The only course that will work entails not only the risks of greater casualties, but the risks of walking away from promises unmet and hopes unfulfilled. More money and troops are inputs, not outputs. A new strategy needs benchmarks for success -- arrests, imprisonment and the adviser ratings of leaders. Our only hope lies not in American troops but in the development of an Iraqi security force free of militia influence, working for a government that understands the penalty for failure.

The Smart Surge: Diplomacy (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0113000

By Wesley K. Clark

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

The odds are that this week President Bush will announce a "surge" of up to 20,000 additional U.S. troops into Iraq. Will this deliver a "win"? Probably not. But it will distract us from facing the deep-seated regional issues that must be resolved.

The administration views a troop surge of modest size as virtually the only remaining action in Iraq that would be a visible signal of determination. More economic assistance is likely to be touted, but absent a change in the pattern of violence, infrastructure enhancement simply isn't practical.

Yes, several additional brigades in Baghdad would allow for more roadblocks, patrols and neighborhood-clearing operations. Some initial successes would be evident. But how significant would this be? We've never had enough troops in Iraq. In Kosovo, we had 40,000 troops for a population of 2 million. That ratio would call for at least 500,000 troops in Iraq; adding 20,000 now seems too little, too late.

Further, U.S. troops so far have lacked the language skills, cultural awareness and political legitimacy to ensure that areas "cleared" can be "held." The key would be more Iraqi troops, but they aren't available in the numbers required. Nor are the Iraqi troops reliable enough for the gritty work of dealing with militias and sectarian loyalties. Even if militia fighters in Baghdad can be temporarily suppressed, they could redeploy to continue the fight in other areas.

What the surge would do is put more American troops in harm's way, further undercut the morale of U.S. forces and risk further alienating elements of the Iraqi populace. American casualties would probably rise, at least temporarily, as more troops appeared on the streets -- as happened in the summer when a brigade from Alaska was extended and sent into Baghdad. And even if the increased troop presence initially frustrated the militias, it wouldn't be long before they found ways to work around the neighborhood searches and other obstacles, if they chose to continue the conflict.

Other uses for troops include accelerating training of the Iraqi military and police. But vetting these Iraqi forces for loyalty has proved problematic. So neither accelerated training nor adding Iraqi troops to the security mission can be viewed as though a specified increase in effort would yield an identical increase in return.

The truth is that the underlying problems are political, not military.

Vicious ethnic cleansing is underway, as various factions fight for power and survival. In this environment, security is unlikely to come from smothering the struggle with a blanket of forces -- and increasing U.S. efforts is likely to generate additional resistance, especially from Iraq's neighbors. More effective action is needed to resolve the struggle at the political level. A new U.S. ambassador might help, but the administration needs to recognize that the neoconservative vision has failed.

Well before the 2003 invasion, the Bush administration was sending signals that its intentions weren't limited to Iraq; "regime change" in Syria and Iran was often discussed in Washington. Small wonder then that both countries have worked continuously to feed the fighting in Iraq.

Dealing with meddling neighbors is an essential element of resolving the conflict in Iraq. But this requires more than border posts and threatening statements. The administration needs a new strategy for the region, before Iran gains nuclear capabilities. While the military option must remain on the table, America should take the lead with direct diplomacy to resolve the interrelated problems of Iran's push for regional hegemony and nuclear power, the struggle for control of Lebanon, and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Isolating our adversaries hasn't worked.

Absent such fundamental change in Washington's approach, there is little hope that a troop surge and accompanying rhetoric will be anything other than "staying the course" more. That wastes lives and time, bolsters the terrorists and avoids facing up to the interrelated challenges posed by a region in crisis.

War Against Time (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

DOJ_NMG_0113001

The new plan for Iraq that President Bush will announce this week will suffer from the same fallacy that has infected each of his previous war strategies -- and also most of the counterproposals sprouting up in Washington. That is, the notion that American action can produce decisive results in Iraq in six to 12 months.

The administration's original war plan -- to the extent one existed -- foresaw the creation of an Iraqi administration and the withdrawal of most U.S. troops within six months of the invasion. When that failed, the administration wagered that it could oversee the election of an interim Iraqi government, the writing of a constitution, that constitution's ratification and the election of a permanent government in 12 months. Insistence on that timetable produced the half-baked constitution that now hamstrings the "unity" government. A year ago the administration supposed that it could train enough Iraqi police and military forces in 2006 to draw down U.S. troops to 100,000 or fewer. It came no closer than it did in 2005, when it had much the same plan.

Now Bush is likely to bet that the dispatch of additional American forces will somehow produce a breakthrough in Baghdad before 2008. That parallels the Iraq Study Group, which foresees a transition of the war to full Iraqi control and the withdrawal of all U.S. combat forces by the first quarter of 2008, and Democratic plans for the beginning of a troop drawdown in four to six months.

In Washington's bipartisan mind-set, the next six months are always crucial in Iraq. Persistently, we believe that one big, intense effort will turn the country around -- or make it possible for us to leave. Why? Perhaps because Bush has never been willing to ask the country to commit itself to a long struggle in Iraq, despite his view of it as "the central front" in a war on terrorism that will define the 21st century. Instead he proposes the war that the Army and the public can tolerate without too much strain. For their part, war opponents understandably have been looking for a way out since the mission began.

Iraq, however, doesn't operate on Washington's clock -- something Iraqi leaders have repeatedly tried and failed to explain to the ambassadors and generals who demand benchmarks and timetables. And why should it? In historical context, the country is not much different from others that have emerged from decades of dictatorship and tried to sort out a new political status quo among multiple competing ethnic groups. Yugoslavia began to break down in 1991; despite repeated Western interventions, the bloodshed continued until the end of the decade. The wars over Congo's future began in 1994 with the end of the Mobuto dictatorship and didn't end until 2003. Lebanon's civil war began in 1976 and ended in 1989.

As the behavior of the Maliki government and its Sunni enemies has made painfully clear, Iraq is nearer the beginning than the end of its sorting out. Each of the main sides -- Shiite, Sunni and Kurd -- remains convinced that it can impose its sectarian agenda by force. The Sunnis believe they will reconquer Iraq when the Americans leave. Maliki himself is eager for the U.S. Army to stand back so the Shiite-dominated police and army can attempt to wipe out Sunni resistance. The Kurds intend to fight before they will share Kirkuk. Until all are convinced that they have exhausted the option of force, there will be no settlement.

If Iraq is like the rest of the post-Cold War world, this will take six to 12 years, not six to 12 months. Not only is the United States unlikely to speed up the resolution of the conflict, it may even slow a resolution down, by acting as a buffer or co-combatant -- as did U.N. troops in Bosnia, Syrian forces in Lebanon and the armies of multiple African states in Congo. Of course, U.S. forces might also prevent the war from spreading beyond Iraq or keep other nations from jumping in.

One day, on its own time, Iraq will reach equilibrium. At that moment a new power structure will solidify in a country that ranks second in the world in proven oil reserves; that occupies the geographic and ethnographic center of the world's most volatile region; that now harbors many of the most dedicated enemies of the democratic West. Will the United States want to be present, as one of the shaping forces, when that settlement is finally reached? Will it want to influence which Iraqi parties are stronger, and which weaker, in the final balance?

If so, the question the country faces is not what can be done on Washington's time, in six or 12 months. It's how the U.S. mission can be configured to adapt to the clock that's running in Iraq.

Quagmire Of The Vanities (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

The only real question about the planned “surge” in Iraq — which is better described as a Vietnam-style escalation — is whether its proponents are cynical or delusional.

Senator Joseph Biden, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, thinks they're cynical. He recently told The Washington Post that administration officials are simply running out the clock, so that the next president will be "the guy landing helicopters inside the Green Zone, taking people off the roof."

Daniel Kahneman, who won the Nobel Memorial Prize in Economic Science for his research on irrationality in decision-making, thinks they're delusional. Mr. Kahneman and Jonathan Renshon recently argued in Foreign Policy magazine that the administration's unwillingness to face reality in Iraq reflects a basic human aversion to cutting one's losses — the same instinct that makes gamblers stay at the table, hoping to break even.

Of course, such gambling is easier when the lives at stake are those of other people's children.

Well, we don't have to settle the question. Either way, what's clear is the enormous price our nation is paying for President Bush's character flaws.

I began writing about the Bush administration's infallibility complex, the president's Captain Queeg-like inability to own up to mistakes, almost a year before the invasion of Iraq. When you put a man like that in a position of power — the kind of position where he can punish people who tell him what he doesn't want to hear, and base policy decisions on the advice of people who play to his vanity — it's a recipe for disaster.

Consider, on one side, the case of the C.I.A.'s Baghdad station chief during 2004, who provided accurate assessments of the deteriorating situation in Iraq. "What is he, some kind of defeatist?" asked the president — and according to The Washington Post, at the end of his tour, the station chief "was punished with a poor assignment."

On the other side, consider the men Mr. Bush has turned to since the midterm election. They constitute a remarkable coalition of the unwilling — men who have been wrong about Iraq every step of the way, but aren't willing to admit it.

The principal proponents of the "surge" are William Kristol of The Weekly Standard and Frederick Kagan of the American Enterprise Institute. Now, even if the Joint Chiefs of Staff hadn't given the surge a thumbs down, Mr. Kristol's track record should have been reason enough to ignore his advice. For example, early in the war, Mr. Kristol dismissed as "pop sociology" warnings that there would be conflict between Sunnis and Shiites and that the Shiites might try to create an Islamic fundamentalist state. He assured National Public Radio listeners that "Iraq's always been very secular."

But Mr. Kristol and Mr. Kagan appealed to Mr. Bush's ego, suggesting that he might yet be able to rescue his signature war. And am I the only person to notice that after all the Oedipal innuendo surrounding the Iraq Study Group — Daddy's men coming in to fix Junior's mess, etc. — Mr. Bush turned for advice to two other sons of famous and more successful fathers?

Not that Mr. Bush rejects all advice from elder statesmen. We now know that he has been talking to Henry Kissinger. But Mr. Kissinger is a kindred spirit. In remarks published after his death, Gerald Ford said of his secretary of state, "Henry in his mind never made a mistake, so whatever policies there were that he implemented, in retrospect he would defend."

Oh, and Senator John McCain, the first major political figure to advocate a surge, is another man who can't admit mistakes. Mr. McCain now says that he always knew that the conflict was "probably going to be long and hard and tough" — but back in 2002, before the Senate voted on the resolution authorizing the use of force, he declared that a war with Iraq would be "fairly easy."

Mr. Bush is expected to announce his plan for escalation in the next few days. According to the BBC, the theme of his speech will be "sacrifice." But sacrifice for what? Not for the national interest, which would be best served by withdrawing before the strain of the war breaks our ground forces. No, Iraq has become a quagmire of the vanities — a place where America is spending blood and treasure to protect the egos of men who won't admit that they were wrong.

The Lynching Of Iraq (BOS)

The Boston Globe, January 8, 2007

THE HANGING of Saddam Hussein Dec. 30 offered a view into the grotesque reality of what America has sponsored in Iraq, and what Americans saw should inform their response to President Bush's escalation of the war.

The deposed tyrant was mercilessly taunted. As he stood on the threshold of the afterlife and was told to go to hell, the world witnessed a chilling elevation of the ancient curse, making an absolute villain an object of pity.

And then, in chanting the name of Moqtada al-Sadr, whose family had been a particular target of Hussein's his executioners made clear that the execution was an act of tribal revenge, not of national restoration, much less justice. It was a lynching. This Shi'ite brutality is guaranteed to spawn Sunni savagery. Iraq itself is hell.

Officials of the United States, from military commanders in Baghdad to members of the Bush administration in Washington, sought to distance themselves from the bedlam, but they are essential to what happened at the last moments of Saddam's life. Decorum would have been the main note of his death if Americans had managed it, but the execution would have been no less an act of false justice.

The harsh fact is that the Shi'ite dominated government of Nouri al-Maliki, in its contemptible treatment of a man about to die, laid bare the dark truth of Bush's war. This is what revenge looks like, and revenge (not weapons of mass destruction, not democracy) drove the initial US attack on Saddam Hussein every bit as much as it snuffed out his life at the end. The hooded executioners took their cue from George W. Bush.

And why should they not have? Let's remember who this man is. As governor of Texas, he presided over the executions of 152 people, including the first woman put to death in Texas in a century. Her name was Karla Faye Tucker. Bush's response to the world-wide plea raised in her behalf was an astounding display of cruelty, a mocking imitation of the woman begging not to be killed.

Bush rejected appeals for clemency in every death penalty case that came before him. The Texas death chamber, with its lethal injection gurney, is a place of decorum. And savagery. That executions defined the main public distinction that Bush brought to the US presidency sums up the national disgrace, while suggesting also how little surprise there should be that America is presided over now by an executioner-in-chief.

Capital punishment is to individuals what aggressive war is to nations. The 20th century, for all its brutality (or because of it), marked the watershed era when world opinion shifted against both. Once, princes exercised life-and-death power over subjects with unchallenged authority. Once, the only check on a state's freedom to attack another state was its power to do so.

These two absolutes of realpolitik have changed. From the Kellogg-Briand Pact of 1928 to principles laid down at the Nuremberg tribunals to the United Nations itself, wars of aggression stand condemned. The force of state violence is to be exercised only in self-defense or in defense of a victim people, in circumstances defined by international agreement. Similarly, nation after nation has abolished the death penalty, understanding the absurdity of defending human life by destroying human life. If killing can ever be justified, individually or communally, it is only as an absolute last resort. In sum, an international moral consensus has taken shape against unnecessary violence, whether targeting a criminal or a rogue state.

George W. Bush is the impresario of unnecessary violence. America has followed him into the death chamber of this war, and now he wants us to believe that the way out is through more death.

Iraqi loss of life remains mostly unimagined, but every evening on the television news, Americans see the sweet faces of young soldiers who have died in Bush's war. They were heroes, not criminals, yet Bush dragged each one of them up onto a gallows. He positioned them on the trap door, hardly wincing as they then fell through. And now, in perhaps the greatest outrage of all, Bush claims that the way to justify the unnecessary deaths he has caused is to add to them. Escalation is his way of saying, go to hell.

With his lies at the beginning of this war, and his fantasy now that an honorable outcome remains possible, the president is a taunting killer, caught in the act. He lacks nothing but the black hood. Stop this man.

Editorial | Change In Washington (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 8, 2007

The only blizzard in Washington this winter has been from all the personnel changes President Bush has made to handle Iraq and other foreign policy crises.

While the changes may be good, new nameplates on desks need to be accompanied by new and better plans for stabilizing and exiting Iraq, for carrying out diplomacy around the world, and for more fully coordinating U.S. intelligence gathering.

What started with the removal of former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has continued with a new director of national intelligence, a new deputy secretary of state, and probably new military commanders to head U.S. operations in Iraq.

Out as the first U.S. director of national intelligence is John Negroponte, who, if confirmed by the Senate, will return to the State Department as deputy secretary.

Negroponte's sudden move is not because he messed up as intelligence chief over the last 18 months. He made a decent start of herding 16 national intelligence agencies. But his experience and skills may be of greater use to State, which needs a seasoned diplomat in that high-ranking position.

Negroponte's appointment, along with the expected nomination of Zalmay Khalilzad to follow John Bolton as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, could indicate that Bush will take diplomacy more seriously in his last two years in office.

That would be a smart course for the administration to take, especially when it comes to U.S. policy in Iraq.

Bush is expected to announce his new strategy for Iraq this week.

He seems to be trying to show he can change with the circumstances, by replacing Gen. John Abizaid with Adm. William Fallon to lead the Central Command, and Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to replace Gen. George Casey as the top U.S. commander on the ground in Iraq.

But Bush's own statements and leaks about this week's announcement suggest that he still hasn't gripped the reality that the earlier U.S. goal - to turn Iraq into a stable democracy - is now unachievable.

A temporary increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, which is what Bush is expected to recommend, won't change that - especially if the outmoded goals and tactics remain the same.

Simply looking into Iraqi President Nouri al-Maliki's eyes to see whether he is sincere about disbanding Shiite death squads won't work either.

Bush ought to listen to the Baker-Hamilton commission's suggestions to beef up the training of Iraqi security forces, and hold talks with regional neighbors, including Iran and Syria, who can influence the outcome in Iraq.

New nameplates on desks can be good. Realism and well-thought-out goals and tactics are better.

Resort To 'Soft-partition' Repair? (WT)

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

As the nation and world await President Bush's speech on what could be his last chance to get Iraq policy right, it is time to face the reality that a multiethnic, integrated, democratic Iraq is probably no longer attainable. The sectarian-based responses to Saddam's execution are only the latest proof of this fact.

Proposals for a U.S. troop surge, more American trainers in Iraqi army and police forces, and a reinvigorated economic recovery package including a job creation program all have serious arguments in their defense. But at a time when nearly 5,000 people are dying and 100,000 Iraqis are being driven from their homes each month, it is also time to develop a backup plan for ending the civil war that we have proven unable to prevent.

Many have already concluded our backup plan for Iraq should be packing up and going home -- or, at most, redeploying to Iraq's borders to protect displaced civilians and deter its neighbors from entering into the civil war. But there is at least one promising Plan B that, while hardly ideal, would be far better for America, Iraq, and the broader region than complete defeat, all-out civil war, and the possibility of broader regional conflict. It would build on Sen. Joe Biden and former Assistant Secretary Leslie Gelb's idea of a soft partitioning of Iraq -- moving away from centralization toward a loose federation (akin to Bosnia) of three largely autonomous regions in which present and future oil revenues would be shared equitably. But it would go beyond Biden/Gelb to confront directly the sectarian strife now raging in and around Baghdad. Rather than striving for a "neutral Baghdad" as Mr. Biden and Mr. Gelb propose, the Iraqi government would assist threatened minorities relocate to where they feel safer -- helping them find new jobs and housing in the process.

This is in effect the Bosnia model for Iraq. Bosnia's war ended only after as many as 200,000 died, and half the country's population had either been expelled or fled, leaving the country a patchwork of ethnically pure pieces. NATO air power, a reinforced U.N. contingent, and strengthened Muslim and Croat armies were critical elements leading to peace. But the Dayton accords of 1995 were centered on the fact ethnic relocations had occurred, creating definable and mostly defensible territories. At that point of ethnic consolidation, it was possible to negotiate and then implement land swaps among Serbs, Croats, and Muslims, creating a map and federal structure that a decade later is still tolerated by key parties.

In a rapidly disintegrating Iraq, our goal should be similarly to create militarily defensible subregions, while attenuating the violence. That way, a unitary state could be preserved -- to share oil revenue equitably, conduct foreign policy, maintain some limited national institutions, and hold out the hope of a more cohesive Iraq in the future. Ethnic relocation is distasteful and not free from risk, but if carried out with care as government policy, it can occur with less trauma than in the Balkans.

In effect, Iraq is already becoming Bosnia. As noted, according to statistics from the UNHCR and Brookings-Bern project on the internally displaced, perhaps 100,000 more Iraqis are forcibly driven from their homes each month. About half wind up abroad, the other half displaced within Iraq. And the displacement increasingly takes on a Balkanlike, territorial logic. Sunni clerics now assert that the Shia are trying to establish a "Sunni-free corridor across northern Baghdad." In other words, ethnic displacement is no longer solely the province of criminals and renegades like Muqtada al-Sadr, but has become policy.

Our choice is no longer whether we want ethnic relocation in Iraq or not. The choice is fast becoming whether we want to manage the process humanely and in a way that leads to stability, or allow ethnic killing and cleansing to reach their logical, terrible conclusion.

To be sure, facilitating ethnic relocation can also encourage it. A few small acts of violence against minorities in a given neighborhood, and they will be more apt to quickly relocate, knowing protection and a new home and job await somewhere else in the country. This could in turn encourage those few small acts of violence on the part of local majorities wishing to consolidate their ethnic group's control of a given region. But ethnic cleansing is already a full-blown reality in Iraq; at some point, one needs to address it rather than pretend it has not yet become a huge problem.

Obtaining agreement in Iraq will require not only limited rapprochement among some Sunni and Shi'ite leaders, but a constructive role by the Kurds who are already ensconced in relative security in their own compact territory. Kurds see the oil rich, multiethnic town of Kirkuk as both the capital of their longed-for state and a symbol of their oppression at the hands of Saddam (who engineered mass Sunni migration to Kirkuk while expelling Kurds.)

Tens of thousands of Kurds have returned to Kirkuk already, heightening tensions. The International Organization for Migration has detailed the serious lack of basic services and opportunities for displaced persons, only serving to aggravate tensions.

The upsurge in sectarian warfare has emboldened the Kurds and their backers to advance the partition-independence agenda. U.S. pressure on the Kurds (whose territory has been used as a base for Kurdish separatists in Turkey) could encourage them to cut a deal on Kirkuk's oil while earning greater Sunni cooperation on property swaps in the town. And such progress on ethnic movements in a place like Kirkuk could set the basis for more ambitious land swaps similar to those on Sarajevo and Western Bosnia that were a crucial component in attaining peace for Bosnia.

With U.S. assistance, the international community and Iraqi government would offer new houses and jobs to those who wished to move voluntarily, as well as protection for them as they left home and packed up to a different region. Houses left behind would revert to government ownership, to be offered to individuals of other ethnic groups who wanted them, in what would largely become a swapping program. Already there are examples of Iraqis trading houses on their own. With safeguards for security, the Iraqi government could form property commissions -- as have already been created in Kirkuk -- to facilitate matches and avoid swindles.

We must not wait for slaughter in Iraq to reach the exhaustion point before finally confronting the reality of mass ethnic movements. Facilitating ethnic movement is not risk free. But it may soon become the only option before condemning Iraq to years of Bosnia-like fratricidal violence. If the president does not have this idea in his January speech, it is time he and his advisers start laying the groundwork with Iraqis for serious consideration of the idea in the coming months. If we want to control the ethnic relocation process rather than let genocidal hatred drive it, we may not have much more time.

Pelosi Hints At Resisting Troop Surge (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, January 8, 2007

Democrats now running Congress will not give President Bush a blank check to wage war in Iraq, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Sunday, suggesting they could deny him the money should he call for additional troops.

Yet Pelosi's second-in-command and a Senate leader on foreign affairs questioned the wisdom and legality of using the power of the purse to thwart the White House as Bush prepared to announce his revised war strategy this week — perhaps on Wednesday.

Republicans, now in the minority, said more troops were needed to get a handle on the spiraling violence in Iraq. They also cast doubt whether Democrats would — or could — block the president's plans. "Congress is incapable of micromanaging the tactics in the war," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky.

Pelosi made clear that her party supported boosting the overall size of the military "to protect the American people against any threats to our interests, wherever they may occur. That's different, though, from adding troops to Iraq." She also said Democrats would not cut off money for those troops already in Iraq.

But dollars for a further buildup in Iraq — Bush's expected plan could send as many as 20,000 additional U.S. troops — will get the strictest of scrutiny, she said.

"The burden is on the president to justify any additional resources for a mission," said Pelosi, D-Calif. "Congress is ready to use its constitutional authority of oversight to question what is the justification for this spending, what are the results we are receiving."

"There's not a carte blanche, a blank check for him to do whatever he wishes there," she added in an interview taped Saturday and broadcast Sunday.

Asked about Pelosi's remarks, White House spokesman Alex Conant said Bush welcomed any ideas on Iraq that "lead to success."

"We're glad the speaker wants us to succeed in Iraq," he said.

Bush was putting the finishing touches on his new policy over the weekend. In addition to the troop increase, it could provide more money for jobs and reconstruction programs in Iraq.

Since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Congress has approved about $500 billion for Iraq, Afghanistan and other terrorism-fighting efforts. The White House is working on its largest-ever appeal for more war funds — a record $100 billion, at least. It will be submitted along with Bush's Feb. 5 budget.

While leading Democrats reaffirmed their opposition to a troop buildup, several did not join Pelosi in suggesting it was possible Congress could deny Bush the money for the additional forces.

"I don't want to anticipate that," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md.

Sen. Joe Biden, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a 2008 presidential candidate, said increasing troops would be a "tragic mistake." But he contended Congress was constitutionally powerless to second-guess Bush's military strategy because lawmakers had voted to authorize the commander in chief to wage war.

"As a practical matter, there's no way to say, 'Mr. President, stop,'" Biden said, unless enough congressional Republicans join Democrats in persuading Bush that the strategy is wrong. "You can't go in and, like a tinker toy, and play around and say, 'You can't spend the money on this piece and this piece.'"

Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., told Bush in a letter last week that Democrats oppose additional U.S. forces in Iraq and want him to begin withdrawing in four months to six months American troops already there.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., criticized the Democratic proposal as a "formula for defeat," saying more troops are needed because the U.S. military never had enough personnel in Iraq to get the job done.

"If we don't start over, and do what we should have done in the beginning — having enough people to win this war — we will pay a heavy price," he said.

"They never talked one minute in that letter what happens to Iraq when we leave," Graham added. "In all honesty we are not winning, and if you're not winning, you're losing. And now's the time to come up with a strategy to win."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., wrote in Sunday's Washington Post that boosting troops for an indefinite time was necessary to secure peace in the Mideast.

"When we authorized this war, we accepted the responsibility to make sure they could prevail," he wrote. "Even greater than the costs incurred thus far and in the future are the catastrophic consequences that would ensure from our failure in Iraq."

But Pelosi, pointing to the November elections that ousted Republicans from control of the House and Senate, said Iraq already is in complete chaos.

"The American people have spoken very clearly on the subject in the election," she said. "And this war in Iraq is damaging our military readiness, so it is not making America safer, it is not making the region more stable."

Ahead of his speech, Bush planned to continue briefings with lawmakers this week, culminating in a meeting with bipartisan leadership on Wednesday, according to lawmakers and aides.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said she would like to see a congressional vote on whether Bush can send in additional troops.

"My belief is, the president's coming to us," she said. "He's going to ask for billions and billions of dollars. He's going to send more of our people into harm's way. I think it would be best for the country if we got to vote on that surge or escalation."

Pelosi spoke on CBS' "Face the Nation," McConnell and Hoyer appeared on "Fox News Sunday," Biden and Graham were on NBC's "Meet the Press" and Boxer appeared on CNN's "Late Edition."

Pelosi Threatens To Reject Funds For Troop Surge (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and other top Democrats yesterday said their party might deny funding for President Bush's expected call this week for a troop surge in Iraq if he doesn't meet their demands for detailed consultations and congressional debate on military strategy.

"If the president chooses to escalate the war, in his budget request we want to see a distinction between what is there to support the troops who are there now. The American people and the Congress support those troops. We will not abandon them," the California Democrat said during an appearance on CBS' "Face the Nation."

"But if the president wants to add to this mission, he is going to have to justify it. And this is new for him because up until now the Republican Congress has given him a blank check with no oversight, no standards, no conditions."

Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat and House Appropriations Committee chairman, echoed his party leader's warnings and some of her wording, saying, "There are certainly going to be no blank checks" from his panel.

"I think we're going to scrub his request and, at the same time, use it as a chance to really discuss whether or not the policy behind that request makes any sense," he said.

But he, like Mrs. Pelosi, was quick to emphasize that a rejection of a surge did not equate to abandoning the forces already stationed in Iraq.

"I think the Congress will provide everything that the troops need," he said during an appearance on ABC's "This Week."

In a letter to the president on Friday, Mrs. Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, cautioned Mr. Bush against calling for a troop surge, although it did not threaten to wield Congress' purse power.

"Surging forces is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed," the letter reads. "Like many current and former military leaders, we believe that trying again would be a serious mistake. They, like us, believe there is no purely military solution in Iraq."

Mrs. Pelosi was more explicit yesterday.

"The burden is on the president to justify any additional resources for a mission," she said. "Congress is ready to use its constitutional authority of oversight to question what is the justification for this spending."

Mrs. Pelosi's fellow Californian Sen. Barbara Boxer said on CNN's "Late Edition" that she would like to see Congress vote on whether Mr. Bush can send more troops and issued warnings about funding a surge.

"My belief is, the president's coming to us," said Mrs. Boxer, a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "He's going to ask for billions and billions of dollars. ... I think it would be best for the country if we got to vote on that surge or escalation."

She added that "there's nothing against that in the Constitution. We do have the power of the purse."

CNN's Wolf Blitzer asked Mrs. Boxer: "So you want to use that power of the purse?"

"I want to use it in terms of whether or not we should fund this escalation if, in fact, that's what the president does," Mrs. Boxer responded.

While Washington has seen much speculation on how many Republican lawmakers would support a troop surge, party leaders yesterday were decidedly more supportive.

"I think to basically begin to withdraw before the job is finished is a mistake," Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell said yesterday during an appearance on "Fox News Sunday." "If the president recommends what we seem to believe he's going to recommend, I intend to support him."

The Kentucky Republican also pointed out that at least one non-Republican, Sen. Joe Lieberman, also supports a surge. The Connecticut independent appeared with Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, at an American Enterprise Institute panel in Washington on Friday to support a surge.

"All I ask of my Republican colleagues, Democratic colleagues and the nation is just to hear the president out. I think there'll be a lot of support by Republican members," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, who supports a surge, on NBC's "Meet the Press."

The South Carolina Republican acknowledged that a surge is not popular but said a withdrawal from Iraq would be a mistake.

"To me, it is a strategy that is based on the needs of the moment. Even though it may not be politically popular for the moment, I think it is in our best interests long term."

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, a longtime rival of Mrs. Pelosi, said he opposes a surge but declined to threaten funding limits.

"We don't see this as a new policy, and I think it's going to be greeted with great skepticism," the Maryland Democrat told "Fox News Sunday." "We've also done the economic investment before -- unfortunately, with not very good positive results."

But when asked about denying funding, Mr. Hoyer said, "I don't want to anticipate that."

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, also said he opposes a troop surge but added that he doesn't think Democrats have the power to stop one.

"There's not much I can do about it. Not much anybody can do about it," Mr. Biden told NBC's "Meet the Press."

Bush Must 'Justify' Surge, Pelosi Says (LAT)

By Judy Pasternak

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democratic congressional leaders, asserting their new majorities in the House and the Senate, said Sunday that President Bush's plan for a new direction in Iraq would face scrutiny on Capitol Hill.

"It's not an open-ended commitment anymore," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) said on CBS' "Face the Nation."

The president, who has been holding extensive discussions with his war Cabinet and has reshuffled military leadership, is expected to announce a change in strategy soon, perhaps Wednesday.

He is considering sending at least 20,000 more troops to help establish order in Baghdad, a course that Pelosi and new Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) called unacceptable in a letter they sent to Bush on Friday.

The two called instead for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops, starting in four to six months.

But the Democratic leaders also acknowledged that they had a limited ability to prevent the White House from adding forces. Any effort to block funding would expose them to charges of not supporting the troops. And since Congress authorized the use of force in Iraq, placing restraints on that approval could be unconstitutional.

Pelosi emphasized that Congress would not cut off funding for U.S. forces now in Iraq, and said that Democrats supported the president's proposal to increase the overall size of the Army and the Marine Corps.

But, she added, when Bush submits a budget request, "we want to see a distinction between what is there to support the troops who are there now" and what he needs to send more to the combat zone.

"If the president wants to add to this mission, he is going to have to justify it," Pelosi said. "And this is new for him because, up until now, the Republican Congress has given him a blank check."

Any request for additional funding, she said, "will receive the harshest scrutiny."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, acknowledged that Bush, as commander in chief, had the constitutional authority to order more U.S. troops to Iraq.

It would be unconstitutional, Biden said on NBC's "Meet the Press," for Congress to "micromanage the war" by putting a cap on troop strength after authorizing the use of force.

Calling the proposal for a rapid influx of forces "a tragic mistake," he said, "As a practical matter, there's no way to say, 'Mr. President, stop.' "

In his speech, Bush is also expected to propose a jobs program, at a cost of as much as $1 billion, to employ young Iraqis who otherwise might join the insurgency. The plan also will include proposals for increased economic aid that would further increase the total bill.

Various aspects of Bush's Iraq policy will be examined by House and Senate committees over the next few weeks, several new Democratic chairmen said.

Biden, who confirmed Sunday that he would be running for president in 2008, said his committee, in a four-week series of hearings starting Tuesday, would ask "experts from every perspective" to discuss what options remain in Iraq.

Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.) said on ABC's "This Week" that his House Appropriations Committee would "scrub" the president's requests for money for both a troop buildup and economic development.

Obey said he supported such aid earlier in the conflict, but the money was never fully spent because of the violence in Iraq.

"I am rather dubious that they'll be able to do it this time as well," Obey said.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles), chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said on the same program that during a week of hearings starting Feb. 6 he intended to focus on waste and corruption among private contractors in Iraq, along with those hired for security in the U.S. and Hurricane Katrina cleanup.

"Only a small part of the money spent in Iraq has been audited," he said, "but what we've seen is very, very frightening."

Several Republicans have also criticized the notion of a troop increase, questioning whether U.S. forces should take on a task that Iraq's own government has been reluctant or unable to perform.

Even Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, a member of the House GOP leadership, said on CNN's "Late Edition," "You can't secure the future for a people who don't want to secure their own future."

But he urged members of Congress and the public to listen carefully to Bush's final plan.

"I see this as one of the last chances for the Iraqi people to secure their future with us as a principal partner," Blunt said.

On Saturday, Iraq's prime minister, Nouri Maliki, announced a new effort to end bloodshed in Baghdad, using the Iraqi army rather than police officers.

His speech, to commemorate Iraqi Army Day, took place on a day when at least 71 corpses were found in the Baghdad streets, where Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias have operated with impunity.

Such levels of violence have led Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, to support "a surge in troops with a purpose," joined with Iraqi military and political leaders "to control this country."

"Now's the time to start over," Graham said on "Meet the Press." "If we don't start over and do what we should've done in the beginning … we will pay a heavy price."

Graham said more U.S. forces working with Iraqi troops would offer "our best chance for victory."

But he added, "It may not work."

Scholars Wade Into Troop Surge (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

Congressional Democrats who want to block any proposed escalation in U.S. troop levels in Iraq have the constitutional authority and the legal power to do so, scholars says.

"It's a fundamental constitutional principle that Congress can initiate and regulate war," said Neil Kinkopf, a law professor at Georgia State University in Atlanta.

Mr. Kinkopf, a former Clinton administration Justice Department official who worked in the Office of Legal Counsel, presented a paper for the liberal American Constitution Society last week arguing that Congress has the power to stop President Bush from sending additional troops to Iraq -- a move many expect him to announce this week.

"As commander in chief, the president's role is to prosecute the war that Congress has authorized," Mr. Kinkopf wrote. "The president may not go beyond this authorization."

Mr. Kinkopf says that the law authorizing the Iraq war, passed by Congress in 2002, clearly includes the authority for the kind of surge in troop numbers currently being considered.

"As a legal matter, that [congressional] authorization was drafted broadly enough to encompass the escalation that the president has in contemplation," Mr. Kinkopf wrote.

But, he argues, Congress could simply pass another authorization "effectively limiting the number of troops deployed in Iraq."

As an alternative, Congress could pass a so-called "appropriations rider," restricting the administration from spending any money to make the troop surge happen.

In either case, Mr. Bush would have to use his veto if he wanted to go ahead with any planned escalation, Mr. Kinkopf said.

But Carl Conetta, co-director of the project on Defense Alternatives, a think tank that researches military requirements in the post-Cold War world, told UPI that such a move would be politically tricky for the new Democratic leadership of the Congress.

"It would put them in a difficult position, one that could be spun by the administration as hamstringing the war effort," he said. "That's exactly where the administration's supporters would like to put them."

Mr. Conetta said that the Democrats might end up trying to "oppose this effort [at escalation] ... without taking congressional action to stop it."

But he said it was more likely they would "play every card to its conclusion," and try to block any escalation -- knowing that "in the end they will fail -- that the president will get his way."

"They may content themselves with complaining loudly," he said.

Activists Demand An End To War Funds (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON -- With President Bush poised to announce a surge in US troops in Iraq this week, antiwar activists in the Democratic Party are stepping up demands that their party's leaders cut off funding for the war -- a dramatic step that would force the president to quickly end American involvement in the war.

Calls for Congress to use the power of the purse to shape war policy are coming from the party's base of vocal war opponents, as well as a growing number of rank-and-file Democratic lawmakers who view November's midterm congressional elections as a demand from the public for Democrats to force the president to end the war.

Today, Representative Dennis Kucinich, a liberal Ohio Democrat, plans to outline a proposal for Congress to deny Bush any more funds for the war and have the United Nations lead a security force to stabilize Iraq.

"Our very majority was created through a determination by the people of this country that they wanted a new direction in Iraq," said Kucinich, who ran for president in 2004 on an antiwar platform and has announced a 2008 candidacy as well.

The push by liberals underscores a split within the Democratic Party that winning the majority in Congress hasn't healed. Democrats are caught between a desire to support US troops and appear strong on national security and a sometimes competing push to end an increasingly unpopular war.

"It'll be an interesting leadership challenge to manage these different pieces," said Brian Katulis, a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress who has written extensively on the war. "But Iraq is not going away."

The intra party tension was on display yesterday, with new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi again rejecting suggestions that Democrats cut off funding for forces now in Iraq.

Pelosi held out the possibility that Democrats would pare down the president's future funding requests to try to prevent a troop increase but said Democrats' efforts to influence war policies would never extend to cutting funds for troops already in the field.

"We will always be there to protect our troops and support our troops," Pelosi, a California Democrat, said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

Since winning the November elections, Democratic leaders in Congress have taken a cautious approach to the war. The issue of Iraq was omitted entirely from House Democrats' agenda for their first 100 legislative hours in power, as Democrats focus on domestic issues such as raising the minimum wage and expanding stem cell research.

House and Senate leaders are urging a "phased redeployment" of troops that is not tied to a timeline, and some have signaled a willingness to accept a temporary increase in troop levels as part of a broader plan for ending the war.

Pelosi made clear in her first speech as speaker that she will look to the president to chart a new course in Iraq before Democrats try to influence policy. Bush is scheduled to address the nation on his plan for Iraq as early as Wednesday evening.

But even before the new Congress began, some peace activists began expressing dismay that Democrats aren't doing more to end the war. A group of antiwar protesters led by Cindy Sheehan, the mother of a slain soldier who gained fame during her summer 2005 vigil outside Bush's Texas ranch, disrupted a press conference Democrats were holding Wednesday in Washington on their ethics and lobbying measures.

"We didn't put you in power to work with the people that have been murdering hundreds of thousands of people since they have been in power," Sheehan said after Democratic leaders were forced to cut short the news conference.

Liberal activists are likely to become even more agitated if Congress stands by while Bush sends more troops to Iraq. With that in mind, House and Senate Democratic leaders took the unusual step Friday of preemptively opposing a major increase in troop levels in Iraq -- something Bush is expected to call for this week.

But it remains unclear whether Democrats will be able to stop a troop surge -- much less hasten the end of the war itself -- without withholding funding. Leading Democrats, including Pelosi and Senate majority leader Harry Reid, have been nearly unanimous in rejecting a move to cut off funds, and some who want to end the war now are hesitant to take such a step.

Representative William D. Delahunt, a Quincy Democrat who serves on the US House International Relations Committee, said Democrats should use congressional hearings to establish the best course and to inform the public about the options that exist.

"You don't want to make the same kind of mistakes getting out that this administration did getting in," Delahunt said. "I'm satisfied that withdrawal as soon as practically possible is the best solution. But it is very important to educate not just the American people, but members of Congress and policy makers about this war and how we can end it."

Yet Kucinich cautions that approving the administration's next war budget request -- the Pentagon is expected to ask for at least $100 billion more in the new federal budget -- could give the president all the money he needs to continue the war through the end of his term.

"You can't say you're opposed to the war and keep funding it," he said.

Representative Gregory W. Meeks, a New York Democrat, said Congress would be wrong to give up its most powerful tool by giving the administration all the money it wants for the war.

"The American people were clear in the election that they don't want more troops in Iraq," said. "We have to -- and we will -- stand up and go in a different direction."

Democrats Revise Agenda To Deal With War In Iraq (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

Democratic leaders who had hoped to emphasize their domestic agenda in the opening weeks of Congress have concluded that Iraq will share top billing, and they plan on aggressively confronting administration officials this week in a series of hearings.

Pushed by House members who want a quick, tough response to the Iraq strategy President Bush is expected to announce this week, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has backed off from her initial assertion that nothing should detract attention from the legislation she hopes to pass in the first 100 hours of House debate.

Late last week, she summoned the chairmen of the Armed Services, Foreign Affairs, intelligence, Homeland Security, and Oversight and Government Reform committees to plot a series of hearings. On Thursday, Democrats will call Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to appear before the House Foreign Affairs Committee to defend the war-strategy shift Bush will outline in a nationally televised speech.

A House Armed Services Committee hearing with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, planned for Jan. 19 was abruptly moved to this Thursday after consultations with Pelosi. And leadership aides went to work on a response to Bush's speech that they hope will be delivered on national television after the president's appearance.

In the Senate, the Foreign Relations Committee will hold hearings Wednesday on the current situation in Iraq, then grill Rice on the president's plan Thursday. Pace and Gates will go before the Senate Armed Services Committee on Friday.

"Iraq is the elephant in the room," said Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.), a member of the House Armed Services Committee and a close ally of Pelosi's.

Democrats had hoped that the headlines and evening news would be dominated by votes in Congress to bolster homeland security, raise the minimum wage, fund stem cell research and grant the federal government authority to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare. Each of those measures will be taken up on sequential days this week, a bill-a-day approach designed to capture headlines and show the nation that Democrats can get things done.

But with Bush's long-awaited policy address tentatively set for midweek, those much-touted bills are not likely to lead the news, and the Democratic leaders have been forced to change their tactics.

"The challenge for them is this: Iraq is the central issue. It's an enormous problem for the president and the Republicans, but it has the suffocating effect of taking attention away from the Democrats' domestic legislative priorities, and I think they understand that," said Joe Lockhart, a White House press secretary in the Clinton administration.

To some Democrats, the House leaders' response to the burgeoning war debate has been too slow and too cautious. A CBS News poll released Thursday found that 45 percent of voters want the Democratic Congress to focus on Iraq, a figure that far outstripped the percentages for the economy and jobs, at 7 percent; health care, at 7 percent; and immigration, at 6 percent. "Americans couldn't be clearer," the poll report concluded.

Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich (D-Ohio), a leader in the antiwar movement, said that as soon as Bush delivers his proposal, Democratic leaders need to be ready with a thorough plan to end the war. Kucinich will outline his own war plan in a speech in New York today.

"When Democrats were in the minority, the default position of the Republican leadership was to take the war off the table, but the war is the 800-pound gorilla," he said. "It ain't moving off the table. Congress has to intervene right now."

Early Friday afternoon, Rep. Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), a House Armed Services Committee member, groused that an Iraq hearing planned for Jan. 19 was at least a week too late. "We on the Armed Services [Committee] feel strongly that we need to begin the hearing process immediately," he said.

By late afternoon, the hearing was rescheduled for this week.

Some Democratic strategists urged party members to stick to their original plan, passing kitchen-table legislation every day, such as the minimum-wage increase and the stem cell bill, while Bush struggles with the war. Celinda Lake, a Democratic strategist and pollster, called it "the perfect juxtaposition."

"People are not looking to their individual members of Congress to solve the Iraq war," she said. "For the House to be focused on it now would look like partisan bickering rather than getting on with the people's business."

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) agreed that the Democrats have the winning hand. Bush may be grabbing the spotlight by shaking up his war advisers, bolstering troop strength in Baghdad and pushing more money into Iraq reconstruction, but the news reports are doing him no good, he said.

"I know where support for more troops is, and I know where support is for the minimum-wage increase," said Emanuel, the fourth-ranking House Democrat. "I'd rather be doing what we're doing."

By the weekend, however, Emanuel had acknowledged the Democrats' strategic shift. He still was not worried that Bush might be scoring political points, but he said the Democrats have to respond.

"This is not a surge; it's an escalation, and we want to make sure the definition is correct," he said. "When the American people voted for change in November, this is not what they had in mind."

Capitol Hill Prepares For Tough Hearings On Iraq (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 8, 2007

Even before President Bush lays out his "new way forward" in Iraq, the Demo-cratic majority in Congress and a growing number of Republicans say they will oppose any troop surge - but not to the point of blocking funding for the war.

That means a key aspect of the president's plan, expected to be unveiled this week, will run into a wall of words on Capitol Hill, but not much more.

"We're not going to fight their civil war for them," says Rep. Ellen Tauscher (D) of California, who chairs the strategic forces subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee. She supports a shift of existing US forces out of areas of sectarian violence.

But if the president insists on adding forces into the most troubled areas, would she vote to deny him the funds to carry out his plan? "No," she says. "That's why he's got us over a barrel."

Still, oversight hearings convening across Capitol Hill, beginning this week, mark an escalation in congressional opposition to the war, including among members of the president's own party.

Beginning Tuesday new Democratic committee chairmen are launching hearings on issues ranging from military strategy, reconstruction, and diplomacy in the region to the Iraqi refugee crisis.

"We will use these hearings to ask tough questions, demand real solutions, and keep working to bring this war to a close," said Senate majority leader Harry Reid, in the Democratic response to Bush's weekly radio address on Saturday.

Citing the advice of current and past military leaders, Democratic leaders on the Hill are opposing any move to pour additional troops into Iraq, even before Bush announces his plan. Instead, they called on him to begin a "phased redeployment" of US forces in the next four to six months, shifting the mission from combat to "training, logistics, force protection, and counterterror."

"Adding more combat troops will only endanger more Americans and stretch our military to the breaking point for no strategic gain," said Senator Reid and Speaker Nancy Pelosi in a joint letter to the president Friday.

But they, too, say they will not block funding for the war. "It's not on the table," said Reid, after a briefing Friday.

Leading off this month's blitz of Iraq hearings, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is set to convene a closed intelligence briefing Tuesday afternoon. In all, it plans a dozen hearings on the war this month. These hearings, says chairman Joseph Biden (D) of Delaware, will be "workmanlike," rather than sensational. They are intended to give Americans a sober look at the state of play in Iraq and build consensus for a way forward. "No foreign policy can be sustained in this country without the informed consent of the American people," he adds.

Even in a time of diminishing public support for the war, lawmakers are wary of challenging the president as commander in chief, especially if they could later be tied into losing a war.

"I think to basically begin to withdraw before the job is finished is a mistake. If the president recommends what we seem to believe he's going to recommend, I intend to support him," said Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell, in an interview on Fox News on Sunday.

Yet Congress's ability to influence Bush, should he decide to send tens of thousands of new forces into Iraq, is "very limited," says Norman Ornstein, senior fellow at the American Enterprise Institute. "Theoretically, they could block the funding, but practically, it's not going to happen.

"The American people may not like this war but if you do something that undercuts the commander in chief and creates a potential for chaos, voters will blame you for decades," he adds.

Meanwhile, new Republican opposition to the war is surfacing in Congress. On Friday, Rep. Heather Wilson (R) of New Mexico staked out early opposition to any plan to add more troops in the region.

"I am not a supporter of a surge to do for Iraqis what they will not do for themselves," she said, after returning from a trip to Iraq last week.

But she would not vote to stop funding the war. "The answer is never to stop paying for food for our soldiers. We can't do that," she adds.

Representative Wilson, who served in the Air Force from 1978-89, is one of several Republicans who cite recent trips to the region as the basis for their dissent. In December, Sens. Norm Coleman (R) of Minnesota and Gordon Smith (R) of Oregon broke ranks with the White House on Iraq.

In support of the White House, Sens. John McCain (R) of Arizona and Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, who calls himself an Independent Democrat, stepped up calls for a sustained surge of US forces into Iraq.

"I believe the war is still winnable, but we're going to have to do everything right," said Senator McCain, in a speech before the American Enterprise Institute Friday. "The worst of all worlds is a small, short surge of American forces," he says. A time-limited deployment signals to insurgents that they "can wait it out," McCain says.

A majority of Americans are against increasing troop levels in Iraq. Only about 1 in 5 voters supports sending in more troops, according to a recent survey by the Cook Political Report.

And the intensity of hearings and debate this month could step up pressure on the Bush White House. "In a democracy, you simply cannot go on indefinitely, if you have lost the public, and there's increasing opposition from an increasing share of the political elite. It's an extremely difficult political environment," says Mr. Ornstein.

McCain Vs. Hagel: Two Views On The War (NSWK)

By Jonathan Darman, Richard Wolffe And Evan Thomas

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

War itself is a foreign concept to many solons of Capitol Hill; a small number—perhaps as few as 25 out of 535—have come under fire in combat. John McCain and Chuck Hagel are obvious and visible exceptions. McCain, a Republican from Arizona, was a Navy bomber pilot, shot down and imprisoned by the North Vietnamese for five and a half years. He has, he sometimes says, "more scars than Frankenstein." Hagel, a Republican from Nebraska, was an Army grunt in Vietnam who won two Purple Hearts and still has shrapnel in his chest. Both men have seen the face of war up close. But on the question of the Iraq war, they are almost mirror opposites.

Hagel is "obsessed" with the war in Iraq, says his brother Tom, who served with him in Vietnam. "You can't have a conversation with him without this coming up." During Christmas, Hagel looked "markedly older and grayer than when I saw him this summer down at the beach," says Tom. In an interview with NEWSWEEK last week, Hagel teared up when he began talking about a Purple Heart ceremony he had attended in August in Lincoln, Neb. "You're sitting there thinking, Was this a waste?" said Hagel, who voted for the original congressional resolution backing the war despite raising serious doubts about whether the invasion made sense. He added, somewhat uncomfortably, that at times he wonders whether he has done enough to try to stop the war.

Hagel is not pushing for "Out Now." But he is almost angrily dismissive of the idea of sending an additional 10,000 to 20,000 troops to Iraq. "Are we going to pacify Baghdad?" he asks. "Are we going to break the militia's stronghold? Are we going to use these troops to propel or force a settlement between the Shias and the Sunnis? What's the objective of it? I will guarantee that there's going to be a lot more American casualties. And there's going to be a lot more animosity by the Iraqis." The idea that the Iraqis will respond only to more troops, he says, is "complete folly, unless you're going to kill all the Iraqis."

McCain, by contrast, was almost dispassionate when he told a NEWSWEEK reporter that he wishes to expand the war in Iraq. His attitude was coolly self-assured. "All of us establish records," he says about his repeated calls for more troops in Iraq. "If I was wrong in the beginning, my credibility might be somewhat less now." McCain suggests that the Bush administration, now scrambling to find enough fresh troops to "surge" in Iraq, should have listened to him all along. "I hate to sound so 'I told you so,' but I've been saying we've got to have a larger Army and Marine Corps for a long, long time." McCain can sound a little matter-of-fact about sending young people off to combat, but he marches to a different drummer than most Americans. His 18-year-old son Jimmy, a newly enlisted Marine, may soon be deployed to Iraq, the fourth-generation McCain to go to war.

Hagel and McCain are likely to be increasingly prominent spokesmen for their opposing views on Iraq. McCain is almost surely running for the Republican nomination for president, and Hagel has often been mentioned as a candidate, though he says he has yet to decide if he is running. Both men will be heard from early and often as the debate on Iraq moves to Capitol Hill this winter. As an institution, Congress has by and large taken a pass on the war, voting on a resolution in favor at the outset, but ever since shying away from using the legislative power of the purse or oversight authority. The November elections, by bestowing power on the Democrats, may embolden Congress. This week Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman Joseph Biden of Delaware, an outspoken critic of the war, will hold the first of many confrontational hearings that will keep Bush's war cabinet trooping up the Hill to defend the president and his policies for weeks, and probably months, to come.

The president seems determined to defy his detractors, not to mention popular opinion. This week Bush is expected to announce a "New Way Forward" on Iraq that will call for more troops to try to bring order and political stability to Baghdad. (There has been some uprooting in his own administration, with White House counsel Harriet Miers eased out, presumably for a tougher fighter in the congressional wars ahead; National Intelligence Director John Negroponte resigned to become the deputy secretary of State, for his Iraq experience and to keep an eye on North Korea and Iran, and Gen. David Petraeus, a much-admired Airborne vet with a Princeton Ph.D., was named to run the Iraq war on the ground.) To Bush's many critics, like Hagel, the new Iraq strategy adds up to a waste of more American lives. To Bush's smaller and dwindling band of supporters, like McCain, failure in Iraq is unthinkable. And if duty requires more sacrifice, then so be it.

A senior Bush aide, who declined to be named discussing internal White House strategy, tells NEWSWEEK that the president's way-forward plan will be a middle-road approach that falls somewhere between McCain's and Hagel's positions. He will call for a staggered troop increase based on benchmarks for the Iraqis' performance. Bush hopes to avoid the failures of previous security plans designed by Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki. This time, unlike in past sweeps of Baghdad, Iraqi troops need to fulfill the basic obligation of reporting for duty. There can be no "no go" areas based on sectarian lines and no political interference in security operations. "You literally had a situation where Iraqi security forces would get a call on their cell phone from a politician saying, 'Don't do that, don't go after so-and-so'," the aide says.

Who's right—McCain or Hagel? One way to understand the debate is to examine how two outspoken war veterans have called upon their experiences in Vietnam to wind up in completely different places on Iraq. McCain and Hagel are friends, members of a small, tight fraternity of lawmakers who have been bloodied by war. McCain teasingly calls Hagel "Sarge," and Hagel once gave McCain the seat of an A-4 bomber—the same type of seat McCain was flying in when he broke his arms ejecting from a burning plane over North Vietnam. But when Hagel is asked about their split on Iraq now, his face tightens. McCain, like Hagel, glosses over any discussion of the private debate that has raged between the two men, though he admits it "divides friends."

Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who is close to both men (but sides with McCain on the war), lays out the basic differences between them. "Chuck believes the war in Iraq has deflected from the war on terror, that it was a war of choice," says Graham. "John sees Iraq more like Bush, in that he sees it as the central front on the war on terror, and it was unavoidable."

When McCain and Hagel argue about the Iraq war, says a mutual friend who did not wish to be identified discussing their private conversations, both men often invoke Vietnam. After their own wartime service, each man read deeply about the history of the Vietnam War but reached different conclusions about its meaning. While Hagel hammers away at the similarities between

Iraq and Vietnam, McCain often begins sentences by saying, "Unlike Vietnam ... " In one recent chat, says the source, McCain challenged Hagel by arguing that the North Vietnamese were no threat "to our shores," whereas "the people we are finding in Iraq are."

The two men saw the war from sharply different angles. Chuck Hagel "walked point" with an infantry company near the Cambodian border in some of the worst fighting in 1967 and '68. His brother Tom often went on patrol with him (the brothers circumvented an Army rule that bars family members from serving in combat together). "I don't know how many times we would be assigned to go out for a search-and-destroy mission," Tom recalls, "and we'd pass South Vietnamese villages with South Vietnamese soldiers lying around sleeping in hammocks. They're doing easy duty while we were out doing the hard part." The lesson to the Hagel brothers was obvious: "You cannot win somebody else's independence," says Tom. "They have to do it for themselves."

Ground-pounder Tom says that while he respects McCain's service, the bomber pilot could not have known what reality was like down in the jungle: "He was up in the air at 10,000 feet. He never saw the consequences of those bombs." (Tom is a Democrat who's tussled with his brother on partisan politics.) McCain acknowledges that different perspectives can produce different outlooks on the war. He brings up one of Hagel and McCain's mutual friends, Gen. Colin Powell, whose Vietnam service bred a strong reluctance to intervene in a foreign conflict without overwhelming force and a clear exit strategy—the so-called Powell Doctrine. "One of the most impactful experiences of Colin's life was holding a dying soldier in his arms in the battlefield in Vietnam," says McCain. "I can see how that would have a very significant impression on him."

McCain does acknowledge one key difference between him and Hagel. "I know Chuck Hagel came home from the war to a very hostile environment in America," says McCain. (Returning GIs were sometimes jeered and even spat upon in airports; they learned to change quickly into civilian clothes.) By the time McCain was released from captivity in 1973, however, "the POWs came home to a welcoming America," says McCain. "We were the only heroes of the Vietnam War." McCain has played the hero ever since, usually with self-deprecating charm. He's unafraid to call for the sacrifices he was willing to make himself; Hagel just wanted the Vietnam War to end, and now he wants to limit what he sees as needless sacrifice in Iraq.

The differences between Hagel and McCain transcend their war experiences. Hagel is the classic citizen-soldier, in a tradition that goes back to George Washington and to ancient times. The ideal is the Roman general Cincinnatus, who left his prosperous farm to rescue the Roman republic—but then returned to domestic life when the fighting was done. Hagel was a draftee who was sent to Germany by the Army but volunteered for duty in Vietnam. When he came home, he made money as an investment banker (and learned something about dealmaking and compromise) before running for Congress in 1996.

McCain, by contrast, is an American samurai, a member of a professional warrior caste. It is revealing that when the young McCain contemplated dropping out of the U.S. Naval Academy in the late 1950s, it wasn't to become Joe College and drink beer. He thought of enlisting in the French Foreign Legion. (McCain's eldest son, 20-year-old Jack—John S. McCain IV—is in his second year at Annapolis.) McCain's book, "Faith of My Fathers," begins with the scene of his grandfather, Adm. John (Slew) McCain, torn by existential angst as he sat in his cabin on an aircraft carrier awaiting Japan's final capitulation in World War II. "Well, this surrender has come as a kind of a shock to all of us," McCain tells a fellow officer. "I feel lost. I don't know what to do. I know how to fight, but now I don't know whether I know how to relax or not. I'm in an awful letdown." Admiral McCain died of a heart attack less than a week later.

McCain himself turned down early release from the Hanoi Hilton because he did not want to get special treatment: his father, John S. McCain Jr., a sub captain in World War II, was by this time commander of the Pacific Fleet. Though McCain contemplated suicide, he decided torture was better than letting down his forebears. For McCain, nothing is worse than defeat in battle. He concedes that a surge in Iraq will impose "a terrific strain" on the military but warns that the alternative is a disaster. "There's only one thing worse," he says, "and that's a defeated Army. I saw a defeated Army and Marine Corps in 1973 and it took us a long, long time to rebuild. Because when armies are defeated, it's not just a matériel problem, it's a morale problem."

Hagel has a long, sad face, one side of which was seared by the flash of an exploding enemy mine almost four decades ago. But he is almost gleeful when he talks about the coming debate on Iraq. He thinks Congress will awaken from its passivity and begin questioning how Bush is spending blood and treasure on Iraq. "The administration is going to be forced to come up and explain, 'Where is the money going?' " says Hagel. He rejects the notion that the newly Democratic-controlled Congress will shy away from cutting off at least some of the funding for the war. (The somewhat cynical view on Capitol Hill is that the Democrats will let Bush have the money—and also the responsibility for a failed policy.) He foresees Congress's agreeing to pay for existing force levels—but not to send more troops. The White House, he says, can no longer bully Republican members into submission. "The Republican Party has to go through an election next year, the president doesn't," says Hagel. "There are a lot of Republicans in this conference that are very scared."

McCain, needless to say, is not one of them. He plans to push back. The president is often asked, he notes, what will happen if the surge fails. "I think it's fair to ask my friends who want withdrawal, what's their Plan B?" says McCain, who does not include Hagel in the cut-and-run crowd. "What is their scenario as to how we handle the ensuing chaos that will be almost impossible to avoid?" McCain was at once smiling and seething. (When McCain says "my friend" to a "single, luckless individual ... through clenched teeth and frozen smile," notes Todd Purdum in the new Vanity Fair, it "means McCain is ready to blow.") Both McCain and Hagel are clearly girding for battle. For these two men, the fighting is never really over.

How The U.S. Is Losing The PR War In Iraq (NSWK)

By Scott Johnson

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

For nearly four years, U.S. military officials have briefed the Baghdad press corps from behind an imposing wooden podium. No longer. Last week U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell relaxed with reporters around a "media roundtable." He replaced the cumbersome headset once used for Arabic translations with a discreet earpiece. He cut short his opening statement, allowing for more back-and-forth banter. Yet even as Iraq emerged from the deadliest month in 2006 for American soldiers, Caldwell maintained the relentlessly upbeat patter that has come to characterize the briefings. "The key difference you're going to see in 2007," he said proudly, "is this is truly the year of transition and adaptation."

Another year, another message. In the United States this week, President George W. Bush's speech laying out his new strategy for Iraq will be scrutinized for its specifics—the numbers of an anticipated troop surge, the money for reconstruction and jobs programs. But at least as critical to success may be whether Bush is convincing. A draft report recently produced by the Baghdad embassy's director of strategic communications Ginger Cruz and obtained by NEWSWEEK makes the stakes clear: "Without popular support from US population, there is the risk that troops will be pulled back ... Thus there is a vital need to save popular support via message." Under the heading DOMESTIC MESSAGES, Cruz goes on to recommend 16 themes to reinforce with the American public, several of which Bush is likely to hit: "vitally important we succeed"; "actively working on new approaches"; "there are no quick or easy answers."

What's even more telling is that the IRAQI MESSAGES—the very next section—are still "TBD," to be determined. Indeed, the document so much as admits that despite spending hundreds of millions of dollars, the United States has lost the battle for Iraqi public opinion: "Insurgents, sectarian elements, and others are taking control of the message at the public level." Videos of U.S. soldiers being shot and blown up, and of the bloody work of sectarian death squads, are now pervasive. The images inspire new recruits and intimidate those who might stand against them. "Inadequate message control in Iraq," the draft warns, "is feeding the escalating cycle of violence." (A U.S. Embassy spokesperson claims the document reflects Cruz's personal views, not official policy.)

Sunni insurgents in particular have become expert at using technology to underscore—some would say exaggerate—their effectiveness. "The sophistication of the way the enemy is using the news media is huge," Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the former commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, told NEWSWEEK just before he returned to the United States. Most large-scale attacks on U.S. forces are now filmed, often from multiple camera angles, and with high-resolution cameras. The footage is slickly edited into dramatic narratives: quick-cut images of Humvees exploding or U.S. soldiers being felled by snipers are set to inspiring religious soundtracks or chanting, which lends them a triumphal feel. In some cases, U.S. officials believe, insurgents attack American forces primarily to generate fresh footage.

Guerrillas have always sought alternative technologies to undermine their better-equipped enemies. What's different now is the power and accessibility of such tools. Production work that once required a studio can now be done on a laptop. Compilation videos of attacks on U.S. forces sell in Baghdad markets for as little as 50 cents on video CDs. Advancements in cell-phone technology have made such devices particularly useful. Their small video files—the filming of Saddam Hussein's hanging took up just over one megabyte—are especially easy to download and disseminate. "Literally, it's only hours after an attack and [the videos] are available," says Andrew Garfield, a British counterinsurgency expert who has advised U.S. forces in Baghdad. "You can really say it's only a cell-phone call away."

What the insurgents understand better than the Americans is how Iraqis consume information. Tapes of beheadings are stored on cell phones along with baby pictures and wedding videos. Popular Arab satellite channels like Al-Jazeera and Al-Arabiya air far more graphic images than are typically seen on U.S. TV—leaving the impression, say U.S. military officials, that America is on the run. At the extreme is the Zawra channel, run by former Sunni parliamentarian Mishan Jibouri, who fled to Syria last year after being accused of corruption. (Jibouri says he's being persecuted for political reasons, and can return to Iraq whenever he wants.) Since November the channel has been spewing out an unending series of videos showing American soldiers being killed in sniper and IED attacks. The clips are accompanied by commentary, often in English, admonishing Iraqis to "focus your utmost rage against the occupation." Among Sunnis and even some Shiites, Zawra has become one of the most popular stations in Iraq. "I get e-mails from girls in their 20s from Arab countries; some of them are very wealthy," Jibouri boasts. "Some offer to work for free, some offer money."

The U.S. military's response, on the other hand, usually sticks to traditional channels like press releases. These can take hours to prepare and are often outdated by the time they're issued. Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, director of the military's press operations in Baghdad until this past September, complains that all military-related information has to be processed upward through a laborious and bureaucratic chain of command. "The military wants to control the environment around it, but as we try to [do so], it only slows us down further," he says. "All too often, the easiest decision we made was just not to talk about [the story] at all, and then you absolutely lose your ability to frame what's going on."

An even bigger problem, say other U.S. officials, may be the message itself. The videos on Zawra are powerful precisely because they confirm the preconceptions many Iraqis have about the occupation. Col. William Darley, editor of the influential Military Review at the Combined Arms Center in Fort Leavenworth, Kans., argues that merely changing podiums in the briefing room misses the point. "You can cook up a kind of shrewd, New York City-style advertising campaign for a candy bar, and if the candy bar tastes lousy, you can't sell it," says Darley. "If Iraq has no electricity, spotty medical care, no security, then [we] cannot succeed."

The consequences of losing the propaganda battle are real. "One of these videos is worth a division of tanks to those people," says Robert Steele, a former U.S. Marine Corps intelligence officer. Not only do the insurgent videos draw recruits and donations, they don't give ordinary Iraqis much incentive to cooperate with the Americans. Videos put out by sectarian death squads, like the one shown to NEWSWEEK by the watchdog SITE institute in which a Sunni militiaman saws the head off a Shiite prisoner with a five-inch knife, enrage the targeted community. The release of the ghoulish video of Saddam's hanging prompted thousands of Sunnis to protest in Anbar province. Residents of Fallujah—the target of a multimillion-dollar hearts-and-minds campaign—renamed the city's main thoroughfare the Street of the Martyr Saddam Hussein.

The damage goes beyond Iraq. Al Qaeda's media arm, As-Sahab ("The Cloud") has similarly improved the quality and frequency of its videos; the group, says former State Department adviser Philip Zelikow, uses "the Internet to provide a sense of virtual identity" now that its Afghan training camps have largely been destroyed. The question is how to fight back, when today's most powerful technologies—the Web, cell phones—are better suited to small, nimble organizations. Back in the 1930s national leaders could almost wholly control the framing of their messages, says Donald Shaw, a professor of media theory at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill who has written about reforms for military public-affairs officers. But now, "the podium has lost its influence." For those who once stood behind it, that message at least is very clear.

New Faces, a New Plan, as Bush Nears His Endgame

President Bush shook up his administration last week, putting in place the lead elements of a new team to deal with military and diplomatic policy in Iraq-and even with Congress. The changes carried the feel of a president knowing that as he describes new policy, new faces will be needed to carry it out. First to move was John Negroponte, the first director of national intelligence. He'll take charge of Iraq policy as a deputy to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. On the military side, Bush will replace Gen. John Abizaid, who commanded U.S. forces in the Middle East, and Gen. George Casey, the top general in Iraq. Abizaid had planned to retire in March. Taking his post will be Adm. William Fallon, the chief U.S. commander in the Pacific, and Casey will be replaced by Gen. David Petraeus, who had been in charge of training Iraqi security forces. On the home front, Bush will be replacing White House counsel Harriet Miers as he girds for investigations by the new Democratic Congress.

So Now We're All Fiscal Conservatives

Democrats saw chicanery, but Republicans smelled political reality in President Bush's announcement last week that he will seek a balanced budget in five years and an end to pork-barrel politics. Bush, after all, had taken a budget of surplus and turned it into one of deficit, but now he seemed to be adopting the new Democratic majority's fiscal pledges. Insiders at the White House spun it a different way: They said the president had hoped to push for deeper tax cuts in the next and future budgets, but the election of Democratic majorities in the House and Senate killed those plans. Now, they said, the president will submit a budget for fiscal 2008 that will leave little room for new Democratic add-ons without deeply cutting into defense spending or raising taxes.

The Give-Him-Enough-Rope Strategy

With his big speech on Iraq expected this week, President Bush's strategists say he has a lot more latitude in setting a new policy than his antiwar critics realize-at least for the next few months. "The Democrats are going to be in a real bind," says a Republican insider with close ties to the White House. "The president will come out with a strong plan to get order in Baghdad, and if the Democrats do anything to undermine or block it, it will look to Americans as though they wouldn't give his plan a chance." The strategist predicts that "their tendency will be to give the president a free hand and blame him if doesn't work." This could be a clever political gambit, but it also would give Bush one more chance to get things right in Iraq. Says one Bush aide: "The White House now feels that urgency."

For Those Who Predicted His Demise...

He is showing no signs of leaving, as some had predicted. Indeed, White House political guru Karl Rove is as aggressive as ever in making policy arguments-his main theme being that Republicans lost the congressional elections because they didn't sufficiently live up to their core conservative ideals. And his influence is still pervasive, sources say. For instance, GOP insiders suspect that Rove had a big hand in distancing Bush from the Iraq Study Group because he believed the bipartisan panel was too critical of current Iraq policy. Rove, aides say, believes that victory is still achievable and that Bush should pursue it as vigorously as he can.

PHOTO OP: 9:47 a.m., January 5, the Roosevelt Room

He had served in the new post of director of national intelligence only two years, hardly enough time to unify the nation's 16 disparate spy agencies. But last week John Negroponte was moving on to direct Iraq policy at the State Department. His replacement, President Bush announced, would be retired Navy Vice Adm. Michael McConnell (right).

Fineman: Sidestepping The 'Surge' (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

Before Barack Obama was a senator, he opposed the war in Iraq. Now that he is one, he says that sending more troops would be "a mistake that compounds the president's original mistake." But don't expect Obama—or most other Dems—to try to block George W. Bush when he asks Congress in the coming weeks for another billion-dollar bundle for the war. The party won't deny the funds, and may not even try to attach conditions to them. Obama made that clear last week when I saw him in his office, a sunny space filled with portraits of Thurgood Marshall, Abraham Lincoln, Mohandas Gandhi and Muhammad Ali. "To anticipate your question," said the Harvard-trained lawyer, "is Congress going to be willing to exercise its control over the purse strings to affect White House policy? I am doubtful that that is something we are willing to do in the first year."

Marriages of convenience are common in Washington. The war in Iraq is producing the opposite: a divorce of calculation. President Bush has no evident interest in consulting with, let alone drawing in, the new Democratic Congress as a war partner.

An example: the new chair of the Senate Armed Services Committee—Carl Levin, an important character now—sent Bush a private letter three weeks ago offering his counsel. Levin never got a reply. Bush can be just as deaf to Republicans. At a recent White House ceremony, Sen. Susan Collins offered to brief him on her Iraq visit. He responded by escorting her to the office of his deputy national-security adviser—and then left before she told her story.

Even as they decried the "surge" and declared that it is "time to bring the war to a close," Democrats offered reasons for staying out of Bush's way. Obama took the safest ground. "I cannot in good conscience," he said, "cut off funding for our troops that are already there." He and others will insist that future requests be included in the regular budget. Sen. Joe Biden, whose Foreign Relations Committee will launch hearings on the war this week, said that Congress's role is simply too limited to be effective. "It's all about the separation of powers," he said. Last month he told Bush: "This is your war, Mr. President, and there's nothing we can do to stop you."

The Democrats may not really want to. Party leaders (especially Nancy Pelosi) fear being branded as "weak on defense" if they kicked off in Congress with antiwar maneuvers. Rather than do that, said Biden and Sen. Chris Dodd, the best strategy for now is to try to dig out the facts and educate the public. Only Republicans have the leverage to pressure Bush to change course, Biden said.

In the meantime, Democrats know a classic "wedge issue" when they see one. With 21 Republicans up for re-election, Democrats would be happy to witness full-scale GOP infighting, which could catch the Republicans' '08 front runner, Sen. John McCain, in the crossfire. Democratic strategists say it would be politically foolish to help Bush by crafting a bipartisan war policy. "Why should we try to come up with a compromise policy with him?" asks Mike Ward, a former congressman who was back at the Capitol for opening-day festivities. "If we do that, we take ownership of the war. Why would we want to do that?" Only one reason I could think of: to end the war faster so that the troops could come home.

After The 100-Hour Show Comes The Slog (USNEWS)

By Alex Kingsbury

U.S. News and World Report, January 8, 2007

The new Democratic majority in Congress has tasked itself with an ambitious opening salvo for the 110th session of the national legislature: raising the federal minimum wage, passing the still-outstanding recommendations of the 9/11 commission, and halving the interest rates on student loans. But Democrats have a robust agenda beyond that first 100 hours. Here's a glimpse at what's coming on Capitol Hill in the weeks and months ahead.

DEFENSE

House Dems have promised hearings into how the war in Iraq has been handled, with scrutiny in a range of committees expected to turn on contractor oversight, force readiness, and the president's forthcoming plan in Iraq. Over on the Senate side, expect three hearings on Iraq this month alone. And Congress will almost certainly consider expanding the size of the Army and Marine Corps, a measure that is expected to receive broad support on both sides of the aisle.

INTELLIGENCE

Expect investigations on controversial intelligence programs launched by President Bush, including the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program and the CIA's secret prison and renditions program. The Senate Intelligence Committee, meanwhile, will tackle a task not finished in either of the past two years-passing an authorization bill for the $44 billion intelligence community for the next fiscal year. But most of the committees' work will remain behind closed doors: Hearings will be held this month on the threats to Iraq from its neighbors, as well as on current and emerging safe havens for terrorists.

IMMIGRATION

Very soon Democrat Ted Kennedy and Republican John McCain will introduce a Senate bill allowing 12 million illegal immigrants in the country to qualify for legal status after paying fines and some back taxes. That's a marked departure from the compromise bill passed in the Senate last year, which grouped immigrants into three categories and had some go home while others could stay. The Senate aims to pass a bill in March or April, while the House will most likely tackle the issue this summer or fall.

HOMELAND SECURITY

Improving radio communications between fire and rescue personnel will be one of the easiest 9/11 commission recommendations to enact; Democrats plan to create new grants specifically for communications equipment. Requiring the inspection of all sea and air cargo, on the other hand, has industry groups howling, including airlines still reeling from financial woes. The Transportation Security Administration, meanwhile, is bracing for a potential congressional push to unionize 43,000 aviation screeners.

JUDICIARY

Sen. Patrick Leahy wants to crack down on war profiteering, and he's promising to implement the Iraq Study Group recommendations to develop the devastated country's judicial system and train its police force. GOP Sen. Arlen Specter last week joined Leahy in reintroducing a bill that would restore habeas corpus rights to permanent U.S. residents who were among noncitizens stripped by Congress of the ability to challenge imprisonment in court. The administration's data-mining programs will immediately come under scrutiny in a committee hearing this week.

HEALTHCARE

Bipartisan support might be in the offing for reauthorization and possible expansion of the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which provides health insurance to 4 million low-income children whose parents don't qualify for Medicaid. But the program could test Democratic pay-as-you-go promises. The House Committee on Energy and Commerce will examine the drug approval processes in various bills that affect pharmaceutical and medical device makers.

BUDGET AND TAXES

Don't expect any action to either extend or eliminate the 2001 and 2003 tax cuts, both scheduled to expire in 2010. Temporary patches to the alternative minimum tax are more likely, once again raising exemption amounts to prevent it from ensnaring millions in the middle class. Complicating efforts to pass the estimated $45 billion fix will be budget rules that would require new tax cuts or spending to be paid for through budget cuts or new taxes. One way forward might be closing the estimated $300 billion "tax gap" between what taxpayers theoretically ought to pay and what actually comes in to the IRS.

EDUCATION

Two big-ticket items are up for reauthorization: the Higher Education Act, funding colleges and universities, and the No Child Left Behind Act, which allocates federal K-12 dollars. Both are mammoth pieces of legislation that will take time to hash out. Many education watchers don't foresee NCLB being reauthorized until after the 2008 elections. While cuts in student loan interest rates may come in the first 100 hours, the promised increased funding for Pell grants will be discussed in the appropriations process.

ENVIRONMENT

Rep. Nick Rahall, chair of the House Resources Committee, is pursuing the loss of billions of dollars in oil-drilling royalties due to "mismanagement" by the Interior Department. On the Senate side, a raft of global warming proposals will be floated to a Congress that has routinely dismissed measures to mandate cuts in greenhouse gases. The Democratic leadership is hopeful that growing public support for such a bill will sway some conservatives. McCain might reintroduce a bill he cowrote with Sen. Joe Lieberman that placed mandatory caps on emissions, while other bills favor a cap-and-trade system similar to that of the Kyoto protocol.

One Last Chance (USNEWS)

By Brian Duffy

U.S. News and World Report, January 7, 2007

Moments of genuine opportunity present themselves so rarely these days that they have become increasingly difficult to recognize. But one may be upon us now. As Washington begins to take up the hard work of government again, with Democrats and their slender majority in the Congress facing a seemingly chastened but still-determined president in the White House, some of the inspiring and much-deserved words of praise for President Gerald Ford's historic stewardship are worthy of reflection by both sides.

Fate can be a mighty strange casting agent. Who would have guessed that it would be Donald Rumsfeld, of all people, in his elegant eulogy, who would capture Ford's spirit so exquisitely as to frame the central failure of our public life today? Within days of Ford's replacing Richard Nixon in the Oval Office, Rumsfeld, Ford's former chief of staff, reminded us, "we saw him welcome advice from Democrats and Republicans alike."

Wow. What a concept.

History be damned, it seems. It is not just fashionable these days but almost Pavlovian to assume that Democrats can have no truck whatever with Republicans-and vice versa-when it comes to any real issues of consequence. It's nice to hear all the earnest talk about ethics reform by the new Democratic majority on Capitol Hill, but we've seen this play before. From the White House, the president tepidly offers outreach, then in the next breath warns the Democrats against even dreaming about messing with his cherished tax cuts. In the next few days, we will hear all kinds of talk from the leadership of both parties about cooperation and coming together. But if it all turns out to be just a lot of palaver, this moment of opportunity will have been lost, and another, very different, one may take its place. More on that in a moment.

For now, Iraq will suck almost all the political air from the room. Democrats promise vigorous oversight, and given their all-but-total abdication on the issue heretofore and the administration's abject mismanagement of postwar operations there, that's as it should be. Obsession with toll-taking alone, however, would be a mistake. Democrats have no real mandate to govern-their seizure of the House and Senate in November was a mandate only to constrain the Bush team from governing. Iraq, of course, is Exhibit A in the voters' misfeasance indictment of the administration. Historians will take years to sort out the ultimate cost of the American misadventure there, beyond the terrible toll in blood and treasure. One hopes fervently that President Bush, having belatedly acknowledged the serial failures of his team in Mesopotamia and having spent the past several weeks intensively searching for a new solution, will come up with one. Democrats may be sorely tempted to let the administration stew in its own juices on Iraq, but the stakes are far too high for such cynical partisanship-especially when the daily drumbeat of casualties continues.

Sharing? What to do? Ever suspect, Washington's conventional wisdom suggests no serious possibility of a return to the sense of shared purpose the capital saw three decades ago in the rancorous days after the Nixon pardon. (The war between the Ford White House and Capitol Hill was bitter enough, but by today's dismal standards, it was waged according to Marquess of Queensberry rules.) Indeed, things may be so far gone in Washington today that the mere expression of such a wish seems to many Pollyanna-ish. Still, it bears remembering that after Ronald Reagan was felled by John Hinckley's bullet, the first person he summoned to his hospital bed after his wife, Nancy, was Tip O'Neill, the quintessential Democrat and Reagan nemesis. The two men prayed together. If no such outreach or sense of shared purpose emerges between Democrats and Republicans in the weeks to come, that could be too bad-for both parties. And this is where that second, now unlooked for, moment of opportunity could present itself. Today, because no majority of Americans identify themselves with either major political party, the crucial slice of the electoral pie is composed of independent voters. Add to that sobering fact voters' clarion call in November for competence and accountability, and you have a potentially combustible political brew.

Nearly a century ago, a patriotic egomaniac named Teddy Roosevelt made a very credible run for the White House as a third-party candidate. It could happen again, and it may well. (Paging Mayor Bloomberg!) That could be a fine and wonderful thing for the nation. But wouldn't it be so much finer if, at this time of critical change and challenge, our elected leaders could somehow ignore the long-ingrained penchant for payback and partisanship and find a way to set us on a more promising and responsible course the way that selfless patriot from Michigan did in one of our nation's darkest hours?

A Problem Province (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, January 7, 2007

BAQUBAH, IRAQ-U.S. military officials here have little trouble knowing when al Qaeda is exerting its influence in this city that was, once upon a time, the lush, orange-growing capital of the Mideast. Sometimes it's the subtle signs: Tomatoes and cucumbers start disappearing from the market, deemed too sexually suggestive, soldiers here say, by the Sunni fundamentalist terrorists. On other occasions, it's more overt: "Graffiti that says, 'Long live al Qaeda,' and stupid stuff like that," explains a U.S.

military officer based here in what is now the capital of Diyala province. Mostly, though, the pressure has been bold and deadly: the heads of rival Shiites, stuffed in fruit crates, and phone calls designed to intimidate schoolteachers from teaching or tellers from opening banks.

For this, there has been retaliation. Shiite militias have been called into Baqubah at the behest of beleaguered Shiites, often arriving from strongholds such as Baghdad's Sadr City to provide protection against a Sunni insurgency that has driven thousands of Shiite families from their homes. "The Shiites get pushed around by Sunnis, and JAM shows up," says the officer. JAM, or Jaish al-Mahdi, is also known as the Mahdi Army militia, which is loyal to Moqtada al-Sadr, a fiery Shiite cleric from Sadr City-and his gunmen arrive well supplied.

U.S. military officials here say the geography of Diyala is what the Fulda Gap was to West Germany: a perfect avenue for infiltration. The province shares a porous 170-mile-long border with Shiite-led Iran-a border that allows trafficked arms from the country to flow through Diyala and, often, down into Baghdad.

Today, more than six months after the U.S. military killed al Qaeda strongman Abu Musab Zarqawi in a dense palm grove outside Baqubah-and turned security responsibilities over to the Iraqi Army-Diyala is second only to Baghdad in per capita crime and kidnappings. Once known as the nation's melting pot, a "little Iraq" with a mix of Sunnis and Shiites, Diyala today lies on a violent fault line where residents tend to agree on just one thing: It is land worth fighting for. The area sits on a tributary of the Tigris and boasts dates and pomegranates, untapped oil fields, and a plentiful water supply.

Sunnis make up the majority of the population of Diyala-55 percent compared with 30 percent Shiites. Yet in a province of 1.5 million that was once a popular retirement spot for many former Sunni Baathists, Shiites compose the majority of seated politicians-this, thanks to a Sunni boycott of elections two years ago. For similar reasons, security forces also are majority Shiite.

Now, as jockeying for control of the province continues between Sunnis and Shiites, the local police chief and an army commander-both Shiites-stand accused of using hit squads and mass arrests to wage a campaign of intimidation against the region's Sunni majority. It's not a pretty picture. Corruption, growing ethnic suspicion, intimidation, wanton killing: What's happening here provides a sobering window on the larger problems bedeviling both Iraqi authorities and American troops as they try to create a secure environment in a fledgling democracy. Late last week, President Bush chose new commanders to lead the war in Iraq. This week, he will announce a revamped strategy, likely to include an increase in troops and an economic incentives package. But the challenges of Diyala serve as a stark warning of just how tough it's going to be to right what's wrong in this beleaguered nation- where security is precarious and, for elected officials here, all too fleeting.

It was last year that Brig. Gen. Shakir Hulail Hussein al-Kaab, the Shiite commander of the area's 5th Iraqi Army Division, managed to enrage powerful Sunni sheiks here in a move that American military officials say haunts the province today: In mass sweeps, he rounded up hundreds of Sunnis who were later found to be innocent. In so doing, says a local official, "he drove the Sunnis into the arms of al Qaeda."

In the office of Col. David Sutherland, commander of the 3rd Brigade of the 1st Cavalry Division, two local Sunni leaders meet in the brigade's headquarters at Forward Operating Base Warhorse to raise their concerns. They have pulled out of Diyala's provincial council for the time being, pointing to the ongoing abuses they say the Sunnis are suffering at the hands of local police and Iraqi soldiers. They cite reports of soldiers destroying furniture and stealing jewelry in homes they raid, and torture by a Shakir subordinate nicknamed Colonel Cable, who has a reputation for beating prisoners on the soles of their feet-most likely, they add, at the police chief's behest. That chief, Ghassan al-Bawi, also a Shiite, "admitted that torture was going on," says a U.S. military official, "but he said they were only doing it to the bad guys."

Sutherland has brought the Sunni leaders here in the hopes of persuading them to rejoin the government. "We have more coverage on the holding facilities now," he reassures them. But they have other concerns. "When the Army was doing the raids in Sunni areas, they played cassette tapes-Shiite ceremonies on tape, songs of the Mahdi Army. This is the kind of army we're dealing with-very sectarian," says Hussein Abid al-Zubeidi, head of the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party. Hussein is still a member of the provisional council, but he's now participating only behind the scenes.

General Shakir for his part contends that his soldiers are not targeting Sunnis-that there are simply few Shiites left to arrest. Some 8,000, he says, have been killed, displaced, or have fled. Sutherland sympathizes with Hussein. "The action of individual soldiers-in houses, showing disrespect-is unacceptable. The people became disgusted and disillusioned." Adds Sutherland of General Shakir: "His actions are indicative of his mental model. And his mental model needs to be changed."

Mind games. U.S. forces here are banking on an operation taking place even as Hussein and Sutherland speak to help change the minds of local Sunnis. It is "a very targeted mission," Sutherland explains to Hussein, to drive out Sunni terrorists in an overrun area outside of Baqubah that has not been touched by U.S. forces for three years. U.S. and Iraqi soldiers will then rush in aid in the form of blankets, water, and kerosene for local Sunnis in the area-classic counterinsurgency strategy honed by Sutherland in his years as an Army tactical instructor. Much hinges on the operation as al Qaeda continues its bid for the region: Recently, U.S. military officials here discovered an extensive network of tunnels and a cache of several trailer-size containers, stocked with rocket-propelled grenades, arms, American dollars, and over half a million rounds of ammunition. "It was more AK-47s than I've given the Iraqi police in the last four months," Sutherland says.

Following the clearing operation, Sutherland and Shakir, the Shiite general, meet with some 70 local Sunni sheiks from across the province, some from towns near the Iranian border. Many take the meeting as a chance to air complaints about the conduct of the police and Army. "The Army doesn't care about military orders," says one frustrated sheik. "They care about religious orders coming from Sadr. They are no better than hit squads."

As he speaks, several cars roll up a nearby gravel road, and the sheiks turn toward the commotion. It is just a food delivery for the kebab feast to follow the meeting, but this is a group ever wary of assassination attempts, and the sheiks are reflexively on guard.

The public relations push continues the next day, as U.S. forces urge General Shakir to go on Iraqi television and take part in a press conference, to put a local face on the clearing operation. But the result is, in the words of one U.S. military official, a disaster: General Shakir refuses to answer journalists' questions, saying he does not have authorization from the Ministry of Defense. Ra'ad Rashid al-Tamini, Diyala's governor, a fellow Shiite, is irate. "Today he embarrassed us," Ra'ad later tells Sutherland. "Ask him a simple question, and he should answer it." Sutherland brings Ra'ad a bowl of ice cream from the cafeteria at the government center and tries to reassure him. We'll take a video and show him what he looked like," Sutherland says. "We'll coach him."

Aches and pains. Yet despite the coaching, General Shakir continues to be a headache for U.S. forces. "I don't know whether he has a sectarian agenda, but he's definitely a buffoon," says one U.S. officer later that week, as some 180 detainees are brought into a local police station. It is, say Iraqi and American officials here, another mass roundup. As dozens of detainees sit blindfolded on the floor awaiting their hearings, an Iraqi judge sifts through the case files on his lap. He reads the first. "This one is dismissed," he says, turning to coalition forces in the room. "I've got an idea," he says. "The Iraqi Army goes into a raid, and they get one target they go for-not take some innocents."

Though none of this does much to help Sunni-Shiite relations in the province, the biggest overlooked threat to the area's fledgling government, according to officials here, has actually been the tenure of Ghassan, the Shiite police chief, who has been running his own militia. Last year, U.S. sources add, Ghassan put in a call for some 250 Shiite gunmen from Baghdad and promptly added them to his police rosters upon their arrival. "He said he was creating his own highway patrol," one senior U.S. military officer says. In reality, though, he says, it was Ghassan's "own personal hit squad" that set up checkpoints designed to intimidate local Sunnis. Coalition forces recently detained a group of Iraqi officers in his force who were holding citizens hostage, then selling them back for money. "Suddenly the whole force is bad in the eyes of the people because of his Shiite agenda," adds the officer.

Months after pleas from the provincial council and American officials, the Ministry of the Interior says it is putting through transfer orders for Ghassan. Military officials here hope that this will boost their ongoing efforts to bring Sunnis into the police force. Already, they say, there have been signs of more interest in joining. But the damage Ghassan has done will be difficult to repair. "He has destroyed the Iraqi police. The situation isn't good," says Col. Ali Saadon, in charge of recruiting at the station. In the meantime, politicians are increasingly reliant on their personal security details-what amount to small armies of guards. Recently, the forces of rival politicians have clashed in "company-level firefights," say officials here-complete with rocket-propelled grenades.

Hopes. Today, Governor Ra'ad says the expectations of his electorate are simple: "The people look to me for three things: security, services, and a return to the normal routine they used to live." Yet he knows that these goals are still a world away.

After previously serving as a war planner in Iraq, Sutherland, the American brigade commander, has returned to a country in which the biggest changes, he says, have been the growth of al Qaeda in the region and the increasing influence of Iran. Diyala has become a key proving ground for al Qaeda at a time some Shiites see as "a chance to get back at Sunnis who have been living the good life all these years," says a military official here.

U.S. commanders add that it will take far more than troops to fix these dynamics, which are in turn fueling a vicious cycle of violence. "I have been most surprised by all of the jockeying-for political, economic, military power," says Sutherland. That jockeying, so endemic to the rest of the country, should now prompt some tough reassessment in Washington, officials here say, as soldiers on the ground ramp up efforts to transition security forces to Iraqi control. "Diyala was the place that we said we're going to turn over to the Iraqis-and look what happened," says a top U.S. commander. "We need to think a lot more closely about what conditions need to be set before transitioning control. If we don't, it can create more opportunities for the enemy," he adds, "which is essentially what happened in Diyala."

The provincial council members meeting with Sutherland stress that they will not return to the government until both Ghassan and Shakir are gone. They are also calling for immediate provincial elections. Until those things happen, they say, they are caught between the militias, and between terrorists "who want to return us to the Dark Ages." And with each day their frustration grows as they mull over the question posed to Sutherland by one Sunni sheik: "Is this the democracy," he wondered, "that the coalition promised us?"

awe (ô), n.1. Immediate and active fear; terror, dread.

—Oxford English Dictionary

Last week Americans were on the receiving end of a kind of shock and awe. The shock of recognition was delivered not by columns of tanks, flights of bombers or salvos of cruise missiles, but by a cell phone. The hanging of Saddam Hussein—not the fact of it, but the manner of it, communicated to the world by video from someone's phone camera—may have been a tipping point. The video, which The Economist said resembled "the sordid snuff videos circulated on the internet by al-Qaeda," may have been, in the scheme of things, just a straw. But coming when it did, it was, for many Americans, perhaps the last straw. In it, they recognized how far into the abyss Iraqi political culture has fallen.

The hanging was conducted in the presence of taunting adherents of Moqtada al-Sadr, the loutish cleric whose militia, the Mahdi Army, is a prime example of why post-Saddam Iraq is a thugocracy. The hanging was an episode of bloodthirsty primitivism in the service of barbaric sectarianism. Which is to say, the hanging was an accurate expression of Iraq's civic culture.

It is shocking that so many Americans were shocked. How much cumulative evidence is needed to teach this country what that country is like? Here is what Iraq is like. Exchanging anecdotes with an Iraqi friend, Anthony Shadid of The Washington Post recounted this one: "Insurgents stopped a driver at a checkpoint. They opened his trunk. 'Why do you have a spare tire?' the insurgent asked solemnly. 'You don't have trust in God?' "

The episode of the hanging sent shivers of dread through America—very timely shivers, thanks to the grainy pictures from the phone (by last Friday, there had been more than 2.5 million viewings of it on YouTube alone). The nation was, just as the 3,000th American combat death was announced, staring at the grotesque face of the faux nation to which more Americans might soon be sent to fight.

This week the president will announce his revision of Iraq policy. In government, personnel are policy, and he has been changing key advisers, military and civilian. Strategy and tactics may change, but in private consultations he reportedly has used one word to denote his unchanged objective: "victory." That is understandable. More than any presidency since Lincoln's, his will be defined by a single matter: Iraq.

It is difficult to imagine how Iraq can end as a success—as an enterprise in which the benefits exceed the costs. And if it is judged a disaster, that will be because the responsible officials were too late in remembering what Gen. Douglas MacArthur said. He said that in war, all disasters can be explained by two words: "too late."

Because the administration was too late to recognize that there were too few U.S. forces in Iraq, the looting after the fall of Baghdad—which did more physical damage to Iraq than the war so far had done—shattered Iraqis' confidence in America, and insurgents were emboldened. Because the administration was too late in admitting that there was an insurgency, Iraq slid into civil war. Because the administration was too late in facing the fact of that civil war, it probably is too late for a "surge" of new U.S. forces, of a size and duration that the American public will tolerate, to extinguish it. For several years, Sen. Joseph Biden, who last week became chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, has urged an increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq. Now, he says, it is too late.

Now, in fact, it may be 1966. That year the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Sen. J. William Fulbright, the Arkansas Democrat, held hearings on the Vietnam War. The hearings helped mobilize opposition to the war, which at the time had much more public support than the U.S. engagement in Iraq now has. Much of the impact of Fulbright's hearings derived from the decision of NBC to televise them, a decision that prompted some live coverage by CBS and ABC. Biden's hearings on Iraq, which begin this week, will occur in a transformed media environment and will be seen on multiple networks.

The hearings will be riveting, in part because Biden speaks with a forthrightness that is sometimes antic but often illuminating. He became a senator in January 1973, by which time the Senate had learned, regarding Vietnam, the difficulty—the impossibility, really—of controlling, legislatively or otherwise, a president's conduct of a war. But last week Biden spoke of changing the president's mind by "having his party walk away from his position." If the president this week announces a substantial and protracted escalation of the U.S. military effort in Baghdad, majorities in both houses of Congress will hotly oppose him. Most of his supporters—perhaps all of them not named Lieberman—will be Republicans, and will be tepid and wary. Democrats control Congress, but only congressional Republicans can perhaps control the president's policy.

Measure For Measure (USNEWS)

By Fouad Ajami

There was mayhem at the gallows, and there was justice at the gallows. Saddam Hussein had divided Iraqis and Arabs-and others-while he lived, and he was to do so again on the day of his execution. In the best of worlds, Saddam's executioners would have been "clinical" about the thing and subdued, and they would have given the event the dignity it deserved. But this was a despot who had cut a swath of terror through the land, and the prime minister who had come to power from the Shiite underground was determined to bring the matter of Saddam Hussein to a fitting end. It wasn't pretty, that spectacle of execution, and there should have been no cellphone video recording of the deed, but the truth at the heart of what played out in Saddam's old military intelligence headquarters was plain and simple justice and retribution. Men are not angels, and the dictator reaped what he had sown.

Aides to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki say that the pen with which he signed Saddam Hussein's death warrant had been in his possession for well over a quarter century. He had carried this pen with him to a long exile in Syria and Iran after he had fled the terrors of Saddam Hussein. He had waited for that moment, and truth be told there was perhaps relish in the way the death sentence was signed, before the cameras, a message to Maliki's Shiite kinsmen. The American regency in Baghdad had underestimated Maliki. There is more steel in the man than our commanders and diplomats on the scene had suspected. An unlikely choice for prime minister, he is through and through a man of the Shiite traditional classes; unlike his peers in the political class, he speaks not a word of English. He had never really taken to the Americans or fully trusted them. His predecessor, Ibrahim Jaafari, had been removed from office through American pressure in the spring of last year. Though he benefited, there lingers in Maliki a suspicion that he could suffer the same fate. It did not help that a memo by White House National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, made public last November, questioned Maliki's ability to rule and to rein in the Shiite militias. American power had bet heavily on reconciling the Sunni insurgents, and Maliki had read the diplomacy of the last year as a steady effort to court the Sunni Arabs. The man led to the gallows may have been a shadow of his old self, but he still haunted the imagination of his fervent supporters. For Maliki it was important that all these doubts be stilled.

Sunni reaction. It was said in the Sunni strongholds of Iraq, and in the Arab capitals, that it had been bad form that the dictator had been dispatched at dawn, on the first day of Id al-Adha, the feast of sacrifice that marks the end of the annual pilgrimage to Mecca. But those protests came from people who had never shed a tear for Saddam's victims. Their loyalties are atavistic: They are motivated by a dread of the Shiites, and by a reflexive, unthinking anti-Americanism.

A big thing happened, it has to be conceded, when Maliki affixed his signature to that death sentence. Sunni rulers had been hounding Shiite rebels for centuries in Arab lands; Saddam himself had put to death some great men of standing in the Shiite religious establishment. In April 1980, in a deed that is still recalled with terror by the vast majority of Shiites, a great figure of the Shiite seminaries, Ayatollah Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr, was put to death by the Hussein regime-along with his immensely talented sister, Bint al-Huda, a poet and a writer of exquisite sensibility. Sadr had become the great martyr of Iraqi Shiites; he is said to have been the intellectual inspiration behind the Dawa Party to which Maliki belongs. Saddam's execution was an act of fealty to that beloved man. For the Shiite faithful, justice had been slow in coming.

It had taken a foreign war to decapitate that tyrannical regime in Baghdad, it is true. But the judgment that mattered was an affair of the Iraqis. We have been asking them to claim responsibility for their country, bemoaning their political abdication. On that morning in Baghdad, three years after he had been flushed out of his spider hole, Saddam Hussein came face to face with the wrath and hurt he had bequeathed Iraqis. Those vengeful men taunting him as he fell through the gallows' trapdoor were in the most direct way the children of his cruel reign of terror.

Graham Says Boost In Troops A Last-ditch Effort (TSSC)

By James Rosen

The State (SC), January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. Lindsey Graham broke Sunday from other Republican senators who have criticized sending more U.S. troops to Iraq, defending President Bush's expected "surge" plan as a last-ditch bid to salvage victory in the war.

Graham, R-S.C., for the first time criticized the top generals removed last week by Bush from command in Iraq and said "a new team" must have the manpower to win the war.

"I support a surge with a purpose — co-joining with the Iraqi political and military leadership to control this country," Graham said on NBC's 'Meet the Press.' "We cannot let this country go into the abyss. Now is the last chance, and the only chance, to get this right."

In an address to the nation this week, Bush is expected to announce the dispatch of as many as 30,000 more troops to reinforce the 140,000 already in Iraq.

Graham, who has called for a troop increase for months, sparred with Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., the new Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman.

Graham said there can be no political stability in Iraq unless the sectarian violence is stemmed. Biden, confirming that he will run for president next year, said a renewed military push will be wasted without firm political measures. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite Muslim, must stand up to Shiite militias and give Sunni Muslims heading the insurgency a real share of power, Biden said.

"We now have a civil war," Biden said. "All the king's horses and all the king's men will not put Iraq together again, absent Maliki making some very hard decisions about what he's going to do."

Graham, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, sharply criticized Democrats calling for a phased withdrawal from Iraq.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., the new congressional czars following the Democrats' election triumph in November, sent Bush a letter Friday saying it is time to "bring the war to a close."

Graham said: "These Democratic proposals are, to me, a formula for defeat. They are nothing more than just a political way to get out of Iraq, and it will come back to haunt us for years."

Biden declined Sunday to call for a troop withdrawal, using instead the formula “disengage and contain.” Asked if he supports the Reid-Pelosi letter, Biden said, “I do not.”

Graham vacillated, though, when asked whether the United States is losing the war.

“In all honesty, we are not winning, and if you’re not winning, you’re losing, and now is the time to come up with a strategy to win,” Graham responded.

Later in the program, Graham said: “I don’t think any Republican or Democrat should do anything right now to say the war is lost. We should try to win this war.”

Graham has broken with Bush on key national security issues in the last two years, most prominently over how the United States should interrogate and prosecute accused terrorist detainees.

Now his support for Bush’s anticipated plan to send more troops to Iraq places him at odds with other prominent GOP senators. Sen. Richard Lugar, an Indiana Republican who was replaced by Biden as head of the foreign relations panel, has declined to endorse a troop increase; GOP Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, also eyeing a White House run, called the increase “folly” and “Alice in Wonderland” last week.

Democrats Vow To Resist Buildup (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

Democratic congressional leaders vowed yesterday to use their powers of spending and policy oversight to challenge President Bush's expected proposal this week, as part of a broad revision of Iraq strategy, for boosting U.S. military forces in the country by as many as 20,000 troops.

Calling Iraq a nation in "complete chaos," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and other Democrats cast the anticipated Bush plan as an escalation of the Iraq war that goes against the advice of senior U.S. commanders, rather than the significant change of course sought by American voters, and said that as a result they would treat the plan -- and new funding requests -- with strong skepticism.

"If the president wants to add to this mission, he's going to have to justify it," Pelosi said on CBS's "Face the Nation," emphasizing that while Congress will not cut off funding for troops now in Iraq, the White House will no longer have a "blank check" for expanding the war effort.

"When the bill comes . . . it will receive the harshest scrutiny," she said, referring to a new supplemental spending request for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan that is expected to surpass $100 billion. Since Sept. 11, 2001, more than $500 billion has been spent on the wars and counterterrorism-related expenditures around the world, according to the Congressional Research Service.

The extra troops are only one part of the package Bush is expected to present to the nation as early as Wednesday. Proposals for economic development and the setting of political benchmarks for Baghdad, leading to the formation of a national reconciliation government, are also expected from Bush's prime-time speech, although final details were being ironed out over the weekend.

Democrats were divided Sunday over how much Congress can do on Iraq. Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.), who reaffirmed yesterday that he will run for the Democratic nomination for president in 2008, argued on NBC's "Meet the Press" that it would be unconstitutional for Congress to authorize the war but then cap troop levels or cut funding for specific items. Biden said any troop increase would be "a tragic mistake . . . but as a practical matter, there is no way to say, 'Mr. President, stop.' "

Republican lawmakers, for their part, voiced general support for the Bush plan as outlined, although they acknowledged it will be controversial and unpopular. Congress should not try to micromanage the war or cut off funding for U.S. troops, they said, warning that Democratic proposals for beginning a gradual U.S. military withdrawal in four to six months could lead to a "failed state" in Iraq and spell disaster for the Middle East.

"At the end of the day . . . I don't think Congress will cut off money for the troops," Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said on "Fox News Sunday." "Congress is incapable of micromanaging the tactics in the war. And even though this will be a controversial step, I think the president will be able to carry it out, and I hope he'll be successful."

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), who along with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) is a strong backer of more troops in Iraq, said the U.S. military from the beginning has lacked the resources it needs to "hold" areas cleared of insurgents. As a result, "if you're not winning, you're losing," he said on "Meet the Press." "We cannot let this country go into the abyss" of civil war, which could provoke intervention by Iran and Turkey and decades of regional conflict.

Graham said Bush's nomination last week of Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus as the new U.S. commander for Iraq, replacing Gen. George W. Casey Jr., and his earlier naming of Robert M. Gates as defense secretary, were moves "long overdue."

Senior U.S. military officials have voiced deep resentment in recent days that the departures of Casey and Gen. John P. Abizaid, which had been planned for months, were being portrayed as part of a Bush administration housecleaning over Iraq strategy.

Some Republicans were more tepid on the subject of a troop increase. Brent Scowcroft, the former national security adviser to presidents Gerald R. Ford and George H.W. Bush and an early skeptic of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, offered only qualified support for a buildup. It would have to support a specific mission -- such as stemming ethnic cleansing in Baghdad -- for a specific period, he said.

"Unless there's something we can accomplish that is visible and demonstrable . . . people will say, well, look, the situation hasn't changed," he said in an interview on ABC's "This Week." "That demonstrates it's hopeless and the pressure to get out will increase."

Scowcroft also opposed making the U.S. commitment to Iraq dependent upon the Iraqi government accomplishing specific milestones -- an approach that is a central feature of Democratic withdrawal plans, and, according to U.S. officials, could also form part of the upcoming Bush plan.

"If they don't meet the first milestone, you withdraw support, making it virtually impossible for them to meet the second milestone," which would be "counterproductive," Scowcroft said. He stressed the necessity for a broader regional approach to bringing stability to Iraq, focusing on reviving Arab-Israeli peace efforts, but criticized the Bush administration's vision of bringing peace to the Middle East through democracy as "revolutionary utopianism."

Alter: Hagel Could Have A Shot (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Let's try an elementary thought experiment for Republican Primary voters. It may help explain why it's far too early to tell what might happen in 2008, the first election since 1928 with no incumbent president or vice president of either party on the ticket. (Truman's vice president, Alben Barkley, ran in 1952, but didn't win the Democratic nomination.) The results of this experiment may also explain why Washington is so often out to lunch on the direction of American politics.

One Republican—we'll call him "Candidate A"—has among the highest support levels for President George W. Bush's conservative agenda in the Senate. He championed the president's 2001 tax cut, which many Republicans believe is the litmus test of today's GOP. After initially voting to give Bush the authority to go to war, he became an early and outspoken critic of the Iraq policy, a view now endorsed not just by the American public and Democrats but by Republicans as well.

Republican "Candidate B" has the inverse position. He opposed Bush's big tax cuts, one of only two Republicans in the Senate to do so (the other being Lincoln Chafee). And on Iraq he is one of the main advocates of the "surge," a plan to "win" the war with a modest influx of troops, though even many military experts say the idea won't work.

You would think that Candidate A would be a strong favorite for the nomination and Candidate B destined for political oblivion. But no. Candidate A, Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel, is seen as damaged goods, with little chance to be nominated. Candidate B, Arizona Sen. John McCain, is now the front runner.

The explanation is the GOP tradition of primogeniture. Since the 1950s, Republicans, unlike Democrats, have given the nomination to their firstborn son—the guy whose "turn" it is. That's McCain, whose seasoned and deep-pocketed team never stopped running after he lost in 2000. McCain's plan is to kiss the con-servative base so ardently that it agrees to enter into a loveless marriage with him. Then he'll tack back to the maverick center for the general election. It just might work.

Hagel, by contrast, seems lost. After John Kerry favorably mentioned Hagel's skepticism about the Iraq war in one of his 2004 debates with Bush, he became persona non grata in his party. As recently as six months ago, any Republican lawmaker who didn't back the president on the war was in deep trouble.

But that was then. Supporting Bush on Iraq today is a liability, not an asset; it reeks of 2004 thinking. Six months from now, any Republican who opposed the tax cuts but champions Bush's disastrous Iraq policy is going to have some explaining to do in early debates. When Rush Limbaugh says after the midterms that he is sick and tired of "carrying water" for Bush, Chuck Hagel is not going to be run out of the party for refusing to carry water.

For ordinary Republicans, tax cuts are an article of faith. Backing a president in a failed war is not. And Hagel's doubts about the war have more weight because of his heroic combat experience in Vietnam. In a GOP debate, McCain would not be able to use his military experience as a trump card on Hagel. But Hagel and the others would score heavily on McCain for opposing the tax cuts—even though McCain was brave and right to have done so.

The most stunning thing about the Republican campaign so far is the vacuum on the right. While McCain, Rudy Giuliani and Mitt Romney (a moderate Republican until five minutes ago) battle over the centrists in the party, the conservative base that actually determines the nomination remains forlorn. Giuliani supports gay rights and abortion, and a third of Republicans disqualify Romney solely because he's a Mormon. This opening is why former Virginia governor James Gilmore is getting in the race and Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee—"Oprah"-ready after losing 110 pounds—can't be ruled out.

But governors, who normally make the strongest presidential candidates, seem a little irrelevant this time around. They aren't likely to sound as credible as senators on the nuances of Pakistani politics or the readiness of the Third Infantry Division. There's more conventional wisdom that's in danger of cracking, too. Pooh-bahs in both parties have convinced the candidates that they have to raise $100 million this year to be competitive. This is nonsense in the Internet age, peddled by consultants who need that booty for their own pockets. In congressional elections, money is a cause—it leads directly to success. In presidential politics, money is an effect—it follows quickly the momentum that's generated in the rough and tumble of the "free media" campaign.

Chuck Hagel might not run. But if he does, Candidate A would be formidable. It's the issues, stupid.

Adm. William J. Fallon: An Experienced Naval Officer, And A Diplomat (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 — The Bush administration's selection of a career naval aviator to be the top commander of American military forces across a region where they are engaged in two ground wars is, at first glance, odd.

A range of military officers at the Pentagon noted that if Adm. William J. Fallon was confirmed by the Senate to the Central Command position, he would be not only the first naval officer to command the region, but also a four-star officer moving between regional combatant commands. Often, such posts are given as promotions to three-star officers.

Senior Pentagon civilians and military officers said Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates's recommendation of Admiral Fallon, currently in command of all American forces in the Pacific, reflected a wish for seasoned eyes on Afghanistan and Iraq as well as a new focus on regional initiatives to reassure allies and deter adversaries, in particular Iran.

"Because of the importance of this job today, and what we're embroiled in over in that area of operations, this is no time for a learning curve," said Adm. Robert J. Natter, who worked extensively with Admiral Fallon before retiring as commander of the Atlantic Fleet.

"He has broad experience, both diplomatic, with the Japanese, Chinese and South Koreans, and also clearly in the traditional military fields," Admiral Natter said.

The Middle East has a vast land area, to be sure, but also has important waterways that carry world oil supplies and, it is feared, nuclear materials and terrorists.

Whether the mission is interdicting contraband, tracking suspected leaders of Al Qaeda or deterring Iran, many military contingencies in the region rely on warships and warplanes, and not boots on the ground.

Admiral Fallon, who began his military career with a commission through the Navy's Reserve Officer Training Program, as opposed to the more prestigious Naval Academy, has a quarter-century's experience in combat aircraft and extensive time at the negotiating table.

The admiral can be grizzly and tough, as befits a product of New Jersey. But he has consistently taken on assignments where diplomatic skills were as important as the military ones. He surprised some of his colleagues when, in early 2001, he volunteered for the task of delivering an apology to Japanese officials and families of those killed in the accidental sinking of a fishery school ship by an American submarine, the Greeneville, off the coast of Hawaii.

The final military inquiry had not been completed, and some at the Pentagon argued that an official apology was premature. But the extraordinary visit to Tokyo by Admiral Fallon, then serving as the vice chief of naval operations, the service's No. 2 job, was credited with soothing the feelings of an important ally, and of its people.

Another side of Admiral Fallon was on display last month when, as the senior American military officer in the Pacific, he took the unusual and punitive move of canceling a large annual field exercise with the Philippines over a local judge's failure to honor the bilateral treaty governing protections for American military personnel. At the time, Admiral Fallon said he was not sitting in judgment of the guilt or innocence of a marine convicted of rape, but was protecting his forces by demanding that the Philippines adhere to legal obligations.

Admiral Fallon can be expected to pay great attention to the missions in Iraq and Afghanistan, but to leave day-to-day operations to the senior commanders on the ground in Baghdad and Kabul, similar to his current relationship as Pacific regional commander to the four-star Army officer in charge of forces just in South Korea.

William Joseph Fallon was born Dec. 30, 1944, in East Orange, N.J., and raised in Merchantville. He graduated from Villanova University in 1967, and later graduated from the Naval War College and the National War College, and earned a master's degree in international studies from Old Dominion University.

He flew combat missions in the Vietnam War, commanded a carrier air wing in the Persian Gulf war in 1991, and four years later led the naval battle group supporting NATO operations in Bosnia. His senior positions before the Pacific assignment included commander of the Fleet Forces Command and of the Atlantic Fleet.

"This selection sends a clear signal that the administration wants the combatant commander to operate at the '30,000 foot' level, at the geopolitical and geostrategic level, and to foster our relations in the region as opposed to being focused solely on this conflict or that conflict," said Stephen R. Pietropaoli, a retired rear admiral who now serves as executive director of the Navy League.

"Admiral Fallon will have very experienced commanders in charge of operations in Afghanistan, Iraq, the Horn of Africa," Admiral Pietropaoli added. "But the Central Command commander needs to be above that, looking at how to enhance America's influence throughout his area of responsibility and how to truly work hand in glove with the Department of State to enhance America's image and influence and prestige in that part of the world."

U.S. Launches Air Assault On Sunni Haven (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

HAMOUD, IRAQ — Bombers, fighter jets and attack helicopters unleashed a thundering attack today as U.S. and Iraqi troops closed in on a web of irrigation canals east of Baghdad where they thought Sunni Arab insurgents were massing.

The predawn strikes shook the ground and sent fireballs and thick smoke into the sky.

The attacks, in a remote area of farms and palm groves, continued sporadically into the morning.

The air assault came after troops set fire Sunday to shoulder-high reeds to clear their view before a final push in Diyala province, a region they say has become a haven and training ground for Al Qaeda in Iraq and other militant groups.

U.S. troops said they killed 21 armed men Sunday. At least four Iraqi soldiers were killed and 27 wounded in antitank mine blasts.

About 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops are participating in the assault, which includes attack helicopters, tanks and Humvees.

Over the last four days, columns of troops have pushed through hamlets populated by wheat farmers and sheep herders to clear an area that is riddled with spider holes, tunnels and weapons caches.

One stash uncovered Sunday contained 1,169 Katyusha rockets, small arms and ammunition, the U.S. military said.

All men of military age have been questioned and tested for explosives residue. But in most homes, troops have found only women and children.

Hamoud, a one-street village of mud-brick homes, was no exception.

U.S. troops asked to meet the village sheik, or leader, and were told there wasn't one. Many houses were abandoned, some of them apparently in haste, with laundry dangling from window bars and chickens scratching in the yard.

"We are religious people; we fast and we pray," said one anxious man questioned by U.S. troops. "But I swear we have nothing to do with Al Qaeda."

Other villagers pointed to a home they said belonged to one of the people on the U.S.-Iraqi wanted list of suspected insurgents.

A small cache, including bomb-making equipment, was found in a hole on the abandoned property.

Villagers told the troops that insurgents occasionally passed through, but they had retreated to the network of canals and tunnels at first sight of the U.S.-Iraqi offensive.

American forces on the ground and in the air have spotted small groups of men, some armed and on motorcycles, moving along the canals, the military said.

U.S. officers said they were confident they could defeat the insurgents in a head-to-head battle.

The risk is that insurgents will drop their weapons and melt into the civilian population to fight another day.

The officers said insurgents didn't always walk away from a fight.

In November, U.S. troops happened upon a major weapons cache during a reconnaissance flight, which led to the discovery of more stashes, training ranges and tunnels.

The insurgents put up a fierce fight, attacking in squad-sized units in a battle that left two Americans and more than 70 insurgents dead.

The region is a stronghold of the powerful Daini tribe, which includes many disaffected former officers from Saddam Hussein's army.

Earlier Sunday, anti-tank mines ripped through two Iraqi troop carriers, killing four Iraqi soldiers and injuring 27, the U.S. military said.

As U.S. and Iraqi troops rushed to tend to the wounded, they came under small-arms fire.

"There were bodies everywhere," Army 1st Sgt. Michael S. Clemens said. "Around every corner there was another one."

The Iraqi company hit by the explosions pulled out and was replaced by troops from a predominantly Kurdish battalion.

Another mine disabled a U.S. Bradley fighting vehicle, injuring eight people.

Such explosions have destroyed numerous vehicles and slowed the operation's progress.

"That's a key indicator we are on the right track," said Sgt. 1st Class Collin Shorey, a military intelligence officer. "They don't want us here."

5 More U.S. Soldiers Killed In Iraq (AP)

By Lauren Frayer And Shafika Mattar, Associated Press Writers

AP, January 8, 2007

Two of Saddam Hussein's co-defendants were taken from their cells and told they were going to be hanged on the same day the former dictator was executed, their lawyer said Sunday.

But the two condemned men still await death as Iraqi officials decide how to avoid the kind of outcry that followed Saddam's hanging on Dec. 30.

Also on Sunday, the U.S. military announced the deaths of five more American troops and at least 14 Iraqis died in bombings and shootings.

Saddam's half brother and former intelligence chief Barzan Ibrahim and the former head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court, Awad Hamed al-Bandar, were sentenced to hang. They were convicted along with Saddam of involvement in the killings of nearly 150 Shiites in the town of Dujail after a 1982 assassination attempt there against Saddam.

Their executions were postponed, however, until after the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha, which ended five days ago.

Authorities also decided to give Saddam his own "special day," National Security adviser Mouwaffak al-Rubaie said at the time of his execution.

One of Saddam's lawyers who met the deposed leader in his final days told The Associated Press over the weekend that Saddam expected to be put to death and considered it "the most beautiful end" he could have.

Now Iraqi officials must decide how to carry out a second round of executions in the face of worldwide criticism over their handling of Saddam's death. In the final moments of his life, Saddam was taunted by some of those present in the execution chamber as he stood with a noose around his neck.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair criticized the way in which Saddam was executed, his office said Sunday.

"He believes that the manner of the execution was completely wrong, but that should not lead us to forget the crimes that Saddam Hussein committed, including the deaths of hundreds of thousands of Iraqis," a spokeswoman for Blair's office said on condition of anonymity in line with policy.

Blair's likely successor, Treasury chief Gordon Brown, said Saturday that the taunting of Saddam during his execution and the release of an illicitly recorded cell phone video was "deplorable" and "completely unacceptable."

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has ordered an inquiry into the emergence of the unofficial video, on which Saddam is heard exchanging insults with his executioners and shown dying on the gallows.

In Amman, Jordan's Parliament also denounced the execution and asked God to bless Saddam's soul. The speaker of the lower house said Saddam's execution ignored the feelings of Muslims and Arabs because it came just before the start of the religious festival of Eid al-Adha.

Human Rights Watch, in a report for release on Monday, said the speedy trial and subsequent execution of Saddam and those planned for Ibrahim and al-Bandar illustrated the Iraqi government's disregard for human rights.

"The tribunal repeatedly showed its disregard for the fundamental due process rights of all of the defendants," said Richard Dicker, director of Human Rights Watch's International Justice Program.

While waiting for their own postponed executions, Ibrahim and al-Bandar have been mourning Saddam, their lawyer Issam Ghazawi told the AP. He said he met with the men individually on Wednesday in Baghdad, where they are in U.S. custody.

The lawyer said U.S. officials had told the pair their deaths were imminent on the day of Saddam's execution.

Ghazawi said Ibrahim told him the Americans took him and al-Bandar from their cells on the day of Saddam's hanging and brought them to an office inside the prison at about 1 a.m. They asked them to collect their belongings because they intended to execute them at dawn — the same time Saddam was put to death.

Ghazawi said the two men were also told to write out their wills. They were returned to their cells nine hours later.

The lawyer said he has had no contact with the men since Wednesday, and had no information on when they would be hanged.

Jaafar al-Mousawi, the chief prosecutor in the Dujail case, said Sunday that the time for al-Bandar and Ibrahim's executions "will be determined by the government." Sami al-Askari, an adviser to al-Maliki, declined to give reasons for the delay and said only that "no date has been made yet" for their hangings.

Al-Bandar told Ghazawi that he "wished to have been executed with President Saddam," the lawyer said. Ibrahim "was in the worst condition. He kept crying over the death of his brother and said it was a great loss for the family and the Arab world," Ghazawi said.

Ghazawi, who served on Saddam's defense team during the last two years and says he has power of attorney for Ibrahim and al-Bandar, urged that their death sentences be overturned. The United Nations has also pleaded for a stay of execution for the two.

"Their execution should be commuted under such circumstances because of the psychological pain they endured as they waited to hang," Ghazawi said.

Meanwhile, Ahmed Saddiq, a Tunisian member of Saddam's defense team, said that during a Dec. 26 meeting with Saddam when he was still in U.S. custody, the former president appeared reconciled to his death.

"He constantly said the strongest, most likely hypothesis — and the one that he expected — was that he was going to be executed," Saddiq told the AP in Tunis. "He didn't stop saying, 'Don't panic. I'm ready for this moment and, after all, it would be the most beautiful end I could have.'"

Saddiq also said Saddam gave his lawyers a poem "of tenderness, of love" that he wrote to his wife, who lives in Qatar.

At one point, Saddam told his lawyers: "'I am still capable of love, of being sentimental and attentive. That's my right. It's there perhaps the other face of Saddam Hussein that you don't know,'" Saddiq said.

In other developments, the U.S. military said three airmen were killed in Baghdad Sunday by a car bomb, a soldier was killed by small arms fire in Baghdad a day earlier, and another soldier died in combat in western Anbar province on Friday. A British soldier also died in a traffic accident.

At least 14 Iraqis died Sunday in bombings and shootings, including three Sunni Muslim shopkeepers gunned down in a busy marketplace and a Shiite cleric and his son killed en route to a mosque, police said. Twenty-three bodies turned up in hospitals and morgues around the country, officials said.

A new battle for Iraq's capital was under way with Iraqi forces mired in gunfights with insurgents and U.S. helicopters hovering over an area where some 30 people died in fighting the previous night.

The fighting is part of a military operation announced Saturday by the prime minister and intended to quell sectarian violence.

Iraq's parliament speaker Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, the government's highest-ranking Sunni official, said Sunday he objected to the new plan for "legal reasons," and said parliament must vote on it.

War's Toll On Iraqis Put At 22,950 In '06 (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

BAGHDAD, Jan. 7 -- More than 17,000 Iraqi civilians and police officers died violently in the latter half of 2006, according to Iraqi Health Ministry statistics, a sharp increase that coincided with rising sectarian strife since the February bombing of a landmark Shiite shrine.

In the first six months of last year, 5,640 Iraqi civilians and police officers were killed, but that number more than tripled to 17,310 in the latter half of the year, according to data provided by a Health Ministry official with direct knowledge of the statistics. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information, said those numbers remained incomplete, suggesting the final tally of violent deaths could be higher.

Much of last year's politically motivated bloodshed unfolded in Baghdad. The Bush administration is considering sending more U.S. troops there, as the newly ascendant Democrats in Congress press for a military withdrawal. Bringing stability and rule of law to the capital is a cornerstone of the administration's strategy to exit Iraq. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki announced over the weekend his own security push to tame Baghdad's sectarian strife.

Last year's spike in casualties occurred despite an ambitious U.S. military operation in the capital, Together Forward, that involved thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops cordoning off some of the deadliest neighborhoods and conducting house-to-house searches.

"We have been in a reaction mode in many ways to the events that occurred because of the [February] bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra, and that began a cycle of sectarian violence that we've been working very, very, very hard to keep under control," Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the former second-ranking commander in Iraq, told reporters last month.

"Now, I'm not in any way happy with what I see in Baghdad. The level of violence is way too high," he added.

The Health Ministry's full-year death toll of 22,950, although incomplete, is higher than the 13,896 violent deaths of civilians, police officers and soldiers reported Jan. 1 by Iraq's ministries of defense, health and interior. The United Nations, in a November report, estimated that more than 28,000 Iraqi civilians had died violently in the first 10 months of 2006, but that count was disputed by the government. The differences in the numbers could not be reconciled.

Iraq's death toll from violence is controversial because it provides a vivid report card on the difficulty of U.S. and Iraqi efforts to bring order to the country. Neither the U.S. government nor the military provides death totals for Iraqis.

"It is often very difficult to gain consensus on the numbers of casualties in Iraq. It really is a government of Iraq issue," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman. U.S. and Iraqi officials have discouraged Baghdad's medical officials from releasing morgue counts.

The Iraqi government does not provide a single official death toll, leaving it up to individual ministries to release data, which are often conflicting.

The Health Ministry compiles data from morgues across the nation and from government hospitals. Those figures include Iraqis killed in bombings, terrorist acts, militia attacks, roadside explosions, drive-by shootings, kidnappings and other acts of violence. They also include the numerous unidentified corpses that turn up virtually every day, often handcuffed and showing signs of torture.

The Health Ministry data are believed to be more reliable than those issued by other sources because they are based solely on death certificates. But the Health Ministry, as a policy, does not publicly release these statistics. The ministry is under the control of the Shiite religious party of Moqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia is behind much of the sectarian killing.

The numbers are considered so sensitive that some Iraqi officials, when told of the Health Ministry data, dismissed them as exaggerated, but at the same time did not offer any other numbers. Previous reports about such body counts have drawn similar denials.

"I don't know of these numbers," said Health Ministry spokesman Qasim Yahya. "The Ministry of Health does not give out such numbers."

He referred all comments to the Interior Ministry, which he said was responsible for releasing such statistics.

Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said the Health Ministry was "not authorized to give out such statistics. It's a very big number. It's not close to the truth."

The Interior Ministry's figures are based primarily on data from police stations, police units and emergency patrols. Those numbers do not include the wounded who die later from their injuries, those kidnapped and later killed, armed men who die in clashes with U.S. or Iraqi forces, unidentified bodies, and other categories of deaths.

Another source of data is the United Nations, which relies on reports it culls from the Health Ministry, the Baghdad morgue and government hospitals, and releases death figures every two months. The organization does not include Iraqi police or military casualties in its reports.

The United Nations reported 28,076 violent deaths of civilians in the first 10 months of 2006, including 3,709 killed in October, according to its latest report, issued in November. At that time, Iraqi government spokesman Ali Dabbagh disputed the U.N. numbers as "inaccurate and exaggerated" because they were not based on official government reports.

"Yes, we have casualties, but not that huge number of casualties," Health Minister Ali Hussein al-Shamari said on Iraqi television. "The true number might be a quarter that, although we feel sorry for those who are dying. But they want to mislead the world about the conditions in Iraq." During a visit to Vienna that month, however, he said as many as 150,000 Iraqi civilians had died since 2003 as a result of violence. Dabbagh, who is traveling outside of Iraq, was not available for comment on Friday.

Sadiq al-Rikabi, a political adviser to the prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, disputed the figures, saying they probably included those who were killed in car accidents or day-to-day crimes.

The Health Ministry official made clear that the statistics counted only those who had died from political violence.

"Everyone can guess, but what is the real number? I'm not sure if anyone knows how many people are killed due to the violence and the terrorism," Rikabi said.

The Associated Press count for last year, assembled from its daily dispatches, is roughly 13,700 civilians, police and soldiers. But the news service has said that it believes its figures are substantially lower than the actual number of deaths because it lacked access to government data. Iraq Body Count, a British-based research group that reports on civilian deaths in Iraq, says the number is at most roughly 58,000 since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

The group relies on deaths reported by the news media, and suggests on its Web site that its totals are an underrepresentation because "many if not most civilian casualties will go unreported." Critics have accused the group of grossly underreporting Iraqi deaths.

A study on Iraqi mortality rates published in October by the Lancet medical journal estimated that more than 600,000 Iraqis had died from violence since the invasion. That number was extrapolated from population surveys rather than a compilation of actual deaths. The U.S. and Iraqi governments, as well as Iraq Body Count, dismissed the Lancet findings as inaccurate.

The United Nations is scheduled to release death tolls for November and December within the next two weeks, an official said. According to the Health Ministry figures obtained last week, November's death toll was 3,293, while December's fell to 2,748.

In November, four family members of Abu Taha al-Adhami, a computer engineer in Baghdad, were killed, he said, and one was kidnapped and remains missing. During the first half of last year, he lost no relatives, he said.

"The violence wasn't that obvious during the first half of last year," he said. "During the second half, the violence started to grow and grow and become more severe. It's all because of the political atmosphere."

A Washington Post special correspondent in Baghdad contributed to this report.

A Tougher Journey To Stock US Troops In Iraq (CSM)

By Raymond Barrett, Contributor To The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, January 8, 2007

Increased violence is slowing supply lines on which five contractors were kidnapped in November. They appeared unharmed in a video released last week.

ABDALY, KUWAIT-IRAQ BORDER

At this dusty border crossing in northern Kuwait, more than 200 18-wheelers wait to cross into Iraq. Braving Sunni insurgents, Shiite militias, and criminal gangs, these trucks are vital links in the supply chain that keeps some 130,000 US military personnel in Iraq afloat.

"Why you come to Iraq? You come again, I kill you," says a Bangladeshi driver, describing the vitriol that he and other contractors supporting the American effort routinely face.

Asked how long he intends to take his chances, he says: "Until I'm dead. I need work, I'll carry on."

A stark reminder of the perilousness of the 400-mile journey from here to a US logistics hub in Iraq came last week in a videotape of five kidnapped security contractors - four Americans and one Austrian. It was the first word from the men since their convoy that originated from this outpost was ambushed on Nov. 16.

The tape was "a good sign" but not one that signals that their release is imminent, says the spokesperson for their employer, Crescent Security Group.

Another American contractor was kidnapped Friday in Basra, according to the US Embassy in Baghdad. The Associated Press reported that the two Iraqis he was traveling with were found dead following the abduction.

Due to such dangers, security is the issue on everybody's lips at the Rabha al-Sahara (Desert Springs) truck stop, within sight of the Abdaly crossing. "It's worse than before ... [the trucks] come under fire more frequently," says a Pakistani businessman who asked not to be identified. He's a logistics operator who leases trucks that are driven into Iraq.

Last month, at least 113 US service members were killed, making December the deadliest month in 2006. The month also saw the death of more than 1,900 Iraqi civilians.

The rise in violence has affected the flow of convoys traveling into the country. "[There are usually] eight movements in a day, but nowadays it's reduced to five. In one movement there are about 45 trucks," the businessman says.

Multinationals such as the Kuwait-based Public Warehouse Company that transport fuel, food, and water receive first priority to the limited number of convoys escorted by the US military. Fuel is then distributed to army bases around Iraq by Halliburton-subsidiary KBR, also under US military protection.

Smaller logistics operators often depend on organizations such as Crescent Security Group. The Pakistani logistics operator says, however, that his drivers often don't like to travel with private security companies and prefer US military escorts. "[The private groups] use ... Silverados or F-350s, while the Army has fully armored gun trucks and Humvees."

To be sure, the high value of the cargo makes these convoys targets for criminal gangs. A truck can carry between $30,000 to $200,000 worth of cargo - the most expensive loads being generators or four-wheel-drive vehicles. The importance of Kuwait as a logistics hub for the coalition forces in Iraq cannot be overstated. Camp Arifjan in southern Kuwait is the main staging area for troops and supplies deploying to Iraq.

"The supply line from Kuwait is absolutely crucial. You cannot supply the level that is required by air," says Paul Rodgers, professor of peace studies at Bradford University in West Yorkshire, England, who has written monthly security briefings on Iraq since 2003.

And with the possibility of increasing US forces by some 20,000 combat troops seeming more likely, the supply route from Kuwait will be ever more vital. "A very big proportion of the food and water [used by the US military] comes from Kuwait," says Robert Soussa, the managing director of Kuwait & Gulf Link Transport Co., a group heavily involved in this logistics business.

"There are hundreds of fuel tankers a day ... shared between many companies. They don't have many [petrol] refineries in Iraq, the Kuwait government supplies them with petrol," he says.

Regarding protection for their convoys, Mr. Soussa says that the security companies they hire depend on local Iraqis for safe passage. "They have connections on the ground, they recruit from local tribes, you must create jobs for these people."

Soussa adds that the upsurge in violence has impacted the logistics business. "Because of the incidents in Iraq, they have reduced the number of trucks [per convoy]," he says.

This reduction was also confirmed by a US contractor, who has driven trucks inside Iraq. US Department of Labor statistics show at least 650 American contractors have been killed inside Iraq.

Professor Rodgers says that a more substantial US combat presence in Iraq could cause insurgents to avoid direct confrontation and intensify attacks on supply lines.

"In the longer term, they [insurgents] may respond [to a troop surge] by attacking the supplies, rather than the troops themselves," he says.

5 More U.S. Soldiers Killed In Iraq (AP)

British Prime Minister Tony Blair criticized the way in which Saddam was executed, his office said Sunday.

"He believes that the manner of the execution was completely wrong, but that should not lead us to forget the crimes that Saddam Hussein committed, including the deaths of hundreds of thousands of Iraqis," a spokeswoman for Blair's office said on condition of anonymity in line with policy.

In other developments, the U.S. military said three airmen were killed in Baghdad Sunday by a car bomb, a soldier was killed by small arms fire in Baghdad a day earlier, and another soldier died in combat in western Anbar province on Friday. A British soldier also died in a traffic accident.

At least 14 Iraqis died Sunday in bombings and shootings, including three Sunni Muslim shopkeepers gunned down in a busy marketplace and a Shiite cleric and his son killed en route to a mosque, police said. Twenty-three bodies turned up in hospitals and morgues around the country, officials said.

A new battle for Iraq's capital was under way with Iraqi forces mired in gunfights with insurgents and U.S. helicopters hovering over an area where some 30 people died in fighting the previous night.

The fighting is part of a military operation announced Saturday by the prime minister and intended to quell sectarian violence.

Iraq's parliament speaker Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, the government's highest-ranking Sunni official, said Sunday he objected to the new plan for "legal reasons," and said parliament must vote on it.

My History With The Rope (WSJ)

By Abraham Verghese

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

I have now watched both the official and the infamous unofficial cellphone video of Saddam's Hussein's execution. Both were on the Web soon after the event. I had the choice of watching them or not. I watched, with the same horrid fascination that I felt seeing ultimate fighting on television -- disbelieving that gladiators are legal when cockfighting is outlawed in just about every state save for New Mexico (where I saw my first and last cockfight).

When pollsters knock on my door, they will find that as a physician I am against capital punishment, ultimate fighting and cockfighting because they run counter to our sense of being a civilized society. But the disconnect between what I will watch and what I claim I am for is more common than most of us care to admit; I blame the camera.

The lens now peers into every nook and cranny of human existence, and it is now in the hands of every man. A digital image of interest spreads on the Internet like a drop of India ink in water. Police brutality, a bully on a school bus, an abusive nanny -- we see them all. It isn't surprising that there is a cellphone video of Saddam's hanging; it is surprising there is only one. While on rounds in my hospital (where I work as an infectious disease specialist), I caught sequential bits of the television show, "Dr. 90210" in the course of going from one patient to the next. I had no idea!

We (my patients, their visitors and I) saw an actual breast augmentation; even more edifying was the opportunity to peek into the personal lives and the marital struggles of the brave practitioners of this craft who eke out an existence in that zip code. My vicarious presence in Beverly Hills and Baghdad in the same week was not because of prurient tastes; it was because these ubiquitous images are all but unavoidable if you have eyes and any curiosity about your fellow human beings.

The uproar over the Saddam video -- both its existence and its content -- is particularly hypocritical. Given all the ways and all the weaponry that could be used to execute someone, hanging is a most inhumane choice. The condemned person will be terrified and anxious, not about death as much as the manner of death. Hanging of the 'short drop' version practiced in Iran is really a slow choking to death; in the standard or long drop method that was used in Iraq, unconsciousness is supposedly instant when the spinal cord is severed, but a misplaced knot could rip skin and muscle and cause an agonizing death. Instant or not, let's not kid ourselves; hanging is a vengeful, brutalizing, psychologically terrifying act with which we humans have a long history; in the past it was carried out publicly (and still is in countries like Iran) with the aim of serving as a deterrent. If we condone hanging a mass murderer, is it not hypocritical to want it to be conducted with "decency" when hanging is by its very nature indecent?

Saddam's hanging disturbs us because it was perverse, vengeful, furtive, hasty, carried out under cover of darkness and in front of a hoarse, excitable male audience who acted as if they were at a carnival, or, to be more precise, as if they were at a lynching. Part of the discomfort the video generates here may lie in these echoes of our own short history with the rope.

As an expatriate child growing up in Ethiopia, I saw my first hanging when the military leaders of an abortive coup were put to death in a public square. We happened to be driving by. Or perhaps, in those pre-Internet days, my parents wanted to witness the spectacle; I don't remember. I do remember the chanting, ululating crowd, dancing under the swaying corpse, the choked, congested faces and the oddly angulated heads, but most of all I remember how the dead men's shoes were filched. The bare feet seemed inconsistent with the rest of the image. That element of violation, of savagery, stayed with me. I saw a few more hangings in that country as I grew up, and the fresh bodies of people who met violent deaths in the aftermath of Emperor Haile Selassie's fall and the advent of Mengistu, the Stalin of Africa.

The Saddam video recalled these memories of witnessing violence and savagery. With the video I felt just as I did as a child witnessing an actual hanging: That the condemned man gets perverse revenge because there is a shame that accompanies such a spectacle; it spreads and stains all who are there, all who drive by, all who watch it on television, or who, like me, download it with a click of the mouse; the killer being executed has suddenly become noble, and turned us into killers.

This cellphone video will be the most viewed hanging video in history. We as a nation should watch it before washing our hands of it, and certainly before pontificating about our brand of justice versus other brands. Only by watching can the debate about capital punishment move from an abstract discussion to what is real, to what is palpable, to what is shameful, to what is actually happening whether you watch it or not.

Britain's Brown Suggests Policy Shift (AP)

By David Stringer

AP, January 8, 2007

Treasury chief Gordon Brown, expected to succeed Tony Blair as prime minister by September, suggested Sunday that he will pursue an Iraq policy that is more independent of Washington than the current government.

Brown acknowledged that mistakes were made in the aftermath of the invasion and promised to be "very frank" with President Bush. He also said that Britain is likely to scale down its commitment of troops to Iraq over the next year — even as the White House is considering dispatching thousands more, at least temporarily.

Brown's comments, aired on the British Broadcasting Corp.'s Sunday AM program, seemed intended to distinguish himself from Blair, who has been criticized in Britain for his strong support for Bush and the war, both unpopular here.

"I look forward, if I am in a new position, to working with the president of the United States, George Bush," Brown said. "Obviously, people who know me know that I will speak my mind. I will be very frank. The British national interest is what I and my colleagues are about."

A spokesman for the U.S. State Department declined to comment on Brown's interview.

Blair has said he will step down as prime minister and leader of the governing Labour party before September. Brown, who is credited with helping Blair reinvigorate the Labour party, is unlikely to face any credible challenge when the party elects a new leader, who will automatically become Britain's new prime minister.

Brown, in the BBC interview, also said that Saddam Hussein's execution — in which Saddam, a Sunni Arab, was taunted with the name of a radical Shiite cleric — had done nothing to help stem Iraq's sectarian violence.

"Now that we know the full picture of what happened, we can sum this up as a deplorable set of events," Brown told the BBC. "It is something, of course, which the Iraqi government has now expressed its anxiety and shame at."

Blair, who previously declined to comment on the hanging, said through his press office Sunday that the manner of Saddam's execution was "completely wrong."

Brown also told the BBC that he believed the ideological battle for the hearts and minds of young Muslims was as crucial as the battle against communism was for previous generations.

Brown, in charge of Britain's Treasury since 1997, said he had worked with officials across the American political divide and remained close to ex-Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan and former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin.

In the interview, recorded on Saturday, Brown also said he believed there should be some form of inquiry into the aftermath of the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

"There are lessons to be learnt, particularly from what happened immediately after Saddam Hussein fell," he told the BBC.

"One is that in Iraq itself there is absolutely no doubt — and I think people will agree on this in time — that the passage of authority to the local population should have begun a lot earlier, so they had to take more responsibility for what was happening in their own country."

He said the experience of insurgency in Iraq and Islamic extremist terrorism had proven that "we will not win against extreme terrorist activities and propaganda activities unless we have this battle for hearts and minds as well."

The Treasury chief said he believed Britain was unlikely to join any future U.S. plan to temporarily increase troop numbers in Iraq, aimed at stemming the current bloodshed.

Britain would "continue to move troops from combat to training, to complete the redevelopment work" and was likely to scale down their presence over the next few months.

Britain has around 7,000 soldiers stationed in southern Iraq, mainly based around the city of Basra.

"I believe it is true to say that by the end of the year, there may be thousands less in Iraq than there are now," Brown said.

Parliament would also have a stronger role under his leadership, Brown said, and be more able to hold the government to account.

Iraq's Escape Is Soccer, But Soccer Can't Escape War (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

BAGHDAD — Anyone wanting to take a measure of the importance of soccer in Iraq needed only to be in the country during the national team's recent march to the finals of the Asian Games, which were held in Doha, Qatar.

During each match involving the Iraqi squad, work ground to a halt across Iraq as people gathered around televisions. Each victory was celebrated with sustained gunfire that etched the sky with the red streaks of tracer bullets. On Dec. 12, the day Iraq beat the heavily favored South Koreans in the semifinals, at least five people in Baghdad were taken to the hospital with wounds from stray bullets, the police said.

When the final whistle blew on the championship game against Qatar on Dec. 15 — a 1-0 defeat for Iraq — the Iraqi television channel that carried the game cut to a montage of glorious highlights from past victories, seemingly intent on forestalling a total collapse of the national spirit. "You are heroes," the commentator declared. "Second is a beautiful position."

Sports fandom is a universal phenomenon, but in Iraq, soccer, the country's most popular sport, may have greater meaning than usual.

"We Iraqis don't have much fun," said Mehdi Hadi Sabi, 36, an auto parts salesman. On a recent afternoon, he was among a cluster of die-hard fans watching the Police Club, one of Iraq's professional soccer teams, practice in a small stadium here. "This is one of the few recreational things we have left," Mr. Sabi said. "It's kind of a catharsis."

Soccer has become an escape from the uncertainty and violence of life, a source of camaraderie and even a binding force of nationalism in a country riven by sectarianism.

When the national team beat Singapore in October, earning Iraq a spot in the Asia Cup this July, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad issued a joint statement of congratulations. "Few events bring together Iraqis as a nation like soccer," it said. "It is a great example of what is possible when Iraqis work together regardless of sect, religion or ethnicity."

Despite the national team's successes abroad, the sport at home has been fraught with the same uncertainties as the rest of Iraqi life.

The professional league halted at the 2003 invasion; play was not resumed until late 2004. Though the stadiums remain remarkably free of violence, fear of attacks has cut into attendance. Ticket revenues and government support have declined, and the stadiums and practice facilities are in poor shape. The best players have fled abroad, seeking safer conditions and more lucrative contracts. "All the players would be happy to leave the country," said Amir Sabah Hussein, 18, a forward on the Police Club. "I wish it weren't so."

Violence has also precluded professional league matches in areas of the country where the insurgency is particularly strong, including Anbar Province and the area north of Baghdad known as the Sunni Triangle. Teams from several violent, troubled cities have either folded or moved: the Samarra team, for instance, has relocated to Baghdad, and Mosul plays in Erbil, according to Tareq Ahmed, the acting director of the Iraq Football Association.

Amateur and school leagues have also been crippled, with many teams no longer traveling outside their neighborhoods to play because of fears of attack.

In recent months, athletes and sports officials have been shot and kidnapped. In November, Hudaib Mejhool, director of the professional Students Club, was kidnapped by gunmen while driving to work. His body turned up in the morgue. Ghanim Ghudayer, a member of the Air Force Club and the Iraqi Olympic team, was kidnapped in September.

The Police Club, which is in the soccer association's premier league and is one of the country's oldest teams, practices on a field scorched yellow by the sun, and the stands have fallen into disrepair. The team has not played an official league game there for two years because it is too vulnerable to attack, team officials said. During a practice in early December, a bullet sailed past the head of a player; the whole team dropped flat on the ground. It was unclear whether the bullet was a stray or from a sniper. The practice was cut short; memories were still fresh of a player with the Zawra Club who was killed by a stray bullet during practice earlier in the year.

The premier league's season was supposed to begin Nov. 24, but was postponed twice because of security concerns. The league's northern and southern divisions started play in November, but the season is still suspended for the teams based in Baghdad. As to when they will begin play, Ahmed Abbas, the general secretary of the Iraqi Football Association, said, "God only knows."

The possibility that the season may evaporate has crippled the Police Club's morale. "They're training aimlessly," Muhammad Shakir, the team's coach, said during a recent practice. "They don't know what they're doing this for."

The players were phlegmatically warming up by kicking around balls and stretching. "Before, we were coming to work with our hearts and minds," the coach continued. "Now we are just coming with our minds."

Hashim Ridah, 27, a stocky forward and one of the league's most prolific scorers, said that if the season never began, he might seek a spot on the team in Karbala, his hometown. He said he could not afford to lose another year. "The time of the player is limited," he said.

The fans, too, are distraught. "I may fall into a depression if there is no season," said Mr. Sabi, the auto parts dealer. "It's hard to imagine Iraq without a football season, and a season without the Police Club." But Mr. Sabi and his buddies continue to turn out for most practices.

"My family has tried to prohibit me from coming here because I have diabetes, but I don't care," said Wasim Mohsin, 50, a rotund sheep vendor and one of the Police Club's stalwart fans. "I watch the clock, and when it strikes two o'clock, I just leave the house and go to the club." Once, he said, he even abandoned a sick daughter at a hospital to catch a game.

But there may be no more devoted a Police Club fan than Khalil Khalaf, 23, a deaf house painter. After a Police Club loss to a team from Najaf last season, Mr. Khalaf, a wiry blade of a man, angrily hurled himself over a retaining fence, sprinted across the playing field and tackled a Najaf player. Mr. Khalaf was pounced on by other Najaf players and a police officer, who beat him with a stick. His friends pulled him to safety.

To explain what the team meant to him, Mr. Khalaf pounded his chest with his fist, then repeatedly dragged an index finger from the corner of his eye down his cheek. Mr. Mohsin translated: "He says, 'The team is in my heart, and sometimes I cry for them.' "

His message conveyed, Mr. Khalaf clenched his fists into thumbs-up signs and bounced up and down on the balls of his feet. He looked like the happiest man in Iraq.

Taliban Resume Their Attacks In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Jan. 7 — The Taliban appeared to be resuming their campaign of violence after a week of quiet over the Islamic festival of Id al-Adha.

Two newborn babies, their mother and a grandmother were killed in a roadside bombing in eastern Afghanistan as they were returning home from the hospital on Sunday, said the provincial police chief of Khost, Muhammad Ayub, who called the attack "inhuman." Three others in the car, a woman and two men, were wounded, he said.

In a separate attack, gunmen on a motorcycle killed a high school headmaster in the southern province of Helmand as he was walking home from morning prayers at his local mosque, according to an Interior Ministry spokesman.

American soldiers thwarted a suicide car-bomb attack on their outpost in the eastern province of Paktika on Saturday. The troops began shooting at the advancing vehicle, and it crashed into an outside barrier and exploded, according to a NATO statement. Five soldiers were wounded, and the bomber was killed.

A NATO soldier was also wounded in a roadside explosion in Kandahar Province on Saturday, a NATO spokesman said.

More than 600 civilians have been killed in the past three years, including those killed as a result of operations by NATO, American and Afghan troops as well as attacks by the Taliban and Al Qaeda, the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission reported Sunday. The commission appealed for the military to take more care to avoid civilian casualties and called for compensation to be given to the victims' families.

Military Injustice (LAT)

Army prosecutors are going too far in trying to conscript reporters to boost their case in a soldier's court-martial.

ARMY 1ST LT. EHREN WATADA may or may not have a good claim for conscientious objector status. It makes sense for the Army to prosecute him for refusing orders to deploy to Iraq last June, and Watada has at best an uphill battle in defending his actions, given that he joined the military of his own free will. But Army lawyers are overreaching when they try to prosecute their case by drafting reporters.

Watada faces a court-martial next month for missing his troop movement and for his published explanations of his refusal to go. The Army has his statements, but it subpoenaed reporters to authenticate that he, in fact, said what is in print and on tape.

Portions of independent journalist Sarah Olson's interviews with Watada appeared on the website Truthout.org and were broadcast on radio stations in New York and the Bay Area. Freelance journalist Dahr Jamail had simply videotaped Watada's speech at a Veterans for Peace convention. Honolulu Star-Bulletin reporter Gregg K. Kakesako also reported Watada's story.

A military judge ruled that Olson and Jamail did not have to appear at Thursday's pretrial hearing. But the Army is pressing forward with its demand that the two reporters testify at the trial.

No prosecutor should be able to conscript any reporter into being a deputy by compelling testimony about a statement made by a source — or go fishing for information beyond what a reporter presents in a story — unless it's absolutely vital to protect U.S. citizens from crime or attack. This principle should apply whether or not the source was speaking in confidence, or whether or not the reporter works for a media organization.

It's egregious enough when U.S. attorneys subpoena journalists, which is happening at an alarmingly increasing rate (illustrating the need for a national shield law). But there is something especially chilling about the U.S. military reaching beyond its traditional authority to compel a non-military U.S. citizen engaged in news-gathering to testify in a military court, simply to bolster a court-martial case. There is no security interest at stake, and no matter of national urgency.

The Army can make its case against Watada without pestering civilian journalists. Sustaining the military subpoena would set a troubling precedent. It's time for the Army to back off.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple's Jobs May Still Face U.S. Scrutiny Over Stock Options (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo And Connie Guglielmo

Bloomberg, January 8, 2007

Jan. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Apple Computer Inc. Chief Executive Officer Steve Jobs, exonerated by the company's board last month in a stock-options scandal, may still face scrutiny from U.S. investigators.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Department of Justice may question Jobs as they probe whether current and former Apple executives, directors and others committed fraud by backdating some stock-option awards to inflate their value, said criminal defense attorneys who formerly worked at those agencies.

Apple said Dec. 29 that 6,428 stock options issued between 1997 and 2002 were backdated. That included one grant to Jobs marked as approved at a special board meeting that never occurred. Jobs recommended some favorable dates on options other than his own. Apple, which found ``no misconduct'' by Jobs, didn't say which options the CEO backdated or why it faked a board meeting.

``The SEC and the Justice Department are not bound by the company's conclusions,'' said San Francisco-based attorney Jahan Raissi, a former senior counsel in the SEC's enforcement division. ``They have far more powerful tools to force people to talk to get information.''

Federal Investigation

Cupertino, California-based Apple, maker of the iPod music player and Macintosh computer, is among the largest of the more than 195 companies embroiled so far in a stock-options scandal that broke last year.

Prosecutors will want to know what Jobs, 51, was told in meetings and in telephone calls and if any advice was given to him by outside attorneys, said Robert Mintz, a white-collar criminal defense attorney in Newark, New Jersey, and former assistant U.S. attorney in New Jersey.

A person familiar with the matter said Oct. 5 that federal prosecutors in San Francisco are investigating Apple's backdating of stock options.

The computer maker's revelation that Jobs chose some of the dates for options grants will prompt investigators to explore his role, said William Portanova, a white collar criminal defense attorney in Sacramento, California, and former U.S. prosecutor in California.

``They admitted he knew what was going on and picked the dates,'' Portanova said. ``Nobody is out of the woods until the SEC and DOJ say they are out of the woods.''

Hiding Costs

Stock options allow holders to buy shares at a later date, usually at the market price the day they were granted. Backdating options to days with low prices inflates their value. If not properly disclosed, the practice may break laws because it hides costs from shareholders and regulators.

SEC spokesman John Nester in Washington wouldn't comment specifically about Apple, though he said internal company reviews don't preclude an SEC investigation. ``It's a tool that can expedite the resolution of a matter, but it's not a substitute,'' Nester said.

U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan in San Francisco declined to comment on the company. In general, while a company's internal investigation ``can be helpful in our investigation, we exercise our own due diligence in determining whether federal criminal prosecution is warranted,'' Ryan said.

Apple set up a special committee to run an internal review of the options grants after disclosing in June there may have been problems with awards. It was led by former Vice President Al Gore, a member of the company's board since 2003, and director Jerome York, who was a member of the compensation committee in 2001 when the backdated grant to Jobs was made.

Jobs and Gore

Jobs served on the advisory board of Gore's Current TV cable channel, the San Francisco-based company said in a May 2004 press release. He has contributed $252,700 to Democrats since 1996, including $26,700 to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in June, according to federal campaign contribution records compiled by the Center For Responsive Politics, which tracks money in politics.

He gave former U.S. Senator Bill Bradley $500 in 1999 and hasn't contributed to Gore, the records show.

Neither Jobs nor Apple have made any financial contributions to any of Gore's projects: The Alliance for Climate Control, Current TV or Generation Investment Management LLP, said Apple spokesman Steve Dowling. There is no financial relationship between Jobs and Gore, Dowling said.

The Gore committee cleared Jobs and other current management of wrongdoing after an investigative team spent more than 26,500 man-hours searching more than 1 million paper and electronic documents. More than 40 current and former directors, officers, employees and advisers were also interviewed, the company said.

Cleared Jobs

The disclosure eased some investors' concerns that Jobs, credited with leading a revival at the company since returning as CEO in 1997, might be forced to step down.

Apple shares rose 4.9 percent the day of the exoneration. They fell 61 cents to $85.05 in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading Jan. 5. They gained 18 percent last year after more than doubling in 2005.

Jobs and Apple may also be forced to provide more details to lawyers representing shareholders suing the company. ``They have not disclosed near enough information," said Nell Minow, editor at the Corporate Library, a corporate governance research firm in Portland, Maine. Apple faces a federal lawsuit in California that consolidates 11 shareholder complaints over backdating.

``You want to see a very specific discussion of what steps they took, what questions they asked, what researchers they used," Minow said.

Options for Jobs

In 2001, Jobs received options on 7.5 million shares. The terms of the grant were completed Dec. 18 of that year, when Apple's shares were trading at $21.01, Apple said. Oct. 19 was chosen as the grant's date, giving Jobs a lower exercise price of $18.30.

The company told shareholders in a March 2002 regulatory filing that the grant was approved at a special board meeting in October 2001. Apple disclosed last month that the meeting never took place. No member of current management was aware of the ``irregularity," the company said.

Apple said it recorded $84 million in charges to correct its accounting for the backdated options, including $20 million for Jobs' 7.5 million share award. Jobs voluntarily canceled that grant and other outstanding options in March 2003.

He chose to do so to make more stock available for employees, Apple said in an SEC filing at the time.

Restricted Shares

Instead, the board gave Jobs 5 million shares of restricted stock, which vested in March 2006. At the time, the shares were worth $646.6 million.

Apple said the actions of two unidentified former officers involved in accounting, recording and reporting of stock options grants had raised ``serious concerns."

Former Chief Financial Officer Fred Anderson, whose tenure included the five years when options were manipulated, resigned as a director in October after Apple first reported the results of its internal review. Jerome Roth, Anderson's San Francisco- based attorney, said his client wasn't involved in any ``knowing manipulation" of options.

Apple's top lawyer Nancy Heinen, who joined Apple in September 1997 after Jobs returned as CEO, resigned last May.

``We strongly deny any and all accusations of intentional wrongdoing on her part," said Cristina Arguedas, Heinen's lawyer in Berkley, California.

Investigator In Apple Probe Had Conflicts (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, January 8, 2007

One of the directors in charge of Apple's internal investigation into backdated stock options ran a computer reseller that accounted for about $600 million worth of Apple sales from 2000 to 2003.

That financial relationship, even though it no longer exists, should have disqualified director Jerome York from the assignment, say two corporate governance experts.

York, an Apple director for the past 10 years who chairs the board's audit and finance committee, was one of three board members on a committee that oversaw last year's probe into the company's improperly awarded options grants.

In January 2000, York led an investor group that paid more than $700 million to buy Micro Warehouse, a distributor of Macintosh computers and related products. York became chairman and CEO.

Over the next three years, according to Apple's filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, Apple drew about 3% of its annual net sales from Micro Warehouse. York sold the company's assets to CDW in September 2003 for $22 million.

In addition to the history of his business relationship with Apple, York faced another conflict in overseeing the special probe: He sat on Apple's compensation committee during part of the time when Apple now says options were backdated. Apple said York recused himself from that part of the probe.

As head of the compensation committee, York had approved some of the grants that were investigated.

Still, two governance experts expressed dismay that Apple would allow York, a former chief financial officer of IBM and Chrysler, to serve on the panel.

"You either have an independent investigation or you don't," says Lynn Turner, director of research at Glass Lewis. "York was a conflicted director."

"This is not a good board, and they have not given us any reasons to feel confident," says Nell Minow, editor at The Corporate Library. Just because York no longer has a financial relationship with Apple doesn't erase all the ties that existed, she says.

"You can't unscramble that egg and suddenly become independent," says Minow. "This shows a failure to understand the core fundamentals of appearance and reality."

York did not return messages left at his home last week, and Apple declined to comment on the matter.

In a statement issued Dec. 29, York and Al Gore, the former U.S. vice president who joined Apple's board in 2003, described Apple's investigation into backdating as "exhaustive" and said the board had "complete confidence" in CEO Steve Jobs and his management team.

Apple said in an SEC filing that Jobs "was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates," but "he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants or appreciate the accounting implications."

The investigation, which the company voluntarily disclosed more than six months ago, was conducted by the law firm Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges, under the direction of Gore, York and a third outside director, Google CEO Eric Schmidt.

Apple is among about 200 companies that have admitted to or are being investigated for giving employees favorably priced options by backdating awards from the approval date to dates when the stock's market price was lower. That may violate SEC and tax rules if companies don't properly disclose and account for below-market priced options.

According to the Dec. 29 SEC filing, the investigation focused on 42,000 stock-option grants made on 259 dates from 1996 to 2003. Of those grants, 6,428 awarded on 42 dates were incorrectly dated.

Apple spokesman Steve Dowling said he did not know if the law firm interviewed Jobs or York or whether the 40-plus witnesses questioned made any statements under oath. He said the findings were given voluntarily to the SEC and the U.S. Attorney's office in San Francisco, which are looking into the matter.

Apple Quietly Canned Lawyer Who Backdated (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, January 8, 2007

Steve Jobs is an ideas guy. He wears jeans, grows beards and orates to cheering throngs at events like this week's MacWorld conference.

Jobs' biographers say evidence indicates that he's a pescetarian. He went to India. He takes only $1 a year in salary. And he leaves it up to other people to award him hugely valuable piles of stock in Apple Computer, where he's the CEO.

People like Wendy Howell, the former in-house Apple lawyer responsible for option paperwork, probably won't be attending Jobs' eagerly awaited MacWorld speech Tuesday. Late last year, she became the lone person to lose her job as a result of the company's well-publicized options problems.

Howell's name hasn't been publicly mentioned in the Apple options mess, and her firing wasn't disclosed by the company in its series of public disclosures of options problems.

But she was the person who filled out the paperwork on a 2001 option award to Jobs that has grown infamous since just after Christmas, when Apple acknowledged that the value of the grant was artificially pumped up via a set of fabricated meeting minutes.

Howell's role was detailed by various people familiar with the situation, all of whom refused to be named because of the federal government's ongoing criminal and regulatory probes of Apple.

As the person who wrote out those "minutes," Howell has become a central figure in the Apple probe -- both as a potential defendant in a fraud case and as someone who could tell the government who at the company knew about backdating and its financial and legal implications.

Reached Thursday, Howell's lawyer, white-collar defense specialist Thomas Carlucci of Foley & Lardner, didn't seem ecstatic about the prospect of seeing his client's name in print. He would not comment on whether his client was a target.

Of course, there's more to Apple's options problem than what went on in the legal department. So while prosecutors discuss whether Howell is more valuable as a witness or a target, their colleagues in the Securities and Exchange Commission are trying to parse the specifics of how Apple accounted for thousands of options grants -- and whether executives knew that the law required backdated grants to be recorded as expenses.

The company has publicly said that while Jobs knew about the backdating, he didn't benefit from it or understand the accounting implications.

And last week, a lawyer for Fred Anderson, Apple's former CFO, released a prepared statement that his client "did not play any day-to-day role in the granting, reporting, and accounting of stock options and he was not involved in any knowing manipulation of the process."

But analyzing the accounting of options is an esoteric pursuit, and people familiar with the Apple case say Anderson could be facing indictment -- a concern big enough to warrant the hiring of a "crisis communications" specialist this week to speak on his behalf.

FLIGHT PATH

Howell's trajectory into backdating ignominy is as unlikely as the route that Jobs, a first-semester college dropout, took to becoming the personification of a wildly successful tech company.

Howell graduated from the John F. Kennedy University School of Law in Walnut Creek, a school unaccredited by the American Bar Association, and passed the bar in 1996.

She soon found herself in the legal department of floundering Apple Computer, a company in such rough shape that it was having a tough time finding in-house lawyers.

But it didn't take long for it to become clear that Howell's timing was lucky: In 1997, Apple acquired Next, the company that Jobs founded after leaving Apple in 1985. The merger saw Jobs return as CEO, leading the company to remarkable success while bringing close associates to executive and board positions.

Howell eventually took over the responsibility of options administration. When her direct supervisor, Michael Wyatt, left in 2000, Howell -- who had been practicing law only four years -- found herself as one of the only corporate lawyers left in the department, and began reporting directly to General Counsel Nancy Heinen.

That was the case through the end of the tech boom and the ensuing bust cycle, which flooded the job market with more experienced corporate attorneys who would've been happy to have Howell's job.

It was in that atmosphere that someone decided to grant Jobs a pile of backdated options -- and it was up to Howell to fill out that paperwork, which, according to people familiar with the case, included writing up minutes for a board meeting that never happened.

HITTING THE FAN

Howell continued working at Apple through a serious personal crisis in 2005 and the spring 2006 firing of Heinen -- which came, according to people with knowledge of the situation, after a disagreement between the GC and Jobs unrelated to the backdating.

DOJ_NMG_0113048

Heinen has been represented by Cristina Arguedas, of Arguedas, Cassman & Headley and by Miles Ehrlich of Ramsey & Ehrlich since shortly after Apple's internal probe into backdating was launched.

Also around the beginning of that probe, Howell's role regarding options came under close scrutiny.

She went on leave over the summer, said people with knowledge of the situation and, sources said, was eventually terminated as a result of the investigation. Howell's role has since been detailed to the San Francisco federal prosecutors and SEC lawyers investigating the case, said people with knowledge of the investigation.

It's not clear what the government will decide to do with that information. While they could decide to bring a case against her, it's unlikely that prosecutors would bring criminal charges in such a high-profile case if they were limited to a non-executive employee.

That sets up a tense dynamic for the prosecutors and the subjects of their investigation. Whereas Howell will probably try to extricate herself by saying superiors ordered her to fabricate filings, those superiors, said people familiar with the case, are certain to argue that the wrongdoing was limited to Howell, who, as an attorney, would be expected to know that faking documents is illegal.

The other question is the extent to which prosecutors and SEC regulators will look beyond the legal department in an attempt to bring charges.

Anderson's crisis management specialist, Paul Kranhold, referred a request for comment to the earlier prepared statement by Anderson's lawyer, Jerome Roth of Munger, Tolles & Olson. And George Riley, the O'Melveny & Myers partner representing Apple, was even less loquacious about the case. "I have no comment at all," he said.

Nor did Mark Pomerantz, the Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison partner who, several people with knowledge of the investigation said, represents Jobs.

A GATHERING STORM

People with knowledge of the Apple probe say they expect it to gain steam over the next few weeks, and that if the prosecution team -- mainly Assistant U.S. Attorney Christopher Steskal and his supervisor, Eumi Choi -- were to file charges, it could happen within the next two months.

But that could change because in most of the options cases, defendants have been willing to sign tolling agreements, which prolong the statute of limitations to give prosecutors extra time to investigate, extending the time targets have to persuade prosecutors not to indict.

As they move forward with their probe, the prosecutors will have to weigh several considerations: Is Apple's assertion that Jobs knew about backdating, but wasn't aware of its impropriety, plausible?

And is it possible that someone in Howell's position could -- or would -- backdate grants to benefit executives without her superiors knowing?

In arguing no, it's likely that her lawyer, Carlucci, will use as a defense Howell's lack of experience -- in contrast to the defense that her superior's lawyer has offered.

"Nancy Heinen has got 20 years of her reputation to stand on, period, and I'll put that up against any innuendo or rumor any time," Arguedas said.

FCC Rules Expected On Phone Records (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, January 8, 2007

Four months after Hewlett-Packard's spying scandal, the Federal Communications Commission is expected within weeks to set new rules protecting personal phone records from unauthorized disclosure.

The move follows last summer's revelations that investigators for Hewlett-Packard used deception to obtain the phone records of board members and reporters in an effort to identify the sources of news leaks about company matters.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin is recommending the FCC order land-line and wireless phone carriers to require that customers use a password to immediately obtain their calling records from a representative by phone, FCC officials say.

Customers also could obtain their records without a password by asking phone companies to send the information to their home addresses, or having a phone company representative call them back at their home or cellphone number of record.

Those trying to obtain their calling data online would have to use a password.

A majority of the FCC's five commissioners support the proposal, though some details could be modified before the new rules are approved in the next few weeks, agency officials say.

In 2005, lawmakers began raising concerns about the practice known as "pretexting," where data brokers pose as someone else and trick phone-company representatives into turning over that person's calling information, such as numbers called, and the time and duration of calls. The brokers then sell the data, often for use in legal or domestic disputes.

Congress last month passed a bill criminalizing the practice of lying to obtain phone records, with violators facing fines and up to 10 years in prison. President Bush is expected to sign the legislation.

Phone companies have opposed a password requirement, fearing it would mean hassles for subscribers. But in a recent letter to the FCC, Verizon and Verizon Wireless said they back a password mandate to obtain call details, as long as it's not needed simply to discuss an account with customer service.

"I think we've tried to figure out a way to balance (customer convenience) while also making sure we add some additional protections," the FCC's Martin says. Under Martin's proposal, a customer also would be able to discuss a particular call on a bill without a password. Carriers also would have to notify customers if their passwords are changed to ensure they were not illegally altered online by a pretexter.

Marc Rotenberg of the Electronic Privacy Information Center says the proposed rules are "a step in the right direction," but a more foolproof strategy would be to not provide calling details on a bill.

Pay Is Company's Prerogative (USAT)

By Yaron Brook

Critics of CEO pay are lampooning the $210 million Robert Nardelli received after a disappointing six-year tenure at Home Depot. Rep. Barney Frank, the new chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, calls Nardelli's pay package "confirmation of the need to deal with a pattern of CEO pay that appears to be out of control."

By what right does the government, or anyone else, claim the power to dictate what owners of Home Depot or any other private company can pay someone to run their company? It's their company. If through error or irrationality they overpay (or underpay, and so fail to attract good managers), as Home Depot may have done, the loss is theirs.

The only valid reason to be concerned about CEO pay is that our government actively prevents market forces from operating. For instance, restrictions on board membership and hostile takeovers today stop large shareholders with extensive business knowledge, especially financial institutions, from influencing CEO pay. Anyone concerned about the health of corporate America would demand repeal of all such regulations.

But far from demanding repeal of the regulations, critics of CEO pay agitate for ever more control over corporate governance. They are not concerned with corporate wealth creation, but with "corporate social responsibility" — the idea that executives and shareholders should be forced to sacrifice money-making for the sake of sundry "stakeholders." These critics demand that companies staff boards with labor activists, invest in irrational environmental schemes, and provide above-market health benefits with no regard for the cost to shareholders.

This vision of corporate altruism is not only destructive, it is immoral. America is the land in which every individual, including a CEO, can pursue happiness through productive work. Morally, CEOs should focus on creating wealth and making profits for their shareholders, and they should be regarded as heroes, not villains, for doing so. Theirs is an enormously demanding job, with billions of dollars riding on their judgment. They should be paid handsomely for their services.

How much? That is for the owners of each company — and more widely, the participants in a truly free market — to establish.

Yaron Brook is executive director of the Ayn Rand Institute, which promotes individual rights and free enterprise. (Home Depot and Robert Nardelli declined to provide an opposing view to this editorial.)

Working Harder For The Man (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

Robert L. Nardelli, the chairman and chief executive of Home Depot, began the new year with a pink slip and a golden parachute. The company handed him a breathtaking $210 million to take a hike. What would he have been worth if he'd done a good job?

Data recently compiled by the Center for Labor Market Studies at Northeastern University in Boston offers a startling look at just how out of whack executive compensation has become. Some of the Wall Street Christmas bonuses last month were fabulous enough to resurrect an adult's belief in Santa Claus. Morgan Stanley's John Mack got stock and options worth in excess of $40 million. Lloyd Blankfein at Goldman Sachs did even better — $53.4 million.

According to the center's director, Andrew Sum, the top five Wall Street firms (Bear Stearns, Goldman Sachs, Lehman Brothers, Merrill Lynch and Morgan Stanley) were expected to award an estimated $36 billion to $44 billion worth of bonuses to their 173,000 employees, an average of between $208,000 and $254,000, "with the bulk of the gains accruing to the top 1,000 or so highest-paid managers."

Now consider what's been happening to the bulk of the American population, the ordinary men and women who have to work for a living somewhere below the stratosphere of the top corporate executives. Between 2000 and 2006, labor productivity in the nonfarm sector of the economy rose by an impressive 18 percent. But workers were not paid for that impressive effort. During that period, according to Mr. Sum, the inflation-adjusted weekly wages of workers increased by just 1 percent.

That's $3.20 a week. As Mr. Sum wryly observed, that won't even buy you a six-pack of Bud Light. Joe Six-Pack has been downsized. Three bucks ain't what it used to be.

There are 93 million production and nonsupervisory workers (exclusive of farmworkers) in the U.S. Their combined real annual earnings from 2000 to 2006 rose by $15.4 billion, which is less than half of the combined bonuses awarded by the five Wall Street firms for just one year.

"Just these bonuses — for one year — overwhelmingly exceed all the pay increases received by these workers over the entire six-year period," said Mr. Sum.

In a development described by Mr. Sum as "quite stark and rather bleak for the economic well-being of the average worker," the once strong link between productivity gains and real wage increases has been severed. The mystery to me is why workers aren't more scandalized. If your productivity increases by 18 percent and your pay goes up by 1 percent, you've been dealt a hand full of jokers in a game in which jokers aren't wild.

Workers have received some modest increases in benefits over the past six years, but most of the money from their productivity gains — by far, it's not even a close call — has gone into profits and the salaries of top executives.

Fairness plays no role in this system. The corporate elite control it, and they have turned it to their ends.

Mr. Sum, a longtime expert on the economic life of the American worker, said he is astonished at the degree to which ordinary workers have been shortchanged over the past several years. "Productivity has been exceptional," he said. "And for most of my life, the way to get wages up was to be more productive. That's how our economy was supposed to work."

The productivity gains in the go-go decades that followed World War II were broadly shared, and the result was a dramatic, sustained increase in the quality of life for most Americans. Nowadays workers have to be more productive just to maintain their economic status quo. Productivity gains are no longer broadly shared. They're barely shared at all.

The pervasive unfairness in the way the great wealth of the United States is distributed should be seen for what it is, an insidious disease eating away at the structure of the society and undermining its future. The middle class is hurting, propped up by the wobbly crutches of personal debt. The safety net, not just for the poor, but for the middle class as well, is disappearing. The savings rate has dropped to below zero, and more Americans are filing for bankruptcy than for divorce.

Your pension? Don't ask.

There's a reason why the power elite get bent out of shape at the merest mention of a class conflict in the U.S. The fear is that the cringing majority that has taken it on the chin for so long will wise up and begin to fight back.

CRIMINAL LAW:

States Turn To Texas For Execution Guidance (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson And Richard Willing

On the evening of Nov. 6, 2001, convicted murderer Terry Clark became the first New Mexico inmate put to death in 41 years. The execution itself wasn't the only thing notable about that evening in the Santa Fe death chamber.

The executioner who carried out the death sentence was an unidentified contractor who learned how to administer a deadly chemical cocktail as a member of the lethal injection team in Texas, which operates the nation's busiest death house. Texas "was right next door, and they were obviously experienced," New Mexico spokeswoman Tia Bland says. The unidentified executioner was paid $6,300, she says.

"We contacted other states," says Bland, whose state has not executed anyone since Clark, "but Texas was the only one willing to accept the contract."

The outsourced execution, and others like it, has drawn attention to Texas' growing reputation as the nation's source for behind-the-scenes guidance and experience in carrying out lethal injections at a time when that method of execution is increasingly under fire.

As lawsuits from California to Florida have challenged the constitutionality of lethal injections, more than a dozen states and the federal government have sought Texas' advice in carrying out such executions.

The lawsuits have alleged, among other things, that unqualified execution teams sometimes have botched the procedure and made it a cruel and unusual punishment that should be considered illegal under the Eighth Amendment.

Problems with the recent execution of Angel Diaz in Florida triggered a temporary suspension of the death penalty in that state while authorities review injection procedures and questions about how much inmates suffer when they are executed by injection. An autopsy revealed that Diaz's execution took 34 minutes — more than twice as long as a typical execution — because needles carrying the lethal drugs had not been inserted properly into Diaz's veins.

Meanwhile, a federal judge in California recently extended a moratorium on executions there after citing a "lack of professionalism" in execution protocols. Last year, challenges to lethal injection were brought in Maryland, Oklahoma, Missouri, Virginia and Georgia. Last month, Maryland's state Court of Appeals suspended executions in that state, ruling that part of the guidelines for carrying out lethal injections were not approved correctly under state law.

Together, the lawsuits represent the most significant challenges to date of the method of execution used by nearly all of the 38 states that have the death penalty.

Lethal injections typically involve a mixture of three drugs administered in the following order:

•Sodium thiopental, which renders the inmate unconscious;

•A muscle relaxant such as pancuronium bromide to stop all muscle movement except that of the heart;

•Potassium chloride, which stops the heart.

The precise mixture of chemicals and the protocols for how to inject the drugs vary slightly among the states, but when officials in a state begin developing or revising their guidelines for carrying out executions, they often start with a trip to Texas. Since the U.S. Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty in 1976, Texas has executed 379 killers — nearly 36% of all the inmates executed in the USA since then, and almost four times the number executed by Virginia, which ranks second in executions.

The trips by officials from other states and the federal government who visit Texas generally are not publicized. Texas Department of Criminal Justice spokeswoman Michelle Lyons says that such trips usually are planned around a scheduled execution in Texas, so that the visiting officials can shadow the entire procedure.

Seats also are reserved for visiting officials in the "chemical room," where an anonymous executioner starts the flow of the lethal drugs to the prisoner through intravenous lines.

"Where else would you go to learn that?" asks Larry Fitzgerald, a former Texas prisons spokesman who witnessed 219 executions in eight years with the Texas Department of Criminal Justice.

The sheer number of executions in Texas was one reason federal prison authorities went to Huntsville in 2001 as they prepared to execute Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh. On June 11, 2001, McVeigh — who was convicted in the 1995 attack on a federal building that killed 168 people and wounded hundreds more — became the first federal prisoner put to death in 38 years.

Federal Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin, who then managed the U.S. government's death row operation in Terre Haute, Ind., was an observer on Feb. 8, 2001, when Texas inmate Adolph Hernandez was executed for killing a 69-year-old woman in 1988. (Lappin recently was named to a Florida commission reviewing lethal injection procedures in the aftermath of Diaz's execution.)

Fitzgerald says prison authorities from more than a dozen states, including Alabama, New York and California, have made similar excursions to Texas to observe executions and develop their own protocols not only for dispensing a lethal dose of chemicals, but also for controlling crowds outside the execution facility and dealing with media.

Fitzgerald also says that states sometimes have arranged to have members of Texas' execution team carry out death sentences in those states. "On occasion, they have been content with our guys to do the execution," he says.

Texas' Department of Criminal Justice has declined to disclose any potentially identifying information about members of the execution team, except to indicate that they are non-physicians with specific medical training to start IV lines and dispense the lethal chemicals. The department also will not reveal how the team members are selected or describe the terms of their contracts with the state of Texas.

Lyons says the department does not monitor execution team members' involvement in out-of-state executions. She says she does not know how frequently Texas teams are hired by other states.

In Connecticut, the attorney for convicted serial killer Michael Ross says he believes the state sought the assistance of Texas executioners when his client was put to death by lethal injection on May 13, 2005. "It was my understanding that our Department of Corrections had obtained guidance and assistance from Texas," attorney T.R. Paulding says.

Connecticut's Department of Corrections has declined to say whether Texas authorities were involved in Ross' execution.

Michael Radelet, chairman of the Sociology Department at the University of Colorado, calls the practice of contract executions "bizarre."

"I suspect that those states look to Texas simply because they do not want to undergo the training costs to qualify their own" executioners, Radelet says. "Then again, given the stigma surrounding the executioner profession for the past several hundred years, perhaps this is simply another sign that more and more people are realizing that this is not a good profession to be in."

He notes that although Texas is recognized as the authority in carrying out the death penalty, there have been complications in several of the state's executions.

In a review published by the Death Penalty Information Center, a group based in Washington, D.C., that opposes the death penalty, Radelet cited 37 instances — including 10 from Texas — in which there were problems during an execution. The problems included execution team members having difficulty finding veins in an inmate's arm in order to inject the drugs and a 1988 case in which a catheter popped out of a condemned man's vein, causing the execution process to be restarted.

Jonathan Groner, associate professor of surgery at Ohio State University's College of Medicine and Public Health, says it would not be uncommon for state officials to gather "the family recipes" from jurisdictions where executions are most common.

"The problem is that the process is so secretive," Groner says, referring in part to the backgrounds and oversight of executioners. Because physician ethics prohibit doctors from overseeing executions, Groner calls the lethal injection process a "medical charade."

"Lethal injection involves medical technology," he says, "but does not include medical expertise."

The New Math On Crime (USNEWS)

By Will Sullivan

DOJ_NMG_0113053

Even before the fireworks launched from the French Quarter's Jackson Square, 2006 went out with a bang in New Orleans-a handful of them, actually. At 7 p.m. on December 31, several of those bangs felled a 42-year-old man, who was found inside his FEMA trailer with multiple gunshot wounds to the back of his head. At 8:45 p.m., another man was shot several times and left dead on the sidewalk. At 10:12 p.m., a third was killed inside his home.

The three men were some of the last murder victims in an unusually bloody 2006. The year is expected to snap a long stretch of relatively good news on the homicide front nationwide, moving questions about the causes of crime increases off the back burner they have occupied for more than a decade. Those questions have so far eluded satisfying answers, and many experts contend that fears of a sustained rise in murders have little foundation. But the numbers are causing more than a little alarm and getting more than a little attention-from the nation's police chiefs, from Congress, from the Justice Department, perhaps even from the president in his State of the Union speech later this month. Slowly but surely, violent crime is returning to the national agenda.

Nationwide murder totals for 2006 will not be available until the fall, when the FBI releases its annual Uniform Crime Report. But an analysis by U.S. News shows a substantive, if uneven, increase in homicide in the nation's 20 largest cities. The 19 cities for which data were available had 4,152 homicides in 2006, compared with 3,919 the previous year-a 6 percent increase. Phoenix, which could not provide a year-end number, had neared its 2005 total of 238 by the end of November.

Murder is considered the most reliable crime statistic because such a high percentage of killings are reported. So the numbers are always watched closely as an indicator of crime trends. The beginning of the crack epidemic brought soaring murder numbers-a 31 percent increase between 1984 and its peak in 1993. But as the drug's popularity waned, so did murder, falling to around 16,000 a year and staying there for the early years after the millennium. More recently, the plateau has ended. Homicide showed an uptick in 2005, and the FBI's preliminary numbers from the first six months of 2006, along with the yearlong data collected by U.S. News, suggest the increase continued last year.

Some cities were hit especially hard. Philadelphia's 406 homicides were the most in the City of Brotherly Love since 1997. Oakland, Calif., topped its 2005 homicide tally by more than 50, and Cincinnati's 85 homicides were literally unprecedented.

As the year's crime numbers come in, the Police Executive Research Forum has sounded the alarm. An October report from the police advocacy group, titled "A Gathering Storm," expresses concern that the increases signal the beginning of "an epidemic of violence not seen for years." Though not all cities have suffered a crime spike, PERF pushes for more federal cooperation with local law enforcement and more federal funding. "If the pandemic flu were to hit 20 cities in the United States, I don't think the Centers for Disease Control would say, 'Well, let's see how many other cities it hits,'" says Chuck Wexler, the group's director.

Anomalies. But there are plenty of caveats to the new numbers. New York City's nearly 10 percent rise in murders-to 590-doesn't look as bad after taking account of the city's unusually high number of "reclassified deaths," those resulting from injuries in prior years. And the city's number of homicides is still historically low; more than 2,000 people were killed in New York in 1990 alone. Houston neared its highest number of murders in a decade, but the increase largely matches the city's surge in population from Hurricane Katrina evacuees.

Several big cities, including Dallas and San Francisco, bucked the murder trend completely. Washington, D.C., ended the year 27 murders shy of its 2005 total. Los Angeles's historically undermanned police force saw its fifth straight year with a reduction of violent crime.

In fact, the 6 percent increase in murders in the country's 20 largest cities is lower than the 9 percent rise the FBI charted in the first six months of the year. And once smaller cities are included, the FBI recorded only a 1.4 percent increase in that time. On average, smaller cities actually showed dramatic declines in their number of homicides.

That is more variability than was seen in the '80s and '90s, when murders spiked and then plummeted almost everywhere. The inconsistency leads some experts to contend that this year's increase is more an idiosyncratic phenomenon than a national crisis. Even among criminologists, there's not a lot of agreement over what's happening-or why.

In his new book, The Great American Crime Decline, Franklin Zimring, a professor at the University of California-Berkeley law school and an expert on crime statistics, tackles the prevailing explanations for what causes changes in crime numbers and finds them wanting. "Any blip in homicide statistics is unnerving because we don't know why we've had this epidemic of good news," he says. "There are a hundred theories and no confirmations."

Yet even some experts who remain agnostic on the significance of the more recent rise in homicides point to factors that could have contributed. Alfred Blumstein, a criminology professor at Carnegie Mellon University, highlights a diversion of resources from traditional crime fighting to preventing terrorism and a reduction in social services to the poorest neighborhoods. He also notes the phasing out of federal money for the Clinton-era COPS program, which gives grants to put more police officers on the street. The PERF report, "A Gathering Storm," partially blames the loss of funds for shrinking police forces in many cities. "I must confess, I expected [murder] to go up two or three years ago," Blumstein says.

With the Dow reaching new records last year and relatively low unemployment, an economic explanation for the rise in violence would seem unlikely. But Richard Rosenfeld, a criminology professor at the University of Missouri-St. Louis, says the economy's strong finish in 2006 belied a volatile year, with concerns about fuel costs and the end of the housing boom. The lack of economic stability especially impacts the urban poor, who are most likely to turn to crime, he says.

That explanation doesn't convince Philip Cook, an economist and professor at Duke University who has written on crime numbers. He disputes the grim portrayal of the 2006 economy and also argues that the link between the economy and murder levels is unproven. Recall the '60s, Cook says, when the economy and murder numbers grew hand in hand.

Police departments have widely cited armed young people as the cause of their recent violence woes, and some speculate that the rise in murders is simply the result of a larger segment of the population entering the prime years for committing crime-generally thought to be ages 15 to 24. The claim is bolstered by FBI statistics showing that the number of murder offenders under the age of 18 and 22 both jumped dramatically in 2005. But the number of young people has risen for some years, with no discernible impact on crime before now.

Some experts suggest the country is suffering the fallout of its own "get tough" crime policies in the 1980s and '90s. The problem was explored in a 2003 Urban Institute study of Maryland, which suggested that the state will face increasing challenges in dealing with a growing population struggling to re-enter society after being incarcerated.

G-men. The uncertainty has not deterred federal eyes from turning back to the problem of urban crime. Under pressure from police groups, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the Initiative for Safer Communities in October, a study of 18 areas with both rising and falling crime to analyze the most effective law enforcement methods. Last month, California Sen. Dianne Feinstein sent a letter to FBI Director Robert Mueller, urging the agency to "re-evaluate its priorities" and place a higher emphasis on investigating violent crime. And Bush administration officials say the president could make an anticrime effort part of his State of the Union address January 23 or put a new initiative in his proposed budget for fiscal year 2008.

Local officials are also rethinking their efforts. In Indianapolis, which saw homicides climb from 110 in 2005 to 137 last year, police have installed their own version of the increasingly popular Compstat system, which combines computerized crime mapping with management brainstorming sessions on how best to combat the latest local crime trends. Recommendations from a mayor's task force are also expected shortly. "We're very optimistic that we'll see a decrease in those numbers in 2007," says Police Chief Michael Spears.

But the year didn't start well. About four hours into 2007, 27-year-old Eric Munoz was found dead in the clubhouse of Indianapolis's Naptown Riders motorcycle club. For Spears, the homicide was humbling, a reminder of a police department's limitations. "If we had 10 officers on patrol outside that location, it wouldn't have prevented it," he says.

The news is worse in New Orleans, where at least seven people have been murdered since the New Year-six within 24 hours. One was 36-year-old Helen Hill, who was shot in the neck inside her home. When police arrived, they found her husband bleeding from gunshot wounds to his hand, arm, and cheek. He was holding the couple's 2-year-old son. The statistics may be ambiguous, but in many cities, the bangs are real.

Polygamist's Papers Topic Of Hearing (AP)

By Jennifer Dobner, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

DOJ_NMG_0113055

SALT LAKE CITY -- When a Cadillac Escalade ferrying polygamist church leader Warren Jeffs was pulled over in Nevada in August, authorities found $54,000 cash, 15 cell phones, portable radios, wigs and four laptops.

The documents stored on those computers was to be the subject of a legal tug-of-war Monday as Jeffs' attorneys try to convince a judge that the laptops contain privileged communication between the spiritual leader and his followers.

Jeffs, the 51-year-old leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, was picked up in a traffic stop near Las Vegas on federal warrants after evading prosecution in Utah and Arizona for nearly two years.

He's now in a southern-Utah county jail pending an April trial on two felony counts of rape as an accomplice related to a 2001 arranged marriage between a 14-year-old girl and her cousin.

Attorneys for the United Effort Plan Trust, which holds $110 million in church property, and Shem Fischer, a former follower who sued Jeffs after being fired, want U.S. District Court Judge Robert Jones in Las Vegas to grant them standing in Jeffs' case.

They also want access to papers, letters and electronic documents being held by the FBI.

In court documents, Jeffs' Las Vegas attorney Richard Wright contends the information on the laptops is "sacred and confidential" because it includes matters of church doctrine and private communications between Jeffs and his followers.

Wright did not return calls from The Associated Press seeking comment. In court papers he asks the court to return the seized evidence to Jeffs.

Shem Fischer's attorneys disagrees. "The documents may shed more information as to where (church) assets have been hidden, in what form they are held and where they are held," Las Vegas attorney Ariel Stern said.

In 2002, Fischer sued Jeffs, the church and a church-controlled cabinet company, for religious discrimination. Fischer said he was fired after he left the FLDS faith. He won a default judgment and now wants to collect the balance of what he's owed.

Like Fischer, Bruce Wisan wants to know if Jeffs' papers and electronic records will lead to church assets that rightfully belong to the trust and should benefit all current and former church members.

The trust is comprised of nearly all the property in Hildale, Colorado City, Ariz., and British Columbia, where church members live in assigned housing. A Utah judge made Wisan overseer of the trust in 2005 after finding Jeffs and other church leaders were fleecing it for personal gain.

Jeffs is also facing felony charges in Mohave County, Ariz., for other arranged marriages. He's expected to be extradited there following the Utah case.

Evidence Hearing For Jeffs Today In Las Vegas (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, January 8, 2007

LAS VEGAS — The "mother lode" of evidence the FBI seized when it arrested Fundamentalist LDS Church leader Warren Jeffs will be fought over in a federal courtroom today.

Warren Jeffs A hearing is scheduled on who can get involved in the fight over papers, ledgers, letters, computers and other items that were found in the Cadillac Escalade in which Jeffs was riding. Among those who want a peek: the court-appointed special fiduciary of the United Effort Plan Trust, an ex-FLDS Church member who won a lawsuit against Jeffs, and the Utah Attorney General's Office.

The feds don't seem willing to give it up.

"We will just continue with our same interest in the case," said Melodie Rydalch, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney for Utah, which is handling the case. "That is protecting the evidence that can be used in a criminal case."

Lawyers for the man placed in charge of the FLDS Church's financial empire want to see if any of the evidence tells them anything about the UEP Trust.

"It could tell a lot," said Jeffrey L. Shields, an attorney for court-appointed special fiduciary Bruce Wisan. "We're hopeful it will give us some insight into the previous management of the trust."

In 2005, a judge in Salt Lake City's 3rd District Court took control of the trust after allegations surfaced that Jeffs and other top FLDS leaders had been "fleecing" the $110 million financial empire of the polygamous church. The UEP Trust was recently reformed, doing away with the "united order" and paving the way for private property ownership.

Wisan has been told that the documents are the "mother lode" of information about the polygamous church's inner workings and business interests.

FBI agents have told the Deseret Morning News the seized evidence includes ledgers containing names of people who helped keep Jeffs on the run. The FLDS leader was put on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list until he was arrested in a traffic stop outside Las Vegas in August 2006.

Shortly afterward, his lawyer Richard Wright filed an emergency motion in federal court demanding the return of the documents, saying they are "privileged communications" between the FLDS leader and his followers.

"The administrative impound impinges on the First Amendment right to the free exercise of religion insomuch as the government took possession of religious documents which are deemed confidential and sacred by the FLDS," Wright said in his motion.

Shields fought to see what the FBI seized when it arrested Jeffs' brother, Seth, during a traffic stop in Pueblo, Colo., last year. Seth Jeffs later pleaded guilty to harboring a fugitive.

"Some of the documents we received were helpful," Shields said of what the FBI gave up in the Seth Jeffs case. "He just had partial stuff. We think that the Warren Jeffs documents will be more complete."

Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff has also expressed interest in seeing the documents, believing they may help his organized crime investigation into Jeffs and the FLDS Church.

Jeffs, 51, is charged in 5th District Court in St. George with rape as an accomplice, a first-degree felony. He is accused of forcing a 14-year-old girl into a marriage with her 19-year-old cousin. He is scheduled to face trial on those charges beginning in April.

Across the border in Mohave County, Ariz., Jeffs is facing multiple charges of sexual conduct with a minor and conspiracy to commit sexual conduct with a minor. Prosecutors there have accused him of arranging several child bride marriages.

Fitzgerald's Wild Source Chase (WSJ)

Patrick Fitzgerald's trial of Scooter Libby is set to begin this month, assuming anyone can still remember what this case is all about. Oh, yes, Mr. Fitzgerald is prosecuting Mr. Libby for lying in order to . . . well, we're still waiting to hear a motive for this alleged perjury to cover up a leak that wasn't a crime. But perhaps the prosecutor will come up with something.

Meantime, Mr. Fitzgerald has some other unfinished legal business that the public has a right to know about -- namely, the affidavits he filed with the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals to justify his motion to compel two reporters to testify about their conversations with Mr. Libby, and his willingness to throw one of them in jail for 85 days until she did so. Those documents remain under seal, which is why Dow Jones and the Associated Press filed a motion with the D.C. Circuit late last month requesting their release.

Dow Jones, which owns this newspaper, and the AP are also requesting that the court now release all of the redacted parts of Judge David Tatel's 2005 concurring opinion in the D.C. Circuit ruling that compelled the reporters to testify. Responding to an earlier DJ-AP motion, the court released part of the redacted eight pages in early 2006. But it held back the rest, as well as Mr. Fitzgerald's affidavits in the case, because the prosecutor insisted his investigation was continuing.

That was a stretch even then, but it's certainly no longer true. Mr. Fitzgerald months ago told the lawyer for Karl Rove that the senior White House aide will not be indicted. And more to the point of Mr. Fitzgerald's wild newspaper source chase, we learned last summer that neither Mr. Libby nor Mr. Rove was the original source of the leak of CIA analyst Valerie Plame's name to columnist Robert Novak. As the Dow Jones-AP motion points out, "The public now knows that the Special Counsel [Mr. Fitzgerald] knew the identity of that leaker -- Richard Armitage, the former Deputy Secretary of State -- from the very beginning of his investigation."

Finding the leaker was Mr. Fitzgerald's main charge from the Justice Department, so why did he keep pursuing reporters with such hyper-zeal for another two years? His pursuit led to a constitutional showdown over the media's right to protect sources, going all the way to the Supreme Court. And the precedent -- a bad one for the press -- may well encourage a wave of attempts by prosecutors across the country to force journalists to betray their sources. The press and public both have a right to know what evidence was so compelling that Judge Tatel and Mr. Fitzgerald thought it warranted such a legal collision. All the more so now that Congress is also debating a "shield" law to protect media sources.

A wiser prosecutor than Mr. Fitzgerald would have ended his probe the minute he discovered that Mr. Armitage was the leaker. Instead, he told Mr. Armitage to keep quiet and let the public believe for two years that someone high up in the White House might have leaked for nefarious political purposes. In the end, Mr. Fitzgerald's case has been distilled to a perjury charge that, while serious as a matter of law, appears to come down to different memories about conversations Mr. Libby had with three journalists. (And, as we all know, journalists never get anything wrong.)

Whether or not Mr. Fitzgerald ever discloses a motive for a seasoned lawyer like Mr. Libby to have lied, the unsealing of the affidavits and Judge Tatel's redacted pages will help us better understand the prosecutor's motives for his troubling zeal.

Free-Market Justice (NYT)

By Morris B. Hoffman

SIXTEEN years as a state trial judge have left me with a deep respect for the professionalism and competence of the public defenders who handle felony cases for indigent criminal defendants in my courtroom. In fact, I've told friends, only half-jokingly, that if they are ever charged with a serious criminal offense, the first thing they should do is give all their assets to charity, in an effort to qualify for public defender representation.

So when two economists from Emory University, Paul Rubin and Joanna Shepherd, agreed last year to collaborate with me on an econometric study of how effective public defenders really are, I had to guard against confirmation bias. I was positive that public defenders would prove more effective than their private counterparts. Mr. Rubin and Ms. Shepherd, with their occupational faith in markets, were equally positive of just the opposite. In the end, the economists were right, though with an interesting twist. (The full study has been published in the Ohio State Journal of Criminal Law.)

We looked at all 5,224 felony criminal cases filed in Denver in 2002. Most other studies measure lawyer effectiveness through indicators like acquittal rates, but we used the one thing criminal defendants care about most: the amount of jail or prison time they receive. Thus, acquittals counted as zero. Probationary sentences likewise counted as zero, unless the probation was combined with some jail time.

We counted halfway-house sentences as 120 days, which is typical for Denver defendants. We counted the initial length of a prison sentence without decreasing it for early release or increasing it for parole violations. Life sentences we arbitrarily counted as 110 years.

My economist friends were able to use regression analyses to control for other variables (such as whether a case was plea bargained or went to trial), to minimize the chance that the differences we found were caused by factors other than effectiveness. They also used regressions with different combinations of variables, to ensure that our results were not sensitive to a particular variable.

The results were surprising. The average sentence for clients of public defenders was almost three years longer than the average for clients of private lawyers.

But our most notable finding was hidden in one of the variables we had controlled — the seriousness of the case. We had assumed that public defenders on average handled more serious cases than private lawyers, if for no other reason than that such cases carry higher bonds, and defendants who can't make those bonds are often rendered indigent by their pretrial incarceration. The length of their clients' sentences would of course be distorted by the fact that they handle more serious cases with longer potential sentences.

But when we removed the control for the seriousness of the crime, public defenders performed relatively worse, not better (five years more incarceration versus three years more).

When we examined the seriousness of the cases handled by each type of lawyer, we discovered not only that private lawyers tend to handle more serious cases, but also that as the seriousness of the case increases, the chances that a private lawyer is handling it also increases. What in the world could explain such a result?

It turns out that the explanation, at least in part, is one that should put a smile on the face of all free-marketers and rational choice theorists: criminal defendants, just like any other consumers of services, appear to be making choices based on their rational assessments of costs and benefits. But, you might ask, do criminal defendants ever really have a choice between public defenders and private counsel? It appears many do.

Our data suggested that, contrary to the law's rather binary notion of indigency, a large chunk of felony criminal defendants are what we have called "marginally indigent." They could, if they had to, tap hidden resources, or the resources of family and friends, to retain private lawyers. But what drives that decision? Just what you'd expect from any rational consumer of criminal defense services: a combination of the seriousness of the offense and the likelihood of conviction.

Imagine a guilty, marginally indigent defendant facing a relatively minor felony (for which he will most likely get probation). Now add to the mix the fact that his crime was captured on videotape, meaning he has a small chance of avoiding conviction. It is unlikely such a defendant would deplete his and his family's and friends' resources to hire a private lawyer when he could get a free public defender to achieve the same result.

At the other end of the spectrum, imagine a marginally indigent defendant charged with first degree murder, and imagine that he is innocent. Wouldn't that defendant do everything in his power to marshal the resources to hire a private lawyer, if he believed, rightly or wrongly, that the private lawyer were more likely to achieve an acquittal?

In other words, marginally indigent defendants who choose public defenders tend to be guilty. And of course if that's true, it's not at all surprising that public defenders would achieve less favorable outcomes.

More work needs to be done to confirm these results. But if they hold, and hold nationally, they could have important policy implications. Roughly one-third of all states have formal statewide public defender systems, and several others have regional or local systems. Current debates about improving these systems tend to revolve around two poles: increased financing (for which public defenders have been clamoring since the 1980s, when per client spending in most systems, in real dollars, took a nose dive from which it has never recovered) and, more recently, privatization.

If it is true that public defenders achieve substantially worse results for their clients than private lawyers, that fact should be troubling to us all, quite apart from whether the difference is the product of underfinancing, government inefficiencies or both.

But our results suggest a more benign explanation, and a less drastic solution than spending more on public defenders or privatizing the system. If self-selection by guilty, marginally indigent defendants is driving a big part of this effectiveness difference, the remedy may simply be to tighten the mechanisms we use to determine indigency. This solution would not only reduce the outcome differences between public defenders and private defense lawyers, but it would also give taxpayers more bang for their public defender buck.

Writer's Block: Valerie Plame Vs. CIA (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

A CIA panel has told former officer Valerie Plame she can't write about her undercover work for the agency, a position that may threaten a lucrative book project with her publisher. Plame's outing as a CIA officer in July 2003 triggered a criminal probe that culminates next week when Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff I. Lewis (Scooter) Libby goes on trial for perjury and obstruction.

But in what could be a precursor to a separate legal battle, Plame recently hired a lawyer to challenge the CIA Publications Review Board, which must clear writings by former employees. The panel refused Plame permission to even mention that she worked for the CIA because she served as a "nonofficial cover" officer (or NOC) posing as a private businesswoman, according to an adviser to Plame, who asked not to be identified discussing a sensitive issue. "She believes this will effectively gut the book," said the adviser. Larry Johnson, a former colleague, said the agency's action seems punitive, given that other ex-CIA undercover officers have published books. But even Plame's friends acknowledge that few NOCs have done so. CIA spokesman Mark

Mansfield said the panel was still having "ongoing" talks with Plame to resolve the dispute. "The sole yardstick," he said, is that books "contain no classified information." A spokesman for Simon & Schuster, Plame's publisher, declined to comment.

Taser Sells Small Version For Wider Use (USAT)

By Robert Davis

Taser International today unveils a new model of its controversial stun gun designed for widespread use by regular folks. It's more affordable and small enough to be stashed in a purse or backpack.

Critics and supporters have a lot to say about the sleek device unveiled at the 2007 International Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas. The size of a TV remote control, the Taser C2 goes on sale in April for about $300 and comes in the metallic pink, electric blue and titanium silver of popular cellphones.

Opponents say Tasers can be used for torture; supporters say the devices are safe when used appropriately.

Taser has sold about 120,000 civilian versions since 1994, a model that is larger than the latest incarnation and shaped like a gun. Since 1991, Taser has sold more than 200,000 devices to law enforcement. Both shoot barbs that pierce the skin and deliver an incapacitating jolt of electricity. Current civilian models cost about $1,000.

Taser says the C2, less powerful than the police version, is designed to stun for 30 seconds, providing enough time for the shooter to flee from danger.

"It's a terrible idea. It's a dangerous idea," says Larry Cox, executive director of Amnesty International USA, which says there have been 200 Taser-related deaths. "I can't think of any reason you would want these out in public."

Daniel Garza, 42, was glad he bought the civilian Taser when a man climbed in the back seat of his truck Dec. 17 at a Yuba City, Calif., Wal-Mart. Garza zapped the intruder, who was arrested. "The Taser did the job," Garza says.

Private citizens are not allowed to own Tasers in the District of Columbia, Hawaii, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Michigan, New Jersey, New York and Wisconsin.

Taser C2 "is a device (owners) can keep in their nightstand," says Taser president Tom Smith. Safeguards include:

•It's sold "inert" and can be activated by the Scottsdale, Ariz.-based company only after a background check by SureCheck, which costs $10.

•When the device is fired, it sprays about 30 tiny pieces of confetti encoded with the serial number of the cartridge. The tags allow police to trace the device back to the registered owner.

The Taser C2 has some police worried. "There are concerns in law enforcement about the public having access to these types of weapons," says Wendy Balazik, spokeswoman for the International Association of Chiefs of Police. "Those concerns include: Who is buying them? How are they going to be used? What are they going to be used for?"

Testing The Testers (NYT)

There is by now no doubt that there are serious problems with electronic voting machines: they fail to record votes, and even flip votes from one candidate to another. Election officials like to defend the machines by noting that they have been certified by independent testing labs. But the certification process has long been deeply flawed, and last week there was even more disturbing news — that the leading testing lab has been unable to meet the federal government's standards.

Since last summer, Ciber Inc., the largest tester of voting machine software, has been unable to meet federal quality standards that will take effect later this year.

It is disturbing that if Christopher Drew had not reported this in The Times, the public still would not know. The Election Assistance Commission, the agency that evaluates the labs, did not reveal that Ciber fell short, and is still not saying what is wrong. Ciber, which is still working on meeting the standards, did not return our phone call.

Many Americans are using electronic voting machines that were certified by Ciber. Were those certifications done properly? Did whatever deficiencies Ciber has now exist then? No one is saying.

Since many jurisdictions, and some whole states, now use electronic voting machines that do not produce a paper record, certification is extremely important. It is one of the few ways of determining whether a machine wrongly records votes, either by accident or by design.

Even before the news about Ciber, certification was a troubled process. The biggest problem is that the voting machine manufacturers pay the labs to do the examination and certification. This is a conflict of interest. If a lab raises too many concerns, it risks losing a client to a more compliant competitor.

There is also too little transparency. The labs, which see themselves as working for the voting machine companies, do not tell the public when they find problems or what those problems are.

Congress should pass legislation fixing the system. The vendors should continue to pay the costs, but the government should choose and pay the labs. That would make the labs responsive to the correct customer — the public.

It should also enact strong transparency rules. Voters should know how testing is done, and have full and timely access to the results. Congress should also require the Election Assistance Commission to be more open about how it evaluates the labs. If a lab falls short, the public — which may currently be using machines certified by that lab — should be told right away what the deficiencies are.

The veil of secrecy that hangs over certification is good for the companies that make voting machines and for the ones that test them. The government should not be protecting those private interests.

It should be protecting the voting public.

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Defends Recent Record Of Antitrust Division (LEGALT)

By Jason McLure, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 8, 2007

Did Oracle result in a loss of nerve? Division chief says no.

For more than two years, the Justice Department's Antitrust Division has been trying to shake the perception that it's been snakebitten.

In this case, the fangs, as it were, were those of Judge Vaughn Walker and his 2004 opinion clearing the way for software maker Oracle Corp.'s merger with PeopleSoft Inc. over the objections of the Justice Department's trust-busters.

Since that decision, in which Walker found that the Justice Department didn't prove that the deal was anti-competitive, the department hasn't gone to trial to block a proposed merger. In the past year alone — the fourth-largest in history for mergers and acquisitions, according to Thomson Financial — AT&T Inc. received the Justice Department's unconditional go-ahead to acquire BellSouth Corp. in a deal that creates a telecom behemoth with $117 billion in revenue; Whirlpool Corp. nabbed Maytag Inc., merging the first- and third-largest makers of home appliances; and agriculture-technology giant Monsanto Co. announced a bid to buy Delta & Pine Land Co., the country's largest cottonseed producer.

"Ever since the Oracle-PeopleSoft decision, the common observation has been that the division has been fearful of taking strong positions against mergers," says Albert Foer, who heads the American Antitrust Institute, echoing a view privately expressed by a number of antitrust lawyers.

It's a perception that Thomas Barnett, the head of the Antitrust Division, isn't happy about. "I don't agree with it," Barnett says, before ticking off what he views as the division's major merger challenges over the past year: a pretrial settlement with a dairy company protecting competition in milk sales to a number of schools in Kentucky and Tennessee, a consent decree with Mittal Steel Co. requiring it to sell a Canadian tin plant as part of its purchase of Arcelor S.A., and another consent decree requiring the sale of six generating plants as part of a merger between two power companies — a deal later blocked by New Jersey state officials.

Those actions, of course, are hardly of the magnitude of Oracle-PeopleSoft, the challenge to which Barnett helped oversee as a deputy to then-antitrust chief R. Hewitt Pate. And Barnett, who was confirmed as the division's assistant attorney general in February, is sensitive to criticism that his division hasn't been vigorously protecting consumers or playing an active role in public policy.

Late last month the Justice Department issued a release touting the Antitrust Division's achievements during his first year on the job. (Before his confirmation, Barnett served as the division's acting chief for several months.) The release highlights the division's continued crackdown on international price-fixing cartels (which netted nearly $500 million in criminal fines in 2006), its streamlining of the merger review process, and the division's recent spurt of activity before the Supreme Court (the high court has granted cert in seven antitrust cases over the past two terms, an unusually high number) as evidence that its lawyers have been anything but inactive.

Barnett also says the division is close to finishing a long-overdue report on antitrust and intellectual property law with the Federal Trade Commission, an agency whose views in that area the Justice Department publicly critiqued in a Supreme Court brief last summer.

Despite those activities, it's the division's merger-enforcement activity — or relative lack thereof — that is most notable to many antitrust lawyers in private practice. Behind the cautious approach, say these practitioners, is more than just conservative economic thinking about the role of government in the marketplace, but a fear of bringing another big case to trial and losing.

"People don't like to lose big cases," says Renata Hesse, who worked on the Oracle-PeopleSoft case before leaving the Justice Department for Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati last year. "When you lose a big case, it makes you step back and look at how you're doing things."

"The buzz around town was that, after losing the case against Oracle-PeopleSoft that had strong customer support, the division got very worried about its ability to put on an effective merger case at trial," says William Randolph Smith, who heads the antitrust group at Crowell & Moring.

Others are more sanguine in their assessment.

"It seems pretty clear that the Antitrust Division is much more cautious in challenging mergers than they have been at times in the past," says Donald Russell, a former Justice Department antitrust lawyer with Robbins, Russell, Englert, Orseck & Untereiner. "[But] I certainly don't think that the caution that they're showing now is out of the mainstream."

Barnett argues that the lack of trials challenging mergers is an indication that the government is succeeding in its efforts to educate companies about the types of mergers likely to pass muster. He also says most concerns can be dealt with through less confrontational means, such as consent decrees. Still, nothing would prevent the department from going to trial if need be.

"We apply the law," he says. "And if we think there's a problem, we pursue it."

WASHING THE MARKET

One case in which the Antitrust Division's legal and economics staff saw a problem was in Whirlpool's $1.8 billion purchase of Maytag, a deal proposed in August 2005. The newly combined company, which produces much of Sears' Kenmore line as well as the brands Jenn Air, KitchenAid, Amana, and Magic Chef, controls as much as 70 percent of the U.S. market for large home appliances such as washers and dryers — the kind of market share that has typically drawn government intervention.

But Barnett decided to approve the deal, despite the staff's recommendations. His reasoning: Other appliance manufacturers, particularly in Asia and Europe, were entering the U.S. market and were likely to generate sufficient competition to prevent consumers from being harmed by the Maytag acquisition. "We looked at who are the players in the market, was entry possible, if entry had already occurred how quickly could it expand," he says. "The ultimate decision, which I take responsibility for, was that this transaction was not likely to substantially lessen competition."

"I think what the Maytag-Whirlpool decision does is send a clear message to companies that mergers that wouldn't have gotten through several years ago should be reconsidered," says David Balto, an antitrust lawyer who was policy director of the Federal Trade Commission during the Clinton administration. "The Oracle-PeopleSoft case has clearly had an effect on the Justice Department's ability to litigate cases."

Although his critics see a link between the defeat in Oracle-PeopleSoft and the decision not to challenge Whirlpool-Maytag, Barnett is quick to point out that last year the Justice Department initiated 16 merger-enforcement actions — more than the previous two years combined. Still, none of those actions resulted in the DOJ going to trial, and last year's figures are down substantially from 2000, when the DOJ challenged 48 mergers.

Barnett's decision in Whirlpool-Maytag was no doubt noted by executives for Monsanto, the world's largest crop-biotechnology company, and Mississippi-based Delta & Pine, a leading producer of cottonseeds. In August 2006, Monsanto announced plans to buy Delta & Pine. The acquisition would give Monsanto a much larger platform with which to distribute its own varieties of hybrid and genetically altered seed cotton through control of a company with more than half the market for such seeds and, potentially, a dominant position in a rapidly growing industry.

What's significant about the deal is that the two companies first attempted it in 1999. Monsanto withdrew its merger offer to Delta & Pine that year, citing regulatory opposition after the Justice Department spent 18 months investigating the deal.

"The Justice Department put some pressure on, and the deal fell through," says the American Antitrust Institute's Foer, whose organization has voiced concern about the merger. "But since that time the attitude towards mergers has become more lenient, and one doesn't really know how far you can push these folks."

Barnett says that because the merger is pending, he can't comment directly on the Monsanto-Delta & Pine coupling. But when questioned about the deal, he offers a clue to his thinking by referencing the Whirlpool-Maytag acquisition and raising the possibility that shifting market conditions could lead the Justice Department to reverse a stance taken years before. "Maytag-Whirlpool, that was a very dynamic market," he says. "If the merger had been attempted five years ago it would have been in different market circumstances and might have led to a different result."

AWAITING THE OTHER SHOE

Before joining the Justice Department in 2004, Barnett, 44, had a successful antitrust practice at Washington's Covington & Burling. In many regards, say those who have worked in the division, his approach to antitrust law differs little from that of either of his two predecessors in the job during the Bush administration: Pate, now in private practice at Hunton & Williams, and Charles James, now general counsel of Chevron Corp.

One initiative Barnett has pushed is streamlining the division's merger reviews — a process which companies have criticized for being lengthy and often opaque. "Most mergers are beneficial or at least don't harm consumer welfare," Barnett says. "Our goal on the merger-enforcement side is to improve the efficiency by which we identify those relatively few transactions that do threaten harm to consumer welfare."

Last month, in a move widely praised by antitrust lawyers who represent large companies, the Justice Department announced revisions to the process, placing limits on the amount of documents companies are required to produce. "I'm a big believer in transparency," Barnett says. "And we try to be as transparent as possible."

With Democrats now in control of Congress, Barnett will have the opportunity to demonstrate that commitment to transparency. "We will make increased oversight of the antitrust agencies a priority," says Jeff Miller, the Democrats' chief counsel on the Senate Judiciary Committee's Antitrust Subcommittee.

Barnett says he welcomes the opportunity to testify in congressional hearings, where he'll no doubt have further opportunity to discuss exactly when the Justice Department will be taking a stand as aggressive as it did in the Oracle-PeopleSoft case.

Whether pressure from Congress will push the department into opposing a major merger in 2007 remains to be seen. But in the meantime, antitrust lawyers are hoping it's not their clients who will be on the receiving end when the other shoe drops.

"I'm getting calls from clients saying, 'I want to do this deal and I don't want you to tell me there are any problems, because there is no antitrust enforcement in Washington,' " says one D.C.-based antitrust lawyer, who spoke on condition of anonymity out of fear of retribution from the Justice Department. "I would assume that they're looking for a case to bring just to show they're alive."

US Reviews European Telecoms Venture (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, January 8, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113063

The US government conducted a national security review of the proposed $21bn (€16.1bn) joint venture agreement between Nokia and Siemens, and forced the European telecoms equipment makers to sign a "mitigation agreement" that imposed restrictions on the new company.

While the US has hitherto shown keen interest in foreign takeovers of US telecoms carriers, the decision to probe the joint venture indicates a new trend.

Agencies involved in the national security review process – especially the departments of defence, homeland security and justice – are intensifying their scrutiny of companies that make components for mobile and fixed-line networks globally.

People familiar with the classified national security review by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the US – Cfius – the inter-agency panel that investigates foreign takeovers of US assets for possible security threats, said the panel had imposed security requirements on the venture. These include procedures that dictate whether foreigners can work on US equipment and software.

But the government's interest in the industry – reinforced by the tough measures it imposed on Alcatel's merger with Lucent – raises questions about whether the inter-agency panel is going beyond its mandate of identifying and preventing risky foreign takeovers.

"The process has become a tool for Cfius to impose security requirements on foreign companies, while the government lacks the legal authority to impose them on US companies," said David Marchick, a lawyer at Covington & Burling in Washington.

The mitigation agreement, or conditions to which a company agrees to gain regulatory clearance, could set a precedent in an industry that is bracing for consolidation globally.

In particular, any deal involving Nortel Networks, which does sensitive work for the US government, would face a lengthy investigation.

Mr Marchick said mitigation agreements should address the "marginal increase in national risk" associated with a foreign acquisition – not general security concerns the government believes exist, regardless of whether an owner is foreign or domestic.

The joint venture, due to close in the first quarter of 2007, will create the third-largest supplier of equipment to telecoms companies, after Alcatel-Lucent and Ericsson.

Nokia said it regarded its conversations with the government as confidential and declined to comment on discussions or agreements it had reached with authorities. Siemens also declined to comment.

Congress Targets Oil-Drilling Subsidies (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

Pressure Mounts to Fix Flawed Leases Valued at Billions of Dollars in Future Royalties

WASHINGTON -- With Democrats controlling Congress, the oil industry is in for a rough ride. So is the agency that collects royalties for oil and gas drilling on federal lands.

Democrats and some Republicans have complained for months that the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service -- whose motto is "securing ocean energy and economic value for America" -- has mishandled the royalty program. The issue will hit the spotlight Jan. 18, when the House takes up energy legislation targeting oil-industry subsidies.

• What's New: Congress threatens action; Bush administration aims to deal with losses of government oil royalties.

• The Players: The Minerals Management Service and dozens of U.S. and foreign oil producers are disputing contract flaws that provided the U.S. with no revenue during a period of rising oil prices.

• The Bottom Line: Some $900 million was lost so far and billions in future payments are at stake.

One goal: untangling a legal mess that could allow companies to escape paying at least $10 billion in future royalties for drilling in the Gulf of Mexico. As part of the debate, congressional critics are sure to ramp up their complaints about the service, which has said that it failed to include a clause requiring the royalties into leases issued in 1998 and 1999.

Meanwhile, the Government Accountability Office is preparing a report that, some lawmakers say, will blame the service's "culture" for widespread laxity in conducting royalty audits and collecting underpayments from industry. And by mid-month, the Interior Department's Inspector General will release a report showing that different units at the service working on leases didn't talk to each other and that some officials apparently signed leases without reading them.

The action reflects continuing fallout from the service's handling of oil and gas leases and royalty payments. A 1995 law temporarily waived royalties to encourage drilling in deeper Gulf waters but required the payments to kick in if oil prices exceeded a price threshold of about $40 a barrel. Under the Clinton administration, the service omitted the price threshold in the 1998 and 1999 leases, so companies haven't had to pay even though oil prices are well above the trigger point. The flawed leases have resulted in a $900 million revenue loss to the government, the department says.

The department is scrambling to try to assuage critics. C. Stephen Allred, an assistant secretary at the Interior Department who oversees the service, announced Dec. 14 that five oil companies -- including BP PLC, ConocoPhillips, Marathon Oil Corp. and Royal Dutch Shell PLC -- had agreed to amend their leases to begin paying royalties on oil and gas produced since Oct. 1, 2006, but not before. Dozens of other companies haven't agreed to change the leases.

Mr. Allred, a 63-year-old engineer who formerly headed Idaho's Division of Environmental Quality, says the government can't force the companies to make the changes, but that several have been willing to discuss the issue because of concern about a Democratic crackdown. "They know what's going on on the Hill," he said in an interview.

He also has been dickering with oil giant Chevron Corp., so far without result. In a statement, Chevron said it has made "significant investments" in Gulf production based on the existing leases and that its lawyers "have put a reasonable offer on the table to resolve this matter" with the Interior Department.

According to Mr. Allred, the department issued 1,023 faulty leases in 1998 and 1999. Of those, 570 are still in force but only about 45 involve current production of oil and gas or discoveries that promise future production. BP and the other companies that have agreed to changes in the leases hold about 20% of those 45 leases, while Chevron holds another 20%. Foreign oil companies, which the department wouldn't identify, hold another 20% and smaller companies hold the rest.

Mr. Allred says the 45 leases could produce $10 billion to $11 billion of federal royalty payments, and that the department wants to collect that money before trying to recover royalties from past production. "We want to deal with this potential first," he says.

Congressional Democrats say they plan to increase oversight of the agency. They are eager to fix the royalty snafu as part of a broader attack on subsidies for the oil industry. Besides forcing oil companies to amend their 1998 and 1999 drilling leases to include a clause requiring royalty payments, the still-emerging energy legislation is expected to raise taxes on oil-company inventories and kill certain industry tax breaks.

Last year , the House passed two different measures dealing with the royalty problem, but neither became law. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California and other Democrats still are weighing which approach to use this year, aides say.

One approach, pushed by Democratic Reps. Ed Markey of Massachusetts and Maurice Hinchey of New York, would bar companies from future exploration on federal outer-continental-shelf lands if they didn't agree to amend their leases. Another measure, championed by former Rep. Richard Pombo, called on the government to assess a "conservation fee," roughly equal to the sought-after royalty payments, unless the companies agreed to changes in the leases.

Some lawmakers are exploring a third approach, which would require the Bush administration to take reluctant energy companies to court. It was suggested by Stephen Lowey, a White Plains, N.Y., lawyer, who argues that because Congress required the leases to have a price threshold, officials at the Interior Department had no authority to leave it out. That means, he says, that a judge could change the leases unilaterally to insert the price threshold, thus requiring royalty payments when prices exceed the threshold. Mr. Lowey says he suspects oil companies already know this, and that is why some are willing to negotiate with the government. Several congressmen have asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to review this aspect.

Lee Fuller, vice president of the Independent Petroleum Association of America, whose members include several smaller exploration companies holding the leases, argues that the policy of encouraging more oil exploration in "frontier" areas of the Gulf has worked. Tampering with existing leases, he asserts, would discourage future exploration and provoke court challenges that could last years.

The companies "didn't negotiate these contracts," he says. "They were handed to them to sign. If it becomes an issue where the nature of the contract itself is affected, then it becomes a lawyers' field day."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

S.F. Area Is No. 1 For Regular Drug Use, Study Says (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, January 8, 2007

The San Francisco metropolitan area has a higher percentage of people who are regular drug users than any other major metropolitan area in the USA, a study from the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration found.

Nearly 13% of San Francisco residents reported using some type of illicit drug, such as marijuana, cocaine or heroin, in the previous month, according to data from the National Surveys on Drug Use and Health 2002-05. The national average is 8.1%.

Other areas with drug-abuse rates higher than the national average included Seattle, 9.6%; Detroit, 9.5%; Philadelphia, 9.1%; and Boston, 8.5%. Cities with the lowest drug use: Houston, 6.2%; and Washington, Dallas and Riverside/San Bernardino, Calif., all at 6.5%.

California has decriminalized marijuana for people with health problems. The state's voters passed Proposition 215 in 1996 to allow seriously ill state residents to possess and use marijuana with a doctor's prescription. In San Francisco, police and prosecutors accept a medical-marijuana identification card as proof that a resident can possess and use marijuana.

"The fact that state law allows the use of medical marijuana and that we have a population with a high rate of AIDS that might need to use medical marijuana may contribute to the rates," says Alice Gleghorn, deputy director of community behavioral health services in San Francisco's Department of Public Health. "We do have a cultural regional norm with regard to medical-marijuana use."

The coastal area north of San Francisco, included in the study as part of the metropolitan area, is known as a popular marijuana growing spot.

"Where marijuana is very accessible, you're going to get higher use," Gleghorn says.

San Francisco focuses its prevention and treatment efforts on heroin, methamphetamine and cocaine, she says.

Chicago, at 25.7%, and Houston, at 25.6%, have the highest rates of binge drinking in the country. Nationwide, 22.7% of people reported binge drinking in the previous month, defined by the study as having five or more drinks on one occasion. Other areas with rates higher than the national average are Philadelphia, Detroit, Boston, San Francisco and Phoenix.

Nationwide, about one quarter of the population smokes cigarettes regularly. Only Detroit significantly exceeded the national average, with 27.4% of its residents reporting that they smoked cigarettes in the previous month, the study found. California's biggest cities had the lowest smoking rates, with 17.9% of people in San Francisco and Los Angeles and 19.2% in Riverside reporting previous-month use, the study found.

Beverly Watts Davis, senior adviser for substance-abuse prevention for SAMHSA, says local prevention coalitions should use the data to help focus their programs.

"If they can pinpoint what's going on where and why, it really helps them plan better to know where resources should be allocated," she said.

3 Extradited From Colombia (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 8, 2007

Drug-ring suspects first from country sent to city in years

Three men extradited from Colombia have appeared in federal court in a drug smuggling case, marking what is thought to be the first time defendants have been sent from that country to face charges in Chicago in at least a decade.

They were among eight people indicted here in 2005 in connection with Operation Highstep, which cracked down on a nationwide ring of smugglers bringing heroin and cocaine into the U.S. hidden in furniture, the frames of paintings and the soles of shoes.

Saulo Salinas-Ospina, his son Jhonny Salinas and Juan Alberto Castillo-Ortiz were arrested by Colombian national police in November 2005, authorities said, and have been indicted on drug conspiracy charges. The extradition process took about a year.

Federal prosecutors and investigators said the Colombian nationals are the first defendants to be extradited from that country to the Northern District of Illinois at least since the current extradition treaty with Colombia was organized in 1997.

Leaders of the Drug Enforcement Administration said the case was a unique effort.

"The extradition of these defendants is an example of a successful law enforcement partnership," said Gary G. Olenkiewicz, special agent in charge of DEA's Chicago Field Division. "By working together, we, the DEA, United States attorney's office and the Colombian National Police were able to dismantle a major heroin and cocaine trafficking organization and keep these dangerous narcotics off the streets of Chicago."

Investigators said the federal probe resulted in the seizure of 78 kilograms of heroin, 38 kilograms of cocaine and more than $1.4 million in cash. Nineteen arrests were made in Colombia, and dozens more people were taken into custody in New York, Orlando and Boston.

Assistant U.S. Atty. John Blakey said the men arrived in the U.S. late last week and did not appear before the judge until Thursday because of the holidays.

The three appeared before U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer, and each pleaded not guilty and waived detention hearings. Pallmeyer ordered them to return to court in March.

Three other co-defendants indicted along with the men already have pleaded guilty in the case and been sentenced, Blakey said. Another is awaiting extradition and the eighth is being prosecuted in another matter in Florida.

John Meyer, the attorney for Salinas-Ospina, said he was new to the case, but he could request early hearings on several issues.

"I have requested all the documents on extradition in the case in case we choose to challenge some aspect of his custody here in the United States," Meyer said.

One issue could relate to Salinas-Ospina's age of 69, Meyer said.

The U.S. agreed not to seek a life sentence in the case to honor the terms of the treaty with Colombia, he said. Under the treaty, Colombia does not extradite individuals to face a life sentence. Meyer said, though, that a sentence within the federal guidelines could amount to a de facto life sentence for Salinas-Ospina.

"It's a 10-year minimum," Meyer said.

The investigation of the case also involved wiretaps in Colombia, he said, raising the issue of whether that evidence can be used in a U.S. court.

According to court documents, Salinas-Ospina, his son and Castillo-Ortiz worked inside Colombia to deliver heroin to individuals who would have it transported to cities in the U.S., including Chicago. Some of those involved were working covertly with law enforcement, the indictment states.

Drugs, Money Laundering Put Executive In Prison (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

A two-year undercover investigation involving an international Ecstasy and weapons-trafficking organization with Hollywood connections has netted its first prison sentence: a 20-year term for an executive of a Swiss-based financial, business and consulting service.

Alexandre De Basseville, 36, of Switzerland and Los Angeles, an executive board member of ADB Swiss S.A., which owns the Los Angeles-based Limelight Films Inc., was sentenced yesterday by U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee. The judge also ordered him to forfeit $528,500 after pleading guilty to conspiracy to commit money laundering and conspiracy to distribute MDMA, or Ecstasy.

De Basseville and his co-defendant, Bruno Cavelier d'Esclavelles, 45, of Los Angeles, were arrested as part of the Drug Enforcement Administration's (DEA) "Operation Director's Cut" after a two-year undercover investigation into international money laundering.

D'Esclavelles, chief executive officer at Limelight Films, was sentenced to 15 years in prison and ordered to forfeit $125,000 on Dec. 15.

"The trail of dirty money is very hard to conceal," U.S. Attorney Chuck Rosenberg said. "Here, two drug dealers and international money launderers are going to jail for a long time because federal agents and prosecutors relentlessly pursued their transactions."

The men were arrested in June in Arlington. Also arrested in the probe were Limelight Chief Financial Officer David Liberman and three associates, all of whom were charged with conspiracy to distribute Ecstasy.

A criminal complaint in the case said De Basseville met repeatedly over the past two years with undercover agents posing as international drug traffickers. It said he offered to launder drug proceeds, supply weapons and broker Ecstasy deals for the undercover agents.

The complaint said the agents met with De Basseville and several of his associates in various locations, including Arlington, Miami, Los Angeles, Amsterdam and Geneva. On two occasions, it said, De Basseville and d'Esclavelles took cash, totaling $300,000, which they thought to be drug proceeds, and laundered it for the undercover agents using Limelight Films.

In February, the complaint said, De Basseville and d'Esclavelles arranged for the sale of Ecstasy from the Netherlands from Thomas Frischknecht to an undercover agent. Mr. Frischknecht sent the agent a package containing 10,000 pills, which the agent received in Arlington, it said.

The complaint said De Basseville, d'Esclavelles and Mr. Frischknecht agreed to sell the agent 500,000 pills in the Netherlands. Mr. Frischknecht, 26, of Switzerland, was arrested in the Netherlands as the undercover agent negotiated for the delivery of the pills.

DEA spokesman Rusty Payne said authorities also arrested Fabian Pruvot, 37, Andre Prikazhikov, 31, and Brian Delansky, 33, all of Los Angeles. Mr. Pruvot and Mr. Liberman were charged with conspiracy to launder money, he said, and Mr. Prikazhikov and Mr. Delansky were charged with conspiracy to possess firearms in furtherance of drug trafficking.

PROVIDENCE, R.I. -- Two lawyers _ including the brother of the mayor of corruption-plagued Providence _ offered to set up a drug deal so clients could get a lighter sentence by alerting authorities, according to an indictment unsealed Friday.

The Boston-based federal grand jury named John M. Cicilline, 49, brother of Mayor David Cicilline, and Joseph Bevilacqua Jr., 57, a disbarred lawyer who worked with John Cicilline.

Also charged with conspiracy were paralegals and interpreters Lisa Torres, 39, and Juan Giraldo, 41. John Cicilline and Torres were also charged with obstruction of justice and making false statements to federal investigators.

Cicilline pleaded not guilty Friday and was released in lieu of $10,000 bond. He did not comment outside court. Torres did not enter a plea and was ordered held.

Bevilacqua, who is currently ending a federal prison term in home confinement, could not be transported in time for the hearing, said Samantha Martin, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney in Boston. Giraldo is serving time in a federal prison for a drug conviction and also was not at Friday's hearing, Martin said.

Cicilline faces a maximum of 25 years in prison, five years more than Torres, Martin said. Bevilacqua and Giraldo both face five-year sentences.

The mayor, who had his own law practice before he was first elected in 2002, is not accused of any wrongdoing.

DOJ_NMG_0113068

"Today's charges should make it clear that justice is not for sale," U.S. Attorney Michael Sullivan said in a written statement.

He said that it was especially troubling that the allegations involve lawyers, who are expected to conduct themselves with high ethical standards.

"A license to practice law and knowledge of the law does not allow you to break the law," said June W. Stansbury, special agent in charge of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration in New England. "As these attorneys have learned, you can go from being a member of the Bar to being behind bars," Stansbury said in a statement.

Federal prosecutors allege that in November 2002, Bevilacqua met in jail with John Mendonca, who was arrested that August in Warwick, allegedly with marijuana and about $1.3 million in cash. His wife, Jacqueline, was also charged.

According to the indictment, Bevilacqua told Mendonca that if he was willing to pay several hundred thousand dollars, Bevilacqua could arrange for someone to tell federal authorities about drug shipments _ but that Mendonca and his wife would get credit for the information. Defendants who cooperate with federal prosecutors are eligible for reduced prison sentences.

After receiving the money, Bevilacqua met with Mendonca at a Plymouth, Mass., jail and explained how Mendonca would get credit for a 900-pound marijuana bust that Giraldo had set up, as well as a 1,000-pound bust that Giraldo was still arranging.

Prosecutors wouldn't comment Friday on whether those drug shipments were made or whether any drug information was ever passed to federal authorities.

Mendonca appeared skeptical of the plot, according to the indictment. He asked how he could receive credit for a drug shipment he knew nothing about.

According to the indictment, Bevilacqua responded: "You'll have all the info,"

The indictment also accuses Bevilacqua of pressuring John Mendonca to plead guilty. He allegedly called the guilty plea a prerequisite for the Mendoncas to receive credit for the drug busts.

"You go to trial, all this is off, you won't get credit for it," he warned Mendonca.

Prosecutors say both lawyers met with Jacqueline Mendonca to seal the deal. Authorities allege that Torres pretended to prosecutors she was a close friend of Mendonca's wife willing to act as an informant. Giraldo allegedly accepted at least some of the payments.

The Mendoncas pleaded guilty to charges in their drug case, but they have not yet been sentenced.

Separately, Bevilacqua was disbarred and sent to prison after he admitted leaking an FBI videotape to a TV reporter. The tape showed an aide to Mayor Cicilline's predecessor, Vincent "Buddy" Cianci, accepting a cash bribe. Bevilacqua's prison term was to end Jan. 17.

The Cicilline brothers are sons of John F. Cicilline, a lawyer who has defended some of New England's most notorious mobsters, including the late Providence godfather Raymond L.S. Patriarca.

David Cicilline has cultivated a reputation for cleaning up City Hall following decades of corruption presided over by Cianci, who's currently serving time in a federal prison. The mayor was sworn in for a second term Wednesday.

In a news conference in his office, David Cicilline said he was not aware his brother was being investigated. The mayor, his voice quavering, said he spoke with his brother Friday morning to tell him he loved him and would be there to support him and his three daughters.

The mayor said he did not think his brother's conduct was a reflection on him or the city of Providence, which has been plagued by corruption for decades.

"My record is clear. I've worked really hard with a team of people to restore honesty and integrity to this city," he said, adding, "I'm not concerned about the impact it's having on me."

Audit Faults DEA, Says $616 Million In Seizures 'At Risk' (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

About $616 million seized by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration during investigations is "at risk" because the agency has failed to "consistently implement and document controls" over the cash, according to a government audit.

The Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General, in a 76-page report, said the accounting failures discovered by its auditors "can lead to discrepancies in the amount of cash seized and counted, accusations of theft and misappropriation of seized cash."

"The DEA has established internal control policies for handling and safeguarding seized cash," said Inspector General Glenn A. Fine. "However, our audit found that the DEA failed to consistently follow or document compliance with these policies."

According to the report released Friday, auditors found that from Oct. 1, 2003, through Nov. 3, 2005, the DEA made 16,007 cash seizures totaling almost $616 million. The money eventually was transferred to the U.S. Marshals Service for safekeeping until it was either forfeited by or returned to the owners.

But, the auditors said, their inquiry often found "no documentation indicating that a witnessing agent or task force officer was present at critical stages of the cash-handling process" as required by DEA policy.

The auditors, according to the report, also found many instances in which agents and task force officers did not count the seized cash; did not provide a receipt to the subject from whom the cash was taken; did not complete documents transferring custody of the cash to an evidence custodian; and did not record the receipt, transfer or disposal of the cash in a temporary or permanent control ledger.

Mr. Fine said that during a review of the documentation from 33 internal DEA investigations from October 2003 through July 2005 involving accusations that agents had either lost or stolen defendants' property, auditors found that in 11 instances the agents did not properly handle, process or dispose of the evidence.

Some of the cases involved multiple violations of DEA policies, he said.

In proposing seven recommendations, Mr. Fine said the DEA needs to better define when seized cash should be counted by the seizing agent, define a time frame for seized cash to be taken to the bank, and speed the transfer of seized cash to the Marshals Service by mandating the use of wire transfers.

In addition, he said, the audit found that the DEA did not follow, or did not document that it followed, many critical internal control policies.

DEA officials, in a written response, agreed to six of the recommendations, but said a proposal that the agency clarify its policy on counting cash and implement best practices for timely cash transfers to banks already had been implemented -- a position rejected by Mr. Fine's office.

"If the DEA was in compliance with this recommendation, it should have identified the deficiencies we identified and made recommendations to correct the deficiencies," he said.

Mexican Drug Cartels Move Into Peru (DMN)

By Alfredo Corchado, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, January 8, 2007

Worry spreads as their presence increases coca production, violence

LIMA, Peru – Mexican drug cartels, once regarded mainly as couriers for South American cocaine producers, have spread their powerful tentacles deep into this Andean nation, sowing violence and nourishing the re-emergence of Shining Path guerrillas, authorities say.

Peruvian authorities suspect a Mexican cartel in the killing of a federal judge in July that shocked this nation. The allegations underscore the presence of Mexican cartels in the multibillion-dollar shadow economy in Peru, the world's second-largest producer of cocaine after neighboring Colombia.

AP An attack by suspected Shining Path guerrillas left eight people dead in a Peruvian coca-growing area in December. The terrorist group may have formed an alliance with Mexican drug cartels.

"Just like in Mexico, Peruvian institutions are being put to the test," said Gen. Juan Zárate Gambini, Peru's anti-narcotics czar and head of the National Police. "We're very concerned about the consequences, and we're committed to doing everything to meet the challenge and defeat the enemy."

DOJ_NMG_0113070

Mexican cartels have become the most dominant drug-trafficking organizations in the hemisphere, authorities say. In his first weeks in office, Mexican President Felipe Calderón has sent thousands of troops and federal police to Michoacán state and the border city of Tijuana to confront entrenched cartels.

In South America, the Mexican groups are bypassing the Colombians and cutting their own deals with coca farmers in Peru and Bolivia, setting up dozens of tiny, state-of-the-art cocaine processing labs inside Peruvian territory, say Western diplomats and Peruvian authorities. The groups are opening new consumer markets throughout Latin America and elsewhere.

The Mexicans ship cocaine loads by boat to the Mexican coast, then up to the border with California or Texas, with its coveted Interstate 35 northbound corridor, Peruvian officials and experts said. South Texas remains the leading entry area for cocaine smuggled into the U.S., according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

In addition, Mexican and Colombian scientists working for the cartels have introduced chemical fertilizers that are multiplying coca leaf production up to 1,000 percent per hectare, Peruvian authorities say.

"Instead of producing 300, 400 plants, new chemicals are ... producing 3,000 plants," said Jaime Artesana, a drug expert at the Peruvian Economic and Political Institute, an independent research organization. "The Peruvian government has dedicated just 3 percent of its budget to fight the drug problem. That has to change, because we need a new strategy to adapt to more powerful Mexican cartels."

U.S. aid to Peru for drug eradication is an estimated $300 million over the last five years, and the U.S. government has earmarked $60 million over the next three years for helicopters for counter-narcotics work. Virginia-based DynCorp International – which has a major operational hub in Irving – will provide maintenance and logistical support.

"Drug trafficking transcends all borders," said the U.S. ambassador to Peru, J. Curtis Struble. "No nation is free from its harmful effect, and [it] impacts all sectors of society."

Despite U.S. support, coca production in Peru has risen almost 40 percent in recent years, partly as a result of eradication efforts in Colombia, experts say.

Similarly, the Mexican cartel presence continues to grow. Between 2005 and 2006, about 35 Mexican cartel members were arrested in Peru. Twenty-five remain in jail, Peruvian authorities said.

U.S. policy

Others say U.S. drug policy is part of the problem. Kenneth Sharpe, a Latin American political and drug policy expert at Swarthmore College in Pennsylvania, said the U.S. "prohibition policy" has actually fed the rise of powerful criminal organizations.

"U.S. drug policy based on prohibition has nourished the drug wars in Latin America," Mr. Sharpe said. "There's absolutely no way a prohibition policy will ever work – here in the United States, in Latin America or anywhere else because all prohibition does is perpetuate the drug trade, rising crime and violence."

In Peru, the presence of the Mexican cartels was illustrated in July, when alleged Tijuana cartel hit men assassinated Federal Judge Hernán Saturno Vergara as he was eating with a nephew at the restaurant near his judicial office, Peruvian authorities said. Mr. Saturno was part of a three-judge panel overseeing a major case against alleged members of the Tijuana cartel.

The Tijuana cartel is allied with the Gulf cartel and its enforcers, the Zetas, who have been blamed for surging violence along the Texas-Mexico border and have been linked to drug killings in North Texas.

The attack on the judge served as a wake-up call on the presence of Mexican cartels in Peru, authorities say.

"The [Tijuana] cartel's message to authorities was very clear: Messing with us will cost you your life," said Ricardo Valdes, a former Peruvian interior minister and now head of the economic research organization Human and Social Capital. Mr. Valdes said the order to kill the judge came from inside the jail where members of the cartel were imprisoned.

Gen. Zárate, Peru's top drug officer, said the authorities' conclusion that Mexican cartels ordered the killing is based on interviews with jailed cartel members.

The Mexican presence in Peru has angered President Alan García, Peruvian officials said. Mr. García appeared with President Bush in Washington and pledged "total eradication of the drug trafficker threat."

Peruvian and Mexican authorities held talks in Lima and pledged greater cooperation in fighting drug traffickers.

Implications

DOJ_NMG_0113071

The implications for this Andean nation of 28 million people are enormous, drug experts say. They point to the violence that has engulfed parts of Mexico and the drug money that has corrupted security forces, judges, journalists and businessmen and is reportedly supporting guerrilla groups.

"We must not allow the violence of Mexico to penetrate Peru," said Gustavo Gorriti Ellenbogen, a Peruvian journalist and author and president of the Press and Society Institute, which promotes media independence.

"Mexico is like one giant bowling alley, with heads rolling," he said, referring to a recent spate of beheadings in Mexico. "We cannot allow that type of violence to happen here."

Meanwhile, the once-violent and powerful Maoist guerrilla movement known as Shining Path is regaining strength, thanks largely to drug traffickers, said Peruvian experts, including Mr. Valdes and Mr. Gorriti. Nearly defunct after the arrest of its leader, Abimael Guzmán, in 1992, the movement is now offering protection to drug traffickers and protecting coca farms from U.S.-backed eradication efforts.

In December, eight suspected Shining Path members were arrested after an attack on a police convoy in a coca-growing region killed five officers and three civilians, including a boy. More than 20 police officers have been killed in ambushes in the past year.

"The two remnants of the Shining Path are in the drug-trafficking zone in Alto Huallaga and ... the Apurímac-Ene [River] valley," said Mr. Gorriti.

There, Peruvian coca leaves are converted into paste and transported to laboratories in the coastal region for final processing. From there, Mexican cartels, working with Peruvian drug producers, ship the cocaine to not only Mexico and the U.S., but also South Africa, the Middle East, Russia, and throughout Latin America, particularly Argentina, Brazil and Chile.

"Eradication measures in Colombia are having an effect, as cocaine production has shifted to Peru," said Mr. Artesana of the Peruvian Economic and Political Institute. "But that's not the only explanation for the growth. It's also about new and growing markets throughout Europe, Asia and Latin America."

Unlike the guerrillas inside Colombia, the Shining Path movement is now based more on profit than ideology, Mr. Gorriti said. "They protect routes and tax drug shipments. That, along with the money they charge ... has provided a source of income which has aided their re-emergence."

In 2005, Peruvian authorities confiscated 11.7 tons of cocaine. As of September 2006, cocaine confiscations for the year had already reached 14 tons.

"But what these figures don't tell you is that Peru is confronting a notable increase in cocaine production," said Ángel Páez, a Peruvian author and investigative journalist. U.S. and Peruvian authorities say 190 tons of cocaine are still being shipped out of the country, he said. "This means that interdiction is actually minimal."

Gen. Zárate said that figure "sounds right."

IMMIGRATION:

U.S. Halts Souza Family Deportation (WSJ)

By Miriam Jordan

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

The U.S. government has terminated deportation proceedings against a Brazilian couple and their disabled son who were the subjects of a page-one profile in The Wall Street Journal last month, giving the family another shot at winning the right to live here permanently.

The case of Zandro Souza and his family raised questions about whether the U.S. should grant permanent legal residency to immigrants who might one day prove to be a financial burden. Mr. Souza, who rose in six years from dishwasher to chef at upscale eateries, was pursuing legal residency in the U.S. for his family and had the sponsorship of an employer.

The family's four-year application process hit a snag during an interview with an immigration official who requested proof that Mr. Souza's son, Igor, who is blind and developmentally delayed, wouldn't become a "public charge" if his parents died.

After questioning the family about its future means of support, the agency issued a green-card denial that cited another reason for the family's rejection: namely, that it entered the U.S. on tourist visas with the intent of staying for good, a violation of federal law. In a letter dated Dec. 28, the day after the article appeared, the government withdrew its request for Mr. Souza and his family to appear for a deportation hearing. The memorandum addressed to Mr. Souza states that the government's notice to appear in court was "improvidently issued" and should be dismissed without prejudice. Thursday, an immigration judge in Boston granted the government's motion to terminate the case.

Shawn Saucier, a spokesman for the federal immigration agency, said there is no guarantee the family would be granted green cards. He said the Souzas and their attorney would be summoned for another interview within a month. "We want to be fair to this family and every applicant," Mr. Saucier said. "We want to make sure all aspects of the decision have been fully explored."

Igor, 11 years old, contracted toxoplasmosis -- a condition that can cause blindness, seizures and mental impairment in newborns -- from his mother in the womb. Mr. Souza worked two jobs to pay out of pocket for his son's medical costs, including doctors' visits, $1,000 a month in medication and as much as $2,500 for each emergency-room visit.

Several immigration attorneys, including the Souzas' lawyer, said the government's decision to reopen the case was likely to result in the family's obtaining legal permanent residency.

GOP Willing To Back Democrats' Key Bills (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

Leaders of both parties say Democrats in Congress are likely to win bipartisan support for many of their signature issues, including passage of an immigration reform package that critics have derided as amnesty.

Republican lawmakers also offered cooperation for a raise in the federal minimum wage and changes to Social Security that do not include privatization.

"What I've said to the new majority leader: 'You won the election. Fair and square. You're in the majority. It is not my first goal every morning to get up and make you look bad,' " said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, during an appearance on "Fox News Sunday."

The Kentucky Republican said that the Democrats likely will pass a minimum-wage bill but that he also supports offsetting tax cuts. Mr. McConnell said he also expects cooperation on other issues, including Social Security.

"In fact, I've been challenging the new Democratic majority not just to do the easy things in the beginning of this session or some relatively easy issues that we were close to passing last year, but let's do some important things," he said.

"And I think there are two things that are very significant that would make a difference for the country. Let's fix the immigration problem, and let's save Social Security. We can do that before this Congress is out."

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer agreed that the House Democrats could work with President Bush on an immigration bill compromise.

"One of the things that we brought up -- we didn't discuss substance -- was the immigration bill. And [Mr. Bush] smiled, and he said, 'You know, I think I'm going to have a lot easier time dealing with you on immigration than I had dealing with the House Republican leadership on immigration.' I think that's the case," the Maryland Democrat said on "Fox News Sunday."

Mr. Hoyer also expressed confidence about Mr. Bush's response to raising the minimum wage.

"He has reconsidered on minimum wage. He has already indicated he's going to sign the minimum-wage bill."

Mr. Bush and some Republican leaders have expressed a willingness to support a minimum-wage boost if it is offset by tax cuts to small-business owners.

"I have every reason to believe that the Republicans want to cooperate," Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat and chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, told ABC's "This Week." "It's in their best interest to cooperate. It's good for the Democrats and Republicans, the Congress and the American people."

However, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi was more critical of Republicans and Mr. Bush, questioning a White House budget proposal to reduce the deficit by half over five years.

"We'd like to see what the president's version of a balanced budget is. He has never sent one to the Congress," Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, told CBS' "Face the Nation."

Mrs. Pelosi said the Democrats will honor legislation they have passed that promises not to increase deficit spending but does not rule out tax increases or promise to balance the budget.

"We are committed to pay as you go; no new deficit spending," she said. "We passed that in our rules package on Friday, and we're very proud of that. And we're committed to it."

In addition, Mrs. Pelosi acknowledged that people earning more than $500,000 a year may see their income taxes rise under the Democrats, but said it is not a "first resort" for her party.

"I'm talking about tax cuts for many in the middle class," she said.

Democrats' Ties To Labor Could Complicate Immigration Reform (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush's hopes of securing a comprehensive immigration overhaul have brightened considerably in the new Democratic-controlled Congress, but resistance from organized labor - one of the Democratic Party's most loyal constituencies - could complicate those efforts.

The AFL-CIO, which represents 53 unions with more than 9 million members, is ratcheting up opposition to a temporary guest worker program, a key element of Bush's immigration plan. At the same time, two powerful unions in a breakaway labor coalition, Change to Win, have tended to support the provision.

The divisions within labor were evident during the contentious debate over immigration in the previous Republican-controlled Congress. But they take on heightened significance as Democrats assume control of the 110th Congress and begin shaping the legislative agenda.

Organized labor is a bedrock of the Democratic coalition and helped drive Democrats' takeover of Congress in November's elections.

Labor political action committees contributed 86 percent of their donations to Democratic candidates, a total of $42 million, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Labor also aggressively waged get-out-the-vote efforts and other activities to help end 12 years of Republican control of Congress.

With its bolstered political clout, the AFL-CIO is better positioned to confront a powerful coalition of business groups that is pressing for a temporary worker program to bring in thousands of foreign workers each year.

"The industry will oppose a bill that doesn't have a good temporary worker program in it," said Randel Johnson, vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

But Johnson acknowledged that the AFL-CIO's heightened political stature in the aftermath of the elections raises the challenge for his side.

"In view of the election, it's very significant," he said. "Certainly, the AFL-CIO has a bigger seat at the table than they did before."

Business leaders say the guest worker program is needed to bring in foreign workers to fill unskilled and low-skilled jobs that Americans don't want. But AFL-CIO officials say the program is designed to give business a steady source of cheap labor and would take jobs from U.S. citizens.

"We don't believe our elected representatives are ready to adopt legislation that creates paths for corporations to import workers (and) reduce working standards in the United States," said Ana Avendando, associate general counsel for the AFL-CIO. "That's exactly what guest worker programs are."

Bush has made immigration one of his top domestic priorities since the outset of his presidency. But he was rebuffed by members of his own party when conservative Republicans in the House of Representatives effectively bottled up a Senate-passed bill. The legislation, which had bipartisan support, included a guest worker program and a legalization plan to put millions of undocumented workers on a path to U.S. citizenship.

At least 12 million illegal immigrants, predominately from Mexico and other Latin American countries, have entered the United States over the last two decades in search of higher paying jobs and better living conditions. How to deal with the growing undocumented population remains one of the most troublesome elements in the immigration debate as Congress prepares to take up the issue again.

Ironically, Bush appears likely to fare better with Democrats than he did with his own party. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., support a comprehensive solution that appears to embrace the general thrust of last year's Senate bill.

In the previous session, House Republicans insisted on an enforcement-only approach that resulted in the passage of a largely unfunded bill creating a 700-mile fence along the Southwest border, the only major immigration initiative to emerge from the GOP-controlled 109th Congress.

The Senate leadership already has designated a comprehensive immigration bill as one of its top 10 legislative initiatives, dubbing it Senate Bill 9, although the components will come later.

"We're going to get it passed," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., who replaces Texas Republican John Cornyn as chairman of the Senate's key immigration subcommittee.

With Democrats in control, the next version of a Senate bill could largely resemble bipartisan legislation that Kennedy co-sponsored with Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., offering eventual citizenship to undocumented immigrants after they pay fines, pass background checks and meet other conditions. A guest worker program in the McCain-Kennedy bill sought to bring in up to 400,000 foreign workers a year and offered future U.S. citizenship to qualifying participants.

The Kennedy-McCain bill served as the framework for the legislation that eventually passed the Senate, but its guest worker program was scaled back. The legalization feature was also redrawn to create three categories that determine eligibility based on the length of an illegal immigrant's stay in the country. That hard-to-administer feature, which aimed at attracting support from wavering Republics, will likely be jettisoned.

The outlook is a bit more fluid in the House, which under Republican control never seriously debated a comprehensive measure. But Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., the incoming chairwoman of the House immigration subcommittee, said she is optimistic that House members eventually can find accord on legalization, guest workers, and other contentious provisions.

"We're at the beginning here," she said. "I believe that if we stop yelling at each other and just methodically work our way through the outstanding questions, that we can come up with a practical solution."

Immigration Debate Gets Religious (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

A number of leading Christian conservative groups have formed a coalition on immigration and illegal aliens that will push religiously grounded positions that both sides of the current immigration debate will both love and hate.

In letters sent today and obtained by The Washington Times, Families First on Immigration urges President Bush and leaders of the new Democratic Congress to adopt a grand compromise on the divisive issue that includes strong border security, an amnesty for illegals already here who are relatives of citizens and an end to birthright citizenship.

Former Republican presidential hopeful Gary Bauer, Deal Hudson of the Morley Institute for Church & Culture and David Keene of the American Conservative Union are among those who have joined forces to chart a new path on immigration reform, an issue that conservative Christians have generally avoided.

"Our position really is consistent with Christian teachings and with the rule of law," said Manuel Miranda, chairman of the Third Branch Conference who has corralled more than 30 leading conservatives to enter the volatile debate.

Religious liberals have long been outspoken advocates of amnesty and more immigration, but Christian conservatives have been torn between biblical admonitions to both the rule of law and charity toward strangers.

At the heart of their position is a compromise that could give both sides of the immigration debate their "holy grail," as Mr. Miranda puts it, while also making a major, one-time concession that would eliminate one of the biggest magnets for illegal immigration.

Out of concern for keeping families together, the religious leaders propose granting citizenship to any illegal aliens in the country who are related to U.S. citizens. This would include anyone who has had a child born here, often referred to as an "anchor baby."

In return, the federal government would end birthright citizenship, which automatically grants U.S. citizenship to anyone born here, regardless of his parents' legal status. The 14th Amendment says "all persons born or naturalized in the United States ... are citizens of the United States."

"This is a real compromise," Mr. Miranda said. "On the one hand, there is legalization of a large number of people, but conservatives get the settlement of the thorniest issue for them in the immigration debate."

In letters today, the coalition implores President Bush and Democrats on Capitol Hill to search in earnest for a solution as soon as possible that deals with the estimated 12 million to 20 million illegals now in the country and ends future illegal migration.

"Illegal immigration is a human tragedy that disrupts lives and separates families," the group wrote in the letter to Mr. Bush that also scolds officials in Mexico for their responsibility. "It is a failure of two governments: the one that fails its people and the one that invites their departure for cheap labor's sake."

Specifically, Families First tells Mr. Bush -- who was supported by most of the members of the new coalition -- to abandon his proposal for a guest-worker program until the rest of the issues such as birthright citizenship and border security are resolved.

The group struck a similar note to Democrats in Congress and requested that they begin more aggressive oversight of the Bush administration's handling of illegal immigration.

"We believe that there is a need for such oversight as soon as possible," the group wrote to Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi of California. "Our hope is that such oversight will lead to a better considered reform and a cohesive immigration policy that goes well beyond Band-Aid politics."

Among others who have joined the coalition are longtime conservative direct-mail guru Richard A. Viguerie, the Rev. Donald Wildmon of American Family Association, the Rev. Louis Sheldon of Traditional Values Coalition and Rabbi Aryeh Spero of Caucus for America.

The group hopes to draw support from fellow religious conservatives in Congress such as Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican.

Mr. Brownback caused deep consternation in conservative circles last year when he enthusiastically embraced the Senate immigration bill, which was reviled by most conservatives because it would grant citizenship rights to most illegals. A member of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. Brownback argued that it was his Christian duty to support a bill that would help illegal aliens who came here in search of a new home away from the tyranny and squalor from which they came.

Families First also urged that lawmakers act quickly.

"Each day that laws are not enforced real people and whole families come to suffer an indignity," group leaders wrote. "Illegal immigrants can become the targets of abuse by the unscrupulous. This harms Americans too. It corrodes the dignity of the American people."

Battling Deportation Often A Solitary Journey (WP)

By Karin Brulliard

Shortly after 9 a.m., all rose.

The black-robed judge took his seat under the Justice Department seal and in front of the federal prosecutor. People whispering in various languages spilled out of the cramped courtroom into the hallway of the federal immigration court in Arlington County, waiting for their chance to fight to stay in the United States, agree to leave or be deported.

Salvadoran Roxana Velasco sat alone in the waiting room. Like several other people listed on that morning's 37-case docket, she had no attorney.

"The judge said I have to have a lawyer or I have to represent myself," said Velasco, 30, recalling her first hearing in October. "How am I going to do that?"

In immigration courts, there are judges and prosecutors, evidence and witnesses. The consequences can be great: banishment, separation from family, perhaps persecution at home. But unlike in criminal courts, the government does not provide free lawyers for the poor. And in what court officials deem a great concern, a growing number of people in immigration court have no legal counsel: Of more than 314,000 people whose cases ran their course in fiscal 2005, two-thirds went through on their own, or pro se.

That leaves respondents to navigate byzantine immigration law, the judges to walk them through it and, critics say, the courts to operate sluggishly and deport thousands unfairly.

"How do they possibly pick out of everything that's happened to them in their lives the legally significant points?" asked Donald Kerwin, executive director of the Catholic Legal Immigration Network Inc. "You have to know the legal standards to do that."

The issue is more crucial than ever, Kerwin said, as stepped-up enforcement increasingly sends immigrants -- including children -- to court and to rural detention centers, where lawyers are hard to find.

Velasco, who was caught by federal border police after slipping across the Rio Grande a year ago, said she immigrated illegally to be with her husband, who lives in the District. She said she called three lawyers, but two wanted $10,000 and one said she could not help. So on a recent morning, Velasco took Metro to a Ballston building, pressed the elevator button marked "PH" for penthouse and ascended to the immigration court, a suite of six small courtrooms.

Just before 10 a.m., she squeezed into Courtroom 4, her red purse carrying a hearing notice outlining her right to an attorney "at no expense to the government."

Judge Garry D. Malphrus was making his way through the master calendar docket, a list of quick preliminary hearings. Case 962 was before him: a 6-year-old girl in a sparkly skirt. To her left sat her attorney. To her right sat her father, who raised his right hand and agreed on his daughter's behalf to "voluntary departure" -- to leave the United States.

The girl's hearing lasted just minutes, and it was unclear why her father conceded that his daughter must go. Immigration lawyers say many of those who appear in the court have no right to stay in the United States -- no employer or legal relative to sponsor their visa, no claim to asylum. But Kerwin and other advocates say confused immigrants often need a lawyer to tell them this, or to determine that they have a case and then make it by, say, arranging expert testimony on a country's human rights record for an asylum case or obtaining documents that prove an immigrant is the child of a U.S. citizen.

Legal representation at the Arlington and Baltimore immigration courts -- which decide all cases from Virginia, the District and Maryland -- is higher than average, largely because of their locations near metropolitan areas. In fiscal 2005, 42 percent of cases in Arlington were completed with an immigration lawyer; that figure was 58 percent in Baltimore.

In court, judges hand immigrants a list of charities that offer free or low-cost legal services. They can help. According to the Catholic Legal Immigration Network, government data show that 34 percent of all non-detained immigrants with attorneys won their cases in fiscal 2003, compared with 23 percent without. Of non-detained asylum seekers, 39 percent with attorneys won their cases; that figure was 14 percent of those without attorneys.

To help, the Executive Office for Immigration Review, the Justice Department agency that runs the nation's 54 immigration courts, has been facilitating and expanding pro bono efforts. But volunteer legal aid services are often overwhelmed and have to turn people away. Many of the nine groups on the Arlington court's list will not take the cases of detainees or criminals.

Alberto M. Benitez, a law professor who directs the George Washington University Immigration Law Clinic, one provider on the list, said he and the students he supervises must sometimes temporarily shut down their service, which operates only during the school year, to catch up.

"Once it's open, it's a deluge of calls and walk-ins and referrals," Benitez said.

Some organizations, including the American Bar Association, have called for a congressionally ordered, court-appointed system for the indigent and mentally ill. But backers concede that the idea has little viability as tension simmers over illegal immigration. Lawyers have made little headway in courts by arguing that the absence of counsel violates immigrants' due process rights.

So now advocates focus on efficiency, saying lawyers save the system money by speeding up the process, often by telling the many immigrants without a good case to accept deportation. But no study has included a cost comparison.

The claim is unconvincing to some.

"I'm not aware of any evidence that says the system would work better if people just had access to more lawyers," said Dan Stein, president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which seeks a reduction in immigration. He added: "Any good immigration lawyer at this point says that every illegal alien is just basically a potential legal one if . . . you find some loophole or make the process long enough."

After 11 a.m., the courtroom was drained of lawyers. A Mexican man approached, attorneyless.

Minutes later, the clerk called 677.

"Six-seven-seven," Velasco echoed in English, standing to cross the chilly room.

"Did you find an attorney to represent you?" Malphrus asked.

"Not yet," she said through an interpreter.

"I'm not aware of any basis that you have for remaining in the United States," Malphrus told her. "The only thing I can do is grant you voluntary departure from the United States in four months."

"Okay," Velasco said, with a nod.

After a lunch break, Juan Carlos Lopez, a 17-year-old Honduran, awaited his hearing. His brother, Johnny Sandoval, 23, said two mortgages and two jobs leave him little time or money to get a lawyer for Juan Carlos, who crossed the border illegally in April.

Soon the brothers sat before the judge, who said he would postpone the case until February. But bring a lawyer, he told them.

"His aunt is a resident," Sandoval said. "Is there any way she can sponsor him?"

"I don't think an aunt is sufficient, right?" Malphrus said to the prosecutor.

"The other option is to try to get him a visa to attend school here, but you need to do that back in Honduras," Malphrus said. "Anyway, talk to lawyers about that some more."

Justice can be done without lawyers, but it is tedious, said Denise N. Slavin, president of the National Association of Immigration Judges. Paperwork-heavy cases, she said, might take two hearings with a good attorney but eight without.

"You're acting like someone at the DMV on those cases," said Slavin, a Miami judge. "Like, 'Okay, you've got your registration; you don't have your pollution certificate.' "

Pro se detainees sometimes file motions modeled on boilerplates that are passed around detention centers. Lawyers say other people have good cases but founder in court, not knowing when to object or what evidence to prepare.

"The pro se folks can be good at packing the court with family members or other supporters, but they don't call them as witnesses because they don't know how to call them as witnesses," said Christopher Nugent, a lawyer who coordinates pro bono programs for Holland & Knight in the District.

About 2 p.m., Richmond resident Yasmin Bahamon sat in the courtroom, looking lawyerly in a pantsuit. She was in court for the fifth time, pushing her asylum case. She said she arrived in the United States five years ago from Colombia after being kidnapped and released by leftist guerrillas.

Her attorney, she said, dropped her case when she could not pay. She said none of the lawyers on the court's pro bono list returned her calls.

As with the others, Malphrus said her file showed no basis for her to stay. Would she take voluntary departure?

"No. I can't," Bahamon, 33, said quietly.

"Why can't you?" the judge asked.

She froze.

"Keep trying to get a lawyer to help you," Malphrus said.

Later, Bahamon stood in the empty hallway, weeping as a court clerk comforted her.

Blinking back tears, she said, "I am going to keep trying on the same list."

BB&T Plans To Appeal Ruling On Tax Refund (WSJ)

By Rob Wells

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON -- BB&T Corp. said it intends to appeal a federal judge's rejection of a refund claim in a tax-shelter dispute with the Internal Revenue Service.

A U.S. District Court judge for the Middle District of North Carolina ruled for the Justice Department in a case involving BB&T's claim of a $3.3 million tax refund related to a 1997 lease transaction.

The IRS had rejected the refund claim, and BB&T went to court to settle the dispute.

BB&T spokesman Bob Denham said the Winston-Salem, N.C., bank is still reviewing the judge's opinion. "We disagree, and we plan to appeal," he said.

The leasing transaction involved a controversial "lease in, lease out" arrangement. In 2004, Congress outlawed similar leasing arrangements under which companies bought assets and then leased them back to their prior owners. Such arrangements can produce big tax benefits because depreciation can be claimed on the assets. The IRS in 2005 said it would begin to pursue leasing transactions in court.

Eileen O'Connor, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's tax division, hailed the court decision, saying it shows that "to have a tax deduction for lease or interest expense, you must actually incur them." She said the court found in the BB&T case that the lease-in, lease-out tax shelter didn't involve a genuine lease or genuine indebtedness.

Mr. Denham said BB&T believes the leasing transaction on its 1997 tax return "was in full compliance with the Internal Revenue Code and all the applicable regulations."

At 4 p.m. Friday in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, BB&T shares fell 58 cents, or 1.3%, to $43.08 apiece.

Bush Tax Cuts Offer Most For Very Rich, Study Finds (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 — Families earning more than $1 million a year saw their federal tax rates drop more sharply than any group in the country as a result of President Bush's tax cuts, according to a new Congressional study.

The study, by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, also shows that tax rates for middle-income earners edged up in 2004, the most recent year for which data was available, while rates for people at the very top continued to decline.

Based on an exhaustive analysis of tax records and census data, the study reinforced the sense that while Mr. Bush's tax cuts reduced rates for people at every income level, they offered the biggest benefits by far to people at the very top — especially the top 1 percent of income earners.

Though tax cuts for the rich were bigger than those for other groups, the wealthiest families paid a bigger share of total taxes. That is because their incomes have climbed far more rapidly, and the gap between rich and poor has widened in the last several years.

The study offers ammunition to supporters and opponents of Mr. Bush's tax cuts, which are all but certain to touch off a battle between the president and the Democrats who just took control of Congress.

Democratic leaders have taken pains to avoid an immediate fight over the tax cuts, most of which are scheduled to expire at the end of 2010. But Democrats are looking for ways to increase revenue well before then, in part because they want to spend more on education and energy without increasing the deficit.

Economists and tax analysts have long known that the biggest dollar value of Mr. Bush's tax cuts goes to people at the very top income levels. One reason is that two of his signature measures, tax cuts on investment income and a steady reduction of estate taxes, overwhelmingly benefit the wealthiest households.

But the Congressional study offers additional insight because it incorporates information about what people paid in 2004, the first year in which taxpayers could take full advantage of the cuts on stock dividends and capital gains.

The study estimates that the effective federal income tax rate, which excludes payroll taxes for Social Security and Medicare, declined modestly for people in the middle- and lower-income categories.

Families in the middle fifth of annual earnings, who had average incomes of $56,200 in 2004, saw their average effective tax rate edge down to 2.9 percent in 2004 from 5 percent in 2000. That translated to an average tax cut of $1,180 per household, but the tax rate actually increased slightly from 2003.

Tax cuts were much deeper, and affected far more money, for families in the highest income categories. Households in the top 1 percent of earnings, which had an average income of $1.25 million, saw their effective individual tax rates drop to 19.6 percent in 2004 from 24.2 percent in 2000. The rate cut was twice as deep as for middle-income families, and it translated to an average tax cut of almost $58,000.

In its report, the Congressional Budget Office estimated that the overall effective federal tax rate edged up to 20 percent in 2004, from 19.8 percent the year before.

But even with that increase, Americans faced lower tax rates than any time since 1979. If President Bush has his way, those rates could decline even more as the estate tax on inherited wealth is gradually phased out by the start of 2010.

Mr. Bush and his Republican allies in Congress want to permanently extend that tax cut and almost all of the others that Congress passed in his first term. The cost of doing that would be more than $1 trillion over the next decade, a cost that would hit the Treasury at the same time that the spending on old-age benefits for retiring baby boomers begins to soar.

The budget office offered little commentary on its new estimates, but many of its numbers spoke for themselves.

The report shows that a comparatively small number of very wealthy households account for a very big share of total tax payments, and their share increased in the first four years after Mr. Bush's tax cuts.

The top 1 percent of income earners paid about 36.7 percent of federal income taxes and 25.3 percent of all federal taxes in 2004. The top 20 percent of income earners paid 67.1 percent of all federal taxes, up from 66.1 percent in 2000, according to the budget office.

By contrast, families in the bottom 40 percent of income earners, those with incomes below $36,300, typically paid no federal income tax and received money back from the government. That so-called negative income tax stemmed mainly from the earned-income tax credit, a program that benefits low-income parents who are employed.

Put another way: rich families were the undisputed winners from President Bush's tax cuts, but people in the bottom half of the earnings scale were not paying much in taxes anyway.

Dems Look At Tax Cuts For Middle Class (AP)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 8, 2007

Democrats are not ruling out raising taxes for the wealthiest people to help pay for tax cuts for middle-income families, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said.

She spoke of pursuing an estimated $300 billion that people owe in back taxes, eliminating deficit spending and reducing wasteful federal spending.

"As we review what we get from ... collecting our taxes and reducing waste, fraud and abuse, investing in education and in initiatives which will bring money into the Treasury, it may be that (repealing) tax cuts for those making over a certain amount of money, $500,000 a year, might be more important to the American people than ignoring the educational and health needs of America's children," Pelosi, D-Calif., said in an interview aired Sunday.

A budget rule, known as the pay-as-you-go rule, that was approved by the Democratic-run House on Friday requires that tax cuts have corresponding cuts in government spending or tax increases elsewhere to pay for them.

"What we're saying is Democrats propose tax cuts for middle-income families. And we want to have 'pay-go,' no new deficit spending. We're not going to start with repealing tax cuts, but they certainly are not off the table for people making over half a million dollars a year," Pelosi said.

The Senate's top Republican said most GOP senators oppose this budget rule because "it almost guarantees that the majority, if it enacts it, will try to raise taxes."

"The last thing we need to do is to be raising taxes in this country, and 'pay-go' is the first step toward raising taxes," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky. "I think there will be very few, if any, Republicans who will support raising taxes.

Last week, the president challenged Democrats to join him in balancing the budget within five years and urged them to cut thousands of pet projects from future spending bills.

"If the president's willing to join with us to fight waste, fraud, and abuse, collecting the taxes, closing the loopholes, we can start there," Pelosi said. "What we'd like to do is come to the table as I say, put all our priorities on the table."

Bush's spending decisions also came under fire from the new chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Rep. David Obey, D-Wis.

"How can you ever expect to get to a balanced budget if you're spending $100 billion a year on Iraq borrowing the money to do it, if you're giving $50 billion a year in tax cuts to people who make over a million bucks a year and paying for that with borrowed money?" Obey said.

Elsewhere on the legislative agenda, the chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee is getting ready to investigate suspected government fraud, particularly in federal contracts in Iraq and the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina struck. But Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., is not preparing to hand out subpoenas at first.

"I don't think you issue a subpoena first. You negotiate, and you try to get the information you need," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif.

Democratic Rep. Charles Rangel of New York, the new chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, is seeking GOP cooperation in making inroads on bloated tax laws.

"We have to look at all of the deductions, all of the credits, and to come up with what we think we can do," he said. "Is it going to be difficult? You bet your life."

Pelosi appeared on CBS' "Face the Nation." Rangel, Waxman and Obey were on "This Week" on ABC while McConnell spoke on "Fox News Sunday."

After Many Years, It's Rangel's Turn At The Helm (NYT)

By Robin Toner

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 — It is the committee that produced the Social Security and Medicare laws, that created the modern welfare state and reinvented it in the 1990s, that raised taxes and slashed them, again and again and again. No committee, arguably, has more power or attracts more lobbyists than the Committee on Ways and Means. House members sometimes wait for years for a seat on it, then for decades to rise in seniority.

Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York, joined the committee in 1975, and now, at the age of 76, has finally arrived at the very top. He takes the chairmanship of the 41-member panel, with a new majority of 24 Democrats, at a moment fraught with risk and possibility. Over the next two years, the committee will play a central role in defining, and financing, the Democratic Party's agenda after 12 years out of power.

In its sprawling meeting rooms (decorated with heroic portraits of chairmen past), the committee will now have to deal with all the Democrats' conflicting promises, barely submerged tensions and competing visions from last year's midterm elections.

The language may be arcane, the legislation incremental, but the issues before the members touch the lives of millions of Americans as they grapple with a changing and sometimes unsettling economy: how to balance the demands of globalization with the fears of many Americans that free trade no longer works for them. How to abide by the principles of fiscal responsibility, while investing in education, health care and other core benefits for an increasingly anxious middle class.

How to maintain the benefits and control the costs in Medicare as the first wave of baby boomers retires. What to do about the huge Bush tax cuts that begin to expire in 2010, a tempting target for liberals but a political landmine for Democrats trying to avoid the old charge of "taxing and spending."

All over Washington, lobbyists, tax lawyers and business leaders, with vast amounts of corporate wealth and power on the line, are acutely focused on the committee — and on the man who now leads it. Moments after the Democratic transfer of power became official Thursday, Mr. Rangel walked across the crowded Capitol to a reception for Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, a fellow New York Democrat, and almost everyone he passed offered a hand, a cheek, a business card, a heartfelt (and occasionally groveling) congratulation.

"Mr. Chairman, what do I do, kneel, genuflect, what?" one woman said. Another man, suddenly recognizing the chairman, blurted out: "We've got to set up a meeting!" One after another asked, almost meekly, "Can I give you my card?" Mr. Rangel seemed utterly enchanted by it all. When he arrived at the reception, he joined the other alpha male in the room, Mrs. Clinton's husband, and settled happily into small talk, surrounded by flashing cameras, filming cellphones and beaming onlookers.

Mr. Rangel acknowledged, with a laugh, that he is now treated quite differently by the business and lobbying community. "I would be doing the same thing, to be honest with you," he said. "You've got to get along with the people who make the decisions and chair the committees." For example, Mr. Rangel added, business leaders consumed with expanding trade are suddenly displaying (at least in his presence) a "more sensitive understanding of the pain that it causes some people." It is, in short, good to be king.

Mr. Rangel is in some ways an unlikely leader for the new Democratic Party, which regained its Congressional majority in large part because of suburban voters, often in very competitive districts. The first black representative to lead the committee, Mr. Rangel comes from an urban and exceedingly safe district; it had the largest margin of Democratic presidential votes in the country in 2004, with just 9 percent going to President Bush, according to the Almanac of American Politics.

Since he won his seat in 1970, defeating Adam Clayton Powell Jr. in a Democratic primary, Mr. Rangel has been easily re-elected, and able to deliver the federal largess that seniority brings. His district has had only two congressmen in more than 60 years.

Mr. Rangel is, by most measures, a liberal, although he said in an interview last month that he would no more be a "Harlem chairman" than Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, would be a "San Francisco speaker." After 12 agonizing years in the minority, when friends urged him to leave the House and give up the distant prospect of the chairmanship, he says he is determined to make the job work and get things done. That means building consensus and reaching out, not just in his own party but across the aisle, to Congressional Republicans and the Bush administration.

He cannot work the way his predecessor, Representative Bill Thomas of California, did — by driving his own party hard and winning votes by absolute party unity. "Democrats don't work in lockstep," Mr. Rangel said. And even if they did, any purely partisan legislation faces the possibility of a presidential veto.

All this political caution and elaborate bipartisanship does not come easily to Mr. Rangel. He is given to speaking his mind, recently affirming, for example, his support for a return of the draft to highlight the unequal sharing of the burden of war. It is not a popular position, and Mr. Rangel said his party leaders "kindly" reminded him that "it wasn't in my jurisdiction."

During the midterm campaign, Republicans repeatedly, and at times successfully, tried to provoke Mr. Rangel. Vice President Dick Cheney said, at one point, that Mr. Rangel "doesn't understand how the economy works" and would return to taxing and spending; Mr. Rangel unloaded in turn.

Now, he is trying hard to be restrained, about Mr. Bush, his administration and his tax cuts. When asked about Mr. Bush's renewed insistence last week that Congress extend those tax provisions, Mr. Rangel paused and said, with almost visible effort, "Part of what I think is my responsibility is not to be critical of the president."

He brushes off speculation about his party's plans for the Bush tax cuts, many of which have been criticized by Democrats for years as a giveaway to the richest Americans; it is simply premature, he argues, since their expiration date is three years off. Stan Collender, a longtime budget analyst, says it makes no political sense for Congress to "deal with tax cuts before you have to, certainly not before the 2008 election."

This almost painfully careful discussion underscores the stakes of the Ways and Means Committee's agenda. This month, to set a framework for the discussion of the president's budget, the committee will hold broad hearings on the state of the nation's economy; those will be followed by more hearings on the budget itself, expected in early February. With the president's fast-track authority to negotiate trade agreements expiring this summer, the debate over globalization will also be quickly joined.

Chairmen of the 218-year-old committee have traditionally been at the center of the great debates, including how to support a growing elderly population and how to deal with the excesses of capitalism. They often deal directly with presidents — Wilbur

Mills with Lyndon Johnson, Dan Rostenkowski with Ronald Reagan and George H. W. Bush — and are linked to the great accomplishments of their eras. (They can also take major political falls, as did Mr. Mills and Mr. Rostenkowski.)

The chairmanship does not carry the power it once did; changes in House rules and political practice reined in the "old bulls." But Mr. Rangel, who plans to fly to Chicago this month and confer with Mr. Rostenkowski, is already thinking about his legacy.

"I'm 76, and I can't afford the luxury just to gridlock," he said.

Still, there are real fault lines, even within his party. The recent elections showed a resurgent populism, a new skepticism on trade and a new alarm that global competition translates into lower wages and shakier benefits for too many Americans. Democrats who embraced free trade under President Bill Clinton are now having second thoughts.

Liberals like Robert B. Reich, the former secretary of labor, argue that the new Congress must provide "more economic security at home," like affordable health insurance or better pension protection, to cushion workers in this rough, new, competitive environment. But at the same time, many Democrats argue that the Clinton-era emphasis on deficit reduction and fiscal responsibility must be restored, raising the question of how all their new spending (not to mention a fix to the alternative minimum tax) will be paid for.

Jared Bernstein, a liberal economist, said: "When the Ways and Means Committee has worked well, they've identified social needs and advocated for the funds to meet them. Will this committee do that? I hope so."

Republicans, for their part, say they want to work with the Democrats where they can, in particular to "change the tone" on the committee after years of bitter partisanship, as Representative Jim McCrery of Louisiana, the panel's senior Republican, put it. But the ideological gulf between the two parties is vast, not just on tax cuts, but on the role of government versus the private market in areas like health care.

Representative Paul D. Ryan, Republican of Wisconsin, one of the influential young conservatives on the committee, says he fears that the Democrats' policies will inevitably lead to abolishing "the pro-growth Bush tax cuts" and pushing Medicare back toward a "one-size-fits-all government monopoly."

All of this now faces Mr. Rangel — an extraordinarily difficult job that he won, in part, by simply enduring. As he did his victory lap across the Capitol last week, he said he had no regrets. He could not stop smiling.

A Bush Tax Increase? (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

More than the ascension of Nancy Pelosi & Co. was disturbing congressional Republicans last week. They worried that George W. Bush might proceed down the path that made his father a one-term president. Thus, they ask this question: Will the current President Bush embrace a tax increase that would produce potential economic disaster and guaranteed political catastrophe?

Henry M. Paulson Jr. is a shark on Wall Street but a rookie on Pennsylvania Avenue. As Bush's third secretary of the Treasury, he has engaged in secret bipartisan talks discussing an increase in the $97,500 limit on personal income subject to the Social Security payroll tax. That would cause a jump in the top marginal tax rate, demolishing supply-side tax principles that Republican administrations have purportedly followed for 26 years.

Paulson certainly has given the impression in those discussions that he is amenable to raising the payroll tax, but a senior White House aide cautions that this decision has not yet been made. "There is somebody higher than Hank Paulson, and it is George W. Bush," he told me. Presidential adviser Karl Rove (who is not the aide I just quoted) attended conservative activist Grover Norquist's weekly meeting on Wednesday and offered to bet anyone $5 that there would be no increase in the payroll tax base. But Bush himself has not unequivocally ruled out such a move, as he has any increase in the personal income tax.

White House spokesman Tony Snow, an ardent supply-sider as a columnist and commentator who must be personally against a higher payroll tax, dances around the question at public briefings. Congressional Republicans are running into a stone wall from usually cooperative Treasury and Social Security Administration officials when they request economic data that would demonstrate the folly of lifting the payroll cap.

But Paulson is the source of most Republican apprehension. He has engaged in private talks with Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, who now calls himself an "Independent Democrat." For more than two years, Graham has been seeking Lieberman's participation in a bipartisan Social Security reform that would include a higher payroll tax base.

When Graham began crafting his compromise in November 2004, the premise was that each party would accept something painful. In return for Republicans agreeing to payroll taxes on higher income, Democrats would have to swallow Bush's proposed personal retirement accounts, which would be financed by cutting into payroll tax revenue now dedicated entirely to Social Security. But no Democrat, not even Lieberman, is willing to accept that. Democrats refuse to talk with Republicans about personal accounts "carved out" of the present system.

Indeed, a "carve out" is a dead letter. New personal retirement accounts could be passed only as an "add on" -- financed voluntarily by individuals whose contributions to Social Security would remain unchanged. Higher payroll taxes would be imposed only to save the present system as part of broader entitlement reform.

Republican concern over such an outcome stems in no small part from the belief that the multimillionaire Paulson has entered a realm foreign to him. One well-placed House Republican, who asked that his name not be used, expressed alarm that a financier who sold $485 million worth of Goldman Sachs stock in order to be confirmed at Treasury cannot appreciate how the payroll tax ravages self-employed businessmen and farmers.

Eliminating the cap on payroll taxes would constitute the largest tax increase in U.S. history, estimated by the Heritage Foundation during the last Congress at $1.4 trillion over 10 years. This analysis predicted that such a step would cost nearly a million jobs and more than $55 billion in projected personal savings.

The economic woe that would result from higher payroll taxes would be matched by the political damage to the president if this outcome were adopted by the Democratic-controlled Congress with his approval but support from only a few Republican legislators. That political calamity can be averted if Bush takes a payroll tax increase off the negotiating table, just as Democrats refuse to talk about a partially privatized Social Security system.

A Bad, Bipartisan Tax Plan (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

Way, way back, which means before the midterm elections, the House Democrats waxed indignant about the rights of the minority party. When they assumed majority status last week, they barely gave Republicans a chance to speak, and all of Washington tut-tutted. Meanwhile, in the Senate, there was an outbreak of bipartisanship fit to make the angels sing. This posed a far more serious problem.

The outbreak came from Max Baucus, the new Democratic chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and Chuck Grassley, the ranking Republican. Standing shoulder to shoulder, manfully defying the mad partisan cleavage of our times, the two senators called for repeal of the alternative minimum tax -- a prescription so fiscally crazy that not even the Bush administration supports it.

To appreciate the full awfulness of this idea, start with the broad tax picture. The Bush tax cuts are set to expire in 2010, so there's going to be a loud debate about whether to extend them. Meanwhile the alternative minimum tax, which was devised to ensure that millionaires don't escape taxes through excessive deductions, is catching more and more families in its net. Back in 1970, just 20,000 households paid the AMT. This year 23.4 million are expected to be hit by it.

Nobody likes the AMT. It penalizes families with children, and it requires taxpayers to calculate what they owe twice: You crunch the numbers under the usual tax rules, crunch them again under AMT rules, then pay whichever bill is bigger. But the spread of the unpopular AMT creates a political opening. Coupled with the expiration of the tax cuts in 2010, it gives Congress two reasons to rethink tax policy.

The Baucus-Grassley idea would waste this opportunity. The senators don't want to reform the AMT or link its repeal to wider tax changes; they just want to abolish it. This would destroy the chance to say to voters: Look, we're not going to extend all the tax cuts we gave you in 2001 and 2003, and while we're at it we're going to reduce the mortgage-interest deduction and other egregious loopholes so that we can collect more revenue without discouraging work by raising your tax rates. But wait, don't get too mad; at least we're going to kill the AMT for you.

Repealing the AMT would preempt that sort of bargain; but it would also be bad on its own terms. For all its administrative clunkiness, the AMT is wonderfully progressive: 90 percent of its revenue comes from those earning more than $100,000 a year, according to the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center. Last week Baucus denounced the AMT as a "monster in the tax code" -- a "Frankenstein," no less. But in an era of rising inequality, you don't slay progressive monsters casually.

Then there is the question of paying for repeal, which would cost a whopping $750 billion-plus over a decade. Last week both parties proclaimed that they had truly, honestly forsworn budget-busting proposals: The Bush administration announced a plan to come up with a plan to balance the budget three years after it leaves office, while the Democrats announced that they would live by rules under which any tax cut or spending proposal must be paid for with an offsetting measure. In one cruel swoop, AMT repeal would bury these green shoots of responsibility.

Baucus, to be fair, says he wants AMT repeal to be "fiscally responsible." The trouble is that his favorite way of generating revenue -- redoubling efforts to collect unpaid taxes from shirkers -- is not going to yield anything like enough to finance AMT reform. If the senator has other revenue ideas, he's not mentioning them.

Meanwhile, Grassley is cheerfully indifferent to the deficit. He dismisses calls to offset the cost of abolition as a "trap": "It's unfair to raise taxes to repeal something with serious unintended consequences like the AMT," he complained last week. But the consequences of the AMT -- namely, rapidly rising revenue -- are not exactly a surprise, least of all to the senator. They have been part of the budget projections that Grassley used to justify his support for the Bush tax cuts.

The nation's fiscal destiny is going to depend on a few big things. It's great that pork-barrel "earmarks" are at last being criticized by both the president and Congress, but the most serious challenges lie elsewhere. They lie, first, in the federal health and retirement programs, whose costs threaten a crackup; and second, in the tax system, which needs to bring in extra revenue while reducing inequality and not injuring the work ethic. Senators have no business sitting on the Finance Committee unless they are grappling with these problems day and night. But Baucus and Grassley have set out to make a solution harder.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

How Bush Education Law Has Changed Our Schools (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, January 8, 2007

The walls are speaking these days at Stanton Elementary School in Philadelphia, and they're talking about test scores.

Post-It notes with children's names tell the story of how, in just five years, a federal law with a funny name has changed school for everyone. "We spend most of our days talking about or looking at data," principal Barbara Adderley says.

Test scores run her week.

She meets with kindergarten teachers on Monday, first-grade teachers on Tuesday and so on. The meetings begin with a look at each teacher's "assessment wall," filled with color-coded Post-Its representing each pupil and whether he or she is making steady progress in basic skills. Once students master a skill, the Post-Its move up the wall.

"If they don't move, then we have to talk about what's happening," Adderley says.

What's driving the talk? President Bush's landmark education law, dubbed No Child Left Behind.

A cornerstone of Bush's domestic agenda and one of his few truly bipartisan successes, it took what was once a fairly low-key funding vehicle (it was known as the Elementary and Secondary Education Act before Bush borrowed the catchy name from the Children's Defense Fund) and turned it into a vast — and contentious — book of federal mandates.

At its simplest, the law aims to improve the basic skills of the nation's public school children, particularly poor and minority students.

At Stanton, it seems to have made a difference. In 2003, fewer than two in 10 kids here met state reading standards; by 2005, about seven in 10 did.

The law turns 5 years old today.

It faces a tough future as Congress prepares to reauthorize it — a group of 100 education, religion and civil rights leaders today announces an effort calling for "major changes."

Is it improving education nationwide? It's too early to tell — many schools didn't get around to enacting most of its more than 1,000 pages of regulations until two or three years ago. U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings says the law wasn't being fully implemented in all 50 states until 2006.

But one thing is certain: No Child Left Behind has had a major influence on the daily experience of school for millions of kids. Here are five big ways it's changing schools.

It's driving teachers crazy

Here's a pretty safe rule of thumb: Start in the classroom and travel up the educational food chain. The further you travel, the more you'll find that people like the law. Mention it to most teachers and they'll just roll their eyes. Many principals tolerate it. Ask a local superintendent, a state superintendent or a governor and the assessment gets rosier as their suit gets more expensive.

Carmen Meléndez quit her job as a bilingual language arts teacher at an elementary school last spring in Orange County, Fla., after the law prompted her principal to institute 90-minute reading blocks and a scripted curriculum — in the process making individualized instruction impossible. Meléndez also found that she couldn't teach poetry anymore.

"It was insane," she says. "The kids were all jaded. They were tired — they hated school."

Most of the frustration, teachers will tell you, comes from the stress of mandated math and reading tests. The law requires that virtually all children be tested each year starting in third grade — and it doles out growing penalties if schools don't raise scores each year. Naturally, test day in most schools is fraught with tension.

"They're 8 years old, and they're so worried about a passing score," Meléndez says. "I think that's inhumane."

Dianne Campbell, director of testing and accountability in Rockingham County, N.C., told the American School Board Journal in 2003 that administrators discard as many as 20 test booklets on exam days because children vomit on them.

Also, many state rating systems (which often predated No Child Left Behind) now end up celebrating the same schools the federal law slams.

Longstreet Elementary School in Daytona Beach, Fla., has scored high on the state ratings for five years, but Longstreet is one of 21 Volusia County schools due for "corrective action" this year under the law.

"Our parents are thrilled at what happens at our school — and a lot of what happens at our school has nothing to do with No Child Left Behind," says counselor Bill Archer.

Jack Jennings of the Center on Education Policy, a Washington education research group, says some of the testing actually helps drive better instructional strategies and, in that respect, is helpful. But he says teachers tell him they're overwhelmed by the sheer volume of testing, which can last six weeks in some schools.

"I don't think you can go into a teacher meeting in the country without somebody bringing up No Child Left Behind," he says.

After five years, the law has even spawned an online petition that, as of Sunday, had about 22,500 signatures of people urging Congress to repeal it.

Along with his signature, teacher Mark Quig-Hartman of Vallejo, Calif., said: "I am well on my way to becoming an embittered and mediocre teacher who heretofore considered teaching to be a profession, not a job. I once loved what I did. I do not now, nor do my students; school has become a rather grim and joyless place for all."

Teachers' unions have often been the law's loudest critics. One top National Education Association official even entertained the NEA's 2004 conference in Washington by appearing onstage with an acoustic guitar and singing a protest song with this unforgettable hook: "If we have to test their butts off, there'll be no child's behind left."

And if you think it's just teachers who complain, think again: 2006 saw even the law's most ardent supporters complaining, but for a very different reason: They say states and school districts game the system by lowering their standards.

Because the law allows each state to set its own pass/fail bar on skills tests, "proficient" means something different depending on which state you live in. The percentage of Missouri fourth-graders at or above "proficient" in English is only 35%, but 89% of Mississippi fourth-graders meet that state's standards. In math, only 39% of Maine fourth-graders are proficient or better; in North Carolina, 92% are.

Philadelphia Public Schools CEO Paul Vallas jokes that to really improve scores in his city, he could make classes smaller and modernize buildings. "Or we can give everyone the Illinois test," he says.

It's narrowing what many schools teach

If nothing else, the law's first five years have proved the maxim "What gets tested gets taught."

The law's annual testing requirements in math and reading have led many schools to pump up the amount of time they spend teaching these two staples — often at the expense of other subjects, such as history, art or science.

Jennings found that 71% of districts are reducing time on other subjects in elementary school.

"What we're getting under (the law) is a very strong emphasis on building skills at the expense of history and literature and science," says researcher Thomas Toch of the Education Sector, a Washington think tank.

Other critics say the law has created a "complexity gap." Children in lower grades have made improvements — some impressive — in basic skills, but the improvements vanish in middle school and beyond, when kids are tested on more complex conceptual thinking.

Brown University researcher Martin West this fall compared federal data from 2000 and 2004, and found that since No Child Left Behind, elementary schools have spent, on average, 23 fewer minutes a week on science and 17 fewer minutes on history. He also found that in states that test history and science each spring, teachers spend about half an hour more a week on each subject.

He also found, oddly, that after a large jump in the 1990s, schools actually spend a few minutes less a week on math — but they still spend more than twice as much time on math than on either history or science.

And they spend more than twice as much time on reading and language as on math.

"Schools really do respond to the incentives that are provided to them," West says. "That places a huge premium on getting the incentives correct."

But he and others aren't quite ready to say the law is dumbing down school.

Researcher Jane Hannaway of the Urban Institute theorizes that improved reading skills may help children understand other topics, even if they're spending less class time on them.

She recently looked at Texas fourth-graders' standardized test scores and found that they had some of the nation's highest marks in science — even though they don't tackle science until fifth grade. One possible theory? The children in Texas were simply able to read the test questions better.

'Invisible' students get attention

Even opponents of No Child Left Behind grudgingly concede that, five years out, the law has revolutionized how schools look at poor, minority and disabled children in big cities, who often find themselves struggling academically. It forces schools to look at test score data in a whole new light, breaking out the scores into 35 or more "subgroups."

If even one group fails to make "Adequate Yearly Progress," or AYP, in a year, the whole school is labeled as "in need of improvement."

Perhaps most significant, the law has given a handful of big-city superintendents the political leverage to make radical changes — they can now make the case that "federal requirements" make them necessary.

In Philadelphia, public schools CEO Paul Vallas invoked the law when, in one school year, 2002-03, he replaced all of the city's elementary and middle school math and language arts textbooks and hired Kaplan, the test-prep company, to write a standardized core curriculum.

He pumped up full-day kindergarten and preschool — Philly students are now 50% more likely to have attended preschool than before the law — and instituted extended-day math and reading programs for struggling students. "No Child Left Behind gave us the cover to do it," he says.

In the past three years, he also has dismissed 750 teachers who didn't meet minimum standards the law put in place.

"We would have never been able to do that without the federal (Sword of) Damocles hanging over our head," he says.

Superintendents in New York City, Chicago, San Diego and elsewhere have made similar — and sometimes bigger — changes under the cover of No Child Left Behind.

Spellings says the law has had similar effects nationwide. "It has built an appetite to pay attention to kids who have been overlooked previously," she says.

A few observers, such as Mike Petrilli, a former top Bush administration official, say the law has been felt most keenly by suburban school districts, where for years low achievers weren't a priority because high-achieving kids could bring up the district average.

Petrilli, who now works for the Fordham Foundation, a conservative Washington think tank, says the idea of breaking out poor and minority kids' scores was "really revolutionary" in most suburbs.

It has prompted many suburban districts in places such as Montclair, N.J.; Shaker Heights, Ohio; and Evanston, Ill., to form a co-op that shares ways to help once-neglected minority kids.

"There's general agreement that (the law) has created more of a sense of urgency," says education blogger and Virginia State Board of Education member Andrew Rotherham.

What that looks like in individual schools varies, but in many, "urgency" is not pretty.

"It really has brought the Hounds of Hell down on the schools of Prince William County," says Betsie Fobes, a recently retired eighth-grade algebra and pre-algebra teacher at Parkside Middle School in Manassas, Va. "This AYP business is just killing us — absolutely killing us."

Parkside, which has seen a large Latino influx, didn't meet its goals two years in a row — so now teachers must attend twice-weekly meetings, often focused on testing. They've built in a tutorial period, and even secretaries do their share of tutoring.

"The entire school is revolving pretty much around these kids who fit into these subgroups," Fobes says.

It's making the school day longer

If a restaurant takes 12 eggs and makes a lousy omelette, will adding another two eggs make it better?

If a school can't teach a child to read in seven hours, will eight do the trick?

Under No Child Left Behind, the answer is: Probably yes.

The law requires schools that don't make adequate yearly progress to offer free transfers to a better-performing public school.

If results don't improve the next year, the school must begin offering free after-school tutoring — in many cases with classes taught by the school's own teachers with whom the kids were failing during the school day.

William Bennett, Ronald Reagan's education secretary, invoked the egg metaphor, and as it turns out, a lot of families — and teachers — are willing to try the omelette. In the 2004-05 school year, 1.4 million students were eligible for the tutoring, and about 17% took advantage of it.

Spellings says the tutoring is often provided by different teachers from the ones a kid sees during the regular day. Perhaps more important, she says, the law is forcing large districts such as Los Angeles to figure out how to keep kids from needing tutoring in the first place.

"They're … sitting there thinking, 'What the heck? How can we have so many kids who can't get to grade level in the course of the school day? What needs to happen in the school day different?' "

It's changing how reading is taught

Forget everything else No Child Left Behind stands for. If it does nothing else, advocates say, it will have improved poor kids' reading in unprecedented ways. A few say it already has.

The law gives schools $1 billion a year to spend on reading and focuses it, laser-like, on 5,600 schools that serve the nation's poorest 1.8 million kids. It starts with kids as soon as they enter school and, so far, has trained 103,000 teachers on "scientifically based" reading strategies heavy in phonics, step-by-step lessons and practice, practice, practice.

And because many schools build their reading programs around what primary grades do, it could affect millions more students' reading skills.

How could it fail? Easily, say critics such as Susan Ohanian. She points to overly scripted reading curricula and a curious little reading test called DIBELS, which makes it easy to rate children's reading skills, in part by asking them to look at nonsense words; it then rates them on their ability to read the words aloud — very quickly.

"I have never seen anything like this," says Ohanian, a former New York teacher who blogs about education in general and No Child Left Behind in particular. She bemoans the loss of teacher autonomy and says DIBELS is one of its worst symptoms.

"I don't dispute that it's quick and easy and it's a tool — and if you just used it that way, I probably wouldn't have a problem with it," she says. But she adds: "They're using DIBELS to hold kids back in kindergarten. And that's where it becomes really evil. Some kids are just not ready for that skills stuff."

Next Round Begins For No Child Left Behind (CSM)

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, January 8, 2007

When President Bush signed the landmark No Child Left Behind Act five years ago Monday, he conducted a three-state road show, touted its bipartisan roots, and promised it would put US schools "on a new path of reform, and a new path of results."

In the five years since, critics and admirers of the bill tend to agree about the reform part, but say they're still waiting for results.

Achievement levels are creeping up toward the 2014 deadline when all public school children are supposed to be "proficient" at math and reading, and the racial and economic achievement gaps have narrowed slightly in a few cases, but not at all in others.

Yet even the act's harshest critics admit it has changed the conversation about education in America, and has focused attention on poor-achieving groups of students who had been overlooked.

This year, No Child Left Behind (NCLB) is getting particular attention: It's not just the five-year anniversary, but the year the act expires and must be voted on again by Congress - an opportunity many are hoping will be used to revise the law - either a lot or a little - to make it more effective.

"I'm actually even more hopeful about this second iteration of this law than I was about the first," says Michael Casserly, executive director of the Council of the Great City Schools. "In general, I think the law has been more helpful than not. For a piece of legislation that really changed the conversation from universal access to universal proficiency, I wouldn't necessarily expect to get that paradigm shift right the first time around." A national reform

In its five years, the law has affected nearly every elementary and high school in the country.

Testing is now conducted every year from Grades 3 through 8, and students' performance is measured against that of the rest of their state and is broken down by race and income level. If any of those groups fails to make the "adequate yearly progress" two years in a row, the school is placed on an "in need of improvement" list. Schools on the list that receive federal funds are then subject to mounting sanctions and extra services.

And that's just the most visible change. The ultimate goal is to have every child meeting standards by 2014.

For now, though, the results are less clear. Scores on the National Assessment of Education Progress (NAEP), called the nation's report card, have climbed slowly in reading and math for some groups, but the number of students who are "proficient" is still discouraging.

Just 41 percent of all white fourth graders meet the standard in reading, for instance. For both reading and math, only 13 percent of all black fourth graders are "proficient." Teachers complain of the stigma of being a failing school, and principals worry about the myriad ways they could end up on a watch list.

The Department of Education emphasizes the long-term NAEP trends, noting that more progress in the reading scores of 9-year-olds was made between 1999 and 2004 than in the previous 28 years combined. But in general, even supporters say they're happier with the conversation the law has jumpstarted than with the results.

"It's been more effective at capturing attention and getting the rhetorical attention than in actually prompting people to go after the hard stuff they're going to need to go after to actually close these gaps," says Kati Haycock, director of the Education Trust, which focuses on closing achievement gaps for poor and minority students. She credits NCLB with some improvement in the achievement gap, but would like to see teacher quality standards better enforced. A push to help those at the bottom

One change that seems likely to get traction is a shift toward a "growth" model of assessing schools, in which schools with students who come in far below grade level get credit for helping them make big strides, even if they still fall short of proficiency - so long as, the Department of Education emphasizes, they do get students to a proficient level eventually. The department has already approved pilot programs in five states, and wants Congress to include such a model in NCLB.

Still, some critics want far more sweeping changes. A coalition called the Forum on Educational Accountability now has more than 100 groups - including the NAACP and the National Education Association - which have signed a list of 14 requested changes to the law. They include lowering the current proficiency targets, providing more assistance to failing schools, getting rid of sanctions with less record of improvement, and encouraging testing designed to measure higher thinking skills and performance throughout the year.

"The goal [of NCLB] is reasonable - the structure and way it's been implemented have been a disaster," says Monty Neill, director of FairTest and chairman of the forum.

He says some sanctions, such as allowing students to attend another school, aren't working, and that the testing and annual progress requirements have caused many schools to narrow their curriculum and "teach to the test" in the months preceding it.

"We'd be better off putting money into the teachers, teaching them how to be better assessors, and building in methods for spot checking and getting feedback," Mr. Neill says. Slim chance for change in 2007

While the conversation is heated, the likelihood that NLCB will be reauthorized this year may be small. An informal poll of Washington insiders conducted by the conservative Thomas B. Fordham Foundation found that none believed it is likely this year, and most thought it would be put off until after the 2008 presidential election.

Michael Petrilli, vice president for national programs and policy of the foundation and an early supporter of NCLB, admits that by this point, he's convinced that the federal government simply can't accomplish what it wants. He'd keep the goals of NCLB, but put the federal government's effort into setting strong national standards - instead of the widely varying state standards that currently exist - and have the states and districts figure out on their own how to get students to meet those standards.

"What we've learned more than anything else is that the federal government isn't well-equipped to force school districts to do things they don't want to do," Mr. Petrilli says.

The Department of Education, meanwhile, asks critics to be patient.

"We're in such a different place" than we were five years ago, says Kerri Briggs, acting assistant secretary for policy. "Education reform is not necessarily speedy work. It's tough stuff and requires putting in new assessments, creating data systems, rethinking curriculum, new professional development for teachers.... We have a lot of heavy lifting left to do."

Cutting Provisions In Union Contracts Could Free Funds (WP)

By Jay Mathews

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

U.S. public schools could have as much as $77 billion more a year to improve teaching if they reduced spending on seniority pay increases, teacher's aides, class size limits and other measures often found in teacher union contracts, a new study contends.

The report from the Washington-based think tank Education Sector analyzed research on eight common provisions of contracts that require schools to spend substantial sums but have what the report called "a weak or inconsistent relationship with student learning."

The provisions include salary increases based on years of experience or educational credentials; professional development days; sick and personal days; class size limits; use of teacher's aides; and generous health and retirement benefits.

Teachers union officials sharply disputed the report's findings. School administrators and school board representatives said that although they would like more flexibility in the use of funds, there was little evidence that cutting such provisions would raise achievement.

"I believe that teachers will not trust our good intentions and find a system that eliminates the current pay structure an organization to avoid," said Robert G. Smith, Arlington County school superintendent.

The Education Sector is supported by several foundations, including those funded by the Gates, Hewlett and Kauffman families.

DOJ_NMG_0113090

The report, written by University of Washington researcher Marguerite Roza, called the $77 billion spent on the eight provisions "frozen assets" that could be better spent elsewhere.

"This is not excess money that could be withdrawn from the public education system with no impact on student learning, but rather money that might be spent differently and with great effect," she wrote.

Analyzing seniority-based salary raises, Roza wrote that "studies show that individual teachers are less effective in their first year of teaching than later in their careers, but improvement tends to plateau after only five years or so, and may even decline as teachers approach retirement."

Roza suggested that more could be spent to raise minimum salaries to recruit highly qualified younger educators or to hire teachers to tutor low-performing students after school.

Antonia Cortese, executive vice president of the American Federation of Teachers, said the report was "on thin ice for its sweeping -- and often inaccurate" assertions.

Reg Weaver, president of the National Education Association, said, "Research has shown us time and time again that low salaries drive committed people from the teaching profession." He added: "Simply put, we need lawmakers to fully fund public education."

Mayors Seek To Take Charge Of Schools (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The statistics tell a sorry tale about the public schools in America's capital. A majority of fourth- and eighth-graders are failing to read or do math at basic levels. Roughly four in five schools are not meeting achievement goals under the federal No Child Left Behind law. Just 43 percent of students graduate from high school in five years.

The new mayor, Adrian Fenty, got an earful about the situation during last year's campaign. "I heard repeatedly, 'Fix the schools.' It was a tidal wave," Fenty said.

So he is trying to do what a dozen other city leaders around the nation have done: gain control over the schools. For Fenty, that means convincing the city council and Congress to support his plan to require the superintendent to report to him and to further limit the authority of the elected school board. A majority of council members have signaled a willingness to back the new mayor.

The problem for Fenty and his colleagues is that mayors generally lack the power to overhaul schools.

"Mayors are held accountable for something they have no responsibility for," said Fritz Edelstein, who recently stepped down as a senior adviser to the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

In most places, elected school boards and the superintendents they hire govern school districts. It is a structure set up about a century ago to insulate schools from political strife and corruption in city government.

Yet it has not always worked as planned.

For example, before a mayoral takeover of New York City's schools, an investigation into a Bronx school board Bronx found that members routinely misused district personnel and resources _ once ordering X-rated pay-per-view movies.

Those kind of problems, plus low voter turnout for school board elections and sagging test scores, have fueled a movement since the 1990s for mayoral control of schools. Besides New York, it has happened in Boston, Chicago, Cleveland and Harrisburg, Pa.

The California Legislature gave the Los Angeles' mayor partial control over schools. But a judge last month struck down that law, saying it violated that state's constitution. The mayor is appealing.

Mayoral control of schools is being debated in Albuquerque, N.M., and Seattle too.

City leaders and their allies make the case that better schools help make cities prosper. Mayors say they are better equipped to take on the infighting, inertia and high turnover rates associated with school boards and the superintendents who report to them.

DOJ_NMG_0113091

New York's mayor, Michael Bloomberg, put it this way when Fenty and members of the District of Columbia City Council visited recently: "There's an old story that a camel is a racehorse designed by a committee and there's a lot more truth to that than not," Bloomberg said. "You don't run things by committee. You don't try to come to consensus when it's our children's future."

Such statements have earned Bloomberg criticism from people who say he has failed to seek community input and operate in a transparent way, said David Bloomfield, who heads a program at Brooklyn College that trains school administrators.

Bloomfield said there has been an increase in no-bid school contracts since the mayoral takeover in 2002 and that many parents feel there is no place to air concerns without an elected board.

Michael Kirst, a professor emeritus at Stanford University and an expert on school governance, said a takeover makes the system less democratic.

"Before mayoral control, you'd go to your school board member and raise hell," Kirst said. He said the trade-off is "strong, integrated leadership."

Bloomberg, a Republican in his second term, says he has broad support among voters, including for his handling of schools. A recent public opinion poll put his approval ratings around 70 percent.

Ken Wong, a school governance expert at Brown University, analyzed test scores in about a dozen cities with mayors in charge of schools from 1999 to 2003. The results showed modest but statistically significant progress in reading and math for elementary and middle-school students. Wong said data is insufficient to make the same judgment about high school students.

"Mayors are turnaround artists, not saviors. Our analysis suggests that mayors can steer the ship in the right direction, but that there is still a long way to go before their districts achieve acceptable levels of student achievement," Wong wrote in a report accompanying his analysis.

Tom Payzant, who recently stepped down after a decade as the mayor's appointed school superintendent in Boston, says it was important for him to be part of the mayor's Cabinet.

"When you think about trying to align policies and programs that affect children, youth and families, there is a much greater opportunity than there is in the system where the municipal government is totally separate from the school government," Payzant said.

Critics say it is precisely because mayors have so many other issues to address that schools should be managed separately.

"Mayors have a lot on their plate. It's a wonder that some of these mayors think they also have time to take over public schools," said Anne Bryant, executive director of the National School Boards Association.

Yet Fenty, sworn in last week as Washington's mayor, said he would make the time.

"We have a crisis on our hands," Fenty said in a news conference describing his bid for school control. "I am asking today for that responsibility to be placed squarely on my shoulders."

U.S. Education Officials Question Diversity Standard (WP)

By Valerie Strauss

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

The Education Department's general counsel is challenging the American Bar Association's new standard on diversity in enrollment and hiring, which calls for the law schools it accredits to take "concrete action" to attract more minority students, faculty and staff.

The 400,000-member law association, which has accredited nearly 200 law schools nationwide, said it updated its standards last year after a 2003 Supreme Court ruling that said law schools could use race and ethnicity as factors in admissions with certain restrictions.

The new standard gives no specific benchmarks, but the association said it would judge results on "the totality of the law school's actions."

Some Education Department officials said the ABA's new standard effectively promotes quotas and could force schools in states that ban affirmative action to break the law. Some civil rights organizations said the new standards did not go far enough "to stem the decline" in minority enrollments in law schools.

ABA officials say the department is misinterpreting the standard and pushing an anti-affirmative action agenda while violating its own procedures for reauthorizing the ABA as an accrediting agency.

The move, critics say, is the latest in a series of legal challenges on affirmative action, including a decision by Michigan voters in November to ban the use of race in deciding public university admissions and government hiring. It comes as the ABA is seeking the Education Department's authority to continue accrediting U.S. law schools.

Supreme courts and bar examiners in all 50 states use ABA approval as a qualifying factor in making law school graduate licensing decisions.

At a Dec. 4 hearing, department officials raised a number of concerns with the ABA's stewardship of the law school accreditation program, including whether it was consistently enforcing its own policies regarding the maximum time it allows a law school to remain out of compliance with its standards -- two years.

But the most controversial issue at the hearing was about the diversity standard.

Bill James, a department official who presented the case for the government, said during the hearing: "The ABA is now requiring schools to implement quotas for enrollment and hiring of racial and ethnic minorities and women. While the agency says that Standard 212 and its interpretations do not require quotas or preferences, the language is so vague that they can be reasonably read to require just that."

William Rakes, chairman of the ABA's council on legal education and admissions to the bar, countered that the association's application "has turned into a policy issue relating to affirmative action, relating to diversity, as opposed to a consideration as to whether" the ABA is consistently applying its own standards.

The ABA said it had a similar standard that promoted diversity for 26 years unchallenged.

Ultimately, the National Advisory Committee on Institutional Quality and Integrity, an appointed panel charged with making the decision, voted to extend the ABA's role for 18 months rather than the usual five years and required the association to improve the way it carries out the task of accrediting law schools. But the committee dropped the staff recommendation to include any action on the diversity standards.

The committee sent its report to Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, and general counsel Kent Talbert said the federal agency would appeal the decision to leave the standard alone. Department spokeswoman Jane Glickman said it was not known when the appeal would be made or when Spellings would rule.

Rakes issued a statement saying the ABA "is disappointed" about the appeal and noted that the department's "own regulations for recognizing accrediting agencies do not speak to diversity standards, and therefore, cannot justify the requirement of removing diversity standards from an accrediting agency's oversight of institutions of higher education."

Supporters Renew Push For Mental Health Care (USAT)

By Marilyn Elias, Usa Today

USA Today, January 8, 2007

Bills that could expand access to mental health care for Americans stand a better chance of passing with the new leadership that has taken over Congress, key lobbyists and congressional supporters of the legislation say.

Their top priority is a bill requiring insurers to offer comparable benefits for treating mental disorders and physical illnesses, known as "parity."

Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., introduced three earlier parity bills. "Now our prospects are the best that they've ever been," says Matt Letourneau, spokesman for the senator.

Although parity has bipartisan support, past legislation stalled in committee because House leadership didn't favor it, says Laurel Stine of the Bazelon Center for Mental Health Law, a Washington, D.C.-based advocacy group.

A 1996 federal law had required comparable dollar limits for coverage of mental disorders and medical problems but allowed caps on the number of therapy visits or days of hospitalization for mental illness.

In the past 15 years, 44 states have passed parity laws to expand coverage, the American Psychological Association says.

But many employer-sponsored health plans, particularly those offered by large companies, are exempt from such state laws, and about 55% of U.S. workers are in such plans, according to a report last year from the Kaiser Family Foundation.

Key goals of a federal parity law are to equalize coverage in such plans and in all insurance programs, Stine says.

Better mental health treatment for veterans returning from the Iraq war also could come out of the new Congress, says Ralph Ibson of Mental Health America, an education and advocacy group. He says the shift in leadership on the House Veterans Affairs Committee could lead to more spending for care.

Also on the radar: reauthorization bills that could affect mental health care for Hurricane Katrina survivors and children in poor families.

A bill to reauthorize the federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration could provide money to help Katrina survivors with mental disorders, Ibson says. And reauthorizing the state children's health insurance program could improve treatment benefits for children of the working poor, says Andrew Sperling of the advocacy group National Alliance on Mental Illness.

Mental health advocates also say there's strong support for a bill to help states create programs that would allow children with serious mental disorders to live with their families while they're treated. Some parents have had to give up custody to the state because they can't afford care.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, proposed the bill last session, but it died in the Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions. Rep. Patrick Kennedy, D-R.I., introduced the House version. Now his father, Sen. Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., will head the Senate committee the bill must clear.

"I'm hopeful we'll have more success this year," says Collins, who will reintroduce the bill. "No parent should have to face such a wrenching choice of either giving up custody or not getting treatment for their child."

Time Does Not Bend For Democrats, But The Congressional Record Does (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

It's not going to take long for the House Democrats to get comfortable in the majority. They got off to an excellent start last week, continuing the venerable tradition of riding roughshod over the minority. That's what gives the House its special charm .

But it may be they're thinking their powers are limitless. For example, new Rules Committee Chairman Louise M. Slaughter (D-N.Y.), speaking on the House floor during the debate Thursday on the new ethics package, said: "Let me just yield myself about 30 seconds or 45 seconds, whichever comes first."

Now wait a minute. Even the chairman of the Rules Committee can't violate the laws of time. No matter what, 30 is going to come before 45. Except in the "Back to the Future" movies.

And then, of course, history got a little massaging as the Congressional Record cleaned up her remarks: "I would like to yield myself about 30 seconds, 45 perhaps, just to respond for a moment," is how the Record recorded it.Retired 'in Place,' but Not in Iraq

Keeping up with . . . April Glaspie. Saddam Hussein's execution brought back thoughts of his early years, when he was a hideous dictator and murderer of his own people but steadfastly supported by Washington as a bulwark against the ayatollahs in Iran.

Things soured, of course, with his invasion of Kuwait, which he launched just days after U.S. Ambassador Glaspie visited him to warn that he should settle his border dispute with Kuwait by peaceful means.

Glaspie's promising diplomatic career naturally went into a tailspin after she was hung out to dry for following U.S. policy. A gifted Arabist, Glaspie worked in Somalia with the United Nations for a while, then worked in the State Department as director of the office of Southern African Affairs, a significant demotion.

There was no way she was going to get a Senate-confirmed post, but she did manage to get a job as consul general in beautiful Cape Town, in the late 1990s, and then, as diplomats often do, retired "in place" down there.

When we called last week, Glaspie, who raises horses in Cape Town, said she didn't want to share her thoughts on Saddam's demise. But she thanked us for calling.Wanted: Brave Writers

Excellent employment opportunity for nation-builders! The State Department has contracted DynCorp International, which has accumulated vast experience running that nifty police training program in Iraq, to create an army for the government of Liberia.

DynCorp, the job announcement says, "is to assist . . . in recruiting, training and equipping an armed military force from the ground up beginning with 2,000 personnel the first year, consisting of . . . two light motorized infantry battalions and a support battalion."

The specific job is for a "ministry of defense technical writer mentor," where you'll "write standard operating procedures for proposal to the ministry of defense" and do various other writing and communications tasks. The pay is "unspecified," but we're certain it will be competitive.

They're looking ideally for retired military or Defense or State department officials with "experience in Africa." Some places in the continent can be a bit dangerous at times, but not to worry. The ad highlights that "full medical and death and dismemberment coverage available." Dismemberment?Teaching History Without Elaboration

Sign up now! Former State Department counselor Philip Zelikow is teaching two history courses at the University of Virginia this semester, according to the school's Web site. One, History 100, is an introductory seminar entitled "Explaining the Choices of Government." Mmm . . . to surge or not to surge? To stand up or stand down? To cut or to run?

The second course is about World War II. This "discusses the causes and course of the Second World War," the blurb says. "The importance of the war to modern history and the shadows it still casts over contemporary politics and culture need no elaboration." Must not be a high-credit course.A Job for the Commitment-Phobic

Job alert! Secretary of Labor Elaine Chao is looking for a new public-affairs chief. The incumbent, Randy Clerihue, announced in a Dec. 21 internal e-mail that he was leaving after barely three months in the job. This could set the world indoor record for brevity for a Senate-confirmed position.

"After careful consideration," Clerihue wrote, "I have decided to tender my resignation as assistant secretary for public affairs, effective by the end of January. This is not a decision I reached lightly, but the nature and demands of the job are such that I am finding it impossible to fulfill my duties to my family. . . . I do not know what I will be doing next, other than spending some quality time with my wife and three young boys."

Three young boys and no job? Must have wanted out quickly. Clerihue had been at the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. for more than four years before going to Labor, and he worked for think tanks, trade associations and the Hill before that. We're told he shouldn't have trouble finding a soft landing.

His replacement would be Chao's fourth public-affairs chief, not counting an acting chief in the early part of the administration. In the past 18 months or so, public-affairs departures include two deputy assistant secretaries and four press secretaries.

Outside Court, Roberts Hears Dissent (WP)

By Robert Barnes

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. usually knows just the right thing to say, his star turn during his 2005 Senate confirmation hearings being Exhibit A.

But maybe not so with the blandly titled "2006 Year-End Report on the Federal Judiciary," issued, as he noted, on the typically slow news day of Jan. 1. He should rest assured that it has been noticed -- and roundly razzed by some in the legal punditry and that segment of the citizenry that likes to write angry letters to the editor and leave sputtering rants on the answering machines of reporters who write about the court.

Roberts devoted his entire address to the call for a pay raise for federal judges, a subject that he noted was not new, and one -- he didn't note this -- that might never be terribly popular with those who make less than $165,200 a year, which is what federal district judges and members of Congress make (Roberts's salary is $212,000).

There are plenty of people who agree with Roberts that judicial salaries should rise to attract and retain the brightest in the legal field. But his description of the issue as a "constitutional crisis" was too much for some.

"What should we say about a Chief Justice who suggests that it is a 'constitutional crisis' if Congress takes advantage of its constitutional prerogatives to refuse to raise the salaries of federal judges?" University of Texas law professor Sanford V. Levinson asked on the legal blog Balkinization. "As it happens, I agree with him that pay raises are long overdue, but not necessarily for members of the US Supreme Court, frankly, who have cushy jobs and are treated like kings and queens."

Matthew J. Franck chimed in on National Review Online: "According to the chief, things are bad enough that we have a 'constitutional crisis that threatens to undermine the strength and independence of the federal judiciary.' In a word: balderdash."

Nor did Roberts endear himself to public-interest lawyers, public defenders, prosecutors and other lower-paid government lawyers with his worry that the judiciary not become restricted to the independently wealthy or "people for whom the judicial salary represents a pay increase." They stopped reading before they got to "Do not get me wrong -- there are very good judges in both of those categories."

Still, not everyone reacted critically. The New York Times endorsed his plea, although its editorial said it was "tempting to dismiss as hyperbole the chief justice's characterization of this issue as a 'constitutional crisis.' "

More important, incoming Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) signaled his quick assent, saying, "I intend again to do what I can to convince Congress to fairly evaluate this issue and the chief's arguments, so that we can see what solutions may be possible."

Capitol Center Nears Completion (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — About 50 feet below the grounds of the U.S. Capitol, scores of workmen install polished marble, mahogany veneer and other finishing touches on what may qualify as one of America's most beautiful, and controversial, cellars.

Two years after its scheduled opening date, and more than double its original price tag, the Capitol Visitor Center inches its way toward completion.

PHOTOS: The Capitol Visitor Center

"We'll essentially be done with construction in March," Architect of the Capitol Alan Hantman says. It will take at least six additional months to test more than 5,000 security alarms, sprinklers and other safety devices before the public can enter.

When the doors finally will open to the public is a major point of contention surrounding the project, which was originally scheduled to be finished in 2005. Hantman predicts a ribbon-cutting this fall, but auditors at the Government Accountability Office say the date will slip. "We think it's going to be early 2008," says Terrell Dorn of the GAO, the investigative arm of Congress.

The other sore point is cost. Government auditors estimate it will be close to $600 million. The original, 1999 price tag: $265 million.

Even some of those who have complained the loudest about the project's rising cost and lengthening delays admit to being wowed by the almost-finished result.

"It has been frustrating because of the cost overruns, but when all is said and done, it will be a great facility," says Sen. Wayne Allard, a Colorado Republican.

For the past two years, Allard has forced project officials to make monthly public appearances before an appropriations subcommittee to account for the pace and price of the work.

Allard says the project could have been done quicker and cheaper but "people will look back 50 years from now, and they'll say every dollar was worth it."

'Built for the people'

In terms of size and cost, the visitor center can be compared to another major government construction project farther down Pennsylvania Avenue. The cost of the Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center was put at $816 million when it was completed in 1998. That's the equivalent of more than $1 billion in today's dollars.

The 580,000-square-foot underground visitor center will give tourists, who now brave the elements in line for tours of the Capitol, a spectacular showplace in which to linger while they wait, as well as a chance to examine historic documents and artifacts now hidden for lack of exhibition space.

The eighth major expansion of the Capitol in its 213-year history, the visitor center may be the most ambitious since the 8.9 million-pound cast-iron dome was completed in 1863.

"We could have done this on the cheap, but we didn't," says Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., a leading proponent of the center. "This is the first addition of the Capitol that was built for the people and not the politicians."

Dorn of the GAO, whose audits have questioned the timetable and costs, concedes, "It's going to be really pretty when it's finished."

Others are less impressed. Rep. David Obey, a Wisconsin Democrat who now chairs the House Appropriations Committee, awarded the center "the golden drain award" in September to highlight what he considers the waste of money on the project.

"The final product will be full of glitzy stuff without addressing the real needs of this institution," Obey says. He calls the visitor center "a state of the art propaganda center."

From the time the project was conceived in the mid-1990s, the center has generated debate. Mica says many Republicans, including former House speaker Newt Gingrich, initially opposed the massive construction because of its cost.

That opposition evaporated after the fatal shooting of two Capitol Police officers by a gunman who burst into the Capitol in 1998. Critics such as Obey focus on the project's ballooning price tag — more than double the original estimate.

About $65 million in private donations was raised for the project. Efforts to raise private donations were halted after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Mica says that was in part because congressional leaders decided to put the project on a fast track and in part because they did not want to compete with fundraising for victims' families.

'Myriad obstacles'

Project supervisors blame the increased cost and delays on Congress' decision to expand the scope of the project. The Sept. 11 terrorist attacks created a need for additional security measures. And Congress decided to build 160,000 feet of additional office space.

Dorn agrees that the project changed in size but says costs and delays continue to pile up even though "Congress is not fiddling with the project at this point."

Tom Fontana, spokesman for the center, defends the work. He says it has moved as quickly and efficiently as possible given the "myriad obstacles and unforeseen conditions" involved in working on a historic site that is also a working government center.

Construction workers had to soundproof windows and calibrate their schedule to keep from disturbing Congress. They had to remove a 121,000-gallon cistern used for fire prevention at the turn of the 19th century and buried when pioneering landscape architect Frederick Law Olmsted created the Capitol grounds.

Hantman says "the biggest surprise" was the discovery of a well just outside the Capitol walls, where the center's containing wall was built.

The landmark status of the Capitol grounds posed other challenges. "We spent $2 million just on tree preservation," Fontana says.

Fontana says the end result will be worth it for the millions of people who visit the Capitol each year. Visitors will be able to watch movies, view exhibits and even get a bite to eat in the new center, where two 30-by-70-foot skylights will offer dramatic views of the Capitol dome. Other amenities include 26 public restrooms (there are five in the Capitol itself) and a movie theater.

The 20,000-square-foot Great Hall and a 16,500-square-foot exhibition hall will showcase statues and artifacts such as the Lincoln catafalque, the bier used to support the caskets of presidents who lie in state in the Rotunda.

The Library of Congress anticipates more than a threefold increase in visitor traffic when a direct underground tunnel is completed between its building and the Capitol Visitor Center.

Space for Congress

There will be more rooms for Congress to use, too, including a 450-seat auditorium wired for electronic voting, additional office space and more meeting rooms.

DOJ_NMG_0113097

Congress added $88 million to the original project budget to build office space for the House of Representatives and Senate.

Above ground, the east plaza of the Capitol — formerly an asphalt lot where lawmakers parked wherever they wanted, according to Fontana — has been covered with 200,000 pink and gray granite paving stones.

The two bronze and granite misting fountains, which Olmsted designed to create a rainbow around the Capitol, have been dismantled, cleaned and reassembled. They had been turned off since the 1970s because they would soak tourists who lined up in the parking lot to wait for tours.

Designers hope members of Congress will not resume parking their cars there.

"We're trying to create a plaza that invites people to linger," Fontana says.

Hantman will end his 10-year term as the Capitol's architect in February.

Last year, Obey introduced a bill that would have taken all spending authority away from Hantman. The measure didn't make it through Congress, but Mica says he believes such legislation is a reason why Hantman did not seek reappointment to a second term. "It's a shame. He's been the whipping boy" for the project's cost and delays, Mica says.

The Capitol architect says he'll be vindicated by generations of visitors to come. "I'm very proud of what we've done," Hantman says. "This is a great project. It's a wonderful legacy to have."

Pay Raise Trails Private Sector (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

This should be a good week for people who work for the federal government, though not as good as some might have wished. The annual base pay raise for most federal employees kicks in, increasing the median white-collar government salary in the region to $86,791.

That's not shabby. But this year's increase -- 2.64 percent in the Washington-Baltimore region -- is one of the smallest annual raises in recent years, and the raise doesn't go far in an area where the cost of living runs about 30 percent higher than the rest of the nation.

"There is no doubt that the federal government is being a little stingy this year," said Tim Priest, executive director of the Greater Washington Initiative, the economic development marketing affiliate of the Greater Washington Board of Trade. "If they continue with these meager pay increases, more and more people will shift to the private sector."

Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, called the 2007 raise "very disappointing." The union represents white-collar professionals at the Internal Revenue Service, Securities and Exchange Commission, Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. and several other agencies.

"This time of year especially, as employees are considering career options and deciding whether they want to stay for the long term or the short term, they build that pay raise into their decision-making," Kelley said. She fears "more and more will decide that they are going to look elsewhere."

Federal pay raises, which are negotiated by the White House and Congress as part of the government's budget, shore up the region's economy every year.

The federal employee payroll was about $19.8 billion in the Washington-Baltimore region last year, about $76 million per work day. (The payroll includes base salary, locality adjustments and special pay for certain occupations, but not the cost of benefits.)

There are about 334,000 civil service employees (not counting the military, the intelligence agencies and the U.S. Postal Service) in the region. In addition to salaries, the government also makes pension payments to about 265,000 civil service retirees in the District, Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia. An additional 77,500 people in this region receive survivor benefits.

As the government takes on more complex responsibilities and increasingly relies on technology to deliver services, federal salaries are a crucial component in the competition for highly skilled workers. Government officials predict a surge in retirements in the next few years as baby boomers depart, and are concerned that agencies will not get their share of top-notch recruits in a region with low unemployment and strong job growth.

To some extent, Washington area federal employees are more fortunate than civil service workers elsewhere. The federal pay formula this year gives a larger increase to employees in areas where federal pay is the most behind private-sector salaries. As a result, most civil service employees will receive a 1.81 percent pay raise, the minimum this year.

Locally and nationally, it appears that the federal pay raise will end up below market rates.

A recent survey by Watson Wyatt Worldwide found that most corporations plan to increase salaries, not counting promotions and market adjustments, by an average 3.6 percent, said Laura Sejen, global practice director for the consulting firm, which specializes in personnel and financial management.

Many employers are reporting increased difficulty in attracting top performers and people with special skills, and that suggests the government should pay close attention to workforce retention, Sejen said.

"Pay is important. When pay is not competitive, employees are more inclined to look," she said. Pay is especially important to employees under 30 and was the most highly rated reason for leaving a company, the Watson Wyatt survey found.

Still, Sejen said, "we don't need to ring alarm bells because of one year of below-market increases" in the federal government.

Pay is but one factor in compensation packages, and the government's relatively generous health-care and retirement benefits will keep many employees from leaving, she said. Survey data also show that employees value "work-life balance" and are more likely to stay with organizations, such as the government, that offer flexible work arrangements.

"These are important contributors to an employee's decision to stay or leave," Sejen said.

But a federal pay raise below market rates carries some risk. "What the government is doing wouldn't drive employees out of the region, but might drive them out of the government," Priest said.

Comrade Pelosi

Capitol Hill residents and congressional staffers alike are curious about large posters of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi that have gone up in the neighborhood.

Indeed, the posters are on display in several Pennsylvania Avenue Southeast bus shelters -- the sort of space frequently reserved for fashion models and movie stars. The poster is a close-up photograph of a smiling Mrs. Pelosi, and in extra-large type: "Congratulations Madame Speaker Nancy Pelosi."

Meanwhile, there is no indication (not even in the tiniest of print) who is sponsoring or paying for the posters.

"It's turned into a fun guessing game," Maggie Hall, who passes a Pelosi poster several times a day, told Inside the Beltway yesterday. "It's quite a topic of conversation in the coffee shops and watering holes on the Hill. You see people really getting up close to it, trying to find the name of the organization or individual who's put it up."

Inside the Beltway was unable to reach Metro's advertising department yesterday.

Sensational heist

As far as William Bennett is concerned, ongoing revelations and circumstances surrounding classified-document heists from the National Archives by former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger have gotten neither the attention nor the scrutiny they deserve.

To help right that wrong, Mr. Bennett, a former Republican Cabinet member-turned-radio talk-show host, is sponsoring a unique contest. Through his popular radio show, "Bill Bennett's Morning in America," he is offering $1,000 to the person who writes the most creative "Sandy Berger" lyrics to the tune of a popular song. (think "Bette Davis Eyes" as "Sandy Berger Lies," but there are infinite possibilities.)

Wannabe songwriters and contestants should go to www.bennettmornings.com for more information. Deadline for submissions is Friday, with the winner announced on Jan. 19. And yes, Inside the Beltway will publish the winning lyrics in their entirety.

Rising to Reagan

A leader's ascension to conservatism was described over the weekend by Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney in Sea Island, Ga., where the likely 2008 presidential contender addressed Awakening 2007, a conservative gathering created a dozen years ago to stimulate dialogue about important issues confronting America.

"Now, I wasn't always a Ronald Reagan conservative. Neither was Ronald Reagan, by the way," noted the Republican governor. "Perhaps some in this room have had the opportunity to listen, learn and benefit from life's experience -- and to grow in wisdom, as I have.

"My life experience convinced me that Ronald Reagan was right."

'Anti-elitist'

That was Michael Gerson, former chief speechwriter to President Bush from 2001 to 2006, discussing the president's "voracious" reading habits and related perceptions during a guest appearance on C-SPAN's "Q&A" with Brian Lamb last night.

"[A] couple of months ago it was leaked out by somebody that he was reading Albert Camus' 'The Stranger.' Does that track for what you know of George Bush?" asked Mr. Lamb.

"Sure," Mr. Gerson replied. "The president is a voracious reader and recommended to me a variety of books when I was at the White House, and gave them to me. He recommended to me ... 'A Godly Hero,' the biography of William Jennings Bryan, a book he'd read.

"Recommended to me ... the book on Martin Luther King and Lyndon Johnson, the relationship between the two men. And he recommended to me the pope's [Benedict XVI] book on relativism."

That left Mr. Lamb scratching his head.

"So, why then is his image one of -- you know, people scoff at the fact that he reads. And they say he's not very intelligent. I mean, you hear that. Where does that come from? And why? Does he want that kind of an image?" the interviewer asked.

"I don't know," Mr. Gerson reasoned. "Throughout his career, in some ways, he's benefited from being underestimated. ... The assumption would be that he, you know, that he would fail. And, of course, we succeeded in a variety of these settings, and certain people always seem to be shocked and surprised."

Offered Mr. Gerson: "I think the president is -- he's not anti-intellectual, but he is anti-elitist."

Puttin' on the Ritz

"I will be interviewed on [NBC's] 'Today' show [this] morning ... talking about the language of politics and the best words for the 2008 election. If for no other reason, tune in to see the most expensive clothing I have ever worn -- and why this will be the first and last time you'll ever see me in a suit."

Agriwelfare (WP)

THE LAST TIME Congress took a long look at America's wasteful system of agricultural subsidies, we had to endure bushels of shallow rhetoric about how billions in largess would save the great American family farm. With this hefty crop of disingenuous sentimentality and equally hefty lobbying efforts from powerful agricultural interests, the result was a federal giveaway that did more to hurt small farmers than it did to help them.

The law that authorizes a range of unnecessary and ill-targeted agriculture programs is set to expire in September. So expect fronts for agribusiness, rural banks and farm insurers (and the members of Congress who accept their campaign contributions) to try and sell the same line again this year: Extend the programs or nail the coffin shut on America's heartland. It's about time to nail the coffin on that tired line instead.

The Post's Gilbert M. Gaul, Sarah Cohen and Dan Morgan reported last month that federal agricultural payments are in fact fueling a rapid consolidation of American farms into enormous agribusinesses. Larger farms get much more government money, which they then use to buy up more land. This increases land prices, raising the financial barriers to starting a new farm and pressuring small farmers to leave the market. The mere fact of farm consolidation is not objectionable; indeed, many large farms are pioneering technological and procedural improvements that increase efficiency. But decisions about who should be farming what and where should be left to the marketplace; the government should not distort the market to push smaller competitors out, especially at the price of $15 billion in annual subsidies.

Congress should overhaul the federal farm subsidy system. But that will not come easily. Recent installments of The Post's investigative series on agricultural payouts detailed the influence the farm lobby exerts on federal legislators, who have added a series of expensive giveaways to existing programs and successfully legislated away meaningful competition in certain agricultural markets, such as that for milk.

There are some signs that the lobby is losing strength. Democratic presidential hopeful and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack will campaign for subsidy reform, and groups such as the Club for Growth plan to spend millions for the cause. Perhaps this time a more reasonable farm policy will emerge.

Creation Of Jobs Beats Forecast (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve interest rate cuts are looking less likely after U.S. businesses created a stronger-than-expected 167,000 jobs in December and workers' wages rose at a rapid pace.

The unemployment rate remained at a low 4.5%, as more people entered the workforce looking for jobs, the Labor Department said Friday.

The good news on jobs was an unwelcome development for some stock traders, who had been betting that the Fed would soon begin trimming interest rates in response to slower economic growth. The Dow Jones industrial average fell more than 82 points to 12,398 in Friday trading.

"The payroll employment data in recent months read like a tale of two economies, in which it is the best of times for the service producing industries and the worst of times for goods producing industries," Richard Moody of Mission Residential said in an advisory.

Manufacturers shed 12,000 jobs in December and 72,000 during 2006. Construction employment fell by 3,000 overall in December, as a 5,800 decline in home-building employment was partially offset by gains elsewhere. Moody said the construction figure would have been worse except for unusually warm weather during the month.

Some of the fastest-growing industries in December were health care, education, financial services, and leisure and hospitality.

Further, the Labor Department revised its October and November figures to show stronger employment growth in those months than it initially projected. It was the latest in a string of revisions to the employment numbers that have made it difficult for economists to get a good read on the job market.

Overall, payroll employment rose by 1.8 million jobs in 2006, the Labor Department said. But economic growth slowed in the second half of the year, running at a 2% annual rate in the third quarter as the housing market slowed. Economists expect business activity to slowly increase through 2007.

In December, workers' paychecks rose 8 cents an hour, or 0.5%, to average $17.04. Hourly wages for payroll, non-supervisory workers grew by 4.2% in 2006.

That's welcome news for workers, whose wages lagged during much of the expansion after the 2001 recession, even as business profits soared. But rising wages can spark faster inflation.

The Fed raised rates steadily from mid-2004 to mid-2006 to blunt inflation, but it has left its target for a key short-term rate at 5.25% since June. The Fed next meets Jan 30-31.

"With wage growth hitting a six-year high and the pool of available labor contracting, we strongly doubt the Fed will change its bias that is currently toward (fighting) inflation," says John Ryding of Bear Stearns.

In another positive sign, the median duration of unemployment fell to 7.3 weeks from 8.6 weeks a year ago.

Why U.S. Should Root For Dollar To Weaken More (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

Last year, the U.S. dollar did what economists had long predicted it would have to do: It fell in value against other currencies. And many believe that if Americans know what is good for them, they should be hoping for more of the same this year.

A weaker dollar creates plenty of hardships. Not only do European vacations get more expensive for Americans, so do Chinese-made television sets and other imported goods. For foreigners, a weaker dollar means their investments in the U.S. lose value. But in the eyes of economists, the more the dollar weakens, the more it helps alleviate one of the great worries of our time: The gaping U.S. current-account deficit.

The current account, which includes trade flows and other international payments, measures exactly how much Americans' spending is outpacing their income -- and how much they are borrowing from abroad to fill the gap. The U.S. is estimated to have rung up a deficit of about $900 billion in its current account last year. That is equivalent to nearly 7% of the U.S. economy -- a level that, if sustained, would cause the nation's foreign debts to pile up to dangerous levels.

A weaker dollar would help narrow the deficit by making U.S. exports more attractive to foreign buyers while making it costlier for Americans to buy products from abroad.

The fate of the dollar and the current account, which has worried economists for years, was a hot topic at this past weekend's annual meeting of the American Economic Association. A panel of prominent economists -- including Nobel Prize winner Robert Mundell of Columbia University, Harvard's Martin Feldstein and Kenneth Rogoff, Michael Mussa of the Peterson Institute for International Economics and Ronald McKinnon of Stanford -- held forth on the subject to a packed ballroom in Chicago.

"We clearly need a more competitive dollar," said Mr. Feldstein, who also heads the National Bureau of Economic Research. "The dollar is still very high -- too high to be sustained."

A tougher question is how far and how fast the dollar needs to fall. Some economists fear a sudden plunge will roil international markets and trigger a U.S. recession. Others believe a slower and more manageable adjustment is under way. They guess it could take a decline of 8% to 25% over as many as 10 years to get the U.S. current-account deficit down to a more sustainable level of 3% of gross domestic product.

In the past several years, the dollar's movements have played into the hands of those who believe the dollar's adjustment will be slow and not too painful. After gradually weakening from its 2002 peak, the dollar strengthened in 2005, even as the U.S. current-account deficit set records. In 2006, the U.S. currency weakened again, as evidence of improving economic growth in Europe prompted investors to put more money into euros. Friday, the dollar's value against a basket of U.S. trading partners' currencies was down 2% from a year earlier and 17% from its February 2002 high.

Jim O'Neill, chief economist at Goldman Sachs in London, applauded the currency's renewed slide. "I think it's good," he said. "It's all part of the growing evidence that the likelihood for international imbalances improving themselves has risen quite significantly."

A weaker dollar by itself won't be enough to resolve global imbalances. Many economists agree that Americans also will need to save more, either by spending less or by cutting the federal budget deficit. As of November, U.S. consumers' spending exceeded their disposable income by 1%. The nation's budget deficit is running at about 3% of GDP.

Stronger growth abroad could play a role in shrinking the current-account deficit by increasing U.S. exports, though some believe the benefits would be limited. In recent history, increases or declines in foreign consumption have had only about half the effect on U.S. exports as changes in U.S. consumption have had on U.S. imports, says Catherine Mann, an economics professor at Brandeis University in Massachusetts.

Beyond that, much depends on exactly which currencies the dollar weakens against. Economists view Asian currencies as most crucial because trade deficits with Asian countries account for more than half of the U.S. current-account gap. So far, the dollar's biggest retreat has been against the euro. Friday, a euro bought $1.30, up 7% from a year earlier. In the same period, the dollar weakened 3% against the tightly controlled Chinese yuan and has strengthened about 4% against the yen.

"You'd need the Asian currencies to do more of the adjusting," says Mr. Mussa, senior fellow at the Peterson Institute for International Economics in Washington.

With all the caveats taken into account, economists' estimates vary widely on how much the dollar would have to weaken to bring the current-account deficit into line. Mr. O'Neill is among the most optimistic. He thinks a 25% drop in the dollar's trade-weighted value from its February 2002 peak, combined with consumer spending slowing in the U.S. and accelerating abroad, would be enough to do the trick. With the dollar down 17% from its peak, that leaves only eight percentage points to go.

Mr. O'Neill's view depends in part on the idea that the U.S. has yet to fully benefit from the dollar's previous weakening, because changes in exchange rates tend to affect trade flows with a lag of as much as two years. Indeed, in inflation-adjusted terms, the U.S. current-account deficit has been stable as a percentage of GDP since late 2004.

Mr. Rogoff, a specialist in international economics at Harvard, sees a darker picture. He believes the dollar must fall at least another 20% from now and worries that the longer it takes, the greater the chances that some unforeseen shock -- such as a terrorist act or a housing-industry collapse -- will trigger a crash. "So far we've just seen a small ripple in the dollar and not the big tsunami that could hit someday," he says. "That's still a significant risk."

As a result, many economists view any move toward a weaker dollar as a step in the right direction. Says John Huizinga, a professor of economics at the University of Chicago Graduate School of Business: "Any depreciation that's in a normal, observable range is good, because it leaves less depreciation to happen and lessens the likelihood of one of these crises."

Aging Bull (USNEWS)

By Paul J. Lim

U.S. News and World Report, January 7, 2007

It's as if Wall Street suddenly discovered Prozac.

On paper, there are plenty of reasons for investors to be anxious about the financial markets' prospects this year.

For starters, the global economic boom that drove international stock and commodity prices higher in recent years is starting to cool. Economists project global growth of 3.2 percent this year, down from 3.8 percent in 2006, while the U.S. economy will trail at about 2.5 percent.

Corporate profits, which have propped up stock prices here at home, are also expected to weaken. Earnings among companies in the S&P 500 index are expected to rise 9.3 percent in 2007, down from 15.4 percent last year.

And the stock surge is now over four years old, an age at which a typical bull market is put out to pasture.

Yet as 2007 kicks off, economists and market watchers are about as optimistic as they've been in recent memory. Eight out of 10 money managers polled by the Russell Investment Group predict that stocks will post their fifth consecutive positive year. One in three thinks the equity markets will return around 10 percent or more in 2007.

Jeffrey Kleintop, chief investment strategist for PNC Wealth Management, predicts the S&P 500 will climb to 1550 next year, about a 9 percent rise in the blue-chip index. Tobias Levkovich, chief U.S. equity strategist for Citigroup Investment Research, thinks the S&P could do even better-hitting 1600, for a 13 percent jump.

To be sure, high-single-digit or low-double-digit gains are simply in line with the stock market's historic average performance dating back to 1926, according to Ibbotson Associates. Last year, the S&P 500 returned 15.8 percent, its best year since 2003. And despite recession fears and a housing market slowdown, the Dow Jones industrial average hit a new all-time record in 2006 and is now poised to pierce the 13,000 level for the first time. "To hear investment managers tell it, Wall Street will belong to the bulls in 2007," says Randy Lert, Russell's chief portfolio strategist.

But "that's what bothers me," says James Paulsen, chief investment strategist for Wells Capital Management.

While optimism is always welcome, there's a fine line between confidence and wishful thinking. Jerry Webman, chief economist for OppenheimerFunds, says most market strategists, no matter their outlook for the economy, are finding reasons to be bullish about stocks.

"Oddly, the people who are bearish on the economy say that if the economy isn't great, the Federal Reserve will [cut rates] and the markets will be just fine," Webman says. "At the same time, people who say, 'Gee, the economy is much stronger than the headlines indicate,' think that earnings will stay strong and the stock market will be OK."

Optimism often leads to heightened expectations. And the greater the expectations, the greater the likelihood that the economy and markets will fall short.

This is why Stuart Schweitzer, global markets strategist for JPMorgan Asset & Wealth Management-who predicts stocks will rise modestly-says equity investors should brace themselves for "stomach-churning bumps."

Wall Street is already trimming estimates of corporate profit growth this year, Schweitzer notes. Six months ago, he says, analysts were forecasting S&P 500 profit growth of more than 10.5 percent. Since then, forecasts have fallen by more than a percentage point.

So, why are investors-who've historically preferred climbing walls of worry to ladders of hope-suddenly acting like Alfred E. ("What, me worry?") Neuman?

Part of it may have to do with history. This is the third year of President Bush's second term. Since World War II, notes Sam Stovall, chief investment strategist for S&P, the 500 index has never lost money in the third year of a presidential term. In fact, third-year gains have averaged 18 percent.

The bullishness may also stem from investors' recent experiences. There's an old saying on Wall Street: Investors tend to think that things will forever be the way they are.

Both the economy and corporate profits have recently proved far more resilient than expected. Last year, the economy weathered recession worries and a housing slowdown, as corporate America found a way to accelerate the pace of earnings growth. "Profits just continue to amaze analysts and strategists," says Jack Ablin, chief investment officer for Harris Private Bank.

Today, investors aren't simply banking on a so-called soft landing for the domestic economy. "The market is bracing for the plane to circle the runway and take off again," says James Swanson, chief investment strategist for MFS Investment Management.

This optimism is reflected in continued risk-taking among investors, Swanson says. Toward the end of last year, the best-performing segments of the market were the riskiest: emerging-markets stocks, small-company stocks, and commodities. Shares of blue-chip companies, which were expected to lead the market, wound up laggards yet again (Page 73). The average large-cap growth fund rose just 7.3 percent in 2006, while small-cap growth funds surged 11.1 percent.

Many on Wall Street think a change is in the air. A Russell survey found that money managers are most bullish on large-cap growth stocks and favor blue-chip foreign stocks over emerging-markets shares.

Of course, investors made a similar bet at the start of 2006 and turned out to be wrong. So how can you tell whether the markets will be in a speculative or safety-seeking mood this year?

Keep an eye on relative growth overseas. The developed economies of western Europe, Japan, and the United States are predicted to trail considerably behind growth in the emerging markets. Stovall expects 2 percent economic growth in the "eurozone" nations and 1.9 percent in Japan, compared with 4.8 percent in Latin America, 5.9 percent in Europe's emerging economies, and 6.8 percent in Asia's developing countries. If the emerging markets continue to outpace the developed world, it should be another solid year for emerging-markets stocks and other speculative assets.

Heed the bond market. Right now, all eyes are on the Federal Reserve as investors try to guess when the central bank will start to cut rates to jump-start U.S. economic growth. But the Fed controls only short-term interest rates. And long-term rates, set by the bond market, have been the real story as of late.

"This is the only time in postwar history where a recovery has taken place ... without any rise in long-term borrowing costs," Paulsen says. This economic expansion began in November 2001, with 10-year treasury notes yielding about 4.7 percent. More than five years later-and after 17 Fed hikes in short-term interest rates-10-year treasury yields are almost unchanged.

So long as long-term borrowing costs remain cheap, Paulsen thinks there's a good chance that money will find its way to higher-risk, higher-return assets like small-cap stocks.

Don't forget the Fed. So far, the bond market has all but ignored the Fed, but stock traders would be foolish to follow. Fed rate decisions tend to quickly change the stock market's mood. Since World War II, Stovall says, the S&P 500 has declined an average of 2.2 percent in the six months leading up to the first in a series of Fed rate cuts. Yet in the six months after the first rate cut, stocks soared 11 percent on average. And 12 months after the Fed began to ease monetary policy, the S&P 500 has jumped 18.5 percent on average.

Check housing prices. Unlike last year, many investors are betting that the worst is over-or close to over-in the housing market. The National Association of Realtors predicts median sales prices of existing homes will keep sliding in the first quarter of 2007, then rebound.

But what if prices continue to fall? That could spell bigger troubles for consumers-and that's a recipe for unexpected problems in the U.S. economy.

Might want to keep that Prozac handy.

Outlook 2007 (USNEWS)

By James Pethokoukis

U.S. News and World Report, January 8, 2007

At times, 2006 seemed like one of those I Love the '70s episodes on VH1, except more depressing. A far-off war going badly, an unpopular president, higher oil prices, creeping inflation-not to mention a pungent whiff of actual stagflation as the economy slowed. There was even another Rocky film. The recent passing of two '70s notables, Nobel Prize-winning economist Milton Friedman and former President Gerald Ford, only added to the sense of deja vu.

But don't look for 2007 to be a rerun, at least as far as the economy goes. "The inflation scare of 2006 is over," declares Kenneth Beauchemin, U.S. economist at Global Insight. Now Beauchemin, who expects inflation to drift lower this year to 2 percent, is admittedly being a bit sarcastic. He never really bought into the notion that higher oil prices by themselves spawn an economywide price surge. "Oil shocks are never the proximate causes of inflation," Beauchemin says. "They are by definition short-term. But they set the table for a scare, and then the media [play] it up."

Yet in the minds of many people, at least those who remember the '70s, higher oil prices do equal inflation. "The Federal Reserve must guard against the emergence of an inflationary psychology that could impart greater persistence to what would otherwise be a transitory increase in inflation," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke told Congress last summer.

Stable prices. Although the Fed hasn't raised rates since June, it hasn't cut them either, despite a slowing economy (growth in gross domestic product fell to 2 percent in the third quarter from 5.6 percent in the first) and a sharp downturn in the housing market.

Making Bernanke's job easier in 2007 is recent good news about energy and housing, the main villains behind much of the stagflation talk. Oil prices are down nearly 25 percent from their high last summer, and even the latest core consumer price index report-the one excluding volatile housing and energy prices-was flat, showing that higher energy prices have failed to infect the rest of the economy. Over the past six months, the core rate is up just 1.1 percent on a yearly basis.

The worst might also be over in housing. Existing-home sales have risen in back-to-back months, and the damage seems to be relatively contained. Although the economy has grown at just a 2.3 percent annual rate in the past two quarters, according to First Trust Advisors, it has expanded at a brisk 3.3 percent rate excluding housing. There is "little evidence" that the ongoing weakness in the housing sector is spilling over to the broader economy, Simon Kwan of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco noted in a recent report, and there are tentative signs that the housing sector may be stabilizing.

Consumers still seem to be digging deep into their wallets. The recent 1 percent jump in monthly retail sales was "a game-changer for those positioned for an imminent hard landing for the U.S. economy," says Mike Englund of Action Economics.

So rather than stagflation, it seems plausible that the American economy will experience a pleasant mix of growth and price stability. Continued strong consumer spending lies at the heart of the consensus Wall Street economic forecast for 2007, which is for the economy to grow roughly 2.5 percent with moderating inflation. That sounds about right to Quincy Krosby, chief investment strategist at the Hartford. "With a job market like this one, it's pretty hard for me to forecast a recession," Krosby says.

The skimpy 4.5 percent unemployment rate, the lowest since the '90s boom, hardly indicates just how strong the job market is right now. The economy added an average of 161,000 new jobs a month through November. Then add 68,000 to that number-that's how much the Labor Department thinks it's been undercounting job growth. Lots of jobs mean stronger wage growth, which keeps consumers spending. Hourly wages were up nearly 3 percent after inflation through November, and real disposable personal income grew a solid 0.3 percent in November.

Good times. You also don't forecast a recession when corporate profits are surging. Adjusted pretax profits rose at a 17.7 percent annual rate in the third quarter, according to JPMorgan Chase. "The economic backdrop is a healthy one," says Bruce Kasman, the firm's chief economist.

So what is the Fed's next move? Judging by the 30-day federal funds futures contract traded at the Chicago Board of Trade, investors are betting that the Fed might cut rates by a quarter point some time in mid-2007. A hike in rates would be a nasty surprise, particularly to stock investors who are wagering on a soft landing. That bet is a big reason behind the Dow's late-2006 run to a record high. Wall Street will continue to obsessively pore over the inflation and housing data, especially, as it frets about the Fed overtightening.

Still, as the various economic reports trickle in during the first part of the year, get ready for a bumpy ride at times. "I think we will be struggling to make sense of the data," Krosby says. "Some days it will look like a recession is around the corner and the next that data will defy that conclusion." So just keep on truckin', brother. Everything's going to be copacetic.

The Greenback May Rebound (USNEWS)

By James Pethokoukis

Maybe writing about what's ahead for the dollar in 2007 is a poor use of space. After all, according to recent calculations by the Financial Times, the euro-which turned five years old this month-is set to overtake the greenback as the world's most popular currency.

But not so fast, Old Europe. What's gotten lost in all the euro hype is that the FT's financial figuring applies to notes in circulation: cold, hard cash. When it comes to currency-denominated assets, the dollar is still king. The United States runs the largest stock and bond markets in the world, and 66 percent of global foreign currency reserves are denominated in dollars-some $2.1 trillion-compared with only 25 percent in euros, according to the International Monetary Fund.

Yet the almighty dollar tanked as 2006 drew to a close. Since mid-October, the dollar has fallen 6 percent against the euro. With widespread concern about the sustainability of the gigantic $800 billion U.S. trade deficit-which requires continuing megapurchases of dollars-some dollar bears interpreted the recent decline as the beginning of a long-awaited greenback collapse. Perhaps foreign central banks, flush with dollars, would begin to dump the dollar en masse.

Cashing out. Dixon Fung, a currency trader at MG Financial, has a simpler, more benign explanation. "Traders just finally realized that we are at the end of a Fed tightening cycle," he explains. Higher U.S. interest rates have served to counterbalance America's huge trade deficit by paying foreign investors more to hold dollars. Now, with growth having slowed and the Federal Reserve Board on hold and perhaps ready to lower rates-and with its European Union counterpart raising them-it seemed a good time to sell. And while the dollar could dip a bit more, don't expect a full-fledged rout.

"The dollar probably should head lower, but it probably won't," says economist Robert Brusca of Fact and Opinion Economics. He notes, for instance, that China has no interest in dumping dollars and thereby starting a panic that would seriously devalue its $700 billion in U.S. government bonds and other dollar-denominated assets. And growth in the EU is forecast to slow in 2007, making that region less attractive to investors. Indeed, the dollar has started to strengthen of late. A surprise Fed rate hike would help even more. While some countries, such as China and the United Arab Emirates, may continue to diversify their foreign currency holdings, "nothing is going to replace the dollar anytime soon," Brusca says.

OPEC Cuts Likely To Buoy Oil Long Term (WSJ)

By Yee Kai Pin

Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

SINGAPORE -- The price of oil may have started 2007 by losing around 8% of its value, but the likelihood of a swift supply response from producers and a series of other factors are likely to underpin the price in the longer term.

Though supply will remain steady until the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries cuts output in a few weeks, analysts said expectations of sustained demand and a long list of geopolitical uncertainties will contribute to a firm oil price.

"I don't think the oil boom is over," said Victor Shum, a Singapore-based analyst at U.S. energy consultancy Purvin & Gertz Inc.

"If we look ahead six months, the sharp drop now will test OPEC's resolve [in cutting production]. That and a weakening U.S. dollar is encouragement for OPEC members to be more aggressive in terms of supply discipline," he said.

Crude-oil contracts for February delivery ended a two-day plunge in the U.S. Friday, rising 72 cents, or 1.3%, to $56.31 a barrel -- still off 7.8% on the week at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The bearish tone has been set in recent days amid an unseasonably balmy winter in key heating regions such as the U.S. and Japan, and at a time when oil-product inventories in these major markets are relatively ample.

"It is still a little too early to talk of a price crisis, but the market does appear to be on the threshold of one," Paul Horsnell, head of energy research at investment bank Barclays Capital, said in a report.

OPEC, which pumps about two-thirds of the world's crude and is widely expected to defend oil at $60 a barrel, is already expressing concern with the price free-fall.

"OPEC ministers are watching the market vigilantly," Hossein Kazempour Ardebili, Iran's governor to the producers' group, said last week.

"If these prices persist or there is a continued decline on the horizon, then the group would consider meeting," he said, adding that policy consultations can also take place by telephone.

The group in mid-December agreed to cut output by 500,000 barrels a day beginning Feb. 1, its second decision in three months to cut back, to forestall the usual seasonal decline in demand after the Northern Hemisphere winter.

However, partly because members have failed to fully implement their earlier plan to rein in 1.2 million barrels a day, traders have cast doubt on the follow-through action.

Ahead of the group's next scheduled meeting March 15, five ministers, including de-facto leader Ali Naimi of Saudi Arabia, will huddle in less than two weeks on the sidelines of an industry conference in New Delhi.

This may provide the group another chance to signal to the market its readiness to step in.

Nymex crude "may go down a bit further because of the momentum, but I think we're looking at a low point already," said Mr. Shum of Purvin & Gertz, predicting a trading average between $60-$65 a barrel in the first half of 2007.

Meanwhile, the global oil market continues to be saddled with a growing list of uncertainties.

Despite talk of "geopolitical fatigue," long-running supply disruptions in Nigeria and Iraq as well as the war of words between the U.S. and Tehran over Iran's nuclear program are still key to the supply outlook.

Stem Cells In Amniotic Fluid Show Great Promise, Study Says (LAT)

By Karen Kaplan

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

Researchers have found stem cells in human amniotic fluid that appear to have many of the key benefits of embryonic stem cells while avoiding their knottiest ethical, medical and logistical drawbacks, according to a study published today.

The stem cells -- easy to harvest from the fluid leftover from amniocentesis tests given to pregnant women -- were able to transform into new bone, heart muscle, blood vessels, fat, nerve and liver tissues, the study said.

"So far, we've been successful with every cell type we've attempted to produce from these stem cells," said Dr. Anthony Atala, director of the Institute for Regenerative Medicine at Wake Forest University School of Medicine in Winston-Salem, N.C., and senior author of the report published online by the journal Nature Biotechnology.

The finding points to a promising avenue of research that sidesteps the hurdles facing embryonic stem cell research, which has been stymied by moral objections to the destruction of embryos that occurs when the cells are harvested.

Most of the work involving human embryonic stem cells is ineligible for the more than $25 billion the federal government spends on research each year. But amniotic fluid stem cell studies are already being funded by the National Institutes of Health.

The study also suggests another advantage: Unlike embryonic cells, which can form tumors when implanted in lab animals, amniotic fluid stem cells do not appear to do so.

"If everything that people think about them turns out to be true, they'll be a powerful source for therapeutic cells," said Alan Russell, director of the McGowan Institute for Regenerative Medicine at the University of Pittsburgh, who wasn't involved in the study.

It is still unclear whether stem cells from amniotic fluid -- the liquid that cushions babies in the womb -- can give rise to the full range of cell types that embryonic stem cells can produce.

"They can clearly generate a broad range of important cell types, but they may not do as many tricks as embryonic stem cells," said Dr. Robert Lanza, a prominent embryonic stem cell researcher and head of scientific development at Advanced Cell Technology Inc. in Worcester, Mass.

But even if the amniotic fluid stem cells turn out to be less flexible, they may still be an important tool in the nascent field of regenerative medicine.

Dr. Dario Fauza, coordinator of the surgical research laboratories at Children's Hospital Boston, has already used the cells to grow tissue to repair defective diaphragms and tracheas in sheep.

He has asked the Food and Drug Administration for permission to do the same for children born with herniated diaphragms. It would be the first human clinical trial involving amniotic fluid stem cells, he said.

Two Swiss scientists, Dr. Dorthe Schmidt and Dr. Simon Hoerstrup of University Hospital Zurich have also used amniotic fluid stem cells to grow heart valves. They are currently testing them in sheep.

The stem cells "may not be as earth-shattering a discovery as human embryonic stem cells, but these cells could prove to be equally important for medical therapy," Lanza said. "I think this is an exciting breakthrough."

Amniotic fluid stem cells lie somewhere between the two major categories of stem cells: embryonic and adult.

Embryonic stem cells are derived from days-old embryos. Nearly all of the development is still to come, so those cells must be extremely flexible.

That trait, called "pluripotency," is the reason researchers believe embryonic stem cells could offer cures for a wide range of ailments. They envision using the cells to replace the faulty islet cells that leave diabetes patients without enough insulin and to grow fresh brain tissue to treat stroke victims, among other things. But they don't yet know how.

Adult stem cells are narrowly focused on replenishing specific types of tissue that wear out over the course of a lifetime, such as skin, hair and blood. Researchers all over the world are looking for ways to expand their range of capabilities.

Amniotic fluid stem cells, which are sloughed off by the developing fetus, are "a different kind of a stem cell," Atala said. "It's not as early as a human embryonic stem cell and it's not as late as the adult stem cells."

Scientists surmised that amniotic fluid would contain those cells more than a decade ago and identified them after several years of searching.

Atala and his colleagues set out to determine just how plentiful and flexible these stem cells might be.

The researchers studied 10-milliliter samples of fluid extracted from pregnant women who had amniocentesis tests to screen their babies for genetic abnormalities. Those tests are routinely performed early in the second trimester.

Of the myriad cells that make up amniotic fluid, the researchers found about 1% had a surface marker that is a hallmark of embryonic stem cells. They took it as a signal that the cells might possess pluripotent abilities.

The researchers from Wake Forest and Harvard Medical School biochemically prompted the cells to transform into all the main categories of embryonic tissue.

A key test was to see if the cells functioned like normal cells.

Stem cells that had been induced to become neural cells were able to secrete a neurotransmitter when stimulated by potassium ions, mimicking conditions inside the brain, the researchers reported. They also induced stem cells to develop into liver cells that were able to secrete urea, a compound produced in the liver.

Other stem cells that had been coaxed into becoming osteoblasts, which build up bone, were implanted in mice. The cells formed a tissue that was more dense than normal mouse bone, he said.

"You may be able to obtain the same medical benefits -- and cure the same diseases -- without the risks or controversy associated with embryonic stem cells," said Lanza of Advanced Cell Technology. "It's just what the doctor ordered."

The cells did not form the tumors -- jumbles of tissue that can include bits of fat, hair and teeth -- that are common with embryonic stem cells, the researchers said.

"That's one of the biggest issues the FDA will be concerned about when it comes time to approve stem cell-based therapies," Russell added.

But Larry Goldstein, a professor of cellular and molecular medicine at UC San Diego who studies embryonic stem cells, said the absence of tumors might signal a limitation of stem cells derived from amniotic fluid. "It makes me wonder how pluripotent they are," he said.

Though the cells might prove useful in some circumstances, Goldstein said, they aren't a substitute for embryonic stem cells. "They built a screwdriver here, but I need a wrench," he said.

The technology described in the study is owned by Wake Forest University Baptist Medical Center and controlled by Plurion Inc., a biotech start-up in Winston-Salem. Atala serves on Plurion's board and directs its scientific advisory panel.

The researchers, whose study was primarily funded by the Joshua Frase Foundation and the Crown Foundation of the March of Dimes, reported that they have found similar stem cells in samples of chorionic villus -- a part of the placenta that is sometimes biopsied during pregnancy as an alternative to amniocentesis -- and of placentas obtained after birth.

Stem cells could one day be routinely extracted from placentas and stored in case they are needed to create genetically matched tissues during a baby's lifetime, Atala said.

Amniotic fluid stem cells could also be used to build a stem cell bank. It would take about 100,000 cell samples to obtain enough genetic diversity to cover 99% of the U.S. population, he said.

Stem Cells Extracted From Amniotic Fluid (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, January 8, 2007

Researchers have been able to derive human stem cells from the amniotic fluid surrounding babies in the womb, potentially providing a source of stem cells that is easily available and uncontroversial.

The amniotic stem cells grew readily into independent cell lines, or colonies, doubling in just 36 hours, the paper says. It was published in Sunday's edition of the journal Nature Biotechnology.

The researchers at the Wake Forest University School of Medicine in Winston-Salem, N.C., were able to get the amniotic cells to differentiate into fat, bone, muscle, blood, nerve and liver cells.

Stem cells can develop into almost all cell types and serve as the repair system for the body.

Such cells created from early-stage human embryos, called embryonic stem cells, have shown the greatest potential for turning into any cell needed. But they are controversial because making them requires destroying the embryo. President Bush cut all federal funding for research into new human embryonic cell lines in 2001.

The amniotic cells are neither human embryonic stem cells nor adult stem cells, which are slightly less resilient, says lead researcher Anthony Atala, director of Wake Forest's Regenerative Medicine and Tissue Engineering Institute.

"They're something in between," he says.

One advantage is that these cells, unlike embryonic stem cells, don't form tumors when implanted into mice.

Though much research into the safety and effectiveness of these potential embryonic stem cell substitutes still needs to be done, the huge advantage would be that they can be easily harvested from both amniotic fluid as well as placental tissue after a baby is born.

The scientists were also able to obtain similar stem cells from prenatal chorioni villius biopsies, commonly done on older women to test for chromosomal abnormalities such as Down syndrome.

If a family "banked" a baby's amniotic stem cells at birth by freezing them, they could provide a potential line of stem cells to treat diseases the child might develop later, Atala says.

But even more important, because amniotic fluid is so easy to harvest, it would make it possible to create thousands of cell lines.

"If you banked 100,000 specimens, you'd be able to provide cells for 99% of the U.S. population with a perfect match for genetic transplantation," Atala says.

Says Robert Lanza of Advanced Cell Technology, a biotechnology firm working to commercialize human stem cell technology: "Just 100 lines will match half the U.S. population. It's an exciting breakthrough."

Scientists See Potential In Amniotic Stem Cells (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

A type of cell that floats freely in the amniotic fluid of pregnant women has been found to have many of the same traits as embryonic stem cells, including an ability to grow into brain, muscle and other tissues that could be used to treat a variety of diseases, scientists reported yesterday.

The cells, shed by the developing fetus and easily retrieved during routine prenatal testing, are easier to maintain in laboratory dishes than embryonic stem cells -- the highly versatile cells that come from destroyed human embryos and are at the center of a heated congressional debate that will resume this week.

Moreover, because the cells are a genetic match to the developing fetus, tissues grown from them in the laboratory will not be rejected if they are used to treat birth defects in that newborn, researchers said. Alternatively, the cells could be frozen, providing a personalized tissue bank for use later in life.

The new cells are adding credence to an emerging consensus among experts that the popular distinction between embryonic and "adult" stem cells -- those isolated from adult bone marrow and other organs -- is artificial.

Increasingly, it appears there is a continuum of stem cell types, ranging from the embryonic ones that can morph into virtually any kind of tissue but are difficult to tame, up to adult ones that can turn into a limited number of tissues but are relatively easy to control.

The newly analyzed fetal stem cells, scientists said, have many of the advantages of both.

"They grow fast, as fast as embryonic stem cells, and they show great pluripotentiality," meaning they can become many kinds of tissues, said study leader Anthony Atala, director of the Institute for Regenerative Medicine at Wake Forest University School of Medicine in Winston-Salem, N.C. "But they remain stable for years without forming tumors," he added, something that embryonic cells are not very good at.

Atala and other scientists emphasized that they don't believe the cells will make embryonic stem cells irrelevant.

"There's not going to be one shoe that fits all," said Robert Lanza, scientific director at Advanced Cell Technology in Worcester, Mass. "We're going to have to see which ones are most useful for which clinical conditions."

George Daley, a Harvard stem cell researcher, echoed that sentiment. "They are not a replacement for embryonic stem cells," he said.

But in the past, even hints that non-embryonic cells might have medical potential similar to embryonic ones have complicated the political push to expand federal funding for the controversial field. And accordingly, opponents quickly pounced on the new results.

"This is wonderful news," said Richard Doerflinger, deputy director of pro-life activities at the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, which opposes research that depends on embryo destruction. "It doesn't require harming anyone or destroying life at any stage."

Last year, President Bush vetoed a bill that would have allowed federal funding of research on stem cells from embryos discarded by fertility clinics. The newly Democratic Congress has promised to send the same or a similar bill to Bush's desk with even greater majorities early this term, with the House slated to vote on the matter this week.

The new work, described in yesterday's online edition of the journal Nature Biotechnology, shows that "amniotic fluid-derived stem cells" can be isolated as early as 10 weeks after conception from fluid extracted during tests widely done to detect birth defects.

In the laboratory, the amniotic cells can mature into all of the major types of cells, dividing at the impressive clip of once every 36 hours yet never showing signs of aging and never becoming tumors -- even after living for more than two years in the lab.

With co-workers from Wake Forest and from Children's Hospital in Boston, Atala coaxed the cells to become brain cells and injected them into the skulls of mice with diseased brains. The new cells filled in diseased areas and appeared to make new connections with nearby healthy neurons.

When coaxed to become bone cells and seeded onto a gelatin scaffold that was then implanted in a mouse, the cells calcified and turned into dense, healthy bone.

Under other conditions they became muscle, fat, blood vessel and liver cells.

Atala said that if 100,000 women donated their amniotic cells to a bank, that would provide enough cells of sufficient genetic diversity to provide immunologically compatible tissues for virtually everyone in the United States. With more than 4 million U.S. births a year, it would not take long to collect that many specimens, he said -- especially because the cells can be found not only in amniotic fluid but also in the placenta, which is discarded after birth.

The rights to certain patent claims relating to the cells have been licensed to Plureon Corp. of Winston-Salem, a privately held company on whose board of directors Atala sits.

Although several stem cell experts applauded the work, some questioned the novelty of the newly described cells. Similar cells have been under study for years with little fanfare, they noted. And though Atala's careful characterization of them is better than any previously done, they said, it is not clear that his cells are truly different than ones others have in hand.

At Children's Hospital in Boston, for example, Dario Fauza, a pediatric surgeon, has been cultivating similar cells and getting them to grow into cartilage, which he has used to repair defective windpipes in newborn sheep. He has also grown the cells into tendon tissue that was used to repair defective diaphragms in sheep.

Fauza is seeking Food and Drug Administration permission to try the method in children diagnosed with birth defects while in the womb. He hopes to grow replacement tissues from their own amniotic cells and use those tissues to repair their defects after birth.

"Typically, you don't do anything until the child is born, and then you are scrambling to fix it," Fauza said. "Why not take out some amniotic fluid, which we do routinely anyway, and engineer a tissue in parallel during the remainder of gestation so he or she will have a tissue by the time he or she is born?"

Population Shift Likely To Boost GOP (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

Ongoing population shifts from the North to the Sun Belt states will benefit Republicans more than Democrats in future House races and could enlarge the Republican Party's electoral count in presidential elections, political analysts say.

Analysts say Democrats have offset the Republicans' Sun Belt advantage with gains in the Northeast and parts of the South and Southwest, but that the size of the migration by the end of this decade likely will give the edge to Republicans.

"I think on balance the Republicans will benefit from the larger number of seats in the Sun Belt region. They won't get 100 percent of it, but more than the Democrats do," said Merle Black, a longtime analyst of Southern politics at Emory University in Georgia.

Projections of the number of Americans moving from the Democrat-dominated Northeast to the more Republican-friendly Southern and Western states "show that seven congressional seats in 13 states have already changed at this point in the decade," according to an analysis by Election Data Services, a firm that studies how population shifts affect redistricting changes under congressional reapportionment.

It forecasts a loss of House seats in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Missouri, Iowa and Louisiana, gains of one seat each in Florida, Georgia, Arizona, Nevada and Utah, and a gain of two seats in Texas.

Another analysis shows an even larger "probable" shift of House seats from the North to the Sun Belt, according to Polidata, a Virginia-based demographic and political research firm.

Under these "probable changes," 13 seats could shift among 19 states, with eight gainers and 11 losers. "All the gainers are in the South and West and all the losers are in the East and Midwest except Louisiana," the Polidata study said.

Leading the "biggest gainers" would be Texas, with four additional seats. Polidata projects gains of two seats each in Florida and Arizona and one each in Georgia, Utah, Nevada, Oregon and Washington.

The biggest losers would be New York and Ohio, with two seats each. Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Illinois, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri and Louisiana each would lose one.

Because each state's electoral votes are based on its representation in Congress, the shift in House seats to the Sun Belt regions, where Republicans are strongest in presidential elections, would mean increased clout in the Electoral College, too.

"Overall, given a 2004 electoral vote of 286 [for President] Bush to 252 [for Sen. John] Kerry, the vote count based upon these 2010 projections would have been 292 Bush, 246 Kerry, a gain of six for the Republican ticket," Poli data's report said.

Independent analysts predict House seat gains in the Southwest and the South -- which with 131 seats is the largest regional delegation in the country -- but said Republican strength declined in the South and in the Northeast in the 2006 election.

The number of House seats for Southern Republicans fell in November from 82 to 77, Mr. Black said, while Democrats increased their number from 49 to 54. In the Northeast, a rash of Republican congressional losses from New Hampshire to Pennsylvania gave 68 House seats to Democrats and 24 to Republicans.

The House seat shifts will not take place until after the 2010 census, when states redraw congressional boundaries in time for the 2012 elections.

"We don't really know the demographics that are driving the in-and-out migration in these states," said political analyst Rhodes Cook. "Some of them could be more affluent white conservatives, but they might be Hispanics who tend to vote more Democratic."

Biden Dispels Doubt: He'll Join 2008 Race (USAT)

USA Today, January 8, 2007

Sen. Joseph Biden said Sunday that he is seeking the Democratic nomination for president and thinks he can hold his own against potential high-profile rivals such as fellow Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama. "I am running for president," Biden said on NBC's Meet the Press. "I will file for an exploratory committee before the month is out."

The filing will allow him to raise money while he gauges support for his candidacy.

Biden is the new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He has promoted a detailed plan for peace in Iraq that would divide the country along ethnic lines.

The Delaware Democrat long has made clear his intentions to again seek the White House. His first presidential bid collapsed 20 years ago amid allegations he plagiarized a campaign speech from then-British Labor Party leader Neil Kinnock.

Biden has about $3.5 million in his campaign account and has campaigned extensively in early voting states such as New Hampshire, Iowa, South Carolina and Nevada.

Army apologizes for recruiting blunder

The Army blamed a computer mix-up for recruitment letters mistakenly sent over the holidays to the families of 275 officers killed or wounded in Iraq.

"Every Army leader is just sick that this happened," said Gen. Richard Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff.

"This is an inexcusable mistake. Five years into this war, the Army can do better than this — and we will."

Cody said the Army used the wrong database in mailing letters between Christmas and New Year's Day to more than 5,100 Army officers who recently left the service. Included were 200 officers wounded in action and 75 killed in action.

That is more than one-third of all Army officers who have died in Iraq since the war began. The letters encourage the officers to consider returning to active duty. Cody said the Army was contacting each family to offer a personal apology.

AP, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON - Democratic Sen. Joe Biden promoted his presidential bid on Sunday, saying he thinks he can hold his own against potential high-profile rivals such as fellow Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama.

"I'll be Joe Biden and I'll try to be the best Biden I can be," the 64-year-old Delaware lawmaker said. "If I can, I have a shot. If I can't, I lose."

DOJ_NMG_0113112

Biden said he will set up an exploratory committee by the end of the month that will help him raise money and gauge support for his candidacy.

Biden, who long has made clear his intentions to seek the White House in the wide-open race, has about $3.5 million in his campaign account. He has campaigned extensively in early voting states such as New Hampshire, Iowa, South Carolina and Nevada.

"I am running for president," he said on "Meet the Press" on NBC. "I will file for an exploratory committee before the month is out."

Considered one of his party's most experienced spokesmen on international affairs, Biden is the new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

He plans a series of hearings on the Iraq war and has promoted a detailed plan for peace in Iraq that would divide the country along ethnic lines.

Biden's first presidential bid collapsed 20 years ago amid allegations he plagiarized a campaign speech from then-British Labor Party leader Neil Kinnock.

Biden Declares Bid For 2008 Democratic Presidential Nomination (BLOOM)

By Joe Sobczyk

Bloomberg, January 8, 2007

Jan. 7 (Bloomberg) -- Senator Joseph Biden said he will seek the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008 and plans to file paperwork that will allow him to begin raising money.

The Delaware Democrat has said for months that he was trying to determine whether he would have enough political and financial support to make a bid for the presidency. Now he is taking the next step, setting up an exploratory committee.

``I am running for president," Biden said on NBC's ``Meet the Press" program.

The first test in the race, the Iowa Caucuses, is a little more than a year away. Former North Carolina Senator John Edwards, the Democratic vice presidential nominee in 2004, former Iowa Governor Tom Vilsack and Representative Dennis Kucinich of Ohio have formally declared their candidacies.

Other potential candidates include Senators Hillary Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, both of whom have been visiting states where the first nominating contests will be held. Neither has announced their intentions.

Biden, 64, first elected to the Senate in 1972, took over as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee with the swearing-in of the new Democratic-controlled Congress last week. He has been a vocal critic of President George W. Bush's Iraq policies and backs a proposal to divide Iraq into three semi- autonomous regions among Sunni and Shiite Muslims and the Kurds.

A Gallup Organization poll taken last month found Clinton favored as her party's nominee by Democratic voters. She got support from 33 percent, followed by Obama with 20 percent and former Vice President Al Gore with 12 percent. Biden got support from 3 percent, behind the 2004 Democratic nominee, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Biden's last bid for the presidency, in 1988, was derailed after he failed to credit portions of a speech that he had adapted from a U.K. politician.

Among Republicans, Senator John McCain of Arizona, former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney have formed exploratory committees, an initial step toward building a campaign organization.

Biden Joins List Of Presidential Contenders (NYT)

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 — Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware on Sunday became the fourth Democrat to formally announce plans to run for president next year.

“I am running for president,” Mr. Biden said toward the end of an appearance on “Meet the Press” on NBC.

“I’m going to be Joe Biden, and I’m going to try to be the best Biden I can be,” he said. “If I can, I got a shot. If I can’t, I lose.”

He said he would file paperwork by the end of the month to establish an exploratory committee to gather support for his bid.

Mr. Biden, who was first elected to the Senate in 1972, also sought the presidential nomination in 1988. But he dropped out of the race after admitting that he had used speeches by other politicians without attribution, and after reports that he had plagiarized while in law school.

Mr. Biden, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, joins a widening field of Democratic presidential hopefuls. The others who have officially announced their candidacies are former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina, Representative Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio and Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa.

Other potential Democratic contenders include Senators Hilary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois. Among Republicans, Senator John McCain of Arizona, former Gov. George E. Pataki of New York and Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former New York City mayor, are expected to run.

Patrick Says He Would Support Kerry If He Seeks Presidency Again (BOS/AP)

By Glen Johnson

The Boston Globe, January 8, 2007

BOSTON --Sen. Barack Obama visited Massachusetts three times last year to campaign for Deval Patrick. The husband of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, former President Bill Clinton, appointed Patrick to the top Justice Department civil rights post during the 1990s.

But the state's new governor says he would have to support Sen. John Kerry over Obama or Mrs. Clinton should the Massachusetts Democrat make a second run for the presidency.

"They are very, very strong people," Patrick said of his three fellow Democrats during an appearance aired Sunday on WHDH-TV's "Urban Update." "I will tell you that if my home senator runs, I've got to be with him. I love the other candidates, but we will see. I don't know that he has made a decision yet."

In October, Patrick called a similar question "premature" after Kerry campaigned for him at the Perkins School for the Blind in Watertown.

Obama, an Illinois Democrat still in his first term in Congress, and Clinton, a New York Democrat just sworn into her second term, are weighing campaigns in 2008, as is Kerry.

Kerry has pledged to announce a decision about a second campaign in the near future, perhaps this month. He is up for re-election in 2008, and some local Democrats are urging him to decide whether he wants to seek re-election or wage a second presidential campaign.

The senator has suggested the calendar and state election law would allow him to do both, at least until he learned the outcome of early primaries and caucuses.

Kerry's senior colleague, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., signaled impatience with his fellow senator in December, saying his support was not guaranteed and he did not want to wait "indefinitely" for a decision. Kennedy later declared he would support Kerry should he declare his candidacy "in the near term."

In 2004, Kennedy was one of Kerry's most ardent supporters, despite a close personal relationship with then-Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who also was seeking the Democratic presidential nomination.

Edwards, who lost his bid but ended up being Kerry's vice presidential running mate, has already declared his candidacy for their party's 2008 presidential nomination.

A Candidate's Not-So-Candid Camera? (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

John Edwards is ridiculing his political consultants.

"You know, they gave me a really great memo," he says, waving the document, which advises him to highlight the importance of public education when addressing teachers. "I pay a lot of money for people who have the expertise to tell me this."

An unscripted moment caught on a cellphone camera? Not exactly. The video of the presidential candidate chatting on his plane is on Edwards's Web site. The former senator seems unusually frank about the absurdities of political life -- or is this just carefully choreographed candor, packaged for the YouTube age?

The 2008 campaign is "totally going to be on steroids this time in terms of what a candidate can do," says Joe Trippi, who masterminded Howard Dean's Internet-driven bid in 2003 and 2004. "You're going to see reality, and you're going to see savvy manipulation under the guise of something that's authentic and real." But Trippi warns against candidates' secretly scripting such moments: "If you get caught, you're dead."

Veteran journalist and blogger Jeff Jarvis says that "candidates will try to look more transparent, whether they are or not. Obviously, you're not going to put something out there that's not flattering. If the casual moments come from the campaign, I can recognize them for what they are."

Mathew Gross, Edwards's Internet strategist, says the campaign is "trying to reach an audience that is increasingly segmented into different channels . . . You peel away the artifice of the campaign to show what's really happening."

Edwards's second bid for the White House, announced shortly after Christmas, was overshadowed by the death of Gerald Ford and the hanging of Saddam Hussein. But Edwards generated plenty of online buzz by hiring friendly bloggers or paying their travel expenses, which would be ethically unacceptable for mainstream journalists.

"We live in a world in which everybody has the power to capture and then broadcast," says Gross, a Dean campaign veteran, noting that the bloggers have full editorial control over their own words and pictures.

Edwards has gone deep into the blogosphere, posting profile pages on MySpace and Facebook and fielding questions -- with his wife, Elizabeth -- on the popular liberal site Daily Kos. His daughter Cate also blogs on the campaign site.

What's striking about the "Webisode," in which Edwards chats on his plane with a freelance video crew, is that it looks like a television documentary, with quick-cut editing and a jerky handheld camera. Edwards, in a work shirt and jeans, is seen chatting with others, not looking at the camera. He says he wants to be judged "based on who I really am, not based on some plastic Ken doll. . . . You're trained to be careful. You're trained to close off, if it feels sensitive, if it feels personal. . . . We're conditioned to saying the same thing, we're conditioned to saying what's safe, we're conditioned to be political, and it's hard to shed all that."

The campaign hired Andrew Baron, founder of the satirical news site Rocketboom.com, to provide advice and to shoot Edwards's announcement video, which was posted on YouTube the night before the candidate personally declared his candidacy in New Orleans. Rocketboom also conducted a separate interview for its Web site, consisting of such softball questions as "What is the John Edwards candidacy about?"

Baron says Rocketboom "is not a journalistic platform" and sets its own ethical standards. As for Edwards, Baron says by e-mail, "this is his opportunity, along with all of ours, to use the video medium to show who he really is/we really are."

Chuck Olsen, a Minnesota freelancer paid for his work by Rocketboom and the campaign, writes on his blog: "For what it's worth I'm convinced Edwards is a passionate, smart, authentic person who would make a great president."

Robert Scoble, a blogger and former Microsoft staffer, paid his own way -- except for the flights on the Edwards campaign plane during the multi-city announcement tour that began in New Orleans. "Was I used by the campaign? Absolutely," he writes on his blog. "I was there to give a different look at the campaign than the Washington Post or CNN could give." Responding to criticism by another blogger who accused him of "doing exactly what his handlers wanted, namely, giving Edwards pseudo-legitimacy among the technophile idiots," Scoble says, "I got to know his staff instead of trying to ask a question that'd get Edwards angry or give me an answer that he wouldn't give Matt Lauer on the 'Today' show."Small is Beautiful?

The slimmed-down Wall Street Journal looked colorful but cramped last week after debuting at its reduced size, with a huge "What's News" digest and a display ad squeezing the front-page stories into three remaining columns. But the more important development has nothing to do with the money-saving layout.

"The culture here has changed dramatically in the last few years," says Managing Editor Paul Steiger. He says 80 percent of the paper's articles will now stress analysis, interpretation or feature writing, with only 20 percent of the what-happened-yesterday variety. As if to underscore the shift, the lead of Thursday's paper was an opinion column by Alan Murray saying that the CEO of Home Depot had "failed most spectacularly" as a public spokesman. The news story on Robert Nardelli's resignation and $210 million golden parachute ran to the column's left.

The late Journal editor Barney Kilgore once said that "it doesn't have to happen yesterday to be news," Publisher Gordon Crovitz recalls. "To which I'd add, just because it happened yesterday, it may not be news to our readers."

Steiger says he assumes that most readers, though not all, have already seen the day's news online. The paper plans to break most of its exclusives on its subscription-only Web site, which has 800,000 customers. When the Journal learned that Los Angeles Times editor Dean Baquet would resign rather than make corporate-mandated budget cuts, it put the story online -- prompting Baquet to confirm the news to his staff -- and came back with a more detailed piece the next morning.

As for the smaller paper's 5 percent loss of news space, Steiger insists tighter editing (plus info-graphics in the USA Today mold) will make up the difference.

Some Journal staffers, meanwhile, are quite upset over an incident last month in which advertisers were told in advance that the paper planned a story on jets that rent time to clients, allowing the handful of companies in the field to buy ad space in the Personal Journal section.

Insiders say that Hilary Stout, the section's editor, objected to the advertisers' involvement and declined to assign the story, and that travel columnist Scott McCartney refused the assignment after a jet company called him to ask about the story. Another reporter was drafted and wrote a balanced piece.

Steiger says the story -- which was first noted by Women's Wear Daily -- was "much too narrow" for advertisers to have been notified in advance, as opposed to a story or package on a larger industry. Such arrangements, he says, could "create confusion and make people think the story might be an advertorial. . . . I'm glad that some reporters raised questions about it." He says the paper will be "more diligent" about what it tells advertisers in advance.Plagiarism Watch

Jacqueline Gonzalez, a San Antonio Express-News columnist, resigned last week after editors found her lifting information without credit in three columns. An internal inquiry began after Gonzalez was found to have ripped off the online encyclopedia Wikipedia for material on the origin of Dec. 25 as the observed birth date of Jesus Christ.Hollywood on the Potomac

Washington journalists must be getting famous. In a "tribute" to the 110th Congress sponsored by the Creative Coalition, the "celebrity delegation" touted in the invitation includes not just Heather Graham, Morgan Fairchild, Fran Drescher and Rip Torn, but Newsweek's Howard Fineman, MSNBC's Tucker Carlson and CNN's Bob Franken. The Jan. 31 event is a $1,000-a-ticket fundraiser for the lobbying group.

"I'm not a delegate to anything," Fineman says. "Even though there's nothing wrong with it, it looks like they're dangling us all on a revolving stage. I'm not even sure I'm going to be there."

Franken says he is a "celebrity wannabe" and that "this will cause a lot of people to say, 'Who the hell is Bob Franken?' "

Prisoner Of Conscience (VF)

By Todd S. Purdum

Vanity Fair, January 8, 2007

The audience is just the kind that makes John McCain feel most alive: a couple of thousand fresh-faced, corn-fed college kids still idealistic enough to believe an Honest-to-God American Hero who tells them that they can, and should, strive to serve a cause greater than their own self-interest. The setting is the Stephens Auditorium at Iowa State University, in Ames, and the questioner is Chris Matthews of MSNBC's Hardball, who is pitching an hour's worth of interrogatories to the American media's favorite politician.

It is three weeks before midterm elections that will prove to be a decidedly mixed bag for McCain. His party will experience the electorate's repudiation of the war in Iraq, which McCain has always supported, and at the same time the voters will repudiate the cozy and corrupt Washington culture as a whole, which McCain has always loathed. Matthews wants to know McCain's views on the prevalence of gay people in all walks of life, a subject whose predicate is the scandal involving Representative Mark Foley and his come-hither instant-messaging with congressional pages. "Should gay marriage be allowed?," Matthews asks.

"I think that gay marriage should be allowed, if there's a ceremony kind of thing, if you want to call it that," McCain answers, searching in vain for the less loaded phrases he knows are out there somewhere, such as "commitment ceremony" or "civil union." "I don't have any problem with that, but I do believe in preserving the sanctity of the union between man and woman." It may not be clear just what McCain is trying to say, but it's easy to see how his words could be skewed in a direction that the Republican right might not like at all.

Fast-forward to the next commercial break, during which McCain and Matthews reposition themselves from the stage to the auditorium floor to take questions from the students. McCain's longtime political strategist, John Weaver, a lanky, laconic Texan, moves in to whisper some advice. The next question is about the pending federal farm bill, and McCain repeats his long-standing opposition to certain agricultural subsidies.

But then, out of nowhere, he adds, "Could I just mention one other thing? On the issue of the gay marriage, I believe if people want to have private ceremonies, that's fine. I do not believe that gay marriages should be legal." There: he said it, the right words for his right flank. It might seem that this audience, the sons and daughters of a socially conservative and culturally traditional bellwether state, would accept, if not approve of, what McCain has just declared. But they are the Wi-Fi wave of the future, and they can smell a pander bear as surely as they can a hog lot. They erupt in a chorus of deafening boos. "Obviously some disagreement with that last comment," McCain says tightly. "Thank you. It's nice to see you."

Moments later, McCain remounts the stage for the program's final segment, and he bores into Weaver, standing quietly in the wings, with a cold look that seems to mingle irritation at Weaver's whispered advice with regret that he took it, and demands, almost hisses, "Did I fix it? Did I fix it?"

John McCain has spent this whole day, this whole year, these whole last six years, trying to "fix it," trying to square the circle: that is, trying to make the maverick, freethinking impulses that first made him into a political star somehow compatible with the suck-it-up adherence to the orthodoxies required of a Republican presidential front-runner. McCain opposes a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage, but supports a ballot measure that would do just that in his home state of Arizona. (It would fail in the midterm elections.) His short-term reward for the Hardball bunt on gay marriage? Boos from the audience and a headline on the Drudge Report, the right wing's favorite screechy early-warning system, reading, mccain: gay marriage should be allowed? McCain needs to square that circle, and the hell of it is, he just can't. Back in the Straddle

But God knows McCain is trying. He began this mid-October day in Sioux City, appearing at a fund-raising Siouxland Breakfast for Representative Steve King, an immigration hard-liner. Recently he had called McCain an "amnesty mercenary" for daring to work with Senator Ted Kennedy on a compromise bill that would provide an eventual path to citizenship for the millions of immigrant workers already in the United States illegally. A day earlier, in Milwaukee, in front of an audience of more sympathetic businessmen, McCain had been asked how debate over the immigration bill was playing politically. "In the short term, it probably galvanizes our base," he said. "In the long term, if you alienate the Hispanics, you'll pay a heavy price." Then he added, unable to help himself, "By the way, I think the fence is least effective. But I'll build the goddamned fence if they want it."

"I'm willing to negotiate anything," McCain tells the breakfast crowd in Sioux City, explaining that there is no way the millions of illegal aliens now here can be sent back to their countries of origin. But he acknowledges that anything seen as amnesty for illegals is "totally unacceptable, particularly to our Republican base." Later, McCain tells me that Congressman King "really knows this issue," but he sounds as if he is trying to persuade himself as much as me.

A couple of hours later, McCain is in an S.U.V., bound for a tour of an ethanol plant in Nevada, Iowa, just north of Des Moines. He knows the visit will be a stretch: he opposes ethanol subsidies. Six years ago, he all but skipped the Iowa caucuses, in large part because his scornful opposition to ethanol was a nonstarter in a state where making corn into fuel is a big and lucrative business. He turns sardonic, asking the members of his small traveling party if they have had their morning glass of ethanol.

We barrel along past the flat fields. Chuck Larson, a bright young Iowa state senator, Iraq-war veteran, and former chairman of the state Republican Party, has signed on to shepherd McCain's already well-organized presumptive 2008 campaign in Iowa. He asks McCain to make some calls to local party leaders. Juggling a sandwich and his cell phone in the front seat, McCain obliges. A couple of times, he gets voice mail and leaves an upbeat message, saying he is in the state and hopes to catch up soon.

Then McCain connects with Darrell Kearney, the conservative finance director of the Iowa Republican Party. Following Larson's instructions, McCain tells Kearney, a former Steve Forbes supporter, that he'd love to go to the party's next Lincoln Day dinner. But his words come out sounding as if he's inviting himself, and the conversation seems strained. "I see," McCain says. "Well, sounds exciting." From my perch in the backseat, it doesn't sound exciting at all. It sounds as if Kearney has ticked McCain off somehow. McCain flips the phone closed and tells Larson, "That's enough!"

A few minutes pass and Larson asks how the conversation with Kearney went. "Fair," McCain says, in a tone that invites no further discussion. "Fair."

If this awkward little day of straddling feels familiar, it is because McCain has tried it before. In the 2000 campaign, he waded straight into the hottest controversy in South Carolina, not long before his crucial primary showdown with George W. Bush, by offering his unvarnished opinion on whether the Confederate battle flag—the Stars and Bars—should continue to fly over the state capitol. "As we all know, it's a symbol of racism and slavery," McCain said. After John Weaver and others did more than whisper in his ear, McCain took to reading aloud from a piece of paper with a statement that began, "As to how I view the flag, I understand both sides," and went downhill from there.

For better or worse, McCain's campaign was never the same again. And no one is more aware of this than John McCain himself. In Worth the Fighting For, his second memoir, written with his longtime aide Mark Salter in 2002, McCain reflected on what he had done:

By the time I was asked the question for the fourth or fifth time, I could have delivered the response from memory. But I persisted with the theatrics of unfolding the paper and reading it as if I were making a hostage statement. I wanted to telegraph to reporters that I really didn't mean to suggest I supported flying the flag, but political imperatives required a little evasiveness on my part. I wanted them to think me still an honest man, who simply had to cut a corner a little here and there so that I could go on to be an honest president.

I think that made the offense worse. Acknowledging my dishonesty with a wink didn't make it less a lie. It compounded the offense by revealing how willful it had been. You either have the guts to tell the truth or you don't. You don't get any dispensation for lying in a way that suggests your dishonesty.

As he embarks on his second presidential campaign, a campaign he once assumed he would never get the chance to run, there are many questions for John Sidney McCain III. Can he bank the fires of temperament that routinely put him atop insiders' lists of the most difficult senators on Capitol Hill and become a unifying leader? Can he reconcile his unstinting support for the war in Iraq with his unsparing criticism of the Bush administration's execution of it—and with the electorate's evident yearning for a new approach? Would he be, at 72—more than two years older than the oldest man ever to assume the presidency, and more battered by old injuries than most men who have held it—too damned old to do the job?

But the biggest questions of all are whether, by forcing himself to become some kind of something he just isn't, John McCain can win the presidency to begin with, and would he consider himself to be worthy of the honor if he did.

Some of McCain's oldest friends and supporters confess that they don't know the answers, but that they worry about the questions. Will McCain's understandable effort to bend a little here and bow a little there—to placate the most conservative elements of his party, who play a disproportionate role in the nominating process—get him all twisted up before he ever gets to face the general electorate that polls suggest admires him so?

Torie Clarke first went to work as McCain's press secretary when he was a freshman congressman, in 1983, and she remains a devoted friend. When I caught up with Clarke one afternoon just after the Republican rout last November, the conversation came round to the toll that the Confederate-flag controversy had taken on McCain's political prospects and his psyche. "What you see now is variations on that," Clarke says. "I think he's a unique, special soul, and I worry about what life is going to be like for him the next couple of years." Dancing with Coyotes

In a thousand and one ways, John McCain remains irresistible—to anyone who ever screwed up in school, fell short of expectations, blew his stack, or gave his all to a losing cause. He is a born rebel, who once confessed that he had spent the bulk of his time at the Naval Academy "being made an example of, marching many miles of extra duty for poor grades, tardiness, messy quarters, slovenly appearance, sarcasm, and multiple other violations of Academy standards." In his third year at Annapolis, he was so fed up he considered joining the French Foreign Legion, until, he said, he realized it required an enlistment of eight years. In prison in North Vietnam, where he spent more than five years after being shot down in 1967, he led a social-studies class for fellow inmates based on the subject he has always loved best—"The History of the World from the Beginning"—in an exercise to keep their sanity.

In an age of pre-fab, blow-dried, plasticized politicians, McCain remains palpably, pungently human. I saw him up close at intervals over a period of many weeks of campaigning last fall, often with almost unlimited access, and his preferred means of controlling his image is by abandoning all the typical modern efforts at control. He is the kind of person who comes alone, without a single aide or handler, to a dinner with a dozen New York Times editors and reporters, and tells stories of the long-ago days in flight school in Pensacola when he dated an exotic dancer known as "Marie, the Flame of Florida." He unself-consciously nurses a vodka Gibson on the rocks in an age when Diet Coke is the safer choice.

In mixed company, he does not shrink from a good "goddamn" or two, and in male company, considerably coarser discourse comes easily to his lips (cocky jet jockey that he once was). He is a man of strong opinions, strongly expressed. "Most current fiction bores the shit out of me," he says in a small plane somewhere over New England. In front of an audience of Republican worthies in Appleton, Wisconsin, he calls the leader of North Korea a "pip-squeak in platform shoes," and in seconding my view that Islamabad has limited charms, he volunteers that the Pakistani capital "sucks." At a nascar race in New Hampshire, he introduces Bobby Allison, "the greatest driver in the history of racing," to one of the journalists following him that day, declaring, "This is Adam Nagourney, New York Times. They're a Communist paper, but he's O.K." He introduces his friend Senator John Sununu, of New Hampshire, son of the famously bumptious former White House chief of staff, to a group of supporters by saying, "You can be very proud of him, and thank God he inherited his mother's temperament." To a gathering of businessmen he says, "I want to keep health-care costs down until I get sick, and then I don't give a goddamn," and to a group of college kids waiting to have their pictures taken with him, he growls good-naturedly, "All right, you little jerks!" On a charter jet above Iowa, he reads aloud a headline from USA Today: actor [wesley] snipes faces indictment on tax fraud charges, then mutters, "All our childhood heroes—shattered!"

Moments like these help explain why the constituency that McCain sometimes jokingly refers to as his base—the press—has not already tried to derail him by highlighting the politically expedient positioning that would be regarded as standard procedure for most elected officials but seems somehow so much worse in a man with such self-defined high standards. Together with Mark Salter, McCain has built a franchise of best-selling books out of his reputation for personal and public integrity. They bear titles such as Faith of My Fathers, Why Courage Matters, and Character Is Destiny, and make John F. Kennedy's Profiles in Courage look like a mere Hallmark card. Yet another McCain book—this one on decision-making—is due out next fall, just as the campaign is likely to heat up in earnest.

But the plain truth is that the Straight Talk Express, Version 2.008, is often a far cry from the Magic Bus of 2000.

"Let me give you a little straight talk," McCain tells the crowd at a house-party fund-raiser in Sioux Falls, South Dakota, for Senator John Thune, the Christian conservative and self-styled "servant leader" who defeated the Senate's Democratic leader, Tom Daschle, in 2004. The minute Thune was elected, McCain says, he became an important figure in the Republican Party and the Senate.

That's not straight talk. That's partisan pap. Nor, presumably, was it straight talk last summer at an Aspen Institute discussion when McCain struggled to articulate his position on the teaching of intelligent design in public schools. At first, according to two people who were present, McCain said he believed that intelligent design, which proponents portray as a more intellectually respectable version of biblical creationism, should be taught in science classes. But then, in the face of intense skepticism from his listeners, he kept modifying his views—going into reverse evolution.

"Yes, he's a social conservative, but his heart isn't in this stuff," one former aide told me, referring to McCain's instinctual unwillingness to impose on others his personal views about issues such as religion, sexuality, and abortion. "But he has to pretend [that it is], and he's not a good enough actor to pull it off. He just can't fake it well enough."

When it comes to the rough-and-tumble of practical politics, as opposed to battles over political principle, McCain's apparent compromises are just as striking. Six years ago, McCain was livid when Sam and Charles Wyly, a pair of Texas businessmen friendly with the Bush campaign, spent $2.5 million on a nominally independent advertising effort attacking McCain. He called them "Wyly coyotes," and implored an audience in Boston to "tell them to keep their dirty money in the state of Texas." This time, McCain accepted money from the Wylys. The Wylys gave McCain's Straight Talk America political-action committee at least $20,000, and together with other family members and friends they chaired a Dallas fund-raiser for the pac. (The Wyly money was later returned because the brothers have become the subject of a federal investigation.) In 2000, McCain denounced the Reverend Jerry Falwell—and others like him—as "agents of intolerance." Last spring McCain gave the commencement address at Falwell's Liberty University.

Two years ago, McCain was unsparing in his criticism of the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, who slimed his friend and fellow Vietnam veteran John Kerry. Kerry felt close enough to McCain at the time to make multiple and serious inquiries about McCain's interest in running for vice president on a national-unity ticket (and McCain basked in the courtship, even if he knew nothing could ever come of it). So the alacrity with which McCain joined in demanding an apology from Kerry—whose "botched joke" last fall about George Bush's intellect came out as a slur against American troops in Iraq—was surprising, if not unseemly. Once upon a time, the two friends would have talked about the issue privately, and McCain might well have given Kerry his frank advice. As of mid-November, they had not spoken since McCain's statement condemning Kerry's "insensitive, ill-considered, and uninformed remarks"—which McCain once again read from a piece of paper, by the way. When I asked McCain if he thought Kerry was really trying to insult the troops, he answered only indirectly, and with some annoyance: "I accepted it when he said, 'I botched a joke,' O.K.?"

The battle between Bush and McCain in 2000 was bitter, with Bush supporters in South Carolina spreading rumors that McCain was insane and that he had fathered a black child. (McCain and his wife, Cindy, are the adoptive parents of a girl from Bangladesh.) Bush and McCain traded insults involving each other's moral standing. A year later, with bad feeling still so high that strategist John Weaver had been virtually blackballed from working in Republican politics, Weaver went so far as to sound out Democratic Senate leaders about the possibility of having McCain caucus with them. This would have put the Senate, then divided 50–50, into Democratic control. Aides to two senior Senate Democrats say it was never clear how serious McCain himself was about the proposal, and any possibility that it might actually happen was short-circuited when another Republican, James Jeffords, of Vermont, made the move first, in 2001.

That was then, when memories of the Bush camp's gruesome, dishonest attacks on McCain were still fresh. When I asked McCain how a rapprochement with Bush could ever have been achieved, he began by saying, "For 10 days I wallowed," then made it clear that the best balm was his realization that the campaign had raised his stature. "We came out of the campaign, even though losing, enhanced nationally, with a lot of opportunities in the Senate legislatively, with more influence, and eventually, if necessary, to be able to go at it again." Whatever the psychic or political specifics, the ultimate result was the celebrated McCain-Bush campaign hug of 2004, in which McCain found himself enveloped in a back-wrapping embrace and upside-the-head smooch. Since that moment McCain has borrowed from the Bush political playbook, aiming to make himself the prohibitive front-runner for the 2008 primaries, and happily snapping up former Bush aides and supporters from key states such as Iowa and New Hampshire, including Terry Nelson, an Iowan and political director of the 2004 Bush campaign. Nelson, now a private consultant in Washington, approved the most widely condemned negative ad of the 2006 midterms, produced by a quasi-independent group financed by the Republican National Committee and aimed at the black Democratic Senate candidate in Tennessee, Harold Ford Jr. In the ad, a sultry white actress says she had once met Mr. Ford at a "Playboy party," then cradles her outstretched thumb and little finger to her ear and coos, "Harold, call me." After the ad sparked an uproar it was taken off the air. Given the racially charged campaign of innuendo deployed against McCain by Bush supporters six years ago, and McCain's outrage at such tactics, the McCain camp's failure to condemn Nelson or the ad struck many as surprising. All John Weaver managed to say at the time was "We're pleased the ad has been pulled down." Nelson is set to manage McCain's '08 campaign.

The Old Man

In the two years leading up to the recent midterm election, McCain kept up a presidential-level schedule, with 346 appearances for Republican candidates and causes around the country. He traveled in small jets, sometimes alone, often with an aide or two; by early fall, his pac had already spent more than $1 million on air charters. On a rainy morning in mid-October, McCain, his longtime chief fund-raiser, Carla Eudy, and I are bound from Washington, D.C., to Milwaukee on a roomy Beechjet, all dark wood and soft leather, with snacks on demand. McCain, as is his habit, props his feet on the opposite seat and opens the newspapers.

"O.K., Carla, several drugs show promise for alzheimer's," he reads from The Wall Street Journal.

Eudy smiles. "I need that."

Turning the page, McCain mutters, "It's not you that needs it."

A few minutes later, reading over his schedule for a long day ahead in Wisconsin, South Dakota, and Iowa, McCain murmurs, "We're going from Joe Foss Field to Bud Day Field! I'm getting old. I knew both of them."

Foss, for whom the airport in Sioux Falls is named, was the World War II flying ace and governor of South Dakota. Day became the nation's most highly decorated military officer since Douglas MacArthur. He served in three wars, was one of McCain's P.O.W. cellmates, and, as a civilian lawyer, handled McCain's divorce from his first wife, Carol, in 1980; the airport in Day's hometown of Sioux City, Iowa, is named for him. (McCain did not know General Billy Mitchell, the World War I aviator for whom the Milwaukee airport, where we'd be landing shortly, is named, but his grandfather did, and McCain wrote about him in Worth the Fighting For.)

At 70, McCain is both matter-of-fact and ruminative about his age. He may have DNA on his side. His father and grandfather, accomplished navy admirals, died prematurely after lives of hard drinking, hard living, and careers cut short, but his mother, Roberta, the daughter of a wealthy oil wildcatter from Southern California, is hale and unstoppable at 94. She spent this past fall driving herself around Europe, and because she was too old to rent a car, she simply bought herself a new Mercedes and hit the road. McCain gets laughs when he acknowledges that he is "as old as dirt, with more scars than Frankenstein"—but he always makes sure to mention his redoubtable mother.

At the end of his failed 2000 campaign, when he had not yet turned 64, McCain clearly assumed that he would be too old ever to run again. "To me, some of this last six months was to see 'Does he still have the physical wherewithal to do this?,'" Mark Salter acknowledges. "Evidently so, because no one staffer can do all the travel with him. Because we burn out too quick."

Indeed, in two long stints on the road in September and October, McCain kept up a punishing pace. He is mentally sharp, verbally facile, and perpetually curious. (On one of our trips, he was rereading Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire.) But he is visibly older, thinner, balder—and, yes, frailer—than he was just six years ago. Like his friend Bob Dole, he tries to minimize his disabilities, but they are serious. He suffered severe injuries when his plane was shot down over North Vietnam 40 years ago; his right knee was broken when his seat was ejected from the cockpit, and both arms were broken in the crash. These injuries were compounded by the profound abuse he endured during five and a half years in captivity.

McCain seldom talks about the details of his torture by the North Vietnamese, but he has written about them in clinical depth. Despite the injuries he had already suffered, upon capture he was promptly bayoneted in the ankle and then beaten senseless. The North Vietnamese never set either of his broken arms. The only treatment of his broken knee involved cutting all the ligaments and cartilage, so that he never had more than 5 to 10 percent flexion during the entire time he was in prison. In 1968 he was offered early release, and when he refused, because others had been there longer, his captors went at him again; he suffered cracked ribs, teeth broken off at the gum line, and torture with ropes that lashed his arms behind his back and that were progressively tightened all through the night. Ultimately he taped a coerced confession.

McCain's right knee still has limited flexibility. Most of the time this is not too noticeable, but McCain mounts the steps onto planes with a herky-jerky gait. A climb up dozens of steps at the New Hampshire International Speedway, in Loudon, leaves him badly winded and sweating profusely. Because his broken arms were allowed to heal without ever being properly set, to this day McCain cannot raise his arms above his shoulders. He cannot attend to his own hair. An aide is often nearby with a comb and small can of hair spray.

McCain has difficulty putting on his suit jacket unassisted. Once, as we prepared to get out of a cramped airplane cabin in Burlington, Vermont, where McCain would be greeted by the governor, I turned my back for a moment, only to find him struggling. He could sense that his collar was all bunched up, and asked me matter-of-factly to help him straighten it out. I felt the pang that those around McCain feel whenever they realize the extent of his injuries. "You comb someone's hair once," his 2000 communications director, Dan Schnur, says, "and you never forget it."

One of McCain's aides tells me that two years ago, campaigning with McCain, George W. Bush asked him if the senator would like to work out with him. Told that McCain did not, could not, really "work out," Bush replied, "What do you mean?"

Just after the Republican convention of 2000, a malignant melanoma was removed from the left side of McCain's face, leaving a track of deep and angry red scars that are only now receding. Salter notes that if McCain's campaign had not died six years ago McCain himself might have, because he wouldn't have taken time out from the trail for the examination that produced the diagnosis. There has been no recurrence of the cancer, and McCain undergoes checkups every three months. At the slightest sign of direct sunlight he breaks out the baseball cap that is always kept at the ready, and slathers his face with so much sunblock that he looks like Marcel Marceau until his skin absorbs it.

And still McCain pushes himself, as if to combat any hint of diminished capacity. Last summer, he hiked the Grand Canyon rim to rim with his son, Jack, 20, now in his second year at Annapolis. He says the descent was torture on his knees, until a park ranger offered him some pills partway down.

"It was—am I saying this right?—I.V. Propen. The stuff's a fucking miracle drug!" It doesn't seem fair to tell him the drug is nothing more miraculous than Advil. McCain will repeat the ibuprofen story a time or two over the course of 48 hours, and he brings it up again when I see him about a month later.

McCain tells me that he counts on Cindy, to whom he has now been married for 25 years, and a close circle of longtime aides to tell him if they ever think he is losing a step. "They watch me very carefully," he says. "They do. They keep an eye on it. And so I try to wear 'em down!" The sheer range in age of McCain's seven children both calls attention to his own span of years and testifies to an unusual willingness to stay young. Besides Jack, they include his first wife's sons by her first husband—Doug, 47, a pilot for American Airlines, and Andy, 44, who works for Cindy's family company in Phoenix; McCain adopted both of them when they were children. Then there is Sidney, 40, his daughter with Carol, who is head of publicity at V2 Records; Meghan, 22, his eldest child with Cindy, now a senior at Columbia; Jimmy, 18, who has recently joined the Marine Corps; and Bridget, 15, a ninth-grader in Phoenix, the Bangladeshi girl the McCains adopted.

Most politicians repeat themselves, in part because they have their rap down, and in part because they see too many people to remember whom they've just seen, and McCain sees far, far more people than most. Older men often repeat their favorite stories, their best tales from the trenches, and McCain certainly repeats his. He is the Milton Berle of political humor, an unrepentant thief of bad gags from friends like Bob Dole and Alan Simpson, which he delivers deadpan and repeats at every stop.

Short-term exposure to McCain is bracing. Long-term exposure can be draining—makes you want to reach for the I.V. Propen. In our travels I spent a great deal of time with John McCain, on occasion just the two of us alone on a plane. Sometimes he would talk, and sometimes he'd stay silent. Often he'd punctuate the silence by saying something like "Do you know who Barry Goldwater's best friend in the Senate was?" and I would answer something like "You told me yesterday that it was George McGovern." McCain may sometimes slip into autopilot, but far more often he is focused intently, speaking to crowds large and small without a single note, addressing his questioners by name after one brief meeting, sizing up the situation in a room he has just entered and saying all the right things.

On what turned out to be a late-night flight from Joe Foss Field to Bud Day Field, McCain was waxing nostalgic about Ronald Reagan, whom he'd begun to admire when, in a North Vietnamese prison, he heard scraps of news about him, and whom he then got to know upon his release. Reagan helped inspire him to leave the navy and go into politics. McCain repeats former attorney general Ed Meese's assertion that Reagan was never the same after he was severely wounded in the assassination attempt early in his first term, when he had just turned 70—McCain's age as we speak. In hindsight, McCain says, Reagan surely exhibited some early signs of Alzheimer's disease while still in the White House.

"I really shouldn't tell you this," McCain says. "I wouldn't want to hurt anybody." He goes on to describe being invited to dinner at the White House as a freshman congressman in 1983 and being seated at Reagan's table, with a woman between them. Reagan told stories, grand stories, priceless stories of Old Hollywood, California politics. He was charming. Terrific. And four years later McCain found himself as a freshman senator back at a White House dinner in just the same arrangement. And Reagan told the same stories all over again. Suddenly, McCain stops and it's as if he can read my mind.

"Now," he says with a knowing air, "I tell the same stories all the time because I like them!" Anger Management

'My dear friends" are words McCain often uses when addressing big crowds. The greeting is expansive, antique, almost Victorian in its exaggerated politesse, and he sometimes stretches out the words as if to heighten the affection they convey. But when he says "My friend" to a single, luckless individual, the tone is terse and tight, and the meaning is anything but philanthropic. "My friend," when uttered through clenched teeth and frozen smile, means McCain is ready to blow.

I've seen it happen again and again. To an inattentive freelance photographer who happened to get between him and a Sunday-afternoon house-party crowd in New Hampshire: "My friend, I like to see people when I'm talking to them." To a nervous technician taking too long to rig a wireless transmitter on McCain's back before a convocation at Boston College: "My friend, I will call you if I need you." To Tim Russert on Meet the Press, after Russert has just told McCain that "to win the Republican primary you have to move to the right, and then, to win the general election, move back to the center": "People know me too well, my friend. I'm not moving any way."

McCain's temperament may be the single most discussed element of his life and career. In high school, his nicknames were "Punk" and "McNasty," and a survey of senior Capitol Hill staffers by Washingtonian magazine last summer ranked McCain second for "Hottest Temper" in the Senate, just behind the famously cranky 83-year-old Ted Stevens, of Alaska. (In fairness, it should be noted that Time magazine recently ranked McCain as one of the "10 best" senators.) Twenty-five years ago, a rival in McCain's first congressional race called his first wife, Carol, to ask if she had any "negative material" on her ex-husband; McCain later told the man that if he ever did anything like that again "I will personally beat the shit out of you."

More recently, just last winter, McCain wrote a stinging letter—and made it public—to Senator Barack Obama, the Illinois Democrat and rising star, for what amounted to little more than a misunderstanding over how Obama intended to proceed on the issue of lobbying reform—something that could have been cleared up with a chat in the corridor. Instead, McCain let loose, writing Obama the kind of missive, lacerating in its sarcasm, that Harry Truman used to compose late at night, but then prudently put in a drawer: "I would like to apologize to you for assuming that your private assurances to me regarding your desire to cooperate in our efforts to negotiate bipartisan lobbying reform legislation were sincere.... I'm embarrassed to admit that after all these years in politics I failed to interpret your previous assurances as typical rhetorical gloss routinely used in politics to make self-interested partisan posturing appear more noble."

McCain's aides say that McCain himself was the last to recognize that he had a reputation as a hothead, and used to rail at them in private every time a public commentator suggested he had a problem, shouting, "I do not have a temper. I just care passionately."

Dan Schnur says he thinks the temper issue has faded: "He's had six years of practice. In 1999 the attention crashed down on us like a ton of bricks. It came out of nowhere, and there was no preparation for it. He's had that level of attention now for seven years, which makes me suspect that his temperament isn't going to be nearly as much of an issue this time as last.

"But there's a flip side to that," Schnur adds. "He traveled on that bus for months with four or five reporters, and one of the nice things about starting slow is you get to try out your act Off Broadway. There's no Off Broadway over the next two years. It's all spotlight. An offhand remark in 1999 vanishes without a trace. In 2007 it's on cable television for three weeks."

One of McCain's great strengths—his pugilistic tendency—is therefore also one of his great vulnerabilities. "There's no bar fight he will walk away from," John Weaver says, with a mixture of admiration and exasperation. A basic reality that makes the current Straight Talk Express seem at least an echo of the last one is that everything McCain says aboard it is on the record, day or night, unless he specifically says something is off the record, and he virtually never does.

From what I can tell, McCain's temper is not so much worse than that of many other politicians I have known, from Rudy Giuliani to Bill Clinton. He wastes no time on niceties. Each time I met him for a trip or an interview, he barely bothered to shake my hand. He no longer calls reporters "liars" and "idiots," as he once did, when he was starting out in politics in Arizona. "Do you think we could sit and watch the damned race for a minute?" he said to an eager aide who was escorting him around the owners' box at the nascar track in New Hampshire to greet potential supporters when what he really wanted was to catch some of the action. Nothing pathological there.

What's so different about—and potentially risky for—McCain is his perpetual willingness to think out loud, unplugged and unfiltered. On our way to Iowa for the Hardball taping in mid-October, McCain tells Chuck Larson and me that he assumes Chris Matthews will be tough on him for his recent dustup with Hillary Rodham Clinton, in which he suggested Bill Clinton's mid-1990s horse-trading with North Korea paved the way for its recent nuclear tests. That prompted an unnamed Clinton adviser to tell Maureen Dowd of The New York Times that McCain had seemed to be doing the craven campaign-season bidding of the Bush administration and would end up "looking similar to the way he did on those captive tapes from Hanoi." Senator Clinton called McCain on his cell phone to apologize.

"It was a very smart thing for her to call," McCain says. "People underestimate her political intelligence and her antennae. She's not her husband—no one's her husband. But she's good. And I like her. I know you're not supposed to say that, but I do." Both McCain's umbrage and his magnanimity seem outsize for a man who once himself had to apologize to the Clintons for having made a cruel joke about their daughter.

On another flight, later that day, McCain reacts to the news that Harry Reid, the Senate Democratic leader, has used campaign money to contribute to the employees' Christmas bonuses at the Ritz-Carlton in Washington, where Reid and his wife, Landra, own a condominium. In legal terms Reid's move was dodgy at best. "Who knew he lived at the Ritz?," McCain says. "Not bad for a boy from Searchlight, Nevada." Then McCain—a former amateur boxer and inveterate gambler, whose wife is the wealthy heir to a beer-distributing franchise in Phoenix—goes on to recount how the McCains and the Reids once ran into one another in Las Vegas and went to a boxing match. It turned out that the Reids took free tickets, while the McCains paid.

"I wouldn't say this publicly," McCain tells the crowd at the private Thune fund-raiser, speaking of Reid, "but I came to the House with him in 1982 and he's always been … " Here McCain pauses—as if suddenly realizing that what he's saying he is indeed saying publicly—and then goes on to finish the thought anyway: " … a little on the edge."

Late that night, on the flight to Sioux City, McCain falls to musing aloud about Colin Powell, his friend and recent stalwart ally in opposing the Bush administration's efforts to end U.S. compliance with provisions of the Geneva Conventions. McCain says he wishes that Powell, from the start, had fought back harder against the Bush White House's repeated efforts to undermine his effectiveness as secretary of state. It's not that McCain and Powell always saw eye to eye on policy, one of McCain's longtime aides tells me later; indeed, McCain was more hawkish than Powell on Iraq from the start. It's that McCain wished Powell had spent more time traveling abroad, pressing aggressive efforts at public diplomacy, making his case out loud, rather than watching his bureaucratic back in Washington. "He could have prevailed at any time," McCain says of Powell. Instead, on issue after issue, he was rolled by Don Rumsfeld and Dick Cheney and Cheney's adroit and aggressive staff, whose power grew and grew.

"He's a great American, a great soldier," McCain says. "But he is also very cautious." He adds, "I'm afraid history will judge him harshly." "Alone in the Room"

History may judge McCain harshly, too, on what he himself has identified as perhaps the biggest moral challenge presented by the war on terrorism: how the United States treats its enemy detainees. No one in American public life has greater personal or political standing to argue against the use of abusive interrogation techniques, and McCain has done so, at times powerfully, and almost without political support.

But in the middle of last fall's election campaign, McCain accepted a messy compromise in the form of a Bush-backed bill, the Military Commissions Act, that would prevent foreign terrorist suspects held by the military from challenging their imprisonment through habeas corpus petitions in federal courts. Many legal scholars and at least one prominent Republican senator—Arlen Specter, of Pennsylvania, who voted for the bill anyway, saying the Supreme Court would eventually clean it up—believe the measure is patently unconstitutional. As enacted, it set up a system to detain, question, and try suspected foreign terrorists before military judges, with only the most limited oversight by federal courts.

Many had expected McCain to put up a stronger fight, even dig in his heels. When the Abu Ghraib prison-abuse scandal broke, in early 2004, McCain had excoriated Donald Rumsfeld at a Senate hearing for his inability to concisely state the chain of command over the interrogations at Abu Ghraib—and thus to accept his own, ultimate responsibility as secretary of defense. But as McCain's election-year rapprochement with George Bush deepened, McCain did not press for the creation of an independent commission to investigate the abuses.

In 2005, McCain led a rebellion in the Senate that forced the Bush administration to accept an amendment banning "cruel, inhumane, or degrading treatment" of all prisoners in American custody. But when does treatment cross the threshold into the forbidden zone? The McCain amendment relied on an American constitutional standard of conduct that "shocks the conscience," one that is open to some interpretation and legal dispute. (Shocks whose conscience?) But the amendment was not being passed in a vacuum—the United States, after all, is also a signatory to the Geneva Conventions, whose Common Article Three bars "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment." So whatever protections the McCain amendment offered prisoners in American custody, Geneva could be seen as providing more, though the Bush administration was contending Geneva did not apply to what it called unlawful enemy combatants. Then, last summer, the Supreme Court ruled in the case of Hamdan v. Rumsfeld that Common Article Three applied to all aspects of the conflict with al-Qaeda, and to all prisoners in American custody.

This was a setback for the Bush administration, which wanted as much leeway as possible in its interrogation of prisoners. But the administration saw a way out. Why not enact legislation that interpreted Common Article Three's "outrages upon personal dignity" as being defined by the words of the McCain amendment itself? On the surface, the move seemed almost tautological. But the consequence was in fact profound: remember, the McCain amendment was open to considerable interpretation, so if the Geneva Conventions were defined as its equivalent, they would be newly open to re-interpretation, too. The administration was proposing a legal flip. For half a century, the Geneva Conventions had been a powerful umbrella, sheltering all measures governing treatment of prisoners, including the McCain amendment. By itself, the McCain amendment would be a meager substitute.

For about 10 days in September, McCain went into full battle mode, joined by his Senate colleagues John Warner, of Virginia, and Lindsey Graham, of South Carolina, fellow veterans and experts on military policy. His rebellion threatened to deprive the White House of what it saw as a potent piece of election-year legislation, one that would remind voters of the administration's determination to spare nothing in its prosecution of the war on terror. McCain was unmoved. "We've faced terrible enemies before, but the United States has always been better than our enemies," he told a crowd at a New Hampshire house party during the height of the controversy.

McCain also knows, better than anyone else, how often torture fails to extract reliable information. After his repeated beatings in North Vietnam, he wrote, he realized that "every man has his breaking point. I had reached mine." He gave his captors a confession under duress, referring to the "deeds of an air pirate," a statement for which he finds it hard to forgive himself to this day. But when the North Vietnamese asked for the names of his flight squadron, McCain recited the names of the Green Bay Packers' offensive line, knowing that false information would be sufficient to suspend the abuse.

McCain ultimately forced the administration to back down from its effort to slip out from under the plain words of the Geneva Conventions. But the final bill, which came to the floor last September, six weeks before the midterm elections, contained many other objectionable provisions, some of them grave, such as the ban on habeas corpus petitions. A person familiar with McCain's thinking acknowledged that he had chosen not to take a stand on the question of habeas corpus rights—that is, the right of prisoners to contest their confinement in a civilian court—and that he was surprised by the furor the issue had generated. McCain ended up in a lose-lose situation: being castigated by much of the press and the legal community for being soft on habeas corpus, even as the Republican base went after him for his hard-line support of the Geneva Conventions. His office phones were virtually shut down by callers protesting his resistance to the White House's original bill, and conservative talk-radio hosts inveighed against him.

Torie Clarke, who has often appeared on conservative talk radio on behalf of one Republican cause or another, says that the basic attitude of the hosts toward McCain is one of watchful wariness. They would tell her, off the air, "We're being nice to McCain now because he's being nice to the president. But we haven't forgiven him."

Tom Malinowski, Washington advocacy director for Human Rights Watch, who worked intensively with McCain and his staff during the drafting of the final 2006 legislation, says, "It's a cloudy bill and he knows it. I'm not a huge fan of what happened in the end, but I do think he did lay everything on the line to prevent the administration from redefining the Geneva Conventions, and he succeeded. The problem was that once he succeeded he was no longer willing or able to essentially throw his body in front of this train over other issues"—like habeas corpus. "He did not have as much support from other senators on those issues," Malinowski added. "He would have been essentially all alone in the room."

And, yet, "alone in the room" is precisely what McCain has always insisted a president must be prepared to be. In the 1999 speech announcing his first presidential campaign, there was a dark and brooding passage that some advisers tried to get him to remove, on the ground that it was not in keeping with the upbeat tone of such an occasion. "When a president makes life and death decisions," McCain said then, "he should draw strength and wisdom from broad and deep experience with the reasons for and the risks of committing our children to our defense. For no matter how many others are involved in the decision, the president is a lonely man in a dark room when the casualty reports come in." Can God Rescue Iraq?

On a mid-October morning President Bush signed the final bill on the handling of detainee interrogations and trials. John McCain skipped the ceremony and instead got back on the campaign trail, finding himself in a meeting room at the Milwaukee Athletic Club. By his own description he was "depressed." His beloved Arizona Cardinals had lost the night before, in a game he stayed up too late watching; the Republicans' prospects in the midterms were getting dimmer by the minute; and his audience of white-haired, ruddy-faced, blue-suited businessmen was begging him for wisdom about the Iraq war, which McCain has supported unwaveringly from the beginning, even as he has offered frequent, pointed, and well-informed criticism of its conduct by Rumsfeld and others. The Iraq war is a huge albatross for McCain, and it is by no means clear that he will be anything close to free of it by the time the presidential campaign begins in earnest. Asked whether, knowing all that is known now (no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, no effective Iraqi army), McCain would have still supported the invasion, his aides say he doesn't view the question in such simple terms. Long before the war, they say, McCain believed that the status quo in Iraqi-American relations was unsustainable. Support for international sanctions against Saddam was collapsing. American pilots faced frequent attack in their overflights of the country to enforce the no-fly zones. And episodic internal Iraqi resistance against Saddam ended in crushing repression from Baghdad. "He stands by his support for doing something," one aide said. But the aide went on to emphasize that, from the summer of 2003 on, McCain had been an aggressive advocate of sending more troops to keep the country from spiraling into insurgency or civil war. McCain had also been, more generally, an outspoken critic of the administration's conduct of the war. If the situation continues to worsen, this aide said, and the Bush administration continues to make "wrong choices," the reality could change. "If you knew we were going to lose, would you still be for it?" the aide asked. "That's a different hypothetical question, that he doesn't have to answer yet." But McCain does have to answer the question: What do we do now? His own short-term prescription—more troops to stabilize the country, if that is even possible—has little public support. "The Iraq situation looks like we're in a quagmire," one man in Milwaukee says. Another adds, "It seems to be tipping." A third asks, "What should the president be doing differently?"

McCain is subdued. Like the rest of official Washington, he has been waiting for the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan commission on Iraq led by former secretary of state James Baker and former representative Lee Hamilton. He hopes the commission will point the way to some promising new direction, and he knows that, whatever the wise men say, he must refine his own approach to the war. But his remarks this morning are uninspired, even vapid. "The next few months will be critical," he tells the businessmen, his critical faculties not as acute as they had been with me just a month earlier, in private, when he said, "A lot of people tell me that the next four months or so are critical … but I'd like to say that, two years ago, everyone said the next six months would be critical."

Finally, a questioner lays it all on the line: "The war's the big issue," he says, adding, "Some kind of disengagement—it's going to have to happen. It's a big issue for you, for our party, in 24 months. It's not that long a time." McCain replies, "I do believe this issue isn't going to be around in 2008. I think it's going to either tip into civil war … " He breaks off, as if not wanting to rehearse the handful of other unattractive possibilities. "Listen," he says, "I believe in prayer. I pray every night." And that's where he leaves his discussion of the war this morning: at the kneeling rail.

On the way to our next stop, McCain tells me, "It's just so hard for me to contemplate failure that I can't make the next step." And that afternoon, at a roundtable with more Republicans in Appleton, McCain gets testy with a woman who says that her grandson and granddaughter have served in Iraq and that things there are going better than the American media say.

"The situation is not improving," McCain says shortly. "There's no biased reporting in the number of casualties."

A week after the November elections, I went to have another conversation with McCain, in his Senate office. I pressed him on the war. He maintained that deploying more American troops was "the only viable option," but added, "There are no good options from where we are today." He went on: "My difference with these people who are saying, 'Threaten the Iraqis with leaving and then they'll do more'—that assumes that they can or will do more. And there's no way that you're going to have any kind of stability without security. Political progress cannot take place unless you have the fundamental elements of a security situation. So, do I know it would be a tremendous strain on the army and Marine Corps? Absolutely. But I saw the kind of impact of a broken army, a defeated army and Marine Corps, after Vietnam. And I'd much rather have 'em take a strain and have some success than be defeated."

He ticked off, and dismissed, other possible options.

"I know of no expert who believes there'd be anything but an enormous amount of bloodshed if you tried to divide them up into three states," he said of an idea that has been occasionally floated. "Every partition in history has been a bloody mess. Removal into enclaves? We're supposed to have our military enclaves while Al Jazeera is broadcasting images of people who've helped Americans being beheaded in the street in Baghdad? I don't think so. A withdrawal to bases outside of Iraq, and go in if needed? How do we get in? You fly in in helicopters? Is that how you do it? Right now, a good portion of the military over there is used up or committed to just maintaining the supply train. So, suppose there's an outbreak in Ramadi, and we're supposed to go get it under control? How do you do that? It's just almost nonsensical. Look what it took to get our initial invasion going."

McCain says he understands how little public support there would be for more troops. "I read the polls all the time. But does that mean I'm not going to do what is morally right? I look you straight in the eye, my friend, and tell you: I want to be president of the United States. I don't want to be president of the United States so badly that I'm going to do something that I know is not right for the security of this nation and the young men and women that are defending it. So, if this position makes me viewed as too militaristic, or unrealistic, or whatever it is, I will more than happily take those political consequences, because I'll sleep a hell of a lot better."

The report of the Iraq Study Group, issued in early December, has done little to alter McCain's thinking. In public hearings he described aspects of the report's approach as "dispiriting." He disagrees robustly with its dismissal of a significant troop increase. He is concerned about the prospect of embedding more American troops with Iraqi units—which are deeply involved in sectarian violence—even as American combat brigades to protect them are drawn down. He is skeptical about bringing Iran and Syria into the conversation, and suspicious of the quid pro quos that this might entail. Clearly McCain will not be using the Iraq Study Group report either as a blueprint or as political cover. On a trip to Iraq in December, McCain reiterated his call for more U.S. troops.

When I asked how history will judge George Bush, McCain answered immediately, "I think it depends on the outcome of the Iraq war." It goes without saying that his own shot at the White House—and his tenure as president if he runs and wins—may well depend on the very same thing. The "Better Angels" and the Rat

The enduring question about John McCain is what, finally, he is willing to do to win. His favorite novel is For Whom the Bell Tolls, Hemingway's story of an idealistic American, Robert Jordan, who goes to fight for the Loyalists in the Spanish Civil War. Jordan is willing to risk his life but never his honor, and his dying meditation, that "the world is a fine place and worth the fighting for," gave McCain's second memoir its title.

But these days, McCain often seems to think and behave like the central character of a more contemporary political novel, Joe Klein's Primary Colors, in which Governor Jack Stanton, Klein's talented but flawed Clinton-esque hero, begs an aide disillusioned by his compromises to stick with him. "You don't think Abraham Lincoln was a whore before he was a president?," Stanton asks. "He had to tell his little stories and smile his shit-eating, backcountry grin. He did it all just so he'd get the opportunity, one day, to stand in front of the nation and appeal to 'the better angels of our nature.' That's when the bullshit stops. And that's what this is all about."

McCain can be cold-eyed. Torie Clarke recalls how she once played a game with him in which he had to name his favorite animal. His favorite animal, he said, was the rat, "because they're cunning and they eat well." But McCain also holds a far loftier view of himself and his obligations than most politicians would dream of articulating. He likes not only to be liked, but to be perceived as a man of high principle.

I asked him once what standard of behavior he should be held to, the "normal" politician's or his own. "Well, I hope you'll hold me to no standard," he joked, before saying he believes that much of the press—and, by extension, the public—will say, "McCain: we like him, we think he's a good guy, we think he's honest, but we'd better make sure that we give him a very thorough scrubbing."

At the freshman convocation at Boston College this fall, McCain concluded his talk with a powerful warning about the costs of compromising one's highest ideals.

"Very far from here and long ago, I served with men of extraordinary character, honorable men, strong, principled, wise, compassionate, and loving men," McCain told the students. "Better men than I, in more ways than I can number.… Some of them were beaten terribly, and worse. Some were killed.… Most often, they were tortured to compel them to make statements criticizing our country and the cause we had been asked to serve. Many times, their captors would briefly suspend the torture and try to persuade them to make a statement by promising that no one would hear what they said, or know that they had sacrificed their convictions. Just say it and we will spare you any more pain, they promised, and no one, no one, will know. But the men I had the honor of serving with always had the same response, 'I will know. I will know.'

"I wish that you always hear the voice in your own heart, when you face hard decisions in your life, to hear it say to you, again and again, until it drowns out every other thought: 'I will know. I will know. I will know.'"

McCain's own compromises in pursuit of the presidency may be necessary, even justified. And they may, in fact, pave his way to victory in the Republican primaries, and perhaps to the White House itself. But even if no one calls him out, and the public plays along, McCain may pay an awful price. Because, whatever happens, he will know. He will know. He will know.

Despite Hefty Risk, McCain Is Unwavering In Support For Troop Surge (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — As a prisoner of war during Vietnam and decorated Navy officer, Sen. John McCain has based much of his political persona on his staunch support for the military and his consummate credibility on national security.

But as the Arizona Republican prepares to mount a White House campaign, he is putting those military bona fides on the line — aggressively backing an unpopular plan to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq at a time that other presidential hopefuls are steering clear of the war or calling for troop reductions.

President Bush is expected this week to announce a plan to send at least 20,000 additional troops to try to halt sectarian violence and bring security to Baghdad — a move widely perceived as an all-but-final push to avert failure in Iraq.

Besides Bush, no politician has more to lose than McCain, the presumed GOP front-runner in 2008 and the plan's biggest backer in Congress.

Now that Bush is pursuing the McCain approach, the senator could soon find himself defending the policy to a war-weary public in Iowa, New Hampshire and other key election states where surveys show voters are fed up with rising U.S. casualties. McCain readily admits that the new strategy is likely to result in even more violence — setting up a paradox for him as he strives to succeed an unpopular fellow Republican in the White House by backing an escalation of the very war that has plunged Bush's approval rating to near-record lows.

Democrats can barely contain their eagerness for McCain to take the blame for a plan that seems to contradict the antiwar message of the 2006 midterm election that stripped Republicans of their once-solid congressional majorities. Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who is running for the Democratic presidential nomination, went out of his way recently to describe the troop increase as the "McCain doctrine."

McCain shows no interest in shedding that label.

"If it destroys any ambitions I may have, I'm willing to pay that price gladly," McCain said Friday after an appearance at the conservative American Enterprise Institute think tank in Washington, where he said the surge "must be substantial and it must be sustained."

His presidential aspirations, he added, "pale in comparison to what I think is most important to our nation's security."

McCain's calculation is the latest sign that the Iraq war is likely to dominate the 2008 race, just as it overshadowed the elections of 2004 and 2006. But it also shows that McCain, perhaps the best-positioned of any candidate to win the presidency in wartime, is willing to bet it all on a gamble that voters will reward his resolve, as they did for Bush in 2004, rather than punish him, as they did to GOP candidates in November.

Other Republicans are clearly not ready to play those odds.

One of McCain's top rivals for the GOP presidential nomination, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, has so far declined to weigh in. In interviews with conservative magazines and bloggers before his term in the statehouse ran out last week, his response was only "I'm still a governor" when asked about increasing troops, adding that he wanted to hear what Bush had to say before making any additional statements.

Another potential McCain primary opponent, Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), has walked a careful line, saying that a troop buildup "could be an acceptable plan" but adding that an increase "seems shortsighted if its only purpose is to impose military order without also moving toward a political equilibrium."

Democrats, encouraged by the 2006 midterm results and still smarting from a 2004 campaign in which many believe they were too passive on national security, appear to be staking out a strong stance against troop buildups.

The party's leaders in Congress, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, laid out their opposition in a letter to Bush last week, and Pelosi warned Sunday on CBS' "Face the Nation" that any administration budget request for additional troops would receive "the harshest scrutiny." Meanwhile, Edwards and another possible White House contender, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), are talking about troop reductions or redeployments.

Edwards has called his 2002 vote in favor of the war a mistake — an admission that his supporters believe will help him appeal to the party's antiwar base. He took the offensive in a recent television interview, pinning the idea of adding troops squarely on McCain, rather than Bush.

"He's been the most prominent spokesperson for this for some time," Edwards said Dec. 31 on ABC's "This Week." "I'm just telling you it's his thing, and I know John McCain very well. He and I are friends, but I think he's dead wrong about this."

The matter is thornier for the Democrats' presumed front-runner, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. She has staked out a moderate tone on the war, reserving criticism for the Bush administration's leadership while consulting military experts such as retired Army Gen. Jack Keane, one of the prime backers of a major troop increase.

Asked during an appearance last month on NBC's "Today" show about the potential troop buildup, Clinton expressed skepticism but left herself room to change direction. "I am not in favor of doing that unless it's part of a larger plan," she said.

But if Bush does announce a troop escalation, no candidate will face tougher questions than McCain, who has advocated such a move since late 2003. The first primary and caucus votes will be cast in January 2008, which would be about a year into a troop buildup that experts predict will result in a sharp rise in deadly combat. If McCain won the nomination, voters could face a stark choice while watching violence unfold. McCain appeared to recognize that on Friday as he addressed the packed American Enterprise Institute conference room.

"I want to be clear, and I mean this with all sincerity: [This] strategy will mean more casualties and extra hardships for our brave fighting men and women, and the violence may get worse before it gets better," he said. "We have to be prepared for this."

Still, McCain is clearly ready to take his message to the voters. In a preview of how he plans to answer critics should extra troops fail to defeat the Iraqi insurgents, he was careful to add that the administration had dug itself into a hole with its post-invasion strategy — an argument that, in effect, blames Bush for not taking McCain's earlier advice.

"Even if we send additional troops to Iraq in large numbers for a sustained period, there is no guarantee for success in Iraq," he said. "We have made many, many mistakes since 2003, and these will not be easily reversed."

McCain aides say they have devised no particular strategy for shielding their boss from the political fallout if a troop buildup does not work. In a sense, they said, the senator's stance might serve to remind voters of the kind of straight talk that boosted McCain's popularity in 2000, when he defeated Bush in the New Hampshire primary.

"It doesn't mean that lots of us who work for him and respect him so much don't worry about things like this," said McCain's longtime chief of staff, Mark Salter. "I'm sure we do. But there's no game plan for it. There's been no fretting and no meetings."

McCain appeared Friday with Sen. Joe Lieberman, the Connecticut Democrat who lost his party's primary last year partly because of his support for the war but then won reelection as an independent.

Lieberman, the Democrats' 2000 vice presidential nominee, heaped praise on McCain and the plan to add troops, all but endorsing his Republican colleague's presidential candidacy. The two traveled recently to Iraq and Afghanistan, and Lieberman has repeatedly lauded McCain for his "gutsy" stance.

"I've just finished an election campaign. If rumors are correct, he may be starting one soon," Lieberman said, gesturing to McCain, seated nearby. "And he's not taking the easy way out here."

For McCain, Lieberman's presence provided a useful illustration. As the two spoke Friday with reporters, McCain pointed to Lieberman as a case study proving that the 2006 elections did not, contrary to widespread opinion, mean that supporting the war was a recipe for defeat.

"There's no way this guy could have been reelected if it was as simple as that," McCain said.

States To Expand Health Coverage (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0113129

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, January 8, 2007

States are planning large expansions in health care coverage this year in an aggressive and potentially expensive attempt to reduce the ranks of the 42.4 million Americans who are uninsured.

The states are acting at a time when Congress, now under Democratic control for the first time since 1994, has put health care lower on its agenda.

Governors and state legislators in both parties and most states have made expanded medical coverage a priority for legislatures — all 50 of which are in session this year, 43 starting this month.

Popular proposals include guaranteeing medical coverage to all children; subsidizing medical insurance at small businesses; and providing tax incentives for businesses and individuals to make coverage more affordable. A few states are considering universal health coverage for all residents. Others are focusing on price competition and preventive care.

"We could not afford the old system," says Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt, whose state is overhauling its program. "The states, as we've done on other issues such as welfare reform, are acting as the real innovators and making changes that will affect national policy."

States are experimenting more with health policy than at any time since the 1980s, says Jim Frogue, a state policy expert at the Center for Health Transformation, founded by Republican former House speaker Newt Gingrich. Frogue says legislatures are often simultaneously adopting policies that appeal to conservatives and liberals, avoiding the deadlock between Democrats and Republicans in Congress.

"There's much more bipartisan agreement in state legislatures than in Congress," Frogue says.

Behind the surge in activity on health care: States have new tools — budget surpluses, more flexible federal rules and successful experiments in other states — that make it easier to expand programs. Also, states enjoyed unexpected success in controlling health care costs in 2006, freeing up billions of dollars that had been committed to health care but were never spent.

Spending on Medicaid, which gives health insurance to 56 million people, fell 1.4% in the first nine months of 2006, the first drop since the program began in 1965. States run Medicaid and pay 43% of the $300-billion-a-year cost. The federal government pays 57%.

The Deficit Reduction Act of 2005 freed states to design federally subsidized insurance programs to target specific groups and income levels, using different benefit packages, premiums and payments from patients. "States now have a lot of flexibility to use Medicaid as an anchor to cover more uninsured people," says Martha King, health program director at the National Conference of State Legislatures.

The politics of health care has shifted dramatically, too. Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty, a Republican, tried to trim Medicaid enrollment two years ago when his state's budget was tight. Now he's supporting universal coverage for children.

Mr. Schwarzenegger's Modest Idea (NYT)

Guaranteed health care for children is the new political apple pie. No one can say he is against it, and it's a sure applause line for politicians who want to show concern for reducing the number of uninsured in America. But special recognition is due California's governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, who is reportedly ready to begin his new term with an actual proposal that his state insure all children. And by all, he means undocumented immigrants, too.

The proposal seems a challenge to fellow Republicans, and even to much of the state's Democratic leadership. Predictably, anti-immigrant groups said that including all children would cost billions more than the $400 million experts estimate. In truth, the idea is economical and, if anything, quite modest.

Several states, including Illinois, Maine and New Jersey, already have programs that cover all youngsters, including undocumented children who might not have access to government-subsidized care. California has what may be the biggest number of uninsured young people, more than 750,000. Most were born in the United States and are citizens.

Children, however, cannot take themselves in for medical care. That responsibility falls to parents and other caregivers, and when these adults are undocumented, they are often reluctant to take advantage of a child's birthright. California's array of programs to help the poor obtain health care has heavy enrollment in most communities, except among Hispanics. The state's history of discrimination against Latinos leaves many suspicious of government.

There's no reason to believe that a push, even from an immigrant governor like Mr. Schwarzenegger, would alone solve that problem. But the governor's efforts should infect the national health care debate. Insurance has become a luxury that eludes 47 million people in this country. Putting children first is a good start, because they are usually healthy and cheaper to cover. That's a reason to do the job the right way, without exceptions.

Golden Visions (LAT)

IT WAS ALL SHOWBIZ and politics, with a star-studded stage and an auditorium echoing with the corny cliches of "Fanfare for the Common Man" and the "Hallelujah Chorus." Then Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger began to speak, and everything changed.

The governor's inaugural address Friday was one of the best in state history, infused with California pride and optimism, and was the most eloquent speech of his career. It was also one of the easiest — all broad strokes and primary colors, with few particulars weighing down its rhetoric. Starting today, things are going to be a lot harder.

Schwarzenegger used his inaugural address to set a course for what he called the "nation-state" of California: a place that sets the pace for the rest of the country not just in politics but in culture, science and economics. The governor's road to this new commonwealth, rooted in decades of California's bipartisan growth, is what he terms "post-partisanship." The state's independent voters are on track to outnumber Democrats and Republicans, he noted, and the thrust of his speech seemed to be that he was their man. He didn't quite jettison his Republican affiliation, but neither did he mention it. Stick to one party's proposals, he said, and you miss half the good ideas.

Giving a nod to historian Kevin Starr, he declared there must be a Party of California, "beyond ideology and one to which all of us belong."

"What a prosperous, peaceful, golden state in which we live and work and raise our families," he said. "We should never forget the joys and blessings of being Californians." Around the world, he said, people "ache to have what we so often take for granted."

Even discounting for California egocentrism — Los Angeles, after all, is the most Californian of cities — these are stirring words. Now the governor must give them substance.

Today he is to deliver an address on healthcare, unveiling a proposal to extend medical care and insurance coverage to many, perhaps most, of the state's 6.5 million uninsured. It's the kind of speech that can't rest on lofty calls to work together. It must delve into the details of a thorny and politically divisive issue.

On Tuesday, he is scheduled to lay out the rest of his agenda in his State of the State speech. Republicans and Democrats may find ample opportunity to lock horns over various plans to close the budget deficit, upgrade schools, redraw district lines and rebuild roads and ports. And later in the week comes Schwarzenegger's first crack at the budget, the state's most important policy document. All the pleas for bipartisanship won't paper over deep financial problems and a continuing disagreement about how to rectify them.

When the dust settles, elected officials from both parties, along with interest groups, policymakers and political thinkers, will have a chance to mull the governor's proposals. By then it will be clear whether his aspirations will carry California into the future — or whether his address was just a remarkable speech about what could have been.

Gov. To Seek Cuts In Aid To Families On Welfare (LAT)

By Evan Halper

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger will propose a major rollback of the state's welfare system this week, including a cutoff of aid to tens of thousands of children whose parents do not meet minimum work requirements or are in the country illegally, administration officials said Sunday.

The proposed $465-million reduction in California's welfare budget came two days after the governor promised that his second term would feature "post-partisan" cooperation.

It was met immediately with resistance from Democrats, who expressed bewilderment that the governor would attempt to cut welfare aid to children in the same week his administration is expected to move forward with a plan to expand health insurance to many of the same children.

"It's ironic that the governor is proposing healthcare for poor kids while taking away their breakfasts," state Senate leader Don Perata (D-Oakland) said of the cuts, which would affect more than 40,000 families. "Even Republican Gov. [Pete] Wilson, at the time he negotiated welfare reform, agreed that children should not suffer for the behavior of their parents."

The plan alarmed advocates for the poor, who predicted that eliminating the cash payments of several hundred dollars a month would substantially increase the risk of homelessness for those families.

Schwarzenegger's proposal also would eliminate this year's cost-of-living increase for welfare recipients.

Department of Finance Director Mike Genest, a Republican who has long favored deep reductions in welfare, noted that most states have already made moves similar to what the governor is proposing.

California is at risk of losing hundreds of millions of dollars in federal funds, he said, if it does not force parents to meet the minimum work requirements in the state's welfare program, known as CalWORKS.

"We have not been able to achieve the kind of work participation for those on the program that we would like," he said. "We have not kept up with the track records of other states."

The plan is one of several the governor has proposed for rolling back welfare benefits since taking office in 2003. Most of those plans have been blocked by the Democrats who control the Legislature.

The governor's latest blueprint for CalWORKS comes at a time when Democrats, eager to work with him on his plan to expand health coverage to millions of uninsured Californians, may be more willing to bargain.

The suggested cuts also could help repair the governor's relations with his own party.

Some Republicans in the Legislature have already signaled that they will resist the healthcare expansion, which is to be unveiled to the public today, because the state faces a projected $5.5-billion deficit. The proposed CalWORKS cuts give the governor an olive branch to offer them as he tries to push his healthcare agenda through.

Administration officials say looming federal penalties against the state — potentially costing California $149 million in the coming fiscal year, growing to $389 million in five years — bring new urgency to Schwarzenegger's call to force more welfare recipients to find jobs.

State statistics show that only 25% of families receiving CalWORKS aid are currently meeting the minimum work requirements, which were created in response to a national welfare overhaul signed into law by then-President Clinton more than a decade ago.

Genest said that in Ohio, 65% of welfare recipients meet minimum work requirements and in Massachusetts, 60% do.

One reason California's compliance rate is so low, budget analysts say, is because it is among 14 states that continue to provide cash assistance to families even when the parents are not working the requisite hours. The safety net was put in place in the mid-1990s under Wilson. It is intended to keep families from becoming homeless.

A single-parent family with two children in such circumstances in Los Angeles gets $584 per month. Genest said eliminating that payment would give parents the incentive to work.

A recent report from the nonpartisan Legislative Analyst's Office, which lawmakers of both parties look to for advice on budget matters, noted that in other states such sanctions have not always served as an incentive for parents to get jobs. Often, families get cut off from the system altogether.

"This proposal would lead to an increase in family homelessness," said Nancy Berlin, the Los Angeles-based director of the California Partnership, a statewide coalition of advocacy groups for the poor. "The number of homeless families in Los Angeles with nowhere to go is already growing fast. I can't imagine why anyone would want to increase that number."

The welfare cuts will be part of the annual state budget proposal the governor plans to release Wednesday. That budget will also include a suspension of the annual cost of living increase for CalWORKS recipients. Such a move would cost a typical family in the program roughly $30 per month.

The cost of living increases, meant to keep cash grants at pace with inflation, have been suspended numerous times in the last two decades. Activists say the buying power of the average welfare grant is now one-third of what it was in the mid-1980s.

The governor's welfare plan would extend to a program that provides cash grants to children who are U.S. citizens but whose parents are here illegally. Advocates said most undocumented adults work enough hours to meet federal welfare requirements even though their citizenship status prevents them from participating in CalWORKS.

The governor will propose that payments to those families be limited to five years.

Joe Munso, deputy director for the state Health and Human Services Agency, suggested that five years was sufficient time for parents to "rectify" their citizenship status.

"We think these things move us in the right direction in terms of where we need to go to stress personal responsibility," he said.

Advocates for the poor said such cuts would likely drive undocumented workers further underground, bring more insecurity to the lives of their children and force the families to turn to already overstressed local facilities such as homeless shelters and food banks for basic necessities.

"How far are we going to go in punishing parents before we unacceptably impoverish their children?" said Frank Mecca, executive director of the County Welfare Directors Assn.

Mecca said all of the major studies he has seen on welfare suggest that increasing sanctions alone is unlikely to result in more poor Californians' joining the workforce.

"There isn't any good data that shows this is likely to work," he said.

How Gov. Arnold Plans To Shake Up Primaries (NSWK)

By Karen Breslau

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

The U.S. Constitution prevents Austria-born Arnold Schwarzenegger from running for president. But California's GOP governor, sworn in last week for a second term, still plans on influencing the 2008 election. Schwarzenegger says he'd like to move the California primary from June—when both parties have all but picked their nominees—to a much earlier date, in February. "We shouldn't be treated as a leftover," Schwarzenegger told NEWSWEEK while at home in Los Angeles, where he was recovering from a broken leg after a skiing accident. "We will go and make a lot of noise about the issues." The governor hopes the change will encourage candidates to spend more time talking to voters in the nation's most populous state, instead of "sucking us dry for money" at fund-raisers. "We don't want to sit back and let this whole thing go by and have California not be a player," he says.

The proposal would need to be brought to the state legislature and approved by a two-thirds vote. Schwarzenegger says he's meeting with leaders from both parties this week to discuss the plan. Moving up the primary certainly increases California's visibility among candidates—and puts the Golden State's environmental concerns on the agenda.

Currently, presidential campaigns are built around creating momentum in Iowa and New Hampshire—whose white, rural populations are notoriously unrepresentative of the country at large—then move on to the Southern states, which tend to favor more-conservative candidates. In 2008, Nevada will become the first Western state to intervene by holding its Democratic nominating caucus in January. Adding liberal California to the early mix would probably affect the nominating process by favoring big-money, big-name candidates such as Hillary Clinton and John McCain.

Schwarzenegger is coy about expressing his support for any particular candidate at this point, though he has ties to several hopefuls. His top campaign strategist recently went to work for McCain. And he says he would "encourage" New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, rumored to be considering an independent candidacy, to run too. In his Inaugural Address, the governor touted "postpartisanship ... Republicans and Democrats actively giving birth to new ideas together." He is challenging presidential candidates to combat global warming and to reform health care, subjects that defy partisan solutions. Schwarzenegger credits his second-term landslide with his own sharp turn to the center after a disastrous year during which he belittled Democrats as "girlie men." Now, he says, "anyone can look and learn from what is going on in California."

'Passing the Bong' to Remake Politics

He is, we think, speaking figuratively when describing late-night "pass the bong" conversations with fellow former Washington Post reporter Jim VandeHei about building a new political journalism model on the Internet. But as Editor-in-Chief John Harris gets ready to debut a thrice-weekly paper and website called the Politico, he concedes that he, Executive Editor VandeHei, and the Allbritton Communications team aim to "provide a needle in the vein" to those hooked on politics, starting January 23. "We're political junkies," says Harris, a former Post editor and reporter, "and we're writing for political junkies." News sources are eager for change, too: Bush political adviser Karl Rove has even talked up the Politico to allies.

Leave the Post for the Web? They're not crazy, says former Minneapolis Star Tribune Editor Tim McGuire. Considering the mass layoffs at fading newspapers, he says, "this is a sanity test, and they are passing." The money is good, rumored at $250,000 for the two top editors and generous for the small staff of big names. But Harris says it's more than cash: The industry is changing, and now's the time to pounce since readers are more in tune with the Web. He and VandeHei are maybe on to something. Since raiding other publications for staff, competitors like the Post have stepped up Web operations and hiring. "We've shaken everybody by the lapels," says Harris.

Is the 'Governator'a 'Senatenator'?

There's growing buzz in Washington and California that just re-elected Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger likes this government stuff so much that he's got his eye on the Senate. Specifically, the seat held by Sen. Barbara Boxer, who's up for re-election in 2010 when the Terminator ends his second term.

The Speaker Gets the Symbolism

As the first-ever woman speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi understands the importance of symbols. And she was full of her trademark touches of style and substance last week as she took the gavel. Three examples: First, she's on a personal enviro-kick, asking her security detail to drive SUVs that run on E20, a mix of 20 percent ethanol and 80 percent gas, insiders tell us. While E10 is more common, E20 is a long-term goal, but associates say she wants to speed up the shift and to lead by example. Despite her victory, it is a compromise: She initially asked for a hybrid Chevy Suburban. Second, that wasn't Lenten purple Pelosi wore the day she was sworn in. It was the color of the original suffragettes. And finally, as simply a nice act, she gave ex-House Speaker Dennis Hastert one of those coveted secret "hideaways" in the Capitol to use as his retreat.

The Collapse of the CIA's 'Berlin Wall'

With the nation's spy agencies in full reform mode, the CIA has finally torn down its own version of the Berlin Wall. For years, its 24-hour operations center had a wall running down the middle, separating the agency's analysts from its ultrasecret clandestine spooks. Not only did CIA Director Gen. Michael Hayden remove the wall, but he invited in representatives from other intel agencies. The move kicks off a new four-year strategic plan for the CIA.

Time for Bush to Steer Noah's Ark

Some major gestures of conciliation are due from President Bush, says Republican wordsmith and pollster Frank Luntz, who offers this suggestion for the State of the Union address January 23: The prez should point out, by name, five Democratic legislators and five Republican legislators and praise them for a specific idea or piece of legislation for which he would request bipartisan support. Why? "So the American people see that the president is pulling ideas from both sides, not only Republicans and not only Democrats," adds the author of the new Words That Work: It's Not What You Say, It's What People Hear. Luntz calls it the "Noah's Ark" strategy: Bush gets the message from the elections and is ready to lock arms with Dems.

Only Newt Worries This Candidate

In a week when former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney joined the 2008 GOP presidential primary race and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani started hiring aides to man his bid, allies of front-runner Sen. John McCain suggested that the guy he's most concerned about is former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. The reason: While Giuliani and Romney are moving to the right, Gingrich is already there. But he's not that worried: Gingrich still hasn't decided to run, and it's getting late.

Sen. Gobbledygook vs. Gov. Plain Talk

The new head of the National Governors Association, Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, doesn't sound as if she likes either top 2008 presidential contender-Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton or Arizona favorite son John McCain. She clearly leans to those in her line of statehouse politics-the job most recent presidents have held. "The longer people are in Congress," she tells us, "the harder it is for them to speak in short, declarative sentences."

Hardball Loves Rocky's Softball

We shouldn't be surprised that Chris Matthews, the jabbing host of MSNBC's Hardball, is a fan of the heroic fighter Rocky series. "I saw the first one; I saw the third one. They were the really great ones," he tells us. So what's he think of the latest, Rocky Balboa? He loved it. "There were some great moments: When he talks to his son and says, 'You know, you were my dream when I held you in my hand when you were small, and then you grew up. But somewhere along the line, you began to look for an excuse for failure, and I'm your excuse.' It was unbelievable. It was so strong," coos Matthews. "The soliloquies-it's an odd word to use for Rocky-his soliloquies that [actor-director Sylvester Stallone] obviously wrote were fantastic," he says. "It was slow moving like all Rockys," adds the critic, "but at the end, it was unbelievable."

Lawmaker Wants McKinney's Name Off Road (LAT)

By Jenny Jarvie

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

ATLANTA — In a city where the average commute lasts 31.2 minutes and drivers have no shortage of bottlenecks and wrecks to grumble about, a Republican state lawmaker is exercised about a different kind of transportation issue: Cynthia McKinney Parkway.

Georgia Rep. Len Walker cannot abide driving along a suburban highway honoring Georgia's former Democratic congresswoman. Each time he catches sight of McKinney's name on exit ramps on the major interstate encircling Atlanta, he is nettled by thoughts of the combative ex-lawmaker.

So a week after McKinney filed her final congressional measure — a resolution to impeach President Bush — Walker pre-filed a bill in the Georgia Legislature to strip McKinney's name from the street and restore the name Memorial Drive.

"I, along with many Georgians, find it totally inappropriate for Cynthia McKinney's name to be honored," Walker said in a telephone interview last week. "She is an embarrassment to the state of Georgia."

Walker's bill has slim chance of passing. Georgia law requires that legislators proposing street names must live in the district where the streets are, and Cynthia McKinney Parkway is in DeKalb County, west of Walker's district.

Walker, though, is confident he can persuade the Republican-dominated Legislature to waive the home-district rule.

His effort has struck a chord among critics of McKinney, who lost her bid for a seventh term in the summer's Democratic primary after a high-profile altercation with a Capitol Hill police officer.

"Put her name ON the road pavement," one irate reader of the Atlanta Journal-Constitution proposed in an online forum. Others suggested putting her name on the road to the county landfill.

Yet Walker's proposal has also prompted charges of racism — McKinney is black — and threats of retaliation from African American lawmakers.

McKinney's supporters argue that the road runs through predominantly African American neighborhoods in Decatur, where McKinney still enjoys considerable support. They say criticism of the road name comes mostly from outsiders who see the signs as they whiz by on the interstate.

In a state crisscrossed by roads named after white Southern men — including Jefferson Davis, the president of the Confederacy, and Lester Maddox, the onetime segregationist Georgia governor — many African American legislators and community activists question why a white lawmaker is singling out one of the few roads named after Georgia's first African American congresswoman.

"This is a witch hunt," said John Evans, McKinney's former campaign manager. "This creep doesn't even live in the district. He's just another idiotic racist trying to embarrass her."

Back in 2000, when a portion of Memorial Drive was designated Cynthia McKinney Parkway, many interpreted it as a symbol of Georgia's progress in race relations. The road connects Stone Mountain, a former stronghold of the Ku Klux Klan, to Atlanta, often called the birthplace of civil rights.

DOJ_NMG_0113135

State Sen. Gloria Butler introduced the original legislation to designate a portion of Memorial Drive for McKinney after the congresswoman secured $14 million in federal funds to revitalize the dilapidated street. Butler said she would not consider changing the name.

"Len Walker should name a street in his own district," she said. "He needs to stay out of DeKalb County."

The flap is escalating. Last month, another state lawmaker proposed removing the name of McKinney's father, another controversial former legislator, from a portion of Interstate 285.

Whatever Georgia residents think of McKinney or her father, the dispute has prompted some to suggest that road naming has gotten out of hand. An editorial in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution recently proposed that the state ban naming roads and bridges after any living person.

In the last 70 years, Georgia legislators have named and renamed more than 860 roads and bridges after politicians, preachers, soldiers, civil rights activists, country music stars and even school cafeteria workers. Nearly a third have been named since 2000.

Street and building names are increasingly forums for political expression, said Derek Alderman, a professor of cultural geography at East Carolina University. More than a quarter of the 383 pieces of legislation signed into law during the 109th Congress, he noted, dealt with naming or renaming federal buildings and structures.

"It's about power," Alderman said. "Those signs up on the street, they basically create a reminder to people about how their community is situated politically. It's almost like a daily political lesson."

Former President Released After Surgery (AP)

AP, January 8, 2007

Former President George H.W. Bush has been released from the Mayo Clinic after undergoing successful hip replacement surgery, the clinic said.

The 82-year-old former president was discharged from the clinic on Saturday, following the operation on his right hip that was performed Wednesday, the Mayo Clinic said on its Web site.

He traveled to the Mayo Clinic on Tuesday after delivering a eulogy at the Washington funeral of former President Gerald Ford.

Surgeons at the clinic replaced his left hip in 2000. Former first lady Barbara Bush also had successful hip replacement surgery at the clinic, in 1997.

The former president has made several highly publicized skydives in the last decade, most recently in 2004 to celebrate his 80th birthday.

Hamstrung In Virginia (WP)

DEL. HARRY R. "Bob" Purkey, a Virginia lawmaker, is one of those quixotic keeners who plug away at lost causes year after year, enduring the joshing of colleagues who regard them as quaint figures of fun. In fact Mr. Purkey is a perfectly sensible man whose hobbyhorse -- changing Virginia's archaic constitutional rule barring governors from running for a second, consecutive four-year term -- may finally have its day.

For 15 years or so, and in various forms, Mr. Purkey, a Virginia Beach Republican, has tried to coax the commonwealth into the modern age by doing away with the rule prohibiting sitting governors from running for reelection. He and his allies have come close. One such bill passed the House of Delegates in 2003, then died when a few Republicans switched votes. A similar attempt cleared the Senate in 1995 but collapsed in the House. And an earlier, pre-Purkey effort seemed tantalizingly within reach when it passed both houses in 1984, only to fail the following year. (To amend Virginia's constitution, a bill must gain legislative approval in consecutive years, then be approved by voters in a referendum.)

Now Mr. Purkey and his fellow Republican legislators are in negotiations with Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), and both sides appear serious about a compromise. In return for the constitutional shift, which would enhance the chief executive's power, future governors would cede to the legislature the right to make some appointments to certain high-level state commissions -- a right now reserved exclusively for the governor. If a deal can be worked out and passed by the General Assembly this year and next, it would go on the ballot in 2008. And if voters approve, the governor elected in 2009 -- not Mr. Kaine, who would still be bound by the old rule barring reelection -- would have the option of running for reelection in 2013.

Those wedded to the old system say a two-term provision would produce governors distracted by the prospect of reelection. A corollary is that governors seeking reelection spend too much time raising money, creating the potential of conflicts of interest.

Those objections are easily outweighed by the main arguments for two-term governors, which 49 other states seem to have grasped: simply, that governors worried about reelection are also more accountable to the state's voters. And that while money in politics can have a corrupting influence, that applies also to candidates who are not incumbents. The one-term rule yields governors who are lame ducks from the moment they take office, hard-pressed to forge and implement long-term policies or strategies for economic development. And because of Virginia's biennial budgeting process, each new governor is hamstrung for the first half of his term by his predecessor's budget.

It's a screwy system. In addition to Mr. Kaine, three of his four most recent predecessors favor scrapping it to allow governors to run for reelection. So do leading business groups. This year, after so many failed attempts, let's hope Mr. Purkey's efforts are not in vain.

Newspaper Cites Plans For Iran Nuke Attack (WT/AP)

By David Stringer

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

LONDON -- A British newspaper reported yesterday that Israeli pilots are training to strike as many as three targets in Iran with low-yield nuclear weapons, aiming to halt Tehran's uranium-enrichment program.

Israeli officials swiftly denied the report, which comes amid growing global concerns over an Iranian project that Washington and other governments think is secretly intended to build atomic weapons.

Israel has never confirmed that it has nuclear bombs, although analysts widely think the Jewish state possesses a significant stockpile and U.S. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates referred to an Israeli atomic arsenal during his recent confirmation hearing.

Citing unidentified Israeli military sources, the Sunday Times said plans had been drawn up in Israel for an attack using "bunker-buster" nuclear weapons against atomic facilities at three sites south of the Iranian capital.

The U.S. and its allies suspect Tehran of trying to produce atomic weapons there -- and the issue has taken on greater urgency because of Iranian leaders' statements calling for the destruction of Israel and their recent hosting of a conference questioning the Holocaust.

Though Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has not explicitly ruled out a military strike on Iran's nuclear facilities, he says the issue should be dealt with diplomatically -- and stresses that an Iranian nuclear bomb would be a problem for the entire world, not just Israel.

Some view Israeli officials' occasional implied threats as a means of pressuring the world community to take action, building on the recent U.N. Security Council decision to impose economic sanctions on Tehran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

Iran says its nuclear program is solely for peaceful purposes, including generating electricity, and it has called the U.N. move invalid and illegal.

The Sunday Times said Israeli military officials think Iran could produce enough enriched uranium to build nuclear weapons within two years. It said Israeli pilots had made flights to the British colony of Gibraltar while training for the 2,000-mile round trip that would be required to reach the Iranian targets.

Israeli pilots conducted a similar raid on Iraq in 1981, destroying a nuclear facility being built by dictator Saddam Hussein's regime.

But Iran's program may be far more difficult to cripple because it is thought to be distributed over many sites and, in part, deep underground.

Israel Plans 'Nuclear' Strike On Iran (AFP)

AFP, January 8, 2007

Israel has drawn up plans to destroy Iranian uranium enrichment facilities with a tactical nuclear strike, a British newspaper has said in a report that was rubbished by the Jewish state.

The Sunday Times quoted several Israeli military sources as saying that two of the country's air force squadrons are training to use "bunker-busting" bombs for a single strike.

The story is "incorrect", Israeli foreign ministry spokesman Mark Regev said Sunday.

"Israel is 100 percent behind the international community's efforts to bring about an end to Iran's nuclear program. Israel totally supports Resolution 1737 and the international community must be ready to take even tougher measures against Iran," he said.

The Sunday Times -- which in 1986 first revealed Israel's undeclared nuclear arsenal -- said the plans involved sending conventional, laser-guided missiles to open up "tunnels" in the targets before "mini-nukes" with a force the equivalent of one-fifteenth of the Hiroshima bomb are fired in.

"As soon as the green light is given, it will be one mission, one strike and the Iranian nuclear project will be demolished," one of the unnamed sources was quoted as saying.

A senior Israeli official dismissed the report out of hand.

"This is absurd information coming from a newspaper that has already in the past distinguished itself with sensationalist headlines that in the end amounted to nothing," the official, who asked not to be named, told AFP.

"To think that we will launch an atomic attack against Iran, and on top of that that we would reveal it in advance to a foreign newspaper is doubly ridiculous," the official added.

"The solution that we recommend, along with the international community, is that of sanctions imposed on Iran."

Iran warned of dire consequences in the event of any such Israeli attack.

"Any action against the Islamic republic will not go without a response and the aggressor would regret the action very quickly," foreign ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini told reporters.

He described the Sunday Times report as "proof of the weakness of the enemy and will have no effect on the determination of the Islamic republic to continue its (nuclear) activities."

Israel and the United States, the Islamic republic's two arch-enemies, accuse Iran of seeking a nuclear weapon -- a charge vehemently denied by Tehran, which refuses to bow to United Nations demands to halt uranium enrichment work.

Even after the UN Security Council agreed to impose its first-ever sanctions on Iran in December, Israel has pushed for tougher international action against the Islamic republic.

Iran's hardline President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has in the past called for Israel to be wiped off the map and also casting doubt on the scale of the Holocaust.

Israel has refused to rule out pre-emptive military action against Iran. In 1981, it took action against Iraq's nuclear reactor in Osirak.

Israel is considered to be the sole nuclear weapons power in the Middle East. It does not officially acknowlege that it has an arsenal although Prime Minister Ehud Olmert appeared to do so in an apparent lapse last year.

The three prime targets for Israeli action are said to be the uranium enrichment plant at Natanz, a uranium conversion facility near Isfahan and a heavy water reactor at Arak, The Sunday Times reported.

The nuclear option is being considered because Israeli military commanders believe conventional strikes may not be effective enough at destroying the well-defended facilities, it said.

The atomic weapons would explode deep underground to minimise the risk of radioactive fall-out, it added.

US and Israeli officials had met several times to consider military action, it added, saying military analysts assessed that disclosing the plans could put pressure on Iran to halt sensitive uranium enrichment activities.

It could also be designed to persuade the United States to act or "soften up" world opinion ahead of an Israeli pre-emptive strike.

Israeli pilots are said to have flown to Gibraltar in recent weeks to train for the 2,000-mile (3,220-kilometre) round-trip to the Iranian targets. Three possible routes have been mapped out, including one over Turkey, the report said.

The plan is similar to one said in a report in the New Yorker magazine last April to have been considered by the United States. The White House dismissed investigative reporter Seymour Hersh's article as "ill-informed".

Abbas Tells Party He'll Proceed With Elections (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 7 — The Fatah faction of the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, held a large rally on Sunday in a Gaza City sports stadium, marking the group's 42nd anniversary with a show of strength and defiance after days of bloody clashes with the rival Hamas movement.

Tens of thousands of Fatah supporters made it one of the largest Fatah rallies in Gaza in many years.

Mr. Abbas told Fatah political leaders in Bethlehem on Sunday that he intended to proceed with his demand for early presidential and parliamentary elections, and that he had lost hope in negotiating a unity government with Hamas, which won a parliamentary majority a year ago. Hamas has rejected early legislative elections as illegal and as a form of a coup and has vowed to boycott and disrupt them.

On Saturday, Mr. Abbas said he would consider the Hamas-led parallel police force known as the Executive Force to be illegal if it were not quickly integrated into other Palestinian security forces under his command.

Hamas rejected that call, too, saying that the Gaza-based group, the Executive Force, was legal and necessary, and that in fact Hamas had plans to more than double its size — to 12,000 men. Hamas leaders warned Mr. Abbas that efforts to disband the Executive Force would be met with violence.

Mr. Abbas also said Saturday that he was changing security personnel. While he did not make clear who would hold the top post, the United States has been urging him to appoint Muhammad Dahlan, the former security chief in Gaza, to lead all security forces in the Palestinian Authority. Mr. Dahlan is especially despised by Hamas, and he is not especially popular among many other Palestinians, who believe that he is corrupt and too close to the United States and Israel, despite his vehement denials. But Mr. Dahlan commands the loyalty in Gaza of many of Fatah's armed men, incorporated into various security services.

Mr. Dahlan said at the rally that there would be a new policy. "If anyone from Fatah is attacked, we will hit back twice as hard," he said, as the crowd shouted "Shiites, Shiites," intended as a riposte to Hamas, which, like Fatah, is Sunni, but is also fervently religious and has close ties to Shiite Iran. Mr. Dahlan responded, "Don't say 'Shiites,' say 'criminals.' "

Agence France-Presse said that its photographer, Jaime Rázuri, 50, from Peru, was released Sunday evening after six days of captivity after being kidnapped in Gaza City on Monday. Mr. Rázuri was released to news-agency representatives at Mr. Abbas's compound. He said: "It was not a five-star hotel, but it was very good. I was treated very well." Mr. Rázuri said he was fine and "very happy to be released," and thanked all those who had tried to help him.

In Israel, intraparty rivalries also intensified, with former Prime Minister Ehud Barak announcing that he would run for the chairmanship of the Labor Party, challenging the current leader and defense minister, Amir Peretz, in primaries on May 24.

Mr. Barak has been out of politics for nearly six years, since Ariel Sharon defeated him in 2001. He will face competition from Mr. Peretz; Ami Ayalon, another former general; and Ophir Pines-Paz, a popular legislator and former minister.

Separately, Israeli forces arrested two Palestinians on Sunday morning in the Balata refugee camp in Nablus. The Palestinians then led them to two suicide-bomb belts in their apartment that were ready for use, the Israeli military said.

Fatah And Hamas Continue Bloody Struggle (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh And Ibrahim Barzak

AP, January 8, 2007

Geography is playing a big role in the violent Palestinian power struggle: When Hamas attacks in its stronghold in the Gaza strip, its rival Fatah retaliates in the West Bank, where it holds sway.

DOJ_NMG_0113139

The pattern of bloodshed in the two Palestinian enclaves, separated by Israel, repeated itself this weekend in a rampage against Hamas supporters in the West Bank, where Fatah gunmen shot an office manager and a university professor in their legs and kidnapped a deputy mayor.

The attacks came two days after Hamas militiamen in Gaza killed a Fatah-allied colonel and seven bodyguards in a rocket barrage.

Fatah says its dominance of the West Bank holds Hamas in check and could keep the lid on what some fear will turn into a full-scale civil war in Gaza.

But to maintain that dominance, Fatah militants in the West Bank have resorted to new tactics — including kidnapping government officials and shooting Hamas sympathizers at random.

After snatching the Hamas deputy mayor of the West Bank city of Nablus, Mahdi al-Khamali, his captors released a video Sunday showing him flanked by gunmen — a scene familiar in Iraq, but a first in the Palestinian areas. Any attack in Gaza will be avenged in the West Bank, a gunman warned in the video.

The division of turf between Hamas and Fatah is largely linked to Israeli troop deployment.

Israeli troops withdrew from Gaza in September 2005, enabling Hamas to build and expand its militia. By contrast, Israel controls the West Bank and has badly weakened Hamas militants there with arrests.

Gaza, a narrow band of Mediterranean coast and the landlocked West Bank, lie on either side of Israel's borders, and it is impossible for most Palestinians to travel between them. Of the 3.8 million Palestinians, about 37 percent live in Gaza and 63 percent live in the West Bank.

Fatah gunmen have also been targeted by Israel in the West Bank, but most of Fatah's firepower comes from the security forces loyal to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, a political moderate. Last week, President Bush asked Congress to provide $83 million to train and equip Abbas' force.

Since winning parliamentary elections a year ago, Hamas has invested heavily in its Gaza paramilitary unit, the so-called Executive Force, with millions of dollars in support, mainly from Iran.

The militia currently has 5,500 members, but thousands more sympathizers can easily be mobilized. Abbas, who heads Fatah, on Saturday outlawed the militia, prompting defiant declarations by Hamas that it would more than double the number of fighters.

Hamas has also established its own arms industry in Gaza, building anti-tank rockets, mortar shells, land mines and hand grenades. Smuggling tunnels running under the Gaza-Egypt border help refresh supplies. Some of Hamas' weapons engineers were trained abroad.

The Executive Force has also bought SUVs and German-made minivans and set up training camps throughout Gaza.

On the West Bank, by contrast, Hamas militants remain underground or only appear in public without weapons, for fear of being targeted by Israel.

On Sunday, dozens of bearded Hamas activists, all unarmed, crowded around the West Bank hospital bed of Ehab Ghaiyatha, an Interior Ministry employee and Hamas supporter who was seriously wounded by Fatah gunmen in the town of Ramallah on Saturday.

Ghaiyatha, 27, said the assailants draped a black hood over his head, drove around with him for 15 minutes, dumped him into the street and then shot him in the legs.

Ghaiyatha said there was little Hamas could do to protect its supporters in the West Bank. "No one can carry weapons here," he said. "If he does, he would become a target for the Israelis, but if they (Fatah gunmen) keep attacking us, we have to find a way to protect ourselves."

The weekend rampage by Fatah — its gunmen also shot a Hamas-allied university professor in the legs — came after a gruesome attack by Hamas on an officer in the Abbas-allied Preventive Security Service in Gaza on Thursday.

Col. Mohammed Ghayeb and seven bodyguards were killed in a barrage of rockets fired at his home, where he had been holed up, pleading for help in a phone call to Palestine TV in his final minutes.

More than 30 Palestinians have been killed in factional fighting since December, most in Gaza. Gun affiliated with Fatah have also carried out brutal attacks against Hamas in Gaza, including executing an Islamic court judge linked to Hamas in the street.

The security forces loyal to Fatah in Gaza still outnumber the Hamas militia by several thousand, but the balance could soon shift.

Fatah, which dominated Palestinian politics for four decades until it lost parliament elections a year ago, is trying to restore its power in Gaza.

On Sunday, tens of thousands of Fatah supporters crowded Gaza City's muddy Yarmouk soccer stadium despite the cold, rainy weather, for the largest Fatah rally since 1994 when legendary leader Yasser Arafat triumphantly returned from exile.

Fatah's strongman in Gaza, Mohammed Dahlan, was given a hero's welcome and shooed away the security guards when he began speaking.

"Let Hamas shoot me," he said as the crowd erupted in applause. Dahlan derided the Hamas militia as a gang, and pledged revenge for the assault on the colonel's home. "If they attack one Fatah person, we'll attack two more," he said.

In another development, a Peruvian news photographer for the French news agency AFP, kidnapped Jan. 1 in Gaza City, was freed Sunday, Fatah officials said. It was not known who kidnapped him.

U.S. Support Key To Ethiopia's Invasion (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — The United States has quietly poured weapons and military advisers into Ethiopia, whose recent invasion of Somalia opened a new front in the Bush administration's war on terrorism.

A Christian-led nation in sub-Saharan Africa, surrounded almost entirely by Muslim states, Ethiopia has received nearly $20 million in U.S. military aid since late 2002. That's more than any country in the region except Djibouti.

Last month, thousands of Ethiopian troops invaded neighboring Somalia and helped overturn a fundamentalist Islamic government that the Bush administration said was supported by al-Qaeda.

The U.S. and Ethiopian militaries have "a close working relationship," Pentagon spokesman Lt. Cmdr. Joe Carpenter said. The ties include intelligence sharing, arms aid and training that gives the Ethiopians "the capacity to defend their borders and intercept terrorists and weapons of mass destruction," he said.

Advisers from the Guam national guard have been training Ethiopians in basic infantry skills at two camps in Ethiopia, said Maj. Kelley Thibodeau, a spokeswoman for U.S. forces in Djibouti.

There are about 100 U.S. military personnel currently working in Ethiopia, Carpenter said.

Somalia has been the region's primary concern for the U.S. government since the early 1990s. U.S. troops, sent to Somalia as part of a peacekeeping and humanitarian mission, withdrew in 1994 after a failed attempt to capture a clan leader led to the deaths of 18 U.S. soldiers in 1993. The incident was later the subject of the book and movie Black Hawk Down.

The country has had no central government since 1991. The capital, Mogadishu, has been controlled by a series of warlords. A fundamentalist movement called the Islamic Courts Council consolidated power by defeating the warlords six months ago.

Ethiopia responded in December, invading to oust the Islamic Courts and prop up a government backed by the United Nations and Western countries.

At least 8,000 Ethiopian troops remain in Somalia, according to United Nations observers.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi has said he would like to be able to withdraw his troops in a few weeks. But there has been little progress in creating an African peacekeeping force to replace the Ethiopians.

Meanwhile, the ousted Islamic movement has begun attacking the Ethiopian troops. And, in an audiotape aired Friday on a website used frequently by Islamic militants, al-Qaeda No. 2 Ayman al-Zawahri urged Somalis to defeat "the crusader Ethiopian invasion forces."

Ethiopia's population is split almost equally between Muslims and Christians, but there are concerns that the Ethiopian intervention "will be framed as another Christian vs. Muslim war," said retired Marine general Joseph Hoar, who headed the U.S. Central Command from 1991-94.

The Bush administration understands that Ethiopia's intervention "is against international terrorism, not against Islam," said Samuel Assefa, Ethiopia's ambassador to the United States.

The close U.S. embrace of Ethiopia is risky, in the view of several Africa experts and human rights advocates. Even though Ethiopia had good reasons of its own for intervening to blunt a Somali threat to its security, it is perceived as acting on behalf of the United States, said William Zartman, an Africa expert at the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies.

The intervention is controversial in Ethiopia, where the Meles government has become increasingly repressive, said Chris Albin-Lackey, an African researcher at Human Rights Watch.

The Meles government has limited the power of the opposition in parliament and arrested thousands. A government inquiry concluded that security forces fatally shot, beat or strangled 193 people who protested election fraud in 2005.

At least 96 prisoners, including several opposition leaders, journalists and the former mayor of Addis Ababa, face charges of treason, plotting to commit genocide and inciting violence, Albin-Lackey said.

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., plans to re-introduce legislation in Congress that would tie U.S. aid to Ethiopia to an improved record on human rights, but the prospects of passage are uncertain. "We have to be careful that that old maxim — the enemy of my enemy is my friend — does not make us unwitting enablers of abuse," Smith said.

UN Under Pressure To Extend Presence In Somalia (FT)

By Mark Turner, Andrew England And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 8, 2007

Western and African powers in Nairobi last week described the defeat of Somalia's Islamic Courts by Ethiopian-backed forces as a "historic opportunity" to rebuild the shattered horn of Africa country, and put an end to the "warlordism" that has torn apart efforts at political reconciliation since the 1990s.

But a history of botched intervention in the world's most failed of failed states leaves few doubts that fixing Somalia poses a severe challenge to the world's peacekeeping systems, and may yet embroil Ban Ki-moon, the new UN secretary-general, in one of the first major challenges of his tenure.

At stake are questions of which international bodies should be responsible for the often expensive, thankless task of peacekeeping, and what their forces should be doing wherever they police.

A senior EU envoy in Washington said the buck must stop with the UN. "The UN will have to take responsibility. The rest of the world will have to pay."

But the world body's peacekeeping department is already overstretched with almost 100,000 troops in 18 operations, and there is little appetite for a UN mission in Somalia after the ill-fated operation of the early 1990s.

Officials and diplomats have been keen to encourage alternatives to traditional peacekeeping, such as providing international support to regional groups such as the African Union (AU), and are trying to develop an African standby force for such situations.

Last month, the UN Security Council authorised a regional "protection and training mission" to be sent to the country. Diplomats say a new resolution will be needed to take account of the changed circumstances since a two-week war put Somalia's weak transitional government in control of most of the country.

The resolution gives little indication of how the mission might work, or who would step in to provide troops. The only candidate to have come forward so far is Uganda, whose President Yoweri Museveni last week promised, pending parliamentary approval, to send a battalion of 1,000 troops.

A much larger contingent than that would be needed for any properly constituted peacekeeping force, and diplomats are urgently searching for other African powers to contribute.

"It is important for the African Union to take over," said one UN official. "Museveni cannot do it alone."

DOJ_NMG_0113142

Nigeria is seen as one possible contender and South Africa suggests it could help with logistics. But it is unclear whether even an expanded AU force would be up to the job in the longer term. The body's peacekeeping force has struggled to maintain itself in Sudan's Darfur region, where the UN has been trying to bolster its presence in the face of staunch government opposition to UN involvement.

Dumisani Kumalo, South Africa's UN ambassador who also sits on the Security Council, said that UN support must follow early African intervention in Somalia.

"If your house is on fire, your neighbours go first," he said, "but you would still hope for the fire department to arrive later."

"The UN must be involved. We can't have the UN subcontract international peace and security."

UN peacekeeping officials concede that they may eventually have to step once more into the Somali breach, and note that, in contrast to the situation in Sudan, the Somali government appears amenable to UN action.

But the approval of Somalia's government may not be enough on its own. UN officials insist that for any intervention to work, the government must start a genuine reconciliation process and earn legitimacy.

At the moment, one said, that legitimacy was "in serious doubt. They were put there by the Ethiopians. A very co-operative approach has to be taken".

Without legitimacy, international troops risk being caught in a conflict in which there is no peace to keep. But Idd Mohamed, Somalia's deputy envoy to the UN, insists any force would be welcomed. Somalis were tired of war, he said.

Washington think-tanks complain that once again the Bush administration, which backed Ethiopia's intervention, has got itself involved in a war with no post-conflict plan – a view echoed by Democrats.

"The US must play more of a leadership role, instead of relying on the piecemeal diplomacy that has failed us in the past," Senator Russ Feingold, the new chair of the Africa sub-committee, said.

Islamists Out, Somalia Tries To Rise From Chaos (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

KISMAYO, Somalia, Jan. 7 — Every Friday morning in this seaside town, the future of Somalia plays soccer on a bone-littered beach.

Boys dribble around animal carcasses and oil drums that have been dumped by the shore. Ships covered with rust lean into the sand. The palms sway, the seagulls squawk and a few girls in veils hang back, watching the action.

"This is all we know," said Mahmoud Abu Gur, 19, pointing to a dozen haphazard soccer games. "This."

The road ahead for Somalia begins in places like Kismayo, dusty, chaotic, forlorn wrecks of cities where the list of dire needs like food, water, shelter, a fire department, law, order — and hope — is so overwhelming that people just shake their heads and smile when asked where they would begin.

In just two weeks, the Somali political world has been turned upside down, bringing ambitious governance and reconstruction issues into focus for the first time in 16 years. The Islamist forces that ruled much of the country for the past six months are out. The transitional federal government, which had been considered totally feckless by those both at home and abroad, is in. The surprising reversal is because of thousands of Ethiopian troops still in Somalia who routed the Islamists after Ethiopian officials declared the growing movement a regional threat.

Kismayo is an old Arab port town of 700,000 people, Somalia's third most populous city, after Mogadishu, the capital, and Hargeysa, in the north. But town elders in all three places are struggling with the same questions: how to provide security; what to do with the remaining Islamists; how to determine the proper role for religion, an important theme in Somali society; and how to unify rival clans, rebuild infrastructure and live with the Ethiopians. Many Somalis say they are starting at less than zero.

"After nearly two decades of anarchy," said Abdi Artan Adan, a retired diplomat in Kismayo, "people just don't want to be ruled."

Ever since Somalia's central government collapsed in 1991, the country has been notorious for the staggering levels of firepower on the streets. The new government made disarmament its first step but despite meetings, pleas, deadlines and threats, officials have collected few weapons. In Mogadishu, hundreds of people rioted Saturday at the prospect of house-to-house searches. The local government there indefinitely postponed the issue.

That led Jendayi E. Frazer, the United States assistant secretary of state for Africa, to cancel a planned trip to Mogadishu on Sunday. She would have been the highest-ranking American official to set foot in Mogadishu since American troops left the country in 1994 after a troubled aid mission. American officials said the security situation was too unstable.

On Sunday night, insurgents in Mogadishu attacked a downtown army barracks and residents said that four civilians were killed.

In Kismayo, no weapons have been turned in. Many elders agreed that everyone would be better off once all guns were gone, but no one seems to want to volunteer theirs first.

"It's a custom for Somalis to attack someone who doesn't have weapons," said Sultan Abdi Rashid Dure, a leader of the Galjel subclan. "When I was young, we used knives."

With long, wrinkled fingers, Mr. Dure, 56, traced the web between disarmament, clans, revenge and anarchy. "During these years, every clan killed," he said. "A lot. Now there are so many feuds, so many scores to settle. We are all afraid that if we give up our weapons, other clans will take their revenge."

The Islamists, using Islam as a bridge, did a better job than any recent authority to unite warring clans. But their military was no match for the better-trained, better-equipped Ethiopian-led troops, and now that the Islamists are gone, many fear a return to clan mayhem.

Somalia has always been somewhat of a political paradox — one of the most homogeneous countries in Africa, with one language, Somali, and one religion, Sunni Islam, but at the same time is one of the most violently divided. Clan allegiances have always mattered.

Dahir Ali Barre, the leader of a small Kismayo political organization, said that when he was a teenager in Mogadishu in the early 1970s, he did not know which clan he belonged to. It was not until 1974, when he was sent to a village in Somalia's barren interior as part of a national effort to foster cross-clan understanding, that Mr. Barre learned he was a Marehan. But when he returned to Kismayo in the mid-90s after some years in the capital, the first thing he did was seek out the Marehan neighborhood, for protection. "After all those years of sophisticated culture," he said, "we've basically gone back to the bush."

The transitional government has theoretically addressed the clan issue by its so-called 4.5 formula, which allots equal representation to the four major clans and a smaller percentage for all the minor clans. The government was set up in 2004 with help from the United Nations and is supposed to rule until the next elections, proposed for 2009.

Already it seems that clan militia leaders are well positioned. The big man in Kismayo is Barre Aadan Shire, the transitional government's defense minister and a former warlord, whose strong jaw, natty goatee and bald head lend him an uncanny resemblance to Lenin. He says many people in Kismayo have asked him to reach out to the Islamists, but he does not want to. The last of the Islamist fighters have retreated to the Kenya border, about 150 miles away.

"If we were going to compromise," Mr. Shire said, "why go to war?" He gave the Islamists credit for bringing a degree of order, but said they pushed religion too far. Yet he predicted that Somalia's permanent government would not be purely secular. He does not see beer or bikinis in Somalia's future. "We are a traditional people," he said.

It seems to be a fine balance. Several Kismayo residents said they grew to resent the Islamists after they banned movies, Western music, cigarettes and khat, a mildly narcotic plant that is chewed here. "Those rules were a total fallacy," said Abdullahi Jama Ali, who was once part of an underground Islamist group. "The Koran doesn't say anything about cigarettes. The Islamic religion is like an ocean, everyone can swim where he likes."

With the Islamists in hiding, Kismayo's market is bustling again. But the grapefruit farms on the outskirts of town are still a mess, irrigation canals are full of sand, roads are dreadful and government buildings are lonely, shot-up places.

Kismayo's jail is a single windowless cell, barred by a log, where four sweaty prisoners, accused of stealing a mattress, wait for a justice system to be set up. There are 22 police officers for the entire city.

Not far away, there is a displaced persons' camp, a field of three-foot-high domes made of sticks and plastic bags. The salty breeze nearly carries them away.

Hundreds of Ethiopian soldiers occupy this wasteland. Though many of its people are Muslims, Ethiopia also has a long Christian history, and already some Muslim extremists, including leaders of Al Qaeda, have vowed to respond with a holy war to drive the Ethiopians out. Ethiopian officials say they plan to withdraw their forces in a few weeks and hand over control to a yet-to-be-formed African peacekeeping force.

With Somalia's longtime fears that Ethiopia might swallow it, the sooner that happens, the better. On Saturday, Nasteh Dahir Farah, a reporter for a Kismayo radio station, visited the town's airport with three foreign journalists. The foreigners were allowed in. Mr. Farah was not. He was shooed away by Ethiopian soldiers at the gate and told never to come back.

"This is my country, not theirs," he said. "If I didn't have a job," Mr. Farah muttered, straightening himself up and smoothing the shirt where he had been poked in the chest, "I'd join the resistance."

A little humiliation, it seems, goes a long, long way.

Ethiopian Forces Attacked In Somalia (AP)

By Elizabeth A. Kennedy

AP, January 8, 2007

Gunmen attacked Ethiopian troops supporting the Somali government Sunday, witnesses said, in the second straight day of violence in a city struggling to emerge from more than a decade of chaos.

Farah Abdi Hussein, who witnessed the attack, said gunmen launched grenades at Ethiopians about 2 1/2 miles from the airport. One Somali soldier was wounded, according to a Somali military official asked not to be named for fear of reprisals.

The unrest comes at a precarious time for Somalia's transitional administration, which is trying to assert some control for the first time in a capital that has seen little more than chaos in the 15 years since clan warlords toppled a dictatorship and then turned on each other.

The government, backed by Ethiopia's military, drove out a radical Islamic militia last week. But many in predominantly Muslim Somalia resent the presence of troops from neighboring Ethiopia, which has a large Christian population and has fought two wars with Somalia.

On Saturday, hundreds of furious protesters took to the streets, burning tires and smashing car windows while denouncing the presence of Ethiopian forces and shouting defiance at the Somali government's call for disarming Mogadishu.

Two people died in Saturday's violence, including a 13-year-old boy.

On Sunday, a similar protest took place about 215 miles away in Belet Weyne, after Ethiopian troops there detained a Somali military commander who refused to hand over an Islamic militiaman, witnesses said. That protest also turned violent, killing a 20-year-old civilian, Abdi Nor Salah Gedi told The Associated Press by telephone.

It was not clear who shot the man or the teenager killed Saturday.

Clan elders held emergency meetings Sunday and hundreds of Somali troops patrolled Mogadishu, setting up six extra checkpoints in areas where residents burned tires and broke car windows during Saturday's protests.

Dahir Abdi Kulima, a chieftain of the Hawiye, the dominant clan of southern Somalia, said the government's reliance on Ethiopia is backfiring.

"Since the Ethiopians arrived people are sleeping and waking with worry about what will happen next," Kulima told AP during a break in a meeting with about a dozen other Hawiye elders. "This is a sign of upcoming problems in Somalia."

Ethiopian soldiers, tanks and warplanes intervened in Somalia on Dec. 24 to defeat the Islamic movement, which had threatened to overthrow the internationally recognized government. At the time, the government controlled only the western town of Baidoa.

The most senior U.S. diplomat for Africa said Sunday that the United States would use its diplomatic and financial resources to support the Somali government.

"I think we are pushing uphill as an international community, as well as the Somali people themselves, to try to overcome their history," Jendayi Frazer, the U.S. assistant secretary of state for Africa, told AP in Nairobi, Kenya.

Frazer was planning a surprise visit to Mogadishu on Sunday but called it off because the details of the trip were made public, prompting concerns for her safety.

The African Union has begun planning for peacekeepers and Uganda has promised at least 1,000 troops. Frazer has said she hopes the first troops would arrive in Mogadishu before the end of the month.

Previous peacekeeping forces, including U.S. troops, met with hostility and violence when they tried to help in the early 1990s, and leaders of the routed Islamic militia are vowing from their hideouts to launch an Iraq-style guerrilla war.

After meeting with Frazer in Nairobi, a top Somali politician with ties to leaders of the militant Muslim movement urged its fighters to surrender and join the peace process.

Sheik Sharif Hassan Aden, speaker of the transitional parliament but a strong critic of the interim government, also dropped his opposition to having foreign peacekeepers in Somalia, calling on people "to welcome, to hail, to respect, to accommodate them in a peaceful manner."

Aden is closely linked to leaders of the militant Council of Islamic Courts, whose fighters scattered into the countryside after being defeated on the battlefield last week.

Frazer reiterated Somalia's importance to the United States because of its location in the Horn of Africa, where the Red Sea opens into the Indian Ocean.

The U.S. wants to make sure Islamic extremists do not take advantage of the chaos to establish a safe haven. Frazer has said al-Qaida's East Africa cell, blamed for the bombings of two U.S. embassies and a Kenyan resort hotel, infiltrated the Islamist movement in Somalia.

But Frazer stressed that the U.S. will provide only a support role.

"Some people would like the United States to lead on this issue," she said. "I would prefer that we lead from behind, and what I mean by that is pushing the Somali people first, pushing the sub-region next and then mobilizing the resources of the international community."

A Fleeting Victory In Somalia (NYT)

By Jonathan Stevenson

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

Newport, R.I.

SOMALIA'S internationally recognized government pulled off a stunning military victory over its Islamist rivals, taking control of the capital, Mogadishu, and the key port city of Kismayo last week. This may appear to bode well for the containment of Islamism on the Horn of Africa. But unless America plays a constructive role in Somalia's next stage, the conflict could become a regional war and a new field of jihad.

The success of the Transitional Federal Government and its current prevalence were made possible entirely through the help of troops from neighboring Ethiopia, many of them trained and equipped by the United States. Nevertheless, Ethiopia cannot be expected to act as the government's main force indefinitely. Nor, eventually, will Somalis, who are almost all Sunni Muslims, tolerate an open-ended occupation by Ethiopians, who are predominantly Christians.

Enforcing peace in a politically atomized territory is remarkably difficult, as was painfully demonstrated by the American intervention in Somalia in the early 1990s. Turning a humanitarian mission into a coercive state-building effort angered local militia bosses, leading to the now-infamous "Black Hawk Down" attack.

The Ethiopians, being thoroughly familiar with the American experience and the Somalis' historical tendency to resist external influence, are already talking about pulling out within a few months.

What's more, the American invasion of Iraq illuminates some drawbacks to any extended Ethiopian military presence in Somalia. Al Qaeda's leadership would inevitably cast such a commitment as the non-Muslim occupation of a Muslim land. This would draw foreign jihadists into the conflict and lead to greater Islamic radicalization of Somalis themselves.

Indeed, Ethiopia's intervention and the United Nations Security Council's authorization of a notional peacekeeping force have already prompted the Islamic Courts Council to declare jihad. Once bitten, twice shy, the United States should be loath to perpetuate this kind of blowback. Similar considerations also argue against a peacekeeping force led by a major power — even if one could be marshaled, which at present looks unlikely.

The upshot is that there is no military solution to the quandary of Somalia. Robust diplomacy, with an eye toward creating some sort of power-sharing agreement between the transitional government and the Islamic Courts Council, appears to be the only hope. Given the recent struggles in Darfur, Congo and elsewhere, the idea of bringing Africans to the negotiating table might cause Westerners to roll their eyes. But there are a few hopeful signs that, in Somalia, diplomacy has a chance.

For one thing, the European Union has shown an interest in becoming an honest broker among the main Somali factions. And Kenya, alarmed by the prospect of tens of thousands of Somali refugees pouring across its northern border, may feel compelled to resume its longstanding diplomatic role in Somali conflict resolution.

Finally, neither the transitional government nor the Islamic courts are in a position to take over wholesale governance of the country: the various clan leaders, tribal elders and militia bosses around Somalia together control the pulse of power. In fact, it was the decision by dozens of local clan elders to withdraw their political and military backing that made it impossible for the Islamic Courts Council to defend Mogadishu and Kismayo.

This parlay underscored how central the elders are to Somalia's tenuous political equilibrium, especially those of the four main clans — the Darod, Hawiye, Dir and Digil-Mirifle — and their various sub-clans. These leaders must be included in any peace negotiation, and any deal with their backing would be hard for the Islamists or the transitional government to walk away from.

The knottiest substantive issue would likely be deciding to what extent Islamic sharia law would apply in Somalia. Naturally, the Islamic courts have insisted on universal religious law, while the secular transitional government has refused to entertain it. But there is recent African precedent for breaking the deadlock.

In January 2005, persistent negotiations overseen by the United States, European powers and Kenya produced a power-sharing compromise between southern Sudanese Christians and Sudan's Arab Muslim government. The deal was that sharia would apply in the northern part of the country and not in the south, and that its applicability in the capital, Khartoum, was to be decided by an elected assembly. While the unrelated violence in Sudan's Darfur region has overshadowed this deal, it was a major breakthrough between two groups far more religiously divided than the two Muslim Somali sides.

The temptation in Washington will be to keep its distance and rely on Ethiopia, the European Union and Kenya for as long as possible. This attitude is myopic. Neither the American public nor the world believe that the Bush administration's predominantly military approach to counterterrorism is working. Relying primarily on Ethiopian troops to tamp down Somali Islamism would represent a continuation of that flawed model, and of the corresponding risk of fueling the jihad.

The United States' full participation in a diplomatic process in the Horn of Africa, on the other hand, would constitute a relatively low-cost way of signaling a new American approach to Islam and a re-engagement in sub-Saharan Africa, which has largely been left out of Washington's post-9/11 calculus. A result could be a small political victory in the Muslim world that would deprive Osama bin Laden and his followers of a new grievance rather than supplying them with one.

Richardson Gets Bleak Darfur Assessment (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, January 8, 2007

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson got a bleak assessment Sunday of the deteriorating situation in Darfur, but expressed optimism for a breakthrough with the Sudanese president he has been able to work with in the past.

President Omar al-Bashir has refused to allow U.N. troops into the violence-wracked region, allowing only 20 civilians to be deployed for assistance.

The peacekeeping force would provide protection to the 2.5 million people uprooted since early 2003 as a result of sectarian conflict. More than 200,000 people have died, victims of violence as well as malnutrition and disease.

Richardson, a potential 2008 presidential candidate, heard disturbing reports of rape, death and corruption from the top U.S. diplomat in Sudan and humanitarian workers, but said he was not deterred from the challenge of trying to help bring peace where years of international efforts have failed.

"I think we make some measurable progress if we can help the cease fire and the humanitarian situation and possibly start a united political process that helps the U.N. peacekeeping effort alive," he said.

Richardson was to meet with al-Bashir on Monday in Khartoum, then fly to Darfur on Tuesday to meet with rebel leaders and the commander of overwhelmed African Union forces assigned to patrol the area.

"I have to tell you, my record with Bashir is pretty good," the governor told the skeptical humanitarian officials.

Richardson flew to Sudan at the request of the Save Darfur Coalition because he has negotiated successfully with al-Bashir in the past over the release of foreign prisoners.

He had been on Sudanese soil just minutes when Cameron Hume, the chief diplomat who was an aide to Richardson when the governor was U.N. ambassador, laid out the challenge to make progress. "I don't think anybody's strategy is working," Hume told Richardson.

Richardson visited the presidential residence for three hours Sunday night for a celebration of Sudan's independence — where al-Bashir addressed the crowd in Arabic — but the two did not greet one another.

Later, he met with 13 representatives of aid groups working in Darfur who asked not to be quoted by name out of fear of reprisal by the Sudanese government. Some said they were doubtful Richardson can make progress with the president and one suggested he was being used by al-Bashir and should refuse to meet with him.

Richardson is planning to announce soon whether he will run for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, and the trip highlights his extensive international experience in a competitive field.

On a 17-hour flight to Sudan, Richardson huddled with five advisers around a table in the private jet chartered by billionaire philanthropist S. Daniel Abraham for the trip. Richardson asked them how he could help encourage a cease-fire, continue the flow of humanitarian aide and persuade al-Bashir to allow United Nations peacekeeping troops in the region.

The group game up with a two-page memo of talking points going into the meeting that lacked specific timetables or numerical goals. For instance, they would like to jump start African Union patrols in some locations, work toward a cease fire and get al-Bashir's commitment a three-stage plan to send some 20,000 peacekeepers and police to Darfur.

Hume's warned during a gloomy hour-long briefing for Richardson's delegation that he was assuming that everything that was said in the room was being monitored by Sudanese intelligence. He repeated the sentiment later with the aid workers.

Hume said the African Union troops who are supposed to be providing protection in Darfur have slowed patrols. But Hume said Richardson might be able to convince the A.U. force commander to step up patrols, at least in some areas.

Hume explained that rising chaos and violence is making it more dangerous for humanitarian groups to travel and distribute aid.

One of the humanitarian officials who briefed Richardson said 13 aid workers have been killed since a cease fire was signed in July, more than 100 of their vehicles were stolen last year and over 400 have had to be relocated to protect their security in the last couple of months.

Hume said violence has increased in El Fasher, where Richardson visited last September and planned to return Tuesday. Richardson was there earlier to retrieve a journalist from New Mexico who had been imprisoned — a release that was the result of Richardson's face-to-face negotiations with al-Bashir. Since that visit, Hume said, there has been gunfire in town, including a shooting by government paramilitary forces opposed to the governor.

US And EU Talks Revive Hopes Of Trade Deal (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, January 8, 2007

Negotiations between the US and the European Union have revived hopes that a deal can be struck on the stalled Doha round of world trade talks by the end of the month, according to EU and American officials.

Top US and EU negotiators have told the Financial Times they hope to achieve a breakthrough in the coming weeks, paving the way for an agreement with Brazil and India at the World Economic Forum in Davos this month.

The proposed deal would be a last-ditch attempt to revive the Doha round before a US law enhancing President George W. Bush's authority to negotiate trade pacts expires later this year.

The round began in 2001 with plans to liberalise manufacturing and agricultural markets, but farm subsidies have proved a sticking point for both the US and EU.

Peter Mandelson, the EU's trade commissioner, told the FT that the US and EU were closer to an agreement than is commonly thought. "After a series of meetings of senior officials it is clear that the gap between us on agriculture is no longer such to dismiss hope of a successful outcome. We are not that far apart to give up on the process."

The optimism follows US-EU negotiations – which were continuing last night – aimed at narrowing differences on agricultural subsidies and tariffs.

Mr Bush and José Manuel Barroso, European Commission president, are expected to back the drive for a deal when they meet today at the White House.

The meeting will mark the highest-level effort to reach a deal at the WTO since talks broke down in July over agricultural policy. The engagement of Mr Bush in the negotiations follows the personal intervention of Tony Blair, the British prime minister, and Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, officials said.

Mr Mandelson said he hoped to persuade Mr Bush to throw his weight behind the Doha deal. "It is at this crucial stage when you reach the end-game that you need the president's authority to help us do a deal," he said.

US and EU officials said that if the outline of a final deal could be reached with Brazil and India at the World Economic Forum in Davos, the circle of countries included in the talks would widen.

Susan Schwab, the US trade representative, told the FT: "Both technical and policy-level conversations are continuing and that is the single most important ingredient necessary to find a resolution to the impasse."

But the chief US trade negotiator was more cautious than her EU counterpart. "The challenges that we face in trying to find our way clear to a breakthrough in Doha are no less than they were last year. But I think we have made progress on the technical side," she said. Ms Schwab added that she would make an improved offer on cutting domestic agricultural subsidies.

Mandelson To Push Bush On Trade (FT)

By Eoin Callan, Caroline Daniel, George Parker And Andrew Bounds

Financial Times, January 8, 2007

Peter Mandelson will on Monday attempt the improbable feat of persuading George W. Bush to take a political gamble on multilateralism and expend precious political capital on reaching a world trade deal during his final two years in office.

The European Union's chief trade negotiator will meet the president this morning and again over lunch at the White House, along with his US counterpart Susan Schwab and José Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission.

The role of persuader is a familiar one for Mr Mandelson, who honed his skills at influencing world leaders as consigliari to Tony Blair, the UK prime minister.

Indeed, the personal intervention of the British prime minister in recent days has been decisive in convincing Mr Bush to give the EU delegation a serious hearing, according to officials familiar with the conversations.

"I believe that President Bush wants to do a deal," Mr Mandelson told the FT. "My political judgment about him and what he has said to me in the past is that he wants to do a deal and, if anything, is slightly impatient."

Mr Mandelson believes he has a unique personal relationship with Mr Bush that will help him convince the president the trade talks have reached an "endgame" and that he must step in.

The European delegation argues that the administration must show leadership if there is to be a deal on the stalled Doha round of world trade talks.

Mr Barroso said: "The moment of truth for the Doha negotiations is fast approaching and the US holds the key to making a deal possible in 2007. The alternative – a delay of several years – would come at a high price for all."

The delegation believes Mr Bush will work for a breakthrough, not least to give some gloss to his international "legacy" – a record dominated by the Iraq crisis.

But Ms Schwab, the US trade representative, emphasised the need to make more progress on technical negotiations over agriculture. "I think the right kind of conversations are going on. Are we there yet? No, not yet," she said.

There has also been no clear message from the Bush administration to its allies in the business community – or to US lawmakers – that a deal is imminent.

This calls into question the optimistic assessment of Mr Mandelson, whose own reputation and legacy are linked to the outcome of the Doha negotiations. It also leaves an extraordinarily small window for a deal to be reached before the president's special fast-track trade negotiating powers expire in the summer.

But Mr Mandelson insists: "My impression is that the Bush administration has arrived at a view that a deal is doable and they want to do it. That is what this is about."

Analysts said a breakthrough on the Doha development round would be a catalyst for US trade policy and could lead to the new Democrat-dominated Congress extending the president's special trade promotion authority. Both US and EU trade negotiators argue that the new Congress has not significantly lessened the chance of a deal.

Mr Mandelson said the European side would also go "as close as possible" to the demands made by the G20 group of developing nations in cutting EU farm subsidies and tariffs. He urged the US to do the same to encourage developing countries to open their own markets to industrial products and services.

"If we fall too far below the developing countries' demands in agriculture we will have fewer benefits to take home to our respective constituencies to go along with a deal," he said.

Sceptics argue that there are simply not enough political incentives for the key countries to make the necessary compromises. Calman Cohen, an influential US trade analyst, said: "The components of a deal are in place. The outstanding considerations are political."

Nurturing Our Most Important Relationship (WSJ)

By Matthias Wissmann

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

BERLIN -- The European Union, the United States and Canada jointly account for almost 60% of global GDP, making them the world's largest economic region. Yet there is still a great deal of untapped potential in bilateral economic relations between the EU and its trans-Atlantic partners. Nontariff barriers to trade still exist in many areas of economic activity, and removing them would make everyone on both sides of the ocean richer.

With this in mind, German Chancellor Angela Merkel has made the creation of a single trans-Atlantic market a priority of our country's European Union presidency. In her visit to Washington last week, she stressed that Europe and North America have more in common with one another than with any other region, but that these shared values and interests must be nurtured and cannot be reduced to the traditional bonds of common security interests.

Numerous industries would benefit from stronger ties between our two regions. Recent studies indicate, for instance, that a fully open aviation market would increase the output of that industry as a whole -- airlines, aircraft manufacturers, suppliers and airports -- by $9 billion a year. Likewise, coordination of the securities market would reduce transaction costs by 60%. Greater coordination would lead to harmonization of the regulations of International Financial Reporting Standards (IFRS) and Generally Accepted Accounting Principles (GAAP) as well as easier access to U.S. stock exchanges. Divergent standards apply in many other fields, to the detriment of both the EU and the U.S. The most prominent examples are technical requirements in the automotive industry, such as safety and environmental standards or costly testing and approval procedures; the lack of coordination in the fight against corruption and in the protection of intellectual property; provisions of antitrust legislation and energy policy; rules governing the supervision of stock exchanges; and interpretations of the concept of liability.

A lack of political support at the highest level and hence a lack of public awareness and of transparency have led to the failure of many previous Euro-American agreements to bear tangible fruit.

Strengthening trans-Atlantic ties need not come at the expense of trade with the rest of the world. While the primary purpose of integrating our markets would be to strengthen European, American and Canadian businesses, we would plan from the outset to allow for the subsequent accession of other countries or trading blocs. Thus, other nations should not perceive this as a situation in which the Western economic powers are "ganging up" against them or trying to shut them out of our markets. Such protectionism would be counterproductive -- particularly for Germany, the world's leading exporter. Barriers against the emerging Asian markets would slow down the wage growth that has already begun in that part of the world. Globalization, already a formidable challenge that offers great potential rewards for the trans-Atlantic partners, would become even more difficult. This is precisely what we want to avoid.

The economic areas on each side of the Atlantic are confronted by a number of unique issues and problems. For this reason, it is important that our unwavering commitment to the World Trade Organization framework should be accompanied by reinforcement of our relations with Canada and the U.S. A single trans-Atlantic market would have the potential to lend fresh impetus to the multilateral negotiations. A Euro-American trade system based on common standards could serve as a new engine for the global economy. Closer cooperation between North America and the EU could establish new benchmarks in other areas, too. We need only think of efforts to protect the global climate or cooperation in the provision of development aid. An agreement concluded on the basis of these conditions would be quite different from a free-trade agreement in the traditional sense. Only 10% to 20% of the negotiating agenda would be devoted to the usual trade barriers such as customs duties. Instead, we could grasp the opportunity to secure world-wide acceptance and application of our standards.

The present situation bodes well for this initiative. The Democratic Party emerged strengthened from the recent elections in the U.S. Although at first sight this seems like a victory for protectionist tendencies, it was the Democrats who, some years ago, developed the idea of closer economic relations between the U.S. and the EU. This idea could attract a cross-party consensus of Democrats and moderate Republicans. On the European side, Germany's dual presidency of the EU and the G-8 offers an excellent basis to kick-start the creation of a single trans-Atlantic market at the EU-U.S. summit in May. The agenda is ambitious. Common legal standards must be created in two steps: first in specific areas of activity (such as developing compatible regulatory procedures, transparency in decision making and convergence of IFRS and GAAP) by 2010 and then across the board by about 2015.

Through its commitment as a founding member of the European Community 50 years ago, Germany has already played a crucial part in the creation of a successful economic area. There is nothing to prevent us from applying the successful model of the single European market in the trans-Atlantic context.

Mr. Wissmann is a member of the German Bundestag from the Christian Democratic party and chairman of its committee on the affairs of the European Union.

Washington Faces Challenge Over Climate (FT)

By George Parker And Andrew Bounds

Financial Times, January 8, 2007

George W. Bush, the US president, will on Monday be challenged to join the fight against climate change as Europe embarks on a "new industrial revolution" aimed at cutting the continent's greenhouse gas emissions by 20 per cent.

José Manuel Barroso, the European Commission president, will use his visit to the White House on Monday to give Mr Bush a preview of a new EU energy policy designed to put the bloc at the forefront of energy efficiency and use of renewables.

Mr Barroso will argue that Europe and America have a joint economic interest in cutting energy use and to reduce their dependence on imported oil and gas.

Although final details of the EU energy package will be finalised on Wednesday, Mr Barroso's aides say he will tell Mr Bush that Europe should aim to cut greenhouse gas emissions in 2020 by at least 20 per cent from their 1990 levels.

The European Commission will also propose a big increase in the bloc's use of renewable energy, a rise from under seven per cent of today's energy mix to about 20 per cent by 2020. A draft Commission paper acknowledges that Europe is failing to meet its existing targets for renewables, and some will be sceptical about whether member states have the political will to go even further.

The paper also says that the shift to renewables could be expensive, costing the EU an average $23.4bn (€18bn) a year if oil costs $48 a barrel in 2020. But higher oil prices and the cost of carbon trading would cut that sum to "practically nothing".

"The economic case for taking action to manage climate change is beyond dispute," Mr Barroso said before leaving for Washington. "In this area we have much to gain, despite our differences."

The US has not ratified the Kyoto treaty on climate change, and Mr Bush has a record of scepticism on the issue, but Mr Barroso's aides claim the former's tone has changed in recent months.

Mr Barroso will also raise raise the issue with Nancy Pelosi, the new Democratic speaker of the House of Representatives, who said last week she would work for "a new America that declares our energy independence, promotes domestic sources of renewable energy, and combats climate change".

Mr Barroso's energy package – which has to be approved by all EU member states – also aims to boost competition in Europe's internal energy market by tackling the dominant position of big national power companies.

A majority of Mr Barroso's Commission colleagues support the forced ownership "unbundling" of operators such as Eon and RWE of Germany and EdF of France, arguing that companies which generate and sell electricity should not own supply networks.

Although this is likely to emerge as the Commission's preferred option, it is almost certain to be rejected by France and Germany when the package is presented at an EU summit in March.

Mr Barroso has ordered a second compromise option to be drawn up, where big companies would retain ownership of the network assets, but they would be handed to an "independent service operator", responsible for the grid's operation and development. Beefed-up regulation would accompany the measure.

China Cashes In On Global Warming (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

Critics Fret Lucrative Carbon Credits Hurt Clean-Energy Efforts

China is turning its environmental problems into a shrewdly managed financial asset, capitalizing on corporate and governmental efforts to curb global warming. How much China's actions will do for the atmosphere remains an open question.

Concerns about the world's rising temperature have prompted many industrialized countries to cap the amount of carbon dioxide and other global-warming gases companies can emit. One way companies can comply is by bankrolling emission-cutting projects in the developing world, where such projects often are cheaper than back home. In return, the Western companies receive "carbon credits" that essentially allow them to continue to emit greenhouse gases themselves.

The credits, which can be bought and sold, have led to a burgeoning global "carbon market." The World Bank, a major player in the market, estimates the market was valued at $21.5 billion in the first three quarters of 2006, about double its value in all of 2005. China, the world's No. 2 global-warming emitter behind the U.S., has become the biggest source of developing-world carbon credits bought by Western investors, benefiting both Chinese corporations and Chinese government tax receipts.

The market has led to projects like one announced December 2005 involving two Chinese companies in Jiangsu province on China's east coast. The two will receive about $1 billion, through 2012, from a private- and public-sector consortium that includes the World Bank, utilities such as Germany's RWE AG, Deutsche Bank AG, and Japanese trading firm Mitsui & Co. The project will, through 2012, destroy about 125 million so-called CO2-equivalent tons of HFC-23, a greenhouse gas that scientists say is thousands of times more potent than CO2 and that is a byproduct of the manufacture of a common refrigerant, HCFC-22.

That means the Western investors will pay the Chinese companies roughly $8 a CO2-equivalent ton for destroying the HFC-23. That is a bargain for the Western investors, who would have to pay far more to reduce emissions back home. It also is a boon for the Chinese companies, for whom the actual cost of destroying the gas is less than $1 a CO2-equivalent ton of emissions, the metric used in the carbon market.

The deal "alleviates the carbon-emissions pressure, [and thus] does less harm to the atmosphere," said Zhang Jingyi, board secretary of one of the companies, a refrigerant-making unit of Shanghai 3F New Materials Co. "Besides, we can receive revenue from it." He said the company hasn't yet decided how it will spend the carbon revenue, though it will consider investing in other projects or paying a dividend to shareholders.

The Chinese government, meanwhile, has rolled out new policies to boost the proceeds and maximize the energy security the country gets from the new stream of foreign investment. China has mandated that only companies with a majority Chinese ownership can own projects generating carbon credits. The country also is effectively imposing minimum prices for its carbon credits, market participants say. China also is taxing the profits from the sale of the credits -- tax revenue that goes into a fund targeted to promote cleaner forms of energy.

"They're always thinking ahead all the time on this," said Neeraj Prasad, who coordinates the World Bank's carbon-market activities in East Asia and who worked with Chinese officials to set up the tax system. In setting up their carbon rules, he says, Chinese officials asked: "How much can we tax it?"

The emission-cutting projects the Chinese government says it most wants to encourage -- such as the installation of renewable-energy technology -- are taxed at 2%. The projects that Western investors most favor -- HFC-23-destruction projects like those in Jiangsu province -- are taxed at 65%.

Investors prefer the HFC-23-destruction deals because the gas's potency compared with CO2, and the relatively low cost of installing the machinery that destroys the HFC-23, means the projects spin off massive numbers of carbon credits at what amounts to rock-bottom prices. Indeed, selling the credits from HFC-23-destruction projects typically generates more profit than selling the actual refrigerant.

As a result, regulators worry that the carbon market is encouraging companies in the developing world to make more of the underlying refrigerant than they otherwise would -- so they can produce more of the global-warming gas, destroy it, and sell the credits. Such a "perverse incentive," as the United Nations calls it, would be problematic because the refrigerant itself both threatens the ozone layer and contributes to global warming.

Whether the carbon market actually is prompting more production of HFC-23 than otherwise would have occurred is unclear. Demand for the underlying refrigerant, HCFC-22, is rising along with incomes around the world, and production is expected to soar in coming years in China as well as in much of the developing world, where it isn't scheduled to be restricted by ozone-layer rules for nearly a decade. Officials with a U.N.-affiliated panel that helps govern the carbon market are studying the issue and plan to discuss it in May.

More broadly, critics worry that the HFC-23-destruction projects are siphoning Western carbon-market investment away from the kind of emission-reduction projects the market was designed to encourage: those that generate energy more cleanly, such as natural-gas-fired power plants and wind turbines.

Even some market participants involved in the HFC-23 deals say China's effective imposition of a minimum carbon-credit price makes it tougher to finance clean-energy projects, because those projects require relatively greater upfront capital, often from Western investors, who in return want to be able to buy the resulting carbon credits at a lower price. A developing country like China is "shooting [itself] in the foot" by imposing a de facto credit-price floor, says Paul Bodnar, who helps assemble carbon projects in China for Climate Change Capital, a London-based company active in the market. "Because you're discouraging precisely the kind of [clean-energy] investment that the [carbon market] was supposed to encourage."

Chinese government officials didn't respond to questions for this article. They have cited their clean-energy fund as evidence of their effort to help the environment. The World Bank's Mr. Prasad says that fund is likely to reach about $1 billion over the next few years.

China plays down HFC-23-destruction projects. "We would prefer to have more energy efficiency and renewable energy projects that could help alleviate poverty in the countryside," Lu Xuedu, deputy director of China's Office of Global Environment Affairs in the Ministry of Science and Technology, said in a statement in October.

Rules governing the carbon market say that only those chemical factories operating prior to 2001 can qualify to sell carbon credits from the destruction of HFC-23. But in November, at a U.N. global-warming conference in Nairobi, Kenya, Chinese officials asked for a change in the rules to allow new plants to generate credits, according to John Hay, a spokesman for the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, a body involved in overseeing the projects.

At the Nairobi conference, U.N.-affiliated officials considered a measure that would allow new HFC-23-destruction projects to qualify for the sale of credits, but would steer most of the revenue to a third party that could in turn spend it on environmentally beneficial projects such as switching production to another refrigerant that is less harmful. China's representatives blocked agreement, according to attendees.

PENGSHUI, China -- All his life, Qin Zhongfei has been an ardent reader, a lover of literature and an amateur poet. But the drama he lived in this little mountain town, Qin said, has taught him that putting his thoughts into verse can be dangerous in China.

"I used to write poetry all the time, but I haven't written any lately," he said with a wan smile, repeatedly wringing his hands and wiping his high forehead during a recent interview. "This was a huge disaster."

Qin, 31, spent a month in jail on criminal charges because of a poem he wrote satirizing local officials accused of corruption. He was released only after several out-of-town newspaper articles related his fate and the central government in Beijing stepped in to halt the prosecution.

What happened to Qin, a mild bureaucrat in the county education department, was by any measure an abuse of power by local authorities here in the remote and wooded hills of central China. But more broadly, it was a vivid reminder of the Communist Party's enduring determination to control information and opinion among China's 1.3 billion people.

Since the party took power in 1949 under Mao Zedong, it has maintained tight censorship over radio, television, newspapers, movies, fine arts and books, carefully selecting what Chinese are allowed to know and enjoy. Human expression, it has decreed, must follow the party's lead.

But as China has opened to the world -- and as the use of cellphones and the Internet has become more common -- the censors' mission has become more difficult.

Still, controls persist. To carry out official policy, censors ban coverage of certain stories -- Qin's was censored from television -- and force the party organ, People's Daily, to fax over the front page every night for approval. Roomfuls of technicians have been enlisted to monitor millions of computers and cut off Web sites the party judges to be dangerous to its monopoly on power or unhealthy for the morals of young Chinese.

President Hu Jintao's ascension to power more than three years ago generated hopes that information controls would loosen as part of the economic opening he has championed. But they have tightened instead. Several prominent editors have been fired over the past two years -- the most recent one last month -- for straining at censors' guidelines. According to the Committee to Protect Journalists, 30 Chinese journalists are in prison for what they wrote.

A 10-Minute Lark

Weighty matters such as freedom of expression were far from Qin's mind on a stifling hot Aug. 15 when he arose from an after-lunch nap on the faux leather gray couch in his office. The cellphone lying on his desk had just signaled the arrival of a message, he said, so he stepped over to take a look.

It was a friend making fun of the local leadership, which was embroiled in several corruption scandals. The Communist Party secretary, Ma Ping, had already come under investigation and been transferred out. The county administrator and the new party secretary were being scrutinized by a team of party inspectors sent from Chongqing, the provincial capital about 200 miles to the west.

The inspectors, it seemed, had their work cut out for them. The half-finished Rainbow Bridge arced over the Wu River but never reached the other side. A lot of money was appropriated for the new Baiyun Middle School, but somehow construction never started. The Tiger's Mouth hotel, with a view over the dramatic Wu River gorge, was an incomplete shell with no sign it would ever be completed.

So to while away the afternoon, Qin took his friend's comments and turned them into a satirical poem, full of puns and comical allusions. "The horse has run far away," it began, making a pun on Ma's departure as secretary and the fact that his family name can mean "horse." Zhou Wei, the county administrator, was singled out for his name's similarity to the Chinese word for Viagra. Lan Qinghua, the new secretary, also got roasted with a pun that turned his name into "incompetent and gutless."

"Look at Pengshui County today," the poem went on. "It's full of foul air and conflicts between officials and the public cannot be halted."

Qin's friends acknowledged that the verse was not great literature. The young bureaucrat had always displayed literary ambitions that may have been greater than his talent, they joked.

Qin himself described the composition as more of a lark than serious poetry. "It only took 10 minutes," he said. "I didn't think it would be such a big deal."

DOJ_NMG_0113154

But then Qin did something that would turn it into a big deal. He transmitted the poem to the cellphones of a half-dozen friends. They in turn transmitted it to their friends, in a widening circle. Eventually it ended up in the cellphone of Zhang Fu'An, chairman of Pengshui County's local People's Congress. Outraged, he took it to the county administrator, who was equally upset and asked the Public Security Bureau to identify the author.

The security sleuths interrogated Qin's friends and backtracked cellphone messages for two weeks, eventually tracing the offensive poem to Qin. At about 5 p.m. Aug. 31, two policemen stepped into Qin's office on the sixth floor of the county Education Committee building and confronted the poet.

Qin, his black hair carefully combed down and his wire-rim glasses in place as always, at first denied he was the author, according to Li Xingchen, a Chongqing journalist who investigated the case. The two police officers left to check with their superiors, Li said, but returned within 10 minutes.

"We know it's you," they said, and Qin confessed.'Modern-Day Word Crime'

The policemen hauled Qin to the station to be interrogated. By the next day, he was detained on suspicion of criminal libel, which carries a penalty of up to three years in prison. His wife, Chen Qiong, was advised to get him an attorney. The office of the procurator filed formal charges Sept. 11, and Qin's office, cellphone and computer were searched for incriminating evidence.

The case, meanwhile, had struck a journalistic nerve with Li. He wrote an article for a blog denouncing Qin's treatment as "a modern-day word crime," harking back to a much-ridiculed Qing dynasty practice of jailing writers who tripped over the intricate Mandarin language of the time.

The historical reference caught people's fancy across the country. Internet comment flourished. A Hong Kong newspaper, not subject to the mainland's censorship rules, published the first article. Then mainland newspapers took up the dare; several carried their own accounts. Eventually, even a Web site run by the official People's Daily allowed someone to post an article.

"The thing got bigger and bigger," recalled Li, a writer for a Chongqing real estate magazine who has resolved for 2007 to write a book on his ideas for improving China.

In Chongqing, the provincial capital that administers Pengshui, authorities were becoming increasingly embarrassed. The Chongqing Propaganda Department ordered an investigation and, true to its mission, banned broadcast stations and newspapers in the Chongqing area from reporting on the fuss.

But the leaders of Pengshui were not to be deterred. The Propaganda Department refused to explain its determination to prosecute Qin, although Meng Dehua, a deputy party secretary, had earlier told reporters the poem could demoralize county workers if its author went unpunished. So the Public Security Bureau went to the People's Court here in the county seat Sept. 27 and asked for a quick conviction. The judge responded that there was no case. So the Public Security Bureau appealed to the No. 4 Intermediate Court in Chongqing. It got the same response: No case.

Twice frustrated, police offered to release Qin on bail but without dropping the charges. On his attorney's advice, Qin at first refused, demanding to be tried or exonerated. But eventually, he agreed to be released under the guarantee of a local middle school principal and distant relative. On Sept. 30, he walked out of jail and into the spotlight's glare.

By then, several Chinese newspapers and magazines with a national readership had weighed in with lengthy reports after visiting Pengshui. Even a magazine sponsored by the official New China News Agency had a story.

"You have become a famous international criminal," a co-worker joked to Qin.

Distressed by the furor, local police notified Qin that he should again get an attorney, implying that the case was still alive and that he could be arrested again if the reporters kept coming.

For his part, Qin, shaken by his time in jail, was trying without much success to resume his life as a quiet bureaucrat and father of a 5-year-old boy.

By the middle of October, according to a source in Chongqing, the central government sent an order to the Chongqing Communist Party secretariat saying the Pengshui problem should be fixed, and right away. Backing up the order, the party's Central Discipline Inspection Commission sent a team to Pengshui to look into the matter.

Feeling the heat, authorities informed Qin on Oct. 23 that the charges had been dropped and told him he could apply for compensation for the time he spent behind bars. The compensation, about $280, was handed over even before Qin had time to apply for it.

"It's impossible for someone who has experienced such a big thing, something that affected my life and work so much -- after that, it's impossible not to have feelings about this," Qin said, wearing a brown striped suit along with a blue plaid shirt and matching tie to receive a foreign journalist.

"But I just don't want to go into it," he added. "The thing is, I think, really, I wish you would go to the Propaganda Department and ask them. I hope you understand my problem."

Behind Bombs, Signs Of A Turbulent Year For Thailand (NYT)

By Seth Mydans

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

BANGKOK, Jan. 6 — A string of lethal bombs that disrupted New Year's celebrations here has signaled the start of a difficult year for Thailand as entrenched elites struggle for control of the country's future.

It is still unclear who set the bombs, which killed three people and wounded more than 40 before and after the New Year's Eve fireworks.

But the message they sent to Thais was that a showdown is likely in the coming months between the ruling military junta and the opponents it unseated in a coup more than three months ago.

"The country is going to be in commotion," said Surin Pitsuwan, a former foreign minister who is no longer in the government. "Old elements will certainly regroup. I think the ruling group has been jolted into a new realization that things are not going to be as calm as they thought."

A struggle for power that began with street demonstrations more than a year ago appears to be resurfacing after pausing for breath after the nonviolent coup on Sept. 19 ended the five-year tenure of Thaksin Shinawatra as prime minister.

It had seemed an almost painless, minimalist coup with the stated intention of setting Thailand back on the track of democracy, which Mr. Thaksin had been systematically undermining.

But the leaders of the coup, treading softly in an attempt to stay within the law — once they had seized power by force — had left Mr. Thaksin's supporters free to regroup and plot a comeback.

On Friday, the military-appointed prime minister, Gen. Surayud Chulanont, warned of a dangerous time ahead and told government ministries and the public to be alert for possible violence.

"We have to watch out and take care of places and our own safety for a certain period of time, at least the next one to two months," he said. He did not explain the time frame, but political tensions are not likely to dissipate so quickly.

Mr. Thaksin was abroad at the time of the coup, but he appears determined to return, and his network of patronage and power still permeates the country, from village headmen to the highest levels of government, the police and the business community.

Since it took power, the junta has increased its military readiness and warned of what it calls "undercurrents" of opposition from Mr. Thaksin's backers.

The disruptions caused by the coup have created a range of potential enemies as well as openings for opportunistic political forces.

Speculation about the people behind the bombs includes not only Mr. Thaksin's supporters but also other political groups; the police, who formed part of his base of power; disaffected soldiers; and even feuding members of the junta and the civilian government it appointed. Most analysts doubt that Muslim insurgents from southern Thailand were involved.

The new sense of crisis began with the dawn of the new year with accusations and insinuations, then a swarm of bomb threats, then troop deployments "to provide security," then a tense round of rumors of a coup within a coup, which a chorus of military men strongly denied.

Defense Minister Boonrawd Somtas said Friday, "The investigators have concluded that the bombers were men in uniform, both green and khaki," the colors worn by the military and the police.

General Surayut said those who planted the bombs and spread the coup rumors were aiming to create "a state of confusion and chaos" that would destabilize the government.

After seizing power, the junta appointed a civilian government and promised to produce a new constitution and to return the country to democratic rule with elections late this year.

But the democratizing trend in Thailand that reached its peak in 1997 with the adoption of a liberal Constitution could now be in decline for some time to come.

The decline began with Mr. Thaksin, who manipulated the Constitution to increase his power. He seized personal control of both its checks and its balances, packing government commissions and the Senate with his supporters while intimidating the press and marginalizing independent agencies.

Now there is concern that the country's military rulers may seek to maintain some form of power. They have sent signals that the new constitution may offer fewer freedoms and more limitations than the one it is to replace.

At the moment, though, the country's leaders are being criticized for being too scrupulous.

They have not seized the assets of Mr. Thaksin, a telecommunications tycoon whose billions have been one of his tools of power; they have not revoked his diplomatic passport; they have not brought corruption charges against him; and they have left his major supporters free to reorganize and plan.

"To me, the bombs show that the coup has gone wrong," said Thitinan Pongsudhirak, director of the Institute of Security and International Studies at Chulalongkorn University. "They indicate that the military has lost control, has not been able to consolidate and demonstrate their rationale. The coup succeeded in ousting Thaksin but not much else."

On the battlefield, the generals' efforts to contain the southern insurgency have been met by increased violence.

In governing they have stumbled over proposed regulations involving liquor sales and a lottery.

On the economic front they have been condemned by foreign investors and bankers for causing a stock market crash in mid-December when they imposed and then modified strict currency controls.

In their attempts to address corruption, a chief rationale for the coup, they are facing a stubborn bureaucracy that is heavy with Thaksin appointees and is prepared to wait them out.

In their stated aim to promote national reconciliation, the generals' power grab seems only to have made things worse.

One concern among political analysts and diplomats is that the bomb attacks could lead to a harsher form of military rule and could delay the return to democracy.

The challenge to those in power, analysts say, is to reassert themselves as energetic managers and keepers of the peace without resorting to the heavy-handed measures more typical of military juntas.

But some members of the junta have let it be known that they are chafing at this slow pace and may already feel, in the words of Sunai Phasuk, a political analyst with the Human Rights Watch monitoring group, that "the time for being a gentleman is up."

Happily Ever AAFTA (WSJ)

By Robert B. Zoellick

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

This year President Bush and the Democratic-led Congress should launch a new Association of American Free Trade Agreements (AAFTA). The AAFTA could shape the future of the Western Hemisphere, while offering a new foreign and economic policy design that combines trade, open societies, development and democracy. In concert with successful immigration reform, the AAFTA would signal to the Americas that, despite the trials of war and Asia's rising economic influence, U.S. global strategy must have a hemispheric foundation.

Successful and sustainable international strategies must be constructed across administrations. Ronald Reagan called for free trade throughout the Americas, opened U.S. markets to our Caribbean neighbors, and completed an FTA with Canada. George H.W. Bush completed negotiations for a North American FTA, offered trade preferences to the Andean countries, negotiated peace in Central America, and freed Panama. Bill Clinton secured the passage of Nafta, launched work on a Free Trade Area of the Americas, and backed Plan Colombia.

George W. Bush enacted FTAs with Chile, the five states of Central America and the Dominican Republic. He also completed FTAs with Colombia, Peru and Panama. If Congress passes these agreements, the U.S. will finally have an unbroken line of free trade partners stretching from Alaska to the tip of South America. Not counting the U.S., this free trade assembly would comprise two-thirds of both the population and GDP of the Americas.

The AAFTA would draw together these 13 partners to build on the gains of free trade. It could also include the island states of the Caribbean Basin Trade Partnership Act. Starting with a small secretariat, perhaps in Miami, the AAFTA should advance hemispheric economic integration; link development and democracy with trade and aid; improve working and environmental conditions; and continue to pursue the goal of free trade throughout the hemisphere. It might even foster cooperation in the WTO's global trade negotiations. The AAFTA might be connected to an academic center, which could combine research and practice through an association among universities in the Americas.

The AAFTA could promote the business of trade by helping the private sector learn how to use FTAs, while encouraging business feedback that identifies impediments -- such as customs complications, regulatory red tape, the lack of financial, energy or other services, and infrastructure problems. It might use technology to create a virtual network of business opportunities, especially for small business.

Moreover the AAFTA should concretely demonstrate how aid and trade can be mutually supportive. U.S. Millennium Challenge Corporation grants are already enabling Central American countries to invest in physical and legal infrastructure matched to trade expansion. The U.S. Overseas Private Investment Corporation, Ex-Im Bank and Trade and Development Agency programs could be integrated, too. AID projects for labor and the environment could promote core standards, best practices, benchmarking and corporate social responsibility projects. The Inter-American Development Bank, a leader in connecting aid and trade, might help with grants and loans to strengthen small business, the economic empowerment of indigenous communities, and education -- all connected to open societies in a global economy. Finally, over time the AAFTA partners might examine how the various FTAs could be knitted together, although these steps would likely require new congressional action.

The U.S. cannot afford to lose interest in its own neighborhood. The pied pipers of populism in Latin America are taking advantage of the genuine frustrations, especially in indigenous communities, of people who have not been able to climb the ladder of opportunity. We should not let these populists dictate the debate. We already have seen that electorates in Mexico, Colombia, Peru, Central America and the Dominican Republic have recognized that trade with the U.S. offers jobs and hope. We need to build on that foundation with results that link trade, aid, good governance, property rights and better working and environmental conditions. Even where populists prevailed, substantial constituencies who view the U.S. as an economic partner have constrained backward policies.

To launch the AAFTA, the president and the congressional leadership must stand up to America's populist protectionists, too. The new chairmen of the House Ways and Means and Senate Finance Committees, Charles Rangel and Max Baucus, have signaled that trade may offer the best economic policy opportunity to work with the president. As Finance Committee Chair in 2001-02, Sen. Baucus worked closely with Sen. Grassley to authorize the negotiations for these FTAs. Rangel helped push preferential trade for Africa and the Caribbean. In response to urgings from New Democrats and Blue Dogs, the U.S. is the only country that includes mutual labor and environmental commitments in its FTAs, backed by enforcement. The administration worked with the International Labor Organization (ILO) and its developing country partners to check their laws with core ILO standards. In cooperation with Sen. Baucus, the administration developed special environmental review and comment procedures for Cafta, strengthening the role of local NGOs. The AAFTA offers more: an opportunity to design labor and environmental partnerships that would complement the rules in the FTAs. The alternative -- ignoring Latin America or defeating FTAs to court economic isolationists -- would leave the causes of workers and the environment to unlikely friends: poverty and populism.

The president and Congress are understandably absorbed by the dangers of war. But the United States cannot afford to ignore the rest of the world. The U.S. trade agenda has turned out to be our strongest lifeline to developing democracies in the Americas. It is not enough. With the passage of the FTAs with Colombia, Peru and Panama, the president and the Congress could use the free trade framework to spur an ongoing dynamic for development and democracy. Just as Alexander Hamilton created a self-reinforcing financial system that vitalized America to deal with future challenges, the AAFTA would create a working, adaptable mechanism that would strengthen the Americas in the 21st century.

Coca Democracy (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

Evo Morales is an anti-American extremist who wants to turn Bolivia into another Venezuela. That naturally alarms Washington, but not enough to halt its war on drugs, which is aiding the president -- and leader of Bolivia's coca-growing peasant movement -- in his bid to become a dictator.

In a recent interview with the Bolivian Catholic radio station Fides, Mr. Morales explained that in 2003, when he was at a conference in Havana, Fidel Castro told him "not to stage an armed uprising" but to "make transformations, democratic revolutions, what [Venezuelan President Hugo] Chávez is doing."

The process Fidel advised requires the slow dismantling of institutions that act as checks on the executive while maintaining the guise of democracy. This calls for healthy poll numbers even while the rule of law is being trampled. Mr. Chávez had oil revenues to keep the masses happy while he put a noose around democracy. But Evo isn't so fortunate and he can't push through a constitutional coup without popular backing. So to generate support he has relied heavily on his defense of coca growers against a U.S. policy that presses countries in Latin America to destroy their crops.

Since his inauguration last January Mr. Morales has been dutifully complying with the Cuban dictator's instructions. He has purged the military leadership, broken contracts with energy investors to signal his control over the sector, and pushed through an election for a constituent assembly that is charged with rewriting the highest law of the land.

So far so good. But the assembly election didn't turn out the way he had hoped. In the event, Mr. Morales's Movement Toward Socialism (MAS) party won only 53% of the seats. Since the law requires a two-thirds majority to approve the new document, the president's party is looking at compromise with his political opponents in the drafting process.

Apparently this is the sort of thing Fidel did not counsel. So now the Morales government is insisting that ratification of the new constitution should require only a simple majority vote in the assembly or a simple majority in a national referendum.

To win on this point, Mr. Morales will have to run roughshod over the law and he has already begun. Over the Christmas holiday he unilaterally named four new justices to the Supreme Court's 12-seat bench. The president says these are legal recess appointments, but the opposition is crying foul because the MAS-controlled congress never initiated the nomination process that would have safeguarded the independence of the court. Bolivian democrats are worried that Mr. Morales will also try to alter the makeup of the constitutional court and the electoral council to favor his own objectives.

Things looks grim for democrats who believe that Mr. Morales is trying to remake the constitution in the image and likeness of Mr. Chávez's Venezuela, but they're not going down without a fight.

The center of the opposition movement is based in the energy-rich, agricultural lowlands of the eastern part of the country, where there is a long history of agitation in favor of more decentralized government. The Morales presidency, with its promise to expropriate and redistribute land, its heavy-handed intervention in the natural gas sector, and now its attempt at a constitutional coup, has heightened that sentiment and provoked a strong backlash against La Paz. In July, when Bolivians voted on the constitutional assembly, they also answered another ballot question regarding departmental (state) autonomy. In Santa Cruz, Pando, Beni and Tarija, autonomy won hands down.

More recently the east took to the streets. On Dec. 15 the opposition organized a "townhall meeting" in Bolivia's largest city, Santa Cruz, to rally against Mr. Morales's power grab. Pro-Morales supporters blockaded a highway outside of the city so that buses carrying protestors could not get through. As many as 60 people were injured and most of the buses had to turn back. But the rally was a success. An estimated 800,000 people congregated under the city's Christ the Redeemer statue to demand that a new constitution be ratified only with a two-thirds vote in the assembly, and that the call for autonomy be respected.

Mr. Morales, who badly needs to maintain the appearance of public support so that the international community tolerates his takeover, had to be embarrassed by this outpouring of democratic opposition. He is trying to spin the constitutional crisis as a confrontation between races and economic classes. But he has to worry about places like the poor and largely indigenous city of

El Alto, just above La Paz, where there is evidence to suggest that many who voted for him are unhappy with his unlawful intervention in the constitutional process and growing impatient with his failure to deliver on economic promises.

This is where U.S. drug policy comes in. Railing against the Yankees who want to destroy peasant income has proven extremely effective in keeping the Morales base -- the country's indigenous coca growers who brought him to power -- energized and his numbers afloat.

He reaffirmed this last month. As his opposition swelled he suddenly announced that he would authorize a near doubling of the number of hectares that may legally produce coca. Then last week he inaugurated a coca industrialization plant in the province of Cochabamba, financed by his government along with Cuba and Venezuela. According to press reports, Mr. Morales told the Cochabamba crowd that coca "never killed anyone" and that the U.S. "should have a law to do away with drug addicts."

Mr. Morales shouldn't wish too hard for that. If Washington policy makers ever decide to tackle the demand for cocaine and stop blaming supply, Mr. Morales's political career would be in jeopardy.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Conservatives Decry Terror Laws' Impact On Refugees (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

Conservatives who supported President Bush's reelection have joined liberal groups in expressing outrage over his administration's broad use of anti-terrorism laws to reject asylum for thousands of people seeking refuge from religious, ethnic and political persecution.

The critics say the administration's interpretation of provisions mandating denial of asylum to individuals who give "material support" to terrorist groups is so broad that foreigners who fought alongside U.S. forces in wars such as Vietnam can be denied asylum on the grounds that they provided aid to terrorists.

Advocates for refugees add that people who were forced to aid terrorist fighters at gunpoint could be labeled as supporters and turned away; such cases include a nurse who was abducted and told to treat a guerrilla fighter in Colombia and a woman in Liberia who said her father was killed and she was raped and forced to stand by as rebels occupied her home for several days.

"This is so indefensible," said Michael Horowitz, a fellow at the conservative Hudson Institute and a former lawyer in the Reagan administration. "It is causing heroes who fought for the United States to be afraid of being deported."

"It's outrageous," said Barrett Duke, vice president of public policy for the Southern Baptist Convention's Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission. "I think it's essentially a reaction of fear to the current terrorist danger." The language in the laws, he added, is "a knee-jerk reaction."

Gary L. Bauer, president of American Values, a conservative public policy group, said the anti-terrorism thrust of laws such as the USA Patriot Act and the Real ID Act is supported by most conservatives, "but the enforcement of it has lapsed into ludicrousy. The concept of material support is being distorted, and even the definition of the term 'terrorism' is being turned on its ear."

The number of individuals granted asylum since 2001 has fallen steadily, from 39,641 then to 25,257 last year, according to the Department of Homeland Security. The number of refugee arrivals has fluctuated since 2001, from a high of 68,925 that year to 28,304 in 2003 to 53,738 last year. But it has not risen as high as the 72,000 who were allowed into the country the year before the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Vager Vang, 63, is one of thousands of ethnic Hmong refugees in the United States who is hoping to gain legal residency with his green-card application. Vang fought in Laos alongside U.S. forces during the Vietnam War and helped rescue an American pilot who was shot down there.

But according to some interpretations of the Patriot Act, Vang is a former terrorist who fought against the communist Laotian government. Although his admission that he fought with Americans helped him gain refugee status in the United States in 1999, it may have hindered his green-card application after Sept. 11, 2001. The application has stalled at the Department of Homeland Security, and Fresno Interdenominational Refugee Ministries, the California group that helped him fill it out, is suspicious.

"It's not like DHS is telling people, saying, 'We're holding up your green-card application because you may have provided material support to terrorists,' " said Sophia DeWitt, a project director for the ministry. "They're just not communicating anything at all."

In central Florida, Lam Kim, 47, is fighting deportation. Kim fled Burma after soldiers ransacked her parents' house and found letters from the Chin National Front thanking her for a donation. The organization, which the Bush administration has labeled a terrorist group, is fighting against the Burmese military junta.

Kim, who uses a pseudonym, said she gave the money to help the group feed people in her ethnic group. She was jailed for two years after arriving in the United States in 2004, and her asylum request was rejected by an immigration judge. "If I go back to Burma," she said softly over the telephone, "I have to give my life. I am not terrorist. I say it not fair."

A Colombian nurse living in California who declined to give her name said she was abducted by the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) outside Bogota and forced to treat one of their soldiers. She fled Colombia with her daughter in 2000 after her life was threatened in a note to her family. Her asylum request was rejected last year.

"I had no option," she said. "What will happen if I go back? I will be killed. They look for people. They know when they arrive at the airport. They have names."

Critics say that during the past two years, the Homeland Security Department has refused requests to broaden waivers that would have opened doors to people such as Hmong and Montagnard fighters who helped the United States in Vietnam and asylum-seekers such as Kim.

Horowitz, of the Hudson Institute, said he hopes Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), an opponent of "material support" provisions who has said the administration's definition of terrorists is a "catch-all," is serious about putting the issue on his agenda and holding hearings within the next two months. Leahy's spokeswoman said last week that the issue is high on his agenda.

"The key to ending these policies is in the hands of the new Democratic majority" in the House and Senate, Horowitz said. "I do not believe this is a sustainable policy."

Bauer, the American Values president, agreed, saying he plans to force the issue. "I've got a list of 150,000 conservative activists I e-mail," he said. "We're going to elevate it now as something we think time is long overdue for action."

If there are hearings in the Senate, Paul Rosenzweig, chairman of a Homeland Security advisory committee, could be called to testify. He said he is prepared to answer questions about why the department has not acted on complaints to grant waivers to people who, some say, clearly are not terrorists.

"I will completely own up to wishing we had done more, but it's a big department," he said. In the past year, the department broadened a waiver that allowed more ethnic Burmese refugees into the country, and it is in the process of broadening a waiver for Hmong and Montagnard guerrillas who fought for the United States.

The United States must be careful to not allow terrorists into the country, while fulfilling its promise to harbor the persecuted, Rosenzweig said. "It's a difficult problem," he said. "It isn't as easy as some might wish to balance the security risks that come with this and the humanitarian impulse."

Rosenzweig said that officials at the Homeland Security, Justice and State departments met with advocates about the waivers and that the meetings went well.

But few of the advocates agreed. "I wouldn't say the meetings went well," said Jennifer Daskal, a program director for Human Rights Watch. "The administration presented a proposal that would expand the waiver and basically said, 'Trust us.' It's been two years, and the administration hasn't done a whole lot to instill confidence."

Melanie Nezer, an attorney for the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society, said, "They're proposing to broaden the waiver, but the waiver hasn't worked." While the administration grants waivers to ethnic Burmese in refugee camps outside the country, she said, it rejects the applications of persecuted Burmese already in the United States.

"It's an unbelievable problem because it's absurd," Nezer said.

Men In Jordan Charged With Attack Plots (AP)

AP, January 8, 2007

Two men were charged Sunday with plotting attacks against Americans living in Jordan.

Prosecutors indicted Mohammed Shehada, 25, a Jordanian, and Sameeh al-Hotari, 25, who was born in Kuwait, for conspiracy to carry out terrorist attacks and possession of an automatic weapon, a Kalashnikov.

Shehada and al-Hotari, who were in police custody, allegedly decided to avenge Muslims "who suffer from the Americans" and planned to kill an American man who lived in a suburb of the Jordanian capital, Amman. The indictment did not identify the American.

The two suspects began watching the American in August but were arrested before they could try to kill him, the indictment said.

The two men were accused of plotting to kill other Americans, but indictment did not give specifics about those plans.

There was no information about attorneys for the two men, and a trial date has not been set.

First Wiretapping, Now Letter-opening? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

THE BUSH administration seems determined to raise the specter of surveillance over every means of communication within the United States. Not content to monitor selected phone calls and e-mails in secret, it recently hinted that letters and packages may be opened without a search warrant too.

The disclosure came in yet another presidential "signing statement," in which President Bush gives his opinion about the legislation on his desk. This one accompanied the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act — a bill to modernize how the Postal Service sets rates, promotes competition with private carriers and shores up funding for its employee retirement benefits.

In his statement, Bush seemed to assert a broader right to do warrantless mail searches than postal regulations allow. The executive branch, he said, would interpret the section on mail privacy "in a manner consistent, to the maximum extent permissible, with the need to conduct searches in exigent circumstances … and the need for physical searches specifically authorized by law for foreign intelligence collection."

Befuddled, some privacy advocates started asking why the White House felt compelled to assert these surveillance powers when the issue wasn't even on the table. Was Bush trying to provide cover for another secret monitoring program? Was he laying the groundwork for a new one? Was he prodding balky government agents into being more aggressive on mail searches?

Suspicions have undoubtedly been heightened because of the administration's aggressive use of signing statements to defend executive-branch prerogatives, even when they're not at issue. By late July, Bush had used them to challenge more than 800 provisions of bills he signed into law. All of his predecessors combined had challenged fewer than 600 provisions in that manner.

The White House tried to allay fears last week about mail snooping. "There is nothing new here," said spokesman Tony Snow. The statement, he said, is "merely a statement of present law and present authorities granted to the president."

On the surface, he's right. The courts have allowed searches without a warrant under "exigent circumstances," and the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act permits them in emergencies when the targets are foreign agents or terrorists.

Still, it's hard not to be suspicious of the president's position on mail privacy, given the administration's record on the issue of domestic surveillance. In the name of the "war on terror," it has taken an unusually expansive view of government power and a correspondingly restrictive view of individual privacy rights. It also has sought to redefine what constitutes a "reasonable" search, and has often done so unilaterally and in secret.

The administration may indeed be up to nothing new when it comes to mail — and that's not the least bit comforting.

Government: Out Of Our Mail (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, January 8, 2007

IN YET another power grab that whittles away our rights without a plausible justification, President Bush has given the government expanded authority to read our mail.

This White House has long signaled that it will do what it wants in the name of national security, laws be damned. It has reserved the government's right to detain and even torture suspects without due process, and has asserted for itself wide latitude to electronically eavesdrop on Americans without obtaining search warrants.

So perhaps it should surprise no one that Bush would add a "signing statement" to a postal-reform bill passed by Congress that suggests the new law allows the opening of mail that would be "otherwise sealed against inspection" for broadly defined security purposes.

Once again, the White House attempted to downplay the significance of a signing statement, insisting the president was not trying to exert any new authority. Instead, the Bush spinners said the purpose of the signing statement was to reiterate current law, which clearly does allow postal authorities to open a package suspected of containing a ticking time bomb -- the example of choice for those trying to pooh-pooh the concerns. Also, before the administration tries to trot out a red herring about wanting to intercept "letters from al Qaeda" without delay, it has every opportunity to do so under current law -- and could then apply for a warrant after the fact.

Bush has added hundreds of similarly substantive "signing statements" to legislation he has approved during his presidency. Some of his statements have unilaterally weakened, or in some cases even overturned, the intent of a bill passed by Congress. His signing statements have tempered congressional attempts to outlaw torture, limit political meddling in scientific research, protect whistle-blowers and recruit women and minorities into the intelligence services.

Before Bush took office, presidential signing statements were relatively rare and mostly limited to expressions of how an administration planned to carry out the stated intent of Congress -- not significant changes in policy.

In this case, the signing statement appears to weaken the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act's reiteration of basic protections of first-class mail from searches without court approval.

If the Bush administration believes those protections are excessive in this era of terrorism -- a highly dubious argument, considering the latitude in the law to inspect packages of suspicious nature or origin -- then it had every opportunity to raise its concerns and to propose modifications while the bill was being aired on Capitol Hill.

"Just trust us," seems to be the operative phrase of this administration.

However, history has shown the potential for government abuses in the absence of strong mail-privacy laws. Bush continues to roll back the clock -- and the Constitution -- with his signing statements.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

False Alarm Tests Miami Port's Security (MH)

By David Ovalle, Jay Weaver, Aldo Nahed And Rob Barry

The Miami Herald, January 8, 2007

What started as a potential terrorist plot at Miami-Dade's seaport Sunday morning quickly flubbed into a sobering reminder of the post 9/11 state of fear.

Initially, the story line sounded startling:

Officers stopped a Middle Eastern man driving an 18-wheel rig with mysterious cargo. Two men, the reports went, were discovered hiding in the trailer portion.

The men had tried to "slip" past security and the port was shut down, media outlets reported.

The truth, however, emerged far less threatening -- the men were not terrorists and were only hauling electrical auto parts. Ultimately, the scare was blamed on miscommunication and unfounded reports.

"We live in a different world these days, and we have to take these situations very seriously," said James Maes, assistant seaport director for safety and security.

The story unfolded on a brilliant Sunday morning as hordes of passengers flocked to the looming cruise ships at one of the nation's busiest ports.

An Iraqi-born trucker from Michigan appeared at about 8 a.m. at the port's main entrance without proper identification, police said.

The 20-year-old driver said he was alone -- at least, that's what the security guard understood -- and the truck was rerouted to another checkpoint.

"I can't tell you how this miscommunication occurred, but apparently there was some kind of miscommunication -- apparently there was a language barrier," said Miami-Dade Lt. Nancy Goldberg, a spokeswoman.

State law dictates anyone that without the proper port ID be rerouted to another checkpoint. There, Miami-Dade officers spotted the two other men, ages 28 and 29, one of whom had no ID.

The alarm was sounded.

"Based on these series of events and in an abundance of caution, we initiated security protocols that included calling in our Southeast Regional Security Task Force," Goldberg said.

That includes the FBI, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the U.S. Coast Guard, the Florida Department of Law Enforcement and U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

FBI agents questioned the men.

County and federal authorities used a gamma ray ID device to examine the blue 40-foot container, which had 22 pallets inside.

Miami-Dade's bomb squad responded. A machine called a radio isotope device, known as RID, was used to rid any notions of radioactivity inside.

"We X-rayed the container, and the contents consisted of what was manifested on the shipping documents," said Jose Ramirez, the customs agency's port director.

The cargo indeed matched its manifest: auto wiring harnesses bound for Latin America. The devices are used to help rewire electronic equipment like stereos in cars.

By 5:15 p.m., authorities stood in front of local and national reporters to stress that despite the false alarm, security procedures unfolded perfectly.

Detectives from Miami-Dade's homeland security bureau will determine if the men will face any criminal or administrative charges.

The identities of the men, two Iraqis and one Lebanese, were not released on Sunday. Their employer was unknown.

All three were legal U.S. residents -- none were on any terrorist watch lists.

At least two of the three had a criminal history, according to several law enforcement sources.

By early afternoon, reporters had flocked to a staging area near where passengers embark on cruise ships.

For some reporters, the long lines seemed an indication of ramped-up security -- it was, in fact, normal Sunday traffic.

In the ensuing hours, various authorities and sources gave differing details, adding to the confusion. Soon, rumors had made their way into news reports online and on television.

DOJ_NMG_0113166

Some outlets reported the port had closed. Others, including The Miami Herald's website, reported the discovery of two 55-gallon containers, a subtle indication of dangerous chemicals.

"There was some confusion," said Lt. Goldberg.

In the era after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, such scares are not unprecedented.

In September 2002, three medical students who made off-color remarks about 9/11 at a Georgia restaurant sparked a similar law enforcement response and media frenzy after blowing through a toll booth on Alligator Alley.

On Sunday, authorities -- as they did then -- reminded reporters that the incident proved a valuable drill.

"The security checks and balances at the port worked well and effectively. What in the past would have taken us three to four days had taken the federal, local and state authorities a few hours to investigate and resolve," Goldberg said.

By the time of the much-delayed press conference, the mood had lightened -- especially when a cruise ship horn and one from a passing car, playing the squeal of a horse, interrupted the speakers.

Herald staff writers Evan S. Benn and Luisa Yanez contributed to this report.

3 Men Held After Misunderstanding About Truck At Miami Port That Seemed Suspicious (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, January 8, 2007

The arrival of a suspicious cargo truck at the Port of Miami Sunday sparked anxiety, confusion and a flurry of rumors involving hidden passengers and possibly hazardous cargo.

Federal agencies were called in and reporters flocked to the scene. By mid-afternoon the story of a potential terrorist threat at one of the nation's busiest ports was playing on every major news network.

But at the end of the day, the security situation amounted to nothing more than a false alarm caused by miscommunication, authorities said.

"The Port of Miami is safe," Miami-Dade police Lt. Nancy Goldberg announced shortly after 5 p.m. At no time during the day was cargo or cruise traffic disrupted, she said.

The scare started at approximately 8 a.m. when a truck, ostensibly carrying auto parts, pulled into the port's main gate. The driver, a 27-year-old Iraqi national, did not have a port-issued identification card and was sent to a security office to obtain a one-day pass.

At the main gate, the driver said he was alone, according to Goldberg. However, when the truck was inspected more thoroughly, Miami-Dade police officers found two men in the cab -- a second Iraqi, 23, and a Lebanese national, 20.

The additional passengers, and the fact that one was not carrying any identification, led police to detain the men and treat the situation as a possible terrorist threat, Goldberg said.

Investigators moved the truck to the port's examination facility to be X-rayed and screened for radioactive emissions. The inspection determined the 45-foot trailer contained electronic automobile parts--just as the driver's manifest stated.

Meanwhile, agents with the Federal Bureau of Investigation spent hours interviewing the men -- two brothers and a friend, according to FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela. The names of the men, who reside legally in Dearborn, Mich., were not released.

Orihuela insisted the heightened security alert was not a case of racial profiling. "It would have been the same response regardless," she said.

After lengthy questioning, the agents concluded the men were harmless and that the day's sinister-seeming events resulted from a simple misunderstanding between the truck driver and the port security officer regarding the number of passengers in the truck.

"He was asked and he stated that he was by himself," Goldberg said.

The truck driver and passengers speak "some English," while the port employee who questioned the driver is a native Creole speaker, she said.

The driver, who worked for a Dearborn, Mich., trucking company, might also have lied initially about being alone because many trucking businesses have strict rules about extra passengers, one law enforcement official said.

The men remain under investigation by the Miami-Dade police in connection with possible criminal or administrative violations, Goldberg said.

She praised the response from local, state and federal agencies, saying it would be a mistake "to minimize" any possible threat to port security.

"We have to be alert as a country to absolutely anything because the public depends on us," she said.

Miscommunication Cited In Port Alert (NSDY/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0113167

By Kelli Kennedy, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 8, 2007

MIAMI -- Three legal immigrants in a cargo truck were detained at the Port of Miami on Sunday after a routine inspection raised concerns, but police say the incident may have stemmed in part from a language barrier.

The port's cargo area was shut down Sunday as the Miami-Dade bomb squad X-rayed the truck and scanned it for radioactive materials. Nothing unusual was found, officials said.

The men in the truck -- two Iraqis and one Lebanese national -- were still detained by local police Sunday evening, but authorities said no federal charges were expected. Officials initially said the men, all permanent U.S. residents, had been caught trying to slip past a checkpoint at the port's entrance.

A port security officer became suspicious when the truck driver could not produce proper paperwork in a routine inspection to enter the port about 8 a.m., Miami-Dade police spokeswoman Nancy Goldberg said.

The driver also indicated he was alone in the truck, though security officers found two other men in the cab, she said. The two passengers, ages 28 and 29, were a friend and a relative of the 20-year-old Iraqi driver, she said.

"Due to a miscommunication between the gate security personnel and the truck driver, we believe there was a discrepancy in the number of people in the vehicle attempting to enter the Port of Miami," Goldberg said. "This, and the fact that one of the individuals did not have any form of ID, raised our level of concern."

"Maybe it could have been a language barrier; we don't know at this point," she said.

The truck's contents -- electrical automotive parts in a 40-foot container -- matched the driver's cargo manifest, Goldberg said.

The port's cargo area was shut down Sunday as the Miami-Dade bomb squad moved the truck away from public areas of the port to X-ray and scan it for radioactive materials.

More than 20 pallets containing spools of wire and other automotive parts taken from the truck were still being scanned, but no radioactive material had been found, said Jose Ramirez, a U.S. Customs and Border Protection spokesman.

The three men remained in local police custody for questioning, Goldberg said, but had not been arrested or charged by Sunday evening.

The men do not appear on any terrorist watch list, said Barbara Gonzalez, a U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokeswoman.

The FBI and the Department of Homeland Security were called to the scene, along with federal and local law enforcers, "in an abundance of caution," Goldberg said.

The Port of Miami is among the nation's busiest. More than 3.6 million cruise ship passengers traveled through in 2005. Its seaport services more than 30 ocean carriers, which delivered more than 1 million cargo containers there in 2005.

Passengers in the normally busy cruise ship area of the port were unaware of the official bustle in the cargo area. When told of the situation, some said they thought it probably made boarding lines longer. But officials said Sunday's long lines were normal.

"I feel freaked out," said Connecticut resident Allie Tetreault, 23, who was waiting to board a Caribbean cruise when she heard about the security alert. "That's not good to hear right before you are going on vacation."

Bill Would Order All Air Cargo Screened (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — The House of Representatives could approve an aviation-security measure Tuesday that would require all cargo on passenger planes to be inspected for bombs.

The measure is part of a 277-page Democratic bill that is likely to pass in the House. Its final approval is uncertain, however, amid criticism from industry groups that warn that it could prevent quick delivery of vital goods.

Each year, U.S. passenger planes carry about 6 billion pounds of cargo, typically sent by businesses that want fast shipment. Such cargo is carried on passenger planes to speed delivery and is stored in the belly of jets along with passenger luggage.

Democrats, who took control of Congress last week, are pushing for the air cargo provision as part of a bill aiming to bolster homeland security. They say it would close a major hole in security.

Inspections are now done on only a small portion of cargo on passenger planes.

DOJ_NMG_0113168

"Passenger planes are still at the top of the terrorist target list," said Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., Congress' leading advocate for cargo inspection. "Here is a backdoor way onto planes."

Cargo aircraft, which carry about 75% of air shipments and have far fewer people on board, would not have their goods inspected.

Airlines and cargo companies say inspections would take so long that passenger planes could not carry goods that require fast delivery. That includes live seafood and other perishables, and items such as auto parts that manufacturers want brought directly to plants to avoid storage costs.

"These requirements will slow down the flow of commerce," said Brandon Fried, executive director of the Airforwarders Association, whose members move cargo from businesses to air carriers.

Airlines might cancel certain passenger routes if those flights can no longer carry cargo, said David Castelveter, spokesman for the Air Transport Association, which represents major U.S. airlines. That's because cargo shipments can provide a large portion of a flight's revenue, and a route may not be profitable without cargo.

Markey dismissed gloomy scenarios and noted that under the legislation, passenger airlines would not have to inspect all cargo until September 2009.

The Transportation Security Administration regulates air cargo largely by setting security requirements for companies that ship goods on passenger planes and inspecting those companies.

Markey's four-year push for cargo inspections has its best chance of passing now that Democrats control the House and Senate, said Fried, who told an aviation security conference last month that he vows a "massive lobbying campaign" against such cargo inspection.

Markey said he's not sure whether the Senate will retain a cargo-screening provision in its bill. House approval "will result in more pressure," he said.

On Friday, 10 groups including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce sent lawmakers a letter urging "realistic solutions" that focus inspections on high-risk shipments and encourage companies to tighten cargo security.

Sen. Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va., chairman of the Senate aviation subcommittee, has asked the TSA whether cargo can be secured without inspecting every package, his spokeswoman Wendy Morigi said. If it can't, Rockefeller "will look to see how we can realistically achieve 100% physical screening," Morigi said.

Congress And Your Security (NYT)

The new Congress is about to revisit some perilously neglected needs of homeland security, with Democrats determined to mandate inspection of all incoming sea cargo by 2012. This is an overdue protection that Republicans bottled up in the last Congress. The House, run now by the Democrats, plans swift passage of legislation requiring both stronger port security and the screening of all air cargo over the next three years.

The bipartisan commission that studied the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks criticized Congress for neglecting these vital steps. They should long ago have been antiterrorism no-brainers for the nation. The complaints of business lobbyists about undue burdens on commerce pale when compared with the havoc that would be created in the American economy if terrorists mounted another major attack.

The Senate should move quickly on these important protections. That chamber will also face a key test of whether the new Democratic majority can override the selfish regional politicking that has skewed the formula for distributing homeland security aid to states and localities. The House proposal is properly written as a risk-based formula, awarding more aid to states like New York and California and other areas where the obvious risks are greater. The question is whether senators from less populated states will again be able to treat homeland security funds as just more local pork, rather than focusing on demonstrated threats.

During last year's Congressional election campaign, the Democrats promised to deliver on the neglected proposals of the 9/11 commission. The House legislation gets only part of the way there. On the imperative need for ensuring radio compatibility between different first responders, it creates study grants for localities and states rather than imposing clear deadlines for addressing the problem and fixing it.

The legislation also sidesteps some of the 9/11 commission's most important findings about the dysfunctional intelligence apparatus. It fails to declassify the nation's costly intelligence budget — a necessary first step for understanding the murky ineptitude of this branch of government. It also makes no effort to rationalize or referee the counterproductive rivalries between the Pentagon's intelligence agencies and their civilian counterparts.

The House measure amounts to a worthy step forward, but one that does not go far enough. The new Congress should be uncompromising on the challenges of homeland security.

Politics: A White House Shuffle (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

Intelligence insiders expect recent personnel shifts to strengthen the authority of the national intelligence director, the job Congress created to improve U.S. spy operations after September 11, 2001. Last week the White House announced that the first "intelligence czar," Ambassador John Negroponte, would return to the State Department as Condoleezza Rice's deputy. His replacement: Mike McConnell, a retired Navy three-star admiral whose career path is similar to that of new CIA Director Michael Hayden, a four-star Air Force general; both men once directed the eavesdropping agency NSA. New Defense Secretary Robert Gates is expected to replace Defense Intelligence Under Secretary Stephen Cambone with another military man, retired Air Force three-star Gen. James Clapper, who headed a spy-photo agency known as NGA. "They have known each other for years and get along very well," said a CIA official, who asked not to be identified discussing an intelligence issue.

Under Negroponte, the intel czar's office was praised by both congressional and executive-branch officials for greatly improving—via its National Counterterrorism Center—the sharing among relevant agencies of intelligence reports about terror threats. But the office was criticized for slower progress in sharing intel on other subjects—including nuclear proliferation—and for establishing a new layer of bureaucracy. A big criticism was that, in the face of alleged obstruction by former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld, the intel czar's office had too little control over Pentagon intel agencies like the giant NSA. Assuming Clapper does become Pentagon intel chief, however, relations between Defense agencies and the intel czar's office may improve considerably: four intelligence officials, who asked for anonymity discussing intel issues, say that Clapper once angered Rumsfeld by telling Congress he would be comfortable if his NGA operation was moved out of Pentagon control and under direct control of the intel czar. At the time, Hayden, then chief of NSA, expressed similar sentiments.

Congress: Is A Katrina Probe On? (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

One early indication of how aggressively Capitol Hill Democrats will investigate the Bush administration—and how strongly the White House will resist—will be how vigorously the new congressional majority pursues Katrina inquiries.

Under GOP leadership, both House and Senate committees sought copies of Katrina records, but the White House declined to turn over messages between the president and his top advisers. According to a GOP investigator involved with the probe, who asked to remain anonymous discussing sensitive matters, Bush aides indicated that if Congress pressed harder, the White House was likely to claim such material was covered by executive privilege. But now that the Democrats have subpoena power, an effort to force the White House to turn over the messages is a "possibility," says a House Democratic source, who also asked to remain anonymous due to political sensitivities. Democrats have ample reason to believe such material could provide new evidence of White House bungling: former FEMA chief Michael (Brownie) Brown told NEWSWEEK that in a still-secret videoconference shortly after Katrina hit New Orleans, he warned presidential aides that 90 percent of the city was being "displaced," but was greeted with "deafening silence."

The Dems Now Have Some Dogs In The Fight (USNEWS)

By Bret Schulte

U.S. News and World Report, January 7, 2007

Democrats won a stunning victory in November, but that may have been the easy part. Now, they have to prove to voters they can stand together to get things done. But, as Republicans learned on issues like immigration, party unity can be a fleeting notion.

Veteran liberals such as House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Charles Rangel, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, hold the party's reins, but their power is likely to be tested by a group far removed from the party establishment-conservative Democrats who are flexing newfound muscle. Eighteen of 41 incoming House freshmen joined the New Democrat Coalition and/or the Blue Dog Coalition, caucuses of pro-business and fiscally conservative Democrats, respectively. Both were born in the wake of the 1994 Republican revolution. Moderate New Democrats claimed the mantle of pragmatists like Bill Clinton. Pro-technology and free trade, the New Democrats boast a few more members, but the budget-minded Blue Dogs may have more bite. Now 44 members strong, this conservative caucus looks to be a cohesive voting bloc on fiscal issues. It also claims some freshman stars, like former NFL quarterback Heath Shuler of North Carolina and former sheriff Brad Ellsworth of Indiana, both of whom won in GOP strongholds. Fourth-term Arkansas Rep. Mike Ross, cochair of the Blue Dogs, says party leaders recognize them as a "force to be reckoned with," adding, "We didn't defeat Republicans with liberal Democrats. We're in the middle ... and that's where we're trying to bring our party."

Both Pelosi and President Bush met with caucus members before Congress reconvened. Pelosi has doled out key assignments as well, putting seven Blue Dogs on the House Appropriations Committee, which controls congressional purse strings. Conservative Democrats are the driving force behind three key initiatives in Pelosi's touted 100-hour plan: implementing pay-as-you-go rules requiring Congress to offset new spending, adding transparency to the earmarking process, and promising members adequate time to review a bill before a vote.

Muscle. That's a far cry from the years when Blue Dogs operated on the fringe with hard-line members mostly from the South and Midwest. But as the federal deficit grew, so did their numbers, with members from California to New York. They still represent mostly rural regions, and while a few take liberal stands on abortion and gay marriage, most are pro-gun, pro-defense, and antiabortion. Many feel that has kept Blue Dogs from leadership positions. By contrast, New Democrat Rep. Rahm Emanuel led the party's bid to win back the House. But, in a sign of the times, he did so by recruiting Democrats more conservative than himself.

That strategy could set the stage for some testy battles with old-guard liberals now chairing key committees-not only Rangel but Rep. Henry Waxman of the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform and Rep. John Dingell of Energy and Commerce. Observers expect the biggest fights to be over pay-as-you-go rules, which are anathema to more free-spending liberals. Showdowns are possible over some key Democratic initiatives, such as halving interest rates on student loans and reforming the alternative minimum tax so it doesn't hit more middle-class families-a fix that could cost the government $50 billion to $70 billion a year. Under pay-as-you-go rules, Democrats would have to find a way to offset that cost. Michael Franc of the Heritage Foundation expects Democrats to be tempted to waive the rules in tricky cases-thus inflaming the party's conservative wing-or raise taxes, which could be politically dangerous. "If Blue Dogs say, 'We're not going to give you a bye on this'... they've created a $50 billion headache for Charlie Rangel," Franc says.

Headaches aside, Ross says the Blue Dogs will stand firm. "There's going to be a natural conflict," says James Thurber, a political scientist at American University, "between Blue Dogs and the old bulls that are chairs."

Even in the more moderate Senate, a new middle may be emerging. Sen. Olympia Snowe of Maine is overhauling the long-standing Senate Centrist Coalition to create a less formal atmosphere for Republicans and Democrats to talk over a weekly lunch or breakfast. Even the word centrist is likely to go in order to avoid any ideological association. New independent Joe Lieberman and Republican Lamar Alexander, meanwhile, are creating their own weekly, bipartisan breakfast group. Cynics note that bipartisanship and moderation always sound good at the beginning of a new Congress. And Pelosi's plan to kick-start the Democratic majority is mostly "low-hanging fruit," Thurber says. "The hard stuff comes with tax reform, Iraq, immigration, and healthcare." That's when we'll see just how well these Democrats can get along.

Changing The Guard (USNEWS)

By Silla Brush

U.S. News and World Report, January 7, 2007

The Democrats swooped into Washington last week for their first week in power in 12 years. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, the first woman to lead the House, hoisted the gavel, was serenaded by Tony Bennett and the former members of the Grateful Dead, and had a hometown Baltimore street named after her. In the House of Representatives, the party passed a set of ethics and earmark reforms in the first two days of the session and now embarks on a 100-hour legislative sprint to show it can govern. In the coming days, President Bush will deliver his much-anticipated speech on Iraq policy, and Democrats have plans to haul Defense Secretary Robert Gates and the nation's top intelligence officials before Congress.

There's no mistaking the shift in tone and power on Capitol Hill. Elected with a mandate to clean up Washington by a deeply disgruntled public, Democrats have a mighty task ahead and a plan to move quickly in the first few weeks. But their efforts are fraught with any number of challenges: holding the progressive and centrist wings of the party together, turning legislation into law with the slimmest of Senate majorities, and working with a president who has seen little resistance from Capitol Hill during his six years in office. How Democrats fare in the next few months-before the presidential election begins to overwhelm Washington-will help determine whether the party maintains control in 2008 and beyond. And for political junkies, it should be quite a show.

Beginnings. First up, Democrats plan to pass their 100-hour agenda through the House before the president's State of the Union address on January 23. "It's not the specifics of what they pass that matters," says Mickey Edwards, a former Republican representative from Oklahoma. "What matters is that when Bush stands up in front of Congress, the people in front of him have already sent notice to him that they're in charge."

The Democrats' agenda, known as the Six for '06, encompasses six politically appealing bills. Those measures would hike the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour, increase federal funds for embryonic stem cell research, implement most of the 9/11 commission's still-outstanding recommendations, repeal tax breaks for oil companies, halve interest rates on student loans, and allow the government to negotiate the price of Medicare prescription drugs. "We view these first 100 hours as essentially a mandate of the American people," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer. "We said to the American people that if you elect us, this is what we'll do." Democrats have decided to proceed with their agenda without an opportunity for Republicans to add amendments to the bills or to let the bills pass through the normal committee hearing procedure. Republicans immediately cried foul, but Democrats counter that the bills have been subject to congressional hearings in the past and were supported in the election.

The six bills may very well sail through the House, since the Democrats hold a 233-to-202-seat majority there. That's the easy part. "Passing the four items out of the House is training camp," says Brad Woodhouse of the Change America Now coalition, a group of labor unions and progressive groups that is lobbying for the agenda. "Getting them through the Senate is the regular season. Getting them signed by the president is the Super Bowl." Take embryonic stem cell research, for example: In 2005, Bush used the sole veto of his presidency to override a bill that would have increased such funding.

Deliberation. What happens next in the Senate could take much longer. Majority Leader Harry Reid has said Democrats' first 10 bills will follow normal procedures and be open to committee hearings. With a narrow 50-to-49-seat majority in the Senate-well short of the 60 votes necessary to overcome a filibuster-Democrats know they must work closely with Republicans to pass legislation. The tenuous nature of their hold has been underscored since mid-December, when Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson of South Dakota suffered a brain hemorrhage and was rushed to the hospital, where he remains in critical condition. Then there are the competing ambitions of roughly 10 presidential candidates from both parties, including presumptive front-runners John McCain, Barack Obama, and Hillary Rodham Clinton, that Reid must navigate.

The Democratic unity could be put to the test soon after the State of the Union speech, when Democrats begin to tackle a litany of thorny issues-from labor laws governing union organization to trade authorization and universal healthcare-that could drive a wedge between conservative and liberal Democrats and complicate the re-election of Democrats who won narrowly in heavily Republican districts. Labor unions and the party's left wing have bought into the 100-hour agenda as a "down payment" for their wish lists of new programs and laws. "There is no question. [Pelosi] is in a hard spot," says Robert Borosage, head of the progressive Campaign for America's Future. "The base of the party is demanding a significant challenge to the president."

The party's tensions were most visibly on display last week over Iraq. Democratic House Caucus Chair Rahm Emanuel tried to hold a press conference, only to be drowned out by a war protesters led by Cindy Sheehan, who became a household name after protesting outside the president's ranch. "De-escalate, investigate; troops home now!" they chanted, driving Emanuel back into a closed-door meeting. Democratic leaders, Sheehan said, "need to include the grass-roots voices."

Many of the tough oversight hearings on issues such as no-bid contracts in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina and food and drug safety methods are likely to come after the State of the Union address so as not to overshadow the 100-hour agenda. Rep. John Dingell of Michigan, a 51-year veteran of the House, is finalizing his roster of Energy and Commerce Committee lieutenants this week and will then decide on hearings and potential legislation; Rep. Henry Waxman's powerful Committee on Oversight (newly added to the title) and Government Reform is doing pretty much the same thing. Several committees in both houses have vowed tough oversight hearings on Iraq, but the political challenges are heady; Congress has few options other than restricting or adding conditions to the funding of the war. "We will work on that to the best of our ability," says Reid. He and Pelosi warned Bush late last week that a troop surge would be misguided and urged the president to plan a phased withdrawal of troops.

Those old bull Democratic committee chairmen like Dingell, Waxman, and Rep. Charles Rangel of New York have been out of power for 12 years and are now eager for vigorous oversight, which could put them at odds with younger Democrats, who have a more centrist ideology and who worry about re-election in Republican-heavy districts. "I think there is an overall appreciation by the most senior members," says Rep. Joe Crowley of New York, a veteran moderate Democrat, "that the reason why Democrats are in control of the House is that we were able to reach beyond the traditional voting bloc to moderates." Such tensions haven't yet manifested themselves, but Democratic strategists see potential problems on issues like trade, spending, and taxes.

The most bruising fights in Congress will most likely come down to dollars and cents budget questions in the spring. Bush said last week he'd work with congressional Democrats, while throwing down the gauntlet on any attempt to raise taxes and saying his economic plan would balance the federal budget by 2012. Democrats so far vow to abide by rules that require any increase in new entitlement spending to be offset by tax revenue or cuts to other programs. The Democrats in charge of the House Budget and Appropriations committees have said Congress will "face a fiscal challenge of historic proportions" in 2007, given the costs of both the Bush tax cuts and the Iraq war (the president will ask Congress for roughly $100 billion in a supplemental bill in February). "I don't think you'll see a major liberal agenda pushed by the Democrats' caucus at the end of the day," says Jim Turner, a former Democratic representative from Texas. "Once the war is behind us and we have a chance to recover from the huge deficits that we're facing, then maybe."

Democrats and Republicans have pledged cooperation, with Senate leaders holding a bipartisan meeting last week to find common ground. But Republicans have a simple new fact to learn-life in the minority. "It's important to recognize," Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell said, standing beside Reid, "that over the past 25 years some of the most important achievements have been during a period of divided government." After their November losses, House Republicans said they'd strongly attack Democrats from the get-go, but they've now softened their approach-at least for the first month.

The bipartisanship may hold through January, giving Democrats something of a political honeymoon. How well they avoid the political traps in the months ahead and help shape Iraq policy will go much further in determining whether the 2006 election was merely a blip in the Republicans' control or a decisive realignment.

The Perils Of Pouting (USNEWS)

By Gloria Borger

U.S. News and World Report, January 7, 2007

Believe it or not, lots of Republicans are downright chirpy these days. Yes, they lost the election. Big time. And they've lost their top committee assignments. And their big office suites. They're downsizing, to be sure, and that's not an easy or pleasant thing to do. On top of that, they've got a Republican president with an all-time-low approval rating of 30 percent. "And that's not good for any of us," says Tom Cole of Oklahoma, the newly elected chairman of the House GOP campaign committee.

So why the smiles? Because the now minority congressional Republicans are feeling liberated. The burden of trying to run a fractious Congress is gone. Now they get to become professional critics. No longer do they have to sweat to deliver a "majority of the majority" to the White House for every big vote-including Iraq. They can be the opposition voice, the backbenchers, the unruly minority. After all, they earned it.

But there's a peril in their new circumstance. The temptation is to behave badly, to prove the Democrats can't get anything done and don't deserve their new majority status. They can complain, as they did this past week, that they're being unfairly shut out of the legislative process. They can become obstructionist if they want; there's plenty of precedent for that. But to simply oppose would be a huge mistake: The public asked for reform and change. To get in the way of that would only be self-destructive.

A losing hand. Yet last week, the Republicans spent much of their time wallowing in a burst of newfound self-righteousness, whining about the Democrats' fast-track legislative strategy-passing ethics reform, then quickly moving on to popular issues like an increase in the minimum wage and federal funding for embryonic stem cell research. The Democrats went straight to the floor, bypassing the usual legislative committees and refusing to allow any amendments. After all, they argued, these measures have been fully vetted, debated, and redebated. Republicans, however, pretend to be shocked, shocked at this betrayal of House rules. Spare us the outrage. Have they forgotten that time in 2003 that the very partisan Tom DeLay and company prolonged a roll call vote for three hours to allow Republicans to round up enough members to pass the prescription drug benefit? Where were the House rules then?

In the end, though, this isn't about the rules. It's about what the public wants. "The American people didn't ask us to wait," the new chairman of the House Democratic caucus, Illinois's Rahm Emanuel, told me. "There's been an election. We ran on an agenda, and we're giving people an opportunity to vote on those bills." And while no one would accuse Emanuel of being anything but a partisan-he was the maestro of the party's House victory in November-his point is accurate. The GOP's whining leaders need to get a grip and then get on with it. "I have three children," Emanuel says, "and I know a tantrum when I see it." In fact, the Republican leaders' righteousness didn't even go over well with some of their own rank-and-file members. "When I saw our leadership whining about the process, I just about threw up," says Rep. Jeff Flake, a conservative Arizona Republican. "We sound like a bunch of babies."

Here's the point: Republicans can engage in a charade complaining about the process all they want. But when they ran the place, they failed on the policy. Consider ethics reform, passed in the House last week. Some Republicans wasted time grumbling that certain reforms didn't go far enough; that the plan to disclose pet spending projects-aka earmarks-should have included a system to simply cut these projects in half. Maybe so. But if it's so weak, why didn't they make the changes when they ran the place? In the end, they voted with the Democrats to pass the most far-reaching ethics reform in House history-including a ban on gifts from lobbyists and free travel on corporate jets. Republicans supported it, because it was the right thing to do, and, besides, they decided not to be suicidal. All of which is a good sign. As Flake says, Republicans should know they had their chance to reform, in the aftermath of the Jack Abramoff influence-buying scandal, and blew it. "We should admit we didn't handle ourselves very well when we were in charge."

A new CBS News poll finds the American people, at least, have hope that things will change. Sixty-eight percent say they're optimistic about the new Congress. If they are disappointed, beware.

Ninth Ward Fairly Sound, Study Says (AP)

By Cain Burdeau

AP, January 8, 2007

NEW ORLEANS -- Urban planners at three universities are challenging the notion that the city's Ninth Ward must be rebuilt from scratch, reporting in a new survey that the predominantly black neighborhoods can be brought back largely as they existed before Hurricane Katrina flooded them.

"The structural integrity of the buildings, even in the most devastated areas, are in much better condition than has been reported," said Kenneth Reardon, chair of Cornell University's Department of City and Regional Planning.

The only section that must be demolished before being rebuilt lies directly next to the levee breach on the Industrial Canal, an area that covers less than a square mile in the Lower Ninth Ward, the planners said. Homes there were battered by floodwaters from Katrina and then from Hurricane Rita nearly a month later.

Urban planners and students at Cornell, Columbia University and the University of Illinois carried out the survey, which was sponsored by ACORN, a national group that works to improve poor and moderate-income neighborhoods. Researchers and structural engineers based their assessment on the inspection of about 3,000 buildings.

The findings were released Saturday.

More than 80 percent of the Ninth Ward's structures "suffered no terminal structural damage," the research found, and the majority of those structures were built atop piers, making it easier to raise them to meet new flood zone requirements.

Only about 20 percent of Ninth Ward residents have returned home, the survey found. It cited bureaucratic and financial hurdles.

"That data shows that it can be rebuilt, and rebuilt in a cost-effective way. What is lacking are the resources," said Andrew Rumbach, a Cornell planner.

Many people in the Ninth Ward did not have flood insurance, and government rebuilding aid has been slow in coming. A lack of schools, day-care centers, businesses and public services, as well as high rents, are also keeping people away.

Ceeon Quiett, a spokeswoman for Mayor C. Ray Nagin (D), said that the mayor is interested in rebuilding the Ninth Ward, but that his office has not yet reviewed ACORN's report.

WAR NEWS:

Plan Sets Series Of Goals For Iraq Leaders (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 — President Bush's new Iraq policy will establish a series of goals that the Iraqi government will be expected to meet to try to ease sectarian tensions and stabilize the country politically and economically, senior administration officials said Sunday.

Among these "benchmarks" are steps that would draw more Sunnis into the political process, finalize a long-delayed measure on the distribution of oil revenue and ease the government's policy toward former Baath Party members, the officials said.

As the policy is being debated in Washington, the new American operational commander in Iraq said Sunday that his plan was to send additional American troops, expected to be part of the policy change, into Baghdad's toughest neighborhoods, and that under the new strategy it may take another "two or three years" to gain the upper hand in the war. [Page A9.]

Without saying what the specific penalties for failing to achieve the goals would be, American officials insisted that they intended to hold the Iraqis to a realistic timetable for action, but the Americans and Iraqis have agreed on many of the objectives before, only to fall considerably short.

And the widespread skepticism about the Bush administration's Iraq strategy among Democrats and some Republicans was underscored by the new speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat, in a television interview broadcast Sunday. She, along with the Democratic leader of the Senate, Harry Reid, informed the president that they were opposed to increasing troop levels.

"If the president wants to add to this mission, he is going to have to justify it," Mrs. Pelosi said on the CBS News program "Face the Nation." "And this is new for him because up until now the Republican Congress has given him a blank check with no oversight, no standards, no conditions."

She also suggested that Congress should deal with financing for the current war and for the proposed increase as separate issues. “If the president chooses to escalate the war, in his budget request we want to see a distinction between what is there to support the troops who are there now,” she said.

Whether lawmakers are prepared to advocate legislative steps to withhold funds from an expanded mission is unclear. Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the Democratic chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, said Sunday that as a practical matter, there was little that lawmakers could do to prevent Mr. Bush from expanding the American military mission in Iraq.

“You can’t go in like a Tinkertoy and play around and say you can’t spend the money on this piece and this piece,” Mr. Biden said on the NBC News program “Meet the Press.” “He’ll be able to keep the troops there forever, constitutionally, if he wants to.”

“As a practical matter,” Mr. Biden added, “there is no way to say, ‘Mr. President, stop.’ ”

Mr. Bush is expected to refer to the benchmarks in a much-anticipated speech this week outlining his new Iraq strategy, including plans to send as many as 20,000 additional troops. Administration officials plan to make the benchmarks public sometime after the address.

In addition to trying to ease Congressional concerns over the new strategy, the administration is trying to instill discipline in an Iraqi government that has been slow to act and hampered by sectarian agendas.

“There will be an approach and a strategy that reflects not only the desire for the Iraqis to take more responsibility but the need for the Iraqis to step up,” a senior administration official familiar with the deliberations said. “This is not an open-ended commitment. We are putting real specific requirements and expectations on the Iraqi government.”

The Americans and Iraqis have agreed on benchmarks before. Indeed, some of the goals that are to be incorporated on the list of benchmarks have been carried over from an earlier list that was hammered out with the Iraqis and made public in October, but never met.

The benchmarks, for example, include a previously stated commitment: setting a date for provincial elections. That goal is intended to enfranchise Sunnis — who had initially boycotted the political process — and thus give them a role in the governing of Sunni-dominated areas.

Another measure that was carried over from the old list of benchmarks is the final completion of the long-delayed national oil law that would give the central government the power to distribute current and future oil revenues to the provinces or regions, based on their population.

The list of benchmarks will also deal with the still-unresolved matter of settling a new policy on de-Baathification. There is wide agreement among experts that the initial Iraqi approach toward former Baath Party members was too sweeping and excluded too many from government service and entitlements. A revised approach would seek to address those concerns by, for example, paying Army pensions to some former Baathists who have been excluded from receiving them.

One important theme of the new Iraqi strategy will be encouraging the Iraqi government to spend more on projects and programs in Sunni areas. Most of the funds allocated for the Sunni-dominated Anbar Province in western Iraq have never actually been expended. That has encouraged opposition to the Iraqi authorities in Baghdad and handicapped the American military’s counterinsurgency efforts in the province.

“The assessment has been that the disbursement of funds from the Iraqi government from Baghdad out to the provinces, particularly the Sunni provinces, has been either slow or nonexisting,” the senior Bush administration official said. “That has to change.”

Administration officials said that by more clearly defining the goals and by planning to make them public some time after Mr. Bush’s address they hoped to encourage a sense of accountability on the part of the Iraqis.

Mr. Bush discussed some of the goals — the need for provincial elections, the enactment of the oil law and reform of Iraq’s de-Baathification policy — during his recent video conference with Iraq’s prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki.

The Americans have not been the only ones underscoring the need for benchmarks. The Maliki government has pressed to gain direct command of Iraq’s 10 army divisions, insisting it should be achieved by June. Some American officials have been concerned that it is overambitious. Nevertheless, an administration official has indicated that it is among the goals.

In Washington, the idea of benchmarks has been generally welcomed by lawmakers, though many remain skeptical that they will be achieved on schedule.

After meeting with the president and his national security team on Friday at the White House, senators from both parties said they told Mr. Bush they would have trouble supporting an American troop increase unless the plan included specific goals for the Iraqi government.

Senator John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire, said one of his Senate colleagues asked why the effort to add to American forces in Iraq would be more likely to succeed than previous troop increases. Mr. Sununu said the president and

Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, responded that Mr. Bush's plan would "include more specific goals, different rules of engagement and different expectations for cooperation with the Iraqi government."

Mr. Sununu said when he raised questions about oil revenue distribution, provincial elections and national reconciliation, he received "strong assurances that these were recognized as critical issues, that they were being addressed by the Maliki government," with one proposal that was nearing completion for the distribution of oil revenue and another regarding provincial elections.

Bush Considers Expansion Of Up To 20,000 Troops (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush is reviewing a plan that would send up to 20,000 more U.S. troops to Iraq, a decision that would trigger heavy opposition from Democratic congressional leaders.

The White House plans a presidential address no sooner than Wednesday to discuss the proposal, which includes new programs for jobs, reconstruction and political assistance in Iraq, according to two administration officials who have been briefed on it.

The officials, who spoke on the condition they not be identified because the president has not made final decisions, said increases would come in phases that could add up to 20,000 troops during the next several months. It is unclear how long the additional troops would stay.

IN IRAQ: Bombings, shootings kill 14 as army amplifies its efforts

The plan includes up to $1 billion in economic assistance, such as job creation and reconstruction projects, the officials said. It also calls for political assistance, including help for human rights groups and political organizations, in an effort to promote peaceful reconciliation among warring Shiite and Sunni factions.

Previous reconstruction efforts have faced serious problems and controversies, including repeated power outages and the awarding of no-bid contracts to U.S. companies.

Elements of the plan emerged over the weekend in TheWall Street Journal and The New York Times.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has announced plans to increase the number of local forces in Baghdad.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., appearing on CBS' Face the Nation, said Sunday that Bush would have to justify any troop hike to the new Congress. "This is new for him because up until now, the Republican Congress has given him a blank check with no oversight, no standards, no conditions," she said.

On Friday, Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., sent a letter to Bush opposing any U.S. troop increase. The letter said, "Surging forces is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed."

White House spokesman Alex Conant noted that Pelosi said she wants to succeed in Iraq, and "we're interested in any ideas that lead to success."

"The president looks forward to addressing the American people next week on the way forward in Iraq," Conant said.

In developing a new Iraq policy, the administration has changed the military leadership in Iraq.

Gen. David Petraeus, a supporter of U.S. force increases in Iraq, will head the multinational force there. He'll replace Gen. George Casey, who expressed skepticism over whether an increased U.S. military presence would be productive, and is being promoted to Army chief of staff.

Bush has also accepted the Pentagon's recommendation that Adm. William Fallon replace the retiring John Abizaid as head of the U.S. Central Command, which includes Iraq.

The administration is stepping up diplomatic efforts in the region. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to the Middle East soon to discuss negotiations between the Israelis and Palestinians. Bush has been skeptical, however, about direct talks with Syria and Iran.

Bush would have support for a troop surge from at least two prominent senators, John McCain, R-Ariz., and Joe Lieberman, I-Conn. Both said a troop increase would help quell sectarian violence.

Plan For Troop 'Surge' In Iraq Gathers Force (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

Christian Science Monitor, January 8, 2007

President Bush plans to lay out his Iraq strategy this week - and could opt for a modest increase of US forces.

WASHINGTON

Advocates of a "surge" of US troops in Iraq hope to persuade President Bush that the victory he seeks there is only possible with a substantial and prolonged escalation of the US presence.

The new congressional Democratic leadership, on the other hand, is calling on Mr. Bush to resist the idea. Yet the president may not satisfy either the "large and long surge" or the "no surge" camp when he unveils his plans in a speech to the American public, likely to occur Wednesday night. Speculation has grown as Bush has consulted widely and reshuffled his Iraq diplomatic and military teams that he could opt for a modest increase - no more than 20,000 troops.

Critics say that would simply repeat past tactics that have not delivered, while advocates of a big surge say it could be worse than nothing, only exposing more US troops to danger without providing the larger numbers they say are needed to get the job done of securing the civilian population.

"We must not low-ball this," says Frederick Kagan, a military historian at Washington's American Enterprise Institute (AEI) and a prominent proponent of a "large and long" US military increase. Insisting Iraq will be costly and bloody for the United States no matter what policy is chosen, he adds, "We can pay the price and win, or pay a similar price and lose."

Nearly two months after the Iraq Study Group dismissed any rise in US troops, advocates of military escalation are calling for an increase of up to 40,000 troops over the current 140,000 on the ground. The goal would be to secure Baghdad with a large American footprint long enough to allow economic development to take hold, and to defeat insurgents in the western Al-Anbar Province.

The strategy is supported by two prominent senators - longtime troop-increase advocate John McCain and Joseph Lieberman - and Washington neoconservatives. Other senators say they could support a small increase lasting a few months. Still others condemn the idea, including Republican Chuck Hagel, who calls it "folly."

Supporters say it would finally call on the US military to do something it should have done from the beginning. "The US military has never set the task for itself of providing security," says Mr. Kagan. What he advocates "is not simply a surge of troops," he says, "but a change of mission."

The major shift in mission that Bush is expected to announce is for US soldiers to take on the task of providing security to Iraqi civilians, primarily in Baghdad, instead of leaving that to the Iraqis. "What's being prepared is actually a drastic departure" from recent strategy, says Paul Hughes, a former Army colonel who served in Iraq under the Coalition Provisional Authority.

Bush has made it increasingly clear that he is committed to achieving "victory" in Iraq. He has announced a number of diplomatic and military moves in recent days suggesting that he is lining up his team for what he sees as the defining foreign-policy effort of his last two years in office.

First, director of national intelligence John Negroponte, a seasoned diplomat and former ambassador to postwar Iraq, was moved back to the State Department to serve as deputy to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. The president's new Iraq policy is expected to include a substantial new reconstruction program involving small teams of State Department officials working among Iraqis, and Mr. Negroponte is seen as a boon to its successful implementation.

Then Bush announced that Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus will replace Gen. George Casey as commander of multinational forces in Iraq. An expert in counterinsurgency, General Petraeus agrees with "surge" advocates that securing the civilian population must come first in Iraq.

Perhaps more important, official sources say, is that Petraeus fits better with Bush's vision of "victory." General Casey advocated transferring security duties to Iraqi soldiers and was doubtful that foreign soldiers could successfully fulfill that function.

The Iraq Study Group, chaired by former Secretary of State James Baker III and former congressional leader Lee Hamilton, emphasized diplomacy and a redeployment of US forces to training Iraqi forces as a prelude to reducing the American footprint. On the other hand, the pro-escalation forces foresee the US military performing key security functions for at least the next 18 months.

And while the Iraq Study Group pointedly refrained from speaking in terms of "victory" in Iraq, the escalation protagonists insist that victory is not only still possible but necessary to halting the march of Islamic extremism in the Middle East.

"This war is still winnable," says Senator Lieberman of Connecticut.

Lieberman, who refers to himself as an Independent Democrat, spoke Friday at an AEI forum where Kagan unveiled "Choosing Victory," a report he co-authored on how to achieve success in Iraq.

Virtually all sides in the debate over a new war strategy agree that Iraq is deteriorating rapidly and the situation there may have outstripped the US ability to turn things around. But the surge advocates' focus on "victory" - and their picture of the dire consequences for US security if the US is not successful in Iraq - is much more in tune with Bush's outlook.

The reshuffling of the president's Iraq team reflects in part an effort to rid the administration of divisions in Iraq policy that existed prior to the invasion. But some officials and analysts say the disputes over policy changes remain.

Cleavage continues over surge, with some policymakers and critics saying the right kinds of US troops and equipment are not available - and that ultimately Iraq can only be secure under Iraqis themselves.

Bush, who spoke at length by videoconference with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki last week, is expected to emphasize that the new security mission will be carried out with additional Iraqi security forces as well.

But surge advocates and critics tend to agree that the number of additional troops the Bush administration is considering is unlikely to be enough to make a difference.

Mr. Hughes, now a specialist in postconflict peace and stability operations at the US Institute of Peace in Washington, notes that the peacekeeping force in the Balkans was set up on the principle of one peacekeeper for every 50 civilians. That would mean 100,000 soldiers in Baghdad alone, excluding the huge Shiite sector of Sadr City.

If Bush sends 20,000 additional troops, "would we reach the number we would need? I don't think so," Hughes says. "Just sending more troops to Baghdad is like pouring more water in the sands of Al-Anbar. It's just going to disappear without accomplishing anything."

Iraq Battle Plan Includes Aid, Talks, Troops (LAT)

By Solomon Moore

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

BAGHDAD — Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the newly installed day-to-day commander of military operations in Iraq, said that success here would depend on a multi-pronged strategy that included economic aid and political negotiations in addition to increased military actions targeting Shiite and Sunni Arab militants.

"We have always tended to look for the military for the solution to this problem," said Odierno, who left his job as military advisor to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to become the operations chief for Iraq.

Speaking before an expected Bush administration proposal to request a surge of thousands of U.S. troops, Odierno said more soldiers would speed the training of the Iraqi force and help quell sectarian fighting in the capital.

He said bringing peace to Baghdad could be accomplished either with additional American troops or expanded recruiting and training of Iraqi troops, or a combination of the two.

Odierno, a West Point graduate who has commanded the 4th Infantry Division in Tikrit and northern Iraq, was known as a tough fighter whose tactics sometimes bordered on the controversial.

But in his comments during a media luncheon at Camp Victory in Baghdad, Odierno said that he had "learned an awful lot" and acknowledged that the war, and the tactics necessary to prevail, had changed.

Odierno said that during a recent fact-finding trip by Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace, he offered several suggestions for increased U.S. involvement in Iraq.

"Some included a surge of economic capabilities, they included a surge of other capabilities within our government — Treasury, Justice — to work the rule of law, and some didn't include a troop surge," he said. "We provided a broad range of things and then we gave a risk analysis."

Odierno said that some tasks, such as training Iraq's police and military and securing Baghdad, could succeed without additional American troops, but they would take more time.

"Over time we can accomplish the mission," he said. "Now that time might be two or three years from now, so the issue becomes are we willing to wait two or three years or do we want to speed it up."

With a troop increase, of either Iraqis or Americans, Odierno said, he hoped to hand over security responsibilities for the capital to the Iraqi security forces by August or September.

The commander said he also hoped that the forthcoming Bush plan would address rampant unemployment in Iraq and political challenges that had become rallying points for Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias.

Iraqis alienated

Political instability and the alienation of ordinary Iraqis from their government have driven many people into the embrace of armed militant groups, he said, adding that the U.S. government could try to help close the gap by better protecting Iraqi civilians, creating jobs and helping to support elections for local councils more responsive to their constituents' needs.

Odierno said another reason for Iraqis' alienation was the tendency of many leaders to be more interested in sectarian interests than the national good of Iraq.

"We thought they'd come together rather easily," he said. "We underestimated that…. We thought they'd think Iraq first, and that didn't occur. I think maybe it will occur over time, but it's not occurring now."

Odierno said he hoped that the parliament, which hasn't had a quorum in more than a month, would pass a law clarifying the role of the Shiite paramilitary groups that have been implicated in death-squad operations against Sunnis.

"They have to have a militia policy," he said of Iraq's government officials. "In my mind, out of the militias, 80% of them are probably OK. We could probably immediately put them into either the police or the army."

U.S. and Iraqi forces would probably have to "capture or kill" the remaining 20% "that are … extreme," he said.

Finding a balance

Odierno said that targeting militias would balance military efforts in Baghdad that until recently were overly focused on Sunni areas. Shiite militias have been ruthlessly pressing their advantage in Baghdad, sweeping whole neighborhoods clear of Sunni Arabs.

One of the failings of a U.S. security plan for Baghdad that was announced with great fanfare in August was that it "was focused mostly on Sunni neighborhoods," he said. "One of the things I think about all the time is that we can't be seen as being a leverage of one group getting advantage over another group."

He said, however, that he was still questioning whether the U.S. had a strong partner in the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

"We all have doubts as we move forward," Odierno acknowledged. "But I think I have enough faith in that they're smart people, they're educated people. I think they want to move their country forward."

Odierno spoke on another day of continuing violence in Iraq.

A car bomb in Baghdad on Sunday killed three U.S. airmen assigned to the 447th Expeditionary Civil Engineer Squadron's Explosive Ordnance Division, the Associated Press reported.

The U.S. military announced Sunday that a U.S. soldier assigned to the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force Headquarters group was killed Friday in Al Anbar province. And in southwest Baghdad on Saturday, insurgents shot a U.S. soldier to death, the military said.

In east Baghdad, a roadside bomb killed two people and gunmen killed a Finance Ministry guard Sunday. In west Baghdad, seven mortar rounds killed four civilians.

At least 17 bodies were discovered in Baghdad, all showing signs of torture and all with gunshot wounds to the head.

In the southern town of Hillah, a car bomb killed two people in a market, and in Kut, a land mine killed a border patrol guard, police said.

U.S. General Aims For Baghdad Pullback (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, January 8, 2007

BAGHDAD — U.S. troops could pull back to Baghdad's outskirts in a matter of months if Iraqi forces step up security, the new commander of U.S. combat forces in Iraq said Sunday.

U.S. Army Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno said it could be years before Iraqi forces can assume complete responsibility for the country's security. But a new security thrust in Baghdad could put Iraqi forces in the lead role by summer or fall, while U.S. troops provide support from outside the capital, he said.

"If you ask me where I want to be three to four months from now, I want (Iraqi security forces) operating in Baghdad and we are on the outskirts of Baghdad, providing support," he said.

Odierno, 52, recently replaced Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli as the No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq. He will answer to Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who is replacing Gen. George Casey as the top U.S. commander in Iraq.

Odierno's remarks came as President Bush prepared an overhaul of U.S. strategy in Iraq. The revision, to be announced this week, could boost the number of U.S. troops in the country from the current 132,000.

Ahead of Bush's announcement, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki unveiled on Saturday a major security plan for Baghdad. He promised to root out militias "regardless of sect or politics."

Odierno said Sunday that the massive Iraqi-U.S. security operation underway in Baghdad since summer has not succeeded.

"We were able to clear areas. We were not able to hold the areas," he said. "You have to go after both (Shiite) and Sunni neighborhoods, and (Operation) Together Forward was focused mostly on Sunni neighborhoods."

U.S. commanders have complained that al-Maliki's Shiite-led government has prevented them from targeting Shiites involved in the violence, including officials close to anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Odierno called for a "balanced approach" targeting extremists of both sects. The new strategy would consist of clearing neighborhoods of insurgents and patrolling those areas heavily; creating more jobs; launching provincial elections; and outlawing militias, he said.

"Unfortunately, we're starting to show a lack of patience. And I understand why," said Odierno, whose son, Army Capt. Anthony Odierno, lost his left arm while on combat duty in Baghdad. "But I think the outcome here is too important not to have patience."

Violence continued as Odierno spoke to reporters Sunday:

·Three U.S. airmen working for a bomb-disposal team were killed by a car bomb in Baghdad, the U.S. military said.

·A senior Education Ministry official survived a roadside bomb attack, but gunmen killed three Sunni shopkeepers and a Finance Ministry guard in drive-by shootings, Baghdad police said.

War Could Last Years, Commander Says (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 7 — The new American operational commander in Iraq said Sunday that even with the additional American troops likely to be deployed in Baghdad under President Bush's new war strategy it might take another "two or three years" for American and Iraqi forces to gain the upper hand in the war.

The commander, Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, assumed day-to-day control of war operations last month in the first step of a makeover of the American military hierarchy here. In his first lengthy meeting with reporters, General Odierno, 52, struck a cautious note about American prospects, saying much will depend on whether commanders can show enough progress to stem eroding support in the United States for the war.

"I believe the American people, if they feel we are making progress, they will have the patience," he said. But right now, he added, "I think the frustration is that they think we are not making progress."

The general laid out a plan to make an impact in Baghdad with the additional troops. Several other military plans since the fall of Baghdad in 2003 have faltered. He said he wanted the new American units, working with three additional Iraqi combat brigades that Iraqi officials say will be deployed in the capital, to move back into the city's toughest neighborhoods and show that they can "protect the people," which he said coalition forces had previously failed to do.

General Odierno contrasted his approach with the last effort to secure Baghdad, effectively abandoned for lack of enough Iraqi troops last fall.

Then, American troops conducted house-to-house clearing operations before moving on to other neighborhoods, leaving the holding phase of the operation to Iraqi troops, who failed to control the areas and forced Americans to return. This time, the general said, American troops would remain in the cleared areas "24/7," to stiffen Iraqi resolve and build confidence among residents that they would be treated evenhandedly.

Equally important, he said, coalition troops would move into both Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods. That, too, would break with the pattern set last fall, when American troops concentrated on known Sunni insurgent strongholds, especially Dora, in southwest Baghdad. This time, the general said, it was crucial the security plan be evenhanded. "We have to have a believable approach, of going after Sunni and Shia extremists," he said.

Going into Shiite neighborhoods, particularly the sprawling working-class district of Sadr City, the base for the powerful Mahdi Army militia that has spawned Shiite death squads, will risk new strains in the relationship between American commanders and the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. Sunni leaders and, increasingly, American commanders here have accused Mr. Maliki of a strong Shiite bias. The criticism has intensified since the sectarian taunting by Shiite guards at the hanging nine days ago of Iraq's ousted dictator, Saddam Hussein, an event personally planned by Mr. Maliki.

General Odierno said he envisaged making enough of a difference within three or four months of the new deployments to move to a second phase of the new plan, pulling American troops back to the periphery of Baghdad and leaving Iraqi forces to carry on the fight in the capital. He said he hoped to be able to do that by August or September, but with American troops prepared to move back into the capital rapidly if commanders conclude that the pullback was "a miscalculation."

Meeting American reporters over lunch at a villa in the grounds of one of Mr. Hussein's former palaces, General Odierno was careful not to divulge details of Mr. Bush's new war plan, which the president is expected to make public in coming days, perhaps on Wednesday.

But much of the Bush plan has been leaked, including an influx of as many as 20,000 additional combat troops to Baghdad. Their arrival would be staged over coming months as American commanders watch to see whether the Iraqis, who made troop commitments before that they have not fulfilled, meet their part of the deal.

Sending up to five additional combat brigades, as suggested by administration officials in Washington who have discussed the plan with reporters, would push the American force in Iraq to at least 160,000 troops, close to the levels involved in the invasion nearly four years ago.

This so-called surge would constitute an abrupt about-face in American strategy, which has aimed in the past two years for a drawdown of American troops as Iraqi forces take on greater responsibility for the war.

General Odierno, the second-ranking American commander here, will be joined in Baghdad in coming weeks by the new overall commander chosen by Mr. Bush, Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who will be promoted to full general when he succeeds

Gen. George W. Casey Jr., top commander in Iraq for the past two-and-a-half years. The recasting of the war command will also include a new top officer at the Central Command, with overall responsibility for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. That post will go to Adm. William J. Fallon, a Navy officer who is now the American commander in the Pacific. The appointments of Admiral Fallon and General Petraeus are expected to be approved by the Senate.

Generals Petraeus and Odierno will assume control in Iraq at a critical juncture, with additional American troops — assuming Mr. Bush's plan is not blocked by Democratic opponents in Congress — and the burden of showing they can find ways of turning the worsening situation around that escaped General Casey and Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the operational commander who preceded General Odierno. General Casey and General Chiarelli have been wary of American troop increases, saying the key to prevailing here is to have Iraqis take over, not to encourage them to shelter behind enhanced American combat power.

The plans laid out by General Odierno appeared aimed at meeting several goals in what American commanders here say has become a highly complex interplay of American and Iraqi politics, in addition to stabilizing a situation that has threatened to spiral out of control as Iraqi Shiites and Sunnis move ever closer to all-out civil war.

The commanders have acknowledged privately that the new Bush plan is almost certain to represent a last-chance option for persuading Americans that it is worth persisting with the heavy burdens of the war, with more than 3,000 American troops dead and overall costs that are nearing $450 billion.

General Odierno said one American goal would be to satisfy Iraqi leaders' insistence that American commanders transfer to them as quickly as possible overall responsibility for the war.

One thorny issue for the Bush administration has been that Iraqi leaders, facing the highest levels of violence in the war and struggling with weaknesses in their forces, have been wary of increasing American troop levels because of the impediment that might pose to the Iraqis taking fuller control of events here.

General Odierno spoke of the mood in the United States as another crucial factor. He served a year here in 2003 and 2004 as commander of the Fourth Infantry Division, during which his troops took credit for capturing Mr. Hussein. But he spent the last two years in Washington, the most recent 12 months as military adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

He said he understood the failing confidence among Americans, including some of those who had lost sons and daughters here, that the war was worthwhile. The general's own son, Capt. Anthony Odierno, a 28-year-old West Point graduate, lost an arm when a bomb detonated during a patrol in Baghdad in 2004.

As a father as well as a commander, the general said, he did not doubt the sacrifices had been justified. "I believe it's worth it," he said.

Baghdad Needs Iraqi Troops, General Says (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 7 -- A top U.S. commander in Iraq said Sunday that previous attempts to halt sectarian killings in Baghdad had failed in part because of a shortage of Iraqi troops and a tight focus on Sunni Arab neighborhoods, and that those lessons would be incorporated into a new strategy to slow the violence in the capital.

Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the number two commander in Iraq, declined to discuss a proposed surge of thousands of additional U.S. and Iraqi troops in Baghdad, saying he preferred to wait for President Bush to outline the policy. But he said he wanted his forces to begin with a push against both Sunni and Shiite fighters and "three or four months from now" retreat to the outskirts of the capital in a supporting role.

Sectarian violence has escalated in Baghdad despite repeated efforts to control it, including last summer's Operation Together Forward, which moved more than 10,000 additional U.S. and Iraqi soldiers into the city. At that time, "we were able to clear areas. We were not able to hold the areas," Odierno said. "We were not able to get security forces in there for an extended period of time that protected the people."

"I think what happened was, is, we overestimated the availability of Iraqi security forces initially; we didn't have enough here," Odierno told reporters at his lakeside residence in Camp Victory, near Baghdad's international airport. "So we have to be able to make sure we have enough forces, Iraqi and coalition, in order to do it this time."

Odierno said the new approach would be "balanced," targeting insurgents and other fighters regardless of their religious affiliation.

"You have to go after both Sunni and Shia neighborhoods," he said. "Together Forward was mostly focused on Sunni neighborhoods, and we've got to do both."

DOJ_NMG_0113181

The fighting in Iraq took the lives of five U.S. service members in recent days, the military said. A car bomb Sunday in Baghdad killed three U.S. airmen assigned to a bomb disposal unit of the 447th Expeditionary Civil Engineer Squadron. A fourth airman was injured in the incident.

A U.S. soldier was killed by small-arms fire in southwestern Baghdad on Saturday, and another soldier assigned to the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force Headquarters Group died from combat wounds in Anbar province in western Iraq.

None of the service members' names was released until their families could be notified.

Also Sunday, the radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, who leads a powerful militia, and Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, an influential Shiite religious leader, met briefly in the holy city of Najaf, according to a Sadr spokesman. During the meeting, Sistani asked Sadr to support the Iraqi government and its security forces, according to the spokesman, Aysam al-Musawi.

Sadr and his increasingly powerful militiamen, accused of hunting down and killing Sunnis, have fought the Americans on several occasions and are a primary American concern. Odierno said Sadr was currently "working within the political system."

"I'm not sure we take him down," he said. "There are some extreme elements . . . that are conducting operations that we don't agree with, and we will go after that."

U.S. and Iraqi leaders say they intend to put Iraqi soldiers in charge of the Baghdad plan, with U.S. forces playing a supporting role. An aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki said that 20,000 troops would operate in the capital, including additional brigades of Kurdish soldiers from northern Iraq.

The Defense Ministry spokesman, Mohammed al-Askari, said that no Kurdish militiamen, known as pesh merga, would be included in the plan. Hasan Suneid, a Shiite lawmaker, said Kurdish soldiers who are part of the Iraqi army would participate.

Suneid said that Iraqi commanders would be able to operate with greater autonomy and that U.S. soldiers would provide air support and logistics.

"We will start from central Baghdad and move out to the suburbs," Suneid said.

Odierno, 52, said that the U.S. military could provide only a partial solution to Iraq's problems, and that more jobs and provincial elections were key components in regaining the people's trust in the government. He called on Americans to have more patience during the difficult counterinsurgency effort that remains.

"I know how we are, we like number one. We want to win 77 to 7. This is hard to win 77 to 7, militarily. It ain't going to happen," he said, adding: "There is going to be no victory parade when we leave here. There never was going to be."

Military `surge' Not Enough To Save Iraq, U.S. Commander Says (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, January 8, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq - In his first wide-ranging interview, the No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq conceded Sunday that a military "surge" escalation would not be enough to rescue Iraq, advocating economic and political changes as well, as top Democratic lawmakers in Washington stiffened their opposition to any escalation of U.S. troop strength.

Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno said he believed that a combination of jobs, provincial elections, anti-militia legislation and stronger Iraqi security forces could stop the nation's plunge toward all-out civil war. Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, his predecessor, spelled out the same approach before his departure one month ago.

By echoing his predecessor, Odierno's comments raised concerns in both Washington and Iraq that the U.S. war effort is exhausting old tactics that haven't worked. Indeed, many Iraqis do not trust that a new Baghdad security plan can change their circumstances because the U.S. and Iraqi government have touted at least five such plans before, all of which failed to stop the violence.

The commander's statements came days before President Bush is to announce a new course for U.S. policy in Iraq, probably Wednesday. It's expected to include an escalation "surge" of between 9,000 and 30,000 U.S. troops, an increase in civilian advisers to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government and perhaps $1 billion in new aid for reconstruction efforts.

In Washington Sunday, top Democratic lawmakers emphasized that they oppose any plan to escalate U.S. troop strength in Iraq, but made clear that they are not ready to cut off funds for troops there now. However, Speaker of the House of Representatives Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said that Congress would scrutinize any Bush request to fund an escalated U.S. presence in Iraq.

"The American people and the Congress support those troops. We will not abandon them. But if the president wants to add to this mission, he is going to have to justify it. And this is new for him, because up until now, the Republican Congress has given him a blank check with no oversight, no standards, no conditions, and we've gotten into this situation which is a war without end, which the American people have rejected," Pelosi said on CBS' "Face the Nation."

On Friday, Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., sent Bush a public letter opposing any increase in U.S. troops in Iraq and calling for a phased redeployment of U.S. troops out of Iraq starting in four to six months.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Sunday that Bush's expected plan to escalate U.S. troop strength in Iraq "is a prescription for another tragedy." Biden also announced that he will seek the presidency in 2008.

"There is now a civil war. You need a political solution," said Biden, speaking on NBC's "Meet the Press." His committee plans extensive hearings on Iraq in coming weeks.

Taking the opposite view was Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"I support a surge with a purpose - co-joining with the Iraqi political and military leadership to control this country," Graham said, also on "Meet the Press." "We cannot let this country go into the abyss.

"Now is the last chance, and the only chance, to get this right."

Graham said many Republican lawmakers are prepared to back Bush's call for an escalation of U.S. forces in Iraq.

In Baghdad, Odierno said he proposed several approaches to Defense Secretary Robert Gates during his visit here last month, including a surge.

"What I will tell you is when Secretary Gates was here with General (Peter) Pace, we offered several different courses of action. Some included surge of troops, some included a surge in economic capabilities." Others, he said, included boosting other Iraqi capabilities in the treasury, justice, and rule of law fields, "and some didn't include a troop surge."

Odierno arrived in Baghdad less than a month ago, replacing Chiarelli. During his tenure, Chiarelli repeatedly said that if more Iraqis had jobs, fewer would join a rogue group or shoot at American soldiers. The unemployment rate here is at least 25 percent, government officials estimate.

Both commanders said they believed that Iraqi forces should take the lead in enforcing security, while conceding that, while they are improving, Iraqis have faltered when given the lead. Some forces have been overtly sectarian. Others lost control of their communities, forcing U.S. troops to intervene. Both commanders said that U.S. troops should be on the periphery of areas handed over to Iraqi forces in case violence erupts.

Both said that U.S. forces must tackle not only Sunni insurgents but Shiite militias - yet both stopped short of advocating that U.S. forces go after firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who leads Iraq's largest militia, the Mahdi Army, and supports the Iraqi government.

"I'm not sure we take him down," Odierno said. "There are some extreme elements (of the Mahdi Army) ... and we will go after them. I will allow the government to decide whether (Sadr) is part of it or not. He is currently working within the political system."

Both Odierno and Chiarelli said that the military could not do everything and that Iraq needs a political solution. Both also said that everyone should be patient with Iraq's nascent government, noting that it has been in power less than a year.

US Twists Civilian Arms To Fill Fortress Baghdad (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 8, 2007

At the heart of George W. Bush's "new way forward" – which the president is expected to announce on Wednesday and involve substantial troop reinforcements – is the plan already under way to expand the US civilian presence across Iraq and complete the world's largest embassy in Baghdad.

Construction of what critics call "Fortress Baghdad" has led to arguments inside the State Department amid fears that the overwhelming diplomatic presence will perpetuate a sense of US occupation and become a focus of local anger.

US diplomats say that just as the armed forces are being stretched to breaking point, the US foreign service is suffering from low morale and operations in the rest of the world are being damaged by the diversion of resources to Iraq.

Officials are also questioning why the Bush administration is sending more civilians into a deteriorating war zone, and the effectiveness of the work they can do.

The embassy compound being built inside Baghdad's Green Zone covers 104 acres, making it six times larger than the United Nations compound in New York. A city within a city for more than 1,000 people, it will have its own water, sewers and electricity, six apartment buildings, a Marine barracks, swimming pool, shops and some walls 15 feet thick.

The State Department has told the Financial Times that the US civilian presence in Iraq has "grown considerably beyond the numbers projected for the new embassy compound", which is scheduled for completion by September 1 at a cost of $592m (€455m, £307m).

The department and other agencies, such as the Pentagon and Treasury which also supply staff, are working out how to accommodate the extra numbers that Mr Bush is expected to announce this week. Recruits are being attracted to one-year posts by a mix of cajoling and inducement – an almost doubling of their salary, four trips outside Iraq and guarantees of favourable postings afterwards.

Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, and other officials have repeatedly sent cables to personnel around the world saying diplomats have a patriotic duty to volunteer for Baghdad and the expanding "provincial reconstruction teams", where diplomats work out of military bases.

"Baghdad dwarfs everything else. It is becoming a monster that has to be fed every year with a new crop of volunteers," says one diplomat.

So far the State Department has not resorted to compulsory or "directed" assignments, a practice last used during the Vietnam war. But it has warned it would put assignments elsewhere on hold "if Iraq and Afghanistan and other priority posts are not staffed".

Among the many recommendations of the bipartisan Baker-Hamilton report on Iraq, issued in December, was that diplomats and other US personnel should be obliged to serve in Iraq if there were not enough volunteers.

Steve Kashkett, vice-president of the American Foreign Service Association, the professional body representing US foreign service officers, questions their logic.

"It makes no sense for the Iraq report authors simultaneously to propose scaling back the US military presence and beefing up the presence of unarmed US diplomats in a combat zone," he writes this month in the association's journal.

John Brown, who resigned as a US diplomat in protest against the 2003 invasion and now teaches public diplomacy, says the embassy "will be a symbol of the US occupation and the near-total separation of US embassy staff members from the society with which they are supposed to interact".

"Indeed, the planned embassy reminds me of the huge, cavernous buildings that housed Soviet missions in eastern Europe during the cold war. They were hated by the local population for all they stood for: secrecy, arrogance and domination."

Of the 1,000 or so US civilians staffing Baghdad at present – not including large numbers of private-sector bodyguards – there are about 200 career diplomats, plus some 70 in the provincial reconstruction teams that are set to expand.

Many other staffers are so-called "3161s" – recruited ad hoc and, according to the State Department, "fully qualified for their highly technical jobs". Diplomats question this, saying many are incompetent and have been hired for their loyalty to the Republican effort.

Asked why the US was sending more diplomats into a war zone when such conditions elsewhere in the world would lead to closure or drawdown of embassies, the State Department said such comparisons were "inappropriate", noting the embassy had suffered "minimal casualties".

A Heavier Iraq 'Footprint' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

President Bush is set to announce his new strategy for Iraq this week, and the early signs are that it will include both more American and Iraqi troops to improve security, especially in Baghdad. We think the American people will support the effort, as long as Mr. Bush treats this like the all-in proposition it deserves to be.

If the stakes in Iraq are as great as Mr. Bush says -- and we believe they are -- then he should commit whatever forces are needed to achieve success. The public's support for the Iraq campaign is waning, in major part because the casualties and expense have been producing no visible progress. Even with Democrats running Congress, Mr. Bush has a political window to pursue a more robust security strategy. The paradox is that the fastest way home from Iraq is a bolder commitment now. * * *

On that score, it is appropriate that Mr. Bush is replacing his Iraq military team. Centcom Commander John Abizaid, who is retiring, can point to successful campaigns to topple the Taliban in Afghanistan and Saddam Hussein in Iraq. His oft-derided "light footprint" strategy for securing Iraq has also been right for much of the country, with Kurdistan able to handle its own security and southern Iraq now transitioning to Iraqi control.

But General Abizaid and ground commander George Casey -- who is leaving for a Pentagon post -- never found the formula for the insurgent-troubled Sunni areas, and in recent months for Shiite death squads in Baghdad. Beginning in 2005, Mr. Bush began talking of a counterinsurgency strategy modeled on the successful "clear, hold and build" operation that drove insurgents from the northern city of Tal Afar.

However, it is now clear his two most important generals failed to muster the forces to make it work. The final straw was the failure of Operation Forward Together to secure Baghdad last year. Although many neighborhoods did improve during the "clear" phase, there were too few troops deployed for the "hold" process to work.

One rap on Mr. Bush as a war leader is that he is supposedly too willful and stubborn. But if anything, in Iraq it now appears he has been too deferential. He was telling the truth when he said his generals, and former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, told him they had enough troops to do the job. Especially as Army and Marine tours lengthened, General Casey seemed focused more on training Iraqis with an eye to drawing down U.S. forces, rather than on improving security.

Whatever chance of success this approach had probably vanished with last year's terrorist attack on the Golden Shrine that ended Shiite forbearance.

In appointing David Petraeus, who will replace General Casey, Mr. Bush has chosen a general with impeccable credentials in this theater. He governed Mosul in 2003 with enlightened engagement, marred by a Baathist spy who somehow managed to become police chief. He also built, essentially from scratch, the current Iraqi Army starting in 2004. One of his chief virtues is that he is a good listener who works well with Iraqis, which is crucial to implementing any new plan. Along with Lieutenant General Ray Odierno, who will be General Petraeus's chief deputy, the President will have generals who understand the priority of security.

The main objections to this new push in Iraq seem to be two: First, that military victory is no longer possible amid a "civil war" in Iraq; and second, that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government is sectarian and thus will not compromise enough to achieve the political ends that must accompany improved security.

We aren't generals, but on the first point there are many serious people who believe success is still achievable in Iraq. They include retired four-star General Jack Keane and military historian Fred Kagan, who recently worked with some of the military's brightest officers to suggest a plan to secure Baghdad under the auspices of the American Enterprise Institute. Among those officers is Colonel H.R. McMaster, the mastermind of the Tal Afar campaign. The President's two most important political allies on Iraq, Senators John McCain and Joe Lieberman, also both believe more troops will make a difference.

As for Mr. Maliki, no one is suggesting that Iraqis be given a blank check. His political alliance with radical Shiite Moqtada al-Sadr is a problem and is one reason we advised the Administration against deposing Ibrahim al-Jaafari. But al-Sadr's influence has risen along with the sense that the Iraqi Army couldn't provide security and that the U.S. was headed out the door. One goal of any larger deployment would be precisely to bolster the forces of Shiite moderation against al-Sadr.

Despite its faults, the Maliki government has shown it is still willing to play by democratic rules. Saddam's hanging was handled ineptly, but the dictator received a fair trial. Mr. Maliki presented his own plan for Baghdad security to Mr. Bush on their recent meeting in Jordan, and he has pledged to protect against both Shiite and Sunni killings. We disagree with Bing West and Eliot Cohen nearby that Mr. Maliki should be presented with some kind of ultimatum to do our bidding or else we'll leave; he is far more likely to make these necessary decisions if he sees the U.S. as a reliable partner.

What is sure to radicalize the Shiites is an early U.S. departure. They would then have little choice but to call on Iran and Hezbollah and anyone else for the military aid to defeat the Sunni terrorists. The forces of Shiite democracy, led by Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, would be swamped. Then there really could be a Shiite dictatorship in Iraq, along with ethnic cleansing on a scale unseen since the India-Pakistan diaspora. * * *

For all of these reasons, we hope Mr. Bush also refrains from using the words "surge" or "temporary" to describe his plans this week. A better message is that he will do whatever it takes to reinforce the forces of moderation and democracy in Iraq to prevent a defeat that would empower American enemies in Iraq and in the war on terror. And his strategy is best framed as providing the forces necessary to protect the population that most military experts believe is the key to successful counterinsurgency.

The tragedy nearly four years after the fall of Saddam is that such a strategy has never been tried. The consequences of failure in Iraq are too great not to try it now, before it really is too late.

'Our Only Hope' (WSJ)

By Bing West And Eliot Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

President Bush has appointed a new Iraq team, including one of our best counterinsurgency generals, David Petraeus, to take command in Iraq; he is also about to unveil a new Iraq strategy. The apparent problem is uncontrolled sectarian violence in Baghdad and the apparent solution is to send more American soldiers to restore order. The actual problem is a dysfunctional, sectarian Iraqi political system. Here at home, the imminent debate between the Congress and the administration about the number of American forces is a diversion. We may need more resources, but first we need a strategy.

President Bush faces a difficult strategic choice. First, he can continue to play defense and send in more troops to undertake tasks approved by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. The intent is to buy another year during which a nonsectarian Iraqi government will pull itself together. It is difficult to see how it will. Alternatively, he can adopt an offensive strategy with clear benchmarks, strengthening Iraqi security forces while imprisoning Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads. The risk is that Mr. Maliki may refuse to cooperate, forcing us to walk away. In sum, what lies before the administration is a final strategic choice, after a series of large and consequential failures.

The campaign began brilliantly with the swift rush to Baghdad in May 2003. Stripped of their dominance but otherwise untouched by the war, the Sunnis supported an insurgency led by Saddam loyalists and fueled by xenophobic religiosity. The American military stubbornly responded for 18 months with conventional sweeps and raids that fueled resentment and raised recruits for the insurgents. It was not until late 2004 that our military seriously began training a new Iraqi army. That same year, the White House endorsed a counterinsurgency strategy of "clear, hold and build" inside Sunni cities, despite Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's reservations that this thrust American soldiers into an occupying role without addressing how they would get out.

For a brief period, it appeared that "clear and hold" was working. Then, in February 2006, the Sunni extremists destroyed the Shiite mosque at Samara. This ignited the civil war they had sought to provoke for three years. As with the initial Sunni insurgency, our military was caught a second time without a counterstrategy.

Since the summer of 2006 we have fought a full-fledged, two-front war, waging one against the Sunni insurgents north and particularly west of Baghdad, and the other in Baghdad, where both Sunni and Shiite killers murdered the innocents. The Sunni tool was the massive car bomb. The Shiite militias were more systematic, employing death squads in a slow, methodical ethnic cleansing of neighborhoods.

The war seesaws back and forth. Unlike in Vietnam, these enemies do not dare to fight even small American military units. Our casualties come from roadside bombs and sniper attacks. In Anbar province, where the fighting is heaviest, our Marines are having unappreciated success in splitting local tribes from al Qaeda in Iraq. The under-strength Iraqi Army has performed well, despite grossly inadequate support from Mr. Maliki's government. The Iraqi police in Baghdad, though, remain penetrated by political militias. The spectacle of Saddam Hussein's guards chanting the name of Moqtada al Sadr as the despot swung from the gallows was revealing and disturbing.

So where do we go from here? The much-debated "surge" would only modify our current strategy, if Americans continue to focus chiefly on destroying the insurgents in Sunni neighborhoods. Fewer Sunni car bombs will supposedly result in less retaliation by death squads and end the ethnic cleansing. The Shiite population would turn away from militias because they wouldn't need them, given more security by more Americans. Because Mr. Maliki values Mr. Sadr's political support, Sadr City will remain what it is today: a sanctuary for the Mahdi Army militia.

This is a problematic approach. The Sunnis initiated the violence, no doubt about it. But now the Shiite militias are doing the majority of the killing in Baghdad -- yet less than 10% of those in prison are Shiites. There are 75 murders a day in Baghdad, and most killers walk free. The militias are gradually succeeding in the ethnic cleansing of much of Baghdad. To persist in this strategy is equivalent to a mayor telling his police chief that the mafia who live on the east side of town cannot be touched. It dooms the chance, however frail, of creating a nonsectarian Iraqi government.

Coupled with defensive patrolling is a proposed program of job creation (removing trash, for example). But handouts in a culture accustomed to handouts gain little. The return for this effort is hard to predict. In Anbar province, the only successful projects have been repayable loans to those Iraqis resolute enough to step forward and accept responsibility for building their own businesses.

Providing our advisers and battalion commanders with discretionary funds is a sound investment, but is ancillary to establishing security. It's unproven how many 16-year-old foot soldiers will be diverted by low-paying jobs. If you went to a member of the mafia and offered a low-paying job in return for renouncing crime, he would laugh at you. Most of the thugs won't be bought off; extortion and robbery are more lucrative and enjoyable.

President Bush recently agreed with the assessment of the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, that "we're not winning in Iraq . . . but we're not losing." But in counterinsurgency, if you do not win, you lose. What, then, is another option the president can choose?

Instead of a defensive surge strategy satisfying to Mr. Maliki, the president can opt for an offensive, nonsectarian strategy. Its core operational concepts must be neutralizing criminals -- which include the Sunni insurgents, the Shiite death squads and the criminal gangs -- by imprisonment, deterrence, or death; and constructing Iraqi security institutions as free as possible of sectarian taint.

Iraq is now a police war and we need to treat it as such. Former Secretary of State Colin Powell a few weeks ago said, "We should not use our troops as policemen." But that's exactly how they are being used today in Baghdad and are, in fact, used in most counterinsurgencies. Our weakest links are leaving the Mahdi Army off-limits, not selecting Iraqi security leaders and refusing to arrest and incarcerate the criminals (insurgents, death squads and thugs). If the president's new strategy does not aggressively rectify these three defects, then surging more American troops will buy time but not alter a war we are losing because we are not winning.

Sadr City cannot remain off limits. When the death squads know they are hunted, many will flee the city. Others will fight back. Intense violence, however, cannot sustain itself. American forces fought Mr. Sadr's militia in April and August of 2004. In both cases, all-out war by the Mahdi Army petered out due to lack of logistics. In both cases, the Shiite population stood to one side. We created a monster by letting Mr. Sadr go free twice. We cannot make that mistake a third time. * * *

To change the dynamic in Iraq, the president has to insist on arrests and incarceration rates equivalent or greater than those for violent crime in New York City. This would set benchmarks and shift our forces from defense to offense. New York City averages over 27,000 arrests a year for violent crimes. If a similar number of arrests were made in Baghdad, which is roughly the same population size as New York City, the jail population in Iraq would double in a year. One in 75 American males is in jail, compared to one in 450 Iraqi males. Iraq is not six times safer than the U.S. Instead, Iraq has a judicial system, abetted by American military legalisms, that works in favor of the killers. The president has to change that.

Our troops in Iraq complain, with justice, that they often capture insurgents, only to find them on the street a few months later. As a result of the abuses of Abu Ghraib, the U.S. military instituted four layers of review for each Iraqi detained. The result is that most detainees are released. As for the Iraqi system, it is simply absurd, insisting on habeas corpus rules of evidence in a corrupt and overwhelmed judicial system that incarcerates a few dozen each week, compared to over a thousand a week in New York City alone. Eight of 10 detainees are set free. Releasing killers undercuts troop morale, while the residents lose trust. Texas has 170,000 in jail; Iraq, with a larger population and 50 times the violence rate, has 28,000 in jail. This "catch and release system," as the troops call it, is the single weakest link in the U.S. strategy.

Technology can help. We could, for example, equip Iraqi and American forces with mobile devices to fingerprint the military-age males in Baghdad and the Sunni Triangle. Anyone stopped can be checked in two minutes, just as the Border Police and the Chicago Police do today. This would deprive the killers of mobility and is the key to radically increasing arrests. In this, as in many other respects, the American failure in Iraq reflects not our preference for high technology -- as facile critics claim -- but our inability to bring appropriate technologies to bear. * * *

This is an Iraqi war, and success depends on the creation of a larger Iraqi Army (perhaps twice its current size of under 140,000) and a neutral police force. So we must increase our advisers from 3,500 to 15,000 or more. This is a small-unit police war, with the insurgents hiding and dodging. We do not need 40 or 50 conventional American battalions trained and equipped for full-scale conventional war, if the Iraqi security forces are strengthened by bulked-up American advisory teams.

But Iraqi security forces will fall apart if political parties use appointments and promotions for sectarian purposes. We must therefore insist on a joint U.S.-Iraqi board to appoint all Iraqi battalion commanders and police chiefs and above. American control over senior personnel is the single most important aspect of our effort to develop Iraqi institutions. Without it, additional resources, to include more advisers, will be wasted.

Quite possibly, Prime Minister Maliki will refuse, on the grounds of sovereignty and national pride, to allow Americans equal control over Iraqi personnel policy. We should respond that when Iraq is truly sovereign and standing on its own, we withdraw our advisers and the joint board ceases to operate. In the meantime, we're not potted plants. It is our advisers that force the ministries in Baghdad to pay the Iraqi soldiers. It is our advisers on patrol risking their lives and dying to reassure the Iraqi forces that they can prevail. As long as we run equal risk, we deserve equal say in the selection of competent leaders.

There is some chance that a strategy dependent on Mr. Maliki's sectarian instincts may succeed. He may, despite his poor track record, pull himself and his government together. Prudence, however, suggests that the president design a strategy that is independent of Mr. Maliki's fortunes and strengthens the only institution capable of holding the country together -- the Iraqi army.

We prefer an offensive strategy based on three ironclad principles: take the offense immediately against the death squads in Sadr City, who are now unsettled; arrest and imprison on a scale equal to the horrific situation (or at least equal to New York City!); and insist on a joint say in the appointment of army and police leaders. If the Iraqi government refuses, we should be willing to disengage completely, and soon.

The paradox of American strategy in Iraq is this: President Bush can achieve success only by threatening to do something he is morally opposed to doing -- leaving swiftly and risking chaotic civil strife. If the president showed the same iron will toward Mr. Maliki that he does toward Congress and public opinion, Mr. Maliki would blink first.

The only course that will work entails not only the risks of greater casualties, but the risks of walking away from promises unmet and hopes unfulfilled. More money and troops are inputs, not outputs. A new strategy needs benchmarks for success -- arrests, imprisonment and the adviser ratings of leaders. Our only hope lies not in American troops but in the development of an Iraqi security force free of militia influence, working for a government that understands the penalty for failure.

The Smart Surge: Diplomacy (WP)

By Wesley K. Clark

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

The odds are that this week President Bush will announce a "surge" of up to 20,000 additional U.S. troops into Iraq. Will this deliver a "win"? Probably not. But it will distract us from facing the deep-seated regional issues that must be resolved.

DOJ_NMG_0113187

The administration views a troop surge of modest size as virtually the only remaining action in Iraq that would be a visible signal of determination. More economic assistance is likely to be touted, but absent a change in the pattern of violence, infrastructure enhancement simply isn't practical.

Yes, several additional brigades in Baghdad would allow for more roadblocks, patrols and neighborhood-clearing operations. Some initial successes would be evident. But how significant would this be? We've never had enough troops in Iraq. In Kosovo, we had 40,000 troops for a population of 2 million. That ratio would call for at least 500,000 troops in Iraq; adding 20,000 now seems too little, too late.

Further, U.S. troops so far have lacked the language skills, cultural awareness and political legitimacy to ensure that areas "cleared" can be "held." The key would be more Iraqi troops, but they aren't available in the numbers required. Nor are the Iraqi troops reliable enough for the gritty work of dealing with militias and sectarian loyalties. Even if militia fighters in Baghdad can be temporarily suppressed, they could redeploy to continue the fight in other areas.

What the surge would do is put more American troops in harm's way, further undercut the morale of U.S. forces and risk further alienating elements of the Iraqi populace. American casualties would probably rise, at least temporarily, as more troops appeared on the streets -- as happened in the summer when a brigade from Alaska was extended and sent into Baghdad. And even if the increased troop presence initially frustrated the militias, it wouldn't be long before they found ways to work around the neighborhood searches and other obstacles, if they chose to continue the conflict.

Other uses for troops include accelerating training of the Iraqi military and police. But vetting these Iraqi forces for loyalty has proved problematic. So neither accelerated training nor adding Iraqi troops to the security mission can be viewed as though a specified increase in effort would yield an identical increase in return.

The truth is that the underlying problems are political, not military.

Vicious ethnic cleansing is underway, as various factions fight for power and survival. In this environment, security is unlikely to come from smothering the struggle with a blanket of forces -- and increasing U.S. efforts is likely to generate additional resistance, especially from Iraq's neighbors. More effective action is needed to resolve the struggle at the political level. A new U.S. ambassador might help, but the administration needs to recognize that the neoconservative vision has failed.

Well before the 2003 invasion, the Bush administration was sending signals that its intentions weren't limited to Iraq; "regime change" in Syria and Iran was often discussed in Washington. Small wonder then that both countries have worked continuously to feed the fighting in Iraq.

Dealing with meddling neighbors is an essential element of resolving the conflict in Iraq. But this requires more than border posts and threatening statements. The administration needs a new strategy for the region, before Iran gains nuclear capabilities. While the military option must remain on the table, America should take the lead with direct diplomacy to resolve the interrelated problems of Iran's push for regional hegemony and nuclear power, the struggle for control of Lebanon, and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Isolating our adversaries hasn't worked.

Absent such fundamental change in Washington's approach, there is little hope that a troop surge and accompanying rhetoric will be anything other than "staying the course" more. That wastes lives and time, bolsters the terrorists and avoids facing up to the interrelated challenges posed by a region in crisis.

War Against Time (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

The new plan for Iraq that President Bush will announce this week will suffer from the same fallacy that has infected each of his previous war strategies -- and also most of the counterproposals sprouting up in Washington. That is, the notion that American action can produce decisive results in Iraq in six to 12 months.

The administration's original war plan -- to the extent one existed -- foresaw the creation of an Iraqi administration and the withdrawal of most U.S. troops within six months of the invasion. When that failed, the administration wagered that it could oversee the election of an interim Iraqi government, the writing of a constitution, that constitution's ratification and the election of a permanent government in 12 months. Insistence on that timetable produced the half-baked constitution that now hamstrings the "unity" government. A year ago the administration supposed that it could train enough Iraqi police and military forces in 2006 to draw down U.S. troops to 100,000 or fewer. It came no closer than it did in 2005, when it had much the same plan.

Now Bush is likely to bet that the dispatch of additional American forces will somehow produce a breakthrough in Baghdad before 2008. That parallels the Iraq Study Group, which foresees a transition of the war to full Iraqi control and the withdrawal of all U.S. combat forces by the first quarter of 2008, and Democratic plans for the beginning of a troop drawdown in four to six months.

In Washington's bipartisan mind-set, the next six months are always crucial in Iraq. Persistently, we believe that one big, intense effort will turn the country around -- or make it possible for us to leave. Why? Perhaps because Bush has never been willing to ask the country to commit itself to a long struggle in Iraq, despite his view of it as "the central front" in a war on terrorism that will define the 21st century. Instead he proposes the war that the Army and the public can tolerate without too much strain. For their part, war opponents understandably have been looking for a way out since the mission began.

Iraq, however, doesn't operate on Washington's clock -- something Iraqi leaders have repeatedly tried and failed to explain to the ambassadors and generals who demand benchmarks and timetables. And why should it? In historical context, the country is not much different from others that have emerged from decades of dictatorship and tried to sort out a new political status quo among multiple competing ethnic groups. Yugoslavia began to break down in 1991; despite repeated Western interventions, the bloodshed continued until the end of the decade. The wars over Congo's future began in 1994 with the end of the Mobuto dictatorship and didn't end until 2003. Lebanon's civil war began in 1976 and ended in 1989.

As the behavior of the Maliki government and its Sunni enemies has made painfully clear, Iraq is nearer the beginning than the end of its sorting out. Each of the main sides -- Shiite, Sunni and Kurd -- remains convinced that it can impose its sectarian agenda by force. The Sunnis believe they will reconquer Iraq when the Americans leave. Maliki himself is eager for the U.S. Army to stand back so the Shiite-dominated police and army can attempt to wipe out Sunni resistance. The Kurds intend to fight before they will share Kirkuk. Until all are convinced that they have exhausted the option of force, there will be no settlement.

If Iraq is like the rest of the post-Cold War world, this will take six to 12 years, not six to 12 months. Not only is the United States unlikely to speed up the resolution of the conflict, it may even slow a resolution down, by acting as a buffer or co-combatant -- as did U.N. troops in Bosnia, Syrian forces in Lebanon and the armies of multiple African states in Congo. Of course, U.S. forces might also prevent the war from spreading beyond Iraq or keep other nations from jumping in.

One day, on its own time, Iraq will reach equilibrium. At that moment a new power structure will solidify in a country that ranks second in the world in proven oil reserves; that occupies the geographic and ethnographic center of the world's most volatile region; that now harbors many of the most dedicated enemies of the democratic West. Will the United States want to be present, as one of the shaping forces, when that settlement is finally reached? Will it want to influence which Iraqi parties are stronger, and which weaker, in the final balance?

If so, the question the country faces is not what can be done on Washington's time, in six or 12 months. It's how the U.S. mission can be configured to adapt to the clock that's running in Iraq.

Quagmire Of The Vanities (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

The only real question about the planned “surge” in Iraq — which is better described as a Vietnam-style escalation — is whether its proponents are cynical or delusional.

Senator Joseph Biden, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, thinks they’re cynical. He recently told The Washington Post that administration officials are simply running out the clock, so that the next president will be “the guy landing helicopters inside the Green Zone, taking people off the roof.”

Daniel Kahneman, who won the Nobel Memorial Prize in Economic Science for his research on irrationality in decision-making, thinks they’re delusional. Mr. Kahneman and Jonathan Renshon recently argued in Foreign Policy magazine that the administration’s unwillingness to face reality in Iraq reflects a basic human aversion to cutting one’s losses — the same instinct that makes gamblers stay at the table, hoping to break even.

Of course, such gambling is easier when the lives at stake are those of other people’s children.

Well, we don’t have to settle the question. Either way, what’s clear is the enormous price our nation is paying for President Bush’s character flaws.

I began writing about the Bush administration’s infallibility complex, the president’s Captain Queeg-like inability to own up to mistakes, almost a year before the invasion of Iraq. When you put a man like that in a position of power — the kind of position where he can punish people who tell him what he doesn’t want to hear, and base policy decisions on the advice of people who play to his vanity — it’s a recipe for disaster.

Consider, on one side, the case of the C.I.A.’s Baghdad station chief during 2004, who provided accurate assessments of the deteriorating situation in Iraq. “What is he, some kind of defeatist?” asked the president — and according to The Washington Post, at the end of his tour, the station chief “was punished with a poor assignment.”

On the other side, consider the men Mr. Bush has turned to since the midterm election. They constitute a remarkable coalition of the unwilling — men who have been wrong about Iraq every step of the way, but aren't willing to admit it.

The principal proponents of the "surge" are William Kristol of The Weekly Standard and Frederick Kagan of the American Enterprise Institute. Now, even if the Joint Chiefs of Staff hadn't given the surge a thumbs down, Mr. Kristol's track record should have been reason enough to ignore his advice. For example, early in the war, Mr. Kristol dismissed as "pop sociology" warnings that there would be conflict between Sunnis and Shiites and that the Shiites might try to create an Islamic fundamentalist state. He assured National Public Radio listeners that "Iraq's always been very secular."

But Mr. Kristol and Mr. Kagan appealed to Mr. Bush's ego, suggesting that he might yet be able to rescue his signature war. And am I the only person to notice that after all the Oedipal innuendo surrounding the Iraq Study Group — Daddy's men coming in to fix Junior's mess, etc. — Mr. Bush turned for advice to two other sons of famous and more successful fathers?

Not that Mr. Bush rejects all advice from elder statesmen. We now know that he has been talking to Henry Kissinger. But Mr. Kissinger is a kindred spirit. In remarks published after his death, Gerald Ford said of his secretary of state, "Henry in his mind never made a mistake, so whatever policies there were that he implemented, in retrospect he would defend."

Oh, and Senator John McCain, the first major political figure to advocate a surge, is another man who can't admit mistakes. Mr. McCain now says that he always knew that the conflict was "probably going to be long and hard and tough" — but back in 2002, before the Senate voted on the resolution authorizing the use of force, he declared that a war with Iraq would be "fairly easy."

Mr. Bush is expected to announce his plan for escalation in the next few days. According to the BBC, the theme of his speech will be "sacrifice." But sacrifice for what? Not for the national interest, which would be best served by withdrawing before the strain of the war breaks our ground forces. No, Iraq has become a quagmire of the vanities — a place where America is spending blood and treasure to protect the egos of men who won't admit that they were wrong.

The Lynching Of Iraq (BOS)

The Boston Globe, January 8, 2007

THE HANGING of Saddam Hussein Dec. 30 offered a view into the grotesque reality of what America has sponsored in Iraq, and what Americans saw should inform their response to President Bush's escalation of the war.

The deposed tyrant was mercilessly taunted. As he stood on the threshold of the afterlife and was told to go to hell, the world witnessed a chilling elevation of the ancient curse, making an absolute villain an object of pity.

And then, in chanting the name of Moqtada al-Sadr, whose family had been a particular target of Hussein's his executioners made clear that the execution was an act of tribal revenge, not of national restoration, much less justice. It was a lynching. This Shi'ite brutality is guaranteed to spawn Sunni savagery. Iraq itself is hell.

Officials of the United States, from military commanders in Baghdad to members of the Bush administration in Washington, sought to distance themselves from the bedlam, but they are essential to what happened at the last moments of Saddam's life. Decorum would have been the main note of his death if Americans had managed it, but the execution would have been no less an act of false justice.

The harsh fact is that the Shi'ite dominated government of Nouri al-Maliki, in its contemptible treatment of a man about to die, laid bare the dark truth of Bush's war. This is what revenge looks like, and revenge (not weapons of mass destruction, not democracy) drove the initial US attack on Saddam Hussein every bit as much as it snuffed out his life at the end. The hooded executioners took their cue from George W. Bush.

And why should they not have? Let's remember who this man is. As governor of Texas, he presided over the executions of 152 people, including the first woman put to death in Texas in a century. Her name was Karla Faye Tucker. Bush's response to the world-wide plea raised in her behalf was an astounding display of cruelty, a mocking imitation of the woman begging not to be killed.

Bush rejected appeals for clemency in every death penalty case that came before him. The Texas death chamber, with its lethal injection gurney, is a place of decorum. And savagery. That executions defined the main public distinction that Bush brought to the US presidency sums up the national disgrace, while suggesting also how little surprise there should be that America is presided over now by an executioner-in-chief.

Capital punishment is to individuals what aggressive war is to nations. The 20th century, for all its brutality (or because of it), marked the watershed era when world opinion shifted against both. Once, princes exercised life-and-death power over subjects with unchallenged authority. Once, the only check on a state's freedom to attack another state was its power to do so.

These two absolutes of realpolitik have changed. From the Kellogg-Briand Pact of 1928 to principles laid down at the Nuremberg tribunals to the United Nations itself, wars of aggression stand condemned. The force of state violence is to be exercised only in self-defense or in defense of a victim people, in circumstances defined by international agreement. Similarly, nation after nation has abolished the death penalty, understanding the absurdity of defending human life by destroying human life. If killing can ever be justified, individually or communally, it is only as an absolute last resort. In sum, an international moral consensus has taken shape against unnecessary violence, whether targeting a criminal or a rogue state.

George W. Bush is the impresario of unnecessary violence. America has followed him into the death chamber of this war, and now he wants us to believe that the way out is through more death.

Iraqi loss of life remains mostly unimagined, but every evening on the television news, Americans see the sweet faces of young soldiers who have died in Bush's war. They were heroes, not criminals, yet Bush dragged each one of them up onto a gallows. He positioned them on the trap door, hardly wincing as they then fell through. And now, in perhaps the greatest outrage of all, Bush claims that the way to justify the unnecessary deaths he has caused is to add to them. Escalation is his way of saying, go to hell.

With his lies at the beginning of this war, and his fantasy now that an honorable outcome remains possible, the president is a taunting killer, caught in the act. He lacks nothing but the black hood. Stop this man.

Editorial | Change In Washington (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 8, 2007

The only blizzard in Washington this winter has been from all the personnel changes President Bush has made to handle Iraq and other foreign policy crises.

While the changes may be good, new nameplates on desks need to be accompanied by new and better plans for stabilizing and exiting Iraq, for carrying out diplomacy around the world, and for more fully coordinating U.S. intelligence gathering.

What started with the removal of former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has continued with a new director of national intelligence, a new deputy secretary of state, and probably new military commanders to head U.S. operations in Iraq.

Out as the first U.S. director of national intelligence is John Negroponte, who, if confirmed by the Senate, will return to the State Department as deputy secretary.

Negroponte's sudden move is not because he messed up as intelligence chief over the last 18 months. He made a decent start of herding 16 national intelligence agencies. But his experience and skills may be of greater use to State, which needs a seasoned diplomat in that high-ranking position.

Negroponte's appointment, along with the expected nomination of Zalmay Khalilzad to follow John Bolton as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, could indicate that Bush will take diplomacy more seriously in his last two years in office.

That would be a smart course for the administration to take, especially when it comes to U.S. policy in Iraq.

Bush is expected to announce his new strategy for Iraq this week.

He seems to be trying to show he can change with the circumstances, by replacing Gen. John Abizaid with Adm. William Fallon to lead the Central Command, and Lt. Gen. David Petraeus to replace Gen. George Casey as the top U.S. commander on the ground in Iraq.

But Bush's own statements and leaks about this week's announcement suggest that he still hasn't gripped the reality that the earlier U.S. goal - to turn Iraq into a stable democracy - is now unachievable.

A temporary increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, which is what Bush is expected to recommend, won't change that - especially if the outmoded goals and tactics remain the same.

Simply looking into Iraqi President Nouri al-Maliki's eyes to see whether he is sincere about disbanding Shiite death squads won't work either.

Bush ought to listen to the Baker-Hamilton commission's suggestions to beef up the training of Iraqi security forces, and hold talks with regional neighbors, including Iran and Syria, who can influence the outcome in Iraq.

New nameplates on desks can be good. Realism and well-thought-out goals and tactics are better.

Resort To 'Soft-partition' Repair? (WT)

By Edward P. Joseph/michael E. O'hanlon, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

As the nation and world await President Bush's speech on what could be his last chance to get Iraq policy right, it is time to face the reality that a multiethnic, integrated, democratic Iraq is probably no longer attainable. The sectarian-based responses to Saddam's execution are only the latest proof of this fact.

Proposals for a U.S. troop surge, more American trainers in Iraqi army and police forces, and a reinvigorated economic recovery package including a job creation program all have serious arguments in their defense. But at a time when nearly 5,000 people are dying and 100,000 Iraqis are being driven from their homes each month, it is also time to develop a backup plan for ending the civil war that we have proven unable to prevent.

Many have already concluded our backup plan for Iraq should be packing up and going home -- or, at most, redeploying to Iraq's borders to protect displaced civilians and deter its neighbors from entering into the civil war. But there is at least one promising Plan B that, while hardly ideal, would be far better for America, Iraq, and the broader region than complete defeat, all-out civil war, and the possibility of broader regional conflict. It would build on Sen. Joe Biden and former Assistant Secretary Leslie Gelb's idea of a soft partitioning of Iraq -- moving away from centralization toward a loose federation (akin to Bosnia) of three largely autonomous regions in which present and future oil revenues would be shared equitably. But it would go beyond Biden/Gelb to confront directly the sectarian strife now raging in and around Baghdad. Rather than striving for a "neutral Baghdad" as Mr. Biden and Mr. Gelb propose, the Iraqi government would assist threatened minorities relocate to where they feel safer -- helping them find new jobs and housing in the process.

This is in effect the Bosnia model for Iraq. Bosnia's war ended only after as many as 200,000 died, and half the country's population had either been expelled or fled, leaving the country a patchwork of ethnically pure pieces. NATO air power, a reinforced U.N. contingent, and strengthened Muslim and Croat armies were critical elements leading to peace. But the Dayton accords of 1995 were centered on the fact ethnic relocations had occurred, creating definable and mostly defensible territories. At that point of ethnic consolidation, it was possible to negotiate and then implement land swaps among Serbs, Croats, and Muslims, creating a map and federal structure that a decade later is still tolerated by key parties.

In a rapidly disintegrating Iraq, our goal should be similarly to create militarily defensible subregions, while attenuating the violence. That way, a unitary state could be preserved -- to share oil revenue equitably, conduct foreign policy, maintain some limited national institutions, and hold out the hope of a more cohesive Iraq in the future. Ethnic relocation is distasteful and not free from risk, but if carried out with care as government policy, it can occur with less trauma than in the Balkans.

In effect, Iraq is already becoming Bosnia. As noted, according to statistics from the UNHCR and Brookings-Bern project on the internally displaced, perhaps 100,000 more Iraqis are forcibly driven from their homes each month. About half wind up abroad, the other half displaced within Iraq. And the displacement increasingly takes on a Balkanlike, territorial logic. Sunni clerics now assert that the Shia are trying to establish a "Sunni-free corridor across northern Baghdad." In other words, ethnic displacement is no longer solely the province of criminals and renegades like Muqtada al-Sadr, but has become policy.

Our choice is no longer whether we want ethnic relocation in Iraq or not. The choice is fast becoming whether we want to manage the process humanely and in a way that leads to stability, or allow ethnic killing and cleansing to reach their logical, terrible conclusion.

To be sure, facilitating ethnic relocation can also encourage it. A few small acts of violence against minorities in a given neighborhood, and they will be more apt to quickly relocate, knowing protection and a new home and job await somewhere else in the country. This could in turn encourage those few small acts of violence on the part of local majorities wishing to consolidate their ethnic group's control of a given region. But ethnic cleansing is already a full-blown reality in Iraq; at some point, one needs to address it rather than pretend it has not yet become a huge problem.

Obtaining agreement in Iraq will require not only limited rapprochement among some Sunni and Shi'ite leaders, but a constructive role by the Kurds who are already ensconced in relative security in their own compact territory. Kurds see the oil rich, multiethnic town of Kirkuk as both the capital of their longed-for state and a symbol of their oppression at the hands of Saddam (who engineered mass Sunni migration to Kirkuk while expelling Kurds.)

Tens of thousands of Kurds have returned to Kirkuk already, heightening tensions. The International Organization for Migration has detailed the serious lack of basic services and opportunities for displaced persons, only serving to aggravate tensions.

The upsurge in sectarian warfare has emboldened the Kurds and their backers to advance the partition-independence agenda. U.S. pressure on the Kurds (whose territory has been used as a base for Kurdish separatists in Turkey) could encourage them to cut a deal on Kirkuk's oil while earning greater Sunni cooperation on property swaps in the town. And such progress on ethnic movements in a place like Kirkuk could set the basis for more ambitious land swaps similar to those on Sarajevo and Western Bosnia that were a crucial component in attaining peace for Bosnia.

With U.S. assistance, the international community and Iraqi government would offer new houses and jobs to those who wished to move voluntarily, as well as protection for them as they left home and packed up to a different region. Houses left behind would revert to government ownership, to be offered to individuals of other ethnic groups who wanted them, in what would largely become a swapping program. Already there are examples of Iraqis trading houses on their own. With safeguards for security, the Iraqi government could form property commissions -- as have already been created in Kirkuk -- to facilitate matches and avoid swindles.

We must not wait for slaughter in Iraq to reach the exhaustion point before finally confronting the reality of mass ethnic movements. Facilitating ethnic movement is not risk free. But it may soon become the only option before condemning Iraq to years of Bosnia-like fratricidal violence. If the president does not have this idea in his January speech, it is time he and his advisers start laying the groundwork with Iraqis for serious consideration of the idea in the coming months. If we want to control the ethnic relocation process rather than let genocidal hatred drive it, we may not have much more time.

Pelosi Hints At Resisting Troop Surge (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, January 8, 2007

Democrats now running Congress will not give President Bush a blank check to wage war in Iraq, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Sunday, suggesting they could deny him the money should he call for additional troops.

Yet Pelosi's second-in-command and a Senate leader on foreign affairs questioned the wisdom and legality of using the power of the purse to thwart the White House as Bush prepared to announce his revised war strategy this week — perhaps on Wednesday.

Republicans, now in the minority, said more troops were needed to get a handle on the spiraling violence in Iraq. They also cast doubt whether Democrats would — or could — block the president's plans. "Congress is incapable of micromanaging the tactics in the war," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky.

Pelosi made clear that her party supported boosting the overall size of the military "to protect the American people against any threats to our interests, wherever they may occur. That's different, though, from adding troops to Iraq." She also said Democrats would not cut off money for those troops already in Iraq.

But dollars for a further buildup in Iraq — Bush's expected plan could send as many as 20,000 additional U.S. troops — will get the strictest of scrutiny, she said.

"The burden is on the president to justify any additional resources for a mission," said Pelosi, D-Calif. "Congress is ready to use its constitutional authority of oversight to question what is the justification for this spending, what are the results we are receiving."

"There's not a carte blanche, a blank check for him to do whatever he wishes there," she added in an interview taped Saturday and broadcast Sunday.

Asked about Pelosi's remarks, White House spokesman Alex Conant said Bush welcomed any ideas on Iraq that "lead to success."

"We're glad the speaker wants us to succeed in Iraq," he said.

Bush was putting the finishing touches on his new policy over the weekend. In addition to the troop increase, it could provide more money for jobs and reconstruction programs in Iraq.

Since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Congress has approved about $500 billion for Iraq, Afghanistan and other terrorism-fighting efforts. The White House is working on its largest-ever appeal for more war funds — a record $100 billion, at least. It will be submitted along with Bush's Feb. 5 budget.

While leading Democrats reaffirmed their opposition to a troop buildup, several did not join Pelosi in suggesting it was possible Congress could deny Bush the money for the additional forces.

"I don't want to anticipate that," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md.

Sen. Joe Biden, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a 2008 presidential candidate, said increasing troops would be a "tragic mistake." But he contended Congress was constitutionally powerless to second-guess Bush's military strategy because lawmakers had voted to authorize the commander in chief to wage war.

"As a practical matter, there's no way to say, 'Mr. President, stop,'" Biden said, unless enough congressional Republicans join Democrats in persuading Bush that the strategy is wrong. "You can't go in and, like a tinker toy, and play around and say, 'You can't spend the money on this piece and this piece.'"

Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., told Bush in a letter last week that Democrats oppose additional U.S. forces in Iraq and want him to begin withdrawing in four months to six months American troops already there.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., criticized the Democratic proposal as a "formula for defeat," saying more troops are needed because the U.S. military never had enough personnel in Iraq to get the job done.

"If we don't start over, and do what we should have done in the beginning — having enough people to win this war — we will pay a heavy price," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0113193

"They never talked one minute in that letter what happens to Iraq when we leave," Graham added. "In all honesty we are not winning, and if you're not winning, you're losing. And now's the time to come up with a strategy to win."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., wrote in Sunday's Washington Post that boosting troops for an indefinite time was necessary to secure peace in the Mideast.

"When we authorized this war, we accepted the responsibility to make sure they could prevail," he wrote. "Even greater than the costs incurred thus far and in the future are the catastrophic consequences that would ensure from our failure in Iraq."

But Pelosi, pointing to the November elections that ousted Republicans from control of the House and Senate, said Iraq already is in complete chaos.

"The American people have spoken very clearly on the subject in the election," she said. "And this war in Iraq is damaging our military readiness, so it is not making America safer, it is not making the region more stable."

Ahead of his speech, Bush planned to continue briefings with lawmakers this week, culminating in a meeting with bipartisan leadership on Wednesday, according to lawmakers and aides.

Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said she would like to see a congressional vote on whether Bush can send in additional troops.

"My belief is, the president's coming to us," she said. "He's going to ask for billions and billions of dollars. He's going to send more of our people into harm's way. I think it would be best for the country if we got to vote on that surge or escalation."

Pelosi spoke on CBS' "Face the Nation," McConnell and Hoyer appeared on "Fox News Sunday," Biden and Graham were on NBC's "Meet the Press" and Boxer appeared on CNN's "Late Edition."

Pelosi Threatens To Reject Funds For Troop Surge (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and other top Democrats yesterday said their party might deny funding for President Bush's expected call this week for a troop surge in Iraq if he doesn't meet their demands for detailed consultations and congressional debate on military strategy.

"If the president chooses to escalate the war, in his budget request we want to see a distinction between what is there to support the troops who are there now. The American people and the Congress support those troops. We will not abandon them," the California Democrat said during an appearance on CBS' "Face the Nation."

"But if the president wants to add to this mission, he is going to have to justify it. And this is new for him because up until now the Republican Congress has given him a blank check with no oversight, no standards, no conditions."

Rep. David R. Obey, Wisconsin Democrat and House Appropriations Committee chairman, echoed his party leader's warnings and some of her wording, saying, "There are certainly going to be no blank checks" from his panel.

"I think we're going to scrub his request and, at the same time, use it as a chance to really discuss whether or not the policy behind that request makes any sense," he said.

But he, like Mrs. Pelosi, was quick to emphasize that a rejection of a surge did not equate to abandoning the forces already stationed in Iraq.

"I think the Congress will provide everything that the troops need," he said during an appearance on ABC's "This Week."

In a letter to the president on Friday, Mrs. Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, cautioned Mr. Bush against calling for a troop surge, although it did not threaten to wield Congress' purse power.

"Surging forces is a strategy that you have already tried and that has already failed," the letter reads. "Like many current and former military leaders, we believe that trying again would be a serious mistake. They, like us, believe there is no purely military solution in Iraq."

Mrs. Pelosi was more explicit yesterday.

"The burden is on the president to justify any additional resources for a mission," she said. "Congress is ready to use its constitutional authority of oversight to question what is the justification for this spending."

Mrs. Pelosi's fellow Californian Sen. Barbara Boxer said on CNN's "Late Edition" that she would like to see Congress vote on whether Mr. Bush can send more troops and issued warnings about funding a surge.

"My belief is, the president's coming to us," said Mrs. Boxer, a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "He's going to ask for billions and billions of dollars. ... I think it would be best for the country if we got to vote on that surge or escalation."

She added that "there's nothing against that in the Constitution. We do have the power of the purse."

CNN's Wolf Blitzer asked Mrs. Boxer: "So you want to use that power of the purse?"

DOJ_NMG_0113194

"I want to use it in terms of whether or not we should fund this escalation if, in fact, that's what the president does," Mrs. Boxer responded.

While Washington has seen much speculation on how many Republican lawmakers would support a troop surge, party leaders yesterday were decidedly more supportive.

"I think to basically begin to withdraw before the job is finished is a mistake," Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell said yesterday during an appearance on "Fox News Sunday." "If the president recommends what we seem to believe he's going to recommend, I intend to support him."

The Kentucky Republican also pointed out that at least one non-Republican, Sen. Joe Lieberman, also supports a surge. The Connecticut independent appeared with Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, at an American Enterprise Institute panel in Washington on Friday to support a surge.

"All I ask of my Republican colleagues, Democratic colleagues and the nation is just to hear the president out. I think there'll be a lot of support by Republican members," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, who supports a surge, on NBC's "Meet the Press."

The South Carolina Republican acknowledged that a surge is not popular but said a withdrawal from Iraq would be a mistake.

"To me, it is a strategy that is based on the needs of the moment. Even though it may not be politically popular for the moment, I think it is in our best interests long term."

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, a longtime rival of Mrs. Pelosi, said he opposes a surge but declined to threaten funding limits.

"We don't see this as a new policy, and I think it's going to be greeted with great skepticism," the Maryland Democrat told "Fox News Sunday." "We've also done the economic investment before -- unfortunately, with not very good positive results."

But when asked about denying funding, Mr. Hoyer said, "I don't want to anticipate that."

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, also said he opposes a troop surge but added that he doesn't think Democrats have the power to stop one.

"There's not much I can do about it. Not much anybody can do about it," Mr. Biden told NBC's "Meet the Press."

Bush Must 'Justify' Surge, Pelosi Says (LAT)

By Judy Pasternak

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democratic congressional leaders, asserting their new majorities in the House and the Senate, said Sunday that President Bush's plan for a new direction in Iraq would face scrutiny on Capitol Hill.

"It's not an open-ended commitment anymore," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) said on CBS' "Face the Nation."

The president, who has been holding extensive discussions with his war Cabinet and has reshuffled military leadership, is expected to announce a change in strategy soon, perhaps Wednesday.

He is considering sending at least 20,000 more troops to help establish order in Baghdad, a course that Pelosi and new Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) called unacceptable in a letter they sent to Bush on Friday.

The two called instead for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops, starting in four to six months.

But the Democratic leaders also acknowledged that they had a limited ability to prevent the White House from adding forces. Any effort to block funding would expose them to charges of not supporting the troops. And since Congress authorized the use of force in Iraq, placing restraints on that approval could be unconstitutional.

Pelosi emphasized that Congress would not cut off funding for U.S. forces now in Iraq, and said that Democrats supported the president's proposal to increase the overall size of the Army and the Marine Corps.

But, she added, when Bush submits a budget request, "we want to see a distinction between what is there to support the troops who are there now" and what he needs to send more to the combat zone.

"If the president wants to add to this mission, he is going to have to justify it," Pelosi said. "And this is new for him because, up until now, the Republican Congress has given him a blank check."

Any request for additional funding, she said, "will receive the harshest scrutiny."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, acknowledged that Bush, as commander in chief, had the constitutional authority to order more U.S. troops to Iraq.

It would be unconstitutional, Biden said on NBC's "Meet the Press," for Congress to "micromanage the war" by putting a cap on troop strength after authorizing the use of force.

DOJ_NMG_0113195

Calling the proposal for a rapid influx of forces "a tragic mistake," he said, "As a practical matter, there's no way to say, 'Mr. President, stop.' "

In his speech, Bush is also expected to propose a jobs program, at a cost of as much as $1 billion, to employ young Iraqis who otherwise might join the insurgency. The plan also will include proposals for increased economic aid that would further increase the total bill.

Various aspects of Bush's Iraq policy will be examined by House and Senate committees over the next few weeks, several new Democratic chairmen said.

Biden, who confirmed Sunday that he would be running for president in 2008, said his committee, in a four-week series of hearings starting Tuesday, would ask "experts from every perspective" to discuss what options remain in Iraq.

Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.) said on ABC's "This Week" that his House Appropriations Committee would "scrub" the president's requests for money for both a troop buildup and economic development.

Obey said he supported such aid earlier in the conflict, but the money was never fully spent because of the violence in Iraq.

"I am rather dubious that they'll be able to do it this time as well," Obey said.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles), chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, said on the same program that during a week of hearings starting Feb. 6 he intended to focus on waste and corruption among private contractors in Iraq, along with those hired for security in the U.S. and Hurricane Katrina cleanup.

"Only a small part of the money spent in Iraq has been audited," he said, "but what we've seen is very, very frightening."

Several Republicans have also criticized the notion of a troop increase, questioning whether U.S. forces should take on a task that Iraq's own government has been reluctant or unable to perform.

Even Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, a member of the House GOP leadership, said on CNN's "Late Edition," "You can't secure the future for a people who don't want to secure their own future."

But he urged members of Congress and the public to listen carefully to Bush's final plan.

"I see this as one of the last chances for the Iraqi people to secure their future with us as a principal partner," Blunt said.

On Saturday, Iraq's prime minister, Nouri Maliki, announced a new effort to end bloodshed in Baghdad, using the Iraqi army rather than police officers.

His speech, to commemorate Iraqi Army Day, took place on a day when at least 71 corpses were found in the Baghdad streets, where Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias have operated with impunity.

Such levels of violence have led Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, to support "a surge in troops with a purpose," joined with Iraqi military and political leaders "to control this country."

"Now's the time to start over," Graham said on "Meet the Press." "If we don't start over and do what we should've done in the beginning … we will pay a heavy price."

Graham said more U.S. forces working with Iraqi troops would offer "our best chance for victory."

But he added, "It may not work."

Scholars Wade Into Troop Surge (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

Congressional Democrats who want to block any proposed escalation in U.S. troop levels in Iraq have the constitutional authority and the legal power to do so, scholars says.

"It's a fundamental constitutional principle that Congress can initiate and regulate war," said Neil Kinkopf, a law professor at Georgia State University in Atlanta.

Mr. Kinkopf, a former Clinton administration Justice Department official who worked in the Office of Legal Counsel, presented a paper for the liberal American Constitution Society last week arguing that Congress has the power to stop President Bush from sending additional troops to Iraq -- a move many expect him to announce this week.

"As commander in chief, the president's role is to prosecute the war that Congress has authorized," Mr. Kinkopf wrote. "The president may not go beyond this authorization."

Mr. Kinkopf says that the law authorizing the Iraq war, passed by Congress in 2002, clearly includes the authority for the kind of surge in troop numbers currently being considered.

"As a legal matter, that [congressional] authorization was drafted broadly enough to encompass the escalation that the president has in contemplation," Mr. Kinkopf wrote.

But, he argues, Congress could simply pass another authorization "effectively limiting the number of troops deployed in Iraq."

As an alternative, Congress could pass a so-called "appropriations rider," restricting the administration from spending any money to make the troop surge happen.

In either case, Mr. Bush would have to use his veto if he wanted to go ahead with any planned escalation, Mr. Kinkopf said.

But Carl Conetta, co-director of the project on Defense Alternatives, a think tank that researches military requirements in the post-Cold War world, told UPI that such a move would be politically tricky for the new Democratic leadership of the Congress.

"It would put them in a difficult position, one that could be spun by the administration as hamstringing the war effort," he said. "That's exactly where the administration's supporters would like to put them."

Mr. Conetta said that the Democrats might end up trying to "oppose this effort [at escalation] ... without taking congressional action to stop it."

But he said it was more likely they would "play every card to its conclusion," and try to block any escalation -- knowing that "in the end they will fail -- that the president will get his way."

"They may content themselves with complaining loudly," he said.

Activists Demand An End To War Funds (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON -- With President Bush poised to announce a surge in US troops in Iraq this week, antiwar activists in the Democratic Party are stepping up demands that their party's leaders cut off funding for the war -- a dramatic step that would force the president to quickly end American involvement in the war.

Calls for Congress to use the power of the purse to shape war policy are coming from the party's base of vocal war opponents, as well as a growing number of rank-and-file Democratic lawmakers who view November's midterm congressional elections as a demand from the public for Democrats to force the president to end the war.

Today, Representative Dennis Kucinich, a liberal Ohio Democrat, plans to outline a proposal for Congress to deny Bush any more funds for the war and have the United Nations lead a security force to stabilize Iraq.

"Our very majority was created through a determination by the people of this country that they wanted a new direction in Iraq," said Kucinich, who ran for president in 2004 on an antiwar platform and has announced a 2008 candidacy as well.

The push by liberals underscores a split within the Democratic Party that winning the majority in Congress hasn't healed. Democrats are caught between a desire to support US troops and appear strong on national security and a sometimes competing push to end an increasingly unpopular war.

"It'll be an interesting leadership challenge to manage these different pieces," said Brian Katulis, a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress who has written extensively on the war. "But Iraq is not going away."

The intra party tension was on display yesterday, with new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi again rejecting suggestions that Democrats cut off funding for forces now in Iraq.

Pelosi held out the possibility that Democrats would pare down the president's future funding requests to try to prevent a troop increase but said Democrats' efforts to influence war policies would never extend to cutting funds for troops already in the field.

"We will always be there to protect our troops and support our troops," Pelosi, a California Democrat, said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

Since winning the November elections, Democratic leaders in Congress have taken a cautious approach to the war. The issue of Iraq was omitted entirely from House Democrats' agenda for their first 100 legislative hours in power, as Democrats focus on domestic issues such as raising the minimum wage and expanding stem cell research.

House and Senate leaders are urging a "phased redeployment" of troops that is not tied to a timeline, and some have signaled a willingness to accept a temporary increase in troop levels as part of a broader plan for ending the war.

Pelosi made clear in her first speech as speaker that she will look to the president to chart a new course in Iraq before Democrats try to influence policy. Bush is scheduled to address the nation on his plan for Iraq as early as Wednesday evening.

But even before the new Congress began, some peace activists began expressing dismay that Democrats aren't doing more to end the war. A group of antiwar protesters led by Cindy Sheehan, the mother of a slain soldier who gained fame during her summer 2005 vigil outside Bush's Texas ranch, disrupted a press conference Democrats were holding Wednesday in Washington on their ethics and lobbying measures.

"We didn't put you in power to work with the people that have been murdering hundreds of thousands of people since they have been in power," Sheehan said after Democratic leaders were forced to cut short the news conference.

Liberal activists are likely to become even more agitated if Congress stands by while Bush sends more troops to Iraq. With that in mind, House and Senate Democratic leaders took the unusual step Friday of preemptively opposing a major increase in troop levels in Iraq -- something Bush is expected to call for this week.

But it remains unclear whether Democrats will be able to stop a troop surge -- much less hasten the end of the war itself -- without withholding funding. Leading Democrats, including Pelosi and Senate majority leader Harry Reid, have been nearly unanimous in rejecting a move to cut off funds, and some who want to end the war now are hesitant to take such a step.

Representative William D. Delahunt, a Quincy Democrat who serves on the US House International Relations Committee, said Democrats should use congressional hearings to establish the best course and to inform the public about the options that exist.

"You don't want to make the same kind of mistakes getting out that this administration did getting in," Delahunt said. "I'm satisfied that withdrawal as soon as practically possible is the best solution. But it is very important to educate not just the American people, but members of Congress and policy makers about this war and how we can end it."

Yet Kucinich cautions that approving the administration's next war budget request -- the Pentagon is expected to ask for at least $100 billion more in the new federal budget -- could give the president all the money he needs to continue the war through the end of his term.

"You can't say you're opposed to the war and keep funding it," he said.

Representative Gregory W. Meeks, a New York Democrat, said Congress would be wrong to give up its most powerful tool by giving the administration all the money it wants for the war.

"The American people were clear in the election that they don't want more troops in Iraq," said. "We have to -- and we will -- stand up and go in a different direction."

Democrats Revise Agenda To Deal With War In Iraq (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

Democratic leaders who had hoped to emphasize their domestic agenda in the opening weeks of Congress have concluded that Iraq will share top billing, and they plan on aggressively confronting administration officials this week in a series of hearings.

Pushed by House members who want a quick, tough response to the Iraq strategy President Bush is expected to announce this week, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has backed off from her initial assertion that nothing should detract attention from the legislation she hopes to pass in the first 100 hours of House debate.

Late last week, she summoned the chairmen of the Armed Services, Foreign Affairs, intelligence, Homeland Security, and Oversight and Government Reform committees to plot a series of hearings. On Thursday, Democrats will call Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to appear before the House Foreign Affairs Committee to defend the war-strategy shift Bush will outline in a nationally televised speech.

A House Armed Services Committee hearing with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, planned for Jan. 19 was abruptly moved to this Thursday after consultations with Pelosi. And leadership aides went to work on a response to Bush's speech that they hope will be delivered on national television after the president's appearance.

In the Senate, the Foreign Relations Committee will hold hearings Wednesday on the current situation in Iraq, then grill Rice on the president's plan Thursday. Pace and Gates will go before the Senate Armed Services Committee on Friday.

"Iraq is the elephant in the room," said Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.), a member of the House Armed Services Committee and a close ally of Pelosi's.

Democrats had hoped that the headlines and evening news would be dominated by votes in Congress to bolster homeland security, raise the minimum wage, fund stem cell research and grant the federal government authority to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare. Each of those measures will be taken up on sequential days this week, a bill-a-day approach designed to capture headlines and show the nation that Democrats can get things done.

But with Bush's long-awaited policy address tentatively set for midweek, those much-touted bills are not likely to lead the news, and the Democratic leaders have been forced to change their tactics.

"The challenge for them is this: Iraq is the central issue. It's an enormous problem for the president and the Republicans, but it has the suffocating effect of taking attention away from the Democrats' domestic legislative priorities, and I think they understand that," said Joe Lockhart, a White House press secretary in the Clinton administration.

To some Democrats, the House leaders' response to the burgeoning war debate has been too slow and too cautious. A CBS News poll released Thursday found that 45 percent of voters want the Democratic Congress to focus on Iraq, a figure that far outstripped the percentages for the economy and jobs, at 7 percent; health care, at 7 percent; and immigration, at 6 percent. "Americans couldn't be clearer," the poll report concluded.

Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich (D-Ohio), a leader in the antiwar movement, said that as soon as Bush delivers his proposal, Democratic leaders need to be ready with a thorough plan to end the war. Kucinich will outline his own war plan in a speech in New York today.

"When Democrats were in the minority, the default position of the Republican leadership was to take the war off the table, but the war is the 800-pound gorilla," he said. "It ain't moving off the table. Congress has to intervene right now."

Early Friday afternoon, Rep. Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), a House Armed Services Committee member, groused that an Iraq hearing planned for Jan. 19 was at least a week too late. "We on the Armed Services [Committee] feel strongly that we need to begin the hearing process immediately," he said.

By late afternoon, the hearing was rescheduled for this week.

Some Democratic strategists urged party members to stick to their original plan, passing kitchen-table legislation every day, such as the minimum-wage increase and the stem cell bill, while Bush struggles with the war. Celinda Lake, a Democratic strategist and pollster, called it "the perfect juxtaposition."

"People are not looking to their individual members of Congress to solve the Iraq war," she said. "For the House to be focused on it now would look like partisan bickering rather than getting on with the people's business."

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) agreed that the Democrats have the winning hand. Bush may be grabbing the spotlight by shaking up his war advisers, bolstering troop strength in Baghdad and pushing more money into Iraq reconstruction, but the news reports are doing him no good, he said.

"I know where support for more troops is, and I know where support is for the minimum-wage increase," said Emanuel, the fourth-ranking House Democrat. "I'd rather be doing what we're doing."

By the weekend, however, Emanuel had acknowledged the Democrats' strategic shift. He still was not worried that Bush might be scoring political points, but he said the Democrats have to respond.

"This is not a surge; it's an escalation, and we want to make sure the definition is correct," he said. "When the American people voted for change in November, this is not what they had in mind."

Capitol Hill Prepares For Tough Hearings On Iraq (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 8, 2007

Even before President Bush lays out his "new way forward" in Iraq, the Demo-cratic majority in Congress and a growing number of Republicans say they will oppose any troop surge - but not to the point of blocking funding for the war.

That means a key aspect of the president's plan, expected to be unveiled this week, will run into a wall of words on Capitol Hill, but not much more.

"We're not going to fight their civil war for them," says Rep. Ellen Tauscher (D) of California, who chairs the strategic forces subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee. She supports a shift of existing US forces out of areas of sectarian violence.

But if the president insists on adding forces into the most troubled areas, would she vote to deny him the funds to carry out his plan? "No," she says. "That's why he's got us over a barrel."

Still, oversight hearings convening across Capitol Hill, beginning this week, mark an escalation in congressional opposition to the war, including among members of the president's own party.

Beginning Tuesday new Democratic committee chairmen are launching hearings on issues ranging from military strategy, reconstruction, and diplomacy in the region to the Iraqi refugee crisis.

"We will use these hearings to ask tough questions, demand real solutions, and keep working to bring this war to a close," said Senate majority leader Harry Reid, in the Democratic response to Bush's weekly radio address on Saturday.

Citing the advice of current and past military leaders, Democratic leaders on the Hill are opposing any move to pour additional troops into Iraq, even before Bush announces his plan. Instead, they called on him to begin a "phased redeployment" of US forces in the next four to six months, shifting the mission from combat to "training, logistics, force protection, and counterterror."

"Adding more combat troops will only endanger more Americans and stretch our military to the breaking point for no strategic gain," said Senator Reid and Speaker Nancy Pelosi in a joint letter to the president Friday.

But they, too, say they will not block funding for the war. "It's not on the table," said Reid, after a briefing Friday.

Leading off this month's blitz of Iraq hearings, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is set to convene a closed intelligence briefing Tuesday afternoon. In all, it plans a dozen hearings on the war this month. These hearings, says chairman

Joseph Biden (D) of Delaware, will be "workmanlike," rather than sensational. They are intended to give Americans a sober look at the state of play in Iraq and build consensus for a way forward. "No foreign policy can be sustained in this country without the informed consent of the American people," he adds.

Even in a time of diminishing public support for the war, lawmakers are wary of challenging the president as commander in chief, especially if they could later be tied into losing a war.

"I think to basically begin to withdraw before the job is finished is a mistake. If the president recommends what we seem to believe he's going to recommend, I intend to support him," said Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell, in an interview on Fox News on Sunday.

Yet Congress's ability to influence Bush, should he decide to send tens of thousands of new forces into Iraq, is "very limited," says Norman Ornstein, senior fellow at the American Enterprise Institute. "Theoretically, they could block the funding, but practically, it's not going to happen.

"The American people may not like this war but if you do something that undercuts the commander in chief and creates a potential for chaos, voters will blame you for decades," he adds.

Meanwhile, new Republican opposition to the war is surfacing in Congress. On Friday, Rep. Heather Wilson (R) of New Mexico staked out early opposition to any plan to add more troops in the region.

"I am not a supporter of a surge to do for Iraqis what they will not do for themselves," she said, after returning from a trip to Iraq last week.

But she would not vote to stop funding the war. "The answer is never to stop paying for food for our soldiers. We can't do that," she adds.

Representative Wilson, who served in the Air Force from 1978-89, is one of several Republicans who cite recent trips to the region as the basis for their dissent. In December, Sens. Norm Coleman (R) of Minnesota and Gordon Smith (R) of Oregon broke ranks with the White House on Iraq.

In support of the White House, Sens. John McCain (R) of Arizona and Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, who calls himself an Independent Democrat, stepped up calls for a sustained surge of US forces into Iraq.

"I believe the war is still winnable, but we're going to have to do everything right," said Senator McCain, in a speech before the American Enterprise Institute Friday. "The worst of all worlds is a small, short surge of American forces," he says. A time-limited deployment signals to insurgents that they "can wait it out," McCain says.

A majority of Americans are against increasing troop levels in Iraq. Only about 1 in 5 voters supports sending in more troops, according to a recent survey by the Cook Political Report.

And the intensity of hearings and debate this month could step up pressure on the Bush White House. "In a democracy, you simply cannot go on indefinitely, if you have lost the public, and there's increasing opposition from an increasing share of the political elite. It's an extremely difficult political environment," says Mr. Ornstein.

McCain Vs. Hagel: Two Views On The War (NSWK)

By Jonathan Darman, Richard Wolffe And Evan Thomas

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

War itself is a foreign concept to many solons of Capitol Hill; a small number—perhaps as few as 25 out of 535—have come under fire in combat. John McCain and Chuck Hagel are obvious and visible exceptions. McCain, a Republican from Arizona, was a Navy bomber pilot, shot down and imprisoned by the North Vietnamese for five and a half years. He has, he sometimes says, "more scars than Frankenstein." Hagel, a Republican from Nebraska, was an Army grunt in Vietnam who won two Purple Hearts and still has shrapnel in his chest. Both men have seen the face of war up close. But on the question of the Iraq war, they are almost mirror opposites.

Hagel is "obsessed" with the war in Iraq, says his brother Tom, who served with him in Vietnam. "You can't have a conversation with him without this coming up." During Christmas, Hagel looked "markedly older and grayer than when I saw him this summer down at the beach," says Tom. In an interview with NEWSWEEK last week, Hagel teared up when he began talking about a Purple Heart ceremony he had attended in August in Lincoln, Neb. "You're sitting there thinking, Was this a waste?" said Hagel, who voted for the original congressional resolution backing the war despite raising serious doubts about whether the invasion made sense. He added, somewhat uncomfortably, that at times he wonders whether he has done enough to try to stop the war.

Hagel is not pushing for "Out Now." But he is almost angrily dismissive of the idea of sending an additional 10,000 to 20,000 troops to Iraq. "Are we going to pacify Baghdad?" he asks. "Are we going to break the militia's stronghold? Are we going to use these troops to propel or force a settlement between the Shias and the Sunnis? What's the objective of it? I will guarantee that there's going to be a lot more American casualties. And there's going to be a lot more animosity by the Iraqis." The idea that the Iraqis will respond only to more troops, he says, is "complete folly, unless you're going to kill all the Iraqis."

McCain, by contrast, was almost dispassionate when he told a NEWSWEEK reporter that he wishes to expand the war in Iraq. His attitude was coolly self-assured. "All of us establish records," he says about his repeated calls for more troops in Iraq. "If I was wrong in the beginning, my credibility might be somewhat less now." McCain suggests that the Bush administration, now scrambling to find enough fresh troops to "surge" in Iraq, should have listened to him all along. "I hate to sound so 'I told you so,' but I've been saying we've got to have a larger Army and Marine Corps for a long, long time." McCain can sound a little matter-of-fact about sending young people off to combat, but he marches to a different drummer than most Americans. His 18-year-old son Jimmy, a newly enlisted Marine, may soon be deployed to Iraq, the fourth-generation McCain to go to war.

Hagel and McCain are likely to be increasingly prominent spokesmen for their opposing views on Iraq. McCain is almost surely running for the Republican nomination for president, and Hagel has often been mentioned as a candidate, though he says he has yet to decide if he is running. Both men will be heard from early and often as the debate on Iraq moves to Capitol Hill this winter. As an institution, Congress has by and large taken a pass on the war, voting on a resolution in favor at the outset, but ever since shying away from using the legislative power of the purse or oversight authority. The November elections, by bestowing power on the Democrats, may embolden Congress. This week Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman Joseph Biden of Delaware, an outspoken critic of the war, will hold the first of many confrontational hearings that will keep Bush's war cabinet trooping up the Hill to defend the president and his policies for weeks, and probably months, to come.

The president seems determined to defy his detractors, not to mention popular opinion. This week Bush is expected to announce a "New Way Forward" on Iraq that will call for more troops to try to bring order and political stability to Baghdad. (There has been some uprooting in his own administration, with White House counsel Harriet Miers eased out, presumably for a tougher fighter in the congressional wars ahead; National Intelligence Director John Negroponte resigned to become the deputy secretary of State, for his Iraq experience and to keep an eye on North Korea and Iran, and Gen. David Petraeus, a much-admired Airborne vet with a Princeton Ph.D., was named to run the Iraq war on the ground.) To Bush's many critics, like Hagel, the new Iraq strategy adds up to a waste of more American lives. To Bush's smaller and dwindling band of supporters, like McCain, failure in Iraq is unthinkable. And if duty requires more sacrifice, then so be it.

A senior Bush aide, who declined to be named discussing internal White House strategy, tells NEWSWEEK that the president's way-forward plan will be a middle-road approach that falls somewhere between McCain's and Hagel's positions. He will call for a staggered troop increase based on benchmarks for the Iraqis' performance. Bush hopes to avoid the failures of previous security plans designed by Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki. This time, unlike in past sweeps of Baghdad, Iraqi troops need to fulfill the basic obligation of reporting for duty. There can be no "no go" areas based on sectarian lines and no political interference in security operations. "You literally had a situation where Iraqi security forces would get a call on their cell phone from a politician saying, 'Don't do that, don't go after so-and-so'," the aide says.

Who's right—McCain or Hagel? One way to understand the debate is to examine how two outspoken war veterans have called upon their experiences in Vietnam to wind up in completely different places on Iraq. McCain and Hagel are friends, members of a small, tight fraternity of lawmakers who have been bloodied by war. McCain teasingly calls Hagel "Sarge," and Hagel once gave McCain the seat of an A-4 bomber—the same type of seat McCain was flying in when he broke his arms ejecting from a burning plane over North Vietnam. But when Hagel is asked about their split on Iraq now, his face tightens. McCain, like Hagel, glosses over any discussion of the private debate that has raged between the two men, though he admits it "divides friends."

Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who is close to both men (but sides with McCain on the war), lays out the basic differences between them. "Chuck believes the war in Iraq has deflected from the war on terror, that it was a war of choice," says Graham. "John sees Iraq more like Bush, in that he sees it as the central front on the war on terror, and it was unavoidable."

When McCain and Hagel argue about the Iraq war, says a mutual friend who did not wish to be identified discussing their private conversations, both men often invoke Vietnam. After their own wartime service, each man read deeply about the history of the Vietnam War but reached different conclusions about its meaning. While Hagel hammers away at the similarities between Iraq and Vietnam, McCain often begins sentences by saying, "Unlike Vietnam ... " In one recent chat, says the source, McCain challenged Hagel by arguing that the North Vietnamese were no threat "to our shores," whereas "the people we are finding in Iraq are."

The two men saw the war from sharply different angles. Chuck Hagel "walked point" with an infantry company near the Cambodian border in some of the worst fighting in 1967 and '68. His brother Tom often went on patrol with him (the brothers circumvented an Army rule that bars family members from serving in combat together). "I don't know how many times we would be assigned to go out for a search-and-destroy mission," Tom recalls, "and we'd pass South Vietnamese villages with South Vietnamese soldiers lying around sleeping in hammocks. They're doing easy duty while we were out doing the hard part." The lesson to the Hagel brothers was obvious: "You cannot win somebody else's independence," says Tom. "They have to do it for themselves."

Ground-pounder Tom says that while he respects McCain's service, the bomber pilot could not have known what reality was like down in the jungle: "He was up in the air at 10,000 feet. He never saw the consequences of those bombs." (Tom is a Democrat who's tussled with his brother on partisan politics.) McCain acknowledges that different perspectives can produce different outlooks on the war. He brings up one of Hagel and McCain's mutual friends, Gen. Colin Powell, whose Vietnam service bred a strong reluctance to intervene in a foreign conflict without overwhelming force and a clear exit strategy—the so-called Powell Doctrine. "One of the most impactful experiences of Colin's life was holding a dying soldier in his arms in the battlefield in Vietnam," says McCain. "I can see how that would have a very significant impression on him."

McCain does acknowledge one key difference between him and Hagel. "I know Chuck Hagel came home from the war to a very hostile environment in America," says McCain. (Returning GIs were sometimes jeered and even spat upon in airports; they learned to change quickly into civilian clothes.) By the time McCain was released from captivity in 1973, however, "the POWs came home to a welcoming America," says McCain. "We were the only heroes of the Vietnam War." McCain has played the hero ever since, usually with self-deprecating charm. He's unafraid to call for the sacrifices he was willing to make himself; Hagel just wanted the Vietnam War to end, and now he wants to limit what he sees as needless sacrifice in Iraq.

The differences between Hagel and McCain transcend their war experiences. Hagel is the classic citizen-soldier, in a tradition that goes back to George Washington and to ancient times. The ideal is the Roman general Cincinnatus, who left his prosperous farm to rescue the Roman republic—but then returned to domestic life when the fighting was done. Hagel was a draftee who was sent to Germany by the Army but volunteered for duty in Vietnam. When he came home, he made money as an investment banker (and learned something about dealmaking and compromise) before running for Congress in 1996.

McCain, by contrast, is an American samurai, a member of a professional warrior caste. It is revealing that when the young McCain contemplated dropping out of the U.S. Naval Academy in the late 1950s, it wasn't to become Joe College and drink beer. He thought of enlisting in the French Foreign Legion. (McCain's eldest son, 20-year-old Jack—John S. McCain IV—is in his second year at Annapolis.) McCain's book, "Faith of My Fathers," begins with the scene of his grandfather, Adm. John (Slew) McCain, torn by existential angst as he sat in his cabin on an aircraft carrier awaiting Japan's final capitulation in World War II. "Well, this surrender has come as a kind of a shock to all of us," McCain tells a fellow officer. "I feel lost. I don't know what to do. I know how to fight, but now I don't know whether I know how to relax or not. I'm in an awful letdown." Admiral McCain died of a heart attack less than a week later.

McCain himself turned down early release from the Hanoi Hilton because he did not want to get special treatment: his father, John S. McCain Jr., a sub captain in World War II, was by this time commander of the Pacific Fleet. Though McCain contemplated suicide, he decided torture was better than letting down his forebears. For McCain, nothing is worse than defeat in battle. He concedes that a surge in Iraq will impose "a terrific strain" on the military but warns that the alternative is a disaster. "There's only one thing worse," he says, "and that's a defeated Army. I saw a defeated Army and Marine Corps in 1973 and it took us a long, long time to rebuild. Because when armies are defeated, it's not just a matériel problem, it's a morale problem."

Hagel has a long, sad face, one side of which was seared by the flash of an exploding enemy mine almost four decades ago. But he is almost gleeful when he talks about the coming debate on Iraq. He thinks Congress will awaken from its passivity and begin questioning how Bush is spending blood and treasure on Iraq. "The administration is going to be forced to come up and explain, 'Where is the money going?' " says Hagel. He rejects the notion that the newly Democratic-controlled Congress will shy away from cutting off at least some of the funding for the war. (The somewhat cynical view on Capitol Hill is that the Democrats will let Bush have the money—and also the responsibility for a failed policy.) He foresees Congress's agreeing to pay for existing force levels—but not to send more troops. The White House, he says, can no longer bully Republican members into submission. "The Republican Party has to go through an election next year, the president doesn't," says Hagel. "There are a lot of Republicans in this conference that are very scared."

McCain, needless to say, is not one of them. He plans to push back. The president is often asked, he notes, what will happen if the surge fails. "I think it's fair to ask my friends who want withdrawal, what's their Plan B?" says McCain, who does not include Hagel in the cut-and-run crowd. "What is their scenario as to how we handle the ensuing chaos that will be almost impossible to avoid?" McCain was at once smiling and seething. (When McCain says "my friend" to a "single, luckless individual ... through clenched teeth and frozen smile," notes Todd Purdum in the new Vanity Fair, it "means McCain is ready to blow.") Both McCain and Hagel are clearly girding for battle. For these two men, the fighting is never really over.

How The U.S. Is Losing The PR War In Iraq (NSWK)

By Scott Johnson

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0113202

For nearly four years, U.S. military officials have briefed the Baghdad press corps from behind an imposing wooden podium. No longer. Last week U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell relaxed with reporters around a "media roundtable." He replaced the cumbersome headset once used for Arabic translations with a discreet earpiece. He cut short his opening statement, allowing for more back-and-forth banter. Yet even as Iraq emerged from the deadliest month in 2006 for American soldiers, Caldwell maintained the relentlessly upbeat patter that has come to characterize the briefings. "The key difference you're going to see in 2007," he said proudly, "is this is truly the year of transition and adaptation."

Another year, another message. In the United States this week, President George W. Bush's speech laying out his new strategy for Iraq will be scrutinized for its specifics—the numbers of an anticipated troop surge, the money for reconstruction and jobs programs. But at least as critical to success may be whether Bush is convincing. A draft report recently produced by the Baghdad embassy's director of strategic communications Ginger Cruz and obtained by NEWSWEEK makes the stakes clear: "Without popular support from US population, there is the risk that troops will be pulled back ... Thus there is a vital need to save popular support via message." Under the heading DOMESTIC MESSAGES, Cruz goes on to recommend 16 themes to reinforce with the American public, several of which Bush is likely to hit: "vitally important we succeed"; "actively working on new approaches"; "there are no quick or easy answers."

What's even more telling is that the IRAQI MESSAGES—the very next section—are still "TBD," to be determined. Indeed, the document so much as admits that despite spending hundreds of millions of dollars, the United States has lost the battle for Iraqi public opinion: "Insurgents, sectarian elements, and others are taking control of the message at the public level." Videos of U.S. soldiers being shot and blown up, and of the bloody work of sectarian death squads, are now pervasive. The images inspire new recruits and intimidate those who might stand against them. "Inadequate message control in Iraq," the draft warns, "is feeding the escalating cycle of violence." (A U.S. Embassy spokesperson claims the document reflects Cruz's personal views, not official policy.)

Sunni insurgents in particular have become expert at using technology to underscore—some would say exaggerate—their effectiveness. "The sophistication of the way the enemy is using the news media is huge," Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the former commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, told NEWSWEEK just before he returned to the United States. Most large-scale attacks on U.S. forces are now filmed, often from multiple camera angles, and with high-resolution cameras. The footage is slickly edited into dramatic narratives: quick-cut images of Humvees exploding or U.S. soldiers being felled by snipers are set to inspiring religious soundtracks or chanting, which lends them a triumphal feel. In some cases, U.S. officials believe, insurgents attack American forces primarily to generate fresh footage.

Guerrillas have always sought alternative technologies to undermine their better-equipped enemies. What's different now is the power and accessibility of such tools. Production work that once required a studio can now be done on a laptop. Compilation videos of attacks on U.S. forces sell in Baghdad markets for as little as 50 cents on video CDs. Advancements in cell-phone technology have made such devices particularly useful. Their small video files—the filming of Saddam Hussein's hanging took up just over one megabyte—are especially easy to download and disseminate. "Literally, it's only hours after an attack and [the videos] are available," says Andrew Garfield, a British counterinsurgency expert who has advised U.S. forces in Baghdad. "You can really say it's only a cell-phone call away."

What the insurgents understand better than the Americans is how Iraqis consume information. Tapes of beheadings are stored on cell phones along with baby pictures and wedding videos. Popular Arab satellite channels like Al-Jazeera and Al-Arabiya air far more graphic images than are typically seen on U.S. TV—leaving the impression, say U.S. military officials, that America is on the run. At the extreme is the Zawra channel, run by former Sunni parliamentarian Mishan Jibouri, who fled to Syria last year after being accused of corruption. (Jibouri says he's being persecuted for political reasons, and can return to Iraq whenever he wants.) Since November the channel has been spewing out an unending series of videos showing American soldiers being killed in sniper and IED attacks. The clips are accompanied by commentary, often in English, admonishing Iraqis to "focus your utmost rage against the occupation." Among Sunnis and even some Shiites, Zawra has become one of the most popular stations in Iraq. "I get e-mails from girls in their 20s from Arab countries; some of them are very wealthy," Jibouri boasts. "Some offer to work for free, some offer money."

The U.S. military's response, on the other hand, usually sticks to traditional channels like press releases. These can take hours to prepare and are often outdated by the time they're issued. Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, director of the military's press operations in Baghdad until this past September, complains that all military-related information has to be processed upward through a laborious and bureaucratic chain of command. "The military wants to control the environment around it, but as we try to [do so], it only slows us down further," he says. "All too often, the easiest decision we made was just not to talk about [the story] at all, and then you absolutely lose your ability to frame what's going on."

An even bigger problem, say other U.S. officials, may be the message itself. The videos on Zawra are powerful precisely because they confirm the preconceptions many Iraqis have about the occupation. Col. William Darley, editor of the influential

Military Review at the Combined Arms Center in Fort Leavenworth, Kans., argues that merely changing podiums in the briefing room misses the point. "You can cook up a kind of shrewd, New York City-style advertising campaign for a candy bar, and if the candy bar tastes lousy, you can't sell it," says Darley. "If Iraq has no electricity, spotty medical care, no security, then [we] cannot succeed."

The consequences of losing the propaganda battle are real. "One of these videos is worth a division of tanks to those people," says Robert Steele, a former U.S. Marine Corps intelligence officer. Not only do the insurgent videos draw recruits and donations, they don't give ordinary Iraqis much incentive to cooperate with the Americans. Videos put out by sectarian death squads, like the one shown to NEWSWEEK by the watchdog SITE institute in which a Sunni militiaman saws the head off a Shiite prisoner with a five-inch knife, enrage the targeted community. The release of the ghoulish video of Saddam's hanging prompted thousands of Sunnis to protest in Anbar province. Residents of Fallujah—the target of a multimillion-dollar hearts-and-minds campaign—renamed the city's main thoroughfare the Street of the Martyr Saddam Hussein.

The damage goes beyond Iraq. Al Qaeda's media arm, As-Sahab ("The Cloud") has similarly improved the quality and frequency of its videos; the group, says former State Department adviser Philip Zelikow, uses "the Internet to provide a sense of virtual identity" now that its Afghan training camps have largely been destroyed. The question is how to fight back, when today's most powerful technologies—the Web, cell phones—are better suited to small, nimble organizations. Back in the 1930s national leaders could almost wholly control the framing of their messages, says Donald Shaw, a professor of media theory at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill who has written about reforms for military public-affairs officers. But now, "the podium has lost its influence." For those who once stood behind it, that message at least is very clear.

New Faces, a New Plan, as Bush Nears His Endgame

President Bush shook up his administration last week, putting in place the lead elements of a new team to deal with military and diplomatic policy in Iraq-and even with Congress. The changes carried the feel of a president knowing that as he describes new policy, new faces will be needed to carry it out. First to move was John Negroponte, the first director of national intelligence. He'll take charge of Iraq policy as a deputy to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. On the military side, Bush will replace Gen. John Abizaid, who commanded U.S. forces in the Middle East, and Gen. George Casey, the top general in Iraq. Abizaid had planned to retire in March. Taking his post will be Adm. William Fallon, the chief U.S. commander in the Pacific, and Casey will be replaced by Gen. David Petraeus, who had been in charge of training Iraqi security forces. On the home front, Bush will be replacing White House counsel Harriet Miers as he girds for investigations by the new Democratic Congress.

So Now We're All Fiscal Conservatives

Democrats saw chicanery, but Republicans smelled political reality in President Bush's announcement last week that he will seek a balanced budget in five years and an end to pork-barrel politics. Bush, after all, had taken a budget of surplus and turned it into one of deficit, but now he seemed to be adopting the new Democratic majority's fiscal pledges. Insiders at the White House spun it a different way: They said the president had hoped to push for deeper tax cuts in the next and future budgets, but the election of Democratic majorities in the House and Senate killed those plans. Now, they said, the president will submit a budget for fiscal 2008 that will leave little room for new Democratic add-ons without deeply cutting into defense spending or raising taxes.

The Give-Him-Enough-Rope Strategy

With his big speech on Iraq expected this week, President Bush's strategists say he has a lot more latitude in setting a new policy than his antiwar critics realize-at least for the next few months. "The Democrats are going to be in a real bind," says a Republican insider with close ties to the White House. "The president will come out with a strong plan to get order in Baghdad, and if the Democrats do anything to undermine or block it, it will look to Americans as though they wouldn't give his plan a chance." The strategist predicts that "their tendency will be to give the president a free hand and blame him if doesn't work." This could be a clever political gambit, but it also would give Bush one more chance to get things right in Iraq. Says one Bush aide: "The White House now feels that urgency."

For Those Who Predicted His Demise...

He is showing no signs of leaving, as some had predicted. Indeed, White House political guru Karl Rove is as aggressive as ever in making policy arguments-his main theme being that Republicans lost the congressional elections because they didn't sufficiently live up to their core conservative ideals. And his influence is still pervasive, sources say. For instance, GOP insiders suspect that Rove had a big hand in distancing Bush from the Iraq Study Group because he believed the bipartisan panel was too critical of current Iraq policy. Rove, aides say, believes that victory is still achievable and that Bush should pursue it as vigorously as he can.

He had served in the new post of director of national intelligence only two years, hardly enough time to unify the nation's 16 disparate spy agencies. But last week John Negroponte was moving on to direct Iraq policy at the State Department. His replacement, President Bush announced, would be retired Navy Vice Adm. Michael McConnell (right).

Fineman: Sidestepping The 'Surge' (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

Before Barack Obama was a senator, he opposed the war in Iraq. Now that he is one, he says that sending more troops would be "a mistake that compounds the president's original mistake." But don't expect Obama—or most other Dems—to try to block George W. Bush when he asks Congress in the coming weeks for another billion-dollar bundle for the war. The party won't deny the funds, and may not even try to attach conditions to them. Obama made that clear last week when I saw him in his office, a sunny space filled with portraits of Thurgood Marshall, Abraham Lincoln, Mohandas Gandhi and Muhammad Ali. "To anticipate your question," said the Harvard-trained lawyer, "is Congress going to be willing to exercise its control over the purse strings to affect White House policy? I am doubtful that that is something we are willing to do in the first year."

Marriages of convenience are common in Washington. The war in Iraq is producing the opposite: a divorce of calculation. President Bush has no evident interest in consulting with, let alone drawing in, the new Democratic Congress as a war partner. An example: the new chair of the Senate Armed Services Committee—Carl Levin, an important character now—sent Bush a private letter three weeks ago offering his counsel. Levin never got a reply. Bush can be just as deaf to Republicans. At a recent White House ceremony, Sen. Susan Collins offered to brief him on her Iraq visit. He responded by escorting her to the office of his deputy national-security adviser—and then left before she told her story.

Even as they decried the "surge" and declared that it is "time to bring the war to a close," Democrats offered reasons for staying out of Bush's way. Obama took the safest ground. "I cannot in good conscience," he said, "cut off funding for our troops that are already there." He and others will insist that future requests be included in the regular budget. Sen. Joe Biden, whose Foreign Relations Committee will launch hearings on the war this week, said that Congress's role is simply too limited to be effective. "It's all about the separation of powers," he said. Last month he told Bush: "This is your war, Mr. President, and there's nothing we can do to stop you."

The Democrats may not really want to. Party leaders (especially Nancy Pelosi) fear being branded as "weak on defense" if they kicked off in Congress with antiwar maneuvers. Rather than do that, said Biden and Sen. Chris Dodd, the best strategy for now is to try to dig out the facts and educate the public. Only Republicans have the leverage to pressure Bush to change course, Biden said.

In the meantime, Democrats know a classic "wedge issue" when they see one. With 21 Republicans up for re-election, Democrats would be happy to witness full-scale GOP infighting, which could catch the Republicans' '08 front runner, Sen. John McCain, in the crossfire. Democratic strategists say it would be politically foolish to help Bush by crafting a bipartisan war policy. "Why should we try to come up with a compromise policy with him?" asks Mike Ward, a former congressman who was back at the Capitol for opening-day festivities. "If we do that, we take ownership of the war. Why would we want to do that?" Only one reason I could think of: to end the war faster so that the troops could come home.

After The 100-Hour Show Comes The Slog (USNEWS)

By Alex Kingsbury

U.S. News and World Report, January 8, 2007

The new Democratic majority in Congress has tasked itself with an ambitious opening salvo for the 110th session of the national legislature: raising the federal minimum wage, passing the still-outstanding recommendations of the 9/11 commission, and halving the interest rates on student loans. But Democrats have a robust agenda beyond that first 100 hours. Here's a glimpse at what's coming on Capitol Hill in the weeks and months ahead.

DEFENSE

House Dems have promised hearings into how the war in Iraq has been handled, with scrutiny in a range of committees expected to turn on contractor oversight, force readiness, and the president's forthcoming plan in Iraq. Over on the Senate side, expect three hearings on Iraq this month alone. And Congress will almost certainly consider expanding the size of the Army and Marine Corps, a measure that is expected to receive broad support on both sides of the aisle.

INTELLIGENCE

Expect investigations on controversial intelligence programs launched by President Bush, including the National Security Agency's warrantless surveillance program and the CIA's secret prison and renditions program. The Senate Intelligence

DOJ_NMG_0113205

Committee, meanwhile, will tackle a task not finished in either of the past two years-passing an authorization bill for the $44 billion intelligence community for the next fiscal year. But most of the committees' work will remain behind closed doors: Hearings will be held this month on the threats to Iraq from its neighbors, as well as on current and emerging safe havens for terrorists.

IMMIGRATION

Very soon Democrat Ted Kennedy and Republican John McCain will introduce a Senate bill allowing 12 million illegal immigrants in the country to qualify for legal status after paying fines and some back taxes. That's a marked departure from the compromise bill passed in the Senate last year, which grouped immigrants into three categories and had some go home while others could stay. The Senate aims to pass a bill in March or April, while the House will most likely tackle the issue this summer or fall.

HOMELAND SECURITY

Improving radio communications between fire and rescue personnel will be one of the easiest 9/11 commission recommendations to enact; Democrats plan to create new grants specifically for communications equipment. Requiring the inspection of all sea and air cargo, on the other hand, has industry groups howling, including airlines still reeling from financial woes. The Transportation Security Administration, meanwhile, is bracing for a potential congressional push to unionize 43,000 aviation screeners.

JUDICIARY

Sen. Patrick Leahy wants to crack down on war profiteering, and he's promising to implement the Iraq Study Group recommendations to develop the devastated country's judicial system and train its police force. GOP Sen. Arlen Specter last week joined Leahy in reintroducing a bill that would restore habeas corpus rights to permanent U.S. residents who were among noncitizens stripped by Congress of the ability to challenge imprisonment in court. The administration's data-mining programs will immediately come under scrutiny in a committee hearing this week.

HEALTHCARE

Bipartisan support might be in the offing for reauthorization and possible expansion of the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which provides health insurance to 4 million low-income children whose parents don't qualify for Medicaid. But the program could test Democratic pay-as-you-go promises. The House Committee on Energy and Commerce will examine the drug approval processes in various bills that affect pharmaceutical and medical device makers.

BUDGET AND TAXES

Don't expect any action to either extend or eliminate the 2001 and 2003 tax cuts, both scheduled to expire in 2010. Temporary patches to the alternative minimum tax are more likely, once again raising exemption amounts to prevent it from ensnaring millions in the middle class. Complicating efforts to pass the estimated $45 billion fix will be budget rules that would require new tax cuts or spending to be paid for through budget cuts or new taxes. One way forward might be closing the estimated $300 billion "tax gap" between what taxpayers theoretically ought to pay and what actually comes in to the IRS.

EDUCATION

Two big-ticket items are up for reauthorization: the Higher Education Act, funding colleges and universities, and the No Child Left Behind Act, which allocates federal K-12 dollars. Both are mammoth pieces of legislation that will take time to hash out. Many education watchers don't foresee NCLB being reauthorized until after the 2008 elections. While cuts in student loan interest rates may come in the first 100 hours, the promised increased funding for Pell grants will be discussed in the appropriations process.

ENVIRONMENT

Rep. Nick Rahall, chair of the House Resources Committee, is pursuing the loss of billions of dollars in oil-drilling royalties due to "mismanagement" by the Interior Department. On the Senate side, a raft of global warming proposals will be floated to a Congress that has routinely dismissed measures to mandate cuts in greenhouse gases. The Democratic leadership is hopeful that growing public support for such a bill will sway some conservatives. McCain might reintroduce a bill he cowrote with Sen. Joe Lieberman that placed mandatory caps on emissions, while other bills favor a cap-and-trade system similar to that of the Kyoto protocol.

One Last Chance (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, January 7, 2007

Moments of genuine opportunity present themselves so rarely these days that they have become increasingly difficult to recognize. But one may be upon us now. As Washington begins to take up the hard work of government again, with Democrats and their slender majority in the Congress facing a seemingly chastened but still-determined president in the White House, some of the inspiring and much-deserved words of praise for President Gerald Ford's historic stewardship are worthy of reflection by both sides.

Fate can be a mighty strange casting agent. Who would have guessed that it would be Donald Rumsfeld, of all people, in his elegant eulogy, who would capture Ford's spirit so exquisitely as to frame the central failure of our public life today? Within days of Ford's replacing Richard Nixon in the Oval Office, Rumsfeld, Ford's former chief of staff, reminded us, "we saw him welcome advice from Democrats and Republicans alike."

Wow. What a concept.

History be damned, it seems. It is not just fashionable these days but almost Pavlovian to assume that Democrats can have no truck whatever with Republicans-and vice versa-when it comes to any real issues of consequence. It's nice to hear all the earnest talk about ethics reform by the new Democratic majority on Capitol Hill, but we've seen this play before. From the White House, the president tepidly offers outreach, then in the next breath warns the Democrats against even dreaming about messing with his cherished tax cuts. In the next few days, we will hear all kinds of talk from the leadership of both parties about cooperation and coming together. But if it all turns out to be just a lot of palaver, this moment of opportunity will have been lost, and another, very different, one may take its place. More on that in a moment.

For now, Iraq will suck almost all the political air from the room. Democrats promise vigorous oversight, and given their all-but-total abdication on the issue heretofore and the administration's abject mismanagement of postwar operations there, that's as it should be. Obsession with toll-taking alone, however, would be a mistake. Democrats have no real mandate to govern-their seizure of the House and Senate in November was a mandate only to constrain the Bush team from governing. Iraq, of course, is Exhibit A in the voters' misfeasance indictment of the administration. Historians will take years to sort out the ultimate cost of the American misadventure there, beyond the terrible toll in blood and treasure. One hopes fervently that President Bush, having belatedly acknowledged the serial failures of his team in Mesopotamia and having spent the past several weeks intensively searching for a new solution, will come up with one. Democrats may be sorely tempted to let the administration stew in its own juices on Iraq, but the stakes are far too high for such cynical partisanship-especially when the daily drumbeat of casualties continues.

Sharing? What to do? Ever suspect, Washington's conventional wisdom suggests no serious possibility of a return to the sense of shared purpose the capital saw three decades ago in the rancorous days after the Nixon pardon. (The war between the Ford White House and Capitol Hill was bitter enough, but by today's dismal standards, it was waged according to Marquess of Queensberry rules.) Indeed, things may be so far gone in Washington today that the mere expression of such a wish seems to many Pollyanna-ish. Still, it bears remembering that after Ronald Reagan was felled by John Hinckley's bullet, the first person he summoned to his hospital bed after his wife, Nancy, was Tip O'Neill, the quintessential Democrat and Reagan nemesis. The two men prayed together. If no such outreach or sense of shared purpose emerges between Democrats and Republicans in the weeks to come, that could be too bad-for both parties. And this is where that second, now unlooked for, moment of opportunity could present itself. Today, because no majority of Americans identify themselves with either major political party, the crucial slice of the electoral pie is composed of independent voters. Add to that sobering fact voters' clarion call in November for competence and accountability, and you have a potentially combustible political brew.

Nearly a century ago, a patriotic egomaniac named Teddy Roosevelt made a very credible run for the White House as a third-party candidate. It could happen again, and it may well. (Paging Mayor Bloomberg!) That could be a fine and wonderful thing for the nation. But wouldn't it be so much finer if, at this time of critical change and challenge, our elected leaders could somehow ignore the long-ingrained penchant for payback and partisanship and find a way to set us on a more promising and responsible course the way that selfless patriot from Michigan did in one of our nation's darkest hours?

A Problem Province (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, January 7, 2007

BAQUBAH, IRAQ-U.S. military officials here have little trouble knowing when al Qaeda is exerting its influence in this city that was, once upon a time, the lush, orange-growing capital of the Mideast. Sometimes it's the subtle signs: Tomatoes and cucumbers start disappearing from the market, deemed too sexually suggestive, soldiers here say, by the Sunni fundamentalist terrorists. On other occasions, it's more overt: "Graffiti that says, 'Long live al Qaeda,' and stupid stuff like that," explains a U.S. military officer based here in what is now the capital of Diyala province. Mostly, though, the pressure has been bold and deadly: the heads of rival Shiites, stuffed in fruit crates, and phone calls designed to intimidate schoolteachers from teaching or tellers from opening banks.

For this, there has been retaliation. Shiite militias have been called into Baqubah at the behest of beleaguered Shiites, often arriving from strongholds such as Baghdad's Sadr City to provide protection against a Sunni insurgency that has driven thousands of Shiite families from their homes. "The Shiites get pushed around by Sunnis, and JAM shows up," says the officer. JAM, or Jaish al-Mahdi, is also known as the Mahdi Army militia, which is loyal to Moqtada al-Sadr, a fiery Shiite cleric from Sadr City-and his gunmen arrive well supplied.

U.S. military officials here say the geography of Diyala is what the Fulda Gap was to West Germany: a perfect avenue for infiltration. The province shares a porous 170-mile-long border with Shiite-led Iran-a border that allows trafficked arms from the country to flow through Diyala and, often, down into Baghdad.

Today, more than six months after the U.S. military killed al Qaeda strongman Abu Musab Zarqawi in a dense palm grove outside Baqubah-and turned security responsibilities over to the Iraqi Army-Diyala is second only to Baghdad in per capita crime and kidnappings. Once known as the nation's melting pot, a "little Iraq" with a mix of Sunnis and Shiites, Diyala today lies on a violent fault line where residents tend to agree on just one thing: It is land worth fighting for. The area sits on a tributary of the Tigris and boasts dates and pomegranates, untapped oil fields, and a plentiful water supply.

Sunnis make up the majority of the population of Diyala-55 percent compared with 30 percent Shiites. Yet in a province of 1.5 million that was once a popular retirement spot for many former Sunni Baathists, Shiites compose the majority of seated politicians-this, thanks to a Sunni boycott of elections two years ago. For similar reasons, security forces also are majority Shiite.

Now, as jockeying for control of the province continues between Sunnis and Shiites, the local police chief and an army commander-both Shiites-stand accused of using hit squads and mass arrests to wage a campaign of intimidation against the region's Sunni majority. It's not a pretty picture. Corruption, growing ethnic suspicion, intimidation, wanton killing: What's happening here provides a sobering window on the larger problems bedeviling both Iraqi authorities and American troops as they try to create a secure environment in a fledgling democracy. Late last week, President Bush chose new commanders to lead the war in Iraq. This week, he will announce a revamped strategy, likely to include an increase in troops and an economic incentives package. But the challenges of Diyala serve as a stark warning of just how tough it's going to be to right what's wrong in this beleaguered nation- where security is precarious and, for elected officials here, all too fleeting.

It was last year that Brig. Gen. Shakir Hulail Hussein al-Kaab, the Shiite commander of the area's 5th Iraqi Army Division, managed to enrage powerful Sunni sheiks here in a move that American military officials say haunts the province today: In mass sweeps, he rounded up hundreds of Sunnis who were later found to be innocent. In so doing, says a local official, "he drove the Sunnis into the arms of al Qaeda."

In the office of Col. David Sutherland, commander of the 3rd Brigade of the 1st Cavalry Division, two local Sunni leaders meet in the brigade's headquarters at Forward Operating Base Warhorse to raise their concerns. They have pulled out of Diyala's provincial council for the time being, pointing to the ongoing abuses they say the Sunnis are suffering at the hands of local police and Iraqi soldiers. They cite reports of soldiers destroying furniture and stealing jewelry in homes they raid, and torture by a Shakir subordinate nicknamed Colonel Cable, who has a reputation for beating prisoners on the soles of their feet-most likely, they add, at the police chief's behest. That chief, Ghassan al-Bawi, also a Shiite, "admitted that torture was going on," says a U.S. military official, "but he said they were only doing it to the bad guys."

Sutherland has brought the Sunni leaders here in the hopes of persuading them to rejoin the government. "We have more coverage on the holding facilities now," he reassures them. But they have other concerns. "When the Army was doing the raids in Sunni areas, they played cassette tapes-Shiite ceremonies on tape, songs of the Mahdi Army. This is the kind of army we're dealing with-very sectarian," says Hussein Abid al-Zubeidi, head of the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party. Hussein is still a member of the provisional council, but he's now participating only behind the scenes.

General Shakir for his part contends that his soldiers are not targeting Sunnis-that there are simply few Shiites left to arrest. Some 8,000, he says, have been killed, displaced, or have fled. Sutherland sympathizes with Hussein. "The action of individual soldiers-in houses, showing disrespect-is unacceptable. The people became disgusted and disillusioned." Adds Sutherland of General Shakir: "His actions are indicative of his mental model. And his mental model needs to be changed."

Mind games. U.S. forces here are banking on an operation taking place even as Hussein and Sutherland speak to help change the minds of local Sunnis. It is "a very targeted mission," Sutherland explains to Hussein, to drive out Sunni terrorists in an overrun area outside of Baqubah that has not been touched by U.S. forces for three years. U.S. and Iraqi soldiers will then rush in aid in the form of blankets, water, and kerosene for local Sunnis in the area-classic counterinsurgency strategy honed by Sutherland in his years as an Army tactical instructor. Much hinges on the operation as al Qaeda continues its bid for the region: Recently, U.S. military officials here discovered an extensive network of tunnels and a cache of several trailer-size containers, stocked with rocket-propelled grenades, arms, American dollars, and over half a million rounds of ammunition. "It was more AK-47s than I've given the Iraqi police in the last four months," Sutherland says.

Following the clearing operation, Sutherland and Shakir, the Shiite general, meet with some 70 local Sunni sheiks from across the province, some from towns near the Iranian border. Many take the meeting as a chance to air complaints about the conduct of the police and Army. "The Army doesn't care about military orders," says one frustrated sheik. "They care about religious orders coming from Sadr. They are no better than hit squads."

As he speaks, several cars roll up a nearby gravel road, and the sheiks turn toward the commotion. It is just a food delivery for the kebab feast to follow the meeting, but this is a group ever wary of assassination attempts, and the sheiks are reflexively on guard.

The public relations push continues the next day, as U.S. forces urge General Shakir to go on Iraqi television and take part in a press conference, to put a local face on the clearing operation. But the result is, in the words of one U.S. military official, a disaster: General Shakir refuses to answer journalists' questions, saying he does not have authorization from the Ministry of Defense. Ra'ad Rashid al-Tamini, Diyala's governor, a fellow Shiite, is irate. "Today he embarrassed us," Ra'ad later tells Sutherland. "Ask him a simple question, and he should answer it." Sutherland brings Ra'ad a bowl of ice cream from the cafeteria at the government center and tries to reassure him. We'll take a video and show him what he looked like," Sutherland says. "We'll coach him."

Aches and pains. Yet despite the coaching, General Shakir continues to be a headache for U.S. forces. "I don't know whether he has a sectarian agenda, but he's definitely a buffoon," says one U.S. officer later that week, as some 180 detainees are brought into a local police station. It is, say Iraqi and American officials here, another mass roundup. As dozens of detainees sit blindfolded on the floor awaiting their hearings, an Iraqi judge sifts through the case files on his lap. He reads the first. "This one is dismissed," he says, turning to coalition forces in the room. "I've got an idea," he says. "The Iraqi Army goes into a raid, and they get one target they go for-not take some innocents."

Though none of this does much to help Sunni-Shiite relations in the province, the biggest overlooked threat to the area's fledgling government, according to officials here, has actually been the tenure of Ghassan, the Shiite police chief, who has been running his own militia. Last year, U.S. sources add, Ghassan put in a call for some 250 Shiite gunmen from Baghdad and promptly added them to his police rosters upon their arrival. "He said he was creating his own highway patrol," one senior U.S. military officer says. In reality, though, he says, it was Ghassan's "own personal hit squad" that set up checkpoints designed to intimidate local Sunnis. Coalition forces recently detained a group of Iraqi officers in his force who were holding citizens hostage, then selling them back for money. "Suddenly the whole force is bad in the eyes of the people because of his Shiite agenda," adds the officer.

Months after pleas from the provincial council and American officials, the Ministry of the Interior says it is putting through transfer orders for Ghassan. Military officials here hope that this will boost their ongoing efforts to bring Sunnis into the police force. Already, they say, there have been signs of more interest in joining. But the damage Ghassan has done will be difficult to repair. "He has destroyed the Iraqi police. The situation isn't good," says Col. Ali Saadon, in charge of recruiting at the station. In the meantime, politicians are increasingly reliant on their personal security details-what amount to small armies of guards. Recently, the forces of rival politicians have clashed in "company-level firefights," say officials here-complete with rocket-propelled grenades.

Hopes. Today, Governor Ra'ad says the expectations of his electorate are simple: "The people look to me for three things: security, services, and a return to the normal routine they used to live." Yet he knows that these goals are still a world away.

After previously serving as a war planner in Iraq, Sutherland, the American brigade commander, has returned to a country in which the biggest changes, he says, have been the growth of al Qaeda in the region and the increasing influence of Iran. Diyala has become a key proving ground for al Qaeda at a time some Shiites see as "a chance to get back at Sunnis who have been living the good life all these years," says a military official here.

U.S. commanders add that it will take far more than troops to fix these dynamics, which are in turn fueling a vicious cycle of violence. "I have been most surprised by all of the jockeying-for political, economic, military power," says Sutherland. That jockeying, so endemic to the rest of the country, should now prompt some tough reassessment in Washington, officials here say, as soldiers on the ground ramp up efforts to transition security forces to Iraqi control. "Diyala was the place that we said we're going to turn over to the Iraqis-and look what happened," says a top U.S. commander. "We need to think a lot more closely about what conditions need to be set before transitioning control. If we don't, it can create more opportunities for the enemy," he adds, "which is essentially what happened in Diyala."

The provincial council members meeting with Sutherland stress that they will not return to the government until both Ghassan and Shakir are gone. They are also calling for immediate provincial elections. Until those things happen, they say, they are caught between the militias, and between terrorists "who want to return us to the Dark Ages." And with each day their frustration grows as they mull over the question posed to Sutherland by one Sunni sheik: "Is this the democracy," he wondered, "that the coalition promised us?"

George F. Will: MacArthur's Two Words (NSWK)

By George F. Will
Newsweek, January 15, 2007
awe (ô), n.1. Immediate and active fear; terror, dread.
—Oxford English Dictionary

Last week Americans were on the receiving end of a kind of shock and awe. The shock of recognition was delivered not by columns of tanks, flights of bombers or salvos of cruise missiles, but by a cell phone. The hanging of Saddam Hussein—not the fact of it, but the manner of it, communicated to the world by video from someone's phone camera—may have been a tipping point. The video, which The Economist said resembled "the sordid snuff videos circulated on the internet by al-Qaeda," may have been, in the scheme of things, just a straw. But coming when it did, it was, for many Americans, perhaps the last straw. In it, they recognized how far into the abyss Iraqi political culture has fallen.

The hanging was conducted in the presence of taunting adherents of Moqtada al-Sadr, the loutish cleric whose militia, the Mahdi Army, is a prime example of why post-Saddam Iraq is a thugocracy. The hanging was an episode of bloodthirsty primitivism in the service of barbaric sectarianism. Which is to say, the hanging was an accurate expression of Iraq's civic culture.

It is shocking that so many Americans were shocked. How much cumulative evidence is needed to teach this country what that country is like? Here is what Iraq is like. Exchanging anecdotes with an Iraqi friend, Anthony Shadid of The Washington Post recounted this one: "Insurgents stopped a driver at a checkpoint. They opened his trunk. 'Why do you have a spare tire?' the insurgent asked solemnly. 'You don't have trust in God?' "

The episode of the hanging sent shivers of dread through America—very timely shivers, thanks to the grainy pictures from the phone (by last Friday, there had been more than 2.5 million viewings of it on YouTube alone). The nation was, just as the 3,000th American combat death was announced, staring at the grotesque face of the faux nation to which more Americans might soon be sent to fight.

This week the president will announce his revision of Iraq policy. In government, personnel are policy, and he has been changing key advisers, military and civilian. Strategy and tactics may change, but in private consultations he reportedly has used one word to denote his unchanged objective: "victory." That is understandable. More than any presidency since Lincoln's, his will be defined by a single matter: Iraq.

It is difficult to imagine how Iraq can end as a success—as an enterprise in which the benefits exceed the costs. And if it is judged a disaster, that will be because the responsible officials were too late in remembering what Gen. Douglas MacArthur said. He said that in war, all disasters can be explained by two words: "too late."

Because the administration was too late to recognize that there were too few U.S. forces in Iraq, the looting after the fall of Baghdad—which did more physical damage to Iraq than the war so far had done—shattered Iraqis' confidence in America, and insurgents were emboldened. Because the administration was too late in admitting that there was an insurgency, Iraq slid into civil war. Because the administration was too late in facing the fact of that civil war, it probably is too late for a "surge" of new U.S. forces, of a size and duration that the American public will tolerate, to extinguish it. For several years, Sen. Joseph Biden, who last week became chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, has urged an increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq. Now, he says, it is too late.

Now, in fact, it may be 1966. That year the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Sen. J. William Fulbright, the Arkansas Democrat, held hearings on the Vietnam War. The hearings helped mobilize opposition to the war, which at the time had much more public support than the U.S. engagement in Iraq now has. Much of the impact of Fulbright's hearings derived from the decision of NBC to televise them, a decision that prompted some live coverage by CBS and ABC. Biden's hearings on Iraq, which begin this week, will occur in a transformed media environment and will be seen on multiple networks.

The hearings will be riveting, in part because Biden speaks with a forthrightness that is sometimes antic but often illuminating. He became a senator in January 1973, by which time the Senate had learned, regarding Vietnam, the difficulty—the impossibility, really—of controlling, legislatively or otherwise, a president's conduct of a war. But last week Biden spoke of changing the president's mind by "having his party walk away from his position." If the president this week announces a substantial and protracted escalation of the U.S. military effort in Baghdad, majorities in both houses of Congress will hotly oppose him. Most of his supporters—perhaps all of them not named Lieberman—will be Republicans, and will be tepid and wary. Democrats control Congress, but only congressional Republicans can perhaps control the president's policy.

Measure For Measure (USNEWS)

There was mayhem at the gallows, and there was justice at the gallows. Saddam Hussein had divided Iraqis and Arabs-and others-while he lived, and he was to do so again on the day of his execution. In the best of worlds, Saddam's executioners would have been "clinical" about the thing and subdued, and they would have given the event the dignity it deserved. But this was a despot who had cut a swath of terror through the land, and the prime minister who had come to power from the Shiite underground was determined to bring the matter of Saddam Hussein to a fitting end. It wasn't pretty, that spectacle of execution, and there should have been no cellphone video recording of the deed, but the truth at the heart of what played out in Saddam's old military intelligence headquarters was plain and simple justice and retribution. Men are not angels, and the dictator reaped what he had sown.

Aides to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki say that the pen with which he signed Saddam Hussein's death warrant had been in his possession for well over a quarter century. He had carried this pen with him to a long exile in Syria and Iran after he had fled the terrors of Saddam Hussein. He had waited for that moment, and truth be told there was perhaps relish in the way the death sentence was signed, before the cameras, a message to Maliki's Shiite kinsmen. The American regency in Baghdad had underestimated Maliki. There is more steel in the man than our commanders and diplomats on the scene had suspected. An unlikely choice for prime minister, he is through and through a man of the Shiite traditional classes; unlike his peers in the political class, he speaks not a word of English. He had never really taken to the Americans or fully trusted them. His predecessor, Ibrahim Jaafari, had been removed from office through American pressure in the spring of last year. Though he benefited, there lingers in Maliki a suspicion that he could suffer the same fate. It did not help that a memo by White House National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, made public last November, questioned Maliki's ability to rule and to rein in the Shiite militias. American power had bet heavily on reconciling the Sunni insurgents, and Maliki had read the diplomacy of the last year as a steady effort to court the Sunni Arabs. The man led to the gallows may have been a shadow of his old self, but he still haunted the imagination of his fervent supporters. For Maliki it was important that all these doubts be stilled.

Sunni reaction. It was said in the Sunni strongholds of Iraq, and in the Arab capitals, that it had been bad form that the dictator had been dispatched at dawn, on the first day of Id al-Adha, the feast of sacrifice that marks the end of the annual pilgrimage to Mecca. But those protests came from people who had never shed a tear for Saddam's victims. Their loyalties are atavistic: They are motivated by a dread of the Shiites, and by a reflexive, unthinking anti-Americanism.

A big thing happened, it has to be conceded, when Maliki affixed his signature to that death sentence. Sunni rulers had been hounding Shiite rebels for centuries in Arab lands; Saddam himself had put to death some great men of standing in the Shiite religious establishment. In April 1980, in a deed that is still recalled with terror by the vast majority of Shiites, a great figure of the Shiite seminaries, Ayatollah Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr, was put to death by the Hussein regime-along with his immensely talented sister, Bint al-Huda, a poet and a writer of exquisite sensibility. Sadr had become the great martyr of Iraqi Shiites; he is said to have been the intellectual inspiration behind the Dawa Party to which Maliki belongs. Saddam's execution was an act of fealty to that beloved man. For the Shiite faithful, justice had been slow in coming.

It had taken a foreign war to decapitate that tyrannical regime in Baghdad, it is true. But the judgment that mattered was an affair of the Iraqis. We have been asking them to claim responsibility for their country, bemoaning their political abdication. On that morning in Baghdad, three years after he had been flushed out of his spider hole, Saddam Hussein came face to face with the wrath and hurt he had bequeathed Iraqis. Those vengeful men taunting him as he fell through the gallows' trapdoor were in the most direct way the children of his cruel reign of terror.

Graham Says Boost In Troops A Last-ditch Effort (TSSC)

By James Rosen

The State (SC), January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. Lindsey Graham broke Sunday from other Republican senators who have criticized sending more U.S. troops to Iraq, defending President Bush's expected "surge" plan as a last-ditch bid to salvage victory in the war.

Graham, R-S.C., for the first time criticized the top generals removed last week by Bush from command in Iraq and said "a new team" must have the manpower to win the war.

"I support a surge with a purpose — co-joining with the Iraqi political and military leadership to control this country," Graham said on NBC's 'Meet the Press.' "We cannot let this country go into the abyss. Now is the last chance, and the only chance, to get this right."

In an address to the nation this week, Bush is expected to announce the dispatch of as many as 30,000 more troops to reinforce the 140,000 already in Iraq.

Graham, who has called for a troop increase for months, sparred with Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., the new Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman.

Graham said there can be no political stability in Iraq unless the sectarian violence is stemmed. Biden, confirming that he will run for president next year, said a renewed military push will be wasted without firm political measures. Iraqi Prime Minister

Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite Muslim, must stand up to Shiite militias and give Sunni Muslims heading the insurgency a real share of power, Biden said.

"We now have a civil war," Biden said. "All the king's horses and all the king's men will not put Iraq together again, absent Maliki making some very hard decisions about what he's going to do."

Graham, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, sharply criticized Democrats calling for a phased withdrawal from Iraq.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., the new congressional czars following the Democrats' election triumph in November, sent Bush a letter Friday saying it is time to "bring the war to a close."

Graham said: "These Democratic proposals are, to me, a formula for defeat. They are nothing more than just a political way to get out of Iraq, and it will come back to haunt us for years."

Biden declined Sunday to call for a troop withdrawal, using instead the formula "disengage and contain." Asked if he supports the Reid-Pelosi letter, Biden said, "I do not."

Graham vacillated, though, when asked whether the United States is losing the war.

"In all honesty, we are not winning, and if you're not winning, you're losing, and now is the time to come up with a strategy to win," Graham responded.

Later in the program, Graham said: "I don't think any Republican or Democrat should do anything right now to say the war is lost. We should try to win this war."

Graham has broken with Bush on key national security issues in the last two years, most prominently over how the United States should interrogate and prosecute accused terrorist detainees.

Now his support for Bush's anticipated plan to send more troops to Iraq places him at odds with other prominent GOP senators. Sen. Richard Lugar, an Indiana Republican who was replaced by Biden as head of the foreign relations panel, has declined to endorse a troop increase; GOP Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, also eyeing a White House run, called the increase "folly" and "Alice in Wonderland" last week.

Democrats Vow To Resist Buildup (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

Democratic congressional leaders vowed yesterday to use their powers of spending and policy oversight to challenge President Bush's expected proposal this week, as part of a broad revision of Iraq strategy, for boosting U.S. military forces in the country by as many as 20,000 troops.

Calling Iraq a nation in "complete chaos," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and other Democrats cast the anticipated Bush plan as an escalation of the Iraq war that goes against the advice of senior U.S. commanders, rather than the significant change of course sought by American voters, and said that as a result they would treat the plan -- and new funding requests -- with strong skepticism.

"If the president wants to add to this mission, he's going to have to justify it," Pelosi said on CBS's "Face the Nation," emphasizing that while Congress will not cut off funding for troops now in Iraq, the White House will no longer have a "blank check" for expanding the war effort.

"When the bill comes . . . it will receive the harshest scrutiny," she said, referring to a new supplemental spending request for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan that is expected to surpass $100 billion. Since Sept. 11, 2001, more than $500 billion has been spent on the wars and counterterrorism-related expenditures around the world, according to the Congressional Research Service.

The extra troops are only one part of the package Bush is expected to present to the nation as early as Wednesday. Proposals for economic development and the setting of political benchmarks for Baghdad, leading to the formation of a national reconciliation government, are also expected from Bush's prime-time speech, although final details were being ironed out over the weekend.

Democrats were divided Sunday over how much Congress can do on Iraq. Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.), who reaffirmed yesterday that he will run for the Democratic nomination for president in 2008, argued on NBC's "Meet the Press" that it would be unconstitutional for Congress to authorize the war but then cap troop levels or cut funding for specific items. Biden said any troop increase would be "a tragic mistake . . . but as a practical matter, there is no way to say, 'Mr. President, stop.' "

Republican lawmakers, for their part, voiced general support for the Bush plan as outlined, although they acknowledged it will be controversial and unpopular. Congress should not try to micromanage the war or cut off funding for U.S. troops, they said, warning that Democratic proposals for beginning a gradual U.S. military withdrawal in four to six months could lead to a "failed state" in Iraq and spell disaster for the Middle East.

"At the end of the day . . . I don't think Congress will cut off money for the troops," Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) said on "Fox News Sunday." "Congress is incapable of micromanaging the tactics in the war. And even though this will be a controversial step, I think the president will be able to carry it out, and I hope he'll be successful."

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), who along with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) is a strong backer of more troops in Iraq, said the U.S. military from the beginning has lacked the resources it needs to "hold" areas cleared of insurgents. As a result, "if you're not winning, you're losing," he said on "Meet the Press." "We cannot let this country go into the abyss" of civil war, which could provoke intervention by Iran and Turkey and decades of regional conflict.

Graham said Bush's nomination last week of Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus as the new U.S. commander for Iraq, replacing Gen. George W. Casey Jr., and his earlier naming of Robert M. Gates as defense secretary, were moves "long overdue."

Senior U.S. military officials have voiced deep resentment in recent days that the departures of Casey and Gen. John P. Abizaid, which had been planned for months, were being portrayed as part of a Bush administration housecleaning over Iraq strategy.

Some Republicans were more tepid on the subject of a troop increase. Brent Scowcroft, the former national security adviser to presidents Gerald R. Ford and George H.W. Bush and an early skeptic of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, offered only qualified support for a buildup. It would have to support a specific mission -- such as stemming ethnic cleansing in Baghdad -- for a specific period, he said.

"Unless there's something we can accomplish that is visible and demonstrable . . . people will say, well, look, the situation hasn't changed," he said in an interview on ABC's "This Week." "That demonstrates it's hopeless and the pressure to get out will increase."

Scowcroft also opposed making the U.S. commitment to Iraq dependent upon the Iraqi government accomplishing specific milestones -- an approach that is a central feature of Democratic withdrawal plans, and, according to U.S. officials, could also form part of the upcoming Bush plan.

"If they don't meet the first milestone, you withdraw support, making it virtually impossible for them to meet the second milestone," which would be "counterproductive," Scowcroft said. He stressed the necessity for a broader regional approach to bringing stability to Iraq, focusing on reviving Arab-Israeli peace efforts, but criticized the Bush administration's vision of bringing peace to the Middle East through democracy as "revolutionary utopianism."

Alter: Hagel Could Have A Shot (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

Let's try an elementary thought experiment for Republican Primary voters. It may help explain why it's far too early to tell what might happen in 2008, the first election since 1928 with no incumbent president or vice president of either party on the ticket. (Truman's vice president, Alben Barkley, ran in 1952, but didn't win the Democratic nomination.) The results of this experiment may also explain why Washington is so often out to lunch on the direction of American politics.

One Republican—we'll call him "Candidate A"—has among the highest support levels for President George W. Bush's conservative agenda in the Senate. He championed the president's 2001 tax cut, which many Republicans believe is the litmus test of today's GOP. After initially voting to give Bush the authority to go to war, he became an early and outspoken critic of the Iraq policy, a view now endorsed not just by the American public and Democrats but by Republicans as well.

Republican "Candidate B" has the inverse position. He opposed Bush's big tax cuts, one of only two Republicans in the Senate to do so (the other being Lincoln Chafee). And on Iraq he is one of the main advocates of the "surge," a plan to "win" the war with a modest influx of troops, though even many military experts say the idea won't work.

You would think that Candidate A would be a strong favorite for the nomination and Candidate B destined for political oblivion. But no. Candidate A, Nebraska Sen. Chuck Hagel, is seen as damaged goods, with little chance to be nominated. Candidate B, Arizona Sen. John McCain, is now the front runner.

The explanation is the GOP tradition of primogeniture. Since the 1950s, Republicans, unlike Democrats, have given the nomination to their firstborn son—the guy whose "turn" it is. That's McCain, whose seasoned and deep-pocketed team never stopped running after he lost in 2000. McCain's plan is to kiss the con-servative base so ardently that it agrees to enter into a loveless marriage with him. Then he'll tack back to the maverick center for the general election. It just might work.

Hagel, by contrast, seems lost. After John Kerry favorably mentioned Hagel's skepticism about the Iraq war in one of his 2004 debates with Bush, he became persona non grata in his party. As recently as six months ago, any Republican lawmaker who didn't back the president on the war was in deep trouble.

But that was then. Supporting Bush on Iraq today is a liability, not an asset; it reeks of 2004 thinking. Six months from now, any Republican who opposed the tax cuts but champions Bush's disastrous Iraq policy is going to have some explaining to do in early debates. When Rush Limbaugh says after the midterms that he is sick and tired of "carrying water" for Bush, Chuck Hagel is not going to be run out of the party for refusing to carry water.

For ordinary Republicans, tax cuts are an article of faith. Backing a president in a failed war is not. And Hagel's doubts about the war have more weight because of his heroic combat experience in Vietnam. In a GOP debate, McCain would not be able to use his military experience as a trump card on Hagel. But Hagel and the others would score heavily on McCain for opposing the tax cuts—even though McCain was brave and right to have done so.

The most stunning thing about the Republican campaign so far is the vacuum on the right. While McCain, Rudy Giuliani and Mitt Romney (a moderate Republican until five minutes ago) battle over the centrists in the party, the conservative base that actually determines the nomination remains forlorn. Giuliani supports gay rights and abortion, and a third of Republicans disqualify Romney solely because he's a Mormon. This opening is why former Virginia governor James Gilmore is getting in the race and Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee—"Oprah"-ready after losing 110 pounds—can't be ruled out.

But governors, who normally make the strongest presidential candidates, seem a little irrelevant this time around. They aren't likely to sound as credible as senators on the nuances of Pakistani politics or the readiness of the Third Infantry Division. There's more conventional wisdom that's in danger of cracking, too. Pooh-bahs in both parties have convinced the candidates that they have to raise $100 million this year to be competitive. This is nonsense in the Internet age, peddled by consultants who need that booty for their own pockets. In congressional elections, money is a cause—it leads directly to success. In presidential politics, money is an effect—it follows quickly the momentum that's generated in the rough and tumble of the "free media" campaign.

Chuck Hagel might not run. But if he does, Candidate A would be formidable. It's the issues, stupid.

Adm. William J. Fallon: An Experienced Naval Officer, And A Diplomat (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 — The Bush administration's selection of a career naval aviator to be the top commander of American military forces across a region where they are engaged in two ground wars is, at first glance, odd.

A range of military officers at the Pentagon noted that if Adm. William J. Fallon was confirmed by the Senate to the Central Command position, he would be not only the first naval officer to command the region, but also a four-star officer moving between regional combatant commands. Often, such posts are given as promotions to three-star officers.

Senior Pentagon civilians and military officers said Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates's recommendation of Admiral Fallon, currently in command of all American forces in the Pacific, reflected a wish for seasoned eyes on Afghanistan and Iraq as well as a new focus on regional initiatives to reassure allies and deter adversaries, in particular Iran.

"Because of the importance of this job today, and what we're embroiled in over in that area of operations, this is no time for a learning curve," said Adm. Robert J. Natter, who worked extensively with Admiral Fallon before retiring as commander of the Atlantic Fleet.

"He has broad experience, both diplomatic, with the Japanese, Chinese and South Koreans, and also clearly in the traditional military fields," Admiral Natter said.

The Middle East has a vast land area, to be sure, but also has important waterways that carry world oil supplies and, it is feared, nuclear materials and terrorists.

Whether the mission is interdicting contraband, tracking suspected leaders of Al Qaeda or deterring Iran, many military contingencies in the region rely on warships and warplanes, and not boots on the ground.

Admiral Fallon, who began his military career with a commission through the Navy's Reserve Officer Training Program, as opposed to the more prestigious Naval Academy, has a quarter-century's experience in combat aircraft and extensive time at the negotiating table.

The admiral can be grizzly and tough, as befits a product of New Jersey. But he has consistently taken on assignments where diplomatic skills were as important as the military ones. He surprised some of his colleagues when, in early 2001, he volunteered for the task of delivering an apology to Japanese officials and families of those killed in the accidental sinking of a fishery school ship by an American submarine, the Greeneville, off the coast of Hawaii.

The final military inquiry had not been completed, and some at the Pentagon argued that an official apology was premature. But the extraordinary visit to Tokyo by Admiral Fallon, then serving as the vice chief of naval operations, the service's No. 2 job, was credited with soothing the feelings of an important ally, and of its people.

Another side of Admiral Fallon was on display last month when, as the senior American military officer in the Pacific, he took the unusual and punitive move of canceling a large annual field exercise with the Philippines over a local judge's failure to honor the bilateral treaty governing protections for American military personnel. At the time, Admiral Fallon said he was not sitting in judgment of the guilt or innocence of a marine convicted of rape, but was protecting his forces by demanding that the Philippines adhere to legal obligations.

Admiral Fallon can be expected to pay great attention to the missions in Iraq and Afghanistan, but to leave day-to-day operations to the senior commanders on the ground in Baghdad and Kabul, similar to his current relationship as Pacific regional commander to the four-star Army officer in charge of forces just in South Korea.

William Joseph Fallon was born Dec. 30, 1944, in East Orange, N.J., and raised in Merchantville. He graduated from Villanova University in 1967, and later graduated from the Naval War College and the National War College, and earned a master's degree in international studies from Old Dominion University.

He flew combat missions in the Vietnam War, commanded a carrier air wing in the Persian Gulf war in 1991, and four years later led the naval battle group supporting NATO operations in Bosnia. His senior positions before the Pacific assignment included commander of the Fleet Forces Command and of the Atlantic Fleet.

"This selection sends a clear signal that the administration wants the combatant commander to operate at the '30,000 foot' level, at the geopolitical and geostrategic level, and to foster our relations in the region as opposed to being focused solely on this conflict or that conflict," said Stephen R. Pietropaoli, a retired rear admiral who now serves as executive director of the Navy League.

"Admiral Fallon will have very experienced commanders in charge of operations in Afghanistan, Iraq, the Horn of Africa," Admiral Pietropaoli added. "But the Central Command commander needs to be above that, looking at how to enhance America's influence throughout his area of responsibility and how to truly work hand in glove with the Department of State to enhance America's image and influence and prestige in that part of the world."

U.S. Launches Air Assault On Sunni Haven (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

HAMOUD, IRAQ — Bombers, fighter jets and attack helicopters unleashed a thundering attack today as U.S. and Iraqi troops closed in on a web of irrigation canals east of Baghdad where they thought Sunni Arab insurgents were massing.

The predawn strikes shook the ground and sent fireballs and thick smoke into the sky.

The attacks, in a remote area of farms and palm groves, continued sporadically into the morning.

The air assault came after troops set fire Sunday to shoulder-high reeds to clear their view before a final push in Diyala province, a region they say has become a haven and training ground for Al Qaeda in Iraq and other militant groups.

U.S. troops said they killed 21 armed men Sunday. At least four Iraqi soldiers were killed and 27 wounded in antitank mine blasts.

About 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops are participating in the assault, which includes attack helicopters, tanks and Humvees.

Over the last four days, columns of troops have pushed through hamlets populated by wheat farmers and sheep herders to clear an area that is riddled with spider holes, tunnels and weapons caches.

One stash uncovered Sunday contained 1,169 Katyusha rockets, small arms and ammunition, the U.S. military said.

All men of military age have been questioned and tested for explosives residue. But in most homes, troops have found only women and children.

Hamoud, a one-street village of mud-brick homes, was no exception.

U.S. troops asked to meet the village sheik, or leader, and were told there wasn't one. Many houses were abandoned, some of them apparently in haste, with laundry dangling from window bars and chickens scratching in the yard.

"We are religious people; we fast and we pray," said one anxious man questioned by U.S. troops. "But I swear we have nothing to do with Al Qaeda."

Other villagers pointed to a home they said belonged to one of the people on the U.S.-Iraqi wanted list of suspected insurgents.

A small cache, including bomb-making equipment, was found in a hole on the abandoned property.

Villagers told the troops that insurgents occasionally passed through, but they had retreated to the network of canals and tunnels at first sight of the U.S.-Iraqi offensive.

American forces on the ground and in the air have spotted small groups of men, some armed and on motorcycles, moving along the canals, the military said.

U.S. officers said they were confident they could defeat the insurgents in a head-to-head battle.

DOJ_NMG_0113215

The risk is that insurgents will drop their weapons and melt into the civilian population to fight another day.

The officers said insurgents didn't always walk away from a fight.

In November, U.S. troops happened upon a major weapons cache during a reconnaissance flight, which led to the discovery of more stashes, training ranges and tunnels.

The insurgents put up a fierce fight, attacking in squad-sized units in a battle that left two Americans and more than 70 insurgents dead.

The region is a stronghold of the powerful Daini tribe, which includes many disaffected former officers from Saddam Hussein's army.

Earlier Sunday, anti-tank mines ripped through two Iraqi troop carriers, killing four Iraqi soldiers and injuring 27, the U.S. military said.

As U.S. and Iraqi troops rushed to tend to the wounded, they came under small-arms fire.

"There were bodies everywhere," Army 1st Sgt. Michael S. Clemens said. "Around every corner there was another one."

The Iraqi company hit by the explosions pulled out and was replaced by troops from a predominantly Kurdish battalion.

Another mine disabled a U.S. Bradley fighting vehicle, injuring eight people.

Such explosions have destroyed numerous vehicles and slowed the operation's progress.

"That's a key indicator we are on the right track," said Sgt. 1st Class Collin Shorey, a military intelligence officer. "They don't want us here."

5 More U.S. Soldiers Killed In Iraq (AP)

By Lauren Frayer And Shafika Mattar, Associated Press Writers

AP, January 8, 2007

Two of Saddam Hussein's co-defendants were taken from their cells and told they were going to be hanged on the same day the former dictator was executed, their lawyer said Sunday.

But the two condemned men still await death as Iraqi officials decide how to avoid the kind of outcry that followed Saddam's hanging on Dec. 30.

Also on Sunday, the U.S. military announced the deaths of five more American troops and at least 14 Iraqis died in bombings and shootings.

Saddam's half brother and former intelligence chief Barzan Ibrahim and the former head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court, Awad Hamed al-Bandar, were sentenced to hang. They were convicted along with Saddam of involvement in the killings of nearly 150 Shiites in the town of Dujail after a 1982 assassination attempt there against Saddam.

Their executions were postponed, however, until after the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha, which ended five days ago.

Authorities also decided to give Saddam his own "special day," National Security adviser Mouwaffak al-Rubaie said at the time of his execution.

One of Saddam's lawyers who met the deposed leader in his final days told The Associated Press over the weekend that Saddam expected to be put to death and considered it "the most beautiful end" he could have.

Now Iraqi officials must decide how to carry out a second round of executions in the face of worldwide criticism over their handling of Saddam's death. In the final moments of his life, Saddam was taunted by some of those present in the execution chamber as he stood with a noose around his neck.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair criticized the way in which Saddam was executed, his office said Sunday.

"He believes that the manner of the execution was completely wrong, but that should not lead us to forget the crimes that Saddam Hussein committed, including the deaths of hundreds of thousands of Iraqis," a spokeswoman for Blair's office said on condition of anonymity in line with policy.

Blair's likely successor, Treasury chief Gordon Brown, said Saturday that the taunting of Saddam during his execution and the release of an illicitly recorded cell phone video was "deplorable" and "completely unacceptable."

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has ordered an inquiry into the emergence of the unofficial video, on which Saddam is heard exchanging insults with his executioners and shown dying on the gallows.

In Amman, Jordan's Parliament also denounced the execution and asked God to bless Saddam's soul. The speaker of the lower house said Saddam's execution ignored the feelings of Muslims and Arabs because it came just before the start of the religious festival of Eid al-Adha.

Human Rights Watch, in a report for release on Monday, said the speedy trial and subsequent execution of Saddam and those planned for Ibrahim and al-Bandar illustrated the Iraqi government's disregard for human rights.

DOJ_NMG_0113216

"The tribunal repeatedly showed its disregard for the fundamental due process rights of all of the defendants," said Richard Dicker, director of Human Rights Watch's International Justice Program.

While waiting for their own postponed executions, Ibrahim and al-Bandar have been mourning Saddam, their lawyer Issam Ghazawi told the AP. He said he met with the men individually on Wednesday in Baghdad, where they are in U.S. custody.

The lawyer said U.S. officials had told the pair their deaths were imminent on the day of Saddam's execution.

Ghazawi said Ibrahim told him the Americans took him and al-Bandar from their cells on the day of Saddam's hanging and brought them to an office inside the prison at about 1 a.m. They asked them to collect their belongings because they intended to execute them at dawn — the same time Saddam was put to death.

Ghazawi said the two men were also told to write out their wills. They were returned to their cells nine hours later.

The lawyer said he has had no contact with the men since Wednesday, and had no information on when they would be hanged.

Jaafar al-Mousawi, the chief prosecutor in the Dujail case, said Sunday that the time for al-Bandar and Ibrahim's executions "will be determined by the government." Sami al-Askari, an adviser to al-Maliki, declined to give reasons for the delay and said only that "no date has been made yet" for their hangings.

Al-Bandar told Ghazawi that he "wished to have been executed with President Saddam," the lawyer said. Ibrahim "was in the worst condition. He kept crying over the death of his brother and said it was a great loss for the family and the Arab world," Ghazawi said.

Ghazawi, who served on Saddam's defense team during the last two years and says he has power of attorney for Ibrahim and al-Bandar, urged that their death sentences be overturned. The United Nations has also pleaded for a stay of execution for the two.

"Their execution should be commuted under such circumstances because of the psychological pain they endured as they waited to hang," Ghazawi said.

Meanwhile, Ahmed Saddiq, a Tunisian member of Saddam's defense team, said that during a Dec. 26 meeting with Saddam when he was still in U.S. custody, the former president appeared reconciled to his death.

"He constantly said the strongest, most likely hypothesis — and the one that he expected — was that he was going to be executed," Saddiq told the AP in Tunis. "He didn't stop saying, 'Don't panic. I'm ready for this moment and, after all, it would be the most beautiful end I could have.'"

Saddiq also said Saddam gave his lawyers a poem "of tenderness, of love" that he wrote to his wife, who lives in Qatar.

At one point, Saddam told his lawyers: "'I am still capable of love, of being sentimental and attentive. That's my right. It's there perhaps the other face of Saddam Hussein that you don't know,'" Saddiq said.

In other developments, the U.S. military said three airmen were killed in Baghdad Sunday by a car bomb, a soldier was killed by small arms fire in Baghdad a day earlier, and another soldier died in combat in western Anbar province on Friday. A British soldier also died in a traffic accident.

At least 14 Iraqis died Sunday in bombings and shootings, including three Sunni Muslim shopkeepers gunned down in a busy marketplace and a Shiite cleric and his son killed en route to a mosque, police said. Twenty-three bodies turned up in hospitals and morgues around the country, officials said.

A new battle for Iraq's capital was under way with Iraqi forces mired in gunfights with insurgents and U.S. helicopters hovering over an area where some 30 people died in fighting the previous night.

The fighting is part of a military operation announced Saturday by the prime minister and intended to quell sectarian violence.

Iraq's parliament speaker Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, the government's highest-ranking Sunni official, said Sunday he objected to the new plan for "legal reasons," and said parliament must vote on it.

War's Toll On Iraqis Put At 22,950 In '06 (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 7 -- More than 17,000 Iraqi civilians and police officers died violently in the latter half of 2006, according to Iraqi Health Ministry statistics, a sharp increase that coincided with rising sectarian strife since the February bombing of a landmark Shiite shrine.

In the first six months of last year, 5,640 Iraqi civilians and police officers were killed, but that number more than tripled to 17,310 in the latter half of the year, according to data provided by a Health Ministry official with direct knowledge of the statistics.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information, said those numbers remained incomplete, suggesting the final tally of violent deaths could be higher.

Much of last year's politically motivated bloodshed unfolded in Baghdad. The Bush administration is considering sending more U.S. troops there, as the newly ascendant Democrats in Congress press for a military withdrawal. Bringing stability and rule of law to the capital is a cornerstone of the administration's strategy to exit Iraq. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki announced over the weekend his own security push to tame Baghdad's sectarian strife.

Last year's spike in casualties occurred despite an ambitious U.S. military operation in the capital, Together Forward, that involved thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops cordoning off some of the deadliest neighborhoods and conducting house-to-house searches.

"We have been in a reaction mode in many ways to the events that occurred because of the [February] bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra, and that began a cycle of sectarian violence that we've been working very, very, very hard to keep under control," Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the former second-ranking commander in Iraq, told reporters last month.

"Now, I'm not in any way happy with what I see in Baghdad. The level of violence is way too high," he added.

The Health Ministry's full-year death toll of 22,950, although incomplete, is higher than the 13,896 violent deaths of civilians, police officers and soldiers reported Jan. 1 by Iraq's ministries of defense, health and interior. The United Nations, in a November report, estimated that more than 28,000 Iraqi civilians had died violently in the first 10 months of 2006, but that count was disputed by the government. The differences in the numbers could not be reconciled.

Iraq's death toll from violence is controversial because it provides a vivid report card on the difficulty of U.S. and Iraqi efforts to bring order to the country. Neither the U.S. government nor the military provides death totals for Iraqis.

"It is often very difficult to gain consensus on the numbers of casualties in Iraq. It really is a government of Iraq issue," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman. U.S. and Iraqi officials have discouraged Baghdad's medical officials from releasing morgue counts.

The Iraqi government does not provide a single official death toll, leaving it up to individual ministries to release data, which are often conflicting.

The Health Ministry compiles data from morgues across the nation and from government hospitals. Those figures include Iraqis killed in bombings, terrorist acts, militia attacks, roadside explosions, drive-by shootings, kidnappings and other acts of violence. They also include the numerous unidentified corpses that turn up virtually every day, often handcuffed and showing signs of torture.

The Health Ministry data are believed to be more reliable than those issued by other sources because they are based solely on death certificates. But the Health Ministry, as a policy, does not publicly release these statistics. The ministry is under the control of the Shiite religious party of Moqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia is behind much of the sectarian killing.

The numbers are considered so sensitive that some Iraqi officials, when told of the Health Ministry data, dismissed them as exaggerated, but at the same time did not offer any other numbers. Previous reports about such body counts have drawn similar denials.

"I don't know of these numbers," said Health Ministry spokesman Qasim Yahya. "The Ministry of Health does not give out such numbers."

He referred all comments to the Interior Ministry, which he said was responsible for releasing such statistics.

Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said the Health Ministry was "not authorized to give out such statistics. It's a very big number. It's not close to the truth."

The Interior Ministry's figures are based primarily on data from police stations, police units and emergency patrols. Those numbers do not include the wounded who die later from their injuries, those kidnapped and later killed, armed men who die in clashes with U.S. or Iraqi forces, unidentified bodies, and other categories of deaths.

Another source of data is the United Nations, which relies on reports it culls from the Health Ministry, the Baghdad morgue and government hospitals, and releases death figures every two months. The organization does not include Iraqi police or military casualties in its reports.

The United Nations reported 28,076 violent deaths of civilians in the first 10 months of 2006, including 3,709 killed in October, according to its latest report, issued in November. At that time, Iraqi government spokesman Ali Dabbagh disputed the U.N. numbers as "inaccurate and exaggerated" because they were not based on official government reports.

"Yes, we have casualties, but not that huge number of casualties," Health Minister Ali Hussein al-Shamari said on Iraqi television. "The true number might be a quarter that, although we feel sorry for those who are dying. But they want to mislead the world about the conditions in Iraq." During a visit to Vienna that month, however, he said as many as 150,000 Iraqi civilians had died since 2003 as a result of violence. Dabbagh, who is traveling outside of Iraq, was not available for comment on Friday.

Sadiq al-Rikabi, a political adviser to the prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, disputed the figures, saying they probably included those who were killed in car accidents or day-to-day crimes.

The Health Ministry official made clear that the statistics counted only those who had died from political violence.

"Everyone can guess, but what is the real number? I'm not sure if anyone knows how many people are killed due to the violence and the terrorism," Rikabi said.

The Associated Press count for last year, assembled from its daily dispatches, is roughly 13,700 civilians, police and soldiers. But the news service has said that it believes its figures are substantially lower than the actual number of deaths because it lacked access to government data. Iraq Body Count, a British-based research group that reports on civilian deaths in Iraq, says the number is at most roughly 58,000 since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

The group relies on deaths reported by the news media, and suggests on its Web site that its totals are an underrepresentation because "many if not most civilian casualties will go unreported." Critics have accused the group of grossly underreporting Iraqi deaths.

A study on Iraqi mortality rates published in October by the Lancet medical journal estimated that more than 600,000 Iraqis had died from violence since the invasion. That number was extrapolated from population surveys rather than a compilation of actual deaths. The U.S. and Iraqi governments, as well as Iraq Body Count, dismissed the Lancet findings as inaccurate.

The United Nations is scheduled to release death tolls for November and December within the next two weeks, an official said. According to the Health Ministry figures obtained last week, November's death toll was 3,293, while December's fell to 2,748.

In November, four family members of Abu Taha al-Adhami, a computer engineer in Baghdad, were killed, he said, and one was kidnapped and remains missing. During the first half of last year, he lost no relatives, he said.

"The violence wasn't that obvious during the first half of last year," he said. "During the second half, the violence started to grow and grow and become more severe. It's all because of the political atmosphere."

A Tougher Journey To Stock US Troops In Iraq (CSM)

By Raymond Barrett, Contributor To The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, January 8, 2007

Increased violence is slowing supply lines on which five contractors were kidnapped in November. They appeared unharmed in a video released last week.

ABDALY, KUWAIT-IRAQ BORDER

At this dusty border crossing in northern Kuwait, more than 200 18-wheelers wait to cross into Iraq. Braving Sunni insurgents, Shiite militias, and criminal gangs, these trucks are vital links in the supply chain that keeps some 130,000 US military personnel in Iraq afloat.

"Why you come to Iraq? You come again, I kill you," says a Bangladeshi driver, describing the vitriol that he and other contractors supporting the American effort routinely face.

Asked how long he intends to take his chances, he says: "Until I'm dead. I need work, I'll carry on."

A stark reminder of the perilousness of the 400-mile journey from here to a US logistics hub in Iraq came last week in a videotape of five kidnapped security contractors - four Americans and one Austrian. It was the first word from the men since their convoy that originated from this outpost was ambushed on Nov. 16.

The tape was "a good sign" but not one that signals that their release is imminent, says the spokesperson for their employer, Crescent Security Group.

Another American contractor was kidnapped Friday in Basra, according to the US Embassy in Baghdad. The Associated Press reported that the two Iraqis he was traveling with were found dead following the abduction.

Due to such dangers, security is the issue on everybody's lips at the Rabha al-Sahara (Desert Springs) truck stop, within sight of the Abdaly crossing. "It's worse than before ... [the trucks] come under fire more frequently," says a Pakistani businessman who asked not to be identified. He's a logistics operator who leases trucks that are driven into Iraq.

Last month, at least 113 US service members were killed, making December the deadliest month in 2006. The month also saw the death of more than 1,900 Iraqi civilians.

The rise in violence has affected the flow of convoys traveling into the country. "[There are usually] eight movements in a day, but nowadays it's reduced to five. In one movement there are about 45 trucks," the businessman says.

Multinationals such as the Kuwait-based Public Warehouse Company that transport fuel, food, and water receive first priority to the limited number of convoys escorted by the US military. Fuel is then distributed to army bases around Iraq by Halliburton-subsidiary KBR, also under US military protection.

DOJ_NMG_0113219

Smaller logistics operators often depend on organizations such as Crescent Security Group. The Pakistani logistics operator says, however, that his drivers often don't like to travel with private security companies and prefer US military escorts. "[The private groups] use ... Silverados or F-350s, while the Army has fully armored gun trucks and Humvees."

To be sure, the high value of the cargo makes these convoys targets for criminal gangs. A truck can carry between $30,000 to $200,000 worth of cargo - the most expensive loads being generators or four-wheel-drive vehicles. The importance of Kuwait as a logistics hub for the coalition forces in Iraq cannot be overstated. Camp Arifjan in southern Kuwait is the main staging area for troops and supplies deploying to Iraq.

"The supply line from Kuwait is absolutely crucial. You cannot supply the level that is required by air," says Paul Rodgers, professor of peace studies at Bradford University in West Yorkshire, England, who has written monthly security briefings on Iraq since 2003.

And with the possibility of increasing US forces by some 20,000 combat troops seeming more likely, the supply route from Kuwait will be ever more vital. "A very big proportion of the food and water [used by the US military] comes from Kuwait," says Robert Soussa, the managing director of Kuwait & Gulf Link Transport Co., a group heavily involved in this logistics business.

"There are hundreds of fuel tankers a day ... shared between many companies. They don't have many [petrol] refineries in Iraq, the Kuwait government supplies them with petrol," he says.

Regarding protection for their convoys, Mr. Soussa says that the security companies they hire depend on local Iraqis for safe passage. "They have connections on the ground, they recruit from local tribes, you must create jobs for these people."

Soussa adds that the upsurge in violence has impacted the logistics business. "Because of the incidents in Iraq, they have reduced the number of trucks [per convoy]," he says.

This reduction was also confirmed by a US contractor, who has driven trucks inside Iraq. US Department of Labor statistics show at least 650 American contractors have been killed inside Iraq.

Professor Rodgers says that a more substantial US combat presence in Iraq could cause insurgents to avoid direct confrontation and intensify attacks on supply lines.

"In the longer term, they [insurgents] may respond [to a troop surge] by attacking the supplies, rather than the troops themselves," he says.

5 More U.S. Soldiers Killed In Iraq (AP)

By Lauren Frayer And Shafika Mattar

AP, January 8, 2007

Two of Saddam Hussein's co-defendants were taken from their cells and told they were going to be hanged on the same day the former dictator was executed, their lawyer said Sunday.

But the two condemned men still await death as Iraqi officials decide how to avoid the kind of outcry that followed Saddam's hanging on Dec. 30.

Also on Sunday, the U.S. military announced the deaths of five more American troops and at least 14 Iraqis died in bombings and shootings.

Saddam's half brother and former intelligence chief Barzan Ibrahim and the former head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court, Awad Hamed al-Bandar, were sentenced to hang. They were convicted along with Saddam of involvement in the killings of nearly 150 Shiites in the town of Dujail after a 1982 assassination attempt there against Saddam.

Their executions were postponed, however, until after the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Adha, which ended five days ago.

Authorities also decided to give Saddam his own "special day," National Security adviser Mouwaffak al-Rubaie said at the time of his execution.

One of Saddam's lawyers who met the deposed leader in his final days told The Associated Press over the weekend that Saddam expected to be put to death and considered it "the most beautiful end" he could have.

Now Iraqi officials must decide how to carry out a second round of executions in the face of worldwide criticism over their handling of Saddam's death. In the final moments of his life, Saddam was taunted by some of those present in the execution chamber as he stood with a noose around his neck.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair criticized the way in which Saddam was executed, his office said Sunday.

"He believes that the manner of the execution was completely wrong, but that should not lead us to forget the crimes that Saddam Hussein committed, including the deaths of hundreds of thousands of Iraqis," a spokeswoman for Blair's office said on condition of anonymity in line with policy.

Blair's likely successor, Treasury chief Gordon Brown, said Saturday that the taunting of Saddam during his execution and the release of an illicitly recorded cell phone video was "deplorable" and "completely unacceptable."

DOJ_NMG_0113220

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has ordered an inquiry into the emergence of the unofficial video, on which Saddam is heard exchanging insults with his executioners and shown dying on the gallows.

In Amman, Jordan's Parliament also denounced the execution and asked God to bless Saddam's soul. The speaker of the lower house said Saddam's execution ignored the feelings of Muslims and Arabs because it came just before the start of the religious festival of Eid al-Adha.

Human Rights Watch, in a report for release on Monday, said the speedy trial and subsequent execution of Saddam and those planned for Ibrahim and al-Bandar illustrated the Iraqi government's disregard for human rights.

"The tribunal repeatedly showed its disregard for the fundamental due process rights of all of the defendants," said Richard Dicker, director of Human Rights Watch's International Justice Program.

While waiting for their own postponed executions, Ibrahim and al-Bandar have been mourning Saddam, their lawyer Issam Ghazawi told the AP. He said he met with the men individually on Wednesday in Baghdad, where they are in U.S. custody.

The lawyer said U.S. officials had told the pair their deaths were imminent on the day of Saddam's execution.

Ghazawi said Ibrahim told him the Americans took him and al-Bandar from their cells on the day of Saddam's hanging and brought them to an office inside the prison at about 1 a.m. They asked them to collect their belongings because they intended to execute them at dawn — the same time Saddam was put to death.

Ghazawi said the two men were also told to write out their wills. They were returned to their cells nine hours later.

The lawyer said he has had no contact with the men since Wednesday, and had no information on when they would be hanged.

Jaafar al-Mousawi, the chief prosecutor in the Dujail case, said Sunday that the time for al-Bandar and Ibrahim's executions "will be determined by the government." Sami al-Askari, an adviser to al-Maliki, declined to give reasons for the delay and said only that "no date has been made yet" for their hangings.

Al-Bandar told Ghazawi that he "wished to have been executed with President Saddam," the lawyer said. Ibrahim "was in the worst condition. He kept crying over the death of his brother and said it was a great loss for the family and the Arab world," Ghazawi said.

Ghazawi, who served on Saddam's defense team during the last two years and says he has power of attorney for Ibrahim and al-Bandar, urged that their death sentences be overturned. The United Nations has also pleaded for a stay of execution for the two.

"Their execution should be commuted under such circumstances because of the psychological pain they endured as they waited to hang," Ghazawi said.

Meanwhile, Ahmed Saddiq, a Tunisian member of Saddam's defense team, said that during a Dec. 26 meeting with Saddam when he was still in U.S. custody, the former president appeared reconciled to his death.

"He constantly said the strongest, most likely hypothesis — and the one that he expected — was that he was going to be executed," Saddiq told the AP in Tunis. "He didn't stop saying, 'Don't panic. I'm ready for this moment and, after all, it would be the most beautiful end I could have.'"

Saddiq also said Saddam gave his lawyers a poem "of tenderness, of love" that he wrote to his wife, who lives in Qatar.

At one point, Saddam told his lawyers: "'I am still capable of love, of being sentimental and attentive. That's my right. It's there perhaps the other face of Saddam Hussein that you don't know,'" Saddiq said.

In other developments, the U.S. military said three airmen were killed in Baghdad Sunday by a car bomb, a soldier was killed by small arms fire in Baghdad a day earlier, and another soldier died in combat in western Anbar province on Friday. A British soldier also died in a traffic accident.

At least 14 Iraqis died Sunday in bombings and shootings, including three Sunni Muslim shopkeepers gunned down in a busy marketplace and a Shiite cleric and his son killed en route to a mosque, police said. Twenty-three bodies turned up in hospitals and morgues around the country, officials said.

A new battle for Iraq's capital was under way with Iraqi forces mired in gunfights with insurgents and U.S. helicopters hovering over an area where some 30 people died in fighting the previous night.

The fighting is part of a military operation announced Saturday by the prime minister and intended to quell sectarian violence.

Iraq's parliament speaker Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, the government's highest-ranking Sunni official, said Sunday he objected to the new plan for "legal reasons," and said parliament must vote on it.

My History With The Rope (WSJ)

By Abraham Verghese

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

I have now watched both the official and the infamous unofficial cellphone video of Saddam's Hussein's execution. Both were on the Web soon after the event. I had the choice of watching them or not. I watched, with the same horrid fascination that I felt seeing ultimate fighting on television -- disbelieving that gladiators are legal when cockfighting is outlawed in just about every state save for New Mexico (where I saw my first and last cockfight).

When pollsters knock on my door, they will find that as a physician I am against capital punishment, ultimate fighting and cockfighting because they run counter to our sense of being a civilized society. But the disconnect between what I will watch and what I claim I am for is more common than most of us care to admit; I blame the camera.

The lens now peers into every nook and cranny of human existence, and it is now in the hands of every man. A digital image of interest spreads on the Internet like a drop of India ink in water. Police brutality, a bully on a school bus, an abusive nanny -- we see them all. It isn't surprising that there is a cellphone video of Saddam's hanging; it is surprising there is only one. While on rounds in my hospital (where I work as an infectious disease specialist), I caught sequential bits of the television show, "Dr. 90210" in the course of going from one patient to the next. I had no idea!

We (my patients, their visitors and I) saw an actual breast augmentation; even more edifying was the opportunity to peek into the personal lives and the marital struggles of the brave practitioners of this craft who eke out an existence in that zip code. My vicarious presence in Beverly Hills and Baghdad in the same week was not because of prurient tastes; it was because these ubiquitous images are all but unavoidable if you have eyes and any curiosity about your fellow human beings.

The uproar over the Saddam video -- both its existence and its content -- is particularly hypocritical. Given all the ways and all the weaponry that could be used to execute someone, hanging is a most inhumane choice. The condemned person will be terrified and anxious, not about death as much as the manner of death. Hanging of the 'short drop' version practiced in Iran is really a slow choking to death; in the standard or long drop method that was used in Iraq, unconsciousness is supposedly instant when the spinal cord is severed, but a misplaced knot could rip skin and muscle and cause an agonizing death. Instant or not, let's not kid ourselves; hanging is a vengeful, brutalizing, psychologically terrifying act with which we humans have a long history; in the past it was carried out publicly (and still is in countries like Iran) with the aim of serving as a deterrent. If we condone hanging a mass murderer, is it not hypocritical to want it to be conducted with "decency" when hanging is by its very nature indecent?

Saddam's hanging disturbs us because it was perverse, vengeful, furtive, hasty, carried out under cover of darkness and in front of a hoarse, excitable male audience who acted as if they were at a carnival, or, to be more precise, as if they were at a lynching. Part of the discomfort the video generates here may lie in these echoes of our own short history with the rope.

As an expatriate child growing up in Ethiopia, I saw my first hanging when the military leaders of an abortive coup were put to death in a public square. We happened to be driving by. Or perhaps, in those pre-Internet days, my parents wanted to witness the spectacle; I don't remember. I do remember the chanting, ululating crowd, dancing under the swaying corpse, the choked, congested faces and the oddly angulated heads, but most of all I remember how the dead men's shoes were filched. The bare feet seemed inconsistent with the rest of the image. That element of violation, of savagery, stayed with me. I saw a few more hangings in that country as I grew up, and the fresh bodies of people who met violent deaths in the aftermath of Emperor Haile Selassie's fall and the advent of Mengistu, the Stalin of Africa.

The Saddam video recalled these memories of witnessing violence and savagery. With the video I felt just as I did as a child witnessing an actual hanging: That the condemned man gets perverse revenge because there is a shame that accompanies such a spectacle; it spreads and stains all who are there, all who drive by, all who watch it on television, or who, like me, download it with a click of the mouse; the killer being executed has suddenly become noble, and turned us into killers.

This cellphone video will be the most viewed hanging video in history. We as a nation should watch it before washing our hands of it, and certainly before pontificating about our brand of justice versus other brands. Only by watching can the debate about capital punishment move from an abstract discussion to what is real, to what is palpable, to what is shameful, to what is actually happening whether you watch it or not.

Britain's Brown Suggests Policy Shift (AP)

By David Stringer

AP, January 8, 2007

Treasury chief Gordon Brown, expected to succeed Tony Blair as prime minister by September, suggested Sunday that he will pursue an Iraq policy that is more independent of Washington than the current government.

DOJ_NMG_0113222

Brown acknowledged that mistakes were made in the aftermath of the invasion and promised to be "very frank" with President Bush. He also said that Britain is likely to scale down its commitment of troops to Iraq over the next year — even as the White House is considering dispatching thousands more, at least temporarily.

Brown's comments, aired on the British Broadcasting Corp.'s Sunday AM program, seemed intended to distinguish himself from Blair, who has been criticized in Britain for his strong support for Bush and the war, both unpopular here.

"I look forward, if I am in a new position, to working with the president of the United States, George Bush," Brown said. "Obviously, people who know me know that I will speak my mind. I will be very frank. The British national interest is what I and my colleagues are about."

A spokesman for the U.S. State Department declined to comment on Brown's interview.

Blair has said he will step down as prime minister and leader of the governing Labour party before September. Brown, who is credited with helping Blair reinvigorate the Labour party, is unlikely to face any credible challenge when the party elects a new leader, who will automatically become Britain's new prime minister.

Brown, in the BBC interview, also said that Saddam Hussein's execution — in which Saddam, a Sunni Arab, was taunted with the name of a radical Shiite cleric — had done nothing to help stem Iraq's sectarian violence.

"Now that we know the full picture of what happened, we can sum this up as a deplorable set of events," Brown told the BBC. "It is something, of course, which the Iraqi government has now expressed its anxiety and shame at."

Blair, who previously declined to comment on the hanging, said through his press office Sunday that the manner of Saddam's execution was "completely wrong."

Brown also told the BBC that he believed the ideological battle for the hearts and minds of young Muslims was as crucial as the battle against communism was for previous generations.

Brown, in charge of Britain's Treasury since 1997, said he had worked with officials across the American political divide and remained close to ex-Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan and former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin.

In the interview, recorded on Saturday, Brown also said he believed there should be some form of inquiry into the aftermath of the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

"There are lessons to be learnt, particularly from what happened immediately after Saddam Hussein fell," he told the BBC.

"One is that in Iraq itself there is absolutely no doubt — and I think people will agree on this in time — that the passage of authority to the local population should have begun a lot earlier, so they had to take more responsibility for what was happening in their own country."

He said the experience of insurgency in Iraq and Islamic extremist terrorism had proven that "we will not win against extreme terrorist activities and propaganda activities unless we have this battle for hearts and minds as well."

The Treasury chief said he believed Britain was unlikely to join any future U.S. plan to temporarily increase troop numbers in Iraq, aimed at stemming the current bloodshed.

Britain would "continue to move troops from combat to training, to complete the redevelopment work" and was likely to scale down their presence over the next few months.

Britain has around 7,000 soldiers stationed in southern Iraq, mainly based around the city of Basra.

"I believe it is true to say that by the end of the year, there may be thousands less in Iraq than there are now," Brown said.

Parliament would also have a stronger role under his leadership, Brown said, and be more able to hold the government to account.

Iraq's Escape Is Soccer, But Soccer Can't Escape War (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

BAGHDAD — Anyone wanting to take a measure of the importance of soccer in Iraq needed only to be in the country during the national team's recent march to the finals of the Asian Games, which were held in Doha, Qatar.

During each match involving the Iraqi squad, work ground to a halt across Iraq as people gathered around televisions. Each victory was celebrated with sustained gunfire that etched the sky with the red streaks of tracer bullets. On Dec. 12, the day Iraq beat the heavily favored South Koreans in the semifinals, at least five people in Baghdad were taken to the hospital with wounds from stray bullets, the police said.

When the final whistle blew on the championship game against Qatar on Dec. 15 — a 1-0 defeat for Iraq — the Iraqi television channel that carried the game cut to a montage of glorious highlights from past victories, seemingly intent on forestalling a total collapse of the national spirit. "You are heroes," the commentator declared. "Second is a beautiful position."

Sports fandom is a universal phenomenon, but in Iraq, soccer, the country's most popular sport, may have greater meaning than usual.

DOJ_NMG_0113223

"We Iraqis don't have much fun," said Mehdi Hadi Sabi, 36, an auto parts salesman. On a recent afternoon, he was among a cluster of die-hard fans watching the Police Club, one of Iraq's professional soccer teams, practice in a small stadium here. "This is one of the few recreational things we have left," Mr. Sabi said. "It's kind of a catharsis."

Soccer has become an escape from the uncertainty and violence of life, a source of camaraderie and even a binding force of nationalism in a country riven by sectarianism.

When the national team beat Singapore in October, earning Iraq a spot in the Asia Cup this July, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad issued a joint statement of congratulations. "Few events bring together Iraqis as a nation like soccer," it said. "It is a great example of what is possible when Iraqis work together regardless of sect, religion or ethnicity."

Despite the national team's successes abroad, the sport at home has been fraught with the same uncertainties as the rest of Iraqi life.

The professional league halted at the 2003 invasion; play was not resumed until late 2004. Though the stadiums remain remarkably free of violence, fear of attacks has cut into attendance. Ticket revenues and government support have declined, and the stadiums and practice facilities are in poor shape. The best players have fled abroad, seeking safer conditions and more lucrative contracts. "All the players would be happy to leave the country," said Amir Sabah Hussein, 18, a forward on the Police Club. "I wish it weren't so."

Violence has also precluded professional league matches in areas of the country where the insurgency is particularly strong, including Anbar Province and the area north of Baghdad known as the Sunni Triangle. Teams from several violent, troubled cities have either folded or moved: the Samarra team, for instance, has relocated to Baghdad, and Mosul plays in Erbil, according to Tareq Ahmed, the acting director of the Iraq Football Association.

Amateur and school leagues have also been crippled, with many teams no longer traveling outside their neighborhoods to play because of fears of attack.

In recent months, athletes and sports officials have been shot and kidnapped. In November, Hudaib Mejhool, director of the professional Students Club, was kidnapped by gunmen while driving to work. His body turned up in the morgue. Ghanim Ghudayer, a member of the Air Force Club and the Iraqi Olympic team, was kidnapped in September.

The Police Club, which is in the soccer association's premier league and is one of the country's oldest teams, practices on a field scorched yellow by the sun, and the stands have fallen into disrepair. The team has not played an official league game there for two years because it is too vulnerable to attack, team officials said. During a practice in early December, a bullet sailed past the head of a player; the whole team dropped flat on the ground. It was unclear whether the bullet was a stray or from a sniper. The practice was cut short; memories were still fresh of a player with the Zawra Club who was killed by a stray bullet during practice earlier in the year.

The premier league's season was supposed to begin Nov. 24, but was postponed twice because of security concerns. The league's northern and southern divisions started play in November, but the season is still suspended for the teams based in Baghdad. As to when they will begin play, Ahmed Abbas, the general secretary of the Iraqi Football Association, said, "God only knows."

The possibility that the season may evaporate has crippled the Police Club's morale. "They're training aimlessly," Muhammad Shakir, the team's coach, said during a recent practice. "They don't know what they're doing this for."

The players were phlegmatically warming up by kicking around balls and stretching. "Before, we were coming to work with our hearts and minds," the coach continued. "Now we are just coming with our minds."

Hashim Ridah, 27, a stocky forward and one of the league's most prolific scorers, said that if the season never began, he might seek a spot on the team in Karbala, his hometown. He said he could not afford to lose another year. "The time of the player is limited," he said.

The fans, too, are distraught. "I may fall into a depression if there is no season," said Mr. Sabi, the auto parts dealer. "It's hard to imagine Iraq without a football season, and a season without the Police Club." But Mr. Sabi and his buddies continue to turn out for most practices.

"My family has tried to prohibit me from coming here because I have diabetes, but I don't care," said Wasim Mohsin, 50, a rotund sheep vendor and one of the Police Club's stalwart fans. "I watch the clock, and when it strikes two o'clock, I just leave the house and go to the club." Once, he said, he even abandoned a sick daughter at a hospital to catch a game.

But there may be no more devoted a Police Club fan than Khalil Khalaf, 23, a deaf house painter. After a Police Club loss to a team from Najaf last season, Mr. Khalaf, a wiry blade of a man, angrily hurled himself over a retaining fence, sprinted across the playing field and tackled a Najaf player. Mr. Khalaf was pounced on by other Najaf players and a police officer, who beat him with a stick. His friends pulled him to safety.

DOJ_NMG_0113224

To explain what the team meant to him, Mr. Khalaf pounded his chest with his fist, then repeatedly dragged an index finger from the corner of his eye down his cheek. Mr. Mohsin translated: "He says, 'The team is in my heart, and sometimes I cry for them.' "

His message conveyed, Mr. Khalaf clenched his fists into thumbs-up signs and bounced up and down on the balls of his feet. He looked like the happiest man in Iraq.

Taliban Resume Their Attacks In Afghanistan (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Jan. 7 — The Taliban appeared to be resuming their campaign of violence after a week of quiet over the Islamic festival of Id al-Adha.

Two newborn babies, their mother and a grandmother were killed in a roadside bombing in eastern Afghanistan as they were returning home from the hospital on Sunday, said the provincial police chief of Khost, Muhammad Ayub, who called the attack "inhuman." Three others in the car, a woman and two men, were wounded, he said.

In a separate attack, gunmen on a motorcycle killed a high school headmaster in the southern province of Helmand as he was walking home from morning prayers at his local mosque, according to an Interior Ministry spokesman.

American soldiers thwarted a suicide car-bomb attack on their outpost in the eastern province of Paktika on Saturday. The troops began shooting at the advancing vehicle, and it crashed into an outside barrier and exploded, according to a NATO statement. Five soldiers were wounded, and the bomber was killed.

A NATO soldier was also wounded in a roadside explosion in Kandahar Province on Saturday, a NATO spokesman said.

More than 600 civilians have been killed in the past three years, including those killed as a result of operations by NATO, American and Afghan troops as well as attacks by the Taliban and Al Qaeda, the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission reported Sunday. The commission appealed for the military to take more care to avoid civilian casualties and called for compensation to be given to the victims' families.

Military Injustice (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

Army prosecutors are going too far in trying to conscript reporters to boost their case in a soldier's court-martial.

ARMY 1ST LT. EHREN WATADA may or may not have a good claim for conscientious objector status. It makes sense for the Army to prosecute him for refusing orders to deploy to Iraq last June, and Watada has at best an uphill battle in defending his actions, given that he joined the military of his own free will. But Army lawyers are overreaching when they try to prosecute their case by drafting reporters.

Watada faces a court-martial next month for missing his troop movement and for his published explanations of his refusal to go. The Army has his statements, but it subpoenaed reporters to authenticate that he, in fact, said what is in print and on tape.

Portions of independent journalist Sarah Olson's interviews with Watada appeared on the website Truthout.org and were broadcast on radio stations in New York and the Bay Area. Freelance journalist Dahr Jamail had simply videotaped Watada's speech at a Veterans for Peace convention. Honolulu Star-Bulletin reporter Gregg K. Kakesako also reported Watada's story.

A military judge ruled that Olson and Jamail did not have to appear at Thursday's pretrial hearing. But the Army is pressing forward with its demand that the two reporters testify at the trial.

No prosecutor should be able to conscript any reporter into being a deputy by compelling testimony about a statement made by a source — or go fishing for information beyond what a reporter presents in a story — unless it's absolutely vital to protect U.S. citizens from crime or attack. This principle should apply whether or not the source was speaking in confidence, or whether or not the reporter works for a media organization.

It's egregious enough when U.S. attorneys subpoena journalists, which is happening at an alarmingly increasing rate (illustrating the need for a national shield law). But there is something especially chilling about the U.S. military reaching beyond its traditional authority to compel a non-military U.S. citizen engaged in news-gathering to testify in a military court, simply to bolster a court-martial case. There is no security interest at stake, and no matter of national urgency.

The Army can make its case against Watada without pestering civilian journalists. Sustaining the military subpoena would set a troubling precedent. It's time for the Army to back off.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple's Jobs May Still Face U.S. Scrutiny Over Stock Options (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo And Connie Guglielmo

Bloomberg, January 8, 2007

Jan. 8 (Bloomberg) -- Apple Computer Inc. Chief Executive Officer Steve Jobs, exonerated by the company's board last month in a stock-options scandal, may still face scrutiny from U.S. investigators.

The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Department of Justice may question Jobs as they probe whether current and former Apple executives, directors and others committed fraud by backdating some stock-option awards to inflate their value, said criminal defense attorneys who formerly worked at those agencies.

Apple said Dec. 29 that 6,428 stock options issued between 1997 and 2002 were backdated. That included one grant to Jobs marked as approved at a special board meeting that never occurred. Jobs recommended some favorable dates on options other than his own. Apple, which found ``no misconduct'' by Jobs, didn't say which options the CEO backdated or why it faked a board meeting.

``The SEC and the Justice Department are not bound by the company's conclusions,'' said San Francisco-based attorney Jahan Raissi, a former senior counsel in the SEC's enforcement division. ``They have far more powerful tools to force people to talk to get information.''

Federal Investigation

Cupertino, California-based Apple, maker of the iPod music player and Macintosh computer, is among the largest of the more than 195 companies embroiled so far in a stock-options scandal that broke last year.

Prosecutors will want to know what Jobs, 51, was told in meetings and in telephone calls and if any advice was given to him by outside attorneys, said Robert Mintz, a white-collar criminal defense attorney in Newark, New Jersey, and former assistant U.S. attorney in New Jersey.

A person familiar with the matter said Oct. 5 that federal prosecutors in San Francisco are investigating Apple's backdating of stock options.

The computer maker's revelation that Jobs chose some of the dates for options grants will prompt investigators to explore his role, said William Portanova, a white collar criminal defense attorney in Sacramento, California, and former U.S. prosecutor in California.

``They admitted he knew what was going on and picked the dates,'' Portanova said. ``Nobody is out of the woods until the SEC and DOJ say they are out of the woods.''

Hiding Costs

Stock options allow holders to buy shares at a later date, usually at the market price the day they were granted. Backdating options to days with low prices inflates their value. If not properly disclosed, the practice may break laws because it hides costs from shareholders and regulators.

SEC spokesman John Nester in Washington wouldn't comment specifically about Apple, though he said internal company reviews don't preclude an SEC investigation. ``It's a tool that can expedite the resolution of a matter, but it's not a substitute,'' Nester said.

U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan in San Francisco declined to comment on the company. In general, while a company's internal investigation ``can be helpful in our investigation, we exercise our own due diligence in determining whether federal criminal prosecution is warranted,'' Ryan said.

Apple set up a special committee to run an internal review of the options grants after disclosing in June there may have been problems with awards. It was led by former Vice President Al Gore, a member of the company's board since 2003, and director Jerome York, who was a member of the compensation committee in 2001 when the backdated grant to Jobs was made.

Jobs and Gore

Jobs served on the advisory board of Gore's Current TV cable channel, the San Francisco-based company said in a May 2004 press release. He has contributed $252,700 to Democrats since 1996, including $26,700 to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in June, according to federal campaign contribution records compiled by the Center For Responsive Politics, which tracks money in politics.

He gave former U.S. Senator Bill Bradley $500 in 1999 and hasn't contributed to Gore, the records show.

DOJ_NMG_0113226

Neither Jobs nor Apple have made any financial contributions to any of Gore's projects: The Alliance for Climate Control, Current TV or Generation Investment Management LLP, said Apple spokesman Steve Dowling. There is no financial relationship between Jobs and Gore, Dowling said.

The Gore committee cleared Jobs and other current management of wrongdoing after an investigative team spent more than 26,500 man-hours searching more than 1 million paper and electronic documents. More than 40 current and former directors, officers, employees and advisers were also interviewed, the company said.

Cleared Jobs

The disclosure eased some investors' concerns that Jobs, credited with leading a revival at the company since returning as CEO in 1997, might be forced to step down.

Apple shares rose 4.9 percent the day of the exoneration. They fell 61 cents to $85.05 in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading Jan. 5. They gained 18 percent last year after more than doubling in 2005.

Jobs and Apple may also be forced to provide more details to lawyers representing shareholders suing the company. ``They have not disclosed near enough information," said Nell Minow, editor at the Corporate Library, a corporate governance research firm in Portland, Maine. Apple faces a federal lawsuit in California that consolidates 11 shareholder complaints over backdating.

``You want to see a very specific discussion of what steps they took, what questions they asked, what researchers they used," Minow said.

Options for Jobs

In 2001, Jobs received options on 7.5 million shares. The terms of the grant were completed Dec. 18 of that year, when Apple's shares were trading at $21.01, Apple said. Oct. 19 was chosen as the grant's date, giving Jobs a lower exercise price of $18.30.

The company told shareholders in a March 2002 regulatory filing that the grant was approved at a special board meeting in October 2001. Apple disclosed last month that the meeting never took place. No member of current management was aware of the ``irregularity," the company said.

Apple said it recorded $84 million in charges to correct its accounting for the backdated options, including $20 million for Jobs' 7.5 million share award. Jobs voluntarily canceled that grant and other outstanding options in March 2003.

He chose to do so to make more stock available for employees, Apple said in an SEC filing at the time.

Restricted Shares

Instead, the board gave Jobs 5 million shares of restricted stock, which vested in March 2006. At the time, the shares were worth $646.6 million.

Apple said the actions of two unidentified former officers involved in accounting, recording and reporting of stock options grants had raised ``serious concerns."

Former Chief Financial Officer Fred Anderson, whose tenure included the five years when options were manipulated, resigned as a director in October after Apple first reported the results of its internal review. Jerome Roth, Anderson's San Francisco- based attorney, said his client wasn't involved in any ``knowing manipulation" of options.

Apple's top lawyer Nancy Heinen, who joined Apple in September 1997 after Jobs returned as CEO, resigned last May.

``We strongly deny any and all accusations of intentional wrongdoing on her part," said Cristina Arguedas, Heinen's lawyer in Berkley, California.

Investigator In Apple Probe Had Conflicts (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, January 8, 2007

One of the directors in charge of Apple's internal investigation into backdated stock options ran a computer reseller that accounted for about $600 million worth of Apple sales from 2000 to 2003.

That financial relationship, even though it no longer exists, should have disqualified director Jerome York from the assignment, say two corporate governance experts.

York, an Apple director for the past 10 years who chairs the board's audit and finance committee, was one of three board members on a committee that oversaw last year's probe into the company's improperly awarded options grants.

In January 2000, York led an investor group that paid more than $700 million to buy Micro Warehouse, a distributor of Macintosh computers and related products. York became chairman and CEO.

Over the next three years, according to Apple's filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission, Apple drew about 3% of its annual net sales from Micro Warehouse. York sold the company's assets to CDW in September 2003 for $22 million.

In addition to the history of his business relationship with Apple, York faced another conflict in overseeing the special probe: He sat on Apple's compensation committee during part of the time when Apple now says options were backdated. Apple said York recused himself from that part of the probe.

As head of the compensation committee, York had approved some of the grants that were investigated.

Still, two governance experts expressed dismay that Apple would allow York, a former chief financial officer of IBM and Chrysler, to serve on the panel.

"You either have an independent investigation or you don't," says Lynn Turner, director of research at Glass Lewis. "York was a conflicted director."

"This is not a good board, and they have not given us any reasons to feel confident," says Nell Minow, editor at The Corporate Library. Just because York no longer has a financial relationship with Apple doesn't erase all the ties that existed, she says.

"You can't unscramble that egg and suddenly become independent," says Minow. "This shows a failure to understand the core fundamentals of appearance and reality."

York did not return messages left at his home last week, and Apple declined to comment on the matter.

In a statement issued Dec. 29, York and Al Gore, the former U.S. vice president who joined Apple's board in 2003, described Apple's investigation into backdating as "exhaustive" and said the board had "complete confidence" in CEO Steve Jobs and his management team.

Apple said in an SEC filing that Jobs "was aware or recommended the selection of some favorable grant dates," but "he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants or appreciate the accounting implications."

The investigation, which the company voluntarily disclosed more than six months ago, was conducted by the law firm Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges, under the direction of Gore, York and a third outside director, Google CEO Eric Schmidt.

Apple is among about 200 companies that have admitted to or are being investigated for giving employees favorably priced options by backdating awards from the approval date to dates when the stock's market price was lower. That may violate SEC and tax rules if companies don't properly disclose and account for below-market priced options.

According to the Dec. 29 SEC filing, the investigation focused on 42,000 stock-option grants made on 259 dates from 1996 to 2003. Of those grants, 6,428 awarded on 42 dates were incorrectly dated.

Apple spokesman Steve Dowling said he did not know if the law firm interviewed Jobs or York or whether the 40-plus witnesses questioned made any statements under oath. He said the findings were given voluntarily to the SEC and the U.S. Attorney's office in San Francisco, which are looking into the matter.

Apple Quietly Canned Lawyer Who Backdated (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, January 8, 2007

Steve Jobs is an ideas guy. He wears jeans, grows beards and orates to cheering throngs at events like this week's MacWorld conference.

Jobs' biographers say evidence indicates that he's a pescetarian. He went to India. He takes only $1 a year in salary. And he leaves it up to other people to award him hugely valuable piles of stock in Apple Computer, where he's the CEO.

People like Wendy Howell, the former in-house Apple lawyer responsible for option paperwork, probably won't be attending Jobs' eagerly awaited MacWorld speech Tuesday. Late last year, she became the lone person to lose her job as a result of the company's well-publicized options problems.

Howell's name hasn't been publicly mentioned in the Apple options mess, and her firing wasn't disclosed by the company in its series of public disclosures of options problems.

But she was the person who filled out the paperwork on a 2001 option award to Jobs that has grown infamous since just after Christmas, when Apple acknowledged that the value of the grant was artificially pumped up via a set of fabricated meeting minutes.

Howell's role was detailed by various people familiar with the situation, all of whom refused to be named because of the federal government's ongoing criminal and regulatory probes of Apple.

As the person who wrote out those "minutes," Howell has become a central figure in the Apple probe -- both as a potential defendant in a fraud case and as someone who could tell the government who at the company knew about backdating and its financial and legal implications.

Reached Thursday, Howell's lawyer, white-collar defense specialist Thomas Carlucci of Foley & Lardner, didn't seem ecstatic about the prospect of seeing his client's name in print. He would not comment on whether his client was a target.

DOJ_NMG_0113228

Of course, there's more to Apple's options problem than what went on in the legal department. So while prosecutors discuss whether Howell is more valuable as a witness or a target, their colleagues in the Securities and Exchange Commission are trying to parse the specifics of how Apple accounted for thousands of options grants -- and whether executives knew that the law required backdated grants to be recorded as expenses.

The company has publicly said that while Jobs knew about the backdating, he didn't benefit from it or understand the accounting implications.

And last week, a lawyer for Fred Anderson, Apple's former CFO, released a prepared statement that his client "did not play any day-to-day role in the granting, reporting, and accounting of stock options and he was not involved in any knowing manipulation of the process."

But analyzing the accounting of options is an esoteric pursuit, and people familiar with the Apple case say Anderson could be facing indictment -- a concern big enough to warrant the hiring of a "crisis communications" specialist this week to speak on his behalf.

FLIGHT PATH

Howell's trajectory into backdating ignominy is as unlikely as the route that Jobs, a first-semester college dropout, took to becoming the personification of a wildly successful tech company.

Howell graduated from the John F. Kennedy University School of Law in Walnut Creek, a school unaccredited by the American Bar Association, and passed the bar in 1996.

She soon found herself in the legal department of floundering Apple Computer, a company in such rough shape that it was having a tough time finding in-house lawyers.

But it didn't take long for it to become clear that Howell's timing was lucky: In 1997, Apple acquired Next, the company that Jobs founded after leaving Apple in 1985. The merger saw Jobs return as CEO, leading the company to remarkable success while bringing close associates to executive and board positions.

Howell eventually took over the responsibility of options administration. When her direct supervisor, Michael Wyatt, left in 2000, Howell -- who had been practicing law only four years -- found herself as one of the only corporate lawyers left in the department, and began reporting directly to General Counsel Nancy Heinen.

That was the case through the end of the tech boom and the ensuing bust cycle, which flooded the job market with more experienced corporate attorneys who would've been happy to have Howell's job.

It was in that atmosphere that someone decided to grant Jobs a pile of backdated options -- and it was up to Howell to fill out that paperwork, which, according to people familiar with the case, included writing up minutes for a board meeting that never happened.

HITTING THE FAN

Howell continued working at Apple through a serious personal crisis in 2005 and the spring 2006 firing of Heinen -- which came, according to people with knowledge of the situation, after a disagreement between the GC and Jobs unrelated to the backdating.

Heinen has been represented by Cristina Arguedas, of Arguedas, Cassman & Headley and by Miles Ehrlich of Ramsey & Ehrlich since shortly after Apple's internal probe into backdating was launched.

Also around the beginning of that probe, Howell's role regarding options came under close scrutiny.

She went on leave over the summer, said people with knowledge of the situation and, sources said, was eventually terminated as a result of the investigation. Howell's role has since been detailed to the San Francisco federal prosecutors and SEC lawyers investigating the case, said people with knowledge of the investigation.

It's not clear what the government will decide to do with that information. While they could decide to bring a case against her, it's unlikely that prosecutors would bring criminal charges in such a high-profile case if they were limited to a non-executive employee.

That sets up a tense dynamic for the prosecutors and the subjects of their investigation. Whereas Howell will probably try to extricate herself by saying superiors ordered her to fabricate filings, those superiors, said people familiar with the case, are certain to argue that the wrongdoing was limited to Howell, who, as an attorney, would be expected to know that faking documents is illegal.

The other question is the extent to which prosecutors and SEC regulators will look beyond the legal department in an attempt to bring charges.

Anderson's crisis management specialist, Paul Kranhold, referred a request for comment to the earlier prepared statement by Anderson's lawyer, Jerome Roth of Munger, Tolles & Olson. And George Riley, the O'Melveny & Myers partner representing Apple, was even less loquacious about the case. "I have no comment at all," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0113229

Nor did Mark Pomerantz, the Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison partner who, several people with knowledge of the investigation said, represents Jobs.

A GATHERING STORM

People with knowledge of the Apple probe say they expect it to gain steam over the next few weeks, and that if the prosecution team -- mainly Assistant U.S. Attorney Christopher Steskal and his supervisor, Eumi Choi -- were to file charges, it could happen within the next two months.

But that could change because in most of the options cases, defendants have been willing to sign tolling agreements, which prolong the statute of limitations to give prosecutors extra time to investigate, extending the time targets have to persuade prosecutors not to indict.

As they move forward with their probe, the prosecutors will have to weigh several considerations: Is Apple's assertion that Jobs knew about backdating, but wasn't aware of its impropriety, plausible?

And is it possible that someone in Howell's position could -- or would -- backdate grants to benefit executives without her superiors knowing?

In arguing no, it's likely that her lawyer, Carlucci, will use as a defense Howell's lack of experience -- in contrast to the defense that her superior's lawyer has offered.

"Nancy Heinen has got 20 years of her reputation to stand on, period, and I'll put that up against any innuendo or rumor any time," Arguedas said.

FCC Rules Expected On Phone Records (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, January 8, 2007

Four months after Hewlett-Packard's spying scandal, the Federal Communications Commission is expected within weeks to set new rules protecting personal phone records from unauthorized disclosure.

The move follows last summer's revelations that investigators for Hewlett-Packard used deception to obtain the phone records of board members and reporters in an effort to identify the sources of news leaks about company matters.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin is recommending the FCC order land-line and wireless phone carriers to require that customers use a password to immediately obtain their calling records from a representative by phone, FCC officials say.

Customers also could obtain their records without a password by asking phone companies to send the information to their home addresses, or having a phone company representative call them back at their home or cellphone number of record.

Those trying to obtain their calling data online would have to use a password.

A majority of the FCC's five commissioners support the proposal, though some details could be modified before the new rules are approved in the next few weeks, agency officials say.

In 2005, lawmakers began raising concerns about the practice known as "pretexting," where data brokers pose as someone else and trick phone-company representatives into turning over that person's calling information, such as numbers called, and the time and duration of calls. The brokers then sell the data, often for use in legal or domestic disputes.

Congress last month passed a bill criminalizing the practice of lying to obtain phone records, with violators facing fines and up to 10 years in prison. President Bush is expected to sign the legislation.

Phone companies have opposed a password requirement, fearing it would mean hassles for subscribers. But in a recent letter to the FCC, Verizon and Verizon Wireless said they back a password mandate to obtain call details, as long as it's not needed simply to discuss an account with customer service.

"I think we've tried to figure out a way to balance (customer convenience) while also making sure we add some additional protections," the FCC's Martin says. Under Martin's proposal, a customer also would be able to discuss a particular call on a bill without a password. Carriers also would have to notify customers if their passwords are changed to ensure they were not illegally altered online by a pretexter.

Marc Rotenberg of the Electronic Privacy Information Center says the proposed rules are "a step in the right direction," but a more foolproof strategy would be to not provide calling details on a bill.

Pay Is Company's Prerogative (USAT)

By Yaron Brook

USA Today, January 8, 2007

Critics of CEO pay are lampooning the $210 million Robert Nardelli received after a disappointing six-year tenure at Home Depot. Rep. Barney Frank, the new chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, calls Nardelli's pay package "confirmation of the need to deal with a pattern of CEO pay that appears to be out of control."

By what right does the government, or anyone else, claim the power to dictate what owners of Home Depot or any other private company can pay someone to run their company? It's their company. If through error or irrationality they overpay (or underpay, and so fail to attract good managers), as Home Depot may have done, the loss is theirs.

The only valid reason to be concerned about CEO pay is that our government actively prevents market forces from operating. For instance, restrictions on board membership and hostile takeovers today stop large shareholders with extensive business knowledge, especially financial institutions, from influencing CEO pay. Anyone concerned about the health of corporate America would demand repeal of all such regulations.

But far from demanding repeal of the regulations, critics of CEO pay agitate for ever more control over corporate governance. They are not concerned with corporate wealth creation, but with "corporate social responsibility" — the idea that executives and shareholders should be forced to sacrifice money-making for the sake of sundry "stakeholders." These critics demand that companies staff boards with labor activists, invest in irrational environmental schemes, and provide above-market health benefits with no regard for the cost to shareholders.

This vision of corporate altruism is not only destructive, it is immoral. America is the land in which every individual, including a CEO, can pursue happiness through productive work. Morally, CEOs should focus on creating wealth and making profits for their shareholders, and they should be regarded as heroes, not villains, for doing so. Theirs is an enormously demanding job, with billions of dollars riding on their judgment. They should be paid handsomely for their services.

How much? That is for the owners of each company — and more widely, the participants in a truly free market — to establish.

Yaron Brook is executive director of the Ayn Rand Institute, which promotes individual rights and free enterprise. (Home Depot and Robert Nardelli declined to provide an opposing view to this editorial.)

Working Harder For The Man (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

Robert L. Nardelli, the chairman and chief executive of Home Depot, began the new year with a pink slip and a golden parachute. The company handed him a breathtaking $210 million to take a hike. What would he have been worth if he'd done a good job?

Data recently compiled by the Center for Labor Market Studies at Northeastern University in Boston offers a startling look at just how out of whack executive compensation has become. Some of the Wall Street Christmas bonuses last month were fabulous enough to resurrect an adult's belief in Santa Claus. Morgan Stanley's John Mack got stock and options worth in excess of $40 million. Lloyd Blankfein at Goldman Sachs did even better — $53.4 million.

According to the center's director, Andrew Sum, the top five Wall Street firms (Bear Stearns, Goldman Sachs, Lehman Brothers, Merrill Lynch and Morgan Stanley) were expected to award an estimated $36 billion to $44 billion worth of bonuses to their 173,000 employees, an average of between $208,000 and $254,000, "with the bulk of the gains accruing to the top 1,000 or so highest-paid managers."

Now consider what's been happening to the bulk of the American population, the ordinary men and women who have to work for a living somewhere below the stratosphere of the top corporate executives. Between 2000 and 2006, labor productivity in the nonfarm sector of the economy rose by an impressive 18 percent. But workers were not paid for that impressive effort. During that period, according to Mr. Sum, the inflation-adjusted weekly wages of workers increased by just 1 percent.

That's $3.20 a week. As Mr. Sum wryly observed, that won't even buy you a six-pack of Bud Light. Joe Six-Pack has been downsized. Three bucks ain't what it used to be.

There are 93 million production and nonsupervisory workers (exclusive of farmworkers) in the U.S. Their combined real annual earnings from 2000 to 2006 rose by $15.4 billion, which is less than half of the combined bonuses awarded by the five Wall Street firms for just one year.

"Just these bonuses — for one year — overwhelmingly exceed all the pay increases received by these workers over the entire six-year period," said Mr. Sum.

In a development described by Mr. Sum as "quite stark and rather bleak for the economic well-being of the average worker," the once strong link between productivity gains and real wage increases has been severed. The mystery to me is why workers aren't more scandalized. If your productivity increases by 18 percent and your pay goes up by 1 percent, you've been dealt a hand full of jokers in a game in which jokers aren't wild.

Workers have received some modest increases in benefits over the past six years, but most of the money from their productivity gains — by far, it's not even a close call — has gone into profits and the salaries of top executives.

Fairness plays no role in this system. The corporate elite control it, and they have turned it to their ends.

DOJ_NMG_0113231

Mr. Sum, a longtime expert on the economic life of the American worker, said he is astonished at the degree to which ordinary workers have been shortchanged over the past several years. “Productivity has been exceptional,” he said. “And for most of my life, the way to get wages up was to be more productive. That’s how our economy was supposed to work.”

The productivity gains in the go-go decades that followed World War II were broadly shared, and the result was a dramatic, sustained increase in the quality of life for most Americans. Nowadays workers have to be more productive just to maintain their economic status quo. Productivity gains are no longer broadly shared. They’re barely shared at all.

The pervasive unfairness in the way the great wealth of the United States is distributed should be seen for what it is, an insidious disease eating away at the structure of the society and undermining its future. The middle class is hurting, propped up by the wobbly crutches of personal debt. The safety net, not just for the poor, but for the middle class as well, is disappearing. The savings rate has dropped to below zero, and more Americans are filing for bankruptcy than for divorce.

Your pension? Don’t ask.

There’s a reason why the power elite get bent out of shape at the merest mention of a class conflict in the U.S. The fear is that the cringing majority that has taken it on the chin for so long will wise up and begin to fight back.

CRIMINAL LAW:

States Turn To Texas For Execution Guidance (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson And Richard Willing

USA Today, January 8, 2007

On the evening of Nov. 6, 2001, convicted murderer Terry Clark became the first New Mexico inmate put to death in 41 years. The execution itself wasn't the only thing notable about that evening in the Santa Fe death chamber.

The executioner who carried out the death sentence was an unidentified contractor who learned how to administer a deadly chemical cocktail as a member of the lethal injection team in Texas, which operates the nation's busiest death house. Texas "was right next door, and they were obviously experienced," New Mexico spokeswoman Tia Bland says. The unidentified executioner was paid $6,300, she says.

"We contacted other states," says Bland, whose state has not executed anyone since Clark, "but Texas was the only one willing to accept the contract."

The outsourced execution, and others like it, has drawn attention to Texas' growing reputation as the nation's source for behind-the-scenes guidance and experience in carrying out lethal injections at a time when that method of execution is increasingly under fire.

As lawsuits from California to Florida have challenged the constitutionality of lethal injections, more than a dozen states and the federal government have sought Texas' advice in carrying out such executions.

The lawsuits have alleged, among other things, that unqualified execution teams sometimes have botched the procedure and made it a cruel and unusual punishment that should be considered illegal under the Eighth Amendment.

Problems with the recent execution of Angel Diaz in Florida triggered a temporary suspension of the death penalty in that state while authorities review injection procedures and questions about how much inmates suffer when they are executed by injection. An autopsy revealed that Diaz's execution took 34 minutes — more than twice as long as a typical execution — because needles carrying the lethal drugs had not been inserted properly into Diaz's veins.

Meanwhile, a federal judge in California recently extended a moratorium on executions there after citing a "lack of professionalism" in execution protocols. Last year, challenges to lethal injection were brought in Maryland, Oklahoma, Missouri, Virginia and Georgia. Last month, Maryland's state Court of Appeals suspended executions in that state, ruling that part of the guidelines for carrying out lethal injections were not approved correctly under state law.

Together, the lawsuits represent the most significant challenges to date of the method of execution used by nearly all of the 38 states that have the death penalty.

Lethal injections typically involve a mixture of three drugs administered in the following order:

·Sodium thiopental, which renders the inmate unconscious;

·A muscle relaxant such as pancuronium bromide to stop all muscle movement except that of the heart;

·Potassium chloride, which stops the heart.

The precise mixture of chemicals and the protocols for how to inject the drugs vary slightly among the states, but when officials in a state begin developing or revising their guidelines for carrying out executions, they often start with a trip to Texas. Since the U.S. Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty in 1976, Texas has executed 379 killers — nearly 36% of all the inmates executed in the USA since then, and almost four times the number executed by Virginia, which ranks second in executions.

The trips by officials from other states and the federal government who visit Texas generally are not publicized. Texas Department of Criminal Justice spokeswoman Michelle Lyons says that such trips usually are planned around a scheduled execution in Texas, so that the visiting officials can shadow the entire procedure.

Seats also are reserved for visiting officials in the "chemical room," where an anonymous executioner starts the flow of the lethal drugs to the prisoner through intravenous lines.

"Where else would you go to learn that?" asks Larry Fitzgerald, a former Texas prisons spokesman who witnessed 219 executions in eight years with the Texas Department of Criminal Justice.

The sheer number of executions in Texas was one reason federal prison authorities went to Huntsville in 2001 as they prepared to execute Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh. On June 11, 2001, McVeigh — who was convicted in the 1995 attack on a federal building that killed 168 people and wounded hundreds more — became the first federal prisoner put to death in 38 years.

Federal Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin, who then managed the U.S. government's death row operation in Terre Haute, Ind., was an observer on Feb. 8, 2001, when Texas inmate Adolph Hernandez was executed for killing a 69-year-old woman in 1988. (Lappin recently was named to a Florida commission reviewing lethal injection procedures in the aftermath of Diaz's execution.)

Fitzgerald says prison authorities from more than a dozen states, including Alabama, New York and California, have made similar excursions to Texas to observe executions and develop their own protocols not only for dispensing a lethal dose of chemicals, but also for controlling crowds outside the execution facility and dealing with media.

Fitzgerald also says that states sometimes have arranged to have members of Texas' execution team carry out death sentences in those states. "On occasion, they have been content with our guys to do the execution," he says.

Texas' Department of Criminal Justice has declined to disclose any potentially identifying information about members of the execution team, except to indicate that they are non-physicians with specific medical training to start IV lines and dispense the lethal chemicals. The department also will not reveal how the team members are selected or describe the terms of their contracts with the state of Texas.

Lyons says the department does not monitor execution team members' involvement in out-of-state executions. She says she does not know how frequently Texas teams are hired by other states.

In Connecticut, the attorney for convicted serial killer Michael Ross says he believes the state sought the assistance of Texas executioners when his client was put to death by lethal injection on May 13, 2005. "It was my understanding that our Department of Corrections had obtained guidance and assistance from Texas," attorney T.R. Paulding says.

Connecticut's Department of Corrections has declined to say whether Texas authorities were involved in Ross' execution.

Michael Radelet, chairman of the Sociology Department at the University of Colorado, calls the practice of contract executions "bizarre."

"I suspect that those states look to Texas simply because they do not want to undergo the training costs to qualify their own" executioners, Radelet says. "Then again, given the stigma surrounding the executioner profession for the past several hundred years, perhaps this is simply another sign that more and more people are realizing that this is not a good profession to be in."

He notes that although Texas is recognized as the authority in carrying out the death penalty, there have been complications in several of the state's executions.

In a review published by the Death Penalty Information Center, a group based in Washington, D.C., that opposes the death penalty, Radelet cited 37 instances — including 10 from Texas — in which there were problems during an execution. The problems included execution team members having difficulty finding veins in an inmate's arm in order to inject the drugs and a 1988 case in which a catheter popped out of a condemned man's vein, causing the execution process to be restarted.

Jonathan Groner, associate professor of surgery at Ohio State University's College of Medicine and Public Health, says it would not be uncommon for state officials to gather "the family recipes" from jurisdictions where executions are most common.

"The problem is that the process is so secretive," Groner says, referring in part to the backgrounds and oversight of executioners. Because physician ethics prohibit doctors from overseeing executions, Groner calls the lethal injection process a "medical charade."

"Lethal injection involves medical technology," he says, "but does not include medical expertise."

The New Math On Crime (USNEWS)

By Will Sullivan

DOJ_NMG_0113233

U.S. News and World Report, January 7, 2007

Even before the fireworks launched from the French Quarter's Jackson Square, 2006 went out with a bang in New Orleans-a handful of them, actually. At 7 p.m. on December 31, several of those bangs felled a 42-year-old man, who was found inside his FEMA trailer with multiple gunshot wounds to the back of his head. At 8:45 p.m., another man was shot several times and left dead on the sidewalk. At 10:12 p.m., a third was killed inside his home.

The three men were some of the last murder victims in an unusually bloody 2006. The year is expected to snap a long stretch of relatively good news on the homicide front nationwide, moving questions about the causes of crime increases off the back burner they have occupied for more than a decade. Those questions have so far eluded satisfying answers, and many experts contend that fears of a sustained rise in murders have little foundation. But the numbers are causing more than a little alarm and getting more than a little attention-from the nation's police chiefs, from Congress, from the Justice Department, perhaps even from the president in his State of the Union speech later this month. Slowly but surely, violent crime is returning to the national agenda.

Nationwide murder totals for 2006 will not be available until the fall, when the FBI releases its annual Uniform Crime Report. But an analysis by U.S. News shows a substantive, if uneven, increase in homicide in the nation's 20 largest cities. The 19 cities for which data were available had 4,152 homicides in 2006, compared with 3,919 the previous year-a 6 percent increase. Phoenix, which could not provide a year-end number, had neared its 2005 total of 238 by the end of November.

Murder is considered the most reliable crime statistic because such a high percentage of killings are reported. So the numbers are always watched closely as an indicator of crime trends. The beginning of the crack epidemic brought soaring murder numbers-a 31 percent increase between 1984 and its peak in 1993. But as the drug's popularity waned, so did murder, falling to around 16,000 a year and staying there for the early years after the millennium. More recently, the plateau has ended. Homicide showed an uptick in 2005, and the FBI's preliminary numbers from the first six months of 2006, along with the yearlong data collected by U.S. News, suggest the increase continued last year.

Some cities were hit especially hard. Philadelphia's 406 homicides were the most in the City of Brotherly Love since 1997. Oakland, Calif., topped its 2005 homicide tally by more than 50, and Cincinnati's 85 homicides were literally unprecedented.

As the year's crime numbers come in, the Police Executive Research Forum has sounded the alarm. An October report from the police advocacy group, titled "A Gathering Storm," expresses concern that the increases signal the beginning of "an epidemic of violence not seen for years." Though not all cities have suffered a crime spike, PERF pushes for more federal cooperation with local law enforcement and more federal funding. "If the pandemic flu were to hit 20 cities in the United States, I don't think the Centers for Disease Control would say, 'Well, let's see how many other cities it hits,'" says Chuck Wexler, the group's director.

Anomalies. But there are plenty of caveats to the new numbers. New York City's nearly 10 percent rise in murders-to 590-doesn't look as bad after taking account of the city's unusually high number of "reclassified deaths," those resulting from injuries in prior years. And the city's number of homicides is still historically low; more than 2,000 people were killed in New York in 1990 alone. Houston neared its highest number of murders in a decade, but the increase largely matches the city's surge in population from Hurricane Katrina evacuees.

Several big cities, including Dallas and San Francisco, bucked the murder trend completely. Washington, D.C., ended the year 27 murders shy of its 2005 total. Los Angeles's historically undermanned police force saw its fifth straight year with a reduction of violent crime.

In fact, the 6 percent increase in murders in the country's 20 largest cities is lower than the 9 percent rise the FBI charted in the first six months of the year. And once smaller cities are included, the FBI recorded only a 1.4 percent increase in that time. On average, smaller cities actually showed dramatic declines in their number of homicides.

That is more variability than was seen in the '80s and '90s, when murders spiked and then plummeted almost everywhere. The inconsistency leads some experts to contend that this year's increase is more an idiosyncratic phenomenon than a national crisis. Even among criminologists, there's not a lot of agreement over what's happening-or why.

In his new book, The Great American Crime Decline, Franklin Zimring, a professor at the University of California-Berkeley law school and an expert on crime statistics, tackles the prevailing explanations for what causes changes in crime numbers and finds them wanting. "Any blip in homicide statistics is unnerving because we don't know why we've had this epidemic of good news," he says. "There are a hundred theories and no confirmations."

Yet even some experts who remain agnostic on the significance of the more recent rise in homicides point to factors that could have contributed. Alfred Blumstein, a criminology professor at Carnegie Mellon University, highlights a diversion of resources from traditional crime fighting to preventing terrorism and a reduction in social services to the poorest neighborhoods. He also notes the phasing out of federal money for the Clinton-era COPS program, which gives grants to put more police officers on the street. The PERF report, "A Gathering Storm," partially blames the loss of funds for shrinking police forces in many cities. "I must confess, I expected [murder] to go up two or three years ago," Blumstein says.

With the Dow reaching new records last year and relatively low unemployment, an economic explanation for the rise in violence would seem unlikely. But Richard Rosenfeld, a criminology professor at the University of Missouri-St. Louis, says the economy's strong finish in 2006 belied a volatile year, with concerns about fuel costs and the end of the housing boom. The lack of economic stability especially impacts the urban poor, who are most likely to turn to crime, he says.

That explanation doesn't convince Philip Cook, an economist and professor at Duke University who has written on crime numbers. He disputes the grim portrayal of the 2006 economy and also argues that the link between the economy and murder levels is unproven. Recall the '60s, Cook says, when the economy and murder numbers grew hand in hand.

Police departments have widely cited armed young people as the cause of their recent violence woes, and some speculate that the rise in murders is simply the result of a larger segment of the population entering the prime years for committing crime-generally thought to be ages 15 to 24. The claim is bolstered by FBI statistics showing that the number of murder offenders under the age of 18 and 22 both jumped dramatically in 2005. But the number of young people has risen for some years, with no discernible impact on crime before now.

Some experts suggest the country is suffering the fallout of its own "get tough" crime policies in the 1980s and '90s. The problem was explored in a 2003 Urban Institute study of Maryland, which suggested that the state will face increasing challenges in dealing with a growing population struggling to re-enter society after being incarcerated.

G-men. The uncertainty has not deterred federal eyes from turning back to the problem of urban crime. Under pressure from police groups, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the Initiative for Safer Communities in October, a study of 18 areas with both rising and falling crime to analyze the most effective law enforcement methods. Last month, California Sen. Dianne Feinstein sent a letter to FBI Director Robert Mueller, urging the agency to "re-evaluate its priorities" and place a higher emphasis on investigating violent crime. And Bush administration officials say the president could make an anticrime effort part of his State of the Union address January 23 or put a new initiative in his proposed budget for fiscal year 2008.

Local officials are also rethinking their efforts. In Indianapolis, which saw homicides climb from 110 in 2005 to 137 last year, police have installed their own version of the increasingly popular Compstat system, which combines computerized crime mapping with management brainstorming sessions on how best to combat the latest local crime trends. Recommendations from a mayor's task force are also expected shortly. "We're very optimistic that we'll see a decrease in those numbers in 2007," says Police Chief Michael Spears.

But the year didn't start well. About four hours into 2007, 27-year-old Eric Munoz was found dead in the clubhouse of Indianapolis's Naptown Riders motorcycle club. For Spears, the homicide was humbling, a reminder of a police department's limitations. "If we had 10 officers on patrol outside that location, it wouldn't have prevented it," he says.

The news is worse in New Orleans, where at least seven people have been murdered since the New Year-six within 24 hours. One was 36-year-old Helen Hill, who was shot in the neck inside her home. When police arrived, they found her husband bleeding from gunshot wounds to his hand, arm, and cheek. He was holding the couple's 2-year-old son. The statistics may be ambiguous, but in many cities, the bangs are real.

Polygamist's Papers Topic Of Hearing (AP)

By Jennifer Dobner, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, January 8, 2007

SALT LAKE CITY -- When a Cadillac Escalade ferrying polygamist church leader Warren Jeffs was pulled over in Nevada in August, authorities found $54,000 cash, 15 cell phones, portable radios, wigs and four laptops.

The documents stored on those computers was to be the subject of a legal tug-of-war Monday as Jeffs' attorneys try to convince a judge that the laptops contain privileged communication between the spiritual leader and his followers.

Jeffs, the 51-year-old leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, was picked up in a traffic stop near Las Vegas on federal warrants after evading prosecution in Utah and Arizona for nearly two years.

He's now in a southern-Utah county jail pending an April trial on two felony counts of rape as an accomplice related to a 2001 arranged marriage between a 14-year-old girl and her cousin.

Attorneys for the United Effort Plan Trust, which holds $110 million in church property, and Shem Fischer, a former follower who sued Jeffs after being fired, want U.S. District Court Judge Robert Jones in Las Vegas to grant them standing in Jeffs' case.

They also want access to papers, letters and electronic documents being held by the FBI.

In court documents, Jeffs' Las Vegas attorney Richard Wright contends the information on the laptops is "sacred and confidential" because it includes matters of church doctrine and private communications between Jeffs and his followers.

DOJ_NMG_0113235

Wright did not return calls from The Associated Press seeking comment. In court papers he asks the court to return the seized evidence to Jeffs.

Shem Fischer's attorneys disagrees. "The documents may shed more information as to where (church) assets have been hidden, in what form they are held and where they are held," Las Vegas attorney Ariel Stern said.

In 2002, Fischer sued Jeffs, the church and a church-controlled cabinet company, for religious discrimination. Fischer said he was fired after he left the FLDS faith. He won a default judgment and now wants to collect the balance of what he's owed.

Like Fischer, Bruce Wisan wants to know if Jeffs' papers and electronic records will lead to church assets that rightfully belong to the trust and should benefit all current and former church members.

The trust is comprised of nearly all the property in Hildale, Colorado City, Ariz., and British Columbia, where church members live in assigned housing. A Utah judge made Wisan overseer of the trust in 2005 after finding Jeffs and other church leaders were fleecing it for personal gain.

Jeffs is also facing felony charges in Mohave County, Ariz., for other arranged marriages. He's expected to be extradited there following the Utah case.

Evidence Hearing For Jeffs Today In Las Vegas (DESERET)

By Ben Winslow, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, January 8, 2007

LAS VEGAS — The "mother lode" of evidence the FBI seized when it arrested Fundamentalist LDS Church leader Warren Jeffs will be fought over in a federal courtroom today.

Warren Jeffs A hearing is scheduled on who can get involved in the fight over papers, ledgers, letters, computers and other items that were found in the Cadillac Escalade in which Jeffs was riding. Among those who want a peek: the court-appointed special fiduciary of the United Effort Plan Trust, an ex-FLDS Church member who won a lawsuit against Jeffs, and the Utah Attorney General's Office.

The feds don't seem willing to give it up.

"We will just continue with our same interest in the case," said Melodie Rydalch, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney for Utah, which is handling the case. "That is protecting the evidence that can be used in a criminal case."

Lawyers for the man placed in charge of the FLDS Church's financial empire want to see if any of the evidence tells them anything about the UEP Trust.

"It could tell a lot," said Jeffrey L. Shields, an attorney for court-appointed special fiduciary Bruce Wisan. "We're hopeful it will give us some insight into the previous management of the trust."

In 2005, a judge in Salt Lake City's 3rd District Court took control of the trust after allegations surfaced that Jeffs and other top FLDS leaders had been "fleecing" the $110 million financial empire of the polygamous church. The UEP Trust was recently reformed, doing away with the "united order" and paving the way for private property ownership.

Wisan has been told that the documents are the "mother lode" of information about the polygamous church's inner workings and business interests.

FBI agents have told the Deseret Morning News the seized evidence includes ledgers containing names of people who helped keep Jeffs on the run. The FLDS leader was put on the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list until he was arrested in a traffic stop outside Las Vegas in August 2006.

Shortly afterward, his lawyer Richard Wright filed an emergency motion in federal court demanding the return of the documents, saying they are "privileged communications" between the FLDS leader and his followers.

"The administrative impound impinges on the First Amendment right to the free exercise of religion insomuch as the government took possession of religious documents which are deemed confidential and sacred by the FLDS," Wright said in his motion.

Shields fought to see what the FBI seized when it arrested Jeffs' brother, Seth, during a traffic stop in Pueblo, Colo., last year. Seth Jeffs later pleaded guilty to harboring a fugitive.

"Some of the documents we received were helpful," Shields said of what the FBI gave up in the Seth Jeffs case. "He just had partial stuff. We think that the Warren Jeffs documents will be more complete."

Utah Attorney General Mark Shurtleff has also expressed interest in seeing the documents, believing they may help his organized crime investigation into Jeffs and the FLDS Church.

Jeffs, 51, is charged in 5th District Court in St. George with rape as an accomplice, a first-degree felony. He is accused of forcing a 14-year-old girl into a marriage with her 19-year-old cousin. He is scheduled to face trial on those charges beginning in April.

DOJ_NMG_0113236

Across the border in Mohave County, Ariz., Jeffs is facing multiple charges of sexual conduct with a minor and conspiracy to commit sexual conduct with a minor. Prosecutors there have accused him of arranging several child bride marriages.

Fitzgerald's Wild Source Chase (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

Patrick Fitzgerald's trial of Scooter Libby is set to begin this month, assuming anyone can still remember what this case is all about. Oh, yes, Mr. Fitzgerald is prosecuting Mr. Libby for lying in order to . . . well, we're still waiting to hear a motive for this alleged perjury to cover up a leak that wasn't a crime. But perhaps the prosecutor will come up with something.

Meantime, Mr. Fitzgerald has some other unfinished legal business that the public has a right to know about -- namely, the affidavits he filed with the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals to justify his motion to compel two reporters to testify about their conversations with Mr. Libby, and his willingness to throw one of them in jail for 85 days until she did so. Those documents remain under seal, which is why Dow Jones and the Associated Press filed a motion with the D.C. Circuit late last month requesting their release.

Dow Jones, which owns this newspaper, and the AP are also requesting that the court now release all of the redacted parts of Judge David Tatel's 2005 concurring opinion in the D.C. Circuit ruling that compelled the reporters to testify. Responding to an earlier DJ-AP motion, the court released part of the redacted eight pages in early 2006. But it held back the rest, as well as Mr. Fitzgerald's affidavits in the case, because the prosecutor insisted his investigation was continuing.

That was a stretch even then, but it's certainly no longer true. Mr. Fitzgerald months ago told the lawyer for Karl Rove that the senior White House aide will not be indicted. And more to the point of Mr. Fitzgerald's wild newspaper source chase, we learned last summer that neither Mr. Libby nor Mr. Rove was the original source of the leak of CIA analyst Valerie Plame's name to columnist Robert Novak. As the Dow Jones-AP motion points out, "The public now knows that the Special Counsel [Mr. Fitzgerald] knew the identity of that leaker -- Richard Armitage, the former Deputy Secretary of State -- from the very beginning of his investigation."

Finding the leaker was Mr. Fitzgerald's main charge from the Justice Department, so why did he keep pursuing reporters with such hyper-zeal for another two years? His pursuit led to a constitutional showdown over the media's right to protect sources, going all the way to the Supreme Court. And the precedent -- a bad one for the press -- may well encourage a wave of attempts by prosecutors across the country to force journalists to betray their sources. The press and public both have a right to know what evidence was so compelling that Judge Tatel and Mr. Fitzgerald thought it warranted such a legal collision. All the more so now that Congress is also debating a "shield" law to protect media sources.

A wiser prosecutor than Mr. Fitzgerald would have ended his probe the minute he discovered that Mr. Armitage was the leaker. Instead, he told Mr. Armitage to keep quiet and let the public believe for two years that someone high up in the White House might have leaked for nefarious political purposes. In the end, Mr. Fitzgerald's case has been distilled to a perjury charge that, while serious as a matter of law, appears to come down to different memories about conversations Mr. Libby had with three journalists. (And, as we all know, journalists never get anything wrong.)

Whether or not Mr. Fitzgerald ever discloses a motive for a seasoned lawyer like Mr. Libby to have lied, the unsealing of the affidavits and Judge Tatel's redacted pages will help us better understand the prosecutor's motives for his troubling zeal.

Free-Market Justice (NYT)

By Morris B. Hoffman

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

SIXTEEN years as a state trial judge have left me with a deep respect for the professionalism and competence of the public defenders who handle felony cases for indigent criminal defendants in my courtroom. In fact, I've told friends, only half-jokingly, that if they are ever charged with a serious criminal offense, the first thing they should do is give all their assets to charity, in an effort to qualify for public defender representation.

So when two economists from Emory University, Paul Rubin and Joanna Shepherd, agreed last year to collaborate with me on an econometric study of how effective public defenders really are, I had to guard against confirmation bias. I was positive that public defenders would prove more effective than their private counterparts. Mr. Rubin and Ms. Shepherd, with their occupational faith in markets, were equally positive of just the opposite. In the end, the economists were right, though with an interesting twist. (The full study has been published in the Ohio State Journal of Criminal Law.)

We looked at all 5,224 felony criminal cases filed in Denver in 2002. Most other studies measure lawyer effectiveness through indicators like acquittal rates, but we used the one thing criminal defendants care about most: the amount of jail or prison time they receive. Thus, acquittals counted as zero. Probationary sentences likewise counted as zero, unless the probation was combined with some jail time.

We counted halfway-house sentences as 120 days, which is typical for Denver defendants. We counted the initial length of a prison sentence without decreasing it for early release or increasing it for parole violations. Life sentences we arbitrarily counted as 110 years.

My economist friends were able to use regression analyses to control for other variables (such as whether a case was plea bargained or went to trial), to minimize the chance that the differences we found were caused by factors other than effectiveness. They also used regressions with different combinations of variables, to ensure that our results were not sensitive to a particular variable.

The results were surprising. The average sentence for clients of public defenders was almost three years longer than the average for clients of private lawyers.

But our most notable finding was hidden in one of the variables we had controlled — the seriousness of the case. We had assumed that public defenders on average handled more serious cases than private lawyers, if for no other reason than that such cases carry higher bonds, and defendants who can't make those bonds are often rendered indigent by their pretrial incarceration. The length of their clients' sentences would of course be distorted by the fact that they handle more serious cases with longer potential sentences.

But when we removed the control for the seriousness of the crime, public defenders performed relatively worse, not better (five years more incarceration versus three years more).

When we examined the seriousness of the cases handled by each type of lawyer, we discovered not only that private lawyers tend to handle more serious cases, but also that as the seriousness of the case increases, the chances that a private lawyer is handling it also increases. What in the world could explain such a result?

It turns out that the explanation, at least in part, is one that should put a smile on the face of all free-marketers and rational choice theorists: criminal defendants, just like any other consumers of services, appear to be making choices based on their rational assessments of costs and benefits. But, you might ask, do criminal defendants ever really have a choice between public defenders and private counsel? It appears many do.

Our data suggested that, contrary to the law's rather binary notion of indigency, a large chunk of felony criminal defendants are what we have called "marginally indigent." They could, if they had to, tap hidden resources, or the resources of family and friends, to retain private lawyers. But what drives that decision? Just what you'd expect from any rational consumer of criminal defense services: a combination of the seriousness of the offense and the likelihood of conviction.

Imagine a guilty, marginally indigent defendant facing a relatively minor felony (for which he will most likely get probation). Now add to the mix the fact that his crime was captured on videotape, meaning he has a small chance of avoiding conviction. It is unlikely such a defendant would deplete his and his family's and friends' resources to hire a private lawyer when he could get a free public defender to achieve the same result.

At the other end of the spectrum, imagine a marginally indigent defendant charged with first degree murder, and imagine that he is innocent. Wouldn't that defendant do everything in his power to marshal the resources to hire a private lawyer, if he believed, rightly or wrongly, that the private lawyer were more likely to achieve an acquittal?

In other words, marginally indigent defendants who choose public defenders tend to be guilty. And of course if that's true, it's not at all surprising that public defenders would achieve less favorable outcomes.

More work needs to be done to confirm these results. But if they hold, and hold nationally, they could have important policy implications. Roughly one-third of all states have formal statewide public defender systems, and several others have regional or local systems. Current debates about improving these systems tend to revolve around two poles: increased financing (for which public defenders have been clamoring since the 1980s, when per client spending in most systems, in real dollars, took a nose dive from which it has never recovered) and, more recently, privatization.

If it is true that public defenders achieve substantially worse results for their clients than private lawyers, that fact should be troubling to us all, quite apart from whether the difference is the product of underfinancing, government inefficiencies or both.

But our results suggest a more benign explanation, and a less drastic solution than spending more on public defenders or privatizing the system. If self-selection by guilty, marginally indigent defendants is driving a big part of this effectiveness difference, the remedy may simply be to tighten the mechanisms we use to determine indigency. This solution would not only reduce the outcome differences between public defenders and private defense lawyers, but it would also give taxpayers more bang for their public defender buck.

Writer's Block: Valerie Plame Vs. CIA (NSWK)

DOJ_NMG_0113238

By Michael Isikoff
Newsweek, January 15, 2007

A CIA panel has told former officer Valerie Plame she can't write about her undercover work for the agency, a position that may threaten a lucrative book project with her publisher. Plame's outing as a CIA officer in July 2003 triggered a criminal probe that culminates next week when Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff I. Lewis (Scooter) Libby goes on trial for perjury and obstruction.

But in what could be a precursor to a separate legal battle, Plame recently hired a lawyer to challenge the CIA Publications Review Board, which must clear writings by former employees. The panel refused Plame permission to even mention that she worked for the CIA because she served as a "nonofficial cover" officer (or NOC) posing as a private businesswoman, according to an adviser to Plame, who asked not to be identified discussing a sensitive issue. "She believes this will effectively gut the book," said the adviser. Larry Johnson, a former colleague, said the agency's action seems punitive, given that other ex-CIA undercover officers have published books. But even Plame's friends acknowledge that few NOCs have done so. CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield said the panel was still having "ongoing" talks with Plame to resolve the dispute. "The sole yardstick," he said, is that books "contain no classified information." A spokesman for Simon & Schuster, Plame's publisher, declined to comment.

Taser Sells Small Version For Wider Use (USAT)

By Robert Davis
USA Today, January 8, 2007

Taser International today unveils a new model of its controversial stun gun designed for widespread use by regular folks. It's more affordable and small enough to be stashed in a purse or backpack.

Critics and supporters have a lot to say about the sleek device unveiled at the 2007 International Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas. The size of a TV remote control, the Taser C2 goes on sale in April for about $300 and comes in the metallic pink, electric blue and titanium silver of popular cellphones.

Opponents say Tasers can be used for torture; supporters say the devices are safe when used appropriately.

Taser has sold about 120,000 civilian versions since 1994, a model that is larger than the latest incarnation and shaped like a gun. Since 1991, Taser has sold more than 200,000 devices to law enforcement. Both shoot barbs that pierce the skin and deliver an incapacitating jolt of electricity. Current civilian models cost about $1,000.

Taser says the C2, less powerful than the police version, is designed to stun for 30 seconds, providing enough time for the shooter to flee from danger.

"It's a terrible idea. It's a dangerous idea," says Larry Cox, executive director of Amnesty International USA, which says there have been 200 Taser-related deaths. "I can't think of any reason you would want these out in public."

Daniel Garza, 42, was glad he bought the civilian Taser when a man climbed in the back seat of his truck Dec. 17 at a Yuba City, Calif., Wal-Mart. Garza zapped the intruder, who was arrested. "The Taser did the job," Garza says.

Private citizens are not allowed to own Tasers in the District of Columbia, Hawaii, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Michigan, New Jersey, New York and Wisconsin.

Taser C2 "is a device (owners) can keep in their nightstand," says Taser president Tom Smith. Safeguards include:

·It's sold "inert" and can be activated by the Scottsdale, Ariz.-based company only after a background check by SureCheck, which costs $10.

·When the device is fired, it sprays about 30 tiny pieces of confetti encoded with the serial number of the cartridge. The tags allow police to trace the device back to the registered owner.

The Taser C2 has some police worried. "There are concerns in law enforcement about the public having access to these types of weapons," says Wendy Balazik, spokeswoman for the International Association of Chiefs of Police. "Those concerns include: Who is buying them? How are they going to be used? What are they going to be used for?"

Testing The Testers (NYT)

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

There is by now no doubt that there are serious problems with electronic voting machines: they fail to record votes, and even flip votes from one candidate to another. Election officials like to defend the machines by noting that they have been certified by independent testing labs. But the certification process has long been deeply flawed, and last week there was even more disturbing news — that the leading testing lab has been unable to meet the federal government's standards.

DOJ_NMG_0113239

Since last summer, Ciber Inc., the largest tester of voting machine software, has been unable to meet federal quality standards that will take effect later this year.

It is disturbing that if Christopher Drew had not reported this in The Times, the public still would not know. The Election Assistance Commission, the agency that evaluates the labs, did not reveal that Ciber fell short, and is still not saying what is wrong. Ciber, which is still working on meeting the standards, did not return our phone call.

Many Americans are using electronic voting machines that were certified by Ciber. Were those certifications done properly? Did whatever deficiencies Ciber has now exist then? No one is saying.

Since many jurisdictions, and some whole states, now use electronic voting machines that do not produce a paper record, certification is extremely important. It is one of the few ways of determining whether a machine wrongly records votes, either by accident or by design.

Even before the news about Ciber, certification was a troubled process. The biggest problem is that the voting machine manufacturers pay the labs to do the examination and certification. This is a conflict of interest. If a lab raises too many concerns, it risks losing a client to a more compliant competitor.

There is also too little transparency. The labs, which see themselves as working for the voting machine companies, do not tell the public when they find problems or what those problems are.

Congress should pass legislation fixing the system. The vendors should continue to pay the costs, but the government should choose and pay the labs. That would make the labs responsive to the correct customer — the public.

It should also enact strong transparency rules. Voters should know how testing is done, and have full and timely access to the results. Congress should also require the Election Assistance Commission to be more open about how it evaluates the labs. If a lab falls short, the public — which may currently be using machines certified by that lab — should be told right away what the deficiencies are.

The veil of secrecy that hangs over certification is good for the companies that make voting machines and for the ones that test them. The government should not be protecting those private interests.

It should be protecting the voting public.

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Defends Recent Record Of Antitrust Division (LEGALT)

By Jason McLure, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 8, 2007

Did Oracle result in a loss of nerve? Division chief says no.

For more than two years, the Justice Department's Antitrust Division has been trying to shake the perception that it's been snakebitten.

In this case, the fangs, as it were, were those of Judge Vaughn Walker and his 2004 opinion clearing the way for software maker Oracle Corp.'s merger with PeopleSoft Inc. over the objections of the Justice Department's trust-busters.

Since that decision, in which Walker found that the Justice Department didn't prove that the deal was anti-competitive, the department hasn't gone to trial to block a proposed merger. In the past year alone — the fourth-largest in history for mergers and acquisitions, according to Thomson Financial — AT&T Inc. received the Justice Department's unconditional go-ahead to acquire BellSouth Corp. in a deal that creates a telecom behemoth with $117 billion in revenue; Whirlpool Corp. nabbed Maytag Inc., merging the first- and third-largest makers of home appliances; and agriculture-technology giant Monsanto Co. announced a bid to buy Delta & Pine Land Co., the country's largest cottonseed producer.

"Ever since the Oracle-PeopleSoft decision, the common observation has been that the division has been fearful of taking strong positions against mergers," says Albert Foer, who heads the American Antitrust Institute, echoing a view privately expressed by a number of antitrust lawyers.

It's a perception that Thomas Barnett, the head of the Antitrust Division, isn't happy about. "I don't agree with it," Barnett says, before ticking off what he views as the division's major merger challenges over the past year: a pretrial settlement with a dairy company protecting competition in milk sales to a number of schools in Kentucky and Tennessee, a consent decree with Mittal Steel Co. requiring it to sell a Canadian tin plant as part of its purchase of Arcelor S.A., and another consent decree requiring the sale of six generating plants as part of a merger between two power companies — a deal later blocked by New Jersey state officials.

Those actions, of course, are hardly of the magnitude of Oracle-PeopleSoft, the challenge to which Barnett helped oversee as a deputy to then-antitrust chief R. Hewitt Pate. And Barnett, who was confirmed as the division's assistant attorney general in February, is sensitive to criticism that his division hasn't been vigorously protecting consumers or playing an active role in public policy.

Late last month the Justice Department issued a release touting the Antitrust Division's achievements during his first year on the job. (Before his confirmation, Barnett served as the division's acting chief for several months.) The release highlights the division's continued crackdown on international price-fixing cartels (which netted nearly $500 million in criminal fines in 2006), its streamlining of the merger review process, and the division's recent spurt of activity before the Supreme Court (the high court has granted cert in seven antitrust cases over the past two terms, an unusually high number) as evidence that its lawyers have been anything but inactive.

Barnett also says the division is close to finishing a long-overdue report on antitrust and intellectual property law with the Federal Trade Commission, an agency whose views in that area the Justice Department publicly critiqued in a Supreme Court brief last summer.

Despite those activities, it's the division's merger-enforcement activity — or relative lack thereof — that is most notable to many antitrust lawyers in private practice. Behind the cautious approach, say these practitioners, is more than just conservative economic thinking about the role of government in the marketplace, but a fear of bringing another big case to trial and losing.

"People don't like to lose big cases," says Renata Hesse, who worked on the Oracle-PeopleSoft case before leaving the Justice Department for Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati last year. "When you lose a big case, it makes you step back and look at how you're doing things."

"The buzz around town was that, after losing the case against Oracle-PeopleSoft that had strong customer support, the division got very worried about its ability to put on an effective merger case at trial," says William Randolph Smith, who heads the antitrust group at Crowell & Moring.

Others are more sanguine in their assessment.

"It seems pretty clear that the Antitrust Division is much more cautious in challenging mergers than they have been at times in the past," says Donald Russell, a former Justice Department antitrust lawyer with Robbins, Russell, Englert, Orseck & Untereiner. "[But] I certainly don't think that the caution that they're showing now is out of the mainstream."

Barnett argues that the lack of trials challenging mergers is an indication that the government is succeeding in its efforts to educate companies about the types of mergers likely to pass muster. He also says most concerns can be dealt with through less confrontational means, such as consent decrees. Still, nothing would prevent the department from going to trial if need be.

"We apply the law," he says. "And if we think there's a problem, we pursue it."

WASHING THE MARKET

One case in which the Antitrust Division's legal and economics staff saw a problem was in Whirlpool's $1.8 billion purchase of Maytag, a deal proposed in August 2005. The newly combined company, which produces much of Sears' Kenmore line as well as the brands Jenn Air, KitchenAid, Amana, and Magic Chef, controls as much as 70 percent of the U.S. market for large home appliances such as washers and dryers — the kind of market share that has typically drawn government intervention.

But Barnett decided to approve the deal, despite the staff's recommendations. His reasoning: Other appliance manufacturers, particularly in Asia and Europe, were entering the U.S. market and were likely to generate sufficient competition to prevent consumers from being harmed by the Maytag acquisition. "We looked at who are the players in the market, was entry possible, if entry had already occurred how quickly could it expand," he says. "The ultimate decision, which I take responsibility for, was that this transaction was not likely to substantially lessen competition."

"I think what the Maytag-Whirlpool decision does is send a clear message to companies that mergers that wouldn't have gotten through several years ago should be reconsidered," says David Balto, an antitrust lawyer who was policy director of the Federal Trade Commission during the Clinton administration. "The Oracle-PeopleSoft case has clearly had an effect on the Justice Department's ability to litigate cases."

Although his critics see a link between the defeat in Oracle-PeopleSoft and the decision not to challenge Whirlpool-Maytag, Barnett is quick to point out that last year the Justice Department initiated 16 merger-enforcement actions — more than the previous two years combined. Still, none of those actions resulted in the DOJ going to trial, and last year's figures are down substantially from 2000, when the DOJ challenged 48 mergers.

Barnett's decision in Whirlpool-Maytag was no doubt noted by executives for Monsanto, the world's largest crop-biotechnology company, and Mississippi-based Delta & Pine, a leading producer of cottonseeds. In August 2006, Monsanto announced plans to buy Delta & Pine. The acquisition would give Monsanto a much larger platform with which to distribute its own varieties of hybrid and genetically altered seed cotton through control of a company with more than half the market for such seeds and, potentially, a dominant position in a rapidly growing industry.

What's significant about the deal is that the two companies first attempted it in 1999. Monsanto withdrew its merger offer to Delta & Pine that year, citing regulatory opposition after the Justice Department spent 18 months investigating the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0113241

"The Justice Department put some pressure on, and the deal fell through," says the American Antitrust Institute's Foer, whose organization has voiced concern about the merger. "But since that time the attitude towards mergers has become more lenient, and one doesn't really know how far you can push these folks."

Barnett says that because the merger is pending, he can't comment directly on the Monsanto-Delta & Pine coupling. But when questioned about the deal, he offers a clue to his thinking by referencing the Whirlpool-Maytag acquisition and raising the possibility that shifting market conditions could lead the Justice Department to reverse a stance taken years before. "Maytag-Whirlpool, that was a very dynamic market," he says. "If the merger had been attempted five years ago it would have been in different market circumstances and might have led to a different result."

AWAITING THE OTHER SHOE

Before joining the Justice Department in 2004, Barnett, 44, had a successful antitrust practice at Washington's Covington & Burling. In many regards, say those who have worked in the division, his approach to antitrust law differs little from that of either of his two predecessors in the job during the Bush administration: Pate, now in private practice at Hunton & Williams, and Charles James, now general counsel of Chevron Corp.

One initiative Barnett has pushed is streamlining the division's merger reviews — a process which companies have criticized for being lengthy and often opaque. "Most mergers are beneficial or at least don't harm consumer welfare," Barnett says. "Our goal on the merger-enforcement side is to improve the efficiency by which we identify those relatively few transactions that do threaten harm to consumer welfare."

Last month, in a move widely praised by antitrust lawyers who represent large companies, the Justice Department announced revisions to the process, placing limits on the amount of documents companies are required to produce. "I'm a big believer in transparency," Barnett says. "And we try to be as transparent as possible."

With Democrats now in control of Congress, Barnett will have the opportunity to demonstrate that commitment to transparency. "We will make increased oversight of the antitrust agencies a priority," says Jeff Miller, the Democrats' chief counsel on the Senate Judiciary Committee's Antitrust Subcommittee.

Barnett says he welcomes the opportunity to testify in congressional hearings, where he'll no doubt have further opportunity to discuss exactly when the Justice Department will be taking a stand as aggressive as it did in the Oracle-PeopleSoft case.

Whether pressure from Congress will push the department into opposing a major merger in 2007 remains to be seen. But in the meantime, antitrust lawyers are hoping it's not their clients who will be on the receiving end when the other shoe drops.

"I'm getting calls from clients saying, 'I want to do this deal and I don't want you to tell me there are any problems, because there is no antitrust enforcement in Washington,' " says one D.C.-based antitrust lawyer, who spoke on condition of anonymity out of fear of retribution from the Justice Department. "I would assume that they're looking for a case to bring just to show they're alive."

US Reviews European Telecoms Venture (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, January 8, 2007

The US government conducted a national security review of the proposed $21bn (€16.1bn) joint venture agreement between Nokia and Siemens, and forced the European telecoms equipment makers to sign a "mitigation agreement" that imposed restrictions on the new company.

While the US has hitherto shown keen interest in foreign takeovers of US telecoms carriers, the decision to probe the joint venture indicates a new trend.

Agencies involved in the national security review process – especially the departments of defence, homeland security and justice – are intensifying their scrutiny of companies that make components for mobile and fixed-line networks globally.

People familiar with the classified national security review by the Committee on Foreign Investment in the US – Cfius – the inter-agency panel that investigates foreign takeovers of US assets for possible security threats, said the panel had imposed security requirements on the venture. These include procedures that dictate whether foreigners can work on US equipment and software.

But the government's interest in the industry – reinforced by the tough measures it imposed on Alcatel's merger with Lucent – raises questions about whether the inter-agency panel is going beyond its mandate of identifying and preventing risky foreign takeovers.

"The process has become a tool for Cfius to impose security requirements on foreign companies, while the government lacks the legal authority to impose them on US companies," said David Marchick, a lawyer at Covington & Burling in Washington.

The mitigation agreement, or conditions to which a company agrees to gain regulatory clearance, could set a precedent in an industry that is bracing for consolidation globally.

In particular, any deal involving Nortel Networks, which does sensitive work for the US government, would face a lengthy investigation.

Mr Marchick said mitigation agreements should address the “marginal increase in national risk” associated with a foreign acquisition – not general security concerns the government believes exist, regardless of whether an owner is foreign or domestic.

The joint venture, due to close in the first quarter of 2007, will create the third-largest supplier of equipment to telecoms companies, after Alcatel-Lucent and Ericsson.

Nokia said it regarded its conversations with the government as confidential and declined to comment on discussions or agreements it had reached with authorities. Siemens also declined to comment.

Congress Targets Oil-Drilling Subsidies (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

Pressure Mounts to Fix Flawed Leases Valued at Billions of Dollars in Future Royalties

WASHINGTON -- With Democrats controlling Congress, the oil industry is in for a rough ride. So is the agency that collects royalties for oil and gas drilling on federal lands.

Democrats and some Republicans have complained for months that the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service -- whose motto is "securing ocean energy and economic value for America" -- has mishandled the royalty program. The issue will hit the spotlight Jan. 18, when the House takes up energy legislation targeting oil-industry subsidies.

· What's New: Congress threatens action; Bush administration aims to deal with losses of government oil royalties.

· The Players: The Minerals Management Service and dozens of U.S. and foreign oil producers are disputing contract flaws that provided the U.S. with no revenue during a period of rising oil prices.

· The Bottom Line: Some $900 million was lost so far and billions in future payments are at stake.

One goal: untangling a legal mess that could allow companies to escape paying at least $10 billion in future royalties for drilling in the Gulf of Mexico. As part of the debate, congressional critics are sure to ramp up their complaints about the service, which has said that it failed to include a clause requiring the royalties into leases issued in 1998 and 1999.

Meanwhile, the Government Accountability Office is preparing a report that, some lawmakers say, will blame the service's "culture" for widespread laxity in conducting royalty audits and collecting underpayments from industry. And by mid-month, the Interior Department's Inspector General will release a report showing that different units at the service working on leases didn't talk to each other and that some officials apparently signed leases without reading them.

The action reflects continuing fallout from the service's handling of oil and gas leases and royalty payments. A 1995 law temporarily waived royalties to encourage drilling in deeper Gulf waters but required the payments to kick in if oil prices exceeded a price threshold of about $40 a barrel. Under the Clinton administration, the service omitted the price threshold in the 1998 and 1999 leases, so companies haven't had to pay even though oil prices are well above the trigger point. The flawed leases have resulted in a $900 million revenue loss to the government, the department says.

The department is scrambling to try to assuage critics. C. Stephen Allred, an assistant secretary at the Interior Department who oversees the service, announced Dec. 14 that five oil companies -- including BP PLC, ConocoPhillips, Marathon Oil Corp. and Royal Dutch Shell PLC -- had agreed to amend their leases to begin paying royalties on oil and gas produced since Oct. 1, 2006, but not before. Dozens of other companies haven't agreed to change the leases.

Mr. Allred, a 63-year-old engineer who formerly headed Idaho's Division of Environmental Quality, says the government can't force the companies to make the changes, but that several have been willing to discuss the issue because of concern about a Democratic crackdown. "They know what's going on on the Hill," he said in an interview.

He also has been dickering with oil giant Chevron Corp., so far without result. In a statement, Chevron said it has made "significant investments" in Gulf production based on the existing leases and that its lawyers "have put a reasonable offer on the table to resolve this matter" with the Interior Department.

According to Mr. Allred, the department issued 1,023 faulty leases in 1998 and 1999. Of those, 570 are still in force but only about 45 involve current production of oil and gas or discoveries that promise future production. BP and the other companies that have agreed to changes in the leases hold about 20% of those 45 leases, while Chevron holds another 20%. Foreign oil companies, which the department wouldn't identify, hold another 20% and smaller companies hold the rest.

Mr. Allred says the 45 leases could produce $10 billion to $11 billion of federal royalty payments, and that the department wants to collect that money before trying to recover royalties from past production. "We want to deal with this potential first," he says.

Congressional Democrats say they plan to increase oversight of the agency. They are eager to fix the royalty snafu as part of a broader attack on subsidies for the oil industry. Besides forcing oil companies to amend their 1998 and 1999 drilling leases to include a clause requiring royalty payments, the still-emerging energy legislation is expected to raise taxes on oil-company inventories and kill certain industry tax breaks.

Last year , the House passed two different measures dealing with the royalty problem, but neither became law. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California and other Democrats still are weighing which approach to use this year, aides say.

One approach, pushed by Democratic Reps. Ed Markey of Massachusetts and Maurice Hinchey of New York, would bar companies from future exploration on federal outer-continental-shelf lands if they didn't agree to amend their leases. Another measure, championed by former Rep. Richard Pombo, called on the government to assess a "conservation fee," roughly equal to the sought-after royalty payments, unless the companies agreed to changes in the leases.

Some lawmakers are exploring a third approach, which would require the Bush administration to take reluctant energy companies to court. It was suggested by Stephen Lowey, a White Plains, N.Y., lawyer, who argues that because Congress required the leases to have a price threshold, officials at the Interior Department had no authority to leave it out. That means, he says, that a judge could change the leases unilaterally to insert the price threshold, thus requiring royalty payments when prices exceed the threshold. Mr. Lowey says he suspects oil companies already know this, and that is why some are willing to negotiate with the government. Several congressmen have asked Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to review this aspect.

Lee Fuller, vice president of the Independent Petroleum Association of America, whose members include several smaller exploration companies holding the leases, argues that the policy of encouraging more oil exploration in "frontier" areas of the Gulf has worked. Tampering with existing leases, he asserts, would discourage future exploration and provoke court challenges that could last years.

The companies "didn't negotiate these contracts," he says. "They were handed to them to sign. If it becomes an issue where the nature of the contract itself is affected, then it becomes a lawyers' field day."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

S.F. Area Is No. 1 For Regular Drug Use, Study Says (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, January 8, 2007

The San Francisco metropolitan area has a higher percentage of people who are regular drug users than any other major metropolitan area in the USA, a study from the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration found.

Nearly 13% of San Francisco residents reported using some type of illicit drug, such as marijuana, cocaine or heroin, in the previous month, according to data from the National Surveys on Drug Use and Health 2002-05. The national average is 8.1%.

Other areas with drug-abuse rates higher than the national average included Seattle, 9.6%; Detroit, 9.5%; Philadelphia, 9.1%; and Boston, 8.5%. Cities with the lowest drug use: Houston, 6.2%; and Washington, Dallas and Riverside/San Bernardino, Calif., all at 6.5%.

California has decriminalized marijuana for people with health problems. The state's voters passed Proposition 215 in 1996 to allow seriously ill state residents to possess and use marijuana with a doctor's prescription. In San Francisco, police and prosecutors accept a medical-marijuana identification card as proof that a resident can possess and use marijuana.

"The fact that state law allows the use of medical marijuana and that we have a population with a high rate of AIDS that might need to use medical marijuana may contribute to the rates," says Alice Gleghorn, deputy director of community behavioral health services in San Francisco's Department of Public Health. "We do have a cultural regional norm with regard to medical-marijuana use."

The coastal area north of San Francisco, included in the study as part of the metropolitan area, is known as a popular marijuana growing spot.

"Where marijuana is very accessible, you're going to get higher use," Gleghorn says.

San Francisco focuses its prevention and treatment efforts on heroin, methamphetamine and cocaine, she says.

Chicago, at 25.7%, and Houston, at 25.6%, have the highest rates of binge drinking in the country. Nationwide, 22.7% of people reported binge drinking in the previous month, defined by the study as having five or more drinks on one occasion. Other areas with rates higher than the national average are Philadelphia, Detroit, Boston, San Francisco and Phoenix.

DOJ_NMG_0113244

Nationwide, about one quarter of the population smokes cigarettes regularly. Only Detroit significantly exceeded the national average, with 27.4% of its residents reporting that they smoked cigarettes in the previous month, the study found. California's biggest cities had the lowest smoking rates, with 17.9% of people in San Francisco and Los Angeles and 19.2% in Riverside reporting previous-month use, the study found.

Beverly Watts Davis, senior adviser for substance-abuse prevention for SAMHSA, says local prevention coalitions should use the data to help focus their programs.

"If they can pinpoint what's going on where and why, it really helps them plan better to know where resources should be allocated," she said.

3 Extradited From Colombia (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 8, 2007

Drug-ring suspects first from country sent to city in years

Three men extradited from Colombia have appeared in federal court in a drug smuggling case, marking what is thought to be the first time defendants have been sent from that country to face charges in Chicago in at least a decade.

They were among eight people indicted here in 2005 in connection with Operation Highstep, which cracked down on a nationwide ring of smugglers bringing heroin and cocaine into the U.S. hidden in furniture, the frames of paintings and the soles of shoes.

Saulo Salinas-Ospina, his son Jhonny Salinas and Juan Alberto Castillo-Ortiz were arrested by Colombian national police in November 2005, authorities said, and have been indicted on drug conspiracy charges. The extradition process took about a year.

Federal prosecutors and investigators said the Colombian nationals are the first defendants to be extradited from that country to the Northern District of Illinois at least since the current extradition treaty with Colombia was organized in 1997.

Leaders of the Drug Enforcement Administration said the case was a unique effort.

"The extradition of these defendants is an example of a successful law enforcement partnership," said Gary G. Olenkiewicz, special agent in charge of DEA's Chicago Field Division. "By working together, we, the DEA, United States attorney's office and the Colombian National Police were able to dismantle a major heroin and cocaine trafficking organization and keep these dangerous narcotics off the streets of Chicago."

Investigators said the federal probe resulted in the seizure of 78 kilograms of heroin, 38 kilograms of cocaine and more than $1.4 million in cash. Nineteen arrests were made in Colombia, and dozens more people were taken into custody in New York, Orlando and Boston.

Assistant U.S. Atty. John Blakey said the men arrived in the U.S. late last week and did not appear before the judge until Thursday because of the holidays.

The three appeared before U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer, and each pleaded not guilty and waived detention hearings. Pallmeyer ordered them to return to court in March.

Three other co-defendants indicted along with the men already have pleaded guilty in the case and been sentenced, Blakey said. Another is awaiting extradition and the eighth is being prosecuted in another matter in Florida.

John Meyer, the attorney for Salinas-Ospina, said he was new to the case, but he could request early hearings on several issues.

"I have requested all the documents on extradition in the case in case we choose to challenge some aspect of his custody here in the United States," Meyer said.

One issue could relate to Salinas-Ospina's age of 69, Meyer said.

The U.S. agreed not to seek a life sentence in the case to honor the terms of the treaty with Colombia, he said. Under the treaty, Colombia does not extradite individuals to face a life sentence. Meyer said, though, that a sentence within the federal guidelines could amount to a de facto life sentence for Salinas-Ospina.

"It's a 10-year minimum," Meyer said.

The investigation of the case also involved wiretaps in Colombia, he said, raising the issue of whether that evidence can be used in a U.S. court.

According to court documents, Salinas-Ospina, his son and Castillo-Ortiz worked inside Colombia to deliver heroin to individuals who would have it transported to cities in the U.S., including Chicago. Some of those involved were working covertly with law enforcement, the indictment states.

Drugs, Money Laundering Put Executive In Prison (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

A two-year undercover investigation involving an international Ecstasy and weapons-trafficking organization with Hollywood connections has netted its first prison sentence: a 20-year term for an executive of a Swiss-based financial, business and consulting service.

Alexandre De Basseville, 36, of Switzerland and Los Angeles, an executive board member of ADB Swiss S.A., which owns the Los Angeles-based Limelight Films Inc., was sentenced yesterday by U.S. District Judge Gerald Bruce Lee. The judge also ordered him to forfeit $528,500 after pleading guilty to conspiracy to commit money laundering and conspiracy to distribute MDMA, or Ecstasy.

De Basseville and his co-defendant, Bruno Cavelier d'Esclavelles, 45, of Los Angeles, were arrested as part of the Drug Enforcement Administration's (DEA) "Operation Director's Cut" after a two-year undercover investigation into international money laundering.

D'Esclavelles, chief executive officer at Limelight Films, was sentenced to 15 years in prison and ordered to forfeit $125,000 on Dec. 15.

"The trail of dirty money is very hard to conceal," U.S. Attorney Chuck Rosenberg said. "Here, two drug dealers and international money launderers are going to jail for a long time because federal agents and prosecutors relentlessly pursued their transactions."

The men were arrested in June in Arlington. Also arrested in the probe were Limelight Chief Financial Officer David Liberman and three associates, all of whom were charged with conspiracy to distribute Ecstasy.

A criminal complaint in the case said De Basseville met repeatedly over the past two years with undercover agents posing as international drug traffickers. It said he offered to launder drug proceeds, supply weapons and broker Ecstasy deals for the undercover agents.

The complaint said the agents met with De Basseville and several of his associates in various locations, including Arlington, Miami, Los Angeles, Amsterdam and Geneva. On two occasions, it said, De Basseville and d'Esclavelles took cash, totaling $300,000, which they thought to be drug proceeds, and laundered it for the undercover agents using Limelight Films.

In February, the complaint said, De Basseville and d'Esclavelles arranged for the sale of Ecstasy from the Netherlands from Thomas Frischknecht to an undercover agent. Mr. Frischknecht sent the agent a package containing 10,000 pills, which the agent received in Arlington, it said.

The complaint said De Basseville, d'Esclavelles and Mr. Frischknecht agreed to sell the agent 500,000 pills in the Netherlands. Mr. Frischknecht, 26, of Switzerland, was arrested in the Netherlands as the undercover agent negotiated for the delivery of the pills.

DEA spokesman Rusty Payne said authorities also arrested Fabian Pruvot, 37, Andre Prikazhikov, 31, and Brian Delansky, 33, all of Los Angeles. Mr. Pruvot and Mr. Liberman were charged with conspiracy to launder money, he said, and Mr. Prikazhikov and Mr. Delansky were charged with conspiracy to possess firearms in furtherance of drug trafficking.

Mayor's Brother, 3 Others, Indicted In Alleged Scheme (AP)

AP, January 8, 2007

PROVIDENCE, R.I. -- Two lawyers _ including the brother of the mayor of corruption-plagued Providence _ offered to set up a drug deal so clients could get a lighter sentence by alerting authorities, according to an indictment unsealed Friday.

The Boston-based federal grand jury named John M. Cicilline, 49, brother of Mayor David Cicilline, and Joseph Bevilacqua Jr., 57, a disbarred lawyer who worked with John Cicilline.

Also charged with conspiracy were paralegals and interpreters Lisa Torres, 39, and Juan Giraldo, 41. John Cicilline and Torres were also charged with obstruction of justice and making false statements to federal investigators.

Cicilline pleaded not guilty Friday and was released in lieu of $10,000 bond. He did not comment outside court. Torres did not enter a plea and was ordered held.

Bevilacqua, who is currently ending a federal prison term in home confinement, could not be transported in time for the hearing, said Samantha Martin, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney in Boston. Giraldo is serving time in a federal prison for a drug conviction and also was not at Friday's hearing, Martin said.

Cicilline faces a maximum of 25 years in prison, five years more than Torres, Martin said. Bevilacqua and Giraldo both face five-year sentences.

The mayor, who had his own law practice before he was first elected in 2002, is not accused of any wrongdoing.

DOJ_NMG_0113246

"Today's charges should make it clear that justice is not for sale," U.S. Attorney Michael Sullivan said in a written statement.

He said that it was especially troubling that the allegations involve lawyers, who are expected to conduct themselves with high ethical standards.

"A license to practice law and knowledge of the law does not allow you to break the law," said June W. Stansbury, special agent in charge of the federal Drug Enforcement Administration in New England. "As these attorneys have learned, you can go from being a member of the Bar to being behind bars," Stansbury said in a statement.

Federal prosecutors allege that in November 2002, Bevilacqua met in jail with John Mendonca, who was arrested that August in Warwick, allegedly with marijuana and about $1.3 million in cash. His wife, Jacqueline, was also charged.

According to the indictment, Bevilacqua told Mendonca that if he was willing to pay several hundred thousand dollars, Bevilacqua could arrange for someone to tell federal authorities about drug shipments _ but that Mendonca and his wife would get credit for the information. Defendants who cooperate with federal prosecutors are eligible for reduced prison sentences.

After receiving the money, Bevilacqua met with Mendonca at a Plymouth, Mass., jail and explained how Mendonca would get credit for a 900-pound marijuana bust that Giraldo had set up, as well as a 1,000-pound bust that Giraldo was still arranging.

Prosecutors wouldn't comment Friday on whether those drug shipments were made or whether any drug information was ever passed to federal authorities.

Mendonca appeared skeptical of the plot, according to the indictment. He asked how he could receive credit for a drug shipment he knew nothing about.

According to the indictment, Bevilacqua responded: "You'll have all the info,"

The indictment also accuses Bevilacqua of pressuring John Mendonca to plead guilty. He allegedly called the guilty plea a prerequisite for the Mendoncas to receive credit for the drug busts.

"You go to trial, all this is off, you won't get credit for it," he warned Mendonca.

Prosecutors say both lawyers met with Jacqueline Mendonca to seal the deal. Authorities allege that Torres pretended to prosecutors she was a close friend of Mendonca's wife willing to act as an informant. Giraldo allegedly accepted at least some of the payments.

The Mendoncas pleaded guilty to charges in their drug case, but they have not yet been sentenced.

Separately, Bevilacqua was disbarred and sent to prison after he admitted leaking an FBI videotape to a TV reporter. The tape showed an aide to Mayor Cicilline's predecessor, Vincent "Buddy" Cianci, accepting a cash bribe. Bevilacqua's prison term was to end Jan. 17.

The Cicilline brothers are sons of John F. Cicilline, a lawyer who has defended some of New England's most notorious mobsters, including the late Providence godfather Raymond L.S. Patriarca.

David Cicilline has cultivated a reputation for cleaning up City Hall following decades of corruption presided over by Cianci, who's currently serving time in a federal prison. The mayor was sworn in for a second term Wednesday.

In a news conference in his office, David Cicilline said he was not aware his brother was being investigated. The mayor, his voice quavering, said he spoke with his brother Friday morning to tell him he loved him and would be there to support him and his three daughters.

The mayor said he did not think his brother's conduct was a reflection on him or the city of Providence, which has been plagued by corruption for decades.

"My record is clear. I've worked really hard with a team of people to restore honesty and integrity to this city," he said, adding, "I'm not concerned about the impact it's having on me."

Audit Faults DEA, Says $616 Million In Seizures 'At Risk' (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

About $616 million seized by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration during investigations is "at risk" because the agency has failed to "consistently implement and document controls" over the cash, according to a government audit.

The Justice Department's Office of the Inspector General, in a 76-page report, said the accounting failures discovered by its auditors "can lead to discrepancies in the amount of cash seized and counted, accusations of theft and misappropriation of seized cash."

"The DEA has established internal control policies for handling and safeguarding seized cash," said Inspector General Glenn A. Fine. "However, our audit found that the DEA failed to consistently follow or document compliance with these policies."

DOJ_NMG_0113247

According to the report released Friday, auditors found that from Oct. 1, 2003, through Nov. 3, 2005, the DEA made 16,007 cash seizures totaling almost $616 million. The money eventually was transferred to the U.S. Marshals Service for safekeeping until it was either forfeited by or returned to the owners.

But, the auditors said, their inquiry often found "no documentation indicating that a witnessing agent or task force officer was present at critical stages of the cash-handling process" as required by DEA policy.

The auditors, according to the report, also found many instances in which agents and task force officers did not count the seized cash; did not provide a receipt to the subject from whom the cash was taken; did not complete documents transferring custody of the cash to an evidence custodian; and did not record the receipt, transfer or disposal of the cash in a temporary or permanent control ledger.

Mr. Fine said that during a review of the documentation from 33 internal DEA investigations from October 2003 through July 2005 involving accusations that agents had either lost or stolen defendants' property, auditors found that in 11 instances the agents did not properly handle, process or dispose of the evidence.

Some of the cases involved multiple violations of DEA policies, he said.

In proposing seven recommendations, Mr. Fine said the DEA needs to better define when seized cash should be counted by the seizing agent, define a time frame for seized cash to be taken to the bank, and speed the transfer of seized cash to the Marshals Service by mandating the use of wire transfers.

In addition, he said, the audit found that the DEA did not follow, or did not document that it followed, many critical internal control policies.

DEA officials, in a written response, agreed to six of the recommendations, but said a proposal that the agency clarify its policy on counting cash and implement best practices for timely cash transfers to banks already had been implemented -- a position rejected by Mr. Fine's office.

"If the DEA was in compliance with this recommendation, it should have identified the deficiencies we identified and made recommendations to correct the deficiencies," he said.

Mexican Drug Cartels Move Into Peru (DMN)

By Alfredo Corchado, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, January 8, 2007

Worry spreads as their presence increases coca production, violence

LIMA, Peru – Mexican drug cartels, once regarded mainly as couriers for South American cocaine producers, have spread their powerful tentacles deep into this Andean nation, sowing violence and nourishing the re-emergence of Shining Path guerrillas, authorities say.

Peruvian authorities suspect a Mexican cartel in the killing of a federal judge in July that shocked this nation. The allegations underscore the presence of Mexican cartels in the multibillion-dollar shadow economy in Peru, the world's second-largest producer of cocaine after neighboring Colombia.

AP An attack by suspected Shining Path guerrillas left eight people dead in a Peruvian coca-growing area in December. The terrorist group may have formed an alliance with Mexican drug cartels.

"Just like in Mexico, Peruvian institutions are being put to the test," said Gen. Juan Zárate Gambini, Peru's anti-narcotics czar and head of the National Police. "We're very concerned about the consequences, and we're committed to doing everything to meet the challenge and defeat the enemy."

Mexican cartels have become the most dominant drug-trafficking organizations in the hemisphere, authorities say. In his first weeks in office, Mexican President Felipe Calderón has sent thousands of troops and federal police to Michoacán state and the border city of Tijuana to confront entrenched cartels.

In South America, the Mexican groups are bypassing the Colombians and cutting their own deals with coca farmers in Peru and Bolivia, setting up dozens of tiny, state-of-the-art cocaine processing labs inside Peruvian territory, say Western diplomats and Peruvian authorities. The groups are opening new consumer markets throughout Latin America and elsewhere.

The Mexicans ship cocaine loads by boat to the Mexican coast, then up to the border with California or Texas, with its coveted Interstate 35 northbound corridor, Peruvian officials and experts said. South Texas remains the leading entry area for cocaine smuggled into the U.S., according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

In addition, Mexican and Colombian scientists working for the cartels have introduced chemical fertilizers that are multiplying coca leaf production up to 1,000 percent per hectare, Peruvian authorities say.

"Instead of producing 300, 400 plants, new chemicals are ... producing 3,000 plants," said Jaime Artesana, a drug expert at the Peruvian Economic and Political Institute, an independent research organization. "The Peruvian government has dedicated just 3 percent of its budget to fight the drug problem. That has to change, because we need a new strategy to adapt to more powerful Mexican cartels."

U.S. aid to Peru for drug eradication is an estimated $300 million over the last five years, and the U.S. government has earmarked $60 million over the next three years for helicopters for counter-narcotics work. Virginia-based DynCorp International – which has a major operational hub in Irving – will provide maintenance and logistical support.

"Drug trafficking transcends all borders," said the U.S. ambassador to Peru, J. Curtis Struble. "No nation is free from its harmful effect, and [it] impacts all sectors of society."

Despite U.S. support, coca production in Peru has risen almost 40 percent in recent years, partly as a result of eradication efforts in Colombia, experts say.

Similarly, the Mexican cartel presence continues to grow. Between 2005 and 2006, about 35 Mexican cartel members were arrested in Peru. Twenty-five remain in jail, Peruvian authorities said.

U.S. policy

Others say U.S. drug policy is part of the problem. Kenneth Sharpe, a Latin American political and drug policy expert at Swarthmore College in Pennsylvania, said the U.S. "prohibition policy" has actually fed the rise of powerful criminal organizations.

"U.S. drug policy based on prohibition has nourished the drug wars in Latin America," Mr. Sharpe said. "There's absolutely no way a prohibition policy will ever work – here in the United States, in Latin America or anywhere else because all prohibition does is perpetuate the drug trade, rising crime and violence."

In Peru, the presence of the Mexican cartels was illustrated in July, when alleged Tijuana cartel hit men assassinated Federal Judge Hernán Saturno Vergara as he was eating with a nephew at the restaurant near his judicial office, Peruvian authorities said. Mr. Saturno was part of a three-judge panel overseeing a major case against alleged members of the Tijuana cartel.

The Tijuana cartel is allied with the Gulf cartel and its enforcers, the Zetas, who have been blamed for surging violence along the Texas-Mexico border and have been linked to drug killings in North Texas.

The attack on the judge served as a wake-up call on the presence of Mexican cartels in Peru, authorities say.

"The [Tijuana] cartel's message to authorities was very clear: Messing with us will cost you your life," said Ricardo Valdes, a former Peruvian interior minister and now head of the economic research organization Human and Social Capital. Mr. Valdes said the order to kill the judge came from inside the jail where members of the cartel were imprisoned.

Gen. Zárate, Peru's top drug officer, said the authorities' conclusion that Mexican cartels ordered the killing is based on interviews with jailed cartel members.

The Mexican presence in Peru has angered President Alan García, Peruvian officials said. Mr. García appeared with President Bush in Washington and pledged "total eradication of the drug trafficker threat."

Peruvian and Mexican authorities held talks in Lima and pledged greater cooperation in fighting drug traffickers.

Implications

The implications for this Andean nation of 28 million people are enormous, drug experts say. They point to the violence that has engulfed parts of Mexico and the drug money that has corrupted security forces, judges, journalists and businessmen and is reportedly supporting guerrilla groups.

"We must not allow the violence of Mexico to penetrate Peru," said Gustavo Gorriti Ellenbogen, a Peruvian journalist and author and president of the Press and Society Institute, which promotes media independence.

"Mexico is like one giant bowling alley, with heads rolling," he said, referring to a recent spate of beheadings in Mexico. "We cannot allow that type of violence to happen here."

Meanwhile, the once-violent and powerful Maoist guerrilla movement known as Shining Path is regaining strength, thanks largely to drug traffickers, said Peruvian experts, including Mr. Valdes and Mr. Gorriti. Nearly defunct after the arrest of its leader, Abimael Guzmán, in 1992, the movement is now offering protection to drug traffickers and protecting coca farms from U.S.-backed eradication efforts.

In December, eight suspected Shining Path members were arrested after an attack on a police convoy in a coca-growing region killed five officers and three civilians, including a boy. More than 20 police officers have been killed in ambushes in the past year.

"The two remnants of the Shining Path are in the drug-trafficking zone in Alto Huallaga and ... the Apurímac-Ene [River] valley," said Mr. Gorriti.

There, Peruvian coca leaves are converted into paste and transported to laboratories in the coastal region for final processing. From there, Mexican cartels, working with Peruvian drug producers, ship the cocaine to not only Mexico and the U.S., but also South Africa, the Middle East, Russia, and throughout Latin America, particularly Argentina, Brazil and Chile.

DOJ_NMG_0113249

"Eradication measures in Colombia are having an effect, as cocaine production has shifted to Peru," said Mr. Artesana of the Peruvian Economic and Political Institute. "But that's not the only explanation for the growth. It's also about new and growing markets throughout Europe, Asia and Latin America."

Unlike the guerrillas inside Colombia, the Shining Path movement is now based more on profit than ideology, Mr. Gorriti said. "They protect routes and tax drug shipments. That, along with the money they charge ... has provided a source of income which has aided their re-emergence."

In 2005, Peruvian authorities confiscated 11.7 tons of cocaine. As of September 2006, cocaine confiscations for the year had already reached 14 tons.

"But what these figures don't tell you is that Peru is confronting a notable increase in cocaine production," said Ángel Páez, a Peruvian author and investigative journalist. U.S. and Peruvian authorities say 190 tons of cocaine are still being shipped out of the country, he said. "This means that interdiction is actually minimal."

Gen. Zárate said that figure "sounds right."

IMMIGRATION:

U.S. Halts Souza Family Deportation (WSJ)

By Miriam Jordan

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

The U.S. government has terminated deportation proceedings against a Brazilian couple and their disabled son who were the subjects of a page-one profile in The Wall Street Journal last month, giving the family another shot at winning the right to live here permanently.

The case of Zandro Souza and his family raised questions about whether the U.S. should grant permanent legal residency to immigrants who might one day prove to be a financial burden. Mr. Souza, who rose in six years from dishwasher to chef at upscale eateries, was pursuing legal residency in the U.S. for his family and had the sponsorship of an employer.

The family's four-year application process hit a snag during an interview with an immigration official who requested proof that Mr. Souza's son, Igor, who is blind and developmentally delayed, wouldn't become a "public charge" if his parents died.

After questioning the family about its future means of support, the agency issued a green-card denial that cited another reason for the family's rejection: namely, that it entered the U.S. on tourist visas with the intent of staying for good, a violation of federal law. In a letter dated Dec. 28, the day after the article appeared, the government withdrew its request for Mr. Souza and his family to appear for a deportation hearing. The memorandum addressed to Mr. Souza states that the government's notice to appear in court was "improvidently issued" and should be dismissed without prejudice. Thursday, an immigration judge in Boston granted the government's motion to terminate the case.

Shawn Saucier, a spokesman for the federal immigration agency, said there is no guarantee the family would be granted green cards. He said the Souzas and their attorney would be summoned for another interview within a month. "We want to be fair to this family and every applicant," Mr. Saucier said. "We want to make sure all aspects of the decision have been fully explored."

Igor, 11 years old, contracted toxoplasmosis -- a condition that can cause blindness, seizures and mental impairment in newborns -- from his mother in the womb. Mr. Souza worked two jobs to pay out of pocket for his son's medical costs, including doctors' visits, $1,000 a month in medication and as much as $2,500 for each emergency-room visit.

Several immigration attorneys, including the Souzas' lawyer, said the government's decision to reopen the case was likely to result in the family's obtaining legal permanent residency.

GOP Willing To Back Democrats' Key Bills (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

Leaders of both parties say Democrats in Congress are likely to win bipartisan support for many of their signature issues, including passage of an immigration reform package that critics have derided as amnesty.

Republican lawmakers also offered cooperation for a raise in the federal minimum wage and changes to Social Security that do not include privatization.

"What I've said to the new majority leader: 'You won the election. Fair and square. You're in the majority. It is not my first goal every morning to get up and make you look bad,' " said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, during an appearance on "Fox News Sunday."

DOJ_NMG_0113250

The Kentucky Republican said that the Democrats likely will pass a minimum-wage bill but that he also supports offsetting tax cuts. Mr. McConnell said he also expects cooperation on other issues, including Social Security.

"In fact, I've been challenging the new Democratic majority not just to do the easy things in the beginning of this session or some relatively easy issues that we were close to passing last year, but let's do some important things," he said.

"And I think there are two things that are very significant that would make a difference for the country. Let's fix the immigration problem, and let's save Social Security. We can do that before this Congress is out."

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer agreed that the House Democrats could work with President Bush on an immigration bill compromise.

"One of the things that we brought up -- we didn't discuss substance -- was the immigration bill. And [Mr. Bush] smiled, and he said, 'You know, I think I'm going to have a lot easier time dealing with you on immigration than I had dealing with the House Republican leadership on immigration.' I think that's the case," the Maryland Democrat said on "Fox News Sunday."

Mr. Hoyer also expressed confidence about Mr. Bush's response to raising the minimum wage.

"He has reconsidered on minimum wage. He has already indicated he's going to sign the minimum-wage bill."

Mr. Bush and some Republican leaders have expressed a willingness to support a minimum-wage boost if it is offset by tax cuts to small-business owners.

"I have every reason to believe that the Republicans want to cooperate," Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat and chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, told ABC's "This Week." "It's in their best interest to cooperate. It's good for the Democrats and Republicans, the Congress and the American people."

However, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi was more critical of Republicans and Mr. Bush, questioning a White House budget proposal to reduce the deficit by half over five years.

"We'd like to see what the president's version of a balanced budget is. He has never sent one to the Congress," Mrs. Pelosi, California Democrat, told CBS' "Face the Nation."

Mrs. Pelosi said the Democrats will honor legislation they have passed that promises not to increase deficit spending but does not rule out tax increases or promise to balance the budget.

"We are committed to pay as you go; no new deficit spending," she said. "We passed that in our rules package on Friday, and we're very proud of that. And we're committed to it."

In addition, Mrs. Pelosi acknowledged that people earning more than $500,000 a year may see their income taxes rise under the Democrats, but said it is not a "first resort" for her party.

"I'm talking about tax cuts for many in the middle class," she said.

Democrats' Ties To Labor Could Complicate Immigration Reform (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery

McClatchy Newspapers, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush's hopes of securing a comprehensive immigration overhaul have brightened considerably in the new Democratic-controlled Congress, but resistance from organized labor - one of the Democratic Party's most loyal constituencies - could complicate those efforts.

The AFL-CIO, which represents 53 unions with more than 9 million members, is ratcheting up opposition to a temporary guest worker program, a key element of Bush's immigration plan. At the same time, two powerful unions in a breakaway labor coalition, Change to Win, have tended to support the provision.

The divisions within labor were evident during the contentious debate over immigration in the previous Republican-controlled Congress. But they take on heightened significance as Democrats assume control of the 110th Congress and begin shaping the legislative agenda.

Organized labor is a bedrock of the Democratic coalition and helped drive Democrats' takeover of Congress in November's elections.

Labor political action committees contributed 86 percent of their donations to Democratic candidates, a total of $42 million, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Labor also aggressively waged get-out-the-vote efforts and other activities to help end 12 years of Republican control of Congress.

With its bolstered political clout, the AFL-CIO is better positioned to confront a powerful coalition of business groups that is pressing for a temporary worker program to bring in thousands of foreign workers each year.

"The industry will oppose a bill that doesn't have a good temporary worker program in it," said Randel Johnson, vice president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

But Johnson acknowledged that the AFL-CIO's heightened political stature in the aftermath of the elections raises the challenge for his side.

"In view of the election, it's very significant," he said. "Certainly, the AFL-CIO has a bigger seat at the table than they did before."

Business leaders say the guest worker program is needed to bring in foreign workers to fill unskilled and low-skilled jobs that Americans don't want. But AFL-CIO officials say the program is designed to give business a steady source of cheap labor and would take jobs from U.S. citizens.

"We don't believe our elected representatives are ready to adopt legislation that creates paths for corporations to import workers (and) reduce working standards in the United States," said Ana Avendando, associate general counsel for the AFL-CIO. "That's exactly what guest worker programs are."

Bush has made immigration one of his top domestic priorities since the outset of his presidency. But he was rebuffed by members of his own party when conservative Republicans in the House of Representatives effectively bottled up a Senate-passed bill. The legislation, which had bipartisan support, included a guest worker program and a legalization plan to put millions of undocumented workers on a path to U.S. citizenship.

At least 12 million illegal immigrants, predominately from Mexico and other Latin American countries, have entered the United States over the last two decades in search of higher paying jobs and better living conditions. How to deal with the growing undocumented population remains one of the most troublesome elements in the immigration debate as Congress prepares to take up the issue again.

Ironically, Bush appears likely to fare better with Democrats than he did with his own party. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., support a comprehensive solution that appears to embrace the general thrust of last year's Senate bill.

In the previous session, House Republicans insisted on an enforcement-only approach that resulted in the passage of a largely unfunded bill creating a 700-mile fence along the Southwest border, the only major immigration initiative to emerge from the GOP-controlled 109th Congress.

The Senate leadership already has designated a comprehensive immigration bill as one of its top 10 legislative initiatives, dubbing it Senate Bill 9, although the components will come later.

"We're going to get it passed," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., who replaces Texas Republican John Cornyn as chairman of the Senate's key immigration subcommittee.

With Democrats in control, the next version of a Senate bill could largely resemble bipartisan legislation that Kennedy co-sponsored with Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., offering eventual citizenship to undocumented immigrants after they pay fines, pass background checks and meet other conditions. A guest worker program in the McCain-Kennedy bill sought to bring in up to 400,000 foreign workers a year and offered future U.S. citizenship to qualifying participants.

The Kennedy-McCain bill served as the framework for the legislation that eventually passed the Senate, but its guest worker program was scaled back. The legalization feature was also redrawn to create three categories that determine eligibility based on the length of an illegal immigrant's stay in the country. That hard-to-administer feature, which aimed at attracting support from wavering Republics, will likely be jettisoned.

The outlook is a bit more fluid in the House, which under Republican control never seriously debated a comprehensive measure. But Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., the incoming chairwoman of the House immigration subcommittee, said she is optimistic that House members eventually can find accord on legalization, guest workers, and other contentious provisions.

"We're at the beginning here," she said. "I believe that if we stop yelling at each other and just methodically work our way through the outstanding questions, that we can come up with a practical solution."

Immigration Debate Gets Religious (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

A number of leading Christian conservative groups have formed a coalition on immigration and illegal aliens that will push religiously grounded positions that both sides of the current immigration debate will both love and hate.

In letters sent today and obtained by The Washington Times, Families First on Immigration urges President Bush and leaders of the new Democratic Congress to adopt a grand compromise on the divisive issue that includes strong border security, an amnesty for illegals already here who are relatives of citizens and an end to birthright citizenship.

Former Republican presidential hopeful Gary Bauer, Deal Hudson of the Morley Institute for Church & Culture and David Keene of the American Conservative Union are among those who have joined forces to chart a new path on immigration reform, an issue that conservative Christians have generally avoided.

"Our position really is consistent with Christian teachings and with the rule of law," said Manuel Miranda, chairman of the Third Branch Conference who has corralled more than 30 leading conservatives to enter the volatile debate.

DOJ_NMG_0113252

Religious liberals have long been outspoken advocates of amnesty and more immigration, but Christian conservatives have been torn between biblical admonitions to both the rule of law and charity toward strangers.

At the heart of their position is a compromise that could give both sides of the immigration debate their "holy grail," as Mr. Miranda puts it, while also making a major, one-time concession that would eliminate one of the biggest magnets for illegal immigration.

Out of concern for keeping families together, the religious leaders propose granting citizenship to any illegal aliens in the country who are related to U.S. citizens. This would include anyone who has had a child born here, often referred to as an "anchor baby."

In return, the federal government would end birthright citizenship, which automatically grants U.S. citizenship to anyone born here, regardless of his parents' legal status. The 14th Amendment says "all persons born or naturalized in the United States ... are citizens of the United States."

"This is a real compromise," Mr. Miranda said. "On the one hand, there is legalization of a large number of people, but conservatives get the settlement of the thorniest issue for them in the immigration debate."

In letters today, the coalition implores President Bush and Democrats on Capitol Hill to search in earnest for a solution as soon as possible that deals with the estimated 12 million to 20 million illegals now in the country and ends future illegal migration.

"Illegal immigration is a human tragedy that disrupts lives and separates families," the group wrote in the letter to Mr. Bush that also scolds officials in Mexico for their responsibility. "It is a failure of two governments: the one that fails its people and the one that invites their departure for cheap labor's sake."

Specifically, Families First tells Mr. Bush -- who was supported by most of the members of the new coalition -- to abandon his proposal for a guest-worker program until the rest of the issues such as birthright citizenship and border security are resolved.

The group struck a similar note to Democrats in Congress and requested that they begin more aggressive oversight of the Bush administration's handling of illegal immigration.

"We believe that there is a need for such oversight as soon as possible," the group wrote to Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi of California. "Our hope is that such oversight will lead to a better considered reform and a cohesive immigration policy that goes well beyond Band-Aid politics."

Among others who have joined the coalition are longtime conservative direct-mail guru Richard A. Viguerie, the Rev. Donald Wildmon of American Family Association, the Rev. Louis Sheldon of Traditional Values Coalition and Rabbi Aryeh Spero of Caucus for America.

The group hopes to draw support from fellow religious conservatives in Congress such as Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican.

Mr. Brownback caused deep consternation in conservative circles last year when he enthusiastically embraced the Senate immigration bill, which was reviled by most conservatives because it would grant citizenship rights to most illegals. A member of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. Brownback argued that it was his Christian duty to support a bill that would help illegal aliens who came here in search of a new home away from the tyranny and squalor from which they came.

Families First also urged that lawmakers act quickly.

"Each day that laws are not enforced real people and whole families come to suffer an indignity," group leaders wrote. "Illegal immigrants can become the targets of abuse by the unscrupulous. This harms Americans too. It corrodes the dignity of the American people."

Battling Deportation Often A Solitary Journey (WP)

By Karin Brulliard

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

Shortly after 9 a.m., all rose.

The black-robed judge took his seat under the Justice Department seal and in front of the federal prosecutor. People whispering in various languages spilled out of the cramped courtroom into the hallway of the federal immigration court in Arlington County, waiting for their chance to fight to stay in the United States, agree to leave or be deported.

Salvadoran Roxana Velasco sat alone in the waiting room. Like several other people listed on that morning's 37-case docket, she had no attorney.

"The judge said I have to have a lawyer or I have to represent myself," said Velasco, 30, recalling her first hearing in October. "How am I going to do that?"

In immigration courts, there are judges and prosecutors, evidence and witnesses. The consequences can be great: banishment, separation from family, perhaps persecution at home. But unlike in criminal courts, the government does not provide free lawyers for the poor. And in what court officials deem a great concern, a growing number of people in immigration court have no legal counsel: Of more than 314,000 people whose cases ran their course in fiscal 2005, two-thirds went through on their own, or pro se.

That leaves respondents to navigate byzantine immigration law, the judges to walk them through it and, critics say, the courts to operate sluggishly and deport thousands unfairly.

"How do they possibly pick out of everything that's happened to them in their lives the legally significant points?" asked Donald Kerwin, executive director of the Catholic Legal Immigration Network Inc. "You have to know the legal standards to do that."

The issue is more crucial than ever, Kerwin said, as stepped-up enforcement increasingly sends immigrants -- including children -- to court and to rural detention centers, where lawyers are hard to find.

Velasco, who was caught by federal border police after slipping across the Rio Grande a year ago, said she immigrated illegally to be with her husband, who lives in the District. She said she called three lawyers, but two wanted $10,000 and one said she could not help. So on a recent morning, Velasco took Metro to a Ballston building, pressed the elevator button marked "PH" for penthouse and ascended to the immigration court, a suite of six small courtrooms.

Just before 10 a.m., she squeezed into Courtroom 4, her red purse carrying a hearing notice outlining her right to an attorney "at no expense to the government."

Judge Garry D. Malphrus was making his way through the master calendar docket, a list of quick preliminary hearings. Case 962 was before him: a 6-year-old girl in a sparkly skirt. To her left sat her attorney. To her right sat her father, who raised his right hand and agreed on his daughter's behalf to "voluntary departure" -- to leave the United States.

The girl's hearing lasted just minutes, and it was unclear why her father conceded that his daughter must go. Immigration lawyers say many of those who appear in the court have no right to stay in the United States -- no employer or legal relative to sponsor their visa, no claim to asylum. But Kerwin and other advocates say confused immigrants often need a lawyer to tell them this, or to determine that they have a case and then make it by, say, arranging expert testimony on a country's human rights record for an asylum case or obtaining documents that prove an immigrant is the child of a U.S. citizen.

Legal representation at the Arlington and Baltimore immigration courts -- which decide all cases from Virginia, the District and Maryland -- is higher than average, largely because of their locations near metropolitan areas. In fiscal 2005, 42 percent of cases in Arlington were completed with an immigration lawyer; that figure was 58 percent in Baltimore.

In court, judges hand immigrants a list of charities that offer free or low-cost legal services. They can help. According to the Catholic Legal Immigration Network, government data show that 34 percent of all non-detained immigrants with attorneys won their cases in fiscal 2003, compared with 23 percent without. Of non-detained asylum seekers, 39 percent with attorneys won their cases; that figure was 14 percent of those without attorneys.

To help, the Executive Office for Immigration Review, the Justice Department agency that runs the nation's 54 immigration courts, has been facilitating and expanding pro bono efforts. But volunteer legal aid services are often overwhelmed and have to turn people away. Many of the nine groups on the Arlington court's list will not take the cases of detainees or criminals.

Alberto M. Benitez, a law professor who directs the George Washington University Immigration Law Clinic, one provider on the list, said he and the students he supervises must sometimes temporarily shut down their service, which operates only during the school year, to catch up.

"Once it's open, it's a deluge of calls and walk-ins and referrals," Benitez said.

Some organizations, including the American Bar Association, have called for a congressionally ordered, court-appointed system for the indigent and mentally ill. But backers concede that the idea has little viability as tension simmers over illegal immigration. Lawyers have made little headway in courts by arguing that the absence of counsel violates immigrants' due process rights.

So now advocates focus on efficiency, saying lawyers save the system money by speeding up the process, often by telling the many immigrants without a good case to accept deportation. But no study has included a cost comparison.

The claim is unconvincing to some.

"I'm not aware of any evidence that says the system would work better if people just had access to more lawyers," said Dan Stein, president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which seeks a reduction in immigration. He added: "Any good immigration lawyer at this point says that every illegal alien is just basically a potential legal one if . . . you find some loophole or make the process long enough."

After 11 a.m., the courtroom was drained of lawyers. A Mexican man approached, attorneyless.

Minutes later, the clerk called 677.

"Six-seven-seven," Velasco echoed in English, standing to cross the chilly room.

"Did you find an attorney to represent you?" Malphrus asked.

"Not yet," she said through an interpreter.

DOJ_NMG_0113254

"I'm not aware of any basis that you have for remaining in the United States," Malphrus told her. "The only thing I can do is grant you voluntary departure from the United States in four months."

"Okay," Velasco said, with a nod.

After a lunch break, Juan Carlos Lopez, a 17-year-old Honduran, awaited his hearing. His brother, Johnny Sandoval, 23, said two mortgages and two jobs leave him little time or money to get a lawyer for Juan Carlos, who crossed the border illegally in April.

Soon the brothers sat before the judge, who said he would postpone the case until February. But bring a lawyer, he told them.

"His aunt is a resident," Sandoval said. "Is there any way she can sponsor him?"

"I don't think an aunt is sufficient, right?" Malphrus said to the prosecutor.

"The other option is to try to get him a visa to attend school here, but you need to do that back in Honduras," Malphrus said. "Anyway, talk to lawyers about that some more."

Justice can be done without lawyers, but it is tedious, said Denise N. Slavin, president of the National Association of Immigration Judges. Paperwork-heavy cases, she said, might take two hearings with a good attorney but eight without.

"You're acting like someone at the DMV on those cases," said Slavin, a Miami judge. "Like, 'Okay, you've got your registration; you don't have your pollution certificate.' "

Pro se detainees sometimes file motions modeled on boilerplates that are passed around detention centers. Lawyers say other people have good cases but founder in court, not knowing when to object or what evidence to prepare.

"The pro se folks can be good at packing the court with family members or other supporters, but they don't call them as witnesses because they don't know how to call them as witnesses," said Christopher Nugent, a lawyer who coordinates pro bono programs for Holland & Knight in the District.

About 2 p.m., Richmond resident Yasmin Bahamon sat in the courtroom, looking lawyerly in a pantsuit. She was in court for the fifth time, pushing her asylum case. She said she arrived in the United States five years ago from Colombia after being kidnapped and released by leftist guerrillas.

Her attorney, she said, dropped her case when she could not pay. She said none of the lawyers on the court's pro bono list returned her calls.

As with the others, Malphrus said her file showed no basis for her to stay. Would she take voluntary departure?

"No. I can't," Bahamon, 33, said quietly.

"Why can't you?" the judge asked.

She froze.

"Keep trying to get a lawyer to help you," Malphrus said.

Later, Bahamon stood in the empty hallway, weeping as a court clerk comforted her.

Blinking back tears, she said, "I am going to keep trying on the same list."

BB&T Plans To Appeal Ruling On Tax Refund (WSJ)

By Rob Wells

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON -- BB&T Corp. said it intends to appeal a federal judge's rejection of a refund claim in a tax-shelter dispute with the Internal Revenue Service.

A U.S. District Court judge for the Middle District of North Carolina ruled for the Justice Department in a case involving BB&T's claim of a $3.3 million tax refund related to a 1997 lease transaction.

The IRS had rejected the refund claim, and BB&T went to court to settle the dispute.

BB&T spokesman Bob Denham said the Winston-Salem, N.C., bank is still reviewing the judge's opinion. "We disagree, and we plan to appeal," he said.

The leasing transaction involved a controversial "lease in, lease out" arrangement. In 2004, Congress outlawed similar leasing arrangements under which companies bought assets and then leased them back to their prior owners. Such arrangements can produce big tax benefits because depreciation can be claimed on the assets. The IRS in 2005 said it would begin to pursue leasing transactions in court.

DOJ_NMG_0113255

Eileen O'Connor, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's tax division, hailed the court decision, saying it shows that "to have a tax deduction for lease or interest expense, you must actually incur them." She said the court found in the BB&T case that the lease-in, lease-out tax shelter didn't involve a genuine lease or genuine indebtedness.

Mr. Denham said BB&T believes the leasing transaction on its 1997 tax return "was in full compliance with the Internal Revenue Code and all the applicable regulations."

At 4 p.m. Friday in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, BB&T shares fell 58 cents, or 1.3%, to $43.08 apiece.

Bush Tax Cuts Offer Most For Very Rich, Study Finds (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 — Families earning more than $1 million a year saw their federal tax rates drop more sharply than any group in the country as a result of President Bush's tax cuts, according to a new Congressional study.

The study, by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, also shows that tax rates for middle-income earners edged up in 2004, the most recent year for which data was available, while rates for people at the very top continued to decline.

Based on an exhaustive analysis of tax records and census data, the study reinforced the sense that while Mr. Bush's tax cuts reduced rates for people at every income level, they offered the biggest benefits by far to people at the very top — especially the top 1 percent of income earners.

Though tax cuts for the rich were bigger than those for other groups, the wealthiest families paid a bigger share of total taxes. That is because their incomes have climbed far more rapidly, and the gap between rich and poor has widened in the last several years.

The study offers ammunition to supporters and opponents of Mr. Bush's tax cuts, which are all but certain to touch off a battle between the president and the Democrats who just took control of Congress.

Democratic leaders have taken pains to avoid an immediate fight over the tax cuts, most of which are scheduled to expire at the end of 2010. But Democrats are looking for ways to increase revenue well before then, in part because they want to spend more on education and energy without increasing the deficit.

Economists and tax analysts have long known that the biggest dollar value of Mr. Bush's tax cuts goes to people at the very top income levels. One reason is that two of his signature measures, tax cuts on investment income and a steady reduction of estate taxes, overwhelmingly benefit the wealthiest households.

But the Congressional study offers additional insight because it incorporates information about what people paid in 2004, the first year in which taxpayers could take full advantage of the cuts on stock dividends and capital gains.

The study estimates that the effective federal income tax rate, which excludes payroll taxes for Social Security and Medicare, declined modestly for people in the middle- and lower-income categories.

Families in the middle fifth of annual earnings, who had average incomes of $56,200 in 2004, saw their average effective tax rate edge down to 2.9 percent in 2004 from 5 percent in 2000. That translated to an average tax cut of $1,180 per household, but the tax rate actually increased slightly from 2003.

Tax cuts were much deeper, and affected far more money, for families in the highest income categories. Households in the top 1 percent of earnings, which had an average income of $1.25 million, saw their effective individual tax rates drop to 19.6 percent in 2004 from 24.2 percent in 2000. The rate cut was twice as deep as for middle-income families, and it translated to an average tax cut of almost $58,000.

In its report, the Congressional Budget Office estimated that the overall effective federal tax rate edged up to 20 percent in 2004, from 19.8 percent the year before.

But even with that increase, Americans faced lower tax rates than any time since 1979. If President Bush has his way, those rates could decline even more as the estate tax on inherited wealth is gradually phased out by the start of 2010.

Mr. Bush and his Republican allies in Congress want to permanently extend that tax cut and almost all of the others that Congress passed in his first term. The cost of doing that would be more than $1 trillion over the next decade, a cost that would hit the Treasury at the same time that the spending on old-age benefits for retiring baby boomers begins to soar.

The budget office offered little commentary on its new estimates, but many of its numbers spoke for themselves.

The report shows that a comparatively small number of very wealthy households account for a very big share of total tax payments, and their share increased in the first four years after Mr. Bush's tax cuts.

The top 1 percent of income earners paid about 36.7 percent of federal income taxes and 25.3 percent of all federal taxes in 2004. The top 20 percent of income earners paid 67.1 percent of all federal taxes, up from 66.1 percent in 2000, according to the budget office.

By contrast, families in the bottom 40 percent of income earners, those with incomes below $36,300, typically paid no federal income tax and received money back from the government. That so-called negative income tax stemmed mainly from the earned-income tax credit, a program that benefits low-income parents who are employed.

Put another way: rich families were the undisputed winners from President Bush's tax cuts, but people in the bottom half of the earnings scale were not paying much in taxes anyway.

Dems Look At Tax Cuts For Middle Class (AP)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 8, 2007

Democrats are not ruling out raising taxes for the wealthiest people to help pay for tax cuts for middle-income families, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said.

She spoke of pursuing an estimated $300 billion that people owe in back taxes, eliminating deficit spending and reducing wasteful federal spending.

"As we review what we get from ... collecting our taxes and reducing waste, fraud and abuse, investing in education and in initiatives which will bring money into the Treasury, it may be that (repealing) tax cuts for those making over a certain amount of money, $500,000 a year, might be more important to the American people than ignoring the educational and health needs of America's children," Pelosi, D-Calif., said in an interview aired Sunday.

A budget rule, known as the pay-as-you-go rule, that was approved by the Democratic-run House on Friday requires that tax cuts have corresponding cuts in government spending or tax increases elsewhere to pay for them.

"What we're saying is Democrats propose tax cuts for middle-income families. And we want to have 'pay-go,' no new deficit spending. We're not going to start with repealing tax cuts, but they certainly are not off the table for people making over half a million dollars a year," Pelosi said.

The Senate's top Republican said most GOP senators oppose this budget rule because "it almost guarantees that the majority, if it enacts it, will try to raise taxes."

"The last thing we need to do is to be raising taxes in this country, and 'pay-go' is the first step toward raising taxes," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky. "I think there will be very few, if any, Republicans who will support raising taxes.

Last week, the president challenged Democrats to join him in balancing the budget within five years and urged them to cut thousands of pet projects from future spending bills.

"If the president's willing to join with us to fight waste, fraud, and abuse, collecting the taxes, closing the loopholes, we can start there," Pelosi said. "What we'd like to do is come to the table as I say, put all our priorities on the table."

Bush's spending decisions also came under fire from the new chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Rep. David Obey, D-Wis.

"How can you ever expect to get to a balanced budget if you're spending $100 billion a year on Iraq borrowing the money to do it, if you're giving $50 billion a year in tax cuts to people who make over a million bucks a year and paying for that with borrowed money?" Obey said.

Elsewhere on the legislative agenda, the chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee is getting ready to investigate suspected government fraud, particularly in federal contracts in Iraq and the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina struck. But Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., is not preparing to hand out subpoenas at first.

"I don't think you issue a subpoena first. You negotiate, and you try to get the information you need," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif.

Democratic Rep. Charles Rangel of New York, the new chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, is seeking GOP cooperation in making inroads on bloated tax laws.

"We have to look at all of the deductions, all of the credits, and to come up with what we think we can do," he said. "Is it going to be difficult? You bet your life."

Pelosi appeared on CBS' "Face the Nation." Rangel, Waxman and Obey were on "This Week" on ABC while McConnell spoke on "Fox News Sunday."

After Many Years, It's Rangel's Turn At The Helm (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 — It is the committee that produced the Social Security and Medicare laws, that created the modern welfare state and reinvented it in the 1990s, that raised taxes and slashed them, again and again and again. No committee, arguably, has more power or attracts more lobbyists than the Committee on Ways and Means. House members sometimes wait for years for a seat on it, then for decades to rise in seniority.

Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York, joined the committee in 1975, and now, at the age of 76, has finally arrived at the very top. He takes the chairmanship of the 41-member panel, with a new majority of 24 Democrats, at a moment fraught with risk and possibility. Over the next two years, the committee will play a central role in defining, and financing, the Democratic Party's agenda after 12 years out of power.

In its sprawling meeting rooms (decorated with heroic portraits of chairmen past), the committee will now have to deal with all the Democrats' conflicting promises, barely submerged tensions and competing visions from last year's midterm elections.

The language may be arcane, the legislation incremental, but the issues before the members touch the lives of millions of Americans as they grapple with a changing and sometimes unsettling economy: how to balance the demands of globalization with the fears of many Americans that free trade no longer works for them. How to abide by the principles of fiscal responsibility, while investing in education, health care and other core benefits for an increasingly anxious middle class.

How to maintain the benefits and control the costs in Medicare as the first wave of baby boomers retires. What to do about the huge Bush tax cuts that begin to expire in 2010, a tempting target for liberals but a political landmine for Democrats trying to avoid the old charge of "taxing and spending."

All over Washington, lobbyists, tax lawyers and business leaders, with vast amounts of corporate wealth and power on the line, are acutely focused on the committee — and on the man who now leads it. Moments after the Democratic transfer of power became official Thursday, Mr. Rangel walked across the crowded Capitol to a reception for Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, a fellow New York Democrat, and almost everyone he passed offered a hand, a cheek, a business card, a heartfelt (and occasionally groveling) congratulation.

"Mr. Chairman, what do I do, kneel, genuflect, what?" one woman said. Another man, suddenly recognizing the chairman, blurted out: "We've got to set up a meeting!" One after another asked, almost meekly, "Can I give you my card?" Mr. Rangel seemed utterly enchanted by it all. When he arrived at the reception, he joined the other alpha male in the room, Mrs. Clinton's husband, and settled happily into small talk, surrounded by flashing cameras, filming cellphones and beaming onlookers.

Mr. Rangel acknowledged, with a laugh, that he is now treated quite differently by the business and lobbying community. "I would be doing the same thing, to be honest with you," he said. "You've got to get along with the people who make the decisions and chair the committees." For example, Mr. Rangel added, business leaders consumed with expanding trade are suddenly displaying (at least in his presence) a "more sensitive understanding of the pain that it causes some people." It is, in short, good to be king.

Mr. Rangel is in some ways an unlikely leader for the new Democratic Party, which regained its Congressional majority in large part because of suburban voters, often in very competitive districts. The first black representative to lead the committee, Mr. Rangel comes from an urban and exceedingly safe district; it had the largest margin of Democratic presidential votes in the country in 2004, with just 9 percent going to President Bush, according to the Almanac of American Politics.

Since he won his seat in 1970, defeating Adam Clayton Powell Jr. in a Democratic primary, Mr. Rangel has been easily re-elected, and able to deliver the federal largess that seniority brings. His district has had only two congressmen in more than 60 years.

Mr. Rangel is, by most measures, a liberal, although he said in an interview last month that he would no more be a "Harlem chairman" than Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, would be a "San Francisco speaker." After 12 agonizing years in the minority, when friends urged him to leave the House and give up the distant prospect of the chairmanship, he says he is determined to make the job work and get things done. That means building consensus and reaching out, not just in his own party but across the aisle, to Congressional Republicans and the Bush administration.

He cannot work the way his predecessor, Representative Bill Thomas of California, did — by driving his own party hard and winning votes by absolute party unity. "Democrats don't work in lockstep," Mr. Rangel said. And even if they did, any purely partisan legislation faces the possibility of a presidential veto.

All this political caution and elaborate bipartisanship does not come easily to Mr. Rangel. He is given to speaking his mind, recently affirming, for example, his support for a return of the draft to highlight the unequal sharing of the burden of war. It is not a popular position, and Mr. Rangel said his party leaders "kindly" reminded him that "it wasn't in my jurisdiction."

During the midterm campaign, Republicans repeatedly, and at times successfully, tried to provoke Mr. Rangel. Vice President Dick Cheney said, at one point, that Mr. Rangel "doesn't understand how the economy works" and would return to taxing and spending; Mr. Rangel unloaded in turn.

Now, he is trying hard to be restrained, about Mr. Bush, his administration and his tax cuts. When asked about Mr. Bush's renewed insistence last week that Congress extend those tax provisions, Mr. Rangel paused and said, with almost visible effort, "Part of what I think is my responsibility is not to be critical of the president."

He brushes off speculation about his party's plans for the Bush tax cuts, many of which have been criticized by Democrats for years as a giveaway to the richest Americans; it is simply premature, he argues, since their expiration date is three years off. Stan Collender, a longtime budget analyst, says it makes no political sense for Congress to "deal with tax cuts before you have to, certainly not before the 2008 election."

This almost painfully careful discussion underscores the stakes of the Ways and Means Committee's agenda. This month, to set a framework for the discussion of the president's budget, the committee will hold broad hearings on the state of the nation's economy; those will be followed by more hearings on the budget itself, expected in early February. With the president's fast-track authority to negotiate trade agreements expiring this summer, the debate over globalization will also be quickly joined.

Chairmen of the 218-year-old committee have traditionally been at the center of the great debates, including how to support a growing elderly population and how to deal with the excesses of capitalism. They often deal directly with presidents — Wilbur Mills with Lyndon Johnson, Dan Rostenkowski with Ronald Reagan and George H. W. Bush — and are linked to the great accomplishments of their eras. (They can also take major political falls, as did Mr. Mills and Mr. Rostenkowski.)

The chairmanship does not carry the power it once did; changes in House rules and political practice reined in the "old bulls." But Mr. Rangel, who plans to fly to Chicago this month and confer with Mr. Rostenkowski, is already thinking about his legacy.

"I'm 76, and I can't afford the luxury just to gridlock," he said.

Still, there are real fault lines, even within his party. The recent elections showed a resurgent populism, a new skepticism on trade and a new alarm that global competition translates into lower wages and shakier benefits for too many Americans. Democrats who embraced free trade under President Bill Clinton are now having second thoughts.

Liberals like Robert B. Reich, the former secretary of labor, argue that the new Congress must provide "more economic security at home," like affordable health insurance or better pension protection, to cushion workers in this rough, new, competitive environment. But at the same time, many Democrats argue that the Clinton-era emphasis on deficit reduction and fiscal responsibility must be restored, raising the question of how all their new spending (not to mention a fix to the alternative minimum tax) will be paid for.

Jared Bernstein, a liberal economist, said: "When the Ways and Means Committee has worked well, they've identified social needs and advocated for the funds to meet them. Will this committee do that? I hope so."

Republicans, for their part, say they want to work with the Democrats where they can, in particular to "change the tone" on the committee after years of bitter partisanship, as Representative Jim McCrery of Louisiana, the panel's senior Republican, put it. But the ideological gulf between the two parties is vast, not just on tax cuts, but on the role of government versus the private market in areas like health care.

Representative Paul D. Ryan, Republican of Wisconsin, one of the influential young conservatives on the committee, says he fears that the Democrats' policies will inevitably lead to abolishing "the pro-growth Bush tax cuts" and pushing Medicare back toward a "one-size-fits-all government monopoly."

All of this now faces Mr. Rangel — an extraordinarily difficult job that he won, in part, by simply enduring. As he did his victory lap across the Capitol last week, he said he had no regrets. He could not stop smiling.

A Bush Tax Increase? (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

More than the ascension of Nancy Pelosi & Co. was disturbing congressional Republicans last week. They worried that George W. Bush might proceed down the path that made his father a one-term president. Thus, they ask this question: Will the current President Bush embrace a tax increase that would produce potential economic disaster and guaranteed political catastrophe?

Henry M. Paulson Jr. is a shark on Wall Street but a rookie on Pennsylvania Avenue. As Bush's third secretary of the Treasury, he has engaged in secret bipartisan talks discussing an increase in the $97,500 limit on personal income subject to the Social Security payroll tax. That would cause a jump in the top marginal tax rate, demolishing supply-side tax principles that Republican administrations have purportedly followed for 26 years.

Paulson certainly has given the impression in those discussions that he is amenable to raising the payroll tax, but a senior White House aide cautions that this decision has not yet been made. "There is somebody higher than Hank Paulson, and it is George W. Bush," he told me. Presidential adviser Karl Rove (who is not the aide I just quoted) attended conservative activist Grover Norquist's weekly meeting on Wednesday and offered to bet anyone $5 that there would be no increase in the payroll tax base. But Bush himself has not unequivocally ruled out such a move, as he has any increase in the personal income tax.

White House spokesman Tony Snow, an ardent supply-sider as a columnist and commentator who must be personally against a higher payroll tax, dances around the question at public briefings. Congressional Republicans are running into a stone wall from usually cooperative Treasury and Social Security Administration officials when they request economic data that would demonstrate the folly of lifting the payroll cap.

But Paulson is the source of most Republican apprehension. He has engaged in private talks with Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, who now calls himself an "Independent Democrat." For more than two years, Graham has been seeking Lieberman's participation in a bipartisan Social Security reform that would include a higher payroll tax base.

When Graham began crafting his compromise in November 2004, the premise was that each party would accept something painful. In return for Republicans agreeing to payroll taxes on higher income, Democrats would have to swallow Bush's proposed personal retirement accounts, which would be financed by cutting into payroll tax revenue now dedicated entirely to Social Security. But no Democrat, not even Lieberman, is willing to accept that. Democrats refuse to talk with Republicans about personal accounts "carved out" of the present system.

Indeed, a "carve out" is a dead letter. New personal retirement accounts could be passed only as an "add on" -- financed voluntarily by individuals whose contributions to Social Security would remain unchanged. Higher payroll taxes would be imposed only to save the present system as part of broader entitlement reform.

Republican concern over such an outcome stems in no small part from the belief that the multimillionaire Paulson has entered a realm foreign to him. One well-placed House Republican, who asked that his name not be used, expressed alarm that a financier who sold $485 million worth of Goldman Sachs stock in order to be confirmed at Treasury cannot appreciate how the payroll tax ravages self-employed businessmen and farmers.

Eliminating the cap on payroll taxes would constitute the largest tax increase in U.S. history, estimated by the Heritage Foundation during the last Congress at $1.4 trillion over 10 years. This analysis predicted that such a step would cost nearly a million jobs and more than $55 billion in projected personal savings.

The economic woe that would result from higher payroll taxes would be matched by the political damage to the president if this outcome were adopted by the Democratic-controlled Congress with his approval but support from only a few Republican legislators. That political calamity can be averted if Bush takes a payroll tax increase off the negotiating table, just as Democrats refuse to talk about a partially privatized Social Security system.

A Bad, Bipartisan Tax Plan (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

Way, way back, which means before the midterm elections, the House Democrats waxed indignant about the rights of the minority party. When they assumed majority status last week, they barely gave Republicans a chance to speak, and all of Washington tut-tutted. Meanwhile, in the Senate, there was an outbreak of bipartisanship fit to make the angels sing. This posed a far more serious problem.

The outbreak came from Max Baucus, the new Democratic chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and Chuck Grassley, the ranking Republican. Standing shoulder to shoulder, manfully defying the mad partisan cleavage of our times, the two senators called for repeal of the alternative minimum tax -- a prescription so fiscally crazy that not even the Bush administration supports it.

To appreciate the full awfulness of this idea, start with the broad tax picture. The Bush tax cuts are set to expire in 2010, so there's going to be a loud debate about whether to extend them. Meanwhile the alternative minimum tax, which was devised to ensure that millionaires don't escape taxes through excessive deductions, is catching more and more families in its net. Back in 1970, just 20,000 households paid the AMT. This year 23.4 million are expected to be hit by it.

Nobody likes the AMT. It penalizes families with children, and it requires taxpayers to calculate what they owe twice: You crunch the numbers under the usual tax rules, crunch them again under AMT rules, then pay whichever bill is bigger. But the spread of the unpopular AMT creates a political opening. Coupled with the expiration of the tax cuts in 2010, it gives Congress two reasons to rethink tax policy.

The Baucus-Grassley idea would waste this opportunity. The senators don't want to reform the AMT or link its repeal to wider tax changes; they just want to abolish it. This would destroy the chance to say to voters: Look, we're not going to extend all the tax cuts we gave you in 2001 and 2003, and while we're at it we're going to reduce the mortgage-interest deduction and other egregious loopholes so that we can collect more revenue without discouraging work by raising your tax rates. But wait, don't get too mad; at least we're going to kill the AMT for you.

Repealing the AMT would preempt that sort of bargain; but it would also be bad on its own terms. For all its administrative clunkiness, the AMT is wonderfully progressive: 90 percent of its revenue comes from those earning more than $100,000 a year, according to the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center. Last week Baucus denounced the AMT as a "monster in the tax code" -- a "Frankenstein," no less. But in an era of rising inequality, you don't slay progressive monsters casually.

Then there is the question of paying for repeal, which would cost a whopping $750 billion-plus over a decade. Last week both parties proclaimed that they had truly, honestly forsworn budget-busting proposals: The Bush administration announced a plan to come up with a plan to balance the budget three years after it leaves office, while the Democrats announced that they would live by rules under which any tax cut or spending proposal must be paid for with an offsetting measure. In one cruel swoop, AMT repeal would bury these green shoots of responsibility.

Baucus, to be fair, says he wants AMT repeal to be "fiscally responsible." The trouble is that his favorite way of generating revenue -- redoubling efforts to collect unpaid taxes from shirkers -- is not going to yield anything like enough to finance AMT reform. If the senator has other revenue ideas, he's not mentioning them.

Meanwhile, Grassley is cheerfully indifferent to the deficit. He dismisses calls to offset the cost of abolition as a "trap": "It's unfair to raise taxes to repeal something with serious unintended consequences like the AMT," he complained last week. But the consequences of the AMT -- namely, rapidly rising revenue -- are not exactly a surprise, least of all to the senator. They have been part of the budget projections that Grassley used to justify his support for the Bush tax cuts.

The nation's fiscal destiny is going to depend on a few big things. It's great that pork-barrel "earmarks" are at last being criticized by both the president and Congress, but the most serious challenges lie elsewhere. They lie, first, in the federal health and retirement programs, whose costs threaten a crackup; and second, in the tax system, which needs to bring in extra revenue while reducing inequality and not injuring the work ethic. Senators have no business sitting on the Finance Committee unless they are grappling with these problems day and night. But Baucus and Grassley have set out to make a solution harder.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

How Bush Education Law Has Changed Our Schools (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, January 8, 2007

The walls are speaking these days at Stanton Elementary School in Philadelphia, and they're talking about test scores.

Post-It notes with children's names tell the story of how, in just five years, a federal law with a funny name has changed school for everyone. "We spend most of our days talking about or looking at data," principal Barbara Adderley says.

Test scores run her week.

She meets with kindergarten teachers on Monday, first-grade teachers on Tuesday and so on. The meetings begin with a look at each teacher's "assessment wall," filled with color-coded Post-Its representing each pupil and whether he or she is making steady progress in basic skills. Once students master a skill, the Post-Its move up the wall.

"If they don't move, then we have to talk about what's happening," Adderley says.

What's driving the talk? President Bush's landmark education law, dubbed No Child Left Behind.

A cornerstone of Bush's domestic agenda and one of his few truly bipartisan successes, it took what was once a fairly low-key funding vehicle (it was known as the Elementary and Secondary Education Act before Bush borrowed the catchy name from the Children's Defense Fund) and turned it into a vast — and contentious — book of federal mandates.

At its simplest, the law aims to improve the basic skills of the nation's public school children, particularly poor and minority students.

At Stanton, it seems to have made a difference. In 2003, fewer than two in 10 kids here met state reading standards; by 2005, about seven in 10 did.

The law turns 5 years old today.

It faces a tough future as Congress prepares to reauthorize it — a group of 100 education, religion and civil rights leaders today announces an effort calling for "major changes."

Is it improving education nationwide? It's too early to tell — many schools didn't get around to enacting most of its more than 1,000 pages of regulations until two or three years ago. U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings says the law wasn't being fully implemented in all 50 states until 2006.

But one thing is certain: No Child Left Behind has had a major influence on the daily experience of school for millions of kids. Here are five big ways it's changing schools.

It's driving teachers crazy

DOJ_NMG_0113261

Here's a pretty safe rule of thumb: Start in the classroom and travel up the educational food chain. The further you travel, the more you'll find that people like the law. Mention it to most teachers and they'll just roll their eyes. Many principals tolerate it. Ask a local superintendent, a state superintendent or a governor and the assessment gets rosier as their suit gets more expensive.

Carmen Meléndez quit her job as a bilingual language arts teacher at an elementary school last spring in Orange County, Fla., after the law prompted her principal to institute 90-minute reading blocks and a scripted curriculum — in the process making individualized instruction impossible. Meléndez also found that she couldn't teach poetry anymore.

"It was insane," she says. "The kids were all jaded. They were tired — they hated school."

Most of the frustration, teachers will tell you, comes from the stress of mandated math and reading tests. The law requires that virtually all children be tested each year starting in third grade — and it doles out growing penalties if schools don't raise scores each year. Naturally, test day in most schools is fraught with tension.

"They're 8 years old, and they're so worried about a passing score," Meléndez says. "I think that's inhumane."

Dianne Campbell, director of testing and accountability in Rockingham County, N.C., told the American School Board Journal in 2003 that administrators discard as many as 20 test booklets on exam days because children vomit on them.

Also, many state rating systems (which often predated No Child Left Behind) now end up celebrating the same schools the federal law slams.

Longstreet Elementary School in Daytona Beach, Fla., has scored high on the state ratings for five years, but Longstreet is one of 21 Volusia County schools due for "corrective action" this year under the law.

"Our parents are thrilled at what happens at our school — and a lot of what happens at our school has nothing to do with No Child Left Behind," says counselor Bill Archer.

Jack Jennings of the Center on Education Policy, a Washington education research group, says some of the testing actually helps drive better instructional strategies and, in that respect, is helpful. But he says teachers tell him they're overwhelmed by the sheer volume of testing, which can last six weeks in some schools.

"I don't think you can go into a teacher meeting in the country without somebody bringing up No Child Left Behind," he says.

After five years, the law has even spawned an online petition that, as of Sunday, had about 22,500 signatures of people urging Congress to repeal it.

Along with his signature, teacher Mark Quig-Hartman of Vallejo, Calif., said: "I am well on my way to becoming an embittered and mediocre teacher who heretofore considered teaching to be a profession, not a job. I once loved what I did. I do not now, nor do my students; school has become a rather grim and joyless place for all."

Teachers' unions have often been the law's loudest critics. One top National Education Association official even entertained the NEA's 2004 conference in Washington by appearing onstage with an acoustic guitar and singing a protest song with this unforgettable hook: "If we have to test their butts off, there'll be no child's behind left."

And if you think it's just teachers who complain, think again: 2006 saw even the law's most ardent supporters complaining, but for a very different reason: They say states and school districts game the system by lowering their standards.

Because the law allows each state to set its own pass/fail bar on skills tests, "proficient" means something different depending on which state you live in. The percentage of Missouri fourth-graders at or above "proficient" in English is only 35%, but 89% of Mississippi fourth-graders meet that state's standards. In math, only 39% of Maine fourth-graders are proficient or better; in North Carolina, 92% are.

Philadelphia Public Schools CEO Paul Vallas jokes that to really improve scores in his city, he could make classes smaller and modernize buildings. "Or we can give everyone the Illinois test," he says.

It's narrowing what many schools teach

If nothing else, the law's first five years have proved the maxim "What gets tested gets taught."

The law's annual testing requirements in math and reading have led many schools to pump up the amount of time they spend teaching these two staples — often at the expense of other subjects, such as history, art or science.

Jennings found that 71% of districts are reducing time on other subjects in elementary school.

"What we're getting under (the law) is a very strong emphasis on building skills at the expense of history and literature and science," says researcher Thomas Toch of the Education Sector, a Washington think tank.

Other critics say the law has created a "complexity gap." Children in lower grades have made improvements — some impressive — in basic skills, but the improvements vanish in middle school and beyond, when kids are tested on more complex conceptual thinking.

Brown University researcher Martin West this fall compared federal data from 2000 and 2004, and found that since No Child Left Behind, elementary schools have spent, on average, 23 fewer minutes a week on science and 17 fewer minutes on history. He also found that in states that test history and science each spring, teachers spend about half an hour more a week on each subject.

He also found, oddly, that after a large jump in the 1990s, schools actually spend a few minutes less a week on math — but they still spend more than twice as much time on math than on either history or science.

And they spend more than twice as much time on reading and language as on math.

"Schools really do respond to the incentives that are provided to them," West says. "That places a huge premium on getting the incentives correct."

But he and others aren't quite ready to say the law is dumbing down school.

Researcher Jane Hannaway of the Urban Institute theorizes that improved reading skills may help children understand other topics, even if they're spending less class time on them.

She recently looked at Texas fourth-graders' standardized test scores and found that they had some of the nation's highest marks in science — even though they don't tackle science until fifth grade. One possible theory? The children in Texas were simply able to read the test questions better.

'Invisible' students get attention

Even opponents of No Child Left Behind grudgingly concede that, five years out, the law has revolutionized how schools look at poor, minority and disabled children in big cities, who often find themselves struggling academically. It forces schools to look at test score data in a whole new light, breaking out the scores into 35 or more "subgroups."

If even one group fails to make "Adequate Yearly Progress," or AYP, in a year, the whole school is labeled as "in need of improvement."

Perhaps most significant, the law has given a handful of big-city superintendents the political leverage to make radical changes — they can now make the case that "federal requirements" make them necessary.

In Philadelphia, public schools CEO Paul Vallas invoked the law when, in one school year, 2002-03, he replaced all of the city's elementary and middle school math and language arts textbooks and hired Kaplan, the test-prep company, to write a standardized core curriculum.

He pumped up full-day kindergarten and preschool — Philly students are now 50% more likely to have attended preschool than before the law — and instituted extended-day math and reading programs for struggling students. "No Child Left Behind gave us the cover to do it," he says.

In the past three years, he also has dismissed 750 teachers who didn't meet minimum standards the law put in place.

"We would have never been able to do that without the federal (Sword of) Damocles hanging over our head," he says.

Superintendents in New York City, Chicago, San Diego and elsewhere have made similar — and sometimes bigger — changes under the cover of No Child Left Behind.

Spellings says the law has had similar effects nationwide. "It has built an appetite to pay attention to kids who have been overlooked previously," she says.

A few observers, such as Mike Petrilli, a former top Bush administration official, say the law has been felt most keenly by suburban school districts, where for years low achievers weren't a priority because high-achieving kids could bring up the district average.

Petrilli, who now works for the Fordham Foundation, a conservative Washington think tank, says the idea of breaking out poor and minority kids' scores was "really revolutionary" in most suburbs.

It has prompted many suburban districts in places such as Montclair, N.J.; Shaker Heights, Ohio; and Evanston, Ill., to form a co-op that shares ways to help once-neglected minority kids.

"There's general agreement that (the law) has created more of a sense of urgency," says education blogger and Virginia State Board of Education member Andrew Rotherham.

What that looks like in individual schools varies, but in many, "urgency" is not pretty.

"It really has brought the Hounds of Hell down on the schools of Prince William County," says Betsie Fobes, a recently retired eighth-grade algebra and pre-algebra teacher at Parkside Middle School in Manassas, Va. "This AYP business is just killing us — absolutely killing us."

Parkside, which has seen a large Latino influx, didn't meet its goals two years in a row — so now teachers must attend twice-weekly meetings, often focused on testing. They've built in a tutorial period, and even secretaries do their share of tutoring.

"The entire school is revolving pretty much around these kids who fit into these subgroups," Fobes says.

It's making the school day longer

If a restaurant takes 12 eggs and makes a lousy omelette, will adding another two eggs make it better?

If a school can't teach a child to read in seven hours, will eight do the trick?

Under No Child Left Behind, the answer is: Probably yes.

DOJ_NMG_0113263

The law requires schools that don't make adequate yearly progress to offer free transfers to a better-performing public school.

If results don't improve the next year, the school must begin offering free after-school tutoring — in many cases with classes taught by the school's own teachers with whom the kids were failing during the school day.

William Bennett, Ronald Reagan's education secretary, invoked the egg metaphor, and as it turns out, a lot of families — and teachers — are willing to try the omelette. In the 2004-05 school year, 1.4 million students were eligible for the tutoring, and about 17% took advantage of it.

Spellings says the tutoring is often provided by different teachers from the ones a kid sees during the regular day. Perhaps more important, she says, the law is forcing large districts such as Los Angeles to figure out how to keep kids from needing tutoring in the first place.

"They're … sitting there thinking, 'What the heck? How can we have so many kids who can't get to grade level in the course of the school day? What needs to happen in the school day different?' "

It's changing how reading is taught

Forget everything else No Child Left Behind stands for. If it does nothing else, advocates say, it will have improved poor kids' reading in unprecedented ways. A few say it already has.

The law gives schools $1 billion a year to spend on reading and focuses it, laser-like, on 5,600 schools that serve the nation's poorest 1.8 million kids. It starts with kids as soon as they enter school and, so far, has trained 103,000 teachers on "scientifically based" reading strategies heavy in phonics, step-by-step lessons and practice, practice, practice.

And because many schools build their reading programs around what primary grades do, it could affect millions more students' reading skills.

How could it fail? Easily, say critics such as Susan Ohanian. She points to overly scripted reading curricula and a curious little reading test called DIBELS, which makes it easy to rate children's reading skills, in part by asking them to look at nonsense words; it then rates them on their ability to read the words aloud — very quickly.

"I have never seen anything like this," says Ohanian, a former New York teacher who blogs about education in general and No Child Left Behind in particular. She bemoans the loss of teacher autonomy and says DIBELS is one of its worst symptoms.

"I don't dispute that it's quick and easy and it's a tool — and if you just used it that way, I probably wouldn't have a problem with it," she says. But she adds: "They're using DIBELS to hold kids back in kindergarten. And that's where it becomes really evil. Some kids are just not ready for that skills stuff."

Next Round Begins For No Child Left Behind (CSM)

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, January 8, 2007

When President Bush signed the landmark No Child Left Behind Act five years ago Monday, he conducted a three-state road show, touted its bipartisan roots, and promised it would put US schools "on a new path of reform, and a new path of results."

In the five years since, critics and admirers of the bill tend to agree about the reform part, but say they're still waiting for results.

Achievement levels are creeping up toward the 2014 deadline when all public school children are supposed to be "proficient" at math and reading, and the racial and economic achievement gaps have narrowed slightly in a few cases, but not at all in others.

Yet even the act's harshest critics admit it has changed the conversation about education in America, and has focused attention on poor-achieving groups of students who had been overlooked.

This year, No Child Left Behind (NCLB) is getting particular attention: It's not just the five-year anniversary, but the year the act expires and must be voted on again by Congress - an opportunity many are hoping will be used to revise the law - either a lot or a little - to make it more effective.

"I'm actually even more hopeful about this second iteration of this law than I was about the first," says Michael Casserly, executive director of the Council of the Great City Schools. "In general, I think the law has been more helpful than not. For a piece of legislation that really changed the conversation from universal access to universal proficiency, I wouldn't necessarily expect to get that paradigm shift right the first time around." A national reform

In its five years, the law has affected nearly every elementary and high school in the country.

Testing is now conducted every year from Grades 3 through 8, and students' performance is measured against that of the rest of their state and is broken down by race and income level. If any of those groups fails to make the "adequate yearly progress" two years in a row, the school is placed on an "in need of improvement" list. Schools on the list that receive federal funds are then subject to mounting sanctions and extra services.

And that's just the most visible change. The ultimate goal is to have every child meeting standards by 2014.

For now, though, the results are less clear. Scores on the National Assessment of Education Progress (NAEP), called the nation's report card, have climbed slowly in reading and math for some groups, but the number of students who are "proficient" is still discouraging.

Just 41 percent of all white fourth graders meet the standard in reading, for instance. For both reading and math, only 13 percent of all black fourth graders are "proficient." Teachers complain of the stigma of being a failing school, and principals worry about the myriad ways they could end up on a watch list.

The Department of Education emphasizes the long-term NAEP trends, noting that more progress in the reading scores of 9-year-olds was made between 1999 and 2004 than in the previous 28 years combined. But in general, even supporters say they're happier with the conversation the law has jumpstarted than with the results.

"It's been more effective at capturing attention and getting the rhetorical attention than in actually prompting people to go after the hard stuff they're going to need to go after to actually close these gaps," says Kati Haycock, director of the Education Trust, which focuses on closing achievement gaps for poor and minority students. She credits NCLB with some improvement in the achievement gap, but would like to see teacher quality standards better enforced. A push to help those at the bottom

One change that seems likely to get traction is a shift toward a "growth" model of assessing schools, in which schools with students who come in far below grade level get credit for helping them make big strides, even if they still fall short of proficiency - so long as, the Department of Education emphasizes, they do get students to a proficient level eventually. The department has already approved pilot programs in five states, and wants Congress to include such a model in NCLB.

Still, some critics want far more sweeping changes. A coalition called the Forum on Educational Accountability now has more than 100 groups - including the NAACP and the National Education Association - which have signed a list of 14 requested changes to the law. They include lowering the current proficiency targets, providing more assistance to failing schools, getting rid of sanctions with less record of improvement, and encouraging testing designed to measure higher thinking skills and performance throughout the year.

"The goal [of NCLB] is reasonable - the structure and way it's been implemented have been a disaster," says Monty Neill, director of FairTest and chairman of the forum.

He says some sanctions, such as allowing students to attend another school, aren't working, and that the testing and annual progress requirements have caused many schools to narrow their curriculum and "teach to the test" in the months preceding it.

"We'd be better off putting money into the teachers, teaching them how to be better assessors, and building in methods for spot checking and getting feedback," Mr. Neill says. Slim chance for change in 2007

While the conversation is heated, the likelihood that NLCB will be reauthorized this year may be small. An informal poll of Washington insiders conducted by the conservative Thomas B. Fordham Foundation found that none believed it is likely this year, and most thought it would be put off until after the 2008 presidential election.

Michael Petrilli, vice president for national programs and policy of the foundation and an early supporter of NCLB, admits that by this point, he's convinced that the federal government simply can't accomplish what it wants. He'd keep the goals of NCLB, but put the federal government's effort into setting strong national standards - instead of the widely varying state standards that currently exist - and have the states and districts figure out on their own how to get students to meet those standards.

"What we've learned more than anything else is that the federal government isn't well-equipped to force school districts to do things they don't want to do," Mr. Petrilli says.

The Department of Education, meanwhile, asks critics to be patient.

"We're in such a different place" than we were five years ago, says Kerri Briggs, acting assistant secretary for policy. "Education reform is not necessarily speedy work. It's tough stuff and requires putting in new assessments, creating data systems, rethinking curriculum, new professional development for teachers.... We have a lot of heavy lifting left to do."

Cutting Provisions In Union Contracts Could Free Funds (WP)

By Jay Mathews

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

U.S. public schools could have as much as $77 billion more a year to improve teaching if they reduced spending on seniority pay increases, teacher's aides, class size limits and other measures often found in teacher union contracts, a new study contends.

DOJ_NMG_0113265

The report from the Washington-based think tank Education Sector analyzed research on eight common provisions of contracts that require schools to spend substantial sums but have what the report called "a weak or inconsistent relationship with student learning."

The provisions include salary increases based on years of experience or educational credentials; professional development days; sick and personal days; class size limits; use of teacher's aides; and generous health and retirement benefits.

Teachers union officials sharply disputed the report's findings. School administrators and school board representatives said that although they would like more flexibility in the use of funds, there was little evidence that cutting such provisions would raise achievement.

"I believe that teachers will not trust our good intentions and find a system that eliminates the current pay structure an organization to avoid," said Robert G. Smith, Arlington County school superintendent.

The Education Sector is supported by several foundations, including those funded by the Gates, Hewlett and Kauffman families.

The report, written by University of Washington researcher Marguerite Roza, called the $77 billion spent on the eight provisions "frozen assets" that could be better spent elsewhere.

"This is not excess money that could be withdrawn from the public education system with no impact on student learning, but rather money that might be spent differently and with great effect," she wrote.

Analyzing seniority-based salary raises, Roza wrote that "studies show that individual teachers are less effective in their first year of teaching than later in their careers, but improvement tends to plateau after only five years or so, and may even decline as teachers approach retirement."

Roza suggested that more could be spent to raise minimum salaries to recruit highly qualified younger educators or to hire teachers to tutor low-performing students after school.

Antonia Cortese, executive vice president of the American Federation of Teachers, said the report was "on thin ice for its sweeping -- and often inaccurate" assertions.

Reg Weaver, president of the National Education Association, said, "Research has shown us time and time again that low salaries drive committed people from the teaching profession." He added: "Simply put, we need lawmakers to fully fund public education."

Mayors Seek To Take Charge Of Schools (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The statistics tell a sorry tale about the public schools in America's capital. A majority of fourth- and eighth-graders are failing to read or do math at basic levels. Roughly four in five schools are not meeting achievement goals under the federal No Child Left Behind law. Just 43 percent of students graduate from high school in five years.

The new mayor, Adrian Fenty, got an earful about the situation during last year's campaign. "I heard repeatedly, 'Fix the schools.' It was a tidal wave," Fenty said.

So he is trying to do what a dozen other city leaders around the nation have done: gain control over the schools. For Fenty, that means convincing the city council and Congress to support his plan to require the superintendent to report to him and to further limit the authority of the elected school board. A majority of council members have signaled a willingness to back the new mayor.

The problem for Fenty and his colleagues is that mayors generally lack the power to overhaul schools.

"Mayors are held accountable for something they have no responsibility for," said Fritz Edelstein, who recently stepped down as a senior adviser to the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

In most places, elected school boards and the superintendents they hire govern school districts. It is a structure set up about a century ago to insulate schools from political strife and corruption in city government.

Yet it has not always worked as planned.

For example, before a mayoral takeover of New York City's schools, an investigation into a Bronx school board Bronx found that members routinely misused district personnel and resources _ once ordering X-rated pay-per-view movies.

Those kind of problems, plus low voter turnout for school board elections and sagging test scores, have fueled a movement since the 1990s for mayoral control of schools. Besides New York, it has happened in Boston, Chicago, Cleveland and Harrisburg, Pa.

The California Legislature gave the Los Angeles' mayor partial control over schools. But a judge last month struck down that law, saying it violated that state's constitution. The mayor is appealing.

Mayoral control of schools is being debated in Albuquerque, N.M., and Seattle too.

DOJ_NMG_0113266

City leaders and their allies make the case that better schools help make cities prosper. Mayors say they are better equipped to take on the infighting, inertia and high turnover rates associated with school boards and the superintendents who report to them.

New York's mayor, Michael Bloomberg, put it this way when Fenty and members of the District of Columbia City Council visited recently: "There's an old story that a camel is a racehorse designed by a committee and there's a lot more truth to that than not," Bloomberg said. "You don't run things by committee. You don't try to come to consensus when it's our children's future."

Such statements have earned Bloomberg criticism from people who say he has failed to seek community input and operate in a transparent way, said David Bloomfield, who heads a program at Brooklyn College that trains school administrators.

Bloomfield said there has been an increase in no-bid school contracts since the mayoral takeover in 2002 and that many parents feel there is no place to air concerns without an elected board.

Michael Kirst, a professor emeritus at Stanford University and an expert on school governance, said a takeover makes the system less democratic.

"Before mayoral control, you'd go to your school board member and raise hell," Kirst said. He said the trade-off is "strong, integrated leadership."

Bloomberg, a Republican in his second term, says he has broad support among voters, including for his handling of schools. A recent public opinion poll put his approval ratings around 70 percent.

Ken Wong, a school governance expert at Brown University, analyzed test scores in about a dozen cities with mayors in charge of schools from 1999 to 2003. The results showed modest but statistically significant progress in reading and math for elementary and middle-school students. Wong said data is insufficient to make the same judgment about high school students.

"Mayors are turnaround artists, not saviors. Our analysis suggests that mayors can steer the ship in the right direction, but that there is still a long way to go before their districts achieve acceptable levels of student achievement," Wong wrote in a report accompanying his analysis.

Tom Payzant, who recently stepped down after a decade as the mayor's appointed school superintendent in Boston, says it was important for him to be part of the mayor's Cabinet.

"When you think about trying to align policies and programs that affect children, youth and families, there is a much greater opportunity than there is in the system where the municipal government is totally separate from the school government," Payzant said.

Critics say it is precisely because mayors have so many other issues to address that schools should be managed separately.

"Mayors have a lot on their plate. It's a wonder that some of these mayors think they also have time to take over public schools," said Anne Bryant, executive director of the National School Boards Association.

Yet Fenty, sworn in last week as Washington's mayor, said he would make the time.

"We have a crisis on our hands," Fenty said in a news conference describing his bid for school control. "I am asking today for that responsibility to be placed squarely on my shoulders."

U.S. Education Officials Question Diversity Standard (WP)

By Valerie Strauss

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

The Education Department's general counsel is challenging the American Bar Association's new standard on diversity in enrollment and hiring, which calls for the law schools it accredits to take "concrete action" to attract more minority students, faculty and staff.

The 400,000-member law association, which has accredited nearly 200 law schools nationwide, said it updated its standards last year after a 2003 Supreme Court ruling that said law schools could use race and ethnicity as factors in admissions with certain restrictions.

The new standard gives no specific benchmarks, but the association said it would judge results on "the totality of the law school's actions."

Some Education Department officials said the ABA's new standard effectively promotes quotas and could force schools in states that ban affirmative action to break the law. Some civil rights organizations said the new standards did not go far enough "to stem the decline" in minority enrollments in law schools.

ABA officials say the department is misinterpreting the standard and pushing an anti-affirmative action agenda while violating its own procedures for reauthorizing the ABA as an accrediting agency.

DOJ_NMG_0113267

The move, critics say, is the latest in a series of legal challenges on affirmative action, including a decision by Michigan voters in November to ban the use of race in deciding public university admissions and government hiring. It comes as the ABA is seeking the Education Department's authority to continue accrediting U.S. law schools.

Supreme courts and bar examiners in all 50 states use ABA approval as a qualifying factor in making law school graduate licensing decisions.

At a Dec. 4 hearing, department officials raised a number of concerns with the ABA's stewardship of the law school accreditation program, including whether it was consistently enforcing its own policies regarding the maximum time it allows a law school to remain out of compliance with its standards -- two years.

But the most controversial issue at the hearing was about the diversity standard.

Bill James, a department official who presented the case for the government, said during the hearing: "The ABA is now requiring schools to implement quotas for enrollment and hiring of racial and ethnic minorities and women. While the agency says that Standard 212 and its interpretations do not require quotas or preferences, the language is so vague that they can be reasonably read to require just that."

William Rakes, chairman of the ABA's council on legal education and admissions to the bar, countered that the association's application "has turned into a policy issue relating to affirmative action, relating to diversity, as opposed to a consideration as to whether" the ABA is consistently applying its own standards.

The ABA said it had a similar standard that promoted diversity for 26 years unchallenged.

Ultimately, the National Advisory Committee on Institutional Quality and Integrity, an appointed panel charged with making the decision, voted to extend the ABA's role for 18 months rather than the usual five years and required the association to improve the way it carries out the task of accrediting law schools. But the committee dropped the staff recommendation to include any action on the diversity standards.

The committee sent its report to Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, and general counsel Kent Talbert said the federal agency would appeal the decision to leave the standard alone. Department spokeswoman Jane Glickman said it was not known when the appeal would be made or when Spellings would rule.

Rakes issued a statement saying the ABA "is disappointed" about the appeal and noted that the department's "own regulations for recognizing accrediting agencies do not speak to diversity standards, and therefore, cannot justify the requirement of removing diversity standards from an accrediting agency's oversight of institutions of higher education."

Supporters Renew Push For Mental Health Care (USAT)

By Marilyn Elias, Usa Today

USA Today, January 8, 2007

Bills that could expand access to mental health care for Americans stand a better chance of passing with the new leadership that has taken over Congress, key lobbyists and congressional supporters of the legislation say.

Their top priority is a bill requiring insurers to offer comparable benefits for treating mental disorders and physical illnesses, known as "parity."

Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., introduced three earlier parity bills. "Now our prospects are the best that they've ever been," says Matt Letourneau, spokesman for the senator.

Although parity has bipartisan support, past legislation stalled in committee because House leadership didn't favor it, says Laurel Stine of the Bazelon Center for Mental Health Law, a Washington, D.C.-based advocacy group.

A 1996 federal law had required comparable dollar limits for coverage of mental disorders and medical problems but allowed caps on the number of therapy visits or days of hospitalization for mental illness.

In the past 15 years, 44 states have passed parity laws to expand coverage, the American Psychological Association says.

But many employer-sponsored health plans, particularly those offered by large companies, are exempt from such state laws, and about 55% of U.S. workers are in such plans, according to a report last year from the Kaiser Family Foundation.

Key goals of a federal parity law are to equalize coverage in such plans and in all insurance programs, Stine says.

Better mental health treatment for veterans returning from the Iraq war also could come out of the new Congress, says Ralph Ibson of Mental Health America, an education and advocacy group. He says the shift in leadership on the House Veterans Affairs Committee could lead to more spending for care.

Also on the radar: reauthorization bills that could affect mental health care for Hurricane Katrina survivors and children in poor families.

A bill to reauthorize the federal Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration could provide money to help Katrina survivors with mental disorders, Ibson says. And reauthorizing the state children's health insurance program could improve treatment benefits for children of the working poor, says Andrew Sperling of the advocacy group National Alliance on Mental Illness.

Mental health advocates also say there's strong support for a bill to help states create programs that would allow children with serious mental disorders to live with their families while they're treated. Some parents have had to give up custody to the state because they can't afford care.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, proposed the bill last session, but it died in the Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions. Rep. Patrick Kennedy, D-R.I., introduced the House version. Now his father, Sen. Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., will head the Senate committee the bill must clear.

"I'm hopeful we'll have more success this year," says Collins, who will reintroduce the bill. "No parent should have to face such a wrenching choice of either giving up custody or not getting treatment for their child."

Time Does Not Bend For Democrats, But The Congressional Record Does (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

It's not going to take long for the House Democrats to get comfortable in the majority. They got off to an excellent start last week, continuing the venerable tradition of riding roughshod over the minority. That's what gives the House its special charm.

But it may be they're thinking their powers are limitless. For example, new Rules Committee Chairman Louise M. Slaughter (D-N.Y.), speaking on the House floor during the debate Thursday on the new ethics package, said: "Let me just yield myself about 30 seconds or 45 seconds, whichever comes first."

Now wait a minute. Even the chairman of the Rules Committee can't violate the laws of time. No matter what, 30 is going to come before 45. Except in the "Back to the Future" movies.

And then, of course, history got a little massaging as the Congressional Record cleaned up her remarks: "I would like to yield myself about 30 seconds, 45 perhaps, just to respond for a moment," is how the Record recorded it.Retired 'in Place,' but Not in Iraq

Keeping up with . . . April Glaspie. Saddam Hussein's execution brought back thoughts of his early years, when he was a hideous dictator and murderer of his own people but steadfastly supported by Washington as a bulwark against the ayatollahs in Iran.

Things soured, of course, with his invasion of Kuwait, which he launched just days after U.S. Ambassador Glaspie visited him to warn that he should settle his border dispute with Kuwait by peaceful means.

Glaspie's promising diplomatic career naturally went into a tailspin after she was hung out to dry for following U.S. policy. A gifted Arabist, Glaspie worked in Somalia with the United Nations for a while, then worked in the State Department as director of the office of Southern African Affairs, a significant demotion.

There was no way she was going to get a Senate-confirmed post, but she did manage to get a job as consul general in beautiful Cape Town, in the late 1990s, and then, as diplomats often do, retired "in place" down there.

When we called last week, Glaspie, who raises horses in Cape Town, said she didn't want to share her thoughts on Saddam's demise. But she thanked us for calling.Wanted: Brave Writers

Excellent employment opportunity for nation-builders! The State Department has contracted DynCorp International, which has accumulated vast experience running that nifty police training program in Iraq, to create an army for the government of Liberia.

DynCorp, the job announcement says, "is to assist . . . in recruiting, training and equipping an armed military force from the ground up beginning with 2,000 personnel the first year, consisting of . . . two light motorized infantry battalions and a support battalion."

The specific job is for a "ministry of defense technical writer mentor," where you'll "write standard operating procedures for proposal to the ministry of defense" and do various other writing and communications tasks. The pay is "unspecified," but we're certain it will be competitive.

They're looking ideally for retired military or Defense or State department officials with "experience in Africa." Some places in the continent can be a bit dangerous at times, but not to worry. The ad highlights that "full medical and death and dismemberment coverage available." Dismemberment?Teaching History Without Elaboration

Sign up now! Former State Department counselor Philip Zelikow is teaching two history courses at the University of Virginia this semester, according to the school's Web site. One, History 100, is an introductory seminar entitled "Explaining the Choices of Government." Mmm . . . to surge or not to surge? To stand up or stand down? To cut or to run?

DOJ_NMG_0113269

The second course is about World War II. This "discusses the causes and course of the Second World War," the blurb says. "The importance of the war to modern history and the shadows it still casts over contemporary politics and culture need no elaboration." Must not be a high-credit course.A Job for the Commitment-Phobic

Job alert! Secretary of Labor Elaine Chao is looking for a new public-affairs chief. The incumbent, Randy Clerihue, announced in a Dec. 21 internal e-mail that he was leaving after barely three months in the job. This could set the world indoor record for brevity for a Senate-confirmed position.

"After careful consideration," Clerihue wrote, "I have decided to tender my resignation as assistant secretary for public affairs, effective by the end of January. This is not a decision I reached lightly, but the nature and demands of the job are such that I am finding it impossible to fulfill my duties to my family. . . . I do not know what I will be doing next, other than spending some quality time with my wife and three young boys."

Three young boys and no job? Must have wanted out quickly. Clerihue had been at the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. for more than four years before going to Labor, and he worked for think tanks, trade associations and the Hill before that. We're told he shouldn't have trouble finding a soft landing.

His replacement would be Chao's fourth public-affairs chief, not counting an acting chief in the early part of the administration. In the past 18 months or so, public-affairs departures include two deputy assistant secretaries and four press secretaries.

Outside Court, Roberts Hears Dissent (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. usually knows just the right thing to say, his star turn during his 2005 Senate confirmation hearings being Exhibit A.

But maybe not so with the blandly titled "2006 Year-End Report on the Federal Judiciary," issued, as he noted, on the typically slow news day of Jan. 1. He should rest assured that it has been noticed -- and roundly razzed by some in the legal punditry and that segment of the citizenry that likes to write angry letters to the editor and leave sputtering rants on the answering machines of reporters who write about the court.

Roberts devoted his entire address to the call for a pay raise for federal judges, a subject that he noted was not new, and one -- he didn't note this -- that might never be terribly popular with those who make less than $165,200 a year, which is what federal district judges and members of Congress make (Roberts's salary is $212,000).

There are plenty of people who agree with Roberts that judicial salaries should rise to attract and retain the brightest in the legal field. But his description of the issue as a "constitutional crisis" was too much for some.

"What should we say about a Chief Justice who suggests that it is a 'constitutional crisis' if Congress takes advantage of its constitutional prerogatives to refuse to raise the salaries of federal judges?" University of Texas law professor Sanford V. Levinson asked on the legal blog Balkinization. "As it happens, I agree with him that pay raises are long overdue, but not necessarily for members of the US Supreme Court, frankly, who have cushy jobs and are treated like kings and queens."

Matthew J. Franck chimed in on National Review Online: "According to the chief, things are bad enough that we have a 'constitutional crisis that threatens to undermine the strength and independence of the federal judiciary.' In a word: balderdash."

Nor did Roberts endear himself to public-interest lawyers, public defenders, prosecutors and other lower-paid government lawyers with his worry that the judiciary not become restricted to the independently wealthy or "people for whom the judicial salary represents a pay increase." They stopped reading before they got to "Do not get me wrong -- there are very good judges in both of those categories."

Still, not everyone reacted critically. The New York Times endorsed his plea, although its editorial said it was "tempting to dismiss as hyperbole the chief justice's characterization of this issue as a 'constitutional crisis.' "

More important, incoming Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) signaled his quick assent, saying, "I intend again to do what I can to convince Congress to fairly evaluate this issue and the chief's arguments, so that we can see what solutions may be possible."

Capitol Center Nears Completion (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — About 50 feet below the grounds of the U.S. Capitol, scores of workmen install polished marble, mahogany veneer and other finishing touches on what may qualify as one of America's most beautiful, and controversial, cellars.

DOJ_NMG_0113270

Two years after its scheduled opening date, and more than double its original price tag, the Capitol Visitor Center inches its way toward completion.

PHOTOS: The Capitol Visitor Center

"We'll essentially be done with construction in March," Architect of the Capitol Alan Hantman says. It will take at least six additional months to test more than 5,000 security alarms, sprinklers and other safety devices before the public can enter.

When the doors finally will open to the public is a major point of contention surrounding the project, which was originally scheduled to be finished in 2005. Hantman predicts a ribbon-cutting this fall, but auditors at the Government Accountability Office say the date will slip. "We think it's going to be early 2008," says Terrell Dorn of the GAO, the investigative arm of Congress.

The other sore point is cost. Government auditors estimate it will be close to $600 million. The original, 1999 price tag: $265 million.

Even some of those who have complained the loudest about the project's rising cost and lengthening delays admit to being wowed by the almost-finished result.

"It has been frustrating because of the cost overruns, but when all is said and done, it will be a great facility," says Sen. Wayne Allard, a Colorado Republican.

For the past two years, Allard has forced project officials to make monthly public appearances before an appropriations subcommittee to account for the pace and price of the work.

Allard says the project could have been done quicker and cheaper but "people will look back 50 years from now, and they'll say every dollar was worth it."

'Built for the people'

In terms of size and cost, the visitor center can be compared to another major government construction project farther down Pennsylvania Avenue. The cost of the Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center was put at $816 million when it was completed in 1998. That's the equivalent of more than $1 billion in today's dollars.

The 580,000-square-foot underground visitor center will give tourists, who now brave the elements in line for tours of the Capitol, a spectacular showplace in which to linger while they wait, as well as a chance to examine historic documents and artifacts now hidden for lack of exhibition space.

The eighth major expansion of the Capitol in its 213-year history, the visitor center may be the most ambitious since the 8.9 million-pound cast-iron dome was completed in 1863.

"We could have done this on the cheap, but we didn't," says Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., a leading proponent of the center. "This is the first addition of the Capitol that was built for the people and not the politicians."

Dorn of the GAO, whose audits have questioned the timetable and costs, concedes, "It's going to be really pretty when it's finished."

Others are less impressed. Rep. David Obey, a Wisconsin Democrat who now chairs the House Appropriations Committee, awarded the center "the golden drain award" in September to highlight what he considers the waste of money on the project.

"The final product will be full of glitzy stuff without addressing the real needs of this institution," Obey says. He calls the visitor center "a state of the art propaganda center."

From the time the project was conceived in the mid-1990s, the center has generated debate. Mica says many Republicans, including former House speaker Newt Gingrich, initially opposed the massive construction because of its cost.

That opposition evaporated after the fatal shooting of two Capitol Police officers by a gunman who burst into the Capitol in 1998. Critics such as Obey focus on the project's ballooning price tag — more than double the original estimate.

About $65 million in private donations was raised for the project. Efforts to raise private donations were halted after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Mica says that was in part because congressional leaders decided to put the project on a fast track and in part because they did not want to compete with fundraising for victims' families.

'Myriad obstacles'

Project supervisors blame the increased cost and delays on Congress' decision to expand the scope of the project. The Sept. 11 terrorist attacks created a need for additional security measures. And Congress decided to build 160,000 feet of additional office space.

Dorn agrees that the project changed in size but says costs and delays continue to pile up even though "Congress is not fiddling with the project at this point."

Tom Fontana, spokesman for the center, defends the work. He says it has moved as quickly and efficiently as possible given the "myriad obstacles and unforeseen conditions" involved in working on a historic site that is also a working government center.

Construction workers had to soundproof windows and calibrate their schedule to keep from disturbing Congress. They had to remove a 121,000-gallon cistern used for fire prevention at the turn of the 19th century and buried when pioneering landscape architect Frederick Law Olmsted created the Capitol grounds.

Hantman says "the biggest surprise" was the discovery of a well just outside the Capitol walls, where the center's containing wall was built.

The landmark status of the Capitol grounds posed other challenges. "We spent $2 million just on tree preservation," Fontana says.

Fontana says the end result will be worth it for the millions of people who visit the Capitol each year. Visitors will be able to watch movies, view exhibits and even get a bite to eat in the new center, where two 30-by-70-foot skylights will offer dramatic views of the Capitol dome. Other amenities include 26 public restrooms (there are five in the Capitol itself) and a movie theater.

The 20,000-square-foot Great Hall and a 16,500-square-foot exhibition hall will showcase statues and artifacts such as the Lincoln catafalque, the bier used to support the caskets of presidents who lie in state in the Rotunda.

The Library of Congress anticipates more than a threefold increase in visitor traffic when a direct underground tunnel is completed between its building and the Capitol Visitor Center.

Space for Congress

There will be more rooms for Congress to use, too, including a 450-seat auditorium wired for electronic voting, additional office space and more meeting rooms.

Congress added $88 million to the original project budget to build office space for the House of Representatives and Senate.

Above ground, the east plaza of the Capitol — formerly an asphalt lot where lawmakers parked wherever they wanted, according to Fontana — has been covered with 200,000 pink and gray granite paving stones.

The two bronze and granite misting fountains, which Olmsted designed to create a rainbow around the Capitol, have been dismantled, cleaned and reassembled. They had been turned off since the 1970s because they would soak tourists who lined up in the parking lot to wait for tours.

Designers hope members of Congress will not resume parking their cars there.

"We're trying to create a plaza that invites people to linger," Fontana says.

Hantman will end his 10-year term as the Capitol's architect in February.

Last year, Obey introduced a bill that would have taken all spending authority away from Hantman. The measure didn't make it through Congress, but Mica says he believes such legislation is a reason why Hantman did not seek reappointment to a second term. "It's a shame. He's been the whipping boy" for the project's cost and delays, Mica says.

The Capitol architect says he'll be vindicated by generations of visitors to come. "I'm very proud of what we've done," Hantman says. "This is a great project. It's a wonderful legacy to have."

Pay Raise Trails Private Sector (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

T his should be a good week for people who work for the federal government, though not as good as some might have wished. The annual base pay raise for most federal employees kicks in, increasing the median white-collar government salary in the region to $86,791.

That's not shabby. But this year's increase -- 2.64 percent in the Washington-Baltimore region -- is one of the smallest annual raises in recent years, and the raise doesn't go far in an area where the cost of living runs about 30 percent higher than the rest of the nation.

"There is no doubt that the federal government is being a little stingy this year," said Tim Priest, executive director of the Greater Washington Initiative, the economic development marketing affiliate of the Greater Washington Board of Trade. "If they continue with these meager pay increases, more and more people will shift to the private sector."

Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union, called the 2007 raise "very disappointing." The union represents white-collar professionals at the Internal Revenue Service, Securities and Exchange Commission, Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. and several other agencies.

"This time of year especially, as employees are considering career options and deciding whether they want to stay for the long term or the short term, they build that pay raise into their decision-making," Kelley said. She fears "more and more will decide that they are going to look elsewhere."

Federal pay raises, which are negotiated by the White House and Congress as part of the government's budget, shore up the region's economy every year.

The federal employee payroll was about $19.8 billion in the Washington-Baltimore region last year, about $76 million per work day. (The payroll includes base salary, locality adjustments and special pay for certain occupations, but not the cost of benefits.)

There are about 334,000 civil service employees (not counting the military, the intelligence agencies and the U.S. Postal Service) in the region. In addition to salaries, the government also makes pension payments to about 265,000 civil service retirees in the District, Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia. An additional 77,500 people in this region receive survivor benefits.

As the government takes on more complex responsibilities and increasingly relies on technology to deliver services, federal salaries are a crucial component in the competition for highly skilled workers. Government officials predict a surge in retirements in the next few years as baby boomers depart, and are concerned that agencies will not get their share of top-notch recruits in a region with low unemployment and strong job growth.

To some extent, Washington area federal employees are more fortunate than civil service workers elsewhere. The federal pay formula this year gives a larger increase to employees in areas where federal pay is the most behind private-sector salaries. As a result, most civil service employees will receive a 1.81 percent pay raise, the minimum this year.

Locally and nationally, it appears that the federal pay raise will end up below market rates.

A recent survey by Watson Wyatt Worldwide found that most corporations plan to increase salaries, not counting promotions and market adjustments, by an average 3.6 percent, said Laura Sejen, global practice director for the consulting firm, which specializes in personnel and financial management.

Many employers are reporting increased difficulty in attracting top performers and people with special skills, and that suggests the government should pay close attention to workforce retention, Sejen said.

"Pay is important. When pay is not competitive, employees are more inclined to look," she said. Pay is especially important to employees under 30 and was the most highly rated reason for leaving a company, the Watson Wyatt survey found.

Still, Sejen said, "we don't need to ring alarm bells because of one year of below-market increases" in the federal government.

Pay is but one factor in compensation packages, and the government's relatively generous health-care and retirement benefits will keep many employees from leaving, she said. Survey data also show that employees value "work-life balance" and are more likely to stay with organizations, such as the government, that offer flexible work arrangements.

"These are important contributors to an employee's decision to stay or leave," Sejen said.

But a federal pay raise below market rates carries some risk. "What the government is doing wouldn't drive employees out of the region, but might drive them out of the government," Priest said.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

Comrade Pelosi

Capitol Hill residents and congressional staffers alike are curious about large posters of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi that have gone up in the neighborhood.

Indeed, the posters are on display in several Pennsylvania Avenue Southeast bus shelters -- the sort of space frequently reserved for fashion models and movie stars. The poster is a close-up photograph of a smiling Mrs. Pelosi, and in extra-large type: "Congratulations Madame Speaker Nancy Pelosi."

Meanwhile, there is no indication (not even in the tiniest of print) who is sponsoring or paying for the posters.

"It's turned into a fun guessing game," Maggie Hall, who passes a Pelosi poster several times a day, told Inside the Beltway yesterday. "It's quite a topic of conversation in the coffee shops and watering holes on the Hill. You see people really getting up close to it, trying to find the name of the organization or individual who's put it up."

Inside the Beltway was unable to reach Metro's advertising department yesterday.

Sensational heist

As far as William Bennett is concerned, ongoing revelations and circumstances surrounding classified-document heists from the National Archives by former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger have gotten neither the attention nor the scrutiny they deserve.

To help right that wrong, Mr. Bennett, a former Republican Cabinet member-turned-radio talk-show host, is sponsoring a unique contest. Through his popular radio show, "Bill Bennett's Morning in America," he is offering $1,000 to the person who writes the most creative "Sandy Berger" lyrics to the tune of a popular song. (think "Bette Davis Eyes" as "Sandy Berger Lies," but there are infinite possibilities.)

Wannabe songwriters and contestants should go to www.bennettmornings.com for more information. Deadline for submissions is Friday, with the winner announced on Jan. 19. And yes, Inside the Beltway will publish the winning lyrics in their entirety.

Rising to Reagan

A leader's ascension to conservatism was described over the weekend by Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney in Sea Island, Ga., where the likely 2008 presidential contender addressed Awakening 2007, a conservative gathering created a dozen years ago to stimulate dialogue about important issues confronting America.

"Now, I wasn't always a Ronald Reagan conservative. Neither was Ronald Reagan, by the way," noted the Republican governor. "Perhaps some in this room have had the opportunity to listen, learn and benefit from life's experience -- and to grow in wisdom, as I have.

"My life experience convinced me that Ronald Reagan was right."

'Anti-elitist'

That was Michael Gerson, former chief speechwriter to President Bush from 2001 to 2006, discussing the president's "voracious" reading habits and related perceptions during a guest appearance on C-SPAN's "Q&A" with Brian Lamb last night.

"[A] couple of months ago it was leaked out by somebody that he was reading Albert Camus' 'The Stranger.' Does that track for what you know of George Bush?" asked Mr. Lamb.

"Sure," Mr. Gerson replied. "The president is a voracious reader and recommended to me a variety of books when I was at the White House, and gave them to me. He recommended to me ... 'A Godly Hero,' the biography of William Jennings Bryan, a book he'd read.

"Recommended to me ... the book on Martin Luther King and Lyndon Johnson, the relationship between the two men. And he recommended to me the pope's [Benedict XVI] book on relativism."

That left Mr. Lamb scratching his head.

"So, why then is his image one of -- you know, people scoff at the fact that he reads. And they say he's not very intelligent. I mean, you hear that. Where does that come from? And why? Does he want that kind of an image?" the interviewer asked.

"I don't know," Mr. Gerson reasoned. "Throughout his career, in some ways, he's benefited from being underestimated. ... The assumption would be that he, you know, that he would fail. And, of course, we succeeded in a variety of these settings, and certain people always seem to be shocked and surprised."

Offered Mr. Gerson: "I think the president is -- he's not anti-intellectual, but he is anti-elitist."

Puttin' on the Ritz

"I will be interviewed on [NBC's] 'Today' show [this] morning ... talking about the language of politics and the best words for the 2008 election. If for no other reason, tune in to see the most expensive clothing I have ever worn -- and why this will be the first and last time you'll ever see me in a suit."

-- Washington political pollster Frank Luntz, well-known for his casual tieless attire even at formal affairs and whose new book, "Words That Work: It's Not What You Say, It's What People Hear," is released today.

Agriwelfare (WP)

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

THE LAST TIME Congress took a long look at America's wasteful system of agricultural subsidies, we had to endure bushels of shallow rhetoric about how billions in largess would save the great American family farm. With this hefty crop of disingenuous sentimentality and equally hefty lobbying efforts from powerful agricultural interests, the result was a federal giveaway that did more to hurt small farmers than it did to help them.

The law that authorizes a range of unnecessary and ill-targeted agriculture programs is set to expire in September. So expect fronts for agribusiness, rural banks and farm insurers (and the members of Congress who accept their campaign contributions) to try and sell the same line again this year: Extend the programs or nail the coffin shut on America's heartland. It's about time to nail the coffin on that tired line instead.

The Post's Gilbert M. Gaul, Sarah Cohen and Dan Morgan reported last month that federal agricultural payments are in fact fueling a rapid consolidation of American farms into enormous agribusinesses. Larger farms get much more government money, which they then use to buy up more land. This increases land prices, raising the financial barriers to starting a new farm and pressuring small farmers to leave the market. The mere fact of farm consolidation is not objectionable; indeed, many large farms are pioneering technological and procedural improvements that increase efficiency. But decisions about who should be farming what and where should be left to the marketplace; the government should not distort the market to push smaller competitors out, especially at the price of $15 billion in annual subsidies.

Congress should overhaul the federal farm subsidy system. But that will not come easily. Recent installments of The Post's investigative series on agricultural payouts detailed the influence the farm lobby exerts on federal legislators, who have added a series of expensive giveaways to existing programs and successfully legislated away meaningful competition in certain agricultural markets, such as that for milk.

There are some signs that the lobby is losing strength. Democratic presidential hopeful and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack will campaign for subsidy reform, and groups such as the Club for Growth plan to spend millions for the cause. Perhaps this time a more reasonable farm policy will emerge.

OTHER NEWS:

Creation Of Jobs Beats Forecast (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve interest rate cuts are looking less likely after U.S. businesses created a stronger-than-expected 167,000 jobs in December and workers' wages rose at a rapid pace.

The unemployment rate remained at a low 4.5%, as more people entered the workforce looking for jobs, the Labor Department said Friday.

The good news on jobs was an unwelcome development for some stock traders, who had been betting that the Fed would soon begin trimming interest rates in response to slower economic growth. The Dow Jones industrial average fell more than 82 points to 12,398 in Friday trading.

"The payroll employment data in recent months read like a tale of two economies, in which it is the best of times for the service producing industries and the worst of times for goods producing industries," Richard Moody of Mission Residential said in an advisory.

Manufacturers shed 12,000 jobs in December and 72,000 during 2006. Construction employment fell by 3,000 overall in December, as a 5,800 decline in home-building employment was partially offset by gains elsewhere. Moody said the construction figure would have been worse except for unusually warm weather during the month.

Some of the fastest-growing industries in December were health care, education, financial services, and leisure and hospitality.

Further, the Labor Department revised its October and November figures to show stronger employment growth in those months than it initially projected. It was the latest in a string of revisions to the employment numbers that have made it difficult for economists to get a good read on the job market.

Overall, payroll employment rose by 1.8 million jobs in 2006, the Labor Department said. But economic growth slowed in the second half of the year, running at a 2% annual rate in the third quarter as the housing market slowed. Economists expect business activity to slowly increase through 2007.

In December, workers' paychecks rose 8 cents an hour, or 0.5%, to average $17.04. Hourly wages for payroll, non-supervisory workers grew by 4.2% in 2006.

That's welcome news for workers, whose wages lagged during much of the expansion after the 2001 recession, even as business profits soared. But rising wages can spark faster inflation.

The Fed raised rates steadily from mid-2004 to mid-2006 to blunt inflation, but it has left its target for a key short-term rate at 5.25% since June. The Fed next meets Jan 30-31.

"With wage growth hitting a six-year high and the pool of available labor contracting, we strongly doubt the Fed will change its bias that is currently toward (fighting) inflation," says John Ryding of Bear Stearns.

In another positive sign, the median duration of unemployment fell to 7.3 weeks from 8.6 weeks a year ago.

Why U.S. Should Root For Dollar To Weaken More (WSJ)

By Mark Whitehouse

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

Last year, the U.S. dollar did what economists had long predicted it would have to do: It fell in value against other currencies. And many believe that if Americans know what is good for them, they should be hoping for more of the same this year.

A weaker dollar creates plenty of hardships. Not only do European vacations get more expensive for Americans, so do Chinese-made television sets and other imported goods. For foreigners, a weaker dollar means their investments in the U.S. lose value. But in the eyes of economists, the more the dollar weakens, the more it helps alleviate one of the great worries of our time: The gaping U.S. current-account deficit.

The current account, which includes trade flows and other international payments, measures exactly how much Americans' spending is outpacing their income -- and how much they are borrowing from abroad to fill the gap. The U.S. is estimated to have rung up a deficit of about $900 billion in its current account last year. That is equivalent to nearly 7% of the U.S. economy -- a level that, if sustained, would cause the nation's foreign debts to pile up to dangerous levels.

A weaker dollar would help narrow the deficit by making U.S. exports more attractive to foreign buyers while making it costlier for Americans to buy products from abroad.

The fate of the dollar and the current account, which has worried economists for years, was a hot topic at this past weekend's annual meeting of the American Economic Association. A panel of prominent economists -- including Nobel Prize winner Robert Mundell of Columbia University, Harvard's Martin Feldstein and Kenneth Rogoff, Michael Mussa of the Peterson Institute for International Economics and Ronald McKinnon of Stanford -- held forth on the subject to a packed ballroom in Chicago.

"We clearly need a more competitive dollar," said Mr. Feldstein, who also heads the National Bureau of Economic Research. "The dollar is still very high -- too high to be sustained."

A tougher question is how far and how fast the dollar needs to fall. Some economists fear a sudden plunge will roil international markets and trigger a U.S. recession. Others believe a slower and more manageable adjustment is under way. They guess it could take a decline of 8% to 25% over as many as 10 years to get the U.S. current-account deficit down to a more sustainable level of 3% of gross domestic product.

In the past several years, the dollar's movements have played into the hands of those who believe the dollar's adjustment will be slow and not too painful. After gradually weakening from its 2002 peak, the dollar strengthened in 2005, even as the U.S. current-account deficit set records. In 2006, the U.S. currency weakened again, as evidence of improving economic growth in Europe prompted investors to put more money into euros. Friday, the dollar's value against a basket of U.S. trading partners' currencies was down 2% from a year earlier and 17% from its February 2002 high.

Jim O'Neill, chief economist at Goldman Sachs in London, applauded the currency's renewed slide. "I think it's good," he said. "It's all part of the growing evidence that the likelihood for international imbalances improving themselves has risen quite significantly."

A weaker dollar by itself won't be enough to resolve global imbalances. Many economists agree that Americans also will need to save more, either by spending less or by cutting the federal budget deficit. As of November, U.S. consumers' spending exceeded their disposable income by 1%. The nation's budget deficit is running at about 3% of GDP.

Stronger growth abroad could play a role in shrinking the current-account deficit by increasing U.S. exports, though some believe the benefits would be limited. In recent history, increases or declines in foreign consumption have had only about half the effect on U.S. exports as changes in U.S. consumption have had on U.S. imports, says Catherine Mann, an economics professor at Brandeis University in Massachusetts.

Beyond that, much depends on exactly which currencies the dollar weakens against. Economists view Asian currencies as most crucial because trade deficits with Asian countries account for more than half of the U.S. current-account gap. So far, the dollar's biggest retreat has been against the euro. Friday, a euro bought $1.30, up 7% from a year earlier. In the same period, the dollar weakened 3% against the tightly controlled Chinese yuan and has strengthened about 4% against the yen.

"You'd need the Asian currencies to do more of the adjusting," says Mr. Mussa, senior fellow at the Peterson Institute for International Economics in Washington.

With all the caveats taken into account, economists' estimates vary widely on how much the dollar would have to weaken to bring the current-account deficit into line. Mr. O'Neill is among the most optimistic. He thinks a 25% drop in the dollar's trade-weighted value from its February 2002 peak, combined with consumer spending slowing in the U.S. and accelerating abroad, would be enough to do the trick. With the dollar down 17% from its peak, that leaves only eight percentage points to go.

Mr. O'Neill's view depends in part on the idea that the U.S. has yet to fully benefit from the dollar's previous weakening, because changes in exchange rates tend to affect trade flows with a lag of as much as two years. Indeed, in inflation-adjusted terms, the U.S. current-account deficit has been stable as a percentage of GDP since late 2004.

Mr. Rogoff, a specialist in international economics at Harvard, sees a darker picture. He believes the dollar must fall at least another 20% from now and worries that the longer it takes, the greater the chances that some unforeseen shock -- such as a terrorist act or a housing-industry collapse -- will trigger a crash. "So far we've just seen a small ripple in the dollar and not the big tsunami that could hit someday," he says. "That's still a significant risk."

DOJ_NMG_0113276

As a result, many economists view any move toward a weaker dollar as a step in the right direction. Says John Huizinga, a professor of economics at the University of Chicago Graduate School of Business: "Any depreciation that's in a normal, observable range is good, because it leaves less depreciation to happen and lessens the likelihood of one of these crises."

Aging Bull (USNEWS)

By Paul J. Lim

U.S. News and World Report, January 7, 2007

It's as if Wall Street suddenly discovered Prozac.

On paper, there are plenty of reasons for investors to be anxious about the financial markets' prospects this year.

For starters, the global economic boom that drove international stock and commodity prices higher in recent years is starting to cool. Economists project global growth of 3.2 percent this year, down from 3.8 percent in 2006, while the U.S. economy will trail at about 2.5 percent.

Corporate profits, which have propped up stock prices here at home, are also expected to weaken. Earnings among companies in the S&P 500 index are expected to rise 9.3 percent in 2007, down from 15.4 percent last year.

And the stock surge is now over four years old, an age at which a typical bull market is put out to pasture.

Yet as 2007 kicks off, economists and market watchers are about as optimistic as they've been in recent memory. Eight out of 10 money managers polled by the Russell Investment Group predict that stocks will post their fifth consecutive positive year. One in three thinks the equity markets will return around 10 percent or more in 2007.

Jeffrey Kleintop, chief investment strategist for PNC Wealth Management, predicts the S&P 500 will climb to 1550 next year, about a 9 percent rise in the blue-chip index. Tobias Levkovich, chief U.S. equity strategist for Citigroup Investment Research, thinks the S&P could do even better-hitting 1600, for a 13 percent jump.

To be sure, high-single-digit or low-double-digit gains are simply in line with the stock market's historic average performance dating back to 1926, according to Ibbotson Associates. Last year, the S&P 500 returned 15.8 percent, its best year since 2003. And despite recession fears and a housing market slowdown, the Dow Jones industrial average hit a new all-time record in 2006 and is now poised to pierce the 13,000 level for the first time. "To hear investment managers tell it, Wall Street will belong to the bulls in 2007," says Randy Lert, Russell's chief portfolio strategist.

But "that's what bothers me," says James Paulsen, chief investment strategist for Wells Capital Management.

While optimism is always welcome, there's a fine line between confidence and wishful thinking. Jerry Webman, chief economist for OppenheimerFunds, says most market strategists, no matter their outlook for the economy, are finding reasons to be bullish about stocks.

"Oddly, the people who are bearish on the economy say that if the economy isn't great, the Federal Reserve will [cut rates] and the markets will be just fine," Webman says. "At the same time, people who say, 'Gee, the economy is much stronger than the headlines indicate,' think that earnings will stay strong and the stock market will be OK."

Optimism often leads to heightened expectations. And the greater the expectations, the greater the likelihood that the economy and markets will fall short.

This is why Stuart Schweitzer, global markets strategist for JPMorgan Asset & Wealth Management-who predicts stocks will rise modestly-says equity investors should brace themselves for "stomach-churning bumps."

Wall Street is already trimming estimates of corporate profit growth this year, Schweitzer notes. Six months ago, he says, analysts were forecasting S&P 500 profit growth of more than 10.5 percent. Since then, forecasts have fallen by more than a percentage point.

So, why are investors-who've historically preferred climbing walls of worry to ladders of hope-suddenly acting like Alfred E. ("What, me worry?") Neuman?

Part of it may have to do with history. This is the third year of President Bush's second term. Since World War II, notes Sam Stovall, chief investment strategist for S&P, the 500 index has never lost money in the third year of a presidential term. In fact, third-year gains have averaged 18 percent.

The bullishness may also stem from investors' recent experiences. There's an old saying on Wall Street: Investors tend to think that things will forever be the way they are.

Both the economy and corporate profits have recently proved far more resilient than expected. Last year, the economy weathered recession worries and a housing slowdown, as corporate America found a way to accelerate the pace of earnings growth. "Profits just continue to amaze analysts and strategists," says Jack Ablin, chief investment officer for Harris Private Bank.

DOJ_NMG_0113277

Today, investors aren't simply banking on a so-called soft landing for the domestic economy. "The market is bracing for the plane to circle the runway and take off again," says James Swanson, chief investment strategist for MFS Investment Management.

This optimism is reflected in continued risk-taking among investors, Swanson says. Toward the end of last year, the best-performing segments of the market were the riskiest: emerging-markets stocks, small-company stocks, and commodities. Shares of blue-chip companies, which were expected to lead the market, wound up laggards yet again (Page 73). The average large-cap growth fund rose just 7.3 percent in 2006, while small-cap growth funds surged 11.1 percent.

Many on Wall Street think a change is in the air. A Russell survey found that money managers are most bullish on large-cap growth stocks and favor blue-chip foreign stocks over emerging-markets shares.

Of course, investors made a similar bet at the start of 2006 and turned out to be wrong. So how can you tell whether the markets will be in a speculative or safety-seeking mood this year?

Keep an eye on relative growth overseas. The developed economies of western Europe, Japan, and the United States are predicted to trail considerably behind growth in the emerging markets. Stovall expects 2 percent economic growth in the "eurozone" nations and 1.9 percent in Japan, compared with 4.8 percent in Latin America, 5.9 percent in Europe's emerging economies, and 6.8 percent in Asia's developing countries. If the emerging markets continue to outpace the developed world, it should be another solid year for emerging-markets stocks and other speculative assets.

Heed the bond market. Right now, all eyes are on the Federal Reserve as investors try to guess when the central bank will start to cut rates to jump-start U.S. economic growth. But the Fed controls only short-term interest rates. And long-term rates, set by the bond market, have been the real story as of late.

"This is the only time in postwar history where a recovery has taken place ... without any rise in long-term borrowing costs," Paulsen says. This economic expansion began in November 2001, with 10-year treasury notes yielding about 4.7 percent. More than five years later-and after 17 Fed hikes in short-term interest rates-10-year treasury yields are almost unchanged.

So long as long-term borrowing costs remain cheap, Paulsen thinks there's a good chance that money will find its way to higher-risk, higher-return assets like small-cap stocks.

Don't forget the Fed. So far, the bond market has all but ignored the Fed, but stock traders would be foolish to follow. Fed rate decisions tend to quickly change the stock market's mood. Since World War II, Stovall says, the S&P 500 has declined an average of 2.2 percent in the six months leading up to the first in a series of Fed rate cuts. Yet in the six months after the first rate cut, stocks soared 11 percent on average. And 12 months after the Fed began to ease monetary policy, the S&P 500 has jumped 18.5 percent on average.

Check housing prices. Unlike last year, many investors are betting that the worst is over-or close to over-in the housing market. The National Association of Realtors predicts median sales prices of existing homes will keep sliding in the first quarter of 2007, then rebound.

But what if prices continue to fall? That could spell bigger troubles for consumers-and that's a recipe for unexpected problems in the U.S. economy.

Might want to keep that Prozac handy.

Outlook 2007 (USNEWS)

By James Pethokoukis

U.S. News and World Report, January 8, 2007

At times, 2006 seemed like one of those I Love the '70s episodes on VH1, except more depressing. A far-off war going badly, an unpopular president, higher oil prices, creeping inflation-not to mention a pungent whiff of actual stagflation as the economy slowed. There was even another Rocky film. The recent passing of two '70s notables, Nobel Prize-winning economist Milton Friedman and former President Gerald Ford, only added to the sense of deja vu.

But don't look for 2007 to be a rerun, at least as far as the economy goes. "The inflation scare of 2006 is over," declares Kenneth Beauchemin, U.S. economist at Global Insight. Now Beauchemin, who expects inflation to drift lower this year to 2 percent, is admittedly being a bit sarcastic. He never really bought into the notion that higher oil prices by themselves spawn an economywide price surge. "Oil shocks are never the proximate causes of inflation," Beauchemin says. "They are by definition short-term. But they set the table for a scare, and then the media [play] it up."

Yet in the minds of many people, at least those who remember the '70s, higher oil prices do equal inflation. "The Federal Reserve must guard against the emergence of an inflationary psychology that could impart greater persistence to what would otherwise be a transitory increase in inflation," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke told Congress last summer.

Stable prices. Although the Fed hasn't raised rates since June, it hasn't cut them either, despite a slowing economy (growth in gross domestic product fell to 2 percent in the third quarter from 5.6 percent in the first) and a sharp downturn in the housing market.

Making Bernanke's job easier in 2007 is recent good news about energy and housing, the main villains behind much of the stagflation talk. Oil prices are down nearly 25 percent from their high last summer, and even the latest core consumer price index report-the one excluding volatile housing and energy prices-was flat, showing that higher energy prices have failed to infect the rest of the economy. Over the past six months, the core rate is up just 1.1 percent on a yearly basis.

The worst might also be over in housing. Existing-home sales have risen in back-to-back months, and the damage seems to be relatively contained. Although the economy has grown at just a 2.3 percent annual rate in the past two quarters, according to First Trust Advisors, it has expanded at a brisk 3.3 percent rate excluding housing. There is "little evidence" that the ongoing weakness in the housing sector is spilling over to the broader economy, Simon Kwan of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco noted in a recent report, and there are tentative signs that the housing sector may be stabilizing.

Consumers still seem to be digging deep into their wallets. The recent 1 percent jump in monthly retail sales was "a game-changer for those positioned for an imminent hard landing for the U.S. economy," says Mike Englund of Action Economics.

So rather than stagflation, it seems plausible that the American economy will experience a pleasant mix of growth and price stability. Continued strong consumer spending lies at the heart of the consensus Wall Street economic forecast for 2007, which is for the economy to grow roughly 2.5 percent with moderating inflation. That sounds about right to Quincy Krosby, chief investment strategist at the Hartford. "With a job market like this one, it's pretty hard for me to forecast a recession," Krosby says.

The skimpy 4.5 percent unemployment rate, the lowest since the '90s boom, hardly indicates just how strong the job market is right now. The economy added an average of 161,000 new jobs a month through November. Then add 68,000 to that number-that's how much the Labor Department thinks it's been undercounting job growth. Lots of jobs mean stronger wage growth, which keeps consumers spending. Hourly wages were up nearly 3 percent after inflation through November, and real disposable personal income grew a solid 0.3 percent in November.

Good times. You also don't forecast a recession when corporate profits are surging. Adjusted pretax profits rose at a 17.7 percent annual rate in the third quarter, according to JPMorgan Chase. "The economic backdrop is a healthy one," says Bruce Kasman, the firm's chief economist.

So what is the Fed's next move? Judging by the 30-day federal funds futures contract traded at the Chicago Board of Trade, investors are betting that the Fed might cut rates by a quarter point some time in mid-2007. A hike in rates would be a nasty surprise, particularly to stock investors who are wagering on a soft landing. That bet is a big reason behind the Dow's late-2006 run to a record high. Wall Street will continue to obsessively pore over the inflation and housing data, especially, as it frets about the Fed overtightening.

Still, as the various economic reports trickle in during the first part of the year, get ready for a bumpy ride at times. "I think we will be struggling to make sense of the data," Krosby says. "Some days it will look like a recession is around the corner and the next that data will defy that conclusion." So just keep on truckin', brother. Everything's going to be copacetic.

The Greenback May Rebound (USNEWS)

By James Pethokoukis

U.S. News and World Report, January 7, 2007

Maybe writing about what's ahead for the dollar in 2007 is a poor use of space. After all, according to recent calculations by the Financial Times, the euro-which turned five years old this month-is set to overtake the greenback as the world's most popular currency.

But not so fast, Old Europe. What's gotten lost in all the euro hype is that the FT's financial figuring applies to notes in circulation: cold, hard cash. When it comes to currency-denominated assets, the dollar is still king. The United States runs the largest stock and bond markets in the world, and 66 percent of global foreign currency reserves are denominated in dollars-some $2.1 trillion-compared with only 25 percent in euros, according to the International Monetary Fund.

Yet the almighty dollar tanked as 2006 drew to a close. Since mid-October, the dollar has fallen 6 percent against the euro. With widespread concern about the sustainability of the gigantic $800 billion U.S. trade deficit-which requires continuing megapurchases of dollars-some dollar bears interpreted the recent decline as the beginning of a long-awaited greenback collapse. Perhaps foreign central banks, flush with dollars, would begin to dump the dollar en masse.

Cashing out. Dixon Fung, a currency trader at MG Financial, has a simpler, more benign explanation. "Traders just finally realized that we are at the end of a Fed tightening cycle," he explains. Higher U.S. interest rates have served to counterbalance America's huge trade deficit by paying foreign investors more to hold dollars. Now, with growth having slowed and the Federal Reserve Board on hold and perhaps ready to lower rates-and with its European Union counterpart raising them-it seemed a good time to sell. And while the dollar could dip a bit more, don't expect a full-fledged rout.

"The dollar probably should head lower, but it probably won't," says economist Robert Brusca of Fact and Opinion Economics. He notes, for instance, that China has no interest in dumping dollars and thereby starting a panic that would seriously devalue its $700 billion in U.S. government bonds and other dollar-denominated assets. And growth in the EU is forecast to slow in 2007, making that region less attractive to investors. Indeed, the dollar has started to strengthen of late. A surprise Fed rate hike would help even more. While some countries, such as China and the United Arab Emirates, may continue to diversify their foreign currency holdings, "nothing is going to replace the dollar anytime soon," Brusca says.

OPEC Cuts Likely To Buoy Oil Long Term (WSJ)

By Yee Kai Pin

Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

SINGAPORE -- The price of oil may have started 2007 by losing around 8% of its value, but the likelihood of a swift supply response from producers and a series of other factors are likely to underpin the price in the longer term.

Though supply will remain steady until the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries cuts output in a few weeks, analysts said expectations of sustained demand and a long list of geopolitical uncertainties will contribute to a firm oil price.

"I don't think the oil boom is over," said Victor Shum, a Singapore-based analyst at U.S. energy consultancy Purvin & Gertz Inc.

"If we look ahead six months, the sharp drop now will test OPEC's resolve [in cutting production]. That and a weakening U.S. dollar is encouragement for OPEC members to be more aggressive in terms of supply discipline," he said.

Crude-oil contracts for February delivery ended a two-day plunge in the U.S. Friday, rising 72 cents, or 1.3%, to $56.31 a barrel -- still off 7.8% on the week at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

The bearish tone has been set in recent days amid an unseasonably balmy winter in key heating regions such as the U.S. and Japan, and at a time when oil-product inventories in these major markets are relatively ample.

"It is still a little too early to talk of a price crisis, but the market does appear to be on the threshold of one," Paul Horsnell, head of energy research at investment bank Barclays Capital, said in a report.

OPEC, which pumps about two-thirds of the world's crude and is widely expected to defend oil at $60 a barrel, is already expressing concern with the price free-fall.

"OPEC ministers are watching the market vigilantly," Hossein Kazempour Ardebili, Iran's governor to the producers' group, said last week.

"If these prices persist or there is a continued decline on the horizon, then the group would consider meeting," he said, adding that policy consultations can also take place by telephone.

The group in mid-December agreed to cut output by 500,000 barrels a day beginning Feb. 1, its second decision in three months to cut back, to forestall the usual seasonal decline in demand after the Northern Hemisphere winter.

However, partly because members have failed to fully implement their earlier plan to rein in 1.2 million barrels a day, traders have cast doubt on the follow-through action.

Ahead of the group's next scheduled meeting March 15, five ministers, including de-facto leader Ali Naimi of Saudi Arabia, will huddle in less than two weeks on the sidelines of an industry conference in New Delhi.

This may provide the group another chance to signal to the market its readiness to step in.

Nymex crude "may go down a bit further because of the momentum, but I think we're looking at a low point already," said Mr. Shum of Purvin & Gertz, predicting a trading average between $60-$65 a barrel in the first half of 2007.

Meanwhile, the global oil market continues to be saddled with a growing list of uncertainties.

Despite talk of "geopolitical fatigue," long-running supply disruptions in Nigeria and Iraq as well as the war of words between the U.S. and Tehran over Iran's nuclear program are still key to the supply outlook.

Stem Cells In Amniotic Fluid Show Great Promise, Study Says (LAT)

By Karen Kaplan

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

Researchers have found stem cells in human amniotic fluid that appear to have many of the key benefits of embryonic stem cells while avoiding their knottiest ethical, medical and logistical drawbacks, according to a study published today.

The stem cells -- easy to harvest from the fluid leftover from amniocentesis tests given to pregnant women -- were able to transform into new bone, heart muscle, blood vessels, fat, nerve and liver tissues, the study said.

DOJ_NMG_0113280

"So far, we've been successful with every cell type we've attempted to produce from these stem cells," said Dr. Anthony Atala, director of the Institute for Regenerative Medicine at Wake Forest University School of Medicine in Winston-Salem, N.C., and senior author of the report published online by the journal Nature Biotechnology.

The finding points to a promising avenue of research that sidesteps the hurdles facing embryonic stem cell research, which has been stymied by moral objections to the destruction of embryos that occurs when the cells are harvested.

Most of the work involving human embryonic stem cells is ineligible for the more than $25 billion the federal government spends on research each year. But amniotic fluid stem cell studies are already being funded by the National Institutes of Health.

The study also suggests another advantage: Unlike embryonic cells, which can form tumors when implanted in lab animals, amniotic fluid stem cells do not appear to do so.

"If everything that people think about them turns out to be true, they'll be a powerful source for therapeutic cells," said Alan Russell, director of the McGowan Institute for Regenerative Medicine at the University of Pittsburgh, who wasn't involved in the study.

It is still unclear whether stem cells from amniotic fluid -- the liquid that cushions babies in the womb -- can give rise to the full range of cell types that embryonic stem cells can produce.

"They can clearly generate a broad range of important cell types, but they may not do as many tricks as embryonic stem cells," said Dr. Robert Lanza, a prominent embryonic stem cell researcher and head of scientific development at Advanced Cell Technology Inc. in Worcester, Mass.

But even if the amniotic fluid stem cells turn out to be less flexible, they may still be an important tool in the nascent field of regenerative medicine.

Dr. Dario Fauza, coordinator of the surgical research laboratories at Children's Hospital Boston, has already used the cells to grow tissue to repair defective diaphragms and tracheas in sheep.

He has asked the Food and Drug Administration for permission to do the same for children born with herniated diaphragms. It would be the first human clinical trial involving amniotic fluid stem cells, he said.

Two Swiss scientists, Dr. Dorthe Schmidt and Dr. Simon Hoerstrup of University Hospital Zurich have also used amniotic fluid stem cells to grow heart valves. They are currently testing them in sheep.

The stem cells "may not be as earth-shattering a discovery as human embryonic stem cells, but these cells could prove to be equally important for medical therapy," Lanza said. "I think this is an exciting breakthrough."

Amniotic fluid stem cells lie somewhere between the two major categories of stem cells: embryonic and adult.

Embryonic stem cells are derived from days-old embryos. Nearly all of the development is still to come, so those cells must be extremely flexible.

That trait, called "pluripotency," is the reason researchers believe embryonic stem cells could offer cures for a wide range of ailments. They envision using the cells to replace the faulty islet cells that leave diabetes patients without enough insulin and to grow fresh brain tissue to treat stroke victims, among other things. But they don't yet know how.

Adult stem cells are narrowly focused on replenishing specific types of tissue that wear out over the course of a lifetime, such as skin, hair and blood. Researchers all over the world are looking for ways to expand their range of capabilities.

Amniotic fluid stem cells, which are sloughed off by the developing fetus, are "a different kind of a stem cell," Atala said. "It's not as early as a human embryonic stem cell and it's not as late as the adult stem cells."

Scientists surmised that amniotic fluid would contain those cells more than a decade ago and identified them after several years of searching.

Atala and his colleagues set out to determine just how plentiful and flexible these stem cells might be.

The researchers studied 10-milliliter samples of fluid extracted from pregnant women who had amniocentesis tests to screen their babies for genetic abnormalities. Those tests are routinely performed early in the second trimester.

Of the myriad cells that make up amniotic fluid, the researchers found about 1% had a surface marker that is a hallmark of embryonic stem cells. They took it as a signal that the cells might possess pluripotent abilities.

The researchers from Wake Forest and Harvard Medical School biochemically prompted the cells to transform into all the main categories of embryonic tissue.

A key test was to see if the cells functioned like normal cells.

Stem cells that had been induced to become neural cells were able to secrete a neurotransmitter when stimulated by potassium ions, mimicking conditions inside the brain, the researchers reported. They also induced stem cells to develop into liver cells that were able to secrete urea, a compound produced in the liver.

Other stem cells that had been coaxed into becoming osteoblasts, which build up bone, were implanted in mice. The cells formed a tissue that was more dense than normal mouse bone, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0113281

"You may be able to obtain the same medical benefits -- and cure the same diseases -- without the risks or controversy associated with embryonic stem cells," said Lanza of Advanced Cell Technology. "It's just what the doctor ordered."

The cells did not form the tumors -- jumbles of tissue that can include bits of fat, hair and teeth -- that are common with embryonic stem cells, the researchers said.

"That's one of the biggest issues the FDA will be concerned about when it comes time to approve stem cell-based therapies," Russell added.

But Larry Goldstein, a professor of cellular and molecular medicine at UC San Diego who studies embryonic stem cells, said the absence of tumors might signal a limitation of stem cells derived from amniotic fluid. "It makes me wonder how pluripotent they are," he said.

Though the cells might prove useful in some circumstances, Goldstein said, they aren't a substitute for embryonic stem cells. "They built a screwdriver here, but I need a wrench," he said.

The technology described in the study is owned by Wake Forest University Baptist Medical Center and controlled by Plurion Inc., a biotech start-up in Winston-Salem. Atala serves on Plurion's board and directs its scientific advisory panel.

The researchers, whose study was primarily funded by the Joshua Frase Foundation and the Crown Foundation of the March of Dimes, reported that they have found similar stem cells in samples of chorionic villus -- a part of the placenta that is sometimes biopsied during pregnancy as an alternative to amniocentesis -- and of placentas obtained after birth.

Stem cells could one day be routinely extracted from placentas and stored in case they are needed to create genetically matched tissues during a baby's lifetime, Atala said.

Amniotic fluid stem cells could also be used to build a stem cell bank. It would take about 100,000 cell samples to obtain enough genetic diversity to cover 99% of the U.S. population, he said.

Stem Cells Extracted From Amniotic Fluid (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, January 8, 2007

Researchers have been able to derive human stem cells from the amniotic fluid surrounding babies in the womb, potentially providing a source of stem cells that is easily available and uncontroversial.

The amniotic stem cells grew readily into independent cell lines, or colonies, doubling in just 36 hours, the paper says. It was published in Sunday's edition of the journal Nature Biotechnology.

The researchers at the Wake Forest University School of Medicine in Winston-Salem, N.C., were able to get the amniotic cells to differentiate into fat, bone, muscle, blood, nerve and liver cells.

Stem cells can develop into almost all cell types and serve as the repair system for the body.

Such cells created from early-stage human embryos, called embryonic stem cells, have shown the greatest potential for turning into any cell needed. But they are controversial because making them requires destroying the embryo. President Bush cut all federal funding for research into new human embryonic cell lines in 2001.

The amniotic cells are neither human embryonic stem cells nor adult stem cells, which are slightly less resilient, says lead researcher Anthony Atala, director of Wake Forest's Regenerative Medicine and Tissue Engineering Institute.

"They're something in between," he says.

One advantage is that these cells, unlike embryonic stem cells, don't form tumors when implanted into mice.

Though much research into the safety and effectiveness of these potential embryonic stem cell substitutes still needs to be done, the huge advantage would be that they can be easily harvested from both amniotic fluid as well as placental tissue after a baby is born.

The scientists were also able to obtain similar stem cells from prenatal chorioni villius biopsies, commonly done on older women to test for chromosomal abnormalities such as Down syndrome.

If a family "banked" a baby's amniotic stem cells at birth by freezing them, they could provide a potential line of stem cells to treat diseases the child might develop later, Atala says.

But even more important, because amniotic fluid is so easy to harvest, it would make it possible to create thousands of cell lines.

"If you banked 100,000 specimens, you'd be able to provide cells for 99% of the U.S. population with a perfect match for genetic transplantation," Atala says.

Says Robert Lanza of Advanced Cell Technology, a biotechnology firm working to commercialize human stem cell technology: "Just 100 lines will match half the U.S. population. It's an exciting breakthrough."

Scientists See Potential In Amniotic Stem Cells (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0113282

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

A type of cell that floats freely in the amniotic fluid of pregnant women has been found to have many of the same traits as embryonic stem cells, including an ability to grow into brain, muscle and other tissues that could be used to treat a variety of diseases, scientists reported yesterday.

The cells, shed by the developing fetus and easily retrieved during routine prenatal testing, are easier to maintain in laboratory dishes than embryonic stem cells -- the highly versatile cells that come from destroyed human embryos and are at the center of a heated congressional debate that will resume this week.

Moreover, because the cells are a genetic match to the developing fetus, tissues grown from them in the laboratory will not be rejected if they are used to treat birth defects in that newborn, researchers said. Alternatively, the cells could be frozen, providing a personalized tissue bank for use later in life.

The new cells are adding credence to an emerging consensus among experts that the popular distinction between embryonic and "adult" stem cells -- those isolated from adult bone marrow and other organs -- is artificial.

Increasingly, it appears there is a continuum of stem cell types, ranging from the embryonic ones that can morph into virtually any kind of tissue but are difficult to tame, up to adult ones that can turn into a limited number of tissues but are relatively easy to control.

The newly analyzed fetal stem cells, scientists said, have many of the advantages of both.

"They grow fast, as fast as embryonic stem cells, and they show great pluripotentiality," meaning they can become many kinds of tissues, said study leader Anthony Atala, director of the Institute for Regenerative Medicine at Wake Forest University School of Medicine in Winston-Salem, N.C. "But they remain stable for years without forming tumors," he added, something that embryonic cells are not very good at.

Atala and other scientists emphasized that they don't believe the cells will make embryonic stem cells irrelevant.

"There's not going to be one shoe that fits all," said Robert Lanza, scientific director at Advanced Cell Technology in Worcester, Mass. "We're going to have to see which ones are most useful for which clinical conditions."

George Daley, a Harvard stem cell researcher, echoed that sentiment. "They are not a replacement for embryonic stem cells," he said.

But in the past, even hints that non-embryonic cells might have medical potential similar to embryonic ones have complicated the political push to expand federal funding for the controversial field. And accordingly, opponents quickly pounced on the new results.

"This is wonderful news," said Richard Doerflinger, deputy director of pro-life activities at the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, which opposes research that depends on embryo destruction. "It doesn't require harming anyone or destroying life at any stage."

Last year, President Bush vetoed a bill that would have allowed federal funding of research on stem cells from embryos discarded by fertility clinics. The newly Democratic Congress has promised to send the same or a similar bill to Bush's desk with even greater majorities early this term, with the House slated to vote on the matter this week.

The new work, described in yesterday's online edition of the journal Nature Biotechnology, shows that "amniotic fluid-derived stem cells" can be isolated as early as 10 weeks after conception from fluid extracted during tests widely done to detect birth defects.

In the laboratory, the amniotic cells can mature into all of the major types of cells, dividing at the impressive clip of once every 36 hours yet never showing signs of aging and never becoming tumors -- even after living for more than two years in the lab.

With co-workers from Wake Forest and from Children's Hospital in Boston, Atala coaxed the cells to become brain cells and injected them into the skulls of mice with diseased brains. The new cells filled in diseased areas and appeared to make new connections with nearby healthy neurons.

When coaxed to become bone cells and seeded onto a gelatin scaffold that was then implanted in a mouse, the cells calcified and turned into dense, healthy bone.

Under other conditions they became muscle, fat, blood vessel and liver cells.

Atala said that if 100,000 women donated their amniotic cells to a bank, that would provide enough cells of sufficient genetic diversity to provide immunologically compatible tissues for virtually everyone in the United States. With more than 4 million U.S. births a year, it would not take long to collect that many specimens, he said -- especially because the cells can be found not only in amniotic fluid but also in the placenta, which is discarded after birth.

The rights to certain patent claims relating to the cells have been licensed to Plureon Corp. of Winston-Salem, a privately held company on whose board of directors Atala sits.

Although several stem cell experts applauded the work, some questioned the novelty of the newly described cells. Similar cells have been under study for years with little fanfare, they noted. And though Atala's careful characterization of them is better than any previously done, they said, it is not clear that his cells are truly different than ones others have in hand.

At Children's Hospital in Boston, for example, Dario Fauza, a pediatric surgeon, has been cultivating similar cells and getting them to grow into cartilage, which he has used to repair defective windpipes in newborn sheep. He has also grown the cells into tendon tissue that was used to repair defective diaphragms in sheep.

Fauza is seeking Food and Drug Administration permission to try the method in children diagnosed with birth defects while in the womb. He hopes to grow replacement tissues from their own amniotic cells and use those tissues to repair their defects after birth.

"Typically, you don't do anything until the child is born, and then you are scrambling to fix it," Fauza said. "Why not take out some amniotic fluid, which we do routinely anyway, and engineer a tissue in parallel during the remainder of gestation so he or she will have a tissue by the time he or she is born?"

Population Shift Likely To Boost GOP (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

Ongoing population shifts from the North to the Sun Belt states will benefit Republicans more than Democrats in future House races and could enlarge the Republican Party's electoral count in presidential elections, political analysts say.

Analysts say Democrats have offset the Republicans' Sun Belt advantage with gains in the Northeast and parts of the South and Southwest, but that the size of the migration by the end of this decade likely will give the edge to Republicans.

"I think on balance the Republicans will benefit from the larger number of seats in the Sun Belt region. They won't get 100 percent of it, but more than the Democrats do," said Merle Black, a longtime analyst of Southern politics at Emory University in Georgia.

Projections of the number of Americans moving from the Democrat-dominated Northeast to the more Republican-friendly Southern and Western states "show that seven congressional seats in 13 states have already changed at this point in the decade," according to an analysis by Election Data Services, a firm that studies how population shifts affect redistricting changes under congressional reapportionment.

It forecasts a loss of House seats in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Missouri, Iowa and Louisiana, gains of one seat each in Florida, Georgia, Arizona, Nevada and Utah, and a gain of two seats in Texas.

Another analysis shows an even larger "probable" shift of House seats from the North to the Sun Belt, according to Polidata, a Virginia-based demographic and political research firm.

Under these "probable changes," 13 seats could shift among 19 states, with eight gainers and 11 losers. "All the gainers are in the South and West and all the losers are in the East and Midwest except Louisiana," the Polidata study said.

Leading the "biggest gainers" would be Texas, with four additional seats. Polidata projects gains of two seats each in Florida and Arizona and one each in Georgia, Utah, Nevada, Oregon and Washington.

The biggest losers would be New York and Ohio, with two seats each. Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Illinois, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri and Louisiana each would lose one.

Because each state's electoral votes are based on its representation in Congress, the shift in House seats to the Sun Belt regions, where Republicans are strongest in presidential elections, would mean increased clout in the Electoral College, too.

"Overall, given a 2004 electoral vote of 286 [for President] Bush to 252 [for Sen. John] Kerry, the vote count based upon these 2010 projections would have been 292 Bush, 246 Kerry, a gain of six for the Republican ticket," Polidata's report said.

Independent analysts predict House seat gains in the Southwest and the South -- which with 131 seats is the largest regional delegation in the country -- but said Republican strength declined in the South and in the Northeast in the 2006 election.

The number of House seats for Southern Republicans fell in November from 82 to 77, Mr. Black said, while Democrats increased their number from 49 to 54. In the Northeast, a rash of Republican congressional losses from New Hampshire to Pennsylvania gave 68 House seats to Democrats and 24 to Republicans.

The House seat shifts will not take place until after the 2010 census, when states redraw congressional boundaries in time for the 2012 elections.

"We don't really know the demographics that are driving the in-and-out migration in these states," said political analyst Rhodes Cook. "Some of them could be more affluent white conservatives, but they might be Hispanics who tend to vote more Democratic."

Biden Dispels Doubt: He'll Join 2008 Race (USAT)

USA Today, January 8, 2007

Sen. Joseph Biden said Sunday that he is seeking the Democratic nomination for president and thinks he can hold his own against potential high-profile rivals such as fellow Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama. "I am running for president," Biden said on NBC's Meet the Press. "I will file for an exploratory committee before the month is out."

The filing will allow him to raise money while he gauges support for his candidacy.

Biden is the new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. He has promoted a detailed plan for peace in Iraq that would divide the country along ethnic lines.

The Delaware Democrat long has made clear his intentions to again seek the White House. His first presidential bid collapsed 20 years ago amid allegations he plagiarized a campaign speech from then-British Labor Party leader Neil Kinnock.

Biden has about $3.5 million in his campaign account and has campaigned extensively in early voting states such as New Hampshire, Iowa, South Carolina and Nevada.

Army apologizes for recruiting blunder

The Army blamed a computer mix-up for recruitment letters mistakenly sent over the holidays to the families of 275 officers killed or wounded in Iraq.

"Every Army leader is just sick that this happened," said Gen. Richard Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff.

"This is an inexcusable mistake. Five years into this war, the Army can do better than this — and we will."

Cody said the Army used the wrong database in mailing letters between Christmas and New Year's Day to more than 5,100 Army officers who recently left the service. Included were 200 officers wounded in action and 75 killed in action.

That is more than one-third of all Army officers who have died in Iraq since the war began. The letters encourage the officers to consider returning to active duty. Cody said the Army was contacting each family to offer a personal apology.

Biden Says He Can Run With '08 Rivals (AP)

AP, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON - Democratic Sen. Joe Biden promoted his presidential bid on Sunday, saying he thinks he can hold his own against potential high-profile rivals such as fellow Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama.

"I'll be Joe Biden and I'll try to be the best Biden I can be," the 64-year-old Delaware lawmaker said. "If I can, I have a shot. If I can't, I lose."

Biden said he will set up an exploratory committee by the end of the month that will help him raise money and gauge support for his candidacy.

Biden, who long has made clear his intentions to seek the White House in the wide-open race, has about $3.5 million in his campaign account. He has campaigned extensively in early voting states such as New Hampshire, Iowa, South Carolina and Nevada.

"I am running for president," he said on "Meet the Press" on NBC. "I will file for an exploratory committee before the month is out."

Considered one of his party's most experienced spokesmen on international affairs, Biden is the new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

He plans a series of hearings on the Iraq war and has promoted a detailed plan for peace in Iraq that would divide the country along ethnic lines.

Biden's first presidential bid collapsed 20 years ago amid allegations he plagiarized a campaign speech from then-British Labor Party leader Neil Kinnock.

Biden Declares Bid For 2008 Democratic Presidential Nomination (BLOOM)

By Joe Sobczyk

Bloomberg, January 8, 2007

Jan. 7 (Bloomberg) -- Senator Joseph Biden said he will seek the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008 and plans to file paperwork that will allow him to begin raising money.

The Delaware Democrat has said for months that he was trying to determine whether he would have enough political and financial support to make a bid for the presidency. Now he is taking the next step, setting up an exploratory committee.

``I am running for president," Biden said on NBC's ``Meet the Press" program.

The first test in the race, the Iowa Caucuses, is a little more than a year away. Former North Carolina Senator John Edwards, the Democratic vice presidential nominee in 2004, former Iowa Governor Tom Vilsack and Representative Dennis Kucinich of Ohio have formally declared their candidacies.

DOJ_NMG_0113285

Other potential candidates include Senators Hillary Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois, both of whom have been visiting states where the first nominating contests will be held. Neither has announced their intentions.

Biden, 64, first elected to the Senate in 1972, took over as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee with the swearing-in of the new Democratic-controlled Congress last week. He has been a vocal critic of President George W. Bush's Iraq policies and backs a proposal to divide Iraq into three semi- autonomous regions among Sunni and Shiite Muslims and the Kurds.

A Gallup Organization poll taken last month found Clinton favored as her party's nominee by Democratic voters. She got support from 33 percent, followed by Obama with 20 percent and former Vice President Al Gore with 12 percent. Biden got support from 3 percent, behind the 2004 Democratic nominee, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Biden's last bid for the presidency, in 1988, was derailed after he failed to credit portions of a speech that he had adapted from a U.K. politician.

Among Republicans, Senator John McCain of Arizona, former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani and former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney have formed exploratory committees, an initial step toward building a campaign organization.

Biden Joins List Of Presidential Contenders (NYT)

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 7 — Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware on Sunday became the fourth Democrat to formally announce plans to run for president next year.

“I am running for president,” Mr. Biden said toward the end of an appearance on “Meet the Press” on NBC.

“I’m going to be Joe Biden, and I’m going to try to be the best Biden I can be,” he said. “If I can, I got a shot. If I can’t, I lose.”

He said he would file paperwork by the end of the month to establish an exploratory committee to gather support for his bid.

Mr. Biden, who was first elected to the Senate in 1972, also sought the presidential nomination in 1988. But he dropped out of the race after admitting that he had used speeches by other politicians without attribution, and after reports that he had plagiarized while in law school.

Mr. Biden, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, joins a widening field of Democratic presidential hopefuls. The others who have officially announced their candidacies are former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina, Representative Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio and Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa.

Other potential Democratic contenders include Senators Hilary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois. Among Republicans, Senator John McCain of Arizona, former Gov. George E. Pataki of New York and Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former New York City mayor, are expected to run.

Patrick Says He Would Support Kerry If He Seeks Presidency Again (BOS/AP)

By Glen Johnson

The Boston Globe, January 8, 2007

BOSTON --Sen. Barack Obama visited Massachusetts three times last year to campaign for Deval Patrick. The husband of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, former President Bill Clinton, appointed Patrick to the top Justice Department civil rights post during the 1990s.

But the state's new governor says he would have to support Sen. John Kerry over Obama or Mrs. Clinton should the Massachusetts Democrat make a second run for the presidency.

"They are very, very strong people," Patrick said of his three fellow Democrats during an appearance aired Sunday on WHDH-TV's "Urban Update." "I will tell you that if my home senator runs, I've got to be with him. I love the other candidates, but we will see. I don't know that he has made a decision yet."

In October, Patrick called a similar question "premature" after Kerry campaigned for him at the Perkins School for the Blind in Watertown.

Obama, an Illinois Democrat still in his first term in Congress, and Clinton, a New York Democrat just sworn into her second term, are weighing campaigns in 2008, as is Kerry.

Kerry has pledged to announce a decision about a second campaign in the near future, perhaps this month. He is up for re-election in 2008, and some local Democrats are urging him to decide whether he wants to seek re-election or wage a second presidential campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0113286

The senator has suggested the calendar and state election law would allow him to do both, at least until he learned the outcome of early primaries and caucuses.

Kerry's senior colleague, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., signaled impatience with his fellow senator in December, saying his support was not guaranteed and he did not want to wait "indefinitely" for a decision. Kennedy later declared he would support Kerry should he declare his candidacy "in the near term."

In 2004, Kennedy was one of Kerry's most ardent supporters, despite a close personal relationship with then-Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who also was seeking the Democratic presidential nomination.

Edwards, who lost his bid but ended up being Kerry's vice presidential running mate, has already declared his candidacy for their party's 2008 presidential nomination.

A Candidate's Not-So-Candid Camera? (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

John Edwards is ridiculing his political consultants.

"You know, they gave me a really great memo," he says, waving the document, which advises him to highlight the importance of public education when addressing teachers. "I pay a lot of money for people who have the expertise to tell me this."

An unscripted moment caught on a cellphone camera? Not exactly. The video of the presidential candidate chatting on his plane is on Edwards's Web site. The former senator seems unusually frank about the absurdities of political life -- or is this just carefully choreographed candor, packaged for the YouTube age?

The 2008 campaign is "totally going to be on steroids this time in terms of what a candidate can do," says Joe Trippi, who masterminded Howard Dean's Internet-driven bid in 2003 and 2004. "You're going to see reality, and you're going to see savvy manipulation under the guise of something that's authentic and real." But Trippi warns against candidates' secretly scripting such moments: "If you get caught, you're dead."

Veteran journalist and blogger Jeff Jarvis says that "candidates will try to look more transparent, whether they are or not. Obviously, you're not going to put something out there that's not flattering. If the casual moments come from the campaign, I can recognize them for what they are."

Mathew Gross, Edwards's Internet strategist, says the campaign is "trying to reach an audience that is increasingly segmented into different channels . . . You peel away the artifice of the campaign to show what's really happening."

Edwards's second bid for the White House, announced shortly after Christmas, was overshadowed by the death of Gerald Ford and the hanging of Saddam Hussein. But Edwards generated plenty of online buzz by hiring friendly bloggers or paying their travel expenses, which would be ethically unacceptable for mainstream journalists.

"We live in a world in which everybody has the power to capture and then broadcast," says Gross, a Dean campaign veteran, noting that the bloggers have full editorial control over their own words and pictures.

Edwards has gone deep into the blogosphere, posting profile pages on MySpace and Facebook and fielding questions -- with his wife, Elizabeth -- on the popular liberal site Daily Kos. His daughter Cate also blogs on the campaign site.

What's striking about the "Webisode," in which Edwards chats on his plane with a freelance video crew, is that it looks like a television documentary, with quick-cut editing and a jerky handheld camera. Edwards, in a work shirt and jeans, is seen chatting with others, not looking at the camera. He says he wants to be judged "based on who I really am, not based on some plastic Ken doll. . . . You're trained to be careful. You're trained to close off, if it feels sensitive, if it feels personal. . . . We're conditioned to saying the same thing, we're conditioned to saying what's safe, we're conditioned to be political, and it's hard to shed all that."

The campaign hired Andrew Baron, founder of the satirical news site Rocketboom.com, to provide advice and to shoot Edwards's announcement video, which was posted on YouTube the night before the candidate personally declared his candidacy in New Orleans. Rocketboom also conducted a separate interview for its Web site, consisting of such softball questions as "What is the John Edwards candidacy about?"

Baron says Rocketboom "is not a journalistic platform" and sets its own ethical standards. As for Edwards, Baron says by e-mail, "this is his opportunity, along with all of ours, to use the video medium to show who he really is/we really are."

Chuck Olsen, a Minnesota freelancer paid for his work by Rocketboom and the campaign, writes on his blog: "For what it's worth I'm convinced Edwards is a passionate, smart, authentic person who would make a great president."

Robert Scoble, a blogger and former Microsoft staffer, paid his own way -- except for the flights on the Edwards campaign plane during the multi-city announcement tour that began in New Orleans. "Was I used by the campaign? Absolutely," he writes on his blog. "I was there to give a different look at the campaign than the Washington Post or CNN could give." Responding to criticism by another blogger who accused him of "doing exactly what his handlers wanted, namely, giving Edwards pseudo-legitimacy among the technophile idiots," Scoble says, "I got to know his staff instead of trying to ask a question that'd get Edwards angry or give me an answer that he wouldn't give Matt Lauer on the 'Today' show."Small is Beautiful?

The slimmed-down Wall Street Journal looked colorful but cramped last week after debuting at its reduced size, with a huge "What's News" digest and a display ad squeezing the front-page stories into three remaining columns. But the more important development has nothing to do with the money-saving layout.

"The culture here has changed dramatically in the last few years," says Managing Editor Paul Steiger. He says 80 percent of the paper's articles will now stress analysis, interpretation or feature writing, with only 20 percent of the what-happened-yesterday variety. As if to underscore the shift, the lead of Thursday's paper was an opinion column by Alan Murray saying that the CEO of Home Depot had "failed most spectacularly" as a public spokesman. The news story on Robert Nardelli's resignation and $210 million golden parachute ran to the column's left.

The late Journal editor Barney Kilgore once said that "it doesn't have to happen yesterday to be news," Publisher Gordon Crovitz recalls. "To which I'd add, just because it happened yesterday, it may not be news to our readers."

Steiger says he assumes that most readers, though not all, have already seen the day's news online. The paper plans to break most of its exclusives on its subscription-only Web site, which has 800,000 customers. When the Journal learned that Los Angeles Times editor Dean Baquet would resign rather than make corporate-mandated budget cuts, it put the story online -- prompting Baquet to confirm the news to his staff -- and came back with a more detailed piece the next morning.

As for the smaller paper's 5 percent loss of news space, Steiger insists tighter editing (plus info-graphics in the USA Today mold) will make up the difference.

Some Journal staffers, meanwhile, are quite upset over an incident last month in which advertisers were told in advance that the paper planned a story on jets that rent time to clients, allowing the handful of companies in the field to buy ad space in the Personal Journal section.

Insiders say that Hilary Stout, the section's editor, objected to the advertisers' involvement and declined to assign the story, and that travel columnist Scott McCartney refused the assignment after a jet company called him to ask about the story. Another reporter was drafted and wrote a balanced piece.

Steiger says the story -- which was first noted by Women's Wear Daily -- was "much too narrow" for advertisers to have been notified in advance, as opposed to a story or package on a larger industry. Such arrangements, he says, could "create confusion and make people think the story might be an advertorial. . . . I'm glad that some reporters raised questions about it." He says the paper will be "more diligent" about what it tells advertisers in advance.Plagiarism Watch

Jacqueline Gonzalez, a San Antonio Express-News columnist, resigned last week after editors found her lifting information without credit in three columns. An internal inquiry began after Gonzalez was found to have ripped off the online encyclopedia Wikipedia for material on the origin of Dec. 25 as the observed birth date of Jesus Christ.Hollywood on the Potomac

Washington journalists must be getting famous. In a "tribute" to the 110th Congress sponsored by the Creative Coalition, the "celebrity delegation" touted in the invitation includes not just Heather Graham, Morgan Fairchild, Fran Drescher and Rip Torn, but Newsweek's Howard Fineman, MSNBC's Tucker Carlson and CNN's Bob Franken. The Jan. 31 event is a $1,000-a-ticket fundraiser for the lobbying group.

"I'm not a delegate to anything," Fineman says. "Even though there's nothing wrong with it, it looks like they're dangling us all on a revolving stage. I'm not even sure I'm going to be there."

Franken says he is a "celebrity wannabe" and that "this will cause a lot of people to say, 'Who the hell is Bob Franken?' "

Prisoner Of Conscience (VF)

By Todd S. Purdum

Vanity Fair, January 8, 2007

The audience is just the kind that makes John McCain feel most alive: a couple of thousand fresh-faced, corn-fed college kids still idealistic enough to believe an Honest-to-God American Hero who tells them that they can, and should, strive to serve a cause greater than their own self-interest. The setting is the Stephens Auditorium at Iowa State University, in Ames, and the questioner is Chris Matthews of MSNBC's Hardball, who is pitching an hour's worth of interrogatories to the American media's favorite politician.

It is three weeks before midterm elections that will prove to be a decidedly mixed bag for McCain. His party will experience the electorate's repudiation of the war in Iraq, which McCain has always supported, and at the same time the voters will repudiate the cozy and corrupt Washington culture as a whole, which McCain has always loathed. Matthews wants to know McCain's views on the prevalence of gay people in all walks of life, a subject whose predicate is the scandal involving Representative Mark Foley and his come-hither instant-messaging with congressional pages. "Should gay marriage be allowed?," Matthews asks.

"I think that gay marriage should be allowed, if there's a ceremony kind of thing, if you want to call it that," McCain answers, searching in vain for the less loaded phrases he knows are out there somewhere, such as "commitment ceremony" or "civil union." "I don't have any problem with that, but I do believe in preserving the sanctity of the union between man and woman." It may not be clear just what McCain is trying to say, but it's easy to see how his words could be skewed in a direction that the Republican right might not like at all.

Fast-forward to the next commercial break, during which McCain and Matthews reposition themselves from the stage to the auditorium floor to take questions from the students. McCain's longtime political strategist, John Weaver, a lanky, laconic Texan, moves in to whisper some advice. The next question is about the pending federal farm bill, and McCain repeats his long-standing opposition to certain agricultural subsidies.

But then, out of nowhere, he adds, "Could I just mention one other thing? On the issue of the gay marriage, I believe if people want to have private ceremonies, that's fine. I do not believe that gay marriages should be legal." There: he said it, the right words for his right flank. It might seem that this audience, the sons and daughters of a socially conservative and culturally traditional bellwether state, would accept, if not approve of, what McCain has just declared. But they are the Wi-Fi wave of the future, and they can smell a pander bear as surely as they can a hog lot. They erupt in a chorus of deafening boos. "Obviously some disagreement with that last comment," McCain says tightly. "Thank you. It's nice to see you."

Moments later, McCain remounts the stage for the program's final segment, and he bores into Weaver, standing quietly in the wings, with a cold look that seems to mingle irritation at Weaver's whispered advice with regret that he took it, and demands, almost hisses, "Did I fix it? Did I fix it?"

John McCain has spent this whole day, this whole year, these whole last six years, trying to "fix it," trying to square the circle: that is, trying to make the maverick, freethinking impulses that first made him into a political star somehow compatible with the suck-it-up adherence to the orthodoxies required of a Republican presidential front-runner. McCain opposes a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage, but supports a ballot measure that would do just that in his home state of Arizona. (It would fail in the midterm elections.) His short-term reward for the Hardball bunt on gay marriage? Boos from the audience and a headline on the Drudge Report, the right wing's favorite screechy early-warning system, reading, mccain: gay marriage should be allowed? McCain needs to square that circle, and the hell of it is, he just can't. Back in the Straddle

But God knows McCain is trying. He began this mid-October day in Sioux City, appearing at a fund-raising Siouxland Breakfast for Representative Steve King, an immigration hard-liner. Recently he had called McCain an "amnesty mercenary" for daring to work with Senator Ted Kennedy on a compromise bill that would provide an eventual path to citizenship for the millions of immigrant workers already in the United States illegally. A day earlier, in Milwaukee, in front of an audience of more sympathetic businessmen, McCain had been asked how debate over the immigration bill was playing politically. "In the short term, it probably galvanizes our base," he said. "In the long term, if you alienate the Hispanics, you'll pay a heavy price." Then he added, unable to help himself, "By the way, I think the fence is least effective. But I'll build the goddamned fence if they want it."

"I'm willing to negotiate anything," McCain tells the breakfast crowd in Sioux City, explaining that there is no way the millions of illegal aliens now here can be sent back to their countries of origin. But he acknowledges that anything seen as amnesty for illegals is "totally unacceptable, particularly to our Republican base." Later, McCain tells me that Congressman King "really knows this issue," but he sounds as if he is trying to persuade himself as much as me.

A couple of hours later, McCain is in an S.U.V., bound for a tour of an ethanol plant in Nevada, Iowa, just north of Des Moines. He knows the visit will be a stretch: he opposes ethanol subsidies. Six years ago, he all but skipped the Iowa caucuses, in large part because his scornful opposition to ethanol was a nonstarter in a state where making corn into fuel is a big and lucrative business. He turns sardonic, asking the members of his small traveling party if they have had their morning glass of ethanol.

We barrel along past the flat fields. Chuck Larson, a bright young Iowa state senator, Iraq-war veteran, and former chairman of the state Republican Party, has signed on to shepherd McCain's already well-organized presumptive 2008 campaign in Iowa. He asks McCain to make some calls to local party leaders. Juggling a sandwich and his cell phone in the front seat, McCain obliges. A couple of times, he gets voice mail and leaves an upbeat message, saying he is in the state and hopes to catch up soon.

Then McCain connects with Darrell Kearney, the conservative finance director of the Iowa Republican Party. Following Larson's instructions, McCain tells Kearney, a former Steve Forbes supporter, that he'd love to go to the party's next Lincoln Day dinner. But his words come out sounding as if he's inviting himself, and the conversation seems strained. "I see," McCain says. "Well, sounds exciting." From my perch in the backseat, it doesn't sound exciting at all. It sounds as if Kearney has ticked McCain off somehow. McCain flips the phone closed and tells Larson, "That's enough!"

A few minutes pass and Larson asks how the conversation with Kearney went. "Fair," McCain says, in a tone that invites no further discussion. "Fair."

If this awkward little day of straddling feels familiar, it is because McCain has tried it before. In the 2000 campaign, he waded straight into the hottest controversy in South Carolina, not long before his crucial primary showdown with George W. Bush, by offering his unvarnished opinion on whether the Confederate battle flag—the Stars and Bars—should continue to fly over the state capitol. "As we all know, it's a symbol of racism and slavery," McCain said. After John Weaver and others did more than whisper in his ear, McCain took to reading aloud from a piece of paper with a statement that began, "As to how I view the flag, I understand both sides," and went downhill from there.

For better or worse, McCain's campaign was never the same again. And no one is more aware of this than John McCain himself. In Worth the Fighting For, his second memoir, written with his longtime aide Mark Salter in 2002, McCain reflected on what he had done:

By the time I was asked the question for the fourth or fifth time, I could have delivered the response from memory. But I persisted with the theatrics of unfolding the paper and reading it as if I were making a hostage statement. I wanted to telegraph to reporters that I really didn't mean to suggest I supported flying the flag, but political imperatives required a little evasiveness on my part. I wanted them to think me still an honest man, who simply had to cut a corner a little here and there so that I could go on to be an honest president.

I think that made the offense worse. Acknowledging my dishonesty with a wink didn't make it less a lie. It compounded the offense by revealing how willful it had been. You either have the guts to tell the truth or you don't. You don't get any dispensation for lying in a way that suggests your dishonesty.

As he embarks on his second presidential campaign, a campaign he once assumed he would never get the chance to run, there are many questions for John Sidney McCain III. Can he bank the fires of temperament that routinely put him atop insiders' lists of the most difficult senators on Capitol Hill and become a unifying leader? Can he reconcile his unstinting support for the war in Iraq with his unsparing criticism of the Bush administration's execution of it—and with the electorate's evident yearning for a new approach? Would he be, at 72—more than two years older than the oldest man ever to assume the presidency, and more battered by old injuries than most men who have held it—too damned old to do the job?

But the biggest questions of all are whether, by forcing himself to become some kind of something he just isn't, John McCain can win the presidency to begin with, and would he consider himself to be worthy of the honor if he did.

Some of McCain's oldest friends and supporters confess that they don't know the answers, but that they worry about the questions. Will McCain's understandable effort to bend a little here and bow a little there—to placate the most conservative elements of his party, who play a disproportionate role in the nominating process—get him all twisted up before he ever gets to face the general electorate that polls suggest admires him so?

Torie Clarke first went to work as McCain's press secretary when he was a freshman congressman, in 1983, and she remains a devoted friend. When I caught up with Clarke one afternoon just after the Republican rout last November, the conversation came round to the toll that the Confederate-flag controversy had taken on McCain's political prospects and his psyche. "What you see now is variations on that," Clarke says. "I think he's a unique, special soul, and I worry about what life is going to be like for him the next couple of years." Dancing with Coyotes

In a thousand and one ways, John McCain remains irresistible—to anyone who ever screwed up in school, fell short of expectations, blew his stack, or gave his all to a losing cause. He is a born rebel, who once confessed that he had spent the bulk of his time at the Naval Academy "being made an example of, marching many miles of extra duty for poor grades, tardiness, messy quarters, slovenly appearance, sarcasm, and multiple other violations of Academy standards." In his third year at Annapolis, he was so fed up he considered joining the French Foreign Legion, until, he said, he realized it required an enlistment of eight years. In prison in North Vietnam, where he spent more than five years after being shot down in 1967, he led a social-studies class for fellow inmates based on the subject he has always loved best—"The History of the World from the Beginning"—in an exercise to keep their sanity.

In an age of pre-fab, blow-dried, plasticized politicians, McCain remains palpably, pungently human. I saw him up close at intervals over a period of many weeks of campaigning last fall, often with almost unlimited access, and his preferred means of controlling his image is by abandoning all the typical modern efforts at control. He is the kind of person who comes alone, without a single aide or handler, to a dinner with a dozen New York Times editors and reporters, and tells stories of the long-ago days in flight school in Pensacola when he dated an exotic dancer known as "Marie, the Flame of Florida." He unself-consciously nurses a vodka Gibson on the rocks in an age when Diet Coke is the safer choice.

In mixed company, he does not shrink from a good "goddamn" or two, and in male company, considerably coarser discourse comes easily to his lips (cocky jet jockey that he once was). He is a man of strong opinions, strongly expressed. "Most current fiction bores the shit out of me," he says in a small plane somewhere over New England. In front of an audience of Republican worthies in Appleton, Wisconsin, he calls the leader of North Korea a "pip-squeak in platform shoes," and in seconding my view that Islamabad has limited charms, he volunteers that the Pakistani capital "sucks." At a nascar race in New Hampshire, he introduces Bobby Allison, "the greatest driver in the history of racing," to one of the journalists following him that day, declaring, "This is Adam Nagourney, New York Times. They're a Communist paper, but he's O.K." He introduces his friend Senator John Sununu, of New Hampshire, son of the famously bumptious former White House chief of staff, to a group of supporters by saying, "You can be very proud of him, and thank God he inherited his mother's temperament." To a gathering of businessmen he says, "I want to keep health-care costs down until I get sick, and then I don't give a goddamn," and to a group of college kids waiting to have their pictures taken with him, he growls good-naturedly, "All right, you little jerks!" On a charter jet above Iowa, he reads aloud a headline from USA Today: actor [wesley] snipes faces indictment on tax fraud charges, then mutters, "All our childhood heroes—shattered!"

Moments like these help explain why the constituency that McCain sometimes jokingly refers to as his base—the press—has not already tried to derail him by highlighting the politically expedient positioning that would be regarded as standard procedure for most elected officials but seems somehow so much worse in a man with such self-defined high standards. Together with Mark Salter, McCain has built a franchise of best-selling books out of his reputation for personal and public integrity. They bear titles such as Faith of My Fathers, Why Courage Matters, and Character Is Destiny, and make John F. Kennedy's Profiles in Courage look like a mere Hallmark card. Yet another McCain book—this one on decision-making—is due out next fall, just as the campaign is likely to heat up in earnest.

But the plain truth is that the Straight Talk Express, Version 2.008, is often a far cry from the Magic Bus of 2000.

"Let me give you a little straight talk," McCain tells the crowd at a house-party fund-raiser in Sioux Falls, South Dakota, for Senator John Thune, the Christian conservative and self-styled "servant leader" who defeated the Senate's Democratic leader, Tom Daschle, in 2004. The minute Thune was elected, McCain says, he became an important figure in the Republican Party and the Senate.

That's not straight talk. That's partisan pap. Nor, presumably, was it straight talk last summer at an Aspen Institute discussion when McCain struggled to articulate his position on the teaching of intelligent design in public schools. At first, according to two people who were present, McCain said he believed that intelligent design, which proponents portray as a more intellectually respectable version of biblical creationism, should be taught in science classes. But then, in the face of intense skepticism from his listeners, he kept modifying his views—going into reverse evolution.

"Yes, he's a social conservative, but his heart isn't in this stuff," one former aide told me, referring to McCain's instinctual unwillingness to impose on others his personal views about issues such as religion, sexuality, and abortion. "But he has to pretend [that it is], and he's not a good enough actor to pull it off. He just can't fake it well enough."

When it comes to the rough-and-tumble of practical politics, as opposed to battles over political principle, McCain's apparent compromises are just as striking. Six years ago, McCain was livid when Sam and Charles Wyly, a pair of Texas businessmen friendly with the Bush campaign, spent $2.5 million on a nominally independent advertising effort attacking McCain. He called them "Wyly coyotes," and implored an audience in Boston to "tell them to keep their dirty money in the state of Texas." This time, McCain accepted money from the Wylys. The Wylys gave McCain's Straight Talk America political-action committee at least $20,000, and together with other family members and friends they chaired a Dallas fund-raiser for the pac. (The Wyly money was later returned because the brothers have become the subject of a federal investigation.) In 2000, McCain denounced the Reverend Jerry Falwell—and others like him—as "agents of intolerance." Last spring McCain gave the commencement address at Falwell's Liberty University.

Two years ago, McCain was unsparing in his criticism of the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, who slimed his friend and fellow Vietnam veteran John Kerry. Kerry felt close enough to McCain at the time to make multiple and serious inquiries about McCain's interest in running for vice president on a national-unity ticket (and McCain basked in the courtship, even if he knew nothing could ever come of it). So the alacrity with which McCain joined in demanding an apology from Kerry—whose "botched joke" last fall about George Bush's intellect came out as a slur against American troops in Iraq—was surprising, if not unseemly. Once upon a time, the two friends would have talked about the issue privately, and McCain might well have given Kerry his frank advice. As of mid-November, they had not spoken since McCain's statement condemning Kerry's "insensitive, ill-considered, and uninformed remarks"—which McCain once again read from a piece of paper, by the way. When I asked McCain if he thought Kerry was really trying to insult the troops, he answered only indirectly, and with some annoyance: "I accepted it when he said, 'I botched a joke,' O.K.?"

The battle between Bush and McCain in 2000 was bitter, with Bush supporters in South Carolina spreading rumors that McCain was insane and that he had fathered a black child. (McCain and his wife, Cindy, are the adoptive parents of a girl from Bangladesh.) Bush and McCain traded insults involving each other's moral standing. A year later, with bad feeling still so high that strategist John Weaver had been virtually blackballed from working in Republican politics, Weaver went so far as to sound out Democratic Senate leaders about the possibility of having McCain caucus with them. This would have put the Senate, then divided 50–50, into Democratic control. Aides to two senior Senate Democrats say it was never clear how serious McCain himself was about the proposal, and any possibility that it might actually happen was short-circuited when another Republican, James Jeffords, of Vermont, made the move first, in 2001.

That was then, when memories of the Bush camp's gruesome, dishonest attacks on McCain were still fresh. When I asked McCain how a rapprochement with Bush could ever have been achieved, he began by saying, "For 10 days I wallowed," then made it clear that the best balm was his realization that the campaign had raised his stature. "We came out of the campaign, even though losing, enhanced nationally, with a lot of opportunities in the Senate legislatively, with more influence, and eventually, if necessary, to be able to go at it again." Whatever the psychic or political specifics, the ultimate result was the celebrated McCain-Bush campaign hug of 2004, in which McCain found himself enveloped in a back-wrapping embrace and upside-the-head smooch. Since that moment McCain has borrowed from the Bush political playbook, aiming to make himself the prohibitive front-runner for the 2008 primaries, and happily snapping up former Bush aides and supporters from key states such as Iowa and New Hampshire, including Terry Nelson, an Iowan and political director of the 2004 Bush campaign. Nelson, now a private consultant in Washington, approved the most widely condemned negative ad of the 2006 midterms, produced by a quasi-independent group financed by the Republican National Committee and aimed at the black Democratic Senate candidate in Tennessee, Harold Ford Jr. In the ad, a sultry white actress says she had once met Mr. Ford at a "Playboy party," then cradles her outstretched thumb and little finger to her ear and coos, "Harold, call me." After the ad sparked an uproar it was taken off the air. Given the racially charged campaign of innuendo deployed against McCain by Bush supporters six years ago, and McCain's outrage at such tactics, the McCain camp's failure to condemn Nelson or the ad struck many as surprising. All John Weaver managed to say at the time was "We're pleased the ad has been pulled down." Nelson is set to manage McCain's '08 campaign.

The Old Man

In the two years leading up to the recent midterm election, McCain kept up a presidential-level schedule, with 346 appearances for Republican candidates and causes around the country. He traveled in small jets, sometimes alone, often with an aide or two; by early fall, his pac had already spent more than $1 million on air charters. On a rainy morning in mid-October, McCain, his longtime chief fund-raiser, Carla Eudy, and I are bound from Washington, D.C., to Milwaukee on a roomy Beechjet, all dark wood and soft leather, with snacks on demand. McCain, as is his habit, props his feet on the opposite seat and opens the newspapers.

"O.K., Carla, several drugs show promise for alzheimer's," he reads from The Wall Street Journal.

Eudy smiles. "I need that."

Turning the page, McCain mutters, "It's not you that needs it."

A few minutes later, reading over his schedule for a long day ahead in Wisconsin, South Dakota, and Iowa, McCain murmurs, "We're going from Joe Foss Field to Bud Day Field! I'm getting old. I knew both of them."

Foss, for whom the airport in Sioux Falls is named, was the World War II flying ace and governor of South Dakota. Day became the nation's most highly decorated military officer since Douglas MacArthur. He served in three wars, was one of McCain's P.O.W. cellmates, and, as a civilian lawyer, handled McCain's divorce from his first wife, Carol, in 1980; the airport in Day's hometown of Sioux City, Iowa, is named for him. (McCain did not know General Billy Mitchell, the World War I aviator for whom the Milwaukee airport, where we'd be landing shortly, is named, but his grandfather did, and McCain wrote about him in Worth the Fighting For.)

At 70, McCain is both matter-of-fact and ruminative about his age. He may have DNA on his side. His father and grandfather, accomplished navy admirals, died prematurely after lives of hard drinking, hard living, and careers cut short, but his mother, Roberta, the daughter of a wealthy oil wildcatter from Southern California, is hale and unstoppable at 94. She spent this past fall driving herself around Europe, and because she was too old to rent a car, she simply bought herself a new Mercedes and hit the road. McCain gets laughs when he acknowledges that he is "as old as dirt, with more scars than Frankenstein"—but he always makes sure to mention his redoubtable mother.

At the end of his failed 2000 campaign, when he had not yet turned 64, McCain clearly assumed that he would be too old ever to run again. "To me, some of this last six months was to see 'Does he still have the physical wherewithal to do this?,'" Mark Salter acknowledges. "Evidently so, because no one staffer can do all the travel with him. Because we burn out too quick."

Indeed, in two long stints on the road in September and October, McCain kept up a punishing pace. He is mentally sharp, verbally facile, and perpetually curious. (On one of our trips, he was rereading Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire.) But he is visibly older, thinner, balder—and, yes, frailer—than he was just six years ago. Like his friend Bob Dole, he tries to minimize his disabilities, but they are serious. He suffered severe injuries when his plane was shot down over North Vietnam 40 years ago; his right knee was broken when his seat was ejected from the cockpit, and both arms were broken in the crash. These injuries were compounded by the profound abuse he endured during five and a half years in captivity.

McCain seldom talks about the details of his torture by the North Vietnamese, but he has written about them in clinical depth. Despite the injuries he had already suffered, upon capture he was promptly bayoneted in the ankle and then beaten senseless. The North Vietnamese never set either of his broken arms. The only treatment of his broken knee involved cutting all the ligaments and cartilage, so that he never had more than 5 to 10 percent flexion during the entire time he was in prison. In 1968 he was offered early release, and when he refused, because others had been there longer, his captors went at him again; he suffered cracked ribs, teeth broken off at the gum line, and torture with ropes that lashed his arms behind his back and that were progressively tightened all through the night. Ultimately he taped a coerced confession.

McCain's right knee still has limited flexibility. Most of the time this is not too noticeable, but McCain mounts the steps onto planes with a herky-jerky gait. A climb up dozens of steps at the New Hampshire International Speedway, in Loudon, leaves him badly winded and sweating profusely. Because his broken arms were allowed to heal without ever being properly set, to this day McCain cannot raise his arms above his shoulders. He cannot attend to his own hair. An aide is often nearby with a comb and small can of hair spray.

McCain has difficulty putting on his suit jacket unassisted. Once, as we prepared to get out of a cramped airplane cabin in Burlington, Vermont, where McCain would be greeted by the governor, I turned my back for a moment, only to find him struggling. He could sense that his collar was all bunched up, and asked me matter-of-factly to help him straighten it out. I felt the pang that those around McCain feel whenever they realize the extent of his injuries. "You comb someone's hair once," his 2000 communications director, Dan Schnur, says, "and you never forget it."

One of McCain's aides tells me that two years ago, campaigning with McCain, George W. Bush asked him if the senator would like to work out with him. Told that McCain did not, could not, really "work out," Bush replied, "What do you mean?"

Just after the Republican convention of 2000, a malignant melanoma was removed from the left side of McCain's face, leaving a track of deep and angry red scars that are only now receding. Salter notes that if McCain's campaign had not died six years ago McCain himself might have, because he wouldn't have taken time out from the trail for the examination that produced the diagnosis. There has been no recurrence of the cancer, and McCain undergoes checkups every three months. At the slightest sign of direct sunlight he breaks out the baseball cap that is always kept at the ready, and slathers his face with so much sunblock that he looks like Marcel Marceau until his skin absorbs it.

And still McCain pushes himself, as if to combat any hint of diminished capacity. Last summer, he hiked the Grand Canyon rim to rim with his son, Jack, 20, now in his second year at Annapolis. He says the descent was torture on his knees, until a park ranger offered him some pills partway down.

"It was—am I saying this right?—I.V. Propen. The stuff's a fucking miracle drug!" It doesn't seem fair to tell him the drug is nothing more miraculous than Advil. McCain will repeat the ibuprofen story a time or two over the course of 48 hours, and he brings it up again when I see him about a month later.

McCain tells me that he counts on Cindy, to whom he has now been married for 25 years, and a close circle of longtime aides to tell him if they ever think he is losing a step. "They watch me very carefully," he says. "They do. They keep an eye on it. And so I try to wear 'em down!" The sheer range in age of McCain's seven children both calls attention to his own span of years and testifies to an unusual willingness to stay young. Besides Jack, they include his first wife's sons by her first husband—Doug, 47, a pilot for American Airlines, and Andy, 44, who works for Cindy's family company in Phoenix; McCain adopted both of them when they were children. Then there is Sidney, 40, his daughter with Carol, who is head of publicity at V2 Records; Meghan, 22, his eldest child with Cindy, now a senior at Columbia; Jimmy, 18, who has recently joined the Marine Corps; and Bridget, 15, a ninth-grader in Phoenix, the Bangladeshi girl the McCains adopted.

Most politicians repeat themselves, in part because they have their rap down, and in part because they see too many people to remember whom they've just seen, and McCain sees far, far more people than most. Older men often repeat their favorite stories, their best tales from the trenches, and McCain certainly repeats his. He is the Milton Berle of political humor, an unrepentant thief of bad gags from friends like Bob Dole and Alan Simpson, which he delivers deadpan and repeats at every stop.

Short-term exposure to McCain is bracing. Long-term exposure can be draining—makes you want to reach for the I.V. Propen. In our travels I spent a great deal of time with John McCain, on occasion just the two of us alone on a plane. Sometimes he would talk, and sometimes he'd stay silent. Often he'd punctuate the silence by saying something like "Do you know who Barry Goldwater's best friend in the Senate was?" and I would answer something like "You told me yesterday that it was George McGovern." McCain may sometimes slip into autopilot, but far more often he is focused intently, speaking to crowds large and small without a single note, addressing his questioners by name after one brief meeting, sizing up the situation in a room he has just entered and saying all the right things.

On what turned out to be a late-night flight from Joe Foss Field to Bud Day Field, McCain was waxing nostalgic about Ronald Reagan, whom he'd begun to admire when, in a North Vietnamese prison, he heard scraps of news about him, and whom he then got to know upon his release. Reagan helped inspire him to leave the navy and go into politics. McCain repeats former attorney general Ed Meese's assertion that Reagan was never the same after he was severely wounded in the assassination attempt early in his first term, when he had just turned 70—McCain's age as we speak. In hindsight, McCain says, Reagan surely exhibited some early signs of Alzheimer's disease while still in the White House.

"I really shouldn't tell you this," McCain says. "I wouldn't want to hurt anybody." He goes on to describe being invited to dinner at the White House as a freshman congressman in 1983 and being seated at Reagan's table, with a woman between them. Reagan told stories, grand stories, priceless stories of Old Hollywood, California politics. He was charming. Terrific. And four years later McCain found himself as a freshman senator back at a White House dinner in just the same arrangement. And Reagan told the same stories all over again. Suddenly, McCain stops and it's as if he can read my mind.

"Now," he says with a knowing air, "I tell the same stories all the time because I like them!" Anger Management

'My dear friends" are words McCain often uses when addressing big crowds. The greeting is expansive, antique, almost Victorian in its exaggerated politesse, and he sometimes stretches out the words as if to heighten the affection they convey. But when he says "My friend" to a single, luckless individual, the tone is terse and tight, and the meaning is anything but philanthropic. "My friend," when uttered through clenched teeth and frozen smile, means McCain is ready to blow.

I've seen it happen again and again. To an inattentive freelance photographer who happened to get between him and a Sunday-afternoon house-party crowd in New Hampshire: "My friend, I like to see people when I'm talking to them." To a nervous technician taking too long to rig a wireless transmitter on McCain's back before a convocation at Boston College: "My friend, I will call you if I need you." To Tim Russert on Meet the Press, after Russert has just told McCain that "to win the Republican primary you have to move to the right, and then, to win the general election, move back to the center": "People know me too well, my friend. I'm not moving any way."

McCain's temperament may be the single most discussed element of his life and career. In high school, his nicknames were "Punk" and "McNasty," and a survey of senior Capitol Hill staffers by Washingtonian magazine last summer ranked McCain second for "Hottest Temper" in the Senate, just behind the famously cranky 83-year-old Ted Stevens, of Alaska. (In fairness, it should be noted that Time magazine recently ranked McCain as one of the "10 best" senators.) Twenty-five years ago, a rival in McCain's first congressional race called his first wife, Carol, to ask if she had any "negative material" on her ex-husband; McCain later told the man that if he ever did anything like that again "I will personally beat the shit out of you."

More recently, just last winter, McCain wrote a stinging letter—and made it public—to Senator Barack Obama, the Illinois Democrat and rising star, for what amounted to little more than a misunderstanding over how Obama intended to proceed on the issue of lobbying reform—something that could have been cleared up with a chat in the corridor. Instead, McCain let loose, writing Obama the kind of missive, lacerating in its sarcasm, that Harry Truman used to compose late at night, but then prudently put in a drawer: "I would like to apologize to you for assuming that your private assurances to me regarding your desire to cooperate in our efforts to negotiate bipartisan lobbying reform legislation were sincere.… I'm embarrassed to admit that after all these years in politics I failed to interpret your previous assurances as typical rhetorical gloss routinely used in politics to make self-interested partisan posturing appear more noble."

McCain's aides say that McCain himself was the last to recognize that he had a reputation as a hothead, and used to rail at them in private every time a public commentator suggested he had a problem, shouting, "I do not have a temper. I just care passionately."

Dan Schnur says he thinks the temper issue has faded: "He's had six years of practice. In 1999 the attention crashed down on us like a ton of bricks. It came out of nowhere, and there was no preparation for it. He's had that level of attention now for seven years, which makes me suspect that his temperament isn't going to be nearly as much of an issue this time as last.

"But there's a flip side to that," Schnur adds. "He traveled on that bus for months with four or five reporters, and one of the nice things about starting slow is you get to try out your act Off Broadway. There's no Off Broadway over the next two years. It's all spotlight. An offhand remark in 1999 vanishes without a trace. In 2007 it's on cable television for three weeks."

One of McCain's great strengths—his pugilistic tendency—is therefore also one of his great vulnerabilities. "There's no bar fight he will walk away from," John Weaver says, with a mixture of admiration and exasperation. A basic reality that makes the current Straight Talk Express seem at least an echo of the last one is that everything McCain says aboard it is on the record, day or night, unless he specifically says something is off the record, and he virtually never does.

From what I can tell, McCain's temper is not so much worse than that of many other politicians I have known, from Rudy Giuliani to Bill Clinton. He wastes no time on niceties. Each time I met him for a trip or an interview, he barely bothered to shake my hand. He no longer calls reporters "liars" and "idiots," as he once did, when he was starting out in politics in Arizona. "Do you think we could sit and watch the damned race for a minute?" he said to an eager aide who was escorting him around the owners' box at the nascar track in New Hampshire to greet potential supporters when what he really wanted was to catch some of the action. Nothing pathological there.

What's so different about—and potentially risky for—McCain is his perpetual willingness to think out loud, unplugged and unfiltered. On our way to Iowa for the Hardball taping in mid-October, McCain tells Chuck Larson and me that he assumes Chris Matthews will be tough on him for his recent dustup with Hillary Rodham Clinton, in which he suggested Bill Clinton's mid-1990s horse-trading with North Korea paved the way for its recent nuclear tests. That prompted an unnamed Clinton adviser to tell Maureen Dowd of The New York Times that McCain had seemed to be doing the craven campaign-season bidding of the Bush administration and would end up "looking similar to the way he did on those captive tapes from Hanoi." Senator Clinton called McCain on his cell phone to apologize.

"It was a very smart thing for her to call," McCain says. "People underestimate her political intelligence and her antennae. She's not her husband—no one's her husband. But she's good. And I like her. I know you're not supposed to say that, but I do." Both McCain's umbrage and his magnanimity seem outsize for a man who once himself had to apologize to the Clintons for having made a cruel joke about their daughter.

On another flight, later that day, McCain reacts to the news that Harry Reid, the Senate Democratic leader, has used campaign money to contribute to the employees' Christmas bonuses at the Ritz-Carlton in Washington, where Reid and his wife, Landra, own a condominium. In legal terms Reid's move was dodgy at best. "Who knew he lived at the Ritz?," McCain says. "Not bad for a boy from Searchlight, Nevada." Then McCain—a former amateur boxer and inveterate gambler, whose wife is the wealthy heir to a beer-distributing franchise in Phoenix—goes on to recount how the McCains and the Reids once ran into one another in Las Vegas and went to a boxing match. It turned out that the Reids took free tickets, while the McCains paid.

"I wouldn't say this publicly," McCain tells the crowd at the private Thune fund-raiser, speaking of Reid, "but I came to the House with him in 1982 and he's always been … " Here McCain pauses—as if suddenly realizing that what he's saying he is indeed saying publicly—and then goes on to finish the thought anyway: " … a little on the edge."

Late that night, on the flight to Sioux City, McCain falls to musing aloud about Colin Powell, his friend and recent stalwart ally in opposing the Bush administration's efforts to end U.S. compliance with provisions of the Geneva Conventions. McCain says he wishes that Powell, from the start, had fought back harder against the Bush White House's repeated efforts to undermine his effectiveness as secretary of state. It's not that McCain and Powell always saw eye to eye on policy, one of McCain's longtime aides tells me later; indeed, McCain was more hawkish than Powell on Iraq from the start. It's that McCain wished Powell had spent more time traveling abroad, pressing aggressive efforts at public diplomacy, making his case out loud, rather than watching his bureaucratic back in Washington. "He could have prevailed at any time," McCain says of Powell. Instead, on issue after issue, he was rolled by Don Rumsfeld and Dick Cheney and Cheney's adroit and aggressive staff, whose power grew and grew.

"He's a great American, a great soldier," McCain says. "But he is also very cautious." He adds, "I'm afraid history will judge him harshly." "Alone in the Room"

History may judge McCain harshly, too, on what he himself has identified as perhaps the biggest moral challenge presented by the war on terrorism: how the United States treats its enemy detainees. No one in American public life has greater personal or political standing to argue against the use of abusive interrogation techniques, and McCain has done so, at times powerfully, and almost without political support.

But in the middle of last fall's election campaign, McCain accepted a messy compromise in the form of a Bush-backed bill, the Military Commissions Act, that would prevent foreign terrorist suspects held by the military from challenging their imprisonment through habeas corpus petitions in federal courts. Many legal scholars and at least one prominent Republican senator—Arlen Specter, of Pennsylvania, who voted for the bill anyway, saying the Supreme Court would eventually clean it up—believe the measure is patently unconstitutional. As enacted, it set up a system to detain, question, and try suspected foreign terrorists before military judges, with only the most limited oversight by federal courts.

Many had expected McCain to put up a stronger fight, even dig in his heels. When the Abu Ghraib prison-abuse scandal broke, in early 2004, McCain had excoriated Donald Rumsfeld at a Senate hearing for his inability to concisely state the chain of command over the interrogations at Abu Ghraib—and thus to accept his own, ultimate responsibility as secretary of defense. But as McCain's election-year rapprochement with George Bush deepened, McCain did not press for the creation of an independent commission to investigate the abuses.

In 2005, McCain led a rebellion in the Senate that forced the Bush administration to accept an amendment banning "cruel, inhumane, or degrading treatment" of all prisoners in American custody. But when does treatment cross the threshold into the forbidden zone? The McCain amendment relied on an American constitutional standard of conduct that "shocks the conscience," one that is open to some interpretation and legal dispute. (Shocks whose conscience?) But the amendment was not being passed in a vacuum—the United States, after all, is also a signatory to the Geneva Conventions, whose Common Article Three bars "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment." So whatever protections the McCain amendment offered prisoners in American custody, Geneva could be seen as providing more, though the Bush administration was contending Geneva did not apply to what it called unlawful enemy combatants. Then, last summer, the Supreme Court ruled in the case of Hamdan v. Rumsfeld that Common Article Three applied to all aspects of the conflict with al-Qaeda, and to all prisoners in American custody.

This was a setback for the Bush administration, which wanted as much leeway as possible in its interrogation of prisoners. But the administration saw a way out. Why not enact legislation that interpreted Common Article Three's "outrages upon personal dignity" as being defined by the words of the McCain amendment itself? On the surface, the move seemed almost tautological. But the consequence was in fact profound: remember, the McCain amendment was open to considerable interpretation, so if the Geneva Conventions were defined as its equivalent, they would be newly open to re-interpretation, too. The administration was proposing a legal flip. For half a century, the Geneva Conventions had been a powerful umbrella, sheltering all measures governing treatment of prisoners, including the McCain amendment. By itself, the McCain amendment would be a meager substitute.

For about 10 days in September, McCain went into full battle mode, joined by his Senate colleagues John Warner, of Virginia, and Lindsey Graham, of South Carolina, fellow veterans and experts on military policy. His rebellion threatened to deprive the White House of what it saw as a potent piece of election-year legislation, one that would remind voters of the administration's determination to spare nothing in its prosecution of the war on terror. McCain was unmoved. "We've faced terrible enemies before, but the United States has always been better than our enemies," he told a crowd at a New Hampshire house party during the height of the controversy.

McCain also knows, better than anyone else, how often torture fails to extract reliable information. After his repeated beatings in North Vietnam, he wrote, he realized that "every man has his breaking point. I had reached mine." He gave his captors a confession under duress, referring to the "deeds of an air pirate," a statement for which he finds it hard to forgive himself to this day. But when the North Vietnamese asked for the names of his flight squadron, McCain recited the names of the Green Bay Packers' offensive line, knowing that false information would be sufficient to suspend the abuse.

McCain ultimately forced the administration to back down from its effort to slip out from under the plain words of the Geneva Conventions. But the final bill, which came to the floor last September, six weeks before the midterm elections, contained many other objectionable provisions, some of them grave, such as the ban on habeas corpus petitions. A person familiar with McCain's thinking acknowledged that he had chosen not to take a stand on the question of habeas corpus rights—that is, the right of prisoners to contest their confinement in a civilian court—and that he was surprised by the furor the issue had generated. McCain ended up in a lose-lose situation: being castigated by much of the press and the legal community for being soft on habeas corpus, even as the Republican base went after him for his hard-line support of the Geneva Conventions. His office phones were virtually shut down by callers protesting his resistance to the White House's original bill, and conservative talk-radio hosts inveighed against him.

Torie Clarke, who has often appeared on conservative talk radio on behalf of one Republican cause or another, says that the basic attitude of the hosts toward McCain is one of watchful wariness. They would tell her, off the air, "We're being nice to McCain now because he's being nice to the president. But we haven't forgiven him."

Tom Malinowski, Washington advocacy director for Human Rights Watch, who worked intensively with McCain and his staff during the drafting of the final 2006 legislation, says, "It's a cloudy bill and he knows it. I'm not a huge fan of what happened in the end, but I do think he did lay everything on the line to prevent the administration from redefining the Geneva Conventions, and he succeeded. The problem was that once he succeeded he was no longer willing or able to essentially throw his body in front of this train over other issues"—like habeas corpus. "He did not have as much support from other senators on those issues," Malinowski added. "He would have been essentially all alone in the room."

And, yet, "alone in the room" is precisely what McCain has always insisted a president must be prepared to be. In the 1999 speech announcing his first presidential campaign, there was a dark and brooding passage that some advisers tried to get him to remove, on the ground that it was not in keeping with the upbeat tone of such an occasion. "When a president makes life and death decisions," McCain said then, "he should draw strength and wisdom from broad and deep experience with the reasons for and the risks of committing our children to our defense. For no matter how many others are involved in the decision, the president is a lonely man in a dark room when the casualty reports come in." Can God Rescue Iraq?

On a mid-October morning President Bush signed the final bill on the handling of detainee interrogations and trials. John McCain skipped the ceremony and instead got back on the campaign trail, finding himself in a meeting room at the Milwaukee Athletic Club. By his own description he was "depressed." His beloved Arizona Cardinals had lost the night before, in a game he stayed up too late watching; the Republicans' prospects in the midterms were getting dimmer by the minute; and his audience of white-haired, ruddy-faced, blue-suited businessmen was begging him for wisdom about the Iraq war, which McCain has supported unwaveringly from the beginning, even as he has offered frequent, pointed, and well-informed criticism of its conduct by Rumsfeld and others. The Iraq war is a huge albatross for McCain, and it is by no means clear that he will be anything close to free of it by the time the presidential campaign begins in earnest. Asked whether, knowing all that is known now (no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, no effective Iraqi army), McCain would have still supported the invasion, his aides say he doesn't view the question in such simple terms. Long before the war, they say, McCain believed that the status quo in Iraqi-American relations was unsustainable. Support for international sanctions against Saddam was collapsing. American pilots faced frequent attack in their overflights of the country to enforce the no-fly zones. And episodic internal Iraqi resistance against Saddam ended in crushing repression from Baghdad. "He stands by his support for doing something," one aide said. But the aide went on to emphasize that, from the summer of 2003 on, McCain had been an aggressive advocate of sending more troops to keep the country from spiraling into insurgency or civil war. McCain had also been, more generally, an outspoken critic of the administration's conduct of the war. If the situation continues to worsen, this aide said, and the Bush administration continues to make "wrong choices," the reality could change. "If you knew we were going to lose, would you still be for it?" the aide asked. "That's a different hypothetical question, that he doesn't have to answer yet." But McCain does have to answer the question: What do we do now? His own short-term prescription—more troops to stabilize the country, if that is even possible—has little public support. "The Iraq situation looks like we're in a quagmire," one man in Milwaukee says. Another adds, "It seems to be tipping." A third asks, "What should the president be doing differently?"

McCain is subdued. Like the rest of official Washington, he has been waiting for the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan commission on Iraq led by former secretary of state James Baker and former representative Lee Hamilton. He hopes the commission will point the way to some promising new direction, and he knows that, whatever the wise men say, he must refine his own approach to the war. But his remarks this morning are uninspired, even vapid. "The next few months will be critical," he tells the businessmen, his critical faculties not as acute as they had been with me just a month earlier, in private, when he said, "A lot of people tell me that the next four months or so are critical … but I'd like to say that, two years ago, everyone said the next six months would be critical."

Finally, a questioner lays it all on the line: "The war's the big issue," he says, adding, "Some kind of disengagement—it's going to have to happen. It's a big issue for you, for our party, in 24 months. It's not that long a time." McCain replies, "I do believe this issue isn't going to be around in 2008. I think it's going to either tip into civil war … " He breaks off, as if not wanting to rehearse the handful of other unattractive possibilities. "Listen," he says, "I believe in prayer. I pray every night." And that's where he leaves his discussion of the war this morning: at the kneeling rail.

On the way to our next stop, McCain tells me, "It's just so hard for me to contemplate failure that I can't make the next step." And that afternoon, at a roundtable with more Republicans in Appleton, McCain gets testy with a woman who says that her grandson and granddaughter have served in Iraq and that things there are going better than the American media say.

"The situation is not improving," McCain says shortly. "There's no biased reporting in the number of casualties."

A week after the November elections, I went to have another conversation with McCain, in his Senate office. I pressed him on the war. He maintained that deploying more American troops was "the only viable option," but added, "There are no good options from where we are today." He went on: "My difference with these people who are saying, 'Threaten the Iraqis with leaving and then they'll do more'—that assumes that they can or will do more. And there's no way that you're going to have any kind of stability without security. Political progress cannot take place unless you have the fundamental elements of a security situation. So, do I know it would be a tremendous strain on the army and Marine Corps? Absolutely. But I saw the kind of impact of a broken army, a defeated army and Marine Corps, after Vietnam. And I'd much rather have 'em take a strain and have some success than be defeated."

He ticked off, and dismissed, other possible options.

"I know of no expert who believes there'd be anything but an enormous amount of bloodshed if you tried to divide them up into three states," he said of an idea that has been occasionally floated. "Every partition in history has been a bloody mess. Removal into enclaves? We're supposed to have our military enclaves while Al Jazeera is broadcasting images of people who've helped Americans being beheaded in the street in Baghdad? I don't think so. A withdrawal to bases outside of Iraq, and go in if needed? How do we get in? You fly in in helicopters? Is that how you do it? Right now, a good portion of the military over there is used up or committed to just maintaining the supply train. So, suppose there's an outbreak in Ramadi, and we're supposed to go get it under control? How do you do that? It's just almost nonsensical. Look what it took to get our initial invasion going."

McCain says he understands how little public support there would be for more troops. "I read the polls all the time. But does that mean I'm not going to do what is morally right? I look you straight in the eye, my friend, and tell you: I want to be president of the United States. I don't want to be president of the United States so badly that I'm going to do something that I know is not right for the security of this nation and the young men and women that are defending it. So, if this position makes me viewed as too militaristic, or unrealistic, or whatever it is, I will more than happily take those political consequences, because I'll sleep a hell of a lot better."

The report of the Iraq Study Group, issued in early December, has done little to alter McCain's thinking. In public hearings he described aspects of the report's approach as "dispiriting." He disagrees robustly with its dismissal of a significant troop increase. He is concerned about the prospect of embedding more American troops with Iraqi units—which are deeply involved in sectarian violence—even as American combat brigades to protect them are drawn down. He is skeptical about bringing Iran and Syria into the conversation, and suspicious of the quid pro quos that this might entail. Clearly McCain will not be using the Iraq Study Group report either as a blueprint or as political cover. On a trip to Iraq in December, McCain reiterated his call for more U.S. troops.

When I asked how history will judge George Bush, McCain answered immediately, "I think it depends on the outcome of the Iraq war." It goes without saying that his own shot at the White House—and his tenure as president if he runs and wins—may well depend on the very same thing. The "Better Angels" and the Rat

The enduring question about John McCain is what, finally, he is willing to do to win. His favorite novel is For Whom the Bell Tolls, Hemingway's story of an idealistic American, Robert Jordan, who goes to fight for the Loyalists in the Spanish Civil War. Jordan is willing to risk his life but never his honor, and his dying meditation, that "the world is a fine place and worth the fighting for," gave McCain's second memoir its title.

But these days, McCain often seems to think and behave like the central character of a more contemporary political novel, Joe Klein's Primary Colors, in which Governor Jack Stanton, Klein's talented but flawed Clinton-esque hero, begs an aide disillusioned by his compromises to stick with him. "You don't think Abraham Lincoln was a whore before he was a president?," Stanton asks. "He had to tell his little stories and smile his shit-eating, backcountry grin. He did it all just so he'd get the opportunity, one day, to stand in front of the nation and appeal to 'the better angels of our nature.' That's when the bullshit stops. And that's what this is all about."

McCain can be cold-eyed. Torie Clarke recalls how she once played a game with him in which he had to name his favorite animal. His favorite animal, he said, was the rat, "because they're cunning and they eat well." But McCain also holds a far loftier view of himself and his obligations than most politicians would dream of articulating. He likes not only to be liked, but to be perceived as a man of high principle.

I asked him once what standard of behavior he should be held to, the "normal" politician's or his own. "Well, I hope you'll hold me to no standard," he joked, before saying he believes that much of the press—and, by extension, the public—will say, "McCain: we like him, we think he's a good guy, we think he's honest, but we'd better make sure that we give him a very thorough scrubbing."

At the freshman convocation at Boston College this fall, McCain concluded his talk with a powerful warning about the costs of compromising one's highest ideals.

"Very far from here and long ago, I served with men of extraordinary character, honorable men, strong, principled, wise, compassionate, and loving men," McCain told the students. "Better men than I, in more ways than I can number.… Some of them were beaten terribly, and worse. Some were killed.… Most often, they were tortured to compel them to make statements criticizing our country and the cause we had been asked to serve. Many times, their captors would briefly suspend the torture and try to persuade them to make a statement by promising that no one would hear what they said, or know that they had sacrificed their convictions. Just say it and we will spare you any more pain, they promised, and no one, no one, will know. But the men I had the honor of serving with always had the same response, 'I will know. I will know.'

"I wish that you always hear the voice in your own heart, when you face hard decisions in your life, to hear it say to you, again and again, until it drowns out every other thought: 'I will know. I will know. I will know.'"

McCain's own compromises in pursuit of the presidency may be necessary, even justified. And they may, in fact, pave his way to victory in the Republican primaries, and perhaps to the White House itself. But even if no one calls him out, and the public plays along, McCain may pay an awful price. Because, whatever happens, he will know. He will know. He will know.

Despite Hefty Risk, McCain Is Unwavering In Support For Troop Surge (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — As a prisoner of war during Vietnam and decorated Navy officer, Sen. John McCain has based much of his political persona on his staunch support for the military and his consummate credibility on national security.

But as the Arizona Republican prepares to mount a White House campaign, he is putting those military bona fides on the line — aggressively backing an unpopular plan to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq at a time that other presidential hopefuls are steering clear of the war or calling for troop reductions.

President Bush is expected this week to announce a plan to send at least 20,000 additional troops to try to halt sectarian violence and bring security to Baghdad — a move widely perceived as an all-but-final push to avert failure in Iraq.

Besides Bush, no politician has more to lose than McCain, the presumed GOP front-runner in 2008 and the plan's biggest backer in Congress.

Now that Bush is pursuing the McCain approach, the senator could soon find himself defending the policy to a war-weary public in Iowa, New Hampshire and other key election states where surveys show voters are fed up with rising U.S. casualties. McCain readily admits that the new strategy is likely to result in even more violence — setting up a paradox for him as he strives to succeed an unpopular fellow Republican in the White House by backing an escalation of the very war that has plunged Bush's approval rating to near-record lows.

Democrats can barely contain their eagerness for McCain to take the blame for a plan that seems to contradict the antiwar message of the 2006 midterm election that stripped Republicans of their once-solid congressional majorities. Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who is running for the Democratic presidential nomination, went out of his way recently to describe the troop increase as the "McCain doctrine."

McCain shows no interest in shedding that label.

"If it destroys any ambitions I may have, I'm willing to pay that price gladly," McCain said Friday after an appearance at the conservative American Enterprise Institute think tank in Washington, where he said the surge "must be substantial and it must be sustained."

His presidential aspirations, he added, "pale in comparison to what I think is most important to our nation's security."

McCain's calculation is the latest sign that the Iraq war is likely to dominate the 2008 race, just as it overshadowed the elections of 2004 and 2006. But it also shows that McCain, perhaps the best-positioned of any candidate to win the presidency in wartime, is willing to bet it all on a gamble that voters will reward his resolve, as they did for Bush in 2004, rather than punish him, as they did to GOP candidates in November.

Other Republicans are clearly not ready to play those odds.

One of McCain's top rivals for the GOP presidential nomination, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, has so far declined to weigh in. In interviews with conservative magazines and bloggers before his term in the statehouse ran out last week, his response was only "I'm still a governor" when asked about increasing troops, adding that he wanted to hear what Bush had to say before making any additional statements.

Another potential McCain primary opponent, Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), has walked a careful line, saying that a troop buildup "could be an acceptable plan" but adding that an increase "seems shortsighted if its only purpose is to impose military order without also moving toward a political equilibrium."

Democrats, encouraged by the 2006 midterm results and still smarting from a 2004 campaign in which many believe they were too passive on national security, appear to be staking out a strong stance against troop buildups.

The party's leaders in Congress, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, laid out their opposition in a letter to Bush last week, and Pelosi warned Sunday on CBS' "Face the Nation" that any administration budget request for additional troops would receive "the harshest scrutiny." Meanwhile, Edwards and another possible White House contender, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), are talking about troop reductions or redeployments.

Edwards has called his 2002 vote in favor of the war a mistake — an admission that his supporters believe will help him appeal to the party's antiwar base. He took the offensive in a recent television interview, pinning the idea of adding troops squarely on McCain, rather than Bush.

"He's been the most prominent spokesperson for this for some time," Edwards said Dec. 31 on ABC's "This Week." "I'm just telling you it's his thing, and I know John McCain very well. He and I are friends, but I think he's dead wrong about this."

The matter is thornier for the Democrats' presumed front-runner, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. She has staked out a moderate tone on the war, reserving criticism for the Bush administration's leadership while consulting military experts such as retired Army Gen. Jack Keane, one of the prime backers of a major troop increase.

Asked during an appearance last month on NBC's "Today" show about the potential troop buildup, Clinton expressed skepticism but left herself room to change direction. "I am not in favor of doing that unless it's part of a larger plan," she said.

But if Bush does announce a troop escalation, no candidate will face tougher questions than McCain, who has advocated such a move since late 2003. The first primary and caucus votes will be cast in January 2008, which would be about a year into a troop buildup that experts predict will result in a sharp rise in deadly combat. If McCain won the nomination, voters could face a stark choice while watching violence unfold. McCain appeared to recognize that on Friday as he addressed the packed American Enterprise Institute conference room.

"I want to be clear, and I mean this with all sincerity: [This] strategy will mean more casualties and extra hardships for our brave fighting men and women, and the violence may get worse before it gets better," he said. "We have to be prepared for this."

DOJ_NMG_0113299

Still, McCain is clearly ready to take his message to the voters. In a preview of how he plans to answer critics should extra troops fail to defeat the Iraqi insurgents, he was careful to add that the administration had dug itself into a hole with its post-invasion strategy — an argument that, in effect, blames Bush for not taking McCain's earlier advice.

"Even if we send additional troops to Iraq in large numbers for a sustained period, there is no guarantee for success in Iraq," he said. "We have made many, many mistakes since 2003, and these will not be easily reversed."

McCain aides say they have devised no particular strategy for shielding their boss from the political fallout if a troop buildup does not work. In a sense, they said, the senator's stance might serve to remind voters of the kind of straight talk that boosted McCain's popularity in 2000, when he defeated Bush in the New Hampshire primary.

"It doesn't mean that lots of us who work for him and respect him so much don't worry about things like this," said McCain's longtime chief of staff, Mark Salter. "I'm sure we do. But there's no game plan for it. There's been no fretting and no meetings."

McCain appeared Friday with Sen. Joe Lieberman, the Connecticut Democrat who lost his party's primary last year partly because of his support for the war but then won reelection as an independent.

Lieberman, the Democrats' 2000 vice presidential nominee, heaped praise on McCain and the plan to add troops, all but endorsing his Republican colleague's presidential candidacy. The two traveled recently to Iraq and Afghanistan, and Lieberman has repeatedly lauded McCain for his "gutsy" stance.

"I've just finished an election campaign. If rumors are correct, he may be starting one soon," Lieberman said, gesturing to McCain, seated nearby. "And he's not taking the easy way out here."

For McCain, Lieberman's presence provided a useful illustration. As the two spoke Friday with reporters, McCain pointed to Lieberman as a case study proving that the 2006 elections did not, contrary to widespread opinion, mean that supporting the war was a recipe for defeat.

"There's no way this guy could have been reelected if it was as simple as that," McCain said.

States To Expand Health Coverage (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, January 8, 2007

States are planning large expansions in health care coverage this year in an aggressive and potentially expensive attempt to reduce the ranks of the 42.4 million Americans who are uninsured.

The states are acting at a time when Congress, now under Democratic control for the first time since 1994, has put health care lower on its agenda.

Governors and state legislators in both parties and most states have made expanded medical coverage a priority for legislatures — all 50 of which are in session this year, 43 starting this month.

Popular proposals include guaranteeing medical coverage to all children; subsidizing medical insurance at small businesses; and providing tax incentives for businesses and individuals to make coverage more affordable. A few states are considering universal health coverage for all residents. Others are focusing on price competition and preventive care.

"We could not afford the old system," says Missouri Gov. Matt Blunt, whose state is overhauling its program. "The states, as we've done on other issues such as welfare reform, are acting as the real innovators and making changes that will affect national policy."

States are experimenting more with health policy than at any time since the 1980s, says Jim Frogue, a state policy expert at the Center for Health Transformation, founded by Republican former House speaker Newt Gingrich. Frogue says legislatures are often simultaneously adopting policies that appeal to conservatives and liberals, avoiding the deadlock between Democrats and Republicans in Congress.

"There's much more bipartisan agreement in state legislatures than in Congress," Frogue says.

Behind the surge in activity on health care: States have new tools — budget surpluses, more flexible federal rules and successful experiments in other states — that make it easier to expand programs. Also, states enjoyed unexpected success in controlling health care costs in 2006, freeing up billions of dollars that had been committed to health care but were never spent.

Spending on Medicaid, which gives health insurance to 56 million people, fell 1.4% in the first nine months of 2006, the first drop since the program began in 1965. States run Medicaid and pay 43% of the $300-billion-a-year cost. The federal government pays 57%.

The Deficit Reduction Act of 2005 freed states to design federally subsidized insurance programs to target specific groups and income levels, using different benefit packages, premiums and payments from patients. "States now have a lot of flexibility to use Medicaid as an anchor to cover more uninsured people," says Martha King, health program director at the National Conference of State Legislatures.

DOJ_NMG_0113300

The politics of health care has shifted dramatically, too. Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty, a Republican, tried to trim Medicaid enrollment two years ago when his state's budget was tight. Now he's supporting universal coverage for children.

Mr. Schwarzenegger's Modest Idea (NYT)

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

Guaranteed health care for children is the new political apple pie. No one can say he is against it, and it's a sure applause line for politicians who want to show concern for reducing the number of uninsured in America. But special recognition is due California's governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, who is reportedly ready to begin his new term with an actual proposal that his state insure all children. And by all, he means undocumented immigrants, too.

The proposal seems a challenge to fellow Republicans, and even to much of the state's Democratic leadership. Predictably, anti-immigrant groups said that including all children would cost billions more than the $400 million experts estimate. In truth, the idea is economical and, if anything, quite modest.

Several states, including Illinois, Maine and New Jersey, already have programs that cover all youngsters, including undocumented children who might not have access to government-subsidized care. California has what may be the biggest number of uninsured young people, more than 750,000. Most were born in the United States and are citizens.

Children, however, cannot take themselves in for medical care. That responsibility falls to parents and other caregivers, and when these adults are undocumented, they are often reluctant to take advantage of a child's birthright. California's array of programs to help the poor obtain health care has heavy enrollment in most communities, except among Hispanics. The state's history of discrimination against Latinos leaves many suspicious of government.

There's no reason to believe that a push, even from an immigrant governor like Mr. Schwarzenegger, would alone solve that problem. But the governor's efforts should infect the national health care debate. Insurance has become a luxury that eludes 47 million people in this country. Putting children first is a good start, because they are usually healthy and cheaper to cover. That's a reason to do the job the right way, without exceptions.

Golden Visions (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

IT WAS ALL SHOWBIZ and politics, with a star-studded stage and an auditorium echoing with the corny cliches of "Fanfare for the Common Man" and the "Hallelujah Chorus." Then Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger began to speak, and everything changed.

The governor's inaugural address Friday was one of the best in state history, infused with California pride and optimism, and was the most eloquent speech of his career. It was also one of the easiest — all broad strokes and primary colors, with few particulars weighing down its rhetoric. Starting today, things are going to be a lot harder.

Schwarzenegger used his inaugural address to set a course for what he called the "nation-state" of California: a place that sets the pace for the rest of the country not just in politics but in culture, science and economics. The governor's road to this new commonwealth, rooted in decades of California's bipartisan growth, is what he terms "post-partisanship." The state's independent voters are on track to outnumber Democrats and Republicans, he noted, and the thrust of his speech seemed to be that he was their man. He didn't quite jettison his Republican affiliation, but neither did he mention it. Stick to one party's proposals, he said, and you miss half the good ideas.

Giving a nod to historian Kevin Starr, he declared there must be a Party of California, "beyond ideology and one to which all of us belong."

"What a prosperous, peaceful, golden state in which we live and work and raise our families," he said. "We should never forget the joys and blessings of being Californians." Around the world, he said, people "ache to have what we so often take for granted."

Even discounting for California egocentrism — Los Angeles, after all, is the most Californian of cities — these are stirring words. Now the governor must give them substance.

Today he is to deliver an address on healthcare, unveiling a proposal to extend medical care and insurance coverage to many, perhaps most, of the state's 6.5 million uninsured. It's the kind of speech that can't rest on lofty calls to work together. It must delve into the details of a thorny and politically divisive issue.

On Tuesday, he is scheduled to lay out the rest of his agenda in his State of the State speech. Republicans and Democrats may find ample opportunity to lock horns over various plans to close the budget deficit, upgrade schools, redraw district lines and rebuild roads and ports. And later in the week comes Schwarzenegger's first crack at the budget, the state's most important policy document. All the pleas for bipartisanship won't paper over deep financial problems and a continuing disagreement about how to rectify them.

When the dust settles, elected officials from both parties, along with interest groups, policymakers and political thinkers, will have a chance to mull the governor's proposals. By then it will be clear whether his aspirations will carry California into the future — or whether his address was just a remarkable speech about what could have been.

Gov. To Seek Cuts In Aid To Families On Welfare (LAT)

By Evan Halper

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

SACRAMENTO — Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger will propose a major rollback of the state's welfare system this week, including a cutoff of aid to tens of thousands of children whose parents do not meet minimum work requirements or are in the country illegally, administration officials said Sunday.

The proposed $465-million reduction in California's welfare budget came two days after the governor promised that his second term would feature "post-partisan" cooperation.

It was met immediately with resistance from Democrats, who expressed bewilderment that the governor would attempt to cut welfare aid to children in the same week his administration is expected to move forward with a plan to expand health insurance to many of the same children.

"It's ironic that the governor is proposing healthcare for poor kids while taking away their breakfasts," state Senate leader Don Perata (D-Oakland) said of the cuts, which would affect more than 40,000 families. "Even Republican Gov. [Pete] Wilson, at the time he negotiated welfare reform, agreed that children should not suffer for the behavior of their parents."

The plan alarmed advocates for the poor, who predicted that eliminating the cash payments of several hundred dollars a month would substantially increase the risk of homelessness for those families.

Schwarzenegger's proposal also would eliminate this year's cost-of-living increase for welfare recipients.

Department of Finance Director Mike Genest, a Republican who has long favored deep reductions in welfare, noted that most states have already made moves similar to what the governor is proposing.

California is at risk of losing hundreds of millions of dollars in federal funds, he said, if it does not force parents to meet the minimum work requirements in the state's welfare program, known as CalWORKS.

"We have not been able to achieve the kind of work participation for those on the program that we would like," he said. "We have not kept up with the track records of other states."

The plan is one of several the governor has proposed for rolling back welfare benefits since taking office in 2003. Most of those plans have been blocked by the Democrats who control the Legislature.

The governor's latest blueprint for CalWORKS comes at a time when Democrats, eager to work with him on his plan to expand health coverage to millions of uninsured Californians, may be more willing to bargain.

The suggested cuts also could help repair the governor's relations with his own party.

Some Republicans in the Legislature have already signaled that they will resist the healthcare expansion, which is to be unveiled to the public today, because the state faces a projected $5.5-billion deficit. The proposed CalWORKS cuts give the governor an olive branch to offer them as he tries to push his healthcare agenda through.

Administration officials say looming federal penalties against the state — potentially costing California $149 million in the coming fiscal year, growing to $389 million in five years — bring new urgency to Schwarzenegger's call to force more welfare recipients to find jobs.

State statistics show that only 25% of families receiving CalWORKS aid are currently meeting the minimum work requirements, which were created in response to a national welfare overhaul signed into law by then-President Clinton more than a decade ago.

Genest said that in Ohio, 65% of welfare recipients meet minimum work requirements and in Massachusetts, 60% do.

One reason California's compliance rate is so low, budget analysts say, is because it is among 14 states that continue to provide cash assistance to families even when the parents are not working the requisite hours. The safety net was put in place in the mid-1990s under Wilson. It is intended to keep families from becoming homeless.

A single-parent family with two children in such circumstances in Los Angeles gets $584 per month. Genest said eliminating that payment would give parents the incentive to work.

A recent report from the nonpartisan Legislative Analyst's Office, which lawmakers of both parties look to for advice on budget matters, noted that in other states such sanctions have not always served as an incentive for parents to get jobs. Often, families get cut off from the system altogether.

"This proposal would lead to an increase in family homelessness," said Nancy Berlin, the Los Angeles-based director of the California Partnership, a statewide coalition of advocacy groups for the poor. "The number of homeless families in Los Angeles with nowhere to go is already growing fast. I can't imagine why anyone would want to increase that number."

DOJ_NMG_0113302

The welfare cuts will be part of the annual state budget proposal the governor plans to release Wednesday. That budget will also include a suspension of the annual cost of living increase for CalWORKS recipients. Such a move would cost a typical family in the program roughly $30 per month.

The cost of living increases, meant to keep cash grants at pace with inflation, have been suspended numerous times in the last two decades. Activists say the buying power of the average welfare grant is now one-third of what it was in the mid-1980s.

The governor's welfare plan would extend to a program that provides cash grants to children who are U.S. citizens but whose parents are here illegally. Advocates said most undocumented adults work enough hours to meet federal welfare requirements even though their citizenship status prevents them from participating in CalWORKS.

The governor will propose that payments to those families be limited to five years.

Joe Munso, deputy director for the state Health and Human Services Agency, suggested that five years was sufficient time for parents to "rectify" their citizenship status.

"We think these things move us in the right direction in terms of where we need to go to stress personal responsibility," he said.

Advocates for the poor said such cuts would likely drive undocumented workers further underground, bring more insecurity to the lives of their children and force the families to turn to already overstressed local facilities such as homeless shelters and food banks for basic necessities.

"How far are we going to go in punishing parents before we unacceptably impoverish their children?" said Frank Mecca, executive director of the County Welfare Directors Assn.

Mecca said all of the major studies he has seen on welfare suggest that increasing sanctions alone is unlikely to result in more poor Californians' joining the workforce.

"There isn't any good data that shows this is likely to work," he said.

How Gov. Arnold Plans To Shake Up Primaries (NSWK)

By Karen Breslau

Newsweek, January 15, 2007

The U.S. Constitution prevents Austria-born Arnold Schwarzenegger from running for president. But California's GOP governor, sworn in last week for a second term, still plans on influencing the 2008 election. Schwarzenegger says he'd like to move the California primary from June—when both parties have all but picked their nominees—to a much earlier date, in February. "We shouldn't be treated as a leftover," Schwarzenegger told NEWSWEEK while at home in Los Angeles, where he was recovering from a broken leg after a skiing accident. "We will go and make a lot of noise about the issues." The governor hopes the change will encourage candidates to spend more time talking to voters in the nation's most populous state, instead of "sucking us dry for money" at fund-raisers. "We don't want to sit back and let this whole thing go by and have California not be a player," he says.

The proposal would need to be brought to the state legislature and approved by a two-thirds vote. Schwarzenegger says he's meeting with leaders from both parties this week to discuss the plan. Moving up the primary certainly increases California's visibility among candidates—and puts the Golden State's environmental concerns on the agenda.

Currently, presidential campaigns are built around creating momentum in Iowa and New Hampshire—whose white, rural populations are notoriously unrepresentative of the country at large—then move on to the Southern states, which tend to favor more-conservative candidates. In 2008, Nevada will become the first Western state to intervene by holding its Democratic nominating caucus in January. Adding liberal California to the early mix would probably affect the nominating process by favoring big-money, big-name candidates such as Hillary Clinton and John McCain.

Schwarzenegger is coy about expressing his support for any particular candidate at this point, though he has ties to several hopefuls. His top campaign strategist recently went to work for McCain. And he says he would "encourage" New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, rumored to be considering an independent candidacy, to run too. In his Inaugural Address, the governor touted "postpartisanship ... Republicans and Democrats actively giving birth to new ideas together." He is challenging presidential candidates to combat global warming and to reform health care, subjects that defy partisan solutions. Schwarzenegger credits his second-term landslide with his own sharp turn to the center after a disastrous year during which he belittled Democrats as "girlie men." Now, he says, "anyone can look and learn from what is going on in California."

'Passing the Bong' to Remake Politics

DOJ_NMG_0113303

He is, we think, speaking figuratively when describing late-night "pass the bong" conversations with fellow former Washington Post reporter Jim VandeHei about building a new political journalism model on the Internet. But as Editor-in-Chief John Harris gets ready to debut a thrice-weekly paper and website called the Politico, he concedes that he, Executive Editor VandeHei, and the Allbritton Communications team aim to "provide a needle in the vein" to those hooked on politics, starting January 23. "We're political junkies," says Harris, a former Post editor and reporter, "and we're writing for political junkies." News sources are eager for change, too: Bush political adviser Karl Rove has even talked up the Politico to allies.

Leave the Post for the Web? They're not crazy, says former Minneapolis Star Tribune Editor Tim McGuire. Considering the mass layoffs at fading newspapers, he says, "this is a sanity test, and they are passing." The money is good, rumored at $250,000 for the two top editors and generous for the small staff of big names. But Harris says it's more than cash: The industry is changing, and now's the time to pounce since readers are more in tune with the Web. He and VandeHei are maybe on to something. Since raiding other publications for staff, competitors like the Post have stepped up Web operations and hiring. "We've shaken everybody by the lapels," says Harris.

Is the 'Governator'a 'Senatenator'?

There's growing buzz in Washington and California that just re-elected Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger likes this government stuff so much that he's got his eye on the Senate. Specifically, the seat held by Sen. Barbara Boxer, who's up for re-election in 2010 when the Terminator ends his second term.

The Speaker Gets the Symbolism

As the first-ever woman speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi understands the importance of symbols. And she was full of her trademark touches of style and substance last week as she took the gavel. Three examples: First, she's on a personal enviro-kick, asking her security detail to drive SUVs that run on E20, a mix of 20 percent ethanol and 80 percent gas, insiders tell us. While E10 is more common, E20 is a long-term goal, but associates say she wants to speed up the shift and to lead by example. Despite her victory, it is a compromise: She initially asked for a hybrid Chevy Suburban. Second, that wasn't Lenten purple Pelosi wore the day she was sworn in. It was the color of the original suffragettes. And finally, as simply a nice act, she gave ex-House Speaker Dennis Hastert one of those coveted secret "hideaways" in the Capitol to use as his retreat.

The Collapse of the CIA's 'Berlin Wall'

With the nation's spy agencies in full reform mode, the CIA has finally torn down its own version of the Berlin Wall. For years, its 24-hour operations center had a wall running down the middle, separating the agency's analysts from its ultrasecret clandestine spooks. Not only did CIA Director Gen. Michael Hayden remove the wall, but he invited in representatives from other intel agencies. The move kicks off a new four-year strategic plan for the CIA.

Time for Bush to Steer Noah's Ark

Some major gestures of conciliation are due from President Bush, says Republican wordsmith and pollster Frank Luntz, who offers this suggestion for the State of the Union address January 23: The prez should point out, by name, five Democratic legislators and five Republican legislators and praise them for a specific idea or piece of legislation for which he would request bipartisan support. Why? "So the American people see that the president is pulling ideas from both sides, not only Republicans and not only Democrats," adds the author of the new Words That Work: It's Not What You Say, It's What People Hear. Luntz calls it the "Noah's Ark" strategy: Bush gets the message from the elections and is ready to lock arms with Dems.

Only Newt Worries This Candidate

In a week when former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney joined the 2008 GOP presidential primary race and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani started hiring aides to man his bid, allies of front-runner Sen. John McCain suggested that the guy he's most concerned about is former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. The reason: While Giuliani and Romney are moving to the right, Gingrich is already there. But he's not that worried: Gingrich still hasn't decided to run, and it's getting late.

Sen. Gobbledygook vs. Gov. Plain Talk

The new head of the National Governors Association, Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano, doesn't sound as if she likes either top 2008 presidential contender-Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton or Arizona favorite son John McCain. She clearly leans to those in her line of statehouse politics-the job most recent presidents have held. "The longer people are in Congress," she tells us, "the harder it is for them to speak in short, declarative sentences."

Hardball Loves Rocky's Softball

We shouldn't be surprised that Chris Matthews, the jabbing host of MSNBC's Hardball, is a fan of the heroic fighter Rocky series. "I saw the first one; I saw the third one. They were the really great ones," he tells us. So what's he think of the latest, Rocky Balboa? He loved it. "There were some great moments: When he talks to his son and says, 'You know, you were my dream when I held you in my hand when you were small, and then you grew up. But somewhere along the line, you began to look for an excuse for failure, and I'm your excuse.' It was unbelievable. It was so strong," coos Matthews. "The soliloquies-it's an odd word to use for Rocky-his soliloquies that [actor-director Sylvester Stallone] obviously wrote were fantastic," he says. "It was slow moving like all Rockys," adds the critic, "but at the end, it was unbelievable."

Lawmaker Wants McKinney's Name Off Road (LAT)

By Jenny Jarvie

The Los Angeles Times, January 8, 2007

ATLANTA — In a city where the average commute lasts 31.2 minutes and drivers have no shortage of bottlenecks and wrecks to grumble about, a Republican state lawmaker is exercised about a different kind of transportation issue: Cynthia McKinney Parkway.

Georgia Rep. Len Walker cannot abide driving along a suburban highway honoring Georgia's former Democratic congresswoman. Each time he catches sight of McKinney's name on exit ramps on the major interstate encircling Atlanta, he is nettled by thoughts of the combative ex-lawmaker.

So a week after McKinney filed her final congressional measure — a resolution to impeach President Bush — Walker pre-filed a bill in the Georgia Legislature to strip McKinney's name from the street and restore the name Memorial Drive.

"I, along with many Georgians, find it totally inappropriate for Cynthia McKinney's name to be honored," Walker said in a telephone interview last week. "She is an embarrassment to the state of Georgia."

Walker's bill has slim chance of passing. Georgia law requires that legislators proposing street names must live in the district where the streets are, and Cynthia McKinney Parkway is in DeKalb County, west of Walker's district.

Walker, though, is confident he can persuade the Republican-dominated Legislature to waive the home-district rule.

His effort has struck a chord among critics of McKinney, who lost her bid for a seventh term in the summer's Democratic primary after a high-profile altercation with a Capitol Hill police officer.

"Put her name ON the road pavement," one irate reader of the Atlanta Journal-Constitution proposed in an online forum. Others suggested putting her name on the road to the county landfill.

Yet Walker's proposal has also prompted charges of racism — McKinney is black — and threats of retaliation from African American lawmakers.

McKinney's supporters argue that the road runs through predominantly African American neighborhoods in Decatur, where McKinney still enjoys considerable support. They say criticism of the road name comes mostly from outsiders who see the signs as they whiz by on the interstate.

In a state crisscrossed by roads named after white Southern men — including Jefferson Davis, the president of the Confederacy, and Lester Maddox, the onetime segregationist Georgia governor — many African American legislators and community activists question why a white lawmaker is singling out one of the few roads named after Georgia's first African American congresswoman.

"This is a witch hunt," said John Evans, McKinney's former campaign manager. "This creep doesn't even live in the district. He's just another idiotic racist trying to embarrass her."

Back in 2000, when a portion of Memorial Drive was designated Cynthia McKinney Parkway, many interpreted it as a symbol of Georgia's progress in race relations. The road connects Stone Mountain, a former stronghold of the Ku Klux Klan, to Atlanta, often called the birthplace of civil rights.

State Sen. Gloria Butler introduced the original legislation to designate a portion of Memorial Drive for McKinney after the congresswoman secured $14 million in federal funds to revitalize the dilapidated street. Butler said she would not consider changing the name.

"Len Walker should name a street in his own district," she said. "He needs to stay out of DeKalb County."

The flap is escalating. Last month, another state lawmaker proposed removing the name of McKinney's father, another controversial former legislator, from a portion of Interstate 285.

Whatever Georgia residents think of McKinney or her father, the dispute has prompted some to suggest that road naming has gotten out of hand. An editorial in the Atlanta Journal-Constitution recently proposed that the state ban naming roads and bridges after any living person.

In the last 70 years, Georgia legislators have named and renamed more than 860 roads and bridges after politicians, preachers, soldiers, civil rights activists, country music stars and even school cafeteria workers. Nearly a third have been named since 2000.

Street and building names are increasingly forums for political expression, said Derek Alderman, a professor of cultural geography at East Carolina University. More than a quarter of the 383 pieces of legislation signed into law during the 109th Congress, he noted, dealt with naming or renaming federal buildings and structures.

DOJ_NMG_0113305

"It's about power," Alderman said. "Those signs up on the street, they basically create a reminder to people about how their community is situated politically. It's almost like a daily political lesson."

Former President Released After Surgery (AP)

AP, January 8, 2007

Former President George H.W. Bush has been released from the Mayo Clinic after undergoing successful hip replacement surgery, the clinic said.

The 82-year-old former president was discharged from the clinic on Saturday, following the operation on his right hip that was performed Wednesday, the Mayo Clinic said on its Web site.

He traveled to the Mayo Clinic on Tuesday after delivering a eulogy at the Washington funeral of former President Gerald Ford.

Surgeons at the clinic replaced his left hip in 2000. Former first lady Barbara Bush also had successful hip replacement surgery at the clinic, in 1997.

The former president has made several highly publicized skydives in the last decade, most recently in 2004 to celebrate his 80th birthday.

Hamstrung In Virginia (WP)

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

DEL. HARRY R. "Bob" Purkey, a Virginia lawmaker, is one of those quixotic keeners who plug away at lost causes year after year, enduring the joshing of colleagues who regard them as quaint figures of fun. In fact Mr. Purkey is a perfectly sensible man whose hobbyhorse -- changing Virginia's archaic constitutional rule barring governors from running for a second, consecutive four-year term -- may finally have its day.

For 15 years or so, and in various forms, Mr. Purkey, a Virginia Beach Republican, has tried to coax the commonwealth into the modern age by doing away with the rule prohibiting sitting governors from running for reelection. He and his allies have come close. One such bill passed the House of Delegates in 2003, then died when a few Republicans switched votes. A similar attempt cleared the Senate in 1995 but collapsed in the House. And an earlier, pre-Purkey effort seemed tantalizingly within reach when it passed both houses in 1984, only to fail the following year. (To amend Virginia's constitution, a bill must gain legislative approval in consecutive years, then be approved by voters in a referendum.)

Now Mr. Purkey and his fellow Republican legislators are in negotiations with Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D), and both sides appear serious about a compromise. In return for the constitutional shift, which would enhance the chief executive's power, future governors would cede to the legislature the right to make some appointments to certain high-level state commissions -- a right now reserved exclusively for the governor. If a deal can be worked out and passed by the General Assembly this year and next, it would go on the ballot in 2008. And if voters approve, the governor elected in 2009 -- not Mr. Kaine, who would still be bound by the old rule barring reelection -- would have the option of running for reelection in 2013.

Those wedded to the old system say a two-term provision would produce governors distracted by the prospect of reelection. A corollary is that governors seeking reelection spend too much time raising money, creating the potential of conflicts of interest.

Those objections are easily outweighed by the main arguments for two-term governors, which 49 other states seem to have grasped: simply, that governors worried about reelection are also more accountable to the state's voters. And that while money in politics can have a corrupting influence, that applies also to candidates who are not incumbents. The one-term rule yields governors who are lame ducks from the moment they take office, hard-pressed to forge and implement long-term policies or strategies for economic development. And because of Virginia's biennial budgeting process, each new governor is hamstrung for the first half of his term by his predecessor's budget.

It's a screwy system. In addition to Mr. Kaine, three of his four most recent predecessors favor scrapping it to allow governors to run for reelection. So do leading business groups. This year, after so many failed attempts, let's hope Mr. Purkey's efforts are not in vain.

Newspaper Cites Plans For Iran Nuke Attack (WT/AP)

By David Stringer

The Washington Times, January 8, 2007

LONDON -- A British newspaper reported yesterday that Israeli pilots are training to strike as many as three targets in Iran with low-yield nuclear weapons, aiming to halt Tehran's uranium-enrichment program.

DOJ_NMG_0113306

Israeli officials swiftly denied the report, which comes amid growing global concerns over an Iranian project that Washington and other governments think is secretly intended to build atomic weapons.

Israel has never confirmed that it has nuclear bombs, although analysts widely think the Jewish state possesses a significant stockpile and U.S. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates referred to an Israeli atomic arsenal during his recent confirmation hearing.

Citing unidentified Israeli military sources, the Sunday Times said plans had been drawn up in Israel for an attack using "bunker-buster" nuclear weapons against atomic facilities at three sites south of the Iranian capital.

The U.S. and its allies suspect Tehran of trying to produce atomic weapons there -- and the issue has taken on greater urgency because of Iranian leaders' statements calling for the destruction of Israel and their recent hosting of a conference questioning the Holocaust.

Though Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has not explicitly ruled out a military strike on Iran's nuclear facilities, he says the issue should be dealt with diplomatically -- and stresses that an Iranian nuclear bomb would be a problem for the entire world, not just Israel.

Some view Israeli officials' occasional implied threats as a means of pressuring the world community to take action, building on the recent U.N. Security Council decision to impose economic sanctions on Tehran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

Iran says its nuclear program is solely for peaceful purposes, including generating electricity, and it has called the U.N. move invalid and illegal.

The Sunday Times said Israeli military officials think Iran could produce enough enriched uranium to build nuclear weapons within two years. It said Israeli pilots had made flights to the British colony of Gibraltar while training for the 2,000-mile round trip that would be required to reach the Iranian targets.

Israeli pilots conducted a similar raid on Iraq in 1981, destroying a nuclear facility being built by dictator Saddam Hussein's regime.

But Iran's program may be far more difficult to cripple because it is thought to be distributed over many sites and, in part, deep underground.

Israel Plans 'Nuclear' Strike On Iran (AFP)

AFP, January 8, 2007

Israel has drawn up plans to destroy Iranian uranium enrichment facilities with a tactical nuclear strike, a British newspaper has said in a report that was rubbished by the Jewish state.

The Sunday Times quoted several Israeli military sources as saying that two of the country's air force squadrons are training to use "bunker-busting" bombs for a single strike.

The story is "incorrect", Israeli foreign ministry spokesman Mark Regev said Sunday.

"Israel is 100 percent behind the international community's efforts to bring about an end to Iran's nuclear program. Israel totally supports Resolution 1737 and the international community must be ready to take even tougher measures against Iran," he said.

The Sunday Times -- which in 1986 first revealed Israel's undeclared nuclear arsenal -- said the plans involved sending conventional, laser-guided missiles to open up "tunnels" in the targets before "mini-nukes" with a force the equivalent of one-fifteenth of the Hiroshima bomb are fired in.

"As soon as the green light is given, it will be one mission, one strike and the Iranian nuclear project will be demolished," one of the unnamed sources was quoted as saying.

A senior Israeli official dismissed the report out of hand.

"This is absurd information coming from a newspaper that has already in the past distinguished itself with sensationalist headlines that in the end amounted to nothing," the official, who asked not to be named, told AFP.

"To think that we will launch an atomic attack against Iran, and on top of that that we would reveal it in advance to a foreign newspaper is doubly ridiculous," the official added.

"The solution that we recommend, along with the international community, is that of sanctions imposed on Iran."

Iran warned of dire consequences in the event of any such Israeli attack.

"Any action against the Islamic republic will not go without a response and the aggressor would regret the action very quickly," foreign ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini told reporters.

He described the Sunday Times report as "proof of the weakness of the enemy and will have no effect on the determination of the Islamic republic to continue its (nuclear) activities."

DOJ_NMG_0113307

Israel and the United States, the Islamic republic's two arch-enemies, accuse Iran of seeking a nuclear weapon -- a charge vehemently denied by Tehran, which refuses to bow to United Nations demands to halt uranium enrichment work.

Even after the UN Security Council agreed to impose its first-ever sanctions on Iran in December, Israel has pushed for tougher international action against the Islamic republic.

Iran's hardline President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has in the past called for Israel to be wiped off the map and also casting doubt on the scale of the Holocaust.

Israel has refused to rule out pre-emptive military action against Iran. In 1981, it took action against Iraq's nuclear reactor in Osirak.

Israel is considered to be the sole nuclear weapons power in the Middle East. It does not officially acknowlege that it has an arsenal although Prime Minister Ehud Olmert appeared to do so in an apparent lapse last year.

The three prime targets for Israeli action are said to be the uranium enrichment plant at Natanz, a uranium conversion facility near Isfahan and a heavy water reactor at Arak, The Sunday Times reported.

The nuclear option is being considered because Israeli military commanders believe conventional strikes may not be effective enough at destroying the well-defended facilities, it said.

The atomic weapons would explode deep underground to minimise the risk of radioactive fall-out, it added.

US and Israeli officials had met several times to consider military action, it added, saying military analysts assessed that disclosing the plans could put pressure on Iran to halt sensitive uranium enrichment activities.

It could also be designed to persuade the United States to act or "soften up" world opinion ahead of an Israeli pre-emptive strike.

Israeli pilots are said to have flown to Gibraltar in recent weeks to train for the 2,000-mile (3,220-kilometre) round-trip to the Iranian targets. Three possible routes have been mapped out, including one over Turkey, the report said.

The plan is similar to one said in a report in the New Yorker magazine last April to have been considered by the United States. The White House dismissed investigative reporter Seymour Hersh's article as "ill-informed".

Abbas Tells Party He'll Proceed With Elections (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 7 — The Fatah faction of the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, held a large rally on Sunday in a Gaza City sports stadium, marking the group's 42nd anniversary with a show of strength and defiance after days of bloody clashes with the rival Hamas movement.

Tens of thousands of Fatah supporters made it one of the largest Fatah rallies in Gaza in many years.

Mr. Abbas told Fatah political leaders in Bethlehem on Sunday that he intended to proceed with his demand for early presidential and parliamentary elections, and that he had lost hope in negotiating a unity government with Hamas, which won a parliamentary majority a year ago. Hamas has rejected early legislative elections as illegal and as a form of a coup and has vowed to boycott and disrupt them.

On Saturday, Mr. Abbas said he would consider the Hamas-led parallel police force known as the Executive Force to be illegal if it were not quickly integrated into other Palestinian security forces under his command.

Hamas rejected that call, too, saying that the Gaza-based group, the Executive Force, was legal and necessary, and that in fact Hamas had plans to more than double its size — to 12,000 men. Hamas leaders warned Mr. Abbas that efforts to disband the Executive Force would be met with violence.

Mr. Abbas also said Saturday that he was changing security personnel. While he did not make clear who would hold the top post, the United States has been urging him to appoint Muhammad Dahlan, the former security chief in Gaza, to lead all security forces in the Palestinian Authority. Mr. Dahlan is especially despised by Hamas, and he is not especially popular among many other Palestinians, who believe that he is corrupt and too close to the United States and Israel, despite his vehement denials. But Mr. Dahlan commands the loyalty in Gaza of many of Fatah's armed men, incorporated into various security services.

Mr. Dahlan said at the rally that there would be a new policy. "If anyone from Fatah is attacked, we will hit back twice as hard," he said, as the crowd shouted "Shiites, Shiites," intended as a riposte to Hamas, which, like Fatah, is Sunni, but is also fervently religious and has close ties to Shiite Iran. Mr. Dahlan responded, "Don't say 'Shiites,' say 'criminals.' "

Agence France-Presse said that its photographer, Jaime Rázuri, 50, from Peru, was released Sunday evening after six days of captivity after being kidnapped in Gaza City on Monday. Mr. Rázuri was released to news-agency representatives at Mr. Abbas's compound. He said: "It was not a five-star hotel, but it was very good. I was treated very well." Mr. Rázuri said he was fine and "very happy to be released," and thanked all those who had tried to help him.

DOJ_NMG_0113308

In Israel, intraparty rivalries also intensified, with former Prime Minister Ehud Barak announcing that he would run for the chairmanship of the Labor Party, challenging the current leader and defense minister, Amir Peretz, in primaries on May 24.

Mr. Barak has been out of politics for nearly six years, since Ariel Sharon defeated him in 2001. He will face competition from Mr. Peretz; Ami Ayalon, another former general; and Ophir Pines-Paz, a popular legislator and former minister.

Separately, Israeli forces arrested two Palestinians on Sunday morning in the Balata refugee camp in Nablus. The Palestinians then led them to two suicide-bomb belts in their apartment that were ready for use, the Israeli military said.

Fatah And Hamas Continue Bloody Struggle (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh And Ibrahim Barzak

AP, January 8, 2007

Geography is playing a big role in the violent Palestinian power struggle: When Hamas attacks in its stronghold in the Gaza strip, its rival Fatah retaliates in the West Bank, where it holds sway.

The pattern of bloodshed in the two Palestinian enclaves, separated by Israel, repeated itself this weekend in a rampage against Hamas supporters in the West Bank, where Fatah gunmen shot an office manager and a university professor in their legs and kidnapped a deputy mayor.

The attacks came two days after Hamas militiamen in Gaza killed a Fatah-allied colonel and seven bodyguards in a rocket barrage.

Fatah says its dominance of the West Bank holds Hamas in check and could keep the lid on what some fear will turn into a full-scale civil war in Gaza.

But to maintain that dominance, Fatah militants in the West Bank have resorted to new tactics — including kidnapping government officials and shooting Hamas sympathizers at random.

After snatching the Hamas deputy mayor of the West Bank city of Nablus, Mahdi al-Khamali, his captors released a video Sunday showing him flanked by gunmen — a scene familiar in Iraq, but a first in the Palestinian areas. Any attack in Gaza will be avenged in the West Bank, a gunman warned in the video.

The division of turf between Hamas and Fatah is largely linked to Israeli troop deployment.

Israeli troops withdrew from Gaza in September 2005, enabling Hamas to build and expand its militia. By contrast, Israel controls the West Bank and has badly weakened Hamas militants there with arrests.

Gaza, a narrow band of Mediterranean coast and the landlocked West Bank, lie on either side of Israel's borders, and it is impossible for most Palestinians to travel between them. Of the 3.8 million Palestinians, about 37 percent live in Gaza and 63 percent live in the West Bank.

Fatah gunmen have also been targeted by Israel in the West Bank, but most of Fatah's firepower comes from the security forces loyal to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, a political moderate. Last week, President Bush asked Congress to provide $83 million to train and equip Abbas' force.

Since winning parliamentary elections a year ago, Hamas has invested heavily in its Gaza paramilitary unit, the so-called Executive Force, with millions of dollars in support, mainly from Iran.

The militia currently has 5,500 members, but thousands more sympathizers can easily be mobilized. Abbas, who heads Fatah, on Saturday outlawed the militia, prompting defiant declarations by Hamas that it would more than double the number of fighters.

Hamas has also established its own arms industry in Gaza, building anti-tank rockets, mortar shells, land mines and hand grenades. Smuggling tunnels running under the Gaza-Egypt border help refresh supplies. Some of Hamas' weapons engineers were trained abroad.

The Executive Force has also bought SUVs and German-made minivans and set up training camps throughout Gaza.

On the West Bank, by contrast, Hamas militants remain underground or only appear in public without weapons, for fear of being targeted by Israel.

On Sunday, dozens of bearded Hamas activists, all unarmed, crowded around the West Bank hospital bed of Ehab Ghaiyatha, an Interior Ministry employee and Hamas supporter who was seriously wounded by Fatah gunmen in the town of Ramallah on Saturday.

Ghaiyatha, 27, said the assailants draped a black hood over his head, drove around with him for 15 minutes, dumped him into the street and then shot him in the legs.

Ghaiyatha said there was little Hamas could do to protect its supporters in the West Bank. "No one can carry weapons here," he said. "If he does, he would become a target for the Israelis, but if they (Fatah gunmen) keep attacking us, we have to find a way to protect ourselves."

DOJ_NMG_0113309

The weekend rampage by Fatah — its gunmen also shot a Hamas-allied university professor in the legs — came after a gruesome attack by Hamas on an officer in the Abbas-allied Preventive Security Service in Gaza on Thursday.

Col. Mohammed Ghayeb and seven bodyguards were killed in a barrage of rockets fired at his home, where he had been holed up, pleading for help in a phone call to Palestine TV in his final minutes.

More than 30 Palestinians have been killed in factional fighting since December, most in Gaza. Gun affiliated with Fatah have also carried out brutal attacks against Hamas in Gaza, including executing an Islamic court judge linked to Hamas in the street.

The security forces loyal to Fatah in Gaza still outnumber the Hamas militia by several thousand, but the balance could soon shift.

Fatah, which dominated Palestinian politics for four decades until it lost parliament elections a year ago, is trying to restore its power in Gaza.

On Sunday, tens of thousands of Fatah supporters crowded Gaza City's muddy Yarmouk soccer stadium despite the cold, rainy weather, for the largest Fatah rally since 1994 when legendary leader Yasser Arafat triumphantly returned from exile.

Fatah's strongman in Gaza, Mohammed Dahlan, was given a hero's welcome and shooed away the security guards when he began speaking.

"Let Hamas shoot me," he said as the crowd erupted in applause. Dahlan derided the Hamas militia as a gang, and pledged revenge for the assault on the colonel's home. "If they attack one Fatah person, we'll attack two more," he said.

In another development, a Peruvian news photographer for the French news agency AFP, kidnapped Jan. 1 in Gaza City, was freed Sunday, Fatah officials said. It was not known who kidnapped him.

U.S. Support Key To Ethiopia's Invasion (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, January 8, 2007

WASHINGTON — The United States has quietly poured weapons and military advisers into Ethiopia, whose recent invasion of Somalia opened a new front in the Bush administration's war on terrorism.

A Christian-led nation in sub-Saharan Africa, surrounded almost entirely by Muslim states, Ethiopia has received nearly $20 million in U.S. military aid since late 2002. That's more than any country in the region except Djibouti.

Last month, thousands of Ethiopian troops invaded neighboring Somalia and helped overturn a fundamentalist Islamic government that the Bush administration said was supported by al-Qaeda.

The U.S. and Ethiopian militaries have "a close working relationship," Pentagon spokesman Lt. Cmdr. Joe Carpenter said. The ties include intelligence sharing, arms aid and training that gives the Ethiopians "the capacity to defend their borders and intercept terrorists and weapons of mass destruction," he said.

Advisers from the Guam national guard have been training Ethiopians in basic infantry skills at two camps in Ethiopia, said Maj. Kelley Thibodeau, a spokeswoman for U.S. forces in Djibouti.

There are about 100 U.S. military personnel currently working in Ethiopia, Carpenter said.

Somalia has been the region's primary concern for the U.S. government since the early 1990s. U.S. troops, sent to Somalia as part of a peacekeeping and humanitarian mission, withdrew in 1994 after a failed attempt to capture a clan leader led to the deaths of 18 U.S. soldiers in 1993. The incident was later the subject of the book and movie Black Hawk Down.

The country has had no central government since 1991. The capital, Mogadishu, has been controlled by a series of warlords. A fundamentalist movement called the Islamic Courts Council consolidated power by defeating the warlords six months ago.

Ethiopia responded in December, invading to oust the Islamic Courts and prop up a government backed by the United Nations and Western countries.

At least 8,000 Ethiopian troops remain in Somalia, according to United Nations observers.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi has said he would like to be able to withdraw his troops in a few weeks. But there has been little progress in creating an African peacekeeping force to replace the Ethiopians.

Meanwhile, the ousted Islamic movement has begun attacking the Ethiopian troops. And, in an audiotape aired Friday on a website used frequently by Islamic militants, al-Qaeda No. 2 Ayman al-Zawahri urged Somalis to defeat "the crusader Ethiopian invasion forces."

Ethiopia's population is split almost equally between Muslims and Christians, but there are concerns that the Ethiopian intervention "will be framed as another Christian vs. Muslim war," said retired Marine general Joseph Hoar, who headed the U.S. Central Command from 1991-94.

DOJ_NMG_0113310

The Bush administration understands that Ethiopia's intervention "is against international terrorism, not against Islam," said Samuel Assefa, Ethiopia's ambassador to the United States.

The close U.S. embrace of Ethiopia is risky, in the view of several Africa experts and human rights advocates. Even though Ethiopia had good reasons of its own for intervening to blunt a Somali threat to its security, it is perceived as acting on behalf of the United States, said William Zartman, an Africa expert at the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies.

The intervention is controversial in Ethiopia, where the Meles government has become increasingly repressive, said Chris Albin-Lackey, an African researcher at Human Rights Watch.

The Meles government has limited the power of the opposition in parliament and arrested thousands. A government inquiry concluded that security forces fatally shot, beat or strangled 193 people who protested election fraud in 2005.

At least 96 prisoners, including several opposition leaders, journalists and the former mayor of Addis Ababa, face charges of treason, plotting to commit genocide and inciting violence, Albin-Lackey said.

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J., plans to re-introduce legislation in Congress that would tie U.S. aid to Ethiopia to an improved record on human rights, but the prospects of passage are uncertain. "We have to be careful that that old maxim — the enemy of my enemy is my friend — does not make us unwitting enablers of abuse," Smith said.

UN Under Pressure To Extend Presence In Somalia (FT)

By Mark Turner, Andrew England And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, January 8, 2007

Western and African powers in Nairobi last week described the defeat of Somalia's Islamic Courts by Ethiopian-backed forces as a "historic opportunity" to rebuild the shattered horn of Africa country, and put an end to the "warlordism" that has torn apart efforts at political reconciliation since the 1990s.

But a history of botched intervention in the world's most failed of failed states leaves few doubts that fixing Somalia poses a severe challenge to the world's peacekeeping systems, and may yet embroil Ban Ki-moon, the new UN secretary-general, in one of the first major challenges of his tenure.

At stake are questions of which international bodies should be responsible for the often expensive, thankless task of peacekeeping, and what their forces should be doing wherever they police.

A senior EU envoy in Washington said the buck must stop with the UN. "The UN will have to take responsibility. The rest of the world will have to pay."

But the world body's peacekeeping department is already overstretched with almost 100,000 troops in 18 operations, and there is little appetite for a UN mission in Somalia after the ill-fated operation of the early 1990s.

Officials and diplomats have been keen to encourage alternatives to traditional peacekeeping, such as providing international support to regional groups such as the African Union (AU), and are trying to develop an African standby force for such situations.

Last month, the UN Security Council authorised a regional "protection and training mission" to be sent to the country. Diplomats say a new resolution will be needed to take account of the changed circumstances since a two-week war put Somalia's weak transitional government in control of most of the country.

The resolution gives little indication of how the mission might work, or who would step in to provide troops. The only candidate to have come forward so far is Uganda, whose President Yoweri Museveni last week promised, pending parliamentary approval, to send a battalion of 1,000 troops.

A much larger contingent than that would be needed for any properly constituted peacekeeping force, and diplomats are urgently searching for other African powers to contribute.

"It is important for the African Union to take over," said one UN official. "Museveni cannot do it alone."

Nigeria is seen as one possible contender and South Africa suggests it could help with logistics. But it is unclear whether even an expanded AU force would be up to the job in the longer term. The body's peacekeeping force has struggled to maintain itself in Sudan's Darfur region, where the UN has been trying to bolster its presence in the face of staunch government opposition to UN involvement.

Dumisani Kumalo, South Africa's UN ambassador who also sits on the Security Council, said that UN support must follow early African intervention in Somalia.

"If your house is on fire, your neighbours go first," he said, "but you would still hope for the fire department to arrive later."

"The UN must be involved. We can't have the UN subcontract international peace and security."

UN peacekeeping officials concede that they may eventually have to step once more into the Somali breach, and note that, in contrast to the situation in Sudan, the Somali government appears amenable to UN action.

DOJ_NMG_0113311

But the approval of Somalia's government may not be enough on its own. UN officials insist that for any intervention to work, the government must start a genuine reconciliation process and earn legitimacy.

At the moment, one said, that legitimacy was "in serious doubt. They were put there by the Ethiopians. A very co-operative approach has to be taken".

Without legitimacy, international troops risk being caught in a conflict in which there is no peace to keep. But Idd Mohamed, Somalia's deputy envoy to the UN, insists any force would be welcomed. Somalis were tired of war, he said.

Washington think-tanks complain that once again the Bush administration, which backed Ethiopia's intervention, has got itself involved in a war with no post-conflict plan – a view echoed by Democrats.

"The US must play more of a leadership role, instead of relying on the piecemeal diplomacy that has failed us in the past," Senator Russ Feingold, the new chair of the Africa sub-committee, said.

Islamists Out, Somalia Tries To Rise From Chaos (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

KISMAYO, Somalia, Jan. 7 — Every Friday morning in this seaside town, the future of Somalia plays soccer on a bone-littered beach.

Boys dribble around animal carcasses and oil drums that have been dumped by the shore. Ships covered with rust lean into the sand. The palms sway, the seagulls squawk and a few girls in veils hang back, watching the action.

"This is all we know," said Mahmoud Abu Gur, 19, pointing to a dozen haphazard soccer games. "This."

The road ahead for Somalia begins in places like Kismayo, dusty, chaotic, forlorn wrecks of cities where the list of dire needs like food, water, shelter, a fire department, law, order — and hope — is so overwhelming that people just shake their heads and smile when asked where they would begin.

In just two weeks, the Somali political world has been turned upside down, bringing ambitious governance and reconstruction issues into focus for the first time in 16 years. The Islamist forces that ruled much of the country for the past six months are out. The transitional federal government, which had been considered totally feckless by those both at home and abroad, is in. The surprising reversal is because of thousands of Ethiopian troops still in Somalia who routed the Islamists after Ethiopian officials declared the growing movement a regional threat.

Kismayo is an old Arab port town of 700,000 people, Somalia's third most populous city, after Mogadishu, the capital, and Hargeysa, in the north. But town elders in all three places are struggling with the same questions: how to provide security; what to do with the remaining Islamists; how to determine the proper role for religion, an important theme in Somali society; and how to unify rival clans, rebuild infrastructure and live with the Ethiopians. Many Somalis say they are starting at less than zero.

"After nearly two decades of anarchy," said Abdi Artan Adan, a retired diplomat in Kismayo, "people just don't want to be ruled."

Ever since Somalia's central government collapsed in 1991, the country has been notorious for the staggering levels of firepower on the streets. The new government made disarmament its first step but despite meetings, pleas, deadlines and threats, officials have collected few weapons. In Mogadishu, hundreds of people rioted Saturday at the prospect of house-to-house searches. The local government there indefinitely postponed the issue.

That led Jendayi E. Frazer, the United States assistant secretary of state for Africa, to cancel a planned trip to Mogadishu on Sunday. She would have been the highest-ranking American official to set foot in Mogadishu since American troops left the country in 1994 after a troubled aid mission. American officials said the security situation was too unstable.

On Sunday night, insurgents in Mogadishu attacked a downtown army barracks and residents said that four civilians were killed.

In Kismayo, no weapons have been turned in. Many elders agreed that everyone would be better off once all guns were gone, but no one seems to want to volunteer theirs first.

"It's a custom for Somalis to attack someone who doesn't have weapons," said Sultan Abdi Rashid Dure, a leader of the Galjel subclan. "When I was young, we used knives."

With long, wrinkled fingers, Mr. Dure, 56, traced the web between disarmament, clans, revenge and anarchy. "During these years, every clan killed," he said. "A lot. Now there are so many feuds, so many scores to settle. We are all afraid that if we give up our weapons, other clans will take their revenge."

The Islamists, using Islam as a bridge, did a better job than any recent authority to unite warring clans. But their military was no match for the better-trained, better-equipped Ethiopian-led troops, and now that the Islamists are gone, many fear a return to clan mayhem.

Somalia has always been somewhat of a political paradox — one of the most homogeneous countries in Africa, with one language, Somali, and one religion, Sunni Islam, but at the same time is one of the most violently divided. Clan allegiances have always mattered.

Dahir Ali Barre, the leader of a small Kismayo political organization, said that when he was a teenager in Mogadishu in the early 1970s, he did not know which clan he belonged to. It was not until 1974, when he was sent to a village in Somalia's barren interior as part of a national effort to foster cross-clan understanding, that Mr. Barre learned he was a Marehan. But when he returned to Kismayo in the mid-90s after some years in the capital, the first thing he did was seek out the Marehan neighborhood, for protection. "After all those years of sophisticated culture," he said, "we've basically gone back to the bush."

The transitional government has theoretically addressed the clan issue by its so-called 4.5 formula, which allots equal representation to the four major clans and a smaller percentage for all the minor clans. The government was set up in 2004 with help from the United Nations and is supposed to rule until the next elections, proposed for 2009.

Already it seems that clan militia leaders are well positioned. The big man in Kismayo is Barre Aadan Shire, the transitional government's defense minister and a former warlord, whose strong jaw, natty goatee and bald head lend him an uncanny resemblance to Lenin. He says many people in Kismayo have asked him to reach out to the Islamists, but he does not want to. The last of the Islamist fighters have retreated to the Kenya border, about 150 miles away.

"If we were going to compromise," Mr. Shire said, "why go to war?" He gave the Islamists credit for bringing a degree of order, but said they pushed religion too far. Yet he predicted that Somalia's permanent government would not be purely secular. He does not see beer or bikinis in Somalia's future. "We are a traditional people," he said.

It seems to be a fine balance. Several Kismayo residents said they grew to resent the Islamists after they banned movies, Western music, cigarettes and khat, a mildly narcotic plant that is chewed here. "Those rules were a total fallacy," said Abdullahi Jama Ali, who was once part of an underground Islamist group. "The Koran doesn't say anything about cigarettes. The Islamic religion is like an ocean, everyone can swim where he likes."

With the Islamists in hiding, Kismayo's market is bustling again. But the grapefruit farms on the outskirts of town are still a mess, irrigation canals are full of sand, roads are dreadful and government buildings are lonely, shot-up places.

Kismayo's jail is a single windowless cell, barred by a log, where four sweaty prisoners, accused of stealing a mattress, wait for a justice system to be set up. There are 22 police officers for the entire city.

Not far away, there is a displaced persons' camp, a field of three-foot-high domes made of sticks and plastic bags. The salty breeze nearly carries them away.

Hundreds of Ethiopian soldiers occupy this wasteland. Though many of its people are Muslims, Ethiopia also has a long Christian history, and already some Muslim extremists, including leaders of Al Qaeda, have vowed to respond with a holy war to drive the Ethiopians out. Ethiopian officials say they plan to withdraw their forces in a few weeks and hand over control to a yet-to-be-formed African peacekeeping force.

With Somalia's longtime fears that Ethiopia might swallow it, the sooner that happens, the better. On Saturday, Nasteh Dahir Farah, a reporter for a Kismayo radio station, visited the town's airport with three foreign journalists. The foreigners were allowed in. Mr. Farah was not. He was shooed away by Ethiopian soldiers at the gate and told never to come back.

"This is my country, not theirs," he said. "If I didn't have a job," Mr. Farah muttered, straightening himself up and smoothing the shirt where he had been poked in the chest, "I'd join the resistance."

A little humiliation, it seems, goes a long, long way.

Ethiopian Forces Attacked In Somalia (AP)

By Elizabeth A. Kennedy

AP, January 8, 2007

Gunmen attacked Ethiopian troops supporting the Somali government Sunday, witnesses said, in the second straight day of violence in a city struggling to emerge from more than a decade of chaos.

Farah Abdi Hussein, who witnessed the attack, said gunmen launched grenades at Ethiopians about 2 1/2 miles from the airport. One Somali soldier was wounded, according to a Somali military official asked not to be named for fear of reprisals.

The unrest comes at a precarious time for Somalia's transitional administration, which is trying to assert some control for the first time in a capital that has seen little more than chaos in the 15 years since clan warlords toppled a dictatorship and then turned on each other.

The government, backed by Ethiopia's military, drove out a radical Islamic militia last week. But many in predominantly Muslim Somalia resent the presence of troops from neighboring Ethiopia, which has a large Christian population and has fought two wars with Somalia.

DOJ_NMG_0113313

On Saturday, hundreds of furious protesters took to the streets, burning tires and smashing car windows while denouncing the presence of Ethiopian forces and shouting defiance at the Somali government's call for disarming Mogadishu.

Two people died in Saturday's violence, including a 13-year-old boy.

On Sunday, a similar protest took place about 215 miles away in Belet Weyne, after Ethiopian troops there detained a Somali military commander who refused to hand over an Islamic militiaman, witnesses said. That protest also turned violent, killing a 20-year-old civilian, Abdi Nor Salah Gedi told The Associated Press by telephone.

It was not clear who shot the man or the teenager killed Saturday.

Clan elders held emergency meetings Sunday and hundreds of Somali troops patrolled Mogadishu, setting up six extra checkpoints in areas where residents burned tires and broke car windows during Saturday's protests.

Dahir Abdi Kulima, a chieftain of the Hawiye, the dominant clan of southern Somalia, said the government's reliance on Ethiopia is backfiring.

"Since the Ethiopians arrived people are sleeping and waking with worry about what will happen next," Kulima told AP during a break in a meeting with about a dozen other Hawiye elders. "This is a sign of upcoming problems in Somalia."

Ethiopian soldiers, tanks and warplanes intervened in Somalia on Dec. 24 to defeat the Islamic movement, which had threatened to overthrow the internationally recognized government. At the time, the government controlled only the western town of Baidoa.

The most senior U.S. diplomat for Africa said Sunday that the United States would use its diplomatic and financial resources to support the Somali government.

"I think we are pushing uphill as an international community, as well as the Somali people themselves, to try to overcome their history," Jendayi Frazer, the U.S. assistant secretary of state for Africa, told AP in Nairobi, Kenya.

Frazer was planning a surprise visit to Mogadishu on Sunday but called it off because the details of the trip were made public, prompting concerns for her safety.

The African Union has begun planning for peacekeepers and Uganda has promised at least 1,000 troops. Frazer has said she hopes the first troops would arrive in Mogadishu before the end of the month.

Previous peacekeeping forces, including U.S. troops, met with hostility and violence when they tried to help in the early 1990s, and leaders of the routed Islamic militia are vowing from their hideouts to launch an Iraq-style guerrilla war.

After meeting with Frazer in Nairobi, a top Somali politician with ties to leaders of the militant Muslim movement urged its fighters to surrender and join the peace process.

Sheik Sharif Hassan Aden, speaker of the transitional parliament but a strong critic of the interim government, also dropped his opposition to having foreign peacekeepers in Somalia, calling on people "to welcome, to hail, to respect, to accommodate them in a peaceful manner."

Aden is closely linked to leaders of the militant Council of Islamic Courts, whose fighters scattered into the countryside after being defeated on the battlefield last week.

Frazer reiterated Somalia's importance to the United States because of its location in the Horn of Africa, where the Red Sea opens into the Indian Ocean.

The U.S. wants to make sure Islamic extremists do not take advantage of the chaos to establish a safe haven. Frazer has said al-Qaida's East Africa cell, blamed for the bombings of two U.S. embassies and a Kenyan resort hotel, infiltrated the Islamist movement in Somalia.

But Frazer stressed that the U.S. will provide only a support role.

"Some people would like the United States to lead on this issue," she said. "I would prefer that we lead from behind, and what I mean by that is pushing the Somali people first, pushing the sub-region next and then mobilizing the resources of the international community."

A Fleeting Victory In Somalia (NYT)

By Jonathan Stevenson

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

Newport, R.I.

SOMALIA'S internationally recognized government pulled off a stunning military victory over its Islamist rivals, taking control of the capital, Mogadishu, and the key port city of Kismayo last week. This may appear to bode well for the containment of Islamism on the Horn of Africa. But unless America plays a constructive role in Somalia's next stage, the conflict could become a regional war and a new field of jihad.

The success of the Transitional Federal Government and its current prevalence were made possible entirely through the help of troops from neighboring Ethiopia, many of them trained and equipped by the United States. Nevertheless, Ethiopia cannot be expected to act as the government's main force indefinitely. Nor, eventually, will Somalis, who are almost all Sunni Muslims, tolerate an open-ended occupation by Ethiopians, who are predominantly Christians.

Enforcing peace in a politically atomized territory is remarkably difficult, as was painfully demonstrated by the American intervention in Somalia in the early 1990s. Turning a humanitarian mission into a coercive state-building effort angered local militia bosses, leading to the now-infamous "Black Hawk Down" attack.

The Ethiopians, being thoroughly familiar with the American experience and the Somalis' historical tendency to resist external influence, are already talking about pulling out within a few months.

What's more, the American invasion of Iraq illuminates some drawbacks to any extended Ethiopian military presence in Somalia. Al Qaeda's leadership would inevitably cast such a commitment as the non-Muslim occupation of a Muslim land. This would draw foreign jihadists into the conflict and lead to greater Islamic radicalization of Somalis themselves.

Indeed, Ethiopia's intervention and the United Nations Security Council's authorization of a notional peacekeeping force have already prompted the Islamic Courts Council to declare jihad. Once bitten, twice shy, the United States should be loath to perpetuate this kind of blowback. Similar considerations also argue against a peacekeeping force led by a major power — even if one could be marshaled, which at present looks unlikely.

The upshot is that there is no military solution to the quandary of Somalia. Robust diplomacy, with an eye toward creating some sort of power-sharing agreement between the transitional government and the Islamic Courts Council, appears to be the only hope. Given the recent struggles in Darfur, Congo and elsewhere, the idea of bringing Africans to the negotiating table might cause Westerners to roll their eyes. But there are a few hopeful signs that, in Somalia, diplomacy has a chance.

For one thing, the European Union has shown an interest in becoming an honest broker among the main Somali factions. And Kenya, alarmed by the prospect of tens of thousands of Somali refugees pouring across its northern border, may feel compelled to resume its longstanding diplomatic role in Somali conflict resolution.

Finally, neither the transitional government nor the Islamic courts are in a position to take over wholesale governance of the country: the various clan leaders, tribal elders and militia bosses around Somalia together control the pulse of power. In fact, it was the decision by dozens of local clan elders to withdraw their political and military backing that made it impossible for the Islamic Courts Council to defend Mogadishu and Kismayo.

This parlay underscored how central the elders are to Somalia's tenuous political equilibrium, especially those of the four main clans — the Darod, Hawiye, Dir and Digil-Mirifle — and their various sub-clans. These leaders must be included in any peace negotiation, and any deal with their backing would be hard for the Islamists or the transitional government to walk away from.

The knottiest substantive issue would likely be deciding to what extent Islamic sharia law would apply in Somalia. Naturally, the Islamic courts have insisted on universal religious law, while the secular transitional government has refused to entertain it. But there is recent African precedent for breaking the deadlock.

In January 2005, persistent negotiations overseen by the United States, European powers and Kenya produced a power-sharing compromise between southern Sudanese Christians and Sudan's Arab Muslim government. The deal was that sharia would apply in the northern part of the country and not in the south, and that its applicability in the capital, Khartoum, was to be decided by an elected assembly. While the unrelated violence in Sudan's Darfur region has overshadowed this deal, it was a major breakthrough between two groups far more religiously divided than the two Muslim Somali sides.

The temptation in Washington will be to keep its distance and rely on Ethiopia, the European Union and Kenya for as long as possible. This attitude is myopic. Neither the American public nor the world believe that the Bush administration's predominantly military approach to counterterrorism is working. Relying primarily on Ethiopian troops to tamp down Somali Islamism would represent a continuation of that flawed model, and of the corresponding risk of fueling the jihad.

The United States' full participation in a diplomatic process in the Horn of Africa, on the other hand, would constitute a relatively low-cost way of signaling a new American approach to Islam and a re-engagement in sub-Saharan Africa, which has largely been left out of Washington's post-9/11 calculus. A result could be a small political victory in the Muslim world that would deprive Osama bin Laden and his followers of a new grievance rather than supplying them with one.

Richardson Gets Bleak Darfur Assessment (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, January 8, 2007

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson got a bleak assessment Sunday of the deteriorating situation in Darfur, but expressed optimism for a breakthrough with the Sudanese president he has been able to work with in the past.

President Omar al-Bashir has refused to allow U.N. troops into the violence-wracked region, allowing only 20 civilians to be deployed for assistance.

DOJ_NMG_0113315

The peacekeeping force would provide protection to the 2.5 million people uprooted since early 2003 as a result of sectarian conflict. More than 200,000 people have died, victims of violence as well as malnutrition and disease.

Richardson, a potential 2008 presidential candidate, heard disturbing reports of rape, death and corruption from the top U.S. diplomat in Sudan and humanitarian workers, but said he was not deterred from the challenge of trying to help bring peace where years of international efforts have failed.

"I think we make some measurable progress if we can help the cease fire and the humanitarian situation and possibly start a united political process that helps the U.N. peacekeeping effort alive," he said.

Richardson was to meet with al-Bashir on Monday in Khartoum, then fly to Darfur on Tuesday to meet with rebel leaders and the commander of overwhelmed African Union forces assigned to patrol the area.

"I have to tell you, my record with Bashir is pretty good," the governor told the skeptical humanitarian officials.

Richardson flew to Sudan at the request of the Save Darfur Coalition because he has negotiated successfully with al-Bashir in the past over the release of foreign prisoners.

He had been on Sudanese soil just minutes when Cameron Hume, the chief diplomat who was an aide to Richardson when the governor was U.N. ambassador, laid out the challenge to make progress. "I don't think anybody's strategy is working," Hume told Richardson.

Richardson visited the presidential residence for three hours Sunday night for a celebration of Sudan's independence — where al-Bashir addressed the crowd in Arabic — but the two did not greet one another.

Later, he met with 13 representatives of aid groups working in Darfur who asked not to be quoted by name out of fear of reprisal by the Sudanese government. Some said they were doubtful Richardson can make progress with the president and one suggested he was being used by al-Bashir and should refuse to meet with him.

Richardson is planning to announce soon whether he will run for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, and the trip highlights his extensive international experience in a competitive field.

On a 17-hour flight to Sudan, Richardson huddled with five advisers around a table in the private jet chartered by billionaire philanthropist S. Daniel Abraham for the trip. Richardson asked them how he could help encourage a cease-fire, continue the flow of humanitarian aide and persuade al-Bashir to allow United Nations peacekeeping troops in the region.

The group game up with a two-page memo of talking points going into the meeting that lacked specific timetables or numerical goals. For instance, they would like to jump start African Union patrols in some locations, work toward a cease fire and get al-Bashir's commitment a three-stage plan to send some 20,000 peacekeepers and police to Darfur.

Hume's warned during a gloomy hour-long briefing for Richardson's delegation that he was assuming that everything that was said in the room was being monitored by Sudanese intelligence. He repeated the sentiment later with the aid workers.

Hume said the African Union troops who are supposed to be providing protection in Darfur have slowed patrols. But Hume said Richardson might be able to convince the A.U. force commander to step up patrols, at least in some areas.

Hume explained that rising chaos and violence is making it more dangerous for humanitarian groups to travel and distribute aid.

One of the humanitarian officials who briefed Richardson said 13 aid workers have been killed since a cease fire was signed in July, more than 100 of their vehicles were stolen last year and over 400 have had to be relocated to protect their security in the last couple of months.

Hume said violence has increased in El Fasher, where Richardson visited last September and planned to return Tuesday. Richardson was there earlier to retrieve a journalist from New Mexico who had been imprisoned — a release that was the result of Richardson's face-to-face negotiations with al-Bashir. Since that visit, Hume said, there has been gunfire in town, including a shooting by government paramilitary forces opposed to the governor.

US And EU Talks Revive Hopes Of Trade Deal (FT)

By Eoin Callan

Financial Times, January 8, 2007

Negotiations between the US and the European Union have revived hopes that a deal can be struck on the stalled Doha round of world trade talks by the end of the month, according to EU and American officials.

Top US and EU negotiators have told the Financial Times they hope to achieve a breakthrough in the coming weeks, paving the way for an agreement with Brazil and India at the World Economic Forum in Davos this month.

The proposed deal would be a last-ditch attempt to revive the Doha round before a US law enhancing President George W. Bush's authority to negotiate trade pacts expires later this year.

The round began in 2001 with plans to liberalise manufacturing and agricultural markets, but farm subsidies have proved a sticking point for both the US and EU.

DOJ_NMG_0113316

Peter Mandelson, the EU's trade commissioner, told the FT that the US and EU were closer to an agreement than is commonly thought. "After a series of meetings of senior officials it is clear that the gap between us on agriculture is no longer such to dismiss hope of a successful outcome. We are not that far apart to give up on the process."

The optimism follows US-EU negotiations – which were continuing last night – aimed at narrowing differences on agricultural subsidies and tariffs.

Mr Bush and José Manuel Barroso, European Commission president, are expected to back the drive for a deal when they meet today at the White House.

The meeting will mark the highest-level effort to reach a deal at the WTO since talks broke down in July over agricultural policy. The engagement of Mr Bush in the negotiations follows the personal intervention of Tony Blair, the British prime minister, and Angela Merkel, the German chancellor, officials said.

Mr Mandelson said he hoped to persuade Mr Bush to throw his weight behind the Doha deal. "It is at this crucial stage when you reach the end-game that you need the president's authority to help us do a deal," he said.

US and EU officials said that if the outline of a final deal could be reached with Brazil and India at the World Economic Forum in Davos, the circle of countries included in the talks would widen.

Susan Schwab, the US trade representative, told the FT: "Both technical and policy-level conversations are continuing and that is the single most important ingredient necessary to find a resolution to the impasse."

But the chief US trade negotiator was more cautious than her EU counterpart. "The challenges that we face in trying to find our way clear to a breakthrough in Doha are no less than they were last year. But I think we have made progress on the technical side," she said. Ms Schwab added that she would make an improved offer on cutting domestic agricultural subsidies.

Mandelson To Push Bush On Trade (FT)

By Eoin Callan, Caroline Daniel, George Parker And Andrew Bounds

Financial Times, January 8, 2007

Peter Mandelson will on Monday attempt the improbable feat of persuading George W. Bush to take a political gamble on multilateralism and expend precious political capital on reaching a world trade deal during his final two years in office.

The European Union's chief trade negotiator will meet the president this morning and again over lunch at the White House, along with his US counterpart Susan Schwab and José Manuel Barroso, president of the European Commission.

The role of persuader is a familiar one for Mr Mandelson, who honed his skills at influencing world leaders as consigliari to Tony Blair, the UK prime minister.

Indeed, the personal intervention of the British prime minister in recent days has been decisive in convincing Mr Bush to give the EU delegation a serious hearing, according to officials familiar with the conversations.

"I believe that President Bush wants to do a deal," Mr Mandelson told the FT. "My political judgment about him and what he has said to me in the past is that he wants to do a deal and, if anything, is slightly impatient."

Mr Mandelson believes he has a unique personal relationship with Mr Bush that will help him convince the president the trade talks have reached an "endgame" and that he must step in.

The European delegation argues that the administration must show leadership if there is to be a deal on the stalled Doha round of world trade talks.

Mr Barroso said: "The moment of truth for the Doha negotiations is fast approaching and the US holds the key to making a deal possible in 2007. The alternative – a delay of several years – would come at a high price for all."

The delegation believes Mr Bush will work for a breakthrough, not least to give some gloss to his international "legacy" – a record dominated by the Iraq crisis.

But Ms Schwab, the US trade representative, emphasised the need to make more progress on technical negotiations over agriculture. "I think the right kind of conversations are going on. Are we there yet? No, not yet," she said.

There has also been no clear message from the Bush administration to its allies in the business community – or to US lawmakers – that a deal is imminent.

This calls into question the optimistic assessment of Mr Mandelson, whose own reputation and legacy are linked to the outcome of the Doha negotiations. It also leaves an extraordinarily small window for a deal to be reached before the president's special fast-track trade negotiating powers expire in the summer.

But Mr Mandelson insists: "My impression is that the Bush administration has arrived at a view that a deal is doable and they want to do it. That is what this is about."

Analysts said a breakthrough on the Doha development round would be a catalyst for US trade policy and could lead to the new Democrat-dominated Congress extending the president's special trade promotion authority. Both US and EU trade negotiators argue that the new Congress has not significantly lessened the chance of a deal.

DOJ_NMG_0113317

Mr Mandelson said the European side would also go “as close as possible” to the demands made by the G20 group of developing nations in cutting EU farm subsidies and tariffs. He urged the US to do the same to encourage developing countries to open their own markets to industrial products and services.

“If we fall too far below the developing countries’ demands in agriculture we will have fewer benefits to take home to our respective constituencies to go along with a deal,” he said.

Sceptics argue that there are simply not enough political incentives for the key countries to make the necessary compromises. Calman Cohen, an influential US trade analyst, said: “The components of a deal are in place. The outstanding considerations are political.”

Nurturing Our Most Important Relationship (WSJ)

By Matthias Wissmann

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

BERLIN -- The European Union, the United States and Canada jointly account for almost 60% of global GDP, making them the world's largest economic region. Yet there is still a great deal of untapped potential in bilateral economic relations between the EU and its trans-Atlantic partners. Nontariff barriers to trade still exist in many areas of economic activity, and removing them would make everyone on both sides of the ocean richer.

With this in mind, German Chancellor Angela Merkel has made the creation of a single trans-Atlantic market a priority of our country's European Union presidency. In her visit to Washington last week, she stressed that Europe and North America have more in common with one another than with any other region, but that these shared values and interests must be nurtured and cannot be reduced to the traditional bonds of common security interests.

Numerous industries would benefit from stronger ties between our two regions. Recent studies indicate, for instance, that a fully open aviation market would increase the output of that industry as a whole -- airlines, aircraft manufacturers, suppliers and airports -- by $9 billion a year. Likewise, coordination of the securities market would reduce transaction costs by 60%. Greater coordination would lead to harmonization of the regulations of International Financial Reporting Standards (IFRS) and Generally Accepted Accounting Principles (GAAP) as well as easier access to U.S. stock exchanges. Divergent standards apply in many other fields, to the detriment of both the EU and the U.S. The most prominent examples are technical requirements in the automotive industry, such as safety and environmental standards or costly testing and approval procedures; the lack of coordination in the fight against corruption and in the protection of intellectual property; provisions of antitrust legislation and energy policy; rules governing the supervision of stock exchanges; and interpretations of the concept of liability.

A lack of political support at the highest level and hence a lack of public awareness and of transparency have led to the failure of many previous Euro-American agreements to bear tangible fruit.

Strengthening trans-Atlantic ties need not come at the expense of trade with the rest of the world. While the primary purpose of integrating our markets would be to strengthen European, American and Canadian businesses, we would plan from the outset to allow for the subsequent accession of other countries or trading blocs. Thus, other nations should not perceive this as a situation in which the Western economic powers are "ganging up" against them or trying to shut them out of our markets. Such protectionism would be counterproductive -- particularly for Germany, the world's leading exporter. Barriers against the emerging Asian markets would slow down the wage growth that has already begun in that part of the world. Globalization, already a formidable challenge that offers great potential rewards for the trans-Atlantic partners, would become even more difficult. This is precisely what we want to avoid.

The economic areas on each side of the Atlantic are confronted by a number of unique issues and problems. For this reason, it is important that our unwavering commitment to the World Trade Organization framework should be accompanied by reinforcement of our relations with Canada and the U.S. A single trans-Atlantic market would have the potential to lend fresh impetus to the multilateral negotiations. A Euro-American trade system based on common standards could serve as a new engine for the global economy. Closer cooperation between North America and the EU could establish new benchmarks in other areas, too. We need only think of efforts to protect the global climate or cooperation in the provision of development aid. An agreement concluded on the basis of these conditions would be quite different from a free-trade agreement in the traditional sense. Only 10% to 20% of the negotiating agenda would be devoted to the usual trade barriers such as customs duties. Instead, we could grasp the opportunity to secure world-wide acceptance and application of our standards.

The present situation bodes well for this initiative. The Democratic Party emerged strengthened from the recent elections in the U.S. Although at first sight this seems like a victory for protectionist tendencies, it was the Democrats who, some years ago, developed the idea of closer economic relations between the U.S. and the EU. This idea could attract a cross-party consensus of Democrats and moderate Republicans. On the European side, Germany's dual presidency of the EU and the G-8 offers an excellent basis to kick-start the creation of a single trans-Atlantic market at the EU-U.S. summit in May. The agenda is ambitious.

DOJ_NMG_0113318

Common legal standards must be created in two steps: first in specific areas of activity (such as developing compatible regulatory procedures, transparency in decision making and convergence of IFRS and GAAP) by 2010 and then across the board by about 2015.

Through its commitment as a founding member of the European Community 50 years ago, Germany has already played a crucial part in the creation of a successful economic area. There is nothing to prevent us from applying the successful model of the single European market in the trans-Atlantic context.

Washington Faces Challenge Over Climate (FT)

By George Parker And Andrew Bounds

Financial Times, January 8, 2007

George W. Bush, the US president, will on Monday be challenged to join the fight against climate change as Europe embarks on a "new industrial revolution" aimed at cutting the continent's greenhouse gas emissions by 20 per cent.

José Manuel Barroso, the European Commission president, will use his visit to the White House on Monday to give Mr Bush a preview of a new EU energy policy designed to put the bloc at the forefront of energy efficiency and use of renewables.

Mr Barroso will argue that Europe and America have a joint economic interest in cutting energy use and to reduce their dependence on imported oil and gas.

Although final details of the EU energy package will be finalised on Wednesday, Mr Barroso's aides say he will tell Mr Bush that Europe should aim to cut greenhouse gas emissions in 2020 by at least 20 per cent from their 1990 levels.

The European Commission will also propose a big increase in the bloc's use of renewable energy, a rise from under seven per cent of today's energy mix to about 20 per cent by 2020. A draft Commission paper acknowledges that Europe is failing to meet its existing targets for renewables, and some will be sceptical about whether member states have the political will to go even further.

The paper also says that the shift to renewables could be expensive, costing the EU an average $23.4bn (€18bn) a year if oil costs $48 a barrel in 2020. But higher oil prices and the cost of carbon trading would cut that sum to "practically nothing".

"The economic case for taking action to manage climate change is beyond dispute," Mr Barroso said before leaving for Washington. "In this area we have much to gain, despite our differences."

The US has not ratified the Kyoto treaty on climate change, and Mr Bush has a record of scepticism on the issue, but Mr Barroso's aides claim the former's tone has changed in recent months.

Mr Barroso will also raise raise the issue with Nancy Pelosi, the new Democratic speaker of the House of Representatives, who said last week she would work for "a new America that declares our energy independence, promotes domestic sources of renewable energy, and combats climate change".

Mr Barroso's energy package – which has to be approved by all EU member states – also aims to boost competition in Europe's internal energy market by tackling the dominant position of big national power companies.

A majority of Mr Barroso's Commission colleagues support the forced ownership "unbundling" of operators such as Eon and RWE of Germany and EdF of France, arguing that companies which generate and sell electricity should not own supply networks.

Although this is likely to emerge as the Commission's preferred option, it is almost certain to be rejected by France and Germany when the package is presented at an EU summit in March.

Mr Barroso has ordered a second compromise option to be drawn up, where big companies would retain ownership of the network assets, but they would be handed to an "independent service operator", responsible for the grid's operation and development. Beefed-up regulation would accompany the measure.

China Cashes In On Global Warming (WSJ)

Critics Fret Lucrative Carbon Credits Hurt Clean-Energy Efforts

China is turning its environmental problems into a shrewdly managed financial asset, capitalizing on corporate and governmental efforts to curb global warming. How much China's actions will do for the atmosphere remains an open question.

Concerns about the world's rising temperature have prompted many industrialized countries to cap the amount of carbon dioxide and other global-warming gases companies can emit. One way companies can comply is by bankrolling emission-cutting projects in the developing world, where such projects often are cheaper than back home. In return, the Western companies receive "carbon credits" that essentially allow them to continue to emit greenhouse gases themselves.

The credits, which can be bought and sold, have led to a burgeoning global "carbon market." The World Bank, a major player in the market, estimates the market was valued at $21.5 billion in the first three quarters of 2006, about double its value in all of 2005. China, the world's No. 2 global-warming emitter behind the U.S., has become the biggest source of developing-world carbon credits bought by Western investors, benefiting both Chinese corporations and Chinese government tax receipts.

The market has led to projects like one announced December 2005 involving two Chinese companies in Jiangsu province on China's east coast. The two will receive about $1 billion, through 2012, from a private- and public-sector consortium that includes the World Bank, utilities such as Germany's RWE AG, Deutsche Bank AG, and Japanese trading firm Mitsui & Co. The project will, through 2012, destroy about 125 million so-called CO2-equivalent tons of HFC-23, a greenhouse gas that scientists say is thousands of times more potent than CO2 and that is a byproduct of the manufacture of a common refrigerant, HCFC-22.

That means the Western investors will pay the Chinese companies roughly $8 a CO2-equivalent ton for destroying the HFC-23. That is a bargain for the Western investors, who would have to pay far more to reduce emissions back home. It also is a boon for the Chinese companies, for whom the actual cost of destroying the gas is less than $1 a CO2-equivalent ton of emissions, the metric used in the carbon market.

The deal "alleviates the carbon-emissions pressure, [and thus] does less harm to the atmosphere," said Zhang Jingyi, board secretary of one of the companies, a refrigerant-making unit of Shanghai 3F New Materials Co. "Besides, we can receive revenue from it." He said the company hasn't yet decided how it will spend the carbon revenue, though it will consider investing in other projects or paying a dividend to shareholders.

The Chinese government, meanwhile, has rolled out new policies to boost the proceeds and maximize the energy security the country gets from the new stream of foreign investment. China has mandated that only companies with a majority Chinese ownership can own projects generating carbon credits. The country also is effectively imposing minimum prices for its carbon credits, market participants say. China also is taxing the profits from the sale of the credits -- tax revenue that goes into a fund targeted to promote cleaner forms of energy.

"They're always thinking ahead all the time on this," said Neeraj Prasad, who coordinates the World Bank's carbon-market activities in East Asia and who worked with Chinese officials to set up the tax system. In setting up their carbon rules, he says, Chinese officials asked: "How much can we tax it?"

The emission-cutting projects the Chinese government says it most wants to encourage -- such as the installation of renewable-energy technology -- are taxed at 2%. The projects that Western investors most favor -- HFC-23-destruction projects like those in Jiangsu province -- are taxed at 65%.

Investors prefer the HFC-23-destruction deals because the gas's potency compared with CO2, and the relatively low cost of installing the machinery that destroys the HFC-23, means the projects spin off massive numbers of carbon credits at what amounts to rock-bottom prices. Indeed, selling the credits from HFC-23-destruction projects typically generates more profit than selling the actual refrigerant.

As a result, regulators worry that the carbon market is encouraging companies in the developing world to make more of the underlying refrigerant than they otherwise would -- so they can produce more of the global-warming gas, destroy it, and sell the credits. Such a "perverse incentive," as the United Nations calls it, would be problematic because the refrigerant itself both threatens the ozone layer and contributes to global warming.

Whether the carbon market actually is prompting more production of HFC-23 than otherwise would have occurred is unclear. Demand for the underlying refrigerant, HCFC-22, is rising along with incomes around the world, and production is expected to soar in coming years in China as well as in much of the developing world, where it isn't scheduled to be restricted by ozone-layer rules for nearly a decade. Officials with a U.N.-affiliated panel that helps govern the carbon market are studying the issue and plan to discuss it in May.

More broadly, critics worry that the HFC-23-destruction projects are siphoning Western carbon-market investment away from the kind of emission-reduction projects the market was designed to encourage: those that generate energy more cleanly, such as natural-gas-fired power plants and wind turbines.

Even some market participants involved in the HFC-23 deals say China's effective imposition of a minimum carbon-credit price makes it tougher to finance clean-energy projects, because those projects require relatively greater upfront capital, often from Western investors, who in return want to be able to buy the resulting carbon credits at a lower price. A developing country like China is "shooting [itself] in the foot" by imposing a de facto credit-price floor, says Paul Bodnar, who helps assemble carbon projects in China for Climate Change Capital, a London-based company active in the market. "Because you're discouraging precisely the kind of [clean-energy] investment that the [carbon market] was supposed to encourage."

Chinese government officials didn't respond to questions for this article. They have cited their clean-energy fund as evidence of their effort to help the environment. The World Bank's Mr. Prasad says that fund is likely to reach about $1 billion over the next few years.

China plays down HFC-23-destruction projects. "We would prefer to have more energy efficiency and renewable energy projects that could help alleviate poverty in the countryside," Lu Xuedu, deputy director of China's Office of Global Environment Affairs in the Ministry of Science and Technology, said in a statement in October.

Rules governing the carbon market say that only those chemical factories operating prior to 2001 can qualify to sell carbon credits from the destruction of HFC-23. But in November, at a U.N. global-warming conference in Nairobi, Kenya, Chinese officials asked for a change in the rules to allow new plants to generate credits, according to John Hay, a spokesman for the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change, a body involved in overseeing the projects.

At the Nairobi conference, U.N.-affiliated officials considered a measure that would allow new HFC-23-destruction projects to qualify for the sale of credits, but would steer most of the revenue to a third party that could in turn spend it on environmentally beneficial projects such as switching production to another refrigerant that is less harmful. China's representatives blocked agreement, according to attendees.

As Grip Of Censors Endures In China, A Satirical Poem Leads To Jail Time (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, January 8, 2007

PENGSHUI, China -- All his life, Qin Zhongfei has been an ardent reader, a lover of literature and an amateur poet. But the drama he lived in this little mountain town, Qin said, has taught him that putting his thoughts into verse can be dangerous in China.

"I used to write poetry all the time, but I haven't written any lately," he said with a wan smile, repeatedly wringing his hands and wiping his high forehead during a recent interview. "This was a huge disaster."

Qin, 31, spent a month in jail on criminal charges because of a poem he wrote satirizing local officials accused of corruption. He was released only after several out-of-town newspaper articles related his fate and the central government in Beijing stepped in to halt the prosecution.

What happened to Qin, a mild bureaucrat in the county education department, was by any measure an abuse of power by local authorities here in the remote and wooded hills of central China. But more broadly, it was a vivid reminder of the Communist Party's enduring determination to control information and opinion among China's 1.3 billion people.

Since the party took power in 1949 under Mao Zedong, it has maintained tight censorship over radio, television, newspapers, movies, fine arts and books, carefully selecting what Chinese are allowed to know and enjoy. Human expression, it has decreed, must follow the party's lead.

But as China has opened to the world -- and as the use of cellphones and the Internet has become more common -- the censors' mission has become more difficult.

Still, controls persist. To carry out official policy, censors ban coverage of certain stories -- Qin's was censored from television -- and force the party organ, People's Daily, to fax over the front page every night for approval. Roomfuls of technicians have been enlisted to monitor millions of computers and cut off Web sites the party judges to be dangerous to its monopoly on power or unhealthy for the morals of young Chinese.

President Hu Jintao's ascension to power more than three years ago generated hopes that information controls would loosen as part of the economic opening he has championed. But they have tightened instead. Several prominent editors have been fired over the past two years -- the most recent one last month -- for straining at censors' guidelines. According to the Committee to Protect Journalists, 30 Chinese journalists are in prison for what they wrote.

A 10-Minute Lark

Weighty matters such as freedom of expression were far from Qin's mind on a stifling hot Aug. 15 when he arose from an after-lunch nap on the faux leather gray couch in his office. The cellphone lying on his desk had just signaled the arrival of a message, he said, so he stepped over to take a look.

It was a friend making fun of the local leadership, which was embroiled in several corruption scandals. The Communist Party secretary, Ma Ping, had already come under investigation and been transferred out. The county administrator and the new party secretary were being scrutinized by a team of party inspectors sent from Chongqing, the provincial capital about 200 miles to the west.

The inspectors, it seemed, had their work cut out for them. The half-finished Rainbow Bridge arced over the Wu River but never reached the other side. A lot of money was appropriated for the new Baiyun Middle School, but somehow construction never started. The Tiger's Mouth hotel, with a view over the dramatic Wu River gorge, was an incomplete shell with no sign it would ever be completed.

So to while away the afternoon, Qin took his friend's comments and turned them into a satirical poem, full of puns and comical allusions. "The horse has run far away," it began, making a pun on Ma's departure as secretary and the fact that his family name can mean "horse." Zhou Wei, the county administrator, was singled out for his name's similarity to the Chinese word for Viagra. Lan Qinghua, the new secretary, also got roasted with a pun that turned his name into "incompetent and gutless."

"Look at Pengshui County today," the poem went on. "It's full of foul air and conflicts between officials and the public cannot be halted."

Qin's friends acknowledged that the verse was not great literature. The young bureaucrat had always displayed literary ambitions that may have been greater than his talent, they joked.

Qin himself described the composition as more of a lark than serious poetry. "It only took 10 minutes," he said. "I didn't think it would be such a big deal."

But then Qin did something that would turn it into a big deal. He transmitted the poem to the cellphones of a half-dozen friends. They in turn transmitted it to their friends, in a widening circle. Eventually it ended up in the cellphone of Zhang Fu'An, chairman of Pengshui County's local People's Congress. Outraged, he took it to the county administrator, who was equally upset and asked the Public Security Bureau to identify the author.

The security sleuths interrogated Qin's friends and backtracked cellphone messages for two weeks, eventually tracing the offensive poem to Qin. At about 5 p.m. Aug. 31, two policemen stepped into Qin's office on the sixth floor of the county Education Committee building and confronted the poet.

Qin, his black hair carefully combed down and his wire-rim glasses in place as always, at first denied he was the author, according to Li Xingchen, a Chongqing journalist who investigated the case. The two police officers left to check with their superiors, Li said, but returned within 10 minutes.

"We know it's you," they said, and Qin confessed.'Modern-Day Word Crime'

The policemen hauled Qin to the station to be interrogated. By the next day, he was detained on suspicion of criminal libel, which carries a penalty of up to three years in prison. His wife, Chen Qiong, was advised to get him an attorney. The office of the procurator filed formal charges Sept. 11, and Qin's office, cellphone and computer were searched for incriminating evidence.

The case, meanwhile, had struck a journalistic nerve with Li. He wrote an article for a blog denouncing Qin's treatment as "a modern-day word crime," harking back to a much-ridiculed Qing dynasty practice of jailing writers who tripped over the intricate Mandarin language of the time.

The historical reference caught people's fancy across the country. Internet comment flourished. A Hong Kong newspaper, not subject to the mainland's censorship rules, published the first article. Then mainland newspapers took up the dare; several carried their own accounts. Eventually, even a Web site run by the official People's Daily allowed someone to post an article.

"The thing got bigger and bigger," recalled Li, a writer for a Chongqing real estate magazine who has resolved for 2007 to write a book on his ideas for improving China.

In Chongqing, the provincial capital that administers Pengshui, authorities were becoming increasingly embarrassed. The Chongqing Propaganda Department ordered an investigation and, true to its mission, banned broadcast stations and newspapers in the Chongqing area from reporting on the fuss.

But the leaders of Pengshui were not to be deterred. The Propaganda Department refused to explain its determination to prosecute Qin, although Meng Dehua, a deputy party secretary, had earlier told reporters the poem could demoralize county workers if its author went unpunished. So the Public Security Bureau went to the People's Court here in the county seat Sept. 27 and asked for a quick conviction. The judge responded that there was no case. So the Public Security Bureau appealed to the No. 4 Intermediate Court in Chongqing. It got the same response: No case.

Twice frustrated, police offered to release Qin on bail but without dropping the charges. On his attorney's advice, Qin at first refused, demanding to be tried or exonerated. But eventually, he agreed to be released under the guarantee of a local middle school principal and distant relative. On Sept. 30, he walked out of jail and into the spotlight's glare.

By then, several Chinese newspapers and magazines with a national readership had weighed in with lengthy reports after visiting Pengshui. Even a magazine sponsored by the official New China News Agency had a story.

"You have become a famous international criminal," a co-worker joked to Qin.

Distressed by the furor, local police notified Qin that he should again get an attorney, implying that the case was still alive and that he could be arrested again if the reporters kept coming.

For his part, Qin, shaken by his time in jail, was trying without much success to resume his life as a quiet bureaucrat and father of a 5-year-old boy.

DOJ_NMG_0113322

By the middle of October, according to a source in Chongqing, the central government sent an order to the Chongqing Communist Party secretariat saying the Pengshui problem should be fixed, and right away. Backing up the order, the party's Central Discipline Inspection Commission sent a team to Pengshui to look into the matter.

Feeling the heat, authorities informed Qin on Oct. 23 that the charges had been dropped and told him he could apply for compensation for the time he spent behind bars. The compensation, about $280, was handed over even before Qin had time to apply for it.

"It's impossible for someone who has experienced such a big thing, something that affected my life and work so much -- after that, it's impossible not to have feelings about this," Qin said, wearing a brown striped suit along with a blue plaid shirt and matching tie to receive a foreign journalist.

"But I just don't want to go into it," he added. "The thing is, I think, really, I wish you would go to the Propaganda Department and ask them. I hope you understand my problem."

Behind Bombs, Signs Of A Turbulent Year For Thailand (NYT)

By Seth Mydans

The New York Times, January 8, 2007

BANGKOK, Jan. 6 — A string of lethal bombs that disrupted New Year's celebrations here has signaled the start of a difficult year for Thailand as entrenched elites struggle for control of the country's future.

It is still unclear who set the bombs, which killed three people and wounded more than 40 before and after the New Year's Eve fireworks.

But the message they sent to Thais was that a showdown is likely in the coming months between the ruling military junta and the opponents it unseated in a coup more than three months ago.

"The country is going to be in commotion," said Surin Pitsuwan, a former foreign minister who is no longer in the government. "Old elements will certainly regroup. I think the ruling group has been jolted into a new realization that things are not going to be as calm as they thought."

A struggle for power that began with street demonstrations more than a year ago appears to be resurfacing after pausing for breath after the nonviolent coup on Sept. 19 ended the five-year tenure of Thaksin Shinawatra as prime minister.

It had seemed an almost painless, minimalist coup with the stated intention of setting Thailand back on the track of democracy, which Mr. Thaksin had been systematically undermining.

But the leaders of the coup, treading softly in an attempt to stay within the law — once they had seized power by force — had left Mr. Thaksin's supporters free to regroup and plot a comeback.

On Friday, the military-appointed prime minister, Gen. Surayud Chulanont, warned of a dangerous time ahead and told government ministries and the public to be alert for possible violence.

"We have to watch out and take care of places and our own safety for a certain period of time, at least the next one to two months," he said. He did not explain the time frame, but political tensions are not likely to dissipate so quickly.

Mr. Thaksin was abroad at the time of the coup, but he appears determined to return, and his network of patronage and power still permeates the country, from village headmen to the highest levels of government, the police and the business community.

Since it took power, the junta has increased its military readiness and warned of what it calls "undercurrents" of opposition from Mr. Thaksin's backers.

The disruptions caused by the coup have created a range of potential enemies as well as openings for opportunistic political forces.

Speculation about the people behind the bombs includes not only Mr. Thaksin's supporters but also other political groups; the police, who formed part of his base of power; disaffected soldiers; and even feuding members of the junta and the civilian government it appointed. Most analysts doubt that Muslim insurgents from southern Thailand were involved.

The new sense of crisis began with the dawn of the new year with accusations and insinuations, then a swarm of bomb threats, then troop deployments "to provide security," then a tense round of rumors of a coup within a coup, which a chorus of military men strongly denied.

Defense Minister Boonrawd Somtas said Friday, "The investigators have concluded that the bombers were men in uniform, both green and khaki," the colors worn by the military and the police.

General Surayut said those who planted the bombs and spread the coup rumors were aiming to create "a state of confusion and chaos" that would destabilize the government.

After seizing power, the junta appointed a civilian government and promised to produce a new constitution and to return the country to democratic rule with elections late this year.

DOJ_NMG_0113323

But the democratizing trend in Thailand that reached its peak in 1997 with the adoption of a liberal Constitution could now be in decline for some time to come.

The decline began with Mr. Thaksin, who manipulated the Constitution to increase his power. He seized personal control of both its checks and its balances, packing government commissions and the Senate with his supporters while intimidating the press and marginalizing independent agencies.

Now there is concern that the country's military rulers may seek to maintain some form of power. They have sent signals that the new constitution may offer fewer freedoms and more limitations than the one it is to replace.

At the moment, though, the country's leaders are being criticized for being too scrupulous.

They have not seized the assets of Mr. Thaksin, a telecommunications tycoon whose billions have been one of his tools of power; they have not revoked his diplomatic passport; they have not brought corruption charges against him; and they have left his major supporters free to reorganize and plan.

"To me, the bombs show that the coup has gone wrong," said Thitinan Pongsudhirak, director of the Institute of Security and International Studies at Chulalongkorn University. "They indicate that the military has lost control, has not been able to consolidate and demonstrate their rationale. The coup succeeded in ousting Thaksin but not much else."

On the battlefield, the generals' efforts to contain the southern insurgency have been met by increased violence.

In governing they have stumbled over proposed regulations involving liquor sales and a lottery.

On the economic front they have been condemned by foreign investors and bankers for causing a stock market crash in mid-December when they imposed and then modified strict currency controls.

In their attempts to address corruption, a chief rationale for the coup, they are facing a stubborn bureaucracy that is heavy with Thaksin appointees and is prepared to wait them out.

In their stated aim to promote national reconciliation, the generals' power grab seems only to have made things worse.

One concern among political analysts and diplomats is that the bomb attacks could lead to a harsher form of military rule and could delay the return to democracy.

The challenge to those in power, analysts say, is to reassert themselves as energetic managers and keepers of the peace without resorting to the heavy-handed measures more typical of military juntas.

But some members of the junta have let it be known that they are chafing at this slow pace and may already feel, in the words of Sunai Phasuk, a political analyst with the Human Rights Watch monitoring group, that "the time for being a gentleman is up."

Happily Ever AAFTA (WSJ)

By Robert B. Zoellick

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

This year President Bush and the Democratic-led Congress should launch a new Association of American Free Trade Agreements (AAFTA). The AAFTA could shape the future of the Western Hemisphere, while offering a new foreign and economic policy design that combines trade, open societies, development and democracy. In concert with successful immigration reform, the AAFTA would signal to the Americas that, despite the trials of war and Asia's rising economic influence, U.S. global strategy must have a hemispheric foundation.

Successful and sustainable international strategies must be constructed across administrations. Ronald Reagan called for free trade throughout the Americas, opened U.S. markets to our Caribbean neighbors, and completed an FTA with Canada. George H.W. Bush completed negotiations for a North American FTA, offered trade preferences to the Andean countries, negotiated peace in Central America, and freed Panama. Bill Clinton secured the passage of Nafta, launched work on a Free Trade Area of the Americas, and backed Plan Colombia.

George W. Bush enacted FTAs with Chile, the five states of Central America and the Dominican Republic. He also completed FTAs with Colombia, Peru and Panama. If Congress passes these agreements, the U.S. will finally have an unbroken line of free trade partners stretching from Alaska to the tip of South America. Not counting the U.S., this free trade assembly would comprise two-thirds of both the population and GDP of the Americas.

The AAFTA would draw together these 13 partners to build on the gains of free trade. It could also include the island states of the Caribbean Basin Trade Partnership Act. Starting with a small secretariat, perhaps in Miami, the AAFTA should advance hemispheric economic integration; link development and democracy with trade and aid; improve working and environmental conditions; and continue to pursue the goal of free trade throughout the hemisphere. It might even foster cooperation in the WTO's global trade negotiations. The AAFTA might be connected to an academic center, which could combine research and practice through an association among universities in the Americas.

The AAFTA could promote the business of trade by helping the private sector learn how to use FTAs, while encouraging business feedback that identifies impediments -- such as customs complications, regulatory red tape, the lack of financial, energy or other services, and infrastructure problems. It might use technology to create a virtual network of business opportunities, especially for small business.

Moreover the AAFTA should concretely demonstrate how aid and trade can be mutually supportive. U.S. Millennium Challenge Corporation grants are already enabling Central American countries to invest in physical and legal infrastructure matched to trade expansion. The U.S. Overseas Private Investment Corporation, Ex-Im Bank and Trade and Development Agency programs could be integrated, too. AID projects for labor and the environment could promote core standards, best practices, benchmarking and corporate social responsibility projects. The Inter-American Development Bank, a leader in connecting aid and trade, might help with grants and loans to strengthen small business, the economic empowerment of indigenous communities, and education -- all connected to open societies in a global economy. Finally, over time the AAFTA partners might examine how the various FTAs could be knitted together, although these steps would likely require new congressional action.

The U.S. cannot afford to lose interest in its own neighborhood. The pied pipers of populism in Latin America are taking advantage of the genuine frustrations, especially in indigenous communities, of people who have not been able to climb the ladder of opportunity. We should not let these populists dictate the debate. We already have seen that electorates in Mexico, Colombia, Peru, Central America and the Dominican Republic have recognized that trade with the U.S. offers jobs and hope. We need to build on that foundation with results that link trade, aid, good governance, property rights and better working and environmental conditions. Even where populists prevailed, substantial constituencies who view the U.S. as an economic partner have constrained backward policies.

To launch the AAFTA, the president and the congressional leadership must stand up to America's populist protectionists, too. The new chairmen of the House Ways and Means and Senate Finance Committees, Charles Rangel and Max Baucus, have signaled that trade may offer the best economic policy opportunity to work with the president. As Finance Committee Chair in 2001-02, Sen. Baucus worked closely with Sen. Grassley to authorize the negotiations for these FTAs. Rangel helped push preferential trade for Africa and the Caribbean. In response to urgings from New Democrats and Blue Dogs, the U.S. is the only country that includes mutual labor and environmental commitments in its FTAs, backed by enforcement. The administration worked with the International Labor Organization (ILO) and its developing country partners to check their laws with core ILO standards. In cooperation with Sen. Baucus, the administration developed special environmental review and comment procedures for Cafta, strengthening the role of local NGOs. The AAFTA offers more: an opportunity to design labor and environmental partnerships that would complement the rules in the FTAs. The alternative -- ignoring Latin America or defeating FTAs to court economic isolationists -- would leave the causes of workers and the environment to unlikely friends: poverty and populism.

The president and Congress are understandably absorbed by the dangers of war. But the United States cannot afford to ignore the rest of the world. The U.S. trade agenda has turned out to be our strongest lifeline to developing democracies in the Americas. It is not enough. With the passage of the FTAs with Colombia, Peru and Panama, the president and the Congress could use the free trade framework to spur an ongoing dynamic for development and democracy. Just as Alexander Hamilton created a self-reinforcing financial system that vitalized America to deal with future challenges, the AAFTA would create a working, adaptable mechanism that would strengthen the Americas in the 21st century.

Mr. Zoellick was U.S. trade representative and deputy secretary of state. He is now vice chairman, International, at Goldman Sachs.

Coca Democracy (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, January 8, 2007

Evo Morales is an anti-American extremist who wants to turn Bolivia into another Venezuela. That naturally alarms Washington, but not enough to halt its war on drugs, which is aiding the president -- and leader of Bolivia's coca-growing peasant movement -- in his bid to become a dictator.

In a recent interview with the Bolivian Catholic radio station Fides, Mr. Morales explained that in 2003, when he was at a conference in Havana, Fidel Castro told him "not to stage an armed uprising" but to "make transformations, democratic revolutions, what [Venezuelan President Hugo] Chávez is doing."

The process Fidel advised requires the slow dismantling of institutions that act as checks on the executive while maintaining the guise of democracy. This calls for healthy poll numbers even while the rule of law is being trampled. Mr. Chávez had oil revenues to keep the masses happy while he put a noose around democracy. But Evo isn't so fortunate and he can't push through a constitutional coup without popular backing. So to generate support he has relied heavily on his defense of coca growers against a U.S. policy that presses countries in Latin America to destroy their crops.

Since his inauguration last January Mr. Morales has been dutifully complying with the Cuban dictator's instructions. He has purged the military leadership, broken contracts with energy investors to signal his control over the sector, and pushed through an election for a constituent assembly that is charged with rewriting the highest law of the land.

So far so good. But the assembly election didn't turn out the way he had hoped. In the event, Mr. Morales's Movement Toward Socialism (MAS) party won only 53% of the seats. Since the law requires a two-thirds majority to approve the new document, the president's party is looking at compromise with his political opponents in the drafting process.

Apparently this is the sort of thing Fidel did not counsel. So now the Morales government is insisting that ratification of the new constitution should require only a simple majority vote in the assembly or a simple majority in a national referendum.

To win on this point, Mr. Morales will have to run roughshod over the law and he has already begun. Over the Christmas holiday he unilaterally named four new justices to the Supreme Court's 12-seat bench. The president says these are legal recess appointments, but the opposition is crying foul because the MAS-controlled congress never initiated the nomination process that would have safeguarded the independence of the court. Bolivian democrats are worried that Mr. Morales will also try to alter the makeup of the constitutional court and the electoral council to favor his own objectives.

Things looks grim for democrats who believe that Mr. Morales is trying to remake the constitution in the image and likeness of Mr. Chávez's Venezuela, but they're not going down without a fight.

The center of the opposition movement is based in the energy-rich, agricultural lowlands of the eastern part of the country, where there is a long history of agitation in favor of more decentralized government. The Morales presidency, with its promise to expropriate and redistribute land, its heavy-handed intervention in the natural gas sector, and now its attempt at a constitutional coup, has heightened that sentiment and provoked a strong backlash against La Paz. In July, when Bolivians voted on the constitutional assembly, they also answered another ballot question regarding departmental (state) autonomy. In Santa Cruz, Pando, Beni and Tarija, autonomy won hands down.

More recently the east took to the streets. On Dec. 15 the opposition organized a "townhall meeting" in Bolivia's largest city, Santa Cruz, to rally against Mr. Morales's power grab. Pro-Morales supporters blockaded a highway outside of the city so that buses carrying protestors could not get through. As many as 60 people were injured and most of the buses had to turn back. But the rally was a success. An estimated 800,000 people congregated under the city's Christ the Redeemer statue to demand that a new constitution be ratified only with a two-thirds vote in the assembly, and that the call for autonomy be respected.

Mr. Morales, who badly needs to maintain the appearance of public support so that the international community tolerates his takeover, had to be embarrassed by this outpouring of democratic opposition. He is trying to spin the constitutional crisis as a confrontation between races and economic classes. But he has to worry about places like the poor and largely indigenous city of El Alto, just above La Paz, where there is evidence to suggest that many who voted for him are unhappy with his unlawful intervention in the constitutional process and growing impatient with his failure to deliver on economic promises.

This is where U.S. drug policy comes in. Railing against the Yankees who want to destroy peasant income has proven extremely effective in keeping the Morales base -- the country's indigenous coca growers who brought him to power -- energized and his numbers afloat.

He reaffirmed this last month. As his opposition swelled he suddenly announced that he would authorize a near doubling of the number of hectares that may legally produce coca. Then last week he inaugurated a coca industrialization plant in the province of Cochabamba, financed by his government along with Cuba and Venezuela. According to press reports, Mr. Morales told the Cochabamba crowd that coca "never killed anyone" and that the U.S. "should have a law to do away with drug addicts."

Mr. Morales shouldn't wish too hard for that. If Washington policy makers ever decide to tackle the demand for cocaine and stop blaming supply, Mr. Morales's political career would be in jeopardy.

The Big Picture

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 25

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington 26
White House: 26

TERRORISM NEWS:

Litvinenko Poisoning Said To Worry Anti-Terror Professionals. On its front page, the Washington Post (1/7, Finn, 690K) details efforts to secure nuclear materials in the wake of the poisoning death of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko. "An international investigation is trying to track" the small amount of polonium-210 that killed Litvinenko "back to its source. Detectives from Scotland Yard have said nothing about where the trail of evidence may be leading; Russian officials have been more willing to talk, saying that [the production plant in] Avangard is tightly audited and that illicit production of polonium-210 is technically possible at many of the world's reactors." However, the Post notes, "Russia's near total domination of the world's legal trade in the substance has focused new international attention on the country's production system and controls. In addition, Litvinenko's death has created new concern among regulators that the substance might be used as an instrument of murder by terrorists." His murder "has caused anti-terrorism officials to worry that an explosive or airborne dispersal of polonium, particularly in a crowded, enclosed space, could cause numerous fatalities and sow widespread panic, scientists said. Compromise a food or water supply, they said, and the consequences could be even more dire."

Sheehan To Protest At Guantanamo Next Week. The AP (1/6) reports, "American 'peace mom' Cindy Sheehan called for the closure of the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, as she and other activists arrived in Cuba on Saturday to draw attention to the nearly 400 terror suspects held at the remote site. Sheehan is among 12 human rights and anti-war activists who will travel across this Caribbean island next week, arriving at the main gate of the Guantanamo base in eastern Cuba on Thursday -- five years after the first prisoners were flown in."

Detainee's Letter Plays Key Role In Italian Rendition Trial. The Chicago Tribune (1/7, Crewdson, 617K) reports, "'This is how they kidnapped me from Italy…and how they tortured and imprisoned me in Egypt.' So begins a 6,300-word, handwritten letter, composed in an Egyptian prison cell by radical Muslim cleric Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr. His abduction by the CIA is at the center of an unprecedented judicial proceeding set to open in Italy this week. … In a kidnapping case against 26 Americans and five Italian intelligence operatives, including the one-time CIA chief in Rome and Italy's former top spymaster, Nasr, better known as Abu Omar, will speak to the court through his letter, telling his story for the first time in his own words." The Tribune notes Abu Omar "was walking to his mosque in Milan on Feb. 17, 2003, when he was stopped on the street by a man who identified himself as a police officer. The cleric wrote that he was pulled into a van, beaten and taken by plane to Egypt. … What followed, according to his letter, was torture with electric shocks, beatings that caused him to lose the hearing in one ear, and sexual abuse."

CIA Cases Spark Debate Over Torture. The Chicago Tribune (1/7, Crewdson) reports, "The use of torture has been prohibited in the United States since the ratification in 1787 of the 8th Amendment to the Constitution barring 'cruel and unusual punishment.' … 'We do not condone torture,' President Bush has declared. 'I have never ordered torture. I will never order torture. The values of this country are such that torture is not a part of our soul and our being.' … Yet some human rights groups contend that a technique known as 'waterboarding,' which simulates drowning and reportedly has been used by the U.S. on some terrorist suspects, is torture. These groups also argue that some psychological interrogation techniques, such as sleep deprivation and exposure to loud music, contravene the 8th Amendment." The Tribune continues, "While those debates continue, there is no question that terrorism suspects such as Abu Omar have been captured abroad by the CIA and transported to third countries whose police and intelligence services routinely employ interrogation methods, such as electric shock, that everyone agrees constitute torture. … Bush said on March 16, 2005, that before a third-country 'rendition' of a suspected terrorist can take place, the CIA must obtain from the receiving country 'the promise that they won't be tortured.' … Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales said on May 3, 2006, that the actual standard applied by the U.S. in choosing a destination country is less stringent: whether a suspect is 'more likely than not' to be tortured." The Tribune adds, "Canadian government and United Nations investigations have found that individuals 'rendered' by the CIA to Egypt and Syria were mistreated despite assurances that they would not be tortured. … 'It's almost impossible to talk about rendition apart from the torture element,' says Joanne Mariner, a lawyer with Human Rights Watch, 'since that is and has always been one of the central issues with renditions. The CIA knows that Egypt practices torture routinely, particularly against suspected Islamists.' … Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), whose Judiciary Committee has just begun an investigation of CIA renditions, agrees. … 'We diminish our own values as a nation--and lose credibility as an advocate of human rights around the world--by engaging in, or outsourcing, torture,' Leahy wrote Gonzales in November."

NYTimes Calls On Democrats To Address Bush's "Assault On Civil Liberties." The New York Times (1/7, WK13, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes President Bush "seems to have interpreted his party's drubbing as a mandate to keep pursuing his fantasy of victory in Iraq and to press ahead undaunted with his assault on civil liberties and the judicial system. … The Democratic majority in Congress has a moral responsibility to address all these issues: fixing the profound flaws in the military tribunals act, restoring the rule of law over Mr. Bush's rogue intelligence operations and restoring the balance of powers between Congress and the executive branch. So far, key Democrats…have said these issues are high priorities for them. We would lend such efforts our enthusiastic backing and hope…Democratic leaders are not swayed by the absurd notion circulating in Washington that the Democrats should now 'look ahead' rather than use their new majority to right the dangerous wrongs of the last six years of Mr. Bush's one-party rule. This is a false choice. Dealing with these issues is not about the past. The administration's assault on some of the nation's founding principles continues unabated."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

McConnell Takes On Competing Responsibilities As DNI. The Washington Post (1/7, A10, Pincus, 690K) reports, "President Bush's choice to be the second director of national intelligence, retired Navy Vice Adm. John M. McConnell, must pick up the job of restructuring the nation's $42 billion intelligence community, which after 19 months is still very much a work in progress. … The DNI's other major role is as the president's top intelligence adviser. That means being present six mornings a week when Bush gets his national security briefing. That session offers the DNI an opportunity not only to have time with the president, but to hear and take part in the ensuing discussion with Vice President Cheney, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley and chief of staff Joshua B. Bolten, who are also in the room. This part of the job requires the DNI to take time the night before to read the roughly 28-page daily briefing report and to show up at his Old Executive Office Building suite next to the White House at about 6:30 each morning to go over the latest intelligence." The Post notes, "Another aspect of the DNI's role as top intelligence adviser to the president is attendance at high-level White House meetings, which have been increasingly frequent since the Iraq war began. … How McConnell will divide his time between this advisory role and the intelligence community duties, should he be confirmed, remains to be seen."

Congress Unhappy With Pace Of FEMA Overhaul. The Washington Times (1/7, Waterman, 88K) reports, "Lawmakers are frustrated with the lack of progress on a congressionally mandated overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, designed to ensure that flaws that dogged the response to Hurricane Katrina are fixed. In a letter sent late last month to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and released last week, members of both the House and Senate homeland security committees complained about being kept in the dark over progress on the changes, which they feared was lagging. … The law effectively reconstitutes FEMA as an independent agency within the department. Mr. Chertoff opposed the overhaul, which was included in the must-pass Homeland Security appropriations bill and signed by President Bush in October."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Iraq Strategy Said To Combine Surge With Jobs Program. Coverage of President Bush's developing strategy on Iraq noted its dual aspects as well as widespread skepticism on whether it could work. The New York Times (1/7, A1, Sanger, 1.16M) reports in a negative article that the President's "new Iraq strategy calls for a rapid influx of forces that could add as many as 20,000 American combat troops to Baghdad, supplemented with a jobs program costing as much as $1 billion intended to employ Iraqis in projects including painting schools and cleaning streets, according to American officials who are piecing together the last parts of the initiative." But "even in outlining the plan, some American officials acknowledged deep skepticism about whether the new plan could succeed. They said two-thirds of the promised Iraqi force would consist of Kurdish pesh merga units to be sent from northern Iraq, and they said some doubts remained about whether they would show up in Baghdad and were truly committed to quelling sectarian fighting." President Bush's coming speech is acknowledged by them as part of "a last-ditch effort to salvage the mission in Iraq."

The AP (1/7, Riechmann) reports, "The idea of a troop buildup is getting a cool reception on Capitol Hill and from some military leaders who claim there is no military solution to the problems in Iraq where 140,000 troops already are deployed. ... Military analysts say Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, who recently finished his tour as the No. 2 general in Iraq, has recommended a short-term jobs program. Others familiar with the plan say Bush is favoring: short-term jobs programs and extending micro-loans to small business; increasing the amount of money that military commanders can spend quickly on local projects to improve the daily lives of Iraqis."

The Washington Post (1/7, A1, Abramowitz, Wright, Tyson, 690K) reports that there is "growing skepticism inside and outside the administration that the emerging package of extra troops, economic assistance and political benchmarks for the Baghdad government will make any more than a marginal difference in stabilizing the country. ... Many officials at the State and Defense departments also doubt that the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is capable of making the necessary reforms. … Meanwhile, the Joint Chiefs of Staff are worried about overstretching the Army and Marines."

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, A1, McManus, Reynolds, 850K) reports that a troop surge after losing both houses of Congress "might sound paradoxical, but aides say Bush's willingness to send more troops makes sense based on two beliefs that have long guided his war strategy. The first is that the price of leaving Iraq would be greater than the cost of staying. The second is that the public will accept the burdens of war if convinced that success is still possible." According to anonymous aides, "Bush believes that the United States still has a chance to stop Iraq from descending into civil war — and, on the other side of the equation, that the consequences of withdrawal would be disastrous. He thinks it's too early to turn primary responsibility for security in Baghdad over to Iraqi security forces, whose performance has been disappointing."

Gannett (1/7, Yaukey) reports that the plan "has sparked intense debate even among advocates who differ on how many troops to send and for how long. ... A prolonged surge into 2008, experts say, could require tapping Guard and Reserve units, which provided close to half the U.S. force in Iraq in 2005." Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "pledged to Bush on Thursday that he would commit three additional battalions to Baghdad, but his record of follow-through raises doubts."

Newsday (1/7, Gordon) reports that a surge "would be the biggest gamble of George W. Bush's presidency -- escalating the war in Iraq with as many as 20,000 U.S. troops when most Americans just want to get out." In many ways, "a surge would amount to a repudiation of the administration's current strategy, which has focused heavily on reducing U.S. presence in Iraq by pulling back from the fight and turning over more and more security duties to Iraqi forces. ... Even supporters of the plan paint it as essentially Bush's last stand: one final, high-stakes bid to salvage something approaching victory."

Democrats Charge Bush Reshuffled Commanders To Find Surge Backers. ABC World News (1/6, story 3, 1:55, Sciutto, 8.78M) reported, "The Democrats now in charge on Capitol Hill say the President reshuffled military leadership to find commanders who would back a troop surge." ABC (Morrell): "The White House insists that opinions on troop levels had nothing to do with these personnel changes, but it's not lost on anyone here in Washington that generals Abizaid and Casey, no fans of a surge, are out. And they are being replaced by Adm. Fallon and Gen. Petraeus. The latter is a big advocate of more boots on the ground."

The Washington Post (1/7, A1, Atkinson, 690K) profiles Petraeus, depicting his abilities, the difficulty of the task facing him, and the existence of some personal detractors in the military: "Long recognized as one of the Army's premier intellectuals, with a PhD from Princeton to complement his West Point education, Petraeus, 54, will inherit one of the toughest assignments handed any senior officer since the Vietnam War. He takes command of 132,000 U.S. troops in a country shattered by insurgency and sectarian bloodletting, with a home front that is divided and disheartened after 3,000 American combat deaths." Although "some peers" consider him "arrogant or excessively ambitious," others view him "as perhaps the last, best hope for success in Iraq.

Democrats Could Face "Crucial Test" On Iraq. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/7, A1, Sandalow, 384K) reports, "President Bush and the new Congress are on a collision course over Iraq that could overshadow the Democrats' '100-hour agenda" and end up defining Rep. Nancy Pelosi's tenure as House speaker." If Bush "announces his intention to deploy as many as 20,000 additional U.S. troops in Iraq, he may encounter widespread political and public defiance. It will quickly test the new Democratic majority's capacity to stand up to the commander in chief in a time of war, and the ability of the legislative branch to seize control of the White House's controversial foreign policy." The Chronicle adds, "For now, Democrats are counting on growing public opposition and congressional oversight to force that change. Pelosi has held open the possibility of attaching conditions to the Pentagon's appropriation bill, which the House expects to receive in the next few weeks. ... But Pelosi has ruled out using what many believe is the legislative branch's most potent weapon -- its ability to cut off the funds with which the Pentagon wages war."

CNN (1/6, Quijano) reported, "In another sign of the political reality facing President Bush, Nancy Pelosi yesterday, after an event honoring her in Baltimore, said that the President does not have a blank check from Congress when it comes to Iraq policy. At the same time, as far as this troop surge option goes, there's been a great deal of debate as to whether or not that would, in fact, be effective. Members of the military as well as lawmakers on Capitol Hill, some of them expressing concern that, in fact, there should be a clearly defined mission, they believe, in order for a troop surge to be effective. Also, they want to see it tied to economic and political steps in Iraq."

Lieberman Goes His Own Way On Iraq. The Washington Post (1/7, A4, Murray, 690K) reports that Sen. Joe Lieberman "was sworn in last week as the chamber's one and only 'independent Democrat,' with the emphasis on 'independent.' On most issues, including big domestic priorities, he expects to vote as he has for the past 18 years, as a loyal Democrat. But on Iraq, Lieberman is more in sync with Bush than are many Republicans. He is a passionate defender of the war as a death struggle against Islamic terrorism." Democrats "grumble off the record that Lieberman is muddying an increasingly unified Democratic message on Iraq, but their public comments are cautious and generally complimentary."

McCain Makes Case For More Troops. In a Washington Post (1/7, B7) op-ed this morning, Sen. John McCain writes, "There are two keys to any increase in U.S. force levels: It must be substantial, and it must be sustained. During my recent trip, commanders there spoke to me of adding as many as five brigades (brigades consist of 3,500 to 5,000 troops) in Baghdad and one or two in Anbar province. This is the minimum we should consider. … The mission of these troops would be to implement the 'hold' element, elusive thus far, of the military's 'clear, hold, build' strategy: to maintain security in cleared areas, to protect the population and to impose the government's authority. This means establishing local outposts and forging relationships with local leaders, building intelligence networks, safeguarding economic reconstruction activities, overseeing other employment-generating projects and weaning Iraqis off of their reliance on militias for safety. Our troops would work in cooperation with Iraqi forces and stay until the completion of their mission. The worst of all worlds would be a small, short surge of U.S. forces. We have tried small surges, and they have been ineffective because our commanders lacked the forces necessary to hold territory after it was cleared. Violence, which fell dramatically while U.S. forces were present, spiked as soon as they were gone. Any new surge needs to provide enough American troops to hold the areas on their own."

WPost Critiques Surge Concept. The Washington Post (1/7, 690K) editorializes that President Bush "will face a formidable task in convincing Congress and the public that such a 'surge' makes sense. ... One [question] is whether the administration and the Army will have the political and logistical capacity to carry out the sort of surge that [Senators John McCain and Joe Lieberman], and experts at the conservative American Enterprise Institute who support them, say is necessary ... [Furthermore,] while Mr. Maliki occasionally speaks of accord, his government has pursued a sectarian agenda. If U.S. troops pacify Baghdad, Shiite politicians in the government may feel less rather than more pressure to compromise. ... The constructive alternative to a surge is not the abandonment of Iraq. Instead, it is the fashioning of a strategy that positions the United States to support the country's moderate forces over the long term -- not just 18 months but the years that may pass before the country can be stabilized. That means a smaller and sustainable military force that can focus on training and backing up the Iraqi army and fighting al-Qaeda, and an aid program that supports the elected government while seeking to marginalize its extremist elements."

Rich Says Bush Seeks "Escalation." New York Times (1/7, WK14, 1.16M) columnist Frank Rich writes, "It's against the backdrop of both the Hussein video and the Ford presidency that we must examine the prospect of that much-previewed 'surge' in Iraq — a surge, by the way, that the press should start calling by its rightful name, escalation." Ford in 1975 "knew it was way too late to make the symbolic gesture of trying to toss fresh American troops on the pyre"; in 2006, the Saddam hanging video shows "that our principal achievement in Iraq over four years has been to empower a jihadist mini-Saddam in place of the secular original." Rich adds that the surge is too small to work: "It is not meant to achieve that undefined 'victory' Mr. Bush keeps talking about but to serve his own political spin. His real mission is to float the 'we're not winning, we're not losing' status quo until Jan. 20, 2009."

Brooks Says Troop Surge Could Salvage Iraq. In his New York Times (1/7, WK14, 1.16M) column, David Brooks writes that "for over three years, President Bush sided with the light-footprint school" of military presence in Iraq, but "it is now clear that the light-footprint approach has been a disaster. If the U.S. had committed more troops and established security back in 2003…history would be different." Brooks asserts that "the surge is a good policy three years too late." To prevent a "political and humanitarian disaster" in Iraq, Brooks concludes that the US should "commit military resources, and create a political strategy, commensurate with the task of salvaging something."

Hoagland Says Rice Steering Bush Toward Salvaging Presidency. In his Washington Post (1/7, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland writes that in his coming speech President Bush "will signal whether Iraq will remain the center of his grand designs for the Middle East or will recede to being one more troublesome conflict in a zone of deadly turbulence and trade-offs. Events, and one key aide, point Bush toward the latter course, with its promise of salvaging his legacy elsewhere. The aide is Condoleezza Rice, who has developed a personal exit strategy for Iraq. She is tossing that reputation-damaging hot potato to John Negroponte." Hoagland recommends a "four-point program" to Bush: he "should acknowledge that his hopes for establishing Iraq as a united, free-market democratic model for the Arab world have fallen far short," "recognize that Iran has legitimate interests in security in Iraq and the Persian Gulf region," "be prepared to extend guarantees of territorial security for Arab states in the Gulf region," and "use Rice's new burst of Middle East activism to reinforce the changes in Iraq strategy his speech will disclose."

"Fierce Clash" In Baghdad Kills At Least 30.

Coverage of fighting in Baghdad noted the likelihood of a perception that the Iraqi government was targeting Sunni Arabs. The New York Times (1/7, A16, Santora, 1.16M) reports in a grim article, "A fierce clash left at least 30 people dead in central Baghdad late Saturday night as Iraqi Army forces fought with gunmen in an area where several residents had been killed and their bodies hanged from street lampposts, the Iraqi military said. The fighting took place in the neighborhood around Haifa Street, a mostly Sunni Arab enclave with a small Shiite population." The Times adds skeptically, "Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki announced Saturday the beginning of a new Baghdad security operation and promised to purge the government security forces of militia fighters and others with sectarian aims. But Mr. Maliki has promised such a crackdown before, and his government has been increasingly seen by Sunnis in Iraq and abroad as dominated by Shiite interests."

The Washington Post (1/7, A13, Partlow, 690K) reports, "The fighting along Haifa Street, raging into the night, killed 30 insurgents, and Iraqi soldiers captured eight others, including five Sudanese fighters, Defense Ministry spokesman Mohammed al-Askari said. ... 'The Baghdad security plan will not offer a safe shelter for outlaws, regardless of their ethnic and political affiliations, and we will punish anyone who hesitates to implement orders because of his ethnic and political background,' Maliki said. Maliki's words appeared intended to counter the perception that the plan would focus on combating Sunni insurgents. ... The announcement was greeted with little enthusiasm in Baghdad, where sectarian killing has escalated despite repeated attempts at cracking down on insurgents and militiamen."

The Washington Times/AP (1/7, A1, Hurst) reports that government aide and member of parliament Hassan al-Suneid "said the new drive would focus initially on Sunni insurgent strongholds in western Baghdad. Sunnis were likely to object, given that a large measure of today's violence in Baghdad is the work of Shi'ite militias, loyal to Mr. al-Maliki's key political backer, the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr." Al-Suneid and Prime Minister Maliki "insisted that this drive to contain militants, as opposed to a largely ineffective joint operation with American forces in the second half of last year, would succeed because it would be in the hands of Iraqi commanders who have been promised American backup and air power if they call for it. But U.S. political and military leaders -- in a message of congratulation on Iraq's Army Day -- tempered Iraqi claims of full independence."

The AP (1/6, Hurst, Abdul-Zahra) reports in a longer version of the above article that Maliki, "whose political survival depends heavily on al-Sadr, the radical anti-American cleric, is eager to show his independence of American occupation forces. ... The prime minister has repeatedly rejected U.S. demands to move against the Mahdi Army." BBC.com (1/6) also reports the fighting.

Seven More Iraqis Killed In Further Violence. The AP (1/7, Salaheddin) reports, "Gunmen killed three Sunni Muslim shopkeepers Sunday in a mixed neighborhood of Baghdad, and two pedestrians died in a roadside bomb, police said. ... In Diwaniyah, 80 miles south of the capital, gunmen assassinated Akeel al-Khalidi, a defense ministry employee, as he left his house for work, another police officer said on condition of anonymity out of fear of reprisals."

Maliki Announces Plan To End Violence In Baghdad. Under the headline, "Iraqi Leader Plans Security Push," the Washington Post (1/7, A13, Partlow, 690K) notes Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "warned Baghdad residents Saturday to expect the disruptions of a heightened military presence and said his government was ready to launch the latest effort to pacify the violent Iraqi capital." The Post adds, "Despite fierce ongoing fighting in western Iraq and violence capable of erupting almost anywhere, Baghdad remains the heart of the country's sectarian conflict. Maliki, in his speech at a morning ceremony honoring the Iraqi army, warned rival political parties against interfering in his plan." Those "words appeared intended to counter the perception that the plan would focus on combating Sunni insurgents." The Post says "Maliki's speech provided few details about the tactical or strategic changes guiding the forthcoming effort," and his remarks were "greeted with little enthusiasm in Baghdad, where sectarian killing has escalated despite repeated attempts at cracking down on insurgents and militiamen."

CNN (1/6, Whitfield) reported, "Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki says Iraqi forces are ready to implement a new security crackdown in Baghdad. It will target all militias regardless of political or religious affiliations. The announcement comes as President Bush is ready to unveil his new Iraq war plan." The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Moore, 850K) reports that Maliki spoke "five months after the U.S. military launched a plan to quell sectarian fighting that is widely regarded as a failure. Killings have steadily increased in the capital as insurgents and Shiite Muslim militia death squads continue to operate with impunity." He "revealed little about the new plan except that the military would have the main responsibility, a shift from the previous operation, which relied on police officers. Iraq's police forces are widely believed to have compromised the U.S. plan to quell sectarian fighting."

ABC World News (1/6, story 3, 1:55, Morrell, 8.78M) reported, "The White House is applauding Prime Minister Maliki's new pledge to crack down on sectarian violence, especially his willingness to go along with U.S. troops and go after both Sunni insurgents and Shia militias. Of course, they've heard tough talk from Maliki before, but one White House official told me today this was a very good speech. The official adds people here are also very encouraged that Maliki has signaled his willingness to go along with a surge of U.S. troops if that's what President Bush calls for when he unveils his new strategy for Iraq next week."

Suicide Bombing Has Lingering Impact On Baghdad Neighborhood. The New York Times (1/7, A1, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports on a Baghdad neighborhood that lost 34 children in a 2005 suicide bombing: "More than 3,000 Iraqis are dying every month in this war — roughly the total deaths in the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon or all the American troops killed since the war began. But behind the headlines and statistics, most of the war is experienced in Iraqi living rooms and on blocks like the one here, where families struggle with the intense pain of loss. ... The deaths that morning tore a hole in the life of the block, and more than a year later, many people have been unable to put their lives back together. Some have drifted away from their spouses. Others changed jobs or stopped going to work altogether. Reminders of the loss were everywhere: Class sizes were smaller. Soccer tournaments for 12-year-olds stopped. Bug collecting was no longer a hobby." The Times adds, "The attack seemed calculated to make Iraqis despise Americans, in a pattern that would eventually succeed and change the direction of the war. But while some of the parents interviewed seem to have developed that hatred, many had not and even expressed respect."

US Commanders Were Upset By Manner Of Saddam's Execution. A 3,300-word "ticktock" recounting of the Saddam Hussein execution in today's New York Times (1/7, Burns, 1.16M) is titled, "Before Hanging, A Push For Revenge And A Push Back." The "taunts Mr. Hussein endured from Shiite guards…have made headlines around the world, and stirred angry protests among his fellow Iraqi Sunnis. But the story of how American commanders and diplomats fought to halt the execution until midnight on Friday…is only now coming into focus, as Iraqi and American officials, in the glare of international outrage over the hanging, compete with their versions of what happened." The Times adds, "Aides said American commanders were deeply upset by the way they were forced to hand Mr. Hussein over, a sequence commanders saw as motivated less by a concern for justice than for revenge. In the days following the hanging, recriminations flowed between the military command and the United States Embassy, accused by some officers of abandoning American interests at midnight Friday in favor of placating Mr. Maliki and hard-line Shiites." Unnamed "senior" Bush officials say that Secretary of State Rice "gave the green light for Mr. Hussein to be turned over, despite the reservations of the military commanders in Baghdad. One official said that Ms. Rice was supported in that view by Stephen J. Hadley, Mr. Bush's national security adviser." The New York Times (1/7, 1.16M) supplies a graphic time line of the hanging. The New York Times (1/7, WK5, Murphy, 1.16M) also writes, "All the talk last week after the hanging of Saddam Hussein suggests that we viewers thought there was some greater codification of the protocols and proprieties than was apparent in the mocking scene that unfolded."

UK's Brown Denounces Saddam's Execution. The AP (1/7) reports UK Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown, "the likely successor to British Prime Minister Tony Blair, condemned Saddam Hussein's execution as 'deplorable' on Saturday." He "said he opposed the death penalty and hoped lessons would be learned from the mistakes made in Saddam's hanging, as well as from other difficulties encountered in Iraq." The AP says Brown's "denunciation contrasted with Blair's silence on the issue. Blair, the chief U.S. ally in the war in Iraq, faces increasing pressure to share his views on the execution and has said he would speak about it in the coming week."

UN Chief Urges Suspension Of Iraqi Executions. AFP (1/6) reports, "UN chief Ban Ki-moon has 'strongly' urged the Iraqi government to suspend imminent executions amid an international outcry over the bungled hanging of Saddam Hussein a week ago. Iraq's embattled prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, meanwhile, threatened to 'review' relations with countries that criticized Saddam's execution. ... Two former Saddam henchmen -- Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti and Awad Ahmed al-Bandar -- are expected to be hanged soon. ... Their executions, due Thursday, were postponed to Sunday, Shiite lawmaker Baha al-Araji from the group of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr told AFP earlier this week." A Maliki official attributed the postponement to "international pressure." BBC.com (1/7) also reports Ban's plea.

Trial Process Was Allegedly Botched. In a commentary for the New York Times Magazine (1/7, 1.16M), Professor Noah Feldman writes, "The process fell short of what is needed to invoke the transcendent norms of universal justice. This was a profound failure. As with the other shortcomings of Iraq's government, many players were at fault here: the Americans for failing to provide security for the Iraqis, including the defense team; the Iraqis for failing to get the trial - or the country - to run smoothly; the international community for sanctimoniously disengaging."

Execution Could Spell End Of Secular Arab Nationalism. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (1/7, 850K), writer Robert Kaplan argues, "Just as the demise of Slobodan Milosevic in Yugoslavia closed the lid on national communist parties in Eastern Europe, the demise of Saddam Hussein in Iraq appears likely to do the same for secular Arab nationalism across the Middle East. ... secular Arab nationalism will exit the stage revealed for what it always was: a despotic perversion of the western nation-state that lasted as long as it did mainly because of secret-police techniques imported from the former Soviet Union. ... No sooner were these independent new [Arab] states created than the ties of faith and tribe were undermining them. ... Indeed, the more artificial the state, the more extreme the secular ideology had to be to hold it together."

Antitank Mines Slow US-Iraqi Drive. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Zavis, 850K) reports from Samoudi, Iraq, "Antitank mines have become one of the top threats as U.S. and Iraqi forces press their assault in a Sunni insurgent redoubt said to be riddled with weapons caches, secret tunnels and training ranges. Their convoys have hit at least 10 explosive devices since the operation was launched early Thursday, most of them antitank mines. ... The devices first were used in the area in November, when U.S. forces faced off against fighters maneuvering through the irrigation canals that lace the region. U.S. vehicles have been upgraded to withstand many attacks, including in some cases adding armor around their fuel tanks that Iraqi vehicles lack. U.S. forces also have developed strategies to mitigate the impact of the blasts, including driving very slowly so the effects are concentrated on the engine box, not the passenger compartment. ... About 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi forces are involved in the assault aimed at reclaiming an area military commanders say has become a haven for Al Qaeda in Iraq and other militant groups. ... But in most homes, soldiers are finding only women and children."

Marines Hope Women Can Talk Men Into Fighting Anbar Insurgency. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Perry, 850K) reports, "The U.S. military is reaching out to women in several communities in the rebel stronghold of Al Anbar province, in hopes of persuading them to tell their husbands and sons to help in the fight against the insurgency. ... Angela Khadijah Williams, a public diplomacy officer with the State Department…believes outreach to Iraqi women is essential. ... The women's outreach effort is in its first stages with no tangible results so far, another reason the Marines say the fight against the insurgency in Al Anbar is a long process where patience is key."

Guarding Iraq-Iran Border A Challenge. ABC World News (1/6, story 4, 2:10, Sciutto, 8.78M) reported, "Any effort to control Iraq will have to take into account one of the most crucial and volatile areas, which is also the most difficult to secure. It is the 900-mile border between Iraq and Iran, where American troops are trying to help Iraqi forces block insurgents and smugglers." ABC (McCarthy): "From the air you don't see a lot of people out here. Iraqi border guards patrol this terrain. A small group of Americans, led by this colonel from the Special Forces, is trying to train them. ... Colonel Harry Miller has just 55 Americans training 4,000 Iraqis. It is a critical mission. The U.S. believes Iranian agents and supplies are crossing this border to fuel much of the violence inside Iraq. .. Incredibly, for three years after the invasion, little was done to secure this border."

Official Says Evidence Does Not Back Haditha Marines. The AP (1/6, Burns) reports, "U.S.

criminal investigators found no evidence to support the claim of Marines charged in the deaths of unarmed Iraqi civilians that five were shot after trying to flee the scene of a roadside bombing that killed one Marine, a senior defense official said Saturday. Investigators determined that all five Iraqis were shot within arm's length of each other and no more than 18 feet from the white taxi they were ordered to exit by members of a Marine squad in the western Iraqi town of Haditha, said the official, who is familiar with reports produced by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service."

The New York Times (1/7, A16, Von Zielbauer, 1.16M) reports, "An American government report on the killing of 24 Iraqis ... provides new details of how the shootings unfolded and supports allegations by prosecutors that a few marines illegally killed civilians, government officials said yesterday." In the report, "Sergeant [Sanick] Dela Cruz said that as he approached the taxi, he saw some men standing near it with their hands in the air, officials said. After Sergeant Wuterich shot them, he continued shooting as they lay on the ground, and later urinated on one of them, an official said. ... Several lawyers representing the accused marines expressed anger at the Defense Department, which they blamed for allowing the report to be given surreptitiously to a newspaper and, they said, potentially damaging their clients' cases."

The Washington Post (1/7, A14, White, 690K), which first reported the findings yesterday, reports that investigators recovered graphic digital-camera images as evidence: "The images -- which investigators tracked down on several laptop computers and digital media drives, some in the United States -- provide visual evidence of a series of shootings outside a taxi and inside three homes that military criminal investigators have alleged were murders ... the Haditha images were discovered months after the shootings as more than 60 Naval Criminal Investigative Service agents scoured the globe for them." The Los Angeles Times (1/7, 850K) summarizes the Post article.

New England Death Toll In Iraq "Nearly Doubled" In 2006. The Boston Globe (1/7, Mishra, 413K) reports, "The number of New Englanders killed in combat in Iraq nearly doubled last year to 40, mostly men under age 25 cut down by increasingly lethal hidden roadside bombs, according to a Globe analysis." Of the 40, "26 -- 65 percent -- were under age 25."

Watada Case Tests Officers' Right To Dissent. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Watanabe, 850K) reports, "Do military officers have the right to publicly voice dissent about their commander in chief and U.S. war policy? That question highlighted last week's pretrial hearing at Ft. Lewis Army base near Seattle for 1st Lt. Ehren Watada, the nation's first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq. ... Watada's statements constitute the criminal offense of 'conduct unbecoming an officer,' Army officials argue." Two retired war critics, "Army Maj. Gens. John Batiste and Paul D. Eaton, said in interviews that they drew sharp distinctions between Watada's conduct as a still-active-duty officer and their own remarks after they left the service," with Eaton saying, "What the American people can't have is an Army of people who on any given day can wake up and say, 'That's not what I want to do.'"

Defense Contractors Lose Prosecution Immunity. The Boston Globe (1/7, Stockman, 413K) reports, "An estimated 100,000 employees of US defense contractors working in Iraq are no longer immune from military prosecutions, because of a little-noticed provision in a 2007 defense spending bill aimed at holding private contractors accountable for crimes committed in war zones." The loophole "caused outrage during the Abu Ghraib scandal in 2004. Soldiers involved in abusing prisoners were sentenced in military courts, but the civilian interrogators working alongside them for Titan Corp. and CACI International, two private firms, faced no punishment. The 2007 Defense Bill, enacted in October, placed contractors and others who accompany the military in the field under the same set of military laws that govern the armed forces."

British Deals Allegedly Hurt War On Taliban. The Washington Times/London Daily Telegraph (1/7, Rashid) reports, "British policy in Afghanistan is seriously damaging Western efforts against the Taliban, diplomats from allied countries have warned. Officials from the United States and European members of NATO say Britain is increasingly at odds with its coalition partners over its policy of making arbitrary peace deals with the Taliban, while at the same time declining to put pressure on Pakistan to stop providing sanctuary to the Taliban leadership." Allegedly at risk are "military preparations for a major Taliban offensive expected next month." Diplomats attribute the British attitude to "cooperation between Britain's MI6 intelligence agency and Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) agency on Britain's domestic terrorist threat from British-born extremists of Pakistani origin."

Afghan Roadside Bomb Wounds NATO Soldier. The AP (1/6) reports, "A roadside bomb struck a NATO vehicle in southern Afghanistan on Saturday, wounding one soldier, while a suicide bomber in a car wounded four soldiers in the country's east, officials said." None of the five soldiers' nationalities was disclosed, but the AP says of the latter bombing, "Most of the troops in that region are American. The Bermel region borders Pakistan, and a U.S. base there sees frequent rocket attacks."

Border Mining Plan Said To Worsen Afghan-Pakistan Relations. The Washington Post (1/7, A16, Constable, 690K) says relations between Afghanistan and Pakistan are "steadily deteriorating" and are beset by a "deepening distrust." The Pakistani plan to mine their shared border to deter crossings by extremists "has aroused angry protests by Afghan leaders who say the mines would endanger innocent travelers and divide tribal lands whose inhabitants do not recognize the border." Those "contretemps is the latest sour note in a deteriorating relationship between the neighboring Muslim governments, both staunch U.S. allies that are linked by the common threat of terrorism but divided by bitter cross-charges of failing to curb a growing Islamic insurgency that operates on both sides of the border." The bilateral "tension has persisted despite a series of high-level meetings between [Afghan President Hamid] Karzai and senior Pakistani officials."

"Arlington Ladies" Give Military Funerals A Personal Touch. The Washington Post (1/7, A1, Schulte, 690K) reports that as a tradition to ensure "that no soldier is ever buried alone," an Army Arlington Lady "has stood graveside at every funeral at Arlington as the personal representative of the chief of staff" chosen from "a society open only to military wives or widows and then only to those invited to join." The Post adds that since the many casualties and growing public disapproval of the Iraq War, the stoic job of the Arlington Ladies has become more difficult if "the family is wondering, 'Are they dying in vain for this?'" The Post points out that "those fears, said Paula McKinley, chair of the Navy Arlington ladies, are not new. 'They have permeated every war since World War II.'"

Hopi Tribe Members Pleased With US Attorney Recommendation. The Arizona Republic (1/7, Az) reports, "News last week that Hopi Tribe member Diane Humetewa was being recommended by Arizona's senators to President Bush as a potential nominee to be the next U.S. attorney for the District of Arizona was met with excitement in the village of Kykotsmovi." The Republic continues, "Justice Department officials said Friday that they've determined she would not be the first Native American U.S. attorney in the entire nation, because past and former U.S. attorneys from states including Utah, South Dakota, New Hampshire and West Virginia have claimed Native American heritage. But she would be the first Native American U.S. attorney for the Arizona district if nominated and confirmed." The Republic adds, "Hopi Tribal Vice Chairman Todd Honyaoma Sr. said Humetewa is a member of the Tobacco/Rabbit Clan from the Village of Kykotsmovi. … 'We could not be more proud of and exhilarated for our sister and daughter,' he said. … 'The Hopi way is that we place a high value on education and serve as stewards to our communities and to the world. Ms. Humetewa has exemplified this value many times in her life,' Honyaoma said. … 'She will make history.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Nardelli's Compensation Package Could Presage More Of The Same. The New York Times (1/7) reports, "It has been a bit bewildering to watch two failed chief executives in the last two weeks or so waltz away from their companies toting severance packages worth more than $200 million each. But pay experts say shareholders had better get ready for more of the same." The Times continues, "Last week, Robert L. Nardelli hightailed it out of Home Depot with $210 million, fast on the heels of Hank McKinnell, whose farewell package of a similar amount from Pfizer was disclosed Dec. 21. Both were paid profusely for failure, thanks to contracts struck years ago by the companies' directors. … Keep in mind that both packages supplemented pay that these executives received during their tenures. Mr. Nardelli's $210 million, for example, came on top of the $63.5 million he made running Home Depot for six years." The Times adds, "That exit numbers like these have shocked many shareholders proves how much inadequate disclosure has kept executive pay hidden from view. But with new rules from the Securities and Exchange Commission on improved pay disclosures, more of these "holy cow" moments will be coming soon to a proxy near you. … Under the new rules, companies will have to disclose potential payments to executives in the case of a termination or a change in control at the company, wrought perhaps by a merger. Unfortunately, the S.E.C. did not require that these payments be made in tabular form and totaled, which would have made it simple for time-pressed investors. … For the most part, however, the figures will be there in black and white. … Are we likely to see any $200 million numbers? Yes, said Mike Sorensen, a principal at Exequity, a law firm in Libertyville, Ill., that does compensation work. He expects such largess to show up at roughly 10 of the nation's 100 largest companies.

Nardelli Steps Down From Business Roundtable's Disaster-Response Task Force. The New York Times (1/7, BU2, Dash) reports, "On the very same day that he left Home Depot last week with an exit package worth at least $210 million, Robert L. Nardelli walked away from another prominent position -- without a cent." The Times continues, "While he was still Home Depot's chairman and chief executive, Mr. Nardelli volunteered as the chairman of a disaster-response task force at the Business Roundtable, a kind of club for corporate chieftains that lobbies for their interests. … Last month, he met at the White House with Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security, and other top government and military officials to discuss improved collaboration on disaster preparedness. … On Tuesday, though, Mr. Nardelli had to quit the group. The Business Roundtable is only for sitting chief executives."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Death Of Louisiana Mayor Ruled Suicide. The AP (1/7) reports from West Lake, LA, "In the hours before his death on the evening of December 30, the first black mayor of this overwhelmingly white town started learning his new job." The AP continues, "About noon, he set City Hall's alarm system for the first time. He got instructions on how to raise and lower the U.S. flag. He had already ordered a new mayoral letterhead with his name on it and a button-down shirt embroidered 'Gerald Washington, Mayor.' … A few hours later he indulged in a hobby, placing a $4 bet at a nearby horse-racing track. … But by 10 p.m. Gerald 'Wash' Washington was dead in the deserted parking lot of a former high school, a bullet wound in his chest. His gun was found by the body." The AP adds, "The coroner and the sheriff have pronounced Washington's death a suicide -- a finding that has embroiled this oil-refinery town in conspiracy theories, with Washington's kin and friends insisting he had no reason to end his life. … Some have accused police of covering up a murder -- perhaps a racially motivated one. … 'This is the South, so of course everybody's going to say it was some white guy shooting a black guy,' said Dr. Terry Welke, the Calcasieu Parish coroner who ruled that Washington killed himself." The AP notes, "Welke said soot from the pistol was deep in the wound, indicating the gun was touching Washington's chest when the trigger was pulled. That, he said, suggested suicide. He also said that while most gunfire suicides involve a bullet to the head, it is not unusual for people to kill themselves with a shot to the chest. … But the coroner and the sheriff have offered no reason for why Washington would have killed himself. No suicide note was found. And there is no evidence he bade farewell to anyone, put his financial affairs in order, or gave any other indication he was about to kill himself, authorities said."

Georgia Man Charged With Trying To Extort $1.5 Million From Oprah Winfrey. The AP (1/7) reports from Chicago, "A man has been charged with trying to extort $1.5 million from Oprah Winfrey by threatening to release recorded telephone conversations he claimed would hurt her reputation, according to the FBI and published reports." The AP continues, "Keifer Bonvillain, 36, targeted a person identified only as 'a public figure and the owner of a Chicago-based company,' according to a criminal complaint filed in U.S. District Court. The Chicago Tribune and the Chicago Sun-Times, citing unnamed sources, reported Saturday that Bonvillain's target was Winfrey." The AP adds, "Bonvillain, of Atlanta, was arrested Dec. 15 in the parking lot of an Atlanta hotel and released on $20,000 bail. He was scheduled for a preliminary hearing in Chicago on Monday. … According to the complaint, Bonvillain met a California-based employee of the Chicago company at a party more than two years ago, then recorded conversations with the employee about the owner and her business. … In mid-October he sent the owner an e-mail, telling her an employee said awful things about her, the complaint states." The AP notes, "A month later, Bonvillain sent a letter saying he had tapes of the conversations, an FBI agent alleges in the complaint. In response, another associate of the company called Bonvillain and learned he had taped 12 hours of those discussions. … Over the next few weeks, Bonvillain told the associate he wanted to publish a book based on the tapes and claimed he had received offers of $500,000 to $3 million from tabloids and book publishers, the complaint said."

Utah Student Sentenced For Hacking Into Professor's Accounts. The Deseret Morning News (1/7, Fattah) reports, "A 22-year-old University of Utah computer science student has been sentenced to four months incarceration and 120 days home confinement after admitting to hacking into his professor's university and personal accounts, changing grades and reading personal e-mails." The News continues, "During a sentencing hearing in U.S. District Court on Thursday, You Li promised U.S. District Judge Tena Campbell to lead a more honest life. 'Those things were so wrong and were against my conscience and my beliefs,' Li said." The News adds, "Li, a Chinese national, was arrested by FBI agents at a campus dormitory last February. According to a grand jury indictment, Li was accused of using a software program to break into the university's math department computer system in December of 2004. … Li has admitted to using a professor's user name and password to attempt to change his grades in classes, read e-mails and obtain other passwords and bank account information. … According to federal prosecutors, Li also accessed the professor's personal e-mail account and installed a key-logging software that recorded the professor's other user names and passwords as well as other actions. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Scott Garland said Li's actions went beyond just changing a grade and that the student ventured into his professor's bank account and personal life."

Hackers Hijack Personal Computers To Commit Fraud. The New York Times (1/7, A1, Markoff, 1.16M), in a front-page article, reports, "In their persistent quest to breach the Internet's defenses, the bad guys are honing their weapons and increasing their firepower. With growing sophistication, they are taking advantage of programs that secretly install themselves on thousands or even millions of personal computers, band these computers together into an unwitting army of zombies, and use the collective power of the dragooned network to commit Internet crimes. These systems, called botnets, are being blamed for the huge spike in spam that bedeviled the Internet in recent months, as well as fraud and data theft."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Fewer States Expected To Vote On Gay Marriage In Coming Years. The Washington Times (1/7, Wetzstein, 88K) reports, "The legislative approval of a marriage constitutional amendment in Massachusetts last week means that at least three states have a good chance of having such measures on their 2008 ballots. But this is a considerably smaller crop of amendments than in previous elections, and there are signs that the state amendment strategy may have run its course. … The amendment strategy took off after the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court legalized same-sex 'marriage' in November 2003, and now 27 states have voter-approved marriage amendments. But no other state court has followed the Massachusetts court -- in fact, nine recent court decisions have upheld state marriage laws." The California Supreme Court "will hear arguments on its same-sex 'marriage' case this spring."

US Steel Exploring Merger Options. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (1/7, Mortimer) reports, "U.S. Steel Corp. still is eyeing Middletown, Ohio-based AK Steel Corp., or it could go shopping for a raw materials supplier in Central or Eastern Europe as steel industry consolidation continues, analysts said." The Tribune-Review continues, "Merger mania was resurrected when Nucor Corp., the second-largest U.S. steel producer behind U.S. Steel, last week agreed to acquire Toronto-based Harris Steel Group Inc. for about $1.07 billion." The Tribune-Review adds, "Conjecture over a possible U.S. Steel takeover of AK Steel surfaced in March. 'Last year, their board was looking at AK Steel, and I heard they're still watching it,' said independent analyst Charles Bradford, of Soleil Securities in New York. … Bradford said he understood U.S. Steel may be looking in Central and Eastern Europe, where assets are cheaper. … 'Domestically, they have the iron ore and coke they need. In Central Europe, they don't have any of that. They may also be looking at smaller, government-owned steel companies,' said Bradford, who did not identify potential foreign targets." The Tribune-Review notes, "U.S. Steel operates a plant in Kosice in the Slovak Republic, the largest flat-rolled steel producer in Central Europe. The company operates U.S. Steel Serbia, too. … U.S. Steel CEO John Surma told analysts during a third-quarter conference in November that the company is not ruling out acquisitions. 'We think there still could be opportunities to expand our footprint,' he said. … 'We believe in consolidation, and we continuously evaluate strategic opportunities focusing mostly in North America and Europe. Any acquisition we would make, however, would have to create value for our company and our shareholders. It has to generate a good return on capital, has to be accretive and generate cash,' said Charles L. Rice, spokesman for U.S. Steel."

US Airways CEO Readies For Delta Fight. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/7, Grantham) reports, "Don't mistake the relative quiet of the past two weeks for a sign that US Airways' resolve to buy Delta Air Lines is weakening, says Doug Parker, CEO of US Airways. … 'We believe our offer is more than fair, and as a result, don't intend on ... backing off,' Parker said in a telephone interview last week. 'We certainly don't intend on pulling the offer.'" The AJC continues, "Parker made his carrier's $8 billion-plus offer public on Nov. 15, and Delta — which had already rebuffed his private approaches — fired back with a volley of objections, employee anti-merger rallies and a formal plan to emerge from Chapter 11 on its own. The dust settled during the holidays." The AJC adds, "Parker says he expects things to soon heat up again, pointing out that Delta's creditors recently hired retired Continental Airlines Chief Executive Gordon Bethune to evaluate the rivals' proposals or other potential alternatives for Delta. … Another potential flash point: Delta has asked for a bankruptcy court hearing Feb. 7 to begin pitching its stand-alone plan to creditors. They will ultimately vote on whatever reorganization plan Delta uses. Delta's plan values the company at $12 billion when it comes out of bankruptcy and would pay creditors with stock. US Airways argues its cash-stock offer is better for creditors and that a merger will create a stronger airline."

NRA Members Oppose Bush Over Drilling Expansion, Access Rights. The Washington Post (1/7, A3, Harden, 690K) reports, "After years of close association with the Republican Party and hard-nosed opposition to federal land-use regulation, the National Rifle Association is being pressured by its membership to distance itself from President Bush's energy policies that have opened more public land for oil and gas drilling and limited access to hunters and anglers. 'The Bush administration has placed more emphasis on oil and gas than access rights for hunters,' said Ronald L. Schmeits, second vice president of the NRA. … The new emphasis on the issue of access to public lands, which Schmeits said is at the 'discussion' level among the NRA's directors, would represent a strategic shift for the NRA." However, "during the past six years, an increasing number of the country's 46 million hunters and anglers, including Republican-leaning shooting organizations such as the Boone and Crockett Club, have been grumbling about the Bush's administration fast-tracking of oil and gas drilling leases on public lands." NRA spokesman Andrew Arulanandam "said he agrees with Schmeits that members are voicing increasing concern about access to hunting land and that the NRA is focusing on the problem."

WPost Offers Backhanded Praise For Polar Bear Decision. The Washington Post (1/7, B6, 690K) editorializes, "The Bush administration has done everything in its power to do as little as possible about climate change. Yet the reality of global warming has a way of intruding even on the most willfully heedless of politicians. Not even an administration dead set against mandatory curbs on carbon emissions can deny that the habitat of the polar bear, as Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne put it the other day, 'may literally be melting.' In response, the administration is proposing to list the polar bear as a threatened species under the Endangered Species Act. … The administration proposed the polar bear designation only after environmental groups petitioned for it and then sued to force a decision. Still, when confronted with the need to make a decision, it made the right one -- and thereby set the stage for action down the road."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

NYT Reporter Participates In FBI Citizens' Academy. In a story taking a generally positive tone toward the FBI, New York Times (1/7) correspondent Alison Leigh Cowan reported on her participation in the New Haven Field Office's Citizens' Academy. Under the headline "Learning How To Fight America's Most Wanted," Cowen noted, "As part of our weekly training, we shot guns in computerized simulations, subjected ourselves to lie detector tests and met some of the graduates of a 'body farm' in Knoxville, Tenn., where federal agents blow up, bury, submerge and do other unspeakable things to donated corpses to sharpen their crime-solving skills. … One stated objective" of the Citizens' Academy "is to help the bureau improve relationships with the communities it serves. Another is 'to demystify the bureau,' as Kimberly K. Mertz, the special agent in charge of the F.B.I. in Connecticut, explained." Cowan added that "efforts to rein in municipal corruption, white-collar fraud and organized crime have long been the F.B.I.'s stock in trade. But international terrorism has created new pressures, and the bureau's top brass has been deflecting calls for reorganizations that would separate newer intelligence-gathering functions from its historic crime-fighting mission. Our eight weeks…inside the F.B.I. did not provide enough information to resolve these larger questions. But it did give us a feel for some of the 100 or so agents in Connecticut and their boss, Ms. Mertz. An Iowa native, she ran the public corruption unit in Washington from 1999 to 2001 and is now one of eight women running one of the bureau's 56 field offices. … Less than 3 percent of those who apply to be agents make the cut, and her staff was suitably impressive."

Man Sets Fire To California Church. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/7, Sturrock, Writer) reports, "A man set fire to a Richmond church early Friday evening after interrupting a practicing choir." The Chronicle continues, "The man walked into St. Cornelius Parish at 225 28th Street shortly before 8 p.m. and poured a flammable liquid on the altar and a nativity scene and then set it ablaze, according to fire officials and a witness. … A short time later, police arrested Robert Mills, 40, of San Pablo on suspicion of arson." The Chronicle adds, "Seven members of the choir, including a 10-year-old boy, were singing the gospel song 'Jardinero' in Spanish when a man entered the church who seemed to be speaking to himself, then announced, 'Do you want to leave or do you want to stay? Because I'm burning this f— place down,' said choir member Veronica Monroy, 32, of Albany." The Chronicle adds, "He then opened what appeared to be a red can of gasoline and poured it on the altar and Nativity scene, Monroy said, adding that everyone left the church as he did this, except one choir member who stayed back. … Monroy said that man told her the intruder took out a lighter, lit a piece of paper and then threw the flame on the liquid. The choir member tried unsuccessfully to fight the fire with an extinguisher, Monroy said."

Authorities Seek Louisiana Gun Theft Suspect. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/7, Reports) reports, "The Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office on Saturday released the identity of a suspect being sought in Monday's theft of more than 120 guns from a Metairie sporting goods store and announced a $10,000 reward for information leading to his arrest." The Times-Picayune continues, "Jermaine Surtain, 28, who once lived in the 5700 block of Tullis Drive, Algiers, is wanted on a warrant accusing him of burglarizing Puglia's Sporting Goods, 1925 Veterans Memorial Blvd., said Col. John Fortunato, a Sheriff's Office spokesman. … The office is also seeking the public's help in identifying a 'person of interest' who rented a vehicle thought to be used in the break-in, Fortunato said." The Times-Picayune adds, "Authorities think the burglary was committed by four men possibly using a black Dodge Durango. The men made a hole in a wall to get in around 2:30 a.m., then broke display cases and took 115 handguns, several shotguns and two assault rifles. … Authorities identified Surtain as a suspect through the cooperation of the Sheriff's Office, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the West Bank Major Crimes Task Force. The task force is made up of officers from the Sheriff's Office and the Gretna, New Orleans and Westwego police forces."

Seven Killed Saturday By Puerto Rico Gun Violence. The AP (1/6) reports, "Seven people were killed in shootings across Puerto Rico on Saturday, prompting the U.S. territory's top police official to plead for lawmakers to pass tougher gun laws. … At a news conference, police chief Pedro Toledo urged the approval of pending legislation that would make it more difficult for islanders to import weapons from the U.S. mainland. Gunmakers have opposed the restrictions."

IMMIGRATION:

Complaints Against Immigration Attorneys On The Rise. The Washington Post (1/7, C1, Cauvin) reports, "Complaints against immigration lawyers working in and around the nation's capital are rising, say officials who investigate allegations of attorney misconduct." The Post continues, "Last year, the D.C. Office of Bar Counsel received 59 complaints about immigration lawyers, up from 49 in 2005 -- when, for the first time, immigration law drew more complaints than any other specialized practice area. … The bar counsel office is finalizing 2006 totals for other categories, but complaints about immigration law appear likely to rank near the top again." The Post adds, "Such a distinction is no small feat in a city flush with lawyers and no small worry in a region long established as a destination for immigrants, particularly those from Africa and Latin America. … 'There are a lot of unhappy immigrant clients out there, and some of them have very good reason to be unhappy,' said D.C. Deputy Bar Counsel Elizabeth A. Herman, who has handled immigration complaints for more than a decade. … From the simply confused to the unquestionably criminal, bad lawyers have become a concern for the immigration bar and for the nation's immigration tribunals. … Federal sanctions have been rising in recent years. Established in 2000, the bar counsel at the Executive Office for Immigration Review, the Justice Department branch that oversees U.S. immigration courts and the Board of Immigration Appeals, disciplined 47 immigration lawyers last year and 54 the previous year -- up from 22 in 2000."

TAX:

Democrats Remove Supermajority Requirement For Tax Increases. The Washington Times (1/7, Lambro, 88K) reports, "One of the first key procedural votes in the Democrat-controlled House last week established legislative rules that Republicans say will make it easier to raise taxes by a simple majority vote. The straight party-line vote received little attention Thursday. … But Republican leaders and conservative tax-cut advocates said it opened up a huge loophole in a Republican-imposed rule drawn from the Republicans' 1994 Contract with America, which requires a supermajority, or three-fifths vote, to raise taxes. Democrats unanimously voted down a motion offered by" Minority Leader John Boehner "that would have prevented them from waiving the rule, a move that tax-cutters said signaled the Democrats' intention to raise taxes between now and the 2008 elections. 'American taxpayers need to hold on to their wallets because the new House rules concerning taxes are not worth the paper they're written on,'" said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform.

WPost Blames Bush Tax Cuts For Budget Deficit. The Washington Post (1/7, B6, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "So President Bush is promising a balanced federal budget -- three years after he leaves office. That's a worthy goal, and we look forward to seeing, when the budget is released next month, how, exactly, he hopes to achieve it. But we'd be more impressed by the professed commitment to fiscal discipline if it weren't, in large part, Mr. Bush's own policies that made that far-off target look like an achievement. Or, better yet, if we had any confidence, based on performance, that this theoretical balance is based on realistic projections. Or if there were any acknowledgment from Mr. Bush that his sacrosanct tax cuts would have to be adjusted to meet this goal. … It was Mr. Bush's recklessly unaffordable tax cuts and his insistence on maintaining and extending them even as the costs of the war in Iraq escalated that helped drive the deficit."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Gearing Up For Oversight Hearings. The AP (1/7, Kuhnhenn) reports, "In this new era of divided government, the congressional hearing room is where the executive and legislative branches will clash. .. Over the next few weeks, Senate Democrats plan to hold at least 11 hearings just on Iraq. In the House, one of the Democrats' most dogged investigators is waiting to spring his committee on a different mission — suspected government fraud." The AP continues, 'From the war to environmental policy and secret surveillance, the Democrats who now control both the House and Senate are armed with subpoena power and ready to summon panels of witnesses. … These newly empowered Democrats plan to put the Bush administration under scrutiny like never before." The AP adds, "Sen. Patrick Leahy, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has said he will examine the administration's policies on torture and other human rights issues. His request for data exposed one of the first rifts between the new Congress and the administration when the Justice Department refused to provide the committee with two secret documents that describe CIA detention and interrogation policies for suspected terrorists. … Leahy, D-Vt., stopped short of threatening the use of a subpoena to get the documents. But he told Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that he 'would pursue this matter further' when the committee holds its first oversight hearing."

Administration Lowers Estimated Cost Of Drug Benefit. The New York Times (1/7, A17, Pear,

1.16M) reports the Bush Administration "lowered its estimate of the cost of Medicare's new prescription drug benefit Saturday, saying the price tag had come down about 10 percent in the last six months. Administration officials said they hoped the numbers would undercut support in Congress for a Democratic proposal requiring the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical makers to secure lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries." Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, "said the new numbers showed that such legislation was unnecessary because competition among private plans had effectively held down costs."

Medicare Drug Bill Lacking Formulary Seen As Unlikely To Generate Savings. The New York Times (1/7, A17, Pear, 1.16M) reports, "Democrats want the government to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries, but insist that the government should not decide which drugs are covered. Many economists and health policy experts see this as a paradox. The only way to get big savings and discounts, they say, is to steer patients to certain preferred drugs. The debate on this issue, bubbling for several years, will come to a boil in Congress next week as the House votes on a Democratic proposal to require the secretary of health and human services to negotiate with drug manufacturers on behalf of Medicare beneficiaries. … Each plan would establish its own list of covered drugs, known as a formulary, and the secretary could not 'establish or require a particular formulary'." AARP CEO William D. Novelli "said that Medicare drug plans 'currently have little choice but to accept the high prices set by manufacturers' for brand-name drugs if no competing products are available."

"Doughnut Hole" Fix Said To Require Tax Increase Or Spending Cuts. The Washington Post (1/7, A8, Lee, 690K) reports, "Democrats face a difficult time delivering on their pledge to eliminate the 'doughnut hole' in Medicare's drug benefit, despite having used the unpopular coverage gap as a rhetorical club against Republicans in regaining control of Congress in the fall elections. Requiring Medicare to negotiate lower drug prices from pharmaceutical companies…will not produce enough savings to fill the doughnut hole, experts say. And making up the difference would require big tax increases or spending cuts elsewhere if Democrats are to keep another campaign promise, to be fiscally responsible and avoid increasing the federal budget deficit." Sen. Charles Grassley is quoted as saying, "I think the Democrats are going to shy away from it because it's very costly."

Democratic Chairs Already Breaking With Leadership On Key Issues. The New York Times (1/7, A1, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "Less than 24 hours after taking over as speaker, Representative Nancy Pelosi summoned the new chairmen of five committees with responsibility for various aspects of Iraq policy to her office to review and coordinate plans for hearings and inquiries. The gathering on Friday would have been unthinkable when Democrats last controlled the House" when "all-powerful Democratic chairmen ruled their committees with impunity." However, according to the Times, "Already there are signs of discord." Sen. Max Baucus of Montana, the Finance Committee chairman "who has been a headache for past Democratic leaders, says he will plunge ahead with hearings next week on giving the government power to negotiate Medicare drug prices with pharmaceutical companies — a top Democratic priority he has opposed and one the House plans to speed through with no new scrutiny." Sen. Joseph Lieberman, chairman of the Homeland Security committee, "is making his colleagues nervous as they consider his differences with many of them over the war and antiterror issues." Rep. Charles Rangel, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, "suggested Friday that he might revisit new Democratic rules forcing lawmakers to disclose their sponsorship of tax breaks for small enterprises." Rep. John Dingell, chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, is contemplating "imposing tougher mileage standards on automakers."

Pelosi Encouraged To Pursue Bipartisanship. The New York Times (1/7, WK13, 1.16M) editorializes, "The House's new Democratic majority is mounting a legislative blitzkrieg meant to leave the displaced Republicans gasping in the dust. … But what is sorely lacking is the oft-invoked, more often abused ideal of bipartisanship — despite the Democrats' campaign pledge to end the practice of relegating minority lawmakers to the legislative wilderness." Speaker Pelosi "promises bipartisanship will be in evidence after the Democrats get past their opening agenda. … If Democratic candidates were smart enough during the campaign to realize that the voters demand bipartisanship, they should be quick enough to try it from the start.

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (1/7, B1, 690K) former Rep. Vic Fazio writes, "Pelosi has sought to engender some bipartisan goodwill by authorizing severance pay for newly unemployed Republican staff members. Likewise, she has sought to preserve continuity by retaining existing staff in the parliamentarian's office and other administrative positions, including the sergeant-at-arms, the clerk of the House and the House historian. In 1994, when Newt Gingrich became speaker, the leadership fired everyone except the parliamentarian. In contrast to that off-with-their-heads attitude, Pelosi has more respect for the administrative framework of the House. Perhaps most important, she reached out to" Minority Leader John Boehner "on transition issues, such as the schedule, oversight on intelligence and fixing the Congressional page program."

LATimes Presses For Expanded Ethics Reform. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, 850K) reports, "The House essentially enacted the wish list of advocates of reform (including us), burnishing Pelosi's promise to preside over 'the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history.' … More remains to be done. Reformers inside and outside Congress must continue to press for the creation of a new ethics watchdog in each chamber. House Democrats say they will take up that initiative in the coming weeks, and Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who now chairs the Rules Committee, has indicated that she would hold hearings on the idea."

More Commentary On Pelosi. San Francisco Chronicle (1/7, A6, 384K) columnist Leah Garchik writes Rep. Mary Bono "said that female camaraderie is essentially different from the male variety. Despite political differences, 'Women are more quick to share their personal side, to support each other,' said Bono, who has known Pelosi since the early 1990s" but "she is left with a conundrum: 'I want her to be successful as a woman in power, but politically, as a Republican, I am on the other side. But I hope when she needs a friend on this side of the aisle, I'll be one of the first she will call.'"

In his Washington Post (1/7, B7, 690K) column, David Broder writes, "It was, superficially, pure coincidence that Nancy Pelosi and Deval Patrick took their precedent-setting oaths of office at almost the same hour on Thursday. … Impressive as their individual resumes are, what's more significant is what their elevation signals: a growing sense of inclusiveness and opportunity in this society.

Laboratories Face "Crisis" Due To Federal Funding Shortfall. The New York Times (1/7, A19, Broad, 1.16M) reports, "The failure of Congress to pass new budgets for the current fiscal year has produced a crisis in science financing that threatens to close major facilities, delay new projects and leave thousands of government scientists out of work, federal and private officials say. … Factoring in inflation, the budgets translate into reductions of about 3 percent to 4 percent for most fields of science and engineering." According to the Times, "Democrats and Republicans alike say that operating under current budgets, in some cases with less money, can strap federal agencies and lead to major disruptions in service. Scientists say that is especially true for the physical sciences, which include physics, chemistry and astronomy." Among the projects at risk" are the Relativistic Heavy Ion Collider at the Brookhaven National Laboratory in New York and the Fermi National Accelerator Laboratory in Illinois.

US Selecting Hybrid Warhead Design. The New York Times (1/7, Broad, Sanger, Shanker, 1.16M) reports, "The Bush administration is expected to announce next week a major step forward in the building of the country's first new nuclear warhead in nearly two decades. It will propose combining elements of competing designs from two weapons laboratories in an approach that some experts argue is untested and risky." The new warhead would "would require a huge refurbishment of the nation's complex for nuclear design and manufacturing, with the overall bill estimated at more than $100 billion." The decision to pursue a hybrid "could delay the weapon's production. It also raises the question of whether the United States will ultimately be forced to end its moratorium on underground nuclear testing to make sure the new design works." Democrats and other critics say that "at a time when the administration is trying to convince the world to put sanctions on North Korea and Iran to halt their nuclear programs…any move to improve the American arsenal will be seen as hypocritical." Defenders "argue that because the United States provides a nuclear umbrella for so many allies, it is critical that its stockpile be as reliable as possible."

SCOTUS Will Hear Fewest Cases In Modern History This Term. The Washington Post (1/7, A4, Barnes, 690K) reports, "After decades of decline in its caseload, the court is once again on track to take its fewest number of cases in modern history. The justices went on a relative shopping spree when they returned from their holiday break, on Friday, agreeing to hear seven additional cases before this year's term ends. Before that they had accepted only 60 petitions, as opposed to 80 at this point last year. Even a caseload in the 80s would have been considered extraordinarily skimpy 20 years ago. In William H. Rehnquist's first term as chief justice in 1986, the court disposed of 175 cases. … Roberts himself said during his 2005 confirmation hearings that the court should be doing more."

LATimes Endorses Pay Raise For Federal Judges. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, 850K) editorializes, "federal judges have been ill-treated by a 1989 law that links their cost-of-living raises to those of members of Congress. Fearful of being criticized for raising their own salaries, members of Congress voted not to accept several pay raises in the 1990s — meaning that the judges also went without raises. That connection would be broken under legislation that would also include a 'catch-up' raise for judges."

Rich Calls Bush Presidency An "Inversion" Of Ford's. In his New York Times (1/7, WK14, 1.16M) column, Frank Rich writes that although "it's a safe bet" that President Gerald Ford's funeral "attracted far fewer viewers than the most consequential death video of the New Year's weekend, the lynching of Saddam Hussein;" Ford's funeral "obsequies were…the Beltway establishment's grim verdict on George W. Bush and his war in Iraq. Every Ford attribute, big and small, was trotted out by Washington eulogists with a wink, as an implicit rebuke of the White House's current occupant." Rich asserts that "under the guise of not speaking ill of a dead president, the bevy of bloviators so relentlessly trashed the living incumbent that it bordered on farce." Rich says Ford's "presidential history is hard to separate from the Bush inversion of it, so it is difficult to separate that indelible melee in Saigon" in the spring of 1975 "from the Hussein video. Both are terrifying, and for the same reason;" offering "further confirmation…that our principal achievement in Iraq over four years has been to empower a jihadist mini-Saddam in place of the secular original."

OTHER NEWS:

Experts Predict Mixed Economic News For 2007. The Washington Post (1/7, F1, Henderson, 690K) writes that according to the "annual blizzard of forecasts last month" from economic experts, 2007 "will be a tough one for anybody looking for jobs or profits in home building, but it holds out modest promise for most other American workers, consumers and investors. The housing market stays in the dumps. Unemployment edges up a bit, but stays relatively low. Inflation ebbs, interest rates remain moderate and stock prices climb, though not as exuberantly as in recent years." The Washington Post (1/7, F4, 690K) also says many economists "think the dollar will slip a bit lower this year."

The New York Times (1/7, BU5, De Aenlle, 1.16M) writes that the "flow of earnings reports will pick up this week, but the earnings themselves are expected to show a dip in growth from past quarters." Standard & Poor's "estimates that earnings for companies in its 500-stock index rose by 9 percent, year over year, in the fourth quarter. That would be a healthy gain, but also the worst one in nearly five years." As for the housing market, the New York Times (1/7, BU4, Gross, 1.16M) says "those who think that the worst may be over…should take another look at the data, economists say. For the figures on new-home sales have a strange wrinkle that, in the current environment, may lead the government to overstate sales (and to understate inventory) by up to 20 percent. 'The market is weaker than the data say,' said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's/Economy.com."

The New York Times (1/7, BU9, Sommer, 1.16M) adds that 2007 "got off to an uneven start on Wall Street last week," with the Dow Jones and S&P 500 "both dropping modestly" and the Nasdaq making "a small gain."

Gore Still Keeping Options Open On Presidential Run. The Washington Post (1/7, A2, Cillizza, Murray, 690K) examines whether Al Gore may still decide to enter the 2008 presidential race, writing that "over the past six years, Gore has become a heroic figure for the party's liberal left, thanks in large part to his early and steady opposition to the war in Iraq." But is the former vice president "ready to enter the ring one more time? Don't count on it, say his closest advisers. 'There are no secret meetings going on to plan the Gore campaign,' said Carter Eskew, a longtime confidant of the former vice president." Still, "neither Eskew nor any of the small cadre of Gore's closest advisers would entirely rule out such a bid," and there are "small signs here and there that could be read as the stirrings of his renewed interest in a campaign. Early last month, Gore addressed more than three dozen labor leaders in Washington, a wide-ranging talk about the Democratic congressional gains and the media, said one attendee, who demanded anonymity. Asked about 2008, Gore said that he has taken a number of calls from people encouraging him to consider running but he 'didn't know whether he was going to or not,' the source said. 'Everybody felt he left a small door open.'"

Rangel Encouraging Obama To Run For President. The New York Times (1/7, A22, Rivera, 1.16M) asks, "Are Charles B. Rangel's loyalties mixed?" The "longtime Harlem congressman" has "let it be known he encouraged Barack Obama to run for president, which could complicate the presidential ambitions of Mr. Rangel's fellow New York Democrat, Hillary Rodham Clinton." Rangel said, "I told him if he didn't run, he'd regret it, and that he's a young man and he ought to test the waters." But he said he "also told Mr. Obama that he was following Mrs. Clinton's moves 'and that as dean of the New York delegation, I had obligations, and he would have to understand that.'" Asked if that meant he would support Clinton, Rangel "said it was too early to say."

GOP Presidential Hopefuls Hiring Schwarzenegger Campaign Operatives. The Washington Post (1/7, A2, 690K) writes that with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's victory in California "one of the few bright spots for the GOP in November," it is "not surprising that Republican presidential aspirants are raiding his team." Sen. John McCain "has turned his presidential exploratory committee into Arnold East, hiring not only campaign manager Steve Schmidt as a senior adviser but also Schmidt's deputy, Reed Galen, to serve as a deputy campaign manager and even Schmidt's assistant, Jake Suski, to be assistant to campaign manager-in-waiting Terry Nelson. Robert Terra, who ran the Schwarzenegger war room, will do the same for McCain. Matt David, who served as director of response on the Schwarzenegger reelection drive will be the -- you guessed it! -- director of response for McCain." But McCain "didn't get them all. Katie Levinson, Schwarzenegger's communications director, will oversee construction of Rudy Giuliani's communications operation. Schwarzenegger deputy political director Josh Ginsberg has inked a deal with Mitt Romney."

Giuliani Presidential Bid Would Have Major Impact On His Consultancy. The New York Times (1/7, A21, Healy, Buettner, 1.16M) writes about the impact a Rudy Giuliani presidential big would have on his consulting firm Giuliani Partners. As Giuliani "contemplates that bid for the presidency, the firm -- about which little has been publicly known -- says it is dependably profitable and attractively positioned. But, at the same time, its aspirations have been modestly realized: a collection of boutiques more than an empire, and one whose long-term survival if Mr. Giuliani departs is very much a matter of debate both in-house and out."

White House Hopefuls Hit "Virtual Campaign Trail." On its front page, the Washington Times (1/7, Bellantoni, 88K) looks at the presidential campaign on the blogs and on MySpace. Aspirants "are turning to the virtual campaign trail. Dedicated political junkies are setting up their own sites devoted to encouraging presidential runs from their favorite candidates -- former Vice President Al Gore, Sen. John McCain and the two Democratic superstars currently topping polls," Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama. Some of the "candidate MySpace pages are official, such as the sites run by" John Edwards and Tom Vilsack. … Others, such as the nearly 100 sites created in Mrs. Clinton's name, are run by anonymous Web surfers. If popularity were gauged by MySpace," Wesley Clark "is winning with more than 45,000 friends."

"Alpha Male Democrats" Return To Capitol Hill. The New York Times (1/7, WK1, Lizza, 1.16M) examines "the return of the Alpha Male Democrat. The members of this new faction, which helped the Democrats expand into majority status, stand out not for their ideology or racial background but for their carefully cultivated masculinity." The "Macho Dems" include Rep. Rahm Emanuel, who "is missing half of one finger…and swears enough to make a Soprano blush," as well as "aggressive and demanding" Sen. Charles Schumer, new senators Jon Tester and Jim Webb, and new congressmen Brad Ellsworth and Heath Shuler.

Jeb Bush Leaves Considerable Legacy In Florida. The Washington Post (1/7, A4, Kleindienst, 690K) examines Jeb Bush's departure from office in Florida. Over his two terms, "Bush sent shivers through Florida's status quo as he gathered more power than any previous governor and reshaped state government to fit his vision. Nicknamed 'King Jeb,' the Republican transformed what he saw as a tangle of red tape and squanderer of public money into a smaller, business-friendly administration needing fewer tax dollars to run." He "leaves a legacy of a leader adamant about doing things his way, who fearlessly championed such controversial causes as school vouchers, faith-based prisons and prolonging the life of Terri Schiavo." But "while his tenure coincided with a sizzling economy and an overflowing treasury, Bush's back-to-back terms were marred by frequent ethics scandals, official bungling and the inability of the government he downsized to meet growing demands for state services, including education and aid for the infirm and the elderly."

Incoming Maryland First Lady Hopes To Keep Judgeship. The Washington Post (1/7, C12, Wagner, 690K) reports, "Maryland's soon-to-be first lady, Catherine Curran O'Malley, is sticking with her plan to stay on the bench once her husband is sworn in as governor." But the Baltimore district court judge's "desire to keep her job has been complicated by a residency requirement and other family considerations regarding an anticipated move to Annapolis." On Friday, a lawyer for Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley wrote to the District Court of Maryland's chief judge "citing case law that suggests a temporary move to Annapolis would not preclude Katie O'Malley from maintaining her 'domicile' in Baltimore, provided she intends to return there at the end of her husband's term."

Writers Consider Senate Race Outcomes In Four Key States. In the New York Times (1/7, WK15, 1.16M), four novelists consider the aftermath of last fall's closely contested Senate races in their states. Charles Baxter writes that in Minnesota, "we have a new senator, Amy Klobuchar. But we're still talking about the aftermath of the midterm elections." Baxter says President Bush "hit the trifecta…Iraq, corruption and incompetence." Deirdre McNamer compares new Montana Sen. Hon Tester to Sen. Jefferson Smith of "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington," writing, "During Senator Smith's excited sightseeing…I thought about" Tester, "gazing up at the Capitol dome for the first time, shortly after the general election. 'It hasn't soaked in yet,' he told reporters. 'Maybe it will never soak in.'" Dan Chaon says, "As Democrats in Ohio, victory is a sensation we've been unfamiliar with for quite some time, and I have to admit that it makes me a little suspicious. … It's not easy to be jubilant given the state of affairs in Ohio, or in the country, or in the world." And from Tennessee, Robert Hicks writes that while he did not vote for Sen. Bob Corker, "I think that if he proves true to his own past he will do well. That is, he'll be a centrist Republican, guided by his own common sense and maybe a bit by the example of Tennessee's moderate senior senator, Lamar Alexander, rather than by the right-wing rhetoric that has become de rigueur in so much of the South."

Veterans Flock To Alaska. The Washington Post/AP (1/7, A5, Lee) reports that nearly 70,000 veterans "have chosen to make their home in Alaska, which, according to the Census Bureau, has the country's highest concentration of former military personnel. The high number reflects, in part, that veterans tend to cluster near military bases. Alaska's two biggest cities, Anchorage and Fairbanks, have one Army and one Air Force base apiece. ... Many veterans, as with many non-military residents, are drawn by the untrammeled wilderness, the world-class hunting and fishing, and secure jobs with good pay. Moreover, the libertarian frontier spirit and the extreme solitude in this sparsely settled state of 650,000 have a certain appeal to veterans who led highly regimented professional lives or saw too much of the horrors of war."

Chait Accuses Conservatives Of Hypocrisy For Criticizing Liberal "Anger." In his Los Angeles Times (1/7, 850K) column, Jonathan Chait writes, "In the 1990s, prominent conservatives suggested that President Clinton was a murderer, a conservative senator warned that the president might be shot if he visited that senator's state, and a Republican majority leader told Democrats, 'Your president is just not that important to us.' And there were many other nasty episodes. But ever since a Republican has held the White House, certain conservatives have decided that political anger is now the main problem of American life and that it resides primarily on the left. … Some would suggest that the right's newfound obsession with tone is not only hypocritical but an attempt to stifle criticism through arbitrary criteria, much like campus PC-niks."

Saudi, French Foreign Ministers Ask Tehran To Halt Uranium Enrichment. The AP (1/6) reports France and Saudi Arabia "called Saturday on Iran to accept international demands to halt uranium enrichment, saying the Mideast should be free of weapons of mass destruction." In Riyadh, French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy and Prince Saud al-Faisal "stressed diplomacy must be the way to solve Iran's ongoing standoff with the West over its nuclear program." The later is quoted saying, "We agreed on the necessity that the region should be void of weapons of mass destruction and that achieving this target will be by dialogue and diplomacy. Israel should not be excluded from the international efforts and procedures."

US-Iranian Relations Examined. ABC World News (1/6, story 5, Sciutto, 8.78M) took "'A Closer Look' tonight at the troubled relationship between the United States and Iran. Just two weeks ago, the UN imposed sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program. Since then, Iran has only grown more defiant and its unrelenting response fits with what we found on a recent trip there, where Iranians from all walks of life expressed pride in their nation's growing power. The anti-American slogans are still visible in Iran's capital. But visit Iran today and one of the first things you notice is that the attitude toward the great Satan is far from uniform. Students and teachers I met at this school in Tehran, like Americans, maybe not our government, but they like us and admire our country."

US Said To Seek End To Oil Industry's Financing. In a front-page story entitled, "U.S. Puts Squeeze On Iran's Oil Fields," the Los Angeles Times (1/7, Murphy, 850K) reports, "As Washington wages a very public battle against Iran's quest for nuclear power, it is quietly gaining ground on another energy front: the oil fields that are the Islamic Republic's lifeblood." The Times says the Administration's "campaign to dry up financing for oil and natural gas development poses a threat to the republic's ability to continue exporting oil," and "comes at a moment of unique vulnerability for Iran's oil industry, which also faces challenges from rising domestic energy consumption, international isolation, a populist spending spree by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and trouble closing contracts with foreign oil companies." However, Iranian authorities say they "recognized the gravity of the threat and launched steps to head it off, including new 'smart' rationing cards, scheduled for distribution in March to check skyrocketing sales of cheap gasoline, and an overhaul of Iran's historically stingy contract terms in an attempt to lure big oil companies into skirting the U.S. roadblocks."

Israel Said To Plan Nuclear Strike Against Enrichment Site. The Times of London (1/7, Mahnaimi, Baxter) reports Israel "has drawn up secret plans to destroy Iran's uranium enrichment facilities with tactical nuclear weapons. Two Israeli air force squadrons are training to blow up an Iranian facility using low-yield nuclear 'bunker-busters,' according to several Israeli military sources." The Times said the strike concept has "been prompted in part by the Israeli intelligence service Mossad's assessment that Iran is on the verge of producing enough enriched uranium to make nuclear weapons within two years," and that "conventional strikes may no longer be enough to annihilate increasingly well-defended enrichment facilities." The Times adds, "Some analysts warned that Iranian retaliation for such a strike could range from disruption of oil supplies to the West to terrorist attacks against Jewish targets around the world."

Hamas Ignores Abbas Demand To Disband Militia. The AP (1/7, Barzak) reports the leadership of Hamas "defied President Mahmoud Abbas' decree Saturday that its paramilitary unit is illegal, saying it will fight any attempt to disband the force in an increasingly bloody faceoff between the Islamic militant group and Abbas' Fatah party." Noting that "factional fighting" is "threatening to plunge the Palestinian territories into civil war," the AP says Abbas "outlawed the Executive Force on Saturday, two days after Hamas gunmen stormed the home of a top pro-Fatah security commander and killed him and seven bodyguards." Abbas later "confirmed the U.S. was sending aid to boost Palestinian security forces loyal to him," and said that "he spoke to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on the current situation ahead of her upcoming visit." Notably, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak "called on the Palestinians to halt their fighting." The Washington Times (1/7, 88K) runs the AP story on its front page.

The New York Times (1/7, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports Abbas "demanded Saturday that Hamas-run paramilitary police be integrated into Fatah-dominated security forces." Hamas "warned" Abbas "that he was making a mistake and that it would resist any effort to disband the" Executive Force. The Times says it "is not clear whether Mr. Abbas's statement is simply declaratory or whether he would order his security forces to take action against the paramilitary group if Hamas did not meet his demands."

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Boudreaux, Abukhater, 850K) says Abbas "outlawed the Hamas-led Interior Ministry's police force, the most powerful armed unit outside his control in factional fighting that has left 33 people dead in the last month. The ministry responded with defiance." Yesterday's rhetoric "raised the prospect of an intensified armed standoff."

Carter's Palestine Book Called Distorted, One-Sided. The New York Times Book Review (1/7, Bronner) describes President Jimmy Carter's "Palestine: Peace, Not

Apartheid," as "a strange little book about the Arab-Israeli conflict from a major public figure." Carter "does not" provide both the Israeli and Palestinian perspectives, but "simply offers a narrative that is largely unsympathetic to Israel." Carter's "contribution is to offer a distortion of his own." His "misrepresentations" are "a shame because most of what Carter focuses on is well worth reading about."

"Malfunctioning" Israeli Government Said To Lose Public's Confidence. In an analysis piece, the New York Times (1/7, Erlanger, 1.16M) notes, "Two of Israel's most important relationships in the world are with the United States and Egypt. In the past 10 days, the Israeli government of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has managed to embarrass both of them." Citing the approval of new settlement in the Jordan Valley and the failed Ramallah raid, the Times says "neither incident was of fundamental importance, and neither, it seems, was intended to create the ensuing ruckus. And neither action, Mr. Olmert's aides insisted, had been approved by the prime minister." However, taken "together, Israeli politicians and analysts suggest, the moves reflect a malfunctioning Israeli government, deeply split over personalities, politics and policies. It has lost the confidence of most Israelis, according to the opinion polls, which makes Israeli leaders even less likely to take bold political steps domestically or internationally." Noting that Olmert and Defense Minister Peretz "and their staffs barely speak to one another," the Times says both men's political parties are hampered by "bitter rivalries."

Somali Disarmament Plan Sparks Rioting. The New York Times (1/7, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports, "Hundreds of Somalis stormed Saturday into the streets of Mogadishu…to hurl rocks at Ethiopian troops allied with the government and to protest a disarmament program that Somali leaders ended up scrapping." Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi's "transitional government appears to have failed its first leadership test: disarmament. After 16 years of anarchy, the streets of Mogadishu are awash with military-grade weaponry," and collecting "these guns was one of [Gedi's] first goals." He had "demanded that all Somalis surrender their weapons in three days," but "even former military officers disagreed with Mr. Gedi's approach, saying it would take months, not days, to disarm the populace and that the government should negotiate with militiamen and clan elders."

The Washington Post (1/7, A16, McCrummen, 690K) adds, "Hundreds of angry and fed-up Somalis demanded that Ethiopian troops leave the city Saturday, smashing cars, burning tires, and hurling stones and threats as a prevailing sense of insecurity deepened in the patched-together neighborhoods of" the capital. "A volatile mix of grievances fueled the clashes between demonstrators and Ethiopian troops, leaving at least two people dead." While Gedi "scrambles to establish ministries, police and other services from scratch, the city is reverting to its old forms of self-governance." The AP (1/6) adds Gedi's government "indefinitely postponed plans to forcibly disarm Mogadishu, as hundreds of people burned tires, looted vehicles and said they wouldn't give up their guns. Two people were reported killed and at least 17 people were wounded."

Under the headline, "Ethiopia's Intervention May Destabilize Region," the Los Angeles Times (1/7, Sanders, 850K) notes, "By launching a war against Somalia's Islamists, Ethiopia says it was drawing a line in the sand against religious extremism in East Africa. But without quick diplomacy and international aid, analysts caution that the war could radicalize the region's traditionally moderate Muslims." Reporting that "signs of a budding insurgency already are emerging in Mogadishu," the Times adds many Somalis "believe the U.S. encouraged Ethiopia to lead the assault last month to put an African face on the war." The Times reports one analysis that, "if Somalia's problems bleed across its borders, the ripple effects could include a destabilization of Ethiopia's Muslim community and reduced tourism for Kenya. … Analysts say U.S. policymakers now have a short window of time to bring change."

Al Qaeda Operatives Sought In Somalia. CNN (1/6, Starr) reported, "An urgent manhunt is underway in East Africa to capture five top al Qaeda operatives on the run from Somalia since the fall of the Islamic militia government. … US and African intelligence services are closely cooperating in an effort to find the men before they slip away, with fear that they might plan new attacks. The US especially wants two men said to be involved in the 1998 bombing of the US embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. Authorities believe all five have ties to al Qaeda attacks across East Africa. Escape routes from Somalia are being sealed off. US intelligence sources believe the men may have been at a known al Qaeda training camp on the Somali-Kenyan border. Two US Navy warships are now patrolling offshore, stopping and searching small boats. Kenya has sealed its northern border with Somalia. US Navy SEALS have been just south of the border, helping train Kenyan forces. … The top US diplomat for Africa has been trying to muster an African peacekeeping force to help Somalia's new transitional federal government. Hunting al Qaeda is a priority." Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Jendayi Frazer: "We believe that it's extremely important and we feel that the cooperation between the neighboring countries, with the transitional federal government at the request of the transitional federal government, is quite helpful in trying to prevent those terrorists from fleeing Somali territory into their neighbors." CNN (Starr): "All of this comes as Ayman al-Zawahiri, Osama bin Laden's deputy, has called for an Iraq style insurgency inside Somalia."

Richardson Departs For Three-Day Sudan Trip. Under the headline, "Richardson Heads To Sudan With Three Goals," the AP (1/7, Pickler) notes Gov. Bill Richardson said he hopes to persuade President Omar al-Bashir "to accept more U.N. peacekeepers in war-ravaged Darfur, a goal that has eluded world leaders." He told the AP that "he has three goals for his visit to the African nation: increasing the U.N. force in Darfur, improving the humanitarian situation and helping encourage a cease-fire." The AP adds that special envoy Andrew Natsios, who met Bashir last month, "has not responded to a request for comment about Richardson's trip."

Two Sri Lanka Bombings Kill 17, Wound 90. The New York Times (1/7, A4, Senanayake, 1.16M) reports, "A powerful bomb blew up a passenger bus on Saturday, killing 11 people and wounding more than 40 others on the southern coast of Sri Lanka." The Times notes that "was the second in less than 24 hours. The authorities are investigating the first blast, which killed six people and wounded 50 on Friday northeast of the capital, Colombo. A government statement blamed the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam for the explosions." The Tigers "had no immediate comment."

Bangladeshi Politics Dominated By Female Leaders' "Feud." Under the headline, "The Personal Politics Of Bangladesh," the Washington Post/AP (1/7, A14, Rosenberg) details the "ferocious" rivalry between Bangladeshi leaders Khaleda Zia and Sheikh Hasina. "It's the stuff of political slapstick, except that this feud is rooted in the assassination of one woman's father and the other's husband, and the result today is anything but funny." Some "Bangladeshis … will say the rivalry is the cause of all the country's problems of poverty and corruption." The AP says "their rivalry has done nothing to improve things. Bangladesh is deeply corrupt and, in many parts, barely governed, raising concerns about instability in this strategic Muslim country already contending with Islamic militancy." Asking why alternative leadership has not emerged, the Post reports, "Analysts blame social conservatism -- a reluctance of the poor and illiterate to question those perceived as their betters -- and thuggish political tactics to ensure that people who do not support either party nonetheless turn out to vote for one of them."

India's Slow Response To Killings Said To Highlight Justice System's Dichotomy. A lengthy New York Times (1/7, A8, Gentleman, 1.16M) piece highlights the Indian police's response to killings in the New Delhi neighborhood of Noida. "What seems clearly a case of serial killing on the fringes of the capital has become a national scandal, with public horror at the brutal details interwoven with outrage at the police department's failure to investigate." While the fact "that India has a two-tier justice system is nothing new," the Times says "the case of the dead and missing slum children has provided a brutally stark example of how the law does not work for the marginalized, shocking even the most jaundiced observers of the nation's legal processes." The Times continues, "The sluggish police response to the disappearance of dozens of children has horrified the nation as much as the crime itself."

Elimination Of Mexican Poultry Tariffs Could Transform Economic Decisions. A 2,400-word piece on the front page of the Washington Post (1/7, Goodman, 690K) describes how "life in the central Mexican state of Jalisco is about to be shaken by globalization. Already much of Mexico's farm country has been overwhelmed by an influx of crops from the United States in the years following the North American Free Trade Agreement. Over the next two years, the final provisions of the trade pact kick in, opening Mexico to unlimited imports of poultry from its northern neighbor. Mexican farms will compete directly with an American agribusiness nurtured by subsidies on the corn that feeds the birds." The Post says NAFTA "was supposed to work the other way around," creating "enough development in Mexico to create millions of jobs, raise wages and diminish the lure of the north."

Mexico's Calderon Said To Make Organized Crime His First Target. A lengthy New York Times (1/7, A6, McKinley, 1.16M) piece notes Mexican President Felipe Calderón "has made it clear his first priority is to turn his government into the scourge of organized crime." He "has sent thousands of federal police and troops into the drug-plagued states of Michoacán and Baja California to break up criminal organizations and stop the brutal violence they perpetuate." However, the Times adds, "some opposition politicians and experts on the drug trade wonder if the federal interventions are not more flash than substance, and question if they will have a lasting impact on the drug trade and police corruption, whose roots run deep." Calderon ordered a "crackdown" in Tijuana, which was "welcomed" by most residents "even as some expressed skepticism the caravan-style patrols and roadblocks would do much to hurt drug traffickers."

Ambassador's "Genocide" Comments Could Delay Successor's Nomination. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Reynolds, 850K) notes that two years ago, Ambassador John Evans "did something no U.S. ambassador to Armenia before him had done: He used the word 'genocide' -- in public -- to describe the deaths of about 1.2 million Armenians at the hands of Ottoman Turks." While "Evans' use of the word did not signal a change in" US policy, "it did set off a slow-boiling controversy that eventually cost him his job." Today, "a clash between the Democratic-controlled Congress and the Republican White House" has "has stalled the confirmation of Evans' successor and strained U.S. relations with Turkey, a key U.S. ally in the Middle East." The Times explains, "Though Armenian Americans and others consider Evans' statement an act of courage for which he has been unfairly punished, policymakers call it a misjudgment that could fuel anti-Western sentiment in Turkey." State Department "officials believe that Turks will come to their own acceptance of the term from internal debate," and the Times says the State Department "made clear its displeasure" with Evans' remarks.

Warsaw Archbishop Resigns Over Collaboration Allegations. The AP (1/7) reports Warsaw Archbishop Stanislaw Wielgus "resigned amid a scandal about his cooperation with the communist-era secret police, Poland's Roman Catholic Church said Sunday." The AP says "a furor had grown around Wielgus" during his week in office "since the allegations were first raised Dec. 20 by a Polish weekly, with demands that he step down from his post." The "scandal gained intensity after church officials said Friday that documents at a historical institute indicated Wielgus had willingly collaborated. Newspapers Friday devoted their front pages to the revelations, even as Wielgus took canonical vows as required by church law ahead of his installation."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Litvinenko Poisoning Said To Worry Anti-Terror Professionals. On its front page, the Washington Post (1/7, Finn, 690K) details efforts to secure nuclear materials in the wake of the poisoning death of former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko. "An international investigation is trying to track" the small amount of polonium-210 that killed Litvinenko "back to its source. Detectives from Scotland Yard have said nothing about where the trail of evidence may be leading; Russian officials have been more willing to talk, saying that [the production plant in] Avangard is tightly audited and that illicit production of polonium-210 is technically possible at many of the world's reactors." However, the Post notes, "Russia's near total domination of the world's legal trade in the substance has focused new international attention on the country's production system and controls. In addition, Litvinenko's death has created new concern among regulators that the substance might be used as an instrument of murder by terrorists." His murder "has caused anti-terrorism officials to worry that an explosive or airborne dispersal of polonium, particularly in a crowded, enclosed space, could cause numerous fatalities and sow widespread panic, scientists said. Compromise a food or water supply, they said, and the consequences could be even more dire."

Sheehan To Protest At Guantanamo Next Week. The AP (1/6) reports, "American 'peace mom' Cindy Sheehan called for the closure of the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, as she and other activists arrived in Cuba on Saturday to draw attention to the nearly 400 terror suspects held at the remote site. Sheehan is among 12 human rights and anti-war activists who will travel across this Caribbean island next week, arriving at the main gate of the Guantanamo base in eastern Cuba on Thursday -- five years after the first prisoners were flown in."

Detainee's Letter Plays Key Role In Italian Rendition Trial. The Chicago Tribune (1/7, Crewdson, 617K) reports, "'This is how they kidnapped me from Italy…and how they tortured and imprisoned me in Egypt.' So begins a 6,300-word, handwritten letter, composed in an Egyptian prison cell by radical Muslim cleric Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr. His abduction by the CIA is at the center of an unprecedented judicial proceeding set to open in Italy this week. … In a kidnapping case against 26 Americans and five Italian intelligence operatives, including the one-time CIA chief in Rome and Italy's former top spymaster, Nasr, better known as Abu Omar, will speak to the court through his letter, telling his story for the first time in his own words." The Tribune notes Abu Omar "was walking to his mosque in Milan on Feb. 17, 2003, when he was stopped on the street by a man who identified himself as a police officer. The cleric wrote that he was pulled into a van, beaten and taken by plane to Egypt. … What followed, according to his letter, was torture with electric shocks, beatings that caused him to lose the hearing in one ear, and sexual abuse."

CIA Cases Spark Debate Over Torture. The Chicago Tribune (1/7, Crewdson) reports, "The use of torture has been prohibited in the United States since the ratification in 1787 of the 8th Amendment to the Constitution barring 'cruel and unusual punishment.' … 'We do not condone torture,' President Bush has declared. 'I have never ordered torture. I will never order torture. The values of this country are such that torture is not a part of our soul and our being.' … Yet some human rights groups contend that a technique known as 'waterboarding,' which simulates drowning and reportedly has been used by the U.S. on some terrorist suspects, is torture. These groups also argue that some psychological interrogation techniques, such as sleep deprivation and exposure to loud music, contravene the 8th Amendment." The Tribune continues, "While those debates continue, there is no question that terrorism suspects such as Abu Omar have been captured abroad by the CIA and transported to third countries whose police and intelligence services routinely employ interrogation methods, such as electric shock, that everyone agrees constitute torture. … Bush said on March 16, 2005, that before a third-country 'rendition' of a suspected terrorist can take place, the CIA must obtain from the receiving country 'the promise that they won't be tortured.' … Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales said on May 3, 2006, that the actual standard applied by the U.S. in choosing a destination country is less stringent: whether a suspect is 'more likely than not' to be tortured." The Tribune adds, "Canadian government and United Nations investigations have found that individuals 'rendered' by the CIA to Egypt and Syria were mistreated despite assurances that they would not be tortured. … 'It's almost impossible to talk about rendition apart from the torture element,' says Joanne Mariner, a lawyer with Human Rights Watch, 'since that is and has always been one of the central issues with renditions. The CIA knows that Egypt practices torture routinely, particularly against suspected Islamists.' … Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), whose Judiciary Committee has just begun an investigation of CIA renditions, agrees. … 'We diminish our own values as a nation--and lose credibility as an advocate of human rights around the world--by engaging in, or outsourcing, torture,' Leahy wrote Gonzales in November."

NYTimes Calls On Democrats To Address Bush's "Assault On Civil Liberties." The New York Times (1/7, WK13, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes President Bush "seems to have interpreted his party's drubbing as a mandate to keep pursuing his fantasy of victory in Iraq and to press ahead undaunted with his assault on civil liberties and the judicial system. … The Democratic majority in Congress has a moral responsibility to address all these issues: fixing the profound flaws in the military tribunals act, restoring the rule of law over Mr. Bush's rogue intelligence operations and restoring the balance of powers between Congress and the executive branch. So far, key Democrats…have said these issues are high priorities for them. We would lend such efforts our enthusiastic backing and hope…Democratic leaders are not swayed by the absurd notion circulating in Washington that the Democrats should now 'look ahead' rather than use their new majority to right the dangerous wrongs of the last six years of Mr. Bush's one-party rule. This is a false choice. Dealing with these issues is not about the past. The administration's assault on some of the nation's founding principles continues unabated."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

McConnell Takes On Competing Responsibilities As DNI. The Washington Post (1/7, A10, Pincus, 690K) reports, "President Bush's choice to be the second director of national intelligence, retired Navy Vice Adm. John M. McConnell, must pick up the job of restructuring the nation's $42 billion intelligence community, which after 19 months is still very much a work in progress. … The DNI's other major role is as the president's top intelligence adviser. That means being present six mornings a week when Bush gets his national security briefing. That session offers the DNI an opportunity not only to have time with the president, but to hear and take part in the ensuing discussion with Vice President Cheney, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley and chief of staff Joshua B. Bolten, who are also in the room. This part of the job requires the DNI to take time the night before to read the roughly 28-page daily briefing report and to show up at his Old Executive Office Building suite next to the White House at about 6:30 each morning to go over the latest intelligence." The Post notes, "Another aspect of the DNI's role as top intelligence adviser to the president is attendance at high-level White House meetings, which have been increasingly frequent since the Iraq war began. … How McConnell will divide his time between this advisory role and the intelligence community duties, should he be confirmed, remains to be seen."

Congress Unhappy With Pace Of FEMA Overhaul. The Washington Times (1/7, Waterman, 88K) reports, "Lawmakers are frustrated with the lack of progress on a congressionally mandated overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, designed to ensure that flaws that dogged the response to Hurricane Katrina are fixed. In a letter sent late last month to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and released last week, members of both the House and Senate homeland security committees complained about being kept in the dark over progress on the changes, which they feared was lagging. … The law effectively reconstitutes FEMA as an independent agency within the department. Mr. Chertoff opposed the overhaul, which was included in the must-pass Homeland Security appropriations bill and signed by President Bush in October."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Iraq Strategy Said To Combine Surge With Jobs Program. Coverage of President Bush's developing strategy on Iraq noted its dual aspects as well as widespread skepticism on whether it could work. The New York Times (1/7, A1, Sanger, 1.16M) reports in a negative article that the President's "new Iraq strategy calls for a rapid influx of forces that could add as many as 20,000 American combat troops to Baghdad, supplemented with a jobs program costing as much as $1 billion intended to employ Iraqis in projects including painting schools and cleaning streets, according to American officials who are piecing together the last parts of the initiative." But "even in outlining the plan, some American officials acknowledged deep skepticism about whether the new plan could succeed. They said two-thirds of the promised Iraqi force would consist of Kurdish pesh merga units to be sent from northern Iraq, and they said some doubts remained about whether they would show up in Baghdad and were truly committed to quelling sectarian fighting." President Bush's coming speech is acknowledged by them as part of "a last-ditch effort to salvage the mission in Iraq."

The AP (1/7, Riechmann) reports, "The idea of a troop buildup is getting a cool reception on Capitol Hill and from some military leaders who claim there is no military solution to the problems in Iraq where 140,000 troops already are deployed. ... Military analysts say Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, who recently finished his tour as the No. 2 general in Iraq, has recommended a short-term jobs program. Others familiar with the plan say Bush is favoring: short-term jobs programs and extending micro-loans to small business; increasing the amount of money that military commanders can spend quickly on local projects to improve the daily lives of Iraqis."

The Washington Post (1/7, A1, Abramowitz, Wright, Tyson, 690K) reports that there is "growing skepticism inside and outside the administration that the emerging package of extra troops, economic assistance and political benchmarks for the Baghdad government will make any more than a marginal difference in stabilizing the country. ... Many officials at the State and Defense departments also doubt that the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is capable of making the necessary reforms. … Meanwhile, the Joint Chiefs of Staff are worried about overstretching the Army and Marines."

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, A1, McManus, Reynolds, 850K) reports that a troop surge after losing both houses of Congress "might sound paradoxical, but aides say Bush's willingness to send more troops makes sense based on two beliefs that have long guided his war strategy. The first is that the price of leaving Iraq would be greater than the cost of staying. The second is that the public will accept the burdens of war if convinced that success is still possible." According to anonymous aides, "Bush believes that the United States still has a chance to stop Iraq from descending into civil war — and, on the other side of the equation, that the consequences of withdrawal would be disastrous. He thinks it's too early to turn primary responsibility for security in Baghdad over to Iraqi security forces, whose performance has been disappointing."

Gannett (1/7, Yaukey) reports that the plan "has sparked intense debate even among advocates who differ on how many troops to send and for how long. ... A prolonged surge into 2008, experts say, could require tapping Guard and Reserve units, which provided close to half the U.S. force in Iraq in 2005." Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "pledged to Bush on Thursday that he would commit three additional battalions to Baghdad, but his record of follow-through raises doubts."

Newsday (1/7, Gordon) reports that a surge "would be the biggest gamble of George W. Bush's presidency -- escalating the war in Iraq with as many as 20,000 U.S. troops when most Americans just want to get out." In many ways, "a surge would amount to a repudiation of the administration's current strategy, which has focused heavily on reducing U.S. presence in Iraq by pulling back from the fight and turning over more and more security duties to Iraqi forces. ... Even supporters of the plan paint it as essentially Bush's last stand: one final, high-stakes bid to salvage something approaching victory."

Democrats Charge Bush Reshuffled Commanders To Find Surge Backers. ABC World News (1/6, story 3, 1:55, Sciutto, 8.78M) reported, "The Democrats now in charge on Capitol Hill say the President reshuffled military leadership to find commanders who would back a troop surge." ABC (Morrell): "The White House insists that opinions on troop levels had nothing to do with these personnel changes, but it's not lost on anyone here in Washington that generals Abizaid and Casey, no fans of a surge, are out. And they are being replaced by Adm. Fallon and Gen. Petraeus. The latter is a big advocate of more boots on the ground."

The Washington Post (1/7, A1, Atkinson, 690K) profiles Petraeus, depicting his abilities, the difficulty of the task facing him, and the existence of some personal detractors in the military: "Long recognized as one of the Army's premier intellectuals, with a PhD from Princeton to complement his West Point education, Petraeus, 54, will inherit one of the toughest assignments handed any senior officer since the Vietnam War. He takes command of 132,000 U.S. troops in a country shattered by insurgency and sectarian bloodletting, with a home front that is divided and disheartened after 3,000 American combat deaths." Although "some peers" consider him "arrogant or excessively ambitious," others view him "as perhaps the last, best hope for success in Iraq.

Democrats Could Face "Crucial Test" On Iraq. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/7, A1, Sandalow, 384K) reports, "President Bush and the new Congress are on a collision course over Iraq that could overshadow the Democrats' '100-hour agenda" and end up defining Rep. Nancy Pelosi's tenure as House speaker." If Bush "announces his intention to deploy as many as 20,000 additional U.S. troops in Iraq, he may encounter widespread political and public defiance. It will quickly test the new Democratic majority's capacity to stand up to the commander in chief in a time of war, and the ability of the legislative branch to seize control of the White House's controversial foreign policy." The Chronicle adds, "For now, Democrats are counting on growing public opposition and congressional oversight to force that change. Pelosi has held open the possibility of attaching conditions to the Pentagon's appropriation bill, which the House expects to receive in the next few weeks. ... But Pelosi has ruled out using what many believe is the legislative branch's most potent weapon -- its ability to cut off the funds with which the Pentagon wages war."

CNN (1/6, Quijano) reported, "In another sign of the political reality facing President Bush, Nancy Pelosi yesterday, after an event honoring her in Baltimore, said that the President does not have a blank check from Congress when it comes to Iraq policy. At the same time, as far as this troop surge option goes, there's been a great deal of debate as to whether or not that would, in fact, be effective. Members of the military as well as lawmakers on Capitol Hill, some of them expressing concern that, in fact, there should be a clearly defined mission, they believe, in order for a troop surge to be effective. Also, they want to see it tied to economic and political steps in Iraq."

Lieberman Goes His Own Way On Iraq. The Washington Post (1/7, A4, Murray, 690K) reports that Sen. Joe Lieberman "was sworn in last week as the chamber's one and only 'independent Democrat,' with the emphasis on 'independent.' On most issues, including big domestic priorities, he expects to vote as he has for the past 18 years, as a loyal Democrat. But on Iraq, Lieberman is more in sync with Bush than are many Republicans. He is a passionate defender of the war as a death struggle against Islamic terrorism." Democrats "grumble off the record that Lieberman is muddying an increasingly unified Democratic message on Iraq, but their public comments are cautious and generally complimentary."

McCain Makes Case For More Troops. In a Washington Post (1/7, B7) op-ed this morning, Sen. John McCain writes, "There are two keys to any increase in U.S. force levels: It must be substantial, and it must be sustained. During my recent trip, commanders there spoke to me of adding as many as five brigades (brigades consist of 3,500 to 5,000 troops) in Baghdad and one or two in Anbar province. This is the minimum we should consider. … The mission of these troops would be to implement the 'hold' element, elusive thus far, of the military's 'clear, hold, build' strategy: to maintain security in cleared areas, to protect the population and to impose the government's authority. This means establishing local outposts and forging relationships with local leaders, building intelligence networks, safeguarding economic reconstruction activities, overseeing other employment-generating projects and weaning Iraqis off of their reliance on militias for safety. Our troops would work in cooperation with Iraqi forces and stay until the completion of their mission. The worst of all worlds would be a small, short surge of U.S. forces. We have tried small surges, and they have been ineffective because our commanders lacked the forces necessary to hold territory after it was cleared. Violence, which fell dramatically while U.S. forces were present, spiked as soon as they were gone. Any new surge needs to provide enough American troops to hold the areas on their own."

WPost Critiques Surge Concept. The Washington Post (1/7, 690K) editorializes that President Bush "will face a formidable task in convincing Congress and the public that such a 'surge' makes sense. ... One [question] is whether the administration and the Army will have the political and logistical capacity to carry out the sort of surge that [Senators John McCain and Joe Lieberman], and experts at the conservative American Enterprise Institute who support them, say is necessary ... [Furthermore,] while Mr. Maliki occasionally speaks of accord, his government has pursued a sectarian agenda. If U.S. troops pacify Baghdad, Shiite politicians in the government may feel less rather than more pressure to compromise. ... The constructive alternative to a surge is not the abandonment of Iraq. Instead, it is the fashioning of a strategy that positions the United States to support the country's moderate forces over the long term -- not just 18 months but the years that may pass before the country can be stabilized. That means a smaller and sustainable military force that can focus on training and backing up the Iraqi army and fighting al-Qaeda, and an aid program that supports the elected government while seeking to marginalize its extremist elements."

Rich Says Bush Seeks "Escalation." New York Times (1/7, WK14, 1.16M) columnist Frank Rich writes, "It's against the backdrop of both the Hussein video and the Ford presidency that we must examine the prospect of that much-previewed 'surge' in Iraq — a surge, by the way, that the press should start calling by its rightful name, escalation." Ford in 1975 "knew it was way too late to make the symbolic gesture of trying to toss fresh American troops on the pyre"; in 2006, the Saddam hanging video shows "that our principal achievement in Iraq over four years has been to empower a jihadist mini-Saddam in place of the secular original." Rich adds that the surge is too small to work: "It is not meant to achieve that undefined 'victory' Mr. Bush keeps talking about but to serve his own political spin. His real mission is to float the 'we're not winning, we're not losing' status quo until Jan. 20, 2009."

Brooks Says Troop Surge Could Salvage Iraq. In his New York Times (1/7, WK14, 1.16M) column, David Brooks writes that "for over three years, President Bush sided with the light-footprint school" of military presence in Iraq, but "it is now clear that the light-footprint approach has been a disaster. If the U.S. had committed more troops and established security back in 2003…history would be different." Brooks asserts that "the surge is a good policy three years too late." To prevent a "political and humanitarian disaster" in Iraq, Brooks concludes that the US should "commit military resources, and create a political strategy, commensurate with the task of salvaging something."

Hoagland Says Rice Steering Bush Toward Salvaging Presidency. In his Washington Post (1/7, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland writes that in his coming speech President Bush "will signal whether Iraq will remain the center of his grand designs for the Middle East or will recede to being one more troublesome conflict in a zone of deadly turbulence and trade-offs. Events, and one key aide, point Bush toward the latter course, with its promise of salvaging his legacy elsewhere. The aide is Condoleezza Rice, who has developed a personal exit strategy for Iraq. She is tossing that reputation-damaging hot potato to John Negroponte." Hoagland recommends a "four-point program" to Bush: he "should acknowledge that his hopes for establishing Iraq as a united, free-market democratic model for the Arab world have fallen far short," "recognize that Iran has legitimate interests in security in Iraq and the Persian Gulf region," "be prepared to extend guarantees of territorial security for Arab states in the Gulf region," and "use Rice's new burst of Middle East activism to reinforce the changes in Iraq strategy his speech will disclose."

"Fierce Clash" In Baghdad Kills At Least 30.

Coverage of fighting in Baghdad noted the likelihood of a perception that the Iraqi government was targeting Sunni Arabs. The New York Times (1/7, A16, Santora, 1.16M) reports in a grim article, "A fierce clash left at least 30 people dead in central Baghdad late Saturday night as Iraqi Army forces fought with gunmen in an area where several residents had been killed and their bodies hanged from street lampposts, the Iraqi military said. The fighting took place in the neighborhood around Haifa Street, a mostly Sunni Arab enclave with a small Shiite population." The Times adds skeptically, "Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki announced Saturday the beginning of a new Baghdad security operation and promised to purge the government security forces of militia fighters and others with sectarian aims. But Mr. Maliki has promised such a crackdown before, and his government has been increasingly seen by Sunnis in Iraq and abroad as dominated by Shiite interests."

The Washington Post (1/7, A13, Partlow, 690K) reports, "The fighting along Haifa Street, raging into the night, killed 30 insurgents, and Iraqi soldiers captured eight others, including five Sudanese fighters, Defense Ministry spokesman Mohammed al-Askari said. ... 'The Baghdad security plan will not offer a safe shelter for outlaws, regardless of their ethnic and political affiliations, and we will punish anyone who hesitates to implement orders because of his ethnic and political background,' Maliki said. Maliki's words appeared intended to counter the perception that the plan would focus on combating Sunni insurgents. ... The announcement was greeted with little enthusiasm in Baghdad, where sectarian killing has escalated despite repeated attempts at cracking down on insurgents and militiamen."

The Washington Times/AP (1/7, A1, Hurst) reports that government aide and member of parliament Hassan al-Suneid "said the new drive would focus initially on Sunni insurgent strongholds in western Baghdad. Sunnis were likely to object, given that a large measure of today's violence in Baghdad is the work of Shi'ite militias, loyal to Mr. al-Maliki's key political backer, the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr." Al-Suneid and Prime Minister Maliki "insisted that this drive to contain militants, as opposed to a largely ineffective joint operation with American forces in the second half of last year, would succeed because it would be in the hands of Iraqi commanders who have been promised American backup and air power if they call for it. But U.S. political and military leaders -- in a message of congratulation on Iraq's Army Day -- tempered Iraqi claims of full independence."

The AP (1/6, Hurst, Abdul-Zahra) reports in a longer version of the above article that Maliki, "whose political survival depends heavily on al-Sadr, the radical anti-American cleric, is eager to show his independence of American occupation forces. ... The prime minister has repeatedly rejected U.S. demands to move against the Mahdi Army." BBC.com (1/6) also reports the fighting.

Seven More Iraqis Killed In Further Violence. The AP (1/7, Salaheddin) reports, "Gunmen killed three Sunni Muslim shopkeepers Sunday in a mixed neighborhood of Baghdad, and two pedestrians died in a roadside bomb, police said. ... In Diwaniyah, 80 miles south of the capital, gunmen assassinated Akeel al-Khalidi, a defense ministry employee, as he left his house for work, another police officer said on condition of anonymity out of fear of reprisals."

Maliki Announces Plan To End Violence In Baghdad. Under the headline, "Iraqi Leader Plans Security Push," the Washington Post (1/7, A13, Partlow, 690K) notes Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "warned Baghdad residents

Saturday to expect the disruptions of a heightened military presence and said his government was ready to launch the latest effort to pacify the violent Iraqi capital." The Post adds, "Despite fierce ongoing fighting in western Iraq and violence capable of erupting almost anywhere, Baghdad remains the heart of the country's sectarian conflict. Maliki, in his speech at a morning ceremony honoring the Iraqi army, warned rival political parties against interfering in his plan." Those "words appeared intended to counter the perception that the plan would focus on combating Sunni insurgents." The Post says "Maliki's speech provided few details about the tactical or strategic changes guiding the forthcoming effort," and his remarks were "greeted with little enthusiasm in Baghdad, where sectarian killing has escalated despite repeated attempts at cracking down on insurgents and militiamen."

CNN (1/6, Whitfield) reported, "Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki says Iraqi forces are ready to implement a new security crackdown in Baghdad. It will target all militias regardless of political or religious affiliations. The announcement comes as President Bush is ready to unveil his new Iraq war plan." The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Moore, 850K) reports that Maliki spoke "five months after the U.S. military launched a plan to quell sectarian fighting that is widely regarded as a failure. Killings have steadily increased in the capital as insurgents and Shiite Muslim militia death squads continue to operate with impunity." He "revealed little about the new plan except that the military would have the main responsibility, a shift from the previous operation, which relied on police officers. Iraq's police forces are widely believed to have compromised the U.S. plan to quell sectarian fighting."

ABC World News (1/6, story 3, 1:55, Morrell, 8.78M) reported, "The White House is applauding Prime Minister Maliki's new pledge to crack down on sectarian violence, especially his willingness to go along with U.S. troops and go after both Sunni insurgents and Shia militias. Of course, they've heard tough talk from Maliki before, but one White House official told me today this was a very good speech. The official adds people here are also very encouraged that Maliki has signaled his willingness to go along with a surge of U.S. troops if that's what President Bush calls for when he unveils his new strategy for Iraq next week."

Suicide Bombing Has Lingering Impact On Baghdad Neighborhood. The New York Times (1/7, A1, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports on a Baghdad neighborhood that lost 34 children in a 2005 suicide bombing: "More than 3,000 Iraqis are dying every month in this war — roughly the total deaths in the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon or all the American troops killed since the war began. But behind the headlines and statistics, most of the war is experienced in Iraqi living rooms and on blocks like the one here, where families struggle with the intense pain of loss. ... The deaths that morning tore a hole in the life of the block, and more than a year later, many people have been unable to put their lives back together. Some have drifted away from their spouses. Others changed jobs or stopped going to work altogether. Reminders of the loss were everywhere: Class sizes were smaller. Soccer tournaments for 12-year-olds stopped. Bug collecting was no longer a hobby." The Times adds, "The attack seemed calculated to make Iraqis despise Americans, in a pattern that would eventually succeed and change the direction of the war. But while some of the parents interviewed seem to have developed that hatred, many had not and even expressed respect."

US Commanders Were Upset By Manner Of Saddam's Execution. A 3,300-word "ticktock" recounting of the Saddam Hussein execution in today's New York Times (1/7, Burns, 1.16M) is titled, "Before Hanging, A Push For Revenge And A Push Back." The "taunts Mr. Hussein endured from Shiite guards…have made headlines around the world, and stirred angry protests among his fellow Iraqi Sunnis. But the story of how American commanders and diplomats fought to halt the execution until midnight on Friday…is only now coming into focus, as Iraqi and American officials, in the glare of international outrage over the hanging, compete with their versions of what happened." The Times adds, "Aides said American commanders were deeply upset by the way they were forced to hand Mr. Hussein over, a sequence commanders saw as motivated less by a concern for justice than for revenge. In the days following the hanging, recriminations flowed between the military command and the United States Embassy, accused by some officers of abandoning American interests at midnight Friday in favor of placating Mr. Maliki and hard-line Shiites." Unnamed "senior" Bush officials say that Secretary of State Rice "gave the green light for Mr. Hussein to be turned over, despite the reservations of the military commanders in Baghdad. One official said that Ms. Rice was supported in that view by Stephen J. Hadley, Mr. Bush's national security adviser." The New York Times (1/7, 1.16M) supplies a graphic time line of the hanging. The New York Times (1/7, WK5, Murphy, 1.16M) also writes, "All the talk last week after the hanging of Saddam Hussein suggests that we viewers thought there was some greater codification of the protocols and proprieties than was apparent in the mocking scene that unfolded."

UK's Brown Denounces Saddam's Execution. The AP (1/7) reports UK Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown, "the likely successor to British Prime Minister Tony Blair, condemned Saddam Hussein's execution as 'deplorable' on Saturday." He "said he opposed the death penalty and hoped lessons would be learned from the mistakes made in Saddam's hanging, as well as from other difficulties encountered in Iraq." The AP says Brown's

"denunciation contrasted with Blair's silence on the issue. Blair, the chief U.S. ally in the war in Iraq, faces increasing pressure to share his views on the execution and has said he would speak about it in the coming week."

UN Chief Urges Suspension Of Iraqi Executions. AFP (1/6) reports, "UN chief Ban Ki-moon has 'strongly' urged the Iraqi government to suspend imminent executions amid an international outcry over the bungled hanging of Saddam Hussein a week ago. Iraq's embattled prime minister, Nuri al-Maliki, meanwhile, threatened to 'review' relations with countries that criticized Saddam's execution. ... Two former Saddam henchmen -- Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti and Awad Ahmed al-Bandar -- are expected to be hanged soon. ... Their executions, due Thursday, were postponed to Sunday, Shiite lawmaker Baha al-Araji from the group of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr told AFP earlier this week." A Maliki official attributed the postponement to "international pressure." BBC.com (1/7) also reports Ban's plea.

Trial Process Was Allegedly Botched. In a commentary for the New York Times Magazine (1/7, 1.16M), Professor Noah Feldman writes, "The process fell short of what is needed to invoke the transcendent norms of universal justice. This was a profound failure. As with the other shortcomings of Iraq's government, many players were at fault here: the Americans for failing to provide security for the Iraqis, including the defense team; the Iraqis for failing to get the trial - or the country - to run smoothly; the international community for sanctimoniously disengaging."

Execution Could Spell End Of Secular Arab Nationalism. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (1/7, 850K), writer Robert Kaplan argues, "Just as the demise of Slobodan Milosevic in Yugoslavia closed the lid on national communist parties in Eastern Europe, the demise of Saddam Hussein in Iraq appears likely to do the same for secular Arab nationalism across the Middle East. ... secular Arab nationalism will exit the stage revealed for what it always was: a despotic perversion of the western nation-state that lasted as long as it did mainly because of secret-police techniques imported from the former Soviet Union. ... No sooner were these independent new [Arab] states created than the ties of faith and tribe were undermining them. ... Indeed, the more artificial the state, the more extreme the secular ideology had to be to hold it together."

Antitank Mines Slow US-Iraqi Drive. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Zavis, 850K) reports from Samoudi, Iraq, "Antitank mines have become one of the top threats as U.S. and Iraqi forces press their assault in a Sunni insurgent redoubt said to be riddled with weapons caches, secret tunnels and training ranges. Their convoys have hit at least 10 explosive devices since the operation was launched early Thursday, most of them antitank mines. ... The devices first were used in the area in November, when U.S. forces faced off against fighters maneuvering through the irrigation canals that lace the region. U.S. vehicles have been upgraded to withstand many attacks, including in some cases adding armor around their fuel tanks that Iraqi vehicles lack. U.S. forces also have developed strategies to mitigate the impact of the blasts, including driving very slowly so the effects are concentrated on the engine box, not the passenger compartment. ... About 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi forces are involved in the assault aimed at reclaiming an area military commanders say has become a haven for Al Qaeda in Iraq and other militant groups. ... But in most homes, soldiers are finding only women and children."

Marines Hope Women Can Talk Men Into Fighting Anbar Insurgency. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Perry, 850K) reports, "The U.S. military is reaching out to women in several communities in the rebel stronghold of Al Anbar province, in hopes of persuading them to tell their husbands and sons to help in the fight against the insurgency. ... Angela Khadijah Williams, a public diplomacy officer with the State Department…believes outreach to Iraqi women is essential. ... The women's outreach effort is in its first stages with no tangible results so far, another reason the Marines say the fight against the insurgency in Al Anbar is a long process where patience is key."

Guarding Iraq-Iran Border A Challenge. ABC World News (1/6, story 4, 2:10, Sciutto, 8.78M) reported, "Any effort to control Iraq will have to take into account one of the most crucial and volatile areas, which is also the most difficult to secure. It is the 900-mile border between Iraq and Iran, where American troops are trying to help Iraqi forces block insurgents and smugglers." ABC (McCarthy): "From the air you don't see a lot of people out here. Iraqi border guards patrol this terrain. A small group of Americans, led by this colonel from the Special Forces, is trying to train them. ... Colonel Harry Miller has just 55 Americans training 4,000 Iraqis. It is a critical mission. The U.S. believes Iranian agents and supplies are crossing this border to fuel much of the violence inside Iraq. .. Incredibly, for three years after the invasion, little was done to secure this border."

Official Says Evidence Does Not Back Haditha Marines. The AP (1/6, Burns) reports, "U.S. criminal investigators found no evidence to support the claim of Marines charged in the deaths of unarmed Iraqi civilians that five were shot after trying to flee the scene of a roadside bombing that killed one Marine, a senior defense official said Saturday. Investigators determined that all five Iraqis were shot within arm's length of each other and no more than 18 feet from the white taxi they were ordered to exit by members of a Marine squad in the western Iraqi town of Haditha, said the official, who is familiar with reports produced by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service."

The New York Times (1/7, A16, Von Zielbauer, 1.16M) reports, "An American government report on the killing of 24 Iraqis ... provides new details of how the shootings unfolded and supports allegations by prosecutors that a few marines illegally killed civilians, government officials said yesterday." In the report, "Sergeant [Sanick] Dela Cruz said that as he approached the taxi, he saw some men standing near it with their hands in the air, officials said. After Sergeant Wuterich shot them, he continued shooting as they lay on the ground, and later urinated on one of them, an official said. ... Several lawyers representing the accused marines expressed anger at the Defense Department, which they blamed for allowing the report to be given surreptitiously to a newspaper and, they said, potentially damaging their clients' cases."

The Washington Post (1/7, A14, White, 690K), which first reported the findings yesterday, reports that investigators recovered graphic digital-camera images as evidence: "The images -- which investigators tracked down on several laptop computers and digital media drives, some in the United States -- provide visual evidence of a series of shootings outside a taxi and inside three homes that military criminal investigators have alleged were murders ... the Haditha images were discovered months after the shootings as more than 60 Naval Criminal Investigative Service agents scoured the globe for them." The Los Angeles Times (1/7, 850K) summarizes the Post article.

New England Death Toll In Iraq "Nearly Doubled" In 2006. The Boston Globe (1/7, Mishra, 413K) reports, "The number of New Englanders killed in combat in Iraq nearly doubled last year to 40, mostly men under age 25 cut down by increasingly lethal hidden roadside bombs, according to a Globe analysis." Of the 40, "26 -- 65 percent -- were under age 25."

Watada Case Tests Officers' Right To Dissent. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Watanabe, 850K) reports, "Do military officers have the right to publicly voice dissent about their commander in chief and U.S. war policy? That question highlighted last week's pretrial hearing at Ft. Lewis Army base near Seattle for 1st Lt. Ehren Watada, the nation's first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq. ... Watada's statements constitute the criminal offense of 'conduct unbecoming an officer,' Army officials argue." Two retired war critics, "Army Maj. Gens. John Batiste and Paul D. Eaton, said in interviews that they drew sharp distinctions between Watada's conduct as a still-active-duty officer and their own remarks after they left the service," with Eaton saying, "What the American people can't have is an Army of people who on any given day can wake up and say, 'That's not what I want to do.'"

Defense Contractors Lose Prosecution Immunity. The Boston Globe (1/7, Stockman, 413K) reports, "An estimated 100,000 employees of US defense contractors working in Iraq are no longer immune from military prosecutions, because of a little-noticed provision in a 2007 defense spending bill aimed at holding private contractors accountable for crimes committed in war zones." The loophole "caused outrage during the Abu Ghraib scandal in 2004. Soldiers involved in abusing prisoners were sentenced in military courts, but the civilian interrogators working alongside them for Titan Corp. and CACI International, two private firms, faced no punishment. The 2007 Defense Bill, enacted in October, placed contractors and others who accompany the military in the field under the same set of military laws that govern the armed forces."

British Deals Allegedly Hurt War On Taliban. The Washington Times/London Daily Telegraph (1/7, Rashid) reports, "British policy in Afghanistan is seriously damaging Western efforts against the Taliban, diplomats from allied countries have warned. Officials from the United States and European members of NATO say Britain is increasingly at odds with its coalition partners over its policy of making arbitrary peace deals with the Taliban, while at the same time declining to put pressure on Pakistan to stop providing sanctuary to the Taliban leadership." Allegedly at risk are "military preparations for a major Taliban offensive expected next month." Diplomats attribute the British attitude to "cooperation between Britain's MI6 intelligence agency and Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) agency on Britain's domestic terrorist threat from British-born extremists of Pakistani origin."

Afghan Roadside Bomb Wounds NATO Soldier. The AP (1/6) reports, "A roadside bomb struck a NATO vehicle in southern Afghanistan on Saturday, wounding one soldier, while a suicide bomber in a car wounded four soldiers in the country's east, officials said." None of the five soldiers' nationalities was disclosed, but the AP says of the latter bombing, "Most of the troops in that region are American. The Bermel region borders Pakistan, and a U.S. base there sees frequent rocket attacks."

Border Mining Plan Said To Worsen Afghan-Pakistan Relations. The Washington Post (1/7, A16, Constable, 690K) says relations between Afghanistan and Pakistan are "steadily deteriorating" and are beset by a "deepening distrust." The Pakistani plan to mine their shared border to deter crossings by extremists "has aroused angry protests by Afghan leaders who say the mines would endanger innocent travelers and divide tribal lands whose inhabitants do not recognize the border." Those

"contretemps is the latest sour note in a deteriorating relationship between the neighboring Muslim governments, both staunch U.S. allies that are linked by the common threat of terrorism but divided by bitter cross-charges of failing to curb a growing Islamic insurgency that operates on both sides of the border." The bilateral "tension has persisted despite a series of high-level meetings between [Afghan President Hamid] Karzai and senior Pakistani officials."

"Arlington Ladies" Give Military Funerals A Personal Touch. The Washington Post (1/7, A1, Schulte, 690K) reports that as a tradition to ensure "that no soldier is ever buried alone," an Army Arlington Lady "has stood graveside at every funeral at Arlington as the personal representative of the chief of staff" chosen from "a society open only to military wives or widows and then only to those invited to join." The Post adds that since the many casualties and growing public disapproval of the Iraq War, the stoic job of the Arlington Ladies has become more difficult if "the family is wondering, 'Are they dying in vain for this?'" The Post points out that "those fears, said Paula McKinley, chair of the Navy Arlington ladies, are not new. 'They have permeated every war since World War II.'"

Hopi Tribe Members Pleased With US Attorney Recommendation. The Arizona Republic (1/7, Az) reports, "News last week that Hopi Tribe member Diane Humetewa was being recommended by Arizona's senators to President Bush as a potential nominee to be the next U.S. attorney for the District of Arizona was met with excitement in the village of Kykotsmovi." The Republic continues, "Justice Department officials said Friday that they've determined she would not be the first Native American U.S. attorney in the entire nation, because past and former U.S. attorneys from states including Utah, South Dakota, New Hampshire and West Virginia have claimed Native American heritage. But she would be the first Native American U.S. attorney for the Arizona district if nominated and confirmed." The Republic adds, "Hopi Tribal Vice Chairman Todd Honyaoma Sr. said Humetewa is a member of the Tobacco/Rabbit Clan from the Village of Kykotsmovi. … 'We could not be more proud of and exhilarated for our sister and daughter,' he said. … 'The Hopi way is that we place a high value on education and serve as stewards to our communities and to the world. Ms. Humetewa has exemplified this value many times in her life,' Honyaoma said. … 'She will make history.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Nardelli's Compensation Package Could Presage More Of The Same. The New York Times (1/7) reports, "It has been a bit bewildering to watch two failed chief executives in the last two weeks or so waltz away from their companies toting severance packages worth more than $200 million each. But pay experts say shareholders had better get ready for more of the same." The Times continues, "Last week, Robert L. Nardelli hightailed it out of Home Depot with $210 million, fast on the heels of Hank McKinnell, whose farewell package of a similar amount from Pfizer was disclosed Dec. 21. Both were paid profusely for failure, thanks to contracts struck years ago by the companies' directors. … Keep in mind that both packages supplemented pay that these executives received during their tenures. Mr. Nardelli's $210 million, for example, came on top of the $63.5 million he made running Home Depot for six years." The Times adds, "That exit numbers like these have shocked many shareholders proves how much inadequate disclosure has kept executive pay hidden from view. But with new rules from the Securities and Exchange Commission on improved pay disclosures, more of these "holy cow" moments will be coming soon to a proxy near you. … Under the new rules, companies will have to disclose potential payments to executives in the case of a termination or a change in control at the company, wrought perhaps by a merger. Unfortunately, the S.E.C. did not require that these payments be made in tabular form and totaled, which would have made it simple for time-pressed investors. … For the most part, however, the figures will be there in black and white. … Are we likely to see any $200 million numbers? Yes, said Mike Sorensen, a principal at Exequity, a law firm in Libertyville, Ill., that does compensation work. He expects such largess to show up at roughly 10 of the nation's 100 largest companies.

Nardelli Steps Down From Business Roundtable's Disaster-Response Task Force. The New York Times (1/7, BU2, Dash) reports, "On the very same day that he left Home Depot last week with an exit package worth at least $210 million, Robert L. Nardelli walked away from another prominent position -- without a cent." The Times continues, "While he was still Home Depot's chairman and chief executive, Mr. Nardelli volunteered as the chairman of a disaster-response task force at the Business Roundtable, a kind of club for corporate chieftains that lobbies for their interests. … Last month, he met at the White House with Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security, and other top government and military officials to discuss improved collaboration on disaster preparedness. … On Tuesday, though, Mr. Nardelli had to quit the group. The Business Roundtable is only for sitting chief executives."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Death Of Louisiana Mayor Ruled Suicide. The AP (1/7) reports from West Lake, LA, "In the hours before his death on the evening of December 30, the first black mayor of this overwhelmingly white town started learning his new job." The AP continues, "About noon, he set City Hall's alarm system for the first time. He got instructions on how to raise and lower the U.S. flag. He had already ordered a new mayoral letterhead with his name on it and a button-down shirt embroidered 'Gerald Washington, Mayor.' … A few hours later he indulged in a hobby, placing a $4 bet at a nearby horse-racing track. … But by 10 p.m. Gerald 'Wash' Washington was dead in the deserted parking lot of a former high school, a bullet wound in his chest. His gun was found by the body." The AP adds, "The coroner and the sheriff have pronounced Washington's death a suicide -- a finding that has embroiled this oil-refinery town in conspiracy theories, with Washington's kin and friends insisting he had no reason to end his life. … Some have accused police of covering up a murder -- perhaps a racially motivated one. … 'This is the South, so of course everybody's going to say it was some white guy shooting a black guy,' said Dr. Terry Welke, the Calcasieu Parish coroner who ruled that Washington killed himself." The AP notes, "Welke said soot from the pistol was deep in the wound, indicating the gun was touching Washington's chest when the trigger was pulled. That, he said, suggested suicide. He also said that while most gunfire suicides involve a bullet to the head, it is not unusual for people to kill themselves with a shot to the chest. … But the coroner and the sheriff have offered no reason for why Washington would have killed himself. No suicide note was found. And there is no evidence he bade farewell to anyone, put his financial affairs in order, or gave any other indication he was about to kill himself, authorities said."

Georgia Man Charged With Trying To Extort $1.5 Million From Oprah Winfrey. The AP (1/7) reports from Chicago, "A man has been charged with trying to extort $1.5 million from Oprah Winfrey by threatening to release recorded telephone conversations he claimed would hurt her reputation, according to the FBI and published reports." The AP continues, "Keifer Bonvillain, 36, targeted a person identified only as 'a public figure and the owner of a Chicago-based company,' according to a criminal complaint filed in U.S. District Court. The Chicago Tribune and the Chicago Sun-Times, citing unnamed sources, reported Saturday that Bonvillain's target was Winfrey." The AP adds, "Bonvillain, of Atlanta, was arrested Dec. 15 in the parking lot of an Atlanta hotel and released on $20,000 bail. He was scheduled for a preliminary hearing in Chicago on Monday. … According to the complaint, Bonvillain met a California-based employee of the Chicago company at a party more than two years ago, then recorded conversations with the employee about the owner and her business. … In mid-October he sent the owner an e-mail, telling her an employee said awful things about her, the complaint states." The AP notes, "A month later, Bonvillain sent a letter saying he had tapes of the conversations, an FBI agent alleges in the complaint. In response, another associate of the company called Bonvillain and learned he had taped 12 hours of those discussions. … Over the next few weeks, Bonvillain told the associate he wanted to publish a book based on the tapes and claimed he had received offers of $500,000 to $3 million from tabloids and book publishers, the complaint said."

Utah Student Sentenced For Hacking Into Professor's Accounts. The Deseret Morning News (1/7, Fattah) reports, "A 22-year-old University of Utah computer science student has been sentenced to four months incarceration and 120 days home confinement after admitting to hacking into his professor's university and personal accounts, changing grades and reading personal e-mails." The News continues, "During a sentencing hearing in U.S. District Court on Thursday, You Li promised U.S. District Judge Tena Campbell to lead a more honest life. 'Those things were so wrong and were against my conscience and my beliefs,' Li said." The News adds, "Li, a Chinese national, was arrested by FBI agents at a campus dormitory last February. According to a grand jury indictment, Li was accused of using a software program to break into the university's math department computer system in December of 2004. … Li has admitted to using a professor's user name and password to attempt to change his grades in classes, read e-mails and obtain other passwords and bank account information. … According to federal prosecutors, Li also accessed the professor's personal e-mail account and installed a key-logging software that recorded the professor's other user names and passwords as well as other actions. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Scott Garland said Li's actions went beyond just changing a grade and that the student ventured into his professor's bank account and personal life."

Hackers Hijack Personal Computers To Commit Fraud. The New York Times (1/7, A1, Markoff, 1.16M), in a front-page article, reports, "In their persistent quest to breach the Internet's defenses, the bad guys are honing their weapons and increasing their firepower. With growing sophistication, they are taking advantage of programs that secretly install themselves on thousands or even millions of personal computers, band these computers together into an unwitting army of zombies, and use the collective power of the dragooned network to commit Internet crimes. These systems, called botnets, are being blamed for the huge spike in spam that bedeviled the Internet in recent months, as well as fraud and data theft."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Fewer States Expected To Vote On Gay Marriage In Coming Years. The Washington Times (1/7, Wetzstein, 88K) reports, "The legislative approval of a marriage constitutional amendment in Massachusetts last week means that at least three states have a good chance of having such measures on their 2008 ballots. But this is a considerably smaller crop of amendments than in previous elections, and there are signs that the state amendment strategy may have run its course. … The amendment strategy took off after the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court legalized same-sex 'marriage' in November 2003, and now 27 states have voter-approved marriage amendments. But no other state court has followed the Massachusetts court -- in fact, nine recent court decisions have upheld state marriage laws." The California Supreme Court "will hear arguments on its same-sex 'marriage' case this spring."

US Steel Exploring Merger Options. The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (1/7, Mortimer) reports, "U.S. Steel Corp. still is eyeing Middletown, Ohio-based AK Steel Corp., or it could go shopping for a raw materials supplier in Central or Eastern Europe as steel industry consolidation continues, analysts said." The Tribune-Review continues, "Merger mania was resurrected when Nucor Corp., the second-largest U.S. steel producer behind U.S. Steel, last week agreed to acquire Toronto-based Harris Steel Group Inc. for about $1.07 billion." The Tribune-Review adds, "Conjecture over a possible U.S. Steel takeover of AK Steel surfaced in March. 'Last year, their board was looking at AK Steel, and I heard they're still watching it,' said independent analyst Charles Bradford, of Soleil Securities in New York. … Bradford said he understood U.S. Steel may be looking in Central and Eastern Europe, where assets are cheaper. … 'Domestically, they have the iron ore and coke they need. In Central Europe, they don't have any of that. They may also be looking at smaller, government-owned steel companies,' said Bradford, who did not identify potential foreign targets." The Tribune-Review notes, "U.S. Steel operates a plant in Kosice in the Slovak Republic, the largest flat-rolled steel producer in Central Europe. The company operates U.S. Steel Serbia, too. … U.S. Steel CEO John Surma told analysts during a third-quarter conference in November that the company is not ruling out acquisitions. 'We think there still could be opportunities to expand our footprint,' he said. … 'We believe in consolidation, and we continuously evaluate strategic opportunities focusing mostly in North America and Europe. Any acquisition we would make, however, would have to create value for our company and our shareholders. It has to generate a good return on capital, has to be accretive and generate cash,' said Charles L. Rice, spokesman for U.S. Steel."

US Airways CEO Readies For Delta Fight. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/7, Grantham) reports, "Don't mistake the relative quiet of the past two weeks for a sign that US Airways' resolve to buy Delta Air Lines is weakening, says Doug Parker, CEO of US Airways. … 'We believe our offer is more than fair, and as a result, don't intend on ... backing off,' Parker said in a telephone interview last week. 'We certainly don't intend on pulling the offer.'" The AJC continues, "Parker made his carrier's $8 billion-plus offer public on Nov. 15, and Delta — which had already rebuffed his private approaches — fired back with a volley of objections, employee anti-merger rallies and a formal plan to emerge from Chapter 11 on its own. The dust settled during the holidays." The AJC adds, "Parker says he expects things to soon heat up again, pointing out that Delta's creditors recently hired retired Continental Airlines Chief Executive Gordon Bethune to evaluate the rivals' proposals or other potential alternatives for Delta. … Another potential flash point: Delta has asked for a bankruptcy court hearing Feb. 7 to begin pitching its stand-alone plan to creditors. They will ultimately vote on whatever reorganization plan Delta uses. Delta's plan values the company at $12 billion when it comes out of bankruptcy and would pay creditors with stock. US Airways argues its cash-stock offer is better for creditors and that a merger will create a stronger airline."

NRA Members Oppose Bush Over Drilling Expansion, Access Rights. The Washington Post (1/7, A3, Harden, 690K) reports, "After years of close association with the Republican Party and hard-nosed opposition to federal land-use regulation, the National Rifle Association is being pressured by its membership to distance itself from President Bush's energy policies that have opened more public land for oil and gas drilling and limited access to hunters and anglers. 'The Bush administration has placed more emphasis on oil and gas than access rights for hunters,' said Ronald L. Schmeits, second vice president of the NRA. … The new emphasis on the issue of access to public lands, which Schmeits said is at the 'discussion' level among the NRA's directors, would represent a strategic shift for the NRA." However, "during the past six years, an increasing number of the country's 46 million hunters and anglers, including Republican-leaning shooting organizations such as the Boone and Crockett Club, have been grumbling about the Bush's administration fast-tracking of oil and gas drilling leases on public lands." NRA spokesman Andrew Arulanandam "said he agrees with Schmeits that members are voicing increasing concern about access to hunting land and that the NRA is focusing on the problem."

WPost Offers Backhanded Praise For Polar Bear Decision. The Washington Post (1/7, B6, 690K) editorializes, "The Bush administration has done everything in its power to do as little as possible about climate change. Yet the reality of global warming has a way of intruding even on the most willfully heedless of politicians. Not even an administration dead set against mandatory curbs on carbon emissions can deny that the habitat of the polar bear, as Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne put it the other day, 'may literally be melting.' In response, the administration is proposing to list the polar bear as a threatened species under the Endangered Species Act. … The administration proposed the polar bear designation only after environmental groups petitioned for it and then sued to force a decision. Still, when confronted with the need to make a decision, it made the right one -- and thereby set the stage for action down the road."

NYT Reporter Participates In FBI Citizens' Academy. In a story taking a generally positive tone toward the FBI, New York Times (1/7) correspondent Alison Leigh Cowan reported on her participation in the New Haven Field Office's Citizens' Academy. Under the headline "Learning How To Fight America's Most Wanted," Cowen noted, "As part of our weekly training, we shot guns in computerized simulations, subjected ourselves to lie detector tests and met some of the graduates of a 'body farm' in Knoxville, Tenn., where federal agents blow up, bury, submerge and do other unspeakable things to donated corpses to sharpen their crime-solving skills. … One stated objective" of the Citizens' Academy "is to help the bureau improve relationships with the communities it serves. Another is 'to demystify the bureau,' as Kimberly K. Mertz, the special agent in charge of the F.B.I. in Connecticut, explained." Cowan added that "efforts to rein in municipal corruption, white-collar fraud and organized crime have long been the F.B.I.'s stock in trade. But international terrorism has created new pressures, and the bureau's top brass has been deflecting calls for reorganizations that would separate newer intelligence-gathering functions from its historic crime-fighting mission. Our eight weeks…inside the F.B.I. did not provide enough information to resolve these larger questions. But it did give us a feel for some of the 100 or so agents in Connecticut and their boss, Ms. Mertz. An Iowa native, she ran the public corruption unit in Washington from 1999 to 2001 and is now one of eight women running one of the bureau's 56 field offices. … Less than 3 percent of those who apply to be agents make the cut, and her staff was suitably impressive."

Man Sets Fire To California Church. The San Francisco Chronicle (1/7, Sturrock, Writer) reports, "A man set fire to a Richmond church early Friday evening after interrupting a practicing choir." The Chronicle continues, "The man walked into St. Cornelius Parish at 225 28th Street shortly before 8 p.m. and poured a flammable liquid on the altar and a nativity scene and then set it ablaze, according to fire officials and a witness. … A short time later, police arrested Robert Mills, 40, of San Pablo on suspicion of arson." The Chronicle adds, "Seven members of the choir, including a 10-year-old boy, were singing the gospel song 'Jardinero' in Spanish when a man entered the church who seemed to be speaking to himself, then announced, 'Do you want to leave or do you want to stay? Because I'm burning this f— place down,' said choir member Veronica Monroy, 32, of Albany." The Chronicle adds, "He then opened what appeared to be a red can of gasoline and poured it on the altar and Nativity scene, Monroy said, adding that everyone left the church as he did this, except one choir member who stayed back. … Monroy said that man told her the intruder took out a lighter, lit a piece of paper and then threw the flame on the liquid. The choir member tried unsuccessfully to fight the fire with an extinguisher, Monroy said."

Authorities Seek Louisiana Gun Theft Suspect. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/7, Reports) reports, "The Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office on Saturday released the identity of a suspect being sought in Monday's theft of more than 120 guns from a Metairie sporting goods store and announced a $10,000 reward for information leading to his arrest." The Times-Picayune continues, "Jermaine Surtain, 28, who once lived in the 5700 block of Tullis Drive, Algiers, is wanted on a warrant accusing him of burglarizing Puglia's Sporting Goods, 1925 Veterans Memorial Blvd., said Col. John Fortunato, a Sheriff's Office spokesman. … The office is also seeking the public's help in identifying a 'person of interest' who rented a vehicle thought to be used in the break-in, Fortunato said." The Times-Picayune adds, "Authorities think the burglary was committed by four men possibly using a black Dodge Durango. The men made a hole in a wall to get in around 2:30 a.m., then broke display cases and took 115 handguns, several shotguns and two assault rifles. … Authorities identified Surtain as a suspect through the cooperation of the Sheriff's Office, the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, and the West Bank Major Crimes Task Force. The task force is made up of officers from the Sheriff's Office and the Gretna, New Orleans and Westwego police forces."

Seven Killed Saturday By Puerto Rico Gun Violence. The AP (1/6) reports, "Seven people were killed in shootings across Puerto Rico on Saturday, prompting the U.S. territory's top police official to plead for lawmakers to pass tougher gun laws. … At a news conference, police chief Pedro Toledo urged the approval of pending legislation that would make it more difficult for islanders to import weapons from the U.S. mainland. Gunmakers have opposed the restrictions."

IMMIGRATION:

Complaints Against Immigration Attorneys On The Rise. The Washington Post (1/7, C1, Cauvin) reports, "Complaints against immigration lawyers working in and around the nation's capital are rising, say officials who investigate allegations of attorney misconduct." The Post continues, "Last year, the D.C. Office of Bar Counsel received 59 complaints about immigration lawyers, up from 49 in 2005 -- when, for the first time, immigration law drew more complaints than any other specialized practice area. … The bar counsel office is finalizing 2006 totals for other categories, but complaints about immigration law appear likely to rank near the top again." The Post adds, "Such a distinction is no small feat in a city flush with lawyers and no small worry in a region long established as a destination for immigrants, particularly those from Africa and Latin America. … 'There are a lot of unhappy immigrant clients out there, and some of them have very good reason to be unhappy,' said D.C. Deputy Bar Counsel Elizabeth A. Herman, who has handled immigration complaints for more than a decade. … From the simply confused to the unquestionably criminal, bad lawyers have become a concern for the immigration bar and for the nation's immigration tribunals. … Federal sanctions have been rising in recent years. Established in 2000, the bar counsel at the Executive Office for Immigration Review, the Justice Department branch that oversees U.S. immigration courts and the Board of Immigration Appeals, disciplined 47 immigration lawyers last year and 54 the previous year -- up from 22 in 2000."

TAX:

Democrats Remove Supermajority Requirement For Tax Increases. The Washington Times (1/7, Lambro, 88K) reports, "One of the first key procedural votes in the Democrat-controlled House last week established legislative rules that Republicans say will make it easier to raise taxes by a simple majority vote. The straight party-line vote received little attention Thursday. … But Republican leaders and conservative tax-cut advocates said it opened up a huge loophole in a Republican-imposed rule drawn from the Republicans' 1994 Contract with America, which requires a supermajority, or three-fifths vote, to raise taxes. Democrats unanimously voted down a motion offered by" Minority Leader John Boehner "that would have prevented them from waiving the rule, a move that tax-cutters said signaled the Democrats' intention to raise taxes between now and the 2008 elections. 'American taxpayers need to hold on to their wallets because the new House rules concerning taxes are not worth the paper they're written on,'" said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform.

WPost Blames Bush Tax Cuts For Budget Deficit. The Washington Post (1/7, B6, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "So President Bush is promising a balanced federal budget -- three years after he leaves office. That's a worthy goal, and we look forward to seeing, when the budget is released next month, how, exactly, he hopes to achieve it. But we'd be more impressed by the professed commitment to fiscal discipline if it weren't, in large part, Mr. Bush's own policies that made that far-off target look like an achievement. Or, better yet, if we had any confidence, based on performance, that this theoretical balance is based on realistic projections. Or if there were any acknowledgment from Mr. Bush that his sacrosanct tax cuts would have to be adjusted to meet this goal. … It was Mr. Bush's recklessly unaffordable tax cuts and his insistence on maintaining and extending them even as the costs of the war in Iraq escalated that helped drive the deficit."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Gearing Up For Oversight Hearings. The AP (1/7, Kuhnhenn) reports, "In this new era of divided government, the congressional hearing room is where the executive and legislative branches will clash. .. Over the next few weeks, Senate Democrats plan to hold at least 11 hearings just on Iraq. In the House, one of the Democrats' most dogged investigators is waiting to spring his committee on a different mission — suspected government fraud." The AP continues, 'From the war to environmental policy and secret surveillance, the Democrats who now control both the House and Senate are armed with subpoena power and ready to summon panels of witnesses. … These newly empowered Democrats plan to put the Bush administration under scrutiny like never before." The AP adds, "Sen. Patrick Leahy, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, has said he will examine the administration's policies on torture and other human rights issues. His request for data exposed one of the first rifts between the new Congress and the administration when the Justice Department refused to provide the committee with two secret documents that describe CIA detention and interrogation policies for suspected terrorists. … Leahy, D-Vt., stopped short of threatening the use of a subpoena to get the documents. But he told Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that he 'would pursue this matter further' when the committee holds its first oversight hearing."

Administration Lowers Estimated Cost Of Drug Benefit. The New York Times (1/7, A17, Pear, 1.16M) reports the Bush Administration "lowered its estimate of the cost of Medicare's new prescription drug benefit Saturday, saying the price tag had come down about 10 percent in the last six months. Administration officials said they hoped the numbers would undercut support in Congress for a Democratic proposal requiring the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical makers to secure lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries." Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, "said the new numbers showed that such legislation was unnecessary because competition among private plans had effectively held down costs."

Medicare Drug Bill Lacking Formulary Seen As Unlikely To Generate Savings. The New York Times (1/7, A17, Pear, 1.16M) reports, "Democrats want the government to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries, but insist that the government should not decide which drugs are covered. Many economists and health policy experts see this as a paradox. The only way to get big savings and discounts, they say, is to steer patients to certain preferred drugs. The debate on this issue, bubbling for several years, will come to a boil in Congress next week as the House votes on a Democratic proposal to require the secretary of health and human services to negotiate with drug manufacturers on behalf of Medicare beneficiaries. … Each plan would establish its own list of covered drugs, known as a formulary, and the secretary could not 'establish or require a particular formulary'." AARP CEO William D. Novelli "said that Medicare drug plans 'currently have little choice but to accept the high prices set by manufacturers' for brand-name drugs if no competing products are available."

"Doughnut Hole" Fix Said To Require Tax Increase Or Spending Cuts. The Washington Post (1/7, A8, Lee, 690K) reports, "Democrats face a difficult time delivering on their pledge to eliminate the 'doughnut hole' in Medicare's drug benefit, despite having used the unpopular coverage gap as a rhetorical club against Republicans in regaining control of Congress in the fall elections. Requiring Medicare to negotiate lower drug prices from pharmaceutical companies…will not produce enough savings to fill the doughnut hole, experts say. And making up the difference would require big tax increases or spending cuts elsewhere if Democrats are to keep another campaign promise, to be fiscally responsible and avoid increasing the federal budget deficit." Sen. Charles Grassley is quoted as saying, "I think the Democrats are going to shy away from it because it's very costly."

Democratic Chairs Already Breaking With Leadership On Key Issues. The New York Times (1/7, A1, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "Less than 24 hours after taking over as speaker, Representative Nancy Pelosi summoned the new chairmen of five committees with responsibility for various aspects of Iraq policy to her office to review and coordinate plans for hearings and inquiries. The gathering on Friday would have been unthinkable when Democrats last controlled the House" when "all-powerful Democratic chairmen ruled their committees with impunity." However, according to the Times, "Already there are signs of discord." Sen. Max Baucus of Montana, the Finance Committee chairman "who has been a headache for past Democratic leaders, says he will plunge ahead with hearings next week on giving the government power to negotiate Medicare drug prices with pharmaceutical companies — a top Democratic priority he has opposed and one the House plans to speed through with no new scrutiny." Sen. Joseph Lieberman, chairman of the Homeland Security committee, "is making his colleagues nervous as they consider his differences with many of them over the war and antiterror issues." Rep. Charles Rangel, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, "suggested Friday that he might revisit new Democratic rules forcing lawmakers to disclose their sponsorship of tax breaks for small enterprises." Rep. John Dingell, chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, is contemplating "imposing tougher mileage standards on automakers."

Pelosi Encouraged To Pursue Bipartisanship. The New York Times (1/7, WK13, 1.16M) editorializes, "The House's new Democratic majority is mounting a legislative blitzkrieg meant to leave the displaced Republicans gasping in the dust. … But what is sorely lacking is the oft-invoked, more often abused ideal of bipartisanship — despite the Democrats' campaign pledge to end the practice of relegating minority lawmakers to the legislative wilderness." Speaker Pelosi "promises bipartisanship will be in evidence after the Democrats get past their opening agenda. … If Democratic candidates were smart enough during the campaign to realize that the voters demand bipartisanship, they should be quick enough to try it from the start.

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (1/7, B1, 690K) former Rep. Vic Fazio writes, "Pelosi has sought to engender some bipartisan goodwill by authorizing severance pay for newly unemployed Republican staff members. Likewise, she has sought to preserve continuity by retaining existing staff in the parliamentarian's office and other administrative positions, including the sergeant-at-arms, the clerk of the House and the House historian. In 1994, when Newt Gingrich became speaker, the leadership fired everyone except the parliamentarian. In contrast to that off-with-their-heads attitude, Pelosi has more respect for the administrative framework of the House. Perhaps most important, she reached out to" Minority Leader John Boehner "on transition issues, such as the schedule, oversight on intelligence and fixing the Congressional page program."

LATimes Presses For Expanded Ethics Reform. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, 850K) reports, "The House essentially enacted the wish list of advocates of reform (including us), burnishing Pelosi's promise to preside over 'the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history.' … More remains to be done. Reformers inside and outside Congress must continue to press for the creation of a new ethics watchdog in each chamber. House Democrats say they will take up that initiative in the coming weeks, and Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who now chairs the Rules Committee, has indicated that she would hold hearings on the idea."

More Commentary On Pelosi. San Francisco Chronicle (1/7, A6, 384K) columnist Leah Garchik writes Rep. Mary Bono "said that female camaraderie is essentially different from the male variety. Despite political differences, 'Women are more quick to share their personal side, to support each other,' said Bono, who has known Pelosi since the early 1990s" but "she is left with a conundrum: 'I want her to be successful as a woman in power, but politically, as a Republican, I am on the other side. But I hope when she needs a friend on this side of the aisle, I'll be one of the first she will call.'"

In his Washington Post (1/7, B7, 690K) column, David Broder writes, "It was, superficially, pure coincidence that Nancy Pelosi and Deval Patrick took their precedent-setting oaths of office at almost the same hour on Thursday. … Impressive as their individual resumes are, what's more significant is what their elevation signals: a growing sense of inclusiveness and opportunity in this society.

Laboratories Face "Crisis" Due To Federal Funding Shortfall. The New York Times (1/7, A19, Broad, 1.16M) reports, "The failure of Congress to pass new budgets for the current fiscal year has produced a crisis in science financing that threatens to close major facilities, delay new projects and leave thousands of government scientists out of work, federal and private officials say. … Factoring in inflation, the budgets translate into reductions of about 3 percent to 4 percent for most fields of science and engineering." According to the Times, "Democrats and Republicans alike say that operating under current budgets, in some cases with less money, can strap federal agencies and lead to major disruptions in service. Scientists say that is especially true for the physical sciences, which include physics, chemistry and astronomy." Among the projects at risk" are the Relativistic Heavy Ion Collider at the Brookhaven National Laboratory in New York and the Fermi National Accelerator Laboratory in Illinois.

US Selecting Hybrid Warhead Design. The New York Times (1/7, Broad, Sanger, Shanker, 1.16M) reports, "The Bush administration is expected to announce next week a major step forward in the building of the country's first new nuclear warhead in nearly two decades. It will propose combining elements of competing designs from two weapons laboratories in an approach that some experts argue is untested and risky." The new warhead would "would require a huge refurbishment of the nation's complex for nuclear design and manufacturing, with the overall bill estimated at more than $100 billion." The decision to pursue a hybrid "could delay the weapon's production. It also raises the question of whether the United States will ultimately be forced to end its moratorium on underground nuclear testing to make sure the new design works." Democrats and other critics say that "at a time when the administration is trying to convince the world to put sanctions on North Korea and Iran to halt their nuclear programs…any move to improve the American arsenal will be seen as hypocritical." Defenders "argue that because the United States provides a nuclear umbrella for so many allies, it is critical that its stockpile be as reliable as possible."

SCOTUS Will Hear Fewest Cases In Modern History This Term. The Washington Post (1/7, A4, Barnes, 690K) reports, "After decades of decline in its caseload, the court is once again on track to take its fewest number of cases in modern history. The justices went on a relative shopping spree when they returned from their holiday break, on Friday, agreeing to hear seven additional cases before this year's term ends. Before that they had accepted only 60 petitions, as opposed to 80 at this point last year. Even a caseload in the 80s would have been considered extraordinarily skimpy 20 years ago. In William H. Rehnquist's first term as chief justice in 1986, the court disposed of 175 cases. … Roberts himself said during his 2005 confirmation hearings that the court should be doing more."

LATimes Endorses Pay Raise For Federal Judges. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, 850K) editorializes, "federal judges have been ill-treated by a 1989 law that links their cost-of-living raises to those of members of Congress. Fearful of being criticized for raising their own salaries, members of Congress voted not to accept several pay raises in the 1990s — meaning that the judges also went without raises. That connection would be broken under legislation that would also include a 'catch-up' raise for judges."

Rich Calls Bush Presidency An "Inversion" Of Ford's. In his New York Times (1/7, WK14, 1.16M) column, Frank Rich writes that although "it's a safe bet" that President Gerald Ford's funeral "attracted far fewer viewers than the most consequential death video of the New Year's weekend, the lynching of Saddam Hussein;" Ford's funeral "obsequies were…the Beltway establishment's grim verdict on George W. Bush and his war in Iraq. Every Ford attribute, big and small, was trotted out by Washington eulogists with a wink, as an implicit rebuke of the White House's current occupant." Rich asserts that "under the guise of not speaking ill of a dead president, the bevy of bloviators so relentlessly trashed the living incumbent that it bordered on farce." Rich says Ford's "presidential history is hard to separate from the Bush inversion of it, so it is difficult to separate that indelible melee in Saigon" in the spring of 1975 "from the Hussein video. Both are terrifying, and for the same reason;" offering "further confirmation…that our principal achievement in Iraq over four years has been to empower a jihadist mini-Saddam in place of the secular original."

OTHER NEWS:

Experts Predict Mixed Economic News For 2007. The Washington Post (1/7, F1, Henderson, 690K) writes that according to the "annual blizzard of forecasts last month" from economic experts, 2007 "will be a tough one for anybody looking for jobs or profits in home building, but it holds out modest promise for most other American workers, consumers and investors. The housing market stays in the dumps. Unemployment edges up a bit, but stays relatively low. Inflation ebbs, interest rates remain moderate and stock prices climb, though not as exuberantly as in recent years." The Washington Post (1/7, F4, 690K) also says many economists "think the dollar will slip a bit lower this year."

The New York Times (1/7, BU5, De Aenlle, 1.16M) writes that the "flow of earnings reports will pick up this week, but the earnings themselves are expected to show a dip in growth from past quarters." Standard & Poor's "estimates that earnings for companies in its 500-stock index rose by 9 percent, year over year, in the fourth quarter. That would be a healthy gain, but also the worst one in nearly five years." As for the housing market, the New York Times (1/7, BU4, Gross, 1.16M) says "those who think that the worst may be over…should take another look at the data, economists say. For the figures on new-home sales have a strange wrinkle that, in the current environment, may lead the government to overstate sales (and to understate inventory) by up to 20 percent. 'The market is weaker than the data say,' said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's/Economy.com."

The New York Times (1/7, BU9, Sommer, 1.16M) adds that 2007 "got off to an uneven start on Wall Street last week," with the Dow Jones and S&P 500 "both dropping modestly" and the Nasdaq making "a small gain."

Gore Still Keeping Options Open On Presidential Run. The Washington Post (1/7, A2, Cillizza, Murray, 690K) examines whether Al Gore may still decide to enter the 2008 presidential race, writing that "over the past six years, Gore has become a heroic figure for the party's liberal left, thanks in large part to his early and steady opposition to the war in Iraq." But is the former vice president "ready to enter the ring one more time? Don't count on it, say his closest advisers. 'There are no secret meetings going on to plan the Gore campaign,' said Carter Eskew, a longtime confidant of the former vice president." Still, "neither Eskew nor any of the small cadre of Gore's closest advisers would entirely rule out such a bid," and there are "small signs here and there that could be read as the stirrings of his renewed interest in a campaign. Early last month, Gore addressed more than three dozen labor leaders in Washington, a wide-ranging talk about the Democratic congressional gains and the media, said one attendee, who demanded anonymity. Asked about 2008, Gore said that he has taken a number of calls from people encouraging him to consider running but he 'didn't know whether he was going to or not,' the source said. 'Everybody felt he left a small door open.'"

Rangel Encouraging Obama To Run For President. The New York Times (1/7, A22, Rivera, 1.16M) asks, "Are Charles B. Rangel's loyalties mixed?" The "longtime Harlem congressman" has "let it be known he encouraged Barack Obama to run for president, which could complicate the presidential ambitions of Mr. Rangel's fellow New York Democrat, Hillary Rodham Clinton." Rangel said, "I told him if he didn't run, he'd regret it, and that he's a young man and he ought to test the waters." But he said he "also told Mr. Obama that he was following Mrs. Clinton's moves 'and that as dean of the New York delegation, I had obligations, and he would have to understand that.'" Asked if that meant he would support Clinton, Rangel "said it was too early to say."

GOP Presidential Hopefuls Hiring Schwarzenegger Campaign Operatives. The Washington Post (1/7, A2, 690K) writes that with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's victory in California "one of the few bright spots for the GOP in November," it is "not surprising that Republican presidential aspirants are raiding his team." Sen. John McCain "has turned his presidential exploratory committee into Arnold East, hiring not only campaign manager Steve Schmidt as a senior adviser but also Schmidt's deputy, Reed Galen, to serve as a deputy campaign manager and even Schmidt's assistant, Jake Suski, to be assistant to campaign manager-in-waiting Terry Nelson. Robert Terra, who ran the Schwarzenegger war room, will do the same for McCain. Matt David, who served as director of response on the Schwarzenegger reelection drive will be the -- you guessed it! -- director of response for McCain." But McCain "didn't get them all. Katie Levinson, Schwarzenegger's communications director, will oversee construction of Rudy Giuliani's communications operation. Schwarzenegger deputy political director Josh Ginsberg has inked a deal with Mitt Romney."

Giuliani Presidential Bid Would Have Major Impact On His Consultancy. The New York Times (1/7, A21, Healy, Buettner, 1.16M) writes about the impact a Rudy Giuliani presidential big would have on his consulting firm Giuliani Partners. As Giuliani "contemplates that bid for the presidency, the firm -- about which little has been publicly known -- says it is dependably profitable and attractively positioned. But, at the same time, its aspirations have been modestly realized: a collection of boutiques more than an empire, and one whose long-term survival if Mr. Giuliani departs is very much a matter of debate both in-house and out."

White House Hopefuls Hit "Virtual Campaign Trail." On its front page, the Washington Times (1/7, Bellantoni, 88K) looks at the presidential campaign on the blogs and on MySpace. Aspirants "are turning to the virtual campaign trail. Dedicated political junkies are setting up their own sites devoted to encouraging presidential runs from their favorite candidates -- former Vice President Al Gore, Sen. John McCain and the two Democratic superstars currently topping polls," Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama. Some of the "candidate MySpace pages are official, such as the sites run by" John Edwards and Tom Vilsack. … Others, such as the nearly 100 sites created in Mrs. Clinton's name, are run by anonymous Web surfers. If popularity were gauged by MySpace," Wesley Clark "is winning with more than 45,000 friends."

"Alpha Male Democrats" Return To Capitol Hill. The New York Times (1/7, WK1, Lizza, 1.16M) examines "the return of the Alpha Male Democrat. The members of this new faction, which helped the Democrats expand into majority status, stand out not for their ideology or racial background but for their carefully cultivated masculinity." The "Macho Dems" include Rep. Rahm Emanuel, who "is missing half of one finger…and swears enough to make a Soprano blush," as well as "aggressive and demanding" Sen. Charles Schumer, new senators Jon Tester and Jim Webb, and new congressmen Brad Ellsworth and Heath Shuler.

Jeb Bush Leaves Considerable Legacy In Florida. The Washington Post (1/7, A4, Kleindienst, 690K) examines Jeb Bush's departure from office in Florida. Over his two terms, "Bush sent shivers through Florida's status quo as he gathered more power than any previous governor and reshaped state government to fit his vision. Nicknamed 'King Jeb,' the Republican transformed what he saw as a tangle of red tape and squanderer of public money into a smaller, business-friendly administration needing fewer tax dollars to run." He "leaves a legacy of a leader adamant about doing things his way, who fearlessly championed such controversial causes as school vouchers, faith-based prisons and prolonging the life of Terri Schiavo." But "while his tenure coincided with a sizzling economy and an overflowing treasury, Bush's back-to-back terms were marred by frequent ethics scandals, official bungling and the inability of the government he downsized to meet growing demands for state services, including education and aid for the infirm and the elderly."

Incoming Maryland First Lady Hopes To Keep Judgeship. The Washington Post (1/7, C12, Wagner, 690K) reports, "Maryland's soon-to-be first lady, Catherine Curran O'Malley, is sticking with her plan to stay on the bench once her husband is sworn in as governor." But the Baltimore district court judge's "desire to keep her job has been complicated by a residency requirement and other family considerations regarding an anticipated move to Annapolis." On Friday, a lawyer for Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley wrote to the District Court of Maryland's chief judge "citing case law that suggests a temporary move to Annapolis would not preclude Katie O'Malley from maintaining her 'domicile' in Baltimore, provided she intends to return there at the end of her husband's term."

Writers Consider Senate Race Outcomes In Four Key States. In the New York Times (1/7, WK15, 1.16M), four novelists consider the aftermath of last fall's closely contested Senate races in their states. Charles Baxter writes that in Minnesota, "we have a new senator, Amy Klobuchar. But we're still talking about the aftermath of the midterm elections." Baxter says President Bush "hit the trifecta…Iraq, corruption and incompetence." Deirdre McNamer compares new Montana Sen. Hon Tester to Sen. Jefferson Smith of "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington," writing, "During Senator Smith's excited sightseeing…I thought about" Tester, "gazing up at the Capitol dome for the first time, shortly after the general election. 'It hasn't soaked in yet,' he told reporters. 'Maybe it will never soak in.'" Dan

Chaon says, "As Democrats in Ohio, victory is a sensation we've been unfamiliar with for quite some time, and I have to admit that it makes me a little suspicious. … It's not easy to be jubilant given the state of affairs in Ohio, or in the country, or in the world." And from Tennessee, Robert Hicks writes that while he did not vote for Sen. Bob Corker, "I think that if he proves true to his own past he will do well. That is, he'll be a centrist Republican, guided by his own common sense and maybe a bit by the example of Tennessee's moderate senior senator, Lamar Alexander, rather than by the right-wing rhetoric that has become de rigueur in so much of the South."

Veterans Flock To Alaska. The Washington Post/AP (1/7, A5, Lee) reports that nearly 70,000 veterans "have chosen to make their home in Alaska, which, according to the Census Bureau, has the country's highest concentration of former military personnel. The high number reflects, in part, that veterans tend to cluster near military bases. Alaska's two biggest cities, Anchorage and Fairbanks, have one Army and one Air Force base apiece. ... Many veterans, as with many non-military residents, are drawn by the untrammeled wilderness, the world-class hunting and fishing, and secure jobs with good pay. Moreover, the libertarian frontier spirit and the extreme solitude in this sparsely settled state of 650,000 have a certain appeal to veterans who led highly regimented professional lives or saw too much of the horrors of war."

Chait Accuses Conservatives Of Hypocrisy For Criticizing Liberal "Anger." In his Los Angeles Times (1/7, 850K) column, Jonathan Chait writes, "In the 1990s, prominent conservatives suggested that President Clinton was a murderer, a conservative senator warned that the president might be shot if he visited that senator's state, and a Republican majority leader told Democrats, 'Your president is just not that important to us.' And there were many other nasty episodes. But ever since a Republican has held the White House, certain conservatives have decided that political anger is now the main problem of American life and that it resides primarily on the left. … Some would suggest that the right's newfound obsession with tone is not only hypocritical but an attempt to stifle criticism through arbitrary criteria, much like campus PC-niks."

Saudi, French Foreign Ministers Ask Tehran To Halt Uranium Enrichment. The AP (1/6) reports France and Saudi Arabia "called Saturday on Iran to accept international demands to halt uranium enrichment, saying the Mideast should be free of weapons of mass destruction." In Riyadh, French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy and Prince Saud al-Faisal "stressed diplomacy must be the way to solve Iran's ongoing standoff with the West over its nuclear program." The later is quoted saying, "We agreed on the necessity that the region should be void of weapons of mass destruction and that achieving this target will be by dialogue and diplomacy. Israel should not be excluded from the international efforts and procedures."

US-Iranian Relations Examined. ABC World News (1/6, story 5, Sciutto, 8.78M) took "'A Closer Look' tonight at the troubled relationship between the United States and Iran. Just two weeks ago, the UN imposed sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program. Since then, Iran has only grown more defiant and its unrelenting response fits with what we found on a recent trip there, where Iranians from all walks of life expressed pride in their nation's growing power. The anti-American slogans are still visible in Iran's capital. But visit Iran today and one of the first things you notice is that the attitude toward the great Satan is far from uniform. Students and teachers I met at this school in Tehran, like Americans, maybe not our government, but they like us and admire our country."

US Said To Seek End To Oil Industry's Financing. In a front-page story entitled, "U.S. Puts Squeeze On Iran's Oil Fields," the Los Angeles Times (1/7, Murphy, 850K) reports, "As Washington wages a very public battle against Iran's quest for nuclear power, it is quietly gaining ground on another energy front: the oil fields that are the Islamic Republic's lifeblood." The Times says the Administration's "campaign to dry up financing for oil and natural gas development poses a threat to the republic's ability to continue exporting oil," and "comes at a moment of unique vulnerability for Iran's oil industry, which also faces challenges from rising domestic energy consumption, international isolation, a populist spending spree by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and trouble closing contracts with foreign oil companies." However, Iranian authorities say they "recognized the gravity of the threat and launched steps to head it off, including new 'smart' rationing cards, scheduled for distribution in March to check skyrocketing sales of cheap gasoline, and an overhaul of Iran's historically stingy contract terms in an attempt to lure big oil companies into skirting the U.S. roadblocks."

Israel Said To Plan Nuclear Strike Against Enrichment Site. The Times of London (1/7, Mahnaimi, Baxter) reports Israel "has drawn up secret plans to destroy Iran's uranium enrichment facilities with tactical nuclear weapons. Two Israeli air force squadrons are training to blow up an Iranian facility using low-yield nuclear 'bunker-busters,' according to several Israeli military sources." The Times said the strike concept has "been prompted in part by the Israeli intelligence service Mossad's assessment that Iran is on the verge of producing enough enriched uranium to make nuclear weapons within two years," and that "conventional strikes may no longer be enough to annihilate increasingly well-defended enrichment facilities." The Times adds, "Some analysts warned that Iranian retaliation for such a strike could range from disruption of oil supplies to the West to terrorist attacks against Jewish targets around the world."

Hamas Ignores Abbas Demand To Disband Militia. The AP (1/7, Barzak) reports the leadership of Hamas "defied President Mahmoud Abbas' decree Saturday that its paramilitary unit is illegal, saying it will fight any attempt to disband the force in an increasingly bloody faceoff between the Islamic militant group and Abbas' Fatah party." Noting that "factional fighting" is "threatening to plunge the Palestinian territories into civil war," the AP says Abbas "outlawed the Executive Force on Saturday, two days after Hamas gunmen stormed the home of a top pro-Fatah security commander and killed him and seven bodyguards." Abbas later "confirmed the U.S. was sending aid to boost Palestinian security forces loyal to him," and said that "he spoke to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on the current situation ahead of her upcoming visit." Notably, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak "called on the Palestinians to halt their fighting." The Washington Times (1/7, 88K) runs the AP story on its front page.

The New York Times (1/7, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports Abbas "demanded Saturday that Hamas-run paramilitary police be integrated into Fatah-dominated security forces." Hamas "warned" Abbas "that he was making a mistake and that it would resist any effort to disband the" Executive Force. The Times says it "is not clear whether Mr. Abbas's statement is simply declaratory or whether he would order his security forces to take action against the paramilitary group if Hamas did not meet his demands."

The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Boudreaux, Abukhater, 850K) says Abbas "outlawed the Hamas-led Interior Ministry's police force, the most powerful armed unit outside his control in factional fighting that has left 33 people dead in the last month. The ministry responded with defiance." Yesterday's rhetoric "raised the prospect of an intensified armed standoff."

Carter's Palestine Book Called Distorted, One-Sided. The New York Times Book Review (1/7, Bronner) describes President Jimmy Carter's "Palestine: Peace, Not Apartheid," as "a strange little book about the Arab-Israeli conflict from a major public figure." Carter "does not" provide both the Israeli and Palestinian perspectives, but "simply offers a narrative that is largely unsympathetic to Israel." Carter's "contribution is to offer a distortion of his own." His "misrepresentations" are "a shame because most of what Carter focuses on is well worth reading about."

"Malfunctioning" Israeli Government Said To Lose Public's Confidence. In an analysis piece, the New York Times (1/7, Erlanger, 1.16M) notes, "Two of Israel's most important relationships in the world are with the United States and Egypt. In the past 10 days, the Israeli government of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has managed to embarrass both of them." Citing the approval of new settlement in the Jordan Valley and the failed Ramallah raid, the Times says "neither incident was of fundamental importance, and neither, it seems, was intended to create the ensuing ruckus. And neither action, Mr. Olmert's aides insisted, had been approved by the prime minister." However, taken "together, Israeli politicians and analysts suggest, the moves reflect a malfunctioning Israeli government, deeply split over personalities, politics and policies. It has lost the confidence of most Israelis, according to the opinion polls, which makes Israeli leaders even less likely to take bold political steps domestically or internationally." Noting that Olmert and Defense Minister Peretz "and their staffs barely speak to one another," the Times says both men's political parties are hampered by "bitter rivalries."

Somali Disarmament Plan Sparks Rioting. The New York Times (1/7, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports, "Hundreds of Somalis stormed Saturday into the streets of Mogadishu…to hurl rocks at Ethiopian troops allied with the government and to protest a disarmament program that Somali leaders ended up scrapping." Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi's "transitional government appears to have failed its first leadership test: disarmament. After 16 years of anarchy, the streets of Mogadishu are awash with military-grade weaponry," and collecting "these guns was one of [Gedi's] first goals." He had "demanded that all Somalis surrender their weapons in three days," but "even former military officers disagreed with Mr. Gedi's approach, saying it would take months, not days, to disarm the populace and that the government should negotiate with militiamen and clan elders."

The Washington Post (1/7, A16, McCrummen, 690K) adds, "Hundreds of angry and fed-up Somalis demanded that Ethiopian troops leave the city Saturday, smashing cars, burning tires, and hurling stones and threats as a prevailing sense of insecurity deepened in the patched-together neighborhoods of" the capital. "A volatile mix of grievances fueled the clashes between demonstrators and Ethiopian troops, leaving at least two people dead." While Gedi "scrambles to establish ministries, police and other services from scratch, the city is reverting to its old forms of self-governance." The AP (1/6) adds Gedi's government "indefinitely postponed plans to forcibly disarm Mogadishu, as hundreds of people burned tires, looted vehicles and said they wouldn't give up their guns. Two people were reported killed and at least 17 people were wounded."

Under the headline, "Ethiopia's Intervention May Destabilize Region," the Los Angeles Times (1/7, Sanders, 850K) notes, "By launching a war against Somalia's Islamists, Ethiopia says it was drawing a line in the sand against religious extremism in East Africa. But without quick diplomacy and international aid, analysts caution that the war could radicalize the region's traditionally moderate Muslims." Reporting that "signs of a budding insurgency already are emerging in Mogadishu," the Times adds many Somalis "believe the U.S. encouraged Ethiopia to lead the assault last month to put an African face on the war." The Times reports one analysis that, "if Somalia's problems bleed across its borders, the ripple effects could include a destabilization of Ethiopia's Muslim community and reduced tourism for Kenya. … Analysts say U.S. policymakers now have a short window of time to bring change."

Al Qaeda Operatives Sought In Somalia. CNN (1/6, Starr) reported, "An urgent manhunt is underway in East Africa to capture five top al Qaeda operatives on the run from Somalia since the fall of the Islamic militia government. … US and African intelligence services are closely cooperating in an effort to find the men before they slip away, with fear that they might plan new attacks. The US especially wants two men said to be involved in the 1998 bombing of the US embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. Authorities believe all five have ties to al Qaeda attacks across East Africa. Escape routes from Somalia are being sealed off. US intelligence sources believe the men may have been at a known al Qaeda training camp on the Somali-Kenyan border. Two US Navy warships are now patrolling offshore, stopping and searching small boats. Kenya has sealed its northern border with Somalia. US Navy SEALS have been just south of the border, helping train Kenyan forces. … The top US diplomat for Africa has been trying to muster an African peacekeeping force to help Somalia's new transitional federal government. Hunting al Qaeda is a priority." Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Jendayi Frazer: "We believe that it's extremely important and we feel that the cooperation between the neighboring countries, with the transitional federal government at the request of the transitional federal government, is quite helpful in trying to prevent those terrorists from fleeing Somali territory into their neighbors." CNN (Starr): "All of this comes as Ayman al-Zawahiri, Osama bin Laden's deputy, has called for an Iraq style insurgency inside Somalia."

Richardson Departs For Three-Day Sudan Trip. Under the headline, "Richardson Heads To Sudan With Three Goals," the AP (1/7, Pickler) notes Gov. Bill Richardson said he hopes to persuade President Omar al-Bashir "to accept more U.N. peacekeepers in war-ravaged Darfur, a goal that has eluded world leaders." He told the AP that "he has three goals for his visit to the African nation: increasing the U.N. force in Darfur, improving the humanitarian situation and helping encourage a cease-fire." The AP adds that special envoy Andrew Natsios, who met Bashir last month, "has not responded to a request for comment about Richardson's trip."

Two Sri Lanka Bombings Kill 17, Wound 90. The New York Times (1/7, A4, Senanayake, 1.16M) reports, "A powerful bomb blew up a passenger bus on Saturday, killing 11 people and wounding more than 40 others on the southern coast of Sri Lanka." The Times notes that "was the second in less than 24 hours. The authorities are investigating the first blast, which killed six people and wounded 50 on Friday northeast of the capital, Colombo. A government statement blamed the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam for the explosions." The Tigers "had no immediate comment."

Bangladeshi Politics Dominated By Female Leaders' "Feud." Under the headline, "The Personal Politics Of Bangladesh," the Washington Post/AP (1/7, A14, Rosenberg) details the "ferocious" rivalry between Bangladeshi leaders Khaleda Zia and Sheikh Hasina. "It's the stuff of political slapstick, except that this feud is rooted in the assassination of one woman's father and the other's husband, and the result today is anything but funny." Some "Bangladeshis … will say the rivalry is the cause of all the country's problems of poverty and corruption." The AP says "their rivalry has done nothing to improve things. Bangladesh is deeply corrupt and, in many parts, barely governed, raising concerns about instability in this strategic Muslim country already contending with Islamic militancy." Asking why alternative leadership has not emerged, the Post reports, "Analysts blame social conservatism -- a reluctance of the poor and illiterate to question those perceived as their betters -- and thuggish political tactics to ensure that people who do not support either party nonetheless turn out to vote for one of them."

India's Slow Response To Killings Said To Highlight Justice System's Dichotomy. A lengthy New York Times (1/7, A8, Gentleman, 1.16M) piece highlights the Indian police's response to killings in the New Delhi neighborhood of Noida. "What seems clearly a case of serial killing on the fringes of the capital has become a national scandal, with public horror at the brutal details interwoven with outrage at the police department's failure to investigate." While the fact "that India has a two-tier justice system is nothing new," the Times says "the case of the dead and missing slum children has provided a brutally stark example of how the law does not work for the marginalized, shocking even the most jaundiced observers of the nation's legal processes." The Times continues, "The sluggish police response to the disappearance of dozens of children has horrified the nation as much as the crime itself."

Elimination Of Mexican Poultry Tariffs Could Transform Economic Decisions. A 2,400-word piece on the front page of the Washington Post (1/7, Goodman, 690K) describes how "life in the central Mexican state of Jalisco is about to be shaken by globalization. Already much of Mexico's farm country has been overwhelmed by an influx of crops from the United States in the years following the North American Free Trade Agreement. Over the next two years, the final provisions of the trade pact kick in, opening Mexico to unlimited imports of poultry from its northern neighbor. Mexican farms will compete directly with an American agribusiness nurtured by subsidies on the corn that feeds the birds." The Post says NAFTA "was supposed to work the other way around," creating "enough development in Mexico to create millions of jobs, raise wages and diminish the lure of the north."

Mexico's Calderon Said To Make Organized Crime His First Target. A lengthy New York Times (1/7, A6, McKinley, 1.16M) piece notes Mexican President Felipe Calderón "has made it clear his first priority is to turn his government into the scourge of organized crime." He "has sent thousands of federal police and troops into the drug-plagued states of Michoacán and Baja California to break up criminal organizations and stop the brutal violence they perpetuate." However, the Times adds, "some opposition politicians and experts on the drug trade wonder if the federal interventions are not more flash than substance, and question if they will have a lasting impact on the drug trade and police corruption, whose roots run deep." Calderon ordered a "crackdown" in Tijuana, which was "welcomed" by most residents "even as some expressed skepticism the caravan-style patrols and roadblocks would do much to hurt drug traffickers."

Ambassador's "Genocide" Comments Could Delay Successor's Nomination. The Los Angeles Times (1/7, Reynolds, 850K) notes that two years ago, Ambassador John Evans "did something no U.S. ambassador to Armenia before him had done: He used the word 'genocide' -- in public -- to describe the deaths of about 1.2 million Armenians at the hands of Ottoman Turks." While "Evans' use of the word did not signal a change in" US policy, "it did set off a slow-boiling controversy that eventually cost him his job." Today, "a clash between the Democratic-controlled Congress and the Republican White House" has "has stalled the confirmation of Evans' successor and strained U.S. relations with Turkey, a key U.S. ally in the Middle East." The Times explains, "Though Armenian Americans and others consider Evans' statement an act of courage for which he has been unfairly punished, policymakers call it a misjudgment that could fuel anti-Western sentiment in Turkey." State Department "officials believe that Turks will come to their own acceptance of the term from internal debate," and the Times says the State Department "made clear its displeasure" with Evans' remarks.

Warsaw Archbishop Resigns Over Collaboration Allegations. The AP (1/7) reports Warsaw Archbishop Stanislaw Wielgus "resigned amid a scandal about his cooperation with the communist-era secret police, Poland's Roman Catholic Church said Sunday." The AP says "a furor had grown around Wielgus" during his week in office "since the allegations were first raised Dec. 20 by a Polish weekly, with demands that he step down from his post." The "scandal gained intensity after church officials said Friday that documents at a historical institute indicated Wielgus had willingly collaborated. Newspapers Friday devoted their front pages to the revelations, even as Wielgus took canonical vows as required by church law ahead of his installation."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Poisoning Of Ex-Agent Sets Off Alarm Bells (WP)

By Peter Finn, Washington Post Foreign Service
The Washington Post, January 7, 2007
Nuclear Regulators Fear Wider Attempt

MOSCOW -- Ninety-seven percent of the legal production of one of the world's rarest industrial products -- the intensely radioactive isotope polonium-210 -- takes place at a closely guarded nuclear reactor near the Volga River 450 miles southeast of Moscow.

In an average year, about three ounces of the substance is made at the Avangard facility, a former nuclear weapons plant, then sold under strict controls to Russian and foreign companies that prize it for its abilities to reduce static electricity.

This fall, a microscopic quantity of polonium-210, from somewhere, found its way into the body of Alexander Litvinenko, a former Russian internal security agent living in London. He died an agonizing death in a hospital 22 days later.

Now an international investigation is trying to track that dose back to its source. Detectives from Scotland Yard have said nothing about where the trail of evidence may be leading; Russian officials have been more willing to talk, saying that Avangard is tightly audited and that illicit production of polonium-210 is technically possible at many of the world's reactors.

Still, Russia's near total domination of the world's legal trade in the substance has focused new international attention on the country's production system and controls. In addition, Litvinenko's death has created new concern among regulators that the substance might be used as an instrument of murder by terrorists.

Russia is the main source of polonium in part because it offers high quality and the best price for commercial users, according to Nick Priest, professor of radiation toxicology at Middlesex University and a former head of biomedical research at the Atomic Energy Authority in Britain. No polonium is produced in Britain, and officials in Russia said none has been exported commercially to Britain for at least five years.

Polonium-210 is produced in reactors by irradiating bismuth-209, an isotope of the element bismuth. The resulting substance is so radioactive that it has a half-life of only 138 days, meaning that half the atoms in a given quantity will disintegrate in that period.

Specialists say that around the world, reactors capable of this operation belong either to state agencies or universities and so are highly regulated. "Everything connected with polonium production and application is controlled by governments," said Boris Zhuikov, head of the radioisotope laboratory in the Nuclear Studies Institute of the Russian Academy of Sciences, in an interview. "You cannot just put any target inside a reactor. It is regulated and checked by many, many people. It would be discovered."

The Avangard plant operates under close Russian government scrutiny. Officials said four Russian organizations are licensed to handle the material made there: the chemistry faculty of Moscow State University; the Federal Nuclear Center in Samara, also on the Volga; Techsnabexport, the state-controlled uranium supplier; and one private company, Nuclon, which uses it for medical devices and transports isotopes to customers.

The controls have proved effective, Russian officials contend. "I can say with complete certainty that no deviations from the rules of storage and transportation of nuclear materials, including polonium, have been discovered at any structures of our fuel and nuclear complex," said Konstantin Pulikovsky, head of the Federal Service for the Oversight of the Environment, Technology and Nuclear Management, according to the Russian news agency RIA-Novosti.

Worldwide, polonium has been lost or stolen in at least 15 known incidents before 2006, most of them in the United States, according to the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog based in Vienna.

Priest said he believed that in Russia, audit safeguards could be circumvented if there was demand for polonium from officials with strong influence. Audits could also be an unreliable gauge of pilfering because during production, much more polonium is made than is actually needed, with the surplus never entering the officially recognized supply.

"When they do these runs, they produce a large amount because it's got a 138-day half-life and they don't want to be making it all the time. It's not possible to maintain complete control by measurement at the source," Priest said.

Other theories suggest that the polonium that killed Litvinenko might have been obtained from an officially tracked commercial supply after it reached its final customer.

Polonium is commonly used in static eliminators in printing plants, photography labs and textile mills. In these applications, it is bound in extremely small quantities with other metals.

Extracting the substance from the molds in which these mixtures are made would be difficult because "polonium science is quite complicated," Priest said.

But with qualified scientists and the right lab conditions, it is possible. "I can see how they could be used to brew up a dose to kill one person," said Peter D. Zimmerman, a nuclear physicist and professor of science and security at King's College London. "It would require very delicate lab work."

In its pure form, polonium-210 is a soft, silvery metal. One microgram, or millionth of a gram, can be fatal, and the body of the poisoned Russian contained multiple times the lethal dose. One gram, about 0.035 of an ounce, could theoretically kill tens of millions of people.

The substance is self-heating and highly radioactive, but as long as it is housed in a sealed capsule of glass or metal, it can be safely transported in, for example, one drop of solution. It eludes radiation detectors in place at airports, border crossings and ports because it emits alpha rays, not the gamma rays the devices look for.

Polonium-210 can be dried into a substance such as chalk and turned into powder. Or it can be mixed with an aerosol solution, allowing it to be sprayed. But many scientists believe the probable method of transporting and dispensing it in the London killing was putting the isotope in a solution that could be tipped at arm's length into a drink or onto food.

"The ideal volume would be a couple of teaspoons of solution; it can sometimes be difficult to transfer a drop or something smaller," Priest said. "Once it's in the body, it irradiates the whole body."

Yet scientists in London did not discover the presence of polonium-210 until Litvinenko's urine was tested with an alpha ray detector at the Atomic Weapons Establishment, the British agency that maintains nuclear warheads. "It's so obscure that it will be among the last things people will look for," Priest said. "And except by extreme luck, there's no chance to work out in a short time what's happened, so it gives the people who did it a long time to get away."

The substance's great giveaway is that once discovered, its telltale traces are easily tracked. Out of its box, polonium smears everything. After Litvinenko's death, it was discovered in planes, cars, hotels and offices -- all places that the victim and people he met had visited around the time of the poisoning.

If it enters the body in tiny amounts, death is certain. The devastating effects were studied in the 1960s at a Moscow institute where the isotope was administered to dogs, rabbits and rats, according to Zhuikov. He said Soviet scientists wanted to understand polonium's potential in case humans were exposed to it, because the isotope was used in various applications in the country's nuclear and space programs.

The painful progression from severe vomiting and diarrhea to hair loss, internal bleeding and organ failure was clear in a photograph of a stricken Litvinenko lying in a London hospital. "If someone hates, really hates, then it's a good material [to use to] to kill," Zhuikov said. "This is real suffering."

The former agent's death has caused anti-terrorism officials to worry that an explosive or airborne dispersal of polonium, particularly in a crowded, enclosed space, could cause numerous fatalities and sow widespread panic, scientists said. Compromise a food or water supply, they said, and the consequences could be even more dire.

"You need a lot of the material," Zimmerman said. "But not more than it is reasonable to think could be diverted from the commercial stream."

The International Atomic Energy Agency is considering tighter controls on polonium.

An IAEA diplomat, who was not authorized to speak for quotation, said that in the wake of the Litvinenko case, concerns have risen at the agency about a mass poisoning through the introduction of polonium into the food chain or drinking water.

Ultimately, scientists such as Zimmerman would like to phase out polonium's commercial use and see the development of anti-static technology using other material.

"Peace Mom" Turns Attention To Guantanamo (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

HAVANA, Cuba (AP) -- American "peace mom" Cindy Sheehan called for the closure of the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, as she and other activists arrived in Cuba on Saturday to draw attention to the nearly 400 terror suspects held at the remote site.

Sheehan is among 12 human rights and anti-war activists who will travel across this Caribbean island next week, arriving at the main gate of the Guantanamo base in eastern Cuba on Thursday -- five years after the first prisoners were flown in.

"Anyone who knows me knows that I am not afraid of anything," Sheehan said when asked about the possibility of U.S. sanctions for traveling to communist-run Cuba, which remains under an American trade embargo.

DOJ_NMG_0113381

"What is more important is the inhumanity that my government is perpetrating at Guantanamo," she told reporters.

Sheehan, 49, of Vacaville, California, became an anti-war activist known as the "peace mom" after losing her 24-year-old son, Casey, in Iraq in April 2004.

She drew international attention after camping outside President Bush's Texas ranch to protest the war in Iraq, and has been arrested numerous times for trespassing.

Sheehan arrived in Havana early Saturday evening with trip organizer Medea Benjamin of the California nonprofit groups Global Exchange and CODEPINK: Women for Peace.

Benjamin said group members believed they were exempt from U.S. travel restrictions on Cuba because they were traveling as professional human rights activists who will attend a daylong international conference in the Cuban city of Guantanamo on Wednesday, the eve of their protest.

The U.S. military still holds about 395 men on suspicion of links to al Qaeda or the Taliban, including about 85 who have been cleared to be released or transferred to other countries.

Cleric's Story Of Abduction, Torture (CHIT)

By John Crewdson, Tribune Senior Correspondent

Chicago Tribune, January 7, 2007

Letter opening salvo in CIA officers' trial

CAIRO -- "This is how they kidnapped me from Italy ... and how they tortured and imprisoned me in Egypt."

So begins a 6,300-word, handwritten letter, composed in an Egyptian prison cell by radical Muslim cleric Osama Moustafa Hassan Nasr. His abduction by the CIA is at the center of an unprecedented judicial proceeding set to open in Italy this week that may ultimately expose to public view one of the agency's most sensitive and controversial operations in its secret war on terror.

In a kidnapping case against 26 Americans and five Italian intelligence operatives, including the one-time CIA chief in Rome and Italy's former top spymaster, Nasr, better known as Abu Omar, will speak to the court through his letter, telling his story for the first time in his own words.

According to Abu Omar's written account, obtained by the Tribune, he was walking to his mosque in Milan on Feb. 17, 2003, when he was stopped on the street by a man who identified himself as a police officer. The cleric wrote that he was pulled into a van, beaten and taken by plane to Egypt.

He described in detail how his Egyptian interrogators tried to get him to agree to become an informer, and he says he refused. What followed, according to his letter, was torture with electric shocks, beatings that caused him to lose the hearing in one ear, and sexual abuse.

For long periods of time, he said in his letter, he was kept in an underground cell "where you cannot distinguish between night and day and the cockroaches and rats and insects walk all over my body night and day."

Abu Omar has been locked away for nearly four years, most of it in Egypt's notorious Torah Prison, some 1,600 miles from the massive Tribunale in Milan, where a preliminary hearing in the case is to begin on Tuesday. Those proceedings could shine the first bright light on the U.S. practice of "rendering" terrorist suspects to other countries for interrogation that allegedly is often accompanied by torture.

Prosecutors in Milan have compiled evidence ranging from hotel and cell phone records to hundreds of hours of wiretapped telephone conversations. Now Abu Omar, through his letter, promises to be a prominent witness in the case.

Abu Omar, 43, is a native Egyptian who fled his homeland when he was young in order to escape what he said was political persecution. He married and had children in Albania and married a second time in Milan. Like uncounted millions of his brethren, he grew increasingly hostile toward Israel and the United States because of perceived injustices to Palestinians and other Muslims.

He was under surveillance by Italian authorities because of his suspected role in helping young European Muslims go to Iraq to take up arms against the expected U.S.-led invasion, which occurred a month after he disappeared from Milan.

While ultimately charged in Italy in April 2005 with helping Muslim fighters make their way to Iraq, Abu Omar had not been charged with a crime in the U.S. or Italy at the time of his abduction. Italian courts are divided on whether the recruiting of "foreign fighters" for a war violates Italy's anti-terrorism laws.

Some human-rights groups have cited Abu Omar's "rendition" as a prime example of the "outsourcing of torture" by the Bush administration. But his case is not unique. Egypt, which has often been accused of torturing prisoners, acknowledges taking custody of 60 to 70 radical Muslims abducted by the CIA.

DOJ_NMG_0113382

The Americans charged in the Abu Omar case--25 current and former CIA operatives and a U.S. Air Force colonel--are fugitives from Italian justice, and none of them are expected in court for this week's hearing. Prosecutors plan to ask the Milanese court to try the Americans in absentia, and the court is expected to agree.

CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield declined comment on any aspect of the case. The agency has refused to acknowledge that it played a role in the Milan rendition, or even that it occurred.

Except for a three-week period in 2004 when he was freed by the Egyptian courts for lack of evidence, Abu Omar's contacts with the world have been limited to a few visits from Nabila Ghali, the second of his two Muslim wives, and a handful of telephone conversations with Ghali and his first wife, Marsela Glina, who lives in Albania.

Testimony a surprise

Until recently, prosecutors in Milan assumed they would have to make their case against the 31 defendants without any testimony from Abu Omar, who is charged under a 25-year-old "emergency decree" with posing a danger to the Egyptian state.

After learning that Abu Omar was in Egypt, Milan's deputy public prosecutor, Armando Spataro, repeatedly asked the Egyptian government for permission to question him. When the Egyptians ignored Spataro's initial request, he sent a second one. When that request was ignored, a third followed last February. Spataro assumed his requests were being thrown away.

Then, last April, Abu Omar's Egyptian lawyer, Montasser El Zayat, who has earned a reputation for defending Muslim radicals, received a surprise summons demanding his client's presence before Egypt's chief appellate prosecutor, Sherif El Kady.

According to El Zayat, as a stenographer took notes Abu Omar answered El Kady's questions about his years as a Cairo university student, a brief jail term for political activity, his flight to Albania, and his life in Milan after being granted political asylum in Italy.

Whether Abu Omar's testimony was taken in response to Spataro's requests is not clear. The Egyptian Interior Ministry declines to discuss the case, and no transcript was ever sent to Milan or provided to El Zayat.

When Abu Omar learned from his wife Ghali that his testimony had never reached Italy, he wrote, in a measured Arabic hand, what Ghali refers to as "his memoirs"--his version of the story of his abduction and captivity.

The document is now in the possession of Spataro, who says he has verified its authenticity.

`Severely beaten'

Abu Omar wrote that he was grabbed on the street in Milan and thrown into a van by men who never spoke. When he tried to resist, he wrote, he was "severely beaten" until white foam spewed from his mouth and he became incontinent.

Suddenly, his kidnappers, evidently fearing a heart attack or some other cardiac event, "began to tear at my clothes quickly and one of them began to compress on my heart," performing heart massage.

The crisis averted, Abu Omar was taken to an airport. A short flight was followed by a longer one, which ended in Cairo shortly after 5 a.m.--in time, he wrote, for him to hear the first call for morning prayer echoing across the Egyptian capital.

Abu Omar wrote that he was driven to a building he later identified as the headquarters of the Egyptian intelligence service, where a man his captors described only as a "great Pasha"--a high-ranking official--asked him:

"Do you accept to work with us in exchange for your safe return to Italy?"

After refusing to become an informer, Abu Omar wrote, he was allowed to sleep and provided with some food before being given paper and pen, ordered to write his life story, and shown "many pictures of people in Italy (Egyptians, Tunisians, Algerians, Moroccans, etc.)."

Refusals to answer questions were met with electric shocks, "hand beatings," and threats of rape, Abu Omar claimed. "I was hung like slaughtered cattle," he wrote, "head down, feet up, hands tied behind my back, feet also tied together, and I was exposed to electric shocks all over my body and especially the head area to weaken the brain. ..."

He also described being tied up and placed on a mattress that was hosed down with water and connected to electricity.

Even when he was not being tortured, he wrote, "I was placed near the torture chambers for long periods of time to hear the screams of the tortured and their moans and their howls so that I would collapse psychologically."

According to El Zayat, Abu Omar has tried to commit suicide at least once in captivity.

Although Abu Omar did not mention it in the handwritten statement, his lawyer, El Zayat, said that his client told the Egyptian prosecutor in his earlier testimony that a man who looked, dressed and spoke English like an American had been present during the first several days of his interrogation.

Asked whether the mystery man had been present during the torture as well as the questioning, El Zayat replied in a recent interview here that his client was "not sure."

A former senior CIA official said it was standard procedure following a rendition for a CIA officer to visit the receiving country and assess how the case was proceeding.

DOJ_NMG_0113383

Cell phone and hotel reservation records compiled by the Milan prosecutors show that Robert Seldon Lady, then the CIA's chief in Milan, traveled to Cairo four days after Abu Omar arrived here and that Lady stayed for two weeks.

Daria Pesce, an Italian lawyer representing Lady, who is one of the CIA operatives charged in Abu Omar's kidnapping, will say only that his visit to Cairo was "official" CIA business.

CIA Cases Spur Debate Over Torture (CHIT)

By John Crewdson, Tribune Senior Correspondent

Chicago Tribune, January 7, 2007

The use of torture has been prohibited in the United States since the ratification in 1787 of the 8th Amendment to the Constitution barring "cruel and unusual punishment."

"We do not condone torture," President Bush has declared. "I have never ordered torture. I will never order torture. The values of this country are such that torture is not a part of our soul and our being."

Yet some human rights groups contend that a technique known as "waterboarding," which simulates drowning and reportedly has been used by the U.S. on some terrorist suspects, is torture. These groups also argue that some psychological interrogation techniques, such as sleep deprivation and exposure to loud music, contravene the 8th Amendment.

While those debates continue, there is no question that terrorism suspects such as Abu Omar have been captured abroad by the CIA and transported to third countries whose police and intelligence services routinely employ interrogation methods, such as electric shock, that everyone agrees constitute torture.

Bush said on March 16, 2005, that before a third-country "rendition" of a suspected terrorist can take place, the CIA must obtain from the receiving country "the promise that they won't be tortured."

Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales said on May 3, 2006, that the actual standard applied by the U.S. in choosing a destination country is less stringent: whether a suspect is "more likely than not" to be tortured.

Canadian government and United Nations investigations have found that individuals "rendered" by the CIA to Egypt and Syria were mistreated despite assurances that they would not be tortured.

"It's almost impossible to talk about rendition apart from the torture element," says Joanne Mariner, a lawyer with Human Rights Watch, "since that is and has always been one of the central issues with renditions. The CIA knows that Egypt practices torture routinely, particularly against suspected Islamists."

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), whose Judiciary Committee has just begun an investigation of CIA renditions, agrees.

"We diminish our own values as a nation--and lose credibility as an advocate of human rights around the world--by engaging in, or outsourcing, torture," Leahy wrote Gonzales in November.

According to the U.S. State Department's global survey of human rights, torture and abuse of prisoners in Egypt remain "common and persistent." The State Department report is also critical of Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Morocco and Syria, which have been recipients of other CIA renditions.

Under legislation implementing the United Nations Convention Against Torture, to which the U.S. is a signatory, it is a federal crime for U.S. government employees to participate in, conspire in or contribute to the torture of anybody, anywhere in the world.

Mariner and other human-rights lawyers think that rendering someone to a country where he is likely to be tortured may violate the law even if the CIA operatives involved in the rendition played no direct role in the torture.

"If the people involved in the process knew he was likely to be tortured, then they're responsible," said M. Cherif Bassiouni, distinguished research professor of law at DePaul University College of Law.

The Imperial Presidency 2.0 (NYT)

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

Observing President Bush in action lately, we have to wonder if he actually watched the election returns in November, or if he was just rerunning the 2002 vote on his TiVo.

That year, the White House used the fear of terrorism to scare American voters into cementing the Republican domination of Congress. Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney then embarked on an expansion of presidential power chilling both in its sweep and in the damage it did to the constitutional system of checks and balances.

In 2006, the voters sent Mr. Bush a powerful message that it was time to rein in his imperial ambitions. But we have yet to see any sign that Mr. Bush understands that — or even realizes that the Democrats are now in control of the Congress. Indeed, he seems to have interpreted his party's drubbing as a mandate to keep pursuing his fantasy of victory in Iraq and to press ahead undaunted with his assault on civil liberties and the judicial system. Just before the Christmas break, the Justice Department served notice to Senator Patrick Leahy — the new chairman of the Judiciary Committee — that it intended to keep stonewalling Congressional inquiries into Mr. Bush's inhumane and unconstitutional treatment of prisoners taken in anti-terrorist campaigns. It refused to hand over two documents, including one in which Mr. Bush authorized the Central Intelligence Agency to establish secret prisons beyond the reach of American law or international treaties. The other set forth the interrogation methods authorized in these prisons — which we now know ranged from abuse to outright torture.

Also last month, Mr. Bush issued another of his infamous "presidential signing statements," which he has used scores of times to make clear he does not intend to respect the requirements of a particular law — in this case a little-noticed Postal Service bill. The statement suggested that Mr. Bush does not believe the government must obtain a court order before opening Americans' first-class mail. It said the administration had the right to "conduct searches in exigent circumstances," which include not only protecting lives, but also unspecified "foreign intelligence collection."

The law is clear on this. A warrant is required to open Americans' mail under a statute that was passed to stop just this sort of abuse using just this sort of pretext. But then again, the law is also clear on the need to obtain a warrant before intercepting Americans' telephone calls and e-mail. Mr. Bush began openly defying that law after Sept. 11, 2001, authorizing the National Security Agency to eavesdrop without a court order on calls and e-mail between the United States and other countries.

News accounts have also reminded us of the shameful state of American military prisons, where supposed terrorist suspects are kept without respect for civil or human rights, and on the basis of evidence so deeply tainted by abuse, hearsay or secrecy that it is essentially worthless.

Deborah Sontag wrote in The Times last week about the sorry excuse for a criminal case that the administration whipped up against Jose Padilla, who was once — but no longer is — accused of plotting to explode a radioactive "dirty bomb" in the United States. Mr. Padilla was held for two years without charges or access to a lawyer. Then, to avoid having the Supreme Court review Mr. Bush's power grab, the administration dropped those accusations and charged Mr. Padilla in a criminal court on hazy counts of lending financial support to terrorists.

But just as the government abandoned the "dirty bomb" case against Mr. Padilla, it quietly charged an Ethiopian-born man, Binyam Mohamed, with conspiring with Mr. Padilla to commit that very crime. Unlike Mr. Padilla, Mr. Mohamed is not a United States citizen, so the administration threw him into Guantánamo. Now 28, he is still being held there as an "illegal enemy combatant" under the anti-constitutional military tribunals act that was rushed through the Republican-controlled Congress just before last November's elections.

Mr. Mohamed was a target of another favorite Bush administration practice: "extraordinary rendition," in which foreign citizens are snatched off the streets of their hometowns and secretly shipped to countries where they can be abused and tortured on behalf of the American government. Mr. Mohamed — whose name appears nowhere in either of the cases against Mr. Padilla — has said he was tortured in Morocco until he signed a confession that he conspired with Mr. Padilla. The Bush administration clearly has no intention of answering that claim, and plans to keep Mr. Mohamed in extralegal detention indefinitely.

The Democratic majority in Congress has a moral responsibility to address all these issues: fixing the profound flaws in the military tribunals act, restoring the rule of law over Mr. Bush's rogue intelligence operations and restoring the balance of powers between Congress and the executive branch. So far, key Democrats, including Mr. Leahy and Senator Richard Durbin of Illinois, chairman of a new subcommittee on human rights, have said these issues are high priorities for them.

We would lend such efforts our enthusiastic backing and hope Mr. Leahy, Mr. Durbin and other Democratic leaders are not swayed by the absurd notion circulating in Washington that the Democrats should now "look ahead" rather than use their new majority to right the dangerous wrongs of the last six years of Mr. Bush's one-party rule.

This is a false choice. Dealing with these issues is not about the past. The administration's assault on some of the nation's founding principles continues unabated. If the Democrats were to shirk their responsibility to stop it, that would make them no better than the Republicans who formed and enabled these policies in the first place.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New Top Spy Inherits An Office Still Finding Its Way (WP)

By Walter Pincus, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

McConnell's Tasks Include the Ongoing Integration of Agencies as Well as Advising the President

DOJ_NMG_0113385

President Bush's choice to be the second director of national intelligence, retired Navy Vice Adm. John M. McConnell, must pick up the job of restructuring the nation's $42 billion intelligence community, which after 19 months is still very much a work in progress.

At the White House on Friday, outgoing director John D. Negroponte said, "Admiral McConnell will continue to drive forward the reforms we have initiated, fully integrating the domestic, foreign and military dimensions of our national intelligence enterprise."

McConnell responded, "I plan to continue the strong emphasis on integration of the community to better serve all of our customers."

He will manage the collection and analysis of intelligence from the 17 agencies and roughly 100,000 people in the U.S. intelligence community. Bush emphasized that the director also "determines the national intelligence budget." That was a major recommendation of the 9/11 commission, and one Congress adopted when it passed legislation in December 2004 creating the director of national intelligence (DNI).

The DNI's other major role is as the president's top intelligence adviser. That means being present six mornings a week when Bush gets his national security briefing. That session offers the DNI an opportunity not only to have time with the president, but to hear and take part in the ensuing discussion with Vice President Cheney, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley and chief of staff Joshua B. Bolten, who are also in the room.

This part of the job requires the DNI to take time the night before to read the roughly 28-page daily briefing report and to show up at his Old Executive Office Building suite next to the White House at about 6:30 each morning to go over the latest intelligence. One person familiar with the process described it as worthwhile, "to get a sense of what's on everyone's mind."

Another aspect of the DNI's role as top intelligence adviser to the president is attendance at high-level White House meetings, which have been increasingly frequent since the Iraq war began. Those meetings can be handled by the deputy DNI, though no one currently holds that job. How McConnell will divide his time between this advisory role and the intelligence community duties, should he be confirmed, remains to be seen.

One of the early tasks he will face, according to a senior intelligence official, is reviewing the 2004 law that created his position to see whether changes need to be made. The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence has already scheduled hearings to review how the restructuring legislation is working out.

McConnell, 63, served in the Navy as a career intelligence officer, rising to vice admiral when he headed the National Security Agency from 1992 to 1996. After his retirement from the Navy, he took a private-sector job in March 1996 with the Booz Allen Hamilton consulting firm, where he rose to be senior vice president.

John Moseman, a former senior CIA official who works with McConnell at Booz Allen, said McConnell has been "successful in helping it become an incredibly collaborative organization." That approach, "reaching across and pulling together teams of people," is a talent that is needed in the DNI job, where "you need collaboration at every level," Moseman said.

At the White House on Friday, McConnell said his private-sector work during the past 10 years "has allowed me to stay focused on national security and intelligence communities as a strategist and as a consultant." In many respects, he said, "I never left" the intelligence business.

Booz Allen makes it clear on its Web site that McConnell has played a leading role in its handling of contracts in the fields of intelligence and military affairs. "McConnell leads the firm's assignments in Military Intelligence and Information Operations for the Department of Defense, the Unified Combatant Commanders, Military Services, and Defense Agencies," according to the site.

FEMA Overhaul Delay Irks Legislators (WT)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, January 7, 2007

Lawmakers are frustrated with the lack of progress on a congressionally mandated overhaul of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, designed to ensure that flaws that dogged the response to Hurricane Katrina are fixed.

In a letter sent late last month to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and released last week, members of both the House and Senate homeland security committees complained about being kept in the dark over progress on the changes, which they feared was lagging.

"There are already some indicators that [the department] may not be effectively and promptly implementing" the new law, wrote Sens. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent, and Susan Collins, Maine Republican, and Reps. Bennie Thompson, Mississippi Democrat, and Peter T. King, New York Republican.

The law effectively reconstitutes FEMA as an independent agency within the department. Mr. Chertoff opposed the overhaul, which was included in the must-pass Homeland Security appropriations bill and signed by President Bush in October.

DOJ_NMG_0113386

The lawmakers' letter requests "full and complete briefings" for staff on the implementation of the law "no later than January 8, 2007."

Lieberman spokeswoman Leslie Phillips told United Press International on Thursday that the Senate committee had heard no response from the department.

"We will give them a courteous amount of time to respond and then decide how to proceed," she said. Miss Phillips said the letter, and the subsequent decision to release it, followed "weeks and weeks of fruitless effort to get briefings."

"It would be fair to say" that Mr. Lieberman was frustrated, she added.

Homeland Security officials denied they were dragging their feet, pointing out that it is a mammoth task to implement the reorganization, which is outlined in 180 pages of legislative language.

"The department was given until the end of March" to implement the reforms, spokeswoman Joanna Gonzalez told UPI, and "we look forward to briefing members of the committee."

But she said officials wanted to ensure that the transition plan was complete before they briefed Congress.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Plan For Iraq Requests More Troops And More Jobs (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 6 — President Bush's new Iraq strategy calls for a rapid influx of forces that could add as many as 20,000 American combat troops to Baghdad, supplemented with a jobs program costing as much as $1 billion intended to employ Iraqis in projects including painting schools and cleaning streets, according to American officials who are piecing together the last parts of the initiative.

The American officials said Iraq's prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, formally agreed in a long teleconference on Thursday with Mr. Bush to match the American troop increase, made up of five combat brigades that would go in at a rate of roughly one a month, by sending three more Iraqi brigades to Baghdad over the next month and a half.

Nonetheless, even in outlining the plan, some American officials acknowledged deep skepticism about whether the new plan could succeed.

They said two-thirds of the promised Iraqi force would consist of Kurdish pesh merga units to be sent from northern Iraq, and they said some doubts remained about whether they would show up in Baghdad and were truly committed to quelling sectarian fighting.

The call for an increase in troops would also put Mr. Bush in direct confrontation with the leaders of the new Democratic Congress, who said in a letter to the president on Friday that the United States should move instead toward a phased withdrawal of American troops, to begin in the next four months.

Mr. Bush is expected to make the plan public in coming days, probably in a speech to the country on Wednesday that will cast the initiative as a joint effort by the United States and Iraq to reclaim control of Baghdad neighborhoods racked by sectarian violence. Officials said Mr. Bush was likely to be vague on the question of how long the additional American forces would remain on the streets of Baghdad. But they said American planners intended for the push to last for less than a year.

A crucial element of the plan would include more than doubling the State Department's reconstruction efforts throughout the country, an initiative intended by the administration to signal that the new strategy would emphasize rebuilding as much as fighting.

But previous American reconstruction efforts in Iraq have failed to translate into support from the Iraqi population, and some Republicans as well as the new Democratic leadership in Congress have questioned if a troop increase would do more than postpone the inevitable and precarious moment when Iraqi forces have to stand on their own.

Congress has the power to halt the increases by cutting off money for Mr. Bush's proposals. But some Democrats are torn about whether to press ahead with such a move for fear that it will appear that they are not supporting the troops.

When Mr. Bush gives his speech, he will cast much of the program as an effort to bolster Iraq's efforts to take command over their own forces and territory, the American officials said. He will express confidence that Mr. Maliki is committed to bringing under control both the Sunni-led insurgency and the Shiite militias that have emerged as the source of most of the violence. Mr. Maliki picked up those themes in a speech in Baghdad on Saturday in which he said that multinational troops would support an Iraqi effort to secure the capital.

Some aspects of the plan were reported by The Wall Street Journal on Friday.

The officials would not say specifically whether the American troop increase would be carried out if the Iraqis failed to make good on their commitment to add to their own ranks. But they emphasized that the American influx, which would be focused in Baghdad and Anbar Province but could also include a contingency force in Kuwait, could be re-evaluated at any point.

The American officials who described the plan included some who said they were increasingly concerned about Mr. Maliki's intentions and his ability to deliver. They said senior Bush administration officials had been deeply disturbed by accounts from witnesses to last Saturday's hanging of Saddam Hussein, who said they believed that guards involved in carrying out the execution were linked to the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia that is headed by Moktada al-Sadr, whose name some of the executioners shouted while Mr. Hussein stood on the gallows.

"If that's an indication of how Maliki is operating these days, we've got a deeper problem with the bigger effort," said one official, who insisted on anonymity because he was discussing internal administration deliberations over a strategy that Mr. Bush has not yet publicly announced.

The White House has refused to talk publicly about any of the decisions that Mr. Bush has made about his plan, which is tentatively titled "A New Way Forward." Even though speechwriters are already drafting Mr. Bush's comments, several of the crucial elements are not final, officials warned. That apparently includes the exact amounts of money Mr. Bush will ask of Congress to finance the jobs program or a longer-term job-training effort that will also be part of the strategy.

Mr. Bush has previously promised to remake American reconstruction efforts in Iraq, most notably in December 2005, when he said that the United States had learned from the failure of efforts to rebuild major infrastructure, mostly run by American companies. But subsequent efforts to focus on programs that would bring more immediate benefits to Iraqis have also faltered.

The details of Mr. Bush's latest military, economic and political initiatives were described by several sources, including some who said they doubted it would work. The jobs program, noted one, "would have been great in 2003 or even 2004, but we are trying it now in a very different Iraq," one in which the passion for fighting for sectarian control of neighborhoods may outweigh interests in obtaining employment.

The American officials who described the program included both advocates and critics of Mr. Bush's new strategy and representatives of three different executive branch departments. They would speak only on condition of anonymity because they were discussing internal deliberations about a plan that Mr. Bush had not yet announced.

The most immediate element of the new jobs program would amount to a major expansion of what is known in the military as the Commander's Emergency Response Program, which provides money to local officers to put civilians to work as a way of reducing resistance to the American presence in neighborhoods. While the effort has had some successes, they have largely been temporary. As a senior White House official noted in an interview recently, "You'd go into a neighborhood, clear it, try to hold it, and come back later and discover that it's all been shattered."

The new effort, officials said, would cost between a half billion and a billion dollars, some of which would be spent on other efforts to achieve stability and train Iraqis for more permanent jobs. The State Department and the Treasury Department have been brought into that effort.

The plan also calls for a more than doubling of the "Provincial Reconstruction Teams," relatively small groups of State Department officials empowered to coordinate local reconstruction efforts, chiefly hiring Iraqi companies. For much of the first half of 2006, the State Department was engaged in a bureaucratic dispute with the Defense Department about how these teams would be protected, including exploration of a plan to hire private protective forces that a White House official said "was too expensive." Now those teams will be expanded and embedded with combat brigades, officials said, in what would amount to the latest effort to demonstrate to Iraqis that the American forces in their midst were not simply occupiers.

Much of the plan described by officials seemed to be consistent with views supported by Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who will soon take over as the commander of ground forces in Iraq and who has been a strong advocate of an everyday American troop presence in neighborhoods.

Mr. Bush's speech is widely expected to make the case that Americans needed to commit to greater national sacrifice as part of what Bush administration officials acknowledge amounted to a last-ditch effort to salvage the mission in Iraq.

But almost as soon as his speech is done, a series of hearings will begin on Capitol Hill that Democrats intend to use to pick apart the details of the plan, with lawmakers questioning administration officials about whether a troop increase of any size can succeed this late in the war. Those hearings will also likely focus on whether the expanded American military commitment is linked to Iraqi military performance, a point that Bush administration officials would not address directly.

As described by those officials, Mr. Bush is stopping well short of declaring that the beefed-up American force will be sent only if the Iraqis also increase their own forces. But under the increase being contemplated, the reality is that every month between now and April or May, Mr. Bush will have a chance to decide whether to send an additional combat brigade into the country. "That's our moment of leverage," a White House official said.

DOJ_NMG_0113388

Officials said a larger American troop commitment also would be used to illustrate Washington's increased resolve to deter adventurism by regional adversaries, especially Iran. Mr. Bush's speech is expected to include talk of a new diplomatic initiative to shore up confidence among Washington's Islamic allies in the region as well as to warn its adversaries. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is expected to begin that initiative almost immediately after the speech, leaving for the Middle East by next weekend.

Parallel to an enlarged Baghdad security operation, Mr. Bush has signaled his desire to expand the number of American military trainers working with Iraqi security forces.

In a speech in Baghdad on Saturday, Mr. Maliki said he was going to renew his efforts to rid the Iraqi Army and other security forces of sectarian influences.

"I announce here that all parties and political organizations, without exception, are forbidden from practicing their activities among the armed forces," he said during a speech given to mark Army Day.

In his speech, he mentioned the new Baghdad security plan, saying multinational forces would "support and back up our forces." But he said little specifically about an increase in American troops. Officials familiar with his thinking have said privately that he opposes any measure that would delay giving his administration complete control over Iraq's armed forces as soon as possible.

He once again tried to reassure critics of his administration that no outlaws could expect protection.

"The Baghdad security plan will not provide safe haven for all outlaws, regardless of their political or sectarian identities," he said.

Bush Fleshes Out Iraq Strategy Details (AP)

By Deb Riechmann,

AP, January 7, 2007

President Bush worked Saturday to finish his new war plan that could send as many as 20,000 additional U.S. troops to Iraq and provide more money for jobs and reconstruction programs.

In Washington, Bush, who will announce his plan as early as Wednesday, held discussions with his national security advisers and then headed out of the White House for a bike ride. In Baghdad, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki announced that Iraqi forces would launch a new effort to wrest control of neighborhoods in the capital from Sunni insurgents and Shiite death squads.

Military officials say Bush is considering sending two to five brigades — up to 20,000 troops — to help tamp down violence that is preventing political reconciliation and rebuilding efforts in Iraq. The idea of a troop buildup is getting a cool reception on Capitol Hill and from some military leaders who claim there is no military solution to the problems in Iraq where 140,000 troops already are deployed.

"Based on the advice of current and former military leaders, we believe this tactic would be a serious mistake," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said in the Democratic radio address Saturday. Instead, Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi want Bush to begin pulling troops out in four to six months.

"Our troops and their families have already sacrificed a great deal for Iraq," Reid said. "They have done their part. It's time for the Iraqis to do their part."

Some military officials, familiar with the discussions, say Bush could initially dispatch 8,000 to 10,000 new troops to Baghdad, and possibly Anbar Province, and leave himself the option of sending more later if security doesn't improve.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Sen. Joseph Lieberman, I-Conn., say that, at a minimum, another three to five brigades should be sent to Baghdad and one more to Anbar province. About 3,500 to 4,000 troops are in a brigade.

Most of the discussion about Bush's new plan has focused on U.S. troop strength, but the strategy he will unveil also will address political and economic issues. "The clear, hold and build counterinsurgency strategy requires a focus on all three," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said. "Our strategy will reflect that point."

Military analysts say Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, who recently finished his tour as the No. 2 general in Iraq, has recommended a short-term jobs program. Others familiar with the plan say Bush is favoring: short-term jobs programs and extending micro-loans to small business; increasing the amount of money that military commanders can spend quickly on local projects to improve the daily lives of Iraqis.

Bush is considering allocating more money for the Commander's Emergency Response Program, set up in 2003 to give field commanders money to solve local problems quickly — and show American compassion and good will. The program was allocated $753 million in the 2006 budget year. The president also has expressed interest in shoring up job-training programs for

Iraqis and the work being done by State Department teams that coordinate local reconstruction efforts in Iraq, according to those familiar with discussions.

In a move reflecting Bush's aim to shift gears in Iraq, the White House on Friday announced that Bush has picked Adm. William Fallon, who commands American forces in the Pacific, to replace retiring Gen. John Abizaid as top U.S. commander in the Middle East, and will nominate Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who headed the effort to train Iraqi security forces, to replace Gen. George Casey as top American general in Iraq. Casey is becoming Army chief of staff.

Both Abizaid and Casey have expressed qualms in recent weeks about boosting U.S. forces in Iraq. Abizaid said an increase of 20,000 could not be sustained for long by the overburdened American military, and Casey said such a boost should be used only to advance U.S. strategic goals.

Last summer, the U.S. military and Iraqi army flooded the capital with 12,000 additional troops to quell violence. By October, the U.S. military said the operation had not met expectations and the situation was disheartening. And the second half of last year ended up being one of the most violent periods in the central and western sections of the Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

Bush is expected to continue his briefings with lawmakers next week, culminating in a meeting with bipartisan leadership on Wednesday, according to lawmakers and aides.

Critics Say "Surge" Is More Of The Same (WP)

Past Troop Buildups Have Not Quelled Iraq

President Bush is putting the final touches on his new Iraq policy amid growing skepticism inside and outside the administration that the emerging package of extra troops, economic assistance and political benchmarks for the Baghdad government will make any more than a marginal difference in stabilizing the country.

Washington's debate over Iraq will intensify this week as Bush lays out his plans, probably on Wednesday or Thursday, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other administration officials face tough questions from Democrats in congressional hearings.

Although officials said the president has yet to settle on an exact figure of new troops, senior military leaders and commanders are deeply worried that a "surge" of as many as five brigades, or 20,000 troops, in Iraq and Kuwait would tax U.S. ground forces already stretched to the breaking point -- and may still prove inadequate to quell sectarian violence and the Sunni insurgency. Some senior U.S. officials think it could even backfire.

"There is a lot of concern that this won't work," said one military official not authorized to speak publicly about the debate at the Pentagon.

Meanwhile, the political and economic ideas under consideration all appear to be variations on initiatives that U.S. and Iraqi authorities have proved unable to implement successfully since the 2003 invasion or have tried and found wanting, according to former U.S. officials and experts on reconstructing war-torn countries.

Many officials at the State and Defense departments also doubt that the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is capable of making the necessary reforms, given its track record of promising but not delivering since taking power in May and despite Maliki's assurances in a speech yesterday that he would hold Iraqis accountable for implementing a new Baghdad security plan.

A sense that the White House is preparing more of the same is generating deep skepticism among Democrats in Congress, many of whom have signaled strongly in recent days that they would resist sending additional troops to Iraq. And although Republicans say they are open to what Bush proposes this week, they are also asking much more pointed questions about the premises of the White House Iraq policy.

Administration officials are pushing lawmakers and the public to withhold judgment until they see all the elements of the new Iraq policy. Bush consulted with advisers yesterday, and White House speechwriters were working on this week's address. There are signs that there could be some surprises as the administration's debate moves from the staff level to the final deliberations of the president and his closest advisers.

Responding to skepticism about Maliki within some parts of the administration, the White House may make a deeper involvement in Iraq contingent on Maliki cracking down on militias and death squads while also undertaking bold political initiatives and developing a wider economic plan, U.S. officials say. The addition of new U.S. troops, for example, may be phased over several months and conditioned on Iraq following through on promised political reforms, the officials said.

One senior White House official said yesterday that the president considers the skepticism of lawmakers and the public "warranted" and that Bush will not "commit resources to a strategy that is not working." But the official said Bush was heartened by recent promises and plans from Maliki, citing the prime minister's speech in Baghdad yesterday in which he pledged a crackdown on sectarian militias, with U.S. assistance.

The official said U.S. and Iraqi leaders have been refining a new Iraqi security plan, first discussed when Bush and Maliki met in Jordan in November, in which Iraqi forces would take the lead with Americans in support. "It is not just rhetoric," the official said of Maliki. "He is actually putting forward specific plans and making different commitments than he has in the past." Speaking on the condition of anonymity because the president has not settled on a final plan, the official said Bush expects "a different result" from that of previous security plans.

Others have doubts. "I don't know that the Iraqi government has ever demonstrated ability to lead the country, and we shouldn't be surprised," said retired Army Lt. Gen. Jay M. Garner, who was the first U.S. official in charge of postwar Baghdad. "You'll never find, in my lifetime, one man that all the Iraqis will coalesce around." Iraqis are too divided among sectarian, ethnic and tribal loyalties, he said, and their loyalties are regional, not national.

Leon E. Panetta, a member of the Iraq Study Group, which recently delivered a wide-ranging set of recommendations about the way forward in Iraq, said in an interview that the test for him of the seriousness of the president's proposal will be whether Bush, in fact, conditions continued U.S. involvement on tangible progress from the Iraqi government.

"There has got to be some prospect that we are not just going to continue an open-ended commitment," said Panetta, who served in the Clinton White House as chief of staff.

As of yesterday, the president had not settled on a precise plan for adding to the 132,000 U.S. troops already in Iraq, officials said. Senior military and administration officials privately admit their deep concerns that the troop increase will backfire -- and leave the United States with no options left in six to eight months.

They note that since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003, the U.S. military has repeatedly carried out temporary troop increases of more than 20,000, but violence has continued to rise. The main difference under the new plan is that additional troops would be concentrated in the Baghdad vicinity, where there are currently seven U.S. brigades, and the increase could last longer, from six to 12 months, Pentagon officials said.

Meanwhile, the Joint Chiefs of Staff are worried about overstretching the Army and Marines.

The active-duty Army and Marine Corps lack a significant pool of ready and available forces to send to Iraq. The Army has one fully ready brigade of 3,500 to 4,000 troops on alert to deploy at any time. That on-alert brigade, most recently from the 82nd Airborne Division, has left for Kuwait in what could be the first phase of a troop increase, requiring that another unit take its place.

As a result, increasing ground troops would depend largely on extending units' time in Iraq and accelerating those preparing to go -- meaning longer war-zone tours and shorter periods back home for thousands of soldiers and Marines.

Under the plan, for instance, Army brigades would leave for Iraq sooner than planned, meaning soldiers would have less than 12 months at home to train and rebuild between tours -- a "red line" that outgoing Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker said he did not want to cross, according to a senior military official.

During its two-month interagency review, the Bush administration has struggled the most to come up with proposals to jump-start the stalled political process in Iraq, according to U.S. officials and Western diplomats. The fate of the revised strategy will be determined as much by new movement on Iraq's combustible political front as by success on the battlefield, administration officials said.

But the emerging package looks slim and, absent last-minute additions, appears to be more of the same, according to sources who have been briefed.

The centerpiece of the political plan is the creation of a national reconciliation government that would bring together the two main Shiite parties with the two largest Kurdish parties and the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party, according to Iraqi and U.S. officials. The goal is to marginalize Moqtada al-Sadr, the leader of the largest and most powerful Shiite militia and head of a group that has 30 seats in parliament and five cabinet posts.

To ensure participation of Sunni moderates, the Bush administration is pressing the Maliki government to take three other major steps: Amend the constitution to address Sunni concerns, pass a law on the distribution of Iraq's oil revenue and change the ruling that forbids the participation of former Baath Party officials.

The three major economic options on the table would revive dormant state-owned industries, launch a micro-finance program to give small loans to generate new businesses and expand a U.S. Agency for International Development stabilization program.

A fourth option would add major funds to a short-term work program to hire Iraqis to clean up trash or do repairs after U.S. and Iraqi troops secure neighborhoods. This Pentagon-run program is a way to lure unemployed men who had joined militias back into the mainstream economy, at least briefly, with the U.S. intention that Iraq would eventually spend its own money to create permanent jobs.

The idea to revive state-owned industries has come full circle. Iraq's economy under Saddam Hussein was state-controlled. When the first U.S. team arrived, its members looked to reenergize the industries as a key element in jump-starting the economy. But the subsequent Coalition Provisional Authority, run by L. Paul Bremer, opted to scrap the effort and emphasize a free-market economy, even though Iraq was ill equipped to make a dramatic conversion. The failure of a free market and the lack of both local and foreign investment has led the Defense Department to launch a massive reassessment.

Apparently absent from the final Iraq plan is any effort to engage Syria and Iran in trying to stabilize the country, a key recommendation from the Iraq Study Group, though the president will probably talk about new efforts to try to jump-start the Arab-Israeli peace process. Rice is expected to visit the Middle East to launch the effort later this month.

Bush Aides Lay Groundwork For Iraq Surge (LAT)

By Doyle McManus, Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — Two months ago, the nation's voters handed both houses of Congress to the Democrats in an election that reflected deep discontent with the war in Iraq.

This week, President Bush is responding to voters' message — by preparing to escalate the U.S. military commitment in Iraq with a "surge" that would add thousands of troops.

That might sound paradoxical, but aides say Bush's willingness to send more troops makes sense based on two beliefs that have long guided his war strategy. The first is that the price of leaving Iraq would be greater than the cost of staying. The second is that the public will accept the burdens of war if convinced that success is still possible.

"Is this a war, or is it not a war?" one official asked, previewing an argument the president is likely to make. "If it is, you have to be willing to sacrifice…. Americans are willing to do that as long as we have a clear strategy that offers a chance of success."

The details of the administration's surge plan haven't been disclosed, and officials say some details are still being ironed out. Bush is expected to unveil the plan in a nationally broadcast speech this week, probably Wednesday evening.

But even before the plan's announcement, Bush aides — speaking on condition of anonymity to avoid stepping on his lines — have been describing his thinking and trying out talking points.

Their summary: Bush believes that the United States still has a chance to stop Iraq from descending into civil war — and, on the other side of the equation, that the consequences of withdrawal would be disastrous. He thinks it's too early to turn primary responsibility for security in Baghdad over to Iraqi security forces, whose performance has been disappointing.

That leaves Bush with no easy options. But one choice that would keep the hope of victory alive — a choice that has growing support in the White House — is a surge aimed at stopping sectarian violence in Baghdad, coupled with rapid political reforms and a U.S.-funded job program to halt the growth of sectarian militias.

Officials said the job program, intended to employ young men who otherwise might join the militias, could cost as much as $1 billion if Congress approves it. The administration's plan will also include proposals for increased economic aid that would further increase the total bill, they said.

White House officials acknowledge that any surge proposal would meet opposition from critics who say the prospect of success is too low to risk more troops' lives. But the officials say they believe that most members of the public are still willing to hear Bush out and give him another chance to succeed.

"If you look at the polls, immediately leaving Iraq is not actually a popular option," one White House aide said. "Everybody figures that anxiety about the war … means 'get out.' But public opinion is more complex than that."

If Bush decides to send more troops, he will argue that the deployment is part of a broader change in strategy that offers a new chance of success, aides said.

"A president does have the ability to persuade," one added.

One official involved in the administration's policy discussion described it this way: "There are several strategic options to choose from. Do we cut and leave, and attempt to exit gracefully? Do we adjust the current strategy and be patient? Do we keep the current strategy without any adjustment? Or do we try to change the dynamic by increasing the troop levels and changing the strategy?

"Given an ample supply of patience on the part of the American people, [the current strategy] would work. However, the president now knows that there's not an ample supply of patience on the part of the American people…. So he has to change the dynamic…. Does he do it by reducing troops and withdrawing, or does he change the mix in a different way?"

DOJ_NMG_0113392

If Bush does propose a surge, that will amount to his rejection of two options proposed in recent weeks. Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, opposed an increase in U.S. troops and called for a quicker transfer of responsibility to Iraqi forces. He is to retire in March.

A commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) called for a strategy similar to Abizaid's and added that most U.S. combat forces should be withdrawn from Iraq by early 2008. Bush has privately dismissed its recommendations as useless.

Aides said that if Bush opted for a surge of troops, it should not surprise anyone who paid attention to his public statements about Iraq.

"Victory in Iraq is achievable," the president told reporters two weeks ago. "It hasn't happened nearly as quickly as I hoped…. A lot of Americans understand the consequences of retreat. Retreat would embolden radicals. It would hurt the credibility of the United States."

In October, Bush told a group of conservative columnists he believed that the public would support the war as long as it thought success was possible.

"People want to know, Can you win? They're with us if we can win," he said. "I'm from Texas. My buddies are saying, 'Are you doing enough?' not 'Are you doing too little?' They want to know, this mighty country … are we doing what it takes to win?"

Duke University public opinion scholar Christopher Gelpi, who has advised the Bush White House, said the administration faced an uphill battle.

"I think the public will be very unhappy with a surge proposal in the short term," he said. "Pressure for withdrawal was increasing before the election, and it's gotten even higher since the election. The Bush administration is unlikely to turn that around in the short term.

"If the White House is trying to say the election of 2006 was not a repudiation of the president's Iraq policy, that's not right," Gelpi added. "The election was a repudiation."

Still, he said, if a surge in troops succeeds in improving conditions in Iraq, public support for the war will probably increase. "If it works, the public will come around," Gelpi said. "I think he is pushing for a surge because he is willing to ride out public dissatisfaction in the short term, in hopes that he can improve the situation on the ground in Iraq and succeed in the long term…. In that sense, it's understandable."

But time may be short, Gelpi warned. "The quicker and sharper they can show some effect, the less the cost in U.S. lives is likely to matter," he said. "If it takes a year to show results, that's a real problem."

A Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll conducted in December found that 52% of Americans favored a fixed timetable for withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq, 26% supported keeping troops in Iraq as long as necessary and 12% favored sending more troops. That survey did not ask about immediate withdrawal, but a CNN poll in December showed 21% favored such a plan.

Lawmakers from both parties — Democrats emboldened to oppose the war and the GOP worried about its 2008 electoral prospects — expressed skepticism about Bush's plans last week.

"No matter what [Bush] does, he'll get chewed on," said an aide to GOP congressional leadership, speaking on condition of anonymity. "If he calls for a surge, he'll get chewed on. If he doesn't, he'll get chewed on."

Sen. Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana, a moderate Democrat who was one of 15 senators who met with Bush on Friday to share their concerns, said: "The president has … the burden of proof to give specific reasons and clear direction if, in fact, he's going to call for a troop surge. What that surge would do, how big it would be, how long the troops would stay, what cities, what neighborhoods, what his specific mission was — I think the American people's patience is wearing thin with vagueness."

Several Republicans, including Sens. Richard G. Lugar of Indiana and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, have also expressed reservations about a surge plan.

As many as 10 of the Senate's 49 Republicans are either against or skeptical about the idea of a surge, the congressional aide said. "It would take a lot of specifics and a shorter-than-two-years time frame to bring them on board," the aide said.

In remarks last week, Bush suggested he would try to provide the details — although aides said he still rejected the idea of a fixed timetable. "One thing is for certain: I will want to make sure that the mission is clear and specific and can be accomplished," Bush said in a question-and-answer session with reporters.

Though most senators at Friday's White House meeting said they opposed any troop increase, they also suggested they were at least partially open to persuasion — even the Democrats.

"I would say that they were all opposed to it unless he comes up with some spectacular idea and a way to measure that idea," said Sen. Blanche Lincoln (D-Ark). "They weren't unequivocally against it, but most would say … the burden of proof was on the president."

Probable Troop Surge In Iraq Raises Questions About Mission, Numbers (GAN)

By John Yaukey

Gannett, January 7, 2007

WASHINGTON — The new plan for Iraq President Bush will unveil within days probably includes increasing U.S. troops there as part of a strategy to save Baghdad, which has sparked intense debate even among advocates who differ on how many troops to send and for how long.

Signs point to Bush sending between 15,000 and 30,000 more troops on top of the 140,000 already in Iraq.

The Pentagon has raised the number of troops to almost 160,00 before — about the level it would be if Bush sent an additional 20,000.

The question now is what would the troops do given the grim new realities of sectarian division and civil war in Iraq, and is it worth it to risk more American lives?

Some leading advocates of a surge argue the situation in Iraq is too dire for anything short of a major increase of 30,000 or more troops for as long as it takes to at least stabilize the capital.

"It must be substantial and it must be sustained," presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said after a fact-finding tour through the Middle East. "(It) will mean more casualties and more hardships. ... We have to be prepared for this."

Leading Democrats believe a troop surge is misguided at best and have vowed to fight it if it's not tied to future troop reductions. They argue the problems in Iraq can only be solved politically.

"Adding more combat troops will only endanger more Americans and stretch our military to the breaking point for no strategic gain," Democratic leaders wrote in a letter to Bush on Friday.

Despite the broad range of opinion on a troop increase, many different voices in the debate agree that if more forces are sent, they must be part of an explicit mission that addresses a series of critical issues:

The troops

The Army and Marines are already stretched, raising questions about where to get the troops.

Increasing the number of troops by 20,000 for several months is possible without calling up any Guard or Reserve units. Military analysts say it probably would by done in part by delaying the departure of two Marine regiments and speeding up Army deployments scheduled for spring.

A prolonged surge into 2008, experts say, could require tapping Guard and Reserve units, which provided close to half the U.S. force in Iraq in 2005.

And would the Iraqis do their part?

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki pledged to Bush on Thursday that he would commit three additional battalions to Baghdad, but his record of follow-through raises doubts.

In the ongoing failed effort to secure Baghdad that began last summer, dubbed Operation Together Forward, only two of six Iraqi battalions U.S. commanders requested showed up, according to Pentagon officials.

The mission

What would the mission be — more training of Iraqi troops, more fighting, or both — and how would success or failure be measured?

For the last year, the Pentagon has been stressing the training of Iraqi forces so they can lead the fight.

On the surface, this appears to be working. Army Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, spokesman for the Multinational Force in Iraq, recently said 80% of Iraq's army divisions are now responsible for their own battle space compared with 10% last year.

And yet every death rate — for U.S. troops, Iraqi forces and civilians — has gone up.

If the new mission is to secure Baghdad, American troops are likely in for some tough urban combat.

Retired Army Gen. Jack Keane, former vice chief of staff for the U.S. Army and an advocate of an aggressive troop surge, said retaking the streets of Baghdad would inevitably entail "clearing neighborhoods ... and that's house by house."

The militias

Would U.S. troops be able to engage the mostly Shiite militias now running death squads in Baghdad? Should they?

Following a Thursday call between Bush and al-Maliki, White House spokesman Tony Snow said, "The prime minister stressed his determination to go after anybody responsible for violence — that would include not only insurgent groups and Saddam loyalists but also militias."

Who would do that? The mostly Shiite Iraqi forces that have allowed the death squads in Baghdad free run.

U.S. forces have twice openly confronted Shiite militias, once in combat and again with a network of roadblocks set up to look for a kidnapped Iraqi-American soldier. Both times they were ordered to stand down by Maliki, himself a Shiite.

The government

DOJ_NMG_0113394

The purpose behind a troop surge in Baghdad presumably would be to provide Iraq's besieged government some breathing room to make difficult decisions.

This was tried two years ago.

A U.S. troop surge to 159,000 for Iraq's historic first elections in January 2005 had a temporary calming effect. But the new government's failure to get moving politically gave the insurgency an opening that led to a three-month spike in violence.

It raises the question: What would be the plan for U.S. troops now if the government remains paralyzed as it has been for months?

Or worse, the government crumbles as it nearly did recently when a block of Shiite lawmakers walked out in protest of a meeting between al-Maliki and Bush.

Bush has promised only that any new mission will be "clear and specific and can be accomplished."

Bush Eyes A Troop Surge (NSDY)

By Craig Gordon,

Long Island Newsday, January 7, 2007

But Bush is expected to announce a troop "surge" as early as Wednesday, even though some military experts and politicians from both parties say the results could be disastrous: a higher U.S. body count, call-ups of overstretched reserve units, and an American military pushed to the breaking point.

Plus, many fear, it probably won't work.

There is little reason to think a relative handful of troops could do what 140,000 U.S. troops have failed to achieve so far, especially in Baghdad, where 2006 was the deadliest year on record despite two previous military surges, these experts say.

"Breathing space"

Adding 20,000 more troops "is not a change in strategy. If Bush thinks that's a change, shame on him," said retired Army Col. Robert Killebrew, a respected former military planner. "It doesn't change the thrust of the war."

An administration source yesterday said the surge was a way to create "breathing space" for Iraqi security forces to grow strong enough to protect against sectarian and insurgent attacks, which U.S. officials had hoped they would start doing by now.

Instead, the plan would have U.S. forces move into Iraqi neighborhoods and protect the locals, the source said. That's dangerous duty that would put the troops in the line of fire and, critics say, merely continue Iraqi dependence on U.S. help.

In many ways, a surge would amount to a repudiation of the administration's current strategy, which has focused heavily on reducing U.S. presence in Iraq by pulling back from the fight and turning over more and more security duties to Iraqi forces.

Bush also has signaled that he will offer a massive economic and reconstruction aid package for Iraq, and propose an increase in funds that commanders on the ground can use for small local projects to build goodwill.

Even supporters of the plan paint it as essentially Bush's last stand: one final, high-stakes bid to salvage something approaching victory.

Now those supporters, including presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), fear Bush will back down in the face of opposition from Democratic leaders and some Republicans -- sending too few troops for too short a time to do any good.

"It has to be significant and sustained. Otherwise, do not do it," McCain said Friday. "Otherwise, there will be more needless loss of American lives."

How much is enough?

McCain and other supporters suggest that 20,000 to 30,000 troops are the minimum needed, and that they should stay 18 months to two years, a dramatic reversal of proposals last year that would have had troops coming home, not going in.

But supporters of a surge fear that Bush may consider as few as 10,000 troops for as little as six months, a more politically palatable approach.

The White House has been tight-lipped about Bush's thinking, but defense sources say he ultimately could tap as many as five brigades to reach a 20,000-troop increase. Another plan under consideration calls for an initial push of two or three Army brigades into Baghdad, around 10,000 troops, and two Marine battalions into the Sunni insurgent hotbed in Anbar province, about 1,500 troops, defense officials said.

Any surge would be accomplished by speeding up the arrival of Army brigades, extending their tours from 12 months to 15 months, and lengthening the tours of Marine units already in Iraq from seven months to 10 or 12 months, sources said.

But any such plan is full of potential pitfalls, experts say -- mainly, the Pentagon's difficulty sustaining any troop increase into late 2007 and 2008. Already some Army units alternate between one year in Iraq and a little more than a year at home -- not the two years between tours the Pentagon once promised.

DOJ_NMG_0113395

"The issue isn't whether you can scare up 20,000 troops. The issue is, for how long?" said Loren Thompson, a military analyst with the conservative Lexington Institute think tank. "You just reach a point where the force barely can go home."

"No guarantee for success"

In a meeting with senators Friday, Bush pledged that any U.S. increase in Iraq would happen only if the Iraqi government stepped up its own efforts to rein in violence -- but the Iraqis have repeatedly failed to do their part.

During the most recent military push in Baghdad -- a plan Bush himself once heralded as a key step to improving security -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government provided only one-third of the troops it had promised, said one source familiar with the operation. This time, al-Maliki is pledging to send three Iraqi brigades to supplement additional U.S. forces.

Top Democratic leaders Friday urged Bush to abandon the notion of a surge. Even McCain, whose support for the idea seems like political poison for a man who wants to be president, is clear that it might not work.

A surge "will mean more casualties and extra hardships for our brave fighting men and women, and the violence may get worse before it gets better," McCain said. "We have to be prepared for this. ... Even if we send additional troops to Iraq in large numbers for a sustained period, there is no guarantee for success in Iraq."

Iraq Will Be Petraeus's Knot To Untie (WP)

By Rick Atkinson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

General Known to See Peace as Still Possible

Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who is President Bush's choice to become the top U.S. military commander in Iraq, posed a riddle during the initial march to Baghdad four years ago that now becomes his own conundrum to solve: "Tell me how this ends."

That query, uttered repeatedly to a reporter then embedded in Petraeus's 101st Airborne Division, revealed a flinty skepticism about prospects in Iraq -- and the man now asked to forestall a military debacle.

Long recognized as one of the Army's premier intellectuals, with a PhD from Princeton to complement his West Point education, Petraeus, 54, will inherit one of the toughest assignments handed any senior officer since the Vietnam War. He takes command of 132,000 U.S. troops in a country shattered by insurgency and sectarian bloodletting, with a home front that is divided and disheartened after 3,000 American combat deaths. If his riddle of 2003 remains apt, so does the headline on a Newsweek cover story about Petraeus in July 2004: "Can This Man Save Iraq?"

Skepticism is rife, inside and outside the Army. "Petraeus is being given a losing hand. I say that reluctantly. The war is unmistakably going in the wrong direction," retired Army Gen. Barry R. McCaffrey said in an interview yesterday. "The only good news in all this is that Petraeus is so incredibly intelligent and creative. . . . I'm sure he'll say to himself, 'I'm not going to be the last soldier off the roof of the embassy in the Green Zone.' "

Petraeus, if controversial among some peers who deem him arrogant or excessively ambitious, is seen by many others as perhaps the last, best hope for success in Iraq. "If anyone can pick up the baton and run with it, it is David Petraeus," said retired Gen. Gordon R. Sullivan, a former Army chief of staff.

After spending 2 1/2 of the past four years in Iraq, as a division commander and then as the officer overseeing the initial reconstruction of Iraqi security forces, Petraeus is known to believe that a stable, pacified Iraq is still possible -- if not probable -- but not without dramatically improved security. Having also served in Bosnia after the catastrophic civil war there, he has told friends that he sees troubling parallels between that country and Iraq. Two months ago, he said, "I actually stay awake occasionally at night trying to figure out the path ahead."

Upon Senate confirmation and the receipt of his fourth star, making him a full general, he is expected to spend some weeks assessing conditions in Iraq and drafting a strategic plan that goes beyond the current debate over whether to increase U.S. troop levels by up to five brigades, roughly 20,000 troops. That "surge" is consistent with the military's new counterinsurgency manual, much of which Petraeus wrote, which stresses protecting the indigenous population and imposing security as a condition for stability.

One of Petraeus's longtime Army patrons, now-retired Gen. Jack Keane, has advocated an even larger deployment this spring. But many strategists say such an increase is pointless without a sweeping economic reconstruction program and a robust rearmament of the Iraqi army with artillery, attack helicopters and other heavy weapons.

Many also say the additional forces to be used in any troop increase are already badly worn down by the military's intense operational tempo since the first deployments to Afghanistan in 2001. The new Democratic leadership in Congress on Friday pointedly rejected even a short-term escalation in U.S. forces in Iraq.

These problems and more confront Petraeus, who has told friends that he has no illusions about the complexity of the job at hand. Unaccustomed to failure, he is, in the words of one former aide, "the most competitive man on the planet." The son of a

Dutch sea captain who took refuge in New York during World War II, Petraeus grew up in Cornwall on Hudson, a few miles outside the gates of the U.S. Military Academy, which he entered as a new cadet in July 1970.

"A striver to the max, Dave was always 'going for it' in sports, academics, leadership, and even his social life," the West Point yearbook noted in 1974. A month after graduation, he married Holly Knowlton, the daughter of the academy superintendent. They have two grown children.

As a young lieutenant, Petraeus entered an Army battered by defeat in Vietnam and badly frayed by drugs, lack of discipline and the American public's diminished esteem for the military. Accolades and achievements followed as he moved from post to post. Petraeus received all three prizes awarded in his class at Ranger School, perhaps the Army's toughest physical and psychological challenge, and he later won the George C. Marshall award as the top graduate in the Army Command and General Staff College class of 1983.

As he rose through the ranks, Petraeus alternated command and staff assignments with duty as an aide to several of the Army's most prominent four-star generals, a pattern that caused one envious peer to call him a "professional son." At Princeton University, Petraeus's dissertation, "The American Military and the Lessons of Vietnam," examined the caution that seized the high command after the war.

His intensity, cutting intellect and competitiveness have rubbed some officers the wrong way. Muttered jibes about "King David" have been heard around his command post. He remains obsessive about what he calls "the P.T. culture" -- physical training -- and has been known to challenge soldiers half his age to various athletic competitions. "If anyone beats him in the shorter runs, four miles or so, he takes them out for 10 miles and smokes them," a staff officer observed several years ago. At 5-foot-9 and 155 pounds, Petraeus evokes George Bernard Shaw's description of the British general Bernard L. Montgomery: "an intensely compacted hank of wire."

Twice, accidents almost ended his career, or even his life. In 1991, as a battalion commander at Fort Campbell, Ky., he was shot in the chest with an M-16 rifle when a soldier tripped during a training exercise. Rushed into surgery at Vanderbilt University Medical Center in Nashville, he underwent five hours of surgery by Bill Frist, who a decade later became Senate majority leader. While skydiving in 2000, Petraeus survived the abrupt collapse of his parachute 60 feet up. His shattered pelvis was reassembled with a plate and long screws.

As commander of the 101st Airborne, Petraeus saw combat for the first time during the division's drive up the Euphrates Valley, with sharp firefights in Najaf, Karbala and Hilla. But it was during the division's subsequent occupation of Mosul and northern Iraq that he won widespread acclaim by resurrecting the local economy, restoring services and preserving order with strategic force, which included killing Saddam Hussein's two sons. Posters in the division bivouacs read: "What have you done to win Iraqi hearts and minds today?"

More than 60 soldiers from the 101st died during the deployment, and upon bringing the division back to Kentucky in February 2004, Petraeus remarked, "It's been a long, tough year, and I am older in more ways than just age."

His subsequent service as commander of the Multi-National Security Transition Command, responsible for training Iraqi security forces, was another long, tough year -- that stretched to 15 months. Tens of thousands of Iraqi soldiers and police were trained, with concomitant efforts to supply infrastructure, equipment and procedures. But the project at best remains an imperiled work in progress, with alarming signs of sectarian fractures spreading through the Iraqi security institutions that Petraeus is known to consider as crucial to restoring stability there as any additional coalition forces could be.

Both long stints in Iraq have given Petraeus an intimate knowledge of the country's ethnic fractures and the limits of American influence. "A certain degree of intellectual humility is a good thing," he once told a reporter. "There aren't always a hell of a lot of absolutely right answers out there."

His cordial relations with the media, and the Newsweek cover story that depicted him as a potential savior for the Bush administration, rankled some of his superiors in the Pentagon, according to two now-retired senior generals. When Petraeus was sent to command the U.S. Army Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., in 2005, some of his peers wondered whether his career was in eclipse.

In asking that nettlesome question four years ago -- "Tell me how this ends" -- Petraeus alluded to the advice supposedly given President Dwight D. Eisenhower in the mid-1950s when he asked what it would take for the U.S. military to save the beleaguered French colonial empire in war-torn Vietnam: "Eight years and eight divisions."

With only ten divisions now in the U.S. Army, and the American public's patience ebbing, Petraeus recently acknowledged that such a prescription is not likely to be any more acceptable today than it was in the 1950s.

Conrad C. Crane, a West Point classmate of Petraeus's who last year helped him write the new counterinsurgency manual, said: "There have been situations in our history where American generals were given tough problems to resolve, like Lincoln grabbing U.S. Grant in 1864. Those situations have all demanded steadfastness, fortitude, initiative and creativity. It will take all those traits in Baghdad.

"We've got a big problem," Crane added. "He's the right guy to fix it. If anybody can fix this, he can."

A Change Of Course: Pelosi And New Democratic Congress May Face Crucial Test Over Iraq (SFC)

By Marc Sandalow

San Francisco Chronicle, January 7, 2007

Washington -- President Bush and the new Congress are on a collision course over Iraq that could overshadow the Democrats' "100-hour agenda" and end up defining Rep. Nancy Pelosi's tenure as House speaker.

Even as the House takes steps this week to raise the minimum wage, expand stem cell research, strengthen homeland security and lower prescription drug prices -- an ambitious lineup -- much of the nation's focus will be on Bush, who is expected to deliver a major address to outline the future of American involvement in Iraq.

If the president, as expected, announces his intention to deploy as many as 20,000 additional U.S. troops in Iraq, he may encounter widespread political and public defiance.

It will quickly test the new Democratic majority's capacity to stand up to the commander in chief in a time of war, and the ability of the legislative branch to seize control of the White House's controversial foreign policy.

"This war needs to come to an end. It is my highest priority as speaker," Pelosi said Friday after less than 24 hours on the job. "The president is going to have to step back. Up until now, his judgment has been severely impaired on this war in Iraq."

But the issue has been vexing to Congress, which has limited foreign policy options and has traditionally played a secondary role to the president. And Democrats are far more united in opposing Bush's war policy than in coalescing around an alternative.

It is with good reason that Iraq is not on Pelosi's 100-hour agenda -- legislation that she intends to have the House pass before the president delivers his State of the Union address later this month. Democrats are nearly unanimous in their support of the mostly domestic agenda, but they do not share a consensus on what to do next in Iraq, beyond a broad sense that the United States must begin to scale back.

"Democrats as a caucus have much more consensus around these economic issues," said Roger Hickey, co-director of the Campaign for America's Future, a liberal advocacy group, during an interview on the public radio program "Democracy Now."

Bush has been inviting lawmakers from both parties to the White House to discuss the future in Iraq. None has emerged with the impression that scaling back U.S. involvement is a leading option for the president. As Bush rattled off areas of potential agreement and bipartisan promise during his Saturday radio address, he did not mention Iraq.

Opposition to the war and Bush's approach in Iraq appeared to play a significant role in the Democrats' electoral success in November. Pelosi, as she assumed the speakership Thursday, declared that "nowhere were the American people more clear about the need for a new direction than in Iraq."

Sitting down with a small group of San Francisco journalists in her new office Friday, Pelosi bristled when a reporter said he wanted to change the subject from war to ethics.

"Wait a minute," Pelosi interrupted. "I believe the biggest ethical issue in this country is the war in Iraq. How we went there; how we put our troops out there without the equipment they needed; how, when they have given their all -- and they did their job very well -- they were abandoned in terms of political and diplomatic initiatives that are necessary to accompany a military effort."

As Pelosi's No. 1 priority, a change in the course of the war would be trumpeted as a great accomplishment. And while failure in Iraq might be blamed primarily on Bush and impair the GOP's ability to hold onto the White House in the 2008 election, it would also raise questions about whether Democrats were able to keep their pledge to usher in a new direction.

"The people have spoken. They expect change," said Rep. Barbara Lee, D-Oakland, one of the founders of the Out of Iraq caucus in the House.

For now, Democrats are counting on growing public opposition and congressional oversight to force that change.

Pelosi has held open the possibility of attaching conditions to the Pentagon's appropriation bill, which the House expects to receive in the next few weeks. And Democrats have scheduled at least five hearings on Iraq this week, three in the Senate and two in the House.

"Making policy openly, with transparency and accountability, will help," said Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Los Angeles, whose committee on government reform is expected to scrutinize Iraq contracts received by Halliburton and other private companies.

DOJ_NMG_0113398

"They haven't been answering the tough questions," Waxman said, noting that Rep. Ike Skelton, the Missouri Democrat and new chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, never received a reply when he sent the White House a letter shortly after the start of the war asking about follow-through plans.

"Now you can be certain he will get an answer," Waxman said.

But Pelosi has ruled out using what many believe is the legislative branch's most potent weapon -- its ability to cut off the funds with which the Pentagon wages war. Congress took such an approach at the very end of the Vietnam War, though the United States had already committed to leaving.

A growing number of peace organizations, and a few members of Congress, have been promoting such a direction as the only way to force Bush to change course.

Pelosi said to cut the money supply could be dangerous to American troops in that the Pentagon could continue to wage war without the proper equipment.

"You have to face the ramifications of your decision. You can't just say, 'OK, let's cut if off, but I don't mean to hurt the troops,' " Pelosi said.

Bush has shown little sign that the November election will change his thinking on the almost 4-year-old war.

"I don't know if (voters) said, 'Come home and leave behind an Iraq that could end up being a safe haven for al Qaeda.' I don't believe they said that," the president said in a news conference the day after the vote.

In the buildup to Bush's speech -- which may come Wednesday, although a time and a place have yet to be announced -- White House press secretary Tony Snow has avoided answering questions about how the president could escalate a war after what appeared to be a rejection of his policy. Polls show about 3 of 4 Americans oppose the president's efforts in Iraq and fewer than 1 in 5 support a surge of troops.

"What you're doing is, you're asking me, 'Is the president concerned about the public-opinion ramifications of a policy that he may or may not have chosen?' When the president chooses a policy, we can do the public polling questions. I think at this point it's preliminary," Snow said Friday.

But most observers foresee an intensified struggle between Bush and Congress.

"We can see a major clash coming between a Democratic Congress and the administration on this very, very fundamental issue," said Bruce Riedel, a former member of Bush's National Security Council and now a fellow at the Brookings Institution. "Not only do most Democrats on the Hill oppose the surge or have serious doubts about it, but more and more Republicans have doubts about the wisdom of the surge."

Even as the Democrats schedule votes on domestic issues for the rest of the month, Pelosi believes the new congressional scrutiny on Bush's Iraq policy will pressure lawmakers of both parties to join her demand for change.

"The opposition to the war and the call for change is coming from the American people," the speaker said.

"Nothing is more eloquent to a member of Congress than the voice of his or her constituents."

Sen. Lieberman Goes His Independent Way (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

He Calls for "Substantial" Troop Increase in Iraq

Standing under the grand dome of the Library of Congress on Friday, the three top Senate Democrats bitterly condemned sending more U.S. troops to Iraq, as President Bush is now considering.

"A bad idea," said Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.).

"A huge mistake," warned Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin (Ill.).

"Makes no sense whatsoever," fumed Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.).

Across town an hour earlier, at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, Connecticut Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman shared his own thoughts on Bush's plan. "We need an increase in troops there now," he asserted before an audience of military experts and academics. "It must be substantial, and it must be sustained."

Lieberman was sworn in last week as the chamber's one and only "independent Democrat," with the emphasis on "independent." On most issues, including big domestic priorities, he expects to vote as he has for the past 18 years, as a loyal Democrat. But on Iraq, Lieberman is more in sync with Bush than are many Republicans. He is a passionate defender of the war as a death struggle against Islamic terrorism.

The November election swept Republicans out of power in Congress and signaled that voters are deeply unhappy about the course of the Iraq war. The asterisk is Lieberman, who won a fourth term in an antiwar state with strong support from Republican and unaffiliated voters.

DOJ_NMG_0113399

That has given Lieberman a mandate to be the man in the middle, an essential player to both parties while beholden to neither. Lately he has dropped the "Democrat" half of his affiliation, describing himself at the Friday event merely as an independent. He even holds out the possibility that he would back a supporter of the Iraq war, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), in the 2008 presidential race -- although his Connecticut colleague, Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (D), also may be running.

"I've had a very political two years, so I'm staying out of it for now," Lieberman demurred after his AEI address. "But you know, I'm independent, and I'm just going to watch it develop for a while. I'm going to support who's best for the country. But I wouldn't exclude the possibility" of endorsing McCain.

Bush is considering a temporary increase in U.S. force levels as he prepares to deliver a major speech on Iraq policy this week. Reid and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) told the president in a letter Friday that they oppose the idea.

"There is no military solution in Iraq, only a political solution," Reid said. "Adding more combat troops to this civil war undermines our efforts to get the Iraqis to take responsibility for the future."

Lieberman got a hearty laugh at the AEI event when asked to comment on the Reid-Pelosi letter. "Speaking as an independent," he said with a smile, "needless to say, I respectfully disagree."

For Lieberman and McCain, the big worry is that Bush will order too small a troop increase to make a difference. "Unless you believe all is lost, we've got to do everything we can to win," Lieberman said.

Upon hearing of his colleague's comments, Durbin sighed and shook his head. "Joe Lieberman said that?" he asked.

Democrats grumble off the record that Lieberman is muddying an increasingly unified Democratic message on Iraq, but their public comments are cautious and generally complimentary. They pretended not to notice his brief appearance at the Library of Congress retreat, which overlapped with the AEI forum.

"It's important to hear a lot of views, which is quite different from what happens in the White House," Schumer said. Or, as Reid put it: "Joe Lieberman could so easily be with us, but he doesn't want to be. I respect that. He's a good man."

On Dec. 29, during a quiet holiday week in Washington, Lieberman published an opinion piece in The Washington Post headlined, "Why We Need More Troops in Iraq." It recalled an earlier Lieberman op-ed, published in the Wall Street Journal on Nov. 29, 2005, headlined, "Our Troops Must Stay." That piece, which undercut a growing Democratic call for a withdrawal from Iraq, spurred antiwar candidate Ned Lamont to challenge Lieberman in last summer's Democratic primary. Lamont, a Greenwich millionaire and political neophyte, wound up winning the primary.

Lieberman's opposition to an Iraq withdrawal was not a radical position. It followed mainstream Republican thinking, and some Democrats shared the view. Sending more troops to Iraq is proving far more controversial. Two GOP senators who face potentially tough 2008 reelections, Norm Coleman of Minnesota and Susan Collins of Maine, have already said they oppose it. Other Republicans have expressed strong reservations.

One Lieberman trait that particularly rankles Democrats is his abiding loyalty to Bush. A few days after the Wall Street Journal published the senator's op-ed piece, Lieberman lectured at a foreign policy conference. "It is time for Democrats who distrust President Bush to acknowledge that he will be commander in chief for three more critical years," he said, "and that in matters of war we undermine presidential credibility at our nation's peril."

The senator was a bit more measured Friday, but his point was clear.

"The president of the United States gets this," Lieberman said. "I think he sees the moment that we are at in the larger war on terrorism and the significance of how we conclude the war in Iraq, how devastating it would be to the Iraqis, to the Middle East, to America if we simply withdrew. He needs our support."

A "Surge" In Iraq? (WP)

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

A troop increase that few in the Pentagon, Congress or the Iraqi government really want

PRESIDENT BUSH is widely expected to unveil a new strategy for Iraq this week that will include a substantial increase in U.S. troops. If he does, he will face a formidable task in convincing Congress and the public that such a "surge" makes sense. It's well known that many senior American generals, including the outgoing commanders of American forces in Iraq and the Middle East, have resisted a troop increase. The Iraqi government of Nouri al-Maliki appears, at best, lukewarm. Mr. Maliki's own plan, like that of the Iraq Study Group, calls for Iraqi forces to take over most of the fighting in the coming months. A majority of the new Congress, and most Americans, favor a winding down of the U.S. troop commitment, not an escalation.

Mr. Bush's first challenge if he proposes a surge will consequently be to convince the country that the fresh troops would have a vital and achievable mission. Those who have been arguing for the move -- notably, Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) -- say the purpose would be to pacify those sectors of Baghdad where sectarian fighting has been most intense. They argue that the main U.S. goal in Iraq, which is to forge a stable and sustainable government, can't be achieved unless there is a minimal level of security in the capital. The Iraqi army isn't yet able to impose order, they say; if the United States doesn't do it, the sectarian warfare will continue to escalate. Without a surge, Mr. McCain and Mr. Lieberman warn, the war will be lost.

This is a serious argument, and the two senators have been principled and even courageous in making it. But several questions give us pause. One is whether the administration and the Army will have the political and logistical capacity to carry out the sort of surge that the senators, and experts at the conservative American Enterprise Institute who support them, say is necessary: Total U.S. forces in Iraq would grow from fewer than 140,000 to as many as 175,000 and remain at that level indefinitely. Such a deployment would place severe new strains on the Army and probably require the alteration of Pentagon rules limiting the deployments of reservists. Some reports have said the administration is considering a more modest increase, both in numbers and in length of deployment. Mr. McCain says that would doom the strategy to failure.

There's no guarantee that the new American forces could stop the mayhem in Baghdad. But let's assume violence did plummet: The logic of the surge assumes that while U.S. soldiers ensured security, Iraq's Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish factions could be pressured into political accord. Yet given their recent behavior, it's hard to believe that the political leadership of any of Iraq's main factions is ready for compromise -- or will be during the limited window created by the surge. While Mr. Maliki occasionally speaks of accord, his government has pursued a sectarian agenda. If U.S. troops pacify Baghdad, Shiite politicians in the government may feel less rather than more pressure to compromise.

The constructive alternative to a surge is not the abandonment of Iraq. Instead, it is the fashioning of a strategy that positions the United States to support the country's moderate forces over the long term -- not just 18 months but the years that may pass before the country can be stabilized. That means a smaller and sustainable military force that can focus on training and backing up the Iraqi army and fighting al-Qaeda, and an aid program that supports the elected government while seeking to marginalize its extremist elements.

The Iraq Study Group, the Maliki government and outgoing U.S. military commanders seemed to converge on this approach. Should he embrace it, President Bush would have a good chance of achieving a broad consensus on Iraq policy, something that is desperately needed if U.S. involvement -- and the painful loss of American lives -- is going to continue. If he chooses escalation, Mr. Bush will have to work a lot harder than he has before to explain the mission that justifies the risk and to build support in Congress and with the public.

The Timely Death Of Gerald Ford (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

THE very strange and very long Gerald Ford funeral marathon was about many things, but Gerald Ford wasn't always paramount among them.

Forty percent of today's American population was not alive during the Ford presidency. The remaining 60 percent probably spent less time recollecting his unelected 29-month term than they did James Brown's "Papa's Got a Brand New Bag." Despite the lachrymose logorrhea of television anchors and the somber musical fanfares, the country was less likely to be found in deep mourning than in deep football. It's a safe bet that the Ford funeral attracted far fewer viewers than the most consequential death video of the New Year's weekend, the lynching of Saddam Hussein. But those two deaths were inextricably related: it was in tandem that they created a funereal mood that left us mourning for our own historical moment more than for Mr. Ford.

What the Ford obsequies were most about was the Beltway establishment's grim verdict on George W. Bush and his war in Iraq. Every Ford attribute, big and small, was trotted out by Washington eulogists with a wink, as an implicit rebuke of the White House's current occupant. Mr. Ford was a healer, not a partisan divider. He was an all-American football star, not a cheerleader. He didn't fritter away time on pranks at his college fraternity, Delta Kappa Epsilon, because he had to work his way through school as a dishwasher. He was in the top third of his class at Yale Law. He fought his way into dangerous combat service during World War II rather than accept his cushy original posting. He was pals with reporters and Democrats. He encouraged dissent in his inner circle. He had no enemies, no ego, no agenda, no ideology, no concern for his image. He described himself as "a Ford, not a Lincoln," rather than likening himself to, say, Truman.

Under the guise of not speaking ill of a dead president, the bevy of bloviators so relentlessly trashed the living incumbent that it bordered on farce. No wonder President Bush, who once hustled from Crawford to Washington to sign a bill interfering in Terri Schiavo's medical treatment, remained at his ranch last weekend rather than join Betty Ford and Dick Cheney for the state ceremony in the Capitol rotunda.

Yet for all the media acreage bestowed on the funeral, the day in Mr. Ford's presidency that most stalks Mr. Bush was given surprisingly short shrift — perhaps because it was the most painful. That day was not Sept. 8, 1974, when Mr. Ford pardoned his predecessor, but April 30, 1975, when the last American helicopters hightailed it out of Saigon, ending our involvement in a catastrophic war. Mr. Ford had been a consistent Vietnam hawk, but upon inheriting the final throes of the fiasco, he recognized reality when he saw it.

Just how much so can be found in a prescient speech that Mr. Ford gave a week before our clamorous Saigon exit. (And a speech prescient on other fronts, too: he called making "America independent of foreign energy sources by 1985" an urgent priority.) Speaking at Tulane University, Mr. Ford said, "America can regain the sense of pride that existed before Vietnam" but not "by refighting a war that is finished as far as America is concerned." He added: "We, of course, are saddened indeed by the events in Indochina. But these events, tragic as they are, portend neither the end of the world nor of America's leadership in the world."

All of this proved correct, and though Mr. Ford made a doomed last-ditch effort to secure more financial aid for Saigon, he could and did do nothing to stop the inevitable. He knew it was way too late to make the symbolic gesture of trying to toss fresh American troops on the pyre. "We can and we should help others to help themselves," he said in New Orleans. "But the fate of responsible men and women everywhere, in the final decision, rests in their own hands, not in ours."

Though Mr. Ford was hardly the unalloyed saint of last week's pageantry, his words and actions in 1975 should weigh heavily upon us even as our current president remains oblivious. As Mr. Ford's presidential history is hard to separate from the Bush inversion of it, so it is difficult to separate that indelible melee in Saigon from the Hussein video. Both are terrifying, and for the same reason.

The awful power of the Hussein snuff film derives not just from its illustration of the barbarity of capital punishment, even in a case where the condemned is a mass murderer undeserving of pity. What really makes the video terrifying is its glimpse into the abyss of an irreversible and lethal breakdown in civic order. It sends the same message as those images of helicopters fleeing our embassy in April 1975: Iraq, like Vietnam before it, is in chaos, beyond the control of our government or the regime we're desperately trying to prop up. The security apparatus of Iraq's "unity government" was powerless to prevent the video, let alone the chaos, and can't even get its story straight about what happened and why.

Actually, it's even worse than that. Perhaps the video's most chilling notes are the chants of "Moktada! Moktada! Moktada!" They are further confirmation, as if any were needed, that our principal achievement in Iraq over four years has been to empower a jihadist mini-Saddam in place of the secular original. The radical cleric Moktada al-Sadr, an ally of Hezbollah and Hamas, is a thug responsible for the deaths of untold Iraqis and Americans alike. It was his forces, to take just one representative example, that killed Cindy Sheehan's son, among many others, in one of two Shiite uprisings in 2004.

The day after Casey Sheehan's slaughter, Dan Senor, the spokesman for the American occupation, presided over a Green Zone news conference promising Mr. Sadr's woefully belated arrest on a months-old warrant for his likely role in the earlier assassination of Abdel Majid al-Khoei, a rival Shiite who had fiercely opposed Saddam. Today Mr. Sadr and his forces control 30 seats in the Iraqi Parliament, four government ministries, and death squads (a k a militias) more powerful than the nominal Iraqi army. He is the puppetmaster who really controls Nuri al-Maliki — the Iraqi prime minister embraced by Mr. Bush — even to the point of inducing Mr. Maliki to shut down a search for an American soldier kidnapped at gunpoint in Sadr City in the fall. (And, you might ask, whatever happened to Mr. Senor? He's a Fox News talking head calling for a "surge" of American troops to clean up the botch he and his cohort left behind.) Only Joseph Heller could find the gallows humor in a moral disaster of these proportions.

It's against the backdrop of both the Hussein video and the Ford presidency that we must examine the prospect of that much-previewed "surge" in Iraq — a surge, by the way, that the press should start calling by its rightful name, escalation. As Mr. Ford had it, America cannot regain its pride by refighting a war that is finished as far as America is concerned and, for that matter, as far as Iraq is concerned. By large margins, the citizens of both countries want us not to escalate but to start disengaging. So do America's top military commanders, who are now being cast aside just as Gen. Eric Shinseki was when he dared assert before the invasion that securing Iraq would require several hundred thousand troops.

It would still take that many troops, not the 20,000 we might scrape together now. Last month the Army and Marines issued an updated field manual on counterinsurgency (PDF) supervised by none other than Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, the next top American military commander in Iraq. It endorsed the formula that "20 counterinsurgents per 1,000 residents" is "the minimum troop density required." By that yardstick, it would take the addition of 100,000-plus troops to secure Baghdad alone.

The "surge," then, is a sham. It is not meant to achieve that undefined "victory" Mr. Bush keeps talking about but to serve his own political spin. His real mission is to float the "we're not winning, we're not losing" status quo until Jan. 20, 2009. After that, as Joseph Biden put it last week, a new president will "be the guy landing helicopters inside the Green Zone, taking people off the roof." This is nothing but a replay of the cynical Nixon-Kissinger "decent interval" exit strategy concocted to pass the political buck (to Mr. Ford, as it happened) on Vietnam.

DOJ_NMG_0113402

As the White House tries to sell this flimflam, picture fresh American troops being tossed into Baghdad's caldron to work alongside the Maliki-Sadr Shiite lynch mob that presided over the Saddam hanging. Contemplate as well Gerald Ford's most famous words, spoken as he assumed the presidency after the Nixon resignation: "Our Constitution works; our great republic is a government of laws and not of men. Here the people rule."

This time the people do not rule. Two months after Americans spoke decisively on Election Day, the president is determined to overrule them. Our long national nightmare in Iraq, far from being over, is about to get a second wind.

Making The Surge Work (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

Picture the person you love most in the world. Now imagine that person shredded by a bomb or dropped off one morning in the gutter with holes drilled through the back of the head. Imagine your lifelong rage, and the terror of not knowing who will die next. Now imagine this has happened to someone in nearly every family on your block, and on the next block, and in the whole town.

This is Iraqi society.

And yet Gen. George Casey and Gen. John Abizaid wanted to put the burden of nation-building on the victims and initiators of this maelstrom. U.S. war strategy for the past three years has been to lighten the American footprint in Iraq and compel Iraqis to undertake the policing tasks we ourselves couldn't accomplish.

Over this time a chorus has arisen to oppose this strategy. The members of this chorus — John McCain, The Weekly Standard, whispering dissenters in the middling rankings of the military — argue that it's simply unrealistic to expect human beings in these circumstances to become impartial nation-builders. These dissenters have argued, since the summer of 2003, that the U.S. must commit more troops to establish security before anything else becomes possible.

For over three years, President Bush sided with the light-footprint school. He did so for personal reasons, not military ones. Casey and Abizaid are impressive men, and Bush deferred to their judgment.

But sometimes good men make bad choices, and it is now clear that the light-footprint approach has been a disaster. If the U.S. had committed more troops and established security back in 2003, when, as Fareed Zakaria of Newsweek recently reminded us, the Coalition Provisional Authority had 70 percent approval ratings, history would be different.

It is now 2007, and President Bush has finally replaced Donald Rumsfeld, Casey and Abizaid. The question now is whether the policy that should have been implemented in 2003 can still be implemented four years on — after so many thousands have died.

Many in and out of the administration think so, hence all the talk about a surge — putting 20,000 more troops into Baghdad, finally occupying the dangerous neighborhoods, finally starting a jobs program, finally forcing national reconciliation.

Unfortunately, if the goal is to create a stable, unified Iraq, the surge is a good policy three years too late. For that surge to succeed now, it would have to accomplish the following tasks: compel the Maliki government to deliver public services in a nonsectarian way; convert the Shiite theocrats who now dominate the Iraqi government into ecumenical multiculturalists; persuade the rabid Sunni leaders to accept a dependent role in the new Iraq; induce the traumatized Iraqi people to hang together as the blood flows; sustain, over 18 months, American political support for an arduous policy that begins with a 17 percent approval rating.

The odds that the surge can accomplish these tasks are vanishingly small. The tragic truth is that the social context for this military strategy has changed since 2003.

But another surge may be realistic. This surge would begin by giving up the dream of national reconciliation and acknowledging that Iraq is in the process of dividing itself.

As the best reporting from Baghdad makes clear, today's Iraqi leaders have little interest in healing the Sunni-Shiite divide. People are retreating to their sectarian homelands by the tens of thousands. In an ever-radicalizing climate, the Sadrs are supplanting the Sistanis, and genocidal Sunni leaders are replacing the merely racist ones.

Perhaps, in other words, it's time to merge the military Plan B — the surge — with a political Plan B — flexible decentralization. That would mean using adequate force levels (finally!) to help those who are returning to sectarian homelands. It would mean erecting buffers between populations where possible and establishing order in areas that remain mixed. It would mean finding decentralized governing structures that reflect the social and psychological facts on the ground.

The record shows that in sufficient numbers and with sufficient staying power, U.S. troops can suppress violence. Perhaps more U.S. troops can create a climate in which decentralized arrangements can evolve.

DOJ_NMG_0113403

We can't turn back time. But if the disintegration of Iraqi society would be a political and humanitarian disaster, perhaps we should finally commit military resources, and create a political strategy, commensurate with the task of salvaging something.

Clarity On Iraq, And Beyond (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 7, 2007

President Bush's choices on Iraq come down to two: clarity, or continued confusion of goals, methods and priorities. His impending address to the nation will reveal which choice he has made. It will also mold his foreign policy agenda for the gathering twilight of his presidency.

Bush will signal whether Iraq will remain the center of his grand designs for the Middle East or will recede to being one more troublesome conflict in a zone of deadly turbulence and trade-offs. Events, and one key aide, point Bush toward the latter course, with its promise of salvaging his legacy elsewhere.

The aide is Condoleezza Rice, who has developed a personal exit strategy for Iraq. She is tossing that reputation-damaging hot potato to John Negroponte, a former ambassador to Baghdad who is resigning as director of national intelligence to become Rice's deputy at the State Department.

His arrival will allow Rice to continue her minimalist personal engagement with Iraq. She will focus her considerable management skills instead on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. A day or so after the president's midweek speech, she will embark on a high-profile Middle Eastern trip dedicated to reviving the two-state solution Bush has endorsed.

Negroponte's move -- which may enhance the influence of new Defense Secretary Robert Gates, given his own intelligence background -- is a key element in the changes of military commanders and diplomats that have been unveiled to frame Bush's speech. But the president must not confuse the administration's organization chart with a blueprint for a way out of Iraq. Only clarity of purpose will lead to that outcome.

Here is a four-point program that Bush could adopt to clarify and bolster U.S. purposes, especially if he is going to "surge" more troops into the Iraq theater, as is widely anticipated:

Â· Bush should acknowledge that his hopes for establishing Iraq as a united, free-market democratic model for the Arab world have fallen far short. Iraqis have chosen a more violent, sectarian and decentralized national reality that they must now stabilize or destroy on their own.

The best way to dramatize that shift would be to call a one-month halt to U.S. offensive actions -- a truce, in effect -- and encourage Iraqis to do the same. This would facilitate the holding of a peace conference in Baghdad, in which blood-stained radicals such as Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr and Hadith al-Dari, the inflammatory voice of Sunni insurgents, would be asked to participate.

Â· Bush's speech should recognize that Iran has legitimate interests in security in Iraq and the Persian Gulf region, and he should pledge that the United States will not use Iraq as a springboard for action against the Iranian regime.

These implicit security guarantees -- if met by a proper response from Iran -- could be the basis for a broad U.S.-Iranian dialogue and an eventual regional conference to endorse and implement the work of the Baghdad conference.

Â· The United States should also be prepared to extend guarantees of territorial security for Arab states in the Gulf region. Bush should announce that he wants consultations with Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Egypt, Jordan and other Arab states -- as well as principal U.S. allies in Europe -- on extending a U.S. or NATO nuclear umbrella over friendly states in the Gulf.

This would be a direct defensive response to Iran's destructive drive for a nuclear program that can produce atomic weapons. U.S. guarantees would enable Arab states to forgo developing their own nuclear arsenals, just as the U.S.-Japan bilateral security treaty is intended to keep Japan nuclear-free.

Â· As the first president to have explicitly endorsed a Palestinian state, Bush should use Rice's new burst of Middle East activism to reinforce the changes in Iraq strategy his speech will disclose. U.S. officials hope Rice can get Israel to release 450 Palestinian prisoners soon as a first step toward Hamas giving up the kidnapped Israeli soldier it holds.

But this heavy new U.S. involvement in the peace process must be included, along with the nuclear guarantees and the Baghdad conference, in a binding U.S. offer to the region's Sunni rulers in return for their cooperation in calming Iraq now. Bush must show the Saudis, Jordanians and others that they have much to gain from cooperation and much to lose from continuing to tolerate or encourage the catalytic Sunni-initiated violence that is destroying Iraq and increasing Iran's influence.

There are many challenges to overcome in constructing this Grand Bargain. But proposing and pursuing it gives Bush his best opportunity to explain to Americans and the rest of the world the complicated and dangerous new realities that his policies have helped create. Desperate times demand desperate measures, and desperate speeches.

30 Dead In Baghdad Clash; Bodies Hanged On Lampposts (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 6 — A fierce clash left at least 30 people dead in central Baghdad late Saturday night as Iraqi Army forces fought with gunmen in an area where several residents had been killed and their bodies hanged from street lampposts, the Iraqi military said.

The fighting took place in the neighborhood around Haifa Street, a mostly Sunni Arab enclave with a small Shiite population.

A spokesman for the Defense Ministry, Muhammad al-Askari, said that an Iraqi Army unit had gone into the area after receiving reports that Sunni fighters had set up a fake security checkpoint and were taking Shiites aside and shooting them.

The bodies of many of those killed at the roadblock were then hanged from the lampposts, Mr. Askari said.

He said that Iraqi soldiers had moved in and surrounded the fighters at the checkpoint. In initial fighting there, 30 of the men were killed and several more were arrested, Mr. Askari said, adding that the neighborhood remained locked down. There was no way to verify the figures.

Residents living nearby said that they were hearing continued fighting through the night but that it was impossible to know precisely what was happening.

In the same neighborhood, there were reports of clashes as government forces moved to collect 27 bodies dumped behind a local hospital. But it was unclear whether the firefight with Iraqi troops was related.

The government said Saturday that 72 bodies were recovered around the city on Saturday, most showing signs of torture.

Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki announced Saturday the beginning of a new Baghdad security operation and promised to purge the government security forces of militia fighters and others with sectarian aims.

But Mr. Maliki has promised such a crackdown before, and his government has been increasingly seen by Sunnis in Iraq and abroad as dominated by Shiite interests.

Premier Promises Nonsectarian Campaign Against "Outlaws" in Baghdad

BAGHDAD, Jan. 6 -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki warned Baghdad residents Saturday to expect the disruptions of a heightened military presence and said his government was ready to launch the latest effort to pacify the violent Iraqi capital.

As if to punctuate the announcement, the Iraqi army clashed with insurgents in a Sunni Arab neighborhood on the west bank of the Tigris River in Baghdad. The fighting along Haifa Street, raging into the night, killed 30 insurgents, and Iraqi soldiers captured eight others, including five Sudanese fighters, Defense Ministry spokesman Mohammed al-Askari said.

Despite fierce ongoing fighting in western Iraq and violence capable of erupting almost anywhere, Baghdad remains the heart of the country's sectarian conflict. Maliki, in his speech at a morning ceremony honoring the Iraqi army, warned rival political parties against interfering in his plan, which Askari said would start "very soon."

"The Baghdad security plan will not offer a safe shelter for outlaws, regardless of their ethnic and political affiliations, and we will punish anyone who hesitates to implement orders because of his ethnic and political background," Maliki said.

Maliki's words appeared intended to counter the perception that the plan would focus on combating Sunni insurgents. An aide to Maliki, Hasan Suneid, a Shiite Muslim lawmaker, told the Associated Press that the Iraqi army would devote 20,000 additional troops to the capital and begin by combating Sunni insurgents in western Baghdad.

Askari said there would "definitely be more troops" but declined to provide a figure.

Maliki's speech provided few details about the tactical or strategic changes guiding the forthcoming effort. But his aides described an effort that relies on U.S. troops to combat Sunni insurgents on the outskirts of Baghdad. Those areas are where the Sunni insurgents plan and manufacture the deadly explosives that detonate regularly in the city.

"Maliki believes that it is in this ring that the attacks are coming from," one of his aides said.

The Iraqi forces would target the most violent neighborhoods, and commanders would have a greater degree of autonomy in their assigned sections of the city, Askari said.

Maliki believes that if the additional troops can effect a decrease in violence over the next two months, then he can negotiate more effectively with Shiite militia leaders in the city and improve his chances of disarming them, his aides said.

DOJ_NMG_0113405

The announcement was greeted with little enthusiasm in Baghdad, where sectarian killing has escalated despite repeated attempts at cracking down on insurgents and militiamen. During Operation Together Forward, an effort to secure the capital last summer, more than 10,000 additional U.S. and Iraqi soldiers failed to halt the worsening violence.

Wamid Nadhmi, a political analyst in Baghdad, said Maliki had promised several times to restore security in Baghdad and was now offering "a new plan, without explaining why the other plans were complete failures."

Alaa Makki, a leading Sunni lawmaker, said that in principle, he wants American troops pulled out of Iraq, but not during this "urgent emergency situation."

Without an effective Iraqi military, "we'll be left with a serious security vacuum and will be lost. It will be filled with forces that are already operating here," he said. "This is a necessary action now, and that's because really the previous plan failed to achieve success."

During the last Baghdad security plan, the Iraqi government pledged more troops than it provided. The number of new troops now being discussed, in the low tens of thousands, will probably not be able to "fundamentally change" the violent neighborhoods in Baghdad, said Anthony H. Cordesman, a military expert.

"You can win every tactical clash, but we couldn't be there in enough numbers" to create stability and foster economic development, said Cordesman, an analyst for the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "At some point, you've got to leave and go on to the next place."

A joint statement by the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, and Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, said that coalition troops "will provide appropriate assistance as determined by Iraqi and coalition field commanders, for the implementation of the new plan for securing Baghdad and its surrounding environs."

Violence flared Saturday after a relative lull last week during the Muslim holiday Eid al-Adha. Nearly 100 corpses were collected Saturday across the country, in addition to the fighting on Haifa Street, the Associated Press reported.

In the central Baghdad neighborhood of Karrada, a car bomb attack targeted the convoy of the commander of the Baghdad emergency police force, Ali al-Yassiri, said Col. Hassan Abdullah, an Interior Ministry duty officer. The explosion missed the police commander but killed two civilians and wounded three others.

The fighting on Haifa Street was not the start of Baghdad's security plan, said Askari, the Defense Ministry spokesman.

"It's not part of the Baghdad security plan. They were terrorists who set up imaginary checkpoints," he said. "We were there, and we arrested them and the clashes took place."

Offensive To Pacify Baghdad Begins (WT/AP)

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 7, 2007

BAGHDAD -- In the opening battle of a major drive to tame the violent capital, the Iraqi army reported it killed 30 militants yesterday in a firefight in a Sunni insurgent stronghold just north of the heavily fortified Green Zone.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, speaking only hours earlier at a ceremony marking the 85th anniversary of the Iraqi army, announced his intention for the open-ended attempt to crush the militant fighters who have left Baghdad in the grip of sectarian violence.

Hassan al-Suneid, a key aide and member of Mr. al-Maliki's Dawa Party, said the Iraqi leader had committed 20,000 soldiers to the operation and would call upon American troops and air power only when needed.

A stern Mr. al-Maliki told the nation the operation in Baghdad would continue "until all goals are achieved and security is ensured for all citizens."

"We are fully aware that implementing the plan will lead to some harassment for all beloved Baghdad residents, but we are confident they fully understand the brutal terrorist assault we all face," he said.

State television said eight militants, including five Sudanese fighters, were captured in the battle near Haifa Street, a Sunni insurgent stronghold on the west bank of the Tigris River, where police reported finding the bodies of 27 torture victims earlier in the day.

Police reported 97 persons were killed or found dead, 80 of them assassination victims dumped in Mosul, Baghdad and south of the capital.

Mr. al-Suneid, who is also a member of parliament, said the new drive would focus initially on Sunni insurgent strongholds in western Baghdad.

Sunnis were likely to object, given that a large measure of today's violence in Baghdad is the work of Shi'ite militias, loyal to Mr. al-Maliki's key political backer, the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

DOJ_NMG_0113406

Mr. al-Suneid and Mr. al-Maliki insisted that this drive to contain militants, as opposed to a largely ineffective joint operation with American forces in the second half of last year, would succeed because it would be in the hands of Iraqi commanders who have been promised American backup and air power if they call for it.

But U.S. political and military leaders -- in a message of congratulation on Iraq's Army Day -- tempered Iraqi claims of full independence.

"As stated by the prime minister today, [U.S. forces] will provide appropriate assistance as determined by Iraqi and [American] field commanders, for the implementation of the new plan for securing Baghdad and its surrounding environs," said the statement from U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and overall American commander Gen. George W. Casey.

Mr. al-Suneid said President Bush signed off on the plan when he and Mr. al-Maliki spoke by videoconference Thursday. The two leaders began formulating the operation during a November summit in Amman, Jordan.

Last summer, the U.S. military and Iraqi army flooded the capital with 12,000 additional troops.

The last half of 2006 was one of the most violent periods in the center and west of the country since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion to topple dictator Saddam Hussein.

Iraqi Army Says It Killed 30 Militants (AP)

AP, January 6, 2007

BAGHDAD (AP) — In the opening battle of a major drive to tame the violent capital, the Iraqi army reported it killed 30 militants Saturday in a firefight in a Sunni insurgent stronghold just north of the heavily fortified Green Zone.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, speaking only hours earlier at a ceremony marking the 85th anniversary of the Iraqi army, announced his intention for the open-ended attempt to crush the militant fighters who have left Baghdad in the grip of sectarian violence.

Hassan al-Suneid, a key aide and member of Maliki's Dawa Party, said the Iraqi leader had committed 20,000 soldiers to the operation and would call upon American troops and airpower only when needed.

A stern Maliki told the nation the operation in Baghdad would continue "until all goals are achieved and security is ensured for all citizens.

"We are fully aware that implementing the plan will lead to some harassment for all beloved Baghdad residents, but we are confident they fully understand the brutal terrorist assault we all face," he said.

State television said eight militants, including five Sudanese fighters, were captured in the battle near Haifa Street, a Sunni insurgent stronghold on the west bank of the Tigris where police reported finding the bodies of 27 torture victims earlier in the day.

Suneid, who is also a member of parliament, said the new drive would focus initially on Sunni insurgent strongholds in western Baghdad.

Sunnis were likely to object, given that a large measure of today's violence in Baghdad is the work of Shiite militias, loyal to Maliki's key political backer, the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

An Iraqi army general said commanders would operate independently, a sharp break with Iraqi military tradition of heavy central control, and would be held individually responsible for failure.

Any civilians carrying arms faced automatic detention, he said, and would be shot if they resisted, the general said on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information.

Suneid and Maliki insisted that this drive to contain militants, as opposed to a largely ineffective joint operation with the Americans in the second half of 2006, would succeed because it would be in the hands of Iraqi commanders who have been promised American backup and airpower if they call for it.

But U.S. political and military officials — in a message of congratulation on Iraq's Army Day — tempered Iraqi claims of full independence.

"As stated by the prime minister today, MNF-I (U.S. forces) will provide appropriate assistance as determined by Iraqi and coalition (American) field commanders, for the implementation of the new plan for securing Baghdad and its surrounding environs," said the statement from U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and overall American commander Gen. George Casey.

Suneid said President Bush signed off on the plan when he and Maliki spoke by video conference Thursday. The two leaders began formulating the operation during a November summit in Amman, Jordan.

Bush was widely reported to be planning to send at least 9,000 additional American forces to the capital from outside Iraq as part of his long-awaited strategy revisions in the fourth year of a war in which more than 3,000 American troops and tens of thousands of Iraqi's have died.

DOJ_NMG_0113407

Last summer the U.S. military and Iraqi army flooded the capital with 12,000 additional troops, but by October, the U.S. military spokesman said the operation had not met expectations and the situation was disheartening.

The last half of 2006 was one of the most violent periods in the center and west of the country since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion to topple Saddam Hussein. The U.S. death toll in the capital spiked with the presence of extra American troops on the street during Operation Together Forward II, which has been supplanted by the new Iraqi-dominated drive to cleanse the capital of militant fighters.

In the earlier drive, the Iraqi army failed to send much of the promised troop strength, making it impossible to secure neighborhoods after American forces cleared them of insurgent and militia fighters.

The Iraqi army general said Iraqi forces, while nominally operating independently, would rely heavily on American support.

Bush hopes to prove that the Iraqi military and security forces are capable of controlling violence by the end of the year, opening the way for an American withdrawal.

Maliki, whose political survival depends heavily on al-Sadr, the radical anti-American cleric, is eager to show his independence of American occupation forces. He wants the Americans to quickly turn over security control to Iraqi forces and withdraw to the outskirts of Baghdad and other cities, where they would be out of sight but could be called to action.

Military commanders said operations against the al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia in its Sadr City stronghold would be left largely to a joint force made up of U.S. soldiers and the Iraqi Special Operations Command division under Brig. Gen. Fadhil Birwari, a Kurd. Soldiers in the division are a mixture of Kurds and Arabs from both the Sunni and Shiite sects.

The prime minister has repeatedly rejected U.S. demands to move against the Mahdi Army.

Violence surged in Iraq Saturday after a week of relative quiet. Police reported 97 people were killed or found dead, 80 of them assassination victims dumped in Mosul, Baghdad and south of the capital.

Battle "Marks New Iraq Campaign" (BBC)

BBC.com, January 6, 2007

Iraqi army has reportedly killed 30 militants and arrested several others, including a number of Sudanese nationals, in a gun battle in Baghdad.

State TV said the firefight took place near Haifa Street, a Sunni district which housed top officials during Saddam Hussein's regime.

The engagement in the centre of the city is believed to mark the start of a new security drive in the capital.

Iraq's PM has pledged to take action against all illegal armed groups.

Earlier, 71 bodies, apparently the victims of sectarian violence, were found dumped at locations in Baghdad.

Twenty-seven were left near a Sunni shrine in the central Sheikh Marouf area. Police said they were the victims of execution-style killings.

Elsewhere, at least two people died when a parked car exploded near a fuel station in the Doura district of the city.

In another incident, a car bomb was detonated beside the motorcade of a senior police official, Major-General Ali Yasser. He survived, but a bystander was killed.

Meanwhile, the US military said its forces had killed four suspected insurgents and detained a fifth in the city. It said all five had been armed, and that they were suspected of involvement in making roadside bombs.

'No refuge'

Prime Minister Nouri Maliki said the new security plan would be implemented by the Iraqi army, supported by US forces.

Bush may send thousands more US troops to Baghdad Mr Maliki said the new security plan would create inconveniences for the people of Baghdad, but it was for their own good.

In a speech to mark Iraqi Army Day, he said: "We will rely on our armed forces to forcefully implement the plan and the multinational forces will support our forces."

He added: "There will be no refuge from this plan for anyone who is operating beyond the law, regardless of their sect or their political affiliation."

It comes only days before President George W Bush is due to outline his new strategy for Iraq.

He is widely expected to send thousands more troops to Iraq, despite calls from the new Democratic Party leaders of Congress for the US to begin withdrawing its forces.

Hanging row

Mr Maliki also said his government could review relations with any country which criticised the execution of ex-leader Saddam Hussein.

DOJ_NMG_0113408

Mr Maliki said the hanging was a "domestic affair" for the benefit of Iraq's unity, adding that the former president had received a fair trial.

Mobile phone images showing Saddam Hussein being taunted appeared on the internet days after the execution.

On Saturday, new UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon urged Iraq not to execute two of Saddam Hussein's co-defendants, Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti and former chief judge Awad al-Bandar.

Mr Ban was criticised this week for not stating the UN's opposition to the death penalty over Saddam Hussein's hanging.

Several Sunni Arab countries criticised the hanging as sectarian.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak said it had turned the former leader into a martyr.

7 Iraqis Killed In Continued Violence (AP)

AP, January 7, 2007

Gunmen killed three Sunni Muslim shopkeepers Sunday in a mixed neighborhood of Baghdad, and two pedestrians died in a roadside bomb, police said.

The shopkeepers were killed in Baghdad's southwestern Baya district. Two cars of gunmen screeched through the neighborhood's main marketplace, opening fire on wholesalers peddling food, clothing and housewares, a police officer said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media. One person was also injured.

In eastern Baghdad, a roadside bomb missed an Iraqi police patrol but killed two pedestrians and wounded two others, police said. Nearby, police said drive-by shooters sprayed bullets at four guards for the Iraqi finance ministry, killing one and injuring two others.

In Diwaniyah, 80 miles south of the capital, gunmen assassinated Akeel al-Khalidi, a defense ministry employee, as he left his house for work, another police officer said on condition of anonymity out of fear of reprisals.

Another roadside bomb went off near an American military convoy in Iskandariyah, 30 miles south of Baghdad, damaging one Humvee, police said. There was no word on casualties, and U.S. troops sealed off the area.

Maliki Unveils Effort To End Bloodshed (LAT)

By Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 7, 2007

Unlike the U.S. plan, the new one relies on Iraqi troops, not police. In Baghdad, soldiers kill 30 suspected insurgents.

BAGHDAD — Iraqi soldiers killed 30 suspected insurgents in a furious gun battle Saturday in downtown Baghdad, authorities said, in what appeared to be the opening salvo of a new plan by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to secure the capital.

Maliki announced the new effort to end bloodshed in Baghdad on Saturday, five months after the U.S. military launched a plan to quell sectarian fighting that is widely regarded as a failure. Killings have steadily increased in the capital as insurgents and Shiite Muslim militia death squads continue to operate with impunity.

Maliki's speech, to commemorate Iraqi Army Day, took place on a day when at least 71 corpses were found in the streets of Baghdad, one of the largest such discoveries in a civil war in which scores of bodies turn up daily.

Most of the victims had been bound, blindfolded, tortured and executed with gunshots to the chest or head. Twenty-seven of the bodies were found near the Sheik Omar cemetery, a Sunni Arab burial ground in downtown Baghdad. Some of the victims had been strangled.

Many of the dead were presumed to be the victims of Shiite death squads, police sources said.

Maliki said that he would crack down on Sunni Arab and Shiite militants with equal vigor.

"The Baghdad Security Strategy will not be a shelter to the outlaws regardless of their political or religious affiliation, and we shall punish anyone who thwarts the strategy or presses their sectarian or partisan agenda," he said.

Shortly after Maliki's address, Iraqi soldiers fought with suspected insurgents in downtown Baghdad. The gun battle took place on Haifa Street, a road that some U.S. soldiers call "Sniper Alley" because of the large number of attacks that have taken place there.

Maliki revealed little about the new plan except that the military would have the main responsibility, a shift from the previous operation, which relied on police officers. Iraq's police forces are widely believed to have compromised the U.S. plan to quell sectarian fighting.

The old plan called for U.S. and Iraqi forces to clear the capital, neighborhood by neighborhood. Once an area was cleared of insurgents and militia fighters, Iraqi police were supposed to take over.

DOJ_NMG_0113409

But Shiite militiamen in the police forces were accused of collaborating with death squads and implicated in killings of Sunni Arabs in "cleared" areas. The entire 8th Brigade of the national police was suspended after witnesses reported that men in police uniforms raided a meat-processing plant in October and kidnapped 26 Sunni Arab workers.

Sunni Arabs also complained that the security plan seemed to focus more attention on their communities than on Shiite militia strongholds such as Baghdad's Sadr City. Maliki criticized early U.S. incursions into the area. His Shiite alliance consists of political parties with armed militias.

The Iraqi army is believed to be less sectarian than the police, but it too has faced accusations of Shiite dominance. U.S. military commanders in Diyala province exerted more control over the Iraqi army's 5th Division in October after that Shiite-dominated force conducted abusive, arbitrary sweeps of Sunni Arab neighborhoods. Shiite-dominated Iraqi army units also have been accused of human rights abuses in towns such Fallouja and Rutbah in Al Anbar province.

Maliki also said he would fight joblessness "through public- and private-sector reconstruction," and he renewed his call for negotiations to bring Sunni Arab militants into the political process.

"Let's fold up the black past and work together to build a free, democratic and diverse Iraq without discrimination or marginalization," Maliki said.

The prime minister's speech appeared to dovetail with discussions in the Bush administration about increasing the number of U.S. troops to help secure Baghdad and other problem areas.

The Bush administration also is likely to propose a new reconstruction package focusing on creating jobs and refurbishing mothballed factories.

In many areas throughout central and western Iraq, poor security has brought industry to a standstill.

Maliki also called on Iraq's parliament to attend to pressing constitutional issues, oversight of anti-corruption agencies and the controversial de-Baathification effort, which left thousands of former regime members without jobs.

But parliament has not achieved a quorum in five weeks and is scheduled to take a recess after it completes Iraq's annual budget.

Maliki also used his speech to rebuff critics of the hanging of Saddam Hussein a week earlier. Shiite guards were recorded on a camera phone jeering and cursing the former Iraqi president as he stood on the gallows with a noose around his neck. Sunni Arab leaders in the Middle East criticized Maliki's decision to execute Hussein on a Muslim holiday.

"These countries know very well that Saddam trampled over everything holy and divine," Maliki said. "We see such behavior as provocative and interference in the internal matters of Iraq and an insult to the feelings of Saddam's victims."

The execution of two of Hussein's former aides is expected to take place soon.

Meanwhile, bloodshed continued in Iraq. In northeast Baghdad, gunmen stormed the home of a police colonel and killed his wife, four children and three other relatives.

U.S. soldiers killed four suspected insurgents during a Baghdad raid, the military announced.

A car bomb in the Baghdad neighborhood of Dora killed three people, and gunmen in Yarmouk killed the driver of Iraq's minister of higher education. A car bomb targeting the director of Baghdad's Emergency Police killed a bystander.

In the southern port city of Basra, two Iraqis were found dead near a soccer stadium. Police said they were investigating to determine whether the men were the interpreters kidnapped along with an American on Friday near Basra.

Bomb's Lasting Toll: Lost Laughter And Broken Lives (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 6 — If the cost of this war is measured in human lives, one block in southeast Baghdad has paid more than its share.

On a hot morning two summers ago, 34 children were killed here in a flash of smoke and metal. They were scooping up candy thrown from an American Humvee. The suicide bomber's truck never slowed down.

More than 3,000 Iraqis are dying every month in this war — roughly the total deaths in the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon or all the American troops killed since the war began. But behind the headlines and statistics, most of the war is experienced in Iraqi living rooms and on blocks like the one here, where families struggle with the intense pain of loss.

And while American war planners discuss the way ahead, Iraqis on this scarred block are stuck in the past on the morning of July 13, 2005, when time stopped and the war truly began for them.

"Our life now, it's not a life, it's a kind of dream," said Qais Ataiwee Yaseen, whose two boys, ages 8 and 11, were killed that day. "Life has no taste. I even feel sick of myself."

DOJ_NMG_0113410

In the early years of the war, the street — a dusty, trash-strewn strip of concrete that runs between Baghdad's southeast highway and the neighborhood of Naariya — was mostly quiet, home to a mix of Shiite and Sunni families who had known each other for years.

But the cruelty of the war intervened when the bomber struck, apparently aiming at a convoy of American Humvees parked at the end of the street. One American soldier and 34 Iraqis were killed. All were boys, and all but four were younger than 15. The youngest was 6. In all, 29 families lost children; one lost three sons.

In the seconds after the explosion, the world narrowed to one child for Sattar Hashim, a 39-year-old security guard whose son had gone out to see the American patrol. Mr. Hashim moved frantically through the wreckage, just outside his front gate, a scene now burned into his memory. He found his son unconscious, his body torn by shrapnel.

"I pray to God that no one in this world will ever have to face such a scene," he said, remembering the scene as he sat in his sparely furnished living room with the curtains drawn. "As if they had been scattered on the ground. Legs. Arms. Heads. Bodies still burning."

His son died in a hospital operating room several hours after the explosion.

Suicide bombings often stop clocks nearby, throwing the delicate mechanisms out of balance. The minute hand freezes the moment that the bomber detonates, and cleanup crews find clocks hanging crookedly on walls hours later, with the moment of loss fixed forever on the clocks' faces.

For the parents in Naariya, the clocks are frozen at a quarter after 10. The deaths that morning tore a hole in the life of the block, and more than a year later, many people have been unable to put their lives back together. Some have drifted away from their spouses. Others changed jobs or stopped going to work altogether. Reminders of the loss were everywhere: Class sizes were smaller. Soccer tournaments for 12-year-olds stopped. Bug collecting was no longer a hobby.

The pain caused strange things to happen. Mr. Yaseen lost his knack for numbers and found himself fumbling in front of customers at the hardware store where he had worked for years. Eventually, he quit. Reading and writing became difficult for Zahra Hussein, the mother of 11-year-old Hamza. She had lost her ability to concentrate and some of her eyesight.

Hadi Faris, Hamza's father, stopped his work as a driver. He could not control his thoughts, and concentrating on the road and split- second decisions was too onerous.

"I kept thinking how life is cheap, how so many innocent people are killed," he said, sitting in front of a kerosene heater in a small guest room.

After some months, he applied for, and was given, a job as a guard in his son's school. It felt somehow reassuring to do after his son's death what could not be done during his life: protect.

"I felt that all the kids were Hamza," he said. "My main job was to protect them all."

Life became empty and quiet for the children who were left. Adel Ali, 12, lost four of his best friends, most of his small soccer team and his entire bicycle-racing brigade. They had all shared a surge of happiness in the form of a birthday cake with candles, a first for most of the children, just days before the explosion. The experience was recorded in a grainy photograph of nine little boys making monkey faces. All but two are dead.

Adel spends his afternoons alone at home. In the early evening, he plays soccer with the older boys. They do not know the names of famous players that he and his friends gave each other when they made good plays. They do not know the sheer joy of riding bicycles while holding a rope together. They do not understand his loneliness.

"We used to play together, and the adults would play in another place," said Adel, his small fingers zipping and unzipping a fleece pullover at his neck.

The attack seemed calculated to make Iraqis despise Americans, in a pattern that would eventually succeed and change the direction of the war. But while some of the parents interviewed seem to have developed that hatred, many had not and even expressed respect. Mr. Faris said that immediately after the bombing he saw a soldier with a mangled arm trying to pick up a wounded child.

More Americans came to the area several weeks later and brought small trinkets to houses, in what Iraqis assumed was something of a peace offering.

"We never hurt the Americans, and the Americans never hurt us," Mr. Faris said.

A constant theme of the war for Iraqis has been their complete lack of control over chaotic, life-changing events. Like victims of a car wreck on an empty highway, they sit in pain and hope that help will come along.

Mr. Yaseen is haunted by the helplessness he felt that morning when he found his younger son, Ali, still alive. He was badly burned and missing his feet.

"I said to myself — two feet, it is nothing," he said. But within several hours the child was dead.

"I did not have the ability to do anything for him," Mr. Yaseen said. "To save him."

DOJ_NMG_0113411

Memories rush back at inconvenient moments. Mr. Yaseen has one in which his older son, Abbas, who loved bugs, begged him not to put poison down for the ants, saying, "They also have families and houses."

Even trifles sting. Ali, called English Ali for his tidiness and admiration for Americans, had only bread to eat for breakfast that morning.

"I'm like a dead man," said Mr. Yaseen, crying into his hands. "I have no ambitions. I have no goals in life. I have lost everything."

His wife and daughter have moved out, and he has retreated into his apartment, a 12-foot by 14-foot room. He stopped shaving. The room is now piled with baskets of laundry, old children's toys and a metal bassinet.

"I live in this room," he said. "I sleep in this room. I eat in this room. This is my whole life. As if I'm in prison."

Meanwhile, the war ground on, and the block was not immune to changes.

In February, poor Shiites rampaged in neighborhoods throughout eastern Baghdad. Naariya started to lose Sunnis. New graffiti in black paint across from Mr. Yaseen's house spelled praise for a Shiite cleric.

Three Shiite families from Diyala, a violent province north of Baghdad, arrived with the stunned look of refugees who just lost everything but their lives.

"There are no smiles on their faces," Ms. Hussein said. "You can tell they lost somebody."

Attacks on Shiites by Sunni militants started to wear, and families on the block began asking about the backgrounds of newcomers.

A small statue erected in the children's memory was blown up, and a bomb was planted under a date palm tree nearby, but it did not explode. During the Ramadan holiday in October, around 20 Sunni men disappeared from the neighborhood. Their bodies turned up in different neighborhoods several days later.

Mr. Hashim heard of the kidnappings but was afraid to ask about them.

"We woke up one day," he said, "and a family had left." The 2005 explosion gouged the pavement in front of his house, and afterward he had a large blast wall built. The wall had the added benefit of shielding him from seeing the crater in the street day after day.

For Adel, the 12-year-old whose friends were killed, memories returned in spurts. Some time after the July attack, he took his bicycle to the balcony of his house and threw it off. He was angry about what happened, Ms. Hussein said. A month ago, his life became even more isolated: a guard and a teacher from his school were killed, and Adel's father began keeping him home.

The boys come back in unexpected ways. Hamza's sister sees her brother's face in a boy who lives in a house on her way to school. She gives him candy sometimes. Mr. Yaseen often sees his boys in dreams.

In one, Abbas asks him why he is crying. He spoke of his own burial in a reassuring way. "He tried to make it easy for me," Mr. Yaseen said.

Speaking of the deaths, Mr. Hashim said: "It formed a hole, a big hole. Before the street was crowded. Cars had to go slowly. Now it's empty."

Before Hanging, A Push For Revenge And A Push Back (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

This article was reported by John F. Burns, James Glanz, Sabrina Tavernise and Marc Santora and written by Mr. Burns.

BAGHDAD, Jan. 6 — When American soldiers woke Saddam Hussein in his cell near Baghdad airport at 3:55 a.m. last Saturday, they told him to dress for a journey to Baghdad. He had followed the routine dozens of times before, traveling by helicopter in the predawn darkness to the courtroom where he spent 14 months on trial for his life.

When his cell lights were dimmed on Friday night, Mr. Hussein may have hoped that he would live a few days longer, and perhaps cheat the hangman altogether.

According to Task Force 134, the American military unit responsible for all Iraqi detainees, Mr. Hussein "had heard some of the rumors on the radio about potential execution dates." But never one to understate his own importance, he had told his lawyers for months that the Americans might spare him in the end, for negotiations to end the insurgency whose daily bombings rattled his cellblock windows.

As Mr. Hussein prepared to walk out into the chill of the desert winter, dressed in a tailored black overcoat, that last illusion was shattered. After being roused and told that he was being transferred to Iraqi custody, a task force statement e-mailed to The New York Times a week later revealed, "he immediately indicated that he knew the execution would soon follow."

"As he left the detention area, he thanked the guards and medics for the treatment he had received," said Lt. Col. Keir-Kevin Curry, spokesman for the task force. Mr. Hussein was then driven to a waiting Black Hawk helicopter for a 10-minute flight to the old Istikhbarat prison in northern Baghdad, where a party of Iraqi officials awaited him at the gallows. “During this brief period of transfer, Saddam Hussein appeared more serious,” the task force said.

The time as the helicopter took off was 5:05 a.m., and Mr. Hussein had 65 minutes to live. But as he flew over Baghdad’s darkened suburbs, he can have known little of the last-minute battle waged between top Iraqi and American officials — and among the Americans themselves — over whether the execution, fraught with legal ambiguities and Islamic religious sensitivities, should go ahead.

American opposition to executing him in haste centered partly on the fact that the Id al-Adha religious holiday, marking the end of the annual Muslim pilgrimage to Mecca, began for Sunnis at sunrise on Saturday. In Baghdad, the sun was to rise at 7:06 a.m. Iraqi government officials had promised the hanging would be over before the dawn light began seeping through the palms that shade the capital’s streets.

The taunts Mr. Hussein endured from Shiite guards as he stood with the noose around his neck have made headlines around the world, and stirred angry protests among his fellow Iraqi Sunnis. But the story of how American commanders and diplomats fought to halt the execution until midnight on Friday, only six hours before Mr. Hussein was hanged, is only now coming into focus, as Iraqi and American officials, in the glare of international outrage over the hanging, compete with their versions of what happened.

Tensions Boil Over

It is a story of the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, trying to coerce second-tier American military and diplomatic officials into handing over Mr. Hussein, first on Thursday night, then again on Friday. The American push back was complicated by the absences of Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and the top American military commander, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who were both out of Iraq on leave. The American message throughout was that rushing Mr. Hussein to the gallows could rebound disastrously, as it did.

It is a story, too, of the Americans disagreeing among themselves. After a final call to Mr. Maliki at 10:30 p.m. Friday, American and Iraqi officials said, Mr. Khalilzad concluded that there was no prospect of persuading the Iraqis to delay the execution and passed that message to Washington. The conclusion found little favor with the military, who were the ones who had to transport Mr. Hussein to the gallows.

For General Casey and Mr. Khalilzad, close partners here, the messy ending for Mr. Hussein was made worse by the confirmation this week that Mr. Bush will soon replace both men as he refashions his Iraq war policy.

There were disputes among the Iraqis as well. At least one senior judge from the tribunal that sentenced Mr. Hussein to die, and three American lawyers who worked closely with the Iraqis at his trials, fought their own rearguard battle, telling fellow Iraqis how surprised they were that he received the death sentence in the narrow case that produced it — the “systematic persecution” of Dujail, a small Shiite town north of Baghdad, after an alleged assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein there in 1982.

In interviews with dozens of American and Iraqi officials involved in the hanging, a picture has emerged of a clash of cultures and political interests, reflecting the widening gulf between Americans here and the Iraqi exiles who rode to power behind American tanks. Even before a smuggled cellphone camera recording revealed the derision Mr. Hussein faced on the gallows, the hanging had become a metaphor, among Mr. Maliki’s critics, for how the “new Iraq” is starting to resemble the repressive, vengeful place it was under Mr. Hussein, albeit in a paler shade.

The hanging spread wide dismay among the Americans. Aides said American commanders were deeply upset by the way they were forced to hand Mr. Hussein over, a sequence commanders saw as motivated less by a concern for justice than for revenge. In the days following the hanging, recriminations flowed between the military command and the United States Embassy, accused by some officers of abandoning American interests at midnight Friday in favor of placating Mr. Maliki and hard-line Shiites.

But for Mr. Maliki’s inner circle, the hanging was a moment to avenge decades of brutal repression by Mr. Hussein, as well as a moment to drive home to Iraq’s five million Sunnis that after centuries of subjugation, Shiites were in power to stay. At the “White House,” as his officials now describe Mr. Maliki’s headquarters in the Green Zone, a celebratory dinner began Friday night even before the Americans withdrew their threat not to hand over Mr. Hussein.

An Iraqi who attended the hanging said the government saw the Americans as wasting time with their demands for a delay until after the four-day Id al-Adha holiday, and for whatever time beyond that required to obtain the legal authorizations they considered necessary. For the Americans to claim the moral high ground afterward by disavowing the hanging, the Iraqi said, was disingenuous.

"They cannot wash their hands, this is a joint responsibility," he said. "They had the physical custody, and we had the legal custody. At one point, I asked, 'Is it our call or is it your call?' They said, 'It's your call.' I said, 'If it's our call, we've made the decision.' " Legal niceties could not save Mr. Hussein, he said, concluding, "The man has to go."

In a speech on Saturday, a week after the hanging, Mr. Maliki showed that he remains as angry as the Americans. Hitting out at governments and human rights organizations around the world that have condemned the hanging, he said they were hypocritical. "We're wondering where these organizations were during the crimes of Anfal and Halabja," he said, referring to Mr. Hussein's persecution of Iraqi Kurds. "Where were they during the mass graves and the executions and the massacres that killed hundreds of thousands of Iraqis?"

Differing Timelines

The countdown to the hanging began eight weeks earlier, on Nov. 5, as Raouf Abdel-Rahman, the chief judge in the Dujail case, passed death sentences on Mr. Hussein and two associates, Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti, Mr. Hussein's half-brother, and Awad al-Bandar, chief judge of Mr. Hussein's revolutionary court, for crimes against humanity in the hanging of 148 men and boys from the Shiite town. "Go to hell, you and the court!" Mr. Hussein yelled as bailiffs ushered him out.

The widespread expectation was that the appeal of the death sentences would run for months, allowing time for the more notorious Anfal case, involving charges of genocide in the killing of 180,000 Kurds, to be completed before Mr. Hussein was hanged. American lawyers in the embassy's Regime Crimes Liaison Office, the behind-the-scenes organizer of the trials, predicted Mr. Hussein's execution in the spring.

When the tribunal's appeals bench announced that it had upheld the death sentences on Dec. 26, three weeks into the appeal, even prosecutors were stunned. Defense lawyers said Mr. Hussein was being railroaded under pressure from Mr. Maliki, who told a BBC interviewer shortly after the Dujail verdict that he expected the ousted ruler to be hanged before year's end.

The suspicion that the judges had submitted to government pressure was shared by some of Americans working with the tribunal, who had stifled their growing disillusionment with the government's interference for months. Among a host of other complaints, the Americans' frustrations focused on the government's dismissal of two judges seen as too indulgent with Mr. Hussein, and its failure to investigate seriously when three defense lawyers were killed. The appeals court's apparent eagerness to fast-forward Mr. Hussein to the gallows — and the scenes at the execution itself — was, for some of the Americans, the last straw.

On the Thursday before the hanging, American military officials were summoned. Both Mr. Khalilzad and General Casey were on vacation, so the American team handling negotiations with Mr. Maliki and his officials was headed by Maj. Gen. Jack Gardner, head of Task Force 134, the detainee unit, and Margaret Scobey, head of the embassy's political section.

Iraqi officials said neither carried much weight with Mr. Maliki, who had learned through bruising confrontations to be wary of alienating Mr. Khalilzad and General Casey, both of whom have direct access to President Bush. At the Thursday afternoon meeting, tempers frayed. According to an Iraqi legal expert at the meeting, Iraqi officials demanded that the Americans hand over Mr. Hussein that night, for an execution before dawn on Friday.

General Gardner responded with demands of his own, for letters affirming the legality of the execution from Mr. Maliki, President Jalal Talabani and the chief judge of the high tribunal that convicted Mr. Hussein, the Iraqi legal expert said. The focus was on two issues: a constitutional requirement that Iraq's three-man presidency council approve all executions, and a Hussein-era law forbidding executions during religious holidays.

Mr. Talabani, a death penalty opponent, refused to sign off on the hanging, but did sign a letter for Mr. Maliki saying he had no objections if the government went ahead. The Iraqis, bolstering their case, said that the Hussein tribunal's own statute, drafted by the Americans, placed its rulings beyond review. They dismissed the holiday ban on executions, saying Iraq's death penalty law had been suspended by the Americans in 2003 and that the new Iraqi Parliament, in reviving it in 2004, had not reinstituted the ban.

An Iraqi participant who opposed the hanging said that Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Mr. Maliki's national security adviser, said angrily, "This is an Iraqi issue," and added, "Who is going to execute him anyway, you or us?" When the Americans insisted they would not hand over Mr. Hussein without the letters, another Iraqi official exploded: "Just give him to us!"

By Thursday evening, pressures for a quick hanging were growing. Esam al-Gazawi, a Hussein lawyer, said by telephone from Jordan that his legal team had been denied a final visit to Camp Cropper, the American detention center, and that they had been told to send somebody to collect Mr. Hussein's personal belongings.

Around midnight on Thursday, the meeting broke up, and General Gardner contacted commanders at Camp Cropper to tell them to stand down. By then, the American command had entered what it called its "X-hour sequence," a 10-hour countdown to the execution that provided a timeline for everything the Americans needed to do to ensure Mr. Hussein's "secure and dignified" delivery to the execution site.

DOJ_NMG_0113414

Negotiations resumed Friday morning. In Phoenix, 10 time zones away, General Casey was monitoring the exchanges in signals traffic from Baghdad. American military officials remained opposed to an immediate hanging, telling Mr. Maliki that beyond the legal issues, there was a question of his government's need to gain international support by carrying out the hanging in a way that could withstand any criticism.

"We said, 'You have to do it by international law, you have to do it in accordance with international standards of decorum, you have to establish yourselves as a nation under law,' " an American official recounted. When Mr. Maliki said the Americans should respect Iraq's right to decide matters for itself, American officials said, one of the Americans said: "Forget about us. You're in front of the international community here. People will be watching this."

The arguments continued deep into the Iraqi night. General Gardner and Ms. Scobey returned at one point to the former Republican Palace, the American headquarters in the Green Zone, seeking Washington's advice. Workarounds for the legal problems were discussed.

At 10:30 p.m., Ambassador Khalilzad made a last-ditch call to Mr. Maliki asking him not to proceed with the hanging. When the Iraqi leader remained adamant, an American official said, the ambassador made a second call to Washington conveying "the determination of the Iraqi prime minister to go forward," and his conclusion that there was nothing more, consistent with respect for Iraqi sovereignty, that the United States could do.

Senior Bush administration officials in Washington said that Mr. Khalilzad's principal contact in Washington was Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and that she gave the green light for Mr. Hussein to be turned over, despite the reservations of the military commanders in Baghdad. One official said that Ms. Rice was supported in that view by Stephen J. Hadley, Mr. Bush's national security adviser.

"It literally came down to the Iraqis interpreting their law, and our looking at their law and interpreting it differently," the official said. "Finally, it was decided we are not the court of last appeal for Iraqi law here. The president of their country says it meets their procedures. We are not going to be their legal nannies."

Mr. Khalilzad had suggested that the Iraqis get a written ruling approving the execution from Midhat al-Mahmoud, the chief judge of Iraq's Supreme Judicial Council; Mr. Mahmoud refused. Then, the Iraqis played their trump card: a call to high-ranking Shiite clerics in the holy city of Najaf, asking for approval from the marjaiya, the supreme authority in Iraqi Shiism. When his officials reported that they had it, Mr. Maliki signed a letter authorizing the hanging. It was 11:45 p.m.

The Americans suggested that foreign reporters be invited to the hanging, along with United Nations observers. American commanders feared the concern for procedure might be swept away by the urge for revenge. "Anybody who's been involved in a firefight will tell you there's a moment when rage takes over," an American official said. The Iraqis dismissed the idea of outside observers and assembled an execution party of 14 Shiite officials and a Sunni cleric invited to help Mr. Hussein with his prayers.

The 'X-Hour Sequence'

At Camp Cropper, the X-hour sequence was running for a second night. Helicopters were positioned. Special security measures went into effect along the flight path. The Americans dispatched sniffer dogs along the route of Mr. Hussein's final steps and into the execution chamber, the only time any American set foot there.

Before he left the camp, Mr. Hussein bade farewell to American soldiers who guarded him during the latter stages of his 1,110 days in solitary confinement. There, and again after the helicopter carrying him landed at 5:15 a.m. at Camp Justice, the American military post in the Kadhimiya district of northern Baghdad that encloses the Istikhbarat prison, the former dictator went man to man, thanking each of the Americans for looking after him.

At 5:21 a.m., he was led into the prison, a forbidding, four-story concrete building that once housed the headquarters of Mr. Hussein's military intelligence agency and now is a base for an Iraqi Army brigade. The Americans took him to a holding room and exchanged papers with the prison governor formalizing the transfer.

"At that point, he was dignified," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the American command's chief spokesman, said at a briefing later. "He said farewell to his interpreter. He thanked the military police squad, the lieutenant who was the squad leader, the medical doctor we had present, the American colonel who was on site." He added, with emphasis, "And then we had absolutely nothing to do with any of the procedures or any of control mechanisms or anything from that point forward."

At 5:30 a.m., the Iraqis took over. An American official who watched said Mr. Hussein's demeanor "changed in the Iraqi prison when the Iraqi governor assumed control of him." Mr. Hussein had long since told his American captors that he trusted them but not the Iraqis.

"He was still dignified, but he was scornful," the American official said.

Mr. Rubaie, the security adviser, said that when Mr. Hussein stepped into the execution block, an ill-lighted concrete structure behind the main prison building where thousands of hangings took place under Mr. Hussein, he seemed composed.

DOJ_NMG_0113415

"He made some joking remarks," he said. "He said to me, 'Don't be afraid,' as if I was going to be hanged. I didn't reply, but one of the guards shouted, 'You did bad things to Iraq.' And he said, 'I made this backward country into an advanced and prosperous nation.' "

After that, the story is taken up by the illicit cellphone video that has caused an uproar among Iraqi Sunnis and across the world, showing Mr. Hussein erect on the gallows in his black overcoat and gray beard, staring ahead, and answering back, as taunts flowed from Shiites gathered in front of the platform.

Mr. Hussein got halfway through the most sacred of Muslim prayers. "There is no God but God, and Muhammad. ..." The trapdoor clanged open. It was 6:10 a.m.

Securing the Body

Before 7 a.m., helicopters ferried Iraqi officials back to the Green Zone, along with Mr. Hussein's body. For nearly 17 hours, Mr. Maliki and his officials remained locked in a dispute with Sunni officials and leaders of Mr. Hussein's Albu Nasir tribe, with Mr. Maliki's officials refusing to release the body, saying they wanted no shrine to him. Throughout, the body, in a white shroud, remained inside the ambulance in the parking lot behind Mr. Maliki's office.

For the last time, the Americans intervened, flying a delegation from Tikrit, Mr. Hussein's hometown, to Baghdad, and returning them 110 miles north again after Mr. Maliki, at nearly midnight, agreed to let the body go.

It was transferred to a pine coffin, loaded onto the open back of a police pickup, and driven back to Landing Zone Washington, the Green Zone helipad.

Upset by events in the execution chamber, and concerned at attracting any fresh anger from Iraqi Sunnis, the Americans ordered their troops not to touch Mr. Hussein's body after the execution, even as it was loaded and unloaded from their helicopters.

This left Iraqi officials to unload the stretcher carrying the body when the execution party returned to the Green Zone from the prison. Mr. Rubaie, the security adviser, said he helped carry the stretcher bearing the body from the helicopter to a waiting ambulance.

"We weren't walking, we were jogging" to the ambulance, he said. "This was a chapter we wanted to get done and finished with. We just wanted it to be over."

A Slim Guidebook For Executing A Deposed Ruler (NYT)

By Mary Jo Murphy

The New York Times, January 7, 2007

THE Ceausescus of Romania were dragged to their executions on Christmas Day 1989 with Nicolae singing "The Internationale" and Elena alternately directing her captors to hell and snapping at them, "I was like a mother to you."

Or so go accounts by some of the executioners. Videotape shown on Romanian television in the aftermath records scenes from a farcical tribunal but stops as the couple are led away after they're condemned, picking up again only after the deed is done, the bullet-pocked bodies cooling where they fell.

The event did not need cellphones and YouTube to peel back the veneer of civility.

But while there is no manual for such occasions — modern history gives us relatively few instances of absolute rulers being deposed, tried and executed — all the talk last week after the hanging of Saddam Hussein suggests that we viewers thought there was some greater codification of the protocols and proprieties than was apparent in the mocking scene that unfolded.

Certainly the hanging of Mr. Hussein and the shooting of the Ceausescus lacked the decorously scripted quality of the beheading of Charles I in 1649, which from trial to scaffold might have lent a template. It had "a deliberate air of formality and solemnity," said Dr. Jason Peacey, a lecturer at University College London who has studied the regicide. There were "rival ideas about how to go about putting the king on trial," but it was decided to "not do things in the dark and in the corner and behind closed doors."

The British monarch never recognized the legitimacy of his judges but still played his role elegantly, even reaching an accommodation with his executioner. "Stay for the sign," Charles reminded him as he laid his neck on the block. The executioner did, swinging the ax only after Charles spread wide his arms in a kind of benediction.

Dr. Peacey and his colleagues discussed the "remarkable similarity" of the Hussein trial to Charles's in one regard: the appearance of legality was deemed important.

But events have a way of overtaking such considerations. Trotsky favored a trial for Czar Nicholas II of Russia, a step which "would have shown the population all of Nicholas's alleged crimes and thus served as both public political education and a ritual of humiliation and thus desacralization of a ruler who claimed divine sanction," said Mark D. Steinberg, a professor of history at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign who has written on the czar's fall.

DOJ_NMG_0113416

Somebody, perhaps Lenin, was in a hurry, however, Mr. Steinberg said, and "whoever ordered it, what resulted was a brutish affair — secret, in the middle of the night, in a basement, with not only the czar and czaritsa killed but also children and servants."
