binoculars and all the high-tech equipment they have to identify groups of migrants that are crossing," he told reporters at Fort Bliss, where he received a classified intelligence briefing and met with Border Patrol officials.

The Guard troops also will build fencing, vehicle barriers, roads and other items as part of the Border Patrol's plan to gain operational control of the border – a goal that Mr. Chertoff said is about two years from being met.

Homeland Security and Defense Department officials still are discussing where to send the first Guard units, which are expected to be dispatched next month.

The White House on Thursday asked Congress to divert $1.9 billion earmarked for border security upgrades as a partial down payment for the Guard deployment and other programs Mr. Bush outlined to the nation Monday.

The money would be used to increase detention capacity by 4,000 beds and to fund 1,000 of the 6,000 Border Patrol agents the administration pledged to add by 2009, bringing the force to more than 18,000.

Chertoff Tells Border Residents Guard Plan Isn't Unusual (AP)

By Alicia A. Caldwell, Associated Press

The AP, May 19, 2006

FORT BLISS, Texas – Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff assured border residents and officials Thursday that National Guard troops set to deploy in their region would function the same way they have for 20 years.

He said President Bush's plan to mobilize up to 6,000 Guard troops along the country's 2,000-mile border with Mexico was "enhancing or scaling up" operations that have long been in place as a backup for U.S. Border Patrol agents.

Chertoff met Thursday with officials from Joint Task Force North, a Department of Defense group that has for years coordinated training and intelligence missions to help the Border Patrol. His visit came on the same day Bush was touting his immigration plan during a trip to Yuma, Ariz., one of the nation's hottest regions and a heavy traffic area for illegal immigrants.

Before speaking with reporters, Chertoff watched a rescue training operation with Border Patrol and other search-and-rescue personnel. He said the rescue operation is an example of the humanitarian side of Border Patrol duties.

"Those who cross our border illegally put themselves at tremendous risk," Chertoff said.

The Bush administration is trying to build support for a comprehensive immigration overhaul that would provide illegal immigrants a path to citizenship while also beefing up border security.

As part of that effort, Chertoff also tried to assure people that federal and military officials were doing their part to avoid a repeat of the fatal 1997 Marine Corps shooting of an 18-year-old goat herder in a remote West Texas hamlet.

Chertoff said there are never any guarantees that something won't go wrong, but "we are taking every step to ensure that we don't have an unfortunate accident."

Esequiel Hernandez was shot while four camouflaged Marines were working an anti-drug mission along the border near Redford, Texas.

Chertoff also told reporters that assignments for the Guard troops haven't been made, but officials hope to begin deployments across the southern border by June.

Chertoff: Border To See Little Change (LCSN)

By Steve Ramirez

The Las Cruces Sun-News, May 19, 2006

FORT BLISS — Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff said Thursday that not much will change with daily security operations along the border with Mexico, even with the addition of 6,000 National Guard troops.

Chertoff visited the Army post in El Paso on Thursday and met with officials of Joint Task Force North, a Department of Defense unit that has conducted training and surveillance operations along the far West Texas and southern New Mexico border for more than five years. Later Thursday, President Bush was in Yuma, Ariz. to lobby for his border security plan.

"Those who cross our border illegally put themselves at tremendous risk," Chertoff said.

Bush's plan is to mobilize Guard troops along the 2,000-mile border with Mexico by June. Chertoff emphasized that the Guard troops would have no law enforcement authority, and would mostly be used for administrative and surveillance duties along the border.

That would enable Border Patrol agents who are assigned those duties to be on the border patrolling for illegal immigrants. There are not enough agents available to adequately patrol the border, and Chertoff said that is flirting with disaster.

"Various carryover Border Patrol agents put their lives at risk," Chertoff said.

On Thursday, Bush submitted a request for $1.948 billion in emergency funding to help secure America's borders. The request includes funding to hire the first 1,000 of 6,000 new border patrol agents that will be deployed along the north and south borders of the United States in the next two years.

That funding would pay for the resources to train new Border Patrol agents and for the temporary deployment of National Guard troops.

Also requested by Bush is $1.172 billion for the Department of Homeland Security. That would include:

$235 million to hire 1,000 new Border Patrol agents

$50 million for additional recruiting and expanded training capacity at the Border Patrol Academy

$25 million to expand the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center in Artesia

$20 million to hire additional administrative staff members to replace agents who now have those duties.

Another $250 million is earmarked for more security infrastructure, including vehicle barriers, lighting, construction of all-weather roads, and more fencing.

DOJ_NMG_0029153

"It is clear that the situation on the border is an emergency," said Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M. "The Senate has already proven it wants to get serious about moving quickly to shore up the border by passing an amendment to spend $1.9 billion on border infrastructure, vehicles, air assets and other equipment."

Senate Votes To Make English The National Language Of The US (KRT)

By Frank James

Knight Ridder, May 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - In a historic move that came as part of its consideration of a comprehensive immigration reform, the Senate Thursday voted to make English the national language of the United States.

The lopsided 63-34 vote came after an impassioned debate in which the word "racist" was used on the Senate floor to describe the effort.

It was the first time in U.S. history that the Senate had passed such legislation. More negotiations on the final bill are expected, but if a "national language" measure cleared both the Senate and House and was signed by President Bush, it could mean a greater emphasis on the federal government providing its services in English.

The vote also appeared to be an important moment of reaction against multiculturalism in the United States.

In recent weeks, massive protests across the United States by supporters of immigrant rights have pointed to America's increasingly polyglot future. But the Senate's action appeared to be a reassertion of the nation's English heritage.

"This is something that is more significant probably to the American people than it is inside this chamber," said Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., who introduced the bill.

He said solid majorities of Americans, including Hispanics according to recent polls, believe English should be the nation's official language.

"So I believe this is something very significant we'll be doing today that people have talked about now for four decades that I know of, and I believe it should be popular," said Inhofe, who speaks fluent Spanish.

Although the immigration bill passed by the House last year doesn't have a similar provision, there is a separate "official English" bill in the House with strong support.

The Senate's action on Thursday raises the prospect that when Senate and House members meet to iron out differences between their immigration bills, the final product will include an "official English" provision.

Inhofe's legislation had originally called for English to be the nation's "official" language. But in order to draw enough support to pass his amendment, he made a subtle change, calling for English to be the "national" language.

To some, this softened the measure slightly, but supporters said it made little difference.

"We don't care. We think it's basically the same thing. It's a `You say potato, I say potahto' kind of thing," said Tim Schultz, director of government relations of U.S. English Inc. The organization describes itself as dedicated to preserving English's unifying role in U.S. life.

"The Senate has never passed an official English bill that has legally operative force," Schultz said. "This bill actually has some legally operative force that says you don't have - unless it's otherwise provided by law - you do not have an entitlement to government services in another language."

The legislation struck the Senate Democratic leader as invidious - if not in motivation, then in result.

"While the intent may not be there, I really believe this amendment is racist," said Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev. "I think it's directed basically at people who speak Spanish."

The bill's supporters rejected that charge.

Specifically, the bill says that "unless otherwise authorized or provided by law, no person has a right, entitlement or claim to have the government of the U.S. or any of its officials or representatives act, communicate, perform or provide services, or provide materials in any language other than English."

The amendment continues, "If any forms are issued by the federal government in a language other that English ... the English language version of the form is the sole authority for all legal purposes."

Opponents of the bill said that under their interpretation, it would be impossible for government officials to conduct a range of activities, from speaking Spanish in government assemblies to putting up warning signs in both English and Spanish.

Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., for example, said drowning deaths on the Potomac River, which flows through the nation's capital, had gone from more than a dozen in 2004 to none last year. The U.S. Park Service credited the dramatic decline, he said, to warning signs in Spanish and English after it noticed that many drowning victims were recent immigrants.

"So is making this political statement in the Inhofe amendment so important that we wouldn't want to provide safety for those using the Potomac River?" Durbin asked. "It was considered to be a sensible, rational thing to do, print the sign in both languages so that people would be warned of the danger."

DOJ_NMG_0029154

Inhofe responded that his bill would not prevent such signs from being printed in other languages in addition to English.

Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., a Mexican-American, asked if the amendment wouldn't prevent senators from speaking Spanish on the Senate floor, as happened when Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales' nomination was being debated.

"That is a preposterous question . . . and not really a suitable question for a serious proposal like this," said Sen. Lamar Alexander, R.-Tenn. "We have a common language because we are a land of immigrants. It should be a simple statement that English is our national language."

In addition to making English the national language, the amendment would increase the proficiency requirements that immigrants would have to demonstrate in English and in U.S. history and government.

Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., introduced an alternative amendment that Democrats who opposed Inhofe's bill hoped would draw enough senators from Inhofe's bill to defeat it. Salazar's proposal said the U.S. government "shall preserve and enhance the role of English as the common and unifying language of America."

That amendment passed by a 58-39 vote. Tim Schultz, director of government relations of U.S. English Inc., said it provided senators who voted against the Inhofe amendment with a chance to show they supported English, too, since it would be "political suicide" to appear to not support English-language dominance in the United States.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., took the Inhofe amendment's supporters to task for increasing proficiency requirements but not providing any additional funding for classes in English as a second language (ESL).

"In my hometown of Boston, there are 16,000 adults on the ESL list waiting to learn English," said Kennedy, practically shouting. "It's two to three years. Anything in the Inhofe amendment to help us help those people who want to learn English? Oh, no. No, no, no. There's nothing."

Senate Votes To Make English Official Language (LAT)

By Michael Muskal And Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — English would be declared the "national language" of the United States under a measure approved by the Senate today, a largely symbolic move that supporters said would promote unity and ensure assimilation by immigrants.

The Senate passed two amendments, one Democratic and one Republican. The Democratic version is more specific on protecting translation and bilingual services.

The GOP-backed amendment, which passed 63 to 34, would allow the government to continue to offer publications and services -- such as bilingual ballots -- in languages other than English. It would require all illegal immigrants seeking to legalize their status in the United States to pass English proficiency tests and would offer guidelines to the Department of Homeland Security for a revised citizenship test.

Heated discussions about the measure dominated the Senate's proceedings, as proponents argued that it was needed to unite the country, while opponents insisted that it would leave the nation more divided.

Designating an official language is important to conservatives, who argue that the government should require English proficiency to ensure that the country does not descend into two societies, and that the 11 million to 12 million undocumented workers now in the United States only become citizens if they can speak the language.

Republicans, led by the principal sponsor, Sen. James Inhoffe (R-Okla.), argued that the amendment is needed because a common language is an important step in allowing people to talk to each other.

"It will help unify us as a nation," said Sen. Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.).

But the amendment also creates questions of fairness, said Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill.), citing the possibility of someone who is legally in the United States but has difficulty with English. Currently, interpreters are provided in many official forums, such as courts. And many states, including California, provide official ballots in different languages.

"Are we going too far?" Durbin asked about the amendment. "What of people who are poor with limited language skills? Are we being fair?"

Republicans insisted that the amendment's language wouldn't prevent needed translations services.

"We are having a great debate on what it means to be an American," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.).

Graham also mentioned the need to respond to recent demonstrations where immigrant rights advocates waved Mexican flags.

"The reason I'm voting for this is that I think it tries to unite us," Graham said, adding that nothing in the amendment prevents the use of interpreters in courtrooms for those whose English is not strong enough. "It doesn't disturb the legal situation in this country. If I thought it did, I wouldn't vote for it."

The Democrats' concerns led to their amendment, which passed 58 to 39.

DOJ_NMG_0029155

Earlier, the Senate reconsidered an action it had taken Wednesday to bar guest workers from petitioning on their own for legal status. In a 56-43 vote today, the Senate allowed guest workers to act on their own if the government determines no American workers are available for the job being filled.

At this point, most observers expect the Senate to pass a bill that will have something for everyone: tougher security at the borders; a guest worker provision to allow people to enter the United States legally; and a path for citizenship for many of the estimated 12 million undocumented workers in the country.

Conservatives have called the legalization provisions an amnesty, a term hotly denied by Senate sponsors who stress that those illegally in the country would have to pay fines and learn English before becoming citizens.

President Bush opposes amnesty but has said he supports a comprehensive approach like the one being considered in the Senate.

After the Senate passes its version of the immigration bill, a further battle with House conservatives is expected and that outcome remains unclear.

The House has passed a tougher bill that would make being an illegal immigrant a felony. The bill also increases border security, but it does not have any provision for granting citizenship to undocumented workers in the United States.

Senate Endorses English As National Language In A Symbolic Stand (KRT)

By Dave Montgomery

Knight Ridder, May 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - In an impassioned debate laden with symbolism, the Senate voted 63-34 Thursday to declare English the national language as it continued to debate legislation that would put millions of illegal immigrants on track to U.S. citizenship.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., denounced the amendment as racist and joined other opponents in warning that it could undercut long-established civil rights law. The amendment's lead sponsor, Sen. James Inhofe, R-Okla., bristled at the assertion, saying the proposal would unify the nation's increasingly diverse population and wouldn't dismantle existing legal protections.

The first Senate vote on the issue in more than two decades illuminated the emotional divisions over Congress' efforts to craft legislation to deal with as many as 12 million immigrants who've entered the country illegally in search of better-paying jobs.

The Senate is considering nearly two dozen amendments on a comprehensive plan to grant legal status to many illegal immigrants and create a temporary guest-worker program to help fill what U.S. business leaders say is a chronic labor shortage. A final vote on the measure is expected next week.

Despite the intensity of the arguments on both sides, it was unclear what impact, if any, Inhofe's English-language amendment would have if it becomes law. Senators further confused the situation by accepting a softer alternative declaring English "the common and unifying language of the United States." The vote on that one, sponsored by Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., was 58-39.

Salazar, one of three Hispanic senators, whose family settled in Colorado before it became a state, asserted that the Inhofe amendment threatened a return "to the dark days of American history" when Hispanic children were punished for speaking Spanish in school, sometimes by having soap thrust in their mouths.

In response, Inhofe said his proposal would put the U.S. government in line with 27 states and 51 countries that declare English the prevailing language. He called Reid's "racist" tag a ridiculous charge and accused opponents of demagoguery.

"This is your last chance to have English as the national language," he told colleagues.

Supporters suggested that the measure will be especially needed as millions of illegal immigrants and future foreign workers get on track for U.S. citizenship.

Senators said both amendments would be part of negotiations with the House of Representatives to reconcile differences in the two chambers' immigration plans. Asked whether the language amendments would have any effect, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., one of the Senate's leading architects on immigration legislation, responded: "Not that I know of."

The bill already requires English proficiency as a condition for illegal immigrants to obtain permanent legal status and citizenship over an 11-year period. At least 215 million of the nearly 300 million U.S. residents speak English, but the diverse population otherwise constitutes a linguistic melting pot, speaking as many as 176 languages. Spanish is the second most common, spoken by 28 million people.

Conservatives, surging with momentum after winning Senate support to erect at least 350 miles of fencing along the Southwest border, continued their attempt to limit the scope of the guest-worker program and legalization provisions that they denounced as "amnesty" for illegal behavior.

By 50-49, the Senate rejected an amendment that that would have prevented immigrants from getting Social Security benefits that they earned when they were here illegally.

DOJ_NMG_0029156

Senators also voted 63-34 to approve an amendment by Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, to add fees that would be charged to illegal immigrants after they step forward to begin the legalization process. The fees - $750 for illegal immigrants and $100 for each dependent - will come on top of the $2,000 fines already proposed in the bill.

Cornyn said the fees are designed to reimburse state and local governments for health care and other services provided to illegal immigrants. The assessment could raise up to $7.5 billion, he said.

Senate Votes To Make English National Language (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — The Senate voted on Thursday to designate English as the national language. In a charged debate, Republican backers of the proposal, which was added to the Senate's immigration measure on a 63-to-34 vote, said that it was equivalent to establishing a formal national anthem or motto and that it would simply affirm the pre-eminence of English without overturning laws or rules on bilingualism.

"We're free to say what we want, speak what we want, but it is our national language," said Senator Lamar Alexander, Republican of Tennessee. The amendment was proposed by Senator James M. Inhofe, Republican of Oklahoma.

It is not clear, though, that the measure will be included in any final bill after negotiations with the House. Shortly after the Inhofe amendment was approved, the Senate also approved a weaker, less-binding alternative declaring English the "common and unifying" language of the nation, on a 58-to-39 vote. The question of which version survives would be decided in negotiations with the House.

The second amendment was proposed by Senator Ken Salazar of Colorado, one of several Democrats who said the Inhofe measure was needlessly divisive and would reduce multilingual government programs.

"We are taking a step backward from the progress America has made," Mr. Salazar said.

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, said the Inhofe amendment was racist.

"Everybody who speaks with an accent knows that they need to learn English just as fast as they can," he said.

Under the Inhofe proposal, the federal government is directed to "preserve and enhance the role of English as the national language of the United States of America." It does not go as far as proposals to designate English the nation's official language, which would require all government publications and business to be in English.

Instead, it says government services and publications now offered in other languages would be unaffected. But the proposal declares that no one has "a right, entitlement or claim to have the government of the United States or any of its officials or representatives act, communicate, perform or provide services or provide materials in any language other than English."

Critics said they fear the directive could lead government agencies to scale back their bilingual efforts, cause discrimination against people who do not speak English, disrupt emergency operations in communities with populations of immigrants and have other unintended consequences.

Mr. Inhofe, who is proficient in Spanish from his days as a pilot in Mexico, said critics were exaggerating the potential effects of his plan. His plan would also stiffen the language rules for immigrants seeking to qualify for citizenship under the new legislation, requiring them to demonstrate English proficiency and understanding of American history and government rather than simply to enroll in a language class.

President Bush, speaking about immigration on Thursday on a trip to Arizona, reiterated that under his proposal illegal immigrants would have to learn English. "If you learn English, and you're a hard worker, and you have a dream, you have the capacity from going from picking crops to owning the store, or from sweeping office floors to being an office manager," Mr. Bush said.

The House did not include a similar provision on English in the legislation it passed in December, but there is strong support among House Republicans for such a move.

Despite the clash over language, advocates of a broad immigration measure combining border protection with the possibility of citizenship for qualifying illegal immigrants successfully fought off repeated efforts to alter the measure.

In a crucial showdown, the Senate voted, 58 to 35, late Thursday to reject an amendment that authors of the legislation said would gut their bill by prohibiting temporary workers and many illegal immigrants from seeking permanent residency.

The Senate reversed a decision it made on Wednesday about how temporary workers could apply for permanent residency. The Senate initially voted to require that such applications come just from employers. But some senators said they had misgivings that the requirement would give employers too much power over workers. On Thursday, senators voted to give workers the ability to apply for permanent residency on their own if they have been working in the country for at least four years.

The Senate retained a requirement that a green card be granted only if the Labor Department certified a need for workers.

DOJ_NMG_0029157

Immigrant groups praised the reversal. But some advocates for immigrants retained grave concerns about the emerging legislation.

Mary Bauer, director of the immigrant justice project at the Southern Poverty Law Center, said immigrants who participated in existing guest worker programs were frequently exploited. She said the programs failed to ensure that employers offered fair pay and housing.

Senate Votes English US National Language (AFP-Y2)

AFP, May 18, 2006

The US Senate voted to make English the national language of the United States as dispute raged over US immigration law reform.

"The government of the United States shall preserve and enhance the role of English as the national language of the USA," said an amendment to immigration legislation introduced by Oklahoma Republican James Inhofe and approved 63-34.

It requires English to be the language of all official paperwork and business, with some exceptions for voter registration, courts and help during disasters.

The House of Representatives is considering similar legislation presented by Iowa Republican Steve King. It already has the backing of 150 representatives.

"I came here at 14 years old and I had to learn English to make my way in America," said Cuban-born Senator Mel Martinez.

"That doesn't mean that you forget your roots. That's why I insist that my children learn Spanish."

"We all understand that the language of this country is English and to be successful here you have to learn English," he added.

President George W. Bush's immigration reform plan unveiled Monday proposes placing as many as 6,000 National Guard troops along the southern US border to assist border patrol officers, and creating a guest-worker program providing a possible path to citizenship for some of the estimated 11.5 million undocumented migrants, among other proposals.

Inhofe said that 27 of the 50 US states already call English their official language. The Spanish-speaking US territory of Puerto Rico calls English an official language, along with Spanish.

Inhofe also mentioned that several polls over the past 25 years show more than 80 percent of Americans -- and 77 percent of Latinos -- agree that English should be the official language of the United States.

Senate Votes English As 'National Language' (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

After an emotional debate fraught with symbolism, the Senate yesterday voted to make English the "national language" of the United States, declaring that no one has a right to federal communications or services in a language other than English except for those already guaranteed by law.

The measure, approved 63 to 34, directs the government to "preserve and enhance" the role of English, without altering current laws that require some government documents and services be provided in other languages. Opponents, however, said it could negate executive orders, regulations, civil service guidances and other multilingual ordinances not officially sanctioned by acts of Congress.

That vote, considered a defeat for immigration-rights advocates, was followed last night by an important victory: By 58 to 35, the Senate killed an amendment that would have blocked eventual citizenship for future immigrants who arrive under a temporary work permit. Democrats and Republicans agreed that the amendment would have destroyed the fragile, bipartisan coalition backing the Senate bill.

The Senate action came hours after President Bush, who visited the border town of Yuma, Ariz., asked Congress to approve a $1.95 billion budget request to deploy National Guard troops and 1,000 additional enforcement agents to the U.S.-Mexico border. Bush also endorsed for the first time the construction of 370 miles of southern border fences to cut down on illegal immigration.

The English language vote continued the conservative turn that a major overhaul of the nation's immigration laws has taken since the Senate began debate this week. The comprehensive legislation would strengthen border security, allow illegal immigrants who have been in the country five years or more to remain and eventually become citizens, and create a guest-worker program.

With approval of a triple-layered border fence Wednesday, the capping of the annual number of guest-worker visas at 200,000 and the English-language amendment yesterday, Republicans say the bill is tougher than the original version and comes closer to what is needed to satisfy many conservatives.

But immigrants-rights groups say their support is teetering. "This is devastating," said Raul Gonzalez, legislative director of the National Council of La Raza, after the English-language vote. "For us, this is a tough issue to bring back to the community."

Only nine Senate Democrats voted for the amendment and one Republican, Sen. Pete V. Domenici (N.M.), voted against it. Maryland's two Democratic senators voted against it, and Virginia's two GOP senators voted for it.

The English-language debate has roiled U.S. politics for decades and, in some quarters, has been as controversial and important as an amendment to ban flag burning.

The impact of the language amendment was unclear even after its passage. The wording negating claims to multilingual services appears straightforward. It also sets requirements that immigrants seeking U.S. citizenship know the English language and U.S. history. The amendment would require more thorough testing to demonstrate English-language proficiency and knowledge of U.S. history and elements of U.S. culture such as the Pledge of Allegiance and the National Anthem.

But its author, Sen. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.), made two last-minute changes that some opponents said would reduce its effect significantly. By stipulating that the English-only mandates could not negate existing laws, Inhofe spared current ordinances that allow bilingual education or multilingual ballots. By changing the amendment to label English the "national language" rather than the "official language" of the country, Inhofe may have lessened its symbolic power.

"In my view, we had it watered down enough to make it acceptable," said Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), one of the chief architects of the immigration bill.

But pro-immigration groups and some Democrats said the amendment would obliterate executive orders issued by President Bill Clinton that mandated multilingual services and communications in a variety of federal agencies, and could undermine court orders, agency regulations, civil service guidances, and state and local ordinances that call for multilingual services.

Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) called the amendment "racist," and Sen. Ken Salazar (D-Colo.) dismissed it as divisive and anti-American.

Further complicating the picture, moments after approving the Inhofe amendment, the Senate voted 58 to 39 to approve a competing amendment by Salazar. It declared English the "common unifying language of the United States," but mandated that nothing in that declaration "shall diminish or expand any existing rights" regarding multilingual services.

Senators said the conflict will have to be worked out in negotiations with the House.

During his appearance in Arizona with Gov. Janet Napolitano (D) in attendance, Bush offered some tough talk. After touring a porous section of the border that has helped turn Yuma into a hotbed for illegal workers, Bush told a group of federal patrol agents that the White House is committed to sending reinforcements soon, and to significantly expanding security and staff over the next several years.

"It's time to get immediate results," Bush said at the Yuma Sector Border Patrol headquarters.

But administration officials made it clear that the $1.95 billion for the president's border initiative should come out of the same money approved by the Senate in its version of an emergency war spending bill.

That angered Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), who had secured that money solely for capital expenditures, such as fences, sensors and watchtowers, not border security operations. But Gregg said he has "been told rather bluntly" some of those expenditures will have to wait.

The White House said the new budget request by Bush would cover the $750 million-plus Guard deployment, new agents, fences and barriers, five helicopters and two new unmanned surveillance aircraft. The money would be offset by delaying other military purchases, according to the White House.

Illegals Granted Social Security (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, May 19, 2006

The Senate voted yesterday to allow illegal aliens to collect Social Security benefits based on past illegal employment -- even if the job was obtained through forged or stolen documents.

"There was a felony they were committing, and now they can't be prosecuted. That sounds like amnesty to me," said Sen. John Ensign, the Nevada Republican who offered the amendment yesterday to strip out those provisions of the immigration reform bill. "It just boggles the mind how people could be against this amendment."

The Ensign amendment was defeated on a 50-49 vote.

DOJ_NMG_0029159

"We all know that millions of undocumented immigrants pay Social Security and Medicare taxes for years and sometimes decades while they work to contribute to our economy," said Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican.

"The Ensign amendment would undermine the work of these people by preventing lawfully present immigrant workers from claiming Social Security benefits that they earned before they were authorized to work in our community," he said. "If this amendment were enacted, the nest egg that these immigrants have worked hard for would be taken from them and their families."

Mr. Ensign was among 44 Republicans and five Democrats who voted to block such payouts.

"It makes no sense to reward millions of illegal immigrants for criminal behavior while our Social Security system is already in crisis," said Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican. "Why in the world would we endorse this criminal activity with federal benefits? The Senate missed a big opportunity to improve this bill, and I doubt American seniors will be pleased with the result."

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, said it would be unfair to deny illegals the benefits.

"We should not steal their funds or empty their Social Security accounts," he said. "That is not fair. It does not reward their hard work or their financial contributions. It violates the trust that underlies the Social Security Trust Fund."

Within hours, the vote had become an issue in this fall's elections, raised by a Republican challenger to Sen. Debbie Stabenow, Michigan Democrat.

"Instead of protecting the retirement security of Americans who are earning an honest living and abiding by the laws of our country, Debbie Stabenow sided with people who are here illegally and abuse our Social Security system," Oakland County, Mich., Sheriff Michael Bouchard said in a press release. "Allowing illegal immigrants to use their illegal work history as credit towards receiving Social Security benefits shows that Debbie Stabenow has forgotten who she is supposed to be working for in the U.S. Senate."

The Senate also yesterday approved an amendment to adopt English as the nation's official language, while reversing course from the day before on protections for U.S. workers who will face new competition from unskilled immigrant labor under the Senate bill. In addition, senators voted last night to kill an amendment that would have specified that the guest-worker program will not provide visas that would provide a path to citizenship.

On Wednesday, senators narrowly approved an amendment to require a foreign worker to have a job lined up in the United States before applying for a green card. The purpose, supporters say, is to ensure that the job market isn't flooded with foreign workers. Also, it prevents foreign workers from coming to the United States only to wind up unemployed and dependent on public assistance.

But yesterday, the Senate essentially gutted that amendment by allowing foreign workers to apply for permanent residency without having a job lined up.

"What that means is that up to 200,000 unskilled workers a year would become eligible for a green card, regardless of economic conditions, regardless of whether that worker has been actually employed for four years, and most importantly, regardless of whether there are unemployed U.S. workers available to fill those jobs," said Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

VERBATIM (WP)

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

After the Bush administration was accused of secretly aiding militias in Somalia, new White House spokesman Tony Snow demonstrated on Wednesday that he had quickly learned the art of saying nothing.

QUESTION: On Somalia, is the United States working with warlords? Does the United States -- does the Bush administration consider the Somalia government to be responsible for specific genocide against African Christians in Darfur?

SNOW: I'm going to be very precise about this, and I will give you -- because this is one of these things where I want to be careful how I parse it. First, the president has said that his primary responsibility as commander in chief is to keep the American people safe. That's a solemn task. The second thing is, you've got instability in Somalia right now, and there is concern about the presence of foreign terrorists, particularly al-Qaeda, within Somalia right now. In an environment of instability, as we've seen in the past, al-Qaeda may take root. And we want to make sure that al-Qaeda does not, in fact, establish a beachhead in Somalia.

Now, the problem we've seen before in ungoverned -- these are problems that we've seen in other ungoverned regions in the past. The terrorists are going to seek to take advantage of the environment and use that kind of chaos in order to put together camps and, therefore, mount operations around the world. The United States -- we will continue to work with regional and international partners wherever we can to crack down on terrorism, and also to try to prevent its rising.

DOJ_NMG_0029160

In the long run, the answer to your concerns is an effective, functional government of Somalia, which, obviously, we do not at the moment have. The United States strongly supports the transitional federal institutions in Somalia because they are trying to reestablish a functioning central government within Somalia that can bring the Somali people out of the period of civil conflict. As I said, I am going to be very careful with the way I say it, and I will say no more.

Q: I appreciate that. One more thing on the genocide, though. Does the president --

SNOW: As I said, I'm not going to make any further comment on Somalia.

Q: What are you really saying?

SNOW: Every word will be in the transcript, every single one.

House Sets Budget Blueprint As Resources Bill Gains Passage (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A $26 billion natural-resources bill cleared the House, even as Republicans won approval of their long-delayed budget blueprint for the new fiscal year that begins Oct.1.

The 218-210 budget vote, which followed a late-night debate spilling into early yesterday morning, ended weeks of frustration for party leaders who had twice pulled back in the final hours for fear of losing. Democrats were united in opposition, but just 12 Republicans broke ranks after moderates won promises that at least $7.1 billion would be added back to President Bush's budget for core job-training, health and education programs.

Passage cleared the way for the first of the 2007 spending measures, and the natural-resources bill adopted last night quickly captured the scrappier tone of the annual appropriations debate.

Just hours after the budget vote, prominent conservatives were back on the floor seeking more money, even including a $500,000 amendment to trap alligators in Florida. In a series of skirmishes with timber and oil interests, environmentalists easily prevailed and enjoyed an election-year surge of support from sometimes as many as 67 or 68 Republicans.

In a closely fought 217-203 contest, Florida Republicans led the successful effort to strip out a business-backed provision that would have lifted decades-old restrictions on exploring for natural gas off the U.S. coast.

Rep. Tom DeLay (R., Texas), the soon-departing former majority leader, watched with evident dismay. "Republicans are voting green tonight," he said.

The floor debate came as the White House and leadership stepped up pressure on House and Senate negotiators to reach agreement soon on an emergency-spending bill to pay for military operations in Iraq and hurricane-recovery efforts on the Gulf Coast.

The administration again warned that Mr. Bush will veto the wartime measure if total spending exceeds his initial $92.2 billion request. The president's chief of staff and former budget director, Joshua Bolten, followed up with a trip to the Capitol where he was promised by the leadership that the veto won't be needed -- and that the bill will comply.

But with the Memorial Day recess approaching, the administration has made the task of cost containment harder by adding about $4.1 billion in demands that must be met under the same $92.2 billion cap.

Just yesterday, for example, the White House sent Congress plans to shift more than $1.9 billion from various defense accounts to pay for new border-security initiatives announced by the president Monday night. The package is heavily tilted toward personnel: $756 million to place 6,000 National Guard troops on borders with Mexico and an additional $410 million to help hire 1,000 border-patrol agents. But the result will be to displace port-security initiatives and capital investments in equipment for border agents championed by many in Congress.

Much of the defense saving proposed to pay for the president's plan has already been claimed by lawmakers to pay for other priorities, such as more armor for troops in Iraq. For example, the administration would save $125 million by canceling its planned Navy purchases of inflatable boats and utility helicopters. In fact, the House and Senate have already assumed cuts of at least 80% from the same procurement money.

The same pattern is seen in the jockeying now over aid to Gulf Coast states recovering from hurricanes Katrina and Rita. The White House initially proposed $19.7 billion, then followed up with an additional $2.2 billion request last month for the Corps of Engineers and levee work in New Orleans. But rather than ask for more money to meet these needs, the administration proposed the cost be largely offset by cutting its proposed contributions to a disaster-relief fund within the Department of Homeland Security.

Critics of this approach argue that the White House is simply postponing having to face up to the cost of the Katrina recovery. And it is also an invitation to Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran (R., Miss.) to try to do the same to offset the added education and development money he wants for the Gulf Coast.

House Conservatives See Wins In Budget (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, May 19, 2006

House conservatives say they scored key spending reform victories in the $2.7 trillion budget approved early yesterday, but major changes are needed to achieve the fiscal discipline promised when Republicans took over the chamber more than a decade ago.

"The budget, while not visionary, was an important first step," said Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican and chairman of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC).

"There's a huge way to go," said Rep. Jeb Hensarling, Texas Republican. "It takes time. ... It's like turning a battleship."

The House approved the blueprint for 2007 spending by a vote of 218-210 after weeks of negotiations between conservative and more liberal Republican factions. Twelve Republicans and all 197 House Democrats who voted opposed the bill, as did the one independent member. Four Democrats and one Republican did not vote.

Mr. Pence said conservatives' greatest victory was holding the line on President Bush's $873 billion limit for discretionary spending, despite what Mr. Pence said was "overwhelming pressure" from the more liberal wing to spend more.

"We stood firm; our leadership stood firm," he said.

Conservatives also highlighted "significant" victories secured from leaders during negotiations, including the promise of votes on line-item veto authority, inclusion of earmark reform in a recently passed lobbying reform bill, and a hard-fought provision that would define and limit "emergency" spending, making it more difficult to add pet projects to such legislation. For 2007, the budget sets that emergency level at $6.4 billion.

Mr. Bush praised the move in the House, and Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, called the budget "a major demonstration of Republicans' commitment to return fiscal discipline."

Conservatives said spending was still too high, that cuts to massive entitlement programs were inadequate and that the plan will raise the national debt.

The bill increases discretionary spending for defense and homeland security while holding other discretionary spending flat. It assumes $228 billion in tax relief and culls $6.8 billion in savings from entitlements programs over five years.

"Even though this budget still spends too much," the reform victories represent "a turning point in the battle over spending," Mr. Hensarling said.

He called the emergency spending item a crucial tool. "There is now at least a stoplight on the road to spending," he said.

Mr. Hensarling this week offered an RSC alternative modeled after the budget House Republicans approved in 1995. Called "Contract With America Renewed," it would have balanced the budget in five years, trimmed $358 billion from entitlement programs, capped annual Medicare growth, eliminated 150 federal programs and restructured three federal agencies. It was approved by 94 Republicans and opposed by 134, including 32 RSC members, even though nearly half of them supported the 1995 budget.

"There's been a shift" in the party since 1995, Mr. Pence said, but he was encouraged that House Republican leaders backed the RSC plan this week.

"This was truly an effort to return to the bold and visionary leadership of the '94 revolution," he said.

Democrats, meanwhile, argued that the budget approved by the House shortchanged key social programs to allow more tax cuts for the rich and increase debt.

"The misplaced priorities demonstrated in this budget are astounding," said Rep. Jim McGovern, Massachusetts Democrat.

Future Is Cloudy For House G.O.P. Budget Bill (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — House Republicans won their hard-fought budget victory early Thursday morning as the House voted 218 to 210 to approve a $2.7 trillion spending plan. But the victory may be more symbolic than substantive.

Lawmakers doubt the House blueprint will ever be reconciled with a larger Senate budget. But Republican leaders, who cut a last-minute deal with party moderates to seal the budget vote, were determined to force through a plan that held the line on federal spending as a show of fiscal discipline.

"We successfully worked with conservatives, moderates and appropriators alike to come together as a team and pass a responsible budget that controls spending," said Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, who had made the budget vote a priority since assuming his leadership role this year.

Democrats, who voted unanimously against the plan, criticized both its reductions in spending on social programs and its forecast of a $348 billion deficit in 2007. "The tide of red ink rises forever," said Representative Sander M. Levin, Democrat of Michigan. "This policy is unsustainable and morally indefensible."

The key to the budget approval was a leadership promise to Republican centrists that an additional $3.1 billion would be found for health and education programs as Congress moved through its individual spending bills. Democrats said the moderates had agreed in return for a vague pledge of future money, but Representative Michael N. Castle, the Delaware Republican who led the push for the extra money, said he thought the leadership would follow through.

"We are aware it is a promise, but we had a lot of talks about it and they are pretty committed," Mr. Castle said of the leadership.

Though the agreement resulted in Mr. Castle and others deciding to support the budget, 12 Republicans voted against it, including some lawmakers in difficult re-election fights, like Representatives Heather A. Wilson of New Mexico and Jim Gerlach of Pennsylvania.

By establishing an overall spending limit, the House has made it harder for lawmakers to force politically difficult votes by pushing for more money.

Even before the final concessions on health and education spending, the leadership had stripped issues like Medicare cuts, called for by President Bush, from the spending bill.

Panel Approves Gay 'Marriage' Ban (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, May 19, 2006

The Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday approved a constitutional amendment against homosexual "marriage" in a brief but nasty meeting.

"If you want to leave, good riddance," Chairman Arlen Specter told Sen. Russ Feingold, the Wisconsin Democrat who refused to participate because, he said, the meeting was not sufficiently open to the public.

"I've enjoyed your lecture, too. See ya," Mr. Feingold told the Pennsylvania Republican before storming out of the cramped and ornate President's Room just off the Senate floor.

The committee approved the measure on a party-line vote. Mr. Specter said he opposes the amendment but supports sending it out of committee to the Senate floor, where it is expected to be taken up next month.

Majority Leader Bill Frist, the Tennessee Republican who is viewed as a 2008 presidential contender, said he will take up the matter the week of June 5.

Even backers of the amendment say it's not likely to go far this year beyond becoming a hot-button political issue in the November elections. Because the measure seeks to change the Constitution, it must pass both houses of Congress by a two-thirds majority and then be approved by at least 38 states.

But the sponsor of the amendment says it's about more than just election-year politics.

"If we quit bringing it up here and talking about it here, in effect we leave the decision-making process to the judicial side," amendment sponsor Sen. Wayne Allard, Colorado Republican, told reporters after the committee vote.

"Marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman," reads the measure. "Neither this Constitution, nor the constitution of any State, shall be construed to require that marriage or the legal incidents thereof be conferred upon any union other than the union of a man and a woman."

Vermont Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, the committee's top Democrat, said the marriage amendment was a waste of time for a committee that needs to tackle a wide range of other pressing issues -- from judicial nominations to oversight of the National Security Agency's domestic-spying program.

"I didn't realize marriages were so threatened. Nor did my wife of 44 years," Mr. Leahy said.

Mr. Leahy said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, who is Mormon, has expressed support for polygamists in his home state of Utah.

"I never said that," Mr. Hatch replied. "I know some [polygamists] that are very sincere. ... Don't accuse me of wanting to have polygamy."

Senate Panel OKs Gay-marriage Ban (USAT)

USA Today, May 19, 2006

The Senate Judiciary Committee approved a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage after a shouting match between two senators Thursday. It began when Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., declared his opposition to the amendment, his love of the Constitution and his intention to leave the meeting.

“I don't need to be lectured by you,” Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said. “Good riddance.”

"I've enjoyed your lecture, too," replied Feingold, who is considering a run for president in 2008.

The panel voted 10-8 along party lines to send the measure to the full Senate. It says, "Marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman." Specter said he opposes the measure but wants it debated. A constitutional amendment needs approval by two-thirds of the House and the Senate, and three-fourths of the states.

Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia reminded a Capitol Hill audience that he does not believe the justices should invoke foreign law in their decisions. But then he had a message for Congress on the topic: Don't try to legislate against it.

"I don't think it's any of your business," said Scalia, the most outspoken justice, after prefacing the remark with a quip: "Part of my charm is that I always tell people things they don't want to hear."

Scalia said that as much as he abhors the increasing use by other justices of international law in their decisions — to support rulings such as a ban on the death penalty for juveniles and protection for homosexual relations — he does not want Congress to meddle.

"If you tell us not to use foreign law, I suppose you can tell us not to use certain principles of logic," he said. A pending resolution by Rep. Tom Feeney, R-Fla., with 83 co-sponsors, says judges generally should not rely on foreign rulings or laws. Feeney was not at the luncheon where Scalia spoke. He said later that the resolution does not tell the court how to rule but attempts to admonish the court when it relies on foreign law. — Joan Biskupic

Members of the House Homeland Security oversight subcommittee criticized the Department of Homeland Security for security gaps. Among the issues: Brian Doyle, the department's fourth-ranking spokesman, was charged with sexually preying on a detective posing as a 14-year-old girl in cyberspace; and the department awarded $25 million in limousine contracts to a Virginia-based company whose owner, Christopher Baker, has numerous felony convictions.

"We're talking about people who were driving the highest people in the department around," said committee Chairman Pete King, R-N.Y.

Dwight Williams, the department's security officer, said Homeland Security might not have had the authority to look at Baker's criminal past. Gregg Prillaman, the department's personnel director, said the department is still feeling growing pains from merging 185,000 employees from 22 agencies in 2003.

Bid To Revive Offshore Gas Drilling Falls Short In House (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON — A new drive to relax the long-standing ban on offshore energy exploration came up short in the House of Representatives on Thursday.

By a 217-203 vote, a bipartisan coalition of coastal-state lawmakers beat back an effort to exempt drilling for natural gas from the congressional moratorium.

But the vote — closer than last year's 262-157 roll call on a similar measure — reflected the heightened political anxiety over high energy prices in this election year.

It is expected to embolden pro-drilling forces to make a more determined push in coming months to try again to relax the moratorium, which currently prohibits oil as well as natural gas drilling offshore in the Atlantic and Pacific oceans as well as in a wide swath of the eastern Gulf of Mexico.

One proposal that might stand a better chance would let states opt out of the moratorium in return for a share of drilling royalties. Another would expand energy exploration in the eastern gulf.

In a statement, the American Gas Assn. said the vote signaled growing support for lifting the moratorium for natural gas exploration on the outer continental shelf. That increasing support will add "tremendous momentum to other legislative efforts to get an [outer continental shelf] bill through the House and Senate," the statement said.

Environmentalists expressed relief, but Sierra Club Executive Director Carl Pope warned, "We must remain vigilant."

Thursday's vote came during consideration of the Interior Department's annual spending bill, which has included a moratorium since the early 1980s. New energy exploration is prohibited except in parts of the Gulf of Mexico and areas off Alaska. A presidential order also prohibits drilling in most coastal waters until 2012.

Farm and manufacturing groups hard hit by high fuel costs joined the energy industry in pushing to relax the drilling ban. Although high gasoline prices have generated attention, natural gas prices have also soared. Winter average natural gas bills for Southern California Gas Co. residential customers were 20% to 25% higher than last winter, according to the company.

Rep. John E. Peterson (R-Pa.), who led the effort to relax the moratorium, argued that natural gas could be explored without risking an oil spill, an assertion that anti-drilling lawmakers disputed.

Peterson also warned that high fuel costs threaten to drive more U.S. companies overseas. "Folks, this is about the economy of America," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0029164

Rep. Ralph Regula (R-Ohio) added: "I don't think it's fair to 280 million Americans to deny them access to an asset that belongs to all of them."

Coastal-state lawmakers, including a number of pro-business Republicans, argued that the measure could endanger their states' tourist economies.

"I can assure you that people don't go visit the coast of Florida or the coast of California to watch oil wells," said Rep. Sam Farr (D-Carmel).

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger joined several other coastal-state governors, including Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, in urging their state delegations to oppose weakening the moratorium. In a letter, Schwarzenegger called the state's coastline "an integral part of our culture, our heritage and our economy."

Offshore drilling has been a significant issue in California since a 1969 oil platform blowout off the coast of Santa Barbara caused extensive environmental damage.

In the California delegation, Republicans Mary Bono of Palm Springs, Ken Calvert of Corona, John Campbell of Irvine, David Dreier of San Dimas, Elton Gallegly of Simi Valley and Ed Royce of Fullerton joined all the Democrats in supporting the continued moratorium. With the exception of Rep. Richard W. Pombo of Tracy, who did not vote, all other Republicans were opposed.

Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands), the influential chairman of the House Appropriations Committee who last year favored keeping the moratorium, was among those who changed his vote Thursday. Jim Specht, a Lewis spokesman, said his boss was moved by the increase in energy prices.

"As gas prices have continued to increase, he has become convinced that we must find new sources to fix the long-term problem of increasing supply," Specht said.

Vote In House Seeks To Erase Oil Windfall (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — In an attempt to revoke billions of dollars worth of government incentives to oil and gas producers, the House on Thursday approved a measure that would pressure companies to renegotiate more than 1,000 leases for drilling in the Gulf of Mexico.

The measure, approved 252 to 165 over the objections of many Republican leaders, is intended to prevent companies from avoiding at least $7 billion in payments to the government over the next five years for oil and gas they produce in publicly owned waters.

Scores of Republicans, already under fire from voters about gasoline prices, sided with Democrats on the issue. Eighty-five Republicans voted to attach the provision to the Interior Department's annual spending bill. The measure would require adoption by the Senate, which is less reflexively supportive of the energy industry than the House, and will almost certainly provoke intense opposition from oil and gas producers.

In a raucous debate on the House floor before the vote, Democrats argued that energy companies were shortchanging taxpayers at the same time that soaring prices for crude oil and natural gas had pushed industry profits to record highs.

"Oil companies want to play Uncle Sam for Uncle Sucker," said Representative Edward J. Markey, a Massachusetts Democrat who co-sponsored the amendment with Representative Maurice D. Hinchey, Democrat of New York. "Today, we must put an end to these senseless giveaways."

Republican leaders, who had hoped to avoid a vote on the issue, agreed that companies should not be getting lucrative incentives in times of high prices. But they insisted that the government had no right to reopen valid leases that it signed years ago with offshore drillers.

"These leases were valid legal contracts signed between the government and these companies in good faith," said Representative Mike Simpson, Republican of Idaho. "The Congress and the government should keep their word when they sign a contract."

In a separate defeat for energy companies, the House voted 279 to 141 to reject a provision that would lift a 25-year ban on oil drilling in coastal areas outside the western Gulf of Mexico.

Lawmakers also voted 217 to 203 to continue the prohibition on drilling just for natural gas.

The lopsided vote to rescind royalty incentives, which surprised many of the proposal's own sponsors, came three months after The New York Times disclosed that companies drilling in publicly-owned waters of the Gulf of Mexico were set to escape royalties on about $65 billion worth of oil and gas over the next five years.

The windfall stemmed in large part from a major error in about 1,000 leases that the Clinton administration signed with energy companies in 1998 and 1999.

To encourage drilling and exploration in water thousands of feet deep, the government offered to let companies avoid the standard royalties, usually 12 percent or 16 percent of sales, for large quantities of the oil and gas they produced.

But the incentives, which have been expanded in recent years by the Bush administration and by Congress, were supposed to stop as soon as prices for oil climbed above $34 a barrel and prices for natural gas climbed above $4 per thousand cubic feet.

For reasons that are now being investigated, the Interior Department omitted the restriction in 1,000 leases it signed in 1998 and 1999. In addition, the Bush administration offered extra "royalty relief" to companies that drilled very deep wells in very shallow water.

The lost royalties are just beginning to hit the government's bottom line.

The Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, estimated in March that the royalty incentives could cost the government $20 billion over the next 25 years.

On top of that, at least one oil company, the Kerr-McGee Corporation, has sued the Bush administration in a test case to expand the "royalty relief" far more. If the Kerr-McGee lawsuit is successful, the G.A.O. estimated, the government could lose a total of $80 billion over the next 25 years.

The amendment approved on Thursday would try to force oil companies to revise their contracts and agree to pay full royalties when energy prices climb above the "threshold levels."

To give the government bargaining power, the bill would also prohibit the Interior Department from awarding any new leases to companies that refuse to revisit their leases.

The industry is itself divided on the issue. Some of the big integrated oil and gas companies, like Exxon Mobil, have already declared that they see no need for incentives in today's environment of high prices.

But many smaller producers are determined to retain their incentives and to fight for even more.

"Forcing renegotiations of contracts would be changing the rules in the middle of the game and would raise serious questions about contract law," said Dan Naatz, vice president for federal resources at the Independent Petroleum Association of America, a trade group that represents independent producers. The Bush administration did not take a position on the House measure, though senior officials have repeatedly said they were powerless to change valid contracts.

It is unclear whether the Senate will go along with the provision. But Democratic lawmakers have already been pushing.

Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon, filibustered for five hours last month in an attempt to attach a similar proposal to major spending bill. Senator Diane Feinstein, Democrat of California, has drafted a bill similar to the House measure.

Auto Makers Support Alternative-Fuel Measures (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The chief executives of Detroit's Big Three auto makers made clear to Congress what they want -- and what they think they might get -- from the government: financing for the pumps and other support needed to encourage Americans to use more ethanol and other gasoline alternatives.

In exchange, the leaders of Ford Motor Co., General Motors Corp. and DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler division promised to produce millions more vehicles that can run on domestically produced alternatives to petroleum.

The executives, meeting in back-to-back sessions with Republican and Democratic leaders of the House and Senate, didn't push for any particular piece of legislation. Rather, they said there were a lot of good ideas on the table.

"We recognize that there are problems, and we are going to work as partners" with the auto makers, said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.). "Perhaps in the last many years we have not worked together as well as we should have."

Aware that voters want Congress to do something to address high gasoline prices, the auto executives were determined to project a positive attitude aimed at solving the problem. The companies dismissed talk of a government bailout despite GM's and Ford's financial problems. And they focused on their support for alternative fuels, rather than their opposition to higher fuel-economy standards.

"We talked about our companies' commitment to developing and introducing more products with newer technology to help drive energy security here in America," said GM's chairman and chief executive officer, Rick Wagoner.

Because U.S. auto makers sell so many gas-guzzling pickup trucks and sport-utility vehicles, Detroit lags behind its foreign competitors in the overall mileage of its fleet. Demand for profitable but low-mileage SUVs has dropped, and GM and Ford have been hurt as they try to stem big losses in their North American auto operations. Detroit also is far behind Honda Motor Co. and Toyota Motor Corp. in production of hybrid vehicles that run on both electricity and gasoline.

But the domestic companies are ahead in production of "flexible fuel" vehicles that can run on E85, a fuel that is 85% ethanol and 15% gasoline. GM, Ford and Chrysler have produced five million of these cars, which provide the companies with special credits needed to meet federal fuel-economy standards. Because E85 is available at only about 600 of 170,000 U.S. gas stations, few of these vehicles ever run on anything but gasoline. Another problem: Because of water condensation in the pipelines that transport much of the nation's oil and gasoline, ethanol must be shipped by truck or train.

The trio of executives -- Ford Chairman and CEO Bill Ford Jr., Chrysler Chief Executive Tom LaSorda and Mr. Wagoner -- had planned to meet with President Bush yesterday, but that meeting was postponed.

In their Capitol Hill sessions, the auto companies said that for ethanol to make a real impact on cutting U.S. oil consumption, flexible fuels must be available at 20% to 30% of the nation's gas stations. Better availability of ethanol could also help car sales, as domestic auto makers would have a product available for customers concerned about rising gasoline prices. In the past, ethanol has been more expensive than gas, but that equation is changing as gas prices climb.

The trio also endorsed the goal pushed by the Energy Future Coalition -- which includes farmers, environmental groups and others -- for the U.S. to produce 25% of its energy through renewable fuels by 2025.

The CEOs tried to steer clear of discussions about higher fuel-economy standards. The Bush administration has asked Congress for authority to restructure the passenger-car standard, a move that could help Detroit by setting lower standards for larger cars. And auto makers are cautiously optimistic that a Bush-crafted plan would increase overall mileage targets only modestly. But auto makers worry that lawmakers could attach a provision requiring much higher mileage.

Automakers Push Higher Use Of Ethanol (USAT/AP)

USA Today, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Detroit automakers pressed Congress on Thursday to help make ethanol fuels more widely available, saying that would be an immediate step toward lessening U.S. dependence on foreign oil.

CEOs of General Motors, Ford Motor and DaimlerChrysler's Chrysler Group appealed to lawmakers for incentives to increase the number of gas stations offering blends of the corn-based fuel.

"If we want a game changer, and a game changer in very short term and in big numbers, then ethanol is a very good play for this country," said Ford's Bill Ford.

The executives endorsed a plan to have renewable fuels meet 25% of the nation's transportation energy needs by 2025. GM's Rick Wagoner said the automakers want to be leaders "in this historic shift from energy consumption."

Other topics discussed during their day on Capitol Hill included health care, trade and currency manipulation by other countries.

"We really tried to make it clear to them we weren't interested in coming asking for help for the domestic auto industry," Wagoner said. "We were interested in talking about things that would improve the competitiveness of the U.S. economy."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said they had productive discussions on several subjects, including "the importance of energy independence being a long-term goal for this country."

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said lawmakers and auto executives were confident they could work together to "bring back the American automobile industry where we think it should be and they think it should be."

The executives arrived in vehicles powered by ethanol and decorated with images of corn stalks. They said they had produced 5 million vehicles capable of running on ethanol blends and planned to bring an additional 1 million to the market this year.

The obstacle to widespread benefit of flexible-fuel vehicles, which can run on a blend of up to 85% ethanol and 15% gasoline, is finding ethanol pumps. Industry officials estimate that about 685 of the 165,000 fueling stations in the USA offer ethanol blends.

Pump prices top $3 a gallon in many places. President Bush has sought an increase in the availability of ethanol and alternative fuels, more research for hybrid vehicle batteries and elimination of the cap on tax credits for the purchase of hybrids.

The auto executives plan to meet in June with Bush.

The administration also has asked Congress to give it the authority to change mileage rules for passenger cars, a move that could lead to higher requirements.

Wagoner said they did not have extensive talks about fuel economy standards.

Big 3 Leaders Lobby On The Hill (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

Washington Post, May 19, 2006

Leaders of Detroit's Big Three automakers came together on Capitol Hill yesterday in an uncharacteristic display of unity to build support for ethanol fuel and to rally legislators behind the financially strapped industry.

DOJ_NMG_0029167

The U.S. automakers have had difficulty getting their message across in Washington in the past year as their profits have sunk and they have come under increasing assault in their home market by rivals from Japan, South Korea and Europe.

In a day-long series of meetings, the auto executives met with House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.); House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.); and Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), a key supporter of the industry. In the Senate, they met with Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and a number of Democratic senators, including Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, and Debbie Stabenow and Carl M. Levin of Michigan.

The automakers had been scheduled to meet with President Bush this week, but he postponed the gathering until June 2. Officials at the auto companies said yesterday that the June 2 meeting has also been postponed.

At the end of the day yesterday, the executives said they would join a coalition of other business and political leaders dedicated to providing 25 percent of U.S. energy needs from renewable sources by 2025.

General Motors Corp. Chairman Rick Wagoner said the nation was undergoing a historic shift in energy consumption, adding that greater use of ethanol was "the best opportunity right now" to reduce the nation's dependence on foreign oil. "We need to pursue all options," he said. Ford Motor Co. Chairman William C. Ford called ethanol a "game-changer" for the industry.

By the end of the year, the three auto companies say, they will have 6 million vehicles on the road capable of using a corn-based fuel called E85. But drivers have virtually no place to get the fuel. Of the 180,000 service stations nationwide, about 600 sell the ethanol blend. The U.S. auto companies have been battered by rising gasoline prices in the past year. Profits at GM, Ford and DaimlerChrysler AG, which owns Chrysler, are heavily dependent on sales of large pickup trucks and sport-utility vehicles.

Ford, Wagoner and Chrysler chief executive Thomas W. LaSorda repeatedly said they did not come to Washington for handouts and said there was no talk in the meetings of a government bailout for the industry. Congressional staff members said the automakers also brought up the need to reform the nation's pension system. Lawmakers expressed some support for the industry. Reid said lawmakers would work with the companies to "bring back the American automobile industry where we think it should be."

Detroit has a big agenda in Washington, and it has long sought a more proactive role for the government. Among the automakers' concerns are the escalating cost of providing health care and pensions for hundreds of thousands of workers and retirees. The companies have also asked for subsidies for research and development and more tax credits to prop up demand for alternative-fuel vehicles.

Japanese automakers now lead in the development of gas-electric hybrid technology. The U.S. companies also have complained that they have limited access to foreign markets and have accused China and Japan of manipulating their currencies for trade advantage.

David E. Cole of the Center for Automotive Research in Ann Arbor said the automakers were trying to build a consensus message. "Individually, they tend to talk about different things at different times, and that really has not been very helpful," Cole said.

Harley Shaiken, a professor at the University of California at Berkeley, said lawmakers tend to minimize the importance of the Detroit automakers, which still hold 60 percent of the U.S. market.

"It is rather remarkable that this is even necessary," he said of yesterday's meetings. "In the mid-'50s, you would almost have the Congress go to Detroit, versus the Big Three executives come to Washington. There would have been no need to remind anybody about how central the American auto industry was."

Carlos Gutierrez (CSM)

By David T. Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, May 19, 2006

Secretary of Commerce Carlos Gutierrez was Thursday's guest. Here are excerpts from his remarks: On whether recent signs of rising inflation threaten the US economy:

"Everything suggests that we should be able to get through this period without seeing inflation increase to a point where it would become a problem." On speculation he will be named Treasury secretary:

"I love serving the president in the job I am doing and serving the country. I haven't given it much thought." On the importance of immigration reform:

"This is probably the social/domestic issue of our time and unless we tackle it, confront it, solve it in a comprehensive way, we are just going to let the problem get bigger and more complex." On whether anti-immigrant rhetoric from some Republicans will hurt the GOP with Hispanic voters:

"There are a lot of values that attract Latinos and Hispanics to the Republican Party.... The leader of the Republican Party has believed in this issue and has been a staunch proponent of comprehensive reform from the time he was governor of Texas.... [T]he symbol of the Republican Party is President Bush and that is what I believe will attract Latinos and Hispanics to the Republican Party." On whether the Sarbanes-Oxley corporate reform law has worked:

"Overall it has been a positive thing. Where we need to be very vigilant ... is with small business [so we don't put these businesses] at a competitive disadvantage."

Shares Continue Falling On Interest Jitters (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

Wall Street extended its losses yesterday, a day after an inflation scare sent the Dow Jones industrial average on its biggest one-day drop in three years and put the Nasdaq composite index in the red for 2006.

Stocks drifted in a narrow range through most of the session but took a sharp turn lower in the last hour of trading, when a market already nervous about interest rates was unsettled by comments from William Poole, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, who reiterated that the central bank's future rate increases would depend on economic conditions.

Concerns that rising inflation would send rates higher propelled the stock market sharply lower Wednesday, carrying the Dow down 214 points in the process.

Even before Mr. Poole's comments were reported on news services, investors were clearly not in a mood to buy. Data showing a moderating economy had little impact on trading, including an unexpected drop in the Conference Board's index of leading indicators and an upswing in jobless claims.

"This market is just scared right now," said Ryan Larson, an equity trader at Voyageur Asset Management. "People are taking money off the table and no bets are being made because no one knows what to do right now."

The Dow dropped 77.32 points, or 0.69 percent, to 11,128.29. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index lost 8.51 points, or 0.67 percent, to 1,261.81, and the Nasdaq sank 15.48 points, or 0.7 percent, to 2,180.32.

Although yesterday's mild economic data did little for stocks, it brightened the bond market's outlook for interest rates. The yield on the 10-year Treasury note plunged to 5.06 percent, from 5.14 percent on Wednesday. Its price rose 21/32 to 10016/32.

The catalyst for the previous day's frenzied selling was a stronger-than-forecast jump in consumer prices that ignited concerns that the Fed might keep raising interest rates amid signs that record energy costs were beginning to seep into other parts of the economy.

Some analysts say higher interest rates are inevitable given the strength of the global economy, and the market's recent retreat was indicative of investors' overblown expectations that the Fed was nearly done with its rate tightening. The uncertainty now lies in whether the Fed will sacrifice economic growth to impede escalating prices, or risk inflation to aid the economy's expansion.

Mr. Poole, who is not a voting member of the Fed's policy-making Federal Open Market Committee, also noted that it was possible, though not likely, that the Fed would cut rates or move beyond the current level for the benchmark federal funds of 5.25 percent.

"I think investors are trying to figure out how much damage the Fed may need to do to growth for inflation pressures to be arrested," said Stuart Schweitzer, global markets strategist for J. P. Morgan Asset and Wealth Management. "It's possible that the Fed has already done enough, but it's looking increasingly unlikely."

Mr. Larson of Voyageur added that while crude oil was off its record high of $75 a barrel, traders could soon grow fearful about the upcoming hurricane season, after last year's storms battered Gulf Coast refineries. Oil futures reversed course after two days of selling, with a barrel of light crude adding 76 cents, to $69.45, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The Sears Holdings Corporation said it swung to a profit on improved results at its Kmart and Sears department stores. Sears surged $17.89, to $155.85.

Burger King Holdings rose 50 cents, closing at $17.50 in its trading debut after pricing its initial public offering at $17 a share.

Declining issues overtook advancers late in the day and were ahead by five to three on the New York Stock Exchange, where the volume of 1.77 billion shares lagged the 2.1 billion shares that changed hands Wednesday.

Stocks Extend Their Descent As Bonds Climb (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

After plunging 214.28 points on Wednesday, the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell another 77.32, leaving it down 4.4% since its skid began last Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0029169

Comments from the presidents of two regional Federal Reserve banks helped prolong worries that inflation is worsening despite repeated Fed interest-rate increases, and the uncertainty made investors even less eager to own stocks.

The industrial average fell 0.69% to 11128.29, the lowest finish in a month. It still is up 3.8% this year.

The Nasdaq Composite Index is down 1.1% for 2006, at its lowest point since November. Yesterday it fell 0.71%, or 15.48 points, to 2180.32. Its eight-day losing streak is its longest since 1994.

But bond investors didn't share stock investors' fears. Treasury bonds rose sharply, driving the yield of the 10-year Treasury note down to 5.065%. Some investors appeared to be shifting money to bonds from stocks, seeking bonds' relative safety and trying to take advantage of the recent rise in bond yields, which makes bonds more lucrative.

Stocks initially rose, too, as investors saw signs of a slowing economy, which would hold down inflation. Reports showed a rise in jobless claims last week and a decline in the index of leading indicators -- which includes things such as new orders that presage economic growth.

But Richmond Federal Reserve Bank President Jeffrey Lacker said higher-than-expected recent inflation readings make it "less likely" that the Fed will be able to pause in its interest-rate increases at its next policy meeting, June 28 and 29. St. Louis Fed President William Poole said he couldn't rule out either a rate cut or a bigger-than-normal rate increase at that meeting. He said such extreme moves were unlikely, but his uncertainty seemed to rattle stock investors.

"Once the forces of inflation get into the economy it is hard to wring them out," said Todd Clark, director of stock trading at San Francisco money-management and brokerage firm Nollenberger Capital Partners. Investors fear the Fed might be forced to raise rates so high that it provokes a recession.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.67%, or 8.51 points, to 1261.81, up 1.1% this year.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated1; bond prices gained2. The 10-year Treasury note rose 24/32, or $7.50 for each $1,000 invested. The 30-year bond was up 1 18/32 to yield 5.168%.

The dollar was mixed3. Late in New York, the currency traded at 111.04 yen, up from 110.94, while the euro rose against the dollar to $1.2821 from $1.2750.

Leading Indicators Reinforce Idea That Growth Is Slowing (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — An important gauge of the nation's future economic activity dipped in April, once again suggesting slower growth in the months ahead.

The Conference Board, a private research group, reported Thursday that its index of leading economic indicators fell by 0.1 percentage point, to 138.9, last month. Economists were predicting a small rise. In March the index climbed by 0.4 percentage point, to 139.

The index predicts economic activity three to six months in the future.

Economists said the decline reinforced the Federal Reserve's forecast that economic growth, which has been brisk, would most likely moderate to a more sustainable pace in the coming months.

In the first quarter of this year, the economy grew at a 4.8 percent pace, the fastest in two and a half years. Analysts expect growth will slow to a pace of 3 percent to 3.5 percent in the second and third quarters.

Lynn Reaser, chief economist at Bank of America Investment Strategies Group, said: "The index is flashing not a recession but a slowing in growth, which is a welcome sign. Unfortunately, we are not seeing an accompanying moderation in inflation yet."

The decline in the index comes as the housing market is slowing, energy prices are high and consumer confidence is sagging. April's index reading was weighed down by, among other things, a drop in building permits, a dip in consumer expectations and a rise in claims for jobless benefits.

The Labor Department said the number of people signing up for jobless benefits rose sharply last week, mainly because of the lingering effects of a partial government shutdown in Puerto Rico, which has now been resolved. New applications filed for unemployment insurance shot up by a seasonally adjusted 42,000, to 367,000, for the week ended May 13. That was the highest level of claims since early in October.

The Federal Reserve raised interest rates last week for the 16th time in two years, an effort to keep inflation from accelerating.

Fed policy makers left future rate decisions open as they grapple with whether the economy is more likely to slow or high energy costs are more likely to ignite price and wage rises. If policy makers think slower growth is the more probable course, then a pause may be favored. If inflation is more likely, another rate increase may be in store.

DOJ_NMG_0029170

After the Labor Department reported Wednesday that consumer prices increased by 0.6 percent in April, many economists said the odds were now increasing that the Fed would bump up rates again at its next meeting on June 28 and 29.

Housing Cool-Down Is 'Orderly,' Fed Chief Says (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

Confirming what home buyers suspected and real estate sales figures have indicated for months, Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said yesterday that the U.S. housing market was showing clear signs of cooling off.

Bernanke said the slowdown is "moderate" and "orderly" and pointed to the overall strength of the economy.

"We're seeing slowing in sales, slowing in starts. There also seem to be signs that prices are not rising as quickly as they have been for the past few years," Bernanke said in response to questions after a speech in Chicago, Bloomberg News reported.

His comments came as Freddie Mac announced that the average rate on a 30-year, fixed mortgage hit 6.6 percent this week, the highest in almost four years. Rising long-term rates have contributed to the housing industry's slowdown. The Commerce Department this week said construction of new homes fell 7.4 percent in April, to an annualized pace of 1.85 million homes. It was the third straight monthly decline.

Analysts were divided about Bernanke's assessment. Peter Morici, an economist at the University of Maryland's Robert H. Smith School of Business, said Bernanke's comments were "right on."

Morici said he saw the rise in long-term interest rates as healthy, with the economy moving away from its dependence on the housing market and "hyper-consumption" fueled by people taking out loans against their houses. "The housing market is going to come back to earth," he said.

Economist Dean Baker of the Center for Economic Policy and Research expressed concern that rising interest rates were squeezing homeowners who took out interest-only and adjustable-rate mortgages. Even when interest rates were at historically low levels, Baker said, stretched buyers were taking out exotic loans to get into pricey homes.

Baker said a rising inventory of homes in the Washington region could fuel a double-digit price decline if interest rates climb higher. Condo prices could fall by as much as 30 percent, and prices of single-family homes could drop by as much as 15 percent, he said.

Former Fed chairman Alan Greenspan echoed Bernanke's analysis in a speech last night to the Bond Market Association in New York. "The boom is over. We can say that with some confidence," Greenspan said. But, he added, "there is no evidence that prices are going to collapse."

Greenspan predicted that the U.S. market was more likely to follow the path set by housing markets in Australia and Britain, where "prices just flattened out."

The consequences for the broader economy are not yet clear, Greenspan said. But if rising home prices and cheap home equity loans have been fueling consumer spending, as many economists think, "there is going to be some slowing of consumption," he said.

Bernanke did not address whether the Fed would pause in its campaign of raising short-term interest rates. Last week, the central bank raised its benchmark rate for the 16th consecutive time since June 2004 in response to continuing signs of inflationary pressures.

On Wednesday, the Commerce Department reported that April consumer prices rose at the highest rate in three months, leading many analysts to believe that the Fed would continue raising short-term rates. Richmond Fed President Jeffrey M. Lacker said in a speech yesterday in Norfolk that the Fed is less likely to suspend its interest-rate increases in light of higher consumer prices.

The shifting housing market has left sellers and buyers alike uncertain about their next steps.

"On the one hand, you feel like you can sit back and wait. On the other hand, you feel like you don't want to because of the interest rates" said John Booth Babcock, a transportation planner from Arlington who had considered buying but has now decided to wait. "No matter what you think the situation is, there's no comfort level."

Coming Down To Earth (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

Um, wasn't the stock market supposed to bounce back after Wednesday's big drop?

We shouldn't read too much into a couple of days' movements in stock prices. But it seems that investors are suddenly feeling uneasy about the state of the economy. They should be; the puzzle is why they haven't been uneasy all along.

DOJ_NMG_0029171

The rise in stock prices that began last fall was essentially based on the belief that the U.S. economy can defy gravity — that both individuals and the nation as a whole can spend more than their income, not on a temporary basis, but more or less indefinitely.

To be fair, for a while the data seemed to confirm that belief. In 2005, the trade deficit passed $700 billion, yet the dollar actually rose against the euro and the yen. Housing prices soared, yet houses kept selling. The price of gasoline neared $3 a gallon, yet consumers kept buying both gas and other items, even though they had to borrow to keep spending (the personal savings rate went negative for the first time since the 1930's).

Over the last few weeks, however, gravity seems to have started reasserting itself.

The dollar began falling about a month ago. So far it's down less than 10 percent against the euro and the yen, but there's a definite sense that foreign governments, in particular, are becoming less willing to keep the dollar strong by buying lots of U.S. debt.

The housing market seems to be weakening rapidly. As late as last October, the National Association of Home Builders/Wells Fargo housing market index, a measure of builders' confidence, was still close to the high point it reached last summer. But on Monday the association announced that the index had fallen to its lowest level since 1995.

Finally, there are preliminary indications that consumers, hard-pressed by high gasoline prices, may be reaching their limit.

The National Retail Federation, reporting on a new survey, warns that "while consumers have seemed resilient in the face of higher energy costs, a tipping point may soon be in sight."

I can't resist pointing out that the Bush administration's response to the squeeze on working families has been, you guessed it, to accuse the news media of biased reporting.

On May 10 the White House issued a press release titled "Setting the Record Straight: The New York Times Continues to Ignore America's Economic Progress." The release attacked The Times for asserting that paychecks weren't keeping up with fixed costs like medical care and gasoline. The White House declared, "But average hourly earnings have risen 3.8 percent over the past 12 months, their largest increase in nearly five years."

On Wednesday Treasury Secretary John Snow repeated that boast before a House committee. However, Representative Barney Frank was ready. He asked whether the number was adjusted for inflation; after flailing about, Mr. Snow admitted, sheepishly, that it wasn't. In fact, nearly all of the wage increase was negated by higher prices.

Meanwhile, the return of economic gravity poses a definite threat to U.S. economic growth. After all, growth over the past three years was driven mainly by a housing boom and rapid growth in consumer spending. People were able to buy houses, even though housing prices rose much faster than incomes, because foreign purchases of U.S. debt kept interest rates low. People were able to keep spending, even though wages didn't keep up with inflation, because mortgage refinancing let them turn the rising value of their houses into ready cash.

As I summarized it awhile back, we became a nation in which people make a living by selling one another houses, and they pay for the houses with money borrowed from China.

Now that game seems to be coming to an end. We're going to have to find other ways to make a living — in particular, we're going to have to start selling goods and services, not just I.O.U.'s, to the rest of the world, and/or replace imports with domestic production. And adjusting to that new way of making a living will take time.

Will we have that time? Ben Bernanke, the chairman of the Federal Reserve, contends that what's happening in the housing market is "a very orderly and moderate kind of cooling." Maybe he's right. But if he isn't, the stock market drop of the last two days will be remembered as the start of a serious economic slowdown.

Adam Smith Growls (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

Stocks continued their weeklong plunge yesterday, selling off again at the end of the day on more inflationary fears. The way to understand this washout -- knocking 4.4% off the Dow -- is that Adam Smith is giving the U.S. financial establishment a warning.

We're using our favorite moral philosopher here as a proxy for the ruthless discipline of financial markets. They can be brutal in punishing economic mismanagement, and for several days Mr. Smith has been growling that the Federal Reserve and its easy-money cheerleaders on Wall Street and in Washington need to sober up, or there will be far worse to come. The press is calling this an "inflation scare," but for those who want to know how markets respond once a real inflation settles in, we suggest reading an economic history of the 1970s. It isn't pretty.

The 4.4%-cold shower may even prove to be beneficial if it changes the psychology in elite political and economic circles. For the last year especially, they've been ignoring signs of incipient inflation, first by trusting in Alan Greenspan's assurances, later pointing to low long-bond rates, or any other excuse to avoid facing up to a world awash in dollar liquidity and soaring gold, oil and other commodity prices. (See gold's run nearby.) This is the kind of psychology that often takes hold at this stage of an expansion, with everyone enjoying the good times and desperately afraid the Fed will spoil the fun.

But the lesson of the past 30 years is that the economic pain is far more severe the longer the Fed stays too accommodative and lets pricing pressures build. The consumer price index reading that triggered Wednesday's selloff is a lagging indicator, after all, the kind that tells you inflation is here only after it has already arrived. As Paul Volcker -- the man who finally broke the 1970s inflation -- once noted, the actual inflation data comes in months later but spot commodity prices are a real-time signal. Investors have finally begun to doubt the Fed's happy talk about a "pause" in raising interest rates or that inflationary pressures are "contained."

All of which suggests that Mr. Greenspan's successor as Fed Chairman, Ben Bernanke, is facing a rough passage. He's arrived at a Fed that has clearly made a mistake in letting inflation expectations build and has been very slow to admit it. The only questions now are the magnitude of that mistake and of the resulting financial casualties.

It's worth noting that while stocks fell yesterday, bonds rallied after comments by a couple of Fed officials that inflation may be gathering steam. "I pay a lot of attention to inflation expectations," said St. Louis Fed President William Poole, which makes us wonder what he and his colleagues have been paying attention to the last year.

The sooner Mr. Bernanke shows that he understands the problem, and has the fortitude to do something about it, the fewer casualties there will be. Sooner or later Adam Smith will take over if Mr. Bernanke doesn't.

Bush Plans To Nominate Bank Expert To SEC Panel (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

President Bush will nominate Kathleen L. Casey, a Senate aide and expert on banking and securities law, to the five-member Securities and Exchange Commission, the White House said yesterday.

The announcement came four days after Cynthia A. Glassman said she did not intend to serve a second term as a commissioner and will leave after her term ends June 5. That will open one of the three Republican seats on the commission.

Casey, whose term would extend to June 2011, must be confirmed by the Senate. She is the staff director and counsel for the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee. Earlier, she was chief of staff and legislative director for the committee's current chairman, Sen. Richard C. Shelby (R-Ala.).

The committee must consider the nomination before it can go to the full Senate. In a statement, Shelby said Casey is "eminently qualified to be a commissioner and will have my full support as she moves through the nomination process."

Casey has a bachelor's degree from Pennsylvania State University and a law degree from George Mason University.

A Right Turn Holds Perils For Bush (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

As they watch President Bush's approval ratings tumble, conservative activists are offering a surefire strategy for presidential recovery: Bush should move to the right and "rally his base."

There's one problem with this approach: It could do the president's party far more harm than good, even within its own ranks. The conservative view ignores the roots of the president's difficulties in the disaffection of moderate voters who are more concerned with performance -- or the lack thereof -- than ideology.

The Post-ABC News poll released this week found the president with a 33 percent approval rating and suffering losses in esteem almost everywhere. Conservatives are by no means his biggest problem.

In January 2005 Republicans who described themselves as conservative gave Bush an astonishing 94 percent approval rating. The new Post-ABC survey, conducted May 11 to May 15, put Bush's approval rating among conservative Republicans at 76 percent, down 18 points.

But the poll found that among moderate Republicans, the president's approval rating had declined 31 points, from 88 percent in January 2005 to 57 percent now. Recent surveys by Gallup and the Pew Research Center also point to losses among moderates.

Bush has lost even more ground among moderate independents. The Pew surveys found Bush's approval rating in this group dropping from 48 percent in January 2005 to 22 percent last month.

The middle of the middle is going south on Bush.

This creates a conflict between Bush's immediate political interests and the interests of many Republican candidates on the ballot this November.

DOJ_NMG_0029173

Bush's best shot at a quick jolt upward in his approval ratings is among conservatives in his own party, who are already more inclined to support him than anyone else and might come home in response to a presidential tilt rightward. But Rep. Chris Shays, a moderate from Connecticut, noted that many of the House Republicans most endangered in this fall's election -- himself included -- are moderates who would be hurt if his party and his president moved farther right.

"His going to the right to move up from 35 percent is not going to help us out," Shays, speaking for his fellow moderates, said in an interview. "It doesn't help me out for him to appeal to his conservative base."

Shays, who is at the top of Democratic target lists, was reelected with 52 percent of the vote in 2004 and faces the same opponent, Democrat Diane Farrell, this year. Shays is the one being judged this fall, not Bush. "Obviously, he should be true to himself and his principles," Shays said of the president, "but if he is looking for issues, he should be looking for issues that are helpful to those of us who are targets."

On the other hand, many of the House's staunchest conservatives -- such as Mike Pence of Indiana and John Shadegg of Arizona -- want Bush to emphasize conservative themes, including deep domestic spending cuts. But a frustrated Shays notes that conservatives urging the president to appeal to his base represent solidly Republican districts.

"Pence's election isn't in jeopardy," he said. "Shadegg's election isn't in jeopardy."

Rep. Tom Davis of Virginia, one of his party's shrewdest political strategists, keeps a sharp eye on the attitudes of moderate and moderately conservative suburbanites of the sort he represents. Davis sees a potential contradiction between one of the GOP's strategic imperatives -- to fire conservatives up enough to get them to the polls this fall -- and the other imperative of stopping defections among middle-of-the-road voters.

"Harder-core Republicans are disillusioned right now, but they're not going to vote for Democrats and Nancy Pelosi," Davis said in an interview, referring to the House Democratic leader. "It's your softer, more moderate Republicans who are now jumping ship."

Davis never likes to bad-mouth his party's electoral chances, and he notes that the six months between now and Election Day "are an eternity." He worries, though, about issues that could boost turnout in the base but drive away less-ideological voters. "To move right may fix part of the problem," Davis said, "but it could exacerbate the other problem."

Bush prospered in 2004 by turning out the Republican base. But the times are very different in 2006. Machiavelli noted that the successful politician "adapts his mode of proceeding to the qualities of the times" and warned against politicians who "remain obstinate in their modes." In 2006 one could imagine Machiavelli counseling moderation to the Republican Party. You wonder how Machiavellian the Republicans' conservative wing will let the party be.

McCain And The Base Truth (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

All successful politicians must have at least some talent for telling lies about what's in their hearts and convincing people that it is the truth. But Sen. John McCain has a unique genius for telling the truth from his heart and making people believe that he is lying. And these people are his supporters! They admire him as a straight-talking truth-teller, and they forgive him for taking positions on big issues that they find repellent, on the grounds that he doesn't really mean what he says.

"Oh, he has to say that to get the Republican nomination," explain many Democrats with a girlish crush on the charming, funny, intelligent and heroic Republican senator from Arizona, and/or a special loathing of their party's own star, the junior senator from New York. "That" might refer to McCain's strong right-to-life stand on abortion, or his strong support for the war in Iraq, or his recent rapprochement with Jerry Falwell. They admire McCain as a straight shooter among sneaks, a truth-teller amid bull artists. They long, understandably, for some fresh air in the fetid atmosphere of politics. And McCain delivers that.

Even better, he delivers the fresh air without the cloying aroma of piety. Or, rather, he can be pious, but the piety is diluted and made bearable by the knowing wink. He makes jokes at his own expense. That's attractive in a politician, but sometimes it is nothing more than a party trick. McCain goes further: Like Bob Dole, he makes jokes -- mean jokes, in public -- about others. That takes more wit and more guts. McCain is a good kind of cynic: He shares his cynicism with the rest of the class. The cynicism makes the piety bearable, while the piety makes the cynicism acceptable.

Journalists love him, of course. His frankness flatters us, and he flatters us more directly as well. Visiting a big convention of journalists last fall, McCain joined a group that was gambling at the hotel casino until the wee hours. In his speech the next morning, he cleverly nailed his audience and himself by declaring that he was happy to be among "my base."

McCain's "base" (poli-talk for his most loyal supporters) is actually larger than that. In a presidential run, he would have the votes of millions who disagree with him on major issues but like him anyway. His challenge is to get the votes of more people who agree with him. The fact that his base of support is people who disagree with him explains both why so many ideological soul mates dislike him and why they might support him anyway. It's because they think he is their best shot at winning. Thus, if

McCain becomes president, it will be the result of a cynical calculation by people who don't like him even though they agree with him, on top of support by people who disagree with him but admire his lack of cynicism.

In his pre-campaign for president, McCain is delivering four university graduation speeches. He gave two already, at Falwell's Liberty University and at Columbia University. His words to these two different audiences are quite similar (a brilliantly McCainian combination of laziness and courage). Read the texts . They are marvelous: witty, self-mocking, above all interesting . When McCain climbs onto an old warhorse like, say, filial obligation, you really do not know where he might take it. It would be wonderful to have a president whose speeches weren't a duty to listen to.

But how many Americans and Iraqis should die so that we can enjoy entertaining presidential speeches? If you support the war, that is a nonsense question. If you don't, it is more pressing. McCain is admirably clear: He supported going to war and he supports continuing it until . . . well, not so clear, but longer than most Democrats would care for. His discussion of the Iraq war in the Liberty University address is a bit of a cop-out. It's mostly about how we all have the duty to express our beliefs and the right to disagree.

This discussion is also a guarded reference to McCain's famous feud with Falwell. In 2000 McCain called Falwell an "evil influence" on the Republican Party. That won McCain a lot of the points he now enjoys among people to his left. He needs some to his right. But if the subject is "evil," it's not good enough simply to say that we all have the right to disagree. And "evil" is not too strong a word for Jerry Falwell. Respectful disagreement may be possible with James Dobson, and "silly" or "senile" might be a more apt description of Pat Robertson. But Falwell is a man who promoted tapes during the Clinton administration accusing the president of murdering political opponents. Sure, he has the right to say whatever he wants. But that is not the key point about Falwell. McCain made the key point six years ago. Today he ducks it.

McCain is like another larger-than-life character in American politics: Colin Powell. Both men are so admirable and so likable that people convince themselves against all evidence that Powell or McCain must agree with them on the big issues. In Powell's case, the theory always was that he was speaking truth to power from within, while telling the necessary public fibs to hold on to the privileged position this service required. With McCain, something more magical is going on. He says plainly that he is for the war, or against abortion choice, and people hear the opposite. It's a gift, I guess.

'Forgotten Hurricane' Haunts La. Survivors (USAT)

By Joyce King

USA Today, May 19, 2006

CAMERON PARISH, La. — Though we're days from a new hurricane season, Hurricane Rita's devastation to the coastal towns of southwest Louisiana is still fresh nearly eight months later. A boat rests on the side of a stretch of road I'm traveling that was once beautiful Holly Beach. Cars, as if launched head first, are embedded upright in the sand.

In Hackberry, men feverishly make repairs to St. Peter the Apostle Church. I stop in Johnson's Bayou, where Rita came barreling ashore. Nearby, the town of Cameron was annihilated: 90% of homes were severely damaged or destroyed. Over and over, I meet people who talk of living through "the forgotten hurricane." Hurricane Katrina still gets most of the news media attention and emergency funding. Many Rita victims are still awaiting federal housing funds to rebuild. Those in Federal Emergency Management Agency trailers are again vulnerable to the next storm, and any hopes of rebuilding the community are quickly fading.

Longtime residents Kirk and Julie Burleigh show me around. "A lot of people aren't coming back. They don't want to go through this again," Kirk says. Before Rita, Cameron Parish had a population of about 9,600. Today, half of the residents have returned.

Julie says neighbors told her they will rebuild someday, but not until after they monitor the new season, which begins June 1. People are frightened. Help is slow to arrive. New codes make rebuilding prohibitive.

Rep. Charles Boustany, R-La., complains that his district is "bleeding" population from a loss of jobs and bottled up funding in Washington. Cameron Parish's economy has relied on oil, fishing and its wildlife refuges. All sustained significant damage. Only some oil-related businesses are operational. Calcasieu Parish, where Lake Charles is located, had more than 50% of its housing damaged or destroyed. The aviation industry suffered a $90 million blow. Unemployment has tripled from 5.3% in 2004 to 16.2% today.

When FEMA announced plans to stop paying for 10,000 evacuees in Lake Charles hotels, the city picked up the tab. In Houston, where some 150,000 Katrina evacuees remain, many have found jobs, housing and a better educational system.

Conversely, thousands of Rita survivors believe they're on their own. So they wait. Weather experts predict this period of “above normal activity” might last two more decades, meaning several major hurricanes will hit the USA.

“It's like you're forgotten,” Julie Burleigh says. She and Kirk hear a common question from outsiders, one never far from their mind: Is Cameron ready for another round? Without federal help soon, the question won't carry much meaning. After all, with each passing day, there will likely be fewer people to ask.

New Orleans In A Tempest Over 'Deluge' (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, May 18 -- He gets asked at campaign stops, in candidate forums and televised debates.

What about the book, Mayor?

"Bogus" he replies, or "total distortions." And sometimes he gets mad.

Rarely has a work of history figured so prominently in a mayoral election here or anywhere else. "The Great Deluge," by Tulane University historian Douglas Brinkley, covers a week of the Hurricane Katrina debacle and depicts New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin as too vain, too stunned and too paranoid to have been effective in the city's crisis.

Relying in part on accounts from Nagin's political rivals, the book has been characterized by his supporters as a campaign attack timed to sink his bid for reelection on Saturday. "The Great Deluge" began appearing in bookstores this month.

Brinkley, the author of several best-selling history books, says the book was meant to coincide not with the election but with the June 1 onset of hurricane season.

Brinkley said that nobody was misquoted and that Nagin should blame himself that the book has become such a prominent part of the campaign.

"Nagin denounced the book without reading it," Brinkley said Thursday. "If he had ignored it, I don't think it would have become an issue. People love the food fight -- it was suddenly the Tulane professor from Uptown versus the mayor. It got framed as a square off.

"It only made my sales jack up," Brinkley said. "My publisher is very happy with Mr. Nagin."

On Saturday, voters here will elect Nagin or Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu in a race that many analysts say is too difficult to call because of the displacement of voters. One poll does show Landrieu with a substantial lead.

Many voters say there appear to be few substantial differences in the approaches the two men have outlined for recovery. Both candidates have rejected calls for abandoning some neighborhoods that are considered extremely vulnerable to another inundation. Both have acknowledged that the city's rebuilding will depend in part on federal aid.

The leadership abilities of the candidates have become a central issue instead, and that is one reason Brinkley's account of Nagin has proved to be a sensitive subject.

It is not the first time that Brinkley has found himself -- and one of his books -- in the middle of an election debate. His 2004 book on John F. Kerry's experience in Vietnam, "Tour of Duty," provoked questions about the Democratic senator's time in the war. It was criticized by Republicans for overstating Kerry's record and prompted a rebuttal book, "Unfit for Command."

Brinkley's latest work on Katrina is sweeping and only sparsely mentions Nagin. But when it does, it is often in disparaging terms. When Nagin showers too long aboard Air Force One, Brinkley likens him to a "primping teenager." When Nagin was considering a mandatory evacuation, Brinkley writes that he was "hesitating like a school boy afraid to receive his report card."

Even Nagin's angry radio appearance during the crisis, in which he advised the federal government to "get off your [behinds] and do something" -- remarks that many here found inspiring, given the gravity of the situation -- is described as pure theater because Nagin knew federal troops were on the way.

"It was the perfect, phony, cause-and-effect gambit," Brinkley wrote.

The book says Nagin broke down and cried after the radio interview and that his communications director, Sally Forman, was worried.

"I tried to get him to calm down," she is quoted as saying. "I kept saying, 'It's OK, It's OK.' "

Forman quit the administration earlier this year when her husband, Ron Forman, entered the mayoral race. He finished third in the primary.

Landrieu also figures in the bleak portrait of Nagin. In the book, Landrieu finds Nagin holed at the downtown Hyatt.

"All Nagin would say, staring straight ahead, as if in a trance, was 'We're looking for a command and control structure,' " Brinkley wrote.

Nagin questioned Brinkley's motives.

DOJ_NMG_0029176

"I could see the venom coming out of him," Nagin told the New Orleans Times-Picayune, describing Brinkley's appearance on a local television show.

Brinkley defended using some of Nagin's political rivals as sources, saying that they were present for many of the events he was reporting on. He also conducted a 47-minute interview with Nagin as the book was being completed.

Acknowledging that the book had become "kind of a carnival side attraction" to the campaign, Brinkley said he did not know what effect it will have on the election. The book came up in a nationally televised debate between Landrieu and Nagin this week on MSNBC, and is on the cover of the Gambit Weekly newspaper here.

At one bookstore near the university, booksellers said it is a hot item not only of commerce but of conversation, as well.

"My sense is that people who would have been voting for Nagin are reading it and they're on the fence now," said Denise Bonis at Octavia Books, who had read an excerpt in Vanity Fair. "I thought I had a pretty good idea of what happened that week. I was a little surprised."

Nagin Says Win Would Send Racial Message (WT)

By Brian DeBose

The Washington Times, May 19, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- Mayor C. Ray Nagin says a victory in tomorrow's election will send a message on race that "will echo throughout America."

"This election will say in spite of American prejudice, I was able to attract votes from all races and classes and move forward with the process of healing," said Mr. Nagin, who has hinted that whites locally and nationally are working to unseat him from the post, which blacks have held for nearly 30 years.

Mr. Nagin questions the source of "$6 million" that opponent Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu has raised, hinting at an effort to return the city to the "good-old-boy system," and says Hurricane Katrina exposed the soft underbelly of race and class in America.

"I have said this before publicly that if this had been South Beach Miami or Orange County, I'll bet you a dollar that the response would have been different," said Mr. Nagin, who was elected in 2002 with 85 percent of the white vote.

Mr. Landrieu, whose father was the city's last white mayor, says this election provides an opportunity to deal with race and class in a unique way nationally.

He said the tightly contested runoff election will turn on whether "African-Americans [will] vote for white politicians and will whites vote for black ones."

"You can't win anymore with an all-black vote or an all-white vote," Mr. Landrieu said.

Voters here, regardless of whom they support, agree that there are a lot of lessons to be learned about race, class and politics from the aftermath of Katrina.

Morris Reid, Democratic political analyst and former adviser to the Clinton administration, said the real story is whether black New Orleanians will stand up and take advantage of the voting rights that their parents and grandparents fought and, in some cases, died to get.

"These [black] folks were relying on a government and a democracy that they didn't participate in, and when they went to cash the check at the political bank, it was bankrupt because they never deposited any money there," Mr. Reid said, referring to the slow hurricane response by local, state and federal officials.

For Robert Richardson, 52, a construction maintenance worker and resident of the Ninth Ward, a largely black neighborhood crushed by the flooding, Mr. Nagin has become part of the problem and is in bed with the developers.

"There is no national conspiracy; it's a land grab, not a white power grab. It's a shame when things like this come down to race, and I hate to say it, but it looks like Landrieu might be the one who will work with us," Mr. Richardson said.

Jimmie Perry, 57, a former utility systems operator-turned-real estate investor, said he owes his newfound wealth and entrepreneurial spirit to Mr. Nagin.

"He made it possible for us to get loans working with the banks and opening the doors, cleaning up the permits process; you know it used to be that only whites and friends of the mayor knew about the property-tax sales; now we know, and we can go and buy the homes," Mr. Perry said.

"Mitch is a nice guy and I've always supported him, but I think they want Mitch because he will be more accommodating."

Mr. Reid, who said he expects a Landrieu victory, said Mr. Nagin and Mr. Landrieu are exploiting the issue to their political advantage but missing the point.

"All things being the same, if Katrina had never happened, Ray Nagin would not be campaigning for the Ninth Ward, he would be campaigning for the people who voted him in the last time," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0029177

Mr. Nagin in 2002 campaigned as a reformer who would clean up the city hall left behind by outgoing Mayor Marc Morial. Mr. Morial, whose father was mayor in the 1980s, was popular with blacks and now heads the National Urban League.

Mr. Landrieu, who is brother to a sitting senator and a state district court judge, is the son of former Mayor Moon Landrieu, who opened the doors of politics to blacks for the first time in 1970.

A Tulane University and WGNO-ABC poll released Tuesday showed Mr. Landrieu with the edge, getting 48 percent, and Mr. Nagin with 38 percent. But the poll has a 4.7 percentage point margin of error because 14 percent of respondents were undecided and it does not include displaced voters.

New Orleans Mayor's Rival Stresses His Political Savvy (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, May 18 — The question for the candidate at a debate last week was simple, spoke to this city's chronic dysfunction and begged a short, sharp answer.

How, he was asked, should New Orleans stamp out patronage in contracts? But the response from Lt. Gov. Mitch Landrieu came back intricate, replete with pledges to different groups, and capped by a politician's formula: "We've got to have a process in place."

Mr. Landrieu, the son of one of Louisiana's first political families, inherited such careful talk as a birthright. He may well take over the mess that is now New Orleans after the mayoral election Saturday, becoming the man in the spotlight on whom the hopes of thousands of struggling residents here and in hurricane-forced exile will be pinned.

Yet for many, Mr. Landrieu, 45, has been defined more by his family (his sister Mary is a United States senator and his father was mayor) than by his own amiable but mostly unobtrusive presence in government, for 16 years as a state legislator and for the last two as Louisiana's second-ranking official.

He would be the first white mayor of New Orleans since his father, Moon, held the position a generation ago, though some conservative whites here swear they will never vote for a Landrieu, and he cannot succeed Saturday without strong black support.

If Mr. Landrieu wins, he will offer the classic prescriptions for governing that have been his armor in debates with an unpredictable opponent, Mayor C. Ray Nagin. Unlike the mayor, Mr. Landrieu rarely throws away the script.

"Figuring out what the problem is, figuring out what the obstacles are, finding high common ground, getting a plan in place, putting a strategy in place, then actually making it happen," he told a breakfast crowd at a downtown restaurant on Thursday, reciting his plan for a struggling city. It is that promise of competence Mr. Landrieu has used as a battering ram against an incumbent he accuses of incarnating the opposite.

His campaign amounts to a complicated balancing act, in which conservative whites must be drawn in without scaring off the healthy share of black votes he received in the April primary, nearly 24 percent. Only about 30 percent of the white vote went for Mr. Landrieu, though; the remainder went to white candidates mostly more conservative than him, and yard signs for those whites who lost have not, by and large, been replaced by Landrieu signs.

Still, Mr. Landrieu needs the bulk of these white votes — as much as three-quarters of them — and so he does his best to distance himself from the liberal associations that his family name carries. He also frequently counters accusations that he will bring back supporters of a past mayoral regime derided by many whites, that of Marc Morial, now president of the National Urban League, whose administration has been the subject of a continuing federal corruption inquiry.

A significant part of his strategy is to increase turnout among residents who have returned to New Orleans, particularly because Mr. Nagin is likely to get most of the absentee votes of those evacuees who are living elsewhere. To that end, Dana Peterson, Mr. Landrieu's campaign manager, said the campaign was using telephone banks and canvassing every evening.

"We're being really aggressive," Mr. Peterson said. "We're sending out volunteers door-to-door in the nonflooded areas." He said more than 2,000 people had volunteered to help the campaign.

Mr. Landrieu, who enjoys a huge cash advantage over Mr. Nagin, also recently won the endorsement of The Times-Picayune of New Orleans. The newspaper's editorial said his strengths uniting the city across racial lines outweighed his weak private-sector experience and his possible difficulty as a Democrat in dealing with a Republican White House and Congress.

Hoping to deflect the suspicions of conservatives, Mr. Landrieu often says ideology has nothing to do with being a good mayor.

"This job is will you, can you, how are you going to get the garbage picked up?" Mr. Landrieu said Thursday. "You can't, as mayor, ordain that you want something to occur, and then leave." In a recent television commercial, he patrols the fleets of flooded-out cars under the highways here, still not removed after nine months, and proclaims, "Ray Nagin had the power to get this job done and didn't do it."

DOJ_NMG_0029178

For nearly half a century, voters here have been putting Landrieus in office, and the name has come to represent an easily recognized basket of political principles: biracial coalitions, moderation on social issues like abortion and ample attention to the problems of the poor. His father's breakthrough tenure at City Hall in the 1970's, when blacks were first brought into decision-making, still defines the terms of governance here. The younger Mr. Landrieu makes no apologies for inheriting that vision, in which running New Orleans becomes an exercise in bringing its disparate factions together.

Those factions are now more separated than ever, with racial undercurrents infusing the politics of rebuilding after Hurricane Katrina. Mr. Nagin has made an explicit pitch for racial solidarity, counting on getting as many black votes as possible with his now-famous promise that New Orleans will once again be a "chocolate city." Mr. Landrieu pointedly offers an opposite vision.

"If you want to think about what the city of New Orleans needs to be, and needs to look like, all you've got to do is go sit in the Lusher schoolyard," Mr. Landrieu began his talk Thursday, referring to one of the few successful public schools here. "The school is diverse, I mean aggressively diverse," he continued. "It's Hispanic, African-American, Vietnamese, white, you have parents that are high socioeconomic, mid, and they are all there together." Repeatedly, Mr. Landrieu emphasizes the equal amounts of white and black votes he received in the April primary.

As a state legislator, he helped reconcile the viewpoints of law enforcement officials and advocacy groups, and then sponsored legislation that led to the closing of the state's most notorious prison for youth.

It is this ability to work within the political system that he is now touting, at a time when his city is thoroughly dependent on help from the outside. "What we need right now is someone who has vast political experience, someone who can communicate to the nation," he said at the debate last week. "Somebody who can bring Republicans and Democrats together, somebody who can really get things done."

RUDY TURNS RIGHT INTO HEART OF DIXIE TO BACK PAL (NYPOST)

By Maggie Haberman, Post Correspondent

The New York Post, May 19, 2006

ATLANTA - Looking to shore up his right flank, Rudy Giuliani embraced former Christian Coalition head Ralph Reed as the man with "the right ideas" at a campaign fund-raiser yesterday in Georgia.

With maverick Sen. John McCain emerging as his main GOP competition for 2008, the socially moderate ex-mayor played up leadership as he boosted Reed in a close primary race for lieutenant governor.

"He's a person that has the right ideas and the right direction and the right goals," Giuliani said as he headlined a luncheon of more than 250 people in a part of the country where many believe he'd face a tough time in a GOP primary.

Later asked by reporters about how his past pro-gay rights, pro-choice stands mesh with Reed's positions, Giuliani said, "We are a broad party. I agree with Ralph on many things."

"There are going to be some things I disagree with him on . . . in Ralph's case I know him, and I think he's going to be a really effective leader," he said.

Asked about his stand on gay marriage, Giuliani - who lived with a gay couple during his divorce - told reporters that marriage should remain between a man and a woman.

"Inviolate, and everything should be done to make sure that's the case," said Giuliani, but he reiterated his support for civil unions.

In The South, Giuliani Stumps For A Friend (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

ATLANTA, May 18 — Former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani glided over his support for gay civil unions and declared heterosexual marriage to be "inviolate" on Thursday as he helped raise money for a former leader of the Christian Coalition, Ralph Reed, who is in a tough fight to become lieutenant governor of Georgia.

For Mr. Giuliani, who is considering a run for the presidency in 2008, the political foray into the South allowed him to pocket a campaign chit from Mr. Reed that could be useful if the former mayor tries to build a national coalition that includes religious-minded Republicans, who are a core part of Mr. Reed's voter base.

Mr. Giuliani was warmly received at a Reed fund-raiser here, though advisers to Mr. Reed noted that most of the donors were politically moderate business people, and that a truer test of Mr. Giuliani's appeal among more conservative Southerners would come in rural counties.

DOJ_NMG_0029179

The Giuliani-Reed embrace came five days after another possible Republican candidate in 2008, Senator John McCain of Arizona, appeared alongside the Rev. Jerry Falwell and invoked God several times in a speech at Liberty University, an avowed evangelical institution in Virginia.

Georgia Republicans said on Thursday that Mr. Giuliani's visit had been scheduled weeks ago, though they acknowledged that both he and Mr. McCain were seeking to make inroads to the Southern and religious wings of the party.

Mr. Giuliani did not mention Jesus Christ or his childhood interest in becoming a priest, but instead preached from the bible of fiscal conservatism. Aligning himself closely with the Bush administration, he called for more federal tax cuts as a means of creating jobs and stimulating the economy, and argued that tax cuts would invigorate business and ultimately yield greater total tax receipts, thereby helping to reduce the deficit.

"President Bush understands that, the Republican Congress understands that, Ralph understands that, and the Democrats don't," Mr. Giuliani told the audience of about 250 people. "We can take a big step back, either state by state or nationally. And this election in 2006 is going to determine if we keep seeing our economy grow, or we take a real step backwards."

Introduced by Mr. Reed as "a great conservative," Mr. Giuliani urged Republicans to look toward the political landscape with optimism and to enthusiastically support President Bush, whose approval ratings are low.

"We shouldn't be going to the American people with our heads down," Mr. Giuliani said. "We should be going with our heads up — our policies work."

In a brief news conference afterward with reporters from Atlanta and New York, Mr. Giuliani acknowledged his support for some gay rights while reiterating past comments that "marriage should be between a man and a woman." Gay marriage has been in the news in Georgia this week after a judge struck down, on procedural grounds, a state constitutional amendment banning such unions.

"I believe that marriage should be between a man and a woman, that it should remain that way, it should remain that way inviolate, and everything should be done to make sure that that's the case," Mr. Giuliani said in response to a reporter's question. "But I also believe that you should allow for the protection of legal rights for people who are gay and lesbian."

Mr. Giuliani said it was not unusual for him to support a former leader of the Christian Coalition like Mr. Reed.

"On some of these social issues, we have disagreements that are very, very broad," Mr. Giuliani said. "It's no different than any other candidate — there are things I agree with, things I disagree with — but in Ralph's case, I know him, and I think he's going to be a really effective leader."

Asked if he would seek Mr. Reed's help in a possible run for president, Mr. Giuliani replied, "When you run for president, you ask for everybody's help."

Mr. Reed declined to answer reporters' questions about whether he could support Mr. Giuliani for president, given that they disagree on abortion rights and gay rights, or if he thought the former mayor would make a good president.

"We're really focused on 2006," Mr. Reed said, adding, "I learned a long time ago an 80 percent friend is not a 20 percent enemy."

Mr. Reed is competing for the Republican nomination against a veteran state senator, Casey Cagle, who has piled up endorsements from many legislative leaders and elected Republicans. Both men are campaigning aggressively, with the primary on July 18.

Mr. Reed has drawn fire from opponents for his ties to Jack Abramoff, a onetime Reed mentor and a former Washington lobbyist who has confessed to trying to bribe members of Congress. Mr. Reed has not been accused of any wrongdoing.

Only at the end of his remarks did Mr. Giuliani hint that his social liberalism could either be a blessing or a curse for a Southern candidate such as Mr. Reed. "I'll support your opponent if it helps," Mr. Giuliani said. "Sometimes I don't know which way it cuts, you know."

Democratic Activists Seek To Punish Their Own For Backing Bush (BLOOM)

By Heidi Przybyla

Bloomberg, May 19, 2006

May 19 (Bloomberg) -- Democratic activist groups that mounted an aggressive campaign against President George W. Bush in the 2004 election have a new target: Democrats who support his policies.

A loose network of organizations, ranging from women's groups to Internet bloggers, is pressuring incumbents such as Senator Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut and Representatives Jane Harman of California and Melissa Bean of Illinois, in some cases by backing insurgent candidates in primary elections.

The groups charge that these and other Democrats have been too supportive of Bush on issues like Iraq and trade, and say they're trying to energize voters disillusioned with a party that has failed to draw clear distinctions with Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0029180

With Democrats holding a wide advantage in public-opinion polls six months before the congressional elections, the party must define its identity, said David Sirota, a Democratic activist.

``If Democrats are really about to get into power, now's the time to let them know what they need to be for,'' said Sirota, who wrote ``Hostile Takeover,'' a book about political corruption.

The organizations and Web logs that identify themselves as the party's ``progressive'' wing include MoveOn.org, a coalition of groups that raised $60 million and enlisted 100,000 volunteers in the 2004 elections; DailyKos, a blog that averages 20 million visitors a month; and Democracy for America, a political action committee with 500 affiliates.

The issues they're promoting include setting a timetable for withdrawing troops from Iraq, building environmental protections into U.S. trade agreements and cracking down on what they say is price-gouging by oil companies.

Angry Public

And they're tapping into public anger. Polls show that more than half of Americans say the U.S. shouldn't have invaded Iraq, and most think the Bush administration has no clear plan for keeping down energy prices.

Ed Kilgore, vice president for policy of the Democratic Leadership Council -- a Washington-based group that says it represents the party's ``vital center'' -- cautions that the primary challenges risk undermining the Democratic Party just as it may be poised to regain control of Congress.

``At a time when we're desperately trying to take back Congress and win a majority of governorships, I'm not sure it makes a whole lot of sense for Democrats nationally to be wasting money on primary challenges,'' Kilgore said.

Connecticut Challenge

In Connecticut, Lieberman, the Democrats' 2000 vice presidential nominee, is facing a challenge in the August primary from Ned Lamont, a 52-year-old Greenwich businessman stressing his opposition to the Iraq war. A recent poll by Rasmussen Reports, an independent survey company in Ocean Grove, New Jersey, showed about a third of Democratic primary voters backing Lamont, the great-grandson of legendary J.P. Morgan & Co. Chairman Thomas W. Lamont, over Lieberman, 64, a supporter of Bush's war policies.

On May 16, the National Organization for Women announced its endorsement of Lamont, and MoveOn.org said yesterday it will poll its 50,000 Connecticut members in an online ``primary'' on May 25 to determine whether they want to back Lieberman or Lamont.

In California, Harman, 60, a six-term House veteran, has a rare primary challenger in Marcy Winograd, 52, president of Progressive Democrats of Los Angeles. Winograd has criticized Harman's support for the Patriot Act, which expanded law-enforcement authority to fight terrorism, and the Iraq war. Winograd's supporters temporarily blocked the state party's endorsement of Harman, although the incumbent ultimately received the backing for the June primary.

Teamsters and Trade

In Illinois' eighth district, the Teamsters union is withholding support for one-term incumbent Bean, 44, over her support for the Central American Free Trade Agreement.

In Washington state, incumbent Senator Maria Cantwell, 47, faces several challengers in a September primary whose campaigns are fueled by anger over her support for the war. They include Mark Wilson, a former Marine who's running as a Democrat, and Aaron Dixon, a former Black Panther Party leader who is running as a Green Party candidate.

In Texas, Representative Henry Cuellar fought off a challenge from Ciro Rodriguez, an opponent backed by labor and environmental groups who got 41 percent of the vote in the Democratic primary in March.

In Pennsylvania, Senate candidate Bob Casey Jr.'s anti- abortion stance was attacked in television ads. While Casey, the state treasurer, fought off a primary challenge this week from Alan Sandals, his opponent won the support of a number of local officials.

Minnesota, Oregon

Gubernatorial races in Minnesota and Oregon, where Governor Ted Kulongoski faces re-election, have also featured challenges from the left. Kulongoski, 65, came under criticism from environmentalists, health-care advocates and some labor groups before the state's May 16 primary. Former state Treasurer Jim Hill, who opened his campaign by declaring that Kulongoski is ``not a good Democrat,'' got almost a third of the vote despite a late start to his campaign.

The Democratic Leadership Council's Kilgore says it isn't true that the party is failing to provide an alternative to Republican policies. ``It's ludicrous,'' he said. ``There's less doubt right now than there's ever been about the differences.''

Ignoring the rift won't make it disappear, said Tom Matzzie, Washington director for MoveOn.org. ``There's already a gigantic gulf in the party,'' he said.

The activist groups say their strategy is broader than merely challenging Democrats in primaries. They say they also want to pressure party-backed candidates to take definitive positions.

`Stand Up'

DOJ_NMG_0029181

``The other part of this is getting candidates to stand up for what they believe in and not being mealy-mouthed about it," said Jim Dean, president of Democracy for America, a group inspired by former Vermont Governor Howard Dean's presidential run in 2004. Jim Dean, Howard's brother, cited Massachusetts Senator John Kerry's call in October for a phased withdrawal from Iraq and expression of regret over his vote for the war.

Even though progressives will find it difficult to win in the primaries, that's unlikely to deter them, said Mark Rozell, a public policy professor at George Mason University in Arlington, Virginia. ``To pull off some victories here and there will be enough to energize much of the left base," he said.

To Rozell, what's at stake is ``the heart and soul" of the Democratic Party. ``The Republicans had that battle, and the moderates pretty much lost," he said. ``The Democrats now have to confront where the center of the party is."

Wave Of Women Candidates For Hill (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON - It feels like the political version of speed dating: Reporters gather in a room, the candidate is whisked in for a coffee-and-pastry-fueled chat about her campaign, then whisked out to make way for the next candidate, and the next, and the next...

This was the scene last week at the Omni Shoreham Hotel here in Washington, where the political action committee EMILY's List was holding its annual luncheon and trumpeting its "endorsees" - all of them Demo- cratic women who favor abortion rights. The topics of conversation ranged from the Iraq war to immigration to Rahm Emanuel, the head of the House Democrats' campaign committee, but rarely touched on the role of gender in the campaign.

Can it be that having women run for federal office is now so routine that gender barely merits a mention? Perhaps. But at EMILY's List, which boasts its largest crop of candidates in its 21 years, gender is key.

And as the Democratic Party seeks to regain control of Congress - doable with a net shift of just 15 seats - it is counting on these EMILY's List women to play a major role. Of the 24 Republican-held House seats deemed competitive by the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, 11 feature Democratic women, all of them getting help from Emily's List. By comparison, of Cook's 11 competitive Democratic-held House seats, only one features a Republican woman contender.

Voter discontent with Washington is high, and women candidates could be the natural beneficiaries of that "throw the bums out" mentality, say experts on women in politics.

"When people get disgusted with politics and they are looking for change, women embody that change," says Debbie Walsh, director of the Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University. "There's a sense that women are more honest."

Analysts see some comparisons to the 1992 election - the so-called "year of the woman," when female representation in both houses of Congress jumped from 32 to 54 members; most of the new women were Democrats. Today, 81 out of 535 House and Senate seats, or 15 percent, are held by women (52 Democrats and 29 Republicans).

The small number of competitive races this cycle compared with 1992 means the best women can do in 2006 is a "mini" year of the woman. But the issue agendas are similar: worries over the economy, healthcare, education, and scandal. In the 1992 race, the House check-writing scandal and the Clarence Thomas-Anita Hill hearings mobilized women. In 2006, the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal and the Iraq war are salient.

"Women are perceived as outsiders, even women incumbents," says Barbara Palmer, coauthor of a new book "Breaking the Political Glass Ceiling: Women and Congressional Elections."

But, she adds, not all congressional districts are hospitable to women. According to her book, women candidates do best in upscale, urban, and diverse districts, and are least likely to be elected in rural, Southern, and "traditional" districts. The book identifies 135 districts that are "unlikely" to elect women.

Whether 2006 will end up bringing a wave of new women to Congress is too soon to say. "It would be easier for the Democrats if they got their act together," says Kellyanne Conway, a Republican pollster, who suggests that a proactive, positive set of ideas, like the GOP's Contract With America in 1994, would be particularly appealing to women. "Women voters always gravitate toward 'yes,' not 'no.' "

Simply being a woman, however, does not necessarily work to a candidate's advantage, says Carl Forti, spokesman for the House Republican campaign committee. "I think it goes back to the quality of the candidate, period," he says.

New Mexico Attorney General Patricia Madrid, a Democrat who is running for the House, sees being a woman in politics as a double-edged sword. "People make assumptions - they think you can't make decisions," she says. "The upside is that your race gets more attention."

DOJ_NMG_0029182

Since Ms. Madrid is facing an incumbent woman - Rep. Heather Wilson - that makes their competitive race more noteworthy. And Ms. Wilson's status as a military veteran (the only woman veteran in Congress), pitted against Madrid's role as the state's chief law-enforcement official, makes for a stereotype-shattering contest.

For now, the biggest race on the political world's radar screen is California's 50th District - the June 6 special election to fill the seat vacated by Rep. Duke Cunningham (R), now in prison for bribery. Under normal circumstances, this heavily Republican district in San Diego would be safe for the Republican candidate, former Rep. Brian Bilbray, but polls show his race against Francine Busby - an EMILY's List endorsee - is close.

This week, a poll for the Busby campaign put her ahead of Mr. Bilbray 47 percent to 40 percent. A poll commissioned by a conservative Republican opponent of the more moderate Bilbray puts Busby ahead 43-37.

Amy Walter, House-watcher for the Cook Political Report, says it's still an uphill climb for Busby, a school board trustee in Cardiff, Calif., who lost to Mr. Cunningham in 2004. But in the current environment, she does not rule out a Busby victory. Neither does the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee: It is spending $1.3 million on advertising in the last weeks of the campaign, after spending only $250,000 in the special-election primary.

"It's a close, volatile race," says Ms. Walter. "If she wins, it will be the shot heard round the world."

Liberal Wrath In Connecticut (NYT)

By William Yardley

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

HARTFORD, May 18 — "George Bush's favorite Democrat," they call him. "Republican Lite," they sneer. But liberals are no longer just venting on Internet blogs and talk radio programs about their centrist nemesis: Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut.

Now, from across the nation, a determined alliance of antiwar activists is working overtime online and on doorsteps to defeat Mr. Lieberman, whose political moderation helped him earn the Democratic nomination for vice president six years ago. Their goal is not only to punish Mr. Lieberman for staunchly supporting the war in Iraq but also to protest what the activists consider the Democratic Party's willingness to accommodate President Bush.

Without a national race to focus on, thousands of activists from other states — encouraged by a host of liberal bloggers — have contributed money and volunteered to help the campaign of Ned Lamont, a cable television executive with little political experience who is trying to unseat Mr. Lieberman in the state's Democratic primary in August.

Although Mr. Lamont's challenge appears to be a long shot, it is roiling some quarters of the Democratic Party, just as the party is trying to regain control of Congress this year. Many Democrats assert that the vigorous challenge to Mr. Lieberman is overshadowing the governor's race and taking money and attention away from three closely contested House races in Connecticut that many strategists consider crucial to the Democrats' majority hopes.

"It's absolute Democratic cannibalism," said John F. Droney, a former Democratic state chairman in Connecticut.

The liberals' campaign is clearly rattling Senator Lieberman, who has not faced a serious primary challenge in his three terms, Democrats say.

He has been cold-calling scores of state party delegates who will meet to endorse a candidate on Friday. He is boasting of union endorsements and interest groups he once took for granted. He has already run commercials and mailed letters to delegates from prominent Democrats like Senators Hillary Clinton and Harry Reid to remind voters of his liberal record on issues like the environment, abortion rights and gay rights.

And while he has continued to defend his Iraq stand, disputing what he calls "caricatures" of his views, he has tried to distance himself from the president. "I'm probably the only person in America to run against George W. Bush twice," Mr. Lieberman, referring to his vice-presidential campaign in 2000 and the Democratic primaries in 2004, told about two dozen people last week at a center for the elderly in Farmington, a Hartford suburb. "Because I don't think he gives us the leadership this country needs."

Yet Mr. Lieberman's critics do not seem to be listening, particularly Mr. Lamont, who has spent more than $370,000 of his own money to challenge the senator.

"Connecticut's a progressive state," Mr. Lamont said at a fund-raiser in the home of a Yale professor in North Haven on Sunday. "You're not going to lose a senator. You're going to gain a Democrat."

A growing cast of prominent activists is backing Mr. Lamont. Markos Moulitsas, who advised the presidential campaign of Howard Dean in 2004 and founded the blog Daily Kos, is appearing in a campaign commercial for Mr. Lamont. James H. Dean, the brother of Howard Dean and the chairman of the grass-roots group his brother formed in 2004, supports Mr. Lamont. Tim Tagaris, recently the Democratic National Committee's Internet outreach coordinator, has become director of Internet operations for the Lamont campaign. Even the state's best-known independent, former Gov. Lowell P. Weicker, has announced his support for Mr. Lamont because of Mr. Lieberman's support of the war.

On Tuesday, the National Organization for Women's political action committee endorsed Mr. Lamont, in part because he said, unlike Senator Lieberman, that he would have supported a filibuster to prevent confirmation hearings for Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court.

Senator Lieberman was also endorsed this week by the Human Rights Campaign, a gay rights group. But some Democrats who have voted for him for years are reconsidering their support. "He won't stand up and fight," Jim Boorsch, a retired lawyer who voted for Mr. Lieberman in his last three races, said at the Sunday fund-raiser.

This weekend, the 1,607 delegates to the state Democratic party convention will nominate a candidate for the Senate, and Mr. Lieberman is expected to win the nomination handily. But Mr. Lamont will get his name on the ballot for the Aug. 8 primary if he wins 15 percent of the delegates, which many party leaders think is likely. "If he gets 25 percent, that will be sending a real message to Lieberman," said Leland Tolo, a West Hartford delegate who said he would back Mr. Lamont.

Mr. Lieberman's supporters note that he is well ahead of Mr. Lamont in polls. At the end of this year's first quarter, the senator had $4.7 million in his campaign account compared with about $375,000 that Mr. Lamont had on hand. The senator has been endorsed by prominent state Democrats and he has long ties with many local party leaders. But those supporters also warn that liberals could turn out in large numbers on Primary Day, making the outcome less than certain.

"Joe, I'm certain, will be fine, but if I were in his shoes I wouldn't be taking chances with an August primary," said Al From, the founder and chief executive of the Democratic Leadership Council, a centrist group of which Senator Lieberman is a past chairman. "Because nobody's paying attention, and you don't know who's going to vote."

Senator Lieberman's attempts to push his party to the center have irritated liberals well before this year. In 2000, when Al Gore named him as his running mate, some Democrats complained that the senator had supported school vouchers, had questioned affirmative action and been too encouraging of free trade. But those concerns pale compared with their passion over his support for the war.

Mr. Lamont, 52, says his frustrations with Mr. Lieberman solidified in the spring of 2005, when the senator voted to allow a federal court to review the case of Terri Schiavo, the brain-damaged Florida woman whose case drove a national debate over right-to-die issues.

Mr. Lamont, a former first selectman in Greenwich whose great-grandfather was a business partner of J. P. Morgan's, also said Representative John P. Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat and a Vietnam veteran, inspired him when he urged the president last November to withdraw troops from Iraq as soon as possible.

But while Mr. Lamont has drawn impassioned support from critics of the war, he does not echo their calls for an immediate withdrawal of all troops. Tom Swan, his campaign manager, said Mr. Lamont supported immediately pulling American troops out of the Sunni Triangle and establishing benchmarks for gradually withdrawing forces from Iraq. He criticized Mr. Lieberman for siding with President Bush in opposing such benchmarks.

Senator Lieberman said in an interview on Friday that his views on the war had been misrepresented "because I happen to have shared the same goals as the president." He said he has repeatedly criticized the administration for being "too unilateral," for not sending enough troops to secure Iraq immediately after the invasion and for not following a State Department plan for reconstruction.

Just 8 percent of Democrats in Connecticut approve of the way President Bush is handling Iraq, according to a poll by Quinnipiac University released this month. The poll showed that 83 percent of Democrats thought going to war was wrong. It also showed Senator Lieberman leading Mr. Lamont, by 65 percent to 19 percent, among registered Democrats.

"A very simple thing happened that changed Democratic politics dramatically, and that was that the war turned bad," Mr. From said, adding of the senator's critics: "There's a group in our party that makes a lot of noise and I don't think they've ever won an election. They're trying to take out one of the great statesmen our party has and that's wrong."

Religious Left Struggles To Find Unifying Message (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

WASHINGTON, May 18 — They had come to All Souls Unitarian Church, 1,200 of them from 39 states, to wrest the mantle of moral authority from conservative Christians, and they were finally planning how to take their message to those in power.

After rousing speeches on Wednesday by liberal religious leaders like Rabbi Michael Lerner of the magazine Tikkun and Sister Joan Chittister, a Benedictine nun, participants in the new Network of Spiritual Progressives split into small groups to prepare for meetings with members of Congress on Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0029184

Yet at a session on ethical behavior, including sexual behavior, the 50 or so activists talked little about what to tell Congress about abortion or same-sex marriage. Instead, the Rev. Ama Zenya of First Congregational Church in Oakland, Calif., urged them to talk to one another about their spiritual values and "to practice fully our authentic being."

Kimberly Crichton, a Washington lawyer and Quaker, grew impatient. "I think we would be more effective if we focused on specific legislation," Ms. Crichton said. "Are we going to discuss specific policies?"

Ms. Zenya replied: "What we envisioned this time is saying we are a religious voice. More relationship-building, consciousness-raising."

The man in the pew in front of Ms. Crichton translated: "The answer is, no."

Since the last presidential election, liberals of various faiths have talked about taking back religion from the conservative Christians who helped bring President Bush and a Republican Congress to power.

Yet liberal believers have so far been unable to approach, even modestly, the success of the religious right and command the attention of Congress.

Turnout at the Spiritual Activism Conference is high, but if the gathering is any indication, the biggest barrier for liberals may be their regard for pluralism: for letting people say what they want, how they want to, and for trying to include everyone's priorities, rather than choosing two or three issues that could inspire a movement.

"We didn't get on the same page with everyone, and it is about getting on the same page," said the Rev. Tony Campolo, an outspoken liberal Baptist minister from Pennsylvania who once served as a spiritual adviser to President Bill Clinton, and attended the conference. "The thing about the left is that they want everybody to feel good."

Initiatives by liberals have been percolating locally and nationally, from state interfaith alliances in Ohio to counter a powerful conservative Christian movement there to national campaigns to reduce poverty led by liberal evangelicals like the Rev. Jim Wallis.

The Democratic Party itself is wrestling with the best way to shake an image of indifference to religion. Most recently, the party's national chairman, Howard Dean, courted evangelicals by appearing on Pat Robertson's television program, "The 700 Club." In the process, Mr. Dean alienated gay and lesbian supporters of the Democratic Party by misstating the party's platform on same-sex marriage.

Religious leaders at the conference here cautioned that it would take years before liberal believers could match the savvy and strength of conservative Christian groups.

But Rabbi Lerner, the editor of Tikkun, the progressive Jewish magazine, and an organizer of the spiritual progressives' network, rejected the approach that Democrats have so far taken to faith, describing it as window-dressing.

He called on the activists at All Souls Church to define progressive faith, rather than have politicians do it. He said research begun years ago showed that Americans were experiencing a deep spiritual crisis but that only conservative Christians had responded to it, with an agenda that he said "backs the ethos of selfishness and materialism in our society."

"They get away with this because the left isn't even in the relevant ballpark," Rabbi Lerner said. When people on the left "hear talk of a spiritual crisis, they think it's some kind of New Age flakery or a code word for homophobia, sexism and racism," he said.

He urged participants to offer a real alternative to the ideas that many conservative Christian groups promulgate. But identifying those alternatives proved to be the hard part for many at the conference.

Mr. Campolo, the Baptist minister, explained to the participants in a seminar that many people on Capitol Hill were religious, and that to reach them and to establish authority, liberals should rely on the Bible.

"You have no right to be a spiritual leader if you haven't read Scripture," he told the group. "People in Congress respect the Book, even if they don't know what it says. If we don't recognize this, we don't know squat."

A young man with long hair and a tunic challenged Mr. Campolo.

"I thought this was a spiritual progressives' conference," he said. "I don't want to play the game of 'the Bible says this or that,' or that we get validation from something other than ourselves. We should be speaking from our hearts."

Carol Gottesman was urged at her group to speak from her heart about her priority, the environment. A 64-year-old nurse from Hubbard, Ohio, and a Conservative Jew, Ms. Gottesman spoke Thursday with her congressman, Tim Ryan, a Democrat. It was one of dozens of meetings the network had set up.

Mr. Ryan, who had read about the network on the Internet, asked Ms. Gottesman if the group was pushing specific policies.

"No, it's more that we want to take caring and generosity and bring it into everything," she said.

Mr. Ryan responded: "Spread love, not hate. Pretty simple. Do you have a little network back home?"

Ms. Gottesman squared her shoulders proudly and said, "I'm it."

Many States Said Not Ready For Bird Flu (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, May 19, 2006

States have a spotty record in preparing for bird flu and it is matter of "not if, but when" the deadly virus reaches the United States, the Homeland Security Department's top doctor said Thursday.

But Dr. Jeffrey Runge said bird flu will not pose a critical threat until the virus can spread consistently between people. Such transmission has occurred only in a few cases overseas.

The department's chief medical officer said state and local governments carry most of burden of preparing for an outbreak. That includes readying emergency medical workers, providing hospital beds and setting up treatment centers outside of immediate disaster areas.

In an interview with the Associated Press, Runge did not identify the states he said have been slow to prepare. States with experience in dealing with hurricanes or terrorist attacks are further along, he added.

"Some states still have the idea that if it makes people sick, it's simply a health event," he said. "And others are much more forward reaching, and understand that they have to prepare for things like civil unrest, or interruption of the supply chain, or the failure of critical infrastructure to keep going, to keep the nation going in the event of some catastrophic event. And those are the ones that we think are the best prepared."

Gov. Mike Huckabee, R-Ark., who leads the National Governors Association, said states have "pretty much been told to prepare to row their own boat" in responding to bird flu.

Federal health officials "were pretty candid with us," Huckabee said in an interview. "The federal government simply does not have the resources themselves to deal with this on a mass level. And if a pandemic does occur, it will overwhelm their resources, just like it will overwhelm ours."

Scientists believe the flu would most likely be carried into the United States by a wild bird migrating from a country that has had an outbreak. "It's not a matter of if, but when we have birds that are infected with an avian virus," Runge said.

He credited agriculture inspectors and poultry producers with adopting tough security standards to prevent visitors from exposing fowl to the virus.

"We have the most secure flocks in the world," Runge said. He recalled hearing from an inspector that "it was tougher to get into a chicken coop than it was to get into our DHS headquarters."

Runge's department is responsible for blocking potentially infected birds and bird products from entering the U.S. at airports, seaports and international borders. Unions representing U.S. Customs and Border Protections officers have complained they have not been trained to identify bird smugglers or to quarantine birds arriving from countries that have had flu outbreaks.

Runge expressed some frustration with the level of training so far. "I wish I could say it had all already been done," he said. "Right now the planning is coordinated, but the education is not as coordinated as we'd like. That having been said, everybody around here's gotten a lot smarter about it."

Scientists Begin Testing For Bird Flu In Alaska (WSJ)

Associated Press, May 19, 2006

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Federal scientists have started testing migratory birds for signs of a dangerous bird flu that could show up on this continent this spring.

The testing of shorebirds began Wednesday on an Anchorage coastal wildlife refuge, said Bruce Woods, spokesman with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service.

It's the first sampling of a summer-long project to swab birds for bird flu throughout the state. Nationwide, the goal is to sample 75,000 to 100,000 wild birds. In Alaska, about $4 million in federal money will be allocated to study about 15,000 birds, Mr. Woods said.

"We had some success in catching some of the target species," he said Thursday.

More than 40 species of waterfowl and shorebirds are considered susceptible to infection by a highly pathogenic H5N1 bird flu virus that's killed more than 100 people, in other parts of the world, mostly in Asia.

Scientists will only test birds in the Anchorage area through early next week. "In this location, it's very brief, birds go through and they're gone," he said.

To screen the birds for the deadly virus, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and Alaska's Fish and Game Department also are setting up more than 50 remote backcountry camps accessible mainly by float planes or boats.

Many birds will be tested and released, while others killed during seasonal hunts will be tested after they have died.

DOJ_NMG_0029186

Alaska is an ideal bird flu laboratory because it's at the crossroads of migratory pathways for birds flying between the U.S. and other countries. Some of these birds arrive in Alaska each year from Asia.

WHO Probes Bird Flu Cluster (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, May 19, 2006

JAKARTA, Indonesia, May 18 -- An international team of health investigators arrived on the Indonesian island of Sumatra on Thursday to determine whether an unusually large cluster of human bird flu cases indicates that the highly lethal virus has mutated into a form easily spread among people.

Laboratory tests conducted for the World Health Organization confirmed this week that five members of one extended family in Kubu Sembilang village had died of bird flu during the first two weeks of May and a sixth had been infected but was recovering. A seventh family member, a 37-year-old woman who had been the first to fall ill, is also suspected of succumbing to the disease but was buried before samples could be taken.

The Sumatran cluster is the world's largest since the disease emerged in East Asia in 2003, although several dozen others have been reported. Any cluster raises the prospect that the virus has undergone genetic change allowing it to spread more readily among people, increasing the likelihood of a global pandemic.

WHO dispatched two investigators from its Jakarta office to northern Sumatra last week, but their initial efforts were stymied by distraught relatives' reluctance to discuss the cases. A second team, which arrived Thursday, included a senior epidemiologist from WHO's headquarters in Geneva and investigators from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta and WHO's regional office in New Delhi.

"We are taking this very seriously," said Sari Setiogi, spokeswoman for WHO's Indonesia office. "The good news is that from our investigation to date, there's no evidence of further spread of the virus beyond the family."

Setiogi said that relatives, neighbors and health-care workers who treated the patients were being monitored and that none had shown influenza-like symptoms.

Influenza specialists have said they suspect human transmission played a role in several other clusters of infection, including instances in Thailand, Vietnam and elsewhere in Indonesia. But the disease has yet to demonstrate it can pass beyond the confines of a family, which would be necessary for bird flu to spark a global epidemic.

The source of the Sumatra outbreak remains unclear. Health officials said that they had heard a report of sick chickens near one of the victims' homes but that tests of poultry and other livestock in the village had failed to identify any infected animals. Agriculture Minister Anton Apriyantono said Thursday, however, that samples taken from chickens, ducks and pigs from the surrounding district had tested positive for exposure to bird flu.

Some Indonesian health officials have speculated that the afflicted family members, who lived near each other in four houses, had contracted the virus either by sharing a feast of infected chicken and pork or from contaminated manure. Health Minister Siti Fadilah Supari minimized the possibility that the virus had spread from one family member to another.

If they had all caught bird flu from the same contaminated source, the victims would have been expected to become sick within the normal incubation period for the disease, which at most is slightly more than one week. But the final victim, a toddler, became ill after that, raising the possibility that the virus was passed between relatives.

Nur Rasyid Lubis, who heads the bird flu prevention team at Adam Malik Hospital in North Sumatra, said five members of the family, including at least two children, were admitted at the same time on May 8 with fever and respiratory problems. X-rays showed symptoms of pneumonia. They all died over the following week.

Lubis reported that all seven victims from the family were related to one another by blood rather than through marriage, reinforcing the suspicions of some influenza specialists that genetic susceptibility could play a role in determining who catches bird flu.

The Sumatra cases and a separate fatal infection confirmed this week in Surabaya, Indonesia's second-largest city, increased the country's death toll from the disease to at least 30. Bird flu has infected more than 216 people worldwide, killing more than half.

Human Transmission Possible In Flu Case (USAT)

USA Today, May 19, 2006

The source of bird flu that killed five members of an Indonesian family isn't known, and human-to-human transmission can't be ruled out, the World Health Organization said on its website. It said this was the largest cluster of closely related cases of the deadly H5N1 strain of the virus reported anywhere. The WHO said the most plausible source was poultry, but “the possibility of limited human-to-human transmission cannot be ruled out." If that occurred, "it has not been either efficient or sustained," the WHO said.

There have been 122 deaths in the outbreak that began in early 2003 and 129 since the strain was first discovered in 1997. The virus is easily transmitted among fowl. If it mutates into a form easily passed among humans, it could kill millions of people.

Typhoon Chanchu pummeled southern China, killing at least 21 people and leaving 27 Vietnamese fishermen missing after their boats sank in Chinese waters. Chanchu flooded scores of homes and forced more than 1 million people to evacuate before weakening to a severe tropical storm and moving out to sea today. The storm has killed more than 60 people in Asia, including 37 last weekend in the Philippines, where it destroyed thousands of homes.

About 40,000 people marched in Ankara, Turkey, to support the secular republic a day after a suspected Islamist militant shot five judges, one fatally, to protest a ruling against a teacher who wore an Islamic-style head scarf. Leaders of Turkey's military, which has led three coups and sees itself as a guardian of secularism, lined up by the coffin of Judge Mustafa Yucel Ozbilgin. Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan, who heads an Islamic-rooted government, did not attend the funeral. The government had criticized the ruling in February.

Hamas security forces clashed with police loyal to President Mahmoud Abbas after a day of tense standoffs as Palestinian rivals competed for control of Gaza.

Khaled Abu Hilal, spokesman of the Hamas-controlled Interior Ministry, said gunmen fired from a moving car on police, wounding two. Police thought nearby Hamas forces were responsible and fired at them, he said. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the tensions pose a "dangerous situation" and the Palestinian leadership needs "to get control of this."

Chile's Supreme Court freed former Peruvian president Alberto Fujimori on $3,000 bail but said he must remain while he fights extradition on corruption and human rights charges. Fujimori, 67, came to Chile in November from Japan, where he lived after his government collapsed in 2000 in a corruption scandal.

5 Bird Flu Deaths In Indonesia Not Linked To Human Exchange (NYT)

By Peter Gelling

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

YOGYAKARTA, Indonesia, May 18 — World Health Organization officials said Thursday that the five avian flu deaths confirmed this week on Sumatra were probably not a result of human-to-human infection and did not suggest that the virus had mutated into a more deadly form.

Five family members were confirmed dead from the A(H5N1) strain of avian influenza by the World Health Organization on Wednesday, the largest such cluster recorded. A sixth family member died of flulike symptoms but was not tested for the virus.

Clusters like the one in Kubu Sembilang village in northern Sumatra, where the victims lived, worry health officials because they indicate that the virus may have been transmitted between humans. Health officials have long feared that such a mutation could set off a worldwide pandemic capable of killing millions.

Gina Samaan, a field epidemiologist for the World Health Organization in Kubu Sembilang investigating the recent cluster, said that the number of deaths had raised eyebrows but that so far the outbreak was similar to others in Indonesia that were caused by close contact with infected poultry.

"Current evidence doesn't suggest at all that the virus was passed between humans," she said in a telephone interview.

Agriculture Minister Anton Apriyantono said Thursday that a number of chickens, ducks and pigs in the village had tested positive for the virus. He said infected flocks of poultry would be culled immediately.

No new cases were reported beyond the Sumatra cluster, which officials said was encouraging. Investigators are scouring the village to determine why only this family had caught the disease.

Indonesia's death toll has reached 30, second only to Vietnam, which has recorded 42. Indonesia, however, has been recording bird flu deaths at a much higher rate than any other country in recent months.

Local tests indicate that a boy in the remote eastern province of Papua who died recently also had bird flu.

The latest fatalities prompted the Indonesian president, Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, to ask Thursday for additional international financial and technical support to help terminate the spread of the disease.

The government has been hesitant to conduct mass culls, as other Asian countries have done, because it cannot compensate farmers.

Lack of public health education probably accounts for Indonesia's high fatality rate, health officials say. In April, Indonesian bird flu patients reported their symptoms an average of five days after they began, making it hard for doctors to prevent deaths.

"It is an issue of how quickly people report their symptoms," Ms. Samaan said. "But we believe health care awareness is increasing."

DOJ_NMG_0029188

In Jakarta, where the majority of the Indonesian deaths have occurred, all major hospitals and even smaller health clinics have plastered bright orange-and-yellow posters on their walls detailing bird flu symptoms and treatments. Booklets have been distributed to far-flung villages throughout the country.

In the tiny village of Taman Jaya on Java's southwestern tip, villagers recently examined an informational packet from the Health Ministry, while chickens ran freely in the front door, through the kitchen and out the back door.

Saving Grace (NYT)

By Lauren F. Winner

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

Durham, N.C.

THE recent Harvard study that found teenagers' virginity pledges to be ineffective should come as a surprise to no one. Several studies had already come to that conclusion. If we are truly to help our teenagers adopt the countercultural sexual ethic of abstinence until marriage, Christians concerned about the rampant premarital sex in our communities need to rethink, rather than simply defend, young people's abstinence pledges.

It is awfully easy for Christians to blame our community's sexual sins on the mores of post-sexual revolution America — to criticize Abercrombie & Fitch catalogs, to natter on about how "Grey's Anatomy" portrays sexual behavior that doesn't square with Christianity.

But perhaps it's more important that we reconsider how we talk about sex in the church. For although the church devotes an immense amount of energy to teaching about sexuality — just go to the Christian inspiration section of your nearest Barnes & Noble and compare the number of books about chastity to books that challenge, say, consumerism — many Christians still "struggle with" (in that euphemistic evangelical phrase) premarital sex, adultery and pornography.

So why is the church's approach to teaching chastity falling short? Consider the popular "True Love Waits" virginity pledge: "Believing that true love waits, I make a commitment to God, myself, my family, my friends, my future mate and my future children to a lifetime of purity including sexual abstinence from this day until the day I enter a biblical marriage relationship."

This pledge and others like it are well meaning but deeply flawed. For starters, there's something disturbing about the assumption that teenagers are passively waiting for their future mates and children, when the New Testament is quite clear that some Christians are called to lifelong celibacy. (Paul, for example, did not have a mate or children, and Dan Brown's fantasies notwithstanding, Jesus's only bride was the church.) Chastity is not merely about passive waiting; it is about actively conforming our bodies to the arc of the Gospel and receiving the Holy Spirit right now.

Pledgers promise to control intense bodily desires simply by exercising their wills. But Christian ethics recognizes that the broken, twisted will can do nothing without rehabilitation by God's grace. Perhaps the centrality of grace is recognized best not in a pledge but in a prayer that names chastity as a gift and beseeches God for the grace to receive it.

The pledges are also cast in highly individualistic terms: I promise that I won't do this or that. As the Methodist bishop William Willimon once wrote: "Decisions are fine. But decisions that are not reinforced and reformed by the community tend to be short-lived."

During our first year of marriage, my husband and I lived in a small apartment inside a church. On Tuesdays, Alcoholics Anonymous and Al-Anon met downstairs. As I got to know some of the regulars, I began to wonder if there wasn't something the church could learn from the 12-step groups in our midst.

After all, what are 12-step groups but communities of people expecting transformation? People show up because they want to change, and they know that making a promise by themselves — I will stop drinking — won't cut it. Alcoholics Anonymous explicitly recognizes that transformation works best when a community comes alongside you and participates in your transformation.

Christians, like 12-step group attendees, are people who are committed to becoming, to use the Apostle Paul's phrase, new creatures. Living sexual lives that comport with the Gospel is one part of that.

Perhaps pledges for chastity need to be made not only by the individual teenager. Perhaps we also need pledges made by the teenager's whole Christian community: we pledge to support you in this difficult, countercultural choice; we pledge that the church is a place where you can lay bare your brokenness and sin, where you don't have to dissemble; we pledge to cheer you on when chastity seems unbearably difficult, and we pledge to speak God's forgiveness to you if you falter. No retooled pledge will guarantee teenagers' chastity, but words of grace and communal commitment are perhaps a firmer basis for sexual ethics than simple assertions that true love waits.

Earmark Loopholes (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0029189

The Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

When the House passed its lobbyist-reform bill last month, we praised the earmark transparency provision as a rare bright spot. Maybe we spoke too soon. Outsiders have now had a chance to inspect the fine print, and if Sarbanes-Oxley were this full of loopholes, few businesses would complain.

Under the House bill, all earmarks inserted into appropriations during the conference committee stage must identify the earmarker -- unless, we now discover, the earmark goes to a federal agency, as nearly half of them do. Another notable earmark exception has been carved out for Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, the mortgage giants that are political honey pots for the Members. As far as we know, the two companies have never received an earmark before -- which raises the question of whether they are about to become a new earmark shelter for the Members to disguise their pork-barrel habits.

Oh, and earmarks directed to state and local governments are also exempt from the requirement under some circumstances. How big a loophole is that? "It could be as big as the appropriators are clever," Representative Jeff Flake (R., Ariz.) told us. "And they're pretty clever." Congressman Flake has been fighting the earmark tide since long before it became a cause celebre, and he's hoping the loopholes can be narrowed when the House and Senate sit down to agree on a common version of the bill.

Perhaps with the House's Appropriator-in-Chief, Californian Jerry Lewis, now under investigation for allegedly steering millions in appropriations to a lobbyist via earmarks, reform will take on added urgency. But GOP leaders should understand that this kind of cynical loophole-writing won't make voters feel any better about them come November.

Medicare Bidding War (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, May 19, 2006

Republicans have been touting new polls showing rising popularity for their Medicare drug benefit. But this week's panic in Congress to extend Monday's deadline for penalty-free enrollment is further evidence that the program has been far from the political home run the GOP once hoped.

It seems forever ago now, but back during the heady days and high poll numbers of 2003 Republican leaders were convinced that the new entitlement was a no-lose proposition. Their cheering section at the Washington Times editorial board fantasized aloud that the benefit offered the prospect of a "permanent Republican majority."

How times have changed. At best, the drug benefit will be a political wash this first national election following its implementation, and there is reason for Republicans to worry that come November many seniors will be hitting the dread "doughnut hole" where coverage stops. More ominously, Democrats are making a pledge to "fix" the benefit -- meaning expand it -- their top campaign plank. So while Republicans might have gotten to play Santa for five minutes, they'll spend decades playing Scrooge as Democrats demagogue for more generous coverage.

All of this was predictable, and in fact was predicted by none other than former Clinton Medicare Administrator Nancy-Ann DeParle. In a 2003 Washington Post op-ed, she urged Democrats to support the program: "In signing it, as [President Bush] will surely be forced to do, he will preside over the biggest expansion of government health benefits since the Great Society. . . . The Democrats should fight to improve the bill now -- filling in the doughnut hole would be a good start. But they should also remember that there will be time to repair it, and more political support, once the bill becomes law -- as the history of past programs shows."

Things have developed more or less as Ms. DeParle had hoped. Democrats have indeed been agitating to "improve" the program from day one. And their complaints about the benefit design resonate for a good reason. In any rational insurance policy, coverage increases with increasing costs. The doughnut hole -- where coverage ceases between annual drug costs of $2,250 and $5,100, before kicking in again -- is what you get when politicians try to spread a little cash around regardless of need and at the same time try to control costs.

Another Democratic campaign issue will be pressure for Medicare to "negotiate" lower prices with drug makers. In reality, price "negotiation" is just a euphemism for price controls. "I'm sure that costs will escalate to the point where even Republicans will see the point of letting the secretary [of Health and Human Services] negotiate to hold down prices," says Democratic Representative Pete Stark. "When Medicare was created in 1965, the law prohibited setting fees for hospitals and doctors. And that's what we do now." This could have grave implications for future R&D budgets in the pharmaceutical industry.

Which means that it's not just the GOP that miscalculated in supporting this drug benefit. The bulk of Big Pharma did too, in the shortsighted hope that it would do something to reduce political pressure for things like drug "re-importation" from Canada and Europe. Only last week Pfizer CEO Hank McKinnell tried to sell Journal editors on the idea that the entitlement will actually save money because increased drug usage correlates with lower hospitalization and other costs.

Nice try. Most of the new entitlement simply replaces money that would have been spent by the private sector. The Medicare Trustees calculate that the drug benefit adds more to the government's unfunded liabilities than the entire projected

Social Security shortfall. We're sorry to see Pfizer -- which for a corporation has done rare and yeoman work promoting free enterprise -- become a defender of government efficiency.

In sum, the Medicare drug benefit has been a big setback for the causes of fiscal responsibility and market-oriented ideas in health care. Only the health-savings accounts that passed at the same time have a chance of redeeming the market "reform" promise that GOP leaders used to bludgeon the package through the House by a single vote.

The political future as far as the eye can see promises nasty battles over drug price controls, and between Democrats trying to expand the program and Republicans trying to hold the line. As for the short-term politics, obviously no one is talking anymore about a "permanent Republican majority." The question on everyone's lips is whether Republicans will even have a Congressional majority next year.

Hot Money Returns (NYT)

The New York Times, May 19, 2006

Those lucky investors who have ridden the bull run of the emerging markets in recent years — and those still thinking about getting onboard — should remember one thing. What goes up quickly often goes down quickly as well.

Investors usually move in herds, and right now they are stampeding, cash in hand, toward countries like Russia and India. As Landon Thomas Jr. reported in this paper yesterday, hedge funds, mutual funds and pension funds are embracing the risks and the returns in countries as far-flung as Zambia and the former Soviet republic of Georgia. Speculation may have overtaken smart investment.

In any country or business sector, there is a limit on the number of good investments. The better values are generally snapped up by the best-informed investors, those with knowledge on the ground. But fund managers have a perverse incentive structure during frenzied periods of investment. They are punished more for missing out on the stellar returns during the upswing than they are for losing money in any broad-based downturn that follows. That encourages short-term thinking, which may be all right for traders, but is less effective for the average people managing their retirement funds.

It's little wonder that no one wants to be left behind. According to Morningstar, the investment research firm, diversified emerging markets stock funds returned 56 percent, 24 percent and 32 percent in the last three years, well above what investors would have gotten by sticking to domestic equities, which returned just 7 percent in 2005.

Exotic stocks may keep rising, but they're also likely to remain very volatile. And while they could perform well during a slow decline in the dollar, a steep plunge in the greenback might send investors scrambling for the comfort of old standbys, like opportunities in Western Europe. The wise investors won't lose their heads and weight their portfolios too heavily toward the most exotic funds. The problem with hot money is that it's easy to get burned.

Lawsuit Against CIA Is Dismissed; Mistaken Identity Led to Detention

By Jerry Markon
Washington Post Staff Writer

A federal judge yesterday threw out the case of a German citizen who says he was wrongfully imprisoned by the CIA, ruling that Khaled al-Masri's lawsuit poses a "grave risk" of damage to national security by exposing government secrets.

U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III in Alexandria acknowledged that Masri "has suffered injuries" if his allegations are true and that he "deserves a remedy." Sources have said Masri was held by the CIA for five months in Afghanistan because of mistaken identity. Masri says he was beaten, sodomized and repeatedly questioned about alleged terrorist ties.

But Ellis said the remedy cannot be found in the courts. Masri's "private interests must give way to the national interest in preserving state secrets," the judge wrote in dismissing the lawsuit filed last year against former CIA director George J. Tenet and 10 unnamed CIA officials.

Masri had sought an apology and monetary compensation.

The ruling was a victory for Justice Department prosecutors, who had invoked the once rarely cited state-secrets privilege to argue for dismissal. Created in the 1950s, it allows the government to urge courts to dismiss cases on the grounds of damage to foreign policy or national security. The privilege has been used far more frequently since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Judges have usually acceded to the government's request. Last year, for example, the government won dismissal of a lawsuit by a Canadian citizen who claimed that he was taken to Syria by U.S. officials for detention and was tortured.

Ben Wizner, an American Civil Liberties Union attorney defending Masri, said Ellis "was precisely wrong that the judicial branch should not be involved here." He said the case was an opportunity to examine the CIA's program of secretly detaining suspects in one country and moving them to another for interrogation and detention -- a process known as "rendition."

"This is doubly insulting," Wizner said. "Everyone knows that Mr. al-Masri was a mistaken victim of the rendition program. He is now a victim of the misuse of the state-secrets privilege."

A Justice Department spokesman, Charles Miller, said the department was reviewing the ruling and would not comment.

Ellis said that his ruling was not a commentary on the substance of Masri's allegations but that if they are true, "all fair-minded people . . . must also agree that [Masri] has suffered injuries as a result of our country's mistake and deserves a remedy."

But if the government even responded, the judge wrote, it could compromise intelligence sources and methods. "Such a revelation would present a grave risk of injury to national security," Ellis concluded.

Masri, a German citizen of Lebanese descent, was arrested by police in Macedonia in December 2003 because his name was the same as that of another man suspected of terrorist links and because Macedonian police believed he was carrying a false passport, according to former and current intelligence officials and U.S. diplomats.

He was held for five months largely because the head of the CIA's Counterterrorist Center's al-Qaeda unit "believed he was someone else," a former CIA official last year said on condition of anonymity.

German investigators have confirmed most of Masri's allegations, which have received extensive publicity in Europe. In December, a senior Bush administration official traveling with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said U.S. officials had told the Germans that Masri was released because the intelligence was insufficient to justify his detention.

AGENCE FRANCE PRESSE ENGLISH WIRE

Germany notes US court ruling in CIA abduction case

BERLIN, May 19, 2006 (AFP) - The German government on Friday said it had noted the dismissal by a US court of German citizen Khaled El-Masri's lawsuit over his alleged abduction by the CIA in a "rendition" operation.

"We are aware of the decision but we cannot say from here whether he can eventually obtain damages or whether it precludes any further legal action on his part," foreign ministry spokesman Martin Jaeger said at a press conference.

A US district court on Thursday dismissed Lebanese-born El-Masri's suit on the basis of "states secrets" privilege -- that a trial would disclose secret information crucial to US security.

But the court in Alexandria, Virginia, also said that if his story was true, the US\l "l" government should come up with an unspecified "remedy" for El-Masri's complaint.

El-Masri, 42, sued\l "l" former CIA boss George Tenet, three allegedly CIA-linked aviation companies and numerous unnamed Central Intelligence Agency agents for 75,000 dollars (60,000 euros).

He claimed that he was abducted in a CIA rendition operation in Skopje, Macedonia on December 31, 2003, and held for five months, including in a CIA prison in Afghanistan.

During that time, he alleged, he was tortured and interrogated about whether he had links to the plotters of the September 11, 2001 attacks on the United States.

On May 28, 2004, El-Masri claimed, he was flown blindfolded in a private jet from Kabul to Albania, where he was left on the side of an abandoned road to make his own way home.

Chancellor Angela Merkel said in December that the US government had admitted that it made a "mistake" in El-Masri's case.

Abbott accused of inflating drug prices

By Julie Appleby, USA TODAY

Abbott Laboratories (ABT) allegedly inflated the prices of some drugs by as much as 10 times the actual sales price so its hospital customers could bill Medicare and Medicaid for more than they paid and pocket the difference, the Department of Justice said Thursday.

Customers who bought Abbott's products were reimbursed more than $175 million by the two government programs, said the department, which joined a whistle-blower suit against the company.

Melissa Brotz, a spokeswoman for Abbott, says the company has complied with all laws and regulations and intends to vigorously defend itself against the claims.

The case alleges that Abbott falsely listed average wholesale prices for some of the products, including intravenous antibiotic vancomycin, sold by its hospital division from 1991 to 2001. That division, Hospira, has since been spun off into an independent company. Because of the difference between the list price and the actual sales price, the complaint alleges, hospital customers sought more money from government programs than they should have — and Abbott gained business.

"This complaint marks another step in the government's investigation and prosecution of pharmaceutical manufacturers who submit fraudulent drug-pricing information," said Assistant Attorney General Peter Keisler in a statement.

Dozens of similar cases involving drugmakers, including Abbott, have been filed by state prosecutors. Many were initiated by the same whistle-blower, Ven-A-Care pharmacy of the Florida Keys.

The case alleges civil violations of the federal False Claims Act.

The government has intervened in some other wholesale price cases, but they generally also had other elements, such as allegations of kickbacks to doctors.

The Abbott case could have ramifications for others in the drug industry. "It's significant because this is an area where (the law) is a little gray and the conduct has not been clear-cut," says attorney James Becker, a partner at the Saul Ewing law firm in Philadelphia.

Government condition barred on AIDS funds

TONI LOCY
Associated Press

WASHINGTON - A federal judge on Thursday barred the Bush administration from requiring nonprofit AIDS groups to sign a pledge opposing prostitution and sex trafficking in exchange for federal dollars.

U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan said a law passed by Congress in 2003 violates the free-speech rights of groups such as DKT International Inc., which provides family planning and HIV/AIDS prevention programs in 11 countries.

Sullivan said the law goes too far because it insists that DKT "parrot" the U.S. government's position on prostitution and bars the group from taking and putting in place a different viewpoint on the issue in the way it spends privately obtained funds.

"By mandating that DKT adopt an organization-wide policy against prostitution, the government exceeds its ability to limit the use of government funds," Sullivan wrote.

In a lawsuit filed last year, DKT accused the U.S. Agency for International Development and its administrator of violating the free speech rights of AIDS nonprofit groups by requiring them to sign an anti-prostitution pledge to become eligible for U.S. government money.

In 2003, Congress created a $15 billion program for fighting AIDS worldwide. Under the law, groups that do not adopt a policy "explicitly opposing prostitution and sex trafficking" cannot receive federal money.

The group's representatives refused to sign the pledge because they are involved in a program to distribute condoms to prostitutes and other sex workers in Vietnam. Signing the pledge, they argued, would stigmatize and alienate many of the people they are trying to help.

The administration argued the law is narrowly tailored to prevent a "garbling" of U.S. policy goals, control use of federal dollars and ensure the U.S. government speaks with one voice internationally.

Sullivan disagreed, saying the Supreme Court repeatedly has ruled that the government cannot compel private groups "to speak in a content-specific, viewpoint specific manner" as a condition of receiving federal money.

ONTARIO GROUPS SUE U.S., CANADA FOR SUSPENDING NAFTA LUMBER ECC

Two Ontario lumber associations sued\l "l" the U.S\l "l". and Canadian governments this week over their agreement to suspend a U.S\l "l". extraordinary challenge to a North American Free Trade Agreement decision that found against U.S. duties on Canadian lumber. The suits argue that the government-to-government deal to suspend the NAFTA challenge unfairly freezes the process at a point where the U.S. can continue collecting countervailing duties against Canadian lumber imports for an indefinite period of time.

In contrast, allowing the process to proceed would likely lead to a decision under which the U.S. would have to stop collecting these duties, they said.

The suit comes just a few weeks after the two governments announced they had a general deal to settle the long-running lumber trade fight, which would be turned into a more detailed legal agreement as long as both sides drop all ongoing litigation. Sources said the new lawsuits appear to be further indication that at least some Canadian industry groups do not appear to be ready to give up litigation against the U.S., which could ultimately spell doom for the political agreement.

The two suits filed by the Ontario groups claimed that their constitutional due process rights to property were violated when the NAFTA extraordinary challenge committee (ECC) process was suspended. The Ontario Forest Industries Association and the Ontario Lumber Manufacturers Association filed the suits on May 16 -- one before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Colombia, and the other before the U.S. Court of International Trade. Both of these industry groups have U.S. companies and U.S. importers as members.

The suits are a reaction to the May 12 joint letter from the U.S. and Canadian governments to the NAFTA Secretariat announcement that the U.S. and Canada had agreed to suspend the ECC, and asked the NAFTA Secretariat to notify other parties to the dispute, including the Ontario organizations. The two governments also declined to nominate judges to the panel by a May 12 deadline for doing so, despite calls from the Canadian industry for Canada to appoint judges.

In response, the two Ontario groups asked the U.S. appeals court to find that the U.S. had no right to suspend the process under NAFTA or U.S. law, decide that failing to appoint panelists violates the U.S. Constitution, and order the U.S. to appoint panelists in the case. The groups argued that the ECC was the result of private industry action under NAFTA, which the U.S. has now stymied by suspending indefinitely the phase at which the government can weigh in.

"The heart of the matter is that private parties have brought a complaint against the United States, and once the United States lost, it shut down the process that would give the private parties their due relief," the groups said in their May 16 pleading.

The pleading argued that nothing in the implementing legislation on NAFTA allows the U.S. to suspend the ECC, and pointed out that the U.S. cites no authority allowing the suspension.

The NAFTA panel decision the U.S. brought to the ECC accepted a de minimis U.S. subsidy finding against Canada, which, if upheld by the ECC process, would mean the 8.7 percent countervailing order on Canadian softwood would have to be lifted. The U.S. made this de minimis finding only after the panel required the U.S. to use data certain to result in a de minimis finding.

The filing to the CIT demanded that judges be appointed to the ECC, and argued that the U.S. violated Section 402(a)(1)(e) of the NAFTA implementation act by not appointing a member or members of the ECC by May 12.

The CIT suit said an action by the court ordering the administration to appoint panelists to the ECC is justified because the administration had a non-discretionary duty to appoint panelists to the ECC under law implementing NAFTA. It also argued that the Ontario associations and their affiliated importers have no other option than asking the court to compel the administration to appoint panelists.

NAFTA itself does not provide for an appeal to address the failure to appoint panelists, and NAFTA panels have no power to order the appointments, the suit said.

Finally, the groups filed notice that they will sue Canada under the Federal Arbitration Act. They argue that Canada agreed to arbitrate extraordinary challenges under NAFTA but has refused to do so by suspending the ECC.

Members of the two Ontario associations include lumber giants Tembec, Domtar, Bowater and Weyerhaeuser, which has signaled support for the tentative U.S.-Canada lumber deal. One industry source acknowledged some companies in the groups have been outspoken in their support of the deal, but signaled they were still supporting the suits because they saw it as being helpful for the pursuit of a better final deal.

Sources close to the U.S. industry argued that the lawsuits are unlikely to go far, since nothing in the NAFTA implementation act prevents governments from suspending an ECC challenge. Sources noted that the U.S. and Canada as sovereign entities are allowed to suspend an ECC to continue working on a settlement, since the ECC is a government-to-government process.

One source also noted that provisions in the NAFTA allow for the timeframes in an ECC to be extended, and that while the NAFTA panel review process includes private parties, the ECC is strictly a government-to-government process.

This source also argued that U.S. law implementing NAFTA does not require the U.S. to appoint panelists within 15 days, but only requires the U.S. to follow certain criteria in selecting panelists, such as choosing them from an accepted list. This source also noted that the U.S. and Canada frequently in the past have not appointed panelists within 15 days. As a result, he said, there is no justification for the CIT to order the U.S. to appoint panelists.

"It's a renegade faction making a desperate effort to do anything they can to slow a settlement," this source said of the lawsuits.

Meanwhile, sources said the U.S. and Canada would also suspend Chapter 11 of the NAFTA for the purposes of softwood lumber under a 23-page draft legal text circulated by the Canadian federal government to provincial officials late last week.

Sources familiar with the text said it invokes Article 58 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties to suspend NAFTA Chapter 11 for softwood lumber disputes. Chapter 11 allows investors in one NAFTA country to ask a NAFTA panel to award damages caused by another NAFTA government's actions that harmed their investment.

Article 58 allows two or more parties to a multilateral treaty to suspend the operations of provisions of the treaty temporarily and between themselves alone. They may do so, according to the convention, if it is not prohibited by the treaty under certain conditions. Those conditions are that suspension must not affect the enjoyment by the other parties of their rights under the treaty of the performance of their obligations; and that it is not incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty. The U.S., Canada and Mexico are the three parties in NAFTA.

One informed source argued that suspending Chapter 11 for NAFTA suits could be considered incompatible with the object and purpose of NAFTA, as one of the key purposes for Canada was to ensure that its companies would have protection from having their property taken away by another NAFTA state.

The tentative agreement reached by the U.S. and Canada must be agreed by Canadian timber mills, since one provision of the deal would be that all softwood litigation is dropped. This would require several Canadian companies to drop existing Chapter 11 claims against the U.S., sources said. The summary of the tentative agreement announced in late April did not specifically mention the suspension of Chapter 11.

The call for Chapter 11 to be suspended appears to be a demand of the U.S. government and its industry, two informed sources said, as only Canadian companies have brought suits under NAFTA Chapter 11. One of these sources noted that current Canadian Minister of International Trade David Emerson launched a NAFTA Chapter 11 case when he was the chief executive officer of Canfor, a Canadian lumber company.

While the draft paper mentions the elimination of all litigation in the lumber fight as a top objective of the agreement, the Canadian industry was informed late last week that Canada would appeal a WTO panel decision that found the U.S. did not violate WTO rules through its use of the so-called "zeroing" methodology, which is used to calculate antidumping margins and generally leads to higher margins. Last week, Canadian industry groups were pressing Canada to appeal this case.

Canada would appeal a decision that the U.S. did not violate WTO rules when it used zeroing in a transaction-by-transaction comparison to develop an overall antidumping margin. WTO panels have already ruled against zeroing, where the U.S. ignores negative dumping margins, when it is used through weighted average to weighted average comparisons, but they so far have not ruled on the use of zeroing in transaction-to-transaction comparisons.

Canada has also written to the CIT asking that it go forward with a decision on whether the U.S. was right to keep duties in place through the use of a second U.S. International Trade Commission finding that U.S. producers were threatened with injury from imports of Canadian softwood lumber. Canada is arguing that the U.S. should have lifted antidumping and countervailing orders when a NAFTA panel ruled an initial ITC finding was wrong, and that all of the approximately $5 billion in deposits should be returned to importers of record.

The CIT judge in the case has requested a May 25 meeting to discuss the status of the case while negotiations on a final agreement are underway. Some sources expect the U.S. and the Coalition to push for the case to be suspended pending the negotiations.

Separately, U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab at a May 16 Senate Finance Committee hearing on her nomination said she hoped a final deal would be completed with Canada in the next few weeks. Canada has told provincial officials it would like to have a deal in place by mid-June.

Schwab said consultations were taking place on a day-to-day basis, and she described the agreement as "very market-based in terms of its structure." She said it was designed to address problems the U.S. industry faces without unduly burdening consumers of lumber.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley (R-IA) criticized the deal during the hearing, and said he did not believe it would help U.S. consumers. He asked Schwab to ensure that so-called "exit ramps" are negotiated quickly. These exit ramps would allow provincial governments to make reforms in order to send lumber to the U.S. unrestricted.

CONSUMER GROUP TO SUE FDA AGAIN OVER QUALIFIED HEALTH CLAIMS

A consumer group plans to take FDA back to court for permitting the food industry to make qualified health claims, following the agency's announcement last week that it will let such claims as it sorts through regulatory issues. FDA signaled in a new guidance that it will refrain from taking enforcement action to stop qualified health claims while it continues to collect information and conduct additional research to decide what claims are appropriate and if regulatory action is needed.

FDA's May 12 guidance allows food products and dietary supplements to make claims to prevent or reduce the risk of disease whether the claim is based on a consensus of qualified experts or approved by the FDA.

At issue is FDA's move to let food products use the same qualified health claims approach that the agency was forced by the courts in 2004 to apply to dietary supplements. Consumer advocates say food law specifically prohibits extending the policy to food.

The Center for Science in the Public Interest (CSPI) originally sued FDA in 2003 alleging the agency broke the law by allowing food manufacturers to make qualified health claims that had not met what is known as the "significant scientific agreement" (SSA) standard. SSA means qualified experts who have evaluated a health claim, such as "diets low in sodium may reduce the risk of high blood pressure," agree evidence supports the claim.

The guidance -- FDA's Implementation of "Qualified Health Claims" -- also allows food manufacturers to make qualified health claims that are based on FDA's assessment. Both types of health claims require a petition to the FDA, but a food manufacturer can determine whether it wishes to attempt to meet SSA or have FDA evaluate its worthiness. Qualified health claims must be accompanied by a disclaimer or be qualified.

"We still think they mislead consumers," said Ilene Ringel Heller, a senior staff attorney at CSPI.

Ringel Heller said consumers often misinterpret the disclaimers that are meant to convey that the qualified health claim is not backed up by strong science to mean the opposite.

CSPI sued\l "l" FDA shortly after the agency announced it would begin allowing qualified health claims in September 2003, but the U.S\l "l". District Court of the District of Columbia threw out the case because FDA had not yet approved any qualified health claims. CSPI plans to file a second lawsuit in the same court, Ringel Heller said.

CSPI's claim is based on the allegation that FDA is violating the Nutrition Labeling and Education Act (NLEA) passed in 1990. The act required foods making health claims to meet SSA.

FDA defends itself in the guidance.

"Moreover, past court decisions have clarified the need to provide for health claims based on less science evidence rather than just on the standard of significant scientific agreement (SSA), as long as the claims do not mislead the consumers."

CSPI, in its comments on FDA's advanced notice of proposed rulemaking regarding qualified health claims in February 2004, addressed Pearson v. Shalala, in which the court ruled FDA violated the First Amendment by prohibiting four health claims for dietary supplements without determining whether a disclaimer would prevent consumer deception. But CSPI argues NLEA applies to food, not dietary supplements.

FDA is currently collecting more information and conducting additional research to decide what is appropriate qualifying language and the extent to which consumers comprehend claims based on SSA or FDA petitions before it establishes final regulations, if any, regarding qualified health claims.

"The agency is also interested in knowing if there are better formats for presenting the supporting science than through the use of words alone," according to the guidance.

Until then, FDA will continue to review qualified health claim petitions on a case-by-case basis.

Church Leader, Wife Claim Peyote Prosecution Violated Their Religious Rights

Debbie Hummel

The leader of an American Indian church and his wife claim in a lawsuit that authorities tried to prevent them from practicing their religion by prosecuting the couple for consuming and distributing peyote.

James "Flaming Eagle" Mooney, 62, and Linda Mooney, 52, leaders of the Oklevueha Earth Walks Native American Church of Utah, have successfully fought charges involving their use of peyote.

The most recent charges were dropped in February after the Supreme Court ruled in an unrelated case involving a hallucinogenic tea that the government cannot hinder religious practices without proof of a "compelling" need to do so.

The Mooneys' federal lawsuit filed Tuesday claims that their First Amendment rights were violated. They are seeking unspecified damages and court fees from the federal, state and local governments.

"Again, it is amazing that we have been forced to this extreme just so we can worship in our Native American Church," Mooney said Wednesday.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office said prosecutors were reviewing the Mooneys' complaint.

Porn domain firm sues US government

ICM Registry LLC, the company behind the proposed .xxx internet porn domain, is to sue two departments of the US government for access to documents it claims show the US pressured ICANN into rejecting the domain.

The Florida-based startup will sue the Department of Commerce and the Department of State to get them to release documents that they redacted when they responded to a Freedom Of Information Act request that ICM filed last year.The suit is expected to allege that the documents released to ICM so far show that the US "exerted undue political influence on ICANN's consideration of the .xxx domain application", and that the redactions were unlawful under FOIA.We've seen about 100 pages of these documents, most of them emails sent between staff at the National Telecommunications and Information Administration, a branch of Commerce.

The documents we've seen suggest that last summer the NTIA reversed its quiet tolerance of the .xxx application, which was on the way to approval, after lobbying from conservative groups, then set about trying to persuade foreign governments to back its position.ICM claims the documents show that the US government "solicit[ed] foreign government intervention to achieve DoC's domestic political goals".One of these goals, the documents suggest, was appeasing the Family Research Council and Focus On The Family, right-wing groups run by radio host James Dobson. Dobson was credited by some with winning the 2004 presidential election for Bush, by bringing out the anti-gay vote.

"What really matters in this mess is Jim Dobson," one Commerce staffer emailed to his colleagues on June 16. "What he says on his radio program in the morning will determine how ugly this really gets--if he jumps on the bandwagon, our mail server may crash."He did jump on the bandwagon.

While it's not known if the server crashed, it is known that tens of thousands of form email complaints were ultimately sent to Commerce and ICANN as a result of Dobson's outreach.ICANN has an international membership, but its power to decide what domains are allowed on the internet comes from an agreement with the NTIA.NTIA's role is supposed to be hands-off. The primary governmental input ICANN's board of directors is supposed to consider are the consensus position papers of its 100-nation Governmental Advisory Committee.ICANN's board rejected ICM's .xxx application recently, after almost a year of delays, in a 9 to 5 vote.

Several directors said they cast negative votes because they didn't think ICM had adequately addressed the concerns of the GAC.But ICM thinks the GAC was captured by the US. The documents we've seen contain evidence that the US tried to persuade other GAC member nations to back up its position that .xxx would not be a good thing.The company thinks this is inappropriate, given the US position as ICANN's overseer.ICANN president Paul Twomey told us that he's not privy to negotiations within the GAC. But he added that if the US did push for other nations to support its position, that's exactly what the GAC is there for."If one government wants to try to get consensus on an issue in the GAC, that's exactly the kind of thing that ICANN's structures are set up for," Twomey said.

The documents we've seen do seem to show that the US administration allowed policy to be guided by right-wing religious groups. Offensive as that may be to secular liberals, it's about as surprising as an American team winning the World Series.What the documents we've seen do not appear to conclusively show is that the US government directly pressured ICANN's directors into voting the way they did. Whether that's because it didn't pressure them, or because the smoking guns have all been redacted, time may tell.The documents do show that the NTIA gave the Family Research Council the phone numbers of several ICANN staff, including Twomey.

Twomey is the only person who is both on the ICANN board and a member of staff.Another indication of communication between an ICANN director and NTIA comes in the form of a September 2005 email exchange between an NTIA staffer and Mohamed Sharil Tarmizi, the Malaysian telecommunications regulator who chairs the GAC.In that exchange, the NTIA staffer forwards to Tarmizi an email from Swedish communications minister Ulrica Messing. The MEssing letter is addressed to ICANN chair Vint Cerf, copied to Twomey and to Tarmizi himself.Since the Swedish letter was not made public by ICANN until November, the inference ICM makes is that either Messing, Cerf or Twomey passed it to the NTIA before even Tarmizi had seen it. This, ICM says, suggests closer NTIA-ICANN ties than thought.

Twomey said he does not know how NTIA got the Messing letter. He acknowledged that ICANN does communicate with the US government, but said that it talks to many governments about many different issues.Another indication that the US influence on the GAC was significant comes in another exchange between Tarmizi and an NTIA staffer from August last year, around the time when the US suddenly started expressing concern about .xxx.

"I am just wondering if you could share with me how far the USG is going to take this issue," Tarmizi wrote. He later adds: "I need to know what the acceptable future course of action might be so that we can do some strategizing."

ICM says this backs up its contention that the GAC was used as a smokescreen to deflect attention from the fact that it was really the US government pulling the strings.It should be noted that in addition to the US, varying levels of concern over .xxx and/or the processes used to approve it have also been expressed by Sweden, the UK, Brazil and Denmark.ICM is suing for alleged breaches of FOIA. One of its lead attorneys is Robert Corn-Revere, who has tackled several notable internet cases in the past.The company alleges that the redacted portions of the documents will show an inappropriate influence on ICANN, and hopes that fresh information coming to light will help it get ICANN to reconsider its decision to reject the .xxx proposal.

Update 3: Guantanamo Prison Guards, Inmates Clash

By BEN FOX , 05.19.2006, 12:47 PM
Associated Press
Prisoners wielding improvised weapons clashed with guards trying to stop a detainee from committing suicide at the U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, the military said Friday.

The fight occurred Thursday in a medium-security section of the camp as guards were responding to the fourth attempted suicide that day at the detention center on the U.S. Navy base, Cmdr. Robert Durand said.

Detainees used fans, light fixtures and other improvised weapons to attack the guards as they entered a communal living area to stop a prisoner trying to hang himself, Durand said.

Earlier in the day, three detainees in another part of the prison attempted suicide by swallowing prescription medicine they had been hoarding.

The attempted suicides and clash occurred on the same day the military transferred 15 Saudi detainees to their country, leaving about 460 prisoners at Guantanamo. It was unclear if the disturbances were related to the transfers.

The detainees who took part in the clash with guards were moved to higher-security sections.

The medium-security Camp Four, where the clash occurred, houses detainees in dorm-style rooms that hold up to 10 people. Camp Four is for the most compliant prisoners and those who are slated for release.

Those who attempted suicide received medical treatment, the military said.
Their names were not released, and military officials declined to speculate about possible motives.

This was the second reported simultaneous suicide attempt at Guantanamo, which holds detainees suspected of links to al-Qaida or the Taliban. The U.S. military said 23 detainees carried out a coordinated effort to hang or strangle themselves in 2003 during a weeklong protest in the secretive camp in Cuba.

There have been previous reports of protests and more minor disturbances at the detention center, including incidents in which detainees hurled urine and other bodily fluids at guards or banged on cell doors for hours at a time. A hunger strike that began in August has involved up to 131 detainees but now has dwindled to a handful.

Word of the clash came as a U.N. panel that monitors compliance with the world's anti-torture treaty called on the United States to close the prison.

There have been 39 suicide attempts at Guantanamo since the prison opened in January 2002, the military said. At least 12 were by Juma'a Mohammed al-Dossary, a 32-year-old from Bahrain.

Joshua Colangelo-Bryan, an attorney for al-Dossary's, said he visited his client last week and saw scars on his throat and the back of his neck from his most recent attempt in March.

Colangelo-Bryan, whose New York-based law firm, Dorsey and Whitney LLP, represents three detainees from Bahrain, said he did not know if any of his clients were involved in Thursday's incident.

The lawyer said the suicides reflect the desperation of detainees held for more than four years with no idea when, or if, they will be released.

"Under these circumstances, it's hardly surprising that people become desperate and hopeless enough to attempt suicide," he said.

4 Detainees Attempt Suicide
Four detainees attempted suicide at the Guantanamo detention center on the same day as a planeload of Saudis left for their homeland.
Miami Herald
May 19, 2006
By Carol Rosenberg
GUANTANAMO BAY NAVY BASE, Cuba -- Four foreign captives tried to kill themselves Thursday -- three with drug overdoses, another by hanging -- on the same day 15 Saudi Arabian captives were flown home from this offshore detention center for suspected terrorists.
None of the captives were seriously wounded, but a disturbance erupted inside a barracks of about 10 enemy combatants at a minimum-security compound -- where guards trying to stop a captive from hanging himself fought with detainees wielding "fans, light fixtures and other items as improvised weapons," said Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand, a prison spokesman.
The surge in suicide attempts happened on the same day that 15 long-held captives from Saudi Arabia were repatriated to their homeland in the largest mass transfer from the prison camp here in more than a year.
'No idea of motive'
"I have no idea of motive, no idea of any coordination -- and no idea of any intended message," said Durand, who added that guards would search cells for contraband.
The Saudi foreign minister had earlier announced that 16 would be repatriated.
Hours before the suicide attempts, the new commander of the prison project said that with no plans to close the detention centers here soon, the U.S.
military has developed a plan to handle the eventual death of a detainee in U.S. custody.
There is "every chance in a population of this size" that a death will occur, said Rear Adm. Harry Harris Jr., who took command on March 31.
``We will conduct an autopsy. We will want to understand why the person died."
His comments were more of a general nature, in response to a reporter's question about contingency plans -- and not in reference to the surging suicide attempts.
Overdoses
At least 23 detainees have attempted suicide here 41 times. Three of the attempts on Thursday involved captives taking overdoses of prescription drugs.
Guards and medical staff responded quickly, the commander said -- and they were given ``activated charcoal to absorb and neutralize the medications." By Thursday night, two men remained under observation in the hospital. Their vital signs were normal. The captive who tried to hang himself, and one of those who tried to overdose were seen by medical staff and sent to cells, he added.
Harris -- the first Navy commander of the detention center after a succession of Army and Marine generals -- said he understood that President Bush's goal is ultimately to close GuantÃ¡namo.
But he characterized captives here as ``hardened enemy combatants." And he said, despite review processes meant to transfer captives and winnow the population, he doesn't expect to empty the prison camps during his two-year tour here.
Hours before the interview, a Royal Saudi Air 747 jetliner departed to repatriate 15 Saudi captives for investigation and potential trial -- the largest mass transfer out of the prison camps in more than a year.

Frank response
In marked contrast to previous commanders who sidestepped sensitive topics, Harris responded frankly and expansively to questions about planning for the death of a detainee.
''Honestly, we're going to be subject to lots of questions, and rightfully so. Legitimate questions,'' said Harris, a veteran Navy aviator. ``Why did this person die? Did you have something to do with it? Was it of natural causes?''
''And I believe if it is of natural causes, we're still going to be criticized,'' he said. ``We should try to be as convincing of the truth as we can be.'' In the event of a death, Harris said, a pathologist and Muslim chaplain would be called to GuantÃ¡namo and an autopsy would be conducted. Once that was complete, the U.S. military would give the captive a Muslim burial either at GuantÃ¡namo Bay or in the captive's home country.
The Defense Department says no detainees have died at GuantÃ¡namo.
About 750 prisoners have been held here since GuantÃ¡namo opened as a detention and interrogation center in January 2002. There are also chronically ill captives -- with diabetes, latent tuberculosis and heart disease.
Three captives are also long-term hunger strikers, fed twice a day by nasal feeding tubes.

US says treatment of Guantanamo inmates within American law

Agence France Presse -- English
May 19, 2006 Friday 5:46 PM GMT

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, May 19 2006

The United States on Friday brushed aside charges that inmates detained at its facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba are mistreated, insisting that interrogations carried out there are fully within US legal guidelines.
"It is important to note that everything that is done in terms of questioning detainees is fully within the boundaries of American law," White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters.
His remarks came one day after a United Nations anti-torture watchdog called on Washington to close Guantanamo and any secret prisons it operates around the world.
The report by the UN Committee Against Torture also said the United States must end mistreatment of its "war on terror" detainees and refrain from handing inmates over to countries where they could face physical and mental abuse.
The 10-member panel of legal experts said the Guantanamo prison camp should be closed and detainees there either put on trial or freed.
Snow, who made no mention of the attempts Thursday by four detainees to commit suicide at the prison camp, stressed that the prisoners at Guantanamo are treatly humanely.
"All detainees get the three meals a day in accordance with Muslim law." He added that they also were well-treated "with regard to diet, water, medical care, clothing, shoes, shelter, showers, soap and toilet articles, the opportunity to worship, Korans and prayer mats." "In short, we are according every consideration consistent with not only the law, but the needs of safety and security at Guantanamo to the people who are there." The spokesman also referred to past comments by US President George W. Bush, in which he said he hoped one day to be able to close the detention camp.
In the meantime, Snow said, quoting the presidentL "'We're at war with an enemy and we've got to protect ourselves'." Saudi Foreign Minister Urges More Detainee Releases From Guantanamo Saudi Arabia's foreign minister says he hopes the United States will release more prisoners from the detention facility at the U.S. Naval Station at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Prince Saud al-Faisal says he hopes this week's transfer of 15 Saudi nationals from Guantanamo Bay will be followed by more detainee releases in the future, and expressed disdain for the controversial facility in general.
"We are very happy and pleased to have received the 15 Saudis that were released," he said, "and we are hoping that the rest of them will be released as time goes on. And, if all prisoners leave the place, then I really do not care what happens to the place." The foreign minister spoke with reporters after meeting with President Bush for what White House officials termed a "strategic dialogue" on counter-terrorism, energy and regional issues. Prince Saud al-Faisal said he discussed Iraq and Iran with Mr. Bush, and said he is convinced that the president is doing everything possible to bring security and stability to the Middle East region.
Earlier, the United Nations Committee Against Torture urged the United States to close the detention camp at Guantanamo Bay, where suspected al-Qaida and Taleban prisoners have been held since late 2001. Some 460 detainees are currently being held at the facility, including scores of Saudi nationals.
Speaking with reporters, White House spokesman Tony Snow noted that President Bush has also expressed a desire to one day bring the detainee operation at Guantanamo Bay to a close. But he said the president is awaiting a decision by the U.S. Supreme Court as to whether the accused terrorists and combatants will face charges in a civilian or military court.
In the meantime, Snow said, the United States treats all detainees humanely.

Saudi lawyer says USA should release all Saudi Guantanamo prisoners

BBC Monitoring Middle East - Political
May 19, 2006 Friday

Text of report by Saudi Al-Ikhbariyah TV on 18 May In an earlier bulletin we broadcast the following interview with Katib al-Shammari, the lawyer of the Saudi detainees in Guantanamo:
[Al-Shammari - recording] It is common knowledge that there are clear instructions from the Interior Ministry that as soon as a detainee arrives back in the country, his family is informed and is allowed to visit him.
According to our own information, a group of detainees is expected to be arriving in the next few hours. Many families have been in touch with us. Of course, the good news made some families very happy. But, as only 16 out of 120 detainees are being released, other families are still very anxious and are asking us all sort of questions.
Of course, we are very pleased about the news of their release, but we still think that 16 out 120 detainees is not enough. We are hoping that the American authorities will release everyone. We are hoping that a new group of detainees will be released soon. It is thanks to God and the efforts of the concerned authorities in the kingdom that this group has been released.
However, we must work towards the release of more people. I would like to repeat here that I think this is not enough on the part of the American authorities; they ought to release more people.

FRESH ASSURANCES ON RELEASE OF INMATES

Global News Wire - Asia Africa Intelligence Wire May 18, 2006 Thursday

BYLINE: Habib Toumi, Bureau Chief

Doha: Forty-one-year-old Bahraini detainee Eisa Al Murbati broke into tears when he was told that his son would buy him a cake when he is released from Guantanamo prison, his lawyer said.
"I talked with Eisa about me meeting his boys in Bahrain. I told him that one of his young sons had promised to buy him a cake when he comes home," New York-based lawyer Joshua Colangelo-Bryan told Gulf News yesterday.
The lawyer said he also conveyed a message to Al Murbati from one of his sons to call his family. "Unfortunately, Eisa is not allowed to do it." The lawyer met Salah Al Bloushi and Juma Al Dossary, but could not report his discussions with them until the information is de-classified by the United States. It "will be classified likely for at least two weeks", he said.
Colangelo-Bryan, who was in Bahrain last month on a short visit, said he told the detainees about his recent trip to the kingdom.
"We told them about our meetings with family members and government officials. We assured our clients, as we were assured, that the Bahrain government and the parliament are making all efforts to bring them home," he said.
"We told our clients that we hope these efforts will be successful soon." Family photos The lawyer added that although he had family photographs from Bahrain, he was not allowed to show them to Al Bloushi and Al Murbati. "Hopefully, the photographs will be delivered to them soon." He said when he met Al Dossary on the last day of his Guantanamo visit, he noted Al Dossary had injuries. "He has a scar across his neck, which is consistent with the reports that he had tried to cut his throat in March. He also has a deep scar on the side of his leg," Colangelo-Bryan said, adding that "Juma did not have either of these scars during our last visit".
Al Dossary last month tried to commit suicide for the 13th time.

'Not enough interrogators' at Guantanamo
May 19, 2006 - 2:19PM

Only about one-quarter of the prisoners held at the US naval base at Guantanamo Bay are interrogated regularly, because there are not enough translators and interrogators to question them all, the US admiral in charge said.
Rear Admiral Harry Harris, who at the end of March took command of the military task force that runs the camp, said the 460 detainees at Guantanamo in Cuba were dangerous men who still provide useful information about al-Qaeda tactics, financing and safe houses.
Among those held is Australian David Hicks.
Harris said only senior al-Qaeda and Taliban leaders were routinely questioned by US interrogators.
"It's about around 25 per cent of the population that we are actively interrogating," Harris told visiting journalists.
"If we had unlimited interrogators and translators then we could interrogate more. But we have limited resources so we have to focus that the best way we can, so we go after those detainees that have the largest intelligence value."
The rest are not ignored completely, he said.
But asked if some prisoners might have gone years without being questioned, he replied, "I would think there are, but I just don't know." The United States has faced criticism from human rights groups and some of its allies for indefinitely holding prisoners at Guantanamo.
US President George W Bush said earlier this month he would like to close the detention centre.
Some 759 captives have been held at Guantanamo since the detention operation opened in 2002, and nearly 300 have been released or transferred to their home nations for continued detention, including 15 sent home to Saudi Arabia on Thursday.
Harris said he expected the population to drop further as officials in Washington complete diplomatic negotiations to return about 120 more to their homelands.
He said he was convinced the rest were "truly dangerous men intent on jihad" and must continue to be

He said he was convinced the rest were "truly dangerous men intent on jihad" and must continue to be held for the protection of Americans.
In a far-ranging interview, Harris said the United States will spend $US64 million ($A84 million) to run the Guantanamo detention operation this year, not counting the $US30 million ($A39 million) spent on a new medium-security prison that will replace some of the aging cells in August.
He said the Guantanamo captives were well treated and in generally good health, but with the oldest now 71, the military had drafted a plan for dealing with any deaths.
Nearly all the prisoners are Muslim and Harris said a Muslim chaplain was on call and would be sent to Guantanamo to perform traditional rites.
He said the body could be returned to the prisoner's homeland or buried at a cemetery on the Guantanamo base but that interment likely would not take place swiftly, as Muslim tradition requires.
"We would conduct an autopsy because we want to understand why the person died," Harris said.
"Obviously we're going to be subjected to lots of questions." Shortly after the interview, a Guantanamo spokesman said two prisoners had attempted suicide on Thursday by overdosing on prescription medicine they had apparently been hoarding.
They received emergency medical treatment, had normal vital signs and were under observation in the camp hospital, said the spokesman, Commander Robert Durand.
He said there had been 39 suicide attempts by 23 Guantanamo prisoners since the camp opened, including 12 attempts by the same man.
None have succeeded, Durand said.

UN body urges U.S. to shut Guantanamo
May 19, 2006 - 9:39 AM
By Stephanie Nebehay

GENEVA (Reuters) - The United Nations committee against torture told the United States on Friday it should close any secret prisons abroad and the Guantanamo Bay facility in Cuba, saying they violated international law.

The 10 independent experts, who examined the U.S. record at home and abroad, urged President George W. Bush's administration to "rescind any interrogation technique" that constituted torture or cruel treatment of foreign terrorism detainees.

It cited use of dogs to terrify detainees, "water-boarding" which is a form of mock drowning, and sexual humiliation.

The United States "should ensure that no one is detained in any secret detention facility under its de facto effective control" and "investigate and disclose the existence of any such facilities," said the committee, which has moral authority but no legal power to enforce its recommendations.

"Detaining persons in such conditions constitutes, per se, a violation of the Convention," said the committee which examines compliance with the 1987 U.N. Convention against Torture, or other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.

Secret detainees are deprived of fundamental legal rights and could face torture, according to the body which regretted the U.S. "no comment" policy on allegations of secret detention.

The United States is holding hundreds of terrorism suspects, most arrested since al Qaeda's September 11 attacks in 2001, at its prisons in Afghanistan, Iraq, and Guantanamo Bay.

Rights groups say the United States is believed to be holding in undisclosed locations Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, alleged operational mastermind of the 9/11 attacks, and Ramzi bin al-Shaibah, a member of the Hamburg, Germany cell that led them.

Another such detainee is Abu Zubaydah, a suspected senior al Qaeda operational planner.

The activist group Human Rights Watch lists the three men, captured in Pakistan, as "ghost prisoners" believed to be in U.S. custody but without legal rights or access to lawyer.

Washington, which sent 30 senior officials to Geneva in early May for the committee's two-day hearings, defended its treatment of foreign terrorism suspects held abroad, saying there had been "relatively few actual cases of abuse".

U.S. officials said waterboarding was not listed in the current Army Field Manual and was therefore banned.

RELIABLE REPORTS OF TORTURE

The committee voiced concern at "reliable reports of acts of torture or cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment" by U.S. military or civilian personnel in Afghanistan and Iraq.

"The state party (the United States) should take immediate measures to eradicate all forms of torture and ill-treatment of detainees by its military or civilian personnel ... and should promptly and thoroughly investigate such acts and prosecute all those responsible...," it said in its 10-page findings.

The Guantanamo Bay facility in Cuba should be closed and its inmates either brought to trial or released, "ensuring they are not returned to any state where they could face a real risk of being tortured", the committee said.

It regretted secrecy surrounding U.S. practice of asking countries for "diplomatic assurances" that they will not torture detainees being sent by Washington. There was a lack of judicial scrutiny and monitoring to ensure that guarantees were upheld.

The committee also voiced concerns at use of electro-shock devices in U.S. prisons, shackling of women inmates during childbirth and the "harsh regime" in "supermaximum prisons".

It told the United States to report back in a year.

"The report obviously is extremely critical of U.S. policies and appropriately so," Jennifer Daskal, U.S. advocacy director of the New York-based Human Rights Watch, told Reuters.

"We hope that the United States will take heed of this report and really begin to rethink and change its policies on a number of practices, including secret prisons, lack of accountability for abuse, and transfer of prisoners to places where they may be tortured," she said.

Feldman: Guantanamo Detainees May be Difficult to Try, Depending on Hamdan Ruling
Interviewer: Carin Zissis
Interviewee: Noah Feldman, Adjunct Senior Fellow
May 19, 2006

President George W. Bush, during a recent interview with the German ARD television network, said he "would like to end Guantanamo." But, he said, closing the facility depends on the Supreme Court's upcoming ruling in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which will determine whether detainees should be subject to civil or military trials. The case arose in 2004 after an indicted detainee-a Yemeni national and former driver of Osama bin Laden-Salim Ahmed Hamdan, challenged the legality of the military tribunals trying him.

CFR Adjunct Fellow Noah Feldman, author of After Jihad and a law professor at New York University, discusses the legal issues at stake in the Hamdan decision, expected in late June. He says the case will decide whether military tribunals are constitutionally sufficient and warns that if the Supreme Court rules current trial procedures inadequate, it may be difficult to try many of the nearly 500 Guantanamo detainees because "much of the evidence-all of the evidence, in some cases-is gleaned from procedures that would not be admissible in ordinary courts." As you know, Bush said on German television that he "would like to end Guantanamo," and cited a need to wait for the Supreme Court to rule on how detainee cases should be adjudicated. That ruling, for the case Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, is expected at the end of June. What is being decided in that case at this point?

Well, what's relevant to his comments is essentially the question of what kind of trial process is constitutionally required for the detainees. What the case will decide, in part, is whether the current procedures for trial are constitutionally sufficient and adequate. And if they are found to be adequate and sufficient, then I suppose, in theory, one could simply put all of the Guantanamo detainees on trial using exactly the procedures that have been used for Hamdan, which is the first of them. If, on the other hand, the court finds that these procedures are inadequate, then the Department of Defense would have to make some amendments to the way a trial is going to operate.

I suppose it's possible that if the Supreme Court were to require, for example, that the defendant detainees see evidence against them and it's some kind of secret evidence, which we treat as inadmissible, it might actually make it very difficult for them to put some of these guys on trial, because much of the evidence-all of the evidence, in some cases-is gleaned from procedures that would not be admissible in ordinary courts. So it's conceivable there could be some kind of a holding that would in some ways derail this goal of putting all these guys on trial. However, that's unlikely, because the Court also reads the newspapers, and the Court is also aware that the goal is they'd all like to get rid of Guantanamo. The Court doesn't like Guantanamo at all. So that's sort of their take on this issue.

Do you think the Court has been influenced by international pressure to close down Guantanamo? Do you think that will influence them to go for civil trials?

Well, it seems the Court is always a little more sophisticated than direct influence from abroad pushing them toward one result or another. That's just not how they, as it were, encounter the world. They're concerned to protect civil liberties, they're concerned about the reputation the United States has internationally. And part of this calculus is they know the United States looks better if it puts people on trial appropriately. But the Court would not, I don't think, be swayed by the arguments to close Guantanamo in such a way as to weaken the basic civil-liberties protections that are required in the Constitution.

Do you think Bush's comments represent that he is now recognizing this administration is beholden to the Supreme Court when it comes to Guantanamo?

Well, he has no choice on that question. I mean, when the Supreme Court ruled in the Rasul [v. Bush] and Hamdi [v. Rumsfeld] cases, the administration did not take the position that it was not bound by the Supreme Court judgments. The administration complied with the Court's rulings. So, if Bush has acknowledged at every stage after those opinions that he is bound by what the Supreme Court says, he would have taken what he called the nuclear option, where he said "I don't care what the Supreme Court says; I can do what I want." The Court held that Guantanamo is, for purpose of the habeas corpus statute, part of the United States, so therefore that the habeas corpus right applied. That was the core of the Court's holding in Rasul and Hamdi. So he acknowledges that he's got to do what the Court tells him, but I don't know if "beholden" is the word that I would use because the Court said in those cases, to the [Bush] administration, "Go back and figure out some way to give these guys a trial, and then we will be deferential to the way you design those trials." Now the question in Hamdan is how deferential.

Can you distinguish what the difference will be between civil trials and military tribunals? What would military trials be like?

The biggest difference is that it's who they're in front of. [Tribunals] are in front of military officers, and the rules of evidence are quite different. There are kinds of secret evidence that would be allowed here, to which the defendants are not necessarily entitled. That's the biggest example of the difference between the two. There are lawyers in both, obviously, and the opportunity to present a case in both. And, in theory, the opportunity to refute what a prosecutor says, but in an ordinary trial you get to confront the witnesses against you, and that's not been the case.

These are the first military tribunals the United States has called since World War II. What are the legal ramifications of that?

The Court has definitely taken the view that military tribunals are permissible, so that's significant. But you could imagine the Court saying that such tribunals are unconstitutional--they have not done so. The suggestion is that in the future, these military tribunals may be used again, subject to certain requirements.

The majority of detainees are termed "enemy combatants." The Justice Department has said the president had the power to permit the Pentagon to hold the detainees indefinitely. What's the significance of holding these men without judicial review?

That's not exactly correct, because under the Supreme Court's holdings in Hamdi and Rasul [both Guantanamo-related cases in which the Court said enemy combatants could challenge U.S. detainment], the men were entitled by law to a certain amount of review. And even though Congress can definitely change that law, the Court left open the possibility that under the Constitution itself, it would be impermissible to hold them indefinitely without any form of judicial review. So, now, the Court hasn't said-they didn't have to-that under the law they had to give them some opportunity for judicial proceedings. But the Court did imply that. So we're not quite there yet, but we're moving in the direction of a legal principle to the effect that the United States can't, under its own Constitution, hold people forever.

But, to the extent that there has been talk of this, it's obviously quite troublesome from the standpoint of basic rule-of-law ideals, because the single most basic right that exists in any of the systems is the right to some form of government judicial review of your detention. Without that, it's hard to say that you're living under the rule of law. The government could take you away, never have to answer to any judicial body about why, and then it'd be very hard to say you were living under the rule of law. That's the single, irrefutable component most important in a legal rule of order.

President Bush says, essentially, he would like to "end Guantanamo" but that he's waiting for this decision from the Court. Do you think that this decision is in some way connected to the closing of Guantanamo? Is the closing of Guantanamo predicated upon this decision?

They can't close Guantanamo unless they know what they're going to do with the people in it. If they want to put them on trial, they need some principles for putting them on trial. So, in that sense, they're closely connected. But the president could, if he wanted to, close Guantanamo tomorrow. He'd just have to do something with the people there.

Are there certain issues that are, in terms of international law, related to the Hamdan case that you see as essential in some sort of ruling?

In the background of the Hamdan case is the question of whether we're complying with the Geneva Convention with respect to these detainees. The Court hasn't said, in its previous opinions, that the Convention with respect to these detainees. The Court hasn't said, in its previous opinions, that the Geneva Convention was the only measure, but some of the justices strongly said in this and other cases that there was an obligation under the Geneva Convention to provide some form of a hearing. I think it's quite reasonable to take the view that the Supreme Court's opinion here will be directly relevant to future constructions of the Geneva Convention, and I expect that the opinion won't turn on the Geneva Convention but it will certainly mention it, I would guess.

The United Kingdom's Attorney General Lord Peter Goldsmith recommended that Guantanamo should be closed and the United States said "no." What does it mean when a person in a prominent legal position from one of our close allies makes a comment like that?
It's a way of one of our close allies telling us that they want to distance themselves from this danger. They see it as publicly harmful, and they see a continuation [of Guantanamo] as problematic with their own political statements. This is an ally who stuck with us through thick and thin. It's been backing us on WMD, backing us on the Iraq war. Maybe it's the best ally we've got, especially in terms of security issues, by a huge margin. And they're saying even they draw the line there. Legally, I think what's significant about it is that, at the margins, the justices are aware of what the rest of the world thinks and they want to look respectable in the eyes of the rest of the world. And it doesn't directly determine their outcomes, but they care about it on some level. And here I think that goes to the question of how we have a state that operates under the law; and if we don't, and if Guantanamo is a blow to that. That is definitely relevant to their thinking, undoubtedly.

Judge dismisses rendition lawsuit against CIA

Private interests must give way to national security, federal judge says The Associated Press
Updated: 8:47 p.m. ET May 18, 2006
ROCKVILLE, Md. - A federal judge dismissed a lawsuit by a German man who said he was illegally detained and tortured in overseas prisons run by the CIA, ruling that a lawsuit would improperly expose state secrets.
Thursday's ruling by U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III makes no determination on the validity of the claims by Khaled al-Masri, who said he was kidnapped on New Year's Eve 2003 and detained for nearly five months before finally being dumped on an abandoned road in Albania.
The ruling hands a victory to the Bush administration, which intervened in the civil lawsuit to prevent exposure of its tactics in the war on terrorism.
During his detention, al-Masri said he was beaten and sodomized with a foreign object by his captors. He also alleges that a CIA team forced him to wear a diaper and drugged him before a flight to an Afghan prison and refused to contact German authorities about his arrest.
Ellis said he was satisfied after receiving a secret written briefing from the director of central intelligence that allowing al-Masri's lawsuit to proceed would harm national security.
"In the present circumstances, al-Masri's private interests must give way to the national interest in preserving state secrets," Ellis wrote.
Al-Masri's lawsuit named former CIA Director George Tenet and three private companies that allegedly helped transport al-Masri from country to country.
The lawsuit says al-Masri was initially held for almost a month in Macedonia before being taken to a secret CIA prison in Kabul, Afghanistan, known as "the salt pit." Suit alleges mistaken identity Al-Masri said the CIA knew shortly after his arrival in Kabul that he was a victim of mistaken identity. He further alleges that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice knew by early May 2004 that al-Masri was mistakenly detained but that he was still not released until May 28.
Ben Wizner, a staff attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union, which is representing al-Masri, said he expects to file an appeal.
"We expect we will continue this fight in the courts," Wizner said.
He said it is absurd to think al-Masri's lawsuit would expose state secrets because many of the details of al-Masri's detention have been made public and confirmed by government sources in newspaper reports.

"There isn't really any dispute about what happened," Wizner said.

'Blank check' for the CIA?

Judge Ellis' ruling "confers a blank check on the CIA to shield even the most outrageous conduct from judicial review," Wizner said.

Ellis did not describe what information he received that convinced him a lawsuit would expose state secrets and harm national security.

But he said he received a briefing labeled "JUDGE'S EYES ONLY" and that "it is enough to note here that al-Masri's publicly available complaint alleges a clandestine intelligence program." Ellis added that "any admission or denial of these allegations by defendants in this case would reveal the means and methods employed pursuant to this clandestine program and such a revelation would present a grave risk of injury to national security." Ellis, at the end of his ruling, writes that "putting aside all the legal issues, if al-Masri's allegations are true or substantially true, then all fair-minded people ... must also agree that al-Masri has suffered injuries as the result of our country's mistake and deserves a remedy." But Ellis said that remedy must come from Congress or the executive branch, not the judiciary.

Wizner said the Bush administration has not yet offered any financial settlement.

A Justice Department spokesman said the judge's ruling is under review and declined comment.

Reporter Contempt Case May Soon Be Resolved

By ADAM LIPTAK

The Supreme Court yesterday put off deciding whether to hear an appeal from four reporters who have been held in contempt of court for refusing to disclose confidential sources. The justices' move was apparently prompted by a letter saying the underlying case might soon be settled.

A lawyer for the plaintiff, Wen Ho Lee, wrote to the court last week to say that "resolution of the entire case may be imminent." Dr. Lee, an atomic scientist, is suing the government, saying it violated his privacy by telling reporters about his employment history, finances, travels and polygraph tests.

He has not sued the reporters: James Risen of The New York Times, H. Josef Hebert of The Associated Press, Robert Drogin of The Los Angeles Times and Pierre Thomas, formerly of CNN, now of ABC.

But Dr. Lee did subpoena those reporters, saying he could not prove his case against the government without their testimony. They refused and, in August 2004, were ordered to pay fines of $500 a day. The fines have been suspended during their appeals.

A fifth reporter, Walter Pincus of The Washington Post, was also held in contempt in the case, in November, but his appeal to the federal appeals court in Washington is pending.

Court documents suggest that at least some of the news organizations may be considering contributing to a settlement. In October, Judge Rosemary M. Collyer of the Federal District Court in Washington ordered the parties to the case, Dr. Lee and the government, to engage in mediation to consider a settlement. That is a common directive by a judge to the parties in a civil case.

But Judge Collyer also wrote that lawyers for some of the reporters would be present at the settlement discussions. Inviting lawyers for witnesses to a mediation is quite unusual. Indeed, Judge Collyer wrote that the government had initially objected to attending a mediation "with plaintiff and counsel for the news reporters," although by September, she said, Dr. Lee and lawyers for the reporters had had "one or more private mediation sessions" with the mediator, Andrew Marks.

She added that one reporter, Mr. Pincus, "is not interested in participating in mediation sessions at this time."

Kevin T. Baine, a lawyer for Mr. Pincus at Williams & Connolly in Washington, said Mr. Pincus had ultimately decided to participate in the mediation. Mr. Baine added: "At some point if there is a settlement it will be clear what the settlement was. Obviously, it's very much in the interests of the reporters to have this matter resolved."

Lawyers for the government and Dr. Lee did not respond to requests for comment. Lawyers for Mr. Risen, Mr. Drogin and Mr. Hebert would not comment, citing court rules concerning the confidentiality of mediations. Charles D. Tobin, a lawyer with Holland & Knight in Washington who represents Mr. Thomas, said only that he was hopeful Dr. Lee and the government would resolve the case.

Federal Law Negates D.C.'s Suit Against Gunmakers, Judge Rules

By Henri E. Cauvin
Washington Post Staff Writer

A lawsuit in the District against gunmakers was dismissed yesterday by a D.C. Superior Court judge who ruled that the suit was precisely the sort of claim that a new federal law was intended to block.

In a 37-page opinion, Judge Brook Hedge wrote that the city and the federal government had two competing policies, and only one could prevail.

The D.C. Council, she wrote, had determined that assault weapons have "little or no social benefit but at the same time pernicious consequences for the health and safety of District residents and visitors." Congress, however, "has trumped local law by passing legislation to protect the profits of such manufacturers," she wrote.

The suit, filed by the city and by victims of gun violence and their families, aimed to hold gun manufacturers liable for the flow of firearms into the District and for the carnage created by the sale of illegal weapons.

Under D.C. law, only law enforcement officers are authorized to carry firearms in the District. But gun violence is a chronic problem in the city, nourished by a steady supply of weapons from Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina and other states with more relaxed gun laws.

District of Columbia v. Beretta U.S.A. Corp ., filed in 2000, was an attempt to address the situation. The plaintiffs faced formidable challenges in the courts and on Capitol Hill, and an act of Congress last year appears to have sealed the fate of the lawsuit and others like it.

The Protection of Lawful Commerce in Arms Act, signed by President Bush in October after winning easy House and Senate approval, enacted broad liability protections for the country's gun industry.

Gun-control advocates blame gunmakers for loose distribution systems that have allowed criminals easy access to assault weapons. Local governments have sued to force changes in the way guns are sold and repayment for police work and medical costs associated with treating victims, particularly those shot by high-powered weapons.

Gunmakers and trade groups say the industry has been made a scapegoat for lax law enforcement and the actions of criminals.

The suit filed by the District and gun violence victims was among the most aggressive of many such suits filed across the country. As with many of those suits, it claimed that the manufacturers create a public nuisance with their products and were conducting business with little regard for the risks their products created.

But the D.C. suit went a step further, arguing that under a 1990 District law, the manufacturer, dealer or importer of an assault weapon or machine gun can be held liable for damages arising from an injury or death that results from the discharge of a firearm in the District.

In 2002, D.C. Superior Court Judge Cheryl M. Long threw out the lawsuit, rejecting the nuisance and negligence claims and concluding that a 1990 statute, the Assault Weapon Manufacturing Strict Liability Act, was unconstitutional.

In 2004, a three-judge panel of the D.C. Court of Appeals upheld much of Long's ruling but said the city could sue under the strict liability statute. In April 2005, the full Court of Appeals upheld that ruling, sending the case back to Superior Court.

After the new liability protections for the gun industry were enacted in 2005, manufacturers petitioned Superior Court to dismiss the suit. The plaintiffs countered that their suit met an exception in the new federal law and that the law was unconstitutional in any event.

Hedge rejected those legal arguments.

"The Court is faced with a classic tension between two elected branches of different governments, two equally clear legislative judgments, but each enforcing opposite policies," Hedge wrote.

"At bottom," she said, the federal law was enacted "to prohibit the very types of lawsuits the Strict Liability Act allows."

And unless she was persuaded that the federal law was unconstitutional -- which she was not -- the federal law would prevail, she wrote.

The D.C. attorney general's office and Wilmer Hale, the firm that is the lead counsel for the plaintiffs, said yesterday that they are weighing whether to appeal the ruling to the D.C. Court of Appeals.

Studs Terkel joins suit against AT&T: ACLU wants an end to sharing of phone records with feds

Eric Herman ; The Chicago Sun-Times

Furious about an alleged secret deal to share Americans' phone records with the U.S. government, six prominent Chicagoans and the American Civil Liberties Union of Illinois slapped AT&T with a lawsuit Monday to bring the sharing to a halt.

The plaintiffs -- including author Studs Terkel -- claim AT&T gives the NSA "sensitive information about massive numbers of domestic phone calls." The federal lawsuit seeks an injunction barring the practice and a ruling that the sharing is illegal.

"This is the kind of insidious, coercive relationship we've seen before in our history," said ACLU\l "l" legal director Harvey Grossman. "These are ominous times."

President Bush acknowledged last year authorizing the NSA to eavesdrop -- without getting a warrant -- on phone calls and Internet traffic of people suspected of terrorist links in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks. Earlier this month, USA Today reported AT&T, Verizon and BellSouth were helping the NSA compile a database of tens of millions of calls placed by U.S. citizens and residents with no links to terrorism.

The records shared include "who is calling whom and for how long," according to the ACLU's\l "l" lawsuit.

RABBI, PROFESSOR ALSO PART OF SUIT\l "l"

In a statement, AT&T said it "does not allow wiretapping or give customer information to law enforcement authorities or government agencies without legal authorization."

But according to the ACLU's\l "l" Grossman, AT&T could be acting on advice from its lawyers that an NSA request amounted to "legal authorization." Even if that is true, he said, a judge should review such a sharing of information to determine its legality.

Absent judicial approval, sharing caller information violates the Electronic Communications Privacy Act of 1986, the lawsuit alleges.

The plaintiffs also include Illinois House majority leader Barbara Flynn Currie (D-Chicago), Rabbi Gary Gerson of Oak Park Temple, Loyola University law professor Diane Geraghty, former Chicago corporation counsel James Montgomery, and former American Public Health Association president Dr. Quinten Young.

Montgomery said giving the NSA access to private phone records could have a "chilling effect" on clients' ability to talk with their lawyers, while Young said it could have the same effect on communications between doctors and patients.

'TOADIES'

Terkel, 94, derided AT&T brass as "toadies."

"Anything the corporate boys do these days does not astonish me," Terkel said.

Terkel also chided the Bush administration for invading Americans' privacy.

"Somehow, idiocy is part of the administration's work. Along with that is an arrogance and a vulgarity that is unprecedented," he said.

In January, the Electronic Frontier Foundation sued AT&T, alleging the company monitored customers' phone and Internet traffic. In recent days, suits\l "l" have been filed in New York and Texas aimed at stopping the sharing of phone records with the NSA. Some of the suits\l "l" seek hundreds of millions in damages. The ACLU\l "l" suit\l "l", however, seeks no monetary damages, Grossman said. It seeks class-action status on behalf of all AT&T customers in Illinois.

AT&T has 48.8 million U.S. customers, said spokesman Michael Coe. It merged with SBC -- making it the nation's largest phone company - - and kept the AT&T name.

BellSouth and Verizon denied giving the NSA customers' personal call information. Another phone company, Qwest, said it rejected the NSA's request.

Questions for the Record
Attorney General Alberto Gonzales

QUESTIONS FROM CHAIRMAN SENSENBRENNER

1. If Congress had not passed the Authorization for the Use Military Force on September 18, 2001, do you still think you would have the authority to carry out the Terrorism Surveillance Program?

   ANSWER: The terrorist surveillance program described by the President targets for interception communications where at least one party is outside the United States and there is probable cause ("reasonable grounds") to believe that at least one party to the communication is a member or agent of al Qaeda or an affiliated terrorist organization (hereinafter, the "Terrorist Surveillance Program"). As the Department has explained, the September 18, 2001 Authorization for Use of Military Force (hereinafter "Force Resolution") provides statutory authorization for the Terrorist Surveillance Program. The Force Resolution is framed in broad and powerful terms, and a majority of the Justices of the Supreme Court concluded in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld that the Force Resolution authorizes the "fundamental and accepted" incidents of the use of military force. As set forth at length in the Department's paper of January 19, 2006, signals intelligence is a fundamental and accepted incident of the use of military force. Moreover, when it enacted the Force Resolution, Congress was legislating in light of the fact that past Presidents (including Woodrow Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt) had interpreted similarly broad resolutions to authorize much broader warrantless interception of international communications.

   Even if there were some ambiguity regarding whether FISA and the Force Resolution may be read in harmony to allow the President to authorize the Terrorist Surveillance Program, the President's inherent powers as Commander in Chief and as chief representative of the Nation in foreign affairs to undertake electronic surveillance against the declared enemy of the United States during an armed conflict would require resolving such ambiguity in favor of the President's authority. Under the canon of constitutional avoidance, courts generally interpret statutes to avoid serious constitutional questions where "fairly possible." INS v. St. Cyr, 533 U.S. 289, 299-300 (2001) (citations omitted); Ashwander v. TVA, 297 U.S. 288, 345-48 (1936) (Brandeis, J., concurring). The canon of constitutional avoidance has particular importance in the realm of national security, where the President's constitutional authority is at its highest. See Department of the Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518, 527, 530 (1988); William N. Eskridge, Jr., Dynamic Statutory Interpretation 325 (1994) (describing "[s]uper-strong rule against congressional interference with the President's authority over foreign affairs and national security"). Thus, we need not confront the question whether the President's inherent powers in this area would authorize conduct otherwise prohibited by statute.

Even if the Force Resolution were determined not to provide the legal authority for the Program, it is the view of the Department of Justice, consistent with positions taken historically by both Democratic and Republican administrations, that the President's inherent authority to authorize foreign-intelligence surveillance would permit him to authorize the Terrorist Surveillance Program. President Carter's Attorney General, Griffin Bell, testified at a hearing on FISA as follows: "[T]he current bill recognizes no inherent power of the President to conduct electronic surveillance, and I want to interpolate here to say that this does not take away the power of the President under the Constitution." Hearing Before the Subcomm. on Legislation of the House Permanent Select Comm. on Intelligence (Jan. 10, 1978) (emphasis added). Thus, in saying that President Carter agreed to follow the procedures of FISA, Attorney General Bell made clear that FISA could not take away the President's Article II authority. More recently, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court of Review, the specialized court of appeals that Congress established to review the decisions of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court, recognized that the President has inherent constitutional authority to gather foreign intelligence that cannot be intruded upon by Congress. The court explained that all courts to have addressed the issue of the President's inherent authority have "held that the President did have inherent authority to conduct warrantless searches to obtain foreign intelligence information." In re Sealed Case, 310 F.3d 717, 742 (2002). On the basis of that unbroken line of precedent, the court "[took] for granted that the President does have that authority," and concluded that, assuming that is so, "FISA could not encroach on the President's constitutional power." Id. (emphasis added).

2. How is the standard for monitoring targets under the NSA Terrorist Surveillance Program different from the probable cause standard in FISA?

ANSWER: Both the Terrorist Surveillance Program and FISA use a probable cause standard. FISA requires a showing that there is "probable cause to believe" that the target of the surveillance is an agent of a foreign power. See 50 U.S.C. § 1805(a)(3). The Terrorist Surveillance Program requires a determination that there is probable cause (that is, "reasonable grounds to believe," cf. Maryland v. Pringle, 540 U.S. 366, 371 (2003)) that one of the parties to the communication is a member or agent of al Qaeda or a related terrorist organization. Although the standards they use are similar, there are important differences between the Terrorist Surveillance Program and monitoring under an order issued by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court (FISC) or under FISA's so-called emergency authorization provision. FISA prescribes a detailed application process before the Justice Department may secure an order from the FISC authorizing the monitoring of communications. Even under the emergency authorization provisions, the Attorney General must "reasonably determine[]" that "the factual basis for issuance of" a FISA order exists at the time he approves an emergency authorization. See 50 U.S.C. § 1805(f)(2). Because there is a risk that the FISC could order disclosure of the interception if the Attorney General authorizes monitoring under this provision and the FISC later declines to authorize continued monitoring, see id. § 1806(j), to minimize the risks of that course, as a practical matter, it is necessary for NSA intelligence officers, NSA lawyers, Justice Department lawyers, and the Attorney General to review a matter before even emergency surveillance begins. FISA also limits the use of intelligence obtained under an emergency authorization if the FISC does not issue an order approving the surveillance within 72 hours. In contrast, under the Terrorist Surveillance Program, professional intelligence officers, who are experts on al Qaeda and its tactics (including its use of communications systems), with appropriate and rigorous oversight, make the decisions about which international communications should be intercepted. Compared with FISA, therefore, the Terrorist Surveillance Program requires fewer layers of review before surveillance may begin. That is appropriate in the narrow context of an early warning system employed during a time of armed conflict to prevent a terrorist attack that could result in hundreds or thousands of civilian deaths. Accordingly, the principal distinction between the two methods is not the burden of proof that the Government must carry before commencing surveillance, but instead the greater speed and agility that the Terrorist Surveillance Program offers, because under it, professional intelligence officers in the first instance make decisions about when monitoring should begin.

3. Let us assume that the President has the inherent authority to establish the Terrorism Surveillance Program, as courts have concluded and the Administration argues.
   a. Does the President's inherent authority prevent Congress from authorizing such a program?

   b. Is that inherent authority exclusive?

   c. Does the inherent authority restrict what Congress can do?

   d. If the President has such constitutional authority, why is FISA, which controls the Administrations surveillance, not unconstitutional?

ANSWER: As discussed in the Department's January 19, 2006 paper, the President's authority under Article II to gather foreign intelligence through electronic surveillance—particularly where surveillance is directed at the enemy during wartime—is amply supported by both historical and legal precedent. The Department has never suggested, however, that this inherent presidential authority entirely precludes Congress from enacting legislation to regulate the process by which foreign intelligence gathering occurs. Nor would the Constitution bar Congress from expressly approving or endorsing the Terrorist Surveillance Program. Whether Congress has constitutional authority to discontinue the Program or significantly restrict its scope—by, for example, requiring judicial approval for all electronic surveillance against al Qaeda and affiliated terrorist organizations—is a more difficult question. While the constitutional division of responsibility in this area between Congress and the President cannot be precisely defined, certain propositions are well established. As explained in the January 19th paper, it is clear that there are constitutional limits on Congress's authority to restrict the means by which the President, as Commander in Chief, may engage the enemy during armed conflicts. Legal Authorities Supporting the Activities of the National Security Agency Described by the President 31-32 (Jan. 19, 2006). And because gathering intelligence about the enemy in order to learn its plans and capabilities is an integral part of any military engagement, longstanding separation-of-powers principles impose limits on Congress's power to prohibit or restrict the President's use of wartime signals intelligence. Id. at 30-31. While there are also limits on Congress's ability to regulate the President's collection of foreign intelligence information, which is at the core of executive functions, see id. at 30, there is plainly a stronger case for congressional regulation of electronic surveillance unconnected to the waging of armed conflict, where the President's authority is at its zenith. Because FISA was enacted during peacetime and addresses peacetime surveillance, its regulation of foreign intelligence gathering powers raises distinct questions from those presented if FISA were read to restrict the authority to conduct the Terrorist Surveillance Program.

4. At a February 6, 2006 hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, you stated in a response to Senator DeWine that "It still takes too long, in my judgment, to get FISAs approved." Do you still agree that the FISA process needs streamlining and improving? Will improving the FISA process alleviate the need for the Terrorist Surveillance Program?

   ANSWER: For the reasons explained in the Department's January 19th paper, the Terrorist Surveillance Program is lawful and fully consistent with FISA, and the Administration therefore believes that it is unnecessary to amend FISA to accommodate the Program. However, FISA can undoubtedly be improved, and the Administration will, of course, work with Congress and evaluate any proposals for improving FISA.

5. At the February Senate Judiciary Committee hearing you (also) stated that you expect the process to be streamlined by the creation of the National Security Division within the Department of Justice. Could you explain how you expect this Division to streamline the process and when you expect to see improvement?

   ANSWER: The National Security Division (NSD) will bring the Department's three primary national security elements, the Office of Intelligence Policy and Review (OIPR), the Counterterrorism Section and the Counterespionage Section into a new division, under the leadership of the Assistant Attorney General for the NSD (AAG). OIPR is responsible for the preparation of all applications for orders to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. The AAG will be responsible for overseeing the day-to-day operations of the Department's national security infrastructure and coordinating the variety of national security matters that arise within the Department each day. This re-organization should result in additional management support for all our national security operations. The Department is always exploring ways in which it can manage its national security work more efficiently and the new AAG will bring a fresh perspective to this task. The AAG will have the opportunity to examine the approval process for all our national security work, including the process by which FISA applications are reviewed and approved, and identify any points of unnecessary friction. In addition, the NSD structure will more closely align the Department's national security elements with the Intelligence Community, and this may lead to greater efficiencies in the Department's operations related to the Intelligence Community. The Department has no timeline for improvements that may flow from the commencement of NSD operations.

6. The Department had previously advised this Committee that the FBI and the Department were taking additional steps to improve the efficiency of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) process. One of these steps was the creation of a FISA unit in November 2002, at FBI Headquarters that was charged with instituting an automated tracking system that would electronically connect the field divisions, FBI Headquarters, the FBI's National Security Law Unit, and the Office of Intelligence Policy Review (OIPR).

   a. What is the status of this automated tracking system?

ANSWER: Since the last report to the Committee, improvement of the automated tracking system, called the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act Management System (FISAMS), has continued. FISAMS has been operating on the FBI's secret network (FBINET) since January 2004, with phased implementation leading to mandatory use by all field offices beginning in November 2004. FISAMS on FBINET currently has over 5,000 registered users.

In April 2006, the FBI and DOJ's Office of Intelligence Policy and Review (OIPR) initiated the automated interface between FISAMS and OIPR's system (Oasis), permitting the transmission of FISA requests and draft and final FISA packages from FISAMS to Oasis. Although previously these documents had to be moved manually between the two systems (generally by printing the documents from one system and then scanning them into the other system), OIPR attorneys can now draft FISA packages and enter them into Oasis at OIPR, automatically transferring them over a network interface to FISAMS. Once in FISAMS, these packages are immediately available for verification review by the declarant at FBI Headquarters (FBIHQ) and by the FBI case agent. Also in April 2006, the FBI "stood up" FISAMS on the FBI's internal Sensitive Compartmented Information (SCI) Operational Network and initiated an automated interface with Oasis' Top Secret system, permitting the electronic exchange of Top Secret and SCI information.

FISAMS has also implemented a number of features to allow users and managers at all FBI levels to better manage the FISA process. These include automated email notifications of pending work and approaching renewal deadlines, as well as various tools to help managers prepare and use activity reports.

b. What are the other duties of the FISA unit?

ANSWER: The FISA Unit provides administrative support for the FISA process, including FISA processing and tracking. In addition, the FISA Unit compiles the FISA packages that are provided to the FBI Director for signature, and it is responsible for transporting signed packages to OIPR before they are taken by OIPR to be signed by the Attorney General or Deputy Attorney General, and then presented to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court (FISC). The FISA Unit also distributes all FISC orders and warrants to the appropriate field divisions for their use and for service on telecommunication carriers, Internet service providers, or other specified entities.

c. Has operational efficiency improved since the Unit was created?

ANSWER: Yes. The FBI's FISA Unit, DOJ's OIPR, and the FISC have all taken steps to improve the efficiency of the FISA process.

The FBI's FISA Unit now scans primary and secondary orders and warrants upon receipt and e-mails these files to Field Office case agents and to those responsible for serving them on carriers, service providers, and other specified persons. While raised seals are required or orders and warrants establishing initial coverage, the FBI has found that most carriers and service providers will accept a printed copy of the signed, scanned document to renew coverage on an existing target. Consequently, although the FBI previously printed and distributed "hard" copies of orders, warrants, and other communications (a process that often took up to two weeks), the FBI now uses scanned, signed copies when possible, subsequently providing documents with raised seals as follow-up.

At the direction of the FISC's Presiding Judge, the Clerk of the Court changed the post-court processing of dockets. Although previously it often took a week or more to return a docket to OIPR, the Clerk of the Court now directs the return of signed dockets to OIPR by the end of the business day after approval.

When taken together, these changes have resulted in the provision of a serviceable copy of a signed order to a carrier or service provider in two or three days rather than in two or three weeks.

d. What other steps have been implemented to achieve optimum efficiency in the FISA application process?

ANSWER: Effective 3/1/03, FBI Field Offices began using a standard "FISA Request Form" to request the initiation, renewal, or modification of FISA coverage. This single, standard form replaced a variety of communications used in the past to request coverage. The form helps ensure that those who draft FISA packages have all pertinent information and that no time is wasted in preparing unnecessary documentation, facilitating quicker preparation of these packages. On 3/1/03, FBI Field Offices also began submitting requests to renew and amend existing FISAs directly to OIPR (previously, all requests to renew or amend existing FISAs were submitted to FBIHQ for approval before being forwarded to OIPR for drafting). This measure also resulted in time savings and the improved efficiency of the process.

In another measure to improve FISA accuracy and efficiency, the Executive Assistant Director of the FBI's National Security Branch issued a communication, dated January 24, 2006, reiterating the importance of accuracy in the FISA process, followed by a directive, dated February 2, 2006, requiring case agents to open and maintain FISA-subfiles containing written substantiation for each factual assertion contained in the FISA declaration. On February 2, 2006, the FBI instituted a FISA Renewal Review Board (consisting of managers from OIPR, FBI, and the Criminal Division-Counterrorism Section) to evaluate FISA renewal requests at regular intervals and to terminate non-productive FISAs, facilitating the more efficient use of limited resources.

7. In Assistant Attorney General Moschella's February 28, 2006 letter responding to a letter from the Committee requesting the status of the Department's HAVA enforcement, he described efforts by the Department of Justice to reach out to all of the chief elections officials in January 2006 to inquire about the status of compliance.

   a. What were the results of that the survey?

   ANSWER: As set forth in more detail below, information which we received from the states in response to our January 2006 letter to chief state elections officials, combined with information which we had been gathering since early 2004, indicates that the status of states' compliance with HAVA is constantly changing and will continue to do so as states approach the time for primary elections and the general election for federal office in 2006.

   b. Have you heard back from all 50 State elections officials?

   ANSWER: As of this date, we have received full or partial responses from all states and are continuing to follow up as appropriate to gather all information necessary for determining the changing status of each state's HAVA compliance.

   c. How many States are in compliance?

   ANSWER: The status of HAVA compliance by states is in a constant state of flux and has been so since well before the HAVA deadline of January 1, 2006, for voting systems and statewide voter registration systems. While there are many states that in our view are at least in partial compliance with HAVA, a significant number of states at this point are not in full compliance with the voting systems and voter registration list mandates. It has been the case that several states that appeared to be in, or well on their way toward, full compliance with HAVA have suffered recent setbacks in their efforts to comply. In many cases, these setbacks have been the result of problems with private vendors that have been unable to deliver on contract promises and/or unexpected and extensive technological glitches that have arisen as setup of voting systems and voter registration systems has approached finalization. In such cases, jurisdictions continue to struggle to put all systems into operation in time for upcoming federal elections.

d. Near compliance?

ANSWER: See answer to 7c, above.

e. What are the barriers preventing full compliance?

ANSWER: For the most part, states have taken their HAVA obligations seriously and have made and are making great efforts to achieve compliance pursuant to HAVA's schedule. Some, however, were much less diligent during the first couple of years after passage of HAVA to initiate compliance efforts. Due to HAVA's very rapid deadlines for compliance on the voter registration database and voting systems requirements, failure of jurisdictions to begin planning and implementation on an expedited basis after HAVA's passage is the most prevalent reason for the current failures in full compliance. Most recently, in the area of voting systems compliance, some problems have arisen across the country due to an apparent inability on the part of some voting systems vendors to deliver in full, or in some cases even in part, on voting systems orders placed by some states. It appears that this has only occurred when orders have been placed in the past six months or so, and are due to the exceedingly high number of jurisdictions that delayed until late to determine what to order. Because the vendors could not anticipate the likely demand for their particular brand of voting equipment, and because the vendors have been in serious financial challenges over the past few years as a result of uncertainty of what would be required after the 2000 presidential election, the vendors have apparently had trouble getting manufacturer cooperation in ramping up production to meet the very late demand. In some cases it also appears that there may have been some misunderstandings or miscommunications between jurisdictions and vendors about availability and certification of systems jurisdictions were contracting to purchase. In some cases, states have had to try alternative means of securing voting equipment for local jurisdictions, if at all possible. In addition, some states that have switched to new voting equipment have experienced technological problems in the rollout of new equipment, which has exacerbated the states' efforts at full HAVA compliance in time for the 2006 federal elections. With regard to statewide voter registration systems, while most states are in compliance with this HAVA requirement, a number of states have also encountered vendor and/or technological problems in developing and implementing the systems. Several states have experienced alleged breach of contract by registration system vendors at a late stage of system development, requiring substantial delay in implementation, or in some cases a need to begin system development all over again. As indicated above, where states have been dilatory in entering into an agreement with SSA for registrant verification purposes, the Department has put such states on notice of their obligations and will consider enforcement action as appropriate.

f. Will these States be in full compliance in time for the first scheduled election?

ANSWER: States experiencing difficulties at this late date with regard to HAVA compliance are continuing to make efforts to resolve problems and secure compliance to the greatest extent possible by the time of their upcoming federal elections. As indicated above, this process is a fluid one, and the Department is in continuous contact with states to determine compliance status, discuss possible resolution of HAVA issues and give assistance as appropriate.

g. Why did you wait until after the January 1, 2006 deadline to seek information about compliance?

ANSWER: The Department's actions to determine the status of the states' compliance with HAVA began long before January 2006. Since HAVA's enactment in late 2003, the Civil Rights Division has closely monitored the constantly evolving actions of each of the states and territories to comply with HAVA's mandates. First, beginning in early 2004, the Voting Section of the Division began gathering information from a variety of sources concerning states' HAVA activities, including those to develop and implement statewide voter registration lists and to ensure that voting systems for use in federal elections in 2006 meet the Act's voting system standards. In August 2005, we sent a letter to the chief election official of each state and territory, requesting detailed information concerning each state's actions to comply with the voting system and registration list requirements. We followed up on the responses we received to these letters to gather further information, or to engage in discussions with states over specific compliance issues. In October 2005, we sent letters to each state and territory inquiring about the states' actions to enter into an agreement with the Social Security Administration (SSA), as required by HAVA, for purposes of verifying the identification of new applicants for voter registration. In January 2006, we sent letters to all state chief elections officials, requesting further information concerning compliance with HAVA's voting systems and voter registration list requirements. In March 2006, we sent letters to certain states requesting updates concerning the HAVA-required state agreements with the SSA.

Attorneys from the Voting Section also have made numerous on-site visits to states to gather information about HAVA compliance activities, in some instances observing the operation of voter registration systems completed or under development. We have also taken formal enforcement action under HAVA. In October 2005, following months of meetings and negotiations, the Division reached agreement with the State of California on a Memorandum of Agreement concerning development and implementation of their new statewide voter registration database system. On March 1, 2006, we filed suit against the state of New York based on allegations of non-compliance with HAVA's voting systems and voter registration list requirements. On March 23, 2006, a federal court in New York found the New York State Board of Elections in non-compliance with HAVA, and the state has recently submitted to the court for review and approval a HAVA compliance plan. On May 1, 2006 we filed suit against the state of Alabama based on allegations of non-compliance with HAVA's voter registration list requirements. We are currently talking with other states to determine possible legal action or necessary agreements on certain aspects of HAVA compliance, and intend to continue to work with states to the extent possible to achieve maximum HAVA compliance. We will continue to make HAVA enforcement decisions, as appropriate, taking into account a variety of factors including the extent of HAVA noncompliance and the history of a state's compliance efforts.

8. Over the last few years, the Department has undertaken a strong effort to enforce the bilingual election assistance requirements in Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act (VRA). However, concerns have been raised by jurisdictions that they have limited opportunity to correct or work with the Department to correct any inadequacies in compliance before an enforcement action is filed. For example, it has been brought to our attention that the Department engages or requires the local election officials to engage in a "sur-name" analysis of registered voters to identify potential recipients of bilingual assistance.

   a. Would you describe the approach that the Department follows when working with a jurisdiction covered by Section 203 to comply with its requirements?

ANSWER: The Department follows an approach of (1) vigorous outreach and education of state and local authorities, (2) investigation, and (3) enforcement actions, where necessary and appropriate.

During this Administration the Department has significantly expanded both written notice and in-person outreach to state and local election officials to inform them fully of their obligations under Section 203, and to answer any questions they may have.

The Department formally notified by letter each jurisdiction covered under Section 203 of the Voting Rights Act upon the announcement by the Director of the Census of the Census coverage in July 2002. That notice letter was, for the first time, expanded to include extensive practical guidance on achieving compliance. In addition to our formal Guidelines, we developed a brochure that identified best practices, and Civil Rights Division attorneys traveled to newly-covered jurisdictions and met face to face with local officials and minority language community members. In these meetings they explained the requirements of the law, offered guidance, provided Census data, answered questions, and encouraged cooperation. We provided an attorney point of contact for each covered jurisdiction. The Department continued outreach through national and regional associations of election officials. For example, the Chief of the Voting Section has regularly spoken on Section 203 at conferences for election officials organized by the Texas Secretary of State. On August 31, 2004, the Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division sent an additional letter to each covered jurisdiction to remind them of their obligations under Section 203 and again offer best practices in advance of the fall elections. The letter again invited questions and provided a point of contact.

Many state and local election officials have taken advantage of this assistance, and the Department has achieved unprecedented levels of voluntary compliance during this Administration. Other officials have not, however, including some localities where the requirements have applied since the original passage of the minority language assistance provisions in 1975. The Department, having given repeated and detailed notice to each covered jurisdiction, has not hesitated to enforce the law.

In enforcing the law, and in fostering voluntary compliance, the Department has found surname data to be a very useful tool both for our investigations and for local election officials who wish to comply with the law as effectively and efficiently as possible. We allow and encourage local officials to target services to those who need them rather than wasting resources on non-citizens or persons who can, in fact, speak and read English. The Census does not make available the key Section 203 data – the number of voting age citizens who speak a particular covered language and who have limited English proficiency – at the precinct level, the level used by local election officials. The Census suppresses such localized information with that combination of detail for privacy reasons.

The most convenient tool for identifying areas of possible need for language services is the current voter registration list, which is the foundation for local election administration, and which includes those persons actually eligible to vote and eligible for the Section 203 language services. The voter registration lists do not indicate language ability, of course, so local officials must turn to other devices, such as any ethnicity data that may be on the registration record, place of birth data, or, most commonly, surname data. These data do not, of course, mean that all citizens flagged need language assistance; far from it. The presence, however, of a significant number of persons with, for example, Spanish surnames a helpful indicator that there may be a need for language assistance in that precinct. Where we find precincts with over 1,000 Spanish surnamed voters and no bilingual personnel, for example, we take that as a strong indication that the precinct contains voters with an unmet need for Spanish language services. We then investigate further by interviewing local election officials and members of the minority language community to determine whether that is, in fact, the case. Local knowledge and inquiry can quickly and efficiently identify areas where the projected need is illusory or where the need is greater than surname or other analysis suggests. Surname analysis accordingly is a useful, but not dispositive, tool for assuring that citizens are served effectively and efficiently.

b. How does the Department determine the type of assistance necessary to help language minority citizens in a jurisdiction?

ANSWER: The Department evaluates each jurisdiction individually and seeks to assist local communities to find means of compliance that are both effective and efficient. To this end we rely heavily on information from local members of minority language communities and local election officials, and we seek to identify existing channels of communication that can be used with minimal cost and maximum impact. Just as Congress recognized the need for oral assistance to serve Native American voters whose languages have historically been unwritten, we have recognized the need to tailor programs by seeking practical solutions that serve the individual and highly diverse circumstances that exist in the covered jurisdictions. We encourage local officials to use newspapers, newsletters, and other media geared to serving minority language voters. We also encourage local officials to adopt practices such as building extensive fax and e-mail addresses (for example, of voters in businesses, churches, unions, social and fraternal organizations, and service providers that serve their minority language community) and sending election information in a way that penetrates the community at essentially no cost.

c. Does the Department work with local minority organizations to determine how best to reach language minority citizens?

ANSWER: As set forth in our minority language brochure, "The cornerstone of every successful program is a vigorous outreach program to identify the needs and communication channels of the minority community." The Department contacts language minority organizations and community members in each jurisdiction we monitor. We gather key facts from them and encourage their cooperation with local election officials. The Department also is in frequent contact with national organizations on Section 203 issues. The Department regards close contact with the communities we serve as essential to effective law enforcement.

d. What does the Department do to promote cooperation between local election officials and language minority residents?

ANSWER: The Department makes every effort to encourage cooperation between local election officials and language minority residents from our first outreach to the community to our resolution of cases through enforcement actions. Indeed, the final order in each of our lawsuits specifically includes an Advisory Group open to all interested persons that provides a vehicle for ongoing cooperation and consultation.

9. In 2004 FBI Director Mueller instituted a five-year term limit for supervisors in the FBI field offices. The purpose of this change, as I understand it, was to fill vacancies in the Washington headquarters, and to provide managers with opportunities to broaden their expertise and gain an understanding of how the FBI operates as a unit. These goals are laudable, however, I understand that this plan is also having a negative effect as senior FBI agents are choosing to resign, rather than moving their families to Washington, DC, and those who do choose to relocate take with them local institutional knowledge that can't be replaced. How are you working to ensure that rigid rules do not have the unintended consequences of costing the FBI the ability to be as effective as possible?

ANSWER: The Field Office Supervisory Term Limit Policy (FOSTLP) was initially implemented in June 2004 as a way to better position the Bureau for the challenges of the future. As the FBI evolves toward a global, intelligence-driven agency focusing on terrorist organizations, hostile intelligence services, and international criminal enterprises, we must ensure that our front-line leaders develop a broad base of experience as they acquire leadership skills. The FOSTLP will promote a diversification of experiences among the supervisory ranks through a strong emphasis on continued career development.

Because the SSAs affected by this policy are among the FBI's most experienced mid-level managers, the program affords a grace period ranging from two to three years (based on tenure) during which SSAs can exercise the following available options.

- Compete for Assistant Special Agent in Charge (ASAC) positions in the field.
- Compete for Unit Chief and Assistant Section Chief positions at FBIHQ.
- Compete for Term GS-15 Team Leader positions in the Inspection Division.
- Compete for Assistant Legal Attaché or Legal Attaché positions.
- Participate in the Alternate FBIHQ Credit Plan Pilot Project, which allows accelerated opportunities to obtain FBIHQ credit and acquire eligibility to compete for ASAC positions.
- Compete for additional five-year SSA terms in positions designated as "hard to staff."
- Compete for positions in the FBIHQ Term Temporary Duty (TDY) Pilot Program, which allows SSAs to compete for GS-14 and GS-15 SSA positions at FBIHQ and obtain full FBIHQ credit upon completion of an 18-month TDY assignment.

Those SSAs who ultimately decide to remain in the current office of assignment and return to investigative duties will benefit from the FBI's Highest Previous Rate (HPR) policy, pursuant to which GS-14 SSAs returning to investigative duties will be placed in the GS-13 "step" comparable to the GS-14 salary. Only those whose pay conversions exceed a GS-13, Step 10 salary will experience a pay reduction (pay set according to HPR cannot exceed step 10).

While we understand that some SSAs are disappointed in the changes brought about by the FOSTLP and we are aware that some have publicly indicated that they do not intend to seek advancement, this stated intent is contradicted by results obtained through tracking those SSAs affected by the FOSTLP. As of 4/17/06, 77 out of 162 SSAs facing term limits in calendar year (CY) 2006 have already made career decisions, with 86% securing promotions in career-advancing positions. For those SSAs affected by the policy in CY 2007, 93 out of 255 SSAs have already made career decisions, with 85% pursuing career advancement. These career advancements have included the selections of 39 ASACs, 18 Unit Chiefs, 17 Legal Attachés or Assistant Legal Attachés, and 10 Assistant Inspectors.

10. Regarding the FBI's proposed half billion dollar Sentinel system, why have you endorsed the FBI as the lead agency for case management systems when they are years away from having one, compared to other DOJ components that already have good case management systems?

ANSWER: The FBI's Sentinel program is the Department's largest and most complex investigative case management investment, however several other components are also developing or improving their case management systems. For example, we are about to begin developing a new litigation case management system for all the DOJ litigating components, beginning with the US Attorneys. In addition, the DEA is piloting a new investigative case management system in Baltimore. These are examples where each component has different mission needs and their systems must scale to varying levels of support. The DOJ CIO is actively involved in finding the best way to re-use approaches, documents, services and software code where applicable.

OMB has selected the Department of Justice as the lead agency for the case management line of business, and the Department's Office of the Chief Information Officer is leading this effort. The CIO is working closely with the FBI on Sentinel to help assure its success and to make sure those future case management efforts can reuse key elements of Sentinel. DOJ/FBI leadership has invited other DOJ components to play an active role within the Sentinel Program Management Office, so that they can better leverage the large investment and lessons learned from that program.

Department-level personnel are involved in the push towards inter-operability. There are many ways to define a "case" and many systems to handle information flow inter- and intra-departmentally. The key to all of this is following standards from both a policy and technical approach. The Department of Justice has taken a leadership role in developing and promoting the National Information Exchange Model (NIEM), a joint effort with the Department of Homeland Security.

In summary, while Sentinel is large and newsworthy, the Department and the components are moving ahead with other case management initiatives, while keeping an eye on Sentinel in order to spend money in a wise manner. OMB and the Department have made it very clear to project owners that systems must be inter-operable and they must leverage existing tools and processes wherever possible.

11. The FBI is notorious for system delays, cost over-runs, lost computer equipment, and now for one of the biggest system failures in government history. At present, the FBI has only identified its own needs for Sentinel's requirements and has yet to begin acquiring information about systems in other DOJ components, the Department of Homeland Security (DHS), and other intelligence community agencies. What are you doing to ensure that this most recent effort does not result in the same failure?

ANSWER: One of Sentinel's key objectives is to share information effectively with others in the law enforcement and intelligence communities. We recognize the importance of information sharing and are working to ensure Sentinel provides that capability. The FBI already shares electronic data with numerous entities in the Department of Homeland Security (DHS), DOJ, and other government agencies through the Secret Internet Protocol Router Network, INTELINK, Regional Data Exchange, Terrorist Screening Center (TSC), and the National Counterterrorism Center (NCTC) systems.

To ensure a coordinated, enterprise-wide approach, the Executive Assistant Director for the National Security Branch (EAD-NSB) serves as the FBI's principal official for information and intelligence sharing policy and as an advisor to the Director, providing policy direction regarding information and intelligence sharing within the FBI, between the FBI and the law enforcement and intelligence communities, and between the FBI and foreign governments. The EAD-NSB also coordinates with the Program Manager for Information Sharing in the Office of the Director of National Intelligence (ODNI) to ensure we keep pace with emerging information sharing uses and policies.

Sentinel will be compatible with the Extensible Markup Language standards used for data tagging and marking used by DOJ and the intelligence community (these two standards will eventually merge to form the National Information Exchange Model for metadata). The Sentinel Program Management Office (PMO) includes a dedicated systems architect, who is working closely on this matter with the intelligence and law enforcement communities. The Sentinel systems architect meets regularly with DOJ's enterprise architect and is coordinating efforts with the ODNI information sharing office. Other agencies, including DHS, have been invited to participate in PMO processes and in meetings with the Sentinel contractor. Immigration and Customs Enforcement has designated five representatives from their Office of Executive Information who will coordinate and exchange requirements with Sentinel counterparts. The Sentinel Program Manager also meets regularly with the FBI's Information Sharing Policy Board and provides monthly status briefings to the Office of Management and Budget (including the OMB Case Management Line of Business, a group representing more than 20 Federal agencies), ODNI, and DOJ on the status of the national information sharing environment architecture.

When Sentinel is fully deployed, those in the FBI and elsewhere in the law enforcement and intelligence communities will be able to share information between the various information systems even if this information is maintained at different levels of security, without compromising that security.

QUESTIONS FROM REPRESENTATIVE COBLE

12. During the hearing, I asked what steps are being taken to address concerns raised by the Inspector General (IG) in a recently issued report on Port Security. You testified that your office was reviewing the report and would be developing recommendations. My greatest fear is that the next terrorist attack on our homeland will come through one of our great seaports. What actions are being taken to address the IG's concerns, when will they occur, and when can we expect another report or evaluation of security measures at our ports?

ANSWER: In its March 2006 report entitled, The Federal Bureau of Investigation's Efforts to Prevent and Respond to Maritime Terrorism, DOJ's Office of the Inspector General (OIG) made several findings and recommendations regarding the FBI's Maritime Security Program (MSP). In a 3/17/06 letter to Inspector General Fine from Mr. Willie T. Hulon, Assistant Director, Counterterrorism Division, the FBI identified the steps taken in response to each of these findings and recommendations (a copy of the letter is attached). The FBI is preparing a formal reply to the report that documents these and subsequent steps taken, and this process will be repeated every 90 days until the FBI has completed its response to all report findings and recommendations.

Many of the OIG's findings and recommendations were developed prior to the President's approval of the Maritime Operational Threat Response (MOTR) Plan in October 2005. The MOTR Plan is one of eight plans supporting the National Strategy for Maritime Security, the development of which is mandated by National Security Presidential Directive 41/Homeland Security Presidential Directive 13 (12/21/04). The MOTR Plan, which was developed under the joint leadership of the Departments of Defense and Homeland Security with DOJ and FBI participation, provides a framework for interagency communication and coordination in response to maritime threats and incidents. This framework, which uses the existing network of federal command centers, has been used to successfully resolve several incidents in the past few months and has dramatically improved the operational response to maritime threats and incidents.

The mission of the FBI's MSP, which was initiated in July 2005 (and not fully addressed in the OIG's audit, which began in May 2005), is to prevent, disrupt, and defeat criminal acts of terrorism directed against maritime assets and to provide counterterrorism preparedness leadership and assistance to Federal, state, and local agencies responsible for maritime security. The MSP will complement the efforts of other U.S. Government entities, focusing on core FBI competencies that include the establishment of a human intelligence base, the collection and distribution of relevant information and intelligence, the preparation of threat and vulnerability analyses, and the provision of investigative support. The MSP emphasizes the importance of its liaison relationships with the USCG and other agencies, participating with the USCG, the Coast Guard Investigative Service (CGIS), and others in formal and informal interagency working groups. Recently, both the USCG and Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS) have assigned full time representatives to the MSP.

The MSP also provides guidance to approximately 80 Maritime Liaison Agents (MLAs), who are assigned to the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Forces (JTTFs) throughout the United States. MLAs include FBI Special Agents as well as JTTF Officers from the CGIS, NCIS, state and local port authorities and police departments, and others. The FBI recently hosted an MLA training conference that included representatives and presentations from the FBI, DOJ, USCG Headquarters, USCG field operations, CGIS, NCIS, and other Federal and local law enforcement agencies. Conference training included the authorities and capabilities of these agencies as well as best practices and guidelines for operational responses to maritime terrorism threats and incidents.

13. I am concerned by reports of organized crime syndicates linked to intellectual property theft and counterfeiting. The ability to steal intellectual property and counterfeit American made goods and then market those goods around the world is deeply troubling. What is the Department of Justice's comprehensive, long-term plan to combat intellectual property theft and counterfeiting by organized crime syndicates?

ANSWER: The Department shares your deep concern over the increasing involvement of organized crime in the commission of IP offenses. Given the high profits and low risks involved in such crimes, it is not surprising that organized crime groups are capitalizing on the opportunity to earn substantial illicit proceeds from trafficking in counterfeit goods.

The Department has conducted a number of recent investigations and prosecutions of organized crime groups engaged in IP theft and counterfeiting. For instance, in April 2006, two Chinese nationals pled guilty to charges arising from a federal crackdown against a violent criminal organization in New York known as the "Yi Ging Organization." These defendants had been charged along with 39 others in a September 2005 indictment charging racketeering offenses, including extortion, witness tampering, trafficking in counterfeit DVDs and CDs, money laundering, operating a large-scale illegal gambling business, and drug trafficking. The Yi Ging Organization allegedly generated millions of dollars in profits from their counterfeit DVD and CD business. Gang members traveled to China to obtain illegal copies of American and Chinese DVDs, which they then smuggled into the United States, copied, and sold along with pirated music CDs at stores the gang controlled in Manhattan and other parts of New York City. According to the indictment, leaders of the Yi Ging Organization ordered associates to use force against groups and individuals who were perceived as threats to the Organization, including competitors in the counterfeit DVD and CD business.

Another example of an organized crime prosecution occurred in November 2004, when federal agents in New York arrested 28 individuals as part of a the takedown of organized criminal organizations allegedly engaged in attempted murder, loan sharking, alien smuggling, narcotics distribution, gambling, and trafficking in counterfeit clothing accessories. The arrests included members of two Asian criminal enterprises operating in Manhattan's Chinatown and in Flushing, Queens, and twelve of the gangs' members were charged federally with criminal racketeering. These criminal organizations' alleged illegal activities included selling counterfeit Chanel, Gucci, and Coach accessories at stores they owned in Midtown Manhattan, as well as distributing the counterfeit apparel to other retail outlets. Twenty-four individuals connected with these criminal enterprises have already pled guilty.

Although these and other cases show some success in combating organized crime groups engaged in IP theft and counterfeiting, the Department is committed to doing more. We have implemented a multi-front enforcement approach to combating intellectual property crime, in particular large-scale intellectual property crime committed by organized criminal groups and syndicates.

First, within the Criminal Division, the Computer Crime and Intellectual Property Section ("CCIPS") devotes 14 of its 35 attorneys to intellectual property enforcement issues, including prosecution, legislative reform, and international training and technical assistance. CCIPS' prosecution strategy stresses the development of undercover investigations that, in turn, lead to multi-district and international prosecutions of organized criminal groups. CCIPS' investigations and prosecutions of intellectual property offenses continue to increase, with nearly an 800% increase in its pending IP criminal workload in the past four years -- from 23 pending cases and investigations at the beginning of FY2002, to 203 pending cases and investigations at the beginning of FY2006. CCIPS also provides training and on-call, 24/7 legal guidance to agents and prosecutors in the field; provides technical assistance on relevant legislative issues; and assists in the development of Department and Administration policy on intellectual property issues.

Second, the Department has designated at least one Computer Hacking and Intellectual Property ("CHIP") coordinator in every U.S. Attorney's Office in the country. As with all federal crime, primary responsibility for prosecution of federal intellectual property offenses falls to the 94 U.S. Attorneys' Offices across the United States and its territories. CHIP Coordinators are Assistant U.S. Attorneys with specialized training in intellectual property and computer crime, and who serve as subject-matter experts within their districts. Identifying a CHIP Coordinator in each District ensures that a prosecutor with training and experience in intellectual property crimes is available wherever and whenever an offense occurs. Like CCIPS, U.S. Attorneys' Offices have also seen increases in their intellectual property cases, with prosecutions increasing 70% from FY2004 to FY2005, and the number of defendants charged more than doubling (from 141 to 352).

Third, the Department has created CHIP Units in districts where the incidence of intellectual property and hi-tech crimes is higher and is more likely to significantly impact the national economy. There are now 18 [possibly as many of 23, depending on what is announced this month] CHIP Units across the United States. The Department has created 5 [10?] new CHIP Units in the past 18 months alone, above and beyond the five Units recommended in the Department's IP Task Force Report issued in October 2004. [1] CHIP Units consist of a concentrated number of trained prosecutors in the same U.S. Attorney's Office. These Units have been successful in increasing the enforcement of criminal intellectual property laws. The most recent data shows an increase of 46% in the number of defendants charged in districts with CHIP Units as compared to the year before these Units were activated.

Finally, the Organized Crime and Racketeering Section (OCRS) of the Criminal Division works closely with the FBI to coordinate the Department's Organized Crime Program, which has a long history of proven success. In recent years, the Program has broadened its focus from the traditional LCN ("La Cosa Nostra") syndicates to encompass new and evolving forms of organized crime threats. Enforcement efforts are currently directed against several transnational organized crime groups believed to engage in or otherwise support intellectual property theft and counterfeiting, including the Chinese Triads, the Sicilian Mafia, and Russian criminal networks. The Organized Crime Program applies a comprehensive approach to these cases, designed to disrupt and dismantle a criminal enterprise through the use of wide-ranging investigative strategies and the powerful RICO (Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations) statute.

OCRS supervises the investigation and prosecution of these cases by specialized Organized Crime Strike Force Units within U.S. Attorneys' Offices in 21 federal districts. In addition, OCRS maintains a cadre of experienced prosecutors trained in multi-defendant RICO cases and available to assist in the prosecution of a broad spectrum of organized crime activities

The combined prosecution efforts of the CHIP network, CHIP Units, CCIPS, and OCRS create a formidable multi-front enforcement attack against intellectual property thieves and the organized crime element. While the challenge before us is great, and growing, I believe that this enforcement strategy will continue to yield improved results.

QUESTIONS FROM REPRESENTATIVE KING

14. The Crime Subcommittee has heard extensive testimony concerning enforcement practices by BATFE at gun shows. Do you believe BATFE was justified in shadowing customers at gun shows, "discouraging" sales, stopping some customers for roadside questioning and gun seizure on their way home, and sending local police to gun buyers' homes for "residency checks"? If not, will you adopt clear investigative guidelines to avoid such excesses in the future?

ANSWER: The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives (ATF) provided extensive testimony and other responsive information to the Subcommittee with regard to the gun show operations conducted in Richmond, Virginia and across the country. That information indicated that ATF conducts investigations at 2% of the 5,000 gun shows that take place each year. The operations that took place in Richmond, Virginia area in 2004-2005 were a focused effort designed in partnership with state and local law enforcement authorities to reduce violent crime and prevent diversion of firearms. ATF provided numerous examples and statistics demonstrating the success of these efforts and thoroughly explained the law enforcement techniques that were employed at the gun shows to accomplish their goals.

ATF is aware that concerns have been raised with regard to one of the gun show operations that took place in August 2005. ATF has addressed those concerns, both before the Subcommittee and with their personnel in the field. ATF has taken the appropriate steps to adapt their operations to avoid similar concerns in the future.

15. Also in the Crime Subcommittee, we heard considerable testimony about BATFE's practices in cases involving revocation of federal firearms licenses. There seemed to be agreement on all sides that BATFE should have enforcement options short of revocation. Do you agree with that as well?

ANSWER: ATF is not opposed to considering ways to improve the current revocation and denial system. ATF is willing to explore the use of alternate sanctions as another tool and means of enforcement options.

16. There also was some very disturbing testimony that BATFE demands an almost impossible level of perfection among licensees - for instance, that BATFE revoked a gun store's license where the store's records were 99.96% accurate and the BATFE's ability to trace firearms was in no way impaired by the 4/100% inaccuracies, and the government then argued in the Court of Appeals that "no errors are permissible." Do you think this is a reasonable approach to administrative enforcement? If not, what changes do you plan to make regarding BATFE's enforcement standards?

ANSWER: ATF has issued national guidelines to field personnel to ensure FFL violations are addressed consistently across the country. These guidelines do not reflect a "zero tolerance" policy. ATF does not ordinarily revoke licenses solely on the basis of a few minor record keeping violations and this policy is reflect in our national guidelines. Moreover, the fact that ATF typically revokes approximately 100 licenses per year, which is less than one-tenth of one percent of the total FFL population, clearly indicates that the agency is not abusing its discretion in regulating the firearms industry.

ATF has discretion whether to use its resources to pursue revocation and the vast majority of insignificant record keeping violations result in no penalties being imposed on an FFL. Even where violations are clearly willful, we generally seek license revocation only where it appears that voluntary compliance is unlikely or that continued operations of the firearms business poses a threat to public safety.

Testimony given before the Crime Subcommittee brought allegations of an instance where ATF supposedly revoked a FFL's license simply because of the FFL's failure to complete 12 blocks on Forms 4473. It was noted that the case was appealed to the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals. ATF disagrees with the characterization of this case as presented at the hearing. The case referenced may be found at Article II Gun Shop, Inc. v. Alberto Gonzales, 2006 U.S. App. LEXIS 6818 (7th Cir., March 20, 2006). The court's opinion correctly states that the Notice of Revocation was issued after an inspection in 2000 in which the FFL was cited for 2 alleged straw sales, 15 violations on ATF Forms 4473, 49 transfers of firearms to aliens without required documentation, and 14 failures to timely record information in the acquisition and disposition record. The District Court decided the case on a motion for summary judgment that raised only the 15 violations on the Forms 4473. This does not mean that the other violations cited in the notice were not supported by evidence–only that there were genuine disputes about the facts underlying the violations. The District Court granted the government's motion for summary judgment, finding that the 15 violations on ATF Forms 4473 were willful as a matter of law. The Seventh Circuit upheld the granting of the motion.

The Article II Gun Shop case does not support the assertion that ATF revokes FFLs for "inconsequential and trivial" violations of the law and regulations. The original Notice of Revocation included numerous significant violations that, combined with the previous compliance record, established a plain indifference to the requirements of the law and showed no desire on behalf of the FFL to voluntarily comply with the law.

Again, the fact that ATF revokes less than 100 licenses per year speaks volumes on how infrequently our revocation authority is used, hardly coming up to the threshold of abuse.

It should be noted that ATF has been criticized in the past for not revoking enough licenses and now it is the subject of oversight hearings for allegedly revoking too may licenses.

17. When Congress enacted the Firearms Owners Protection Act in 1986, the Senate Judiciary Committee Report stated that the purpose of adding "willfully" to the license revocation procedure "is to ensure that licenses are not revoked for inadvertent errors or technical mistakes." S.Rep. No. 98-583 at 88. But BATFE continues to argue against this interpretation. In fact, in one case, ATF argued to the court that Congress' addition of the word "willfully" to the license revocation statute was "without practical significance." Do you think this is an appropriate position for the Government to take concerning an act of Congress? If not, what changes do you plan to make regarding the Government's position?

ANSWER: Willfulness is not defined in the GCA, but Federal courts have consistently defined the term as requiring evidence the FFL knew of the legal requirements at issue and disregarded or was plainly indifferent to the requirements. This interpretation is not unusual in the civil context. It is consistent with that used in other administrative proceedings, such as Occupational Safety and Health Administration civil proceedings for workplace safety violations and securities fraud cases administered by the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Amending the GCA to provide a statutory definition of willfulness that narrows FFL revocations to those violation undertaken with the intent to violate the law would dramatically narrow the scope of the sanction. It would mean that negligent violations, even those that recur year after year, could not be cited as a basis for revocation. Moreover, adoption of this standard for revocation would provide no incentive for FFL's to comply with the vast majority of their obligations under the law and regulations.

18. Last week in the Crime Subcommittee, Mayor Bloomberg of New York testified against a proposal to codify an appropriations rider that prohibits BATFE from disclosing firearms trace data, except for disclosure to law enforcement during a bona fide criminal investigation. Over the past several years, BATFE has supported this language in order to protect confidential law enforcement information, and with DOJ's support has opposed such disclosures in court. Do you continue to support legislation that maintains the confidentiality of this information?

ANSWER: The consolidated Appropriations Act of 2005, PL 108-447, (the Act) provides restrictions related to the disclosure of part or all of the contents of the Firearms Tracing System (FTS) or any information required to be kept by Federal Firearms Licensees (FFL) pursuant to 18 USC 923(g), or required to be reported pursuant to 923(g)(3) and 923(g)(7). While the Act does not completely prohibit ATF from sharing trace data, it does provide limitations as to its disclosure, as follows:

1. No part of the above-specified information can be disclosed to anyone except as follows:
    a. A Federal State or local law enforcement agency (LEA)
        i. Solely in connection with a bona fide criminal investigation or prosecution

ii. And only where such information pertains to the geographic jurisdiction of the LEA

2. The information is not subject to subpoena or other discovery in any civil action

ATF traces firearms for more than 17,000 Federal, State and local law enforcement agencies, each of which uses such information in connection with law enforcement investigations. Under the Act, requesting law enforcement agencies can receive complete trace result reports from ATF as long as they meet the criteria defined above.

Firearms trace requests are submitted during the course of bona fide criminal investigations. Premature release of the covered information could compromise an investigation and indeed, could pose a risk to the safety of undercover officers, confidential informants, or witnesses. As such, the Department of Justice and ATF continue to believe that the disclosure of this information should be restricted.

19. Because the Immigration Judges and Immigration Board Members exercise the Attorney General's authority over immigration, you can currently issue decisions that overturn their findings. Senator Specter, however, recently introduced a bill that would take this authority away from you and require you to appeal administrative immigration decisions with which you disagreed to the Courts of Appeal.

a. How would this proposed legislation affect the national security?

ANSWER: As you probably know, the provision mentioned above is not included in Senator Specter's most recent version of the Comprehensive Immigration Reform Act of 2006. Senator Specter has been sensitive to the Department's concerns about altering the structure of administrative adjudication of immigration cases (although a few provisions in his bill would still reduce the Attorney General's power to supervise Immigration Judges and the Board of Immigration Appeals). The Department's longstanding view is that the Attorney General is the Executive Branch official ultimately responsible for the administrative adjudication of immigration cases. Although he has delegated his authority to the Board of Immigration Appeals, it is essential for the Attorney General to retain the power to overturn their findings and conclusions. Immigration cases can involve matters of national security, and so any proposal that diminishes the Attorney General's authority over immigration cases necessarily undermines national security.

b. How would this affect the Executive Branch's ability to ensure that the immigration laws that Congress passes are enforced?

ANSWER: As noted above, the Department's long standing view has been that it is essential that the Attorney General have responsibility and control over immigration adjudications that are delegated to the Board and Immigration Judges to ensure that the laws of this country are enforced. The adjudication of cases is the principal means for interpreting this country's immigration laws. As the chief law enforcement officer in the Executive Branch, the Attorney General is uniquely positioned to ensure that the immigration laws that Congress passes are properly enforced. However, the Attorney General can fulfill this obligation only if he has authority over the immigration cases that are adjudicated as well as authority over the adjudicators.

c. How would this affect the President's ability to control foreign relations with other nations?

ANSWER: Delegating the powers traditionally held by the Attorney General regarding the adjudication of administrative immigration removal cases to an "independent agency" would undermine the President's ability to control foreign relations with other nations. The Supreme Court has consistently recognized that immigration adjudications can implicate sensitive issues relating to foreign relations. See e.g., INS v. Aguirre-Aguirre, 526 U.S. 415, 425 (1999). Accordingly, the Attorney General must retain the ultimate authority in immigration cases in order to preserve the President's ability to control foreign relations with other nations.

d. How would this affect Congress's oversight of immigration?

ANSWER: Traditionally Congress has exercised its immigration oversight function relating to the adjudication of immigration removal cases by turning to one official, the Attorney General, to explain, justify, or correct the actions of the Board or immigration judges. Any legal modifications that diminish the Attorney General's authority over the cases adjudicated by the Board and Immigration Judges will necessarily undermine the traditional oversight process. Furthermore, to the extent that immigration adjudication authority is exercised by a large group (i.e., Board members and immigration judges) oversight becomes more resource intensive and less responsive.

20. I believe that the Voting Rights Act does not require or allow surname analysis by the Department of Justice to make statistical determinations that they use to require voter outreach to LEP (limited English proficient) populations. I believe that in our diverse society a person's last name is not a good indicator of whether he or she speaks English well. Our nation has a rich history of immigrants working hard to learn English. I believe that the VRA requires the DOJ to rely on more accurate census data where people describe their own language ability. Are you aware of this practice of surname analysis at the DOJ and do you believe it is appropriate when there is more accurate data available?

ANSWER: In enforcing the law, and in fostering voluntary compliance, the Department has found surname data to be a very useful tool both for our investigations and for local election officials who wish to comply with the law as effectively and efficiently as possible. We allow and encourage local officials to target services to those who need them rather than wasting resources on non-citizens or persons who can, in fact, speak and read English. The Census does not make available the key Section 203 data – the number of voting age citizens who speak a particular covered language and who have limited English proficiency – at the precinct level, the level used by local election officials. The Census suppresses such localized information with that combination of detail for privacy reasons.

The most convenient tool for identifying areas of possible need for language services is the current voter registration list, which is the foundation for local election administration, and which includes those persons actually eligible to vote and eligible for the Section 203 language services. The voter registration lists do not indicate language ability, of course, so local officials must turn to other devices, such as any ethnicity data that may be on the registration record, place of birth data, or, most commonly, surname data. These data do not, of course, mean that all citizens flagged need language assistance; far from it. The presence, however, of a significant number of persons with, for example, Spanish surnames a helpful indicator that there may be a need for language assistance in that precinct. Where we find precincts with over 1,000 Spanish surnamed voters and no bilingual personnel, for example, we take that as a strong indication that the precinct contains voters with an unmet need for Spanish language services. We then investigate further by interviewing local election officials and members of the minority language community to determine whether that is, in fact, the case. Local knowledge and inquiry can quickly and efficiently identify areas where the projected need is illusory or where the need is greater than surname or other analysis suggests. Surname analysis accordingly is a useful, but not dispositive, tool for assuring that citizens are served effectively and efficiently.

21. Concerning the Voting Rights Act, do you believe Section 203 encourages assimilation? Do we still need Section 203? Do you believe Section 203 increases the likelihood of voting errors or voter fraud in the electoral process?

ANSWER: In passing Section 203 Congress found: English language acquisition is extremely important for all Americans. The cases that DOJ has brought under Section 203 have uncovered the ill treatment of voters in some non-compliant jurisdictions. For example, in United States v. Westchester County, New York, poll workers refused to offer Hispanic voters provisional ballots; demanded identification from Hispanic voters that was not demanded from other voters; improperly directed Hispanic voters to other polling places; denied voters assistance by persons of the voter's choice; and treated voters with such hostility that at least one voter left the polls in tears. Likewise, in United States v. Ector County, Texas, poll workers demanded identification from Hispanic voters that was not demanded from other voters; improperly directed Hispanic voters to other polling places; denied voters assistance by persons of the voter's choice; and treated Hispanic voters with disrespect and impatience not shown to white voters.

Section 203 may also reduce voting errors and combat voter fraud. Where citizens have access to ballots they can understand and bilingual individuals to help them through the election process, there may be a natural reduction in voting errors. Similarly, where citizens have access to ballots that they can read and understand, they are far less vulnerable to voter fraud. Our recent lawsuit against the City of Boston, for example, was brought in part on evidence that individuals had, on election day, taken ballots from Chinese-speaking voters and marked those ballots regardless of the voters' wishes.

22. A state or political subdivision is covered by Section 203 if it is determined that: (1) more than 5% of a jurisdiction's voting age population consists of a single language minority group that is limited English proficient; or (2) more than 10,000 citizens of a political subdivision's voting age population are of a single language minority and are limited English proficient. What if there are fewer minorities in a state or political subdivision than these cutoff amounts that are limited English proficient? Is there an equal protection problem with this?

ANSWER: The statutory formula devised by Congress for Section 203 coverage is a reasonable and permissible means of balancing the need to ensure that citizens have access to the franchise while avoiding the waste that would come from providing services where they are not needed. The Supreme Court has upheld similar formulas in other contexts, including the Voting Rights Act itself. See, e.g., South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301 (1966). [Note: This answer should be reviewed by OLC and the SG's Office.]

23. During the hearing, I asked about the effect and the intent of Section 2 of the Fourteenth amendment with regard to the practice of counting people rather than citizens for the purposes of redistricting. After a review of Section 2, do you believe the intent was to ensure that eligible voters and citizens would be equally represented in Congress by the redistricting process?

ANSWER: The counting of persons rather than citizens appears consistent with the intent of the Framers of the Fourteenth Amendment. Historically, including at the time of the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment, it was common for States to allow alien residents to vote on the same basis as citizens of the Untied States. For example, all of the states that grew out of the Northwest Ordinance of 1787 allowed alien suffrage, as was recognized by the Illinois Supreme Court in Spragins v. Houghton, 3 Ill. 377 (1840). Congress also incorporated declarant alien suffrage (voting rights for those who declared their intent to become United States citizens) into the territorial enabling acts of Oregon, Washington, Kansas, Nebraska, Nevada, Dakota, Wyoming, and Oklahoma, according to Jamin B. Raskin, "Legal Aliens, Local Citizens: The Historical, Constitutional, and Theoretical Meanings of Alien Suffrage," 141 U. Pa. L. Rev. 1391, 1406 (1993). Contemporaneously with the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment, the reconstructed state governments created in 1868 in Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, and Texas, included declarant alien suffrage in their new state constitutions. Id. at 1414. In 1874 the U.S. Supreme Court recognized that numerous states permitted non-citizens to vote. Minor v. Happersett, 88 U.S. 162, 176-78 (1874). [Note: This answer should be reviewed by OLC and the SG's Office.]

QUESTIONS FROM REPRESENTATIVE CONYERS

I. Warrantless Wiretapping

A. Wiretapping Privileged Conversations

24. In response to questions on the NSA program posed by House Judiciary Democrats, the Department indicated that an advantage of the NSA warrantless surveillance program as compared to electronic surveillance under FISA is that an NSA analyst rather than a judge makes the probable cause decision before an electronic communication is intercepted. Is it the Administration's position that there is no need for judicial check on the NSA warrantless wiretapping program?

ANSWER: The President authorized the Terrorist Surveillance Program because it offers the speed and agility required to help defend the United States against further terrorist attacks by al Qaeda and affiliated terrorist organizations. Under the Program, professional intelligence officers, who are experts on al Qaeda and its tactics (including its use of communications systems), with appropriate and rigorous oversight, make the decisions about which international communications should be intercepted. In the narrow context of defending the Nation in this congressionally authorized armed conflict with al Qaeda, we must allow these highly trained intelligence professionals to use their skills and knowledge to protect us.

25. Are there any safeguards in place to assure that privileged communications between attorneys and their clients or doctors and their patients are not captured in the NSA program?

ANSWER: The Terrorist Surveillance Program targets communications for interception only when one party is outside the United States and there is probable cause to believe that at least one party is a member or agent of al Qaeda or an affiliated terrorist organization. The Program does not specifically target the communications of attorneys or physicians, and procedures are in place to protect privacy rights, including applicable minimization procedures and other applicable procedures required by Executive Order 12333 and approved by the Attorney General, that govern acquisition, retention, and dissemination of information relating to U.S. persons.

26. A 2003 Senate Judiciary Committee Report found that FBI personnel "failed miserably" in its attempts to secure approval for a warrant against the terrorists, and FBI Agent Harry Samit, testified he had warned his superiors more than 70 times that he believed that Moussaoui was a terrorist involved in a plot to hijack an airplane, but these warnings were all ignored. There also would have been no legal impediment to the Bush Administration obtaining an retroactive warrant on September 10, 2001, when the government intercepted al Qaeda calls outside the United States, which revealed that an attack was imminent by virtue of communications that "the match begins tomorrow" and "tomorrow is zero hour." Numerous Members of the Bush Administration, including the Vice President and General Hayden, have asserted that had warrantless surveillance been in place before September 11, the attack could have been avoided. Given what the 9/11 Commission has reported about this event and FBI Agent Samit's recent testimony regarding disarray at the FBI, do you support their assertions?

ANSWER:

27. The Washington Post has reported that "[s]everal FISA judges said they ... remain puzzled by [President] Bush's assertion that the court was not 'agile' or 'nimble' enough to help catch terrorists." In addition, on September 12, 2001, one day after the attacks, when FBI Director Robert Mueller and other Justice officials asked then-FISA presiding Judge Lamberth to allow for expedited FISA procedures, he immediately acceded. According to an informed government official: "The requirement for detailed paperwork was greatly eased, allowing the NSA to begin eavesdropping the next day on anyone suspected of a link to al Qaeda, every person who had ever been a member or supporter of militant Islamic groups, and everyone ever linked to a terrorist watch list in the United States or abroad." Your representatives have told us in briefings that warrantless surveillance could comply with FISA through emergency warrants, but that it was simply too time consuming and resource intensive to comply with the 72- hour paperwork requirement. What is the extent of resources that would be necessary to allow the Administration to comply with the requirements of FISA for all surveillance involving U.S. citizens?

ANSWER: Shortly after September 11, 2001, the President decided, based on the advice of intelligence experts, that the Nation needed an early warning system to help detect and prevent another catastrophic al Qaeda attack. Speed and agility are critical in this context. It would be an unjustifiable lapse if al Qaeda electronic communications were used to coordinate another deadly attack on America, but the communications were not intercepted in time because of the delay inherent in traditional FISA procedures.

As noted above, the emergency authorization provision in FISA, which allows 72 hours of surveillance without obtaining a court order, does not—as many believe—allow the Government to undertake surveillance immediately. Rather, in order to authorize emergency surveillance under FISA, the Attorney General first must personally "determine[] that . . . the factual basis for issuance of an order under [FISA] to approve such surveillance exists." 50 U.S.C. § 1805(f). FISA requires the Attorney General to determine that the requirements for issuance of a FISA order are satisfied before authorizing the surveillance to begin. The process needed to make that determination, in turn, can take time. Section 106(j) of FISA, 50 U.S.C. § 1806(j), provides that if a court later declines to authorize an interception that previously was authorized by the Attorney General under the so-called "emergency" exception to FISA, it may order disclosures about the surveillance to U.S. persons whose communications were intercepted. Thus, using the "emergency" exception poses a risk that surveillance activities will be subject to public disclosure. In addition, FISA limits the use of intelligence obtained through an emergency authorization if the FISC does not issue an order approving the surveillance within 72 hours. To reduce these risks, the Attorney General follows a multi-layered procedure before authorizing interception under the "emergency" exception to help to ensure that any eventual application will be acceptable to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. That process ordinarily entails review by intelligence officers at the NSA, NSA attorneys, and Department of Justice attorneys, each of whom must be satisfied that the standards have been met before the matter proceeds to the next group for review. Compared to that multilayered process, the Terrorist Surveillance Program affords a critical advantage in terms of speed and agility. Although additional resources would not be unwelcome, we do not believe that those resources would alter the fundamental limitation on the utility of traditional FISA procedures in the narrow context of this early-warning system involving international communications.

B. Acquisition of Information from Private Companies

28. The New York Times reports that government officials have confirmed that "the NSA has gained the cooperation of American telecommunications companies to obtain backdoor access to streams of domestic and international communications," which has resulted in millions upon millions of U.S. citizens' communications being captured by telecommunications firms and shared with the federal government for purposes of signal intelligence and pattern analysis. Since September 11th, the leading telecommunication companies "have been storing information on calling patterns and giving it to the federal government to aid in tracking possible terrorists." In several interviews, Russell Tice, a former NSA signal intelligence officer, revealed his concerns that "the communications of millions of Americans might have been vacuumed up in one of a number of classified NSA programs." Former Intelligence Chairman Bob Graham further detailed the program when he explained that "briefers told him in [Vice President] Cheney's office in October 2002 that Bush had authorized the agency to tap into those junctions . . . and allowed the NSA to intercept, 'conversations ... that went through a transit facility inside the United States.'" While we will not request discussion of the details of these programs, could you provide us with a legal analysis of how such a program might be considered to conform to FISA and the Fourth Amendment?

ANSWER: As the President has stated, "[w]e're not mining or trolling through the personal lives of millions of innocent Americans. Our efforts are focused on links to al Qaeda and their known affiliates." The President also outlined four basic principles of the government's efforts to create an early warning system to protect America from another catastrophic terrorist attack: "First, our international activities strictly target al Qaeda and their known affiliates. Al Qaeda is our enemy, and we want to know their plans. Second, the government does not listen to domestic phone calls without court approval. Third, the intelligence activities I have authorized are lawful and have been briefed to appropriate members of Congress, both Republican and Democrat. Fourth, the privacy of ordinary Americans is fiercely protected in all our activities."

As your question recognizes, it would be inappropriate to discuss in this setting the existence (or non-existence) of specific intelligence activities or the operations of any such activities. Consistent with long-standing practice, the Executive Branch notifies Congress concerning the classified intelligence activities of the United States through appropriate briefings of the intelligence committees and congressional leadership. For similar reasons, we do not think it appropriate in these circumstances to discuss the potential legality of asserted surveillance techniques that are the subject of unconfirmed newspaper accounts.

C. Treatment of Department of Justice Employee Dissent

29. Newsweek has reported that those lawyers within the Department of Justice who raised questions regarding the legality or appropriateness of the domestic spying program "did so at their peril, [were] ostracized [and] were denied promotions, and some went so far as to line up private lawyers in 2004, anticipating that the president's eavesdropping program would draw scrutiny from Congress, if not prosecutors." This reportedly included the head of the Office of Legal Counsel, Patrick Philbin. According to government sources, Department lawyers raising questions regarding the legality or appropriateness of the domestic spying program were ostracized within the Department and had their promotions blocked. Is this type of behavior allowed, and will you commit to undertake an independent investigation to ascertain the validity of these allegations?

ANSWER: We respectfully disagree with your characterization of the Terrorist Surveillance Program as a "domestic spying program." The program targets for interception only international communications, where at least one party is outside the country and there is probable cause to believe that at least one party is a member or agent of al Qaeda or an affiliated terrorist organization.

The Department of Justice encourages the free and candid exchange of views among its lawyers, which improves the quality of legal advice rendered. To promote the candid exchange of views, we will not comment on the internal deliberations of the Executive Branch. We note, however, that the Attorney General testified before the Senate Judiciary Committee that, contrary to news accounts, "there has not been any serious disagreement about" the Terrorist Surveillance Program. (Note that Mr. Philbin was not head of the Office of Legal Counsel; during his tenure at the Department, he served as a Deputy Assistant Attorney General in the Office of Legal Counsel and later became an Associate Deputy Attorney General.)

D. Other Secret Programs

30. In your February 28, 2006 letter to Senator Arlen Specter clarifying your testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee on February 6, 2006, you included a strained explanation that your testimony was confined to only the program that President had previously described. Do other programs of warrantless electronic surveillance exist? Do other programs of warrantless physical searches or mail searches exist? Which agencies run these programs and how long have they been in operation? What legal standards apply to these other programs?

ANSWER: As noted above, it would be inappropriate in this setting to discuss the existence (or non-existence) of specific intelligence activities or the operations of any such activities other than the Terrorist Surveillance Program publicly confirmed by the President. Our answer should not be read to suggest the existence or non-existence of specific intelligence activities. Consistent with long-standing practice, the Executive Branch notifies Congress concerning the classified intelligence activities of the United States through appropriate briefings of the intelligence committees and congressional leadership

E. Intelligence Oversight Board

31. Under Executive Order 12863, the Intelligence Oversight Board (IOB) is responsible for overseeing U.S. intelligence activities. General counsel and inspectors general throughout the intelligence community must report to the IOB on at least a quarterly basis intelligence activities that they "have reason to believe may be unlawful or contrary to Executive order or Presidential directive." The IOB is required to forward to the Attorney General any reports of intelligence conduct that it "believes may be unlawful or contrary to Executive order or Presidential directive." In November 2005, the Electronic Privacy Information Center submitted a Freedom of Information Act request to the Attorney General for all reports of possible intelligence misconduct received from the Intelligence Oversight Board (IOB) since September 2001. EPIC's request also asked for documentation of any response from the Attorney General to such reports. EPIC was informed in March 2006 that the Attorney General has no records responsive to this request. Has the Attorney General received any reports of possible intelligence misconduct from the IOB since September 2001?

ANSWER: Per OIPR and FBI, OAG is in the best position to respond to this question.

32. If so, please name the agencies that submitted the reports to the IOB, and explain what sorts of possible misconduct the reports detailed. Please also describe any action the Attorney General has taken in response to such reports.

ANSWER: Per OIPR, ODAG/OAG should review this proposed response: The Department does not know what agencies submit reports to the IOB nor the content of such reports, with the exception of those submitted to the FBI. (Per FBI: It is the FBI's understanding that the IOB does not send reports to the Attorney General.)

33. If the Attorney General has not received any reports from the IOB since September 2001, please explain how instances of possible intelligence misconduct throughout the intelligence community have been addressed during that time.

ANSWER: The FBI's procedures for addressing possible intelligence misconduct are discussed in response to Question 34, below.

34. In March 2006, the Department of Justice Inspector General issued a semiannual report to Congress on Implementation of Section 1001 of the USA PATRIOT Act. In this report, the Inspector General discussed reports of possible intelligence misconduct that the FBI made to the Intelligence Oversight Board (IOB) in FY2004-FY2005. The Inspector General characterized the possible violations as ranging from "relatively minor to significant." According to the Inspector General's report, the FBI submitted 108 reports of possible intelligence violations to the IOB in FY2004-FY2005. How were these matters addressed by the FBI, IOB, and/or Attorney General?

ANSWER: The FBI is able to address only how these matters were addressed by the FBI; we defer to the IOB and the Attorney General with respect to how they addressed these matters.

Pursuant to Section 2.4 of Executive Order (EO) 12863, FBI policy requires all FBI employees, in both the field offices and headquarters divisions, to report intelligence activities that may be "unlawful or contrary to Executive order or Presidential directive." The FBI has interpreted this as including potential violations of agency procedures issued pursuant to EO 12333, including the Attorney General's Guidelines for National Security Investigations and Foreign Intelligence Collection (2003). Potential violations are reported to both the FBI's Office of the General Counsel (OGC) and Inspection Division.

Based on the requirements of EO 12863 and guidance provided by the President's Intelligence Oversight Board (IOB) and DOJ's OIPR, the FBI's OGC determines whether the potential violation is sufficiently serious to warrant reporting to the IOB. If the potential violation is determined to be reportable to the IOB, OGC prepares a written notification, which is signed by the General Counsel or the General Counsel's designee (the Deputy General Counsel, National Security Law Branch) and provided to the IOB, with copies furnished to the Attorney General and Counsel for OIPR. Copies are also forwarded to the FBI's Inspection Division for action as deemed appropriate and to the field office or headquarters division that originally reported the matter.

While generally the reportable actions of FBI employees constitute performance errors rather than willful misconduct, in rare instances this may not be the case. In such instances, the FBI's Inspection Division conducts an appropriate investigation and may refer the matter to the FBI's Office of Professional Responsibility (OPR) for adjudication. If the FBI's OGC determines that any such matters are not reportable to the IOB, that office maintains a copy of its opinion for periodic review by Counsel for the IOB.

If an IOB violation involves the acquisition of communications conducted pursuant to FISA but without appropriate authorization, that "overcollection" would be sequestered and provided to OIPR for appropriate disposition by the FISC pursuant to FISA Section 106(i). If an IOB violation involves the unintentional acquisition of information unrelated to a FISA court order (e.g., obtaining information beyond the scope of a National Security Letter), the FBI would take appropriate remedial action to identify and address any individual or systemic issues related to the overcollection.

35. The Inspector General's report says that in one instance of possible intelligence misconduct reported to the IOB, "the FBI received 181 full content telephone calls instead of just billing and toll records." What actions did the FBI, IOB, and/or Attorney General take in response to this report of possible misconduct?

ANSWER: The FBI is able to address only the actions taken by the FBI in response to reports of possible misconduct; we defer to the IOB and the Attorney General with respect to how they responded to such reports.

The FBI's response to this question is classified and is, therefore, provided separately.

36. According to the Inspector General's report, a number of possible violations reported to the IOB in FY2004-FY2005 involved the FBI's use of national security letter a authority. Did any of these matters involve provisions of law amended by the USA PATRIOT Act?

ANSWER: The USA PATRIOT Act changed the legal standard for issuing National Security Letters (NSLs) from information that is relevant and offers "specific and articulable facts" giving reason to believe that the subject is an agent of a foreign power to information that is "relevant to an authorized investigation to protect against international terrorism or clandestine intelligence activities." In addition, the USA PATRIOT Act allowed the FBI Director to delegate signature authority to Special Agents in Charge of designated field offices and to FBI managers in the Senior Executive Service at FBI Headquarters.

The IOB violations referenced in the Inspector General's report as arising from the FBI's use of NSLs did not relate to the FBI's failure to have sufficient predication to issue these NSLs. Rather, the reported violations involved errors by third parties or clerical mistakes by the FBI. For example, some IOB violations resulted when telecommunications carriers inadvertently provided the FBI with unsolicited data. In other instances, clerical errors resulted in the acquisition of information on telephone numbers that was not actually sought in an NSL. There were no instances in which NSLs were signed by a person who did not have delegated authority to do so.

37. The Inspector General's report indicates that the vast majority of reports from the FBI to the IOB in FY2004-FY2005 involved the improper use of investigative authority under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. Did any of these matters involve provisions of law affected by the USA PATRIOT Act?

ANSWER: The USA PATRIOT Act made changes to the legal standard required under FISA. As amended by the USA PATRIOT Act, FISA requires a certification that foreign intelligence is "a significant purpose" of the authority sought rather than "the" purpose or the "primary purpose." None of the IOB violations arose from this certification.

We understand this question to be asking whether any of the IOB violations referenced in the Inspector General's report related to other changes to FISA enacted as part of the PATRIOT Act, such as: (1) "roving" electronic surveillance; (2) the pen register/trap and trace (PR/TT) standard; (3) FISA business records authority; or (4) information sharing provisions. For fiscal years 2004-2005, approximately 8 percent of the 108 violations reportable to the IOB were related in some way to these provisions. Many such violations were third-party errors, such as telecommunications carriers' mistakes. All but one of these violations were errors in the implementation of PR/TTs.

38. On April 3, 2006, the Chicago Tribune published a story about the Intelligence Oversight Board (IOB) entitled "Intelligence Watchdog Slow to Bite." The article reported that President Bush did not appoint anyone to serve on the IOB until March 17, 2003. How were reports of possible intelligence misconduct from the intelligence community handled during this period when the IOB had no members?

ANSWER: The fact that there was a lag in appointing IOB members had no effect on how the FBI handled reports to the IOB of potentially improper intelligence activities.

II. Terrorism

A. Terrorist Access to Guns

39. As you know, a 2005 GAO reported indicated that a total 47 firearms were purchased over a nine-month period in 2004 by individuals designated as a 'known or suspected' terrorist by the federal government. The GAO went on to determine that with regard to such purchases the Department of Justice's information-sharing procedures failed to adequately "address the specific types of information from NICS transactions that can or should be provided to federal counterterrorism officials or the sources from which such information can be obtained." In response to the GAO report, you announced the formulation of a "working group" to study this issue. Could you please provide us with an update on the progress of the working group, including any specific findings, recommendations or actions that it has taken over the course of the past year?

ANSWER: The working group was formed to consider the issues raised by the GAO report. The working group developed a set of proposed changes to the administration of the system. The Attorney General directed the adoption of these administrative changes, and, in conformance with the recommendations of the working group, the FBI has made all the administrative changes recommended by the working group and relating to NICS checks that hit on records in the Violent Gang and Terrorist Organization File (VGTOF) records. The changes are:

- Improving information-sharing on terrorism subjects seeking to acquire or acquiring firearms by sending out an FBI communication to all Joint Terrorism Task Force (JTTF) agents clarifying that contact due to a NICS check on a person in VGTOF may be treated as any other piece of investigative information and, therefore, can be shared with others, including state and local JTTF members, whenever appropriate.

- Establishing of a separate database by the FBI, outside the Criminal Justice Information Services Division, within which the NICS Section operates, to track persons in VGTOF who seek to acquire or acquire a firearm and appointing an analyst to review such information and develop appropriate intelligence. Data is maintained in this database only in cases of a confirmed match between the prospective purchaser and the person in VGTOF.

- Having the FBI process all VGTOF hits at the NICS Section, rather than allowing the point-of-contact states to process VGTOF hits. This change was made to ensure consistency in handling and appropriate contact with relevant FBI components and field agents.

- Clarifying the process for NICS VGTOF hits to require the NICS to request from the firearms dealer the prospective purchaser's address in the case of every VGTOF hit and to share that information with FBI counter-terrorism officials while attempting to verify a true match and the existence of any prohibiting information. Previously, the NICS had obtained and provided the address in cases when requested to do so by the field agent, but not as a general practice. If the prospective purchaser is not the person in VGTOF, then no information, including the purchaser's address, on the transaction is retained, except as currently allowed under existing law and regulations.

- In cases of NICS VGTOF hits, the FBI encourages its agents to request through the JTTF, whenever they think it appropriate and as a part of a JTTF criminal investigation, that ATF agents review the Form 4473 at the gun dealer's location so that the FBI can find out what makes and models of firearms and quantities the subject bought.

In addition to identifying and recommending these administrative changes, the working group has worked on developing draft legislation for consideration by the Attorney General that would provide him discretionary authority to deny firearms and explosives transfers or permits to dangerous terrorists. The working group expects to submit the draft legislation to the Attorney General for his consideration in the near future.

40. Could you also provide us with an update on the number of firearms that have been purchased by individuals included on the terrorist watch list ("Violent Gang and Terrorist Organization File") since the conclusion of the GAO report. With this information, please include the number of attempted purchases that were made; information on the types of weapons that were involved; what information, if any, was shared with state or federal counterterrorism officials regarding such transactions; and what follow-up actions were undertaken by such officials in response to receiving this information.

ANSWER: The FBI's National Instant Criminal Background Check System (NICS) Section maintains statistics regarding the number of firearm background checks resulting in positive matches to terrorist subjects in the National Crime Information Center's (NCIC) Violent Gang and Terrorist Organization File (VGTOF). The FBI does not maintain statistics on the number of firearms actually purchased as a result of background checks. (The fact that a firearm background check was initiated does not, in itself, indicate either that the customer actually took possession of a firearm or, if a firearm was acquired, that only one firearm was acquired.) In addition, section 617 of the Consolidated Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 2004 (Public Law 108-199, 1/23/04) requires that the FBI destroy any identifying information submitted by or on behalf of any person who is determined not to be prohibited from possessing or receiving a firearm no more than 24 hours after the Federal Firearms Licensee is notified of the approval, and the FBI does not retain statistical information regarding the type of firearm involved in a NICS VGTOF transaction. For this reason, the NICS Section is unable to provide some of the requested information.

The following table reflects the number of firearm purchase background checks that have resulted in NCIC VGTOF matches for each year from 2004 to the present.

	2004 (1/3/04 - 12/31/04)	2005	2006 (1/1/06 - 4/21/06)
Transactions that "Hit" on NCIC VGTOF Records	38	41	41

If a NICS background check reveals a potential NCIC VGTOF match, the NICS Section telephonically notifies the FBI's TSC, providing to the TSC all available information, including the buyer's descriptive data and the type of firearm the buyer is attempting to purchase (handgun, long gun, or both). If the subject does appear to be a match, the TSC will forward this information to the Terrorist Screening Operations Unit (TSOU) at FBIHQ for its provision to an FBI case agent. The case agent and NICS work together to determine whether the FBI possesses any information indicating that the subject is ineligible to obtain firearms. The FBI does coordinate with appropriate Federal, state, and local officials regarding the attempted or denied purchase of a firearm by a subject in VGTOF if circumstances warrant such coordination. The Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act prohibits the retention and dissemination of information regarding approved firearm purchasers.

41. In your personal opinion, should individuals listed on the terrorist watch list ("VGTOF") be permitted to purchase firearms?

ANSWER: I believe that we have to carefully consider how and under what circumstances legal authority should be provided allowing the denial of firearms to persons on the terrorist watch list. We want to be sure to address the concern of not prematurely alerting persons on the watch list or compromising ongoing investigations or intelligence-collection operations. These concerns were summarized in a letter dated July 26, 2005, from Assistant Attorney General for Legislative Affairs, William Moschella, to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a copy of which is attached. As noted above, I expect to receive a proposal for draft legislation on this question very soon from the working group.

B. The Terrorist Watchlist and Guns

42. In January 2005, the General Accountability Office released a report which indicated that over a four month period in 2004 (February 3 - June 30th, to be exact) 35 individuals on the terrorist watchlist ("VGTOF") were able to successfully purchase firearms. Would you please provide us with information concerning the types of weapons that were purchased, including make and model?

ANSWER: The Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act of 1993 (Brady Act) does not permit the FBI's National Instant Criminal Background Check System (NICS) Section to record information regarding the make or model of a firearm. In addition, Section 617 of the Consolidated Appropriations Act, 2004 (Pub. L. No. 108-199, 1/23/04) requires the NICS Section to destroy any identifying information submitted by or on behalf of a person who has been determined not to be prohibited from possessing or receiving a firearm no more than 24 hours after the Federal Firearms Licensee (FFL) has been notified of the approval. For this reason, the NICS Section is unable to provide any information regarding the type of firearm or firearms a buyer has attempted to purchase, if the transaction was permitted.

43. With regard to the aforementioned purchases, please indicate if any of the transactions involved multiple transfers to the same individual.

ANSWER: The Brady Act does not permit the NICS Section to record information regarding how many firearms a buyer is attempting to purchase. The only exception to this prohibition occurs if an individual is attempting to purchase both a handgun and a long gun. Even in such cases, though, information regarding permitted transactions is destroyed within 24 hours after the FFL is notified of the approval. For this reason, the NICS Section is unable to address how many firearms a buyer attempted to purchase in cases in which the transaction was permitted.

44. Please provide the geographic location of the transactions (categorized by city and state, if possible).

ANSWER: Section 617 of the Consolidated Appropriations Act, 2004 requires the NICS Section to destroy any identifying information submitted by or on behalf of a person who has been determined not to be prohibited from possessing or receiving a firearm within 24 hours of notifying the FFL of the approval. For this reason, the NICS Section is unable to provide any information regarding the geographic location of permitted transactions.

45. Please note whether the same dealer was involved in more than one of the transactions.

ANSWER: Section 617 of the Consolidated Appropriations Act, 2004 requires the NICS Section to destroy any identifying information submitted by or on behalf of a person who has been determined not to be prohibited from possessing or receiving a firearm within 24 hours of notifying the FFL of the approval. For this reason, the NICS Section is unable to provide any information regarding whether the same FFL was involved in more than one of the permitted transactions.

46. Finally, please indicate what type of dealer was involved in each transaction. (ie whether they were a Type 1 dealer or a Type 2 dealer)

ANSWER: Section 617 of the Consolidated Appropriations Act, 2004 requires the NICS Section to destroy any identifying information submitted by or on behalf of a person who has been determined not to be prohibited from possessing or receiving a firearm within 24 hours of notifying the FFL of the approval. For this reason, the NICS Section is unable to provide any information regarding the type of FFL involved in permitted transactions.

47. From July 1, 2004 through April 1, 2006, please provide us with the total number of individuals on the terrorist watch list that were able to successfully purchase firearms.

ANSWER: From July 1, 2004, through April 1, 2006, there were 34 permitted firearm transactions in which background checks revealed positive matches to subjects in the terrorist records of the National Crime Information Center (NCIC) Violent Gang and Terrorist Organization File (VGTOF). (Even where a transaction is permitted, the NICS Section is not informed whether the purchase is finalized.) The criteria for prohibiting the possession or receipt of a firearm are established by 18 U.S.C. § 922(g) and (n). Because a subject's inclusion in the terrorist records in VGTOF may be based on criteria other than these, inclusion in VGTOF does not necessarily mean a person is prohibited from possessing a firearm. In these 34 firearms transactions, the basis for inclusion in VGTOF was not among the prohibiting criteria in 18 U.S.C. § 922(g) and (n) and there was no other legal basis for declining these transactions. Under these circumstances, these transactions were permitted.

48. With regard to this new set of transactions, please provide the same information requested in questions 1 through 5 printed above.

ANSWER: As indicated in response to Questions 42 through 46, above, the FBI's NICS Section is unable to provide the requested information.

49. Please explain the criteria used for adding an individual's name to the terrorist watchlist.

ANSWER: Homeland Security Presidential Directive 6 (HSPD-6) (9/16/03) provides the minimum substantive criteria for placing an individual's name on the consolidated terrorist watchlist. In accordance with HSPD-6, an individual may only be included in the Terrorist Screening Data Base (TSDB) if the person is "known or appropriately suspected to be or have been engaged in conduct constituting, in preparation for, in aid of, or related to terrorism."

The subjects of domestic terrorism investigations and international terrorism investigations are handled somewhat differently. The FBI opens domestic terrorism investigations pursuant to the Attorney General's Guidelines on General Crimes, Racketeering Enterprise and Terrorism Enterprise Investigations (5/30/02) and forwards the names of the subjects of these investigations to the FBI's Terrorist Review and Examinations Unit (TREX). If the TREX confirms that the subject is a known or appropriately suspected domestic terrorist, it forwards the nomination to the TSC for inclusion in the TSDB.

The NCTC receives information regarding international terrorists from throughout the intelligence community, including the FBI. An NCTC analyst reviews the totality of the available information, including both facts and reasonable inferences from those facts. The NCTC considers the originating agency's designation of an individual as a "known or appropriately suspected" international terrorist to be presumptively valid unless the NCTC has specific and credible information that such a designation is not appropriate. If the NCTC determines that an individual meets the "known or appropriately suspected" standard of HSPD-6, it will "flag" that record for export to the TSC. The TSC receives the NCTC's nominations daily and generally places all NCTC international terrorist nominations into the TSDB unless there is insufficient corroboration of a terrorism nexus. The TSC notifies the NCTC if a nomination is rejected.

50. Beyond establishing a working group in March 2005, what steps if any has the Administration taken in response to the January 2005 GAO report?

ANSWER: The FBI has taken the administrative steps described in the answer to question 39 above.

51. Who are the members of the working group, and how many times have they met since its formation? (please include specific dates, if possible)

ANSWER:

III. Drug Kingpin Prosecutions

52. Would you agree that the most important job of the Department of Justice in the national anti-drug effort is to prosecute the highest level drug traffickers -- those operating at the international and nationwide level who are beyond the ability of state and local law enforcement to prosecute?

ANSWER: The working group has been led by the Office of Legal Policy and has representatives from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives, and the Office of Legislative Affairs. The working group has also consulted with the Office of Legal Counsel, the Civil Division, and the Office of the Deputy Attorney General on its recommendations. The working group has met in person a number of times and has communicated frequently by e-mail over the last year.

(from CRM) We agree that prosecuting high level drug traffickers is a critical part of the Department's counter-narcotics mission. At the same time, we also believe that the Department's mission must be understood in the overall context of the Administration's National Drug Control Strategy, and we are not prepared to state that prosecuting the highest level drug traffickers is the "most important job" of the Department.

The Department's anti-drug efforts are an integral part of the Administration's National Drug Control Strategy, which sets forth a balanced, three-pronged approach to combat illegal drugs, including: (1) Stopping Drug Use Before It Starts, which focuses on prevention; (2) Healing America's Drug Users, which focuses on providing drug treatment to those who need it; and (3) Disrupting Drug Markets, which focuses on disrupting the availability of illicit drugs, through source country efforts, interdiction programs, investigative operations, and prosecutions.

The Department of Justice has an important role in each of these three prongs, albeit sometimes in unexpected ways. For instance, even though the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) primarily focuses on drug investigations and interdictions, DEA also has a demand reduction section to conduct community outreach to educate the public on the dangers of drug abuse. Likewise, although the Bureau of Prisons's (BOP's) mission is primarily to incarcerate federal offenders, BOP in FY2005 was allocated over $40 million in drug treatment resources to provide services to the prison population. The Department's law enforcement components (DEA, FBI) and prosecutorial units (Criminal Division and U.S. Attorneys' Offices) obviously play an important role in identifying, disrupting and dismantling drug trafficking organizations.

Within the third prong of the Administration's Strategy, the Department, through its Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force (OCDETF) program, focuses on Consolidated Priority Organization Targets (CPOTS), which represents the "most wanted" drug supply and money laundering targets. At the same time, non-CPOT drug distributors are also routinely prosecuted because they have violated the federal Controlled Substances Act, 21 U.S.C. § 801, et seq. The Department has an important responsibility to prosecute those individuals that violate federal law, even if they are not CPOTs.

Accordingly, our position is that the Department plays an important role in each of the three pillars of the Administration's National Drug Control Strategy, and we do not believe that any of the roles should be categorized as less important or less significant in the battle against illicit narcotics.

53. According to the Bureau of Justice Statistics, the states imposed about 340,000 felony convictions for drug offenses in the most recent year, and they imprison about 500,000 persons for drug offenses. Hundreds of thousands of additional lower level offenders are on probation or parole. The states have an extensive capacity to investigate and prosecute drug offenders, wouldn't you agree?

ANSWER: Yes. Many states have established systems to handle a large volume of criminal offenders. It should also be noted, however, some states and cities lack the capacity to investigate and prosecute violate gangs that are involved in drug trafficking. They lack the expertise to formulate major conspiracy cases against local violent drug gangs, and to protect witnesses that are needed to testify against the major offenders. Accordingly, simply because some states and cities have in place mechanisms to handle large numbers of defendants should not be the basis to conclude that the those states or cities are capable of prosecuting major violent crack cocaine organizations.

54. The Department of Justice prosecuted about 26,000 drug cases in FY 2003. Those drug cases should be the most important of the nation's drug cases, do you agree?

ANSWER: As stated above, the Department of Justice has a responsibility to prosecute individuals and organizations that have violated federal law, and not all of these cases would be described as the "most important of the nation's drug cases." Drug cases are brought by federal law enforcement agencies to the Department for prosecution for a variety of reasons, and therefore, all of the cases are not necessarily major trafficking cases. For instance, drugs (sometimes in relatively small quantities) may be interdicted at the border or at airports during security screenings and referred by Customs and Border Protection for prosecution. In addition, seizures may take place in Federal parks or on Federal lands and referred by the National Park Police for prosecution.

Accordingly, the Department of Justice prosecutes a wide variety of cases, and drug prosecutions, similar to other offenses, fall along a wide spectrum in terms of the severity of the offense.

55. Two weeks ago, on March 22, you announced the indictment of a number of Colombians for their role in conspiring to manufacture and distribute large quantities of cocaine. Your press release said of one of those indicted, just for example,"Erminso Cuevas Cabrera, a.k.a "Mincho," was . . . managed cocaine laboratories . . . Cuevas Cabrera allegedly supervised the production and distribution of hundreds of thousands of kilograms of cocaine." Would you agree that this is the level of drug trafficker that should be a prime example of what the federal government's cocaine enforcement should be about - traffickers responsible for hundreds of millions of grams of cocaine?

ANSWER: The indictment is an example of the Administration's goal, as set forth in the National Drug Control Strategy, of disrupting the availability of illicit drugs by attacking the distribution of drugs at the source country level. While this is an important part of the Administration's effort, we also must focus on reducing the supply of illicit drugs at the regional and local level as well.

56. There were almost 10,000 federal cocaine prosecutions in FY 2000. Almost half of all federal cocaine prosecutions in 2000 were crack prosecutions. Of the 4,706 crack cases prosecuted by the Justice Department, what fraction do you think were of national or international scope?

ANSWER: In one sense, all cocaine prosecutions are "national or international" in scope because the cocaine originated in a country outside the United States, such as Columbia or Peru. Notwithstanding this caveat, if, by "national or international" in scope, the question asks whether the offender was distributing to customers across state lines or international borders, then the Department does not maintain such data.

The U.S. Sentencing Commission completed a report in May 2002, which examined some of these issues. In its May 2002 monograph, entitled "Report to Congress: Cocaine and Federal Sentencing Policy," the Sentencing Commission concluded that in 2000, 11.6 percent of offenses were "national" (9.0 percent) and "international" (2.6 percent) in scope.[1]

57. What fraction do you think were interstate involving a region or section of the country?

ANSWER: The Department does not maintain statistics to respond to this question. However, the U.S. Sentencing Commission study reflects that in 2000, 9.7 percent of offenders were categorized as "regional" and 3.4 percent were categorized as "section of country."[1]

58. The greatest extent of the trafficking of 75.3% of the federal crack prosecutions was local and neighborhood trafficking. Does that sound like the right proportion to you?

ANSWER: The Department does not maintain statistics to respond to this question. However, the Department agrees that the Sentencing Commission concluded that in FY2000, 42.1 percent of offenders were "neighborhood" offenders and 33.2 percent of offenders were "local" in nature.[1]

59. You recently indicted some Colombians for their alleged role in manufacturing hundreds of millions of grams of cocaine. What do you think the average quantity of cocaine was for international level traffickers in powder cocaine in 2000?

ANSWER: The Department does not maintain data to respond directly to this question. Complicating the matter is that seizures on the Mexican border might be included with the phrase "international level traffickers" even though they could include low-level smugglers. Nevertheless, the Sentencing Commission reports in 2000, there were 243 powder cocaine offenders who were sentenced at base offense level 38 (at least 150 kilograms), and the average quantity of powder cocaine for which offenders at this level were held responsible was 1,038 kilograms.[1]

[3] Sentencing Commission Annual Reports and Statistical Sourcebook, FY 2000, Table 42.

In its report of May 2002, the Sentencing Commission found that offenders categorized as "importers/high level suppliers" and "leader/grower/manufacturer" were responsible for a median quantity of 16 kilograms and 16.2 kilograms, respectively, of powder cocaine in 2000.[2]

60. Can you tell us what percentage of the federal cases are brought against crack defendants are against the high level traffickers: importers, organizers, wholesalers?

ANSWER: The Department of Justice does not maintain this data. The Sentencing Commission's study in May 2002, suggests that in 2000, 0.5 percent of crack cocaine offenders were "importers," 5.6 percent were "organizers" and 9.1 percent "wholesalers."[1]

61. What percentage of all of all federal crack cases do you think are simply street level dealers, according to the Sentencing Commission?

ANSWER: The Department of Justice does not maintain this data. The Sentencing Commission's study in May 2002, suggests that in 2000, 66.5 percent of crack cocaine offenders are categorized as "street-level dealers."[1]

62. What is the average weight of crack cocaine sold in the entire course of the conspiracy that those street level defendants were involved in?

ANSWER: The Department of Justice does not maintain this data. According to the Sentencing Commission, "street level dealers" were responsible for a median quantity of 52 grams in 2000.[1]

IV. Immigration

A. Employer Sanctions

63. In recent years, hundreds of thousands of immigrants have crossed the borders into the U.S. to undertake work in our economy - despite their lack of authorization to do so. The Senate is currently engrossed with the issue of how to resolve our unlawful immigration problems - yet we are not doing anything to eliminate the pull factor - namely, the availability of jobs to undocumented immigrants. In 2005, the Department of Justice only instituted sanctions against 3 companies in the entire country for their use of undocumented labor. How can we be trying to fix the problems with new legislation if we are not even going to enforce the laws against hiring illegal labor by applying employer sanctions against those who violate those laws?

ANSWER: The Department of Homeland Security is responsible for initiating employer sanctions cases. The Department of Justice, through the Office of the Chief Administrative Hearing Officer, is responsible for adjudicating those cases once they have been initiated.

64. It appears that the Department, and maybe the Administration by implication, does not think it needs to enforce these laws - is that the case?

ANSWER: No. The Department of Justice—and the Administration as a whole—is committed to protecting our borders and enforcing the immigration laws. The employer-sanction cases cited above do not tell the whole story. For instance, on April 20 we announced the charging of seven current and former managers of IFCO Systems North America in New York, Texas, and Ohio for criminal acts relating to the employment of hundreds of illegal aliens. Although the case was not technically an employer-sanction case, it represents a major enforcement action, conducted with the close cooperation and significant efforts of the Department of Homeland Security, against what is (assuming the charges are proven) a large-scale employer of unauthorized workers. The Department of Justice will continue to cooperate with the Department of Homeland Security in investigating and prosecuting employers for criminal immigration offenses.

65. What is the agency doing under your leadership to sanction employers who hire undocumented immigrants and what assurances can you give us that the Department will not continue to avoid this important enforcement responsibility?

ANSWER: The Department of Justice will continue to adjudicate employer sanctions case consistent with the law and to prosecute criminal offenses relating to the employment of unauthorized workers. Employers who employ illegal aliens will be punished.

B. Immigration Courts

66. I understand that you have ordered a review of the immigration courts and Board of Immigration Appeals. How is that review progressing? What reforms are being recommended as a result of that review?

ANSWER: The review, which I asked the Deputy Attorney General and Associate Attorney General to conduct, is ongoing. Over 200 people have been interviewed in connection with it. I am awaiting the Deputy Attorney General's and Associate Attorney General's recommendations.

67. In light of the review, is the Department considering revision of its affirmance without opinion system? Are the three-judge panels being restored at the BIA in more cases or is any oversight being added to ensure that single-judge decisions are issued after full consideration of the facts and law?

ANSWER: Our understanding is that these matters have all been raised during the review and are being carefully considered.

68. What measures are being taken to correct those judges who have demonstrated inappropriate behavior in the immigration court?

ANSWER: The Attorney General is awaiting the Deputy Attorney General's and Associate Attorney General's recommendations on these issues.

69. What is the Department's plan for revising how it recruits immigration judges and BIA members?

ANSWER: The Attorney General is awaiting the Deputy Attorney General's and Associate Attorney General's recommendations on these issues.

70. Please tell us about the Justice Department's $11.5 million dollar settlement of a class action suit alleging discriminatory hiring practices in selecting immigration judges (see Notice of Resolution of Class Action).

ANSWER: Durnford v. Ashcroft was a case brought before the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) in 1995 by a class of unsuccessful white male applicants for Immigration Judge (IJ) positions during 1994 and 1995. The class, which was estimated to include approximately 440 members, alleged that the Executive Office for Immigration Review discriminated against white male applicants during this period. During the summer of 2003, after almost a decade of litigation and as the parties prepared for a scheduled administrative hearing, the parties voluntarily entered into mediation with the assistance of a private mediator. Given the vintage of the case and the significant time expenditures expected for the impending administrative hearing, the parties agreed to resolve the matter for a lump sum payment "in the interests of avoiding the expense, delay, and inconvenience of further litigation of the issues raised in th[e] administrative class complaint . . . ." Settlement Agreement § I.

Under the settlement, the Department agreed to make to the class a lump sum payment of $11.5 million. This figure included all possible monetary relief to class members, as well as the costs of administering the payments and all attorneys' and experts' fees and expenses. The Department's share of FICA and Medicare taxes were also included in this total amount. No IJ positions were provided under the settlement, and the Attorney General was left with full hiring discretion for these important positions. The agreement did not admit any liability or fault by the Department.

On December 23, 2004, the EEOC Administrative Judge approved the settlement agreement as fair, adequate and reasonable. Pursuant to a joint stipulation by the parties, this case was dismissed with prejudice in its entirety effective July 5, 2005.

71. Several months ago, you called for a review of Immigration Court proceedings across the United States, voicing concern about intemperate or even abusive conduct. In two memos you sent to immigration judges and the Board of Immigration Appeals, you explained that you were concerned about reports that some immigration judges had failed to treat aliens with respect and that the conduct of some of them could aptly be described as intemperate or even abusive. You instructed Acting Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty and the associate attorney general to conduct a comprehensive review of the immigration court system. Please tell us the results of that review.

ANSWER: As noted above, the review remains ongoing.

72. I have heard that a substantial number of immigration judges did not have any immigration law experience when they were hired. Is this true, and, if so, how often has it happened?

ANSWER: Immigration law experience is certainly a relevant consideration in selecting immigration judges, but it is not the only one. Immigration cases raise a wide variety of issues under laws other than the immigration laws (such as State and federal criminal laws, State marriage and domestic relations laws, and State and federal domestic violence and violence against women laws) and have inter-relationships with federal labor programs and foreign relations. In addition, while immigration law experience is certainly useful for a new adjudicator, other qualities, such as judicial temperament and legal reasoning ability, may be just as important to his or her long-term success. Many of the most distinguished adjudicators in this field come from other backgrounds.

73. Please comment on the Board's streamlining practice, particularly the one member decisions. In view of the fact that single member decisions are not reviewed by other Board members, please tell us about the backgrounds of the members who have worked on the streamlining panel. Do they all have strong backgrounds in immigration law?

ANSWER: As discussed above, the streamlining practice, including the use of single Board member decisions, is being reviewed, and I await the recommendations of the Deputy Attorney General and the Associate Attorney General.

All Board Members may sign decisions as single Board Members. The 11 permanent and three temporary Board Members come from a variety of distinguished legal backgrounds. As we have noted regarding immigration judges, immigration experience is a relevant factor in becoming a Board Member, but is not the only factor. Because immigration law encompasses a wide area of other laws, a Board Member's entire legal and professional background is considered when selecting members.

Furthermore, although a single Board Member may sign a decision, all of the BIA's resources are available to that Board Member, including his or her colleagues, with their areas of expertise, and the corps of expert staff attorneys who assist them.

C. Material Support

74. Unfortunately, our law intended to protect against terrorists is actually barring refugees who are fleeing persecution, including Burmese ethnic and religious minorities, Cubans, and Hmong. It also includes others who are actually victims of terrorism – such as Colombian farmers who choose to flee rather than continue to pay taxes extorted at gunpoint by leftist guerrillas, and Sierra Leonean and Liberian women who are forced under extreme duress to provide labor to rebel forces. The material support ground of inadmissibility is keeping all of those people out - based on the very same oppressive circumstances that made them refugees in the first place. There appear to be three unintended consequences of the material support policy. First, deserving refugees are not being rescued. Second, the refugee resettlement program, a long-standing commitment of the President, is threatened. Some 10,000 deserving Burmese refugees in Thailand and Malaysia remain in peril, and their resettlement is looking less and less likely this year due to this policy. Third, the overreach of this law puts U.S. refugee policy at odds with our foreign policy. Do you share these concerns about unintended consequences of the material support law?

ANSWER: On _____, 2006, the Secretary of State, in consultation with the Secretary of Homeland Security and the Attorney General, exercised his authority under section 212(d)(3)(B)(I) of the Immigration and Nationality Act with respect to the Karen refugees from Burma in Tham Hin Camp in Thailand. Refugees from this camp, who have been found to meet all other requirements for access to and eligibility for the United States Refugee Admissions Program, will be allowed entry into the United States as applicants for resettlement.

While DOJ shares the concerns of others throughout the U.S. Government that certain deserving refugees have not had the opportunity to resettle immediately in the United States through the United States Refugee Admissions Program, DOJ is equally concerned about the risks associated with admitting individuals into the United States who have provided material support to terrorist organizations. DOJ has been unwavering in its zero-tolerance approach to prosecuting terrorists or their supporters in the United States. To allow individuals to give food, money or other assistance to a terrorist organization allows the terrorist organization to make available other funds for weapons and other essentials for the commission of terrorist acts. Allowing certain refugees into the United States who may have committed arguably similar crimes for which other individuals in the United States may be prosecuted under U.S. law has the potential to undermine the ability of the U.S. Government to enforce this country's terrorism laws fairly, effectively, and uniformly. For these reasons, DOJ has been working closely with DOS and DHS to ensure that the United States is helping deserving refugees, while at the same time protecting its ability to prosecute individuals in the United States for material support to terrorism.

75. How are you working with DOS and DHS to ensure that the material support ground of inadmissibility does not bar deserving refugees such as these, or, failing that, how is DOJ working with DOS and DHS to implement the exception to the material support bar, which was authorized by Congress?

ANSWER: As discussed above, DOJ has been working closely with DOS and DHS to implement the waiver provided for in the Immigration and Nationality Act in a way that protects our ability to prosecute terrorists under the law, while at the same time permits deserving refugees admission into the United States under the United States Refugee Admissions Program. DOS, in coordination with DHS and in consultation with DOJ, has exercised the material support waiver with respect to the Karen refugees from Burma in Tham Hin Camp in Thailand. Refugees who are determined to pose no danger to the safety and the security of the United States and meet all other requirements will be allowed entry into the United States as applicants of the United States Refugee Program.

76. Given its urgency, why is there such a delay in resolving this issue?

ANSWER: There has been timely and thoughtful interagency discussion of this issue. We do not agree that considered deliberation regarding this matter constitutes "delay."

77. How will you as Attorney General help to break the impasse and use your office to assure a resolution to the material support issue that is consistent with the President's commitment to refugee protection?

ANSWER: DOJ worked closely with DOS and DHS to resolve issues relating to the implementation of the waiver provision of the Immigration and Nationality Act for the Karen refugees from Burma in Tham Hin Camp in Thailand. DOJ will continue to work with DOS and DHS to address issues associated with providing admission to deserving refugees who have not had the opportunity to enter the United States through the United States Refugee Admissions Program, but who are determined to pose no danger to the safety and the security of the United States and meet all other requirements to become applicants.

V. Civil Rights

A. Enforcement

78. Last month the Southern Illinois University reached a consent decree with the Justice Department to allow non-minority students and men access to graduate fellowships originally created for women and minorities. Fearing the threat of litigation, colleges and universities nationwide are eliminating aid for minorities. Given the Supreme Court's most recent holding on affirmative action (Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 US 306 (2003)) which upheld the use of race in admissions, on what grounds is DOJ challenging minority aid programs?

ANSWER: The United States' litigation against Southern Illinois University ("SIU") was brought under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended, 42 U.S.C. s 2000e et seq., which prohibits an employer from discriminating against an employee or an applicant for employment on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.

Prior to filing suit, the Department conducted an investigation into the employment practices of SIU in order to determine if it was engaged in unlawful discrimination in the selection and hiring of paid fellowship recipients in violation of Title VII. Based upon the results of that investigation, the Department filed suit against SIU, alleging that it maintained three paid fellowship programs that were open only to students who were either of a specified race and/or national origin or who were female. These paid fellowship programs, as opposed to scholarships or other forms of financial aid, were based on the recipient's employment by the University.

On the same day the Department filed the complaint against SIU, we also filed a consent decree negotiated with SIU that was intended to resolve the suit. The following day, the court approved and entered the consent decree. In the consent decree, SIU admitted the fact allegations of the United States concerning the restrictive ethnic, racial, and sex eligibility criteria of the three paid fellowship programs.

79. What if any, commitment does the administration have to ensuring equal opportunities for women and minorities?

ANSWER: The Civil Rights Division exists to protect all Americans. It is my understanding that the Civil Rights Division has never tracked or categorized its investigations and enforcement actions by the race of the victims. Nonetheless, the Division has been active in protecting the civil rights of all Americans, including minorities and women. Indeed, the Division has brought dozens of cases, and reached numerous consent decrees directly benefiting minorities and women. Listed below are some of the more significant actions taken during this Administration that might be of interest:

- Earlier this year, the Division and the City of Virginia Beach reached a consent decree submitted for court approval after the Division challenged the City of Virginia Beach's use of a test that disproportionately and, we alleged, illegally screened out African-American and Hispanic applicants for the position of entry-level police officer. The Decree will alter the City's method for selecting entry-level police officers in a way that would eliminate the disparate impact of certain portions of that process. On April 20, 2006, the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia provisionally entered the Decree pending the outcome of a fairness hearing to be held on July 24, 2006.

- In recent months, the Division has successfully prosecuted two defendants, who were members of a national white supremacist group, for their role in the racially motivated assault of an African-American man.

- In April 2006, the Division filed a complaint against First National Bank of Pontotoc in Mississippi, the first sexual harassment lawsuit filed by the Justice Department under the Equal Credit Opportunity Act. The complaint alleges that William Anderson, a former vice president of the First National Bank of Pontotoc in Pontotoc, Mississippi, used his position to sexually harass female borrowers and applicants for credit. The complaint alleges that Anderson's conduct included making offensive comments of a sexual nature, engaging in unwanted sexual touching, and requesting or demanding sexual favors from female customers over a period of years before his employment with the Bank ended in May 2004.

- In December 2005, the Division filed a complaint against a Wisconsin nightclub alleging that the nightclub violated Title II by discriminating against African Americans. According to our complaint, Eve employees falsely told African Americans that they could not enter because a private party was underway, while at the same time that whites were admitted. On other occasions, the complaint alleges, Eve employees falsely told African Americans that Eve was at capacity, while at the same time that whites were admitted.

- In December 2005, the Division filed a complaint alleging that Ronald Bathrick, the owner of numerous rental properties in Hastings, Minnesota, has subjected female tenants to severe and pervasive sexual harassment, including making unwelcome sexual advances; touching female tenants without their consent; entering the apartments of female tenants without permission or notice; and threatening to or taking steps to evict female tenants when they refused or objected to his sexual advances.

- In 2004, the Division entered a consent decree with Cracker Barrel resolving allegations that Cracker Barrel accommodated a severe and pervasive pattern of racial discrimination at its restaurants, including allowing its servers to refuse to serve African American customers, and treating such customers differently in terms of seating, service, and responsiveness to complaints. Cracker Barrel agreed to implement far-reaching policy changes and training programs to remedy these violations.

- In 2004, the Division announced that federal assistance would be provided to local state officials conducting a renewed investigation into the 1955 murder of Emmett Till, a 14-year old African American boy from Chicago. Till was brutally murdered while visiting relatives in Mississippi, after he purportedly whistled at a white woman. Two defendants, who subsequently admitted guilt, were acquitted in state court four weeks after the murder. Both men are now deceased. Although the investigation showed that there was no federal jurisdiction, on March 16, 2006, the Justice Department reported the results of that investigation to the District Attorney for Greenville, Mississippi, Joyce Chiles, for her to consider whether to pursue state charges. Federal and state officials are investigating the murder in order to determine whether a local criminal prosecution of any surviving perpetrator is warranted, as the statute of limitations has long since expired on any possible federal crime.

- In April 2004, five white supremacists pled guilty to assaulting two African American men who were dining with two white women in a Denny's restaurant in Springfield, Missouri. One of the victims was stabbed, and suffered serious injuries. The defendants were sentenced to terms of incarceration ranging from 24 to 51 months.

- In 2004, the Division alleged that the City of Gallup, New Mexico, engaged in a pattern or practice of hiring discrimination on the basis of race against Native American applicants for jobs in various City departments. The Division obtained a very favorable consent decree and is currently engaged in determining appropriate remedial relief for individual victims of discrimination.

- In 2004, the Division obtained the largest verdict it has ever obtained in a Fair Housing Act case. In United States v. Veal (E.D. Mo.), a sex discrimination case, the jury returned a verdict of over one million dollars. In the case, the Division proved a pattern or practice of sex discrimination by the defendants, and in particular that Mr. Veal systematically sought sexual favors from female tenants. The victims included a 19-year old single mother, a mentally challenged female tenant, and one victim who considered committing suicide after several instances of fondling by the defendant.

- On June 22, 2004, the Division filed the first lawsuit since 1990 alleging racial discrimination in education under Title IV of the Civil Rights Act against Lafayette High School in New York City. The complaint alleged that Asian students were severely harassed by other students and the school district was deliberately indifferent to the harassment. The suit was resolved by consent decree filed simultaneously with the complaint.

- In February 2003, the Division successfully prosecuted Ernest Henry Avants for the 1966 murder of Ben Chester White, an elderly African American farm worker in Mississippi who, because of the victim's race and efforts to bring the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., to the area, was lured into a national forest and shot multiple times—including a shotgun blast to his head. That conviction was affirmed by the Court of Appeals in April 2004.

- In 2003, the Division successfully settled a racial discrimination and retaliation lawsuit against the city of Fort Lauderdale, Florida, for a total of $455,000 in victim's compensatory damages. The lawsuit, consolidated with a private lawsuit, alleged that the city of Fort Lauderdale violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, by denying an African-American employee promotion because of his race. The lawsuit further alleged that the city retaliated against the employee when he complained that he had been denied promotion for discriminatory reasons.

- In 2002, the Division filed the first lawsuit ever to protect Haitian Americans, this under Section 208 of the Voting Rights Act.

- In 2002, the Division filed and resolved United States v. Fidelity Federal Bank, a case involving a pattern or practice of discriminatory abusive credit collection practices on the basis of national origin against Hispanics in violation of Equal Credit Opportunity Act. Under the terms of the Settlement Agreement and Order, Fidelity paid $1.6 million dollars to both compensate the victims and fund a Consumer Education Program.

- Since 2001, the Division has brought 29 cross-burning prosecutions, charging a total of 46 defendants. On April 13, 2004, one defendant pleaded guilty to building and burning a cross in the front yard of an African American couple. On February 19, 2004, three defendants were charged with conspiring to interfere with the housing rights of an African American family by carrying out a series of racially-motivated threats of violence against the victims. Two of the three defendants recently pleaded guilty. And, on March 4, 2004, in a case personally argued by the former Assistant Attorney General, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit agreed with the Division that the district court should have imposed a stiffer sentence for the perpetrator of a cross burning in Gastonia, North Carolina.

- Since 2001, the Division has obtained three consent decrees involving the redlining of predominantly African American neighborhoods by major banking institutions. The first involved a major bank in Chicago that will invest more than $10 million and open two new branches in minority neighborhoods to settle a lawsuit alleging that it engaged in mortgage redlining on the basis of race and national origin. In May 2004, the Division obtained a consent decree requiring a bank to invest $3.2 million in small business and residential loan programs in the City of Detroit and to open three new branches in the City of Detroit. This was the first redlining case the Division has ever brought alleging discrimination in business lending. In July 2004, the Justice Department filed and resolved a lawsuit against another bank in Chicago. The suit alleged that the bank intentionally avoided serving the credit needs of residents and small businesses located in minority neighborhoods. The bank has agreed to invest $5.7 million and open new branches in these neighborhoods.

- The Civil Rights Division has filed more than five times the number of human trafficking cases in the last five fiscal years than it did from FY1996 through FY2000. Many trafficking victims, of course, are women and minorities.

- During this Administration, the Civil Rights Division has filed 13 lawsuits in seven states (California, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New Mexico and Tennessee) alleging that landlords have sexually harassed their female tenants. Eight of these lawsuits have been resolved, and five are pending. Of the eight resolved lawsuits, the Division received favorable verdicts in two of them and obtained consent decrees in the others.

80. Given the history of Title VII and the work of the Civil Rights Division, is it prudent for DOJ to use its limited resources to go after SIU's lawful affirmative action program?

ANSWER: The United States did not challenge a lawful affirmative action program. As explained above, SIU maintained several race and sex-exclusive paid fellowship programs are subject to the requirements of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Under Title VII, SIU is prohibited from discriminating against an employee or applicant for employment on the basis of race, sex, national origin, or religion. DOJ is committed to vigorously enforcing the requirements of Title VII.

81. There is concern about the drop off in pattern and practice cases and disparate impact cases in all areas including race and gender. For example, with respect to police accountability in particular, it appears that no new pattern and practice investigations have been initiated in that area by the Department in either 2005 or 2006. Can you explain this alarming record?

ANSWER: The Civil Rights Division has been active in pattern or practice enforcement across the breadth of the Division through investigations, lawsuits and settlement agreements. For example, during the current Administration we have ensured the integrity of law enforcement by more than tripling the number of settlements negotiated with police departments across the country compared with the previous five years. And, from January 2001 to date, we have initiated more police department investigations than during the comparable time period of the previous Administration. More specifically, we are currently conducting nine Section 14141 pattern or practice investigations of police departments and monitoring ten agreements between the United States and police departments. In 2005 alone, the Division initiated four pattern or practice investigations against police departments, and while it is still early in the 2006 year, we are on pace to continue this success.

Overall the Division has obtained significant relief under its police misconduct authority to prevent excessive uses of force, unconstitutional uses of canines, biased policing, and unconstitutional searches and seizures. The Division works with police departments to implement widespread reforms, including training, supervising, and disciplining officers and implementing systems to receive, investigate, and respond to civilian complaints of misconduct. The reforms instituted by large and small police departments pursuant to settlements with various departments have had a widespread impact and are being used as models by other police departments. The Division also cooperatively works with departments large and small to provide valuable expert technical assistance and guidance from experts with years of police management experience. Some recent examples of this work include providing technical assistance to the Miami, Florida Police Department and Warren, Ohio Police Department.

The Division has also been extremely successful in its pattern or practice enforcement of the Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons Act (CRIPA) authorizing 25 percent more investigations than during the comparable period for the previous Administration. CRIPA authorizes the Attorney General to conduct pattern or practice investigations of conditions in institutions run by or on behalf of a government. Under CRIPA, we investigate nursing homes, psychiatric hospitals, facilities for persons with developmental disabilities, residential treatment facilities for children, juvenile justice facilities, jails, and prisons. In FY 2004, the Division favorably resolved a record number of these matters, ensuring the constitutional and statutory rights of thousands of persons. And, in matters involving children committed to juvenile justice facilities, this Administration has increased the number of settlement agreements, doubled the number of investigations and tripled the number of findings letters issued. We currently have 51 open CRIPA investigations of 67 facilities. We also are monitoring CRIPA settlements in 36 filed cases involving 96 facilities. We are in contested litigation in one CRIPA case involving the Terrell County Jail in Georgia.

Thus far in fiscal year 2006 alone, we have commenced pattern or practice investigations of eight facilities regarding conditions of care and confinement, initiated four uncontested lawsuits involving six facilities, and reached seven agreements resolving pattern or practice investigations of conditions of care and confinement at 12 facilities. Examples of this work include:

- On May 2, 2006, the Division filed a complaint and an agreed consent decree with the State of California regarding conditions at four state hospitals serving individuals with mental disabilities from around the State. The four hospitals - Metropolitan State Hospital in Los Angeles, Napa State Hospital in Napa, Patton State Hospital in San Bernardino, and Atascadero State Hospital in San Luis Obispo - provide inpatient psychiatric care to nearly 5,000 people. The extensive reforms required by the consent decree will ensure that individuals in the hospitals are adequately protected from harm and are provided adequate services to support their recovery and mental health. Our four-year CRIPA investigation revealed a pattern or practice of preventable suicides and serious, life-threatening assaults on residents by staff and other residents.

- On January 27, 2006, the Division entered a settlement agreement with the Nassau Health Care Corporation ("NHCC"), a New York public benefit corporation, resolving our investigation of conditions and services at A. Holly Patterson Extended Care Facility, an 889-bed nursing home operated by NHCC in Uniondale, New York. The agreement requires NHCC to protect facility residents from harm and to improve constitutionally-required services in the areas of mental health care, use of restraints, general medical and clinical care, and nutritional care. In addition, the agreement ensures that each resident is served in the most integrated setting appropriate to his or her needs, as required by the Supreme Court's 1999 decision in Olmstead v. L.C. In Olmstead the Court held that segregation of persons with disabilities may constitute illegal discrimination when those persons can live in a more integrated setting. The Division found in its investigation that A. Holly Patterson exposed residents to a pattern or practice of unsafe living conditions and undue restraints, failed to provide adequate medical and mental health care, failed to provide residents with adequate nutrition and hydration, and failed to protect residents from unnecessary institutionalization.

- On February 8, 2006, the Division reached a settlement agreement with the State of Indiana regarding civil rights violations in two juvenile justice facilities operated by Indiana: Logansport Juvenile Intake/Diagnostic Facility in Logansport and South Bend Juvenile Correctional Facility in South Bend. The agreement, filed in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Indiana, requires the State to implement reforms to ensure that juveniles in the facilities are adequately protected from harm and provided adequate services including mental health care and special education. Our investigation, which was conducted pursuant to CRIPA and the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994, revealed a pattern or practice of numerous civil rights violations, including many instances of youth violence and inadequate supervision by staff, inadequate special education services, and deficiencies in mental health care. Under the terms of the agreement, the State will address and correct all of the violations we identified.

During this administration, the Housing and Civil Enforcement Section has filed 112 pattern or practice cases and has entered into 103 consent decrees resolving pattern or practice cases. The large majority of these pattern or practice cases arise under the Fair Housing Act, with the remainder arising under the Equal Credit Opportunity Act, Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). The number of pattern or practice filings in this administration is consistent with the number filed in the previous five years. Further, within the last six months, we have filed four pattern or practice cases alleging discrimination on the basis of sex and two alleging discrimination on the basis of race. Examples of this work include:

- On April 28, 2006, the Division filed a complaint in United States v. General Properties (E.D. Mich.), a pattern or practice case alleging discrimination based on race or color at the Whispering Woods Apartments, a 273-unit apartment complex in Livonia, Michigan. The complaint alleges that the owner of the complex, General Properties Company, LLC, and its president Elliott Schubiner, have refused to rent apartments to African American prospective tenants because of their race or color.

- On April 27, 2006, the Division filed a complaint in United States v. First National Bank of Pontotoc (N.D. Miss.), the first sexual harassment lawsuit filed by the Justice Department under the Equal Credit Opportunity Act. The complaint alleges that William Anderson, a former vice president of the First National Bank of Pontotoc in Pontotoc, Mississippi, used his position to sexually harass female borrowers and applicants for credit. The complaint alleges that Anderson's conduct included making offensive comments of a sexual nature, engaging in unwanted sexual touching, and requesting or demanding sexual favors from female customers over a period of years before his employment with the Bank ended in May 2004.

- On April 21, 2006, the Division filed a complaint in United States v. James (W.D. Mo.), alleging that a maintenance man at several apartment complexes in Platte City and Smithville, Missouri subjected female tenants to a pattern or practice of sexual harassment, including: 1) unwanted verbal sexual advances; 2) unwanted physical sexual advances, such as unwanted touching of the breasts, buttocks, and other parts of the bodies of female tenants; 3) forcible physical contact with the sexual parts of his body; 4) statements that indicate a preference or intent to discriminate on the basis of the tenant's sex; and 5) threatening to withhold maintenance service or to evict female tenants when they refused or objected to his sexual advances. The complaint also names as defendants the site manager, the property management company and the owners of the complexes.

- On December 29, 2005, the Division filed a complaint in United States v. Candy II, d/b/a Eve (E.D. Wis.), alleging that a Milwaukee nightclub violated Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by discriminating against African-Americans. The complaint alleges Eve employees falsely told African-Americans that they could not enter because a private party was underway, at the same time that the employees admitted whites. On other occasions, the complaint alleges, Eve employees told African-Americans that Eve was at capacity, at the same time that the employees admitted whites.

- In December 19, 2005, the Division filed a complaint in United States v. Bathrick (D. Minn.) alleging that Ronald Bathrick, the owner of numerous rental properties in Hastings, Minnesota, has subjected female tenants to severe and pervasive sexual harassment, including making unwelcome sexual advances; touching female tenants without their consent; entering the apartments of female tenants without permission or notice; and threatening to or taking steps to evict female tenants when they refused or objected to his sexual advances.

In addition, in FY 2005 alone, the Division brought lawsuits under the Fair Housing Act that created 12, 000 new housing opportunities for people with disabilities - a figure that is almost four times greater than the entire eight year output of the previous Administration.

The number of complaints filed by the Civil Rights Division in calendar years 2004, 2005 and 2006 that alleged a pattern or practice of employment discrimination has been consistent with the number of such cases filed yearly by the previous administration. Indeed, in 2004 the Civil Rights Division filed four such complaints, the largest number filed in one year since the mid 1990s. The Division also filed two such complaints in 2005, as it has to date in 2006. All of the pattern or practice complaints filed by the Department since 2004 have resulted in either a decision from the Court in favor of the United States, or the entry of a consent decree implementing terms that were favorable to the United States. Examples of this work include:

- On April 3, 2006, in United States v. City of Virginia Beach, the Division challenged the City's use of a test that disproportionately and, we alleged, illegally screened out African-American and Hispanic applicants for the position of entry-level police officer. The United States and the City have submitted a consent decree to the court for its approval. The Decree will alter the City's method for selecting entry-level police officers in a way that would eliminate the disparate impact of certain portions of that process. On April 20, 2006, the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia provisionally entered the Decree pending the outcome of a fairness hearing to be held on July 24, 2006.

- On February 8, 2006, the Division filed a complaint in United States v. Southern Illinois University ("SIU") alleging that SIU was engaged in a pattern or practice of unlawful discrimination in the selection and hiring of paid fellowship recipients in violation of Title VII. Specifically, the suit alleged that SIU maintained three paid fellowship programs that were open only to students who were either of a specified race and/or national origin or who were female. Accordingly, the Division alleged that SIU was engaged in a pattern or practice of discrimination in violation of Title VII. On the same day the Division filed the complaint against SIU, we also filed a consent decree negotiated with SIU that was intended to resolve the suit. The following day, the court approved and entered the consent decree. In the consent decree, SIU admitted the fact allegations of the United States concerning the restrictive ethnic, racial, and gender eligibility criteria of the three paid fellowship programs.

- On August 26, 2005, the Division filed a complaint in United States v. Ohio EPA alleging both a pattern or practice of discrimination, and a separate claim of discrimination against an individual charging party. In the suit, we allege that the State of Ohio allows public employees whose religions historically have held conscientious objections to joining the state employee union to redirect their representation service fees from the employee organization to nonreligious charities. The State, however, will not provide this religious accommodation to public employees who are not members and adherents of such religions, even if the employees hold sincere religious objections to associating with and financially supporting such a union.

- On July 26, 2005, the Division filed a complaint in United States v. City of Pontiac alleging a pattern or practice of discrimination on the basis of race and gender in the City's fire department hiring. The City of Pontiac signed a collective bargaining agreement that requires the City's fire department to maintain separate hiring and promotion lists that are segregated on the basis of race and sex. Under the agreement, every third hire and every third promotion must go to a minority or a woman, regardless of whether or not that individual is the best qualified. There is no evidence that this one-for-three ratio addresses any specific shortfalls of minorities or women in the fire department, nor is there any evidence that this formula was the result of any sort of detailed analysis of the fire department.

- On September 30, 2004, the Division filed a complaint in United States v. New York City Transit Authority alleging that the MTA has engaged in a "pattern or practice" of discrimination against Muslim, Sikh, and similarly situated employees who wear religious head coverings by not reasonably accommodating their religious observances, practices, and beliefs, and by selectively enforcing its uniform policies.

- On September 29, 2004, the Division filed a complaint in United States v. City of Gallup, New Mexico alleging that the City engaged in a pattern or practice of hiring discrimination on the basis of race against Native American applicants for jobs in various City departments. The United States obtained a very favorable consent decree and is currently engaged in determining appropriate remedial relief for individual victims of discrimination.

- On September 16, 2004, the Division filed a complaint in United States v. Los Angeles Metropolitan Transit Authority alleging that the MTA engaged in a "pattern or practice" of religious discrimination by not reasonably accommodating employees and applicants for employment as bus operators who, in accordance with their religious observances, practices and beliefs, are unable to work weekends and on any shift. The lawsuit was successfully resolved through entry of a consent decree.

- On January 8, 2004, the Division filed a complaint in United States v. City of Erie, Pennsylvania (W.D. Pa.), alleging that the City violated Title VII by using a particular physical ability test as a pass/fail device for screening applicants for the job of entry-level police officer. The complaint alleged that the City's use of the test had a disparate impact against female applicants and was not job related and consistent with business necessity. On December 13, 2005, the District Court entered judgment for the United States and found the City liable under Title VII.

82. According to Department of Justice statistics, prosecutions for racial and gender discrimination crimes traditionally handled by the Civil Rights Division have declined 40 percent over the past five years. Do you know why this is? Can it be attributed to the fact that many Civil Rights Division attorneys are handling immigration matters instead of civil rights cases?

ANSWER: The Washington Post in 2005 reported that "prosecutions for the kinds of racial and gender discrimination crime traditionally handled by the division have declined 40 percent over the past five years[.]" We are puzzled by his incorrect conclusion, and indeed to which specific "traditional[]" "racial and gender discrimination crimes" the article even referred. In fact, the Division has compiled a significant record on criminal civil rights prosecutions. Our zealous commitment to the vigorous enforcement of every federal criminal civil rights law is clear: since 2001, we have increased the staffing of criminal prosecutors within the Division by 13 percent. We recently filed a record number of criminal civil rights cases (96) in FY 2004, and charged a record number of such defendants (191) in FY2001. The total number of criminal civil rights cases filed over the past five years (411) is comparable to and slightly higher than the total number filed during the last five years of the previous Administration (408). Likewise, the total number of defendants charged with civil rights offenses from FY 2001 through FY 2005 (764) is slightly larger than the total number charged from FY 1996 through FY 2000 (730).

Historically, the bulk of the Division's criminal prosecutions has consisted of official misconduct cases, such as those cases involving the willful use of excessive force by law enforcement officials. That remains true today. Since FY 2001, those prosecutions have increased by 16 percent in comparison to the last five years of the previous Administration. We have charged 11 percent more defendants in color of law cases during the same time frame, and convicted 30 percent more defendants. In fact, the Division filed a record number of official misconduct cases, and charged a record number of defendants in such cases in FY 2001, and convicted a record number of defendants in these cases in FY 2002.

The Division also is prosecuting more human trafficking cases, which reflects the passage of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act in 2000. Over the last five years, the Civil Rights Division, in partnership with United States Attorneys' Offices, has prosecuted a record number of trafficking cases. From FY 2001 through FY 2005, the Division filed more than five times the number of human trafficking cases than it did from FY 1996 through FY 2000. Thus far in FY 2006, we already have convicted more trafficking defendants than any other single year on record. While trafficking offenses are not charged as bias-motivated offenses, these victims of crime are predominantly women and minorities. We are proud of our enforcement efforts in this area, which demonstrates the Department's firm commitment to protecting the most vulnerable members of our society.

The Criminal Section includes data related to "backlash" crimes in its bias crime statistics. After September 11, 2001, the Criminal Section implemented an initiative to combat "backlash" crimes involving violence and threats aimed at individuals perceived to be Arab, Muslim, Sikh, or South Asian. This initiative has led to numerous prosecutions involving physical assaults, some minor and some involving dangerous weapons and resulting in serious injury or death, as well as threats made over the telephone, on the internet, through the mail, and in face-to-face interactions. We have also prosecuted cases involving shootings, bombings, and vandalism directed at homes, businesses, and places of worship.

These offenses are prosecuted under a variety of civil rights statutes and other Title 18 offenses, depending on the conduct involved. The Department has investigated more than 700 bias motivated incidents since September 11, 2001. However, the number of backlash allegations referred to the Department has dropped approximately 32% from a high of 121 in 2003 to just 82 last year which may also explain the decline in the total number of bias prosecutions. The Department also assisted local law enforcement in bringing more than 150 such criminal prosecutions.

Our efforts have resulted in 32 federal convictions in "backlash" cases. For example, in United States v. Cunningham, a defendant who shot at worshipers leaving a Seattle mosque was sentenced to 78 months in prison. In United States v. Goldstein, defendants who conspired to destroy mosques and Islamic centers in Florida were convicted. The leader was sentenced to 151 months in prison and his coconspirators also received lengthy prison terms. And last year, a defendant in United States v. Nunez-Flores, who threw a Molotov cocktail at an Islamic Center in El Paso, received a sentence of 171 months in prison.

The Civil Rights Division is deeply committed to the vigorous enforcement of our nation's civil rights laws and, in recent years, has brought a number of high profile bias motivated crime cases. We continue to aggressively prosecute members of the Ku Klux Klan, neo-Nazi, and skinhead groups. Here are examples of recent prosecutions:

- United States v. Baalman (District of Utah): In late 2005 and early 2006, three white supremacists in Utah pled guilty to assaulting an African-American man riding his bicycle to work because of his race and because they wanted to control the public streets for the exclusive use of white persons. One of the three defendants was sentenced to 57 months in prison on March 14, 2006; the other two will be sentenced later this year.

- United States v. Garner, et al. (N.D. Georgia): In February 2004, six defendants in Georgia pled guilty to conspiring to burn a five foot tall cross in the driveway of a home occupied by a white woman. For several days prior to the cross burning, the woman's daughter and her boyfriend, who is African-American, had been living at the residence. The defendants were sentenced to terms of incarceration ranging from 12 to 46 months in prison.

- United States v. Hildenbrand, et al. (W.D. Missouri): In April 2004, five white supremacists pled guilty to assaulting two African-American men who were dining with two white women in a Denny's restaurant in Springfield, Missouri. One of the victims was stabbed, and suffered serious injuries. The defendants were sentenced to terms of incarceration ranging from 24 to 51 months.

In addition, two bias-motivated murder cases are set for trial early this summer. In United States v. Saldana et al., attorneys from the Civil Rights Division and the United States Attorney's Office for the Central District of California are prosecuting members of the Avenues, a violent street gang in Los Angeles, which the indictment alleges systematically threatened, assaulted, and killed African-Americans in an effort to drive them from their homes. In United States v. Eye and Sandstrom, attorneys from the Civil Rights Division and the United States Attorney's Office for the Western District of Missouri are prosecuting two men who, according to the indictment, fatally shot an African-American man as he was walking to work in downtown Kansas City.

In recent years, the Division has teamed up with local prosecutors in an effort to prosecute historical Civil Rights era murders. The Justice Department assisted the Mississippi District Attorney's Office in reopening the investigation into the 1955 murder of Emmett Till, a 14 year-old African-American teenager, who was kidnapped and killed in rural Mississippi. Although the investigation showed that there was no federal jurisdiction, on March 16, 2006, the Justice Department reported the results of that investigation to the District Attorney for Greenville, Mississippi, Joyce Chiles, for her to consider whether to pursue state charges. In 2003, the Justice Department convicted Ernest Avants for the 1966 killing of Ben Chester White, an African-American sharecropper, on national forest land. White was murdered as part of a plot by white supremacists to lure Martin Luther King, Jr., to Mississippi so that they could assassinate him.

Your concern about a perceived diversion of Division resources to handle immigration enforcement may stem from inaccurate media reports suggesting that attorneys from the Civil Rights Division were singled out to handle immigration appeals. We assure you they were not. The fact is that immigration cases within the Civil Division's Office of Immigration Litigation have increased 500 percent since 2001. Every component of the Department of Justice and every United States Attorney's Office have been assigned immigration cases to share this burden pursuant to a directive issued by the Deputy Attorney General. The Civil Rights Division attorneys continue to handle effectively their significant civil rights responsibilities while accepting this new, but temporary, burden to assist another litigating component. The Division's limited and necessary participation in the enforcement of the immigration laws has not impacted its aggressive pursuit of civil rights cases.

B. Investigations

83. During a March 10, 2006, briefing for Judiciary Committee staff, John E. Lewis, Deputy Assistant Director of the FBI's Counterterrorism Division indicated that the FBI is forced to work in a hostile work environment in Puerto Rico. According to Mr. Lewis, the FBI believes that involving the Puerto Rico authorities in its activities poses a security problem and raises the level of compromise for FBI agents. Can you please describe the instances in which Puerto Rico authorities compromised FBI activities in Puerto Rico?

ANSWER: The unauthorized release of information in law enforcement operations poses a risk not only to the safety and security of law enforcement officers, but to the subjects under investigation, the media, and the general public. The FBI is extremely cautious with respect to how information regarding pending investigations is handled and controlled. We have taken appropriate precautions in Puerto Rico, where the FBI's San Juan field office has initiated 43 corruption investigations of current or former officers of the Police of Puerto Rico (POPR), the Municipal Police, and the Puerto Rico Department of Corrections since 2000. These investigations resulted in 165 arrests, 132 indictments, and 137 convictions. The convictions are for such offenses as murder, protecting drug shipments, introducing drugs to correctional facilities, and using weapons and other police equipment during the commission of crimes.

The FBI enjoys an excellent relationship with the POPR and with other Puerto Rico law enforcement agencies. This is evidenced by the current complement of 65 local officers on the four FBI-led Federal task forces. While the number of cases, indictments, and convictions of law enforcement personnel is significant enough to impact the manner in which certain information is shared, it does not mitigate the FBI's efforts to engage our local law enforcement partners on all possible occasions in an ongoing effort to improve the productivity of these important relationships.

84. On October 5, 2005, Members asked DOJ to investigate allegations of misconduct by local law enforcement and correctional officials during the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. Members were concerned that the civil rights of evacuees were evacuated when individuals were not permitted to cross the Greater New Orleans Bridge and when detainees were not transferred from the Orleans Parish Prison. In its November 28, 2005, letter, DOJ indicated that it would determine if federal civil rights investigations were warranted. Can you please provide me with the status of DOJ's inquiry into these possible civil rights violations during the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina?

ANSWER: As you may know, the Louisiana Attorney General's Office has been conducting an exhaustive inquiry into allegations that New Orleans residents were not permitted to cross the Greater New Orleans Bridge to Gretna, Louisiana, by law enforcement officials. The Civil Rights Division will review the state's factual investigation once it is completed to determine whether additional investigation is necessary and whether the facts implicate a violation of any federal statutes. We are in contact with the Louisiana Attorney General's Office and intend to review its report as soon as it becomes available.

The Civil Rights Division requested that the FBI conduct an investigation into allegations that correctional officers did not properly transfer inmates from the Orleans Parish Prison during the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. The FBI forwarded the report of its investigation to the Division. The Division reviewed that report and determined that it did not reveal sufficient evidence to establish a violation of any inmate's constitutional rights. Thereafter, the FBI informed the Division that it was investigating additional complaints from inmates formerly housed at the Orleans Parish Prison. The FBI and the Division will continue to coordinate regarding the ongoing investigation of those complaints.

In addition to these allegations, the Civil Rights Division is reviewing two other matters in relation to the Orleans Parish Prison. On May 9, 2006, the Civil Rights Division received a referral from the Department of Homeland Security Office of the Inspector General regarding a complaint from an alien detainee who alleges that he was abused at the Orleans Parish Prison during Hurricane Katrina. The Civil Rights Division has opened an investigation into this complaint and is coordinating with the Office of the Inspector General regarding the investigation. On May 9, 2006, the Juvenile Justice Project of Louisiana, a juvenile justice advocacy organization, issued a report alleging that juveniles housed at Orleans Parish at the time of Hurricane Katrina endured horrible conditions following the storm's aftermath. The Civil Rights Division has reviewed the report and asked the FBI to open an investigation.

C. Employment

85. In September 2005, the New York Times and the Washington Post reported that alleging that the Director of the Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS), Lawrence A. Greenfeld, was demoted for insisting that data on aggressive police treatment of blacks and Hispanics be included in a press release announcing the results of the most recent Public-Police Contact Survey. Can you describe the civil service disciplinary, whistleblower and transfer regulations governing BJS and whether they were appropriately applied to Lawrence Greenfeld's removal as BJS Director?

ANSWER: The Director's position in the Bureau of Justice Statistics is a Presidential bbsrule1 appointment, requiring confirmation by the Senate. As with all positions of this nature, as a Presidential appointee, Mr. Greenfeld served at the pleasure of the President. As a member of the career Senior Executive Service preceding his appointment as Director, upon his resignation as Director, Mr. Greenfeld invoked his civil service right to, "retreat," to an SES position, and currently serves in the Office of Justice Programs on a detail to the Bureau of Prisons as Senior Statistical Advisor to the Director of the National Institute of Corrections.

86. There have been reports of political appointees overruling staff recommendations. For example, in January 2005, the Washington Post reported that political appointees overruled a staff recommendation that the Texas congressional redistricting plan of 2003 be rejected as retrogressive under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. How will you eliminate this type of undue political influence that permits political appointees to overrule staff recommendations?

ANSWER: Partisan considerations should not play a role in the Justice Department's decisions. Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim of the Civil Rights Division believes strongly in this principle as well. The Division's successful record in the courts demonstrates that its decisions are based on the facts and the law.

Your question suggests that an internal staff memorandum that appeared in the press represented the only legal analysis on the Texas submission. That is not true. The memo that was leaked to the media in no way represented the sum total of the analysis (written or otherwise) that Civil Rights Division considered in reaching the final pre-clearance decision in the Texas redistricting case. Candid conversations and vigorous discussions are a healthy and necessary part of the deliberative process. A disagreement hardly suggests that improper political considerations motivated the final decision. In this case, the final decision reflected a careful and dispassionate consideration of the applicable law and facts.

Turning to the specific facts of the Texas case, it is important to bear in mind that the applicable standard in the Justice Department's evaluation of any voting change under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act is whether there will be retrogression in the position of racial minorities in their effective exercise of the electoral franchise when compared to the existing or benchmark plan. See Beer v. United States, 425 U.S. 130 (1976). That standard was faithfully applied in the preclearance of the Texas plan.

The benchmark redistricting plan in Texas at the time the new plan was submitted for review was the plan that had been drawn by a three-judge federal panel in the case of Balderas v. Texas, Case No. 6:01-158 (E.D. Tex. 2001). The court drew a congressional plan when the Texas legislature was unable to redraw the congressional districts after the 2000 Census. The three-judge panel in Balderas found that eight of the 32 congressional districts allocated to Texas had to be minority districts protected by the Voting Rights Act – six districts for Hispanic voters and two districts for African American voters. The congressional plan submitted to the Justice Department in 2003 by the Texas Attorney General preserved, without question, eight minority districts. In fact, as the election of Congressman Al Green from the 9th District in 2004 after preclearance of the redistricting plan showed, the plan actually created an additional minority district where African American voters were able to elect their candidate of choice. Far from being retrogressive, the plan that DOJ properly precleared was actually progressive as to minority voting rights.

As you may be aware, a group of plaintiffs filed suit in 2003 under Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act against the State of Texas alleging that the legislature had not created a sufficient number of minority districts, i.e., that eight districts were not enough districts given the demographics and other factors present in the state. This claim was denied by a three-judge panel on January 6, 2004. See Session v. Perry, 298 F. Supp.2d 451 (E.D. Tex. 2004). The essence of this particular Section 2 lawsuit was a claim that the new congressional redistricting plan should have created more than eight minority districts. Thus, the court's denial of that claim supports the Department's decision to preclear that same plan. Under established Supreme Court precedent, Texas had only to preserve the number of existing districts in the benchmark plan under Section 5's retrogression standard. As the Court's ruling confirmed, that standard was satisfied. A second decision was issued by the same court on June 5, 2005, holding that there was no valid constitutional claim in this redistricting. On December 12, 2005, the Supreme Court issued an Order scheduling its review of this case. We welcome this review of a matter that is better litigated in the courts than the media.

In sum, the Texas redistricting submission involved a deliberate and careful review of every relevant fact. Subsequent events – including the decision by a three-judge panel finding no violation of the Voting Rights Act, and the 2004 elections held under the new plan that resulted in the election of an additional African American legislator – indicate that the pre-clearance decision was correct.

87. Do career staff attorneys have a role in offering recommendations in major voting rights cases?

ANSWER: There is no policy in the Civil Rights Division that prevents staff attorneys from making recommendations. Voting Section (and other Civil Rights Division) attorneys are in fact required to prepare detailed memoranda setting forth the facts and law on each proposed enforcement matter. There is always a full opportunity for lively debate. The Section Chief -- a veteran career attorney with 30 years experience in the Civil Rights Division -- -- expects and encourages thoughtful and aggressive recommendations from Section staff, and this career official has decisional responsibility for many matters. When the Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division makes a decision, he also welcomes opposing views, and is always available for responsible, productive discussion.

88. There are a number of concerns with respect to the Civil Rights Division at the Department of Justice, including morale of career attorneys and the direction in which this administration is driving the Civil Rights Division. An example of this is the reported politicizing of the Voting Rights Section. Additionally, career attorneys are reportedly being assigned to immigration enforcement actions rather than bringing valid discrimination claims. To what do you owe this broad sweeping problem and how do you propose to move forward in your administration of the Civil Rights Division to address these concerns?

ANSWER: The reports of politicization of the Voting Rights Section are inaccurate. And most of the suggestions of low staff morale rely on the claim that there are, allegedly, record numbers of attorneys leaving the Division. The facts show, however, that the rate of attorney attrition in the Division is not out of the ordinary. A number of attorneys accepted a retirement package offered to multiple Justice Department components by the Office of Personnel Management in FY 2005. Even considering those who left under this incentive package, attorneys have left the Civil Rights Division during this Administration in roughly the same numbers as during a comparable period of the previous Administration (12.65% versus 11.8%). This slight difference of less than one percent hardly suggests an unusual degree of unhappiness, nor will it have a serious impact on the experience level in the Division. The Division has been – and remains – strong, with each section chief, for example, having on average about two decades of experience in the Civil Rights Division. This experience, dedication, and practical knowledge continue to serve the Division well.

Regarding your question about the immigration briefs, attorneys in all of the Department's litigating Divisions and every United States Attorney's Office are assisting in handling the extraordinary caseload of immigration briefs, and that practice extends to the Civil Rights Division as well. Despite this extra work, Voting Section attorneys have set a number of records in terms of the initiation of cases. Please consider the following:

- We have filed or litigated nine Section 2 lawsuits, including suits on behalf of African American, Hispanic, Asian American, and Native American voters. Two of these Section 2 cases were successfully won on appeal: one on behalf of African American voters and another on behalf of Native American voters. A tenth Section 2 matter was settled out of court without the necessity of filing suit; two other Section 2 vote dilution cases were authorized on behalf of African American voters but not pursued after African American candidates were elected to offices in those jurisdictions.

- We have undertaken the most vigorous enforcement of the language minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act in its history. Since 2001, the Division has filed more enforcement actions under Sections 4(e), 4(f)(4), and 203 than in the previous 26 years of the Act's history. We have filed more cases in 2005 than in any previous year – breaking the previous record set in 2004. The 15 lawsuits filed by this Administration have provided comprehensive minority language programs to more citizens than all previous lawsuits combined and have included the first lawsuits ever to protect Filipino and Vietnamese voters.

- Of the six lawsuits that have been filed under Section 208 of the Voting Rights Act in the entire history of the Act, four were filed by this Administration, including cases filed on behalf of Hispanic voters and Haitian American voters.

- During 2004, the Division conducted its largest election-monitoring program ever. We sent a total of 1,996 individuals (533 Department personnel and 1,463 federal observers from OPM) to monitor 163 elections in 105 political subdivisions in 29 states, which included the largest number of federal observers ever for any election on November 2, 2004 – 822 federal observers and 251 Division personnel in 86 political subdivisions in 25 states. This compares with the 743 individuals (103 Department personnel and 640 federal observers from OPM) sent to monitor 46 elections in 31 political subdivisions in 13 states during all of CY 2000. During 2005, the Division sent a total of 831 individuals (191 Department personnel and 640 federal observers from OPM) to monitor 47 elections in 36 political subdivisions in 14 states.

- The Division's responsibility to enforce several other federal voting rights statutes likewise has been successful. Under the National Voter Registration Act of 1993, this Administration has filed five lawsuits and resolved out of court compliance problems in two other jurisdictions. To vindicate the voting rights of citizens and soldiers serving abroad, the Division filed six enforcement actions in the first four years of this Administration under the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act, and two other federal enforcement lawsuits was only averted by jurisdictions when they took immediate measures to grant relief to affected voters. Our efforts to enforce both of these important voting laws have outpaced a comparable period of the prior Administration.

- The Division also has already filed four federal lawsuits to enforce compliance with the new Help America Vote Act (HAVA) of 2002, and last fall entered into an out of court agreement with the State of California to ensure its compliance with HAVA's statewide voter registration database requirement, a system that will cover the largest number of registered voters of any state in the country. For the past three years since the passage of HAVA, we have likewise engaged in outreach to state and local officials and other organizations all over the United States to explain the statutory requirements of this new legislation and to provide assistance in complying with the provisions.

As all of these facts illustrate, there has been no decline in our enforcement of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, or of the Nation's other voting rights laws. Rather, this Administration has an extraordinarily strong record of voting rights enforcement. The attorneys and staff of the Civil Rights Division - both career professionals and political appointees alike – have helped achieve major advancements for all Americans through the fair, faithful, and vigorous enforcement of our federal civil rights laws. We take great pride in these accomplishments.

D. Voting Rights

89. On March 16, 2006, we were notified that the Department of Justice had preccleared the election procedures submitted by the State of Louisiana for the April 22 New Orleans municipal elections. Given the apparent risk of disenfranchisement for the tens-of-thousands of citizens displaced by hurricane Katrina outside the state, what is the Department doing to protect their voting rights? More specifically, is the Department prepared to initiate legal action to compel the state to implement out-of-state satellite voting procedures similar to those made available for Iraqi citizens in their national elections?

ANSWER: The election procedures that we precleared for the April 22 New Orleans municipal elections were designed to ameliorate voting conditions for individuals displaced from their homes and the city because of Hurricane Katrina. These new procedures proposed by the State of Louisiana included early voting in 10 satellite locations throughout the State, as well as relaxed absentee voting procedures.

The bills enacted by the Louisiana legislature, which included many of the new provisions, enjoyed the endorsement of the Louisiana Legislative Black Caucus. In a February 25, 2006, letter, the Caucus characterized the creation of satellite voting locations within the State (but no such locations outside the State) as "a progressive effort to enfranchise displaced voters." The Caucus wrote: "The Louisiana Legislative Black Caucus fully supports the legislation and respectfully requests expeditious preclearance of the acts by the United States Department of Justice." Minority members of the Louisiana House and Senate were unanimous in voting for the three legislative bills with proposed changes in elections procedures.

There were some additional changes proposed by the Secretary of State in an Emergency Election plan on January 23, 2006. The Secretary of State's plan provided for measures such as additional voting machines, office space, staff and equipment to assist the City in the conduct of the elections; created a Baton Rouge mailing address for absentee applications and ballots to address mail delivery problems in New Orleans; and promulgated a voter outreach campaign (including mailings to displaced voters) and a media campaign both within and outside Louisiana to inform voters of their rights and election procedures. A majority of the Louisiana Legislative Black Caucus supported the Secretary of State's plan.

The Department of Justice, as a matter of law, has a narrow role in reviewing voting changes submitted by covered jurisdictions, like Louisiana, pursuant to Section 5. Our function and authority is limited to examining whether the change is retrogressive – that is, whether the purpose or effect of the change is to put racial minorities in a position inferior to the one they occupy under the status quo, as compared to non-minorities, vis a vis their ability to elect their candidates of choice. In this case, the law permitted the Department of Justice to object to the satellite voting procedures under Section 5 only if the Department determined that the State of Louisiana has not met its burden of showing that the position of minority voters in the 2006 New Orleans elections will not be worse with the changes that it would be without them. Just as the Louisiana Legislative Black Caucus voted in favor of these changes, the Department concluded that these changes helped minority voters.

We understand that some mistakenly perceive the role of the Department under Section 5 as far more expansive than it is. Under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act, the relevant legal question is not whether the procedures could be better. Rather, the sole Section 5 inquiry is whether New Orleans voters would be better off without the change. The Department lacks the legal authority to design a plan for New Orleans elections, or to demand that the State adopt a particular set of procedures, such as satellite voting locations outside the State, that it chose not to adopt.

Highly experienced voting rights counsel did bring legal action to compel the state to implement out-of-state satellite voting procedures. U.S. District Judge Ivan Lemelle found, however, that the unprecedented steps that the State had taken, including the establishment of a series of satellite voting locations across the State, satisfied the requirements of federal law. Given the decision of the Court, as well as the absence of any previous Voting Rights Act case of which we are aware that has gone so far as to require even those satellite voting steps taken by the State, we did not initiate a legal action.

The Civil Rights Division's work in New Orleans is ongoing. Department of Justice personnel monitored such satellite voting, as well as the conduct of the primary election in New Orleans on April 22, 2006. Department personnel also plan to monitor the May 20, 2006 run off election in New Orleans. The Voting Section is coordinating with civil rights groups on their efforts to assist displaced persons, and continues to work diligently to serve New Orleans voters. As always, we welcome any information you may have that will help us to do our job better.

90. Identify the name, filing date, and the affected racial or ethnic group of each case alleging a Voting Rights Act violation(s) that the Civil Rights Division has filed under the current Administration.

ANSWER: In addition to the Section 2 lawsuits discussed in response to Question 91, we have undertaken the most vigorous enforcement of the language minority provisions of the Voting Rights Act in its history. Since 2001, the Division has filed more enforcement actions under Sections 4(e), 4(f)(4), and 203 than in the previous 26 years of the Act's history. We have filed more cases in 2005 than in any previous year – breaking the previous record set in 2004. The 15 lawsuits filed by this Administration have provided comprehensive minority language programs to more citizens than all previous lawsuits combined and have included the first lawsuits ever to protect Filipino and Vietnamese voters. Our language minority cases include the following:

- United States v. Orange County, FL; filed 6/28/02; Hispanic
- United States v. Berks County, PA; filed 2/25/03; Hispanic
- United States v. Brentwood Union Free School District, NY; filed 6/4/03; Hispanic
- United States v. San Benito County, CA; filed 5/26/04; Hispanic
- United States v. San Diego County, CA; filed 6/23/04; Hispanic and Filipino (relief also obtained for Vietnamese)
- United States v. Suffolk County, NY; filed 6/29/04; Hispanic
- United States v. Yakima County, WA; filed 7/6/04; Hispanic
- United States v. Ventura County, CA; filed 8/4/04; Hispanic
- United States v. Westchester County, NY; filed 1/19/05; Hispanic
- United States v. City of Azusa, CA; filed 7/14/05; Hispanic
- United States v. City of Paramount, CA; filed 7/14/05; Hispanic
- United States v. City of Rosemead, CA; filed 7/14/05; Hispanic and Chinese and Vietnamese
- United States v. City of Boston, MA; filed 7/29/05; Hispanic and Chinese and Vietnamese
- United States v. Ector County, TX; filed 8/23/05; Hispanic
- United States v. Hale County, TX; filed 2/27/06; Hispanic

In addition, of the six lawsuits that have been filed under Section 208 of the Voting Rights Act in the entire history of the Act, four were filed by this Administration, including cases filed on behalf of Hispanic voters and Haitian American voters. Our Section 208 cases include the following:

- United States v. Miami-Dade County, FL; filed 6/17/02; African American (Haitian)
- United States v. Osceola County, FL; filed 6/28/02; Hispanic
- United States v. Berks County, PA; filed 2/25/03; Hispanic
- United States v. Hale County, TX; filed 2/27/06; Hispanic

91. Identify the name, filing date, and the affected racial or ethnic group of each case alleging vote dilution under Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act that the Civil Rights Division has filed under the current Administration.

ANSWER: During this Administration, the Civil Rights Division has filed or litigated nine Section 2 lawsuits, including suits on behalf of African American, Hispanic, and Native American voters. Two of these Section 2 cases were successfully won on appeal: one on behalf of African American voters and another on behalf of Native American voters. A tenth Section 2 matter was settled out of court without the necessity of filing suit; two other Section 2 vote dilution cases were authorized on behalf of African American voters but not pursued after African American candidates were elected to offices in those jurisdictions.

Cases filed during this Administration involving vote dilution include:

- United States v. Crockett County, TN; filed 4/17/01; African American
- United States v. Alamosa County, CO; filed 11/27/01; Hispanic
- United States v. Osceola County, FL; filed 7/18/05; Hispanic

Cases filed during this Administration involving vote denial include:

- United States v. Osceola County, FL; filed 6/28/02; Hispanic
- United States v. Berks County, PA; filed 2/25/03; Hispanic
- United States v. Brown (Noxubee County, MS); filed 2/17/05; White
- United States v. City of Boston, MA; filed 7/29/05; Hispanic, Chinese, and Vietnamese
- United States v. Long County, GA; filed 2/08/06; Hispanic

92. Identify the number of times under the current Administration that the Assistant Attorney General (or the individual designated to act as Assistant Attorney General) has not agreed with the recommendation of the Voting Section to interpose a Section 5 objection.

ANSWER: As stated above, the Department has a long-standing policy against disclosure of internal deliberations.

93. Identify the number of times under the current Administration that the Assistant Attorney General (or the individual designated to act as Assistant Attorney General) has not agreed with the recommendation of the Voting Section to bring a lawsuit.

ANSWER: As stated above, the Department has a long-standing policy against disclosure of internal deliberations. As noted above, attorneys in the Voting Rights Section have, in fact, set a number of records in terms of the initiation of cases.

94. Identify the number of times under the current Administration that the Assistant Attorney General (or the individual designated to act as Assistant Attorney General) has not agreed with the recommendation of the Voting Section to cover an election.

ANSWER: As stated above, the Department has a long-standing policy against disclosure of internal deliberations. We do note that the Division has maintained the most robust election monitoring program in its history.

During 2004, the Division conducted its largest election-monitoring program ever. We sent a total of 1,996 individuals (533 Department personnel and 1,463 federal observers from OPM) to monitor 163 elections in 105 political subdivisions in 29 states. This compares with the 743 individuals (103 Department personnel and 640 federal observers from OPM) sent to monitor 46 elections in 31 political subdivisions in 13 states during all of CY 2000. The Division similarly had an extraordinary level of election monitoring for "off-year" in 2005. The Division sent a total of 831 individuals (191 Department personnel and 640 federal observers from OPM) to monitor 47 elections in 36 political subdivisions in 14 states.

95. For every recommendation made by the Voting Section from 2002- 2005 to bring a Section 2 vote dilution lawsuit, identify the number of days that elapsed between the date the recommendation was first received by the "front office" (or, if that date cannot be identified, the date of the recommendation in the J-Memo) and the date that Assistant Attorney General (or the individual designated to act as Assistant Attorney General) either approved or disapproved the recommendation. To the extent that there are recommendations made in 2002 - 2005 which are still pending, indicate how long those recommendations have been pending.

ANSWER: As stated above, the Department has a long-standing policy against disclosure of internal deliberations.

E. Employment Discrimination Cases

96. The issue currently before the Supreme Court in Burlington Northern and Santa Fe Railway v. White, Docket No. 05-0259, is what type of employer conduct rises to the level of unlawful retaliation. The civil rights community has urged the Court to uphold the standard developed by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, the federal agency tasked with enforcing Title VII. Under the EEOC standard, employers would be prohibited from taking any action "reasonably likely to deter the exercise of rights under Title VII." This standard would provide broad protection against retaliation. This is the position the EEOC has argued for in the courts, and indeed, in the lower court in this case. The U.S. Department of Justice rejected the EEOC standard. Instead, the government's brief to the Supreme Court endorsed a more stringent standard. Under this more stringent standard, employers would be liable only for retaliation that took the form of a "materially adverse change in terms of employment." Please explain why DOJ rejected the standard advocated by the EEOC?

ANSWER: In the amicus brief that it filed with the Supreme Court in this case, the United States argued that the term "discriminate" in Title VII's anti-retaliation provision must be read consistently with the statute's core anti-discrimination provision, which prohibits discrimination in employment on the basis of race, sex, national origin, or religion. As discussed more fully in its amicus brief, the United States determined that this position is the correct interpretation based on the text and structure of Title VII. A majority of the circuits that have decided the issue -- the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 6th, and 11th -- have reached the same conclusion. A copy of the United States's amicus brief, which sets forth fully its position in this case, may be found at: www.usdoj.gov/osg/briefs/2005/3mer/1ami/2005-0259.mer.ami.html.

VII. Special Counsel

97. You have never seen fit to appoint an outside special counsel under 28 C.F.R. part 600 to investigate the possible commission of crimes by Administration officials, including: (1) torture in Iraq, Afghanistan, and Guantanamo Bay by U.S. military personnel and military contractors; (2) the Thomas Noe fundraising scandal in Ohio; (3) the demotion of U.S. Attorney Frederick Black for investigating Jack Abramoff; and (4) the potentially unconstitutional wiretapping of U.S. citizens without court orders. Similarly, Attorney General Ashcroft refused to appoint special counsels for: (1) fraudulent Halliburton activities; (2) Iraqi prisoner abuse; (3) Westar Energy for potential bribery; and (4) Enron accounting fraud. On December 30, 2003, then-Deputy Attorney General James B. Comey, in the position of Acting Attorney General, delegated to U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald the powers of the Attorney General for purposes of the CIA name leak investigation. According to Mr. Comey's letter to Mr. Fitzgerald, this appointment was made pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 508-10, 515 (not 28 C.F.R. part 600). Is it your contention that, even if the President or Vice President were subjects or targets of investigation, you could investigate them impartially and without the need for an outside special counsel under 28 C.F.R. part 600?

ANSWER: The Department of Justice and the Attorney General place a high priority on achieving just results and assuring the public that the nation's laws are being enforced fairly and impartially. The bedrock of our effort to do so is the Department's reliance on experienced and dedicated career prosecutors who handle difficult and sensitive matters on a daily basis. Those prosecutors have been, and will continue to be, the front line in our effort to enforce the law.

As you noted, title 28 U.S.C. §§ 508-510 and 515 provide statutory mechanisms for the Attorney General to delegate authority to other prosecutors within the Department of Justice in appropriate circumstances. In addition, Department of Justice regulations, 28 C.F.R. § 600, et seq., provide a mechanism for the Attorney General to appoint an attorney outside the Department of Justice to act as a Special Counsel if investigation or prosecution by Department of Justice attorneys would present a conflict of interest or other extraordinary circumstance, and if the Attorney General determines that it would be in the public interest to do so. The Special Counsel regulations were designed as a replacement for the former Independent Counsel Act, which required mandatory appointment of Independent Counsels, many of whom continued for lengthy terms at substantial cost to the taxpayers. By contrast, the Special Counsel regulations make clear that the Attorney General is responsible for determining whether the public interest would best be served by allowing the appropriate office within the Department of Justice to handle a matter according to the normal and well-established process, or by removing the matter from the Department's normal processes.

Over the past several years, there have been a number of matters in which there have been calls for the recusal of the Attorney General or the appointment of an outside Special Counsel. As you noted, those matters have included the investigation of the activities of Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff and corporate fraud involving Enron. In each instance, the matters have been handled fairly, appropriately, and impartially by dedicated career professionals in the Department of Justice, and the Attorney General has taken all steps that are necessary to insure public confidence in the fairness of the investigation. In these matters, the Attorney General has determined that the public interest would best be served by allowing experienced career prosecutors to handle the matters according to well-established Department of Justice procedures and principles. Those career professionals have conducted thorough and complete investigations without interference, and they have brought charges where they deemed appropriate. I have every confidence that they will continue to do so.

In one instance, former Deputy Attorney General James Comey used the provisions of title 28 to authorize United States Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald to handle the investigation regarding the leak of information regarding the identity of a CIA operative. As you know, charges have been brought against a high-ranking White House official, and Mr. Fitzgerald's professionalism, integrity, and impartiality are beyond question.

I do not believe that it would be appropriate for me to address questions regarding hypothetical situations involving allegations against the President or Vice President. However, I assure you that I will continue to uphold the highest standards of ethics in the enforcement of federal law, and that I will take all steps that are necessary to insure public confidence in the outcome of matters that are handled by the Department of Justice. If a circumstance arises in which the public interest would best be served by the appointment of a Special Counsel, I will not hesitate to do so.

98. Have there been any instances since President Bush took office in which there has been disagreement within the Justice Department about whether a special counsel should be appointed pursuant to 28 C.F.R. part 600; more specifically, have there been situations where Department officials or employees have argued in favor of the Attorney General exercising his authority under 28 C.F.R. part 600? If so, please describe the investigation or allegations in question.

ANSWER: It would not be appropriate for me to provide information regarding the Department of Justice's internal deliberative processes regarding the potential appointment of a Special Counsel under 28 C.F.R. § 600, et.seq. Moreover, it would not be practical for me to assess which officials, among the Department's many employees, may have argued in favor of the appointment of a Special Counsel in any particular situation. I can assure you, however, that I have been and will continue to be dedicated to doing whatever is in the public interest. I will continue to uphold the highest standards of ethics in the enforcement of federal law, and I will take all steps that are necessary to insure public confidence in the outcome of matters that are handled by the Department of Justice

VIII. Scope of Presidential Authority

99. The Justice Department has claimed that the President is permitted to authorize domestic surveillance without court orders as a result of (1) his inherent authority as Commander-in-Chief and (2) his statutory authority under the Authorization for Use of Military Force. The purported statutory rationale is that the Use of Force explicitly authorizes military action against suspected terrorist and, therefore, implicitly authorizes any lesser action against suspected terrorists, such as surveillance. Would it be the position of the Department that the Commander-in-Chief has inherent constitutional authority to engage the U.S. Armed Forces against suspected terrorists living within or visiting the territory of the United States? If so, what action(s) would such authority encompass (i.e, military detention of such suspected terrorists, targeted killing of such suspected terrorists)?

ANSWER: We do not contend that because the Force Resolution "authorizes military action against suspected terrorists [it], therefore, implicitly authorizes any lesser action against suspected terrorists, such as surveillance." Rather, it is the position of the United States, confirmed by a majority of the Supreme Court in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507 (2004), that when Congress authorized the President to use "use all necessary and appropriate force" against those responsible for the September 11th attacks, it also authorized use of the "fundamental and accepted" incidents of waging war. Id. at 518 (plurality opinion); see id. at 587 (Thomas, J., dissenting). Just as capturing and detaining enemy combatants is a fundamental and accepted incident of waging war, see Hamdi, signals intelligence has long been recognized to be a basic tool of warfare to ensure our troops are not fighting blind. Consistent with this traditional understanding, other Presidents, including Woodrow Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt, have interpreted general force authorization resolutions to permit warrantless surveillance to intercept suspected enemy communications. Cf. Curtis A. Bradley & Jack L. Goldsmith, Congressional Authorization and the War on Terrorism, 118 Harv. L. Rev. 2048, 2091 (2005) (explaining that, with the Force Resolution, "Congress intended to authorize the President to take at least those actions permitted by the laws of war"). The terms of the Force Resolution must be understood in light of that historical practice.

It is the position of the United States that the President's inherent authority, confirmed and supplemented by the Force Resolution, authorizes the detention of enemy combatant terrorists in military custody, even if captured within the United States. That view has been embraced by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit. See Padilla v. Hanft, 423 F.3d 386 (4th Cir. 2005); cert. denied, 126 S. Ct. 1649 (2006). The same authorities also clearly authorize the use of force against al Qaeda terrorists within the United States.

In the Force Resolution, Congress expressly recognized that the September 11th attacks "render it both necessary and appropriate that the United States exercise its rights to self-defense and to protect United States citizens both at home and abroad." Force Resolution pmbl. (emphasis added). Congress concluded that the attacks "continue to pose an unusual and extraordinary threat to the national security." Id. Congress affirmed that "the President has authority under the Constitution to take action to deter and prevent actions of international terrorism against the United States." Id. (emphasis added). Accordingly, Congress authorized the President "to use all necessary and appropriate force against those" associated with the attacks "in order to prevent future acts of international terrorism against the United States." Id. (emphasis added). It is unclear from your question which forms of force you are inquiring about. If by "targeted killings," you mean "assassination," we have previously responded to Senator Feingold that that hypothetical question is far removed from the very well established authority of nations to engage in signals intelligence during military conflict.

The plain language of the Force Resolution clearly encompasses action within the United States. In addition, when Congress passed the Force Resolution on September 14, 2001, the World Trade Center was still burning, combat air patrols were flying over many American cities, and there was great concern that another attack would follow shortly. Further, the attacks of September 11th were launched on United States soil by foreign agents who had been living in this country. Given this context and the plain meaning of the Force Resolution, Congress must be understood as having ratified the President's authority to use force within the United States. A crucial responsibility of the President—charged by the Force Resolution and the Constitution to defend our Nation—was and is to identify and disable those enemies, especially if they are in the United States, waiting to strike.

100. Is it the position of the Department that the Authorization for Use of Military Force authorizes the President to engage the U.S. Armed Forces against suspected terrorists living within or visiting the territory of the United States? If so, what action(s) would such authority encompass (i.e, military detention of such suspected terrorists, targeted killing of such suspected terrorists)?

ANSWER: Please see the answer to question 99 above.

101. Has the Department provided any legal opinion or other memorandum to the President analyzing any inherent constitutional or statutory authority to engage the U.S. Armed Forces against suspected terrorists living within or visiting the territory of the United States? If so, please provide a copy of such opinion or memorandum.

ANSWER: Any such opinions would constitute the confidential legal advice of the Executive Branch and would reflect the Branch's internal deliberative process. We are not able to discuss the contents of confidential legal advice.

102. The White House has asserted that the President has the authority to declassify information at will. White House Press Secretary, Press Briefing by Scott McClellan (Apr. 7, 2006). Without regard to any specific instance, is the President similarly empowered to declassify the identities of current covert agents of the United States?

ANSWER: The Supreme Court has expressly stated that the President's foreign affairs powers and his role as Commander in Chief give him considerable authority over the protection and dissemination of classified information: The President's "authority to classify and control access to information bearing on national security and to determine whether an individual is sufficiently trustworthy to occupy a position in the Executive Branch that will give that person access to such information flows primarily from this constitutional investment of power in the President and exists quite apart from any explicit congressional grant." Department of the Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518, 527 (1988) (emphasis added). Both the Court's opinion in Egan and longstanding Executive Branch practice support the conclusion that the Constitution grants the President plenary authority to determine whether national security considerations require the classification or declassification of particular information.

103. When declassifying information, what procedures does the President follow? How can those procedures be changed? Do the procedures differ based upon type of classified information in question? If so, in what manner?

ANSWER: The currently applicable procedures within the Executive Branch generally governing the classification and declassification of information by officers within the Executive Branch are set forth in Executive Order 13292, which was issued on March 25, 2003

104. Last week Congressman Jane Harman and Congressman John Conyers, Jr. wrote to you and asked that you rescind the signing statement that accompanied the PATRIOT Act reauthorization. The statement claimed that the unilateral authority for the President permits him to ignore new reporting requirements in that bill. Can you please explain under what authority the President can single-handedly ignore a valid law passed by the United States Congress?

ANSWER: We respectfully disagree with your statement that the President's signing statement indicates that he was "single-handedly ignor[ing] a valid law passed by . . . Congress." The President's signing statement was both entirely consistent with his duties under the Constitution and with the actions of past Presidents of both parties.

The Constitution requires the President to take an oath to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution," and directs him to "take care that the Laws be faithfully executed." U.S. Const., Art. II, §§ 1, 2. When Congress passes legislation containing provisions that could be construed as contrary to well settled constitutional principles, or which could be applied in a manner that is plainly unconstitutional, the President can and should take steps to ensure that such laws are interpreted and executed in a manner consistent with the Constitution. As Attorney General Benjamin R. Civiletti, Attorney General during the Carter Administration, wrote, "the President's constitutional duty does not require him to execute unconstitutional statutes; nor does it require him to execute them provisionally, against the day that they are declared unconstitutional by the courts." Attorney General's Duty to Defend and Enforce Constitutionally Objectionable Legislation, 4A Op. O.L.C. 55, 59 (1980). Using a presidential signing statement to give a potentially problematic provision in a bill a construction that renders it constitutional does not represent an affront to Congress; rather, it gives greater effect to Congress's will than simply vetoing the legislation, or tacitly declining to enforce a provision (as other Presidents have done). As Assistant Attorney General Walter Dellinger explained early in the Clinton Administration, the practice of issuing a signing statement to construe a statutory provision to ensure its constitutionality is "analogous to the Supreme Court's practice of construing statutes, where possible, to avoid holding them unconstitutional." The Legal Significance of Presidential Signing Statements, 17 Op. O.L.C. 131, 133 (1993) (available at http://www.usdoj.gov/ olc/signing.htm). Thus, as Assistant Attorney General Dellinger noted, "[s]igning statements have frequently expressed the President's intention to construe or administer a statute in a particular manner (often to save the statute from unconstitutionality)." Id. at 132 (emphasis added). "[S]igning statements of this kind can be found as early as the Jackson and Tyler administrations, and later Presidents, including Lincoln, Andrew Johnson, Theodore Roosevelt, Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt, Truman, Eisenhower, Lyndon Johnson, Nixon, Ford and Carter, also engaged in the practice." Id. at 138; cf. Presidential Authority to Decline to Execute Unconstitutional Statutes, 18 Op. O.L.C. 199, 202 (1994) (memorandum opinion of Assistant Attorney General Walter Dellinger) ("[E]very President since Eisenhower has issued signing statements in which he stated that he would refuse to execute unconstitutional provisions") (available at http://www.usdoj.gov/olc/nonexcut.htm).

When the President signed the PATRIOT Act reauthorization into law, he stated that the legislation would "help us continue to fight terrorism effectively and to combat the use of the illegal drug methamphetamine that is ruining too many lives." The President indicated that the Executive Branch would construe the provisions that may involve "furnishing information to entities outside the executive branch, such as sections 106A and 119, in a manner consistent with the President's constitutional authority to supervise the unitary executive branch and to withhold information the disclosure of which could impair foreign relations, national security, the deliberative processes of the Executive, or the performance of the Executive's constitutional duties." The two sections of the USA PATRIOT Act specifically mentioned in the signing statement involved audits of the use of certain business records and National Security Letters. Although neither of the provisions of the law the President signed themselves required disclosure of classified information, it was foreseeable that such information might be disclosed during the course of such audits. In the signing statement, the President simply indicated that he would construe the Act, which was itself silent on the point, in a manner to safeguard information the disclosure of which could impair foreign relations or national security.

That signing statement also served as an instruction to those in the Executive Branch to safeguard that information.

That instruction is fully consistent with the well established principle, explicitly recognized by the Supreme Court, that the President has the power to "supervise and guide [Executive officers'] construction of the statutes under which they act in order to secure that unitary and uniform execution of the laws which Article II of the Constitution evidently contemplated in vesting general executive power in the President alone," Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 135 (1926). It was particularly appropriate that the President take such action here to safeguard classified information: as the Supreme Court has recognized, the President has the "authority to classify and control access to information bearing on national security." Department of the Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518, 527 (1988) (citations omitted). That authority, the Supreme Court has noted, "flows primarily from this constitutional investment of power in the President and exists quite apart from any explicit congressional grant." Id. (emphasis added).

In accordance with Assistant Attorney General Dellinger's opinion, President Clinton issued signing statements addressing constitutional issues with respect to 105 laws he signed, see Christopher Kelley, A Comparative Look at the Constitutional Signing Statement 18 (2003) (available at http://mpsa.indiana.edu/conf2003papers/ 1031858822), including several that are virtually identical to the one the President issued here. See, e.g., Statement of President Clinton on Signing the Intelligence Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1999 (Dec. 3, 1999) ("H.R. 1555 provides that '[n]o department or agency of the Government may withhold information from the [National Commission for the Review of the National Reconnaissance Office] on the grounds that providing the information to the Commission would constitute the unauthorized disclosure of classified information or information relating to intelligence sources or methods.' I do not read this provision to detract from my constitutional authority, including my authority over national security information."); Statement of President Clinton on Signing the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2000 (Oct. 5, 1999) ("A number of other provisions of this bill raise serious constitutional concerns. Because the President is the Commander in Chief and the Chief Executive under the Constitution, the Congress may not interfere with the President's duty to protect classified and other sensitive national security information or his responsibility to control the disclosure of such information by subordinate officials of the executive branch (sections 1042, 3150, and 3164). . . . To the extent that these provisions conflict with my constitutional responsibilities in these areas, I will construe them where possible to avoid such conflicts, and where it is impossible to do so, I will treat them as advisory. I hereby direct all executive branch officials to do likewise."); Statement of President Clinton on Signing the Intelligence Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1998 (Nov. 20, 1997) ("So that this provision [section 307] cannot be construed to detract from my constitutional authority and responsibility to protect national security and other privileged information as I determine necessary, and so that the provision does not require the release of information that is properly classified, I direct that it be interpreted consistent with my constitutional authority and with applicable laws and executive orders."); Statement of President Clinton on Signing the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1998 (Nov. 18, 1997) ("Other provisions of H.R. 1119 raise serious constitutional issues. Because of the President's constitutional role, the Congress may not prevent the President from controlling the disclosure of classified and other sensitive information by subordinate officials of the executive branch (section 1305). . . . These provisions will be construed and carried out in keeping with the President's constitutional responsibilities."). Indeed, President Clinton's use of signing statements to give narrowing constructions to provisions he believed to raise constitutional concerns has been praised in Congress. See, e.g., Cong. Rec. 151 Cong. Rec. E357-03, E357 (Mar. 2, 2005) (statement of Rep. Scott); 151 Cong. Rec. H8264, H8272 (Sept. 22, 2005) (statement of Rep. Scott)

IX. Anti-Torture Act

105. The Justice Department has proven itself incapable of conducting a full and fair investigation of violations of the Anti-Torture Act and other federal criminal laws against torture and abuse. The Justice Department is the only law enforcement agency that has the legal authority to prosecute civilians for violations of federal laws against torture and abuse. However, despite numerous government-produced documents alleging criminal acts by civilians, including civilian CIA agents and private contractors, the Justice Department has brought only one indictment, of a civilian contractor, David A. Passaro, who was indicted by the U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of North Carolina nearly two years ago. When your predecessor, Attorney General John Ashcroft, announced the indictment of Passaro on June 17, 2004, he also said that "the Justice Department has received one referral from the Department of Defense and additional referrals from the CIA." The Justice Department acknowledged to Senator Durbin, during the confirmation hearing for Paul McNulty for Deputy Attorney General, that it has received eleven referrals of civilians from the Defense Department and nine from the CIA. Based on autopsy reports provided through the Freedom of Information Act litigation, several autopsy reports list the cause of death as "homicide" and relate to incidents that involved civilians employed by the federal government. However, nearly two years after Ashcroft's announcement of a plan for the investigation and prosecution of civilians alleged to have committed torture or abuse, there have been no additional indictments. During this same period, military prosecutors have charged and prosecuted dozens of soldiers for the same criminal conduct. Privates and sergeants are being marched off to jail, while government civilians and the people at the top remain free--or are getting better jobs. Given your own role in the development of the government's torture policies, have you recused yourself from decisions on whether and how to investigate and prosecute civilians referred by other agencies?

ANSWER: Pending OAG/OLA/ODAG

106. Why have there been no indictments of civilians by the Justice Department in the nearly two years since Attorney General Ashcroft announced the protocol for investigation and prosecution of allegations of torture or abuse by civilians?

ANSWER: The Department of Justice takes allegations of torture or abuse by civilians seriously, and we have and will continue to vigorously investigate any allegations of torture or other abuse using all appropriate investigative tools. Be assured that allegations involving abuse by civilians of which we are aware, and for which we have jurisdiction to prosecute, have been and will continue to be investigated thoroughly by the Eastern District of Virginia Task Force. If evidence is developed in any cases sufficient to sustain proof beyond a reasonable doubt of a federal offense, those cases will be charged and prosecuted.

QUESTIONS FROM REPRESENTATIVE NADLER

I. Bankruptcy

107. With respect to bankruptcy law enforcement, how many criminal referrals have been made by the U.S. Trustee program in each of the last five years? What is the disposition of these referrals? What is the Department's current policy on enforcement of bankruptcy crimes?

ANSWER: The chart below provides the number of criminal referrals made by the United States Trustee Program (USTP or Program) over the past five fiscal years. In addition to the 744 formal referrals made in FY 2005, which represent a 12 percent increase over FY 2004, the Program also assisted law enforcement and prosecutors in investigating and prosecuting an additional 300 bankruptcy-related matters separate from USTP referrals.

USTP CRIMINAL REFERRALS BY FISCAL YEAR
FY 2001	FY 2002	FY 2003	FY 2004	FY 2005
1,059	939	817	660	744

Prior to FY 2005, the Program did not have a comprehensive database for collecting the full range of data related to its criminal referrals. Effective in FY 2005, however, all 95 USTP offices began reporting criminal referral information using a new Criminal Enforcement Tracking System (CETS). CETS provides more comprehensive data and allows for the analysis of criminal referral activity, including disposition information, in a reliable and accessible electronic format. Since inception, the system has undergone several upgrades and the Program continues to evaluate areas for improvement.

To enhance the completeness and accuracy of criminal referral case and disposition information, the Program is working with the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys to obtain data from its case tracking system. Similarly, efforts are underway with the Bureau of Justice Statistics to collect federal court data that includes criminal case disposition information. At present, the relevant data from both sources must be manually reviewed and compared, although opportunities for the electronic transfer of information between the systems are being explored. Finally, the Program has developed and piloted an efficient data collection instrument to assist in the gathering of criminal referral disposition data by each of the Program's field offices. The anticipated result of these ongoing efforts is that criminal referral disposition data will be tracked systematically by the Program in a variety of ways, thereby enabling the Program to meet the new annual reporting requirements recently enacted by the Congress.

The chart below shows the outcome data for FY 2005 referrals available to the Program as of December 2005.

OUTCOME/DISPOSITION OF FY 2005 REFERRALS	NUMBER OF CASES
Prosecution Declined by U.S. Attorney's Office	90
With Investigative Agency	82
Under Review in U.S. Attorney's Office	539
Formal Charges Filed (Case Still Active)	18
Formal Charges Filed (Case Closed)	15

For fiscal years 2001 through 2004, Program records indicate that criminal referrals averaged more than 100 convictions or guilty pleas annually. Acquittals during the same period occurred in less than three percent of disposed cases.

Criminal enforcement aimed at combating bankruptcy-related crimes continues to be a priority of the USTP. In 2003, the Program established a special unit with four experienced criminal prosecutors to provide leadership of its referral and prosecution assistance responsibilities. Additionally, about 25 staff attorneys have been designated as Special Assistant U.S. Attorneys to assist U.S. Attorney's offices in prosecuting cases. The Program has also done extensive outreach and training. This past year alone, the Program conducted or participated in over 50 training programs that reached more than 1,500 employees, private trustees, prosecutors, and law enforcement agents through courses conducted at the National Advocacy Center and local training seminars. The Program also recently commenced a study with the National Institute of Justice and a group of outside experts aimed at identifying and measuring bankruptcy-related fraud, abuse, and errors.

The Department of Justice is fully committed to investigating and prosecuting bankruptcy crimes. The Department sponsors a National Bankruptcy Fraud Working Group that assists in coordinating a national response to bankruptcy fraud issues, and encourages the formation of inter-agency bankruptcy fraud working groups at the local level. Members of the local working groups include representatives from the United States Attorneys' offices, the United States Trustee Program, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Postal Inspection Service, HUD's Office of the Inspector General, the IRS's Criminal Investigation Division, as well as other federal agencies. In addition, the Department of Justice has satisfied its obligations under 18 U.S.C. § 158, and has designated an Assistant United States Attorney in every judicial district and an FBI agent from every field office to have primary responsibility for investigating and prosecuting bankruptcy fraud violations.

108. What efforts has the Justice Department made to ensure that individual debtors who are not English Language Proficient are able to comply with the credit counseling and debtor education provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act? In the absence of such assistance, has the U.S. Trustee program sought dismissal of a case filed by such an individual, or objected to a discharge, because that individual was unable tom comply with section 109(g), 727(a)(11) & (12), or 1328(g) of the Bankruptcy Code?

ANSWER: The U.S. Trustee Program (USTP or Program) is the Department's component charged with implementation of the provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, including the approval of credit counseling agencies and debtor education providers. The USTP has encouraged providers of those services to expand their language capabilities and will be exploring other options to ensure easier access to credit counselors and debtor educators.

Currently, credit counseling and debtor education services are offered in a total of 22 languages in various judicial districts throughout the country. There is at least one national provider who will arrange for translation services at no cost to the consumer and three others who offer services in Spanish at all of their locations and over the phone. The Program also permits individuals with limited English proficiency (LEP) to have members of volunteer community groups, friends, relatives, and family members act as interpreters. Further, in order to facilitate matching consumers with approved providers who offer language services, the USTP recently compiled data on additional languages offered by every credit counseling agency and debtor education provider, and this information is posted on the Program's public Web site.

The USTP has filed approximately 950 motions to dismiss consumer bankruptcy cases for failure to file a credit counseling certificate. When such motions are filed, the Program generally is not aware of the debtor's reasons for failure to comply with the filing requirement. Field offices have been directed to be judicious in bringing and prosecuting cases regarding deficiencies related to credit counseling, especially as the debtor's bar is in the learning phase of the new requirements. Although not specifically tracked, anecdotal information suggests that there have been only a handful of cases where a debtor has requested relief from the credit counseling requirement because of LEP.

Finally, USTP records reveal only a small number of actions brought by its attorneys to date under section 727(a)(11) or section 1328(g) to deny a discharge for failure to fulfill the debtor education requirement. None of those actions related to the inability of a debtor to receive a course in financial management due to LEP. Under extant court rules, in the absence of proof of debtor education, the clerk of court generally will close a case without entering a discharge. The debtor may then later reopen the case, file proof of debtor education, and receive a discharge.

II. Law Enforcement in Hurricane Katrina-Affected Region

109. What is the Department doing with respect to criminal conduct connected with violations of the wage and hour laws, intentional fraud, threats of violence and actual violence against workers seeking to enforce their rights, especially in cases involving direct or indirect employment by federal contractors involved in the rebuilding effort following Hurricane Katrina?

ANSWER: The Wage and Hour Division (WHD) of the U.S. Department of Labor is a member of the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force. At the April 24, 2006 meeting of the Task Force's Command Center, WHD representatives briefed Task Force members on WHD's authority under the Fair Labor Standards Act, the Davis-Bacon Act, and other laws for which WHD has responsibility, and on the Katrina-related issues they will be examining. The Task Force fully expects that as WHD investigators find evidence of possible criminal violations of labor laws or other federal statutes, they will promptly coordinate with Command Center representatives and make appropriate referrals to criminal investigative agencies."

QUESTIONS FROM REPRESENTATIVE SANCHEZ

I. Voting Rights

110. As you may know, the Department of Justice entered into an agreement with the California Secretary of State on implementing the statewide voter database requirements of the Help America Vote Act (HAVA). This unique agreement resulted in the establishment of procedures for processing voter registration forms that has proven to be highly problematic in practice. Across the state of California, 26 percent of all voter registration forms between January 1 and March 15 2006 have been declared invalid by the California Secretary of State's office. In highly urbanized Los Angeles County, this number is as high as 43 percent. Before the implementation of this new system, the number of truly false or otherwise invalid registrations was less than one percent. Clearly the new system for processing voter registration forms is invalidating legitimate voters and will potentially disenfranchise tens of thousands of voters, including many who have voted for years and who attempted to re-register in a good-faith effort to update their registration with a new address, change in party affiliation or change in name due to marriage. It is my understanding that the problem is not with HAVA itself, but rather the unique way in which the California Secretary of the State is implementing the law, in accordance with an agreement reached with the U.S. Department of Justice. Considering the problems arising from the DOJ-California Secretary of State agreement, do you disagree with the claim by Bradley J. Schlozman, Acting Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division, that it is "a model for other states"?

ANSWER: The agreement reached with California is fully consistent with HAVA's requirements. The reported problems the State has experienced with its new statewide voter registration list are not a result of the Agreement; rather, as we understand the alleged problem, it involved a question of California law.

The specific legal issue involved the "matching criteria" that were being utilized by counties, pursuant to regulation of the Secretary of State, in order to verify information provided by voter registration applicants on their applications. Under Section 303(a)(5) of HAVA, as of January 1, 2006, a state cannot accept or process a voter registration application for an election for federal office unless that application includes the applicant's driver's license number or the last 4 digits of the applicant's social security number (where the applicant does not have a driver's license number). In those cases where an applicant has neither number, the state is required to assign to the applicant a unique identification number.

It is our understanding that, prior to January 1, 2006, under California state law, neither number was required to be supplied by applicants on a voter registration form. Pursuant to state legislation enacted in 2005, effective January 1, 2006, voter registration applicants are required to supply such number(s) for the first time. Concurrent with our Agreement with the state, the Secretary of State's office drafted regulations to implement the new voter registration database. Based on what we understand to be that Office's interpretation of existing state law, these regulations required that where a new voter registration application did not contain either identification number required under HAVA, and a check of the state's motor vehicle records indicated a possible match with a person in that system, counties were to make contact with applicants to verify the driver's license number and complete the registration process. Apparently, as many new applicants after January 1 neglected to place such numbers on forms, the verification workload for the counties increased, in some cases dramatically. The failure of so many voters to supply their driver's license number does not appear to have been anticipated.

Most recently, we have been advised by the state of California that, based on an interpretation of the pertinent state law by the office of state legislative counsel, the Secretary of State has determined that state law does not require such personal contact for purposes of verification in certain instances, and that a technological "fix" can be and has been made to the voter registration system which should reduce substantially the number of registration applications subject to personal verification. We have also been advised by the Secretary of State that emergency regulations to formalize the change are being processed. We have informed the Secretary of State that we have no objection to the proposed change.

111. Considering the difficulties being experienced in California, will you direct subordinates in your department to not enter in any such agreements with other states?

ANSWER: No. As set forth above, the reported problems the State has experienced with its new statewide voter registration list are not a result of the Agreement; rather, as we understand the alleged problem, it involved a question of California law.

112. The agreement your department entered into with the California Secretary of State goes beyond what is required under HAVA. Other states that didn't enter into such an agreement with your department are experiencing much lower rejection rates. Why did your department impose such an agreement on California?

ANSWER: The agreement reached with California is fully consistent with HAVA's requirements. The agreement was entered into initially when the state reported to the Department that they would not meet the HAVA deadlines; they then offered to enter into an agreement to memorialize their plans to comply with HAVA. The reported problems the state has experienced with its new statewide voter registration list are not a result of the Agreement; rather, as we understand the alleged problem, it involved a question of California law.

113. Can the State of California unilaterally change the agreement if it realizes it's too restrictive and denying eligible voters the right to register to vote?

ANSWER: As indicated above, we understand that California has changed its matching criteria for voter registration applicant verification and we have advised the state that we have no objection to this change.

114. Does the State of California risk being sued by your department if it changes its regulations?

ANSWER: As indicated above, we understand that California has changed its matching criteria for voter registration applicant verification and we have advised the state that we have no objection to this change.

115. Does the State of California risk being sued by your department if it passes a law to override the regulations?

ANSWER: As indicated above, we understand that California has changed its matching criteria for voter registration applicant verification and we have advised the state that we have no objection to this change.

QUESTIONS FROM REPRESENTATIVE WEXLER

I. Civil Rights

A. Women's Rights

116. Each year, approximately 25,000 women in the United States become pregnant as a result of rape. An estimated 22,000 of these pregnancies - or 88 percent - could be prevented if sexual assault victims had timely access to emergency contraception. Unfortunately, according to 2005 nationwide survey, 42 percent of non-Catholic hospitals and 55 percent of Catholic hospitals do not dispense emergency contraception under any circumstances, including when a woman has been sexually assaulted. As I'm sure you know, emergency contraception (EC) is a concentrated dosage of ordinary birth-control pills that can dramatically reduce a woman's chance of becoming pregnant if taken soon after sex. EC does not cause abortion; rather it prevents pregnancy by inhibiting ovulation, fertilization, or implantation before a pregnancy occurs. Why then is information about EC not included in the DOJ's National Protocol for Sexual Assault Medical Forensic Examinations even after being urged to address the issue by a bipartisan contingent of 22 Senators?

ANSWER: The cornerstone of the National Protocol for Sexual Assault Medical Forensic Examinations is a victim-centered approach. The premise underlying this approach is that a well-informed victim is the person best equipped to make decisions affecting the victim's health and well-being. The protocol, therefore, emphasizes providing information to victims. Then, based upon this information and the victim's own preferences and beliefs, the sexual assault victim controls as much of the process as possible.

Specifically, the protocol recommends discussing treatment options with patients, including all reproductive health services. The protocol encourages health care professionals to discuss the variety of and recommend appropriate treatment options to female sexual assault victims.

QUESTIONS FROM REPRESENTATIVE LOFGREN

I. Warrantless Wiretapping

117. In Mr. Gonzales' testimony on April 6 before the House Judiciary Committee, he stated that the President has the authority to conduct warrantless eavesdropping on U.S. persons because the United States is at war pursuant to the adoption of the AUMF and the President as Commander-in-Chief has the authority under Article II of the U.S. Constitution to conduct warrantless eavesdropping on U.S. persons as a fundamental incident to war. During the hearing, Ms. Lofgren asked whether "shooting people, capturing them in their homes or on the street, putting them in POW camps" were also authorized as "fundamental incidents" to war. Mr. Gonzales did not disavow such authority and left open the possibility that the Administration believed the AUMF authorized such activities as incidents to war, stating merely that "I think we'd have to look at what has occurred in the past in connection with conflicts." Does the Attorney General now deny each of the following activities is a "fundamental incident" to the AUMF, yes or no? Does he deny each of the following activities is a likely "fundamental incident" to the AUMF, yes or no?

ANSWER: Please see the answer to question 118, below.

118. Reinstatement of the draft?

ANSWER: We have not had the opportunity to conduct an exhaustive historical examination of each of these questions, but we will attempt to respond to the best of our ability. Reinstatement of conscription into the armed forces is not likely to be a fundamental incident to the use of armed forces authorized by the Force Resolution. Conscription has traditionally been a matter governed by statute. See, e.g., 50 U.S.C. app. § 451 et seq; see also the National Defense Act of 1916, 39 Stat. 134. Such treatment is consistent with the fact that the Constitution vests Congress with authority to "raise and support Armies," U.S. Const. Art. I, § 8, cl. 12, and providing for conscription into the Armed Services would be a traditional part of that authority. Detailed statutes are of particular importance in establishing a draft because compliance is generally enforced through criminal statutes, and only Congress can authorize the imposition of judicially enforceable criminal punishments under federal law. Cf. Bousley v. United States, 523 U.S. 614, 620-21 (1998); United States v. Hudson, 7 Cranch 32 (1812).

119. Shooting U.S. persons on U.S. soil?

ANSWER: Inside the United States, the Fifth Amendment prohibition against depriving a person of life without due process of law and the Fourth Amendment restriction on unreasonable seizures place significant restraints on the government's authority to use deadly force. Without reference to the Force Resolution or the President's inherent constitutional authority, we note that it is well established that law enforcement officials may use deadly force to prevent an act that threatens life or severe bodily injury or to apprehend a suspect who is believed to have committed such an act. See, e.g., Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1, 10-12 (1985).

120. Detaining U.S. persons in their homes or on U.S. soil?

ANSWER: It is the position of the United States that enemy combatants with plans to attack the United States may be captured on U.S. soil, even if they are U.S. citizens. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit upheld that position in Padilla v. Hanft, 423 F.3d 386 (4th Cir. 2005), cert. denied, 126 S. Ct. 1649 (2006), holding that the President had authority under the Force Resolution to capture on U.S. soil and detain in military custody a United States citizen who planned to engage in terrorist operations on behalf of al Qaeda.

121. Holding U.S. persons in POW camps?

ANSWER: A majority of the Supreme Court specifically has concluded that the Force Resolution authorizes the President to capture and detain United States persons, including United States citizens, who are enemy combatants. Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S 507 (2004); see also Padilla v. Hanft, 423 F.3d 386 (4th Cir. 2005).

122. In the Attorney General's testimony, he stated under oath that one or more undisclosed surveillance programs, the legal authority for which was disputed by Attorney General John Ashcroft and Deputy Attorney General James Comey, exist besides the "terrorist surveillance program" disclosed publicly by the President. What categories of communications are captured and what categories of individuals are targeted by this or these programs?

ANSWER: As an initial matter, we are not aware of any instance in which the Attorney General, as your question asserts, "stated under oath that one or more undisclosed surveillance programs . . . exist besides the" Terrorist Surveillance Program. In recognition of the fact that he was testifying in public, the Attorney General has simply declined to discuss the existence or non-existence of specific intelligence activities besides the Terrorist Surveillance Program, which had already been publicly disclosed. Consistent with long-standing practice, the Executive Branch notifies Congress concerning the classified intelligence activities of the United States through appropriate briefings of the intelligence committees and congressional leadership. For the same reasons, it would be inappropriate to discuss in this setting the existence or non-existence of any specific intelligence activities or the operations of any such activities, besides the Terrorist Surveillance Program.

123. Press reports indicate that AT&T and possibly other telecommunications providers are data-mining communications on behalf of the NSA prior to any human review. Rather than discuss the so-called "operational details" of NSA surveillance programs, does the Attorney General deny each of the following statements with respect to any and all NSA surveillance programs: Does the Attorney General deny that communications to which U.S. persons are parties are routinely intercepted and analyzed by one or more automated systems under the control of or established on behalf of the NSA, prior to any individualized human determination that probable cause exists that a specific communication intercepted by this or these automated systems includes as a party an overseas member of al Qaeda?

ANSWER: As the President has stated, "[w]e're not mining or trolling through the personal lives of millions of innocent Americans. Our efforts are focused on links to al Qaeda and their known affiliates." The President also outlined four basic principles of the government's efforts to create an early warning system to protect America from another catastrophic terrorist attack: "First, our international activities strictly target al Qaeda and their known affiliates. Al Qaeda is our enemy, and we want to know their plans. Second, the government does not listen to domestic phone calls without court approval. Third, the intelligence activities I have authorized are lawful and have been briefed to appropriate members of Congress, both Republican and Democrat. Fourth, the privacy of ordinary Americans is fiercely protected in all our activities."

It would be inappropriate to discuss in this setting the existence (or non-existence) of specific intelligence activities or the operations of any such activities. Consistent with long-standing practice, the Executive Branch notifies Congress concerning the classified intelligence activities of the United States through appropriate briefings of the intelligence committees and congressional leadership.

124. Does the Attorney General deny that the automated interception described in (a) involves millions of instances of communications or more?

ANSWER: The Terrorist Surveillance Program targets for interception a limited set of communications where one party is outside of the United States and there is reasonable grounds to believe that at least one party is a member or agent of al Qaeda or an affiliated terrorist organization.

As we noted above, it would be inappropriate to discuss in this setting the existence (or non-existence) of specific intelligence activities or the operations of any such activities. Consistent with long-standing practice, the Executive Branch notifies Congress concerning the classified intelligence activities of the United States through appropriate briefings of the intelligence committees and congressional leadership

125. Does the Attorney General deny that the interception described in (a) involves tens of thousands of U.S. persons or more?

ANSWER: Again, the Terrorist Surveillance Program targets for interception a limited set of communications as described in response to question 124. It would not be appropriate to discuss the operational details of the Program or the existence or non-existence of any other intelligence activities in this setting.

126. At the hearing, Ms. Lofgren asked "How many prosecutions have involved intelligence gathered under this program, either directly or indirectly?" Mr. Gonzales promised to provide quoted material in response to this question. Please provide that material.

ANSWER: The Terrorist Surveillance Program (TSP) is the presidentially authorized surveillance program that the President has publicly described, which involves the targeted interception by the National Security Agency (NSA) of communications in which one party is outside the United States where there are reasonable grounds to believe that at least one party to the communication is a member or agent of al Qaeda or an al Qaeda affiliated terrorist organization. Because TSP is a classified program, we are not able to provide information about the number of prosecutions that may "have involved intelligence gathered under this program" as you have requested. There are, however, a number of pending criminal cases in federal district courts across the country in which a defendant has requested information regarding the alleged use of warrantless electronic surveillance by the NSA and/or has filed motions or legal challenges alleging that any NSA activities conducted are either unconstitutional or not authorized by statute. The Government has responded to a number of these defense motions pursuant to the Classified Information Procedures Act. As of May 1, 2006, in every case in which a United States District Court Judge has ruled on a defense request for information, an order has been issued denying the defendant's motion.

QUESTIONS FROM REPRESENTATIVE JACKSON-LEE

I. Voting Rights

127. There have been reports of political appointees overruling staff recommendations. For example, in January 2005, the Washington Post reported that political appointees overruled a staff recommendation that the Texas congressional redistricting plan of 2003 be rejected as retrogressive under Section 5 of the Voting Rights Act. And before that, in November 2005 the Washington Post reported that a team of Justice Department lawyers and analysts who reviewed a Georgia voter-identification law recommended rejecting it because it was likely to discriminate against black voters, but they were overruled the next day by higher-ranking officials at Justice, according to department documents. What concrete steps have you taken to eliminate this type of undue political influence that permits political appointees to overrule staff recommendations?

ANSWER: Partisan considerations should not play a role in the Justice Department's decisions. Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim of the Civil Rights Division ("Division") believes strongly in this principle as well. The Division's successful record in the courts – and in the Texas redistricting and Georgia voter-identification matters specifically -- demonstrates that its decisions are based on the facts and the law.

As explained in our response to Question 86, above, the Texas redistricting submission involved a deliberate and careful review of every relevant fact. Subsequent events – including the decision by a three-judge panel finding no violation of the Voting Rights Act, and the 2004 elections held under the new plan that resulted in the election of an additional African American legislator – indicate that the preclearance decision was correct.

Likewise, the decision to preclear the State of Georgia's amendments to its voter identification statute was made by the Chief of the Voting Section, a veteran career attorney with more than 30 years of experience in the Civil Rights Division. The decision was well grounded in law and fact submission. The 2005 Georgia voter identification law, which amended an existing voter identification statute that had been precleared by the prior Administration, was precleared after a careful analysis that lasted several months and took into account all of the relevant factors, including the most recent data available from the State of Georgia on the issuance of state photo identification and driver's license cards. That data supported the ultimate preclearance decision in this matter.

128. Given that political appointees have virtually no role in determining whether to bring public corruptions cases (like Abramoff), why do political appointees play such a big role in determining whether to bring major voting rights cases?

ANSWER: Political appointees do not play an inordinate role in determining whether to bring major voting rights cases. The Assistant Attorney General for the Civil Rights Division is, of course, the official responsible for all cases brought by the Division, just as the Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division is the official responsible for all cases brought by that Division, including public corruption cases. It has been the practice of the Civil Rights Division since its inception that the Assistant Attorney General must approve each case initiated by the Division before it is filed. Cases are approved based solely on the facts and the law. There certainly has been no reluctance to bring cases under the Voting Rights Act. For example, in this Administration, the Assistant Attorneys General for Civil Rights have approved more cases under Sections 203 and 208 of the Voting Rights Act than all previous Assistant Attorneys General combined.

II. Presidential Signing Statements

129. President Bush has occupied the office for nearly 6 years but is yet to veto a single bill. Instead he has exhibited a penchant for issuing the signing statements in which he usually claims that he is not bound by the law he just signed.What is the legal significance of a presidential "signing statement"? Is it not true that it is entitled to no consideration whatsoever in the interpretation of congressional intent?

ANSWER: We strongly disagree with your characterization of the President's use of the traditional tool of the presidential signing statement represents a "claim[] that he is not bound by the law he just signed." The President's use of signing statements is both entirely consistent with his duties under the Constitution and with the actions of past Presidents.

As noted above in response to question 104, the Constitution requires the President to take an oath to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution," and directs him to "take care that the Laws be faithfully executed." U.S. Const., Art. II, §§ 1, 2. When Congress passes legislation containing provisions that could be construed as contrary to settled constitutional principles, or which could be applied in a manner that is plainly unconstitutional, the President can and should take steps to ensure that such laws are interpreted and executed in a manner consistent with the Constitution. Thus, Presidents have used signing statements to construe enactments of Congress since the early days of the Republic, and President Clinton himself issued constitutional signing statements with respect to 105 statutes. See Kelley, supra, at 18; see also, e.g., Statement of President Clinton on Signing the National Defense Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 2000 (Oct. 5, 1999) ("A number of other provisions of this bill raise serious constitutional concerns. Because the President is the Commander in Chief and the Chief Executive under the Constitution, the Congress may not interfere with the President's duty to protect classified and other sensitive national security information or his responsibility to control the disclosure of such information by subordinate officials of the executive branch (sections 1042, 3150, and 3164). . . . To the extent that these provisions conflict with my constitutional responsibilities in these areas, I will construe them where possible to avoid such conflicts, and where it is impossible to do so, I will treat them as advisory. I hereby direct all executive branch officials to do likewise."); Statement of President Clinton on Signing the Departments of Commerce, Justice, State, the Judiciary, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (Dec. 21, 2000) ("I also oppose language in the Act related to the Kyoto Protocol. . . . I direct the agencies to construe these provisions to be consistent with the President's constitutional prerogatives and responsibilities and where such a construction is not possible, to treat them as not interfering with those prerogatives and responsibilities."); Statement of President Clinton on Signing Legislation To Reform the Financial System (Nov. 12, 1999) ("Under section 332(b)(1) of the bill, the President would be required to make such appointments from lists of candidates recommended by the National Association of Insurance Commissioners. The Appointments Clause, however, does not permit such restrictions to be imposed upon the President's power of appointment. I therefore do not interpret the restrictions of section 332(b)(1) as binding and will regard any such lists of recommended candidates as advisory only."); Statement of President Clinton on Signing the Omnibus Consolidated and Emergency Supplemental Appropriations Act (Oct. 23, 1998) ("Section 610 of the Commerce/Justice/State appropriations provision prohibits the use of appropriated funds for the participation of U.S. armed forces in a U.N. peacekeeping mission under foreign command unless the President's military advisers have recommended such involvement and the President has submitted such recommendations to the Congress. The 'Contributions for International Peacekeeping Activities' provision requires a report to the Congress prior to voting for a U.N. peacekeeping mission. These provisions unconstitutionally constrain my diplomatic authority and my authority as Commander in Chief, and I will apply them consistent with my constitutional responsibilities.").

It is not the case that the President's only option when confronting a bill containing a provision that is constitutionally problematic is to veto the bill. Presidents Lincoln, Theodore Roosevelt, Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt, Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy, Lyndon Johnson, Ford, Carter, and Clinton each signed legislation rather than vetoing it despite concerns that it posed constitutional concerns. See The Legal Significance of Presidential Signing Statements, 17 Op. O.L.C. at 132 nn. 3 & 5, 138 (memorandum opinion of Assistant Attorney General Walter Dellinger). Using a presidential signing statement to give a potentially problematic provision in a bill a construction that renders it constitutional does not represent an affront to Congress; rather, it gives greater effect to Congress's will that simply vetoing the legislation, or tacitly declining to enforce a provision (as other Presidents have done). As Assistant Attorney General Walter Dellinger explained early in the Clinton Administration, this practice is "analogous to the Supreme Court's practice of construing statutes, where possible, to avoid holding them unconstitutional." Id. at 133.

Presidential signing statements serve several purposes that are "[s]eparate and distinct" from any argument that they represent "legislative (or 'executive') history" to be considered by "the courts in ascertaining the meaning of statutory language." Id. at 135. Signing statements "explain to the public, and more particularly to interested constituencies, what the President understands to be the likely effects of the bill," and also serve to "guide and direct executive officials in interpreting or administering a statute." Id. at 131-32. Assistant Attorney General Dellinger wrote that one "uncontroversial" function of presidential signing statements is to "guide and direct executive officials in interpreting or administering a statute." Id. at 132 (emphasis added). "Signing statements have frequently expressed the President's intention to construe or administer a statute in a particular manner (often to save the statute from unconstitutionality)." Id. at 132. The President may also use a signing statement to announce his "view of the constitutionality of the legislation he is signing," id. at 132, either to explain that he will refuse to enforce the bill in various unconstitutional applications, see id. at 132-33, or to "put forward a 'saving' construction of the bill, explaining that the President will construe it in a certain manner in order to avoid constitutional difficulties," id. at 133. As Assistant Attorney General Dellinger noted, each of those "uses of Presidential signing statements generally serve[s] legitimate and defensible purposes." Id. at 137.

III. Texas Counties Mistreated by Federal Bureau of Prisons

130. I am concerned about a new Federal Bureau of Prisons' (Bureau) policy related to Intergovernmental Agreements (IGAs). I believe that you have heard from my Texas colleagues - both Republicans and Democrats - regarding the Bureau's policy decision not to renew IGAs with four local governments in West Texas to house over 7,000 BOP inmates. Over the last nineteen years, the Bureau has partnered with these local governments to address a growing Federal need to house Bureau inmates. One county expanded its jails at the request of the Bureau and in doing so incurred tens of millions of dollars in debt to provide a vital governmental service for the Federal Government. Reeves County, Texas, issued over $90 million in municipal bonds to expand its facility for the Bureau. In this rural county of West Texas, the Reeves County Detention Center is the largest employer in a county that has seen numerous manufacturing plant closures, as a result of NAFTA and other Federal action, putting over 1,200 people out of work in a county that has a workforce of 4,000. In Washington, DC terms, this may seem insignificant, but Mr. Attorney General, Pecos, TX is not San Antonio with a Toyota Plant, when they lose the largest employer in town, it devastates the community! The 322 hardworking men and women who work at the Reeves County Detention Center rely on the Bureau of Prisons IGA to provide for them and their families. This Intergovernmental Partnership produces over $35 million in economic impact to Reeves County, including the payment of salaries and benefits, the purchase of goods and services, and the utilization of utilities. The proposed policy by the Bureau of Prisons is a breach of trust with the local governments in Texas, like Reeves, who have stood with us to fulfill the Border Security needs of our nation. Mr. Attorney General, in this time of scarce resources, I urge you to reconsider the abolishment of these Intergovernmental Agreements. What justification is there for terminating these long-term IGAs and incurring the risk of transporting 7,000 criminal aliens from one penal facility to another?

ANSWER: These Intergovernmental Agreements (IGAs) were initiated by the Bureau of Prisons (BOP) in the 1980's as a temporary solution to crowding. The intent was to provide the BOP with flexibility in managing its low-security, criminal alien population, without making long-term investments or commitments. Originally, the IGAs were direct agreements with the local governmental entities and were entered into without competition. The IGAs then and now have 3-year terms. Over time and as a result of the continued increase in the Federal inmate population, these IGAs have evolved into a permanent housing alternative for a large number of non-U.S. citizen inmates. Also, the local governmental entities now have arrangements with private companies for the management and day-to-day operation of the facilities. For example, the Reeves County facility is managed by GEO Corporation. Given the large number of beds involved and the fact that the local governments have a secondary role in these agreements, the BOP has proposed to fulfill this bedspace need through competitively-bid contracts in order to get the best value and best price for the taxpayers. (The four existing contracts will all expire during the period January - April 2007.) Conducting a fair and open competition for this bedspace will likely save the taxpayers millions of dollars. It is unfortunate if any of the four communities who currently have one of these IGAs expanded the facility in its jurisdiction based on expected future contracts with the BOP. No such action was required by the BOP. All four local communities are eligible to compete and have been encouraged to participate in the proposed upcoming competition.

The Congress and the Administration have encouraged agencies to expand their efforts to increase competition and contracting opportunities. The Department supports efforts to achieve the best value for the taxpayers, and using a competitive process to acquire these beds is expected to meet that objective.

IV. Abortion and Choice

131. As I'm sure you're aware, I differ with the administration on the issue of legal abortion. But I believe that people who disagree on that issue can and should find common ground working to prevent the unintended pregnancies that increase the need for abortion. Do you agree that America would be a better country if no woman ever faced the difficult choice posed by an unintended pregnancy?

ANSWER: Per OLP, OAG should review this answer: Yes.

132. Each year, approximately 25,000 women in the United States become pregnant as a result of rape. An estimated 22,000 of these pregnancies - or 88 percent - could be prevented if sexual assault victims had timely access to emergency contraception. Unfortunately, according to 2005 nationwide survey, 42 percent of non-Catholic hospitals and 55 percent of Catholic hospitals do not dispense emergency contraception under any circumstances, including when a woman has been sexually assaulted. As I'm sure you know, emergency contraception (EC) is a concentrated dosage of ordinary birth-control pills that can dramatically reduce a woman's chance of becoming pregnant if taken soon after sex. EC does not cause abortion; rather it prevents pregnancy by inhibiting ovulation, fertilization, or implantation before a pregnancy occurs. EC therefore has tremendous potential to assist sexual assault victims avoid the additional trauma of an unintended pregnancy - do you agree?

ANSWER: The National Protocol for Sexual Assault Medical Forensic Examinations addresses many critical issues facing sexual assault victims , all through the lens of a victim-centered approach. The protocol recommends that health care providers discuss the possibility of pregnancy with the patient, being cognizant that "[P]atients of different ages, social, cultural, and religious/spiritual backgrounds may have varying opinions regarding treatment options." This section goes on to recommend conducting a consensual pregnancy test to assist in prescribing appropriate medications.

Finally, the protocol recommends discussing treatment options with patients, including all reproductive health services. The protocol encourages health care professionals to discuss the variety of and recommend appropriate treatment options to female sexual assault victims.

133. In late 2004, the Department of Justice issued the first-ever National Protocol for Sexual Assault Medical Forensic Examinations. I commend the establishment of a national protocol as a critical first step towards ensuring that all sexual assault victims receive quality medical and forensic services, but I am extremely concerned that the protocol lacks any mention of emergency contraception or recommendation that it be offered to sexual assault victims. In early 2005, 22 senators from both parties - and from both pro-life and pro-choice perspectives - wrote a letter urging DoJ to amend the protocol to include information on emergency contraception. In his response, Assistant Attorney General William Moschella wrote that the cornerstone of the national protocol is a "victim-centered approach"… "that a well-informed victim is the person best equipped to make decisions affecting the victim's health and well-being." I couldn't agree more. But why is it then that the protocol omits critical information about emergency contraception? Would you agree with me that in order for a sexual assault victim to be "well informed," she must receive information about all her available options for care, including emergency contraception?

ANSWER: The National Protocol for Sexual Assault Medical Forensic Examinations recommends discussing treatment options with patients, including all reproductive health services. The protocol encourages health care professionals to discuss the variety of and recommend appropriate treatment options to female sexual assault victims.

134. News reports made clear that information about emergency contraception was included in earlier versions of the protocol and was subsequently eliminated. Last August, the ACLU, NARAL Pro-Choice America, Christians for Justice Action and many other organizations filed a Freedom of Information Act request asking the Department of Justice to release records pertaining to the removal of any references to emergency contraception or pregnancy prevention in the protocol. What is the status of this FOIA request and what is the Department of Justice doing to ensure that it is acted upon promptly?

ANSWER: On September 7, the Office of Justice Programs forwarded a FOIA request to the Office on Violence Against Women (OVW) from the ACLU and other signatories requesting "all agency records held by the Department of Justice regarding the Department's decision about what information to include or omit regarding pregnancy prevention in the National Protocol for Sexual Assault Medical Forensic Examinations."

OVW Director Diane Stuart responded to their request on September 29, 2005 and the package of materials was mailed to Jennifer Nevins at the ACLU on September 30, 2005.

For your information, an electronic copy of the letter to Ms. Nevins from Director Stuart is enclosed.

Question 12

3/17/06 Letter to Inspector General Fine

March 17, 2006

The Honorable Glenn A. Fine
Inspector General
Office of the Inspector General
United States Department of Justice
Room 4322
950 Pennsylvania Avenue, Northwest
Washington, D.C. 20530

Dear Mr. Fine:

I would like to thank you for providing the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) the opportunity to respond to your report entitled, "The FBI's Efforts to Prevent and Respond to Maritime Terrorism."

I recognize the substantial challenge the Office of the Inspector General (OIG) has in producing timely reports on complex issues such as this. This challenge is even more difficult when assessing FBI operations because of the rapid changes it continues to undergo to optimally position itself to address the evolving threats to our Nation.

In large part, the FBI agrees with the findings and recommendations of this report. Accordingly, Executive Management from the Counterterrorism Division (CTD) of the FBI and personnel from the appropriate programs within the FBI have reviewed OIG's draft report concerning the FBI's efforts to prevent and respond to maritime terrorism. Ideally, we would like for the report to be updated to provide a current status of maritime security efforts in the FBI, and to that end have set forth several points of information for you to consider.

- The FBI initiated the Maritime Security Program (MSP) in July 2005. This proactive measure was taken by CTD Executive Management in recognition of the potential threat of maritime terrorism. It is worth noting that this program was established without additional funding by reallocating resources within CTD.

- Availability of resources has also influenced the FBI's participation in various exercises. Although the FBI would like to participate in additional exercises, the FBI is currently able to support the joint exercises that are coordinated through the National Exercise Program.

- The FBI is actively working with the United States Coast Guard (USCG) and other agencies to resolve potential coordination issues in advance of actual threats and incidents in the maritime domain.

Additionally, the following comments are to correct or clarify statements made in the text of the audit report:

4. Page "v", first paragraph and page 25, first paragraph: The MSP prepared an Electronic Communication (EC) to the field to request that an FBI Special Agent (SA), as opposed to a Task Force Officer (TFO) be designated as the primary Maritime Liaison Agent (MLA). Although this EC was drafted, it was not approved by CTD management. As a result, in many Field Offices a TFO serves as the primary or only MLA.

5. Page "vi", first bullet: This point may need to be modified to include the capabilities of the Laboratory Division's Hazardous Materials Response Unit (HMRU) in dealing with a weapon of mass destruction (WMD) incident. HMRU provides technical and scientific operational response to WMD incidents, including, but not limited to, crime scene management, evidence recovery, emergency decontamination and scientific assessments. The responsibilities of the Hazardous Devices Response Unit (HDRU) includes the response to threats and actual devices before they are detonated or used in an "attack." HDRU does not respond to post-detonation attacks; that is the responsibility of HMRU and/or the Laboratory Division's Explosive Unit.

6. Page "viii", last paragraph: The statement, "The FBI has not collected complete data on the number of suspicious activities or terrorist threats involving seaports," is correct. However, the MSP has begun to collect this information from all available sources. The MSP has created a data base to capture this information which will be used to identify and track possible trends in suspicious activity at ports and port facilities. The MSP is also in the process of creating a standardized reporting mechanism for use by the MLAs when responding to incidents. These reports will be maintained in the MSP case file and the information will also be entered into the data base. Finally, the MSP maintains liaison with other agencies and the private sector, such as the USCG, Office of Naval Intelligence (ONI) and the International Council of Cruise Lines (ICCL), for the sharing of pertinent threat information.

7. Page 20, bottom of the page: It should be noted that the MSP will present the 2006 Maritime Liaison Agent Training Conference in Long Beach, California from 04/03-07/2006. The Port of Long Beach is one of the busiest ports in the United States with a variety of inter-modal transportation systems. This site was specifically chosen because it offers hands on/familiarization training using various port facilities and vessels. The curriculum for this conference is expected to include presentations on the impact of maritime directives under the National Strategy for Maritime Security (NSMS); informant and liaison development; legal issues; enhancing maritime domain awareness; the FBI's capabilities and resources to respond to a maritime incident; and guidance to the field on best practices.

8. Page 24, first full paragraph: The report indicates that as a result of placing responsibility for managing the MLA Program under the MSP, all of the FBI's transportation related counterterrorism programs are located within the same organizational unit. This is not the case as the National Joint Terrorism Task Force (NJTTF) initiated the Rail Liaison Agent (RLA) Program via EC dated 10/24/2005. The NJTTF requested each Field Office to designate an FBI SA or TFO as a primary and secondary RLA. A separate initiative is currently underway to evaluate the feasibility of creating a program or unit focused on all aspects of the transportation sector. It is important to note this initiative is unfunded and would be created by reallocating existing resources.

9. Page 24, last paragraph: The report mentions that one of the objectives of the MSP was to create a website on the FBI's Intranet to facilitate the dissemination of information pertaining to directives, training, intelligence and other matters. This objective has been accomplished. The MSP website address is http://ctd.fbinet.fbi/semu/maritime/. This website contains information on maritime directives including National Security Presidential Directive (NSPD)-41/Homeland Security Presidential Directive (HSPD)-13, the NSMS and key supporting plans; maritime related statutes; intelligence reports; points of contact; and links to related programs including the Directorate of Intelligence (DI), and the Office of the General Counsel (OGC). Information is continually updated or added to the website. The MLAs are notified of information posted to the website via e-mail. The website has generated positive feedback from the MLAs and is a readily available source of standardized information for the field.

10. Page 24, last paragraph: The report also mentions that another objective of the MSP was to review maritime related suspicious activity reports to identify any trends that may be indicative of pre-operational planning. As noted above, the MSP has already started this process, which is ongoing. This effort is complicated by the lack of standardized reporting and difficulty in retrieving this information, as stated elsewhere in the findings.

11. Page 25, middle of the page: The report states that the MSP has not reviewed the eight supporting plans under the NSMS to identify the FBI's responsibilities nor identified all of the FBI's representatives assigned to the corresponding working groups. That information was supplied to OIG at the inception of the MSP. Since then, the MSP has thoroughly reviewed NSPD-41/HSPD-13, the NSMS and all eight of the supporting plans. The FBI's responsibilities under these directives have been identified and are being addressed. NSPD-41/HSPD-13, the NSMS and key supporting plans are posted to the MSP website. Due to limited resources, the MSP must prioritize which of the working groups to attend in support of these efforts. In that regard, representatives from the MSP have regularly attended and participated in the Maritime Security Policy Coordinating Committee (in support of Executive Management); the Maritime Security Working Group; the Maritime Operational Threat Response (MOTR) Implementation Team; and the Maritime Domain Awareness Implementation Team. In addition, an interagency MOTR Joint Working Group (JWG) has recently been established to address the planning, standardization and exercise requirements that will be deleted from the final version of the MOTR Plan as the Homeland Security Council has indicated. The MSP participates in this JWG as well as the Border and Transportation Security Policy Coordinating Committee.

12. Page 25, fourth paragraph: The report states neither the MSP's FY 2006 goals and objectives nor the critical duties of an MLA include the need for the FBI to develop relationships with people who can inform the FBI about maritime operations. It should be noted that at the time the MSP's goals and objectives were established (via EC dated 08/19/2005), the MSP did not have responsibility for managing the MLA Program. In fact, the first objective identified in that EC was to coordinate with the NJTTF to assume responsibility for the MLA Program. That objective was accomplished on 10/04/2005, when the MSP assumed responsibility for managing the MLA Program. Furthermore, within the goals and objectives (via EC dated 08/19/2005), the MSP established various objectives for the field. One of these objectives was to "ensure effective liaison between the MLA and various law enforcement agencies, port and shipping officials in respect to counterterrorism preparedness." In the goals and objectives EC, the MSP identified five core competencies which included the establishment of a human intelligence base. Finally, in an EC to all Field Offices dated 07/12/2004, the NJTTF stated, "The goal of the MLA Program is to enhance the maritime environment through increased interaction between MLA members, private industry, state and local port authorities, to include law enforcement and other federal agencies with maritime responsibilities. These enhancements will result from the establishment of close working relationships between the MLAs and concerned entities within the maritime field…" The EC goes on to provide additional guidance and an extensive list of recommended liaison contacts, including participation in the local Area Maritime Security Committee (AMSC). In addition to these specific recommendations, every FBI SA, including those designated as MLAs, are evaluated on specific critical elements. One of the core critical elements for all FBI SAs is the development of an intelligence base, which includes source development. This process encompasses identifying, initiating and developing relationships with individuals or organizations that may provide information or assistance in investigations and assignments. Therefore, CTD believes the need for the FBI to develop relationships with people who can inform the FBI about maritime operations has been thoroughly addressed.

As you requested, the MSP has provided responses to pertinent recommendations. Additionally, recommendations not under MSP's purview were provided to the appropriate offices, (i.e., the DI, the Critical Incident Response Group (CIRG), and CTD's Counterterrorism Analysis Section.) Responses to the recommendations are set forth below.

Recommendation #1

OIG Recommendation: Ensure that MLA guidance is consistent with the actual role of MLAs.

FBI Response: FBI agrees with this recommendation. The MSP has already made significant progress in this regard.

Through the creation of the MSP website, which contains information on maritime directives, including NSPD-41/HSPD-13, the NSMS and key supporting plans; maritime related statutes; intelligence reports; points of contact; and links to related programs including the DI and the OGC. Information is continually updated or added to the website. The MLAs are notified of information posted to the website via e-mail. The website has generated positive feedback from the MLAs and is a readily available source of standardized information for the field.

The MSP is in the process of planning the 2006 Maritime Liaison Agent Training Conference in Long Beach, California from 04/03-07/2006. This site was specifically chosen because the Port of Long Beach is one of the busiest ports in the United States with a variety of inter-modal transportation systems. The conference will include hands on/familiarization training using various port facilities and vessels. The curriculum for this conference is expected to include presentations on the impact of maritime directives under the NSMS; informant and liaison development; legal issues; enhancing maritime domain awareness; the FBI's capabilities and resources to respond to a maritime incident; and guidance to the field on best practices.

Finally, now that the MSP has responsibility for management of the MLA Program, the MSP will establish specific, quantifiably measurable and attainable goals and objectives that are consistent with the responsibilities assigned to the MLAs, to include recommendations for participation in various local working groups and liaison contacts.

Recommendation #2

OIG Recommendation: Assign MLAs based on an assessment of the threat and risk of a terrorist attack to critical seaports.

FBI Response: FBI agrees with this recommendation. FBI will ensure that resources are assigned or available necessary to address the risk or threat based on the assessment.

DOJ_NMG_0029333

Recommendation #3

OIG Recommendation: Measure the amount of resources devoted to maritime efforts by establishing a maritime case classification under the general Counterterrorism Preparedness classification.

FBI Response: FBI agrees with this recommendation. The MSP has already taken certain steps which would enhance the FBI's ability to measure the amount of resources devoted to maritime efforts.

FBI is in the process of establishing a classification for maritime matters.

In August 2005, the MSP provided recommendations to the Counterintelligence Division for changes to the Investigative Accomplishment Report (FD-542) to capture activity conducted in support of the MLA Program. Finalization of the modifications to this report are pending.

Recommendation #4

OIG Recommendation: Require field offices to name at least one MLA to each AMSC.

FBI Response: FBI agrees with this recommendation. FBI will ensure that adequate resources are dedicated to each Area Maritime Security Committee to address priority matters.

Recommendation #5

OIG Recommendation: Require field offices to immediately notify the Maritime Security Program of any MLA appointments or reassignments.

FBI Response: FBI agrees with this recommendation. The MSP updates the MLA list on a regular basis. The MLA list is maintained by the MSP and is available on the MSP web site. The list identifies, by Field Office, all of the MLAs as well as the JTTF Supervisors who have oversight of the MLA Program. The list provides contact information, identifies if the MLAs are assigned to a Resident Agency (RA) and which ports they cover. The MSP has advised field offices to immediately notify the MSP of any personnel changes affecting the MSP, and this guidance will be reiterated through training such as the 2006 Maritime Liaison Agent Training Conference.

Recommendation #6

OIG Recommendation: Ensure that the Maritime Security Program has measurable objectives.

FBI Response: FBI agrees with this recommendation and recognizes that significant changes and progress in the MSP require the establishment of more specific, quantifiably measurable and attainable goals and objectives.

While FBI recognizes that the goals and objectives established for the MSP (via EC dated 08/19/2005) did not include quantifiable measures, it should be noted that the MSP was a new program and no previous goals and objectives had been established. Furthermore, the MSP did not have responsibility for managing the MLA Program at the time the initial objectives were established. The first objective of the MSP was to coordinate with the NJTTF to assume responsibility for the MLA Program.

It is also worth noting that the NSMS and all of the supporting plans were released in the final quarter of 2005, after the date on which these objectives were established. Final directives under the NSMS have not been established, even as of the date of this response. Under these circumstances, it is difficult to quantify the amount of training and/or reference materials required to train MLAs in the field.

Despite the lack of specific, quantifiably measurable objectives at the inception of the program, the MSP accomplished several of the stated objectives, including the following:

- The MSP assumed responsibility for managing the MLA Program on 10/04/2005;

- Training and reference materials to assist the MLAs have been distributed via e-mail, posted to the FBI's Intranet, and will be presented at the 2006 Maritime Liaison Agent Training Conference scheduled to take place 04/03-07/2006;

- The MSP established a web site on the FBI's Intranet where current information including, but not limited to, maritime directives, statutes and intelligence is maintained;

- The MSP continually identifies, analyzes and disseminates information pertaining to maritime threats, vulnerabilities and safety/security issues;

- The MSP continually coordinates with other programs within the FBI to enhance situational awareness for the MSP, other programs, FBIHQ and the field;

- The MSP has already begun to review and track suspicious activity reports to determine if there are any trends which could indicate terrorist activity and has disseminated information to the field in this regard; and

· The MSP is actively engaged in liaison with other government agencies as well as the private sector. This effort and the fact that the MSP serves as a primary point of contact and a coordination center within the FBI for maritime issues has enhanced the FBI's liaison with these groups.

Recommendation #7

OIG Recommendation: Ensure that the Maritime Security Program's objectives include developing human intelligence.

FBI Response: FBI agrees with this recommendation and asserts that the MSP and the NJTTF have already provided such guidance to the MLAs.

As stated above, at the time the MSP's goals and objectives were established, the MSP did not have responsibility for managing the MLA Program. Even so, the MSP established various objectives for the field. One of these objectives was to "ensure effective liaison between the MLA and various law enforcement agencies, port and shipping officials in respect to counterterrorism preparedness." In the goals and objectives EC, the MSP identified five core competencies which included the establishment of a human intelligence base.

Prior to the existence of the MSP, in an EC to all Field Offices dated 07/12/2004, the NJTTF stated, "The goal of the MLA Program is to enhance the maritime environment through increased interaction between MLA members, private industry, state and local port authorities, to include law enforcement and other federal agencies with maritime responsibilities. These enhancements will result from the establishment of close working relationships between the MLAs and concerned entities within the maritime field…" The EC goes on to provide additional guidance and an extensive list of recommended liaison contacts, including participation in the local AMSC.

In addition to these specific recommendations, every FBI SA, including those designated as MLAs, are evaluated on specific critical elements. One of the core critical elements for all FBI SAs is the development of an intelligence base, which includes source development. This process encompasses identifying, initiating and developing relationships with individuals or organizations that may provide information or assistance in investigations and assignments. Therefore, FBI believes the need for the FBI to develop relationships with people who can inform the FBI about maritime operations has been thoroughly addressed.

DOJ_NMG_0029336

The MSP also plans to address liaison and the development of a human intelligence base during the 2006 Maritime Liaison Agent Training Conference which is scheduled for 04/03-07/2006. In addition, the MSP will include specific recommendations to the MLAs in the objectives which will be established for FY 2007.

Recommendation #8

OIG Recommendation: Ensure that the FBI's MOTR operations plan examines high risk scenarios, determines the required response time, and evaluates how FBI resources would address the scenarios.

FBI Response: The FBI's maritime operational response plan takes into account various high-risk scenarios to include the criminal/terrorist use of biological, chemical or radiological WMD, as well as Improvised Explosive Devices (IEDs)and Improvised Nuclear Devices (INDs). Other high-risk scenarios include a large number of hostages on a maritime platform and/or the involvement of sophisticated criminal/terrorist adversaries. The TSB's tactical response to maritime threats mirrors the response to any other tactical response. That is, the FBI tactical response is a tiered approach which recognizes that local field offices will respond as necessary (Tier 1), with regional response (Tier 2) added as the evaluation of the situation may dictate. National response, as required (Tier 3), will involve the deployment of the Hostage Rescue Team (HRT), as well as other FBI SWAT teams and possibly the HDRU and the Laboratory's HMRU, as the scenarios would necessitate. Response times vary as a consequence of venue. HRT, HDRU and HMRU response times are typically notification plus four hours for deployment in addition to any travel time involved to the specific venue.

Recommendation #9

OIG Recommendation: Establish a requirement for joint FBI/Coast Guard exercises in field offices assessed as having high-risk seaports.

FBI Response: CIRG will require the fourteen (14) field offices that have been given enhanced tactical maritime training to make overtures to the USCG to conduct joint exercises on an annual basis. It should be noted that the FBI is not in a position to require USCG participation, however, the FBI will extend the invitation to the USCG as well as to other appropriate entities.

Recommendation #10

OIG Recommendation: Resolve potential role and incident command conflicts in the event of a maritime terrorist incident through joint exercises and, if necessary, a revised and broadened

DOJ_NMG_0029337

MOU with the Coast Guard.

FBI Response: FBI concurs in stating that this is currently being addressed through the revision of the final interagency MOTR Plan. It may be premature to determine if a revised memorandum of understanding (MOU) with the USCG will be necessary until the final MOTR Plan has been approved and vetted through exercises and/or operations. Again, the FBI is not in a position to require the USCG to enter into a renewed MOU.

Recommendation #11

OIG Recommendation: Prepare after-action reports after all maritime-related exercises and use the reports to identify and disseminate lessons learned and best practices.

FBI Response: This is being addressed in a separate joint initiative within the FBI. It is anticipated an After Action Report (AAR) template will be developed that applies to all critical incidents, special events and exercises. CIRG's Crisis Management Unit (CMU) is responsible for program oversight for the production of AARs per the Manual of Investigative and Operational Guidelines (MIOG), Part 2, section 30-1.8 (1) (a), (b) and (c) which specifically sets out the requirements for AARs.

Recommendation #12

OIG Recommendation: Ensure that all field offices submit critical incident reports to the CIRG by January 15 each year; require the FBI's Maritime Security Program, in consultation with the CIRG, to use the reports to conduct maritime-specific reviews of the FBI's crisis management policies and practices — including any requirements for field office crisis management plans — and to disseminate maritime-related lessons learned and best practices.

FBI Response: CIRG's CMU ensures adherence to the MIOG's Part 2, section 30-1.8 which requires that field offices submit critical incident reports to CIRG by January 15th of each year. CTD's MSP will provide information concerning maritime related lessons learned and best practices.

Recommendation #13

OIG Recommendation: Assess the threat and risk of maritime terrorism compared to other terrorist threats and ensure the National Threat Assessment ranks the various modes of attack and targets.

FBI Response: FBI will ensure that intelligence gaps are identified and action is initiated to resolve any deficiencies.

Recommendation #14

OIG Recommendation: Ensure the amount of FBI resources dedicated to maritime terrorism is based on the extent of the maritime threat in relation to other threats.

FBI Response: FBI agrees with this recommendation. FBI will ensure that adequate resources are allocated to address priority threats.

Recommendation #15

OIG Recommendation: Monitor the progress of operating divisions and field offices in answering intelligence collection requirements pertaining to seaports and maritime terrorism.

FBI Response: The Directorate of Intelligence will provide a response to this recommendation.

Recommendation #16

OIG Recommendation: Focus intelligence reporting to more comprehensively address potential maritime-related terrorist targets and methods.

FBI Response: The Directorate of Intelligence will provide a response to this recommendation.

Recommendation #17

OIG Recommendation: Name a unit within the Counterterrorism Division to monitor the volume and substance of all FBI maritime-related intelligence.

FBI Response: FBI Counterterrorism Division will ensure that Maritime related intelligence as well as investigations are monitored and properly managed.

Recommendation #18

OIG Recommendation: Consider establishing a requirement for regular field office intelligence bulletins to summarize the field office's suspicious incident reporting and, if such a requirement is adopted, establish standardized frequency, content, and distribution requirements.

FBI Response: The Directorate of Intelligence will provide a response to this recommendation.

The FBI has prepared the appropriate responses to the recommendations found in your report. The responses have undergone a classification review (Enclosure 1) and Sensitivity Review (Enclosure 2).

The responses were coordinated through the FBI's Inspection Division. Please contact Shirlene Savoy of the Inspection Division should you have any questions. Ms. Savoy can be reached at (202) 324-1833.

Mr. Glenn A. Fine

I want to thank you again for your efforts in producing this report, and I welcome the opportunity to discuss in detail the progress the FBI continues to make in this area.

Please contact me should you have any questions regarding this matter.

Sincerely yours,

Willie T. Hulon
Assistant Director

NY judge: Endless ban on speech in NSLs likely unconstitutional

By LARRY NEUMEISTER

Associated Press Writer

NEW YORK_A federal appeals judge warned the government on Tuesday that the permanent ban on speech it seeks with its FBI national security letters _ which allow it to obtain records about people in terrorism investigations _ was probably unconstitutional.

Judge Richard Cardamone of the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals commented as the court acted on lawsuits challenging the government's ability to force companies to turn over information about customers or subscribers as part of the war on terrorism and keep quiet about it.

"While everyone recognizes national security concerns are implicated when the government investigates terrorism within our nation's borders, such concerns should be leavened with common sense so as not forever to trump the rights of the citizenry under the Constitution," he said.

Alluding to a recent change in federal law, a three-judge panel including Cardamone dismissed a Connecticut case as moot and returned a New York case to a lower court judge to see how the new law affects it.

Cardamone wrote a separate concurring opinion to highlight what he said was the government's recent insistence that a permanent ban on speech is sometimes permissible under the First Amendment. He said he suspected "a perpetual gag on citizen speech of the type advocated so strenuously by the government may likely be unconstitutional."

A telephone message left with a spokeswoman for the government was not immediately returned Tuesday evening.

Cardamone said courts historically have ruled in favor of the government when a ban on speech is limited so that it narrowly meets the demands of a compelling government interest. He said the bans are not constitutional once an investigation ends.

Lately, though, the government has insisted that permanent bans on speech are necessary in antiterrorism probes because all terrorism investigations are permanent and unending and grow out of other investigations, he said.

"The government's urging that an endless investigation leads logically to an endless ban on speech flies in the face of human knowledge and common sense: witnesses disappear, plans change or are completed, cases are closed, investigations terminate," he wrote.

He said a ban on speech and an unending shroud of secrecy concerning government actions "do not fit comfortably with the fundamental rights guaranteed American citizens" and could serve as a cover for official misconduct.

The comments came as the Manhattan court considered the First Amendment ramifications of challenges to government searches of Internet and telephone records, a right the government gained under a 1986 law that was expanded by the Patriot Act of 2001.

Recently, Congress made changes in the law that affect national security letters, or NSLs, investigative tools used by the FBI to compel businesses to turn over customer information without a judge's order or grand jury subpoena.

The changes specify that an NSL can be reviewed by a court and explicitly allows those who receive the letters to inform their lawyers about them.

The appeals court said the changes render moot a Connecticut case in which U.S. District Judge Janet Hall ruled that a gag order on librarians who received an FBI demand for records about patrons unfairly prevented them from joining a debate over the rewriting of the Patriot Act.

In the New York case, U.S. District Judge Victor Marrero had ruled that the national\l "l" security\l "l" letters\l "l" violate the Constitution because they amount to unreasonable search and seizure. He found that the nondisclosure requirement violated free speech.

The case pertained to an unidentified Internet access firm that received one of the letters in which the FBI certified that phone or Internet records are "relevant to an authorized investigation to protect against international terrorism or clandestine intelligence activities."

The appeals court said Marrero can consider new evidence or arguments and rule again.

Cardamone said the government had asked the appeals court to vacate Hall's ruling in the Connecticut case rather than leaving it unreviewed.

He said the request was "not surprising but right in line with the pervasive climate of secrecy."

He said the government, in effect, was seeking to "purge from the public record the fact that it had tried and failed to silence the Connecticut plaintiffs."

American Civil Liberties Union lawyer Ann Beeson, who argued before the appeals court, said Cardamone was "sending a strong message to the government that it can't simply claim secrecy is always necessary to protect national security."

She said it's clear the government "was using the Patriot Act as a gag to prevent these librarians in Connecticut from speaking publicly about the Patriot Act."

She said the ACLU would stage a news conference this week to "unmask our clients."

"Our clients," she said, "are very much looking forward to speaking for the first time publicly."

Appeals court shows little patience for timing of NYCLU appeal

By LARRY NEUMEISTER

Associated Press Writer

NEW YORK_The New York Civil Liberties Union got a brush off from a federal appeals court Tuesday when it sought to have a federal judge make public his secret court ruling regarding the government's wiretapping program.

A three-judge panel of the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals expressed skepticism that the NYCLU had proper standing to challenge the ruling of U.S. District Judge Thomas McAvoy in a terrorism case.

"May I ask you why you didn't ask the district court about this?" Judge Loretta A. Preska asked NYCLU attorney Arthur Eisenberg. "Shouldn't you go there first?"

Eisenberg said the civil liberties group did not go to McAvoy, who sits in Albany, because he had already defended his decision.

"It would at this point be a fruitless exercise," Eisenberg said.

The other judges on the panel expressed skepticism as well, questioning the urgency of the matter and saying the NYCLU could not pursue the claim unless it became a party to the case.

McAvoy's ruling came in a laundering case against two men, Yassin Aref, imam at an Albany mosque, and Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner and mosque member.

They were accused of laundering money from 2003 to 2004 for an FBI informant, a Pakistani businessman posing as an arms dealer. The mosque was raided by federal agents on Aug. 5, 2004, following a yearlong sting aimed at Aref.

Defense lawyers say the charges against their clients should be thrown out and evidence from wiretaps should be suppressed because illegal wiretaps may have been used.

On March 10, after the government submitted a secret court document opposing the evidence suppression demands of the defense, McAvoy rejected the defense motion in the classified ruling.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William C. Pericek told the appeals court Tuesday that the NYCLU was asking the court to rule on an issue without properly submitting it to McAvoy first.

In one nod to the NYCLU's point of view, Appeals Court Judge Dennis Jacobs noted to the prosecutor that it was "fairly unusual" for a judge to file an opinion under seal.

Pericek said it was not known how long the judge's document was.

"I don't think it's fair to call it an opinion," he said.

The appeals court did not immediately rule on the matter.

State secrets privilege slams door on civil suits

By Andrew Zajac
Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON -- A suit filed this week in Chicago by author Studs Terkel and others accusing AT&T of invading its customers' privacy by sharing phone records with the National Security Agency could provide the next test of whether the Bush administration employs a once-rare tactic that essentially gives the government a blank check to kill civil suits.

Earlier this month, Justice Department lawyers intervened in an invasion-of-privacy suit in San Francisco against AT&T and asserted what is known as the state secrets privilege by asking a judge to dismiss the case because they said allowing it to go forward would compromise national security.

The government has repeatedly invoked the state secrets privilege to head off challenges to two of the most sensitive aspects of the administration's war on terror--domestic electronic surveillance and so-called extraordinary renditions. In the latter instance, suspected terrorists are secretly picked up overseas and sent to foreign countries for interrogations under harsh conditions.

All told, the administration has asserted the privilege at least six times since 2001.

Last week, the government used the privilege to short-circuit a German man's suit alleging that he was wrongfully imprisoned in Afghanistan for five months in a case of mistaken identity. In the San Francisco invasion-of-privacy suit, brought by the non-profit Electronic Frontier Foundation, a judge has set a June date for arguments on the government's secrets claim.

The suit charges that AT&T gave the NSA access to databases of domestic and international Internet and telephone records without obtaining prior court approval.

The Justice Department declined to discuss specific cases. The department said in a statement that both the head of an agency seeking to protect information, such as the Central Intelligence Agency or NSA, and Justice Department lawyers must agree that national security is at stake before asking a court to dismiss a case.

But Harvey Grossman, legal director of the ACLU of Illinois, which co-filed the Chicago suit, said invoking the state secrets privilege has moved from an extremely selectively used tool to a weapon of choice in combating suits challenging national security policy. "Anything that touches on national security, we expect to see" an assertion of the state secrets privilege, Grossman said.

He said he expects the government to use the privilege in the Illinois lawsuit, but "we're hoping we can convince a judge that the case can be tried in a way that protects the government's legitimate interests." The Illinois case is narrower in scope than the one in California, he said.

Although use of the secrets privilege is limited to the federal government, Verizon, a telecom company linked in news accounts to the NSA surveillance program, has tried to shield itself from regulatory scrutiny by arguing that its hands are tied by the administration's use of the privilege.

"The inability of Verizon to provide information concerning its cooperation, if any, with the NSA program is further demonstrated by the `state secrets' privilege which the Department of Justice has invoked in connection with a pending federal court action," the company wrote in a filing with the Maine Public Utility Board. The board is conducting an inquiry after a customer complained.

A company spokesman declined to comment. In an earlier statement, Verizon denied supplying various specific categories of telecom data to the NSA but said it would neither confirm nor deny "whether it has any relationship to the classified NSA program."

In addition to its use in NSA surveillance cases, the state secrets privilege has been cited at least twice in high-profile cases challenging renditions.

On May 17, a Washington judge accepted the government's assertion of a secrets privilege in dismissing a case brought by Khaled al-Masri, a German citizen who said he was a victim of mistaken identity when he was arrested in Macedonia in December 2003 and flown to Afghanistan, imprisoned and beaten. The judge said that if al-Masri's claims were true, he deserved redress but that national security trumped his cause.

The government also cited state secrets in the case of Maher Arar, a Syrian and Canadian citizen who said he was detained while transiting through New York's Kennedy International Airport in September 2002 and flown to Syria, where he was imprisoned and tortured. He eventually was released and never charged with a crime.

In throwing out Arar's case in February, the judge did not specifically rule on the government's secrets claim but said Arar did not have legal standing for his suit and noted the "national security and foreign policy considerations at stake."

The state secrets privilege, recognized in modern form in a 1953 Supreme Court case, was used sparingly and narrowly for decades.

But in the past quarter-century or so, use of the privilege has grown more frequent. The scope of requests has also expanded, with the government seeking the elimination of particular pieces of evidence and asking that entire cases be tossed out of court, according to Mark Zaid, a Washington attorney who represented plaintiffs in three recent cases ended by assertion of the secrets privilege.

The privilege is a particularly lethal legal weapon because the federal judiciary is loath to dispute executive branch decisions on national security questions and almost never rejects a government request for secrecy. "The judges don't want to be the ones who release the family jewels," Zaid said.

As a result, there's a powerful temptation for government lawyers to overuse the privilege, because, Zaid said, "They know the judges will accept it."

For telecoms, a storm of lawsuits awaits; Major phone companies bob and weave on their roles in an NSA surveillance program, as they brace for legal action.

Peter Grier

Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

WASHINGTON The forecast for major US phone companies this spring: continued heat, with a 100 percent chance of gathering lawsuits.

From New York to Kentucky to Texas, lawyers specializing in class-action litigation are lining up to sue phone firms alleged to have handed over customer records to the National Security Agency without a court order. On Monday, for instance, the American Civil Liberties Union of Illinois filed suit\l "l" against AT&T, charging that its actions in the NSA program violated customer privacy.

"Having been blacklisted from working in television during the McCarthy era, I know the harm of government using private corporations to intrude into the lives of innocent Americans," says author Studs Terkel, a Windy City icon and a plaintiff in the ACLU\l "l" suit\l "l".

Despite this rush to the courthouse, it isn't yet clear which phone firms handed over what records to whom. Some companies have denied involvement - while critics note that those denials are carefully worded.

Further scrutiny by Congress or the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) is needed to resolve this issue for the public, say some.

"The accounts that have been provided by some of the phone companies regarding their involvement in the NSA program have hardly resolved the matter," wrote Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center (EPIC), in a letter to the FCC requesting an investigation.

Earlier this month, USA Today reported that AT&T, Verizon, and BellSouth had turned over the call records of millions of Americans to the US government in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks.

These records didn't include names or the contents of calls, according to the newspaper. But they did list which numbers called which other numbers, both internationally and domestically, and how those calls were routed.

This information was then sifted by powerful computers in an attempt to discover a pattern that might reveal the presence of terrorists in the US. On Tuesday, USA Today reported that the NSA had used the phone records of the known 9/11 conspirators to try to establish a model of how terrorists communicate.

The companies named in the USA Today stories have all, to varying degrees, disputed the newspaper's account.

AT&T hasn't denied it - but it hasn't confirmed it, either. And it has said that no information was released illegally.

Verizon has flatly denied involvement in the NSA program. But it has left open the issue of whether MCI, the long-distance subsidiary it acquired in January, has turned over records to the government.

BellSouth, for its part, issued a statement earlier this month that said "based on our review to date, we have confirmed no such contract exists and we have not provided bulk customer calling records to the NSA."

The use of the word "contract" in this denial appears to be a hedge, noted the EPIC in its letter to the FCC.

"With more questions being raised each day about the scope of participation by the telephone companies in the NSA's domestic surveillance program, the need for the FCC to undertake a comprehensive investigation has become clear," wrote Mr. Rotenberg.

USA Today has said it stands by its reporting on this issue, but it will review its actions in light of a call by BellSouth for a retraction.

For the phone companies, the stakes in this dispute could be enormous. If the legal claims gain traction, the case might equal in scope such past actions as litigation against the major tobacco companies.

A successful series of suits\l "l" could cost the phone companies billions of dollars.

But the cases might be difficult for plaintiffs to win. Given the scope of the government's regulatory power over phone companies, the communications behemoths might be able to argue that they were coerced to turn over phone records - if, in fact, that is what they did.

Meanwhile, Qwest, another of the so-called Baby Bell phone companies, has emerged as an unlikely hero in the case given that its former chief executive has said he rebuffed the NSA's request for call records.

Senator calls for hearings on Boeing's defense contracts; Company has agreed to big settlement

Associated Press

A senator said Tuesday he plans hearings on the defense-contracting practices that led Boeing Co. to agree to pay $615 million to end a Justice\l "l" Department\l "l" investigation.

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., said his Armed Services Committee would not limit itself to Chicago-based Boeing -- the nation's second-largest defense contractor -- and would look into other aerospace contracts with the government.

"Boeing is considered one of the premier industrial organizations not just in the United States but the entire world," said Warner, a former secretary of the Navy. "Yet they, regrettably, awakened one morning to find this situation."

Boeing spokesman Tim Neale declined to comment, citing the tentative deal with the Justice\l "l" Department\l "l".

Boeing has been under investigation for three years for allegations that it improperly obtained secret documents from rival Lockheed Martin in the late 1990s and used some of them to help win a competition for a government rocket-launching business.

As a result, the government took away about $1 billion worth of rocket launches from Boeing.

The company has faced a separate controversy over recruiting former Air Force official Darleen Druyun while she was still overseeing Boeing deals. Both Druyun and the Boeing official who recruited her went to jail for violating federal law.

Warner said the Armed Services hearings would not "go back over in a negative way some of the things that happened at Boeing," but rather would take a "constructive approach of what happened, how it happened and how Boeing has taken steps ensure it will not happen again."

The hearings will be sometime this year, but Warner said he had not decided when.

"I think this is a very important case study for the whole ... aerospace industry," he said.

FCC chief says won't probe NSA call program

Tuesday 23 May 2006, 7:34pm EST

By Jeremy Pelofsky

WASHINGTON—The Federal Communications Commission will not pursue complaints about a U.S. spy agency's access to millions of telephone records because it cannot obtain classified material, the FCC chairman said in a letter released on Tuesday.

Rep. Edward Markey, a Massachusetts Democrat, had asked communications regulators to investigate a newspaper report that AT&T Inc., Verizon Communications and BellSouth Corp. gave access to and turned over call records to help the National Security Agency fight terrorists.

"The classified nature of the NSA's activities makes us unable to investigate the alleged violations," FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, a Republican, said in the May 22 letter released by Markey.

Verizon and BellSouth denied turning over telephone call records to the NSA. BellSouth demanded USA Today retract claims in its story.

"We can't have a situation where the FCC, charged with enforcing the law, won't even begin an investigation of apparent violations of the law because it predicts the administration will roadblock any investigations citing national security," Markey said in response.

The five-member FCC oversees and regulates U.S. telecommunications. While technically independent, the commissioners are appointed by the president with no more than three from the political party controlling the White House.

The 1934 Communications Act requires telecommunications carriers to protect the confidentiality of certain consumer call information, "except as required by law" or when the customer approves its release. Violators can be fined.

Another Democrat on Tuesday said in a letter to AT&T that she understood the company may have received from the Director of National Intelligence (DNI) a waiver to avoid keeping records and from liability for actions it may be taking. She did not elaborate

"I would like more information on the Internet and phone records AT&T may have provided to the NSA and the access AT&T has provided the NSA to its telecommunications network, if any," Rep. Jan Schakowsky of Illinois said in the letter.

On May 5, President George W. Bush delegated to the DNI the authority to waive liability for national security matters if they are done in cooperation with the head of an agency or department, according to a notice in the Federal Register.

Spokesmen for the DNI and AT&T declined to comment.

Bush has refused to confirm or deny the report in USA Today but said intelligence activities he authorized were legal and the government was not probing Americans' personal lives or eavesdropping on domestic calls without court approval.

AT&T was sued by the privacy rights group Electronic Frontier Foundation for violating customer privacy by turning over telephone data to the government. The Justice Department asked that the case be dismissed, saying it could reveal military and state secrets.

The FCC's Martin said the government's arguments in that case would prevent the FCC from conducting an investigation.

Such a probe would require access to "highly sensitive classified information" and the "commission has no power to order the production of classified information," Martin said.

He said the National Security Act of 1959 prevented the disclosure of the NSA's activities.

AT&T faces privacy suit

May 24, 2006

The American Civil Liberties Union of Illinois filed a suit against AT&T, alleging that the company invaded the privacy of its Illinois customers by providing phone records to the federal government without a court order, according to a Chicago Tribune report.

The report said several prominent local residents agreed to serve as plaintiffs in the lawsuit, which targeted controversial domestic surveillance practices.

The ACLU sought no money damages, only a court order to block AT&T from providing phone records to the National Security Agency, the report said.

James Montgomery, a lawyer and former corporation counsel for the city of Chicago, said at a news conference that attorneys were among those who should be concerned. “Obviously, there will be a chilling effect on people calling lawyers,” he said.

The ACLU was seeking to bring the suit as a class action on behalf of millions of AT&T customers statewide, the report said.

The case was assigned to District Judge James Zagel, the report further said.

Lawsuit seeks to unearth CIA ties to paramilitaries

By Steven Dudley

BOGOTÁ, Colombia — A Washington-based think tank filed a lawsuit on Tuesday to force the Central Intelligence Agency to search its archives for documents that may help reveal the CIA's links to a vigilante group in Bogotá that helped Colombian and U.S. authorities track down drug lord Pablo Escobar.

In its suit, the Institute of Policy Studies (IPS) and the law firm of Brian Gaffney said CIA actions "discourage the Plaintiff, its members and other members of the public from obtaining public records from the United States government."

IPS, one of Washington's oldest think tanks, has been requesting documents on the case via the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) since 2004. The new lawsuit seeks a court order to force the CIA to search its records again so it can determine any U.S. government connections to the vigilante group, People Persecuted by Pablo Escobar, better known by its Spanish acronym PEPES.

Rival smugglers and illegal right-wing militias created the PEPES around 1992 to help authorities track down Escobar. They harassed and killed his relatives, associates and lawyers — and destroyed their properties — until Escobar was gunned down by police in December 1993.

The PEPES maintained regular relations with the Colombian police and even U.S. drug agents, U.S. documents have revealed. But IPS wants to go a step further, lead researcher Paul Paz y Mino said, by obtaining other documents on the contacts between the PEPES and U.S. officials.

"The issue is of accountability," said Paz y Mino. "This is a very pivotal issue with respect to everything that has come out in the past decade."

After the PEPES disbanded following Escobar's death, many of its members went on to form the core of what became the illegal paramilitary group United Self-Defense Forces of Colombia. Known by its Spanish acronym AUC, the paramilitaries killed thousands of civilians they suspected of being leftist guerrilla supporters.

Many AUC leaders are now under U.S. indictments on drug-trafficking charges — what Paz y Mino calls a blowback from bad U.S. policy decisions in the hunt for Escobar.

"The kind of monster the U.S. helped create was, in many ways, worse than what they wanted to destroy," he said about the PEPES morphing into the AUC.

Since 1994, human-rights groups like Amnesty International and information advocacy groups like the National Security Archives have sought to obtain information regarding the U.S. government's connections to the PEPES.

Paz y Mino said that the most startling documents made public to date reveal that even after U.S. agencies knew that the PEPES were torturing and killing people, they continued to have contacts with the vigilantes.

The CIA recently set up a detailed Web site to handle FOIA requests that states, "Because of CIA's need to comply with the national security laws of the United States, some documents or parts of documents cannot be released to the public. In particular, the CIA, like other U.S. intelligence agencies, has the responsibility to protect intelligence sources and methods from disclosure."

I spoke with Mr. Meyers this morning, Mr. Meyers is looking for reference materials, position papers used in relation to the topic you will be speaking on. I mentioned to him that you usually do not have any materials other than your written remarks. If that is different let me know and I will make certain he gets a copy of all that is needed. He also indicated that if the material is done in word form I could e-mail it to his attention to he could get it published and copied.

PREPARED REMARKS OF DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL PAUL J. MCNULTY AT THE AMERICAN ENTERPRISE INSTITUTE

WASHINGTON, D.C.

The terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001 marked a defining moment in our Nation's history. These vicious and brutal attacks resulted in over 3,000 deaths in New York City, Washington, D.C., and Pennsylvania, and shocked and horrified people throughout the world. In the aftermath of the attacks, President Bush directed then Attorney General John Ashcroft to do everything in the Department of Justice's power to prevent such destruction and devastation from happening again. The Department of Justice was called to find new and invigorated ways of using our resources to prevent future acts of terrorism.

We have responded to this call to action. Today I am here to tell that story. Since September 11th, the Department of Justice has harnessed its full resources, both here at home and around the globe, and committed those resources to preventing terrorism. And now, nearly five years after the watershed events of 9/11 and the closure of the Zacarias Moussaoui prosecution, it's a good time to take a closer look at the successes we have achieved, the difficulties we have encountered and overcome, and the challenges we face as we move forward. I speak today not only as Deputy Attorney General, but also as the former United States Attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia, where, from September 2001 to March 2006, I had the responsibility and privilege of overseeing many of the Government's more significant terrorism prosecutions.

The Department of Justice has developed a strong record of success in the war on terrorism. Our prosecutions have run the gamut and affirmed that the fight against terrorism is the Department of Justice's highest priority. We have prosecuted and convicted violent terrorists; supporters and financiers of terrorism; and persons who came to our shores and used our freedoms to advance terrorist causes. Since September 11th, individuals like Richard Reid, who tried to ignite a bomb in his shoe to kill everyone aboard an American Airlines flight bound for Miami; Sheikh Ali Al-Timimi, who encouraged young men in Virginia to travel abroad and receive military training to prepare for war against the United States; and Mohammed Al-Moayad, a Yemeni cleric who conspired and attempted to obtain over two million dollars from the United States for al-

Qaeda, Hamas, and other terrorist organizations to fund violent jihad –- among many other individuals -- have been convicted and are behind bars serving significant sentences.

The extent of September 11th's impact on the Department of Justice cannot be overstated. The magnitude of that day's tragedy transformed our counterterrorism strategy. On every level, we committed to a new strategy of prevention. The 9/11 attacks shifted the law enforcement paradigm from one of predominantly reaction to one of proactive prevention. We resolved not to wait for an attack or an imminent threat of an attack to investigate or prosecute. We pledged to those who lost their lives, to the children and loved ones they left behind, and indeed to our entire Nation that we would devote the resources and energies necessary to preventing terrorism and protecting our communities. We understood, most fundamentally, that the events of 9/11 marked a defining moment for the Department of Justice.

One of our greatest liberties is the right of all people to form and hold their own views and beliefs. Yet 9/11 displayed to the entire world how ideology can be used to inspire violence, how deep hatred toward America and its freedoms runs in some circles, and just how vigilant we must be going forward. Accordingly, if 9/11 marked a defining moment for the Department of Justice, it surely did the same for Islamic extremists and others harboring radical and dangerous views about America. The moment the Twin Towers were hit in New York, the Pentagon attacked in our Nation's capitol, and Flight 93 hijacked en route to San Francisco, people had a choice to make. They could recoil at the horrors and relinquish any thought of ever endeavoring to harm America. Or they could endorse or even celebrate those vicious attacks as a rallying point for future terrorist acts.

Since September 11th, people throughout the world, including countless Muslims, have rejected the ideology of hate that led to 9/11. But, sadly, other individuals have chosen to follow the path of terrorism.

I saw this firsthand as a United States Attorney. Take, for example, the Northern Virginia Jihad case, United States v. Ali Al-Timimi. Just four days after September 11, a group of young men gathered in an apartment in Fairfax, Virginia, and their purpose in meeting, as proven in federal court, was to discuss plans to join and support the Taliban and engage in jihad against the United States. Those men, led by Sheikh Ali Al Timimi, had a choice to make in that apartment. And, with the fires at the Pentagon still smouldered only 20 miles away, they choose not to reject extremist violence, but to embrace it and pursue it.

It was no different for Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, who, after graduating from the Islamic Saudi Academy in Alexandria, Virginia, chose to move to Saudi Arabia and later join and receive military training from al-Qaeda, and to plan attacks against the United States, including to kill the President. Nor was it different for Iyman Faris, who chose to travel to Pakistan in early 2002, discuss with al-Qaeda's Khalid Sheikh Mohammed a plan to collapse a landmark bride in New York City by severing its suspension cables with gas cutters, only then to return to the United States to assess the plan's feasibility by inspecting the bridge's structure and security.

Each of these men faced a choice. They could harbor profound discontent with America while taking care not to let that discontent boil over to criminal conduct, or they could step over that line by supporting terrorist causes. The line was as clear as their choices were criminal. By choosing to support terrorist causes, they violated the laws of the United States.

We at the Department of Justice have our own choices to make upon learning that men like Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, Iyman Faris, and members of the Northern Virginia Jihad have chosen to provide support to terrorists. We could await further action by these men and then arrest and prosecute them. Or we could prosecute at the moment our investigation reveals both a risk to our national security and a violation of our Nation's laws. In the wake of September 11, this aggressive, proactive, and preventative course is the only acceptable response from a department of government charged with enforcing our laws and protecting the American people. Awaiting an attack is not an option. That is why the Department of Justice is doing everything in its power to identify risks to our Nation's security at the earliest stage possible and to respond with forward-leaning – preventative – prosecutions.

Our record since September 11th is strong in multiple respects. In terms of numbers alone, we have charged 435 defendants and won 253 convictions in 45 different judicial districts across the country, with many of these defendants still awaiting trial. These statistics, tracked by the Justice Department's Criminal Division, represent defendants charged in terrorism or terrorism-related criminal cases with an international connection.

Of course, there is much more to success than tallying charges and convictions. A walk through these successes demonstrates the extent of the Department of Justice's commitment to prosecuting and preventing terrorism, and attests to the tireless efforts of the men and women who serve as federal prosecutors in our U.S. Attorney's Offices and at Main Justice in Washington, D.C., and to the thousands of investigators who have searched the globe for evidence.

A cornerstone of our post 9/11 efforts has been the material support statutes. Congress enacted these laws to prevent terrorism by cutting off the provision of support and resources to terrorists and terrorist organizations. Within the past two years Congress has amended the laws to expand and clarify their broad scope, making it expressly plain, for example, that anyone who receives military-type training from or on behalf of a terrorist organization commits a crime. The men I spoke of a moment ago – Abu Ali, Iyman Faris, and the members of the Northern Virginia Jihad, including Ali Al-Timimi – were convicted of violating the material support statutes, and those men presently are serving lengthy sentences.

We have successfully used the material support statutes in a host of other prosecutions as well. For example, in United States v. Yaha Goba , the so-called Lackawanna Six or Buffalo Cell case, prosecutors in the Western District of New York used the material support statutes to convict a group of defendants who traveled to Afghanistan to train in the Al Farooq camp operated by al-Qaeda. While there, the men met Osama Bin Laden and heard Bin Laden report that certain individuals were on a mission to attack the United States. The theory of the Lackawanna Six case, much like the theory of Abu Ali and Northern Virginia Jihad prosecutions, was straightforward and obviously logical: those who attend terrorist training camps and receive instruction or assist in providing instruction in how to use military-style weapons against Americans and American interests commit crimes and present grave risks to our national security.

The Department of Justice has also successfully used the material support laws to prosecute defendants beyond those who sought and received terrorist training. The U.S. Attorney's Office in the District of New Jersey, for example, prosecuted and convicted Hemant Lakhani for attempting to sell a shoulder-fired missile to an FBI cooperating witness as part of a plan to shoot-down a civilian airplane in jihad against the United States. The Southern District of New York similarly used the material support statutes to convict both Uzair Paracha for the steps he took to conceal an al-Qaeda operative's true whereabouts from law enforcement authorities.

These prosecutions, among many others, provide concrete illustration of the Department of Justice's successful use of the material support statutes, and similar laws, to prevent terrorism by prosecuting persons who have taken steps to aid, advance, and encourage terrorist causes. Use of the material support laws will remain a central component of our efforts to disrupt terrorist activity before it occurs.

Beyond the material support cases, the Department of Justice also has expanded its post 9/11 efforts to aggressively pursue crimes, such as identity theft and immigration violations, which present risks to our national security. The simple truth is that terrorists, as well as sympathizers and supporters of terrorist causes, are able to exploit weaknesses in our identification, immigration, and financial systems to facilitate future attacks. Nobody proved the point more than the September 11 hijackers, seven of whom possessed fraudulent Virginia identification cards.

In the aftermath of 9/11, therefore, it is unacceptable, if not irresponsible, to limit our counter-terrorism strategy only to prosecutions involving core terrorism or material support charges. Our preventative mission requires broader vision, including acceptance of the reality that persons presenting security risks to our Nation may be living among us under fake identities. Individuals who purposely evade immigration and identify-theft laws make a conscious choice to conceal who they are and to deceive the United States, and if our investigations and intelligence reveal that the deception is connected to, or was committed toward the end of engaging in, terrorist activity, the Department of Justice must respond. We must use the full arsenal of tools Congress has given us.

It takes little foresight to envision the rightful criticisms that would be leveled at the Department of Justice if, in response to a terrorist incident, we looked back after-the-fact and discovered that the offenders were in this country after having succeeded in committing immigration or identity fraud crimes, and we were in a position to do something about it.

Two such cases from my experience as United States Attorney in Eastern Virginia illustrate this point. In 2003, an investigation revealed that Abdurahman Muhammad al-Amoudi, a naturalized United States citizen and the founder of the American Muslim Council, had used a false Yemeni passport on numerous occasions to travel to Libya, itself a violation of federal law. When confronted with the immigration fraud, al-Amoudi admitted to the fraud and, more broadly, to participating in a Libyan plot to assassinate Crown Prince Abdullah of Saudi Arabia. Our aggressive pursuit of immigration charges against al-Amoudi resulted in a quick conviction and contributed to al-Amoudi's decision to cooperate with federal and international officials in advancing important terrorism-related investigations both within the United States and abroad.

We also used the immigration laws to convict Soliman Biheiri, an Egyptian national and the then president of a New Jersey-based Islamic investment firm suspected of having links to terrorism. When our investigation revealed that money from the investment firm may have been used to help fund the 1998 embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania and that the firm may have acquiesced in channeling money through its accounts for a known terrorist, we moved swiftly to learn all we could about Biheiri himself. In short order, we determined that Biheiri had obtained United States citizenship on the basis of a naturalization application that contained false statements. So, rather than prolong the investigation -- and thus leave open the risk to our Nation's security presented by all of the facts and circumstances we knew at the time about Biheiri –- we moved forward and prosecuted and convicted Biheiri for naturalization fraud, among other crimes.

Across the landscape of our post-9/11 prosecutions, we have achieved other important successes which deserve emphasis. Foremost, we have faced and overcome unprecedented challenges – both legally and operationally – in shepherding our cases through our criminal justice system. Let me focus specifically on our effective use of classified information in certain prosecutions, including the co-called Portland Seven case brought in the District of Oregon against Jeffrey Battle and six other defendants.

In our prosecutions involving the use of classified information, we undertake an important and essential balance. We must balance our obligation to hold defendants accountable for criminal conduct and the defendants' right to a fair trial, while, at the same time, not compromising our national security. The balance is delicate and difficult, and it ultimately takes place within the protocols Congress provided in the Classified Information Procedures Act. Article III federal judges administer these Congressionally-provided protocols and procedures in order to balance the Government's need to protect classified information with a defendant's right to a fair trial.

The Portland Seven case provides a useful illustration. The case arose out of Jeffrey Battle and others' efforts in 2001 to enter Afghanistan and fight alongside the Taliban against United States and allied forces. The prosecution entailed the use of classified materials, including electronic surveillance obtained pursuant to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. In using the evidence, prosecutors took care to adhere to the procedures delineated in the Classified Information Procedures Act by, for example, providing certain notices to defense counsel and the Court and obtaining certain protective orders. These processes – all overseen by the presiding District Court Judge – ensured that the defendants' rights remained protected throughout the litigation, while also allowing the prosecution team to make effective use of classified information.

The Portland Seven prosecution serves to illustrate yet another obstacle overcome in our post-9/11 prosecutions. As part of the USA PATRIOT Act, Congress eliminated a barrier that previously prevented prosecutors and members of the intelligence community from sharing full information with each other. The Portland Seven prosecution involved Jeffrey Battle, who, before attempting to enter Afghanistan and fight with the Taliban, had taken steps toward attacking Jewish schools and synagogues within the United States. In its investigation, the FBI shared important intelligence information with the prosecution team. This sharing enabled the FBI and prosecution to work together to monitor the risks presented by Battle, while also advancing the investigation against other members of the Portland Seven. The effort marked a significant operational successes that would not have been possible but for the USA PATRIOT Act.

While our record shows many victories in recent years, we have not always been successful. And, when we make a mistake or come up short in a prosecution, it is important to say so. We did just that in the case brought in federal court in Detroit against Karim Koubriti and others. Although the jury returned guilty verdicts, it turned out that the lead prosecutor, before trial, did not provide the defense with certain evidence that the jury properly could have viewed as exculpating Koubriti and certain other defendants of guilt. To not disclose the evidence violated the defendants' constitutional rights and breached a clear duty that prosecutors owe defendants under the law. Upon learning of the potential violation, we undertook a comprehensive investigation, which culminated in our acknowledging error and consenting to relief for the defendants. While the error we committed was undeniably grave, our response to learning of it was undeniably right. Indeed, the presiding judge, upon hearing the results of our investigation and decision to consent to relief, observed that our handling of the matter was "in the highest and best tradition of Department of Justice attorneys."

On occasion it is suggested that a jury's decision to acquit a defendant marks a setback for the Department of Justice. A variety of that particular criticism surfaced, for example, following the jury's decision to acquit Sami Amin al-Arian of certain terrorism charges and not reach a verdict on other serious terrorism charges following a long trial in federal court in Florida in 2005. That view is mistaken and especially so in the arena of terrorism prosecutions.

No apology is necessary or appropriate in response to an acquittal. We bring cases when we believe that there is proof beyond a reasonable doubt. The reality is that, while we will present the strongest case possible, a jury may not agree with our view of the strength of the evidence. That, though, is the function of a jury. We recognize that a reality of our prevention strategy is that we may find it more difficult in certain cases to marshal the evidence sufficient to convince 12 jurors beyond a reasonable doubt. That is because we must bring charges before a conspiracy achieves its goals – before a terrorist act occurs. To do so, we have to make arrests earlier than we would in other contexts where we often have the luxury of time to gather more evidence. This heightened risk of acquittals is one we acknowledge and accept given our unwavering commitment to prevent terrorists risks from materializing into terrorist acts.

It also is worth observing that the al-Arian case, in particular, culminated recently in a conviction and significant sentence. In April 2006, al-Arian pleaded guilty to conspiring to make or receive contributions of funds, goods, and services to the Palestinian Islamic Jihad terrorist group, and in doing so, admitted to engaging in acts specifically designed to advance the group's terrorist mission. In sentencing al-Arian to 57 months in prison, the District Court observed that al-Arian was "a master manipulator" who, as "a leader of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad," plotted to create "widows and orphans" through acts of terrorism.

As we approach the fifth anniversary of September 11 and move forward in our fight against terrorism, clear challenges lay ahead. Terrorists and their supporters are growing more sophisticated. They are using tools like the Internet to train and recruit new followers and to raise money to fund their causes. One of our biggest challenges, therefore, is to stay a step ahead. In our investigations, we must continue to adapt our technologies, approaches, and strategies to the ever-changing means and methods of those planning the next attack. In our prosecutions, too, we continue to face difficult challenges, including how most effectively to use classified information without compromising our Nation's security. We also regularly confront the challenging task of having to prosecute early enough to prevent harm to America, while simultaneously having to let our investigations play out long enough to allow us to identify all co-conspirators in a terrorist plot and to accumulate evidence sufficient to satisfy the demanding beyond-a-reasonable-doubt standard of proof that governs all criminal trials.

Our mission is a difficult one. Hatred for America and all that our Nation stands for remains deep-seated among many extremists. When hatred runs so deep, risks run high. Today's risks are very real, and identifying the risks before they take the form of an attack is very hard. The American people need to know that their Department of Justice embraces the challenge. We are committed to preventing terrorism and protecting our homeland. As the Attorney General has said, "[W]e have no higher calling than the protection of our fellow citizens." In responding to the calling, we are not resting on yesterday's successes, but rather are focusing on today and tomorrow's challenges.

Our efforts will remain aggressive, and they will remain fair. In our investigations, we will continue to use every tool and authority available to us to identify risks at the earliest stage possible. And, in deciding whether to prosecute, we will not wait to see what can become of risks. The death and destruction of September 11, 2001 mandate a transformed and preventative approach. Our mission, then, is clear: we will — indeed, we must — press forward aggressively in the war on terror, with prevention and protection serving as the guideposts. In carrying out our mission, we will remain focused on the freedoms we seek to protect and the risks we seek to address. The Department of Justice will remain unyielding in our commitment to preserve our cherished rights and protect our national security.

PREPARED REMARKS OF DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL PAUL J. MCNULTY AT THE AMERICAN ENTERPRISE INSTITUTE

WASHINGTON, D.C.

The terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001 marked a defining moment in our Nation's history. These vicious and brutal attacks resulted in over 3,000 deaths in New York City, Washington, D.C., and Pennsylvania, and shocked and horrified people throughout the world. In the aftermath of the attacks, President Bush directed then Attorney General John Ashcroft to do everything in the Department of Justice's power to prevent such destruction and devastation from happening again. The Department of Justice was called to find new and invigorated ways of using our resources to prevent future acts of terrorism.

We have responded to this call to action. Today I am here to tell that story. Since September 11th, the Department of Justice has harnessed its full resources, both here at home and around the globe, and committed those resources to preventing terrorism. And now, nearly five years after the watershed events of 9/11 and the closure of the Zacarias Moussaoui prosecution, it's a good time to take a closer look at the successes we have achieved, the difficulties we have encountered and overcome, and the challenges we face as we move forward. I speak today not only as Deputy Attorney General, but also as the former United States Attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia, where, from September 2001 to March 2006, I had the responsibility and privilege of overseeing many of the Government's more significant terrorism prosecutions.

The Department of Justice has developed a strong record of success in the war on terrorism. Our prosecutions have run the gamut and affirmed that the fight against terrorism is the Department of Justice's highest priority. We have prosecuted and convicted violent terrorists; supporters and financiers of terrorism; and persons who came to our shores and used our freedoms to advance terrorist causes. Since September 11th, individuals like Richard Reid, who tried to ignite a bomb in his shoe to kill everyone aboard an American Airlines flight bound for Miami; Sheikh Ali Al-Timimi, who encouraged young men in Virginia to travel abroad and receive military training to prepare for war against the United States; and Mohammed Al-Moayad, a Yemeni cleric who conspired and attempted to obtain over two million dollars from the United States for al-Qaeda, Hamas, and other terrorist organizations to fund violent jihad –- among many other individuals -- have been convicted and are behind bars serving significant sentences.

The extent of September 11th's impact on the Department of Justice cannot be overstated. The magnitude of that day's tragedy transformed our counterterrorism strategy. On every level, we committed to a new strategy of prevention. The 9/11 attacks shifted the law enforcement paradigm from one of predominantly reaction to one of proactive prevention. We resolved not to wait for an attack or an imminent threat of an attack to investigate or prosecute. We pledged to those who lost their lives, to the children and loved ones they left behind, and indeed to our entire Nation that we would devote the resources and energies necessary to preventing terrorism and protecting our communities. We understood, most fundamentally, that the events of 9/11 marked a defining moment for the Department of Justice.

One of our greatest liberties is the right of all people to form and hold their own views and beliefs. Yet 9/11 displayed to the entire world how ideology can be used to inspire violence, how deep hatred toward America and its freedoms runs in some circles, and just how vigilant we must be going forward. Accordingly, if 9/11 marked a defining moment for the Department of Justice, it surely did the same for Islamic extremists and others harboring radical and dangerous views about America. The moment the Twin Towers were hit in New York, the Pentagon attacked in our Nation's capitol, and Flight 93 hijacked en route to San Francisco, people had a choice to make. They could recoil at the horrors and relinquish any thought of ever endeavoring to harm America. Or they could endorse or even celebrate those vicious attacks as a rallying point for future terrorist acts.

Since September 11th, people throughout the world, including countless Muslims, have rejected the ideology of hate that led to 9/11. But, sadly, other individuals have chosen to follow the path of terrorism.

I saw this firsthand as a United States Attorney. Take, for example, the Northern Virginia Jihad case, United States v. Ali Al-Timimi. Just four days after September 11, a group of young men gathered in an apartment in Fairfax, Virginia, and their purpose in meeting, as proven in federal court, was to discuss plans to join and support the Taliban and engage in jihad against the United States. Those men, led by Sheikh Ali Al Timimi, had a choice to make in that apartment. And, with the fires at the Pentagon still smouldered only 20 miles away, they choose not to reject extremist violence, but to embrace it and pursue it.

It was no different for Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, who, after graduating from the Islamic Saudi Academy in Alexandria, Virginia, chose to move to Saudi Arabia and later join and receive military training from al-Qaeda, and to plan attacks against the United States, including to kill the President. Nor was it different for Iyman Faris, who chose to travel to Pakistan in early 2002, discuss with al-Qaeda's Khalid Sheikh Mohammed a plan to collapse a landmark bride in New York City by severing its suspension cables with gas cutters, only then to return to the United States to assess the plan's feasibility by inspecting the bridge's structure and security.

Each of these men faced a choice. They could harbor profound discontent with America while taking care not to let that discontent boil over to criminal conduct, or they could step over that line by supporting terrorist causes. The line was as clear as their choices were criminal. By choosing to support terrorist causes, they violated the laws of the United States.

We at the Department of Justice have our own choices to make upon learning that men like Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, Iyman Faris, and members of the Northern Virginia Jihad have chosen to provide support to terrorists. We could await further action by these men and then arrest and prosecute them. Or we could prosecute at the moment our investigation reveals both a risk to our national security and a violation of our Nation's laws. In the wake of September 11, this aggressive, proactive, and preventative course is the only acceptable response from a department of government charged with enforcing our laws and protecting the American people. Awaiting an attack is not an option. That is why the Department of Justice is doing everything in its power to identify risks to our Nation's security at the earliest stage possible and to respond with forward-leaning – preventative – prosecutions.

Our record since September 11th is strong in multiple respects. In terms of numbers alone, we have charged 435 defendants and won 253 convictions in 45 different judicial districts across the country, with many of these defendants still awaiting trial. These statistics, tracked by the Justice Department's Criminal Division, represent defendants charged in terrorism or terrorism-related criminal cases with an international connection.

Of course, there is much more to success than tallying charges and convictions. A walk through these successes demonstrates the extent of the Department of Justice's commitment to prosecuting and preventing terrorism, and attests to the tireless efforts of the men and women who serve as federal prosecutors in our U.S. Attorney's Offices and at Main Justice in Washington, D.C., and to the thousands of investigators who have searched the globe for evidence.

A cornerstone of our post 9/11 efforts has been the material support statutes. Congress enacted these laws to prevent terrorism by cutting off the provision of support and resources to terrorists and terrorist organizations. Within the past two years Congress has amended the laws to expand and clarify their broad scope, making it expressly plain, for example, that anyone who receives military-type training from or on behalf of a terrorist organization commits a crime. The men I spoke of a moment ago – Abu Ali, Iyman Faris, and the members of the Northern Virginia Jihad, including Ali Al-Timimi – were convicted of violating the material support statutes, and those men presently are serving lengthy sentences.

We have successfully used the material support statutes in a host of other prosecutions as well. For example, in United States v. Yaha Goba , the so-called Lackawanna Six or Buffalo Cell case, prosecutors in the Western District of New York used the material support statutes to convict a group of defendants who traveled to Afghanistan to train in the Al Farooq camp operated by al-Qaeda. While there, the men met Osama Bin Laden and heard Bin Laden report that certain individuals were on a mission to attack the United States. The theory of the Lackawanna Six case, much like the theory of Abu Ali and Northern Virginia Jihad prosecutions, was straightforward and obviously logical: those who attend terrorist training camps and receive instruction or assist in providing instruction in how to use military-style weapons against Americans and American interests commit crimes and present grave risks to our national security.

The Department of Justice has also successfully used the material support laws to prosecute defendants beyond those who sought and received terrorist training. The U.S. Attorney's Office in the District of New Jersey, for example, prosecuted and convicted Hemant Lakhani for attempting to sell a shoulder-fired missile to an FBI cooperating witness as part of a plan to shoot-down a civilian airplane in jihad against the United States. The Southern District of New York similarly used the material support statutes to convict both Uzair Paracha for the steps he took to conceal an al-Qaeda operative's true whereabouts from law enforcement authorities.

These prosecutions, among many others, provide concrete illustration of the Department of Justice's successful use of the material support statutes, and similar laws, to prevent terrorism by prosecuting persons who have taken steps to aid, advance, and encourage terrorist causes. Use of the material support laws will remain a central component of our efforts to disrupt terrorist activity before it occurs.

Beyond the material support cases, the Department of Justice also has expanded its post 9/11 efforts to aggressively pursue crimes, such as identity theft and immigration violations, which present risks to our national security. The simple truth is that terrorists, as well as sympathizers and supporters of terrorist causes, are able to exploit weaknesses in our identification, immigration, and financial systems to facilitate future attacks. Nobody proved the point more than the September 11 hijackers, seven of whom possessed fraudulent Virginia identification cards.

In the aftermath of 9/11, therefore, it is unacceptable, if not irresponsible, to limit our counter-terrorism strategy only to prosecutions involving core terrorism or material support charges. Our preventative mission requires broader vision, including acceptance of the reality that persons presenting security risks to our Nation may be living among us under fake identities. Individuals who purposely evade immigration and identify-theft laws make a conscious choice to conceal who they are and to deceive the United States, and if our investigations and intelligence reveal that the deception is connected to, or was committed toward the end of engaging in, terrorist activity, the Department of Justice must respond. We must use the full arsenal of tools Congress has given us.

It takes little foresight to envision the rightful criticisms that would be leveled at the Department of Justice if, in response to a terrorist incident, we looked back after-the-fact and discovered that the offenders were in this country after having succeeded in committing immigration or identity fraud crimes, and we were in a position to do something about it.

Two such cases from my experience as United States Attorney in Eastern Virginia illustrate this point. In 2003, an investigation revealed that Abdurahman Muhammad al-Amoudi, a naturalized United States citizen and the founder of the American Muslim Council, had used a false Yemeni passport on numerous occasions to travel to Libya, itself a violation of federal law. When confronted with the immigration fraud, al-Amoudi admitted to the fraud and, more broadly, to participating in a Libyan plot to assassinate Crown Prince Abdullah of Saudi Arabia. Our aggressive pursuit of immigration charges against al-Amoudi resulted in a quick conviction and contributed to al-Amoudi's decision to cooperate with federal and international officials in advancing important terrorism-related investigations both within the United States and abroad.

We also used the immigration laws to convict Soliman Biheiri, an Egyptian national and the then president of a New Jersey-based Islamic investment firm suspected of having links to terrorism. When our investigation revealed that money from the investment firm may have been used to help fund the 1998 embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania and that the firm may have acquiesced in channeling money through its accounts for a known terrorist, we moved swiftly to learn all we could about Biheiri himself. In short order, we determined that Biheiri had obtained United States citizenship on the basis of a naturalization application that contained false statements. So, rather than prolong the investigation -- and thus leave open the risk to our Nation's security presented by all of the facts and circumstances we knew at the time about Biheiri –- we moved forward and prosecuted and convicted Biheiri for naturalization fraud, among other crimes.

Across the landscape of our post-9/11 prosecutions, we have achieved other important successes which deserve emphasis. Foremost, we have faced and overcome unprecedented challenges – both legally and operationally – in shepherding our cases through our criminal justice system. Let me focus specifically on our effective use of classified information in certain prosecutions, including the co-called Portland Seven case brought in the District of Oregon against Jeffrey Battle and six other defendants.

In our prosecutions involving the use of classified information, we undertake an important and essential balance. We must balance our obligation to hold defendants accountable for criminal conduct and the defendants' right to a fair trial, while, at the same time, not compromising our national security. The balance is delicate and difficult, and it ultimately takes place within the protocols Congress provided in the Classified Information Procedures Act. Article III federal judges administer these Congressionally-provided protocols and procedures in order to balance the Government's need to protect classified information with a defendant's right to a fair trial.

The Portland Seven case provides a useful illustration. The case arose out of Jeffrey Battle and others' efforts in 2001 to enter Afghanistan and fight alongside the Taliban against United States and allied forces. The prosecution entailed the use of classified materials, including electronic surveillance obtained pursuant to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. In using the evidence, prosecutors took care to adhere to the procedures delineated in the Classified Information Procedures Act by, for example, providing certain notices to defense counsel and the Court and obtaining certain protective orders. These processes – all overseen by the presiding District Court Judge – ensured that the defendants' rights remained protected throughout the litigation, while also allowing the prosecution team to make effective use of classified information.

The Portland Seven prosecution serves to illustrate yet another obstacle overcome in our post-9/11 prosecutions. As part of the USA PATRIOT Act, Congress eliminated a barrier that previously prevented prosecutors and members of the intelligence community from sharing full information with each other. The Portland Seven prosecution involved Jeffrey Battle, who, before attempting to enter Afghanistan and fight with the Taliban, had taken steps toward attacking Jewish schools and synagogues within the United States. In its investigation, the FBI shared important intelligence information with the prosecution team. This sharing enabled the FBI and prosecution to work together to monitor the risks presented by Battle, while also advancing the investigation against other members of the Portland Seven. The effort marked a significant operational successes that would not have been possible but for the USA PATRIOT Act.

While our record shows many victories in recent years, we have not always been successful. And, when we make a mistake or come up short in a prosecution, it is important to say so. We did just that in the case brought in federal court in Detroit against Karim Koubriti and others. Although the jury returned guilty verdicts, it turned out that the lead prosecutor, before trial, did not provide the defense with certain evidence that the jury properly could have viewed as exculpating Koubriti and certain other defendants of guilt. To not disclose the evidence violated the defendants' constitutional rights and breached a clear duty that prosecutors owe defendants under the law. Upon learning of the potential violation, we undertook a comprehensive investigation, which culminated in our acknowledging error and consenting to relief for the defendants. While the error we committed was undeniably grave, our response to learning of it was undeniably right. Indeed, the presiding judge, upon hearing the results of our investigation and decision to consent to relief, observed that our handling of the matter was "in the highest and best tradition of Department of Justice attorneys."

On occasion it is suggested that a jury's decision to acquit a defendant marks a setback for the Department of Justice. A variety of that particular criticism surfaced, for example, following the jury's decision to acquit Sami Amin al-Arian of certain terrorism charges and not reach a verdict on other serious terrorism charges following a long trial in federal court in Florida in 2005. That view is mistaken and especially so in the arena of terrorism prosecutions.

No apology is necessary or appropriate in response to an acquittal. We bring cases when we believe that there is proof beyond a reasonable doubt. The reality is that, while we will present the strongest case possible, a jury may not agree with our view of the strength of the evidence. That, though, is the function of a jury. We recognize that a reality of our prevention strategy is that we may find it more difficult in certain cases to marshal the evidence sufficient to convince 12 jurors beyond a reasonable doubt. That is because we must bring charges before a conspiracy achieves its goals – before a terrorist act occurs. To do so, we have to make arrests earlier than we would in other contexts where we often have the luxury of time to gather more evidence. This heightened risk of acquittals is one we acknowledge and accept given our unwavering commitment to prevent terrorists risks from materializing into terrorist acts.

It also is worth observing that the al-Arian case, in particular, culminated recently in a conviction and significant sentence. In April 2006, al-Arian pleaded guilty to conspiring to make or receive contributions of funds, goods, and services to the Palestinian Islamic Jihad terrorist group, and in doing so, admitted to engaging in acts specifically designed to advance the group's terrorist mission. In sentencing al-Arian to 57 months in prison, the District Court observed that al-Arian was "a master manipulator" who, as "a leader of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad," plotted to create "widows and orphans" through acts of terrorism.

As we approach the fifth anniversary of September 11 and move forward in our fight against terrorism, clear challenges lay ahead. Terrorists and their supporters are growing more sophisticated. They are using tools like the Internet to train and recruit new followers and to raise money to fund their causes. One of our biggest challenges, therefore, is to stay a step ahead. In our investigations, we must continue to adapt our technologies, approaches, and strategies to the ever-changing means and methods of those planning the next attack. In our prosecutions, too, we continue to face difficult challenges, including how most effectively to use classified information without compromising our Nation's security. We also regularly confront the challenging task of having to prosecute early enough to prevent harm to America, while simultaneously having to let our investigations play out long enough to allow us to identify all co-conspirators in a terrorist plot and to accumulate evidence sufficient to satisfy the demanding beyond-a-reasonable-doubt standard of proof that governs all criminal trials.

Our mission is a difficult one. Hatred for America and all that our Nation stands for remains deep-seated among many extremists. When hatred runs so deep, risks run high. Today's risks are very real, and identifying the risks before they take the form of an attack is very hard. The American people need to know that their Department of Justice embraces the challenge. We are committed to preventing terrorism and protecting our homeland. As the Attorney General has said, "[W]e have no higher calling than the protection of our fellow citizens." In responding to the calling, we are not resting on yesterday's successes, but rather are focusing on today and tomorrow's challenges.

Our efforts will remain aggressive, and they will remain fair. In our investigations, we will continue to use every tool and authority available to us to identify risks at the earliest stage possible. And, in deciding whether to prosecute, we will not wait to see what can become of risks. The death and destruction of September 11, 2001 mandate a transformed and preventative approach. Our mission, then, is clear: we will — indeed, we must — press forward aggressively in the war on terror, with prevention and protection serving as the guideposts. In carrying out our mission, we will remain focused on the freedoms we seek to protect and the risks we seek to address. The Department of Justice will remain unyielding in our commitment to preserve our cherished rights and protect our national security.

CIVIL DIVISION
DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

SUBCOMMITTEE ON COMMERCIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY
UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

CONCERNING
BUDGET AND RESOURCE NEEDS OF THE JUSTICE DEPARTMENT CIVIL DIVISION
FOR FISCAL YEAR 2007

APRIL 26, 2006

Chairman Cannon, Congressman Watt, and Members of the Subcommittee:

I appreciate the opportunity to discuss the work of the Civil Division of the Department of Justice and our budget and resource needs for Fiscal Year 2007.

The Division represents the interests of the United States in a wide range of civil matters. Our cases encompass virtually every aspect of the Federal government – from defending the constitutionality of Federal statutes to recovering money defrauded from Government programs, to the administration of national compensation programs, to the representation of Federal agencies and Government employees in a host of matters that arise as part and parcel of Government operations – contract disputes, allegations of negligence and discrimination, loan defaults, and immigration matters. The Division employs 660 attorneys and 295 full and part time employees who provide essential paralegal, administrative, and clerical support.

In FY 2005, the Civil Division accomplished the following:

DOJ_NMG_0029373

- Worked with the United States Attorneys to recover more than $1 billion dollars lost through fraud against Government programs;

- Protected the public fisc from billions of dollars in claims arising from the Government's commercial activities;

- Protected the public fisc from over $1 billion dollars in tort claims arising from the Government's past and current operational programs and activities;

- Defended against challenges to Congressional and Executive exercises of power;

- Played a major role in the administration of the Vaccine Injury Compensation Program, which was established by Congress;

- Represented individual Government employees sued in connection with their performance of official duties; and

- In the period since the September 11th attacks, defended the Federal government's coordinated response to those attacks and the Administration's policies designed to prevent future acts of terrorism.

NATIONAL SECURITY

Among the laws and policies of greatest importance to the Administration, the Congress, and the public are those intended to protect our nation's security. Our leadership has committed itself to devoting all resources necessary to disrupt, weaken, and eliminate terrorist networks; to prevent terrorist operations; and to bring to justice perpetrators of terrorist attacks. And we in the Civil Division are privileged to contribute to this mission through our representation of the United States in litigation that relates to the Federal government's efforts to protect against threats to our national security. In fulfilling our litigation responsibilities, we take seriously the Attorney General's charge to address terrorism and other threats to the United States with integrity and devotion to our nation's highest ideals.

Civil cases related to the war on terrorism often raise complex issues. And the consequences are large, as litigation losses in this area could undercut policies of crucial importance to the security of our citizens. By way of example, Civil Division attorneys have defended the Government in the following matters: challenges to the USA PATRIOT Act; decisions to freeze the assets of terrorist organizations; enforcement actions involving the detention and removal of suspected alien terrorists; and designations of Specially Designated Global Terrorists.

* * * * *

While national security cases are paramount, they nonetheless represent a small fraction of the cases and matters pending with the Civil Division in FY 2006. This vast and diverse workload is handled by our trial attorneys who spend their time on the front lines of litigation – preparing motions, taking depositions, negotiating settlements, conducting trials, and pursuing appeals.

WORKLOAD TRENDS

Over the past four years, the Civil Division's caseload has increased by more than 70 percent. In FY 2002, we handled about 31,000 cases and matters, but by FY 2005, our caseload exceeded 52,000. This increase is attributable to two main factors: (1) significant growth in the number of claims filed with the compensation programs; and (2) a dramatic rise in appellate cases resulting from increased challenges to immigration enforcement actions.

IMMIGRATION LITIGATION

The Office of Immigration Litigation ("OIL") defends the Government's immigration laws and policies and handles challenges to immigration enforcement actions. At no time in history has this mission been so important, and never before has it consumed as many of the Department's resources as it does today.

Immigration attorneys defend the Government's efforts to detain and remove terrorists and criminal aliens. Since 9/11, OIL has handled and assisted in hundreds of cases involving aliens of national security interest. On average, OIL defends the detention and removal of approximately 1,500 criminal aliens each year. Vigorous defense of these cases is critical to our national security and the safety of our communities. OIL also provides liaison and training to all of the Government's immigration agencies, enabling enforcement efforts at and within our borders to enjoy dependable support before the courts.

Immigration litigation has been, by far, the fastest growing component of the Civil Division's docket. The Division is responsible for handling or overseeing all Federal court challenges to decisions of the Board of Immigration Appeals ("BIA"), and the number of these challenges has grown significantly in recent years. OIL's docket of pending cases has nearly tripled in the past four years, growing from 6,200 cases in FY 2002 to over 17,000 cases in FY 2005.

This growth stems from several factors. In 2003, much of the growth was attributed to the Department's streamlining reforms, which increased the productivity of the BIA and thus helped clear a sizable backlog of cases. The backlog has since been cleared. Now, the growth stems primarily from heightened immigration enforcement activities pursued by the Department of Homeland Security and the rapid increase in the rate at which aliens appeal BIA decisions to the Federal courts, which has increased from 6 percent to 29 percent over the past four years. There is no reason to expect this rate to subside. Aliens now must turn to the courts to get the delay in removal that was once reliably provided simply by an administrative appeal to the BIA.

This enormous growth has driven OIL's caseload per attorney to over 155 in FY 2005, more than doubling the historic caseload of 60 cases per attorney. Even with the Congress' favorable approval of the Division's FY 2006 request, OIL's rising caseload has negated whatever gains might have been achieved with this increase. Without additional resources in FY 2007, the attorney caseload is expected to remain at the untenable level of 155 cases per attorney. The Division and the Department have responded to this crisis, assigning immigration cases to other attorneys throughout the Department. These stopgap measures, which task attorneys who lack OIL's experience and efficiency in handling immigration matters, are not a permanent solution.

The Office of Immigration Litigation will continue to face an overwhelming workload in FY 2007. Therefore, the President requests in his FY 2007 budget a program increase of 114 positions (86 attorneys), 57 FTEs, and $9,566,000 for immigration litigation.

PROTECTING THE PUBLIC FISC

Our dockets are filled with cases that involve substantial monetary claims against the Government. The significance of these claims cannot be overstated.

Our responsibilities have included: (1) the 122 Winstar suits in which hundreds of financial institutions have sought tens of billions of dollars for alleged losses that occurred in the wake of banking reforms enacted in the 1980s; (2) the Cobell class action – perhaps the largest ever filed against the Government; and (3) numerous complex, sensitive, and challenging tort cases based on Federal programs and activities, including defense and national security programs, law enforcement activities, and other Government operations, in which the Civil Division has successfully protected the public fisc from approximately $1 billion in unmeritorious tort claims in the last fiscal year.

In thousands of other defensive monetary matters, our mission is to ensure that the will of Congress and the actions of the Executive branch are vigorously and fairly defended, and that meritless claims are not paid from the public fisc. Thus far, we have been largely successful. For example, seventy of the original 122 Winstar suits have been resolved without the Government paying any money whatsoever. And in 2005 alone, we defeated over $3.9 billion in groundless Winstar claims asserted against the United States.

RECOVERING FEDERAL FUNDS

In any given year, about 15 percent of our cases involve affirmative litigation on which we work with United States Attorneys to enforce Government regulations and policies, and to recover money owed the Government from commercial transactions, bankruptcy proceedings, and fraud. The bulk of affirmative monetary recoveries stem from fraud suits. As in the last several years, health care in FY2005 accounted for the lion's share of the Department's fraud settlements and judgments – more than $1.1 billion was recovered in that year alone. This number includes both whistleblower claims and those initiated by the United States in independent fraud investigations. Most of our recoveries in this area are returned to the Medicare and Medicaid programs, but substantial recoveries also are returned to the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, the Department of Defense TRICARE program, the Department of Veterans Affairs, and the Railroad Retirement Board. The coming fiscal year promises to continue, if not exceed, this trend. Health care fraud recoveries in the first four months of this fiscal year already exceed $600 million. The following recent recoveries illustrate our efforts in this area:

We obtained $325 million from HealthSouth Corporation, the Nation's largest provider of rehabilitative medicine services. Allegations against HealthSouth included false claims for outpatient physical therapy services that were not properly supported by certified plans of care, administered by licensed physical therapists, or for one-on-one therapy as represented. Of similar magnitude was a recent settlement with Gambro Healthcare for $310 million to resolve allegations of false claims for Medicare and Medicaid in connection with dialysis services. Gambro Supply Corporation, the sham durable medical equipment company and a wholly owned subsidiary of Gambro Healthcare, paid a $25 million criminal fine and agreed to permanent exclusion from the Medicare program.

One of the largest areas of the Department's health care fraud caseload are matters against pharmaceutical companies or other related entities, charging various kinds of fraud on the Medicare and Medicaid programs in the pricing or delivery of drugs. To date, we have recovered more than $4.7 billion in criminal fines and civil recoveries in these cases, much of it returned to the Medicare and Medicaid programs. Indeed, there now are more than 150 qui tam cases filed by whistleblowers under the False Claims Act that allege various schemes associated with government drug plans.

Just this past December, Serono S.A., a Swiss biotechnical corporation, and its United States subsidiaries, entered into a global criminal, civil, and administrative settlement for $704 million, making it one of the largest health care fraud settlements the Department has reached. Serono Labs, one of the subsidiaries, pled guilty to two counts of conspiracy: the first, conspiring to introduce and deliver for introduction into interstate commerce, with intent to defraud or mislead, adulterated medical devices; the second, conspiring to knowingly and willfully pay illegal remuneration to health care providers to induce them to refer patients to pharmacies for the furnishing of the drug Serostim, for which payments were made in whole or in part by the Medicaid program. Serono Labs paid a criminal fine of $136.9 million and reached a civil settlement of its False Claims Act liability of $567 million. This amount was paid to the United States and to State Medicaid programs (the Federal share of which was $305 million).

Finally, in the first settlement of its kind, the pharmacy benefit manager AdvancePCS agreed in 2005 to pay $137.5 million to resolve its civil liability in connection with soliciting and receiving kickbacks from pharmaceutical manufacturers and paying kickbacks to potential customers to induce them to contract with AdvancePCS. This investigation exposed the hidden financial relationships maintained by pharmacy benefits managers with drug manufacturers and health plans that ultimately influenced the nature and the brand of drugs prescribed to Medicare beneficiaries. We think the lessons learned in this case and its progeny will be particularly instructive as we monitor potential fraudulent conduct in the Medicare prescription drug program now coming on line.

The Government's ability to handle these cases is directly linked to available resources in the Civil Division. These cases are highly complex and resource intensive. Investigative work includes massive document collections, witness interviews, research, and interagency coordination. Millions of taxpayer dollars are lost each year to health care fraud, and any effective effort to contain the cost of Medicare and Medicaid must also incorporate strategies aimed at stopping such fraud.

ALTERNATIVES TO LITIGATION

In addition to its litigation work, the Civil Division also helps to administer alternatives to litigation. The Vaccine Injury Compensation Program, for example, was created in 1986 by the National Childhood Vaccine Injury Act to encourage childhood vaccination by providing a streamlined system for compensation in rare instances where an injury results. The Vaccine Injury Compensation Trust Fund, from which compensation awards are paid to eligible claimants, derives its funding from an excise tax on vaccine manufacturers and provides reimbursement to the Departments of Justice and Health and Human Services, as well as to the Court of Federal Claims, for expenses related to the administration of the Program. To date, over 1,960 families or individuals have been paid nearly $1.58 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0029377

Similarly, Congress passed the Radiation Exposure Compensation Act ("RECA") in 1990 to offer an apology and compensation to individuals who suffered disease or death as a result of the Nation's nuclear weapons testing program during the Cold War Era. In July 2000, RECA Amendments were enacted which significantly expanded the scope of the Act. Major changes included new categories of beneficiaries, expansion of eligible diseases, and geographic areas. Annual capped mandatory appropriations did not keep pace with the increased number of new claim filings and resulted in shortfalls of funds for eligible claimants. However, I am pleased to report that the Trust Fund is currently solvent. In FY 2005, Congress ensured adequate long-term funding by requiring that payments to certain RECA claimants be made from the Energy Employees Occupational Illness Trust Fund. Additional legislation conferred mandatory and indefinite funding status for the remaining RECA claimants beginning in FY 2006. To date, over 15,200 claims have been approved, representing over $1 billion paid to eligible claimants or their surviving beneficiaries.

PERFORMANCE

By concentrating on the Civil Division's top priorities, this testimony provides little elaboration on the thousands of cases and matters that form the traditional core of our work.

The Civil Division has a longstanding commitment to maximizing the effectiveness of scarce Government resources. It is with pride that I can report that performance targets across the board were met or exceeded in FY 2005, as we succeeded in recovering substantial funds owed to the Government, defeating unmeritorious claims, and prevailing in the vast majority of cases involving challenges to the programs of some 200 client agencies.

PRESIDENT'S BUDGET REQUEST

The President's FY 2007 request seeks 1,208 positions (834 attorneys); 1,176 FTEs; and $213,286,000, which includes a program increase of 114 positions (86 attorneys) and $9,566,000 for immigration litigation. Also included in this request are the base resources required to maintain the superior legal representation services that have yielded such tremendous success, and additional funds to support the Office of Immigration Litigation's important mission.

At this time, Mr. Chairman, I would be happy to address any questions you or Members of the Subcommittee may have.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Lawyers Question Gonzales Justification For NSA Telephone Call Database. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' legal justification for collecting domestic telephone records as part of the Bush Administration's domestic surveillance program is being questioned by civil liberties lawyers The Washington Post (5/25, A8, Pincus, 744K) reports that Gonzales cited the 27-year-old court ruling in Smith v. Maryland, noting, that 'those kinds of records do not enjoy Fourth Amendment protection.'" Noting that "Congress in 1986 passed the Electronic Communications Privacy Act in reaction to the Smith v. Maryland ruling to require court orders before turning over call records to the government, G. Jack King Jr. of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers said Gonzales is correct in saying 'the administration isn't violating the Fourth Amendment' but 'he's failing to acknowledge that it is breaking" the 1986 law, which requires a court order 'with a few very narrow exceptions.'"

In an exclusive on its web site, Time (5/24, Dell) reported, "It remains an open question whether law enforcement obtaining the private phone records of Americans in this fashion is actually illegal. While most data brokers claim there is no specific law against the sale of phone records, as there is with banking records, and therefore it should not be illegal, the Federal Trade Commission and numerous state attorney generals disagree."

ACLU Asks States To Investigate Phone Companies. Meanwhile, the New York Times (5/25, Belson, 1.19M) reports that the ACLU is asking the utility commissions in 21 states to investigate whether phone companies turned over customer records to the NSA without warrants. The ACLU "is approaching the state commissions because they often monitor the privacy and abuse of customer data. The group said it also hoped to clarify whether local as well as long-distance calls had been monitored."

WPost Says Senate Panel Should Delay Markup Of Warrantless Wiretapping Bills. An editorial in the Washington Post (5/25, A28, 744K) says, "Today the Senate Judiciary Committee will consider bills on warrantless wiretapping. None should move. … We sympathize with members eager to get the program under some legal control. But action, in advance of real understanding of the surveillance, risks authorizing too much or failing to address the issues that led the administration to act outside of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which regulates domestic electronic surveillance." The Post adds, "The goal of legislation should be to legitimize important surveillance by requiring judicial review, limiting the use of material collected to counterintelligence purposes and ensuring that irrelevant material is not retained. The best way for the Judiciary Committee to move toward this goal is to hold off on a markup and insist that it receive more information about the program -- so that it's not shooting in the dark."

FBI Seeking Interviews With House Members Over NSA Program Leak. Roll Call (5/25, Bresnahan, Kane) reports, "The FBI is seeking interviews with top House Members from both parties to determine whether they leaked details of the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program to The New York Times, further fanning the flames of an already tense relationship between Capitol Hill and the Bush administration. Those being targeted for interviews include GOP and Democratic leaders, as well as the chairmen and ranking member of the Intelligence committee." Roll Call adds, "While acknowledging his support for rooting out those who leak classified information," House Intelligence Chairman Pete Hoekstra "expressed concerns over whether having the FBI question the lawmakers who oversee their agency would upset the balance of power between Congress and the administration."

Chertoff, McNulty Defend Administration's Anti-Terror Record. Two senior Administration officials yesterday defended the government's anti-terrorism record, saying agencies have been very successful in preventing terror attacks at home and abroad. The Washington Post (5/25, A8, Eggen, 744K) reports, "Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty, in a speech at the conservative American Enterprise Institute in Washington, said the Justice Department has 'developed a strong record of success in the war against terrorism' -- citing prosecutions against admitted al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui and other defendants around the country since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. In a separate meeting with editors and reporters at The Washington Post, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the government has made 'a significant amount of progress' in guarding against cataclysmic attacks and more limited operations, such as the Madrid commuter train bombings."

The Washington Times (5/25, Seper, 90K) reports that McNulty said the Justice Department "is committed to a new strategy of prevention -- from one of predominantly reaction to one of being proactive. He said the government is determined to prosecute cases immediately when an investigation reveals both a risk to national security and a violation of its laws. He said this 'aggressive, proactive and preventative course' is the only acceptable response."

Columnist Questions Gonzales' Use Of Espionage Act Against Reporters. In a column distributed by Scripps Howard (5/25), Dale McFeatters writes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told a TV talk show that the Justice Department was actively investigating the leak of the Bush administration's warrantless-wiretapping program and might prosecute the journalists who reported it. … 'There are some statutes on the book which, if you read the language carefully, would seem to indicate that that is a possibility,' he said." McFeatters continues, "Gonzales' reading of the law should be taken seriously because he has written or signed off on some of the administration's most questionable decisions - like the very same warrantless wiretapping of international calls and e-mails, when the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act seems to quite clearly say warrants are required. … He signed off on a memo that condoned brutal treatment, if not outright torture, of prisoners taken in the war on terror and declared U.S. laws banning torture inapplicable. And he declared the Geneva Conventions, the international treaty calling for humane treatment of prisoners of war, 'obsolete' and said that it too didn't apply to enemy combatants." McFeatters adds, "The law that Gonzales is now reading closely because it might pertain to the leaks to the media is the Espionage Act of 1917, a broadly - some would say sloppily - drawn law that, among much else, criminalizes the possession of classified information. With good reason, the law has been little used since. … The law was of little use against actual espionage, but the Woodrow Wilson administration, which rivaled this White House in self-righteousness, used it enthusiastically to harass and jail labor leaders, socialists, conscientious objectors, pacifists, assorted other leftists and people who just plain shot off their mouths in ways that irritated the government. The government silenced something like 75 newspapers - by barring them from the mail - for opposing the Wilson administration on the war. … In essence, the actual use of the Espionage Act was to suppress domestic dissent. Based on the attorney general's reading of that law, might it not be making a comeback in a similar role?"

UK Police Arrest Eight Terror Suspects. British police staged raids across the country yesterday, netting eight people who are suspected of plotting terror attacks abroad. The New York Times (5/25, Lyall, 1.19M) reports, "The eight, who were detained in Manchester, Liverpool and London, were held under various government powers, the authorities said. Those powers included antiterrorism and immigration laws that allow the home secretary to deport foreigners whose presence in the country 'is not conducive to the public good for reasons of national security.' The authorities would not release the suspects' names or nationalities, or other details about them."

The Washington Post (5/25, A22, Sullivan, 744K) reports, "The BBC and other British news organizations reported that one of the men arrested was Tahir Nasuf, 44, who works for the Sanabel Relief Agency, a group that the U.S. government has accused of financing terrorist operations. Home Office and police spokesmen declined to comment on those reports. The Web site for Sanabel, based in Birmingham, says the organization's 'task is to aid and relieve Muslims in the destitute parts of the world.' U.S. officials, however, have said the group is affiliated with al-Qaeda and has attempted to overthrow the Libyan leader, Moammar Gaddafi."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Pakistani Immigrant Convicted Of Plotting NYC Subway Attack. The New York Times (5/25, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports, "A federal jury in Brooklyn convicted a Pakistani immigrant yesterday in the plot to blow up the Herald Square subway station in 2004," rejecting Shahawar Matin Siraj's "defense that a paid police informer had entrapped him by stoking his rage with images of Muslims abused at the hands of Americans." The Times notes, "While the case was a victory for federal prosecutors in Brooklyn, it was also one for the New York Police Department, which has retooled since the Sept. 11 attacks, with the aim of preventing new ones. The trial was the first time that a federal terrorism investigation was largely conducted by the department's Intelligence Division, rather than the F.B.I." The New York Sun (5/25, Greenstein) also reports that Siraj's conviction is being hailed as a victory in New York City's war on terrorism. … 'The verdict is an important milestone in safeguarding New York against terrorist plotters whether homegrown or foreign,' Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said in a statement issued yesterday. He congratulated the police officers 'who stopped the worst from happening,' and the prosecutors 'who made certain justice was pursued.'" The New York Daily News (5/25, Marzulli, 729K) also calls the conviction a "major victory" for the NYPD. The New York Post (5/25, Haberman, 624K), AP (5/25) and AFP (5/25) also report on the conviction, as is CNN's American Morning this morning.

Man Killed By Air Marshals Was Shot 11 Times. The New York Times (5/25, Goodnough, 1.19M) reports Rigoberto Alpizar, a man fatally shot by federal air marshals at Miami International Airport in December, was shot "numerous times, according to an autopsy report released a day after state prosecutors declared the shooting 'legally justified' and said no criminal charges would be filed." The Miami-Dade County Medical Examiner Department said Alpizar "had been wounded 11 times — in the chest, abdomen, shoulder, hand, wrist and forearm." The marshals involved in the shooting said "after one marshal started shooting…, Mr. Alpizar kept approaching, compelling them to keep firing."

100% Container Inspection Criticized. Randall Larsen, director of the Institute for Homeland Security, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (5/25, A14, 2.11M) writes that while the closure or restriction of US land, air and sea ports in 9/11's aftermath "was understandable," but "too many people remain committed to a port and border security paradigm that is short on risk analysis and offers little or no value to the nation." Congressional proposals to inspect 100% "of all 12 million containers entering the US" would cost billions, and could make the nation less secure "because the money could have been spent on programs with a far better return on investment." Larsen adds, "A thinking enemy will not be deterred by deadbolt locks on America's front doors (our seaports) when our windows and back doors (7,000 miles of virtually unguarded land borders and 95,000 miles of shoreline) remain wide open."

Collins, Murray Say GreenLane Act Would Close "Gaping Security Holes." Sens. Susan Collins and Patty Murray, in the Hill's Congress Blog (5/25), write that cargo containers, "a linchpin of our economy," are also "among the greatest threats to our economy — and our safety. … Terrorists could turn a container itself into a weapon or use containers to import a dirty bomb or parts for a weapon they would assemble on our own shores or to transport terrorists themselves." Collins and Murray go on to tout their "GreenLane Maritime Cargo Security Act, which was recently approved by the Senate Homeland Security Committee," which they say "would finally begin to close the gaping security holes in our cargo system while maintaining an efficient flow of commerce."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Cautiously Hints Of Change In US Role In Iraq. The AP (5/24, Pickler) writes, "The White House said Wednesday the formation of Iraq's new government presents an opportunity to review the need for US troops but cautioned against setting timetables for withdrawals." White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "What is going to happen, I think it's very safe to say, is that increasingly American, British and other coalition forces are going to move into support roles as Iraqi forces themselves move into lead roles." The news comes as President Bush and British PM Tony Blair meet on Thursday and Friday. Both leaders are "under pressure to make troop cutbacks."

Rice Sees "Very Big Change" In US Role. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (5/24) if there is an "end in sight" in Iraq. Rice said, "I certainly see that the Iraqis have now developed a political process and a political system that means that Iraqis are going to be in control of their future." Rice added, "I see a very big change in the way that we have to support them. Now, we've been through interim governments, and transitional governments, and provision governments, and now they finally have a permanent government."

New Iraqi PM Claims Country Can Take Over Security In 18 Months. The AP (5/24, Quinn) reports that new Iraqi PM Nouri al-Maliki said Iraqi forces could "take control of security" in the entire country "within 18 months," although he acknowledged a need for more "recruits, training, and equipment." Al-Maliki "did not mention a timetable for U.S.-led coalition forces to leave." The AP writes that "handing over security responsibilities to the Iraqis does not necessarily mean that significant numbers of U.S.-led forces will start returning home. Instead, plans call for them to move from cities to large coalition bases -- where they will be on call if needed." The Los Angeles Times also carried this article.

NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 3, 2:35, Engel, 9.87M) interviewed Maliki, who "tried to reach out to the American people. He says he has a new priority to get his own security forces up and running quickly so that American troops can go home." Nouri al-Maliki (via translator): "Considering our determination to build our forces, we will be finished by the end of 2007." Engel: "But US troops in Iraq, he said, must stay for now. Pulling them out would be too destabilizing. Maliki sees American forces playing a very different role 18 months from now. First, there would be fewer American troops, and, he said, instead of fighting, they would be in a supporting role, mostly confined to their bases, where they would provide air support, logistics, training, and be a rapid reaction force." Nouri al-Maliki (via translator): "They would be contingency forces to confront emergencies that could challenge this still relatively new nation."

Health Care Falls Under Sadr's Grip. The Christian Science Monitor (5/25, Murphy, 61K) reports of the Iraqi health ministry, "The ministry is run by the militant Shiite movement led by cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, one of Maliki's key backers." Doctors and nurses complain that "administrative posts have gone to unqualified members of his movement." In addition, Sunnis allege that Sunnis seeking relatives' bodies at the morgue "have themselves been abducted and killed by militias working at the site. Baghdad residents interviewed claim that a bribe of $100 is required to claim a body for burial."

WSJournal Assesses New Iraqi Cabinet. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, 2.11M) editorializes that the Iraqi cabinet is an "important milestone." However, the lack of defense and interior ministers shows that "very much hard work lies ahead." The Journal says critically that "sectarian political tokenism has been the order of the day," putting more burdens on new Prime Minister Al-Maliki. It adds that the "most urgent need" is to improve security in Baghdad.

Murder Charges Likely As US Begins Probe Of Iraqi Civilian Deaths. The AP (5/24, Reid) reports, "The U.S. military has opened a criminal investigation into allegations that U.S. Marines killed an Iraqi civilian west of Baghdad last month." The US command's statement said that suspects included "'several service members' from the Third Battalion, Fifth Marine Regiment, in the Falluja area, 40 miles west of Baghdad." The CBS Evening News (5/24, story 3, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "CBS News has learned that seven Marines were involved and they're back in this country now pending the investigation."

The Washington Times (5/25, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "Defense attorneys expect the Marine Corps to file murder charges against one or more Marines who conducted raids in Haditha in November that resulted in the deaths of more than 20 Iraqi civilians." NCIS agents have been questioning members of the 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, at Camp Pendleton. As many as a "dozen Marines" could need attorneys.

US General Testifies At Abu Ghraib Abuse Trial. The New York Times (5/25, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "Maj. Gen. Geoffrey D. Miller said Wednesday that he never suggested that dogs be used to intimidate prisoners during interrogations in Iraq." Miller said that he recommended using dogs to help with "custody and control." Miller's 2003 visit to Iraq "has been depicted as importing harsh interrogation techniques from Guantánamo," where he was commander of the detention center.

Zarqawi Backers Impose Sharia In Sunni Neighborhood. The Washington Times (5/25, Behn, 90K) reports, "Imams loyal to terrorist leader Abu Musab Zarqawi have issued threats in mosques in a western Baghdad neighborhood against anyone who does not follow Islamic law." A neighborhood resident described the rules: "Women must stay at home, and girls cannot go to school past primary school. People selling Iranian products will either have to throw them out or get killed."

Aziz Testifies At Saddam's Trial. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Roug, 958K) reports, "Former Foreign Minister Tariq Aziz, a member of Saddam Hussein's inner circle, took the stand at Saddam's trial Wednesday and accused the Shiite party of Iraq's new prime minister of trying to kill Aziz decades earlier." Aziz claimed that in 1980 Shiite "assailants threw several hand grenades at him," killing several bystanders. The assertion by Aziz appears to be an attempt to discredit the new prime minister's Dawa party.

USA Today (5/25, Jervis, 2.31M) reports that the testimony was Aziz's first public appearance "since his arrest" in 2003. In it, Aziz defended as legitimate "Saddam's actions in response to a 1982 assassination attempt," in which "hundreds of mostly Shiite men, women and children were jailed and some tortured and murdered following the assassination attempt."

The Washington Post (5/25, A24, Knickmeyer, 744K) describes Aziz as "thinner and paler" than when he was last seen in public. It reports that "Judge Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman … appeared irritated at times that Aziz was testifying despite having no direct knowledge of the events surrounding Hussein's trial."

The New York Times (5/25, Burns, 1.19M) reports that Aziz's testimony "gushed with adulation" for his former boss.

Romney Visits Iraq. The AP (5/24, Johnson) writes, "Republican Gov. Mitt Romney, a potential 2008 presidential candidate, said Wednesday he was impressed by the determination of U.S. forces following a fact-finding trip but couldn't say when Iraqis could assume security operations from the Americans." He was accompanied by "Democratic Gov. Brian Schweitzer of Montana and Republican Gov. Matt Blunt of Missouri. About half the nation's governors have made similar trips." The AP writes, "Romney has steadfastly pledged his support for President Bush and the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, while criticizing Bush for not doing an 'adequate job' outlining the rationale for the war."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/24, Blitzer) reports, "Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney is visiting Iraq, a trip that could help burnish his foreign policy credentials, if he runs for president. The Republican governor met with U.S. military and diplomatic officials earlier today."

US Expresses Regret For Afghan Civilian Deaths. The Washington Post (5/25, A21, Constable, 744K) reports, "The U.S. military expressed regret Wednesday for the deaths of a reported 16 civilian villagers Monday in U.S. airstrikes near here, but officials and elders said Taliban insurgents were responsible for the incident." The Post reports, "Some tribesmen in the Panjwai district, where Azizi is located, reportedly support the revived Taliban insurgency … But others publicly blamed the Taliban for using civilian homes as shelter and said they were planning to demand that the insurgents leave the area."

29 Afghanis Killed In Continued Fighting With Taliban. The New York Times/AP (5/25) reports that "a firefight in the south left at least 24 people suspected Taliban militants and 5 Afghan soldiers dead." It writes, "The fighting started after a joint patrol of Afghan- and American-led troops was attacked in a small village in Tirin Kot District, a coalition statement said. The troops beat back the assault and forced the militants to retreat into the mountains, where aircraft bombed Taliban positions."

Afghan Government Struggling To Collect Taxes. USA Today (5/25, Wiseman, 2.31M) reports, "No country in the world is worse at collecting taxes. According to the World Bank and International Monetary Fund, government revenue in Afghanistan is equal to barely 5% of gross domestic product (GDP), lower than the impoverished governments of sub-Saharan Africa." Though the government has little historical experience in "paying its own way" without major foreign aid and struggles with corruption, it now aspires to be a "poor, underdeveloped, normal country," as stated by the finance minister. The government "has pledged to boost government revenue to 8% of GDP by 2011. That would reassure foreign donors who finance 92% of the Afghan government's total expenditures."

Rice Cites Progress In War On Terror. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (5/24) that the US is making progress in the war on terror, noting, "We're taking down the organization that did 9/11. Al Qaeda is not the same organization that it was on September 11th. And we're making progress in spreading freedom in the Middle East, and that ultimately is going to be an antidote to terror. But we've still got a lot work to do, and we have to stay vigilant, because one never knows when there might be an attack. I'd like to say that there won't be, but I do know that the terrorists only have to be right once. We have to be right 100 percent of the time, and those aren't fair odds."

Senate Bans Protesters At Military Funerals. The AP (5/25, Abrams) reports that legislation passed by the Senate and House "specifically targets a Kansas church group that has staged protests at military funerals around the country, claiming that the deaths were a sign of God's anger at U.S. tolerance of homosexuals." The bill bans disruption of military funerals at national cemeteries. The House sponsor's office said that it "expected the House to act quickly to accept the Senate changes and send the bill to the president."

726 Gay Service Members Were Discharged in 2005. The Washington Post (5/25, 744K) reports, "The number of gay and lesbian service personnel discharged under the 'don't ask, don't tell' policy last year was 726 -- slightly more than in 2004 but still 30 to 40 percent lower than the number of forced departures in the years before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks." It breaks down the total: "The Army discharged 386 members, compared with 177 for the Navy, 88 for the Air Force and 75 for the Marine Corps." Activists "say they have noticed a slight increase in the number of cases in which service members' sexual orientation was disclosed by others." The GAO "said last year that it has cost nearly $200 million to recruit and train replacements for the 9,488 troops discharged since the policy began in 1994," including "more than 750" who held "critical jobs" and "more than 300 linguists."

Author Concerned US Public Disconnected Form War. Kathy Roth-Douquet, the co-author, with Frank Schaeffer, of "AWOL: The Unexcused Absence of America's Upper Classes from Military Service -- and How It Hurts the Country," in an op-ed in USA Today (5/25, 2.31M) writes, "Increasingly, since the 1970s, we have delegated to a small cohort the risks and honor of armed service. To whom do we delegate it? Those who serve are largely middle- and working-class, from the South and West, and already from military families. Upper-middle class from the Northeast or California? Chances are, you are excused. We have, in effect, delegated to others the very stuff of our citizenship." And "the president exhorts us to go shopping, not to share in a civilian war effort, as in previous wars when Americans bought war bonds or conserved resources. Today no leadership helps us do so."

Service Academy Graduates Prepare To Face Battlefield Challenges. USA Today (5/25, Vandenbrook, 2.31M) reports, "Midshipmen and cadets graduating this weekend from the United States' main service academies will be the first classes since 1972 to have spent all four years in school with the nation at war." Many of the graduating cadets sought service after the 9/11 attacks and "Thirty-eight graduates from West Point, eight from the Naval Academy here and five from the Air Force Academy have been killed in Afghanistan and Iraq. The rate of deaths for West Point alumni is about twice what it was in Vietnam. Figures for the other academies were unavailable."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Investors Swamped By Reports As Stock Options Probe Expands. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Zuckerman) reports, "As investigations into stock-option practices heat up, investors are being inundated with a flood of reports from analysts looking for companies that may come under the microscope." The Journal continues, "The methodologies behind the studies vary, making it difficult to independently verify the conclusions. Still, shares of some companies are suffering even though there isn't any indication that they acted inappropriately. Others are tumbling, though the abuses might not affect their businesses. So some investors, rather than shying away, are trying to figure out if the scrutiny is creating some bargains." The Journal adds, "So far, about two dozen companies have disclosed that they face federal investigations or inquiries from their own boards over options timing. Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox said Tuesday that possible backdating of stock options is 'a matter of ongoing interest to our enforcement division.' Federal authorities are investigating whether a number of companies backdated their options to certain days when the stock prices were at a low to allow executives to reap gains ahead of subsequent increases in the prices of the shares. … The SEC has been examining the matter for more than a year. In a page-one article in March, The Wall Street Journal did its own analysis -- using statistical methodology reviewed by university professors -- and identified a half dozen companies with suspicious grant practices. The chief executives of those companies routinely received grants dated ahead of sharp rises in share prices. … Just yesterday, CNET Networks Inc. said it had been notified that the SEC is conducting an informal inquiry into the company's stock-option grants. The San Francisco company said it plans to cooperate. In addition, Analog Devices Inc. said it received a subpoena from federal prosecutors over stock-options grants. The Norwood, Mass., company said it would cooperate. And Power Integrations Inc. said it is cooperating with the SEC and the U.S. attorney's office for the Northern District of California in their investigations of the San Jose, Calif., company's stock-option practices."

US Subpoenas Analog Devices In Stock Option Probe. Bloomberg (5/25, Barr) reports, "Analog Devices Inc., a maker of computer chips for consumer products, said federal prosecutors have subpoenaed documents related to stock options dating back to 2000." Bloomberg continues, "Analog Devices believes the documents requested by the U.S. Attorney in New York are related to grants that have been under investigation by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, the Norwood, Massachusetts-based company said today in a Business Wire statement. … The request is the latest in a series of subpoenas from the Justice Department or the SEC in a probe over whether companies deliberately moved option grants back to dates when the stock price was lower, helping to ensure that executives who received them would make money." Bloomberg adds, "Earlier this week Juniper Networks Inc., F5 Networks Inc., Brooks Automation Inc. and Openwave Systems Inc. all said they had been contacted by prosecutors or regulators in connection with similar inquiries."

Enron Jury Continues Deliberations. The AP (5/25, Hays) reports, "Jurors in the fraud and conspiracy trial of Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay and former Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling deliberated a fifth day Wednesday in the premier criminal case to emerge from the company's collapse." The AP continues, "Both defendants awaited the outcome away from the federal courthouse in Houston - Lay at his office about two blocks away, and Skilling in his legal team's so-called 'war room' in an office building across the street." The AP adds, "Lead Skilling attorney Daniel Petrocelli remained at the courthouse, while lead Lay lawyer Michael Ramsey said he and the ex-chairman's other attorneys planned to wait there in shifts. … The eight-woman, four-man panel sent a note to U.S. District Judge Sim Lake on Tuesday stating they don't intend to deliberate on Monday, Memorial Day. The jurors told the judge last week they would consider the case Monday through Thursday each week, the same schedule as the 16-week trial that started with jury selection Jan. 30."

Jury Requests Testimony Transcripts. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Mcwilliams) reports that the jury "requested unspecified transcripts of testimony and additional copies of the lengthy trial's exhibit list. … The jury…sent a note seeking the items to U.S. District Court Judge Sim Lake. Wednesday, it signaled deliberations would run into next week, telling the court it wouldn't work on Monday, Memorial Day, and reiterating that it wouldn't deliberate Friday. … After huddling with attorneys on both side, Judge Lake said he would send the jury three additional copies of the index of exhibits, and ask it to be more precise to the witness or witnesses whose testimony it now wants to review. He suggested it could be difficult to pull through trial transcripts for specific issues 'in a trial of this length and complexity,' noting some topics were raised multiple times in direct testimony, in cross examination, and re-direct."

Judge Approves $6.6 Billion Enron Settlement. The AP (5/25, Hays) reports, "A federal judge gave final approval Wednesday for three more banks to pay $6.6 billion to settle civil claims that they helped Enron Corp. manipulate earnings." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon in Houston approved the deals with the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, JPMorgan Chase & Co. and Citigroup Inc. Her ruling came as a jury in another courtroom continued to deliberate the fate of Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey Skilling in a criminal fraud and conspiracy trial." The AP adds, 'The litigation's settlement tally has so far reached $7.3 billion, with interest, against Wall Street firms accused of helping the energy trader hide losses and inflate profits before it careened into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001. … William Lerach, who represents the University of California, the lead plaintiff in the conglomerate of shareholder lawsuits in Houston, said the pot is earning $550,000 in interest per day. He declined comment Wednesday on any other settlement talks."

Enron Legal Action Dominates Houston Federal Courthouse. USA Today (5/25, Farrell) reports, "For Enron junkies, there's no better place these days than the ninth floor of the federal courthouse (in Houston). … In three separate criminal cases against former Enron executives, observers await verdicts, while in a civil case, a judge approved a $6.6 billion settlement between Enron shareholders and three major banks that did business with the energy-trading company." USA continues, "As expected, U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon gave final approval Wednesday to a $6.6 billion settlement between Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (CIBC), JPMorgan Chase and Citigroup and shareholders who claim that the banks helped Enron hide billions of dollars in losses from the public. … That approval, on top of a previous settlement between shareholders and two other banks, Lehman Bros. and Bank of America, brings the sum of funds promised to shareholders to $7.2 billion.

Plaintiffs lawyers have asked for as much as $40 billion in damages." USA adds, "Other Enron-related action on the ninth floor of the courthouse: … Jurors continued deliberating in the main criminal case against former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling. … Another jury continued deliberating in the government's case against two former executives from Enron's Broadband unit. In that trial, which began three weeks ago, prosecutors alleged that Kevin Howard and Michael Krautz used deceptive accounting to allow the business unit to claim $111 million in phony earnings in late 2000 and early 2001. That jury completed its second full day of deliberations. … Lake, who presided at the jury trial of Lay and Skilling, held a bench trial to hear the government's accusations that Lay lied to three banks to obtain favorable terms for personal loans in the 1990s. … Judge Lake said he won't disclose his verdict in Lay's bank fraud case until after the jury reaches a decision in the larger fraud case."

Martha Stewart Faces Deadline In Civil Case. The New York Times (5/25, Thomas) reports, "A year after her release from prison, her carefully executed makeover complete, Martha Stewart must now confront again the insider trading accusations that turned her world upside down." The Times continues, "The three-year-old civil case against her is resuming. Contesting the Securities and Exchange Commission accusations, as opposed to a negotiated settlement, would help give Ms. Stewart the opportunity to not only clear her name but also to win back her title as chairwoman and chief executive of the company she founded, Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia. … If she loses, the burden will not be onerous. She could certainly afford any financial penalty and while she no longer serves on the board, her current role as editorial director gives her considerable influence. … All the same, a trial of the S.E.C. lawsuit could be another embarrassing blow not only to Ms. Stewart's image but to the fortunes of her company." The Times adds, 'Today, Ms. Stewart faces a deadline to respond to charges that she illegally used nonpublic information when she sold 4,000 shares of ImClone Systems in late 2001. … A last-minute settlement is always possible. However, if she denies the allegations and asserts her innocence, which she has done from the outset, then preparations for a civil trial, starting most crucially with her deposition, will begin. Ms. Stewart could also refuse to answer by asserting her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, according to lawyers involved in the case. Lawyers for Ms. Stewart and the S.E.C. remain locked in negotiations. … Peter E. Bacanovic, the former Merrill Lynch broker who, regulators contend, fed Ms. Stewart privileged information that other large investors were selling their ImClone shares, is on the verge of reaching an agreement with the S.E.C. that would bar him from the securities industry, according to people briefed on the discussions. … But the stakes are much higher for Ms. Stewart, who along with Mr. Bacanovic was convicted of having obstructed the original investigation into her sale of ImClone shares."

Small's Tenure At Fannie Mae Draws Scrutiny. The Washington Post (5/25, C1, Day, Trescott, 744K) reports that Smithsonian Secretary Lawrence M. Small's role in the accounting fraud scandal at the Federal National Mortgage Association, where he was president, chief operating officer and board member from 1991 to 2000, is drawing scrutiny. A new government report "says Small was among a handful of senior Fannie Mae executives who set an improper 'tone at the top,' encouraging employees to hit profit targets above all else so that managers would receive the largest annual bonuses possible."

CEO Says SEC, PCAOB Acted Wisely. James Quigley, CEO of Deloitte & Touche writes in the Wall Street Journal (5/25, 2.11M), "A Small Business Advisory Committee to the SEC recommended earlier this year that a majority of all public companies be exempted from at least a portion of" the Sarbanes Oxley law's requirements, "acting on a concern that the cost fell disproportionately on smaller issuers. Members of Congress have also proposed legislation with similar exemptions. The SEC has opted against such exemptions, instead announcing a plan to substantially expand guidance to issuers, and make other changes aimed at scaling implementation of these requirements for smaller issuers. Concurrently, the PCAOB announced a decision to revise a related audit standard. As leader of one of the largest public accounting firms, I believe that the SEC and PCAOB acted wisely, shifting the debate to a discussion of how to make the law work effectively for all companies and their investors."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Denies Hastert Under Investigation In Abramoff Scandal. The Chicago Tribune (5/25, Zajac, Dorning, 643K) reports this morning, "In an unusually swift and blunt response to a news report, the Justice Department on Wednesday issued a statement denying an ABC News story that House Speaker Dennis Hastert was under investigation in the far-reaching Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal. 'Speaker Hastert is not under investigation by the Justice Department,' said department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse, less than an hour after ABC News, citing 'high-level Justice Department sources,' reported that Hastert 'is under investigation by the FBI" in connection with the Abramoff scandal." Roehrkasse "acknowledged that the Justice Department generally neither confirms nor denies news reports asserting the existence of an investigation, but said that the department was moved to respond to the report because of 'unique circumstances.'"

DOJ_NMG_0029390

ABC World News Tonight (5/24, lead story, 2:15, Vargas, 8.78M) had reported that "sources tell ABC News the case involving convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff has led FBI investigators to some of the most powerful members of Congress." ABC (Ross) added, "Federal officials tell us the congressional bribery investigation now includes the Speaker of the House, Dennis Hastert, based on the testimony from the convicted lobbyists who are cooperating with the government. Justice Department officials describe the 64-year-old Illinois Republican as very much in the mix of the corruption investigation. Part of the investigation is said to involve a letter Hastert wrote three years ago, urging the Secretary of the Interior to block a casino on an Indian reservation that would have competed with other tribes. The other tribes were represented by Jack Abramoff, who has reportedly provided details on his dealings with Hastert as part of his plea agreement with the government. The letter was written shortly after a fundraiser for Hastert at a restaurant owned by Abramoff. Abramoff and his clients contributed more than $26,000 at the time. The day Abramoff was indicted, Hastert denied any unlawful connection, and said he would donate to charity, any campaign contributions he h received from Abramoff or his clients."

On ABC World News Tonight (5/24, story 2, 1:00, Vargas, 8.78M), chief Washington Correspondent George Stephanopoulos said the development is "potentially seismic," but it "really is going to depend on the facts and whether prosecutors can demonstrate a quid pro quo, that Hastert took that official action, in return for the campaign contribution."

Most news reports this morning focus on Hastert's and the DOJ's reaction to the ABC story. The Washington Times (5/25, Bellantoni, Seper, 90K) headlines its report "Justice, Hastert Deny Report Of Probe Into Abramoff Ties," and notes "Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said, 'The ABC News report is absolutely untrue. ... We are demanding a full retraction.'" The Financial Times (5/25, Yeager) titles its story "Hastert Denies Involvement In Corruption Scandal."

The Hill (5/25, Crabtree) notes Brian Ross, who reported the story, "is ABC News' chief investigative correspondent. According to his biography on ABC News' website, he received the National Headliner Award for breaking the 1980 ABSCAM story, among other accolades."

Hastert Aide Says ABC Report Linked To Hastert's Criticism Of Jefferson Raid. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Mullins, 2.11M) headlines its report "Hastert Demands Retraction Of ABC News Report," and says "a spokesman for ABC declined to comment on the report or Mr. Hastert's retraction request." The report "followed strong criticism by Mr. Hastert and other congressional leaders for the Federal Bureau of Investigation on Saturday raiding the Capitol Hill offices of a Louisiana Democrat involved in a separate corruption probe. … After the ABC report aired, Republican aides on Capitol Hill accused the Justice Department of leaking the story to undercut Mr. Hastert. One aide to Mr. Hastert said: 'No doubt about it. They're pushing back.'"

Bloomberg (5/25, Schmidt) reports, "Hastert's spokesman, Ron Bonjean, also issued a statement denying the report. … 'The ABC News report is absolutely untrue,' Bonjean said in the statement. 'We are demanding a full retraction of the ABC News story.'"

Hastert, Pelosi Demand Return Of Documents Seized In FBI Raid. In a joint statement yesterday, House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi called for the return of documents seized in the weekend FBI raid of Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office. Hastert and Pelosi said, "The Justice Department must immediately return the papers it unconstitutionally seized." They also called for FBI agents who participated in the raid to be removed from the case. The CBS Evening News (5/24, story 5, 1:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) said that the joint statement is "something we seldom see on Capitol Hill," and CBS (Borger) added, "We've never really seen anything like this before. The FBI barged into Congressman William Jefferson's office and seized documents. And CBS News has learned that the White House was worried that House Republicans were so upset with this that they were on the verge of asking for the resignation of the Attorney General. Now, they didn't do that today, but they do want those documents back. … They believe there's a constitutional issue here," and "I think they're also worried, gee, whose office will the FBI be searching next?"

NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 8, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) briefly noted Hastert and Pelosi's demand, "saying the raid was a violation of constitutional separation of powers," and CNN's The Situation Room (5/24, Blitzer) called it "a constitutional showdown in the making."

The AP (5/25, Kellman) calls the statement a moment of "rare, election-year harmony" and adds, "Within hours, according to several Republican officials, White House aides were involved in talks with Hastert's staff concerning the possible transfer of the documents, possibly to the House ethics committee. … Any agreement along those lines would mark a concession by the Bush administration, which spent the day fending off complaints from angry lawmakers of both parties." However, the AP notes, "Not all lawmakers agreed" with Hastert and Pelosi. Louisiana Sen. David Vitter, in a letter to Republican leaders, said, "'These self-serving separation of power arguments' have no basis in law."

USA Today (5/25, 4A, Kiely, 2.31M) reports DOJ spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos "defended the FBI's actions. 'There is tremendous respect for Congress' important, independent role, but the department has an obligation to the American people to fully pursue corruption cases wherever the trail of evidence goes,' she said." However, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "joined Hastert and Pelosi in expressing concern about the Capitol Hill raid. 'The whole idea of separation of powers does need to be addressed,' he said."

The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Reynolds, Schmitt, 958K) reports, "Some experts said the Justice Department appeared to be on firm legal footing. And some members of Congress began to question how the public would view the leadership's position. … President Bush's top political advisor, Karl Rove, fielded complaints about the search during a closed-door meeting Wednesday with House Republicans, several members present said."

In a front-page story, The Washington Post (5/25, Murray, Lengel, 744K) adds that "White House officials are concerned about the vigorous and repeated complaints of the congressional leaders and have pressed the Justice Department to find a way to placate Congress and defuse the controversy, according to a department official." However, after the Hastert-Pelosi statement was released, "a Justice Department official" said "the department will not agree to any arrangement or demand that would harm or hurt an ongoing law enforcement investigation."

The New York Times (5/25, Hulse, 1.19M) notes, "Privately, Justice Department and Federal Bureau of Investigation officials expressed dismay at the tone of statements by Mr. Hastert and Ms. Pelosi. The officials said there was virtually no possibility that any material taken legally during the search would be returned." The Times adds, "The tense conflict is also developing into a potential new problem for President Bush. The White House has reached out to Republicans on Capitol Hill to allay concerns about the president's low poll numbers and to try to heal deep rifts within the party over a variety of issues," but "the constitutional confrontation is doing nothing to help with that effort. One lawmaker whose stance will be important to the fate of the immigration legislation, Representative F. James Sensenbrenner...on Wednesday set a hearing for next Tuesday on the implications of the search."

Roll Call (5/25, Pershing) reports that Sensenbrenner "was extremely angry about the search and that he called Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty…to tear into Justice's tactics. … 'The FBI's unprecedented Saturday night raid of Rep. Jefferson's Capitol Hill Office raises profoundly disturbing constitutional questions that must be addressed,' Sensenbrenner said in a statement accompanying his announcement of Tuesday's hearing. He added that the raid could have 'a chilling impact on the Legislative Branch's ability to function.'"

Knight Ridder (5/25, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Hastert and Pelosi challenged the raid as violating the Constitution's separation of powers between the legislative and executive branches of government. … 'In addition, the Justice Department must immediately cease any further review of the documents it unconstitutionally seized, ensure that those who have reviewed the documents do not divulge their contents to the investigators, and move in court to vitiate the search warrant,' the two congressional leaders said." Knight Ridder notes, "One law enforcement official familiar with the investigation expressed surprise at the stance taken by the House leaders. … 'The implications of what they're asking for are huge,' the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity to permit candor about a case involving powerful lawmakers. 'They're asking that the FBI return documents to a target in the middle of a law enforcement investigation.'"

Jefferson Files Motion In Federal Court Seeking Return Of Seized Documents. The AP (5/25, Kellman) also reports Rep. William Jefferson yesterday "filed a motion asking the federal judge in the case to order the FBI to return the material it seized from his office. The Justice Department dug in, repeating that the raid was carried out only after Jefferson refused to comply with a subpoena and only then with a search warrant signed by a judge. 'The actions were lawful and necessary under these unique circumstances,' said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty."

Jefferson Rebuffs Pelosi Request To Quit Ways And Means. The AP (5/25, Kellman) reports, "Democrats sought to get embattled Rep. William Jefferson to resign his seat on the House's most prestigious committee. 'In the interest of upholding the high ethical standard of the House Democratic Caucus, I am writing to request your immediate resignation from the Ways and Means Committee,' wrote House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi in the one-sentence correspondence." But Jefferson "was defiant," writing back, "I will not give up a committee assignment that is so vital to New Orleans at this crucial time for any uncertain, long-term political strategy." Fox News' Special Report (5/24, Wilson) also noted Pelosi's call for Jefferson to resign his committee seat.

Legal Analysts Say FBI Raid Broke Custom, But Not Constitution. The Washington Post (5/25, A10, Lane, 744K) reports, "The FBI raid on Rep. William Jefferson's congressional office was an aggressive tactic that broke a long-standing political custom. But while it might violate the spirit of the Constitution, it might not violate the letter of the document or subsequent rulings by the Supreme Court, legal analysts say. The issue could turn on whether a court finds that the items seized from Jefferson's office were related to such protected legislative activities as writing, researching and voting on bills." Yale constitutional law professor Akhil Reed Amar said, "It's really a matter of etiquette. I don't see any constitutional principle here."

McCain Says FBI Should Have Approached Hastert, Pelosi Before Raid. On CNN's Larry King Live (5/24), Sen. John McCain said that he "reacted with some concern" about the raid of Jefferson's office, adding, "what I think should have happened, I think the FBI should have gone to the Speaker and Nancy Pelosi…and said, look, we need to go into this office for this reason. I think that probably would have been a much better path to take. They didn't have to tell every senator, but they should have gone to the leadership of the House, I think, and told them they were going to do it. And you could trust them not to say anything about it."

WPost Calls Congressional Reaction To FBI Search "Overblown." The Washington Post (5/25, 744K) editorializes, "The uproar over the FBI's search…is understandable but overblown," and the demand by Hastert and Pelosi "that the Justice Department return the papers it seized goes way too far." The Post adds, "We're not saying that the Justice Department acted perfectly here. It would have been preferable to find some way to consult with congressional leaders before the search. … Still, lawmakers' high-decibel complaints are unwarranted."

Cheney May Be Called To Testify In Libby Trial. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Schmidt, 958K) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney may be called as a government witness in the perjury and obstruction case against his former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby, a special prosecutor indicated Wednesday. Then again, he may not." In a court filing, Patrick J. Fitzgerald "held open the possibility that during Libby's trial, currently set for January 2007, he might ask Cheney to authenticate the handwritten notations in the margins of a July 2003 newspaper column critical of the Bush administration's decision to go to war in Iraq." The New York Times (5/25, Johnston, 1.19M) says Fitzgerald's filing "suggested that…Cheney would testify as a government witness," underscoring "the prosecutor's contention that the vice president's role was critical to understanding Mr. Libby's wrongdoing."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (5/25, A1, Smith, 744K) reports, "Cheney was personally angered by a former US ambassador's newspaper column attacking a key rationale for the war in Iraq and repeatedly directed…Libby…to 'get all the facts out' related to the critique, according to excerpts from Libby's 2004 grand jury testimony released late yesterday by…Fitzgerald." Libby also "told the grand jury that Cheney raised as an issue that the former ambassador's wife worked at the CIA and that she allegedly played a role in sending him to investigate the Iraqi government's interest in acquiring nuclear weapons materials. That issue formed the basis of former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV's published critique."

Opening Arguments Made At Safavian Trial.

The New York Times (5/25, Shenon, 1.19M) reports, "A former White House aide who went on trial Wednesday in the influence-peddling scandal centered on the lobbyist Jack Abramoff offered an admission rarely heard these days in Washington: he acknowledged he was once a good friend of the now-disgraced lobbyist. The admission by the former aide, David H. Safavian, came in opening statements by his lawyer." Safavian "is accused of lying to government investigators about his relationship with Mr. Abramoff and the circumstances of their 2002 golfing trip to Scotland." The Washington Post (5/25, A6, Birnbaum, 744K) adds, "Prosecutors signaled that they plan to rely heavily on hundreds of e-mails between Safavian and Abramoff to show that Abramoff was seeking two government properties over which Safavian had influence while offering Safavian favors, including the overseas trip. 'The defendant lied, concealed and misled' federal investigators about his dealings with Abramoff, prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg told a jury in US District Court here yesterday." Zeidenberg "said that he would show 'examples of concrete assistance' that Safavian offered to Abramoff and also prove that Safavian lied about the details of his interactions with Abramoff to Senate staffers and to an ethics officer and an investigator of the General Services Administration, where Safavian worked at the time."

The AP (5/25, Yost) notes "the prosecution's first witness, Stephen Perry, GSA's former administrator, testified that Safavian invited him on the Scotland golf outing. But Perry said he didn't want to go because he thought it would be too expensive." Perry, who now runs the NFL Hall of Fame, "said Abramoff turned up at Safavian's country club and golfed with Perry, his wife and Safavian. Another time, Perry and several friends declined Abramoff's offer of free dinners at the lobbyist's restaurant."

CNET News (5/25, Broache) reports, "E-mail messages took center stage Wednesday" in the Safavian trial. "During opening statements in federal district court, Justice Department attorney Peter Zeidenberg told jurors that the government would prove Safavian's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt by 'relying largely on the defendant's own words' in electronic form. … Zeidenberg displayed about six e-mail messages on screens in the courtroom, read portions aloud, and said they would 'demonstrate clearly and unequivocally' that Safavian had been helping Abramoff in deals involving federally managed land--and then concealing his involvement from investigators. Also at issue is whether Safavian legally could have accepted a free golf trip to St. Andrews, Scotland, with Abramoff, House Republicans Bob Ney and Tom DeLay, and former Christian Coalition Director Ralph Reed. … This is hardly the first time archived e-mail messages have become the centerpiece of a federal case. During the Microsoft antitrust trial, Justice Department attorneys delighted in highlighting incendiary e-mail messages that Chairman Bill Gates and other company executives exchanged. In one August 1997 e-mail message, for instance, Gates asked subordinates: 'Do we have a clear plan on what we want Apple to do to undermine Sun?'"

Nicholson Details Response To News Of Data Theft.

VA Secretary Nicholson expressed his "outrage" over the recent breach of security at the VA and described his response after learning of the theft 13 days after it occurred. The White House expressed its support for Nicholson, but he is expected to face tough questions during Congressional hearings into the breach on Thursday. The level of national media coverage of the issue has dropped significantly this morning, with the story being covered primarily by the New York Times, the AP and local media outlets.

The New York Times (5/25, Stout, 1.19M), in an article titled "Veterans Chief Voices Anger On Data Theft," reports VA Secretary James Nicholson "expressed outrage Wednesday over being kept in the dark about the theft of computer data on 26.5 million veterans as he himself came under heavy criticism from Capitol Hill." He "issued a statement vowing 'a very extensive review of individuals up and down the chain of command' and urging the inspector general's office at the Department of Veterans Affairs to expedite an investigation of the affair." Nicholson said, "Upon notification, my first priority was to take all actions necessary to protect veterans from harm and to assist in law enforcement efforts." An Administration official "said that Mr. Nicholson had not been informed for 13 days" and that Nicholson notified the FBI "once he learned of the theft, then ordered his own agency to set up Web sites and a toll-free number to handle an anticipated flood of queries."

The AP (5/25, Yen) reports Sen. Patrick Leahy, referring to "past budget problems at the VA…said Nicholson should consider resigning." But seeking to reassure Veterans, White House press Secretary Tony Snow said, "We have no indication that these have been used to defraud the 26.5 million people whose personal information would have been contained." USA Today (5/25, 2.31M) briefly notes similar details.

There was no network news coverage of the data security breach, but CNN's The Situation Room (5/24, Blitzer) reported that sparks are "expected to fly tomorrow when a Senate committee put Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson in the hot seat. Nicholson says he's ordered an investigation into why he and the public didn't learn about the theft until more than two weeks after it happened."

Bush Expresses Confidence In Nicholson. A second version of the AP's (5/25, Yen) coverage in an article titled "Bush Backs VA Chief After Data Breach" led with the White House's response, reporting, "VA Secretary Jim Nicholson got an endorsement Wednesday from President Bush -- and a summons to Capitol Hill -- after the theft of veterans' personal information that has become one of the nation's largest security breaches." Expressing support for Nicholson "White House press secretary Tony Snow said Bush had 'full faith and confidence' in Nicholson. Snow originally had declined to issue a statement of support in the president's name but then said he wanted to clarify his remarks." Meanwhile, "Sen. Patrick Leahy said Bush should call Nicholson 'into the woodshed' and consider changing the leadership of the VA, particularly after the agency waited until May 22 to inform the public after the May 3 theft." And Sen. Larry Craig "said he plans to ask Nicholson tough questions on timing, security procedures and who was involved when his panel holds its extraordinary joint hearing Thursday with the Senate Homeland Security Committee." Craig said, "Twenty-six million people deserve answers."

Buyer Says VA Delay In Alerting Public "Made Sense." The Army Times (5/25, Maze) reports House Veterans Affairs Chairman Steve Buyer "did not fault the VA for waiting until May 22 to announce the May 3 laptop theft, saying it made sense to determine if the stolen data would be recovered before announcing what was taken." But Rep. John Salazar "said the delay 'squandered critical damage control time.'"

VA One Of Many Government Agencies At Risk For Data Security Breaches. The New York Times/AP (5/25) reports the VA is not the only agency at risk for data security breaches. According to the GAO, the VA "was one of eight departments given failing grades for computer security practices in 2005. The Pentagon and the departments of Homeland Security, State, Energy and Health and Human Services also got Fs from the House Committee on Government Reform in its annual report card released in March." GAO director of information security issues Greg Wilshusen on Wednesday said, "There's a vast amount of highly sensitive information that the government collects and maintains. … A number of agencies are vulnerable to similar data breaches."

The New York Times (5/25, Stout, 1.19M) in its coverage also says, "Christopher Wolf, a Washington lawyer with the firm Proskauer Rose who specializes in security issues, said that the veterans department was just one of many federal agencies with lax computer security, and that sabotage might not be the biggest danger. 'These things happen because of accidents,' he said." The VA "began issuing new identification cards late in 2004, with a veteran's Social Security number and date of birth encrypted on a magnetic tape on the back. 'Identity theft is one of the fast-growing crimes in the nation,' read an accompanying announcement."

29 Lawmakers Could Be Vulnerable After Data Theft. The Hill (5/25, Schor) reports 29 current members of Congress, including House Veterans Affairs Committee chairman Steve Buyer, Rep. Tom Davis and Sen. John McCain, could possibly be at risk after the theft of VA personal information. Buyer spokeswoman Laura Zuckerman "said verifying the integrity of his own data was not Buyer's first concern." Other lawmakers were similarly more concerned about their constituents including "Marine veteran Rep. John Kline" who "has written to veterans in his district informing them of the breach and offering information on credit-reporting agencies and other relevant contacts, according to spokesman Troy Young." The Hill also notes that VA Secretary Nicholson "will face a new ranking Democrat at today's Veterans' Affairs Committee hearing, as Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) announced Tuesday that Rep. Bob Filner (Calif.) would replace Rep. Lane Evans (D-Ill.)."

House Bill Would Ban Online Gambling. The Washington Post (5/25, D1, Ahrens) reports, "Online poker players will have to fold their hands if a Virginia congressman gets his way. … Today, the House Judiciary Committee will mark up a bill introduced by Rep. Robert W. Goodlatte (R) that would ban much online gambling, including bets on sporting events and games of chance -- namely poker, which has enjoyed a boom in recent years." The Post continues, "The legislation could get an unexpected boost from the Jack Abramoff scandal. The disgraced lobbyist was key to blocking one of Goodlatte's three previous attempts to ban Internet gambling, and backlash over corruption charges could help the current effort. … The bill would update the Federal Wire Wager Act, which prohibits gambling over telephone lines but may not apply to Internet gambling because not all Web traffic travels over phone lines. It also would force banks to block transactions related to online gambling and would empower law enforcement agencies to force Internet service providers to remove or disable links to gambling sites. … The bill effectively would prevent state lotteries from taking their games online, because technology does not exist to keep gambling within a state. Fantasy sports leagues would be exempt. Goodlatte said his bill is neutral on parimutuel horse wagering, which has an online component that is the cause of an ongoing struggle between Congress and the Justice Department."

Case Made Against Online Gambling Ban. Frank Catania, a former assistant attorney general, director of the New Jersey Division of Gaming Enforcement and deputy Speaker of the New Jersey General Assembly, writes in The Hill (5/25), "This week, the House Judiciary Committee is expected to mark up two bills that would make certain forms of Internet gambling and the financial transactions involved in Internet gambling illegal. … Whether the gambling entertainment is online or offline, consumers deserve diligent regulators who make sure operators are honest, games are fair, winning players are paid promptly, problem gamblers are offered assistance or ultimately barred and minors are prohibited from playing. Prohibition of Internet gambling will not provide such protections; licensure and regulation will."

Former New Orleans Mayor's Uncle Pleads Guilty To Stealing Transit Funds. The AP (5/25, Martel) reports, "The uncle of former Mayor Marc Morial pleaded guilty Wednesday to stealing $550,000 from a transit agency, the third conviction in a federal probe of corruption at city hall and in the public schools. Glenn Haydel pleaded guilty to fraud against a federal program and would serve two years in prison if a judge approves the deal, said U.S. Attorney Jim Letten." The AP notes Haydel "held a lucrative consulting contract with the Regional Transit Authority when Morial was in office in the 1990s," and he "admitted diverting $550,000 from an authority trust account to his own company, Metro New Orleans Transit Inc., and then taking $350,000 for his personal use, Letten said."

Former West Palm Beach Official Pleads Guilty To Corruption Charges. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (5/25, Blum, 249K) reports, "Former West Palm Beach City Commissioner and State Rep. Ray Liberti pleaded guilty on Wednesday to three counts in federal court stemming from a corruption case involving a massage parlor." He "was accused of accepting more than $66,000 in cash and a a $2,000 Tag Heurer watch in what turned out to be an FBI sting operation. 'I know what I did,' Liberti told the judge when he entered his pleas." The AP (5/25, Anderson) notes Liberti admitted "using his powers as a city official to harass business owners in exchange for bribes from investors who wanted to buy the businesses below market value. … Unknown to Liberti at the time, one of the 'investors' turned out to be an undercover FBI agent, and most of Liberti's meetings and phone calls in the case were tape recorded, said John Kastrenakes, the assistant U.S. attorney prosecuting the case."

Holdout Juror Says FBI "Set Up" Former New Mexico Treasurer. The AP (5/25) reports, "A juror described by his colleagues as the lone holdout against convicting Robert Vigil in his public corruption trial said he doesn't believe the former New Mexico state treasurer is entirely innocent, but prosecutors clearly failed to prove their case. In a phone interview with Associated Press from his part-time home in Sun City, Ariz., Delmus Holdson also says he believes Vigil was 'set up' by the FBI. And if federal prosecutors try the case again, they'll likely face another hung jury, Holdson said Tuesday." Holdson added, "They put him in a position where the other side knew what they were doing, and were wearing recording devices," and he denied other jurors' allegations that he refused to weigh the evidence during deliberations.

Indicted Tennessee Senator Delivers Subpoenas To Lawmakers. The Tennessean (5/25, Schrade) reports that at the Tennessee Capitol yesterday, "indicted former Sen. Roscoe Dixon created a stir as he issued subpoenas in his defense to lawmakers, including Lt. Gov. John Wilder and state Sen. Jeff Miller. Dixon was one of the five public officials snagged in the FBI's Tennessee Waltz bribery sting -- which occurred almost one year ago to the day. … He is charged with taking payoffs to advance legislation favorable to a phony computer recycling company created by federal prosecutors." The Memphis

Commercial Appeal (5/25, Locker) adds, "Dixon would only say that he was lining up potential witnesses for his Memphis trial. … He resigned that post last May following his indictment, along with three other legislators and others, in the FBI's 'Tennessee Waltz' corruption investigation. … Dixon has pleaded innocent of charges of accepting $9,500 in bribes from undercover agents." The Nashville Post (5/25, Whitehouse) notes, "As lobbyists and reporters looked on, Dixon was warmly greeted by former colleagues of both political parties and made small talk with them. The most interesting moment was watching Dixon and State Sen. Ward Crutchfield…who is also facing trial in the 'Waltz' case, embrace and share private thoughts before going their separate ways."

Defense Lawyer Again Brings Up Daley At Patronage Trial. The Chicago Tribune (5/25, Mihalopoulos, 643K) reports, "Mayor Richard Daley became a focus again Wednesday at the federal corruption trial of his former patronage chief, Robert Sorich, as prosecutors complained about frequent references to Daley by the defense. Sorich's lawyer, Thomas Anthony Durkin, asked prosecution witnesses such as former Daley Cabinet member John Kosiba whether the mayor, his closest aides or the city's Law Department knew about patronage hiring in the administration. … In a private sidebar conversation, Durkin was asked to explain his repeated references to Daley. Durkin said the mayor told federal agents 'that he didn't believe that there was anything improper at the time, and he was not aware that there was anything improper going on,' according to a transcript of the discussion." WLS-TV Chicago (5/24, Schulte) reported on its Web site that federal prosecutor Patrick Collins "complained to the judge about defense attorney Tom Durkin's constant line of questioning during cross-examination about Mayor Daley's role in hiring. Collins said it was confusing to the jury and caused 'serious risk of diverting the attention away from the four men on trial.' Judge David Coar agreed and did not see the significance in questions about Daley."

Ryan Juror Returns Trial Notes. The AP (5/25) reports, "One of the jurors who convicted former Gov. George Ryan of racketeering and fraud has returned notes she took during the seven-month corruption trial. U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer had ordered the return of the notes to the courthouse after the juror, Karen James, told a reporter she planned to sell them. James returned the notes Wednesday and the matter was closed, officials said."

Barn Demolished In Ongoing FBI Search For Hoffa Remains. The AP (5/25, Krisher) reports, "It took about three hours Wednesday for a 75,000-pound excavating machine to gobble up a barn as part of the FBI's search for the remains of former Teamsters boss Jimmy Hoffa. The barn's destruction was the most dramatic moment in the week since dozens of FBI agents descended on the horse farm 30 miles from Detroit. … Dawn Clenney, a spokeswoman for the FBI in Detroit, said nothing significant has been found so far." The AP adds, "On Thursday, crews will begin to remove the barn's 200-square-foot concrete floor and then the FBI will dig to search for evidence." In a story distributed by Knight Ridder, The Detroit Free-Press (5/25, Neavling) adds that Clenny said "things are 'business as usual.'" By the end of the day yesterday, "a pile of wooden debris sat where the 4,700-square-foot barn once stood. A handful of FBI agents in navy blue polo shirts stood watch nearby 0- one leaning on a yellow shovel." CNN.com (5/24, Cummings) notes, "The government eventually will have to replace the barn, or any other structures it removes, and pay for any damage to the Hidden Dreams Farm," and "the FBI paid Able $6,000 to tear down the barn, the company said."

Lawyer Says Tipster Withheld Hoffa Information From Fear Of Retribution By Mob. The Detroit News (5/25, Egan) reports, "Donovan Wells was terrified in 1976 about telling the FBI what he knew about the disappearance of former Teamsters boss Jimmy Hoffa, one of his former lawyers said Wednesday." Attorney Joseph J. Fabrizio recalled, "He said if he wasn't careful, he'd end up in the same place as Hoffa." But "Fabrizio said that after 30 years and with many of those rumored to be involved with Hoffa's murder in their graves, Wells was likely to tell the FBI much more about what he knew than he was willing to tell in 1976, when he was trying to strike a plea bargain on a charge related to theft of steel. Fabrizio's recollection of Wells' fear could help explain why the story from the former Hoffa associate and trucking company owner could mobilize FBI action today that it could not mobilize in 1976."

Township Businesses Making Most Of Publicity. The AP (5/25, Charlton) reports from Milford Township, "In the week since dozens of FBI agents, police and others invaded this small community…to search for the remains of former Teamsters chief Jimmy Hoffa, local businesses are taking advantage of the national spotlight aimed at them. With humorous signs, specially made T-shirts and themed meals, business owners are poking fun at the search while trying to attract more customers."

Killer Of Abortion Doctor Wins Right To Represent Himself. The AP (5/25, Thompson) reports, "Anti-abortion extremist James Kopp, who admits he was the sniper who killed an abortion doctor in 1998, will defend himself against federal charges of violating abortion clinic access laws." The AP continues, "A judge granted Kopp permission Tuesday to represent himself. … Kopp's first move was to abandon his former attorney's efforts to prevent federal prosecutors from using his statements detailing how and why he shot Dr. Barnett Slepian." The AP adds, "Kopp says the statements he made during his 2003 second-degree murder trial contain 'truths about my faith in the Lord Jesus Christ,' according to court filings. … Kopp, 51, is serving 25 years to life in prison after being convicted on the state murder charge. Federal prosecutors want an additional conviction to ensure he is never released. … The trial judge ruled that Kopp could be charged under the law because abortion-related violence and a shortage of abortion doctors have forced many women to cross state lines for procedures. … Kopp has acknowledged shooting Slepian from the woods outside the doctor's suburban Amherst home but said he was trying only to wound him to prevent him from performing abortions."

California Man Sentenced For Mail Theft. The California Recorder (5/25, Smith) reports, "U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker's voice sounded heavy with disappointment. … Just one month after a man fulfilled Walker's unique sentence for mail theft by carrying a scarlet letter-type sign for eight hours outside a San Francisco post office, he committed yet another mail-related crime. … And so, when it came to his latest sentencing Tuesday, Walker did not get creative." The Recorder continues, "After defendant Shawn Gementera admitted violating his supervised release in four different ways -- three involving drugs and another, mail-related theft -- Walker sentenced him to a year in prison. … 'I do think, Mr. Gementera, what forbearance and patience the court may have had for you in the past has obviously not put you on the right track,' Walker said sadly. … And 'when you start stealing mail, you directly hurt other people,' the judge added. 'And that cannot be tolerated. So I think the time has come when [you need to] go back to custody.'" The Recorder notes, "Federal advisory guidelines suggested 12 to 18 months in prison for Gementera, said prosecutor Blake Stamm, who suggested the former. … 'Clearly, the lessons the court wished the defendant to learn ... that the theft of mail is not a victimless crime ... clearly that lesson has not taken,' the assistant U.S. attorney argued."

Regulators Move To End Fraudulent Mortgage Practices. The Washington Times (5/25, Hill, 90K) reports, "The Federal Reserve, Federal Trade Commission and other regulators said yesterday that they will work to stamp out the fraudulent advertising and bad deals being offered by brokers marketing seemingly low-rate mortgages with backloaded payment schedules that put many consumers in debt over their heads. … Such mortgages include some loans with interest-only payments so that consumers accumulate no equity in their dwellings and some adjustable-rate mortgages with options to make minimal payments that do not pay down principal. The loans have been particularly popular in Washington and other high-priced areas where borrowers need the lenient terms to afford houses."

Texas Appeals Court Overturns Conviction Of Man Once Sentenced To Death. The AP (5/25, Vertuno) reports, "A state appeals court on Wednesday overturned the conviction of a man who once was sentenced to death in the 1991 slayings of four teenage girls, sending the case back to a lower court because of a codefendant's statement that was used by prosecutors." The AP continues, "Robert Springsteen IV, who was 17 at the time of the killings, was convicted in 2001. His death sentence was commuted to life in prison after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that it was unconstitutional to execute killers who were under the age of 18 when the crime was committed." The AP adds, "On Wednesday, the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals voted 5-4 to reverse Springsteen's conviction and sent the case back to a lower court. … Eliza Hope Thomas, 17; Amy Ayers, 13; and sisters Jennifer and Sarah Harbison, ages 17 and 15, were killed during a 1991 yogurt shop robbery. The girls were bound, gagged and shot in the head, and the store was set on fire, authorities said."

US Charges Scientist, California Biotech Firm With Fraud. The AP (5/25, Elias) reports, "A scientist and his biotechnology company were charged on 13 counts of mail fraud, false statements and related charges for allegedly shipping bogus research material to many corporate and academic researchers, including at the U.S. National Institute of Health and the Walter Reed Medical Center, federal prosecutors said." The AP continues, "The indictment unsealed Tuesday in San Francisco federal court accused Chi Yang and employees at the Dublin, California-based company he owned, SynPep Corp., of falsifying scientific paperwork attesting to the purity of protein fragments called peptides that researchers ordered from the company between 1999 and 2004." The AP adds, "The indictment alleged that SynPep's employees doctored the data by cutting-and-pasting vital results plotted on charts and knowingly sent impure peptides at Yang's behest. Yang is the only person charged and he faces a maximum of 20 years in prison and the government is seeking to seize property bought with proceeds from the allegedly fraudulent sales. … The peptides that were shipped were impure or crude replicas of what was ordered, jeopardizing research in cancer, AIDS and other diseases, the indictment alleged. On its Web site, SynPep bills itself as the 'The Peptide Quality Leader.'"

Convicted Sniper Muhammad Questions Malvo In Maryland Trial. The Washington Post (5/25, A1, Rich, Londoño) reports, "John Allen Muhammad interrogated his former protégé yesterday on the specifics of the sniper slayings and on the roots of their relationship, a cross-examination that unfolded as a struggle for psychological dominance between two men who terrorized the Washington region while bound as if they were father and son." The Post continues, "Lee Boyd Malvo testified that he once absorbed Muhammad's venomous teachings, including his hatred of white people and of the United States. But in nearly five hours of questioning over two days, as the dynamic of their relationship unfurled in a packed courtroom in Montgomery County, Malvo gave every indication that he has broken free from the man who trained him in paramilitary tactics. … 'Son,' Muhammad, who is acting as his own attorney, began at one point. … 'I would prefer you address me by my name,' Malvo snapped back. … 'Okay, thank you, I stand corrected,' Muhammad said, only to do it again seconds later." The Post notes, "Muhammad, 45, stood behind the defense table as he conducted the cross-examination, sometimes holding in his hand the logic book that has been with him since the trial began three weeks ago. Malvo, 21, sat in the witness box about 25 feet away, speaking softly but clearly, taking occasional sips of water from a paper cup. … The questions ranged widely and took unusual turns as Muhammad appeared sometimes combative, sometimes nearly tender. At one point, the case and its horrific details -- 10 dead and three wounded in 22 days -- seemed to recede as the two recalled that Muhammad once asked Malvo to look after his children in Antigua while he was away. Splashing in the water at a beach, Muhammad's son, then 11, and Muhammad's then-girlfriend nearly drowned."

Muhammad's Ex-Wife Describes Life Of Abuse, Fear. The Washington Post (5/25, B1, Londoño) reports, "Never mind that her ex-husband is one of the most closely watched death row inmates in the country. … To this day, Mildred Muhammad never leaves home without the restraining order that bars sniper John Allen Muhammad from getting close to her and their three children. … 'The only thing I know is he was coming to kill me,' Mildred Muhammad said in an interview last weekend. 'If he were to escape, I have that to show to say that he's not supposed to be near me.'" The Post adds, "Mildred Muhammad, 46, said she decided to speak publicly about her ex-husband because she feels prosecutors who have tried him in Virginia and Maryland have not thoroughly addressed what she believes his motive in the October 2002 shootings was: to kill her so he could recover his children."

West Virginia Used Car Dealer Pleads Guilty To Falsifying Loan Documents. The Wheeling Intelligencer (5/25) reports the "owner of several local auto dealerships has pleaded guilty to obtaining more than $700,000 from false loan documents, according to information provided by Acting U.S. Attorney Rita R. Valdrini." Jon Marhefka "of St. Clairsville pleaded guilty recently before U.S. District Judge Frederick P. Stamp Jr. to one count of an information document, which allowed the matter to bypass consideration by a federal grand jury." Marhefka, the "owner and president of Arrow Sales Inc., a corporation operating used car lots in Wheeling and Belmont County, acknowledged in the court documents that he was aware that false loan applications were submitted to financial institutions on behalf of customers purchasing vehicles at the businesses."

Maryland Man Convicted In Gang Rape. The Washington Post (5/25, B4, Castaneda) reports, "A Riverdale Park man suspected of belonging to a violent street gang was convicted yesterday by a Prince George's County jury of participating in the brazen gang rape of a young woman last fall." The Post continues, "Hector Mosquera, 28, was found guilty of first-degree rape and three counts of first-degree sex offense, said a spokesman for State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey. … Mosquera faces a possible sentence of four life terms in prison, prosecutors said. Circuit Court Judge Richard H. Sothoron Jr. scheduled sentencing for July 6." The Post adds, "Prosecutors said they obtained evidence that Mosquera is a member of Vatos Locos, a street gang made up primarily of Central American immigrants. … Sothoron granted a defense motion to exclude evidence of Mosquera's involvement in Vatos Locos from the trial, said Ramon Korionoff, an Ivey spokesman. … The attack occurred about 4 p.m. Oct. 20 in Riverdale Park. The victim, now 28, and her sister-in-law were walking home from a bus stop. Prosecutors said Mosquera and another man confronted the two women and demanded money. The two attackers grabbed her and dragged her to a bamboo grove. A third man joined them, and the three sexually assaulted the victim, prosecutors said. The sister-in-law escaped."

DOJ_NMG_0029399

New York City Expanding Mounted Police Force. The CBS Evening News (5/24, story 11, 2:30, Schieffer) reported, "Here in New York, they are training horses not to race but to patrol the streets as part of an expansion of the New York Police Department." CBS (Schlesinger) added, "Looking at him, it would be easy to dismiss" mounted Officer Chris Daniello "as a quaint holdover from a simpler time. But New York's thoroughly modern police commissioner has rediscovered horses, less because they're lovable, more because they're affordable." Commander Raymond Kelly, New York Police Department: "They're not that expensive to maintain -- $10 a day for hay and some treatment." Schlesinger: "And their emissions are easier on the atmosphere than their gasoline-powered competitors. The NYPD already has 80 horses that hit the streets thousands of times a year to control crowd and crime and traffic. They are hard to ignore." They "work so well that the department's buying 75 more."

Judge Rejects GM Request To Delay Delphi Hearings. The Washington Post (5/25, D03, ElBoghdady) reports, "A bankruptcy court judge yesterday denied General Motor Corp.'s request to delay hearings on whether Delphi Corp., its largest auto parts supplier, can nullify its own union contracts as it struggles to emerge from bankruptcy protection." The Post continues, "In a letter that GM declined to make public, the automaker urged Judge Robert D. Drain to adjourn the hearings in New York for up to 60 days so it can use the time to negotiate an out-of-court settlement and avert a threatened strike by Delphi's 33,000 unionized plant workers in this country. The hearings started earlier this month and resumed as scheduled yesterday morning. … With the hearings underway, GM is facing more pressure to kick in money so Delphi can offer wages and benefits acceptable to the unions before the judge rules and possibly revokes the contracts. The judge has urged the parties to keep talking as the hearings proceed." The Post notes, "A strike by Delphi workers could paralyze GM's production lines and even push the automaker into Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection if the strike lasts long enough. GM, which spun off Delphi in 1999, purchases about $14 billion in parts from Delphi each year. An analyst predicts that GM could "bleed" $7 billion to $8 billion during a 60-day walkout."

Led By McCain, Senate Prepares To Scrutinize Defense Contractors. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Karp, Pasztor, 2.11M) reports, "Boeing Co. and other big Pentagon contractors are bracing for fresh congressional criticism of weapons-procurement blunders and profits as Sen. John McCain ratchets up his scrutiny of the defense establishment." Sen. McCain reportedly wants to use his memberships on the Armed Services Committee and Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee to investigate "alleged sweetheart dealings between the Pentagon and industry." The Journal writes, "Currently, many contractors are awarded maximum bonuses, even on projects that are significantly behind schedule or over budget."

DOJ Targets Human Trafficking In Midwest. The AP (5/25, Sedensky) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department launched a loosely organized effort Wednesday to prosecute human trafficking in a region that has prosecuted virtually no such cases." The AP continues, "Officials announced the Human Trafficking Rescue Project in conjunction with training sessions for regional police, prosecutors and social service workers - the rank-and-file professionals seen as integral to spotting incidents of forced labor and sexual exploitation, and to keeping them from spreading. … 'Human trafficking is nothing less than modern-day slavery,' said Bradley Schlozman, the U.S. attorney for western Missouri." The AP adds, "Trafficking affects an estimated 600,000 to 800,000 victims annually - including an estimated 14,500 to 17,500 who are brought to the U.S. - and has become a top issue for the Justice Department. Schlozman, named interim U.S. attorney in March, previously worked in the department's Civil Rights Division, handling cases including trafficking. … More than 30 other regions have launched similar task forces, which aim to educate authorities on how to identify trafficking cases and how to respond to victims. No funding has yet been awarded to this region's program. … Schlozman said his office was investigating several trafficking cases in the area, including alleged incidents of forced labor and prostitution of both children and adults. … Wan Kim, the assistant U.S. attorney general for civil rights, said within a 10-mile radius of the training seminar - at a hotel near Kansas City International Airport - one could find examples of trafficking."

WTHR-TV Indianapolis (5/24, Chapman) reports on its Web site, "Now, alongside big cities like New York, Los Angeles and Chicago, Indianapolis is on the government's map when it comes to human trafficking. In a report to the Justice Department, local investigators have identified as many as 40 potential victims, some in brothels run by a growing population of immigrants. 'We're finding out that a lot of the immigration issue is tied so closely to human trafficking,' says Keith Lourdeau, agent in charge of the FBI's Indianapolis office." WTHR adds, "The Julian Center in Indianapolis is now opening its doors to human trafficking victims as part of a half-million dollar grant from the Justice Department.. ... 'We need to take off the head of the organization for it to stop,' Lourdeau says. 'We need people inside to help us out so that we can crack the ring.'"

Florida Man Pleads Guilty To Transporting Illegal Aliens. The Naples Daily News (5/24, Zeitlin) reported, "A Fort Myers man pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court today to a count of transporting illegal aliens. Eliseo Escalante Santizo…an illegal immigrant from Mexico, was arrested by the FBI in connection with a human trafficking case involving a 14-year-old-girl and 24-year-old woman from Chiapas, Mexico."

Mexican Man In Oregon Charged With Human Trafficking. KGW-TV Portland, OR (5/24, Giedwoyn) reports on its Web site, "A Mexican man living in Salem was indicted by a federal grand jury in Portland Wednesday on human trafficking charges, authorities said." Ramon Lopez-Montanez "is accused of kidnapping a woman from Mexico and threatening to harm her or her family unless she manufactured marijuana, according to the FBI and Oregon State Police. … In addition to being blackmailed and taken to Otis, Ore. for the marijuana operation, the victim was beaten, stabbed and sexually assaulted as well as caused to witness acts of violence committed against children and other women, according to the indictment."

ANTITRUST:

Former Michigan School Official Charged With E-Rate Fraud. IDG News Service (5/25, Gross) reports, "A former assistant superintendent at a Michigan school has been arrested, along with his wife, on charges of fraud involving US$7.3 million obtained from a US government program intended to help schools and libraries connect to the Internet, the US Department of Justice (DOJ) said Wednesday." IDG continues, "A federal grand jury in Detroit on Tuesday indicted Douglas A. Benit and Mary Ann Elam Benit on fraud-related charges for allegedly using his position at Ecorse Public Schools to steer contracts from the U.S. E-Rate program to a company under his control. The contracts were awarded to Coral Technology under inflated bids, the DOJ said." IDG adds, "The indictment charges both the Benits and Coral with one count of conspiring to commit federal program fraud and mail and wire fraud between March 1998 and October 2003, as well as one count of mail fraud in relation to a Coral application for an E-Rate funded project in the Ecorse schools. … Douglas Benit is also charged with two counts of federal program fraud relating to school purchases of vocational labs and payments required under the federal E-Rate program, the DOJ said. He is also charged with one count of mail fraud in relation to a September to November 2005 scheme to defraud a mortgage and a lending company while obtaining a $893,750 mortgage. … Douglas Benit and Coral are charged with two counts of wire fraud in relation to wire transmissions made in 2001 and 2002 in connection to the E-Rate fraud, the DOJ said. Benit and his wife are charged with bank fraud in a December 2002 to April 2003 scheme to defraud a Minnesota bank, the DOJ said."

Falconbridge Blasts Rivals In Inco Takeover Bid. The Financial Times (5/25, Simon) reports, "Falconbridge has accused several rival metal groups, including Swiss-based Xstrata, of putting up obstacles to European regulatory clearance of a friendly takeover bid from Inco, its fellow Toronto-based nickel miner." The Times continues, "Delays in anti-trust approvals by the European Commission and the US Justice Department opened the way for a C$20bn (US$17.8bn) hostile bid last week by Xstrata for Falconbridge." The Times adds, "Singling out Xstrata, the Swiss trading group Glencore and the French nickel miner Eramet, Derek Pannell, Falconbridge's chief executive, said this week: 'I'm sure if there had been no pushback, [the deal with Inco] would have gone a lot more smoothly.' … Glencore owns 36 per cent of Xstrata. Mr Pannell said Eramet was unhappy at failing to gain control of a Falconbridge exploration property in New Caledonia. … Mr Pannell expressed the hope that Canadian authorities would apply the same rigour in vetting Xstrata's bid as the European Commission had done with the Inco deal."

Anderson To Purchase Silver Line Building Products. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (5/25, Welbes) reports, "After 102 years as a leading maker of wood windows, Andersen Corp. is embracing vinyl. … Bayport-based Andersen said Wednesday that it's buying Silver Line Building Products Corp., one of the largest U.S. manufacturers of vinyl windows. The deal is Andersen's largest acquisition, and will give it access to vinyl window sales at the Home Depot." The Pioneer-Press continues, "Both companies are privately owned, and terms of the deal weren't disclosed. But the Silver Line acquisition will raise Andersen's annual revenue by almost a third. Hoover's Inc., a business research firm, estimated Andersen's 2004 sales at $2.5 billion, while it lists Silver Line's 2005 sales at $700 million. … Some 60 percent of the windows made in the U.S. are vinyl, which is the fastest-growing segment of the business. Silver Line's single largest customer is Home Depot, which carries its American Craftsman vinyl window line. … Andersen's move into vinyl also occurs as the market for new-home construction continues to show signs of slowing. Last week, the U.S. Commerce Department said that housing starts fell for a third straight month in April, dropping by 7.4 percent from the previous month. The April number was the lowest since November 2004." The Pioneer-Press adds, "The Silver Line acquisition still needs to pass a government antitrust review, but the two companies hope to close the deal by the end of June."

EU Gives Antitrust Nod To Bayer's Purchase Of Schering AG. Dow Jones (5/25) reports, "The European Commission Wednesday cleared German health care company Bayer AG to purchase competitor Schering AG, creating one of the largest pharmaceutical companies in the world. The deal values Schering at EUR16.3 billion, or EUR86 a share. In a statement, the commission said the two companies are 'mainly complementary.'" Dow Jones continues, "The main overlaps are in a few over the counter and prescription anti-fungal markets. … Even in these fields, the commission said the two companies had market shares above 35% only in isolated areas: gynecological anti-fungals in Portugal, topical dermatological anti-fungals in Austria and combinations of corticosteroids with anti-fungals in Ireland. … Even there, the commission said the enlarged Bayer will 'face several strong competitors and there are no specific entry barriers in the markets.' … Bayer Management Board Chairman Werner Wenning urged Schering shareholders to approve the deal. … He said they note the antitrust approval and that his company's EUR86 per Schering share is about 61% above the unweighted 12-month average price and about 39% above the closing price of Schering shares before the takeover."

EU Is Likely To Drop Its Fight With France On Takeover Law. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, A8, Cohen) reports the European Commission "is likely to abandon efforts to strike down a French law restricting foreign takeovers, even as it has railed against rising economic nationalism in Europe." The Journal notes, "The commission's success in fighting protectionism in France could set a precedent as the EU seeks to counter rising economic nationalism in other member countries." The Commission "sees France as one of Europe's arch-protectionists," and its "regulators increasingly are finding themselves outmaneuvered by Paris."

Cablevision Recording Proposal Sparks Copyright Suit. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Grant) reports, "Seven of the leading movie and television producers filed a lawsuit in U.S. District Court in New York against Cablevision Systems Corp. challenging the cable operator's plan to allow viewers to store and pause TV programs on the cable system rather than on set-top boxes, firing the opening shot in a copyright battle." The Journal continues, "Cablevision, the country's sixth-largest cable operator by subscribers, has announced plans to build into its network a technology that would allow its subscribers to record every TV show, like many do with TiVo-like digital-video recorders built into set-top boxes. Cablevision believes it would be far less expensive to build the recording capability into the network than to provide hundreds of thousands of households with individual recorders." The Journal adds, "The movie and television producers, whose battles against recording technology date back to the first VCRs, charge in their lawsuit that Cablevision's plan would 'exploit' their programming 'in a manner that violates the law.' The lawsuit, which has been expected since Cablevision announced its plans, asks the court for a judgment declaring that Cablevision's plan would violate copyright law. … The plaintiffs include News Corp.'s Twentieth Century Fox Film Corp., Viacom Inc.'s Paramount Pictures Corp., Walt Disney Co.'s Disney Enterprises Inc., CBS Corp.'s CBS Broadcasting, General Electric Co.'s NBC Studios Inc., Disney's ABC Television Network, and Universal Studios, owned by Vivendi Universal and GE."

China Mobile Nears Deal For Millicom. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Singer, Dean) reports, "China Mobile Communications Corp. is near a $5.3 billion pact to acquire Millicom International Cellular SA of Luxembourg, operator of mobile-telephone services in many of the world's poorest nations, in a move that would expand China's influence into international telecommunications, especially in emerging markets." The Journal continues, "The expected deal -- the biggest overseas acquisition by a Chinese company -- could also have a ripple effect on Chinese suppliers of telecom equipment and mobile handsets such as Huawei Technologies Co. and ZTE Corp. China Mobile is expected to upgrade the network of Millicom, which operates in 16 countries." The Journal adds, "The deal, which could be signed within days, is the latest sign of Chinese companies' ambitions in snapping up international assets. After watching Western companies invest billions in their home market, Chinese companies in recent years have been looking at purchases abroad, most notably with Lenovo Group Ltd.'s purchase of the personal-computer division of International Business Machines Corp. For China's government, the expansion of Chinese companies overseas is part of a broader push to expand the country's global influence."

McCain, Martin Make Case For A La Carte Cable Choices. Sen. John McCain and FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, write in the Los Angeles Times (5/25, 958K) that millions of TV viewers outside the US have the choice to "buy their television channels individually or in smaller bundles -- and get better deals as a result." In the US, "there is too little competition, too much regulation and not enough consumer choice in the cable TV business. … The solution to high cable bills isn't price controls or additional government regulation. It is more competition and more choice. For that reason, Congress should pass the proposed Consumers Having Options in Cable Entertainment Act -- the CHOICE Act -- which is being introduced today. It would allow cable companies to compete nationally for your business (rather than only at the local level) in exchange for agreeing to offer channels a la carte, either individually or in smaller bundles."

BASF Gets EU Approval For Degussa AG Purchase. The AP (5/25) reports, "EU regulators on Wednesday approved German chemical maker BASF AG's bid to buy Degussa AG's construction chemicals business." The AP continues, "BASF will pay about 2.2 billion euros ($2.6 billion) in a deal aimed at expanding its reach in a fast-growing sector. … The European Commission said its investigation showed the deal would not cause any antitrust problems even though both make performance polymers used to make concrete products. … 'Overlaps between both parties' activities lead to a combined market share that raised no competition concerns on the market for performance polymers since the combined firm would continue to face several strong, effective competitors,' it said."

Bush Promotes Plans For Expanded Use Of Nuclear Energy. President Bush promoted his plans to expand the use of nuclear power during a visit to Pennsylvania yesterday. The Philadelphia Inquirer (5/25, Shields, 423K) reports, "Bush visited Limerick's nuclear power plant this afternoon to push his broad new offensive on nuclear energy. Bush's ambitious Global Nuclear Energy Partnership is an attempt to promote construction of a whole new generation of nuclear plants in an industry which hasn't licensed one in 30 years." His proposal "faces a tough battle in Congress in the coming weeks. The House appropriations subcommittee cut it's funding in half last week, but it has powerful support in the upcoming senate budget debate. The future of the Global Nuclear Energy Partnership will likely be worked out in conference committee, observers say." The AP (5/25, Loven) notes the Limerick Generating Station is "a nuclear plant operated by Exelon Corp. about 40 miles from Philadelphia." Bush "donned a white hard hat for a brief tour, then spoke to employees in a sweltering tent set up in the shadow of the plant's two enormous cooling towers." Bush "argued that nuclear power is abundant, affordable, safe and clean."

The story got no network coverage, though it is getting attention from major newspapers this morning. Much of the coverage frames Bush's remarks in the context of high energy prices and the political pressure on Bush and the GOP. CNN's The Situation Room (5/24, Malveaux), for example, reported Bush is "saying we've got to wean Americans off their addiction to foreign sources of oil. Also, of course, the President facing a great deal of pressure, if you will, from the American people, who are looking at those gas prices, very high gas prices, saying: 'What are you going to do?' Clearly, his energy plan is not a short-term solution, but a long-term solution to push forward on nuclear energy."

The New York Times (5/25, Rutenberg, 1.19M) reports Bush "promoted the 2005 energy bill he signed into law, which provides tax incentives, loan guarantees and federal risk insurance for companies building nuclear plants. Before the law, he said, only 2 companies were considering building plants, but now 16 are." Said Bush, "For the sake of economic security and national security. … The United States of America must aggressively move forward with the construction of nuclear power plants." Bush also "spoke of his administration's efforts to research alternative energy sources, like solar panels, ethanol and wind turbines."

The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Pulizzi, 2.11M) reports Bush "said the government has a strategy of loan guarantees, production tax credits, and federal risk insurance to encourage development. He said 16 companies have expressed an interest in building as many as 25 new nuclear facilities." While the US "hasn't built a nuclear plant since the 1970s," Bush "noted that other nations are further along. France generates more than three-quarters of its electricity from nuclear power, and China has plans to construct 40 plants over the next decade." The US "has 100 nuclear plants in 31 states. Those facilities generate a fifth of the nation's electricity."

Knight Ridder (5/25, Shields) reports, "It is a pivotal time for Bush's nuclear agenda. Funding for a new nuclear initiative is being fought over in Congress. Last year, he won a host of other incentives for the nuclear industry, including tax breaks and insurance against regulatory and legal delays." Knight Ridder adds, "Another part of his plan calls for expediting the opening the Yucca Mountain storage facility in Nevada, which would allow plants such as Exelon's Limerick Generating Station to begin shipping out spent fuel that is now stored on site. Providing a place to store spent fuel is critical if new power plants are to be built."

The Washington Post (5/25, A4, Baker, Mufson, 744K) reports, "Opinion polls suggest public attitudes toward nuclear power are shifting. Support for expanding the use of nuclear energy has grown from 43 percent to 55 percent in the past three years, according to surveys by the Gallup Organization." The Pew Research Center "found rising support in the past few months as gasoline prices have soared, from 39 percent last September to 44 percent in February. Still, 49 percent remain against expanding nuclear energy. … Some environmentalists, including Patrick Moore, co-founder of Greenpeace, have changed their minds as well, seeing nuclear energy as clean compared with fossil fuels that pollute the environment. Other environmentalists complain that Bush is overselling any benefits from nuclear power and underestimating the risks."

The Spring-Ford (PA) Reporter (5/25, Arnosky) reports that Bush said plans for new "nuclear power plants are hindered by lawsuits and 'bureaucratic obstacles.' He said his 2005 energy bill would give loan incentives, tax credits and federal risk insurance to the first six new nuclear power plants to be built. Bush also said a $1.1 billion partnership with the industry was in the works to facilitate new plants. 'I understand we need more nuclear power plants and here's a strategy to get it going,' Bush said. 'Here's a way to say to the industry, 'We're serious about this.'"

Meanwhile, under the headline "Protesters Rally Against Bush Energy Stance," the Pottstown Mercury (5/25, Moyer) reports, "Hours before President Bush shook the hands of workers at" the Limerick plant, about "25 community members and activists gathered outside Pottstown Borough Hall to protest Bush's energy policy. Lewis Cuthbert, president of the Alliance for a Clean Environment, criticized "Bush's call for building more nuclear power plants," ripping "nuclear power as too polluting, dangerous and expensive, and said it is not an answer to global warming. 'Mr. President, are you trying to deceive us, or don't you know the facts?' Cuthbert said."

Bush Also Attends Fundraiser For "Vulnerable" Republicans. The AP (5/25) reports, "Bush made a fundraising stop Wednesday for two vulnerable House Republicans seeking re-election in the Philadelphia suburbs. Calling Reps. Jim Gerlach and Mike Fitzpatrick 'two of the young stars of the United States Congress,' the president urged about 250 supporters to continue fundraising for the pair and recruiting others for their campaigns." The event "raised about $450,000 after expenses, said Gerlach spokesman John Gentzel. The money will be split evenly between Gerlach, Fitzpatrick and the Pennsylvania Republican State Committee."

Limerick Workers Welcome President's Nuclear Proposals. Under the headline, "President Bush Gets A Warm Reception From Exelon Employees," the Pottstown (PA) Mercury (5/25, Karas) reports, "It's not every day the president stops by to tell you that you're doing a good job." The Mercury adds, "About 300 of the plant's 700 employees attended a 30-minute speech by the president," who talked up the safety of nuclear power production and said, "It is safe because of advances in science and engineering and plant design," and added, "It is safe because the workers and managers of our nuclear power plants are incredibly skilled people who know what they're doing."

Another Pottstown Mercury (5/25, Brandt) piece noted that as the president stood "in front of a backdrop heralding his 'Advanced Energy Initiative,' Bush emphasized research and technology as the best way to maximize the energy resources available to the nation and thus break America's addiction to foreign oil." Prior to "making his 35-minute speech, Bush toured the station, visiting the plant's two massive generators and its control room. He praised the employees' 'strong dedication to safety,' and earned more of their applause when he said 'this plant serves two million homes in the area, and it does so in a way that does not require us to pollute the air."

House Seen As Likely To Scale Back Bush Plan To Resume Nuclear Fuel Reprocessing. The AP (5/25, Hebert) reports, "The House appeared ready to scale back President Bush's ambitious plan to resume nuclear fuel reprocessing as part of an international program to boost nuclear power." A "broad spending bill, expected to be approved by the House later Wednesday would cut Bush's request for the first installment of the nuclear initiative in half, to about $130 million. An attempt to slash it by an additional $40 million was rejected." The AP adds, "The $30 billion spending measure funds the Energy Department, related agencies and numerous federal water projects."

Spent Fuel Issue Seen As Critical To Future Of Nuclear Energy. In an editorial, the Pottstown Mercury (5/24) says the president's visit "comes at a time when the local plant is dealing with the long-simmering question of how to dispose of spent fuel rods in the future. Exelon recently unveiled plans to store used nuclear fuel on a concrete pad" and the "proposed project utilizing what is known as 'dry cask storage' has become necessary," though "Bush may discuss some other ideas on how to handle spent fuel in the coming years." The Mercury adds that the "issue of safely handling spent fuel is a critical environmental question that will become even more important as the future of nuclear energy is debated."

More Commentary. In a commentary appearing in the Valley Item (5/25) of Royersford, PA, Mike Morsch who is the Executive Director of Montgomery Newspapers, writes, "As presidential speeches go, this one was typical. He talked about his energy plan to a favorable, if somewhat calm, crowd of approximately 200 inside a big tent at the Limerick plant site. He talked for about 30 minutes, and he sounded a bit more Texas twangy than he does on television, especially during the part of his speech where he talked about reducing our dependence on foreign oil." But, Morsch adds, "it was a great honor for the nuclear station and its employees -- as well as all Limerick residents -- to have Mr. Bush in the house."

Protesters Try To Halt Test Blast In Nevada.

USA Today (5/25, Passey, 2.31M) reports, "Residents downwind of the Nevada Test Site are fighting to block a non-nuclear blast scheduled there in June, mainly because of the legacy of Cold War atomic testing. The Pentagon's Defense Threat Reduction Agency (DTRA) plans to explode 700 tons of ammonium nitrate and fuel oil at the site, which is 65 miles northwest of Las Vegas, to test the effects of ground shock on hardened targets, such as underground bunkers." Opponents cite three objections: "There could be health hazards for those downwind because radioactive soil left over from Cold War-era atomic testing might be dispersed; the test could lead to renewed nuclear testing; and the Western Shoshone tribe claims the test would violate ancestral lands."

Utilities Scramble To Make Sure They Have Enough Coal. The Christian Science Monitor (5/25, Clayton, 61K) reports that as summer approaches, electric utilities are scrambling to make sure they have enough coal on hand. According to the Monitor, "With at least a few utilities unable to get enough coal shipped by rail, some are resorting to extreme measures - even importing it." The US has enough domestic reserves to last centuries. But "getting America's abundant coal to where it is most needed is a growing challenge for power companies - and the railroads that supply them."

California Town Uses Eminent Domain To Block Planned Wal-Mart Store. ABC World News Tonight (5/24, story 7, 2:25, Rooney, 8.78M) reported on the use of the eminent domain power by the town of Hercules, California to take land that Wal-Mart had planned to use for a big-box story. Hercules is "a developing city of 23,000, east of San Francisco, where the city's planners have labored to give this town a certain look and feel. And right here, on 17 acres, next to new homes with a view of San Pablo Bay, Wal-Mart plans to build a new store." But the city council "voted unanimously to take Wal-Mart's land by power of eminent domain. The right to take private property for public use. The world's largest retailer is not what the city wants as the centerpiece of its planned waterfront." Towns "from Virginia to California have fought Wal-Mart before, claiming it would kill local business. But many more have welcomed Wal-Mart's jobs and tax revenue, actually using eminent domain to help the retail chain develop. But no one has ever used eminent domain to stop Wal-Mart. And in an ironic reversal of roles, the company's spokesman cried foul."

IG Finds FBI Missed Many Opportunities To Uncover PRC Spy. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (5/25, Sherman) reports that in a report released yesterday about FBI informant Katrina Leung and her relationship with Special Agent James J. Smith, DOJ inspector general Glenn Fine concluded that "the FBI missed many opportunities to uncover that Leung was working for China and getting her information from Smith, as well as to learn of the long affair between the pair." Fine found that "in one instance in 2000, a tipster told the FBI that Leung was 'in bed with' the bureau's Los Angeles office," and "the FBI also failed to follow up on information that pointed directly to Smith even as the bureau was in the midst of a major espionage investigation that resulted in the arrest of Robert Hanssen." The AP adds, "The FBI said Wednesday it has learned from the many mistakes in the spy case. 'The FBI has already moved to address the systemic issues identified by' Fine that allowed Smith and Leung to escape detection for so long, the bureau said in a statement." The AP notes that "special task force was created in 2002 after FBI Director Robert Mueller, on the job for only a few months, expressed concern about the pace and scope of the investigation" in to the Leung-Smith relationship," and "Mueller asked for the inspector general's review."

The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Spano, 958K) reports, "A separate review of spies against China concluded in December that FBI relationships with several of them should be 'closed' because of 'control and reliability issues,' according to Wednesday's report. The secret report also said that an FBI task force was created to investigate persistent allegations against Leung after counterintelligence operations had been compromised and several of its operatives 'had been detained and interrogated in China.'" The Times adds, "The report repeatedly uses words such as 'incompetent,' 'incomprehensible,' and 'incredible' to describe the FBI's self-investigative failings." The FBI said "that it has moved 'to minimize the risk' associated with spying operations," noting "it has implemented seven of the 11 reforms recommended by the inspector general." Under the headline "F.B.I. Missed Many 'Red Flags' On Key Informer, Review Finds," The New York Times (5/25, Lichtblau, 1.19M) notes, "As early as 1987, senior officials at the F.B.I. received word" Leung "might have had unauthorized contacts with Chinese officials," but "the F.B.I. continued using her as one of its most highly paid informants, paying her a total of $1.7 million." The bureau said yesterday that "it had taken numerous steps since 2002 to bolster management of its informants," but the "report said the F.B.I. still needed to go further."

DOJ_NMG_0029406

The Washington Post (5/25, A13, Geis, 744K) reports, "FBI officials on Wednesday acknowledged 'weaknesses in the FBI's asset program.' The agency has implemented, in whole or part, seven of 11 recommendations in the report, they said. … 'The FBI expanded its polygraph program in 2001, making all on-board employees, contractors and detailees subject to a polygraph examination,' FBI Assistant Director Charles S. Phalen Jr. wrote in response to Fine's report. 'The FBI has built, and continues to improve, a comprehensive, centralized and forward-looking security program.'" The Washington Times (5/25, Seper, 90K) also reports on the IG's criticism, and the FBI's response, under the headline "FBI Agent, Tipster Hid Relationship."

Oregon Mayor Accuses FBI Of Trying To Spy On City Government. The Oregonian (5/25, Griffin, 346K) reports Portland Mayor Tom Potter "is accusing the FBI of trying to spy on City Hall. In an open letter to Portlanders on Wednesday, Potter reported that a Federal Bureau of Investigation agent approached a city employee earlier this month seeking information about City Council members and city government. 'In the absence of any reasonable suspicion of wrongdoing, I believe the FBI's recent actions smack of "Big Brother,"' Potter wrote. … Federal officials confirmed that an agent spoke to a midlevel employee from the city attorney's office, hoping that person would serve as a source inside City Hall," but Portland Assistant SAC Daniel Nielsen "had a different take on the encounter's significance. 'We're supposed to talk to people, to develop sources, to develop relationships. … We can't do our jobs without the public,' he said." However, National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers president-elect Martin Pinales said, "I have never heard of anything like that. It's a frightening concept." And Georgetown law professor David Cole "said the FBI appeared to be operating outside its own guidelines." US Rep. Earl Blumenauer "said he will ask the FBI for an explanation. 'The report that the FBI would consider trolling for information in Portland City Hall is stunning,' Blumenauer said."

The AP (5/25, McCall) adds that at a news conference yesterday, Potter called "it a recruiting attempt that raises questions about how far the government is willing to go to spy on its citizens." But Nielsen "said an agent and a city employee 'came across each other in day-to-day activities, Starbucks and they work out in the same gym.' He said the agent made no secret about who he was, and when the city employee was 'clearly uncomfortable about the situation,' he told her she was free to report the contact. 'It wasn't the jackbooted thug coming in and putting on the klieg lights,' Nielsen said." The AP notes, "Legal experts said it would be highly unusual for the FBI to try to recruit someone outside of a specific investigation." The Portland Business Journal (5/24) also reports on Potter's allegations.

Search Continues For Source Of Fentanyl-Laced Drugs Linked To Overdoses. According to the AP (5/24), federal drug agents and the CDC "are stepping up the investigation of dozens of fatal overdoses linked to heroin laced with a strong prescription painkiller. The synthetic painkiller fentanyl has tainted the illegal heroin supply in Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania and New Jersey, authorities said. In Detroit, the drug combination has been linked to at least 23 deaths in less than a week. … 'Samples are being tested to see if we can determine if it's pharmaceutical grade or from a clandestine laboratory,' DEA agent Christopher Hoyt said." Fentanyl-laced illegal drugs have received wide media coverage, with more than 80 news outlets referring to such stories today. The latest AP story has been published in newspapers and/or posted on the Web sites of ABC News, CBS News, FOX News, the New York Times, Washington Post, San Diego Union-Tribune, and Kansas City Star.

The Chicago Tribune (5/24, Heinzmann, Coen) writes, "As Chicago police continue investigating heroin dealers lacing their drugs with the deadly painkiller Fentanyl, federal officials are trying to determine whether the outbreak of the drug is part of an emerging national problem. … In addition to Chicago and Detroit, New Jersey and Philadelphia also have had a series of fatal overdoses in recent weeks. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration has begun testing samples in controlled purchases from targeted areas…to determine if they can be linked to a common source, officials said."

The Washington Times/ UPI (5/25) cites the Chicago Tribune story in its report.

Lewes, Delaware's WGMD Radio (5/24) reports on its Web site, "The U-S Drug Enforcement Administration is testing samples of heroin sold in Chicago to determine if bad batches nationwide can be linked to a single source. Authorities say 15 people were hospitalized two weeks ago after using heroin bought on Chicago's West side."

DOJ_NMG_0029407

Local TV Coverage. WFLD-TV, Chicago (5/24, 12:00 p.m.) reported, "Federal drug agents are stepping up their efforts to find the source of tainted heroin. … They believe the heroin has been mixed with a very important drug. The Drug Enforcement Agency is trying to figure out if it has been stolen or made in an illegal lab. They believe it does not come from one source but at least several."

WGN-TV, Chicago (5/24, 8:00 a.m.) reported, "Federal drug officials have begun testing samples of heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl. Here in Chicago and several other cities, addicts have been dying after taking the contaminated drug. The fentanyl is either [stolen from] pharmaceutical warehouses or made in makeshift laboratories and can be 100 times as potent as heroin. The Fed is trying to track the drug to a common source in hopes of stopping it before it gets into street drugs."

KWGN-TV, Denver (5/24, 9:00 p.m.) reported, "Dozens of fatal overdoses of a prescription painkiller have been reported in seven northeastern states. Federal drug agents say the deaths are link to e synthetic painkiller fentanyl that's laced with heroin the combination has killed at least 23 in Detroit and ten more in Chicago. Fentanyl is 80-times stronger than morphine."

KCAL-TV, Los Angeles (5/24, 12:00 p.m.) reported, "Nearly three dozen people have died recently from overdoses on heroin laced [with] a painkiller. Dozens have been hospitalized. It has turned up in several Midwest and eastern states."

KENS-TV, San Antonio, Texas (5/24, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "The painkiller fentanyl has tainted the illegal heroin supply in Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania and New Jersey. In Detroit alone, the drug combination has been linked to at least 23 deaths in less than a week. In Chicago two weeks ago, 15 people were hospitalized after using heroin bought on the city's West side. In southern New Jersey and the Philadelphia area, at least nine heroin users died last month."

Israeli Listed Among World's Top Drug Traffickers Enters Plea In Florida. An Israeli considered to be one of the world's biggest distributors of Ecstasy yesterday pleaded not guilty to federal drug charges. The AP (5/24) reports from Fort Lauderdale that Zeev Rosenstein "entered the plea nearly three months after he was extradited from Israel to face charges that he conspired to distribute more than 1 million Ecstasy pills in the United States between summer 1999 and November 2001. … Rosenstein, who was on the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's list of 44 top worldwide drug traffickers, was arrested in Israel more than a year ago." CBS News, the Washington Post, Miami Herald, Houston Chronicle, Contra Costa Times, and Jerusalem Post are among the news outlets that published the AP story.

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (5/25) reports, "Federal prosecutors say Rosenstein headed a drug trafficking ring spanning four continents and orchestrated the delivery of 700,000 Ecstasy pills seized in a New York apartment in 2001. Israel extradited Rosenstein, 51, to the United States in March. He is being held in the maximum-security unit of the Federal Detention Center in Miami."

Drug Runners Carrying More Drugs Across Border, Cartels Relying More On Marijuana Income. According to the AP (5/24), drug runners are "getting caught running more drugs than ever -- often over the same desert routes used by undocumented migrants -- with the U.S. Border Patrol reporting a sharp increase in the amount of marijuana seized. The Border Patrol's Tucson, Ariz., sector confiscated almost as much marijuana in the first 7 1/2 months of this fiscal year as they did all of last year, and seizures are up all along the border. … The drug runs are so difficult that Steve Robertson, a U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency special agent who has worked along the Texas border, says the average migrant couldn't make them." The AP adds, "Mexico's Attorney General, Daniel Cabeza de Vaca, said cartels are also becoming more reliant on income from marijuana."

Five Sentenced In Texas Marijuana Smuggling, Money Laundering Case. The Waco (TX) Tribune Herald (5/25) reports, "Five people who were part of a group that trucked thousands of pounds of marijuana along Interstate 35 and into Waco and Dallas were sentenced to various jail terms in Waco federal court Wednesday. The five were among at least 11 people involved in a smuggling and money-laundering operation in which thousands of pounds of marijuana were brought into Waco and Dallas, according to the Internal Revenue Service's criminal investigation division. … According to IRS officials, beginning in 1998, [a group] packed tractor-trailer rigs in Mexico with as much as 12,000 pounds of marijuana." The prison terms ranged from 8 years to 17 years.

NY: Man Faces Charges For Selling Steroids Through Internet. In Colonie, the Albany (NY) Times Union (5/24, Higgins) reports authorities said the "seizure of $50,000 in illegal steroids announced by town police and federal investigators [yesterday] is the largest ever in the Capital Region. Christopher J. Magnano…is facing charges he received illegal steroids through the mail and courier services from other countries and re-sold them on the Internet."

Federal Agents Robbed, Carjacked In Maryland. The Washington Post (5/25, B02, Klein) reports, "Two federal law enforcement officers and another man were carjacked yesterday morning at a Prince George's County gas station as they prepared to go on vacation in South Carolina, according to police and a source with knowledge of the investigation." The Post continues, "The law enforcement officers -- one from the Secret Service and one from the Drug Enforcement Administration -- were gassing up a red Hummer with two motorcycles attached to the back at 4:30 a.m. when they were approached by a pair of gunmen, said police and the source, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the case is open." The Post adds, "The three victims were on their way to Myrtle Beach, the source said. … The gunmen took money from the law enforcement officers, then demanded the keys from the Secret Service officer, who was the driver of the Hummer. He handed them over. Nothing was taken from the third man, police said.""

California Murder Suspect Escapes In Van Stolen From US Marshals. The Oakland Tribune (5/25, McDonough) reports, "A fugitive with a history of slipping away from police avoided arrest again Tuesday when he stole a van from the U.S. marshals who had come to arrest him. … It was the second time within several hours the man had evaded police." The Tribune continues, "Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal Tom Figmik said his agency received word late Monday night that murder suspect Kim Saelio, 22, was in the Dublin area. … A reputed pimp from Oakland who uses the names 'Mr. T.' and 'Tim-Tim,' Saelio is wanted by police in connection with the slaying and robbery of a man shot in Vallejo in November while meeting with a prostitute." The Tribune adds, "Vallejo police called in the U.S. Marshals Service — experts in chasing fugitives — in February to track Saelio, Figmik said. … When the marshals surrounded him at a Dublin bowling alley around midnight Monday, Saelio escaped by stealing a van rented by the marshals. … Figmik would not say how Saelio managed to steal the van, only that the theft was being investigated. He said there were no weapons in the vehicle when it was stolen."

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Expected To Pass Immigration Reform Bill Today. The US Senate is expected to pass its version of an immigration reform bill today. Most media reports look ahead at the fight ahead between the Senate and the House. As the AP (5/25, Gamboa) reports, Senate "passage would set the stage for a difficult negotiation with the House, which passed legislation last year that exposes all illegal immigrants to criminal felony charges."

USA Today (5/25, Kiely, 2.31M) notes "a test vote Wednesday morning showed strong bipartisan support for the comprehensive immigration bill, which includes plans to expand visas for 'guest workers,' fines against employers who hire illegal immigrants and tough border security measures." The Senate "voted 73-25 to cut off debate and move ahead to final passage, probably by today." The Washington Times (5/25, Hurt, 90K) notes three Democrats, "Sens. Byron L. Dorgan of North Dakota, Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia and Ben Nelson of Nebraska -- joined 28 Republicans to try blocking the bill on spending concerns, but they fell 10 votes short of the 41 needed to succeed."

The Washington Post (5/25, A3, Babington, 744K) headlines its story "Fragile Senate Coalition Set To Pass Bill On Immigration," and says "the very mixture of get-tough and be-kind measures that have made Senate approval possible could prove the biggest obstacle to reaching an accord with the House, where conservatives are determined to secure the borders before tackling other matters." Senate "leaders said their coalition is fragile, and it may be hard pressed to survive changes that House members signal they will demand this summer." The New York Times (5/25, Swarns, 1.19M) runs a similar story under the headline "Immigration Bill Backed In Senate, Setting Up Clash," reporting "with passage of the Senate legislation on track, senators and Bush administration officials quickly turned their attention to wooing the House. For the second straight week, the administration dispatched Karl Rove, the president's political adviser, to a meeting of House Republicans to press Mr. Bush's case for an approach broader than theirs."

The story was covered by CBS and NBC last night, while ABC did not cover it. The CBS Evening News (5/24, lead story, 1:50, Attkisson, 7.66M) reported, "The Senate tomorrow is expected to approve what has come to be called the 'roots approach.' The longer an illegal immigrant has been here, the easier it is to stay. But House leaders today said they won't go along." Tomorrow's Senate vote "sets up a showdown between the House and the Senate with two bills that have almost nothing in common, and if they can't come to an agreement, even after all of this, nothing gets done." NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 7, 0:55, Reid, 9.87M) also says "the hard part" will be "reaching an agreement with the House."

The CBS Evening News (5/24, story 2, 3:05, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The Senate bill contains a little-known provision that would put immigrants who serve at least two years of active duty in the US armed forces on a fast track to citizenship. This one was written by Senator Barbara Mikulski of Maryland in response to the tragic case of one immigrant soldier who was killed in Iraq" before his citizenship was approved.

The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Lueck, 2.11M) reports "members of a bipartisan coalition backing the bill overcame another attempt by conservatives to derail it yesterday, on the grounds that it exceeded spending limits. Senators voted 67-31 to block the challenge."

Taking a pessimistic view of the bill's chances of reaching the President's desk, the Los Angeles Times (5/25, Gaouette, 958K) headlines its report "Little Progress Made on Immigration Deal." Says the Times, "As the Senate headed for a final vote on immigration policy today, the rift between the administration and House Republicans on the issue seemingly deepened Wednesday as GOP lawmakers rebuffed attempts by White House aide Karl Rove to win their support for the broad overhaul endorsed by President Bush."

The Christian Science Monitor (5/25, Chaddock, 61K) reports "US senators are pushing the pedal to the metal on the first overhaul of immigration policy in two decades. The trouble is, no one is quite sure what's in it. The quickened pace in recent days has helped the Senate get to 'yes' on the 614-page bill -- a final vote is expected this week. And it's given senators a rare chance to actually legislate. But it's also produced several surprises that have caught members off guard. … In the end, the Senate raised the number of visas for high-tech workers from 65,000 to 115,000 a year. But with an automatic 20 percent escalator clause in the bill that could mean an additional 3 million foreigners will compete with American workers for high-tech jobs in the US during the next 10 years. … It's one of the many possibly unintended consequences in a bill that could have a vast impact on America's economy and society."

House Republicans Challenge Rove On Bush Immigration Proposals. The Hill (5/25 O'Connor) reports, "Several House Republicans gave White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove an earful yesterday about their strong opposition to any immigration-reform bill that includes an avenue for citizenship." Rove, "making his second appearance in two weeks at the weekly gathering of House Republicans…fielded a series of questions — and comments — from the assembled members one week after his 15-minute presentation on the issue left many members unsatisfied." Members and staff said "most of the members spoke in harsh terms and openly challenged Rove on President Bush's rationale for pushing a comprehensive reform bill."

House GOP Said To Face Political Costs With, Without Passage Of Immigration Bill. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Hook, 958K) reports Rep. Mark Souder was "hammered by constituents for his moderate stand on illegal immigration" and "this month got 7,100 fewer votes in the GOP primary than in 2004, when he ran against the same challenger. His experience helps explain why so many House Republicans adamantly oppose any compromise that would allow illegal immigrants to earn legal status. They have concluded it could be political suicide to give ground to the Senate immigration bill, expected to pass today, which would do just that." Souder said, "The Senate bill would be worse than nothing." The Times adds other Republicans "fear a different political risk — that the party would suffer if it came up empty-handed after the long, emotional debate on immigration that has spilled from Capitol Hill into the streets of major cities."

McCain Believes House, Senate Should "Work Something Out." Sen. John McCain was asked on CNN's Larry King Live (5/24) about the status of the immigration bill in the Senate. McCain said, "We're on the home stretch. We'll probably pass it tomorrow morning. We have invoked cloture, which means you've only got a limited amount of hours before we vote final passage. Several more contentious amendments, but I think we're pretty well going to merge as the basic proposal went in." Asked if the House would go along with the measure, McCain said, "You know, I'm very encouraged by some of the comments that some of the House members have been making lately. They understand that we shouldn't leave this issue unaddressed. I mean, it's a terrible problem. It has to do with national security and many other aspects of American life. And I've seen some good comments out of the House. And there's no reason why we shouldn't sit down and be able to work something out."

Rohrabacher Blasts Senate "Shamnesty" Bill. GOP Rep. Dana Rohrabacher writes in the Washington Times (5/25, 90K), "Right now, the Senate is desperately trying to convince the American people that their immigration bill is something else -- anything else -- than what it is: a massive amnesty for all 15 million to 20 million illegal aliens without any meaningful enforcement provisions. This same open-borders crowd that has betrayed the American middle class for years is hoping to fool us again." This "shamnesty" bill "spells out the level of contempt the Senate has for middle-class Americans."

"Liberal House Republicans" Said To Be Increasingly Opposed To "Path To Citizenship." The Washington Times (5/25, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Liberal House Republicans are taking an increasingly tough stance on immigration reform and are more determined than ever to delete the portions of the Senate bill that grant citizenship rights to more than 10 million illegal aliens." Rep. Christopher Shays, described as "one of the most liberal Republicans in Congress," said, "I don't want to see a bill come to the floor of the House that gives them a path to citizenship." This is "a change from three weeks ago, before Mr. Shays attended 18 community meetings in his district, where the questions invariably turned to immigration. At the first meeting, he told a group of constituents that he supported providing a path to citizenship to illegals. Not anymore."

NYTimes Says Hastert Making Partisanship "A Sweeping Dogma." The New York Times (5/25, 1.19M) editorializes, "After all the legislative hash that the Republican Congress has made of immigration policy, the worst is yet to come. Any workable compromise that a bipartisan mix of senators may manage this week must, perforce, run into negotiations with House obstructionists. And none are more hard-core than Speaker Dennis Hastert." He "stands waiting with his triumphalist decree that no bill, even one fairly balancing border protection and enlightened naturalization law, can be put to a vote unless a majority of his Republican caucus -- not some larger majority of, yes, the people's House -- agree to it. … In the past, leaders of Democratic majorities did not hesitate to elbow Republicans out of play on issues and keep them on a leash. But bipartisanship always had a chance to prevail, while the Hastert doctrine makes partisanship a sweeping dogma."

LATimes Says Senate Should Pass Now "Disfigured" Immigration Bill. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, 958K) says in an editorial that the Senate's "more comprehensive approach -- tougher border security coupled with ways to address the nation's labor needs via a guest worker program and the legalization of millions of workers already in the country -- is sensible, although the bill being voted on is a rather disfigured version of the original legislation sponsored by Sens. John McCain and Edward M. Kennedy." But "senators should vote to support this bill. And then they should brace themselves for a contentious conference with the House, where not even Karl Rove can get much of a hearing when he asks for support for immigration reform."

Border Fence Seen As Bad Idea. In a USA Today op-ed (5/25), Robin Hoover of Humane Borders says, "Border fences might contribute to a perception of stability in border communities as far as local law enforcement is concerned, but they do not deter border crossers in the whole. They move migrants around a bit, but the U.S. Border Patrol union opposes the walls precisely because they are ineffective."

USA Today Backs Border Wall In High-Traffic Areas. USA Today (5/25, 2.31M) says in an editorial, "There are many reasons fences won't solve the nation's illegal immigration problems. And yet they have an undeniable logic as part of the solution. Sections of the U.S.-Mexico border are so inundated with illegal crossings that to not build a fence is tantamount to giving up. In the areas along the border south of Tucson, the Border Patrol is apprehending almost half a million people a year. While fence opponents often speak of the negative symbolism of walling off the border, the absence of any meaningful barriers in high-traffic areas is highly symbolic itself. It conveys the unmistakable message that the United States isn't serious about stemming the tide of illegal immigration."

Will Calls For Ending Bilingual Ballots. In his Washington Post column (5/25, A29), George Will says, "Declaring English the national language is a mere gesture. But by ending bilingual ballots, American law would perform its expressive function of buttressing, by codifying and vivifying, certain national assumptions and aspirations. Among those is this: The idea of citizenship becomes absurd when sundered from the ability to understand the nation's civic conversation."

Four Of Five Potential Republican '08 Candidates To Vote For Senate Bill. The AP (5/25, Sidoti) reports, "Call it an early, conservative rehearsal for the 2008 campaign for the Republican presidential nomination, four senators supporting a chance at citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants, one opposed." Sen. Sam Brownback said, "Some call it amnesty. I call it probation and parole." The AP adds Brownback is "willing to push back against conservatives — many of whom presumably will vote in primaries and caucuses in 20 months' time." Sen. John McCain, "echoing Brownback's view as well as the one espoused by President Bush," said, "In poll after poll after poll, Americans support earned citizenship and a comprehensive solution." Sen. George Allen, "seeking re-election in Virginia as well as maneuvering toward a White House bid, begs to differ." Allen said, "There are a lot of practical, principled problems with this and I am not voting for this. It rewards illegal behavior." The AP adds, "Four of five potential GOP presidential candidates — Brownback, McCain, Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee — are betting the wiser vote is in favor of the bill."

African Americans, Hispanics Clashing. The Christian Science Monitor (5/25, Wood, 61K) reports, "In cities where almost half of the young black men are unemployed, a debate is raging over whether Latinos - undocumented and not - are elbowing aside blacks for jobs in stores, restaurants, hotels, manufacturing plants, and elsewhere." Hispanics and blacks "tend to gravitate to the same inner-city areas and low-skill labor markets - and the result is a clash over jobs that require less skill and less education, experts say." Vernon Briggs, "a Cornell University professor who researches immigration policy and the American labor force," said, "In this era of mass immigration, no group has benefited less or been harmed more than the African-American population." The Monitor adds, "Yet a precise relationship between the presence of immigrants and the loss of black jobs has not been clearly proven in research. Rather, the influx of legal and illegal immigrants has been so massive that it has affected the internal migration of native-born Americans to the point where 'economists have given up trying to prove a one-to-one-displacement,' says Dr. Briggs."

Immigrant Students Lobby Congress For Temporary Legal Status. The Washington Times (5/25, Summers, 90K) reports Marie Gonzalez, "a model student at her Jefferson City, Mo., high school," was "one of about 70 immigrant and illegal-alien students from across the country who lobbied on Capitol Hill yesterday, sharing photos and personal stories in an effort to rally co-sponsors for the DREAM Act, a House bill that would allow temporary legal status to illegal-alien students who have been living in the United States for at least five years. The act would allow the students to complete a university degree program or serve time in the military and eventually apply for permanent residency." The students, "who included illegal aliens whose visas have expired and U.S.-born citizens who have illegal-alien parents or siblings, also urged lawmakers not vote for any bill that would lead to the separation of families."

First National Guard Troops To Be Deployed To US-Mexico Border. The AP (5/25, Baldor) reports the "first wave of about 800 National Guard soldiers will head to the U.S-Mexico border next week, including planners and leadership personnel who will stay longer than the planned 21-day missions, the National Guard chief told lawmakers Wednesday." Lt. Gen. Steven Blum "said 200 soldiers are preparing to go to each of the four border states — California, Texas, Arizona and New Mexico — around June 1. He said the initial troops will be part of a longer-term force of project managers who will stay on the job over time to provide continuity in the new border program."

Knight Ridder (5/25, Brown) reports Bush Administration officials "have provided a number of details about the border security plan in the past week, but testimony by Blum and other officials before the House Armed Services Committee was some of the most in-depth explanations of how it's supposed to work." Blum said "that the troops deployed at any given time would represent less than 2 percent of available Guard forces. About 71,000 National Guardsmen are in Iraq out of a total force nationwide of 445,000 part-time soldiers and airmen." He added that "no forces will come from states that are likely to experience hurricanes this year."

Snow Says Bush Is Acting Quickly On Border Security. White House Press Secretary Tony Snow was asked on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (5/24) why the US border remains so porous four years after the 9//1 attacks. Snow said, "The question is not why we have it, it's how we fix it, and that's what the President is talking about. When the President went before the nation -- what was it -- nine days ago, the first thing he talked about is figuring out the smartest and best way to patrol the borders. That means that some places will need fences, some places will need sensors. One thing we're sure we need is a lot more Border Patrol agents, and so he's getting to work on that right away. … So for everybody out there who says we need to do border security first; the president agrees, he wants to get started within the next couple of weeks."

Border Patrol Increased Faster, Apprehended More Aliens Under Clinton. The Washington Times (5/25, Dinan, 90K) reports the US Border Patrol "increased at a faster rate and apprehended more illegal aliens per year under President Clinton than under President Bush, according to statistics from a new, unpublished congressional research briefing report." President Bush "trails his predecessor on a series of measures of border security, says the briefing from the Congressional Research Service to the House Judiciary Committee, which was based on Department of Homeland Security data." Clinton "increased the number of Border Patrol agents and pilots by 126 percent over his eight-year term, or an average of 642 per year, while Mr. Bush has averaged 411 new agents per year through 2005, for a total increase of 22.3 percent over his tenure." Although Bush "last week said his administration has caught and returned 6 million illegal aliens, that's actually a drop from any five-year period during Mr. Clinton's administration, the briefing says."

Schwarzenegger Ready For "Temporary" National Guard Deployment. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Nicholas, Vogel, 958K) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "said Wednesday he was prepared to deploy National Guard troops to the Mexican border — but only temporarily — as part of a national effort to curb illegal immigration." Speaking on "the eve of a visit by Mexican President Vicente Fox, Schwarzenegger said in the clearest statement yet of his intentions that he would discuss border security with Fox and press the Bush administration for answers before making a final decision but that his inclination was to send the Guard for border patrols." The Times adds Democrats "quickly denounced Schwarzenegger's position and said the timing was poor."

Citizenship Verification Plan Said To Rely On Faulty Federal Database. The Washington Post (5/25, A1, Witte, 744K) reports in a front page story that a "federal database program with a checkered track record could dramatically expand to affect every U.S. employer and worker under provisions of the immigration legislation being considered by Congress." The program is "intended to keep illegal immigrants from working in the United States and to discourage more from entering, but in nearly a decade of small-scale tests, it has had trouble distinguishing between those who are here legally and those who are not. Fixing it and rolling it out nationwide could cost more than $1 billion."

Minuteman Founder Feels Vindicated. USA Today (5/25, Wagner, 2.31M) reports Chris Simcox, "co-founder of the Minuteman border watch movement, is feeling vindicated." President Bush "last week ordered 6,000 National Guard troops to the Mexican border, a move the 45-year-old former kindergarten teacher says is long overdue." Simcox said, "We feel that's a victory, but it's not nearly enough." He says "at least 30,000 troops are needed," and "that's why he'll press his war over illegal immigration." Simcox has "propelled himself to the forefront of America's angst-filled debate over illegal immigration."

Fox Calls For "Orderly" Flow Of Migrants. The AP (5/25, Vergakis) reports Mexican President Vicente Fox "said Wednesday that immigration is the most pressing challenge to the relationship between his country and the United States, but is also their greatest opportunity." On the second day of his four day US trip, Fox said "building a wall on the border is not the answer to illegal immigration into the United States." Speaking at a special session of the Utah legislature, Fox said, "Since the beginning of my administration, the government of Mexico has promoted the establishment of a new system that regulates the movement of people across our border in a manner which is legal, safe and orderly." The AP adds that after "his appearance in Utah, Fox flew to Washington state to meet with farmers in the Yakima Valley and Oregon Gov. Ted Kulongoski before moving on to Seattle. After that, he is expected to address California lawmakers and meet with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa."

The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Verhovek, 958K) reports with "immigration issues front and center before the U.S. Congress, Mexico's president made an emotion-laden visit to this agricultural valley" of Yakima "in central Washington state Wednesday, telling hundreds of farmworkers at an apple orchard that "we miss you very much in Mexico." Greeted by "a 13-piece mariachi band and a boisterous, cheering crowd in an area where nearly half the population is Latino, most with ties to Mexico," Fox "used the second day of his four-day U.S. trip to highlight support for what he called an 'orderly' guest worker program." Fox "received a generally warm welcome from legislators and business leaders in Utah and

Washington state, where Gov. Christine Gregoire met him at the Yakima airport."

Mexican Border Agents Have Little Power To Stop Migrants. The New York Times (5/25, McKinley, 1.19M) reports Mexican border patrol agents "cannot arrest the migrants, or hold them for long, because they are breaking no Mexican law, unless he can prove they are paid guides." The agents "acknowledge they do little to stop the migrants on the Mexican side. Indeed, they hand out literature containing tips on how to survive in the desert and what to do if apprehended in the United States. They see their mission as saving lives, keeping people from dying in the desert."

Illegal Immigrants Using Drainage Pipes To Enter San Diego. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Marosi, 958K) reports the "vast labyrinth of drainage pipes under Otay Mesa, a booming commercial area of San Diego 15 miles southeast of downtown" is a "23-mile network" leading "to about 500 manholes scattered across about three square miles. From those openings into the bowels of the city, mud-covered migrants crawl out into streets, busy intersections and parking lots, creating a dizzying guessing game for U.S. Border Patrol agents." Agent Joe Perez said, "They're popping up all over the place." The Times adds, "The migrant traffic below truck-clogged streets and new office parks underscores the persistence and desperation of people faced with crossing one of the most heavily fortified sections of the border."

Some Immigration Experts See Border Wall As Positive Development. The New York Times (5/25, Thompson, 1.19M) reports the debate in the United States over building a wall on the US-Mexico border "has started some Mexicans thinking it is not such a bad idea. Nationalist outrage and accusations of hypocrisy over the prospect have filled airwaves and front pages in Mexico, as expected, fueled by presidential campaigns in which appeals to national pride are in no short supply. But, surprisingly, another view is gaining traction: that good fences can make good neighbors." The "clamorous debate over a border wall has confronted President Vicente Fox of Mexico at every stop during a visit to the United States that began Tuesday. While he did not publicly endorse the idea, he made clear that his government was prepared to live with increased border security as long as it comes with measures that opened legal channels for the migration of Mexican workers." Several immigration experts "have even begun floating the idea that real walls, not the porous ones that stand today, could be more an opportunity than an attack. A wall could dissuade illegal immigrants from their perilous journeys across the Sonora Desert and force societies on both sides to confront their dependence on an industry characterized by exploitation, they say."

Cuban Man Wrongly Convicted Of Rape Faces Immigration Fight. The AP (5/25, Davis) reports, "A Cuban man wrongly convicted of a 1982 rape must still answer to a federal immigration judge for not obtaining proper U.S. residency status and convictions for burglary, possession of a firearm and loitering, authorities said." The AP continues, "Orlando Bosquete, who came to the United States in the 1980 Mariel boat lift, could be deported because he never became a legal U.S. resident, Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokeswoman Barbara Gonzalez said Wednesday." The AP adds, "He also broke immigration rules when he was convicted in 1995 of burglary, possession of burglary tools and possession of a firearm, according to a U.S. Justice Department notice to appear. The report also cites a 1988 conviction for loitering. … In all three cases, Bosquete, 52, was an escaped convict on the run from a 55-year sentence for a rape authorities now say he didn't commit. … Bosquete was set to be released from prison Tuesday after DNA evidence proved he did not rape the Key West woman in 1982. He was sentenced to 55 years in prison after the victim identified him in a darkened parking lot from the back of a police cruiser more than 20 feet away."

TAX:

GAO Study Finds Charities Owe Back Taxes. A GAO report to be released today has found that more than 1,200 charities that participate in the Combined Federal Campaign owe federal taxes. The Washington Post (5/25, A14, Salmon, 744K) reports, "The study found that although most of the delinquent charities owed less than $10,000, 15 owed significant amounts. One mental health clinic diverted $1.5 million it owes in payroll taxes to pay salaries, the report said. A health care provider that has received more than $2 million in federal grants owes more than $400,0000 in taxes and penalties on late payroll taxes, it said. A museum has underpaid its payroll taxes by $100,000. The study did not identify the charities."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Zoellick's Departure From "Subordinate Position" Imminent. In continuing coverage of reporting that began Tuesday night, the New York Times (5/25, Brinkley, 1.19M) reports that Deputy Secretary Zoellick "intends to resign…after barely 15 months in the job, aides and associates said Wednesday." The Times adds that "from his first days at the State Department, Mr. Zoellick has chafed at his subordinate position, frequently remarking that he was finding the adjustment difficult after running his own office during four years as" US Trade Representative. And "friends said, Mr. Zoellick had at times felt marginalized at the State Department, where his subordinates, including R. Nicholas Burns, an under secretary of state, manage most of the major issues, including matters related to Iran, Iraq, the rest of the Middle East and North Korea." The Times calls Burns "the logical front-runner to take Mr. Zoellick's job," but adds that Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt is "also under consideration."

The Washington Times (5/25, Kralev, 90K) says "a State Department official acknowledged that rumors had spread but said no announcement about Mr. Zoellick had been made to people in the building." The official "speculated that the deputy secretary might have received an offer he could not refuse, as was the case with Margaret Tutwiler, who was undersecretary of state for public diplomacy for a few months in 2004 before becoming vice president of the New York Stock Exchange." Zoellick's aide "noted that his boss surprised many in Washington last year when he agreed to become Miss Rice's deputy after holding a Cabinet-level position during President Bush's first term."

Editor Of Conservative Magazine To Be Bush Domestic Policy Advisor. The AP (5/25, Pickler) reports, "In the latest White House personnel changes, the editor of a conservative magazine will replace Claude Allen, the domestic policy adviser who left in February amid a shoplifting investigation." The White House "announced the appointment Wednesday of Karl Zinsmeister, who has been editor-in-chief of The American Enterprise magazine for 12 years." According to The American Enterprise Web site, Zinsmeister "has traveled to Iraq as an embedded journalist, writing three books about his experience there and writing and producing a forthcoming PBS film called 'Warriors' that profiles US troops." He "once worked for Democratic Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan of New York, the Web site said."

The New York Times (5/25, Bumiller, 1.19M) says Zinsmeister "is not in the mold of many other White House aides who have longtime ties to Mr. Bush or Republican administrations. 'He's probably exactly what the White House needs, which is fresh blood and an endless supply of ideas,' said Kevin A. Hassett, a colleague of Mr. Zinsmeister's and the director of economic policy studies at the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative policy group." But "it is unclear whether Mr. Zinsmeister will give his new White House job any clout because Karl Rove, the president's powerful political aide, has effectively operated as Mr. Bush's chief domestic policy adviser for the past five and a half years."

The Washington Post (5/25, A4, Fletcher, 744K) reports Bush said in a statement, "Karl has broad policy experience and a keen insight into many of the issues that face America's families and entrepreneurs, including race, poverty, welfare, and education. He is an innovative thinker and an accomplished executive. He will lead my domestic policy team with energy and a fresh perspective."

In an editorial, the Washington Times (5/25, 90K) says, "As founder and longtime editor in chief of the American Enterprise, Mr. Zinsmeister is an inspired choice, much like former radio host and Fox News anchor Tony Snow being named press secretary. We have no doubt that he will bring the same thoughtful conservative analyses to domestic affairs as he exhibited in running one of the country's finest publications for more than 10 years."

Schumer Seeks Floor Debate On Schwab Confirmation. CQ (5/25, Van Dongen) reports, "President Bush's nominee for US trade representative may run into trouble on the Senate floor." Though Republicans hoped to get Susan Schwab confirmed by voice vote before Friday's recess, CQ says "some Senate Democrats are talking about a debate and a floor vote on her nomination." On Wednesday, Sen. Chuck Schumer said he wants a debate, which CQ says "would give Democrats another opportunity to attack what they describe as the administration's 'failed' trade policy."

Snow Says Separation From Fox News Is "Clean Break." The Washington Times (5/24, Caterinicchia, 90K) reported yesterday that one of the "first questions Tony Snow was asked at his inaugural White House press briefing concerned his ties to previous employer Fox News." Snow said, "It was a clean break." Snow said he "had about two years left on his Fox contract when he resigned. He described the process he went through to leave the News Corp. company." His last day "on the Fox books was May 7, and he officially became a White House employee May 8. Mr. Snow said government rules precluded him from receiving any future payouts or employment considerations from Fox."

DOJ_NMG_0029415

Paulison Nomination Hits Snag Over Tax Deductions. The AP (5/25, Jordan) reports Sen. Susan Collins maintained yesterday that "any irregularity is cause for concern with a presidential nominee," but said "questionable deductions on three years of tax returns" by acting FEMA director R. David Paulison were not likely to "hinder his approval as permanent chief." However, Sen. Joe Lieberman "said 'it's hard to say' whether the concerns would slow the confirmation." FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said Paulison's returns had been "prepared by a private accountant who apparently gave Paulison bad advice."

The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Block, 2.11M) reports "Paulison drew praise and generally favorable reviews until the questions over the deductions came up. It wasn't clear the purpose or value of the deductions." They "were discovered late Tuesday night, and came as a surprise to both the Department of Homeland Security and Mr. Paulison, DHS officials said." The Journal adds, "A derailed confirmation would be a major blow to the White House and the DHS which is stepping up efforts to shore up federal response capability before the 2006 hurricane season starts June 1."

Reichert Says Removing FEMA From DHS Not A "Comprehensive Solution." Rep. Dave Reichert, in his Congress Blog In The Hill (5/25), writes that while "everyone in Washington, DC, agrees" that FEMA "is broken," there is a lack of agreement on "how to fix it." Reichert adds that some have called for FEMA's removal from DHS, which may "look good politically…, but…is not a comprehensive solution." Reichert continues, "FEMA must be strengthened and given a more accurate mission and the resources and authority to carry it out, and its efforts must be integrated with those of local authorities who respond to disasters. Along with my colleagues from the House Committee on Homeland Security, I introduced bipartisan legislation that would do just that, creating a 21st century approach to emergency management."

Army Corps Near Goals For Levee Repair; Assessors Say It May Not Be Enough. The New York Times (5/25, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports, "In a breathless finale that has been called one of this generation's greatest adventures in civil engineering, the Army Corps of Engineers has all but completed its repairs to this city's ruined levee system." And though "the corps has largely achieved its goal, independent engineers say it is the goal that is the real problem." Raymond Seed, a professor of engineering at the University of California, Berkeley, "and other experts who have studied the crazy quilt of levees, flood walls, pumps and gates that have been in the process of being built for more than 40 years now say that they were never adequate to protect hundreds of thousands of people in an urban setting and that the levees themselves are now known to be fundamentally flawed."

Secret Feud Over Clinton-Era Case Blamed For Goss Effort To "Purge" CIA Operatives. In an exclusive on Newsweek's (5/24) web site, Mark Hosenball writes that Newsweek has discovered new details about "a purge of top [CIA] operatives shortly after [Director Porter] Goss's arrival in 2004. A bitter secret feud over a Clinton-era counterintelligence case was apparently a major motivation behind the loss of those seasoned intelligence veterans, sources say. … The secret feud revolves around how CIA management, led by former director George Tenet, handled a 1999 counterintelligence problem that arose as a result of the Clinton administration's bombing of Belgrade to oust Serbian dictator Slobodan Milosevic. Though the counterintelligence investigation ended years ago, egos and reputations were so deeply bruised that participants on both sides of the dispute (who spoke to NEWSWEEK anonymously because the matter is still considered sensitive) still fume when discussing the case. The CIA declined to comment on the matter."

Supreme Court Clerks Predominately White Males. The Legal Times (5/25, Mauro) reports, "The intense competition for Supreme Court clerkships has been compared more than once to a market that responds to economic forces. … If the analogy works, then it has been a very bullish year for clerkship futures." The Times continues,

"Think of it: A former high court clerk, John Roberts Jr., has succeeded another former clerk, William Rehnquist, as chief justice. Two excellent books have just been published on the history and power of clerks, also adding luster to the job. … The resignation May 10 of Judge J. Michael Luttig from the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals abruptly shut off a major pipeline of high court clerks, intensifying competition among other judges. Luttig has sent 43 of his 45 law clerks to the Supreme Court in the past 15 years." The Times adds, "Cap that with reports of law firm hiring bonuses of $200,000 for former clerks, and the job's luster seems brighter than ever. … But as high court clerkships drift ever upward into the stratosphere of earthly rewards to which young lawyers can aspire, one stark reality persists: Recipients of this prize are overwhelmingly white, and mostly male. … Eight years after attention was first called to the dearth of minorities among high court clerks, it appears that only three of the 37 clerks serving at the Court this term are nonwhite. No Hispanics or Native Americans seem to be among the ranks of law clerks, and not a single African-American male. … Viewed another way, it appears that all of the clerks are white in the chambers of seven of the nine justices. Only Justices Clarence Thomas and Stephen Breyer have hired minorities this term."

Administrative Judges Oppose Linking Pay To Performance. The Washington Post (5/25, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "When it comes to federal pay, should there be consistency or equity inside government? Should pay hinge at least in part on job performance? Are there jobs where performance cannot be measured or rewarded in the usual way?" These questions "played out in miniature recently before a House subcommittee looking at pay and retirement benefits of administrative law judges. … ALJs think they got left behind two years ago after the Bush administration and Congress overhauled the pay system for the Senior Executive Service, and they would like to be paid at a rate that is comparable to the SES rate. ALJs also oppose linking their pay to performance factors, contending that their jobs must be seen as independent of political pressure and the whims of their agencies."

Congress To Miss Memorial Day Deadline For Supplemental Spending Bill. The AP (5/25, Taylor) reports congressional Republicans "will miss a Memorial Day deadline set by the White House to complete work on a huge bill to supply new funds for troops overseas and hurricane victims at home." Even though "closed-door talks between top House and Senate negotiators had produced a series of tentative agreements, obstacles such as President Bush's $1.9 billion request for a new border security initiative are proving too difficult to resolve before Congress leaves Friday for a weeklong Memorial Day recess." House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis said, "We are going to take the necessary time to develop the right product that is narrowly focused on the war on terrorism and hurricane recovery." Lewis "said an agreement would be reached soon after Congress returns in early June." The AP adds that just last week, "the White House sent lawmakers a letter saying that it is 'critical' that the measure — which ballooned from Bush's $92.2 billion request to almost $109 billion during its consideration by the Senate — be enacted before the end of May."

The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Rogers, 2.11M) reports conferees' failure to reach agreement on the supplemental spending bill is "adding to recent tensions with the White House." The "slow progress has irritated the Bush administration, which submitted its initial requests more than three months ago. The Pentagon, and especially the Army, has been counting on the money to replenish operations accounts strained by the accelerated pace of spending in Iraq. Mr. Lewis said the services 'informed us they can tolerate a delay into June.'"

House GOP Unity Seen As Dissolving. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Rogers, 2.11M) reports last week "ought to have been a good one for Republicans in Congress: The House passed a budget, President Bush signed more tax cuts and immigration legislation advanced in the Senate with the blessing of the White House." But "within days of the budget passing, Republicans fell into an ugly spending fight, impugning one another's honesty and patriotism on the House floor. Public resentment of oil-company profits, meanwhile, opened the door to a rout by environmentalists on the first 2007 appropriations bill. Even an elaborately staged tax-cut publicity event unraveled at the foot of the Capitol steps." The "budget infighting, the muddled news conference and the floor debate over federal lands can't be ignored: Democrats lost power in 1994 when they kept fighting among themselves, oblivious to their House burning around them."

Unfunded Government Retirement Benefits Reach $57.8 Trillion. USA Today (5/25, Cauchon, 2.31M) reports a USA Today analysis shows "taxpayers owe more than a half-million dollars per household for financial promises made by government, mostly to cover the cost of retirement benefits for baby boomers." Federal, state and local governments "have added nearly $10 trillion to taxpayer liabilities in the past two years, bringing the total of government's unfunded obligations to an unprecedented $57.8 trillion. That is the equivalent of a $510,678 credit card debt for every American household. Payments on this delinquent tax bill must start soon if financial promises to the elderly are to be kept."

Senate Leaders Snub Lieberman, Collins In Naming Lobbying Overhaul Conferees. Roll Call (5/25, Newmyer) reports that with "a number of ethics-related probes of lawmakers intensifying, Senate leaders moved this week to put new momentum behind an overhaul of lobbying rules by naming negotiators to work out differences in the long-stalled bills." The five negotiators "are Republican Sens. Trent Lott (Miss.), Ted Stevens (Alaska) and Majority Whip Mitch McConnell (Ky.) and Democratic Sens. Chris Dodd (Conn.) and Daniel Inouye (Hawaii)." The move "cut out two lawmakers key to shaping the Senate measure — Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairman Susan Collins (R-Maine) and ranking member Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) — drawing a fresh round of criticism from ethics watchdogs." Also "absent from the conference committee will be Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a noted voice on reform issues who introduced the base bill on which the lobbying reform measure was built."

FDA Chiefs Overruled Staff On Morning After Pill. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Alonso-Zaldivar, 958K) reports that court transcripts to be released today show that the last two appointees to head the FDA "were closely involved in decisions to overrule the agency's medical reviewers and block the 'morning-after' birth control pill from being sold without a prescription." Last year, Lester M. Crawford "personally took the decision away from his top subordinates, according to depositions of two senior Food and Drug Administration officials. And at an earlier stage in the process, his immediate predecessor as FDA commissioner, Mark B. McClellan, raised objections that formed the basis for overruling medical reviewers." The Times adds, "The transcripts provide the most detailed look yet at an internal review that some critics say has been tainted by politics."

Sales Of New Homes Up 4.9%, But Number Of Homes On Market Hits Record. NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 6, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke said last week the once scorching housing market is now cooling off in an orderly way. New numbers out today on new home sales seem to back up that assessment, while sales of new single family homes increased by a higher than expected 4.9% last month. There is also a more sobering statistic here. The backlog of unsold homes hit a record 565,000. It would take almost six months to sell off all that inventory in homes, and that already has some homeowners worried about housing on the bubble."

Under the headline "New Signs Of A Slowing Economy In 2 Federal Reports," the New York Times (5/25, Peters, 1.19M) reports, "New-home sales rose last month, but failed to keep up the robust growth pace of March. The home sales numbers, along with a second government report yesterday that showed a steep decline in orders for durable goods, were seen as pointing to a softening economy." But "the numbers did little to reassure investors hoping that the economic data would encourage the Federal Reserve not to raise interest rates when it meets next month." The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Whitehouse, 2.11M) and USA Today (5/25, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) run similar reports.

The Washington Post (5/25, D3, Crutsinger, 744K) runs a more positive assessment of the home sales data, reporting, "Sales of new homes rose unexpectedly in April to the fastest pace this year as the housing sector showed resilience in the face of rising mortgage rates."

Stock Markets Break Losing Streak, Close With Small Gains. NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street here in New York today, the Dow was up almost 19 points [to close at 11,117.32], Nasdaq up 10 1/2 [to close at 2,169.17]." USA Today (5/25, 2.31M) notes the Standard & Poor's 500 also rose 1.99 points to 1258.57. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, McKay, 2.11M), among other sources, also reports the stock numbers.

More Commentary On Economy. Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (5/25, 1.19M), "You don't hear much from the American worker anymore. Like battered soldiers at the end of a lost war, ordinary workers seem resigned to their diminished status. The grim terms imposed on them include wage stagnation, the widespread confiscation of benefits (including pensions they once believed were guaranteed), and a permanent state of employment insecurity." He adds, "For an unnecessarily large number of Americans, the workplace has become a hub of anxiety and fear, an essential but capricious environment in which you might be shown the door at any moment."

NLRB Decisions Could Restrict Union Membership For Some. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Maher, 2.11M) reports a series of legal decision currently pending before the National Labor Relations Board could restrict union representation for some workers, and "deal a major setback to the struggling labor movement's efforts in growing areas of the economy such as health care." The cases "will help define when nurses and other workers qualify as supervisors, who are excluded from collective-bargaining rights under labor law. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has argued that unions currently organize many workers who fit the definition of supervisor under the law. The board's five members were appointed by President Bush, and organized labor has criticized its recent decisions as pro-business."

Firms Gave To Groups That Provided Free Trips For Judges. The Washington Post (5/25, A27, Weiss, 744K) reports that the Community Rights Counsel, a nonprofit Washington law firm, has released records showing that two organizations that have provided free trips to hundreds of federal judges received large contributions from tobacco, oil and other corporate interests. The Montana-based Foundation for Research on Economics and the Environment (FREE) and George Mason University's Law & Economics Center "previously said corporate money does not pay for the judges' seminars or declined to disclose their donors." But the documents "show that corporations including Exxon Mobil, Philip Morris and R.J. Reynolds Tobacco have contributed tens of thousands of dollars toward these programs."

Parties' Efforts To Recruit Congressional Candidates Examined. USA Today (5/25, Lawrence, 2.31M) reports Democrat Lois Murphy's decision to run for a Pennsylvania House seat "was a small early victory in the Democrats' drive to break the GOP's 12-year hold on the House of Representatives: She already had shown she could raise money and draw votes." Long before "anyone casts a vote, recruiting can determine the fate of a party. The goal is a strong candidate in every winnable race, but recruiters often fall short." The "competition is intense. Recruiters often target the same people — Republicans and Democrats tried at various points for ex-Redskins quarterback Heath Shuler, now running as a Democrat for a House seat in North Carolina. And there's no single formula for persuading someone to run."

Rothenberg Sees Mounting Evidence GOP Control Of House At Risk. In his Roll Call column (5/25), Stuart Rothenberg says, "While there is plenty of evidence that voters are dissatisfied with the president, Congress and the direction of the nation, I am finally seeing a significant amount of evidence at the local level — in polling data and in recent primary election results — that the national mood is having an impact on incumbents." Incumbent GOPers "are taking more of the heat, and they are likely to suffer far more in November." In Pennsylvania, "state legislators who supported a pay raise for the three branches of state government, including themselves, fell like flies in the state's May 16 primary. But the federal race that raised eyebrows involved the 10th Congressional district, where veteran Republican Rep. Don Sherwood (who admittedly has unique problems of a personal nature) squeezed out a 56 percent to 44 percent primary win over a prohibitive underdog." In addition, a "number of early polls now suggest greater vulnerability among Republican incumbents this cycle than I had previously assumed." Democratic polls "in Republican-held districts such as California's 11th (Richard Pombo), Indiana's 8th and 9th (John Hostettler and Mike Sodrel), Pennsylvania's 10th (Sherwood), Kentucky's 4th (Geoff Davis), and North Carolina's 8th and 11th (Robin Hayes and Charles Taylor) show Democrats running better against GOP incumbents than they should if this were a "normal" election cycle. In some of these districts, the Democrat is essentially unknown but running well ahead of his or her name identification." The "best evidence that the national GOP meltdown is affecting individual Republicans may well be North Carolina's 11th district, where Taylor is facing Democratic challenger Heath Shuler." Rothenberg adds, "And that's why Republicans in 2006 are starting to look like the Democrats in 1994."

Abramoff Scandal Takes Toll On Burns. Roll Call (5/25, Duran) reports national Democrats "may consider Sen. Conrad Burns (R-Mont.) the poster boy for the Jack Abramoff scandal and in deep trouble politically. But back home in Big Sky country, he's just Conrad — and doing just fine." Eastern Montana "is Burns' stronghold, and if watching him work the crowd" at the Bucking Horse Sale "is any indicator, the folks out here don't seem too eager to buck the three-term Senator from office." But while Burns "vehemently denies that he did any favors for Abramoff, the allegations have taken a toll. His poll numbers have sunk and the Democrats are doing everything they can to make sure he does not rebound. The Montana Democratic Party, aided by the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, began airing television commercials last August raising the question of whether Burns broke the law."

McCain Returns Contributions To PAC. The Washington Post (5/25, A15, Cillizza, 744K) reports Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) "returned $20,000 in campaign contributions from two prominent Texas businessmen after staff members for his political action committee discovered that there was an investigation into one of their companies." The donations "were made to Straight Talk America -- McCain's leadership political action committee -- by Sam and Charles Wyly, billionaire brothers who have been major players in Republican fundraising for years. Each cut a $5,000 check to Straight Talk, as did Sam's wife, Cheryl, and Charles's son, Charles III." The "contributions drew notice because the two brothers bankrolled Republicans for Clean Air, a soft-money 527 group that attacked McCain for his environmental record during his 2000 presidential campaign." The Wylys "are the subject of state and federal investigations centered on their transfer of revenue from stock options to offshore family trusts."

Roll Call (5/25, Kane) reports the "much-hyped detente between Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and big Texas donors to President Bush ran into an embarrassing snag last month, prompting the Senator to return $20,000 in donations from the Wyly family after realizing they were being investigated by federal tax authorities." McCain, whose "active courtship of Bush's financial network has been widely promoted by his political aides, gave back the checks from Sam and Charles Wyly Jr. and other relatives after his political action committee's 'vetting system' turned up multiple probes into the Wylys regarding their offshore holdings on the Isle of Man."

Gore Says He Has No Plans To Run For Office. The AP (5/25) reports Al Gore is "talking as if he has ruled out another run for the presidency. 'I don't intend to be a candidate ever again,' the former Democratic presidential candidate said in an interview broadcast Wednesday." But the AP adds Gore "then invoked the time-honored language of politicians who know it's perhaps folly to categorically rule anything out." On NBC's Today Show, Gore added, "I've said I'm not at the stage of my life where I'm going to say never in the rest of my life will I ever think about such a thing."

NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 5, 3:55, Brokaw, 9.87M) reported, "The Vice President's film tonight, which is called 'An Inconvenient Truth', is a stylish and compelling video version of an argument that he's been making for a long time that global warming is real and it's getting worse. But, to many of his former political allies, this is a film about more than global warming." Gore is "suddenly everywhere again, the leading man in a new documentary that graphically describes the realities and consequences of global warming." Gore's "high-profile involvement in this film and in other public appearances these days is causing a political buzz. Already your friends and admirers are saying to me, after seeing the film, he's running again." Gore: "I have no intention of being a candidate again." Brokaw: "No intention or a firm commitment?" Gore: "Well no intention, no plans, and I am involved in a kind of campaign but it's not for candidacy, Tom. It's a campaign to change the minds of the American people."

Gore May See Buzz About Political Prospects As Way To Boost Film. ABC World News Tonight (5/24, story 10, 2:20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "Al Gore is back with a new kind of campaign, not a political one, but one for his signature cause. Mr. Gore is the star of a new documentary about global warming. Intended or not, it's got a lot of people talking about Al Gore." ABC (Harris) added, "The movie is creating buzz. But will it create results? The producers say it will help shift the debate on an issue, that's never been at the top of the national to-do list. But documentaries rarely create real social change. And it's unclear whether the people who need convincing will go see it." The substance "may be overshadowed by speculation about whether the movie's a spring board for a presidential run. Some Democrats are encouraging Gore, because they're worried about Hillary Clinton's chances." Gore says "he's not running. But hasn't said he won't run. One commentator recently said, perhaps Gore isn't using the buzz from his movie to boost his presidential prospects. Maybe he's using the buzz from his presidential prospects to boost his movie and his cause."

Broder Notes "Buzz" During Clinton Speech Was About NYTimes Story On Her Marriage. David Broder writes in the Washington Post (5/25, A29, 744K), "The two sides of Hillary Rodham Clinton -- the opposites that make her potential presidential candidacy such a gamble -- came into sharp focus Tuesday morning at the National Press Club." The "buzz in the room was not about her speech -- or her striking appearance in a lemon-yellow pantsuit -- but about the lengthy analysis of the state of her marriage to Bill Clinton that was on the front page of that morning's New York Times. … Three times in the question-and-answer session, she referred to her husband as 'Bill,' praising him for seeing that his library in Little Rock incorporated a lot of energy-saving features. Other than that, the elephant in the room went unmentioned."

Feith Met With Hostility By Georgetown Faculty. Under the headline "Faculty's Chilly Welcome for Ex-Pentagon Official," the New York Times (5/25, DeParle, 1.19M) reports, "The move to a teaching position at the School of Foreign Service at Georgetown by [Douglas] Feith, a former Pentagon official, set off a faculty kerfuffle, with 72 professors, administrators and graduate students signing a letter of protest, some going as far as to accuse him of war crimes." Feith has received a "two-year appointment" (ineligible for tenure) from the school dean and the Georgetown provost.

Reagan, Bentsen Comments Cited As Classic Political Put Downs. The Washington Post (5/25, C1, Copeland, 744K) examines rhetorical put downs, citing the late Sen. Lloyd Bentsen's debate comment to Dan Quayle, 'Senator, you're no Jack Kennedy,'" and late President Ronald Reagan's, "There you go again" line to then-President Jimmy Carter as examples of "yo-momas from which no one can recover." The Post adds, "The perfect put-down is a checkmate, and the smart opponent…will laugh and concede the round."

WSJournal Eulogizes Bentsen. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (5/25, 2.11M) eulogizes former Sen. Lloyd Bentsen, who died earlier this week. The Journal remembers Bentsen "as the Senate Democrat who helped make the supply-side revolution possible. … To his credit, Bentsen was willing to consider new ideas, even some offered by non-establishment thinkers. He became, at a crucial moment, a convert to the supply-side policy mix of tighter money to re-establish price stability and tax cuts to lift incentives to work and invest. … Lloyd Bentsen was what used to be known as a growth Democrat, or what we like to call a Jack Kennedy Democrat."

Former NTSB Chief Warns Secondary Roads Being Neglected. Former National Transportation Safety Board chairman Jim Hall, who now heads Hall & Associates LLC, a safety and security consulting and government relations firm, in an op-ed in USA Today (5/25, 2.31M) warns that legislators are increasingly building new toll roads to pay for infrastructure, but ignoring the impact on secondary roads. Hall states, "Now is the time for leadership at the federal and state levels to require a percentage of toll road profits to be used to improve the safety of secondary roads. Otherwise, we will be traveling down a very dangerous road, indeed, creating two classes of safety: safe highways for drivers with money, and unsafe roads for the rest."

Rice Rules Out Direct Talks With Tehran As Snow Is Seen As Hinting At Possibility. USA Today (5/25, Slavin, 2.31M) runs a story headlined "White House Hints At Talks With Iranians," reporting "the Bush administration said Wednesday it might talk to Iran about the nuclear issue but only if Iran suspends its uranium enrichment program. 'When that happens…then there may be some opportunities,' White House spokesman Tony Snow said." Snow "declined to give details other than to say the talks would include other countries."

The New York Times (5/25, Weisman, 1.19M) reports the Administration yesterday "rejected calls for a direct dialogue with Iran over its nuclear program and declared that the United States had taken steps toward closing differences with Europe, China and Russia on a package of incentives and threats of punishment for the Iranian government. After a day of talks in London on a package" of incentives, Secretary Rice "said more work needed to be done in coming days or weeks. 'The London meeting had good progress. We did not expect that they were going to finalize all matters, and I think they're still working on some matters.'"

The Washington Times (5/25, Sands, 90K) says that while the Bush Administration "yesterday rejected the idea of direct talks with Iran," it "is facing increasing calls from allies, policy experts and even Mr. Bush's fellow Republicans to consider the first direct talks with Iran's Islamic regime since the 1979 seizure of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran." Snow, says the Times, "said the United States would not even consider face-to-face negotiations until Iran bowed to international demands to halt its uranium enrichment program, a critical step in the development of nuclear weapons." AFP (5/25) also says "the White House, under growing pressure to have bilateral talks with Tehran, insisted there would be no direct negotiations with Iran unless it suspends its uranium enrichment program."

The AP (5/25, Gearan) reports Rice "said talks Wednesday on perks and penalties meant to stop Iran from pursuing nuclear activities that the West fears could produce a bomb produced 'good progress,' suggesting the United Nations could act soon if Tehran remains defiant. Meanwhile, the possibility of direct talks between Iran and the United States appeared distant despite back channel overtures from Iran and additional pressure on Washington from its negotiating partners and others." Rice had been meeting with IAEA head Mohammed El-Baradei, who "told reporters the United States alone must decide if it wants to sit down for direct talks with Tehran, something the Bush administration has rejected as premature at best. White House press secretary Tony Snow ruled out direct talks at least until Iran ends all uranium enrichment, which Iran has refused to do, and allows international inspections."

The Financial Times (5/25, Dombey, Dinmore) keys on continuing US-Russian disagreement, saying, "Moscow and Washington failed to overcome their differences over Iran's nuclear programme yesterday, with a meeting of top diplomats in London unable to agree on what sanctions or incentives to present to the Islamic republic. … With speculation continuing that a diplomatic impasse could lead to a US military strike on Iran, the EU believes both threats and incentives are necessary to convince Tehran to halt development of the nuclear fuel cycle." The Times adds that Undersecretary Burns "also spoke to diplomats from Canada, Japan and Italy about possible sanctions and counter-proliferation measures, a US official said, signalling US efforts to broaden its coalition."

More Commentary On Iran. Yale professor Abbas Amanat writes in the New York Times (5/25, 1.19M), "It is easy to label Iran's quest for nuclear energy a dangerous adventure with grave regional and international repercussions. It is also comforting to heap scorn on President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for his earlier denial of the Holocaust and his odious call for the obliteration of the state of Israel. … Yet there is something deeper in Iran's story than the extremist utterances of a messianic president and the calculated maneuvering of the hard-line clerical leadership that stands behind him. We tend to forget that Iran's insistence on its sovereign right to develop nuclear power is in effect a national pursuit for empowerment, a pursuit informed by at least two centuries of military aggression, domestic meddling, skullduggery and, not least, technological denial by the West."

Morton Kondracke writes in Roll Call (5/25), "Even though Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is pursuing a diplomatic track to stop Iran from going nuclear, Bush's liberal critics are demanding an even more generous (or 'realistic') stance: A US offer of direct negotiations and a possible 'grand bargain' including security guarantees. Right-wingers, for their part, advocate preparations for military strikes." He adds, "I come down thinking that Bush ought do it all vis-à-vis Iran: Unleash the US ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, to explore openings with Iran for a grand deal, while also keeping up the diplomatic drive for stiff economic sanctions and preparing to bomb (or let Israel bomb) if nothing else works."

Olmert Impresses Congress With Anti-Terror Talk, Separation Plan. Several major newspapers featured coverage of Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's address to a joint session of Congress. Most of the stories remark on the positive reaction on the Hill to the Prime Minister's speech. The AP (5/25) reports Olmert told Congress "that Israel would be a 'willing partner in peace' with the Palestinians, but would draw its own borders in the West Bank should it conclude it has no negotiating partner." He "drew a sustained standing ovation when he declared, 'We will not yield to terror,' a reference to suicide attacks on Israelis such as those that killed a 16-year-old American high school student observing the Passover holiday in Israel this year." Olmert "said the West Bank withdrawal is vital to Israel's security and the cause of peace and cannot go forward without U.S. support," and "called on the moderate Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, to seek a negotiated solution -- the preferred route for both Mr. Olmert and President Bush."

DOJ_NMG_0029422

The Washington Post (5/25, A21, Branigin, 744K) says Olmert "urged the Palestinian Authority to meet his terms for peace talks or face a unilaterally imposed settlement in the West Bank, and he warned that a nuclear-armed Iran would constitute 'an intolerable threat' that he said 'cannot be permitted to materialize.'" Olmert "acknowledged Palestinians' 'national aspirations' and asserted that Israel has no desire to rule or oppress them. But he said Israel cannot wait indefinitely for the Palestinians to become acceptable negotiating partners, and he outlined" his unilateral disengagement plan. He "was repeatedly interrupted by ovations," and "stressed common ideals and said the United States and Israel share resolve to confront 'the scourge of suicide terrorism.'"

The New York Times (5/25, Erlanger, 1.19M) says Olmert "left Washington for home late Wednesday a pretty happy man. He was embraced by President Bush and reassured about Iran, and he received 16 standing ovations from a joint meeting of Congress for a speech that was strong on emotion and rhetorically tough on terrorism and Iran. More important, Mr. Olmert received just enough presidential support for his main initiative -- another unilateral pullback of Israeli settlers, from a large portion of the West Bank — to satisfy an Israeli public that craves American approval and respect." The Times says, however, that "those around Mr. Olmert were a little disappointed, too, that the American embrace of what Mr. Olmert is calling realignment was so tepid and conditional, especially given that the task of pulling some 70,000 Israeli settlers out of the West Bank will dwarf, in emotional cost as well as numbers, the much-praised withdrawal from the Gaza Strip." Knight Ridder (5/25, Douglas), Financial Times (5/25, Morris) and Washington Times (5/25, Fagan, 90K) run similar reports.

More Commentary On Olmert's Speech. The New York Times (5/25, 1.19M) editorializes, "Speaking to Congress yesterday, Mr. Olmert said Israel was willing 'to negotiate with a Palestinian Authority.' He added, 'In a few years they could be living in a Palestinian state, side by side in peace and security with Israel.' We'd like to see that, too. We only hope that Mr. Olmert and Mr. Bush realize that there will not be peace in the Middle East unless the Palestinians have a say in creating a state that can function."

Key Abbas Security Aide Assassinated. The Washington Times/AP (5/25, Barzak) reports Nabil Hodhod, "a Gaza security chief loyal to the Palestinian president was killed Wednesday when his car blew up, the second attack on a top commander in less than a week. There was no claim of responsibility, but the explosion came at a time of an increasingly bloody power struggle between President Mahmoud Abbas' forces and those of the Hamas-led government." The AP calls Hodhod "the highest-ranking official to be killed in a week of violent incidents, sparked by Hamas' fielding of its own militia in defiance of a ban by Abbas. Two other senior security officers have been targeted."

Israeli Raid Leads To Riot In Gaza Strip. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, King, Abukhater, 958K) reports, "Violence spread Wednesday from the volatile Gaza Strip to the West Bank, where Israeli troops shot dead four Palestinians in this usually placid city after a riot broke out during an Israeli arrest raid." The fighting in Ramallah, "the Palestinians' administrative and commercial capital, was the most intense in the city since a massive Israeli military incursion into the West Bank four years ago when they laid siege to the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's compound. Now forays by Israeli troops into the city center are rare, particularly during daylight hours." The New York Times (5/25, Myre, 1.19M) and Washington Post (5/25, A21, Wilson, 744K) run similar reports.

Novak Says Hyde Urging Bush To Act On Behalf Of Palestinian Christians. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (5/25) writes this morning that Rep. Henry Hyde "is pleading the case of endangered Palestinian Christians to President Bush." Hyde "said in a letter sent Friday to the White House: 'I cannot be blind when Israeli actions seem to go beyond the realm of legitimate security concerns and have negative consequences on communities and lands under their occupation.' He urged the president to take up this issue with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on his Washington visit this week." Hyde also sent the White House a report "prepared by his staff based on visits to Israel and Palestine over the past two years" that said the "Israeli security wall and expanding Jewish settlements in the West Bank…'are irreversibly damaging the dwindling Christian community.'" Novak notes, however, "There is no sign that Bush studied the House report or even that it made its way through an unsympathetic National Security Council staff into his hands. … 'It would be helpful,' says the Hyde report, 'if the United States Government committed itself to working with the Israeli government to end support for and prevent the establishment of new realities on the ground, which complicate a negotiated solution over Jerusalem, destroy its multicultural identity and constitute an increase in the political volatility of the city.' But will George W. Bush be that helpful?"

WHO Investigating Indonesian Avian Flu Cluster Outbreak. As World Health Organization investigators continue to investigate whether the avian flu deaths of eight family members in Indonesia were caused by human transmission of the virus, media coverage continues to mount. All three networks and the nation's dailies dedicated extensive coverage to the WHO's investigation which has raised the possibility that the H5N1 virus has mutated and could cause a pandemic.

ABC World News Tonight (5/24, story 3, 2:20, Litke, 8.78M) reported, "By the time medical investigators began reaching the remote village, nearly all the victims had been buried and many of the villagers were too grief-stricken, and too frightened, to recall events, making the mystery that much difficult to solve." There "have been a few cases of human-to-human virus in Asia. Between mother and child. Between patient and health worker. But those are clusters of two. This case involves up to eight victims. What also troubles the World Health Organization, no one has found the original source of the outbreak."

On ABC World News Tonight (5/24, story 4, 0:55, Vargas, 8.78M), medical editor, Dr. Tim Johnson, said the fact that virus samples so far show no mutations is "so far, very reassuring. And the second fact that it hasn't spread since two weeks ago, in the village or in the families of the village, is also I think very reassuring. If this has mutated into a pandemic virus, would have spread to hundreds, probably thousands of cases."

The CBS Evening News (5/24, story 4, 1:55, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Romania is taking steps tonight to fight the spread of bird flu, putting dozens of communities under quarantine to contain a new outbreak. In Indonesia, it now appears likely the virus spread person-to-person among eight members of the same family, killing seven of them, but the World Health Organization says this does not mean that bird flu has mutated into a form that could cause a worldwide epidemic." Dr. Anthony Fauci, National Institute of Allergy & Infectious Diseases: "The important point that we should emphasize to the public is that in examination of the virus itself, there doesn't appear to be any of those molecular or genetic changes or mutations as we call them that are associated with what we would consider a better transmissibility from human-to-human."

In separate interview on CNN's The Situation Room (5/24) Fauci said, "The somewhat encouraging news thus far within the framework of a serious situation is that there have not been other cases outside of the family unit. In other words, not a casual contact, not any of the nurses or the doctors or others who were taking care of them. So this could be a reflection of one of those unusual cases where you do get a family cluster." And in yet another interview on ABC News' Nightline (5/24, Moran) Fauci was asked if the family cluster means we are "one step closer to a pandemic." Fauci responded, "No. It doesn't. It's something you have to take very seriously and observe. If the virus itself changed and we saw there was casual contact beyond what the family unit was showing us, then I would be concerned that the virus was evolving in a way that was more efficient."

NBC Nightly News (5/24, lead story, 2:30, Francis, 9.87M) reported, "No one else outside the family is ill, not friends or hospital workers. The peasants are as baffled as scientists. Was it from the poultry that roams free or the pigs that kids play with? The World Health Organization's top epidemiologist here says villagers finding a sick bird may have cooked and eaten it." Dr. Steven Bjore, World Health Organization epidemiologist: "There's no security cams out there that we can go back and look at to see where someone actually touched a bird. That's just not possible. So we're really working backwards as best we can in a difficult situation."

NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 2, 1:10, Bazell, 9.87M) reported, "The WHO had a containment plan that called for very severe action if it was only a cluster of five people with human-to-human transmission, but when they took a close look at the case and found that it was contained to this one family, they decided to step down. But if there are any more cases in this village that could change very quickly."

USA Today (5/25, D11, Manning, 2.31M) adds Julie Gerberding, director of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, said, "There is no sign of an impending pandemic," but conceded that this is "probably the third example where we've seen pretty good evidence" that the virus passed from one person to another. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Chong, 958K) quotes WHO spokeswoman Maria Cheng as saying "investigators had not found H5N1 in the animals in that area, so the likely explanation is human-to-human transmission."

Meanwhile, the New York Times (5/25, Rosenthal, 1.19M) reports Dick Thompson, "a WHO official who arrived in Indonesia yesterday," said that it would "probably take a while to decide whether human-to-human transmission had occurred, because that determination was largely made by process of elimination."

Indonesian Findings May Raise Global Alert Level. The Washington Post (5/25, A21, Sipress, 744K) reports the World Health Organization "might soon convene an expert panel to decide whether an unprecedented human outbreak of bird flu in Indonesia should trigger a higher global alert for a possible pandemic," health officials said Wednesday. If the global alert status were increased, the Post says international stockpiles of antiviral drugs "would probably be shipped to Indonesia and travel from the country would be monitored in an attempt to contain the outbreak."

The Wall Street Journal (5/25, A6, Zamiska, 2.11M) quotes WHO spokeswoman Maria Cheng as saying, "What we're dealing with is possibly the first instance of second-generation human-to-human spread." In response, Cheng said the WHO is "considering convening a group of international experts, such as Nancy Cox from the US Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, to discuss the implications of the latest findings, including whether to raise the group's pandemic alert level." However, the Financial Times (5/25, Donnan, Jack) Cheng "stressed that there was no plan in the coming days to convene the international committee of experts that would determine whether to increase the agency's current risk assessment of the likelihood of a pandemic."

Bird Flu Fears Ignite Debate On Scientists' Sharing Of Data. As fears of an influenza pandemic grow, the Washington Post (5/25, A20, Brown, 744K) reports that a "struggle has emerged between experts who believe the latest genetic data on the H5N1 bird flu virus should be made public immediately and others who fear that such a policy would alienate the countries collecting virus samples and the scientists analyzing them." The issue "may come to a head this week" at the WHO's World Health Assembly in Geneva where health ministers from more than 190 countries will consider a resolution that would require them to provide flu data and virus samples to the scientific community "in a timely manner." If adopted, the Post says that "probably would end the current system whereby flu researchers decide when and how quickly crucial genetic data on the virus are made available to other scientists."

Saudi Arabia Now Flush With Petrodollars. ABC World News Tonight (5/24, story 5, 3:00, Sciutto, 8.78M) reported that "moment you land" in Saudi Arabia, "you see a kingdom of limitless oil wealth. A building boom. Luxury cars. Lavish shopping malls. On our trip, we were particularly struck by the expensive, new, Western-style bars and restaurants. Saudi Arabia is sitting on a fortune. With estimated oil reserves under desert sands worth more, if you can believe it, than the entire US economy." Civil servants' "salaries have gone up 15% in the last year, a direct result of the government's increased oil revenues. This is a country with oil money to spend, from the most grandiose infrastructure projects, to the smallest businesses." Gas prices "were just cut by one-third, to 61 cents a gallon. Cheap gasoline makes big SUVs, especially American-made ones, popular. Part of the reason is that at today's prices, a full tank of gas costs less than $25 US." Starting with the first oil boom in the 1970s, Saudis learned to take their oil wealth for granted," but "when oil prices dropped and the population ballooned, came unfamiliar problems -- poverty. 25% unemployment. King Abdullah is promising this oil boom will be different. One-third of his new record budget focuses on education."

Fire At Turkish Airport Destroys Cargo Facility. ABC World News Tonight (5/24, story 6, :25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "A spectacular fire at Turkey's largest airport, just outside Istanbul. The choking smoke shut one runway, disrupted flights, and forced 2,000 workers to evacuate. Tanker planes with sea water made 70 flights to douse the flames. Most of the airport's main cargo facility was destroyed and three people were injured. A short circuit may have started the fire."

Europeans Fear Creation Of Russia-Algeria Gas Cartel. Increased cooperation in the energy sector between Russia and Algeria is raising European fears that the two countries might form a gas cartel to control process. The Washington Times (5/25, Mihailescu, 90K) reports, "Top natural gas executives from the two countries announced last month that they were preparing a memorandum of cooperation that would cover joint efforts in the exploration, production and marketing of Algerian gas. Industry reports also say the Russian gas giant Gazprom has undertaken a project with Algeria's state-run gas company, Sonatrach, under which the latter would fulfill Russian contracts to deliver natural gas to France."

Japanese PM To Visit US. The AP (5/25) reports that Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi will visit President Bush next month. During a June 29 meeting, the two leaders "will discuss the war on terror, security and prosperity in Asia and global economic issues, the White House said in a statement."

The Financial Times (5/25, Sevastopulo) reports that Koizumi "will visit Graceland, the former home of Elvis Presley, the King of rock and roll, as part of his farewell trip before stepping down as prime minister in September. In a highly unusual move, Mr Bush is considering accompanying Mr Koizumi to Memphis for the visit. Mr Bush decided to give Mr Koizumi, a huge Elvis fan, the Graceland trip to thank him for his support, including taking the politically difficult decision to send Japanese troops to Iraq." The Times also notes that "rolling out the red carpet for Mr Koizumi may also irk Chinese President Hu Jintao whose recent visit to Washington was marred when a protester managed to enter the White House and disrupt his South lawn arrival ceremony."

UN On Pace To Run Out Of Funds In July. The Washington Times (5/25, Pisik, 90K) reports that the UN "is on a pace to run out of funds months earlier than usual this year. The organization has regularly dipped into peacekeeping reserves to pay its operating budget for a month or two late in the year, while waiting for the United States to transmit the money it usually pays when its own fiscal year begins in October. But this year, a $950 million spending cap largely imposed by the Bush administration will have the organization run out of money as early as July, according to U.N. officials familiar with the organization's budget."

Venezuelan University Aims To Prepare Students For Social Activism. The Washington Post (5/25, A21, Reel, 744K) reports on the Bolivarian University of Venezuela, which provides a free education to the "massive underclass that [President Hugo] Chavez aims to empower through the social programs that have fed his domestic popularity. The school, the cornerstone of those programs, is aimed at educating millions and promoting the sort of social activism that Chavez says can help Venezuela's poor majority to overcome decades of oppression by the rich."

Morales Has Closely Aligned Bolivia With Venezuela. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (5/25, De Córdoba, Luhnow, 2.11M) notes that since taking office as Bolivia's President, Evo Morales "has aligned his country so closely with Venezuela's Hugo Chávez that it is sometimes difficult to tell where one government begins and the other ends. … Bolivian opposition leader Jorge Quiroga, who lost to Mr. Morales in the presidential race, contends that 'we have become a colony of Venezuela.' Mr. Morales rejects that accusation, but refers to Mr. Chávez as Bolivia's 'godfather.'" The Journal adds, "For the U.S., Mr. Chávez's tightening alliance with Bolivia both threatens to undo years of political and economic liberalization in South America and is the latest in a series of energy-security threats. President Bush on Monday said he was 'concerned about the erosion of democracy' in Bolivia and Venezuela."

Polls Show African Support For Democracy Is Eroding. Multi-nation polls released yesterday show that Africans are growing increasingly frustrated with democracy. The Washington Post (5/25, A26, Timberg, 744K) reports, "Afrobarometer, a nonprofit polling project, reported that surveys conducted since 2000 have revealed a slow but steady deterioration in support for democracy, with particularly steep declines in Nigeria, Tanzania, Botswana and Uganda. Sixty-one percent of Africans surveyed said they regard democracy as preferable to other political systems. But the pollsters found that flaws in many democracies across the continent have undermined support for the concept."

Bono Continues Tour Of Africa. NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 10, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported rock star Bono's tour of Africa "continued today" in "the West African nation of Ghana, where today Bono mixed humanity with policy. The man from Ireland who is greeted as a visiting head of government today met with the president of Ghana. He considers these high-level meetings a necessity but he prefers to approach the problem at the ground level." Most Africans "don't know who Bono is. They just know he's out to help them by raising billions, along with awareness."

Americans Accused Of Plotting Coup In Congo. Twenty-six security works, including three Americans, were arrested and jailed in Congo last week on suspicion of plotting a coup in advance of July's national elections. The Washington Post (5/25, A26, Timberg, 744K) reports, "Fifteen of the suspects are employed by a South African security company, Omega Security Solutions, whose parent company has offices in Pretoria, the South African capital. A company official said the detained Americans work for two U.S. companies that are arranging security and logistics for the campaign of a presidential candidate in Congo. The other suspects are Nigerians."

US Response To China's Military Buildup Seen As Inadequate. Dan Blumenthal, resident fellow in Asian studies at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Washington Post (5/25, A29, 744K), "The Pentagon's annual report to Congress on China's military power, released this week, reveals that Beijing's buildup has advanced well beyond what most analysts considered likely just 10 years ago. … But our China policy leaves us a day late and a dollar short when it comes to the challenge posed by the speed of Beijing's military buildup. … A policy seeking to shape China into a responsible global actor works only if you are willing to recognize when it is not working. That time may be fast approaching."

LATimes Says US Backing Somali Warlords "Repackaged" As Anti-Terror Fighters. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (5/25, 958K) says that in Somalia, the US "appears to be supporting one group of Somali warlords, who have repackaged themselves as secular anti-terrorists, to fight another group of equally brutal Islamist Somali warlords. … The Bush administration fears that Al Qaeda operatives and 'foreign fighters' are profiting from Somalia's chaos to establish a beachhead in the strategic Horn of Africa. Even if these concerns are valid, arming thugs to fight a proxy war against Islamists is a clumsy game the U.S. is likely to lose." The US "should stick to its policy of trying to help create a government that can finally end the anarchy in Somalia."

UN Official Calls Continuing Hunger Around World "Unacceptable." James T. Morris, executive director of the UN World Food Program, writes in the Washington Post (5/25, A29, 744K), "Today I will brief a congressional committee on ways of dealing with a problem that has dogged mankind from the beginning: hunger. It's a problem that -- I'm pleased to say -- we have almost overcome in the United States. … So, to my mind, it is unacceptable that you need travel only a few hundred miles from our shores to find societies in which hunger is still a grim component of daily life."

WSJournal Praises Montenegrin Break With Serbia. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (5/25, 2.11M) says, "The people of Montenegro (population 620,000) on Sunday chose to break up their union with Serbia -- all that was left of Yugoslavia -- and give birth to the Continent's 24th and 25th new nation-states since the end of the Cold War. As long as these decisions are freely, peacefully and constitutionally made, the more the merrier. … Montenegro's leaders plan to join the EU as soon as possible and attract investors with policies inspired by slightly larger Estonia. … The mushrooming of new states in Europe has tended, especially after the wars of the early 1990s, to coincide with the spread of freedom on the Continent. May it continue."

WPost Skeptical Of Burmese Regime's Promise Of Change. An editorial in the Washington Post (5/25, A28, 744K) says, "Burma's dictators may be willing 'to turn a new page in relations with the international community.' … But don't pop the champagne corks yet. The ruling junta has made many similar promises in the past, and it has yet to honor one." The Post adds that "there is no question that the people support Aung San Suu Kyi -- a Nobel Peace Prize laureate, wedded to nonviolence, committed to peaceful dialogue with the nationalities that Burma's regime seeks to wipe out. The U.N. Security Council ought to welcome positive statements -- and demand positive action."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Lawyers Question Gonzales Justification For NSA Telephone Call Database. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' legal justification for collecting domestic telephone records as part of the Bush Administration's domestic surveillance program is being questioned by civil liberties lawyers The Washington Post (5/25, A8, Pincus, 744K) reports that Gonzales cited the 27-year-old court ruling in Smith v. Maryland, noting, that 'those kinds of records do not enjoy Fourth Amendment protection.'" Noting that "Congress in 1986 passed the Electronic Communications Privacy Act in reaction to the Smith v. Maryland ruling to require court orders before turning over call records to the government, G. Jack King Jr. of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers said Gonzales is correct in saying 'the administration isn't violating the Fourth Amendment' but 'he's failing to acknowledge that it is breaking" the 1986 law, which requires a court order 'with a few very narrow exceptions.'"

In an exclusive on its web site, Time (5/24, Dell) reported, "It remains an open question whether law enforcement obtaining the private phone records of Americans in this fashion is actually illegal. While most data brokers claim there is no specific law against the sale of phone records, as there is with banking records, and therefore it should not be illegal, the Federal Trade Commission and numerous state attorney generals disagree."

ACLU Asks States To Investigate Phone Companies. Meanwhile, the New York Times (5/25, Belson, 1.19M) reports that the ACLU is asking the utility commissions in 21 states to investigate whether phone companies turned over customer records to the NSA without warrants. The ACLU "is approaching the state commissions because they often monitor the privacy and abuse of customer data. The group said it also hoped to clarify whether local as well as long-distance calls had been monitored."

WPost Says Senate Panel Should Delay Markup Of Warrantless Wiretapping Bills. An editorial in the Washington Post (5/25, A28, 744K) says, "Today the Senate Judiciary Committee will consider bills on warrantless wiretapping. None should move. … We sympathize with members eager to get the program under some legal control. But action, in advance of real understanding of the surveillance, risks authorizing too much or failing to address the issues that led the administration to act outside of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which regulates domestic electronic surveillance." The Post adds, "The goal of legislation should be to legitimize important surveillance by requiring judicial review, limiting the use of material collected to counterintelligence purposes and ensuring that irrelevant material is not retained. The best way for the Judiciary Committee to move toward this goal is to hold off on a markup and insist that it receive more information about the program -- so that it's not shooting in the dark."

FBI Seeking Interviews With House Members Over NSA Program Leak. Roll Call (5/25, Bresnahan, Kane) reports, "The FBI is seeking interviews with top House Members from both parties to determine whether they leaked details of the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program to The New York Times, further fanning the flames of an already tense relationship between Capitol Hill and the Bush administration. Those being targeted for interviews include GOP and Democratic leaders, as well as the chairmen and ranking member of the Intelligence committee." Roll Call adds, "While acknowledging his support for rooting out those who leak classified information," House Intelligence Chairman Pete Hoekstra "expressed concerns over whether having the FBI question the lawmakers who oversee their agency would upset the balance of power between Congress and the administration."

Chertoff, McNulty Defend Administration's Anti-Terror Record. Two senior Administration officials yesterday defended the government's anti-terrorism record, saying agencies have been very successful in preventing terror attacks at home and abroad. The Washington Post (5/25, A8, Eggen, 744K) reports, "Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty, in a speech at the conservative American Enterprise Institute in Washington, said the Justice Department has 'developed a strong record of success in the war against terrorism' -- citing prosecutions against admitted al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui and other defendants around the country since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. In a separate meeting with editors and reporters at The Washington Post, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the government has made 'a significant amount of progress' in guarding against cataclysmic attacks and more limited operations, such as the Madrid commuter train bombings."

The Washington Times (5/25, Seper, 90K) reports that McNulty said the Justice Department "is committed to a new strategy of prevention -- from one of predominantly reaction to one of being proactive. He said the government is determined to prosecute cases immediately when an investigation reveals both a risk to national security and a violation of its laws. He said this 'aggressive, proactive and preventative course' is the only acceptable response."

Columnist Questions Gonzales' Use Of Espionage Act Against Reporters. In a column distributed by Scripps Howard (5/25), Dale McFeatters writes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told a TV talk show that the Justice Department was actively investigating the leak of the Bush administration's warrantless-wiretapping program and might prosecute the journalists who reported it. … 'There are some statutes on the book which, if you read the language carefully, would seem to indicate that that is a possibility,' he said." McFeatters continues, "Gonzales' reading of the law should be taken seriously because he has written or signed off on some of the administration's most questionable decisions - like the very same warrantless wiretapping of international calls and e-mails, when the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act seems to quite clearly say warrants are required. … He signed off on a memo that condoned brutal treatment, if not outright torture, of prisoners taken in the war on terror and declared U.S. laws banning torture inapplicable. And he declared the Geneva Conventions, the international treaty calling for humane treatment of prisoners of war, 'obsolete' and said that it too didn't apply to enemy combatants." McFeatters adds, "The law that Gonzales is now reading closely because it might pertain to the leaks to the media is the Espionage Act of 1917, a broadly - some would say sloppily - drawn law that, among much else, criminalizes the possession of classified information. With good reason, the law has been little used since. … The law was of little use against actual espionage, but the Woodrow Wilson administration, which rivaled this White House in self-righteousness, used it enthusiastically to harass and jail labor leaders, socialists, conscientious objectors, pacifists, assorted other leftists and people who just plain shot off their mouths in ways that irritated the government. The government silenced something like 75 newspapers - by barring them from the mail - for opposing the Wilson administration on the war. … In essence, the actual use of the Espionage Act was to suppress domestic dissent. Based on the attorney general's reading of that law, might it not be making a comeback in a similar role?"

UK Police Arrest Eight Terror Suspects. British police staged raids across the country yesterday, netting eight people who are suspected of plotting terror attacks abroad. The New York Times (5/25, Lyall, 1.19M) reports, "The eight, who were detained in Manchester, Liverpool and London, were held under various government powers, the authorities said. Those powers included antiterrorism and immigration laws that allow the home secretary to deport foreigners whose presence in the country 'is not conducive to the public good for reasons of national security.' The authorities would not release the suspects' names or nationalities, or other details about them."

The Washington Post (5/25, A22, Sullivan, 744K) reports, "The BBC and other British news organizations reported that one of the men arrested was Tahir Nasuf, 44, who works for the Sanabel Relief Agency, a group that the U.S. government has accused of financing terrorist operations. Home Office and police spokesmen declined to comment on those reports. The Web site for Sanabel, based in Birmingham, says the organization's 'task is to aid and relieve Muslims in the destitute parts of the world.' U.S. officials, however, have said the group is affiliated with al-Qaeda and has attempted to overthrow the Libyan leader, Moammar Gaddafi."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Pakistani Immigrant Convicted Of Plotting NYC Subway Attack. The New York Times (5/25, Rashbaum, 1.19M) reports, "A federal jury in Brooklyn convicted a Pakistani immigrant yesterday in the plot to blow up the Herald Square subway station in 2004," rejecting Shahawar Matin Siraj's "defense that a paid police informer had entrapped him by stoking his rage with images of Muslims abused at the hands of Americans." The Times notes, "While the case was a victory for federal prosecutors in Brooklyn, it was also one for the New York Police Department, which has retooled since the Sept. 11 attacks, with the aim of preventing new ones. The trial was the first time that a federal terrorism investigation was largely conducted by the department's Intelligence Division, rather than the F.B.I." The New York Sun (5/25, Greenstein) also reports that Siraj's conviction is being hailed as a victory in New York City's war on terrorism. … 'The verdict is an important milestone in safeguarding New York against terrorist plotters whether homegrown or foreign,' Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said in a statement issued yesterday. He congratulated the police officers 'who stopped the worst from happening,' and the prosecutors 'who made certain justice was pursued.'" The New York Daily News (5/25, Marzulli, 729K) also calls the conviction a "major victory" for the NYPD. The New York Post (5/25, Haberman, 624K), AP (5/25) and AFP (5/25) also report on the conviction, as is CNN's American Morning this morning.

Man Killed By Air Marshals Was Shot 11 Times. The New York Times (5/25, Goodnough, 1.19M) reports Rigoberto Alpizar, a man fatally shot by federal air marshals at Miami International Airport in December, was shot "numerous times, according to an autopsy report released a day after state prosecutors declared the shooting 'legally justified' and said no criminal charges would be filed." The Miami-Dade County Medical Examiner Department said Alpizar "had been wounded 11 times — in the chest, abdomen, shoulder, hand, wrist and forearm." The marshals involved in the shooting said "after one marshal started shooting…, Mr. Alpizar kept approaching, compelling them to keep firing."

100% Container Inspection Criticized. Randall Larsen, director of the Institute for Homeland Security, in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (5/25, A14, 2.11M) writes that while the closure or restriction of US land, air and sea ports in 9/11's aftermath "was understandable," but "too many people remain committed to a port and border security paradigm that is short on risk analysis and offers little or no value to the nation." Congressional proposals to inspect 100% "of all 12 million containers entering the US" would cost billions, and could make the nation less secure "because the money could have been spent on programs with a far better return on investment." Larsen adds, "A thinking enemy will not be deterred by deadbolt locks on America's front doors (our seaports) when our windows and back doors (7,000 miles of virtually unguarded land borders and 95,000 miles of shoreline) remain wide open."

Collins, Murray Say GreenLane Act Would Close "Gaping Security Holes." Sens. Susan Collins and Patty Murray, in the Hill's Congress Blog (5/25), write that cargo containers, "a linchpin of our economy," are also "among the greatest threats to our economy — and our safety. … Terrorists could turn a container itself into a weapon or use containers to import a dirty bomb or parts for a weapon they would assemble on our own shores or to transport terrorists themselves." Collins and Murray go on to tout their "GreenLane Maritime Cargo Security Act, which was recently approved by the Senate Homeland Security Committee," which they say "would finally begin to close the gaping security holes in our cargo system while maintaining an efficient flow of commerce."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Cautiously Hints Of Change In US Role In Iraq. The AP (5/24, Pickler) writes, "The White House said Wednesday the formation of Iraq's new government presents an opportunity to review the need for US troops but cautioned against setting timetables for withdrawals." White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "What is going to happen, I think it's very safe to say, is that increasingly American, British and other coalition forces are going to move into support roles as Iraqi forces themselves move into lead roles." The news comes as President Bush and British PM Tony Blair meet on Thursday and Friday. Both leaders are "under pressure to make troop cutbacks."

Rice Sees "Very Big Change" In US Role. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (5/24) if there is an "end in sight" in Iraq. Rice said, "I certainly see that the Iraqis have now developed a political process and a political system that means that Iraqis are going to be in control of their future." Rice added, "I see a very big change in the way that we have to support them. Now, we've been through interim governments, and transitional governments, and provision governments, and now they finally have a permanent government."

New Iraqi PM Claims Country Can Take Over Security In 18 Months. The AP (5/24, Quinn) reports that new Iraqi PM Nouri al-Maliki said Iraqi forces could "take control of security" in the entire country "within 18 months," although he acknowledged a need for more "recruits, training, and equipment." Al-Maliki "did not mention a timetable for U.S.-led coalition forces to leave." The AP writes that "handing over security responsibilities to the Iraqis does not necessarily mean that significant numbers of U.S.-led forces will start returning home. Instead, plans call for them to move from cities to large coalition bases -- where they will be on call if needed." The Los Angeles Times also carried this article.

NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 3, 2:35, Engel, 9.87M) interviewed Maliki, who "tried to reach out to the American people. He says he has a new priority to get his own security forces up and running quickly so that American troops can go home." Nouri al-Maliki (via translator): "Considering our determination to build our forces, we will be finished by the end of 2007." Engel: "But US troops in Iraq, he said, must stay for now. Pulling them out would be too destabilizing. Maliki sees American forces playing a very different role 18 months from now. First, there would be fewer American troops, and, he said, instead of fighting, they would be in a supporting role, mostly confined to their bases, where they would provide air support, logistics, training, and be a rapid reaction force." Nouri al-Maliki (via translator): "They would be contingency forces to confront emergencies that could challenge this still relatively new nation."

Health Care Falls Under Sadr's Grip. The Christian Science Monitor (5/25, Murphy, 61K) reports of the Iraqi health ministry, "The ministry is run by the militant Shiite movement led by cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, one of Maliki's key backers." Doctors and nurses complain that "administrative posts have gone to unqualified members of his movement." In addition, Sunnis allege that Sunnis seeking relatives' bodies at the morgue "have themselves been abducted and killed by militias working at the site. Baghdad residents interviewed claim that a bribe of $100 is required to claim a body for burial."

WSJournal Assesses New Iraqi Cabinet. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, 2.11M) editorializes that the Iraqi cabinet is an "important milestone." However, the lack of defense and interior ministers shows that "very much hard work lies ahead." The Journal says critically that "sectarian political tokenism has been the order of the day," putting more burdens on new Prime Minister Al-Maliki. It adds that the "most urgent need" is to improve security in Baghdad.

Murder Charges Likely As US Begins Probe Of Iraqi Civilian Deaths. The AP (5/24, Reid) reports, "The U.S. military has opened a criminal investigation into allegations that U.S. Marines killed an Iraqi civilian west of Baghdad last month." The US command's statement said that suspects included "'several service members' from the Third Battalion, Fifth Marine Regiment, in the Falluja area, 40 miles west of Baghdad." The CBS Evening News (5/24, story 3, 0:20, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "CBS News has learned that seven Marines were involved and they're back in this country now pending the investigation."

The Washington Times (5/25, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "Defense attorneys expect the Marine Corps to file murder charges against one or more Marines who conducted raids in Haditha in November that resulted in the deaths of more than 20 Iraqi civilians." NCIS agents have been questioning members of the 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, at Camp Pendleton. As many as a "dozen Marines" could need attorneys.

US General Testifies At Abu Ghraib Abuse Trial. The New York Times (5/25, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "Maj. Gen. Geoffrey D. Miller said Wednesday that he never suggested that dogs be used to intimidate prisoners during interrogations in Iraq." Miller said that he recommended using dogs to help with "custody and control." Miller's 2003 visit to Iraq "has been depicted as importing harsh interrogation techniques from Guantánamo," where he was commander of the detention center.

Zarqawi Backers Impose Sharia In Sunni Neighborhood. The Washington Times (5/25, Behn, 90K) reports, "Imams loyal to terrorist leader Abu Musab Zarqawi have issued threats in mosques in a western Baghdad neighborhood against anyone who does not follow Islamic law." A neighborhood resident described the rules: "Women must stay at home, and girls cannot go to school past primary school. People selling Iranian products will either have to throw them out or get killed."

Aziz Testifies At Saddam's Trial. The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Roug, 958K) reports, "Former Foreign Minister Tariq Aziz, a member of Saddam Hussein's inner circle, took the stand at Saddam's trial Wednesday and accused the Shiite party of Iraq's new prime minister of trying to kill Aziz decades earlier." Aziz claimed that in 1980 Shiite "assailants threw several hand grenades at him," killing several bystanders. The assertion by Aziz appears to be an attempt to discredit the new prime minister's Dawa party.

USA Today (5/25, Jervis, 2.31M) reports that the testimony was Aziz's first public appearance "since his arrest" in 2003. In it, Aziz defended as legitimate "Saddam's actions in response to a 1982 assassination attempt," in which "hundreds of mostly Shiite men, women and children were jailed and some tortured and murdered following the assassination attempt."

The Washington Post (5/25, A24, Knickmeyer, 744K) describes Aziz as "thinner and paler" than when he was last seen in public. It reports that "Judge Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman … appeared irritated at times that Aziz was testifying despite having no direct knowledge of the events surrounding Hussein's trial."

The New York Times (5/25, Burns, 1.19M) reports that Aziz's testimony "gushed with adulation" for his former boss.

Romney Visits Iraq. The AP (5/24, Johnson) writes, "Republican Gov. Mitt Romney, a potential 2008 presidential candidate, said Wednesday he was impressed by the determination of U.S. forces following a fact-finding trip but couldn't say when Iraqis could assume security operations from the Americans." He was accompanied by "Democratic Gov. Brian Schweitzer of Montana and Republican Gov. Matt Blunt of Missouri. About half the nation's governors have made similar trips." The AP writes, "Romney has steadfastly pledged his support for President Bush and the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, while criticizing Bush for not doing an 'adequate job' outlining the rationale for the war."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/24, Blitzer) reports, "Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney is visiting Iraq, a trip that could help burnish his foreign policy credentials, if he runs for president. The Republican governor met with U.S. military and diplomatic officials earlier today."

US Expresses Regret For Afghan Civilian Deaths. The Washington Post (5/25, A21, Constable, 744K) reports, "The U.S. military expressed regret Wednesday for the deaths of a reported 16 civilian villagers Monday in U.S. airstrikes near here, but officials and elders said Taliban insurgents were responsible for the incident." The Post reports, "Some tribesmen in the Panjwai district, where Azizi is located, reportedly support the revived Taliban insurgency … But others publicly blamed the Taliban for using civilian homes as shelter and said they were planning to demand that the insurgents leave the area."

29 Afghanis Killed In Continued Fighting With Taliban. The New York Times/AP (5/25) reports that "a firefight in the south left at least 24 people suspected Taliban militants and 5 Afghan soldiers dead." It writes, "The fighting started after a joint patrol of Afghan- and American-led troops was attacked in a small village in Tirin Kot District, a coalition statement said. The troops beat back the assault and forced the militants to retreat into the mountains, where aircraft bombed Taliban positions."

Afghan Government Struggling To Collect Taxes. USA Today (5/25, Wiseman, 2.31M) reports, "No country in the world is worse at collecting taxes. According to the World Bank and International Monetary Fund, government revenue in Afghanistan is equal to barely 5% of gross domestic product (GDP), lower than the impoverished governments of sub-Saharan Africa." Though the government has little historical experience in "paying its own way" without major foreign aid and struggles with corruption, it now aspires to be a "poor, underdeveloped, normal country," as stated by the finance minister. The government "has pledged to boost government revenue to 8% of GDP by 2011. That would reassure foreign donors who finance 92% of the Afghan government's total expenditures."

Rice Cites Progress In War On Terror. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (5/24) that the US is making progress in the war on terror, noting, "We're taking down the organization that did 9/11. Al Qaeda is not the same organization that it was on September 11th. And we're making progress in spreading freedom in the Middle East, and that ultimately is going to be an antidote to terror. But we've still got a lot work to do, and we have to stay vigilant, because one never knows when there might be an attack. I'd like to say that there won't be, but I do know that the terrorists only have to be right once. We have to be right 100 percent of the time, and those aren't fair odds."

Senate Bans Protesters At Military Funerals. The AP (5/25, Abrams) reports that legislation passed by the Senate and House "specifically targets a Kansas church group that has staged protests at military funerals around the country, claiming that the deaths were a sign of God's anger at U.S. tolerance of homosexuals." The bill bans disruption of military funerals at national cemeteries. The House sponsor's office said that it "expected the House to act quickly to accept the Senate changes and send the bill to the president."

726 Gay Service Members Were Discharged in 2005. The Washington Post (5/25, 744K) reports, "The number of gay and lesbian service personnel discharged under the 'don't ask, don't tell' policy last year was 726 -- slightly more than in 2004 but still 30 to 40 percent lower than the number of forced departures in the years before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks." It breaks down the total: "The Army discharged 386 members, compared with 177 for the Navy, 88 for the Air Force and 75 for the Marine Corps." Activists "say they have noticed a slight increase in the number of cases in which service members' sexual orientation was disclosed by others." The GAO "said last year that it has cost nearly $200 million to recruit and train replacements for the 9,488 troops discharged since the policy began in 1994," including "more than 750" who held "critical jobs" and "more than 300 linguists."

Author Concerned US Public Disconnected Form War. Kathy Roth-Douquet, the co-author, with Frank Schaeffer, of "AWOL: The Unexcused Absence of America's Upper Classes from Military Service -- and How It Hurts the Country," in an op-ed in USA Today (5/25, 2.31M) writes, "Increasingly, since the 1970s, we have delegated to a small cohort the risks and honor of armed service. To whom do we delegate it? Those who serve are largely middle- and working-class, from the South and West, and already from military families. Upper-middle class from the Northeast or California? Chances are, you are excused. We have, in effect, delegated to others the very stuff of our citizenship." And "the president exhorts us to go shopping, not to share in a civilian war effort, as in previous wars when Americans bought war bonds or conserved resources. Today no leadership helps us do so."

Service Academy Graduates Prepare To Face Battlefield Challenges. USA Today (5/25, Vandenbrook, 2.31M) reports, "Midshipmen and cadets graduating this weekend from the United States' main service academies will be the first classes since 1972 to have spent all four years in school with the nation at war." Many of the graduating cadets sought service after the 9/11 attacks and "Thirty-eight graduates from West Point, eight from the Naval Academy here and five from the Air Force Academy have been killed in Afghanistan and Iraq. The rate of deaths for West Point alumni is about twice what it was in Vietnam. Figures for the other academies were unavailable."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Investors Swamped By Reports As Stock Options Probe Expands. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Zuckerman) reports, "As investigations into stock-option practices heat up, investors are being inundated with a flood of reports from analysts looking for companies that may come under the microscope." The Journal continues, "The methodologies behind the studies vary, making it difficult to independently verify the conclusions. Still, shares of some companies are suffering even though there isn't any indication that they acted inappropriately. Others are tumbling, though the abuses might not affect their businesses. So some investors, rather than shying away, are trying to figure out if the scrutiny is creating some bargains." The Journal adds, "So far, about two dozen companies have disclosed that they face federal investigations or inquiries from their own boards over options timing. Securities and Exchange Commission Chairman Christopher Cox said Tuesday that possible backdating of stock options is 'a matter of ongoing interest to our enforcement division.' Federal authorities are investigating whether a number of companies backdated their options to certain days when the stock prices were at a low to allow executives to reap gains ahead of subsequent increases in the prices of the shares. … The SEC has been examining the matter for more than a year. In a page-one article in March, The Wall Street Journal did its own analysis -- using statistical methodology reviewed by university professors -- and identified a half dozen companies with suspicious grant practices. The chief executives of those companies routinely received grants dated ahead of sharp rises in share prices. … Just yesterday, CNET Networks Inc. said it had been notified that the SEC is conducting an informal inquiry into the company's stock-option grants. The San Francisco company said it plans to cooperate. In addition, Analog Devices Inc. said it received a subpoena from federal prosecutors over stock-options grants. The Norwood, Mass., company said it would cooperate. And Power Integrations Inc. said it is cooperating with the SEC and the U.S. attorney's office for the Northern District of California in their investigations of the San Jose, Calif., company's stock-option practices."

DOJ_NMG_0029439

US Subpoenas Analog Devices In Stock Option Probe. Bloomberg (5/25, Barr) reports, "Analog Devices Inc., a maker of computer chips for consumer products, said federal prosecutors have subpoenaed documents related to stock options dating back to 2000." Bloomberg continues, "Analog Devices believes the documents requested by the U.S. Attorney in New York are related to grants that have been under investigation by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, the Norwood, Massachusetts-based company said today in a Business Wire statement. … The request is the latest in a series of subpoenas from the Justice Department or the SEC in a probe over whether companies deliberately moved option grants back to dates when the stock price was lower, helping to ensure that executives who received them would make money." Bloomberg adds, "Earlier this week Juniper Networks Inc., F5 Networks Inc., Brooks Automation Inc. and Openwave Systems Inc. all said they had been contacted by prosecutors or regulators in connection with similar inquiries."

Enron Jury Continues Deliberations. The AP (5/25, Hays) reports, "Jurors in the fraud and conspiracy trial of Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay and former Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling deliberated a fifth day Wednesday in the premier criminal case to emerge from the company's collapse." The AP continues, "Both defendants awaited the outcome away from the federal courthouse in Houston - Lay at his office about two blocks away, and Skilling in his legal team's so-called 'war room' in an office building across the street." The AP adds, "Lead Skilling attorney Daniel Petrocelli remained at the courthouse, while lead Lay lawyer Michael Ramsey said he and the ex-chairman's other attorneys planned to wait there in shifts. … The eight-woman, four-man panel sent a note to U.S. District Judge Sim Lake on Tuesday stating they don't intend to deliberate on Monday, Memorial Day. The jurors told the judge last week they would consider the case Monday through Thursday each week, the same schedule as the 16-week trial that started with jury selection Jan. 30."

Jury Requests Testimony Transcripts. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Mcwilliams) reports that the jury "requested unspecified transcripts of testimony and additional copies of the lengthy trial's exhibit list. … The jury…sent a note seeking the items to U.S. District Court Judge Sim Lake. Wednesday, it signaled deliberations would run into next week, telling the court it wouldn't work on Monday, Memorial Day, and reiterating that it wouldn't deliberate Friday. … After huddling with attorneys on both side, Judge Lake said he would send the jury three additional copies of the index of exhibits, and ask it to be more precise to the witness or witnesses whose testimony it now wants to review. He suggested it could be difficult to pull through trial transcripts for specific issues 'in a trial of this length and complexity,' noting some topics were raised multiple times in direct testimony, in cross examination, and re-direct."

Judge Approves $6.6 Billion Enron Settlement. The AP (5/25, Hays) reports, "A federal judge gave final approval Wednesday for three more banks to pay $6.6 billion to settle civil claims that they helped Enron Corp. manipulate earnings." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon in Houston approved the deals with the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, JPMorgan Chase & Co. and Citigroup Inc. Her ruling came as a jury in another courtroom continued to deliberate the fate of Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey Skilling in a criminal fraud and conspiracy trial." The AP adds, 'The litigation's settlement tally has so far reached $7.3 billion, with interest, against Wall Street firms accused of helping the energy trader hide losses and inflate profits before it careened into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001. … William Lerach, who represents the University of California, the lead plaintiff in the conglomerate of shareholder lawsuits in Houston, said the pot is earning $550,000 in interest per day. He declined comment Wednesday on any other settlement talks."

Enron Legal Action Dominates Houston Federal Courthouse. USA Today (5/25, Farrell) reports, "For Enron junkies, there's no better place these days than the ninth floor of the federal courthouse (in Houston). … In three separate criminal cases against former Enron executives, observers await verdicts, while in a civil case, a judge approved a $6.6 billion settlement between Enron shareholders and three major banks that did business with the energy-trading company." USA continues, "As expected, U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon gave final approval Wednesday to a $6.6 billion settlement between Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce (CIBC), JPMorgan Chase and Citigroup and shareholders who claim that the banks helped Enron hide billions of dollars in losses from the public. … That approval, on top of a previous settlement between shareholders and two other banks, Lehman Bros. and Bank of America, brings the sum of funds promised to shareholders to $7.2 billion. Plaintiffs lawyers have asked for as much as $40 billion in damages." USA adds, "Other Enron-related action on the ninth floor of the courthouse: … Jurors continued deliberating in the main criminal case against former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling. … Another jury continued deliberating in the government's case against two former executives from Enron's Broadband unit. In that trial, which began three weeks ago, prosecutors alleged that Kevin Howard and Michael Krautz used deceptive accounting to allow the business unit to claim $111 million in phony earnings in late 2000 and early 2001. That jury completed its second full day of deliberations. … Lake, who presided at the jury trial of Lay and Skilling, held a bench trial to hear the government's accusations that Lay lied to three banks to obtain favorable terms for personal loans in the 1990s. … Judge Lake said he won't disclose his verdict in Lay's bank fraud case until after the jury reaches a decision in the larger fraud case."

Martha Stewart Faces Deadline In Civil Case. The New York Times (5/25, Thomas) reports, "A year after her release from prison, her carefully executed makeover complete, Martha Stewart must now confront again the insider trading accusations that turned her world upside down." The Times continues, "The three-year-old civil case against her is resuming. Contesting the Securities and Exchange Commission accusations, as opposed to a negotiated settlement, would help give Ms. Stewart the opportunity to not only clear her name but also to win back her title as chairwoman and chief executive of the company she founded, Martha Stewart Living Omnimedia. … If she loses, the burden will not be onerous. She could certainly afford any financial penalty and while she no longer serves on the board, her current role as editorial director gives her considerable influence. … All the same, a trial of the S.E.C. lawsuit could be another embarrassing blow not only to Ms. Stewart's image but to the fortunes of her company." The Times adds, 'Today, Ms. Stewart faces a deadline to respond to charges that she illegally used nonpublic information when she sold 4,000 shares of ImClone Systems in late 2001. … A last-minute settlement is always possible. However, if she denies the allegations and asserts her innocence, which she has done from the outset, then preparations for a civil trial, starting most crucially with her deposition, will begin. Ms. Stewart could also refuse to answer by asserting her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, according to lawyers involved in the case. Lawyers for Ms. Stewart and the S.E.C. remain locked in negotiations. … Peter E. Bacanovic, the former Merrill Lynch broker who, regulators contend, fed Ms. Stewart privileged information that other large investors were selling their ImClone shares, is on the verge of reaching an agreement with the S.E.C. that would bar him from the securities industry, according to people briefed on the discussions. … But the stakes are much higher for Ms. Stewart, who along with Mr. Bacanovic was convicted of having obstructed the original investigation into her sale of ImClone shares."

Small's Tenure At Fannie Mae Draws Scrutiny. The Washington Post (5/25, C1, Day, Trescott, 744K) reports that Smithsonian Secretary Lawrence M. Small's role in the accounting fraud scandal at the Federal National Mortgage Association, where he was president, chief operating officer and board member from 1991 to 2000, is drawing scrutiny. A new government report "says Small was among a handful of senior Fannie Mae executives who set an improper 'tone at the top,' encouraging employees to hit profit targets above all else so that managers would receive the largest annual bonuses possible."

CEO Says SEC, PCAOB Acted Wisely. James Quigley, CEO of Deloitte & Touche writes in the Wall Street Journal (5/25, 2.11M), "A Small Business Advisory Committee to the SEC recommended earlier this year that a majority of all public companies be exempted from at least a portion of" the Sarbanes Oxley law's requirements, "acting on a concern that the cost fell disproportionately on smaller issuers. Members of Congress have also proposed legislation with similar exemptions. The SEC has opted against such exemptions, instead announcing a plan to substantially expand guidance to issuers, and make other changes aimed at scaling implementation of these requirements for smaller issuers. Concurrently, the PCAOB announced a decision to revise a related audit standard. As leader of one of the largest public accounting firms, I believe that the SEC and PCAOB acted wisely, shifting the debate to a discussion of how to make the law work effectively for all companies and their investors."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Denies Hastert Under Investigation In Abramoff Scandal. The Chicago Tribune (5/25, Zajac, Dorning, 643K) reports this morning, "In an unusually swift and blunt response to a news report, the Justice Department on Wednesday issued a statement denying an ABC News story that House Speaker Dennis Hastert was under investigation in the far-reaching Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal. 'Speaker Hastert is not under investigation by the Justice Department,' said department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse, less than an hour after ABC News, citing 'high-level Justice Department sources,' reported that Hastert 'is under investigation by the FBI" in connection with the Abramoff scandal." Roehrkasse "acknowledged that the Justice Department generally neither confirms nor denies news reports asserting the existence of an investigation, but said that the department was moved to respond to the report because of 'unique circumstances.'"

ABC World News Tonight (5/24, lead story, 2:15, Vargas, 8.78M) had reported that "sources tell ABC News the case involving convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff has led FBI investigators to some of the most powerful members of Congress." ABC (Ross) added, "Federal officials tell us the congressional bribery investigation now includes the Speaker of the House, Dennis Hastert, based on the testimony from the convicted lobbyists who are cooperating with the government. Justice Department officials describe the 64-year-old Illinois Republican as very much in the mix of the corruption investigation. Part of the investigation is said to involve a letter Hastert wrote three years ago, urging the Secretary of the Interior to block a casino on an Indian reservation that would have competed with other tribes. The other tribes were represented by Jack Abramoff, who has reportedly provided details on his dealings with Hastert as part of his plea agreement with the government. The letter was written shortly after a fundraiser for Hastert at a restaurant owned by Abramoff. Abramoff and his clients contributed more than $26,000 at the time. The day Abramoff was indicted, Hastert denied any unlawful connection, and said he would donate to charity, any campaign contributions he h received from Abramoff or his clients."

On ABC World News Tonight (5/24, story 2, 1:00, Vargas, 8.78M), chief Washington Correspondent George Stephanopoulos said the development is "potentially seismic," but it "really is going to depend on the facts and whether prosecutors can demonstrate a quid pro quo, that Hastert took that official action, in return for the campaign contribution."

Most news reports this morning focus on Hastert's and the DOJ's reaction to the ABC story. The Washington Times (5/25, Bellantoni, Seper, 90K) headlines its report "Justice, Hastert Deny Report Of Probe Into Abramoff Ties," and notes "Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said, 'The ABC News report is absolutely untrue. ... We are demanding a full retraction.'" The Financial Times (5/25, Yeager) titles its story "Hastert Denies Involvement In Corruption Scandal."

The Hill (5/25, Crabtree) notes Brian Ross, who reported the story, "is ABC News' chief investigative correspondent. According to his biography on ABC News' website, he received the National Headliner Award for breaking the 1980 ABSCAM story, among other accolades."

Hastert Aide Says ABC Report Linked To Hastert's Criticism Of Jefferson Raid. The Wall Street Journal (5/25, Mullins, 2.11M) headlines its report "Hastert Demands Retraction Of ABC News Report," and says "a spokesman for ABC declined to comment on the report or Mr. Hastert's retraction request." The report "followed strong criticism by Mr. Hastert and other congressional leaders for the Federal Bureau of Investigation on Saturday raiding the Capitol Hill offices of a Louisiana Democrat involved in a separate corruption probe. … After the ABC report aired, Republican aides on Capitol Hill accused the Justice Department of leaking the story to undercut Mr. Hastert. One aide to Mr. Hastert said: 'No doubt about it. They're pushing back.'"

Bloomberg (5/25, Schmidt) reports, "Hastert's spokesman, Ron Bonjean, also issued a statement denying the report. … 'The ABC News report is absolutely untrue,' Bonjean said in the statement. 'We are demanding a full retraction of the ABC News story.'"

Hastert, Pelosi Demand Return Of Documents Seized In FBI Raid. In a joint statement yesterday, House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi called for the return of documents seized in the weekend FBI raid of Rep. William Jefferson's Capitol Hill office. Hastert and Pelosi said, "The Justice Department must immediately return the papers it unconstitutionally seized." They also called for FBI agents who participated in the raid to be removed from the case. The CBS Evening News (5/24, story 5, 1:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) said that the joint statement is "something we seldom see on Capitol Hill," and CBS (Borger) added, "We've never really seen anything like this before. The FBI barged into Congressman William Jefferson's office and seized documents. And CBS News has learned that the White House was worried that House Republicans were so upset with this that they were on the verge of asking for the resignation of the Attorney General. Now, they didn't do that today, but they do want those documents back. … They believe there's a constitutional issue here," and "I think they're also worried, gee, whose office will the FBI be searching next?"

NBC Nightly News (5/24, story 8, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) briefly noted Hastert and Pelosi's demand, "saying the raid was a violation of constitutional separation of powers," and CNN's The Situation Room (5/24, Blitzer) called it "a constitutional showdown in the making."

The AP (5/25, Kellman) calls the statement a moment of "rare, election-year harmony" and adds, "Within hours, according to several Republican officials, White House aides were involved in talks with Hastert's staff concerning the possible transfer of the documents, possibly to the House ethics committee. … Any agreement along those lines would mark a concession by the Bush administration, which spent the day fending off complaints from angry lawmakers of both parties." However, the AP notes, "Not all lawmakers agreed" with Hastert and Pelosi. Louisiana Sen. David Vitter, in a letter to Republican leaders, said, "'These self-serving separation of power arguments' have no basis in law."

USA Today (5/25, 4A, Kiely, 2.31M) reports DOJ spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos "defended the FBI's actions. 'There is tremendous respect for Congress' important, independent role, but the department has an obligation to the American people to fully pursue corruption cases wherever the trail of evidence goes,' she said." However, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "joined Hastert and Pelosi in expressing concern about the Capitol Hill raid. 'The whole idea of separation of powers does need to be addressed,' he said."

The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Reynolds, Schmitt, 958K) reports, "Some experts said the Justice Department appeared to be on firm legal footing. And some members of Congress began to question how the public would view the leadership's position. … President Bush's top political advisor, Karl Rove, fielded complaints about the search during a closed-door meeting Wednesday with House Republicans, several members present said."

In a front-page story, The Washington Post (5/25, Murray, Lengel, 744K) adds that "White House officials are concerned about the vigorous and repeated complaints of the congressional leaders and have pressed the Justice Department to find a way to placate Congress and defuse the controversy, according to a department official." However, after the Hastert-Pelosi statement was released, "a Justice Department official" said "the department will not agree to any arrangement or demand that would harm or hurt an ongoing law enforcement investigation."

The New York Times (5/25, Hulse, 1.19M) notes, "Privately, Justice Department and Federal Bureau of Investigation officials expressed dismay at the tone of statements by Mr. Hastert and Ms. Pelosi. The officials said there was virtually no possibility that any material taken legally during the search would be returned." The Times adds, "The tense conflict is also developing into a potential new problem for President Bush. The White House has reached out to Republicans on Capitol Hill to allay concerns about the president's low poll numbers and to try to heal deep rifts within the party over a variety of issues," but "the constitutional confrontation is doing nothing to help with that effort. One lawmaker whose stance will be important to the fate of the immigration legislation, Representative F. James Sensenbrenner...on Wednesday set a hearing for next Tuesday on the implications of the search."

Roll Call (5/25, Pershing) reports that Sensenbrenner "was extremely angry about the search and that he called Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty…to tear into Justice's tactics. … 'The FBI's unprecedented Saturday night raid of Rep. Jefferson's Capitol Hill Office raises profoundly disturbing constitutional questions that must be addressed,' Sensenbrenner said in a statement accompanying his announcement of Tuesday's hearing. He added that the raid could have 'a chilling impact on the Legislative Branch's ability to function.'"

Knight Ridder (5/25, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Hastert and Pelosi challenged the raid as violating the Constitution's separation of powers between the legislative and executive branches of government. … 'In addition, the Justice Department must immediately cease any further review of the documents it unconstitutionally seized, ensure that those who have reviewed the documents do not divulge their contents to the investigators, and move in court to vitiate the search warrant,' the two congressional leaders said." Knight Ridder notes, "One law enforcement official familiar with the investigation expressed surprise at the stance taken by the House leaders. … 'The implications of what they're asking for are huge,' the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity to permit candor about a case involving powerful lawmakers. 'They're asking that the FBI return documents to a target in the middle of a law enforcement investigation.'"

Jefferson Files Motion In Federal Court Seeking Return Of Seized Documents. The AP (5/25, Kellman) also reports Rep. William Jefferson yesterday "filed a motion asking the federal judge in the case to order the FBI to return the material it seized from his office. The Justice Department dug in, repeating that the raid was carried out only after Jefferson refused to comply with a subpoena and only then with a search warrant signed by a judge. 'The actions were lawful and necessary under these unique circumstances,' said Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty."

Jefferson Rebuffs Pelosi Request To Quit Ways And Means. The AP (5/25, Kellman) reports, "Democrats sought to get embattled Rep. William Jefferson to resign his seat on the House's most prestigious committee. 'In the interest of upholding the high ethical standard of the House Democratic Caucus, I am writing to request your immediate resignation from the Ways and Means Committee,' wrote House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi in the one-sentence correspondence." But Jefferson "was defiant," writing back, "I will not give up a committee assignment that is so vital to New Orleans at this crucial time for any uncertain, long-term political strategy." Fox News' Special Report (5/24, Wilson) also noted Pelosi's call for Jefferson to resign his committee seat.

Legal Analysts Say FBI Raid Broke Custom, But Not Constitution. The Washington Post (5/25, A10, Lane, 744K) reports, "The FBI raid on Rep. William Jefferson's congressional office was an aggressive tactic that broke a long-standing political custom. But while it might violate the spirit of the Constitution, it might not violate the letter of the document or subsequent rulings by the Supreme Court, legal analysts say. The issue could turn on whether a court finds that the items seized from Jefferson's office were related to such protected legislative activities as writing, researching and voting on bills." Yale constitutional law professor Akhil Reed Amar said, "It's really a matter of etiquette. I don't see any constitutional principle here."

McCain Says FBI Should Have Approached Hastert, Pelosi Before Raid. On CNN's Larry King Live (5/24), Sen. John McCain said that he "reacted with some concern" about the raid of Jefferson's office, adding, "what I think should have happened, I think the FBI should have gone to the Speaker and Nancy Pelosi…and said, look, we need to go into this office for this reason. I think that probably would have been a much better path to take. They didn't have to tell every senator, but they should have gone to the leadership of the House, I think, and told them they were going to do it. And you could trust them not to say anything about it."

WPost Calls Congressional Reaction To FBI Search "Overblown." The Washington Post (5/25, 744K) editorializes, "The uproar over the FBI's search…is understandable but overblown," and the demand by Hastert and Pelosi "that the Justice Department return the papers it seized goes way too far." The Post adds, "We're not saying that the Justice Department acted perfectly here. It would have been preferable to find some way to consult with congressional leaders before the search. … Still, lawmakers' high-decibel complaints are unwarranted."

Cheney May Be Called To Testify In Libby Trial.

The Los Angeles Times (5/25, Schmidt, 958K) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney may be called as a government witness in the perjury and obstruction case against his former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby, a special prosecutor indicated Wednesday. Then again, he may not." In a court filing, Patrick J. Fitzgerald "held open the possibility that during Libby's trial, currently set for January 2007, he might ask Cheney to authenticate the handwritten notations in the margins of a July 2003 newspaper column critical of the Bush administration's decision to go to war in Iraq." The New York Times (5/25, Johnston, 1.19M) says Fitzgerald's filing "suggested that…Cheney would testify as a government witness," underscoring "the prosecutor's contention that the vice president's role was critical to understanding Mr. Libby's wrongdoing."

Meanwhile, the Washington Post (5/25, A1, Smith, 744K) reports, "Cheney was personally angered by a former US ambassador's newspaper column attacking a key rationale for the war in Iraq and repeatedly directed…Libby…to 'get all the facts out' related to the critique, according to excerpts from Libby's 2004 grand jury testimony released late yesterday by…Fitzgerald." Libby also "told the grand jury that Cheney raised as an issue that the former ambassador's wife worked at the CIA and that she allegedly played a role in sending him to investigate the Iraqi government's interest in acquiring nuclear weapons materials. That issue formed the basis of former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV's published critique."

Opening Arguments Made At Safavian Trial.

The New York Times (5/25, Shenon, 1.19M) reports, "A former White House aide who went on trial Wednesday in the influence-peddling scandal centered on the lobbyist Jack Abramoff offered an admission rarely heard these days in Washington: he acknowledged he was once a good friend of the now-disgraced lobbyist. The admission by the former aide, David H. Safavian, came in opening statements by his lawyer." Safavian "is accused of lying to government investigators about his relationship with Mr. Abramoff and the circumstances of their 2002 golfing trip to Scotland." The Washington Post (5/25, A6, Birnbaum, 744K) adds, "Prosecutors signaled that they plan to rely heavily on hundreds of e-mails between Safavian and Abramoff to show that Abramoff was seeking two government properties over which Safavian had influence while offering Safavian favors, including the overseas trip. 'The defendant lied, concealed and misled' federal investigators about his dealings with Abramoff, prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg told a jury in US District Court here yesterday." Zeidenberg "said that he would show 'examples of concrete assistance' that Safavian offered to Abramoff and also prove that Safavian lied about the details of his interactions with Abramoff to Senate staffers and to an ethics officer and an investigator of the General Services Administration, where Safavian worked at the time."

The AP (5/25, Yost) notes "the prosecution's first witness, Stephen Perry, GSA's former administrator, testified that Safavian invited him on the Scotland golf outing. But Perry said he didn't want to go because he thought it would be too expensive." Perry, who now runs the NFL Hall of Fame, "said Abramoff turned up at Safavian's country club and golfed with Perry, his wife and Safavian. Another time, Perry and several friends declined Abramoff's offer of free dinners at the lobbyist's restaurant."

CNET News (5/25, Broache) reports, "E-mail messages took center stage Wednesday" in the Safavian trial. "During opening statements in federal district court, Justice Department attorney Peter Zeidenberg told jurors that the government would prove Safavian's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt by 'relying largely on the defendant's own words' in electronic form. … Zeidenberg displayed about six e-mail messages on screens in the courtroom, read portions aloud, and said they would 'demonstrate clearly and unequivocally' that Safavian had been helping Abramoff in deals involving federally managed land--and then concealing his involvement from investigators. Also at issue is whether Safavian legally could have accepted a free golf trip to St. Andrews, Scotland, with Abramoff, House Republicans Bob Ney and Tom DeLay, and former Christian Coalition Director Ralph Reed. … This is hardly the first time archived e-mail messages have become the centerpiece of a federal case. During the Microsoft antitrust trial, Justice Department attorneys delighted in highlighting incendiary e-mail messages that Chairman Bill Gates and other company executives exchanged. In one August 1997 e-mail message, for instance, Gates asked subordinates: 'Do we have a clear plan on what we want Apple to do to undermine Sun?'"

Nicholson Details Response To News Of Data Theft. VA Secretary Nicholson expressed his "outrage" over the recent breach of security at the VA and described his response after learning of the theft 13 days after it occurred. The White House expressed its support for Nicholson, but he is expected to face tough questions during Congressional hearings into the breach on Thursday. The level of national media coverage of the issue has dropped significantly this morning, with the story being covered primarily by the New York Times, the AP and local media outlets.
